The International Conference

– CKS 2019 –

Challenges of the Knowledge Society

Bucharest, 17th - 18th May 2019, 13th Edition

“Nicolae Titulescu” University Publishing House
Calea Văcărești, nr. 185, sector 4, Bucharest
Phone/Fax: +400213309032/+400213308606
Email: editura@univnt.ro

ISSN 2359-9227
ISSN-L 2068-7796

Indexed by EBSCO, ProQuest, DOAJ,
Index Copernicus, Ulrich`s Databases

INTERNATIONAL SCIENTIFIC COMMITTEE

ORGANIZING COMMITTEE

OFFERING BRIBES: A LEGI-PRAGMATIC PERSPECTIVE

Basim Yahya Jasim AL-GBURI[•]

Abstract

Offering a bribe is generally thought of as giving something of value with corrupt intent to influence an action of a civil servant in his official capacity. This act can be accomplished physically or verbally hiding behind elaborate code words built in socio-pragmatic norms specific to a given community so that they can easily mislead those outside the transaction. The present paper approaches this offence from two perspectives: legal and pragmatic. It shows how it has been perceived in criminal laws and how it is realized through socio-linguistic expressions which can potentially be understood by the interactants as signs of offering bribes. The study is guided by two research questions: Are there linguistic expressions from which the speakers of Iraqi Arabic can typically infer that the speaker is offering bribes? And what insights can the pragmatic analysis offer the judge or trier of facts in evaluating the evidence on this offence? The major argument in the present paper is that the linguistic evidence can have no less evidentiary value in detecting the corrupt intent of bribery than the circumstantial evidence.

Keywords: Bribery, Pragmatic analysis, forensic linguistics, criminal evidence, Iraqi context bribery in Iraq.

1. Introduction

In everyday interaction people use verbal and nonverbal means of communication to convey the message to their interlocutors. Offer, agreement, disagreement, warning, accepting, refusing, requesting etc., can be performed by nonlinguistic means using gestures, body movements, hands or signs. Using language to request something or someone to do something, offering something to someone or agreeing to do something to someone are all actions that can also be performed through language. Such verbal actions are not suspected or incriminated. They are commonly used in normal communication. They are suspected and indicted only when they contain illegal elements. That is when what is being offered, requested or accepted is illegal or illegitimate. Technically speaking, when what is exchanged is illegal quid pro quo.

To most people bribery is no more than offering someone some money for doing something which he should not do and the other party, usually a public official, agrees to do it. It is the practice of enticing someone to do something he is otherwise unwilling or reluctant or legally forbidden to do, with money or gift. But bribery is much more complicated than this. It is applicable only when the transaction is forbidden by law either explicitly or implicitly and requires one party to break a law, or neglect his duties and typically involves a public official who agrees to do this illegal action. Bribes can hide behind terms ranging from direct to indirect using various strategies of indirectness and elaborate code words built in socio-pragmatic norms that are specific to a given community group and can easily mislead those outside the transaction.

The present paper attempts to consider offering bribes from two perspectives: legal and pragmatic focusing on the pragmatic aspect. This is because the pragmatic manifestation has not been given its due interest in the literature on bribery despite the fact that the words that accompany the acts of offering, requesting, and accepting can change these physical acts into punishable crimes. This paper provides a data-based evidence on offering bribes with all its verbal manifestations in the Iraqi context in all its phases and from which interactants can easily infer the intended meaning which the speaker wants to convey. The major argument in the present study is that the linguistic evidence can have no less evidentiary value in detecting the corrupt intent of bribery than the circumstantial evidence. It is guided by two research questions: Are there linguistic expressions from which the speakers of Iraqi Arabic can typically infer that the speaker is offering bribes? And what insights can the pragmatic analysis offer the judge or trier of facts in evaluating the evidence on this offence?

Bribery: Legally Considered

Bribery is commonly thought of as a corrupt behaviour or a misconduct of a public official accused of betraying the public trust by requesting or accepting money, an article of value, or a benefit in return for his official responsibility. Collin (2000:36) defines it loosely as "the crime of giving someone a bribe-money offered corruptly to someone to get him to do something". Oran and Tosti (2000:61) view it as the offering, giving, receiving or soliciting of anything of value in order to influence the actions of a public official". Martin (1997:52) stipulates that the offer, reward, or advantage be given to a servant of a public body "in relation to any matter with which that body is concerned. A more comprehensive definition of bribery is provided by West's Encyclopedia of American Law;

[•] Department of English, College of Arts, University of Mosul, Iraq. e-mail: algburi55@gmail.com

where bribery is seen as "the offering, giving, receiving or soliciting of something for the purpose of influencing the action of an official in the discharge of his or her public or legal duties. A bribe may consist of money, or of personal favour or benefit, a promise to later payment or privilege, or anything else the recipient views as valuable. " (Hooper, 1968:118)

Bribery, as such, overlaps with related acts such as extortion and blackmail and grafts. For Perkins and Boyce (1982 in Garner 1999:605) the dividing line between bribery and extortion is shadowy. If one other than the officer corruptly takes the initiative and offers what he knows is not authorized fee, it is bribery; if the officer corruptly makes an unlawful demand which is made by one who does not realize it is not the fee authorized for the service rendered, it is extortion. For Martin (1997: 181) extortion is an offence committed by a public official who uses his position to take money or any other benefit that is not due to him. Lindgren (1993: 1695-1702) distinguishes between two types of extortion: extortion by threat and fear and extortion under colour of office. Coercive extortion refers to the illegal use of threat or fear to obtain property or advantages from another; extortion under colour office is the seeking of a corrupt payment by the public official because of his ability to influence official action.

By contrast, bribery seeks not only to have a preferential treatment but also to influence the official action in his or her favour. Thus, "the same envelop filled with cash can be a payment extorted under the influence of unfairly positive treatment"(Ibid:1700).

Blackmail is the act of getting money or a benefit from someone by threatening to make public information of a secret which a person does not want it to be revealed. Elliott and Quinn (2006: 219) and Martin (1997: 47) consider a person guilty of blackmail when he makes any unwarranted demand with menaces for the purpose of financial gain. Menace is the major criterion for distinguishing extortion and bribery from Blackmail.

Grafti also overlaps with bribery. It is defined as offering, or receiving money, a benefit, or an article of value as a reward for a past official decision in an attempt to receive favourable consideration in the future. . Various states in the United states declare it a crime because the public is deprived of the right to receive honest and faithful service.

Thus, blackmail and extortion are similar to bribery in that both involve receiving money or advantage as an inducement for doing or omitting to do something. They differ from bribery in that bribery is an offence of a public official while blackmail and extortion are not. Also, both blackmail and extortion have varying degrees of menace, whereas bribes are mostly given voluntarily. Graft differs from bribery in that graft, unlike bribery, does not require an intent to influence or to be influenced .

Legally, bribery comprises three distinct types of acts: bribery of public officials, bribery of elections and bribery of and by agents. The present paper is restricted to the first type of acts, namely, bribery of public officials.

In bribery of public officials two important elements must be available: a public official and a corrupt intent to influence or to be influenced in carrying out a public duty to wrongfully gain a financial or other advantage for himself or herself. And in order to find the defendant guilty of this offense most of world statutes, including Iraqi penal code No. 111 of 1969 Articles No.207-214 (amended), stipulates that the prosecutor must prove each of the following three elements beyond a responsible doubt: 1) That the accused offered, gave or promised something of value to a public official; 2) That the person(s) who solicited or received the money or article of value was at that time a public official; and 3) That the offerer and/ or the public official did so corruptly with the intention to influence an official act as a remuneration for the advantage or promise given.

The first element in bribery is that the public official must be a government officer or employee acting for or on the behalf of the government. The official act is usually understood as any decision or action which may at any time be pending or be brought before any public official, in such official capacity, or in such official's place of trust. The decisions or actions are those which are generally expected of public official.

The corrupt intent is the second important element in bribery which must be proved by the prosecutor beyond any responsible doubt. The court must contend beyond a reasonable doubt that a person who offers money or a thing of value corruptly to a public official acts knowingly and intentionally with the purpose of accomplishing an unlawful end regardless whether the act was successful or not.

Because of the importance of proving or disproving intent in bribery a detailed discussion of this concept will be made paying special attention to physical and verbal representation of the corrupt intent in bribery.

Intent is commonly viewed as a psychological phenomenon (De Jong 2011:1). It is a "mental state that a person may have regarding the doing of a future act" (Tiersma 1987:324). Black's Law Dictionary distinguishes between intent and motive. Unlike motive which is the inducement to do some act, intent is the mental resolution or determination to do it. It is the state of mind accompanying an act especially a forbidden act. (pp. 813-814). Various types of intent can be identified: intent can be general or pertaining to specific crimes; immediate relating to wrongful act or implied from speech or conduct. A person's intent cannot be easily proven by overt behaviour or witness's testimonies. The court, therefore, has to infer it from the subtotal of the circumstances including factual presumptions (Kadmi 1994 in Azuelos-Atias 2007:101).

In Bribery, the corrupt intent must be proved in the act of offering, soliciting and/ or accepting money or the items of value by the public official which will influence the discharge of his official duties in return for the payment. More specifically, "the item of value must be corruptly offered with the intent to induce that person to act in a particular way in his or her official capacity" (Solan&Tiersma 2007: 194). Likewise, the prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, the public official acted with corrupt intent in exchange for the illegal quid pro quo.

It is not necessary to show that the public official to whom the bribe was offered was actually corrupted by the offer. Similarly, there is no need to show that the official accepted the bribe. Some statutes pass that regardless of who initiates the deal. Either party can be found guilty of the crime independently of the other. Saudi Arabia Anti Bribery Law in Resolution No.175 on 28-12-1412 AH provides in Article (9) that "any person offering a bribe, and which is not accepted from him shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding (10) years or fine not exceeding one million Rials or both". Article 313 of Iraqi Penal Code No.111 of 1969 provides that "anyone who offers a bribe to a public official and is not accepted from him shall be punished with imprisonment or fine". This implies that there must be a corrupt intent in the mind of one of the parties; therefore it is personal not joint in nature. Yet, bribery is generally regarded as an offense of a public official and the offerer of the bribe is deemed an accessory whose punishment is derived from the punishment of the public official.

Bribery: Pragmatically considered

The act of bribery is partly physical and partly linguistic. The physical act is usually expressed through offering, or promising to offer, requesting, accepting or taking money, an article of value or a benefit. Linguistically, the act of bribery is usually expressed indirectly through words but its intention can be guessed by the interactants through various types of contextual and paralinguistic cues. Pragmatics, the study of the intended meaning of the speaker, the choice he makes, the effect his use of language has on other participants in an act of communication (Leech,1983;Crystal 1991;Yule1996) is particularly relevant to the linguistic analysis of bribery.

Pragmatists postulate that on any occasion the verbal action performed by a speaker consists of three related acts: locutionary; illocutionary, and perlocutionary (Austin,1962; Searle,1979). A locutionary act is the basic act of utterance or producing meaningful linguistic expressions: An illocutionary act is the use of well-formed utterances to perform specific communicative function(s): to make a statement, an offer, a suggestion ,and the like…The perlocutionary acts refer to the effect, the speaker wants to create upon other participant(s) while producing his utterance. Pragmatics, in fact, focuses on what is not explicitly communicated and on how utterances in situational contexts are interpreted. It is concerned "not so much with the sense of what is said as with…what is communicated by the manner and style of an utterance" (Finch 2000:150). This is why the act of bribery can have pragmatic implications.

Speech Act Theory

An essential topic that exists in almost all books on pragmatics is speech acts. Speech act theory originally initiated by J. Austin (1962) in his book "How to do things with words" and developed by the philosopher John R. Searle assumes that a significant part of our use of language is to perform certain acts, and that utterances can be regarded as events in a similar way to other actions. Austin first distinguishes between constatives and performatives. Constatives are utterances such as statements and questions where actions are being described or asked about rather than explicitly performed. Performatives on the other hand are utterances the saying of which perform the actions named by the verbs (Finch 2000: 181). In order for specific utterances to be counted as performatives, a number of conditions must be met. These conditions are called felicity conditions. Austin (1962 in levinson 1983 : 229) distinguishes three main categories of these conditions;

a) There must be a conventional procedure having a conventional effect, and the circumstances and persons must be appropriate as specified in the procedure.
b) The procedure must be executed correctly and completely, and
c) Often the person must have the requisite thoughts, feelings and intention, as specified in the procedure and if consequent conduct in specified, then the relevant parties must do.

In addition to the felicity conditions, Yule (1996: 50) points out that in everyday contexts among ordinary people there are at least six preconditions on speech act. There are the general conditions, that they understand each other and are non sensical, content conditions, that the content of the utterance must be about a future event; preparatory conditions, that each act has its own preparation; sincerity conditions, that the speaker genuinely intends to carry out the future action; and essential conditions, that the utterance changes the state of action or being and create new state or obligation. In bribery, for example, the general condition is that each party ,the offerer and the offeree are serious and want to complete the transactions. The content condition is available in that offering bribes is for doing a future act. Sincerityconditions is met since both the parties intend to perform what they commit themselves to do.

Many suggestions have been offered to classify speech acts. The most important classification is the one presented by Searle (1977 in May 1993: 131). Searle distinguishes five main types of speech acts: representative, directives, commissives, expressives and declarative. Representative speech acts represent a state of affairs where the intention is to make the words fit the world e.g. statements. Directives aim at directing the hearer towards doing something e.g. orders. Commissives are those types of speech acts in which the speaker commits himself to doing something e.g. promise. Expressives involve expressing a certain psychological state e.g. congratulations. Declarations are speech acts that bring about something to the world e.g. marriage and divorce (Cf. Leech 1983: 205-206; Finch 2000: 182).

Indirectness: Characteristics and Strategies

Speech acts of the kinds already mentioned can either be direct or indirect. A speech act is said to be direct when the form of the utterance coincides with what the speaker is intending to convey i.e. when the utterance directly, openly, plainly and bluntly communicates what it intends to communicate. By contrast in indirect speech acts there is a mismatch between expressed and implied meaning. In indirectness, Searle (1979: 31-32) notesthat "the speaker communicates to the hearer more than he actually says by way of relying on their mutually-shared background linguistic and non-linguistic knowledge together with the general powers of nationality and inference on the part of the hearer.

Indirect speech acts are quite common in everyday conversation. Pinker et al (2008: 833) point out that people often do not blurt out what they mean in so many words; they, instead, veil their intentions in innuendo, euphemism, or double speaker. When people speak, they often insinuate their intent indirectly rather than stating it as a bald proposition. Examples include: sexual come-ons, veiled threats, polite requests, and concealed bribes. Because of most bribery acts are done indirectly a detailed discussion of the indirect speech acts is going to be made so as to provide a linguistic background for subsequent discussion.

Indirectness is an immediate and central concern of pragmatics. Obeing (1994: 42) views it as "a communicative strategy in which the interactants abstain from directness in order to obviate crises or in order to communicate difficulty and thus make their utterances consistent with this face and politeness". Indirectness is often appealed to for a variety of reasons. Thomas (1995: 143-6) points out that indirectness is universally used for four reasons: interestingness, increasing the force of the message, competing goals and politeness, and regard of face. In other words indirect speech is used to make the message more interesting, more forceful and effective and more politely expressed , to save face, avoid embarrassment, and to achieve the sense of rapport that comes from being understood without saying what one means. Dews et al (1995 in Alkhaffaf 2005: 94) believes that indirectness provides immunity to the speaker and frees him from full responsibility of what he has meant. The speaker can easily claim that he is responsible for what he has actually said not for the indirect meaning that the listener attaches to what he has said.

A closer look at the various aspects of indirectness reveals that it has a number of characteristic features. Indirectness is said to be: a universal, intentional, non conventional, rational and risky linguistic phenomenon (Leech,1981;Levinson,1983; and Grundy,2000). It is a universal linguistic phenomenon because it is found in almost all cultures and societies although different cultures vary widely in how, when and where to use it. It is intentional in the sense that its aim is to "produce specific effect upon the hearer utilizing shared and/ or background knowledge, and interlocutor's rationality and inference" (Thomas 1995: 119). It has non-conventional forms, most of them use non conventional forms i.e. forms which are not commonly used to communicate the function intended. It is rational in that "speaker is behaving in a rational manner to avoid embarrassment or face threatening" (Dascal1993 in Ibid: 121). Finally, indirectness is costly and risky: it takes longer time for the hearer to understand what the speaker wants to convey; and the hearer may not understand the speaker's intention or he may misinterpret the intended meaning that is expressed indirectly (Ibid).

In everyday communication, the frequent use of indirectness is said to be governed by a number of variables the most important of which are: the relative power of the speaker upon the hearer, the social distance between the interactants, and the degree of imposition, rights and obligations each party enjoys (Thomas 1995: 124-9). The employee, for example tends to be more indirect when expressing his dissatisfaction about his employer. By contrast, you feel in less need to employ indirectness when you feel close to someone, or similar to his age, social class, occupation etc. You need to use indirect speech when the size of imposition is relatively great as when you ask someone to do something to you which might be greater than his ability or beyond his ability. Finally indirectness depends on whether or not the speaker has the right or obligation to affect the hearer's behaviour.

Indirectness can be expressed in various ways. In relevant literature, these are called strategies of indirectness. Research work on indirectness (Brown and Levinson 1987, Obeng 1994, and Bull 2003 in Alkhafaf 2005) identify six strategies in which indirectness find expressions: metaphors, innuendoes, euphemism, proverbs, circumlocution and evasion.

A metaphor is a twisted speech or writing used by a speaker or writer to embellish his/her utterance or writing by asserting that something is equivalent to another which in most ways different. It is sometimes appealed to save face and to give the indication that the speaker possesses good speech. Innuendo or insinuation is an indirect suggestion often with harmful connotation.

Innuendo is often resorted to when the interactants are engaged in delicate issues without being engaged in direct verbal dueling (Obeng 1994: 53). The user of the innuendo can easily claim immunity provided that it is used responsibly without mentioning the name of the person whom the innuendo is directed at.

Euphemism is usually appealed to when talking about delicate things or topics to overcome unfavourable implications or unpleasant connotation of a word or phrase by another which has less harsh and more cheerful expressions (New mark 1963in Naoum 1995: 5) as when a man saying that his wife's physical structure is changed instead of saying that his wife has become pregnant. This strategy is said to flout Gricean maxims of perspicuity in that it is less clear (Obeng 1994: 58). Yet, it can be seen as witty and eloquent and saves one's face.

The strategy of using proverbs is by far the commonest strategy in which indirectness finds expression. Obeng (Ibid: 43) notes that the impersonal nature of the proverb helps the user to claim immunity from any social or individual penalty that might otherwise has been imposed.

Circumlocution is a roundabout way of stating things. It is defined by McArthur (1981: 367) as "the use of a large number of unnecessary words to express an idea needing fewer words especially trying to avoid directly answering a difficult question". The excessive use of words may communicate to the interlocutor that the speaker does not like to answer the question directed to him or to talk about the point under question. Circumlocution again, flouts Grice's maxim of manner "be brief"; yet it is recommended to maintain face and a polite way for refusing or accepting a controversial view point.

Unlike circumlocution, evasion is derived from the verb evade "to get out of the way or escape from" (McArthur 1981: 620) It is a sort of tricky avoidance of answering delicate or embarrassing question which one has no option but to answer. It is a kind of face maintenance answer to a face threatening questions. Bull and Mayer (1988 in Al khaffaf 2005: 26) summarize the options available to the speaker to evade critical or embarrassing questions among which are: ignoring the question asked, attacking the question, apologizing, or declining to answer the question, stating that the question has already been answered or repeating the answer to a previous question. Again, evasion flouts Grice's maxim of reference 'be relevant'; yet it an indirect strategy to keep up cooperation, overcoming face threatening and saving face in a tricky manner.

Having identified the strategies that are commonly used in indirect speech act, the question to be addressed now is: how is it possible for the hearer or interactant to uncover the intended meaning of the speaker "the unsaid" from "the said", i.e. the literal meanings of the words uttered by the speaker? Put it simply, how does the ineractant get to the indirect meaning the speaker aims at?

Considerable research has been devoted to provide an answer to this question. Grice (1975: ) maintains that the interactant is able to guess the implied meaning of the speaker because competent language users are usually cooperative and observed the shared rules of conversation which are subsumed under what he called cooperative principle. This principle dictates that the speaker's contribution is suppose to be informative, truthful, relevant, brief, clear, unambiguous and orderly. Technically speaking, the speaker's conurbation should satisfy the maxims of quality, quantity, relation and manner. (Cf. Levinson 1983; Grundy 2000). Violating one or more of these maxims will lead the hearer to make what Grice calls "Conversational Implicature" . Grice's theory of implicature tries to explain a hearer gets from what is said to what is meant in occasions when the speaker conveys more than, or different from, the literal meaning of his words and expressions. To this end, Grice distinguishes, first between conventional and non-conventional or conversational implicature. Conventional implicature is evident from using specific lexical expressions and does not depend on special contexts for their interpretation. The use of 'but' and 'yet' in any sentence have the implicature of contrast; 'even' implicates 'contrary to expectation' (Yule 1996: 45). By contrast conversational implicature is context dependent. It depends for their interpretation on a wide range of contextual information including information about the participants and their relationship with each other (Finch 2000: 167).

The Speech Act of Offering Bribes:

In everyday situations offering may be accomplished through physical and/or verbal acts (i.e. through language). Nobody is convicted for offering a service, an assistance, or money to another for humanitarian purposes. Yet an offer is indicted when the offer involves an illegal element i.e. when the offer is made in remuneration to an illegal act to be done by the offeree. Shuy (1993: 43) notes that "the difference between an offer and a bribe lies in: in the quid pro quo of a bribe". Before we identify the distinctive features of the speech act of offering bribes, a review of the speech act of offering, in general, is required.

Offering is commonly understood as presenting or promising to present something (money, thing, or service) to express acknowledgement, or to maintain positive social relationships leaving the offeree the choice to accept or deny the offer. Hickey (1986, cited in Al-Sha'baan 1999: 15) argues that as a speech act, offering involves a sort of commitment on the part of the speaker independent of the hearer. Following Searle's (1979) classification of speech acts, Hancher (1979: 7) views offering as a commissive – directive speech act requiring two participants to act: the offerer who looks forward towards the completion of the act by a positive response from the offeree. Tiersma (1986: 190, 197-198) argues that the speech act of offering must adhere to two basic types of rules: those that regulate the process of offering and those that count as placing the offerer under the obligation to carry out the terms of the bargain. These must be accompanied by a particular intent.

Addaraji et al. (2012: 4) suggest that the speech act of offering be accounted for in terms of orientation: whether the offer is speaker-oriented, hearer-oriented or speaker-hearer-oriented depending on the speaker's intent to commit himself, the hearer or both. In speaker-oriented offers, the speaker commits himself to do something to the hearer who is a mere observer, e.g. Shall I get you a chair? In hearer-oriented offers, the speaker directs the hearer to do an act if the hearer accepts the offer, e.g. Have a coke! ; while in speaker-hearer-oriented offers, both the speaker and hearer commit themselves to do an act on condition that the hearer accept the offer, e.g. Perhaps we should have other cups of tea.

The speech act of offering is also said to be culture-bound. The ways offering is done have cultural implications and differ from culture to culture (Leech, 1983). The ways offering is made or expressed are considerably affected by the cultural value, customs and tradition and have, therefore, different implications.

In terms of politeness theory, the speech act of offering is seen as a face threatening act. Within politeness theory, 'face' is understood as every individual's feeling of self-worth or self image; This image can be damaged, maintained or enhanced through interaction with others (Thomas, 1995: 169). Brown and Levinson (1987: 13) distinguish between two types of face wants: positive and negative. Positive face is reflected in the speaker's desire to be approved of, respected and appreciated by others; whereas negative face refers to the speaker's desire to be unimpeded, or put upon and to have the freedom to do what s/he wants to do. Within this framework, offering is done baldly or directly when the offer is in the hearer's interest. By contrast, offering is made indirectly when it is in the speaker's interest, when it is highly demanding on the part of the hearer, when the speaker expects that his offer might be denied by the hearer, or when the offer damages the hearer's self-image or his reputation in the eyes of others. For these reasons, the speaker uses various strategies of indirectness to mitigate his offering.

The speech act of offering bribes share the general speech act of offering in several respects. First, it is speaker-hearer-oriented in the sense that the offerer commits himself to what he has promised to offer only when the offeree does or promises to do what is required from him by the offerer in response to the rumuniration received or promised to receive. Second, there must be an intent-the offer intends to pay or present or do something and the offeree intends to do something to the offerer. Third, it is a face-threatening act in that offering a bribe can have a bearing on both interactants and is normally refused and might lead the offerer to jail. It is, therefore, most often made indirectly to leave a chance for denial by both parties.

The speech act of offering bribes, however, has a number of features which set it a part from the general speech act of offering. To me, the characteristic features of offering bribes are the following:

First ,Applying Austin's felicity conditions to bribery, in order for the speech act of offering bribery not to misfire, the offeree must be a public official having specific power or authority, and both the parties perfectly know that what they are doing is illegal, yet they intend to accomplish the deal to the end.

Second It is a speech act of corrupt intent. The offerer promises to present money, an article of value or a service to a public official in exchange for a benefit an illegal act done by the public official for the benefit of the offerer. It is this corrupt intent which is incriminated by law.

Third, it is mostly done indirectly. The offerer rarely uses bald-on-record strategies (to use Brown and Levinson's 1987 terms) in offering. This is because it is highly face-threatening act. S/he most often use indirect strategies and conversational implicatures to communicate his corrupt intent. S/he may use double meaning expressions, jokes, overstatements, maneuvering, etc., to save his face in case that the offeree does not accept the offer and also not to harm the offeree's reputation or self-image. Indirectness is also appealed to because these strategies can help him to easily deny his corrupt intent and thereby escape from punishment.

Fourth, it may be preceded by negotiations with a third party especially when it occurs for the first time so that the offerer comes to the offeree (the public official) with full background knowledge about her/him and prior agreement about what, when, where and how it will be paid. When there is no third party, preparatory strategies such as requesting for help, explaining the problematic situations, checking the person(s) who can help doing what s/he wants and whether the person can accept a bribe to complete the corrupt transaction. Fifth, it is speaker-hearer oriented in the sense that both the offerer and the offeree benefit from the transaction when the offer is accepted by the offeree.

Sixth, it is a bilateral corrupt contract.Theofferer commits himself to pay what he promises to offer and the offeree (the public official) commits himself or promises to do what is required from him by the offerer.

Seventh, it is socially-conditioned and culturally-bound. What is sometimes regarded as a grant, a present or a gift in a given situation or context in one society might be regarded as a bribe or a grafti in another society.

Eighth, it is context-dependent. The words or expressions uttered by the offerer have context-dependent meaning which are usually more or difficult from what the words might literally say. They are, therefore, understood differently by different participants in a given communicative event. This will help the offerer to claim that his/her words have been wrongly understood.

Ninth, the offeree must be a public official and the act to be done must be within his capacity.

From a socio-linguistic perspective, offering bribes is to be viewed as a speech event of special type. A speech event is "a piece of linguistic interaction, a communicative happening consisting of one or more utterances" (Criper and Widdowson, 1975: 185). As a speech event, offering bribes consists of a series of predictable events which seem to be recurrent in most bribery cases. They usually take four phases: stimulation, negotiation, agreement/disagreement, and extension (cf. the four phases of bribery-problem, proposal, completion and extension-suggested by Shuy, 1993: 21-24).

In Iraq, the phases of offering bribery usually take the following route: A problematic situation is stimulated by expressions of some kind uttered by a public official indicating that the application cannot be managed in a normal way, or a contravention of special type which requires paying a lot or being demanding is committed. Next, a negotiation starts either directly or indirectly through a third party as a mediator in order to overcome or help solve the problematic situation. Then, the transaction may either succeed- when both agree on the terms of the deal or fail -when one of or both the parties disagree on the terms or the transaction itself. Finally, extension can be made when the parties agree to extend the agreement to include future transactions.

Data Collection procedure and Analysis:

Participants:

In order to collect the data on the verbal act of offering bribes two groups of people were purposefully selected for providing the expressions and utterances that are commonly used by the interactants in the speech event of stimulating, negotiating, agreeing/disagreeing, and extending phases of offering bribes. The first group included public officials who were in direct contact with people and applicants in special institutions where offering, requesting and/or receiving bribes are quite probable. The public officials were randomly selected from those who work in the Vehicle Registration Department, police officers who work in criminal investigations, and public servants who work in immigrations and passport office especially those responsible for issuing passports, and civil servants working in property conveyance section in Real Estate Registration office – Mosul Branch, and those working as tax assessors in the General Commission of Taxation – Mosul Branch. The participants in this group were asked to write down as many occasions and cases as possible that stimulate or drive the applicants to have their things done illegally and even tend to offer bribes indirectly to have their affairs completed. They were also asked to write down expressions that are typically regarded as an indirect offering of bribes.

The second group of participants were solicitors , auctioneers, lawyers who are regularly in direct contact with the groups above and pursuants who apply for the offices mentioned above for one reason or another. The participants in this group were asked to write down the cases and circumstances that force them to follow illegal means and ways to have their applications done and their affairs completed.

Instrument

The instrument that was found to be appropriate to collect the data was two versions of an open-ended questionnaire. The first version was presented to the first group. It reads as follows: "owing to your position in the office, being responsible for performing or supervising actions or applications directly pertinent to a large class of people and in direct contact with those who want to have their applications or business done, you come across people who persist on having their things done quickly and perfectly, legally or sometimes illegally. Would you kindly write down the cases or occasions when those people offer or promise to offer directly or indirectly money, service, article of value, benefit and the like to have things done for them; and the recurrent expressions as far as you remember from which you infer that they are indirectly offering bribes"?

The second version was presented to the second group. It reads as follows: "Due to your business as a regular pursuant or solicitor, being in direct contact with public servant especially those working in the Directorate of Traffic office, Passports Office, Real Estate registration, the General Commission of Taxation and the like, would you kindly write down the cases in which you have no way but to offer a bribe to have your application done quickly, and the expressions from which you infer that you should have to pay or promise to pay, money, an article of value or, a benefit if you want to have your business or application done quickly and smoothly.

In addition to the questionnaire, interviews with a number of public officials, solicitors, auctioneers, and lawyers were made asking them to remember as many expressions as possible from which one infers that the speaker offers a bribe of some kind to have his business or application done.

Data analysis and discussion

The data collected were put into four categories: the expressions that indirectly stimulate the applicant to think of an illegal way to have his application or business done; the expressions commonly used in negotiation; the expressions that signal that the offer is accepted or denied; and the expressions which indicate that the transaction can be extended to other cases.

Below are the expressions that stimulate the applicants to think of illegal ways to have his business done from the points of view of the public officials in the institutions already mentioned.

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| السيارة عليها شارة حجز. | 1. | There has been a sign of attachment on your car in the vehicles register. |
| رقم الشّاصي مختلف عما مثبّت في السجلات. | 2. | The chassis number of your car is different from the one fixed in our records. |
| لازم ترجع الى الكمارك لتدقيق رقم الشّاصي. | 3. | You have to go back to custom office to check up the chassis number again. |
| لازم ترجع على الفحص وتفحص السيارة مرة أخرى. | 4. | You have to go back to the inspection office to check up your car again. |
| أرجع إلى نفس الدائرة لختمه ثانية .الختم غير واضح. | 5. | The stamp is not clear. You have to go back to the same office to stamp it again. |
| لازم يجي المالك الشرعي شخصيّاً. | 6. | The legitimate owner must personally attend in front of me. |
| تعال بعد يومين بلكي يصلك السرة. | 7. | Come back in two days, I will put your application in the queue. |

The expressions above are quite normal in the vehicles registration office. There is nothing in them that leads or stimulates the interactant to offer bribes. What changes these expressions into stimulations that motivate some interactants to offer bribes to have their business done illegally is the communicative event or circumstance of the individual interlocutors and the background knowledge the public official has about the applicant.

To begin with, expression No. 1 above stimulates offering a bribe when the applicant perfectly knows that the car has been officially attached and wants to lift the attachment sign illegally. Expression No. 2 leads to offering bribery when the applicant knows that the number of the chassis was fake or tampered with or does not want to go to the custom office to fix it correctly. Expressions No. 3, 4 and 5 lead to think of offering a bribe when the applicant has had painful experience in the custom office and that checking up the chassis number in the custom office or in the inspection office where very long queues of cars are waiting for him require a lot of time. Here, the interactant has no way but to negotiate with the public official to solve the problem. Expression No. 6 leads to think of offering bribes when the applicant is not the legitimate owner and that the owner cannot attend personally either because he is dead or very difficult for him to attend the registration office. Expression No. 7 enhances negotiation with the public official and may sometimes offer a bribe when the applicant is from another governorate , lives in the suburbs, or his residence is far away from the custom office and cannot stay for days in a hotel waiting for his business to be done.

The frequent expressions reported by those working in direct contact with people in the passport office and found to be leading to offering bribes were the following:

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| صعب وتجديده منتهي جوازك. | 1. | Your passport is expired and it's renewal is not easy. |
| تعمل ترجع لازم تصحيحه وصعب خطأ الجد أسم جديد من المعاملة. | 2. | Your surname is wrong and you need to check it and the whole application should be renewed. |
| العامة للمديرية أبعثها لازم ينشال وصعب منع عليك. | 3. | You are prohibited from travelling abroad and lifting the prohibition mark is not easy. |
| تدبّرلك إستمارة ولازم خلصت الإستمارات. | 4. | The application forms have finished. You have to obtain one. |
| تبدّلها لازم قديمة بالمعاملة المدنية الأحوال هوية. | 5. | The identity card is expired. You need a new one. |

The first expression may lead the applicant to offer bribes to have his passport renewed when he needs to travel abroad urgently. Utterance No. 2 stimulates offering bribes to correct the surname because the applicant perfectly knows that the legal route may take days or weeks but can be easily corrected by the public official in charge himself. The same applies to utterance No. 3 where the applicant absolutely knows that he will not be allowed to travel abroad unless he negotiates with the officer in charge to convince him to overlook the prohibition issued against him and permits him to travel. Utterance No. 4 stimulates the crooked way to get an application form only when it is limited in number but essential for the application for a passport. Utterance No. 5 has nothing on the face of it. It obliges the applicant to think of an illegal way only when he learns that changing the identity card is a very difficult task and needs a lot of time and effort.

The cases that were reported to invite offering bribes in the taxation office mostly come under the following circumstances:

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| لم تراجع منذ مدّة والضّريبةعليك كثيرة | 1. | You have not shown up for a long time. I'm afraid the tax is high. |
| عندك أعذار حتى نساعدك بالضّريبة. | 2. | Have you got excuses to help you?. |
| معاملتك طويلة عريضة وتحتاج وقت حتى نصفّيها روح تعال بعد أسبوع. | 3. | Your application needs a lot of time to finish. Come back next week. |
| معملك عليه ضريبة مضاعفة لأن مكائنه من منشأ أوربي. | 4. | Your factory will have a high tax because its machinery is of European origin. |
| تعال غداً حتى نطلع معاك كشف على معرضك. | 5. | Come back tomorrow. We will assess the tax on your show on the spot. |

The first utterance incites the applicant to think of a wrapped way to bribe the public official only when he knows that the tax will be high. The second utterance arouses in the applicant the tendency to offer a bribe when he understands that the excuses decrease the amount of the tax but he has no excuses and wants the public official to help him in this respect. In the third case, the utterance instigates the applicant to bribe the public official when he has no time to wait for a week or more and wants his business done quickly. The fourth utterance greatly invites the applicant to think of a twisted way to change the place of origin of his machinery or a way which may reduce the amount of tax which he is supposed to pay. The fifth utterance invokes the tendency to offer a bribe when the applicant utterly knows that on the spot inspection will make the tax assessor increase the tax considerably.

In the real estate registration office, the following cases were reported to invite the applicant to think of an illegal way to have things done for his benefit in the most appropriate way.

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| البيت عليه شارة حجز بالسّجل. | 1. | There is a sign of attachment on your house in the registrar. |
| الحمل مال البيت ما مثبّت بالسّجل. | 2. | The buildings have not been fixed in the registrar. |
| لازم نطلع كشف حتى نقدر نقدّر الرّسوم. | 3. | We have to see your house to estimate the charge. |
| السّند قديم ولازم تطلّع سند جديد بالعقار. | 4. | The title deed is old. You need a new title deed for your house. |
| تحتاج لجلب كتاب من دائرة القاصرين .احد الورثة قاصر | 5. | One of the inheritors is a minor and you need to bring a certificate from the Minor's Affairs office. |
| لازم تروح إلى بغداد تجيب صورة قيد دارك. | 6. | You have to go to Baghdad to bring a copy of your house record. |

In the utterance No. 1, the claimant wants to lift the attachment sign at all costs because this sign prevents him from selling or buying the real estate. In the utterance No. 2, the claimant wants to fix the buildings on his land and recognizes that this needs a lot of time and effort a case which motivates him to pay something to have his buildings fixed. Utterance No. 3 invites the inquirer to convince the public official not to go on spot inspection to assess the charges especially when he perfectly knows that on the spot assessment would be much higher. Utterance No. 4 may motivate the applicant to think of convincing the public official to overlook the date especially obtaining a new copy of the title deed takes time and a lot of effort. Utterance No. 5 stimulates the inquirer to ignore this certificate when he finds it difficult or impossible for him to obtain such a certificate from the minor's' Affairs office. Finally, utterance No. 6 invokes thinking of a twisted way to persuade the public official to ignore this certificate by offering a bribe especially when obtaining such a certificate is not very much necessary or when going to Baghdad is costly and risky.

From the view points of solicitors', auctioneers', lawyers and regular pursuants who are regular customers in the offices above, some public officials in those offices are artful in creating obstacles or demanding the applicants to submit documents most of which can be overlooked leaving no choice for them but to pay or promise to pay a bribe to have his application or business done. The utterances above were mostly attached by expressions from which one may indirectly infer that the pursuant has to pay in order for his business to be completed.

A part from the minute differences in the expressions that are recurrent in each office, solicitors, auctioneers, lawyers and regular pursuants reported a number of utterances that are regularly attached to the situations already mentioned:

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| بسيطة شوفنا ونشوفك. | 1. | Simple, scratch my back and I'll scratch yours. |
| فرّحنا نفرحك. | 2. | My happiness is your happiness. |
| فيد وأستفيد. | 3. | Mutual benefit. |
| أدهن أيدك وبسيطة. | 4. | Show me kindness. |
| حرّك أيدك حتى أتحرّك. | 5. | Move your hand to make me move. |
| شويّة حرّكني ليش واقف خامل؟ | 6. | Do something, do not just stand there. |
| معاملتك تحتاج چروخ. | 7. | Your application needs wheels. |
| مع هذا شغلتك بسيطة بس ينرادلها مصرف. | 8. | Your work is easy but it will cost. |
| لا تشيل هم بس خلّي للسيارة بانزين. | 9. | Don't worry, just put fuel in the car. |
| سهلة بس لا تنسونا. | 10. | Don't worry, but keep us in mind. |
| بسيطة بس شوّفني البطاقة الحمراء. | 11. | Consider it done. Just show me the 'red card'. |
| الشّغلة ينرادلها دفعة. | 12. | Your application needs a push. |
| أريد أكمّل معاملتك بس أخاف لا باص الدّائرة يفوتني. | 13. | I want to complete your application, but I'm afraid that I might miss my bus. |
| هذي تمشي بدفتر. | 14. | This needs (copybook)ten grand to be completed. |

The expressions above are commonly uttered by the public officials when the pursuant or applicant please them to help him giving different reasons. Unlike the expressions provided by the public officials which are constatives and stating facts and have informative functions, the expressions provided by the second group - auctioneers, solicitors, pursuants, applicants and the like, are performatives and negotiable. They are performatives in that when uttering them the speaker is not telling facts or imparting information; he is, actually, requesting, or urging his interlocutor to negotiate or bargaining with his job in exchange for a personal benefit. Still, unlike the expressions of the first group, almost all the expressions used are indirect employing a variety of linguistic strategies to convey them. Of course, these are commonly uttered when the public official feels the difficulty that would face the applicant in providing the documents he requests or the task he is required to perform to have his application request or claim carried out. Also, these expressions are most often said by the public official sarcastically with tricky laughter to save his face when his interlocutor refuses the transaction or misunderstands his intention, leaving a space to deny his intention to solicit a bribe and that his words have been wrongly interpreted.

The expressions above were reported by the auctioneers, pursuants, solicitors and those in direct contact with the public officials who are fully aware that all the words and expressions above refer to one thing, namely, a bribe paid to the public official to have him nudge the applicant's business or application under his charge.

The question now is: how is it possible for those people to make a relationship between "what is said" with "what is implicated" in different situational contexts. .The answer to this question was provided by Grice (1975) who maintains that the interactants are able to understand each other's intended meaning owing to conventions agreed upon in a given communicative event subsumed under what he called "cooperative principle" and conversational maxims. The cooperative principle suggests that one's contribution to be "such as is required, at the stage at which it occurs, by the accepted purpose or direction of the talk exchange in which you are engaged" (Levinson, 1983: 101). To have an effect, the utterance made by the speaker is expected to follow four maxims: of quality-be truthful and never say what you believe to be false; of quantity-make your contribution as informative as is required; of relevance-be relevant to the topic you are talking about; and of manner-be brief, orderly and avoid ambiguity (Ibid: 101-102).

Relevant to the cooperative principle is the notion of presupposition which is a proposition taken for granted by the speaker and is supposed to be known by the hearer although it is not explicitly stated (Cruse, 2006: 137). Presupposition is of two types: semantic and pragmatic. Semantic presupposition is conventionally triggered by using certain words or expressions such as iteratives, verbs that indicate a change of state, implicatives, verbs and certain grammatical constructions; whereas pragmatic presupposition is inferred from the situational context (for details, see Yule, 1996; Saeed 1997; and Grundy, 2000).

In addition to the speech act theory, these two notions are highly relevant in bribery cases. They can help in explaining how the intention of the offerer, solicitor and acceptor can be understood without being explicitly stated. Thus, the utterances reported by the auctioneers, pursuants, solicitors etc., are not uttered to impart information. They are uttered to negotiate with their interlocutors the terms of bargaining of the act to be performed with the public official for the applicant's benefit in exchange for the money, article of vale or a benefit to be given or promised to be given by the applicant.

The expressions reported by the second group where each of which can attach to any of the utterances regularly reported by the first are obviously speech acts. These speech acts communicate one basic communicative function- that of requesting bribes. This communicative function has mainly been communicated indirectly using various strategies of indirectness. The speaker depends on the presuppositions he assumes on the part of his interlocutors and his interlocutors are mostly able to figure out the speaker's intended meaning on the basis of their background knowledge, contextual clues, in addition to the cooperative principle, and conversational maxims already mentioned. Thus, when hearing the utterances above, the rational applicant is fully aware of how to care for, , what 'hand oiling', 'hand movement', 'trucks' mean in the context under question, how the application 'costs' and what 'putting benzene in the car' suggests; what 'remembering' implies and what the 'red card' connotes, how to nudge the application, what 'missing the bus' hints, and what ''notebook/buck' refers to. Counting on the presupposition, conversational implicature and contextual cues, the speaker assumes that the listener understands his metaphors like 'oil your hand', 'put trucks', 'red card' or 'notebook'. In the Iraqi context people conventionally use the phrase 'oil/lubricate your hands' to refer to giving money, 'trucks' to 'facilitate doing something' and the "red card" to refer to the bank-note of 25 thousand Iraqi Dinars and the "book" to "bucks" i.e. 100 US dollars.

Of course, loading these expressions with double meaning to indirectly refer to money or an article of value is a maneuver to cover the malicious intent, to save face and deny any accusation of him for soliciting bribes assuming that he has never asked for money and that the words he uttered were wrongly and maliciously interpreted.

Soliciting bribes can or cannot be instigated by the public official. In fact, very few public officials working in the offices above solicit for bribes in comparison with those subjected to various cases of offering bribes without being solicited. The following expressions were reported by the public officials who completed the questionnaire and wereinterviewed in the present study and subjected to various cases of offering bribes:

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| .ألله يخلّيك مشّيها وآني حاضر | 1. | Please, let this slide and I'll be ready for everything you want. |
| .أدفعها وأتعابك موجودة | 2. | Nudge it, and I'll make it worth your while. |
| .أشتأمر آني حاضر بس خلّصني | 3. | I am ready for everything. Just finish it please! |
| .كمّلها وما راح أقصّر ويّاك | 4. | Just finish it and I'll do what you want. |
| .هلّلا هلّلا بينا بالضّريبة وتتدلّل | 5. | Reduce the tax amount andI am ready for whatever you say. |
| .بس خلّصني من الكمرك وأشتأمر آني حاضر | 6. | Just help me with the custom duties and I am ready to do what you want. |
| .بس شيل الحجز المنع واللّي تأمر بيه تتدلّل | 7. | Just lift up the compounding prohibition and say what you want. |
| صاحب /عندي بنزينخانة /إذا تحتاج شي أنا صايغ .صاحب معرض سيّارات /مطعم | 8. | If you need anything I am a goldsmith/ I have a petrol station / a restaurant in Al-Majmu'a/car showroom/ dealer. |
| .بس سوّي البنچر والهوا موجود | 9. | Just do the puncture and the air is handy. |
| .أعجنها والخمرة موجودة | 10. | Knead it and the yeast is at your hand. |

The utterances above signal the third phrase of offering bribes. These utterances usually follow the ones uttered by the public officials indicating that negotiations can be made and a sort of compromise can be reached. In the first four utterances the applicants request the public officials to make their applications up and that they are ready to offer the interactants what they want-usually money-in exchange for what the public officials are going to do illegally or illegitimately for him. These utterances were quite normal and recurrent in almost all public offices and reported by almost all participants and interviewees in the present study. Utterances five and six were particularly used in Real Estate Registration Office and General Commission of Taxation Office because the tax and custom can be very high, a case which leaves the door open for negotiation to reduce them considerably. In utterance seven, negotiations to lifting up the attachment sign is recurrent in the Real Estate Registration Office while prohibition from traveling abroad is commonly found in Passport Office. Canceling the attachment sign or prohibition from traveling abroad is not an easy task and the applicants are sometimes ready to pay millions of Iraqi Dinars for such canceling. This is why there have always been rooms for negotiations and offering bribes.

Utterances No. 8, 9 and 10 are different from their predecessors in that they are highly indirect. They can be approached pragmatically because the speaker says something and means a completely different thing. In the utterances above, the words do not say what they mean. They are not answers to questions like what do you do for living? From the context in which they are used, the presupposition the speaker made on the part of the listener, social background knowledge, the cooperative principle and implicature in addition to the conversational maxims already pointed out. The utterances "I am a goldsmith", "I have a petrol station" and "I have a restaurant in Al-Majmu'a" or "I have an auto show" have only one communicative function: "I am rich, I have a lot of money and I can pay what you say, just process my application within your authority". The same applies to utterance No. 9 where the speaker uses a metaphor "puncture" to refer to the application which failed to move smoothly and to "the air" to refer to the bribe (the money) which can help in making the application proceed again. The same relationship applies to the "dough" and the "ferment" which changes the dough to bread. Again, the application which needs to proceed is linked to the dough which needs to be "knead" and the "ferment" which turns the "dough" to bread is linked to the money which can be paid in exchange making up the application in an illegal way.

The communicative function of offering bribes-can be easily understood by those who were used to hear such expressions and to work on the basis of the promise given. Those who are outside such types of communicative events and transactions may not understand what these utterances exactly mean and why they have been uttered in that situation. This will give the interactants additional immunity and safety and help them escape from the accusation of offering and of soliciting bribes claiming that their utterances mean what they say and that the interpretations given to their utterances were not right.

Offering bribes can also be viewed as a commissive speech act in which one party commits himself to give or do something to the other party. In the transaction, the offerer commits himself to pay money, a service, or a benefit to the public official in exchange for processing the application legally or illegally. By contrast the public official commits himself to process the application in exchange for the money, service or benefit he got or will get from the offerer. This transaction is negotiable in the sense that one party, usually the public official, may accept or deny the terms of the deal. The following expressions were reported by the interviewees as verbal signs of agreement by either party.

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| أعتمد. بسيطة. | 1 | I can manage it. You can count on me. |
| تتدلل. | 2. | With pleasure. |
| ما أردّك. | 3. | You can not be denied. |
| صار. | 4. | Done. |
| أتّفقنا. | 5. | It is a deal! |
| أعتبرها منتهية /خلص. | 6. | You can consider it finished. It's done. |

As for the expressions used to decline an offer, the following utterances were also reported by the same interviewees to be regularly used for declining the offer.

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| أسف، ما أقدر. | 1. | Sorry, I can't. |
| هلا بيك بس الشغلة ما تصبر. | 2. | You are welcome, but your application cannot proceed! |
| كمل المعاملة /أشنو أنت ووين تشتغل ما يهمني. | 3. | I do not care who you are or what you do, complete your documents. |
| حالك حال الناس أنت ما أحسن منهم. | 4. | You are like all the people here. You are not better than them. |
| أنت تريد ترشيني؟ أخبّر عليك الشرطة؟ | 5. | Do you want to bribe me? I'll call the police. |
| طلبك غير قانوني وما يمشي عدنا. | 6.. | Your request is not legal and cannot proceed. |

Unlike the expressions that are commonly used in negotiating and offering bribes, the speech act of accepting or denying bribes are direct, non-negotiable, said with falling intonation and predetermined. The perlocutionary force of the utterances of accepting bribes is usually favourable, beneficial, positive and well-disposed for both parties. By contrast, the perlocutionary force of the utterances of denying the offer is usually unfavourable, non-beneficial and negative for one party-the offerer rather than the other-the public official. The tone in accepting is commonly warm, sympathetic, approving, conciliating and promising; whereas the tone in denying is usually expressionless, aggressive, reproachful and even threatening. Thus in the utterances above that show agreement, utterance No. 1 is promising and confidential; utterance No. 2 is encouraging and warm; utterance No. 3 is cordial and sincere; utterance No. 4 is determined and definite; utterance No. 5 expresses agreement and settlement; while utterance No. 6 implies complete agreement and assurance. On the other hand, in the utterances that show refusal of the offer, utterance No. 1 and 2 are discouraging; utterance No. 3 is denying and face-threatening; utterance No. 4 is assertive and offensive; utterance No. 5 is suspicious and threatening; while utterance No. 6 is destructive, unquestionable and non-reconciling.

The final phase of offering bribes is the extension phase. Here, the agreement or acceptance of the offer can be extended to include future deals and transactions. This case happens when both the parties the offerer and offeree were satisfied with the terms of the transaction and each commits to perform what will be required from him in the future. The utterances that were reported by the interviewees to be regularly said by the offerer were:

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| راح أبعث فلان عليك هم عنده شغلة مثلها. | 1. | I will send X to you. He has the same issue. |
| عندي معاملة أخرى تسوّيها؟ | 2. | I have another application. Can you process it? |
| أجيك كل مرّة، ها؟ صرنا عرف. | 3. | We have become acquaintances. Can I come to you every now and then? |
| أمرّك إذا صارلي شغلة، زين؟ | 4. | I will come to you if I have a problem, is that ok? |

In the utterances above, the offerer wants to consolidate his relationship with the public official and would like to be sure if he can come back to him whenever he faces a problematic situation in his office. These utterances are pragmatically direct, less face-threatening, because they are in favour of the interlocutor. They all have one communicative function, namely, that of consolidating social and utilitarian relationships between the interactants paving the way to future deals and transactions.

The utterances that were reported to be recurrent in the discourse of the public officials to express consolidation for future deals were:

| Expressions | No. | Translation |
|---|---|---|
| آني الممنون. | 1. | I appreciate it. |
| تتذلّل وأهلاً وسهلاً. | 2. | Most welcome. |
| آني حاضر لأي شغلة أخرى. | 3. | I am ready for any other work or business. |
| تعالني وشتريد يصير. | 4. | Come to me and we'll do whatever you want. |

In the utterances above, the speaker-the public official-wants to ensure his interactant that he is ready for any future deal or transaction. Pragmatically, these utterances communicate the speaker's readiness and confirmation of doing similar work in the future. These expressions herald the preclosing stage in this deal which is often ended by عليكم السّلام (peace be upon you) and its response السّلام وعليكم (peace be upon you too).

Conclusion

The present paper aimed to provide a research-based evidence on the pragmatic dimension of offering bribe viewing it as a speech act based on the speaker's presupposition on the listener's background knowledge, socio-cultural knowledge and conversational implicature making use of cooperative principle and conversational maxims. The major argument is that the verbal manifestations of offering bribes are no less essential evidence than the physical evidence in the court of law on the corrupt act of bribery

The sole physical evidence almost available in incriminating offering bribes is catching the accused flagrant delicto in the act of offering bribes. This material evidence is a beyond doubts evidence; yet, it is not always easy to obtain. Actually, most of offering bribes are done in safe places like restaurants, cafés, clubs, and the like. The public official rarely receives money or articles of value in his office. This is why most of the bribery cases are difficult to prove. It seems to me, therefore that viewing offering bribes as an independent offense a part from being accepted or denied can mostly be proved by analyzing the utterances made in a given speech event from a socio-pragmatic perspective. Analyzing the utterances from this perspective can substantially help in bringing to light the malicious intent, if any, and thereby aids the judge or trier of fact in his discretion of the circumstances that surround the act of offering bribes. To our mind, accounting for the expressions from which a lay person can infer the corrupt intent of the offerer and analyzing them socio-pragmatically, can greatly serve in capturing a lot of bribery cases which can otherwise flee from criminal justice.

References

- Ad-Darraji, Hadher A., Foo, Thomas C V., Ismail, Abdul Malik, and Abdulah, Eabah S. (2012). Offering as a Comissive and Directive Speech Act: Consequence for Cross-Cultural Communication. International Journal of Scientific and Research Publication. Vol.2. No.3.PP.1-5
- AL Khaffaf, Suha.(2005). Indirectness in the written Diplomatic Discourse. Unpublished Ph.D. Dissertation. University of Mosul
- Al-Sha'baan, Kawkab S. M. (1999). The Speech Act of Offering in English-Arabic Translation. Unpublished M.A. Thesis. University of Mosul.
- Austin J.L. (1962). How To Do Things With Words: The William James LecturesDelivered at Harvard University. Oxford: The Claren Don Press.
- Azuelos-Atias, Sol (2007). A Pragmatic Analysis of Legal Proofs of Criminal Intent. Amsterdam: John Benjamin's Publishing Company.

- Betza, Ann. (2008). A Questionnaire-based Comparative Study of Irish English and Polish Speech Acts of Requesting. Unpublished Ph.D. Dissertation. University of Silesia.
- Brown, P. and Levinson, S. C. (1987). Politeness. Some Universals in Language Usage. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Collin, Peter, H. (2000). Dictionary of Law. London: Bloomsbury
- Criper, C. and Widdowson, H. G. (1975). "Sociolinguistics and Language Teaching". In Allen, J. P. B. and Corder, S. Pit (eds.) Papers in Applied Linguistics. Vol. 2, Oxford: Oxford University Press. pp. 154-217.
- Cruse, Alan. (2006). A Glossary of Semantics and Pragmatics Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press Ltd.
- De Jung, Ferry (2011). Theorizing Criminal Latent: A Methodological Account. Utrecht Law Review. Vol. 7, issue No. 1, pp. 1-15
- Elliot, Catherine and Quinn, Frances. (2006)( (Criminal Law) 8th edition. Essex: Pearson Education Limited
- Finch, Geoffrey. (2000) Linguistic Terms and Concepts. London: Macmillan Press LTD.
- Finch, Geoffrey. (2000) Linguistic Terms and Concepts. London: Macmillan Press LTD.
- Garner, Bryan (ed.) (1999). Black's Law Dictionary. St. Paul. Mann: West Group
- Grundy, Peter (2000). Doing Pragmatics. London: Arnold
- Hancher, M. (1979). "The Classification of Cooperative Illocutionary Acts". Language and Society, Vol. 8, No. 1, pp. 1-14.
- Hooper A. y.(1968) Harris's Criminal Law. London: Sweet and Maxwell
- Leech, G. N. (1983). Principles of Pragmatics. London and New York: Longman
- Lindgren, James. (1993).The Theory, History, and Practice of the Bribery-Extortion Distinction. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. Vol.141, No.5., PP.1695-1740
- Martin, Elizabeth A. (1997). Oxford Dictionary of Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mc Arthur, Tom. (1981). Longman Lexicon of Contemporary English. Beirut: Librari Du Liban
- Mey, Jacob (1993). Pragmatics: An Introduction. Oxford and Cambridge: Blackwell.
- Naoum, A (1995). Euphemism in Arabic with reference to English. Unpublished M.A. Thesis. University of Mosul
- Obeng, S.G. (1994). (Verbal Indirectness in Akan Informal Discourse." Journal of Pragmatics Vol.20, No.1, 37-67
- Oran, Danial J. D. and Tosti, J. D. (2000). Oran's Dictionary of the Law. Thomas Learning Tm: West Legal Studies, West Encyclopedia of American Law, 2nd ed.
- Saudi Arabia: Anti Bribery Law (1994). Arab World Quarterly. Vol. 3, No. 3. pp. 283-287.
- Searle, John (1975). "Indirect Speech Acts". In Cole, Paul and Morgan, J. (eds.). Syntax and Semantics: Speech Acts. New York: Academic Press.
- Searle, John (1979). Expression and Meaning: Studies in the Theory of Speech Acts. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Shuy, Roger W. (1993). Language Crimes: The Use and Abuse of Language Evidence in the Courtroom. Oxford and Cambridge: Blackwell.
- Shuy, Roger W. (2005). Creating Language Crimes. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Sifianou, M. (1999). Politeness Strategies in England and Greece: A Cross-Cultural Perspective. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Solan, M., and P. Tiersma (2005). Speaking of Crime: The Language of Criminal Justice. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press.
- Thomas, Jenny. (1995). Meaning in Interaction: An Introduction to Pragmatics. London and New York: Longman.
- Tiersma, P. (1986). "The Language of Offer and Acceptance: Speech Acts and the Question of Intent". California Law Review Volume74 No. 1 pp. 189-232 .
- Tiersma, Peter M. (1987). "The Language of Defamation" Texas Law Review. Vol. 66, No. 2. pp. 303-350
- Tsuda, Sanae (1993). "Indirectness in Discourse: What Does it Do in Conversation". Inter- cultural Communication Studies. Vol. 3, No. 1, pp. 63-74.
- Yule, George. (1996) Pragmatics. Oxford. Oxford University Press

THE PROCEDURE FOR THE REFERRAL OF THE CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION BODIES

Denisa BARBU[*]

Abstract

Vintil Dongoroz mentioned in one of his books that "the referral is the dynamic act that causes the prosecution to take place." We can say that the criminal prosecution is born when the criminal prosecution bodies are informed of a crime of a criminal nature by one of the above mentioned ways of referral.

The common point of all means of referral is that it always takes the written form, either by direct recording of the injured party or by the oral hearing. In practice, the document of referral is the document which will always contain the registration number of the prosecutor's office and the resolutions of the hierarchical chiefs on the registration procedure and the worker to whom the work was assigned for verification and settlement.

The referral is the effect of a manifestation of will for the purposes of conducting criminal proceedings that may be brought by the criminal investigation body, the finding body or the injured party whose interests or rights have been violated as a result of committing an offense.

Any criminal offense brought before the categories of civil servants mentioned in this Chapter shall lead to their obligation to immediately notify the competent prosecution body. Also, the criminal investigation body should refrain from carrying out any criminal investigation if it clearly finds that it is not competent and the investigation is not urgent.

Keywords: jurisdiction, obligation, Criminal investigation, competence, the procedure

1. Introduction Ways of Referring to Criminal Investigation Bodies

1.1. The Complaint

The most common way to refer criminal prosecution bodies is the complaint through which individuals can address the authorities by making them aware that they have been the victim of a crime.

Any complaint may be made in writing or by oral proceedings where the criminal investigation bodies record a report. This is done in his own name or by the trustee in a situation where a procuration is attached, by procedural substitutes or by legal representatives instead of persons without exercise capacity.

Practical aspect:

- On 15.05.2014, at 15.15, at the Police Headquarters of the Municipality of Târgu Mureș was presented named G.R. together with the minor G.F. who verbally reported the following: about one hour before, his child returned from school without having a Samsung mobile phone on it, and the child told him that his mobile phone would have been taken from the desk at the last hour when he had physical education.
- The police have recorded a report containing the data of the legal representative, the verbal ones, and the mention that they require identification of the perpetrators of the offense of theft. Following the notification, the criminal investigating authorities carried out criminal investigation activities which ultimately led to the identification of the authors.

The Code of Criminal Procedure states that the complaint may also be filed in electronic form, subject to the existence of an electronic signature. As regards the notion of electronic signature, it is defined in Article 4 (3) of the Law No. 455/2001 republished as data in electronic form that are attached or associated with other data also in electronic form, which will serve as an identification method. The electronic signature cannot take the form of the scanned signature.[1]

In practice, there is a situation where the author of the offense is the legal representative and an ex officio referral is recorded in this respect.

Practical aspect:

- On 14.02.2015, at 18.00, T.R presented herself at the headquarters of Onesti City Police, who notified the police that his son T.I. left the park to play in the nearby park and did not return. Police officers carried out specific activities to find the minor, and around 21:00 it was legitimized by a police patrol and was led to the police headquarters to record a report and hand him over to parents. Considering that the minor showed marks on the surface of the body, the police asked him about the origin of these signs, and the child reported verbally that they were made after the beatings he receives almost daily from his mother. Taking into account the visible traces of the juvenile's body and those reported by him, the police officers as observers have been notified of the offense of "ill-treatment of the minor" and the case was taken over by the criminal investigation bodies who developed specific activities, also helped by a psychologist.

With regard to the form of the complaint, the complaint must contain the name, surname of the person who is making it, accompanied by the personal numerical code, the quality and domicile of the complaint, and, in the case of legal persons, the name, headquarters, single registration or fiscal identification code and indication legal or conventional representative. After these data the complaint describes the description of the act that he wants to claim, and the author indicates if it is known and non-mandatory to indicate the means of evidence that he considers necessary to be administered in order to prove the deed. Also, the injured party is not obliged to record the legal framing of the act or if the criminal prosecution bodies do not have the obligation to fit the act exactly as indicated, but how it considers it necessary. If the complaint is missing at least one of the mandatory conditions of the form, the petitioner shall be remanded by administrative means and shall indicate the missing items, and in the case where one of the substantive or formal conditions, for example the lack of all the name of the petitioner or the description of the deed, it is classified.[2]

[*] Lecturer, PhD, The Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, Valahia University of Targoviste, ( email:denisa.barbu77@yahoo.com)

[1] Legea nr.455/2001 r. Art.4, pct.3

Due to the fact that not all persons have legal education, they are unaware of the legal framing of the act they wish to claim, nor of the competence of the criminal investigation bodies or the courts. Thus, the wrongly directed complaint is submitted by administrative means to the competent judicial body. If the criminal investigation body draws up the order to initiate the criminal proceedings in rem on the basis of the complaint, the prosecutor will send the complaint to the competent body without taking into account the form of the refusal, except in the case in which the prosecutor starts the prosecution.

Practical aspect:

- On 11.05.2015, at 09.00 at the Breaza City Police Headquarters, the so-called F.H. who filed a complaint in which it was recorded that on 10.05.2015, at 22.50 while listening to music in front of block No. 2, on Peace Street, together with a friend, two gendarmes presented, dressed in uniform that hit their bodies with sticks and sanctioned them for their contravention. He wanted to file a criminal complaint for the offense of hitting or other violence. Given that the Gendarmerie workers have the military status, the complaint was filed administratively with the Military Prosecutor's Office attached to the Bucharest Military Tribunal for the investigation of the offense of abusive behaviour.

1.2. Denunciation

Any natural or legal person, even if he is not the injured person, has the possibility to inform the criminal prosecution bodies about the existence of any offense by denunciation.

Denunciation is a voluntary referral method that can be made by a natural or legal person without any legal obligation to do so. Exceptions make certain situations where denunciation becomes mandatory if the person has become aware of the commission of any crime. In this respect, the legislator incriminated at art. 266 para. (1) Criminal Code the offense of non-forfeiture which consists in a person's act of not announcing the authorities, even though he was aware of an offense provided by the criminal law against life or that resulted in the death of a person. It is also stipulated in art. 410 par. (1) of the Criminal Code, the offense of non-infringement of national security crimes thus criminalizes the person's deed to do so in the event that he has been informed of the preparation or committing of any offense that is likely to affect national security.[3]

There are situations in which the denouncer may be the person who committed the offense and thus benefit from the removal of criminal liability as a cause of non-punishment.

Practical aspect:

- On 14.09.2014 R.E. turned-out at the headquarters of the General Anticorruption Directorate - Argeş County Service, and filed a complaint about the fact that an employee of RAR Pitesti requested and received the amount of 500 lei to make his technical inspection of his BMW 3 Series without passing it through all the verification means. The DGA workers received the denunciation and under the direct coordination of a prosecutor within the Prosecutor's Office attached to the Argeş Tribunal, investigated the denounced person, investigating activities that led to the identification and probation of several RAR employees receiving regular bribes for various services who were circumventing the proper performance of their duties. Since R.E. filed the denunciation before the criminal investigative bodies had been notified, he benefited from the elimination of criminal liability.

Also, self-denouncement may also have the value of a mitigating circumstance.

Practical aspect:

- On 20.08.2014 the workers of the Giurgiu Organized Crime Prevention Service under the coordination of a prosecutor within the DIICOT - Giurgiu Territorial Office carried out a flagrant, resulting in the fact that the DV received for resale from the named RT a number of 22 sachets containing a white powder, possibly cocaine. Being faced with clear evidence and at the request of his lawyer, the defendant R.T. filed a complaint with the criminal investigating authorities about the persons who supplied him with high-risk drugs, as well as with other individuals on the same criminal level as he. Thus, the criminal investigating bodies initiated specific activities to investigate the facts, with 12 persons being prosecuted and the denouncer benefited according to art.15 of the Law no.143/2000 on the prevention and combating of illicit drug trafficking and consumption, to halve the penalty limits prescribed by law. Concerning the so-called D.V, it is worth mentioning that the flagrant was carried out following its denunciation and thus benefited from the provisions of art. 14 of the Law no. 143/2000 his deed was not punished because it was brought to the attention of the authorities before the criminal prosecution had begun.

[2] Mihail Udroiu. Procedură penală. Partea specială 2017, Ed. Universul juridic, pag. 26.
[3] V. Rămureanu,Proceduri penale, Bucuresti, 2016, Ed. Universul Juridic, pag. 28.

A denunciation is made only personally, and if he is a person with restricted exercise capacity through his legal representative. There is a situation where the person who has been denounced by a person is his legal representative or a person who agrees with his acts if he has limited exercise capacity. In this case, the prosecution is made ex officio.

The denunciation having a written form must fulfil the formal requirements in the sense that it contains the name, surname, personal numerical code, its quality and domicile, and for legal persons the name, the registered office, the unique registration code, the fiscal identification code, the registration number in the trade register. Once personal data have been recorded, the description of the reported criminal offense, as well as the indication of the perpetrators and evidence, if known by the denouncer, must be given. The lack of one or more of these form elements involves redressing the administrative complaint by indicating the missing elements, and in the absence of an essential condition as the author's identification data or the description of the act is incomplete or unclear, the organs of tracing criminal will dispose the classification.

Practical aspect:

- The workers of the Criminal Investigation Bureau of the Barlad City Police received by e-mail a denunciation from Popescu Robert stating that on 25.08.2016 he passed the Urological Department of the Emergency County Hospital at the 3rd floor where a person was screaming from pain, which is why the denouncer wishes to be held accountable the medical personnel for negligence in the service. Police officers proceeded to identify the denouncer and found that his identity could not be accurately determined, the sending address did not exist, and the databases contained a large number of people with that name. Regarding the description of the deed, the criminal investigating bodies have determined that the injured person cannot be identified because the name or even the ward in which he was present was not indicated and the concrete way of committing the negligence offense was not described in the notification. Taking into account the findings of the investigation bodies, they solved the denunciation in the form of a petition and did not find any real aspects of criminal nature, for which reason they ordered its classification.

If the denunciation is anonymous, it can not be considered as an act of indicating the criminal prosecution bodies, but the judicial bodies have the obligation to verify the veracity of the issues raised and if they find that they confirm, they will initiate the prosecution.

Practical aspect:

- On May 14, 2014 at the Police Headquarters of Constanţa Municipality an e-mail was received regarding a denunciation from several detainees of Poarta Albă Penitentiary. The denunciation was anonymous, no name or surname being indicated, but it was brought to the knowledge of the criminal investigation authorities that the prisoner of F.L. of Cell No. 12, Body B boasts that he cheated more elderly people by "the accident method", earning big sums of money. In his criminal activity he uses a cell phone and several phone cards illegally obtained from other detainees and is helped by his former concubine N.E. who presented at the home of injured people to take money or jewellery from them. Considering that several facts of this kind were reported in the district of Constanţa County, being left with an unknown author, the criminal investigating authorities heard of themselves and under the supervision of a prosecutor they were able to prove the criminal activity of the detainee F.L. and the so-called N.E., investigations that were uncovered by a flagrant on 18.08.2014.

As in the case of the complaint, the denunciation may also have electronic form, subject to the existence of an electronic signature, and in the oral case, the criminal investigative body will record it in a minutes and then hear it in witness quality.

1.3. The referrals made by leadership persons or other people

On the same level with the complaint and the denunciation as a way of indicating the criminal prosecution bodies, there is the referral made by the persons with leading positions or by other people, being regulated in art. 291 para. (1) of the New Criminal Procedure Code. They are obliged to immediately notify the criminal investigating bodies the persons who hold leading positions within the public administration authorities or other public authorities, public institutions or other legal persons of public law who, in the exercise of their duties, have learned of the existence of any offenses. It is also the duty of the persons who have control duties when, in the exercise of their duties, they have been aware of the commission of any offense. These people can be part of public institutions, but also of private entities with their own control mechanisms. Also in the provisions of Article 291 are included those persons exercising a public interest service which have been invested by the public authorities or are subject to their control or supervision and in the exercise of their official duties have been aware of the existence of any crime, bailiffs, lawyers in the performance of certain tasks, notaries public.[4]

These referrals apply only to offenses for which the criminal action is initiated ex-officio and must have the content of a denunciation. We note, therefore, that this way of referral essentially takes the form of a mandatory denunciation.

Also included in this category are the minutes drawn up by the finding bodies listed in Articles 61 and [4] Phd Judge Voicu Puşcaşu, Phd Judge Cristinel Ghigheci, Proceduri Penale, Vol. 1, pg. 41- 42.

62 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure. They no longer resume the description and their examples, since both the theoretical and the practical part are entirely applied by the section of the finding bodies.

The public order and national security bodies shall draw up a report in the event of a finding of a criminal offense. This act has a dual function both as a means of referring the criminal prosecution body being provided in art. 288 para. (1) referring to art. 292 of the new Code of Criminal Procedure and as a means of proof provided in art. 198 par. (2) New Code of Criminal Procedure.

In this category is also included the conclusion of a hearing made by the court in the case of the offense of audience.

Practical aspect:

- On 9 May 2014, 10 a.m., at the Iasi Tribunal, several defendants accused of criminal grouping, trafficking and money laundering have been tried. The public hearing was attended by defendants, including D.L. what managed to bring a gun with ammunition into the courtroom. When M.S. had to speak, D.L. pulled out a gun and directed it to the witness, but the trigger was not perturbed because the hitch was not drawn and a representative of the guard intervened. In this case, the referral was constituted by the closing of the sitting, and the prosecutor present in the court took over the case by immediately ordering the continuation of the criminal prosecution and taking the measure of apprehension of the accused person that he intended to kill the witness M.S.

1.4. The ex officio referral

Article 292 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure stipulates the way of the ex officio notification, so the criminal investigation bodies, if they have become aware of the committing of a crime in a different way than the complaint, denunciation or notifications made by persons with leading positions are bound to record an ex officio referral.

Starting from the ex officio notification of the criminal prosecution body, either personally proceeds with the prosecution, or hand it over to the competent prosecution body by administrative means.

As we have previously stated in the case that the complaint or denunciation does not meet the substantive or lawful conditions, the criminal investigation bodies can check the issues raised and, if it finds that they may be relevant, draws up a minutes from which they refer from office. A practical example was opened at the denouncing session.

One of the usual sources of information from which the criminal prosecution authorities complain ex officio is the media.

Practical aspect:

- On April 22, 2014, in the local press, in Neamt County a press article entitled "Find out who poisons the water in Bicaz Dam" appeared. It was mentioned in the article that a slaughterhouse in Bicaz-Chei drove dead animal remains in the Bicaz River, which later collapsed in the Bicaz Dam and became an outbreak of infection. Taking into account the ones mentioned in the press article, the criminal prosecution bodies heard of the offense of water infestation, and in the course of the criminal investigation it was ascertained that the reported issues are true.

In a rule of law, there are also specialized bodies with the objective of maintaining national security. These structures carry out specific investigative activities and the information obtained is confidential. Criminal Investigation Bodies have access to classified information up to various levels of classification according to the specifics of work, so they can be notified of offenses, but they can not use the documents they receive because they are not intended to be advertised. In order to capitalize the information it is necessary to initiate the criminal prosecution which starts from the official act of the ex officio notification.

Practical aspect:

- A specialized structure on the maintenance of national security carried out the specific investigation activity towards the foreign citizen I.H. As a result of the investigations, it has been shown that he travels regularly to Turkey by airplane and has more Romanian citizens known to be part of the so-called "underworld", suspected of dealing with drug trafficking. Given that I.H. has a very high standard of living, with no visible source of revenue, and several people said they were buying high-risk drugs from Turkey that they made available to the interlopes, the structure informed D.I.I.C.O.T. prosecutors have heard of their case and initiated the prosecution.

In the case of offenses found in the flagrant, the minutes to be drawn up on this occasion constitute an act of indicating the criminal prosecution bodies, and the injured persons of the offense found may file a complaint.

If the information is accurate, no matter how they get to the criminal prosecution body, this is obliged to complain of its own motion.[5]

1.5. Preliminary complaint

Another way of indicating criminal prosecution bodies is the prior complaint in the form of a regular complaint, the difference being that the existence of this complaint makes the criminal action in the case of criminal offenses conditional. The existence of the prior complaint does not give rise to the obligation of the criminal prosecution bodies to order the commencement of criminal prosecution, the continuation of the criminal prosecution of the suspect or the commencement of the criminal action.

The prior complaint must meet the formal and substantive conditions, just as for a regular complaint, and in the absence of one or more of such elements, it is returned administratively by indicating the shortcomings.

[5] PhD Judge Voicu Puşcaşu, PhD Judge Cristinel Ghigheci, Proceduri Penale, Vol. 1, pag. 44.

The preliminary complaint is made in written or oral form, in which case the criminal investigative body records a report in this respect. This can be done both personally and for another person by procuration, and the New Code of Criminal Procedure stipulates that the prior complaint may be advanced electronically, subject to the existence of an electronic signature, just as with the other means of notification.

The injured person may be deprived of his/her capacity to exercise and the prior complaint may be made by his/her legal representative, and if he/she has limited exercise capacity, he may be personally made with the consent of the persons provided by the civil law. If the perpetrator is even his/her representative, the criminal prosecution bodies may order the commencement of criminal prosecution, the continuation of criminal prosecution of the suspect and the bringing of criminal proceedings, by virtue of the fact that, exceptionally, the existence of the preliminary complaint on certain offenses. Another exception to this rule is where the author is even the representative of the legal person whose interests should be protected.[6]

If we are in the situation of the provisions of art.199 of the Penal Code on domestic violence, where the commencement of the criminal action is conditioned by the existence of the preliminary complaint and the withdrawal of the preliminary complaint takes place, the prosecutor shall decide whether or not the will of the injured person, having the possibility to continue the prosecution as it deems necessary.

Practical aspect:

- On May 15, 2015, R.E. has filed a preliminary complaint, for the offense of hitting or other violence, against her husband, R.L., by making available to the criminal investigation authorities and a medical certificate, certifying that after the blows received it required 11 days of medical care. Subsequently, on 18 August 2015, she appeared before the criminal prosecution authorities saying she wanted to withdraw his previous complaint. Since the evidence-based economy shows that for R.L. this is not the first offense of this kind, and two more criminal cases have been filed in the last year by withdrawing the preliminary complaint and the perpetrator is known as a very violent person, it is concluded that he presses the injured person in order to withdraw the preliminary complaint, which is why the prosecutor considered it necessary to continue prosecution with regard to the suspicion and the initiation of the criminal action as finally to forward the file to the competent court.

When referring to the existence of the prior complaint we also consider the active or passive indivisibility of criminal liability in the sense that if the preliminary complaint was formulated only by one of the injured persons although there are several persons who have been injured the author will answer the criminal as well if the prior complaint concerns only one person, the prosecution will extend to all the perpetrators of the crime regardless of whether they are authors, co-authors, instigators or accomplices.

As regards the procedural period of revocation, the New Code of Criminal Procedure establishes it at 3 months from the day when the injured party learned of the act and does not take into account whether at the time when he learned of the criminal offense he knew the author or not. If the injured party is a minor or an incapacitated person, the term of revocation shall run from the time when his legal representative has learned of the existence of the deed. It has been concluded in the case-law that in the case of an abuse of trust which is committed by the refusal to return a good, the period of decline begins to run from the moment the author has given his first refusal, a solution given by the Bucharest Tribunal. Also regarding the introduction of the preliminary complaint, we encounter a situation in which the mediation between parties is interrupted, and the mediation period is not taken into account when establishing the term of introduction, being considered suspended.[7]

In the case of flagrant finding of the offenses of which the criminal proceedings are triggered, is conditioned by the existence of the preliminary complaint, the criminal prosecution or finding body shall be obliged to state the perpetrator, to record the minutes, then the criminal prosecution body to ask the injured person if he/she wants to file a preliminary complaint.

Practical aspect:

- On May 14, 2015, a patrol of public order and safety, moving in the area of the block parking, in the city of Sinaia, surprised the named E.F. while hitting the door of a car. The author of the deed stated verbally that he had made this gesture because the car is parked on the place he usually parked. The police have drawn up a verbal record of the flagrant crime for destruction, and the criminal investigation authorities have identified the owner of the car that said he did not want to file a criminal complaint for the crime of destruction. A criminal case file was drawn up on the basis of the minutes and was submitted to the prosecutor's office for classification, as the preliminary complaint was missing.

If the criminal prosecution for an offense has started and the legal classification of a criminal offense has subsequently changed depends on the existence of the prior complaint, the criminal prosecution bodies will ask the injured person if he wishes to make a preliminary complaint and the term for the forfeiture flows from that time.

1.6. Conclusions

The common point of all the means of referral is that it always takes the written form, either by direct recording of the injured person or by the oral hearing. In practice, the document of referral is the document which will always contain the registration number of the prosecutor's office or, as the case may be, of the criminal prosecution body and resolutions of the hierarchical chiefs on the registration procedure and the worker to whom the work was assigned for verification and settlement.

[6] Mihail Udroiu. Procedură penală. Partea specială, 2017, pag. 23.
[7] Mihail Udroiu. Procedură penală. Partea specială, 2017, pag.24-25.

The referral is the effect of a manifestation of will for the purpose of conducting criminal proceedings that may come from the criminal investigative body, the finding body or the injured person whose interests or rights have been violated as a result of committing an offense.

The referral is the procedural act by which a natural or legal person addresses the criminal prosecution body in order to achieve the object of criminal prosecution. The referral may refer to a partial or complete description of the offense, and the criminal investigative body is required to discover and collect material evidence to lead to the truth, even if some aspects are not to the liking of the person who made the referral.

According to the Code of Criminal Procedure the act of referral is not a material means of evidence, except for the rule, it makes the report of the flagrant offense.

The lack of the referral makes it impossible to draw up a procedural act of subsequent criminal prosecution such as the commencement of criminal prosecution, the continuation of criminal prosecution of the suspect or actuating criminal prosecution. The prosecutor or the criminal investigating body refers to the manner in which they are referred in most of the procedural or procedural acts that they draw up. Thus, the prosecutor reminds the act of referral in all the ordinances he makes when conducting the criminal prosecution.

References

- Udroiu M.,Procedură penală. Partea specială, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucuresti,2017.
- Voicu Pușcașu, Ghigheci Cristinel, Proceduri Penale,Vol. 1, Ed. Hamangiu, 2016.
- Rămureanu V.,Proceduri penale, Bucuresti, Ed. Universul Juridic,2016.

ROMANIAN COURTS HOLDING JURISDICTION IN THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE PROBATION MEASURES

Andrei-Dorin BĂNCILĂ

Abstract

The new law of enforcement of sanctions and non-deprivation procedural measures, namely Law no. 253/2013 regulates "the jurisdictional nature of execution". This jurisdictional nature of the enforcement of sanctions and non-deprivation procedural measures reflects through the involvement of the courts in the resolution of a significant number of issues related to enforcement.

Courts, either by judges delegated with administrative or judicial-administrative competences, or by judges in full capacity and who performs purely judicial duties specific to the judicial function, are called upon to perform activities designed to ensure the enforcement of the precepts contained in the court order or to regularize the actual execution by solving the incidents that arise during the execution.

Keywords: probation measures, the enforcement court, the judge delegated with the enforcement, the clerk delegated to the criminal enforcement department, the execution, the annulment and the revocation of the postponement of the punishment, the suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision or the conditional release.

Introductory remarks

The new law on the enforcement of sanctions and non-custodial procedural measures, namely Law no. 253/2013 on the execution of sentences, educational measures and other non-custodial measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings, reminds of the "jurisdictional nature of the execution", giving it an entire chapter[1].

This jurisdictional nature of the enforcement of sanctions and non-custodial measures is reflected by involving the courts in many enforcement matters.

In the following, we will see that the courts, whether by judges delegated with administrative or judicial-administrative competences, or by judges constituted in full court, who perform exclusive judicial functions specific to the judicial function, are called upon to perform activities designed to ensure the enforcement of the precepts comprised in the judgments or regularize the actual execution by solving the incidents that arise during the execution.

In this first part, it is useful to specify that we will approach the courts only from the perspective of their competences in relation to the execution of the probation measures, leaving in the authors' charge, above all, the rules of criminal procedural law and those of judicial organization to deepen the organization and functioning of the courts and from other perspectives.

1. The enforcement court

Of the relevant legislative provisions we find that the first entity with competences in connection with the execution of educational measures is the enforcement court. This is defined by the provisions of art. 553 Code of Criminal Procedure and it is, with only one exception, the court that handled the case in first instance. The only court that can not be a court of enforcement is the High Court of Cassation and Justice, which, when judging in first instance, has legally delegated most of the specific jurisdiction to the Bucharest Court of Appeal or the military court law.

In connection with this legal delegation of functional competence, we feel the need to have some discussions. Art. 553 par. (3) final thesis of the Code of Criminal Procedure is rather imprecise, using the singular form when referring to the military court law, without indicating its full name (as it does with regard to the civil court), although, according to art. 56 para. (1) letter a) and par. (2), referring to Annex 2 of Law no. 304/2004 regarding the judiciary organization, the military courts in the country are four: the Military Courthouse of Bucharest, the Military Courthouse of Cluj, the Military Courthouse of Iasi and the Military Courthouse of Timisoara. In order to answer the question which of the four military courthouses are competent to enforce a criminal judgment on a case before the High Court of Cassation and Justice, some authors[2] propose to choose the solution according to the relevant provisions of art. 41, which regulate territorial jurisdiction for crimes committed on the territory of the country or on Romanian flag vessels or aircraft registered in Romania. In particular, given the order of preference which is deduced from the provisions of art. 41 par. (5), we believe that the military court of execution in the case of first instance judgments of the High Court, is the one in whose circumscription the criminal act was committed or the one in whose circumscription the first Romanian harbour is situated, where the ship is anchored and the offense committed or the first place of landing on the Romanian territory of the aircraft in which the offense was committed.

* Assistant PhD candidate, Faculty of Law „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: andreibancilasng@gmail.com).

[1] Chapter III of Title I from Law no. 253/2013.

[2] L. Postelnicu and C. Meceanu, in the Code of Crminal Procedure. Comments on teh articles, coordinated by M. Udroiu, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharestti 2015, p. 1453.

We believe that these provisions can be added to the art. 42 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, useful in the case of crimes committed outside the territory of the country.

Even if, as I have shown, we agree with the provisions of art. 41 Code of Criminal Procedure, to which we add those of art. 42 Criminal Code, de lege ferenda we believe that a legislative amendment would be required to align the military enforcement order in the first instance judgments of the High Court to the type of the civil enforcement order.

In support of this proposal we call the historical perspective in relation to the teleological one.

Thus, in the old Code of Criminal Procedure the Territorial Military Courthouse was designated as a military court to execute the first instance judgments of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, which was abolished by the provisions of art. 20 of Law no. 255/2013 for the implementation of the new Code of Criminal Procedure, but also the fact that, according to art. 21 par. (1) of the same law, the cases before the disbanded Territorial Military Courthouse of Bucharest were taken over by the Military Courthouse of Bucharest. Also, the teleological argument that subsisted in the designation of the Bucharest Courthouse as a civil court for the execution of the first instance judgments of the High Court, namely that of the spatial approximation of the two courts, is found, in a stronger word, also as regards the election of the Military Courthouse of Bucharest as a military court for execution of the first instance judgments of the High Court.

In conclusion, we consider that the Military Courthouse of Bucharest should be designated as the military court to execute the first instance judgments of the High Court of Cassation and Justice.

The enforcement body has two main types of functional competencies in relation to the execution of probation measures: enforcement competences and enforcement competences to regulate (by solving some of the incidents during the actual execution).

Some of their competences in relation to the execution of the probation measures are enforced by the court of enforcement and they are exercised by its judges who are constituted in court. These are, in general, those competencies to regulate execution by solving some of the incidents that occurred during the actual execution, which require a simplified trial.

This category of competences includes, in the first place, those related to the contestation of execution for the cases provided by art. 198 par. (1) letter (a), (b) and (d) of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

In the same category of competence it was included expressing the agreement to leave the country since the person whom was given a solution for deferment of penalty or a solution of suspended sentence under supervision sentence has the obligation not to leave the territory of Romania without the consent of the court.

Also, according to the provisions of art. 48 of the Law no. 253/2013, corroborated with those of art. 87, art. 95 and art. 103 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, in the course of enforcement, the enforcement authority is competent to amend the content of some of the obligations imposed on the supervised person, to impose new ones or to order the cessation of the execution of some of the previously ordered ones.

2. Judge delegated whit the enforcement

The competences for the enforcement of criminal judgments in general of those who institute probation measures are in particular exercised by the executing court through the judge whom it delegates to carry out a series of activities necessary to ensure compliance to the individuals at the court's discretion. Thus, according to art. 554 par. (1) Code of Criminal Procedure, the court of enforcement "delegates one or more of its judges to conduct the enforcement".

The activity of the judge delegated to execution is, as it results from the very "delegate" particle governed by the rule of specialization, according to which it is necessary for the duties in question to be exercised by trained and experienced judges in criminal matters. The rule of specialization is also deduced from the provisions of art. 29 par. (2) of the Rules of Internal Order of the Courts, approved by the Decision of the Plenum of the Superior Council of Magistracy no. 1375/2015, which gives the possibility of partial or total relief of the delegated judge to the execution of the trial.

The activity of the judge delegated to the execution is also governed by the rule of continuity, expressly provided by art. 29 par. (3) of the Law no. 253/2013, also enshrined in the provisions of art. 29 par. (4) of the Internal Rules of the Courts, which requires that the judge delegated to the execution remains, as a rule, the same throughout the period of execution. This rule of continuity, which is a transposition in the matter of the enforcement of criminal judgments of the principle of continuity that governs the entire court activity, acquires a special importance in the conditions of diversification of the competences of the judge delegated to execution, to whom we will refer in the following.

In the context of the new regulations that illustrate the configuration of the institution of the judge delegated to the execution, its functional competence is made up of two categories of attributions: administrative (through which the functional competencies of the executing enforcement authority, which we have referred to above and which were entirely delegated to the judge in question, materializes) and jurisdictional-administrative (which gives the delegated judge a part of the competence of the enforcement instance regarding the regularization of the execution by solving some of the incidents during the actual execution).

The administrative tasks of the judge delegated with the execution are those through which he carries out the activity of enforcement of the criminal decisions.

The tasks in question are subsumed, according to art. 15 letter a) of Law no. 253/2013, as regards the probation measures, in order to ensure enforcement by communicating to the probation service and other community institutions involved in the execution of sentences and non-custodial measures, the children of the judgments they had the respective punishments or measures.

This task is reflected by an activity which is also known as the preparation works of execution, a phrase which is legally enforced by the provisions of the Rules of Internal Order of the Courts.

Of course, in carrying out this activity of mainly administrative and technical nature, the judge delegated to the execution is helped by the clerk delegated with the execution, a clerk whose special task is precisely to constitute real support for the judge delegated with the execution.

Besides, the importance but also the complexity of this administrative and technical activity to carry out criminal enforcement work is underlined by the need to delegate some of the judges and court clerks to deal exclusively or predominantly with this activity.

In the courts with a high workload, several judges and court clerks can be delegated with execution, and they carry out their work in the context of a functional court dismemberment called the criminal enforcement department.

The execution works (or under the equivalent designation of enforcement) include those activities that the delegated judge and the clerk delegated to the criminal enforcement department performs after the moment the judgment becomes enforceable in order to ensures the fulfilment of the provisions that are likely to be executed. It must be said that the meaning of the syntagma in question is quite broad, comprising not only the works which refer to the enforcement of the sanctions, the obligations, the express prohibitions contained in the provisions of the judgments, but also the works referring to the achievement of more distant effects of criminal proceedings, such as consequences (dismissal from the office, for example) or prohibitions not expressly contained in the provisions of the judgments and intervening as a result of provisions of the law (opelegis).

The execution work to be carried out in order to ensure that the provisions contained in the judgments are complied with, are: issuing various procedural documents (such as the mandate to execute the imprisonment or life imprisonment, such as the ban on leaving the country if we refer to custodial sentences); the drawing up of various addresses or other correspondence documents in connection with the enforcement activity; the communication of various procedural documents or extracts from them to the authorities with responsibility for the enforcement of judgments; transmission of data and extracts from judicial documents; the return, consisting of sending an address to an authority to which, previously, was sent or submitted procedural documents extracted from them or data relating to the enforcement of judgments; the request for information, which is an execution work complementary to the return; verification, which is a work of execution similar to the request for information and which is expressly provided by art. 154 par. (4) of the Rules of Internal Order of the courts regarding the situation of the collection of fines sent for execution; the referral, which is an enforcement work whereby unjustified delays in the execution of criminal judgments (as in the case of referrals under Article 154 (5) of the Rules of Court Internal Courts) or it is intended to clarify certain aspects of enforcement (as in the case of the referrals referred to in Article 554 (2) of the Penal Code and Article 29 (1) (f) of the Rules of Procedure of the courts).

In connection with the latter enforcement work, consisting in informing the executing court to clarify the unclear aspects of execution or to remove the obstacles to execution, a serious problem was raised in the doctrine regarding the incompatibilities that may arise when the judge who seizes is also entrusted with the resolution of the referral.

In view of the many aspects that may lead the delegated judge in charge of enforcement to bring the matter to court for clarification or to remove obstacles to enforcement, the answer to the question raised can only be that the degree of involvement of the delegated judge must be analysed in the expression of a point of view on the matter raised by the court of enforcement[3].

The judiciary-administrative competences of the delegated judge with the execution are a new category of tasks introduced with the latest reform of criminal and criminal law enforcement in our country, which took place in 2014 with the entry into force of the new criminal codes and enforcement laws.

This category of tasks of the delegated judge with the execution is also an expression of the judicial nature of the execution of sanctions and non-custodial measures, expressly enshrined in Law no. 253/2013 and to which I referred to the beginning of this work.

[3] D. Lupașcu, Aspecte teoretice si de practica judiciara privind punerea in executare a pedepselor principale, Universitatea București – Facultatea de drept, teză de doctorat, nepublicată, p. 98.

The development of the functional competences of the delegated judge with the execution by winning this new category of judicial-administrative attributions is natural in the context in which the alternative ways of executing sentences and measures depriving of liberty have been significantly diversified in the context of the new criminal law.

This diversification meant the rethinking of the criminal execution paradigm, by strengthening the role of the probation counselor in supervising the execution, by involving the community institutions in execution, but also by widening the competences of the delegated judge with the execution, which, according to the provisions of art. 14 par. (3) of the Law no. 253/2013, guides and controls the oversight process carried out by the probation service or the other authorities responsible for the execution of sanctions and non-custodial sentences.

In order to carry out its new guidance and control functions, the following administrative-judicial tasks were associated with the delegated judge with the execution:

The task to solve the incidents arising during the execution and which are not within the jurisdiction of the enforcement instance by the judges constituted in common law. In this subcategory there are tasks such as:

- the payment of the penalty in monthly instalments, attributed by art. 22 par. (1) and (2), with respect to the convicted natural person, and by art. 25 par. (2) and (3) of Law no. 253/2013, on the convicted legal person;
- granting permissions during the execution of the complementary punishment of prohibition of certain rights, attributed by art. 31 of the Law no. 253/2013;
- the designation of an institution in the community in which the unpaid work is performed if its execution is no longer possible in any of the two institutions in the community specified in the decision of the court of first instance, art. 51 par. (2), in case of delay of punishment, and art. 57 par. (2) of the Law no. 253/2013, in the case of suspended custodial supervision.

The task to solve complaints against the probation counselor's decisions, generally governed by art. 15 lit. f) and art. 17 par. (4) of the Law no. 253/2013. We will list below some situations, for executing the measures of probation, the probation officer shall take decisions which may form the subject of complaints competence appointed judge:

- the decision by which, according to art. 50 par. (1) of the Law no. 253/2013, the probation adviser establishes the course to be followed and the institution in the community in which the course is to be carried out, in case the supervised person is obliged to attend a school or vocational training course;
- the decision by which, according to art. 51 par. (1) of the Law no. 253/2013, the probation counselor establishes in which of the two institutions in the community specified in the judgment the community service work and the specific type of activity are to be performed, assuming the supervised person is obliged to perform unpaid work for the benefit of the community;
- the decision by which, according to art. 53 par. (1) of the Law no. 253/2013, the probation adviser establishes the program or programs to be followed and, where appropriate, the institution or institutions in the community in which they are to take place, if the supervised person is required to attend one or more social reintegration programs, conducted by the probation service or organized in collaboration with community institutions;
- the decision by which, according to art. 54 par. (1) of the Law no. 253/2013, the probation counselor establishes the institution in which the control, treatment or medical care is to be carried out, in case the supervised person is obliged to undergo control measures, treatment or medical care and where the institution has not been established by the court decision.

The task of judicial fines is provided, with a general norm value, through the provisions of art. 15 lit. g) of Law no. 253/2013.

In particular, in the matter of the execution of probation measures, the delegated judge with enforcement may apply fines in cases such as those provided by art. 19 par. (1) of the Law no. 253/2013, where community institutions contributing to the execution of sentences and non-custodial measures do not fulfill or inadequately perform the duties assigned to them and to which the judge entrusted with the execution may apply a judicial fine in an amount between 500 lei and 5,000 lei.

The task to empower community institutions with competencies in the execution of probation measures is another manifestation of the judicial nature of enforcement. The task is stipulated in art. 20 and art. 21 of Law no. 253/2013.

3. Court hearing at first instance to postpone punishment or suspension of custody

Besides the executing court, exercising its tasks regarding the execution of probation measures, as we have seen, either by the court hearing the execution or by judges constituted in panels court of common law, the law maker granted functional competences to the court that pronounced at first instance the postponement of the punishment or the suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision. This category of courts is, as we will argue below, insufficiently complete and precisely outlined.

Through the provisions of art. 582 par. (2) and art. 583 par. (2) Code of Criminal Procedure, the court that issued in the first instance the postponement of the punishment or the suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision, the competence to order the revocation of the postponement of the punishment and the revocation of the suspension of execution of the punishment under supervision in case of non-fulfilment of civil obligations in the court decision is explicitly granted.

Of course, in most cases, the court that ruled in first instance the postponement of the punishment or the suspension of execution of the sentence under supervision is the very first instance court and thus also the court of execution.

However, there are also situations in which there is no identity between the court of enforcement and the court that pronounced in first instance the postponement of the punishment or suspension of the execution of the sentence under supervision, the simplest example being given by the hypothesis of the enforcement of the rulings issued by the High Court of Cassation and Justice in the first instance.

However, the previous example is not the only one, because, depending on the solutions contained in the criminal judgments and depending on whether or not the appeals are to be filed, either the first instance judgment will be delivered or the decision of the first instance as amended by the appeal judgment or the judgment given in the appeal.

For a better understanding, we believe we can evoke perfectly possible examples in practice, as follows:

- the hypothesis of postponing the punishment or conviction with suspension of execution of the punishment under supervision in the appeal after acquittal or cessation of the criminal proceedings in first instance;
- the hypothesis in which the decision of the first instance was abolished, through which a solution other than the acquittal or cessation of the criminal trial was adopted, but no solution to defer punishment or conviction with suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision has been adopted, and the control court re-judged and pronounced for the first time a solution for postponement of punishment or conviction with suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision.

Assuming that we reasonably argued the existence of the situations in which the enforcement instance is not identical with the court that pronounced in first instance the postponement of the punishment or suspension of execution of the punishment under supervision, we return to the analysis of the provisions of art. 582 par. (2) and art. 583 par. (2) Code of Criminal Procedure.

The legal texts invoked are, in our opinion, incomplete and inaccurate.

We say that they are incomplete because they should have covered the assumptions of revocation in cases of non-execution of the probation measures, more precisely of any measures and obligations of supervision out of those stipulated in art. 85 par. (1) to (4) and art. 93 par. (1) - (4) Criminal Code.

Such an addition is necessary in the context in which the functional court competent to order revocation in such cases is not sufficiently precise determined by the provisions of art. 86 par. (4) letter b), corroborated with those of art. 88 par. (1) Criminal Code, and the provisions of art. 94 par. (5) letter b), corroborated with those of art. 96 paragraph (1) Criminal Code, but neither those of art. 56 para. (1) or art. 57 par. (2) of the Law no. 253/2013. After reading the legal texts mentioned above, which refer only to "court", without specifying whether the court or other court (for example, the court that ordered in first instance the postponement of the sentence or the suspension of custody) remains the question which is the functional court competent to order the revocation of the postponement of the sentence or the suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision in case of non-execution or inadequate execution of the probation measures.

We say that the provisions of art. 582 par. (2) and art. 583 par. (2) Code of Criminal Procedure are inaccurate because they use imprecise attributes to actually identify the competent court to order the revocation of the postponement of the sentence or the suspension of the execution of the sentence under oversight in case of non-fulfillment of civil obligations, namely the first instance adjudication of the postponement of the sentence or suspension of the sentence under supervision. The literal interpretation of this attribute, which should be the first interpretation to be used but sufficient to attempt to discover the true intention of the law maker, will lead to the conclusion that there are also situations that remain uncovered, namely those in which the delay of the sentence or the suspension of the sentence under supervision are pronounced for the first time in the appeal procedures. In such a case, perfectly possible in practice, there will not be a court to first adjudicate the postponement of the sentence or the suspension of the execution of the sentence under supervision, but only a court that finally pronounced the solutions in question. Therefore, a further question arises as which is the court competent to order the revocation of the postponement of the sentence or the suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision in case of non-observance of the civil obligations, but also in case of non-compliance - the inadequate execution or execution of the probation measures, when the solutions in question were given in the first phase of the call.

We can give an answer to the first of the two questions (namely, which is the functional competent court to order the revocation of the postponement of the punishment or the suspension of the execution of the penalty under supervision in case of non-execution or inadequate execution of the probation measures) in the sense that the functional competent court is the enforcement court, once reading the provisions of art. 15 letter e) of Law no. 253/2013, which gives the judge delegated with execution the duty to notify the enforcement court in the cases provided by the law, inter alia, for the "revocation of non-custodial sentences or measures".

For drafting answer to the second question (which court is competent to order the revocation of the postponement of the sentence or the suspension of the execution of the sentence under supervision in the case of non-compliance with civil obligations, and in the event of non-execution or inappropriate enforcement of the probation measures, were the solutions had been given for the first time in the appeal) also an example of jurisprudence[4] leads us, from which it follows that although the suspension of the execution of the sentence under supervision was condemned by the final court[5], competent to revoke the suspension for non-execution of the probation measures was declared the first instance[6], which is also a court of enforcement.

In support of the same answer, we can also rely on another case-law[7] example, from which it results that although the suspension of execution of the punishment under supervision was first issued in the appeal, the competence to solve the request to revoke the suspension for non-payment of civil damages belongs to the first instance court execution.

Since the criminal procedural provisions here analyzed underpin the same criticisms and under the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1968, whose pertinent provisions regarding the revocation of the conditional suspension of the execution of the sentence or the suspension of the execution of the sentence under supervision[8] were similar, we believe it is useful to show that the jurisprudence developed in the light of those provisions has held that "the examination of the request to revoke the conditional suspension of the execution of the punishment (for non-payment of civil damages, nn) belongs to the court which judged in the first instance the case with the offense for which the sentence was the suspension of conditional execution, even if that suspension was ordered as a result of the appeal being upheld by the higher court"[9].

Although it seems that the jurisprudence has somewhat surpassed the legislative inaccuracy and the lack of coverage of all the assumptions that can be encountered in practice, based on the fact that the revocation is a matter of regularization of the execution, we believe that we could formulate a lege ferenda proposal that the law maker explicitly stipulates (as we will see below that it did in the case of conditional release) that the enforcement authority has the functional competence to order the revocation of the postponement of the punishment or the suspension of the execution of the sentence under supervision, both in the case of non-civil obligations and in the case of non-execution or inadequate execution of probation measures, i.e the supervision measures and the obligations and prohibitions accompanying the two alternative ways of judicially identifying criminal sanctions.

Such legislative clarification would be particularly welcome, especially when the High Court of Cassation and Justice ruled on the substance of the case in first instance, where, de lege lata, the supreme court has the functional competence to rule on the revocation of the postponement of the punishment and the revocation of suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision at least for the case of non-fulfillment of civil obligations, i.e a matter of regularization of the execution, in the context in which the principle established by the provisions of art. 553 par. (2) Code of Criminal Procedure is in the sense of relieving this instance the taks of the enforcement court.

4. The court that ordered conditional release

With regard to the execution of the probation measures ordered in the case of conditional release with a remaining period to be executed for 2 years or more, the law gives tasks of regularizing the execution of the competent court to order the conditional release. We would like to point out that, as regards the enforcement competences of judgments ordering conditional release, the competent court to order conditional release also acts as an executing court.

According to art. 587 par. (1) the competent court to order conditional release is always "the court in whose jurisdiction the place of detention is located"[10].

According to the provisions of art. 588 par. (3) Code of Criminal Procedure "the court mentioned in art. 587 par. (1) also rules on the revocation of conditional release" in two cases:

- when, during the surveillance, the conditional

[4] By criminal sentence no. 11/2016 of the Court of Appeal of Târgu Mureş, the court, as executing court, declared competent to solve the petition regarding the revocation of the suspension of execution of the punishment under supervision, although this solution was given for the first time by the High Court of Cassation and Justice in appeal; the judgment is accessible in the electronic data base Lege5.

[5] As it is clear from criminal decision no. 4119/2011 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice - the Criminal Division, whereby the appeal as the last ordinary attack path according to the Code of Criminal Procedure 1986 reduced the penalty and changed the way of individualisation execution, effective enforcement, suspension under the supervision of the execution of the punishment; the court decision is accessible in the electronic database of the portal www.scj.ro.

[6] From criminal sentence no. 18/2010 of the Târgu Mureş Court of Appeal it results that this court has ruled on the merits of the case in the first instance; the judgment is not public.

[7] Criminal Sentence no. 27/2015 of the Bacău Court of Appeal, accessible in the electronic database of the portal www.rolii.ro, final by the criminal decision no. 705/2015 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice - Criminal Section, accessible in the electronic data base Leg5.

[8] See the provisions of art. 447 par. (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1968.

[9] Criminal Sentence no. 39/2005 of the Cluj Court of Appeal, cited by L. Lefterache in the Annotated Criminal Code, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest 2007, p. 292

[10] With regard to this way of conferring jurisdiction on the issue of conditional release exclusively for the first category of courts in the judicial system, namely the courts in whose territorial jurisdiction the places of detention are located, we only have the duty to state that, within the Constitutional Court of Romania there are four complaints submitted that criticize the law maker's option, as it results from the analysis of the electronic portal of the constitutional court www.ccr.ro.

released does not exactly execute the probation measures and

- when, after the release, the released one commits a new offense discovered in the term of supervision and for which a sentence was pronounced for imprisonment even after the expiration of that term, and the competent court to order the revocation of the release (that is the court that judges, or judged in first instance the offense of revoking, as it results from the provisions of article 588 (2), the last sentence of the Code of Criminal Procedure) did not rule on the revocation.

The latter functional competence granted to the conditional release court to order the revocation of conditional release for the commission of a new offense in the period of custody of conditional release, when the court which judges the new offense did not itself order the revocation, it reflects another difference of regime between the revocation of conditional release and the revocation of the postponement of the execution of the punishment or the suspension of the execution of the sentence under supervision, on the other hand, in these latter hypotheses, the court ordering the adjournment or the suspension without having revocation competences for committing new offenses within the surveillance terms.

As it can easily be seen in art. 588 par. (3) Code of Criminal Perocedure, the law maker uses the normative reference technique to designate the competent court to rule on the revocation of conditional release in the assumptions of the previous paragraph, which may rise difficulties in interpretation and application, since the text referred to reflects that "the court where the place of detention is", but at the time when the question of the revocation of conditional release is made, the convict may be either in a state of liberty or imprisoned at another place of detention, which may give rise to a question about which place of detention is concerned.

We believe that, as other author[11] has stated, the law maker wished to give, by questioning, the competence to rule on the revocation of conditional release in the hypotheses in question to the same court that ordered conditional release, but we believe, in order to remove any discussion, de lege ferenda, this intention should be expressed explicitly and directly.

From the analysis of the relevant legal provisions, we will find that the court that ordered conditional release does not have the functional jurisdiction to order the suspension of conditional release.

5. The court that judges or judged in first instance the offense that could lead to the revocation or annulment of the postponement of the punishment, the suspension of the execution of the sentence under supervision or the conditional release

Another court to which the law confers competence to regulate the execution of probation measures is, according to the provisions of art. 582 par. (1), art. 583 par. (1) and art. 588 par. (1) and (2) Code of Criminal Procedure, the court "that judges or judged in the first instance the offense that could lead to the revocation or annulment".

From reading these texts, undoubtedly it results that the law maker understood mainly to confer the functional competence to order the annulment or revocation of the three alternative means of enforcement to the court that "judges or judegd in first instance the offense that might entail the revocation or cancellation". This choice is a logical one, capable of promptly regulating the execution of the probation measures accompanying the postponement of the punishment, suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision and conditional release.

But, as I have already pointed out, the law maker has shown inconsistency, choosing to regulate, without proper justification, a partially different regime from the point of view of the competent jurisdiction to order the annulment or revocation on condition of conditional release, on the one hand the hypothesis of the postponement of the punishment and suspension of the punishment under supervision, on the other. This different regime makes the provisions of art. 588 par. (2) Code of Criminal Procedure be inaccurate, as we will argue below.

The difference in question is that while in the case of postponement of the punishment and the suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision, the competence to order the annulment and revocation (when committing a new offense) belongs exclusively to the court that judges or judged in the first instance the offense and that could be the subject of the revocation or annulment, in the case of conditional release, the jurisdiction in question remains exclusive only to the court which judges or judged in first instance the offense which leads to the annulment, because, in the case of an offense involving the revocation of conditional release, the revocation is no longer the sole responsibility of the court which in first instance judges the offense in question, but it is also granted to the conditional release court, which, according to the provisions of art. 588 par. (3) the last sentence of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it becomes competent to order revocation when the court which in first instance ruled the offense of revocation has not ruled on that.

[11] E. Dumbravă, Conditional release in new codes, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest 2016, p. 135.

The difference of the regime in question makes, as I stated above, that the provisions of art. 588 par. (2) Code of Criminal Procedure be inaccurate. The inaccuracy consists in using (by the method of referring to the previous paragraph of the law) at a past time of the verb to judge, when identifying the court competent to order the revocation of conditional release. In other words, if the conditional release body has the functional competence to order the revocation of a new offense when the court that in first instance judged this new offense did not rule on the revocation, it means that it is inaccurate to say that the court that judges or judged in first instance the offense of revoking conditional release is competent to order revocation.

More specifically, the court in charge of prosecuting the offense of revoking conditional release may order revocation only if it makes a decision on the offense of revocation and if it has not done so in that context to become competent to order even the revocation of the conditional release.

So, we believe that, de lege ferenda, if the law maker keeps the option of devoting alternative competences, the provisions of art. 588 par. (1), (2) and (3) Code of Criminal Procedure should be correlated with each other in order to give a precise meaning to the provisions governing the functional competence to order the revocation of conditional release in the case of a new offense, so that what follows implicitly from the corroborated interpretation of the said texts results explicitly, namely that the court in charge of the prosecution of the offense that leads to the revocation of conditional release may order revocation only if it makes a ruling on the offense of revocation, otherwise the jurisdiction in question will lie with the court of conditional release.

Considering that, in the matter of conditional release, the court which ordered the release is competent not only to revoke the release in case of non-execution of the probation measures, but also to revoke a new offense if the court that judged the case in first instance the offense that would lead to the revocation did not rule on the revocation of conditional release, de lege ferenda it would also be useful to regulate such a functional competence of the enforcement instance if the court that in first instance judged the offense that might attract the revocation of the postponement of the punishment or the suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision did not give rise to the revocation.

This would bring about a regime unification in terms of functional competence in the matter of revoking (and in case of a new offense) the postponement of the punishment and the suspension of the execution of the punishment under supervision on the one hand and the revocation of conditional release, on the other hand.

Conclusions

In the matter of the enforcement of probation measures, but not only of them, there are several categories of courts that have different competences, such as: the enforcement court (either through the judges who are in full force, exercising exclusive jurisdictional tasks, or through the judge delegated with execution, which mainly exercises administrative powers), the court that gave in first instance the postponement of the punishment or the suspension of execution of the punishment under supervision, the court of conditional release and the court that judges or judged in first instance the offense that could lead to the revocation or cancellation of the postponement of punishment, suspended custody or conditional release.

Also after the analysis, including the reference to the case law, we have drafted some proposals of the law de lege ferenda that are meant to emphasize the need for the Romanian law maker to be more consistent when it regulates the competences of the courts in the enforcement of the probation measures.

References

- L. Postelnicu and C. Meceanu, in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Comment on articles, coordinated by M. Udroiu, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest 2015.
- D. Lupascu, Theoretical aspects and judicial practice on enforcement of principal sentences, University of Bucharest - Faculty of Law, doctoral dissertation, unpublished.
- L. Lefterache in the Annotated Criminal Code, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest 2007, p. 292.
- E. Dumbravă, The Conditional release in the new codes, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest 2016, p. 135.

OVERCROWDING – CURRENT ISSUES IN ROMANIAN DETENTION CENTERS. CAUSES, EFFECTS AND REMEDIES

Dorian CHIRIȚĂ

Abstract:

The overcrowding phenomenon in detention centers generates serious issues with respect to the human dignity – corollary of the fundamental human rights. Both international legislation and the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights relating to article 3 and 8 of the European Convention of the Human Rights address the issue of prison overcrowding, stating that this can lead to violation of fundamental human rights, causing severe physical and psychological trauma, which is aggravating as the prisoners spend more time in the detention center.

If this issue wasn't given much attention in the past, being considered an inevitable mental sufferance of the execution of punishment, respectively a reasonable constraint determined by the conviction, lately it has been approached more seriously, at both national and international level and, as a result, new standards are set for ensuring the protection of the fundamental human rights.

The purpose of this study is to identify the problems that prison overcrowding generates for both the detainee, on a personal level, and for the detention centers, from the administrative point of view. Moreover, this study critically analyses the national and international evolution of the legislation and the national policies of the competent institutions and authorities in dealing with this issue. At the same time, the author offers practical legislative and administrative solutions which may lead to reducing the phenomenon of prison overcrowding.

Keywords: Conditions of detention; treatment of detainees; prohibition of inhuman and degrading treatments; relevant international and European standards, legislative measures on prison overcrowding.

Introduction

Prison overcrowding has currently become a social issue in contemporary times and this phenomenon generally occurs when the necessities of the detainee space in prison within a certain jurisdiction exceed the capacity of the facilities to hold the detainees provided in that jurisdiction.

The prison overcrowding phenomenon is a current problem for the government of all countries. Considering its negative impact on the people directly involved in the process (detainees and the prison staff) and on the society in general, it requires a quick and efficient intervention.

This article is aimed at showcasing the problems created by prison overcrowding on both the personal and administrative levels, on the one hand, and at describing the efforts of the competent national authorities to solve these problems, on the other hand. Moreover, we propose administrative and legislative solutions that would lead to a decrease in the prison overcrowding phenomenon.

In Romania, the problem of prison overcrowding is not of late interest, but it has recently been brought to the attention of the competent state bodies and the society, as a result of the numerous European Court of Human Rights judgements holding the State responsible for the conditions of detention in prisons and in the detention facilities attached to police stations, and of the Pilot judgement in the case of Rezmiveș and others vs. Romania[1], in which the Court held that there had been a violation of Article 3 of the European Convention on the Human Rights (prohibition of torture and of inhuman and degrading treatment) and that Romania had to implement a series of measures and remedies to address these problems.

This pilot judgement has also led to the initiation of legal actions against the State in which the detainees, unsatisfied with the overcrowded prisons and the conditions of detention, attempted at holding the state and the relevant institutions responsible for moral prejudices suffered during their detention period caused by the breach of fundamental rights, such as the right to health and human dignity. This state of affairs imposed that Government should adopt immediate measures, hasty measures in our opinion, which not only proved inefficient, but also produced a negative social impact. The efficiency of these measures will be further analysed hereinafter.

Paper Content

Examining the evolution of the detention conditions in Romania and the legislator viewpoint regarding the minimal standards of living for a detainee demonstrates that, although the overcrowding phenomenon in the Romanian prisons is not recent, it has increased so much in the late years that it is currently seen as a major problem for the detention system and implicitly for the judicial system.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Judge (e-mail: dorian.chirita@yahoo.com)

[1] Case of Rezmives and others v. Romania (Applications nos. 61467/12, 39516/13, 48231/13 and 68191/13) - https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22tabview%22:[%22document%22],%22itemid%22:[%22001-173351%22]}

During the Communist Regime, the overcrowded prisons or the conditions of detention had not held the attention of the competent authorities in the sense of trying to find urgent solutions to this problem. On the contrary, the prisons had been used as a means of torture against the political detainees. After 1989, this phenomenon has gradually become of maximal interest and the state, alongside its empowered institutions, was compelled to look for measures in order to remedy the situation.

Undoubtedly, after Romania adopted the European Convention of the Human Rights and after our country joined the European Union, the way in which the competent authorities perceived the conditions of detention, the overcrowding phenomenon and the minimal living standards in prisons has subsequently changed. Thus, the Romanian State was forced to take action and adopt measures so that to address this situation and to comply with the European standards.

Starting from the premise that the effects produced by a problem and the solution proposed for that problem have to stem from the causes which led to that particular problem, we consider it necessary to begin this endeavour with the analysis of the causes and effects of the overcrowding phenomenon.

1. Causes

Contrary to popular opinion, we consider that the crime rate does not represent a major cause for the prisons overcrowding phenomenon. The answer has to be looked for elsewhere, since the crime rate indicator has constantly decreased in the last twenty years, reaching half of its maximal value registered at the end of the 1980s.

The explanation for this decrease lies in the analysis of the socio-economic factors which have significantly influenced the evolution of the crime rate in Romania, and according to the statistics provided by Eurostat[2], in our country the crime rate related to patrimony offences in principal, but also related to offences against life and bodily integrity in particular, is not the highest in the European Union, despite the fact that the overcrowding issue is more serious in our country than in other member states of the European Union.

Therefore, from this perspective, the responsibility must be placed on the inadequate state policies in the justice system with regard to the regime of application and enforcement of deprivation of personal liberty punishments.

Firstly, it should be taken into consideration that the most obvious factor is the insufficient number of available detention centres. The reason is that most of these detention centres were built and used at the applicable standards prior to 1989, and as mentioned above, the need to create decent detention conditions for the detainees was not regarded as a priority at that time.

It should be noted that only 3 detention facilities have been built after 1989 in Romania and, given the existent financial politics, the state was not interested in investing funds in this domain.

In addition to the above mentioned causes of prison overcrowding, we point out that until quite recently the regime of punishment enforcement was very strict and there have hardly been situations in which the legislator allowed for preventive measures to be taken or for a form of executing the punishment involving the deprivation of personal liberty other than detention.

Accordingly, an important step was the adoption of the current Criminal Procedure Code which regulated the institution of house arrest as a preventive measure and led to a decrease in the number of detainees in the detention facilities attached to police stations.

Among the causes that generate the overcrowding phenomenon, we should not overlook the judge's sentencing harshness in delivering the punishments, there having been many cases presented in the media in the which some people were sentenced to deprivation of personal liberty despite the fact that their wrongdoings were not so serious as to require such sanctions and the deprivation of personal liberty.

Paradoxically, the causes can be partially found in the effects that detention conditions have on the individuals deprived of personal liberty and on their evolution subsequent to the moment they are released from prison.

The impossibility to assure a proper education in prison, that would allow the detainees to acquire useful work-related abilities so that to enable them to find a job after detention or to make them acknowledge the negative effects of their deeds on the life of the victims and on the society, deemed the educational role of detention unattainable. Therefore, in many cases, the detainees end up committing wrongdoings after their release and so they return to prison.

Against this background, we also note that beyond the lack of engaging the detainees in different activities, there are other factors that determine this state of affairs, namely the lack of culture, the lack of proper psychological support, all these contributing to the perpetuation of aggressive conduct at liberty. Moreover, it should be highlighted that in the case of the recidivists, successive detention periods, cumulated with the lack of rehabilitation programmes, create an affective depression when confronted with the conditions in the prison, so that the effect of enforcing the punishment has a diluted nature.

[2] https://ec.europa.eu/eurostat/en/web/products-statistics-in-focus/-/KS-SF-13-018;

2. Effects

With regard to the last aspect presented above, one of the negative effects caused by the inability of the state to adopt policies suitable for the detention system regime is on the society, which is at risk of reincorporating persons prone to continually committing criminal offences.

Considering the impact that the overcrowding phenomenon has on the prison conditions, the most important effect is certainly felt by the detainees. The lack of sufficient space and adequate detention conditions led to the violation of fundamental rights, as constantly stated by the European Court of Human Rights in the cases regarding other states, as well as in the legal actions initiated by detainees from Romania.

For that purpose, the Court argued that Article 3 of the Convention "imposes that the State be held responsible for the protection of the physical comfort of the people deprived of personal freedom, in the sense that it should offer, for example, the necessary medical assistance. The Court lays emphasise on the right of all detainees to detention conditions compatible with the human dignity, so that to guarantee that the manner and method of executing the imposed measures does not bring hardship or suffering beyond the unavoidable level of suffering inherent in deprivation of liberty; additionally, except for the health of the detainees, their comfort is to be adequately assured, taking into consideration the practical circumstances of detention "(the cases of Bragadireanu vs. Romania[3], Kudła vs. Poland [MC], no. 30.210/96, § 94, ECHR 2000-XI[4], and Mouisel vs. France, no. 67.263/01, § 40, ECHR 2002-IX[5]).

Likewise, in the case of Micu vs. Romania, the Court held that there had been a violation of Article 3 of the Convention, concluding that "the respective detention conditions of the applicant, especially the overcrowding in his cell, cumulated with the length of his incarceration in these conditions, constitute inhuman and degrading treatment".

It should be noted that during 2007-2012, the European Court of Human Rights has delivered 93 judgements against the Romanian state for violations of Article 3, finding that there had been cases of overcrowding and inadequate detention conditions in prisons and in the detention facilities and custody centres, and delivered the Pilot Judgement in the case of Rezimveș and others vs. Romania, in which the Court held that Romania had to implement urgent measures to remedy the situation.

Hence, in the pilot judgement of 25 April 2017, the Court requested that no later than 6 months the State provide, in cooperation with the Committee of Ministers of the European Council, a calendar for the implementation of suitable general measures to remedy the problem of overcrowding and inadequate detention conditions, in accordance with the principles of the Convention as stipulated in the pilot judgement. The Court has also ruled in favour of postponing similar cases that were not yet communicated to the Government of Romania until the implementation of necessary measures at the national level[6].

In the Pilot judgement, the Court recommends the Romanian State to take general measures for the remedy of the structural problem. These measures are of two types:

1. Measures for prison overcrowding decrease and improvement of detention conditions

d) With view to pre-trial detention, the Court stated that the detention centres attached to the police stations were considered by CPT (European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment) and the Committee of Ministers as "structurally inadequate" for detentions exceeding the duration of a few days. Moreover, the Court reasserts that these detention centres are intended for very short-term detentions. Considering all the above, the internal affairs must make sure that the persons deprived of personal liberty be transferred to prison at the end of the temporary custody. Likewise, the Court encouraged the Romanian State to explore the possibility of facilitating the implementation in a greater extent of alternative measures to temporary custody.

e) With view to post-trial detention, the Court acknowledged the reform initiated by the Government focused, among other things, on reducing the punishment terms for certain crimes, on criminal penalties as alternative to detention and on postponing the enforcement of the sentence, as well as on the positive effects of the probation system. Although the immediate results of this reform have not significantly influenced the prison overcrowding rate, which still is at rather high levels, such measures, dubbed by diverse alternative punishments to detention, could have a positive impact on decreasing the number of prison population. Other ways to be explored, such as simplifying the conditions on renouncing at punishment enforcement and delaying punishment enforcement, and especially extending the possibilities to access probation and increasing the efficiency of the probation service, could constitute sources of inspiration for the State in their endeavour to remedy the problem of the inflated number of detainees and the inadequate material conditions in detention.

[3] https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22tabview%22:[%22document%22],%22itemid%22:[%22001-83879%22]};
[4] https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22tabview%22:[%22document%22],%22itemid%22:[%22001-58920%22]}
[5] https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22itemid%22:[%22001-60732%22]}
[6] https://www.juridice.ro/507966/hotararea-pilot-cauza-rezmives-si-altii-impotriva-romaniei-materia-conditiilor-de-detentie.html

Referring to the necessity to provide additional detention places, the Court made reference to Recommendation No. R (99)22 of the Committee of Ministers, according to which this measure of extending the prison capacity is not likely to offer a sustainable solution for the remedy of the problem. Moreover, considering the precarious living conditions and hygiene of the Romanian detention centres, the State should continue to invest in refurbishing the existent detention facilities.

Adopting the measures recommended by the European Court of Human Rights in the pilot judgement will certainly determine the allocation of supplementary budgetary funds in this domain, additional to the current expenses of the detention system, expenses which are necessary for the provision of food and shelter to the detainees, as well as expenses for prison staff salaries and employment.

Therefore, even the State experiences the negative effect of prison overcrowding and reflects this effect mostly at the financial level, as a result of the additional costs that the detention system generates for the state budget and, finally, for the contributors who pay fees and taxes to the state budget.

3. Solutions

Considering the effects discussed in the previous section of this article, the State has looked for urgent solutions to solve the problem of prison overcrowding, yet some of the measures taken did not have a positive impact.

If measures such as allowing the prisoners to benefit from early release for good conduct during detention or regulating the house arrest as a preventive measure proved to be useful, leading to a decrease of the overcrowding phenomenon up to a certain extent, in our opinion solutions such as the appeal for compensatory measures has not yet been proved beneficial.

According to Law no.169/2017, known to the public as the law of the compensatory appeal, for the amending and completion of Law no. 254/2013 regarding the enforcement of punishments and freedom-privative measures laid out by judiciary bodies during the criminal cause, it is stated that when calculating the executed punishment, regardless of the regime of executing the punishment, it should be taken into consideration, as a compensatory measure, the execution of punishment in improper conditions, a case in which, for every 30 days of detention in improper conditions, even if these are not consecutive days, 6 more days are added and considered executed. These dispositions are also considered when calculating the executed punishment in preventive detention facilities and centres of improper conditions.

In determining the notion of improper conditions, the aspects generated by the prison overcrowding phenomenon were also taken into consideration, namely the confined space accommodation of the detainees of less or equal to 4 sqm per detainee, which is calculated excluding the area for sanitary and food storage facilities and diving the total surface of the detention rooms to the number of accommodated persons in the respective rooms, regardless of the facilities provided.

The adopted legislative act mentioned above has not reached its stated purpose and this is proved by the fact that, from the 14,000 inmates who benefited from early release based on the enforcement of this law, more than 900 of them returned behind bars for committing serious violent offences - murders, rapes and robberies.

The cases presented in mass-media, such as the case of the rapist released on the basis of this law who raped and robbed a young woman returning from a club during night time, shortly after his release, or the case of the man charged with robbery and attempted rape, released on the basis of the same law, who violently attacked a young woman at the entrance of a block of flats with the purpose of robbing her, are all relevant examples in support of this view.

Consequently, the enforcement of this normative act was exclusively based on considering the detention conditions without any regard to the difference between the non-violent inmates and the dangerous ones, namely without taking into consideration the offences of the inmates executing their freedom-privative punishments and the consequences brought along to the society by the early release of these individuals, before executing the entire punishment or the minimum period required for early release.

In this article, we show that from our point of view, not time is the factor that generates the negative effects in the post-release period presented above, but the fact that the early-released detainees have not finished their educational programmes and have not acquired aptitudes, job-related skills and capacities that would help them earn a living in the post-release period. This implies that the purpose of re-educating the detainees has not been reached.

As a matter of fact, in the Pilot judgement of 25 April 2017, the European Court of the Human Rights did not impose on the Romanian state the initiation of legislative measures that would have the immediate result of early-releasing a great number of detainees from prisons, by abandoning the educational programmes and activities. The Court recommended instead a set of correlated measures that would generate an extension of the detainee's space in detention on the one hand, and prevent the overcrowding problem in the future, on the other hand.

Equally so, it can be observed that the conventional court recommended that the Romanian state should adopt viable solutions, with long-term effects, not with short and very short-term palliative effects.

The non-governmental associations regarding the protection of the human rights have also criticized the measures taken by the legislator in Law no.169/2017, expressing their concern for the negative social impact of these measures.

Thus, APADOR CH, an important non-governmental organisation involved in the protection of the human rights took public stand and acted against the adoption of the law granting compensatory appeal by stating that:

„Both full-term release, much too hasty as a result of the enforcement of the compensatory appeal law, and the conditional release of convicts who had not proven themselves rehabilitated or ready to be reinserted, an excess stimulated by the lack of sufficient detention space, do nothing but encourage the criminal phenomenon. The availability of this release option induces the idea that offenders might easily escape after committing a crime, no matter how serious the crime may be. Thus, they end up committing new crimes, in fact more and more serious crimes, having more new victims as a result of these crimes, and finally, returning to prison after their much sooner release, without the chance to be fully rehabilitated and socially reinserted. Accordingly, it is quite likely that prisons will be overcrowded as a direct result of hasty early release"[7].

In agreement with the opinion stated above, we envisage that the measures adopted for the reduction of the overcrowding prison phenomenon should not ignore the interest and security of the citizens, being necessary to maintain a balance between the right of the inmates on the one hand, by assuring a proper detention regime, and on the other hand the right of the citizens, whose rights to safety, physical integrity and property are equally important and need to be protected.

Starting from the benefits brought along by the regulations regarding house arrest as a preventive measure for the reduction of overcrowded detention facilities, we propose de lege ferenda to adopt similar measures regarding the execution of freedom-privative punishments, by means of regulating the possibility to execute the punishment as house arrest, at present being available technical devices to electronically monitor the activity of the convicted offenders within the perimeter of their homes. Such a measure would be beneficial as it allows the convicted individuals to remain within their own community, having the possibility to find jobs and keep in touch with their families, reinserting and rehabilitating themselves at a much rapid pace.

Another solution that could favourably solve this problem is to build new detention centres or to renovate and refurbish the existent ones, providing larger spaces which satisfy the demand and exigencies imposed by the compliance with the fundamental rights of the detainees.

Furthermore, there is also the need to organise and develop in the detention centres and facilities modern programmes for the rehabilitation and reinsertion in society of detainees. This naturally implies the creation of mechanisms for inter-institutional cooperation so that to encourage the social reinsertion of former detainees after their release, to provide employment possibilities and social protection with the aim of preventing recidivism.

Conclusions

The prison overcrowding phenomenon has continued to be part of the Romanian detention system, despite the recent measures adopted by the authorities, which have had minimal effect on the reduction of this phenomenon. However, the only visible effects were the numerous negative effects on the social level.

Prison overcrowding is distinctively complex and with a powerful social impact, so a new approach to this issue should be implemented, not a unilateral approach but one that would involve a series of longer term measures at different levels (legislative, administrative, psychological, social).

As pointed out in this study, there is a complex set of causes and effects, characterised by diverse intensity and targeting multiple levels, which are of interest for both the society, and the detainee - future free individual. It is at this complex set that the European Court for Human Rights has drawn attention in its jurisprudence in the domain, holding each state responsible for the necessity to deal with such issues, since a minimization of these aspects could lead to a waste of human, financial-economic resources and not only, whose effects might be contrary to the intended purpose.

References

- Case of Rezmives and others v. Romania (Applications nos. 61467/12, 39516/13, 48231/13 and 68191/13) -https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22tabview%22:[%22document%22],%22itemid%22:[%22001-173351%22]};
- https://ec.europa.eu/eurostat/en/web/products-statistics-in-focus/-/KS-SF-13-018; https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22tabview%22:[%22document%22],%22itemid%22:[%22001-83879%22]}; https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22tabview%22:[%22document%22],%22itemid%22:[%22001-58920%22]} ;
- https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22itemid%22:[%22001-60732%22]};
- https://www.juridice.ro/507966/hotararea-pilot-cauza-rezmives-si-altii-impotriva-romaniei-materia-conditiilor-de-detentie.html;
- https://www.g4media.ro/apador-ch-cere-abrograrea-legii-recursului-compensatoriu-efectul-specific-vizibil-si-cu-adevarat-negativ-este-dublarea-numarului-celor-eliberati-la-termen.html

[7] https://www.g4media.ro/apador-ch-cere-abrograrea-legii-recursului-compensatoriu-efectul-specific-vizibil-si-cu-adevarat-negativ-este-dublarea-numarului-celor-eliberati-la-termen.html.

THE BENEFITS OF A SPECIAL CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS IN ABSENTIA

Ioan-Paul CHIȘ

Abstract:

A criticism of the national legislator's decision not to introduce a shortened hearing as a special criminal procedure in absentia, which would exclude the Preliminary Chamber and would leave the civil action unsolved. In our opinion, such a procedure would definitely contribute to the efficiency of the judiciary system by significantly reducing the duration of trials, seeing that the evidence of the case would not be administrated in the absence of the accused and, as a consequence, the witnesses and the victim would not be repeatedly subjected to the stress of the hearings. Moreover, not solving the civil action would be a measure of protecting the interests of the civil party, seeing how a simple request of the defendant would suffice to invalidate the court's decision given in absentia, and with it, the ruling on the civil claims of the case.

Keywords: special criminal procedure, trial in absence, in absentia, abbreviated procedure

1. Context.

The perpetration of an offense gives rise to the exercise of criminal proceedings, and in the case of offenses resulting in damages, the criminal proceedings can be joined by the civil action. The relation between the public and the civil (private) action has seen several systems, the Romanian legislator preferring as early as 1864, the hybrid system, namely the system allowing the two actions to be exercised jointly within a single criminal trial[1].

Therefore, within our legal system, the party injured by the perpetration of a deed stipulated by the criminal law is entitled to choose between seizing the civil court and joining the civil action to the criminal proceedings exercised concerning that unlawful deed.

I find that the reason for joining the two actions is twofold. Thus, first of all, regard must be taken to the more favourable terms under which the civil action is settled, in this case the evidence is the same for the two actions and it can even be ordered by the court ex oficio or at the prosecutor's application, the proceedings unfold with greater celerity etc. At the same time, it must not be neglected the fact that the direct opponent of the civil party, the defendant, might be interested in paying the civil claims in order to benefit from this conduct in the criminal aspects of the trial by nearing some mitigating circumstances stipulated by the criminal law, a resort unavailable in the hypothesis of settling the civil action by a civil court.

From another point of view, I believe that the state might have a real interest for the civil party to bring the civil action in front of the criminal court, given that in this context he/she might submit evidence unknown to the judicial bodies which might serve for the correct settlement of the criminal aspects, especially as far as the individualisation of the penalty is concerned.

1.1. Introducing the civil action in the criminal proceedings and the options of the injured party.

According to the criminal procedural law, the civil action seeks to establish the civil liability in tort of the persons responsible for the damage produced by the perpetration of the deed subject to the criminal action. To this end, the injured party must express his/her wish to bring the civil action in the criminal proceedings, a step which implies becoming a civil party; this indication of will can be made at any time throughout the criminal trial but no later than the commencement of the judicial inquiry.

Note that the injured party is entitled to choose between becoming a civil party in the criminal trial, thus joining the individual civil action to the criminal action exercised by the prosecutor, or seizing directly the civil court, one choice excluding as a matter of principle, the other (electa una via non datur recursus ad alteram). Thus, in case the injured party has become a civil party within the criminal trial, he/she can seize the civil court only if the criminal court has not settled the civil action [article 27 paragraph (2) of the Criminal Procedure Code], if the criminal trial has been suspended [article 27 paragraph (3) of the Criminal Procedure Code] or if the damage has not been fully repaired [article 27 paragraph (5) of the Criminal Procedure Code] or if the damage was generated or discovered after becoming a civil party [article 27 paragraph (6) of the Criminal Procedure Code].

It follows that the injured party who chose to bring the civil action in front of the criminal court will not be able to leave this court regardless of the fact that he/she finds useless the settlement of the private action by the criminal court.

* Assistant Professor, PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: chis.ioan@drept.unibuc.ro)

[1] I.P. Chiș, Soluționarea laturii civile în procesul penal în caz de dezincriminare. Situații tranzitorii, in the Magazine „Caiete de drept penal" no. 4/2014.

1.2. The trial in absentia of the defendant.

Further, it must be reminded that the Romanian criminal proceedings allow the trial in absentia of the defendant, regardless of what the penalty he/she is facing on the criminal side of the trial, i.e. fine, imprisonment or life detention, as well as regardless of the amount of the civil damages to which he/she might be held liable on the civil side of the trial. At the same time, it does not matter whether the criminal court could order certain security measures against the defendant, e.g. special confiscation, extended confiscation etc., the criminal trial can lawfully take place without them.

Obviously, for the trial in absentia of the defendant to be possible, the summoning procedure must be fulfilled according to the law, irrespective of whether the communication to the defendant concerning the criminal trial has been successfully accomplished or not.

Indeed, the law makes no distinction in this regard, between the three possible situations, the continuation of the criminal judicial proceedings being possible when the accused has actually taken note of the criminal trial but waived his/her right to appear before the judicial bodies either i) explicitly, by formulating an application to be tried in absentia or ii) implicitly, by the unjustified absence after being summoned by the judicial bodies; as well as when iii) the accused has not been formally informed about the criminal trial against him/her, the summons procedure being accomplished by a mere legal fiction such as posting the notice/summons.

In the first case, if there is evidence pointing that the accused has actually taken note of the criminal trial against him/her, we are in the presence of a waiver to the right to appear in front of the judicial bodies, the accused thus disposing of his/her right to participate to trial.

If to the contrary, there is no evidence that the accused has actually been informed about the criminal proceedings against him/her, the trial in absentia shall continue and in the case of a conviction solution the law stipulates the possibility of reopening the criminal trial by merely formulating an application to this end within a month from the communication of the final criminal ruling.

Note that in the case where the accused tried in absentia has knowledge about the criminal proceedings and refuses to respond to the summons of the judicial bodies, as well as in the case where the accused has no knowledge about these proceedings, the criminal trial shall take place according to the general trial procedure, following the preliminary chamber procedure and assessing during the trial all the evidence of the case as if the accused had been present for trial.

The legal assistance is guaranteed throughout the criminal trial and in the case where the accused is underage, admitted to a detention centre or an educational centre, detained or arrested even in a different case, where the accused is subject to a safety measure or placed in a medical institution, even in a different case or where the offense brought to the accused charge is punished by life detention or an imprisonment penalty exceeding 5 years, the legal assistance shall be provided ex oficio (article 90 of the Criminal Procedure Code).

1.3. The preliminary chamber procedure.

The preliminary chamber procedure is the phase of the criminal trial[2] ensuring the judicial context for verifying the lawfulness of the criminal investigation acts. Within this procedure, after checking the court's competence, the preliminary chamber judge examines the lawfulness of receiving the indictment, the lawfulness of evidence-gathering and of the performance of the criminal investigation acts.

The preliminary chamber procedure is essential to the economy of a criminal case given that this is the only procedural moment where the accused can criticise the lawfulness of the criminal investigation acts, the result of this procedure influencing the continuation of the criminal trial or the return of the case to the prosecutor's office.

2. Reopening of the criminal trial in the case of trial in absentia.

Reopening the criminal proceedings in the case of a trial in the absence of the convicted person[3] is a procedural remedy, at the convicted person's disposal, which can be used after the criminal ruling pronounced in absentia has become final, but no later than a month from its communication. Thus being, in our legal system, reopening the criminal proceedings is considered an extraordinary legal remedy, limited to points of law, within the jurisdiction of the court that issued the challenged ruling, of withdrawal, designed to ensure the compatibility of the Romanian legislation with the standards imposed by the conventional block, as well as by the right to a fair trial in the broadest meaning of the term.

If the court finds grounded the application for reopening the criminal proceedings, it will admit it in principle, the final ruling pronounced in absentia being thus reversed by the law itself, both concerning the solution pronounced on the criminal side of the case and the solution pronounced on the civil side of the case, the trial being resumed from the stage of the trial in first instance, with all its consequences: reassessing the evidence of the case, the taking of a new first instance ruling, the pronunciation of a ruling in appeal and the enforcement of the new final ruling.

[2] For solid arguments for the qualification of the preliminary chamber procedure as a pre-trial stage, see A. Zarafiu, Procedură penală. Parte generală. Partea specială, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 376-378. In arguing this view, the author shows that the stages of the criminal trial must be represented as those sections of the criminal trial where the competent judicial bodies exercise one of the main judicial functions (investigation or trial) and where one of the solutions of cease of the criminal action can be ordered or pronounced.

[3] Further, to ensure the flexibility of the commentary, whenever I will refer to this legal remedy, I will use the wording Reopening of the criminal trial.

3. The criticisms of the present system.

The criticisms can be divided in two: criticisms concerning the conceptual aspect of the notion of reopening the criminal proceedings and criticisms concerning the incompatibility of the national system with the conventional block, as well as with the right to a fair trial.

As a matter of principle, any legal remedy takes the form of procedural remedies aimed at removing the mistakes that the courts might have made in impairing justice. Therefore, these procedural remedies are based on the idea of a mistake that can be made by the lower judicial body, an error which the judicial review court, placed on a higher level and being composed of more experimented judges, is presumed to eliminate.

Even if the reopening of the criminal trial is placed by the Romanian legislator among the extraordinary legal remedies, the idea of a mistakes on which such a remedy should be based, is not in all cases true.

Indeed, the premise of this procedural remedy does not necessarily reside in the court's failure to summon the accused to the trial or in a summoning procedure which was not dully accomplished.

Truly, the hypothesis of procedural error must not be de plano excluded, in the end, justice is achieved by an eminently human activity which is by nature, subject to error (errare humanum est). Therefore, the accused who has never been summoned nor informed officially about the criminal trial or the accused concerning whom the summoning procedure has not been duly fulfilled is entitled to apply for the reopening of the criminal trial, with the consequence of resuming the trial stage starting from the first instance trial.

Nevertheless, in most cases of reopening the criminal trial, the premise shall not reside in an error related to the summoning of the accused, but in the lawful conduct of the criminal procedures in the absence of the accused who has not been genuinely informed about it.

The summoning procedure is lawful because in these hypothesis, the judicial bodies usually use the legal fictions stipulated by the law, such as considering legally summoned the person concerning who a notification about the summoning has been posted at the seat of the judicial body or who, having changed the procedural address during the criminal investigation, has been summoned at the address previously chosen although it was no longer up to date.

Transposed into practice these situations are met in the case where the accused is not found at the addresses where the state bodies have information that he/she might be (the legal domicile or the residences irregularly used etc.), the summoning procedure and the communication of the procedural acts being accomplished by posting a notice at the seat of the judicial body.

As a first conclusion, it must be remembered that the reopening of the criminal trial is wrongly regulated as a legal remedy while it has the appearance of a procedural remedy characteristic for a special trial procedure as I shall demonstrate.

From the perspective of the right to a fair trial, it must be highlighted that the premise for reopening the criminal trial is the justified absence of the accused from the criminal trial. This justification resides on the fact that the accused had no knowledge about his/her criminal trial. Thus being, starting from this premise, it can be said that as far as the accused is regarded, the proceedings that follow the reopening of the trial is the first he/she has knowledge of, the first in which he/she can defend himself/herself using the whole range of procedural rights and guarantees.

For all this, reminding as well the fact that resuming the procedure shall only take place with the first instance trial, the preliminary chamber procedure in absentia remaining final, the criticism focuses on the obvious reduction of the possibilities of the accused to defend himself/herself, especially concerning the possibilities to criticise the lawfulness of the criminal investigation acts, from the clarity of the wording of the accusation to the rightness of the administration of certain evidence.

4. Positive aspects that the regulation of a special procedure of trial in absentia would entail.

Starting from the premise that our legal system accepts the trial in the absence of the accused, whatever the reason of this absence might be, a deliberate absence as a result of the explicit or implicit waiver to the right to participate to one's own trial, or an absence which is not based on an informed choice, one wonders whether a special procedure for the trial of the accused absent should not be regulated.

Note that our legal system acknowledges several special trial procedures based either on the procedural conduct of admission of guilt adopted by the accused (the plea of guilt), or on the special situation of the accused (the defendant is underage or is a legal entity).

Therefore, once accepted these special procedures by the legislator, the question arises whether the absence from the trial of the accused implies a necessity to embody a set of rules derogating from the general procedure. In other words, it must be established whether in the case of the trial in absentia the general trial procedure is sufficient from the perspective of the procedural guarantees and, otherwise, whether a special procedure is fully justified[4] by number, content, systematization and operation.

4.1. The trial in absentia according to the general procedure.

I have previously pointed out why in the case of the trial in absentia, the general procedure does not meet the minimum guarantees of the right to a fair trial.

It is thus noted that the trial in absentia gives the accused the right to apply for the reopening of the criminal trial but the procedure shall be resumed not from the preliminary chamber, but from the trial stage. Thus being, starting from the premise of reopening the criminal trial, namely the trial in the justified absence of the accused, it is clear that he/she did not have the genuine possibility to contest the evidence and the criminal investigation acts, this essential part of the trial being finally settled in his/her absence. Under these circumstances, reopening the criminal trial should not be limited to the reopening only of the trial stage, the reopening of the preliminary chamber procedures being necessary as well.

At the same time, as regards the civil side of the trial, it is quite clear the violation of the civil party right to the settlement of the case within a reasonable period. I have a slight reservation making this statement given that the time necessary for the settlement of the civil action can be either shorter or longer according to the difficulty and the complexity of the evidence brought, as well as according to the choice of the accused during retrial: the general procedure implying the reassessment of all the evidence and necessitating more trial dates in the case, or the abbreviated procedure implying the settlement of the case based on the evidence assessed during the criminal investigation, the activity usually taking place in a single trial date. In the case where the accused wishes the reassessment of the evidence, the time elapsed between bringing the civil action within the criminal trial and the final settlement of the action, to which the time elapsed between the admission of the application for reopening the trial and the final settlement of the action is added, can easily exceed the party's right to a fair trial as regards the reasonable period.

On the same note, one can retain the precariousness of the final ruling given by the criminal court for the settlement of the civil action. Indeed, the right of access to court necessarily calls for the right to a final ruling and, furthermore, the right to the actual enforcement of that ruling. Or, if the civil aspects of a criminal trial are settled through a final ruling subject to reversal ipso jure by the mere application of the accused, there is a problem concerning the fairness of the procedures towards the civil party, especially in the context that he/she can only leave the criminal trial in order to claim damages in a civil court under extremely restrictive conditions. Therefore, the very settlement of the civil action under these circumstances appears as an activity not only lacking efficiency (the ruling being subject to reversal), but also likely to unjustifiably delay the obtainment of a final ruling issued by the civil court.

On another note, concerning the first procedural cycle, it can be seen that the criminal court assesses the evidence with a view to ensuring an adversary procedure for the defendant, even if he/she is absent from the proceedings. Therefore, it seems that within the first procedural cycle unfolded in the absence of the accused, the adversarial principle is merely simulated, the main character, the accused, being absent to this procedure.

Also as regards the accused, I find that a procedure which necessitated high efforts on the part of the judicial bodies is an extremely costly one, the legal costs being then borne by the accused. From this angle too, the lack of any culpable absence from the accused and holding him/her liable for the payment of the legal costs generated precisely by this absence appears as a contradiction of terms.

In conclusion, it must be remembered that the general trial procedure closes in a final manner the preliminary chamber procedure so that, during the retrial, the accused has no genuine possibility to contest the criminal investigation acts. At the same time, the absolute precariousness of the ruling pronounced on the civil side of the trial must be noticed as well as the fact that, under certain circumstances, the settlement of the civil action might exceed a reasonable period by resuming the procedures.

The foregoing are all reasons that justify the regulation of a special trial procedure eliminating all the deficiencies identified, through derogating provisions.

4.2. The special criminal proceedings in absentia.

The special criminal proceedings in absentia must be a rapid, abbreviated one allowing the examination of the case within an extremely short time, without going through the preliminary chamber procedure and without settling the civil action.

I find thus that procedural cycle in absentia must start by observing the absence of the accused from the criminal trial, the special trial procedure being accordingly open. Under these circumstances, the criminal proceedings shall be taken directly to the trial stage, the court adopting a solution strictly based on the evidence collected during the criminal investigation. Of course, the procedure in absentia shall imply the representation of the absent defendant by a lawyer, either chosen or designated ex oficio (a case of mandatory legal assistance).

Further, irrespective of the solution pronounced by the court on the criminal side of the trial, the possible civil action shall be left unsettled, the right to choose of the injured party being thus reactivated. Therefore, according to the special procedure, the civil action shall not be settled, the right of the injured party to seize the civil court to receive damages being immediately reinstated.

[4] N. Volonciu, Drept procesual penal, Editura Didactică și Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1972, p. 502-503.

After the criminal ruling of conviction pronounced following this procedure, the possibility to apply for the reopening of the criminal trial shall be open, the trial resuming from the preliminary chamber procedure with all that this entails, the procedure unfolding as if the accused had never been absent.

Conclusions.

The judicial activity in the preliminary chamber and of trial imposed by the current regulation in the case of the trials with absent accused is not only time consuming and unfair, but also useless. This is why I consider that a special procedure having the foregoing as its main landmarks must take its place into the substantive law.

Such a procedure would be capable of settling the conflict of law within a short period, without too much effort from the judicial bodies or high expenses and it will allow the injured party to switch a moment earlier to the other option, the bar to leave the criminal court no longer existing within this procedure.

References

- Chiș, Ioan-Paul, Soluționarea laturii civile în procesul penal în caz de dezincriminare. Situații tranzitorii, in the Magazine „Caiete de drept penal" no. 4/2014.
- Volonciu, Nicolae, Dreptprocesual penal, Editura Didactică și Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1972, p. 502-503.
- Zarafiu, Andrei, Drept procesual penal. Partea generală. Partea specială, ed. A 2-a, Editura CH Beck, București, 2015.

THE EUROPEAN ARREST WARRANT. THE ENFORCEMENT OF THE EUROPEAN ARREST WARRANT IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

Cosmin Iulian CRETU[*]

Abstract

The European arrest warrant has replaced the extradition procedure between the Member States of the European Union. Thus, by the introduction of the European arrest warrant, the administrative-judicial procedure was replaced by a purely judicial procedure. This article analyzes the implementation of the Framework Decision no. 2002/584/JHA in the United Kingdom through the Extradition Act 2003 and, more precisely, the enforcement of the European arrest warrant in the United Kingdom, as provided by Part 1 of the Extradition Act 2003. This article presents the steps that need to be followed in the process of the requested person's surrender from the United Kingdom and it analyzes the evolution of the number of European arrest warrants received by the United Kingdom over the years.

Keywords: European arrest warrant, mutual recognition, implementation and enforcement in the United Kingdom, bars to extradition, criminal procedure.

1. Introduction

It is undisputable that the extradition procedure represents the most important instrument of international judicial cooperation in criminal matters.

One of the fundamental problems that caused countless discussions at political and legal level between the countries of the world was of course the extradition of their own citizens[1].

This problem was resolved at the level of the European Union by the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European Arrest Warrant and the Surrender Procedures between Member States.

The most important modification brought by the introduction of the European arrest warrant has been the transition from a judicial-administrative cooperation to a purely judicial cooperation[2].

However, this purely judicial cooperation does not entail that the requested state has no option but to extradite its own citizens once a European arrest warrant is issued. It rather leads to a more expedited procedure based on mutual recognition between the member states of the European Union.

The ambition of this article is to review the enforcement of the European arrest warrant in the United Kingdom as provided by the Extradition Act 2003, considering all the amendments brought by the several pieces of legislation enacted since its adoption, 16 years ago.

Further, we shall analyze the evolution of the number of European arrest warrants received by the United Kingdom over the years, as well as the number of surrenders ordered by the competent courts following the issuance of these European arrest warrants.

2. The European arrest warrant

The Amsterdam Treaty of 1997 represented a starting point for the idea of freedom, security and justice. Later, this idea has been developed in the conclusions of the Tampere European Council, where the Council stated that the principle of mutual recognition of judicial decisions "should become the cornerstone of judicial cooperation in both civil and criminal matters within the Union".

Even though the conclusions of the Tampere European Council were seen as an important step towards the adoption of the European arrest warrant ("EAW") and it was clear that the member states of the European Union (the "Member States") were inclining towards having simplified extradition procedures, it is undisputable that the EAW was speeded up by the 11th of September 2001 terrorist attacks from the United States of America.

Not only did the terrorist attacks strengthen the importance of certain measures in respect to the EU's internal security, but they also put pressure on the European Union's justice, leading to substantial legal actions taken in a short period[3].

Thus, on 13th of June 2002, the Council of the European Union adopted Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA on the European Arrest Warrant and the

[*] PhD Student, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (avccretu@gmail.com)

[1] Alexandru Boroi, Ion Rusu, Minodora-Ioana Rusu, Treaty of international judicial cooperation in criminal matters, C.H. Beck Publisher, 2016, p 343;

[2] Rodica Panainte, Considerations on the European Arrest Warrant, Journal of Public Administration, Finance and Law, January 2, 2015, p 163;

[3] Laura Maria Stanila, the European arrest warrant. The problem of implementing framework decision 2002/584/JHA in the EU Member States, The Journal of Judicial Sciences, 2007, p 111; surrender procedures between Member States (the "Framework Decision").

The new system provided by the EAW has replaced since 1 January 2004 the traditional procedures of extradition between Member States, procedures that were no longer adapted to the requirements of a common space of freedom, security and justice, but exposed to crimes, in which national borders are becoming less important in order not to be impediments in the fight against crime[4].

The EAW is defined as being a judicial decision issued by a Member State with a view to the arrest and surrender by another Member State of a requested person, for the purposes of conducting a criminal prosecution or executing a custodial sentence or detention order[5].

In order to better understand the modifications brought by the introduction of the EAW, we shall relate to a definition given to the extradition procedure in the Romanian doctrine.

Thus, the extradition is the procedure whereby a sovereign state (the requested state) accepts to surrender, at the request of another state (the requesting state), a person located on its territory and who is being prosecuted or sent to trial for a crime or is being sought in order to execute a punishment in the requesting state[6].

Therefore, it can be observed that the Framework Decision on the one hand uses the term "surrender" instead of "extradition", and on the other hand uses the term "Member State" when referring to both "the requesting state" and "the requested state", as they appeared in the classic extradition procedure.

It is important to mention that, as a general rule, the classic extradition procedure did not allow the extradition of a state's own citizens, which was only accepted as an exception and under restrictive conditions.

The EAW brought a significant change in what regards the extradition of a state's own citizens.

Art. 20 par. (1) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union provides that "every person holding the nationality of a Member State shall be a citizen of the Union" and "citizenship of the Union shall be additional to and not replace national citizenship".

Thus, starting from the idea of European citizenship, the principle of non-extradition of a state's own citizens was basically waived and it merely became a ground for refusal.

The Member States were given a deadline to take the necessary measures to comply with the provisions of the Framework Decision. However, only 13 Member States managed to meet the deadline for implementation.

Although in some cases the respective national implementing law fails to fully transpose the Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA on the European arrest warrant, it can be concluded that Member States have largely implemented it properly[7].

3. Implementation of the Framework Decision in the United Kingdom

The Framework Decision has been implemented in the United Kingdom through the Extradition Act 2003 (the "Extradition Act").

The Extradition Act is divided into five parts:

Part 1 – Extradition to category 1 territories

This part deals with extradition to all European Union Member States and it basically corresponds with the requirements of the Framework Decision.

The main features introduced by the EAW in the first part of the Extradition Act are:

- mutual recognition – a foreign warrant is accepted without getting into the facts of the case;
- the dual criminality rule is no longer required for 32 categories of offences – under the condition that the punishment for the offence is at least three years' imprisonment;
- the procedure is now entirely judicial – the competent authority in the United Kingdom only has to certify that the EAW is properly drafted by the competent authority from the issuing state;
- no exception on the grounds of citizenship.

The extradition procedure under Part 1 of the Extradition Act is detailed in the next section.

Part 2 – Extradition to category 2 territories

This part deals with the extradition to all other countries with whom the United Kingdom has international extradition arrangements, other than the countries included in part 1.

The extradition of a requested person to these territories entails, besides the information required for the category 1 cases, that the court must be satisfied that the request contains admissible evidence of the offence sufficient to establish a prima facie case against the person.

Part 3 – Extradition to the United Kingdom

This part deals with requests issued by the competent authorities in the United Kingdom to both European Union Member States as well as all other countries.

Part 4 contains provisions in relation to police powers, while Part 5 contains a number of miscellaneous and general provisions[8].

[4] Rodica Panainte, Considerations on the European Arrest Warrant, Journal of Public Administration, Finance and Law, January 2, 2015, p 159;

[5] Article 1(1) of the Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA on the European arrest warrant;

[6] Florin Razvan Radu, International judicial cooperation in criminal matters, C.H. Beck Publisher, Bucharest, 2008, p 23;

[7] Libor Klimek, Mutual Recognition of Judicial Decisions in European Criminal Law, Springer Publisher, 2017, p 673;

[8] Details regarding these parts of the Extradition Act 2003 can be found in the Explanatory Notes (https://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/2003/41/notes/contents) published by the Government of the United Kingdom;

Since its adoption, the Extradition Act has been amended four times, through (i) the Police and Justice Act 2006, (ii) the Policing and Crime Act 2009, (iii) the Crime and Courts Act 2013 and (iv) the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014.

If we were to compare the initial version of the Extradition Act with the version amended through the aforementioned pieces of legislation, we would ascertain that the latter barely resembles the one that was enacted 16 years ago.

As we stated in the introduction part of this article, the most important change brought by the EAW is that the extradition procedure within Europe is entirely judicial, as opposed to a judicial-administrative procedure.

In the United Kingdom, prior to the Extradition Act, after an extradition request was granted by the court, there was still a step that had to be met, namely the approval of the Home Secretary.

So the wanted person who claimed that it was "all a fix" could ask the Home Secretary to refuse permission, and if he would not listen, he could attack the Home Secretary's refusal in the courts by a series of maneuvers which, if played with skill, could delay his removal for many years (and, incidentally, cost the taxpayer a vast amount of money)[9].

4. The Enforcement of the EAW in the United Kingdom under the Extradition Act – Extradition to category 1 territories

The steps that need to be followed in the process for extradition from the United Kingdom to the category 1 territories are:

1. a EAW is submitted;
2. the certificate is issued;
3. the arrest of the requested person;
4. the initial hearing;
5. the extradition hearing.

The issuance of a European arrest warrant

Pursuant to the provisions of art. 2 par. (1) from the Framework Decision, "a European arrest warrant may be issued for acts punishable by the law of the issuing Member State by a custodial sentence or a detention order for a maximum period of at least 12 months or, where a sentence has been passed or a detention order has been made, for sentences of at least four months".

The issuance of the certificate

In the United Kingdom, the National Crime Agency is the designated authority for European arrest warrants, which can only issue a certificate if the requirements provided under section 2 of the Extradition Act are met.

More precisely, the National Crime Agency may issue a certificate under this section if it believes that the authority which issued the warrant has the function of issuing arrest warrants in the category 1 territories.

The arrest of the requested person

Once the request has been certified, the warrant for the requested person's arrest is issued. Based on this warrant, the requested person is arrested and he/she must be brought before a District Judge at the Magistrates' Court for the initial hearing as soon as practicable.

In urgent cases, a requested person can be arrested before the receipt of a EAW. In this case, the EAW must be received in time for a court hearing which must be held within 48 hours of the arrest[10].

The initial hearing

The 'appropriate judge' in the UK, according to section 67 (1) EA, is a District Judge (Magistrates' Courts) designated for that purpose by the Lord Chancellor in England and Wales[11]. In England, the extradition cases are heard at the Westminster Magistrates' Court.

The purpose of this hearing is to establish the identity of the arrested person and, more precisely, that the person brought before the District Judge is the person in respect of whom the warrant was issued.

Pursuant to section 7(3), the District Judge is required to take the decision on the requested person's identity on the balance of probabilities.

Thus, if the District Judge decides the person brought before him is not the person in respect of whom the warrant was issued, then he must order the person's discharge.

Otherwise, if the District Judge decides the person brought before him is the person in respect of whom the warrant was issued, then he must:

- inform the person about the procedures for consenting to be surrendered to the issuing state;
- fix a date for the extradition hearing if the requested person does not consent to extradition;
- remand the person in custody or on bail.

The extradition hearing should normally begin within 21 days of arrest[12]. However, if proceedings in respect of the extradition are adjourned under section 8A or 8B, the permitted period is extended by the number of days for which the proceedings are so adjourned[13].

Thus, if, before the beginning of the extradition hearing, the District Judge is informed that the person is charged with an offence in the United Kingdom, any further proceedings in respect of the extradition must be adjourned until the prosecution performed in the

[9] Spencer J.R., Fair trials and the European arrest warrant, The Cambridge Law Journal, July 1, 2010, p 227;
[10] Section 6(2) of the Extradition Act 2003;
[11] Mar Jimeno-Bulnes, The Enforcement of the European Arrest Warrant: A Comparison Between Spain and the UK, European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice, August 1, 2007, p 271;
[12] Section 8(4) of the Extradition Act 2003;
[13] Section 8(4A) of the Extradition Act 2003;

United Kingdom is finalized. However, even this term can be exceeded in case a custodial sentence is imposed in respect of the offence, when the proceedings may be further adjourned until the person is released from custody.

Also, if, before the beginning of the extradition hearing, the District Judge is informed that the person is in custody serving a sentence of imprisonment or another form of detention in the United Kingdom, any further proceedings in respect of the extradition may be adjourned until the person is released from custody.

In case the hearing does not begin on or before the date fixed, and no reasonable cause is shown for the delay, then the judge must order the person's discharge.

In what regards the duration of the initial hearing, in practice, in England and Wales the average period between arrest and first instance surrender decision is 28 days in consented cases, and 65 in non-consented cases[14].

The extradition hearing

In England and Wales, the powers available to the District Judge are (as nearly as possible) the same as those available to a magistrates' court at a summary trial[15].

In the initial stage of the extradition hearing, the District Judge must decide whether the offence specified in the warrant is an extradition offence as defined in section 64 (the requested person was not sentenced for the offence) or section 65 (the requested person was sentenced for the offence).

The conduct specified in the warrant must either (i) meet the dual criminality test[16] or (ii) the appropriate issuing authority must indicate that the offence is included within the European framework list.

In the case of framework list offences, the offence in the warrant amounts to an extradition offence if:

- the conduct occurs in the category 1 territory and no part of it occurs in the United Kingdom;
- the conduct falls within the European framework list;
- the conduct is punishable under the law of the category 1 territory with imprisonment or another form of detention for a term of 3 years or a greater punishment.

Thus, it can be observed that in the case of European framework list offences, even though the dual criminality test is not necessary, extradition is only available if no part of the conduct took place in the United Kingdom. Otherwise, no matter how insignificant the conduct performed in the United Kingdom, the dual criminality test becomes mandatory in relation to European framework list offences.

Further, if the District Judge decides that the conduct specified in the EAW does not amount to an extradition offence then he must order the person's discharge. Otherwise, the District Judge must proceed to consider whether there are any statutory bars to extradition. The bars to extradition are:

- rule against double jeopardy – if the requested person was previously either convicted or acquitted for the same conduct specified in the EAW;
- the absence of a prosecution decision;
- extraneous considerations – if the EAW was issued for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing the requested person on account of race, religion, nationality, gender, sexual orientation or political opinions;
- passage of time – when it appears it would be unjust or oppressive to extradite the requested person due to the passage of time since the alleged conduct described in the EAW;
- the age of the requested person – if the requested person would not be criminally liable in the United Kingdom due to his/her age at the time of the alleged conduct described in the EAW;
- specialty – there are no arrangements between the United Kingdom and the issuing state that would prevent the prosecution of the requested person for other offences than the one he/she is being extradited for;
- earlier extradition to the United Kingdom from a category 1 territory or transfer from the International Criminal Court;
- human rights concerns – if the extradition of the requested person would not be compatible with fundamental rights provided by the European Convention on Human Rights;
- proportionality – if the extradition of the requested person would be disproportionate in relation to (i) the seriousness of the conduct alleged to constitute the extradition offence, (ii) the likely penalty that would be imposed if the requested person was found guilty of the extradition offence and (iii) the possibility of the relevant foreign authorities taking measures that would be less coercive than the extradition of the requested person;
- forum – if the requested person's extradition would not be in the interests of justice;
- physical and mental health considerations which would make extradition unjust or oppressive;
- no guarantee that the requested person who was convicted in his/her absence will benefit of a retrial.

Thus, after assessing on the applicability of the bars to extradition, the District Judge must order the person's discharge if any of the bars to extradition do apply.

Otherwise, if none of these bars to extradition apply and the District Judge decides that extradition is both proportionate and compatible, then he must order the extradition of the requested person.

[14] European Arrest Warrants: ensuring an effective defence, a JUSTICE report, London, 2012, available at www.ecba.org;

[15] Within a summary trial, the district judges from the magistrates' court are judges both of law and fact; as opposed to the trial by jury, where the questions of law are decided by the Crown Court judge, while questions of fact are decided by the jury;

[16] The dual criminality test entails that the conduct for which extradition is being requested must constitute a crime both under the law of the category 1 territory and under the law of the relevant part of the United Kingdom;

5. Appeal and surrender following appeal

Appeals may be lodged by either the requested person or the issuing judicial authority with the High Court and, as the case may be, with the Supreme Court.

Where an appeal against an extradition order is unsuccessful or where the issuing judicial authority successfully appeals against a discharge order and the appeal court orders extradition, the person must be extradited within 10 days, starting with the day on which the decision of the relevant court becomes final.

However, if the relevant court which made the appeal decision and the issuing judicial authority agree a later date, extradition must take place in the 10 day period following the agreed date. If the deadlines are not complied with the judge must, on the person's application, order his discharge, unless reasonable cause is shown for the delay.

6. The evolution of the number of EAWs received by the United Kingdom over the years[17]

Between 2010 and 2015, the United Kingdom has received 48,766 EAWs. Following these requests, the competent authorities in the United Kingdom have made 9,305 arrests and ordered the surrender of 6,514 persons.

Thus, it can be observed that the competent authorities in the United Kingdom have only ordered the surrender of the requested persons in 13.36 % of the cases.

The number of EAWs received per year between 2010 and 2013 was in the average of 5,500 (4,369 in 2010, 6,512 in 2011, 6,290 in 2012 and 5,522 in 2013). In 2014, the number of EAWs received has more than doubled, from 5,522 in 2013 to 13,460 in 2014, while in 2015 it remained above the 10,000 mark (i.e. 12,613).

In what regards the number of surrenders ordered by the United Kingdom following EAWs issued by the Member States, over the years this number remained in the average of 1,000 per year.

Thus, it can be observed that, even though the number of EAWs has increased, the number of surrenders remained constant.

If we look at the percentages, we see that in 2015 the competent authorities in the United Kingdom ordered the surrender of the requested person in 9.1 % of the cases, as opposed to 24 % in 2010.

The top 3 countries who issued the EAWs received by the United Kingdom between 2010 and 2015 are: Poland (11,638 requests), Germany (7,288 requests) and Romania (5,382 requests).

Thus, only these 3countries issued almost half of the total number of EAWs received by the United Kingdom during the said period.

However, the number of surrenders to these countries is still rather small: Poland (3,752 surrenders or 32.2 %), Germany (161 surrenders or 2.2 %) and Romania (332 surrenders or 6.17 %).

Conclusion

The European arrest warrant has replaced the extradition procedure between the Member States of the European Union. The judicial-administrative procedure was basically replaced by a purely judicial one, which lead to simplified extradition procedures between the Member States of the European Union.

In this context, although the European arrest warrant entails a simplified extradition procedure, the Extradition Act 2003 provides sufficient safeguards for the citizens of the European Union, so that their fundamental rights are observed. The bars to extradition provided by the Extradition Act 2003, as well as the requested person's possibilities to appeal the decision ruled on his/her extradition show that, although this procedure is a purely judicial one and therefore, a more expedited one, the requested person's extradition is carefully assessed by the competent courts in the United Kingdom and the requested person's right to a defense is observed.

This aspect is confirmed by the fact that, over the years, the percentage of surrenders ordered by the competent courts in the United Kingdom has decreased significantly, although the number of requests has increased.

References

- Alexandru Boroi, Ion Rusu, Minodora-Ioana Rusu, Treaty of international judicial cooperation in criminal matters, C.H. Beck Publisher, 2016;
- Rodica Panainte, Considerations on the European Arrest Warrant, Journal of Public Administration, Finance and Law, January 2, 2015;
- Laura Maria Stanila, The European arrest warrant. The problem of implementing framework decision 2002/584/JHA in the EU Member States, The Journal of Judicial Sciences, 2007;
- Florin Razvan Radu, International judicial cooperation in criminal matters, C.H. Beck Publisher, Bucharest, 2008;
- Libor Klimek, Mutual Recognition of Judicial Decisions in European Criminal Law, Springer Publisher, 2017;
- Spencer J.R., Fair trials and the European arrest warrant, The Cambridge Law Journal, July 1, 2010;
- Mar Jimeno-Bulnes, The Enforcement of the European Arrest Warrant: A Comparison Between Spain and the UK, European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice, August 1, 2007;

[17] The statistics related to the European arrest warrant from 2010 to 2015 can be found on the website of the National Crime Agency – www.nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk;

THE INFLUENCE OF ARTIFICIAL INTELLIGENCE ON CRIMINAL LIABILITY

Maxim DOBRINOIU

Abstract

The nowadays deployment of Artificial Intelligence (AI) and its expected relatively rapid integration into various instances of the socio-economic or governmental life (e.g. household, health, industry, trade and so on) represent a great development opportunity for every nation, as well as a key element for the evolution of the mankind. The elements of AI have already started to take over certain human-type workouts or tasks, while it will take not so long until they will almost completely replace individuals in performing their jobs, and thus evolve from the status of simple tools to the status of "electronic persons" or even subjects of law. During their interaction with the human-dominated world, the AI-driven entities may either be in compliance or a conflict relationship with the law and the society protected by the law, especially when a loss, a damage or a casualty occurs. The article aims at studying the electronic persons' behavior and pointing out whether would be possible or not to further treat the elements of AI as liable against the law, in general, and criminal law, in particular.

Keywords: Artificial Intelligence, criminal law, criminal liability, electronic person

1. The concept of artificial intelligence and its impact on social life

At the European level, the term "artificial intelligence" (AI) was officially referred to as "systems that display intelligent behavior by analyzing their environment and taking actions – with some degree of autonomy – to achieve specific goals".[1]

From its already far deployment in areas like: medicine, transportation, industry, agriculture, military, public order, Cybersecurity, client-interaction, technology research and improvement, Internet of Things – IoT and so on, the AI proved to be "real", to be "live", and to be a significant part of our socio-economic life.

It is worth understanding, in a first phase, what really means both "artificial" and "intelligence". While "artificial" may be regarded as a good "made by people, often as a copy of something natural"[2], "intelligence" has at least the following meanings: "the ability to learn and understand or to deal with new or trying situations", "the skilled use of reason", and "the ability to apply knowledge to manipulate one's environment or to think abstractly as measured by objective criteria"[3].

Other authors[4] define AI as artificially developed intelligence, which is, to some extent, correct and logic.

It is pretty much obvious that AI was created as an alternative to humans, a crafted machine with embedded learning and analysis capabilities, mastered to comply with real-life situations and to perform, as much as accurately possible, the tasks and works once done by men. Thus, the combined above definitions may conclude that an element of AI could be perceived as a unnatural product designed with human-like form of intelligence.

However, as written in the preamble of the Montreal Declaration for a Responsible Development of Artificial Intelligence (2018), AI poses a major ethical challenge and social risks, with intelligent machines that can restrict the choices of individuals and groups, lower living standards, disrupt the organization of labor and the job market, influence politics, clash with fundamental rights, exacerbate social and economic inequalities, and affect ecosystems, the climate and the environment.[5]

The evolution of AI-type entities (such as robots) conducted in time to the development of autonomous and even cognitive features – such as the ability to learn from experiences and take independent decisions, thus evolving them more and more to agents that interact with their environment and are able to alter it significantly. That's why the European experts came to the conclusion that "the legal responsibility arising from a robot's harmful action becomes a crucial issue".[6]

In terms of liability, the same EU legal document (mentioned above) states that "the most autonomous robots are, the less they can be considered simple tools in the hands of other actors (such as the manufacturer, the owner, the user, etc.)" and this, in turn, "makes the

* Associate Professor, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: office@e-crime.ro)

[1] See the Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the European Council, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions, Artificial Intelligence for Europe, COM(2018) 237 final, Brussels, 25.04.2018

[2] The Cambridge Dictionary, available at https://dictionary.cambridge.org/dictionary/english/artificial, accessed 25.04.2019

[3] The Merriam-Webster Dictionary, available at https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/intelligence, accessed on 25.04.2019

[4] Stuart Russell, Peter Norving, Artificial Intelligence: A Modern Approach(3rd edn, NJ Prentice Hall 2009) 4-5

[5] https://docs.wixstatic.com/ugd/ebc3a3_c5c1c196fc164756afb92466c081d7ae.pdf

[6] See the Committee on Legal Affairs Draft Report with recommendations to the Commission on Civil Law Rules on Robotics 2015/2103 (INL) available at http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?pubRef=-//EP//NONSGML%2BCOMPARL%2BPE-582.443%2B01%2BDOC%2BPDF%2BV0//EN ordinary rules of liability insufficient and calls for new rules which focus on how the machine can be held – partly or entirely – responsible for its acts or omissions", while "as a consequence, it becomes more and more urgent to address the fundamental question of whether robots should poses a legal status".[7]

Another interesting point driven to the attention of the EU Parliament's Committee on Legal Affairs is that "robot's autonomy raises the question of their nature in the light of the existing legal categories – of whether they should be regarded as natural persons, animals or objects – or whether a new category should be created, with its own specific features and implications as regards the attributions of rights and duties, including liability".[8]

It seems to be commonly agreed at the European level that "the existing rules of liability cover cases where the cause of the robot's act or omission can be traced back to a specific human agent such as the manufacturer, the owner or the user and where that the agent could have foreseen and avoided the robot's harmful behavior".[9]

Among other significant aspects, the experts calls on the European Commission, when carrying out an impact assessment of its future legislative instrument, to explore the implications of all legal solutions related to the AI entities (robots), by far the most important one being the "creation of a specific legal status for robots, so that at least the most sophisticated autonomous robots could be established as having the status of electronic persons with specific rights and obligations, …, and applying electronic personality to cases where robots make smart autonomous decisions or otherwise interact with third parties independently".[10]

Some authors[11] developed a scale of AI, based on different forms of intelligence they poses and the implication of humans, such as: level 1 – AI with human supervision, level 2 – AI with deterministic autonomy, level 3 – machine learning-type AI, and level 4 – multi agents systems AI.

2. Doctrine views on Criminal Liability

A crime is the only legal ground for the criminal liability. For a crime to be indicted to a specific person (individual or legal), certain elements must exist, such as: a legal provision (depicting the offence), the commission of one or several material acts (actus reus), the mental state (mens rea) of the person charged with that offence, the unjustifiable ground for the person's criminal behavior, and the attribution (one's moral involvement in committing a crime).

In the large majority of the national criminal systems, one of the most important elements of a crime is mens rea – the mental element[12] which drives a person to commit a crime or to trespass a legal provision.

As all the legal practitioners know, that guilty mind of a culprit consists of three different forms: the intent (with its sub-categories: direct intent – when the person foresees the result of his actions and pursue that result, and oblique intent – when the person foresees the result of his actions, and, while not pursuing that result, only accepts the occurrence of that result), the guilt (with its sub-categories: recklessness – when the person foresees that a particular result may occur and further acts without taking care whether that result happens or not, and criminal negligence – when the person does not foresee the result of his actions while he could or should have foresee it), and the overt intent.

From the Romanian legislation perspective, the guilt or the moral responsibility (involvement) of the person who commit a crime is a subjective process consisting of two factors: the consciousness and the will.[13]

In what regards the consciousness, the culprit has the representation of his actions, of the conditions he acts in, and of the causal relation between the culprit's action/inaction and the result. In his mind there comes the idea of committing the crime and, furthermore, the deliberation of the reasons why he, however, should commit the crime. At the end of this process, the culprit takes the decision to commit the crime.[14]

In what regards the will, the culprit moves from the mental state to the physical state of his actions, thus mobilizing his energies (at his disposal) towards realizing the external behavioral acts. This will comes to be very important, because the person, being in full control of its actions and without any (internal or external) constraints (physical or moral), has a free and unconditioned determination to act in the desired manner, thus to also commit a crime.

These above analyzed factors are entirely acknowledged and fully recognized as being human-related. They are specific to any individual, whose conscience and will are not affected in any way by various forces, and there is no clue that they may be associated with any form of machine, even world class high performance computers, run with the most advanced pieces of software and applications.

---

[7] Ibid, pct S on Liability
[8] Ibid, pct T on Liability
[9] Ibid, pct U on Liability
[10] Ibid, pct 31, p.11
[11] Ikenga Oraegbunam, Uguru Uguru, Artificial Intelligence Entities and Criminal Liability: A Nigerian Jurisprudential Diagnosis, in African Journal of Criminal Law and Jurisprudence, no. 2, 2018
[12] Malice aforethought (US Criminal Code)
[13] V. Pasca, Criminal Law. General Part. 2nd Edition, UniversulJuridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p.156
[14] V. Dobrinoiu and colab., The New Criminal Code Commented. General Part., 3rd Edition, UniversulJuridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p.134

3. From "electronic person" to active subject of a crime

The human-level AI seems to be the next generation of AI, capable of performing almost all the intellectual tasks an individual can do, and also to have feelings (worries, angers, happiness or maybe love) and to control them through autonomous human-like behavior. Many[15] believes that it is a question of time until the AI will become a true forms of intelligence (or a human-based or human-type intelligence), replacing human judgement, also think independently and act for itself.

As we all know, nowadays, in law, a person is identified as individual (human) person and legal person, both having certain degrees of liability when involved in any way in the commission of a crime.

Different authors identified some particular aspects that shape the elements of AI, and play a significant role in explaining the difficulties of assessing the criminal liability share between the "synthetic person" and the "natural person". And these are: increasing autonomy[16] (that meaning a decreasing control from humans), unpredictability[17] (meaning AI lacks of cognition may lead to reactions totally different than human like), and unaccountability[18] (while not applied with legal personality, AI elements cannot be held responsible for their harmful actions).

In order to analyze the actual and real involvement of an AI entity in committing a crime, it is first needed to clarify the role of different other actors in the doing or undoing (action or inaction – meaning actus reus)[19]. And here the "user", the "supervisor" and the "producer" of the AI entity have an important role in a respective criminal investigation, as being the humans behind the machine, thus firstly questionable about the conditions the AI entity acted upon, the software they designed and implemented into the machine, and the computer instructions they performed on it or even the omission to intervene when they are noticed about the AI element acting wrongfully, harming an individual or damaging goods.

When it comes to autonomous agents or machine learning, the real problem is the way they actually "learn" from the environment or from their own experiences. With little or even no human control of the learning process (in the future), we will have to deal with unpredictable entities, which may turn harmful or at least unlawful in performing their actions.

The doctrine is still reluctant to clearly attribute the responsibility of committing a crime entirely to the AI element, and rather prefers to identify a human being as the offender – the main actor liable (see the "user", the "supervisor" or the "producer" of the AI element).

According to some authors[20], "the harm from the actors' behavior does not occur immediately, but it may occur in the future when the AI acts", while "the launch or use of any AI somewhat presupposes a duty of control and supervision over the AI and its actions".

On the other hand, other authors[21] believe that AI criminal liability requires legal personhood for the AIs, and that would be similar to corporate criminal liability that some legal systems are recognizing. And, therefore, legal personhood for AI is consequently a question whether AIs should have rights and duties in accordance with the law.

Moreover, the general opinion is that, in contrast with corporations, the AI elements should be liable only for their own actions or inactions (behavior), and not for those initially attributed to certain individuals.

There is an idea that a possible solution would be a system enforcing AI criminal liability within a system that accepts only the actus reus condition when assessing a crime, but this seems to be unacceptable from the general principles of the criminal law. We agree with the opinion that such a case, when mens rea is excluded, would be similar to the involuntary acts that excludes criminal liability at all.

In one of his remarkable articles on this subject, an author[22] envisaged three models of liability concerning the AI entities, that can be considered separately of in conjunction (for better liability solutions): 1) Perpetration-via-Another Liability Model, 2) Natural-Probable-Consequence Liability Model, and 3) Direct Liability Model.

We agree with the author that in the first model, when a crime involves an AI entity, this AI entity should be regarded as "innocent agent" (like in the longa manus theory), thus mere an instrument in the commission of that crime, and not an active (principal

---

[15] Karel Nedbálek, The Future Inclusion of Criminal Liability of the Robots and Artificial Intelligence in the Czech Republic, Paradigm of Law and Public Administration, Interregional Academy for Personnel Management, Ukraine, 2018, available at http://maup.com.ua/assets/files/expert/1/the-future-inclusion-of-criminal.pdf

[16] Ryan Calo, Robotics and the Lessons of Cyberlaw, California Law Review, 2015, p. 532

[17] Sherer M, Regulating Artificial Intelligence Systems: Risks, Challenges, Competencies and Strategies (2016), Harvard Journal of Law and Technology, p. 353

[18] Mireille Hildebrandt, Criminal Liability and "Smart" Environments in R.A. Duff and Stuart P Green (eds) Philosophical Foundations of Criminal Law (2011), p. 506

[19] Weaver J F, Robots Are People Too: How Siri, Google Car and Artificial Intelligence Will Force Us to Change Our Laws. (2014)

[20] AP Simester, A von Hirsch, Crimes, Harms, and Wrongs. On the principles of criminalisation, Hart Publishing, 2011 at https://www.researchgate.net/publication/241643522_AP_Simester_and_Andreas_von_Hirsch_Crime_Harms_and_Wrongs_On_the_Principles_of_Criminalisation

[21] Ashworth A, Principles of Criminal Law (4th edn, OUP 2003) and Mireille Hildebrandt, Criminal Liability and "Smart" Environments in the thesis of Matilda Claussen-Karlson, Artificial Intelligence and the External Element of Crime, Orebro University, Sweden, 2017

[22] Gabriel Hallevy, The Criminal Liability of Artificial Intelligence Entities – From Science Fiction to Legal Social Control, Akron Intellectual Property Journal No. 4, University of Akron, 2016

or secondary) participant. In this case, due to the lack of mens rea of the actual perpetrator, the criminal charge will always pursue the producer, the programmer or the end-user of that particular AI entity.

The second model addresses the cases of the "foreseeable offences committed by AI entities", where, in the opinion of the author, the producer or the programmer do not have any involvement, nor they acknowledge of any offence until this is actually committed by the AI entity they designed, produced or programmed.

In this scenario, we agree that human activity is merely linked to the malfunction of the AI entity in the manner that the producer, the programmer or the user should have thought about (or should have considered the possible consequence of) a crime being committed (in certain circumstances) by that AI entity. Therefore, we support author Gabriel Hallevy that considers the criminal liability of the human factor rather negligence[23], than intention, although there may be situations when the (human) offender foresees the result of its actions (upon AI entity), does not pursue it, while accepting this result to occur one day.

The third model of Gabriel Hallevy focuses on the AI entity itself[24], while considering the direct liability as similar applicable to societal individuals (offenders). While there are argues that AI elements should be put aside of the criminal liability similar to children and mentally ill persons (doli incapax), the new technology developments prove that AI entities are able to interpret large amounts of data from its sensors, to make difference between "right" and "wrong", and even to analyze what is "permitted" or "forbidden".

It is still a question whether these capabilities (irrespective they are the result of a good programming or the result of its own learning feature) may be seen as signs of consciousness or internal elements (mens rea) needed for the existence of the criminal liability.

If so, we also need to consider the various forms of participation to the crime commission, depending on the relations between the AI entity and the other human perpetrators, and each other's involvement in pursuing the criminal activity. In these scenarios, the AI entity may find itself in the capacity of principal, accessory, accomplice or abettor.

Although some authors believe the contrary, we consider that is beyond reasonable acceptance to consider AI elements as qualifying to all the defenses against criminal liability (e.g. self-defense, necessity, consent, error, physical or mental constraint etc.), due to the fact that, in our opinion, there are more other internal elements to be taken into account when analyzing the possible fulfillment of all the requirements.

Conclusions

Trying to find the best solutions for AI-related legal problems, some authors[25] envisaged various approaches, from a "precautionary" one – in which the autonomous agents are precluded or prohibited due to their associated risks and uncertainties, to a "permissive" one – permitting the deployment and development of AI entities and autonomous agents, while accepting the risks and the social costs until properly regulating the domain.

As revealed by the above analysis, in the crimes committed with the involvement of AI elements, for the criminal liability to exists there is a strong need for both actus reus and mens rea to exist in the behavior of the respective artificial intelligence agents.

And we observed that at least mens rea is hard to be taken into consideration in what regards AI.

But, before "thinking" and "acting", there is a strong need for an AI element to learn (or to be taught) about the law. Civil and criminal. And if is about a autonomous AI or an advanced machine learning, the producer, the programmer or the user must ensure that the most important routines of instructions comply with the existing laws and regulations, and the entity is (somehow) forced to "learn" the most prevalent principles of the living societies (not to kill, not to harm, not to steal, not to destroy etc.), to abide these laws and regulations and to keep away from any sort of autonomous actions that may be considered as unacceptable harmful behavior.

And this should be the main task of all the future projects involving the development of AI or legal bids to consider (and further treat) AI as "electronic person", with rights and obligations, similar to human beings.

Also, considering that the future will probably belong to the AI elements, the basics of the criminal law must be adjusted according to the principle nullum crimen sine lege, assuming that for the new society (electronic) members we may need to create special legal provisions and maybe a new legal system[26].

We share the same views with other authors[27] claiming that the AI entities should be considered as both objects and subjects of legal relations, "perhaps somewhere between legal entities and individuals, combining their individual characteristics with regards to relevant circumstances".

Another system that should be revised in the future is the penalty one, as it is hardly believable that actual criminal sanctions may apply to AI accordingly (such as: imprisonment, penal fine, safety measures or educative measures). There are multiple possibilities to be considered, such as: the destruction, the dismemberment, the decommissioning (partially or totally), the removal from duty or the reprogramming.

[23] Ibid

[24] Ibid

[25] See Peter M. Asaro, The Liability Problem for Autonomous Artificial Agents, presented to the Association for the Advancement of Artificial Intelligence (www.aaai.org ), Spring Symposia 2016

[26] See also Karel Nedbálek

[27] Radutniy Olecksandr Eduardovich, Criminal Liability of the Artificial Intelligence, in Problems of Legality, issue 138, 2017

In all the cases, we think that there will be no effect on both re-education of the "convicted" AI entity, and the prevention of future crimes – as the principal aims of any penalty system in place, due to the fact that AI existence and behavior rely on computer programs and logic instructions and not on human-like emotions or feelings like shame, fear, care, love, guilt, outrage, regret, suffering, worry, rejection, social connection, need, sense of freedom etc.

For all that, the national criminal justice systems are required to adapt themselves and include clear and comprehensive provisions in order to ensure the public order, the safety of people and their goods and property.

References

- https://www.coe.int/en/web/human-rights-rule-of-law/-/thematic-session-on-artificial-intelligence-and-criminal-law-responsibility
- https://www.torontopubliclibrary.ca/detail.jsp?Entt=RDM3061779&R=3061779
- https://www.researchgate.net/publication/321321904_Criminal_liability_of_the_artificial_intelligence/download
- https://arxiv.org/ftp/arxiv/papers/1802/1802.07782.pdf
- https://core.ac.uk/download/pdf/55634657.pdf
- http://www.diva-portal.org/smash/get/diva2:1115160/FULLTEXT01.pdf
- http://plaw.nlu.edu.ua/article/view/105661
- https://lawreview.law.ucdavis.edu/issues/51/5/Essays/51-5_Greely.pdf
- http://maup.com.ua/assets/files/expert/1/the-future-inclusion-of-criminal.pdf
- https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:52018DC0237&rid=1
- http://journals.ezenwaohaetorc.org/index.php/AFJCLJ/article/view/501
- http://www.europarl.europa.eu/doceo/document/A-8-2019-0019_EN.html
- https://www.inverse.com/article/30285-robot-crime-artificial-intelligence-punishment
- http://brandonmarinoff.com/artificial-intelligence-and-criminal-law/
- https://www.natlawreview.com/article/legal-ethics-ethical-dilemma-artificial-intelligence

REFLECTING THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY IN THE DECISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF ROMANIA

Eliza Ene CORBEANU

Abstract

The need to protect has deep roots in the history of law. Paradoxically, the more humanity has endeavored to legislate, the abuse and the lack of real support from those responsible for ensuring security and peace have increased.

That is how society felt that, besides the internal regulation of privacy, it had to appeal to international organisations whose purpose was to persuade states that they alone could be able to resist any abusive interference in the individual's privacy.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights established in 1948 that no man would be the object of arbitrary interference in his private life, as long as there is legal protection against these intrusions[1].

Article The Right to Privacy written by Samuel Warren and Louis Brandeis, appeared in the Harvard Law Review, volume IV, issue 5 of December 15, 1890, is considered to be one of the most influential essays in the history of American law[2], and the right to private life is defined by the authors as the right to be left alone or the right to loneliness[3].

The social evolution and the transformations of law have gradually led to an increasing distance between the initial desideratum - that of loneliness - and the real need to ensure a safety and protection environment for each individual.

Even if at the theoretical level any individual has the right to be left alone, in reality this right is not necessarily illusory, but rather impossible to be respected in the way we would probably want each one of us.

Complex threats, from wars, civil movements, terrorism, to cyber attacks, and the need for strong nations to dominate, have transformed the right to private life into a promising slogan whenever interest calls for it, or, worse, have reduced to noticeable dimensions invoking the need for over-protection of the individual by the state.

But what are governments doing in the name of protecting their own citizens? They violate private life, but they do it under the protection of the law, they do not respect fundamental rights, but their action appears justified, they restrict liberties and even suppress any intimacy in the name of the protection of the general good.

What does ultimately mean private life and how much should the state be interested in protecting it?

Of course, the notion itself is all-encompassing, with unspeakable valences and hidden ramifications throughout our existence.

We have a private life from the moment we are born, but others are responsible for it, private is the home with all its dependencies, private information about the state of health, or personal data, at work we have the right to intimacy, even a detainee has the right to ensure and respect his private life in designated spaces and the list can continue.

By making a parallel between private life in the American model and the way it is protected in European law, a fundamental difference emerges.

If in American law individual autonomy is the expression of absolutism, being the core of the existence of social rights, Europeans did not think this notion as an independent, stand alone, supreme relation to the other rights recognized by the individual but as an important, but not exclusive component or outside any limitations or restrictions.

In European law, the balance between the protection of the general interest and the need to guarantee, within reasonable limits, respect for the right to privacy was maintained.

Although Romania signed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, the constitutional right to privacy did not find a distinct regulation either in the 1848 constitution or in 1952 or in 1965.

At present, the Romanian Constitution protects and regulates the right to private life and the authorities have the obligation to respect it.

Keyword: the constitutional court of Romania, the right to private life, the right to family life, unconstitutionality

1. The proper regulation

1.1. The Right to Private Life in the Romanian Constitution

- Article 26 of the Romanian Constitution
  Intimate, family and private life

1. Public authorities respect and protect their intimate, family and private life.
2. The individual has the right to dispose of himself if he does not violate the rights and freedoms of others, public order or good morals. "

Although Article 26 of the Constitution of Romania recognizes the right to private life with all its valences (intimate, family), it does not define the notions, for the simple reason that a fundamental law does not have the role of limiting the situations that the practice could generate, leaving the lawyer, the courts,

* Lawyer elizacorbeanu@yahoo.com

[1] http://www.un.org/en/universal-declaration-human-rights/

[2] Susan E. Gallagher, Introduction to "The Right to Privacy" by Louis D. Brandeis and Samuel Warren: A Digital Critical Edition, University of Massachusetts Press, forthcoming.

[3] Warren & Brandeis, paragraph 1

the doctrine, the freedom to interpret and create the right.

1.2. The right to privacy in the Civil Code

The Civil Code, which entered into force on 1 October 2011, dedicates a whole chapter (Chapter II) of respect for the human being and its inherent rights, and in Section II deals with respect for the privacy and dignity of the human person.

According to Article 71 of the Civil Code, every person has the right to respect for his private life, just as no one can be subjected to any interference in his or her private, personal or family life, or at home, residence or correspondence without his consent or without complying with the limits laid down in Article 75 of the Civil Code[1].

Particular importance is attached to correspondence, manuscripts or other personal documents, as well as to the personal information of a person, which can not be used without its consent or without observing the limits provided by Article 75 of the Civil Code.

With a wider scope of privacy, Article 58 of the Civil Code speaks about the right of personality, giving another valence to the protection we are talking about.

Thus, everyone has the right to life, to health, to physical and psychological integrity, to dignity, to their own image, to respect for private life, and other such rights recognized by law.

Let us say that all these regulations would be deprived of practical utility, as long as there were no punitive measures meant to sanction any violation of the values under the protection of the law.

As superficial as it may seem at first glance, or because of excessively long periods in national courts, we can not deny their importance and necessity, because the only way to prevent abuse is by imposing rules and imposing sanctions.

Speaking of civil sanctions, the Civil Code in Article 252 protects the human personality by establishing that every individual has the right to protect the intrinsic values of the human being, such as life, health, physical and mental integrity, dignity, private life, freedom of conscience , scientific, artistic, literary or technical creation.

1.3. The right to privacy in the Criminal Code

We have decided to end with the Romanian Penal Code, which came into force in February 2014, precisely because its regulations should be, in essence, a stepping stone for potential criminals, and coercion measures get more serious, going as far as affecting the freedom of the guilty person and the damage to her property through the imposition of fines or civil damages.

In Chapter IV on offenses against freedom of the person, Article 208 governs the offense of harassment, according to which the action of a person who repeatedly pursues, without right or without a legitimate interest, a person or oversees his home, work or other frequented places by causing it a state of fear, shall be punished by imprisonment from 3 to 6 months or by fine.

Making telephone calls or communications by means of remote transmission which, by frequency or content, causes a person to fear, shall be punished by imprisonment from one month to three months or by a fine if the act does not constitute a more serious crime .

The initiation of criminal proceedings takes place at the preliminary complaint of the injured party .

At first sight, the punishments could be considered ridiculous, but the fact that there was a concern to regulate this kind of acts denotes an anchoring of the current legislation to social transformations and the evolution of inter-human relations.

Even if the state is the one who intervenes to sanction, by bringing to account the guilty ones, it remains to the victim's discretion if they choose to bring the offenders before the law, so that the initiation of criminal proceedings only takes place at the preliminary complaint of the person injured.

Domicile, as a component of privacy, is protected in Chapter IV, Article 224, on Domestic Violence.

Intangible access in any way to a house, room, dependency or enclosure connected to the house without the consent of the person using it or the refusal to leave them at its request shall be punished by imprisonment from 3 months to 2 years or a fine. If the act is committed by an armed person, during the night or by use of lying qualities, the punishment is imprisonment from 6 months to 3 years or a fine.

The initiation of criminal proceedings takes place at the preliminary complaint of the injured party .

And in the case of this crime, criminal liability depends on the injured party's decision, but sanctions are more drastic, and there is even an aggravating variant.

A new incrimination in Romanian criminal law is the introduction of Article 226 on the violation of private life.

Although, at first glance, it could be considered a reiteration, or even a duplication of other offenses (such as home violence), in fact this offense concerns the attainment of privacy by specific methods, involving the use of techniques more or less sophisticated surveillance, using instruments and means capable of intruding a person's private life in a way that is sometimes inscrutable.

Taking pictures, capturing or recording images, listening with technical means, or recording audio are ways to accomplish this type of offense, and the disclosure, broadcasting, presentation or transmission without right of the sounds, conversations or images provided in the form of a crime, have the character of aggravating, the limits of punishment being increased.

[1] article 75 Civil Code Limits: (1) Do not violate the rights set out in this section, which are permitted by law or international human rights conventions and pacts to which Romania is a party. (2) The exercise of constitutional rights and freedoms in good faith and in compliance with the international covenants and conventions to which Romania is a party shall not constitute a violation of the rights provided for in this section.

The fact that even in the case of this crime the legislator left the injured person the right to decide whether the offender was to be held criminally liable was originally justified as a guarantee that the individual is free to decide for himself what actions he / she is injuring or not.

In fact, the practice has shown that the number of cases concerning the investigation of this last crime, for example, is low, the victims often choose to remain passive.

The reasons why the passive subjects of this crime decide not to denounce this type of antisocial behavior that affects their right to private life are multiple, starting from the social implications of such an approach, fear of repression, shame, or simply distrust of force government to stop these abuses.

2. Decisions of the Constitutional Court of Romania on the analysis of private life

2.1. DECISION[2] no. 1258/2009 regarding the admission of the unconstitutionality exception of the provisions of Law no. 298/2008 regarding the retention of the data generated or processed by the providers of electronic communications services for the public or public communications networks, as well as for the amendment of the Law no. 506/2004 on the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector

The subject of the exception of unconstitutionality was Article 1 and Article 15 of Law no. 298/2008 on the retention of data generated or processed by providers of publicly available electronic communications services or public communications networks and amending Law no. 506/2004 on the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector ", published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.780 of 21 November 2008.

- Article 1. - "(1) This law establishes the obligation for the providers of public electronic communications networks and services to retain certain data generated or processed in the framework of their activity of providing electronic communications services, for making them available to the competent authorities for use in research, discovery and prosecution of serious crimes.

(2) This law applies to the traffic and location data of natural and legal persons as well as related data necessary to identify the subscriber or the registered user.

(3) This law shall not apply to the content of the communication or the information consulted during the use of an electronic communications network.

(4) The enforcement of the provisions of the present law is done in compliance with the provisions of the Law no. 677/2001 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and the free movement of such data, as subsequently amended and supplemented, as well as of Law no. .506 / 2004 on the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector, with further additions. ";

- Article 15. - "Providers of public communications networks and providers of publicly available electronic communications services shall, at the request of the competent authorities, on the basis of the authorization issued in accordance with the provisions of Article 16, transmit immediately the data retained under this law, except in cases of force major. "

The author of the unconstitutionality exception criticized the retention of the data generated or processed by the providers of publicly available electronic communications services or public communications networks and the amendment of the Law no. 506/2004 on the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector .

These regulations, claimed the author of the exception affect the exercise of the right to free movement, the right to private life, private and family life, affect the secrecy of correspondence and freedom of speech.

Regarding the clarity and precision of the regulations under consideration, the Constitutional Court has found that they give rise to abuses in the retention, processing and use of data stored by providers of publicly available electronic communications services or public communications networks.

Even if it is remembered that the right to privacy, the secrecy of correspondence and freedom of expression may be restricted or limited, however, any interference must be regulated in a clear, predictable and unambiguous manner.

Lastly, the Court reminds the importance of the obligation to refrain from any interference in the exercise of citizens' rights and freedoms in the matter of personal rights such as the right to intimate and free speech and the processing of personal data.

[2] Text published in the Official Gazette of Romania, in force since November 23, 2009

2.2. DECISION[3] no. 440 of 8 July 2014 on the exception of the unconstitutionality of the provisions of Law no.82 / 2012 on the retention of data generated or processed by the providers of public electronic communications networks and of the providers of publicly available electronic communications services, as well as for the modification and completing the Law no. 506/2004 on the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector and Article 152 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The subject of the exception of unconstitutionality was the provisions of the Law no.82 / 2012 on the retention of the data generated or processed by the providers of public electronic communications networks and the providers of publicly available electronic communications services, as well as for amending and supplementing Law no.506 / 2004 on the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 211 of March 25, 2014, and article 152 of the Criminal Procedure Code:

- Article 152 of the Criminal Procedure Code: "(1) The criminal investigation authorities, with the prior authorization of the judge of rights and freedoms, may require a provider of public electronic communications networks or a provider of publicly available electronic communications services to transmit retained data under the special law on the retention of data generated or processed by providers of public electronic communications networks and providers of publicly available electronic communications services other than the content of communications where there is reasonable suspicion of an offense; and there are grounds for believing that the requested data constitutes evidence for the categories of offenses provided by the law on the retention of data generated or processed by the providers of public electronic communications networks and the providers of elec- tronic communications services for the public.

(2) The judge of rights and freedoms shall pronounce within 48 hours on the request of the criminal prosecution bodies to transmit the data, through reasoned conclusion, to the council chamber.

(3) Providers of public electronic communications networks and providers of publicly available electronic communications services who cooperate with the criminal investigation bodies are obliged to keep the secret of the performed operation. ".

The author of the unconstitutionality objection said that the criticized texts violate the constitutional provisions of Article 26 on intimate, family and private life.

In 2012, following the defeat to the Constitutional Court by Decision[4] No. 1258/2009, a new transposition of Directive[5] 2006/24 / EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58 / EC in the national legislation, by Law no.82 / 2012, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.211 of 25 March 2014.

According to the Constitutional Court, Law no.82 / 2012 did not bring substantial modifications to the previous unconstitutional law, which provided identical solutions ignoring Decision No. 1258 of October 8, 2009[6].

A second rejection of the law at the Constitutional Court on July 8, 2014 came after, not long before, even the EU Data Retention Directive 2006/24 / EC was invalidated.

"We are aware that on 8 April 2014, the Court of Justice of the European Union invalidated Data Protection Directive 2006/24 / EC from the date on which it was issued, considering that there was a wide-ranging interference and the seriousness of the fundamental rights to respect for privacy and the protection of personal data, without such an interference being limited to what is strictly necessary, "the Court's press release states[7].

Regarding violation of the right to privacy, the Constitutional Court notes that in terms of access and use of data, the issue of unconstitutionality arises, given the access of the judicial bodies and other state bodies with attributions in the field of national security to the stored data.

As such, the law does not provide the safeguards necessary to protect the right to intimate, family and private life, the secrecy of correspondence and the freedom of expression of persons whose stored data are accessed. "(Paragraph 61)

This decision has sparked vehement reactions both from the Romanian Intelligence Service and from the representatives of the prosecutor's offices, going to the assertion that the national security of Romania is jeopardized and the criminal investigations can no longer run in good conditions, because, overwhelmingly, criminal investigations were based on data stored by operators.

On September 18, 2014, the Constitutional Court of Romania issued a statement[8] attempting to justify taking the above-mentioned decisions: "We mention that other Constitutional Courts or European Courts

[3] Text published in the Official Gazette of Romania, in force since September 4, 2014
[4] Text published in the Official Gazette of Romania, in force since November 23, 2009
[5] https://eur-lex.europa.eu/eli/dir/2006/24/oj
[6] https://www.ccr.ro/noutati/COMUNICAT-DE-PRES-106, 18.09.2014
[7] http://unbr.ro/wp-content/uploads/2014/04/CP140054EN.pdf
[8] https://www.ccr.ro/noutati/COMUNICAT-DE-PRES-106

have already declared unconstitutional national laws on data retention, in this situation - with Germany, Austria, Czech Republic or Bulgaria, with the same object appearing in the role of the constitutional courts in other states. On the other hand, as it appears from the motivation of the decision establishing the unconstitutionality of Law no.82 / 2012, the Court does not said unconstitutional data retrieval and storage operations in themselves, but only that access to and use of data is not accompanied by the necessary safeguards to ensure the protection of the above-mentioned fundamental rights, in particular the fact that the judicial bodies with attributions in the field of national security have access to these data without the judge's authorization.

2.3. DECISION[9] No. 580 of 20 July 2016 on the Citizens' Legislative Initiative entitled "Law on the Revision of the Romanian Constitution"

It was through this decision that a citizen's initiative, supported by several non-governmental organizations, was to change the content of Article 48 of the Constitution:

Present as follows: "(1) The family is based on the freely consented marriage between spouses, on their equality, and on the right and duty of parents to ensure the raising, education and training of children. (2) The conditions for termination, termination and invalidity of marriage shall be established by law. Religious marriage can only be celebrated after civil marriage. (3) Children outside the marriage are equal before the law with those in marriage. "

The proposal[10] was in the following sense: "The family is based on the freely agreed marriage between a man and a woman, on their equality and on the right and duty of parents to ensure the raising, education and training of children."

In other words, it was desired to replace the phrase between husbands with the phrase between a man and a woman.

The motivation for this citizens' initiative to review the Constitution has come from the fact that in Romania the right to marry belongs only to a man with a woman, being excluded from the same sex.

In the initiators' view, the attempt to clarify the term "spouses" in Article 48 of the Constitution was intended to remove any interpretation contrary to that of a woman and a man in a family.

Another argument used has started from the definition of the family as it results from Article 16 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, namely that of a natural and fundamental element of society.

According to Article 16 (1) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on December 10, 1948, "men and women have the right to marry and to found a family".

Article 12 of the European Convention on Human Rights[11] states that "From the age of the law the husband and wife have the right to marry and to found a family under the national law governing the exercise of this right."

Romania remains tributary to the old traditions, and society as a whole is not yet ready to cope with changes in perceptions rooted centuries in the culture of this people.

Romania is still in Europe, a country where the marriage rate is among the highest, and this is the fear of embracing innovative experiments, decadent for most and destabilizing for others.

Article 258 (4) of the Civil Code, speaking of spouses, describes them as the man and woman united by marriage[12], and marriage is the freely consented union between a man and a woman (Article 259 of the Civil Code).

Perhaps the large number of citizens who have consented to the Constitutional Court's request to ask the Court to clarify the notion of spouses shows precisely the traditionalism that I mentioned above and the need to preserve the values that have remained unaltered or perhaps, was just a speculated subject of organizations or political actors interested in acquiring notoriety or image capital.

Being a sensitive issue at European level, the European Court of Justice has left the role of regulating permissively or restrictively each state, considering it to be their absolute attribute to decide on the definition of marriage, civil status, the possibility of validating a legal union between same-sex couples.

It is worth recalling the Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Union of 1 April 2008 in Case C-267/06[13] Tadao Maruko v Versorgungsanstalt der deutschen Bühnen, which established more than eleven years ago that "the civil status and benefits derive from it, are matters which are the responsibility of the Member States and Community law does not affect that competence. '

The same approach we find in the Judgment of 10 May 2011 in Case C-147/08 Jürgen Römer v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg[14].

The Resolution of the United Nations Human Rights Council on Family Protection of July 3, 2015 defines the family as a natural and fundamental group of society that must be essentially protected by the state.

It must be mentioned some of the arguments of the Constitutional Court in Decision 580/2016 because they describe its concept of marriage, private life,

[9] published in the Official Gazette no. 857/2016 - M. Of. 857/27 October 2016

[10] http://www.cdep.ro/proiecte/2017/100/20/7/pl34.pdf

[11] https://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_RON.pdf

[12] (4) For the purposes of this Code, spouses are men and women united by marriage.

[13] Repertoriul de jurisprudență 2008 I-01757, https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/?qid=1553454942837&uri=CELEX:62006CJ0267

[14] Cauza C-147/08, Repertoriul de jurisprudență 2011 I-03591, https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/?uri=CELEX:62008CJ0147

family life: "The Court holds that Article 48 of the Constitution enshrines and protects the right to marry, and family relationships resulting from marriage, distinct from the right to family life / respect for and protection of family life, with a wider legal content enshrined and protected by Article 26 of the Constitution, according to which "(1) Public authorities respect and protect the intimate, family and private life . (2) The individual has the right to dispose of himself if he does not violate the rights and freedoms of others, public order or good morals. "

The notion of family life is complex, including family relationships in fact, distinct from family relationships resulting from marriage, the importance of which the constituent legislator has emphasized distinctly in Article 48 the protection of family relationships resulting from marriage and from the link between parents and children.

2.4. DECISION[15] No.51 of 16 February 2016 on the objection of unconstitutionality of the provisions of Article 142 (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure

The subject of the exception of unconstitutionality was the provisions of Article 142 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, according to which "the prosecutor enforces the technical supervision or may order it to be carried out by the criminal investigative body or specialized police officers or other specialized bodies of the state ".

The authors of the exception considered that Article 1 (5) on the Romanian State, Article 20 on international human rights treaties, Article 21 on free access to justice, Article 53 on restricting the exercise of rights or freedoms , as well as the provisions of Articles 6 and 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, concerning the right to a fair trial and the right to respect for private and family life.

As a first conclusion, the Court has held that the phrase "or other specialized bodies of the state" is lacking in clarity, precision and predictability, as it does not allow the identification of those competent authorities to carry out measures with a high degree of intrusion into the privacy of individuals.

Also, the lack of clear, precise regulation would lead, in the Court's view, to an abusive violation of some of the essential fundamental rights in a state of law: intimate, family and private life and the secrecy of correspondence.

2.5. DECISION[16] no. 336/2018 concerning the rejection of the unconstitutionality exception of the provisions of Article 231 (2) with reference to Article 229 (1) lit. b) and d) and para. (2) lit. b) the second sentence of the Criminal Code, published in M.Of. of Romania, in force since 6 September 2018

By the Conclusion of June 1, 2016, pronounced in File no. 3.319 / 328/2015, the Turda District Court notified the Constitutional Court, except for the unconstitutionality of the provisions of Article 231 paragrapf (2) with reference to Article 229 (1) letter b) and d) and paragrapf (2) letter b) second sentence of the Criminal Code.

The exception was invoked by the public prosecutor in the case of concerning criminal liability for committing the offense of qualified theft, an offense under Article 228 paragraph (1) in relation to Article 229 (1) letter b) and d) of the Criminal Code.

The prosecutor requested the change of legal classification - by retaining and the provisions of Article 229 paragraph (2) letter b) of the Criminal Code, in the sense that the act was also committed by violation of the professional headquarters of the injured person. In the case, one of the defendants reconciled himself with the injured person.

In justifying the objection of unconstitutionality, the prosecutor, as the author of the exception, claims in essence that the provisions of Article 231 (2) of the Criminal Code, which establishes the possibility that the reconciliation, which removes the criminal responsibility, also intervenes in the case of theft theft crimes under Article 229 paragraph (1) letter b) and d) and paragraph (2) letter b) second sentence of the Criminal Code - serious crimes and with a very high impact on society - violates the constitutional provisions of Article 1 paragraph (3) on the rule of law, in which citizens' rights and freedoms and justice are the highest and guaranteed values of Article 26 on the intimate, family and private life of Article 27 (1) on inviolability of domicile, Article 44 (1) on the right of private property, Article 53 on the restriction of the exercise of certain rights or freedoms and Article 131 (1), according to which, "In the judicial activity, the Public Ministry represents the general interests of society and defends the rule of law, as well as citizens' rights and freedoms."

In paragraph 21 of the aforementioned decision, which has been called upon to adjudicate on the violation, inter alia, of Article 26 of the Constitution of Romania on Intimate, Family and Private Life, it leaves the legislator's appreciation of the measures necessary to protect the social values invoked by to the author of the exception of unconstitutionality.

It also reminds the Constitutional Court in the same paragraph that the criminal policy of a state is not its attribute, which is a priority of the lawyer according to priorities, opportunity, frequency of violations, gravity and consequences of antisocial acts.

[15] Official Gazette of Romania no. 190 of 14 March 2016
[16] Text published in the Official Gazette of Romania, in force since September 6, 2018

2.6. DECISION[17] No 498 of 17 July 2018 on the unconstitutionality of the provisions of Article 30 (2) and (3) and the phrase "the system of electronic patient patient file" in Article 280 (2) of the Law no.95 / 2006 on health reform

The texts invoked in support of the objection of unconstitutionality were Article 1 (5) on the quality of law, Article 26 on intimate, family and private life, and Article 53 on the restriction of the exercise of fundamental rights and freedoms in the Constitution of Romania, as well as Article 8 The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, concerning the right to respect for private and family life.

This exception was raised directly by the People's Advocate, arguing that in the matter of healthcare provision, the legal regulation must not contravene the fundamental rights provided by article 26 of the Constitution, according to which the public authorities are obliged to respect and protect the intimate, family and private life .

In the opinion of the author of the objection of unconstitutionality, the regulation contained in Article 280 paragraph (2) of Law no. 95/2006 on healthcare reform is of a general nature, without any guarantee of confidentiality of personal data of medical nature, contained in electronic health records.

The views expressed in public space by physicians 'and patients' associations have also been invoked, meaning that the implementation of the electronic health records could seriously violate the intimate, family and private lives of patients, through the possibility of disclosing personal data of a medical nature public.

Even the Constitutional Court in its previous jurisdiction has established that, in order to ensure respect for privacy and the confidentiality of medical data, it is necessary to limit the access of persons to such data (see, in this regard, Decision[18] No 17 of 21 January 2015 and Decision[19] No.440 of 8 July 2014.)

Referring to the violation of the individual's right to privacy, the Constitutional Court considered the personal data and the processing of this information, recalling, inter alia, the case[20] of 4 May 2000 in Rotaru v. Romania, paragraph 43.

The Court recalls a series of judgments handed down by the European Court of Human Rights in the area of patient healthcare protection as follows: (Judgment of 17 July 2008 in Case I v. Finland, paragraph 36) [Judgment of 17 January 2012 in Varapnickaitė-Mažylienė v. Lithuania[21], paragraph 41) (Judgment of 17 July 2008 in Case I v. Finland, paragraph 37) (case of 17 July 2008 in Case C- Finland, paragraph 38) (Judgment of 17 July 2008 in Case I v Finland, paragraph 38, Judgment of 25 February 1997 in the case of Z. v. Finland, paragraph 95, or Judgment of 10 October 2006, pronounced in the LL case against France, par.44]. (Judgment of 6 June 2013 in Avilkina and Others v. Russia, paragraph 45) (Judgment of 25 February 1997 in the case of Z. v. Finland, paragraph 95).

All the arguments that we find in this decision are based on a comparative analysis of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights on the violation of Article 8 of the Convention, concluding that the disclosure of medical data can seriously affect the person's family and private life, such as and its social and employment situation by exposing it to public atrocities and the risk of ostracization (Judgment of 17 January 2012 in Varapnickaitė-Mažylienė v. Lithuania, paragraph 44, or the judgment of 6 June 2013 in Avilkina and others against Russia, p.45][22]

Paragraph 42 of the decision concludes with regard to the issue at stake in the debate, meaning that "if the State has established by law a measure in the application of the right to the protection of the health of a person, it is also incumbent on it to protect and guarantee the confidentiality of information medical treatment, through a normative act of the same level, respectively by law. ,, Moreover, the Court uses the syntagm of the legislator's silence, in other words, it speaks of a passivity in ensuring minimum guarantees that the right to intimate, family or private life is respected.

In the Court's view, the introduction of electronic health records is only an interference of the state in the intimate, family and private life of the individual.

Such a lack of concern to ensure minimum leverage can not be overlooked by arguments such as the existence of a constitutional obligation to protect the health of the individual, because its accomplishment must not violate other rights, as laid down in the Constitution.

It was therefore found that although the legal interference in the law provided for in Article 26 of the Constitution may have a legitimate purpose (protecting the health of a person by ordering his medical history and holding it by a state authority), it is appropriate and necessary for the purpose does not maintain a fair balance between competing interests, namely the public interest in public health, the interest of the person in protecting his or her health, and the interest of the person in protecting his private, family and private life.

[17] Published in the Official Gazette no. 650 of July 26, 2018
[18] Text published in the Official Gazette. of Romania, in force since January 30, 2015
[19] Text published in the Official Gazette of Romania, in force since September 4, 2014
[20] Text published in the Official Gazette. of Romania, in force since 11 January 2001
[21] http://health-rights.org/index.php/cop/item/case-of-varapnickait%C4%97-ma%C5%BEylien%C4%97-v-lithuania-2012
[22] https://www.globalhealthrights.org/health-topics/hospitals/avilkina-and-others-v-russia/

2.7. DECISION[23] no.91 of 28 February 2018 on the objection of unconstitutionality of the provisions of article 3, article 10, article 11, paragraph 1, letter d) and article 13 of the Law no.51 / 1991 on the national security of Romania, as well as the provisions of article 13 from Law no.51 / 1991 on the national security of Romania, in the form prior to the amendment by the Law no.255 / 2013 for the implementation of the Law no. 135/2010 on the Criminal Procedure Code and for the modification and completion of some normative acts containing provisions criminal proceedings

The subject of the exception of unconstitutionality constituted the provisions of Articles 3, 10, 11 and 13 of Law no. 51/1991 on the national security of Romania, in the form before the amendment by Law no. 255/2013, as well as the provisions of Article 13 of the same normative act, in the form in force at the time of notification to the Constitutional Court.

It was argued that the texts of the abovementioned articles contradict the constitutional provisions contained in Article 1 paragraph (5), according to which, in Romania, compliance with the Constitution, its supremacy and the law is mandatory, Article 21 paragraph (3), according to which the parties right to a fair trial and the settlement of cases within a reasonable time, Article 26 on intimate, family and private life, Article 28 on the confidentiality of correspondence, and Article 53 on the restriction of the exercise of rights or freedoms.

This decision is relevant from the point of view of the Court's analysis of the phrase "seriously undermining the rights and fundamental freedoms of Romanian citizens" in Article 3 let f) of Law no 51/1991.

In paragraph 79 of the Decision, the Constitutional Court recalls the Joint Opinion of the Venice Commission and the Human Rights Directorate, citing a passage that we consider relevant and exposing it exactly: "In the Law on the Functioning of the Service, the mandate given to this Service by Article 7 requires defending against actions that "violate the constitutional rights and freedoms of citizens and endanger the state" and against attacks against senior officials, etc. Undoubtedly, both situations can be considered to be clear criminal matters and not just a legitimate aim to protect national security. Therefore, their use in these cases, with no specific safeguards for criminal investigations and trials, can be justified only if the phrase "and jeopardizes the state" is read literally in the sense that only when the threat affects democratic order, in other words, when it is sufficiently concrete and serious that it becomes a matter that can come to the attention of the Service. For example, the Swedish Security Police mandate includes investigating attacks and threats directed against the high dignitaries (when they affect democratic order), as well as actions that undermine the exercise of constitutional rights of citizens. This latter function has the relatively narrow meaning of investigating the activities of organized extremist groups that are hostile to certain groups of citizens or residents, for example of a certain ethnic origin "[Opinion No. 756 of 2 April 2014, paragraph 27, CDL-AD (2014) 009].

In essence, in analyzing the provisions criticized by the author of the objection of unconstitutionality, the Court has held that the lack of clear rules providing information on the circumstances and conditions under which national security authorities are empowered to resort to the technical supervision measure is violation of fundamental rights, essential in a state governed by the rule of law, concerning intimate, family and private life and the secrecy of correspondence.

Thus, the phrase "seriously undermines the fundamental rights and freedoms of Romanian citizens" contained in article 3, letter f) of Law no. 51/1991 on Romania's national security violates the constitutional provisions contained in article 1 paragraph (5) which enshrines the principle of legality , Article 26 on private life and Article 53 governing the conditions for the restriction of the exercise of certain rights or freedoms.

2.8. DECISION[24] No 534 of 18 July 2018 on the objection of unconstitutionality of the provisions of Article 277 (2) and (4) of the Civil Code

The subject of the exception of unconstitutionality was the provisions of Article 277 (2) and (4) of the Civil Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.409 of 10 June 2011, according to which:

"(2) Marriages between persons of the same sex concluded or contracted abroad either by Romanian citizens or by foreign citizens are not recognized in Romania. [...]

(4) The legal provisions regarding the free movement on the territory of Romania of the citizens of the Member States of the European Union and the European Economic Area remain applicable "and, in the author's opinion, these texts represent a violation of the right to intimate, family and private life, the criterion of sexual orientation.

By doing a comparative analysis, the Constitutional Court lists the states that have adapted their legislation so that they can provide effective protection of the right to intimate, family and private life as regards homosexual couples.

It reminds the Court that thirteen Member States of the European Union recognized same-sex marriage: the Kingdom of the Netherlands, the Kingdom of Belgium, the Kingdom of Spain, the Kingdom of Sweden, the Portuguese Republic, the Kingdom of Denmark, the French Republic, the United Kingdom of

[23] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 348 of April 20, 2018
[24] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania. no. 842 of 3 October 2018

Great Britain and Northern Ireland The United Kingdom (with the exception of Northern Ireland), the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, Ireland, the Republic of Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany and the Republic of Malta and Austria, which by the Austrian Constitutional Court of 4 December 2017 (G 258-259 / 2017-9) the provisions of the Civil Code limiting the right to marriage to heterosexual couples, and furthermore stated that without the intervention of the legislator before that date, same-sex marriage would be possible from 1 January 2019.

In the Czech Republic, the Republic of Estonia, the Hellenic Republic, the Republic of Croatia, the Italian Republic, the Republic of Cyprus, Hungary, the Republic of Austria and the Republic of Slovenia, there is the notion of registered partnership or civil partnership for homosexual couples, which, although distinct from marriage, recognizes, however, a series of rights similar to those derived from the marriage between a man and a woman.

States such as Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, Argentina, Uruguay or Brazil authorize same-sex marriage by law, and others, through Mexican judgments (Supreme Court Supreme Court ruling No. 155/2015 June 3, 2015), the United States[25] (Supreme Court ruling of June 26, 2015, "Obergefell et al. Hodges, Director, Ohio Department of Health, et al., 576 U.S. (2015), Colombia (Constitutional Court judgment SU-214/16 of 28 April 2016, Case T 4167863 AC) Taiwan[26] (judgment of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of China (Taiwan) of 24 May 2017, J.Y. Interpretation N ° 748, on Consolidated Claims of Huei-Tai-12674 and Huei-Tai-12771].

It is important that the comparative analysis which the Court made in the decision, because it led to the suspension of the judgment and to the lodging of a request to the Court of Justice of the European Union for a preliminary ruling on the following questions :

'(1)' Husband 'in Article 2 (2) (a) of Directive 2004/38, in conjunction with Articles 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter, includes the same-sex spouse of a non- , of a European citizen with whom the citizen has legally married under the law of a Member State other than the host State?

2. If the answer to the first question is in the affirmative, Articles 3 (1) and 7 (2) (3) of Directive 2004/38, read in conjunction with Articles 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter, require the Member State host country to grant a residence permit in its territory for more than 3 months to a same-sex spouse of a European citizen?

3. If the answer to the first question is in the negative, the same-sex spouse from a non-Member State of a European citizen with whom the citizen has legally married under the law of a Member State other than the host State may be 'any other family member ...' within the meaning of Article 3 (2) (a) of Directive 2004/38 or 'the partner with whom the Union citizen has a duly substantiated, lasting relationship' within the meaning of Article 3 (2) (b) of Directive 2004/38, with the host State's correlative obligation to facilitate entry and stay, even if the host State does not recognize same-sex marriages or provides for any alternative form of recognition legal partnerships such as registered partnerships?

4. If the answer to the third question is in the affirmative, then Articles 3 (2) and 7 (2) of Directive 2004/38, read in conjunction with Articles 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter, require the host Member State grant the right to reside in its territory for more than three months to a same-sex spouse of a European citizen? "

The reasons justifying this move were that Romania, together with the Republic of Bulgaria, the Republic of Latvia, the Republic of Lithuania, the Republic of Poland and the Slovak Republic, are the only Member States of the European Union which do not offer any form of formal and legal recognition of the established couple relationships between the same sex.

By Judgment of 5 June 2018 in Case[27] C-673/16, the Court of Justice of the European Union (Grand Chamber) answered in the affirmative the first two questions.

Relevant is paragraph 36 of the judgment, according to which a Member State can not rely on its national law to oppose the recognition on its territory, solely for the purposes of granting a right of residence to a third-country national, of the marriage entered into by a citizen of the same sex in another Member State in accordance with the law of the latter State.

It has thus been established that the relationship of a same-sex couple is circumscribed to the notion of "private life" and "family life", with no distinction as to the relationships established between persons of different sex .

In those circumstances, the State is bound to ensure the protection of both categories of relations by virtue of respect for the fundamental right to private and family life guaranteed by Article 7 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union by Article 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Freedoms Fundamental and Article 26 of the Romanian Constitution (paragraph 41).

3. Conclusions

This article aimed to draw attention to the relevant decisions of the Constitutional Court of Romania regarding the right to privacy, the evolution of its approach in the case law of the Court, and the need to bring the legislation subject to constitutional review into conformity with the Court's rulings.

[25] https://supreme.justia.com/cases/federal/us/576/14-556

[26] http://www.loc.gov/law/foreign-news/article/taiwan-constitutional-court-rules-same-sex-marriage-prohibition-unconstitutional/

[27] http://curia.europa.eu/juris/liste.jsf?num=C-673/16

Regarding the jurisprudence of the Court so far, we can note that, in its decisions, the Court has often replaced the passivity of the legislature or the parliament's refusal to regulate in accordance with the fundamental principles found in the international treaties Romania adhered to, increased attention to the necessity to comply with the Romanian legislation with the European one.

Not long ago, the Constitutional Court had to respond to challenges that generated social, sometimes institutional, discontent, but it is precisely its role - to restore the balance and supremacy of the Constitution by reconciling the law with the fundamental law.

The border between law and politics is a fragile one, and here the role of the Constitutional Court intervenes through actions designed to defeat any attempt to distort the purpose of a law so as to remind the lawmaker that its role is to pass laws respecting fundamental rights of citizens.

References

- http://www.un.org/en/universal-declaration-human-rights/
- Susan E. Gallagher, Introduction to "The Right to Privacy" by Louis D. Brandeis and Samuel Warren: A Digital Critical Edition, University of Massachusetts Press, forthcoming.
- Warren & Brandeis, paragraph 1
- article 75 Civil Code Limits: (1) Do not violate the rights set out in this section, which are permitted by law or international human rights conventions and pacts to which Romania is a party. (2) The exercise of constitutional rights and freedoms in good faith and in compliance with the international covenants and conventions to which Romania is a party shall not constitute a violation of the rights provided for in this section.
- Official Gazette of Romania, in force since November 23, 2009
- Official Gazette of Romania, in force since September 4, 2014
- Official Gazette of Romania, in force since November 23, 2009
- https://eur-lex.europa.eu/eli/dir/2006/24/oj
- https://www.ccr.ro/noutati/COMUNICAT-DE-PRES-106, 18.09.2014
- http://unbr.ro/wp-content/uploads/2014/04/CP140054EN.pdf
- https://www.ccr.ro/noutati/COMUNICAT-DE-PRES-106
- Official Gazette no. 857/2016 - M. Of. 857/27 October 2016
- http://www.cdep.ro/proiecte/2017/100/20/7/pl34.pdf
- https://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_RON.pdf
- Repertoriul de jurisprudență 2008 I-01757, https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/?qid=1553454942837&uri=CELEX:62006CJ0267
- Cauza C-147/08, Repertoriul de jurisprudență 2011 I-03591, https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/?uri=CELEX:62008CJ0147
- Official Gazette of Romania no. 190 of 14 March 2016
- Official Gazette of Romania, in force since September 6, 2018
- Official Gazette no. 650 of July 26, 2018
- Official Gazette. of Romania, in force since January 30, 2015
- Official Gazette of Romania, in force since September 4, 2014
- Official Gazette. of Romania, in force since 11 January 2001
- http://health-rights.org/index.php/cop/item/case-of-varapnickait%C4%97-ma%C5%BEylien%C4%97-v-lithuania-2012
- https://www.globalhealthrights.org/health-topics/hospitals/avilkina-and-others-v-russia/
- Official Gazette of Romania no. 348 of April 20, 2018
- Official Gazette of Romania. no. 842 of 3 October 2018
- https://supreme.justia.com/cases/federal/us/576/14-556
- http://www.loc.gov/law/foreign-news/article/taiwan-constitutional-court-rules-same-sex-marriage-prohibition-unconstitutional/
- http://curia.europa.eu/juris/liste.jsf?num=C-673/16

STATE RESPONSIBILITY IN THE PREVENTION OF TORTURE AND INHUMAN AND DEGRADING TREATMENT

Laurenţia Florentina GĂIŞTEANU (ŞTEFAN)

Abstract

To produce intentional, systematic and cruel physical or mental suffering, acting on their own initiative or on the basis of order, in order to compel certain persons to confess or give information, was defined as torture.

To put a person in serious danger through actions, measures or treatments of any kind, affecting physical or mental condition is inhuman and degrading treatment.

The European Convention on Human Rights stated, with the overriding value, by the provisions of Article 3 that: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment", imposing, by the provisions of the article, the obligations of the state authorities not to apply no form of suffering or inhuman treatment of persons under their jurisdiction, and the obligation to protect the physical and mental integrity of such persons.

On 9 October 1990, by promulgating Law No.19, Romania adheres to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, and has thus established a mechanism for the prevention of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment.

The establishment of independent internal mechanisms for the prevention of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment is an express requirement contained in Part V of the Optional Protocol to the Convention for the Prevention of Torture. The scope of the institutions in which the mechanisms for the prevention of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment are exercising is largely covering both the penitentiary system, the detention and preventive arrest centers, the medical-social institutions for the persons with mental disabilities and other units in which may engage in inhuman or degrading treatment.

Keywords: torture, inhuman and degrading treatment, Convention, mechanism

Introduction

Respect for fundamental human rights as well as the formation of a system to guarantee these rights has been, since antiquity, a problem debated by important historical personalities. Thus, in 1770, Hammurabi's Code regulated social relations and promoted rules of social justice and humanitarian spirit[1], and from the beginning of the period of Stoicism and that of Christianity, the teachings on the principle of equality between people were developed. These principles were tinted in the modern era, during the Enlightenment, when the first legal provisions on human rights were formulated and edited in documents such as the "Magna Charta Libertatum" (Great Book of Freedoms) where it was stated for the first time that neither a free man can not be imprisoned without being tried, or the "Law of Rights" voted by the British Parliament in 1689, which definitively laid the foundations of the constitutional monarchy in England, formulating for citizens a series of rights.[2]

An important step on the line of human rights assertion was represented by the United States Declaration of Independence, which associates liberation from British domination with a series of citizens' rights and freedoms, underlining that "all people have have been created equal, are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights, and among them are life, freedom and the pursuit of happiness. The Declaration constituted the fundamental act underlying the elaboration of the Constitution of the United States of America in 1787, which is maintained, with some modifications occurring along the way, and at present[3].

The first European constitution based on democratic principles was the Polish Constitution of 3 May 1791 and introduced equality of political rights between townspeople and nobility, placing peasants under the protection of the government and alleviating the worst abuses against the serfs[4]. Until the Second World War, the constitutions of most states with democratic regimes contained extensive human rights provisions, but the tragedy of millions of victims during the Second World War revealed, among other things, that the great mid-century conflagration The XX has been unleashed precisely because the fundamental rights and freedoms of man and peoples have not been respected[5].

The stories of World War II have highlighted the need for global provisions to ensure the safeguarding of

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: laurentiastefan@yahoo.com)

[1] I.MoroianuZlatescu, R.Demetrescu, From the History of Human Rights, Romanian Institute for Human Rights, Bucharest, 2003, p.5;

[2] http://www.scritub.com/stiinta/stiinte-politice/Drepturile-fundamentale-ale-om92277.php

[3] Ibidem 2

[4] https://ro.wikipedia.org/wiki/Constitu%C8%9Bia_de_la_3_mai_1791

[5] I.MoroianuZlatescu, R.Demetrescu, From the History of Human Rights, Romanian Institute for Human Rights, Bucharest, 2003, p.5;

human rights. Thus, on December 10, 1948, the United Nations considered that "ignoring and despising human rights led to acts of barbarism that revolted the conscience of mankind, proclaiming the" Universal Declaration of Human Rights, "specifying in the preamble of the act that this statement is a "common ideal to which all peoples and nations must strive, so that all persons and all organs of society strive, having this permanent statement in mind, to develop respect for these rights and freedoms through education and education, and to ensure, through national and international progressive measures, their universal and effective recognition and application both within the peoples of the Member States and those of the territories under their jurisdiction[6].

Starting from the provisions of Article 1 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which states that "all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and must act one another in the spirit of fraternity, "and corroborating Article 5 of the same statement that" no one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment degrading, we show that the recognition of equal and inalienable rights is the foundation of freedom and justice and assures the inherent dignity of the human person.

Also, by defining the notions of torture, inhuman and degrading treatment, the mode of violation of inalienable rights is reversed. To produce intentional, systematic and cruel physical or mental suffering, acting on their own initiative or on the basis of order, in order to compel certain persons to confess or give information, was defined as torture. This definition is also found in the Tokyo Tokyo Declaration on Torture and Degrading Treatment in 1975, developed by the World Medical Association, a declaration to which Romania has joined and is currently a party, and putting a person in serious danger through action, treatments of any kind, affecting physical or mental condition, are inhuman and degrading treatment.

From the perspective of human rights, the definition of "torture" involves four aspects:

- torture as a violation of human rights;
- torture as dehumanization, cruelty and degradation;
- prophylaxis of torture;
- the moral reward of the victim and her psychological recovery.[7]

The history of torture has its origins since antiquity when prisoner torture was a practice accepted and maintained by special methods and equipment, and these forms of torture have always had physical, mental and social consequences on the victims. For a period of time in the nineteenth century, torture has disappeared from Western Europe, as evidenced by Victor Hugo's speech at the International Peace Congress of August 21, 1849, when he said that "a day will come when the cannon is a piece of museum, such as the tools of torture today. And we will wonder that these things have ever existed! "But the twentieth century was the culmination of the ways of physical and mental torture.

As a result of these issues, in 1950, the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms stated, with imperative value, by the provisions of Article 3 that: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" .

Definitions of the concepts in Article 3 of the European Convention have been made by jurisprudence. In the case of Ireland v. The United Kingdom (1978), the Court differentiated the three basic notions of Article 3 by the degree of severity of treatments or punishments:

a) torture: intentional inhuman treatment that causes very serious and very cruel suffering; the three main elements of torture are, therefore, the intensity of suffering, intent and purpose.
b) inhuman treatment or punishment: the application of intense, physical or mental suffering.
c) degrading treatment: treatment that creates a feeling of fear, restlessness and inferiority to the victim, which humiliates, degrades and eventually breaks his physical or moral resistance. Degrading treatment considers those grave human dignity, proving to be capable of descending the social status of a person, its situation or reputation may be considered to constitute such treatment, within the meaning of Art. 3 of the Convention, if it reaches a certain degree of severity.[8]

In ECHR case law, Article 3 is particularly applicable in cases considered inhumane, such as the situation of excessive police procedures in the event of arrest or interrogation, failure to ensure detention conditions, overcrowding of penitentiaries, failure to provide adequate medical care for private individuals the situation of degrading conditions in the case of hospitalization of mental health patients in psychiatric services, extradition or deportation to a country that does not guarantee the assurance of respect for human rights etc.

Thus, the provisions of the article also imposed the obligations of the state authorities not to apply any form of inhuman or degrading treatment to persons under their jurisdiction and the obligation to protect the physical and mental integrity of such persons.

Also, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the UN Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (known under the English acronym CAT -

[6] Preamble to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights

[7] Ruxandra Cesereanu, Panopticum Essay on Torture in the 20th Century, 2014, Polirom Publishing House, 2nd Edition, Introduction

[8] Cruceanu Andreea – Simona, Prohibition of torture and ill-treatment in terms of subjection to medical treatment, pg. 2 – 3, footnote note 2 op.cit. Corneliu Bârsan, The European Convention on Human Rights. Comment on articles. Ediţia a II-a, Editura C.H.Beck, Bucureşti, 2010, pag. 32 , https:/www.avocatnet.ro

Convention Against Torture) or the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture of the Council of Europe are the most known norms and, at the same time, mandatory for the states that have ratified them. A number of other documents, such as the Beijing Rules (detention regime, mainly for minors), or the Istanbul Protocol with Practical Guides for Doctors and Legal Practitioners, the Minimum Basic Rules in Prisons in the UN version and the The Council of Europe and many others that should be applied by all democratic states or self-defining as such. Besides, there are a lot of studies, textbooks, reports, etc. in the field, drawn up by national and international human rights organizations or by independent experts.[9]

The European Court of Human Rights has the role of supreme protector of human rights norms in Europe. However, the European system of human rights is based on the expectation that Member States will provide the first line of defense. In particular, the national courts are expected to reflect ECHR jurisprudence in their day-to-day practice. This suggests a constructive interaction of national legal systems with the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. Thus, the focus is clearly and firmly on the national implementation of human rights guarantees. [10]

In this context, each State that has adhered to these norms has been required to put in place legislative, administrative or other necessary and effective measures to prevent acts of torture or other inhuman or degrading treatment.

The responsibility of the Romanian state for the prevention of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment was materialized by the following measures:

A. Legislative measures

On 9 October 1990, by promulgating Law No 19, Romania adhered to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and thus has the first legislative measures to establish a mechanism for the prevention of torture and inhuman treatment and degrading.

In the same context, by the adoption of the Constitution of Romania, on 21 November 1991, Chapter II - Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, Article 22 - Right to life and physical and mental integrity, paragraph (2), the provisions of Art. 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

Also, in order to express the obligation of the Romanian state to protect people from any act of torture, inhuman or degrading treatment, the domestic criminal law provides for and sanctions these acts as criminal offenses.

According to the provisions of Law no.286 / 2009 on the Criminal Code, torture is found in art. 282 and is considered by the legislator as a crime against justice, and not as a crime against the person as we would have believed, given that at international level torture is a violation of human rights, being a direct act of the person's physical and mental integrity. In this context, this classification suggests that the main subject of protection is in the proper administration and implementation of justice. Even if history shows that, over time, acts of torture have been committed, most often, in order to obtain information or statements during the exercise of state authority, in the current form of the classification of the legal provision in the Criminal Code, we consider that the protective purpose against the practice of torture is reduced only to the assertion of justice, which would be a restrictive approach to the spirit and nature of the prohibition of torture stipulated in international rights,

The objective aspect of the torture offense referred to in paragraph (1) of Article 282 of the Criminal Code is manifested by the offense of a civil servant who performs a function involving the exercise of authority or other person acting upon his instigation or with his express or tacit consent, , which results in a strong physical and mental suffering to a person. The term "deed" has a general meaning, including any activity or omission that is likely to cause severe physical pain or mental suffering, which may result in the death of the person, and is deemed consumed from the time of their occurrence. Incriminating torture is punishable by imprisonment and the ban on the exercise of certain rights.

As regards the state's responsibility for sanctioning inhuman and degrading treatment, the Romanian criminal law has criminalized these actions under the name of ill-treatment, the provisions of which are found in Article 288 of the Penal Code. The contents of this article bring together acts that affect the work of justice, preventing the pursuit of the purpose of safety or educational measures and of deprivation of liberty.

The aggravating variant of the offense of subjection to ill-treatment, provided for in paragraph (2) of Article 281, is formulated under the influence of the provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights and has the following content:

"(2) The subjection to degrading or inhuman treatment of a person in detention, possession or execution of a security or educational measure, depriving of liberty, shall be punished by imprisonment from one to five years and the prohibition of the exercise of the right of to hold a public office. "

Taking into account that the provisions of art. 281 Penal Code are aspects requiring the correct execution of criminal law sanctions measures, the legislator addressed these obligations both in the Law no.253 / 2013 on the execution of punishments, educational measures and other non - Freedom by the judicial bodies in the course of criminal proceedings, art. 7 paragraph (2), which states that the execution of punishments, educational measures and other measures ordered by the judicial bodies can not involve the application of inhuman or degrading treatment, No.254 / 2013 on the execution of sentences and detention measures ordered by the judiciary in the criminal proceedings, where, under Article 5, imperative, it is forbidden to obey any person in the execution of a sentence or a measure depriving himself of liberty torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or other ill-treatment.

[9] https://andreivocila.wordpress.com/2011/01/30/prevenirea-torturii-si-a-pedepselor-sau-tratamentelor-inumane-sau-degradante-2/accesat în 18.03.2019

[10] Jim Murdoch Vaclav Jiricka, Penitentiary System Manual on Prevention ill-treatment in penitentiaries, combating ill-treatment in penitentiaries, Cover and Format: SPDP, Council of Europe, page 11 https://rm.coe.int/2

B. Administrative measures to prevent torture, inhuman or degrading treatment

The daily improvement of the protection of human rights is one of the fundamental tasks of the Council of Europe. To this end, he has set four main lines of action:

- establishment of effective control and protection systems for fundamental rights and freedoms;
- identifying new threats to human rights and human dignity;
- raise public awareness of the importance of human rights;
- promoting education and training in the field of human rights[11].

The European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CPT) is set up at European level in 1987 to establish effective control and protection systems for fundamental rights and freedoms[12].

Following the European model, in order to monitor the promotion and respect of human rights, the Romanian State created an independent and autonomous institution, called the People's Advocate Institution, with the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of individuals in their relations with public authorities . The institution was established by Law no. 35/1997 on the organization and functioning of the People's Advocate Institution, and has been designated as the only national structure that fulfills the specific attributions of the National Mechanism for Torture Prevention in places of detention.

The field of prevention of torture in places of detention within the People's Advocate Institution resolves petitions addressed to the institution about torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in places of detention, and visits or inquiries to address these issues. In the prevention and monitoring of acts of torture or ill-treatment, the People's Advocate Institution cooperates with the representatives of NGOs, as the participation of representatives of non-governmental organizations is mandatory for the visits to the places of detention.

The People's Advocate presents reports to the Romanian Parliament annually or at his request, and part of these reports also refer to the field's activity to prevent torture in places of detention.

Also, the Ministry of Justice and the National Penitentiary Administration oversee the observance of the rights of the persons deprived of their liberty through the control structures (the Control Corps of the Minister of Justice and the Penitentiary Inspection Department) and check any activity that raises suspicions of the act of torture or bad treatments.

As has already been pointed out, in domestic criminal law, in the case of torture in the type variant, the guilt is the direct intention, but a subjective part is included outside the intent. In this context, in order to establish the existence of the torture offense, it must be committed for the purpose of obtaining information or statements or for the purpose of punishing the person for an act which he has committed or is suspected of committing or intimidating or to put pressure on it or on a ground based on any form of discrimination. If the deed is followed by the death of the victim, then the conditions of the aggravated variant are fulfilled, and in case of subjection to ill-treatment, their pursuit is only criminalized if the victim is in the state of restraint, detention or in the execution of a safety measure or educational deprivation of freedom. With such a case, which took the form of a crime of torture and other ill-treatment, faced the Romanian penitentiary system, in 2010, when 13 civil servants with special status of the Galati Penitentiary were sent to trial due to the eviction treatments for CS prisoner aged 36, who degenerated with the death of the victim on June 4, 2010. The person of liberty C.S. was in custody of the Galati Penitentiary on June 1, 2010, as a result of a term of execution of a three-year prison sentence for theft. When placed in a penitentiary, the medical assessment did not reveal acute medical conditions, but it was established that the person in question was known as a chronic alcohol consumer, for whom he had received medical care 1 year ago. On June 4, 2010, the National Penitentiary Administration announced that the person in custody died as a result of a delirium tremens due to sudden alcohol withdrawal, a syndrome that culminated in a cardio-respiratory arrest. At that time, apparently the person deprived of liberty did not show signs of bodily violence, had been washed and cared for, but the autopsy one day after death revealed that the person deprived of liberty had “straight C6-C11 fractures with anterolateral C7 - C9, retroperitoneal right haematoma and thoraco-abdominal trauma with hepatic crack and renal rupture “, medical certificate of death no. 293 / 05.06.2010 establishing that the person deprived of liberty died as a result of a cardiac arrest caused by the traumatic shocks he was subjected to.

[11] European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment - Convention text and Explanatory report, Series of European Treaties - 126. Amended text in accordance with the provisions of Protocol Nr. 1 (STE No. 151) and Nr. 2 (STE No 152) which entered into force on 1 March 2002

[12] Jim Murdoch Vaclav Jiricka, Penitentiary System Manual on Prevention ill-treatment in penitentiaries, combating ill-treatment in penitentiaries, Cover and Format: SPDP, Council of Europe, page 11 https://rm.coe.int/2

In this context, informing the National Administration of Penitentiaries and the criminal investigation bodies was immediate, but there were many unknowns about this negative event. Immediately the National Administration of Penitentiaries established a first control team to carry out the first checks at the Galati Penitentiary, which would identify that the person deprived of liberty had suffered several psychomotor agitation episodes for which he had been immobilized in bed with means of immobilization - handcuffs metal, and during this time he made his physiological needs in bed. At this first check from the National Penitentiary Administration, in collaboration with the criminal investigation authorities, it was argued that the detainee could have been beaten to death by the other detainees. However, the documents drawn up by the penitentiary, both operative and medical, gave rise to certain misinterpretations in the description of the event, which led to the creation of a new control team, of which he was also a member. For an uninterrupted period of two days, all the aspects that have been carried out were analyzed and all the attempts to cover up the employees of the Galati penitentiary were countered. The images recovered from the surveillance cameras also had a significant impact on the control team, and the moments when the detainee was handcuffed and lengthened on the detention facility's lobby were punched and legged by penitentiary employees and dragged along the length of the hall, while the hitting of the employees continued.

Following this event, the National Penitentiary Administration has stepped up its training and awareness actions on the obligation to respect a person's physical and mental integrity, irrespective of their status or judicial status.

Ensuring material conditions of detention

The constant development of jurisprudence regarding the treatment of detainees is directly attributable to the impact of CPT standards. The European Court of Human Rights states that the effects of prolonged exposure to degraded material conditions of detention may be such as to constitute ill-treatment or, alternatively, may exacerbate other forms of treatment or punishment so as to rely on Article 3 of the Convention. The CPT request is that each detainee has at least 4 m2 of personal space in cells for multiple accommodation, this being the minimum standard. The standardization provided by the CPT, which has been driven by concerns not only to prevent ill-treatment but also to combat the psychological effects of imprisonment, has directly prompted the European Court of Human Rights to adopt a firmer approach to detention conditions. Thus, it is to be expected that the state authorities will ensure that the detainee's detention under conditions that are "compatible with respect for his human dignity, that the manner and method of execution of the measure do not subject him to an attempt or suffering of an intensity exceeding the inevitable level of suffering inherent in detention and that, given the practical requirements of incarceration, and that his or her health and well-being are adequately ensured, in particular by providing the necessary medical assistance."[13]

In this context, ensuring the conditions of detention is another responsibility of the Romanian state against the application of ill-treatment and one of the main preventive actions is the reduction of overcrowding in penitentiaries.

Combating overcrowding in penitentiaries

The first cases of convictions in the European Court of Human Rights against the Romanian state were recorded in 1998. In July 2012, a ruling was made in the case of Iacov Stanciu, where the ECHR noted that, despite the efforts of the Romanian authorities to improve the situation conditions of detention, there is a structural problem in this area. The decisive element in this context was the pilot judgment of 25 April 2017 in Rezmiveş and Others v. Romania, whereby the Court requested the Romanian State to provide within a period of 6 months from the date of the final judgment of the decision to provide a calendar precisely for the implementation of appropriate general measures to address the problem of overcrowding and inadequate detention conditions, in accordance with the principles of the Convention.[14]

As a result of these issues, new legislative measures have been developed to impose the standardization of detention facilities in line with international recommendations and in particular those of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. By the Order of the Minister of Justice no. 2772/C/17 October 2017 were approved the mandatory minimum standards regarding the conditions of accommodation of persons deprived of their liberty, stipulating in Article 1, paragraph (1) of the Annex to the norms, that the spaces intended to accommodate persons deprived of their liberty must respect human dignity and meet minimum sanitary and hygienic standards and, in accordance with paragraph (3), the accommodation rooms shall be arranged (...) for the purpose of allocating more than 4 spaces m2 for each person deprived of liberty". The National Penitentiary Administration permanently monitors the number of persons deprived of their liberty in each subordinate unit in terms of accommodation capacity (calculated at 4m2, 6m2 and 7m2 depending on the specifics of the place of detention), the number of beds installed and the occupancy index.

Therefore, the new legal provisions require minimal detention conditions. Also, the entry into force of Law no. 169/2017 by establishing a compensatory mechanism for the benefit of detainees consisting of 6 days deemed to have been executed for a period of 30 days in custody in detention facilities was an acceleration in order to implement the measures taken at at the national level, in the wider context of the Memorandum on the "Approval of the 2018-2024 timetable for the resolution of overcrowding and detention conditions in the execution of the judgment in Rezmiveș and Others v. Romania, delivered by the ECHR on 25 April 2017".[15]

[13] Jim Murdoch Vaclav Jiricka, Penitentiary System Manual on Preventionill-treatment in penitentiaries, combating ill-treatment in penitentiaries, Cover and Format: SPDP, Council of Europe, pg.27 https://rm.coe.int/2

[14] National Administration of Penitentiaries, Annual Activity Report 2018, p.8

The entry into force of the Compensation Act directly influenced the evolution of the number of detainees detained by the penitentiary system. Thus, since the entry into force of the Law, there has been a steady decrease in the number of custodial detainees, with direct positive consequences on accommodation standards, the increase of the minimum individual space insured in the detention room, but also the easier access to the range of activities and programs available in the detention environment.[16]

Since 2017, other measures to reduce overcrowding have focused on increasing and modernizing accommodation capacity by investing in design services for the design of 2 new penitentiaries - the Berceni Penitentiary with 1000 seats and the Unguriu Penitentiary with 900 accommodation places, as well as on improving the material conditions of detention.

Providing medical assistance to persons deprived of their liberty

The provisions of Article 3 of the Convention prohibiting torture, punishment or inhuman or degrading treatment are closely linked to the protection of the right to life provided for in Article 2, implicitly by guaranteeing an adequate state of health.

Thus, medical care must be given to each detainee properly and failure to guarantee the physical integrity of a detainee by providing appropriate medical care can lead to a violation of Article 3 of the Convention. The essential point is that inappropriate healthcare can quickly generate situations that fall under Article 3, which prohibits "inhuman or degrading" treatment. A sudden deterioration in the health of a prisoner inevitably gives rise to problems related to the adequacy of health care, and state authorities will be obliged to respond to the treatment they apply to inmates. Thus, there is a need to ensure that a detainee's health is monitored on a regular basis not only at the time of receiving, but also throughout the discharge of deprivation measures.[17]

Concerning the provision of medical assistance in prisons, the following principles are closely monitored by the CPT:

a) Access to doctors;
b) Equivalence of medical assistance from the penitentiary to the public health system;
c) Patient Consent and Privacy;
d) Preventive health care (hygiene, communicable diseases, prevention of suicide and violence, social and family ties);
e) Humanitarian medical assistance (vulnerable: mother and child, adolescents, pathological personalities, serious conditions / disease terminals);
f) Professional independence of medical staff;
g) Professional competence

In this respect, Romania's intention to improve the medical assistance of persons deprived of their liberty has materialized through the organization of their own health care network for the provision of medical assistance to detainees, under the coordination of the National Administration of Penitentiaries. The sanitary network of the National Penitentiary Administration serves the entire penitentiary population on the territory of Romania in order to maintain, improve health, and has subordinate family medicine cabinets, dental clinics and 6 hospital penitentiaries.

The medical staff in the facilities shall ensure that the persons deprived of their liberty are protected in case of aggression, so any traumatic bodily injury found in the medical examination of the detainees (especially as a result of violent incidents in the penitentiary, but also in other situations where integrity is affected body of detainees) is duly documented, with three key points being pursued:

a) recording as accurate as possible of objective findings regarding traumatic lesions (number, type, anatomical location, shape, color, dimensions, etc.);
b) recording the detainee's statements about the circumstances and how to produce the traumatic bodily injuries found (whether or not he / she declares in writing how the injuries have occurred, the medical establishment that he / she has found is obliged to summarize - under his / her signature - the detainee stated in his presence), and in the case of a refusal to declare or an inability to speak, a record of the fact that the person refuses / does not wish to declare the origin of the traumatic injuries is drawn up;
c) The examining physician distinctly records his conclusions on the compatibility of the objectively ascertained with the detainee's statements (ie, if the injuries are consistent with, or consistent with, those declared; However, this conclusion of the examination is by no means a finding forensic medicine on the cause or origin of injuries in terms of a causal relationship, but expresses only the opinion of the examining physician on the findings made - namely the extent to which the physician perceives or not a discrepancy between the declared and the established ones, thus a possible tendency to dissimulate the reality of the facts), the confirmation of these injuries is done by presenting the detainee to legal medicine;

[15] National Administration of Penitentiaries, Annual Activity Report 2018, p.3
[16] National Administration of Penitentiaries, Annual Activity Report 2018, p.10
[17] Jim Murdoch Vaclav Jiricka, Penitentiary System Manual on Prevention ill-treatment in penitentiaries, combating ill-treatment in penitentiaries, Cover and Format: SPDP, Council of Europe, pg.33 https://rm.coe.int/2

Both the traumatic lesions identified during the examination of the newly detained detainees and those found after the violent incidents with aggression in the penitentiary are recorded chronologically in a unique register called the "Traumatic injuries register", and each position (current number) in the Register of traumatic injuries corresponds to an information note detailing the lesions found by both a morphological description and an annex containing their topographic representation on predefined topographic anatomical sketches such as those set out in the Istanbul Protocol and the Minnesota Protocol . This Information Note contains the medical information which, in conjunction with information on the circumstances of the occurrence of the event, serves the penitentiary unit when drawing up the immediate notification of the facts, to the territorial unit of the prosecutor's office and informing the judge of the deprivation of liberty about the incident with traces of violence body.

The CPT's recommendation is that there is a positive trust-based relationship between the treating physician and the patient as an essential factor in keeping and promoting the health and well-being of detainees.

According to the ECHR jurisprudence of recent years, the vulnerability of the Romanian state in the provision of medical assistance in the penitentiary system was due to the shortage of specialists employed in the penitentiary system, especially the psychiatrists, the non-dental care and the dental prostheses required for the detainees with dental conditions.

Responsibilities in case of violence among detainees

Along with the negative obligation of essentially not applying ill-treatment or causing the death of a person, the ECHR imposes significant positive obligations on state authorities. These obligations are especially important for penitentiary employees. The basic prerequisite is that detainees are in a vulnerable position precisely because they are in prison and thus state authorities have to counterbalance this vulnerability by adopting effective measures to protect them. This is particularly important in terms of violence among detainees. Penitentiary employees must ensure adequate protection against other detainees known to pose a threat to their offenders.[18]

This aspect has been materialized at the level of the penitentiary system in Romania, starting with 2014, through the implementation of a Strategy for the reduction of aggressive behaviors in the penitentiary environment, consisting mainly of the creation of multidisciplinary teams (medical staff at the level of each penitentiary unit) , psychologist, operative staff) who analyze all the aggressive behavior of the individuals to be released, interfering and counseling the persons deprived of their liberty. Annually, data on adverse events is analyzed from a multidisciplinary perspective and at the level of the National Penitentiary Administration in order to establish necessary adjustments for the measures to be integrated into the Annual Implementation Plan.

Immobilization of detainees

The mode of immobilization of detainees was another issue debated in ECHR judgments against the Romanian state as ill-treatment of detainees. The ECHR convictions in these cases have led to a new legislative approach, through the approval of the Order of the Minister of Justice no. 4800 / C / 2018 on the Regulation on the Safety of Detention Locations, normative act adapted to ECHR requirements and CPT recommendations. Thus, the description of the means of protection and immobilization used in stages, have been transposed as legal provisions in Article 12, paragraph (2), as follows:

"(2) In order to prevent escape during the movement of persons deprived of their liberty, in order to protect persons deprived of their liberty from self-destruction, as well as to prevent the injustice of others or the damage, or to restore order and discipline, as a result of the opposition or resistance of the detainees to a provision of the judicial bodies or the staff of the place of detention shall be used, under the conditions of art. 16 of the Law, as the means of protection and immobilization, the following:

a) metal handcuffs - a device made up of two metallic rings joined together, which applies to persons deprived of their liberty in accordance with the law, in order to limit their physical mobility;
b) Immobilisation belts - hand-made handcuffs fitted with a gripping system around the waist, which applies to persons deprived of their liberty who, by their behavior, risk to disturb the order and safety of their activities while traveling to the judicial bodies, sanitary units from outside the penitentiary system or other places outside the place of detention, on the occasion of the transfer from one place of detention to another and for journeys within the place of detention, in duly justified cases;
c) Hand-held disposable handcuffs - Resistant plastic devices to restrict the physical mobility of the upper limbs. (...);
d) means of immobilization during the movement / transport - hand-held metal handcuffs and legs of metal legs, which allow movement and are applied to the persons deprived of their liberty, following the analysis of the risk situation for each of them. These means apply during travel to the judicial organs, sanitary facilities outside the penitentiary system, other places outside the detention facilities, as well as during the transfer from one place of detention to another, including for journeys inside the place of detention, in duly justified situations;

[18] Jim Murdoch Vaclav Jiricka, Penitentiary System Manual on Prevention ill-treatment in penitentiaries, combating ill-reatment in penitentiaries, Cover and Format: SPDP, Council of Europe, pg.28 https://rm.coe.int/2

e) Immobilization belts made of leather or textile material - are used in the case of persons deprived of their liberty who have personality or mental disorders in the decompensated phase, mentally retarded people with behavioral decompensation, those with psychomotor agitation with a high risk of car and / or heteroagression, of various etiologies, maintaining them until the effects of sedative drugs are established. They can also be used to immobilize other persons deprived of their liberty to prevent escape, or to endanger the safety of possession, threaten the life and integrity of staff or other persons, or to prevent the destruction of property. Immobilizing belts in leather are made to secure, separately, immobilisation of hands or legs. The textile strap can be used if immobilisation by means of leather straps is not sufficient if persons deprived of their liberty seek to destroy or remove medical equipment, attempt to become self-righteous or aggressive; it is applied over the chest and clings to the bed. The straps must be applied in such a way that they do not cause injuries or cracks, and after each application, check that the safety mechanisms are in operation.

Conclusions

Aspects presented in the essay present only the main responsibilities of the Romanian state in transposing the recommendations of international human rights organizations. In this context, the efforts of the Romanian legislator to comply with the required standards should be emphasized, especially if a comparative analysis is made with the provisions prior to the conventions and pacts to which the Romanian state has joined or participates.

To avoid the emergence of negative aspects in the fight against torture and ill-treatment, it is necessary to strengthen the notion of professionalism among civil servants by adopting ethical standards and responsibilities to avoid any form of discrimination, provocative behavior that can lead to physical or psychological maltreatment.

References

- National Administration of Penitentiaries, Annual Activity Report 2018;
- European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment;
- The European Convention on Human Rights;
- Jim Murdoch Vaclav Jiricka, Penitentiary System Manual on Prevention ill-treatment in penitentiaries, combating ill-reatment in penitentiaries, Cover and Format: SPDP, Council of Europe - https://rm.coe.int/2;
- Cruceanu Andreea – Simona, Prohibition of torture and ill-treatment in terms of subjection to medical treatment - https:/www.avocatnet.ro
- https://andreivocila.wordpress.com/2011/01/30/prevenirea-torturii-si-a-pedepselor-sau-tratamentelor-inumane-sau-degradante-2
- I.MoroianuZlatescu, R.Demetrescu, From the History of Human Rights, Romanian Institute for Human Rights, Bucharest, 2003;
- The Universal Declaration of Human Rights;
- Ruxandra Cesereanu, Panopticum Essay on Torture in the 20th Century, 2014, Polirom Publishing House, 2nd Edition;
- http://www.scritub.com/stiinta/stiinte-politice/Drepturile-fundamentale-ale-omului;
- https://ro.wikipedia.org/wiki/Constitu%C8%9Bia_de_la_3_mai_1791.

FREEDOM OF THOUGHT, OPINION, AND RELIGIOUS BELIEFS IN THE CASE OF PERSONS DEPRIVED OF THEIR LIBERTY

Radu Florin GEAMĂNU

Abstract

This paper[1] deals with the issue of freedom of thought, opinion, and religious beliefs in the case of persons deprived of their liberty.

The study has a first part which consists in a presentation of the international standards (United Nations, Council of Europe, European Union), followed by a presentation of the national standards (the freedom of thought, opinion, and religious beliefs being a fundamental freedom, prescribed by the Romanian Constitution).

An analysis is made based on the European Convention of Human Rights and of the European Prison Rules, in relation with national legal framework, touching the essential aspects of the freedom of thought, opinion, and religious beliefs in the case of persons deprived of their liberty: the exercise of the freedom of conscience and opinions, as well as of the freedom of religious beliefs; organization of religious service in prisons; proportionality of the measures ordered by the penitentiary administration; the limits of exercising the freedom of conscience and opinions, as well as the freedom of religious beliefs.

Further, the paper focuses on the main ECtHR judgements dealing with possible infringements of art. 9 from the European Convention, dealing with freedom of thought, opinion, and religious beliefs and then focuses on the national case law in this field.

Concluding, the study attempts to asess the national legislation and case law pleading on taking into consideration the solutions rendered by the ECtHR in its judgments, which can and should be applied at national level, in order to ensure the uniformity of judicial practice.

Keywords: prison; persons deprived of their liberty; freedom of conscience; religion; ECHR; ECtHR; Romanian legislation

1. Introduction

Freedom of conscience, fundamental freedom, is traditionally included in the category of social and political rights and freedoms. As claimed by the doctrine[1], it is one of the first freedoms in the human rights catalogue, because especially religious freedom - as part of the freedom of conscience[2] - has had a long, long history, streaked with intolerance and rushes, with excommunication and prejudice, with many suffering and pain.

Individuals must be free in exercise of this, one of the most fundamental human rights available, to determine his or her own theological or philosophical convictions and to manifest such beliefs free from State interference, at least insofar as the religious practice does not infringe or impede the exercise of the fundamental rights of others.[3]

This absolute freedom to entertain any thought, moral conviction or religious view is not entirely without practical importance. It is true that thoughts and views, as long as they have not been expressed, are intangible and that valuable for the person concerned if he can express them. But that does not render the (inner) freedom of thought, conscience and religion useless. This guarantee also implies that one cannot be subjected to treatment intended to change the process of thinking (’brain-washing’), that any form of compulsion to express thoughts, to change an opinion, or to divulge a religious conviction is prohibited, and that no sanction may be imposed either on the holding of a view or on the change of a religion or conviction; it protects against indoctrination by the State.[4]

* PhD., Faculty of Law, ”Nicolae Titulescu” University, Bucharest; Legal Adviser, Romanian Ministry of Justice (e-mail: radurfg@yahoo.com).

[1] This paper is based on the research realised in the 3rd Chapter. Analysis of the rules applicable to persons deprived of their liberty, 4th Section. Freedom of thought, opinion, and religious beliefs, R. F. Geamănu, Mijloace de protecție a persoanelor condamnate la pedepse privative de libertate (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2019).

[1] I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, Drept constituțional și instituții politice [Constitutional law and political institutions], 12th edition, volume I (Bucharest: All Beck, 2005), 180.

[2] We do not support the opinion expressed in the specialist literature - Ghe. Iancu, A.I. Iancu, Evoluția unor drepturi fundamentale în contextul social actual [The evolution of fundamental rights in the current social context] (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2017), 6 -, according to which freedom of conscience is also known as "religious freedom", as in our opinion there is no equivalence between the two notions, but a whole - part relationship.

[3] R. K.M. Smith, Textbook on International Human Rights, 5th edition (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012), 207.

[4] P. van Dijk, F. van Hoof, A. van Rijn, L. Zwaak (editors), Theory and practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 4th edition (Antwerpen-Oxford: Intersentia, 2006), 752.

2. Freedom of thought, opinion, and religious beliefs

2.1. International standards

At international level, Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in art. 18, sets out the principle according to which, "everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance."

Similar provisions are to be found in art. 9 (freedom of thought, conscience and religion) of the (European) Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (European Convention) and art. 10 (freedom of thought, conscience and religion) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.

The authors of the European Convention understood to protect not only the private and family life of the individual, his correspondence and his domicile, but also his "inner forum", namely the thought, conscience and religion he chooses. In the process of thinking, the individual forms certain beliefs; as a social being, he needs to manifest his beliefs - often attached to the embrace of a certain religion - externally to other fellows or with them.[5]

In the context of international legal instruments, it should be underlined that the freedom of opinion, conscience and religion is also regulated at special level, namely for the persons deprived of their liberty. We take into account the provisions of rules 65 and 66 of the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Nelson Mandela Rules), the first instrument developed under the auspices of U.N. which protects people deprived of their liberty.

Also, the European Prison Rules, in rule 29 set out the basic principles regarding the freedom of thought, conscience and religion, which shall be respected; as a consequence, inmates "may not be compelled to practice a religion or belief, to attend religious services or meetings, to take part in religious practices or to accept a visit from a representative of any religion or belief."

This entails two aspects: first, the right of prisoners to manifest their religion or belief and to receive religious or moral support, which is particularly important in the context of deprivation of liberty; and secondly, the right of prisoners not to be compelled to adopt any form of religion or belief.[6]

2.2. Relevant internal legislation

At national level, freedom of thought, opinion, and religious beliefs is regulated, as a basic principle, in art. 29 paras. (1) and (2) of the Romanian Constitution, according to which these liberties "shall not be restricted in any form whatsoever. No one shall be compelled to embrace an opinion or religion contrary to his own convictions. Freedom of conscience is guaranteed; it must be manifested in a spirit of tolerance and mutual respect."

From a legal point of view, freedom of conscience, as it is formulated in our Fundamental law, is a single right, a single freedom, which incorporates, as it can be observed, several aspects that need to be considered together.[7]

In detail, the legal framework is established by the provisions of Law no. 489/2006 on religious freedom and the general status of denominations[8]. Thus, according to art. 1 and 2, "the Romanian State observes and guarantees the fundamental right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion for any individual on the territory of Romania, under the Romanian Constitution and the international treaties Romania is a party to. No one shall be prevented from adopting a religious opinion or joining a religious faith, no one shall be coerced into adopting a religious opinion or joining a religious faith, contrary to his/her persuasion, and no one shall be subject to any discrimination, or be harassed or placed in an inferior position on account of their faith, membership or non-membership in a religious group, association or denomination, or for the exercise, within the law, of their freedom of religion.

Freedom of religion includes the right of every individual to have or embrace a religion, to manifest it individually or collectively, in public or in private, through practices and rituals specific to that denomination, including through religious education, as well as the freedom to preserve or change one's religion. The freedom to manifest one's religion cannot be subject to any restrictions other than those required under the law and which are necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the public, of public order, health or morality, or for the protection of fundamental human rights and liberties."

The special rules, which concern the persons deprived of their liberty, are provided by art. 58 of the Law no. 254/2013 on enforcement of custodial penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings[9] (Law no. 254/2013), art. 124 of the Regulation on implementing the

---

[5] C. Bîrsan, Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole. Volume I. Drepturi și libertăți [The European Convention on Human Rights. Comment on articles. Volume I. Rights and freedoms] (Bucharest: All Beck, 2005), 697.

[6] D. van Zyl Smit, S. Snacken, Principles of European prison law and policy. Penology and human rights (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2011), 207.

[7] M. Udroiu, O. Predescu, Protecția europeană a drepturilor omului și procesul penal român [European Human Rights Protection and the Romanian Criminal Procedure] (C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008), 231.

[8] Law no. 489/2006 on religious freedom and the general status of denominations, republished in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 201 of March 21, 2014.

[9] Law no. 254/2013 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 514 of August 14, 2013.

provisions of the Law no. 254/2013[10] (Regulation) and the Order of the Minister of Justice no. 4000/C/2017 for the approval of the Regulation regarding the religious assistance of the persons deprived of their liberty in the prison system[11] (Order of the Minister of Justice no. 4000/C/2017).

2.3. Specific aspects regarding the persons deprived of their liberty

Historically, religion played a large part in shaping prison regimes, In Europe early historical connections between the evolution of the prison and the monasteries are well documented, while attempts to reform prison regimes at the end of the 18th century owed much to the Christian beliefs of moral entrepreneurs, such as John Howard and his successors. Religious groups have continued to focus on prisons and to attempt to influence the spiritual lives of prisoners.[12]

Prison authorities will be expected to recognize the religious needs of those deprived of their liberty by allowing inmates to take part in religious observances.[13]

The special primary legislation has only taken over the principles already enshrined in Romanian Constitution, so that art. 58 paras. (1) and (2) of Law no. 254/2013 states that "freedom of conscience and of opinions, as well as freedom of religious beliefs of the convicted persons cannot be restricted. The convicted persons shall have the right to freedom of religious beliefs, without prejudice to the freedom of religious beliefs of the other convicted persons".

Because of the specific nature of the organization of the penitentiaries, such a legal framework, regulated only in general termn and declarative norms, would have been insufficient, risking generating only formal regulation and not an effective exercise of freedom of conscience, with all its components, especially religious freedom.

As a consequence, it was necessary to create a system of legal provisions that would contain some technical, precise and complete provisions designed to ensure full respect for the freedoms of thought and their effective exercise by persons deprived of their liberty:

a) The exercise of the freedom of conscience and opinions, as well as of the freedom of religious beliefs in the case of persons convicted of deprivation of liberty. The right of the individual to manifest his beliefs presupposes that any person can manifest his/her own beliefs, individually or collectively, publicly or in a private setting, manifesting, first of all, through cult and rites - especially in prison -, as well as through "practices".[14]

Inmates may declare on their free consent the confession or religious affiliation at the entrance to the place of detention and subsequently during the execution of the punishment [art. 124 para. (3) of the Regulation on implementing the provisions of the Law no. 254/2013].

According to art. 58 para. (3) of the Law no. 254/2013, the convicted persons may attend, based on free will, to sermons or religious meetings organized in penitentiaries, may receive visits from the representatives of that denomination and may acquire and hold religious publications, as well as worship objects.

Without prejudice to free consent to the choice of confession or religious affiliation, secondary legislation has established an administrative procedure for the change of religion, as well as some rules on giving inmates the possibility of attending cults or beliefs, as a precondition for changing confession or religious affiliation.

Thus, the change of confession or religious affiliation during the period of detention is proved by a declaration on its own responsibility and by the act of affirmation of belonging to that cult. Where a change of religion is envisaged, inmates are allowed to participate in the meetings of that cult or faith, with the agreement of their representatives and taking into account the specific security measures, the daily schedule and the number of participating inmates. Prisoners are informed that changing religion is a major decision that can affect their relationship with family members, their dependents or others [art. 124 paras. (4) and (8) of the Regulation on implementing the provisions of the Law no. 254/2013].

In applying the constitutional principles on the freedom of religious beliefs, paras. (6) and (7) of art. 124 of the Regulation establish the right of inmates to exercise their religion or belief in a real and effectively manner, by granting them the possibility of requesting confidential discussions with representatives of religious denominations or religious associations recognized by law and, on the other hand, the protection of this category of people against possible constraints on the adherence, change or renunciation of their own religious beliefs in the sense that inmates cannot be compelled to practice any religion or adopt any beliefs, participate in religious meetings, accept the visit of a representative of a cult or religious faith.

[10] Government Decision no. 157/2016 on the approval of the Regulation on implementing the provisions of the Law no. 254/2013 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 271 of April 11, 2016.

[11] Order of the Minister of Justice no. 4000/C/2017 for the approval of the Regulation regarding the religious assistance of the persons deprived of their liberty in the prison system, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 965 of November 29, 2016.

[12] D. van Zyl Smit, S. Snacken, Principles of European prison law and policy. Penology and human rights, 207.

[13] J. Murdoch, Protecting the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion under the European Convention on Human Rights (Strasbourg: Council of Europe Publishing, Human Rights Handbooks, 2012), 54.

[14] F. Sudre, Drept European și internațional al drepturilor omului [European and international human rights law] (Bucharest: Polirom, 2006), 344.

b) Organization of religious service in prisons. The set of regulations on the freedom of religious beliefs and religious assistance is capable to provide a lasting and profound connection between man and God or any other divinity. Practically, without being constrained, persons deprived of liberty can adopt the theism, as a conception of life, which can only help and discipline the person deprived of freedom by contributing to the education in the spirit of respecting religious and social values, with the consequence of successful reintegration into society. The situation is the same with regard to the adoption of atheism.

Of all the components of freedom of conscience, the freedom of religious beliefs required a number of special legal provisions to ensure a full and concrete external manifestation, through the organization of religious service in prisons and the access of persons deprived of liberty to it. In applying the provisions of art. 29 para. (5) of the Romanian Constitution, according to which the religious cults are autonomous to the state and enjoy its support, including through the facilitation of religious assistance in prisons, art. 124 para. (1) of the Regulation establishes the duty of the National Administration of Penitentiaries (N.A.P.) through the subordinated units to grant access to religious organisations and representatives recognized by the law in the penitentiaries in order to respond to the needs of religious assistance of the inmates on the basis of the written approval of the director of the penitentiary.

According to the provisions of art. 2 para. (2) from the Order of the Minister of Justice no. 4000/C/2017, in order to respond to the needs of religious assistance of persons deprived of their liberty, "specific activities in places of detention can be permanently secured by the Chaplain priests employees of N.A.P. or by representatives appointed by religious cults or associations, in compliance with their own canonical statutes or codes and legal provisions."

In order to effectively exercise the freedom of religious beliefs, the units subordinated to N.A.P. provides for "spaces allowing the exercise of the freedom of belief of persons deprived of their liberty in custody, with the assistance of representatives of religious denominations or religious associations recognized by law, whose confession they share" (Article 3 from the Order of the Minister of Justice no. 4000/C/2017).

Such a provision is in line with the regional standards in the field, provided in rule 29.2 of the European Prison Rules: "The prison regime shall be organised so far as is practicable to allow prisoners to practise their religion and follow their beliefs, to attend services or meetings led by approved representatives of such religion or beliefs, to receive visits in private from such representatives of their religion or beliefs and to have in their possession books or literature relating to their religion or beliefs."; according to the Commentary on Recommendation Rec(2006)2 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the European Prison Rules, so far as is practicable, places of worship and assembly shall be provided at every prison for prisoners of all religious denominations and persuasions. Also, approved representatives of religions should be allowed to hold regular services and activities and to pay pastoral visits in private to prisoners of their religion. Access to an approved representative of a religion should not be refused to any prisoner.

Also, the national provisions are in line with the provisions of rule 65 of the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Nelson Mandela Rules), according to which, "if the prison contains a sufficient number of prisoners of the same religion, a qualified representative of that religion shall be appointed or approved. If the number of prisoners justifies it and conditions permit, the arrangement should be on a full-time basis. A qualified representative appointed or approved in the previous mentioned conditions shall be allowed to hold regular services and to pay pastoral visits in private to prisoners of his or her religion at proper times."

"Representatives of religious denominations or religious associations who have access to the penitentiary may distribute to inmates publications and religious objects that can be kept by the inmates in a reasonable number. The reasonableness is determined by the number and size of publications, books and religious objects in possession of a detainee, without affecting his/her living space or the living space of other inmates, when the accommodation is shared." [art. 124 para. (5) of the Regulation]. Such a provision is in line with the international standards in the field - rule 66 of the Nelson Mandela Rules, according to which, "So far as practicable, every prisoner shall be allowed to satisfy the needs of his or her religious life by attending the services provided in the prison and having in his or her possession the books of religious observance and instruction of his or her denomination."

It is forbidden for the prison administration to interfere with the content of religious programs [art. 6 para. (2) from the Order of the Minister of Justice no. 4000/C/2017].

In other words, inmates should be able to received visits from a religious representative, and such contact should be in private, at least out of hearing of the prison staff.[15]

Moreover, from the perspective of the European Convention, the guarantee of freedom of thought, conscience and religion presupposes, first of all, a negative obligation on the part of the State authorities not to take any action or to refute any omission leading to a restriction of the effective exercise of these freedoms; such restraints are allowed only within the limits strictly determined by the provisions of art. 9 para. 2 of the Convention and only with regard to freedom of religion and conscience, and not to freedom of thought.[16]

[15] Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT), Monitoring places of detention. A practical guide (Geneva: Association for the Prevention of Torture, April 2004), 182.

Concluding, we consider that the legal provisions in force are able to ensure the protection of inmates against possible abuses by the prison administration or third parties, by ensuring freedom of conscience, opinions and, above all, the freedom of religious beliefs.

c) Proportionality of the measures ordered by the penitentiary administration. Regarding the compliance of the penitentiary regulations, it was pointed out in the North American law system that, if the court decides your belief is religious and sincerely held, it will then apply the Turner test to the prison regulation or practice that you are challenging by asking whether a prison regulation "is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests," and therefore does not violate your constitutional rights[17]. Specifically, under Turner, a court will consider the following four factors:

- Whether there is a valid, rational connection between the prison regulation and the legitimate governmental interest used to justify it;
- Whether there are other ways of exercising the right despite the regulation;
- If, by allowing you to exercise your right, there will be a "ripple effect" on others such as prison personnel, other prisoners, and on the allocation of prison resources; and
- Whether there is a different way for the prison to meet the regulation's goal without limiting your right in this way.[18]

For example, one federal court of appeal used the Turner test to rule that prison officials could prohibit religious items like a bear tooth necklace and a medicine bag in cells to protect the safety of other prisoners, prison guards, and the prisoner[19].

Also in the North American law system (Schreiber v. Ault case), a free exercise of religion claim failed. A prisoner believed for religious reasons that after his blood was used for routine medical tests it should have been poured on the ground and covered with dust; decontamination and disposal of prisoners' blood after medical testing was reasonably related to public health and safety concerns.[20]

We consider that such a test could also be used by national courts or by the judge in charge of the supervision of deprivation of liberty on the occasion of the examination of the violation of the freedom of conscience, opinions and freedom of religious beliefs provided for in art. 58 of the Law no. 254/2013.

d) The limits of exercising the freedom of conscience and opinions, as well as the freedom of religious beliefs. The fundamental nature of the rights guaranteed in article 9 para. 1 (art. 9-1) is also reflected in the wording of the paragraph providing for limitations on them. Unlike the second paragraphs of articles 8, 10 and 11 (art. 8-2, art. 10-2, art, 11-2) which cover all the rights mentioned in the first paragraphs of those Articles (art. 8-1, art. 10-1, art. 11-1), that of article 9 (art. 9-1) refers only to "freedom to manifest one's religion or belief". In so doing, it recognizes that in democratic societies, in which several religions coexist within one and the same population, it may be necessary to place restrictions on this freedom in order to reconcile the interests of the various groups and ensure that everyone's beliefs are respected[21]. In fact, there is a generous margin of appreciation from State authorities in this field[22].

The closed environment and the constraints inherent in the execution of the custodial sentences imposed the regulation of some normal limits for the exercise of religious freedom, which would enable each prisoner (both individually and collectively, in the prison community), to exercise the effectiveness of this freedom. Thus, according to art. 58 paras. (2) and (3) of the Law no. 254/2013, convicted persons shall have the right to freedom of religious beliefs, without prejudice to the freedom of religious beliefs of the other convicted persons. The convicted persons may attend, based on free will, to sermons or religious meetings organized in penitentiaries, may receive visits from the representatives of that denomination and may acquire and hold religious publications, as well as worship objects.

However, the actual contact of the inmates with the representatives of the cult or religious confession

---

[16] C. Bîrsan, Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole. Volume I. Drepturi și libertăți [The European Convention on Human Rights. Comment on articles. Volume I. Rights and freedoms], 703.

[17] Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79 (1987) ("[W]hen a prison regulation impinges on inmates' constitutional rights, the regulation is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests."), apud Columbia Human Rights Law Review, A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual, Chapter 27: Religious Freedom in Prison, 819, accessed March 25, 2019, http://jlm.law.columbia.edu/files/2017/05/39.-Ch.-27.pdf.

[18] Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89-90, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261-62, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79-80 (1987), apud Columbia Human Rights Law Review, A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual, Chapter 27: Religious Freedom in Prison, 828-829.

[19] Hall v. Bellmon, 935 F.2d 1106, 1113 (10th Cir. 1991) (upholding a prison policy that prohibited a Native American from wearing a bear tooth necklace and medicine bag on the grounds of prison security); see also Spies v. Voinovich, 173 F.3d 398, 405 (6th Cir. 1999) (upholding a prison's prohibition of certain Buddhist religious materials from a prisoner's cell and the chapel on the grounds of prison security), apud Columbia Human Rights Law Review, A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual, Chapter 27: Religious Freedom in Prison, 829.

[20] Schreiber v. Ault, 280 F.3d 891 (8th Cir. 2002), apud J. W. Palmer, Constitutional Rights of Prisoners, 9th Edition (New Providence, New Jersey: Lexis Nexis Anderson, 2010), 126.

[21] ECtHR, judgment from 25.05.1993, Kokkinakis v. Greece, no. 14307/88, § 33. Please note that all judgments of the European Court of Human Rights referred to in this study are accessible on the website of ECtHR, accessed March 25, 2019, http://www.echr.coe.int/ECHR/EN/Header/Case-Law/HUDOC/HUDOC+database/.

[22] J. Murdoch, The treatment of prisoners. European standards, (Strasbourg: Council of Europe Publishing, 2006, reprinted 2008), 248.

they belong to is not absolute, the limitations inherent in the penitentiary regime being accepted as long as they do not affect the very substance of the right or freedom in question. "Religious or moral-religious activities in the penitentiary environment are carried out in compliance with the internal regulations regarding the guarding, supervision and escorting of the persons performing custodial sentences in the places of detention in the penitentiary administration system". [art. 8 para. (1) from the Order of the Minister of Justice no. 4000/C/2017].

From this perspective, the provision in art. 124 par. (2) of the Regulation provides for the possibility of the warden to order the prohibition of the access of representatives of cults or religious associations recognized by law for a period of maximum 6 months, in certain strictly regulated cases (e.g.: discovery of weapons, ammunition, hallucinogenic substances, drugs or other objects forbidden to visitors, which they have not declared before the start of control; visitors that may have a negative influence on the behaviour of inmates; visitors that do not allow the specialized control before entering a prison). The imposition of such obligations on representatives of religious denominations and religious associations, as well as the regulation of the possibility of applying a ban on the access of representatives of religious denominations or religious associations who have breached the legal provisions for a maximum period of 6 months, is fully in line with the requirements of international legal instruments, as such restraints are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others [art. 9 para. (2) of the European Convention; art. 18 para. (3) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights].

Mention should be made that the prohibition concerns only the religious representative, not the cult, so that the right to religious assistance is not affected by the application of such a prohibition on access by religious representatives or religious associations who have breached legal provisions.

e) The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The case law of the European Court of Human Rights. At the Council of Europe level, freedom of conscience, opinions and religious beliefs is regulated in art. 9 of the European Convention and read as follows: "Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance. Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

Freedom of thought (conscience, beliefs and religious beliefs), as provided in art. 9 of the European Convention, has two dimensions - the internal, individual dimension ('forum internum'), which concerns the right to have opinions and beliefs, independent of its concretisation and expression in public, and an external dimension ('external forum'), which concerns the manifestation of these freedoms in public, in society.

The right to have a conscience, belief, in general, protects the inner forum, that is, the field of personal beliefs and religious beliefs, and is not susceptible to limitations, unlike the right to manifest beliefs, which may suffer some limitations, of course in accordance with legal requirements (provided for by law, have a legitimate aim and being necessary for public security, public order, health, public morals, rights and freedoms of others).

Article 9 para. 1 of the European Convention does not only address religious beliefs that can be manifested in certain forms or can be exchanged, but also other beliefs of the individual, expressing his conception of the world and life or of certain social phenomena.[23]

Freedom to have beliefs is absolute, the only restriction referred to in art. 9 of the European Convention excluding only the means of exercising that freedom. Affirming this freedom may seem useless, it is that obvious.[24]

The right to have a conscience presents a triple approach: it is primarily the freedom of every person to have or to adopt a belief or religion, at his free choice; then the right in question is the freedom to have no belief or religion and finally the right to have a belief is the freedom of individuals to change their belief or religion without suffering any constraint or prejudice.[25] And it also comprises the right not to be obliged to act in a way that entails the expression of acceptation of a church, a religion or belief that one does not share.[26]

Conventional regulation recognizes each person's freedom to manifest their religion or belief: through cult, education, practice, and ritual fulfilment.

It should be noted that neither the European Convention nor the case law of its bodies have given a definition of the notion of "religion" or "cult"; they also do not allow the identification of general criteria according to which certain spiritual representations can

[23] C. Bîrsan, Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole. Volume I. Drepturi și libertăți [The European Convention on Human Rights. Comment on articles. Volume I. Rights and freedoms], 715.

[24] J.-F. Renucci, *Tratat de drept European al drepturilor omului [Treaty on European Human Rights]* (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2009), 207.

[25] F. Sudre, Drept European și internațional al drepturilor omului [European and international human rights law] (Bucharest: Polirom, 2006), 344.

[26] P. van Dijk, F. van Hoof, A. van Rijn, L. Zwaak, Theory and practice on the European Convention on Human Rights, 758.

be qualified as having the meaning of a religion or cult.[27]

Obviously, a person's membership of major religions or traditional confessions does not raise any problem in exercising control over respect for freedom of religion. But religious beliefs are not limited to Christianity, Islam, Judaism, Hinduism, or Buddhism. The most delicate issues are about minority religions and new religious groups. Therefore, the issue of the sects is inevitable, especially as there is a general mistrust of the sects and their actions at European level.[28]

In any case, when the criteria of 'cogency, seriousness, cohesion and importance' are fulfilled, the existence of a religion or belief must be assumed. It is not up to the State to withhold protection because this religion or belief is regarded as incorrect, untrue or unacceptable.[29]

For proper assessment and application of national legal provisions on freedom of conscience, opinion and freedom of religious belief, an analysis of the Strasbourg Court's case law on art. 9 of the European Convention must be put in place.

We believe that the Court's principles in solving the applications can and should be applied at national level; this is the only way to ensure the uniformity of judicial practice, with a conventional application and interpretation of domestic legal provisions.

Occasional complaints have been made concerning interference with religious beliefs or matters of conscience by prison regimes. Few serious issues have yet been found to arise. Claims by Orthodox prisoners that prison food failed to respect dietary requirements was contested strongly by the UK Government and failed for non-exhaustion.[30] Also, the inability to obtain a particular item or lack of provision of a preferred item is insufficient. Short of compulsion to breach a strict religious dietary requirement or failure to provide sufficient food compatible with that diet, complaints are likely to fail[31] as an infringement of the European convention.

As the Court finds in an admissibility decision, prisoners have the right to manifest their religion or beliefs through worship, practice and the fulfilment of religious rites, within the meaning of art. 9 para. 1 of the European Convention[32].

Over time, the Strasbourg courts have ruled that art. 9 defends beliefs such as: pacifism, environmental protection, vegetarianism, conception of hunting, etc.[33]

In the case of Vârtic v. Romania (no. 2)[34], the Court found that the authorities failed to strike a fair balance between the interests of the prison authorities and those of the applicant, namely the right to manifest his religion through observance of the rules of the Buddhist religion (the applicant requested a meat-free diet, as prescribed by his religion). The Court concluded that there has been a violation of Article 9 of the Convention.

In this case, the Court noted that the applicant himself provided a coherent account of the manner in which he observed his Buddhist faith, and argued that he asked the prison authorities to provide the diet required by his faith only when, due to a change in legislation, he could no longer rely exclusively on the food provided by his family. It also appears that during the domestic proceedings the courts did not in any way question the genuineness of his faith.

The applicant requested a meat-free diet, as prescribed by his religion. Whilst the Court is prepared to accept that a decision to make special arrangements for one prisoner within the system can have financial implications for the custodial institution and thus indirectly on the quality of treatment of other inmates, it must consider whether the State can be said to have struck a fair balance between the interests of the institution, those of other prisoners and the particular interests of the applicant. The Court noted that the applicant's meals did not have to be prepared, cooked and served in any special way, nor did he required any special foods. The Court was not persuaded that the provision of a vegetarian diet to the applicant would have entailed any disruption to the management of the prison or any decline in the standards of meals served to other prisoners, all the more so as a similar diet free of animal products was already provided for inmates observing the Christian Orthodox fasting requirements.

Finally, the Court pointed out that the recommendation of the Committee of Ministers to the member States, namely Recommendation Rec (2006)2 on the European Prison Rules recommend that prisoners should be provided with food that takes into account their religion. In recent judgments the Court has drawn the authorities' attention to the importance of this recommendation, notwithstanding its non-binding nature.

---

[27] C. Bîrsan, Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole. Volume I. Drepturi și libertăți [The European Convention on Human Rights. Comment on articles. Volume I. Rights and freedoms], 709.

[28] M. Udroiu, O. Predescu, Protecția europeană a drepturilor omului și procesul penal român [European Human Rights Protection and the Romanian Criminal Procedure], 225.

[29] P. van Dijk, F. van Hoof, A. van Rijn, L. Zwaak, Theory and practice on the European Convention on Human Rights, 760.

[30] ECtHR, judgment from 07.03.1990, S. v. UK, no. 13669/88.

[31] K. Reid, A practitioner's guide to the European Convention on Human Rights, 3rd edition (London: Thomson Sweet & Maxwell, 2008), 478.

[32] ECtHR, judgment from 06.07.2000, Indelicato v. Italy, no. 31143/96, apud D. Bogdan, Arestarea preventivă și detenția în jurisprudența CEDO [Preventive arrest and detention in the European Court of Human Rights case law], 2nd edition (Bucharest, 2011), 514.

[33] M. Udroiu, O. Predescu, Protecția europeană a drepturilor omului și procesul penal român [European Human Rights Protection and the Romanian Criminal Procedure], 223.

[34] ECtHR, judgment from 17.12.2013, Vârtic v. Romania, no. 14150/08, § 46-55.

In Poltoratskiy v. Ukraine[35], the Commission was unable to establish with sufficient clarity whether the applicant or his parents requested permission from the national authorities for the applicant to be visited by a priest before 22 December 1998. However, the Commission found it to be established by the oral evidence and documents produced to it that the applicant was not able to participate in the weekly religious service which was available to other prisoners and that he was not in fact visited by a priest until 26 December 1998.

In these circumstances, the Court found that the interference with the applicant's right to manifest his religion or belief was not "in accordance with the law" as required by article 9 § 2 of the Convention. It considered it unnecessary to examine whether the interference was "necessary in a democratic society" for one of the legitimate aims pursued within the meaning of article 9 § 2. Accordingly, there has been a violation of art. 9 of the Convention.

The fundamental question is whether a headscarf, bangle, crucifix, yarmulke, is an expression of faith or an essential tenet of faith. It appears that international human rights will only actively protect the essential tenets of faith, other overt manifestations of faith being regarded as a private matter and thus subject to State control.[36]

In Leyla Şahin v. Turkey case[37], the Court argued that while religious freedom is primarily a matter of individual conscience, it also implies, inter alia, freedom to manifest one's religion, alone and in private, or in community with others, in public and within the circle of those whose faith one shares. Article 9 lists the various forms which manifestation of one's religion or belief may take, namely worship, teaching, practice and observance. But, art. 9 does not protect every act motivated or inspired by a religion or belief. By reason of their direct and continuous contact with the education community, the university authorities are in principle better placed than an international court to evaluate local needs and conditions or the requirements of a particular course. Besides, having found that the regulations pursued a legitimate aim, it is not open to the Court to apply the criterion of proportionality in a way that would make the notion of an institution's "internal rules" devoid of purpose. Article 9 does not always guarantee the right to behave in a manner governed by a religious belief and does not confer on people who do so the right to disregard rules that have proved to be justified. Consequently, the Court held that there has been no breach of art. 9 of the Convention.

Keeping order and safety in penitentiaries allows, in the opinion of the former Commission, a generous margin of appreciation for the authorities. For example, the need to be able to identify prisoners may thus warrant the refusal to allow a prisoner to grow a beard, while security considerations may justify denial of the supply of a prayer-chain.[38]

However, relatively recently, and by reference to the right to respect for private and family life, the Strasbourg Court (in the Biržietis v. Lithuania case)[39] noted that the applicant was serving a prison sentence, during which time he was prohibited from growing a beard by the internal rules of the correctional facility. Those rules placed an absolute prohibition on prisoners growing a beard, irrespective of its length, tidiness, or any other considerations, and did not explicitly provide for any exceptions to that prohibition. While the Court accepted that the Contracting States are in principle justified in setting certain requirements related to prisoners' personal appearance, it reiterated that any such restrictions must conform to the requirements of necessity and proportionality within the meaning of art. 8 § 2 of the Convention. In this case, the Court has expressed its reservations as to the existence of a legitimate aim pursued by the impugned restriction on the applicant's art. 8 rights. The Court further considered that the Government did not demonstrate that the absolute prohibition on growing a beard, irrespective of its hygienic, aesthetic or other characteristics, and not allowing for any exceptions, was proportionate. Lastly, it observed that in the applicant's case the prohibition on beards did not seem to affect other types of facial hair, such as moustaches or sideburns, thereby raising concerns of arbitrariness. Taking into account all the circumstances of the case, the Court considered that the applicant's decision on whether or not to grow a beard was related to the expression of his personality and individual identity, protected by art. 8 of the Convention, and that the Government has failed to demonstrate the existence of a pressing social need to justify an absolute prohibition on him growing a beard while he was in prison. There

[35] ECtHR, judgment from 29.04.2003, Poltoratskiy v. Ukraine, no. 38812/97, § 166-171. See, also, on the same topic, ECtHR, judgment from 29.04.2003, Kuznetsov v. Ukraine, no. 39042/97; ECtHR, judgment from 30.11.2006, Igors Dmitrijevs v. Latvia, no. 61638/00, § 79-81.

[36] R.K.M. Smith, International Human Rights, 208.

[37] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), judgment from 10.11.2005, Leyla Şahin v. Turkey, no. 44774/98, § 105, 121.

[38] Commission Decision in the case of X. v. Austria, 15th of February 1965, no. 1753/63 apud J. Murdoch, Protecting the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion under the European Convention on Human Rights, 55.

[39] ECtHR, judgment from 14.06.2016, Biržietis v. Lithuania, no. 49304/09, § 45-58.

Similarly, The U.N. Human Rights Committee, in the case no. 721/1997, Boodoo v. Trinidad and Tobago (74th Session, 18 March-5 April 2002, Communication No. 721/1996, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/74/D/721/1996, accessed March 25, 2019, http://www.ccprcentre.org/doc/2013/05/CCPR_C_74_D_721_1997.pdf), stated that as to the author's claim that he has been forbidden from wearing a beard and from worshipping at religious services, and that his prayer books were taken from him, the Committee reaffirmed that the freedom to manifest religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching encompasses a broad range of acts and that the concept of worship extends to ritual and ceremonial acts giving expression to belief, as well as various practices integral to such acts. In the absence of any explanation from the State party concerning the author's allegations, the Committee concluded that there has been a violation of article 18 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

has accordingly been a violation of art. 8 of the Convention.

From the point of view of public security, the protection of order, the rights and freedoms of others, we can hold the principles affirmed by the European Court in the case of Phull v. France as applicable, mutatis mutandis, to the penitentiary system as well. The applicant complained under art. 9 of the Convention of a violation of his right to freedom of religion by the airport authorities. He argued that there had been no need for the security staff to make him remove his turban (the applicant was a practising Sikh and was, thus, required by his religion to wear a turban), especially as he had not refused to go through the walk-through scanner or to be checked with a hand-held detector. Given the fact that the Sikh religion requires its male followers to wear a turban, the Court decided to work on the premise that the disputed measure constituted interference with the applicant's freedom to manifest his religion or beliefs. The Court ruled that security checks in airports are undoubtedly necessary in the interests of public safety within the meaning of that provision; also, the arrangements for implementing them in this case fell within the respondent State's margin of appreciation, particularly as the measure was only resorted to occasionally, as this was a necessary safety measure and that any resulting interference with the applicant's freedom of religion was justified.[40]

In C.W v. UK case[41], the applicant complained of the policy at H.M. Prison Blundeston whereby he was required to work in the prison print shop. He protested that he did not consider inside work suitable and that also his belief as a Vegan prohibited working with products that are unnecessarily tested on animals.

The Commission recalled that the applicant refused to work in the print shop because as a Vegan he wished to avoid contact with animal products or products which had been tested on animals. The Commission found that the Vegan convictions with regard to animal products fall within the scope of art. 9 para. (1) of the European Convention.

The Commission recalled that all prisoners were generally required to work in the print shop for a period of 13 weeks after which time other employment was available. It noted the factual conflict as to the nature and extent of the connection between the dyes and animals, the fact that it was only one of the applicant's reasons for refusing the work and also the relatively minor nature of the penalties imposed on the applicant for refusing to comply with the normal work regime. In these circumstances, the Commission found that the principle of proportionality has not been infringed and to the extent that there has been an interference, the interference is justified under art. 9 para. (2) of the European Convention.

The importance of religious freedom has been recognized by the Strasbourg Court as one of the factors that may lead to the non-existence of the violation of art. 3 of the European Convention in the case of a person subject to the measure of isolation in a penitentiary. Thus, in Rhode v. Denmark[42], the Court noted that a period of such a length (eleven months and fourteen days) may give rise to concern because of the risk of harmful effects upon mental health, as stated on several occasions by the CPT. However, when assessing whether the length was excessive under art. 3 the Court must also take into account the conditions of the detention including the extent of the social isolation. The applicant was detained in a cell which had an area of about eight square metres and in which there was a television. Also, he had access to newspapers. He was totally excluded from association with other inmates, but during the day he had regular contact with prison staff, e.g. when food was delivered; when he made use of the outdoor exercise option or the fitness room; when he borrowed books in the library or bought goods in the shop. In addition, every week he received lessons in English and French from the prison teacher and he visited the prison chaplain. Also, every week he received a visit from his counsel. Furthermore, during the segregation period in solitary confinement the applicant had contact twelve times with a welfare worker; and he was attended to thirty-two times by a physiotherapist, twenty-seven times by a doctor; and forty-three times by a nurse. Visits from the applicant's family and friends were allowed under supervision. In these circumstances, the Court found that the period of solitary confinement in itself, lasting less than a year, did not amount to treatment contrary to art. 3 of the European Convention.

In Vincent v. France[43], the applicant, who was unable to move, being immobilized in a wheelchair (he retained normal upper limb mobility, being autonomous in managing his own person), invoked the violation of art. 9 of the Convention, concerning his right to practice religion, since the penitentiaries in which he was accommodated did not have facilities that would allow him to easily access the worship places in these prisons without help. The Court pointed out that art. 9 guarantees to every person the right to freedom of religion, including the freedom to manifest their religion or belief individually or collectively, in public or in particular, through cult, education, practice and the fulfilment of rituals. However, although it was not disputed that the applicant could not reach the places of worship by his own forces, yet the prison administration offered him help to reach them, but the applicant refused. Moreover, he received visits to his room from the chaplain. Consequently, the Court rejected the claimant's claim, in the absence of violation of his religious freedom.

[40] ECtHR, judgment from 11.01.2005, Phull v. France, no. 35753/03.
[41] ECtHR, judgment from 10.02.1993, C.W v. UK, no. 18187/91.
[42] ECtHR, judgment from 12.07.2005, Rhode v. Denmark, no. 69332/01, § 97-98.
[43] ECtHR, judgment from 24.10.2006, Vincent v. France, no. 6253/03, § 8-9, 133, 136-138.

Also, in another case, the Commission declared the application inadmissible for the situation where the applicant (Sikhismist adherent) claimed that retaining a book on religion is contrary to his religious freedom. Although the Commission accepted that the applicant's freedom of religion was limited by the prison authorities, it noted that the refusal to receive the book was not based on philosophical or religious reasons, but because it contained an illustrated section on martial arts and self-defense, which could be dangerous if used against other persons. The passive use of the book (for practicing religion), as the applicant intended to do, was not, for that reason, the decisive factor in the decision of the prison management. The Commission concluded that the interference with the applicant's freedom under art. 9 of the European Convention was justified within the meaning of para. (2) of that article[44].

Finally, it is important to point out that not all allegations about the violation of freedom of conscience, opinions and freedom of religious beliefs lead to a favourable solution from the Strasbourg Court. In other words, the allegations of the persons held on the violation of religious freedom must be substantiated. From this perspective, ECtHR decided that the provisions of art. 9 of the European Convention because the applicant, complaining of a violation of his right to manifest his religion through religious rituals, has not even demonstrated that he has requested that those rituals be held in the chapel of Cala Reale (where the persons with forced residence were placed), or that he requested permission to go to church at Cala d'Oliva (the main settlement on the island of Asinara, near Sardinia)[45].

The claimant must provide evidence to substantiate the allegations made and have the capacity to prove, in the view of the court, the violation of the principle that freedom of conscience, opinion and freedom of religious beliefs is ensured, regulated by art. 9 of the European Convention.

Similarly, in the case of Iorgoiu v. Romania[46], the claim for the impairment of religious freedom was dismissed as manifestly groundless because the applicant did not bring any evidence to support the impediment of the free exercise of religion by the penitentiary administration.

The Court considers that the right to manifest one's religion or beliefs also has a negative aspect, namely the right of the person not to be forced to reveal his religion or beliefs and not to be obliged to act in a way that would allow determining whether or not the person share such beliefs. Therefore, the state authorities are not entitled to intervene in the sphere of the person's freedom of conscience and to try to find out his religious beliefs or to force him to declare his confession. In Sinan Işik v. Turkey[47] the Court held the violation of art. 9 of the European Convention, although the violation in question did not occur by refusing to indicate the applicant's belief on his identity card, but by indicating, whether mandatory or optional, religion on the identity card. This reasoning is supposed to cover all types of documents or registers that serve to identify state-run individuals, including those managed at the level of penitentiary units.

Finally, it should be stressed out that the refusal to allow a prisoner convicted of terrorist offences to travel to her father's funeral was recently analysed by the Strasboug Court (Guimon v. France[48]) in relation with article 8 (right to respect for private and family life) of the European Convention, rather than in relation with a art. 9 (freedom of conscience, opinions and religious beliefs) of the European Convention. The case concerned the refusal to allow the applicant, who was imprisoned in Rennes for terrorist offences, to travel to a funeral parlour in Bayonne to pay her last respects to her deceased father.

The Court held that there had been no violation of art. 8 of the European Convention, noting that the authorities had rejected the request on the grounds, firstly, of the applicant's criminal profile – she was serving several prison sentences for terrorist offences and continued to assert her membership of ETA – and, secondly, because it was impossible to organise a reinforced security escort within the time available. The Court found that the respondent State had not exceeded the margin of appreciation afforded to it in this area and that the refusal to grant the applicant's request had not been disproportionate and had pursued legitimate aims.

f) National case law. Regulating freedom of conscience and opinions as well as freedom of religious beliefs in the legislation regarding the execution of criminal penalties would be illusory if it were not accompanied by effective mechanisms to protect the exercise of freedom of thought against possible abuses of the prison administration.

Thus, by decision no. 1153/2011[49], the delegate judge from Iași Penitentiary admitted the complaint of an inmate complaining about the violation of the freedom of religious beliefs. The petitioner stated that he was Adventist on Day 7 (although in the penitentiary he was registered as an Orthodox Christian) and requested to the warden of the prison to approve his participation in the meetings organized by this cult and to receive the appropriate diet. His request was rejected on the grounds that he was not yet convicted by a final court decision, based on the provisions of art. 40 para.

[44] Commission Decision, X. v. UK, 18.05.1976, no. 6886/75.
[45] ECtHR, judgment from 06.11.1980, Guzzardi v. Italy, no. 7367/76, § 110.
[46] ECtHR, judgment from 17.07.2012, Iorgoiu v. Romania, no. 1831/02, § 95-101. See, also, on the same topic, ECtHR, judgment from 15.04.2014, Florin Andrei v. Romania, no. 33228/05, § 50-55; ECtHR, judgment from 15.10.2013, Ali (no. 2) v. Romania, no. 30595/09, § 48.
[47] ECtHR, judgment from 02.02.2010, Sinan Işik v. Turkey, no. 21924/05, § 41, 51-53.
[48] ECtHR, judgment from 11.04.2019, Guimon v. France, no. 48798/14.
[49] The delegated judge, Iași Penitentiary, decision no. 1153/2011, unpublished.

(2) from Law no. 275/2006 [currently, art. 58 para. (3) from Law no. 254/2013], according to which ”convicted persons may participate, on the basis of free consent, in religious services or gatherings organized in penitentiaries and can obtain and hold publications of religious character as well as objects of worship”. The prison administration argued that the applicant was in preventive detention and not convicted by a final court decision, thus he could only participate in individual activities, counselling or evaluation. Regarding the demand for a diet specific for the Adventist cult, the administration of the penitentiary took into account that the applicant was registered as an Orthodox Christian, and that in order for the application to be admitted it was necessary for him to prove his belonging to the Adventist cult.

The delegated judge solution of admitting the detainee's complaint we consider to be correct because, according to art. 82 para. (5) of the Law no. 275/2006, the provisions of the law contained in Title IV, Chapter. III-VII (including those on religious assistance) apply to both convicted and preventively arrested persons. Thus, it is clear that persons deprived of their liberty may participate, on the basis of free consent, to religious services or assemblies organized in penitentiaries, because only in this way can they acquire the status of member of a certain cult. In other words, when a change of religion is targeted, inmates will be allowed to participate in the meetings of that cult, with the agreement of their representatives, and taking into account the specific security measures of their possession. Therefore, participation in religious services and activities organized by representatives of religious organizations, associations and cults can only be restricted for reasons of security of ownership, the daily schedule and the number of participating inmates.

In fact, as the Strasbourg Court has consistently held, the prison administration's obligation consists in an attitude of neutrality and impartiality, as defined in the ECtHR case-law, which is incompatible with any interference to assess the legitimacy of religious beliefs.[50]

By criminal decision no. 1938/2015, the 5th District Court of Bucharest[51] admitted partly the complaints of the petitioners K.C., M.Y.S. and E.N. against the decision of the judge in charge of the supervision of deprivation of liberty and ordered the prison administration to allow the petitioners to receive Koser food daily (on their own expense) in quantities necessary to meet their personal needs (including food requiring heating, baking, boiling or other heat treatments in order to be eaten), ensuring that the food is served under the same conditions as to other inmates, and, also, with the obligation for the prison to provide conditions for storing the food for the days when it cannot be delivered to the three inmates.

In order to decide this, the court held the following: the right to religious freedom is a constitutional right, guaranteed by the provisions of art. 29 of the Romanian Constitution, as well as a right regulated by art. 9 of the European Convention. In the court's view, the only concrete way in which the applicants could benefit from food according to religious beliefs was to require the prison administration to allow the petitioners to receive Koser food daily (bearing the cost thereof), given the fact that if the court were to rule on a general solution such as ”obliges the prison administration to provide kosher-type food for the inmates” ", would not solve the complaint, but rather will acknowledge a theoretical and illusory right to receive proper food, according to their religious beliefs, as such a solution would only open the bureaucratic channels for the prison administration in order to allocate budgetary resources and then conducting a public procurement procedure. Under these circumstances, it is clear that the petitioners would be deprived of the right to obtain food according to religious beliefs for a good period of time.

According to the court, the provisions of art. 56 para. (6) letter a) of Law no. 254/2013 allow the court to determine the legal measures required to comply with the law and to oblige the prison administration to respect them. An interpretation according to which the prison administration is the one that establishes the concrete measures for respecting the law would only allow it to replace the power of the courts.

By decision no. 211/2014, the judge in charge of the supervision of deprivation of liberty from București-Rahova Penitentiary[52] admitted the complaint about the violation of the right to freedom of religious beliefs and ordered the penitentiary to provide complainants with a meat-free diet (for all three meals of the day), as prescribed by their religion, observing the Christian Orthodox fasting requirements. Thus, two Orthodox Christian inmates (recorded as such in the prison administration's records) showed that they had requested in writing to the penitentiary to provide a meat-free diet, during the Christian Orthodox fasting before Easter, but either it was not granted or it was provided only for lunch, not for the other two meals of the day.

While the prison response was general and elusive, without clear references to the situation of the complainants, although the place of detention recognized the right of inmates to receive a meat-free diet, as prescribed by their religion, the judge considered the position of the prison as an implicit acknowledgment of the petitioners' claims and ruled on [50] See, for example, ECtHR, judgment from 07.12.2010, Jakóbski v. Poland, no. 18429/06, § 48-55, in which case the Court has held that if the religion or belief requires a particular diet, it should be respected by the authorities, provided that it is not unreasonable or burdensome, or the refusal to make available to a person deprived of liberty of Buddhist religion, a diet lacking meat, as his belief requires, was considered to be a violation of the provisions of art. 9.

[51] 5th District Court, Bucharest, criminal decision no. 1938/2015, unpublished.

[52] The judge in charge of the supervision of deprivation of liberty, București-Rahova Penitentiary, decision no. 211/2014, unpublished.

the violation of art. 58 of the Law no. 254/2013, because according to these legal provisions, freedom of religion must be observed in case of inmates, a component of this freedom being obviously also respecting a specific diet required by the religion.

Conversely, the delegate judge at Codlea Penalty[53] has reasonably rejected the complaint of M.I. with regard to the violation of the right to participate in religious activities, with the following reasoning: the petitioner pointed out that he was enrolled in religious activities in August 2008, but the penitentiary employees unjustifiably refused to allow his to participate at the religious activities. Regarding the violation of the freeform of religious beliefs, the delegated judge noted that from the internal documents of the prison regarding the religious activity of the inmates, it can be concluded that the petitioner was included to participate at religious activities both on 10 August 2008 and on 16 August 2008, and on 10 August 2008 it was recorded that he participated in the religious activity, so that the petitioner's assertions are not confirmed, thus the complaint was rejected as ill founded.

3. Conclusions

Religious (or other) beliefs underpin the conduct of the life of an individual. Moreover, religious/moral precepts designate legal from illegal, right from wrong, in society. Courts, in adjudicating disputes before them, apply the stated beliefs of the society in which they operate.[54]

The fundamental character of the freedoms of thought is fully reflected in the national legislation, the normative provisions specifying precisely the limits within which they can be exercised, mentioning the limitations being of strict interpretation and proportionate to the intended purpose.

We envisage, for example, regulating the possibility of the warden to order the prohibition of the access of representatives of religions or religious associations recognized by law for a period of maximum 6 months, in cases where their behaviour is affecting the safety and stability of the penitentiary.

Obviously, the prison authorities have the obligation to recognize and respect the needs of (external) manifestation of freedom of conscience, opinions and especially of religious freedom, an important aspect being their access to specially designed worship places and the visits of the representatives of recognized religions or religions.

Concluding, one can affirm that the decisions rendered by the European Court can and should also be applied at national level, in order to ensure the uniformity of judicial practice.

References

- The United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights
- The United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Nelson Mandela Rules)
- E.U., Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union
- CoE, Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms
- CoE, Recommendation Rec(2006)2 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the European Prison Rules
- Constitution of Romania
- Law no. 489/2006 on religious freedom and the general status of denominations
- Law no. 254/2013 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings
- Government Decision no. 157/2016 on the approval of the Regulation on implementing the provisions of the Law no. 254/2013 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings
- Order of the Minister of Justice no. 4000/C/2017 for the approval of the Regulation regarding the religious assistance of the persons deprived of their liberty in the prison system
- C. Bîrsan, Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole. Volume I. Drepturi și libertăți [The European Convention on Human Rights. Comment on articles. Volume I. Rights and freedoms] (Bucharest: All Beck, 2005)
- D. Bogdan, Arestarea preventivă și detenția în jurisprudența CEDO [Preventive arrest and detention in the European Court of Human Rights case law], 2nd edition (Bucharest, 2011)
- P. van Dijk, F. van Hoof, A. van Rijn, L. Zwaak (editors), Theory and practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 4th edition (Antwerpen-Oxford: Intersentia, 2006)
- Ghe. Iancu, A.I. Iancu, Evoluția unor drepturi fundamentale în contextul social actual [The evolution of fundamental rights in the current social context] (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2017)
- Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, Drept constituțional și instituții politice [Constitutional law and political institutions], 12th edition, volume I (Bucharest: All Beck, 2005)
- J. Murdoch, Protecting the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion under the European Convention on Human Rights (Strasbourg: Council of Europe Publishing, Human Rights Handbooks, 2012)

[53] The delegated judge, Codlea Penitentiary, decision no. 617/2008, unpublished.
[54] R.K.M. Smith, International Human Rights, 212.

- J. Murdoch, The treatment of prisoners. European standards, (Strasbourg: Council of Europe Publishing, 2006, reprinted 2008)
- K. Reid, A practitioner's guide to the European Convention on Human Rights, 3rd edition (London: Thomson Sweet & Maxwell, 2008)
- J.-F. Renucci, Tratat de drept European al drepturilor omului [Treaty on European Human Rights] (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2009)
- R. K.M. Smith, Textbook on International Human Rights, 5th edition (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012)
- F. Sudre, Drept European și internațional al drepturilor omului [European and international human rights law] (Bucharest: Polirom, 2006)
- J. W. Palmer, Constitutional Rights of Prisoners, 9th Edition (New Providence, New Jersey: Lexis Nexis Anderson, 2010)
- M. Udroiu, O. Predescu, Protecția europeană a drepturilor omului și procesul penal român [European Human Rights Protection and the Romanian Criminal Procedure] (C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008)
- D. van Zyl Smit, S. Snacken, Principles of European prison law and policy. Penology and human rights (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2011)
- Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT), Monitoring places of detention. A practical guide (Geneva: Association for the Prevention of Torture, April 2004)
- Columbia Human Rights Law Review, A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual, Chapter 27: Religious Freedom in Prison
- Commission Decision in the case of X. v. Austria, 15th of February 1965, no. 1753/63
- Commission Decision, X. v. UK, 18.05.1976, no. 6886/75
- ECtHR, judgment from 06.11.1980, Guzzardi v. Italy, no. 7367/76, § 110
- ECtHR, judgment from 07.03.1990, S. v. UK, no. 13669/88
- ECtHR, judgment from 10.02.1993, C.W v. UK, no. 18187/91
- ECtHR, judgment from 25.05.1993, Kokkinakis v. Greece, no. 14307/88
- ECtHR, judgment from 06.07.2000, Indelicato v. Italy, no. 31143/96
- ECtHR, judgment from 29.04.2003, Poltoratskiy v. Ukraine, no. 38812/97
- ECtHR, judgment from 29.04.2003, Kuznetsov v. Ukraine, no. 39042/97
- ECtHR, judgment from 11.01.2005, Phull v. France, no. 35753/03
- ECtHR, judgment from 12.07.2005, Rhode v. Denmark, no. 69332/01, § 97-98
- ECtHR (Grand Chamber), judgment from 10.11.2005, Leyla Șahin v. Turkey, no. 44774/98
- ECtHR, judgment from 24.10.2006, Vincent v. France, no. 6253/03
- ECtHR, judgment from 30.11.2006, Igors Dmitrijevs v. Latvia, no. 61638/00
- ECtHR, judgment from 02.02.2010, Sinan Işik v. Turkey, no. 21924/05
- ECtHR, judgment from 07.12.2010, Jakóbski v. Poland, no. 18429/06
- ECtHR, judgment from 17.07.2012, Iorgoiu v. Romania, no. 1831/02
- ECtHR, judgment from 15.10.2013, Ali (no. 2) v. Romania, no. 30595/09
- ECtHR, judgment from 17.12.2013, Vârtic v. Romania, no. 14150/08
- ECtHR, judgment from 15.04.2014, Florin Andrei v. Romania, no. 33228/05
- ECtHR, judgment from 14.06.2016, Biržietis v. Lithuania, no. 49304/09
- ECtHR, judgment from 11.04.2019, Guimon v. France, no. 48798/14
- US, Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79 (1987)
- US, Hall v. Bellmon, 935 F.2d 1106, 1113 (10th Cir. 1991)
- US, Spies v. Voinovich, 173 F.3d 398, 405 (6th Cir. 1999)
- US, Schreiber v. Ault, 280 F.3d 891 (8th Cir. 2002)
- U.N. Human Rights Committee, case no. 721/1997, Boodoo v. Trinidad and Tobago (74th Session, 2002)
- The delegated judge, Codlea Penitentiary, decision no. 617/2008
- The delegated judge, Iași Penitentiary, decision no. 1153/2011
- The judge in charge of the supervision of deprivation of liberty, București-Rahova Penitentiary, decision no. 211/2014
- 5th District Court, Bucharest, criminal decision no. 1938/2015
- https://www.echr.coe.int/
- https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#
- https://rm.coe.int/
- https://search.coe.int/
- http://www.un.org/
- http://www.ccprcentre.org/doc/2013/05/CCPR_C_74_D_721_1997.pdf
- http://jlm.law.columbia.edu/files/2017/05/39.-Ch.-27.pdf

ISSUES OF CONTROVERSIAL PRACTICE REFERRING TO THE CRIME OF FALSE TESTIMONY

Mirela GORUNESCU

Abstract

The crime of false testimony is one of the crimes which are traditionally found in our criminal legislation, the judicial practice recording also specific situations which required the application of the incrimination text which defined this crime. It can be considered that we are dealing with a crime which can no longer present any difficulties in relation to the interpretation and application of the incrimination norm with regard to the particular deeds committed. However, many elements are still encountered with respect to the interpretation of the incrimination norm, which generate different solutions of application, a fact which –in accordance with the rigors of the criminal law- is not to be desired. This study approaches two of these issues, namely the juridical significance of the refusal of the person heard as a witness to give any statements in such capacity and, on the other hand, the possibility of the realization of a formal concurrence of crimes when the person summoned as a witness, through his/her false or incomplete statement intends to create a situation more favorable to a person regarded by the factual situation.

Keywords: false testimony; crimes against the service of justice; witness' refusal to give a statement; the privilege against self-incrimination; favoring through a false testimony

1. General Issues

The crime of false testimony is provided under Art. 273 of the Criminal Code in a standard version and in an aggravated version. According to Art. 273 para. (1) of the Criminal Code, standard false testimony is represented by the deed perpetrated by a witness who, within a criminal case, civil case, or any other procedure wherein witnesses are heard, makes deceitful statements or fails to tell everything s/he knows in relation to the facts or essential circumstances s/he is questioned about.

The aggravated version constitutes, according to para. (2), the false testimony given: a) by a witness with protected identity or found in the Witness' Protection Program; b) by an undercover investigator; c) by a person who prepares an expert appraisal report or by an interpreter; d) in connection with a deed for which the law provides the penalty by imprisonment or imprisonment for 10 years or longer.

In accordance with doctrinarian opinions, the crime of false testimony has as its special juridical object the social relations regarding the proper service of justice. The crime can also have a secondary juridical object, consisting in the social relations regarding certain essential attributes of the person (dignity, liberty) or in the social relations with a patrimonial character, because such relations can also be breached through the perpetration of the deed[1].

In accordance with the provisions of the legislation in force, a witness is the person who, being informed of certain facts, data or circumstances which constitute evidence within a judicial lawsuit, is called to be heard. Also, the jurisprudence stated that the persons who are parties in a lawsuit[2], as well as the main subjects of the lawsuit cannot have the capacity of witness and, therefore, they cannot be active subjects of the deed of false testimony [Art. 115 para. (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code]. It is considered that the lawmaker instituted the incompatibility between the capacity of a party or of a main lawsuit subject within a lawsuit and the witness capacity, considering that, since the parties or main lawsuit subjects can be heard in such capacity, and their statements constitute evidentiary means, the accumulation of the capacity of party or main lawsuit subject and of the witness capacity cannot be justified[3]. If a person loses the capacity of party or main lawsuit subject within the lawsuit, such person may be heard as a witness.

According to Art. 117 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the following persons shall have the right to refuse to be heard as a witness: the spouse, direct ascendants and descendants, as well as the siblings of the suspect or of the defendant, and the persons who were the spouses of the suspect or of the defendant. Instead, if the abovementioned persons agree to make statements, the provisions regarding the witnesses' rights and obligations shall be applicable to such persons.

According to Art. 116 para. (3) of the Criminal Procedure Code, those facts or circumstances whose secret or confidential nature may stand good under the law in relation to the judicial bodies cannot form the

* Associate Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email:mire_gor@yahoo.com.)

[1] V. Dobrinoiu, I. Pascu, M.A. Hotca, C. Păun, I. Chiș, M. Gorunescu, N. Neagu, M. Dobrinoiu, M. Sinescu, Noul Cod penal comentat, Partea specială, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 249.

[2] Brașov Court of Appeal, Criminal Section, Dec. No. 198/A/2000, on www.ctce.ro.

[3] Gr. Theodoru, Tratat de drept procesual, Publishing House Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2007, p. 371.

object of the witness' statement. These are the facts or circumstances which came to the knowledge of the witness within the exercise of his/her profession. By exception, such facts or circumstances may form the object of the witness\ statement when the competent authority or the entitled person expresses its consent in this respect or when there is another legal cause for removing the obligation to keep the secret or maintain the confidential nature (for instance, the obligation to incriminate).

False testimony is punished in a more severe manner if it is perpetrated by a witness with protected identity or found in the Witness Protection Program, by an undercover investigator, by a person who prepares an expert appraisal report or by an interpreter. The reason for aggravation in relation to the capacity of the active subject refers to the special position of such a person in the criminal lawsuit, based on relations of trust (in case of the undercover investigator, expert or interpreter, who are specialists in certain fields and must assist the court of law in the process of finding the truth and serving justice). In the case of protected witnesses, the additional effort of the judicial bodies to ensure their protection in exchange for their testimony justifies the aggravation of the punishment in case the trust in their bona fide is breached.

The witness with a protected identity is the threatened witness, according to Art. 125 of the Criminal Procedure Code, in relation to whom any of the protection measures provided under Art. 126 para. (1) letters c) and d) of the Criminal Procedure Code was taken. Thus, if there is any reasonable suspicion that the life, bodily integrity, freedom, assets or professional activity of the witness or of a member of the witness' family might be endangered as a result of the data provided by such witness to the judicial bodies or as a result of his/her statements, in relation to the respective person shall be ordered the measure of the protection of the data regarding his/her identity, by giving to such person a pseudonym under which such witness shall sign his/her statement, or by hearing the respective person in his/her absence, by means of audio-video communication devices, with distorted voice and image, when the other measures are not sufficient.

The witness found in the Witness Protection Program is subject to the regulations of the Witness Protection Law[4]. The Witness' Protection Program represents the specific activities conducted by the National Office for Witness Protection, with the support of the central and local public administration authorities, for the purpose of protecting the life, bodily integrity and health of the persons who obtained the capacity of protected witnesses, under the conditions provided by the law. The protected witness is the witness, the members of the witness' family and the persons close to the witness, who are included in the Witness' Protection Program, according to the provisions of the law.

According to Art. 148 of the Criminal Procedure Code, undercover investigators are operative agents of the judicial police. In the case of investigating crimes against national security and crimes of terrorism, the operative agents of the State bodies which conduct, under the law, information activities in view of ensuring national security can also be used as undercover investigators. The authorization to use undercover investigators may be issued by the prosecutor under the conditions of Art. 148 para. (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code. Undercover investigators can be heard as witnesses within the criminal lawsuit under the same conditions as threatened witnesses.

The objective side of the crime of false testimony is realized in terms of the material element by means of two alternative methods: either deceitful statements are made, or not everything that is known about the essential circumstances in a case in which witnesses are heard is told, and we are dealing with a manifestation liable to mislead judicial bodies.

So, in the first case, we are dealing with an action, in which case the witness, expert or interpreter makes deceitful statements, while, in the second case, we are dealing with the situation when not everything that is known about the essential circumstances for the judicial case is told[5].

The normative method which is of interest for this study is „[the witness] is not telling everything that she knows", which means manifesting reticence as far as what s/he stated is concerned, keeping quiet, concealing all or part of what the witness knows. Keeping quiet must refer to something that was known to the witness, and not what the witness might have known[6].

A criminal significance shall be attached only to that omission liable to mislead the judicial body. A person's refusal to testify is not the equivalent of the omission in terms of attitude, which can be the manifestation of the material element of a false testimony.[7]

The statements or omissions of a witness must refer to essential circumstances.

Essential circumstances must represent those situations and circumstances which refer to the main fact of the case, and not to any adjacent issues which are not related thereto[8]. Therefore, the following can, for instance, be considered circumstances essential to the case: the constitutive elements and the mitigating or aggravating circumstances within a criminal lawsuit; the de facto grounds in case of a divorce lawsuit in the [4] Law No. 682/2002 on the witness protection, published in The Official Gazette No. 964 of December 28, 2002, as subsequently amended and supplemented.

[5] V. Dobrinoiu, I. Pascu, M.A. Hotca, C. Păun, I. Chiș, M. Gorunescu, N. Neagu, M. Dobrinoiu, M. Sinescu, op.cit., p. 249

[6] V. Dongoroz and others, op. cit., vol. IV, pp. 182-183., p. 183.

[7] V. Dobrinoiu, I. Pascu, M.A. Hotca, C. Păun, I. Chiș, M. Gorunescu, N. Neagu, M. Dobrinoiu, M. Sinescu, op.cit., p. 249

[8] Idem.

civil field; as well as the other evidentiary facts which may serve to the solving of a case and to the finding of the truth.

The essential character must be determined in accordance with the object of the evidence, in the sense that it is conclusive in relation to the charge brought against the defendant or in relation to any other issue liable to influence the defendant's criminal liability.

The realization of the material element of the crime requires that the witness should have been asked by the authorized body (prosecutor's office, court of law, etc.) or by the lawsuit parties or by the main lawsuit subjects with regard to the essential circumstances. Thus, in the judicial practice it was decided that the fact that the defendant declared that she was in another locality for a certain period of time together with her husband, charged with the perpetration of a crime during the same period of time, does not represent a crime of false testimony, since she was not expressly asked whether the defendant was in the same locality as she was at the time when the crime was perpetrated and neither did she state that the defendant would not have left the locality in the mentioned period of time[9].

If, through his/her deceitful statements, the witness tries to avoid that his/her criminal liability be entailed, such fact no longer constitutes a crime (according to Art. 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the witness has the right to not accuse oneself). A contrary solution is considered to lead to the conclusion that the obligation of self-incrimination is incumbent on those persons who committed a crime, which conclusion cannot be accepted as long as the obligation to inform on crimes perpetrated by other persons exists only in the cases in which the law expressly provides so[10].

2. Issues Specific to the Crime of False Testimony

Constantly, in the doctrine and in the judicial practice, the issue is raised to establish whether the crime of false testimony may be perpetrated from an objective point of view is the refusal to make statements [sic!], namely the maintenance of passivity, given that the crime of false testimony is a crime which implies perpetration in all the cases[11].

With respect to this issue, the specialty doctrine traditionally differentiates between the normative assumption "[the witness] does not declare all that s/he knows" and the factual assumption to refuse to make any statements.

Thus, a doctrinarian opinion indicates that: „A criminal significance shall be attached only to that omission liable to mislead the judicial body. A person's refusal to testify is not the equivalent of the omission in terms of attitude, which can be the manifestation of the material element of a false testimony. In the juridical literature, the following opinion to which we adhere was expressed, that the explicit refusal of a person who accepted to testify to answer certain questions has no criminal significance either, in the sense of the provisions of Art. 273 of the Criminal Code[12]. Such an explicit refusal, clearly expressed, is not, as it was stated, liable to mislead the judicial body, but it draws attention to the necessity of producing new evidence in order to find out the truth."

The specialty doctrine often indicates that: "the witness enjoys the right to keep quiet and to not contribute in his/her self-incrimination, to the extent to which, through his/her statement, s/he might incriminate himself/herself [for instance, in the cases in which, as a result of successive severances, a suspect or a defendant in the initial file (the basic file) becomes a witness in a file severed from the basic file; in such capacity, s/he enjoys the right to silence and to not incriminate himself/herself with regard to certain issues which, once reported, might incriminate him/her in the file in which s/he is being charged]." [13]

Under these conditions, my refusal to make a statement does not have in any case the purpose of encumbering the service of justice, but only the purpose that the witness should protect his/her lawsuit situation, representing a bona fide exercise of the right to not incriminate oneself.

In the same respect, the specialty literature[14] indicates that: "The privilege against self-incrimination and the defendant's right to keep quiet, implicit guarantees of the right to a fair trial, have been examined, after 1993, in several cases on the dockets of the E.C.H.R. (J.B versus Switzerland, 2001, IJL GMR and AKP versus United Kingdom, 2000, Kansal versus United Kingdom, 2004, Jalloh versus Germany, 2006, Weh versus Austria, 2004, Allan versus United Kingdom, 2002, Muray versus United Kingdom, 1996, Serves versus France, 1997), being constantly revealed the necessity to prohibit the use of any coercion means in order to obtain evidence, against the defendant's will, as well as the fact that, in relation to the autonomous character of the notion of "criminal charge", consideration should be given to the fact that

[9] HCCJ, Criminal Section, Decision No. 5430/2004, in RDP No. 4/2005, p. 147.

[10] V. Dobrinoiu, I. Pascu, M.A. Hotca, C. Păun, I. Chiș, M. Gorunescu, N. Neagu, M. Dobrinoiu, M. Sinescu, op.cit., p. 249

[11] V. Dongoroz and a collective of authors, Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului penal român, The Publishing House of the Romanian Academy and C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2003, p. 159.

[12] A. Filipaş, Infracţiuni contra înfăptuirii justiţiei, The Publishing House of the Romanian Academy, Bucharest, 1985, p. 56.

[13] M. Udroiu, Drept penal, partea specială, C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 256.

[14] C. Rotaru, A. Trandafir, V. Cioclei, Drept penal, Partea specială II, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 102. The author quotes from the considerations of Decision No. 213/2015 issued by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, consulted at http://www.scj.ro/1093/Detalii-jurisprudenta?customQuery%5B0%5D.Key=id&customQuery%5B0%5D.Value=124329) the witness also enjoys this right to the extent to which his/her statement might lead to self-incrimination.

In summary, the privilege against self-incrimination is a principle according to which the State cannot compel a suspect to cooperate with his/her prosecutors by providing evidence which might incriminate him/her.

Or, under the conditions of hearing a person having the witness capacity, subject to taking an oath and, especially, subject to the criminal punishment of perpetrating the crime of false testimony, with respect to facts or circumstances which might incriminate him/her, E.C.H.R. - in its jurisprudence – has elaborated the so-called "theory of the three difficult choices with which the person is faced", according to which it is not natural that the alleged perpetrator should be asked to choose between being punished for his/her refusal to cooperate, providing incriminating information to the authorities or lying and risking conviction for this reason (case Weh versus Austria, 2004)".

In the recent judicial practice, however, it was deemed that the witness either makes deceitful statements which entails de plano the fact that the witness accepts to testify but distorts the truth with respect to the essential circumstances of the case in which s/he is heard, case which is not –however- applicable in this cause – or does not tell everything that s/he knows in connection with the facts or with the essential circumstances s/he is asked about. Not telling everything that s/he knows means manifesting a reticence as far as his statements are concerned, keeping quiet, concealing all or part of what the author knows"[15].

Also, the court considered that, by looking at the factual method of the refusal to testify, two distinct situations can be again identified. The first is that of the "refusal to have the witness capacity – in which case the respective person refuses to take the oath and to have the witness capacity", a hypothesis in which the court deemed that we cannot be in the presence of the crime of false testimony, but eventually in the situation of committing a judicial default or of any other crime, as applicable.

The second situation concerns: "the case in which, although the oath was taken, the witness refuses to tell anything about certain essential circumstances about which s/he is asked". Against this theoretical background, the court considered that: "the total refusal to testify, given that the witness capacity is a capacity won for the case because the person took the oath, is the equivalent of: not telling everything s/he knows in connection with essential elements on which s/he is heard"[16].

Moreover, the court considered that: "it matters not for the existence of the crime whether the refusal is an explicit refusal – when the witness expressly declares that s/he refuses to testify – or an implicit refusal – when the witness, without making any express reference, chooses to keep quiet on certain matters related to the essential circumstances of the case in which s/he is being heard." The argument invoked by the court of law to support this statement is an argument which adds to the law, in the sense that: "it cannot be considered that the crime of false testimony, in this version, would exist only under the conditions of a partial and tacit refusal, but also under the conditions of a total and explicit refusal, because it would be a non-sense that the one who is committing less should perpetrate a crime, while the one who is committing more should not be considered as a deceitful witness."[17]

These arguments, which obviously represent an analogical supplement of interpretation in malam parte of a criminal juridical norm, reveal, in the opinion of the merits court that the witness' refusal to make a statement represents the crime of false testimony.

When analyzing the constitutive elements of the crime of false testimony, they should start from the reason for which the lawmaker would have incriminated such a behavior. Obviously, such a legal text was included in the group of crimes against the service of justice, because it allows the punishment of anti-social behaviors whereby a circumstance perceived directly by a person heard as a witness in a judicial case is presented in a distorted manner. Under these conditions, for a crime of false testimony to exist, there must exist in fact an effort to mislead the body which is conducting the hearing.

Moreover, the existence of the crime of false testimony requires that the person conducting the hearing of the person having the witness capacity, should have asked specific questions about the circumstances that s/he considers being essential.

The argument made by the court according to which "it cannot be considered that the crime of false testimony, in this version, would exist only under the conditions of a partial and tacit refusal, but also under the conditions of a total and explicit refusal, because it would be a non-sense that the one who is committing less should perpetrate a crime, while the one who is committing more should not be considered as a deceitful witness" is, in fact, erroneous. This because the one who is apparently committing less causes more disturbance in the process of serving justice. Through the effort of making a statement which is purposefully elliptical, the person heard as a witness distorts the real facts and makes the judicial body have an erroneous representation of the factual situation, considering that such representation is correct. The behavior of refusing to make another statement is not specifically covered by the incrimination norm under Art. 273 of the Criminal Code.

Moreover, the court highlighted that the crime of false testimony constitutes a special version of favoring a perpetrator since, in the criminal cases; the false testimony can also lead implicitly to the favoring of the perpetrator. Under these conditions, the court of law indicates: "regardless of the fact that, through the false testimony made, the defendant is acting with a direct intention – pursuing to favor a perpetrator – or with an indirect intention – i.e. not expressly pursuing to favor the perpetrator but accepting the possibility that such result could also occur – the same deed cannot meet the material elements of two distinct crimes, while only the special crime, that is the false testimony, shall be maintained."

[15] HCCJ, Criminal Division, Sentence No. 363/2017, final through Criminal Decision No. 13/2018, not published.
[16] HCCJ, Criminal Division, Sentence No. 363/2017, final through Criminal Decision No. 13/2018, not published.
[17] Idem.

Also in the judicial practice the issue is raised whether the crime of favoring the perpetrator may be committed under the conditions of a formal concurrence of crimes with the false testimony.

In our opinion, such a juridical classification of the deed cannot be accepted, since it is in disagreement with the specific nature of the incrimination of the deed of favoring the perpetrator. Thus, the specialty doctrine indicates that: "The character of general and, therefore, subsidiary norm of the crime of favoring the perpetrator entails that, if the assistance given takes the form of a false testimony, only this latter crime shall be maintained.[18]"

In the same manner, in the judicial practice it is indicated that: "the crime of favoring the perpetrator has a subsidiary nature, and it cannot be maintained if there are other special incriminations of the favoring (such as the false testimony or the facilitation of escape). It is noted that, in the case, there is a special incrimination (Art. 260 of the Criminal Code – the false testimony), so that the crime of favoring the perpetrator and the crime of false testimony cannot be maintained concomitantly, but only the crime of false testimony can be maintained … "[19]

It was correctly considered that the relationship between the two crimes (namely the favoring of the perpetrator and the false testimony) is a relationship of the type genre – species, the testimony being nothing other than a special form of favoring. Under these conditions, maintaining a formal concurrence of crimes between the crime of favoring the perpetrator and the false testimony is in complete disagreement with the specific nature of the incrimination norms included in the Title referring to the crimes against the service of justice from the Criminal Code and does nothing other than breaching the ne bis in idem principle.

Thus, the more recent specialty doctrine indicates that: "The character of general and, therefore, subsidiary norm of the crime of favoring the perpetrator entails that, if the assistance given takes the form of a false testimony, only this latter crime shall be maintained[20]". In the same manner, the judicial practice indicates that: "the crime of favoring the perpetrator has a subsidiary nature and it cannot be maintained if there are other special incriminations of the favoring (such as the false testimony or the facilitation of escape).

Conclusion

Although the crime of false testimony is one of the incriminations which have continuity in the field of our criminal legislation, the matters related to such crime are far from being clarified. On the contrary, in our opinion, this crime gained new interpretation and application difficulties, especially by reference to the European standard regarding the witness protection, which witness is also recognized the privilege against self-incrimination. Under these conditions, it is obvious that the refusal to make a statement in witness capacity, especially in case the judicial body hears in this capacity the very person against whom a criminal complaint is submitted, for instance, should not have any criminal valences.

References

- V. Dobrinoiu, I. Pascu, M.A. Hotca, C. Păun, I. Chiș, M. Gorunescu, N. Neagu, M. Dobrinoiu, M. Sinescu, Noul Cod penal comentat, Partea specială, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014.
- Gr. Theodoru, Tratat de drept procesual, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007.
- V. Dongoroz and a collective of authors, Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului penal român, The Publishing House of the Romanian Academy and C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2003.
- A. Filipaş, Infracţiuni contra înfăptuirii justiţiei, The Publishing House of the Romanian Academy, Bucharest, 1985.
- M. Udroiu, Drept penal, partea specială, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016;
- C. Rotaru, A. Trandafir, V. Cioclei, Drept penal, Partea specială II, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016.

[18] C.Rotaru, A. Trandafir, V. Cioclei, Drept penal partea specială, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 69.

[19] Timişoara Court of Appeal, Criminal Division, Decision No. 1174/2013 commented in C.Rotaru, A. Trandafir, V. Cioclei, Drept penal partea specială, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 69.

[20] C.Rotaru, A. Trandafir, V. Cioclei, Drept penal partea specială, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 69.

SPECIAL FEATURES OF THE CRIMINAL OFFENCES LAID DOWN IN THE COMPANY LAW NO.31/1990

Mihai Adrian HOTCA

Abstract

The Law No.31/1990 is a non-criminal law with criminal provisions, as it is mainly aimed at regulating the operation of companies, but it also includes incrimination rules. Thus, Art. 271-279, Art. 280[1] and Art. 280[3] incriminate several acts through which the legal rules on companies are violated.

The incrimination rules included in the Law No.31/1990 are special incrimination rules (derogatory), as compared to the ones existing in the Criminal Code [Art.297 (abuse of office), Art.295 (embezzlement) etc.], because they are applied with priority, except when the penalty provided for in the Criminal Code is more severe (see Art.281 of the Law No.31/1990).

The incrimination rules existing in the Law No. 31/1990 apply exclusively to the companies regulated by this law, and not to other types of companies, with or without legal personality.

Keywords: companies; incrimination rules; non-criminal law with criminal provisions; Criminal Code; active subject; passive subject; legal subject-matter.

1. General

The most important legislative act, regulating the formation, the organisation and the dissolution of companies is the Law No. 31/1990[1].

This law is a technical and legal support intended for the entrepreneurs who want to start businesses but do now own enough resources to put in practice their ideas, and for those who want to carry out economic activities in cooperation with other persons, although they own the necessary capital or resources. If the first category concerns persons who do not own enough resources, the second category concerns persons who want to share the economic risks with others or who want to limit them.

The companies provided for in the Law No. 31/1990 are legal lucrative vehicles, configured in forms of organisation aimed at satisfying both the private economic interests and the general ones, made available to business man and to the persons who wish to invest and to make profit.

According to Art.1 para. (1) of the Law No.31/1990, in order to perform lucrative activities, the natural persons and the legal entities may associate together and set up companies with legal personality, in compliance with the provisions of this law.

And Art.1 para. (2) of the same law provides that the companies specified in para. (1) established in Romania are Romanian legal entities.

According to Art.2 of the Law No.31/1990, the companies shall be set up in one of the following forms:

- general partnership;
- limited partnership;
- joint stock company;
- limited partnership with a share capital;
- limited liability company.

Art.3 para. (1) of the Law No.31/1990 enshrines the principle (rule) of limitation of the legal liability of the members. The rule in the field of companies is that the social obligations (belonging to one of the companies regulated by the Law No. 31/1990) are secured by the assets of the company.

By way of exception to this principle, the partners in a partnership and the general partners in a limited partnership or in a limited partnership with a share capital are jointly and severally liable for the social obligations. In these derogatory situations, the creditors of the company shall pursue first the company and, only if the company does not pay them within not more than 15 days of the date of the formal notice, they will be able to pursue the partners, who are jointly and severally liable [Art. 3 para. (2)].

The shareholders, the limited partners and the members of the limited liability company are liable only up to the amount of the subscribed share capital [Art. 3 para (3)]. We note that in the business field the overwhelming majority of companies are limited liability companies. The companies limited by shares hold the next place, but at a great distance, while other forms of companies are almost non existent.

It is necessary to note here that the persons who committed acts provided for in the Law No.85/2014 or in the tax legislation shall be liable for the debts of the company regardless of the legal form of the latter, if the company is insolvent or in a state of insolvency.

According to the provisions of Art.4 of the Law No. 31/1990, the company with legal personality shall have at least 2 members, unless otherwise provided for

* Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: mihaihotca@gmail.com).

[1] For commentaries on the Law No. 31/1990, see St.D. Cărpenaru, S. David, C. Predoiu, Gh. Piperea, The Company Law, Comments on articles, 5th edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014; S. Bodu, The Company Law, commented and annotated, Rosetti Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017. Please note that this material has been published in a similar form, in the Romanian language, in RRDPA No. 1/2019.

by the law. The law provides for otherwise, for example, in the case of the limited liability company, that may be formed by one member.

The violation of legal rules regulating the formation, the organisation, the change or the cessation of the activity of companies can take different forms and can give rise to criminal, civil, disciplinary, tax liability, as the case may be, etc.

Given the reality that the companies have a special importance in the business field, the Romanian legislator incriminates certain violations of the rules laid down in the Law No.31/1990[2].

2. Special and common features of the criminal offences laid down in the Law No. 31/1990

2.1. Special features of the criminal offences laid down in the Law No.31/1990

I. From the standpoint of categories of criminal laws, the Law No.31/1990 is a non-criminal law with criminal provisions, as it is mainly aimed at regulating the operation of companies. Thus, Art. 271-280, Art. $280^1$ and Art. $280^3$ incriminate more acts through which the legal rules on companies are violated.

II. According to the criterion of the scope, the incrimination rules included in the Law No.31/1990 are special (derogatory) incrimination rules, as compared to the ones included in the Criminal Code [Art. 297 (abuse of office), Art. 295 (embezzlement) etc.]. These incrimination rules are special because whenever the same act meets both the incrimination requirements laid down in one of the criminal provisions of the Law No.31/1990, and the ones laid down in the Criminal Code or in other laws, the incrimination rules from the Law No.31/1990 are applied with priority, except when the penalty provided for in the Criminal Code is more severe (Art.281 of the Law No.31/1990)[3].

III. The incrimination rules existing in the Law No.31/1990 apply exclusively to the companies regulated by this law and not to other types of companies, with or without legal personality (unincorporated voluntary associations, joint ventures, cooperatives, agricultural companies). Also, the application of these incrimination rules may not be extended to other collective entities with legal personality, although there are similarities between them. Thus, the incrimination rules laid down in the Law No.31/1990 are not applicable to autonomous public service undertakings or to associations. A fortiori, the incrimination rules included in the Law No.31/1990 do not apply to the natural persons authorised to carry out economic activities, and nor to the individual or family enterprises set up according to the Government Emergency Ordinance No.44/2008.

IV. According to Art.281 of the Law No.31/1990, although the incrimination rules laid down in the Law No.31/1990 are special, they are also subsidiary. But the subsidiarity is limited to the cases in which other legislative acts provide for more severe penalties for the same acts, which means that the rule of subsidiarity is correlated with and supplemented by the principle of specialty, feature applicable in the case of special rules. If the rule of specialty applied in all cases - regardless of the serious nature of the criminal offence - then it could be said that the rules of the Law No.31/1990 are general rules, and not special ones. Therefore, these are conditional derogatory rules.

V. Another specific feature of the criminal offences regulated by the Law No. 31/1990 is that the legislator uses the technique of reference rules in respect of most of them. This specific feature - the legislative technique of reference rules - was criticised in the academic literature that claimed that this is not typical for the criminal legislator, and that the rules in question lack predictability and clarity, thus breaching the principle of legality. Moreover, by successive amendments, the hypothesis of many criminal rules was so deformed that it can no longer be used to incriminate [4].

Indeed, the addressee of the incrimination rules has to make many correlations both between the incrimination rules and between them and other rules of the Law No.31/1990, as there many (multiple) references from one rule to another[5].

From a different standpoint, in respect of some of the incrimination rules included in the Law No.31/1990, the legislator should reconsider the need of criminal liability, as long as there are other legal instruments than can achieve the aim contemplated by the legislator. For example, de lege ferenda, the failure

[2] For a review of the criminal offences relating to companies, see: A.M. Truichici, The criminal protection of company's assets, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007. See also the bibliography indicated by this author, including the works: R.Bodea, Criminal offences laid down in special laws, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, M.A. Hotca, M. Gorunescu, N. Neagu, M. Dobrinoiu, R. Geamănu, Criminal offences laid down in special laws, 4th edition, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017; S.Bodu, The Company Law, commented and annotated, Rosetti, Bucharest, 2017; N.Cârlescu, Criminal business law. Criminal offences laid down in the Criminal Code and the Company Law No. 31/1990, Bucharest, C.H. Beck Publishing House, 2018.

[3] Art.281 of the Law No.31/1990 provides that the sanctioning of criminal offences laid down in the Law No. 31/1990 is subject to the rule of subsidiarity according to which if, under the Criminal Code or certain special laws, these acts form the subject-matter of more severe criminal offences, they shall be punishable under the conditions and by the penalties provided for there.

[4] See S. Bodu, op.cit, p.1343.

[5] See A.M. Truichici, op. cit., p. 61.

to call the general meeting by the auditor (Art.276) could be excluded from the scope of criminal law.

In conclusion, after reviewing the incrimination rules provided for in the Law No.31/1990, one can note that the texts describing the criminal acts are not properly drafted, whereas they favour the possible non-unitary application of the law and the emergence of controversies[6], therefore a re-assessment of the criminal rules included in the Law No.31/1990 is required. However, this operation must be carried out in a systematic and global manner, namely both in respect of the correlation between the special incriminatory provisions, and in respect of the correlation of the incrimination rules with the rules to which the first ones make reference to. Also, in the framework of the re-assessment of the incrimination rules, we think that the legislator should review each such rule by reference to the principle of proportionality of the criminal protection.

2.2. Common features of the criminal offences laid down in the Law No.31/1990

I. The generic legal subject-matter of the criminal offences provided for in the Law No.31/1990 is represented by the social relationships arisen in connection with the formation, the organisation, the change and the cessation of the activity of limited liability companies, joint stock companies, limited partnerships, limited partnerships with a share capital and partnerships. In other words, the Romanian legislator protects the legal institution of companies, institution that is fundamental for any rule of law based on a market economy. The protection of companies is provided both for their benefit and for taking care of the fabric of social relations generated by the existence of these collective entities equipped with legal personality. On a different note, the criminal protection of companies covers various virtues or social values, essential for a democratic and social state, namely the honesty of the management bodies, the truth of the content of the documents issued by these entities, the observance of the fundamental rights of third parties, shareholders, employees, etc[7].

II. As regards the material subject-matter, the latter usually is absent in the case of criminal offences regulated by the Law No.31/1990.

III. From the standpoint of the consequences on the social values, most of the criminal offences provided for in the Law No 31/1990 have immediate effects consisting of states of danger for the protected social values.

IV. As regards the forms of the criminal offence (possible only in the case of intentional criminal offences), by reference to the performance of the criminal activity, we note that the attempt or the preparatory acts are not incriminated in the case of any of the criminal offences examined, whereas the legislator deemed them irrelevant from a criminal standpoint.

V. Another feature resulting from the analysis of the incrimination rules provided for in the Law No.31/1990 is that all these criminal offences are committed with intent. Although it is not necessary, but in order to emphasize the specificity of the subjective side, the legislator uses often, relatively redundantly (mainly in order to warn the addressees of the rules), the wording ”in bad faith” (which means here intent in any of its forms) or other terms that show that the guilt of the perpetrator must take the form of intent, and in some cases even the form of direct intent (for example, when it uses the wording in order to).

VI. Another specific feature of the criminal offences regulated by the Law No.31/1990 is that the criminal offences concerning companies have, directly or indirectly, a qualified active subject, because the persons covered by the incrimination rules must be founders, directors, managers, shareholders, internal auditors etc. The criminal offence provided for in Art. 280[3] (knowingly using the documents of a struck off company for the purpose of creating legal consequences).

The criminal offences provided for in the Law No.31/1990 may be committed, as author or co-author, by: the founder[8], the director, the general manager, the manager, the member of the Supervisory Board or of the Management Board or by the legal representative of the company[9]. No special conditions are required for the instigator or the accomplice, therefore any persons meeting the general conditions of criminal liability can be held criminally liable for this criminal offence.

According to Art.6 para (1) of the Law No.31/1990, the founders are the signatories of the memorandum of association and the persons with a decisive role in the formation of the company.

The persons who have (had) an important role in the formation of a company are those persons who, although are not the signatories of the memorandum of association (of course, the signatory founders usually play an important role), had an essential contribution to

[6] Ibidem.

[7] M.A. Hotca, M. Gorunescu, N. Neagu, M. Dobrinoiu, R. Geamănu, Criminal offences provided for in special laws…, op. cit., p. 348.

[8] The status of founder is required, alongside the other statutes (director, manager, etc.) only in the case of the criminal offences provided for in Art.271-272[1] and Art. 277 para (3)].

[9] According to Art.278 of the Law No.31/1990:” The provisions of Art.271-277 shall also apply to the liquidator to the extent to which they refer to obligations pertaining to his specific duties.” We note that the criminal offence provided for in Art.279 of the Law No.31/1990 may be committed, as author or co-author, only by a shareholder or a bondholder. And according to Art.280[1] of the same law, the incrimination rule implicitly concerns the shareholder and the member of a limited liability company.

the formation of the company in relation to which the act is committed. It concerns the so-called de facto founders[10], who inter alia had the idea of the business forming the objects, who attracted the investors etc. In any case, the status of person playing an important role in the formation of a company must follow from the acts legally prepared by the entitled persons. For example, from the memorandum of association.

Indeed, the founders of the companies may be signatories or non-signatories of the memorandum of association. The latter may benefit from certain advantages (public or non-public), according to the agreements between the founders, granted in consideration of their status of persons who played a decisive role in the formation of the company. The category of de facto founders does not have to include all persons who had a certain role, but less important in the formation of the company. The persons who were involved in the formation of the company, but without playing a decisive role, may not be integrated in the category of founders. For example, there are deemed such persons those who, regardless of the title (for free or for consideration) have contributed in a non-essential manner to the formation of a company (lawyers, consultants, etc)[11].

In the case of two-tier companies, two specific structures are regulated: the Management Board and the Supervisory Board. According to Art. $153^1$ of the Law No. 31/1990, the members of the Management Board are the persons who direct the activity of the joint stock company and fulfil the acts necessary and useful for achieving the objects of the company, except for those reserved by the law to the Supervisory Board and to the General Meeting of Shareholders. The Management Board perform its duties under the control of the Supervisory Board.

The Supervisory Board appoints the members of the Management Board and also assigns to one of them the title of Chairman of the Management Board [Art. $153^2$ para. (1)].

According to Art. $153^6$, the members of the Supervisory Board are appointed by the general meeting of shareholders, except for the first members, who are appointed by the memorandum of association. According to Art.$153^8$ of the Law No. 31/1990, the members of the Supervisory Board may not simultaneously be members of the Management Board. Also, they may not be members of the Supervisory Board and employees of the company at the same time.

The Supervisory Board has the following main duties:

a) exercises continuous control over the leadership of the company by the Management Board;
b) appoints and revokes the members of the Management Board;
c) verifies that the operations of managing the company comply with the law, with the memorandum of association and with the resolutions of the general meeting;
d) reports at least once a month to the general meeting of shareholders on the supervision carried out.

In exceptional cases, when the interest of the company requires it, the Supervisory Board may call the general meeting of shareholders.

Under Art.31 of the Law No.31/1990, the founders and the first members of the Board of Directors, of the Management Board and of the Supervisory Board respectively, are jointly liable from the time of formation of the company to the company and the third parties for:

- the full subscription of the share capital and the making of the payments established by the law or the memorandum of association;
- the existence of contributions in kind;
- the veracity of the publications made in order to set-up the company;
- the validity of the operations completed on behalf of the company before the formation and assumed by the latter.

Art.18 para. (1) of the Law No.31/1990 provides that, if the joint stock company is formed by public subscription, the founders shall prepare a prospectus that shall include the data laid down in Art.8, except for those concerning the directors and the managers, the members of the Management Board and of the Supervisory Board respectively, and the internal auditors or, where appropriate, the financial auditor, and that shall specify the date of closure of the subscription.

Also, Art.108 of the Law No.31/1990 provides that the shareholders who offer for sale their shares through public offer shall proceed according to the laws on the capital market.

The director status is acquired according to the provisions of the Law No.31/1990, and the latter has certain obligations provided for by the law or the memorandums of association. The obligations and the rights of the director have a different configuration depending on the legal form of the company (joint stock company, limited liability company etc.) and its type of organisation (one-tier or two-tier system). Art.71 of the Law No.31/1990 provides that the directors holding the right to represent the company may only transfer it if they were expressly authorised in this respect.

The academic literature considers that the de facto directors may be active subjects of this criminal offence[12]. As far as we are concerned, we consider that the person who is not mentioned as director in the deeds of the company, even if he de facto behaves as a director, may not be author or co-author of the criminal offences laid down in the Law No.31/1990. Such person may be held criminally liable as instigator or accomplice, where appropriate, if the other legal requirements are met.

[10] See S. Bodu, op. cit., p. 53.
[11] For more explanations, see S. Bodu, op.cit., p.54.
[12] See N. Cârlescu, op. cit., p. 389.

The manager is the person to whom the Board of Directors delegates the management of the company. According to Art.143 of the Law No.31/1990, the Board of Directors may delegate the management of the company to one or more managers, appointing one of them as general manager. The managers may be appointed from the directors or outside the Board of Directors. If the memorandum of association or the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders provides for in this respect, the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the company may be appointed General Manager. The delegation of the management of the company is mandatory in the case of joint stock companies whose annual financial statements are subject to a legal obligation of financial auditing.

The (general or ordinary) manager of the joint stock company is only the person to whom powers to manage the company were delegated. Any other person, regardless of the technical name of the position held within the company, is excluded from the application of the legal rules concerning the managers of the joint stock company.

Now, examining as a whole the provisions of the Law No.31/1990, it follows that the executive managers are included in the category of managers. If, besides the legal requirements, other duties than the specific ones are established for other persons, named executive managers, these persons may not be legally included in the category of managers.

The legal representative of a company is a person, other than the director, the manager or the general manager, who is authorised, according to the law, to perform certain activities in the name of and on behalf of the company. For example, the person designated as legal representative, in the framework of proceedings for holding liable the legal entities, according to the provisions of Art.491 para. (3) Criminal Procedure Code[13].

We note that the legal representative of the company may be a qualified author or co-author only in the case of criminal offences provided for in Art.271-274 of the Law No.31/1990.

The internal auditors are among the persons who may be authors or co-authors of the criminal offences laid down in Art.276 and Art.277 para. (1) and (2) of the Law No.31/1990. Also, the experts may be authors or co-authors in the case of the criminal offence laid down in Art.277 para. (1) and (2) of the same law.

In the case of co-authorship, all perpetrators must hold the special capacity provided for by the law, but all persons who meet the legal requirements for criminal liability may be accomplices and instigators. In other words, the secondary participants may come from the ones nominated or non-nominated by the law.

VII. The passive subjects (the injured parties) are not expressly qualified, which, at the first sight, means that the sphere of injured parties coincides with the sphere of legal subjects. However, this is indirectly limited to the category of legal entities covered by the law (of the companies in question) and to certain persons who may be harmed by the acts forming offences, to the shareholders, the members and the creditors of the companies in question respectively (the bondholders may also be included here). In other words, the companies harmed by the acts committed may mainly be injured parties and, alternatively, if they prove a harm, the creditors of the company, the members or the shareholders may be passive subjects. Of course, the injured parties may be civil parties in the criminal proceedings. The application of incrimination rules of the Law No.31/1990 is limited to the natural persons or legal entities who commit the acts described in relation to the companies regulated by this law. Consequently, no other collective entities are concerned, regardless of whether they have legal personality or not. For example, these incrimination rules do not apply to the persons activating within organisations similar to the companies regulated by the Law No.31/1990, such as the cooperatives, the agricultural companies, the unincorporated voluntary associations etc [14].

VIII. According to Art. 6 para. (2) of the Law No. 31/1990: ”The persons who, according to the law, are incapacitated or have been sentenced for criminal offences against the assets by breach of trust, corruption offences, embezzlement, offences of forgery of documents, tax evasion, criminal offences laid down in the Law No.656/2002 on preventing and sanctioning money laundering, and on establishing measures for preventing and fighting the financing of acts of terrorism, republished, or for the criminal offences provided for by this law (our emphasis added) cannot assume the position of founders”.

According to Art. $73^1$ of the same law:” The persons who, according to Art.6 para (2), may not be founders may also not be directors, managers, members of the Supervisory Board and of the Management Board, internal auditors or financial [13] According to Art.491 Criminal procedure code:” (1) During the various proceedings and procedures the legal entity shall be represented by its legal representative.

(2) If criminal action has started against the legal entity’s legal representative for the same offense or related offenses, said representative shall appoint a proxy to stand in for them.

(3) In the case stipulated at par. (2), if the legal entity has not appointed a proxy, such person shall be appointed, as the case may be, by the prosecutor who performs or supervises the criminal investigation, by the Preliminary Chamber Judge or by the court, selected from the ranks of insolvency practitioners who are certified under the law. Insolvency practitioners thus appointed shall operate, accordingly, under the stipulations of Art. 273 par. (1), (2), (4) and (5).”

[14] For this point of view and for references to the academic literature, see S. Bodu, op.cit., p.1344.

auditors, and if they were elected, they shall be revoked".

As a matter of principle, the prohibition (the forfeiture) of the right to be a founder and of the exercise of other rights (to be director, manager, member of the Supervisory Board and of the Management Board, internal auditor or financial auditor) lasts until the de jure rehabilitation occurs or the judgment granting the judicial rehabilitation becomes final. I said in principle whereas there might be other cases in which the interdictions, the incapacities or the forfeitures deriving from a conviction judgment cease. For example, if the rule laying down the forfeiture is repealed or if a law decriminalising the act in relation to which the conviction giving rise to the forfeiture of certain rights was ordered entries into force.

3. Conclusions

The Law No.31/1990 represents the legal and technical support intended for the business man and other investors through which they can put into practice their ideas.

As it is the most important law on companies, the legislator has also wanted to insert certain criminal incrimination rules in it, aimed at protecting the companies.

According to the criterion of the scope, the incrimination rules included in the Law No.31/1990 are special (derogatory) incrimination rules, as compared to those existing in the Criminal Code [Art. 297 (abuse in office), Art. 295 (embezzlement) etc.]. These incrimination rules are special, because whenever the same act meets both the incrimination requirements laid down in one of the criminal provisions of the Law No.31/1990 and those from the Criminal Code or from other laws, the incrimination rules of the Law No.31/1990 are applied with priority, except when the penalty included in the Criminal Code is more severe (Art.281 of the Law No.31/1990).

The incrimination rules of the Law No.31/1990 apply exclusively to the companies regulated by this law, and not to other types of companies, with or without legal personality (unincorporated voluntary associations, joint ventures, cooperatives, agricultural companies), and all the more they may not be applied to the businesses carried out by natural persons.

The incrimination rules provided for in the Law No.31/1990 are special and also subsidiary. However, this is limited to the cases in which other regulatory acts lay down offences more serious for the same acts, which means that the rule of subsidiarity is correlated with and supplemented by the principle of specialty, feature applicable in the case of special rules. If the rule of subsidiarity applied in all hypothesis - regardless of the severity of the penalty - then it could have been said that the rules of the Law No.31/1990 are general rules, and not special ones. It can be considered that they are conditional derogatory rules.

Another specific feature of the criminal offences regulated by the Law No.31/1990 is that the legislator uses the technique of reference rules in respect of most of them. This legislative technique of reference rules is questionable.

In conclusion, we note that the texts describing the criminal acts favour the possible non-unitary application of the law and the appearance of controversies, therefore a re-assessment of the criminal rules included in the Law No.31/1990 is required, including by reference to the principle of proportionality of the criminal protection.

References

- A.M. Truichici, The criminal protection of the company's assets, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007;
- R. Bodea, Criminal offences laid down in special laws, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011;
- M.A. Hotca, M. Gorunescu, N. Neagu, M. Dobrinoiu, R. Geamănu, Criminal offences laid down in special laws, 4th edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017;
- S. Bodu, Company law, commented and annotated, Rosetti Publishing House, 2017;
- N. Cârlescu, Criminal business law. Criminal offences laid down in the Criminal Code and the Company Law No. 31/1990, Bucharest, C.H. Beck Publishing House, 2018,
- St.D. Cărpenaru, S. David, C. Predoiu, Gh. Piperea, The Company Law, Comments on articles, 5th edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014.

PARTICULARITIES OF CIVIL ACTION IN THE CASE OF FRAUD BY BANK CREDIT CONTRACTS

Andrei-Viorel IUGAN[*]

Abstract

The crime of fraud is one of the most important threats facing the contemporary Romanian society. One of the most common ways of fraud is fraud through credit agreements. Of course, as in any criminal proceedings, in this case the question arises as to the way of repairing the damage caused by the offense. The particularity of solving the civil action in this case is the fact that, according to Romanian law, the credit contract is an executory title, so the bank would have no reason to wait for the criminal trial because it can immediately proceed to the forced execution of the person who obtained the credit in fraudulently.

However, there is also the view that the criminal court will have to cancel the credit agreement, which has been hit by absolute nullity at the end of the criminal trial, and to oblige the defendant to pay damages. Throughout this study, we will try to analyze the consequences of both solutions and try to identify the legal and sound solution.

Keywords: fraud, civil action, credit contract, executory title, penalty.

1. Introductory considerations.

It is possible that the commission of an offense will produce, in addition to the socially dangerous consequences, material and moral damages to the detriment of a natural or legal person, in which case the offense is also the source of civil proceedings.

The legal means by which the person materially or morally damaged seeks compensation for the damage caused in a criminal trial is the civil action.

As a judicial action, civil action is essentially an institution of civil law, becoming an institution of criminal procedural law insofar as it is exercised in a criminal proceeding.[1]

In this respect, Article 19 (1) C.pr.pen. states that "the civil action brought in the criminal proceeding has as its object the tortuous civil liability of the persons responsible under civil law for the damage caused by committing the deed which is the object of the criminal action".

Civil action arising from the commission of a criminal offense can also be exercised separately in civil proceedings; in some legal systems, such as the Anglo-Saxon, a civil action can not be brought before the criminal court, so that the person injured by the offense must go to the civil court to obtain compensation for the damage suffered. In most legislation, the two actions - both criminal and civil - have as a common source that the same offense can be exercised concurrently in the same criminal process; in this sense, the romanian specialists in the field of criminal procedural law were pronounced. The Romanian criminal procedure has been known this system since 1864.[2]

2. Fraud by credit bank contracts.

The crime of fraud is one of the most important threats facing the contemporary Romanian society. A particular feature of this form of criminal behavior is fraud by credit bank contracts

The economic crisis that the Romanian society has traveled since 2009 proved a particularly cruel reality: a large part of the loans granted by the banking units were fraudulently granted and the accompanying guarantees had no real effective coverage . The desire for enrichment of bank employees (who were rewarded by the amount of the credits granted, without counting that they later did not have any chance of recovering the amounts of money granted), the lending policy (the granting of loans was not decided by an independent structure in the bank's structure that has no contact with the client, but also by the officials of the agencies and branches to be rewarded for the respective credits), the formal verification of the sources of income for those applying for loans (the information in the income certificates, which most of the time they were forged, were not for example checked at the Territorial Labor Inspectorates) were the main elements that favored fraud. Practice has shown that there have been numerous criminal networks specializing in fraudulently obtaining credits, networks formed of managers of commercial companies (who issued employee certificates although their companies did not carry out any concrete economic activity, the only purpose of the existence of these companies being strictly deception banking units), bank officials, persons with the ability to falsify identity documents or other documents, etc. Against the backdrop of the desperate financial situation of many people, these groups have found numerous clients who have agreed to contract bank loans in their own name, with most of the loans coming back to the members of the criminal group.

[1] Ion Neagu, Drept Procesual Penal.Partea Generala, Bucuresti,Ed. Global Lex, 2007, p.73

[2] G. Theodoru, Tratat de Drept Procesual Penal, Bucureşti, Ed. Hamangiu, 2008, p. 113-114

Although the period we refer to seems far away, judicial practice proves that there are many cases currently pending court trials dealing with such bank frauds. Although such crimes are not as common at present, they are a constant reality.

3. Solving the civil action.

In this article, we aim to deal with the issue of solving civil action in the case of a fraud committed through credit agreements. Is such a civil action exercised by the banking unit in criminal proceedings admissible? And if so, under what conditions? The solutions were contradictory in the case-law.

In a first opinion, it was considered that the exercise of civil action in this case is inadmissible. The credit agreement between the bank unit and the person who took the credit is an enforceable title according to O.U.G. no. 99/2006. Thus, according to art. 120 of O.U.G. no. 99/2006, credit agreements, including real or personal guarantee contracts, concluded by a credit institution shall be enforceable titles.

The civil party already has an enforceable title, represented by the credit agreement, so that the admission of the civil action would lead to two titles for the same claim. In other words, the civil party already has an enforceable title in respect of that amount, the enforceable title which is precisely the contract of credit concluded. As a result, the enforcement of these titles would be of greater interest to the civil party, even through a forced execution conducted with the bailiff.

The situation is similar to the one in which the civil action is taken in the case of the offense of family abandonment, although for the maintenance pension there is an enforceable title represented by the court order by which the parent was obliged to pay it. In this respect, it has been stated in the case-law that "as regards the civil aspect of the present case, the court found that there was a ground for inadmissibility of the civil action, deriving from the fact that no longer a decision can be made to order the defendant to pay of the amounts targeted in the criminal proceedings, as long as the defendant has already been obliged, in a civil proceeding, to pay exactly the same amounts and the same title. In other words, the civil party already has a writ of execution on the respective pension, an enforcement order which is precisely the final and irrevocable civil sentence by which the defendant was obliged to pay a monthly maintenance pension."[3]

In another opinion it is considered that in such cases, the court is obliged to order the cancellation of credit agreements as a result of the restoration of the previous situation, and these have been hit by absolute nullity as a result of the unlawful cause. Under the conditions of the abolition of credit agreements, the possibility for the bank to make claims in the criminal proceeding opens through the exercise of civil action. In other words, the bank will not have two enforceable titles, because when the court order by which the defendant was ordered to pay the sums due defines definitively, the credit agreement is abolished and therefore can not constitute a basis for enforced execution the one found guilty.

4. Possible solutions

In our opinion the first opinion is the correct one. In this sense, it is also the majority practice. For example, in a recent ruling, the Bucharest Court of Appeal stated that "the Court, in line with the view of the court of first instance, notes that the claims relating to the credit agreement concluded with the defendant B in the amount of RON 30 485.90 are inadmissible since the contract in question is an enforceable title, so that the admission of a civil action under this contract would lead to two titles for the same claim."[4] In another case, another panel of judges from the same court stated that "in such situations, there is no question of an unlawful cause of the contracts concluded, but of a vitiation of consent (inferiority), which only attracts the relative nullity of credit agreements . At the same time, as long as the civil party already had an enforceable title against the defendants, it is questionable to what extent he could claim the same claims in a criminal trial."[5]

Besides, we can not help notice that the second opinion would only cause many practical difficulties. For example, almost always bank units do not wait for the criminal process to be finalized but address the bailiff to execute the credit agreement. If the credit agreement were to be canceled as a result of restoring the previous situation, virtually all execution acts under the credit agreement would have to be effectively abolished as a result of the principle of accessorium sequitur principalae. Such an interpretation would only jeopardize the principle of legal certainty and would be capable of generating new litigation (for example, the debtor's assets have been executed and leased to a third party in good faith). Even more obvious is the erroneous nature of that view if the credit agreement was associated with a mortgage contract on the assets of a third party.[6] In this situation, cancellation of the credit agreement would lead to the termination of the mortgage contract as a result of the latter's accessory character. Practically, as a result of this interpretation, the bank would obviously be disadvantaged because it would lack a real estate collateral that it consented to

[3] Jud. . Brașov, s. pen., sent. pen. nr. 2075/11.10.2016, J. Timișoara, s. pen. sent. pen. nr. 3073/7.10.2016, in I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, A.V. Iugan., Codul de Procedură Penală Adnotat, București, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2018, p. 91-92.

[4] C. Apel București, s. I pen., dec. nr. 1463/1.11.2018, unpublished

[5] C. Apel București, s. a II-a pen., dec. nr. 308/23.02.2016, unpublished.

[6] See also, T. București, sent. pen. nr. 221/13.02.2019, unpublished.

granting credit. In particular, the bank would have diminished its chances of obtaining compensation for the damage caused.

That is why we consider that in such cases the banking units are not in a position to demand compensation for the damage in the criminal proceedings, but will execute the credit contract.

However, two exceptions are to be recognized from this rule: the situation in which the bank carries out the civil action against other participants in the offense than the one with which it actually concluded the credit agreement and the hypothesis in which the credit agreement was obtained under a different name, using fake identity documents.

In the first case, obviously civil action is admissible in respect of the damage created, the civil party having no enforceable title against the defendant in respect of these amounts, if he is complicit or instigator of the acts by which the bank was deceived.

In the same sense, in a solution of judicial practice, it was shown that "regarding the rest of the claimed claims, in the context in which the defendant had the procedural quality of accomplice and instigator of the material acts by which the bank was injured, the civil party does not have a enforceable title against the defendant, but only against the suspects for whom the case was closed in the course of the criminal prosecution - as the act does not present the degree of social danger of a crime - and on whose behalf the contracts in question were concluded. Under these circumstances, amounts of money corresponding to credit agreements made by suspects AC, IM, RN and ZM with the civil party through the support and at the request of the defendant may be the object of the civil action in question.

In a fair and thorough manner the court of first instance analyzed the conditions of civil liability in question, 998-999 C.civ. previously valid on the date when the offense was committed, holding that the offending offense is the action of the defendant to issue false certificates, which allowed AC, IM, RN and SM to obtain credits, although not they had this right. Indeed, the condition of the existence of damage is also met, since the actions of the accused have caused material damage, amounting to the amounts with which the civil party has been harmed by the non-repayment (or delayed repayment) of the loans. At the same time it was rightly pointed out that the damage caused is the consequence of the illicit deed committed by the defendant, the act being committed by the guilty defendant, having the possible consequences of his actions on the civil party, consequences that, even if he did not follow, he accepted.

The Court observes that the first instance found that there are fulfilled the conditions for the detention of the defendant's civil liability and legally forced the defendant to pay the amount requested by the civil party. The Court also takes into consideration the provisions of Art. 1382 of the Civil Code, according to which those responsible for a damaging act are held jointly and severally liable for the damage and, in the case of joint and several liability, the creditor is entitled to require any person to execute the full benefit of the obligation which is the subject of the obligation.

The defendant had in the criminal case in question, complicity in the material acts imputed to suspects AC, IM, RN and ZM. Therefore, in this situation, the civil party could claim payment of the entire debt from any of those charged with the civil liability."[7]

Also, in the second case the civil action is admissible. The credit contract is concluded by the defendant under another name, it is obvious that the bank does not have a writ of execution against him and can not carry out his forced execution. Under these circumstances, it is necessary to terminate the concluded credit agreement, which is being punished with absolute nullity for the unlawful cause and the substantive settlement of the civil action.

If the court will effectively resolve the civil action, the question arises as to how the amount of the damage will be determined, namely whether the defendant will be required (of course, in addition to the amount borrowed) to pay all the penalties and commissions provided in the credit agreement or just to pay legal interest.

The problem arises from the art. 19 par. (1) C.pr.pen. in which it is stated that the civil action in the criminal proceedings has as object the tortuous civil liability of the persons responsible under civil law for the damage caused by committing the deed which is the object of the criminal action. As regards tort liability and not contractual liability, the question arises as to the extent to which the provisions of a contract for determining the amount of the damage can be taken into account. Moreover, the fact that the credit agreement in question is abolished must also be taken into account. Could such a contract be the basis for calculating the damage?

In the case-law, the views on how to calculate the damage in the case of frauds in the conventions, in the event that the parties have introduced a criminal case, are controversial.

For example, in a case involving a crime of fraud, consisting in the fact that the defendants as promise-sellers deceived 8 (eight) persons by signing of the sale-purchase pre-contracts with the notary of apartments to be built in Sibiu, for which the injured parties paid between 5.000-64.000 euros (penalties were set in each contract if the promissory-sellers did not sell the apartments), and later they found that those the apartments were either sold to others or were not finalized and entered in the Land Book, the defendants refusing under certain pretexts to repay sums of money collected in advance, the court, by settling the civil action, ordered the defendants not only to pay the sums received but also to pay penalties according to the concluded contracts.[8]

[7] C. Apel București, s. I pen., dec. nr. 1463/1.11.2018, unpublished.

In another case, the defendant was convicted of deception, noting that he had requested from B.C.R. SA a credit of 43.500,00 Euro, granted on February 27. The credit was guaranteed with the apartment located in Vaslui, ŞMM, bl. 337, et. 3, sc. C, ap. 7, on which a first-rank mortgage was signed in favor of the bank, authenticated by the conclusion no. 735 dated 29 February 2008 by the Bureau of Notary Public Associates B.M. and CRD defendant stating that the flat is good for themselves and "is free of charges or prosecutions of any kind on it there is litigation pending, being the acquisition date and so far legally and continuously" in its property despite the fact that that apartment was a common good of the defendant and his wife with whom he was in the process of divorce. The court, admitting the civil action brought by the bank unit, ordered the defendant to pay the outstanding debit and penalties under the credit agreement.[9]

Conversely, in a case where the defendant was convicted of fraud, it was noted that the defendant misled the injured person C.D. after 14 October 2011 when the parties authenticated B.N.P. A.A.A. the addendum to the authenticated Sale / Purchase Agreement dated September 29, 2011 (ending the authentication of October 14, 2011) invoking various unrealistic reasons not to end on January 25, 2012, the purchase contract for the studio for which an antecontract was previously concluded selling sale for the price of 26,000 euros, the goal pursued by defendant BH being to get a better price from another buyer for the same studio (32,000 euros) and thus causing damage to the injured party C.D. by the fact that he could not become the owner of the respective studio and can not oblige the defendant B.H. to conclude an authentic act of sale, provided that the respective studio was sold at auction under a forced execution procedure and subsequently sold to another person.

In the case, at the time of the conclusion of the sale / purchase agreement, the injured C.D. paid the accused B.H. the amount of 22,000 euros by bank transfer from C.M. - Buyer's father opened at Banca R.D. in the account of the defendant B.H. opened at the same bank. The price difference of 4,000 euros was to be paid by the injured C.D. in 2 installments, namely 2,000 euros until September 30, 2012, and 2,000 euros by September 30, 2013. The authentic purchase purchase agreement for the studio would be completed on September 30, 2013, otherwise defendant BH had to pay the injured party double the amount of the advance received or the injured party may apply to the civil court to obtain a court order to place a sale-purchase contract for that studio.

Solving the civil action, the appellate court held that it is not possible to order the defendant to pay double the advance received from the injured party, namely the sum of 44,000 euros, as this sum has its source in the clauses of the bilateral sale-purchase promise. However, the defendant's liability is engaged in the criminal offense on a non-contractual basis. In this respect, the appellate court considered that there was no causal link between the defendant's act of misleading the injured party and the amount of the damage consisting in the payment of an additional amount equal to the advance paid by the injured party resulting from the failure to execute the pre- for sale – purchase.[10]

In our opinion, in such cases, the defendant may be required to pay all the interest and penalties stipulated in the credit agreement, and not just to pay the legal interest. As long as both parties to the contract have agreed on the claims that the creditor may claim in the event of the debtor's non-performance, there is no reason that this clause will not produce its effects for the future until the payment effective flow.

It is necessary that the contractual provisions relating to the calculation of interest and commissions due by the defendant should continue to exist only for the proper compensation of the civil party, who is entitled both to recover the actual loss and the unrealized gain. If the defendant were not obliged to pay the interest and commissions set, it would be the paradoxical situation in which debtors of bad faith, who obtained fraudulent credits through the use of falsified documents, owe the bank in case of default of the credit compensation lower than a bona fide debtor who has legally obtained a credit and can no longer pay for it due to objective circumstances.

One last issue we want to address is the possibility of the criminal court invested with the resolution of civil action in these cases to censure the penalties and interest set out in the credit agreement and to find that these are abusive clauses.

In our opinion, not only can the court, but it is even obliged (including ex officio) to consider whether the bank contract, which is the basis for establishing the amount of the damage in the criminal proceedings, contains abusive clauses or not.

As regards the possibility for the court to raise of its own motion this issue, the Court of Justice of the European Union in Murciano Quintero judgment C-240/98 decided that the protection afforded to consumers by Directive No. 93/13 on unfair terms in consumer contracts requires the national court to be able to examine of its own motion whether a contract clause inferred from the judgment is abusive.

Applying this rule in practice, a court held in a case that the clause in Article 6 (2) of each credit agreement, which provides for penalties of 1% per day

[8] I.C.C.J, s.pen., dec. pen. Nr. 2978/13.11.2014, according www.scj.ro

[9] C. Apel Iași, s.pen., sent. pen. nr. 82/18.12.2014, according www.scj.ro; n the appeal made by the banking unit, the court ordered the pending settlement of the civil action following the death of the defendant - I.C.C.J, s.pen., dec. pen. nr. 197/29.05.2015, according www.scj.ro of delay, must be interpreted in the light of the provisions of Law No 193/2000 , with amendments to the abusive clauses in contracts between traders and consumers, in force at the time of the conclusion of the agreement between the parties to the dispute. Under Article 1 paragraph 3, traders are forbidden to stipulate abusive clauses in cartels with consumers.

[10] I.C.C.J, s.pen., dec. pen. nr. 219/12.06.2015, according www.scj.ro

Any contract provision that has not been negotiated directly, which does not allow the consumer to influence its nature and which creates a significant imbalance between the rights and obligations of the parties to the detriment of the consumer and violates the principle of good, is regarded as an abusive clause under Article 4 of the same act, Faith.

Thus, this provision protects the interests of the consumer, in the sense of allowing the possibility of negotiating the contractual terms from equality, while being an expression of the actual (real) manifestation of the will of freedom.

According to the court, the clause inserted in Article 6 (6) (2) of the General Conditions, which does not limit the amount of penalties in time or in amount, thus allowing the creditor to remain passive until the limitation period is fulfilled, does not entirely satisfy the requirements of a clause complying with legal provisions and the principle of good faith. That is because, on the one hand, the debtor could not have influenced its content, since that convention is a standard contract, which contains pre-established clauses unilaterally. On the other hand, the provision in question produces a serious imbalance between the situations of the parties, to the detriment of the debtor, because it establishes a unilateral liability by forcing the debtor to pay penalties in the event of default or late enforcement but not the creditor .

Under these conditions, seeing also the provisions of letter i) of Annex no. 1 to Law no. 193/2000, which lists exemplary types of abusive clauses, including the obligation to pay disproportionately high amounts in case of non-fulfillment contractual obligations by the trader in comparison with the damage suffered by the trader, the court instance considered that the obligation of the debtor to pay penalties in an unlimited amount, reaching a value exceeding two or three times the value of the debit for example, in the case of RN the outstanding capital is 13,273.68 lei and the delay penalties are 45,062.34 and in the case of ZM the remaining capital is 6,894.75 lei and the penalties are 22,096.82 lei - is justified by the actual loss suffered by the creditor, since in the period between the date of declaring the maturity of the loan up to which the penalties have been calculated - not serious monetary instability) is an abusive clause that damages the interests of the consumer-debtor.

Failure to observe the imperative, public order provisions of Article 4 of Law no. 193/2000 brings the total absolute nullity of the aforementioned abusive clauses. The sanction of invalidity has a virtual character, but it certainly results from the way in which the legal provision is drafted, as well as from its rationale and purpose.

Considering that the law was adopted to transpose the European Community Directive No.93 / 13 on unfair terms in consumer contracts and Romania has assumed the obligation to transpose and effectively apply Community legislation in inter-individual relations, only an interpretation that ensures the effective effectiveness of the prohibition of imposing unfair terms in contracts between traders and consumers can ensure the attainment of the aim pursued by the legislature, namely to discourage the laying down of unfavorable clauses for consumers under the general conditions imposed on them.

From the wording of the contract, which in fact is an adhesion contract, the party having no active role in negotiating the clauses, it has not obviously been that the debtor has had an effective opportunity to influence the nature of the inserted clauses, including those relating to and the amount of penalties in case of late payment of invoices and the collection of a pre-term termination fee.

On the effects of ineffectiveness, the Court held that in the judgment in Case C-618/10 Banco Español de Credito SA, the Court of Justice of the European Union stated that the national courts had only the obligation to exclude the application of an unfair contractual clause so that it produces binding effects on the consumer, but without being able to alter its content. That contract must, in principle, continue to exist without any change other than that resulting from the abolition of unfair terms inasmuch as, in accordance with the rules of national law, such maintenance of the contract is legally possible .

Under these circumstances, the court deduced from the amount of the damage claimed by the civil party the amount of penalties calculated according to the contract.[11]

5. Conclusions

As we have seen, the practical problems faced by courts in dealing with civil action in the case of credit fraud were quite numerous. Under these circumstances, the case-law solutions were also very varied.

Unitary jurisprudence is an indispensable element for increasing citizens confidence in the justice system. We hope that the present study, through the solutions proposed and the case-law presented, will be a first step in the unification of judicial practice and a useful tool for every person involved in the execution of the act of justice, and why not for any person interested in the issues presented.

[11] Jud. Sect. 5 București, sent. pen. nr. 1316/2.05.2018, unpublished.

References

- T. Dima, Drept Penal. Partea generală., Ed. Hamangiu, București, 2014.
- V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, Drept Penal. Partea specială. Teorie și practică judiciară. Conform Noului Cod Penal, București, Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2011.
- L. L. Lefterache, Drept Penal. Partea Generală, București, Ed. Hamangiu, 2016.
- I. Neagu, M. Damascin, Tratat de Procedură Penală. Partea Generală, București, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2014.
- I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, A.V. Iugan., Codul de Procedură Penală Adnotat, București, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2018
- V. Papadopol, M. Popovici*, Repertoriu alfabetic de practică judiciară în materie penală pe anii 1969-1975*, Editura Ştiinţifică şi Enciclopedică, București 1977.
- F. Streteanu, D. Nițu, Drept Penal. Partea Generală, vol. I, Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2014.
- G. Theodoru, Tratat de Drept Procesual Penal, București, Ed. Hamangiu, 2008.
- M. Udroiu, Drept Penal. Partea Specială, București, Ed. C.H. Beck, 2016.

ACTUAL PROBLEMS OF REALIZATION OF THE RIGHT OF PERSONAL PROTECTION OF THE ACCUSED IN THE CONTEXT OF THE REQUIREMENT FOR A TERM FOR PRE-TRIAL INVESTIGATION ACCORDING TO THE BULGARIAN CRIMINAL PROCEDURE CODE.

Lyuboslav LYUBENOV

Abstract

The present scientific publication represents an attempt for clarification the question, how affects the principle of objective truth and the right of personal protection of the accused person to carry out the pre-trial investigation in an explicity regulated by law period of time? For this purpose, is made an obserbance of Art.234, par.7 of the Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Bulgaria and the legal consequences. Based on the understanding that the defendant's right to personal protection is in its broadest sense, a recognized and guaranteed opportunity for personal, active participation in criminal proceedings we have mainly dealt with the issue of excluding important evidence of justification only because they were collected beyond the period of investigation and over the forms of limiting the personal activity of the accused person in the preliminary stage of trial through the investigation period itself. In the context of the problems described, a case- law of the European Court of Human rights has also been discussed. In the final part of the report are made theoretical conclusions on the basis of which were formulated proposals for improvement of the Bulgarian Code of Criminal Procedure.

Keywords: right of personal protection, criminal procedure law, European court of Human right, case-law.

1. Introduction

The ground for this paper is the latest amendments made 2017 in Art. 234 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Republic of Bulgaria. With these amendments, the legislator finally strengthened his understanding of conducting the pre-trial investigation in absolute term. In my opinion, this normative innovation inadvertently contradicts the disclosure of objective truth and the right to personal protection, which is linked to the requirement for the duration of the study in several different directions: personal protection is exercised at all stages of the process (Art. 122 par. 1 from the Constitution of Republic of Bulgaria; Article 15 of Criminal Procedure Code of Republic of Bulgaria); the accused as a rule presents and is involved in the pre-trial investigation (Art. 206 of the Criminal Procedure Code); the accused has the opportunity to make evidential requests and to lay evidence in the course of the investigation (Art.55, 107 and 230 of the Criminal Procedure Code); the accused has the right to a sufficient time to prepare for his defense (Art. 6 (3) (b) ECHR). The present exposition describes this problem and offers a solution.

2. Content

According to the amended Art. 234, par. 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code "The investigation shall be performed and the case forwarded to the prosecutor within two months from the date of its institution."

In par. 2 of the same article is expressly prescribed the possibility of shortening the basic term for investigation by the prosecutor by defining shorter than the two-month period, and in par. 3 - possibility of extending the term under par. 1 in the factual and legal complexity of the case by up to four months, in cases where it can be assumed that the extended term is also insufficient, the administrative head of the respective prosecutor's office or a prosecutor authorized by him may extend the extended term at the request of supervising prosecutor, and the period of any extension may not be longer than two months. In paragraph 4 of Art. 234 of the Criminal Procedure Code, it is stated in particular that " The reasoned request for prolongation of the period shall be sent before expiration of the terms under Par. 1 and 2. Consequently, the timely completion of the pre-trial phase of the process is legally secured, above all with the introduction of a preliminary pre-trial investigation.

The investigating authorities must, as a general rule, clarify the facts and circumstances of the criminal proceedings within the prescribed time limit, and only exceptionally, for a shorter or longer term but always in a clearly specified time, unlike the court which Art. 22, par. 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code empowers the general obligation to consider and resolve the cases within a reasonable time. This dual mode of development and completion of criminal proceedings inevitably leads to a number of both theoretical and practical problems.

It is not clear from the law itself why the court at the stage of a judicial investigation should not be stimulated and accordingly limited in its actions by a deliberate time limit, and the pre-trial authorities must.

* Lecturer, PhD candidate, Faculty of Law University of Ruse „Angel Kanchev" (e-mail: lvlyubenov@uni-ruse.bg)

Although in substance, the investigation activity is identical and with the same procedural importance for the entire criminal process - a concrete act of revealing the objective truth by getting to know the issues relevant to the proper resolution of the case. The described ambiguity is exacerbated when the possibilities for disclosure of the objective truth of the court are compared with those of the investigating police authorities and the investigators who ex lege are obliged in the pre-trial phase of the trial to conduct a full, objective and comprehensive study within the two-month period because the extension and the shortening of the investigation period is not a mandatory one, but only a discretionary option, and secondly an opportunity addressed to the prosecutor, i.e. lies beyond their own discretion and authority - argument Art. 234, par. 2-3 Criminal Procedure Code. In other words, there is no answer to the question why the same criminal case at the pre-trial stage is considered according to the legislator's preliminary assessment of a sufficient time for its solution, and in the court - according to the court's decision, for a reasonable time?! It can be summarized that the pre-trial investigation "ipso iure" should take place and the case should be handed over to the prosecutor within two months of its formation in accordance with Art. 234, par. 1 of Criminal Procedure Code, as "de lege lata" conducting the preliminary investigation within the terms of par. 2-3 of the same article, constitutes an optional deviation from the general text (Article 234, paragraph 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code), i.e. an exception to the general rule and not the basic rule itself. The latest amendments from 2017 in Criminal Procedure Code do not contradict this conclusion. Although, in Art. 234, par. 3 of the Code states that the investigation period may be extended, i.e repeatedly and not once, it can not be assumed that the extensions themselves can be carried out indefinitely, because, according to Art. 203 par. 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code: " The investigative body shall be obligated within the shortest possible period to collect the necessary evidence required for the discovery of the objective truth, being guided by the law, his/her inner conviction and the instructions of the prosecutor."

From the aboved, it can be safely concluded that the existence of an obligation to carry out the preliminary investigation as soon as possible necessarily implies an obligation to temporarily reveal the objective truth in the pre-trial phase of the trial. This is because the objective truth "de jure" is revealed only through a lawful investigation, that is, in the order and with the means stated in the code – argument- Article 106 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The normative introduction of a deadline for revealing the objective truth is in disharmony with Art. 121, par. 2 of the Constitution of Republic of Bulgaria, according to which: "The proceedings in the cases ensure the establishment of the truth". The constitutional legislator is categorical that all procedure, i.e pre-trial proceedings, is organized and structured in such a way as to ensure that the knowledgeable subjects can reach the objective truth in full and not as far as possible within a certain procedural timeframe. This understanding could be reached in another formally-logical way, namely, it is not possible to fulfill the tasks referred to in Art. 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code without "... establishing the facts and circumstances of the criminal process as they have been in the objective reality"[1]. For example, disclosing the offense and disclosure to the guilty is always a function of clearly illustrating the criminal event and the involvement of the accused in it. The timely discovery of objective truth violates the very principle of objective truth (Article 13 of the Criminal Procedure Code) and leads to conclusions, most of which are absolutely unacceptable:

First of all, it is clear from the obligation that the objective truth be strictly established within the pre-trial investigation period that it must be disclosed on a provisional basis - to the extent that the term has not expired, and not unconditionally, as stated in Art. 13 of the Criminal Procedure Code - with all necessary measures for the purpose.

Second, since the objective truth must be disclosed only within the period of investigation and not according to the need to examine all the circumstances relevant to the outcome of the case, it is permissible and sufficient that it be sought in part rather than in full, exhaustively.

Third, as the objective truth is revealed exclusively within the time limit and not according to the factual nature and legal complexity of the case, it is permissible to derive it entirely according to the diligence, the approach and the subjective possibilities of the investigative bodies to orientate quickly and correctly in time.

Fourth, the requirement for objective truth to be "delivered", that is brought quickly into the process, finally stimulates the investigating authorities to ignore the details of their work, which increases the risk of procedural errors and significantly reduces the quality of their work.

Fifth, the disclosure of objective truth with the judicious speed, but without the necessary quality, excludes the possibility of a proper settlement of the case.

Sixth, according to the practice - the wrongful resolution of the case always comes at the expense of citizens' rights and their trust in the justice system, etc.

From the above, it can be inferred that the disclosure of objective truth within the explicitly defined time frame for pre-trial investigation is a factual and formal-legal disagreement with the lawful and proper resolution of the case. This disagreement ultimately reduces considerably the security of state interests and hence of personal interests, because ... "in our criminal proceedings, the interests of the state are harmoniously combined with the interests of the person"[2] Therefore, the timely disclosure of objective truth adversely affects the full exercise of the defendant's right of defense. Personal protection, conceived as a specific subjective right, means the possibility of self-defense of certain rights and legitimate interests in the criminal process - active participation aimed at highlighting those circumstances of the subject of proof that exclude or mitigate the penal liability of the accused i.e. disclosure of objective truth about them from the accused himself. From this point of view, personal protection always helps to properly solve the case. The introduction of a time-limit for disclosure of the objective truth in the pre-trial phase infringes the right to personal protection, so that, through its exercise, the accused reveals the truth of the factual situations in which he is using the case.

[1] С. Павлов, Наказателен процес на Република България – обща част, С. „Сиби", 1996 г., с. 108.

The necessity for the objective truth to be revealed exclusively within the term for pre-trial investigation is imposed in Art. 234, par. 7 of Criminal Procedure Code, with the following wording: "... Investigative actions taken outside the time limits under Paragraphs 1 - 3 shall not generate legal effect and the evidence collected may not be used before court for the issuance of a sentence." Consequently, the disclosure of the objective truth by will and by the means described in the code by both the state and the accused outside the term a pre-litigation investigation is inadmissible in nature and the person subject to it should be subject to a procedural penalty consisting in disqualification of the evidence gathered outside the due date. Although the procedural inadmissibility of evidence and evidence attracted outside the term of investigation is not a classical legal sanction, since it neither adversely affects the person of the offender by imposing certain sanctionary consequences on him (burdens, deprivation) nor his property. It is a typical procedural penalty aimed at restoring the situation existing before the offense.

By argument of legal theory, the term is relevant for a certain period of time in which legal rights are exercised and legal obligations are being fulfilled. From the point of view of its realization, it is an event, as the physical exhaustion of time occurs regardless of the presence of human will for that[3]. As an event in certain cases, the term is raised by the legislator as a particular legal fact from the category of legal events, the preliminary manifestation of which is confined to the appearance of certain legal consequences. Considered as a legal fact, the term is part of the composition of the legal phenomenon - a necessary component of it and a separate, independent precondition for the creation, modification or extinction of rights and obligations[4]. In the indicated sense the legislator in Art. 234, par. 7 of the Criminal Procedure Code treats the term of investigation. A careful analysis of the provision shows that the expiration of the investigation period is a legal fact, the manifestation of which exits the pre-emptive environment for a pre-trial investigation. In other words, the expiration of the terms under par. 1-3 of Art. 234 of Criminal Procedure Code entails the obligation to suspend the investigation, the non-fulfillment of which leads to procedural sanction - the procedural inadmissibility of the collected material and the impossibility of being used by and before the court in the issuing of the sentence. But in order to be an imperative, the law is "... above all-evaluation norm"[5]. This is because "... whoever wants to motivate someone, he must know beforehand towards what he wants to motivate; he must have assessed that thing in a certain positive sense, i.e. to have found it valuable."[6] In this logical sequence, the norm of Art. 234, par. 7 of Criminal Procedure Code should also state what is the state of public law that is behind its imperative, i.e what is publicly worthwhile and what is not to occur or not to be subject to sanction. Obviously, the legislator has considered it to be publicly harmful to use evidence gathered beyond the time-limit for pre-trial investigation, i.e, it is publicly valuable to close the criminal proceedings quickly. This legislative decision can only be justified if the exclusion of evidence formally collected outside the time-limit for pre-trial investigation is in favor and not at the expense of the rights and legitimate interests of the participants in the criminal proceedings and, in particular, the accused as a subject in the pre-trial phase and in the judiciary. Simple verification of the claim that the rapid completion of criminal proceedings corresponds to the effective and efficient protection of the legal good of the accused leads to important results, some of which are considered as significant below.

First, from the literal interpretation of Art. 234, par. 7 of the Criminal Procedure Code, it is remarkable that there is no obstacle to certain justifiable evidence, that they are inappropriate and consequently used in the process, even though the request for their collection was made at the end of the term or shortly after its expiration, only on the pretext that their collection outside the same would not produce the intended legal consequences and would therefore be meaningless. This, in turn, is nothing other than depriving the defendant of free evidence valuable evidence, especially considering the fact that the taking of evidence and the collection of the materials mentioned therein takes place outside his or her personality. It is addressed to the competent state authorities as a procedural obligation (Article 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code), which can not be implemented in a timely manner, even consciously, in general. The omission of the term for unreasonable reasons is irreparable - Art. 186, par. 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code and the disciplinary

[2] Пак там, с. 90.

[3] Р. Ташев, Обща теория на правото, С., „Сиби", 2010 г., с.235-236.

[4] Виж подробно относно строежа на равното явление, В. Ганев, Курс по обща теория на правото – увод и методология на правото, С., „Академично издателство Проф. Марин Дринов", 1995 г., с. 15-20.

[5] Н. Долапчиев, Наказателно право – обща част, С., „ Издателство на Българската академия на науките", 1944 г., с.202.

[6] Пак там.

sanctioning of state bodies for deliberate procedural passivity will in no way remedy the unfavorable consequences of expiry of the term for the accused.

Second, the provision mentioned above precludes the acceptance of any documentary evidence deposited personally by the accused, even when the expiration date is only one day, which is absurd and in violation of his or her effective personal protection. It goes without saying that there is no obstacle to the accused by an active subject of the investigation to be reduced to a passive object of the same by means of purely formal legal arguments.

Third, Art. 234, par. 7 of the Criminal Procedure Code makes it possible to exclude without justification the exculpatory evidence that is included outside the general investigation period by carrying out procedural investigative actions (prequisition, search, seizure, etc.).[7]

Fourth, the continuation of the term in the criminal proceedings, according to Art. 185, par. 1 of Criminal Procedure Code is only possible if it is determined by the court or pre-trial bodies in the presence of valid reasons and the filing of an application before the expiration of the term. Probably, because the time for investigation is determined by law, not by a body of pre-trial proceedings or by the court, the legislator in par. 3 of Art. 234 talks about the extension of the investigation period. It is obviously a particular case of extension of the time-limit, since there is no significant difference between the extension and the extension of the time-limit, in both cases an additional period of time is added to one expiration date. But, and the "special" extension of the term within the meaning of Art. 234, par. 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code shall be implemented by decision of the prosecutor or of the administrative head of the respective prosecutor's office. Then, what is the guarantee that the extensions of the pre-trial time will not be carried out systematically for the prosecution's needs and too little, or at least for those of the defense?

Fifth, the availability of time-limits for pre-trial investigation encourages public authorities to transfer the evidence-based process primarily to the judicial phase, where the judicial investigation is conducted within a reasonable, not exactly specified, time. This inevitably leads to the occurrence of a probative incompleteness, which is in some cases absolutely insurmountable to the accused, even due to the nature of the evidence itself, which can be erased, destroyed or damaged by the beginning of the judicial investigation. On the other hand, probative deficiency is a basic prerequisite for raising and introducing unjustified and unlawful charges. It fills the environment for making erroneous conclusions about the existence of the necessary and sufficient grounds for drafting and filing the indictments in court (Article 246 of the Criminal Procedure Code), as the prosecutor is deprived of "... all the evidence that could be objectively gathered and investigate in the pre-trial investigation."[8]

Sixth, according to Art. 234, par. 7 of Criminal Procedure Code, the materials gathered outside the term for pre-trial investigation can not be used, but only when the sentence is handed down. Therefore, per argumentum a contrario, they could be used in the enforcement of other judicial acts. For example, when deciding to approve a settlement agreement - Art. 382 of the Criminal Procedure Code, or in the adoption of a decision to convict the accused, by releasing him from criminal responsibility by imposing an administrative penalty - Art. 378 Criminal Procedure Code. The conclusion is that the same evidence may be admissible or inadmissible depending on the requirements of the case, or in other words there is no obstacle to surrendering the probative value of the evidence in the case - something incompatible with the philosophy underlying in the Constitution of Republic of Bulgaria and the Bulgarian Criminal Procedure Code.[9]

Seventh, literal interpretation and application of Art. 234 par. 7 of the Criminal Procedure Code raises serious gaps in the practice, for example, is it unclear, should it be disqualified from the evidence in the case of certain protocols with justification for the accused only because the compulsory means of obtaining them (certification, perquisition, search etc.) were carried out within the time limit for pre-trial investigation, but the approval of the records by the court occurred later, after its expiration? In the Criminal Procedure Code, there is no specific answer to the question what happens when the pre-trial proceedings are initiated against an unknown perpetrator (Article 215 of the Criminal Procedure Code) and no action has been taken within the prescribed timeframe to investigate the crime, but after the expiry of the time a person accused of being charged with the minutes of the first investigative action against him.

Eighth, the short deadlines for the pre-trial phase of the trial encourage pre-trial authorities to "look for" at the cost of all the confessions of the accused, in order to guarantee their accusation. The extraction and use of the confessions of the accused de lege lata is facilitated by the legislator with the institute of the interrogation of the accused before a judge - Art. 222 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The adoption of this procedural figure has the following meaning: "... after confession has been reached, the accused is interrogated before a judge, and the relevant protocol is drawn up. If in the course of the judicial investigation he gives a substantially contradictory explanation, only the record of the interrogation before a judge /to which he or she is given a prior power/ ... from what has been said so far ... the interrogation before a judge in the pre-trial proceedings is an institute of investigation /inquisitorial/. It introduces a preliminary force of evidence and reabilitates the accused's confession as the queen of evidence."[10] In summary, the short deadlines for investigation, especially of a complicated criminal activity, the preliminary proceedings motivate their position by compensating the insufficient time with methods from the inquisitorial process.

[7] В този см., вж., М. Чинова, Досъдебното производство по НПК – теория и практика, С., „Сиела", 2013 г., с.388.
[8] Н. Манев, Развитие на реформата на наказателния процес, С., „Сиела", 2018 г., с. 103.
[9] Вж в този см., пак там., с. 102.

Ninth, the provision of an explicit deadline for pre-trial investigation is also contrary to european standards of protection. Under Article 6 (1) of the ECHR, every person is entitled to request that his case be dealt with within a reasonable time. The requirement of reasonableness of the term in European theory and practice aims not to accelerate the criminal proceedings but to prevent uncertainty in the situation of the accused for too long[11]. In criminal cases "... the guarantee for reasonable time is valid from the moment when the person is accused wich means from the moment it is significantly affected.[12]" Therefore the guarantee time applies as early as in the pre-trial proceedings. Under the ECHR, criminal cases are not dealt with in absolute terms[13]. The reasonableness of the time-limit depends always on specific circumstances such as the complexity of the case (number of accusations against one person, number of accused persons, amount of evidence, legal complexity of the concerned issues, etc.), the applicant's behavior and the behavior of the competent administrative and judicial authorities[14]. Thus, the European legislator appealed for a criminal trial that takes into account the needs of the defendant to fully counter the indictment according to the nature and peculiarities of each individual case and not to the expense of them in pursuing a speedy resolution of criminal cases because of the very speed as a value.

Tenth, the existence of a special term for pre-trial investigation also contradicts the right to sufficient time for the preparation of the protection provided in Art. 6, item 3, letter "b" of the ECHR. Ensuring sufficient time to prepare the defense is designed to protect the accused from a quick trial[15]. By analyzing the case law of the Court of Human Rights, there would be no violation of Art. 6 (3) of the Convention if, within the time-limit for pre-trial investigation, the accused has sufficient time to take full account of the facts of the case, provided that his competence, his need for further training, authorization of a defense counsel, for a longer discussion meeting with a lawyer[16].

4. Conclusions

In our view, the written above is sufficient to justify the understanding that the introduction of an absolute time-limit for pre-trial investigation runs counter to both the principle of disclosure of the objective truth and the right to personal protection. Therefore, "de lege lata" in Art. 234 form Criminal Procedure Code terms is necessary to be understanded and treated as instructive and disciplining, and in no way fatal. In agreement with this conclusion, we propose 'de lege ferenda' to amend the text in line with the broader (European) requirement for a reasonable period or to build a new, more flexible, procedure for extending the time-limits for investigation in the preliminary phase. It is in the interest of the participants in the criminal proceedings that the legislator should strive for the complete elimination of the pre-trial investigation periods rather than for their extension or even less to their reduction.

Acknowledgement

/"The present report is published by the financial support of project //BG05M2OP001-2.009-0011-C01/ "/Support for human resources development in the field of research and innovation in University of Ruse "Angel Kanchev"./

References

- С. Павлов, Наказателен процес на Република България – обща част, С. „Сиби",1996 г.
- Р. Ташев, Обща теория на правото, С., „Сиби", 2010 г.
- В. Ганев, Курс по обща теория на правото – увод и методология на правото, С., „Академично издателство Проф. Марин Дринов", 1995 г.
- Н. Долапчиев, Наказателно право – обща част, С., „ Издателство на Българската академия на
- М. Чинова, Досъдебното производство по НПК – теория и практика, С., „Сиела", 2013 г.
- Н. Манев, Развитие на реформата на наказателния процес, С., „Сиела", 2018 г.
- И. Сълов, Актуални въпроси на наказателния процес, С., „Нова звезда", 2014 г.
- Харис, О' Бойл, Уробрик, Бейтс, Бъкли, Право на европейската конвенция за правата на човека., С., „Сиела", 2015 г.
- Darryl K. Brown, Jenia Iontcheva Turner, Bettina Weisser, The Oxford Handbook of Criminal Process, Published: 14 April 2019 ISBN: 9780190659837.
- Иванов М.М. Специалните служби и политическата класа.// Professional, 2015, брой 13

[10] И. Сълов, Актуални въпроси на наказателния процес, С., „Нова звезда", 2014 г., с. 46.
[11] Харис, О' Бойл, Уробрик, Бейтс, Бъкли, Право на европейската конвенция за правата на човека., С., „Сиела", 2015 г., с. 523.
[12] Пак там.
[13] Пак там., с. 524
[14] Pedersen and Baadsgaard v. Denmark [GC], No. 49017/99, judgment of 17 December 2004, Reports 2004-XI
[15] Müller and Others v. Switzerland, 24 May 1988, § 35, Series A no. 133
[16] Харис, О' Бойл, Уробрик, Бейтс, Бъкли, Право на европейската конвенция…, цит съч, с., 561-562: X vs Austria, Le compte vs Belgium, Samer vs Germany, Kremzow vs Austria и др.

ISSUES REGARDING THE JURISDICTION IN CASE OF JOINING THE CRIMINAL CASES

Dan LUPAȘCU[*]
Mihai MAREȘ[]

Abstract

The joinder of criminal cases determines a prorogation of material or territorial jurisdiction of the court or, as the case may be, of the prosecuting authority ensuring a proper performance of the legal activities.

The current Code of Criminal Procedure regulates both the compulsory joinder and the optional joinder of the criminal cases, according to a summary proceedings, stipulated in article 45 (during the trial), and, respectively, article 63 paragraph (1) related to article 45 (during the criminal investigation).

The concurrence between the civil and military nature of the judicial body is settled in favour of the civil nature of the judicial body, observing the equivalence of its degree. After joining the cases, the enactment of certain decisions by the judicial body determines either maintaining the legal empowerment (in case of the court) or, as the case may be, declining the jurisdiction (in case of the prosecuting authority).

Keywords: jurisdiction; joinder of cases; court; prosecution body; joinder procedure.

1. Introduction

The joinder of criminal cases is an institution of major importance in the criminal procedural law with direct repercussions on the procedural trajectory of a criminal case. Although the joining of the cases is of such major importance, it does not benefit from a thorough and exhaustive analysis in the specialized legal doctrine.

Also, the judicial bodies in their practice do not approach this institution with much interest, in general the prosecutors and the courts of law deal with it in an expeditious way, by a simple order of joinder and with no further argumentation as to why the joinder is applicable, nor why the legal conditions of joining the cases are actually met in the respective cases.

This paper deals with a full theoretical, but still pragmatic, analysis of both the old and the new procedural regulations in the matter of joinder of the cases in criminal matters. By examining current legislation as compared to the old regulation, some principles can be drawn up to provide answers to several aspects signaled in the practice of prosecutor's offices or courts of law. The analysis of each case of bringing together criminal cases has an important role for the clarification of the problems caused by what we contend to be a limited regulation of this procedural institution.

It shall be noted from our analysis that the regulation on the joinder of cases in criminal matters is not very vast and it does not address all the issues that may appear in the judicial practice.

This paper therefore aims to bring to light some controversy over the current regulations in the matters related to the joinder of the cases in criminal matters, problems that give rise to a proper doctrinal analysis in order to provide the necessary answers. It is our contention that this paper will definitely serve as guideline for the legal authors and for the legal professionals as well.

2. General issues. Institution of joining the cases in criminal matters

Regulatory act in the current Code of Criminal Procedure

The current Code of Criminal Procedure[1] (hereinafter referred to as the Code of Criminal Procedure) regulates the joinder of the criminal cases as independent and special procedural institution, specific to courts, in articles 43-45, within Title III (Participants in criminal proceedings), Chapter II (Jurisdiction of judicial bodies), Section 3, a section marginally and suggestively called "Special stipulations regarding the jurisdiction of courts".

The simple positioning of the institution for joining the cases within this section determines ab initio its qualification as an institution waiving the common rules on the jurisdiction of the courts.

[*] PhD, Lecturer, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, owner at „Dan Lupaşcu" Law Office – Bucharest Bar (e-mail: prof.danlupascu@gmail.com);

[] PhD, The Institute of Legal Research „Acad. Andrei Rădulescu" of the Romanian Academy, managing partner at Mareș / Danilescu / Mareș" Law Firm – Bucharest Bar (e-mail: mihai.mares@mares.ro).

[1] Effective from 1 February 2014.

The joinder of cases by the prosecution bodies[2] does not benefit from a freestanding regulation in the Code of Criminal Procedure, different from the one related to the jurisdiction of courts. Under the provisions of article 63 paragraphs (1) and (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, contained in Section 5 (Prosecuting authorities and their jurisdiction) of the same Title and the same Chapter of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the provisions of article 43-45 also properly apply during the criminal investigation, with one exception, but to which we shall refer below.

As we shall mention, the current regulation is not much different from previous regulation in the Previous Code of Criminal Procedure (hereafter referred to as the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968), the regulatory differences being rather formal than related to content.

Notion. Rationale for regulating the joinder of cases in criminal matters

As it results from the very topography of the initial criminal procedural provisions, the joinder of cases is a special procedural incident with implications on the jurisdiction in criminal matters - both of the courts and of the prosecuting authorities. The joinder of cases is, in a more plastic but eloquent expression, "gathering together" several criminal cases - among which there are certain links - either during the criminal investigation or during the trial, even if the judicial body (the court or prosecuting authority) would not normally be competent to settle all these cases.

From a technical and legal point of view, the specialized doctrine has correctly acknowledged that the joinder is the operation in which two or more causes are brought together in one file to be solved by one court order[3]. The joinder or criminal procedural junction occurs when substantive links exist between criminal cases, so that finding the truth can only be achieved by examining these cases within the same proceedings[4].

As a matter of course, the Code of Criminal Procedure does not define as such the notion of joinder of criminal cases or their effects on judicial proceedings, but its meaning and implications are easily deduced from all the provisions governing it.

The legislator has thus provided the institution for joining the cases for the good administration of justice and for avoiding a separate trial by the same court and passing a contradictory court order in cases between which there are substantial connections necessary to find the truth in the same criminal proceedings[5]. The same purpose of a good administration of justice is also pursued by the legislator in case of joinder of cases during the criminal investigation, since, in addition to the advantages of time and resources of the prosecution carried out in one case and concurrently regarding the same offences and persons, the eventual prosecution of all these offences and persons subsequently ensures a unitary and consistent trial by a single court.

As a matter of fact, one of the objectives pursued by the Code of Criminal Procedure by regulating the jurisdiction of the judicial bodies and all other issues related to the participants in the criminal proceedings has been to create a legislative framework "in which the criminal proceedings become faster and more efficient, and significantly less expensive"[6]. The reason for joining the cases is undoubtedly limited to the aim pursued by the legislator in the current criminal procedural regulation. The simultaneous investigation and trial of the cases between which there are certain connections as a result of the implementation of the joining mechanism, guarantee a good performance of the criminal proceedings, since, in this way, the efficiency of the judicial activities is ensured, avoiding possible contradictory or unfounded decisions in the respective cases.

The mechanism for joinder of criminal cases therefore tends to ensure a unitary justice and, in the broad sense, it is a benefit to the good course of justice. The joinder of criminal cases leads to a better settlement thereof, since it gives the judicial bodies the opportunity to have an overview of all the circumstances in which the offences have been committed[7]. The aim of joinder of cases is to ensure that the truth is attained by conducting all investigations by the same investigation bodies at the same time for a fair and consistent production of evidence, thereby clarifying the contradictions between the statements of the heard witnesses, through confrontations and the production of other necessary evidence[8].

Effects of joinder of cases from the jurisdiction perspective. Prorogation of jurisdiction

The joinder of cases in criminal matters may have the effect, as legal doctrine and practice call, of legal prorogation of jurisdiction. This prorogation of jurisdiction functions both with regard to the prosecuting authorities and the courts.

The jurisdiction of judicial bodies, courts or prosecuting authorities is the scope of the duties that each category of judicial bodies has to fulfil, according

[2] Mentioning that the only prosecuting authority competent to order the joinder of criminal cases during the criminal investigation, is the prosecutor.

[3] A. Zarafiu, Procedură penală. Partea generală. Partea specială. Conform Noului Cod de procedură penală, Editura C.H. Beck, 2015 – p. 130.

[4] C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 133.

[5] High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Division, decision no. 2379 of 14 June 2011, available on www.scj.ro to the law, in the criminal proceedings[9]. In principle, this jurisdiction can be determined by an offence (material jurisdiction - ratione materiae) or, exceptionally, by the quality of the perpetrator of an offence (personal jurisdiction). Also, without going into details that go beyond the scope of this paper, we recall that another form of jurisdiction of the judicial bodies is also the territorial form (ratione loci), established in accordance with the dispositions of article 41 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, according to certain criteria expressly provided by the legislator.

[6] Explanatory statement of the Code of Criminal Procedure, effective from 1 February 2014, p. 4.

[7] I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Tratat de procedură penală, Partea generală, Editura Universul Juridic, București, 2014, p. 365.

[8] Constitutional Court of Romania, Decision no. 719/2016 - the exception of the unconstitutionality of the provisions of article 43 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, published in the Official Gazette no. 125 of 15 February 2017, paragraph 16.

Thus, the joinder of criminal cases would, at first glance, be a prolongation or extension of the limits of jurisdiction of a judicial body and of offences or persons not assigned to it according to the customary rules[10]. The prorogation of jurisdiction is essentially an exception to the ordinary rules of jurisdiction which allows the judicial body to carry out judicial activities in respect of certain offences or persons in respect of whom it has not been initially competent without the acts performed under those conditions to become null and void[11].

The joinder of cases is governed by special provisions on jurisdiction, which derogate from the ordinary rules of jurisdiction, so that all joinder cases listed in article 43 of the Code of Criminal Procedure will be restrictively interpreted and cannot be extended by analogy to other situations not provided by law.

As we shall see below, not all cases of joinder of cases cause a genuine prorogation of jurisdiction, some of which do not attract a genuine effect of extending the jurisdiction of the judicial body to these causes, but rather a formal one.

The old doctrine defines the prorogation of jurisdiction as "the prolongation or extension of jurisdiction, regarding the offence, to another offence or another offender of different jurisdiction"[12]. Other perpetrators, examining the prorogation of jurisdiction under the Code of Procedure 1968, have argued that there is a prorogation of jurisdiction due to some errors in the classification of the offence or the failure to recognise circumstances leading to a change of classification[13].

Also, under the aegis of the former regulation, the Supreme Court has ruled in a decision similar to this case that "the prorogation of jurisdiction means the extension of the normal jurisdiction of the judicial bodies to cases which, naturally, belong to other judicial bodies, according to the law "ratione materiae" or "ratione loci"[14]. At the same time, the specialized doctrine has rightly considered in that the prorogation of jurisdiction is always legal in criminal matters and can only take place in favour of a judicial body of the same rank or of a higher rank, never in favour of a lower judicial body[15].

3. Regulation of the institution for joining the cases in the current Code of Criminal Procedure and in the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968

As can be seen from the simple comparison of the two criminal procedural regulations, the changes in the joinder of cases during the trial have occurred more formally, in principle the cases of joining the cases being renamed and restructured by the current Code of Criminal Procedure (A). Regarding the regulation of the joinder of cases during the criminal investigation, no changes in the content have been made either in the current Code of Criminal Procedure, as stated below (B).

(A) Regarding the joinder of cases during the trial, the criminal procedural provisions of the two codes may technically be presented as follows:

Current Code of Criminal Procedure

TITLE III: Participants in criminal proceedings

CHAPTER II: Jurisdiction of judicial bodies

SECTION 3: Special stipulations regarding the jurisdiction of courts

Article 43:

Joinder of cases

(1) The court shall order the joinder of cases in case of continued offences, of formal multiple offences, or in any other cases when two or more material acts compose a single offence.

(2) The court may order the joinder of cases, provided that this does not delay the trial, in the following situations:

a) when two or more offences were committed by the same person;

b) when two or more persons participated in the commission of an offence;

c) when there is a connection between two or more offences and joinder of cases is required for a proper administration of justice.

(3) The provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) are also applicable when several cases, having the same subject matter, are pending with the same court.

Article 44:

Jurisdiction in case of joinder of cases

---

[9] Quoted in C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 116.

[10] A. Zarafiu, Procedură penală. Partea generală. Partea specială. Conform Noului Cod de procedură penală, Editura C.H. Beck, 2015 – p. 130.

[11] Idem.

[12] Tr. Pop, Drept Procesual Penal, vol. II, Partea Generală,, Tipografia Naţională S.A. Cluj, 1946, p. 189.

[13] V. Dongoroz (coord.) Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală roman, Partea general, vol. I, Editura Academiei Republicii Socialiste România, Bucureşti, 1975, p. 102.

[14] High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Division, decision no. 1495 of 10 May 2012, available on www.scj.ro.

[15] C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 133.

(1) In case of joinder of cases, if in relation to various perpetrators or various acts, the jurisdiction belongs, under the law, to several courts of an equal level, the jurisdiction to rule on all facts and on all perpetrators shall rest upon the court which has been firstly notified, and if, depending on the nature of facts or on the capacity of persons, the jurisdiction belongs to courts of different levels, the jurisdiction to rule on all joined cases rests with the court of the higher level.

(2) The jurisdiction to rule on joined cases remains adjudicated even if for the act of the perpetrator who determined the jurisdiction of a specific court, splitting or termination of criminal proceedings was ordered or an acquittal was ordered.

(3) Concealing and favouring the offender and failure to report any offences fall under the jurisdiction of the court deciding upon the offence to which these are related, and if the jurisdiction based on the capacity of persons belongs to courts of different level, the jurisdiction to rule on all joined cases rests with the court of the higher level.

(4) If one of the courts is a civil court and the other is a military court, the jurisdiction rests with the civil court.

(5) If the military court is of a higher level, the jurisdiction rests with the civil court having an equivalent level and has jurisdiction under articles 41 and 42.

Article 45:

Case joinder procedure

(1) The joinder of cases may be ordered at the request of the prosecutor, the parties, the victim and ex officio by the competent court.

(2) The cases may be joined if they are judged by a first instance court, even after the cancellation or annulment of the court order, or by the Court of Appeal.

(3) The court shall decide through a court session report, which may be appealed only together with the merits of the case.

Code of Criminal Procedure 1968

TITLE II: Jurisdiction

CHAPTER I: Types of jurisdiction

SECTION III: Jurisdiction in case of indivisibility and connection

Article 32:

Joinder of cases

(1) In case of indivisibility or connection, the trial at first instance is judged by the same court if it takes place at the same time for all offences and all perpetrators.

Article 33:

Cases of indivisibility

(1) The following cases are considered indivisibility:

a) when more persons were involved in the commission of an offence;

b) when two or more offences were committed through the same act;

c) in case of continued offence or in any other cases in which two or more material acts make up one offence.

Article 34:

Cases of connection

The following cases are considered connection:

a) when two or more offences are committed through different acts, by one or more persons together, at the same time and in the same place;

b) when two or more offences are committed at different times and in different places, as a result of a prior understanding between the perpetrators;

c) when an offence is committed in order to prepare, facilitate or hide the perpetration of another offence, or in order to facilitate or ensure avoidance of criminal responsibility by the perpetrator of another offence;

d) when there is a connection between two or more offences and the cases must be joined for a better administration of justice.

Article 35:

Jurisdiction in case of indivisibility and connection

(1) In case of indivisibility or connection, if the jurisdiction regarding the different perpetrators or the different deeds rests, under the law, with various courts of an equal level, the jurisdiction to judge all the deeds and all the perpetrators rests with the court which has been firstly notified, and if the jurisdiction according to the nature of the deeds or to the quality of the persons rests with the courts of different level, the jurisdiction to judge all the joined cases rests with the court of the higher level.

(2) If one of the courts is a civil court and the other is a military court, the jurisdiction rests with the civil court.

(3) If the military court is of a higher level, the jurisdiction rests with the civil court having an equivalent level as the military court.

(4) The jurisdiction to judge the joined cases is kept by the court it was granted to, even if the splitting or termination of the criminal proceedings or the acquittal were ordered for the offence or the perpetrator who determined the jurisdiction of this court.

(5) Concealing and favouring the offender and failure to report any offences fall under the jurisdiction of the court deciding upon the offence to which these are related, and if the jurisdiction based on the capacity of persons belongs to courts of different level, the jurisdiction to rule on all joined cases rests with the court of the higher level.

Article 36:

Court competent to decide upon the joinder of cases

(1) Whether the cases are joined or not is decided by the court which is competent to judge, according to the provisions of article 35.

(2) In the case stipulated in article 35 paragraph 3, the joinder of cases is decided by the military court which forwards the file to the competent civil court.

Article 37:

Special cases

(1) In the indivisibility cases stipulated in article 33 letters a) and b), as well as in the connection cases, the cases are joined even if they are judged by the first instance court, even after the cancellation of the decision forwarded by the court of appeal or after the annulment forwarded by the court of last appeal.

(2) The cases are also joined by the courts of appeal, as well as by the courts of last appeal of the same level, if they are at the same stage of the trial.

(3) In the indivisibility case stipulated in article 33 letter c), the cases must always be joined.

Starting from the reference provisions of the two normative acts mentioned above, some clarifications are required:

3.1. Joinder cases

Reading the provisions on joinder of criminal cases according to the Previous Code of Criminal Procedure and comparing them with those of the current regulation, the institution for joining the criminal cases seems to be fully reformed. In fact, the legislator has made a reform only in terms of the configuration of the institution in the structure of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The doctrine has argued that in the previous regulation the joinder of cases has been a "procedure deriving from the express and distinct provision of certain cases of connection or indivisibility"[16]. The previous criminal procedural law has expressly provided the indivisibility and connection as causes for joinder of cases. It has been argued that they are the most common cases of prorogation of jurisdiction[17]. The specialized doctrine has defined the indivisibility as the legal situation of a criminal case, which, comprising multiple offences or persons, forms a unity that requires the judgment of the "complex assembly" of offences and persons by the same court[18]. The notion of connection has also been defined as the legal situation of a criminal case in respect of two or more offences which, because of the link between them, require them to be judged jointly by the same court[19].

As a first remark, it is noted that the current Code of Criminal Procedure has not taken over the express provision in article 32 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968, which has tried to define the conditions of joinder of cases, namely the "first instance" trial by the "same court" if this trial "takes place at the same time for all the offences and for all the perpetrators". Practically, article 32 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968 has explicitly referred to the procedural context in which the cases could be joined, in which case the joinder could only take place when the cases have been at the same procedural stage and phase.

Having regard to the purpose of the institution, the joinder cases and the case joinder procedure regulated almost identically in the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968, such a reference was superfluous, since it was entirely understandable that the joinder could only be ordered if those cases were pending and aimed at the same procedural stage and phase, in the sense that none was definitively settled at the time of the joinder. Moreover, the rationale for joinder of cases and the good administration of justice could only concern the pending cases which were not finally settled at the time of the joinder.

Regarding the actual cases (grounds) of the joinder of criminal cases, the configuration of the current Code of Criminal Procedure places these cases in one article (article 43), unlike the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968, which lists joinder cases in two distinct articles (article 33 and article 34). Also, the earlier names of the joinder cases, namely "cases of indivisibility" and "cases of connection", were no longer kept as terminology by the current Code of Criminal Procedure, trying to approach more pragmatically the institution for joining the criminal cases.

However, it is easy to see that the current article 43 of the Code of Criminal Procedure includes in its contents the cases of indivisibility and connectivity stipulated in the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968. Article 43 of the Code of Criminal Procedure shows that the joinder of cases can occur in two hypotheses: compulsory joinder (in the cases stipulated in paragraph 1 of article 43) and optional joinder (in the cases stipulated in paragraph 2 of article 43).

In essence, the cases of compulsory joinder in the current Code are the indivisibility cases stipulated in article 33 letter b) (when two or more offences were committed through the same act) and article 33 letter c) (in case of the continued offence or in any other cases in which two or more material acts make up one offence) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968.

Accordingly, the cases of optional joinder in the current Code include both the indivisibility case stipulated in article 33 letter a) (when two or more persons participated in the commission of an offence), and all cases of connection stipulated in article 34 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968 (where two or more offences are committed by different acts by one or more persons together, at the same time and in the same place; where two or more offences are committed in time or in a different place, after a prior agreement between the offenders or when an offence is committed to prepare, facilitate or hide the commission of another offence, or is committed to facilitate or ensure the

[16] I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Tratat de procedură penală, Partea generală, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2014, p. 365.

[17] G. Theodoru, Tratat de Drept procesual penal, Ed. Hamangiu, 2007, p. 311.

[18] Idem.

[19] Ibidem.

avoidance of the criminal liability of the perpetrator of another offence).

The delineation of compulsory joinder cases and optional joider cases also results from the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968, although they were slightly inconsistent, and this distinction in its provisions was not very clearly outlined. Thus, the circumstance that certain cases attracted the compulsory joinder and others did not resulted from the provisions of article 37 paragraph (3), according to which the indivisibility cases stipulated in article 33 letter c) had to be always joined. Per a contrario, the other cases of connection and indivisibility were deemed as cases of optional joinder which were thus left to the discretion of the competent court.

However, regarding the regulation of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968, an element of novelty is the provisions of article 43 paragraph (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which expressly regulates the situation in which the cases, which are capable of compulsory or optional joinder, are, as the case may be, judged by the same court, and therefore not different courts, of equal or different level.

3.2. Jurisdiction of the joined cases

In point of the court competent to judge all joined cases, it can be found that there has been no change in the rules for determining that jurisdiction, both Codes of Procedure containing the same provisions in that regard.

Thus, according to both regulations, if, in relation to the different perpetrators or different offences, the jurisdiction belongs, according to the law, to several equal level courts, the jurisdiction to judge all the offences and all the perpetrators rests with the court which was firstly notified (chronological priority) and if, according to the nature of the offences or the quality of the persons, the jurisdiction belongs to different level courts, the jurisdiction to judge all the joined cases rests with the court of a higher level (hierarchical priority). Similarly, when there is also a military judicial body between the competent bodies, the jurisdiction rests with the civil judicial body (functional priority). If the military judicial body is of a higher level, the jurisdiction belongs to the civil judicial body of an equal level (hierarchical and functional jurisdiction)[20].

On another occasion[21], we have showed that the normative solution of judging the joined cases by the civil court instead of the military court has not been embraced by the Romanian legislator from the beginning. We emphasize that it was different from the normative solution contained in article 35 paragraphs (2) and (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968, prior to the amendment introduced by Law no. 356/2006, which provided for the jurisdiction of the military court in the joinder of cases pending in the civil and military courts, respectively. Subsequently, article I, paragraph 17 of Law no. 356/2006 amended the above mentioned provisions, reaching the normative solution preserved by the de lege lata, which means that the civil court is competent to judge the joined cases, not the military court.

Also, the provision that the concealment, the favoring of the offender and the failure to report any offences lie within the jurisdiction of the court that judges the offence to which they refer, and the provision that, if the jurisdiction by the quality of the persons belongs to different level courts, the jurisdiction to judge all the joined cases rests with the higher court, are also identical in the current regulation.

At the same time, both codes of procedure provide that, if the offence or the perpetrator that determined the jurisdiction of a certain court were ordered to split, terminate the criminal proceedings or acquittal, the jurisdiction of the joined cases is still acquired.

3.3. Case joinder procedure

In that regard, it is also noted that the two regulations contain similar provisions as to the court having jurisdiction to order the joinder, as well as the procedural stage and phase in which it may be ordered.

It is necessary, however, to emphasize, with particular reference to the concurrence between a civil and a military court, that, although the trial of the joined cases rested with the civil court, after the above-mentioned distinctions, however, if we are in the presence of a higher level military court, according to the former provisions of article 35 paragraph (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968, the joinder of cases was decided by the military court, which then sent the file to the civil court competent to judge the joined cases. De lege lata, this provision no longer exists, as the jurisdiction to decide the joinder, as naturally, rests with the same court having jurisdiction to judge the joined cases, according to article 45, paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure the final sentence, respectively the civil court of an equal level as the military court or the civil court of an equivalent level as the military court of a higher level.

We consider that the new legislator's option to renounce the provision that, in the above-mentioned situation, the joinder of cases is decided by the military court, is normal and corresponds to the recognized principle of legal symmetry. Given that the civil court is the one which, in fact, has the legal jurisdiction to judge the joined cases, it is the only one which can decide on the procedural incident of the joinder of cases, whether we are talking about a compulsory or optional joinder. At the same time, we believe that the provision on joinder of cases issued by a court other than the court with jurisdiction to resolve the joined cases would constitute an unlawful interference with the judicial activity of the latter court.

---

[20] Note in N. Volonciu, Comentariu la articolul 44 din Noul Cod de Procedura Penală, 2014, www.sintact.ro.

[21] See in this respect, Dan Lupascu. Mihai Mareș. Considerații privind competența organelor judiciare civile și a celor militare, published on 5 June 2017 on www.juridice.ro and in "Revista Pandectele Române" number 3 of 30 June 2017.

Regarding the procedural stage and phase in which the joinder can be ordered, given the procedural reconfiguration of the appeal, namely the fact that the appeal has become de lege lata an extraordinary appeal (review), it is no longer possible to join the cases in the appeal according to the current Code of Criminal Procedure, the cases being already settled by final judgments[22]. Therefore, the current Code of Criminal Procedure has kept from the previous regulation only the possibility to join the cases (i) in the first instance court, even after the judgment was cancelled or annulled in the appeals and (ii) in the court of appeal respectively.

(B) Regarding the joinder of cases during the criminal prosecution, the criminal procedural provisions of the two codes may technically be presented as follows:

Current Code of Criminal Procedure

TITLE III: Participants in criminal proceedings

CHAPTER II: Jurisdiction of judicial bodies

SECTION 5: Prosecuting authorities and their jurisdiction

Article 63:

Common provisions

(1) The provisions stipulated in articles 41-46 and 48 shall also apply accordingly during the criminal investigation.

(2) The provisions of article 44 paragraph (2) shall not apply during the criminal investigation.

[…]

Code of Criminal Procedure 1968

TITLE II: Jurisdiction

CHAPTER I: Types of jurisdiction

SECTION IV: Common provisions

Article 45:

Provisions applicable to criminal investigation

(1) The provisions of articles 30-36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 shall also apply during the criminal investigation accordingly.

($1^1$) The provisions of article 35 paragraph 4 shall not apply during the criminal investigation.

[…]

($4^1$) In the case of indivisibility or connection between offences for which the jurisdiction rests with the National Anticorruption Directorate and the Directorate for Investigating Organized Crime and Terrorism, the jurisdiction to carry out the criminal investigation in the joined case belongs to the specialized prosecuting authority which has been firstly notified. The provision is not applicable if the splitting has been ordered regarding the offence leading to the jurisdiction of the other structure.

The comparison of the two regulations shows that the Romanian legislator's view has remained the same in the current Code of Criminal Procedure. The provisions on the joinder of cases during the trial are also applicable during the criminal investigation, except for the normative situation regarding the keeping of jurisdiction by the criminal court when the splitting, termination of the criminal proceedings or acquittal are ordered for the offence or the perpetrator who has determined its jurisdiction according to the rules in the joinder.

Thus, the closing of the case or splitting regarding the offence or the perpetrator, which has generated the jurisdiction to conduct the criminal investigation of the judicial body is ordered during the criminal investigation or upon the termination thereof, the jurisdiction to conduct the criminal investigations for the remaining offences or the perpetrators or the offence or the perpetrator about whom the splitting was ordered, is not won by the prosecuting authority. In this case, the case shall be referred to the competent body, a reference which, in our opinion, is achieved through the declination of jurisdiction.

As a differentiation element, the Code of Criminal Procedure has not preserved the previous provision on establishing the jurisdiction in cases where the cases of indivisibility or connection simultaneously led to the jurisdiction of both specialized structures within the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice - National Anticorruption Directorate and the Directorate for Investigating Organized Crime and Terrorism. This provision was, however, superfluous, since the jurisdiction to conduct the criminal investigations could be established by properly applying the same criteria laid down for the trial.

It is noticed that the prorogation of jurisdiction during the criminal investigation, generated by the case joinder mechanism, does not have a final effect in this case.

4. Cases of joinder of cases in criminal matters

As mentioned above, the joinder of criminal cases is mandatory in case of the application of one of the cases stipulated in article 43 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, but it represents a faculty of the body in the judiciary in the case of the application of any case stipulated in article 43 paragraph (2) of the same code. The cases of compulsory and optional joinder are generally applicable both during the judgement and the criminal investigation.

a) Compulsory joinder of cases

The compulsory joinder, as it results from the content of article 43 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, occurs in the case of the continued offence, the combination of offences[23], as

[22] C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 137.

[23] Pursuant to article 38 paragraph (2) of the Criminal Code, there is a combination of offences when an action or inaction committed by a person, due to the circumstances in which it has occurred or the consequences which it has incurred, accomplishes the content of several well as in any other cases where two or more material acts constitute a single offence - it is about other forms of the offence stipulated in the substantial criminal law, respectively the successive continuous offence[24] or the complex offence[25].

It is noted that the regulation of mandatory joinder of criminal cases has a purely objective basis, namely the existence of a single offence in its materiality, which may include one or more material acts. In essence, however, because the same offence has been committed by a person, it is necessary both to investigate it and to judge it, once, by the same judicial bodies.

There has been criticism about the constitutionality of article 43 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, in terms of clarity, precision and predictability of the rule, due to the use of a allegedly ambiguous terminology on cases in which, in the practice of the judicial bodies, it could be the basis for compulsory joinder. On this occasion, the Constitutional Court has analyzed the cases stipulated in article 43 paragraph (1) of compulsory joinder of cases and has found fairly that the first two cases are expressly defined in the Criminal Code, and the third legal hypothesis mentioned in the criticized text implies that the court, following the analysis, classifies the material acts which are committed by the defendant and which are not a continued offence or a combination of offences, in the constituent content of the same offence.

The Court has stated in this respect that "this activity of the judicial bodies of establishing the legal classification of the investigated offences is not, however, lacking of clarity, precision and predictability the criminal and criminal procedural norms, being the direct consequence of the duty of the law enforcement judicial bodies, duty which is a direct application in the criminal procedural laws of the constitutional provisions of article 124 on the administration of justice"[26]. The Court has rejected the exception of unconstitutionality, arguing "that, by the criticized text, the violation of the constitutional provisions of article 1 paragraph (5) regarding the quality of the law or the provisions of article 7 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which regulates the principle of legality of incrimination, cannot be supported since the necessity for the legal classification of the committed offences by the courts in order to establish the existence of one of the legal assumptions stipulated in article 43 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code, does not deprive the addressees of the criticized text of the possibility to adapt their conduct according to its requirements"[27].

With particular regard to the continued offence, according to article 35 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code, an offence is continued when a person commits, at different time spans, but for the same purpose and against the same victim, actions or inactions that each have the content of the same offence.

As it has been pointed out in the doctrine, the conditions for the continued offence to exist, according to the new criminal procedural regulation are: the unit of perpetrator, the plurality of actions or inactions committed at different time spans, the unit of criminal intent, the legal homogeneity of the acts of execution to which the unit of victim was added, a condition that does not exist under the previous regulation[28].

Regarding the condition of the unit of victim is, however, relevant the Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 368/2017 on the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of article 35 paragraph (1) and article 39 paragraph (1) letter b) of the Criminal Code, which stated that the phrase "and against the same victim" in the provisions of article 35 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code is unconstitutional because it creates discrimination within the same category of persons who commit at different time spans, but for the same purpose, actions or inactions that each have the content of the same offence, leading to the violation of the provisions of article 16 paragraph (1) of the Constitution regarding the equality of citizens before the law[29].

We consider that this reconfiguration of the conditions for the continued offence to exist, as a result of Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no.

offences. In this situation, the perpetrator undertakes a single action, which, by its pursuit, affects at least two social values protected by different offences by the legislator.

[24] The offence is continuous when its material element (action or inaction incriminated by the criminal law) is naturally extended. In fact, we are talking about a single material act extended over time, therefore, of one offence in its materiality. For this analysis, we consider that only the successive continuous offence is likely to be the subject of a compulsory joinder of cases, because, by itself, it assumes the natural interruption and the resumption of the material act, without generating multiple offences - as is the case, for example, of the offence of driving a vehicle without having a driving license.

For a similar definition of the successive continuous offence, see C. Mitrache, C. Mitrache, Drept penal român, Partea generală, Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2014, p. 301.

[25] The complex offence is expressly regulated by article 35 paragraph (2) of the Criminal Code providing that the offence is complex when its content includes an action or an inaction which constitutes an offence stipulated in the criminal law, as a constituent element or aggravating circumstance element. The compulsory joinder of cases seems natural if the committed offence is a complex one, i.e. it includes at least two actions or inactions which are incriminated as freestanding offences under the law.

[26] Constitutional Court of Romania, Decision no. 719/2016 - the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of article 43 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, published in the Official Gazette no. 125 of 15 February 2017, paragraph 21.

[27] Idem, paragraph 22.

[28] Tr. Dima în I. Pascu, V. Dobrinoiu (coord.), Noul Cod penal comentat, Partea generală, ed. a II-a, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2014, p. 262.

[29] Constitutional Court of Romania, Decision no. 368 of 30 May 2017 on the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of article 35 paragraph (1) and article 39 paragraph (1) letter b) of the Criminal Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, part I, no. 566 of 17 July 2017.

368/2017, also has consequences on the criminal procedural realm, including from the perspective of joinder of criminal cases. Although article 35 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code has not yet been in line with the Court's decision, its effects are in the order of the substantive criminal law, so that, de lege lata, the recurrent offence shall also be considered when the material acts are committed against different victims - individuals or legal entities.

In particular, where, for various reasons, until the entry into force of the said Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania, two or more cases having as their object legally homogeneous offences committed by the same perpetrator on the basis of the same criminal intent, but against different victims, have been prosecuted or judged separately, it shall be necessary to join these cases complying with the rules on the jurisdiction to judge the joined cases.

Regarding the effect of the prorogation of jurisdiction of compulsory joinder, the doctrine has rightly considered that it could in most cases generate only a prorogation of territorial jurisdictional, but it could theoretically be accepted as the hypothesis of the prorogation of material jurisdiction in the case of combination of offences[30]. In this regard, an example is when the perpetrator shoots a gun at a person holding a publicly appointed office, thereby endangering the national security, but, by the same action, he/she also hurts a civilian, he/she commits both the attempt under article 401 of the Criminal Code, as well as an attempted murder, the prorogation of jurisdiction determining the trial of the case by the court of appeal according to article 38 paragraph (1) letter (a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, although the murder is judged in the first instance by the district court.

Of course, there cannot always be a prorogation of jurisdiction as a result of joinder of cases under article 43 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure. For example, there shall not be a genuine prorogation of jurisdiction if the same prosecuting unit has been notified and opened separate criminal files dealing with different material acts of one continued offence committed within the same territorial jurisdiction. In this case, the joinder of criminal files does not give rise to any prorogation of jurisdiction, not even territorial, the prosecuting unit being also territorially competent to carry out investigations regarding those material acts.

b) Optional joinder of cases

The optional joinder of cases is regulated by article 43 paragraph (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure and is, in essence, an incorporation, in a slightly different form, of the case of indivisibility stipulated in the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968 in article 33 letter a) and the cases of connectivity stipulated in the same code in article 34.

In the optional joinder of cases, the court having jurisdiction over the joinder of cases shall appraise whether there is a connection between those cases, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, whether the trial is not delayed by the joint trial of cases, respectively whether the joint trial of the cases would not affect the speed of the criminal trial and its resolution within a reasonable time. Of course, the same principles apply accordingly when the prosecutor appraises the joinder of cases during the criminal investigation.

In particular, the joinder of cases is optional in case of the multiple offences[31], of the participation in the offence[32], and in any other cases where there is a connection between two or more offences and the joinder of cases is necessary for the proper administration of justice.

In the latter case, for example, even the situation expressly indicated by the legislator in article 44 paragraph (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure with respect to the jurisdiction to judge the offences of concealment, favouring the offender or failure to report offences together with the offence/offences to which they refer. A similar legal solution should also be recognized, for example, with regard to the offence of perjury committed during the criminal investigation, which, insofar as it would not lead to an unjustified delay in the settlement of the criminal case concerning offences related to false testimony, should be investigated within the same file.

The connection, a concept used in the previous Code of Criminal Procedure, but which is relinquished de lege lata, is a term specific to the civil procedural law, which was also dealt with in the interwar criminal procedural doctrine. It was then argued that "two or more offences are connected when there is an objective extrinsic connection between them, that is, there is no subjective approximation between the perpetrators of these offences as in the participation and by their material nature, the offences did not engage in a common purpose as with the correlative offences, but owing to extrinsic circumstances, e.g. place, time, persons, object, etc., a connection was established between the offences, a connection that makes them connected"[33]. Concerning the notion of connection, it was rightly stated in the legal literature that it is based on a criterion of procedural opportunity for the good administration of justice[34].

---

[30] C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 134.

[31] According to article 38 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code, there are multiple offences when two or more offences were committed by the same person through separate actions or inactions, before being finally convicted for any of them. Also, there are multiple offences when one of the offences has been committed for the commission or concealment of another offence.

[32] The participation in the offence refers to the legal situation in which several persons participate as co-perpetrators, instigators or accomplices in the commission of an offence under the criminal law act.

[33] I. Tanoviceanu, Tratat de drept şi procedură penală, vol.II, Tip. „Curierul Judiciar", Bucureşti, 1925, p.439.

[34] Tr. Pop, op. cit., p. 190.

Obviously, in the cases of optional joinder, there shall be no prorogation of jurisdiction where the court or, as the case may be, the prosecuting authority is competent materially or by the quality of the person and territorially in relation to all the cases involved in the joinder. However, since the optional joinder cases refer to offences and/or different persons, the likelihood of joinder producing an effect of prorogation of jurisdiction is much higher than in the case of compulsory joinder of cases.

c) Joinder of cases with the same object before the same court

In line with the above, the current Code of Criminal Procedure has also regulated as a matter of novelty the situation of compulsory or optional joinder of cases where there are several cases judged by the same court having the same object - article 43 paragraph 3 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

We consider that, although from the wording of article 43 paragraph (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure would appear to be in the presence of a special case, distinct from joinder, in fact the above mentioned provisions do not regulate a real case of joinder of cases, but rather an apparent case or, at the most, a case assimilated by the legislator in the actual cases of joinder. Since the text of law refers to the phrase "the same object" of the cases judged "by the same court", we consider that these causes are characterized by identity of person and offence[35]. Under these circumstances, the reason for joinder referred to in article 43 paragraph (3) is different from the reasoning of the institution for joining the cases, that is to bring together, in the same file, cases relating to distinct factual aspects.

Therefore, under article 43 paragraph (3), the joinder of cases, being about the same object of the cases, cannot lead to a prorogation of jurisdiction. However, the only procedural remedy to avoid cases in which the cases with the same subject are settled by the same judicial body at the same time, can only be that of joinder of cases.

The text provides that both the provisions of paragraph (1), which regulates the compulsory joinder, as well as those in paragraph (2) of article 43, which regulates optional joinder are applicable. In this respect, the text is deficient, and it is not clear whether, if there are two cases with an identical object, their joinder would be compulsory or optional. On this point, we consider that, when identifying an identical object in relation to two or more criminal cases judged by the same court, their joinder must be mandatory and cannot be left to the appreciation of the panel which has been firstly vested. Otherwise, there is a risk of contradictory decisions in the same criminal case on the same matter of fact or law.

5. Jurisdiction in case of joinder of criminal cases. Sanctions

As we have stated in Section II dedicated to analyzing the regulation of the institution for joining the cases in the current Code of Criminal Procedure and in the previous Code of Criminal Procedure, jurisdiction in joinder of cases in criminal matters essentially involves two elements: the judicial body competent to issue the procedural act of the joinder, therefore, to decide whether or not the cases are joined, but also the judicial body competent to subsequently judge the joined cases (the unique case resulting from the joinder).

Both during the trial and the criminal investigation, the judicial body competent to order the joinder is the same body that subsequently judges or investigates the joined cases. This jurisdiction to resolve the joined cases becomes, through extension (prorogation), a material or personal jurisdiction or, as the case may be, territorial jurisdiction.

Synthetically, the jurisdiction to judge/prosecute all the offences and all the perpetrators belongs to the court which was firstly notified/prosecutor's office which was firstly notified in the case of judicial bodies of an equal level, or, as the case may be, the court of a higher level/the Prosecutor's Office of a higher level in the case of judicial bodies of different levels. Also, as we have stated, the concurrence between the civil and military nature of the judicial body is in favour of the civil nature of the judicial body, complying with its level equivalence.

At the same time, unlike the rules applicable during the trial, if following the joinder of cases, the prosecuting authority orders the closing or splitting as regards the offence or the perpetrators, who determined the jurisdiction of a certain body, the jurisdiction to carry out the prosecution is lost as regards the other offences.

According to the provisions of article 281 paragraph (1) letter b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, in the configuration given by the Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 302/2017[36], disregarding the rules on the material and personal jurisdiction of the courts and the prosecuting authorities, when the trial or the prosecution has been conducted by a judicial body of a lower level than the competent judicial body, shall be sanctioned with absolute nullity. On the other hand, the rules on territorial jurisdiction are provided under the sanction of relative nullity, being necessary to prove the injury inflicted by the person invoking it, according to the provisions of article 282 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

[35] Strictly related to the trial by the first instance court, both article 317 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968, and article 371 of the Code of Criminal Procedure stipulate that the trial is limited to the offences and persons indicated in the document instituting the proceedings.

[36] The Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 302/2017 passed on 4 May 2017, found that the legislative solution, included in the provisions of article 281 paragraph (1) letter b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which does not regulate in the category of absolute nullity the violation of the provisions on the material jurisdiction and by the quality of the person of the prosecuting authority, is unconstitutional.

It has been pointed out in the specialized doctrine that, when the prorogation is determined by the application of different rules of material jurisdiction or by the quality of the person for some defendants in those cases, the effect of the prorogation of jurisdiction is mandatory under the sanction of absolute nullity, since the prorogation of jurisdiction is always in favour of the higher court[37]. For the identity of reason, in view of the Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 302/2017, we consider that such a sanction also intervenes if the prorogation of jurisdiction is done in favour of the higher level prosecutor's office.

Analyzing the rules for determining the jurisdiction in case of compulsory or optional joinder of cases during the trial stipulated in article 44 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, we consider that the sanction of absolute nullity may be applied in the following hypotheses:

A first hypothesis could be that in which the trial of the joined cases is carried out in violation of the rules of jurisdiction in article 44 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, more precisely in the case where the trial of the joined cases is not made by the higher court in relation to the nature of the offences or the quality of the perpetrators, but by a lower court.

A second hypothesis might be that in which the trial of the joined cases is carried out in violation of the jurisdiction rules in article 44 paragraphs (1) and (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, respectively by the military court instead of the civil court.

A third hypothesis could equally be the one in which the offences expressly stipulated in article 44 paragraph (3), namely the concealment, the favouring of the offender and the failure to report certain offences, are joined in the offence to which they refer and are judged by a lower level court, although they would have been in the jurisdiction of a higher level court in relation to the quality of the person what he has committed them.

Lastly, another hypothesis in which we consider that the absolute nullity sanction could also be imposed is that in which the court rejects the request for joinder, although, a compulsory joinder is applicable in this case and the jurisdiction to judge the joined cases would have rested with a court of higher level. We consider, however, that such a hypothesis would be more difficult to find in the judicial practice, since the compulsory joinder of cases is rather capable of a prorogation effect in the area of territorial jurisdiction, than an effect in terms of material jurisdiction.

From the perspective of the effects that a possible rejection of the joinder of cases in a compulsory case of joinder may have in the field of jurisdiction, the provisions of the supreme court stipulated in a decision passed in the appeal are relevant, considering that the disregard of the obligation to join the cases is sanctioned with absolute nullity when the prorogation refers to the material and personal jurisdiction and relative nullity when the prorogation relates to the territorial jurisdiction[38]. In that case, the legal situation was represented by the existence of two case files judged by the same court (Cluj Court) concerning material acts that were included in the content of a single continued offence of influence peddling for two defendants. Although there were no requests for joinder in the case, the failure to join the cases being criticized in the appeals, the Supreme Court considered, however, that in this case, it was not even a matter of prorogation of jurisdiction, since jurisdiction over the perpetrators and their offences rested with one and the same court - Cluj Court, and not to more courts of an equal level or different levels. As such, it was found that the failure to join the cases did not in any way affect the material, personal and/or territorial jurisdiction of the court that is legally gained by the same unique court, which was vested from the beginning to settle the two cases.

As regards the violation of the jurisdiction rules in case of optional joinder of cases, we consider that the analysis of a possible nullity can only be made if the request for joinder has been admitted (because only in this case an effect of prorogation of jurisdiction becomes possible), and the hearing of the cases by a non-competent court according to the distinctions contained in article 44 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Finally, all these distinctions regarding the sanction of nullity in the event of non-compliance with the rules of jurisdiction in the area of joinder of criminal cases are also properly applied during the criminal investigation.

6. Case joinder procedure

During the trial, according to the rules stated in article 45 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the joinder shall be ordered at the request of the prosecutor, the parties, the injured party and, ex officio, of the competent court which has jurisdiction to judge by prorogation (the court which joins the cases). We consider that, although the law does not make a distinction, the holders of the request for joinder can be both those who determine the jurisdiction of the court judging the joined cases, as well as the ones in the court, judging the case to be joined.

As regards the procedural phase and the procedural stage of the cases, it is necessary for these cases to be in the same procedural phase and stage and the cases under the criminal investigation with those that are pending trial, the cases in progress with those in the preliminary chamber procedure or the cases under appeal with those judged by the first instance court cannot be joined[39]. In this respect, article 45 paragraph (2) explicitly states that the joinder may take place if the cases are judged by the first instance court, even after the decision has been cancelled or annulled, or by the court of appeal. The joinder is essential for the cases to be judged at the same time, so that, to the extent that one of the cases has been finally judged, there can be no question of joining them[40].

[37] C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 133.
[38] High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Division, decision no. 2379 of 14 June 2011, available on www.scj.ro.

Given that a new trial by the first instance court as a result of the cancellation/annulment of the decision in the appeals is a new trial on the merits of the case, we consider that two cases judged by the first instance court can be joined, one of which is in a first procedural cycle and the other in a second procedural cycle, determined by the cancellation/annulment with referral for a new trial.

In the doctrine, there was discussion about the possibility to join the cases in the preliminary chamber stage, the parties expressing their points of view. In this respect, the supreme court's view seems to be the one according to which the joinder of cases cannot occur in the preliminary chamber. Thus, the High Court of Cassation and Justice, in order to settle a challenge against the preliminary chamber resolution[41], considered that the joinder of cases could only be carried out after the preliminary chamber procedure. Consequently, the judge conducting the preliminary chamber may refer a case to a court to value the joinder with another case which is judged by it, only after the preliminary chamber procedure and the start of trial.

According to the judge conducting the preliminary chamber within the Supreme Court, the provision for referral of the case in order to value the joinder may be included in the report ordering the start of trial.

In order to state the above, the judge conducting the preliminary chamber within the Supreme Court considered that, in relation to the provisions of both article 43 but also of article 45, paragraph (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the joinder of cases may be made if they are judged by the first instance court. According to the same judge, by using the phrase "by the first instance court", in relation to the provisions of article 3 paragraph (1) letter d) and paragraph (7) of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the name of Chapter II - "Hearing by the first instance court" in Title III - "Trial" of the special part of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the legislator wanted the cases to be joined only after the preliminary chamber procedure. In fact, according to the judge, another argument to support this theory is the fact that, in the preliminary chamber, the filter procedure is carried out by the judge conducting the preliminary chamber and not by the court.

Consequently, in relation to the foregoing, the judge conducting the preliminary chamber considered that the joinder of cases in criminal matters is made before the first instance court and not in the preliminary chamber procedure.

We also embrace the arguments put forward by the judge conducting the preliminary chamber of the High Court on the subject matter and we consider that the joinder of criminal cases cannot take place in the preliminary chamber procedure. In addition to the textual arguments put forward in this case, the possibility to join the cases in such a procedure should also be examined in the light of the solutions or measures that may be taken in the this procedure.

For example, if the cases are joined in the preliminary chamber, and the judge conducting the preliminary chamber would order, in the first instance, to remedy the irregularities of both documents instituting the proceedings which are the subject of the verifications conducted in the preliminary chamber. Given that we are talking about two distinct indictments, so two procedural documents belonging to different prosecutors, we would practically have situations in which the filter procedure would be unduly delayed, with each prosecutor being liable for his/her own indictment and his/her own file. At the same time, a possible joinder in the preliminary chamber can never lead to a joinder of the prosecution files pending before the court, especially as we are in the presence of prosecutions which are, basically, finalized.

Finally, the court competent to judge the joined cases shall decide on the request for joinder or, on its own initiative, by a court session report which can be appealed only with the merits of the case.

During the criminal investigation, the case joinder procedure is different in view of the nature and specificity of this procedural stage, although, in principle, the rules applicable in the field of joinder during the trial apply accordingly. In particular, the joinder during the criminal investigation may be ordered at the request of the parties but also of the main subjects, namely the suspect and the victim, as well as ex officio by the prosecutor's office competent to carry out the criminal investigation for all the joined cases. The joinder, as a procedural act, is ordered by the prosecutor by means of an ordinance.

7. Conclusions

Considering all the above matters, it can be concluded that the joinder of the criminal cases in the Romanian procedural law is a complex institution with

[39] C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 133.

[40] In the same sense, see also Timișoara Court of Appeal, by the criminal court sentence no. 153/PI of 27 February 2018, available at www.jurisprudenta.com.

[41] High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Division, judge conducting the preliminary chamber, court session report no. 827 of 14 September 2017, available at www.scj.ro.

many practical implications and even difficulties of interpretation and application.

Any controversial issue of the application of the joinder of criminal cases should be solved, by starting with the analysis of the regulation of this criminal procedural law institution. It is necessary to firstly observe the main purpose of regulating this procedural measure, namely, which is the good administration of justice, without neglecting the fundamental human rights of the parties in a criminal case.

Although it may seem that the joinder of cases in criminal matters is a simple institution, it may give rise to different interpretations, especially with regard to the sanctions that may apply for breaching the provisions regulating this institution. As usual, the most important aspects to be dealt with on this matter remains the sanction of procedural nullity.

A further legislative approach on the matter should focus maybe on providing clearer regulations with regard to the procedural phases and stages of the criminal proceedings in which the joinder may be ordered, especially in respect to those special procedures that may not fall directly under the cases of joinder provided by art. 43 of the Criminal Procedure Code in force (e.g.: complaints against the acts of the case prosecutors of non-referral to the court, challenges to the enforcement of the court decisions, etc.).

References

- Mentioning that the only prosecuting authority competent to order the joinder of criminal cases during the criminal investigation, is the prosecutor.
- A. Zarafiu, Procedură penală. Partea generală. Partea specială. Conform Noului Cod de procedură penală, Editura C.H. Beck, 2015 – p. 130.
- C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 133.
- High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Division, decision no. 2379 of 14 June 2011, available on www.scj.ro
- Explanatory statement of the Code of Criminal Procedure, effective from 1 February 2014, p. 4.
- I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Tratat de procedură penală, Partea generală, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2014, p. 365.
- Constitutional Court of Romania, Decision no. 719/2016 - the exception of the unconstitutionality of the provisions of article 43 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, published in the Official Gazette no. 125 of 15 February 2017, paragraph 16.
- Quoted in C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 116.
- A. Zarafiu, Procedură penală. Partea generală. Partea specială. Conform Noului Cod de procedură penală, Editura C.H. Beck, 2015 – p. 130.
- Idem.
- Tr. Pop, Drept Procesual Penal, vol. II, Partea Generală,, Tipografia Naţională S.A. Cluj, 1946, p. 189.
- V. Dongoroz (coord.) Explicații teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală roman, Partea general, vol. I, Editura Academiei Republicii Socialiste România, Bucureşti, 1975, p. 102.
- High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Division, decision no. 1495 of 10 May 2012, available on www.scj.ro.
- C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 133.
- I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Tratat de procedură penală, Partea generală, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2014, p. 365.
- G. Theodoru, Tratat de Drept procesual penal, Ed. Hamangiu, 2007, p. 311.
- Idem.
- Ibidem.
- Note in N. Volonciu, Comentariu la articolul 44 din Noul Cod de Procedura Penală, 2014, www.sintact.ro.
- See in this respect, Dan Lupascu. Mihai Mareș. Considerații privind competența organelor judiciare civile și a celor militare, published on 5 June 2017 on www.juridice.ro and in "Revista Pandectele Române" number 3 of 30 June 2017.
- C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 137.
- Pursuant to article 38 paragraph (2) of the Criminal Code, there is a combination of offences when an action or inaction committed by a person, due to the circumstances in which it has occurred or the consequences which it has incurred, accomplishes the content of several offences. In this situation, the perpetrator undertakes a single action, which, by its pursuit, affects at least two social values protected by different offences by the legislator.
- The offence is continuous when its material element (action or inaction incriminated by the criminal law) is naturally extended. In fact, we are talking about a single material act extended over time, therefore, of one offence in its materiality. For this analysis, we consider that only the successive continuous offence is likely to be the subject of a compulsory joinder of cases, because, by itself, it assumes the natural interruption and the resumption of the material act, without generating multiple offences - as is the case, for example, of the offence of driving a vehicle without having a driving license.

- For a similar definition of the successive continuous offence, see C. Mitrache, C. Mitrache, Drept penal român, Partea generală, Universul Juridic, București, 2014, p. 301.
- The complex offence is expressly regulated by article 35 paragraph (2) of the Criminal Code providing that the offence is complex when its content includes an action or an inaction which constitutes an offence stipulated in the criminal law, as a constituent element or aggravating circumstance element. The compulsory joinder of cases seems natural if the committed offence is a complex one, i.e. it includes at least two actions or inactions which are incriminated as freestanding offences under the law.
- Constitutional Court of Romania, Decision no. 719/2016 - the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of article 43 paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, published in the Official Gazette no. 125 of 15 February 2017, paragraph 21.
- Idem, paragraph 22.
- Tr. Dima în I. Pascu, V. Dobrinoiu (coord.), Noul Cod penal comentat, Partea generală, ed. a II-a, Editura Universul Juridic, București, 2014, p. 262.
- Constitutional Court of Romania, Decision no. 368 of 30 May 2017 on the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of article 35 paragraph (1) and article 39 paragraph (1) letter b) of the Criminal Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, part I, no. 566 of 17 July 2017.
- C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 134.
- According to article 38 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code, there are multiple offences when two or more offences were committed by the same person through separate actions or inactions, before being finally convicted for any of them. Also, there are multiple offences when one of the offences has been committed for the commission or concealment of another offence.
- The participation in the offence refers to the legal situation in which several persons participate as co-perpetrators, instigators or accomplices in the commission of an offence under the criminal law act.
- I. Tanoviceanu, Tratat de drept şi procedură penală, vol.II, Tip. „Curierul Judiciar", Bucureşti, 1925, p.439.
- Tr. Pop, op. cit., p. 190.
- Strictly related to the trial by the first instance court, both article 317 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1968, and article 371 of the Code of Criminal Procedure stipulate that the trial is limited to the offences and persons indicated in the document instituting the proceedings.
- The Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 302/2017 passed on 4 May 2017, found that the legislative solution, included in the provisions of article 281 paragraph (1) letter b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which does not regulate in the category of absolute nullity the violation of the provisions on the material jurisdiction and by the quality of the person of the prosecuting authority, is unconstitutional.
- C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 133.
- High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Division, decision no. 2379 of 14 June 2011, available on www.scj.ro.
- C. Voicu, în N. Volonciu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, Ediția a 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 133.
- In the same sense, see also Timişoara Court of Appeal, by the criminal court sentence no. 153/PI of 27 February 2018, available at www.jurisprudenta.com.
- High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Division, judge conducting the preliminary chamber, court session report no. 827 of 14 September 2017, available at www.scj.ro.

EUROPEAN PROTECTION ORDER IN CRIMINAL MATTERS: A NEW FORM OF COOPERATION IN EUROPEAN UNION

Cătălin-Nicolae MAGDALENA

Abstract

Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) emphasized judicial cooperation in criminal matters, based on the principle of mutual recognition of all types of judgments and decisions of a judicial nature. In a common area of justice without internal borders, it was considered necessary to adopt a EU legal instrument that should provide achievement of the following desideratum: protection provided to a natural person in one Member State is maintained and continued in any other Member State to which the person moves or has moved.

Directive 2011/99/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council sought to establish rules by means of which protection measures adopted in criminal matters in the issuing Member State can be extended to any of the executing Member States.

In this context, the purpose of the article is to analyze if Romanian authorities transposed the Directive according to the purposes for which it was adopted and whether the measures taken at national level by Law no. 151/2016 ensure effective protection of fundamental rights protected in all Member States: life, freedom, physical or sexual integrity, etc.

The objectives of the present study are to analyze the European protection order in criminal matters as it is regulated by the above mentioned national law of transposition, to explain the terminology used, to analyze the procedure of issuing this protection measure in a Member State/recognizing it in another Member State and, last but not least, practical aspects related to execution.

Keywords: European protection order. Directive 2011/99/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council. Issuing Member State. Executing Member State. Supervision Member State.

1. Introduction

The Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union[1] (TFEU) has granted a special importance to the subject of international cooperation in criminal matters, based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions. This principle is found in article 82 (1) a, d of TFEU regarding:

- the introduction of norms and procedures that will insure the recognition, throughout the entire EU, of all categories of judgments and judicial decisions.
- the facilitation of cooperation between judicial authorities, or their equivalent, in Member States in the area of criminal investigation and enforcing court decisions.

Placing in the centre of attention the component of judicial cooperation between Member States has appeared as a stringent necessity, able to respond to the needs pointed out by other measures adopted by the EU. Among these measures the gradual abolition of controls at common borders on EU territory stands out, issue that has given the possibility for EU citizens to travel free, but has also allowed the criminals to act easier at a transnational level[2].

In order to rebut the transnational organized crime phenomena the Lisbon Treaty has comprised measures meant to encourage international cooperation in criminal matters, as well as regulations meant to ensure that the rights of the victims are effectively protected throughout the EU.

The Stockholm Programme – an open and secure Europe serving and protecting citizens[3], has shown the way that an united Europe wants to take on the matter of judicial cooperation, establishing as its goal that mutual recognition should be extended to all types of judgments and judicial decisions of a juridical nature, regardless if these are, depending on the legal system, either criminal or administrative.

In particular, in the EU there has been a constant preoccupation for consolidating the rights of the victims of crimes, as well as the protection that the national authorities are obliged to give them. Thus came the need to find a mechanism of cooperation between Member States that would guarantee the mutual recognition of all decisions that comprise measures of protection for the victims of crimes conferred by criminal proceedings.

In a common area of justice without internal frontiers it was considered necessary to adopt, at EU level, an instrument meant to ensure the fulfilment of a desideratum: the protection provided to a natural person in a Member State is maintained and continued

* PhD candidate, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: magdalena.catalin@gmail.com catamagdalena@yahoo.com).

 Associated Assistant, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest.

[1] Signed by the EU Member States at the 13th of December 2007, in force following December 1st 2009 in any other member state in which that person moves or has moved.

[2] Kristiina Milt, http://www.europarl.europa.eu

[3] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union (2010/C 115/01) on 4/5/2010

On December 21st 2011, in the Official Journal of the European Union, the Directive 2011/99/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 December 2011 on the European protection order was published, this act having been intended to be an instrument for the protection of all persons that have been or could become victims of crime, its stated goal being the extending of the protection stemming from certain judicial decisions given according to the internal law of a Member State, to other Member States , where the protected person decides to move to or to reside.

The aforementioned Directive 2011/99/EU of 13 December 2011 on the European protection order was further implemented in the internal legislation in 2016 trough the passing of Law no. 151/2016 on July 13th 2016[4].

In this context, the aim of the article is to analyse the extent in which the Romanian authorities have implemented in the national legislation and have taken in the abovementioned Directive according to the goals for which it was adopted and if the measures taken at a national level are able to ensure the efficient protection of certain fundamental rights recognized and upheld in all Member States: life, freedom, physical or sexual integrity etc.

Concurrently, this study aims to analyse the European protection order in criminal matters, to explain the terminology used by the national legislation, to analyse the procedure carried out for the issuing/recognition of this protection measure, and last but not least, reveal practical sides of the executing procedure itself.

The analysis of the case-law of the national courts is also able to probe if the national judicial instrument corresponds to the assumed objectives.

2. Content

The European protection order is represented as a decision adopted by a judicial authority, or an equivalent one, of a Member State, comprising a protection measure, on whose grounds a judicial authority, or an equivalent one, of another Member State orders the adequate and appropriate measures, under the provisions of its national legislation, in order to provide continued protection to the protected person.

Out of reasons of legislative technicality, for a better clarity of the legal text, the national rendering of the law clarifies the meaning of the terms used in Law no. 151/2016, such as: "measure of protection", "protected person", "issuing State" or "executing State".

Thus, „protection measure" refers to a final decision in a criminal matter adopted in the issuing State and trough which one or more prohibitions or restrictions are imposed on the person causing danger, in order to prevent the committing upon the protected person of a crime that might endanger its fundamental rights recognised and upheld in all Member States such as life, physical and psychological integrity, dignity, personal freedom or sexual integrity.

It must be said that, in the denotation of the law, "protection measure" refers exclusively to the decisions taken in criminal matters, whilst, for mutual acknowledgement of the protection measures in civil matters the provisions of Regulation (EU) No 606/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 June 2013 are applicable[5].

The prohibitions and the restrictions that may be enforced in this procedure may be:

1. the prohibition to enter certain localities, places or specific areas where the protected person resides or visits;
2. the prohibition to contact, under any form, the protected person, including by phone, electronic or ordinary mail, fax or any other means;
3. the prohibition to approach the protected person closer than a prescribed distance.

In the event in which the court ruling deems it satisfying, its decision can only refer either to a partial limitation or the precise lining out of the way of contacting or approaching the protected person.

In general terms, the European protection order may be issued, or recognized and enforced, according to the specific situation, only when the protected person has established its domicile or residence or has inhabited for a period of time or is about to establish its domicile or residence or will inhabit for a period of time on the territory of another Member State than in the one where the protection measure was issued.

By interpreting ad literam the provisions that set the scope[6] of this judicial instrument, it comes down to the idea that for issuing the European protection order, at least two requirements must be met:

a) a protection measure was previously adopted on the territory of a Member State, by a judiciary (or equivalent) authority, prior to the request of issuing the protection order.
b) the beneficiary of a protection measure on the territory of a Member State must establish or intends to establish its' domicile/residence/lodging, for a period of time, on the territory of another Member State.

Because the European protection order represents a judicial instrument that may be applied throughout the European Union, the regularization of different working procedures was necessary, depending if

[4] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I no. 545 on July 20 2016
[5] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union of 29/6/2013
[6] Art. 2 Law no. 151/2016

Romania is issuing or executing such an order, thus being either the issuing State[7] or the executing State[8].

2.1. The procedure when Romania is the issuing State

The general rule is that the competent authority to issue the European protection order is the judicial body held to rule the case in which the protection measure has been taken, on whose basis the issuing of the European protection order is requested to be made.

Thus, out of reasons regarding a good cognition of the circumstances that led to the necessity of taking certain protection measures, the law has also granted the competence to the same judicial body that has ruled the case to appreciate upon the necessity and the opportunity of issuing the European protection order.

Establishing in this way, trough regulation in this fashion, the authority in favour of the national competent body, may be seen as a positive aspect, given the fact that in order to decide upon issuing the order, there must be analysed, alongside other criteria that will be discussed in this study, also aspects regarding the factual danger for the protected person or the proportionality of the measure. Since the judicial authority was the one that initially instated a protection measure, it is also the most recommendable to further analyse the necessity on maintaining it by issuing the European protection order.

Derogatory from the general rule is the situation in which in the court case where the protection measure was ruled, on whose basis the European protection order is demanded to be issued, a final decision was given to convict the offender, the competence to issue the European protection order is given to the judge delegate in charge of enforcement, according to art. 554 of Law no. 135/2010 regarding the Criminal Procedure Code.

If a decision to condemn the offender has not been given, but the Court has ruled to postpone enforcement of a penalty, the competence is given to the Court that has first pronounced the postponement of penalty enforcement.

This being said, we can state that the national competent authority to issue a European protection order may either be: the court, the preliminary chamber judge, the judge for rights and liberties, the judge delegate in charge of enforcement or the prosecutor (if the case is under criminal investigation).

In order for the European protection order to be issued, the protected person, personally or by representative, must file a petition to the competent judicial body. The request must contain, along side the personal identification data of the protected person, highlights regarding the Member State where the protected person will establish its domicile or residence or where it will stay or intends to stay and the time period for these dislodgements.

In order for the competent authority to issue the European protection order the following conditions must be met:

a) the protected person must be granted the status of victim in a criminal trial under way or where a penalty has been enforced trough a final decision, or the postponement of penalty enforcement has been pronounced.

Also a member of the victims' family may ask for the European protection order to be issued, if it is in turn a beneficiary of a protection measure[9];

b) the protected person stays or will stay or has established, or will establish its domicile or residence in another Member State of the European Union;

c) the person causing danger has the status of defendant, convicted individual, or a person for whom the postponement of penalty enforcement has been pronounced during criminal proceedings and against it one or more measures listed in the Criminal Procedure Code[10] and Criminal Code[11] have been enforced.

d) issuing the European protection order is needed to eliminate a future or present danger for the protected person.

Referring to the measures listed under letter c), it must be mentioned that these are actually restrictions/prohibitions and obligations enforced upon the defendant during the criminal proceedings, with the ordering of judicial control, or judicial control under bail[12], or house-arrest[13], postponement of penalty enforcement[14], conditional release[15], enforcing non-custodial educational measures[16], or enforcing additional or ancillary penalties of receiving a ban on the exercise of a number of rights[17].

For example, these measures may refer to the prohibition for the defendant to return to the family domicile, or to come near the victim or the victim's family, to communicate with the victim, or to go in certain locations.

When deciding upon the issuing of a European protection order, the national competent authority in the issuing State shall take into account, a series of

[7] According to art. 1 Law no. 151/2016 the issuing State means the Member State in which a protection measure has been adopted that constitutes the basis for issuing a European protection order

[8] The executing State means the Member State to which a European protection order has been forwarded with a view to its recognition and execution

[9] From the persons listed under letter c)

[10] Law no. 135/2010 published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 486 on July 15th 2010

[11] Law no. 286/2009 published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 486 on July 24th 2009

[12] Obligations listed under art. 215 (2) lit. b) or d) of the Criminal Procedure Code

[13] Obligation listed under art. 221 (2) lit. b) of the Criminal Procedure Code

[14] Obligations listed under art. 85 (2) lit. e) or f) of the Criminal Code

[15] Obligations listed under art. 101 (2) lit. d) or e) of the Criminal Code

[16] Obligations listed under art. 121 (1) lit. c) or d) of the Criminal Code

[17] A ban on one of the rights listed under art. 66(1) lit. l)-o) of the Criminal Code predetermined criteria such as the actual danger for the protected person, the length of the period of time that the protected person intends to stay in the executing State, the proportionality of the measure and any other relevant circumstances able to demonstrate the opportunity and need of the protection measure.

In all situations, the European protection order may be issued only for the duration of time in which the protected person is staying or will be staying, or has established its domicile or will establish its domicile or residence in another EU Member State. Also, it may not surpass the duration of time for which the measure that is the ground for the order has been enforced.

Upon the protected persons request, the court, the preliminary chamber judge, the judge for rights and liberties, the judge delegate in charge of enforcement will pass a court resolution and the prosecutor will give a prosecutorial order.

When the judicial body observes that the petition of the protected person is well-founded a final court resolution/order will be given, in chambers, issuing the European protection order. In other words, when the national competent authority will rule the issuing of the European protection order, the resolution, or the order, issued for this purpose can not be challenged.

The procedure of issuing the European protection order stated under the provisions of art. 6 of Law no. 151/2016 does not impose the citation of the protected person or of the person causing danger, nor the prosecutor, because the law says nothing about their presence.

Still, the apparent lack of provisions seems to have its fundament in art. 6 (4) of the Directive 2011/99/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 December 2011 on the European protection order, which clearly states that:"Before issuing a European protection order, the person causing danger shall be given the right to be heard and the right to challenge the protection measure, if that person has not been granted these rights in the procedure leading to the adoption of the protection measure." Nevertheless, the procedural warranties given to the defendant by the national legislation bestow upon him the right to challenge the protection measure, from the moment it was adopted throughout the entire criminal proceedings, so that the summoning of the involved parties in the issuing procedure of the European protection order is not necessary[18].

Nevertheless, if the protected persons' petition to issue the order has been rejected, the ruling can be challenged in 3 days time from receiving notification of the decision. The legal text does not mention to whom the court resolution or the prosecutorial order containing the rejection of the petition for the European protection order will be communicated to, nor who are the persons allowed to take effective remedy by challenge of the decision.

By trying to supply for the lack of clarity of the legal provision, we consider that the court resolution/prosecutorial order of rejection of the request of issuing the European protection order is communicated exclusively to the protected person, upon issuing the ruling. We believe that the time frame for filing the challenge shall start from the date when the ruling regarding the decision upon the protected persons request for issuing the order was communicated and does not start from the notification of the reasoned court resolution. We take into account the fact that whenever the Romanian law has wanted to establish as the moment for starting the count of a time frame for filing a challenge with a different moment than the communication of the decision, it has stated it an express provision[19].

The author reckons that, the holder of the right to challenge the rejection decision of the issuing of a European protection order is only the protected person, as the only one that can justify a legitimate interest in advancing the challenge.

The challenge shall be settled by the Judge for Rights and Liberties, respectively by the Preliminary Chamber Judge from the court that is higher than the notified one or, as the case may be, by the court higher than the notified one, but the legal text says nothing about the composition of the judicial panel. We reckon that this oversight can be complemented trough the analysis of incidental provisions in the Law governing the organisation of the judicial system[20]. Thus, according to art.54 ($1^1$) of Law no. 304/2004, it was established in general terms that the challenges against rulings regarding criminal matters coming from first instance courts and tribunals during first instance trials, issued by the judges for rights and liberties and the preliminary chamber judges of those courts, is adjudicated by a panel of 2 judges.

In order to settle the challenge the protected person is summoned and in order to keep to the equality of arms ground rule, the person causing danger and the prosecutor are summoned as well.

Thus, in this procedure the prosecutor is summoned as well, just as the plaintiff (the protected person) and the defendant (the person causing danger), which means that the Public prosecutor may or may not present itself at the settlement of the challenge. In support of this allegation are the provisions of art. 6 (2) in its final theses[21], stating that the absence of the summoned persons (including the prosecutor) does not preclude the ruling of the cause.

To sum up, it may be possible upon the adjudication of the challenge for all the summoned persons to be present, or just some of them, or none, since the presence of the prosecutor is not mandatory.

---

[18] See also the Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 139/2017 , published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 336 of May 5th 2017

[19] According to the provisions of art. 347 (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code

[20] Law no. 304/2004 published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 827 on September 13th 2005

[21] Law no. 151/2016 on the European protection order

The challenge is settled in chambers within a time period of 3 days, but neither does now the law say since when does the count for the time frame begin. Having in mind the necessity of rapidly solving the protected persons petition (that is also implied by the fact that a solution can be given without the presence of the parties), we reckon that the count begins upon the registration of the case file containing the challenge with the competent authority.

As for the prosecutorial order containing the rejection of the request, it can be challenged before the chief prosecutor of the prosecutor that has rejected the petition, according to the above mentioned distinctions and time frames.

After the court resolution or prosecutorial order has remained final, the solution is communicated, regardless if the European protection order was issued or not, both to the protected person and to the person causing the danger.

If it was decided for the European protection order to be issued, a copy of the order is also communicated to the parties and another one is attached to the case file.

A forth copy is sent by the issuing judicial body, by any direct and safe means which leaves a written record to the competent authority of the executing State as to allow the competent authority of the executing State to establish the authenticity of the European juridical instrument.

After the issuing, the European protection order can be renewed, revoked, or modified in its content.

The order can be renewed if the measure that is the grounds for its enforcement is prolonged and if the reasons taken into consideration upon its issuing are maintained. Although the law does not provide the procedure applicable for renewal, we reckon according to the ubi eadem est ratio, eadem solutio esse debet principle, that it must be similar to the one that led to the issuing of the European protection order and the measure is notified to the executing State.

The European protection order may also be revoked if the protection measure that it is issued upon ceases or is revoked.

Finally, the European protection order may be modified in its content if, for example, the protection measure on which it was based is replaced with another protection measure with a different content. In this case the competent national authority may issue a new European protection order.

2.2. The procedure when Romania is the executing State

If Romania is the executing State, the competent authority to recognize the European protection order, adopt the measures for its enforcing and impose the replacing or ceasing of these measures is the Tribunal in whose venue the protected person stays or will stay, or has established or will establish its domicile or residence.

Thus, in a different way from the procedure presented in item I[22], the national competent authority to receive and enforce a request of recognition for a European protection order can only be a Court.

From the procedural standpoint, the trial is conducted urgently, in chambers, by a panel of one judge, with the citation of the protected person, the person causing danger and the prosecutor. The absence of the summoned persons does not preclude the ruling of the cause.

It is noticeable that, although the procedure of recognition and enforcing of the European protection order demands urgency, the trial can not take place unless the parties[23] are legally summoned, and often this procedure contains norms that imply the use of international law applicable to the relation with the requested state, that demand the use of judicial cooperation[24] instruments adopted for the EU.

Thus being the case, upon establishing the court hearings, the court will take into consideration the necessity of having fulfilled the procedural demands, alongside the specific circumstances of the case, such as, the date for the arrival of the protected person in Romania or the emergency of the situation.

In order to be recognized by the Romanian authorities, the European protection order must comply with these requirements:

a) it must be translated in Romanian;

In the event that the order is not translated in Romanian, the court will ask the competent authority of the issuing State to send the translation in a time limit of maximum 5 days starting from the moment when the request was made.

b) to be complete;

If this requirement is not fulfilled the court may deny the recognition request or may ask the competent authority of the issuing State to send the necessary data in a time frame of maximum 10 days, the term being established according to the particularities of the case.

c) to be issued on the premises of one or several of the protection measures adopted in the issuing State by a judgment in a criminal matter;
d) the lack of any of the grounds for the rebuttal of the request.

In the hypothesis of the fulfilling of these requirements, the Court will take a decision to recognise the European protection order and will enforce upon the person causing danger one or more of the prohibitions that would be available under its national law, similar or with the closest content to the prohibition stated in the European protection order, such as:

- The prohibition to be in certain localities or places as established by the Court;
- The prohibition to communicate with the

[22] Where Romania is the issuing State
[23] The protected person and the person causing danger
[24] E.g. The Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between the Member States of the European Union of May 29th 2000 protected person or to go near that person;

- The prohibition to go near the domicile, workplace, school or other locations where the protected person carries social activities, in the conditions established by the Court.

At times the national courts considered that the recognition of the European protection order may be done by referring to the provisions of Law no 151/2016 and also Law no. 217/2003 on preventing and combating family violence.

In consequence, by the first court decision no. 16 of 18 February 2019 of the Prahova Tribunal the European protection order issued by the Court of First Instance for Violence against women no. 1 in Arganda del Rey – Spain was recognised, the Court having in consideration the provisions of art. 13 of Law no. 151/2016 and art. 23(1) d and f of Law no. 217/2003[25].

We reckon that the provisions of Law no. 217/2003 do not fall under the subject of the European protection order for which Romania is the executing State, and the prohibitions the Court may enforce are strictly limited, as stated under art. 13 (5) of Law no. 151/2006, such as they have been previously analysed, and by no means taken from the national legislation on preventing and combating family violence.

Immediately after the issuing of the decision, the Court shall inform the protected person, the person causing danger, the General Police Directorate of Bucharest Municipality or the County Police Department where the protected person inhabits or will inhabit, or will reside, or in whose circumscription stays, or will stay or will reside the person causing danger, or in whose circumscription the places targeted by the prohibition are.

The decision is also notified to the competent authority of the issuing State.

The Court may reject the request of recognition and enforcement of a European protection order, the non-recognition grounds being stated by the Directive 2011/99/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 December 2011 on the European protection order under art. 10 as follows:

- the European protection order is not complete or has not been completed within the time limit set by the competent authority of the executing State;
- the European protection order has not been issued on the grounds of a protection measure as stated by art.1 b) of the national law.
- the protection measure relates to an act that does not constitute a criminal offence under the law of the executing State;
- the protection derives from the execution of a penalty or measure that, according to the Romanian law, is covered by an amnesty and relates to an act or conduct which falls within its competence according to Romanian law;
- there is immunity conferred under the Romanian law on the person causing danger, which makes it impossible to adopt measures on the basis of a European protection order;
- criminal prosecution, against the person causing danger, for the act or the conduct in relation to which the protection measure has been adopted is statute-barred under the Romanian law, when the act or the conduct falls also within its competence under Romanian national law;
- recognition of the European protection order would contravene the ne bis in idem principle;
- the person causing danger falls under the provisions of art. 113 of the Romanian Criminal Code[26],
- the protection measure that laid the grounds for the issuing of the European protection order relates to a criminal offence which is regarded as falling under the competence of Romanian criminal law[27].

In these cases, the decision by which the request of recognition of the European protection order is rejected is without undue delay notified to the competent issuing authority, to the protected person, the latter being also informed about the possibility of requesting the adoption of protection measures in accordance with its national law[28].

The Court decision on the request of recognition of the European protection order can be appealed in a 48 hours time frame starting when it was notified, regardless if the issuing of the order was granted or not. We believe that all the persons summoned in this procedure can file the appeal, meaning the protected person, the person causing danger and the prosecutor, even if they were not present in court when the case was tried.

When the appeal is filed, its effect shall not suspend the execution. Thus, if the protection order was recognized and enforced, by filing the appeal the protection measures taken for the safety of the protected person will not be suspended form execution.

By recognizing the protection order the Court will enforce the prohibitions available in its own national legislation for the duration of time demanded in the European protection order request, but no more than the Romanian law permits for similar, or with the closest content measures that were the grounds for issuing the protection order. In all cases the protection measure can only be enforced for a 180 days period.

After the recognition of the European protection order, while being in force, incidents may occur such as: breaches of prohibitions or changes in the execution of the protection order.

Thus there are situations when the person causing danger does not comply with the prohibitions

[25] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 205 of March 24th 2014

[26] The juvenile who has not turned 14 years of age, or who is between 14 and 16 years of age, for the latter if proven that the act was committed without competence

[27] Art. 8 of the Criminal Code

[28] Law no 217/2013 on preventing and combating family violence published in the Official Journal, Part I, no 205 of March 24th 2014

established by the Court. In this event, the executing Court must inform the competent authority of the issuing State or of the State of Supervision[29]. Thus, the national judicial authorities may take measures against the person that breaches its obligations, except when these breaches fall under the Romanian Criminal law.

At the same time, it may be possible for the issuing State to modify the European protection order, in which case it will address the Romanian judicial authorities with a new request for recognition and enforcing of the order. The Court will undertake a new evaluation of the request and may either order the modification of the protection measures in a corresponsive manner, either reject the recognition of the modified order if any of the non-recognition grounds exists.

The execution of the European protection order may cease when the maximum term for which the European protection order has been recognised has expired [30], or if there is clear indication that the protected person does not reside or stay in the territory of Romania, or has definitively left its territory. In a similar way, the execution may cease if after the recognition and the enforcement of the European protection order, Romania recognizes a supervision measure, a probation measure or an alternative sanction regarding the person causing danger for which the European protection order was issued[31].

The enforcement ceases upon revocation or withdrawal of the European protection order by the issuing State.

In all situations, the competence to decide upon the discontinuation of the European protection order belongs to the Court that has initially recognized this judicial instrument.

Although the national law does not state the applicable procedure in the hypothesis of existing reasons for discontinuing the European protection order, we reckon that the notification of the court can be done: by the judge delegate in charge of enforcement, by the police authorities, or by the judicial authorities of the issuing State.

The trial will be held in chambers, without the citation of the protected person, the person causing danger or the prosecutor.

After the court has ruled the discontinuation of the execution of the order, it has the obligation to notify without any delay the competent authority of the issuing State, and also, if it is possible, the protected person.

3. Conclusions

The transposition in the national law of the Directive 2011/99/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council corresponds to the aim for which it was adopted and ensures the assumed desideratum: the creation of a juridical instrument by which the protection granted to a natural person in a Member State is maintained and continued in any other Member State in which that person moves or has moved to.

The national authorities have established the juridical framework to ensure the efficient protection of all fundamental rights upheld in all member states such as life, freedom, physical or sexual integrity etc.

Even if, at times, the national regulation is not extremely clear an precise, the judicial cooperation in criminal matters carried out on the premises of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) regarding this legal work instrument represents a success, aspect that leads us to trust in the principle of mutual recognition of all types of judgments and decisions adopted in the Member States.

Future examination activities may look upon the means of solving the identified problems in the present study in a unified manner, alongside the direction given by the case-law of the Courts and the analogy with the national provisions applicable for the protection of victims of violence (Law no 217/2013 on preventing and combating family violence); Order no 146/2578/2016 regarding the management of domestic violence by the police force.

To rally up, we reckon that a new analysis on the European protection order institution may target exclusively the jurisprudential orientation of the national useful courts.

References

- Directive 2011/99/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 December 2011 on the European protection order in the national legislation
- Law no. 151/2016 of 13 July 2016 regarding the European protection order, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I no. 545 of 20 July 2016
- The recitals for Law no. 151/2016 available at http://www.cdep.ro
- Law no 217/2013 on preventing and combating family violence published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no 205 24 March 2014

[29] According to art. 1 of Law no. 151/2016, 'State of supervision' means the Member State of the European Union to which a final decision, enforcing upon a natural person that has commited a crime, one of the sanctions or measures stated under art. 170 [1], or art. 170 [17] of Law no 302/2014 on international judicial cooperation in criminal matters, has been transferred to.

[30] Before ordering the discontinuation, the competent Court can ask the national authority of the issuing State to provide information as to whether the protection provided by the European protection order is still needed in the circumstances of the case in question.

[31] As stated by art. $170^{1}$ (2) a) and art. $170^{20}$ of Law no. 302/2004

- Order no. 146/2578/2016 regarding the management of domestic violence by the police force published in the Official Journal, Part I, no 1110, 28 December 2018
- Joint practical guide of the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission for persons involved in the drafting of European Union legislation, http://eur-lex.europa.eu
- Kristiina Milt, http://www.europarl.europa.eu/factsheets/ro/sheet/155/judicial-cooperation-in-criminal-matters;
- The Stockholm Programme – An open and secure Europe serving and protecting citizens [Official Journal of the European Union (2010/C 115/01 of 4.5.2010].
- The Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union
- Directive 2012/29/UE of the European Parliament and of the Council of October 25th 2012, available at http://eur-lex.europa.eu;
- Regulation (EU) No 606/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 June 2013
- Law no. 135/2010 published in the Official Journal of Romania no 486 of 15 July 2010
- Law no. 286/2009 published in the Official Journal of Romania no 510 of 24 July 2010
- Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 139/2017, published in the Official Journal no. 336 on May 5th 2017
- Law no. 304/2004 published in the Official Journal of Romania Part I no. 827 on September 13th 2005
- The Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between the Member States of the European Union of May 29th 2000
- Criminal sentence no. 16/ 18.01. 2019 pronounced by Prahova Tribunalul în dosarul nr. 41/105/2019, unpublished, disponibilă pe http://portal.just.ro

CRIMINALISTICS TACTICS IN CASE OF CATASTROPHIC PLANE DISASTER

Nicolae MĂRGĂRIT

Abstract

This article is showing the criminalistics tactics in case of catastrophic plane disaster. It was analysed the crime scene investigation and the criminalistic methods of research of the victims in case of a plane disaster. The catastrophic plane disaster can be seen as a crash of an air plane after a collision between two planes, a collision with other obstacles, or other types of disaster if it generates the consequences of death or injured people, or plane and goods destruction and it is a crime referred to in the Air Transport Code. Catastrophic disaster is a tragic event, of great proportions, with no advance notice, with disastrous consequences. The catastrophic disaster is a generic notion. In practice there are two major catastrophic groups: natural catastrophes and disasters. Natural catastrophes are natural phenomena that occur according to physical laws and arise as a result of a brutal, but passive imbalance between the factors underlying these physical laws, predictable as manifestations, unpredictable as a moment of occurrence, observing as tragic events of great proportions and disastrous consequences on social - economic level. The disasters represent the catastrophe group in whose's production is incriminated the direct or indirect action, voluntary or involuntary of human being. Concluding, we can say that through catastrophe we understand all-natural phenomena, unexpected damage or accidents that hit a city, a country or a group of people linked by labour relations or during a trip and whose combat requires a large supply of people and means.

Keywords: criminalistic tactics, Crime scene investigation, catastrophic plane disaster, photo orientation and sketch, flight crew

1. Introduction

The activity carried out in the sector of air transportation is particularly important to the economy of Romania, and for this reason it is subject to proper regulation.

The regulatory documents in force define the airspace, determine the activities in connection with the airspace, indicate the bodies that are responsible for regulating and controlling air travels, and set rules for flight discipline and safety. They also stipulate the serious acts which threaten the security of air travels and which are labelled as offences.

The first category of incriminatory acts refers to the conduct of the staff in charge with the aircraft, such as when a crew member or any person participating in piloting the aircraft is intoxicated with alcohol and goes on board of a civil aircraft which is to take off.

The second category of incriminatory acts refers to actions or inactions committed during air navigation and which are such as to prevent the normal operation and travel of an aircraft, precisely:

- Destroying or damaging the air navigation installations or perturbing their operation or the air navigation services, if any of these acts is such as to threaten the security of an aircraft during the flight.
- Communicating information while being aware that it is false, if this act threatens the security of an aircraft during the flight.
- Interfering with the duties of the crew responsible for piloting an aircraft, if this threatens its security.
- Taking control of the aircraft unrightfully, directly or indirectly.
- Committing an act of violence against a person on board of an aircraft in the air, if that act is such as to threaten the security of an aircraft.
- Destroying an aircraft in the course of its service or damaging it, which is such as to make it unfit for flight or to threaten its security during the flight.[1]

For the acts listed above, the law stipulates two aggravating forms in relation to the goal pursued (hijacking) and the consequences (killing one or more people, damage or loss of the flying machine).

As viewed by the legislator, an air disaster is the crash or the turnover of an aircraft after the clash of two such means of transportation, the impact of an aircraft against other obstacles, or the occurrence of such other act, if there are very serious consequences like the death of people or body injuries, the destruction of or damage to that means of transportation, of installations or goods. An air disaster may be viewed as a very serious consequence of one of the offences stipulated by the Air Code or the criminal law, in connection with the aircraft, and the people or the goods carried by it.

In case of air disasters, the on-scene investigation is mandatory. According to the rules and regulations in force, the Department for Civil Aviation organises and conducts the inquiry of flight accidents involving civil aircrafts in the Romanian airspace.

Without substituting the criminal prosecution bodies in their rights, the bodies responsible for inquiring flight accidents have a contribution, through their specific means, to determining the facts, and one may conclude that within the investigation of air disasters, the inquiry has a double purpose:

- to determine the technical causes which led to the disaster through a technical inquiry;

* Nicolae Mărgărit, Assistant Lecturer, PhD. – Faculty of Law – University "Bioterra" of Bucharest, Romania; Lawyer in the Bucharest Bar, (e -mail: margarit.nicolae56@gmail.com).

[1] Revistă de informare, documentare şi opinii – Criminalistica, no.5, 6/2000.

- to determine any possible criminal responsibilities associated with the disaster through a judicial inquiry.

In consideration of the aforesaid, the on-scene investigation appears as the common start point for both inquiries, being indispensable for determining the causes, the consequences and any possible responsibilities in connection with the disaster. Specialists in the field of aviation, representatives of the Ministry of Internal Affairs, coroners and prosecutors contribute to the objectives of the on-scene investigation. If the aircraft belongs to another state, representatives of the company involved or the aeronautic authority of the state of registration of the aircraft usually participate in the investigation of the scene. Of course, the investigation team will be determined taking into consideration the provisions of the treaties in the field of aeronautics between the Romanian state and the states of registration of the aircrafts involved, as well as other clauses and obligations accepted by the signatory states[2].

In case of air disasters, the on-scene investigation pursues the following objectives:

- to discover, examine, retain and pick up traces and other types of physical evidence;
- to identify the victims, witnesses and other people in connection with the disaster, and to determine its consequences;
- for the specialists taking part in the investigation, to make technical-scientific findings and conduct expertises, in order to clarify the multiple aspects required by the investigation of causes;
- to determine the causes which led to the conditions and circumstances that brought forward the disaster.

With regard to the scene to be investigated in case of air disasters, we may say that it includes:

- the field where the debris is scattered, the bodies of passengers and crew members, the wreckage, the surrounding areas, as well as the regional direction and control centre, in case that the disaster occurred during a flight;
- the field where the debris is scattered, the bodies of passengers and crew members, the wreckage, the surrounding areas, as well as the regional direction and control centre, in case that the disaster occurred during the take-off and landing.

2. Distinctive features of the on-scene investigation in air disasters

2.1. Preparatory activities for the actual investigation

Until the actual investigation, there are some specific measures which need to be taken, some of them at the police station, others at the scene, if such measures have not been taken by the first responders at the scene. Some of these measures are:

a) Obtaining as much information as possible with regard to the disaster that occurred.

Such events are announced in most cases by the airport staff or the air traffic control and direction staff, after losing the radio contact with the aircraft, whether or not they received a prior DANGER message (which means that the aircraft is in a critical situation and needs help) or an EMERGENCY message (the aircraft is in a situation forcing it to land).

The relevant information in this phase is concerned with the nature of the danger, the location of the aircraft, its cargo, the possible crash site, the atmospheric and ground conditions which will be taken into consideration when organising the actions for the search and rescue of victims. Depending on the information that has been gathered, the involvement of other forces will be requested according to the search and rescue plan for aircrafts in difficulty, a plan made jointly by all the bodies which are able to provide help as necessary. The forces and means needed for the search and rescue of victims are also determined in this phase. It is possible to determine urgent measures to be taken by the people nearby in order to save the victims and limit the damaging effects[3].

b) Procuring, making operational and checking the necessary means for going to the disaster site, in order to provide medical help and carry out the necessary activities at the scene.

Unlike other situations, in case of an air disaster, the range of means used in the investigation is complex, and besides the forensic ones and those connected with medical help, airplanes or helicopters are necessary to fly over the area of interest, welding devices to cut the parts which will be subject to technical expertise, bags for carrying the bodies, vehicles necessary for transportation and so on.

c) Appointing the investigation team and moving to the scene.

The participants in an on-scene investigation in case of air disasters are specialists of Civil Aviation, representatives of the prosecution, staff of the Ministry of the Administration and the Interior, coroners, medical staff, fire fighters, and members of mountain rescue teams.

If the aircraft belongs to another state, representatives of the company involved and the aeronautic authority of the state of registration of the aircraft may participate in the investigation at the scene if they so request.

d) Providing first aid to save the lives of air disaster victims is part of the category of priority measures, which are applied even at the risk of destroying traces.

This measure involves asking the medical staff to support the team, and the victims shall be transported to the nearest medical facility.

[2]Association of Romanian Criminalists – Investigarea criminalistică a locului faptei, Bucharest 2004, p.117.
[3] Palcu Pavel – Consideraţii privind soluţionarea împrejurărilor controversate de la faţa locului, 2004 Arad, p. 53.

e) Securing the scene.

This measure is extremely important, and its purpose is mainly to protect the objects and preserve the traces, to remove the people who are not involved in the on-scene investigation, so as to avoid changes which could influence the judicial goal.

f) The assignment of the tasks to be completed by the participants in the investigation of the scene, determining how they will keep in touch, all these correlated with the large area of the site to be investigated, the complexity of the tasks to be performed and so on.

2.2. Conduct of the on-scene investigation

2.2.1. Activities specific to the static phase

The static phase of an on-scene investigation in case of air disasters starts with some preliminary activities, insofar as they have not been already carried out.

Depending on the particularities of the site to be investigated and of the event, the following main activities will be carried out:

a) Identifying witnesses and obtaining the first information about the disaster.

In an on-scene investigation, the people who may provide information about the disaster that occurred shall be identified. Of course, it is important to identify them, but if the identification is not followed by getting the first information from these people, the result is not the expected one[4].

The statements of the people concerned shall be recorded on tape or videotape, an important role in solving the case being played by the statements given by the surviving passengers or members of the crew.

The hearing of these people tries to clarify some issues related to the time when the event occurred, the weather conditions, the cloud ceiling, the visibility, the direction of movement of the aircraft, the noises it made, the objects which detached from it, the obstacles encountered, the manoeuvres performed and so on.

It is important to underline once again the need to record the statements of survivors, because their health, in most cases, is precarious, and otherwise valuable information for solving the case may be lost.

b) The overall orientation – this is particularly important for determining the area of the ground to be investigated. While going over the crash site, depending on the peculiarity of the ground, it may be parcelled based on the location of the traces of the disaster and it is possible to decide the order in which the parcelled particularities will be investigated.

During the overall orientation, photographs will be taken for orientation and sketching, which will catch the consequences of the disaster, the condition and the position of the main traces and physical evidence.

The orientation photographs may be taken from a helicopter of from far away, while the sketching ones are executed based on the panoramic technique, they providing a more accurate image of the scene, the consequences and the location of different traces on the ground.

Photographing and video recording may also be used to retain the activities carried out by the investigation team, for locating and extinguishing fires or for saving victims[5].

c) The topographic survey of the landscape characteristics of the ground, as well as the position of the main objects, with the corresponding distances, for drawing the sketch of the scene.

d) Examining the traces which risk being changed or disappear, then retaining them as appropriate.

After searching for, discovering, retaining and picking up the traces and physical evidence at the scene and after interpreting them, with help from the specialists involved, it is possible to issue versions about how the air disaster occurred.

Based on the investigation of past air disasters, the following causes have been found:

- Technical causes – defects related to design, construction, or defects which appeared as a result of using the aircraft.
- Navigation errors or errors related to the piloting of the aircraft. Wrong coordinates and data are sent to the aircraft by the air traffic direction and control centres or the members of the crew execute commands erroneously.
- Fires or explosions on board, which may be generated by accident or produced on purpose.

The on-scene investigation shall consider all the traces and the physical evidence, it shall be carried out independently of the version that has been developed, and evidence will be gathered both to support and to deny such version[6].

2.2.2. Activities specific to the dynamic phase

In the dynamic phase, the crash site will be examined thoroughly and the traces and the physical evidence will be analysed based on appropriate techniques, with the specialists participating and helping in their description and interpretation. The investigation of the disaster scene shall be carried out based on an order imposed by the specificity of the investigated surface area. The investigation is usually conducted at the place of impact, continuing with the area on which the debris and passengers and crew's bodies are scattered, and then extending it on the route between the place of impact and the airport, to the airport or the control centre. We should note that the investigation of the air traffic direction and control centre may take place simultaneously with the investigation at the crash site.

[4] Idem, p. 58.
[5] Pavel Palcu, ibidem, p.63.
[6] Pavel Palcu, ibid., p.68.

The categories of traces which arise and may be identified during the on-scene investigation are specific to the cause of the disaster, and they are mainly:

I. Traces specific to disasters which occurred because of technical malfunctions

All the parts of the aircraft shall be examined in order to discover traces which confirm the existence or inexistence of technical malfunctions which caused or could have influenced the occurrence of the disaster.

a) Traces created on the outside of the aircraft

They usually consist in dismantling, tearing, bending, and their interpretation may provide information about the phenomenon which caused them, the place where they started and their succession, the place of impact of the aircraft, the functioning of the engine at the time of the impact. The examination of the airscrew is particularly important for the interpretation of traces and the determination of the causes of the accident, when the aircraft is equipped with a piston or a turboprop engine, as well as the examination of the traces it creates.

If we know some particular data about the airscrew, precisely the number of blades, the engine speed, the engine-airscrew transmission ratio at the place of the disaster, it is possible to determine the speed of the aircraft and, in relation to it, other issues relevant to the inquiry may be determined and clarified.

The examination of the airscrew is required even if no traces created by it were identified on the ground, its examination and interpretation providing data about the angle at which the impact occurred, the travelling speed, the functioning or non-functioning of the engine; all these related to the deformation of the airscrew.

b) Traces created in the cell (fuselage) of the aircraft

The cell is that part of an aircraft without the engine and board equipment. Traces may form on the span, the fuselage or the empennage. In order to determine and interpret them in the course of the investigation, tears and deformations will be examined and a conclusion is drawn on whether they could have been produced or not at the time of the impact between the aircraft and the obstacle.

The examination of the cell should take into consideration any possible deviations related to adjustment and balance, whether or not the cover shows any previous deformation or deterioration, traces of ice, missing or loose rivets, and cracks. The exhaust area will be examined for traces of corrosion and deposition of combustion products.

The interpretation of these traces may consider, besides the configuration of the impact area, how the cargo was distributed in the aircraft in order to comply with the requirements related to balance, aircraft weight and other requirements.

c) Traces created by piston engines

To discover such traces, the condition of oil filters is checked to see if they retained any metal particles which confirm the breakage of parts before the impact, as well as the condition of the intake and exhaust manifold, for tightness, the colour of cinder and smoke black spots. The check will also include the condition of spark plugs and ignition installations, the cooling installation, other aggregates of the engine so as to determine, based on tests with special devices, the working regime of the engine corresponding to the position of the control levers.

Attention will be paid to the presence of fire traces, the condition of the change mechanism of the airscrew blades, as well as the use of fuel and lubricant for that type of engine, and samples of them may be taken for analysis[7].

Based on this examination and the subsequent findings, it is possible to determine whether or not the operational regime provided by instructions has been complied with.

d) Traces created by reaction engines (turboprop or turbojet)

The following will be checked to determine such traces:

- the condition and the position of the low-pressure filter of the feeding installation (whether they are obstructed or nor);
- the condition of the tubes and hoses of the feeding and greasing installation;
- the condition of the engine aggregates, the boxes of the driving gears, to determine any possible tears, cracks, indentations, etc.

The condition of the following will also be examined:

- the transmission bearings;
- the insulating layer of the reactive tube with regard to traces which could be left by broken parts of the engine and which were expulsed by gases;
- the turbine, especially the paddles, burning traces or other aspects relevant to the investigation.

e) Traces created at the aircraft commands

When examining such traces attention shall be paid to:

- the incorrect position of levers, rods, cables, pulleys and hydraulic amplifiers;
- the position of counterweights, compensators, and aerodynamic ailerons and brakes;
- the condition of steering, profounder, joysticks, rudder bars;
- abnormal margins, the correct angle of lock, the attachment and safety of all command articulations.

All these shall be examined in comparison and in relation to the position and the indications of the flight instruments which control their functioning. For rigid commands, the check will include the cleaning and greasing condition, the wear in articulations, the rollers, rods, deformations, cracks, exaggerated tightening of bearing axes, the existence of foreign objects on the command routes.

f) Traces created in the cockpit

[7] Crimnalistica – revistă de informare, documentare şi opinii, no. 4, December 2002.

To identify such traces, a thorough examination will be conducted with regard to the position of the board instruments used in the navigation and those which control the functioning of power plants, the position of levers and other controllers of the engine, the undercarriage and flaps. Of course, attention will also be paid to other instruments and devices, special installations, equipment (radio-location, radio-navigation, fire protection etc.).

g) Traces created on the takeoff and landing devices

For discovering them, the following shall be checked:

- the position of the rods of the hydraulic installation and the securing locks which makes it possible to determine whether the undercarriage was out at the time of the contact between the aircraft and the ground;
- the tearing direction of the components of the undercarriage;
- the presence of fuel traces on tyres, their pressure, air loss, mechanical deterioration, thrusting, non-tightness[8].

II. Traces specific to accidents caused by direction errors or pilot errors

In the Romanian air space, the flight of civil aircrafts transporting passengers and goods is executed only within airport zones, terminal control regions and air ways. Throughout its itinerary, the aircraft is provided with radio-electric protection. During the execution of a flight, the aircraft must be at all times under the direction and control of the air traffic bodies. During the flight, the commander of the aircraft has the obligation to follow the directives of the bodies responsible for the protection of air traffic, is responsible for their application, and must ensure the permanent phonic contact with the direction and control centres. The commander of the aircraft has the obligation to provide information to the direction and control bodies about the evolution of the flight in the form of position reports, which refer to the indicative, position, time, altitude or level, information on weather conditions.

The main traces which may be created and may be used in finding the causes of air disasters and determining any liability are the sound traces of voice and conversation, recorded on tape at the direction body and in the aircraft.

To determine the causes of an air disaster, it is necessary:

- at the direction body with which the aircraft kept contact, to pick up the magnetic tapes on which the conversations with the crew were recorded, checking first the integrity of their seals;
- in the aircraft, to look for and pick up the flight recorder (the "black box"), which is constructed to resist the consequences of a crash. This device records on tape or film the flight parameters, and the operational parameters of various equipment and aggregates. For some aircrafts, the flight recorder is doubled by a "voice recorder", which records all the sounds in the cockpit. Even if the plane sinks, the recorder may be recovered from water, because it is provided with an ultrasound emitter.

Besides the traces of voice and conversation, in case that the disasters are consequences of pilot or aircraft direction errors, it is also necessary to search for and discover other traces which may indicate the wrong manoeuvres executed by the crew or the erroneous direction by the direction and control body. For this purpose, it is necessary to look for the map indicating the route covered by the aircraft and due attention should be paid to the examination of the component parts of the aircraft[9].

III. Traces specific to disasters which occurred as a result of fire or explosions

a) Traces produced by fire

For this purpose, the on-scene investigation will consider:

- Traces indicating the possibility of ignition or self-ignition of fuel, which requires the examination of fuel tanks, fixing joints, whether there are any cracks in the fuel ducts and tanks, whether the fuel came into contact with the hot parts of the engine.

Samples of the fuel used by the aircraft shall be taken to determine the ignition and self-ignition point based on an expertise.

- Traces confirming a short-circuit on the electric wiring, at the electric conductors, the characteristic parts of the short-circuit. To determine any possible traces, the examination will include the electric starters, generators, accumulator batteries, conductors, cables, distributing boxes and the terminal panels of the electric equipment. One should not overlook the radio-location equipment, the maintenance, especially any changes to the installation, the chassis ground of the equipment, the voltage of the power source, fuses and protection devices, the insulation of conductors etc.
- The existence of fire points and traces which confirm the spread of fire, determining and retaining the degree of burns on the inside and outside of the aircraft, determining the intensity of the fire and how it propagated.

In this respect, the special fire protection equipment is very important, and it will be examined with regard to its technical condition, the seal of emergency command levers of fixed installations and the triggers of the mobile ones, the condition of the fire alarm devices, the condition of fire extinguishers and so on.

b) Traces resulting from an explosion and for this attention should be paid to:

- How the debris from the aircraft or its content is disposed; this is important for determining whether there was an explosion, if it occurred in the air or on ground.

[8] Crimnalistica – revistă de informare, documentare şi opinii, no. 4, 6, December 2002.
[9] Mircea I. - Criminalistică, Ed. Fundaţiei Chemarea, Iaşi 2002,p. 136.

If the explosion occurred in the air, the debris is scattered on a large area, directly proportional to the height of the flight and the weight of the spread pieces. The falling apart of the aircraft and the scattering of the debris on a large area may result not only from an explosion, but also from a possible depressurisation determined by various causes, possibly connected to malfunctions or projectiles from fire arms.

In case that the parts of the aircraft are scattered on a large area, and the engines are shallowly sunk, the impact with the ground was under a small fall angle and at high speed, the crash not being the result of an explosion.

The focus of the explosion may be determined only after all the parts of the aircraft have been extinguished, which will be used to rebuild it. Based on the interpretation of traces, it is possible to conclude whether the disaster was the result of an explosion[10].

2.2.3. Other specific activities of the on-scene investigation

Besides the activities presented above, in order to solve all the tasks, in the course of the on-scene investigation, the members of the team will carry out other activities too in order to determine the causes of the disaster, its consequences in terms of victim identification, the search for and picking up of the aircraft documents, the recovery of goods[11].

1. The identification of victims

The main task of the on-site investigation, the identification of victims, is much facilitated compared to railway accidents or other accidents, due to the list passengers which contains the passengers' main identification data.

The navigation staff (the staff commanding the aircraft, pilots, air navigators, engineers and navigation mechanics, radio-navigation operators), the technical and ancillary staff (flight attendants), all being members of the crew, may be identified based on the place where they are found, their clothing, identity and work documents. If their bodies were not carbonised, the identification may be provisory on the spot, based on the objects which remained on the body (components of the headphones of the radio emission device etc.), and the certain identification shall be made based on the forensic examination, an important role in this activity being that of the medical record drawn by the team providing medical assistance, especially the odontologic report.

The forensic examination of the command staff shall search for traces on the body attesting the exercise of violence, and biological samples shall be taken for determining the level of alcohol.

The passengers shall be identified using mainly the data provided by the list of passengers, as well as the identity documents found with them.

The practice of air disaster investigation revealed that men are more easily identified and certainly on the spot compared to women, because of the identity documents which they keep with them. Women may be identified on the spot, without full certainty, because most of times they keep their identity documents in bags, which more often are not found on the body.

The identification activity continues and is completed in forensic laboratories, where specific activities may be conducted for the examination of the bodies in order to determine the sex, age, height, and particular signs, and the bodies will be fingerprinted, photographed or video recorded, and after dressing, both the bodies and the clothing or other personal belongings may be presented for recognition[12].

It is important to emphasise that the bodies should be photographed in compliance with the rules of criminalistics, and photographs shall be taken both at the scene and after dressing, as illustrated in the examples below.

2. The search for and picking up of documents and objects

During the on-scene investigation, the investigation team will look for and pick up the identity documents or other documents found with the passengers, as well as the obligatory documents on board which may lead to determine the causes of the disaster.

The obligatory documents on board, or part of them, depending on the nature of the flight, may be:

- The navigability certificate (provisional flight authorisation), based on which any civil aircraft is acknowledged as being able to fly, a document issued or validated for a determined period of time. The certificate also indicates the minimum numerical composition of positions for the aircraft (the crew).
- The registration certificate issued based on the registration in the single register of civil aircrafts, which also indicates the identification mark.
- The flight book of the aircraft where the commander records everything that happens during the mission and what is relevant for the execution of the mission, of the flight in general; these records may serve as official evidence for justifying acts or actions.
- The radio logbook – in case of aircrafts which have a radio-navigation device in the composition of the crew.
- The mission order – which indicates the nominal composition of the crew for each mission, the commander on board etc.
- A copy of the flight plan.
- The necessary navigation and meteorological documentation – documents on the passengers and the cargo, the excerpt of the agreement concluded with the beneficiary for utility flights and so on.
- Documents which the navigation staff are obliged to keep with them during the execution of flight missions, the brevet with the licence up-to-date, the radio-telegraphic certificate, the passengers' documents.

[10] Suciu, C. - Criminalistica, Ed. Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1972,p.263.
[11] Mircea I. - Criminalistica, Lumina Lex, Bucharest , 2001,p. 176.
[12] Colecţia de reviste - Criminalistica – Revistă de informare, documentare şi opinii, 1999 - 2005, no.3/2004.

If the navigation staff or the passengers carried any armament, it is necessary to find and examine it in order to look for traces which could attest any recent firing.

3. Search for and recovery of goods

In the course of the on-scene investigation of air disasters, measures will be taken to recover the goods, among which there are:

- The recovery of the aircraft in so far as this activity is possible, or of parts of it, this task being executed by representatives of civil aviation. If the destruction is massive, or the disaster site is difficult to access or does not allow the transportation of the wreckage, a destruction or abandonment report shall be drawn up.
- The recovery of goods or passengers' belongings. After picking up these goods, inventory documents shall be drawn up, and proofs of handing them over to members of the family. Increased attention should be paid to the possessions of passengers, and measures for their security should be taken. The same measures are required with regard to the goods transported by air.

2.2.4. Retention of the results of the on-scene investigation

I. Retention of the results of the on-scene investigation

The results of the on-scene investigation are retained through description, as well as with the help of technical means. The main means for retaining the results of the on-scene investigation is the report[13].

a) The on-scene investigation report shall include all the findings, the dimensions and the spatial relations of the investigated area, the characteristics of all the traces and physical evidence, with peculiarities given by:

- the recording of the geographic coordinates, the altitude, the landscape characteristics of the site of the disaster;
- the recording of information as accurate as possible about the time of the announcement, finding the aircraft, the meteorological conditions at the time of the investigation;
- the nature of the flight, and its purpose (public passenger air transport or cargo air transport, utilitarian-sanitary, agricultural-forestry), training or practice, technical for check, sports, special. Moreover, if the flight takes place at sight or based on instruments, its regularity (regular, occasional, special, additional, charter) etc.
- the recording of the impact place as accurately as possible, the area on which the parts of ensembles and sub-ensembles are scattered, the position and the condition of different debris from the aircraft, the way covered by it;
- the identification of the aircraft, which is based on the flag, the records referring to nationality and the group of letters representing the identification mark, which are written on the body of the aircraft, as well as on a plate made of a fireproof material fixed in the proximity of the main entrance of the aircraft;
- the recording of the documents found, of the magnetic tapes picked up by the direction bodies, the data on the number of passengers, the nature of the cargo;
- the condition and the position of the flight instruments and of different mechanisms and equipment for direction and control, other installations (including those from the airport, if appropriate);
- the number of victims, their identification data, their clothing, the objects found and picked up, other consequences of the disaster.

b) The retention with the help of technical means is intended to reflect as accurately as possible the image of the site, to complement the description given in the report and is done by photographing, video recording, videotaping and sketching.

1. The photograph and the forensic film as a means of retention shall be executed in compliance with the known general rules and with some particularities. So, the orientation of the disaster site shall be done from a plane or a helicopter, so as to cover as much as possible the area containing the debris from the aircraft, the goods and the passengers.

The next to be retained is the impact place of the aircraft with the ground or with the mountain versant, the object hit in the fall, continuing with the retention of the main parts of the aircraft, of the engines at the places where they were found, without moving them, taking photographs and filming, the sketch, which may include aspects regarding the cockpit, the instrument board and the position of control levers, at the place and in the condition in which they were found, then the details of the board instruments, the bending of airscrews, the portions torn up, the deformation of the wings, the fuselage, cables and other traces.

2. The recording on magnetic tape or video tape has the advantage of rendering the statements of victims, witnesses or other people soon enough after the disaster. If they are not recorded, considering the serious condition of the victims, the investigation may lack many essential elements for solving the cause objectively [14].

With reference to video records, they have the advantage of retaining both the image and sound, as well as of catching activities in progress, in their evolution, from the incipient phase to the final one, or phenomena which evolve rapidly (a fire on board). The examination of these records after the investigation at the scene may lead to valuable elements for clarifying the causes of the disaster.

[13] Palcu Pavel – Considerații tactice privind pregătirea, etapele și mijloacele tehnice de fixare a cercetării la fața locului, Arad, 2004, p. 49.
[14] Palcu Pavel – Considerații tactice privind pregătirea, etapele și mijloacele tehnice de fixare a cercetării la fața locului, Arad, 2004, p. 56.

3. The sketch of the site where the disaster occurred should render the essential elements of the investigated area, and it shall be completed simultaneously with the report, the photographs, the videotaping and the video recording. It is possible to draw it based on several techniques. A first technique for executing the sketch is the representation in horizontal projection. This makes it possible to make the orientation sketch containing the site where the debris from the aircraft is found, as well as other landmarks, the bodies of victims. This sketch reflects different position relations between various traces and the physical evidence existing at the crash site.

Another technique used preponderantly to illustrate the succession of the phases of the disaster, starting with the point of impact, when fragments of the aircraft are spread on sloped land (mountain versant), is the sketch in vertical projection[15].

3. Forensic methods for victim identification

3.1. The dactyloscopic identification

The digital impression obtained from bodies of unknown identity based on the methodology previously presented is compared with the fingertip's records existing in the criminal record or, as appropriate, with the papillary traces picked up from the homes of missing persons.

We consider that it is not necessary to insist on this category of expertise, the value of this identification being widely recognised, and its application being within the reach of any criminalist.

3.2. The collation of identification forms

The identification forms, which are an "anthropologic catalogue", are usually drawn up in three copies, one of them being sent to the General Inspectorate of the Romanian Police –National Institute of Criminalistics. This way, all the identification forms are concentrated at central level and are compared to see whether the data in the form of an unidentified body match the identification data in the forms of missing persons.

Because the form of a missing person is based on the statements sometimes subjective or incomplete of the person reporting the disappearance, and sometimes the condition of the body does not allow a correct evaluation of particulars, special attention should be paid when making the comparisons. When resemblances between two forms are found, an identification method that is certain is used, the results of these comparisons serving as a rough guide in principle.

Comparisons are made between general data referring to age, sex, the day the person went missing and the day when the body was found, the blood type and the Rh, then the matching of particulars, clothing and objects found with them. If possible, the photographs of the missing person are compared with those of the body, and when the data is available, the odontologic forms are compared16.

3.3. The portrait photograph expertise

When we have a recent photo of a missing person, we may use the expertise of the portrait photograph for identification.

The photograph of the missing person and the photograph of the unidentified body are enlarged at the same scale.

A separate and a comparative examination of the two photographs determine:

a) the anatomical particulars: sex, age, race, the shape of the head and face, the shape, size, location and colour of the component elements of the face;
b) the singular particulars: scars, spots, warts, moles, tattoos, wrinkles, as well as the particularities of some component elements of the face, which individualize the person through their nature, form, colour, size and location.

In order to clarify the objective of the expertise it is possible to use one or more methods of the portrait photograph expertise:

- collation-based comparison;
- determining the linear continuity;
- the face grid;
- angle measurements;
- the projection of common points.

If we have a photograph in profile of the missing person, identification may be made based on morphological aspects of the ear.

The ear, due to its cartilaginous nature, keeps its morphological characteristics for a longer period and is less influenced by the putrefaction process. With its multiple anatomic parts and their variation, the ear provides a possibility for identification.[17]

The body is photographed in profile, approximately at the same angle at which the photograph of the missing person was taken. The photographs of the ears are enlarged at the same scale, and then the comparisons for identification are made, observing the general principles of forensic expertise.

3.4. The over projection

This method is used when it is necessary to identify a body in advanced putrefaction or when only the skeleton has been discovered. The over projection was used for the first time in England, in 1935.

[15] Palcu Pavel – Considerații tactice privind pregătirea, etapele și mijloacele tehnice de fixare a cercetării la fața locului, Arad, 2004, p. 67.
[16] Colecția de reviste - Criminalistica – Revistă de informare, documentare și opinii, 1999 - 2005, no.3/2004.
[17] Collective work – Tratat practic de criminalistica – vol. I, ed. 1976, p. 170-178.

The identification of a person based on this method is possible after taking into consideration:

a) general identification elements related to:
- race;
- typology;
- sex;
- anthropometrics, and

b) individual identification elements:
- metric;
- morphologic;
- functional;
- aesthetic.

To be able to apply the method, the general and individual elements found on bodies and those referring to the missing person must be corresponding.

Basically, the method consists in examining the overlap of the elements of a photograph of the skull that has been discovered and is to be identified.

The photograph of the missing person may be procured from the population registry office or from the personal photographs of the missing person.

A negative of the photograph of the missing person is taken with the dimension 9/12 or 12/18 cm. The negative is introduced in a photographic chamber with a mat glass, the mat glass is overlapped and a pencil is used to draw, very carefully, the characteristic features in vertical plane – the transversal line connecting the zygoma and the corners of the eye pit.

The skull is fixed on a special stand which allows its movement in all planes and after determining a position as close as possible to that of the head of the missing person, a negative with the same dimensions is taken.

Finally, the two negatives – of the person and of the skull – are projected on the same photographic paper, obtaining the photograph of the skull overlapped with the photograph of the victim. The overlapping may be total or partial.

The identity conclusion is based on the perfect overlapping of all the characteristics consisting in characteristic lines and anatomic graphic points.

Although simple, the method involves special precision, as well as some challenges related to the execution of the overlapped photograph.

For the application of this method, special devices have been made for taking the photograph of the skull. At the National Institute of Criminalistics there is such a device conceived in Romania.

This method has been considerably enhanced with the introduction of computing technology and the video technique which allow the electronic combination of the image of the unknown skull with the photograph of the missing person.

3.5. Odontology

Dentition keeps its characteristics for a long time, and it may be successfully used in the identification of bodies. The importance of the method lies also in the inclusion of the dental form among the identification forms.

The dental form is a drawing which represents the position of the 32 teeth of an adult person, as well as the legend which indicates the names of the teeth and the conventional signs used to indicate dentition changes.

When a body is discovered, the coroner helps to complete the odontogram.

In case of missing persons, this problem will be clarified with the help of people reporting the disappearance and by interviewing the relatives and the acquaintances of the missing person. Also, one should check if the missing person had any dental work done at the dental centre in the neighbourhood, where we could also find sketches or dental radiographs and the number of the dental plate, if any. The dentist who fixed the dental plate may help to identify the body by recognising that plate.

By comparing the odontogram of the body with that of the missing person, elements of coincidence may be found, which allow us to use other identification methods, if the odontogram of the missing person is incomplete or uncertain, because the interviewed people indicate only probable data about the condition of the missing person's dentition. If the records in the dental centre are found, this method is certain and sufficient to identify the body.

For people whose profession involves a higher level of risk – for example, sailors, navigation staff, etc. – several identification methods have been suggested in case of an accident. Such a suggestion was to insert, in case of a dental work, a rod in the tooth subject to the intervention, which could be found through a radiologic check. An aluminium plate containing the identification data of the person marked in miniature shall also be introduced in that tooth. The proposed method confers a high degree of certainty to the identification and is also easy to apply.[18]

4. Conclusions

Until the actual investigation, there are some specific measures which need to be taken, some of them at the police station, others at the scene, if such measures have not been taken by the first responders at the scene.

The static phase of an on-scene investigation in case of air disasters starts with some preliminary activities, insofar as they have not been already carried out.

In the dynamic phase, the crash site will be examined thoroughly and the traces and the physical evidence will be analysed based on appropriate techniques, with the specialists participating and helping in their description and interpretation. The investigation of the disaster scene shall be carried out based on an order imposed by the specificity of the investigated surface area.

[18] P.L. Samis – Un nouveau procédé d'identification par les dents – in Revue internationale de police criminelle.

In the Romanian air space, the flight of civil aircrafts transporting passengers and goods is executed only within airport zones, terminal control regions and air ways. Throughout its itinerary, the aircraft is provided with radio-electric protection. During the execution of a flight, the aircraft must be at all times under the direction and control of the air traffic bodies.

In the course of the on-scene investigation, the members of the team will carry out other activities too in order to determine the causes of the disaster, its consequences in terms of victim identification, the search for and picking up of the aircraft documents, the recovery of goods

During the on-scene investigation, the investigation team will look for and pick up the identity documents or other documents found with the passengers, as well as the obligatory documents on board which may lead to determine the causes of the disaster.

The results of the on-scene investigation are retained through description, as well as with the help of technical means. The main means for retaining the results of the on-scene investigation is the report.

The digital impression obtained from bodies of unknown identity based on the methodology previously presented is compared with the fingertip's records existing in the criminal record or, as appropriate, with the papillary traces picked up from the homes of missing persons.

References

- Gh. Asanache, Elemente de medicina biocriminalistica, Bucharest, 1978.
- Association of Romanian Criminalists, Investigarea criminalistică a locului faptei, Bucharest, 2004.
- Association of Romanian Criminalists, Realităţi şi perspective în criminalistică, Bucharest 2003.
- N. Mărgărit, C.R. Pavel, Criminalistică, Curs universitar de metodologia investigării infracțiunilor, Moroșan, Bucharest, 2017.
- M. Gheorghita, Tratat de Metodica Criminalistica, Ed. Universitatea de Stat din R. Moldova, Chisinau, 2015, CEP USM.
- Association of Romanian Criminalists – Rolul şi contribuţia probelor criminalistice şi medico-legale în stabilirea adevărului, Luceafărul, Bucharest, 2005.
- V.Belis, Medicina legala, Teora, 1992.
- V. Beliş et al., Medicina legală, Teora, Bucharest, 1992.
- V. Beliş et al., Tratat de medicinălegală, vol. I – II, Editura Medicală, Bucharest, 1995.
- Ciopraga, I. Iacobuţă, Criminalistica, Chemarea, Iaşi, 1997.
- G. Mateut, Procedura penală, vol. I and II, Editura Fundatiei "Chemarea", Iaşi, 1995.
- N. Mărgărit, C.R. Pavel, Criminalistică, Tratat de tactică, Moroșan, Bucharest, 2017.
- F. Meixner, Dicţionar pentru criminalişti, Hamburg, 1964.
- Mircea, Criminalistica, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 2001.
- Mircea, Valoarea criminalistică a unor urme de la locul faptei, Vasile Goldiş, Arad, 1996.
- Palcu Pavel, Consideraţii privind soluţionarea împrejurărilor controversate de la faţa locului, 2004 Arad.
- Palcu Pavel, Consideraţii tactice privind pregătirea, etapele și mijloacele tehnice de fixare a cercetării la faţa locului, Arad, 2004.
- E. Stancu, Tratat de criminalistică, 2nd edition, reviewed, Bucharest, Universul Juridic, 2002.
- C. Suciu, Criminalistica, Editura Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1972.
- L. Suciu, Criminalistica, Editura Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucharest 1982.
- The Cosereni air disaster, File of the Ilfov Prosecution Office – 1977.
- Moraru, Medicina legala, Editura Medicala, Bucharest, 1967.
- C. Simion, Medicine legale judiciare, Librairi Maloine, Paris, 1955.
- Gh. Scripcaru, M. Terbancea, Medicina legala - Manual pentru facultatile de drept, Editura Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucharest 1970.
- V. Dongoroz et al., Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului Penal Român, Vol. IV, Bucharest, 1972.
- N. Margarit, Criminalistica - Note de Curs, Little Star, Bucharest, 2013.
- N. Margarit, N. Vaduva, Tratat de Tactica Criminalistica, Mustang, Bucharest, 2015.

REVIEW OF IRRECONCILABLE DECISIONS

Bogdan MICU[*]

Abstract

This article proposes a theoretical and practical approach of the review case which refers to the hypothesis in which two final decisions cannot be reconciled. The author is making an analysis even by the reference to two specific practical situations in which two courts of appeal have given radical solutions in two cases which were ruled in an erroneous manner by the merits court. In the given situations, the two panels of appeal invalidated each other's reasoning through their rulings. By reference to these hypotheses, which were not generalized so that a ruling by means of a second appeal in the interest of the law could be opportune, the author proposes an extension of the invoked review case also with respect thereto.

Keywords: review; extraordinary means of challenge; irreconcilable decisions; criminal lawsuit; final decisions

1. General Issues

The review is one of the extraordinary means of challenge regulated by the Criminal Procedure Code under Art. 453, para. 1 letter e). In terms of the doctrine, it is shown that the review is the extraordinary means of challenge "through the use of which can be removed the judicial errors regarding the deeds retained under a final Court decision or the continuous violations of the rights guaranteed by the European Convention or the breaches of the constitutional provisions in case the Constitutional Court admitted a non-constitutionality plea after the decision remained final."[1]

It is admitted that some Court decisions which contain judicial errors may fall under the power of res judicata, although they fail to reflect the truth in reference to the case in which they were issued, and – in this case- they are confronted with the principle of finding out the facts and with that of the authority of res judicata.[2]

At the same time, the jurisprudence notes that: "The review represents an extraordinary means of challenge which can be exerted against the final Court decisions issued by the criminal courts of law, having the character of a withdrawing means of challenge, which allows the criminal court of law to re-analyze its own decision and, at the same time, the character of a de facto means of challenge, by means of which judicial errors which occurred in the ruling on criminal cases are found and removed. The review is filed versus a decision that obtained the authority of res judicata, on the strength of certain facts or circumstances which were not known to the court of law when they ruled on the case, which were found after the trial and represent proof that such trial is based on a judicial error."[3]

The judicial error is identified as consisting in the fact that the court of law maintains a factual state which does not match the true facts and can be generated by certain causes: „failure by the court of law to know certain facts or essential circumstances; use of distorted evidence (through the mediation of criminal activities); corruption of the judicial bodies which investigated or judged the case; the existence of contradictory (irreconcilable) decisions[4].

Being an extraordinary means of challenge, it may be exerted solely with respect to the decisions established under Art. 452 of the Criminal Procedure Code and only for the cases provided under Art. 453 of the Criminal Procedure Code and Art. 465 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the only articles that might cause a de facto reexamination of the criminal case.

2. Review of Irreconcilable Decisions

In accordance with Art. 453 of the Criminal Procedure Code, "the review of final Court decisions, with respect to their criminal side, may be required when: a) they found out facts or circumstances which were unknown when a ruling was made on the case and which prove the lack of grounds of the decision issued in the case; b) the decision required to be reviewed was based on the statement made by a witness, on the opinion issued by an expert or on the situations to which an interpreter drew attention, who committed the crime of false testimony in the case required to be reviewed, thus influencing the ruling made; c) a writ which served as grounds for the decision required to be reviewed was declared as false

[*] Assistant Professor, Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email:bogdan.micu@mnpartners.ro.)

[1] M. Udroiu, Procedură penală partea specială, 4th edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p. 430.

[2] I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Tratat de procedură penală, Partea specială, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018, p. 413.

[3] HCCJ (CD) Dec. No. 101/A/2017, https://www.universuljuridic.ro/conditiile-de-admisibilitate-ale-revizuirii-apel-ncpp/

[4] V. Dongoroz, comment to Decision No. 2793/1943 of the Court of Cassation, IInd Division in "Pandectele române" I.1944, pg.41 – 46, quoted in A. Olteanu, Analiza cazurilor de revizuire, available at http://old.mpublic.ro/jurisprudenta/publicatii/analiza_ cazurilor_de_revizuire.pdf

during the judgment or after the ruling was made, which circumstance influenced the ruling made in the case; d) a member of the Court panel, the prosecutor or the person who carried out acts of criminal prosecution committed a crime in connection with the case which is required to be reviewed, which circumstance influenced the ruling made in the case; e) when two or several final Court decisions cannot be reconciled;f) the decision was grounded on a legal provision which, after the decision became final, was declared as unconstitutional as a result of the admission of a non-constitutionality plea raised in that case, if the consequences of the breach of the constitutional provision keep occurring and can only be remedied through a review of the decision issued".

The review case provided under Art. 453 para. 1 letter e of the Criminal Procedure Code is relevant for this work; for the occurrence of such review case, the doctrine maintained that the fulfillment of certain conditions must be ascertained.

The first condition is the existence of two final criminal decisions, by which the courts could have ruled on the criminal law conflict of substance. The doctrine notes that the review cannot be exerted against a final decision ruling on the merits of the case and against an order to take no further action, because the latter is not a final decision ruling on the merits of the case[5].

More recent practice accepted the occurrence of this review case in the field of the application of the more favorable criminal law on the basis of Art. 6 of the Criminal Code[6], but not also if the irreconcilability affects a final decision which relates to the merits of a case and a ruling made within a second appeal in cassation or in the solving of a matter of law.

The second condition contemplates that the irreconcilable decisions should be the contents of the two final decisions. The doctrine shows that such irreconcilable character is maintained when the two rulings exclude each other and may envisage: the same deed, but different perpetrators, the same perpetrator and different deeds, different fact and circumstances if such are correlative. The plea determined by the hypotheses which envisage the application of the more favorable criminal law is also recognized, where the irreconcilable character may also envisage different factual situations, grounded on the same factual basis[7].

The third condition requires that decisions should not have been challenged concomitantly through the intermediary of other extraordinary means of challenge[8].

The judicial case law maintained that there is such a review case when: due to the data and provisions contained thereby, they exclude each other in the sense that there are different deeds committed in the same day, at the same time, but in different localities, by the same person[9]; in case that, for the deed with regard to which a person was convicted they were subsequently referred to another person for trial purposes[10];

We believe that such review case should be extended with regard to situations in which two decisions issued in different cases, but having the same specific [nature], are solved in a radically different manner. Please note that we are not referring to the hypotheses in which they ascertain that in the judicial practice there are two categories of solutions for the same matters of law which would have claimed the initiation of a second appeal in the interest of the law (Arts. 471 – 474[1] of the Criminal Procedure Code), but to those situations in which two isolated decisions would receive a radically different ruling, which circumstance would impair the principle of juridical security.

For exemplification purposes, we would like to refer to two specific rulings from recent judicial practice.

We are contemplating Criminal Sentence No. 115 of June 23, 2016 issued by the Bucharest Court of Appeal, I[st] Criminal Division, which remained final through Decision No. 266/A/2017 issued by the Criminal Division of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, on one hand, and Criminal Sentence No. 104 issued on June 9, 2016 by the Bucharest Court of Appeal, I[st] Criminal Division, subject to jurisdictional control by Decision No. 362/A/2017 issued by the Criminal Division within the High Court of Cassation and Justice, on the other hand.

The two sentences which ruled on the merits of the cases, issued by the same panel within the Bucharest Court of Appeal, I[st] Criminal Division, as a merits court, received different rulings within the means to challenge the appeal, based on the fact that they were examined by two different panels within the High Court of Cassation and Justice, although the manner in which the merits court proceeded was identical in both [sentences].

Thus, a first common point of the two sentences was the solution chosen by the merits judge to severe the civil side of the case and to leave it unsolved.

In the first decision, which we identify as Criminal Sentence No. 115 of June 23, 2016[11], the merits court, with regard to the civil side of the case, maintained that it has the legal obligation to propose the civil action in the case having as its object the recovery of the prejudice, there is the constitution as a civil party by means of which they intend to restore the situation previous to the perpetration of the deed, appreciating that the solving of the civil action, through the complex

[5] B. Micu, A.G. Păun, R. Slăvoiu, Procedură penală, Curs pentru admiterea în magistratură, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p. 551.
[6] I.P. Chiș, Inconciliabilitate sau încălcarea autorității de lucru judecat?, in Dreptul No. 11/2015, p. 180-187.
[7] M. Udroiu, Op. cit., p. 440.
[8] G. Bodoroncea, in M. Udroiu coord., Codul de procedură penală, Comentariu pe articole, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 1132.
[9] HCCJ, Criminal Division, Decision No. 468/2015, www.scj.ro
[10] HCCJ, Criminal Division, Decision No. 2041/2002, www.scj.ro
[11] Final through HCCJ Decision No. 266/A/2017.

matters of the criminal case,…..their solving would lead to an excess of the reasonable term for solving the criminal case, a reason for which they severed the civil action from the criminal action" (pages 125-126 of HCCJ Decision No. 266/A/2017)

On the strength of the provisions of Art. 25 para. 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code, related to Art. 397 para. 5 of the Criminal Procedure Code, they ordered that the civil side should be left unsolved, and the case was severed from this perspective. (page 129 of HCCJ Decision).

With regard to the sentence invoked, the High Court of Cassation and Justice indicates in Decision No. 266/A/2017 that among the reasons of appeal claimed by defendants and which – in their opinion – would justify the solution of referring to the merits court the case for re-judgment purposes, since the judge from the merits court – they did not motivate the sentence de facto and de jure; – they copied the indictment; - they did not deliberate; - they did not establish the factual situation and the guilt; - they ordered the conviction for the crime of qualified abuse of office without individualizing and analyzing each material act which enters into the composition of the continued form; - they did not establish the quantum of the prejudice, a condition indispensable for the realization of the constitutive elements of the indicated crime; - they did not analyze the defenses filed by all the parties and by the defendants; - they left the civil action unsolved and also severed it, therefore they did not rule on the civil action joined with the criminal action; - they ordered the severance of the civil action, directly through a sentence, an order appreciated as unlawful by the defense because such a solution could only be ordered through a ruling issued under contradictoriality conditions." [sic!]

The appeal court noted in this case that: all the criticism is subsumed to the breach of the right to a fair trial stated also in the jurisprudence of the ECHR, the breach of the double rank of jurisdiction, because the judicial control court does not have the possibility to analyze the reasons for the unlawfulness or for the groundlessness of the sentence, such sentence is virtually inexistent, although it has more than 284 pages, therefore the judgment of the case would only go through the stage of appeal, Art. 13 of the Convention being –thus- breached as well.

The High Court appreciated in Decision No. 266/A/2017 that such criticism, as reasons for appeal, is not grounded.

The court noted that all the indicated criticism was virtually classified by the defense under the hypotheses provided by Art. 421 item 2 letter b of the Criminal Procedure Code; however, none of this criticism is grounded because referring the case to the same court for re-judgment purposes can be ordered, according to the text, only if the judgment of the case at that court of law occurred in the absence of a party which was unduly summoned or which, being duly summoned, found it impossible to appear in court and to announce the court of such impossibility, invoked by that party, when the court did not rule on a deed maintained as the defendant's fault through the notification act or on the civil action, or when there is any of the cases of absolute nullity, except for the case of lack of competence, when the re-judgment by a competent court is ordered, therefore, the three situations are provided in a limitative and express manner as grounds for a solution to cancel the sentence and, in a correlative manner, to refer the case to the merits court for re-judgment purposes.

The statements made by the defense in the sense that the sentence is not motivated, that the merits judge did not deliberate, that the so-called motivation means the copying of the indictment by the merits court, were also appreciated by the High Court as ungrounded for the following reasons:

The content of the sentence is the content provided by Arts. 402-404 of the Criminal Procedure Code, even if the content of the exposition part is not always systematized, however, as Opinion No. 11(2008) issued by the Consultative Council of European Judges to the attention of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe maintained, the court's obligation to motivate its decision should not be understood as requiring a detailed response to each argument invoked to support an invoked defense argument.

The jurisprudence of ECHR indicated that, in order to respond to the requirements of a fair trial, motivation should highlight that the judge truly examined the essential matters which were submitted to him/her (ECHR – Case Helle versus Finland of February 19, 1997, case Perez versus France, Hotvan der Hurk versus The Netherlands of April 19, 1994, case Boldea versus Romania of February 15, 2007). In the spirit of Art. 6 of the Convention, ECHR indicated in numerous decisions that "the motivation of the decisions should not be interpreted as imposing a detailed response to all the arguments made by the parties. Court decisions must be motivated so as to indicated in a sufficient manner the reasons on which they are based" (ECHR, I$^{st}$ Division, Decision [in case] Driemond Bouw versus The Netherlands, February 2, 1999, ECHR, Grand Chamber, Garcia Ruiz versus Spain, 21.01.1999).

In the respective case, the appeal court found that the merits judge maintained that the factual situation established further to the judicial investigation, through the direct production of evidence, is the situation described in the notification act, while the arguments made, even if they are not summarizing, pertain to the manner in which the judge systematized his/her decision, the involvement of each defendant being related to the factual situation and to the indicting texts correlative thereto.

HCCJ Decision No. 266/A/2017 interpreted that, with respect to the civil side of the case, the solution ordered by the merits court is that it ordered the severance of the civil action, for this conclusion being invoked the following de jure arguments:

According to Art. 19, para. 4 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the civil action is settled within the criminal lawsuit, if the reasonable duration of the lawsuit is exceeded thereby.

Art. 26, para. 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that the court may order the severance of the civil action when its ruling determines the excess of the reasonable term for solving the criminal action. Solving of a civil action remains under the competence of the criminal court, para. 2 of the text providing that the severance is imposed by the court, ex officio, or at the demand of the prosecutor or of the parties, para. 5 of Art. 26 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that the decision for the severance of the civil action is final.

Invoking the Case Tonchev versus Bulgaria of November 19, 2009 ECHR, the appeal court reiterated the states' obligation which, in case the internal legislation provides the right of the injured party to claim damages through the exercise of the civil action in the criminal lawsuit, this request should be settled even if the criminal lawsuit ceased through the intervention of the time-bar of the criminal liability, and it should not remain unsolved so that the court should not be obligated thereby to initiate a new judicial procedure with the civil court.

Interpreting the invoked procedural provisions, HCCJ Decision No. 266/A/2017 indicates that it results that the severance solution ordered by the merits court by its sentence is not only lawful, but it is also correctly justified in terms of the fulfillment of the conditions provided under the law, there being a perspective that the solving of the civil claims should cause a delayed solving of the civil action.

The examination of the wording of Art. 26, para. 5 of the Criminal Procedure Code, which refers to "order", does not lead to the conclusion that the court cannot order the severance of the civil action by a sentence, but it is only provided that "the severance of the civil action" can be made at any time during the judgment, even at the terms prior to debates, the lawmaker establishing, however, expressly that the order is final, this being also a concern of the lawmaker to not postpone the judgment of the criminal case through the filing of an appeal/a separate challenge against the severance order.

In the criminal case, solved on the merits through Criminal Sentence No. 115 of June 23, 2016, none of the defendants involved in the criminal activity was acquitted, so that the insertion in the wording of the decision of the wording of Art. 25 para. 5 of the Criminal Procedure Code is a mere material error, which is also proven also by the fact that the civil side of this case, being severed, is pending for judicial investigation with the competent merits court …. in which case the mentioning in the order of the maintaining of precautionary measures was made in order to avoid the concealment, destruction, disposal or absconding from prosecution of the assets which may be subject, inter alia, to the recovery of damages.

In reference to the defendants' criticism in connection with the erroneous option of the severance of the civil side, the High Court, taking into account the charges of abuse of office had as an immediate result a material impairment, the causing of a prejudice, and according to the expert appraisal report prepared in the case the value exceeded the limit provided under Art. 146 of the 1969 Criminal Code or by that provided by Art. 183 of the 2009 Criminal Code, which represents particularly severe consequences ….

Consequently, the appeal court rejected as ungrounded the appeals submitted by the defendants and ordered their conviction by HCCJ Decision No. 266/A/2017.

Another appeal panel within the High Court of Cassation and Justice proceeded in a different manner, its statements being radically different from those invoked at a previous time.

We are considering Criminal Sentence No. 104 of June 9, 2016 of the Bucharest Court of Appeal, I$^{st}$ Criminal Division (the same panel)[12] which indicates, inter alia, that: "On the basis of Art. 25 item 5, para. 1 letter f) of the Criminal Procedure Code the civil action of the criminal lawsuit was left unsolved, and on the basis of Art. 26 of the Criminal Procedure Code the civil action was severed on the basis of Art. 26 item 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code…"

In terms of the civil side of the case, the first court, on the basis of the provisions of Art. 26 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the severance of the civil action, without motivating the order and without raising it for the discussion of the parties.

The defendants were convicted for the perpetration of the crime of fraud ….in case of which: "the establishment of the damage caused by the actions of the perpetrators …is decisive for the existence of this fraud."

All the more, in case of the crime of fraud with particularly severe consequences and without the exact establishment of the quantum of the damage incumbent on each defendant, no solution regarding the criminal side of the case can be ordered.

Or, the merits court, without raising the matter for the discussion of the parties, severed the civil action, which was to be solved within a criminal file.

Such a procedure triggers the impossibility of the appeal court to rule on the criminal side of the case, since it cannot establish whether any damages were caused through the misleading actions. Also, the applicability of the provisions referring to the particularly severe consequences cannot be verified, as long as it is not known whether the damage is in excess of Lei 200,000. Therefore, the criminal action is indissolubly linked to the civil action and it cannot be solved separately.

[12] Verified within the appeal through HCCJ Decision No. 362/A/2017.

Also differently from the first hypothesis presented, HCCJ Decision No. 362/A/2017 also indicates the fact that the motivation of the solution issued by the court of law constitutes a duty which removes any discretionary aspect in the service of justice, giving the lawsuit parties a possibility to form their opinion with regard to the lawful and grounded nature of the solution adopted, while providing to the appeal courts the elements required for the exercise of the judicial control.

The right to a fair trial guaranteed by Art. 6 paragraph 1 of the Convention means, inter alia, the lawsuit parties' right to submit the observations they deem to be relevant for their case.

This right can only be considered effective if such observations are thoroughly analyzed by the notified court.

Art. 6 of the Convention entails as the court's duty the obligation to make an effective analysis of the parties' evidentiary means, arguments and proposals.

In addition, the notion of fair trial presupposes that a court which motivated its decision only briefly, by taking over the motivation made by the lower court or otherwise, should have actually analyzed the essential matters which were submitted to its judgment and should not have been satisfied by approving the conclusions made by a lower court, as the European Court stated in its jurisprudence.

With regard to the material acts of the stated crimes, it is found within the appeal that there is no description of such crimes, no mention of the perpetration date and circumstances, the evidence which proved the perpetration of each crime, being included only general references to all the defendants.

Thus, the appeal court cannot substantiate the adoption of any decision on the merits of the case, being unable to censor the defendants' criticism from this point of view.

On the other hand, it is remarked that the decision issued by the merits court is in fact a reproduction of the indictment and represents in fact a copy of the notification document, which is obviously and incontestably revealed by a comparison between the two procedural documents (the indictment and the sentence of the Bucharest Court of Appeal).

Thus, the conviction decision (pages 12-257) maintains the factual situation maintained in the indictment, and the court notification document was entirely copied (pages 16-296), being added the mention that the factual situation established by the prosecutor's office and evidenced is entirely maintained by the court and meets as of right the constitutive elements of the crimes for which the defendants were referred to judgment.

Such a formal mention does not constitute a motivation of the decision in the sense of the provisions of Art. 403 para. 1 letter c of the Criminal Procedure Code and Art. 6 paragraph 1 of the Convention, which entail an analysis of the evidence that served as grounds for the solving of the criminal side of the case, as well as for those which were removed, as required by the legal provisions.

Also, the description of the deeds perpetrated by defendants, the form and degree of their guilt are entirely copied from the indictment, the first court limiting itself virtually to confirming the notification document.

It is true that Art. 421 item 2 letter b) of the Criminal Procedure Code does not provide the cancellation of the sentence issued by the first court and the re-judgment [of the case] because the decision does not include the reasons on which the solution is based.

However, in the case Dumitru Popescu versus Romania (No. 2) – paragraphs 103, 104, the European Court of Human Rights consecrated that the status granted to the Convention in the internal law allows national courts to remove ex officio or at the parties' request – the provisions of the internal law that they consider as incompatible with the Convention and its additional protocols. This issue entails the national judge's obligation to ensure a full effect of its norms (the Convention) ensuring their preeminence versus any other contrary provision of the national legislation.

Therefore, Art. 6 paragraph 1 of the Convention is directly applicable in the case; this article imposes as the duty of the court examining the case in all of its de facto and de jure issues, the obligation to make an actual analysis of the evidentiary means, arguments and proposals invoked by the parties, which obviously the first court failed to do since it strictly reproduced the indictment.

Out of the presented reasons, HCCJ Decision No. 362/A/2017 maintains that re-judgment is required, and both the criminal side and the civil side of the case are to be solved jointly – the basis being Art. 421 item 1 letter b the Criminal Procedure Code, related to Art. 6 of ECHR.

Conclusion

Here are, therefore, two rulings made in the judicial case law which have obvious elements of contradiction and which severely shake the trust in the system of criminal justice through the very fact that they were made by three judges who were all functioning within the Criminal Division of the High Court of Cassation and Justice. Through an extension of the review case, they might reconcile such rulings which are based on the same factual situation and yet exclude each other.

References

- B. Micu, AG Paun, R. Slăvoiu, Criminal Procedure, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017.

- I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Treaty of Criminal Procedure, Special Part, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018.
- A. Olteanu, Analiza cazurilor de revizuire, available at http://old.mpublic.ro/jurisprudenta/publicatii/analiza_cazurilor_de_revizuire.pdf
- M. Udroiu, Criminal Procedure, Special Part, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017.
- M. Udroiu coord., Codul de Procedură Penală, Comentariu pe articole, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015

CONSIDERATIONS ON RE-SOCIALISATION, SOCIAL REINSERTION AND RECOVERY THROUGH EDUCATION

Constantin Marc NEAGU[*]

Abstract

This paper mainly aims at pointing to the criteria that make a detainee be eligible for re-socialisation. In addition to this, we distinguish between negative re-socialization, when the expected result is not obtained, and positive re-socialization, when the ultimate goal is successfully accomplished. Moreover the definition of re-socialization is provided to better understand this concept.

Keywords: re-socialization, reinsertion, recovery, positive, negative.

After 2000, scientific research in the field of the criminal law on the execution of penalties has taken off and the specialized literature in Romania has analyzed the main features of the prison population and the criminality nationwide, attempting to attune to the standards set by the Recommendations of the Council of Europe concerning the imprisonment norms, the alternative measures to detention, as well as the re-socialization means provided by criminal law.

Under current circumstances, re-socialization is expected to be highly integrative, as it involves not only official bodies such as the police and the prosecutor's office, but also institutions that contribute to the convicts' training, education, health, from the time when the final penalty is established until all forms of imprisonment and post criminal conditions are complied with, so that the individual could reintegrate in one's family, as well as society.

No matter how wide the cultural horizon of the individual is, how he is able to relate to the moral values of the society he lives in, in how many ways he divides his daily concerns, or no matter the way he fits into the community which has its own laws of organization and functioning, yet he is inexorably subject to his time, the age in which he lives, the laws that he has already found in the society he is willy-nilly a part of, as he belongs to a certain social class, an ethnic group, a gender group, a religion, he has a certain political position, a specific amount of wealth, as well as health. Consequently, we can say that the individual lives as a social being, contained in the tumult of the society to which he belongs, but we note that he is strongly determined and influenced by the micro-society (family, entourage, job, friends), as his concerns are close to or influenced by the micro-climate specific to any of these. If the elements of the micro-society the individual lives in are characterized by guidelines towards achieving life goals by observing the law, it is almost certain that he will feel such an influence. If the micro-society he lives in is downgraded, pauper, it is a broken home without moral values, or even if the members of his micro-society lead a carefree life due to their owning plenty material resources and they encourage a libertine lifestyle bordering crime, then the individual will copy the same behavioural traits.

Re-socialization is the process of reintegrating a person who committed an offense punishable in some form by the criminal law, within the social system that he left, as he has improved his values according to the requirements of morality, basic principles and laws. Reintegration may be particularly difficult if the individual who has served his prison sentence and has returned to society is forced to live by the old 'arrangements', in the same family or community environment where crimes are still committed. In this case, the proper reintegration begins by leaving that environment and trying to 'restart life', which sometimes means overcoming big material and social obstacles.

Reintegration can be negative and this is relatively easy if the individual resumes old ties and habits, as, one could assume that, while serving his prison term, he has become a 'professional criminal'. Under these circumstances, the respective person is very likely to commit similar or even more serious crimes and consequently to reappear in court. On the other hand, social reintegration can be close to success when old habits are willingly abandoned in order to happily resume normal family life, to obtain a steady income, to achieve emotional stability within a cultural, educational, religious or sports environment, by pursuing a hobby that could help the individual give up crime and the pleasure of committing it.

Re-socialization is defined as a set of measures for the social reintegration of marginal social groups, offenders or certain categories of people with disabilities[1]. Unfortunately, re-socialization can be negatively oriented, which could be corrected by means of the methods, programs and psychotherapy carried out in penitentiary institutions, psychiatric hospitals or programs for people with certain disabilities. Of course, in this paper, we are interested in the social reintegration of the individual in the Romanian social system, by changing the deviant behaviour, relearning moral and legal rules of conduct, respecting the rights of others and the way of living in a democratic society.

[*] Assistant, PhD candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: office@univnt.ro).

[1] According to DEX (Romanian Explanatory Dictionary).

The re-socialization of criminals unfolds along the entire prison term they serve[2], by means of an integrative concept on education, necessary medical treatment, information on the correct system of rules and behaviour, entertainment, as well as work. To be able to debate the re-socialization of the offender, the following aspects should exist:

1. a convicted person serving a prison term or undergoing an educational measure;
2. the stated purpose of the individualized educational intervention[3];
3. voluntary cooperation[4] when designing the individualized programs in order to prevent recidivism;
4. scientific methods for education, rehabilitation and treatment;
5. education is addressed to those who have suffered from negative socialization, whose bad habits are contrary to the generally accepted norm;
6. rehabilitation should be directed towards those who cannot comply in various ways with the system of rules and laws;
7. treatment entails proper therapeutic methods (surgical, medical and educational, psychotherapeutic, psychoanalytical) to reshape the personality, improving negative and criminal attitudes, changing negative motivation into positive one.

The New Romanian Criminal Code introduces the phrase 'the reintegration of minors' to refer to the ultimate aim of the custodial or non-custodial educational measures to be implemented. One considers that socialization measures[5] are appropriate in this case because they could help juvenile offenders become aware of their actions, future conduct and obligations as citizens, as the sanctions that apply are not punishments as such, but they are, as a matter of fact, custodial and non-custodial educational measures. It is one of the major reasons which have made us reconsider the re-socialization and reintegration activities for adults, especially that most of them can understand the consequences of their deeds and what they need to do if they want to change their conduct.

It might be needless to mention that one of the major problems of the reintegration of offenders is the poverty in which they have lived, are living and they are to live after they are released from detention. No matter how many educational, training or any other programs that could exert some positive influence these people are exposed to, unfortunately, poverty indefinitely marks the fate of children, young people and adults who have had to face scarcity on a daily basis all their lives.

In 2018, an Action Plan to reduce poverty and improve the inclusion of people in poverty or at risk of poverty in urban areas across the EU was drawn up[6]. Based on extensive discussion, four main insurmountable issues have been identified (child poverty; regeneration of urban deprived areas and neighbourhoods; homelessness; vulnerability of Roma people), which created the framework for the consideration of the need for access to quality services and welfare, as well as the continuous necessity to measure, monitor, and evaluate urban poverty. In Romania urban poverty has been detected spatially and socially, characteristic of all people regardless of where they live.

Consequently, an analysis regarding the reintegration of persons executing criminal sanctions (minors, young people, adults, elderly persons) should have been performed in order to take concrete measures on some practical issues which all European detention facilities, Romanian included, face daily:

a) There are difficulties in organizing the proposed activities due to the fact that the prisoner population is heterogeneous from many points of view: education, training, property, opinions and prejudices deeply rooted in their conscience. This population is already organized based on their legal situation (length of the sentence, dangerousness, risk of relapsing, criminal experience), not on their educational needs;

---

[2] Recommendation REC(2006)2 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the European prison rules (adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 11 January 2006 at the 952nd meeting of the Ministers' Deputies), Principle 6: 'All detention shall be managed so as to facilitate the reintegration into free society of persons who have been deprived of their liberty.'

[3] REC 2006/2 Implementation of the regime for sentenced prisoners, art. 103: 1. 'The regime for sentenced prisoners shall commence as soon as someone has been admitted to prison with the status of a sentenced prisoner, unless it has commenced before. 2 As soon as possible after such admission, reports shall be drawn up for sentenced prisoners about their personal situations, the proposed sentence plans for each of them and the strategy for preparation for their release. 3 Sentenced prisoners shall be encouraged to participate in drawing up their individual sentence plans. 4 Such plans shall as far as is practicable include: a. work; b. education; c. other activities; and d. preparation for release. 5. Social work, medical and psychological care may also be included in the regimes for sentenced prisoners. 6 There shall be a system of prison leave as an integral part of the overall regime for sentenced prisoners. 7 Prisoners who consent to do so may be involved in a programme of restorative justice and in making reparation for their offences.'

[4] In the New Romanian Criminal Code art. 64 (1), art.91 (1) (c), art.117 (1), 119 ( 1), art.120, art.121, all these activities are regulated only if the criminal's consent exists or if he is willing to do that activity.

[5] According to art. 135, Law no. 254 /2013 '(1) When implementing custodial educational measures, the aim is to reintegrate the interned person back to society as well as to raise their awareness, so that they would assume responsibility for their actions and avoid committing new offences. (2) Custodial educational measures are applied in such a way so as not to restrict exercising a person's right to privacy more than it is inherent to these measures.'

[6] EU URBAN POVERTY PARTENERSHIP – Final action plan 2018, HOMELESSNESS Conference, Budapest, 21.09.2018 (https://ec.europa.eu/futurium/en/urban-poverty/final-action-plan-urban-poverty-partnership-available)

b) The mental state of the person who committed the offense (direct intent; basic intent – foreseeing or not foreseeing the outcome of their actions; oblique intent) is important when classifying their offense. It is difficult to give a complete account of the mental state behind a crime because of its complexity, especially if it comes to planning and justifying personal actions or inactions, as each offender has his own representation on the causes of his crime. The guilt is placed most often than not beyond his conscience, his ability to take decisions and perform actions, placing the blame on the others (environment, family, friends, strangers that happened to be at the scene of the crime) or on adverse circumstances (drunkenness, under the effect of drugs etc.). Based on various studies conducted so far, most criminals, who have just started their prison term, consider themselves innocent or not so guilty in contrast to the severity of the penalty administered to them, as well as less guilty as compared to offenders who have committed similar crimes. Only after serving a relatively large part of their prison term they take responsibility for their actions, their violation of the law or the harm done to their victim, which causes their sorrow and desire for reformation.

c) There is large discrepancy between the needs of re-socialization and the prison term set for the execution of penalties. The penalties – prison terms or educational measures – are individualized according to general criteria (seriousness of the offense, the dangerousness of the offender) [7]. Each offender has his own re-socialization needs, and behavioural flaws acquired during childhood (when behaviour becomes part of an individual's personality), youth (when training and education are strongly influenced by the living environment) or adulthood, when asocial or antisocial habits already mark an individual's conduct, cannot be fought against during the relatively short period of time of the penalty, especially since criminogenic factors are overwhelming;

d) So far, detention facilities have not been specialized in providing education for adults, youth, minors, since, as a matter of fact, all re-socialization activities represent an accessory to the detention specific activities, such as security, surveillance, escorting, which vary according to the regime of the respective facility (maximum security, closed system, half-open and open). For example, in Romania, only 10% of prison staff is involved in organizing and carrying out re-socialization activities, whereas 80% deals with operational activities and 10% with logistics, material resources and finance. 'Alexandru Ioan Cuza' Police Academy in Bucharest is the Romanian higher education institution that prepares the personnel (officers in particular) that will work in the Romanian prison system, and their university curriculum comprises few subjects related to re-socialization, the majority being focused on police science, administrative law or criminal law. Moreover, only few of the prison staff hired from external sources have attended a course on criminal law on the execution of penalties.

e) Putting offenders off cultural and educational concerns, creating and promoting television programs highly appreciated by the general public has resulted in a large group of citizens who find it pleasurable to watch unhealthy humour shows, films with explicit sexual content, music and concerts that encourage libertinism and challenge authority, or programs in which the role models are the people who have loose morals or the people that have become rich by breaking the law or people that have taken advantage of 'the legislative loopholes' and have committed white collar crimes. Unfortunately, even some of those who should be role models for the Romanian people, high officials from various state levels, offend trying to escape criminal charges by various methods to delay their accountability.

f) 'White collar' criminals are highly trained, educated, have wide material resources and can easily reintegrate into the society of origin. It is because of them that the personal efforts of some common criminals, who might have been eager to change their moral values, have disintegrated or vanished into thin air. Therefore common criminals got discouraged when they realized that people holding high public offices were almost never held accountable for the great 'robberies' that occurred in Romania's economy and patrimony. Moreover, they think that what they need to do is continue being offenders and not change themselves into honest people, but change their criminal methods and partners in order to achieve their goals. This way, committing offenses becomes a habit, a way of living, an acceptable way to transform their material desires into reality. Dissolute standards of morality condone illegal conduct and there have been individuals, who have risked being sentenced to several years in prison and serving the respective term, if, by various means, they could keep some of the possessions obtained from illegal acts they committed.

g) The aetiology of the crimes committed by educated, well-informed people who either hold important political positions or assets can be explained by their struggle, which at first is honest, to achieve a lawful purpose perhaps pursued for years, using their own personal resources or those of the institution they work in, and, when the aim is achieved, accomplished, they need a new target, a higher social standing, more wealth, more recognition on the national or international social scale. Then, naturally comes the use of illegal means, connections and partnerships with the underworld, such as drug dealers, human traffickers, arms dealers, and, consequently, the whole structure will shortly collapse like a house of cards. The re-socialization process for this kind of individuals should begin with a psychological examination to identify what determined them to paranoidly seek ways to gain power, and then, blinded by power, to accept and embrace corrupt moral and social values.

[7] According to art. 74, the New Romanian Criminal Code: '(1) Establishing the length or amount of a penalty shall be made on the basis of the seriousness of the offense and the threat posed by the convict, all of which shall be assessed based on the following criteria: a) the circumstances and manner of commission of the offense, as well as the means that were used; b) the threat to the protected social value; c) the nature and seriousness of the outcome produced by the offense or other consequences of the offense; d) the reason for committing the offense and intended goal; e) the nature and frequency of offenses in the convict's criminal history; f) the convict's conduct after committing the offense and during the trial; g) the convict's level of education, age, health, family and social situation. (2) When the law stipulates alternative penalties for the offense, the criteria stipulated in par. (1) shall be a factor in selecting one of those alternatives.'

h) It is impossible to achieve re-socialization with a certain type of criminals, that is with people who are mentally ill, having polymorphic psychopathies, serious degenerative diseases, psychotic and paranoid individuals with serious behavioural disturbances, who may commit offences when left unattended by their rightful guardians. These individuals, although they are criminally liable, as well as others[8], who are mentally ill, suffer from dissociative identity disorder, so that their behaviour differs from one day to the other, and even one situation to another. They may seem normal people until a trigger is pulled which unleashes behaviour that can cause aberrant acts characterized by extreme gravity[9].

i) According to the statistical data of the Romanian Prison Service, at the beginning of 2018, 1938 persons were under pre-trial arrest, 8908 convicted persons were sent to half open prisons, 3430 convicted persons were sent to open prisons, 6341 convicted persons were sent to closed prisons, 1539 convicted persons were sent to maximum security prisons, 288 convicted persons were sent to an educational facility, 119 convicted persons were sent to a detention centre. Basically in the last five years, the trend has gone downward: 2013 – 33434 convicts; 2014 – 30156 convicts; 2015 – 28334 convicts; 2016 – 27455 convicts; 2017 – 23450 convicts). Habitual offenders represent the following percentages out of the total prison population per year in Romania: 45.78% - 2013; 43% - 2014; 40.33% - 2015; 38.27% - 2016; 38.37% - 2017. It seems that the percentage of habitual offenders is in decline, however, that the absolute value is constant, around 40% of the total prison population[10].

Since habitual offenders have 'benefited' from the numerous programs provided by the detention facilities where they served their sentence terms and since most of them have been released on parole, two research hypotheses could be inferred:

a) the first hypothesis assumes that offenders have complied with the requirements of the programs, nevertheless they have failed to change their values and mentalities;

b) the second hypothesis assumes that it is impossible for former offenders to reintegrate into society, because this society is not prepared to receive them and give them a 'second chance', or that former offenders lack training and education related skills, which makes it difficult for them to exploit the advantages of living in a free society, of engaging in legally lucrative activities which could yield enough income to allow them to live by observing not only the law, but also other people's life, rights and property.

Conclusions

As far as the process of social rehabilitation, social reinsertion and educational recovery is concerned, we could say that its outcome is not always positive, that most of the times the path towards reaching the set goal is so steep that the convict has to get rid of the old habits in order to be welcomed by the society, he has to acknowledge a pro social behaviour and commit to psychological counselling programs in order to overcome temptations and obstacles that may interfere with his desire to assimilate as much as possible so that he could return to the right path.

References

- DEX (Romanian Explanatory Dictionary)
- Recommendation REC(2006)2 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the European prison rules
- The Romanian Criminal Code
- Law no. 254/2013

[8] The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) by the American Psychiatric Association and the Classification of Mental and Behavioral Disorders (ICD) by World Health Organization point to 76 disorders and symptoms or clinically recognizable set of symptoms and behavior (https://Lista de_tulburări_psihic Legături_externe, accesat în 17.10.2018 (n.a.).

[9] Ioan Chiș, Alexandru Bogdan Chiș, Executarea sancțiunilor penale (Executing criminal penalties), Editura Universul Juridic, București, 2015, p. 545.

[10] The 2017 Romanian Prison Service Report, p. 14.

- EU URBAN POVERTY PARTENERSHIP – Final action plan 2018, HOMELESSNESS Conference, Budapest, 21.09.2018
- The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) by the American Psychiatric Association
- Ioan Chiș, Alexandru Bogdan Chiș, Executarea sancțiunilor penale (Executing Penalties), Editura Universul Juridic, București, 2015
- The 2017 Romanian Prison Service Report

THE CONCEPT OF SOCIAL REINTEGRATION IN ROMANIA AFTER 1989

Constantin Marc NEAGU[*]

Abstract

This paper attempts at pointing to the way in which social reintegration has evolved in Romania, starting with the communist era and ending with present time. First, we briefly outline the organisation of social reintegration under the communist regime and then we present how this concept has been approached in the last thirty years, under the new political circumstances, stemming from the recommendations of the Committee of Ministers of Council of Europe to Member States. Our conclusions focus on the role of education, which is fundamental in accomplishing successful social reintegration.

Keywords: communist era; education; local community; credits; activities

1. Educational solutions provided by the Recommendation No. R (89) 12 of the Committee of Ministers of Council of Europe to Member States[1] on Education in Prison.

It is worth mentioning this European recommendation because, since 1989, Romania has made special efforts to attune its legislation to European Union law. As for the law on the execution of penalties, after 1989, Romania first embraced the principles dictated by the rule of law.

The provisions of this new Recommendation were slowly accepted, as the mentality of the prison staff, who were trained to see the people behind bars as the enemies of the Romanian people, people that should be excluded from society, gradually changed. Moreover, the rebellions that broke out in prisons due to the change of the political regime between 1989 - 1991, which resulted into collective protests, revolts, arsons, taking hostages, as well as death threats, created a barrier that was difficult to pass in order to ensure normal relations and cooperation between the prison staff and the detainees when starting acceptable projects. The switch to the market economy system, the massive unemployment, the collapse of the economic areas which used sentenced persons as their workforce, lack of self-financing income represented serious obstacles for the organization of educational and lucrative activities in Romanian detention facilities. For almost a decade (1989-1997), activities for the reorganization of the Romanian prison system were carried out: the Romanian Prison Service became part of the Ministry of Justice, destroyed prison buildings were repaired, new staff was recruited to replace the employees made redundant, existing norms were amended by orders given by the Minister of Justice, rebellions and protests that frequently broke out were thwarted[2].

The particular context, in which this Recommendation had to be applied, transformed its provisions into milestones for educational activities organised in Romanian prisons, as they were used to develop annual programs by the Romanian Prison Service. Mainly, the Recommendation comprised valuable ideas put forth by the working group who had seven meetings between 1984-1988. The European governments were recommended to implement policies such as:

a) all detainees shall have access to basic education, training, cultural activities;
b) education for prisoners should be like the education provided for similar age-groups in the outside world;
c) education in prison shall aim to develop the whole person bearing in mind his or her social, economic and cultural context;
d) all those involved in the administration of the prison system and the management of prisons should facilitate and support education as much as possible;
e) education should have no less a status than work within the prison regime and prisoners should not lose out financially or otherwise by taking part in education;
f) every effort should be made to encourage the prisoner to participate actively in all aspects of education;
g) development programmes should be provided to ensure that prison educators adopt appropriate adult education methods;
h) vocational education should aim at the wider development of the individual, as well as being sensitive to trends in the labour-market;
i) prisoners should have direct access to a well-stocked library;
j) physical education and sports for prisoners should be emphasised and encouraged;

[*] Assistant Lecturer, PhD candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: office@univnt.ro).
[1] Adopted on the 13th of October, 1989 during the 429th reunion of Deputy Ministers.
[2] Ioan Chiș, Istoria penitenciarelor – ieri și azi (The History of Prisons – Past and Present), Editura A.N.I., București, 2003, pp. 103-127.

k) social education should include practical elements that enable the prisoner to manage daily life within the prison, with a view to facilitating his return to society;
l) wherever possible, prisoners should be allowed to participate in education outside prison;
m) where education has to take place within the prison, the outside community should be involved as fully as possible;
n) the funds, equipment and teaching staff needed to enable prisoners to receive appropriate education should be made available.

As we are to explain, these principled recommendations were included in the acts that were subsequently passed by the Romanian Parliament, in the orders of the Romanian Minister of Justice, as well as in the decisions of the Head Officer of the Romanian Prison Service, so that the core activities set for educating prisoners started[3].

For a period of at least five years, the educational activity was marked by the real and continuous latent conflict that existed between the prison staff, marked by the prisoners' excesses in the period immediately following the 1989 Romanian Revolution, when dramatic events took place (rebellions, protests, escapes, suicides, serious crimes against prisoners or staff, etc.). During this time, the security reasons made the re-socialization activity be severely hampered, as the time, the programmes, the staff were directed towards ensuring security and surveillance. Moreover, among prison officers there was only one educator and for the entire prison system there was only one psychologist. In the first decade after 1989, getting prison staff to become involved in the re-socialization process was limited and timid. The prejudiced mind was keeping the prison staff back, considering that prisoners have more rights than they did, as the detention conditions had been humanized due to the fact that prisoners' rights were re-evaluated and enhanced.

Nevertheless, Recommendation R (89) 12 had a positive impact and led to the adoption of new rules which granted prisoners a wider range of rights (including for the juvenile offenders who were convicted), to the drafting of the bill on execution of penalties and the measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal trial.

2. Changes in the rules on the execution of penalties referring to the re-socialization activity, after 1989

Since Law no. 23/1969 came into force, several periods of time passed that marked the re-socialization activity. Applying this law referring to the execution of penalties did almost nothing for re-socialization, unless we consider that the fear for serving the prison term or for the admission to juvenile rehabilitation centres meant a sufficient incentive for some offenders to try not to break the criminal law.

It had been over 49 years since the concept of reintegration was last discussed scientifically and applied to the needs of our country[4]. In 2004, 15 years after the events that led to changes to the rule of law, the first bill on the execution of penalties and the measures ordered by the court during the criminal trial[5] was drafted. Although it seemed that the humanitarian provisions of the law will influence the re-socialization activity, they were not applicable, not only because the context was unfavourable, but also because the provisions were intricate and inconsistent with the existing administrative infrastructure. It seems inconceivable, but this law has never been applied. Although it has never been applied, as a theoretical exercise, we can show that this law included both the execution of non custodial sentences, community service, converting a fine as community service, postponing the execution of the penalty and the execution of custodial sentences. Reintroducing, in art. 25 of this law, the penalties abandoned when the 1968 Penal Code entered into force (i.e. how to serve the prison terms; strict imprisonment; severe imprisonment and life imprisonment) meant going back in time for the Romanian prison system. The new penalties and the four execution regimes made it impossible for the prison facilities existing at that time to legally separate and classify prisoners.

Nevertheless, legislative developments were positive. Law no. 294/2004 was the first legal document which set specific rights for convicted persons, their rights as citizens and how to exercise them. Besides labour regulations for convicted persons, modern methods of re-socialization were provided[6].

Chronologically, two years later, the concept of re-socialisation gained momentum when Law no. 275/2006[7] was passed. In this law, under Chapter VI new regulations were introduced on the educational, cultural, therapeutic, psychological counselling and social assistance activities, as well as educational and [3] The programmes were developed to satisfy the right to education: the right to read and write, ask and reflect, imagine and create, write and read about the living environment, have access to educational materials, develop personal skills.

[4] Attempts to depopulate Romanian prisons between 1976-1977 by means of amnesty and pardon decrees, as well as by means the 1988 acts of clemency were no more than populist measures meant to eulogize Nicolae Ceaușescu's policies, and the return to prisons by increased relapse proved more dangerous (author's footnote )

[5] Law no. 294/ 28.06.2004 on the execution of penalties and the measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial, Official Gazette of Romania no. 591/1.07.2004.

[6] According to art. 75 para. (1), Law no. 294/2004: 'Socio-educational activities, psychological treatment and counselling, providing advice and assistance to get a job or pursue a professional activity after prison release are organised in every prison facility and aimed at the social reinsertion of convicted persons who execute custodial sentences.'

[7] Law no. 275/2006 on the execution of penalties and the measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial.

vocational training for persons serving prison terms. For the first time, the old concept of 'prisoner re-education' was done away with and replaced with new phrases: 'social reintegration of the persons serving prison terms' and 'the recovery of minor offenders.'

By means of the Enforcement Regulation for Law 275/2006[8], the purpose of executing the penalties was introduced explicitly, namely 'assisting inmates in their social reintegration and prevention of committing new crimes.' Consequently, at that point, it was also the first time when a nationally strategic document on how the Romanian Prison Service[9] could be developed so that prisoners would become interested in re-socialization, and human and material resources from institutions charged with accomplishing social tasks would start being purposefully used.

On July 19, 2013 Law no. 254/2013[10] came into force, for the first time ever in Romania being established procedures for re-socialization attuned to the categories of persons convicted and the regime that applied to them. Each prisoner gets a personalized re-socialization program for the entire prison term, with progressive transition from one regime to another. Thus, for more severe regimes, the re-socialization activities take place in a controlled manner, inside the prison facilities, whereas in less severe regimes, inmates can voluntarily take on more responsibilities, they can assess their situation and informedly decide whether they are willing or not to participate in one program or another[11]. As we mentioned before, the concept of re-socialization is closely linked to the prison regime (including security measures, security, surveillance, escort) and re-socialization is possible only if these measures are effective.

On the contrary, we believe that, by means of the re-socialization activity, the atmosphere in the prison facility is characterized by a higher degree of normality, the individual risk of the person executing the penalty is related to other criteria, not to the prison regime. This represents a weakness of the law on the execution of penalties, because prison regimes should have been developed primarily in relation to the need for re-socialization and secondly in relation to the need for security.

The principle according to which educational activities should not hinder operational activities should be abandoned, especially because, in the 21st century, technology is sufficiently advanced to ensure thorough, safe and immediate surveillance, so it is possible that a prison facility specialized in maximum security would be characterized by the same order and discipline as a low security one.

We would also like to point out to the progress made as far as the re-socialization measures for young people[12] are concerned. We should not forget that Law no. 252/2013, Law no. 253/2013, Law no. 254/2013 represent a legal package that regulates the execution of penalties, the probation, the execution of non-custodial sentences, as well as the execution of custodial sentences, which are closely interrelated with the enforcement of the provisions included in the New Romanian Criminal Code and the New Romanian Criminal Procedure Code[13]. New criminal and criminal procedure regulations, as well as new regulations on the execution of penalties came into force and, consequently, in a relatively short period of time, in Romania, the number of adult prisoners has decreased from 33,000 to 23,000 at present, and the number of minors in re-education centres from 5,000 to 500, which proves the effectiveness of these measures and the positive impact of re-socialisation.

Due to the entry into force of the new criminal codes and the law on the execution of penalties, new necessities popped up. Thus, to attune to their content, it was absolutely necessary to draw up rules on the main activities, tasks, measures, work instructions, equipment, as well as the use of financial, human, material resources and common organization. Unfortunately, it did not happen very quickly as it took three years to develop the Enforcement Regulation for Law no. 254/2013[14]. Other laws, government decisions, orders of the Minister of Justice, decisions of the Romanian Prison Service's Head Officer, containing subsequent, secondary or tertiary rules, are still being developed today, along with the modification of the [8] Romanian Government Ordinance no.1897/2006 on the approval of the Enforcement Regulation for Law no. 275/2006 on the execution of penalties and the measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial.

[9] The Strategy on the Development of Romanian Prison System 2007-2010, (accessed on 08.10.2018 http://www.snlp.ro/strategia-2007-2010-administratia-nationala-a-penitenciarelor.pdf).

10 Law no. 254/19.07.2013 on the execution of penalties and the custodial measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial, Official Gazette of Romania no. 514/14.08.2013.

[11] According to art. 41, Law no. 254/2013, '(1) The individualization of the prison regime for the execution of custodial sentences is determined by the commission provided under art. 32, depending on the length of the sentence, behaviour, personality, risk level, age, state of health, identified needs and possibilities for social reinsertion of the convicted person. (2) Taking into account the criteria in para. (1) The convicted person takes part in educational, cultural, therapeutic, counselling, moral and religious activities, as well vocational training. (3) The activities under para. (2) are organised by staff belonging to education and psychosocial services in prisons, with the participation, where appropriate, of probation officers, volunteers, associations and foundations, and other representatives of the civil society.'

[12] According to art. 42, Law no. 254/2013, 'along their prison term, young prisoners attend special educational programmes, which address their psychological and social assistance needs, depending on their age and personality. Under this law, young people are convicted persons under the age of 21.'

[13] Law no. 286 /2009 on the Criminal Code; Law no. 135/2010 on the Criminal Procedure Code.

[14] The Enforcement Regulation for Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of penalties and the custodial measures taken by judicial bodies during the criminal trial, 10.03.2016.

codes and the law on the execution of penalties, as required by the practical situations that arise[15].

The permanent concern with drafting, promulgating and then amending the rules governing the deprivation of liberty in criminal proceedings and the execution of penalties, by means of new administrative rules, shows the need for this field to keep pace with the development of the Romanian society as a whole, with the implementation of new technologies and the protection of networks and computer data communication in the places of detention, to comply with the recommendations of the Council of Europe and to correct certain aspects pointed out by the ECHR.[16]

New rules are being drafted either by the Romanian Minister of Justice or by the Romanian Prison Service, on daily specific activities related to feeding, equipment, accommodation, as all these aspects are closely linked with the organisation of educational, cultural, sports, vocational activities, by means of specialised EU funded programmes[17].

An important clarification of the concept of re-socialization can be found in the practical work of the institutions that run programmes with the people executing penalties, institutions which cooperate by appointment of the judge delegated with the execution of penalties, such as NGOs performing activities to support reinsertion or volunteers representing various religious cults trying to support the assimilation of moral norms by those with disturbed consciences due to having led a disorderly or antisocial lifestyle. Fighting against drug trafficking, the consumption of drugs, alcohol and ethnobotanical substances, human trafficking is not exclusively reserved to the places of detention, probation institutions and the justice system in general, but to all institutions involved in organising educational, vocational, artistic, musical, sports activities, as well as those which provide jobs, social housing or long-term paid placements.

In 2005, the Romanian Government drafted a document on the reinsertion of the persons deprived of liberty, named 'the National Strategy of Social Reintegration of the Persons Deprived of Liberty, 2015-2019', Bucharest, May 27, 2015. An interministerial[18] commission undertook various tasks dealing with coordination, the mobilisation of resources, communication, project planning and recommendations. Moreover, the commission initiated public policies on reintegration, set up working groups made up of specialists from central and local [15] Law no. 293/2004 on the Status of civil servants with special status in the Romanian Prison System, republished, as amended and supplemented; Law no. 48/2012 on the financing of Romanian Prison Service and Romanian Prison Service facilities; Romanian Government Ordinance no. 652/2009 on the organization and functioning of the Ministry of Justice, as amended and supplemented; Romanian Government Ordinance no. 756/2016 on the organization, functioning and duties of the Romanian Prison Service and on amending Romanian Government Ordinance no. 652/2009 on the organization and functioning of the Ministry of Justice, as amended and supplemented; Romanian Government Ordinance no. 584/2005 on assigning specific activities and on financing health units belonging to the defence, public order and national security system, as well as the health units of the Ministry of Justice, as amended and supplemented; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 160/C/2018, 8.01.2018 on approving the Regulation for the organization and functioning of the Romanian Prison Service; Minister of Justice Order no. 1302/C/2017, 21.04.2017 on the composition and duties of the Technical and Economic Council of the Romanian Prison Service; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 3936/2017 on approving the Regulation for the organization of educational centres and detention centres subordinated to the Romanian Prison Service; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 3725/2017 on approving the organization and functioning of the Supplies, Management and Repairs Unit; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 1548/2017 on approving the organization and functioning of the National School for Training Penitentiary Officers Târgu Ocna, as amended and supplemented; Minister of Justice Order no. 1662/C/2011 on approving the competences for human resources management of the Minister of Justice, the Head Officer of Romanian Prison Service and senior officers in charge with subordinated units; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 1316/C/2012 on approving the Rules on providing motor vehicles for the Romanian Prison System and its facilities, as amended and supplemented; the decision of the Romanian Prison Service's Head Officer no. 543/2012 on approving the Internal Regulations of the Romanian Prison Service; the Decision of the Romanian Superior Council of Magistracy no. 89/2014 on approving the Regulation organizing the activity of the judge supervising the deprivation of liberty, Official Gazette of Romania no. 77, 31.01.2014; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 1676/C/24.06.2010 on approving the Regulation for the safety of the detention facilities under the coordination of the Romanian Prison Service, Official Gazette of Romania no. 523, 27.07.2010; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 420/2011 on the conditions according to which the convicted persons can volunteer to work, Official Gazette of Romania no. 181, 15.03.2011; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 433/C/125, 7.02.2012 on ensuring medical assistance to persons executing custodial sentences within the Romanian Prison Service, Official Gazette of Romania no. 124, 21.02.2012; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 433/2010 on approving minimum mandatory rules on the accommodating persons executing custodial sentences, Official Gazette of Romania no. 103, 15.02.2010; Order of the Minister of Justice no. 432/5.02.2010 on approving the Instruction for individually and statistically registering the persons executing custodial sentences in the prison facilities coordinated by the Romanian Prison Service, Official Gazette of Romania no. 157, 11.03.2010; the 30.04.2013 Methodology on granting awards to the persons in the custody of the Romanian Prison System, based on the Credit System relate to prisoners' participation in educational, psychological treatment, socialisation, work activities and programmes and risky situations, Official Gazette of Romania no. 353, 14.06.2013; the 12.06.2012 Internal Regulations for the Romanian Prison Service, Official Gazette of Romania no. 423, 26.06.2012.

[16] Romanian Constitutional Court, decision no. 453/4.07.2018, on the unconstitutionality of the provisions of the sole article subsections 2-5 and subsection 10 of the Law amending supplementing Law no.254/2013 on the execution of sentences and custodial measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal trial.

[17] The Norwegian Financial Mechanism 2014-2021: Correctional Project; CHILD Project – 'Inserting minors by education and development'; 4NORM-ality Project – 'Improving Romanian correctional services by implementing the normality principles'; EIGEP Project – European Interaction Guidelines for Education Professionals when Working with Children in juvenile Justice Learning Centres; Menace Project – Mental Health, Aging And Palliative Care In European Prisons; DERAD Project – Counter-radicalisation through the Rule of Law; RASMORAD Project – Raising Awareness and Staff Mobility on violent RADicalisation in Prison and Probation services; SIPOCA 60 Project – Institutional Consolidation of the Romanian Prison System.

[18] The interministerial commission is made up of representatives (civil servants is in management positions, at least as directors) from the following public institutions: a) Ministry of Justice; b) Ministry of Labour, Family, Social Protection and the Elderly; c) Ministry of Education and Scientific Research; d) Ministry of Internal Affairs; e) Ministry of Health; f) Romanian Probation Directorate; g) Romanian Prison Service. The chair of this commission is the representative of the Ministry of Justice.

institutions, so that proposals evaluating the specific activities could be drafted. This strategy is ongoing, and the efficiency of the interministerial commission is to be assessed at the end of 2019. Meanwhile, the cooperation among the Ministry of Education, the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of Health resulted in common regulation orders, necessary in qualified assistance in three extremely important domains. Moreover, it is worth mentioning the Protocol signed by the Romanian Prison Service and the Administration of the Romanian Orthodox Church on providing moral guidance in penitentiaries, in 1990.

To have a complete picture of the numerous legislative amendments that are to be passed, it is necessary to mention that the rules included in Law no. 254/2013 are debated in the Romanian Parliament, as far as the following domains are concerned: redrafting some provisions on parole; amendments on the prison regimes for the execution of penalties; organising home detention; participation of the convicted persons in the public hearing of appeals; participation of the convicted person in some serious family events; the convicted persons' writing scientific papers; changing the competence of judgment for parole; establishing certain rights and facilities for those remanded in custody; granting unrestricted permissions for humanitarian reasons.

These amendments, together with the provisions on the normalisation of the accommodation conditions[19] in penitentiaries, currently bring about new ideas on the necessity for structural and conceptual reformation of the entire activity within the places of detention so that the re-socialisation of the convicted persons could be successfully achieved.

In the 21st century, the normalization, culturalisation, as well as the 'spiritualization' of the prison 'bars', as well as other activities that are organized in the places of detention should become a reality not just a dream, stated the Romanian Minister of Justice, Gabriel Chiuzbaian, in 1994. The 21 ministers, who occupied the ministerial chair for justice after 1989, generally considered that the administration of penalties is an additional burden, so this activity has become a real problem identified by the ECHR, which has delivered judgments of conviction for the Romanian state amounting to several million euros in recent years[20]. Thus, due to circumstances, useful, important activities and programs have started being organized, though timidly and cautiously.

In recent years, internal assessment analyses[21] of the prison system, probation, educational measures enforced in educational or detention centers have resulted in the development of very important documents which highlighted the need for immediate measures for the improvement of accommodation, medical care, legal assistance, for streamlining release opportunities and proper integration. Analyzing the content of these documents we could conclude the following:

a) the re-socialization activity takes place in particular during the execution of criminal penalties, post-criminal activities are sporadic, lacking financial and material support;
b) all activities that take place in the places of detention have substantially bureaucratic load and they are quantitatively measured to account for their efficiency as far as social integration or the prevention of relapse are concerned;
c) the prison system organizes numerous activities as compared with the probation service, which lacks sufficient human, material and financial resources;
d) the numerous programs related to reintegration are directed toward group activities (conferences, artistic activities, schooling, professional training) and much less on personalized activities;
e) in the last five years the activity of re-socialization and educational rehabilitation of the minors has had positive effects, as the prison population has decreased, although the degree of relapse is constant; the professionalization and the employment from external sources of those in charge with re-socialization has become a major concern for the Romanian Ministry of Justice;
f) Romania's population still holds the prejudice that all criminals 'have to go to jail', and the means to inform, explain and educate citizens are insufficient to demonstrate the effectiveness of non-custodial measures, even the prosecutors and judges are not sufficiently familiar with the European recommendation[22], so custodial sentences are still given, although the law provides that the application of non-custodial sentences[23]

---

[19] Law no. 169/2017 on modifying and supplementing Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of penalties and the custodial measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal trial, the Official Gazette of Romania no. 571/18.07.2017.

[20] The 2017 Romanian Prison Service Report – the sums of money paid, following the EHRC judgements in the last 5 years, are: 2013 – 221,819 euros, 2014 – 196,400 euros, 2015 – 459,275 euros, 2016 – 1,624,670 euros, 2017 – 2,296,451 euros.

[21] Internal documents of the Romanian Prison Service, accessed on 10.10.2018: Diagnostic analysis of the penitentiary system 2008; Report of the Romanian Prime Minister's Control Body; Strategic plan on turning the penitentiary system more efficient, 2008; the Romanian Prison Service's study, 'The Assessment of the Current Situation for Re-socialisation', 2009; Studies resulting from externally funded projects – 'The Strategy for Occupation and Qualification through Education and Activities for Liberty', 'The Increase of Chances for social insertion for the convicted persons by better informing the society and the improvement of the prison activities', by the Regional Research Institute in Lombardy, Former convicts' return to the labour market and their integration into society.'

[22] Recommendation No. R (92) 16 of the Committee of Ministers of Council of Europe to Member States on the European Rules on Community Sanctions and Measures (adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 19 October 1992, at the 482nd meeting of the Ministers' Deputies).

[23] According to art. 74 para. (2), the New Romanian Criminal Code 'When the law stipulates alternative penalties for the offense, the criteria stipulated in para. (1) shall be a factor in selecting one of those alternatives.' According to art. 115 para. (2): '(2) The educational measures to be taken against a juvenile shall be chosen in terms of Art. 114, according to the criteria stipulated in Art. 74.'

should take priority.

The concerns about the re-socialization of the convicted persons in the places of their detention (prisons and detention and educational centers) are currently identifiable by the organization of diversified programmes, which have recently started being personalized. Thus, we can acknowledge the effect of Recommendation 2006/2, but, nevertheless, we are not able to predict its outcome on the evolution of the Romanian prison system.

We consider that the numerous rights granted to prisoners, the change of the prison system to accommodate educational programmes[24] and to eliminate coercion and force will transform the places of detention into institutions highly focused on re-socialization, hence the need for a Code on the execution of penalties to determine, starting with the names of the institutions, their purpose and means, a revival of change for the better for those who are forced to go and live in prison for a period of time.

It is time to move from acknowledging the fact that the places of detention are criminogenic to accepting the necessity that it is fundamental to change the execution of penalties to determine offenders to change their lifestyle.

Conclusions

Social reintegration in Romania both during communism and after 1989 meant drafting a lot of documents which unified the doctrine and the case law related to this field. Before the 1989 revolution, the detainees in Romanian penitentiaries were subject to inhuman or degrading treatment, even to torture. After 1989, the conditions of detention in Romanian prisons could not change very quickly. Once Romania became a member of the European Union, new rules needed to be adopted, in order to attune to EU directives and recommendations. Nevertheless, not all obstacles could be overcome, and at present there are still problems related to overcrowding in prisons, the lack of compliance with suggested sanitary requirements, the inefficiency of the socio-educational programs, as well as the lack of specialized training of the personnel working for the Romanian Prison Service. In addition to this, this paper also highlighted the progress made in the legal field of criminal law on the execution of penalties, which represent small steps in the democratic society we live today.

References

- Ioan Chiș, Istoria penitenciarelor – Ieri și azi (The History of Prisons – Past and Present), Editura A.N.I., București, 2003
- Law no. 294/28.06.2004 on the execution of penalties and the measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial
- Law no. 275/2006 on the execution of penalties and the measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial
- Romanian Government Ordinance no.1897/2006 on approving the Enforcement Regulation for Law no. 275/2006 on the execution of penalties and the measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial
- The Strategy for Developing the Romanian Prison Service 2007-2010
- Law no. 254/19.07.2013 on the execution of penalties and the custodial measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial
- Law no. 286 /2009 on the Romanian Criminal Code
- Law nr. 135/2010 on the Romanian Criminal Procedure Code
- Enforcement Regulation for Law no. 254/20136 on the execution of penalties and the measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial
- Law no. 293/2004 on the Status of civil servants with a special status in the Romanian Prison Service
- Law no. 48/2012 on financing the activity of the Romanian Prison Service and its subordinated units

[24] Subsequent regulatory documents on the re-socialisation of the convicted persons: Decision no. 315/15.01.2018 on approving 'The literacy programme for detainees who cannot attend school'; Decision no. 646/10.10.2018 on approving the programme for general psychological assistance, 'The animal-assisted therapy for detainees'; Decision no. 302/03.01.2017 on approving 'The programme for training the detainees holding responsibilities in educational activities and programmes'; Decision no. 396/15.03.2018 on supplementing the Decision of the Romanian Prison Service's Head Officer no. 302/2017 on 'The programme for training the detainees holding responsibilities in educational activities and programmes'; Decision nr. 421/05.04.2018 on approving 'The Programme for specific psychological intervention dedicated to adults aged over 55'; Decision no. 929/04.07.2017 on 'The organisation and unfolding of topic-based and sports competitions, as a result of activity projects'; Decision no. 448/29.04.2011 on approving 'The instrument for assessing the educational needs of the detainees in the Romanian prison system'; Decision no. 449/29.04.2011 on approving 'The instrument for assessing the social assistance needs of the detainees in the Romanian prison system'; Decision no. 535/21.07.2011 on approving 'The credit system in some units belonging to the Romanian prison system'; Decision no. 500015/28.07.2017 on approving 'The strategy for the computerisation of the prison system for the time period 2017 – 2020'; Decision no.729/27.04.2017, published in Official Gazette of Romanian no. 359/16.05.2017, on 'The conditions to ensure the materials necessary to organise shows, exhibitions and other cultural and artistic performances in which detainees are involved'; Decision no. 441/2.05.2018 on modifying the Decision of the Romanian Prison Service's Head Officer no. 581/2016 for founding a 'Therapeutic centre for women within Gherla Penitentiary', financed under the Programme RO23 'Correctional Services, including Non-custodial Sanctions', by the Norwegian Financial Mechanism 2009-2014, published in Official Gazette of Romanian no. 412/15.05.2018; Order no. 1322/C/2017, on April 25, 2017 on approving 'The regulation for organising and unfolding of educational, social assistance, psychological treatment activities and programmes in the places of detention', coordinated by the Romanian Prison Sentence, published in Official Gazette of Romanian no. 432 bis/12.06.2017.

- Romanian Constitutional Court, decision no. 453/4.07.2018
- Law no. 169/2017 on modifying and supplementing Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of penalties and the custodial measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial
- The 2017 Romanian Prison Service Report
- Recommendation Nr. R (92) 16 of the Committee of Ministers of Council of Europe to Member States on the European Rules on Community Sanctions and Measures (adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 19 October 1992, at the 482nd meeting of the Ministers' Deputies)

CRIMINAL PROFILING IN CRIME INVESTIGATION

Constantin NEDELCU

Abstract

This article proposes a theoretical and practical approach of the criminal profiling and underlines its importance for the criminal investigation domain. The process by which are indicated the personality characteristics of a crime author, taking into account the analysis of the crime scene, various types of personalities of the perpetrators to criminal activity, the statistical data of similar acts can be called "criminal profiling", although there is no unanimously accepted definition so far.

Keywords: the psychological profile, criminal profiling, criminal investigation, behavioural characteristics

The shaping of the psychological profile of the author is an investigation process in criminal prosecution, through which it is tried to examine and to comprehend the personality traits and, implicitly, the behaviour of the crime author in order to indicate the possible person (or its type) responsible for the criminal activity. The method is to be regarded as a help in criminal investigation, with the role of orienting the activities towards the most suitable suspects, to remove the suspicions concerning the suspects not related to the crime and, after the identification of the authors should not be seen as making a composite sketch of the crime author, but mostly as a description of his personality.

The most common definition is Veron Géberth's: "the psychological profile is the result of providing the investigators with specific information about an unknown author who committed a certain crime, process based on the detailed investigation of the crime scene, victimology and known psychophysical theories"[1], and other authors define profiling" as "a technique for determining the personality and behavioural characteristics of an individual, taking into account his criminal background, various types of personalities of offenders committing similar acts".[2]

In the early 1960s-1970s, the American authorities have given a higher importance to the contribution of psychology and psychiatry to identifying unknown authors who committed sever or less sever acts. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) from US has adopted this new "investigation method" which did not have as result the immediate identification of the crime authors, but did bring an important contribution related to investigation's targeting their faster finding. This method, known in the US as "psychological profiling" ("profiling"), it is an endeavour essentially founded on the expertise, logic, intuition and large knowledge in various domains such as: scientific philosophy, forensic medicine, criminology technique, sociology, psychology, psychiatry, etc.

The development of the criminal profiling method is due to the profound knowledge of the personality of violent persons. Numerous researches and documentation were made in the prison environment, and important and conclusive information have been obtained. During many years, the authors of many sexual assaults, homicide, fire, destruction, etc. were systematically interviewed. They detailed the reasons about committing various acts for which they were found guilty, about their remorse, the way they choose their victims, their childhood and teenage years, the education they received and their entire life to the moment of committing the act.[3]

These researches and documentation had as purpose the establishment of the National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crimes, who's necessity was proven by obtaining positive results after applying the psychology in solving some criminal cases and the alarming increase (at least in the US) of crimes committed through violence. The establishment of this Center was not the last step done in the process of introducing the author's profile in criminal investigation. At the moment, not only in the US, but in many countries of the world, a greater importance is granted to this field, known by us under the name of "psycho-forensics".

The importance of this method has been witnessed since the 1950s, when into the FBI was created a research and profiling development Center, called Investigative Supportive Unit. It was very helpful creating a large database containing the information obtained by interviewing the convicted criminals, storing at the statistical level, all these deviant behaviours with all the personality traits arising from. From 1976 to 1979, many FBI agents have been known, including the well-known John Douglas and Robert Ressler, have interviewed 36 serial killers with

* Asistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: constantin.nedelcu@univnt.ro).

[1] Vernon Geberth, Forensic Science University Package: Practical Homicide Investigation, Fourth Edition.

[2] Ressler R., Criminal Profiling from Crime Scene Analysis in Behavioral Sciences and the law, nr.4, 1986, p.401-405.

[3] Lea Winerman, „Criminal profiling: the reality behind the myth", article published on the American Psychology Association, Volume 35, No. 7, July 2004, p. 66. http://www.apa.org/monitor/julaug04/criminal.aspx

the purpose to develop theories and categories of various types of criminals.[4]

In 1972s, the Behavioral Science Unit (BSU) was set up within the FBI Academy as a specialized unit in profiling techniques. The specialized unit has developed certain techniques and procedures in behavioural analysis programs.

In Europe, in 1933s, Interpol established a crime analysis unit called ANALYTICAL CRIMINAL INTELLIGENCE UNIT (ACIU), a unit that assesses the nature and size of various criminal activities, including serial killers or organized crime groups, introducing structures, techniques and methods for carrying out a complex analysis of the criminal phenomenon.

Even though the FBI's approach has gained public interest, some psychologists have doubted its scientific knowledge. Robert Ressler, John Douglas and other FBI agents did not have studies in the field, so the psychologists who studied their theories and researches did find methodological mistakes. Some psychologists developed their own researches in criminal profiling field and have develop new approaches, concept, classification systems.[5]

The modern profiling did build a strong foundation on the researches from criminology, psychology, psychiatry and forensic fields.

General Considerations

Criminal profiling is operating with the personality concept - a multidisciplinarity construct. The personality concept[6] incorporates the essence of the human as subject and object of the historical-social process, a system of biological, psychological and social attributes, behavioural, temperamental, character structures, personal values related to social values which a person can have. Any person having intellectual, affective, volitive, character and temperamental peculiarities, being different and being similar at the same time to his peers, presents himself also as a unique personality, organized according to his genetics and environment influences.

Criminal profiling implies in the whole concept the given idea, taking into account a particular case, the law of the judicial investigation. „The research of the personality of an unknown offender, even though takes in consideration concept models, psychology elaborates in order to define and determine its profile, however makes use of particular schemes, accepted in the special sciences field."[7] Thereby, in the process of drawing the profile, it is tried to define the offender's personality traits, the elements related to motivation, skills, preparation and behavioural - criminal orientation. The need of a large research of the criminal personality it is conditioned by both law's tasks: discovering, researching, punishing the crimes and orienting the activity towards crime prevention; and the contemporary general-human orientation toward humanism, social relationship harmonisation, annihilation of distorted factors which are provoking interpersonal and intergroup conflicts.

A contemporary research of the criminal profile involved in a crime is referred to a series of aspects. No doubt that the law research of the offender's personality, which identifies it with crime and is oriented towards its four components - crime's subject, its objective and subjective causes, shall not offer sufficient material for the full understanding of both, criminal personality, and the concrete person and the actions provoking the criminal case. It is required a dynamic treatment, which takes in consideration the genesis and the affirmation of the most productive personality, which are capable of other sciences - psychology, sociology criminology. The analysis of the personality under these sciences offers knowledge which allows the comprehension of all the aspect of the deviant behaviour.

Criminal profiling is a complex and complicated activity. In the psychological profile of any human being involved in crime, shall blend both positive qualities, as well those which shall characterize the occurrence of a certain social group - criminals. The psychical qualities of any human cannot fatally decide his antisocial role of offender. There are however some psychical peculiarities like social factors, which shall determine the psychological profile and behavioural orientation. When we talk about the offender's personality's, these are to be analysed.

Some authors, researching on the criminal formation process[8], mentioned the role of psychological and physiological peculiarities - of the

[4] Lea Winerman, „Criminal profiling: the reality behind the myth", article published on the American Psychology Association, Volume 35, No. 7, July 2004, p. 66.
http://www.apa.org/monitor/julaug04/criminal.aspx

[5] Lea Winerman, „Criminal profiling: the reality behind the myth", article published on the American Psychology Association, Volume 35, No. 7, July 2004, p. 66.
http://www.apa.org/monitor/julaug04/criminal.aspx

[6] Personality is a wide-spread term which sense it is known to the common language. The majority uses the word to refer to a complex of characteristics defining the way in which a person sees and acts in the world - something similar to the combined processes of thinking and behavioural. In psychology, it could be determined as emotional, cognitive, and behavioural unique traits of each individual, learned and evolved through expertise and relatively consistency throughout time.
Is is unlikely to find a consent between psychologists related to personality's nature. There is no unique perspective over which all researchers could agree. It is difficult to find an agreement for sole personality definition, but mostly related to its characteristics. Rather than looking for a convergence, the psychologists belonging to various schools, did advance theories and definitions of personality which they sustained and defend with great passion and belief.

[7] Tudorel Butoi, „Tratat universitar de psihologie judiciară", Publishing House Phobos, Bucharest, 2003, p. 125.

[8] Nicolae Mitrofan, Voicu Zdrenghea, Tudorel Butoi, „Psihologie judiciară", Publishing House Şansă, Bucharest 1992, p. 162.

psychical, behavioural, character type system, and social factors, mostly of those which shall determine the socialising process of the individual. In the circle of the subjective causes of a crime, the author marks his thinking and consciousness, dominated by certain representations, contradictory to those general-humans, social orientation as result of needs, interests and motivation with an antisocial character. It is obvious the orientation of the research of the offender's personality in order to appoint the correlation between social and biological, this process being analysed only through its dynamic: "within the process of social development, personality formation"[9].

Criminal profiling offers information to all law agents which are conducting the criminal investigation. It is a fact that in the criminal investigation, a simple profile cannot lad to the exact identification of the offender. However, criminal profiling can eliminate an important part of variants, restricting enough the suspects circle. More data offers the criminal profile and more efficient will be the criminal investigation.

Criminal profiling was defined as "a collection of clues"[10], "an educated try to offer specific information related to a certain type of suspect"[11] and as a biographic sketch of behavioural models and possible tendencies arising from these[12]

Some authors have confirmed related to criminal profiling that it is especially useful when the offender suffers of a form of psychopathology. The FBI defines criminal profiling as being that identification technique of the major personality traits and behavioural characteristics of an individual, starting from the crime analyse. The investigator's ability consists in recognising the dynamic of the scene and its correlation to various criminal figures which committed similar crimes.

Criminal profiling is based on the principle that any author of a crime, independently of the committed crime, will act on a "values set" basis. These values or "signatures", are same way personalised as handwriting and once identified, they can be used to help investigators in the physical identification of the criminal[13].

Scientific methods of drawing up the criminal profiling

A. FBI's method: the investigation of the crime scene[14]

The original method used by FBI, was performed by the FBI agents Howard Teten and Pat Mullany and involves the first overall impression on the mental status of the criminal based on the overall observation of the crime scene.

Later, in 1979s and 1983s, following a study based on the interviewing of the sentenced criminals, FBI agents, Douglas John and Ressler Robert have updated the process of the profiling in the current approach: analysis of the crime scene. The importance of researching the crime scene, its urgent nature and irreplaceable as well as its wealth of samples that can be gathered (not just physical evidence, but also psychological) have been understood by the forensics long time before the official development of the FBI method. This takes place in six steps[15]:

- The collection and evaluation of the primary data (Profiling Imputus)- in this step, particularly important, whose achieving depends the whole investigation and its results, where all the information regarding the case are gathered: the photos of the crime scene and of the victims, the autopsy results and of the analysis of the samples founded at the crime scene and all the other information that can be relevant in shaping a precise picture of what happened before, in the middle and after murder.
- Templates of data systematisation (Decision Process Models) – the second step involves all of the information assembling collected into a logical, coherent pattern of the preceding stage. As a result of data systematisation can be determined the crime.
- The systematic interpretation of the criminal activity (Crime Assessment), is the time of [9] Jenkins, P., „Using murder: The social construction of serial homicide". New York: Aldine de Gruyter, 1994, p. 142.

[10] Nicolae Mitrofan, Voicu Zdrenghea, Tudorel Butoi, „Psihologie judiciară", Publishing House Şansă, Bucharest 1992, p. 163.
[11] Vernon Geberth, Forensic Science University Package: Practical Homicide Investigation, Fourth Edition, 2008, p. 164.
[12] Idem, p. 165.
[13] Jenkins, P., „Using murder: The social construction of serial homicide". New York: Aldine de Gruyter, 1994, p. 146.
[14] A school case in this sense, is Râmaru killer's profile analysed by Univ. Prof. PhD Tudorel BUTOI and by Alina TĂNASE in the article Profiler. In „the Eagle" operation – Analysing the case Râmaru (father and son) from the psychological perspective:
"A young man in his mid20s (insane courage - "youthful arrogance", correlated with the ages of the victims).
Disturbingly often (prolific criminal, whose timeless attacks don't follow a pattenr), so it's probably about a psycho criminal, with a compulsive behaviour, the crimes being lived as a way of achieving satisfaction.
The free of remorse psychopath, believing that the victim had received what deserves (this results from the way in which he left the bodies).
Victims: young women (sexual moving body –sexual psychopath) over which he was going into the night, in their own homes (by forcing the window, break-in – Freud: rape), from the basement (the underground in Freud's psychoanalysis – the symbol of early childhood, so probably once abused, where the inability to have normal relations with the young women that he was murdering of, attachment disorder in the early childhood– violence against women: the need of killing them, not necessarily to rape them, so the need of absolute control).
Weather: strong storm, heavy rain, which means nature's "help", specific "Wolf Man" through surprising attacks and for easier hide, because otherwise he wouldn't be able to approach the women.
Cowardice (the shyness is the result of particular neurotic tendencies; they may have the source, typical, in early childhood education by the hyper authoritarian families) because he has to attack them over night, on a weather he can hide, while they're sleeping, without the possibility to defend themselves. This means a lack of self-confidence in order to have normal relationships."
[15] Nicolae Mitrofan, Voicu Zdrenghea, Tudorel Butoi, „Psihologie judiciară", Publishing House Şansă, Bucharest 1992, p. 162.

reconstitution of the events and of the criminal behaviour of the author as well as the victim. Are intended to understand the role each participant had (victim and perpetrator) in what happened.

- Establishing the criminal profile - There shall be a characteristics list of the possible author of the crime, list that could target: a range of age, the sex, ethnicity, some particular physical traits (like a deformity, or a specific disease), the weight, the height, occupation, level of education and culture, behavioural symptoms, possible speech defects, matters concerning author's relations to other people. Data serve to determining identification process, detention of the suspect and the establishment of appropriate questioning methods of the suspect.
- The Investigation. Being realised the author's profile, it is surrendered to criminal Courts. Ideally would be that the profile to point direction that focuses the efforts of the investigators and to narrow the circle of the suspects. The Profile can suffer changes, unless doesn't lead to any suspect or if appear new evidence, the profile is reconsidering in order to incorporate new evidence.
- The Apprehension. In this stage are compared the characteristics of the suspect to the original profile prior identified therefore. In many cases, this comparison or verification can't be realised because of the missing author of the crime.

At the bottom of the FBI's method there is the dichotomy of the organised - disorganised offender[16], according to which are classified the crime scenes. An organised crime scene shows the attentive planning and control from the offender's side when he commits the murder; this thing makes reference to educated individuals with social competences, which are able to maintain harmonious relationships with people around. At the opposite end there is a disorganised crime scene, which indicates the lack of control and capacity to take intelligent decisions. The disorganised criminal is not trying to cover his tracks, presuming an individual which has either a lower level of intelligence, or uses drugs or alcohol regularly.

This classification seems reasonable, but at an attentive analysis it can be seen that the crime scenes often have organised, as well disorganised characteristics.

Despite critiques, the FBI's method to analyse the crime scene remains one of the most taught methods worldwide at the moment.

B. CANTER'S METHOD: investigation psychology[17]

David Cantor's method is based on statistics: starting from the offenders' population database, the typologies shall be defined (offenders groups) and the crimes with unknown authors are compared with those from the typologies. This procedure follows the similarity and has as result a list with the probable characteristics of the unknown author. The difference between the FBI's and Canter's method consists that the last one updates its database.

The model elaborated by Canter, named the model of the five factors, is based on five aspects of the interaction between the victim and the perpetrator; these are the following:

- The interpersonal coherence is represented by the assumption that the offenders will relate with their victims the same way they do with every day persons. Another assumption is that the victim symbolises a very important person from the offender's life.
- The time and the crime scene can provide information about the offender's mobility, contributing to determining his probable residence. Since the time and place are chosen by the perpetrator, they can give information related to his personal life and schedule.
- Criminal characteristics allow the analyst to refine the classifications on offenders groups and to offer a profile with the most probable traits which can

[16] Continuing the case presented above, we can notice the dichotomy Organised-Disorganised

Organised:

- from the geographical profile it can be determined that he crosses the city to attack his victims, proving a great mobility (he kills in both center of the city, a maximum risk area, and in the neighbourhood close to suburbs) [subsequently it was shown that he was an ITB driver, so we knew quite well all the city areas].
- the victims belong to a very obvious pattern: young women in their 20s, alone, on their way home during the night or living in buildings basements.
- cured aspect ( the military boots are freshly painted).
- does not know the victims (they are strangers especially targeted to fit in his victimisation profile), being able to easily manifest his sadism and brutality.
- he is coming in the criminal area with the crime weapon and dos not leave it there; this and the fact that the victims are brutally attacked prove the premeditation and the tendency of a ruthless "hunter" which "is hunting his prey" in his best advantage (his tracks are covered by the nature and the biological human cycle (sleep or night, when the visibility is low and the vigilance is attenuated) ensure him a minimum defence reaction of the victims.
- leaves physical evidence at the crime scene, but these do not help to identification. From here we can conclude that it might be either a very brave primary offender, which overestimates his ability to hide, or we talk about a very agile offender, which, without being identified, "experimented" through multiple crimes (probably burglaries, robberies) until he shaped an operating mode which he considers valid.

Disorganised:

- leaves boots and digital tracks at the crime scene (this should be interpreted with caution because the fingerprint technique was a new science at that time, so its utility in the investigations could not be known to the wide public, especially at the end of the war).
- does not lure the victims in his comfort zone (inadequate from a social and probably sexual point of view)
- the corps is left at the crime scene (the crime discovery is prevented only by the locked door from the inside; does non make any effort to hide the corps o make identification difficult)
- the crime scene is pretty "dirty" (blood and brain particles, scattered on the walls) characterize a certain offender.

[17] Tudorel Butoi, „Tratat universitar de psihologie judiciară", Publishing House Phobos, Bucharest, 2003, p. 54.

- Criminal Career is referred to the possibility of the existence of other criminal activities and the type of these activities.
- Forensic Awareness is referred to the elements which prove that an offender knows the investigation and samples collecting techniques. Such elements can be wearing gloves, using condoms o removing any object which may have the perpetrator's fingerprint or blood.

Since this method uses statistic means in order to elaborate the offender's profile, similar criticism can be brought like to the FBI's method, especially because the typologies can not be applied in other environment but in the one where the initial data were collected (in the case of Canter's model, in Great Britain).

C. Turvey's METHOD: Behavioural Evidence Analysis

Starting from the observation that the crime authors lie most of the times when they talk about how they committed the crime, Truvey Brent elaborated a profiling method where the most objective evidence related to what happened in a crime is the reconstruction of the criminal behaviour. Behavioral Evidence Analysis covers four steps[18]:

- Equivocal Forensic Analysis. The term equivocal refers that the interpretation of the samples can lead to more meanings and the purpose of this step is to evaluating which is the most probable meaning of the evidences. The sources of Equivocal Analysis and interpretation are the following: photos, registrations, sketches of the crime scene, investigators records, material evidences found, autopsy records and its photos, witnesses' statements, the map of the victim before the death, the victim's past etc.
- Establishing the victim's profile (Victimology). In this step is established a very precise portrait of the victim's profile. The answer about why, how, where and when o certain victim was chosen can say a lot about the perpetrator. One of the victim's characteristics taken in consideration is the measures (height, weight); so, if it can be established that the victim could be moved, there is a series of conclusions to understand the power and the physical conformation of the perpetrator.
- Crime Scene Characteristics are referring to the crime scene traits, determined by the perpetrator's decision related to the victim, the place and its meaning for him. In this stage, the crime scene is related to other similar crime scenes and it is determined the way how to approach the victim. These information can lead to the same perpetrator.
- Offender Characteristics are the behavioural or personality traits shown after the above steps. The profile reached is not final, it has to be analysed permanently along with the new shown evidences and denied older information. Offender Characteristics can refer to: physical conformation, gender, professional status, the presence of remorse and guilt feeling, the criminal background, the abilities and skills level, the aggressiveness level, offender's residence referred to the crime scene, his medical background, the marital status, the race etc.

Since the analysis of the behavioural samples does not use to a referral group which base a profile is created, Petherick (2006) considers this method as being the biggest transcultural application. The method considers all the physical evidences, the offender's behaviour and the victim's characteristics, which lead together at the perpetrator's profile. The critiques brought to this method refer at its time frame, to the need of a great professional preparation and the dependency of the quality of the final result with the quantity of information to which the profiler has access.

Geographic profiling

Profiling or geographic profiling is a management information system and at the same time an investigation methodology which is evaluating the series of the crime scenes in order to determine the most probable area where the perpetrator lives.

This technique may apply in serial crimes, rapes, burglaries, fires and planting bombs. At the base of the technique the is the Brentingham (Webb, 2006) model, according to which all people have an "activity space" dependent on the area where we live, work and relax and this activity space is producing a distinct pattern of travelling throughout the city; applying this model to the criminal activity we can understand that an offender must know a certain area before committing the crimes. The crime scene is determined by the intersection of the travel route with that area.

By geographical profiling are predicted the most probable places where the offender lives, works, relates or the most probable routes which he is following, the data referred to the time, distance and movement towards and from the crime scene are analysed to obtain a three-dimensional model called risk surface.

The risk surface contains the most probable places where the offender can be found and helps the investigators to focusing their effort onto the areas where he is active.

Geographic profiling methodology presumes a series of procedures[19]:

- File's examination: witnesses statements, autopsy record, psychological profile (if any);
- Crime scene inspection;
- Discussion with the investigators;
- Crime scenes visits (if any possibility);
- Local statistics analysis referred to criminality and demographic data;
- Study of the roads and transportation routes;
- Global analysis of these data and completion of the record.

[18] Tudorel Butoi, „Tratat universitar de psihologie judiciară", Publishing House Phobos, Bucharest, 2003, p. 56-58.
[19] Univ. Prof. Phd Tudorel Badea Butoi, "Psihologie judiciară. Tratat Universitar, Publishing House Solaris Prinţ, Bucharest, 2009, p. 153.

Often, profiling techniques are gathered as one and same method, with a single set of procedures and practised by persons with the same type of preparation.

It is obvious though that these techniques are different as well as the professional preparations of persons applying them. The FBI's method presumes the comparison of an offender's behaviour to those criminals which the profiler has met in the past and to groups/typologies established throughout studying similar crimes and criminals.

The investigation psychology is based on the environmental psychology and the analysis of the situational elements (place, time, offender's experience at a certain moment), making recourse to statistics also. The behavioural samples analysis does not utilize statistics, but leans first of all on the reconstruction of the incident, starting from the physical evidence and on psychology and psychiatry in order to interpreting the perpetrator's behaviour. In this technique is more or less visible, the psycho-behavioural signature which can differentiate between two offenders with similar operating mode.

Geographical profiling is a complementary instrument which does not refer to psychological information, but is having as purpose, like the others techniques, the restrain of the searching area of suspects and the shaping of a more accurate direction for the shaping of the investigator effort to put an end to crimes.

Logical forms of reasoning in the elaboration of the crime author's profile

The behavioural and personality analysis of the perpetrator of the crime involves a logical approach, different according to the arguments type used for the evaluation. Therefore, the arguments, as logics study elements can be divided in two distinct types, according to how their premises are leading to conclusions: inductive and deductive.

In the speciality literature, the logical forms of reasoning in the shaping of the crime author's profile were divided as inductive and deductive.[20]

The inductive profile presents the following characteristics:

- the premises do not give final solutions for the conclusions, they only offer the support and allow the general way, which even if it's nor correct, is based on the statistical analysis.
- starting from the behaviour and characteristics which many authors who have been studied in the past have, is generalised also for the suspect in the investigates cause, presuming the crime authors have similar motivations in similar situations.
- in order to draw the intended statistics and to elaborate the inductive profile, the data are collected from three sources: the studies on the population imprisoned; the practical investigators experience, the public sources, media included.
- even if it has the advantage of easiness and speed, the presence of the specialists not being necessary, the inductive profile was criticised because it turns to a limited number of population of known authors, by extending the obtained data from them, to innocent persons.

The deductive profile presents the following characteristics[21]:

- it offers unquestionable grounds for conclusions, having as primary objective the clarification of the relationship between premises and conclusions.
- is the exclusive result of the correct examination of the tracks discovered after the investigation of the crime scene, forensic expertise, followed by the analysis of the crime scene characteristics and those of the victim, so the profile of an individual which could commit the crime with that victim can be deducted, in the proper conditions of that crime scene.

From this prospective, the characteristics and behaviour of the author's crime can be deducted from several information categories, classified as follows:[22]

- material evidences. The forensic psychologist analyses all the samples taken at the crime scene in order to ensure that those are correctly sustaining the peculiarities at the crime;
- the characteristics at the crime scene are determined after a complete evaluation of the material evidences and are individually determined and analysed as developed, in chronological order. This examination can lead to conclusions referred to the motive and purpose of the offender and to his operating mode;

Victim's characteristics. In order to study the victim's characteristics, to create its own profile, is a part of the elaboration of the offender's profile, and involves speciality personnel with the expertise in the crime scene investigation, in interpreting the laboratory analyses and knowledge in the psychology field. The forensic psychologist must establish a unique behaviour of the offender, by crossing from an universal set of characteristics of a suspect to particular characteristics of a certain individual.

There is no exact rule of a certain method in a specific case and the profiling elaboration methods can be adapted by the investigators, according to their needs and specific of the investigation.

The future of criminal profiling.

Criminal profiling has an out-of-court character and not even in the United States is considered as an evidence proof which serves in finding the truth,

[20] Stancu, Emilian, "Criminalistică. Vol. II: Tactica şi metodologia criminalistică", Bucureşti, Publ. House Actami, 1995, p. 43;
[21] Stancu, Emilian, "Criminalistică. Vol. II: Tactica şi metodologia criminalistică", Bucureşti, Publ. House Actami, 1995, p. 47;
[22] Idem 48

however through it, acts with unknown authors could be rapidly solved, the identification and capture of the crime authors allow also o comparative evaluation, and it is natural that in the future this type of investigation shall have a well-earned, efficient and indisputable place.

Criminal profiling as instrument in the criminal investigation begins to enjoy a major interest on both investigators and media. However, even if it became quickly accepted by the wide public (especially because of the movies to consecrated it), a lot of questions related to its applicability and objectivity were arising.

Criminal profiling did not arise to solve the case by itself. It is not a magical instrument or a precise science. According the FBI's internal records, it has a 17% success rate. However, criminal profiling had an important role in crime investigation in the US and not only. It is known to be used in at least 11 countries: Great Britain, Sweden, Finland, New Zealand, South Africa, Germany, Canada, Malaysia, Russia, Zimbabwe and Holland[23]. Therefore, despite controversies related to this field, more and more profiling specialists appear every year. This leads to the increasing of the researches number which can only lead to a higher success rate of the predictions.

Therefore it is to be expected that profiling importance increases every year, and in a not so far away future, shall become indispensable in the investigation of crime committed with violence.

References

- Vernon Geberth, Forensic Science University Package: Practical Homicide Investigation, Fourth Edition.
- Ressler R., Criminal Profiling from Crime Scene Analysis in Behavioral Sciences and the law, nr.4, 1986, p.401-405.
- Lea Winerman, „Criminal profiling: the reality behind the myth", article published on the American Psychology Association, Volume 35, No. 7, July 2004, p. 66. http://www.apa.org/monitor/julaug04/criminal.aspx
- Tudorel Butoi, „Tratat universitar de psihologie judiciară", Publishing House Phobos, Bucharest, 2003, p. 125.
- Nicolae Mitrofan, Voicu Zdrenghea, Tudorel Butoi, „Psihologie judiciară", Publishing House Şansă, Bucharest 1992, p. 162.
- Jenkins, P., „Using murder: The social construction of serial homicide". New York: Aldine de Gruyter, 1994, p. 142.
- Vernon Geberth, Forensic Science University Package: Practical Homicide Investigation, Fourth Edition, 2008, p. 164.
- Tudorel Badea Butoi, "Psihologie judiciară. Tratat Universitar, Publishing House Solaris Prinţ, Bucharest, 2009, p. 153.
- Stancu, Emilian, "Criminalistică. Vol. II: Tactica şi metodologia criminalistică", Bucureşti, Publ. House Actami, 1995, p. 43;
- Snook, B., Gendreau, P., Bennell, C., & Taylor, P. (2008). Criminal Profiling. (Cover story). Skeptic, 14(2), 42-47. Retrieved March 19, 2009.

[23] Snook, B., Gendreau, P., Bennell, C., & Taylor, P. (2008). Criminal Profiling. (Cover story). Skeptic, 14(2), 42-47. Retrieved March 19, 2009.

THE SIZE AND THE IMPORTANCE OF THE EVIDENCE GOVERNED DURING THE PROSECUTION IN REM

Alin-Sorin NICOLESCU[*]
Luminița CRIȘTIU-NINU[]

Abstract

The jurisdiction developed on the edge of the implementation of the provisions of Code of Criminal Procedure, relating to the verification of the legality of the referral to the court, the legality of the management of evidences and documents of the prosecution, has proved the fact that in front of the judges of preliminary chamber has come, not infrequently, the request of the exclusion of the evidences governed during the criminal prosecution in rem, on the ground that these evidences have been managed either in total or in the majority of them, at this stage absolutely secret of the criminal prosecution, even though the offender of the deed was known and in this way, the future suspect or charged, has been deprived of any realistic and concrete possibility to defend himself, to assist with the help of a lawyer in the management of theses evidences and to combat them by appropriate procedural means.

This raises the question which is the size of the evidences that reasonably can be taken during the criminal proceedings in rem, thus the suspect/ defendant should not be harmed in his procedural rights, in particular with regard to his right of defence.

To search for an answer to this matter, this is very present in the proceedings in front of the judge of preliminary chamber, legal provisions must be primarily examined that implicitly separates the criminal prosecution in rem from the moment of further performing of the prosecution towards a certain person.

Keywords: Evidence, prosecution, in rem, procedural, suspect, defendant.

1. Introduction

The criminal process represents the activity, through which the specialized bodies of the state discover the criminal offences, identify and catch the criminals, gather and manage the samples, accomplish the penal liability and apply the penalties.[1]

The judicial bodies carry out a complex activity which exceeds the strict limits of the resolution of criminal case within the framework of the jurisdictional detent, executing a series of legal procedures in order to conduct the act of justice in good conditions.

On the basis of succession of judicial activities carried out by the competent bodies for the sole purpose of making the truth and pull the penal liability of persons who committed crimes found the samples, the nature of the evidence and processes of evidence.

Underlying succession of judicial activities carried out by the competent bodies for the sole purpose of finding out the truth and criminal responsibility of individuals who committed crimes find evidence, evidence and evidence procedures.

2. The proof. General considerations

2.1. Evidences, means of evidence and proceedings of evidence.

The legislator defines the notion of proof in the content of the provisions of Article 97 (1) as being "any element of fact which serves at the disclosure of the existence or non-existence of an infringement, at the identification of the person who committed it and at the knowledge of the necessary circumstances for the fair resolution of the cause and which contributes to finding out the truth in the criminal trial."

The means of the proof represents the means of investigation or of discovery of the evidences and the management of the evidence in the criminal trial.[2]

The evidence is obtained in the criminal trial by the following means that sample: the declarations of the suspect or of the defendant, the declarations of the injured person, the declarations of the civil party or of the responsible party from a civil point of view, the declarations of the witnesses, expert reports or findings, reports, photos, material means of sample or by any other means of sample which is not forbidden by law.

[*] Asistent Profesor, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Judge at Bucharest Court of Appeal (e-mail: nicolescualinsorin@gmail.com)

[] PhD Student, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Vice-President at Bucharest Court of Appeal (e-mail: luminita.cristiu@just.ro)

[1] Nicolae Volonciu, „Tratat de procedură penală Vol I", ed. Paideia, 1993, p. 9;

[2] V. Dongoroz, Curs de procedură penală, București, 1942, p. 207.

2.2. The object of the evidence and the aim of the evidence

The object of the evidence represents all the facts and the circumstances which have to be proved, for the purpose of solving the criminal cause and also shows the limits of the judicial research and the performance of the evidence.

According to the article 98 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the object of the proof is constituted by tye existence of the offence and its commission by the defendant, the facts concerning civil liability, when there is a civil part, the facts and the circumstances of fact which depends on the enforcement of the law and any necessary circumstance for a fair resolution of the case.

The charge of the proof mainly belongs to the prosecutor in the criminal proceedings, civil parts or, as the case may be, the prosecutor who pursues the civil action in the case in which the injured person lacks the capacity of exercise or has a capacity of limited exercise.

The suspect or the defendant benefits of the presumption of innocence, not being obliged to prove his innocence, and he has the right not to contribute to his own indictment. Thus, in the case in which the prosecution fails to fully overturn the presumption of innocence, the fact will be interpreted as an evidence in favour of the innocence of the defendant (in dubio pro reo). According to the judicial practice, even if the defendant reports himself the Court cannot order his sentencing, if the presumption of innocence has not been overturned during the criminal trial, whereas any doubt takes advantage of the defendant and the defendant's admission does not have absolute evidential value.

3. The management of the evidences during the prosecution stage

3.1. The beginning of the criminal proceedings and the continuation of the criminal prosecution against a person

The informed body of the criminal prosecution by denunciation or complaint has the obligation to check in the first stage the fulfilment of the conditions of form of the information and respectively of the mentions from the content of the information which relates to the way of describing the deed, in order to establish, if the conditions of form are met, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, if the description of the deed is complete and clear. The verification of the criminal prosecution body has a judicial result in refunding the denunciation or the complaint through administrative way to the petitioner, where the conditions relating to the form or conditions relating to the description of the deed are not fulfilled.

The article 305 (1) from the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that "When the document of information accomplishes the conditions laid down by the law, the criminal prosecution body disposes the beginning of the criminal prosecution relating to the committed deed or whose commitment is prepared, even if the author is shown or known."

According to the article 305 (3) from the Code of Criminal Procedure "When there are evidences indicating reasonable suspicion that a certain person has committed the deed for which the the criminal prosecution has started and there is not one of the cases provided by the article 16 (1), the criminal prosecution body disposes that the criminal prosecution should be carried out in front of him, who acquires the quality of suspect. The measure ordered by the criminal prosecution body shall be carried out within 3 days of the confirmation of the prosecutor who supervises the criminal prosecution, the criminal prosecution body being obliged to present the prosecutor even the case file. "

The fact that it is not immediately possible the acquisition of the official quality of suspect as soon as the criminal prosecution bodies were informed relating to the commitment of a criminal deed by one or more people represents a guarantee justified by the necessity to protect the rights of the people against whom such a referral was made, in order they may not be the subject of such criminal charges without a minimum verification of support, to the effect of indicating both the existence of the deed and the non-existence of a case which prevents the exercise of the criminal action, and the reasonable suspicion that they have committed a deed prescribed by the penal law.

Reported to the administration of numerous evidences and sometimes of all evidences in the stage of criminal prosecution in rem and to the existence or not of a physical injury of the right of defence of the suspect/ defendant, by the impossibility to assist through a lawyer, I their management, especially in the conditions in which after further criminal prosecution in personam, the request of re-administration of the evidences was rejected by the prosecutor, different solutions have been pronounced in jurisprudence.

3.2. The management of the evidences within criminal prosecution in rem

Thus, in a case, in which the defendant, in the procedure of preliminary chamber requested the exclusion of the evidences managed before being brought to the attention the charge and the beginning of the criminal prosecution against him (criminal investigation that began three years ago, without being brought to attention of the charge meanwhile), the judge of the preliminary chamber kept in mind that the sanction that would be incident in this case is that of relative nullity, only that this penalty cannot operate because the defendant has not proved the existence of a physical injury which could not be removed otherwise than the cancellation of the procedural act concerning the management of the evidences and the exclusion of all evidences thus managed.

It was argued the solution through which the criminal prosecution is characterized by the lack of advertising and contradiction, which means that although the defendant had, at least virtually, the possibility of assisting by the defender at the interrogation of the witnesses, this fact did not suppose for the defender an active interrogation of the witnesses. Especially that during the criminal prosecution the prosecutor meets in his person the functions of process of accusation, defence and resolution of the case and in very few exceptions, such as for example, the confrontation, and all parties are present at the same time to carry out the criminal prosecution.

It was also noted that the nullity may not interfere only if the physical injury cannot be removed differently or, in case, the remedy is given by the possibility of re-interrogation of the witnesses directly by the Court, during the judicial investigation and that the criminal law of process does not restrict the administration of all evidences only after disposition of further carrying out of the criminal prosecution, the contrary conclusion leading to the necessity of re-administration of all managed evidences in the stage of criminal prosecution in rem, or this is not the purpose of the legislator.

Therefore, it was concluded that the defendant was not caused any physical injury to found the request of exclusion of the evidences.

To the contrary, the Court has decided in a supreme decision of the case, prior to coming into force of the new criminal provisions of process, but the reasons remain valid and they are fully applicable in relation to the new provisions[3].

Thus, the Supreme Court held that the provisions of art. 6 paragraph 3 (c) of the European Convention of the human rights, European standard of protection in the field of the right to dispose of the necessary time and facilities to prepare the defence, it also applies at the stage of criminal prosecution, being an element of the notion of fair trial, to the extent that the initial failure of this right might compromise the fair character of the criminal trial. (imbroscia against Switzerland, 1993)

The Supreme Court, taking into account that the injured person and the majority of the witnesses have been interrogated in the stage of prior acts (the correspondent of the criminal prosecution in rem), the request of re-interrogation has been rejected on the grounds that they were interrogated by the prosecutor respecting all the guarantees and thus being managed the most important evidences in the preceding act stage, stated that the equality of arms has been violated, the accused being placed in a position where he no longer can present the cause in such way as not to be disadvantaged compared to the incrimination ( case S against Switzerland 1991). The Court held that the presence of the lawyer in the administration of these evidences would have conferred the right to make requests, conclusions, and complaints according to the rights conferred by extension of the sphere of judicial assistance in criminal prosecution stage including the possibility granted by the prosecutor to ask questions on the occasion of the interrogation of the injured person and of witnesses.

He further held that the hearing of the injured person and of witnesses on the occasion of judicial research cannot complete the obligation of the prosecutor to manage the evidences with the respect of the rights of defence.

In a third case[4], clarifying for the problem in question, from my point of view, it was held that the evidences managed between the moment of the beginning of the criminal prosecution in rem and the moment of the disposition by the prosecutor to continue to carry out the criminal prosecution against the suspect and, respectively, bringing to the attention of this person the quality of suspect, cannot be stuck by nullity, as long as the time intervals between the two moments mentioned above, reported to the dates and the circumstances of the case, are justified, a condition which the judge considered as being fulfilled in question, since it is a period of time of only 15 days. It was held that in the lack of an obvious abuse in the timing of the stages of process during the criminal prosecution, the judge cannot censure the way in which the body of the criminal prosecution has planned the beginning and the continuation of the criminal prosecution, not having data in the file to the effect that the prevention of the defendant in the exercise of the right of the defence had been sought.

3.3. The continuation of the criminal prosecution against a person. The phrase "reasonable suspicion"

In the recent doctrine[5] drawn up on the New Code of Criminal Procedure, it was stated the opinion according to which the order of the carrying out of a further criminal prosecution against the suspect in the case in which the conditions provided by the article 77 and art. 305 (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure are fulfilled constitutes a positive procedural obligation of the body of criminal prosecution, and not a faculty of this one, being regulated in order to ensure an effective guarantee of the right to defence of the people accused in criminal proceedings. The precise determination of the moment of the formulation of an accusation in criminal matters (the notion of accusation in criminal matters signifying the official notification issued by an authority accusing a person of committing an offence, fact that attracts important repercussions on that person) is of particular importance because the respective person becomes the holder of rights and obligations at this point, having guaranteed the rights provided in art 6 of ECHR. It was shown next that the acquisition of the quality of suspect interferes with ex law, when the conditions provided by article 77 and art 305 (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure are fulfilled which impose the body of criminal prosecution on acknowledging the existence of a charge in criminal matters and to order the carrying out of the further criminal prosecution against the suspect and on bringing to the attention of the rights. The violation of the positive procedural obligation, by carrying out the criminal prosecution in rem beyond the moment when it could be made a charge in criminal matters in a reasonable way, may lead to a significant and substantial injury of the right of a fair trial for the defendant, such as to draw the incidence of the penalty of relative nullity provided in art 282 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, relating to act of process or the evidences managed after this moment, being essential for the retaining of the injury of process, being as after a further criminal prosecution in personam , the right to defence may have been affected in its essence by the impossibility of obtaining the re- administration of the evidences or the participation at other acts of process.

[3] Decizia penală nr. 242/3 decembrie 2012 a Înaltei Curți de Casație și Justiție, disponibilă pe www.juridice.ro;
[4] Încheierea penală nr. 345/CO/CP/2.09.2016 a Curții de Apel București, secția a II-a penală, nepublicată;
[5] M. Udroiu, Procedură penală, Partea specială, Ediția a 4-a, Editura C.H.Beck, p. 52.

It was also stated the opinion that the prolongation of the criminal prosecution in rem beyond the time when there are evidences to the effect of reasonable suspicion that a certain person committed the deed for which the penal prosecution was initiated is a procedural abuse.[6]

The European Court, in its jurisprudence[7] has stated that a person acquires the quality of suspect that draws the application of the guarantees provided for in the art. 6 ECHR, not from the moment in which the quality is notified to him,but from the moment in which they had plausible reasons to suspect the concerned person of committing the offence.

The European Court has stated that even at the time of the preceding acts, according to the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1968, the art guarantees were applicable 6 of the ECHR even if they were not provided for national law.

The European Court has shown that, at the time of the Acts prior to, according to the Code of penal procedure in 1968 was applicable to guarantees of Article 6 of the European Court for Human Rights in Strasbourg, even if there were laid down in national law.

It was shown in the case of Argintaru against Romania that the delay in the fulfilment of the obligation to provide further criminal prosecution against the suspect, and consequently, the extension of the placement of the person to whom there is a penal accusation in concreto apart from the penal trial, constitutes an infringement of the right fair trial.

The European Court has shown that even at the time of the fulfilment of the preceding acts, according to the Code of Criminal Procedure from 1998, the guarantees were applicable in art. 6 of ECHR, even if they were not provided in national law.[8]

In our opinion, this issue was, in principle, discovered in the recitals of the Decision no. 236/2016 of the Constitutional Court[9], by which, although the exception of unconstitutional of the provisions of art. 305 (1) and (3) of The Code of Criminal procedure were rejected as unfounded, it was held that "the interval of time that separates the moment of the beginning of the criminal prosecution in rem from the moment of the beginning of the criminal prosecution in personam is not strictly and expressly determined by the provisions of the Code of Penal Procedure." However, the criminal provision of process states that the prosecutor provides that the criminal prosecution should be further carried out to a person, when the existing dates and the evidences in question have effect in reasonable clues that this one has committed the deed for which the criminal prosecution has started. Thus, the prosecutor is obliged that, in the moment when there are reasonable clues that a person has committed the deed for which the criminal prosecution has started, to provide further criminal prosecution towards this person. This has the effect from the use of the legislator of the verb at imperative mood "provide", and not "may provide", so that it could be interpreted that there is a faculty of the prosecutor to postpone the time of the beginning of the criminal prosecution in personam until the necessary fulfilment of the probation for the beginning of the penal action and the direct order of this measure.

In principle, the existence of reasonable clues is concomitant with the formulation of an accusation in personam which has the valences of an accusation in criminal matters. However, there may be situations in which the two elements do not have a simultaneous existence. To the extent in which, in disagreement with the above provisions, the prosecutor does not comply with those requirements, then, in the case of issuing the bill of the indictment, the suspect has become a defendant and may submit to the censorship of the judge of preliminary chamber the examination of the legal administration of the evidences and the carrying out of the acts by the bodies of criminal prosecution, thus according to the art. 342 and art. 345 (1) and (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, in the filter procedure, the judge of preliminary chamber has the possibility to ascertain the nullity and to exclude the acts of criminal prosecution and the managed evidences with breaking the law which confers ,among other things, an effective right to defence.

The Court has noted in this respect that the provision of the art. 282 (1) of The Code of Criminal Procedure establish that breaking the legal provisions determine the nullity of the act when by the failure to

[6] Viorel Paşca, Principiul egalităţii armelor în procesul penal roman-O realitate sau o ficţiune, Revista Universul Juridic;
[7] Cauza Brusco contra Franţei, Hotărârea din 14 octombrie 2010, cauza Sobko împotriva Ucrainei;
[8] Curtea Europeană a Drepturilor Omului, cauza Argintaru contra Romîniei, decizia din 8 ianuarie 2013;
[9] Decizia CCR nr. 326/19 aprilie 2016, publicată în M.Of. nr. 426/7 iunie 2016;

comply with the legal requirements was brought a harm of the rights of the parties or of the main subjects of process that cannot be removed other than by the abolition of the act. Therefore, whenever all or most of the evidences from the criminal prosecution stage have been managed only during the criminal prosecution in rem , then the aspects of implementation of law with overlooking of the specific guarantees to the right to a fair trial can be called into question, such as the right of the suspect to be informed regarding the deed for which he is investigated and the legal classification of this one, the right to consult the file, under the law, to have a chosen lawyer or one of the office for cases of compulsory assistance, to propose the administration of evidences, to raise exceptions and to put conclusions, to make any other requests relating to the resolution of the civil and penal side of the case, to appeal to a mediator, in cases allowed by law, to be informed regarding his rights, or to the right to benefit from other rights stipulated by law. As long as depending on the particularities of each case it is proved the suspects/ defendants are deprived of the rights conferred by the Code of Criminal Procedure, being severely affected the right of defence during the criminal prosecution, then the evidences and the documents drawn up with the failure to comply with the legal requirements may be removed until the completion of the procedure of the preliminary chamber.

Towards the evolution of the jurisprudence of the European Court on the matter of the right to defence, towards the vision of the Constitutional Court on the fair interpretation of the provision of art 305 (1) and (3), the conclusion that is drawn up is that, in the event of ordering a further criminal prosecution against a person beyond the moment at which the body of criminal prosecution had to order in this respect in a reasonable way with the consequence of the lack of the suspect of the rights conferred by law, in particular that one to be able to assist, through a lawyer, at the interrogation of the parties, of procedural subjects, of witnesses, to be able to take part in carrying an expertise, etc., the compensatory in such situation would be the re-administration of the managed evidences in the criminal prosecution stage in rem or the removal from the appreciation of those evidences managed in the breach of the rights of the suspect.

Conclusions

Thus, to the question which is "the quantity" of evidences that can reasonably be managed in the criminal prosecution stage in rem, from the corroborated interpretation of the provisions of art 305 (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure and art 99 paragraph 3letter c of the ECHR, the answer is that, in the criminal prosecution stage in rem must not be administrated only those strictly necessary evidence to provide reasonable clues that a person committed the offence with which the body of criminal prosecution has been referred to, not being necessary to have evidences at the level of those who found the sentencing to court.

Under no circumstances at this stage may not be administrated all the evidences during the criminal prosecution, in such a case, the injury caused to the suspect being not only evident but also irremediable. In such a case, even the re-administration of the evidences can no longer constitute a remedy for the removing the injury, because in case of a contradiction of the evidences, there will be a tendency for the body of criminal prosecution to take into account those administrated at the stage in rem. Neither the re-administration of these evidences at the judicial research stage is a remedy, such as some courts have stated, because the progress of the proceedings in compliance with the procedural guarantees in the criminal prosecution stage is essential, being possible that on the conditions of the management of the evidences with the full respect of the right to defence, the result of the criminal prosecution should be other than that of a made research without compliance with those guarantees. On the other hand, the administration of the evidences in this manner sometimes deprives the defendant of the possibility to use the simplified procedure, because it is possible to wish to admit the deed but at the same time he may invoke the existence of certain mitigating legal circumstances, of some causes of non- immutability, for which in front of the court, legally it is no longer possible to request evidences.

References

- Nicolae Volonciu, „Tratat de procedură penală Vol I", ed. Paideia, 1993, p. 9;
- V. Dongoroz, Curs de procedură penală, București, 1942, p. 207.
- M. Udroiu, Procedură penală, Partea specială, Ediția a 4-a, Editura C.H.Beck, p. 52.
- Viorel Pașca, Principiul egalității armelor în procesul penal roman-O realitate sau o ficțiune, Revista Universul Juridic;
- Încheierea penală nr. 223/23 aprilie 2015 a Curții de Apel Cluj, disponibilă pe www.avocatura.com
- Decizia penală nr. 242/3 decembrie 2012 a Înaltei Curți de Casație și Justiție, disponibilă pe www.juridice.ro;
- Încheierea penală nr. 345/CO/CP/2.09.2016 a Curții de Apel București, secția a II-a penală, nepublicată;
- Cauza Brusco contra Franței, Hotărârea din 14 octombrie 2010, cauza Sobko împotriva Ucrainei;
- Curtea Europeană a Drepturilor Omului, cauza Argintaru contra Romîniei, decizia din 8 ianuarie 2013;
- Decizia CCR nr. 326/19 aprilie 2016, publicată în M.Of. nr. 426/7 iunie 2016;

REPLACING THE JUDICIAL CONTROL WITH THE PREVENTIVE ARREST

George Octavian NICOLAE

Abstract

In the practive of the courts, there are situations where, due to a violation of the obligations imposed by the measure of the judicial control or the case of the commission of new offenses, it is questionable to replace the judicial check with a heavier preventive measure, namely preventive arrest or home arrest.

The present study aims to adress the steps to be followed in this procedure and to analyze the relevant issues and incidents which may arise.

Keywords: preventive arrest, judicial control, criminal prosecution; European Convention on Human Rights; criminal law.

Introduction

The measure of judicial control is the least intrusive preventive measure, since it does not infringe upon the personal freedom.

The judicial control indeed interferes with the defendant's right to free movement, which is why we consider that the provisions of art. 2 of the Additional Protocol no. 4 to the European Convention on Human Rights are applicable, according to which: anyone who is lawfully on the territory of a state has the right to move freely and freely elect his residence; any person is free to leave any country, including his own; the exercise of these rights may not be subject to any restrictions other than those which, by law, are necessary measures in a democratic society, or fot the interest of national security, public security, public order, crime prevention, and others; the rights recognized in paragraph 1 may also, in certain specified areas, be subject to restrictions which, under the law, are justified by the public interest in a democratic society.

Content

According to art. 211 and art. 202 of the Criminal Procedure Code, in order to institute the measure of judicial control, there must be evidence to raise a reasonable suspicion that the defendant has committed an offense, the measure of judicial control must be proportionate to the seriousness of the accusation brought against the person concerned and necessary for the purpose of good unfolding of the proceedings, preventing the eviction of the defendant, preventing the commission of another offense, and if there is no reason to prevent the criminal proceedings.

While under judicial control, the defendant has to comply with the following obligations: to appear before the criminal investigative body, the preliminary chamber judge or the court, or as soon as he is called; to immediately inform the judicial authority which has taken the measure the change of adress; to appear before the police body designated with his supervision by the judicial body that ordered the measure, according to the program prepared by the police or whenever he is called.

The defendant may be the subject of, depending on the particularities of each case, other obligations: not to exceed a certain territorial limit, fixed by the judicial body, except with its prior consent; not to go to specific places established by the judicial body or to move only to the places set by it; to wear a permanent electronic surveillance system; not to return to the family home or to approach the injured party or members of his / her family, other participants to the offense, witnesses or experts or other persons specifically designated by the judicial body and not to communicate with them directly or indirectly; not to practice the profession, to do the job or not to carry out the activity in the exercise of which he has committed the deed; to periodically communicate the relevant information regarding his means of existence; to undergo control, care or medical treatment measures, particularly for detoxification purposes; not to attend sporting or cultural events or other public gatherings; not to drive specific vehicles established by the judicial authority; not to not use or to wear weapons; not to issue checks.

In order to ensure the predictability of the necessary conduct, the judicial body, which has taken the measure of judicial control, will specify in the act of taking the measure (ordinance or minute) what are the obligations that the defendant has to observe and will be reminded that in case of violation in bad faith of his obligations, that the measure of judicial control can be replaced by the measure of house arrest or the measure of preventive arrest.

According to art. 215 par. 7 Code of the Criminal Procedure, all throughout the duration of the measure, should the defendant infringe upon in bad faith his obligations or there is a reasonable suspicion that he intently committed a new crime for which criminal proceedings have been brought against him, the rights and liberties judge, preliminary chamber judge or court, at the request of the prosecutor or ex officio, order the replacement of this measure with house arrest or arrest, as provided by law.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: nicolae.georgeoctavian@yahoo.com).

Regarding the replacement of preventive measures, art. 242 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is applicable. A preventive measure is replaced ex officio or upon request, with a harder one, if the conditions provided by law for taking it and the evaluation of the concrete case and the conduct of the accused during trial, is established that the measure the harsher preventive measure is necessary to achieve the goal provided by art. 202 par. 1. According to art. 202 of the Criminal Procedure Code (C.p.p.), preventive measures, which include the arrest procedure, may be adopted if there is evidence or indications which point to the reasonable suspicion that a person has committed a crime and are necessary to ensure normal criminal proceedings, preventing the accused to skip trial or to prevent new crimes.

Any preventive measure must be proportionate to the seriousness of the accusation against the person to whom it is taken and necessary to achieve the aim pursued by its disposal.

In order to arrest an individual during criminal prosecution, reasonable suspicion should emerge from the evidence that the defendant perpetrated an offence and the conditions art. 223 letter. (a), (b), (c) or (d), Criminal Procedure Code, are met.

Thus, in order to fulfill the prerequisite condition for replacing the measure of judicial control with the measure of preventive arrest, it must be demonstrated that the defendant: either escaped or hid in the purpose of escaping from the criminal prosecution or trial, or did preparations of any kind for such acts; attempts to influence another participant in committing the offense, a witness or expert, or to destroy, alter, hide or evade material evidence or cause another to engage in such behavior; puts pressure on the injured person or tries to make a fraudulent deal with him; there is a reasonable suspicion that after criminal action has been initiated against him, he has comitted a new offense or is preparing a new offense.

However, in order for pre-trial detention, only a reasonable suspicion that the accused person has comitted an offence from the list mentioned in art. 223 paragraph (2) of C.p.p. is necessary, or that an offence punishable by law with 5 or more years of imprisonment be comitted.

Regarding the case of the measure of preventive arrest provided by art. 223 par. 1 lit. D C.p.p., we note that it contains two theses. The first sentence assumes the existence of a reasonable suspicion that the defendant intentionally or prataer-intentionally committed a new offense after the criminal proceedings had been initiated before him. Although the law does not provide, we consider that in this situation it should be both the initiation of criminal prosecution and the prosecution in persona, since it is only in these circumstances that a reasonable suspicion of committing a new offense committed by a particular person can be established.

The second thesis, referring to the fact that the defendant is preparing a criminal offense, refers to the execution or comitting acts of execution with no independent criminal meaning. If these preparatory acts were incriminated separately, either as separate crimes or as attempts, we would not consider the situation as preparations of new offenses, but as new offenses themselves.

The second situation provided by art. 223 par. 1 lit. D Cpp., regarding the preparation of a crime, was established by the New Criminal Procedure Code, and was not mentioned by the art. 148 par. 1 lit. D of the former Criminal Procedural Code of 1968.

This solution was imposed - the possibility of ordering the preventive arrest in the case of merely preparing to commit a new crime - because in this case the defendant has the intention to commit a new offense and the preventive measure is justified precisely to prevent such a risk of repetition of criminal behavior[1].

If the defendant mentioned in a preliminary statement that he has indeed tried to commit similar acts, it cannot be concluded that this arrest warrant is necessary in the absence of other data. This case of arrest does not take into account the situation in which the defendant also committed other criminal acts before the criminal action was initiated, but only when the criminal activity is prolonged in time, after the moment when there is evidence of the offense and the criminal action is in motion[2].

As the preparation of criminal acts is under discussion, in this second hypothesis of the case for preventive arrest, it would not be necessary to have any criminal prosecution commence. However, under such circumstances, the judicial authorities should use this case with caution, as it is necessary to establish the probability of a criminal offense committed by the defendant on the basis of the data and information presented, which may not be the same as establishing a presumption of guilt.

If the defendant does not commit an intentional crime and no criminal acts are reported, but the criminal investigating authorities have data regarding the risk of committing a new intentional offense, we consider that art. 223 par. 2 C.p.p Instanţa applicable.

Also, in case of committing a non intentional criminal offense after the criminal action has commenced, it should not be possible to order the preventive arrest in the case of the original offense, but only after the criminal action for the new offense is initiated, can the conditions for the admissibility of the arrest measure regarding art. 223 par. 2 C.p.p. be analyzed.

[1] Nicolae Volonciu – Noul Cod de Procedură Penală,editura Hamangiu, București 2014, pag. 506.
[2] M. Udroiu, Porcedură penală, Partea geerală, 2014, pag. 413.

From the procedural point of view, the arrest proposal will be formulated in the case in which the criminal action was already in motion and not in the new case. This should be done precisely in order to comply with the condition provided by art. 223 C.p.p., which refers to the existence of the defendant in question.

The doctrine has showed that[3] it is necessary to prove that the commission of the new crime or the carrying out of preparatory acts that have are not criminalised separately takes place after informing the defendant of his new quality. The need for preventive arrest stems not from committing concurrent offenses but from the unlawful conduct of the defendant who, although subject to judicial proceedings and is accused of committing a crime, is drawn to his attention to the procedural obligations under art. 108 par. 2 C.p.p., chooses to continue to pursue with perseverance an intentionally illicit, dangerous conduct for society.

Thus, the criminal procedural law provides for the possibility of replacing the preventive measure of judicial control with a heavier preventive measure, namely the measure of home arrest or preventive arrest.

However, due to inconsistencies between the legal texts, in the practice of the courts, difficulties have arisen regarding the uniform application of the legal provisions.

Thus, the source of the practical difficulties is the lack of correlation between Article 223 1 lett. D C.p.p. , which provides that the preventive arrest (as well as the replacement of a preventive non-custodial measure with preventive arrest) may be ordered when there is a reasonable suspicion that after the criminal proceedings have been initiated, the defendant intentionally committed a new offense or is preparing to commit an offense and Art. 215 par. 7 C.p.p. It provides that if during the judicial control there is a reasonable suspicion that the defendant intentionally committed a new offense for which the criminal action was initiated, it shall be necessary to replace the judicial control with the house arrest measure or the preventive arrest under the conditions provided by law.

Thus, this provision introduces an additional condition, namely that for the new intentional offense committed that the criminal action should be ordered. The phrase "under the conditions provided by law" refers to the general conditions for taking and replacing preventive measures, which, as we have seen above, do not require the prosecution of the criminal action for the new committed act.

As a consequence, we believe that Art. 215 par. 7 C.p.p., is a separate case of replacing the preventive non-custodial measure with a deprivation of liberty, which does not, however, limit the general rule in the matter, provided by art. 242 par. 3 C.p.p. in relation to art. 223 par. 1 and 2 C.p.p..

A different interpretation of these legal provisions would lead to unjust situations in which, in the event of a new intentional offense not covered by Art. 223 par. 2 C.p.p. and without having the criminal action set in motion, against a defendant who has no judicial control to be able to order the replacement of the measure and the taking of the measure of preventive arrest, as opposed to another who is under the control of the judiciary and not receive a replacement of the measure with that of the preventive arrest.

Another difficulty in judicial practice is represented by the way in which the relation between the situation of the preventive arrest, mentioned in art. 223 par. 1 lit. d C.p.p. and that provided by art. 223 par. 2 C.p.p.

According to art. 223 par. 2 C.p.p., the measure of preventive arrest can be taken if the evidence raise a suspicion that the defendant has committed one of the offenses referred to in para. 2 or another offense for which the law provides for a five-year or longer sentence and, on the basis of an assessment of the seriousness of the offense, the manner and circumstances of the offense, the entourage and environment in which the defendant originates, his criminal history and other circumstances, it is noted that his deprivation of liberty is necessary for the removal of the danger for the public order.

For a more accurate analysis, we will look at a case with practical implications.

Thus, there is a criminal case concerning a defendant sent to court under judicial control for committing the offense of disturbing the order and public peace, as stated in art. 371 Criminal Code, an offense not fulfilling the conditions of art. 223 par. 2 C.p.p.

During the measure of judicial control, the defendant carries out a new intentional offense by applying a punch to the injured person.

In regards to the legal classification, the second offence meets the constitutive elements of the offense mentioned by art. 193 par. 1 of the Criminal Code.

Due to the fact that the medical / legal certificate mentioning the existence of traumatic injuries was not issued in a timely manner, the prosecutor can only ask in regards to the original offense, that the measure of judicial control be replaced with the measure of preventive arrest, on the the grounds of art. 242 par. 3 C.p.p. in relation to art. 223 par. 1 lett. d C.p. and if the prosecution of the criminal action was initiated under art. 215 par. 7 C.p.p.

Assuming that this replacement proposal was admitted and that it was ordered to replace the measure of judicial control with the preventive arrest measure, is it possible that, in the second case, regarding the offense of commiting acts of violence mentioned in art. 193 alin 2 Criminal code (legal provision applicable only after the issuing of the medical certificate which stipulates the existence of a certain amount of days of medical care) to be requested in accordance to art. 223 par. 2 C.p.p. in order to arrest the same defendant. It would lead to two preventive measures against the same person for committing the same act of striking the injured person.

[3] Nicolae Volonciu, op cit., pag. 507.

In our opinion, in order to solve the problem, first it must be pointed out of all that the provisions of Art. 223 para. 1 lit. d C.p.p. and art. 223 par. 2 C.p.p. contain distinct theses of taking or replacing preventive measures.

Thus, the two cases for preventive arrest are not mutually exclusive because they are based on different legal bases.

The first, the one provided by art. 223 par. 1 lit. d. C.p.p., is meant to sanction the conduct of the defendant, who, although aware of the fact that he is under legal invesgation, commits a new offense, in disregarding the norms of cohabitation and the restrictions and exigencies of the initial preventive measure.

The second case of preventive arrest refers to the existence of a danger to public order. The protection of the public order is regarded as a pertinent and sufficient element for the deprivation of liberty of a person, if it is based on facts capable of showing that the release of the person would actually disrupt the public order. The concept of danger to the public order is a prediction, an appreciation of the defendant's future behavior. In some cases, the seriousness of the offense committed may be sufficient to outline the assessment that the defendant is dangerous to public order. In other situations, the criminal record can lead to the conviction that the defendant will commit a new offense.

Hence, unlike the first case of the preventive arrest measure, which sanctions the repetitive illicit conduct of the defendant, the second case seeks to protect society against defendants who present a real and concrete danger to public order.

This interpretation, we consider that it is circumscribed to the purpose of the norms under consideration, and it is not a double application of the preventive measures for the same act, because in its essence, the basis of taking the preventive arrest measure only in the second case, with regard to the first case, is based on the grounds of the misconduct of the defendant.

In support to this legal reasoning, the issue of a case that prevents the prosecutorial endeavour, such as the withdrawal of the criminal complaint by the injured person, may be dealt with.

Starting from this hypothesis, in the case in which the preventive arrest was ordered on the grounds of danger to public order, the measure would be revoked, since it involves a cause that prevented the continuation of the criminal proceedings.

On the other hand, in the case of replacing the judicial control with the measure of preventive arrest, we do not think we are in the case of revoking the preventive measure. As pointed out above, the measure has been replaced due to the defendant's conduct and not because of the legal characteristics of the offense.

3. Conclusions

Analyzing the legal provisions regarding the replacement of the measure of judicial control with the preventive arrest, it should be noted that the non-custodial preventive measure can be replaced by the preventive arrest measure if the conditions stipulated by the law are met (Article 223 paragraph 1, 2, C.p.p. ) and following the assessment of the concrete circumstances of the case and of the procedural conduct of a defendant, it is considered that the heavier preventive measure is necessary for achieving the goal provided by art. 202 par. 1 C.p.p..

References

- Ion Neagu, Mircea Damaschin, *Tratat de procedura penala. Partea generala. Partea speciala.*Editia a II-a, Bucuresti, EdituraUniversul Juridic, 2015;
- Nicolae Volonciu, Andreea Simona Uzlau (coordonatori), Noul Cod de procedura penala. Bucuresti, Editura Hamangiu, 2014;
- Mihail Udroiu (coordonator), Codul de procedura penala. Comentariu pe articole, Bucuresti, Editura C.H. Beck, 2016.
- Corneliu Birsan, Conventiaeuropeana a drepturiloromului, editia 2, editura C.H. Beck, Bucuresti;
- G. Antoniu, C. Bulai, Dictionar deDrept penal si procedura penala, editura Hamangiu, Bucuresti, 2001;
- Beatrice Ramascanu, Jurisprudenta CEDO in cauzele impotrivaRomaniei, editura Hamangiu, 2008.

THE PERSONS DEPRIVED OF LIBERTY, AS PASSIVE SUBJECT OF THE CRIMINAL EXECUTION LEGAL RELATIONSHIPS

Simona Cireșica OPRIȘAN[*]

Abstract

The study analyzes the behaviour of individuals deprived of their liberty both as an individual phenomenon and in relations established during the execution of custodial sentences. The impact of detention on these people is different, so their reactions are different. Isolation of society, loss or restriction of rights, separation from their families, subjection to a severe life regime, all perceived as a violation of his integrity as a human being.

The study also analyzes the conformism/discipline report, taking into account both personal factors and secondary (environmental) factors generating aggressive behaviours, circumstances that affect the psyche of a person deprived of liberty, lowering his tolerance to everything the authorities involve who consider them "malevolent entities" whose purpose is to punish the innocent, to destroy the prisoner's being by being subjected to ill-treatment or by applying disciplinary sanctions.

The study also focuses on the relationship between the person deprived of liberty and the restorative justice, the relationship between the offender, the victim, the criminal trial, the criminal sanction, the prison, in order to identify adequate remedies in order to recover the damage caused by the offense, as an alternative to the retributive penal system, focusing on the dialogue, on the negotiation, to enable offenders to assume active responsibility for their actions.

Keywords: the person deprived of liberty, passive subject, rights, disciplinary liability, reparatory justice

1. Introduction

The passive subject of the legal relationship of execution of the punishment or the other penalties of criminal law is represented by those categories of participants obliged to incur criminal liability.

In the usual language, the person (major or underage individual) executing a custodial sentence is inevitably named condemned, and a long period was considered to be so only because the law did not offer variants for the situation of persons in the execution of punishment. However, the new changes in our criminal justice system have imposed a differentiated treatment of these individuals according to the nature of the penal sanction applied: only punishments for the major people and and detention measures for the minor individuals, so that the terms used to indicate belonging to one category or another does not only reflect the teaching differentiation but, above all, the criminal treatment. The Government Decision no.157/10.03.2016 for the approval of the Regulation implementing Law no.254/2013 on the execution of sentences and deprivation of liberty ordered by the court during the criminal trial defines, in art.2, the term persons deprived of their liberty as the case may be, detained persons, arrested at home, preventive arrest, interned, convicted, and detained person who is the convicted person in custody or life imprisonment.

By introducing in the new Criminal Code the alternative measures of detention, a distinct legal value was granted to each of the three operations that the court usually carries out in the process of judicial individualization of punishments, namely, the determination of the punishment, its application and the order of its execution[1], distinction from the previous criminal code when the three operations represented a succession of phases that the court underwent in the process of judicial individualization of the punishment, since it could only pronounce punishments.

Therefore, the passive subjects of the criminal enforcement legal relationship are:

- convicted persons, major natural persons and legal persons sentenced to custodial or non-custodial sentences, as the case may be. From the point of view of the criminal procedural law nature, the application of the punishment is a procedural solution of conviction issued in solving the criminal action against the defendant, which results also from the provisions of art.404 paragraph 2, sentence I of the Criminal Procedure Code, according to which the court when the court orders the conviction, the device includes the principal punishment applied. Only at the end of this phase, the defendant acquires the status of a convicted person[2].
- the supervised persons, the major persons to whom the court applied the measure of giving up the punishment or postponing the punishment, the status of a convicted person is incompatible with the measure of the application of these measures.
- the underage individuals against whom only custodial measures (internment into an educational centre or detention centre) and non-custodial measures (civic training, supervision, weekend and daily assistance) can be taken,

[*] PhD, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (nsimona51@yahoo.com)

[1] I.Borlan, Amânarea aplicării pedepsei în teoria și practica dreptului penal, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, pp.41-45.

[2] I.Borlan, ibidem, p.43.

In the opinion of the author Petrache Zidaru[3], the convict, as a matter of law, is:

- is the natural person whose criminal behaviour has led the judiciary to impose his prison sentence;
- is the natural person for whom the prison regime has to appeal to all educational means and all forms of assistance available to society in the purpose of his re-socialisation;
- is the natural person who can only be deprived of his or her liberty and of the rights the restriction of which derives expressly and necessarily from the deprivation of liberty.
- is the natural person by whose conviction the society carries out a social-political act that aims to achieve one or more of the following objectives: the deserved retribution or punishment, the general and individual prevention, the protection of the population, the impossibility to do harm, and social rehabilitation.

2. Content

2.1. The person deprived of liberty as an individual phenomenon.

Deprivation of liberty is a situation with great resonance both in the life of the person who supports it and in that of his relatives or friends. Every person deprived of liberty leaves behind the individual universe replaced now by the detention room, the educational halls, the walk, the institutionalized life becoming second nature. The penitentiary is a total institution, as defined by Erving Goffman[4] a place where a large number of individuals of a similar status, separated from the rest of society for a considerable period of time carrying together a strictly defined life officially regulated by the institution. The detention impact[5] on a person deprived of his liberty is felt dramatically by limiting the space of movement and the organization of life, by restricting personal relationships, lack of information, authoritarian and strict regime, closed environment and monotonous activities. All these characteristics are perceived by the prisoner as a touch of his integrity as a human being. Most of the individuals deprived of their liberty[6] choose the way to execute the punishment or educational measure, in accordance with the rules imposed by the law and the administration of the detention facility, proving, at least formally, that they are on the road to reintegration, participating in the activities and programs penitentiary, participating in work, everything in order to execute the sentence and leave the penitentiary as soon as possible. Unfortunately, the involving of persons deprived of their liberty only in sports, religious activities, skills discovery, etc., is not sufficient for reintegration into society, even if they end with proposals for reward or obtaining credits. It is that necessary for each type of activity to be selected people with certain attributes that make them suitable for that activity and, even more importantly, that these activities to become useful[7] because the interest is not to keep him busy , but to give them a sense of usefulness, increase their self-esteem and, why not, also gain income from these skills.

Many of the detainees involved in the skills discovery only find out that they possess some abilities they did not even know or, even if they knew, could not practice them (painting, origami). Therefore, it may be more appropriate for activities and programs to be tailored to the specifics of the prison population from the place where they occur, and not vice versa. However, unfortunately, for various reasons, the penitentiary institution can not always provide for some detainees the right re-socialization programs, which would increase their chances of finding a post-release job, e.g. intensive care courses qualification in different trades. The issue of detainees, not necessarily of the young ones, but also of those who are at the age of professional maturity entering the prison without having previously a job or occupation and leave him, sometimes after years, just as skilled how they came, is another one that can increases the risk of relapse after leaving the penitentiary at term or conditional release. A lege ferenda proposal would be welcomed in this respect by which legal persons convicted to the penalty of the fine could benefit from the reduction if they organize training and retraining courses for the persons deprived of their liberty. But until such a legislative initiative, prisons are currently facing the prolonged inactivity of prisoners, boredom, lack of lucrative activities, the monotony of activities or the lack of continuity of these activities and programs, because during the summer many of these programs are suspended, caused by staff leave or school holidays, etc., situations that influence the behaviour of people deprived of their liberty, causing them to wish nothing more but waste time.

The pathogenic environment of the penitentiary is often reflected in the incapacity of some of the persons deprived of their liberty to integrate into the requirements of the rules imposed by the law and the internal regulation, claiming their dissatisfaction with everything that represents the penitentiary system (institution, director, staff, etc.) through all sorts of protests, demands, complaints, by resorting to food refusal, as extreme solutions to solve their problems. The discontents may be real but, most often, are the expression of exaggerated ambitions (“to show who he is”) or the belief that he is the victim of permanent

[3] Drept execuțional penal, Edit Press Mihaela S.R.L. Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997, p.110.

[4] Renowned american sociologist (1922-1982), which in one of his books , Asylums, published in 1961, makes a profound analysis of "total institutions" such as psychiatric hospitals, prisons, military barracks, ships, boarding schools, monasteries, homes for the blinds, sanatoriums, etc.

[5] I.M.Rusu, Drept execuțional penal, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p.258.

[6] I.Chiș, Drept execuțional penal, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p.276.

[7] E.g., enrolling in the "Literary Creation" activity of a detainee who had only two classes and who, not after a long time, abandoned his activity.

injustice because the administration of the penitentiary specifically targets him in decision-making (moving to another room, for example). The practices refusal of nourishment and self-injury (cutting on arms with sharp objects, blades, swallowing objects, etc.) are very common amongst detainees in order to capture the attention of staff or in order to get what they want, that is why that's are only \"demonstrative\", a game of refusal of nourishment (sometimes the refusal to eat lasts from one meal to the next) with the intention of impressing, to tease staff, and not with the intention of reaching to suicide, often justifying their behaviour through the existence of psychic illnesses they suffer or by the adverse effects of treatment they receive, making a practice of using the medical condition or invoking amnesia to justify nonconforming behaviour[8].

2.2. The person deprived of liberty in interpersonal relationships

The deprivation of liberty environment brings together people from different social backgrounds with different degrees of culture or understanding, and their long-term influence on the structure of the personality of persons deprived of their liberty cannot be ignored. The deprivation of liberty environment brings together people from different social backgrounds with different degrees of culture or understanding, and their long-term influence on the structure of the personality of persons deprived of their liberty cannot be ignored. At the institutional level, the person deprived of liberty is in the middle of two types of relations: a report detainee - the institution of the penitentiary, e.g., a report of compliance with the internal regulations, by Law No. 254/2013 on the execution of sentences and detention measures ordered by the court during the criminal trial, the Internal Regulations, the provisions of the director of the place of detention, and a relationship detainees-detainees and detainees - contact person (other persons deprived of liberty or personnel at the place of holding). The strong influence that the deprivation of liberty environment exerts on detainees personality generates and maintains the tensions between these persons, increasing exponentially the opportunities of occurrence of indiscipline acts, both vis-à-vis the staff of the detention facility and the other persons with whom it comes in contact.

The analysis of the conformism/indiscipline ratio should be made taking into account two categories of factors: main and secondary.

The primary factors category (personal) includes the person's bio-behavioural characteristics, namely increased verbal and physical aggressiveness, formed in childhood, amplified in adolescence, for the adult being, this behaviour to accompany him all his life, a low self-control (lowering self-esteem, envy, resentment), low levels of education, untreated mental illness, tobacco dependence, alcohol and/or drugs, provocative attitude, especially in the case of interned underage individuals, eager to impress entourage with the obvious intention generated conflicts between them and the staff in the penitentiary, avenging themselves precisely because "they embarrassing him in front of the other interned persons"[9]. The aggressive behaviours also affect relationship detainees- detainees, the violence ranging from verbal forms (offences, ironing) to extreme forms, harassment, corporal injuries, even killings, collective violence, "scores settling" on the background of some conflicts prior to the imprisonment, or caused by the tensions accumulated during detention.

In the secondary (environmental) factors category that generating the aggressive behaviours can be included those situations, external circumstances that affect the psyche of a person deprived of liberty, lowering his tolerance to everything that involves authority, and rejecting everything that comes from authority, courts of law, prison administration) which they consider to be "malevolent entities" whose only aims are to punish the innocent, to destroy the detainee by subjecting him to ill-treatment, by limiting his rights as a result of the imposition of regulations, or following the disciplinary sanctions applied.

Considered as the first cause of aggressive behaviour, overcrowding of detention places produces dramatic effects on at least three levels[10]:

a) at the level of the detainees there are dissatisfactions regarding the quality of the services to which they are entitled (food, medical assistance), there are acts of indiscipline, aggressions among persons deprived of liberty, as well as self-aggressions, increasing the smuggling among detainees, the feeling of boredom and of monotony;

at the level of staff working directly with the inmates increases the psychological overload, there are complaints about the working conditions caused by overtime and uncompensated time or unpaid or caused by the transfers of staff to other units;

b) at the management level, the management act is difficult because of the malfunctions in the dynamics of the institution,connected with the increasing demands of detainees in order to respect them the accommodation conditions, the management of the funds meant to carry out the capital repairs of the accommodation spaces, the prison security, to monitoring the incidents, the surveys, the assessments, the responsibilities, the establishing responsibilities takes most of the unit's command.

Psychologically, the changes in family life, such as divorce, the impossibility of seeing their children, the death of a parent, the material difficulties or the age of the relatives, the large distances from their home to the place of detention, the transfer to another penitentiary, the rejection of applications intimate visit, inappropriate medical care at the place of detention, disciplinary sanctions, etc., are just as many reasons for depression, accentuation of meaninglessness, of existential void, which sooner or later will turn in crisis of self-aggression or aggressions on other prisoners (hetero-aggressions, on staff or on property of the penitentiary (the destroying of windows, furniture, etc.).

[8] The Closing of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty from Braila Penitentiary nr.315/07.08.2018 (unpublished).
[9] The Closing of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty from Braila Tichilești Detention Center, nr.9/17.05.2018 (unpublished).
[10] Gh.Florian, Fenomenologie penitenciară, Oscar Print Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006, p.99.

Another form of aggression is instrumental[11], which manifests itself in the form of individual or group conflict, being a desire to stake it is necessary "in the territory" or the desire to have the right to the best bed. The typical expression of the verbal and physical aggression is expressed towards those who are convicted of felonies openly repudiated even carceral environment such as incest, child rape, the murder of children, the parents of his wife. Aggressiveness is manifested through slavery, consisting in the use of the inmates to other prisoners for housework and other activities demeaning.

The paradox is that in a full violence universe and opposition, there is also the normality of interpersonal relationships that functions as a "defense system" against persons deprived of liberty recognized as having non-conforming behaviours that tend to break the cohesion of a group adapted to institutionalized life, sanctioning these attitudes by the vehemently rejected refusal to accommodate such persons in that space for fear of being assimilated to such behaviour.

2.3. The system of rights of persons deprived of their liberty.

During the execution of criminal sanctions, the participants in social relations emerging within the framework of the criminal enforcement legal report (the state, through its specialized bodies, and the persons under a criminal or non-custodial sanction) have a special legal status, e.g., a total of rights and specific obligations arising from the particularities of the legal relationship in question. Article 6 of the Law no.253/2013 on the execution of sentences and non-custodial measures provides that non-custodial punishments and non-custodial educational measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings are enforced under conditions that ensure compliance rights and fundamental freedoms, with the inherent limitations of the nature and content of these punishments and measures.

Regarding persons deprived of their liberty, Article 7 of the Law no.254 / 2013 on the execution of sentences and deprivation of liberty ordered by the court during the criminal trial, in connection with the exercise of rights, extends the scope of correlative rights and obligations beyond those which results from the condition of a person deprived of his liberty, the law stipulating that inmates shall exercise all the civil and political rights except those taken away from them in compliance with the law by the decision sentencing them, as well as those rights that cannot be exercised or are limited inherently by the status of being imprisoned or for reasons related to the safety of the prison facilities. This means that the legal status of the person deprived of liberty (convicted persons serving the prison sentences, persons in a custodial educational measure, the person in remanding custody) reflects a duality of legal relations:

- criminal execution legal relationships specific to persons deprived of their liberty because their legal status involves a certain restriction of the rights of individuals but the exercise of rights and freedoms can not be subject to restrictions other than those provided by law,
- and another of civil law, as the owner of patrimonial or non-patrimonial rights whose violation allows its holder to obtain the restoration of the right through a civil trial.

I. In terms of the law regarding the execution of the punishments and of the custodial measures, the persons serving a custodial sentence are and remain human beings. Like all human beings, like citizens with the rights consecrated by the Romanian Constitution, the persons deprived of liberty have rights, but also obligations because the penitentiary it operates under the law[12]. At the admission, all prisoners receive information about their rights, duties and disciplinary misconduct, but also about the rewards that can be granted to. If the person sentenced does not speak or understand the Romanian language, the prison administration takes all necessary measures to inform them in their native language.

The institution of the rights of persons serving prison sentences recognizes, in chapter V of Law no.254/2013, between art. 56-80, the right to express their opinions and religious beliefs (art.58), to information (art.59, to confidential and professional record access (art.60), to legal advice (art.62), to correspondence (art.63), to telephone calls (art.65), to online communication (art.66), to exercise and recreation (art.67), to be informed of the death or serious illness of any near relative (art.68), to intimate visit (art.69), to receive visits and goods (art.70), to proper health care (art.71), to a medical examination (art.72), to specialised medical care (art.73), diplomatic assistance for foreign nationals (art.74), to marriage (art.75), to vote (art.76), to rest day (art.77), to work (art.78), to education (art.79), to allocation and accommodation (art.80).

Therefore, as stated in the doctrine[13], we are dealing with a criminal law enforcement report, in which the prison administration has a negative obligation to do nothing that could undermine the rights of the persons detained, and the positive obligation of to ensure that the rights of persons deprived of their liberty are respected. Persons deprived of their liberty also have the obligation to observe the rules of internal order and to execute the custodial sentence or measure. The compliance of the rights of the persons deprived of their liberty is ensured by the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty. Against the measures regarding the exercise of the rights provided by the present law taken by the administration of the penitentiary, the inmates may file a complaint within 10 days from the date when they became aware of the measure, according to art. 56 of Law no.254/2013 regarding the execution of sentences and custodial measures ordered by the court during the criminal trial.

[11] M.I.Rusu, op.cit.,p.267.

[12] I.Chiş, Al.B.Chiş, op.cit., p.359.

[13] A.Ciobanu, T.Manea, E.Lazăr, D.Pârgaru, Legea nr.254/2013 privind executarea pedepselor şi a măsurilor privative de libertate dispuse de organele judiciare în cursul procesului penal, comentată şi adnotată, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.173.

II. From the point of view of the legal relationship of civil law, the person deprived of liberty is the owner of patrimonial or non-patrimonial subjective rights, whose violation allow their holders to obtain the restoration of the right through the civil trial. In a concise formulation, the Civil Code, in Article 25 paragraph 2, defines the natural person in the following terms: "The natural person is the human being, viewed individually as the holder of civil rights and obligations".

Every human being is a subject of law. For a person to be able to be part of the legal relationship, she must have legal capacity, that is the general and abstract ability to have rights and obligations. By subject of law, we understand the person who can exercise multiple prerogatives and, in particular, subjective rights. The subject of law is nothing more than the person represented in his legal position, equally designating as both the participant in legal relations - the holder of rights and obligations - and the vocation of the holder to participate in such relations, materialized in the ability to value the rights and obligations that are recognized and imposed. A human being is not necessarily a subject of law, he becomes so only if the positive right attributes that quality[14]. Therefore, a person deprived of liberty may be a party not only in the civil legal relations but also in legal relationships of another nature as a subject of labour law, tax law, inheritance law, etc.
However, the capacity of persons deprived of their liberty to be subject of law and to participate in legal life has not always been recognized in legal systems. A legal deprivation of rights in the middle of the nineteenth century was civil death (deminutio capitis), which usually results from a criminal conviction (life imprisonment) or voluntarily from religious professions (professio religiosa). The civilian deaths, living beings, were dead for the world, they were no longer subject of law. The one who has been convicted of hard work or who has dedicated himself to monastic life was considered dead and therefore his inheritance was declared open, the marriage was free and all civil or political rights were lost[15].

The current legal provision regarding the individual are spread in various normative acts, starting with the Constitution of Romania (art.16, art.25, art.49, etc.) provisions that shall be interpreted and applied in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights , with the pacts and other treaties to which Romania is a party, in the Civil Code, 1st Book, About Persons, art. 25-257, in 2nd Book, About the Family, art.258-534, in Government Emergency Ordinance no.97/2005 on the registration, domicile, residence and identity papers of the Romanian citizens[16], Law no.14/2018 on the approval of Government Emergency Ordinance no.33/2016 for amending and completing some normative acts regarding the civil status documents and the identity documents of the Romanian citizens[17], Law no.272 / 2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child[18].

A premiere in Romanian civil law is Article 58[19] with the marginal title The rights of personality , rights which should not be confused with the debt rights or the personal rights (iura in persona aliena), whose achievement requires the support of the passive subject, forced to procure an active subject or refrain from anything that they could have done in the absence of its legal commitment, nor with real rights (iura in recorporali) or intellectual property rights (iura in reincorporali) which confer on their holder prerogatives that are directly exercised over tangible non- tangible goods. According to Article 58 of the Civil Code, any person has the right to life, health, physical and mental integrity, honour and reputation, the right to respect for private life, and the right to his/ her own image. These rights are not transferable. Furthermore, at art. 60, civil law recognizes the right of the individual to dispose of himself, unless he violates the rights and freedoms of others, public order or good morals.

Deprivation of liberty does not mean deprivation of dignity, therefore, as any natural person, the person deprived of liberty enjoys legal protection provided by civil law through the defensive means provided by art.253 of the Civil Code[20], by way of reparation action

[14] O.Ungureanu, C.Munteanu, Drept civil. Persoanele în reglementarea noului cod civil, Ediția a 2 a revizuită și adăugită, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, pp.4-6.

[15] ibidem

[16] Published in Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.719 of October 12th, 2011.

[17] Published in Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.50 of January 21th, 2018.

[18] Published in Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.557 of June 23th , 2012.

[19] Superior Council of Magistracy, National Institute of Magistracy, The Conference of the New Civil Code, available online on http://www.inm-lex.ro/NCC/doc/BrosuraNoulCodCivil.pdf, pp.105-109, consulted on 11/27/2018, 06:07AM.

[20] Art.253 Civil code, Means of defence: (1) The natural person whose non-patrimonial rights have been violated or threatened may request the court at any time:

brought in the court, in reparation both material and moral damage, the difference between these types of actions is that, while the former is open to the victim from the moment she suffered an unlawful harm to her personality, the repressive action requires proof of guilt. Thus, the petitioner's claim[21] for 150.000 euros from the penitentiary administration was dismissed on the ground that the amount claimed as moral damages for the violation of more detainees' rights cannot be granted by the judge of surveillance of the deprivation of liberty, but only by the court because there is need for adequate evidence to enable the court to find criteria for assessing its extent, since the court's free expression is not sufficient, based on the degree of it perceives the psychic universe of each person.

Protecting the rights of personality often intersect with press freedom and the right to inform the public. The European Court of Human Rights[22] decided that the freedom of the press is so important that it includes a possible dose of exaggeration or even provocation, and that is why it must promote debates instead of the "sensational journalism"[23].We refer to the situation of persons deprived of their liberty who works on public domain of the state and who, without their consent, have been photographed carrying out this activity, the photos accompanying articles in the press concerning their status of being deprived of their liberty or when they are filmed or photographed at the entrance to the buildings of the prosecutor's offices, the courts or the police.

2.4. Disciplinary liability of persons deprived of their liberty - a form of legal liability specific to the execution of punishments law.

As we have seen in previous explanations of the content of the criminal execution legal relationships, this content is made up of the totality of the rights and obligations of the subjects involved in the legal relationship of criminal execution. The subjects of the legal relationship always appear as holders of rights and obligations and behave according to the position of each of the right or obligation holder, the current legal doctrine rejecting the idea of the existence of rights without obligations. Upon the inmate's admission to the detention facility, the person deprived of his liberty is informed of his rights and obligations, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law to be applied in the event of misconduct and of the remedy against the disciplinary sanction applied.

The disciplinary misconduct is the deed in connection with the execution of the punishment, of the custodial, educational measures or of the preventive arrest which consists in an action (though the law prohibits) or in an inaction (although the law imposes) committed with guilt by the person deprived of liberty, by which he violated the legal norms, the internal order, the orders and the legal provisions given by the management of the place of detention in connection with the execution. The disciplinary offence is, therefore, the necessary and sufficient condition, the only basis of disciplinary liability, which is expressed by the application of disciplinary measures.

Disciplinary liability of the inmates is a form of legal liability, a specific institution for the enforcement of criminal sanctions and measures involving the deprivation of liberty, which derives from the content of the legal relationship of criminal execution and which is achieved by applying of disciplinary measures by the competent bodies (the administration of the place of detention - through the discipline commission for the persons deprived of their liberty) of appropriate sanctions.

Disciplinary liability of persons deprived of their liberty is characterized by the following features:

a) is engaged only in acts which, according to the law, are considered disciplinary misconduct;
b) is engaged only in the case of committed with guilty of the disciplinary misconduct - a conscious act by which the person deprived of liberty is aware that his deed is an act not in accordance with the law, with the internal order or the administrative decisions (e.g., the refusal of a person to comply with binding decisions adopted by the administration of the place of detention or the refusal to undergo non-invasive testing of the body). Law no.254 /2013 on the execution of sentences and deprivation of liberty ordered by the court during the criminal trial classifies the obligations of the persons deprived of their liberty in two categories:

1. positive obligations, which imply an action, e.g., to obey. ... to comply ... to comply with the provisions of Art.81, letter a) -l), and

a) prohibiting the commission of the illicit acts, if is imminent;
b) the cessation of violation and banning it for the future, if it last;
c) establishing the unlawfulness of the offence, if the disorder that has occured subsists;
(2) By way of exception to the provisions of paragraph (1), in the case of violation of non-patrimonial rights through exercise of the right to freedom of speech, the court may only order the measures provided for in para. (1) letter b) şi c).
(3) At the same time, the person who has suffered a violation of such rights may require to the court to oblige the perpetrator to carry out any measures deemed necessary by the court to achieve the restoration of the right attained, such as:
a) to order to the perpetrator to publish the criminal sentence on his expense;
b) any other measures deemed necessary for the cessation of the unlawful act or for the repair of the damage caused.
(4) The injured party may also claim damages or, as the case may be, patrimonial reparation for the damage caused to him by the author of the prejudicial act. In these cases, the right to action is subject to extinctive prescription.

[21] The closing of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of libertyof Braila penitentiary no.373/28.09.2018 (unpublished).

[22] The European Court of Human Rights judgment in the case of Toma c.României, (Cererea nr. 42716/02), Ageyevy v. Russia (Cererea no. 7075/10), Godlevskiy v. Russia (Cererea no. 14888/03).

[23] O.Ungureanu, C.Munteanu, op.cit., p.77.

2. negative obligations, which imply abstinence, prohibitions, e.g., the obligation not to do, provided in Art.82, letter a)-y): exercise of acts of violence; organizing, supporting, participating in group violence actions that could jeopardize the order, discipline and safety of the penitentiary; introducing into the penitentiary, the production, possession, sale or consumption of narcotics, alcoholic beverages or toxic substances; instigating others to commit disciplinary misconduct, the refusal of a person to comply with binding decisions adopted by the administration of the place of detention, the refusal to undergo non-invasive testing of the body, etc.

c) is strictly personal, and no responsibility for the deed of another person or collective liability;
d) is engaged only once for committing a deed or behaviour, a person deprived of liberty shall never be punished twice for the same deed or behaviour (ne bis in idem);
e) the presence of a causal link between the action and the specific result as well as a harmful result;
f) is a form of independent liability to all other forms of legal liability.

The autonomy of disciplinary responsibility is manifested by the fact that it's triggering is independent of producing any material damage. Disciplinary liability coexists with material liability, criminal liability, etc. Thus, the criminal liability, even material, would be applied in parallel with disciplinary liability, as long the criminal liability includes the constitutive elements of a crime (destruction, physical violence on other persons, the introduction of prohibited goods into the penitentiary, etc.).

In practice, however, there are cases where, although the act seems to fulfil the conditions of disciplinary misconduct, the certain specific circumstances existing at the time of its commission, they lead to the conclusion that, in fact, the author's conduct is not illicit and that liability will be removed. Thus, the deed of the person deprived of his liberty to retain, after testing, the packaging of the rapid test of the use of prohibited substances to prove the test was carried out with the one year test validity period expired, does not constitute the disciplinary misconduct provided by art.82 of the Law no.254/2013, consisting of the stealing or destruction of goods or values from the workplace or belonging to the administration of penitentiary, staff, visitors, as well as goods belonging to other persons, including those convicted, misbehaviour for which it was sanctioned, because, after unsealing and use, both the packaging and the test are no longer goods belonging to the penitentiary since once disposable, they are discarded after use, so that the judge of surveillance. of deprived of liberty admitted the person's deprived of his liberty complaint and the disciplinary sanction was annulled on grounds of illegality[24]. In another situation[25], the de facto error was held by the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty as a cause of exoneration, situation in which a person of Albanian nationality, arriving by transfer from another penitentiary, even with a few hours before being sanctioned, because, in the courtyard, walking, he kindly offered a cigarette to another prisoner in the refusal of nourishment room, a person who asked him if he could give him a cigarette, but without these two people knowing each other and without the person sanctioned knowing that the person was the refusal room. In so doing, the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty admitted the petitioner's complaint and annulled the disciplinary sanction applied for committing the disciplinary misconduct consisting of the introduction into the penitentiary, the procurement, manufacture, possession, exchange, receipt, use or transmission of weapons, explosives, objects and substances which jeopardize the security of the penitentiary, missions or persons, money, medicines, mobile phones, accessories of mobile phones, goods or other values under conditions other than those permitted Article 82, letter j of Law no. 254/2013, motivated by the fact that a detainee arrived a few hours before the incident did not have time to know the architecture of the penitentiary where he was, and the petitioner of Albanian nationality barely understand the Romanian language, was reading and expresses himself hardly in this language.

2.5.The private person of liberty and restorative justice.

The concept of restorative justice[26] offers a new way of approaching and understanding all the concepts that criminal law professionals bearing in mind: offence, offender, the victim, criminal trial, criminal sanction, imprisonment, etc. Restorative justice seeks to balance the victim's and the community's problems, as well as the need for the social reintegration of the offender, to assist the victim in the process of recovery and to grant all parties the right to be present and to engage actively in justice, to repair the damages caused by committing the offence, based on an approach involving not only the parties but also the community in general, in close connection with the specialized institutions in the field. Appeared in North America in the 1970s[27], this criminal philosophy is based on

[24] The closing of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty of Braila penitentiary no.261/13.07.2018 (unpublished).
[25] The closing of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty of Braila penitentiary no.332/29.08.2018 (unpublished)
[26] See details on the concept of restorative justice online on https://legeaz.net/dictionar-juridic/justitie-restaurativa. Consulted on 15.08.2018, 11:01 hour.
[27] The term of restorative justice comes from english, which demonstrates the Anglo-Saxon origins of the concept that applied practically for the first time in 1974 when two canadians, Mark Yantzi and Dave Worth, asked a judge in Kitchener, Ontario, to allow them to try a different approach in the justice intervention on two young criminals arrested for the destruction of goods. The idea was to allow the victim and the offender to play the main role in deciding on the most appropriate method of responding to the harm produced. Apud Elena Bedros in the article Conceptul de justiție restaurativă și legătura acestuia cu tendințele moderne de dezvoltare a procesului penal (The concept of programs aimed at reconciling the victim with the offender and identifying appropriate solutions for repairing the damage caused by committing the offence, developing as an alternative to the retributive criminal justice system.

In 1996, the British criminologist, Tony Marshall[28], gave the world a definition of the concept of restorative justice, a definition recognized as valid for the entire world movement in this field: restorative justice is a process whereby parties with a stake in a specific offence collectively resolve how to deal with the aftermath of the offence and its implications for the future.

From the perspective of international documents[29], the interest of the specialists in the implementation of the ideas of restorative justice in the judicial practice of more and more states in the world, as well as the introduction of restorative practices that correspond to high methodological requirements, but which also take into account the particularities of each state, in developing international documents on the basic principles of restorative justice in criminal matters.

One of the basic international documents in the field of restorative justice is ECOSOC Resolution 2002/12 on Basic principles on the use of restorative justice programmes in criminal matters adopted at the 37th plenary session of the United Nations Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) on 24 July 2002, which in Article 2 of the Resolution of the Resolution defines the restorative process means any process in which the victim and the offender, and, where appropriate, any other individuals or community members affected by a crime, participate together actively in the resolution of matters arising from the crime, generally with the help of a facilitator. Restorative processes may include mediation, conciliation, conferencing and sentencing circles. The same document defines the restorative outcome as a means an agreement reached as a result of a restorative process. Restorative outcomes[30] include responses and programmes such as reparation, restitution and community service, aimed at meeting the individual and collective needs and responsibilities of the parties and achieving the reintegration of the victim and the offender. The model of restorative justice was one of the topics addressed at United Nations congresses, such as at the Eleventh United Nations Congress on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice- Bangkok, Thailand, 18-25 April 2005, and the Twelfth UN Congress on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice- Salvador, Brazil, 12 – 19 April 2010. The works of both congresses focused on the need to reform the criminal justice system and to implement the model of restorative justice as an alternative to the traditional criminal justice system, in order to avoid the negative effects of imprisonment, in order to reduce the workload of courts, emphasizing the need for to reinforce the alternatives to imprisonment, which may consist of community service, restorative justice, electronic surveillance, and the need to support rehabilitation and reintegration programs, including those aimed at correcting criminal behaviour, alongside educational and vocational training for convicts[31]. The approach and interpretation of the concept of restorative justice was consecrated on the European continent[32] as well because "those who are most vulnerable or who find themselves in particularly exposed situations, such as persons subjected to repeated violence in close relationships, victims of gender-based violence, or persons who fall victim to other types of crimes in a Member State of which they are not nationals or residents, are in need of special support and legal protection".

Emphasizing, as a priority, that the victims of crime should be protected from secondary and repeat victimisation, from intimidation and from retaliation, should receive appropriate support to facilitate their recovery and should be provided with sufficient access to justice, Art.12 of the Directive 2012/29/EU[33] of the European Parliament and of the Council of 25 October 2012 establishing minimum standards on the rights, support and protection of victims of crime, and replacing Council Framework Decision 2001/220/JHA, provides that member states shall take measures to safeguard the victim from secondary and repeat victimisation, from intimidation and from retaliation, to be applied when providing any restorative justice services, such as the victim's free and informed consent, which may be withdrawn at any time; providing to the victim of the fully and unbiased information about that process and the potential outcomes as well as information about the procedures for supervising the implementation of any agreement; the acknowledgement by the offender the basic facts of the case; any agreement arrived at voluntarily may be taken into account in any further criminal proceedings restorative justice and its connection with modern trends in the development of criminal trial),p.39,available online on: http://www.legeasiviata.in.ua/archive/2014/6/8.pdf, Consulted on 15.08.2018, 17:51hour.

[28] T.Marshall, Restorative justice: an overview, p.8, available online on: http://www.antoniocasella.eu/restorative/Marshall_1999-b.pdf. Consulted on 15.08.2018, 18:58 hour.

[29] National Institute of Criminology, Restorative justice programmes in the contemporary world (documentary analysis),2005, p.11,available online on http://criminologie.org.ro/wp-content/uploads/2015/08/Programe-de-justitie-restaurativa-in-lumea-contemporana-Studiu.pdf, consulted on16.08.2018, 16:26 hour.

[30] I.M.Rusu, op.cit., p.417.

[31] E.Bedros, Conceptul de justiţie restaurativă şi legătura acestuia cu tendinţele moderne de dezvoltare a procesului penal (The concept of restorative justice and its connection with modern trends in the development of criminal trial), p.39, available online on http://www.legeasiviata.in.ua/archive/2014/6/8.pdf. Consulted on 16.08.2018, 19:17 hour.

[32] Art.2.3.4 The Stockholm programme — an open and secure europe serving and protecting citizens (2010/C 115/01), , document consulted on 17.08.2018, 09:00 hour, available online: https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/?uri=celex:52010XG0504(01).

[33] Published in Official Journal of the European Union L 315/14.11.2012, available online on http://data.europa.eu/eli/dir/2012/29/oj.

and the discussions in restorative justice processes that are not conducted in public are confidential and are not subsequently disclosed, except with the agreement of the parties or as required by national law due to an overriding public interest. In this spirit, as the terminology of "restorative justice" proliferates across the globe[34], emphasizing the benefits of restorative justice, as well as the limitations that characterize traditional approaches to criminal justice, considering the provisions of the Directive 2012/29/EU, Recommendation CM/Rec(2018)8 concerning restorative justice in criminal matters[35] updated the list of international documents and agreements taken into account and placed greater emphasis on restorative justice principles and the recent developments in research evidence, adding timely to the growing number of international instruments working on the use and evolution of justice restorative. The Recommendation reflects the view that restorative justice should be regulated only to the extent necessary and that restorative justice services should be given independence and autonomy in performing their duties. Also, the Recommendation ask the member States to develop the capacity to deliver restorative justice in all geographical areas in their jurisdictions, with respect to all offences, and at all stages of their criminal justice processes.

In the Romanian criminal justice system, most part of the Directive 2012/29/EU has already been transposed, in particular through the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code, and Law no. 211/2004[36] on certain measures to ensure the protection of victims of the offence.

But there are also a number of provisions of the directive that require adaptation to internal legislation by creating a legislative framework to modify and supplement, e.g., Law no.211/2004 as well as Law no.192/2006[37] on mediation and organization of mediator profession. By the Law no.97/2018[38] on certain measures for the protection of victims of crime, have been transposed into our national legislation art.3 paragraph (3), art.4 paragraph (1) letter i) and j), art.5, par. (1) and (3), Article 12 (1) (c) and Article 19 (2) of Directive 2012/29 / EU to ensure that victims are treated with respect and to allows them to take informed decisions about their rights as well as their participation in the mediation procedure. These provisions must be correlated with the provisions of the of Criminal Code Procedure, which in Article 16, paragraph 1, letter g (concluding a mediation agreement is one of the cases preventing the to initiate both the prosecution and the trial by a court in criminal proceedings, art.23 para.1 mediation and recognition of civil claims), art.81, par.1, lit.i (right of the injured party to appeal to a mediator), art.83 para.1 letter g (the right of the defendant to call a mediator) art.108 paragraph 4 (communication of rights and obligations), art. 111 paragraph 1, lit.b (hearing of the injured party), art.313 paragraph 3 (mediation is one of the cases of suspension of criminal prosecution), art. 318 paragraph 4 (submission by the prosecutor to the court of the agreement for the recognition of guilt- guilty plea, accompanied by the transaction or the mediation agreement criminal prosecution), art. 486 (solving the civil action) recognize both the injured party and the defendant the right to appeal to a mediator in the cases provided by the law. By forming the "triad victim-criminal-community"[39], the new criminal philosophy differs from the traditional justice in that the restorative justice focuses on reparation of the damage caused by the offence, while the traditional one focuses on punishing a crime; then, restorative justice is characterized by dialogue and negotiation between the parties, while traditional justice is based on the principle of contradictoriality, and, thirdly, restorative justice requires community members or organizations to play an active role, to assume responsibility for both sanctioning and social reintegration of offenders, while for traditional justice, the "community" is represented by the state[40]. The mediation in the criminal proceeding as an alternative method of resolving conflicts applies both to the criminal and to the civil side of the criminal trial. In the criminal area of the trial, the mediation provisions apply only to cases of offences for which, according by the law, the withdrawal of the previous complaint or reconciliation removes the criminal liability[41]. The law does not limit, in relation to the type of offense committed, the possibility call a mediator for solving of the civil aspect of the case, thus recognizing the right to call a mediator for solving the civil aspect [34] Commentary to Recommendation CM/Rec(2018)8 of the Committee of Ministers to member States, available online on https://search.coe.int/cm/Pages/result_details.aspx?ObjectId=09000016808cdc8a, consulted on 26.02.2019, 18:35 hour.

[35] Adopted by the Commitee of Ministers on 3 October 2018 at the 1326th meeting of the Ministers' Deputies.

[36] Published in Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.505 June 4th 2004.

[37] Published in Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.441 May 22th 2006, with subsequent amendments.

[38] Published in Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.376 May 2nd 2018.

[39] M.I.Rusu, op.cit., p.416.

[40] K. Daly, Revisiting the Relationship between Retributive and Restorative Justice, p.6, To appear in Restorative Justice: From Philosophy to Practice, edited by Heather Strang and John Braithwaite, Australian National University. Aldershot:Dartmouth(2000), consulted on 16.08.2018, 10:53 AM, available online on https://www.griffith.edu.au/data/assets/pdf_file/0028/223759/2001-Daly-Revisiting-the-relationship-pre-print.pdf, [41] Art.II para.2, thesis II by the Law no.97/2018 on certain measures for the protection of victims of crime, the conclusion of a mediation agreement in the criminal area, according to the present law, might take place until the court notification has been read . By the Decision no.397/June15th 2016, the Constitutional Court of Romania, called to decide over the unconstitutionality of the provisions of art.16 par. (1) letter g) of the final thesis of the Criminal Procedure Code and of art.67 of the Law no.192/2006 on the mediation and organization of the profession of mediator, admitted the exception of unconstitutionality and established that these provisions are constitutional insofar as the mediation agreement with regard to the offences for which reconciliation can take place until the court notification has been read.

of any criminal case. However, the exercise of this right may be restricted in certain situations, such as the taking of a preventive measure against the defendant which implies, inter alia, the prohibition of approaching and communicating directly with the injured person or the reasonable suspicion that the defendant is trying to achieve a understands fraudulently with it. However, the parties to the criminal conflict, both on the criminal and the civil side, may givespecial empowerment to another person to conclude the mediation contract, thus allowing the possibility of avoiding direct contact between the the subjects of the offence[42.]

3. Conclusions

The execution of criminal penalties involving deprivation of liberty is not just a mere administrative problem, but a legal issue governed by law. It has been said at some point that the detainee will be resocialized only if he really wants it, true indeed, if we look at the criminal persistence reflected in a long list of crimes committed by some of the persons deprived of liberty. During the execution of punishments and detention measures, most of the persons deprived of their liberty choose the way of complying with the requirements of the law and those of the administration of the place of detention, at least formally proving that they are on the road to reintegration.

Reintegration into society means not only returning to the free world, but also the assumption of the result of the crime by repairing the harm produced as a result of its commission, as well as changing the mentality regarding the importance of the social values to be defended.

The issue of maximum actuality remains that of the risk of recidivism due to the lack of a job. The lack of a professional qualification, the lack of studies, the lack of interest of persons deprived of their liberty from the activities carried out at the place of detention, and the habit of persons deprived of their liberty to live in crime (theft, robbery, deception, etc.) several causes that dramatically reduce the chances of community integration, with the risk of transforming the person deprived of liberty into a state-maintained ("scholar") state.

Taking recovery measures for prisoners under the custody of the penitentiary system is an essential prerequisite for successful social intervention to facilitate social reintegration and prevent relapse. The purpose of preventive measures and the formative function of educational measures and custodial sentences is highlighted as a priority and contributes significantly to increasing community safety by improving education, psychological assistance and social assistance provided to people deprived of their liberty and by raising awareness and raising awareness of social reintegration issues of persons deprived of their liberty. The expected outcome is to prepare people deprived of their liberty from an educational, psychological and social perspective, for socio-professional reintegration or, as the case may be, to take them into a post-detention assistance.

References

- Borlan, Ionuț, Amânarea aplicării pedepsei în teoria și practica dreptului penal, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017,
- Chiș, Ioan, Drept execuțional penal, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Florian, Gheorghe, Fenomenologie penitenciară, Oscar Print Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006,
- Rusu, Ioan, Marcel, Drept execuțional penal, Hamangiu Publishing House, București, 2015,
- Volonciu, Nicolae (Scientific coordinator), Uzlău, Simona, Andreea (coordinator author), Moroșanu, Raluca, Voicu, Corina et.alii, Codul de procedură penală comentat, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017.
- A.Ciobanu, T.Manea, E.Lazăr, D.Pârgaru, Legea nr.254/2013 privind executarea pedepselor și a măsurilor privative de libertate dispuse de organele judiciare în cursul procesului penal, comentată și adnotată, Hamangiu House, București, 2017.
- O.Ungureanu, C.Munteanu, Drept civil. Persoanele în reglementarea noului cod civil, Ediția a 2 a revizuită și adăugită, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2013.
- Goffman, Erving, Aziluri.
- https://legeaz.net/dictionar-juridic/justitie-restaurativa.
- Bedros, Elena, Conceptul de justiție restaurativă și legătura acestuia cu tendințele moderne de dezvoltare a procesului penal, available online on http://www.legeasiviata.in.ua/archive/2014/6/8.pdf
- Daly, Kathleen, Revisiting the Relationship between Retributive and Restorative Justice. To appear in Restorative Justice: From Philosophy to Practice, edited by Heather Strang and John Braithwaite, Australian National University.Aldershot:Dartmouth(2000), available online on: https://www.griffith.edu.au/data/assets/pdf_file/0028/223759/2001-Daly-Revisiting-the-relationship-pre-print.pdf
- National Institute of Criminology, *Restorative justice programmes in the contemporary world (documentary analysis)*,2005, p.11,available on line pe http://criminologie.org.ro/wp-content/uploads/2015/08/Programe-de-justitie-restaurativa-in-lumea-contemporana-Studiu.pdf,

[42] N.Volonciu (Scientific coordinator), A.S.Uzlău (coordinator author), R.Moroșanu, C.Voicu, et.alii,Codul de procedură penală comentat, Hamangiu Publishing House, București, 2017, p.236.

- The Stockholm programme — an open and secure europe serving and protecting citizens (2010/C 115/01), available online: https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/?uri=celex:52010XG0504(01).
- Marshall, Tony, Restorative justice: an overview, available on line pe http://www.antoniocasella.eu/restorative/Marshall_1999-b.pdf
- Directive 2012/29/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 25 October 2012 establishing minimum standards on the rights, support and protection of victims of crime, and replacing Council Framework Decision 2001/220/JHA,
- Law no.211/2004 on certain measures to ensure the protection of victims of the offence,
- Law no.192/2006 on mediation and organization of mediator profession,
- Law no.97/2018 on certain measures for the protection of victims of crime.
- The Decision no.397/June15th 2016 of the Constitutional Court of Romania
- The Closing of the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty from Braila Penitentiary nr.315/07.08.2018 (unpublished),
- The Closing of the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty from Braila Tichilești Detention Center, nr.9/17.05.2018 (unpublished).
- The Closing of the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of libertyof Braila penitentiary no.373/28.09.2018 (unpublished),
- The Closing of the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty of Braila penitentiary no.261/13.07.2018 (unpublished),
- The Closing of the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty of Braila penitentiary no.332/29.08.2018 (unpublished).

ASPECTS REGARDING THE APPLICATION OF THE PRINCIPLE OF CONTINUITY IN THE JUDGING STAGE IN THE LIGHT OF THE EUROPEAN CONVENTIONALITY BLOCK

Rodica Aida POPA

Abstract

The principle of continuity, as a result of the principle of immediacy in the criminal trial, is one of the important principles of the Romanian criminal trial, the content of which is given by the rule of the uniqueness of the panel of judges, which must remain the same. The continuity of the court panel is a guarantee of a fair trial, since the trial at the trial stage provides the parties with the faith that before the same panel of judges, composed of the appropriate number of judges, provided under the law, for the cases deducted from the judgment, fulfilling the requirements of immutability , independence, impartiality, responsibility and professional competence, the hearing of the parties, administration of evidence, discussion of applications, and then debates take place, giving expression to the lawfulness of criminal proceedings.

The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, subject to art. 6 § 1, as well as the case-law of the European Contentious Court has established concrete criteria for the application of the principle of continuity of the panel of judges, as a result of the principle of immediacy.

In our study we aim to make a brief analysis of the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights on how to apply the continuity of the panel of judges as well as the limitations in the cases concerning Romania and other member states of the Council of Europe in report to the national regulatory standards, namely the Romanian Criminal Procedure Code and Art. 11 of Law no. 304/2004 republished, on judicial organization.

We consider that the observance of the principle of continuity of the panel of judges in the court stage gives it content, and on its violations only the courts have the power to decide, since sanctioning the violation of the provisions regarding the composition of the panel of judges is absolute nullity.

Keywords: the principle of immediacy, the principle of continuity, the composition of the panel of judges, the absolute nullity, the interpretation of the application of the principle of continuity only by the courts.

Introduction

The trial stage in the criminal proceedings in Romania, as regulated by the Criminal Procedure Code in force, is experiencing a new vision on the part of the legislator, relative to the European vision, in the sense that new procedural safeguards, which provide the parties with confidence in a fair trial, have been introduced.

Moreover, the trial stage also relates to the requirements of the new realities, since the participants in the criminal proceedings have acquired a thorough knowledge of their rights and obligations, in the context of increasing the level of legal education and culture, which requires the awareness of the accountability of all the parties involved in the criminal proceedings.

A trial in the criminal proceedings in Romania, as provided in the Criminal Procedure Code in force, falls within a process in which the participants have foreseeable, predictable, clear and qualitative provisions, giving effectiveness to the rights and obligations, compatible with the European legal area, with respect to other trial-related provisions in the European legal system, whether continental or common law.

In other words, the trial regulation, as a stage of the criminal proceedings in Romania, by the principles governing it, namely the principles of legality, adversariality, immediacy, continuity, oral proceedings, finding the truth, the procedure itself, either simplified or ordinary, with its stages, offer procedural safeguards for all participants, with respect to the president of the panel of judges, explaining to the defendant what the accusation is, informing the defendant of his/her right not to make any statement, advising him/her that everything he/she says can be used against him/her, as well as the right to ask questions to the co-defendants, the injured person, the other parties, the witnesses, the experts, and to explain during the course of the inquiry, when deemed necessary, the filing of applications, pleas, requests for the taking of evidence and presenting the proof of evidence, by the lawyers, the parties, the injured person, as main litigant and other litigants.

In this context, one of the criminal procedural safeguards of the criminal proceedings in the trial stage is the observance of the principle of continuity of the panel of judges, which is an effect of the principle of immediacy, and it can be said that the two principles together superpose and ensure consistency, both in terms of the observance of the law and of all legal instruments, the manner of use of the agreed evidence, the proceedings and of the perception of the participants in the stages of the criminal proceedings, as well as the effectiveness thereof.

* Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Judge, The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Chamber (e-mail: aidap@scj.ro)

Our study aims to address aspects related to the application of the principle of continuity in the trial stage in view of the European conventionality block, on the one hand, by presenting some cases from the European Court of Human Rights case law in which Romania itself was convicted for the non-observance of the principle of immediacy, having in effect the principle of continuity in its essential component, the uniqueness of the panel of judges, and of other cases in the case law of the court and, on the other hand, in addition to the content to be taken into account in complying with such principle, as regulated by the Criminal Procedure Code and by Law No. 304/2004 on judicial organization, as amended, and the subsequent development of the national case law, especially that of the High Court of Cassation and Justice.

In our opinion, the importance of such an approach will lead to the establishment of a method for analysing concrete situations when there is a change in the composition of the panel of judges and the application of the criteria for verifying the relevant legal provisions, both in terms of national regulation and of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, the conduct to be observed by the panel of judges, when there is a change in its composition, by replacing the judge, in the case of one-judge panels, or one or two judges, in the case of multi-judge panels, which will confer a strong practical character, in ensuring the observance of the continuity principle.

Such a method will give effectiveness to the convergence of the application of the national law, as regulated in the Code of Criminal Procedure in force, harmonized with the European norms, with the development of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, in terms of the principle of immediacy and, implicitly, of the principle of continuity, in view of ensuring a fair trial, as provided by Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

It should also be emphasized that the principle of continuity, as a result of the principle of immediacy in the Romanian criminal proceedings, is experiencing a doctrinal approach,[1] which has guided the national case law in complying with the legal provisions in the matter, however, we consider that the national case law in the application of the principle of continuity has significantly contributed to giving concrete meaning to this principle, being important to present in our study how this principle was applied.

Content

The Romanian Criminal Procedure Code in force regulates the principle of immediacy in Article 351 (1),[2] and the principle of continuity in the content of codified provisions, i.e. Article 354 (2) and (3) and Article 388 (6),[3] as well as in Article 11 of Law No. 304/2004 on judicial organization, republished, as amended.[4]

As regards both the principles of immediacy and continuity, as is apparent from the very content of the procedural rules mentioned above, it follows that the court must be established according to the law, i.e. the composition of the panel is legal when it remains unchanged after the proceedings start.

Should there be set another hearing during the one in which the proceedings occurred, and the court have a different composition at such subsequent hearing and continue the trial in such a composition, without ordering the resumption of the proceedings, the court disregards the provisions of Article 354 (2) and (3) of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Another situation is when the court decision is signed by a judge whose name is not mentioned in the introductory part as being part of the panel.[5]

The European Court of Human Rights has ruled in two cases in which it condemned Romania for breaching Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

Thus, in the first case, Beraru vs Romania, the judgment of which was delivered on 18 March 2014,[6] the European Court of Human Rights held that there had been a violation of Article 6§1 taken together with Article 6§3 (b), (c) and (d) of the Convention, the respondent State having to pay to the applicant EUR 4,000 in respect of non-pecuniary damage, plus any tax that may be chargeable, and EUR 3,000 in respect of costs, plus any tax that may be chargeable, within 3 months from the date on which the judgment becomes final, converted into the currency of the respondent State at the rate applicable on the date of settlement.

In the recitals of the judgment of the European Court, it presented its arguments in §63-84. In essence, it was considered that... The principle of immediacy is an important guarantee in criminal proceedings in which the observations made by the court about the demeanour and credibility of a witness may have important consequences for the accused. Therefore, a

[1] Nicolae Volonciu, Andreea Simona Uzlău et al, Criminal Procedure Code - commented text, 3rd Edition, revised and supplemented, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2017, pp. 1058-1059.

[2] Article 351 (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code states that "The case shall be tried before a court established according to the law and shall be conducted in hearings, observing the principles of oral proceedings, immediacy and adversariality."

[3] Article 354 (2) and 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that. "(2) The panel of judges shall remain the same throughout the trial. When this is not possible, the panel may change until the proceedings begin. (3) After the beginning of the proceedings, any change in the composition of the panel shall lead to the resumption of the proceedings."

[4] Article 11 of the Law No. 304/2004 on judicial organization, republished, as amended: "The trial shall be conducted in accordance with the principles of random distribution of cases and continuity, except in cases where the judge cannot participate in the trial for objective reasons."

[5] HCCJ, Criminal Chamber, Judgment No. 5964 of 17 December 2003, available on wwwscj.ro.

[6] The Judgment in Beraru v. Romania of 18 March 2014 was published in the Official Gazette, Part I, No. 944 of 23.12.2014.

change in the composition of the trial court after the hearing of an important witness should normally lead to the rehearing of that witness (see P.K. v. Finland (dec.), No. 37442/97, 9 July 2002). 64;§65. In the instant case the Court notes that the single judge had heard all of the applicant's co-defendants and the witnesses in February and March 2002. After the appointment of the second judge the co-defendants and witnesses previously heard were not heard again. §66. The Court accepts that while the second judge was appointed in May 2003, 5 months after the proceedings commenced, the first judge, who heard most of the evidence alone, remained the same throughout the proceedings. It also accepts that the second judge had at his disposal the transcripts of the hearings at which the witnesses and the co-accused had been heard. However, noting that the applicant's conviction was based solely on evidence not directly heard by the second judge, the Court considers that the availability of those transcripts cannot compensate for the lack of immediacy in the proceedings. §67. Furthermore, the Court is aware that the possibility exists that a higher or the highest court might, in some circumstances, make reparation for defects in the first-instance proceedings (see De Cubber v. Belgium, 26 October 1984, §33, Series A No. 86). In the present case the Court notes that the court of last resort not only upheld the judgment of the first-instance court, but also based its decision on the evidence adduced before the court of first instance without a direct hearing of it." The European Court examined the change in the panel in the light of its consequences for the fairness of the proceedings as a whole, noting that in the present case the applicant's lawyers were unable to gain direct access to the case file until a late stage; they were not initially provided with a copy of the indictment. Moreover, they could not obtain either a copy of the transcripts of the recordings of the tapped phone calls or a taped copy of the tapped phone calls used as evidence in the file. In this respect, the applicant's lawyers submitted numerous requests to the domestic courts for access to the file. The Court also notes that the lack of access to the file, which caused difficulties in the preparation of the defence, was exactly the reason advanced by the applicant's lawyers for seeking to withdraw their representation of the applicant.

(§71).. The Court observes that the recordings played an important role in the body of evidence assessed by the courts. Thus, at the beginning of the proceedings the first-instance court considered a technical expert report on the recordings as absolutely necessary and ordered that such a report be produced. Furthermore, the first-instance court based its reasoning on the transcripts of the recordings, concluding that they "leave little room for doubt" as regards the accused's guilt, while acknowledging that the statements given by the other co-accused were not totally reliable, as they could "be considered subjective". (§78). Despite the importance of the recordings in the assessment of evidence the first-instance court changed its initial position concerning the necessity of a technical report in order to establish the authenticity of the recordings. At the end of the proceedings it considered the report as superfluous and revised its decision to adduce this evidence. (§79). In addition, despite the INEC submitting a technical report stating that there were doubts about the authenticity of the recordings before the delivery of its judgment, the first-instance court relied on the transcripts instead of re-opening the proceedings in order to allow the parties to submit their observations on the report. (§80). The Court noted that not only did the domestic courts base their decision on recordings of contested authenticity, but they did not reply to the applicant's submissions that he had not been presented with the transcripts and therefore was not aware of their content. (§81). The Court noted that none of the defects noted at the pre-trial and first-instance trial stage were subsequently remedied by the appeal court. Despite having jurisdiction to review all aspects of a case on questions of both fact and law, both the Bucharest Court of Appeal and the High Court of Cassation and Justice merely reiterated the prosecutor's findings, and did not address the repeated complaints made by the defendants concerning various defects in the trial. (§82). In view of the above findings, the Court concluded that the proceedings in question, taken as a whole, did not satisfy the requirements of a fair trial, considering that there had been a violation of Article 6§1 taken together with Article 6§3 (b), (c) and (d) of the Convention. (§83-84).

In the second case, Cutean v. Romania, the judgment of which was delivered on 2 December 2014,[7] the European Court of Human Rights held that there had been a violation of Article (6) of the Convention, the respondent State having to pay to the applicant EUR 2,400, plus any tax that may be chargeable, in respect of non-pecuniary damage, EUR 1,953, plus any tax that may be chargeable, in respect of costs and expenses, into a bank account indicated by the applicant, within three months from the date on which the judgment becomes final.

In the recitals of the judgment, in essence, the European Court of Human Rights held that an important aspect of fair criminal proceedings is the ability for the accused to be confronted with the witnesses in the presence of the judge who ultimately decides the case. The principle of immediacy is an important guarantee in criminal proceedings in which the observations made by the court about the demeanour and credibility of a witness may have important consequences for the accused (see Beraru v. Romania, No. 40107/04, §64, 18 March 2014). The Court considers that, given the high stakes of criminal proceedings, the aforementioned considerations also apply as regards the direct hearing of the accused himself by the judge who ultimately decides the case. (§60). The Court recalls that according to the principle of immediacy, in a criminal case the decision should be reached by judges who have been present throughout the proceedings and evidence-gathering process (see Mellors v. the United Kingdom (dec.), No. 57836/00, 30 January 2003). However, this cannot be deemed to constitute a prohibition of any change in the composition of a court during the course of a case (see P.K. v. Finland, cited above). Very clear administrative or procedural factors may arise rendering a judge's continued participation in a case impossible. Measures can be taken to ensure that the judges who continue hearing the case have the appropriate understanding of the evidence and arguments, for example, by making transcripts available, where the credibility of the witness concerned is not in issue, or by arranging for a rehearing of the relevant arguments or of important witnesses before the newly composed court (see Mellors, cited above; and P.K. v. Finland, cited above). (§61). The Court notes that it is undisputed that the original panel of judges examining the applicant's case had changed during the course of the proceedings before the first-instance court. In addition, the judge who convicted the applicant had not heard him or the witnesses directly. Moreover, the appellate courts that upheld the applicant's conviction also failed to hear him or the witnesses directly. (§63). The Court notes that none of the judges in the initial panel who had heard the applicant and the witnesses at the first level of jurisdiction had stayed on to continue with the examination of the case (contrast and compare with P.K. v. Finland, cited above; and Beraru, cited above, §66). (§64). The Court observes that there is no evidence in the file suggesting that the first-instance court's composition was changed in order to affect the outcome of the case to the applicant's detriment – or for any other improper motives – or that the Bucharest District 1 Court's single judge lacked independence or impartiality and also notes that the District Court judge had at his disposal the transcripts of the hearings at which the witnesses and the applicant had been heard. However, the Court also notes that the applicant's and the witnesses' statements constituted relevant evidence for his conviction that was not directly heard by the District Court single judge. Consequently, the Court considers that the availability of statement transcripts cannot compensate for the lack of immediacy in the proceedings. (§70). Furthermore, the Court is aware that the possibility exists that a higher or the highest court might, in some circumstances, make reparation for deficiencies in the first-instance proceedings (see Beraru, cited above, §67). In the present case the Court notes that the courts of last resort not only upheld the judgment of the first-instance court, but also based their decisions on the evidence adduced before the court of first instance without a direct hearing of it. (§71). The Court therefore concludes that the change of the first-instance court's panel of judges and the subsequent failure of the appellate courts to hear the applicant and the witnesses was tantamount to depriving the applicant of a fair trial. (§72). It follows that there has been a violation of Article 6 of the Convention.(§73).

[7] The Judgment in Cutean v. Romania of 2 December 2014 was published in the Official Gazette, Part I, No. 261 of 20.04.2015.

In the case of Cerovsek and Bozicnik v. Slovenia, delivered by the European Court of Human Rights on 7 March 2017, which became final on 7 June 2017,[8] it was held that there had been a violation of Article 6§1 of the Convention, the respondent State having to pay to the applicant EUR 5,000, plus any tax that may be chargeable, in respect of non-pecuniary damage, EUR 2,500, plus any tax that may be chargeable, in respect of costs and expenses, within three months from the date on which the judgment becomes final.

In the recitals of the judgment, in essence, the European Court of Human Rights held that it was called upon to determine whether the applicants had a fair trial despite the fact that the reasons for the verdicts, that is their conviction and sentence, were not given by the judge who had pronounced them but by other judges, who had not participated in the trial. (§38). The court notes that the present case concerns a trial before a professional judge sitting as a single judge (see paragraph 6 above) and, secondly, that the applicants' situation was a departure from the procedure envisaged in the Slovenian Criminal Procedure Act. Indeed, pursuant to that Act, the judge who conducts the trial and who deals directly with the evidence is supposed to give the verdict and provide written reasons relating to the relevant factual and legal aspects of it, if so requested by the parties (see paragraphs 22 to 24 above). The situation in the present case, referred to by the Government as being of an exceptional nature (see paragraph 35 above), arose because the judge who had examined all the evidence produced during the trial had retired after pronouncing her verdict, without providing written grounds. (§39). In the present case, the aforementioned purpose of the requirement to give reasons could not be achieved since the judge who conducted the trial, A.K., did not set down the reasons that had persuaded her to reach her decision on the issue of the applicants' guilt and their sentence. Furthermore, there is no indication in the records of the hearing that she gave any reasons orally (see paragraph 11 above). The written grounds given by Judges D.K.M. and M.B. (see paragraphs 14 and 15 above), which were put together post hoc some three years later, and, as appears from the evidence before the Court, had no input from Judge A.K., could not compensate for that deficiency. (§41). In addition, the Court is mindful of the two judges' lack of involvement in the evidence-gathering process. It observes that Judges D.K.M. and M.B. did not participate in the trials in any way and drew up their grounds solely on the basis of the written case files. By contrast, Judge A.K.'s verdict was not based on documents only. In particular, Judge A.K. heard the applicants during the trial, examined a number of witnesses and must have formed an opinion as to their credibility. She must also have made an assessment of the elements of the alleged offences, including the subjective element, namely the applicants' intention to commit them, for which the direct hearing of the applicants was particularly relevant (see paragraphs 7 and 8 above, and Cutean v. Romania, No. 53150/12, §66, 5 February 2014). (§42). Therefore, as recognised through the principle of the immediacy in criminal proceedings (see Cutean, cited above, §60 and §61, and P.K. v. Finland (dec.), No. 37442/97, 9 July 2002; see also the Slovenian Constitutional Court's decision of 11 October 2006 cited in paragraph 28 above), Judge A.K.'s observation of the demeanour of the witnesses and the applicants and her assessment of their credibility must have constituted an important, if not decisive, element in the establishment of the facts on which the applicants' convictions were based. In the Court's view, she should, for precisely that reason, address her observations in the written grounds justifying the verdicts. Indeed, under domestic law, such observations should form one of the essential components of written judgments (see section 364(7) of the Criminal Procedure Act, cited in paragraph 24 above). (§43). As to the question of whether Judge A.K.'s retirement, which was allegedly the reason for her failure to provide written grounds, gave rise to exceptional circumstances that justified a departure from the standard domestic procedure (see paragraph 35 above), the Court observes that the date of her retirement must have been known to Judge A.K. in advance. It should therefore in principle have been possible to take measures either for her to finish the applicants' cases alone or to involve another judge at an early stage in the proceedings. Moreover, it notes that the case was not a particularly complex one and that the applicants gave notice of their intention to appeal as soon as the verdict was pronounced (see paragraph 12 above). That means that Judge A.K. was immediately aware that she would have to provide written grounds. The Court therefore cannot agree with the Government that there were good reasons to depart from the procedure to which the accused were entitled under domestic law. Furthermore, it is particularly striking that despite a statutory time-limit of thirty days, the written grounds were not provided for about three years after the pronouncement of the verdicts, during which time the case files were lost and had to be reconstituted (see paragraphs 13 and 23 above). Those factors raise further concerns about the way the applicants' cases were handled by the domestic courts. (§44). Lastly, the Court is aware that there is a possibility that a higher or the highest court might, in some circumstances, make reparation for defects in first-instance proceedings (see De Cubber v. Belgium, 26 October 1984, §33, Series A No. 86). However, it notes that in the present case the courts at higher levels of jurisdiction upheld the first-instance court's judgment without directly hearing any of the evidence (see paragraphs 17, 19, 21, 27 and 42 above, and, mutatis mutandis, Beraru v. Romania, No. 40107/04, §71, 18 March 2014). It therefore cannot be said that the deficiency at issue in the present case was remedied by the appellate courts. (§46). In conclusion, the Court considers that the applicants' right to a fair trial was breached because of the failure of the judge who conducted their trial to provide written grounds for her verdict and because of the absence of any appropriate measures compensating for that deficiency. (§47). There has accordingly been a violation of Article 6 of the Convention. (§48).

[8] In the Hudoc database of the European Court of Human Rights.

The case law of the European Court of Human Rights has highlighted the importance of correlating the principle of immediacy with that of continuity, when hearing the defendant and adducing evidence, by hearing witnesses before the legally established panel of judges.

The Court has highlighted the fact that the panel may change during a trial, but it is significant that the new member(s) of the panel must become aware of the consequences of such change, the procedural safeguards and the reiteration of the requests for re-taking evidence, applications, pleas and confrontations that participants have in the criminal proceedings.

Thus, it is essential that the new judges have access not only to the written statements of the parties and witnesses, but also, in order to form an opinion on the charges, it is necessary to re-take the evidence, directly, to allow the possibility of discussion on other evidence, when required by law.

At the same time, it is important for the grounds of the decision rendered to be drawn up by the judge participating in the inquiry, the proceedings and the defendant's final address, as the arguments to be set out are also based on the oral arguments brought in the criminal proceedings, in what regards its content staged in front of the court, forming a complete and direct opinion on the whole case, and also answering the incriminating or exculpatory criticisms.

Therefore, we consider that beyond the above-mentioned legal requirements provided by the Criminal Procedure Code and Law No. 304/2004 on the judicial organization, as amended, it is necessary that in every case brought before the courts, the panel of judges formed as provided by law to have in place its own verification mechanism also based on the criteria set forth by the ECHR, the consequences involved by the occurrence of a cause for a change in the composition of the panel of judges, inclusively with the re-taking of means of evidence, the re-discussion of applications, the possibility to reiterate the conclusions of an expert report, for the judges to form an opinion on the factual base and the typical character conditions of the charges held against the defendants.

If, after entering the proceedings, one or more judges join the initial panels of judges, the proceedings must be repeated in a subsequent hearing during the trial stage, as otherwise the sanction of non-compliance with the principle of continuity of the judge panels is the absolute nullity of the judgment given, according to Article 281 (1) (a) of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Following a change in the composition of the panel of judges, the discussion on the scope of the cases of Beraru and Cutean v. Romania should be mandatorily requested, ex officio or by any party or the prosecutor, in the presence of the new judge(s), which is equivalent to the direct application of Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the specific consequences in such case in relation to the evidence taken, the conclusions of the parties and of the prosecutor, leading to the observance of the principles of immediacy and continuity, as well as to a fair trial, in terms of the effectiveness of the procedural safeguards of the parties.

In examining the case law of the 5-judge panel of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, during the appeal, following the judgments delivered in the cases of Beraru and Cutean v. Romania, we found observance of the continuity of the 5-judge panel at the time of allowing the evidence, taking the evidence and delivering the judgment, ensuring the observance of the above-mentioned principles, but also of the criteria stated in the two cases.

Thus, by way of example, by the decision rendered by the 5-judge panel of the High Court of Cassation and Justice on 15 December 2014 in the case No. 1768/1/2014,[9] the panel of judges composed of L.D.S., as president, and the judges Fl.D., L.T.R., S.L.M. and I.A.I., partially allowed the applications for evidence filed by the civil party appellant respondent A, by the defendant appellant respondents B., C., D., E., F., G., H and I., also postponing the discussion of an application for change of legal classification in respect of one of the defendant appellant respondents, postponing the case until 26 February 2015.

During the hearing mentioned above, the panel of judges consisting of the above mentioned judges took the evidence allowed, heard the arguments in the proceedings, and the decision was postponed until 10 February 2015.

On 10 February 2015, the 5-judge panel consisting of the same judges, L.D.S., as president, and the judges of Fl.D., L.T.R., S.L.M. and I.A.I., delivered the Criminal Judgment No. 22 in case No. 1768/1/2014.

In another case, the 5-judge panel of the High Court of Cassation and Justice consisting of I.M.M., as president, and the judges Fl.D., L.T.R, S.D.E. and I.A.I., during the hearing of 15 December 2014 in the case No. 2678/1/2014, having regard to the provisions of the hearing decision of 24 November 2014, in observance with Article 119 (2) of the Criminal Procedure Code, Article 120 (1) (d) of the Criminal Procedure Code, Article 121 (3) of the Criminal Procedure Code and Article 381 of the Criminal Procedure Code, continued the inquiry by interviewing the witnesses A., B., C., D. and E., their statements being recorded and attached to the case file (pages 127-140 of the case in the appeal stage). When asked, the lawyers of the defendant respondents, the representative of the appellant civil party F. and the representative of the Ministry G. answered that they had no other applications to file during such hearing and requested for a new hearing to be set in order to continue the inquiry.

The High Court of Cassation and Justice, with a view to continuing the inquiry, set another hearing for 26 January 2015, when the allowed witnesses, H., I., J., K., L. and M., would be summoned.

During the aforementioned hearing, the 5-judge panel, in the same composition, interviewed the allowed witnesses, in attendance, discussed an application filed by the lawyer of the defendant respondent and allowed the sending of a letter requested to the mentioned institution regarding specific information and, for the continuation of the inquiry, set another hearing on 27 February 2015 and ordered the summoning of the allowed defence witnesses: N., O. and P.

Subsequently, the evidence was taken during the hearings of 27 February and 9 March 2015, and at the latter hearing the proceedings were recorded and the delivery of the judgment was postponed until 23 March 2015, the 5-judge panel having the same composition.

On 23 March 2015, the 5-judge panel, in the same composition mentioned above, delivered the Criminal Judgment No. 40 in the case No. 26787/1/2014 pending before the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the 5-judge panel.[10]

Conclusions

By examining the principles of immediacy and continuity together in their effective application in criminal cases in our study, the connection between them and the impact of their non-observance on the procedural safeguards of the participants in the criminal proceedings is revealed.

The presentation of the applicability of the two principles in the light of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights has been able to ensure compliance by the domestic courts, the finding of actual and different violations, as well as the criteria that proves to be necessary in their examination when they have not been observed, impacting the fair trial, as presented by the ECHR.

The consequences and the manner in which the judgments delivered by the European Court of Human Rights have been applied in the subsequent case law of the Supreme Court in the given matter are in a position to ensure the establishment of a mechanism for verifying the provided criteria in ensuring compliance with the procedural safeguards of the parties.

[9] Criminal Judgment No. 22 delivered on 10 February 2015 by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the 5-judges panel, in the case No. 1768/1/2014, not published.

[10] Criminal Judgment No. 40 delivered on 23 March 2015 by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the 5-judges panel, not published.

We believe that further research into the application of the two principles in the criminal cases pending before the Supreme Court should continue in order to verify the concrete and different aspects of the specific application so as to assess the stability of the mechanism for verifying the incidence of the case law of the ECHR and to increase the quality of the trials, both at the first instance and during the appeal.

References

- Nicolae Volonciu, Andreea Simona Uzlău et al, Criminal Procedure Code - commented text, 3rd Edition, revised and supplemented, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2017.
- The Judgment in the Beraru v. Romania case of 18 March 2014 was published in the Official Gazette, Part I, No. 944 of 23.12.2014.
- The Judgment in Cutean v. Romania of 2 December 2014 was published in the Official Gazette, Part I, No. 261 of 20.04.2015.
- The Judgment in Cerovsek and Bozicnik v. Slovenia available in the Hudoc database.
- Criminal Judgment No. 22 delivered on 10 February 2015 by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the 5-judges panel, in the case No. 1768/1/2014, not published.
- Criminal Judgment No. 40 delivered on 23 March 2015 by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the 5-judges panel, not published.

EUROPEAN AND CANADIAN PROVISIONS ON KEEPING CONTACT BETWEEN THE PERSON DEPRIVED OF HIS LIBERTY AND HIS FAMILY, DIFFERENCES AND SIMILARITIES

Iulia POPESCU[*]

Abstract

Every democratic society seeks to create a stable environment for its members, trying to identify the needs of citizens, in all aspects, creating legal norms to ensure the proper functioning of society as a whole is one of the needs. The family as an institution, but also as a form of people's approach, requires maintaining a balance in the family relations, a desideratum pursued by both society and its members. Situations where a family member is deprived of liberty following a final court decision raise various questions about the family situation and the links between the family and the person in custody. The European states, as well as Canada, have recognized the importance of the family in the life of a person deprived of liberty by adopting rules in the field of penitentiary that contribute to the desideratum of the proper functioning of the family. But these rules also present, carefully scrutinized.

Keywords: family, convicted, Canada, European states, rules

Introduction

Man and the satisfaction of his needs have always been objectives pursued by each democratic society for its members, both in identifying needs and in meeting them.

The testimony of the efforts made by the European states and not only, in the attempt to establish as general rules, the rights considered as fundamental and on which the EU Member States report in the creation of the general framework of the rights of their citizens, stands "THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS OF A EUROPEAN UNION" proclaimed by the European Commission, the European Parliament and the Council of the European Union on 7 December 2000 at the Nice European Council[1].

Since the Preamble to the Charter, the direction that the European states want to embrace, namely "the peoples of Europe, establishing an ever closer union among them, have decided to share a peaceful future based on common values", the common values representing even the fundamental rights in the Charter, which concern inter alia the right to live, respect for private and family life, marriage and the founding of a family, family life and freedom and the principle of non-discrimination in accordance with Union law and international law established by international conventions to which the Union or all the Member States are parties, in particular the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the constitutions of the Member States.

The existence of the principle of non-discrimination shows the equal treatment that the European Union, through its states, applies to its citizens with regard to the rights they enjoy, irrespective of the legal situation in which they are in the state of liberty or imprisonment.

The need for behavioral recovery of prisoners has far greater valences than just in respect of whom are personally need to be pursued and the impact of their actions on their families and society in general.

Just as society in its essence is constantly moving and evolving, the legal and behavioral norms must follow its course through periodic changes and improvements in order to shape its citizens' behavior to create a climate of order and safety.

It is true that in most cases the state of affairs determines the normative changes, but trying to identify the norms with the best and obvious results in different legal systems can lead to the creation of a new and adapted idea that will result in beneficial changes in the field under consideration.

The rationale for choosing Canadian legislation alongside the European one as regards the existence of the rights of detainees to stay in touch with the family was based on the recognition of the Canadian system with extensive democratic valences, from which new elements could be identified to ensure respect for the rights of individuals incarcerated, as well as identifying good practices in a non-European state. The study of the European and Canadian legal provisions relating to keeping contact between the person deprived of his liberty and his family in identifying the differences and similarities between them could support the need to recover the imprisoned persons and to maintain their families united.

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, Judge (e-mail: iulia.tudor@yahoo.com, iuliapopescu35@gmail.com)

[1] https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:12012P/TXT&from=PT

European Provisions

I. On 1 September 2015, 1 483 126 people were imprisoned in the prisons on the territory of Europe[2] according to the Annual Penal Statistics Center, but according to the same source, the number of imprisoned persons increased to 2016.

The presence of so many incarcerated persons as well as the tendency to increase their number arises the interest of companies in identifying the situations and conditions that favor the increase of crime in order to counter this phenomenon as well as the negative consequences generated for the society in its whole as well as on each individual individual.

Man is a social being (Aristotle, Politics)[3], for which his isolation as a result of committing antisocial deeds, though necessary, produces in himself confused feelings that can seriously affect him sometimes without possibility of recovery.

At European level, over the years, there has been identified the need to establish rules that directly address the situation of imprisoned persons, in relation to their large number, and the fact that after the incarcerated there are many more people who are subject to conditions of suffering as a result of the incarceration of a family member.

Thus, on January 11, 2006, at the 952nd Meeting of Delegates Ministers, the Committee of Ministers adopted the RECOMMENDATION OF THE COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS OF THE MEMBER STATES, REGARDING THE EUROPEAN PENALTY RULES OF REC (2006) 2[4].

In addition to the general principles, rules on health, order and safety etc., and conditions of detention have been established, being inserted in Art. 24 even in Title II, where the detainees were allowed to keep in touch with the outside.

According to art. 24 detainees will be allowed to communicate, as often as possible, by mail, telephone or other means of communication with their families, third parties and representatives of outside bodies, and receive visits from such persons, so that any restriction or oversight of the communication or visits, however, allow a minimum acceptable contact level.

At point 4 of art. 24 states that "The arrangements for making visits should allow detainees to maintain and develop their relations with their families as normally as possible", which shows the recognition of the importance of family life in the prisoner's life and vice versa, as also confirmed by the following of the same art. 6. The detainee should be immediately informed of the death or serious illness of a close relative. 7. Whenever possible, the detainee should be allowed to leave the prison either under escort or free to visit a sick relative, attend funeral or other humanitarian reasons. 8. Detainees should be allowed to immediately notify their families of imprisonment or transfer to another prison as well as of serious illness or injury. 9. Even if the detainee requests or not, the authorities will immediately inform the detained spouse of the detainee / detainee or close relative or a person previously designated by the prisoner of death, illness or serious injury or transfer of the detainee to a detainee, another penitentiary or a hospital".

Conscious of the natural differences between men and women, in full compliance with the principles of equality before the law, the European states have included special rules on the situation of women and children in REC (2006) 2 Recommendation on detention conditions.

Thus, Article 34 provides that 1. In addition to the specific provisions of these rules, the authorities must respect the needs of women in detention, paying particular attention to physical, occupational, social and psychological needs, when making decisions that affects the aspects of their detention. 2. Particular efforts must be made to allow access to special services to those with special needs, such as those who have suffered physical, mental or sexual violence. 3. Detainees will be allowed to give birth outside the penitentiary, but if a child is born in the penitentiary, the prison management will provide the necessary support and facilities.

The Member States' interest in specifically regulating the right of women to benefit from private, physical, occupational, social and psychological needs does not constitute a violation of the principle of equal treatment between men and women under the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, from the physiological and anatomical point of view, the two genres are different and implicitly have different needs in certain situations.

The regulation of the possibility of the child's birth within the penitentiary can only be seen as a normality situation that was required to be mentioned, given the human condition.

It is worth noting that the normative act contains special provisions regarding the small children, specifying in the art. 36 that "Small children may remain in prison with a detained parent only if it is in their best interest. They will not be considered "inmates". 2. When a young child can stay in the penitentiary with one of the parents, there must be a nursery with qualified staff, where the child can stay when the parent participates in an activity that is not allowed for small children. 36. 3. A special infrastructure must be set up to protect young children.

The normative text is intended to keep the child with one of the parents, not necessarily with the mother, as can be seen from par. 1 and 2 of art. 36, where it is mentioned that a small child can stay in the penitentiary with one of the parents if it is in his / her best interest.

[2] https://www.coe.int/en/web/prison/space- Council of Europe Annual Penal Statistics SPACE I – Prison Populations Survey 2015 UPDATED ON 25TH APRIL 2017

[3] https://www.scribd.com/doc/146325879/Man - human being

[4] https://rm.coe.int/16804c8d9a

Under such circumstances a nursery with qualified staff must be provided.

This provision is of particular importance, once again applying the principle of equality between men and women, in this case between father and mother, as is the role of both parents in the child's life.

However, some cases call for the need to regulate certain categories of persons, in particular juveniles, so that in Art. 35 of Recommendation Rec (2006) 2 provides for special conditions applicable to persons under the age of 18. "In exceptional cases where children under the age of 18 are imprisoned in an adult penitentiary, the authorities will ensure that in besides the services available to all inmates, detained children will have access to social, psychological and educational services, religious education and recreational programs or their equivalent available to children in the community. 2. All child prisoners enrolled in the compulsory education process will have access to it. 3. Additional assistance will be provided to the prison-released children. 4. In exceptional cases where children are imprisoned in an adult penitentiary, they shall be accommodated in a separate area from that visited by adults except in cases where this is not in the interest of the child.

The special treatment applicable to minors in providing access to social, psychological and educational services, religious education and recreational programs can only be regarded as a necessary norm for their harmonious development despite the special situation in which they are at the time of execution punishment.

The execution of punishments must not interfere with the compulsory schooling stages, but instead the penitentiary system must make efforts to maximize the time spent by the juvenile in custody for its education and re-socialization.

The child's superior interest should be the primary motivation in everything that concerns the minor both in the penitentiary and after the release from the penitentiary, given the fragile balance generated as well as the possible family deficiencies.

The additional assistance mentioned in the normative act should be considered more than merely counseling but should consist in the effective monitoring of children who have been identified with more serious behavioral problems as well as those from families where there is no sound morally or material support.

The special situation of life in the penitentiary has demonstrated the need for direct regulations of the way of life and the execution of the punishment, as well as the ongoing transformation of the way in which the existing society must be approached at the level of a penitentiary.

Even at the end of REC (2006) 2, it is stated that "European Prison Rules need to be reviewed regularly", recognizing the need for frequent changes in how to address the situation of people deprived of their liberty.

Continued concern over the situation of people deprived of their liberty following the execution of a prison sentence led to the European Parliament's elaboration of resolutions on prison systems and prison conditions.

European Parliament resolution of 5 October 2017 on prison systems and prison conditions (2015/2062 (INI)) (2018 / C 346/14) The European Parliament[5] (hereinafter referred to as the Resolution) contains guidance to Member States on the link between detainees and their families, as well as the situation of imprisoned women or imprisoned minors.

Thus, in paragraph 26 of the Resolution, it is proposed that Member States pay particular attention to the needs of women in prisons during pregnancy but also after they have given birth by providing adequate facilities for skilled and specialized breastfeeding and care, reiterating that it is necessary to analyze the application of alternative models that take into account the living conditions of prison children, considering that automatic separation of the mother of a child creates major emotional disturbances in children and can be considered as an additional punishment affecting both the mother and the child.

By their very nature, women are created to give birth, but also nurture the newborn, being essential for the baby's harmonious development of close proximity to the mother and the nutrition she provides by breastfeeding.

The mother's ability to keep her child along with her during the execution of the punishment must first be seen as a necessity for the well-being of the child and ensuring a normal development, the sanction being applied only to the mother in the execution of a punishment, not to the newborn.

At the same time, the possibility of keeping the child by the mother can also benefit from its behavior, leading to the adoption of appropriate behavior to social norms and thus creating the premises of release from the prison depending on the circumstances of each case.

Paragraph 28 of the Resolution demonstrates that family life in detainees' lives is of particular value and states must be encouraged to create the conditions necessary to keep in touch with the family.

Member States are therefore encouraged to ensure that detainees have regular contacts with their families and friends, giving them the possibility to execute their sentences in establishments near their homes and by promoting visits, phone calls and the use of electronic communications, subject to authorization to the judge and under the supervision of the prison administration, in order to maintain family ties.

The law maker, through these recommendations, does not lose sight of the fact that the notion of a family should not be seen in the strict sense, but in its broad sense, concluding that it was intended to create the possibility for detainees to keep in touch with persons with whom they did not necessarily have a blood link or as a result of the conclusion of civil acts.

[5] https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=OJ:C:2018:334:FULL, Official Journal of the European Union C343 Year 61 27 September 2018 European Parliament Resolution of 5 October 2017 on prison systems and prison conditions (2015/2062 (INI)) 2018 / C 346/14, pag 94".

This approach is quite natural, as reality confirms that the notion of family is in a continuous transformation or rather a complement, in such a way that the limitation of the access of detainees to certain persons, whom civil law qualifies as part of the notion of "family," would prevent them from being able to keep in touch with people with whom they developed strong relationships but who can not fit into the "classical" family notion.

However, the way to set up legal rules is to give people the opportunity to exercise their rights in accordance with law and good morals but without creating unnecessary constraints and not resulting from the consequences of committing crimes, a lack of attention or legal indifference.

Also in support of maintaining the connection between the detainee and the family, paragraph 29 of the resolution states that the policy of placing detainees in prisons dispersed in the territory is condemned, as this is an additional punishment for their families, some of which may even constitute an infringement of Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights (right to respect for private and family life).

Points 30-37 continue to provide guidance to Member States on the situation of minors in prisons.

Thus, it is reiterated the importance of ensuring that children are treated in prison taking into account their superior interest, by separating adults from the mainstream, in order not to be exposed to the risks of abuse and violence or negative behavioral patterns, trying not to be deprived of specific care that such a vulnerable group needs, including during transfers of detainees, giving them the right to maintain contact with the family, unless there is a judgment to the contrary, and mentioning the need to create special teenage centers.

Life in the penitentiary is more difficult as minors do not have a life experience to help them identify hazards, so that without markers they become safe victims in the hands of "life-spanning" adults.

Each child should receive care, protection and all the necessary personal assistance - social, educational, vocational, psychological, medical and physical - which it may need depending on age, gender and personality, encouraging Member States to promote centers closed-school education to provide pedagogical and psychological support to minors, rather than resorting to deprivation of liberty.

Regular and meaningful contacts with parents, family and friends are encouraged through visits and correspondence, both to help the child not to feel ashamed, but also to identify possible harmful family environments in order to be able to act on them and subsequently release the minor and reintegration into the family, identifying problems and finding solutions.

It is reiterated the importance of paying full attention to minors in terms of their emotional and physical needs, and it is necessary to apply programs to prepare them in advance to return to their communities, to manage relationships with their families, in those situations where problems in the support family have been found, identifying opportunities for tuition and employment, as well as socio-economic status.

It has not been forgotten that there are situations where children whose parents are in custody are discriminated against by other members of society simply because they have their parents in custody, so that these children have to be monitored to strengthen social integration and build a fair and inclusive society.

This resolution recognizes the right of children to maintain direct contact with their detained parent and, at the same time, reiterates the right of the inmate to be a parent, considering, in this regard, that prisons should be provided with adequate childcare facilities, where they should be supervised by well-trained guards, social workers and volunteers from NGOs who can help children and their families during their visits to prisons.

In other words, the detainees' right to keep in touch with the family and to be present at important moments in the education of their children is recognized, thus protecting the interests of minors, but also the right of the family to keep in touch with the person imprisoned.

It is natural to think of this, especially since the family, especially children, should not be punished for the deeds of their parents, nor should they be subjected to the loss of a parent by being imprisoned and away from the family.

Another recommendation made by the European Parliament in the above-mentioned resolution is concerning detained persons in a Member State other than the State of residence which encounters more difficulties in maintaining contact with their families and it is necessary to have electronic communication facilities with families, to give them opportunities, even if less, to keep in touch with the family.

Canadian Provisions

II. At Canadian level, the regulation of the fundamental rights and freedoms of persons is found in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms of 1982, which mentions fundamental rights, democratic rights, movement rights, legal rights and the right to equality for Canadian citizens.

It is worth noting that the protection of the rights mentioned in the Charter is ensured only in cases of violation of rights by state institutions, not in cases where citizens' rights are violated by other individuals or private institutions[6].

[6] https://www.chrc-ccdp.gc.ca/eng/content/human-rights-in-canada

Canada being a constitutional monarchy, consisting of 10 provinces, according to the Correctional Law and conditional release[7], a proper regime for the execution of sentences, so that detainees serving a prison sentence of 2 years or more are held in federal penitentiaries, while those serving prison sentences of less than 2 years remain in state detention centers.

The rights of detainees are also provided under the Correctional and Exempting Law[8], which includes the right of the imprisoned persons to keep in touch with children, the right to leave the penitentiary under escort or [9] to temporarily leave the penitentiary without escort, and the right to family visits without the use of barriers.

At the same time, in 1995, the Canadian Correctional Service, an institution responsible for overseeing the execution of punishment by the detainee and ensuring its re-socialization, implemented the Mother-Child Program, which allowed children under 4 years of age to remain with their mothers in the penitentiary permanently, while for those aged 4-6 the program provided the possibility of spending a half-hour program in their mother's company.

According to art. 71 of the Correctional and Exemplary Law, detained persons have the right to keep contact with the society, to receive visits and to make correspondence with family, friends, and other persons outside the penitentiary.

At the same time, the same normative act in art. 77 provides the particular rules applicable to imprisoned women as regards the application of specific programs for women as well as working groups with other women.

As a novelty and peculiarity of the Canadian system to European regulations, there is a system of volunteers in Canada that engages in the social recovery of detained persons, facilitating the keeping of links between detainees and their families as well as between parental detainees and their children.

The right to be visited by the family allows detainees to spend time with them for up to 72 hours inside the penitentiary.

The Canadian Correctional Service[10] plays a key role in the Canadian enforcement system, which, from the time the person is placed in prison (in the case of those serving the sentence in federal prisons), draws up a correctional plan based on the information provided by the detainee, police officers, courts, detainees' family and other detainees, as appropriate.

It can be noticed that in the Canadian system, the attempted remodeling behavior of the incarcerated individual is based on his individual supervision, both during and after punishment, for the purpose of liberating a balanced person into society that can reintegrate into system and in public life.

While there is a right in the Canadian state's legislation to the detainees' right to visit, correspondence and contact with family and close relatives, it is worth mentioning that the attempt to resocialize the detainee, both in society and in the family, relies heavily on oversight institutional behavior of the detainee, both by specialists and by volunteers, than on the support of family presence and contact.

What also needs to be mentioned is that the detainees' supervision system includes special provisions for female prisoners for the purpose of including them into programs and activities specific to the female nature.

A peculiarity in the Canadian law system is given by the existence of the population and the category of aborigines, which led to the introduction in the Correctional Law and conditional release of certain articles for this category, so that in Articles 70-84 the notion of aboriginal (as indian, inuit or metis) as well as the aboriginal community is defined.

It is foreseen that between the Minister of Public Security and the aboriginal communities, agreements can be concluded to provide specific corrective services to aboriginal detainees, such as the creation of special programs addressing the needs of aboriginal detainees.

At the same time, the legal rules regulate the fact that in those situations where an aboriginal detainee executes a sentence in federal jails and he demands transfer to a community prison, he may be granted this right.

In order to identify the needs of the aboriginal persons who were imprisoned, the National Aboriginal Advisory Commission was established, which advises the Community Correctional Service to identify the needs of aboriginal persons.

Conclusion.

The attempt of the society to maintain a balance between its protection against the antisocial acts committed by the offenders who were later incarcerated and the need to reform those persons and to maintain their connection with their families and the outside environment of prison life is not easy to achieve.

However, the attempt continues to identify the needs of imprisoned persons and their families in different forms, either as a result of maintaining family-owned contact at a level that can bring behavioral and developmental benefits to those involved (the European system) or through continuous monitoring of the prisoner, both during and after the execution of the punishment (Canadian system), using the institution of volunteering, can only be necessary to maintain a functioning society, benefiting both the detainee and

[7] https://laws.justice.gc.ca/eng/acts/C-44.6/page-9.html#h-30.
[8] https://laws-lois.justice.gc.ca/eng/acts/C-44.6/page-9.html#h-31.
[9] https://laws-lois.justice.gc.ca/eng/acts/C-44.6/Corrections and Conditional Release Act, S.C. 1992,.
[10] https://www.csc-scc.gc.ca/correctional-process/002001-1000-eng.shtml.

the family in particular, as well as for the society of which the detainee and his family are in general.

From the analysis of the systems that were at the bottom of this paper, it can be concluded that a mixture of the two types could be beneficial, as maintaining the link between the detainee and the family can only have beneficial effects (in those situations where no disruptive elements are identified at the family level), the more so as the family should not be penalized for the offense committed by its member and isolated from it, but also the supervision of the detainee during the execution of the punishment and more, after the release, in order to ensure that he understood the consequences of his actions and changed, can only be necessary for the protection of the society and, why not, the person of the detainee.

References

- https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:12012P/TXT&from=PT https://www.coe.int/en/web/prison/space- Council of Europe Annual Penal Statistics SPACE I – PrisonPopulationsSurvey 2015 UPDATED ON 25TH APRIL 2017
- https://www.scribd.com/doc/146325879/Man-Human-Being
- https://rm.coe.int/16804c8d9a
- https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=OJ:C:2018:334:FULL, Official Journal of the European Union C343 Year 61 27 September 2018 European Parliament Resolution of 5 October 2017 on prison systems and prison conditions (2015/2062 (INI)) 2018 / C 346/14, pag 94"
- https://www.chrc-ccdp.gc.ca/eng/content/human-rights-in-canada
- https://laws.justice.gc.ca/eng/acts/C-44.6/page-9.html#h-30
- https://laws-lois.justice.gc.ca/eng/acts/C-44.6/page-9.html#h-31
- https://laws-lois.justice.gc.ca/eng/acts/C-44.6/Corrections andConditionalRelease Act, S.C. 1992,.
- https://www.csc-scc.gc.ca/correctional-process/002001-1000-eng.shtml

THE LEGAL CONSEQUENCES OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT'S DECISIONS IN THE CONTEXT OF THE LEGALITY PRINCIPLE OF THE CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Liliana-Dorina RĂDUCU[*]

Abstract

The principle of legality of the criminal procedure is the established general rule according to which the criminal trial is carried out under the provisions stipulated by the law. In order to fully understand the application of the fundamental principle of legality of the criminal proceeding, it is necessary to clarify, on the one hand, the notion of "criminal procedural law" - a term that does not have a legal definition and, on the other hand, it is necessary to analyze the evolution of the concept referring to the source of criminal procedural law, in the current conventional context, as well as in the context of the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence. Ensuring the application of the criminal process' lawfulness is firstly achieved by the legislator's fulfillment of the obligation to clearly regulate the rules of conducting the criminal proceedings and other judicial proceedings in connection with a criminal case. However, the actual reality proves the existence of numerous legal provisions declared unconstitutional, the Constitutional Court's decisions being binding for both the legislator and the judicial bodies. Thus, the purpose of the research is to identify the consequence of the legislator's lack of intervention so that the stipulations declared unconstitutional would agree with the Constitution's provisions if it grants valences of some sources of law to the decisions of the Constitutional Court, if it transforms the Constitutional Court into a positive lawmaker or it just assigns the entire task of guaranteeing of the criminal process' lawfulness to the judicial bodies. In fact, although the nullity is the main procedural guarantee of the legality of the criminal trial, the consequences of the Constitutional Court's decisions raise many problems of unitary interpretation and application of the law even in this area, thus questioning the legality of the criminal process.

Keywords: the legality of the criminal trial, criminal procedural law, the effects of the Constitutional Court's decisions, sources of criminal procedural law, absolute and relative nullity

1. Introduction

The legality of the criminal process is the fundamental principle governing the conduct of the entire criminal process, its incidence sights all phases of the criminal process: prosecution, preliminary chamber, judgment and enforcement of judgments.

The fundamental principle of legality is generally enshrined in the Romanian Constitution, in art. 1 para. (5) showing that, in Romania, the observance of the Constitution, its supremacy and the laws is compulsory, and in particular, as regards the criminal proceedings, in art. 2 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, according to which the criminal proceedings are carried out in accordance with the provisions prescribed by the law.

Starting from the general framework of the principle of legality of the criminal process, although the existence of a clear and predictable law-as a source of law, constitutes an imperative in this area, the notion of criminal procedural law does not know a legal definition, being imposed a detailed analysis of it in the context of the case-law of the Constitutional Court and the European Court of Human Rights.

In order to respect the principle of legality of the criminal process, it is mainly the legislature's task to lay down legal rules governing the conduct of the criminal proceedings, but, as any regulation of an activity, the law cannot capture in detail all the issues that will arise during the criminal process.

It also equates to the lack of a text of law and the assumption that there is a written law, but which does not meet the quality conditions.

In contrast to the field of criminal law when the lack of legal provision constitutes an impediment to the criminal liability of a person, the criminal process will not stop in the event of a lack of regulation of a particular procedural situation.

The inability of the legislator to provide in a text of law all situations which may be encountered in the conduct of the criminal proceedings or their respective regulatory provisions, leads to the exercise of obligations imposed on constitutional authorities or judicial bodies, precisely in order to comply with the principle of legality.

Thus, the exclusive competence to legislating, mainly attributed to the Parliament, is not discretionary, but is subject to scrutiny of the constitutionality of the Constitutional Court of Law. However, that intervention should not confer on the Constitutional Court legislative powers when the legislature has not fulfilled that obligation.

Despite the latter aspect, new rules of general binding criminal law have been established through the recent case-law of the Constitutional Court.

It remains to be determined whether, in those circumstances, the decisions of the Constitutional [*] PhD, Faculty of Law, 'Nicolae Titulescu ' University of Bucharest (e-mail: lilianna.manea@yahoo.com);

Court should be included in the notion of criminal procedural law, which is required to be analysed in the light of the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, according to which the autonomous notion of ' law ' also includes jurisprudence, or if the decisions of the Constitutional Court acquire the nature of criminal procedural law sources.

The binding nature of the decisions of the Constitutional Court requires the adoption of one of the abovementioned solutions, although at this time, in the national legal order, in the concept of law, is not also included the compulsory case-law, and the doctrine is reserved in classifying the decisions of the Constitutional Tribunal as the sources of criminal procedural law.

The latter approach should be announced in the context of the evolution of the case-law of the Constitutional Tribunal, especially in the field of interpretative decisions, which, in certain specific cases, bear the valences of a true regulation.

In this legal context, the hardest task lies with the judicial bodies, as the main actors of the criminal process, who have an obligation to interpret the law in accordance with the principle of legality, to comply with the decisions of the Constitutional Court or, in the absence of the total laws or other rules of criminal procedural law, application of the analogue supplement.

It is therefore necessary to identify the legal pathways for carrying out the criminal liability activity of the persons who committed offences, by reconciling an imperfect law with the effects of the decisions of the Constitutional Court, when they appear nuances in fulfilling the obligations and observance of the legal competences of each of the two powers, the criminal process will be carried out in all cases, imperative under the principle of legality.

2. Criminal Procedural law

2.1. The notion of law

As a consequence of the fact that the conduct of the criminal proceedings is governed by the adage, 'the nulum judicium sine lege', 'the repressive Courts must work only in the cases, in the form and, in the forms prescribed by law, avoiding and refusing any other process that does not bear the seal of legality, even if it were, in cases, more comfortable, propor and more rational. On the other hand, that principle requires the legislator to make a full and wise bundle of rules to ensure the proper conduct of the repressive action within the reach of repressive justice.'[1]

In applying the principle of legality, the conduct of the criminal process must take place in accordance with the provisions laid down by law, so the existence of a law and the application and compliance with the legal provisions is required.

There is no regulated definition of the notion of 'criminal procedural law', but relevant in this respect are the provisions of art. 173 of the Penal Code defining the notion of ' criminal law ' as any criminal provision contained in organic laws and emergency ordinances or other normative acts which, at the time of their adoption, had the power of law.

On the one hand, the determination of the meaning of 'criminal law' is only a starting point for the identification of the framework for applying the principle of legality of the criminal process, since the provisions of art. 173 of the Penal Code concern substantive rules of criminal law, and the conduct of the criminal proceedings takes place on the basis of procedural criminal law rules, in the latter case, in relation to the principle of legality of the criminal process, the notion of law being interpreted lato sensu. The difference between substantive and procedural law rules has been highlighted by the fact that, 'all the rules of law confering such a rights will constitute substantive rules, contrary to all the rules of their content, do not indicate only how the rights granted will be exercised and the formalities after which the entire activity leading to the realisation of the repressive justice will be carried out shall be rules of formal law (procedural provisions).'[2]

On the other hand, the conduct of the criminal process and other judicial proceedings involves the competition of both the judicial authorities and other parties or other persons in achieving its purpose, which implies the undertaking of numerous activities governed by secondary legislation, such as government decisions, orders or internal organisation regulations. The verification of compliance with the principle of legality of the criminal process is not limited to fully respecting only the provisions of the laws, but also by analysing the lower-level acts, without the power of law, but which come to detail the rules of procedural law compliance with the legal limits.

In this respect, in the literature of specialty[3] it has been shown that the compliance with the principle of legality is checked against all the rules governing an act, and not only in relation to a certain provision of law.

In the case-law of the Constitutional Court [4] as regards the notion of 'law', it was noted that the notion of law 'has several meanings according to the distinction between the formal or organic and material criteria.'

[1] I. Tanoviceanu, Treaty of Law and Criminal Procedure, vol. IV, Second edition of the course of law and criminal Procedure, reviewed and supplemented by V. Dongoroz and. A., typography, "The Judicial Courier", Bucharest, 1924, p. 35;

[2] Idem, p. 25;

[3] N. Volonciu, Treaty of Criminal Procedure, Vol. I, Peideia P.H., Bucharest, 1998, p. 83; V. Dongoroz etc., New Criminal Procedure Code and previous Criminal Procedure Code, Political P.H., Bucharest, 1969, apud. M. Udroiu, in M. Udroiu (coord.), Code of Criminal Procedure. Commentary on articles, ed. 2, C. H. Beck P.H., Bucharest, 2017, p. 6;

[4] Decision No. 146 of 25 March 2004 a Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, Nr. 416 of 10 May 2004;

Thus, a distinction is made between the existence of a law text according to the formal citerium (lex scripta) and the quality of the law – in relation to the substantive criterion (lex certa).

The formal criterion shall be assessed on the basis of the issuing body and the procedure to be complied with in the adoption of the law. According to art. 61 para. (1) the second sentence of the Constitution, the Parliament is (...) the only legislature of the country, further the provisions of art. 76, 77 and 78, stipulating that the law adopted by Parliament is subject to promulgation by the President of Romania and enters into force three days after its publication in the Official Gazette of Romania, part I, if no further date is foreseen in its content.

As regards the government's Ordinances, The Court held[5] that, 'by drafting such normative acts, the administrative body exercises a competence by award which, by its nature, falls within the legislative competence of Parliament. Therefore, the ordinance is not a law in a formal sense, but an administrative act of the law, assimilated to it by the effects that it produces, while respecting the substantive criterion.'

Next, the analysis of the existence of a law from the point of view of the substantive criterion relates to the subject matter of the norm, namely the nature of regulated social relations. These conditions add to the clarity and accessibility of the text of law, the European Court of Human Rights, in its case-law[6] showing that there is not enough the existence of a procedural legal rule contained in laws, ordinances, Government emergency ordinances, in international conventions and treaties to which Romania is part or other acts regulating a particular activity, but the notion of law incorporates the right of origin both legislative and jurisprudential and involves some qualitative conditions, inter alia those of accessibility and predictability.

For the full understanding of the substantive nature of the law, the relevant considerations are the recitals of decision No. 600 of 9th of November 2005 of the Constitutional Court[7] by which, concerning the concept of 'law', the Court held that, 'by definition, the law, as a legal act of power, is unilateral, giving expression exclusively to the will of the legislature, whose content and form are determined by the need to regulate a particular area of social relations and its specificities. '

The condition of accessibility of the law is fulfilled through the provision of art. 10 of Law No. 24 of 27 March 2000 to the fact that, with a view to their entry into force, the laws and other normative acts adopted by Parliament, the ordinances and judgments of the Government, the normative acts of the autonomous administrative authorities, as well as the orders, the instructions and other normative acts issued by the Central public administration bodies shall be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, part I.

It is therefore necessary to give the person the opportunity to acknowledge the content of the legal norm. By publishing it in the Official Gazette of Romania, the law fulfils the the requirement of accessibility, in the same vein as the European Court of Human Rights in in the cause Rotaru v. Romania, judgment of 29 March 2000, paragraph 54.

As far as secondary legislation is concerned, the condition of accessibility is achieved by bringing it to public knowledge, for example, by publishing on the websites of the institutions, and that the fulfilment of that condition is established in concrete, in relation to each subject and the circumstances of the case.

The predictability of the law provision presupposes that it must be sufficiently clear and precise to be applied.

In this respect, according to art. 7 para. (4) of Law No. 24 of 27 March 2000 on the rules of legislative technique for the drafting of normative acts, the legislative text must be formulated clearly, fluently and intelligible, without syntactic difficulties and obscure or equivocal passages. No affective load terms are used. The form and aesthetics of the expression must not prejudice the legal style, accuracy and clarity of the provisions.

With regard to the accessibility and predictability of the law, the Constitutional Court noted[8] that 'one of the requirements of the principle of compliance with laws relates to the quality of normative acts and that, in principle, any normative act must fulfil certain qualitative conditions, including predictability, which presupposes that it must be sufficiently clear and precise to be applied. Thus, the wording with sufficient precision of the normative act allows the persons concerned, who may, if necessary, appeal to the advice of a specialist, to provide a reasonable measure, in the circumstances of the case, of the consequences which may result from an determined act . Concerning the same law-quality requirements, the guarantee of the principle of legality, the European Court of Human Rights, by judgments of 4 May 2000, 25 January 2007, 24 May 2007 and 5 January 2010, rendered in the cases Rotaru v. Romania ( Paragraph 52), Sissanis v. Romania (paragraph 66), Dragotoniu and Militaru-Pidhorni v. Romania (paragraph 34) and Beyeler v. Italy (paragraph 109), made it compulsory to ensure these laws quality standards as guarantee of the principle of legality laid down in article 7 of the [6] ECHR, judgment in Dragotoniu and Militaru-Pidhorni v. Romania, 24 May 2007, paragraph 34 and 35; ECHR, judgment in Cantoni v French, 15 November 1996, paragraph 29; Judgment of the ECHR, Coëme and Others v. Belgium, 32492/96, 32547/96, 32548/96, 33209/96 and 33210/96, paragraph 145, ECHR 2000-VII and E.K. v. Turkey, No. 28496/95, paragraph 51, 7 February 2002;

[5] Ibidem;

[7] Decision No. 600 of November 9, 2005 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette Nr. 1060, Part I, of 26 November 2005;

[8] Decision no. 1 of the 10th of January 2014 of the Constitutional Court, Publised in The Official Gazzette of Romania, Part I, no. 123 of the 19th of February 2014;

Convention for the Protection of Human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Thus, by judgment in Sissanis v. Romania (paragraph 66), the European Court held that the phrase <prescribed by the law>requires the contested measure to have a basis in national law, but also seeks the quality of the law in question: it should indeed be accessible to the vigilante and predictability in relation to its effects.

It was also held that, in order for the law to satisfy the requirement of predictability, it must state with sufficient clarity the extent and modalities of the exercise of the discretion of the authorities in that field, taking into account the aimed legitimate purpose to provide the person with adequate protection against the arbitrary.

In addition, it has been held that it cannot be regarded as <law> merely a rule set out with sufficient precision, in order to enable the citizen to control his conduct, by appealing in need of expert advice on the matter, he must be able to provide, to a reasonable extent, to the circumstances of the case, the consequences which may result from a particular act. '

Moreover, the European Court of Human Rights has shown[9] that the significance of the notion of predictability depends largely on the context of the text, the area it covers, and the number and quality of its recipients.

The predictability of the law does not preclude the person concerned from having to resort to good advice in order to assess, at a reasonable level in the circumstances of the case, the consequences that might arise from a certain action[10]. This usually happens with professionals, accustomed to proving a great prudence in the exercise of their profession. It can also be expected from them to pay particular attention to the assessment of the risks involved[11].

Consequently, as a normative legal act, in general, is defined both by form and by content, the law in a broad sense, thus including assimilated acts, is the result of combining the formal criterion with that material.[12]

2.2. International conventions and treaties

The conventions and international treaties to which Romania is a party are included in the notion of 'law' in this regard being the provisions of art. 11 of the Romanian Constitution, which establishes that the treaties ratified by Parliament, according to the law, form part of national law, and if a treaty to which Romania is to become a party contains provisions contrary to the Constitution, the ratification can take place only after the revision of the Constitution.

Also, according to the provisions of art. 20 of the Constitution, the constitutional provisions on citizens' rights and freedoms will be interpreted and applied in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the pacts and other treaties to which Romania is a party. If there are inconsistencies between the pacts and the treaties on fundamental human rights, to which Romania is a party, and domestic laws, they have priority over international regulations, unless the constitution or national laws Contain more favourable provisions.

2.3. Compulsory case-law

Decisions given in the appeal in the interest of the law and the decisions rendered by the Panel on the untying of legal matters have binding force for the courts from the date of publication of decisions in the Official Gazette of Romania.

According to art. 474 para. (4) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the unlinking of the matters of legal proceedings is compulsory for the courts from the date of publication of the decision in the Official Gazette of Romania, part I.

Also, as regards the decisions of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, pronounced by the panel for the untying of legal matters in criminal matters, according to art. 477 para. (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the unlinking of matters of law is compulsory for courts from the date of publication of the decision in the Official Gazette of Romania, part I.

However, the judiciary cannot enter the field of legislative power.

In this respect, the Constitutional Court has held[13] that it has no power to engage in the field of law-making and criminal policy of the State, any contrary attitude constituting an interference with the jurisdiction of that constitutional authority. The Court acknowledges that, in that area, the legislature enjoys a rather large margin of discretion, given that it is in a position which allows it to assess, according to a number of criteria, the need for a particular criminal policy.

Therefore, on the basis of the principle of separation of powers in the state, the High Court of Cassation and Justice has no competence in the field of law.

This issue is relevant in the present case, given that the decisions of the High Court of Cassation and Justice on appeal in the interests of the law or for the untying of matters of law in criminal matters may also concern a question of procedural low. The High Court of Cassation and Justice has held[14] in this regard the following: 'the question of which the untying is subject

[9] ECHR, Groppera Radio AG and Others v. Switzerland of 28 March 1990, paragraph 68;
[10] ECHR, Tolstoy Miloslavsky v. The United Kingdom of Great Britain, July 13, 1995, paragraph 37;
[11] ECHR, Cantoni v. France, 22 June 2000, paragraph 29;
[12] Decision no. 146 of 25 March 2004 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 416 of May 10, 2004;
[13] Decision no. 405 of 15 June 2016 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no.517 of 08 July 2016; Decision no.629 of 4 November 2014 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.932 of 21 December 2014;
[14] Decision No. 7 of 17 April 2015 of the Panel for the untying of matters of law in criminal matters of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, No. 359 of 25 May 2015;

to the examination of the high Courts of Cassation and Justice must, as a rule, concern a matter of substantive law which depends on the substantive settlement of the case, which may only, as an exception, concern a procedural problem, i.e. to the extent that the solution given to it is significantly passed on to the settlement of the fund.'

Regarding the absence of the law of a judgment of the High Court given on appeal in the interests of the law or for the untying of matters of law, it was stated that[15] că the 'Decision No 2 of April 14, 2014 of the Supreme Court is not a normative act, in the meaning given to this notions of law no. 24/2000, republished, with subsequent amendments and additions, which in art. 11, makes a limitative enumeration of issuers of such acts, which does not include the High Court of Cassation and Justice by judgments given in the uniform interpretation and application of the law.

On the other hand, the judgments of the High Court on appeal in the interest of the law or for the untying of matters of law cannot be regarded as statutory laws, in the meaning of art. 173, the final sentence of the Penal Code, and, in the light of the fact that it does not regulate social defence relationships, does not establish rules of conduct and rules of crimination or which relate to criminal liability, its bases and limitations, but reflects only a interpretation of such provisions contained in normative acts drawn up and adopted in accordance with the legislative technical procedure applicable to the matter. In the same context, accepting the idea that the interpretative solutions rendered by the Supreme Court by prior judgments for the untying of matters of law and decisions given in appeal in the interest of the law are included in the sphere of criminal law would amount to a violation of the principle of separation of powers in the state by the judicial authority taking over the powers of the legislative power with the consequence of verifying the constitutionality of those judgments by the Court of Constitutional law. '

2.4. Case-law

In the Romanian criminal law, jurisprudence does not constitute a source of law, in this regard being also the decision no. 23 of 20 January 2016 of the Constitutional Court[16], whereby the Constitutional Court held that, in the continental system, the case-law does not constitute a source of law so that the meaning of a rule can be clarified in that way, because, in such a case, the judge would become a lawgiver.

However, this view must be nuanced with the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights[17], according to which the notion of ' law ', within the meaning of the EU Convention for the Protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, incorporates the right of origin both legislative and jurisprudential.

In order for the case-law to equate to the acceptance of the European Court of Human Rights with a law, it must undergo a stage of crystallization leading to the existence of a constant jurisprudence, formed over a large period of time, so as to enable the citizen to reasonably expect a certain interpretation of the rules, taking into account the developments in practice.

The analysis of jurisprudence as a source of law, in the light of the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, was made on the occasion of establishing the existence of a more favourable criminal law as a result of decision No. 2/2014 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice (by which it was decided that in the application of article 5 of the Penal Code, the limitation of criminal liability is an autonomous institution for the institution of the penalty) and subsequently to the decision of the Constitutional Court No. 265/2014 (by which it has been held that the provisions of article 5 of the Penal Code are constitutional in so far as they do not allow the combination of the provisions of successive laws in the establishment and enforcement of more favourable criminal law).

Thus, the High Court of Cassation and Justice recalled[18] that ' it has been held in principle by the Strasbourg court that the notion <law>in the light of the European Convention encompass the right of origin both legislative and jurisprudential, but decision No. 2 of 14 April 2014 handed down by the High Court of Cassation and Justice-the Assembly for the untying of matters of law in criminal matters, does not subdue to this notion, constituting only a stage in the complex process of crystallization of a case of jurisprudences consistent with the determination and enforcement of more favourable criminal law after the entry into force on 1 February 2014 of the new Penal Code, adopted by Law No. 286/2009.

In other words, a single judgment, either in the untying of a matter of law by the Supreme Court, in accomplishing its powers of interpretation and uniform application of the law, does not amount to the European Court's acceptance of a law, a concept which implies

[15] Decision No. 21/2014 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice-the panel for the untying of matters of law in Criminal Matters, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I No. 829 of 13 November 2014, which established that the provisions of article 5 para. 1 of the Penal Code must be interpreted, including the limitation of criminal liability, in the sense that the more favourable criminal law is applicable to offences committed before 1 February 2014 which have not yet been definitively judged, in accordance with decision No. 265/2014 of the Constitutional Court;

[16] Decision No. 23 of 20 January 2016 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no 240 of 31 March 2016;

[17] ECHR, Kokkinakis v. Greece of 25 May 1993; ECHR, judgment of S.W. and C.R. v. The United Kingdom of 22 November 1995; ECHR, judgment in Cantoni v. Franceadin 15 November 1996; ECHR, judgment of the E.K. v Turciadin 7 February 2002; ECHR, judgment in Pessino v Franceadin October 10, 2006);

[18] Decision no. 21/2014 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice - The Criminal Law Enforcement Unit, Published in the Official Gazette, Part I no. 829 of November 13, 2014; the existence of a constant jurisprudential guidance, formed over a long period of time.

However, the requirement of consistent case-law has not been met with regard to the determination and application of milder criminal law by national courts after 1 February 2014, given the very short period of time, only three months, pending the publication of the Constitutional Court's Decision no. 265 of May 6, 2014, and the different interpretations made in judicial practice for the purpose of assessing criminal law more favorably either globally or autonomously, especially as there was no unitary view of the latter in the latter as autonomous of different criminal law institutions.

In those circumstances, it cannot be the shaping of a constant case-law either in the application of the more favourable criminal laws in matters of criminal prescription in the period of only 20 days following the publication on 30 April 2014 of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Untying this issue of law until the end of its effects on 20 May 2014, when the interpretation in accordance with the Constitution of the provisions of art. 5 of the Penal Code became of immediate application and general compulsory. '

In the light of the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, as has been mentioned above, the autonomous notion of ' legislation ' also includes jurisprudence, but this case-law must be constant. The decision-making function for the courts serves precisely to remove the doubts that may exist with regard to the interpretation of the rules, taking into account the developments in the daily practice, provided that the result is coherent with the substance of the offence and clearly foreseeable [19].

Consequently, it can reasonably be argued that a jurisprudential rule, as it is respected by the majority of the internal courts, is clear and accessible and that its application in the present case is foreseeable[20], it can be considered, 'law' within the meaning of Jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights.

3. Deciziile Curţii Constituţionale și efectul general obligatoriu al acestora

According to the provisions of art. 147 para. (4) of the Constitution of Romania, from the date of publication, the decisions of the Constitutional Court are generally binding and have power only for the future. The Court[21] has ruled, with a value of principle, that the compulsory force accompanying the judicial Acts, so also the decisions of the Constitutional Court, attache not only to the device, but also to the considerations which it supports. Thus, it was noted that both the recitals and the device of its decisions are generally binding and are imposed with the same force on all the subjects of law.

Although its decisions are generally binding, the Constitutional Court has no competence in the field of law-making. According to art. 2 para. (3) of Law No. 47/1992, the Constitutional Court shall only pronounce on the constitutionality of the acts in respect of which it was seised, without being able to amend or supplement the provisions subject to scrutiny. In its case-law[22], it held that Parliament is free to decide on the state's criminal policy, any opposite attitude constituting an interference with the jurisdiction of that constitutional authority. While, in principle, Parliament enjoys exclusive competence in regulating measures relating to the State's criminal policy, that competence is not absolute in the sense of excluding the exercise of constitutionality control over the measures adopted.

The principle of legality is naturally complemented by the principle of separation of powers in the state, the Constitutional Court having no legislative powers.

It must not be understood from that conclusion that the decisions analysing the constitutionality of a legal provision do not affect the rule of law. As previously mentioned, they are compulsory from the date of publication in the Official Gazette of Romania, and the application and interpretation of the provisions laid down by law must be carried out only in accordance with those which are made by simple decisions or interpretative finding of unconstitutionality.

Therefore, their contribution, in our particular case, in criminal procedural matters, in compliance with the limits of the principle of legality, shall be retreated to the legal provisions analysed, already existing, by excluding the non-constitutional norm from the Legal order or by granting the constitutional meaning.

Although this aspect proves to be clearly established, the general binding effect of the decisions of the Constitutional Tribunal continues to exist by imposing rules of law on the nature of criminal procedural law.

The establishment of a rule of criminal procedural conduct both by the recitals of decisions rejecting the exceptions of unconstitutionality and by the removal of unconstitutional legal rules in force, but especially by the imperative stipulation of a certain positive conduct exceeding the scope of the rule which formed the subject-matter of the exception of unconstitutionality – the aspect encountered in the interpretative decisions,

[19] ECHR, the decision of S.W. v. the United Kingdom of Great Britain, 22 November 1995, Series A no. 335-B, p. 41, paragraph 36;

[20] ECHR, Lupas and others v. Romania of 14 December 2006, paragraph 69;

[21] Decision of the Plenum of the Constitutional Court no. 1/1995 regarding the mandatory of its decisions under the constitutionality control, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 16 of 26 January 1995; Decision no. 1.415 of November 4, 2009 of the Constitutional Court,, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 796 of 23 November 2009 and Decision no. 414 of April 14, 2010 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 291 of May 4, 2010;

[22] Decision no. 405 of 15 June 2016 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 517 of July 8, 2016; Decision no. 629 of 4 November 2014 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 932 of December 21, 2014;

gives to the decisions of the Constitutional Court the nature of sourses of procedural, criminal law[23].

This is the direct consequence of the general binding effect of the decisions of the Constitutional Court and the failure of the legislature to agree unconstitutional provisions with the provisions of the Constitution, within 45 days after publication of the decision, thus creating a legislative void.

However, the passiveness of the legislature does not take effect in the event of decisions rejecting unconstitutionality exceptions-when the legal rules continue to enjoy the presumption of constitutionality.

The provisions of art. 147 para. (4) of the Constitution of Romania, which establishes the binding of the general effect, do not distinguish between decisions which reveal the unconstitutionality of a legal provision and decisions rejecting unconstitutionality exceptions. A well-known rule of interpretation is that „where the law does not distinguish, neither should we distinguish „(ubi lex non distinguist, nec nos distinguere debemus). Perfectly applicable in the present case, all the decisions of the Constitutional Tribunal, without distinguishing whether or not the unconstitutionality of a law or ordinance or a provision of a law or ordinance have been established, are general mandatory.

In the case of decisions establishing the unconstitutionality of a text by law, by virtue of the negative legislature, the Constitutional Court excludes the rules contrary to constitutional provisions from the legal order and is fully justified the effect generally binding erga omnes, without the possibility of a text being both unconstitutional and constitutional in the light of the subjects of law.

The general binding effects of erga omnes are a natural consequence of the constitutional provision found in art. 147 para. (1) stating that the provisions of the laws and ordinances in force and those of the regulations, as established as unconstitutional, cease to be legal effects at 45 days after the publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court if, in this The Parliament or the Government, as the case may be, do not agree the unconstitutional provisions with the provisions of the Constitution. During that period, the provisions established as unconstitutional are suspended by law.

As regards the decisions rejecting unconstitutionality exceptions, there is obviously no such effect of the suspension of law and, subsequently, the termination of legal effects. By the time the finding of its unconstitutionality is found, any rule is presumed to conform to the provisions of the fundamental law. However, as previously mentioned, the Romanian Constitution confers a generally binding effect on all decisions of the Constitutional Court. As a symmetry of the consequences of the finding of the unconstitutionality of legal provisions, the general binding effect is manifested in the case of decisions rejecting the exception of unconstitutionality by maintaining the obligation of application, in the rules of law considered constitutional within the limits of the control carried out. [24]

However, in that case, the determination of the framework of the binding general effect must be carried out in accordance with the authority of the court ruling of the judicial decision, the general binding effect being significantly diminished.

Therefore, we note that the rules on Civil Procedure, which are compatible with the nature of the proceedings before the Constitutional Tribunal, confer on the authority of the judgment, including the decision rejecting the exception of unconstitutionality, but only in Relation to a new exception of unconstitutionality raised by the same parties, in the same case and relating to the same legal provisions, for the same reasons. As such, the generally binding effect, is limited in this case, to the question cut with the authority of work judged. The analysis of the Constitutional Court is circumscribing the criticality and factual and legal situation existing in the case in which the exception was lifted. At the same time, the interpretation of the provisions of art. 29 para. (3) of Law No. 47/1992 on the organisation and functioning of the Constitutional Court, it is apparent that the provisions which have not been found unconstitutional by an earlier decision of the Constitutional Court may be subject to the exception. Therefore, the general binding effect of the decisions establishing the constitutionality of the legal provisions criticized should not be absoluted. Under no circumstances will such a decision be able to be opposed to the power of work judged in another case or even in the same procedural framework, but for other reasons.

By Decision No. 169/1991[25] The Constitutional Court held that, the same parties and for the same reasons cannot reiterate the exception of unconstitutionality, since the authority of the work on trial would be infringed. But in another process the exception can be reiterated, thus enabling the Constitutional Court to reanalyze the same issue of unconstitutionality, as a result of invoking new grounds or of intervening other new elements, which amend the case-law of the court. ' The consequence of the elements of differentiation of law and of fact between the cases in which the exceptions of unconstitutionality are raised, the general binding effect of the decision establishing the constitutionality of a legal provision will operate only inter partes.

However, although a decision rejecting the exception of unconstitutionality enjoys the authority of the Court of Justice, that aspect is recognised only in respect of the considerations which support and explain the solution adopted (decisive considerations), As well as (...) of those who have been debated in the process

[23] F. Streteanu, D. Nițu, Criminal Law. General Part, Vol. I, Universul Juridic P.H., Bucharest, 2014, p. 75;
[24] I. Morar, M. Constantinescu, The Constitutional Court of Romania, Albatros P.H., Bucharest, 1997, p. 162;
[25] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.151 of 12 April 2000;

(decision-making considerations). The Working authority shall not concern the indifferent considerations, which may be lacking in the content of the reasoning, without it leading to the lack of foundation of the judgment.' [26]

Therefore, we do not exclude de plano the possibility of establishing in the recitals of decisions rejecting exceptions to non-constitutionality of general procedural law rules, and not strictly limited to the cause of the judgment, which, at the same time, constitutes decisive considerations supporting the given solution and thus the general binding effect imposed on all legal subjects.

In the case of interpretative decisions, the Constitutional Court establishes the constitutional interpetation of a text of law, thus saving the legal provision from its wholly removal from the legal order.

However, there are precedents when the constitutionality control has been adopted by the interpretative powers of judicial bodies, but also of positive legislating powers. By imposing a constitutional interpretation mechanism, the Constitutional Court excludes from application a certain procedural rule of law in a given interpretation or may determine its constitutional meaning even by effectively adding to the text of law of new rules of law, in order to confer to the rule a constitutional meaning.

If the limitation of the application of a text of law capable of several interpretations, by establishing its constitutional meaning, falls within the exercise of the powers of the Constitutional Tribunal's negative legislature, the same cannot be stated in establishing constitutional interpretation by adding new rules of law. In the latter case, the nature of the legal source of the decisions of the Constitutional Tribunal is evident.

4. Effects of Constitutional Court decisions in criminal proceedings – sources of criminal procedural law on invalidity

'The first consequence of the principle of legality is absolute and legal invalidity (Ope Legis), of all acts carried out not in conformity with or contrary to the positive rules of Criminal Procedure law.'[27]

The Constitutional Court noted [28] that, 'the nulities of procedural and legal acts occupy an important place in the sphere of collateral ensuring the effectiveness of the principle of legality of the criminal process and the principle of the finding of truth, being designed to remove infringements of the procedural rules which intervened on the occasion of the establishment of a procedural act or of the proceeding to the fulfilment of a legal act and the negative consequences which those infringements have caused in the criminal proceedings.'

The matter of nullity has been reformed by the current regulation, being limited in cases of absolute nullity, with the excluding from the absolute nulities of non-compliance with the provisions on referral to the court, the conducting of the investigation of social responsibility for minors, material competence and the quality of the person of the Court superior to the competent legal authority, as well as the material competence and the quality of the person of the criminal prosecution body and the attenuated sanctioning thereof by the establishment of deadlines to which it may be invoked, as a consequence of the regulation of the preliminary chamber. As regards the exclusion from absolute nulities of infringements of the provisions relating to substantive jurisdiction and the quality of the person of the criminal prosecution body, in the doctrine[29] it was shown that it seeks to avoid exceeding the duration of the reasonable grounds for resolving the cases, the possible harm caused by the conduct of judicial research.

Furthermore, as regards the relative nulities, the relevant is to eliminate the possibility of the judge or court to invoke, on its own motion, the relative nulities and to take them into account at any stage of the process, except in breach of the rules of Material competence or the quality of the person, where the judgment was carried out by a court superior to the competent legal authority and the irregularity of the procedure for the citation of a party.

In the absence of a clearly defined purpose by the legislator and on the basis of the fundamental principle of legality, the Constitutional Court has penalised some of the amendments adopted in matters of nullity, in that regard by stating[30] regarding the provisions of art. 281 para. (1) lit. (b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, that the legislative solution contained in those provisions, which does not govern in the category of absolute nulities, breaches of the provisions relating to material competence and the quality of the person of the Criminal prosecution is unconstitutional.

The consequence of the decision of the Constitutional Court, definitive and generally binding, is to sanction the absolute nulity of non-compliance with the provisions regulating the substantive competence and the quality of the person of the criminal prosecution body . Although it can be argued that the decision of the Constitutional Court has not been dictated by procedural law, but has established the constitutional meaning of the provisions of art. 281 para. (1) lit. b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, we

[26] The Decision no. 554 of the 19th of September 2017 of the Constitutional Court, Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 1013 of the 21 of December 2017;

[27] I. Tanoviceanu, op.cit., p. 35;

[28] The Decision no. 554 of the 19th of September 2017 of the Constitutional Court, Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 1013 of the 21 of December 2017;

[29] C. Ghigheci, The principles of the criminal trial in The Criminal Procedure Code, Universul Juridic P.H., Bucharest 2014, p.37;

[30] Decision no. 302/04 May 2017 of The Constitutional Court, Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 556 of the 17 of July 2017; cannot omit the fact that the provisions of art. 281 para. (1) lit. (b) of The Code of Criminal Procedure have a clear and strictly delimited content to the material competence and the quality of the person of the Superior Court, and is evident the intention of the legislator to express the removal from the absolute nulity of the infringement of the rules on material competence and the quality of the person of the criminal prosecution body.

An interpretative decision is likely to intervene if the legal norm has several interpretations, one of which is unconstitutional, the Constitutional Court rescuing the provision of law from its inapplicability by preserving the constitutional meaning.

In the present case, we note that the provisions of art. 281 para. (1) lit. b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, only by an interpretation per a contrario, exclude from the category of absolute nulities the infringements of the provisions relating to material competence and the quality of the person of the criminal prosecution body. Although the latter interpretation was penalised by decision No. 302/04.05.2017 of the Constitutional Court, the direct effect is to establish a new case of absolute nullity, unregulated by law, so of a new rule of criminal procedural law.

Also, by Decision No. 554/2017 the Constitutional Court[31] upheld the exception of unconstitutionality and found that the legislative solution contained in the provisions of art. 282 para. (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which does not allow for the invocation of the relative nullity, is unconstitutional. According to art. 282 para. (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the relative nulity may be invoked by the prosecutor, the suspect, the defendant, the other parties or the injured person, where there is a procedural interest in the breach of the legal provision violated. In that case, the exclusion of the possibility of the judge and the Court of Justice to invoke the relative nulity is apparent from the logical interpretation – per a contrario of the provision which formed the subject-matter of the exception of unconstitutionality.

Both as a result of the fact that in the case of interpretative decisions the legal provision does not cease to have legal effects at 45 days after the publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court if, within that period, the Parliament or the Government, as the case may be, do not put in agreement the unconstitutional provisions to the provisions of the Constitution, but it continues to produce effects in the constitutional sense established and as a result of the general binding effect, by Decision No. 554/19.09. 2017 the Constitutional Tribunal, shall be granted directly to the judge and to the Court of Justice to invoke the relative nulity, although this is not governed by law.

In other words, the Constitutional Court does not remove from application a provision of a law, on the basis of its duties as a negative legislature, is not confined to preserving the constitutional meaning of the legal norm, but penalises the lack of regulation by the establishment of new rules of criminal procedural law, thus constituting a genuine source of law.

It should be pointed out that the object of the exception of unconstitutionality may only form a provision of a law, and not its absence, by decisions given to the Constitutional Court not having jurisdiction to amend or supplement the provisions subject to Control.

Moreover, with regard to the establishment of the constitutional meaning, it should be noted that the reasoning per a contrario, by itself, does not give the legal norm more meanings, but on the contrary, limits the applicability of a provision, without extended to unforeseen cases of law.[32]

Although an intrinsic issue of constitutionality is not identified in the aforementioned legal provisions, but only a lack of regulation, and the intervention of the Constitutional Court does not find it justified, we nevertheless consider that the solutions arranged on the merits of the case are in total agreement with the principle of legality of the criminal process, although the legislative powers are the legal power and the interpretation and enforcement of the law is incumbent upon judicial bodies.

In this context, the granting of the character of the source of criminal procedural law to the decisions of the Constitutional Court proves to be an imperative, in this way, the conduct of the criminal process taking place predictably, the consequence that according to art. 147 para. (4) of the Constitution of Romania, from the date of publication in the Official Gazette of Romania, the decisions of the Constitutional Court are generally binding.

That assertion is fully valid in the cases analysed, the sanction which arises in the event of non-compliance with the provisions relating to the jurisdiction of the material and the quality of the person of the criminal prosecution body and the possibility of the judge or the Court of Justice to invoke the relative nulity of its own motion.

However, the task of integrating and applying the new rule of criminal procedural law established by the decisions of the Constitutional Tribunal in the conduct of the criminal proceedings lies with the judicial bodies, without there being any rules for the application of the mandatory character .

Thus, the provisions of art. 281 para. (3) and (4) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, lay down deadlines in which or until absolute nulity can be invoked, depending on the time of the process in which it intervenes.

[31] The Decision no. 554/19 September 2017 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.1013/21.December 2017;

[32] I. Neagu, A Criminal Procedure Treaty, General part, second edition, Universul Juridic P.H., Bucharest,2010, p. 57;

It is concluded from the economy of the rules of nullity that the legislature expressly limited the possibility of invoking absolute nullity in the criminal prosecution phase after the preliminary chamber procedure was concluded. According to art. 281 para. (4) lit. (a) the Code of Criminal Procedure breaches of the provisions sanctioned with absolute nullity which may intervene in the criminal prosecution phase (set out in article 281 para. (1) lit. e) and F):

The presence of the suspect or defendant, when his participation is obligatory according to the law; the assisting by the lawyer of the suspect or defendant and the other parties, where the assistance is obligatory must therefore be invoked until the procedure is concluded in the preliminary chamber, if the infringement intervened during the criminal prosecution or in the preliminary chamber procedure.

On the other hand, the cases of absolute nullity which may interfere with the preliminary chamber and Judgment (referred to in article 281 para. (1) lit. A)-D): Composition of the trial panel; the substantive competence and personal competence of the courts, when the judgment was carried out by a court lower than the competent legal authority; advertising of the court hearing; the prosecutor's participation, when his participation is compulsory according to the law may be invoked in any state of the process.

Although the decision of the Constitutional Court No. 302/04.05.2017 concerns the provisions of art. 281 para. (1) lit. (b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the infringement of which may be invoked in any state of the criminal proceedings, in determining the period up to which the infringement of the provisions relating to material competence may be invoked and the quality of the person of the Prosecution cannot omit the rationale of the limitation of the allegation of absolute nulliity according to the procedural phase in which the infringement took place.

At the same time, the provisions of art. 282 para. (2) and (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, govern the deadlines to which the relative nulity may be invoked, without there being a legal provision at present to stipulate whether the judge or court is bound by those deadlines following the decision of the Constitutional Court No 554/19.09. 2017 through which was directly awarded to the judge, namely the Court of Justice, to invoke the relative nulity.

We are therefore witnessing the creation of a vicious circle in which the decisions of the Constitutional Court become sources of criminal procedural law by establishing rules of law, in the case of a legislative loophole inconsistent with constitutional principles, rules such as cover the legislative void but which generate new legislative loopholes by the lack of legal rules governing the application of the new rules of criminal procedural law.

In this situation, it is up to the judicial bodies to interpret the law by analogy or application of the analogue supplement, without being able to invoke the lack of legal provision in the conduct of the criminal proceedings. 'The activity leading to the realisation of justice repressive must necessarily follow its course and reach the end. The law of Criminal Procedure disciplines this activity, but in the course of its conduct may arise exceptional situations, which have escaped the legislature's provision and are therefore not governed by the law. The silence of the law does not dispense with the interpreter to settle the new situations, so the repressive activity would remain suspended and condemned to abandon.

While the interpretation of the substantive criminal law when it finds that the law is silent, absolses and terminates the prosecution, the interpreter of criminal procedural law, has to make the law speak even when it is silent, because it owes the action repressive to the end.'[33]

In this respect, in the doctrine it was shown that 'then, when the gaps in the criminal Procedure Law cannot be fulfilled by an extensive interpretation, it will necessarily have to resort to the analogue supplement.

For this it will be sought in the law of Criminal Procedure if there is no express provision regulating in another matter a situation or a similar report. If there is such a provision then the completion of the gap by analogy may be accepted if we encounter the same conditions as they make interpretation possible by analogy.'[34]

Application of the interpretation to the case in question, in relation to the reason for the imposition of the deadlines for invoking absolute nullity, namely the limitation of the possibility to invoke infringements of the provisions sanctioned with absolute nullity in the follow-up phase following the preliminary chamber procedure, invoking the infringement of the provisions relating to material competence and the quality of the person of the criminal prosecution body will not be able to take place in any state of the process, but only until conclusion of the procedure in the preliminary chamber, according to art. 281 para. (4) lit. A) of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Things are different for the time limit by which the judge or court may invoke the relative nulleness. In this respect, the recitals of Decision No. 554/2017 of the Constitutional Court, which also enjoys the general binding effect, which has established that the possibility of a relative nullity is required 'in the light of the outcome of the procedure in the preliminary chamber concerning the determination of the legality of the administration of evidence and the conduct of procedural acts by the prosecution authorities, has a direct influence on the conduct of the judgment on the merits, which may be decisive for the determination of guilt/innocence of the defendant (...) and as regards the role of the court at the trial stage of the criminal proceedings, the court considers that such a legislative solution — which does not allow, as a rule, the claim of relative invalidity of its own motion — cannot be justified only by the philosophy of the restriction of the active role of the court and, in general, by rethinking the system of criminal proceedings, in the sense of its approximation, in certain respects, by the adversial system. In this respect, the Court notes that, unlike the adversial system, in which the judge bears responsibility, in principle, solely on the correctness of the conduct of the proceedings, the task of establishing the facts and the guilt of the jurors, in the Romanian criminal process the court also assumes responsibility for these essential elements, which constitute the purpose of the process —-the determination of the offence and the guilt. '

[33] I. Tanoviceanu, op.cit., p. 49;
[34] Idem, p. 50;

Therefore, the possibility for the judge and the court to take account of its own motion of the relative nullity is required on the basis of the principle of finding the truth and for the full clarification of the circumstances of the case.

However, that judgment is not attained in the event of limitation of the possibility of relying on the relative nullity by the court under the conditions of art. 282 para. (2) and (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, namely in the course or immediately after the act or at the latest until the closure of the preliminary chamber procedure, if the infringement intervened during the prosecution or in this proceeding, until the first period of judgment with the legal procedure fulfilled, if the infringement intervened in the course of prosecution, when the court was seised of an agreement to recognise the guilt, until the next period of judgment with the full procedure, if the infringement intervened during the judgment.

Without identifying, in this case, express provisions regulating a similar situation or report and fully agreeing with the rules of compulsory procedural law laid down in the decision of the Constitutional Court, the judicial bodies will appeal to the systematic interpretation consisting, 'in the clarification of the meaning of a legal rule by linking it with other provisions belonging to the same branch of law.'[35]. Therefore, 'from all the methods of interpretation will be used with priority in interpreting the rules of criminal Procedure all those methods that allow to the interpreter to converge towards the fundamental principles of Criminal procedure. Also between two methods of which one leads to a solution in accordance with these principles will be given priority to the latter. '[36]

Consequently, by a systematic interpretation it can be concluded that the judge of the preliminary chamber will be able to invoke the relative nullity when it is necessary to find out the truth and to resolve the case until the closure the preliminary chamber procedure, including in the procedure governed by the provisions of art. 347 of the Code on Criminal proceedings, to resolve the appeal against the conclusion of the preliminary chamber. As regards the court, I conclude that, on the basis of the same arguments, the court will be able to invoke the relative nullity in any state of the criminal proceedings, that interpretation being consistent with the principle of legality of the criminal process and the finding of the truth.

5. Conclusions

The law constitutes the foundation of the principle of legality, and its observance is imperative in conducting the criminal proceedings. As an activity governed by law, but which also knows legislative loopholes and is not permitted to abandon the law, it is necessary to exclude equivalence between criminal procedural law and the source of criminal procedural law, with a wider area of existence.

The extensive interpretation of the notion of criminal procedural law encompasses both primary and secondary legislation, which comes to detail the rules of law, within the limits and conditions imposed by them. However, the rules of criminal procedural law are not confined to the law lato sensu, with the obligation to comply with compulsory jurisprudence, including the decisions of the Constitutional Court and the compulsory interpretation of the legal norms by Judicial bodies.

The establishment, mainly of the notion of criminal procedural law, led to the exclusion of the possibility of granting this nature to the decisions of the Constitutional Tribunal and their attribution of the nature of the source of criminal procedural law. Although the autonomous sense of the notion of law encompasses the concept of the European Court of Human Rights and the case-law, a single decision, even with a generally binding effect, does not satisfy the conditions for a consistent and crystallized practice over a long time. Therefore, I conclude that the decisions of the Constitutional Court do not fall within the notion of criminal procedural law, this possibility remaining open to the constant and lengthy case-law subsequently developed on the basis of the general binding effect of Constitutional Court decisions.

The affirmation of the nature of the criminal procedural law, the decisions of the Constitutional Tribunal, even in the absence of legislative intervention to implement the rules not conforming to the constitutional principles, are supported by the mandatory general effect of those stated by the constitutional authority.

Both the judicial bodies and all other participants in the criminal proceedings will also be held equally in compliance with the rules of criminal procedural law established by the decisions of the Constitutional Tribunal, which are governed by the principle of Fundamental nature of the general legality of the Romanian Constitution.

[35] I. Neagu, op.cit., p. 56;
[36] I.Tanoviceanu, op. cit., p. 46;

The impact of the lack of provision of a text of law or of sanctioning it through the decisions of the Constitutional Tribunal and the establishment of new rules of criminal procedural law conveys to judicial bodies the task of identifying the most optimal solutions in conducting the criminal process in agreement with the principle of legality. The interpretation by analogy or application of the analogue supplement is not contrary to the principle of legality, as the basis for any interpretation is the fundamental principles of the criminal process, including that of legality.

However, sanctioning the legislative void through the intervention of the Constitutional Court and its complacement by new rules of law lacking rules of application and integration as a whole of the regulation of the criminal process, in addition to the fact that it establishes as a responsibility of the Judicial bodies a much too large burden, lacking predictability in the conduct of the criminal process.

The evolution of the case-law of the Constitutional Tribunal remains an open topic, with the aim of crystallizing or not its character as a source of criminal procedural law. Likewise, the passiveness of the legislature in fulfilling the obligation to agree unconstitutional provisions with the provisions of the Constitution requires a thorough analysis in order to justify the full transmission to the judicial bodies of the duty to comply with the principle of legality, although in this respect the main task lies with the legislator by providing for legal rules

References

- C. Ghigheci, The principles of the criminal trial in The Criminal Procedure Code, Universul Juridic P.H., Bucharest 2014;
- I. Morar, M. Constantinescu, Constitutional Court of the Romania, Albatros P.H., București, 1997;
- I. Neagu, A Criminal Procedure Treaty, General part, Second Edition, Universul Juridic P.H., Bucharest, 2010;
- F. Streteanu, D. Nițu, Criminal Law. General Part, Vol. I, Universul Juridic P.H., Bucharest, 2014;
- M. Udroiu, in M. Udroiu (coord.), Code of Criminal Procedure. Commentary on articles, ed. 2, C. H. Beck P.H., Bucharest, 2017;
- I. Tanoviceanu, Treaty of Law and Criminal Procedure, vol. IV, Second edition of the course of law and criminal Procedure, reviewed and supplemented by V. Dongoroz and. A., typography, "The Judicial Courier", Bucharest, 1924;
- N. Volonciu, Treaty of Criminal Procedure, Vol. I, Peideia P.H., Bucharest, 1998.
- Decision of the Plenum of the Constitutional Court no. 1/1995 regarding the mandatory of its decisions under the constitutionality control, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 16 of 26 January 1995;
- Decision No. 169/1991 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.151 of 12 April 2000;
- Decision No. 146 of 25 March 2004 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, Nr. 416 of 10 May 2004;
- Decision No. 600 of November 9, 2005 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette Nr. 1060, Part I, of 26 November 2005;
- Decision no. 1.415 of November 4, 2009 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 796 of 23 November 2009;
- Decision no. 414 of April 14, 2010 of the Constitutional Court Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 291 of May 4, 2010;
- Decision no. 1 of the 10th of January 2014 of the Constitutional Court, Publised in The Official Gazzette of Romania, Part I, no. 123 of the 19th of February 2014;
- Decision no.629 of 4 November 2014 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.932 of 21 December 2014;
- Decision No. 23 of 20 January 2016 of the Constitutional Court, }ublished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no 240 of 31 March 2016;
- Decision no. 405 of 15 June 2016 of the Constitutional Court, Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no.517 of 08 July 2016;
- Decision no. 302 of the 04 May 2017 of the Constitutional Court, Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 556 of the 17 of July 2017;
- Decision no. 554 of the 19th of September 2017 of the Constitutional Court, Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 1013 of the 21 of December 2017;
- Decision No. 21/2014 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice-the panel for the untying of matters of law in Criminal Matters, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I No. 829 of 13 November 2014;
- Decision No. 7 of 17 April 2015 of the Panel for the untying of matters of law in criminal matters of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, No. 359 of 25 May 2015;
- ECHR, judgment in Groppera Radio AG and Others v. Switzerland,of 28 March 1990;
- ECHR, judgment in Kokkinakis v. Greece of 25 May 1993;
- ECHR, judgment in Tolstoy Miloslavsky v. The United Kingdom of Great Britain of 13 July 1995;

- ECHR, judgment of S.W. and C.R. v. The United Kingdom of 22 November 1995;
- ECHR, judgment in Cantoni v. French of 15 November 1996;
- ECHR, judgment in Coëme and Others v. Belgium, no. 32492/96, 32547/96, 32548/96, 33209/96 şi 33210/96;
- CEDO, judgment in Cantoni v. French of 22 June 2000;
- ECHR, judgment in E.K. v. Turkey, No. 28496/95 of 7 February 2002;
- ECHR, judgment in Pessino v. France of 10 October 2006;
- ECHR, judgment in Lupas and others v. Romania of 14 December 2006;
- ECHR, judgment in Dragotoniu and Militaru-Pidhorni v. Romania of 24 May 2007.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE RIGHT OF DEFENSE IN THE CRIMINAL TRIAL

Alina-Marilena ŢUCĂ

Abstract

One of the fundamental principles of the criminal trial is the principle of enforcing the right of defense, being not only an expression of the rule of law, but also a necessary condition for the efficient course of justice. The right of defense is a complex right, comprising all the possibilities provided by the legislator to the parties and subjects in the criminal proceedings, in order to defend their interests, and is expressed under three general aspects: the possibility of the parties to defend themselves in person during the criminal trial; the obligation of the judicial bodies to consider ex-officio aspects also favorable to the parties involved in the criminal trial; the possibility and sometimes the obligation to provide legal assistance during the criminal trial. The right of defense is a fundamental right, guaranteed by the Constitution, by the Criminal Procedure Code and by the international treaties. Any violation of the right of defense implies various penalties, including the most important sanction provided by the Criminal Procedure Code, respectively the absolute nullity of the acts taken in violation of this right, including the nullity of the decision pronounced under these conditions and retrial of the case.

Keywords: the rigt of defense, defense in person, defense through attorney, penalties applied if the right of defense is not respected.

1. Introduction

Enforcement of the right of defense represents a fundamental principle of the criminal trial and, at the same time, an essential component of the right to a fair trial and a balance is maintained between the individual interests of the people participating to the criminal trial and the general interest of the society to hold criminally liable all the persons who perpetrated a criminal offence if this right is respected.

Taking into consideration the importance of this right in the course of justice, through this study we intend to present the modalities through which this right is established both by the Romanian legislator and by the main international regulations, to underline the fact that it is a complex right, integrating all the possibilities granted by the legislator to the parties and main subjects in the proceedings in order to defend their interests. Thus, the national legislator underlined the importance of the right of defense, both by stipulating this right among the fundamental rights established by the Romanian Constitution and by a detailed presentation of this right in the Criminal Procedure Code. A special importance was equally assigned to the principle of enforcing the right of defense at the European level, eloquently stipulating the actual dimensions of this right, considering the fact that this principle represents an essential condition for the effective course of justice.

At the same time, in this study we will present the means through which this right can be exercised, as well as the guarantees provided by the legislator for the respect of this right and the penalties applied if this right is violated.

Taking into consideration the fact that the course of justice in a state of law can only take place by respecting the legitimate rights and interests of a person, through this study we intend to illustrate that the right of defense is not an additional institution, but it represents an essential and necessary right for any act of justice. Far from being exhaustive, this study can represent a supporting element for certain legal or practical clarifications related to enforcing the right of defense.

2. The right of defense- definition and regulation

The criminal trial represents "the activity regulated by the law, performed by the competent bodies, with the participation of the parties and of other persons, in order to promptly and completely establish the acts which represent offences, thus any person perpetrating an offence could be punished according to their guilt and no innocent person could be held criminally liable."[1]

Based on this definition, it results that a person who perpetrated an offense is held criminally liable by the judicial bodies only after a criminal trial.

This criminal trial is governed by certain general rules, by certain fundamental principles, which reflect the overall conception of the entire regulation.

One of the fundamental principles of the criminal trial is the principle of enforcing the right of defense, being not only an expression of the rule of law, but also a necessary condition for the efficient course of justice. The right of defense in the criminal trial represents an essential component of the right to a fair trial and a balance is maintained between the individual interests of the people participating to the criminal trial and the general interest of the society to hold criminally liable all the persons who perpetrated a criminal offence if this right is respected. The right to defense can be defined as "all the fair trial guarantees granted by the law to the parties or to the main subjects in the proceedings within a criminal procedure or criminal trial, in order to efficiently defend their legitimate rights and interests"[2].

* PhD, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: oprealina83@yahoo.ro)

[1] Ion Neagu, Tratat de procedură penală, Partea generală, Ediţia a-II-a, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti 2010, p.19-20.

Taking into consideration the importance of this right in the course of justice, it was established through several international law regulations. Thus, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[3] defines the main rights of the human being, which also include several procedural rights: the right to a fair trial, the right to defense, the right to be a subject of law, the right to an effective remedy. Despite the fact that the Declaration is not an international treaty, implying legal consequences if its provisions are violated, it became a reference document for the States and its provisions were subsequently included in various international treaties. Article 11 point 1 of this document mentions that "everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defense." This underlines the particular importance of the right of defense in a fair trial.

Another extremely important international document, expressly establishing the right of defense of any person, is the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, also known as the European Convention on Human Rights[4], which, in Article 6 point 3, specifies the fact that "everyone charged with a criminal offence has the following minimum rights:

a) to be informed promptly, in a language which he understands and in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him;
b) to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defense;
c) to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing or, if he has not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so require;
d) to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;
e) to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court."

We notice the fact that this Convention establishes a detailed regulation of the right of defense, capable to highlight its considerable importance within a fair trial, specific to any democratic society. The text of law mentioned establishes both the right of an accused person charged with a criminal offence to defend himself in person during the proceedings against him (defense which implies several guarantees: information in a language which he understands, possibility to examine or have examined witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him), as well as his right to be defended through legal assistance of his own choosing, or if he has not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free, under certain conditions, however, without being an exhaustive enumeration of the guarantees which have to be provided to a person charged with a criminal offence during the criminal proceedings, since the texts mentions the fact that "everyone charged with a criminal offence has the following minimum rights", and then the rights are enumerated. All these rights cannot be separately treated, but they represent all together an essential component of the right to a fair trial.

At the same time, the Charter of the Fundamental Rights of the European Union[5] reinstates the important of the right of defense, the document expressly establishing, in Article 48 paragraph 2, the importance of guaranteeing this right, stating that "respect for the rights of the defense of anyone who has been charged shall be guaranteed." Article 47, paragraphs 2 and 3 also establish this right, the Charter specifying that "everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal previously established by law. Everyone shall have the possibility of being advised, defended and represented. Legal aid shall be made available to those who lack sufficient resources in so far as such aid is necessary to ensure effective access to justice."

As previously mentioned, a special importance was given to the principle of guaranteeing the right of defense at the European level, eloquently shaping the actual dimensions of this right, considering the fact that this principle represents an essential condition for the effective course of justice.

The importance of this right is equally underlined at the national level by the Romanian legislation and the Constitution of Romania has a special place reserved for the right of defense. Thus, Article 24 of the above mentioned regulation specifies the fact that the right of defense is guaranteed and the parties are

[2] Mihail Udroiu, Procedură penală, Partea Generală, Ediţia 5, Editura C.H.Beck, Bucureşti 2018, p. 42.
[3] Passed on 16 December 1948, by the third session of the General UN Assembly.
[4] This act represents a catalogue of fundamental rights, elaborated by the Council of Europe, signed on 4 November in Rome and enforced on 3 September 1953. The convention was ratified by almost all the Member States of the Council of Europe and Romania ratified this act through Law 30 in 1994.
[5] The Charter of the Fundamental Rights of the European Union was proclaimed by the European Commission, the European Parliament and the Council of the European Union, on 7 December 2002, within the European Council in Nice, being enforced on 01 December 2009, along with the Treaty of Lisbon.

entitled to be assisted by an attorney, of their own choosing or appointed by the court.[6]

The Criminal Procedure Code specifies, at its turn, the enforcement of the right of defense among the basic rules of the criminal trial." Thus, article 10, called "right of defense", specifies that:

1. The parties and the main subjects in the proceedings have the right to defend themselves in person or to be assisted by an attorney.
2. The parties, main subjects in the proceedings and the attorney have the right to be given the time and facilities necessary for the preparation of the defense.
3. The suspect has the right to be informed promptly, and before being heard, of the offense the criminal investigation is looking into and the legal classification of the offense. The accused person has the right to be informed promptly of the offense brought against them by the prosecution, and the legal classification of the offense.
4. Before being heard, the suspect and accused person must be informed that they have the right to make no statements whatsoever.
5. The judicial bodies are under an obligation to ensure full and effective exercise by the parties and main subjects in the proceedings of their right to defense throughout the criminal trial.
6. The right of defense shall be exercised in good faith, according to the goal for which the law recognizes it.

The specification of these rights is not exhaustive and there are other dispositions in the Criminal Procedure Code aimed to guarantee an effective defense during the criminal trial (the right to examine the case file, the right to bring evidence, the right to be informed about his rights, the right to make requests, to claim exceptions). We can notice that the rights specified by article 10 from the Criminal Procedure Code actually represent a transposition in the national law of the dispositions under Article 6 from the European Convention on Human Rights, with the mention that part of the rights specified by Article 6 were also extended to other parties and main subjects in the proceedings, apart from the person charged with a criminal offence.

3. Content of the right of defense

As regards to the content of the right of defense, as established by the Criminal Procedure Code, as well as by the European Convention on Human Rights, we notice that it is not only reduced to the legal assistance from an attorney, as "The right of defense does not have to be confused with the existence of the attorney"[7]. The right of defense is a complex right, comprising all the possibilities provided by the legislator to the parties and subjects in the criminal proceedings, in order to defend their interests. Thus, the doctrine specifies the fact that the right of defense is expressed under three general aspects: "the possibility of the parties to defend themselves in person during the criminal trial; the obligation of the judicial bodies to consider ex-officio aspects also favorable to the parties involved in the criminal trial; the possibility and sometimes the obligation to provide legal assistance during the criminal trial."[8]

3.1. Defense in person

Both Article 6 paragraph 3 from the European Convention on Human Rights and article 10 from the Criminal Procedure Code establish the right of everyone charged with a criminal offence to defend himself in person and the article from the Romanian Criminal Procedure Code also extends this right to the other parties and to the victim. However, the text from the Convention does not mention the conditions of exercising this right, leaving the contracting states the choice of the means allowing its effective performance and the Court has to examine if these means comply with the requirements of a fair trial.[9] Furthermore, the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights[10] indicated that it is necessary to guarantee "not only rights that are theoretical or illusory, but rights that are practical and effective (…) this is particularly so of the right of the defense in view of the prominent place held in a democratic society by the right to a fair trial, from which they derive". Thus, the possibility of the parties and main subjects in the proceedings, to defend themselves in person in the criminal trial, is guaranteed by the national legislation, by establishing certain wide fair trial rights and guarantees in the Criminal Procedure Code.

In order to guarantee a concrete and effective defense, several specific rights are recognized for the suspect and for the accused person. Thus, articles 78 and 83 from the Criminal Procedure Code specify the main rights of the suspect, respectively of the accused person, among which:

a) the right not to make any statements whatsoever during criminal proceedings, and their attention shall be drawn to the fact that their refusal to make any statements shall not cause them to suffer any unfavorable consequences, and that any statement they do make may be used as evidence against them.

[6] Such a regulation is also mentioned by Law no. 304/2004, on the judicial organization, whose article 15 specifies that "the right of defense is guaranteed. Throughout the entire criminal trial, the parties have the right to be represented, or, as applicable, assisted by an attorney, of their own choosing or appointed by the court, pursuant to the law."

[7] V. Dongoroz, S. Kahane, G. Antoniu, C. Bulai, N. Iliescu, R. Stănoiu*, Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român, Partea generală, vol. I, ediţia a-2-a*, Editura Academiei, Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti, 2003, p. 49

[8] Ion Neagu, op. cit.p. 102-103

[9] Corneliu Bîrsan, Convenţia europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole, Ediţia 2, Editura C.H.Beck, Buureşti 2010, p.551.

[10] See ECHR, judgment from 13 May 1980, case of Artico v. Italy, paragraph 33.

The right is also mentioned by article 10 paragraph 4 Criminal Procedure Code, which specifies the fact that, before being heard, the suspect and accused person must be informed that they have the right to make no statements whatsoever, as well as by article 99 paragraph 2 Criminal Procedure Code, which specifies that the suspect or accused person has the right not to contribute to their own incrimination and by article 118 Criminal Procedure Code, according to which the witness statement given by a person who had the capacity of suspect or accused person before such testimony or subsequently acquired the capacity of suspect or accused person in the same case, may not be used against them.

Thus, these legal dispositions establish the right to remain silent and the right not to contribute to their own incrimination, right in relation to which the European Court of Human Rights constantly ruled that "even if Article 6 from the European Convention does not expressly mention the right of an accused person to remain silent about the offences held against him and not to contribute to his own incrimination, there represent generally recognized regulations, center of the notion of fair trial, established by Article 6 (...)."[11]

b) right to be informed, promptly and before being heard, about the offense the criminal investigation is looking into and the legal classification of the offense.

This right is also provided by article 10 paragraph 3 Criminal Procedure Code, according to which the suspect and the accused person have the right to be informed promptly and before being heard of the offense the criminal investigation is looking into and the charge for that offense, as well as by article 307 and article 309 paragraph 2 Criminal Procedure Code.

The above mentioned dispositions from the national law actually represent a transposition of the Directive 2012/13/EU, on the right to information in criminal proceedings[12], Directive which mentions, in its preamble in points 27 and 28 that "(27) Persons accused of having committed a criminal offence should be given all the information on the accusation necessary to enable them to prepare their defense and to safeguard the fairness of the proceedings. (28) The information provided to suspects or accused persons about the criminal act they are suspected or accused of having committed should be given promptly, and at the latest before their first official interview by the police or another competent authority, and without prejudicing the course of ongoing investigations. A description of the facts, including, where known, time and place, relating to the criminal act that the persons are suspected or accused of having committed and the possible legal classification of the alleged offence should be given in sufficient detail, taking into account the stage of the criminal proceedings when such a description is given, to safeguard the fairness of the proceedings and allow for an effective exercise of the rights of the defense."[13]

At the same time, this right is also established by paragraph 3, letter a from the European Convention on Human Rights, according to which the accused person has the right to be informed about the reason of his arrest and of any charge against him. In its case-law, the Court ruled that, in the criminal matter, "a precise and complete information about the offense the criminal investigation is looking into and the charge for that offense has to be interpreted in the light of the general right to a fair trial, guaranteed by article 6 paragraph 1 from the Convention."[14]

c) the right to consult the case file

This represents an essential component for the exercise of the right of defense in the criminal trial, as the suspect or the accused person could not build a precise and effective defense unless they have the right to study the case.

Thus, the case-file of the European Court[15] established that access to the case file and use of notes, including, if necessary, the possibility of obtaining copies of relevant documents, represent important guarantees of the fair trial. The failure to afford such access has weighed, in the Court's assessment, in favor of the finding that the principle of equality of arms has been breached.

The right to access the case file is equally explicitly specified by Directive 2012/13/EU, on the right to information in criminal proceedings (directive transposed in the national law, mainly through the dispositions of article 94 Criminal Procedure Code), which specifies in Article 7 that : "(1) Where a person is arrested and detained at any stage of the criminal proceedings, Member States shall ensure that documents related to the specific case in the possession of the competent authorities which are essential to challenging effectively, in accordance with national law, the lawfulness of the arrest or detention, are made available to arrested persons or to their lawyers. (2) Member States shall ensure that access is granted at least to all material evidence in the possession of the competent authorities, whether for or against suspects or accused persons, to those persons or their lawyers in order to safeguard the fairness of the proceedings and to prepare the defense. (3) Without prejudice to paragraph 1, access to the materials referred to in paragraph 2 shall be granted in due time to allow the effective exercise of the rights of the defense and at the latest upon submission of the merits of the accusation to the judgment of a court. Where further material

[11] N. Volonciu (coordinator), A. Simona Uzlău, R. Moroşanu, V. Văduva, D. Atasiei, C. Ghighenci, C. Voicu, G. Tudor, T.V. Gheorghe, C.M. Chiriţă, Noul Cod de procedură penală comentat, Editura Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2014, p. 31

[12] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union, no. L142 dated 01 June 2012

[13] See also Article 6 from the same Directive

[14] C. Bîrsan, op. cit.p. 544.

[15] Case Matyjek v. Poland, no. 38184/03, points 59 and 63 and Judgment of 15 January 2008, in case Luboch v. Poland, no. 37469/05, points 64 and 68.

evidence comes into the possession of the competent authorities, access shall be granted to it in due time to allow for it to be considered. By way of derogation from paragraphs (2) and (3), provided that this does not prejudice the right to a fair trial, access to certain materials may be refused if such access may lead to a serious threat to the life or the fundamental rights of another person or if such refusal is strictly necessary to safeguard an important public interest, such as in cases where access could prejudice an ongoing investigation or seriously harm the national security of the Member State in which the criminal proceedings are instituted. Member States shall ensure that, in accordance with procedures in national law, a decision to refuse access to certain materials in accordance with this paragraph is taken by a judicial authority or is at least subject to judicial review".

As it can be noticed from the above mentioned text, the right to consult the case file does not appear as being an absolute right, as its exercise can be limited if it could prejudice an investigation, however, its limitation has to be concretely motivated by the judicial bodies (not in generic terms) and it has to be necessary and proportional to the purpose aimed, as equally provided by article 53 from the Constitution of Romania.[16] Similarly, there are the dispositions of article 94 paragraph 4 Criminal Procedure Code, according to which, during the criminal investigation, the prosecutor can restrict, on a motivated basis, the consultation of the case file if this could prejudice the ongoing investigation, but, after the initiation of the criminal action, such restriction may be ordered for up to 10 days. However, in all the cases, the attorney cannot be restricted the right to consult the statements of the party or subject in the proceedings he represents and within the procedures taking place before the judge of rights and liberties, concerning deprivation or restrictive measures of rights, the attorney of the accused person has the right to be informed about the entire material from the criminal investigation case file. During the court proceedings, article 356 paragraph 1 Criminal Procedure Code specifies that the accused person can have the right to be informed of the actions under the case file, without establishing limitations of this right.

d) the right to propose the production of evidence, within the conditions of the law, to raise exceptions and make submissions.

Article 6, paragraph 3 letter d from the European Convention on Human Rights specifies the possibility of the accused person to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him.

The right of the accused person to propose the production of evidence in the criminal trail is also established through the fact that article 306 paragraphs 3 and 4 Criminal Procedure Code specifies that the criminal investigation bodies have the obligation to collect and present evidence both in favor and against the suspect or accused person, as well as the obligation to rule, by reasoned order, on the request to produce evidence. At the same time, throughout the trial, the court shall produce evidence at the request of the parties or main subjects in the proceedings and the accused person has the right to challenge including the evidence administered during the criminal investigation and to obtain their new production.

Moreover, in its case-law[17], the European Court specified that an important aspect of fair criminal proceedings is the ability for the accused person to be confronted with the witnesses in presence of the judge who immediately decides the case. At the same time, it ruled that Article 6 paragraph 3 letter d establishes the right that, before an accused person is declared guilty, all the prosecution evidence has to be presented in principle before him, in public pronouncement, for a contradictory debate. However, this principle is not applied without exceptions, as the evidence can only be accepted under the reserve of the right of defense. As general rule, the accused person has to be provided with an adequate and sufficient possibility to challenge the prosecution's testimony and to examine witnesses against him, when they take the stand or afterwards. Two requirements result from this principle based on ECHR case-law: the first – the absence of a witness must be supported by a serious motive; the second – when a conviction is fully or considerably based on the depositions of a person, to whom the accused person was not able to ask questions or he could not request the examination, during the processing stage or during the debates, the right of defense can be restricted in a manner which is incompatible with the guarantees specified under Article 6.[18]

e) the right to benefit free of charge from an interpreter, when he does not understand, does not speak well or cannot communicate in Romanian language
f) the right to use a mediator, in the cases provided by the law
g) the right to be examined in the presence of his attorney, before ordering a custodial measure against the suspect or accused person.

Thus, article 209 paragraph 5 Criminal Procedure Code specifies that taking in custody may only be order after hearing the suspect or the accused person, in the presence of an attorney of his own choosing or an attorney appointed by court. At the same time, article 225 paragraph 4 Criminal Procedure Code specifies that the pre-trial arrest proposal shall only be made in the presence of the accused person, excepting the cases he is unjustifiably absent, he is missing, he avoids [16] Pursuant to article 53 paragraph 2, Restriction can only be ordered if it is necessary in a democratic society. The measure has to be proportional to the situation which determined it, to be non-discriminatory applied and without harming the existence of the right or freedom.

[17] Judgment of 18 March 2014, in case Beraru v. Romania, request no. 40107/04, point 64
[18] Judgment of 09 July 2013, in case Bobeş v. Romania, request no. 29752/05, points 36, 37.

coming to court or cannot be brought before the judge due to health condition, force majeure or a state of necessity, the same guarantee being also established by the legislator for the house arrest measure[19] or for a restrictive measure, respectively the judicial control or the judicial control on bail.[20]

h) the right to be present at the trial

The judicial bodies have to order the summon of the suspect or of the accused person, in order to be present at the trial, as provided by the dispositions of article 353 paragraph 1 Criminal Procedure Code. For the persons deprived of liberty, their presence at the trial and summon at each trial term are mandatory. This right is also established through Directive 2016/343/EU, which, in Article 8, specifies that: "(1) Member States shall ensure that suspects and accused persons have the right to be present at their trial. (2) Member States may provide that a trial which can result in a decision on the guilt or innocence of a suspect or accused person can be held in his or her absence, provided that: a) the suspect or accused person has been informed, in due time, of the trial and of the consequences of non-appearance; or b) the suspect or accused person, having been informed of the trial, is represented by a mandated lawyer, who was appointed either by the suspect or accused person or by the State. (3) A decision which has been taken in accordance with paragraph 2 may be enforced against the person concerned. (4) Where Member States provide for the possibility of holding trials in the absence of suspects or accused persons but it is not possible to comply with the conditions laid down in paragraph 2 of this Article because a suspect or accused person cannot be located despite reasonable efforts having been made, Member States may provide that a decision can nevertheless be taken and enforced. In that case, Member States shall ensure that when suspects or accused persons are informed of the decision, in particular when they are apprehended, they are also informed of the possibility to challenge the decision and of the right to a new trial or to another legal remedy, in accordance with Article 9. (5) This Article shall be without prejudice to national rules that provide that the judge or the competent court can exclude a suspect or accused person temporarily from the trial where necessary in the interests of securing the proper conduct of the criminal proceedings, provided that the rights of the defense are complied with (…).

i) communication of the copy of the indictment,

Pursuant to article 344 paragraph 2 Criminal Procedure Code, the certified copy of the indictment and, as applicable, a certified translation thereof, shall be communicated to the accused person at their place of detention or, as the case may be, the address where they live or the address where they requested to receive the procedural acts and the accused person shall also be informed of the object of the Preliminary Chamber procedure, their right to retain an attorney and the time within which, as of the communication date, they can file motions and exceptions in writing concerning the lawfulness of evidence gathering and conduct of criminal investigations by the criminal investigation bodies.

j) during the debates, the accused person takes stand in order to express opinions about the evidence produced in the case, as well as about the charges and individualization of the punishment.

At the same time, before ending the debates, the accused person takes his last stand, procedure during which he cannot be asked questions, in particular in view of exercising a proper defense. If new acts or circumstances are revealed, essential in order to settle the case, the court shall order that the court investigation shall be retaken. He can produce defenses both on the criminal side and on the civil side, challenging the allegations of the prosecutor or of the victim/party in civil claim.

k) the accused party has the right to file the legal remedies established by the legislator, respectively the ordinary legal remedies or, in certain cases, the extraordinary legal remedies.

During the ruling of the ordinary legal remedy of appeal (regardless if it is filed or not by the accused person), he has the right to file requests and raise exceptions, to request new evidence in defense, to debate all the appeal motifs filed in his defense or the motifs raised by the prosecutor, the victim or by other parties.

The suspect and the accused persons are not the only parties for whom the legislator established a series or rights and guarantees in view of concretely exercising the right of defense. Part of the rights established for them are also established under the same conditions for the other parties and for the victim. Thus, pursuant to the dispositions of article 81 Criminal Procedure Code, the victim has the right to consult the case file, to be summoned, to be present at the trial, to file evidence, to ask questions to the accused person, to witnesses, to expert, the right to use a mediator, to benefit from an interpreter, to be send in a language he understands the translation of any non-arraignment decisions, as well as other rights provided by the law (to file the legal remedies provided by the law, to make submissions during the debates about the evidence processed and about their lawfulness). At the same time, pursuant to the dispositions of articles 85 and 87 Criminal Procedure Code, the civil party and the party with civil liability benefit from the same rights, with the mention that for the party with civil liability, the rights

[19] Article 219 paragraph 5 Criminal Procedure Code specifies that the Judge of Rights and Liberties shall hear the accused person when the latter is present.

[20] Article 212 paragraph 3 Criminal Procedure Code, the measure of judicial control can only be taken after hearing the accused person, in the presence of an attorney of his own choosing or an attorney appointed by court. These dispositions being also applicable for the judicial control on bail, provided by article 216 paragraph 3 Criminal Procedure Code.

shall be used within the limits and for the purposes of settling the civil claim.

Another component of the right of defense is also represented by the "obligation of the judicial bodies to consider, ex-officio, aspects favorable for the parties. This obligation actually represents an aspect for the manifestation of the active role played by the judicial bodies. If the parties do not act in order to valorize the evidence supporting their interests, the judicial bodies shall process such evidence ex-officio."[21]

3.2. Defense through attorney

As mentioned above, the content of the right of defense also includes the legal assistance of the parties by an attorney. This right is established by the Criminal Procedure Code through article 10 paragraph 1 Criminal Procedure Code, according to which the parties and main subjects in the proceedings have the right to defend themselves in person or to be assisted by an attorney, as well as through other provisions from the same Code.[22]

Considering the importance of this form of exercising the right of defense during the criminal trial, this right is also expressly provided through article 6, paragraph 3, letter c, which specifies that any accused person has the right to be assisted by an attorney of his own choosing and, in certain conditions, he has the right to be assisted, free of charge, by an attorney appointed by the court.

Similarly, Directive no. 2013/48/EU[23], on the right of access to a lawyer in criminal proceedings, specifies in its preamble the fact that Member States should ensure that suspects or accused persons have the right of access to a lawyer without undue delay and in any event, they should be granted access to a lawyer during the criminal proceedings before a court, if they have not waived this right.

Directive no. 2016/1919/EU[24] establishes, through Article 4, the rights of suspects or accused persons, who lack sufficient resources to pay for the assistance of a lawyer, have the right to legal aid when the interests of justice so require.

Therefore, legal aid represents a fundamental guarantee of the right of defense and implicitly one of the fundamental components of a fair trial, being provided by a person with legal qualification. Thus, article 1 from Law 51/1995[25] specifies that the profession of lawyer is free and independent, with autonomous organization and functioning, and the lawyer profession is only practiced by lawyers registered in the bar table where they belong, bar member of the National Association of Romanian Bars. At the same time, the activity of the lawyer is reiterated, among others, through legal consultations and requests, legal aid and representation before the courts, criminal investigation bodies (article 3 from Law 51/1995). Thus, it can be noticed that the lawyer profession can only be exercised by observing the law, being conditioned by the observance of certain requirements. Through the Decision no. 15/RIL/2015, the High Court of Cassation and Justice, ruling in appeal in the interest of the law, indicated that the legal aid granted to an accused party in the criminal trail by a person who did not acquire the lawyer quality within the conditions of Law no. 51/1995, is the equivalent of his lack of defense.

The right to be assisted by a lawyer invariably also implies an efficient communication between the lawyer and the person he defends and if such communication is not possible, the right to legal assistance is devoid of substance. Thus, the judicial bodies have the positive obligation to assure the effectiveness of this communication, as well as its confidentiality.

Directive 2013/48/EU, on the right of access to a lawyer, specifies in its preamble the importance of assuring the contact between the attorney and his client, and, through Article 4, it establishes that Member States shall respect the confidentiality of communication between suspects or accused parties and their lawyer and such communication shall include meetings, correspondence, telephone conversations and other forms of communication permitted under national law. The obligation to respect confidentiality not only implies that Member States should refrain from interfering with or accessing such communication, but also that, where suspects or accused persons are deprived of liberty or otherwise find themselves in a place under the control of the State, Member States should ensure that arrangements for communication uphold and protect confidentiality (Article 33 from the preamble of Directive 2013/48/EU).

ECHR case-law[26] established that the right to be assisted by a lawyer does not only mean the assurance of the contact between the lawyer and the accused person, but it also implies a more complex matter, respectively the accused person has to be able to obtain the whole range of services specifically associated with legal assistance: discussion of the case, organization of the defense, collection of evidence, preparation for questioning.

---

[21] I. Neagu, op. cit. p. 104.

[22] Article 81 paragraph 1, letter h, specifies that the victim has the right to be assisted or represented by an attorney; article 83 paragraph 1 letter c specifies that the accused person has the right to have an attorney of his own choosing and, if he cannot afford one, in cases of mandatory legal assistance, the right to have an attorney appointed by court, the same right being also established for the suspect through the dispositions of article 78 Criminal Procedure Code, according to which the suspect has the rights provided by the law for the accused person, unless otherwise provided by the law.

[23] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 294 date 06 November 2013, p. 1-12.

[24] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 297 date 04 November 2016, p. 1-8.

[25] Published in the Official Journal, no. 113 date 06 March 2001

[26] Case Dayanan v. Turkey, judgment of 13 October 2009.

If the legal assistance is mandatory, the simple appointment of the lawyer by the court is not sufficient to consider that the right of defense was respected, but the judicial bodies have the positive obligation to assure that the lawyer appointed by the court studied the case file and performs a practical and effective defense, as provided by ECHR case-law, not being sufficient to guarantee some theoretical or illusory rights, as we indicated above. At the same time, the judicial bodies have to oversee that the lawyer does not find himself in an incompatibility case, through certain qualities or functions exercised.

However, the right to legal assistance is not an absolute right, namely the legal assistance of a lawyer appointed by court is not mandatory in all cases, the rule established by the Romanian legislation stating that the legal assistance is mainly facultative. Nevertheless, there are certain cases when the judicial bodies have to take the necessary measures in order to assure legal assistance, cases which considered the assistance by a lawyer of certain persons/main subjects in the proceedings who find themselves in a more fragile position, position which has to be protected by assuring an efficient defense in a criminal trial. The mandatory legal assistance is established by the legislator in two separate texts of law, first of all for the suspect or accused person and secondly for the victim, civil party and party with civil liability.

3.2.1. Mandatory legal assistance of suspect or accused person.

The suspect or accused person has the right to be assisted by one or several lawyers, during all the stages of the criminal trial, as soon as starting the criminal investigation in personam, as well as in the preliminary chamber stage or during the ruling, including during the legal remedies.

Article 90 from the Criminal Procedure Code specifies the cases when the legal assistance of the suspect or accused person is mandatory, the enumeration is not limitative as there are also special cases which impose the obligation to assure this assistance. Pursuant to the text of law, the legal assistance is mandatory when:

a) the suspect/accused person is underage;

During the criminal investigation, the legal assistance is mandatory up to the date when he turns 18 years and during the course of trial throughout the entire ruling procedure (both in the court of first instance and in appeal) if he was still underage when he committed the offence (article 507 paragraph 3 Criminal Procedure Code).

b) he is admitted to a detention center or educational center;
c) he is detained or arrested (pre-trial detention or house arrest), even if in another case;
d) the safety measure of medical admission was ordered for the suspect/accused person, even if in another case;
e) in other cases established under the law;

The cases when the legislator establishes the need to assure legal assistance by a lawyer can be therein included: if the accused party wants to sign an agreement for the admission of guilt during the criminal investigation, within the procedures regarding the ordering, extension, duly cessation of preventive measures (judicial control, judicial control on bail, pre-trial arrest, house arrest; in the procedures related to the ex-officio debate of the lawfulness and substantiation of the preventive measures; in the procedure to settle the appeal against the court resolutions through which the judge of rights and freedoms, the preliminary chamber judge or the court rule on the preventive measures; in the procedure ordering the provisional medical admission, in the procedure for ordering, confirmation, replacement or cessation the provisional processual measures compelling to medical treatment or medical admission, sustained before the preliminary chamber judge following the ruling of not to refer the case to a trial court, if it is requested to replace the punishment by fine with the imprisonment punishment.

f) when the judicial bodies believe that the suspect or accused person could not prepare their defense on their own

These cases can include the elderly, the foreign citizens who do not know the procedural dispositions of the Romanian law, the persons suffering from mental or physical disabilities which may affect the preparation of their defense. At the same time, when assessing the possibility of a person to defend himself in person, the elements considered shall also include the complexity of the case, the criminal participation, the existence of a high number of offences.

g) During the preliminary chamber procedure and during the course of trial, in cases where the law establishes life detention or an imprisonment punishment exceeding 5 years for the offence perpetrated.

This case of mandatory legal assistance is also incident when the defendant is a legal entity.[27] The punishment provided by the law means the punishment stipulated by the text of law, incriminating the act perpetrated under consumed form, not considering the circumstances for the aggravation or mitigation of the penalty (article 187 Criminal Code). When assessing the incidence or non-incidence of this case of mandatory legal assistance, the court shall take into consideration the classification of the acts through the indictment, and if it will order the change into a charge for which the legislator provides a punishment exceeding 5 years, the legal assistance shall become mandatory since the order of the court to change the charge.

3.2.2. Mandatory legal assistance for the victim, civil party or party with civil liability.

Article 93 Criminal Procedure Code mentions, through paragraphs (4) and (5), the cases when the legal assistance is mandatory for these persons: when the victim or the civil party lacks mental competence or has limited mental competence or when, for various reasons, the victim, civil party or party with civil liability cannot prepare their defense in person.

[27] See also Decision no. 21/HP/2016 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice

Law no. 678/2001[28] establishes another case of legal assistance for the victim, during all the stages of the criminal trial, respectively when they are a victim of human trafficking.

4. Penalties applied if the right of defense is not respected.

The violation of legal dispositions concerning the mandatory legal assistance of the suspect, accused person, civil party or party with civil liability is punished with the absolute nullity, as stipulated by article 281 paragraph 1 letter e Criminal Procedure Code. We notice the fact that the text of law mentioned does not punish by absolute nullity the violation of the dispositions concerning the obligation to assure legal assistance to the victim, thus, despite the fact that we do not understand the reason for which the legislator made this distraction between the civil party and the victim, if the right to mandatory legal assistance of the victim is breached, another type of nullity shall intervene, respectively, the relative nullity if the conditions stipulated by article 282 Criminal Procedure Code[29] are met.

At the same time, if a case is tried in absence of the suspect or accused party, despite the fact that their presence was mandatory (i.e., they were under detention), the absolute nullity of the acts performed in violation of such dispositions shall nevertheless intervene.

The violation of the legal dispositions concerning the mandatory legal assistance for the suspect, accused person or other parties, as well as of dispositions concerning the absence of the suspect/accused person, when their presence was mandatory, can be invoked up to the completion of the preliminary chamber procedure, if such violation occurred during the criminal investigation stage or the preliminary chamber. The preliminary chamber judge shall exclude the evidence obtained in violation of the mentioned dispositions, or he will integrally return the case to the prosecutor, where he establishes that the overall criminal investigation was harmed by such violation. Nullity can be invoked in any stage of the trial, if the violation occurred in course of the trial or if the court was referred with an agreement for the admission of guilt, regardless of the moment when it intervened.

The absolute nullity of the decision and the case shall be retried also where the accused persons were assisted by the same lawyer, despite the fact that his interests were contradictory, because the court has the obligation to highlight the contrariety of interests and to provide them with the possibility to hire another lawyer for one of the accused persons, or to appoint an attorney by the court, if they do not have the possibility to hire another lawyer who could provide legal assistance along with the lawyer of their own choosing.

At the same time, if the right of a person to be present at the trial was breached, namely the person was not duly summoned, or, when, despite being duly summoned, the party could appear in person or inform the court thereupon, the court shall admit the appeal of the person, it shall reverse the ruling pronounced under these conditions and it will order the retrial of the case by the court whose ruling was quashed (article 421, point 2, letter a Criminal Procedure Code).

Another guarantee to exercise the right of defense is the possibility provided to the parties by the legislator to file an extraordinary legal remedy. Thus, if the ruling in appeal took place without duly summoning a person, or, when, despite being duly summoned, the party could appear in person or inform the court thereupon, or where the ruling in appeal took place without the participation of the accused person, although their presence was mandatory, or when the court did not hear the accused person, although the hearing was possible according to the law, these parties can file challenge for annulment, the decision pronounced in violation of these rights (essential components of the rights of defense) shall be quashed and a retrial of the appeal or of the quashed case shall take place.

Another guarantee established by the legislator if a person was convicted in absence, without being summoned at the trial and without being otherwise officially informed thereupon, or, despite being informed about the trial, the person was justifiably absent from the ruling of the case and could not inform the court thereupon, is represented by the possibility to reopen the criminal trial and subsequently quashing the decision pronounced under these conditions.

The right to respect the confidentiality of conversations between the lawyer and the client is also guaranteed through article 139 paragraph 4 Criminal Procedure Code, according to which the relationship between the lawyer and a person assisted or represented by them may be subject to electronic surveillance only when there is information that the lawyer perpetrates or prepares the perpetration of any of the offences mentioned under article 139 paragraph 2 Criminal Procedure Code. If, by error, the conversations between the lawyer and suspect/accused person he defends were intercepted, the evidence obtained this way cannot be used in any criminal trial and shall be destroyed forthwith by the prosecutor.

[28] Published in the OFFICIAL JOURNAL no. 783, of 11 December 2001.

[29] Pursuant to article 282 paragraph 2 Criminal Code, "The violation of any legal dispositions except for the dispositions stipulated by article 281 shall cause the nullification of an act when failure to comply with the legal requirement caused farm to the rights of the persons or main subjects in criminal proceedings, which can only be removed by nullifying the act ."

5. Conclusions

As already mentioned above, the right of defense is a fundamental right, guaranteed by the Constitution, by the Criminal Procedure Code and by the international treaties. The practical means to exercise the right of defense are largely stipulated by the Criminal Procedure Code.

Guaranteeing the right of defense represents a fundamental principle of the criminal trial and, at the same time, an essential component of a fair trial. Therefore, the legislator established various guarantees and legal means in order to assure the observance of this right. By recognizing this right, the legislator also established certain obligations for the judicial bodies (the obligation to have a lawyer appointed by court, if the legal assistance is mandatory, the obligation to verify if there are incompatibilities between the appointed lawyer and the person he represents, the obligation to rule on the requests of the persons/their lawyers, the obligation to assure that the lawyer studied the case file and performs a prompt and effective defense).

Any violation of the right of defense implies, as we mentioned above, various penalties, including the most important sanction provided by the Criminal Procedure Code, respectively the absolute nullity of the acts taken in violation of this right, including the nullity of the decision pronounced under these conditions and retrial of the case.

The right of defense is not an additional institution, but it represents an essential and necessary right for any act of justice, because the respect of this right creates a balance between the individual interests of persons participating to the criminal trial and the general interest of the society to hold criminally liable anyone who committed a criminal offense. By respecting this right, the suspect, the victim, the parties are capable of highlighting all the circumstances of the act under investigation, thus no innocent person is held criminally liable and any person who committed an offence is punished pursuant to the law.

References

- Corneliu Bîrsan, Convenţia europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole, Ediţia 2, Editura C.H.Beck, Buureşti 2010.
- V. Dongoroz, S. Kahane, G. Antoniu, C. Bulai, N. Iliescu, R. Stănoiu, Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român, Partea generală, vol. I, ediţia a-2-a, Editura Academiei, Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti, 2003.
- Ion Neagu, Tratat de procedură penală, Partea generală, Ediţia a-II-a, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti 2010.
- Mihail Udroiu, Procedură penală, Partea Generală, Ediţia 5, Editura C.H.Beck, Bucureşti 2018.
- N. Volonciu(coordonator), A. Simona Uzlău, R. Moroşanu, V. Văduva, D. Atasiei, C. Ghighenci, C. Voicu, G. Tudor, T.V. Gheorghe, C.M. Chiriţă, Noul Cod de procedură penală comentat, Editura Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2014.
- Constitution of Romania, of 21 November 1991, published in the Official Journal No. 767 of 31 October 2003.
- Criminal Procedure Code, passed through Law No. 135 of 1 July 2010.
- Law 51/ 1995, on the Organization and Exercise of Lawyer Profession, republished in the Official Journal No. 440 of 24 May 2018.
- Universal Declaration of Human Rights, passed on 16 December 1948, by the third session of the General UN Assembly.
- Charter of the Fundamental Rights of the European Union, enforced on 01 December 2009.
- European Convention on Human Rights.
- Directive 2012/13/EU, published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L142, of 01 June 2012.
- Directive 2013/48/EU, published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 294, of 06 November 2013.
- Directive 2062/1919/EU, published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 297, of 04 November 2016.
- Directive 2016/343/EU, published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 65, of 11 March 2016.
- ECHR, case Artico v. Italy, judgment of 13 May 1980.
- ECHR, case Beraru v. Romania, request no. 4010/04, judgment of 18 March 2014.
- ECHR, case Bobeş v. Romania, request no. 29752/05, judgment of 09 July 2013.
- ECHR, case Dayanan v. Turkey, judgment of 13 October 2009.
- ECHR, case Luboch v. Poland, request no. 37469/05.
- ECHR, case Matyjek v. Poland, request no. 38184/03.
- Decision no. 21/HP/2016, pronounced by the High Court of Cassation and Justice for the resolution of points of law.

DEFICIENCIES IN ENACTING ARTICLE 44 OF ROMANIAN LAW NO.111/1996 REGARDING THE SAFE DEPLOYMENT, REGULATION, AUTHORIZATION AND CONTROL OF NUCLEAR ACTIVITIES

Sorin-Alexandru VERNEA

Abstract

In this paper, the author analyses the main practical issues that can be discussed when enacting the provisions of article 44 of Romanian Law no.111/1996 regarding the safe deployment regulation, authorization and control of nuclear activities.

The paper is structured in two parts. The first aims at pointing out the particularities of the incrimination discussed, by reference to its constitutive content, and the second part adapts the mechanism of the Romanian Constitutional Court Decision no.405/2016 to the provision analyzed, in order to comply with the regulation of art.73, paragraph 3, letter h of the Romanian Constitution.

The author concludes that the only effective way to prevent the deficiencies previously discussed is the intervention of the legislator, reason for which a de lege ferenda proposal has been made.

Keywords: nuclear activities, crimes against the nuclear regime, crimes against environment, incomplete provisions, organic law, deficient incrimination

1. Introduction

Human activities involving nuclear materials require a high degree of responsibility of the state for environmental protection both nationally and internationally. As stated in legal literature[1], nuclear energy is the most important discovery of man in the 20th century, but also the worst weapon against the creator itself.

In Romania, the special legislation in the field of nuclear activities is Law no.111/1996 regarding the safe deployment, regulation, authorization and control of nuclear activities[2]. Article 2 of the quoted act establishes the area of regulation of the law in question in the following way: "The provisions of this law shall apply to the following activities and sources of radiation: a) research, design, possession, placing, construction, installation, commissioning, trial run, operation, modification, conservation, decommissioning or closure, import, export and intra-Community transfer of nuclear installations, including the management of used nuclear fuel; b) the design, ownership, location, construction and assembly, commissioning, operation, conservation and decommissioning of mining and preparation of uranium and thorium and facilities of waste from the mining and preparation of uranium and thorium; c) the production, placing, construction, supply, rental, transfer, handling, holding, use, intermediate storage, removal, transportation, transit, import, export and intra-community transfer of radiological facilities, including radioactive waste management facilities; c[1]) producing, manufacturing, supply, rental, transfer, handling, storing, processing, utilization, recycling, intermediate storage, transport, transit, import, export and intra-community transfer of radioactive material and radioactive sources, as appropriate; c[2]) producing, manufacturing, supply, transfer, handling, storing, processing, utilization, intermediate storage, transport, transit, import, export and intra-community transfer of nuclear materials, including fresh and spent nuclear fuel; c[3]) the transfer, handling, holding, pre-storage, intermediate storage, permanent storage, transport, transit, import, export and intra-community transfer of radioactive waste; d) the production, the providing and use of dosimetric and of ionizing radiation detection systems, of materials, and devices for the protection against ionizing radiation, and means for packaging or transport of radioactive materials, specially arranged for this purpose; e) the production, manufacture, lease, transfer, possession, import, export and intra-community transfer of materials, devices and equipment referred to in Annex no.1, f) holding, transfer, import, export and intra-community transfer of unpublished information relating to materials, devices and equipment pertinent to the proliferation of nuclear weapons and other nuclear explosive devices, referred to in Annex no. 1, g) providing products and services for nuclear facilities; h) providing products and services for radiation sources, dosimetric control instruments, ionizing radiation detection systems, materials and devices used for protection against ionizing radiation; h[1]) design and execution of nuclear

* PhD Student, University of Bucharest, Faculty of Law, Judge, Bucharest 2nd District Court of first instance (e-mail: wersera2005@gmail.com); specific constructions; i) orphan sources, from their detection to their permanent storage as radioactive waste; j) manufacture, import, export and transit of products for consumption which have been irradiated, containing or contaminated with radioactive material; k) activities leading to exposure of workers or the population to radon and thoron or their inside offspring, the external exposure caused by building materials, and prolonged exposure situations caused by long-term effects of an emergency or a past human activities; l) locations contaminated with mineral substances associated in ore with uranium or thorium or with residual radioactive contamination resulting from a radiological or nuclear accident, after the emergency status was over; m) human activities that involve the presence of natural sources of radiation which leads to a significant increase in the exposure of workers or other people, including the operation of aircraft in terms of exposing the crew during the flight, the extraction and processing of minerals associated in ore with uranium or thorium, and other raw materials in the process of extracting and processing, lead to an increase in the concentration of natural radionuclides in intermediate products and waste, and the processing of materials containing naturally occurring radionuclides; n) preparation, planning and response for all cases of exposure to ionizing radiation in order to protect public health, workers and workers in emergency situations".

[1] D.S.Marinescu, M.C.Petre – Environmental Law Treaty (original title: Tratat de Dreptul Mediului), 5th edition, Universitara Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, pg.609

[2] Republished in the Official Gazette, Part I, no.552 / 27.06.2006

The national authority exercising regulatory powers, licensing and control of nuclear materials is the National Commission for Nuclear Activities Control, in accordance with article 4, paragraph 1 of Law no.111 / 1996, as amended and supplemented.

2. Particularities of the incrimination

For the purpose of this paper, we shall focus our attention on the provisions of art.44 of Law no.111/1996. According to this text, "(1) Carrying out an activity among those referred to art.2, art.24, par.1, art.28, par.2 and art.38, par.1 without proper authorization required by law alongside the breach of art.38 par.$2^1$ and $2^2$ constitutes an offense and shall be punished as follows: a) with imprisonment from six months to two years or a fine, the activities referred to in: art.2 letter a, on the research, development, ownership, location, construction or assembly, conservation of nuclear installations; art.2, letter b; art.2, letter d, regarding means of packaging or transport of radioactive materials, specially arranged for this purpose; art.2, letter g; art.24, par.1, and art.38, par.1; b) imprisonment from 2 to 7 years and deprivation of certain rights, the breach of art. 38 par.$2^1$ and $2^2$, and performing unauthorized activities under: art.2 letter a, relating to the commissioning, trail-run, operation, modification, removal, import and export of nuclear installations; art.2 letter c, if radiological facilities, nuclear or radioactive materials, radioactive radiation generating waste presents a special risk; art.2, letters e and f and art.28 par.2, if nuclear or radioactive materials, radioactive waste and radiation generators present a special nuclear or radiological risk. (2) Attempt to offenses under par.1, letter b is punished".

Regarding the special legal object, we have observed that legal literature is not unitary. In this regard, some authors have noted that the object is represented by the social relations developed in order to "prevent radioactive pollution by exercising strict control of nuclear activities through the authorization procedure"3.

Other authors have defined the special legal object as "social relations concerning the safety of nuclear activities for exclusively peaceful purposes, so as to meet the conditions of safety, protection of occupationally exposed workers, population, environment and property"4.

We believe the second definition is preferable for including in its area of protection the integrity of the environment, but also for circumscribing the use of nuclear energy to peaceful purposes only. Our opinion is that article 44 of Law no.111/1996 aims mostly at protecting public health, public safety and the environment with all its natural and anthropologic components.

In what concerns the material object, we appreciate that it depends on the normative variant of the incrimination. In general, it is represented by nuclear materials, goods subjected to radiation, or to processing by nuclear materials or nuclear facilities. In some normative variants, we consider that no material object can be determined, the offense being purely formal.

The active subject of the crime is not qualified by law therefore it can be represented by any physical person or legal entity that can be held liable according to common criminal law provisions.

In fact, given that the access to nuclear materials is limited by law, we believe that the active subject of the offense can only be a physical or legal entity that usually operates, apparently legal, in the nuclear field.

The main passive subject is the State, as the main protector of the environment, public health and public safety. If by the same action the integrity of a person is harmed, we believe that we cannot consider the victim a secondary passive subject for this crime, but a primary passive subject for a crime against its integrity or life.

Regarding the constitutive content, we believe that the offense in question exists on a premise situation namely, the pre-existence of the obligation to obtain authorization for the conduct complained of, but only in the first normative variant.

[3] M.Gorunescu in M.A.Hotca (coord.) – Criminal offenses under special laws, Comments and explanations (original title: Infracţiuni prevăzute în legi speciale, Comentarii şi explicaţii), 3rd edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, pg.593

[4] N.Conea, E.Tanislav, C.Gheorghe, M.Conea – Criminal offenses under special laws (original title: Infracţiuni prevăzute în legi speciale), Semne Publishing House, Bucharest, 2000, pg.244

As the incrimination text clearly states, the first normative variant consists of conducting one of the activities referred to in art.2, art.24, par.1, art.28, par.2 and art.38, par.1, without proper authorization required by law. The second normative variant consists of a breach of art.38 par.$2^1$ and $2^2$.

To understand the action or omission punishable under criminal law, we find it necessary to examine the texts earlier referred to. In this regard, article 2 defining the regulatory field of the law was reproduced in the first part of the paper. Article 24, paragraph 1 of the same law states that: "The authorization of management systems in the nuclear activities of design, location, supply, manufacturing, service delivery, construction, installation, commissioning, operation, decommissioning or conservation of nuclear installations and products, services and systems classified as important for nuclear safety is mandatory". Article 28, paragraph 2 of the Law refers to obligatory licensing of ownership, conservation, decommissioning or transfer, providing that: "Upon closure or decommissioning of nuclear or radiological facilities, and in case of partial or complete transfer of nuclear and radiological installations, radioactive products or nuclear materials, the authorization holder must, in advance, request and obtain, as provided by law, the authorization for possession, storage, decommissioning or transfer, as appropriate".

Finally, article 38, paragraph 1 of Law no.111/1996 stipulates: "The Ministry of Public Health shall authorize: a) the introduction into the economic and social circuit, for use or consumption by the population, of products which have undergone irradiation or containing radioactive materials; b) the introducing into the field of medical diagnosis and medical treatment, radiation sources closed, open, ionizing radiation generating devices and pharmaceutical products containing radioactive materials".

The multitude of actions resulting from cumulating the offending provisions found in article 2 of Law no.111/1996, as amended and supplemented, generate a poor and possibly confusing incrimination. This is, from our point of view, an effect of the repeated reference technique, which, in criminal law, can lead to severe misunderstandings of the text, most of all, when certain actions or omissions are prohibited, but they are not sanctioned as such.

We appreciate that only the following actions or omissions resulting from article 2 are actually incriminated by article 44, namely because they are the only conducts for which a sanction is provided: a) research, design, possession, placing, construction, installation, commissioning, trial run, operation, modification, conservation, decommissioning or closure, import, export and intra-Community transfer of nuclear installations, including the management of used nuclear fuel; b) the design, ownership, location, construction and assembly, commissioning, operation, conservation and decommissioning of mining and preparation of uranium and thorium and facilities of waste from the mining and preparation of uranium and thorium; c) the production, placing, construction, supply, rental, transfer, handling, holding, use, intermediate storage, removal, transportation, transit, import, export and intra-community transfer of radiological facilities, including radioactive waste management facilities; d) the production, the providing and use of dosimetric and of ionizing radiation detection systems, of materials, and devices for the protection against ionizing radiation, and means for packaging or transport of radioactive materials, specially arranged for this purpose; e) the production, manufacture, lease, transfer, possession, import, export and intra-community transfer of materials, devices and equipment referred to in Annex no.1, f) holding, transfer, import, export and intra-community transfer of unpublished information relating to materials, devices and equipment pertinent to the proliferation of nuclear weapons and other nuclear explosive devices, referred to in Annex no. 1, g) providing products and services for nuclear facilities.

In national legislation, so far, we have not encountered any crime likely to be committed in so many normative variants. We appreciate that the choice of the legislator is mainly determined by the use of a per relationem incrimination method, which complicates determining the actual content of criminal offense and the framing of facts in one of the legal provisions in question.

Paradoxically, for the actions found in article 2, entirely indicated by the legislator in the content or article 44, just the conducts set out in paragraphs a, b, c, d, e, f, g are penalized by indicating the penalties applicable. The criminal activities covered by art. 2 lit.$c^1$, $c^2$, $c^3$, h, $h^1$, i, j, k, l, m, n, although prohibited, are not subjected to a criminal penalty. We believe that this mismatch was caused by repeated legislative changes, by modifying single articles without remedying the imperfections generated by the reference norms. In this regard, we observe that in the original form of the law[5], article 2 contained only 7 letters, from "a" to "g", therefore, the rest of article 2 is the effect of legislative upgrades done in the past.

The offense is considered typical also when the perpetrator carries out the activities listed under art.24, par.1, art.28, par.2 and art.38, par.1 without proper authorization required by law. According to the texts previously quoted, the offense consists of activities of design, location, supply, manufacturing, service delivery, construction, installation, commissioning, operation, decommissioning or conservation of nuclear installations and products, services and systems classified as important for nuclear safety; or cessation of the activity or radiological or decommissioning of nuclear installations, as well as the transfer in part or in whole, of nuclear and radiological, nuclear materials or radioactive products; or introduction into the economic and social, for use or consumption by the population, placing the medical field, for diagnosis and treatment, radiation sources closed, open, ionizing radiation generating devices and pharmaceutical products containing radioactive materials.

[5] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no.267/29.10.1996

All regulatory arrangements set out above have the essential request attached to the material element, that the acts must be undertake without proper authorization.

We appreciate that imposing an authorization that is also an essential element in determining the constitutive content of a crime must be done by a normative act of the same legal force as the organic law, in order to comply with article 73, paragraph 3, letter h of the Romanian Constitution. This problem will be referred to in the second part of this paper, when analyzing the relevance of the Romanian Constitutional Court Decision no.405/2016.

The latter normative variant for the offense in question is represented by the noncompliance of the perpetrator with art.38 par.$2^1$ and $2^2$ of Law no.111/1996. The quoted text, namely paragraph $2^1$ stipulates: "It is prohibited to deliberate add radioactive substances in the production of food, feed and cosmetic products, as well as the import or export of such products". Paragraph $2^2$ provides that "It is prohibited to deliberate addition of radioactive substances in toys and personal ornaments, and the import or export of such products".

We believe that the incrimination actually prohibits the manufacturer, importer or exporter of food, cosmetics, toys and personal ornaments to deliberately add radioactive substances in its products to safeguard the life and integrity of human beings. This provision, from our perspective is mainly suitable for the protection of public health, more than for the protection of the environment.

The immediate result is represented by a state of danger to the social values protected, public health, public security and environmental integrity. Being a crime of abstract danger it is not necessary to produce any result for it to be typical. Moreover, if the facts in question have the effect of a more dangerous outcome, and personal life, integrity and property of people are affected, other crimes against life or property will be committed by the same act.

The causal link, given the formal character of the offense, is ex re.

The form of guilt required by law, in accordance with article 16, paragraph 6 of the Criminal Code, is the intention, either direct or indirect. The motive and purpose of the perpetrator are relevant only for the judicial individualization of the penalty.

3. The particular relevance of Romanian Constitutional Court Decision no.405/2016

Considering the type of normative act as criteria for the quality of a criminal norm, we consider it appropriate to determine the category of law liable to regulate criminal offenses and penalties provided, under the provisions of article 73, paragraph 3, letter h of the Romanian Constitution[6].

In this regard, we consider relevant to analyze the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of Romania in Decision no.405/15.06.2016[7], regarding the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of art.246 of the Romanian Criminal Code from 1969, art.297, paragraph 1 of the current Criminal Code and art.$13^2$ of Law no.78 / 2000 on preventing, detecting and sanctioning corruption.

By our assessment, the decision is relevant for the reasoning used by the constitutional judges that must apply with regard to other offenses regulated in a similar manner by incomplete criminal norms.

The essential legal question for this thesis focuses on the quality standard of the law when the incriminations is done by an incomplete legal norm, that must be completed with a provision from another act, in order to determine and punish a certain conduct. The same problem, but with reference to the offense of abuse of office, has been resolved by the Constitutional Court decision mentioned above.

In paragraph 51 of the Decision nr.405/2016, the Romanian Constitutional Court stipulated that one cannot be held liable for violating an objective standard if he does not fulfill a conduct undeterminable at normative level. Similarly, the Court held that the fulfillment of service duties improperly, can only be interpreted as meaning that the defective fulfillment is achieved by breaking the law.

The Court held that reference to a large sphere of normative acts, other than laws and Government ordinances, in order to complete criminal regulations, influences the objective side of the offense by extending it to acts that are not stipulated by primary regulation.

Equally, according to paragraph 61 of the decision, the prohibited conduct should be imposed by the legislature even by law (understood as an act formally adopted by Parliament, under Article 73, paragraph 1 of the Constitution, as well as a physical act with the force of law issued by the Government under legislative delegation under Article 115 of the Constitution or ordinances and emergency ordinances), and it cannot be deducted by the judge in a manner in which legal norms are replaced by a reasoning.

Consider the reasoning of the Court, we believe it to be applicable for every situation in which an incomplete norm regulates a criminal offense, and in order to determine the prohibited conduct, the legal text

[6] According to article 73, paragraph 3, letter h of the Romanian Constitution: "Organic laws shall regulate: crime, punishment and the execution thereof."

[7] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no.517/08.07.2016

must be completed with another provision, originating in a normative act. Without any doubt, article 73, paragraph 3, letter h of the Constitution does not require that absolutely all components of the constitutive content of the offense to be regulated by an organic law, or Government Emergency Ordinance issued in conditions legislative delegation under article 115 of the Constitution.

We also consider relevant the Romanian Constitutional Court Decision no.599/19.06.2007[8] regarding the exception of unconstitutionality of article 97, paragraphs 1,3 and 4 and the provisions of article 98, paragraphs 1,3 and 4 of Law no.26/1996 regarding the Forest Code. In that case, the exception of unconstitutionality was rejected, but the Court noted in its preamble that "since the average price of a cubic meter of standing timber is established under article 107, paragraph 1 of the Forest Code, by order of the central public authority responsible for forestry, this determination is based on a legal empowerment given by an organic law therefore the Court will not retain a violation of article 1, paragraph 3 of the Basic Law on the supremacy of the Constitution and the law".

Therefore, we believe that in terms of respecting Article 73, paragraph 3, letter h of the Constitution, an essential request attached to the material element of the offense is part of the constitutive content of the offense, and in order to comply with the Constitutional provisions earlier mentioned, the obligation that constitutes the essential request must be imposed by law, namely by organic law or by a Government emergency ordinance, or by an act of lower legal force, like a Government decision or a Ministry act, as long as the nature of that act is determined or, at least determinable, starting from the incrimination text, or from an act of legal force equal to organic law.

Fortunately, the provisions of article 44 of Law no.111/1996 refer to a proper authorization required by law, and in this respect, we have observed that all activities incriminated must be preauthorized, according to different provisions of the Law. Given the fact that it is an organic law, this quality standard imposed by article 73, paragraph 3, letter h of the Constitution is fulfilled. More than that, in the case of a breach of article 38, paragraph 1, as a normative variant of the offense stipulated by article 44, the normative act of lower legal force, like the act of the Ministry of Public Health is expressly mentioned, and following the mechanism of the Romanian Constitutional Court Decision no.599/19.06.2007, previously quoted, a legal empowerment has operated, and the completing norm, although an act of a Ministry, is determinable as an effect of an organic law provision.

Conclusion

As we have managed to show in the first part of this paper, the provisions of article 44 of Law no.111/1996 are among the vaguest and most confusing incriminations found in Romanian actual legislation.

Given the fact that a great number of legislative changes conducted to non-hermetic correlations, we appreciate that art.44 must be modified to suit the actual status of the legislation and to prevent the need for both the addressee of the criminal provision, but also for the national judge continuously reinterpret the provision in order to determine the prohibited and the punished conduct.

For this reason, we believe that art.44 must incriminate each of the conducts found in article 2, in a direct manner, and therefore we suggest the following form:

1. Carrying out the following activities without the proper authorization required by law constitutes an offense and shall be punished with imprisonment from six months to two years or a fine:

a) the research, development, ownership, location, construction or assembly, conservation of nuclear installations;
b) the design, ownership, location, construction and assembly, commissioning, operation, conservation and decommissioning of mining and preparation of uranium and thorium and facilities of waste from the mining and preparation of uranium and thorium;
c) the production, the providing and use of means for packaging or transport of radioactive materials, specially arranged for this purpose;
d) providing products and services for nuclear facilities;
e) the design, location, supply, manufacturing, service delivery, construction, installation, commissioning, operation, decommissioning or conservation of nuclear installations and products, services and systems classified as important for nuclear safety, without a management system authorization;
f) the introduction into the economic and social circuit, for use or consumption by the population, of products which have undergone irradiation or containing radioactive materials or the introducing into the field of medical diagnosis and medical treatment, radiation sources closed, open, ionizing radiation generating devices and pharmaceutical products containing radioactive materials.

2. Carrying out the following activities without the proper authorization required by law constitutes an offense and shall be punished with imprisonment from 2 to 7 years and deprivation of certain rights:

a) the commissioning, trial-run, operation, modification, removal, import and export of nuclear installations;
b) the production, placing, construction, supply, rental, transfer, handling, holding, use, intermediate storage, removal, transportation,

[8] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no.523/02.08.2007

transit, import, export and intra-community transfer of radiological facilities, including radioactive waste management facilities, if radiological facilities, nuclear or radioactive materials, radioactive radiation generating waste presents a special risk;

c) the production, manufacture, lease, transfer, possession, import, export and intra-community transfer of materials, devices and equipment referred to in Annex no.1;

d) holding, transfer, import, export and intra-community transfer of unpublished information relating to materials, devices and equipment pertinent to the proliferation of nuclear weapons and other nuclear explosive devices, referred to in Annex no.1;

e) closure or decommissioning of nuclear or radiological facilities, and in case of partial or complete transfer of nuclear and radiological installations, radioactive products or nuclear materials, if nuclear or radioactive materials, radioactive waste and radiation generators present a special nuclear or radiological risk.

3. The same penalty as in paragraph 2 will be applied for the deliberate addition of radioactive substances in the production of food, feed and cosmetic products, as well as the import or export of such products and for the deliberate addition of radioactive substances in toys and personal ornaments, and the import or export of such products.

4. The attempt to offenses under paragraphs 2 and 3 is punished".

Considering the second part of this paper, regarding the particular relevance of Romanian Constitutional Court Decision no.405/2016, we have concluded that an essential request attached to the material element of the offense is part of the constitutive content of the offense, and in order to comply with the provisions of article 73, paragraph 3, letter h of the Romanian Constitution, the obligation that constitutes the essential request must be imposed by law, namely by organic law or by a Government emergency ordinance, or by an act of lower legal force, like a Government decision or a Ministry act, as long as the nature of that act is determined or, at least determinable, starting from the incrimination text, or from an act of legal force equal to organic law. In this respect, we have observed that the provisions of article 44 of Law no.111/1996 adequately refer to other legal texts from the same law, which is organic, or to normative acts of lower legal force, like an act of the Ministry of Public Health, which is expressly mentioned by article 38, paragraph 1 of Law no.111/1996, being, therefore, determinable by organic law.

References

- N.Conea, E.Tanislav, C.Gheorghe, M.Conea – Criminal offenses under special laws (original title: Infracţiuni prevăzute în legi speciale), Semne Publishing House, Bucharest, 2000
- M.A.Hotca (coord.) – Criminal offenses under special laws, Comments and explanations (original title: Infracţiuni prevăzute în legi speciale, Comentarii şi explicaţii), 3rd edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- D.S.Marinescu, M.C.Petre – Environmental Law Treaty (original title: Tratat de Dreptul Mediului), 5th edition, Universitara Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014

PROTECTION OF THE WASTE REGIME BY CRIMINAL LAW. ACTUAL SITUATION IN ROMANIA

Andreea Oana VERNEA[*]

Abstract

In this paper, the author discusses the main weaknesses of the incrimination provided by article 63 of Romanian Law no.211/2011, regarding the waste regime, in its actual state, as a result of legislation changes that occurred repeatedly.

The paper is structured in three parts. The first part indicates the most relevant legislation changes for article 63 of Romanian Law no.211/2011 since its entry into force. The second part identifies the inconsistencies of the actual version of the law, focusing mainly on the constitutive content of the crime, while the third part points out the main solutions to the deficiencies previously mentioned, alongside de lege ferenda proposals.

Keywords: waste regime, waste protection, crimes against environment, inadequate legislation.

1. Introduction

The legal regime of waste in Romania is regulated by Law no.211/2011, republished[1], with subsequent amendments. The major impact of the management of waste on the environment is beyond doubt, even resulting from article 1 of the law previously mentioned that states: "This law establishes the necessary measures to protect the environment and human health by preventing or reducing adverse effects resulting from the production and management of waste and by reducing overall impacts of the use of resources and improving the efficiency of their use".

The criminal protection assured by the legislator under the provisions of article 63 of Law no.211/2011 aims at ensuring the compliance with the provisions regarding marketing, recovery, treatment, disposal and transport of waste criminalization containing six different normative contents, sanctioned in the same manner.

Art.63 of Law no.211/2011 states: "(1) An offense punishable by imprisonment from three years to five years or a fine following facts: a) the import of appliances, equipment, machinery, materials and products used from a waste category prohibited to import; b) failure to take or respect measures in carrying out the collection, transport, recovery and disposal of hazardous waste; c) trade, abandonment and/or failure to assure the load of waste during transit through the territory of Romania; d) the refuse to return waste to the country of origin if it was brought into the country for purposes other than that of disposal and for which the competent authority ordered the return; e) placing the waste in the country in order to eliminate and / or not used for the purpose for which it has been introduced; f) acceptance by operators of deposits/incinerators for disposal of waste of smuggled waste and / or of waste brought into the country for purposes other than disposal and which could not be used for the purpose for which they were introduced. (2) The attempt is punishable".

Regarding the most relevant legislative changes that occurred since its entry into force, we observe that since November 25th, 2011[2], Law no.211/2011 has been modified three times.

The first amendment was done by Law no.187/2012 regarding the enactment of Law no.286/2009, the Criminal Code. This act had a direct relevance for the provisions analyzed, namely art.63 of Law no.211/2011, because it reduced the penalty limits originally established by the legislator, in 2011, at 3 to 5 years of imprisonment, or a criminal fine, to 6 months to 5 years of imprisonment or a criminal fine. The reason behind the reduction of the penalty limits came alongside the philosophy of the new Criminal Code, Law no.286/2009, enforced in the 1st of February, 2014, that provided some reduced the penalty limits for most crimes by comparison to the old legislation.

Two months later, on March 28th, 2014, Law no.211/2011 was republished, but this did not affect, in any way, the provisions of art.63.

The second important amendment to the Law was done by the Government Emergency Ordinance (G.E.O.) no.68/2016, regarding the amending and supplementing of Law no.211/2011 concerning the waste regime, entered into force on October 28th, 2016[3], approved by Law no.166/2017 on July 16th, 2017[4]. By this amendment, the first paragraph of art.63 was again modified, by return to the previous regulation, namely, the limits of the penalty were raised from 6 months to 5 years of imprisonment or a criminal fine to 3 to 5

[*] PhD Student, University of Bucharest, Faculty of Law, Judge, Bucharest 1st District Court of first instance (e-mail: andreeaoanea@gmail.com);

[1] Variant republished in the Official Gazette, Part I, No. 220/28.03.2014

[2] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, No. 837/25.11.2011

[3] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 823/18.10.2016

[4] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 554/13.07.2017

years of imprisonment, or a criminal fine, just like the original provisions of the Law, as entered into force in 2011.

The hesitation of the legislator to modify the penalty limits followed by a reenactment of the previous version of the law is an indicator of the Romanian legislative fluctuation in the matter of waste regime in the last years, fluctuation that prevented a consequent judicial practice in the same timeframe.

The third legislative change was made by G.E.O. no.74/2018[5], regarding the amending and supplementing of Law no.211/2011 concerning the waste regime, of Law no. 249/2015 regarding the management of packaging and of the waste of packaging, and of G.E.O. no.196/2005 regarding the Environmental Fund. G.E.O. no.74/2018 was approved by Law no.31/2019[6]. This third legislative amendment to Law no.211/2011 does not include relevant changes to the provisions of art.63, subjected to analyze.

2. Particularities of the incrimination

In order to establish the actual status and deficiencies of the crime regulated by art.63 of Law no.211/2001 we will briefly point out the particularities and weaknesses of the text.

The generic legal object consists in the protection of the environment against pollution by waste. The special legal object, as we appreciate, consists in the social relationships formed around environmental protection and human health by strictly regulating the marketing, recovery, treatment, disposal and transport of waste.

Depending on the features of each variant normative, the material object can be represented by appliances, equipment, machinery, materials and products used and worn in the category of waste, prohibited import waste or hazardous waste.

The definition of waste is stipulated in Section 9 of Annex 1 to this Law, as follows: "any substance or object which the holder throws or intends to throw or is required to throw". Hazardous waste is defined by section 11 of Annex 1 to the same law as follows: "any waste which displays one or more of the hazardous properties listed in Annex no.4 of the law".

In an unexpected manner, although the qualification of hazardous waste depends on the provisions of Annex 4, part of Law no.211/2011, this annex was repealed by article 1, point 33 of G.E.O. no.68/10.12.2016 amending and supplementing Law no.211/2011 on waste regime.

This way, the actual enactment does not contain a functional definition of the concept of hazardous waste. Given the fact that the concept is used in criminal regulation, and section 11 of Annex 1 of Law no.211/2011 strictly refers to Annex 4, we appreciate that the definition of hazardous waste should not be taken from another law, but, as a last resort, if another provision clearly stipulates the definition, it can be used. As we observed, a definition of hazardous waste can be found in Article 2, point 21 of G.E.O. no.195/2005, regarding the protection of the environment[7]. According to this text, hazardous waste is "waste classified generically under specific waste regulations in these types or categories of waste and that have at least one constituent or a property that makes it hazardous". This cannot be considered a valid definition, mainly because it refers to special regulation that classifies waste, and, under Romanian law, that classification was made by Annex 4 of the Law no.211/2011, actually repealed.

The concept of hazardous waste was defined by legal literature[8] as "waste arising from anthropogenic activities that once introduced or maintained in the environment has a negative effect on the environment, people, plants, animals and material goods".

Other authors[9] state that for the management of waste a list containing all types of waste, including hazardous waste must be established, but the author does not refer to an existing list.

An environmental law dictionary[10] defines hazardous waste as "toxic, inflammable, explosive, infectios, corrosive, radioactive, or other similar types of waste that once introduced or maintained in the environment can harm the environment, plants, animals and people".

We appreciate that a definition given by a scholar, even of the highest academic rank, cannot replace the incrimination text that can only be provided by the legislator, as an effect of nullum crimen sine lege principle.

As a result, none of the provisions stipulated for hazardous waste can be applied at this moment.

The active subject of the offense is not qualified by law, therefore it can be represented by any physical person or legal person held liable according to general criminal law provisions.

In what concerns the normative variant covered by article 63, paragraph 1, letter f, previously quoted, the active subject is, in fact, a legal entity, but since the law does not circumstantiate this distinction, we appreciate that an Operator can also be an individual person, therefore, even a physical person is likely to commit the offense.

[5] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 630/19.07.2018
[6] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 37/14.01.2019
[7] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no.1196/30.12.2005
[8] D.S.Marinescu, M.C.Petre – Environmental Law Treaty (original title: Tratat de Dreptul Mediului), 5th edition, Universitara Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, pg.535
[9] M.Duţu, A.Duţu – Environmental Law (original title: Dreptul Mediului), 4th edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, pg.442
[10] C.P.Romiţan – Environmental Law Dictionary (original title: Dicţionar de Dreptul Mediului), All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004, pg.59

The main passive subject is the State as guarantor of the integrity of the environment. If a legal or physical person is harmed by the action incriminated under the provisions of art.63, we appreciate that there will not be a secondary passive subject of this crime, but a single passive subject of another offense against patrimony or physical integrity of the victim.

Given the fact that the offenses covered by Article 63 of Law no.211/2011 are incriminated in six variants with different regulations, we appreciate that the premise and the constitutive content must be analyzed for each variant.

Therefore, in what concerns the variant regulated by article 63, paragraph 1, letter a, we shall not encounter a premise situation, and the material element consists of an import operation, namely the placing inside the national borders, regardless of title of goods, as circumscribed in the present situation: appliances, equipment, machinery, materials and products used and waste from abroad. In this regard, we appreciate that the civil context in which the goods were brought into the country is not relevant, as long as they are within the borders of Romania and are likely to alter the quality of the environmental quality in this area.

For the crime to be typical, the material element must have an essential requirement attached, namely that the imported products fall within the category of waste prohibited to import.

A major shortcoming of this regulation is that the forbidden to import waste category is not determinable. As we analyze the Romanian legislation, we observe that the regime of import of waste materials of any kind and other dangerous substances to health and the environment has been established in Romania by Government Decision no.340/20.06.1992[11], but the quoted decision has been repealed by art.30 of the Government Decision no.228/2004[12] regarding the control of placing unhazardous waste inside the borders considering import, active perfecting or transit.

The only actual act designating conditions directly applicable to import of waste is the Regulation (EC) no. 1013/2006 of the European Parliament and of the Council, but an exhaustive list of prohibited to import waste that cannot be found.

In these circumstances, we consider that the provisions of article 63, paragraph 1, letter a of Law no.211/2011 are not likely to be applied in practice, fact that requires the intervention of the criminal legislature in order either to repeal the provision, or to establish a category of waste prohibited to import. Given the need to protect the environment, especially in the last decade, we find it imperative for the Romanian legislator to determine the category previously mentioned.

The second normative variant of the offense can be found in article 63, paragraph 1, letter b of Law no.211/2011.

The prohibited conduct is represented by the failure to take or respect measures in carrying out the collection, transport, recovery and disposal of hazardous waste. The premise situation is the pre-existence of an obligation to take measures or respect the measures taken in processing hazardous waste in the manner established by the law: collection, transport, recovery and disposal.

To establish the existence of the premise situation it is necessary to predetermine the category of hazardous waste. In this regard, we refer to the explanations given when analyzing the material object of the crime and conclude that hazardous waste is defined in section 11 of Annex 1 of Law no.211/2011 as waste which displays one or more of the hazardous properties referred in the Annex no. 4 the law, but Annex 4, inexplicably, was repealed, without being replaced by another list of dangerous properties in accordance to the legal text.

This way, the provisions of article 63, paragraph 1, letter b of the Law no.211/2011 are without practical effect, since the type of waste for which the conduct was prescribed is not determined or determinable by current legislation. As earlier stated, the definition of hazardous waste cannot be borrowed from another law.

The third normative variant is found in article 63, paragraph 1, letter c of Law no.211/2011, and incriminates the trade, abandonment and/or failure to assure the load of waste during transit through the territory of Romania. The regulation has no premise situation and the material element consists of three alternative actions, namely trade, abandonment of waste and failure to assure the load of waste during transit through the territory of Romania.

The imprecise legislative manner used by the legislator cannot be accepted in criminal regulations, because the use of "and/or" in a criminal provision may create the impression that the three actions should be carried out either cumulatively or alternately. We appreciate that such confusion is not compatible with the accuracy and predictability of the incrimination in criminal matters, and the only reasonable interpretation, in our view, concerns the alternative nature of the conducts incriminated, and this way, the only valid conjunction would be "or" instead of "and/or".

We shall not focus on the three actions that represent the verbum regens because no deficiencies have been found. The essential requirement attached to the material element states that the prohibited act must occur while the waste is located in Romania.

The fourth normative variant is found in article 63, paragraph 1, letter d that incriminates the refuse to return waste to the country of origin if it was brought into the country for purposes other than that of disposal and for which the competent authority ordered the return.

[11] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no.201/18.08.1992
[12] Published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no.189/04.03.2004

The premise situation is represented by the waste return order previously issued by the competent authority. The material element lies in the refusal to return the waste to its country of origin, which can be done either by an action or by omission. Equally, we appreciate that an essential requirement is attached to the material element, and that consists of the purpose of importing the waste, which must be other than its elimination. If the waste was imported with the purpose of disposal, even if the competent authority issued an order to return, the conduct will not fit the incrimination, because the essential requirement is not fulfilled.

The fifth normative variant, found in article 63, paragraph 1, letter e incriminates the action of placing the waste in the country in order to eliminate and/or not used for the purpose for which it has been introduced. The text does not imply the existence of a premise situation. The material element can be achieved by two alternative actions, firstly, the placing of waste on Romanian land and secondly, the lack of using the waste according to the purpose for which it was placed inside the national borders. We appreciate that the foregoing considerations regarding the need to replace the phrase "and/or" with a single conjunction, in this case "or", are valid for this provision also.

Regarding the first alternative action, consisting in placing the waste inside Romanian borders, we consider that it is irrelevant to determine if the waste was imported in a legitimate or fraudulent manner, as long as the placing on land is done with the purpose of eliminating the waste.

Regarding the second alternative action, consisting in the non-use of waste for the purpose for which it was introduced inside Romanian borders, we appreciate that it is not necessary that the waste was used in another purpose other than that for which it was introduced in the country, because the crime is committed even in the case of non-use, or of storage without the intention of using the waste in any way.

If the waste that constitutes the material object of the crime in this normative variant is introduced inside Romanian borders, and after that it is abandoned, we appreciate that the conduct will fall under the provisions of article 63, paragraph 1, letter c of Law no.211/2011, previously mentioned.

The sixth normative variant is regulated by article 63, paragraph 1, letter f of Law no.211/2011, and incriminates the acceptance by operators of deposits/incinerators for disposal of waste of smuggled waste and/or of waste brought into the country for purposes other than disposal and which could not be used for the purpose for which they were introduced.

As a particularity we observe that the premise situation is also alternative: firstly, it consists in the action to smuggle, namely illegally introduce waste inside the borders of Romania and secondly the legal introduction of waste inside the borders, with a specific purpose other than disposal, if the waste could not be used for the original purpose.

For the same reason as earlier discussed, we believe that the phrase "and/or" must be replaced with "or", because the acceptance of smuggled waste is not cumulative with the acceptance of legally introduced waste, both being alternative ways, autonomously incriminated by the text analyzed.

The action of accepting waste for disposal implies the agreement of the operator of waste deposits or incinerators. We appreciate that it is not necessary for the operator to proceed to waste disposal for the action to be punishable, because the conduct fits the incrimination if the operator simply accepts the waste, if the premise situation is fulfilled.

The immediate consequence, for all six normative variants is a state of danger caused to social relations regarding environmental protection and public health.

The causality link between the material element and the immediate consequence is directly determined by the material conduct, resulting ex re.

The form of guilt required by law, as article 16, paragraph 6 of the Criminal Code states, is the intention, either direct or indirect of the perpetrator, which we find suitable for all six variants of article 63, paragraph 1. The motive and purpose of the perpetrator are relevant only in the judicial individualization of punishment.

Although preparatory acts are possible if the material element is done by an action, they are not incriminated. The attempt is criminalized for each variant normative under article 63, paragraph 2 of Law no.211 / 2011, but we appreciate that it is possible only if the conduct of the perpetrator consists of an action.

3. Conclusion

In these final paragraphs, we have cumulated our proposals for improving the legislation, which will be stated separately for each normative variant.

In order to effectively enforce the provisions of article 63, paragraph 1, letter a, de lege ferenda, we consider it necessary that the legislator establishes a basis for determining the category of prohibited waste import by regulating its content either by an amendment to Law no.211/2011 or in a distinct normative act, expressly determined by Law no.211/2011.

In order to apply the provisions of article 63, paragraph 1, letter b, we appreciate that the legislator must promptly define the concept of "hazardous waste" by law, possibly by setting up the reference system for this type of waste under Annex 4 of the Law no.211/2011, which would not imply other legislative changes. By our appreciation, the easiest way to fix this deficiency would be to re-enact the last version of Annex 4, before it was repealed.

In what concerns the regulation found in article 63, paragraph 1, letter c, we appreciate that de lege ferenda, the legislator must replace the confusing manner of incrimination with an accurate provision, that will not raise issues of predictability, therefore, we propose the replacement of the term "and/or" with a single conjunction, namely "or".

The same considerations apply for the provisions of art. 63, paragraph 1, letter e where we propose the replacement of the term "and/or" with a single conjunction, namely "or", because the purpose of the legislator was not to cumulate two prohibited actions in order for the perpetrator to be held liable. We believe that the only reasonable interpretation is to accept that the text incriminates two distinct, alternative conducts, therefore, the phrase "and/or" must be replaced with a single conjunction, namely "or".

With a slight amendment, the same considerations are valid for the provisions of art. 63, paragraph 1, letter f, where the acceptance of smuggled waste cannot be seen as cumulative with the acceptance of legally introduced waste, in order for the conduct to fit the incrimination, but this interpretation must not lead to plural offenses if both types of waste are accepted by the operator.

As we have managed to show, the regulation of article 63 of Law no.211/2011 is far from being functional at this moment, and an intervention of the legislator is necessary. Equally, some of the issues analyzed, that made the legislative proposals earlier mentioned possible, are an effect of uncorrelated legislative changes in the past.

References

- M.Duţu, A.Duţu – Environmental Law (original title: Dreptul Mediului), 4th edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- D.S.Marinescu, M.C.Petre – Environmental Law Treaty (original title: Tratat de Dreptul Mediului), 5th edition, Universitara Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- C.P.Romiţan – Environmental Law Dictionary (original title: Dicţionar de Dreptul Mediului), All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004

ON THE LIMITS AND CONSEQUENCES OF THE CASE SPLITTING IN THE ROMANIAN CRIMINAL PROCEDURE SYSTEM

Andrei ZARAFIU
Radu SLĂVOIU*

Abstract

In the Romanian criminal justice system, the framework or procedural context in which one of the two main judicial functions is exercised - dealing with essential elements of the conflict report - is not fixed but flexible.

The current study aims to analyze some of the procedural manifestations of case splitting, one of the legally accepted operations that have as purpose to modify the procedural framework.

The analysis seeks to identify not only the general pattern in which case splitting may occur, but also the possible solutions to overcome any impediments or incidents generated by the actual application / enforcement of this operation. Last but not least, the study also suggests making changes to the incidental regulatory framework, where it lacks efficiency.

Keywords: case splitting, procedural incident, boundaries, effects, prohibitions.

Introduction:

This research approach addresses a seemingly benign issue in all incidental or ancillary procedural operations. Undoubtedly, the procedural purpose of the case splitting does not refer to the merits of the case, in the sense that this operation is not capable of influencing the solution to be given on the conflict report subjected to the investigation or judgment. Paradoxically, however, the case-splitting may result in the procedure being an important operation in the general economy of the judicial process. In terms of the regulatory framework incidentally concentrated on case splitting, the institution was approached rather tangentially in the literature.

However, the particular judicial manifestations of case splitting have shown that in many cases the erroneous or distorted realization of this operation can raise serious problems that are difficult to overcome.

1. Preliminary aspects regarding the procedural operation of case splitting in the Romanian criminal procedural system

From a normative and also a judicial perspective, case splitting is regulated as a common procedural incident on jurisdiction in criminal matters. As a way of procedural manifestation, the case splitting is a derivative incident that interferes closely with the joining of the criminal cases, realizing in the opposite sense a similar consequence to it. Both when joining the cases and sometimes when case splitting, there is a prorogation of competence of the judicial bodies, which thus are empowered to manifest themselves judicially, in compliance with the regulation, beyond their original competencies. In this sense, in the doctrine[1], the prorogation of competence was defined as a form of extension of the jurisdiction of a judicial body also as regard the facts or persons not falling within the scope of the competence determined in accordance with the common rules. When considering the effects[2] of the competence, the prorogation of competence is basically a procedural remedy whereby the extension of the powers that derive from the natural, ordinary jurisdiction of a judicial body and other matters will not be sanctioned under the conditions of common law. Thus, the acts performed by a judicial body through the extension of the competence as well as regarding the facts, persons not assigned to them according to the customary norms, shall not be found to be null (sanctioned by absolute nullity) or annulled (nullified by relative nullity), but will be considered valid, producing legal consequences.

In the current criminal procedural system, prorogation of competencies operates not only in terms of facts or persons, but also in terms of circumstances,

* Associate Professor, Ph.D., Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (e-mail: andrei.zarafiu@drept.unibuc.ro , andrei.zarafiu@mnpartners.ro )

 Assistant Professor Ph.D., Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: raduslavoiu@yahoo.ro )

[1] G. Gr. Theodoru, Criminal Procedure Law Treaty, 3rd Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2013, p.265. The author deals with the indivisibility and connectivity under the most often encountered cases of prorogation of jurisdiction, forms that no longer found an express normative correspondent in the Criminal Procedure Code. See in this respect the provisions of article 43 to 46 CPC.

[2] If the positive effect of competence determines the habilitation or the empowerment of a judiciary to manifest themselves by performing specific tasks and carrying out concrete acts, the negative effect of competence determines the impossibility of the same judicial body to overcome its competencies established based on its competencies. In this respect, A Zarafiu, Criminal Procedure. The general part. Special art, 2nd Edition, CH Beck Publishing House, 2015, p.123-124.

such as the pre-proceedings questions[3] of extra-criminal nature that causes an extension of the functional competence. When synthesizing the incidental regulation, nowadays the prorogation of competence operates when joining the criminal cases, when splitting them, in case of pre-proceedings, change of legal classification or qualification of the offence. The prorogation of competence is regulated as a common incident regarding the competence, having the possibility to intervene both in the activity of the courts as in the activity of the prosecution bodies, as a rule of reference under article 63 CPC.

However, the prorogation of competence remains an possible event, since the extension of competence does not operate even if one of the ways provided by the law manifests itself (it is not mandatory to extend the initial competence if the change of legal classification leads to a qualification that falls within the jurisdiction of the same judicial body where the case is pending).The law prefers, as a rule, the prorogation of competence in an ascending order, intervening only in favor of a body of similar or higher degree. By exception (in the case of pre-proceeding matters), the prorogation of competence may also operate in favor of the inferior body, as it is manifested in terms of functional competence.

In order to understand the limits and procedural consequences of case splitting, similar aspects of the case joining must first be cleared, because the institutions are correspondent but accomplished in the opposite direction. As a legal operation, case joining involves bringing two or more separate causes into a single file to be solved by a single judgment. Case joining is a form of achieving the procedural operability as it involves the simplification of the judicial activity and prevents contradictory rulings, through which different rulings are issued for the same legal relationships or interrelated legal relationships .The material premise of case joining is the valid existence of many criminal causes as the unification of the procedural context cannot operate at the virtual level, but always in the concrete. The functional premise consists of an intrinsic, formal, etiological, etc. connection, between these causes that claim the need to reunite them. The circumstances justifying the judicial operation of the case joining are its cases (grounds), in the absence of which the case joining, even if it corresponds to a judicial purpose, takes on an unlawful form. At present, the situations of case joining are no longer exhaustively regulated, in order not to affect the dynamic nature of the procedural forms, except in the case of compulsory case joining.

Sometimes case joining can also lead to a prorogation of competence in the sense that the body that will investigate or judge all causes did not have initially the competence over some facts or some perpetrators[4] . It is the possibility and not the binding nature of the incidence of the prorogations of competence in terms of case joining that is emphasized in the doctrine, providing that "if several causes between which a connection exists are pending in front of the same court or the same prosecutor's office, the case joining will not imply by itself as well the prorogation of competence"[5]. As mentioned above, joining criminal cases is regulated by the current provisions of article 43 CPP either as a mandatory incident or as an optional incident.

The mandatory case joining is caused by the circumstance or the legal situation in which a plurality of material acts or criminal acts constitutes, by its nature or by the will of the legislator, a unit requiring the settlement of the entire procedural complex by a single court. Practically, the plurality of legal relationships of conflict will be given a single judicial ruling that will ensure the security of legal relations. Corresponding to indivisibility cases in the former legislation, the present cases of compulsory case joining involve an organic connection between several facts or several material acts that make up a legal or natural unity of the offence. For the mandatory hypothesis for which it was regulated, the case joining appears, according to article 43 paragraph (1) CPC, in the form of a positive procedural obligation for the judicial body losing the right to assess the justifiable nature of the case joining from a judicial perspective. Its manifestations are limited only to finding that there is one of the cases of compulsory case joining without being able to refuse or ignore the benefit of the case joining.

The provision for the criminal cases joining is obligatory issued:

When it was regulated as an optional operation, the case joining seems to be caused by a less close link between two or more criminal causes, thus manifesting itself in a short term and only if it does not affect the procedural operability.

The optional case joining intervenes:

a) in the case of a multiple offenses contest - when two or more offenses were committed by the same person;
b) in the case of criminal participation - when more than one person were involved in the crime (even if in different qualities);
c) when two or more offenses are connected (by the

[3] In the case of pre-proceedings questions, through the prorogation of competence, the criminal court acquires jurisdiction to judge in matters other than the criminal one. According to article 52 paragraph (2) from the CPC, the judicial consequences of this extension are manifested in two aspects, concerning the procedure (rules) and the means of evidence.

[4] In the same sense, in doctrine I. Neagu, M. Damaschin Criminal Procedure Treaty. The general part, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p.366, it was stated that "Case joining is a situation in which the prorogation of competence can be retained because, depending on the reason leading to the case joining, competence norms are established according to which certain cases are settled by criminal justice bodies, which, under normal circumstances, do not have the competence to resolve them."

[5] M. Udroiu in M. Udroiu (coord.), Code of Criminal Procedure. Comment on articles , 2nd edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.202 object, persons, cause, etc.) and the case joining is necessary for the good performance of justice.

This general situation of optional case joining may include the situations which, in the former procedural law, were considered to be cases of inherent connection:

- when two or more offenses are committed by different acts, by one or more persons together, at the same time and in the same place;
- where two or more offenses are committed in a different time or place after a prior agreement between offenders;
- when an offense is committed to prepare, facilitate or hide the commission of that offense, or is committed to facilitate or ensure that the perpetrator of another offense is excluded from criminal liability.

Irrespective of the fact that the existence of any of these cases is judicially established, the case joining will only be ordered if the competent judicial authority, within the limits of its powers, considers that the pursuit or trial are not delayed by this operation. In this respect, it is stated in the doctrine that despite the fact that the new code of criminal procedure no longer maintains the express rules of indivisibility and connectivity, "the different legal treatment of the cases in which the case joining is mandatory and those in which the case joining is optional represents precisely the distinction to be made between instances of indivisibility and the cases of connectivity"[6] .Thus, the link between criminal cases is not, by itself, the sufficient condition for the case joining to take place; the provision of the judicial body must be based not only on legality but also on the opportunity. In this respect, the doctrine states that "the importance of this institution is determined by the need for the act of justice to have a unitary nature in relation to the objective reality that characterizes the committed criminal activity, because otherwise there is the risk of a misapplication of the law"[7].

By implementing in criminal matters an incident specific to civil proceedings, the law now allows case joining as well in cases where there are several causes of the same object being analyzed by several judicial bodies. In such a situation, the case joining is based on a legal situation called litis pendens.

It may fall under this situation of case joining when the same appeal, introduced by the same person against the same ruling is recorded in two different cases, assigned to separate distinct bodies of the same court of appeal since it has been successively filed and registered, once by fax and once by registered letter (which arrived later). The case joining determined by the identity of object of two or more criminal cases is rather specific to the initial moments of the criminal trial (two different criminal prosecution bodies are pursuing the same offense and conducting parallel investigations as a result of distinct referrals).

Regardless of whether it is mandatory or voluntary, the case joining is not accomplished arbitrarily, but according to expressly regulated legal preferences that prevent abnormal situations or conflicts of competence. Thus:

- if the competence in relation to different facts or different perpetrators belongs, according to the law, to several equal-rank courts, the jurisdiction to judge all the facts and all the perpetrators (the joined cases) lies with the court first notified;
- if the competence by nature of the facts or by the quality of the persons belongs to different-rank courts, the competence to judge all the cases lies with the higher rank court;
- if one of the courts is civil and one military, the competence lies with the civil court; if the military court is higher in rank, the competence shall lie with the civil court equivalent in rank to the military court, having territorial jurisdiction according to the general rules, article 41 and article 42 Code of Criminal Procedure;
- concealment, favoring the offender, and non-disclosure of offenses are within the jurisdiction (competence) of the court that judges the offense to which they refer, and if competence by the quality of the persons belongs to different-rank courts, the competence to judge all the cases lies with the higher-rank court.

Paradoxically, the preference for the civil judicial organs with regard to the organ in whose favor the prorogation of competence operates is only functioning with regard to the judiciary. During the criminal prosecution, the preference operates in favor of the specialized body. In this respect, according to article 56 paragraph (4) and (5) of the CPC, under the form of special rules, is established the absolute nature of the provision according to which, in the case of crimes committed by military personnel, the prosecution is necessarily carried out by the military prosecutor. Military prosecutors within the military prosecutor's offices or the military units of the prosecutor's offices carry out the criminal prosecution according to the competence of the prosecutor's office to which they belong, for all participants in committing the crimes committed by the military, and the competent court will be notified according to article 44 CPP.

Practically, this preference of a special nature was only established for the criminal prosecution phase, which would be replaced by the preference regulated by common rules at the time the court was seized.

In all cases, once produced judicially, the prorogation of competence generates definitive effects, and it cannot be lost even if the ground that caused it ceases or disappears. Thus, according to article 44 para (2), the competence to hear the joined cases remains with the court, even if for the act or the perpetrator who determined the jurisdiction of these courts the splitting

[6] C.Voicu in the Code of Criminal Procedure , Issue 3, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.135

[7] B. Micu, AG Paun, R. Slăvoiu, Criminal Procedure. Course for the admission to the magistracy and to the profession of lawyer. Tests with multiple choice questions, 3rd Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p.82 of the cases or the discontinuation or termination of the criminal proceedings have been ordered or the exoneration was ruled. However, this rule does not work for the criminal prosecution phase, according to article 63 para (2) CPC. Currently, case joining is ordered only by the court which also shall have jurisdiction to hear the joined cases, in accordance with the above rules. There is no incidence of the rule from civil matters transferring the competence to decide on the joining of the judicial body which has no jurisdiction to hear the joined cases[8].

However, in all cases, the joining of the cases is preceded by a series of administrative measures (references to the competent court or panel) aimed at bringing all the cases in which the joinder will be discussed in the same hearing before a single panel.

The joining of the cases shall be ordered at the request of the prosecutor or of the parties. The case joining may also be ordered ex officio, regardless of the case on which it is grounded (compulsory or optional joining). The Government Emergency Ordinance no. 18/2016 provided that the injured party, whether or not a civil party in the criminal proceeding, may request the judicial bodies to join the cases, regardless of whether the reason invoked is a case of compulsory or optional joining. In the light of this new change, in doctrine, we also find opinions according to which "in the course of criminal prosecution the suspect as well may ask the criminal prosecution bodies to join the cases for the purpose of the good administration of justice"[9].

During the trial, in order to be joined, the cases must be at the same stage of the trial: at first instance or on appeal. The condition is deemed to be fulfilled even if these cases are at different stages of the trial at first instance or on appeal, or they are in the re-judgment phase after the dismissal or the cassation ordered during the ordinary or extraordinary ways of appeal. Thus, in the doctrine, it was stated that "at the stage of the trial, the joining of the cases is done differentially according to the stage of the trial. Cases are always joined if they are pending on a first instance court, even after the cassation with remanding the case for retrial"[10].

The joining of the cases is ordered during the trial by a court resolution which can be appealed only with the merits of the case [article 45 para (3) CPC]. In the course of the criminal prosecution, the joining of cases is ordered by an ordinance which, in the absence of derogation from the ordinary rule, may be appealed under the conditions of common law, with a complaint to the hierarchically superior prosecutor.

A form of prorogation of competence, atypical and mediated, may be considered to occur in case of splitting of the case. As mentioned, the splitting of the case is the legal operation similar to the joining of the cases, but accomplished in the opposite direction.

In spite of the apparent regulatory freedom regarding the form of procedural manifestation (the law does not explicitly provide for strict cases and conditions of operation as in the case of joining), the case splitting is circumscribed to implied limitations[11] which makes its judicial existence more specific. First of all, the act of positive disposition in the case of case splitting produces, at the same time, two categories of effects. The procedural effect of this operation is to gain the autonomy of the context in which either one of the elements of the already active action (with regard to some of the facts or some of the perpetrators) is exercised, or even one of the actions initially exercised in the same judicial context. The administrative effect of case splitting consists in the formation of new files (one or more, with different indications), derived from the original one, which retains its unique number and which will be solved separately. Secondly, the normative basis of the case splitting is different, according to the subject matter.

According to article 46 CPC the court may order the case splitting in respect of some of the defendants or some of the offenses for sound reasons concerning the proper conduct of the trial (eg the serious illness of one of the defendants that would lead to the suspension of the trial as far as he is concerned, the acquisition of special qualities by one of the defendants that would determine the change of personal competence and declining the jurisdiction, etc.).The measure does not affect the indivisibility of the criminal proceedings because, in such a situation, there will not be multiple judicial actions (born out of a single material cause) but the same action will be exercised in different procedural contexts.[12]

When the case splitting concerns one of the judicial actions itself, the incidental normative framework is given by the provisions of article 26 CPC. The premise of this form of case splitting is the existence of a simultaneous exercise of both legal actions in the same procedural framework, conducted in front of the criminal judicial bodies. Although generated by the same material cause (committing the offense representing at the same time a tort / delict), the two legal actions are exercised with the consideration of different procedural requirements, given that the criminal action is a public action and the civil action is a private one. Moreover, the main nature of the criminal

[8] According to article 139 paragraph (2) Code for civil procedure "The exception to the connectivity may be invoked by the parties or ex officio at the latest at the first hearing before the court subsequently seized which, by court resolution, will rule on the exception"

[9] M. Udroiu in M. Udroiu (coordinator), Code of Criminal Procedure. Comment on articles, 2nd edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.205

[10] N. Volonciu, Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part Vol. I , 3rd Edition, Paideia Publishing House, Bucharest, p.311

[11] In this respect, according to the doctrine, N. Volonciu, Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part Vol. I, 3rd Edition, Paideia, Bucharest, p.311 "case splitting must be used with caution so as the separation of complex issues should not be prejudicial to the unitary resolving of the case."

[12] See also M. Udroiu, previously quoted, p. 62 action influences the procedural destiny of the secondary action by removing the possibility of affecting the features of the public action[13].

In this respect, if the resolution of the civil action determines the exceeding of the reasonable time for solving the criminal action (circumscribed in principle to the procedural celerity), the criminal court may order the splitting of the civil action. In order to be able to properly substantiate the case splitting provision, the danger of delaying the settlement of the criminal action as a result of the timing of the civil action settlement must be cert and actual, even if it is to occur in the future, but under no circumstance may it be only eventually. Thus, in the doctrine, it was shown that "the case splitting must be well justified, the interest of the breakdown exceeding the interest of the joint settlement of the cause"[14].

By splitting the civil action no transfer of functional competence of the criminal court to the civil court will be achieved, as the newly formed file will remain pending in front of the criminal court. This criminal case will deal with the settlement of the split civil action and will remain in the competence of the criminal court that will perform its judicial function by pronouncing one of the main solutions provided by article 25 CPC, with the possibility to pronounce as well the complementary solutions provided by article 397 CPC. The judicial activity in the case having as object the split civil action will be carried out according to the procedural rules (of procedural law) provided by the criminal procedural law, but the conflict report will be settled according to the substantive rules (substantive law) provided by the civil law. In order for the case splitting order not to be unfairly transformed for the active subject of civil action that could very hardly sustain civil claims by re-administering the evidence administered before the criminal court, the law offers an effective remedy in the provisions of article 26 para (3). Thus, the evidence administered until the case splitting will be used, by takeover, as well to the settlement of the split civil action.

Although the case splitting is regulated as a common incident in the matter of competence, when it is expressed in the form of case splitting of the civil action, the act of disposition can only belong to the court. It shall rule either ex officio or at the request of the interested subjects - prosecutor, party or injured party. In this respect, the opinion of some authors is that "the suspect as well may ask the prosecution bodies to split the cases"[15]. Moreover, in this case the court resolution encompassing the positive act (ordering the case splitting) is final, leaving out the possibility of exercising a control on the legality or on the merits of the application.

Instead, case splitting over some of some facts or some of the perpetrators (who have previously received the procedural quality of a suspect or defendant) may be ordered both at the trial stage as during the criminal prosecution. In this case the court rules the splitting of the case by court resolution while the criminal prosecution body manifests itself through ordinance. In the absence of special provisions, both the court resolution and the prosecutor's ordinance are subject to judicial review by ordinary means of appeal: the appeal or the complaint against the criminal prosecution.

When the court orders the case splitting during the trial, it is clear from the manner of regulating this incident that it is approached as an incidental matter, as a matter to be solved by contentious manner under the general conditions of article 351 paragraph (2), by means of a court resolution preliminary to the settlement of the case on the merits. The case splitting with regard to the facts and persons has not been explicitly regulated as to the cases in which it can operate but, despite the permissive regulation of the institution, we consider that the case splitting is not possible for the offenses and defendants for which/whom the compulsory case joining initially operated, if it were considered appropriate by the court. In this sense, in the doctrine there is also the contrary opinion according to which "from the way in which the case splitting is regulated results that criminal cases can be separated in all situations, irrespective of the case of article 43 that would have determined the joining"[16]. The prorogation of competence in case of case splitting operates under the conditions of article 44 para (2) CPC which provides that, once acquired, the competence will be retained by the court even though for the fact or the perpetrator that determined its original competence the case splitting was ordered.

Against the backdrop of the absence of an explicit interdiction, both the case joining and the case splitting, with the above-mentioned amendment, do not have an interlocutory character, and they can intervene several times during the criminal proceedings. Also, considering the subject matter and limits of the preliminary camera procedure, we consider that the act of case splitting is not allowed at this stage of the criminal proceedings.[17]

Last but not least, from the point of view of their procedural consequences, case splitting and case joining are the only ways in which, after the commencement of the trial, the procedural framework in which the judicial function and, implicitly, the object of judgment can be changed.

---

[13] See also M. Udroiu in the Criminal Procedure. General Part, 5th Edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018, p.60-61 "the criminal action constitutes the central element of the criminal proceedings, representing the main action."

[14] N. Volonciu, Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part Vol. I , 3rd Edition, Paideia Publishing House, Bucharest, p.311

[15] M. Udroiu in M. Udroiu (coordinator.), Criminal Procedure Code. Comment on articles, 2nd Edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.206

[16] I. Neagu, M. Damaschin Criminal Procedure Treaty. General, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p.371

[17] See, in this respect, M. Udroiu in M. Udroiu (coordinator), The Code of Criminal Procedure. Comment on articles , 2nd Edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.206

2. Critical analysis of an unprecedented procedural manifestation regarding the case splitting in the recent practice of the Romanian courts

In a relatively recent case-law solution[18], a Romanian court ordered the conviction of the defendant PGA, based on article 26 related to article 48 Criminal Code with reference to article 248[1] Criminal Code, with the application of article 41 par.(2) Criminal Code from 1968 and article 5 of the new Criminal Code, to 7 years imprisonment, for committing the crime of complicity to abuse of office, in a qualified form. Under the provisions of article 255 para (1) Criminal Code from1968 with reference to article 6 and 7 of Law no. 78/2000 with the application of article 5 of the new Criminal Code ordered the defendant PGA to be sentenced to 7 years imprisonment for having committed the crime of bribery.

Under the article 33 letter a) and article 34 letter b) Criminal Code from 1968, orders the defendant PGA to execute the seven-year prison sentence, which the court increases by 2 years, having finally, the defendant to execute 9 years imprisonment. Of the amount of the penalty imposed on the defendant, the 24-hour retention period from 24 March 2009 on 25 March 2009 was deducted. As regards the civil aspect of the case, the court ordered to leave as unresolved the civil side of the criminal trial and the case splitting of the cause on this issue .The court held as legal basis for these measures (irreconcilable in terms of the effects they imply) the provisions of article 25 para (5) in relation to article 397 para (5) CPC.

Analyzing the above judgment from the perspective of the objectives of the present study, the unlawfulness of the measures ordered by the court on the civil side of the case is manifested in several aspects. Firstly, there is a clear contradiction between the recitals of the judgment, which explain the nature of the measure ordered for the civil action and its procedural consequences (continuation of the civil action before the criminal court but separately from the criminal action) and the operative part of the judgement, in terms of the legal ground being held. Thus, both the provisions of article 25 para (5) CPC and of article 397 para (5) CPC regulates the legal cause of "leaving as unresolved the civil action" as a way of divestiture of the criminal court with respect to lawfully exercised civil action. The solution (even in the sui generis form of leaving as unresolved) rendered in respect of the civil action and obviously the legal basis on which it is grounded must be indicated in the operative part of the judgement, according to article 404 para (1) CPC. The court's ruling must be developed and motivated in fact in the recitals, according to article 403 para (1) letter c) CPC, the detailed exposition having to keep the legal and factual correspondence of the issues resolved in the operative part of the judgement.

However, there is a substantial contradiction between the recitals of the judgement and the operative part of the judgement, the underlying legal basis not having a correspondent in the reasoning of the provision on the civil side, a fact which proves the lack of effective judgment in the first instance. The effects of the final courts' ruling do not correspond to the legal ground retained in the operative part of the judgement because the essence of the "leaving the civil action unresolved" is to enable the possibility to having it exercised in front of the civil court, the criminal court losing its functional competence to solve by extension the private action, following the manner the main action was solved.

To that end, in the absence of a concordance between the legal basis enshrined in the operative part of the judgement and the nature of the final provision, the effects of which are similar to case splitting, the measure taken by the court in respect of the civil side remains unjustified in law and thus arbitrary. Secondly, the measure finally implemented by the court without indicating the legal basis is also unlawful in terms of the procedural form in which it was disposed. Thus, according to article 26 para (1) CPC, the court may order the case splitting for the civil action when its settlement determines the exceeding of the term for solving the criminal action and according to para (5) of article 26 CPC the court resolution ordering the civil action to be split is final.

If analyzing how the case splitting of the civil action is configured, it is undoubtedly that it has the nature of an incidental matter in the criminal proceedings. Without having the capacity to influence the way in which the case is dealt with on the merits, the case splitting acts as a matter or a preliminary matter which must be resolved before the action is resolved. From a procedural point of view, the solution of the incidental issue in case of case splitting is circumscribed to the requirements provided for in article 351 para (2) CPC corresponding to counter-claims guarantees. According to article 26 para (2) in relation with article 351 para (2) CPC, even when invoked ex officio, the case splitting must be discussed by the prosecutor and the parties, in all cases being released (by sentence delivery) by reasoned court resolution. The nature of the decision by which the court ruled on the case splitting of the civil action is customized by the provisions of article 26 para (5) CPC, its legal regime derogating from the provision of a general nature provided by article 408 para (2) CPC and which, as a rule, allows appeals to be made against all judgments delivered during the trial. By requiring the court to deliver a sentence on the case splitting, the law excludes the possibility that this measure may be ordered directly by the substantive judgment on the merits of the case.

[18] Bucharest Court of Appeal, Criminal Section I, criminal sentence no.115 / 23.06.2016 (unpublished), which is final on the civil aspect by the dismissal of the appeals being formulated as not grounded

Furthermore, considering the requirements under article 351 para (2) CPC, the issue of case splitting should have been first discussed in a contradictory manner in an appropriate procedural context, namely in the course of the judicial investigation, the premise of declaring that this stage was terminated in the conditions of article 387 para (1) and (2) CPP being precisely the absence of any request or issues. It is clear from the analysis of the documents in the file that the issue of case splitting has never been put into the contradictory discussion of the participants in the process, this aspect being not even debated in the debates, as it court resolutions rendered on 30.05.2016 and 02.06.2016. Therefore, not being invoked prior to the completion of the judicial inquiry, the incidental question of case splitting, even if it appeared as present directly during the debates, it would have been impossible to discuss it for the first time at the ending moment of the trial, the adequate remedy being the one provided by article 395 para (1) CPC and consisting in retaking the judgment. As the case splitting was not discussed beforehand and not even in the debates, the act of disposition could not be delivered directly by sentence except in severe violation of the legal provisions.

Such a way of proceeding deprived the defendants of the possibility of expressing positions with regard to the court's intention, amounting to a severe violation of the rights of defense and the right to a fair trial in its component of the contradictory nature of the proceedings, which also represents the injuries sustained. Although accepted at the legislative level [but only in the procedural form provided by article 26 related to article 351 para (2) CPC], the case splitting appears as a justifiable measure only when it corresponds to a functional purpose. In the context of the identity of the material cause and the possibility of overlapping in terms of consequences, in the jurisprudence of the High Court of Cassation and Justice the case splitting operation was viewed with caution if the determination of the guilt of the defendant, the individualization of the punishment and the legal framing relate to the extent of the damage caused by the offense such as, in particular, those that have produced particularly serious consequences.

In this respect, the High Court of Cassation and Justice held that in the unitary resolution of a criminal case the determination of the extent of the damage caused by the act committed by the defendant is an important criterion which is reflected in the criminal aspect of the case, his guilt, but also the plan of criminal responsibility, in the process of individualization of punishment, taking into account the gravity of the damaging consequences. The Court found that as long as the extent of the damage is not established in full, the civil side being split exactly in order to determine the damage caused, the criminal side cannot be resolved correctly either on the retention of guilt or on the individualization of the punishment, in relation with the injury caused.[19]

Relevant, in this respect, is another case-law solution[20] where the High Court of Cassation and Justice held that the court of appeals had wrongly split the civil case and sent the case to its settlement at the court of first instance, as long as it held the defendant's guilt for the offense of deception with particularly serious consequences, without knowing the existence and extent of the damage. Last but not least, the manner in which the Court of Appeal has ruled on the civil aspect of the case is criticized in terms of compliance with legal requirements and the procedure by which the court has agreed to continue the civil action, even though it has left it beforehand unresolved. Thus, assuming the irreconcilability of the two provisions that were mutually exclusive and anticipating the impediments which the pending litigation of the civil action would provoke with regard to the civil aspect of the process, the Court of Appeal opted for a hybrid procedure to overcome this incident.

Consequently, in the recitals of the judgment, and in breach of its obligation to justify in fact and in law only the acts of disposition embodied in the operative part of the judgement [article 403 para (1) letter c) and d) CPC], the court proceeded to requalification of the solution expressed in the operative part of the judgement in a sense that does not correspond either to the legal nature of the provision or to the legal basis retained by the deliberation. Challenging the procedural purpose of the pending litigation for the civil action, the court of first instance "explained" in its recitals (page 282, paragraph no. 12) that in fact this statement does not signify the divestiture of the court but only a split of the civil action from the criminal action.

By developing the "meaning" of the provisions given in the civil aspect of the case, the court (pages 283-284) stated that "if it leaves the civil action unresolved, it will not order the case to be resolved by the civil court, but will only separate the two actions to offer the parties the possibility to formulate all their defense in the civil action connected with the criminal proceedings." In fact, the court of first instance has radically reconfigured the nature and effects of the provision on the civil action, removing the legal basis retained in the operative part of the judgement and distorting its meaning. This apparently judicial operation does not have a legal correspondent and exceeds the limits within which the court is required to make the report.

By its final consequences, this operation cannot be described as a form of clarification of the operative part of the judgement as the procedure provided for by the provisions of article 277-279 CPC refers only to the material form (external envelope) of the procedural act and not to the legal mechanism it involves. Assessing the explanations given in the recitals regarding the sum of the provisions on the civil side, it is undisputed that their result consisted in distorting the initial purpose of the measure. Thus, a provision which has the effect of the divestiture of the criminal court and was duly substantiated by the provisions of article 25 para (5) and art. 397 para (5) CPC was transformed solely as a result of the reasoning in the recitals by the Court of Appeal to an extent that made it possible to reinstate the criminal court and continue the civil action in a separate file.

[19] ICCJ, Criminal Section, decision no.6281 / 25.11.2004
[20] ICCJ, Criminal Section, Decision no.5019 / 08.09.2005

Practically, the Court of Appeal has moved to the field of other power in the state, because, by replacing the legislator, it has reclassified the effects of the disposition aiming to leave the civil case unsolved, replacing its judicial component (divestiture of the court) with an administrative one (the formation of a new file having as object the settlement of the split civil action). Moreover, taking into account the sequence of the two procedural operations as set out in the minutes of the decision no. 115 / 23.06.2016, the illegality of the case splitting also derives from its delay. As the court first ordered to leave the case unresolved, any subsequent action on it was lacking procedural support because the functional competence that would have allowed it to manifest itself was lost.

The only legal effects with regard to the civil proceedings left unresolved operating ex-lege, under the terms of an express regulation - article 27 para (2), 397 para (5) CPC, concern exclusively the precautionary measures. It is only them that are maintained by the law even if the judicial context in which they have been disposed of has disappeared, pending the bringing of the action before the civil court, but not more than 30 days, otherwise ceasing lawfully. Therefore, as stated above, the case splitting had the capacity to produce its effects only if it operated autonomously and in advance, without being cumulated with the ruling of leaving the civil case unresolved. In the absence of an express legal remedy, while the court reserved judgement on the civil action due to discussing the civil claims, contradictorily, during the debates, the court should have been ordering the redocketing of the case to discuss case splitting, according to article 395 CPC.

Moreover, in order to observe the incidental nature of the case splitting, the redocket of the case had to be accomplished by resuming the judicial investigation, since only in this way the issue of the separation of the two actions could be solved according to the requirements of article 351 para (2) and 26 para (5) CPC – through final reasoned court resolution (in fact and in law).

From the perspective of the above mentioned aspects, we appreciate that the form in which the actual operation of case splitting was manifested does not respect the requirements and limitations foreseen at the normative level, and a closer analysis of the framework in which it is allowed being necessary.

Conclusions:

Apparently regulated permissively, case splitting knows certain implicit boundaries that make it more specific in terms of procedural manifestation.

There are substantial differences between the way in which this operation is performed during the criminal prosecution and in the trial, the Romanian procedural system also having jurisdictional procedures in which the case splitting disjunction is prohibited. In certain situations, the judgment of the court in the case of splitting, although seemingly in line with the normative pattern, may be regarded as an unlawful measure that could be remedied in the appeal by sui generis reason for closure with the remanding of the case for retrial. From this perspective, a legislative modification that explicitly provides for situations in which the operation case splitting is prohibited by law would be more than adequate.

References

- I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Treaty of Criminal Procedure, General Part, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2014;
- B. Micu, AG Paun, R. Slăvoiu , Criminal Procedure. Courses for admission in magistracy and the lawyer profession. Multiple Choice Tests, 3rd Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest 2015;
- Procedure G. Theodoru Treaty for Criminal Law, 3rd edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013;
- M. Udroiu, The Criminal Procedure Code.Commentaries over the articles, 2nd edition, CH Beck Publishing House, 2017;
- M. Udroiu , Criminal Procedure. General Part, 5th edition, CH Beck Publishing House, 2018;
- C. Voicu The New Code for Criminal Procedure, commented, group of authors, N. coordinator Volonciu, 3rd edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2017;
- N. Volonciu, Treaty of criminal procedures, General Part 1st volume, 3rd edition, Paideia Publishing House 1997

IMPLICATIONS OF CJEU JURISPRUDENCE ON THE DELIMITATION OF WORKING TIME BY REST TIME IN THE COLLABORATIVE ECONOMY

Răzvan ANGHEL[*]

Abstract

The specificity of the collaborative economy has raised a number of issues with regard to the qualification of legal relationships between workers, final beneficiaries and the online platform that mediates the provision of work, respectively whether between the platform and the worker there is an employment relationship or there is a commercial relationship between the platform, self-employees and consumers. In particular, the question arises whether, in the case of these workers, the working time regulations apply and, if so, how they can be applied in concrete manner. The article contains an analysis on how some principles derived from the CJEU case law can be used to determine whether and under what conditions workers in the collaborative economy can benefit from protection by limiting working time and how can work time be delimited by rest time in their case, given the specificity of their work condition, in order to ensure an effective protection.[]

Keywords: working time, rest time, collaborative economy, workers, employees, self-employees

1. Introduction

The development of information and communication technology has led to the emergence of new forms of work and working time arrangements, and has made it possible to increase the degree of labor flexibility, driven by economic, but also social and personal needs. The phenomenon is not very new, appearing in the early 1970s in first forms and developing along with the development of mobile communications and information technology, especially in the last 30 years, after the emergence and development of the INTERNET[1].

In present time work is also done in what is called the "collaborative economy" or "the gig economy" in which the worker is essentially directly linked to the client via a platform accessible on the INTERNET[2], which rises in the first place the question of whether such a worker has the status of worker or employee and, consequently, the question whether or not he/she enjoys the protection guaranteed to employees, which is still unclear in the European case-law.

It can be noticed a return to task-oriented work, to a result that must be achieved at a certain time, at least in certain areas of activity, the classic concept of working time remaining still largely applicable in the industrial field[3].

The use of information technology has allowed work to be unspatialised, and the physical space of its deployment has become less relevant in this context.[4]

The notion of collaborative economy includes business models in which activities are facilitated by online platforms that generate an open market for the temporary use of goods or services provided by individuals[5].

In the collaborative economy, work is organized in two main forms: crowdwork - the creation of micro-

[*] PhD student, Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (email: anghel.razvan@drept.unibuc.ro); judge, president of the First Civil Section, Constanţa Court of Appeal

[] This work is a result of the research conducted by the author during the doctoral program followed within the Doctoral School of Law of the Faculty of Law of the University of Bucharest.

[1] See for this evolution: Jon Messenger, Luty Gschwind – Three Generations of Telework, Conference paper – 17th ILERA World Congress, 7-11.09.2015, Cape Town, South Africa, available at https://www.ilera2015.com/dynamic/full/IL156.pdf (accesed 13.03.2019);

[2] See for details, for example: A. Donini, Il lavoro digitale su piattaforma, Labour & Law issues, no. 1/2015, p. 50-71; E. Dagnino, Il lavoro nella on-demand economy: esigenze di tutela e prospettive regulatorie, Labour & Law issues, nr. 2/2015, p. 87-106; A. Aloisi, Il lavoro „a chiamata" e le piattafrme online della collaborative economy: nozioni e tipi in cerca di tutele, Labour & Law issues, nr. 2/2016, p. 18-56; G. Friedman, Workers without employers: shadow corporations and the rise of the gig economy, Review of Keynesian Economics 2.2/2014, p. 171-188; A. Aloisi, Commoditized workers: Case study research on labor law issues arising from a set of on-demand/gig economy platforms, Comp. Lab. L. & Pol'y J. 37/2015, p. 653; J. Hamari, M. Sjöklint, A. Ukkonen, The sharing economy: Why people participate in collaborative consumption, Journal of the Association for Information Science and Technology 67.9/2016, p. 2047-2059; J. Schor, Debating the Sharing Economy, Journal of Self-Governance & Management Economics 4.3/2016; B. Cohen, J. Kietzmann, Ride on! Mobility business models for the sharing economy, Organization & Environment 27.3/2014, p. 279-296; H. Heinrichs, Sharing economy: a potential new pathway to sustainability, GAIA-Ecological Perspectives for Science and Society 22.4/2013, p. 228-231.

[3] It has been shown that the limit between working time and rest time becomes more unclear as a result of the increasing variability of the work program on the one hand and the increasing task orientated work which results in a bigger pressure to work the hours required to perform the task – J. Rubery, Working time in the UK, Transfer: European Review of Labour and Research 4.4/1998, p. 672.

[4] Răzvan Anghel – Noua reglementare privind telemunca. Probleme specific privind delimitarea timpului de lucru de timpul de odihnă în cazul telesalariaţilor, Curierul Judiciar, nr. 4/2018, p.211.

[5] Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions - A European agenda for the collaborative economy, Brussels, 2.6.2016 COM (2016) 356 final, available at: https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2016/EN/1-2016-356-EN-F1-1.PDF, p.3, accessed on 13.03.2019; tasks for which a global offer is launched through an on-line platform and can be done anywhere; on-demand services - performing services in a certain area, hired through an on-line application[6].

There is a difference in the organization of working time between the two forms of work arrangements. In the case of crowdwork, the worker has greater autonomy and can work at any time in principle, while in the case of on-demand work, the on-line platforms exercise greater control over the services provided by setting quality standards and limiting providers' freedom to choose tasks and customers[7].

The delimitation of working time from rest time and the limitation of the first when working in the collaborative economy presents numerous difficulties, the boundary between working time and rest time being very difficult to determine, porous[8], in this case, the rest time being affected by interspersed periods of activity[9], and the carrying out of the activity may involve the alternation of intensive work periods with inactive periods[10].

It has been shown that "the normal working time pattern, which characterized Ford's standardized, industrial, mass production, loses its force," and "for much of the labor force over the last two decades, working time has become not just shorter but also more flexible and heterogeneous", being noticed that "the variable forms of working time take the place of uniform ones"[11].

Thus, in the labour relations that were born in the mass industrialization process, there was a difference between the "paid time" for which the employee received financial compensation - the salary - and the "free time" at his disposal[12]. If in the conception of the industrialization era on the organization of labour, working time was a spatial time in which the collective of workers was placed in a community of place, time and action[13], the new possibilities of modelling the organization of the working time and the labour offered by the information technology, have raised new problems regarding the delimitation of working time by rest time[14].

Also, the subordination of the worker to the employer, which is characteristic of the traditional model of the employment relationship, has been gradually replaced in many areas by the assignment of tasks and objectives and the granting of greater autonomy to the employees, by applying flexible procedures for their coordination[15], which resulted in the transfer of working time control from the employer to the employee and the increasing difficulty of delimiting working time from rest time.

In the collaborative economy, the worker's autonomy is considered to be defining although there is no solid empirical evidence in this respect[16]. On the contrary, it is highlighted a blurred boundary between working time and privacy time[17] and lack of control over working time[18].

The degree of autonomy of the worker, expressed in the possibility to choose the task to be performed, the time used for this purpose and the way of organizing and performing the work, differs significantly depending on the control exercised by the platform administrator and the type of activity[19].

At the same time, the space boundaries are blurred in the sense that space for work is increasingly entering the space for private life; at the same time, it is remarked that work is space-independent[20].

At the present, understanding and defining working relationships in the collaborative economy are deficient, although the key issue in their analysis and in the analysis of working time organization is their classification[21], as it is essential to determine whether they are employment relationships or business relationships.

The work done within the framework of the collaborative economy generates problems regarding the protection of the persons carrying out such activities, including the problem of limiting the working time for the purpose of protection of health and

---

[6] Jon Messenger – Working time and the future of work, International Labour Organization, ILO Future of Work Research Paper Series, 2018, p.22; see for the evolution and the definition of crowdwork: Janine Berg, Marianne Furrer, Ellie Harmon, Uma Rani, M Six Silberman – Digital labour platforms and the future of work – Toward decent work in the online world, International Labour Organization, 2018, p.3

[7] Jon Messenger – Working time and the future of work, cited, p.23;

[8] A. Supiot, Temps de travail: pour une concordance des temps, Droit social, 1995, p. 949-950.

[9] J.-Y. Boulin, Working time in the new social and economic context, Transfer: European Review of Labour and Research 7.2/2001, p. 204.

[10] J.-Y. Boulin, G. Cette, D. Taddéi, Le temps de travail: une mutation majeure, Futuribles 5/1992, p. 8.

[11] H. Seifert, Flexibility through working time accounts: reconciling economic efficiency and individual time requirements, WSI - Diskussionspapiere, no. 130/2004, p. 1.

[12] J. Rubery, K. Ward, D. Grimshaw, H. Beynon, Working time, industrial relations and the employment relationship, Time & Society 14(1)/2005, p. 91.

[13] P. Bouffartigue, J. Bouteiller, A propos des normes du temps de travail, Revue de l'IRES no. 42/2003, 2., p. 8.

[14] Răzvan Anghel – Noua reglementare privind telemunca..., cited, p.213.

[15] C.A.Moarcăş, Impactul globalizării asupra reglementărilor din domeniul muncii. Posibile schimbări în sistemul relaţiilor industriale, Revista de Drept Public, nr.1/2005,,p. 28- 29.

[16] Jon Messenger – Working time and the future of work, cited, p.23-24;

[17] Jon Messenger – Working time and the future of work, cited, p.21, 24, 25;

[18] EUROFOUND – Work on demand: Recurrence, effects and challenges, Publications Office of the European Union, Luxembourg, 2018, p.4;

[19] for a classification of activities provided through on-line platforms and the way they are provided see EUROFOUND, Employment and working conditions of selected types of platform work, Publications Offices of the European Union, Luxemburg, 2018, p.5, 21;

[20] Jon Messenger – Working time and the future of work, cited, pag.19;

[21] Jon Messenger – Working time and the future of work, cited, p.22; EUROFOUND – Work on demand..., cited, p.3; safety at work, but also for ensuring a balance between professional life and personal life.

But in order to solve this problem, it must first be determined whether the legal rules that require working time limitation are applicable. In the next stage, in order to ensure the protection offered by these normative acts, the working time must be firstly delimited by the rest time, as it can only be limited something defined and determined; as a result, it has to be checked whether this delimitation process is possible in practice and by what methods.

The legal framework applicable in the European Union on the organization of working time is Directive 2003/88 and the sectoral directives, as well as the internal rules for transposing them. The jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of the European Union may provide benchmarks to determine whether and how these legal acts can be enforced, even if the Court has not yet expressly addressed those issues.

2. Applicability of rules on the organization of working time

2.1. General aspects

The Working Time Directives are, as a rule, applicable to workers, an autonomous concept of EU law, with the exception of Directive 2002/15 on road transport, which also applies to self-employed workers.

By reference to Article 2 (1) of Directive 89/391 / EEC, to which Article 1 (3) of Directive 2003/88 / EC refers, the latter applies to all areas of activity[22]. It is true that Article 2 (2) of Directive 89/391 / EEC excludes from its scope activities which have inherent characteristics which are inevitably inconsistent with the provisions of the Directive but only if they form part of the public administration so those activities in the collaborative economy that are activities in the private domain, cannot be excluded[23].

In the judicial practice, more and more have raised the issue of the nature of the legal relationships established in the collaborative economy between those who provide the work and the operators of the on-line platforms that put the first ones in contact with the clients. The problem is generated by the fact that, viewed globally, it seems that a feature of the collaborative economy is that service providers are often individuals who occasionally offer goods or services from individual to individual, but, in the mean time collaborative platforms are increasingly used by micro-enterprises and small entrepreneurs[24].

Thus, on-line platform operators claim that it is a commercial relation, and those that do the work are self-employed, professionals that are leading their own business, while some of them who have filed a complaint with the courts claim that they are employees engaged in a labour relations.

This issue must be addressed with priority, since working time rules apply only if the person who performs the work has the status of a worker, otherwise, if it is a commercial relationship, these rules are not applicable as only workers enjoy protection by limiting working time and also benefit of guaranteed rest periods, considering the relationship of subordination with the employer, as opposed to an independent professional who is in a tie with the contractual partner.

If the person who performs the work in the collaborative economy is considered to be an independent service provider, the provisions of Directive 2006/123, which generally define service providers, or special directives such as Directive 86/653 / EEC on self - employed commercial agents, are applicable and those regulations do not provide for protection measures with regard to the organization of working time, assuming that the self - employed is free to organise the work to do. Only Directive 2002/15 also applies to self-employed workers.

It is important, however, that the attribution of the status of a worker does not depend on the classification of the legal relationships in which he/she is part according to the national law, being an autonomous notion of Union law[25].

However, it is essential if there is a subordinate relationship between the on-line platform operator and the worker. The first element of this subordinate report implies that the platform operator has control over the organization of the activity.

So, in order to determine the nature of these legal relationships, two aspects need to be considered:

- if the services offered to the beneficiaries are an activity of the operator of the on-line platform or belong to the natural person providing the work and the platform acts only as an intermediary between the service provider and the beneficiary offering only the frame for the demand to meet the offer; if the on-line platform merely provides intermediation services

[22] see, among many others, CJEU, Judgment of 14.10.2010, 2nd Chamber, case C-428/09, Union syndicale Solidaires Isère c. Premier ministre, Ministère du Travail, des Relations sociales, de la Famille, de la Solidarité et de la Ville, Ministère de la Santé et des Sports, ECLI:EU:C:2010:612, par.21, 22; Judgment of 5.10.2004, Pfeiffer e.a., C-397/01-C-403/01, Rec., p. I-8835, par.52, www.curia.eu;

[23] as fear was expressed: Alan Bogg, Foster parents and fundamental labour rights, www.uklabourlawblog.com, 25.07.2018, par.16;

[24] Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions - A European agenda for the collaborative economy, cited, p.5;

[25] CJEU (Grand Chamber), judgement of 20.11.2018, in case C-147/17, Sindicatul Familia, par.41; Judgment of 14.10.2010, Isère, C-428/09, cited,, par. 28; CJEU, (5th Chamber), Judgment of 21.02.2018, case C-518/15, Matzak, par.28 and 29, www.curia.eu; Judgment of 20.09.2007, Kiiski, C-116/06, EU:C:2007:536, par. 26 and the case-law cited there; Judgment of 1.12.2005, case C-14/04, Abdelkader Dellas, Confédération générale du travail, Fédération nationale des syndicats des services de santé et des services sociaux CFDT, Fédération nationale de l'action sociale Force ouvrière c. Premier ministre, Ministre des Affaires sociales, du Travail et de la Solidarité, ECLI:EU:C:2005:728, par. 44, and also the case-law cited there; between professionals and customers, the work done does not belong to it, but belongs to the professional so that it is excluded that the operator of the platform is considered an employer and, as a consequence, the person who provides the work to be considered a worker;

- If the activity is considered to be organized and to belong to the operator of the on-line platform, it should be analysed whether the natural persons performing the work are commercial partners, subcontractors of the operator of the platform, or have the status of employees of the platform, i.e. workers.

It is acknowledged, however, that in the context of the collaborative economy there are increasingly blurred boundaries between the category of workers employed under an individual labour contract and that of self-employed workers[26].

2.2. Criteria regarding the responsibility of organizing the activity

The CJEU has been called to address this issue in an administrative case concerning the authorization of certain activities, being asked to determine whether an online platform through which public transport services are provided has the status of a public transportation service provider, with the consequence of being subject to specific authorization requests, or has the status of information service.

Although the issue of work relations between the on-line operator and service providers has not been addressed in this case, the decision sets out several principles that may be useful in determining whether an on-line platform can be considered as responsible for organizing the activity, or a simple intermediary between and customers and the service providers.

Thus, in Case C-434/15[27], the Court held that "a brokerage service which, by means of an application for smart phones, has the purpose of linking, for the purpose of obtaining remuneration, unreachable drivers using their own vehicle with persons wishing to travel urbanely, must be regarded as being indissociably linked to a transport service and as falling within the scope of the qualification as a "transport service within the meaning of Article 58 (1) TFEU".

In this case, the difference between information society services and classical services has been made.

The Court has identified the following elements defining the service provided as a transport service (par.37-39):

- the service is not limited to a brokerage service consisting of connecting, through a smartphone application, a non-professional driver using his own vehicle and a person wishing to make an urban journey;
- the provider of this brokerage service creates at the same time an offer of urban transport services which it makes accessible especially by means of computer tools such as the used application;
- the provider of this brokerage service organizes the general operation of the application in favour of persons wishing to make use of this offer;
- the intermediation service is based on the selection of non-professional drivers using their own motor vehicle to which this company supplies an application, in absence of which, on the one hand, those drivers are not in a position to provide transport services and, on the other hand, the person who wants to make an urban journey would not access the services of those drivers;
- the supplier of the service exercises a decisive influence over the conditions of service provided by those drivers, such as: the fact that it determines, by means of the application used, at least the maximum price per race; that the company collects that price from the customer and retain a part of it before paying the rest to the driver and that it exercises a certain control over the quality of the motor vehicles and their drivers, as well as the behaviour of the latter, which may lead, if necessary, to their exclusion.

Therefore, in order to determine whether it is an information society service within the meaning of Article 1 (1) (b) of Directive 2015/1535[28] or a service providing direct benefits to consumers, it must first be ascertained whether this is only a brokerage service. Such a service offers to the users, both consumers and physical service providers, a virtual meeting place in which demand and supply meet freely, and workers choose freely to carry out an activity and agree with the beneficiary on the remuneration requested, collecting the price directly or with minimal involvement of the platform that offers only an electronic payment system and retains a commission just for the money transfer service.

On the contrary, if through the on-line platform its operator exercises a certain level of control, manifested in providing the service on its own behalf, controlling the level of charges, collecting and distributing the remuneration to the providers of work, controlling the professional qualities of those, their behaviour, it should be considered as a classical service provider, who retains responsibility for organizing the activities.

2.3. Criteria defining the status as worker of individuals who work through on-line platforms

CJEU has had the opportunity to rule on a number of cases, including some concerning the interpretation of the provisions of Directive 2003/88, on the notion of worker in European Union law by laying down rules to determine whether a person performing the work has this status or not .

---

[26] Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions - A European agenda for the collaborative economy, cited, p.12

[27] CJEU (Grand Chamber), Judgement of 20 December 2017, EU:C:2017:981, Asociación Profesional Elite Taxi vs. Uber Systems Spain SL, www.curia.eu;

[28] former art. 1, par. 2 of Directive 98/34, referred by art. 2 (a) of Directive 2000/31;

At the same time, the Court has also ruled on provisions defining concepts which exclude the status of worker, such as the notion of a service provider within the meaning of Directive 2006/123 or a commercial agent within the meaning of Directive 86/653 / EEC.

Thus, for a person who performs an activity involving the conclusion of contracts with service and product recipients, in order to be a commercial agent within the meaning of Article 1 (2) of Directive 86/653, the activity performed must be independent.

The Court has held[29] in this regard that, in order to retain that status, this essential requirement must be fulfilled (paragraph 23); it further pointed out that the circumstance that the worker performs the activity on the principal's premises, alone, does not exclude the independent character of the work (par. 28, 32); however, if the worker's independence is impaired, he/she loses the status of a commercial agent, that happening by subordinating to the instructions of the principal and by the ways of carrying out the tasks performed (par.32), under the latter aspect, being possible to be relevant that the work is carried out from the headquarters of the principal. Thus, being in the immediate proximity of that principal, by virtue of his presence at his seat, that agent may be subject to the instructions of that principal and, at the same time, by having material advantages connected with that presence, such as the provision of a workspace or the access to the organizational facilities of that head office, it cannot be ruled out that the agent in question is in fact in a situation which prevents him from carrying out his activity independently from the point of view of organizing this activity or the associated economic risks (par.33).

Consequently, if those elements are fulfilled and the individual does not enjoy total independence, he/she can only have the status of worker, so that judgment is relevant in this respect.

The CJEU had the opportunity to analyse the notion of worker even in cases concerning the organization of working time.

The Court held that Directive 2003/88 did not refer either to Article 3 (a) of Directive 89/391 (which defines the concept of 'worker') or to the definition of a worker as is apparent from the legislation and /or national practices[30] and, for the purposes of its application, that notion cannot be interpreted differently according to the national legal systems but has a specific autonomous meaning to Union law[31] and must not be interpreted restrictively[32].

In the Court's view, the concept of a worker must be defined according to objective criteria characterizing the employment relationship, taking into account the rights and obligations of the persons involved[33] and the sui generis legal nature of a labor relationship from the perspective of national law cannot have any effect on the status of worker within the meaning of Union law[34]. For example, the Court has held that the fact that a person who performs work is not subject to the Labour Code in his country of employment cannot be decisive for assessing the existence of an employment relationship between the parties, that generating a legal situation sui generis[35].

The CJEU also stated that it is for the national court to determine whether the applicant falls within the concept of a worker, in which case it must conclude based on objective criteria and assess in its entirety all the circumstances of the case before it, which are connected with the nature of both the activities in question and the relationship between the parties concerned[36]. In that analysis, the national court must in particular verify whether the work actually provided by the person concerned can be regarded as normally belonging to the labor market, taking into account not only the status and practices of the beneficiary of the work concerned but also the purpose of the activity and the nature and the arrangements for the performance of work[37].

The Court has held in many cases that an essential characteristic of the employment relationship is the fact that a person performs the work in return of remuneration for a certain period of time in favour of

---

[29] CJEU, (4th Chamber), judgement of 21.11.2018, C-452/17, EU:C:2018:935, in case Zako SPRL;

[30] CJEU (2nd Chamber) Judgment of 14.10.2010, case C-428/09, Isère, cited, par.27; CJEU, 1st Chamber, Judgement of 26.03.2015, case C 316/13, Gérard Fenoll c. Centre d'aide par le travail „La Jouvene", Association de parents et d'amis de personnes handicapées mentales (APEI) d'Avignon, ECLI:EU:C:2015:200, par.24, www.curia.eu.

[31] CJEU, Judgment of 14.10.2010, 2nd Chamber, case C 428/09, cited, par.28; CJEU, 1stChamber, Judgement of 26.03.03. 2015, case C 316/13, cited, par.25; CJEU, (5th Chamber), Judgment of 21.02.2018, in case C‑518/15, Matzak, par.28, www.curia.eu;

[32] CJEU, 5th Chamber, Ordinance of 7.04.2011, case C-519/09, Dieter May c. AOK Rheinland/Hamburg – Die Gesundheitskasse, ECLI:EU:C:2011:221, par.21, www.curia.eu.

[33] CJEU, Judgment of 14.10.2010, 2nd Chamber, case C 428/09, cited, par.28; CJEU, 1st Chamber, Judgement 26.03.2015, case C- 316/13, cited, par.27;

[34] CJEU, Judgment of 14.10.2010, 2nd Chamber, case C 428/09, cited, par.30; see Judgment of 20.09.2007, Kiiski, C-116/06, Rep., p. I 7643, par. 26 and the case-law cited; CJEU, 1st Chamber, Judgement of 26.03.2015, case C-316/13, cited, par.31; Judgement Trojani, C-456/02, EU:C:2004:488, par. 16; CJEU, (5th Chamber), Judgment of 21.02.2018, in case C‑518/15, Matzak,, par.29, www.curia.eu; another person and under that person direction[38]. As a result, it has been shown that a 'worker' must be considered to be any person who carries out real and effective activities in order to obtain remuneration[39], except for activities which are so small that they appear to be purely marginal and accessories[40]. In this regard, it was appreciated that in the context of collaborative economy, when a person provides purely marginal or ancillary services using on-line platforms, this would indicate that that person does not have the status of worker while the provision of stable work leads to the qualification of that person either as a worker or as self employed according to the analysis of other facts[41].

[35] CJEU, 1st Chamber, Judgement of 26.03.2015, case C -316/13, cited, par.30;

[36] CJEU, Judgment of 14.10.2010, 2nd Chamber, case C 428/09, cited, par.29; CJEU, 1st Chamber, Judgement of 26.03.2015, case C 316/13, cited, par.29; Judgement Trojani, C 456/02, EU:C:2004:488, par. 17;

[37] CJEU, 1st Chamber, Judgement of 26 .03. 2015, case C 316/13, cited, par.42; see mutatis mutandis, Judgement Trojani, C-456/02, EU:C:2004:488, par. 24 (in this case, the question arises whether the applicant can claim a right of residence as an employed or self-employed person or a provider of services in the situation where work is done under a social-professional re-integration program run by a non-profit organization).

In the Court's view, neither the higher or lower productivity of the person concerned, nor the origin of the resources for remuneration, or the limited level of remuneration, can have consequences on the status of worker within the meaning of Union law[42]. Also, in the Court's view, the existence of an employment relationship is not excluded either by the overall reduced duration of the activity[43] or the reduced duration of the daily activity[44]. Also, the CJEU has held that this status is not excluded by the fact that the worker enjoys a considerable margin of appreciation in the day-to-day exercise of his duties or that the mission attributed is a "trust mission"[45].

In the recent case of Matzak, the CJEU also held[46] that "any person who carries out real and effective work is to be regarded as a" worker ", except for activities that are so small that they appear to be purely marginal and accessories" and "the characteristic element defining a report of work consists in the fact that a person performs work in return for which he receives a remuneration, for a certain period of time, for another person and under his direction[47].

In an earlier judgment, the Court has already held that must be regarded as a worker within the meaning of European Union law also a person who has concluded a contract on the basis of which she/he provides occasional work, on request and for irregular periods of time, being paid only for the work actually done, and without any obligation for the employer to actually request the work[48].

However, the Court held that, in order to determine whether the activity was real and not a purely marginal activity, the national court may have regard to the irregular nature and limited duration of the work actually performed, which may indicate that it is a marginal activity; it is very important, however, that the CJEU has held in this context that another important element in the analysis of national courts is whether the person concerned must remain at the disposal of the employer to perform the work if so requested[49].

In a recent ruling[50], the CJEU reiterated its previous jurisprudence on the elements defining the notion of worker. Accordingly, it follows from the case-law of the CJEU:

- the essential characteristic of the employment relationship is the fact that a person performs work in return for which she/he receives a remuneration in a given period for another person and under his direction[51];
- an employment relationship requires a relationship of subordination between the worker and his employer, but the existence of such a link must be assessed on a case-by-case basis in the light of all the elements and circumstances of the relationship between the parties[52];
- the natural persons, in relation to the company with which they have contractual relations, are in a subordination relation materialized by the continuous supervision and evaluation of their activities by the respective company in relation to the requirements and the criteria specified in the contract, in order to carry [38] CJEU, Judgment of 14 .10. 2010, 2nd Chamber, case C-428/09, cited, par.28; see mutatis mutandis, for article 39 CE, Judgment of 3.07.1986, Lawrie Blum, 66/85, Rec., p. 2121, par. 16 and 17, and also Judgment of 23 .03. 2004, Collins, C-138/02, Rec., p. I 2703, par. 26; CJEU, 5th Chamber, Ordinance of 7.04.2011, case C 519/09, cited, par.21; see especially the Judgment of 3 .07. 1986, Lawrie Blum, 66/85, Rec., p. 2121, par. 16 and 17, Judgment of 23 .03. 2004, Collins, C- 138/02, Rec., p. I 2703, par. 26, and Judgment of 7.09.2004, Trojani, C-456/02, Rec., p. I 7573, par. 15; CJEU, 1st Chamber, Judgement of 26.03.2015, case C 316/13, cited, par.27; Judgment of 20.09.2007, Kiiski, C 116/06, par.25; CJEU, (5th Chamber), Judgment of 21.02.2018, in case C‑518/15, Matzak, par.28, www.curia.eu;

[39] Judgement Trojani, C-456/02, EU:C:2004:488, par. 17;

[40] CJEU, 5th Chamber, Ordinance of 7.04.2011, case C 519/09, cited, par.21; CJEU, 1st Chamber, Judgement 26 .03. 2015, case C 316/13, cited, par.27; CJEU, (5th Chamber), Judgment of 21 .02. 2018, in case C‑518/15, Matzak, par.28, www.curia.eu;

[41] Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions - A European agenda for the collaborative economy, cited, p.14;

[42] CJEU, 1st Chamber, Judgement 26.03.2015, case C 316/13, cited, par.34; see Judgement Bettray, 344/87, EU:C:1989:226, par. 15 and 16, Judgement Kurz, C-188/00, EU:C:2002:694, par. 32, and also Judgement Trojani, C 456/02, EU:C:2004:488, par. 16.

[43] CJEU (Sixth Chamber), judgment of 6 November 2003, in Case C-413/01, Franca Ninni-Orascheand Bundesminister für Wissenschaft, Verkehr und Kunst, par.25

[44] CJEU, Judgment of 3 June 1986, in case C-139/85, R. H. Kempf v Staatssecretaris van Justitie, par.13;

[45] see for this opinion CJEU, Judgment of 10.09.2014, Haralambidis, C-270/13, EU:C:2014:2185, par. 39-41, and Judgment of 9.07.2015, Balkaya, C-229/14, EU:C:2015:455, par. 41

[46] CJEU, (5th Chamber), Judgment of 21.02.2018, in case C‑518/15, Matzak, www.curia.eu;

[47] For the same opinion see Judgment of 26 .03. 2015, Fenoll, C-316/13, EU:C:2015:200, par. 27 and the case law cited.

[48] CJEU, Judgment of 26 February 1992, in case C-357/89, V. J. M. Raulin v Minister van Onderwijsen Wetenschappen, par.9;

[49] CJEU, Judgment of 26 February 1992, in case C-357/89, V. J. M. Raulin v Minister van Onderwijsen Wetenschappen, par.14;

[50] CJEU (Grand Chamber), judgement of 20.11.2018, in case C-147/17, Sindicatul Familia;

[51] CJEU, (Grand Chamber), judgement of 20.11.2018, in case C-147/17, Sindicatul Familia, cited, par.41; Judgment of 14.10.2010, Isère, C-428/09, cited, par. 28 and the case-law cited; out the activity[53].

[52] Judgment of 10.09.2015, Holterman Ferho Exploitatie and others, C-47/14, EU:C:2015:574, par. 46.

It should also be noted that the CJEU has analysed the issue of organizing working time, including in the case of an independent self-employed worker who was working on demand[54]. The applicant in the main proceedings did not work under an individual employment contract but had the status of self-employed, performing work according to a contract on the basis of which he was remunerated only by a commission for the work carried out, very similar to the situation of the persons supplying work based on orders received through an electronic platform. For this reason, the employer did not consider that it should grant him leave of absence and a leave allowance as to an employee on the basis of an employment contract. However, in its decision the Employment Tribunal considered that the applicant was to be classified as a 'worker' within the meaning of Directive 2003/88. It is true that in its judgment the CJEU did not consider whether or not the plaintiff in the main proceedings had the status of a worker within the meaning of Directive 2003/88, which is an autonomous concept of EU law. It can be argued that the CJEU has started from the presumption of the relevance of the reference for a preliminary ruling to the national court[55], on the basis of the British court's conclusion that the applicant was a worker. However, it is noteworthy that the CJEU was in no way obliged to accept this conclusion and could have started the analysis of the referral with the verification of the applicability of Directive 2003/88 and of whether the situation of the applicant falls within its scope; the fact remains that the CJEU had no objection to the classification of the applicant as a worker within the meaning of Directive 2003/88 by the referring court[56].

This judgment may be of great relevance in the future as a precedent in the classification of legal relationships between workers through an electronic order distribution platform and the owner of such a platform.

From the perspective of national law, there is the question of the qualification of the legal relations established between the parties, namely whether they are employment relationships or trade relations between professionals.

On this regard, there are already different solutions given by the EU courts on the basis of a case-by-case analysis. For example, given that workers using an electronic platform are registered as self-employed, in some cases they were qualified as employees[57] while in other cases they were considered not to have this status[58]. Recently, the bond of subordination, defining for the labour relation, was found in a situation where the on line application was equipped with a system of geolocation allowing the real-time monitoring by the company of the position of the courier and the accounting of the total number of kilometres travelled and, secondly, the company had power of sanction with respect to the courier[59].

The Romanian High Court of Cassation and Justice – the Panel for preliminary clarification on legal aspects, by Decision no. 37 of November 7, 2016, found that in the event of a failure by the parties to conclude a written employment contract, the natural person who has worked for and under the authority of the other party has the possibility to ask the court to acknowledge the existence of the employment relationship and its effects even if the employment relationship ceased prior to the filing of the petition to the court.

In order to analyse the nature of legal relationships in the frame of which work is done, there may be relevant the provisions of art. 7 of Law no. 227/2015 on the Fiscal Code, defining independent and dependent activities as follows:

- dependent activity - any activity carried out by a natural person in an income-generating employment relationship;
- dependent activity on the main job - any activity performed on the basis of an individual employment contract or a special legal status, declared to the employer as a main job by the employee; if the activity is carried out for several employers, the employee is obliged to declare only to the chosen employer that the place in question is the place where he performs the function he/she considers to be the main job;
- self-employment - any activity carried out by a natural person for the purpose of obtaining income, which meets at least 4 of the following criteria:
- the individual has the freedom to choose the place and way of working, as well as the work schedule;
- the individual has the freedom to work for more than one client;
- the risks inherent in the activity are assumed by the natural person carrying out the activity;
- the activity is done by using the patrimony of the natural person who performs it;
- the activity is performed by the individual by using the intellectual capacity and / or the physical performance of the person, depending on the specificity of the activity;
- the natural person is part of a professional body / order with the role of representing, regulating and

[53] CJEU (Grand Chamber), judgement of 20.11.2018, in case C-147/17, Sindicatul Familia, cited par.45;

[54] CJEU (5th Chamber), Judgment of 29.11.2017 în case C-214/16, Conley King vs. The Sash Window Workshop Ltd, Richard Dollar,

[55] See for example CJEU- Judgment of 6.09.2016, in case C-182/15, EU:C:2016:630, par. 20 and the case-law cited there;

[56] Răzvan Anghel - Working time and rest time in recent CJEU case law (July 2017 - February 2018), Revista EuRoQuod nr.2/2018, pp.77-78;

[57] United Kingdom Employment Appeal Tribunal London, [2018] IRLR 97, [2017] UKEAT 0056_17_1011, [2018] ICR 453, [2017] WLR(D) 809, par.124, available: www.bailii.org, accessed 18.04.2018;

[58] among others, Conseil de Prud'hommes de Paris, n° RG: F 16/11460, sentence of 29.01.2018;

[59] Cour de cassation, chambre sociale, audience publique du mercredi 28 novembre 2018, N° de pourvoi: 17-20079, www.legifrance.gouv.fr;

supervising the profession, according to the special normative acts regulating the organization and the exercise of the respective profession;

- the natural person has the freedom to carry out the activity directly, with employed person or through collaboration with third parties under the law.

Thus, when the activity does not meet the criteria to be qualified as independent, the income obtained is qualified by the Fiscal Code as salary income and assimilated to salaries precisely to eliminate the possibility of dissimulation of employment relationships in self-employment.

Per a contrario, if there are not met at least four of the criteria set out in Art. 7 of Fiscal Code, the activity cannot be considered as independent, so that it can be considered that in fact the activity was performed in an employment relationship even without the conclusion of an individual contract of employment in written form.

Therefore, it could be considered as elements which, once proven, would lead to the conclusion that a work relationship exists, among others, the following:

- the individual does not have the freedom to choose the place and the way of doing the work, as well as the work schedule, as established by the beneficiary's indications;
- the risks inherent in the activity are assumed by the person benefiting from the activity;
- the activity is done by using the beneficiary's goods;
- the natural person does not have the freedom to carry out the activity directly, with employed personnel or through collaboration with third parties under the law[60].

3. The practical difficulties of delimiting working time from rest time in the collaborative economy

With regard to the delimitation of working time from rest time for individuals who work in other areas than those belonging to the employer, the CJEU offered a solution, pointing out that "it is up to the employer to use the necessary control tools to avoid possible abuses" of employees who work outside their premises[61], such as the use of credit cards dedicated exclusively to the payment of fuel needed for the professional use of vehicles made available by the employer[62].

In the French case-law, for example, it has been held in several cases that a worker's geolocation system, which has a certain freedom in the organization of work, can be used by the employer to determine the working time but only if there is no other means of that control to be carried out and only if the employee and the competent administrative authority are informed, since the rights and freedoms of the employee can only be affected if the measure is justified by the aim pursued and proportionate to it[63], so that another solution was even in the sense that such a measure it is not justified in the particular case of such an employee[64].

In the situation where the working time can no longer be delimited by reference to the time a worker is at the workplace determined by the employer, the work being done anywhere and at any time, it becomes relevant the actual performance of the work so that the durations of the work itself must be clearly determined. For this purpose, electronic means of monitoring the employee activity can be used, ranging from cameras and systems to monitor access to a work area or to monitor the energy consumption of some equipment and continuing with the means of modern information technology such as internet traffic monitoring, computer keyboard monitoring, replication of desktop activity, verification of information that reflects software activity, electronic communications control, social networking activities, geolocation systems, dedicated software monitoring the activity of mobile devices, and so on[65]. Employers may wish to use these technical means to control the employee's behaviour and thus to be able to delimit working time from rest time[66] in order to determine remuneration and to verify employee compliance with service obligations.

Using these means of remote monitoring and control of employees' work poses, however, serious and numerous issues concerning the protection of employees' personal data, the protection of their privacy and dignity, especially in the context where the traditional and clear limit between working time and personal time is becoming more blurred with the development of flexible forms of work organization[67].

It is important that CJEU has already established that a record of working time which implies the indication of the hours at which each worker begins and [60] Răzvan Anghel, Procedura soluționării conflictelor individuale de muncă – Ghid pentru practicieni, Ediția a II-a, revizuită și adăugită, Editura C.H. Beck București 2018, pp.308-309.

---

[61] CJEU, 3rd Chamber, Case C-266/14, Judgment of 10.09.2015, Federación de Servicios Privados del sindicato Comisiones obreras (CC.OO.) c. Tyco Integrated Security SL, Tyco Integrated Fire & Security Corporation Servicios SA, ECLI:EU:C:2015:578, par. 40 (www.curia.eu).

[62] Idem, par. 41.

[63] Cour de Cassation, Chambre sociale nr. 10-18036, public audience of 3.11.2011 (www.legifrance.gouv.fr).

[64] Cour de Cassation, Chambre sociale nr. 13-23645, public audience of 17.12.2014, ECLI:FR:CCASS:2014:SO02387 (www.legifrance.gouv.fr).

[65] Răzvan Anghel – Noua reglementare privind telemunca..., cited, p.215.

[66] See also A. Fabre, Le temps de trajet des travailleurs nomads devant la Cour de justice: la mobilité vue de plus haut, Droit Social 1/2016, p. 61 (https://search.proquest.com/openview/93c636846dc716af2978ca28f35137c5/1).

[67] T.A. Coelho Moreira, The electronic control of the employer in Portugal, in Labour & Law Issues, vol. 2, nr. 1/2016, p. i.4.

ends the working day, as well as the interruptions or appropriate breaks, is part of the concept of "personal data" in the meaning of art.2 (a) of Directive 95/46 / EC[68].

Next, however, the question is whether the period of availability, in which the employee does not actually work but only awaits the orders of the employer or the orders of its clients to carry out certain activities, must be considered working time.

The problem arises in the context in which the CJEU has determined that the availability time should be considered as working time only when the worker is present in the workplace or in another place imposed by the employer[69], but not when at his/her own home[70] or in another location not set by the employer[71] unless the way in which the activity is organized makes it impossible for them to devote themselves to their own activities[72].

As a result, new elements for delimiting working time from rest time must be identified for workers in the collaborative economy, where working time is no longer defined by the presence in a certain space.

For example, a British appeal court has determined that the working time of employees using an online order platform for potential clients can be determined by reference to the time the application provided by the employer is active, which means that the employee is at his disposal to take orders[73].

However, availability time differs in its qualities depending on the type of activity and on-line platform. If work on demand in a given location may involve periods of availability in which the worker cannot devote himself to other activities, crowdwork, which allows more freedom in choosing tasks to be performed and the moment of fulfilment, may imply that periods of waiting for a new task does not constitute real periods of availability but rest periods that do not constitute working time.

At the same time, provisions on the protection of personal data may prevent the use of means of supervising the activity of the employee if they interfere with his private life in the context in which he carries out the work including in private premises belonging to him and during periods of time which are interspersed with periods affected by private interests. This also creates a further difficulty in determining working time, which affects mainly the worker who finds himself faced with a very difficult choice: to renounce the protection of privacy or to renounce the protection of health and safety at work by limiting working time in relation to the employer.

4. Conclusions

The new ways of labour supply in the collaborative economy rise primarily the question of the status of the individual that do the work, whether he/she is a worker or a self-employed worker, essential being the verification of the fulfilment of the condition of subordination, which has several defining elements: the one who performs the work must act under the leadership of the on-line platform, which determines the nature of the activity, the remuneration and the working conditions[74]; any activity performed outside a relationship of subordination from the point of view of working and remuneration conditions must be regarded as a self-employed activity for which the individual is solely responsible[75]. At the same time, the activity must be a consistent one to define a working relationship and not at such a low level as to be purely marginal and auxiliary precisely because in the collaborative economy, many people provide occasional, isolated activities for additional non-essential income.

The spatialization of work and the determination of working time by reference to the duration of the worker's presence in an area imposed by the employer in the exercise of his prerogative of controlling and disciplining the work has generated in the jurisprudence, including the case-law of the CJEU, the concern to find criteria for delimitation of working time from rest time by reference to the space.

In this context, without removing from the definition of working time the periods in which the worker actually carries out the work, the CJEU has established criteria for delimiting working time from rest time by reference to the presence of worker to the work place in order to include inactive periods when the worker is at the employer disposal, exercising the duties of work so that the Court was not asked with preliminary questions concerning the delimitation of working time by the rest time, according to the criterion of actual work, as in the classical way of work organization the employer supervision and control was presumed to be exercised so no problems of determining the actual time of work were of interest.

---

[68] CJEU, 3rd Chamber, Case C-342/12, Judgment of 30.05.2013, Worten – Equipamentos para o Lar SA c. Autoridade para as Condições de Trabalho (ACT), ECLI:EU:C:2013:355 (www.curia.eu).

[69] For example, CJEU (5th Chamber) – Ordinance of 11.01.2007 in case C 437/05, Jan Vorelvs. Nemocnice Český Krumlov, EU:C:2007:23

[70] CJEU, Judgement of 03.10.2000 in case C-303/98, Sindicato de Médicos de Asistencia Pública (SIMAP) c. Conselleria de Sanidad y Consumo de la Generalidad Valenciana, EU:C:2000:528

[71] CJEU (4th Chamber) Judgement in case C-87/14, European Comission vs. Ireland, EU:C:2015:449

[72] CJEU, (5thChamber), Judgment of 21 .02. 2018, in case C‑518/15, Matzak, cited;

[73] United Kingdom Employment Appeal Tribunal London, 2018, IRLR 97, 2017, UKEAT 0056_17_1011, 2018, ICR 453, 2017, WLR(D) 809, par. 124 (www.bailii.org) accessed 18.04.2018;

[74] Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions - A European agenda for the collaborative economy, cited, p.13;

[75] CJEU, judgment of 20 November 2001, in case C-268/99, Aldona Malgorzata Jany and Othersand Staatssecretaris van Justitie, www.curia.eu, accessed 13.03.2019, par.33, 34, 37

In the context of the new way of organizing work, mainly results-oriented, abandoning the employer's constant supervision and of work despatialization, the CJEU's case law no longer provides clear rules for the delimitation of working time by rest time, especially as regards inactive availability periods, but only principles and hints for future possible solutions.

Practically, if a worker is awaiting orders from the employer, in a freely chosen place, according to CJEU's case law, that period should not be considered working time. But if the period of actual work performance cannot be determined, although obviously the work has been done, the interpretation should be in favour of the employee, presumed to be in a vulnerable position, so that the entire period of availability to be considered as working time especially that, according to the case-law of the CJEU, the qualification of a period as working time does not depend on the intensity of work[76] and there is no intermediate category between working time and rest time so that if a period cannot be considered rest time it must automatically be considered working time, as the two notions are mutually exclusive[77]. To assess whether a period is rest time, all the specific elements of the activity must be analysed, especially if the worker must be in a certain area to respond to the orders and whether she/he is under the obligation to start work shortly after receiving the order[78] .

Such an interpretation is able to determine employers to adopt effective means of quantifying the working time, which is such as to ensure adequate protection for workers.

Furthermore, the fact remains that Article 17 (1) of Directive 2003/88 allows Member States to derogate from Articles 3 to 6, 8 and 16 where, based on the specific characteristics of the activity pursued, the length of working time is not measured and predetermined or can be determined by the workers themselves.

However, these exemptions must be adopted by states through normative acts, as the provision in the directive is not enough[79]. Although it cannot derogate from the provisions of Article 2 which include the definition of working time, the derogation from the provisions of Article 6 on maximum weekly working time makes it useless to delimit working time from rest time as this is relevant only for limitations of working time.

The new forms of working in the collaborative economy will further pose many problems on working time organization and regarding the delimitation of it from rest time.

The analysis on whether working time regulations are applicable and how will have to be done on a case by case approach, depending of the particular and ever changing conditions of work imposed by the on-line platforms, even in the case of the same platform if the terms and conditions of use are changed.

From the CJEU previous case law some principles may be detached for finding the legal solution to working time problems, generated by innovative work arrangements, as those questions were not addressed in a preliminary question on the subject, and such a possible future answer, anyway may not be applicable to all the possible situations. All those principles are useful on the condition to find first the essence of every work arrangement in the collaborative economy and then find the applicable principle.

References

- Aloisi, A. - Commoditized workers: Case study research on labor law issues arising from a set of on-demand/gig economy platforms, Comp. Lab. L. &Pol'y J. 37/2015;
- Aloisi, A. - Il lavoro „a chiamata" e le piattaforme online della collaborative economy: nozioni e tipi in cerca di tutele, Labour & Law issues, nr. 2/2016;
- Anghel, R. – Noua reglementare privind telemunca. Probleme specific privind delimitarea timpului de lucru de timpul de odihnă în cazul telesalariaţilor, Curierul Judiciar, nr. 4/2018;
- Anghel, R. - Working time and rest time in recent CJEU case law (July 2017 - February 2018), Revista EuRoQuod nr.2/2018;
- Anghel, R.-Procedura soluţionării conflictelor individuale de muncă – Ghid pentru practicieni, Ediţia a II-a, revizuită şi adăugită, Editura C.H. Beck Bucureşti 2018;
- Berg, J., Furrer, M., Harmon, E., Rani, U., Silberman, M.S. – Digital labour platforms and the future of work – Toward decent work in the online world, International Labour Organization, 2018;
- Bogg, A.-Foster parents and fundamental labour rights, www.uklabourlawblog.com, 25.07.2018;
- Bouffartigue, P.,Bouteiller, J.-A propos des normes du temps de travail, Revue de l'IRES no. 42/2003, 2;
- Boulin, J.-Y. ,Cette, G., Taddéi, D.-Le temps de travail: une mutation majeure, Futuribles 5/1992;
- Boulin, J.-Y. -Working time in the new social and economic context, Transfer: European Review of Labour and Research 7.2/2001;

[76] CJEU, Judgment of 1.12.2005, case C-14/04, Dellas, cited, par.43 and 58 of the judgement;

[77] CJEU, Judgement of 3.10.2000, in case C-303/98, SIMAP, cited, par.47, CJEU, 2nd Chamber, Judgment of 1.12.2005, case C-14/04, Dellas, cited, par.43, www.curia.eu; CJCE, 5th Chamber , Ordinance of 11.01.2007, case C-437/05, Jan Vorel c. Nemocnice Český Krumlov, ECLI:EU:C:2007:23, www.curia.eu, par.25; CJEU, 6th Chamber, Ordinance of 4.03.2011, case C 258/10, Nicuşor Grigore c. Regiei Naţionale a Pădurilor Romsilva – Direcţia Silvică Bucureşti, ECLI:EU:C:2011:122, www.curia.eu, par.43; CJEU, 3rd Chamber, Judgment of 10 .09. 2015, case C 266/14, Tyco, cited, par.26;

[78] mutatis mutandis CJEU, (5th Chamber), Judgment of 21.02.2018, in case C‑518/15, Matzak, cited.

[79] CJEU, (2nd Chamber) Judgement of 21.10.2010 in case C-227/09, Antonino Accardoe v.Comune di Torino, par.46 and 51, www.curia.eu.

- CJEU (5thChamber) – Ordinance of 11 .01. 2007 in case C- 437/05, Jan Vorel vs. Nemocnice Český Krumlov, EU:C:2007:23;
- CJEU (2nd Chamber) Judgment of 14.10.2010, case C -428/09, Union syndicale Solidaires Isère c. Premier ministre, Ministère du Travail, des Relations sociales, de la Famille, de la Solidarité et de la Ville, Ministère de la Santé et des Sports, ECLI:EU:C:2010:612, www.curia.eu;
- CJEU (4th Chamber) Judgement in case C-87/14, European Commission vs. Ireland, EU:C:2015:449;
- CJEU (5th Chamber), Judgment of 29 .11. 2017 în case C-214/16, Conley King vs. The Sash Window Workshop Ltd, Richard Dollar;
- CJEU (Grand Chamber), Judgement of 20 december 2017, EU:C:2017:981, Asociación Profesional Elite Taxi vs. Uber Systems Spain SL, www.curia.eu;
- CJEU (Grand Chamber), judgement of 20.11.2018, in case C-147/17, Sindicatul Familia;
- CJEU (Sixth Chamber), judgment of 6 November 2003, in Case C-413/01, Franca Ninni-Orascheand Bundesminister für Wissenschaft, Verkehr und Kunst;
- CJEU, Judgment of 10 .09. 2014, Haralambidis, C-270/13, EU:C:2014:2185;
- CJEU, Judgment of 23 .03. 2004, Collins, C- 138/02, Rec., p. I 2703;
- CJEU, Judgment of 3.07.1986, Lawrie Blum, 66/85, Rec., p. 2121;
- CJEU- Judgment of 6 .09. 2016, in case C-182/15, EU:C:2016:630;
- CJEU, Judgment of 5.10.2004, Pfeiffer e.a., C-397/01-C-403/01, Rec., p. I-8835,www.curia.eu;
- CJEU, (2nd Chamber) Judgement of 21.10.2010 in case C-227/09, Antonino Accardoe v. Comune di Torino, www.curia.eu.
- CJEU, (4th Chamber), judgement of 21.11.2018, C-452/17, EU:C:2018:935, in case Zako SPRL;
- CJEU, (5th Chamber), Judgment of 21.02.2018, in case C‑518/15, Matzak, www.curia.eu;
- CJEU, 1stChamber, Judgement of 26.03.2015, case C 316/13, Gérard Fenoll c. Centre d'aide par le travail „La Jouvene", Association de parents et d'amis de personnes handicapées mentales (APEI) d'Avignon, ECLI:EU:C:2015:200, www.curia.eu.
- CJEU, 2nd Chamber, Judgment of 1 .12. 2005, case C-14/04, Abdelkader Dellas, Confédération générale du travail, Fédération nationale des syndicats des services de santé et des services sociaux CFDT, Fédération nationale de l'action sociale Force ouvrière c. Premier ministre, Ministre des Affaires sociales, du Travail et de la Solidarité, ECLI:EU:C:2005:728, www.curia.eu;
- CJEU, 3rdChamber, Case C-266/14, Judgment of 10 .09. 2015, Federación de Servicios Privados del sindicatoComisionesobreras (CC.OO.) c. Tyco Integrated Security SL, Tyco Integrated Fire & Security Corporation Servicios SA, ECLI:EU:C:2015:578 (www.curia.eu).
- CJEU, 3rd Chamber, Case C-342/12, Judgment of 30 .05. 2013, Worten – Equipamentos para o Lar SA c. Autoridade para as Condições de Trabalho (ACT), ECLI:EU:C:2013:355 (www.curia.eu).
- CJEU, 5th Chamber, Ordinance of 7.04.2011, case C-519/09, Dieter May c. AOK Rheinland/Hamburg – Die Gesundheitskasse, ECLI:EU:C:2011:221, www.curia.eu.
- CJEU, 6th Chamber, Ordinance of 4 .03. 2011, case C- 258/10, Nicuşor Grigore c. Regiei Naţionale a Pădurilor Romsilva – Direcţia Silvică Bucureşti, ECLI:EU:C:2011:122, www.curia.eu;
- CJEU, judgement Bettray, C-344/87, EU:C:1989:226;
- CJEU, Judgement Kurz, C- 188/00, EU:C:2002:694;
- CJEU, Judgement of 3.10.2000 in case C-303/98, Sindicato de Médicos de Asistencia Pública (SIMAP) c. Conselleria de Sanidad y Consumo de la Generalidad Valenciana, EU:C:2000:528;
- CJEU, Judgment of 26 February 1992, in case C-357/89, V. J. M. Raulin v Minister van Onderwijsen Wetenschappen;
- CJEU, Judgment of 10 .09. 2015, Holterman Ferho Exploitatie and others, C-47/14, EU:C:2015:574;
- CJEU, judgment of 20 November 2001, in case C-268/99, Aldona Malgorzata Jany and Othersand Staatssecretaris van Justitie, www.curia.eu;
- CJEU, Judgment of 20.09.2007, Kiiski, C-116/06, Rep., p. I 7643;
- CJEU, Judgment of 3 June 1986, in case C-139/85, R. H. Kempf v Staatssecretaris van Justitie;
- CJEU, Judgment of 7 .09. 2004, Trojani, C 456/02, Rec., p. I 7573;
- CJEU, Judgment of 9 .07. 2015, Balkaya, C-229/14, EU:C:2015:455;
- Coelho Moreira, T.A. -The electronic control of the employer in Portugal, in Labour & Law Issues, vol. 2, nr. 1/2016;
- Cohen, B.,Kietzmann, J. - Ride on! Mobility business models for the sharing economy, Organization & Environment 27.3/2014;
- Conseil de Prud'hommes de paris, no. RG: F 16/11460, judgement of 29.01.2018;
- Cour de Cassation, Chambre sociale nr. 10-18036, public audience of 3.11.2011 (www.legifrance.gouv.fr).
- Cour de Cassation, Chambre sociale nr. 13-23645, public audience of 17.12.2014, ECLI:FR:CCASS:2014:SO02387 (www.legifrance.gouv.fr)
- Cour de cassation, chambre sociale, audience publique du mercredi 28 novembre 2018, N° de pourvoi: 17-20079, www.legifrance.gouv.fr;
- Dagnino, E. -Il lavoro nella on-demand economy: esigenze di tutela e prospettive regulatorie, Labour & Law issues, nr. 2/2015;
- Donini, A.-Il lavoro digitale su piattaforma, Labour & Law issues, no. 1/2015;
- EUROFOUND – Work on demand: Recurrence, effects and challenges, Publications Office of the European Union, Luxembourg, 2018;

- EUROFOUND, Employment and working conditions of selected types of platform work, Publications Offices of the European Union, Luxemburg, 2018;
- European Commission - Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions - A European agenda for the collaborative economy, Brussels, 2.6.2016 COM (2016) 356 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2016/EN/1-2016-356-EN-F1-1.PDF, p.3, accesed on 13.03.2019;
- Fabre, A.-Le temps de trajet des travailleurs nomads devant la Cour de justice: la mobilité vue de plus haut, Droit Social 1/2016;
- Friedman, G.-Workers without employers: shadow corporations and the rise of the gig economy, Review of Keynesian Economics 2.2/2014;
- Hamari, J., Sjöklint, M., Ukkonen, A. -The sharing economy: Why people participate in collaborative consumption, Journal of the Association for Information Science and Technology 67.9/2016;
- Heinrichs, H.-Sharing economy: a potential new pathway to sustainability, GAIA-Ecological Perspectives for Science and Society 22.4/2013;
- Messenger, J. – Working time and the future of work, International Labour Organization, ILO Future of Work Research Paper Series, 2018;
- Messenger, J.,Gschwind, L. – Three Generations of Telework, Conference paper – 17th ILERA World Congress, 7-11.09.2015, Cape Town, South Africa, disponibilă la https://www.ilera2015.com/dynamic/full/IL156.pdf (accessed 13.03.2019);
- Moarcăş, C.A. Impactul globalizării asupra reglementărilor din domeniul muncii. Posibile schimbări în sistemul relaţiilor industriale, Revista de Drept Public, nr.1/2005,
- Rubery, J.- Working time in the UK, Transfer: European Review of Labour and Research 4.4/1998, p. 672.
- Rubery, J., Ward, K., Grimshaw, D., Beynon, H.-Working time, industrial relations and the employment relationship, Time & Society 14(1)/2005;
- Schor, J. - Debating the Sharing Economy, Journal of Self-Governance & Management Economics 4.3/2016;
- Seifert,H.-Flexibility through working time accounts: reconciling economic efficiency and individual time requirements, WSI-Diskussionspapiere, no. 130/2004;
- Supiot, A.-Temps de travail: pour une concordance des temps, Droit social, 1995;
- United Kingdom Employment Appeal Tribunal London, [2018] IRLR 97, [2017] UKEAT 0056_17_1011, [2018] ICR 453, [2017] WLR(D) 809, par.124, www.bailii.org, accessed 18.04.2018.

LIABILITY OF THE TRANSPORTATOR IN THE CASE OF THE RAILWAY TRANSPORT CONTRACT

Adriana Elena BELU[*]

Abstract

When dealing with rail transport, whether we deal with aspects of domestic or international rail transport, the provisions of GO no. 7/2005 for the approval of the Romanian Railways Regulation and the Romanian Rail Transport Regulations for Internal Transport and the Convention on International Carriage by Rail (COTIF) of 9 May 1980 and Uniform Rules for the International Carriage of Goods Goods (CIM) for international transport.

Keywords: Contractual transport, rail transport, tort law, illicit nature of the harmful act.

Introduction

Relationships arising from the transport contract are independent of the relationship between the shipper and the beneficiary, which is based on another contract, which are not opposable to the carrier, and thus the existence of two stand-alone contracts with its own effects.

Carriage of goods is determined by the sale of a buyer from another locality or the rental of equipment for use in another locality than the one in which they are located. The use of purchased or leased goods may take place only by transporting them from the place where they are to be used.

The conclusion of the contract of carriage is determined by the prior conclusion of the sale-purchase, rental contracts without losing its autonomy through this connection. Thus, in practice, the transport contract, being autonomous, is concluded and executed independently of any existing conventions between the shipper or the consignee and third parties. In the same sense, the problem can be raised and vice versa, ie the provisions of the transport contract can not be opposed to the parties to the contract that preceded it. Thus, in a transport contract, if the jurisdiction of the Court of Arbitration in London, in which the jurisdiction of the International Commercial Arbitration Court in Bucharest was established in the event of litigation, was settled in case of litigation between sellers and buyers.

The transport contract is a legal institution with specific characters, which distinguishes it from all other contracts with economic or civil law content or which have as object the provision of services. Represents in legal terms the realization of economic relations of a special nature, such as the displacement of the object of transport, which gives it its own juridical figure with distinct characters. Being entered into between economic agents with regard to the performance of certain services, in order to carry out its tasks, the transport contracts are economic service contracts and are of a special nature.

The contract of carriage is a unitary, autonomous and autonomous contract, in the content of which there are elements that resemble elements specific to other contracts, but which confer on this contract an own legal nature.

But not every move of things from one place to another is the subject of a transport contract but only when the shipment is made on the basis of the assumed obligation of the carrier and which it has taken to the place of loading and will hand them over to place of destination.

The towing contract is of a legal nature different from the legal nature of the transport contract because it does not involve the taking over of the goods in the port of shipment and their handing over to the port of destination but only the offshore or seagoing offshore . The towing contract may be terminated for a certain distance, for a certain length of time or for the execution of a particular operation, in return for a payment. Both Contracting Parties have obligations whose non-compliance entails the contractual liability of the defaulting party, and in the event of damage to property due to third parties by performing the towing operations, the defaulting party shall be liable to them. The contract of carriage is also different from the contract of shipment, which is the contract on the basis of which a person, called expeditionary or commissioner, undertakes to the other contracting party, appointed as the sender or the principal, that by virtue of the empowerment given by the latter to conclude with carriage on own account but on the expedition's behalf a contract for the carriage of goods and to carry out all the ancillary operations for the dispatch of the goods or their arrival at destination and the consignor undertakes to pay him a certain amount of money and the price of ancillary services. The legal relationships established between the parties to the shipment contract are of a complex legal nature.

There are two civil contracts in the relations between the consignor and the consignor: a contract without a warrant, under which the sender authorizes the shipper to conclude with a carrier the transport contract and a service contract, on the basis of which the consignor must execute all the operations necessary for transport, such as the taking over of the goods and their loading in the means of transport, the completion of the necessary formalities. The consignor is responsible for the destruction or destruction of the goods from the moment they are received until they are handed over to the carrier, and is only responsible for the proper execution of the specific shipment contract obligations and the choice of the carrier, the means of transport and the route. The sender has the right to terminate the contract, but only until the date of conclusion of the contract of carriage, in which case he is obliged to pay the expedient a sum of money, which represents the equivalent of his activity until the termination and the price of the accessories provided; unpaid, as long as the goods are still in detention, will have the right of retention. By the way it is formed and viewed from the complexity of its constitutive elements and its purpose, the transport contract has its own legal structure and specific physiognomy, being independent of any other civil or commercial contract.

[*] PhD student at the Bucharest University of Economic Studies, Lawyer in Dolj, Bar Association, adyelenabelu@yahoo.com.

1. Regulation of the transport contract.

The legal provisions applicable to the transport contract come from a series of normative acts that need to be coordinated with each other. The Civil Code refers to the transport contract within the scope of art. 1955 - art. 2008. The transport activity is also regulated by normative acts specific to each transport sector: Government Ordinance no. 19/1997 on transport; The Romanian Railways Regulation approved by Government Ordinance no. 7/2005, Government Emergency Ordinance no. 12/1998 on the Romanian railways and the reorganization of the Romanian National Railway Company, Government Ordinance no. 42/1997 on the maritime and inland waterways, Government Ordinance no. 27/2011 on road transport. Besides the special laws and custom, as provisions that derogate from the legal regime established by the New Civil Code, it is also necessary to consider Art. 140 of the Law no. 71/2011 for the implementation of Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, which stipulates that the provisions of the international instruments ratified by Romania in the field of transport prevail over the provisions of the Civil Code.

Art. 193 of the Law no. 71/2011 provides that art. 20 par. (3) of the Government Ordinance no. 19/1997, which regulates the transport contract in general, is modified in order to know the provisions of the New Civil Code as a general rule.

Also in the sense of recognizing the provisions of the New Civil Code as a general norm in the field of transport, art. 194 of Law no. 71/2011 provides for the amendment of para. (7) of art. 1 of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 12/1998 on the Romanian railways and the reorganization of the Romanian Railway Company.

In addition to the common features of any provision of services, the transport contract is distinguished by its own characteristics, such as: an activity consisting in the movement of persons or goods; the exercise of the carrier activity as a self-employed profession; the technical and commercial management of the operation; autonomy of the transport contract against the correlation contracts.

2. Mandatory clauses of the transport contract.

According to art. 1961 par. (2) the transport document is signed by the consignor and must contain, inter alia, particulars of the identity of the consignor, the carrier and the consignee and, where applicable, the person to whom the shipment is due. The transport document also mentions the place and date of receipt of the goods, the point of departure and the destination, the price and timing of the shipment, the nature, quantity, volume or mass and the apparent condition of the goods when handed over for transport, the dangerous nature of the goods, if any, as well as additional documents that have been handed over and accompany the shipment. The Parties may also agree on other entries in the transport document.

The provisions of the special law remain applicable.

The terms of the contract of carriage concern: the date of the contract; the nature of the transport document; the parties concerned; identification of the goods transported; carrier's obligations; payment of the price; the signature of the document.

The date of the contract is important because it determines the day of conclusion of the contract of carriage, as from the normal start of the assumed obligations. In addition, dating is of interest in determining whether or not the sender was a person with an exercise capacity at the time the legal act was finalized.

The nature of the transport document is requested incidentally by art. 1965 of the New Civil Code, which states that when the transport document is on order or at the bearer, the property of the transported goods is transferred by the effect of the transmission of this document. The type of transport document influences the identification of the recipient. The Civil Code requires that the sender, the carrier and the consignee and the person who has to pay for the shipment be identified. The identity of the sender allows the carrier to know the person from whom he or she can validly receive counter-orders, such as changing the destination or replacing the consignee. The carrier, being the main party to the contract, must be nominated, because only the recipient or the rights transferee will know without a doubt who can be held accountable in the event of loss or damage to the displaced property. The mention of the seat serves to determine the territorial jurisdiction of the jurisdiction that will settle the dispute between the contracting parties, most of the times the defendant being the carrier.

The mention of the addressee is necessary to enable the carrier to determine the person entitled to the cargo at the end of the journey.

The description of the cargo that the shipper handles to the carrier is a mandatory requirement in the contract of carriage, since the nature, quantity, volume or mass and the apparent condition of the goods when delivered for carriage must be specified, the dangerous nature of the goods, if any. If things are in boxes or packages, you must specify their quality, number and seals or marks applied.

The purpose of these mentions is to facilitate the identification of things both by the carrier, who must release them at the end of the journey, as well as the recipient, who will receive them. The load description serves to assess the amount of compensation that the carrier may owe in the event of loss or damage to goods during transport.

Regarding the carrier's obligations, the New Civil Code requires that the point of departure and the destination be mentioned. By knowing only the destination, the carrier will be able to properly guide the means of transport. The term of the shipment must be mentioned, the term of delivery of the items being transported shall be decided by the parties. The time limit for the execution of the contract of carriage starts to run from the date when the work was handed over to the carrier by the consignor.

Payment of the price must be expressed in the document. The cost depends mainly on the type of transport, the distance traveled, the nature, the dimensions and the weight of the work being carried. In addition to the actual price of the transport, its total cost may also include other amounts.

The new Civil Code provides that the transport document is signed by the sender. By signing it, its unconditional adherence to the terms of the transport contract is manifested. The text does not include the carrier's signature. The nominative transport document must be signed by both contracting parties, namely carrier and consignor.

3. Comparative view of transport.

Two obligations are the basis of any legislation on transport, in the general sense of a different carrier according to the rules of common law, in particular the meaning of railway under the various transport regulations.

The imperative nature of these obligations is:

- equality of treatment towards the public wishing to take part in the contracting of a transport, resulting in the publicity of the law or regulation which stipulates the conditions and the price on the means of transport, which become mandatory in the relations between the state or the entrepreneur and the private persons on the basis of the concluded transport contract;
- non-disregard of the general principle that it is not permissible to circumvent the contractual obligation giving rise to the waiver.

Any enterprise of private or private interest violates the principle of fairness in law when it is allowed by law or the regulation which would require it to deviate or diminish its contractual responsibility. Justice, by jurisprudence, has the honor of restoring the violation of this high justice principle.

3.1. France

In France, land transport was governed by the provisions of Art. 1782-1786 Civil Code and Title VI S. III Commercial Code dealing with commissioners for water and land transport in Art. 96-102 and S. IV which contained a series of provisions concerning carriers generally in Art. 103-108, these articles contained general rules applicable to any kind of transport. However, it does not apply to maritime transport as these are regulated separately from the commercial code or from the transports on the roadways to which the laws of 30 May 1851 of 17 July 1908 apply, or the trams and railway undertakings of local interest to which they apply the law of 11 June 1880 and the decree of 16 July 1907.

For a long time after the promulgation of the commercial code, France has envisioned a rich legislation on rail transport, seeking new provisions to satisfy the requirements of this mode of transport.

From the point of view of the legal nature of the transport contract, the French Civil Code regards it as an operating lease and the commercial code as a commission contract. The French Leader did not know to relinquish the transport contract that autonomy that is so logical and necessary to the important economic function it performs. The rule of law translated into law is incomplete and too old that it can no longer solve problems that arise with the development of the transport industry.

As far as the railway transport is concerned under the old laws, whenever the special tariff was applied, this presupposed in the transport contract the existence of a negligence clause on the part of the railway administration and the recipient was the one who had to prove the fault of the roads railways.

The law of March 29, 1905 considers any clause introduced in the consignment note to be void under which the reduction of liability is stipulated.

The provisions of the Code, which did not restrict the parties' freedom of contract, the carrier, to the freedom to contract with the shipper on the terms of the contract, could mitigate the extent of its liability or remove it altogether by stipulating in the contract a non-warranty clause. However, the case-law has saved the general principle of common law that each is responsible for the consequences of his deeds or the non-fulfillment of an obligation.

Through a series of steady decisions, it has defeated the desire of railway companies to work beyond the boundaries of an elementary contractual liability, being nullified by any clause to the contrary. The legal reasoning which the French courts based in their judgments referred to a clause whereby railways would be sheltered from any liability or diminished the degree of their liability resulting from the breach of contract is equivalent to the right of the railway company to free themselves from the effects of culpability, which would result in the encouragement of all the most damaging crimes and negligence and the deceptive facts. As a consequence, such an irresponsibility clause would be against public order and would not be valid.

3.2. Germany

In Germany, it was easier to regulate the transport contract because there is no legal tradition as it was in France where the commercial code of 1807 drafted the basic principles of transport and created a legal regime that had been put into practice. The German Legislative Commission of 1848, which had been designated to deal with trade and transport business, was able to study this problem and resolve it in a satisfactory manner.

The 1861 code deals with transport through art. 390-421. Damages in the event of damage or loss were calculated according to the value of the goods in the destination city, and when the carrier was guilty of misdemeanors or misdemeanors, it used the principles of common law with regard to damage to the sender. For the amounts due by virtue of transport, the carrier had a pledge on the shipment. All of these provisions, together with the others contained in the old code, have been the basis for the drafting of the Berne international convention, which is largely a true replication of the German principles. In 1900, the new German code was promulgated, which, in transport matters, reproduced exactly the provisions of the Berne Convention, paying particular attention to the conditions under which transport must be carried out and at the same time regulating the responsibility of the carrier.

The German legal system on transport has been adopted by many countries in their transport legislation because the Germans have been the only ones who have been able to adapt to the new requirements emerging with the development of the transport industry, new principles capable of satisfying them.

Transport law is viewed by German doctrine and law as a conventional right of the parties, although their will is limited by some prescriptive rules prescribed by the Code, however, they have some freedom to contract. The principles of railway law refer to a transport of public interest, are imperative and the contractual freedom of the parties is wholly excluded.

3.3. Italy

The Italian Commercial Code of 1865, which was a copy of the French code of 1807, contained in the transport field old provisions because, during the entry into force of the French code, the transport industry was very poorly developed, trafficking in persons or goods was extremely low when, after several decades, the transport companies have expanded, especially the railway companies, and those provisions could no longer meet the new needs due to the multiplication of the means of transport and their intensification.

The Italian code deals with freight and freight forwarders, each with a sphere of activity and distinct responsibility. The Chief Officer was responsible for the way the carrier carried the task of carrying, responding to the damage, the loss or delay of the work, and the carrier responded to the commissioners as to how it had carried out the shipment.

There is no provision in this code on rail transport, and then, in the absence of a special law or regulation, the provisions of the commercial code apply, which is totally inadequate and abusive.

Thus, due to the lack of specific rules that clearly and precisely define the concept of railway administration's reputation, those companies, through their regulations and statutes, which they changed as they pleased, began to restrict their responsibilities in many cases or reserve their right to fix in the consignment note the amount of damages they would have to pay to the entitled party in the event of damage or loss attributable to them. Many times, through an express clause, they were free from any liability. The damages suffered by the public as a result of such abusive treatment, forced in the event of damage or loss, to satisfy what companies wished to indemnify or to give up any compensation when the companies provided the clause of their irresponsibility in the contract.

Following the promulgation of the commercial code in 1885, a number of conventions entered into between the Italian State and the various companies to which the state had conceded the operation of the railways, setting out in detail the conditions under which they were obliged to carry out the transports, and also the extent of their responsibility . The Royal Decree of November 26, 1921 brought many changes to the existing legal regime for rail transport.

The Italian Legislative Commission of 1921, which deals with the reform of the commercial code, has echoed a pressing need. He also deals with the transport of people. The few principles of the commercial code applicable to all modes of transport are insufficient in their content and, with the development of public transport services, their applicability has become increasingly difficult. In this situation it was necessary to intervene in the jurisprudence to supplement these shortcomings and the legislator who by special laws to adapt the old provisions to the new requirements.

3.4. England

The regulation of transport in England is subject to the rules contained in the Railways and Canal Traffic Act of 30 July 1854 where no convention whereby the carrier would derogate from the general principles underlying its liability is prohibited under the penalty of nullity.

Any carrier is subject to those provisions which have a single purpose, a fair compensation in the event of loss, damage or delay.

3.5. Switzerland

The law of 29 March 1983 governed transport in Switzerland, which contains the same provisions as the Berne international convention. The contract of carriage is treated in Art. 440-457 of the Obligation Code of 30 March 1911.

4. Liability in the contract of carriage.

Failure to comply with the obligations assumed in the contract of transport gives rise to civil liability for the carrier and the consignor. As regards the liability of the consignor or the consignee, the rules that apply are those of ordinary law, whereas special aspects of the common law apply to the carrier.

Regarding the carrier, there is contractual liability and tort liability. Tort liability is subject to the provisions of the civil code, and contractual liability is subject to the provisions of special laws, and only in the absence of specific provisions is it subject to common law.

The legal regime of the carrier's liability is given by the provisions of the civil code by art. 1984-2002.

4.1. Tort liability of the carrier.

Tort law is a sanction specific to civil law, applied for committing an illicit act of causing damage and has a reparatory character.

According to the civil code, any person has the duty to observe the rules of conduct that the law or custom of the place requires that, by his actions or inactions, the rights or legitimate interests of others, are not prejudiced. The person who has discretion violates this obligation is responsible for all the damages caused, being obliged to repair them fully. In certain cases provided by law, a person is obliged to repair the damage caused by the deed of another, the things or animals under his guard, as well as the ruin of the edifice.

The carrier, through the performance of the contract of carriage, assumes responsibility towards its contractor but may also assume liability to third parties in the sense that in the event that third parties have been harmed by acts committed by the carrier in the course of the activity outside the contract of trabsport, the liability of the carrier will be a tort / delict.

4. 2. The contractual liability of the carrier.

When the sender did not notify the carrier of the fault of the work, and he did not check the thing and did not know his vice, if the work deteriorated because of his vice and the things adjoined, the sender will be responsible for the damage caused by his fault. The sender's deed may extend the wholly or partly the civil liability of the carrier. In order for the liability to be wholly excluded, the creditor's deed must fulfill the features of force majeure, ie it is absolutely unpredictable and irresistible, otherwise the rules of common fault will apply. In the case of the transport contract, the following will be attributed to the sender and the consignee: - inappropriate loading or unloading, if these operations were done by the means of the consignor or the consignee or under their supervision; - the sender hid the vice of the work, declaring the contents of the package to be false; - the sender has handed over products which are excluded from the transport by any special law, under a false, inaccurate or incomplete name and confiscated by the authorities; - handing things over to a package with defects that could not be seen from the outside appearance when things were taken to transport; - the consignor did not indicate in the transport documents and on the packaging the particularities of the goods which required special conditions or certain precautions during transport or storage; - the creator designated by the consignor or consignee to accompany the transport has not taken the necessary measures to ensure the integrity of the transported work; - incorrect indications in transport documents; - handing over incomplete transport documents.

4. 3. Liability for non-transport or for delay

The carrier is also liable for the damage caused by not carrying out the transport or by exceeding the transport term, resulting in unlawful acts, such as not carrying out the transport and exceeding the transport time.

The performance of these acts may entail the liability of the carrier and is a manifestation of the non-fulfillment or inadequate execution of the obligation of the transport to carry out the transport within a certain period, determined conventionally or legally.

If it is found that the loss or damage or alteration could have occurred in certain cases, it is presumed that the damage was caused by that cause.

The carrier is relieved of liability if it proves that the total or partial loss or alteration or deterioration occurred due to:

- any other offense committed intentionally or by fault by the sender or consignee or instructions given by one of them;
- the major force or deed of a third party for which the carrier is not required to respond.

Article 1991 The NCC aims to group the exonerating causes of liability that may be encountered in the event of loss, alteration or degradation of the goods carried. The text is not an exhaustive list of excusable causes of liability, but the article refers to other causes provided by special laws and other texts of the new Civil Code, and exonerating causes of liability apply also to the transport contract.

Art. 1991 The NCC establishes two categories of exonerating causes of liability, depending on the legal mechanism of producing the exonerating effect of liability. The first category is characterized by the following mechanism of producing the exonerating effect of liability: in order to apply the exonerating cause, it must be proven that it is produced and that there is damage. It is not necessary to prove the concrete causal link, that is, the fact that the actual damage is the consequence of the interference of the exculpatory case relied on. Concerning the causal link between the exonerating cause and the prejudice, art. 1991 alin. 2 The NCC requires only an abstract analysis in order to ascertain whether the intervention of the alleged reimbursement case would have the effect of giving rise to the damage suffered. If the vocation of the existence of an abstract causal link has been proved, it is assumed that there is also the concrete causal link.

The second category is characterized by the following mechanism for producing the exonerating liability: for the purpose of applying the exonerating case, it must be proved that it is produced, that there is damage and that there is a concrete causal link to prove that the damage is the consequence of the exculpatory liability .

4. 4. Causes that eliminate the illicit nature of the injurious fact

The causes that remove the unlawful nature of the harmful act are: legitimate defense; the state of necessity; the performance of a legal duty or legal order given by a competent authority; the victim's consent; the exercise of a subjective right.

In the event of intentional or gross negligence on the part of the carrier, the provisions relating to the extinction of the claimant's claims and those relating to the notice period are not applicable.

The clause which removes or limits the liability established by law to the carrier is considered unwritten. The consignor may take the risk of transport in the case of damage caused by packaging or in the case of special consignments which increase the risk of loss or damage to the goods.

Unless otherwise agreed, the carrier who undertakes to transport the goods on its operating lines and those of another carrier shall only be liable for carriage on the other lines as a commission agent.

Conclusions

Unless otherwise provided by law, in the case of successive or combined transport, liability may be brought against the carrier who has concluded the contract of carriage or the last carrier. In their relations, each carrier contributes compensation in proportion to its share of the transport price. If the damage is caused intentionally or by gross negligence on the part of one of the carriers, the full compensation is incumbent upon him. When one of the carriers proves that the damage did not occur during its transport, it is not required to contribute to compensation. Goods are presumed to have been handed over in good condition from one carrier to another if they do not require the transport document to state the state in which the goods were taken over.

In the successive or combined transport, the latter carries the others with regard to the collection of the sums under the contract of carriage and the exercise of the rights. The carrier who fails to fulfill these obligations shall be liable to the previous carriers for the amounts due to them.

References

- Gheorghe Filip, Cristina Badea, Mihai Manoliu, Gavril Paramon, Dreptul transporturilor, Editura Junimea, Iași, 2002,
- Florin Făinişi, Dreptul transporturilor, ediţia a IV-a revăzută şi adăugită, Editura Pro Universitaria, Bucureşti, 2014,
- Petre Alexandru Măinescu, Codul transporturilor adnotat, Editura „Curierul Juridic" S.A., Bucureşti, 1931,
- E. Cristoforeanu, Despre contractul de transport. Cartea I. Transportul terestru de lucruri. Analiza lui în cadrul dispoziţiilor din codul de comerţ, Tipografia „Curierul Judiciar'' S.A., Bucureşti, 1925,
- E. Cristoforeanu, Despre contractul de transport. Cartea I. Transportul terestru de lucruri. Analiza lui în cadrul dispoziţiilor din codul de comerţ, Tipografia „Curierul Judiciar'' S.A., Bucureşti, 1925,
- Noul Cod Civil;
- Ordonanţa Guvernului nr. 19/1997 privind transporturile;
- Regulamentul privind transportul pe căile ferate din România aprobat prin Ordonanţa Guvernului nr. 7/2005,
- Ordonanţa de urgenţă a Guvernului nr. 12/1998 privind transportul pe căile ferate române şi reorganizarea Societăţii Naţionale a Căilor Ferate Române,
- Ordonanţa Guvernului nr. 42/1997 privind transportul maritim şi căile navigabile interioare,
- Ordonanţa Guvernului nr. 27/2011 privind transporturile rutiere.
- Legea nr. 71/2011 pentru punerea în aplicare a Legii nr. 287/2009 privind Codul civil
- Ordonanţa de urgenţă a Guvernului nr. 12/1998 privind transportul pe căile ferate române şi reorganizarea Societăţii Naţionale a Căilor Ferate Române.

THE SHAREHOLDERS VOTING RIGHTS IN COMPARATIVE LAW

Roxana-Mihaela CATEA

Abstract

The most important consequence of owning shares in a company is the possibility to exercise your voting right as a shareholder and decide the future of the company and of your own capital increases. Nowadays, companies are becoming increasing interested in knowing the identity and the financial reputation of their shareholders in order to ensure a healthy and stable economic flow. Although Romanian legislation provides minimum quorum and majority guidelines for approving shareholders' decisions, the procedural manner in which shareholders exercise their voting rights may benefit to some extent from the solutions identified by other legal systems, which have a clearer regulation of minority and majority shareholders rights. Also, the discrepancies due to the absence of a more standardized legal framework for the exercise of voting rights have been overcome as a result of the interpretation provided through case law, which has revealed a series of criteria for determining whether the stockholder's vote has been duly cast. Considering the current Romanian legal background, this article aims to analyze the Romanian legal system with respect to the shareholders' voting rights in comparison with the guidelines set out by other legal systems and to emphasize the welcoming recent EU legislation for the harmonization and protection of shareholders' rights.

Keywords: right to vote, minority shareholder, majority shareholder, exercising voting rights, joint stock company, limited liability company, corporate policy, proxy voting

1. Introduction

1.1. Introduction

The purpose of a company is to organize its activity in order to produce profit. This is the lucrative purpose which generates interest in owning a part of that company by individuals or other legal entitites.

Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies ("Law no. 31/1990") provides that votes are cast in the general meeting of shareholders and their result represents the will of the company itself. Renowned scholars have said that the general meeting of shareholders represents the deliberation body of the company because it expresses the company's social will[1]. Although in doctrine, the legal nature of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders pendulated between an unilateral legal act and a contract between shareholders, the true nature of such an act was established as being a sui generis act, since it cannot be included in any other category of legal deeds[2].

As opposed to voting in limited liability companies, voting in joint stock companies may lead to several issues due to the specific nature of the procedures and types of vote set out by Law no. 31/1990.

For example, as opposed to the open voting procedure established by Law no. 31/1990 for shareholders in limited liability companies, art. 130 par. 1) of the same law provides that open votes are the general rule in joint stock companies, while secret votes are established for specific operations.

While the Romanian legal system is in line with most of European legal systems establishing a subjective system, where commercial and corporate norms are applicable to legal professionals, in USA the common-law rules apply both to individuals and to legal professionals performing a commercial or corporate deed. However, federal regulations have been adopted in USA in order to uniformize commercial rules by issuing a common Commercial Code[3] applicable for all states.

Apart from the differences within the Romanian legal system connected to the type of company analized, there are significant differences between the manner in which the shareholder's voting rights are cast in other legal systems, both in relation to substantial aspects regarding the shareholder's voting competence and to procedural aspects regarding how the vote is actually cast.

While most of Europe's legal system is a continental one, in USA

2. Overview of the shareholder voting rights in Romania

2.1. Voting as a limited liability company shareholder

For a shareholder in a limited liability company, each share grants the right to one vote. Votes are cast in the general meeting of shareholders. Law no. 31/1990 established a restriction referring to shareholders who cannot exercise their right to vote in the general

*Assistant professor, PhD student, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University (e-mail: roxana.catea@yahoo.com);

[1] V. Nemes, Commercial Law, 3rd Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2018, p. 142.

[2] St. D. Carpenaru, S.David, C. Predoiu, Gh. Piperea, Commented Companies Law, 4th Edition, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2009, p. 485.

[3] St. D. Carpenaru, Romanian Commercial Law Treaty, VIth Edition, C.H. Bech, Bucharest, 2019, p. 15.

meeting if the matter on the agenda refers to their own share capital contributions or the legal acts concluded between the shareholder and the company. Needless to say that if a shareholder loses the ownership of its shares, even within a forced execution procedure[4], it shall lose the capacity required by law to act as shareholder and exercise votin rights.

From a procedural point of view, art. 192 of Law no. 31/1990 establishes that the general meeting passes a ruling considering the votes representing the "absolute majority" of the shareholders and their shares, provided that the articles of association do not establish othervise. In order for the general meeting to amend the articles of incorporation, Law no. 31/1990 provides that shareholders' unanimity in this respect is required.

2.2. Voting as a joint stock company shareholder

Voting rights and procedures in a joint stock company are more detailed by the Romanian legislator, most likely due to the more complex configuration of this type of company.

Generally and similar to limited liability companies, in a joint stock company a subscrised and paid up share grants the shareholder the right to one vote, provided that the company's articles of association do not establish otherwise.

When discussing the voting rights of a shareholder within a joint stock company, it is neccesary to determine if the shareholders have established certain limitations attached to their shares through the articles of association. For example, the shareholders may include in the articles of association certain vote limitations for shareholders owning more than a share.

A limitation has been set through Law no. 31/1990 regarding certain resolutions in which the shareholders who are also members of the board of directors, of the directorate or of the supervision board cannot vote with respect to their discharge from their mandate or with respect to an issue in which their person or management would be subject to discussion. Similarly, a shareholder who, either personally or in his capacity as a proxy of another person, has an interest contrary to the company's interest needs to refrain from voting in connection to that certain operation.

Another relevant aspect regarding the exercise of a vote in joint stock companies is linked to the type of shares owned by the shareholder. For example, in case of priority shares without voting rights attached hereto, the shareholder owning such type of shares is prohibited from voting.

If the shareholders did not pay their contributions, their voting rights are suspended.

The right to vote cannot be transferred and any convention which states that the shareholder undertake to exercise its voting right in accordance with the company's or the company's representatives' instructions or proposals is null and void. In practice[5], courts have clarified this matter in the sense that only if the company or its representatives instruct or propose that the vote be cast in a certain manner, the procedure is null. However, if the shareholder mandates a third party to exercise its voting right as the third party deems proper, the shareholder's instruction shall not be deemed null.

From a procedural point of view, voting in general meetings of shareholders is performed through an open vote. Art. 130 par. 2) of Law no. 31/1990 provides that a secret vote is mandatory for the appoinment or revokation of members of the board of directors or of supervision council, for the appoinment, revokation or dismissal of censors or financial auditors and for passing decisions in connection to the liability of the members of administration, management and control bodies of the company.

The provisions of Law no. 31/1990 also entail that shareholders in joint stock companies must exercise their rights in good faith, while observing the rights and legitimate interests of the company and of other shareholders.

3. Voting rights in other legal systems

If in general, one share generates the right to one vote in a Romanian company, a difference in this respect can be observed in foreing law systems, such is the French one. For example, pursuant to articles L225 - 122 and L225 - 123 of the French Commercial Code, a voting right equivalent to twice that attributed to other shares could have been attributed to fully paid shares which can be proved to have been registered in the name of the same shareholder for at least two years, depending on the proportion of the share capital they represent, by the memorandum and articles of association or a special shareholders'meeting. Recently, thorugh the adoption of the so-called Florange law this principle was reversed for listed companies, so that the attribution of double voting rights is automatic by operation of law except if the articles expressly provide otherwise.This system enables companies to recognize, subject to the satisfaction of certain requirements, double voting rights to their shares.

Shareholders' extensive rights under French law allows them remove any director at any shareholders' meeting by a simple majority vote of the shareholders, upon proposal of any single shareholder, even if the subject is not on the agenda for the relevant shareholders' meeting and regardless of the term of office for which the director was originally appointed[6].

[4] Brasov Appeal Court, Decision no. 433/R/2016 - Losing the quality of shareholder after being under forced execution for the shares. Absolute nullity of the general meeting of shareholder resolution passed after the transmission of the shares to a third party.

[5] Gorj Tribunal, Resolution no. 1/2010 - Claim for the annulment of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders.

The trend for enlarging shareholder protection is recognizable in Sweden, as well. For example, the Swedish Companies Act provides for certain protection of minority shareholdersso that some rights under the Swedish Companies Act may be exercised by each shareholder (i.e., regardless of the number of shares owned or the number of votes they represent) whereas some rights may only be exercised by a shareholder whose shareholdings represent 10 per cent or more of the share capital. In order to illustrate such a system, imagine that a shareholder is allowed to introduce matters to the agenda and present proposals for resolutions at general meetings; and take court actions against the company to set aside or amend a resolution on the grounds that it has not been duly passed or that the correct procedure for its adoption was not followed. However, in Sweden, the right of a shareholder to voe via a proxy is somewhat limited, in the sense that to introduce proxy voting, the company initialy must alter its articles of association, by introducing a provision on proxy voting. This would enable the distribution of proxy forms where the shareholders may indicate their votes (as 'yes' or 'no') regarding the relevant proposals, which are then executed without the shareholders being present at the shareholders' meeting.

The preoccupation for the protection of minority shareholders is not trending in all European countries, as one might expect. For example, in Luxembourg, where a law issued in 2016 amended the provision which stated that one vote is attached to one share. The former rule limited the voting rights to the number of the shares, in order to strengthen the exercise of minority shareholders' voting rights in listed companies in order to improve the corporate governance of such companies.

Also, in Luxembourg the management of the company is strictly limited to its board. Should a shareholder be directly involved in the management of the company, he or she may be deemed a de facto director and face civil or criminal liability, or both, and generally be liable under the same circumstances as the appointed directors[7].

Another example of the shareholders' voting rights being limited is included in Switzerland's Code of Obligations and established that a company may limit the voting rights of shareholders to a certain percentage (usually between 2 and 5 per cent), above which the registration with voting rights in the company's share register may be refused, thus making the shareholders' voting rights capped at the relevant percentage limit. Through this feature, a company may also be able to limit coalitions between shareholders[8]. Also, in Switzerland, shareholders of a Swiss company have no right to request direct access to the company's shareholder register, this aspect not making the decision process smooth at all, since shareholders may not be aware of other shareholders with similar interests in the company. However, a most welcomed provision of the the Swiss Ordinance against Excessive Compensation (the Ordinance), which entered into effect on 1 January 2014, states that any institutional representation of shareholders can be done only through an independent proxy elected annually at the shareholders' meeting, and no longer through a company representative[9].

In contrast with the Swiss limiting laws blocking shareholders for having access to the shareholders' registry, in the United Kingdom, under Section 116, Section 809 and Section 811 of the Companies Act[10], shareholders have the right to inspect and copy a company's register of members and any register of beneficial interests. This disclose of the company register allows other shareholders to be identified and subsequently communicated with, or (in circumstances where the directors of a company have failed to comply with a shareholder's requisition) allow the interested shareholder to call the general meeting itself at the company's expense (Section 305).

Also, in the United Kingdom, shareholder's rights in connection to the manner in which a vote is cast are firmly regulated. In this respect, under the Companies Act, a shareholder who holds at least 5 per cent of a company's issued share capital to require the directors of a company to obtain an independent report on any poll taken or to be taken at a general meeting of the company (Section 342).

4. The shareholders' Directive

In 2017, the European Council adopted a revised version of the EU Shareholder Rights Directive, applicable from June 2019[11] (the "2017 Shareholders Rights Directive"). Topics include the identification of shareholders, rules that require investors to be transparent about how they invest and how they engage with companies they invest in, voting rights concerning executive compensation (say on pay), and transparency on and shareholder engagement in respect of related party transactions.

The 2017 EU Shareholders Rights Directive is an amending Directive which shall require transposition into each Member State's national law and is expected to be implemented during the second part of 2019.

For the purpose of ensuring better transparency within European companies, the 2017 Shareholder

[6] C. com. Articles L. 225-18; L. 225-105.
[7] Tom Barnes, The Shareholder Rights and Activism Review, Third Edition, 2018, London, Law Business Research Ltd., p. 132.
[8] Tom Barnes, The Shareholder Rights and Activism Review, Third Edition, 2018, London, Law Business Research Ltd.,p. 129.
[9] Tom Barnes, The Shareholder Rights and Activism Review, Third Edition, 2018, London, Law Business Research Ltd.,p. 125.
[10] Section 116, Section 809 and Section 811 of the United Kingdom Companies Act.
[11] Directive (EU) 2017/828 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 17 May 2017 amending Directive 2007/36/EC as regards the encouragement of long-term shareholder engagement.

Rights Directive regulates the company's right to identify their shareholders and request such identification in connection to shareholders holding more than a certain percentage of shares or voting rights. Such a percentage shall not exceed 0,5 %. Also, in case an intermediary such as an investment firm, a credit institution, or central security depository, is involved in the chain between the company and its shareholders, the companies are allowed, within the limits set out above, to request that intermediary to provide information regarding the shareholders' identity, without such a circumstance being deemed as a breach of legal provisions. This obligation stems both from a necessity for more transparency within the corporate governance and from the role of the intermediary, who provides services of safekeeping of shares, administration of shares or maintenance of securities accounts on behalf of shareholders or other persons.

Additionaly, the 2017 Shareholders Rights Directive establishes the right of the shareholder to request and obtain information from the intermediary and the intermediaries are required to transmit the following information, without delay, from the company to the shareholder or to a third party nominated by the shareholder:

a) the information which the company is required to provide to the shareholder, to enable the shareholder to exercise rights flowing from its shares, and which is directed to all shareholders in shares of that class; or
b) where the information referred to in point (a) is available to shareholders on the website of the company, a notice indicating where on the website that information can be found.

The role of the intermediary is further increased by the 2017 Shareholders Rights Directive, to the extent that the intermediary becomes a de facto proxy on behalf of the shareholder. Article 3c of the 2017 Shareholders Rights Directive states that intermediaries facilitate the exercise of the rights by the shareholder, including the right to participate and vote in general meetings. The intermediary's attributions in this respect comprise but are not limited to one of the following:

a) the intermediary makes the necessary arrangements for the shareholder or a third party nominated by the shareholder to be able to exercise themselves the rights;
b) the intermediary exercises the rights flowing from the shares upon the explicit authorisation and instruction of the shareholder and for the shareholder's benefit.

Another measure introduced by the 2017 Shareholders Directive for the protection of shareholders and their voting rights refers to the possibility for the shareholder to receive a written confirmation of the receipt of its vote when it is cast electronically. Additionally, the 2017 Shareholders Directive states that after the general meeting, the shareholder or a third party nominated by the shareholder can obtain, at least upon request, confirmation that their votes have been validly recorded and counted by the company, unless that information is already available to them.

The European Commission summaries the challenging requirements investors will face in a Q+A on its website[12], and the conclusions of the survey reveal that investors remain poorly informed and under-prepared for these paradigm shifts with just over half (58%) of participants aware of the Directive.

Irrespective of the conclusions of said survey, it appears that the general professional views[13] with respect to the amendments of the Shareholders Rights Directive are that the Directive represents a historic opportunity to address some of the systemic problems in capital markets and ensure a more sustainable capitalism functioning in a fairer and more transparent way in the interests of all stakeholders.

5. Conclusions

From a regulatory perspective, increased transparency and accountability reflected in European legislation are likely to reinforce the trend of safeguarding and extending shareholders' voting rights and may potentially strengthen minority or activist shareholders. While the traditional strategy among corporate legal systems in Europe focuses mainly on the company, the new emerging generation of legislators tend to shift the interest on the protection and active involvement of shareholders, instead of the central role of the company itself.

In support of this conclusion, the 2017 Shareholders Rights Directive seeks to make it easier for shareholders to exercise their rights, and facilitate cross-border voting, thus alining European legislation with the international activism trends of minority shareholders emerging and developed in the USA.

References

- St. D. Carpenaru, Romanian Commercial Law Treaty, 6th Edition, C.H. Bech, 2019, Bucharest,
- St. Carpenaru, S.David, C. Predoiu, Gh. Piperea, Commented Companies Law, 4th Edition, C.H. Beck, 2009, Bucharest;
- V. Nemes, Commercial Law, 3rd Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2018, Bucharest;

[12] http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_MEMO-17-592_en.htm.
[13] https://corpgov.law.harvard.edu/2019/04/04/the-shareholder-rights-directive-ii/.

- Tom Barnes, The Shareholder Rights and Activism Review, Third Edition, 2018, London, Law Business Research Ltd;
- Directive (EU) 2017/828 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 17 May 2017 amending Directive 2007/36/EC as regards the encouragement of long-term shareholder engagement;
- http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_MEMO-17-592_en.htm;
- https://corpgov.law.harvard.edu/2019/04/04/the-shareholder-rights-directive-ii/;
- Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies;
- United Kingdom Companies Act;
- French Commercial Code;
- Swiss Code of Obligations.

CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE CONDITION, AS A MODALITY OF THE LEGAL ACT

Valentin COCEAN

Abstract

The provisions of the new civil code did not bring significant changes to the matter of modalities, instead they clarified some aspects, which in the past, due to lack of legislative clarification, could spark controversy. Nevertheless, for an accurate understanding of the condition as a modality of the legal act an analysis is still necessary, particularly regarding the role of the parties' will and their conduct in relation to the condition included in the contract.

Keywords: condition, the realization of the condition, the will of the parties, abuse of right, obligation

1. Introduction

The herein article's purpose is not to present the issue of condition as a modality of the legal act. For the most part, looking at practice and specialized doctrine, this issue does not raise special problems. However, there are a few aspects, mostly related to the role of the parties' will, which have been neither sufficiently analyzed in juridical literature, nor encountered in litigation brought before courts. These aspects will be subject to a, far from exhaustive, analysis in the study hereunder.

Firstly we shall take on the matter of the distinction between condition and the obligation pertaining to one of the contractual parties, a distinction which not always is easy to make.

Secondly, we shall emphasize the role that the parties' will plays in the qualification of a provision regarding a modality of a legal act, specifically in the correct assessment of its nature in relation to what the parties envisioned upon conclusion of the contract.

Finally, we shall analyze the effect that the parties' conduct has in establishing if the condition has realized or not, the limitations of their freedom to act related to the type of condition provided in the contract.

These issues have been summarily treated in specialized literature, therefore the idea of this study. Pretending to neither present new aspects, nor to give definitive verdicts in issues hereunder, the article presents the author's opinion, making propositions for ways to look at and solve possible situations which might occur in practice and in which contractual provisions including conditions would need a more detailed analysis, one that exceeds the standards in the matter.

Thusly, we shall not include aspects related to condition as a modality of the legal act which have already been treated by both doctrine and practice, but we shall only touch issues which might raise controversy, establishing guidelines which could be used to clarify them.

2. Content

The condition as a modality of the legal act, represents a future and uncertain event upon the happening of which the efficacy or abolition of a subjective right and its corelative obligation depend.[1]

Previously, according to the old regulation, the condition was defined as the future event upon which the creation of the subjective right and its corelative obligation depended.

The wording chosen by the lawmaker in the 2009 Civil Code (art. 1399 – "affected by condition is the obligation whose efficacy or abolition depend on a future and uncertain event") raised, however, the issue of the validity of the old definition[2].

Some authors considered that the old definition remains valid, the lawmaker's reference to the efficacy of the obligation having no significance[3]. Others felt the need to note the terminology change, without analyzing its meaning[4].

Finally, other authors correctly noted that, without bringing a new solution, we are witnessing a change in terminology which much better reflects the regime and effects of suspensive condition[5], as the obligation affected by it exists but is not effective.

* Research Assistent, Phd, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, valentin.cocean@zrp.ro

[1] E. Chelaru, The General Theory of Civil Law, C.H.Beck Publishing House, 2014, page 150.

[2] G. Boroi, Civil Law Lecture. The General Part, 2nd Edition, revised and completed, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012, page 192.

[3] L.Pop, I.F. Popa, S.I. Vidu, Civil Law Lecture. The Obligations, Universul Juridid Publishing House, 2015, page 433; C.T. Ungureanu, Civil Law. The General Part. The Persons, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012, page 190

[4] E.J. Prediger, Introduction to the Study of Civil Law. The Civil Legal Relation, the Legal Act and the Statute of Limitation, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2011, page151; T. Prescure, R. Matei, Civil Law. The General Part. The Persons, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012, page 178.

[5] Fl.A. Baias, E. Chelaru, R. Constantinovici, I. Macovei. The New Civil Code. Comments by Article, C.H. Beck Publishing House, 2012, page 1478; E. Chelaru, op.cit. page 150

This is how one can explain the fact that the creditor under suspensive condition has the possibility to take action in order to preserve their right or that the acquirer under suspensive condition of a real estate right can make a provisional note in the land registry. The same way, this is the justification for the possibility of estranging the conditional right and, also, for the creditor's possibility to ask and obtain warranties for their claim.

Finally, even the retroactive effects the happening of the suspensive condition has find a better justification in considering the affected obligation as existing from the very signing of the legal act, but as lacking efficacy until the happening of the condition.

Beyond this, ultimately terminological, issue, the matter of condition is treated similarly in specialized doctrine. Therefore, we shall not reiterate general aspects, instead we shall jump right to the ones targeted by the herein study.

2.1. The qualification of a contractual provision as being a condition or as establishing an obligation incumbent on one party.

Surely, this issue can only regard the mixed condition or the one entirely dependent on the will of the obligor, on principle resolutive (because it could be mistaken for an obligation whose failure to fulfill could result in termination, leading to the retroactive annulment of the legal act's effects) and only when the wording of the contractual provision is not clear.

For an event to be qualified as a (resolutive) condition it needs to be external to the legal relation generated by the act, different from the execution of the benefit intrinsic to the legal relation created by the respective act. If one of the parties of the legal relation undertakes an obligation, this cannot be deemed as condition as a modality, even if the failure to fulfill it leads to snactions, including, as the case may be, the lack of effects of the legal act.

As far as it can be deduced from the wording of the contractual provisions, the consequence agreed upon by the parties for the happening or not-happening of the respective event (obligation) is also relevant. If this gives the other party the option of asking for termination of the legal act, then we shall, clearly, be talking of a simple obligation. The appearance of the possibility to ask for termination or resolution of the contract cannot be the effect of a resolutive condition, but it is specific to the culpable failure to fulfill the counterparty's obligations.

A resolutive condition would have a different consequence, respectively the by-law, automatic dissolution, as soon as the condition would happen (without any other manifestation of will being necessary) of the right affected by it.

An important role will surely be played by the rules of interpretation of the legal act, which will serve to establish the real will of the parties.

A greater difficulty would appear when qualifying a provision in a concession which would regard a certain conduct on behalf of the beneficiary. Respectively, the issue would rise of qualifying that provision as either a burden or a condition.

The difficulty rises from the fact that, usually, the burden establishes an obligation which is also exterior to the basic relation regarding the transmittal of the right from the one that disposes to the beneficiary.

Aside from the interpretation of the parties' will, including assessing the consequence they projected in case of failure to fulfill the requirement set in the contract regarding the action or inaction of the beneficiary, we can imagine criteria which, under no pretense of infallibility, could help clarify the respective provision.

Thus, we think it should be deemed as a condition and not as a burden the provision establishing a certain conduct for the beneficiary which will not exclusively depend on his own will. The patrimonial criterion can also constitute a clue, meaning the possibility of pecuniary evaluation of the conduct set for the beneficiary is suitable rather to a burden than a condition.

2.2. The distinction between term and condition, in relation to the will of the parties.

At first sight, the distinction between the two modalities of the legal act raises no difficulty, the criterion being the certainty of the future event's happening.

However, we must not forget that the matter of the legal act is governed by the principles of the juridical will, respectively the one of free will and that of real will.

Thusly, the parties will be free to choose the legal regime to govern the contractual provision regarding a future event, notwithstanding the degree of certainty of its happening.

But even when the choice of the parties was not direct or if it was not clearly stated, it is necessary to establish the way they foresaw the future event. Meaning, if the parties envisioned that event as certain to happen, then it would be deemed as a term, even if in reality the happening is not certain.

This solution was expressly provided by the 2009 Civil Code, under art. 1420, thus consecrating once more the principle of the real will of the parties.

Thereby, art. 1420 of the Civil Code provides that "if an event which the parties deem as a term does not happen, the obligation becomes due on the date the event should have normally happened". Also, it specifically states that, in such case, the legal regulations regarding term are applicable.

The assessment of what the parties thought regarding the respective event must not be made objectively, meaning we should not take into account if the parties had the possibility of observing that the event was not certain. What matters here is just the way the parties assessed the event upon conclusion of the contract. Notwithstanding of the fact that they knew or could have known that the event was uncertain to happen, the only relevant fact is the way they assessed it.

For example, if the contract concluded between the parties included a provision which established that an obligation would be executed on the day of a certain concert, which is settled and public, one can assess that the parties deemed the happening of the concert as being certain event and, therefore, qualify the respective provision as containing a term and not a condition, although, objectively, the event was not certain to happen.

2.3. The relation between the parties' conduct and the happening or not happening of the condition.

We shall not reiterate here the basic rules, set by the legal dispositions and not challenged by doctrine.

We shall only refer to special situations related to mixed or potestative conditions.

Art. 1405, par.1 of the 2009 Civil Code provides that, if the obligor under condition prevents the its happening, then the condition will be deemed as having happened. And the second paragraph states that, should the party interested in the happening of the condition, ill-fatedly determinate such happening, the condition will be deemed as not having happened.

The text must be understood as regarding both the suspensive and the resolutive condition, as the case may be. We must not omit the fact that, if for one party the condition is suspensive, for the other it can be viewed as resolutive, and the other way around. Thusly, we must not fail to observe the symmetry of the two types of conditions. The resolutive condition sets a situation opposite to that resulting from the inclusion of a suspensive one. In the case of a rights translative act, for example, should the acquirer receive the right affected by a resolutive condition, then the transmitter could be seen as having the respective right under suspensive condition. (consisting of the same event which constitutes the resolutive condition).

However, what we need to establish regarding article 1405 of the 2009 Civil Code is the reason it was adopted. The purpose was to avoid situations in which the one profiting from the happening or not happening of the condition would act in order to determinate or, respectively, prevent the happening of the event established as such.

This purpose is found both in the hypothesis of suspensive condition and in that of the resolutive one. And where the same purpose exists we must apply the same rule (ubi eadem est ratio, ibi eadem solutio esse debet), we must give the same solution.

The principle of good-faith, however, bounds us to analyze the legal disposition from a broader perspective. Thus, it must be considered that the provision sets a general rule, that which imposes verifying the parties' conduct regarding the event stated as being a condition (and, of course, the intent of the parties).

The law moralizes the situation, by sanctioning the lack of loyalty of the party which stands to profit from the happening or not happening of the condition and acts ill-fatedly to that purpose[6].

One might object that, when the condition is entirely dependent on the will of the obligor, the party upon whose will the happening of the condition depends has the freedom to act as they wish, however, only if their conduct is not abusive.

There is no issue in the hypothesis in which the party acting towards the happening or not happening of the condition is not the one of whose will the happening of the event depends on, as per contract. In such case, the dispositions of art. 1405 of the Civl Code would apply.

The necessity for sanctioning such conduct in the event that the condition was not agreed on by the parties as being dependent of the will of the party acting towards the happening or no happening of the condition is evident.

Let's take a classic example. The hypothesis in which Primus sells to Secundus a certain good under the condition that the later gets married. It would obviously be a potestative condition on behalf of Secundus. In this case, should Primus act (for example, by spreading depreciating rumors regarding Secundus) towards preventing (or enabling – insomuch as the condition was suspensive or resolutive, positive or negative) the happening of the condition (at any rate, towards the outcome which would profit them), their behavior would represent abusive conduct, which must be sanctioned, as it is unequivocal that the parties did not intend for the fate of the contract to depend on the will of Primus.

We also consider that, in the event in which the conduct chosen by the party upon whose will the happening of the condition depends, as per contract, is an obviously abusive one, by which, without any justification, failing to abide by legal dispositions, acting towards the happening or not happening of the condition, the aforementioned legal dispositions are also applicable.

Moreover, we think that, without a breach of legal provisions being necessary, insomuch as the parties conduct meets the requirements to be qualified as an abuse of right, the same solution must apply[7]. Naturally, the interested party must prove that the requirements for abusive conduct qualification were met.

In other words, it is exactly in this type of situations that lies the reason for the adoption of article 1405 of the Civil Code, respectively that of preventing the beneficiary of the happening or not happening of the condition (weather it was not deemed to be potestative as far as they were concerned or, being potestative, their conduct is abusive) from acting towards the prevention or, respectively, the realization of the event.

[6] Ph. Malaurie, L. Aynes, Ph. Stoffel-Munk, Civil Law. The Obligations, translation into Romanian, Wolters Kluwer Publishing House, 2007 page 745.

[7] To the same purpose, also see E. J. Prediger, op.cit., page 154

We must also observe the provisions of art. 1404, par.1 of the 2009 Civil Code, which state that the happening of the condition is assessed in accordance with the will of the parties[8]. And we do not think one could allege that by the happening of the condition the parties would have envisioned a situation in which one of them, even the one on whose will the realization of the event depended, would act ill-fatedly, securing for their own the benefit of a right as a result of committing an abuse of right.

This conclusion we deem valid not only with regard to the mixed condition, but also for the simple potestative or purely potestative one.

The only case in which this solution might not apply is the one of an obligation undertaken under a purely potestative, resolutive condition on behalf of the obligor. Here, the validity of the obligation is acknowledged[9], resulting from a per a contrario interpretation of art. 1403 of the Civil Code, but the same applies to the obligor retaining the right to end the obligation whenever they may wish.

We consider that we must not exclude in such case either, the solution of deeming the condition as not having happened, insomuch as the obligor's action towards the happening of the event could be qualified as abusive. However, in such a hypothesis, proving the abuse would be extremely difficult.

Otherwise, the purely potestative condition raises no particular isssues, given that, if it is a suspensive one and depends on the will of the obligor, the conditional obligation would not be valid, on the other hand, should it depend on the will of the creditor, art. 1405 of the Civil Code would not apply, as the creditor has no interest in acting for precluding the suspensive condition from happening or for enabling the happening of a resolutive condition.

Finally, we consider that a distinction must be made between the stipulation of the condition in the sole interest of one of the parties and the case in which the happening of a condition depends on the will of one of the parties, therefore we reached the conclusion that giving up on the condition, possible as per art. 1406 of the Civil Code as far as the condition has not happened yet, will not fall under the rules of art. 1405, as the requirement regarding interest is not met[10].

Conclusions

As we have previously shown, the herein study did not intend to analyze the entire problematics of the matter of condition, but only some aspects, prone to raise difficulties in practice.

We particularly targeted the role the will of the parties plays in qualifying a contractual provision regarding a future event and as a way of assessing the happening or not happening of a condition.

Surely, we do not pretend to have solved the difficulties which will probably appear while applying the legal dispositions regarding the condition as a modality of the legal act, nor do we assess our proposals as being absolute. This article is an attempt to support practitioners, courts and the involved parties' representatives, who will be put in the position of answering the aforementioned questions.

Naturally, this issue will make for much ampler analyses in specialized literature and the advanced solutions will either be confirmed or rebutted by the courts' practice.

References

- G. Boroi, Civil Law Lecture. The General Part, 2nd Edition, revised and completed, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012;
- E. Chelaru, The General Theory of Civil Law, C.H.Beck Publishing House, 2014;
- L.Pop, I.F. Popa, S.I. Vidu, Civil Law Lecture. The Obligations, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2015;
- C.T. Ungureanu, Civil Law. The General Part. The Persons, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012;
- E.J. Prediger, Introduction to the Study of Civil Law. The Civil Legal Relation, the Legal Act and the Statute of Limitation, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2011;
- T. Prescure, R. Matei, Civil Law. The General Part. The Persons, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012;
- Fl.A. Baias, E. Chelaru, R. Constantinovici, I. Macovei. The New Civil Code. Comments by Article, C.H. Beck Publishing House, 2012;
- Ph. Malaurie, L. Aynes, Ph. Stoffel-Munk, Civil Law. The Obligations, translation into Romanian, Wolters Kluwer Publishing House, 2007;
- P. Vasilescu, Civil Law. The Obligations, Hamangiu Publishing House 2012.

[8] P. Vasilescu, Civil Law. Obligations, Hamangiu Publishing House 2012, page 405
[9] G.Boroi, op.cit., page 194
[10] For an analysis on giving up on a condition, see Fl.A. Baias, E. Chelaru, R. Constantinovici, I. Macovei, op.cit., page 1483.

UNPREDICTABILITY IN THE LOAN CONTRACT

Georgiana COMAN[*]

Abstract

Referring to the conditions of the unpredictability to the substantive elements of the loan agreement, it can be observed that this institution could intervene when the exceptional circumstance of its essence would affect the object of the contract. More specifically, in the case of CHF (Swiss national currency) loans, unpredictability may arise as a result of an exceptional circumstance that would exponentially increase the value of this currency relative to the Romanian leu.

Keywords: unpredictability, loan contract, instance, binding force, swiss currency

1. Introduction

Under Romanian law, unpredictability has existed for quite a long period of time, as a mere theory, without finding legal consecration. Since 2011, with the entry into force of the new Civil Code, unpredictability has become an institution of civil law governed by the provisions of article 1271. Thus, the Romanian legislator tries to align the Romanian legislation with the European tendency that is to regulate the institution of unpredictability or, in other words, the possibility of revising the contract. Moreover, lately, we can observe that all the European states are trying to harmonize their legislation in the field of contracts with the legislations of the other states, uniformity which has as cause the freedom of movement of persons and goods.

The way in which the institution of unpredictability was regulated in the Romanian Civil Code was basically influenced by the Draft Common Frame of Reference (DCFR) Rules, which in paragraph III 1: 110, second paragraph, provides for the possibility of the court intervening in the event of an exceptional situation in the performance of a unilateral contract or legal act that makes the debtor's obligation excessively onerous. Also, the Unidroit Principles which, although regulates the international commercial contracts, in Article 6.2.2 speaks of the hardship clause and defines it as when the occurrence of events has fundamentally altered the balance of the contract either because the value of the obligations of a party have increased, or because the amount of benefit that a party receives has reduced.

Unpredictability appears as an exception to the effect of the principle of binding contract force.

Or, in other words, it is a limitation of the principle of binding force, not a violation of it.

The express regulation of the establishment of the unpredictability was necessary for its application to be carried out only if all the conditions provided by the law were observed. The purpose of the binding force of contracts is mainly to ensure the stability and security of legal relations. As an exception to this principle, unpredictability must be applied with caution and always in compliance with all the conditions laid down by the legislator.

Lately, unpredictability is often invoked in cases concerning the execution of the loan agreement or contracts that represent the variants of the former, contracts where the loan was granted in the Swiss national currency.

In order to better understand the notion of unpredictability, it is necessary to present the main features of the principle of binding force of the contract.

2. Unpredictability - exception to the principle of binding force of the contract

Along with the principle of relativity and irrevocability, the principle of the mandatory force of civil legal acts (pacta sunt servanda) indicates how the effects of the civil legal act occur. This principle is explicitly provided by the provisions of article 1270 C.civ. according to which: (1) The valid contract concluded has the force of law between the contracting parties. The contract shall be amended or terminate only with the consent of the parties or for causes authorized by law.

The following conclusions can be drawn from Article 1270: under a contract, the parties are required to perform their own obligations, even if their execution has become more onerous either because of the increase in the cost of fulfilling their obligation or because of the decrease in the amount of the consideration as indicated paragraph 1 of Article 1270. At the same time, the amendment or termination of a contract has as its main source the will of the parties.

Further, the legislator wanted to strengthen the principle of binding force of the contract, mentioning in Article 1271 paragraph 1 C.civ. the fact that the parties are held to perform their obligations, even if their execution has become more onerous either because of the increase in the cost of fulfilling their obligation or because of the decrease in the value of the consideration.

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, Nicolae Titulescu University of Bucharest (e-mail: georgiana_mail@yahoo.com)

Therefore, the fact that the execution of one of the parties or, on the contrary, of both parties has become more onerous does not justify removing the principle of binding force of the contract without the consent of the party to whose benefit the execution is.

However, the legislator considered a remedy, a possibility to rescue the contract, in the event of a break in the contractual balance due to the change of circumstances in an exceptional way, circumstances that were not considered by the parties at the beginning of the contract

3. The notion of unpredictability and its conditions in the light of the Civil Code

3.1 The notion of unpredictability

According to art. 1271 alin.2 C.civ. if the execution of the contract has become excessively onerous due to an exceptional change of circumstances which would make it manifestly unfair to oblige the debtor to perform the obligation, the court may order: a) the adaptation of the contract, in order to distribute fairly between the parties the losses and the profits resulting from the change circumstances; b) the termination of the contract, at the time and under the conditions it establishes.

Therefore, unpredictability implies an exceptional change in the circumstances taken into consideration by the parties at the beginning of the contract, circumstances that would make it manifestly unfair to oblige the debtor to execute the obligation in the manner agreed upon by the parties initially. A first condition for unpredictability is the existence of a contract. Although the DCFR Rules governing unpredictability apply to unilateral acts, the Romanian legislator chose to apply this institution only to sinalagmatic (bilateral) contracts.

This paragraph also indicates the mandatory condition for the existence of a situation of unpredictability, namely, that the execution of the contract has become excessively onerous. At the same time, it is clear from this paragraph that another condition must be fulfilled in order to ascertain the interference of the unpredictability, namely to be a successive contract, because in the case of contracts with a sudden execution, uno ictu, the moment of the beginning of the contract, corresponds to the moment of the execution of the obligation, or the execution does not take place at a very long time from the date of beginning of the contract so that an exceptional situation would not be possible. The only situation in which an exceptional situation might arise during the performance of a contract with a sudden execution would be the one in which the obligation of one party would be affected by a suspensive term. Also, the contract must be an honourable one, because if we were in the case of a free-of-charge contract, there is no benefit from both sides, so even the contractual balance would not be affected. Last but not least, the contract must not have finished at the time when the court is required to find the unpredictability

With regard to the classification of contracts in commutative contracts and random contracts, in the event of unpredictability, it can only be a commutative contract where the parties at the time of beginning of the contract knew the rights and obligations arising from that contract and their extent determined or at least determinable (Article 1173 (1) C.I.). The explanation for which the institution of the unpredictability would not find application in the case of random contracts is simple. In the case of these latter contracts, even the parties, by their will, offer at least one of them a chance of winning and at the same time expose them to the risk of loss, which depends on a future and uncertain event (art.1173 paragraph 2 C.civ .). Thus, the premise of unpredictability is even a feature of this type of contract.

The Consumption Loan Contract (mutuum) fulfils the above-mentioned conditions regarding the category of contracts to which the institution of unpredictability might apply, being a sinalagmatic contract, with successive, commutative and pecuniary execution.

The consumption loan contract is defined by article 2158 paragraph 1 C.civ.. According to this article the consumption loan contract is the contract by which the lender gives to the borrower a sum of money or other such fungible and consumable goods by nature and the borrower undertakes to return after a certain period the same amount of money or quantity of goods of the same nature and quality. The legislator therefore established the principle of nominalism in relation to the consumption loan contract for money. Moreover, with regard to the money-lending contract, the legislator sought to reinforce this principle by stipulating in article 2164 paragraph 2 that if the loan is borne by a sum of money, the borrower is not required to return only the nominal amount received, whatever its variation, unless otherwise agreed by the parties.

Also, paragraph 2 of article 2159 C.civ. appreciates that Unless otherwise proven, the loan involving a sum of money is presumed to be forfeit. Thus, a variant of the Consumption Loan Contract is the interest-bearing loan agreement. This implies that under the contract a term of payment of a sum of money or other goods of the same kind shall also arise insofar as there are no particular rules on the validity and execution of that obligation. In other words, when there is no other contract called. The interest included in the contract price may be determined in cash or other benefits under any title or denomination the borrower undertakes as the equivalent of the use of capital. Also, according to article 2169 C.civ. The amount of money borrowed is interest-bearing from the day it was handed over to the borrower.

Referring to the conditions of the unpredictability to the substantive elements of the loan agreement, it can be observed that this institution could intervene when the exceptional circumstance of its essence would affect the object of the contract. More specifically, in the case of CHF (Swiss national currency) loans, unpredictability may arise as a result of an exceptional circumstance that would exponentially increase the value of this currency relative to the Romanian leu.

At present, at national level, there are a lot of loan contracts or varieties of this contract. In many cases, the parties have established the object of the contract in a currency other than the national one, particularly in the Swiss national currency (CHF). In close connection with the determination of the object of the contract in another currency, there is the interest provided by the parties, which was in principle set at a lower amount than if the object of the contract had been set in the national currency. Characteristic of these contracts is the exchange rate fluctuation because the borrower has to repay the amount of money borrowed in the same currency in which it was agreed, according to the principle of nominalism. However, the conversion of the national currency into the borrowed currency can mean for the borrower a greater or lesser financial effort depending on the currency exchange. Could the contract's object, in case this object is established in another currency than the national one, change the character of the contract from a commutative to a random one? It is a question to which we would in principle be tempted to give a negative answer because the evolution of the financial and banking market that determines the value of a currency in relation to the other, should not be an uncertain but rather predictable event. However, analyzing the evolution of a certain currency, namely the Swiss franc, in relation to all other national currencies, the answer may not be so simple.

Returning to the consumption loan contracts for pecuniary interest signed on the territory of Romania in the last 10 years, it can easily be noticed that the loan, in a fairly large proportion, was established in Swiss francs. By making only a small comparison, between the value of a Swiss franc by reference to the Romanian leu on January 1, year 2008 (2.29 lei) and January 1, year 2019 (3.99 lei), it can easily be noticed that the national currency has experienced a depreciation more than considerable during this period.

In connection with this surprising evolution of the Swiss national currency, it was also the observance of the obligations of the borrowers, which became obviously more onerous. Therefore, there are many cases in which the parties have requested, through the courts, the adaptation of these contracts as a result of unpredictability.

Before considering the possible solutions available to courts in these cases, it is necessary to briefly outline the conditions imposed by the legislator for establishing the existence of a case of unpredictability.

3.2. Conditions of unpredictability

Article 1271 paragraph 3 C.civ. provides for the conditions under which the court may intervene in the contract concluded by the parties. These are:

a) the change of circumstances occurred after the beginning of the contract;
b) the change of circumstances and the extent thereof have not and could not reasonably have been taken into account by the debtor at the time of the conclusion of the contract;
c) the debtor did not take the risk of changing the circumstances and could not reasonably be considered to have assumed that risk;
d) the debtor has attempted, within a reasonable time and in good faith, to negotiate the reasonable and equitable adjustment of the contract.

In the case of consumption loan contracts was established in the Swiss currency, previously this currency has an important evolution, it can easily be said that the condition that the change of circumstances occurs after the conclusion of the contract, is satisfied. Also, having regard to the previous ratio between the two coins, it follows that, in principle, the second condition, namely that the change of circumstances and the extent of the circumstances were not and could not be envisaged by the debtor, reasonably at the time of the conclusion of the contract, is fulfilled. However, it is important to note that both the exceptional circumstance that has occurred and the effects of the imbalance that has taken place must occur after the beginning of the contract. According to the doctrine [1], in order to verify the condition of an exceptional situation, it is of interest that the unpredictability as well as the economic-financial aspect - which must characterize the effect on the contract - should relate not only to the nature or the cause of the event, but also to its effects on the performance of contractual obligations.

As regards the third condition, which presupposes that the debtor did not take the risk of changing the circumstances and could not reasonably be considered to have assumed that risk, the opinions are different. It could be said that a person who sign a loan contract in a currency other than the national one and, in fact, the one in which it is remunerated, has automatically assumed the risk of a currency change, regardless of the level or magnitude of that change? As mentioned above, the conclude of these contracts, in the circumstances described, was also based on other benefits for the borrower, in principle, less interest than in the case of contracts where the refund was agreed in the national currency. Another benefit was, in some cases, fixed interest, not variable. That is why analyzing the fulfillment of this condition is complex and involves considering all these elements.

It should be remembered that the contractual imbalance must make the execution of the contract excessively onerous for the one who invokes unpredictability. Therefore, many claimants in the filed cases before the courts, together with the exchange rate of these coins and the change in their personal financial conditions, invoke the courts also from this point of view to make appeals. Obviously, while the proof of Swiss currency development in relation to the Romanian leu is at the hands of the court, in terms of changing the borrowers' financial situation, it must be proved by the party according to art. 259 Civil Procedure Code.

[1] Conditions of Contractual Contradiction between Traditions and Current Affairs-STUDIA-C.Zamşa, Romanian Business Law Review no.6 / 2009

We also note that the court should also take into account the fact that a certain degree of risk was assumed by the parties at the conclusion of the contract. As the Constitutional Court has pointed out in Decision No.623 / 2016, the contract itself entails an inherent risk voluntarily assumed by the two parties to the contract, based on their autonomy of will, a principle that characterizes the matter of the conclusion of the contract, and one above - added which could not be the subject in particular of a prediction by any of them, a risk which goes beyond the contractual power of the contracting parties and which involves the interventions of elements which could not be taken into account at the time of a quo. Imprudence aims to call over-added risk and, in the context of its intervention, it is meant to reap the benefits the parties have been obliged to under the new economic / legal realities. It is not intended to revert to the benefits at the time of the conclusion of the credit agreement or to the risk accepted by the parties at the same time, being therefore alien to them, but provides a legal basis for the adjustment or termination of the contract (... ) Adaptation takes place when the social utility of the contract can be maintained, while the cessation when the new conditions intervene, you are forgiving the social utility. It follows from the above that the adaptation of the contract during its execution to the new reality is equivalent to the maintenance of its social utility, in other words it allows further execution of the contract by rebalancing the benefits[2].

As the legislator does not offer clear criteria regarding the notion of "changing circumstances", a notion underpinning the institution of unpredictability, I believe that the courts should take into account both previous jurisprudence and possible doctrinal criteria, but taking into account, the current socio-economic reality. Moreover, even regulating the institution of unpredictability in th Civil Code, although it has the role of establishing very clearly the conditions of the unpredictability, one might say that it encourages the parties to invoke the unpredictability, not just a doctrinal theory.

As regards the latter condition, namely that the debtor has tried, within a reasonable time and in good faith, to negotiate the reasonable and equitable adjustment of the contract, it is necessary to consider whether that condition falls within the scope of the notion of a prior procedure governed by art. 193 C.pr.civ. In other words, if the lack of negotiation would constitute a fine of non-receipt in the case of a petition for the purpose that regards unpredictability. According to art. 193 paragraph 1 of the Civil Procedure Code, the court may be referred only after a preliminary procedure, if the law expressly so provides. Proof of the completion of the prior procedure shall be attached to the request for a summons. At the same time, according to paragraph 2, the failure to carry out the preliminary procedure can only be invoked by the defendant by means of a grievance, under penalty of decay.

By virtue of this last condition, it can be said that the legislator provided for two steps to establish the interference of the unpredictability[3]: a stage of the negotiation initiated by the debtor in order to adapt the contract and a court stage of the court's intervention at the request of any party dissatisfied with the election of the phase negotiations-be for the cancellation or for the adjustment of the contract.

Regarding the terms of good faith, fair and reasonable, we note that while the good faith was presumed by the legislator through art. 14 C.civ., regarding the reasonable term and the equitable term, the legislator left the judgment of the court (if a lawsuit is pending), the definition of these terms. Thus, the judge has a great margin of discretion in this regard. However, I consider that the judge should refer to a diligent and prudent person for the consideration of the reasonableness of the condition. Obviously, even in the case of good faith, the court might find that the party had an attitude from which the intention was that the negotiations would fail so that the presumption would be overturned. Such a situation would occur if the contract is to be canceled directly, but there is no agreement between the side.

Turning to the solutions that the court could decide if the conditions of the unpredictability were met, the legislator stipulated in article 1271 paragraph 2 C.civ. that if the performance of the contract became excessively onerous due to an exceptional change in the circumstances that would make it manifestly unfair to order the debtor to perform the obligation, the court may order: a) the adaptation of the contract in order to distribute fairly between the parties the losses and benefits changing circumstances; b) the termination of the contract, at the time and under the conditions it establishes. Could the solution decided by the court be influenced by the will of the parties? In principle, the answer should be negative because if both sides would like to terminate the contract, this would happen precisely as a result of the parties' agreement and not as a result of a court ruling. On the other hand, if only one party would request the termination of the contract, I believe that the court is not limited to the solution it can dispose of, and it is necessary to consider whether the adjustment of the contract would be feasible. The principle of availability provided by art. 9 C.civ. would not be defeated in this respect because the legislator, by the way he chose to regulate the institution of unpredictability, has made it clear that termination of the contract is to be ordered only if which would not be possible to adapt it. If the court has ordered the termination of the contract, the deadline set may only be one later.

[2] Constitutional Court Decision no.623 / 2016, paragraphs 96 and 97

[3] Cristina Zamşa, Imprevision in the light of the law on the application of the new Civil Code. Reflection of the new concept on the contract - Romanian Business Law Review, no. 5 of June 30, 2011

Regardless of which of the solutions would be ordered by the court, it should also have a fair distribution between the parties of the losses and benefits resulting from the change of circumstances or of the moment and conditions in which the termination of the contract occurs. Obviously, the parties may at any time until the process terminate, conclude a transaction by which they themselves establish these elements. In most cases, even by the petition to sue, the claimant also indicates the form in which he wishes to adjust the contract, namely the stabilization of the course of the Swiss franc to the one at the date of the conclusion of the contract. I believe that the courts should also consider the evolution of other currencies relative to the national currency, noting that the Romanian leu depreciated in general but differently from a percentage point of view. Inflation should also be considered. All of these elements and not only should be analyzed precisely so that the contractual imbalance is removed, and not just transmitted from one side to the other. Also, the institution of unpredictability should not be the way for a contractual party, through the court's appeal, to change the contractual conditions in an easy way.

In practice, in the case of interest-earning contracts where the object of the contract was established in the Swiss currency, it seems to be rather difficult for the courts to rule on how the unpredictability is going to take effect. The difficulty of such a solution results from the fact that these contracts are complex and, implicitly, the effects of such contracts are complex. Courts have to be cautious when they have the adaptation or termination of the contract, mostly because, in principle, the solution is contrary to the will of one of the contracting parties.

4. Differences between the regulation of the unpredictability in the French Civil Code to the Romanian Civil Code

Unlike the Romanian civil law, in the French Civil Code the legislator provided in Article 1195 expressly that during the period of prior negotiations between the parties in the event of an exceptional occurrence, the effects of the contract are not suspended. This solution is also expressly provided by the Unidroit Principles under Article 6.2.3 (2).

A further difference from the domestic regulation, the French legislature has made it necessary to bring legal action to a negotiation initiative and not to a proper negotiation. Thus, it is admitted that even the refusal of the other party to negotiate legitimizes the party invoking the imprudence to bring its claim before the courts.

5. Conclusions

Although more than 7 years have passed since the entry into force of the New Civil Code regulating the institution of unpredictability, the courts appear to be very cautious in order to review the loan agreements in which the loan was granted in the Swiss currency. This caution appears to be largely justified by the fact that the judge does not want, through his solution, to move the losses resulting from the change of circumstances from a part to the other and to create a new contractual imbalance. At the same time, this caution is both legitimate and necessary because the review of contracts by the court should not lead to the abolition of the principle of binding force of the contract. However, it is worth noting that several states chose not to give any law to the contract. This, together with the express regulation of the institution of unpredictability, undoubtedly leads to a greater margin of appreciation for the courts.

References

- Gabriel Boroi, Mona-Maria Pivniceru, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, Ioana Nicolae, Tudor-Vlad Rădulescu, Civil law files, 3rd edition, Hamangiu Publishing House 2018, Bucharest
- Răzvan Dincă, Special Civil Contracts in the New Civil Code, The Universe Juridic, Bucharest 2013
- Cristina Zamşa- STUDIA- Effects of Imprevision: Adaptation and Termination of the Contract, Between Negotiation and Dispute, Present and Future- Romanian Business Law Review, no. 7 of October 30, 2009
- Cristina Zamşa, Imprevision in the light of the law of application of the new Civil Code. Reflection of the new concept on the contract - Romanian Business Law Review, no. 5 of June 30, 2011
- Gabriel Tiţa -Nicolescu - The New Civil Code. Exceptions to the principle of mandatory contractual effects provided by the New Civil Code - Pandectele Române Magazine, no.11 of November 30, 2012

CONSUMER'S STATUS IN CROWD AND PEER TO PEER FINANCE

Monica CALU

Abstract

Taking into account the decrease in nominal yields of traditional savings products, consumers are increasingly attracted to alternative ways of investing, such as those offered by crowdfunding platforms. As control over the traditional financial sector has been strengthened after the crisis, new forms of financial intermediation have emerged, such as crowdfunding or peer-to-peer loans. Simple individuals and regular institutions use these types of platforms to lend money directly to consumers or businesses in order to make a financial return from interest payments and the repayment of capital over time.

Such services are usually provided by new market operators known to intensively digitize their processes, including technology support for credit analysis and payments settlement.

From the perspective of consumer protection, these are risky tools where protection is particularly necessary. It is likely that consumers will not understand the risks involved in the transaction, especially the value of the investment, and an additional problem is the reliability of the trading platforms.

Existing EU legislation does not harmonize consumer protection standards in the crowdfunding field and leaves the full development of Member States. It is also a matter of applying a mix of regulations of public and private law to achieve the desired results. Applying the rules of private law on consumer credit by their consumers is another problem. Consumers are often unaware of the legal complications involved.

The purpose of this study is to show how, in the absence of harmonization of private-law measures for breaches of the national rules transposing the Consumer Credit Directive and due to the insufficient regulation of crowdfunding, the traditional division of public law (especially financial supervision) and private law (in particular contract law and consumer protection) at national level may create obstacles for consumers to rely on consumer protection standards in private actions against financial institutions.

Keywords: consumer protection, peer-to-peer loan, crowdfunding, digitalization, risk

1. Introduction

FinTech, technology-enabled innovation in financial services, has developed significantly over recent years and is impacting the way financial services are produced and delivered. FinTech does not only lead to an increasing automation of processes, but also to a fundamental reorganization of financial services with new business models (for example, peer to-peer lending and robo-advising). FinTech is set to have a profound impact on consumers in retail finance. While FinTech comes with opportunities such as increased competition and new services (e.g. peer-to-peer lending, mobile payments and peer-to-peer money transfers, telematics insurances, crowdfunding), it also poses huge challenges regarding privacy, fairness and security

After a financial crisis and credit crunch, caused, among other things, due to irresponsible lending and increased risk appetite, retail investors are lending billion of dollars over the Internet, on an unsecured basis, to total strangers. Technological and financial innovation permit now person-to-person or peer-to-peer lending ("P2PL") to connect lenders and borrowers in ways never before imagined. But, not everything is all right with peer-to-peer loans.... The emergence of peer-to-peer online is especially due to the recent global financial crisis, which has prompted banks to tighten lending rules.

Online peer-to-peer lending (P2PL) is a fast growing financial service industry that presents challenges such as rationality and compliance with consumer protection as it allows unsecured loan transactions between consumers, intermediated by online platforms.

P2PL has been praised enthusiastically as a miracle that could help fill the space left by traditional bank and non-bank lending.[1] Subsisting in the marginal lending economy for ages, in the form of credit unions, payday loans and microcredit[2] and friendly societies, P2PL has reappeared on a widespread scale thanks to the Internet.

Consumers are eager to have access to a simplified, streamlined lending process, and peer to peer companies are capitalizing on this need. Auto loans and mortgages, once the territory of "traditional lenders" are now offers on innovative peer-to-peer lending platforms.

* Master student at National School for Political and Administrative Studies, Bucharest, International Relations and European Integration Department; monica.calu@apc-romania.ro

[1] M. Pagano, 'Peer-to-peer lending boom could make banks obsolete' The Independent, Monday 17 December 2012, http://www.independent.co.uk/news/business/news/peertopeer-lending-boom-could-make-banks-obsolete-8421241.html [Accessed May 10, 2014].

[2] A. Brill, "Peer-to-peer lending: innovative access to credit and the consequences of Dodd-Frank" (2010) 25 Wash Leg Found Leg Backgrounder 1.

Consumers who did not fit the new tighten conditions required to obtain a bank loan or a credit from non-bank entities, now have an alternative way of doing so. Internet technology has transformed the lending market in different aspects, creating various modalities and facilitated the ease of contact between lenders and borrowers. The P2P platforms allow the conclusion of a lending contract by clicking on an option on a screen. However, the internet has also led to the rise of concerns regarding the need to protect consumers in the online environment from the perils such as pyramid schemes[3]unlicensed and shadowy lending[4] and abusive practices.

In United Kingdom, the Financial Conduct Authority set out new rules for this crowdfunding activity, in March 2014[5]. It is, for example arguable that the FCA's classification of P2P lenders as retail investors[6] shows failure of anticipation that P2PL can involve consumers- lenders and borrowers- on both sides of a loan transaction. P2PL open debates about the definition of a "consumer of financial services" by modifying the features of key participants in a lending transaction.

The issue of online peer-to-peer lending appears to contest fundamental presumptions, settings and purposes of consumer protection law and policy of the EU and everywhere.

In this article the aim is to show the suitability and propriety of a more interventionist consumer protection approach, after assessing the consumer protection justifications for regulating peer-to-peer lending. I stress out that regulation ought identify and admit the consumer-to-consumer transaction possibility in peer-to-peer lending and as a result to consider the need to protect two very different types of consumers: lenders, which, as these platforms become more popular will increasingly involve more inexperienced and unsophisticated investors and borrowers, generally associated with consumers category.

2. Crowdfunding regulation at EU level for peer-to-peer lending

Across European Union, national regulatory frameworks for P2P lending are not yet (definitively) established and are very different from each other and most EU regulatory measures provide a framework for either peer-to-peer business lending or peer-to-peer consumer lending. The current regulatory system in European Union is a weak struggle for the needs of consumers and the platforms that connect them. Peer-to-peer lending platforms are no credit institutions under Article 4(1) (1) of the Regulation (EU) No 575/2013 on prudential requirements for credit institutions and investment firms.

Crowdfunding is considered an emerging alternative funding method at the level of EU institutions, especially in the immediate post-crisis economic context, characterized by the decline in bank lending and difficult access to finance. To this end, the European Commission explores the potential and the risks of this new and growing form of funding, as well as the existing national legislative framework at Member State level.

The recent European Commission Proposal on European Crowdfunding Service Providers for Business (March 2018)[7] establishes an (optional) legal framework for investment- and lending-based crowdfunding platforms that enables platforms to easily provide their services across the EU Single Market and aim to approach crowdfunding risks in a in a balanced way. Investors will be protected by clear rules on information disclosures, risk management, with coherent approach to supervision, not to forget the rules on governance.

Although the legal framework set out in the proposal is considerably innovation-oriented, the question arises whether the European Commission could not go (much) further in its innovation-oriented approach by relying on block chain technology to address some or several risks of peer-to-peer lending, of course without undermining consumer protection. Consumer lending falls outside the scope of the proposal. These aspects are covered by other EU legislation such as the Consumer Credit Directive (CCD) and the Mortgage Credit Directive (MCD). EU regulatory measures are preponderantly addressing peer-to-peer lending risks. In this regard, the proposal refers to the (partial) application of existing EU consumer protection legislations. More specifically, (i) when a consumer is receiving a loan for personal consumption and operating outside his professional capacity, P2P lending falls within the remit of the Consumer Credit Directive and (ii) when a consumer is receiving a loan to purchase an immovable property, P2P lending falls within the remit of the Mortgage Credit Directive. Therefore, regarding P2P consumer lending, we discuss the relevant regulatory measures laid down in EU consumer protection legislations with a focus on the CCD. Note that when P2P lending platforms offer both business lending services and consumer lending services, it is very likely that they need to comply with the strictest regulatory measures applicable. Additionally, the proposal is characterized by extensively elaborated measures to prevent conflicts of interest (Article 7) and money laundering (Article 9, 10 and 13). Especially the initial evaluation of [3] See, for example, 4finance UAB v Valstybinė vartotojų teisių apsaugos tarnyba and another (Case C-515/12) [2014] Bus LR 574.

[4] R. Mayer, "When and why usury should be prohibited" (2013) 116 Journal of Business Ethics 513 at 524.

[5] Policy statement 14/4, The FCA's regulatory approach to crowdfunding over the internet, and the promotion of no readily realisable securities by other media, March 2014: http://www.fca.org.uk/static/documents/policystatements/ps14-04.pdf

[6] Financial Conduct Authority, (Policy Statement, PS14/4) at 16, 31. Contrast Financial Services Authority, "The Financial Conduct Authority: approach to regulation" (June 2011) at 16.

[7] https://ec.europa.eu/info/publications/180308-proposal-crowdfunding_en suitability of a potential client and the possibility to simulate their capacity to support losses are worth mentioning (Article 15).

In particular, there is the dual aspects of the status of peer-to-peer lenders (as investor and consumer) and the suitable degree of protection that should be accord to them.

In the EC's proposal for a regulation of the European Parliament and of the council on European Crowdfunding Service Providers (ECSP) for Business, Brussels, 8.3.2018 COM (2018) 113 final 2018/0048 (COD). Article 3(1)(a): 'crowdfunding service' means the matching of business funding interest of investors and project owners through the use of a crowdfunding platform and which consist of any of the following: the facilitation of granting of loans […]. Article 3(1) (g): 'investor' means any person that, through a crowdfunding platform, grants loans or acquires transferable securities. The EU consumer law and policy, as paradigm, defines a consumer as a natural person acting for purposes outside of his or her normal business, trade or profession.

Though, nothing suggests that users of peer-to-peer platforms are not simply individuals acting outside their business, trade or profession. Lenders on peer-to-peer platforms are often described as investors rather than consumers because they lend money directly to borrowers. Categorization as investor rather than consumer is worthy of attention and with important consequences because investor protection is totally different from consumer protection. Investor protection regulation often suppose mastery and a level of competence and are therefore less likely to be interventionist than ordinary consumer protection regulations.

For instance, in United States, Supreme Court in Securities & Exchange Commission v. Howey Co., 328 U.S. 293 (1946), establishes the test of whether there is an "investment contract": An investment contract exists if there is "an investment of money in a common enterprise with profits to come solely from the efforts of others. „This three-part test, thus, requires: (1) investment of money with the expectation of profits, (2) commonality, and (3) the entrepreneurial efforts of others[8]. Consequently, this, appears to defy the business-consumer antithesis and also reignites topical consumer lending issues such as fairness of commercial practices and responsible lending[9]. Typical investor protection rules including the segregation of client and financial intermediary's accounts[10] may be irrelevant in consumer protection[11]. Different types of consumer are provided with different levels of consumer protection and different regulated activities are subject to varying levels of intervention depending on what category a consumer of that service falls into. This differential approach is, however, problematic for peer-to-peer lending which involves two consumers with similar levels of knowledge and experience who may find themselves subject to different levels of protection simply because of their participation as lender and borrower. It is noticeable that experience is a key element in whether consumer protection measures apply to particular individuals.[12]

3. What are the key-points for peer-to-peer lending?

The European Commission's Proposal on European Crowdfunding Service Providers for Business provides a fairly comprehensive framework for peer-to-peer risks. There are provisions regarding the extensive disclosure standards and warnings related to credit risk for investors and the extensive regulatory measures for money laundering and conflict of interest. On the other hand, peer-to-peer consumer lending has a considerably less extensive regulatory framework. The application of the Consumer Credit Directive (CCD) on peer-to-per lending platforms is highly limited and is not certain the application of MiFID II[13] on peer-to-peer lending, which would be relevant for credit risk and conflict of interest. There are not specific regulatory measures which address operational risk in peer to peer consumer lending or norms addressing money laundering.

3.1. Regarding the peer-to-peer lending risks

In order to subsequently evaluate which types of regulatory measures can be eliminated or reduced by block chain technology, when we approach consumer lending Article 85 of the CRD IV could inspire for regulatory measures addressing operational risk in P2P (consumer) lending.288 Article 85 stipulates: "1. Competent authorities shall ensure that institutions implement policies and processes to evaluate and manage the exposure to operational risk, including model risk, and to cover low frequency high-severity events. Institutions shall articulate what constitutes operational risk for the purposes of those policies and procedures. 2. Competent authorities shall ensure that contingency and business continuity plans are in place to ensure an institution's ability to operate on an

[8] https://supreme.justia.com/cases/federal/us/328/293/

[9] S. Brown, "Using the law as a usury law: definitions of usury and recent developments in the regulation of unfair charges in consumer credit transactions" (2011) 1 Journal of Business Law 91.

[10] Staikouras, "A novel reasoning of the UK Supreme Court decision in Lehman Brothers: the MiFID segregation rule from the angle of financial intermediation and regulation theory" (2014) 2 Journal of Business Law 97.

[11] Financial Services Act 2012 ss.1C(2)(a) and (b); Joint Committee on the draft Financial Services Bill, Session 2010-12 at [108].

[12] Maple Leaf v Rouvroy [2009] EWHC 257, [2009] 2 All ER (Comm) 287; Patel v Patel [2009] 3264 (QB), [2010] 1 All ER (Comm) 864; Rahman v HSBC Bank plc [2012] EWHC 11 (Ch).

[13] Directive 2014/65/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 May 2014 on markets in financial instruments and amending Directive 2002/92/EC and Directive 2011/61/EU ongoing basis and limit losses in the event of severe business disruption."

3.2. Creditworthiness assessments of peer-to-peer lending borrowers/consumers.

Creditworthiness is what creditors look at before they grant any new credit. Creditworthiness assessments aim at protecting lenders when making an investment decision and borrower when concluding a peer-to-peer loan agreement.

Article 8 of the Consumer Credit Directive states the obligation on the creditor to assess the creditworthiness of consumers on the basis of sufficient information, where appropriate obtained from the consumer and, where necessary, on the basis of a consultation of the relevant database. This obligation is imposed on the creditor, i.e. the P2P lender, without expanding this obligation to credit intermediaries.

The Proposal on European Crowdfunding Service Providers for Business does not present any disposition regarding creditworthiness assessments of borrowers at all.

Considering the insufficient pre-contractual information standards requirements in peer-to-peer, it is controversial that there are no regulatory measures that impose to this lending platforms to conduct qualitative creditworthiness assessments of borrowers.

3.3. Disclosure standards for peer-to-peer consumer lending

If we consider the important asymmetric information aspects in peer-to-peer lending, disclosure standards regarding the peer-to-peer lending risks creditworthiness of borrowers are crucial to reduce credit risk for platform lenders, Article 16 of the proposal approaches "Key investment information sheet", requires peer-to-peer lending platforms to provide (potential) investors-lenders with a clear, comprehensible and correct key investment information sheet with the aim of this key investment information sheet to warn intending peer-to-peer lenders that the investing environment they have entered into imply risks covered neither by the deposit compensation scheme nor by investor compensation guarantees. The key investment information sheet contains the following explanatory statement, appearing directly underneath the title of the key investment information sheet: "This crowdfunding offer has been neither verified nor approved by ESMA or national competent authorities. The appropriateness of your education and knowledge have not been assessed before you were granted access to this investment. By making this investment, you assume full risk of taking this investment, including the risk of partial or entire loss of the money Second, the key investment information sheet contains the following risk warning: "Investment in this crowdfunding offer entails risks, including the risk of partial or entire loss of the money invested. Your investment is not covered by the deposit guarantee and investor compensation schemes established in accordance with Directive 2014/49/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council and Directive 97/9/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council. You may not receive any return on your investment. This is not a saving product and you should not invest more than 10% of your net wealth in crowdfunding projects. You may not be able to sell the investment instruments when you wish."

As previously stated, consumer lending falls outside the scope of the Proposal on European Crowdfunding Service Providers for Business. The Consumer Credit Directive applies to credit agreements between a creditor and a consumer. In this regard, in (Article 3(b)), 'credit agreement' means "an agreement whereby a creditor grants or promises to grant to a consumer credit in the form of a deferred payment, loan or other similar financial accommodation […]". The concept of 'creditor' is problematic. 'Creditor' means a natural or legal person who grants or promises to grant credit in the course of his trade, business or profession. (Article 3(c)). Consequently, consumers cannot be considered as 'creditor' in the view of the Consumer Credit Directive, as they do not grant or promise to grant credit in the course of [their] trade, business or profession. The definition of 'creditor' leads to a few considerations: Consumer Credit Directive is only applicable to business to consumers lending (and it's not applicable to consumer to consumer lending). Supplementary, peer-to-peer lending platforms are no 'creditor' as they do not give nor promise to give credit. Therefore, peer-to-peer lending platforms do not fall within the principal scope of application of the Consumer Credit Directive.

But, Consumer Credit Directive regulates certain duties of credit intermediaries in relation to consumers[14]. It is highly probable that peer-to-peer lending platforms qualify as 'credit intermediary' in the meaning of the CCD. The Consumer Credit Directive stipulate "only certain obligations of credit intermediaries in relation to consumers" with the scope to protecting borrowers. Considering peer-to-peer lending platforms as 'credit intermediary' this imply the pre contractual information duties. Pre-contractual information relevant for addressing credit risk includes: the type of credit; the total amount of credit and the conditions governing the drawdown; the duration of the credit agreement; the borrowing rate, the conditions governing the application of the borrowing rate; the annual percentage rate of charge and the total amount payable by the consume; the amount, number and frequency of payments to be made by the consumer the interest rate applicable in the case of late payments and

[14] Credit intermediary' is defined as "a natural or legal person who is not acting as a creditor and who, in the course of his trade, business or profession, for a fee […]: (i) presents or offers credit agreements to consumers; (ii) assists consumers by undertaking preparatory work in respect of credit agreements other than as referred to in (i); or (iii) concludes credit agreements with consumers on behalf of the creditor" (Article 3(f)).CCD the arrangements for its adjustment, a warning regarding the consequences of missing payments; where applicable, the sureties required; the existence or absence of a right of withdrawal; (p) the right of early repayment, and, where applicable, information concerning the creditor's right to compensation and the way in which that compensation will be determined.

If peer-to-peer lending platforms are considered as 'credit intermediary', this means that the lending platforms have a duty to assist the consumer in deciding which credit agreement, within the range of products proposed, is the most appropriate for his needs and financial situation Member states shall ensure that credit intermediaries provide adequate explanations to the consumer, in order to place the consumer in a position enabling him to assess whether the proposed credit agreement is adapted to his needs and to his financial situation, where appropriate by explaining the pre-contractual information to be provided , the essential characteristics of the products proposed and the specific effects they may have on the consumer, including the consequences of default in payment by the consumer[15].

4. Romania's specificities

In Romania, the lending activity is carried out professionally through credit institutions and financial institutions provided by OUG 99/2006 on credit institutions and capital adequacy as well as by non-banking financial institutions under the conditions established by Law 93/2009 on non-banking financial institutions. The prohibitions in these normative acts concern only the carrying out of the professional activity, without restricting the commercial and civil lending operations that are not circumscribed to this character.

Limits of legal lending in civil relations. In Romania, Law no. 216/2011 on the prohibition of usury activity regulates the issue of "usury", and the usurer appears as the only natural person (unprofessional) who carries out a professional loan with interest, although not authorized (according to Law 93/2009 or GEO 99/ 2009, only legal persons may be authorized to do so). Therefore, usury implies a "business" of giving money with interest, a violation of the banking monopoly and "non-banking financial" in the matter.

It does not import the amount of the interest (it is however limited to the legal interest rate plus 50%, and in case of exceeding this threshold the interest null and void), but only the use of the loan activity as "business", i.e. as a constant source of income and repetitive character. In the initial draft law, the interest rate was an essential element, but the determination of the "excessive" nature was not defined by law. This approach was not, however, agreed by the Legislative Council, which suggested a similar form of the offense already contained in the New Criminal Code.

Therefore, the usury appears to be only the individual (non-professional) who carries out a professional loan with interest, although not authorized (according to Law 93/2009 or GEO 99/2009, only legal persons may be authorized to do so) . Therefore, usury implies a "business" of giving money with interest, a violation of the banking and "non-banking financial institutions" monopoly field. The interest rate is not imported (it is however limited to the statutory interest rate plus 50%, and in case of overrun, this interest rate is canceled altogether), but only the use of the borrowing activity in a use of the loan activity in a "business" as a source of income and with a repetitiveness character.

From Law no. 216/2011 prohibiting usury, it should not be understood that any interest-bearing loan will be banned. In order to constitute an offense, it is necessary to prove the practice of interest-bearing loan "as a job". Loans between unauthorized individuals or between commercial companies and individuals or other legal entities will still remain legal, but within certain limits, subject to the conditions imposed by law. Government Ordinance no. 9/2000 on the legal interest for pecuniary obligations established limits that should have interest in non banking loans to comply with the law. The interest collected or paid by the National Bank of Romania, banks, credit union organizations and the Ministry of Public Finance, as well as the method of their calculation, are established by other specific regulations. The prohibition to set a higher interest rate than the one stipulated in Government Ordinance no. 9/2000 refers only to civil relations.

An additional argument for the validity of the borrowing operation and the charging of interest is represented by the provisions of art. 23 par. 5 of the Fiscal Code which states as the source of the loan and other entities than the credit institutions or the non-banking financial institutions, where the deductible interest rate is limited to the reference interest rate of the NBR for the loans in lei. Therefore, operations are possible, irrespective of the quality of the lender's physical or legal person.

In civil relations interest can not exceed legal interest rate by more than 50% per year. Legal interest in civil matters (i.e. loans not commercially traded) is set at the reference rate of the National Bank of Romania, down 20%.The reference interest rate of the National Bank of Romania is published monthly in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, through the care of the National Bank of Romania. In civil relations, the obligation to pay interest higher than the statutory interest plus 50% per annum is null and void. However, the usurers know this, and there are no high interest rates in contracts, but they go from the start to a higher amount than the one borrowed, to which the legal interest is applied.

Finding justification in the new social reality, the new Romanian Criminal Code criminalizes the patrimonial exploitation of a vulnerable person in art. 247[16]. Two variants of the offence are brought under regulation: a basic and an aggravated one. The Lawmaker provides the specific conditions for the existence of each of the variants of the offence. If the basic form of the offence requires that the passive subject should be in a visibly vulnerable situation before the offence takes place, in the case of the aggravated variant, the state of vulnerability does not exist before the offence, but is caused by the active subject.

[15] https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/ALL/?uri=CELEX:62013CJ0449

5. Conclusions

FinTech innovations such as the peer-to-peer lending platforms can be game changers for financial services and beyond. We need to create the framework for innovation to flourish, while managing risks and protecting consumers. There is a need for regulation and reform of legislation to better accommodate consumer needs and to protect their rights in peer-to-peer lending.

To preserve peer-to-peer lending, appropriate legal treatment must sustain and discipline this nascent market. Peer-to-peer loans are disintermediated financial transactions on a small scale — but with grand ambitions. The regulation should target at least four key areas of reform: disclosure, oversight and enforcement, prudential regulation, and borrowers. At the same time, in order to operate properly, crowdfunding needs to have an institution / supervisory authority with attributions in the field. If properly designed, this grand experiment may provide a transparent, consumer-benefiting product where opaque, costly products now dominate.

European Union and Member State's regulators should place strong emphasis on consumer protections in financial market, including the FinTech. The Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) in the United Kingdom issued its regulatory approach to crowdfunding over the internet in 2014. Also, it is not surprising to see that the European Commission to take a more active role in oversight and regulation of peer-to-peer lenders as they expand their product offerings and increase customer base.

References

- Brill, "Peer-to-peer lending: innovative access to credit and the consequences of Dodd-Frank"(2010) 25 Wash Leg Found Leg Backgrounder ;
- J.R. Magee, "Peer-to-peer lending in the United States: surviving after Dodd-Frank" (2011) 15 NC Bank;
- http://www.europarl.europa.eu/doceo/document/A-8-2018-0364-AM-001-001_EN.docx
- https://ore.exeter.ac.uk/repository/handle/10871/16993;
- https://www.juridice.ro/291168/crowdfunding-ul-sau-multifinatarea-noua-metoda-alternativa-de-finantare.html

[16] Article 247 Patrimonial exploitation of a vulnerable person, New Penal Code

(1) The act creditor who, while putting borrow money or goods, taking advantage of the state particularly vulnerable debtor, due to age, health, infirmity or relationship of dependency in which the debtor is to him, makes him constitute or convey for himself or for another, a real right or claim value manifestly disproportionate to the benefit shall be punished with imprisonment from one to five years. (2) Putting a person in a state of obvious vulnerability by causing poisoning with alcohol or psychoactive substances in order to persuade it to agree to the creation or transmission of a real right or claim or waive a right, if there was a loss shall be punished with imprisonment for 2-7 years.

BLOCKCHAIN-BASED SOLUTIONS FOR FINANCIALLY DISTRESSED OR INSOLVENT COMPANIES

Corina Georgiana COSTEA

Abstract

The era of technology has been developing numerous instruments constantly, with high impact even upon areas of commercial law. One of these instruments consists of the blockchain technology, which has revolutionized traditional businesses in terms of their functioning, performance and even funding. Funding is one of the best means for companies to deal with their state of financial difficulty or insolvency, which means that the blockchain technology may be able to represent a solution for insolvency prevention or even treatment. Moreover, the blockchain technology may be helpful in other insolvency-related issues, such as debtors' stocks', assets' and contracts' management and may even substitute the traditional process of voting a restructuring plan. This paper aims to identify if and how the blockchain technology may be used as an instrument of companies' insolvency treatment and even financial difficulty prevention, given the fact that so far, it hasn't been widely used for this purpose.

Keywords: blockchain, technology, innovation, insolvency, funding, smart contracts.

Introduction

The blockchain technology has been increasingly used in the past decade, and its properties allowed it to be applied in a various number of fields and industries, such as banking, insurance, online storage and cloud-like services, retail, digital payments, voting processes and many others. Moreover, it may undoubtedly be applied in all business-related matters, such as the accounting industry, stocks', assets' and contracts' management, while providing a new, digital alternative for business funding. Therefore, if the blockchain technology could be applied, in theory, to all business-related matters, the following question arises: Could the blockchain technology serve its purpose in an insolvency proceeding, and, implicitly, in a restructuring process, either preventive or formal? This question is the main issue that this paper will aim to answer, providing the necessary explanations. Blockchain-based insolvency proceedings or preventive restructurings of companies may consist of a new, digital way for the participants to approach corporate liquidity issues. This paper's topic is important not only because it provides blockchain-related explanations, but particularly because it contains a fresh view of preventive and formal corporate restructuring in a digital era. Moreover, we believe that the blockchain technology will definitely be applied in pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings at some point in the future, therefore the topic of this paper will sometime become a subject of general interest for absolutely every participant in an insolvency proceeding, commencing with the debtors, accountants, insolvency practitioners, creditors, auditors, judges, lawyers, evaluators and so on. We also believe that the blockchain technology will not be applied in practice very soon, not only because of its temporary lack of regulation, but mainly because people, in general, who do not work in the IT industry, do not know anything about it. Applying the blockchain technology in practice will probably take place in the next decade, progressively, as traditional ways of industries' unfolding may be exceeded by future needs. As we will see in this paper, the blockchain's technology implementation in practice is, basically, inevitable, mostly because of the fact that it provides several benefits in businesses, and particularly in insolvency proceedings, one of the most important being the fact that it creates digital trust, which eliminates the need of trust between debtors and creditors in regards to a restructuring plan.

1. What is blockchain?

The blockchain technology is a digital platform which records time-stamped transactions of the digital currency called Bitcoin.[1] Bitcoin provides an alternative for online financial transactions, operated by the so-called miners, which are resolving an algorithm through cryptology and mathematics. The first miner who successfully validates the transaction is being rewarded with a small fee, in digital currency. Well-known global companies are beginning to accept digital currencies (Bitcoin and many others), such as Microsoft, CheapAir.com, Bloomberg, Expedia, KFC (Canada), McDonald's (starting in 2019), Burger King (Russia), Amazon (starting in 2019), AT&T, ASOS, Shopify and many others.[2] But the blockchain serves

* PhD Candidate, Doctoral School of Law, ″Nicolae Titulescu″ University, Bucharest (e-mail: corinacostea23@gmail.com; office@insolpedia.ro).

[1] Satoshi Nakamoto, Bitcoin: A peer-to-peer electronic cash system, https://bitcoin.org/bitcoin.pdf

[2] https://coinswitch.co/news/top-25-websites-and-businesses-that-accept-bitcoins-in-2019

much more purposes than facilitating digital currency transactions. So, what exactly is blockchain and what is its connection with pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings? As its name suggests, a blockchain is basically a digital chain of blocks, the latter consisting of pieces of digital information, that are publicly stored into a chain. In other words, chained pieces of digital information create the so-called blockchain, which can be considered an electronic journal. Since it is not yet regulated, blockchain doesn't have a widely accepted definition, but if we are to provide our own definition, it would be the following: blockchain is an innovative, secure, unalterable, transparent, decentralized and distributed string of unique blocks carrying digital data, chronologically arranged, capable of storing and also creating information consisting of value, such as financial transactions and property, without the need of intermediaries' implication. For example, in a traditional online transaction between a merchant and a customer, the third party is the financial institution which needs to verify the payment. By using blockchain, the third party is eliminated out of the transaction, therefore significantly reducing costs (in this case, the banks' fee). Basically, blockchain serves as a third party, by verifying the transaction (validating the blocks that are connected in the chain) and collecting a very small fee. But still, not only the fee is significantly reduced, but also the necessary time of the payments' validation: if money is being transferred into a foreign account, this transaction could take up to several days; with blockchain, only a few seconds are necessary to confirm the payment. Furthermore, one of the main advantages of using blockchain is the digital trust it offers. When a person initiates a payment onto the blockchain, basically a new, time-stamped block is created and attached to the blockchain. The block contains all transaction-related information, except the identity of the parties, therefore protecting personal data. This protection is needed because the blockchain, or the digital journal of transactions, is public and may be stored by any computer in the world that is connected to the internet. However, even if the blockchain doesn't reveal the identity of the parties involved in a transaction, it reveals other data that could be related to a natural person's identity, therefore being in conflict with the General Data Protection Regulation.[3] "This highlights that, even before the new supranational data protection framework enters into force, it is already partly outdated in respect of its application to distributed ledgers for it simply cannot account for the technology's characterizing features."[4] If somebody tries to alter the data uploaded onto the blockchain, not only that it will be recorded, but also, they need to simultaneously alter the entire history of chains created before the one that it is altered, since the blocks are linked to one another, across millions of computers that hold the public blockchain.[5] This is why the blockchain is presently considered as being one of the most secure digital resources for transactions. So, what is the link between blockchain and insolvency proceedings? The fact that its properties allows it to cover most of the traditional insolvency-related issues, such as assets' tracking and evaluation, establishing directors' liability, cancelation of fraudulent acts or operations, enabling smart contracts (self-enforced contracts), elaborating a feasible restructuring plan, creditors' voting process, litigations and many other traditional insolvency-related shortcomings which may be time-consuming and also generate high costs.

2. Types of blockchain

There are mainly three types of blockchain: public blockchains, federated (consortium) blockchains and private blockchains.[6] Public blockchains grant access to any person that wants to connect to the chain, who may generate new blocks and add them into the chain. They remain completely anonymous, and they may read all the transactions that appear on the blockchain. The consortium blockchains is a hybrid blockchain: it combines public and private blockchains and it is managed by a person or a group of persons. Access may be either public or restricted to identified parties. This type of blockchain doesn't provide complete decentralization, in opposition with public blockchains. Private blockchains are only available to identified parties and it is completely centralized. "Likely applications include database management, auditing, etc. internal to a single company, and so public readability may not be necessary in many cases at all, though in other cases public auditability is desired."[7] In relation to the insolvency proceedings, we consider that public blockchains may not serve a common purpose with the confidentiality principles, as all restructuring-related issues would appear available to every participant in the blockchain. One might ask what the purpose of confidentiality and restricted access would be, if creditors already know the state of financial difficulty or insolvency of its debtor. The answer is that a debtor's financial state might only be temporary and publicizing it might irremediably ruin the debtor's reputation. Not every participant in the chain may have permission to add blocks (information) onto the chain, but only authorized persons. Also, restricted access to participants (creditors, debtor,

[3] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union, series L 119, 4th of May 2016.

[4] Michèle Finck, Blockchains and Data Protection in the EU, Max Planck Institute for Innovation and Competition Research Paper No. 18-01, p. 28, available for downloading https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=3080322

[5] Don Tapscott, How the blockchain is changing money and businesses, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Pl8OlkkwRpc&t=2s, min. 6.55 – 7.15.

[6] https://blockchainhub.net/blockchains-and-distributed-ledger-technologies-in-general/

[7] Vitalik Buterin, On Public and Private Blockchains, https://blog.ethereum.org/2015/08/07/on-public-and-private-blockchains/, published on the 6th of August 2015 <Accessed on the 26th of March 2019>.

insolvency practitioner, judges and other specialists) may clearly define their roles in a restructuring process, therefore preventing any sort of abuse. Therefore, it becomes clear that permissioned blockchains, the ones that offer its participants access to it, are the most suitable for the unfolding of pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings. The Romanian Law no. 85/2014[8] states that the ad-hoc mandate must remain completely confidential, while the preventive composition partially benefits from the principle of confidentiality. In the case of formal reorganization proceeding, as a form of the general insolvency proceeding, the principle of confidentiality isn't applied. Therefore, private blockchains may be suitable for the ad-hoc mandate, while federated (consortium) blockchains would be suitable for both the preventive composition and formal judicial reorganization. Private and consortium blockchains are both permissioned, which means that they "(…) have clearly defined governance structures compared to public blockchain networks."[9] In relation with the Romanian Law no. 85/2014 regarding pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings, the governance structures would be the following: in the ad-hoc mandate's case, the governance structure would be composed of the President of the Court and the ad-hoc agent appointed by the Court; in both preventive composition's and judicial reorganization's case, the governance structure would be composed of the syndic-judge and the concordat administrator, respectively the judicial administrator. Basically, governance structures represent the organs applying the proceedings, while the blockchain network's participants would be the debtors and their creditors. Moreover, the blockchain technology would be extremely useful and would facilitate cross-border insolvencies, by stimulating and speeding international cooperation between Courts and insolvency practitioners. In this specific matter, which is proactively approached[10] by the European Union, the benefits of implementing the blockchain technology would mainly be cost reductions and time saving.

3. How could insolvency proceedings deploy on a blockchain?

First of all, initiating an insolvency proceeding through a blockchain would be useless if the debtor's activity wouldn't be running already on a blockchain. This premise would ease not only the detection of the debtor's state of insolvency, but it would also make it easier to set this moment in time. In traditional insolvency proceedings, establishing the exact moment when the debtor became insolvent is the main premise of establishing directors' liability. In tradition pre-insolvency proceedings, establishing the moment in time when financial difficulties have appeared is even more complicated. These are present issues which need to be dealt with by debtors, creditors, syndic-judges and insolvency practitioners. In an ideal, digital world, businesses running on blockchain would use this technology for accounting, management, marketing and legal aspects. This means that all data recorded on the blockchain may provide evidence of financial difficulties and insolvency, while also providing the best approaching solutions.

3.1. Commencement of pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings on blockchain

Insolvency may be installed in two ways: either gradually or suddenly. Depending on the jurisdiction in which debtors run their businesses, and mostly on the way each law defines insolvency, businesses may find themselves surpassing financial difficulties and entering directly in insolvency. Blockchain technology may be able to alert directors upon insolvency installation, so that they can take appropriate measures. The first step would be filing for insolvency to the competent Court. If all legal requirements are met, the Court may appoint an insolvency practitioner, who would enable a permissioned blockchain for the deployment of the whole insolvency proceeding. An important observation needs to be highlighted: a blockchain couldn't run insolvency proceedings automatically, because they need human intervention. Updated laws, the particularity of each pre-insolvency or insolvency case, giving participants permission to access the blockchain-based insolvency proceedings are just a few examples justifying human intervention and supervision. Blockchain technologies could only be implemented to ease traditional pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings, to reduce costs and to save time. Even the commencement of pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings might be settled, since the blockchain's properties allows it to serve as a tool for electronic dispute resolution.[11] A particular case in the Romanian legal system is the fact that a financially distressed debtor needs to prove its financial difficulties, by providing the Court any document he considers to be necessary. In other words, the law doesn't specify the necessary documentation for proving financial difficulty, but however, this is the main admissibility condition that needs to be fulfilled in order to commence the ad-hoc mandate or the preventive composition proceeding. Using the blockchain technology will not only provide directors' necessary information upon financial difficulties, but it may also identify the causes. Therefore, the blockchain

[8] Published in the Romanian Official Gazette no. 466/25.06.2014

[9] Steven Zheng, Crypto simplified: Explaining permissioned blockchains, https://www.theblockcrypto.com/2018/12/10/crypto-simplified-explaining-permissioned-blockchains/ <Accessed 26th of March 2019>

[10] https://e-justice.europa.eu/content_tools_for_courts_and_practitioners-68-en.do <Accessed 26th of March 2019>

[11] For details, see Darcy W.E. Allen, Aaron M. Lane, Marta Poblet, The Governance of Blockchain Dispute Resolution, 15 February 2019 Version, available for downloading at https://www.researchgate.net/publication/331155400_The_Governance_of_Blockchain_Dispute_Resolution technology may be implemented and used for early financial difficulty or insolvency detection, while also meeting all legal requirements for pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings' commencement.

3.2. Assets' management in a blockchain-based pre-insolvency and insolvency proceeding

Assets' management in a traditional Romanian pre-insolvency or insolvency proceeding involve the following: identifying if any assets were sold within a period of 2 years before the commencement of the insolvency proceeding (assets' tracing), evaluation (if they are planned to be sold according to a restructuring plan) and determining if they are essential to the business' activity. Assuming a business would already run on a blockchain, before pre-insolvency or insolvency commencement, assets' management would be much easier handled by the organs applying the procedure. First of all, assets' history would be much more accessible for insolvency practitioners, since the blockchain system could reveal any information about any asset which was registered onto the blockchain. The Romanian Insolvency Law states that judicial administrators or judicial liquidators may lodge with the syndic judge petitions for cancellations of fraudulent acts or operations made by the debtor to the detriment of its creditors' rights over the past two years before the opening of the insolvency proceeding. If the syndic judge admits such a request, the asset(s) need to be reintegrated in the debtor's patrimony, in order to be exploited or sold, therefore increasing creditors' recovery rates. Such an issue is extremely time-consuming and costly in a traditional insolvency proceeding. Blockchain technology would therefore serve as a digital mechanism for dispute resolution that cancels assets' sale and returns it in the debtor's patrimony. This digital operation might save time and money. Moving forward, determining if assets are essential to business' activity is an issue that can be easily handled by insolvency practitioners. However, regarding assets' evaluation, blockchain technology would come in use. This issue is also costly and time-consuming, affecting the proceeding's effectiveness. The main problem implied by costly operations in an insolvency proceeding is the fact that they are being reflected upon creditors' recovery rates, generating tension and distrust, especially when it comes to a restructuring plan. In terms of assets' evaluation though a blockchain system, insolvency practitioners could add new blocks onto the chain, containing the following information: assets' acquisition cost, assets' amortized cost and their useful life cycle duration. Based on these economic parameters, the blockchain may easily determine and reveal assets' market price.

3.3. Participants' role in a blockchain-based pre-insolvency or insolvency proceeding

Considering that the blockchain technology is able to approach many aspects of a pre-insolvency or insolvency proceeding, one might ask what participants' role would resume to. We will try to answer this question in the following subsections.

3.3.1. The syndic-judge's role

All pre-insolvency and insolvency Romanian proceeding have one thing in common regarding the syndic judge's role: supervision of proceedings' unfolding. In the ad-hoc mandate, the syndic-judge's attributions are the following: (i) to subpoena the debtor and the ad-hoc mandate, (ii) to verify if the debtor can be subjected to the proceeding; (iii) verifying if the debtor is able to prove its state of financial difficulty; (iv) verifying if the ad-hoc agent is an authorized insolvency practitioner; (v) designation of the ad-hoc agent and establishing its honorary. As we may see, blockchain comes in use only regarding the debtor's financial difficulty, and therefore, the syndic-judge still has legal attributions to accomplish. In both preventive composition and judicial reorganization, the syndic-judge's role is much more complex and cannot be entirely substituted by the blockchain technology. As we stated above, human intervention remains needed.

3.3.2. The debtor's role

Considering that a business would run through a permissioned blockchain system, the fact that it may reveal the installation of insolvency isn't equivalent to the proceeding's commencement. The debtor would still have the obligation to file for insolvency, since its financial state wouldn't be known by the Court. When pre-insolvency or formal insolvency proceedings are commenced, the debtors needs to respect the restructuring plan.

3.3.3. The insolvency practitioner's role

The main attribution of an insolvency practitioner remains the elaboration of a feasible restructuring plan, adapted to both debtor's and creditors' interests. Of course, the blockchain technology may be able to generate a payment graphic, but it could never have negotiations or crisis management abilities. The insolvency practitioner can negotiate with creditors and may restore trust in their debtor. As is the syndic-judge's case, the blockchain technology couldn't substitute all of insolvency practitioners' attributes, especially in relation to the current insolvency framework.

3.3.4. The creditors' role

Even in traditional pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings, creditors' role is rather passive. They have the possibility to accept or to reject a restructuring plan, in function of their own financial state. Their main role would be voting upon essential aspects of the proceedings, when they are being summoned by the insolvency practitioner.

4. Business rescue in a digital era

Every business undergoing a restructuring process needs to benefit from its creditors' trust. Otherwise, as good as the restructuring plan would be, either extrajudicial or formal, it couldn't be implemented. If the insolvency practitioner is a good negotiator and crisis manager, he would take into consideration the creditors' own financial state and would propose measures that benefits all parties.

4.1. Voting a restructuring plan through the blockchain

Once the insolvency practitioner grants access to all the debtor's creditors into the permissioned blockchain, they could acknowledge all pre-insolvency or insolvency related information required in order to vote a restructuring plan. In a traditional pre-insolvency or insolvency proceeding, creditors must go to the Court and request the file, so that they can see the proceeding's evolution. Through blockchain, creditors could have digital access to all permitted information. This is particularly important because trust and transparency are the main premises for a successful business restructuring. Even if traditional voting of a restructuring plan is easy to accomplish by creditors, blockchain technology would allow creditors to see each others' votes.

Conclusions

This paper has analysed the way that blockchain technology could be applied to business rescue through pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings, in accordance with the insolvency legal framework. We therefore conclude that blockchain may be applied in practice, at its properties may be useful to detect and even prevent financial difficulties and insolvency, if the business already runs through blockchain. However, not every type of blockchain is suitable for this purpose, since only authorized persons need to create and add new blocks to the chain. If the blockchain technology is to be implemented in the following decade, in business-related fields such as accounting, this paper should serve as a starting point for further research. However, before implementing a technology with such an impact, there are many issues and shortcomings to be covered. Considering that the blockchain is both decentralized and distributed, the first step would be developing a legal framework. Another step would be to make it easy to understand by ordinary people, who do not work in the IT industry. These issues will remain to be approached progressively, and even if it seems hard to achieve, the blockchain technology will revolutionize even the pre-insolvency and insolvency field.

References

- Satoshi Nakamoto, Bitcoin: A peer-to-peer electronic cash system, https://bitcoin.org/bitcoin.pdf
- https://coinswitch.co/news/top-25-websites-and-businesses-that-accept-bitcoins-in-2019
- Michèle Finck, Blockchains and Data Protection in the EU, Max Planck Institute for Innovation and Competition Research Paper No. 18-01, p. 28, available for downloading https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=3080322
- Don Tapscott, How the blockchain is changing money and businesses, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Pl8OlkkwRpc&t=2s
- https://blockchainhub.net/blockchains-and-distributed-ledger-technologies-in-general/
- Vitalik Buterin, On Public and Private Blockchains, https://blog.ethereum.org/2015/08/07/on-public-and-private-blockchains/, published on the 6th of August 2015
- Steven Zheng, Crypto simplified: Explaining permissioned blockchains, https://www.theblockcrypto.com/2018/12/10/crypto-simplified-explaining-permissioned-blockchains/
- https://e-justice.europa.eu/content_tools_for_courts_and_practitioners-68-en.do
- Darcy W.E. Allen, Aaron M. Lane, Marta Poblet, The Governance of Blockchain Dispute Resolution, 15 February 2019 Version, https://www.researchgate.net/publication/331155400_The_Governance_of_Blockchain_Dispute_Resolution

ADMINISTRATIVE CONTRACTS IN THE CONTEXT OF THE NEW CIVIL CODE AND THE NEW CIVIL PROCEDURE CODE

Crina Alina DE SMET

Abstract

The Romanian law concerning administrative contracts has evolved greatly in the last three decades; the New Civil Code, which came into effect in 2009, and the New Civil Procedure Code, which came into effect in 2010, have important stipulations in the field. The purpose of this paper is to create a short review on the Romanian legislation concerning administrative contracts, to analyze the legal requirements, to identify possible issues in the field and, eventually, to propose improvements. In order to achieve these objectives, the relevant legislation is reviewed, and Romanian authors Romanian authors with recent studies in the field of administrative contracts, such as L. Catana, O. Puie, and A. Tabacu, are cited. The legislation concerning administrative contracts includes organic laws, such as Law 554/2004, Law 98/2016, Law 100/2016, and Law 101/2016, as well as government decisions, such as Government Emergency Ordinances no. 54/2006 and no. 34/2006. Our main findings are that, although the law concerning administrative contracts assimilates this concept to the notion of the administrative act, and although there are examples of administrative contracts which are more thoroughly explained, a clear definition of the administrative contract is missing, which we consider to be a legislative gap which needs to be fixed in the future, when the relevant legislation will be revised.

Keywords: administrative contracts, administrative acts, civil legislation

1. Introduction

Administrative contracts have undergone a substantial legislative development over the last decades. They needed a major adaptation after the 1989 Revolution, and the French legislation became an inspiration. In the French legal literature, there are three types of administrative contracts, according to O. Puie: those concluded between two public figures, those concluded between a public person and a private person and those concluded between two private persons. Compared to private contracts, administrative ones are subject to additional requirements. Although both types of contracts share the principle of contractual freedom, in the case of administrative contracts there is a subordination to the principle of public interest. Therefore, as O. Puie explains, "at a legislative level, it has been sought to establish a hybrid structure that combines contractual freedom with the need to protect the public interest, which has been achieved by the provisions of Art. 8 par. (3) of the Law no. 554/2004".[1]

In this paragraph, Law no. 554/2004 indicates that litigations occurring prior to the conclusion of an administrative contract or related to the execution or application of an administrative contract, are within the competence of the administrative court to resolve the dispute. On these disputes, art. 8 par. (3) of the Administrative Litigation Act provides that "in the settlement of the disputes referred to in par. (2) shall be taken into account the rule that the principle of contractual freedom is subordinated to the principle of public interest priority".[2]

For a contract to be classified as an administrative contract, it is defined on certain criteria by private-law contracts. By means of case-law, some central elements of administrative contracts emerge. In order for a contract to be an administrative contract, at least a part must be a person of public law. At the same time, another condition for a contract to be classified as administrative, its object must depend on the execution of a public service (for clarification, the case-law has used the notion of "direct participation in the precise (precise) execution of the public service".[3]

This distinction is needed between the two types of contracts because "administration is no longer just in administration: the administrative action has finally come out of the proper public and, even beyond the most decentralized public establishments, it integrates today private individuals".[4]

The principles underlying the award of administrative contracts include: regulation, non-discrimination, free competition, equal treatment, mutual recognition, transparency, proportionality, efficiency in the use of funds, accountability and avoidance of conflicts of interest.

In the Law 554/2004, the subject of the administrative contract was expressly delimited, but it was not defined. Within this law, the administrative contract was assimilated to the administrative act.

* Doctoral student, Law and Administrative Studies, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (desmet.crina@yahoo.ro); Notary Public, Galați Notarial Chamber, e-mail adress: desmet.crina@yahoo.ro.

[1] Puie, O. (2014) Contractele administrative în contextul noului Cod civil și al noului Cod de procedură civilă. București: Universul Juridic

[2] art. 8, Law no. 554/2004

[3] Puie, op. cit.

[4] Puie, op. cit., p. 10.

According to art. 2, the administrative act is an unilateral act, which may be of an individual or normative nature and which was "issued by a public authority in order to execute or organize the execution of the law, creating, modifying or terminating legal relations".[5]

Administrative acts include administrative contracts when they concern valuing public property assets, performing public works, performing public services and public procurement.[6] Therefore, Law no. 554/2004 specifies three types of possible administrative contracts:

- administrative contracts for valuing public property assets;
- administrative contracts for the execution of works of public interest;
- administrative contracts for the provision of public services;
- administrative contracts for public procurement.[7]

However, a distinction must be made between the administrative act and the act of the administration. The administrative act, which includes the concept of administrative contract, is a much wider concept, while the act of the administration is only a part of it.

With regard to the definition of administrative contracts, the lack of clear definition and delimitation in legislation has translated into fragmented norms, focused on certain types of administrative contracts, elaborated due to the obligations arising from a series of European directives. In normative acts, such as Government Emergency Ordinances, more than one type of administrative contracts is specified and defined. For example, O.U.G. (in Romanian, Ordonanță de Urgență a Guvernului) no. 54/2006 identifies and defines the concession contract for public property[8], while O.U.G. no. 34/2006 provides a framework for the following types of administrative contracts: public procurement, service concession, public works concession and sectoral contract.[9]

All litigations generated by administrative contracts are within the jurisdiction of the administrative litigation court; however, certain special regulations in the past have established the competence of the common law court in solving the principles related to certain specific administrative contracts.

Moreover, it is worthwhile mentioning the possible solutions in a legal dispute that has an administrative contract as an object. According to art. 18 par. (4) of Law no. 554/2004, the court may give the following solutions if the subject of the administrative action is represented by an administrative contract: it may cancel it, in whole or in part; it may oblige the public authority to conclude the contract if the claimant is entitled; it may impose an obligation in respect of any party; it may, if the public interest so requires, amend the consent of a party; and, last but not least, it may order payment of damages.[10]

2. Administrative Contracts in context of the New Civil Code

The new Civil Code has made substantial amendments and additions to the legislation concerning contracts, which also apply to administrative ones. First of all, the definition of contracts has changed. In the old Civil Code, the contract was defined, in art. 942, as "the agreement between two or more persons to constitute or extinguish a legal relationship between them."[11] On the other hand, in the new Civil Code, the contract is defined in art. 1.162 as "the will of two or more people with the intention of creating, modifying or extinguishing a legal relationship."[12] Therefore, with the change of the civil code, administrative contracts may also have the intention of modifying a legal relationship. In addition, the notion of "will" is introduced as the basis for the agreement. The fact that any contracts, including administrative ones, fall under the provisions of the Civil Code is specified in art. 1.167: "All contracts are subject to the general rules in this chapter. Particular rules regarding certain contracts are provided in this Code or in special laws."[13]

According to art. 1.179 of the New Civil Code, the conditions necessary in order to make a contract valid are: the capacity to make a contract, the valid consent of the parties, a possible, determined, legal object and a valid cause for the obligations. Moreover, the same article states that if the law provides for a certain form of contract, „it must be complied with, subject to the sanction provided for by the applicable legal provisions".[14] For example, in the case of public procurements contracts, before signing the contract, the parties have to sign a framework agreement. Law no. 99/2016 establishes the meaning of framework agreements, which is defined as "a written agreement between one or more contracting entities and one or more economic operators which seeks to establish the terms and conditions governing the sectoral contracts to be awarded in a given period, the price and, where appropriate, the quantities concerned".[15]

[5] art. 2, Law no. 554/2004
[6] Ibidem;
[7] Law 554/2004
[8] O.U.G. 54/2006
[9] O.U. G. 34/2006
[10] art. 18, alin. (4), Law 554/2004
[11] art. 942, Old Civil Code
[12] art. 1.166, New Civil Code
[13] art. 1.167, New Civil Code
[14] art. 1.179, New Civil Code.
[15] Law no. 99/2016

Moreover, according to the Government Resolution no. 395/2016, the framework agreement has to include the obligations of the parties, especially regarding technical indicators linked to performance and function. The services or the products have to be described, and deadlines should be included as well as the prices. The procurement contract needs to have certain annexes, such as the specification, the offer, the performance guarantee and the association agreement.[16]

In the New Civil Code, it is pointed out in art. 1.187 that making and accepting an offer has to be done in the form requested by law in order for the contract to be valid. Several normative acts have indicated how offers should be made and accepted in the case of different types of administrative contracts. To continue the example of public procurement contracts, Government Resolution no. 395/2016 indicates how public procurement takes place, and what are the duties of both the public authorities and the economic operators, about which the law states that "the economic operator submits the offer, DUAE, qualification documents, answers to requests for clarification only by electronic means when participating in an award procedure that takes place through SEAP".[17]

The new Civil Code law stipulates rules concerning every contract. The law includes aspects of the parties' consent, what may be the object of the contract, but also the cause of the contract. At the same time, it indicates the obligations related to the form of the contract, whether in written or electronic form. In the New Civil Code, there are stipulated the situations in which a contract becomes null, how can it be validated and how it can be interpreted. Normally, contracts produce effects only between parties, but there are situations where the law provides effects for third parties.

The concept of administrative act, to which the administrative contract is assimilated, is mentioned in the New Civil Code in the context of acquiring the right of ownership. Art. 557 par. 2 specifies that an administrative act may have the effect of acquiring a property.[18]

In our opinion, a major and interesting topic for practitioners is the concession of public property, which we shall briefly review next.

Both our Constitution and New Civil Code, together with other regulations, such as Law no. 15/1990 on the merger of State-managed companies into autonomously-managed public companies and trading companies, Law no. 215/2001 on local public administration, O.U.G. no. 34/2006 on the award of public procurement contracts, public works concession contracts and services concession contracts and O.U.G. no. 54/2006 on the regulations of public property concession contract, are governing the usability of the concession of public property belonging to the State or to the territorial entities thereof.

Article 866 NCC enumerates the right of concession among the real rights relating to the public property right, while art. 871-873 rule on its legal status. Yet, such provisions should be correlated with those included in a couple of the above-cited regulations, i.e. O.U.G. no. 34/2006 and O.U.G. no. 54/2006, whose enforceability survived the New Civil Code. Therefore, in the preamble of O.U.G. no. 54/2006 we can read that, in consideration of both the imperative and urgent full alignment of domestic law on concessions with the European Union's regulations and practice, and the recommendation of the European Executive – the Commission – for the full and express repeal of Law no. 219/1998 on concessions, as amended, after the coming into force of O.U.G. no. 34/2006 on the award of public procurement contracts, public works concession contracts and services concession contracts, also considering the provisions of art. 136 paragraph (4) of the Romanian Constitution, republished, passing this emergency ordinance regulating the concession of public property was of a large requirement.

Therefore, now we can distinguish between the legal statuses of the concession of public property, as it is governed by the provisions of O.U.G. no. 54/2006, on one hand, and the public works concession contracts and public services concession contracts, as governed by the provisions of O.U.G. no. 34/2006, on the other hand.

From this point of view, art. 2 of O.U.G. no. 54/2006 stipulates that the provisions of this regulation do not apply to those contracts which are not governed by the provisions of O.U.G. no. 34/2006 on the award of public procurement contracts, public works concession contracts and services concession contracts; in case of contracts awarded under O.U.G. no. 34/2006, for whose implementation an operation of a public property, the operation right for such property shall be transferred "under and pursuant to the procedure enforced for awarding such contract", Meaning that the contracting authority shall enter a single contract under O.U.G. no. 34/2006. Moreover, art. 220 letter c) of the latter provides that its provisions shall not apply if the concession contract has the scope of public property concession, but only when through the scope of such contract the contracting authority intends to acquire the performance of a work or provision of a service, which would classify such contract either as a public procurement contract or as a concession contract whose award is governed by its provisions, namely those of O.U.G. no. 34/2006.

Both ordinances basically aim to provide the performance of business, administrative and legal activities on concession within a competitive, non-discriminating and transparent European Union specific environment.

[16] Government Resolution no. 395/2016
[17] art. 123, Government Resolution no. 395/2016
[18] art. 557, New Civil Code.

Without going into further details, we shall point out hereinafter several aspects on the public property concession contract, by reference to the provisions included in these special regulations an also by general regulations in this field from art. 871-872 NCC.

2.1. Notion and effects of public property concession contracts

Article 871 NCC does not include a definition for the concession contract; the text rules, as of its first paragraph, that a grantee ha the right and obligation, at the same time, to operate the chartered property, in exchange of a royalty and for a limited period of time, also observing the requirements of laws and the provisions of the concession contract. Instead, art. 1 paragraph (2) of O.U.G. no. 54/2006 defines such contract as a written and authenticated contract whereby a public authority (grantor), transfers for a limited period of time to another person (grantee), who acts on its own risk and liability, the right and obligation to operate a public property, for valuable consideration (royalty). Article 3 of such ordinance rules that the scope of such contract may include any goods in the State's public property or owned by its administrative-territorial units according to the Constitution and legal provisions on public property.

Although art. 871 NCC does not specify, when the scope of a concession contract is represented by State's public property, the grantor capacity shall belong to ministries or other specialized bodies of central public administration; if it is represented by County's, City's or Commune's public property, such capacity shall be exercised accordingly by county or local councils, Bucharest City General Council or the local concern public institutions (art. 5). Article 871 NCC rules that any legal or natural person can act in the capacity of grantor. Moreover, art. 6 of O.U.G. no. 54/2006 provides that any Romanian and foreign natural or legal person can be a Grantor. The ordinance also provides that, irrespective of nationality or citizenship of the grantor, the concession contract shall be entered under the Romanian law (art. 7).

In respect of the royalty, calculation and payment shall be established by the relevant ministries or other specialized bodies of central public authorities or by local public authorities and it shall be an income to the State's or local budgets, as applicable (art. 4 of O.U.G. no. 54/2006). Therefore concession contracts are onerous.

Another feature of the contract under discussion is that it shall be entered on a definite period. Indeed, Pursuant to art. 7 paragraph (1) the final phrase of the Ordinance, duration of the concession contract shall not exceed 49 years since its signing date; such duration can only be extended with at most half of its initial term, by the mere agreement of the parties. Concession term shall be established by the grantor based on the concession's operational study. Basically, sub-granting is forbidden, unless expressly provided for by the ordinance (art. 8). The concession contract shall be entered in authentic written form [art. 1 paragraph (2) din O.U.G. no. 54/2006]. Such requirement is for ad validitatem, not for ad probationem purposes

2.2. Entering procedure and contents of a concession contract

Article 871 paragraph (3) NCC rules that the concession procedure and also the signing, execution, and termination of concession contracts are subject to the legal provisions. Such general rule is further developed by the provisions included in O.U.G. no. 54/2006 and Methodology thereto. Thus, O.U.G. no. 54/2006 includes rules on the preliminary administrative procedure before the signing of a concession contract, "awarding" of concession contract, which can occur after a tender or following direct negotiation, the contents of the concession contract, how the "concession file" is drafted and also the applicable rules for the control of all operations pertaining to the signing of concession contracts and the settlement of any disputes on concession.

We are interested in the rules of the ordinance which are in fact determining the legal status of the public property in the scope of concession. From this point of view, art. 52 of O.U.G. no. 54/2006 from the section concerning the contents of the concession contract rules that the contract must include a clear provision the types of property that may be used by the grantee under such concession, i.e.:

a) the so-called return property, which were subject to concession and shall rightfully return at the end of the contract, gratuitously and free from any liens, to the grantor;
b) own property of the grantee, which were used by him during concession and which shall naturally remain in his property at the end of the contract.

In consideration of the exercise of the concession right, art. 872 NCC provides that the holder of such right may carry out any material or legal acts required for the operation of granted property. However, under the penalty of absolute nullity, the grantee shall not alienate or burden the granted property or the goods designed for or resulting from concession, as applicable, property which must be returned to the grantor at the end of the contract, irrespective of cause, according to enforceable laws or articles of association.

Instead, art. 872 paragraph (2) NCC allows the grantor to acquire ownership of fruits and also products resulting from the chartered property, within the limits of enforceable laws and articles of association.

In turn, art. 47 paragraph (2) of Enforcement Rules for O.U.G. no. 54/2006 on the public property concession contracts indicates that, during contract implementation, the grantee has the right to use the chartered property and to collect its fruits, according to the nature thereof and purpose established by the parties within the contract. Yet he shall provide efficient, continuous and permanent operation of the public property in the scope of concession [art. 48 paragraph (1) of Rules). From these legal regulations it results that, based on the concession contract, the grantee shall acquire a real right upon the chartered property, opposable erga omnes\ within the limits of contract provisions, and such right shall be also opposable to the grantor. Yet, since the grantee must return the "return goods" - public property in the scope of concession at the end of the contract, it means that the older thereof has no right to dispose on the chartered property, as required by art. 872 paragraph (1) NCC, under the penalty of absolute nullity of the executed act in breach of such principle.

2.3. Demarcation of concession right for certain public property vs. the administration right pertaining to public property

We may find some similitude and important differences between these two rights.

As for the similitudes, we can note that both are real rights originating in the public property right and each represent a specific method of exercising such right.

Moreover, none of such right represent a fragmentation of the public property right.

Yet, important differences are among them. Thus, first of all, administration right may belong only to certain public law subjects – state-managed companies, prefectures, central and local public authorities [art. 868 paragraph (1) NCC], while concession right may belong only to private law subjects, Romanian and foreign natural or legal persons (art. 6 of O.U.G. no. 54/2006).

Secondly, administration right arises only by means of an administrative act of authority issued by the relevant state body - Government, County council, respectively Bucharest City General Council, local council [art. 867 paragraph (1) NCC] -, while concession right arises exclusively based on a contract entered by an between the grantor (owner of public property right) and grantee (beneficiary of the concession) [art. 1 paragraph (2) of O.U.G. no. 54/2006].

Thirdly, in term of prerogatives, the administration right holder may possess, use and even dispose, within certain limits, of the granted good, while the concession right confers to the grantee only the rights of possession, use according to the purpose designed in the contract and collect the fruits or even the products of the chartered good, within the limits of applicable laws and articles of association.

Last, administration right is a real, basically perpetual and inalienable right, while the concession right is a real, temporary and inalienable right.

2.4. Termination of concession contract

Pursuant to art. 871 paragraph (3) of NCC, the termination procedure for concession contracts is subject to legal provisions, that is applicable special regulations. The concession contract may be terminated in various ways pursuant to O.U.G. no. 54/2006. Thus, firstly it can end on its expiry date. Actually, the concession contract shall be rightfully terminated on its expiration date, unless it was extended under the parties' agreement for a period which shall not exceed half of its initial term [art. 57 letter a) of the ordinance].

Then, art. 57 letter b) of the ordinance rules that, if required by national or local interests, concession contract can be unilaterally terminated by the grantor. In this case, it shall pay in advance a reasonable compensation to the grantee, as agreed by the parties, or, if such agreement cannot be reached, it shall be established by the court of law.

Should the grantee fail to fulfil its contractual obligations, art. 57 letter c) of O.U.G. no. 54/2006 entitles the grantor to unilaterally terminate the contract and to oblige the grantee to pay compensation for any damages thus incurred by the grantor, if applicable. In turn, the ordinance allows the grantee to use the same possibility with the same consequences should the grantor fail to observe its contractual obligations [art. 57 letter d)].

Finally, the contract may be terminated through the extinction of the concession scope pursuant to a force majeure case or by waiver, in case of the grantee's objective impossibility to operate the property, no compensation being due under such circumstances [art. 57 letter e) of O.U.G. no. 54/2006].

3. Administrative contracts in the context of the new Civil Procedure Code

The new Civil Procedure Code does not have specific references to administrative contracts. However, there are stipulations which apply to them. First of all, several articles provide provisions on contracts. For example, art. 289 discusses other categories of inscriptions and specifies that the contracts concluded on standardized or standardized forms or incorporating general conditions shall be considered as private signature, unless the law provides otherwise.[19]

In case of sale at a public auction, the new Civil Procedure Code indicates in art. 778 the conditions for maintaining or terminating contracts, which also apply to administrative contracts. The law stipulates that "settlements and other legal acts relating to the adjudicated good remain in existence or, as the case may be, cease according to the law".

Conclusions

In this paper, we have presented and analysed the concept of the administrative contract in the Romanian legislation, in which this concept is assimilated to the concept of administrative act. However, the laws concerning contracts, as are those in the Civil Code and in the Civil Procedure Code, still apply. Taking this into consideration, in order to analyse the administrative contract in the context of the New Civil Code and the New Civil Procedure

[19] art. 778, New Civil Procedure Code

Code, we undertook an analysis of other relevant legislation, such as Government Emergency Ordinances and Government Resolutions, but also of laws such as the law of public procurements. Several laws that apply to administrative contracts were introduced in 2016: Law no. 98/2016 concerning public procurements, Law no. 99/2016 concerning sectoral procurements, Law no. 100/2016 concerning work and services concessions and Law no. 101/2016, concerning remedies in the case of the attribution of public procurement contracts.

Analyzing the relevant legislation, we notice that administrative contracts are assimilated to the notion of administrative act, and that several types of contracts (e.g. of public procurement, of provision of public services) are assimilated to the concept of administrative contracts. However, the Romanian legislation does not include at the moment a clear definition of administrative contracts. This is one of the reasons why other authors, such as L. Catana,[20] are in favor of introducing a law that will establish this terminology in the special legislation.

References

- Catana, L. (2016) Teză de doctorat. Actul administrative asimilat in contenciosul administrativ (rezumat). București: Universitatea din București, Facultatea de Drept.
- Puie, O. (2014) Contractele administrative în contextual noului Cod civil și al noului Cod de procedură civilă.București: Universul Juridic
- Tabacu, A. (2009) „Scurte considerații asupra contractului administrative și a supraprocedurilor de control jurisdictional în material achizițiilorpublice", RevistaTransilvană de Științe Administrative. 1(23), pp. 67-88.
- Government Resolution no. 395/2016
- Law no. 554/2004, the law of administrative litigation
- Law no. 98/2016 concerning public procurements
- Law no. 99/2016 concerning sectoral procurements
- Law no. 100/2016 concerning work and services concessions
- Law no. 101/2016 on remedies in respect of the award of public procurement contracts, sectoral contracts and works concession contracts and the concession of services and the organization and functioning of the National Council for the Solving of Complaints
- O.U.G. no. 54/2006
- O.U.G. no. 34/2006
- The New Civil Code
- The Old Civil Code
- The New Civil Procedure Code

[20] Catana, L. (2016) Teză de doctorat. Actul administrativ asimilat in contenciosul administrativ (rezumat). București: Universitatea din București, Facultatea de Drept

PARTICULARITIES ON THE REGULATION OF THE SUE PETITION, IN THE LIGHT OF PRACTICAL DIFFICULTIES AND LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

Andrei-Radu DINCĂ

Abstract

According to the Romanian Civil Procedure Code, one of the trial stages of first instance is represented by the written stage in which, as a general rule, the fulfillment of the requirements regarding the petition content is analysed.

This stage is a novelty of the new Civil Procedure Code. The purpose of this check is to prevent the introduction of an inform application, as well as for predictability reasons, in order to guarantee the other parties the right of defend oneself, in order to be able to effectively respond to the plaintiff's claims.

However, the institution has experienced some interpretation and enforcement difficulties, but also legislative changes that will be the subject of our analiysis.

Keywords: sue petition, regulation, written stage, inform application, enforcement difficulties

1. Introduction

The new civil procedural law, in force since February 15, 2013, meaning the New Romanian Code of Civil Procedure Code, surprised by a novel legislative element, namely the establishment of a distinct written stage in the first instance court, immediately after the introduction of the sue petition.[1]

At this stage, the parties are mutually aware of their claims and defense, as well as of the means of evidence they intend to administer.[2] The reason for setting up this procedure is, at least on a theoretical level, to increase the efficiency for the trial, to reduce the length of the civil trial, to ensure all procedural guarantees, in particular the right to defense and the principle of contradictory.[3]

As the Constitutional Court of Romania has also decided, in the Decision no. 479 of November 21, 2013, published in the Official Gazette no. 59 of January 23, 2014: "The procedure (...) is the option of the legislator and aims to remedy some deficiencies of the introductory action, so that, at the beginning of the procedure for fixing the first term of trial, it shall contain all the elements provided by Article 194 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The legislator's purpose is disciplining the parties in a trial and thus respecting the principle of celerity and the right to a fair trial. Such a procedure would not affect the very essence of the protected right, since it is also accompanied by the guarantee given by the right to make a request for review under Article 200 par. (4) of the Code of Civil Procedure. Moreover, the court rules on a matter exclusively concerning the proper administration of justice.

However, as the European Court of Human Rights has repeatedly established, most of the procedural rights, by their very nature, are not "civil rights" within the meaning of the Convention and therefore fall outside the field of application of Article 6 of the European Convention for on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (...).

Therefore, while the admission in principle procedure does not concern the substance of the application, the contested provisions do not infringe the provisions relating to the right to a fair trial, since the special procedure in question does not refer to the substance of the cases, the way Article 6 of European Convention for on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms requests, but only on matters of purely legal nature, the examination of which does not necessarily require a debate, with the parties being cited.

Moreover, the procedural means by which justice is carried out also mean the establishment of the rules of the process before the courts, and the legislator, by virtue of its Constitutional role established in Article 126 par. (2) and Article 129 of the Constitutional Law, is able to establish the court procedure, by law. These

* Judge, Teleorman County Court (e-mail: andreiradudinca@yahoo.com)

[1] The following provisions of Article 200 of the Code of Civil Procedure are relevant regarding the conduct of the written procedure: "(3) When the application does not meet the requirements of Art. 194-197, the applicant shall be notified in writing of the shortcomings, stating that within maximum 10 days after receipt of the communication, he shall make the ordered additions or modifications, subject to the sanction of petition annulment. It is exempt from this sanction the obligation to designate a common representative, in which case the provisions of Art. 202 par. (3) are applicable.

(4) If the obligations regarding the filling in or modification of the application provided in Art. 194 lit. a) -c), d) only in the case of factual reasons and f), as well as Art. 195-197, are not fulfilled within the time limit stipulated in par. (3), the application is annulled.

(4 ^ 1) The complainant may not be required to supplement or amend the sue petition with data or information which he or she does not have in person and for which the court is required to intervene.

[2] Gabriel Boroi, „Civil procedural law. Third Edition, revised and added'', Ed. Hamangiu, 2016, București, pag. 332;

[3] Gabriel-Sandu Lefter, „Sue petition regulation – a tool for achieving the right to a fair and and a predictible case'', Private Law Magazine, No. 4/2013, pag. 115-116;

constitutional provisions give expression to the principle also established by the European Court of Human Rights, which, for example, in its Judgment of 16 December 1992, Case Hadjianastassiou v. Greece, paragraph 33, stated that "the The Contracting States enjoy considerable freedom in the choice of the appropriate means to ensure that their judicial systems comply with the requirements of Article 6 (Art. 6). The national courts must, however, indicate with sufficient clarity the grounds on which they based their decision. It is this, inter alia, which makes it possible for the accused to exercise usefully the rights of appeal available to him.''

The possibility of annulling the sue petition is in line with the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, which stated that the sanction of the annulling the application (...) complies with the requirements to be prescribed by law and to pursue a legitimate aim, namely the proper administration of justice (see the inadmissibility decision of April 15, 2014, Case Lefter v. Romania).[4]

The written stage is provided only for the sue petition, not for the incidental claims, even if they have the legal nature of a sue petition, because they are introduced or debated after fixing the first term for the trial.[5] Also, the written stage is incompatible with certain procedures, either because the elements of the sue petition are different from those of ordinary law, or there are situations where there is no need for prior judicial preparation.[6]

It should be noted that the rudiments of this written stage also existed in the old regulation, in Articles 114[7] and 114, index 1[8] of the Old Code of Civil Procedure, but there was no possibility for the judge to annul the sue petition in the case of failure to fulfill the missing requirements, only the possibility of suspending the trial.

Regarding the effectiveness of the written stage[9], a part of the doctrine criticized the limits of the judge's appreciation of the sue petition regularity, but also the increased duration for a case, given that, in the old civil procedural law, simultaneously with the filing of the petition for registration, the first term of the hearing was also set.

It was stated[10] that, in practice, the procedure proved to be extremely rigid, among the most often requested requirements in the notifications to complete the petition were the obligation to indicate the personal numerical code for the defendant, therefore the legal provision which establishes the obligation to communicate these data, "only to the extent that they are known", being neglected.

In addition, part of the doctrine[11] claimed that, in all cases where the applicant did not comply with the obligation to complete or amend the action, the court is entitled to annul the application. It was thus considered that the legislator makes no distinction according to the essential or non-essential nature of the requirements set out in Articles 194-197 or whether they are governed by mandatory or non-mandatory rules. In the absence of legal criteria, the importance assessment of the missing element would be discretionary, left only to the judge's discretion, and if an item is qualified as non-essential, there would be no reason to request the applicant to modify or complete the application.

Indeed, the sanction of the sue petition annulment may occur both for non-compliance with the intrinsic requirements of the petition and for the extrinsic requirements provided by Articles 194-197 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That is why, in principle, the analysis of the elements of the sue petitions concerns any of these aspects, and not just those provided by Article 196, under the penalty of nullity.

However, in order to examine the limits of the judge's discretion in the written procedure, account must be taken of the reason for establishing this stage. It is intended to communicate to the other party an application which allows him to make a complete defense, so that the sue petition annulment will only take place insofar as, because of the ill-formed petition, the conduct of the civil process would be difficult, and the opposing party could not defend itself against a

[4] Traian Cornel Briciu, Claudiu Constantin Dinu, ,,Civil procedural law. Second Edition, revised and added'', Ed. Național, 2018, București, pag. 293;

[5] Gheorghe Florea, ,,New Code of Civil Procedure, commented and annotated. Vol I. – art. 1-526'', Ed. Universul Juridic, 2016, București, pag. 737;

[6] G.-S. Lefter, op. cit, pag. 117;

[7] Article 114 of the Old Romanian Code of Civil Procedure provided as follows: "(1) Upon receipt of the sue petition, the President or the Judge replacing him shall verify that he meets the legal requirements. Where appropriate, the complainant is required to complete or amend the application and to file, in accordance with Art. 112 par. (2) and Art. 113, the application and certified copies of all the documents on which it bases the application.

(2) The claimant shall complete the application immediately. When filling is not possible, the application will be registered and will be given a short term to the complainant. If the application was received by post, the complainant will be notified in writing of its shortcomings, stating that it will make the necessary additions or amendments by the deadline. (...) "

[8] Article 114, index 1, paragraph 1, of the Old Romanian Code of Civil Procedure provided as follows: "The President shall, as soon as he establishes that the conditions laid down by the law for the sue petition are met, shall fix the trial term which, under his signature, is notified for the present applicant or his representative. The other parties will be summoned according to the law. "

[9] Andrei Pap, ,,Diverting the sue petition regulation procedure from the purpose for which it whas regulated in the NCCP. Incidents of judicial practice'', www.juridice.ro;

[10] Elena Ablai, ,,The sue petition regulation – an instrument for imposing a procedural discipline or a filter to prevent the trial?'', www.avocatura.com; For other examples, see also Bogdan Ionescu, ,,Law no. 310/2018. Panorama of amendments and additions to the Code of Civil Procedure'', Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2019, pag. 57;

[11] Viorel Terzea, ,,New Code of Civil Procedure annotated'', Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2016, pag. 425; G.-S. Lefter, op. cit, pag. 118-119; claim with such vices. In other words, the sanction of the petition annulment must be proportionate to the reasons justifying it, and the court is supposed to analyze the proportion for the missing elements affect the proper conduct of the proceedings, so that it cannot communicate the petition to the defendant and, as a consequence, it is necessary to annul the request for summons in the written stage.[12]

2. Legislative changes regarding the written stage

The Romanian legislator made changes regarding the regularization procedure, through Law no. 310 of December 17, 2018 for amending and completing the Law no. 134/2010 on the Code of Civil Procedure, as well as for amending and completing other normative acts.[13]

Thus, Article 200 (4) has been amended in order to restrict the cases in which sanctioning the petition annulment in the written stage may be applied, meaning failure to state legal reasons or the evidence.

In such cases, the court still has the obligation to verify the fulfillment of the sue petition requirements provided by Articles 194-197 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but it can not annul the application anymore.[14]

As it regards the first case, namely the failure to indicate the legal grounds, before the amendment of the Code of Civil Procedure by Law no. 310/2018, it was considered that the absence of the legal grounds does not justify the sanction of invalidity except to the extent that there is proven an injury which cannot be annulled in other way than by the annulment of the petition. Also, if the factual exposition is sufficient to imply the existence of a legal rule, the court should frame the litigious deeds in order to be lawful. Also, the applicant may not be able to indicate the law applicable to his claim, in the context in which legal aid is not compulsory in Romania.[15] Other authors have argued that a sue petition which does not include the legal grounds does not generate a procedural injury which cannot be removed except by the annulment of the procedural act.[16]

However, the legislative amendment is necessary, in the context of a widespread judicial practice of annulling the petitions for failure to state reasons.

The rationale behind this legislative change is that only the factual reasoning is essential, not the legal grounds, the latter being the subject of the court's qualification, and that cannot be done without a contradictory debate.[17] Also, according to Article no. 22 paragraph (4) of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is the judge who gives or restores the legal classification of the trial acts and facts, which often involves a contradictory debate that can not be assured at the written stage.

However, the repeal of this annulment case is effective only at the written stage, the judge still being able to order the petition annulment under the common law. Thus, the judge has the role of establishing the exact legal classification of the trial acts and facts, only after having put this issue to the attention of the parties. Therefore, we appreciate that the solutions provided by the doctrine and the judicial practice before the amendment of the Code of Civil Procedure by Law no. 310/2018 are maintained, meaning that the lack of legal grounds leads to the annulment of the petition if the judge is effectively prevented from proceeding with the qualification and settlement of the application, the legal reasons not being clearly stated or contradictory[18]. This situation will not concern the written stage, but only after the completion of this procedure after contradictory debates.

Law no. 310/2018 repealed the basis for the petition annulment for failure to file evidence. The reason for introducing this amendment is the fact that the absence of evidence by the complainant entails the loss of the right to propose evidence. In addition, part of the doctrine[19] and the judicial practice considered that the sanction of annulment for the sue petition could not have acted insofar as the applicant had requested at least one evidence under procedural regularity, for example the offense report or even a copy of the identity card, for the attestation of the applicant's identity. The sanction of the petition annulment could also have been operating in the case of using a formula which is equivalent to the non-indication of the evidence, "any evidence useful to the case" or simply "witnesses" without indicating their names and addresses.[20]

Thus, the court cannot consider the applicant what type of evidence to submit at the written stage, but only at the end of that stage, under Article 203 of the Code of Civil Procedure, when the first term of the trial is set, the judge is able to provide measures to [12] G. Boroi, op. cit, pag. 351-352;

[13] Published în The Romanian Official Gazette no. 1074/18.12.2018;

[14] Nicolae-Horia Ţiţ, Roxana Stanciu, ,,Law no. 310/2018 to modify and complete the Law no. 134/2010 regarding the Code of Civil Procedure'', Ed. Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2019, pag. 49;

[15] Gheorghe-Liviu Zidaru, ,,Some issues regarding the sue petition regulation and the new regulation of stamp taxes'', www.juridice.ro;

[16] Gheorghe Florea, op.cit, pag. 741;

[17] Traian-Cornel Briciu, Mirela Stancu, Claudiu-Constantin Dinu, Gheorghe-Liviu Zidaru, Paul Pop, ,,Comments on the amendment of the new Civil Procedure Code by Law no. 310/2018. Between the desire for functionality and the trend of restoration'', www.juridice.ro;

[18] Delia-Narcisa Teohari, Gabriel Boroi (coordinator), ,,New Code of Civil Procedure. Comment on articles. Second edition, reviewed and added'', Vol. I, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2016, pag. 573; The Minute of the Civil Departments Presidents' Meeting in Iasi, 7-8 May 2015,pct. 10, www.inm-lex.ro;

[19] Gheorghe-Liviu Zidaru, op. cit; G. Boroi, op. cit., pag. 354; administer the evidence or to carry out the process according to the law.

[20] G.-S. Lefter, op. cit, pag. 128;

However, we appreciate that, in the absence of some evidence, there still may be certain situations under which the judge would be able to order the annulment of the sue petition. We consider the situation of the documents provided by Article 194 letter c) of the Code of Civil Procedure, respectively the fiscal certificate or the land book extract, in the case of immovable property, insofar as failure to do so makes it impossible to determine the object of the claim or its value.[21] However, in this case, the annulment will also take place for not indicating the object or its value, and not for not stating the evidence.

Also, the lack of proof for the representative status, under Article 194 letter b) of the Code of Civil Procedure could lead to the petition annulment in the written procedure, at least at a theoretical level, but it was rightly considered that it would be more useful to fix the first term of trial and to grant a time limit for this irregularity removal, under Article 82.[22]

Even in the context in which the legislator has understood to remove this requirement from those which may lead to the petition annulment under Article 200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we consider that there are no significant changes in the applicant's procedural conduct, except in terms of easier access to a court, in order to analyze the substance of the claim.

On the other hand, for the plaintiff, in the case of rights that need to be exercised within a certain time-limit laid down by law, Article 2.539 par. (2) of the Romanian Civil Code provides that the limitation of the substantive right to action is interrupted if the petition has been annulled by a final judgment if the applicant, within six months of the date on which the decision of rejection or annulment has become final, introduces a new application, provided that the new application is admissible.

Under the new rules, the applicant would no longer be able to benefit from the above-mentioned provisions if he did not indicate the evidence he requested, as the provisions of Article 204 par. (1) of the Code of Civil Procedure remain fully applicable, and it allows the plaintiff to indicate only new evidence at the first term, in relation to those already indicated in the petition.[23] Thus, the applicant will not request evidence which he intends to use directly at the first hearing, as the penalty of right loss, provided by Article 254 par. (1) of the Code of Civil Procedure generally operates.

It should also be noted that in Romanian law, in the absence of evidence, the sue petition will be dismissed as unfounded, and not as unproven. Therefore, we appreciate that sanctioning the right to propose evidence at the written stage is a sufficiently vigorous sanction to establish a certain procedural discipline for the parties. Even if there is no longer any risk for the plaintiff to have his petition filed without a substantive analysis, there is an even greater risk of looking at the merits of the application, in the absence of proposed evidence within the law prescribed time limit.

We note that the New Code of Civil Procedure does not regulate an often found situation in practice, caused by the failure to conduct a written procedure or superficial petition analysis by judges followed by observing its regularity, although it contains some shortcomings related to the provisions of Articles 194-197 (in particular by requesting testimony without indicating the names and addresses for the witnesses).

In that situation, it is clear that the court does not fulfill its obligation to apply the provisions of Article 200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by not considering the applicant's shortcomings of its own petition and, thus, communicates it to the defendant in order to lodge a contestation. On this occasion, we need to point out that a possible regularity statement in a non-contentious procedure does not prevent the defendant from claiming petition irregularities in court. The question then arises: how the court will proceed, seeing the claim with unfulfilled shortcomings at the first hearing, and the defendant invokes those shortcomings?

We consider that, in this situation, at the first hearing, the court will continue to apply the sanction of annulment under the conditions of the common law or the sanction of right loss, with certain nuances.

Under Article 178 par. (3) of the Code of Civil Procedure, unless the law provides otherwise, the relative nullity must be invoked by contestation for the irregularities committed before the commencement of the trial, if the contestation is mandatory. Thus, if the defendant does not claim the petition irregularity of the or the applicant's right loss to propose certain evidence by contestation, we believe that the court might consider the plaintiff to fill the petition shortcomings at the first hearing, as a corollary of respecting the applicant's right of defense, in spite of the court's omission to consider the complainant to remedy the petition's shortcomings.

However, if the defendant invokes the petition irregularity, the applicant is, however, in a position to remedy the petition deficiencies himself, even though they have not been observed by the court, since possible sanctions of invalidity or right loss may only be applied at the first hearing that the parties are lawfully summoned. Therefore, the court would no longer be able to apply the sanction of annulment at the stage of sue petition regularization, because once this phase is over, the trial can no longer return to the initial stage.[24]

[21] See also Mihaela Tăbârcă, „Civil procedural law. Supplement containing comments of Law no. 310/2018'', Ed. Solomon, Bucureşti, 2019, pag. 117;

[22] G. Boroi, op. cit., pag. 353;

[23] Mihaela Tăbârcă, ,op.cit, pag. 114; G. Boroi, op. cit., pag. 397;

[24] G.-S. Lefter, op. cit., pag. 130-131;

If, in the present case, there is an absolute nullity cause regarding the petition, in the sense of Article 178 par. (1) of the Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant or the court may, at any time, invoke the irregularity of the application even if it has not been remedied in the written procedure.

However, we appreciate, as a de lege ferenda proposal, that legislative clarification is required from the legislator, and our proposed solution could underpin this regulation.

Another amendment to Article 200 par. (4) is related to the repealing of the phrase 'given in the council chamber'. In this regard, we draw attention to the fact that, in reality, this does not represent a substantive change in the legislator's view of the way in which the procedures in the written stage take place, because the nature of the written procedure is still non-contentious.

Thus, from the time of filing of the petition to the court and until observing its regularity, followed by the filing of the petition to the defendant, the latter has no knowledge of the trial, so we can talk about the applicability of Article 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure, being the case of a petition that is not intended, at this stage, to establish an adversarial right to another person, since no other person is still involved in this procedure.

As to the non-contentious nature and the provisions of Article 532 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is fully applicable in addition, it follows that, despite the deletion of the phrase 'given in the council chamber', the further annulment of the petition will still be made in the council room.

Another argument is the legislative technique, in the context in which, through Law no. 310/2018 was also amended and Article 402 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which no longer provides for the obligation to pronounce the judgment in public hearing.

Another argument in the sense that the legislative amendment is only apparent is the legal logic: the provisions of Article 200 par. (7) have not been amended, which means that the review of the appeal, namely the request for review of the annulment will also take place in the council room.

We therefore appreciate that this legislative change is only about the general aspect of the legal text, without any practical significance.

We are reporting another legislative amendment, namely the new paragraph 4, index 1, of Article 200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which expressly provides that the claimant cannot be required to supplement or amend the sue petition with data or information which he does not personally dispose and for which the court is required to intervene.

This new legal provision aims to moderate certain trends observed in judicial practice, such as the possibility of annulling the petitions for the mere fact that the applicant did not indicate the data or information requested, although he had indicated that he cannot obtain this data personally.

In fact, there are certain situations in which the parties cannot access certain databases, and the court is able to take the necessary steps, these issues being considered by the legislator through the legislative amendment.

In the doctrine before this legislative amendment, it was rightly assumed that if the plaintiff proves that he has failed to find the defendant's domicile or any other place to be summoned, the court would be able to consent to public summoning or to carry out checks in databases or other electronic content systems held by public authorities and institutions, but the sue petition annulment will not occur.[25]

Moreover, the applicant can not rely on this legal provision if he is required to take action and he fails, even though he would have been able to obtain those information personally (for example, a Trade Registry extract, a land book extract, his own personal numeric code). However, if the plaintiff proves that although he has taken care to obtain the necessary information and the competent authority has refused for legitimate reasons (for example, general data protection) or even if the refusal is abusive, in this case the court can no longer ask the plaintiff to complete the information, but the court itself is going to collect this information.

The written stage has undergone a new amendment by removing the obligation to submit a response for contestation, as it can be seen from the new wording of Article 201 par. (2) and (3). In the old regulation, the plaintiff had the obligation to file a response for contestation, and the new text merely provides the possibility of responding, but the 10-day period after the communication in which this act of procedure can be filed, is maintained, under the same sanction, the right loss to submit this act.

We appreciate this amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure, given that most of times the issues raised in the response didn't bring something new, but the plaintiff reiterated the argument in the initial petition. Also, the deadline for submitting the response was within the written procedure and, in practice, extended its duration. As a result, it lengthened the first hearing date. Under the new circumstances, within 3 days of filing the contestation, the judge will directly determine the first term of the trial and communicate the response to the contestation, instead of running a 10-day deadline, only for the response to contestation.

In the new regulation, the plaintiff enjoys the same right to submit a response, but without being an obligation in the same time. Moreover, the plaintiff may continue to invoke any contestation irregularity or procedural pleas regarding the defendant's contestation and the first hearing to which the parties are legally summoned.[26]

[25] G. Boroi, op. cit., pag. 352;
[26] Traian-Cornel Briciu, Mirela Stancu, Claudiu-Constantin Dinu, Gheorghe-Liviu Zidaru, Paul Pop, op. cit.;

Conclusions

Law no. 310/2018 aimed to correct some of the New Romanian civil procedural law shortcomings, and the new legislative amendments are, in part, the expression of the need for modernization or restoring the legal provisions functionality.

However, it can be noticed that most of legislative amendments in Law no. 310/2018 aim approaching to the Old Civil Procedure Code provisions, and this phenomenon can be explained, in part, by the existence of a real need and, in part, by the resistance to change. Even the waiving of the obligation to submit a response to the contestation, which was the subject of the present study, is an approach to the old legislation, which did not regulate this procedural act.

Indeed, even at the time of the new legislation issue, there were critical voices about the written procedure, and opinions were expressed in the sense that this stage prolonged the trial duration, neglecting the obvious usefulness of this filtering stage, in terms of shortening and streamlining the stage of the judicial investigation. In fact, in the case of the written stage there was only the necessity of making some corrections in order to make the act of justice more effective, aspects, largely done by the latest legislative changes, at least in the aspects considered in our approach.

In conclusion, we welcome the amendments to the New Civil Procedure Code in the matter of sue petition regulation, especially regarding procedure acceleration and creation of additional procedural safeguards for the plaintiff in order to achieve the final stage of the written procedure and to reach settling on the merits of the case.

References

- Elena Ablai, ,,The sue petition regulation – an instrument for imposing a procedural discipline or a filter to prevent the trial?'', www.avocatura.com;
- Gabriel Boroi, ,,Civil procedural law. Third Edition, revised and added'', Ed. Hamangiu, 2016, Bucureşti
- Traian Cornel Briciu, Claudiu Constantin Dinu, ,, Civil procedural law. Second Edition, revised and added'', Ed. Naţional, 2018, Bucureşti
- Traian-Cornel Briciu, Mirela Stancu, Claudiu-Constantin Dinu, Gheorghe-Liviu Zidaru, Paul Pop, ,,Comments on the amendment of the new Civil Procedure Code by Law no. 310/2018. Between the desire for functionality and the trend of restoration'', www.juridice.ro
- Gheorghe Florea, ,,New Code of Civil Procedure, commented and annotated. Vol I. – art. 1-526'', Ed. Universul Juridic, 2016, Bucureşti
- Bogdan Ionescu, ,,Law no. 310/2018. Panorama of amendments and additions to the Code of Civil Procedure'', Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2019
- Gabriel-Sandu Lefter, ,,Sue petition regulation – a tool for achieving the right to a fair and and a predictible case'', Private Law Magazine, No. 4/2013
- Andrei Pap, ,,Diverting the sue petition regulation procedure from the purpose for which it whas regulated in the NCCP. Incidents of judicial practice'', www.juridice.ro
- Mihaela Tăbârcă, ,,Civil procedural law. Supplement containing comments of Law no. 310/2018'', Ed. Solomon, Bucureşti, 2019
- Delia-Narcisa Teohari, Gabriel Boroi (coordinator), ,,New Code of Civil Procedure. Comment on articles. Second edition, reviewed and added'', Vol. I, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2016
- Viorel Terzea, ,,New Code of Civil Procedure annotated'', Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2016
- Nicolae-Horia Ţiţ, Roxana Stanciu, ,,Law no. 310/2018 to modify and complete the Law no. 134/2010 regarding the Code of Civil Procedure'', Ed. Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2019
- Gheorghe-Liviu Zidaru, ,,Some issues regarding the sue petition regulation and the new regulation of stamp taxes'', www.juridice.ro

SIMULATED CONTRACTS BETWEEN THE OLD AND NEW CIVIL CODES OF ROMANIA

Adrian-Gabriel DINESCU[*]

Abstract

The world which gave birth to the New Civil Code is significantly different than the world of the 19th century of the Old Civil Code, as the development of social relationships has been tremendous in the last century, many more people participating actively in society and thus having more incentive to resort to the complex mechanism of simulation in order to mask their true intentions. Thus, the lawmaker of 2011 in Romania has been a lot more careful to describe the effects of simulation between the parties of the simulated contracts, especially in regard to the third parties who acted in good faith. In trying to protect these latter, five articles of the New Civil Code govern these complex relationships which stem, basically, from an instinctual tendency of humans to lie. Also, through-out the 150 years in which the Old Civil Code (inspired by the Napoleon Code of France of 1804) has been in force, tomes of legal literature tried to remedy its obvious deficiencies. In the New Civil Code these suggestions and conclusions, as well as many ideas which stem from court rulings have been assimilated into law. This short paper tries to give a short analysis on these changes and to glimpse at the way the legal professionals involved in interpreting the law will assimilate them.

Keywords: simulation, apparent contracts, sham contracts, effects of simulation, differences between the Old and New Civil Code

1. Introduction

The Old Civil Code of Romania had a long live, approximatively 150 years, between 1865 and 2011, suffering under numerous types of regimes, from authoritarian monarchies to communist dictatorships.

Despite frequent attempts at adopting new Civil Codes[1], the Napoleonian Civil Cod survived until 2011, when a New Civil Code came into force, in an attempt to further the social, cultural and legal development of Romania.

This New Civil Cod has been inspired by numerous other legislations, such as the Quebec Civil Code, the Italian Civil Code etc., the lawmaker trying to assimilate the best of all worlds in an attempt to solve the many legislative hurdles that Romania has had to face, especially after the fall of the communist regime.

Thus the New Civil Code came into force on the 1st of October, 2011, and it is a work of grand proportions, introducing many new institutions but also trying to be in line with traditions our country has had for centuries. This is why in a lot of areas, the New Civil Cod has assimilated the law literature and the jurisprudence of the Romanian courts, trying, and mostly succeeding, in making the Civil Code understandable to the layman and useful for the law professional.

The area of interest to us is regarding simulated contracts or simulation in general, which the Old Civil Code described succinctly at art. 1.175. The New Civil code offers a much more comprehensive description of the institution at art. 1.289 – 1.293.

In this short paper we shall try to ascertain whether the New Civil Code is a change of paradigm or whether it is merely a change of form, a codification of the criticisms of the Old Civil Code.

2. Definition of the institution of simulation and general consequences

Before we try to analyze the differences between the two Codes we think it necessary to try to give a short definition on the institution of simulation and of the simulated contracts.

To simulate is nothing else than to lie about something, to present a distorted truth. Why would a person want to simulate an action? To gain some advantages, of course.

To simulate in contractual matters is nothing less than to elaborate a public contract, which is presented to the outside world as true and which contains an apparent agreement, whilst between the parties, a secret agreement is drawn, the true expression of their will, and which is adversely different than the apparent contract.

Thus, the simulation mechanism works with these concepts: apparent contract (public, but false, known generally to third parties, does not contain the true will

[*] PhD Candidate, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest,. E-mail : dinescu.adrian.gabriel@gmail.com

[1] There have been a few attempts by the lawmaker to elaborate new Civil Codes, more in tune with the times: the Civil Code of 1940, the Civil Code of 1980, the Civil Code of 2004.

of the parties), concealed, hidden contract (contains the true will of the parties, the secret contract, known and producing effects only between the parties, generally not known by third parties) and general agreement to simulate – the simulation mechanism.[2]

Contractual parties usually resort to simulation to hide their true intensions, as these latter ones are either not permissible by law or would impede upon their desired goals. Simulation usually brings advantages. Indeed, parties usually resort to simulated contracts to try to gain some sort of advantage over third parties (creditors, successors) or try to circumvent the law[3].

There are three types of simulated contracts:

a) simulation by interposing another person as contractual party – this type of simulations is usually used by parties who, by law[4] or by private norm, cannot have a contractual relationship regarding a certain right. A "strawman" thus is inserted within the "equation" in order to seem than the right has been passed not to its true successor according to the will of the parties, but to the strawman. The secret contract, however, expresses the fact that the respective right has been passed to its true successor.
b) Simulation by changing the nature of the contract or of some its components – this type of simulation usually entails the concealment of a type of contract which is either not permissible by law or which is detrimental to the interests of the parties. For example, a donation contract of a house is simulated to be a lease contract, in order to hide the property right of the real buyer from his creditors. In this fashion, property of the house is apparently withheld by the donor, while in manifesting their true intent, the parties, through the secret agreement, acknowledged that property of the house shall be transferred to the other party. Parties can also simulate only some aspects of the contract regarding the price, conditions etc., harming the interest of certain third parties.[5]
c) Simulation by fictitious contract. The parties who want to evade their creditors usually hide their intentions through the use of simulation in which they fictitiously relent ownership of a certain right in favor of another person, while, in reality, retaining ownership through the means of the true agreement as part of the simulation. This true agreement entails that ownership has not passed to the other party, but has stayed with the initial owner.

Now that we have briefly shown the types of simulations which the law literature has elaborated through-out the history of Romanian and Continental law, we ought to state that the Romanian lawmaker did not choose to sanction this complex operation with nullity, but had a rather more tolerant approach – inopposability. Indeed, other legislations have been a lot harsher towards the operation. For example, Hungarian law does not tolerate such lies and sanctions the operation with nullity, this nullity having effect on third parties as well. Spanish law, also, sanctions the apparent contract with nullity. German and Austrian lawmakers have also not been tolerant of this operation.

Inopposability means that while the true will of the parties, as expressed in the secret, but true contract produces consequences between the parties, it cannot produce consequences in regard to third parties, with the exception of the situations in which the true will of the parties creates advantages for the third party.

This sanction of inopposability also means that neither the apparent contract, nor the hidden one are null and void. The true will of the parties produces consequences only between them, whilst only the apparent, but deceitful, contract produces consequences before third parties.

This is the main effect of simulation in the Romanian legislation: only the false and simulated will of the parties produces consequences in regard to third parties.

The reader can easily imagine that this complex sanction applied to the simulation operation will have complex consequences, as well, in regard to third parties who might be interested in using the concealed contract for their own interests.

3. Simulated contracts in the Old and New Civil Code. Differences. Effects and consequences.

The Old Civil Code contained merely one article concerning the complex mechanism of simulation: art. 1.175 which entailed that the secret contract that modified a public contract produces consequences only in regard to the contractual parties and their personal successors, but cannot produce consequences in regard to other persons.

Thus, from this succinct article spawned a myriad of interpretations from the professional law literature as well as from the Romanian courts. In principle these effects have been in accordance with the interpretations given by the French courts and the French law

[2] A. Menyhard, E. Veress, New civil Codes în Hungary and Romania, ed. Springer, 2017, p. 169, published on Google books.

[3] F. Baias, "Simulația – Studiu de doctrină și jurisprudență", ed. Rosetti, Bucharest, 2003, p. 163.

[4] In the Romanian legal system judges cannot buy certain rights which are pending judgement, and thus, having this special status and interdiction, judges usually refer to simulation through the participation of a "strawman" who buys the respective right, while the true agreement states that ownership of the right will not be the strawman's but the true contractual party, the judge – at. 1.653 Romanian Civil Code. In this case, the entire simulation will be null and void according to the New Civil Code which copies the old provisions of the Old Civil Code.

[5] Fiscal simulations, unfortunately, are quiet common in Romania, as parties usually try to conceal the true price of the transaction from the state in order to pay less taxes. While the Romanian lawmaker has, in general, been quite tolerant of simulated contacts, in this case the contract is null and void, as the state has to have leverage over people who try to skimp on taxes.

literature, as the Old Civil Code was thoroughly inspired form the French Code of 1804.

The New Civil Code tries to delve more thoroughly into the matters of simulation through the use of five articles: art. 1.289 – art. 1.293 C.civ.

Whatever the changes may have been, the definition, in principle, of the mechanism and the effects of simulation have remained the same: the secret contract can only produce effects between the parties of the simulation, and cannot produce effects against third parties.[6]

Thus, the New Civil Code has retained the tolerant approach towards the act of simulating, not choosing the powerful sanctions other lawmakers chose (the entire operation being null and void), like in the Hungarian legislation.

In justifying this decision, the Romanian lawmaker expressed that the tolerant tradition of the Romanian people is incompatible with harsh sanctions such as nullity. The Romanian lawmaker expressed that this sanction can only be applied when law explicitly forbids the parties to resort to contractual simulations. In other words, the law has to sanction the simulation mechanism per se, otherwise it will be permissible in the Romanian legislation.

We believe that this approach is a pragmatic one, as the lawmaker could see that the effects on innocent third parties could be terribly harsh if the simulation would be null and void. Also the Romanian lawmaker accepted that simulations are not necessarily a heinous crime, but rather an adaptation of contractual parties to certain situations.[7]

Also, in principle, to hide the true nature of the contract, either in regard to its clauses, or in regard to certain aspects, or even its own fictitiousness, it not always fraudulent, the simulation can actually have quite noble aspirations. For example, a person wishes to gratify another person who has proven himself to excel in his field of study, but wants to retain his anonymity – the anonymous philanthropist. In this instance, he will have interest in resorting to the simulation mechanism, hiding himself before a "strawman".

Thus, the New Civil Code has maintained the legality of simulation, in principle, the lawmaker sanctioning the operation only in special cases or situations.

In the Romanian legal system, the simulation is considered to be neutral - it does not have a certain positive or negative meaning. The mechanism of simulation cannot validate a certain invalid contract and, vicevera, cannot invalidate a valid agreement[8].

In our discussion about the differences between the Old Civil Code and New Civil Code, at art. 1.289, the New Civil Code, after decades of conflict between different law authors and between the law literature and courts, concluded that the secret, but true contract must not honor the mandatory conditions of validity regarding form. Thus, the real contract must only honor the substantial requirements, as all contracts do. In other words, in the case of simulation, the simple and valid will of the parties is enough to form the contract, irrespective of special mandatory conditions concerning form.[9]

This is an extremely important mention in the new legislation, putting an end to all debate regarding this subject and positioning the Romanian legislations as one of the most tolerant legislations in Europe.

Even the Italian legislation which inspired the Romanian simulation legislation has stricter provisions in regard to this matter, requiring the true contract between the parties to adhere to the legal provisions regarding substance as well as form.

For example, if two parties – A and B – want to conceal their true will of donating a product from A in favor of B, they can resort to the simulation mechanism and enter into a sham, apparent agreement of sale. The parties are incentivized to choose a sale agreement as it has many advantages: the heirs of the donor cannot contest the legality of the sale if their reserve is reduced, B's creditors lose the ability to claim the amount that was the price of the product etc.

According to art. 813 C.civ., the donation is subject to special form requirements - all donations should hold the authentic form.

But, this donation being a part of the simulation mechanism, being the true, but hidden contract, does not have to abide by the special form requirements and thus the parties, just through their will, can legally wrap the donation contract into a sale contract.

Secondly, articles 1.290 and 1.291 are new introductions into the Romanian civil legislation, showing how the simulation mechanism can harm the interests of third parties: objective successors (persons who acquired assets from the parties of the simulation) and creditors.

These two articles are the innovations of the Romanian lawmaker in the New Civil Code and they mainly transpose into law the conclusions of the Romanian courts as well as the law literature.

Art. 1.290 stipulates that the secret contract cannot be enforced by the contractual parties, their personal and objective successors[10], nor by the creditors of the apparent seller against third parties

---

[6] F. Baias, art. 1.289 and the following in "Noul Cod civil. Comentariu pe articole", ed. CH Beck, Bucharest, 2012.

[7] See also, regarding the Old Civil Code - C. Hamangiu, I. Rosetti – Bălănescu, Al. Băicoianu, "Tratat de Drept Civil Român", ed. Ciornei, Bucharest, 1928, p. 853.

[8] G. Chivu, "Simulația în teoria și practica dreptului civil", ed. Argonaut, Cluj-Napoca, 2001, p. 36

[9] F. Baias & other authors, "Noul Cod civil. Comentariu pe articole", ed. CH Beck, Bucharest, 2012, the analysis at art. 1.289 C.civ.

[10] The personal successor is the universal successor of a party, the person who continues the personality of the defunct after the event of his demise. The personal successor is the general heir of all rights of obligations. The objective successor, on the other hand, is the person that who, in good faith, have gained rights from the apparent acquirer. The secret agreement is effective between the parties of the simulation.

This article is a summary or a conclusion of 100 years of terrible ordeal concerning the effects of the mechanism of simulation and gives the ultimate favor to the third party – the possibility of ignoring the true will of the parties captured in the true contract, and giving them the benefit of basing their decision on the apparent, but sham, contract.

This is a great benefit, in general, for third parties, as they usually gained rights or assets from an apparent acquirer exactly because, having knowledge only of the apparent contract, they, in good faith, considered the apparent owner to be the true one.

This is the typical sanction of simulation: the true will of the parties shall not take effect against third parties who acted in good faith.

Also, worth mentioning is the fact that the Romanian lawmaker stipulated the notion of "good faith" or "good will", an idea previously only present in law literature or court rulings.

In general, in the case of simulation, a third party is of good faith when this party is rightfully ignorant of the true contract, of the true will of the parties and, acting upon this good will, enters into agreements with the apparent owner of a specific right.

Good faith also implies that the third party entering into agreement with the apparent owner checked all public registries ensuring that the party he contracts with is the true owner of the right. For example, if the third party acquires a house, then he must check the land registry in order to ensure that the seller is the true proprietor of the house. If he acquires the house from another person than that shown in the land registry, then he may be considered to have bought the house "in bad faith".

Moreover, art. 1.291 of the New Civil Code, regulates the relationships between the simulation parties and the creditors, as well as between the creditors themselves.

Art. 1.291 par. 1 of the New Civil Code stipulates that the secret contract is not effective against the creditors of the apparent acquisitor who, in good faith, registered their foreclosure proceedings in the land registry or obtained a seizure of the asset object of the simulation.

It must be noted that this norm is not necessarily groundbreaking in the general regulation of the contract simulation, but it is a novelty addition as it clearly offers the inopposability solution only with certain conditions: to be given this huge benefit, the creditor of the apparent acquirer must uphold some special conditions. He must have registered the foreclosure proceedings in the land registry or obtained a seizure of the asset object of the simulation.

If these special requirements are not met, then the secret contract will be effective against the creditor of the apparent acquisitor, and thus he will not be able to hide under the "cape" of inopposability. This norm is a faithful copy of the Italian provisions who offer the same solution in this case.

The main victims of the simulation are not, usually, the creditors of the apparent acquisitor, but they have an incentive to begin foreclose proceedings against their debtor, seeing that he has gained new assets from the apparent seller.

However, these creditors are not preferred by art. 1.291, unless the very special conditions presented above are met. Otherwise, if they did not obtain a judicial seizure of the asset or they have not registered the foreclosure, then they will be have to bear the effects of the true contract.

If the creditor of the apparent acquisitor is not the true victim of the simulation mechanism, then who is this true victim?

Finally, we reached an important point in which the modern Romanian lawmaker chose a different path than the legislator of 1865: art. 1.291 par. 2 New Civil Code stipulates that if the creditor of the apparent acquisitor comes into conflict with the creditor of the apparent seller, the latter will have prevalence, as, in our opinion, he is most of the time the real target of the simulation, the reason why the parties resorted to this complex scheme: in order to reduce the number of assets the creditor can use to satisfy his claim.

However, there is one condition: that the claim of the creditor of the apparent seller is previous to the claim of the creditor of the apparent acquisitor.

If the claim of the creditor of the apparent seller was born after the claim of the creditor of the apparent acquisitor, then there is no reason to protect the first, as he has become creditor knowing full well the assets that his debtor had.

In this latter case, the creditor of the apparent acquisitor will prevail over the creditor of the apparent seller, as the second one fights against a loss and the first fights for enrichment. Time and time again the Romanian legislator has considered that between fighting against loss and fighting for enrichment, the first one will always prevail.

The solution chose by the Romanian legislator in the New Civil Code is again in tune with the Italian Civil Code, at art. 1.416, being also a 180 degree turn from the court rulings and the law literature of the Old Civil Code.

We think that this solution is just and is a welcome improvement.

Finally, at art. 1.292 of the New Civil Code, the legislator stipulated that proof of simulation can be made between parties only through the means put forth by normal contractual law, with the exception of the illicit simulation, when parties can use any and all means of proof. Proof of the simulation can be made by third parties through any means.

only gain a certain right or asset. Of course, he will have to suffer all the obligations in connection to that asset as well being party to all conventions limiting a particular right over that asset.

4. Conclusion

Contract simulation is a complex mechanism, tolerated to a certain degree in Romanian legislation, under the Old Civil Code, as under the New Civil Code.

However, the New Civil Code has departed from some old opinions of the Romanian courts or of the Romanian law literature and chose new remedies to try to bring order between the conflicting interests of the simulation parties as well as the third parties.

The New Civil Code is, without a doubt, an improvement concerning the regulation of simulated contracts, offering concrete stipulations and being careful not to harm the interests of third parties who acted in good faith, a lot more than the stipulations of the Old Civil Code.

This is natural, as the world which gave birth to the New Civil Code is significantly different that the world of the 19th century, of the Old Civil Code, the development of social relationships has been tremendous in the last century, many more participating actively in social activities and thus having more incentive to resort to the complex mechanism of simulation.

References

- F. Baias, ”Simulația – Studiu de doctrină și jurisprudență”, ed. Rosetti, Bucharest, 2003.
- F. Baias & other authors, ”Noul Cod Civil Comentat”, ed. CH Beck, Bucharest, 2012.
- G. Chivu, ”Simulația în teoria și practica dreptului civil”, ed. Argonaut, Cluj-Napoca, 2001.
- C. Hamangiu, I. Rosetti – Bălănescu, AL. Băicoianu, ”Tratat de Drept Civil Român”, ed. Ciornei, Bucharest, 1928.
- A. Menyhard, E. Veress, ”New civil Codes in Hungary and Romania”, ed. Springer, 2017, available on Google Books, p. 169.

SHORT ESSAY ON THE LEGAL EFFECTS OF SIMULATED CONTRACTS IN REGARD TO THIRD PARTIES

Adrian-Gabriel DINESCU[*]

Abstract

The simulation is a lie born out of the will of the parties to evade showing successors or third parties the truth. The Romanian legislation has a tolerant approach towards simulation, and permits it, in general. The New Civil Code does not sanction the mechanism of simulation with nullity, but offering the rather milder sanction of inopposability. This short paper will strive to give a short analysis on the effects of this simulation upon the third parties – the objective successors and the creditors of the parties. The New Civil Code has numerous stipulations in order to regulate these complex effects as to avoid harming the interests of these third parties who usually act in good faith and gain rights from the parties of the simulation. These parties should and are protected by law, exactly because they acted in good faith. The objective successor of the apparent acquisitor will be protected against the true will of the parties, as, in general this true will harms his interests. Also, this paper will analyze the special situation of the creditors of the apparent seller and of the apparent aquisitor, as their situation can vary according to the person they come into conflict with.

Keywords: simulation, sham contracts, good faith, third parties and creditors, inopposability

1. Introduction

Simulated contracts are quite an often occurrence in our modern era, as more and more people are participating actively in the civil circuit, acquiring goods and services and trying to fulfill their interests.

The Romanian legislator, observing this increase in activity, in order to better protect individuals from the chaos of private initiative increased regulation. The typical example is the New Civil Code which is packed with stipulations. However this influx of legislation can cause a vicious circle as people, seeing all these norms which limit their possibility to engage in trade and other commercial activities, resort more and more often to the complex mechanism of simulation to hide their true intents.

The simulated contract, containing in its mechanism a duality of contracts - a public but sham contract and a secret, but true one - is well known to its parties, as they voluntarily committed to resort to this "lie". More problematic is the effect of this mechanism on third parties who acted in good faith and contracted with one of the parties of the simulation.

Thus, we consider essential in drawing up a short analysis on the effects of simulation upon these third parties, distinguishing between third parties who acted in good faith and those who manifested bad faith.

2. Types of third parties

First of all we must assess what participants form this category of "third parties" as to distinguish them from the parties who elaborated the simulated contract.[1]

The third parties, in general, are considered to be the people who are rightfully ignorant of the simulated contract, who do not know the existence of the hidden contract - the objective successors of the parties as well as the creditors.

The first category, the objective successors, are persons who inherit assets or rights from another person, but these rights and assets are individually determined and not part of an universality of goods. The objective successor thus gains these rights from the people who owned them previously and must adhere to all obligations linked to these assets or rights.

This category is in opposition to the subjective successor who is merely a continuation of the personality of a person who ended his existence. The subjective successor gains the universality of the rights and obligations of a personal, being also named a "universal successor".

The creditors of a person, unlike all other types of parties or successors of these parties, have merely a general claim on the assets of their debtor, all these assets comprising the entire collateral of the creditor. In case of default by the debtors, the creditor can foreclose on any of the assets of the debtor.

The major problem of the creditor is that he only has this general claim on the assets of the debtor and thus he must pay close attention to him and ensure that the debtor does not enter into fraudulent agreements in order to reduce the number of assets and thus harming the interests of the creditor.

It has also been said that, along with the objective successors, the creditors are more often than not the direct victim of the intention of the parties to simulate[2], the debtor trying through all means to reach a state close to bankruptcy or even bankruptcy in order for the creditor to be unable to fulfill his claim.

[*] PhD Candidate, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest,. E-mail : dinescu.adrian.gabriel@gmail.com

[1] For an analysis of the "third parties" in simulation see also F. Baias, "Simulația – Studiu de doctrină și jurisprudență", ed. Rosetti, Bucharest, 2003, p. 141.

3. Effects of the simulation regarding third parties

The Old Civil Code had very succinct stipulations regarding this issue, for it had only one article dealing with the problem of simulation and its effects on the third parties, including the creditors and objective successors.

At art. 1.175 C.civ., the Old Civil Code merely stated that the secret contract, as part of the simulation mechanism, cannot be enforced against third parties.[3]

The New Civil Code, however, which came into force on October 1st 2011, has a much more elaborate take on the norms concerning the effects of the simulation against third parties.

Art. 1.290 C.civ. stipulates that the simulation cannot be enforced by the parties, their personal successors, their objective successors, nor by the creditors of the apparent seller against third parties who manifesting good faith gained rights from the apparent acquisitor.

Art. 1.291 par. 1 of the New Civil Code stipulates that the secret contract is not effective against the creditors of the apparent acquisitor who, in good faith, registered their foreclosure proceedings in the land registry or obtained a seizure of the asset object of the simulation.

It is worth mentioning that the simulated agreement made up by the parties is not, in the Romanian legal system, subject to nullity, but merely the true will of the parties, the true contract, is inopposable to the third parties who, in good faith, gained rights from a sham owner.

This is in opposition to quite a number of law systems in Europe who deal much more "violently" with this type of fraudulent behavior, declaring the entire simulated operation as null and void and incapable of producing effects against any person.

3. 1. What is good faith in matters of simulation?

Entire treaties have been written regarding the notion of "good faith", and in our short essay we cannot even hope to give an accurate and complete definition on this complicated affair.

We shall mention, however, that acting in good faith a person must follow only the paths that the law has permitted him to take and must act seeking only just and reasonable goals.

A person acted in good faith in matters of simulation when he was rightly ignorant of the simulation mechanism. This does not mean that he was negligent or he ignored the existence of the simulation with malice, for his own unjust reason, but rather undertook all means at this disposal to make sure that the apparent contract which he himself bases his decisions on is the true contract, containing the true will of the parties.

For example, if he acquired a house from a seller, only if he acted with good will, in good faith, and he took all the necessary measures, including checking the land registry, as to ensure that the seller is the true owner of the house, will he receive the benefit of inoposability in case the person who sold him the house was only a "strawman" or an apparent owner.

If he was of bad faith, if he knew that the person who sold him the right, was nothing more than an apparent owner, than he will not be protected when the true owner claims his right.

3.2. Inopposability of the secret contract in regard to objective successors

Thus, the objective successor, in order to gain the benefits awarded by art. 1.290 C.civ. must always manifest good faith and must enter into an agreement with the apparent acquisitor only manifesting this good will.

The objective successor, thus, gained rights from the apparent acquisitor who himself gained these rights from the apparent seller.

For us to better understand these stipulations we must define the notions of "apparent seller" and "apparent acquisitor".

Simulated contracts, usually, take three forms:

- simulation through the interposing of a third person, a so called "strawman" who although is mentioned as part of the agreement, is merely a front in order to present to the "outside" world an apparent and untrue contract.
- simulation through fictitiousness. The parties of the simulation enter into an agreement which is only apparently real, but in true fact, it is merely a sham contract, the true agreement between parties stating the unreal character of the transaction.
- simulation through disguise. The parties apparently choose a type of agreement (for example, a sale contract), although in reality they chose another type of contract (for example, a donation contract). They simulate reality in order to better protect their interests against limiting factors such as third parties or even the law, when the latter does not permit them to enter into the real agreement.

The "apparent seller" is party to simulation and chooses to fictitiously enter into an agreement with the "apparent acquisitor", all these parties knowing full well that the apparent contract is a sham one.

The real contract may be a contract in which the parties merely have leased the asset. The parties may have even resorted to a fictitious act, where the true owner is still the "apparent seller" who held onto his rights fully.

[2] F. Baias, "Simulația – Studiu de doctrină și jurisprudență", ed. Rosetti, Bucharest, 2003, p. 154.
[3] See also G. Chivu, "Simulația în teoria și practica dreptului civil", ed. Argonaut, Cluj-Napoca, 2001, p. 78.

It is irrelevant for the objective successors the nature of the contract. The only thing that matters is that they, in good faith and considering the apparent contract, entered into an agreement not with the true owner of the right, but with merely an „apparent aquisitor" and thus with a non-owner.

In the absence of art. 1.290, their position might have been quite precarious, as they would have been extremely vulnerable against the „apparent seller", the true owner of the right.

But this is exactly where art. 1.290 comes in and protects the objective successors from losing their right – if they entered into an agreement with the „apparent aquisitor" and in good faith gained rights from this person who is not the true owner, the true contract, the real but hidden one, cannot be effective against them – they can ignore the true will of the simulation parties.

This is the typical sanction of the simulation mechanism – the true intent of the parties of the simulated contract is not effective against the third party who contracted in good faith the apparent aquisitor.

Thus, the third party, the objective successor of the apparent aquisitor, is protected from losing his right, although he did not enter into agreement with the real owner of that right.

All this is because he manifested good faith and accepted the apparent contract as true.

Of course, between the parties of the simulated contract this situation is difficult, as the apparent acquisitor, knowing full well that he is just a sham owner, chose to sell further on this right in order to gain pecuniary advantages, harming in a deliberate manner the ownership right of the apparent seller, the true owner.

The parties of the simulated contract will have to sort this complex legal situation for themselves, as this is completely irrelevant for the objective successors who gained rights from the apparent acquisitor, in good faith.

They will be able to keep the rights they acquired, as if they had entered into an agreement with the true seller.

3.3. Inopposability of the secret contract in regard to creditors

As we mentioned above, the creditors merely have a general claim on the assets of the debtor, they, generally speaking, have no special position or special guarantee concerning these assets and thus are prone to all kinds of fraudulent behavior by the debtor who tries to evade them and not satisfy their claim.[4]

This is why debtors enter constantly into fraudulent agreements, including resorting to simulation in order to trick these creditors into thinking they have no assets.

Knowing full well this behavior, the Romanian lawmaker stipulated that the secret agreement born between two parties who hide their true intentions through a sham, apparent contract cannot be effective against third parties, including creditors.

This conclusion can be extracted by interpreting the stipulations at art. 1.289 – 1.291 C.civ. It is worth mentioning that the norms at art. 1.290 and 1.291 in the New Civil Code are special applications of the general rule enshrined at art. 1.289 C.civ. They are nothing more than the materialization of the will of the lawmaker to put an end to several debates concerning the effects of simulation in regard to third parties.

Thus, the main rule will be that the parties and their personal successor cannot oppose the secret agreement in regard to creditors, as they are third parties to the mechanism of simulation.

However, although the legislator has not made this distinction, we must further our study and see if it matters if the claim of the creditor is previous to the simulation or if the claim was born after the secret agreement.

In the case of the creditor of the apparent seller:

If the creditor's claim is previous to the simulated contract, then the above shown articles are fully applicable, even if the creditor knew that his debtor would enter into the secret agreement because he couldn't do anything about it, he cannot prevent his debtor into entering secret agreements.

It if the creditor's claim is born after his debtor entered into the secret agreement, than his good faith is essential, because if he knew about the simulation, then he accepted the role of creditor knowing the full extent of his debtor's assets. In this case, he will have interest in claiming that the true contract is the one effective between parties, as this contract is the one containing the true will of the parties.

If he didn't know and couldn't of known about the real contract, then he is of good faith and can act in any way he considers fit, but he mostly will act in the same way, having interest in bringing forth the true contract, as this one ensures that the will of the simulation parties is the true one and that the assets he could foreclose upon are still in the possession of his debtor.

Anyway, in general, the sanction which the law enshrines in this case is not nullity, of course, but rather the creditor, having interest, can ask that only the true contract be effective against him, as it is the true contract.

This is one of the cases in which a third party, does not ask for inopposability of the true will of the parties, but rather for the inopposability of the sham contract, having interest in maintaining the true intent of the parties.

In the case of the creditor of the apparent acquisitor

[4] See also F. Baias & other authors, "Noul Cod civil. Comentariu pe articole", ed. CH Beck, Bucharest, 2012, the analysis at art. 1.290-1.291 C.civ.

This creditor will, in general, have an interest to ensure that the sham contract will prevail over the true one in relation to any other person.

This is because the creditor of the apparent acquisitor gained rights from the apparent buyer and thus has interest to maintain the apparent contract as it offers him more assets to foreclose upon in case his debtor, the apparent acquisitor, can't settle his claim.

However, the creditor of the apparent acquisitor must have entered into an agreement with the apparent acquisitor, in good faith, ignorant that his debtor has an asset which is the object of a simulation.

If the creditor of the apparent acquisitor knew that the respective asset is, in reality, not his debtor's, than he will have the status of creditor of bad faith concerning the simulation and will now be able to ask for the benefit of inopposability.

It may be even the case that the creditor is in collusion with the parties of the simulation, being himself a party and trying to further the dishonest and fraudulent activity in order to harm the interests of other creditors or objective successors.

In this case, of course, the creditor will be held by the true contract which contains the true will of the parties, as he was truly aware of its existence.

However, is the creditor of the apparent acquisitor is of good faith he will be able to prevent the effectiveness of the real, but hidden contract, but only under the special conditions of art. 1.291 C.civ. : the secret contract is not effective against the creditors of the apparent acquisitor who, in good faith, registered their foreclosure proceedings in the land registry or obtained a seizure of the asset object of the simulation.

Thus, unlike the protection offered by the Romanian lawmaker for the creditor of the apparent seller, the legislator offered the special benefit of inopposability for the creditor of the apparent acquisitor only if he fulfills the conditions mentioned above because of one important factor : the creditor of the apparent buyer will fight to obtain an extra benefit, another asset for him to foreclose upon, while the creditor of the apparent seller will fight to prevent a loss, than of an asset. Between these contrary interests, naturally, the Romanian law maker preferred the person who is fighting to prevent a loss, rather than the person fighting to win further benefits.

3.4. Effects of the simulated contract between third parties

The lawmaker of the New Civil Code has not only included norms to settle the relationship between the parties of the simulation and third parties, but also between third parties.

Art. 1.290 stipulates that the true contract cannot be opposed by the creditors of the apparent seller against the third parties, objective successors, who gained rights from the apparent acquisitor.

So in this case, the law states that the objective successors of the apparent acquisitor are preferred rather than the creditors of the apparent seller simply because the first ones, in good faith, gained rights in light of the apparent contract, while the creditors of the apparent seller will bring forth the true will of the parties. This true will manifested in the true, but hidden contract, cannot be made effective against the objective successors who entered into an agreement with the apparent acquisitor considering, in good faith, that the sham contract is real.

On the other hand, art. 1.291 par. 2 stipulates that when there is conflict between the creditors of the apparent seller and the creditors of the apparent acquisitor, the first ones are preferred if their claim is previous to the sham contract.

Indeed, this position of the lawmaker is contrary to the previous one, giving priority not to the creditors of the apparent acquisitor who considered, in good faith, the apparent contract to be the real one, but rather to the creditors of the apparent seller.

This is because, as mentioned above, the creditor of the apparent seller is generally the direct "victim" of the simulation and he fights against a loss, while the creditor of the apparent acquisitor fights only to enrich the assets of this own debtor.

4. Conclusions

The typical effect against third parties of the simulation is usually inopposability of the true will of the parties, as the sham, but apparent contract will be the only one to be effective against these third parties because it is the only one who is shown to the world and any person, entering into an angreement with the parties of the simulation will know only of the apparent contract and not of the true will of the parties.

Thus, the Romanian lawmaker gave this important benefit to the third parties taking into consideration that they acted in good faith and deserve to win against the fraudulent intent of the parties who chose to "lie" in order to protect their interests.

However, as we have seen, difficulties may appear when third parties have conflicting interests, some having interests to uphold the real, but hidden contract, while others choosing to uphold the sham, but apparent contract.

In this situation the New Civil Code offers us just solutions, trying to curtail the myriad of interpretation given in the past by the Romanian courts as well as the Romanian law literature.

References

- F. Baias, "Simulația – Studiu de doctrină și jurisprudență", ed. Rosetti, Bucharest, 2003.
- F. Baias & other authors, "Noul Cod Civil Comentat", ed. CH Beck, Bucharest, 2012.
- G. Chivu, "Simulația în teoria și practica dreptului civil", ed. Argonaut, Cluj-Napoca, 2001.

EU FACILITATES NEW RULES FOR CROSS-BORDER MOBILITY OF COMPANIES

Gabriela FIERBINŢEANU[*]
Vasile NEMEŞ[]

Abstract

Legal certainty is needed in the Company Law area, and this could be obtained if all the factors act jointly to achieve this aim by introducing division and conversion regulation, improving legal framework on mergers and in this manner create for company law the possibility to interact properly with EU legal framework specially designed to ensure that cross border operations will not be used in abusive way.

The proposed Company Law Package by the European Commission which consists of two proposals for Directives amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132:Directive as regards the use of digital tools and processes in company law and Directive as regards cross-border conversions, mergers and divisions will achieve its best results only when both instruments could work together, complementing each other. Online solutions for European businesses so that they cut costs and save time and the choice of where to do business and how to grow or reorganise their businesses for honest entrepreneurs should push for a fairer modern Single Market. For the first time in European Union law, rules are provided for cross border conversions and divisions and the regime of cross border merger is improved, the legal framework being adapted to the economic and social realities.

Keywords: conversions, divisions, freedom of establishment, artificial arrangement, safeguards for employees

1. Introduction

On 25 April 2018 the European Commission adopted the "Company Law package", which consists of two proposals for Directives amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132, the Directive as regards the use of digital tools and processes in company law ('digitalisation') and Directive as regards cross-border conversions, mergers and divisions ('mobility')[1].

The proposed rules of Mobility directive aim to regulate the uncontrollable behavior of companies, which are using some sequential operations to achieve a final scope, freedom of establishment, because of the lack of provisions in the field of conversions and divisions[2]. Legal certainty is needed in the Company Law area, and this could be obtained if all the factors act jointly to achieve this goal by introducing division and conversion regulation, improving legal framework on mergers and in this manner create for company law the possibility to interact properly with EU legal framework specially designed to ensure that cross border operations will not be used in abusive way.

The following paper is an introductory one and intends to look at the content of the Proposal with a special regard to conversions and divisions providing an overview of the safeguards for employees and also of " artificial arrangement" concept red in conjunction with freedom of establishment under art.49 of TFEU.

2. Content

2.1 Artificial arrangement and freedom of establishment

As article 49 TFEU[3] provides "Within the framework of the provisions set out below, restrictions on the freedom of establishment of nationals of a Member State in the territory of another Member State shall be prohibited. Such prohibition shall also apply to restrictions on the setting-up of agencies, branches or subsidiaries by nationals of any Member State established in the territory of any Member State.

Freedom of establishment shall include the right to take up and pursue activities as self-employed persons and to set up and manage undertakings, in particular companies or firms within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 54, under the conditions laid down for its own nationals by the law of the country where such establishment is effected, subject to the provisions of the Chapter relating to capital".

In cross border mobility area, the ECJ has addressed the issue on the basis of the freedom of establishment under Art. 49 TFEU in a series of

[*] Gabriela Fierbinţeanu, author, Assistant lecturer Civil and Commercial Law, PhD, Faculty of Law, Nicolae Titulescu University,Bucharest(gabriela.fierbinteanu@gmail.com)

[] Vasile Nemeş, co-author, Associate professor PhD, Commercial Law, Faculty of Law, Nicolae Titulescu University, Bucharest(nemes@nemes-asociatii.ro)

[1] https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=COM:2018:241:FIN

[2] For instance, a company might divide at national level and merge cross-border with another company or create a new company abroad and transfer part of their assets and liabilities to newly created company. Also in the absence of clear rules on cross border conversions, a company could also be wound – up and created a new one in another MS judgments in the last decade[4]with a special concern in the matter of the obstacles which Member States can raise in the case of a cross border transfer, the problem of the transfer of seat being already on the legislative agenda since 1997 .[5]One of the important topics in this area is possible circumvention of the rules through an artificial arrangement aimed at obtaining undue tax advantages or unduly prejudging the rights of minority shareholders, creditors or employees. As European Parliament stated in its Explanatory Statement to the Draft Report on the proposal for a directive of the European Parliament and of the Council amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132 as regards cross-border conversions, mergers and divisions drawn by Committee on Legal Affairs[6], "the creation of artificial arrangements, so-called „letterbox-companies", „shell-companies" or „front subsidies" needs to be prevented. Letterbox-companies are artificial creatures of company law, which is therefor the appropriate and best place to tackle their formation as such. They are established by registration in a Member State while conducting its business in other Member states, with the aim to avoid national tax laws, social security contributions, collective agreements, employee participation laws or other national laws affected".

[3] https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:12012E/TXT&from=EN

The proposed Directive does not provide for a definition of " artificial arrangement" which at this stage we consider it was a wise regulatory choice. The text only indicates in Article 86 c para 3 that the kind of artificial arrangement that could lead to a refusal of the competent authority to authorise cross border operation must be aimed at obtaining undue tax advantages or at unduly prejudicing the legal or contractual rights of employees, creditors or minority members. As in Cadbury Schweppes case was observed , restricting freedom of establishment on the ground of prevention of abusive practices, must have the objective to prevent conduct involving the creation of wholly artificial arrangements which do not reflect economic reality, with a view to escaping the tax normally due on the profits generated by activities carried out on national territory. However the proposed grounds ( undue tax advantages and undue prejudice caused to employees, creditors or minority members) are vague, not allowing to Member States much flexibility regarding the needed control in their own legal systems. Also, with the instruments already provided by Article 6[7] of Council Directive (EU) 2016/1164of 12 July 2016 laying down rules against tax avoidance practices that directly affect the functioning of the internal market, the question whether an ex-ante examination of possible tax abuse is really needed may rise.Nevertheless, some difficulties could also appear while competent authorities should have to carry out an extensive assessment of the possible aims of a the cross-border conversion.There may be other corporate schemes that could be considered "artificial arrangement", without targeting the effective economic activity in the destination Member State or other forms of evasion or circumvention of company's obligations.

On the other hand, considering the ECJ case law "the fact that it [a company] has its registered office and its activities only in the Member State where its branch is established is not sufficient to prove the existence of abuse or fraudulent conduct" (Centros, C-212/97, para 29). Therefore, even a letterbox company is entitled to enjoy the freedom of establishment, provided that it does not infringe any law. The ECJ held that the freedom of establishment is applicable when the registered office alone, without the real head office, is transferred from one Member State to another if the Member State of new incorporation accepts the registration of a company even without the exercise of an economic activity there: in that case Article 49 TFEU does not require such an economic activity as a precondition for its applicability.[8]

The proposed rules on Mobility Directive found a compromise solution on the matter and introduced rules ensuring a scrutiny of the legality of the cross-border operation ( conversion and division) in two phases. During the first phase, limited to one month, the competent authority would examine whether the cross-border operation is lawful determining if all conditions laid down in the Directive and in national law are fulfilled, including the solvency of the company, the approval of the operation at a general meeting and if employees, minority shareholders and creditors are protected. During this phase, the authority would also determine whether there is an artificial arrangement. If at the end of a one month period the authority has no objections, it would issue a pre-conversion certificate or would refuse to grant a pre-conversion certificate if it is certain that the cross-border conversion/division is

[4] C-81/87 Daily Mail, C-212/97 Centros, C-208/00 Überseering, C-167/01 Inspire Art, C-411/03 Sevic, C-196/04 Cadbury Schweppes, C-210/06 Cartesio, C-378/10 VALE Építésikft, C-371/10 National Grid Indus BV, C-106/16 Polbud - Wykonawstwo

[5] Proposal for a Fourteenth European Parliament and Council Directive on the Transfer of the Registered Office or the de facto head office of a company from one Member State to another' of 20 April 1997

[6]Draft Report on the proposal for a directive of the European Parliament and of the Council amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132 as regards cross-border conversions, mergers and divisions( COM(2018)0241 – C8-0167/2018 –2018/0114(COD))Committee on Legal Affairs, http://www.europarl.europa.eu

[7] Article 6 General anti-abuse rule

1. For the purposes of calculating the corporate tax liability, a Member State shall ignore an arrangement or a series of arrangements which, having been put into place for the main purpose or one of the main purposes of obtaining a tax advantage that defeats the object or purpose of the applicable tax law, are not genuine having regard to all relevant facts and circumstances. An arrangement may comprise more than one step or part.

2. For the purposes of paragraph 1, an arrangement or a series thereof shall be regarded as non-genuine to the extent that they are not put into place for valid commercial reasons which reflect economic reality.

[8] C-106/16 Polbud - Wykonawstwo

unlawful. Alternatively, if at the end of this period it has serious concerns that the conversion/division may be unlawful, it would inform the company that it will carry out an in-depth examination as regards the existence of abuse as referred to above.The assessment of the legality of cross-border conversions/divisions by the competent authority of a departure Member State in respect to the procedure governed by the respective national laws is provided by Articles 86m and 86n for conversions and Article 160o and 160p as regards the legality of the cross-border division and in this case it will be conducted by the competent authority of a Member State to which jurisdiction the company being divided is subject.

Member States shall ensure that competent authorities may consult other relevant authorities with competence in the different fields concerned by the cross-border conversion or divisions. The competent authority shall examine the draft terms of the operation, the reports referred to in Articles 86e, 86f and 86g, as appropriate, information on the resolution of the general meeting to approve the conversion referred to in Article 86i, all comments and opinions submitted by interested parties in accordance with Article 86h(1) and an indication by the company that the procedure referred to in Article 86l(3) and (4) has started, where relevant.The assessment shall conduct to the issuance of the pre operation certificate if it is determined that the conversion or the division falls within the scope of the national provisions transposing the Directive, that it complies with all the relevant conditions and that all necessary procedures and formalities have been completed.The same result is reached in situations when the competent authority determines that the cross-border conversion does not meet all the relevant conditions or that not all necessary procedures and formalities have been completed and the company, after being invited to take the necessary steps, complies with the legal requirements.Where the competent authority has serious concerns that the cross-border conversion constitutes an artificial arrangement it may decide to carry out an in-depth assessment and shall inform the company about its decision to conduct such an assessment and of the subsequent outcome.As provided by Article 86 c para 3 and Article 86 m of the Proposal, Member States shall ensure that the competent authority of the departure Member State shall not authorise the cross-border conversion where it determines, after an examination of the specific case and having regard to all relevant facts and circumstances, that it constitutes an artificial arrangement aimed at obtaining undue tax advantages or at unduly prejudicing the legal or contractual rights of employees, creditors or minority members. Article 160o para 7 provides for divisions the same treatment, ruling that where the competent authority has serious concerns that the cross-border division constitutes an artificial arrangement referred to in Article 160d(3), it may decide to carry out an in-depth assessment in accordance with Article 160p and shall inform the company about its decision to conduct such an assessment and the subsequent outcome. In the in depth assessment procedure, as described in Article 86n and corresponding Article 160p for divisions, the competent authority of the departure Member State carries out all relevant facts and circumstances and shall take into account at a minimum the following: the characteristics of the establishment in the destination Member State, including the intent, the sector, the investment, the net turnover and profit or loss, number of employees, the composition of the balance sheet, the tax residence, the assets and their location, the habitual place of work of the employees and of specific groups of employees, the place where social contributions are due and the commercial risks assumed by the converted company in the destination Member State and the departure Member State, elements which may be only considered as indicative factors in the overall assessment and therefore shall not be considered in isolation. The in-depth examination must be concluded and a final decision must be taken within two months. However, as stated in recital 22, this in-depth assessment should not be carried out systematically, but it should be conducted on a case-by-case basis, where there are serious concerns as to the existence of an artificial arrangement. After having received a pre-conversion certificate, and after verifying that the incorporation requirements in the destination Member State are fulfilled, the competent authorities of the destination Member State should register the company in the business register of that Member State. It should not be possible for the competent authority of the destination Member State to challenge the accuracy of the information provided by the pre-conversion and pre-division certificate. In the case of conversion, the converted company should retain its legal personality, its assets and liabilities and all rights and obligations, including rights and obligations arising from contracts, acts or omissions(from Article 86b para (6)'converted company' means the newly formed company in the destination Member State from the date upon which the cross-border conversion takes effect and the term " newly" could lead to the idea that the two companies are different but the legal personality will be retained in conversion cases).

Scrutiny of the legality of the cross-border conversion/division by the destination Member State regards that part of the procedure which is governed by the law of the destination Member State.For this purpose, the company carrying out the cross-border conversion/division shall submit to the authority of the destination Member State the draft terms of the cross-border conversion/division approved by the general meeting.In the case of cross border division, the scrutiny of legality regards the recipient companies governed by the law of another Member State and the compliance with provisions of national law on the incorporation of companies .For both cross border operations, the competent authority from the destination Member State shallconfirm receipt of the pre-conversion certificate issued by the competent authority from the departure Member State and issue a decision to approve the cross-border conversion as soon as it has completed its assessment of the relevant conditions, accepting the pre-conversion certificateas conclusive evidence of the proper completion of the procedures and formalities under the national law of the departure Member State.

2.2. Safeguards for employees

In the Impact Assessment accompanying the Proposal[9], European Commission underlined as an objective for the initiative the harmonization of procedures and safeguards which are considered necessary to facilitate cross-border operations while preventing their use for abusive purposes.In terms of stakeholder protection, harmonised procedural rules for conversions and divisions will result in a predictable and reliable legal framework for employees, creditors and minority shareholders.

The proposed safeguards include for all cross-border operations (cross-border mergers, divisions and conversions) a new report prepared by the company's management to the employees and the possibility to provide an opinionon it ( the opinion is already possible to be provided under Article 124 of Directive (EU) 2017/1132 of the European Parliament and of the Councilof 14 June 2017relating to certain aspects of company law(codification) for cross border mergers)and different and stronger rules on employees participation.

The report should explain in particular the implications of the proposed cross-border conversion/division on the safeguarding of the jobs of the employees, material changes in the employment relationships and the locations of the companies' places of business and how each of these factors would relate to any subsidiaries of the company.The provision of the report should be without prejudice to the information and consultation proceedings instituted at national level following the implementation of Directive 2002/14/EC of the European Parliament and of the Councilor Directive 2009/38/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council.As provided in Article 86 f and Article 160h, the report shall be made available, at least electronically, to the representatives of the employees of the company carrying out the cross-border conversion/being divided or, where there are no such representatives, to the employees themselves not less than two months before the date of the general meeting that approves the operation.The report shall also be made similarly available to the members of the company being divided.The opinion of the representatives of their employees, or, where there are no such representatives, from the employees themselves, as provided for under national law, shall be appended to the report.

Another protective provision, inspired from Article 133 para 7 of Directive ( EU)2017/1132 was extended also to conversions and division envisagingthat during 3 years following the cross-border division or conversion, the company would not be able to perform a subsequent cross-border or domestic operation which would result in undermining the system of employee participation.

For cross-border divisions and conversions, the existing rules on employee participation in cross border mergers are maintained but with some differentiation compared to cross-border mergers, aimed to discourage the potential misuse of the operation in order to avoid the employee participation rules throughout the division of the company into smaller ones or by using the changes in the law applicable to it. There are two different legal sources to draw from as regards the protection of employee participation in existing EU legislation.

The provisions governing the European company (SE) were adopted on 8 October 2001, as a turning point in the history of European corporate law. Council Regulation (EC) No 2157/2001 of 8 October 2001 on the Statute for a European company (SE) and Council Directive 2001/86/EC of 8 October 2001 supplementing the Statute for a European company with regard to the involvement of employees are both the result of long years debates between Member States concerning a transnational form of company partnership The Regulation sets out the corporate-law principles for the SE, while the SE Directive supplementing the SE Regulation provides for the involvement of employees in such an SE.

As a next step the Council of the European Union adopted Directive 2005/56/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 26 October 2005 on cross-border mergers of limited liability companies. The Directive provides for the requirements under corporate law and under the legal framework governing employee participation rights that must be met in the event of cross-border merger of companies established under different laws and with different legal forms. The provisions of the Directive on mergers have been included in Article 133 of Directive (EU) 2017/1132.

On the one hand, there are rules in directive 2001/86/EC supplementing the Statute for a European company regarding employee participation, on the other hand, there are slightly modified rules in place for the current cross-border merger regime in Article 133 of directive 2017/1132 relating to certain aspects of company law.The concept underlying the compromise achieved by the SE Directive as regards the involvement rights of employees is the "before-and-after-principle." This stipulates that the involvement rights that employees enjoyed in the founding companies prior to the SE being established are not to be lost as a consequence of the foundation of the SE and will serve as the basis on which to negotiate the employees' participation rights (the principle of protecting acquired rights).

[9] Commission Staff Working DocumentImpact AssessmentAccompanying the documentProposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132 as regards the use of digital tools and processes in company lawandProposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132 as regards cross-border conversions, mergers and divisions

Negotiations are pursued by the representatives of the company and the employee on how to structure the involvement rights of employees in the SE

In the event of the negotiations failing, a statutory standard rule applies that serves to secure, for the most part, the employee involvement rights existing in the enterprises forming the SE.

The Proposal provides that the companies would be obliged to negotiate an employee participation system in case of the cross-border division or conversion even if the company being divided or carrying out a cross-border conversion would not be operating under the employee participation system.According to Article 86l, the company resulting from the cross-border conversion shall be subject to the rules in force concerning employee participation, if any, in the destination Member State.

However, the rules in force concerning employee participation, if any, in the destination Member State shall not apply, where the company carrying out the conversion has, in the six months prior to the publication of the draft terms of the cross-border conversion an average number of employees equivalent to four fifths of the applicable threshold, laid down in the law of the departure Member State, which triggers the participation of employees within the meaning of point (k) of Article 2 of Directive 2001/86/EC. Also the rules in force in the destination Member State should not apply where the national law of the destination Member State does notprovide for at least the same level of employee participation as operated in the company prior to the conversionorprovide for employees of establishments of the company resulting from the conversion that are situated in other Member States the same entitlement to exercise participation rights as is enjoyed by those employees employed in the destination Member State.Maintaining a similar rationale, Article 160n provides for cross border divisions the same approach, stating that each recipient company shall be subject to the rules in force concerning employee participation, if any, in the Member State where it has its registered office with similar exceptions as for conversions as regards the provisions in national law of the recipient companies.

Even the proposed rule regarding the four fifths threshold could serve to prevent the circumvention of employee participation rights it will be still possible for the representatives of the enterprise unilaterally to cause the failure of the negotiations.In such case standard rule applicable would be meaningless since the threshold for employee participation rights in the original Member State has not been reached.

3. Conclusions

The proposal aims to establish clearer rules and adjustments of company law to cross-border mobility of companies in the EU, maintaining the balance between procedures on cross-border operations that need to exploit more the potential of the Single Market and the protection against abuse of employees, creditors and minority shareholders. Recent studies showed that between 2014 and 2016, there was a minimal rise of cross border transfers of seat each year, with 44, 46 and 53 CBSTs respectively a rise being registered in 2017 to 134 CBSTs.[10] On political level, trade unions and the European Parliament were not totally satisfied by the Proposal, militating for a stronger regime for information and consultation rights addressed to the workers, including the involvement of the European Work Council if existing, for a strengthen regime of board-level participation rights for employees, after the cross border restructuring and for stopping the cross border operation aimed to circumvent tax rules or employer obligations. One must admit the existing differences in the Proposal between the procedures of the cross-border merger on the one hand and the crossborder conversion and division on the other may affect the attractiveness of the latter and also that not in all instances the rules on cross-border conversions, mergers, and divisions are internally harmonised which could have been a desirable approach.

In a more positive note, as stated in other analyses of this topic[11], ECJ's judgments decisions on freedom of establishment of companies identify the role for Community secondary legislation rather than remove the need for it and the Proposal is a first welcomed major step in this area. A provisional agreement was reached with the European Parliament on 13 March on the directive that facilitates EU companies' cross-border co+nversions, mergers and divisions and on 27 March Member States' ambassadors, sitting in Coreper, endorsed this important compromise. The future papers on this matter intend to scan the agreed text starting from the initial provisions of the Proposal trying to explain the need and feasibility of the common ground found by the co legislators in this area.

[10] Biermeyer, Thomas and Meyer, Marcus, Cross-border Corporate Mobility in the EU: Empirical Findings 2018 (September 21, 2018). Available at SSRN: https://ssrn.com/abstract=3253048 or http://dx.doi.org/10.2139/ssrn.3253048

[11] Davies, Paul L. and Emmenegger, Susan and Ferran, Eilis and Ferrarini, Guido and Hopt, Klaus J. and Moloney, Niamh and Opalski, Adam and Pietrancosta, Alain and Roth, Markus and Skog, Rolf R. and Winner, Martin and Winter, Jaap W. and Wymeersch, Eddy O., The Commission's 2018 Proposal on Cross-Border Mobility – An Assessment (September 27, 2018). European Company and Financial Law Review Forthcoming; Oxford Legal Studies Research Paper No. 25/2018. Available at SSRN: https://ssrn.com/abstract=3257846 or http://dx.doi.org/10.2139/ssrn.3257846

References

- Proposal for a Directive amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132 as regards cross-border conversions, mergers and divisions
- Draft Report </TitreType><Titre>on the proposal for a directive of the European Parliament and of the Council amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132 as regards cross-border conversions, mergers and divisions</Titre><DocRef>( COM(2018)0241 – C8-0167/2018–2018/0114(COD))</DocRef> <Commission> {JURI}Committee on Legal Affairs
- Commission Staff Working DocumentImpact AssessmentAccompanying the documentProposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132 as regards the use of digital tools and processes in company lawandProposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council amending Directive (EU) 2017/1132 as regards cross-border conversions, mergers and divisions
- Biermeyer, Thomas and Meyer, Marcus, Cross-border Corporate Mobility in the EU: Empirical Findings 2018
- Davies, Paul L. and Emmenegger, Susan and Ferran, Eilis and Ferrarini, Guido and Hopt, Klaus J. and Moloney, Niamh and Opalski, Adam and Pietrancosta, Alain and Roth, Markus and Skog, Rolf R. and Winner, Martin and Winter, Jaap W. and Wymeersch, Eddy O., The Commission's 2018 Proposal on Cross-Border Mobility – An Assessment
- C-106/16 Polbud - Wykonawstwo

THE LEGAL DIFFICULTIES GENERATED BY THE ALTERATION OF THE PROVISIONS REGARDING THE HEARING OF WITNESSES BY THE COURT WITHIN THE CIVIL PROCEDURAL CODE

Bogdan Sebastian GAVRILĂ[*]
Oana Luiza Petruța POSMAC[]

Abstract

Since Law no. 310/2018 has altered the legal provisions of the Civil procedural code regarding the way in which witness testimony is to be obtained, a certain number of difficulties have been generated due to the fact that the actual hearing of witnesses has to occur in a radically different manner, thus imposing on the court some obligations which may prove troublesome in the future. The paper aims to establish some proper practices, in terms of ensuring for all parties a fair trial whilst also abiding by the new legal solutions.

Keywords: Civil procedural code Problems Witness Testimony Hearing Proper Conduct of the Court

1. Introduction

1.1. What matter does the paper cover?

The article shall endeavour to establish a preliminary point of view regarding the effects of Law no. 310 which was adopted in 2018 on the plaintiff, the defendant but also on what it implies for the judge should it apply the new provisions to the letter.

It shall also attempt to identify potential solutions needed to avoid legal difficulties generated by the new alterations to the Civil procedural code, including interpreting the text in accordance with the other relevant legal provisions, analysing the opportunity of a de lege ferenda effort and ultimately the necessity of implicating the Constitutional Court of Romania into the matter at hand.

1.2. Why is the studied matter important?

The study matter is paramount because there are a great deal of cases in which witnesses are heard by the court. It should always ensure that witness testimony is obtained in a legal mannor and in accordance to both the national legal provisions but also the European Court of Human Rights case law. The impact of witness testimony on the outcome of trials cannot be refuted and hence the necessity of identifying a workable legal method of administering the evidence, in circumventing potential problems which may arise.

1.3. How does the author intend to answer to this matter?

It is hoped to reach the objective of offering a very detailed outlook on the effects of the alteration via the analysis of the legal texts which are applicable, the point of view of both the legal authors which have analysed the effects of the new alterations but also that of prominent legal authors who have offered a clear perspective on the institution in general prior to the new law. By analysing the consequences of the altered legal text in-depth, it is hoped to achieve some results in offering the reader a viable option in terms of applying the specific legal provisions.

1.4. What is the relation between the paper and the already existent specialized literature?

The specialised literature has addressed the institution of witness testimony in general and there are also some legal authors who have attempted to shed some light on the new modifications. The paper shall attempt to utilise their insight and further advance the topic in gaining a perspective as detailed as possible of what it means for future trials for the judge to enforece the will of the legislator.

2. The legal applicable texts

Firstly, our national Civil procedural code[1] outlined in Article no. 321 the initial legal framework regarding the method in which the hearing of witnesses took place: " Each witness will be listened separately, and without the presence of those who are have been yet heard.

(2) The order of hearing witnesses shall be fixed by the President, taking into account the request of the parties.

(3) The witness shall first answer the questions of the chairman and then the questions asked, with his consent, by the proposing party as well as by the opposing party.

[*] PhD Student, Bucharest University of Economic Studies, Romania, Judge (email: gavrila.bogdan.sebastian@gmail.com)
[] University of Sibiu, Faculty of Law, Judge (email: posmacoanaluiza@gmail.com)
[1] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.

(4) After the hearing, the witness shall remain in the sitting room until the end of the investigation, except if the court decides otherwise.

(5) At the hearing, the witness shall be allowed to freely express his testimony, without being allowed to read a previous written answer; but he can employ the use of notes, with the President's approval, but only to specify figures or names…".

The procedure was also regulated in Article no. 322 and 323 of the Civil procedural code[2]: " Witnesses can be asked again if the court finds fit.

(2) Witnesses whose statements do not fit can be confronted.

(3) If the court finds that the question raised by the party can not lead to solving the case, is offensive or tends to prove a fact whose proving is forbidden by the law, it will dismiss it. The court will, at the request of the party*, shall write down both the question and the reason why it was not approved.*

Art. 323. - (1) The testimony shall be written by the clerk, after the dictation of the president or the delegated judge, and shall be signed on each page and at the end of it by the judge, the clerk and the witness, after he has become aware of the contents. If the witness refuses or can not sign, it will be mentioned at the end of the minute.

(2) Any additions, deletions or changes in the testimony must be approved and signed by the judge, the clerk and the witness, under the sanction of not being taken into account.

(3) Unfilled places in the statement must be barred with lines so that no additions can be made.

(4) The provisions of art. 231 par. (2) shall apply accordingly. "

However, with the advent of Law[3] no. 310 passed in 2018, certain alterations have been made to these legal texts: " (1) Each witness will be listened separately, and without the presence of those who are have been yet heard.

(2) The order of hearing witnesses shall be fixed by the President, taking into account the request of the parties.

(3) The witness shall first answer the questions of the chairman and then the questions asked, with his consent, by the proposing party as well as by the opposing party.

(4) After the hearing, the witness shall remain in the sitting room until the end of the investigation, except if the court decides otherwise.

(5) At the hearing, the witness shall be allowed to freely express his testimony, without being allowed to read a previous written answer; but he can employ the use of notes, with the President's approval, but only to specify figures or names.

(6) If the court finds that the question raised by the party can not lead to solving the case, is offensive or tends to prove a fact whose proving is forbidden by the law, it will dismiss it. In this situation, the court will write down the name of the party and the question asked and the reason why it was not approved.

(7) If the question is approved, the question, together with the name of the party who formulated it, followed by the witness's response, shall be literally recorded in the witness statement according to the provisions of Art. 323 par. (1).

Art. 322. - (1) Witnesses may again be asked, if the court finds fit.

(2) Witnesses whose statements do not fit can be confronted.

(3) 'repealed'

Art. 323. - (1) The testimony shall be written by the clerk, who shall record the witness's statement in a exact and literal manner*, and shall be signed on each page and at the end of it by the judge, the clerk and the witness, after he has learned of the contents . If the witness refuses or can not sign, it shall be mentioned at the end of the statement.*

(2) Any additions, deletions or changes in the testimony must be approved and signed by the judge, the clerk and the witness, under the sanction of not being taken into account.

(3) Unfilled places in the statement must be barred with lines so that no additions can be made.

(4) The provisions of art. 231 par. (2) shall apply accordingly. "

Also, very relevant to the issue at hand are the findings of the Constitutional Court of Romania[4] in terms of the similar obligation to write down the exact testimony of the defendant during a criminal trial:" 465. In analyzing the criticized legal text, the Court notes that it provides the obligation to literally record the suspect or defendant's statements by the judicial body or by the court*. According to the Explanatory Dictionary of the Romanian language, "exactly" has the meaning "exactly the same", and "literally" has the meaning "that is done, is reproduced word by word, letter by letter; textual, exact". Therefore, the statement must be worded word for word reproduces exactly what the suspect or defendant conveys.*

466. However, under the procedural provisions mentioned above there are sufficient safeguards to properly record the suspect's or the defendant's statements, and Article 110 (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that if he should agree with the content of the written statement, the suspect or defendant shall sign it, and if there are any additions, corrections or explanations to be made, they can be indicated in the end of the statement, followed by the

[2] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.

[3] Law no. 310/2018 for amending and completing the Law no. 134/2010 on the Civil Procedure Code, as well as for amending and completing other normative acts published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 1174 of November 25, 2008

[4] DECISION no.633 of 12 October 2018 on the objection of unconstitutionality of the provisions of the Law for amending and completing the Law no. 135/2010 on the Criminal Procedure Code, as well as for amending and completing the Law no.304 / 2004 on the judicial organization

signature of the suspect or the defendant. The newly introduced obligation appears not only as excessive and burdensome for the authorities but it is likely to create difficulties in the enforcement work, with consequence of delaying or blocking the act of justice.

467. The Court therefore considers that the criminal procedural provisions in force contain sufficient safeguards to respect the rights of the defense suspect or defendant, so that the provisions of art. I, item 55, related to paragraph (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, are unconstitutional with respect to the phrase "exactly and literally", which is likely to prejudice the parties right to a fair trial, within a reasonable time. "

3. The opinion of the legal authors

Bozeșan was among the first to notice that it is the obligation of the court to request to the clerk to write down the question of the party ex oficii and not only when it is formally solicited by one of the parties.[5]

He has also commented regarding another key difference, in terms that it is the obligation of the court to literally write down witness testimony but without being able to raise any criticisms regarding this change.[6]

In terms of in which cases is the judge obligated to proceed according to the new guidelines, it has been noted that in relation to article 26 paragraph 2 of the Civil procedure code the administration of evidence is to be conducted in accordance to the law at that particular moment in time. [7]

A collective of prominent authors have put together a study regarding the modifications to the Civil procedural code[8] stating that that the new alterations are applicable even to cases iniated prior to the entry into force of the law when it comes to the procedure regarding witness testimony.

They have also delved into the necessity of using technical support in order to further ensure that the procedure is followed as smoothly as possible: " In any case, we believe that it would be appropriate either for witness testimony to be recorded audio-video and technical storage support would constitute the means of proof, which would alleviate some inconveniences of the re-examination of testimony by the superior court, respectively whether the judge sums up the witness's statement as a precedent or gives it a more concise and intelligible form, as the parties and the witness himself can of course challenge, as before, the concrete way of dictating and recording the witness's statement. "[9].

Traditionaly, other important legal authors[10] have refrained from expressing any views regarding the necessity for the solution to be implemented by the legislative authorities.

The most prominent author[11] in the field has offered a most useful definition of the testimony: " The testimony, could be defined as the oral statement made by a natural person, before the court, regarding to a precise and pertinent fact he is personally aware of. ".

4. The interpretation of the author

Firstly, the analysis should begin with the actual definition of the testimony provided by the most prominent author in the field who has clearly and explicitly stated that is deals with precise and pertinent facts that the witness has come into contact.

Despite the fact that the definition has been provided by the author prior to the alterations made to these legal texts it is still very much applicable even to the new situation.

This one first important issue, which can be derived from the opinion of the legal authors in full accordance to the legal text, is the fact that the court is called upon to decide what specific issues in the witness speech can be integrated in the stricto sensu notion of testimony.

Indeed, the parties should be allowed to express their views regarding the opportunity to write down certain facts which could prove more relevant further on in the trial.

However, the judge is the soul actor in this particular play which is allowed to decide how much of what the witness speaks about can be actually integrated in the witness testimony.

This is paramount, and is one of the reasons why the article deals with this aspect first.

There can be no doubt that the judge should be allowed to censor or limit what the witness actually speaks about, in terms of limiting the number of words in the witness testimony so as to ensure a proper

[5] Bozeșan, V. ( 2019), „ Codul de procedură civilă actualizat la 10 ianuarie 2019", ed. Solomon, București, p. 108
[6] Bozeșan, V. ( 2019), „ Codul de procedură civilă actualizat la 10 ianuarie 2019", ed. Solomon, București, p. 108
[7] Bozeșan, V. ( 2019), „ Codul de procedură civilă actualizat la 10 ianuarie 2019", ed. Solomon, București, p. 109
[8] Traian Cornel BRICIU, Mirela STANCU, Claudiu Constantin DINU, Gheorghe-Liviu ZIDARU, Paul POP,,, Comentarii asupra modificării noului Cod de procedură civilă prin Legea nr. 310/2018. Între dorința de funcționalitate și tendința de restaurație", last modification 12.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/essentials/2901/comentarii-asupra-modificarii-noului-cod-de-procedura-civila-prin-legea-nr-310-2018-intre-dorinta-de-functionalitate-si-tendinta-de-restauratie#_ftn3
[9] Traian Cornel BRICIU, Mirela STANCU, Claudiu Constantin DINU, Gheorghe-Liviu ZIDARU, Paul POP,,, Comentarii asupra modificării noului Cod de procedură civilă prin Legea nr. 310/2018. Între dorința de funcționalitate și tendința de restaurație", last modification 12.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/essentials/2901/comentarii-asupra-modificarii-noului-cod-de-procedura-civila-prin-legea-nr-310-2018-intre-dorinta-de-functionalitate-si-tendinta-de-restauratie#_ftn3
[10] Răducanu, G., Dinu, M., „ Fișe de Procedură Civilă ", Ed. Hamangiu, București, 2016, p.208
[11] Boroi, G. (ed.), (2013), „Noul Cod de Procedură Civilă Comentat, vol.2 " [The Commented New Civil Procedural Code, vol. 2 ], București: Ed. Hamangiu, p. 639.

continuity and a trial which lasts a reasonable amount of time.

Failure to do so can and would actually result in chaos in the courtroom, since most often than not witnesses do not know what the judge is actually interested in.

For example, the witness may choose to express his views regarding the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant in general whereas the judge may be interested in details regarding a specific period.

It should come as no surprise for the reader that the judge is still entitled to this right, namely to decide which aspects of the witness statement can actually be referred to as witness testimony.

In terms of the obligation for the court to write down all the questions addressed to the witness by each party in particular, it's application is very clear but it's consequences are more than open to discussion.

This is when the opinion of the Constitutional Court of Romania becomes extremely relevant. When it was asked to provide insight into whether or not the obligation to literally write down the accused' statement word for word was in fact unconstitutional.

There is no reason why this line of thinking is not applicable also for the civil trial.

The right of the parties for both a fair but also swift trial as stated in article 6 of the Civil procedure code is clearly infringed upon with the advent of this new alteration.

One mal-intended party may choose to create chaos in the courtroom by addressing a great number of questions to the witness so as to obligate the judge to make the clerk write down each and every one of them.

Should the judge refrain from doing so would result in a direct breach of a clearly formulated legal provision.

However, should the judge apply that legal provision as formaly as possible would also result in an infringement of the rights provided by article 6 of the parties to enjoy a trial in a period as short as possible.

It is a significant issue, able to generate far more legal difficulties than it would have solved.

One possible solution would be to alter it in terms of a de lege ferenda effort on the part of the legislative authority.

Should it not occur in a reasonable amount of time, another, more direct approach would be to address the Constitutional Court of Romania.

Given the fact that during the criminal trial this was viewed as a problem and the provisions were blatantly considered as unconstitutional a similar solution for the civil trial would seem appropriate.

The problematic provisions are also applicable in cases which have been initiated prior to entry into force of Law no. 310 adopted in 2018, since the administration of evidence is to be conducted in accordance to the legal provisions at that actual moment.

A scenario can be conceived in which should the plaintiff have known about the problem created by the alteration, he would not have resorted to addressing the court with that particular claim and might have sought to resolve the legal conflict in another way, such as adressnig a mediator.

However, since the solution is legally binding, the party is obligated to suffer consequences that he may not have accepted or even known prior to addressing the court.

It is thus also a question of a lack of predictability for the law and one could argue that it could be viewed as an infringement into the right to a fair trial.

Indeed, the court is entitled to apply a fine, as a sanction for the party who chooses to exercise it's legal rights without bona fide but this has no bearing on its obligation to make sure that every word spoken by the witness is to be jotted down on a piece of paper.

Also, the necessity for such a alteration is not stringent, given the fact that the whole proceedings are audio recorded. Should any omission committed by the court occur, which may affect on outcome of the trail, it can be easily by simply analysing the audio material later on, during the appeal.

The parties are free to request a copy of the audio file. They are also able to appeal the solution of the first instance court. They need only indicate a specific issue which the witness has pointed out but which the court omitted to analyse in passing it's judgement.

The system initiated after the adoption of the Civil procedure code worked.

New alterations, without a proper analysis, provided is extremely detrimental for all the participants in the trial.

Moving on to the opinion of the legal author in terms of employing technical support so as to make sure that the trial takes place smoothly, can be viewed as a very welcomed idea.

It should be implemented as fast as possible in terms of purchasing for all the courts in Romania dictation software so as to make it easy to abide by the new provisions, should they remain unchanged.

The provisions also make it more difficult for the court to address its control questions to the witness, since everything has to be written down.

Thus, the lawyer of one of the parties, in future cases will have direct access to the method in which the judge verifies the credibility of the witness. He can anticipate what those control questions would be and he can use the information in future trial so as prepare the witness for addressing them in the hopes of validating his credibility, despite it lacking.

Overall, these provisions are detrimental in this respect and in the long term may affect the right of the parties to a fair trial in the future since a most important tool of the judge, namely the process of verifying the credibility of testimonies may be hindered severely.

This is not in the best interests of any of the parties and can lead to very problematic situations in which the witness who is not expressing the truth has been prepared prior to his testimony to answer those specific control questions which are to be addressed by the diligent judge.

Thus, it would be far easier for the witness to pass this most important checkpoint during the trial and later to provide false testimony, which would greatly disadvantage the opposing part.

Consequently, the legislator, without knowledge, may have hindered these very necessary efforts left in the care of the judge and may have severely damaged the right to a fair trial for future parties who will be at the mercy of false testimonies and malevolant lawyers.

Thus, it becomes very clear that the actions previously mentioned must be taken by both the judge and the other diligent participants in the trial in addressing this issue, which has the potential to create very problematic outcomes that are not in the interests of anyone.

It is normal for the plaintiff to initiate the trial but also for the defendant to participate in it, knowing that the judge has an arsenal of methods at its disposal intended to verify the authenticity of the witness testimony.

5. Conclusions

5.1. Summary of the main outcomes

As the analysis is about to be concluded, it is evident that some of the alterations are unuseful and should be rectified as soon as possible, either by means of a new modifying law or with the intervention of the Constitutional Court of Romania.

For the moment the effects of the modifications are somewhat limited but as time passes by it will become more evident that in the long term its effects are ill.

Now is the time to act to address the issue at hand and minimise the effects as much as possible in order to protect the rights of the party who sooner or later may suffer an infringement.

5.2. The expected impact of the research outcomes

It is hoped that the reader of the article shall endeavour on his own to analyse the effects of the alterations and reach his or her own conclusions regarding the issue at hand.

Should he find the conclusions offered in the paper as valid, it is expected that he joins the effort of addressing the alterations particularly in terms of minimising the negative impact as much as possible. Time is of the essence.

5.3. Suggestions for further research work.

Future research work could be focused on potential modifying efforts undergone by the legislator or even the applicability of a potential decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania regarding this issue.

As time passes by, new potential effects which have not been taken into consideration in the early stages after the law was adopted could be the subject of further research in terms of analysing the outcome for both the defendant and the plaintiff, but also what it means for the court to obey its legal obligations stemming from the altered Civil procedural code.

References

- Law nr. 134/2010, republished in the Oficial Monitor, Part 1, no. 247/10.04.2015.
- Law no. 310/2018 for amending and completing the Law no. 134/2010 on the Civil procedure Code, as well as for amending and completing other normative acts published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 1174 of November 25, 2008
- DECISION no.633 of 12 October 2018 on the objection of unconstitutionality of the provisions of the Law for amending and completing the Law no. 135/2010 on the Criminal Procedure Code, as well as for amending and completing the Law no.304 / 2004 on the judicial organization
- Bozeșan, V. (2019), ,, Codul de procedură civilă actualizat la 10 ianuarie 2019", ed. Solomon, Bucureşti.
- Boroi, G. (ed.), (2013), ,, Noul Cod de Procedură Civilă Comentat, vol.2 " [The Commented New Civil procedural code, vol. 2 ], București: Ed. Hamangiu.
- Traian Cornel BRICIU, Mirela STANCU, Claudiu Constantin DINU, Gheorghe-Liviu ZIDARU, Paul POP,,, Comentarii asupra modificării noului Cod de procedură civilă prin Legea nr. 310/2018. Între dorința de funcționalitate și tendința de restaurație", last modification 12.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/essentials/2901/comentarii-asupra-modificarii-noului-cod-de-procedura-civila-prin-legea-nr-310-2018-intre-dorinta-de-functionalitate-si-tendinta-de-restauratie#_ftn3
- Răducanu, G., Dinu, M., ,, Fișe de Procedură Civilă ", Ed. Hamangiu, București, 2016, p.208

THE LEGAL DIFFICULTIES GENERATED BY THE ALTERATION OF ARTICLE NO. 200 OF THE OF THE CIVIL PROCEDURAL CODE

Bogdan Sebastian GAVRILĂ [1]
Oana Luiza Petruța POSMAC [2]

Abstract

After Law no. 310/2018 modified Article no. 200 of the of the Civil Procedural Code, various difficulties have arisen in practice, due to the fact that the new provisions, in paragraph no. 4 no longer state that the action can be annulled by the court for breach of fulfilling the obligations it established for the claimant during a non-public hearing. Thus, according to some legal opinions, the Court is thus obligated to cite all the parties so that they may give their conclusions on the matter. On the other hand, it has been stated that the Court has no obligation to cite any of the parties upon deciding whether or not to annul the claim. The paper aims to determine which course of action is in accordance to the new provisions and ensures the right to a fair trial for all the parties.

Keywords: Articole no. 200 Of the Civil Procedural Code Problems Public Hearing

1. Introduction

1.2. What matter does the paper cover?

The paper is intended to provide an accurate description of the main effects standing from the alterations of article no. 200 of the Civil procedure code in terms of analysing the legal texts themselves, the opinion of some noteworthy legal authors.

Finally it shall endeavour to establish some good practices regarding it's application, despite the fact that the modifications are relatively recent. The paper has tried to utilize the first opinions regarding the issue at hand while trying to comprehend the thinking behind the alterations themselves as they have unfolded.

Indeed, there are some positive aspects which have emerged after the decision of the legislative authority to alter these provisions which are also about to be properly analysed.

However, there are also some negative aspects which are derived from the decision to alter the procedure which require a critical eye and a proper interpretation in terms of circumventing potential legal difficulties which may arise.

1.2 Why is the studied matter important?

The studied matter is of great importance because there are a huge number of cases in which the court is about to annul the claim.

It is vital for it to proceed in this manner without any dangers of infringing upon the fundamental rights of all the parties involved in the trial.

Even at it's early stages, the keys must be handled with due diligence by the court and no effort should be spared in analysing the alterations and establishing good practices regarding the application of the sanction.

The fact of the matter is that the moment when the claim is annuled, the plaintiff may suffer some very harsh consequences but the way in which the court applies the legal provisions can have a significant impact.

The article in itself attempts to handle rather a new topic, without significant jurisprudence behind it but it shall attempt to surprise the main issues at hand in establishing a legal avenue useful and beneficial for all the participants in the trial.

1.3 How does the author intend to answer to this matter?

The author shall identify both the initial form of the article and its final form after the operation and shall attempt to identify some opinions regarding the issue at hand, despite the fact that it is rather early to do so.

However some authors have already tackled the issue early on and can provide a relevant foundation for constructing a proper analysis on the subject.

It shall also analyse potential de lege ferenda solutions and it shall also deal with the opportunity of addressing the Constitutional Court of Romania regarding the constitutionality of the new provisions, in how they shall affect the constitutional rights of all the parties involved.

[1] PhD Student, Bucharest University of Economic Studies, Romania, Judge (email: gavrila.bogdan.sebastian@gmail.com).
[2] University of Sibiu, Faculty of Law, Judge (email: posmacoanaluiza@gmail.com)

Finally, some relevant conclusions shall be provided so as to allow for the reader to invest his own efforts into identifying a useful legal pathway.

Indeed, there are some discussions and difficulties which are to be tackled in the paper as a direct consequence of the policy employed by the legislative authority in this particular situation, but the author shall at least attempt to clarify the issue at hand as best as possible.

1.4. What is the relation between the paper and the already existent specialized literature?

The paper shall attempt to address the few opinions already expressed in the specialised literature and shall try to reconcile the opposition in them so that the relevant legal texts may be applied in equity.

The authors which are to be analysed have dealt with the issue on some specific level but it is hoped to conduct a more complex analysis of the legal situation created after the adoption of Law no. 310 in 2018. A collective of authors has already provided a most welcomed outlook on all the alterations brought forth by the law, but the paper shall try to complete the work with new ideas regarding what it is needed to avoid the opposing case law by the courts regarding this particular issue.

2. The legal applicable texts

Firstly, our national provisions outlined in Article no. 200 of the Civil Procedural Code[3] constitute the initial legal framework regarding the annulement procedure in the cases when the party failed to comply to the request made by the court: " The court to whom the case was randomly assigned shall promptly check whether the claim is within its competence and whether it meets the requirements of art. 194-197.

(2) Where the case is not within its competence, the claim shall, by decission given without the summons of the parties, be sent to the competent specialized body or, where appropriate, the specialized section of the competent court. The provisions on noncompetence and conflicts of jurisdiction apply by analogy.

(3) Where the application does not meet the requirements of art. 194-197, the applicant shall be notified in writing of the shortcomings, stating that within maximum 10 days after receipt of the communication, he shall make the additions or modifications ordered, under the sanction of cancellation of the request. It is exempt from this sanction the obligation to designate a common representative, in which case the provisions of art. 202 par. (3).

(4) If the obligations for completing or modifying the application are not fulfilled within the time limit stipulated in paragraph (3), by decission, given in the council chamber, the application can be annuled.

(5) Against the termination of the annulment, the complainant will only be able to make a request for a review to solicit the cancellation measure.

(6) The request for re-examination shall be made within 15 days from the date of communication of the rulling.

(7) The request shall be settled by a final decision given in the council chamber by another judge of that court, designated by random assignment, who will be able to revert the annulment measure if it has been wrongly taken or the irregularities have been removed within the time allowed according to par. (3).

(8) In the event of admission, the case shall be sent back to the initially invested judge."

In 2018, the legislative authority has sought to alter these specific provisions, by instituting certain changes regarding the specified article: " In Article 200, paragraph 4 shall be amended and shall have the following content:

"(4) If the obligations regarding the filling in or modification of the application provided in art. 194 lit. a) - c), d) only in the case of factual reasons and f), as well as art. 195 - 197, are not fulfilled within the time limit stipulated in paragraph (3), the application shall be annulled by way of a rulling. "

In Article 200, after paragraph (4), a new paragraph, para. (41), with the following wording:

"(41) The complainant may not be required to supplement or amend the request for legal action with data or information which he or she cannot personally obtain and for which the court is required to intervene*."*[4]

Lastly, another article of great importance to the study is article 532 of the of the Civil Procedural Code which states that: " The request shall be judged in the council chamber, with the citation of the petitioner and the persons shown in the application, only if the law so requires. Otherwise, the judgment is made with or without a citation, at the discretion of the court.

(2) The court may order, of its own decission, any measures which are of use to the case. It has the right to listen to any person who can bring the matter in question, as well as to those whose interests may be affected by the judgment. "[5]

[3] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.

[4] Law no. 310/2018 for amending and completing the Law no. 134/2010 on the Civil Procedure Code, as well as for amending and completing other normative acts published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 1174 of November 25, 2008

[5] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.

The general provisions[6] regarding the obligation of the court to cite the parties and to conduct all proceedings during a public hearing are: " Art. 14. - (1) The court may decide on an application only after the citation or appearance of the parties, unless the law stipulates otherwise… Article 15 - Oral proceedings shall be dealt with unless the law provides otherwise, or where the parties expressly request the court to make the case only on the basis of the documents submitted to the file... Art. 17. - Judgment sessions are public, except for cases provided by law. "

Article[7] no. 22 establishes a clear obligation for the court to determine the legal applicable texts, should the parties fail to indicate the proper ones: " The judge gives or restores the legal classification of the acts and facts inferred for the judgment, even if the parties have given them another name. In this case, the judge is obliged to bring the exact legal qualification to the parties."

Lastly, article 6 of the Civil Procedural Code[8] states that " Everyone has the right to a fair, timely and foreseeable hearing of his case by an independent, impartial and lawful court. To this end, the court is obliged to dispose of all the measures allowed by the law and to ensure the speedy conduct of the trial. (2) The provisions of paragraph (1) shall also be applied in the forced execution phase. "

3. The opinion of the legal authors

Bozeșan was very clear regarding the fact that the omission to mention that the procedure regarding the annulment of the claim for failure to fulfill the obligations established by the court is to occur in a non-public proceeding represents an error committed by the legislative authority. It is mandatory for the court to proceed in this fashion, in terms of analysing the fulfilment of the obligations in a non public setting, just as it has been done prior to the modifications.[9]

One of the reasons why the author considers that the annulment should be decided in a non public setting is because the whole procedure in itself is of a non-contradictory nature, in relation to article 532 of the Of the Civil Procedural Code. Firstly, the plaintive has not yet received a copy of the claim, and he may not need to express his point of view regarding the fulfilment of the obligations established by the court for the claimant. Verifying whether or not the claimant has respected the obligations has nothing to do with the rights and obligations which are about to be decided before the court. The sanctions for the initial irregularities of the claim are of a purely formal nature in regards.[10]

Another important aspect is the impossibility for the court to obligate the plaintiff to provide specific information regarding the case for which the intervention of the court is ultimately necessary. However, there clearly remains the necessity for the claimant to fulfill his obligation of due diligence in terms of undertaking all the legal and possible avenues in order to complete his claim with the necessary data mentioned in article 194 of the of the Civil Procedural Code. [11]

Another prominent collective of authors[12] have stated that: " Regarding the elimination of the phrase "given in the council chamber" we appreciate that the modification is based on the correlation with the new form of art. 402 which, as we shall see, no longer requires the judgment to be delivered at a public hearing, so that the exception to that rule would no longer be justified. Unfortunately, the current legislator was mistaken because the expression "given in the council room" was meant the actual place of the judgment, not the place where the solution is to be passed. "

Despite being a most regrettable mistake it has laid the groundwork for the discussions which are to be analysed during this article in terms of interpreting the legal texts so as to ensure for all parties a fair and reasonable trial.

Gabriela Răducan and Mădălina Dinu[13] have also analysed the provisions and clearly established that the annulment procedure is to take place in the council chamber.

The collective[14] has also argued ,,that does not mean, however, that the judgment will now take place in a public hearing. The analysis procedure is, by definition, a non-contentious one, which is to be settled in the council

---

[6] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.
[7] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.
[8] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.
[9] Bozeșan, V. ( 2019), „ Codul de procedură civilă actualizat la 10 ianuarie 2019", ed. Solomon, București, p. 108
[10] Bozeșan, V. ( 2019), „ Codul de procedură civilă actualizat la 10 ianuarie 2019", ed. Solomon, București, p. 108
[11] Bozeșan, V. ( 2019), „ Codul de procedură civilă actualizat la 10 ianuarie 2019", ed. Solomon, București, p. 109
[12] Traian Cornel BRICIU, Mirela STANCU, Claudiu Constantin DINU, Gheorghe-Liviu ZIDARU, Paul POP,, *Comentarii asupra modificării noului Cod de procedură civilă prin Legea nr. 310/2018. Între dorința de funcționalitate și tendința de restaurație", last modification 12.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/essentials/2901/comentarii-asupra-modificarii-noului-cod-de-procedura-civila-prin-legea-nr-310-2018-intre-dorinta-de-functionalitate-si-tendinta-de-restauratie#_ftn3
[13] Răducanu, G., Dinu, M., „ Fișe de Procedură Civilă ", Ed. Hamangiu, București, 2016, p.154
[14] Traian Cornel BRICIU, Mirela STANCU, Claudiu Constantin DINU, Gheorghe-Liviu ZIDARU, Paul POP,„ Comentarii asupra modificării noului Cod de procedură civilă prin Legea nr. 310/2018. Între dorința de funcționalitate și tendința de restaurație", last modification

chambers, and which seeks to establish the procedural framework correctly, without presenting a litigious matter in terms of establishing any adverse right in contradiction with the defendant, especially since he does not even know that he has been sued for the simple reason that he has not yet been summoned. Therefore, we consider that by removing from the text the phrase "given in a council room" was intended only to suppress a statement that the legislator considered unnecessary to the new configuration of bringing the judgment to the attention of the public. It is obvious that by amending art. 200 par. (4) of the Civil Procedural Code, the legislator wanted only to remove the possibility to annul the application for failure on the applicant's part to fulfill the obligations stipulated in art. 194 lit. d) and e) of the Of the Civil Procedural Code, without any intention to modify the rules of the regularization procedure.".

The opinion of the above cited collective was also shared by the most prominent author in the field.

Prof. Boroi[15] argued that the annulment procedure is to take place withourt the citation of the parties.

In terms of splitting the two procedures regulated by Article no. 200, the collective[16] has stated that "Moreover, from the global interpretation of art. 200 Of the Civil Procedural Code, there is no logical argument for the whole annulement to be split between the cancellation phase of the request which would be conducted during a public hearing and, on the other hand, the re-examination procedure to be made in a council chamber, according to the provisions of art. 200 par. (7) of the Civil Procedural Code.

In conclusion, we appreciate that, regardless of the deletion of the phrase "given in the council chamber" (4) of art. 200, the annulement shall take place in the council chamber."

Also, the new provisions after paragraph no. 4 have been the subject of a proper analysis[17]: "The second amendment of art. 200 of the Civil Procedural Code consists of introducing a new paragraph, par. (4 dash 1), according to which: "the claimant may not be required to supplement or amend the request for legal action with data or information which he or she does not personally posess and for the procurement of which the court is required to intervene".

We appreciate the benefit of this clarification of the duties of the claimant in the regularization procedure, in the sense that he will not be guilty of any fault in situations in which he is not in possession of data or information requested by the court and for which it is necessary to intervene…The meaning of this rule is that the applicant will be sheltered from the event of excessive or even abusive application by the court of the sanction provided in art. 200 par. (3) and (4) of the Civil Procedural Code [53]. The claimant is not relieved of the obligation to provide that date or information which, even if he does not own it, can obtain it without the intervention of the court, based on other legal provisions (e.g. land registry extract, data on registered companies in the general trade registry, other data mentioned in a public register, in relation to which there is the possibility to obtain information by any person). Obviously, we do not deny that in practice there are situations in which a particular authority or institution unduly refuses the release of information or a record, although the law compels it to do so (often invoking secondary norms such as orders, internal regulations, etc.). In those situations the plaintiff must prove that he has endeavored to obtain that information in order to be exempted for the application of the sanction.".

The collective[18] has concluded that ,, this procedure seeks to discipline the parties in the process, with the practical application of the principle enshrined in art. 6 of the Civil Procedural Code on a fair trial and within an optimal and predictable manner, without affecting the substance of the right to adress the court, taking into account the fact that a possible annulment of the petition is subject to judicial review by means of a request with the application of art. 200 par. (5) - (7). "

Also, we note that the Constitutional Court also found that the procedure for the regularization of the application has the role of relieving the courts of incomplete applications, so as to prepare the judgment in all its aspects. This procedure also provides protection for the defendant, who is served with all the relevant documentation so as to be able to mount his defence. Unlike art. 200 of the current Code of Civil Procedure, the old regulation of the 1865 Civil Procedure Code, stated that in order to remedy incomplete requests, it was necessary to grant new terms during the judgement, which in most cases led to the prolongation of the trial, thus affecting the optimal and predictable term. At the same time, it involved the incurring of new costs by both the

12.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/essentials/2901/comentarii-asupra-modificarii-noului-cod-de-procedura-civila-prin-legea-nr-310-2018-intre-dorinta-de-functionalitate-si-tendinta-de-restauratie#_ftn3

[15] Boroi, G., Stancu, M. (ed.), (2019), „ Fise de procedură civilă ", Ed. Hamangiu, p. 267

[16] Traian Cornel BRICIU, Mirela STANCU, Claudiu Constantin DINU, Gheorghe-Liviu ZIDARU, Paul POP,„ Comentarii asupra modificării noului Cod de procedură civilă prin Legea nr. 310/2018. Între dorința de funcționalitate și tendința de restaurație", last modification 12.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/essentials/2901/comentarii-asupra-modificarii-noului-cod-de-procedura-civila-prin-legea-nr-310-2018-intre-dorinta-de-functionalitate-si-tendinta-de-restauratie#_ftn3

[17] Traian Cornel BRICIU, Mirela STANCU, Claudiu Constantin DINU, Gheorghe-Liviu ZIDARU, Paul POP,„ Comentarii asupra modificării noului Cod de procedură civilă prin Legea nr. 310/2018. Între dorința de funcționalitate și tendința de restaurație", last modification 12.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/essentials/2901/comentarii-asupra-modificarii-noului-cod-de-procedura-civila-prin-legea-nr-310-2018-intre-dorinta-de-functionalitate-si-tendinta-de-restauratie#_ftn3

[18] Traian Cornel BRICIU, Mirela STANCU, Claudiu Constantin DINU, Gheorghe-Liviu ZIDARU, Paul POP,„ Comentarii asupra modificării noului Cod de procedură civilă prin Legea nr. 310/2018. Între dorința de funcționalitate și tendința de restaurație", last modification 12.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/essentials/2901/comentarii-asupra-modificarii-noului-cod-de-procedura-civila-prin-legea-nr-310-2018-intre-dorinta-de-functionalitate-si-tendinta-de-restauratie#_ftn3

parties and the court. Moreover, the procedural means by which justice is to be carried out imply the establishment of procedural rules regarding the process before the courts, the legislator, by virtue of its constitutional role enshrined in art. 126 para. (2) and art. 129 of the Basic Law, being able to establish by law the procedure before the court. These constitutional provisions themselves give expression to the principle enshrined in the European Court of Human Rights Case Law, which, for example, in its judgment of 16 December 1992 in Hadjianastassiou v. Greece, paragraph 33, stated that "the Contracting States enjoy great freedom in choosing the means to enable the judiciary to comply with the requirements of Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.".".

4. The interpretation of the author

First of all, the initial thinking behind the initial form of article no. 200 was to leave the court a reasonable margin in terms of appreciating whether or not the minimal conditions were met in order to be able to communicate the claim to the other party so as to allow it to mount a reasonable form of defense.

Given the fact that in the past, the only possible sanction available to the court consisted in suspending the trial for failure on the claimant's part in ensuring that the basic conditions were met to move forward with the judgement.

However, in order to reach this specific point, the court needed to communicate to the other party a very informal request, which sometimes was limited to a single page, without any mention of any legal applicable texts, thus rendering the other party into a virtual impossibility of defending himself. It is clearly evident that the defendant's rights were infringed upon severely since he usually paid for legal fees even though the claim brought before him was so informal that even the court was unable to ascertain what it was required of it.

After the new Civil Procedure Code was adopted, the legislative authority instituted the new sanction of annuling the initial informal claim without the need to communicate it prior to employing this solution by the court. A very elegant solution, it exempted the other party from resorting to legal counsel or even suffering legal costs in the initial stages of the trial.

However, like any other solution, it resulted in creating problems for one of the parties which in most cases was the claimant. There were cases in which the court wrongly annuled the claim for failure to fulfill obligations such as indicating the correct social security number of the defendant, even though the claimant provided his correct address, which would have permitted the court to properly communicate the documentation and also summon him for the trial.

Despite being relatively limited, this particular tendency to annul the claim for this reason lead to the modifications of article no. 200.

Thus, in terms of the addition of paragraph 4 dash 1, it is evident that it was intended to counteract the tendency of annuling claims far too easily by some courts, so as to ensure the right to a fair trial for the claimants whose action should have been communicated to the other party and should have enjoyed a proper analysis during a normal trial.

No authors who expressed some concerns regarding the thinking behind this new addition, particularly the purpose for which it has been adopted were identified.

However, some discussions regarding the impossibility for the court to annul the claim for failure to indicate the legal applicable texts are in order.

Thus, it is rather a simple conclusion to reach that some defendants will find it very difficult to mount a proper defence in cases in which they are unable to establish which legal texts they are accused of breaching.

Indeed it is the obligation of the court to determine the legal avenue that is available to both parties in terms of reaching a clear and equitable solution in the case.

Despite this, there will always be instances in which the parties fail to determine the legal basis for the litigation.

To intervene ex oficio can easily be interpreted as a decission to help one of the parties and thus creating a detrimental situation for the other.

It is not the task of the court to help the claimant to such an extent, sometimes even more then his own legal counsel, just because the legislative authority has established such an obligation for the judge.

Moreover, the impossibility of annuling the claim by means of Article 200 for failure to indicate by the plaintiff what legal provision are applicable will clearly lead to situations in which the defendant is unable to counteract the claim brought before the court by the other party at least until the judge establishes the legal applicable text.

After this moment, even though the legal text established by the court as applicable would clearly render the initial claim as inadmissible or without merits the fact remains that up until this point the summoned defendant has been in a situation on deciding whether or not to sustain legal fees.

For those diligent defendants who wish to participate in an active way in the trial and therefore appeal to legal consel or engage in other cost the fact that the informal claim has reached this point may be seen as an infringement into their right to a fair trial.

This conclusion is even more clear in the cases in which the court has established the applicable law, but is unable to provide the defendant another term to organise his defence according to the actual legal situation since there are no provisions which allow this.

Indeed the situation may not be very common but in the cases in which it occurs it is evident that the defendant may suffer clear breaches to his right to a reasonable and effective defence.

It is thus very clear that the alterations regarding the impossibility for the court to annul the claim for this particular reason is a mistake in the part of the legislative authority and should be remedied as soon as possible.

Moving on with the analysis of the modifications of articles no. 200, the removal of the phrase „in the council chamber" in paragraph 4 clearly stands out.

Indeed, Bozeșan[19] may be right in his opinion that it is only an oversight of the legislative authority.

However, oversight or not, the alteration is able to create a number of situations in which the judge is obligated to intervene so as to avoid any infringements in the right to a fair trial of the parties involved.

Firstly, since the legislative authority has removed the phrase in the council chamber one can interpret this measure as a willingness on it's part to obligate the court to annul the claim during a public session.

Further on, it can be interpreted in terms of a decision to move away from the initial interpretation of the legal texts regarding this procedure in terms that it is non-contradictory and governed by article 532 of the Civil procedure code.

Since the interpretation may lead to such a conclusion, namely that we are no longer dealing with a non-contradictory procedure, it should therefore take place in a public setting. It is thus evident that it is necessary to summon all the parties even to this procedure.

The interpretation in itself may seem very unreasonable, given the implicit obligation to summon the defendant to present his opinion regarding the sanction of annuling the initial claim even though no other prior documentation has been provided.

Thus, for example in cases in which the claimant has failed to provide enough copies of the initial claim and the supporting documentation, interpreting the legal tax in this manner would also imply the obligation for the court to copy all available documentation and communicate them to the defendant so as to present his opinion on the matter. This would thus render article no. 195 of the Civil Procedural Code without effects - „ The request for legal action shall be made in the number of copies provided in art. 149 para. (1)."

Just as problematic would be too summon the claimant for this procedure, given the fact that he has chosen a very passive stance on the case, by failing to fulfill his obligations.

Also, given this alternative interpretation which is allowed by the formulation of the text that it is no longer a council chamber procedure, the general texts provided by article 14, 15 and 17 of the Civil Procedure Code regarding the obligation for the court to summon the parties and allow for an oral proceeding during a public hearing come into play, with very binding legal consequences.

The interpretation can we developed further on, in terms of the possibility for the claimant to invoke a breach in his right to a fair trial as stated in article 6 of the Civil Procedure Code during the re-examination procedure of the sanction to annul the claim by the court. Given the fact that he wasn't summoned to the procedure when the claim was annulled, he may invoke the argument that he was unable to provide a proper defence so as to persuade the court otherwise.

Overall, interpreting the modifications as indicated above is not an unreasonable undertaking and could occur in some situations in which the judge may choose to interpret the law in a very formal way.

However, a more accurate interpretation has been made by all the above cited authors in the article for the reasons which are to be developed.

Firstly, it is indeed the case of or non-contradictory procedure, in full accordance with article 532 of the Civil Procedure Code since the scope of the analysis carried out by the court deals with ascertaining whether or not the conditions for going to court are met.

The procedure in itself does not tend to lead to a conclusion regarding the existence or non-existence of the rights which are the subject of the trial but merely tends to allow for the trial to enter into the public stage in which arguments may be presented by all the parties involved.

Simply verifying if all the paperwork is in order and all the obligations of the trial have been properly handled by the claimant does not mean that the procedure in itself is a contradictory one.

Indeed, the claimant who feels that his action has been wrongfully annuled may choose to solicit a reexamination of the sanction applied by the judge by another of his colleagues, which also constitute another procedure that has a clear non-contradictory nature. Moreover, this last one is expressly mentioned as to occur in the council chamber and there are no objective reasons for which the regime for the two should be separated.

[19] Bozeşan, V. ( 2019), „ Codul de procedură civilă actualizat la 10 ianuarie 2019", ed. Solomon, Bucureşti, p. 108

Thus, paragraph no. 7 of article no. 200 clearly states that the re-examination procedure shall occur in a council chamber, being no reason to separate the verification procedure into two different stages, one in a public hearing and another in a non-public one.

Also, there is no reason to involve the defendant into the trial at this point since for the arguments presented above it is not in his best interests to intervene at this point in the trial.

Legals fees, which may stem from participating in a hearing at this stage of the trial may not be requested in this particular setting, merely via a new and separate trial, since there are no legal provisions which may deal with this type of situation.

Thus, the judge, despite the alterations to the legal text, is to proceed according to the previous procedure in terms of applying the sanction in a non-public setting, namely during a council chamber procedure.

It is evident that proceeding in a different way, by means of interpreting the new alterations in terms that a public hearing should be conducted is a grave error, which should be avoided at all costs since it is not in the interests of any of the parties involved for the court to act in such a manner.

Moving on to the alterations in paragraph 4 dash 1, regarding the impossibility for the court to annul the claim should the plaintiff not have personal access to the information needed for the trial to move forward, they are of great importance. Situations in which the court has annulled the claim without any fault by the plaintiff will be avoided. This alteration in itself is very protective for the plaintiff, however, in order for it to work, it requires that he may prove he has previously addressed the competent authorities regarding to identify the relevant information.

Again, it is mandatory for the court to respect the plaintiff's right to a fair trial and the solution provided by the alteration of this article is equitable and most welcomed.

5. Conclusions

5.1. Summary of the main outcomes

Indeed, whatever the reasons why the legislative authority has chosen to adopt the solutions previously analysed it is imperative for practitioners to employ all possible methods in order to ensure that the legal text is applied in a manner which does not infringe upon the constitutional rights of either party.

Both the plaintiff and even the defendant can and should always indicate the legal text they consider as applicable, so as not to render the defence of the other party a mere guessing game, to be decided by the court.

The court itself should be willing to grant another term for the opposing party after establishing the legal provisions which are to be applied to solve the case whenever it has been expressly requested. This is to ensure that the opinion of all the participants is taken into consideration and their point of view is properly grasped by the judge.

Some other ideas which might help the situation would be to address the Constitutional Court of Romania ex oficio by the judge who is in a situation in which the impossibility to annul the claim may cause serious problems for the other party, who may be left to guess the legal articles it is accused of breaching. The request to the Constitutional Court should raise the issue of the potential unconstitutionality of the provisions regarding the impossibility for the court to annul the claim for failure to indicate the legal applicable texts.

The decision to remove the phrase in the council chamber should not be interpreted as the establishment of a new obligation for the court to annul the claim in a public setting, after all the parties have been summoned to the procedure.

This interpretation is erroneous and may tend to create burdensome situations for the defendant, would could suffer legal fees to mount a proper defence.

Also, summoning the plaintive after already indicating to him what obligations require his attention would mean that he is given two opportunities to complete his claim, situation which can never be considered as acceptable and which would render paragraph 4 of Article 200 as inapplicable.

Finally, the paragraph added after paragraph 4 should be interpreted in the sense that the plaintiff is obligated to prove before the court that he has fulfilled all of his obligations prior to soliciting the judge to intervene in order to obtain the needed information necessary for the continuation of the trial. Otherwise, there would be situations in which the role of the judge would be extended far too much and would also raise questions such as what sanction can be applied to the court for not fulfilling it's newly established obligation.

5.2. The expected impact of the research outcomes

The aim of the article is to endeavour to shed light on the subject, in order to present for the reader all the consequences which may stem from applying the altered provisions.

It is thus hoped to provide him or she with a useful interpretation, in full accordance with the necessity to ensure the right to a fair trial for all the parties involved in the trial.

5.3. Suggestions for further research work.

Given the previously presented idea of addressing the Constitutional Court of Romania regarding the constitutionality of the new provisions, future research could focus on the answer it gives to the dilemma presented before it. It could also focus on de lege ferenda proposals, upon applying the provisions by practitioners after some time and analysing the effects of the alterations on more cases.

References

- Law nr. 134/2010, republished in the Oficial Monitor, Part 1, no. 247/10.04.2015.
- Law no. 310/2018 for amending and completing the Law no. 134/2010 on the Civil procedure code, as well as for amending and completing other normative acts published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 1174 of November 25, 2018
- Bozeșan, V. ( 2019), ,, Codul de procedură civilă actualizat la 10 ianuarie 2019", ed. Solomon, Bucureşti.
- Boroi, G., Stancu, M. (ed.), (2019), ,, Fise de procedură civilă ", Ed. Hamangiu.
- Traian Cornel BRICIU, Mirela STANCU, Claudiu Constantin DINU, Gheorghe-Liviu ZIDARU, Paul POP,,, Comentarii asupra modificării noului Cod de procedură civilă prin Legea nr. 310/2018. Între dorința de funcționalitate și tendința de restaurație", last modification 12.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/essentials/2901/comentarii-asupra-modificarii-noului-cod-de-procedura-civila-prin-legea-nr-310-2018-intre-dorinta-de-functionalitate-si-tendinta-de-restauratie#_ftn3
- Răducan, Gabriela et Dinu, Mădălina (2016), ,,Fișe de procedură civilă "[Civil Procedure Charts], București: ed. Hamangiu.

INVESTMENT SERVICES AND ACTIVITIES AGREEMENT ON CAPITAL MARKET

Cristian GHEORGHE[*]

Abstract

Investment services and activities on the account of the investors shall be supplied under a contract drafted in accordance with Capital Market Laws.

Intermediaries (investment firms) hold the market access monopoly to trading systems of the regulated market or multilateral trading systems. Contracting them is the only way for investors to have access (indirectly) to trading through market orders.

The legal framework shaped by the contract regarding investment services and activities is the premise, the mandatory and preliminary condition for the sale or purchase of financial instruments. The contract of investment services and activities is thus a sine qua non for trading on the capital market.

Keywords: capital market, investment services and activities agreement, regulated market, trading system, investment firm.

1. Investment services and activities.

Investment services and activities have a legal demarcation. The main services for investors are: reception and transmission of orders in relation to one or more financial instruments, execution of orders on behalf of clients, portfolio management, investment advisory services, underwriting of financial instruments and placing of financial instruments on a firm commitment basis or without a firm commitment basis. Along with these main services the law also sets ancillary services which consist of safekeeping and administration of financial instruments for the account of clients, granting credits to an investor to allow him to carry out a transaction, advice to undertakings on capital structure, foreign exchange services connected to the provision of investment services, services related to underwriting.[1] Main services includes also services and activities that exceed the provision of customer services: dealing on own account, operation of an MTF (multilateral trading facility) or operation of an OTF(organized trading facility). Contemplating these services and activities it is easy to extract the essence of the investment services and activities agreement: performing legal acts and deeds regarding the financial instruments or following the order of the client.

2. Legal nature of the investment services and activities agreement.

At the declarative level, although the legislator is not legally consistent, the intermediary (services provider) works on behalf of the client, suggesting the existence of a legal relationship based on a full power of attorney (mandate with representation).

The effects of the intermediary's activity will be reflected in the client's assets by the purchase or sale of financial instruments. Investment firms (SSIF in Romanian Capital Markets Laws) will undoubtedly work on their client's account. European rules use this formula, the client's account, to compare with the transaction that employs the SSIF's own funds, dealing on own account. Therefore "execution of orders on behalf of clients" means acting to conclude agreements to buy or sell one or more financial instruments on behalf of clients and "dealing on own account" means trading against proprietary capital resulting in the conclusion of transactions in one or more financial instruments[2].

The execution of stock transactions takes place through stock exchange mechanisms, on behalf of the intermediary. Orders are executed by intermediaries (investment firms) in the multilateral market system in their own name (between two initial SSIFs, then between each SSIF and the CCP (central counterparty clearing house, a specialized legal entity of the regulated market mechanism)) with the effects being made on clients' accounts.

The agreement concluded between investment firms and clients seems to be, from the perspective of the entire mechanism of the conclusion and execution of the market orders, as a mandate without representation.

In fact, the conclusion of transactions by the intermediary exclusively on behalf of the client would compromise the stock market celerity, would mean the multiplication of the legal relations between the specialized market participants (market operator, central securities depository (CSD), central counterparty (CCP)) with the number of investors participating in the stock exchange.

[*] Associate Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: profesordrept@gmail.com)

[1] Directive 2014/65/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 May 2014 on markets in financial instruments and amending Directive 2002/92/EC and Directive 2011/61/EU, Annex I, Section A and B.

[2] Directive 2014/65/UE (MiFID II), Art. 4 para (1) no 5.

Otherwise, direct legal relationships only concern investment firms which deal in their own name and the rest of the capital market specialized participants.

Investors just take advantage of these pre-existing legal relationships as the investment firms works on their own behalf as part of the legal relationship with the trading market institutions. The intermediary provides services to the client and concludes legal acts in his own name but on the client's account.

The service provider generally carries out proprietary trades. However, the service provider may act in the name of and on account of the client.

3. A priori assessment of the adequacy and appropriateness of the services and activities offered to investor.

The investment firm shall collect information from the clients about their knowledge and experience regarding financial investments in order to determine their financial skills, provide appropriate warnings about the risks inherent in transactions on capital market and provide client tailored services.

Pursuant to the regulations, the client shall be classified in the retail or professional clients category[3] and shall be informed of its right to ask for a different categorization, under the conditions defined in the regulations. The client shall also be informed of the consequences which could result concerning its degree of protection[4].

Retail clients are afforded the most regulatory protection while professional clients are considered to be more experienced and able to assess their own risk and make their own investment decisions so they are afforded less regulatory protection.

According to Capital Markets Laws, the following shall be regarded as professionals in relation to all investment services and activities and financial instruments: entities which are required to be authorised or regulated to operate in the financial markets (as well as credit institutions, investment firms, insurance undertakings, collective investment schemes and management companies of such schemes, pension funds and management companies of such funds and other institutional investors), large undertakings meeting two of the following size requirements, on a proportional basis: balance sheet total at least 20.000.000 Euro, net turnover at least 40.000.000 Euro, own funds at least 2.000.000 Euro, national and regional governments, public bodies that manage public debt, central banks, international and supranational institutions (such as the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the European Central Bank, the European Investment Bank and other similar international organisations) and other institutional investors whose main activity is to invest in financial instruments, including entities dedicated to the securitisation of assets or other financial transactions[5].

Any clients not falling within this list are, by default, retail clients. Even if they are on the list above such entity can ask for a higher level of protection where it deems it is unable to properly assess or manage the risks involved.

Clients may be treated as professionals on request following some identification criteria as well as: frequent significant transactions, portfolio size or financial expertise[6]. Such clients may waive the benefit of retail client status only where the following procedure is followed: they must state in writing to the SSIF that they wish to be treated as professional clients (either generally or in respect of a particular investment service), SSIF must give them a written warning of the protections and investor compensation rights they may lose and they must state in writing, in a separate document from the contract, that they are aware of the consequences of this professional status.

Eligible counterparties are entities (to which a credit institution or an investment firm provides the services of reception and transmission of orders on behalf of clients or execution of such orders) as well as: investment firms, credit institutions, insurance companies, UCITS and UCITS management companies, pension funds and their management companies, other financial institutions authorised or regulated under Union law or under the national law of a Member State, national governments and their corresponding offices including public bodies that deal with public debt at national level, central banks and supranational organisations[7].

The retail client has the right to request the different classification of professional client but he will be afforded a lower level of protection. SSIF is not obliged to accept this request. Also the professional client has the right to request the different classification of retail client in order to obtain a higher level of protection. The eligible counterparty has the right to request a different classification of either as a professional client or retail client in order to obtain a higher level of protection.

If the client stops providing the information requested by the regulations to the investment firm, the latter would no longer be in a position to assess the appropriateness of the financial instrument and shall

[3] Annex II, Directive 2014/65/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 May 2014 on markets in financial instruments and amending Directive 2002/92/EC and Directive 2011/61/EU.

[4] Art. 25, Directive 2014/65/EU.

[5] Directive 2014/65/EU, Annex II.

[6] Ibidem. The client has carried out transactions, of significant size, on the relevant market at an average frequency of 10 per quarter over the previous four quarters, the size of the client's financial instrument portfolio exceeds 500.000 Euro, the client works or has worked in the financial sector for at least one year in a professional position.

[7] Ibidem, Article 30 para (2).

draw the client's attention to the risks it could incur due to the inappropriateness of the financial instrument compared to its profile.

Regarding order execution, the investment firm shall not be required to collect the information needed for client's assessment if the service is provided at the client's initiative (and if the investment firm warns the client prior to the execution of orders that no assessment the appropriateness of the service or the financial instrument is provided).

3. Execution policy.

Best execution principle implies the investment firm's obligation to take all reasonable measures, during order execution, to obtain the best possible outcome for its clients, under the conditions defined by regulations[8].

Where an investment firm (SSIF) executes an order on behalf of a retail client, the best possible result shall be determined in terms of the total consideration, representing the price of the financial instrument and the costs relating to execution (which shall include all expenses incurred by the client which are directly relating to the execution of the order).

For the purposes of delivering best possible result where there is more than one place to execute an order for a financial instrument, in order to assess and compare the results for the client that would be achieved by executing the order on each of the execution place, the SSIF's own commissions and the costs for executing the order on each of the eligible execution places shall be taken into account in that assessment[9].

However, if the client asks investment firm for a quotation for a financial instrument transaction, such firm shall not apply its execution policy. Investment firm, acting as counterparty for its client, shall not be substituted for its client in deciding the best way to carry out such a transaction.

If the investment firm agrees to accept an order including a specific instruction given by the client, it shall execute the order in accordance with that instruction. The client is clearly informed that the investment firm was prevented from carrying out the measures stipulated in the execution policy in respect of the conditions imposed in the clients' instruction.

If the client places a limit order relating to shares accepted for trading on a regulated market and this order is not immediately executed under the conditions prevailing on the market, the investment firm shall take measures to facilitate the order execution as quickly as possible, by making it immediately public in a form easily accessible to other market participants[10].

When the investment firm provides the service of reception-transmission of orders, the entities to which client orders are transmitted for execution are selected on the basis of ensuring the best possible execution. Unless otherwise specified by the client, he shall consent to the executing of his orders outside a regulated market or a multilateral trading facility by signing the investment services agreement.

The execution policy of the investment firm shall be disclosed entirely and separately to the client.

By submitting an order to the SSIF (investment firm) the client explicitly acknowledges to the investment firm's execution policy.

4. Order confirmation.

For the order execution service, the client shall receive a confirmation on a durable medium (fax, letter or email) at the latest on the first working day following the order execution (if the firm receives confirmation of the execution from a third party, at the latest on the first working day following the reception of the confirmation from this third party).

The confirmation shall contain all the information such as the name of SSIF (the investment service provider) issuing the confirmation, the client's name, the date, type and nature of the order, the name, the volume and price by unit of the financial instrument, the venue of execution.

The client is informed that, given the time taken to send the confirmation, it should generally arrive within 24 hours. The client is therefore asked to notify the firm if said confirmation has not been received within 48 hours of the order having been passed.

Periodic reports shall include details about price, costs, speed and manner of execution for individual financial instruments[11].

Investment firms shall be able to demonstrate to their clients that they have executed their orders in accordance with the investment firm's execution policy according to the law.

5. Conflicts of interest.

SSIF (investment firm) has a written policy aimed at preventing, identifying and, also, managing in an equitable manner any conflict of interest that may arise during the provision of investment services and activities. The conflicts may arise between the interests of the SSIF and its clients, or between the interests of two or more of its clients.

The expanding range of activities that many SSIFs undertake simultaneously has increased potential for conflicts of interest between those different activities and the interests of their clients.

SSIFs shall take effective steps to identify and manage conflicts of interest and mitigate the potential

[8] Art. 27, Directive 2014/65/EU.
[9] Art. 27 para (1), Directive 2014/65/EU.
[10] Art. 28 para (2), Directive 2014/65/EU.
[11] Art. 27 para (3), Directive 2014/65/EU.

impact of those risks as far as possible. Where some risk of detriment to the client's interests remains, clear disclosure to the client of the general nature and sources of conflicts of interest to the client and the steps taken to mitigate those risks should be made before undertaking business on his behalf[12].

6. Clients' obligations

The investor who is party to the investment services and activities agreement undertakes to pay the SSIF the remuneration due to it in respect of the activities and services provided. Furthermore, the client shall compensate SSIF for any expense or damage likely to be (directly or indirectly) borne by the latter.

The investor shall provide SSIF full evidence regarding his identification, the identification of his shareholders, representatives, managers, agents and ultimate beneficiaries of the transactions in compliance with the regulations regarding anti money laundering and the financing of terrorism.

7. Distance agreement.

A distance contract means any agreement for the purpose of services and investment activities concluded between an investment firm (S.S.I.F.) as a provider and an investor as a beneficiary of services and investment activities, in the context of a system of sales or service and distance investment activities organized by the SSIF which, for the purposes of that contract, uses only one or more means of distance communication[13] .

Such distance communication represents any means which, without requiring physical presence of the parties (SSIF and the beneficiary of services and investment activities) may be used for the purpose of achieving the agreement of the parties.

The investor has a 14 day term from the day of conclusion of the distance contract to terminate the contract without having to justify the termination decision and without incurring punitive fees.

In the case of unilateral denunciation, the investor may be required to pay the services rendered up to that date, according with the terms of the agreement.

The right of withdrawal from a distance contract shall not apply to investment services and activities the price of which depends on the fluctuations in the financial markets that may occur during the withdrawal period of the contract[14].

Conclusions.

The investment services and activities agreement shall govern relations between the investor and the SSIF (investment firm) in relation to the supply by the service provider of investment services as defined in MiFID II (Directive 2014/65/EU, Annex I) and national law (Law no 126/2018, Annex 1).

The service provider shall reveal his business on the exchange and commodity markets, as well as financial instruments, securities, money market instruments, unit trusts and types of derivatives instruments that it deals with.

SSIF shall indicate regulated markets, multilateral trading facilities (MTF) or organized trading facilities (OTF) where the transactions are carried out on.

SSIF carries out proprietary trades or it may act in the name of and on behalf of the client.

The investment services and activities agreement shall apply to all transactions concluded by the SSIF carried out at the client's order.

References

- St. D. Cărpenaru, Tratat de drept comercial roman, Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2016.
- St. D. Cărpenaru et al., Legea societăților. Comentariu pe articole. Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2014.
- P. Craig et al., Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Comentarii, jurisprudenta si doctrina, Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2017.
- C. Duţescu, Contractul de vanzare-cumparare actiuni, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2012.
- I.L. Georgescu, Drept comercial român, Bucharest: All Beck, 2002.
- Cristian Gheorghe, Drept comercial român,, Bucharest: CH Beck, 2013.
- Cristian Gheorghe, Piata de capital. Fundamentele juridice, Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2018.
- C. Hamangiu, I.Rosetti-Bălănescu, Al. Băicoianu, Tratat de Drept Civil Român, Bucharest: All, 1996.
- A.-D. Merville, Droit financier, Issy-les-Moulineaux: Gualino, 2015.
- O. Manolache, Drept comunitar, Bucharest: All Beck, 2003.
- T. Prescure, N. Călin, D. Călin, Legea pieţei de capital, Comentarii şi explicaţii, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2008.
- A. Tutuianu, Piata de capital. Regimul juridic aplicabil participantilor, Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2007.

[12] Preamble, no 56, Directive 2014/65/EU.

[13] Art. 60 para (3), (4), Law no 126/2018.

[14] Art. 60 para (8), Law no 126/2018 Fluctuations may be generated by: money market instruments, securities participation in collective investment undertakings, futures contracts, including similar contracts with final settlement in funds, forward rate agreements (FRA), interest rate swaps, exchange rates and shares or options.

UNIVERSITY TEACHERS' ATTITUDES ABOUT UNETHICAL INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY USE: A REVIEW

Roxana GHIAȚĂU[*]
Liliana MÂȚĂ[]
Ioana BOGHIAN[]

Abstract

Continuous confrontation with changes in technologies involves building new attitudes towards ethical issues of IT use. There is increased interest in investigating students' attitudes towards ethical information technology use in particular, and less those of teachers. The major aim of the study is to achieve a systematic review of the studies over the past twenty years on the investigation of the factors that explain the university teachers' attitudes towards the unethical use of information technologies. The specific objectives of the present study are to explore the existing literature on factors influencing unethical information technology use in higher education in terms of two areas of interest: (a) research into investigations on the direct effects of external and internal factors on unethical conduct in higher education; (b) research into investigations on the effects of technology on teachers' unethical conduct. The analysis of current studies reveals that most factors influencing ethical decision-making to a significant extent are internal. We need, first and foremost, strong interior springs to resist the temptation of fraud and less of the external resources. Based on existing studies, we can not extract the specific differences related to technological factors influencing unethical conduct in higher education.

Keywords: factors, higher education, technology use, unethical information

1. Introduction

This study is part of a wider research project aimed at developing an unethical information technology use (UITU) model for higher education teachers. We are currently at the first stages of our approach, therefore a review is absolutely necessary in building a rigorous scientific path.

Regarding the concept of unethical information technology use, answers have been provided more to the question of why teachers engage in unethical conduct rather than to how and under what circumstances such actions are being carried out. The unethical use of Information and Communication Technology (ICT) by students and teachers is a major challenge in educational institutions (Johnson & Simpson, 2005; Özer et al., 2011). Over the last 30 years, a great deal of research has been undertaken to elucidate ethical decision-making in different contexts. There are studies in organizational, educational, marketing, business. Many of them have explored the construction of explanatory models of decision makers. Some of the patterns are more general, such as those that explain the relationship between intention and behaviour, others are more contextual. The purpose of this article is to achieve a review of the research over the past 20 years on the investigation of the factors that explain the attitude towards the ethical use of information technologies for university teachers.

It is necessary to develop a theoretical model of understanding the factors influencing the attitude towards the unethical use of IT, by reference to the previous approaches: the model of unethical usage of information technology (Chatterjee, 2005), the attitude toward ethical decision model (Leonard & Cronan, 2005), the HV general theory of ethics (Hunt & Vitell, 2006), unethical behavioural model in the Social Networking Sites context (Jafarkarimi et al., 2016), and the casual model for ethical behavioural intention of information technology (Seif, 2016). The motivations of this approach are further presented. First of all, building a possible model of UITU factors in higher education must take into account the impressive theoretical and empirical accumulations in this field. However, we may ask ourselves how far we can extrapolate a series of conclusions from various fields in the university field. There are many studies that explain cheating at students, or explain decision making in general, but are they valid for teachers as well? Our intention is to delineate a series of specific information that will lead us to build a model for a specific (university) context, also within an information technology environment. Therefore, we should also take into account the general theories explaining the relationship between attitudes, intent and behaviour, as well as more specific and different variables (teachers in higher education, multiple roles, information technology use). Secondly, the IT fraud in the university environment is quite widespread, but it has been mainly researched in relation to students.

[*] Associate professor , PhD, "Vasile Alecsandri" University of Bacău (e-mail: roxanag@uaic.ro)
[] Associate professor , PhD, Faculty of Sciences, "Vasile Alecsandri" University of Bacău (e-mail: liliana.mata@ub.ro)
[] Lecturer , PhD, Faculty of Sciences, "Vasile Alecsandri" University of Bacău (e-mail: boghian.ioana@ub.ro)

The main objective of the present study is to explore the existing literature on factors influencing UITU in higher education in relation to two areas of interest: 1) Research on examining the direct effects of each factor on unethical conduct in higher education; 2) Research on examining the cumulative, comparative effects of each category of factors on unethical conduct. The research questions are:

- Can we extract, based on the analysed studies, the specific differences related to factors influencing UITU in higher education?
- What is the influence of the Internet and technologies resources on teachers' unethical attitude and unethical behaviour as revealed by studies? Is information technology a relevant external factor in ethical decision?

2. Method

The systematic review of the literature is an explicit, comprehensive and reproducible method for identifying, evaluating and synthesizing some of the existing issues in several completed and recorded works produced by researchers and practitioners (Fink, 2005). A rigorous analysis of the literature review, according to the author, should be systematic as a result of the use of an explicit methodological approach in explaining the procedures through which it was achieved and made comprehensive, to include all relevant studies in the field of unethical information technology use.

Okoli and Schabram (2010) present eight major steps, each of which is necessary for a systematic literature review: setting the goal for reviewing the literature, drafting the protocol and conducting the training, identifying the most relevant studies and articles in the field, selecting significant studies and excluding unreliable ones, quality assessment based on clear criteria, extraction of necessary data, synthesis of studies, writing the review analysis. According to Rousseau et al. (2008), the systematic literature review allows a comprehensive accumulation, transparent exploration and reflexive interpretation of all empirical studies pertinent to a specific question.

This systematic literature search began in august 2018 and was completed in November 2018. A literature search in the databases Google Scholar and Science Direct was performed using the following keywords: "factors unethical conduct", "unethical attitudes higher education" and "higher education unethical attitude Information and Communication Technology". The stage of selecting relevant studies consisted in covering by hand all the articles on one or several of the three areas of interest specified in the main study objective.

3. Results

The presentation of the research results is done by reference to the two areas already mentioned. For each of them, the most useful elements to support answers to research questions have been integrated into tables.

Issue 1: Research on exploring the direct effects of each factor on unethical intention and unethical conduct

a) The relation between individual factors and unethical choice

Table 1 presents a systematic analysis of the main categories of individual factors that emerged from studies as being related to the ethical decision of teachers.

Table 1. Individual factors and unethical choice for teachers

| Individual factors | Authors | Findings |
|---|---|---|
| Cognitive moral development | Johnston and Lubomudrov (1987) | The level of moral reasoning of teachers influences teachers' understanding of classroom rules. |
| | Diessner (1991) | The expressed moral reasoning of teachers (after Kohlberg) is at the conventional level. Moral reasoning indicates a preference, 30-50% of time, for postconventional, principled thinking. |
| | Chang (1994) | Most teachers are at the conventional level. |
| | Cummings et al. (2001) | Students – prospective teachers display lower moral reasoning than students from other specializations. |
| Personal system of values | Hyytinen & Löfström (2016) | The views of university professors on the responsibility for research integrity, the teaching methods used and the need to intervene vary. |

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Moral philosophy | Kish-Gephart et al. (2010) | Relativistic moral philosophy was positively related to unethical choice. |
| Ethical orientation (deontologism, utilitarianism, relativism and selfishness) | Deering (1998) | The ethical orientation of teachers depends on the cultural context in which they work. |
| | Melo (2003) | Early teachers join the utilitarian framework. |
| | GökÇe (2013) | The value of justice has the most powerful effect on the ethical reasoning of teachers. |
| Machiavellianism | Kish-Gephart et al. (2010) | Machiavellianism positively influences unethical choices. |
| Locus of control | Kish-Gephart et al. (2010) | External locus of control was also positively related to unethical choices. |
| Ethical sensitivity | Sparks and Hunt (1998) | There is a significant negative relationship between ethical sensitivity and formal ethical training of participants in research. |
| | Kuusisto et al. (2012) | Finnish teachers perceived themselves as having a high level of ethical sensitivity. |
| Job satisfaction | Kish-Gephart et al. (2010) | Higher job satisfaction was related to a lower likelihood of unethical choices. |
| Demographic variables (gender, age, education) | Akdemir et al. (2015) | Men are more likely to carry out non-ethical activities in the virtual environment than women. |
| | Beycioglu (2009) | Future female teachers were more concerned with ethical issues than men. |
| | Kreie and Cronan (1998) | Women are more conservative in their judgments than men. |
| | Hodges et al. (2017) | Senior teachers tend to self-plagiarize more than juniors. |

The preliminary conclusion is that there are not many recent studies on internal factors that could lead to an unethical choice. Studies on teachers' moral reasoning, ethical orientation, Machiavellianism, locus of control need to be extended an updated to cover a wide range of cultural contexts. With direct reference to the purpose of our research, there is a lack of studies focused on university teachers.

b) The relation between external factors and unethical choice

Table 2 synthesizes the main categories of external factors that explain teachers' unethical choice.

Table 2. External factors and unethical choice for teachers

| External factors | Authors | Findings |
|---|---|---|
| Ethical climate type (egoistic climates, benevolent climates, principled climates) | Kish-Gephart et al. (2010) | An egoistic climate increases the likelihood of unethical choices; benevolent and principled ethical climates decrease the likelihood of unethical choices. |
| Ethical culture | Kish-Gephart et al. (2010) | The strength of ethical cultures in organizations is negatively related to unethical choices. |
| Codes of conduct (code existence, code enforcement) | Kish-Gephart et al. (2010) | Existence of a code of conduct is not negatively related to unethical choices; enforcement of a code of conduct is negatively related to unethical choices. |
| Years of experience in computer use | Beycioglu (2009) | Future teachers who have up to five years of experience with personal computers take into account ethical behaviour more than teachers with over five years of experience. |
| Domain of teaching and subjects taught | Tiong et al. (2018) | Various forms of academic deviations have higher prevalence among medical |

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| | | academics compared to their counterparts in non-medical settings. |
| | Beycioglu (2009) | The judgments of teachers who teach science or computer science were less ethical than those who teach social sciences. |
| Training in other cultural spaces | Lei and Hu (2015) | Teachers trained in other countries had a subtler understanding of the transgressional intertextualities present in plagiarism than did teachers trained in their native countries. |
| | Hodges et al. (2017) | Participants from non-Western contexts have not plagiarized more than Westerners in the abstracts of a conference. |

Among the sources examined, the meta-analysis Kish-Gephart et al. (2010) was of particular interest to our study, because it also examined the cumulative, comparative effects of each category of factors on unethical conduct. To establish the cumulative effects of external factors, the authors concluded: five of the six variables had simultaneous and significant unique impacts on either unethical intention or unethical behaviour. Strength of benevolent climate, principled climate, and code enforcement explained significant variance in unethical intention. Only ethical culture did not account for unique variance in either unethical intention or unethical behaviour beyond these other predictors.

Issue 2: Studies on ICT and unethical choice

Table 3. Factors in ICT context

| Authors | Findings |
|---|---|
| Al-Rafee and Cronan (2006) | Attitude toward digital pirating is influenced by beliefs about the outcome of behaviour (cognitive beliefs), happiness and excitement (affective beliefs), age, the perceived importance of the issue, the influence of significant others (subjective norms), and Machiavellianism. |
| Haines and Leonard (2007) | Gender has the most profound effect on ethical decision-making in IT context; ego strength also having a strong effect; locus of control has a negligible effect. |
| Leonard and Haines (2007) | Along with other factors, computer-mediated group discussion may influence individual's ethical behavioural intention. |
| Cronan and Al-Rafee (2008) | Attitude, past piracy behaviour, perceived behaviour control, and moral obligation explained 71 percent of the intention to pirate variance. |
| Akdemir et al. (2015) | Prospective teachers are more likely to perform unethical behaviours in virtual environment than real life. Men are more likely to perform unethical behaviours in the virtual environment than women. |
| Akbulut et al. (2008) | The factors constituting common types of e-dishonesty among undergraduate students are: fraudulence, plagiarism, falsification, delinquency, and unauthorized help. |
| Şendağ et al. (2012) | The extent of involvement in e-dishonesty practices was significantly greater among freshmen than graduate students; a significant relationship between involvement in e-dishonesty and the rationale for e-dishonesty. |

4. Conclusions

Our review has led to the formulation of two main final conclusions. The first is that in the context of ICT, most factors that contribute significantly to ethical decision-making are internal. Therefore, measures to reduce fraud need to work on these internal factors of attitude. First of all, we need strong interior springs to resist the temptation of fraud, and less external resources. The second conclusion is that studies on IT as an external factor of ethical decision-making in higher education are still in incipient stage. Although some general models have been developed, we cannot yet extract, based on empirical evidence, the specific differences about technological factors influencing the unethical conduct in higher education. Authors present studies with contrasting results, where technological resources either lead to positive attitudes, if they support transformational learning, or to negative attitudes, with tools for fraud being available. We need to approach both situations more thoroughly, so that we can outline an explanatory model of factors influencing unethical information technology use in higher education.

Acknowledgement

This work was supported by a grant of Ministry of Research and Innovation, CNCS - UEFISCDI, project number PN-III-P1-1.1-TE-2016-0773, within PNCDI III.

References

- Akbulut, Yavuz, Serkan Şendağ, Gürkay Birinci, Kerem Kılıçer, Mehmet C. Şahin, and Hatice F. Odabaşı. "Exploring the types and reasons of Internet-triggered academic dishonesty among Turkish undergraduate students: Development of Internet-Triggered Academic Dishonesty Scale (ITADS)." Computers & Education 51, no. 1 (2008): 463-473.
- Akdemir, Ömür, Ömer F. Vural, and Özgür M. Çolakoglu. "Prospective Teachers' Likelihood of Performing Unethical Behaviors in the Real and Virtual Environments." Turkish Online Journal of Educational Technology-TOJET 14, no. 2 (2015): 130-137.
- Al-Rafee, Sulaiman, and Timothy Paul Cronan. "Digital piracy: Factors that influence attitude toward behavior." Journal of Business Ethics 63, no. 3 (2006): 237-259.
- Beycioglu, Kadir. "A cyberphilosophical issue in education: Unethical computer using behavior–The case of prospective teachers." Computers & Education 53, no. 2 (2009): 201-208.
- Chang, Fon-Yean. "School teachers' moral reasoning." In J. R. Rest & D. Narvaez (Eds.), Moral development in the professions: Psychology and applied ethics (pp. 71–83). Hillsdale, NJ: Erlbaum., 1994.
- Chatterjee, Sutirtha. "A model of unethical usage of Information Technology." AMCIS 2005 Proceedings (2005): 51.
- Cronan, Timothy Paul, and Sulaiman Al-Rafee. "Factors that influence the intention to pirate software and media." Journal of business ethics 78, no. 4 (2008): 527-545.
- Cummings, Rhoda, Lynn Dyas, Cleborne D. Maddux, and Art Kochman. "Principled moral reasoning and behavior of preservice teacher education students." American Educational Research Journal 38, no. 1 (2001): 143-158.
- Deering, Thomas E. "The ethical perspective of British and American preservice teachers." Educational Research 40, no. 3 (1998): 353-358.
- Diessner, Rhett. "Teacher Education for Democratic Classrooms: Moral Reasoning and Ideology Critique. Draft." (1991).
- Fink, Arlene. Conducting research literature reviews: From the Internet to paper. Sage Publications, 2013.
- Gökçe, Asiye. "Ethical awareness and ethical orientation of Turkish teachers." Education 134, no. 1 (2013): 35-49.
- Haines, Russell, and Lori NK Leonard. "Individual characteristics and ethical decision-making in an IT context." Industrial Management & Data Systems 107, no. 1 (2007): 5-20.
- Hodges, Amy, Troy Bickham, Elizabeth Schmidt, and Leslie Seawright. "Challenging the profiles of a plagiarist: a study of abstracts submitted to an international interdisciplinary conference." International Journal for Educational Integrity 13, no. 1 (2017): 1-15.
- Hunt, Shelby D., and Scott J. Vitell. "The general theory of marketing ethics: A revision and three questions." Journal of Macromarketing 26, no. 2 (2006): 143-153.
- Hyytinen, Heidi, and Erika Löfström. "Reactively, Proactively, Implicitly, Explicitly? Academics' Pedagogical Conceptions of how to Promote Research Ethics and Integrity." Journal of Academic Ethics 15, no. 1 (2017): 23-41.
- Jafarkarimi, Hosein, Robab Saadatdoost, Alex Tze Hiang Sim, and Jee Mei Hee. "Behavioral intention in social networking sites ethical dilemmas: An extended model based on theory of planned behavior." Computers in Human Behavior 62 (2016): 545-561.
- Johnson, D., & Simpson, C. Are you the ©opy cop?. Learning and Leading with Technology, 323, no. 7 (2005): 14-20.
- Kish-Gephart, Jennifer J., David A. Harrison, and Linda Klebe Treviño. "Bad apples, bad cases, and bad barrels: Meta-analytic evidence about sources of unethical decisions at work." Journal of applied psychology 95, no. 1 (2010): 1.
- Kreie, Jennifer, and Timothy Paul Cronan. "How men and women view ethics." Communications of the ACM 41, no. 9 (1998): 70-76.
- Kuusisto, Elina, Kirsi Tirri, and Inkeri Rissanen. "Finnish teachers' ethical sensitivity." Education Research International, 2012.
- Lei, Jun, and Guangwei Hu. "Chinese university EFL teachers' perceptions of plagiarism." Higher Education 70, no. 3 (2015): 551-565.
- Leonard, Lori NK, and Russell Haines. "Computer-mediated group influence on ethical behavior." Computers in Human Behavior 23, no. 5 (2007): 2302-2320.
- Leonard, Lori NK, and Timothy Paul Cronan. "Attitude toward ethical behavior in computer use: a shifting model." Industrial Management & Data Systems 105, no. 9 (2005): 1150-1171.
- Melo, Patricia. "Ethical conflicts in teaching: The novice teacher's experience." Connections 3 (2003): 175-189.
- Okoli, Chitu, and Kira Schabram. "A guide to conducting a systematic literature review of information systems research." (2010). Retrived from http://sprouts.aisnet.org/10-26.
- Özer, Niyazi, Celal Teyyar Ugurlu, and Kadir Beycioglu. "Computer teachers' attitudes toward ethical use of computers in elementary schools." International Journal of Cyber Ethics in Education (IJCEE) 1, no. 2 (2011): 15-24.

- Rousseau, D. M., Manning, J., & Denyer, D. Evidence in Management and Organizational Science: Assembling the Field's Full Weight of Scientific Knowledge Through Syntheses. (2008). SSRN eLibrary. Retrieved from http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1309606.
- Seif, Mohammad Hasan. "Presenting a casual model for ethical behavioral intention of information technology among students of Shiraz University of Medical Sciences." Medical Ethics Journal 10, no. 35 (2016): 177-198.
- Sparks, John R., and Shelby D. Hunt. "Marketing researcher ethical sensitivity: Conceptualization, measurement, and exploratory investigation." The Journal of Marketing (1998): 92-109.
- Şendağ, Serkan, Mesut Duran, and M. Robert Fraser. "Surveying the extent of involvement in online academic dishonesty (e-dishonesty) related practices among university students and the rationale students provide: One university's experience." Computers in Human Behavior 28, no. 3 (2012): 849-860.
- Tiong, John Jeh Lung, Hui Ling Kho, Chun-Wai Mai, Hui Ling Lau, and Syed Shahzad Hasan. "Academic dishonesty among academics in Malaysia: a comparison between healthcare and non-healthcare academics." BMC medical education 18, no. 1 (2018): 168.

IS THE ANNUAL LEAVE AN AD INFINITUM RIGHT?

Bogdan IONIȚĂ

Abstract

In 2015, the Romanian Labor Code was amended in order to transpose a vast and constant CJEU case law in this field, providing that in the event the employee, for justified reasons, cannot take the annual leave during the year in which it was accrued, the employer is under the obligation to grant the employee the untaken leave days, with his consent, in a reference period of 18 months, calculated from the start of the year following the one in which the right to annual leave was accrued.

In the same context, the Labor Code expressly provided for the accrual of annual leave in certain cases where workers cannot perform work due to objective reasons, such as, but not limited to medical leave and maternity leave.

The above cited regulation gave rise to endless debates in the legal literature regarding aspects such as (i) whether the right to annual leave lapses upon expiry of the 18 months term and, (ii) whether in such a case the corresponding right to payment of an allowance in lieu of leave not taken upon expiry of the 18 months also lapses.

This study intends to address the above-mentioned questions and suggests an approach that takes into account both the purpose (ratio legis) of the annual leave and the legal nature thereof, as well as the recent CJEU case law rendered in the interpretation of Directive 2003/88, pursuant to which the workers' right to annual leave may be construed as lapsed in cases where (i) the employer is able to prove that it enabled workers to exercise their right to paid annual leave in a concrete and transparent manner and (ii) the worker refused to benefit from annual leave voluntarily.

Keywords: annual leave; lapse of annual leave; fundamental social right; indemnity in lieu.

1. Introduction

According to the Labor Code provisions[1] if the employee, for justified reasons, can not make all or part of the annual leave he/she was entitled to in that calendar year, with the agreement of the person concerned, the employer is obliged to give the rest of the leave not performed during a period 18 months starting from the year following the one in which the right to annual leave was born.

The provisions mentioned above are reffering to an exeception from the rule mentioned at paragraph one from the same article 146 from Labor Code which establish that the annual leave shall be taken each year.

Also the same provisions gave rise to endless debates in the legal literature regarding aspects such as (i) whether the right to annual leave lapses upon expiry of the 18 months term and, (ii) whether in such a case the corresponding right to payment of an allowance in lieu of leave not taken upon expiry of the 18 months also lapses.

2. General aspects regarding the annual leave

Employees are entitled to annual leave in accordance with the legal provisions in force.

The right to paid annual leave is a constitutional right provided by art. 41 paragraph 2 of the Constitution of Romania[2], paragraph stipulating the following: "Employees are entitled to social protection measures. These concern the safety and health of employees, the working conditions of women and young people, the establishment of a minimum gross national salary, weekly rest, paid leave, special or special work, vocational training, as well as other specific situations by law. "

The right to annual leave is also provided by art. 39, paragraph 2 of the Labor Code, as it is guaranteed to all employees and can not form the object of any assignment, renunciation or limitation[3].

One of the mandatory clauses of the individual labor contract is the annual leave [4] which is also included in the framework model of the individual labor contract stipulated in the Annex to Order no.63/2004[5] and mentioned in item M. General rights and obligations of the parties, paragraph 1, letter c.

* PhD candidate, Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (email:ionita.bogdan@yahoo.com)

[1] Art.146, par 2, Law no. 53/2003 regarding Labor Code, republished in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, Issue no.345 from 14th May 2011, with subsequent amendments

[2] The Romanian Constitution updated and republished in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, Issue no.767 from 31st October 2003

[3] See art.144, par 2 from Labor Code

[4] See art.17, par. 3, letter i from Labor Code and par 4 from the same article

[5] Order no. 64 of February 28, 2003, issued by the Minister of Labor and Social Solidarity for approval of the framework model of the individual labor contract, as subsequently amended and supplemented

The annual leave is governed by Articles 145-151 of the Labor Code.

One of the elements in respect of which the person selected for employment must be informed before the conclusion of the individual employment contract which is the subject of negotiations between the parties to the individual employment contract and which must be compulsorily included in the individual employment contract is the annual leave.

The right to annual leave is an application of the principle of the protection of employees' rights set out in the provisions of Article 6 of the Labor Code.

The annual leave is a fundamental principle of social law and, thus, part of the EU and national public order. As put by the Court of Justice of the European Union, the annual leave aims to ensure that workers are entitled to actual rest, with a view to guaranteeing effective protection of their health and safety.

To this end, both EU Directive 2003/88 on the organization of working time and the Romanian Labor Code preclude the payment of an allowance in lieu of the annual leave not taken before the termination of the employment relationship.

3. Length of annual leave

Article 7 of Directive[6] 2003/88 EC requires the Member States to take the necessary measures to ensure that every worker receives an annual paid leave of at least four weeks and that the minimum paid annual leave can not be replaced by an allowance financial, unless the employment relationship ceases.

According to the Romanian legislation, the minimum annual leave is 20 working days[7], with the stipulation that the effective annual leave is set in the individual labor contract in compliance with applicable law and collective labor agreements.

Legal holidays in which the employees are not working and also the paid days off laid down in the applicable collective labour agreement shall not be included in the length of the annual leave[8].

There are also employees who, in view of certain specific elements, enjoy an additional leave, employees working in difficult, dangerous or harmful conditions, the blind persons, other disabled persons and the young people under the age of 18 enjoy an addional leave to at least 3 working days[9].

The number of working days related to additional leave for the above categories of employees is set by the applicable collective labor agreement and will be of at least 3 working days.

Additional leave will have to be stipulated distinctly from the annual leave in the individual labor contract. In the same sense, the framework model of the individual labor contract stipulated in the Annex to the Order no. 63/2004 mentions distinct the addditional leave at element “I. The leave” whose provisions are mentioned below:

"I. leave

The duration of the annual leave is ..... working days, in relation to the duration of the work (full-time, part-time).

The employee also benefits from an additional leave of ..... "

4. Can the right to annual leave elapse in certain conditions?

Annual leave shall be taken each year[10] on the basis of a collective or individual schedule[11] laid down by the employer after consulting the trade union or, as the case may be, the representatives of the employees, as far as the collective schedule is concerned, or after consulting the employee, as far as the individual schedule is concerned. Programming is done by the end of the calendar year for the following year.

If the employee, for justified reasons, cannot take all or part of the annual leave he/she was entitled to in that calendar year, with the consent of the person concerned, the employer is obliged to give the untaken leave in a period of 18 months from the year following that in which the right to annual leave was born[12].

Compensation in cash for untaken annual leave is allowed only in the case of termination of the individual employment contract. Article 7 (2) of Directive 2003/88 / EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 concerning certain aspects of the organization of working time laid down, as stated above, that the minimum paid annual leave may not be replaced by a financial indemnity, unless the employment relationship ceases.

Consequently, the rule laid down by both the Romanian[13] and the European legislators is for the annual leave to be taken in-kind, except for the termination of the individual employment contract, in which case the untaken leave will be compensated in cash. The aim is to restore the working capacity of the employee and as stated at the beginning of this article

[6] Directive 2003/88/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time

[7] See art.145 from Labor Code

[8] See art.145, par.3 from Labor Code

[9] See art.147 from Labor Code

[10] See art.146, par.1 from Labor Code

[11] See art.148 from Labor Code

[12] See art.146, par.2 from Labor Code

[13] See in this sens also Al.Athanasiu, Ana Maria Vlăsceanu, Labor Law. Course notes. C.H.Beck Publishing house, Bucharest, 2017,p.174 represents a transposition of the principle of social protection.

Also, in the sense of confirming this rule set by the Romanian legislator, we consider that there are also the provisions of Article 149 of the Labor Code which state that the employee is obliged to take in kind the annual leave of rest during the period in which he was scheduled, except cases expressly provided by law or when, for objective reasons, the annual leave cannot be taken.

If the right to annual leave is set in proportion to the actual time worked by an employee in a calendar year, naturally it follows that a cash offset of untaken annual leave will take into account the same rule for determining the number of unpaid leave days to be paid[14].

Annual leave can be interrupted at the request of the employee for objective reasons.

The employer can recall the employee from the rest leave in case of force majeure or for urgent interests requiring the presence of the employee at the workplace. In this case, the employer has the obligation to bear all the expenses of the employee and his / her family necessary for his / her return to the workplace, as well as any damage suffered by him / her as a result of the interruption of the leave.

Regarding Article 146 (2) of the Labor Code, the following questions arise:

1. If the 18 months mentioned in art.146, paragraph 2 of the Labor Code pass, the days of unpaid leave shall be lost in the case of an employee who did not unduly took his annual leave even though the employer repeatedly told him/her to take the annual leave he was entitled to?
2. What will happen in the case of an employee who, for objective reasons, did not take annual leave within the respite period?
3. Loss of annual leave would only entail the loss of the right to annual leave in kind or also to the right to benefit from the cash compensation at the termination of the contract for the same days referred to in Article 146 (3) of the Labor Code?

We will answer in the following to the above questions.

Answer for the 1st question

If the employee, for unjustified reasons, did not take, all or a part, of the annual leave he/she was entitled to in the respective calendar year, with the agreement of the person concerned, the employer is obliged to grant the untaken annual leave during a period of 18 months from the year following that in which the right to annual leave was born.

If the employee has not taken the annual leave for unjustified reasons, although the employer repeatedly informed him about the annul leave and the term established by art. 146, paragraph 2 of the Labor Code was exceeded, the employee loses the right to annual leave for that period? We consider that, in such a situation, as long as the employer has made all the necessary steps in order for the employee to take the annual leave according to the schedule, and if necessary informed the employee also after that about the annual leave and the employee did not want to exercise this right, the fulfillment of the conditions provided by art. 46, paragraph 2 of the Labor Code will result in the employee's loss of the right to take the remain annual leave for the respective period.

Answer for the 2nd question

We consider that if an employee, for objective reasons, that can be demonstrated, did not take the annual leave within the respite period, he/she will not lose his/her right, because the factors which stopped the employee to take his annual leave could not be controlled by him/her.

Answer for the 3rd question

According to Article 146, 3rd paragraph from the Labor Code: "The cash compensation of the annual leave not taken shall only be permitted in the event of termination of the individual labor contract." So regarding the provisions mentioned before, we consider that the right to the annual leave in kind is indissoluble linked to the annual leave allowance and as a consequence with the compensations to which is referring Article 146, 3rd paragraph from the Labor Code. As a consequence, the loss of annual leave would not only entail the loss of the right to annual leave in kind but it will also atract the loss to the right to benefit from the cash compensation at the termination of the contract for the same days.

The Court of Justice of the European Union ("CJEU") issued on 6 November 2018 a decision regarding case C-684/16, on the interpretation of art. 7 of Directive 2003/88/EC concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time and of Article 31 Para. (2) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, regarding the annual leave.

The dispute was concerning the fact that a German employer, Max-Planck-Gesellschaft zur Förderung der Wissenschaften eV, refused to grant one of its workers, upon termination of employment, a financial compensation for the untaken leave days. The employer's refusal was based on the German legislation pursuant to which the annual leave must be granted in the course of the calendar year when it is accrued – the possibility of carrying forward the annual leave in the following year being permitted only in the event of compelling operational grounds or for personal reasons pertaining to the employee.

In those circumstances, the Bundesarbeitsgericht (Federal Labour Court) decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the CJUE for a preliminary ruling:

"(1) Does Article 7(1) of Directive [2003/88] or Article 31(2) of the [Charter] preclude national legislation, such as Paragraph 7 of the [BUrlG], under which, as one of the methods of exercising the right to annual leave, an employee must apply for such leave with an indication of his preferred dates so that the leave entitlement does not lapse at the end of the relevant period without compensation and under which an employer is not required, unilaterally and with binding effect for the employee, to specify when that leave be taken by the employee within the relevant period?

[14] See in this sens also Al.Athanasiu, Ana Maria Vlăsceanu, Labor Law. Course notes. C.H.Beck Publishing house, Bucharest, 2017,p.174

The CJEU ruled that if the employer is able to prove that it enabled workers to exercise their right to paid annual leave in a concrete and transparent manner and the worker refuses to take annual leave voluntarily, being aware of all the consequences arising thereof, EU law does not preclude national legislation from providing the loss of annual leave or payment of an allowance in lieu of untaken paid annual leave at the end of the employment relationship.

In addition, CJEU recalled that, according to its consistent case law (which remains applicable hereinafter), the right to paid annual leave must be regarded as a particularly important principle of European Union social law, the implementation of which by the competent national authorities must be confined within the limits expressly laid down by Directive 2003/88 itself.

5. Conclusions

In light of the above cited CJEU case law and considering the Romanian legal framwork on the subject matter, it is our view that art. 146 of the Labor Code may be construed in the sense that the right to annual leave lapses at the end of the calendar year during which it was accrued provided the employer guaranteed the employee the right to perform the annual leave (e.g.: specific and timely information, notification with regard to the number of untaken leave days) and the employee refuses to benefit from annual leave without having any objective justification.

CJEU ruled that if

References

- Alexandru Athanasiu, Ana-Maria Vlăsceanu, Labor Law. Course notes. C.H.Beck Publishing house, Bucharest, 2017;
- Alexandru Athanasiu, Codul muncii. Comentariu pe articole. Actualizare la Vol. I și II, C.H. Beck Publishing House, București, 2012;
- Ion Traian, Ștefănescu Tratat teoretic și practic de drept al muncii, Ediția a IV-a, revăzută și adăugită, Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2017.
- Jean Pélissier, Gilles Auzero, Emmanuel Dockès, Droit du travail, Éd. Dalloz, 26e Édition, Paris, 2012;
- Luminița Dima, Relații de muncă și industriale în Uniunea Europeană, Ed. C.H. Beck, București, 2012;
- Paul Craig, Grainne De Búrca, EU Law: Text, Cases and Materials, Oxford University Press, Fourth Edition, 2008;
- Roger Blanpain, European Labour Law, Ed. Kluwer Law International, 2010;
- Sylvie Hennion, Muriel Le Bris -Le Barbier, Marion Del Sol, Droit social européen et international, Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 2010;

THE OBLIGATION TO INFORM ONE ANOTHER OF THE INSURANCE CONTRACTIG PARTIES. LIMITS AND CONTENT OF THE OBLIGATION, FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF EACH OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES.

Ștefan Matei DĂNILĂ

Abstract

In contractual relationships, in general, and as regards the insurance contract, in particular, the obligation to inform one another is of particular importance, all the more so as it is an effective means of protection for both contracting parties.

The obligation of the professional to provide advice to the user of insurance services in order to conclude the contract requires the observance of certain principles such as loyalty and good faith and is carried out, as a rule, by insurance intermediaries.

The obligation to advice of the insurer refers, and at the same time is limited, exclusively to the framework of the insurance operation, without involving external aspects and that are presumed to be known by all. According to some opinions, the obligation to advice is distinguished from the obligation to provide information, the content of which is distinct and refers to the contractual relationship and not to the pre-contractual relationship.

Also, the other contracting party, the insured, has the obligation to inform the insurer, being mandatory that the insured acts in good faith when providing the information required by the insurer, information that is considered by the insurer important when taking over and quantifying the risk.

The insurance contracts must be executed with the utmost good faith. The aspects related to hiding certain key elements are often found in insurance contracts. Failure to inform or distortion of the facts is a violation of the obligation to inform, involving, together with fraud, serious consequences in the execution of the contract by the insured.

All these aspects will be the subject of our analysis, presented within this article.

Keywords: information, advice, insurance, fraud, good faith, distortion

1. The obligation of the insurance products distributor to provide information and advice in accordance with the European and national legislation

When the insured risk occures and we find out that the insurance agreement does not cover the risk, the reaction is to say that we were poorly advised.

Distinct from classical claims based on contract, we notice, more and more, the occurence of complaints based on poor information and/or advice.

For a long time, insurance intermediaries advised their clients verbally. Therefore, those who considered to have been poorly adviced had to prove the deficient advice, which in practice was quite difficult.

The Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council of 20 January 2016 on insurance distribution, provides drawing in the responsability of the insurance distributors for the deficiencies of advice and information. The cited regulatory document, concerning the harmonization of national provisions on insurance distribution, establishes the obligation to issue a written document with regard to the information made and, generally, allows the customers to benefit of the same level of protection, regardless of the differences between the distribution channels.

The Directive applies to all natural or legal persons who are established in a Member State of the European Union or who wish to establish in a Member State for the purpose of performing the activity of distribution of insurance and reinsurance products and of carrying out those activities. The Directive does not apply to the accessory insurance intermediaries.

The regulatory document regulates the obligation to provide advice and information and stipulates that, prior to the conclusion of an insurance contract, the distributor of insurance products must establish, based on the information provided by the client, the needs of that client and, accordingly, disclose to the client objective information, with regard to a specific product, in a comprehensible way, in order to allow the client to make a decision on insurance contracting in full awarness.

At the same time, the Directive also provides that, to the extent that the pieces of advice are provided prior to the conclusion of a specific insurance contract, the distributor of insurance products must provide the customer with a customized recommendation, explaining to the client the reasons why a particular product better satisfies his/her demands and needs.

According to the Directive, the insurance intermediary must propose the contract that best suits the needs of the client.

If the insurance distributor reckons, based on the information received, that the product is not the most suitable for the client, it is required that the client is notified in this respect.

* Phd, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (mstdanila@gmail.com)

The liability for the poor information or advice lies with the insurance distributor.

The liability of the insurance intermediary may be subsequently undertaken, in the event that when the event occurs, there shall be proved that the proposed contract was not best suited to the client`s situation and that another contract would have made it possible to avoid a situation of non-existence of the guarantee.

At the same time, the Directive also provides that the insurance intermediaries or the insurance company must provide the client with the appropriate information regarding the service provided, on a durable medium, in the meaning that a written document, with regard to the information made, shall exist. All the information provided to the client shall be delivered on paper, with some exceptions, strictly regulated.

As regards the insurance distribution, the national legislation has implemented the provisions of the European Union (EU) Directive 2016/97.

Thus, the Law no. 236/2018 on insurance distribution stipulates the requirements applicable to the distributors of insurance products and transposes the provisions of the Directive 2016/97 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 20 January 2016 on insurance distribution.

According to this national regulatory document, the information, including the information about the marketing of the products, must be clear and must not mislead the customers.

The insurance distributor has the obligation to inform the customer to what extent the service provided is about advice on the insurance products offered according to the law.

As defined by the law, by customer it is understood only the natural person, according to the applicable national legislation, and by client it is understood both the customer and the client as legal person.

It must also be clear whether the distributor carries out the activity on behalf of an insurer or independently, as well as who pays him.

According to the provisions of the law, brought in line with the provisions of the Directive, the insurance distribution represents the activity consisting in the following sub-activities: advising on insurance contracts, proposing such contracts or carrying out other work preparatory to the conclusion of such contracts.

The activity of insurance distribution may also consist in concluding such contracts or assisting in the management or performance of such contracts, in particular in the case of a claim, including the provision of information on one or more insurance contracts in accordance with the criteria selected by the clients on a website or by other means of communication.

The insurance distribution activity also includes the compilation of an insurance product ranking list, including price and product comparisons, or a discount on a premium, if the client has the possibility to conclude, directly or indirectly, an insurance contract using a website or other means of communication.

For the purposes of the law, the following activities are excluded from being regarded as distribution activities: a) the occasional provision of information in the context of another professional activity where the provider is limited to it, without assisting a client in concluding or performing an insurance or reinsurance contract; b) the management of claims of a company on a professional basis, and the assessment and regulation/processing of claims; c) the mere provision of data and information on potential contractors, to intermediaries or companies, if the provider is limited to it, without providing assistance in concluding an insurance or reinsurance contract; d) the mere provision of information about insurance or reinsurance products, intermediaries or companies to potential contractors, if the provider is limited to it, without providing assistance in concluding an insurance or reinsurance contract. (3) The terms and expressions provided for in para. (1) shall be supplemented by those defined by the Law no. 237/2015.

In accordance with the provisions of the Law no. 236/2018, the insurance intermediaries are those natural or legal persons, other than a company or its employees and other than an accessory insurance intermediary, who initiate or carry out an insurance distribution activity, in return for remuneration.

The processes carried out by the distributors, including the decision-making process, and the supervisory process carried out by A.S.F. (the Financial Supervisory Authority) are substantiated by supporting documents, the Law no. 236/2018 stating the so-called principle of documentation.

The documentation is made on durable medium, defined by the law as the instrument which, on the one hand, allows the client to store the information that is addressed to him personally so that the information can be used for future reference for a period of time adequate for the purpose of the information, and on the other hand, allows the exact reproduction of the information stored.

The law establishes, in accordance with the Directive, the requirements for information and conduct in the performance of the activity, stating that the insurance distributors must always act honestly, fairly and professionally in order to fit best to the interests of their clients.

The information relating to the subject matter of this law, including advertisements, which are addressed to the clients or potential clients by the insurance distributors, must be accurate, clear and non-misleading and easily identifiable (art. 12).

In this regard, before concluding an insurance contract, the insurers and/or the insurance intermediaries must provide their clients, in due time, with certain information, namely: a) in the case of insurers and intermediaries: (i) their identity and address; (ii) the capacity of intermediary or insurer, as applicable; (iii) if they provide advice on the insurance products marketed; (iv) the procedures provided for by art. 4 para. (20) and the information on out-of-court complaint procedures and appeals procedures provided for by art. 4 para. (27); b) in the case of intermediaries: (i) the register in which they are registered and the means by which the registration can be checked; (ii) whether they represent the client or act for and on behalf of the insurer.

The law clearly distinguishes between the obligation to provide advice and the obligation to provide information.

The obligation to provide advice. As far as the advice information is concerned, before the conclusion of insurance contracts, the insurance distributors must assess the requirements and needs of the clients, based on the information obtained from them, so that the proposed contracts are in line with them.

In the event that the advice is given prior to the conclusion of a specific contract, the insurance distributors make customized recommendations for the clients, documenting the reason for the suitability of a particular product to the clients` requirements and needs, by adapting to the complexity of the proposed insurance product and to the type of client.

The advice is provided after the analysis of a sufficiently large number of insurance contracts available on the market, so that the customized recommendation is made based on professional criteria and the insurance contract is best suited to the needs of the client.

Within the obligation to provide advice, they must provide clients with objective information about the proposed insurance product, in an easily understandable form, in order to allow them to make an informed decision.

1.2. The obligation to provide information. General aspects.

According to the doctrine[1], the general pre-contractual obligation to provide information exists independently of an express provision of the law.

The general legal basis for the existence of the obligation to provide information lies, under the old regulations, in the extensive construction of art. 970 paragraph 1 of the 1864 Civil Code, according to which: „They (the agreements) must be performed in good faith", this text being unanimously construed by the doctrine and the case law arisen from the provisions of the old regulations, that applies also to the pre-contractual period.

Under the new regulation, art. 14 of the Civil Code provides that (1) „any natural or legal person must perform his/its obligations in good faith, in accordance with the public order and good morals. (2) Good faith is presumed until proven otherwise", and art. 1170 of the Civil Code provides that „The parties must act in good faith both during the negotiation and the conclusion of the contract and throughout its execution. They can not eliminate or limit this obligation".

The second thesis of art. 1170 of the Civil Code adds that the parties can not eliminate or limit this obligation, which gives the rule of the first thesis, a public order nature. A similar rule is provided by the principles of the European Contract Law.

If this is the general rule applicable to contract matters, we must point out that good faith is specifically regulated also with regard to the mechanism for concluding contracts by art. 1183, which details the obligation of good faith during the negotiations and provides the sanction for bad faith conduct, namely the obligation to repair the damage caused to the other party.

Violation, by the insurer, of the rights of the insured has as a consequence, with respect to the clauses resulting from these violations, namely their lack of effect, their lack of opposability to the insured (the equivalent of the absolute nullity).

According to an opinion expressed in the specialized doctrine [2] before the law nr. 236/2018 was enacted, „there will also be taken into account the regulations in the field of customer protection, legislated mainly by the Law no. 296/2004 on the consumption code. The Law no. 296/2004 provides the regulation of legal relations created between traders and customers on purchasing products and services, including financial services (art. 1). Under the Law no. 296/2004, the notion of financial services includes some services of banking nature, credit, insurance, private pensions and investments or payments ... We note that, according to art. 27 of the law, the customers (and therefore also the insurance customers - our emphasis, MD) have the right to be fully, accurately and precisely informed of the essential characteristics of the products and services, so that the decision they adopt in relation to them corresponds best to their needs and to be educated in their capacity as customers, and according to art. 78, traders are prohibited from stipulating abusive clauses in contracts concluded with customers".

1.3. The obligation to provide information according to the Law no. 236/2018.

Without prejudice to the provisions of art. 107 of the Law no. 237/2015, prior to the conclusion of a contract, irrespective of whether or not advice is given and whether or not the insurance product is part of a package, the insurance distributor applies the provisions of the law on how to provide information about that product.

That information shall be delivered using a standardized insurance product information document, according to the legal provisions, called „PID", an information document prepared by the creator of the non-life insurance product in a succinct and stand-alone manner.

[1] L.Pop, „Tratat de drept civil. Obligaţiil". Vol II. Contractul. Ed Universul Juridic, Bucureşti 2009 pag 281
[2] Vasile Nemeş, „Dreptul asigurărilor" Ediţia a 4-a Editura Hamangiu 2012, pag. 194,

The information document shall be presented and structured using legible characters in order to be clear and easy to read and shall be written in the official language used in the Member State where the insurance product is offered or in another language, if an agreement is entered into between the customer and the distributor in this regard. P.I.D. must be accurately structured, not-confusing and must contain the title „Insurance Product Information Document".

It will also include the statement specifying that full pre-contractual and contractual information shall be provided in other documents.

The P.I.D. is delivered together with the information required to be transmitted according to the legal provisions and shall include the following information: a) the type of insurance; b) a summary of the cover of the insurance including: (i) the main risks; (ii) the insured amount; (iii) geographical coverage, if applicable; (iv) the summary of the excluded risks, if applicable; c) methods of payment of premiums and frequency of payments; d) the main exclusions for which no claims can be made; e) obligations at the beginning of the contract; f) obligations during the term of the contract; g) obligations in case of claims; h) the contract period, including the start and end dates of the contract; i) methods of termination of the contract.

The information provided in accordance with the provisions of the law shall be communicated to the clients on paper, clearly and accurately, in a manner that is comprehensable to the customer, in one of the following official languages: of the Member State where the risk is situated, of the Member State of the committment, in the language agreed upon by the parties. Transmission will be free of charge.

By way of exception, if certain conditions are met, the information may be provided to the clients using one of the following means of communication: a) a durable medium, other than paper; b) a website, and only if the delivery method is appropriate in the context of the activity carried out between the insurance distributors and the clients and offers the possibility for the clients to choose between information on paper and other durable medium, the clients choosing the second option.

The provision of information is considered to be appropriate if there is evidence that those clients have access to the Internet on a regular basis. The provision by the client with an email address for the purpose of that activity is considered such proof.

In the case of telephone sales, the information provided to the clients before the conclusion of the contract, including the PID, is provided in accordance with the national and European Union rules directly applicable to the distance marketing of customers financial services.

1.4. The sanction for non-compliance by the insurer with the obligation to provide information in national case law.

The insurer`s failure to comply with the obligation to provide information and the consequences that it implies considering the obligations of the contracting parties, is also pointed out by the national case law.

In accordance with the civil decision no. 620 dated 26 February 2009, delivered by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, court order that was published in a case law review, the author Cristina Enache, judge magistrate at the Prahova Tribunal[3] and on the website www.scj.ro, it has been sanctioned the culpable conduct of the insurer consisting in not handing over a copy of the conditions, not mentioning the cases excluding the liability of the insurer in the section of the insurance policy specially created for that purpose, also noting that „the insured did not give his consent with regard to the clause concerning the exclusion causes of the insurer".

In the reasoning of the decision of the High Court of Cassation and Justice no. 620/26.02.2009 the following recitals are noted:

„The High Court, analyzing the appealed decision in terms of the criticisms made based on the provisions of art. 304 pt. 7, 8 and 9 of the Civil Procedure Code, in relation to the deeds and proceedings of the file and the relevant legal provisions, finds that they are not such as to lead to the cassation or the modification of the decision of the appelate court. In this respect, it is noted that the appealed decision is correctly and coherently reasoned, the appelate court justly establishing that, although there is a mention on the insured`s statement that he took note of the terms and conditions of the contract, it is not signed by the insured claimant (page 6)and the insurer defedant did not prove that he handed a copy of the above mentioned general conditions to the insured or that he has a copy signed by him, and that the section of the insurance policy specially created for cases excluding the insurer`s liability is not filled in (page 5) and the insurance agent did not request the insured to submit the construction authorization, nor did he inform him that the existence of such an authorization conditioned the conclusion of the insurance contract by the insurer, so that, the court judiciously noted that the insured claimant did not express the consent with regard to the clauses concerning the reasons of exclusion of the liability of the insurer, the court also fairly construed the clauses of the insurance contract in litigation ..... References of the appellant to the breach of the provisions of the Law no. 50/1991 are void in this case, because the penalties provided for by this law can not be applied incidentally, at the request of a legal person governed by private law, and in order to take effect in the case of a trade contract of another nature. Therefore, the Court considers that the appelate court has correctly construed and enforced the law, for this reason, under art. 312 para. (1) of the Civil Procedure Code, the appeal will be dismissed as unfounded."

[3] Cristiana Dana Enache, „Clauze abuzive în contractele încheiate între consumatori şi profesionişti", Editura Hamangiu, 2012

In another case decision, which is also extremely relevant as regards the failure of the insurer to comply with the obligation to provide information, the Covasna Tribunal notes in the recitals of the civil decision no. 142R/28.05.2014 the following:

„Noting that the insured risk has occured, the judicial review court finds that the aspect to be examined in the case concerns the effects of the clause that exonerates the liability which the defendant insurer made use of in justifying the refusal to pay the insurance indemnity, clause that has been challenged by the claimant insured and to which the first ground of appeal relates to ..... Analyzing the above clause, the court will note that it has the legal nature of a standard clause in the meaning presented by art. 1202 para. 2 of the New Civil Code, according to which „There are considered standard clauses the provisions established in advance by one of the parties for general and repeated use and which are included in the contract without being negotiated with the other party", a hypothesis that is found in this case, considering that this clause is written by the insurer and is inserted in a brochure or book, according to the terminology used by the appellee in the statement of defence, and it is not the result of a negotiation with the insured. At the same time, the clause clearly has the legal nature of a liability exemption clause, given the fact that it is provided a hypothesis in which, although the insured risk occures, the insurer`s contractual obligation is removed.

Therefore, considering the nature of the clause in question, the court will take into account that it is subject to the express provision of art. 1203 of the New Civil Code, according to which „the standard clauses providing for the benefit of the person proposing them the limitation of liability, ... shall have effect only if expressly accepted by the other party".

But, in this case, the judicial review court will note that the insured did not adopt by signing this clause stipulated in his detriment, from the evidence presented to the case it did not result that he had been informed of the conditions of the insurance and that he had taken note of their content and much less that he would have agreed and would have accepted this clause, since the condition required provided for by the above mentioned legal provision has not obviously been fulfilled in order for that clause to take effect.

In view of the above, considering the nature of the clause and its drastic effect, to completely remove the obligation of the insurer - who has received the insurance premiums - to pay the insurance indemnity, the court notes that an assertion that the agreement of the insured would appear from other clauses or related provisions is contrary to the compulsory rule of the Civil Code, a rule which unequivocally states that this clause must be expressly accepted, not tacitly and generically.

The judicial review court shall not, in this respect, consider the defense of the appellee that in the insurance policy has been stated that the insured acknowledged and received the insurance conditions and that those conditions are part of the contract, these terms being insufficient to express the acceptance by the insured of the clause presented by the appellee - defandant."

2. The obligation of the insured to provide information to the insurer. General aspects.

The pre-contractual stage is always marked by various communications or attempts of communication, sometimes abandoned, by future contractors.The deficiencies arising with regard to the pre-contractual information are always the cause of an important litigation.

The insurance operation is often too technical for the uniformed insured, who should be informed and advised by the professional.

It is therefore the responsibility of the insurer to provide the insured with a limitative and precise insurance questionnaire and to provide him with a copy of the draft contract together with the insurance conditions, as well as with detailed information regarding insurance exclusions and covers/guarantees.

As regards the insured, the obligation to provide information consists in presenting the risk in a frank and accurate manner, the exact description of the proposed risk belonging to the insurance contract and being carried out based on the information requested by the insurer through the insurance questionnaire.

In the concrete process of concluding an insurance contract, the insured performs his obligation to declare the risk only after receiving the first information provided by the professional.

The information that the insured provides to the insurer in relation to the risk that he wishes to cover is an essential element of the contract. This information, by itself, allows the insurer to assess to what extent he accepts to offer the guarantee of the insurance contract.

The basis for the obligation to declare any circumstances which might lead to a risk lies in the principle of extreme good faith or „uberrime fidei". Therefore, the obligation of the insured to inform the insurer must be carried out in maximum good faith.

In order to establish the extent of the obligation to declare, it arises also the issue of the person who determines the extent of the obligation. Therefore, the main issues will be to know how to determine the measurement criteria and who has the responsibility to establish the statement framework.

If the liability for the content of the statement lies with the declarant himself, he will always be liable for the information deficiencies.

The existence of a particular circumstance, known to the insured, must be disclosed to the insurer, because otherwise, assuming the insured risk arises, it will come down to what the insurer would have done if he knew that situation prior to the conclusion of the contract, the assumptions being the following: either the insurer would have refused to contract, or would have committed to cover the risk only in return for a higher premium.

As far as the insurer is concerned, his main objective, at this stage, is to accurately measure the risks and to assess the costs.

Consequently, insofar as he is the one that takes over the responsibility of establishing the questions from the insurance questionnaire, the first stage, but a very important stage in the risk statement, is to determine the circumstances existing at the conclusion of the contract in relation to the insured asset, which is subject to the statement and which may influence his opinion.

The circumstances that may affect and influence the insurer`s opinion may be very different. They vary not only depending on the different categories of insurance but also depending on each specific case.

In this context, a clarification is necessarily required: if the insurer is the one that determines the extent of the obligation to provide information, he will not be able to blame the co-contractor for the insufficiency of the information, insofar as the insured has provided exact answers to all the questions.

In the system of the so-called spontaneous statement of the insured, the insured had to declare, when concluding the contract, all the circumstances known to him and which can help the insurer make the risk assessment.

This procedure proved to be impractical because the insured does not have or has little experience in insurance, which implicitly leads to his inability to assess the importance and relevance of the information regarding the conditions of taking over the risks by the insurer.

The jurisprudence has moderated the use of the spontaneous statement, and the so-called limited statements were adopted, within the questionnaire proposed by the insurer. It was considered that the insurer, given his own experience, as a professional, is sufficiently trained in order to adequately and comprehensively determine all the information he needs for a correct risk assessment.

The system of the limited statement therefore consists in providing exact answers to the questions asked by the insurer, within the form for the risk statement, a form through which, upon the conclusion of the contract, the insurer inquires the insured with regard to the circumstances that are likely to determine him to assume guarantee coverage and risk taking.

However, regardless of the insurer`s help through the questionnaire, the insured is still required to declare all information known by him, that could influence the insurer`s opinion with regard to the risk.

The circumstances known to the insured and that have to be declared to the insurer may be objective or subjective. The objective circumstances are those that concern the subject of the contract itself and that allow the insurer to determine the possibility and intensity of the risk, such as fire insurance, being of interes for example the construction materials, the neighborhood and the destination of the building.

The subjective circumstances are those that refer to the person of the underwriter, meaning if an insured event occurred under a previous insurance contract, if he previously terminated an insurance contract with another company, if he was subject to civil or criminal convictions, or if he has already been insured for the same risks by another insurance company.

In the doctrine, there has been raised the issue of the consequences of an on-site visit of the insurer, namely to the asset to be insured. The issue that arises is to know whether such a visit would involve, as a consequence, the limitation of the extent of the obligation to declare incumbent upon the insured.

Does an inspection procedure carried out by the insurer represent the signal of a waiver of the insurer to make use of an inaccurate statement made by the insured?

The waiver should mean that the insurer already knows the inaccuracy of the statement at the time of the inspection, having the value of a simple presumption of knowing the circumstances of the risk.

No such conclusion can be drawn, as the obligation to determine the framework of the statement belongs to the insurer, who must ask questions to the insured.

Insofar as a pertinent question is asked to the insured, he can not refuse to answer, even if he is able to prove that the insurer already knows the answer.

If, because of the ineffectiveness of the inspection, the insurer has not been able to notice certain aspects and, as a consequence, he has failed to question the insured about those aspects, the insurer will not objectively be able to blame the insured for not giving an exact statement.

The risk inspection is only an additional way to check the accuracy of the risk assessment. The existence of a risk inspection will automatically determine a facilitation of the obligation to declare of the insured, who often knows the reality better than others.

The insured is bound to answer correctly the questions asked by the insurer, even if he knows for sure that the insurer knows the answers. The questionnaire has the role of facilitating the risk statement and the insured has the obligation to submit to the insurer`s guidance.

Also, there has been raised the question whether the insured is exonerated of the obligation to declare, when certain aspects, as a consequence of their public knowledge, are, or ought to be known by the insurer.

The French jurisprudence[4] has admitted that the insured does not have to declare to the insurer any elements of which the latter is presumed to have knowledge of. It is the case of a famous sportsman for whom it has been decided that he did not have the obligation to make a statement regarding his speedboat racing, since these activities as well as his engagement in sports competitions were public and should have been known by the insurer. The insurer is not a mere addressee of the statement, he has a precise role in the procedure.

The insured are protected against dangers resulting from inaccurate and obscure questions. An incomplete questionnaire can be assimilated to an ambiguous questionnaire. Consequently, incomplete, partial answers might be attributable to the insurer and not to the insured. The inaccurate nature of the answers, consequence of ambiguous questions, can lead to the elimination of the insured`s suspicion of bad faith. In a 1993 judgment, the French Court of Cassation showed that the accuracy and the honesty of the insured`s statements must be assessed depeding on the questions presented in the risk statement questionnaire[5]. For example, if the insurer asks the insured to indicate the risk history occurring within a specified period of time, he can not blame the insured for not indicating the events that had occurred before or after that period.

The insurer has also the possibility to obtain the information necessary for the risk assessment also by other means, the risk statement not being the only way. Thus, the insurance company may request the provision, from another insurer, of the risk statement signed by that insured when concluding contractual relations with the other insurer.

The omission of the insured to answer to one or more of the questions asked by the insurer, especially when he is aware of the issues he has been asked of, may result in the refusal to pay compensation for the omission in statements.

In one case, the French case law considered the deliberate nature of the insured`s omission to answer to a particular question when the insured, aware of the risk of land compaction, refused (omitted) to answer the insurer`s question and, moreover, did not provide him with the proof of the technical check required by the insurer.[6]

In fulfilling an obligation to provide information, such as the one regarding the risk statement, it is required that the transmission of the document is done, in order have the proof for that, thus raising a crucial issue, namely the proof of making the statement.

The distinctiveness of the insurance contract lies not only in the evidence or in determining who is responsibile for the burden of proof, but, also in the fact that, in the process of searching for information about the risk, it may come into conflict with certain rights of the person, including those relating to confidentiality. These minuses give rise to a delicate problem, namely to know the limits of risk related research.

The first limit depends on the condition of good performance of the insurance, meaning no statement should be made if it does not serve the insurer in the risk assessment.

However, even in the presence of such a clear principle, in practice, there have been pointed out situations in which there has been a conflict between the compulsoriness to preserve the medical confidentiality and the need to declare certain information, for purposes of insurance coverage, information likely to lead to a breach of medical confidentiality, which has a general and absolute nature.

2.1. Th obligation to inform. The effects of bad faith of the insured.

An insurer who criticises his insured that the latter has violated the obligation to declare must prove, by all means, a number of aspects such as: the fact that the insured, knowing the existence of a circumstance likely to influence the insurer`s opinion on the risk, has not made the statement or made an inaccurate statement.

If the insurer claims that the insured has acted intentionally, he will also have to prove the bad faith of the contractor, otherwise good faith is presumed. The bad faith means that the reluctance or the false statement is intentional, most often happening for the insured to benefit of a more advantageous premium regime.

It is necessary to demonstrate not only the bad faith of the insured, but also the fact that the simulated circumstance had consequences on the insurer`s opinion regarding the risk.

The starting point of the analysis is the evidence of a wrong answer to the questionnaire given by the insured, but the false statement does not equal bad faith.

To the extent that the intentional nature of the inaccurate statement can not be established, the declarant should not be subject to sanctions, as his bad faith is not proved.

The bad faith is sovereignly appreciated by the first instance judges, in particular, taking into account the insured`s personal capacity to become aware of the effects of the inaccurate or false statement. However, it is also necessary to take into account the way the questions are drafted.

Thus, if the insured proves to be in difficulty to understand precisely the questions asked by the insurer, the judge may dismiss the bad faith.

In the presence of inaccurate answers to the questions in the questionnaire, one can also draw the conclusion that the declarant has a limited understanding capacity, aspect which also appeals to tolerance in the assessment of his bad faith. However, those who possess particular professional competences, for example, of the kind that helps them understand the meaning of the questions asked by the insurer, should not benefit from this tolerance.

[4] Cass 1 er civil, 2 martie 1994, Campagnie Abeille Paix Vie c/ Banque Commerciale Privee et M. Coudray, RGAT, 1994, p. 469
[5] Cass, 1 er civile, 17 martie 1993, Mem Manon c/ Societe Cogirout La Henin et Societe Assurance vie, RGAT 1993, p. 547
[6] Cass, 1 er civil, Societe Visconti c/Cie Yorkshire General Accident Fire and Life Corp, RGDA, 1997, p. 123, note du Jerom Kullmann.

The case law affirmed the sovereign power of the first instance judge to assess the intentional nature of the erroneous statement.

If the judge finds that, at the time of the underwriting, the insured was unaware of the circumstance omitted or of its effects, its importance may be understated and, finally, the consequences of the omission removed, since the ignorance or knowledge of the declarant, which are not intentional, should not lead to incurring any sanctions.

The insured in default can not claim that he had not been advised by the insurer regarding his obligation to act in good faith or regarding the consequences of an inaccurate, omissive or untruthful statement. The insurer can not be liable to inform the insured with regard to the sanctions applied in case of his bad faith.

If the insurer wants to obtain the nullity of the contact, the evidence of the bad faith of the insured is not enough. Additionally, it is required that the insurer proves that, in his opinion, the falsity of the statement changed the subject of the risk and had consequences on the opinion that he might have had.

A possible defense of the insured may be, in this situation, to claim that the false statement, despite its intentional nature, did not alter the risk assessment.

There are no well-defined criteria to determine this fact, the insurer is free to prove that, if the omission or false statement of the insured are found, they would lead to either a refusal to contract or a higher premium regime.

2.2. The sanction that occurs in case of inaccurate statement or reluctance regarding the risk, according to the romanian Civil Code .

The Romanian legislator provided for in art. 2203 of the Civil Code, the obligation of the insured to inform the insurer, by way of a statement, answering, in writting, to the insurer`s questions.

Thus, the insured has the obligation to answer in writing to the questions asked by the insurer and to declare any information or circumstances known to him and which are also essential for the risk assessment at the conclusion of the contract. This obligation to provide information shall also be maintained during the performance of the contract, being provided that, if the essential circumstances regarding the risk change during the performance of the contract, the insured shall notify the insurer in writing of the change occurred. The same obligation also lies with the insurance contractor who became aware of the change occurred.

The sanction that occurs in the event of non-compliance with this obligation, non-compliance expressed by making an inaccurate statement or by an omission to declare, is the nullity of the insurance contract, a sanction that occurs only to the extent that the bad faith of the insured arises.

According to the provisions of art. 2204 para. 1 of the Civil Code, besides the general reasons for nullity, the insurance contract is null in the event of inaccurate statement or reluctance made in bad faith by the insured or by the insurance contractor with regard to the circumstances which, if had been known by the insurer, would have determined him not to give his consent or not to give his consent under the same conditions, even if the statement or the reluctance had no influence on the occurrence of the insured risk. The premiums paid remain acquired by the insurer, who, may also request the payment of the premiums due until the moment he became aware of the cause of the nullity.

The Civil Code adapts the sanction not only in relation to the good or bad faith of the insured, but also depending on the moment of finding the inaccurate statement or the reluctance in the statements of the insured.

Thus, the inaccurate statement or the reluctance on the part of the insured or of the insurance contractor, whose bad faith could not be established, does not draw in the nullity of the insurance.

In the event that the finding of the inaccurate statement or of the reluctance happens prior to the occurrence of the insured risk, the insurer has the right either to keep the contract requesting the premium to be increased, or to terminate the contract at the end of a period of 10 days calculated from the notification received by the insured, refunding to the latter the share of the premiums paid for the period during which the insurance no longer operates.

When the finding of the inaccurate statement or of the reluctance happens after the occurrence of the insured risk, the sanction, that occurs in the event that the bad faith of the insured could not be established, is the decrease of the compensation in relation to the ratio between the level of the premiums paid and the level of the premiums that should have been paid.

References

- L.Pop, „Tratat de drept civil. Obligaţiil". Vol II. Contractul. Ed Universul Juridic, Bucureşti 2009, pag 281
- Vasile Nemeş, „Dreptul asigurărilor" Ediţia a 4-a Editura Hamangiu 2012, pag 194
- Civil decision no. 620 dated 26 February 2009, delivered by the High Court of Cassation and Justice published in, „Clauze abuzive în contractele încheiate între consumatori şi profesionişti", author Cristiana Dana Enache, Editura Hamangiu, 2012 and on the site www.scj.ro
- Revue generale des assurances trrestres (RGAT), 1994, p. 469, Cass 1 er civil, 2 martie 1994, Campagnie Abeille Paix Vie c/ Banque Commerciale Privee et M. Coudray,
- Revue generale des assurances trrestres (RGAT) 1993, p. 547, Cass, 1 er civile, 17 martie 1993, Mem Manon c/ Societe Cogirout La Henin et Societe Assurance vie,
- Revue generale du droit des assurances (RGDA), 1997, p. 123, Cass, 1 er civil, Societe Visconti c/Cie Yorkshire General Accident Fire and Life Corp, note du Jerom Kullmann.

COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF THE REGULATION REGARDING THE SUBSTANTIVE CONDITIONS OF ADOPTION IN ROMANIA AND IN THE REPUBLIC OF MOLDOVA

Cristian MAREȘ[*]
Dan LUPAȘCU[]

Abstract

The study examines from a comparative point of view some theoretical issues of the substantive conditions of adoption both in Romania and in the Republic of Moldova as they are regulated by the specific laws. The research consists in the analysis of the legal provisions related to the conditions that must be fulfilled by the adopted and by the adopter both from theoretical and practical perspectives. The authors also intend to carry out an analysis of the relevant case law of the courts of law in this matter.

Keywords: adopted, adopter, consent, adoption age, interdictions

1. Introduction

This paper intends to carry out an analysis of the substantive conditions of adoption both in the Romanian and in the Moldavian legislations.

The substantive conditions of adoption are regulated by the Romanian Civil Code (Law No. 287/2009, republished)[1] – hereinafter referred to as Civil Code –, by the Law No. 273/2004 regarding the legal regime of adoption, as republished and further amended[2] – hereinafter referred to as Law No. 273/2004 – and by the Moldavian Law No. 99/2010 regarding the legal regime of adoption[3] – hereinafter referred to as Law No. 99/2010 –.

2. Content

2.1. The individuals who can be adopted

According to the provisions of article 455 paragraph (1) of Civil Code, the child can be adopted until acquiring full exercise capacity. Nonetheless, the provisions of article 455 paragraph (2) of Civil Code stipulate the fact that the individual with full exercise capacity can be adopted also, when raised during minority by the individual who wishes to adopt him or her[4]. As per article 38 of Civil Code, the full exercise capacity begins when the individual becomes an adult, respectively at the age of 18 years old. Also, it must be taken into consideration the case of the child acquiring full exercise capacity by marriage, as well as the child acquiring full anticipated exercise capacity, under the conditions stipulated by article 40 of Civil Code. As stated in the literature[5], the growth of the child during minority means not only ensuring the child support, but also the existence of affective relations between the adopted and the adopter, such as those established between the child and the natural parents. Also, the growth must have been continuous and on a long-term. With respect to the application in time of the provisions governing the age of the adopted, article 48 of Law No. 71/2011 on the application in time of the Law No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code[6] stipulates that „the provisions of article 455 of Civil Code are applicable also in case the child acquires anticipated exercise capacity, as per article 40 of Civil Code".

The provisions of article 10 of Law No. 99/2010 are approximately similar to those in the Romanian legislation, meaning that the individual can be adopted only until the age of 18 years and, by way of derogation from this rule, the individual who has acquired full exercise capacity until the age of 18 years old can be adopted only in case the adopter is the individual or the family who has raised him or her, if he or she has cohabited for no less than 3 years until the application for adoption.

---

[*] Lecturer PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest and Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, "Valahia" University of Târgoviște (email: cristian.mares@mares.ro)

[] Professor PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: prof.danlupascu@gmail.com)

[1] Published in Official Gazette of Romania No. 505 of July 15, 2011, as further amended.

[2] Published in Official Gazette of Romania No. 739 of September 23, 2016, as further amended.

[3] Published in Official Gazette of Republic of Moldova No. 131-134 of July 30, 2010, as further amended.

[4] Please see Constanța Tribunal, I Civil Division, Civil Sentence No. 99/2012 and Civil Sentence No. 139/2012 (www.juridice.ro), when the court admitted the action and approved the adoption of an adult.

[5] D. Lupașcu, C.M. Crăciunescu, Family law, 3rd edition, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.481; E. Florian, Family law. Marriage. Matrimonial regims. Filiation, ed. a 5-a, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p.467; C. Mareș, Family Law, Second Edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p.288; B.D. Moloman, L.-C. Ureche, The new Civil Code. 2nd Book. About family. Articles 258-534. Commentaries, explanations and jurisprudence, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 608-609.

[6] Published in Official Gazette of Romania No. 409 of June 10, 2011, as further amended.

The distinction between the two regulations consists in the following: (i) according to Law No. 99/2010, may be adopted the individual who has not reached the age of 18 years old and, exceptionally, the individual who has acquired full exercise capacity until 18 years of age, (ii) according to Law No. 99/2010, a minimum cohabitation period of 3 years until the application for adoption is regulated, in case of adoption of the individual who has acquired full exercise capacity until the age of 18 years.

The first difference stipulated by article 10 of Law No. 99/2010 consists in the fact that only the child until the age of 18 years old can be adopted and, in case the individual acquires full exercise capacity until the age of 18 years old, the adopter must be the individual or the family who has raised him or her, if the latter has cohabited for no less than 3 years until the application for adoption.

The second difference between the two legislations is that, according to the Romanian law, it is not mandatory a minimum duration for the adopted with full exercise capacity to be raised during minority by the adopter, unlike the Moldovian legislation which stipulates the mandatory minimum cohabitation period of 3 years of the adopted with the adopter individual or the family who has raised him or her, until the application for adoption.

Article 463 paragraph (1) letter b) of Civil Code and article 15 paragraph (2) of Law No. 273/2004 require the consent to adoption of the adopted individual who is 10 years old. Thus, it is mandatory also the consent of the adopted with full exercise capacity. Prior to the consent, the general direction of social assistance and child protection, in whose territorial jurisdiction the child who is 10 years old resides, shall inform and shall advise the latter, especially with respect to the consequences of the adoption and its consent thereof, and shall conclude a report in this regard[7]. The consent to adoption of the child who has reached the age of 10 years old shall be given in front of the custody court, when approving the adoption[8].

The consent to adoption must cumulatively meet the following conditions:

a) to be freely expressed, not affected by any vice of consent. According to article 479 paragraph (1) of Civil Code, the vices of consent in the matter of adoption are the following: (i) the error on the adopter's identity, (ii) the misrepresentation or (iii) the violence.
b) the consent must be unconditional, a consent given in view of the promise or the actual gain of benefits, irrespective of their nature is not considered valid[9].
c) the consent must be expressed only after the child who is 10 years old has been duly informed and advised, taking into account his or her age and maturity, especially on the consequences of the adoption and his or her consent thereof.

Article 23 paragraph 1 letter c) of Law No. 99/2010 stipulates the expressing of consent to adoption of the adopted who is 10 years old.

The individuals whose consent to adoption is required shall be duly informed of the consequences of their consent and, in particular, of the termination, following the adoption, of the family ties between the child and his or her biological family[10]. The territorial authorities at the place of residence of the adopted individual are obliged to provide counseling and information to him or her prior to expressing the consent to the adoption and to conclude a report in this respect[11].

The consent of the adopted is expressed in writing, freely and unconditionally, authenticated according to the provisions of the legislation or confirmed by the territorial authority of their domicile[12]. Consent of the adopted through corruption, deceit, fraud, money, other goods, or any kind of promise before or after obtaining the consent is not valid[13].

The competent court may request confirmation of the consent when examining the case in front of the court, ensuring the confidentiality of information about the adopters and the biological parents[14].

The territorial authority shall require the consent of the child, taking into account the age and the degree of maturity, as well as his or her views, desires and feelings in the adoption process[15].

In the process of matching the adopter, the child who is 10 years old, at the request of the territorial authority at his/her domicile, must express his written consent[16].

The child must receive counseling from the territorial authority on the consequences of adoption, future adopters, as well as appropriate information on all aspects of adoption[17].

In order to approve the adoption, the consent of the child who is 10 years old must be expressed in front of the court, when the child has the right to decide on

[7] Article 15 paragraph (3) of Law No. 273/2004.
[8] Article 15 paragraph (1) of Law No. 273/2004.
[9] Article 463 paragraph (2) of Civil Code.
[10] Article 23 paragraph (2) of Law No. 99/2010.
[11] Article 23 paragraph (3) of Law No. 99/2010.
[12] Article 23 paragraph (4) of Law No. 99/2010.
[13] Article 23 paragraph (5) of Law No. 99/2010.
[14] Article 23 paragraph (6) of Law No. 99/2010.
[15] Article 26 paragraph (1) of Law No. 99/2010.
[16] Article 26 paragraph (2) of Law No. 99/2010.
[17] Article 26 paragraph (3) of Law No. 99/2010.

the adoption, to confirm or to withdraw the consent to adoption[18].

With respect to the consent of the child who is 10 years old, both legislations stipulate the obligation to express it, along with the obligation of the competent authorities to advise the child on the consequences of adoption and his or her consent to adoption, as well as the need to express the consent before the court, in the adoption phase.

Also, in order to approve the adoption, both legislations provide the need for biological parents' consent. Thus, article 463 paragraph (1) letter a) of Civil Code requires the consent of the natural parents or, as the case may be, of the child's guardian whose natural parents are deceased, unknown, declared dead, missing or prohibited. Article 23 paragraph (1) letter a) of Law No. 99/2010 stipulates the need of the biological parents' consent or, as the case may be, of the guardian or curator of a child whose parents are deceased, unknown, declared missing or decease, subject to judicial protection in the form of custody under the law.

Although custody is also established in case the parents are deprived of their parental rights[19], in this case the consent to adoption shall be given by both the guardian and the natural parents, based on article 464 paragraph (2) of Civil Code, according to which the parent or parents who has/have been deprived of the parental rights or who has/have been subject to the interdiction of parental rights shall keep their right to consent to the child's adoption, the consent of the child's legal representative being also mandatory. In order to validly conclude the adoption, the consent of both natural parents is mandatory, even if they are separated in fact or divorced and the custody court has decided that the parental authority be exercised only by one of the parents. Consent to adoption can not be expressed in the place of the natural parents or the guardian by the curator, trustee or other individual empowered to do so.

Unlike the Romanian legislation, article 24 paragraph (3) letters b) and c) of Law No. 99/2010 stipulates that the consent of biological parents is not required if they are deprived of their parental rights or in case they are subject to judicial protection in the form of custody.

Another difference between the two legislations resides in the manner in which the minor parent expresses the consent. Thus, according to the Romanian legislation[20], the minor parent who is 14 years old shall express his or her consent, assisted by his legal guardian. According to the Moldovian legislation[21], minor parents shall express their consent to the child adoption through their legal representatives, until the age of 16 years old, and individually, after this age.

As regards the revocation of consent and the refusal of natural parents or of the guardian to consent to the adoption, both legislations provide for solutions to be adopted in such situations. Thus, according to article 466 of Civil Code, the consent to adoption of the natural parents or, as the case may be, of the guardian may only be expressed after a period of 60 days as of the child's birth and may be revoked within 30 days of the date of its expression. According to article 24 paragraphs (6) and (7) of Law No. 99/2010, the consent of the biological parents can not be expressed until the child's birth, but only after 45 days after his or her birth, and they can revoke their consent until the court decision on the adoption is pronounced.

In the case of the natural parents' refusal to consent to adoption, article 467 of Civil Code provides that, by way of exception, the custody court may disregard the refusal of the natural parents or, as the case may be, the guardian to consent to adoption if proven by any means of proof that it is abusive and the court considers that the adoption is in the superior interest of the child, taking into account his/her opinion, given according to the legal provisions, with the express reasoning of the decision in this respect.

A similar provision is also regulated by article 24 paragraph (9) of Law No. 99/2010, respectively the exceptional situation in which the court may disregard the refusal of the biological parents or, as the case may be, the guardian's or the curator's consent to the adoption of the child if proven, by any means of proof, that they abusively refuse to give their consent to adoption, and the court considers that the adoption is in the best interest of the child, expressly reasoning it in the court decision.

As stated within the case law[22], the mere assertion that the consent to adoption is abusive is not sufficient,

[18] Article 26 paragraph (4)-(5) of Law No. 99/2010.

[19] Article 110 of Civil Code.

[20] Article 12 of Law No. 273/2004.

[21] Article 24 paragraph (2) of Law No. 99/2010.

[22] Piteşti Court of Appeal, Civil Division I, Decision No. 764/2013, in the Legal Week No. 40/2013, p.11-12. The court held that the court of first instance made a correct assessment of the evidence administered and legally held that it was not necessary to admit the applicant's application for adoption because the conditions laid down by the Law No. 273/2004, respectively, lacking the father's consent, an essential condition stipulated by the law. The child's biological father claimed that he rarely visited the child because of reasons determined by the child's mother's family, who is reluctant to allow him to have contact with the minor. The circumstances shown by the applicant, namely that the natural father of the child manifests disinterest in this, does not contribute to its growth and maintenance, does not visit it, but which is not supported by clear and conclusive evidence, is not such as to determine the refusal the defendant to consent to adoption as an abuse in the sense of the law. The court held that the father's negligence towards the child was presumed. This negligence is not complemented by a real lack of affection and affiliation from father to child. No deeds or acts committed by the father have been proven to lead to the alienation of the child.

To consider, in view of the peculiarities of the case, that the refuse of the father to the adoption of her daughter constitutes an abuse, it would mean giving rise to conflicts between the mother's family and the natural father of the child, between them and the adopter, between the child and the father. Although the child said that she wanted to be adopted by the plaintiff, the current husband of the mother, when listening to the in the absence of clear evidence of the contrary nature of the refusal to the child's interest; the court can not approve the adoption in this case because the condition of the natural parent's consent is not fulfilled.

Also, it was decided[23] that the possibility of the court to supplement the consent to adoption of the mother must be analyzed by reference to the exact circumstances of the case, the mother's behavior towards the child who she abandoned and who she has never visited again, as well as the repeated absence before the administrative bodies or the court being considered abusive refusal to adoption consent.

It may also be considered as an abusive refusal to adoption consent the situation when the natural parents or, as the case may be, the guardian, although legally cited, did not repeatedly appear before the court at the hearings set for the expressing of the consent[24].

According to another decision[25], the situation in which a parent can not be found given that his/her domicile is unknown may be considered as an abusive consent.

With respect to the conditions of the natural parents' consent or, as the case may be, of the guardian, the natural parents of the child or, as the case may be, the guardian must consent to the adoption freely, unconditionally and only after being properly informed of the consequences of adoption, especially on the termination of the child's relations with his or her family of origin[26].

The consent to adoption must cumulatively meet the following conditions:

a) it must be freely expressed, not affected by any vice of consent, meaning: (i) error with respect to the identity of the adopted individual, (ii) misrepresentation, or (iii) violence;
b) it must be unconditional, a consent given in view of the promise or actual gain of benefits, regardless of their nature, not being valid;
c) it must be expressed only after the natural parents or guardians have been properly informed of the consequences of the adoption, especially the termination of the child's family ties with his or her family of origin. The general direction for social assistance and child protection in whose territorial jurisdiction the natural parents or, as the case may be, the guardian reside is obliged to ensure their counseling and information before expressing the consent to adoption and to draw up a report in this respect.
d) to be given by the natural parents or, as the case may be, by the guardian, only after a period of 60 days after the child's birth. The given consent may be revoked within 30 days as of the date of its expression;
e) to be given by the natural parents or, as the case may be, by the guardian in front of the court when deciding over the start of the adoption procedure. Along with the request for consent, the court shall ask the general direction for social assistance and child protection the counseling and information report, confirming the fulfillment of the counseling and information obligation[27].

The Moldovian legislation also provides for the obligation to properly inform the biological parents or, as the case may be, the guardian or curator of the child whose parents are deceased, not known, declared missing or deceased, are subject to judicial protection in the form of custody the conditions of the law, whose consent to adoption is requested, on the consequences of their consent, in particular on the termination of the family relations between the child and his/her biological family as a result of adoption[28].

Also, as shown for the condition of the adopted's consent, the territorial authorities from the domicile of the biological parents or, as the case may be, of the guardian or the curator of the child are obliged to provide counseling and information to them prior to the consent to the adoption and to draw up a report in this regard[29].

Moreover, the consent of the biological parents or, as the case may be, of the guardian or curator of the child must be expressed in writing, freely and unconditionally, authenticated according to the legislation or confirmed by the territorial authority of their domicile[30]. The consent of the biological parents or, as the case may be, of the guardian or curator of the child obtained through corruption, deceit, fraud, money, other goods or for any kind of promise before or after obtaining the consent shall not be valid[31].

2.2. The individuals who can adopt

The general rule is that any individual can adopt irrespective of civil status, gender, race, nationality, religion etc. However, the above-mentioned elements child in the council room, there were indications that this manifestation of will be impressed by the influence exercised by her mother and husband, of the conflicting attitude maintained about the child's natural father, the desire of the child to be in agreement with his mother. It was found that the child artificially imposed a distance from her father. The defendant sought his child, but in the last few years he did not do so because of preventing the former wife from making contact with the child. The child's mother denies these claims of the father of the child, but at the declarative level.

[23] Bucharest Court of Appeal, 3rd Civil Division, decision No. 857/2013, in Legal Week No. 9/2014, p.23.

[24] Article 8 paragraph 2 of Law No. 273/2004.

[25] Bucharest Court of Appeal, Civil division, decision No. 207A/2013, apud. B.D. Moloman, Consent – an important actor in the adoption procedure, in Romanian Review of privat law No. 3/2018, p.250.

[26] Article 465 Civile Code and article 9 of Law No. 273/2004.

[27] Article 14 paragraph (3) of Law No. 273/2004.

[28] Article 23 paragraph (2) of Law No. 99/2010.

[29] Article 23 paragraph (3) of Law No. 99/2010.

[30] Article 23 paragraph (4) of Law No. 99/2010.

[31] Article 23 paragraph (5) of Law No. 99/2010.

shall be duly analyzed when approving an adoption. Also, according to article 452 letter c) of Civil Code the ethnic, linguistic, religious and cultural origins will be taken into account in view of the continuity principle of the child's growth and education.

2.2.1. The age of the adopter

With respect to the minimum age, as per article 459 of Civil Code, the individuals who do not have full exercise capacity can not adopt. From the corroboration of these provisions with those of article 40 of Civil Code, according to which the court may give full exercise capacity to an individual who is 16 years old, for justified reasons, thus it can be concluded that the minimum age of the adopter may be 16 years old, when acquired a full anticipated exercise capacity. The Civil Code does not explicitly stipulate the maximum age of the adopter.

However, according to article 460 paragraph (1) of Civil Code, the adopter must be at least 18 years older than the adopter. According to paragraph (2) of the same article, "for good reasons, the custody court may approve adoption even if the difference in age between the adopted and the adopter is less than 18 years, but not less than 16 years". As decided by the Supreme court[32], the adoption can be refused in exceptional and undeniably proven circumstances, where the advanced age of the adopter is an unavoidable obstacle to the fulfillment of the purpose of adoption, namely the satisfaction of the adopted individual's interests.

The Moldovian legislation provides for a minimum age for the adopter, but also a maximum age difference between the adopted and the adopter[33]. Thus, according to article 12 paragraph (1) of Law No. 99/2010, the adoption is only allowed for individuals who have full exercise capacity, 25 years of age, and are at least 18 years older than the one they wish to adopt, but not by more than 48 years old. With respect to the condition of the minimum age of 25 years old, the law provides a derogation, in the sense that it is sufficient that only one of the spouses to be 25 years old.

Regarding the age difference between the adopted and the adopter, the Moldovian legislation also provides that the court can approve adoption even if the age difference between the child and the adopter is less than 18 years old, but in no case less than 16 years old[34].

2.2.2. The exercise capacity

From the provisions of article 459 of Civil Code, according to which people who do not have full exercise capacity can not adopt, it follows that the adopter must have full exercise capacity.

The same condition of full exercise capacity is expressly stated by the provisions of article 12 paragraph (1) of Law No. 99/2010.

2.2.3. The vocation to adopt

In accordance with the principle of the best interests of the child, article 461 paragraph (1) of Civil Code and article 13 paragraph (1) of Law No. 273/2004 on the adoption procedure, republished, stipulate that the adopter or adoptive family must fulfill all moral guarantees and material conditions necessary for the child's harmonious growth, education and development[35].

We consider, together with other authors[36], that the fulfillment of the moral guarantees and material conditions is not mandatory in case of adoption of the individual with full exercise capacity, given the express mention on the final thesis of article 461 paragraph (1) of Civil Code, with respect to the child, meaning the individual is not 18 years old or who has not acquired full anticipated exercise capacity, as well as the provisions of article 484 of Civil Code, according to which "the parental authority is exercised until the child acquires full exercise capacity".

The fulfillment of all guarantees and material conditions, as well as the existence of the parental skills shall be assessed by the general direction of social assistance and child protection by issuing a certificate attesting that the individual or family is able to adopt[37], which shall be attached to the decision of the general / executive director of the direction, when carrying out the evaluation according to Law No. 273/2004[38].

Nonetheless, according to article 26 of Law No. 273/2004 the certificate shall not be necessary in the following cases: a) for the adoption of the individual who has acquired full exercise capacity; b) for the adoption of the child by the husband of the natural or adoptive parent.

The capacity to adopt is also provided under the Moldovian legislation. According to article 16 of Law No. 99/2010, the territorial authority at the domicile of the adopter shall assess should the moral guarantees and material conditions of the adopter comply with the child's development needs, in accordance with a

---

[32] Supreme Court of Justice, Civil Division, Decision No. 578/1992, in Dreptul No. 2/1993, p.68.

[33] See B.D. Moloman, L.-C. Ureche, Law No. 273/2004 on the adoption procedure. Commentaries on articles, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016, p.65-66.

[34] Article 12 paragraph (2) of Law No. 99/2010.

[35] See Supreme Tribunal, Civil Division, decision No. 2144/1985, in R.R.D. No. 9/1986, p.65. In this case, the 84-year-old adopter, who died 2 months after the adoption, could not provide the moral conditions of the 6-year-old minor, the only purpose of adoption being to create a succession vocation. Moreover, the adopter, beneficiary of a benefit of 300 lei per month needed assistance himself in ensuring living conditions, so that the court's decision to reject the action on the nullity of adoption is untenable and unlawful.

[36] E. Florian, op. cit., p.476.

[37] See Order No. 552/2012 regarding the approval of the framework model of the certificate of a individual or family able to adopt, as well as the model and content of some forms, instruments and documents used in the adoption procedure (published in Official Gazette of Romania No. 245 of April 11, 2012).

[38] Article 461 paragraph (2) Civil Code along with article 13 paragraph (2) of Law No. 273/2004.

regulation approved by the central authority, and shall conclude an evaluation report.

Based on the results of this assessment, the territorial authority shall decide the issuance or the refusal to issue the certificate. In case of issuance, the territorial authority shall decide the registration of the adopter[39]. The territorial authority that issued the decision shall provide, within 10 days, to the central authority a copy of the decision and of the certificate in order to include all necessary information in the State Register of Adoptions[40].

Also, as within the Romanian legislation, according to article 18 paragraph (3) of Law No. 99/2010, as an exception, the registration of the adopter is not a condition of adoption in the case of the following: a) the adoption of the child by the husband or wife of the biological parent or adoptive parent of the child; b) the adoption of the child who has acquired full exercise capacity until the age of 18 years old.

2.2.4. The consent of the adopter or, as the case may be, of the adoptive family

Article 463 paragraph (1) letters c) and d) of Civil Code requires the consent of the adopter or, as the case may be, of the spouses of the adoptive family when they adopt together, as well as the spouse of the adopter, unless the lack of discernment makes it impossible for him to manifest his or her will.

As in the case of the consent of the adopted, as well as of the natural parents or guardian, the consent must be freely expressed, not affected by the vices of consent, and unconditional, the consent given in view of the promise or the actual gain of benefits, regardless of their nature, not considered as being valid. The consent of the adopter or adoptive family shall be given to the custody court when deciding on the adoption application[41]. The consent of the adopting husband is necessary even if, at the date of the adoption, the spouses are separated in fact and without distinction as to whether a child or an individual with full exercise capacity is adopted.

However, the consent of the adopting husband is not necessary in case of impaired judgment but also in the following cases: the husband is considered a mentally incompetent individual, is missing etc. As with the adopter or adoptive family, the consent of the adopter's spouse is given to the custody court when deciding on the adoption application. When the adopter is the adoptive parent's husband, the latter will consent to the adoption as a parent, by the effect of the previous adoption.

According to article 25 of Law No. 99/2010, the adopter shall give the consent to the adoption of the child proposed by the territorial authority from the domicile of the latter and shall confirm that he or she was informed on the child's health. At the adoption by spouses, it is mandatory the consent of both spouses.

The adoption by both spouses shall be permitted only in case their marriage has been lasting for at least 3 years prior to the application for adoption[42].

2.3. The interdictions

2.3.1. Multiple adoptions - brothers and sisters

According to article 456 of Civil Code, the brothers, irrespective of their sex, may be adopted by different people or families only if this is in their best interests. The general rule is that the brothers must be adopted together by the same individual or adoptive family, except for the case when their separate adoption is consistent with their superior interest.

The same provision is governed unde the Moldovian legislation. Thus, according to article 10 paragraph (3) of Law No. 99/2010, the separation of siblings through adoption and their adoption by different individuals or families is forbidden, except for the case when this requirement is contrary to the best interests of the child.

2.3.2. The adoption between brothers

The adoption between brothers is forbidden, irrespective of their sex[43], them being from marriage or from outside marriage, good brothers[44], consanguineous[45] or uterine[46].

The Moldovian legislation also stipulates that the adoption between brothers is forbidden[47].

2.3.3. Adoption of two spouses or ex-spouses by the same adoptive parent or adoptive family as well as adoption between spouses or former spouses [48]

Adoption of two spouses or ex-spouses by the same adoptive parent or adoptive family, as well as adoption between spouses or ex-spouses is forbidden. Incompatibility arises from the fact that, by adoption, husbands or ex-husbands would become brothers, and the quality of brother is incompatible with the one of husband. Also, it is incompatible the quality of a husband with the parent-child relationships.

This prohibition is not regulated under Law No. 99/2010.

2.3.4. Adoption by the individual with no full exercise capacity[49]

As mentioned, according to article 38 of Civil Code, the full exercise capacity begins when the

[39] Article 17 paragraph (2) of Law No. 99/2010.
[40] Article 18 paragraph (1) of Law No. 99/2010.
[41] Article 16 of Law No. 273/2004.
[42] Article 12 paragraph (6) of Law No. 99/2010.
[43] Article 457 of Civil Code.
[44] Having the same mother and father.
[45] Only after the father.
[46] Only after the mother.
[47] Article 11 paragraph (1) of Law No. 99/2010.
[48] Article 458 of Civil Code.
[49] Article 459 first thesis of Civil Code.

individual becomes an adult, at the age of 18 years old. It is also necessary to consider the case of the minor who acquires full capacity by marriage, as well as the minor who acquires full anticipated capacity under the conditions stipulated by article 40 of Civil Code.

This prohibition is also regulated under the Moldovian legislation, according to article 12 paragraph (1) of Law No. 99/2010 which stipulates the condition of the full exercise capacity of the adopter.

2.3.5. Adoption by the individual with a mental illness or mental disability [50]

This prohibition concerns the mentally ill individual, whether he or she is under a court order or not. Similarly, the interidction also applies to an individual with a mental disability regardless of whether he or she has been assigned to a category of disabled individuals requiring special protection or not.

A similar prohibition is also regulated by Law No. 99/2010, which, as per article 12 paragraph (4) letter b) prohibits the adoption of individuals whose state of health does not allow the proper fulfillment of obligations and responsibilities regarding the raising and education of children.

2.3.6. Simultaneous or successive adoption of the same individual by several adopters

According to article 462 paragraph (1) of Civil Code, two individuals can not adopt together, neither simultaneously, nor successively. This prohibition considers the purpose of the adoption, otherwise the adopted would have more parents at the same time. The exceptions to this rule are the following: a) simultaneous or successive adoption by adopters who are husband and wife[51]; b) the adopter or adoptive spouses has/have died; in this case, the previous adoption is considered to be terminated on the date of the final decision on the new adoption[52]; c) the previous adoption has ended because of any other reason[53]; d) the adopted child has only one parent, unmarried, and he or she is in a stable relationship and is living with an individual of the opposite sex[54], not married, who is not a relative to the fourth degree and declares, by authentic notarial act, that the new adopter has been directly involved in raising and caring of the child for an uninterrupted period of at least 5 years[55].

A similar provision is included within the Moldovian legislation. Thus, according to article 11 paragraph (2) of Law No. 99/2010, the adoption of a child by several adopters is prohibited, unless it is done by both spouses at the same time.

However, a new adoption may be granted if:

a) the adopter or adoptive spouses has or have died, the previous adoption being considered to be terminated on the date of the final decision with respect to the new adoption;
b) the previous adoption ceased as a result of it being declared as void.

2.3.7. The adoption by same sex individuals

Article 462 paragraph (3) of Civil Code expressly states that "two individuals of the same sex can not adopt together".

Law No. 99/2010 does not expressly regulate this prohibition, but it is implicitly derived from the legal provisions on the legal status of adoption.

3. Conclusions

In conclusion, the Moldavian legislation is almost similar to the Romanian legal provisions with some differences.

The first difference stipulated by article 10 of Law No. 99/2010 consists in the fact that only the child until the age of 18 years old can be adopted and, in case the individual acquires full exercise capacity until the age of 18 years old, the adopter must be the individual or the family who has raised him or her, if the latter has cohabited for no less than 3 years until the application for adoption.

The second difference between the two legislations is that, according to the Romanian law, it is not mandatory a minimum duration for the adopted with full exercise capacity to be raised during minority by the adopter, unlike the Moldovian legislation which stipulates the mandatory minimum cohabitation period of 3 years of the adopted with the adopter individual or the family who has raised him or her, until the application for adoption.

Unlike the Romanian legislation, article 24 paragraph (3) letters b) and c) of Law No. 99/2010 stipulates that the consent of biological parents is not required if they are deprived of their parental rights or in case they are subject to judicial protection in the form of custody.

Another difference between the two legislations resides in the manner in which the minor parent expresses the consent. Thus, according to the Romanian legislation, the minor parent who is 14 years old shall express his or her consent, assisted by his legal guardian. According to the Moldovian legislation, minor parents shall express their consent to the child adoption through their legal representatives, until the age of 16 years old, and individually, after this age.

[50] Article 459 second thesis of Civil Code.
[51] Article 462 paragraph (1) final thesis of Civil Code.
[52] Article 462 paragraph (2) letter a) of Civil Code and article 6 paragraph (2) letter a) of Law No. 273/2004.
[53] Article 462 paragraph (2) letter b) Civil Code and article 6 paragraph (2) letter b) of Law No. 273/2004.
[54] According to article 6 paragraph (5) of the same law, "The condition regarding the existence of a stable relationship and cohabitation shall be verified by the court in charge of the examination of the application for the adoption approval and can be proved by any means of proof."
[55] Article 6 paragraph (2) letter c) of the same law. In this case, the legal provisions relating to the adoption of the child by the natural or adoptive parent's spouse, as well as those relating to the name, domicile, rights and obligations between parents and children, the exercise of parental authority, succession rights, identity papers applicable to the child born out of marriage with established affiliation to both parents is properly enforced.

As regards the revocation of consent and the refusal of natural parents or of the guardian to consent to the adoption, both legislations provide for solutions to be adopted in such situations. Thus, according to article 466 of Civil Code, the consent to adoption of the natural parents or, as the case may be, of the guardian may only be expressed after a period of 60 days as of the child's birth and may be revoked within 30 days of the date of its expression. According to article 24 paragraphs (6) and (7) of Law No. 99/2010, the consent of the biological parents can not be expressed until the child's birth, but only after 45 days after his or her birth, and they can revoke their consent until the court decision on the adoption is pronounced.

In relation to the adopter's minimum age, the Moldovian legislation provides for a minimum age for the adopter, but also a maximum age difference between the adopted and the adopter. Thus, according to article 12 paragraph (1) of Law No. 99/2010, the adoption is only allowed for individuals who have full exercise capacity, 25 years old, and are at least 18 years older than the one they wish to adopt, but not by more than 48 years old. With respect to the condition of the minimum age of 25 years old, the law provides a derogation, in the sense that it is sufficient that only one of the spouses to be 25 years old.

Regarding the age difference between the adopted and the adopter, the Moldovian legislation also provides that the court can approve adoption even if the age difference between the child and the adopter is less than 18 years old, but in no case less than 16 years old.

Referring to interdictions, the differences between the two legislations reside in the fact that the Moldavian legislation does not provide the interdicition of the adoption of two spouses or ex-spouses by the same adoptive parent or adoptive family as well as adoption between spouses or former spouses and also the interdition of the adoption by same sex individuals. Notwithstanding, even if Law No. 99/2010 does not expressly provide the interdition of the adoption by same sex individuals, it results from the entire legal regime of adoption.

References

- Emese Florian, Family law. Marriage. Matrimonial regimes. Filiation, Fifth Edition, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2016);
- Dan Lupaşcu and Cristiana Mihaela Crăciunescu, Family Law, Third Edition, (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2017);
- Cristian Mareş, Family Law, Second Edition, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2015);
- Bogdan Dumitru Moloman and Lazăr-Ciprian Ureche, Law No. 273/2004 on the adoption procedure. Commentaries on articles (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2016);
- Bogdan Dumitru Moloman and Lazăr-Ciprian Ureche, The new Civil Code. 2nd Book. About family. Articles 258-534. Commentaries, explanations and jurisprudence, (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2016).

THE JUDGMENT IN LIEU OF THE CONTRACT - INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLES 1279 AND 1669 OF THE CIVIL CODE RELATING TO THE PROMISE OF SALE

Emilian-Constantin MEIU[*]

Abstract

The matter of enforcement in the promise of sale poses practical problems arising from the interpretation of the articles 1279 and 1669 of the Civil Code and that we intend to analyze in this study. Among the issues to analyze we can mention: the role of the court and the legal requirements for a judgment in lieu of contract as follows: execution of their duties by the party calls for a judgment in lieu of the contract; the unjustified refusal of the promissor-seller to conclude the contract of sale within the set deadline; establishing the fulfillment of the terms of sale at the time of the judgment; the quality of the promise-seller of the owner of the good; the filing of the fiscal certificate issued by the specialized department of the local public administration authority resulting in the lack of debts of the promised property owner; proof of up-to-date flows of contribution allowances to the owners expenses. We will now consider the prescription of the right to request a decision in lieu of contract under article 1669 para. (3) Civ. Code, as well as the importance of the inalienability clause in the conventions which give rise to the obligation to pass on the property in the future to a determined or determinable person, as provided by article 627 par. (4) Civ. Code.

Keywords: promise, promissory agreement, judgment in lieu of a contract, prescription, inalienability.

Introduction

The Civil Code regulates in art. 1669 and art. 1670 promise to sell, in certain respects, such as the ability of the rightful party to request, in the event of unjustified refusal of the other party to conclude the contract of sale, the delivery of a judgment which takes the place of the contract, the limitation of the right of action, the nature of the sums of money paid on the basis of a sales promise.

The unilateral sales promise is a contract whereby a party, called the promisory-seller, undertakes to sell in the future a certain good to the other party, called the promissory-buyer, if the latter promises to buy it. The promissory-seller does not sell the good, but only undertakes to sell it in the future or to conclude the sales contract if the promissory-buyer chooses to buy it.

The existence of an option for the promissory-buyer is one that characterizes the unilateral promise and distinguishes it from the sinalagmatic promise. In order to exercise the right of option, the parties agree that the beneficiary has a certain amount of time to reflect and make informed decisions. In the case of the bilateral sale promise, both parties, both the promissory-seller and the promissory-buyer, firmly and mutually commit themselves to conclude in the future the sales contract, whose essential elements (at least the object and price) are already established the promise ended.

The bilateral sales promise is a preparatory contract for the conclusion of the definitive sales contract between the same parties. Given that the sales promise is not a sale, the consent given at the end of the sale promise differs from the consent given at the conclusion of the sales contract, the latter being expressed in order to fulfill the obligation to undertake by promise.

1. The judicial stamp duty

In the matter of the judicial stamp duty, for the application for a decision to take place the contract shall apply art. 3 par. (1), par. (2) lit. c) and art. 31 from G.E.O. no. 80/2013 on stamp duty. The interpretation of these legal provisions leads to the conclusion that the application for a decision in lieu of sale contract is one that can be evaluated in money, the determination of the amount of the judicial stamp duty being made by reference to the value limits established by art. 3 par. (1) of the mentioned normative act. According to art. 31 par. (2) from G.E.O. no. 80/2013 the value taken into account for stamp duty is the one indicated in the application (which may or may not coincide with that indicated in the sales promise). The same law stipulates that if the value is disputed or appreciated by the court as obviously ridiculously low, the assessment is made under the terms of par. (3) of art. 98 Civ. Proc. Code.

Over the value to be taken into account when stamp duty is set, several approaches are encountered in court practice. A first solution is to establish the stamp duty considering the value of the price set by the parties in the promissory-sale, in the context in which the applicant does not specify in the application its value for the stamp duty. This method of setting the stamp duty is the easiest and includes a high degree of celerity, because the setting of the stamp duty will no longer be postponed in order to inform the applicant of the obligation to specify the value of the object of the application in order to establish the stamp duty.

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: meiuemilian@yahoo.com).

The use of the price of the promissory-sale as a reference also takes into account the fact that the price set by the parties for sale usually reflects the market value of the good, even if it is possible to imagine situations in which the parties have set a price lower than the real value of the good. This approach is to be criticized for failing to comply formally with art. 31 par. (2) from G.E.O. no. 80/2013 which state that the value at which the judicial stamp duty is calculated is the one provided in the application.

A second practice of the courts is to notify the applicant of the obligation to provide proof of the taxable value for immovable property and to set the judicial stamp duty on that amount. It takes into account the real estate demand, capitalizing on it by reference to an objective value, the taxable one, which usually reflects the value of the movement of the asset.

A third variation of stamp duty, which is less common in practice, is to report the value of the movement of the asset to be transmitted if the request is made by the promissory-buyer, or the agreed price if the request is made by the promissory-seller. This method has as a criterion the value with which the applicant's patrimony is to be increased, which consist either of the good which is the object of the sales promise for the buyer or the selling price for the seller.

Although all three solutions present convincing arguments, the closest to the letter and spirit of the rules governing this matter is the establishment of the stamp duty at the market value of the good, which can be assimilated to the taxable value, or the value of the notarial scales. It is true that according to art. 31 par. (2) from G.E.O. no. 80/2013 value must be the one in action, but this value can not be left to subjective appreciation, but must be based on objective criteria .

The value of the movement of the property is related to the time of the filing of the petition. If the amount indicated by the claimant is contested, the amount shall be determined by the documents submitted and the explanations given by the parties, according to art. 98 par. (3) C. Proc. in which the data on the taxable value of the property or, as the case may be, the market studies carried out by the public notary's chambers, commonly known as "grids of notaries public" in accordance with the provisions of art. 104 par. (4) the final thesis of Law no. 227/2015 on the Fiscal Code.

2. The competent court

From the perspective of material competence, the value criterion is applied, competence being determined according to art. 94 pt.1 lit. k) and art. 95 pt. 1 Civ. Proc. Code.

From the perspective of territorial competence, the provisions of art. 107, art. 113 par. (1) point 3 Civ. Proc. Code, if expressly stipulated the place of performance of the obligation to conclude the contract.

From this perspective, the application for a contract decision is a personal action, even if the contract that is required to be finalized is a translational contract of ownership or other real rights, this being merely an expression of its real estate character.

In this respect, the High Court of Cassation and Justice, through the Decision no. 8/10.06.2013 , pronounced in an appeal in the interest of the law, stated that "the application requiring a court decision to take the place of an authentic sale and purchase agreement of a building has the character of a personal real estate action", since "the civil action requesting the delivery of a court order to take the place of a sale and purchase agreement, in the matter of the obligations to make arising from the pre-contract is personal inasmuch as the applicant makes use of a right of claim, namely the right to require the conclusion of the contract, correlated with the defendant's obligation to take the necessary steps with a view to concluding the contract. (...) Territorial jurisdiction is alternative, between the court of the defendant's domicile and the court of the place of performance of the obligation only if the legal act concluded by the parties provided for the place of enforcement, or even in part, of the obligation. "

The foregoing considerations regarding the judicial stamp duty relating to the determination of the value of the object of the application relevant to the determination apply mutatis mutandis to the determination of material jurisdiction.

3. The conditions required by the law for the delivery of a judgment in lieu of contract and the evidence administered to prove them

The valid conclusion of the bilateral sale promise obliges the parties to conclude the sales contract. The same obligation have the parties in the case of the unilateral sale promise, once the beneficiary has opted for the purchase of the good.

According to art. 1669 par. (1) Civ. Code "when one of the parties having concluded a bilateral sale promise unjustifiably refuses to conclude the promised contract, the other party may request that a judgment be held to the place of the contract if all other conditions of validity are met ".

The provisions also apply to the unilateral sale promise, according to art. 1669 par. (3) Civ. Code. Therefore, the question which may arise is that of the conditions required for the court to be able to pronounce such a court decision. Of course, the court will have to analyze these conditions in concrete terms, depending on the circumstances of each case.

3.1. The conclusion of a valid pre-contract and the fulfillment of the conditions of sale at the date of the awarding of the contract

The condition results implicitly from the text of art. 1669 par. (1) Civ. Code, which claims that "all other conditions of validity are to be fulfilled" and which clearly refers to the promise to sell agreement. This is because, in order to be able to pronounce the decision in lieu of contract, the promise of sale must fulfill its own conditions of validity, necessary for any convention. For example, there is a requirement for a valid consent to be expressed under the ordinary law (article 1204 Civ. Code). At the time of the promise, the parties must have the ability to sell and buy, for otherwise the agreement on the sold asset and the price would not be valid.

Also, the object of the promise of sale, consisting in the conclusion of the sale contract in the future, must be determined and lawful and it must be stipulated the good to be sold and the price, and the cause must be licit and moral.

In relation to the provisions of art. 1.279 par. (1) Civ. Code, the court will verify the existence of the essential elements of the sale, which must be included in the pre-contract, when the decision is based on a sales act, otherwise it is considered to be a simple convention concluded for the continuation of the negotiations - art. 1.279 par. (4) Civ. Code.

It should be noted that the object, i.e. the good promised, must be in the civil circuit at the date of the judgment. The decision in lieu of a sale contract is governed by the law in force at the time of its pronouncement as an application of the principle tempus regit actum, a solution legally required by art. 6 par. (5) Civ. Code. This reasoning is followed by the Constitutional Court in the decision no. 755/2014 of the Constitutional Court .

Also, the property must belong to the promissory-seller at the time the property transfer operates. The requirement that the promissory-seller also be the owner of the good at the time of the judgment can no longer be the object of the controversy, the non-unitary practice that it triggered being cut by the H.C.C.J throught Decision no. 12/2015 following an appeal in the interest of the law.

At the date of the judgment, all the conditions required by the law to complete the sale must be fulfilled: the promissory-seller shall be the owner of the promised asset to be sold, and the promise-buyer shall not be struck by any special inability to acquire it. The court's pronouncement of a decision to take place is only possible if the property is in the patrimony of the promissor-seller (current owner) and in respect of which there are no inalienability clauses, established in compliance with the legal provisions (art. 627 par. (1) Civ. Code. If the promissory-seller pledged to sell the whole property, although he is not the sole owner of the property, the supreme court has decided that the promise of sale can not be enforced in kind, in the form of a court decision to take place for sale, unless the other co-owners agree.

The doctrine has advanced the view that such a decision could be pronounced even if, after the promissory contract had been concluded, the promissory-seller sold the good that was the object of the promised contract; the contract thus concluded will be a sale of the good of another.

In the light of Decision no. 12/2015 the sale promise can not be enforced in kind, in the form of a court decision to place a sale contract, in the absence of the sole owner of the promise-seller, so even less could be said such a decision when the promissory-seller sold the good and hence no longer owns the property.

Moreover, the considerations of that decision are apparently illustrating the fact that the decision which takes the place of a sale contract is constitutive of rights, which involves the transfer of the property from the date of its final stay. Thus, if the promissory-seller sold the object of the promise, the court could not issue a decision to take the place of the sale contract.

The issuance of a a decision to take the place of the sale contract it is not conditional upon the conclusion of a promise of sale in an authentic form, solution stemming from the Decision no. 23/2017 of the H.C.C.J., pronounced as a result of a complaint about the loosening of legal issues. We continue to reproduce part of the provisions of this decision: "... In interpreting and applying the provisions of art. 1.279 par. (3) first sentence and art. 1.669 par. (1) of the Civil Code, the authentic form is not mandatory upon the conclusion of the promise of sale of immovable property with a view to pronouncing a judgment which would take the place of an authentic act ... ". The promise has to be proven under the conditions of common law. The sale-purchase promise is a bilateral legal act, to be proved according to the rules provided by the law in the field of legal acts. For example, if the value of the object of the legal act is more than 250 lei, the proof is made with a document, under private signature.

3.2. The applicant has fulfilled his promised obligations.

The party entitled to request the court to adjudicate is the one that has fulfilled its obligations or is ready to do so. If the promissory-buyer has obtained a time limit for the payment of the price or part of the price, which would have been made after the court has delivered the ruling, it does not prevent the court from pronouncing the judgment.

As to the meaning of the phrase "at the request of the party who has fulfilled his own obligations", provided by art. 5 par. (2) of the Law no. 247/2005, Title XI (now abrogated, but applicable to the promises of a contract concluded as long as it was in force) and art. 1279 par. (3) Civ. Code, we consider the interpretation to be applicable as referring to the obligations established by the pre-contract and not by the contract to be concluded.

In this regard, we have to conclude that the prior payment of the sale price can not be a condition for the admission of the application. It is sufficient for the court to make mention of the price in the device, the advance paid and the remainder of the price due - even if, in the absence of a counterclaim, it can not oblige the applicant to pay that sum to the defendant - in order to make it possible to register the legal mortgage (Article 2386 (1) of the Civil Code). Given that the legal mortgage is a legal effect of the sale contract concluded without the full payment of the price, we consider that the court must state of its own motion not only the price of the contract, the price already paid and the price still due, but also the existence of the mortgage legal tender for the remaining price, for the benefit of the seller. The explanation for such a solution lies in the fact that the court, by issuing a judgment which takes the place of a contract, has quasi-notary powers, being required to record in the device at least the essential elements of the contract or the seller, the remaining price due and the legal mortgage guarantee payment constitutes such essential elements; the seller could not be deemed to have a counterclaim as he does not "request" anything from the court, the enrollment of the legal mortgage is a natural consequence of accepting the claimant's claim and concluding the contract by the court's judgment.

3.3. Unjustified refusal to sign the promised contract

One party refuses to conclude the sales contract and the refusal is unjustified. This condition is expressly provided for in art. 1669 par. (1) Civ. Code which stipulates that "when one of the parties who have concluded a bilateral sales promise unjustifiably refuses to conclude the promised contract, the other party may demand that a judgment be taken on the basis of a contract ... ". For example, the party did not appear before the public notary on the day and at the time fixed, for signing the contract of sale in authentic form for unjustified reasons.

As far as the proof of this refusal is concerned, we consider that the burden of proof is overturned, so that it does not come to the claimant but to the defendant, according to art. 249 Civ. Proc. Code. Thus, the plaintiff should only prove that, at the end of the term set in the contract for the sale, this did not happen. The defendant should prove either the justified nature of the refusal (proving the existence of one of the justified reasons for non-fulfillment of the contractual obligations provided by art.1555-1557 Civ. Code) or the applicant's fault according to art. 1517.

Thus, although in court practice the applicant is admitted to witness evidence and documents to prove that the defendant was not present at the date fixed for signing the sale contract, in reality the plaintiff's support that the promised contract was not concluded reverses the burden of proof so that the defendant is bound to prove the conclusion of the contract or the reason that prevented it.

3.4. The submission of the land registry excerpt, of the fiscal certificate attesting the payment of all payment obligations due to the local budget and proof of the current debits regarding the contribution rates to the owners' association

According to art. 57 par. (1) from E.G.O. no. 80/2013, in the case of applications for a decision that takes the place of an authentic act of alienation of immovable property, the court will request a land registry excerpt for the immovable properties registered in the land book or a certificate of tasks for the immovable properties who do not have an open land book, tax certificate issued by the specialized department of the local public administration authority and proof of the current debits regarding the contribution rates to the owners' association.

Also, according to art. 159 par. (5) of the Law no. 207/2015 on the Fiscal Procedure Code, "for the alienation of ownership of buildings, land and means of transport, the owners of the assets to be alienated must present tax attestations certifying that all payment obligations due to the local budget of the administrative-territorial unit in whose rayon is registered the taxable asset, according to par. (2). For the asset that is being alienated, the owner of the property must pay the tax due for the year in which the good is sold, except for the fact that the asset to which the tax is transferred is owed to another person than the owner "and, in accordance with par. (6): "The acts by which the buildings, land and means of transport are alienated, in violation of the provisions of para. (5) are null ". Although the legal texts directly concern the voluntary act of alienation, it is obvious that the court can not ignore their existence. The solution that will be applicable in case of non-compliance with the requirements of par. (5) is the rejection of the request for a judgment that takes the place of a contract of sale as unfounded.

The foregoing conclusion also follows from Decision no. 42/2017 pronounced by the H.C.C.J - The Law Enforcement Assembly, stating that in the interpretation and application of the provisions of art. 159 par. (5) of the Law no. 207/2015 on the Fiscal Procedure Code, in the case of an action requesting the determination of the validity of a bilateral exchange promise relating to goods subject to taxation and the delivery of a judgment which takes the place of an authentic act, it is mandatory that the owners of the goods submit a certificate of tax certification and have paid all the payment obligations due to the local budget of the administrative-territorial unit in which the asset is located, irrespective of whether the goods have equal value or different values. In the recitals of that decision, it was noted that in order for the defendant not to paralyze the efficiency of the action by refusing to present the tax attestation certificate, 57 of the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 80/2013 imposed on the court the obligation to apply for the certificate of tax attestation regarding the good; in order to avoid abusive conduct on the part of the defendant defendant, the complainant's petitioner (if he formulates a petition in this respect) should be given the opportunity to pay himself the obligations owed to the local budget by the other party, simultaneously with the ability to seeks, in the same or separate proceedings, to order the latter to pay damages equal to the amount of the obligations paid.

Regarding the proof of the daily debits of the contribution allowances to the expenses of the owners' association, this is in accordance with art. 20 par. (2) of the Law no. 230/2007, a condition whose non-fulfillment is sanctioned with absolute nullity of the act of alienation. The previously held regarding the non-compliance with the requirements regarding the existence and the content of the tax certificate are also properly applied in the present case.

Another proving relevant provision is art. 57 par. (3) from G.E.O. no. 80/2013, according to which the technical expertise (topographical) must be endorsed by the cadastre office and real estate publicity.

According to art. 5 par. (1) of the Law no. 17/2014, in all cases where a court decision is required for a sale-purchase contract, the action is admissible only if the pre-contract is concluded according to the provisions of Law no. 287/2009, republished, as subsequently amended, and the relevant legislation, as well as if the conditions stipulated in art. 3, art. 4 and art. 9 of this law, and the building that is the subject of the pre-contract is registered in the fiscal role and in the land book. The provisions of art. 5 of Law no. 17/2014, legal text which, from the perspective of art. 20 of the same normative act (as it was created following the Constitutional Court's Decision No. 755/2014 ) hall apply to all pre-contracts, whether prior to or after the entry into force of this Act, that they are concluded in the form of a document in private or in authentic form.

Therefore, in order for the action to be admissible, the applicant must submit the opinion of the Ministry of National Defense (if the land is located at a depth of 30 km from the state border and the Black Sea coast); the opinion of the Ministry of Culture (for the lands where the archaeological sites are located, where listed sites of archaeological patrimony or areas of potentially archaeological potential have been established), the opinion of the territorial or central structure of the Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development or the certificate issued by the City Hall at the location of the land (the latter attesting the completion of the procedures necessary for the exercise of the pre-emptive right). The abovementioned law stipulates that the action will also be rejected if the complainant fails to prove that the real estate is registered for tax purposes in the land register.

4. The limitation of the action for delivery of a judgment in lieu of contract of sale

According to art. 1669 par. (2) Civ. Code, the right of action for the delivery of a judgment in lieu of contract shall be prescribed within 6 months from the date on which the sale has to be completed.

When the parties expressly promised the date on which the sales contract is to be concluded, the obligation to do of the parties can not be executed immediately, because it was postponed until the agreed date. Consequently, the obligation to conclude the sale contract and, in addition, the right to request the conclusion of the sale contract, are affected by a standstill period for the benefit of both parties. If one of the parties has refused to conclude the sale agreement on the due date, the other party is entitled to bring a civil action before the court to request a judgment to be given by the contract. As is clear from art. 2524 par. (2) Civ. Code, the limitation period of 6 months will start to run from the day after the deadline for the contract .

If the parties have not promised the date on which the sales contract has to be concluded and subsequently can not agree on it, 1182 par. (3) and art. 1415 par. (2) Civ. Code, the court may order, at the request of either party, to complete the promise with that date. According to art. 1415 par. (3) the civil request for settlement of the date shall be settled according to the rules applicable to the presidential ordinance, subject to prescription, which shall start to run from the date of promulgation. In the absence of a special legal provision, the 3-year general limitation period provided for in art. 2517 Civ. Code shall apply.

Regarding the moment when the limitation period of the action under art. 1415 par. (3) Civ. Code in which the court may be required to settle the term in which the contract is to be concluded, it flows according to the said text, from the date of the conclusion of the "contract", i.e. the promise of sale, because the obligation affected by the term is that of concluding in the future the contract prefigured by the parties by the promise made.

During the period in which the promissory-buyer is in possession of the promised asset, the prescription is interrupted, according to art. 2538 par. (2) Civ. Code. The handing over of the good to the promissory buyer and the exercise by the latter of the ownership of the promised asset is an act of tacit acknowledgment by the promissor-seller of the claim in the forced execution of the pre-contract in the way of a judgment in lieu of sale. In this case, the prescription of the right to action begins to run again when the promissory-seller expressly manifests himself in the sense of denying the promissory-buyer's right.

5. The inalienability clause

According to art. 627 par. (4) Civ. Code, the inalienability clause is understood in the conventions from which it is the obligation to pass on the property in the future to a determined or determinable person. The scope of this law was subject of controversy as to whether the promise of a translative property contract "gives rise to the obligation to pass on the property in the future", or whether this condition refers to the translative contract itself, in where, for various reasons (e.g. good future, suspensive condition, etc.), the property is not transmitted at the time of the conclusion of the contract.

This controversy was solved by art. 601 of Law no. 71/2011 for the implementation of Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, as modified by G.E.O. no. 60/2012, according to which "in the category of conventions provided by art. 627 par. (4) of the Civil Code, which implies the obligation to pass on the property in the future to a determined or determinable person, also includes the pre-contracts for the future transmission of the right to ownership of a movable or immovable property by concluding contracts, as the case may be, unless otherwise provided by law. "

The implicit existence of the inalienability clause in pre-contracts is not without significant practical consequences. Thus, the promissory-buyer, as a beneficiary of the inalienability clause in the pre-contract, may request the cancellation of the translative or constitutive act of real rights concluded without respecting the clause marked for opposability in the land book. In the absence of this note, the action for annulment is to be dismissed.

In order to ensure the irrevocability of the ineligibility clause, it is sufficient to note in the land book the pre-contract pursuant to art. 902 par. (2) point 12 Civ. Code, without the necessity of enforcing the ineligibility clause under art. 902 par. (2) point 8 Civ. Code. This text applies only to the situation of expressive inalienability.

Conclusions

The forced execution in nature of the promise of sale takes on the atypical form of the contract which, by virtue of its particular nature of the form of execution in nature of the contracts, has a number of peculiarities which translate into the substantial plan by the conditions to be met for obtaining of such a judgment.

Interpretation of the legal framework in the matter of the contract decision may reveal difficulties such as those we have dealt with in the foregoing.

With regard to the value of the stamp duty the market value of the good is preferable. The value of the movement of the good is related to the time of the filing of the petition. If the amount indicated by the claimant is contested, the amount shall be determined by the documents submitted and the explanations given by the parties, according to art. 98 par. (3) Civ. Proc. Code in which the data on the taxable value of the asset or, where appropriate, the grids of the notaries public could be used.

With regard to the conditions to be met for the award of a contract, they are: the conclusion of a valid pre-contract and the fulfillment of the terms of the sale at the date of the delivery of the contract (including the condition that the property be retained in the promise of the seller at the date the award of the contract which takes place); the applicant has fulfilled his promised obligations; the unjustified refusal of one of the parties to conclude the promised contract. To these substantial conditions are added formal obligations established by the law regarding the submission of the land book excerpt on the immovable property subject to the promise of sale, the fiscal certificate certifying the payment of all payment obligations due to the local budget and the proof of current debts of the contribution rates to the owners' association.

According to art. 1669 par. (2) Civ. Code, when the parties expressly promised the date on which the contract of sale must be concluded and one of the parties refused to conclude the contract of sale on the established date, the other party has the right to address to the court, to file an application in civil matters, requesting a decision to be taken, within 6 months of the date fixed for the conclusion of the contract.

If the parties have not promised the date on which the sale contract has to be concluded and subsequently can not agree on it, 1182 par. (3) and art. 1415 par. (2) Civ. Code, the court may order, at the request of either party, to complete the promise with that date. Regarding the moment when the limitation period of the action under art. 1415 par. (3) Civ. Code in which the court may be required to settle the term in which the contract is to be concluded, it flows according to the said text, from the date of the conclusion of the "contract", i.e. the promise of sale, because the obligation affected by the term is that of concluding in the future the contract prefigured by the parties by the promise made.

Under art. 627 par. (4) Civ. Code, the inalienability clause is understood in the conventions from which it is the obligation to pass on the property in the future to a determined or determinable person. The implicit existence of the inalienability clause in the pre-contracts entitles the promissory-buyer, as a beneficiary of the inalienability clause in the pre-contract, to demand the cancellation of the translative or constitutive act of real rights concluded without respecting the clause marked for opposability in the land book.

References

- G. Boroi, M. Stancu, Drept procesual civil, Ed. Hamangiu, 2017;
- G. Boroi (coord.), O. Spineanu-Matei, D. N. Theohari, A. Constanda, M. Stancu, C. Negrilă, D.M. Gavriș, V. Dănăilă, F.G. Păncescu, M. Eftimie, Noul Cod de procedură civilă. Comentariu pe articole, vol. I, Ed. Hamangiu, 2016;
- G. Boroi, C.A. Anghelescu, B. Nazat, „Curs de drept civil. Drepturile reale principale", ed. a II-a, Ed. Hamangiu, 2013;
- I.F. Popa, „Promisiunile unilaterale și sinalagmatice de înstrăinare imobiliară", în Revista Română de Drept Privat nr. 5/2013, pp. 146-189;
- R. Dincă, „Promisiunea de a vinde un teren agricol situat în intravilan", Revista Română de Drept Privat nr. 3/2015, pp. 46-77.
- I. Urs, Condiţiile cerute pentru pronunţarea unei hotărâri judecătoreşti care ţine loc de contract în materia promisiunilor de vânzare, Pandectele Romane 10/2015.

CLUSTER OF COMMERCIAL SALE AGREEMENTS

Vasile NEMEŞ[*]
Gabriela FIERBINŢEANU[]
Anca Nicoleta GHEORGHE[]

Abstract

The object of this article is the analysis of some actual issues regarding the content and particularities of the cluster of agreements involved by the sale-purchase agreement. We identified mainly two categories of contractual relationships that are specific to sale transactions that we classified in the legislated/regulated cluster of agreements and the contractual conventional cluster existing in relation to the sale-purchase agreement. Given that the problems are many and complex, we limited ourselves to the issues regarding the transfer of ownership and bearing the risk of perishing of the goods subject to sale, but which have to be carried from the place where they are to the buyer's office/domicile, or to some other destination mentioned by the latter. We reached the conclusion that a distinction should be made between the transfer of ownership and bearing the risk of perishment of goods, which pertain exclusively to the relationship between the seller and the buyer, and the issues regarding the liability for the destruction/loss of goods, which pertain to the contractual relationship with the other participants in the transaction (shipper, carrier, insurer, etc).

Keywords: agreement, sale-purchase, contractual group, risk, perishment of goods, deterioration, loss, liability.

1. Introduction

From its appearance and up to the present, the sale-purchase agreement has been one of the most used agreements, both within the relations between simple individuals, and within the trade relationships between various participants in such relationships. Truly, sale-purchase is the agreement that meets a multitude of needs of natural persons, in their capacity of consumers of various goods and services, but also the main tool of agency of exchange and movement of goods (raw materials, materials, products, merchandise, etc.) both from manufacturers to distributors, and from the latter to the end recipients. It is indubitable that the sale transactions in their various forms are the main means of marketing the goods both on large (regulated) markets), as provided in Law no. 357/2005 regarding commodity exchanges[1]and the Regulation regarding the approval, supervision, control and sanctioning the activity of commodity exchanges[2] and within the usual relationships between consumers, or between consumers and professional traders.

Sale transactions have evolved over time, the most significant progress being witnessed, undoubtedly, in relation to commercial sales.

2. Content

2.1. Particularities of the commercial sale-purchase

As it is well-known, by the enactment of this Civil Code, the sale-purchase was doubly regulated, in the meaning that the common law relations (between simple individuals) were legislated in the Civil Code (of 1864), while the ones specific to commercial sale were legislated in the Commercial Code[3]. The duality of the regulation was based on the specifics of the two categories of transactions. Several characteristics forming the specifics of commercial sale-purchase the purpose of sale, the economic function of sale, the capacity of contractual parties, the condition and particularities of the goods subject to sale, the price and method of payment, etc.

Repealing the Commercial Code has not led, however, to the disappearance of commercial sale-purchase transactions, because the specifics characterizing them consist of veritable intrinsic elements of such categories of transactions. More precisely, given that commercial relationships have not disappeared, neither have so the specific differences between the commercial sales and the civil ones.

---

[*] Vasile Nemeş, author, Associated professor, PhD, Commercial Law, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest(nemes@nemes-asociatii.ro)

[] Gabriela Fierbinţeanu,co- author, Assistant lecturer Civil and Commercial Law, PhD, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (gabriela.fierbinteanu@gmail.com)

[] Anca Nicoleta Gheorghe, co- author, Lecturer Civil Law, PhD, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (anca.gheorghe@univnt.ro)

[1] Official Gazette no. 1115 of 9 December 2005.

[2] Official Gazette no. 850 of 21 November 2014.

[3] for an analysis of the commercial sale-purchase transactions subject to the Commercial Code, see St. D. Cărpenaru, Romanian Commercial Law, 5th edition, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004, p. 409 et seq

We do not intend to analyze hereby all the elements forming the difference between the civil sale-purchase agreement and the commercial sale-purchase agreement, but we limit ourselves to the ones arising from capacity and the place where the contractual parties are. We proceed in this way because, undoubtedly, in light of parties' capacity, at least one participant in the sale is a professional trader, in the meaning of the Civil Code, while, in light of the place, most commercial sale agreements are negotiated, entered into and implemented between remote persons.[4]

These features of commercial sale-purchase generate, among others, also a series of other categories of legal relations, some being intrinsic to the sale, as tools of marketing through sale (such as consignation, commission, supply, franchise, leasing, agency relations, etc.), while others extrinsic to it (such as shipping, transport, insurance, etc.), but without which, actually, the commercial sale-purchase could not achieve its purpose.

Surely, each of these categories of relations forms the legal content of an agreement, which is regulated and autonomous in the Civil Code or in other normative acts. Given that these are closely interconnected and serve a common purpose, that of marketing through sale, such categories of legal relations look like a veritable „cluster of agreements" gravitating around the commercial sale-purchase, which is the „queen" of the other civil or commercial transactions, as the case may be.

2.2. Main commercial sale-purchase agreements

The actual analysis of the legal relations involved by commercial sale-purchase shows that they cluster in two categories of agreements. One category contains those agreements that have a natural connection with commercial sale, such as the relation sale-leasing-mandate and we consider the actual cases in which the financer mandates the user to search for and negotiate with the supplier the essential elements of the sale-purchase agreement for the goods that are to be used on a leasing basis[5].

We called such contractual relations „a natural cluster of agreements" or „a regulated/legislated cluster of agreements" due to the connection existing between them, in the meaning that sale, as the main transaction of marketing the goods, involves the intrinsic (natural) existence of such agreements.

Besides the contractual transactions which have a natural (intrinsic) connection with commercial sale, there is a series of other agreements that the contractual parties connect to the commercial sale agreement. Such examples are the shipping agreement, the transport agreement, the insurance agreement, the customs service agreement, etc., that we call „the conventional/volitional cluster of agreements". Such agreements do not have an intrinsic connection, but facilitate the performance of commercial sale transactions, and increase efficiency of the particularity of the commercial sale-purchase agreement of being negotiated, concluded and implemented between remote persons. The conventional cluster of agreements is based on real facts, in the meaning that, given the parties are placed within a distance from each another, or the merchandise is found in a certain place or in a certain condition (such as in the case of sale of future goods)[6] and should be carried to the buyer's domicile/office, or to another destination mentioned by them. For the operations of transport of merchandise, a shipping company may be mandated, and if the merchandise carried (bought) is to transit the territory of other states as well, the services of a customs agent are used. Likewise, as regards the merchandise carried (that is subject to sale-purchase), the parties may agree on taking up an insurance policy for the duration of transportation (CARGO). In this way, the same goods (subject to the sale-purchase agreement) are subject to an entire chain of other separate sale agreements, but in close connection with it. Mainly the goods that are subject to sale are, at the same time, subject to the shipping agreement and/or to the transport agreement, subject to the insurance agreement, subject to customs formalities, etc. The situations are even more complex, if the goods are bought or are to be marketed through agency, commission, consignation, franchise, distribution relations or any other relations, when, issues specific to the mandate agreement, with or without representation, are also involved in the case.

2.3. Correlation between the agreements within the conventional cluster with commercial sale transactions

Hereinafter, we intend to point out several issues related exclusively to the conventional cluster of agreements involved by the implementation of the commercial sale-purchase agreement, even if, in fact, both clusters of agreements may coexist.

We mentioned above that the conventional cluster of agreements is created by the parties to the sale-purchase agreement, depending on their understanding of the distribution of the obligations incumbent on them. For instance, the agreement stipulates that the issues regarding the loading and carrying of goods are the responsibility of the seller, while the ones related to

[4] for the analysis of the mechanism of conclusion of an agreement between remote persons, see L. Pop, I-F. Popa, St. I. Vidu, Civil Law.Obligations), UniversulJuridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 67-68; P. Vasilescu, Civil Law. Obligations, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012, p. 301-302.

[5] For details regarding the analysis of the leasing agreement, see St. D. Cărpenaru, Treaty of Romanian Commercial Law, UniversulJuridic Publishing House, 2019, p. 599 et seq.; V. Nemeș, Commercial Law, third edition revised and supplemented, HamangiuPublishing House, Bucharest, 2018, p. 396 et seq.

[6] for the analysis of sale of future goods, see St. D. Cărpenaru, Treaty of Romanian Commercial Law, op. cit. p.455; V. Nemeș, Commercial Law, op. cit. p.307-308.

insurance and customs services are incumbent on the buyer. Likewise, the parties may establish, based on the principle of freedomof contract, that all the issues regarding the arrival of goods at destination be the exclusive responsibility of one of the contractual parties. It is understood that the substance of the conventional character of the cluster of agreements is provided by the will of the parties, both as regards the correlation elements, and in light of the knowledge of their content. This because, as shown by facts, the parties procure the protection of contractual provisions, by inserting some confidentiality clauses, or even by entering into veritable agreements in this respect, from the very beginning of negotiations.

A „contractual hierarchy" is thus created, according to which sale is clearly the main transaction/agreement, while the others are not necessarily subsidiary, but, undoubtedly, should serve the purpose of sale.

The contractual parties may choose also a third solution, especially, within trade relations with extraneous elements, that of mandating a specialized entity, an agent( we consider the agent in the agency contract regulated by the Civil Code and not the agent in the meaning of ordinary language),who is to take care of the conclusion of all the agreements involved by sale, and also of the performance of transactions/deeds, such as the loading/stacking of merchandise, its transfer, unloading at destination, etc., especially, in situations in which the nature of goods requires special handling machinery/techniques. Such agent of sale and of related transactions takes care of the transfer within the group of the main contractual elements, or this may be done by the very seller/buyer, a kind of contractual union being thus formed, within which certainly the seller/buyer is to be the leader. Such a contractual technique may be used in the case of a group of companies [7] within which named or unnamed agreements may be implemented, containing clauses specific to several transactions performed by the group (for example, sale and leasing, sale and commission, etc.), subject to the groups' changing economic needs.

Irrespective of the option chosen by the parties to the sale agreement, it is sure that certain essential elements of each agreement within the group are known by all the group members. More precisely, the carrier knows the main clauses of a sale agreement; likewise, an insurer is no stranger to the sale, transport and shipping relations, etc. Undoubtedly, on the correlation between the agreements within the group, depends the success of the commercial sale-purchase relations. This because, as mentioned previously, all the other agreements within the group should contribute to the achievement of the main objective of the commercial sale-purchase agreement. Certainly, from a legal standpoint, each of the agreements within the group may be analyzed inclusively as to their application, both individually, and collectively, looking like a contractual conglomerate of sale.

2.4. The main legal effects of the conventional cluster of agreements related to the commercial sale-purchase.

In order to grasp the importance and effects of the conglomerate of sale related agreements, it is sufficient to recall the issue of liability/covering damages. More precisely, if the goods subject to commercial sale are deteriorated in full or in part, the issue of bearing the risk of perishment arises, having its root in the sale agreement, and also the issue of liability of the shipper, carrier, the insurance company, etc., and, last but not least, issues related to the transfer of the property title.

The issues become, therefore, complex enough, and might overwhelm the seller/buyer, however specialized they could be. This is exactly the reason why we showed above that the seller/buyer may outsource these services/deliveries to an agent specialized in such transactions[8].An example would be using the commission agreement as a transaction facilitating the identification of contractual partners, group members, and of the relations serving for the purpose of commercial sale. But another contractual mechanism may be also conceived, such as the letter of credit, whereby many sale related transactions are performed by financial institutions, such as the correspondent bank (the acknowledging bank, the approving bank).

2.5. Liability versus bearing the risk in case of the conventional cluster of agreements

Some of the most important issues related to the sale-purchase agreement are the ones regarding the transfer of the property title to the goods subject to sale and the liability/bearing the risk of perishment of goods. As regards commercial sale, such issues arise, especially, within the relationship seller-buyer-carrier and CARGO insurer. Indeed, in commercial matters, the scope of sale consists mainly of generic goods, which have sometimes the particularity of being „future goods" (which do not exist concretely at the time of negotiation of the agreement) and which have to be carried from the seller's domicile/office or from the place where they are to the buyer's office/domicile, or to another place mentioned by the latter. Or, during transportation, the merchandise may suffer certain deterioration or loss, and the issue of liability for damages arises, respectively, bearing the risk of perishment of goods subject to sale, but also of the other agreements, in close connection with this agreement.

I. Transfer of ownership

As regards the transfer of ownership, the Civil Code regulatessuch issue, depending on the nature of goods. Thus, as regards future goods, art. 1658 in the Civil Code stipulates that, if the subject of sale is some future asset, the buyer acquires ownership when the relevant asset is realized. The ownership over generic goods is transferred to the buyer as of the date when they are individualized through delivery, counting, weighing, measuring, or by any other means agreed or prescribed by the nature of goods (art.1.678 in the Civil Code). On the other hand, if the goods are sold in bulk and for a single aggregate price, the ownership is transferred to the buyer as soon as the agreement is concluded, even if the goods were not individualized (art.1.679 In the Civil Code). As noticeable, as regards generic goods, except for those sold in bulk and for a single aggregate price, the transfer of the property title is related to the actual fact of delivery of goods. Given that goods move through the carrier, it means that the actual act of delivery takes place in relation to the carrier or the shipper, as the case may be. The solution is substantiated also by the provisions under art. 1.667 in the Civil Code, according to which, in the absence of contrary usage or stipulation, if the goods have to be carried from one place to another, the seller should take care of shipping, at the buyer's expense. The seller is released when delivering the goods to the carrier or shipper. We infer from this that, once the goods are delivered to the carrier, the property title is transferred from the seller to the buyer.

[7] Manole Ciprian Popa, Group of Companies , Publishing House C. H. Beck, Bucharest, 2011

[8] for a detailed analysis of the agency transactions/agreements within commercial relations, see D.A. Sitaru, Agency Contracts within Commercial Activity, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012

II. Bearing the risks

The delivery operation is related also to the issue of bearing the risks of full or partial perishment of the goods subject to the sale agreement. As regards, especially,generic goods, art. 1686 par.3 in the Civil Codestipulates that, as regards generic goods, the seller is not released from the obligation of delivery, even if the lot the relevant goods belonged to perished in full, unless the said lot was expressly mentioned in the agreement. It may be easily inferred that the risk of full or partial perishment of goods is the responsibility of the debtor of the delivery obligation, namely the seller, res perit debitori, while, after delivery, the risk of perishment is transferred to the buyer. The rule expresses the general principle in such matters, as regulated under art. 1274 in the Civil Code, which sets forth that, in the absence of a contrary stipulation, to the extent goods are not delivered, the risk under the agreement stays with the debtor of the delivery obligation, even if the ownership was transferred to the acquirer. Therefore, as a rule, the delivery of goods to the carrier realizes both the transfer of ownership, and the transfer of the risk of full or partial perishment of goods to the buyer. The issues regarding bearing the risk of perishment interconnect with the ones regarding liability, in the hypothesis of full or partial destruction/deterioration of the goods during transportation.Certainly, the issue of bearing the risk of full or partial perishment of the goods carried, subject to the sale-purchase agreement arises only within the relationship between the buyer and the seller, and this fact is settled, as we showed above, to the detriment of the buyer, in the meaning that, in the absence of a contrary stipulation, the latter bears the risk, being obliged to pay the price to the seller. On the other hand, the issues regarding the liability for deterioration/loss of goods during transportation arise mainly within the relationship buyer-shipper-carrier and the insurer of the merchandise. As a consequence, the carrier shall be held liable for all the losses arising during transportation. Certainly, there are essential differences between the two instances, namely bearing the risk and the liability.

2.6. The difference between bearing the risk of perishment and the liability for deterioration / destruction

The issue of bearing the risk of full or partial perishment of the goods arises only under agreements transferring ownership (we consider the period of negotiation and execution of the agreement), or, the only agreement transferring ownership within this contractual mechanism is the sale. Consequently, if the full or partial perishment (deterioration or loss) of the goods occurred during transportation, the other members of the contractual group (shipper, carrier, insurer, etc.) do not bear the risk of perishment of the goods, but may be kept liable for the contribution/risk undertaken upon the occurrence of damage. More precisely, as regards the carrier, pursuant to the provisions under art. 1.984 in the Civil Code, this is liable for the damage caused by the full or partial loss of goods, due to their alteration or deterioration, arising during transportation. The legislator sets forth, under art. 1.991 in the Civil Code, the cases that exempt the carrier from liability, a situation which is, undoubtedly, more privileged than that of the person liable for bearing the risk. [9]. Likewise, as regards the insurance of goods, the insurer undertakes , upon the occurrence of the risk insured, to pay the insured, the beneficiary of insurance or other entitled persons (art. 2.214 in the Civil Code). [10]

Therefore, as regards the other agreements than the sale one, the only issue is the liability for covering the damage caused, such as in the case of the shipper and carrier, or of the damage undertaken by contracting some risks, as in the case of the insurance agreement, but not also of bearing the risk of full or partial perishment of the goods.

[9] for the issues regarding the carrier's liability, and also other essential elements of the transport agreement, see Gh. Piperea, CarriageLaw, 3rd edition, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013; A.T Stănescu, Ț-A. Stănescu, Transport Agreement, in the new Civil Code. Comments per Articles 2nd edition, C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 2106 et seq.; M. Afrăsinei, Transport Agreement in the new Civil Code. Comments, Doctrine and Case Law)Vol.III, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012, p. 324 et seq.; O. Crauciuc, Transport Agreement in the new Civil Code, Vol.III, Part II, Studies and Comments), p. 277 et seq

[10] as regards the goods insurance agreement, see V. Nemeș, Insurance Law, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012, p. 256 et seq.; C. Iliescu, Goods Insurance Agreement in Romania, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999; I. Sferdian, Goods Insurance Agreement, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004.

Undoubtedly, the legitimacy of the capacity to sue in the action for covering the damage stays with the person that entered into the contract, being thus a personal/contractual action. The question is if, for example, the obligation of entering into the transport/shipping agreement or the insurance agreement is incumbent on the seller, does the buyer still have the legitimacy to sue such persons? More precisely, if, during transportation, goods are destroyed, stolen or lost, and the transport agreement was concluded by the seller, is the buyer able to request payment of the damage from the carrier, although, hypothetically speaking, he is not party to such an agreement? Without proceeding further with the analysis, for space related reasons, we believe the answer is yes. The main argument is that, as we have showed, in the absence of a contrary stipulation, the concrete fact of delivery of goods to the carrier for loading transfers the property title and transfers the risk of the full or partial perishment of goods. Thus, any deterioration or loss of the goods subject to sale is borne by the buyer, given that all such losses are to be borne through the latter's assets. Therefore, as the owner of goods and as an injured person following the full or partial loss of such goods, the buyer may not be denied the right to be indemnified by the author of the loss. In conclusion, given that the adverse impact of the loss is on the buyer's assets, the latter should be acknowledged anaction in tort against the shipper, carrier, the insurer and any other persons that caused damages to the goods.

3. Conclusions

The sale-purchase agreement is first and foremost one of the most important and frequent agreements not only within civil relationships, but also within commercial activity. What is specific to commercial activity is that sale-purchase in almost any situations is in close connection with a multitude of other agreements, forming, thus, a regulated cluster, or, as the case may be, a conventional cluster of agreements. All such agreements created around sale should serve the essential purpose of sale, namely that of marketing the goods until reaching the end recipient of such goods. Objectively, the goods subject to sale are, at the same time, subject to other agreements, such as shipping, transport, insurance, etc. agreements. The main issues arising in such a contractual context regard the transfer of the property title, the transfer of bearing the risk of full or partial perishment of goods and the liability for the damages caused. Given that not all such issues are regulated in detail by the legislation in force, it is advisable that at least the essential aspects of the three categories of issues be an object of concern to the contractual parties, being inserted in the contracts the latter enter into.

References

- St. D. Cărpenaru, Romanian Commercial Law, 5th edition, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004
- L. Pop, I-F. Popa, St. I. Vidu, Civil Law.Obligations), UniversulJuridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- P. Vasilescu, Civil Law. Obligations, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012
- St. D. Cărpenaru, Treaty of Romanian Commercial Law, UniversulJuridic Publishing House, 2019
- V.Nemeș, Commercial Law, third edition revised and supplemented, HamangiuPublishing House, Bucharest, 2018
- V. Nemeș, Insurance Law, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012
- C. Iliescu, Goods Insurance Agreement in Romania, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999
- O. Crauciuc, Transport Agreement in the new Civil Code, Vol.III, Part II, Studies and Comments
- Gh. Piperea, CarriageLaw, 3rd edition, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Manole Ciprian Popa, Group of Companies , Publishing House C. H. Beck, Bucharest, 2011
- D.A. Sitaru, Agency Contracts within Commercial Activity, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012
- A.T Stănescu, Ț-A. Stănescu, Transport Agreement, in the new Civil Code. Comments per Articles 2nd edition, C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- M. Afrăsinei, Transport Agreement in the new Civil Code. Comments, Doctrine and Case Law)Vol.III, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012
- I. Sferdian, Goods Insurance Agreement, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004.

PROTECTION OF A BUSINESS NAME IN CASE OF SIMILARITY OR IDENTITY OF BUSINESS NAMES AND/OR TRADEMARKS

Anna NIKOLOVA

Abstract

In Bulgarian legislation, the regulatory framework of a business name was supplemented by two new paragraphs of article 7 of the Commerce Act (SG № 34/2011). The changes were almost immediately subject to criticism by the doctrine. This report analyzes, on one side, the business name, focusing on the protection provided in violation of the right of the business name under Art. 7, para. 4 of the Commerce Act in case of bad faith application or use of business name, and on the other side, the newly introduced prohibition under art. 7, para. 5 of the Commerce Act for similarity or identity between a registered business name and a trademark, unless the merchant has rights in the trade mark. An overview of the case law has been made. The purpose of the research problem is to answer the question of whether adequate protection of the right of business name has been provided by the legislator in cases where a business name in a bad faith has been registered similar to an already existing one or with trademark.

Keywords: a business name, protection of a business name.

1. Introduction

In Bulgarian legal literature, the business name is traditionally seen as a means of individualizing the merchant and as an element of their entreprise. The general legal framework of the business name, and the ways for its legal protection, are regulated in Chapter three of the Commerce Act, Art. 7-11. The business name is not just a means of individualizing merchants. As an element of his enterprise, the business name may be a subject of transactions. It is necessary to point out that in many cases the business name is an important pricing factor in transactions with the merchant's enterprise. Therefore, the issues of the legal protection of the business name are important.

The objectives set out in the report are to clarify what new claims have been regulated in the case of a breach of right of the business name through the newly created paragraph 4 of Article 7 of the Commerce Act. The objective can be achieved with the performance of the following tasks: to explain when there is identity and similarity between two business names and the comparison of the claims under Art. 7, para. 4 and under Art. 11, para. 2 of the Commerce Act.

Next, the objective of the report is to indicate what new requirements for the content of the business name are introduced with the newly created paragraph 5 of Article 7 of the Commerce Act. In order to meet the defined goal, it is necessary to make a comparison between a business name and a trademark. Moreover, the latest amendments to the regulations of the business name (SG 34/2011) are subjected to a critical analysis by well-known scientists in the field.

The third and fourth paragraphs of Article 7 of the Commerce Act are therefore subject to thorough analysis. For the sake of completeness, the case-law has been reviewed.

2. Content

2.1. The essence of the right to a business name

In the Bulgarian legal doctrine the right to a business name is considered as an indefinite, personal (non-material), indiscriminate, absolute and exclusive right, which arises at the moment a business name is registered in the Commercial register[1]. The condition for registration of the business name in the register is compliance with the normative requirements, which determine the content of the business name. These requirements are determined according to the rules of the mixed system with the priority of the beginning of the truth[2]. Its expression is the rule of Art. 7, para. 2, last sentence of Commerce Act, according to which the business name must be truthful, not misleading and must not be offensive to the public order and moral. The content of the business name is traditionally divided into obligatory and optional. It should be determined in such a way as to provide exclusivity of the business name. It should not coincide with the the business name of already registered merchants. These requirements are derived from Art. 11, para. 1 of the Commerce Act,[3] Art. 21, para 7[4] and Art. 35[5] of the Commercial Register and the Register of Non-Profit Legal Persons Act. With

* Assistant Professor, PhD, University of Ruse „Angel Kanchev" Law Faculty Departament of Private Law(e mail:anikolova@uni-ruse.bg)

[1] Georgi Stefanov, Targovsko pravo.Obshta chast. (Veliko Tarnovo, Abagar, 2016) ,p.141-142.

[2] Stefanov, Targovsko pravo, p.136.

[3] Stefanov, Targovsko pravo, p.141.

[4] Angel Kalaydzhiev, Targovsko pravo. Obshta chast. (Sofia, Trud I Pravo, 2010), p.126.

[5] Nikolay Kolev, Otnosno firmata na targovetsa (Targovsko i konkurentno pravo, issue 5/2011, p.15-21).

the transition from decentralized judicial registration of merchants to centralized administrative procedure before the Registry Agency, the exclusivity has turned from local to national (the change is regulated by the Commercial Register Act). The business name is a means of individualisation of merchants. Having in mind that merchants are both legal and economic entities, which produce or provide goods or services, it is indisputable that the business name must differ from the business names already registered. Otherwise how could consumers distinguish the merchants' goods from those of others.

In my opinion Art. 11, para. 2 of the Commerce Act regulates only the exclusive nature of the business name which ensues from the entry in the register. However, the provision does not introduce a requirement for the uniqueness of the business name. It could therefore be assumed that the entry of two identical merchants with identical business names into the register would lead to confusion among consumers. There is no rule in any of the provisions of Chapter Three of the Commerce Act that the merchant's business name must be distinguished from those of already registered mercahts. Such a requirement existed in our old trade legislation. Pursuant to Article 24 of the repealed Commerce Act, each new business name must be clearly distinguished from other business names, registered in the same place or in the same municipality. In the old Bulgarian commercial legal literature it is stated that the right to a business name is exhausted by the exclusive use of the business name to carry out the commercial activity under its name. Only by way of exclusive use of the business name, one can expect the related benefits - good name, trade relations, customers[6]. To include such a rule in our legislation would make the disputes about the identity of two bisiness names pointless, if they differ only by the punctuation marks used or the spaces between the words.

Pursuant to Art. 21, item 7 and Art. 35 of the Commercial Register and the Register of Non-Profit Legal Persons Act, before entering a merchant the registration official is obliged to check whether another person has rights over the business name and whether it meets the requirements of Art. 7, para. 2 of the Commerce Act. Consequently, there is no explicit rule in these provisions either that a merchant's business name should be distinguished from other listed business names. As it has already been pointed out, the requirement for authenticity is the guiding principle when determining the content of a business name. An obligatory element of the business name's content is the designation of the trader's type. /e.g Rompetrol Limited Liability company or Rompetrol LLC/. These requirements are imperative. In addition to the obligatory content of the business name, all business names may also indicate the nature of the business, the names of the partners, as well as a freely chosen addition.

The first conclusion that can be drawn from the analysis of Art. 7, para 2 and Art.11 of the Commerce Act is that the right to a company name is an exclusive right - the name can only be used by the merchant who has registered it and that each business name entered in the register is distinguished from the bisiness names of the others. The Commerce act does not regulate the cases in which the registration official has registered a business name that does not meet the requirements of Art. 7. Until the 2011 amendments to the law, the only protection against violation of the right to a business name was regulated in Art. 11, para. 2 of the Commerce act. The claim under Art. 11 is inapplicable in the cases of violation of Art. 7, para. 2 of the Commerce act. The doctrine states that the legislator has failed to provide a legal mechanism for removing any breaches committed when registering a business name[7]. For the reasons given, the view deserves to be supported. Apart from being a right, the business name is also a means of individualizing the merchant in turnover. It is vital for him/ her to be able to protect themselves against any intentional or unintentional misuse of their name. Such actions can be expressed in any unauthorized use of the business name not by the merchant who registered it but by another person (he may or may not be a mercant) or in the use of a business name that is registered in compliance with the legal requirements, but is similar or identical to a business name registered earlier.

In the first hypothesis protection shall be granted with the claim under Art. 11, para 2 of the Commerce Act. From the expression 'affected parties', it can be concluded that the claimant may be both the trader and any other person, provided that they have an interest in discontinuing the use of this bisiness name[8]. This has to be proven specifically for each case. In my opinion, while it is highly unlikely, it should be assumed that it is possible to file only a claim for compensation without seeking the cessation of the infringement. If damage has not been caused to the right-holder by the wrongful use, then he may file a claim only to cease further use of the right to the business name. Both claims can therefore be brought individually[9].

A claim to establish an application for, or a use of, a business name in bad faith, to cease and desist using a business name in bad faith and for damages, when the business name is identical or similar to an already registered one

In the second hypothesis, up until amendments to the commercial legislation in 2011, there was no private protection in the case of registering two identical or similar business names in the commercial

[6] Lyuben Dikov, Kurs po targovsko pravo Commercial Law Course (Sofia, Third Phototype, 1935,1992), p.46.

[7] Stefanov, Targovsko pravo, p.139, Valentin Braykov, Targovskoto ime i negovata zashtita The Trade Name and Its Protection (Tagovsko pravo, issue 2/2001, p.5-12).

[8] Stefanov, Targovsko pravo ,p.143, opposite Kalaydzhiev, Targovsko pravo , p.128.

[9] Kalaydzhiev, Targovsko pravo, p.128 opposite Stefanov, Targovsko pravo,p. 143.

register. Art. 7, para. 4 was subject to criticism by the doctrine.

According to another opinion, Art. 7, para. 4 of the Commerce act provides private legal protection of a business name. This paragraph regulates three claims - declaratory -to establish an application for, or use of, a business name in bad faith, reprehensible - to cease and desist using a business name in bad faith, compensation - for damages.

In order to distinguish between claims under Art.11 para. 2 and Art. 7 para.4 of the Commerce Act, it is necessary to analyze the prerequisites for the submission of claim under Art. 7 para.4of the Commerce Act.

For a claim to be admitted under Art. 7 para.4 of the Commerce Act, both the plaintiff and the defendant must have a commercial quality, whereas a defendant under Art. 11 para.2 of the Commerce Act may not be a trader.Next, in order to admit a claim under Art.7 para.4 of the Commerce Act, it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove identity or similarity between his business name and the one of the defendant and has to prove that his business name has been registered before the bisiness name of the defendant. Therefore, it is necessary to clarify whether the identity of a business name only refers to its optional content or to all elements of the business name's content. According to doctrine, there will be no matching of names if they are entirely covered by the optional content but differ only by the designation for the type of commercial company. When consumers choose certain goods, they hardly pay attention to the type of merchant. That is why it would be more correct to judge the identity of two business names in relation to the other elements of its content.

Next, in order to determine whether there is an identity between two business names, the question must be answered whether the different punctuation marks contained in the business names lead to an identity between them. This question – so easy at first glance, has created controversial practice, both judicial and registration. Opinions are split into two. It has been affirmed in the legal literature that business names that differ only in their punctuation marks are identical. It has already been pointed out that the business name as a means of individualizing traders must be unique. That is why I adhere to this opinion. According to the jurisprudence, there is an identity between two business names when they differ either by using a double vowel or a double consonant (it is a matter of identical sound, identical pronunciation).

The identity is a circumstance that can be established more easily than the similarity between two business names. Moreover, the optional content of the business name may contain an indication of the nature of the business or be defined as a combination of the partners' names. These requirements allow for the listing of many companies in the commercial register, whose names are somewhat similar. The registration of similar business names in the register is not a violation of legislation. This is also the case law. Establishing a similarity between two business names can not be self-directed. Such an assessment should be made only in the case of a claim under Art. 7, para. 4 of the Commerce Code, and not at the initial entry of the business names in the register. Similarity should be assessed specifically and factually in regard to its relation with bad faith.

Next, in order to admit the claim under Art. 7, para. 4 of the Commerce Act, it is necessary to prove the defendant's bad faith. On the question of how bad faith was established, the Supreme Court of Cassation, in its Decree No. 304 of 15.05.208, ruled that, in its application for registration of a trademark and its use, it established a consistent practice, assessed in Decision No 194 /30.10.2013 SCC, Decision No. 162/ 24.01.2012 SCC. This practice may also apply to misconduct when a business name is identical with or similar to a previously registered bisiness name. Criteria regarding the content of 'bad faith' within the meaning of Art. 7, para. 4 of the Commerce Act may be the reputation of a previously registered bisiness name, identity or similarity in the content of the business names, the behaviour before and after filing an application for registration of the business name in terms of the knowledge of the existence of an earlier identical or similar name, as well as the intention to harm another person.

As a conclusion from the analysis of Art. 7, paragraph 4 of the Commerce Act, we can point out that despite some imperfections of the regulation, the change is positive. Even if the claim under Art. 7 para.4 is admitted, there are no means to force the merchant, who has registered the later (second) business name, to change its content. There is already a case law on this issue, according to which the only enforcement mechanism is to impose fines.

2.2. Identity or similarity of a business name with a trademark

Before proceeding to consider the issue of identity or similarity between a business name and mark, a distinction must be made between them. The business name is always a verbal indication of the merchant and he/ she can own only one name. The right to a business name is exclusive and arises from the entry in the Commercial Register. It can only be transferred as an element of the merchant's enterprise, not as a separate object of industrial property. The registration of the business name is indefinite. Each name is different from the name of all the other merchants. The merchant can use it to denote all the goods or services he/ she produces or provides. Merchants are legally obliged to have a bisiness name and state it in their commercial correspondence. The trademark has quite different functions. Not every merchant is required to register a mark. It is a sign, capable of distinguishing the goods or services of one person from those of other persons and can also be represented graphically. The mark therefore individualises the goods or services and not the merchant. It is not always a verbal indication. The right to a trade mark arises from the registration at the Patent Office for a period of 10 years from the filing date of the application. The trademark registration can be renewed for an unlimited number of times. The right to a trademark is also exceptional. Legislation allows the registration of identical marks provided that they are used to designate different goods or services.

In the commercial literature, until the change in the legislation in 2011, it was pointed out that no prohibition or protection of verbal identity was established between a registered business name and a later registered trademark in the Patent Office. It was even considered acceptable that the optional content of the business name should match the mark or be part of it[10]. Protection against the use of a business name, trademark, or geographical designation identical or similar to that of other persons, both before 2011 and at present, is regulated in Art. 35, paragraph 2 of the Law on Protection of Competition. Responsibility under Art. 35, para. 2 of the LPC is administratively punitive.

The addition of Art. 7 para. 5 of the Commerce Act (promulgated in the State Gazette, issue 34 of 2011) regulates the prohibition of identity or similarity between a business name and a protected trademark, unless the merchant has no rights over it. The newly created paragraph 5 of Article 7 of the Commerce Act is subject to criticism in the legal literature regarding the term used - 'protected trademark' and the lack of criteria to judge the identity, respectively the similarity between a business name and a trademark. An identity is allowed between a business name and a trademark when the registered trademark is a word or a dominant word element[11].. Since the business name is always a verbal indication, in my opinion, in Art. 7, para 5 of the Commerce Act is meant not a protected trademark but a word mark. Therefore, the view should be supported that Paragraph 5 of Article 7 of the Commerce Act provides for the prohibition and protection of verbal identity between a registered business name and a later registered trademark at the Patent Office, as well as vice versa[12].

As already explained, the legal form of the merchant is an element of the business name's mandatory content. Consequently, the view that the identity of a business name and a trademark is at the very least excluded because of the mandatory content of the company, which pursuant to the Marks and Geographical Indications Act is in most cases an absolute ground for refusal of registration[13],, deserves to be supported.

Even authors criticizing Art.7 para. 5 admit that a mechanism is needed to avoid the misconduct of registration of business names that include trademard, registered before the registrationof the business name. The prohibition under Art. 7, para. 5 of the Commerce code should apply only to newly registered business names and not to existing business names as of the date of entry into force of the provision. The law-maker has not provided for any reversal of Art. 7, para. 5. That is also the case law.

Criticism is also grounded that the assessment of similarity requires the application of criteria that the Commerce Act does not provide. The lack of criteria does not relieve the registration official of the obligation to monitor compliance with the requirements for entry in the commercial register. The Patent Office provides free access to electronic registers which they keep, including of trademarks.

On the basis of the above analysis it can be concluded that even imprecise use of expressions and lack of criteria by the requirements of Art. 7, para. 5 of the Commerce Act the regulation of the business name has been improved .

2. Conclusions

The margins of private law protection of the right of business name have been expanded as a result of the amendments to Chapter Three of the Commerce Act. Settlement, damages and indemnification for the use of a business name identical or similar to a previously registered business name are governed by the provision of Article 7, paragraph 4 of the Commerce Act. New requirements for the contents of a business name have been added. It has banned for the business name to be identical or similar to a registered trademark, unless the merchant holds rights over the latter. Therefore, the legislator is striving to improve the business names` legal framework in order to put an end to the unscrupulous registration of business names, identical or similar to business names already existing in the register, as well as identical or similar to registered trademarks.

References

- Angel Kalaydzhiev, Targovsko pravo. Obshta chast. (Sofia, Trud I Pravo, 2010).
- Bozhana Nedelcheva, Zhivko Draganov, Emil Markov, Ofeliya Kirkoryan-Tsonkova, Dimitar Batakliev, Andreĭ Andreev. Izmeneniyata v pravnata uredba na firmata-trevogi. sp. Targovsko pravo, br.2/2011, p.51-58.
- Georgi Stefanov, Targovsko pravo. Obshta chast. (Veliko Tarnovo, Abagar, 2016).
- Lyuben Dikov, Kurs po targovsko pravo (Sofia, Third Phototype, 1935,1992).
- Nikolay Kolev, Otnosno firmata na targovetsa (Targovsko i konkurentno pravo, issue 5/2011, p.15-21).
- Zhivko Draganov, Obekti na intelektualnata sobstvenost. (Sibi, Sofia 2016)

[10] Stefanov, Targovsko pravo. Obshta chast. (Veliko Tarnovo, Abagar, 2009) p.132, 141.

[11] Bozhana Nedelcheva, Zhivko Draganov, Emil Markov, Ofeliya Kirkoryan-Tsonkova, Dimitar Batakliev, Andreĭ Andreev. Izmeneniyata v pravnata uredba na firmata-trevogi. sp. Targovsko pravo, br.2/2011, p.51-58

[12] Stefanov, Targovsko pravo. Obshta chast.p.145.

[13] Zhivko Draganov, Obekti na intelektualnata sobstvenost. (Sibi, Sofia 2016) p.238.

BRIEF PRESENTATION OF RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM ACCORDING TO THE ROMANIAN CIVIL CODE OF 2009

Vlad-Victor OCHEA

Abstract

This study aims to briefly present restitutio in integrum in light of the New Romanian Civil Code of 2009. Apart from the civil law point of view, it shall mention an aspect pertaining to the procedural law that should not be ignored when a court of law gives a ruling on restitutio in integrum.

Keywords: restitutio in integrum, restitution of prestations, Romanian Civil Code of 2009, civil law, procedural law

1. Introduction

As in many other areas, the Civil Code of Quebec has served as inspiration for the Romanian legislator in drawing up the provisions related to restitutio in integrum. Several articles pertaining to restitutio in integrum are mere translations of the Quebecois provisions in the matter.

A clear understanting of restitutio in integrum can only be achieved by operating with the distinction between substantial law and procedural law. In other words, it is essential to be aware of the fact that the application of any civil (substantial) provision is conditioned to the procedural decor in which the interested party seeks protection of her/his rights.

That is why this study aims to present restitutio in integrum not only from a civil law point of view, but also from a procedural law point of view.

2. Content

2.1. Coordinates of restitutio in integrum

According to art. 1635 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009, which is a translation of art. 1699 of the Civil Code of Quebec, restitution of prestations takes place where a person is bound by law to return to another person the property he has received, either without right or in error, or under a juridical act which is subsequently terminated with retroactive effect or whose obligations become impossible to perform by reason of superior force – casus major, casus or another similar event a.n.

Restitutio in integrum shall take place when a person has received an indebitum solutum (art. 1341-1344 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009) or when the contract that served as grounds for the prestations exchanged between parties was terminated with retroactive effect. Retroactive termination of a contract can occur when the contract was annulled or terminated due to the unjustified non-performance of the obligations by one of the parties (resolution).

There will obviously be no restitutio in integrum when the contract is annulled or terminated due to the unjustified non-performance of the obligations by one of the parties, when such cessations of existence of the contract generate only ex nunc effects.

Regardless of the cause of restitution, its grounds shall always consist of indebitum solutum. Once the contract is annulled or otherwise terminated, both parties or, as the case may be, one of them become(s) entitled to claim restitution. The foundation of the right to restitution is indebitum solutum, because the dissapereance of the contract leads to the dissapereance of the cause of the prestations. The contract was the reason those prestations were made. As a consequence, the termination of the contract gives right to restitution.

According to art. 1635 par. 2 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009, that which was performed based on a future cause, which was not fulfilled, is also bound to restitution, except if the person performed the prestation acknowledging the impossibility of fulfillment or deliberately blocking its fulfillment.

Par. 3 of the same article provides that the obligation of restitution enjoys the same sureties/hypothechs as the initial obligation.

The debtor of the initial payment is the person entitled to restitution of prestations. If he has transferred his rights and obligations arising from the contract to another party, then the latter, the successor of the debtor of the initial payment, shall claim restitution. In this regard, art. 1636 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 provides that the right to restitution belongs to the one who performed the prestation bound to restitution or, as the case may be, to another person, entitled by law to such restitution.

Art. 1638 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 brings an end to a scientific dispute occurred under the previous fundamental civil legislation.

Following the nemo auditur propriam turpitudinem allegans rule, authors were of the opinion that there shall be no restitution of prestations upon the annulment of a contract for immoral or illicit cause (causa), because no one can claim the protection of his/her right based on his/her incorrectnes or imorality1.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (vlad.ochea@gmail.com).

Although this was the opinion embraced by the majority of authors, art. 1638 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 states the opposite.

Restitution of prestations shall be made in kind or by equivalence. Restitution of prestations in kind is the rule, so restitution by equivance shall take place whenever restitution in kind is not possible (art. 1636 par. 1, art. 1639-1640 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009).

Par. 2 of art. 1637 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 indicates that restitution of prestations shall take place, even if damages ar not owed.

A party to a contract which was terminated is entitled not only to restitution, but also to damages, if the other party breached its obligations or, for example, if the other party is held liable for damages, following the annulment of the contract for error occasioned by fraud (see art. 1215 par. 2 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009).

With respect to restitution in kind or by equivalence, a clear distinction has to made between restitution of movable or immovable property, on one hand, and restitution of other prestations, on the other hand.

Restitution in kind of movable or immovable property shall always be possible, with the exceptions presented below.

Restitution in kind of an amount of money or other fungible goods shall always be possible. The same rule applies for generic goods. As it will be shown below, determined goods are not always prone to restitution.

Services performed by a party or the use of a good ar not prone to restitution. In such cases, the termination of the contract only has ex nunc effects. Admission of restitution in such cases would lead to the same outcome. If, for example, a lease contract is terminated, the lessor would be entitled to the restitution of the use of the good and the lessee could claim the rent. Since the use of the good is not subject to restitution in kind, the party would resort to restitution by equivalence, which translated into paying the other party the amount of money which is the equivalent of the use of the good. Since this is equal to the rent, the two prestations are compensated and thus estinguished. That is why the termination of continuing contracts only has ex nunc effects.

Art. 1640 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 provides that if restitution cannot take place in kind due to impossibility, due to a serious impediment or due to the fact that restitution regards services already performed, restitution shall be made by equivalence. In cases provided for at par. 1, the value of prestations shall be assessed as at the time the debtor received what he is liable to restore.

A problem that arises from the restitution of prestations by equivalence is that of determining the amount that has to be paid to the party entitled to restitution. Between the conclusion of the contract, the performance of its obligations and its annulment or otherwise termination that leads to restitution of prestations there is a certain interval of time. Within it, the services initially performed can either increase or decrease in value, due to different factors in that specific market. The Romanian legislator has opted to determine the amount owed to the party who is entitled to restitution by taking into consideration the value of such prestations as at the time the debtor received what he is liable to restore.

In the case of total loss or alienation of property subject to restitution, the person obligated to make the restitution is bound to return the value of the property, considered when it was received, as at the time of its loss or alienation, or as at the time of the restitution, whichever value is the lowest; but if the person is in bad faith or the cause of the restitution is due to his fault, the restitution is made according to whichever value is the highest (art. 1641 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009).

According to art. 1648 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009, if the good bound to restitution was transferred, the claim to restitution can also be exercised against the third party who acquired that good, subject to the rules of Real Estate register, to the effect of acquiring movable goods in good faith or subject to the application of rules regarding usucaption.

According to art. 1648 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009, if the good bound to restitution has fortuitously perished, the debtor is exempt from making restitution, but he shall then transfer to the creditor, where applicable, the indemnity he has received for the loss of the property or, if he has not already received it, the right to the indemnity. If the debtor is in bad faith or the cause of the restitution is due to his fault, he is not exempt from making restitution unless the property would also have perished if it had been in the hands of the creditor.

Art. 1643 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 provides that if the good bound to restitution has only suffered a partias loss, such as a deterioration of any other depreciation in value, the person who is obliged to make restitution is bound to indemnify the creditor for such loss, unless it results from normal use of the property.

From the previously cited articles, the following conclusions can be drawn:

a) if the good bound to restitution has perished following other event than a fortuitous one or was transferred by the debtor, the creditor can either claim the value of the good from the debtor or can claim the property from the person who acquired

[1] Gabriel Boroi, Drept civil. Partea generală. Persoanele, ed. a III-a, București, Ed. Hamangiu, 2008, p 329.

it, subject to the rules of Real Estate register;

b) if the good bound to restitution has only suffered a partias loss, the debtor has to compensate the creditor for such loss. However, he shall be exempt from payment if the loss occurs from normal use;

c) if the good bound to restitution has perished fortuitously, then the creditor is entitled to the indemnity. If the cause of restitution lays in the bad faith of the debtor or in his guilt, he shall be held liable according to art. 1641, regardless of any indemnity.

With respect to the reimbursement for disbursements made with respect to the property, art. 1644 of the Romanian Civil Code clearly provides that it is governed by the provisions applicable to a possessor in good faith or, in case of bad faith or if the cause of the restitution is due to the fault of the person who is bound to make restitution, by those applicable to possessors in bad faith.

Loyal to its source of inspiration, the Romanian Civil Code provides in art. 1645 that the fruits and revenues of the property being returned belong to the person who is bound to make restitution, and he bears the costs he has incurred to produce them. He owes no indemnity for enjoyment of the property unless that was the primary object of the prestation or unless the property was subject to rapid depreciation. If the person who is bound to make restitution is in bad faith or if the cause of the restitution is due to his fault, he is bound, after compensating for the costs, to return the fruits and revenues and indemnify the creditor for any enjoyment he has derived from the property.

Costs of restitution are borne by the parties, in proportion, where applicable, to the value of the prestations mutually restored. Where one party is in bad faith, however, or where the cause of the restitution is due to his fault, the costs are borne by that party alone.

Any other acts performed in favour of a third person in good faith may be set up against the person to whom restitution is owed.

2.2. Procedural aspects

Although restitutio in integrum is reciprocal, it shall take place in this manner, if both parties have filed a claim in this regard. In other words, if only the claimant files for restitutio in integrum, it shall only be granted to him and not to the defendant as well, since the civil trial is governed by a fundamental principle that states, amongst others, that the object and limits of the trial are set by the claims filed by the parties.

Consequently, if the defendant does not file for restitutio in integrum within the trial initiated by the defendant, then he can do so in 3 years starting from the date the ruling of the court.

3. Conclusions

In an attempt to achieve a set of norms which is meant to be clearer and more accurate, the legislator has opted for the systematisation of the rules relating to restitutio in integrum, to whom is dedicated Title X Restitution of prestation of the Fifth Book About obligations of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009.

It comprises of the same rules and principles that have governed this matter under the Civil Code of 1864. There are slight variations and the main aspect of novelty consists in the previously mentioned systematisation, as opposed to some rules scattered across the provisions of the Civil Code of 1864.

References

- Gabriel Boroi, Drept civil. Partea generală. Persoanele, ed. a III-a, București, Ed. Hamangiu, 2008.

THE PRINCIPLE OF THE BEST INTERESTS OF THE CHILD

Ioana PĂDURARIU

Abstract

Since 1919, the recognition of children's rights has begun to find an international echo, when the League of Nations "came to life", the name of which links to the Geneva Declaration of 1924. Adopted in 1989, by the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the principle of the best interests of the child is still an imprecise, subjective notion if we consider its application, but so necessary, even in the absence of precise regulatory criteria.

Keywords: best interests of the child, children`s rights, Geneva Declaration, Declaration on the Rights of the Child, Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC).

1. Introduction

„There is only the authority of love, the natural one, that we naturally have since birth, preserved only by love. Authority is not what I want to impose, but just what others recognize in me."[1]

In the absence of a legal definition, determining the notion of „best interests of the child" may present major difficulties. This happens because this notion can be defined differently, depending on the legal situation to which it refers, above all in family law[2] (separation from parents, adoption, deprivation of family environment), but also in relation to juvenile justice (separation from adults in detention, presence of parents at court hearings for penal matters involving a juvenile).

The Convention on the Rights of the Child (hereinafter CRC) does not simply expose a list of rights. Of course, the CRC is the enumeration of those rights to which the child is entitled, but for sure it is also much more than this. If we admit that, in the past, the Geneva Convention (1924) and the Declaration on the Rights of the Child (1959) considered the child as „an object in need of attention and protection"[3], however, since 1989, when the CRC was promulgated, the child has been understood to be a subject of rights. As a result, the CRC has become a reference document for the development of European child rights.

In this spirit, legal acts concerning children are followed, almost without exception, either by explicit references to the CRC or by implicit references in the form of references to the rights of the child, such as: the „best interests of the child" (article 3 – the best interests of the child as a primary consideration in all actions concerning children), the child's right to participate in decisions that affect him (article 12) or the right to be protected against discrimination of any kind (article 2).

It is important to mention, among other things, the role of the European courts in interpreting and ensuring the respect for children's rights in Europe.

The Court of Justice of the European Union (hereinafter CJEU) referred to the fact that its decisions[4] have been grounded also on the general principles on the rights of the child, also incorporated into the CRC (such as the „best interests of the child" and the right to be listened), especially in the context of international kidnapping cases.

Unlike the CJEU, the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter ECHR) has a rich jurisprudence on child rights. ECHR jurisprudence on family life recognizes interdependent rights such as the right to family life and the right of the child that his best interests have a higher priority. It recognizes that children's rights are sometimes contradictory. For example, the child's right to respect for family life can be limited to guaranteeing his superior interest. Furthermore, the Council of Europe has adopted various other instruments dealing with issues related to personal relationships, child custody and the exercise of children's rights.

Thus, in the Maslov case against Austria[5], the applicant had been convicted of several delinquencies during the minority period. The ECHR affirmed that the obligation to take into account the best interests of the child includes the obligation to facilitate its reintegration, in accordance with Article 40 of the CRC, as regards the expulsion measures against a juvenile delinquent. The ECHR has also received complaints from children about the impossibility of establishing the identity of their biological fathers. The ECHR has observed that establishing a legal

* Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu", University of Bucharest (e-mail: padurariu_ioana@yahoo.fr)

[1] S. Baștovoi, The price of love, Cathisma, Bucharest, 2018, pages 80-81.

[2] See also C.-M. Crăciunescu, The best interests of the child in in the exercise of parental authority exclusively by one of the parents, in Parental authority. Between greatness and decadence, Solomon Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018, pages 3-25.

[3] See J. Zermatten, The Best Interests of the Child. Literal Analysis, Function and Implementation, Working Report, 2010, Institut International des Droit de l`Enfant, page 2.

[4] See CJEU, C-491/10 PPU, Joseba Andoni Aguirre Zarraga/Simone Pelz, 22.12.2010.

[5] See ECHR, Case Maslov/Austria, no. 1638/0323, 23.06.2008.

relationship between a child and the alleged biological father goes into the sphere of private life. Thus, the authorities may have a positive obligation to intervene in the action to establish paternity, in the best interests of the child, when the legal representative of the child (in this case[6], the mother) was unable to represent the child properly, for example, because of a serious disability.

2. Meanings of the expression „the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration". Rule of procedure and foundation for a particular, independent right

First of all, this concept was interpreted as a rule of procedure[7]. That means, whenever a decision is to be taken and that decision will affect a specific child or a group of children, the decision-making process must carefully consider both, positive and negative, impacts of the decision on the child or on the children concerned, and must give to this impact a primary consideration when weighing the different interests at stake.

On the other hand, this principle is nevertheless considered one of the foundations for a particular right. And is clearly that, seen like this, the principle represents the guarantee that it will be applied whenever a decision is to be taken concerning a child or a group of children.

In fact, no one really knows what are the best interests of a particular child. However, the principle of the best interests of the child must respect what the Committee on the Rights of the Child established[8] in the General Comment no. 8 on the right of the child to protection from corporal punishment and other cruel or degrading forms of punishment:

«26. When the Committee on the Rights of the Child has raised eliminating corporal punishment with certain States during the examination of their reports, governmental representatives have sometimes suggested that some level of „reasonable" or „moderate" corporal punishment can be justified as in the „best interests" of the child. The Committee has identified, as an important general principle, the Convention's requirement that the best interests of the child should be a primary consideration in all actions concerning children (art. 3, para. 1). The Convention also asserts, in article 18, that the best interests of the child will be parents' basic concern. But interpretation of a child's best interests must be consistent with the whole Convention, including the obligation to protect children from all forms of violence and the requirement to give due weight to the child's views; it cannot be used to justify practices, including corporal punishment and other forms of cruel or degrading punishment, which conflict with the child's human dignity and right to physical integrity.»[9]

So, this principle must respect the importance of every child as a human being in development, an individual with opinions, all that seen in the global spirit of the CRC, with an interpretation that could not deny other rights of the CRC (for example, the right to protection against harmful traditional practices and corporal punishment).

„Best" and „interests", as a whole, mean that the final goal should and must be the well-being of the child, as defined through the Convention, especially in the Preamble and in the Article 3 of the CRC (paragraphs 2 and 3).

Moreover, as an author has observed[10], there is a subtle, but highly relevant nuance in the second part of the expression of this principle („shall be a primary consideration"). We clearly see that a literal analysis reveals us that this text refers to „a primary consideration" and not to „the primary consideration". That means, indeed, that this terminology implies that the best interests of the child will not always be the single, overriding interest and that there may be other competing interests at stake.

However, in accordance with the opinion expressed by the same author[11], in at least two particular situations, the drafters of international human rights instruments have used „the" when referring to the paramountcy of the best interests of the child:

- Article 21 of the CRC: „States parties that recognize and/or permit the system of adoption shall ensure that the best interests of the child shall be the paramount consideration (…)";

and

- Article 23 (2) of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities: „States Parties shall ensure the rights and responsibilities of persons with disabilities, with regard to guardianship, wardship, trusteeship, adoption of children or similar institutions, where these concepts exist in national legislation; in all cases the best interests of the child shall be paramount. States Parties shall render appropriate assistance to persons with disabilities in the performance of their child-rearing responsibilities."

In these cases, the best interests of the child become the sole determining factor when considering a solution, or, „in certain circumstances, such an adoption or for children living with disabilities, the higher standard is applicable".[12]

[6] See ECHR, Case A.M.M./Romania, no. 2151/10, 14.02.2012, points 58-65.
[7] See J. Zermatten, op. cit., page 7.
[8] Geneva, 15 May-2 June 2006.
[9] See https://resourcecentre.savethechildren.net/node/10263/pdf/gc8.pdf.
[10] See J. Zermatten, op. cit., page 11.
[11] Idem, page 12.
[12] See G. Van Bueren, Pushing and pulling in different directions – The best interests of the child and the margin of appreciation of States, in Child Rights in Europe, Council of Europe, 2007, page 32.

3. „Best interests of the child" in other articles of the CRC

This expression is also included in a number of other articles of the CRC[13], as a reference point that must be considered in particular situations.

Article 9 of the CRC put the principle promulgated by Article 3 of CRC in relation to the right of the child to live with his parents, also referring to the rule that the child must maintain personal relationships and direct contact with both parents, unless this threatens the best interests of the child (situations that include an open conflict between the child and one or both parents, or the cases when a child and his parents may become separated as a result of an official decision, necessary in a particular case such as one involving abuse or neglect of the child by the parents, or one where the parents are living separately and a decision must be made as to the child's place of residence, but only when such a decision takes into account the best interests of the child).

Article 18 establishes the principle according to which the two parents must be involved with the education of the child; this is called the common responsibility for education.

Article 20 of the CRC provides that the child who is deprived, temporarily or permanently, of his family environment or in whose own best interests cannot be allowed to remain in that environment shall be entitled to special protection and assistance provided by the State. States Parties, in accordance with their national laws, shall ensure alternative care (inter alia, foster placement, kafalah of Islamic law, adoption or if necessary placement in suitable institutions for the care of children for such a child).

According to the article 21 of the CRC, „States Parties that recognize and/or permit the system of adoption shall ensure that the best interests of the child shall be the paramount consideration and they shall: (a) Ensure that the adoption of a child is authorized only by competent authorities who determine, in accordance with applicable law and procedures and on the basis of all pertinent and reliable information, that the adoption is permissible in view of the child's status concerning parents, relatives and legal guardians and that, if required, the persons concerned have given their informed consent to the adoption on the basis of such counselling as may be necessary; (b) Recognize that inter-country adoption may be considered as an alternative means of child's care, if the child cannot be placed in a foster or an adoptive family or cannot in any suitable manner be cared for in the child's country of origin; (c) Ensure that the child concerned by inter-country adoption enjoys safeguards and standards equivalent to those existing in the case of national adoption; (d) Take all appropriate measures to ensure that, in inter-country adoption, the placement does not result in improper financial gain for those involved in it; (e) Promote, where appropriate, the objectives of the present article by concluding bilateral or multilateral arrangements or agreements, and endeavour, within this framework, to ensure that the placement of the child in another country is carried out by competent authorities or organs."

Article 37 of the CRC looks at general principles which should govern the administration of juvenile justice[14], in particular the exclusion of torture, punishments or inhuman treatments and the prohibition of capital punishment. Also this article impose that the child be treated with humanity and, if the child is deprived of freedom, he must be detained separately from adults, except if the opposite proved to be preferable for the best interests of the child (this might be the case if the child is imprisoned with one of his parents or a mother who gives birth while she is confined).

As a conclusion, we observe that the principle of the best interests of the child is a general principle which must be applied in all activities related to implementation of the entire CRC.

4. „Best interests of the child" – roles and fields of application

The concept of the best interest of the child, such as it is defined by the CRC, but also for example in the Convention of the Hague on international adoption, was seen as a concept that has two „traditional" roles, one that seeks to control and one that finds solutions (criterion of control and criterion of solution[15]).

Control criterion means that the best interest of the child is applied to oversee that the exercice of rights and the obligations towards children be correctly carried out, fulfilled. It is the entire field of child protection that is concerned with this aspect of control (family law, child protection services, situations of alternative care and cases of migration).

Regardind the solution criterion, the concept of the interest of the child itself must intervene to help the people that need to make the right decisions for children. The solution chosen should be selected because it is in the interest of the child. It is an essential bridge between the right, the theoretical concept, and the reality.

Many attempts have already been made to specify, supplement and to „objectify" the concept of the best interests of the child.

---

[13] See https://www.ohchr.org/documents/professionalinterest/crc.pdf.

[14] See also Article 40, as a continuation of the Article 37.

[15] See P. Pichonnaz, Le bien de l'enfant et les secondes familles (familles recomposées), in Le Bien de l'enfant, Verlag Ruegger, Zürich/Chur, 2003, page 163; H. Fulchiron, De l'intérêt de l'enfant aux droits de l'enfant in Une Convention, plusieurs regards. Les droits de l'enfant entre théorie et pratique, IDE, Sion, 1997, pages 30 and following.

For example, in Canada, the draft amendment to the „Divorce Act" which wishes that the child's interests be judged according to elements'[16]:

1. the nature, the stability and the intensity of the relationship between the child and each person concerned with the procedure;
2. the nature, the stability and the intensity of the relationship between the child and other members of the family where the child resides or implicated in the care or the child's education;
3. the child's leisure activities;
4. the capacity of each person to offer a framework for life, education and all care for the child;
5. the child's cultural and religious bonds;
6. the importance and advantages of joint parental authority, ensuring the active involvement of the two parents after separation;
7. the importance of the relationship between the child and his/her grandparents or other members of the family;
8. the proposals of the parents;
9. the capacity of the child to adapt him/herself to the parent's views;
10. the capacity of the parents to facilitate and ensure the maintenance of the child's relationships with other members of the family;
11. all previous incidents showing violence by a relative towards the child;
12. the exclusion of preference shown to one parent because of their sex;
13. the demonstrated willingness of each parent to take part in educational meetings;
14. any other factor that could influence decision-making.

As we can see, it is a long list that is not exhaustive and the 14 elements are not hierarchically ordered. These points remain to be examined largely open „and consequently only have a relative influence, as well they allow for a more concrete approach and offer a working method to better comprehend, in casu, the interests of the child"[17].

Other countries have taken identical steps. A particular product of the Anglo-Saxon legal system, an attempt to objectivize the concept, England's „Children Act" of 1984 provides that the judge must take into account[18]:

- the views of the child;
- his/her physical, emotional, educational needs;
- the effect of change on the child;
- his/her age, sex and personality;
- the pains which he/she has already suffered or could suffer;
- the ability of each of the child's parents to meet the child's needs.

5. Conclusions

It is very important that any cause involving a child can find a solution best suited to the best interests of the child, so that his development will not suffer. It is also clear that the child must be heard, so the decision maker in question has an obligation to hear if the child is able to form and communicate his views if the case affects him.

Nevertheless, it is evident that the principle of the best interests of the child is one of the most important of the CRC, but, in the same time, it is the most difficult to explain.

We need to clarify this concept; we cannot deal only with the assumption that everyone is acting in the best interests of the child. If we do not clarify, it is possible to risk that this principle be emptied of content, legislative and social reality.

Also, we must consider another aspect: the potential impact on children of relevant legislation. Therefore, the State parties to the CRC have an obligation to take seriously their commitments.

And, above all, maybe it is the perfect time to keep in our minds the fact that, in the absence of the „authority of love", this principle and for sure the whole mechanism that turns the wheels of his profound understanding will become meaningless.

References

- Savatie Baștovoi, The price of love, Cathisma Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018;
- Cristiana-Mihaela Crăciunescu, The best interests of the child in in the exercise of parental authority exclusively by one of the parents, in Parental authority. Between greatness and decadence, Solomon Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018;
- Jean Zermatten, The Best Interests of the Child. Literal Analysis, Function and Implementation, Working Report, 2010, Institut International des Droit de l`Enfant;
- Géraldine Van Bueren, Pushing and pulling in different directions – The best interests of the child and the margin of appreciation of States, in Child Rights in Europe, Council of Europe, 2007;
- Pascal Pichonnaz, Le bien de l'enfant et les secondes familles (familles recomposées), in Le Bien de l'enfant, Verlag Ruegger, Zürich/Chur, 2003;
- Hugues Fulchiron, De l'intérêt de l'enfant aux droits de l'enfant in Une Convention, plusieurs regards. Les droits de l'enfant entre théorie et pratique, IDE, Sion, 1997;

[16] N. Bala, The best interests of the child in post-modern Era: a central but paradoxical Concept, in Law Society of Upper Canada, Special Lectures, 2001, quoted by J. Zermatten, op. cit., pages 18-19.

[17] See J. Zermatten, op. cit., page 19.

[18] Children Act, quoted by the Canada Justice Department (website: http://Canada.justicde.gc.ca), entry Child and Custody Access.

- Nicholas Bala, The best interests of the child in post-modern Era: a central but paradoxical Concept, in Law Society of Upper Canada, Special Lectures, 2001;
- CJEU, C-491/10 PPU, Joseba Andoni Aguirre Zarraga/Simone Pelz, 22.12.2010;
- ECHR, Case Maslov/Austria, no. 1638/0323, 23.06.2008;
- ECHR, Case A.M.M./Romania, no. 2151/10, 14.02.2012, points 58-65;
- https://www.ohchr.org/documents/professionalinterest/crc.pdf;
- https://resourcecentre.savethechildren.net/node/10263/pdf/gc8.pdf.
- Children Act, quoted by the Canada Justice Department (website: http://Canada.justicde.gc.ca), entry Child and Custody Access;

PARTICULARITIES AND PRACTICAL ISSUES OF THE COMPULSORY INSURANCE CONTRACT FOR MOTOR THIRD PARTY LIABILITY

Răducu Marian PETRESCU

Abstract

This paper aims at identifying and clarifying the legal regulations in the field of insurance. Starting from everything that means in practice as a whole, we need to mention from the outset that best practices are not mandatory or binding rules of law, they can not and will not be placed over the legal provisions in force but only can complete the law. Furthermore, we intend to analyze the implementation of Law no. 132/2017 on compulsory insurance against civil liability in respect of third party damage caused by vehicle and tramway accidents (published in OJ 431/2017) in the light of best practice in the field of insurance.

In this research, the main method of study was the theoretical qualitative research (especially the analysis of legal regulations) in order to identify and develop theoretically information on best practices in the field covered by the aforementioned normative acts.

The main research results are to identify the general issues that have been briefly presented and which could be the subject of practical situations in the field of compulsory motor third party liability insurance for third-party damage caused by vehicle and tramway accidents.

Keywords: insurance, insured, beneficiary, indemnity, non-use

1. Introduction

Law no. 132/2017 on compulsory insurance against civil liability in respect of damage to third parties by means of vehicle and tramway accidents (published in OJ No 431/2017) establishes the persons required to conclude MTPL contracts and the exceptions to this obligation, the territorial application limits , the liability limits, the obligations of the insured, the obligations of the MTPL insurer, the risks covered and the exclusions, the elements regarding the establishment and payment of the indemnities, the verification of the MTPL insurance, the facilities and penalties applicable to the insurers and the insurers as well as the organization and functioning of the Romanian Motor Insurers' Bureau (hereinafter referred to as BAAR).

In addition, the provisions of the A.S.F. no. 20/2017 on motor insurance in Romania (published in Government Gazette No. 624/2017) and RCA / 2017 Guide.

From the broad field of Law no. 132/2017 and the related regulations, we intend to present some features of the compulsory motor third party liability insurance contract (hereinafter referred to as RCA).

1.1. Common insurance law.

According to the Civil Code, under the insurance contract, the insurance contractor or the insured undertakes to pay a premium to the insurer, and the latter undertakes to pay an indemnity, if the insured person, the beneficiary of the insurance or the third party (Article 2129 paragraph 1 of the Civil Code).

The insurance contract is based on three important principles: the principle of compensation (within the limits of the damage suffered by the insured); the principle of insured interest (determined by the relationship between the person and the good or the damaging event); the principle of subrogation (the insurer substitutes in all the rights of the insured against those responsible for causing the damage)[1].

The insurance contract is subject to the law in force at the date of the conclusion of the insurance policy, the insurance certificate or the cover note, as the case may be (Article 146 of Law No. 71/2011).

According to its subject matter, insurances are divided into: goods insurance, personal insurance and civil liability insurance. Property and liability insurance are insurances (damages) and consequently are indemnifying.

Liability insurance concerns the amount of compensation to be paid by the insured in consequence of the damage caused to a third party (eg compensation due to third parties injured by motor vehicle accidents)[2]. Thus, the insurer undertakes to pay compensation for the damage that the insured person is liable to according to the law against the third persons injured and for the costs incurred by the insured in the civil process (Article 2223 paragraph 1 C. civ.).

In the insurance contract, the parties may agree to include in the insurance and civil liability of persons other than the insurance contractor (Article 2223 paragraph 2 C. civ.).

The rights of injured third parties are exercised against those responsible for causing the damage.

[1] See V. Nemeş, Insurance Law, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012, p. 15

[2] See V. Ciurel, Insurance and Reinsurance: International Theoretical and Practical Approaches, Ed. All Beck, Bucharest, 2000, p. 47

The insurer may be sued by the injured party within the limits of his obligations under the insurance contract.

Unless otherwise provided by law, compensation shall be determined by a convention concluded between the insured person, the injured third party and the insured person or, in case of misunderstanding, by a court order (Article 2225 C. civ.).

1.2. Definition, competence and parts of the CAR.

The natural or legal persons - owners of vehicles subject to registration or registration in Romania (as well as trams), are obliged to insure for the cases of civil liability as a result of the damages caused by vehicle accidents.

Vehicle means means of transport with or without propulsion for landing, including any type of trailer, whether or not coupled, for which there is a legal obligation to register or register in Romania, except for those traveling on rails other than trams, bicycles or animal tractors (Article 2 (27) of the Act).

Vehicle accident means an event involving at least one vehicle resulting in material damage and / or injury to the health and bodily integrity or death of one or more persons (Article 2 (1) of the Act)

Ensuring the above persons is done through the RCA contract.

According to art. 4 of the Act, those who use vehicles exclusively for training, racing, competitions or rallies legally organized (but can be provided on a voluntary basis) are not required to conclude an RCA contract.

Territorial, RCA operates on:

a) the territory of Romania;
b) the territories of the Member States of the European Union, the States Parties to the ESAA and the territory of the Swiss Confederation;
c) the territories of the States directly linking two Member States (where there is no national auto-office);
d) the territories of the States where the national auto offices are competent.

The parties to the RCA contract are the insured and the insurer.

The RCA insurer is the owner or user of a vehicle or a tram whose tort or delict is contractually acquired for damages caused to third parties. The law distinguishes between the insured (in general) and the high-risk insured - the person who, based on the classification in the risk classes, for which at least 3 RCA insurers offer a premium rate N times higher than the reference price calculated by BAAR 2 (5) of the Act). The RCA insurer is the legal entity authorized to "practice" RCA insurance. BAAR is a professional association of all insurance companies that have the right to practice compulsory motor third party liability insurance in Romania. Other topics covered by the RCA contract are: - the contractor is the person who concludes the MTPL and who undertakes to pay the insurance premium; - the correspondent is the person representing one or more foreign insurers, members of other national auto bureaux, for the settlement of damages claims by road accident victims produced on Romanian territory; - the trustee any natural or legal person empowered under the law to represent the interests of the injured party in its relations with the insurer and the auto repair unit; - the person injured is the person entitled to compensation for the damage suffered; - the user is a natural or legal person to whom the owner of the vehicle grants him the right to use it in accordance with the law.

1.3. Content, duration and RCA limits.

The RCA contract includes: the number and date of the conclusion of the contract, the parts of the MTPL contract, the validity period, the maximum liability limits of the MTPL insurer, the insurance premium, the number and maturity of the installments, the intermediary, the bonnet, the registration number and the vehicle identification number, as well as the countries in which the contract is valid.

In terms of form, the insurance contract has a consensual character and, therefore, no form of ad validity is required.

Ad probationem, the insurance must be written in writing (regardless of the amount of the insurance premium or indemnity).

In principle, witness evidence is not admitted "even when there is a beginning of written proof" (Article 2200 paragraph 1 C. civ.). As an exception, if the insurance documents have disappeared through force majeure or fortuitous circumstances and there is no possibility of obtaining a duplicate, their existence and content can be proven by any means of proof.

The insurance sample is made with the insurance contract (in the sense of the instrument) or with the insurance policy.

According to art. 2 point 21 of the law, the RCA insurance policy is the document by which "the MTPL insurance contract is concluded" and "certifies the existence of civil liability insurance for third party injuries caused by vehicle and tramway accidents".

The insurance policy must include at least: the name or the name, domicile or headquarters of the contracting parties (as well as the name of the beneficiary of the insurance, if he is not a party to the contract); subject of insurance; the risks to be assured; the moment of commencement and the end of liability of the insurer; insurance premiums; the amounts insured (Article 2201 paragraph 1 C. civ.). Other elements that the insurance policy must include may be established by rules adopted by the competent state bodies (Article 2201 paragraph 2 C. civ.).

The RCA contract ends for a period of one month to 12 months (multiple times a month).

As an exception, the RCA contract can be concluded for less than a month:

a) for vehicles registered in other EEA and EC Member States for a maximum period of 30 days from the date of acquisition of the property;

b) for vehicles intended for export, for a maximum period of 30 days;
c) for vehicles which are provisionally authorized for use for periods of 30 days.

The minimum liability limits covered by MTPL insurance are:
a) for material damage caused in an accident, irrespective of the number of injured persons, the limit of compensation is set at EUR 1,220,000 (equivalent in lei at the NBR exchange rate);
b) for injuries and deaths in an accident, irrespective of the number of injured persons, the limit of compensation is 6,070,000 euros (equivalent in lei at the NBR exchange rate).

The liability limits are revised from 5 to 5 years, depending on the evolution of the European Consumer Price Index (IEPC).

1.4. Obligations of the RCA insured

As a primary obligation, the insured must pay the insurance premium to the MTPL insurer under the terms of the law and the insurance contract.

The insured must notify the RCA insurer of the acidity production within 5 business days of the event (Article 15 (1) of the Act).

At the same time, the insured person provides the RCA insurer with information on the causes and circumstances of the accident and the documents necessary for the case.

The insured must notify the RCA insurer of the following:
a) the injured party has requested indemnification from the insurer;
b) informs the RCA insurer of the proceedings against him;
c) exercise of the right to compensation at a court by the injured party;
d) the changes made in the RCA contract during its execution.

According to art. 16 of the law, the insured is obliged to submit to the injured party (at his / her request) data on:
a) the name, surname and address of the person who has driven the insured vehicle at the time of the accident;
b) name, surname and address or name, headquarters of the contractor or insured person;
c) the name, the seat of the RCA insurer, the serial number and the RCA contract number, and the registration number of the insured vehicle (or identification number).

In the case of material damage, insured persons may also inform the insurance, based on a standard form, called "amicable accident finding", in which the drivers of the vehicles concerned inform information about the circumstances of the accident (Article 17 paragraph 1 of the Act). The conditions for the use of the standard form are set by the regulations of A.S.F., in accordance with O.U.G. no. 195/2002 on the circulation on public roads, republished, as subsequently amended and supplemented.

In the event of injury, the injured person may address (for the repair) to any self repairing unit "without any restriction or constraint on the part of the RCA insurer or the auto repair unit that could influence its option" (Art. 6 pt. 8 of the law).

During the course of the contract, the insured has the obligation to allow the RCA insurer access to the compulsory motor third party liability insurance database in Romania and to provide the information for the risk assessment and calculation of the insurance premium.

The insured has the obligation to inform the RCA insurer about the conclusion of other RCA contracts with other RCA insurers and may opt for the maintenance of a single contract. The right of option is exercised only once a year (Article 8 paragraph 3 of the Act).

In addition to the above obligations, the parties may also agree to include additional clauses. Exceptions are clauses that may restrict the rights of the injured party.

1.5. Obligations of the RCA insurer.

At the conclusion of the contract, the RCA insurers request the necessary data for the assessment and verify the correctness of the vehicle identification and technical data, the owner / user's data (Article 4 paragraph 2 of the Act).

As a primary obligation, the insurer must, as at the insured risk, pay the indemnity to the injured third party, under the terms of the law and the insurance contract.

Where, for the same vehicle, there were several valid RCA contracts, the compensation shall be paid in equal parts by all RCA insurers (Article 9 (1) of the Act).

According to art. 5 of the Law, the RCA insurer shall be liable for damages caused to third parties by vehicle and tram accident as well as for the expenses incurred by them in the civil process in relation to:
a) the level required by the law of the State in which the accident occurred;
b) the level imposed by the Romanian legislation, if the injured persons are citizens of some Member States (according to the law).

Compensation is equal to the extent of the damage, but up to the maximum liability limit of the MTPL insurer (which is equal to the highest of the liability limit provided by the applicable law).

The insurance premium is calculated by the insurer so as to cover all contractual obligations (Article 18 (1) of the Act). In the calculation of the premium rate, the RCA insurers may use risk criteria, load indices, increase and / or correction coefficients, or other tariff adjustment instruments established by A.S.F regulations (Article 18 (3) of the Act).

For the calculation of the insurance premium, the RCA insurer may take into account the history of claims paid in the last 5 years for accidents caused by the insured vehicle.

The RCA insurer has the obligation to inform policyholders about the calculation of the insurance premium.

RCA insurers (and their intermediaries) are required to inform policyholders about termination of the MTPL and the possibility of renewal (30 days before the termination of the contract). According to art. 18 point 9 of the law, the RCA insurer has the obligation to communicate to ASF the following data: a) the method of determining the insurance premium; b) statistical data on the basis of which the insurance premium is established; c) the actuarial ratio underlying the determination of the premium rate; (d) any other information concerning the method of calculation of the insurance premium.

According to the law, RCA insurers assume responsibility for all contracts (including those granted by BAAR).

The liability of the RCA insurer begins:

a) the day following the previous CARR, for the insured who signs a new insurance, at the latest on the last day of the previous contract;
b) the day following the day on which the MTPL contract was concluded for persons who did not have prior insurance;
c) from the date of issue of the insurance contract, but not earlier than the date of entry into force of the provisional registration or registration of the vehicle.

In order to maintain the bonus class, the parties may agree to the redemption or the bearing by the policyholder of the compensation corresponding to the event.

1.6. Suspension, termination and termination of the RCA contract.

At the insured's request, the RCA contract may be suspended during the period of suspension of the vehicle's right to drive in accordance with the law or during the immobilisation of the vehicle (but with the obligation to submit the license plates to the authority that issued it)[3]. The suspension procedure and the immobilization cases are established by common regulations of MAI, M.T., A.S.F. and MDRAPFE (Article 4 paragraph 6 of the Act).

During the suspension of the RCA contract, the insured has the obligation to immobilize the vehicle in a private area outside the public domain.

The non-fulfillment of the above obligation is assimilated to the breach of the insurance obligation and the non-fulfillment of the obligation to submit the license plates and shall be sanctioned in contraventional terms.

According to art. 7 of the law, the RCA contract ceases:

a) the date on which the owner of the vehicle notifies the RCA insurer of the transfer of ownership of the vehicle, together with supporting documents;
b) the date on which the vehicle is out of circulation;
c) at the time specified in the RCA contract.

According to art. 8 of the law, the RCA contract is abolished by law when:

a) the insured risk occurred (or became impossible to produce) before the insurer's obligation arises;
b) the production of the risk became impossible after the insurer's obligation was born.

When the policyholder has paid the insurance premium, he can recover it proportionally to the unexpired period of the MTPL contract if no compensation is due for events occurring during the insurance period.

When the RCA insurer is subsequently required to pay compensation for events covered by the RCA contract, the RCA insurer is entitled to recover from the insured the insurance premium returned to him on request.

3. Conclusions

Analyzing from the perspective of the insurance field, the compulsory insurance of civil liability for damages caused to third parties through vehicle and tram accident, we have come to the conclusion that the proper understanding and application of the legal regulations in force lead to stability of this sector, and how much the entities that develop such activities respect good practices that serve the interests of those who make such insurance. Understanding customer needs, managing properly, delivering the best services, constantly consulting and increasing transparency will clearly lead to higher professional standards and, implicitly, to avoiding legal issues.

References

- V. Ciurel, Insurance and Reinsurance: International Theoretical and Practical Approaches, Ed. All Beck, Bucharest, 2000;
- V. Nemeş, Insurance Law, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012;
- L. Stănciulescu, Civil Contract Law, Ed Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2017;
- Civil Code (Law 289/2009);
- Law no. 132/2017 on compulsory insurance against civil liability in respect of damage to third parties by means of vehicle and tramway accidents (published in the Official Gazette No. 431/2017);

[3] See L. Stănciulescu, Civil Contract Law, Ed Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2017, p. 492

CONTROVERSIES REGARDING THE ARBITRAL INSTITUTION DESIGNATED BY SUB-CLAUSE 20.6 OF FIDIC CONDITIONS OF CONTRACT TO ADMINISTER THE ARBITRAL CASES RESULTED FROM EXECUTION OF PUBLIC WORKS UNDER THE ROMANIAN LAW

Cristian Răzvan RUGINĂ[*]

Abstract

From 2010 to 2017 the execution of public works in Romania took place by virtue of the General Conditions of Contract of FIDIC Yellow Book or Red Book approved by Government Decision no. 1405/2010. In 2011 the Romanian Ministry of Transportation and Infrastructure issued Order no. 146/2011 whereby it approved standard forms of Particular Conditions of Contract, Appendix to Tender and Contract Agreement for execution of such public works. In particular, the Appendix to Tender modified the provisions of Sub-Clause 20.6 regarding the arbitral institution empowered to administer the disputes resulted from public procurement contracts based on FIDIC Conditions of Contract. The mention included in the Appendix to Tender in this regard referred to "the Court of International Commercial Arbitration", apparently an incomplete reference to the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania. Encouraged by a subjective interpretation of the contractual provisions, a significant number of contractors submitted their disputes with the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania to the ICC International Court of Arbitration. Recently, the Bucharest Court of Appeals decided that this approach was wrong, setting aside the final partial awards issued under the auspices of the ICC International Court of Arbitration. In an attempt to clarify which arbitral institution has jurisdiction to administer such arbitral cases, this paper analyzes the controversial contractual provisions, the soundness of the various interpretation and arguments brought by the involved parties under the rules of interpretation provided by the Romanian Law and internationally applicable custom in arbitration, and the recent jurisprudence of Romanian Courts related to this matter.

Keywords: arbitration, jurisdiction, the Court of International Commercial Arbitration, FIDIC, public works, G.D. no. 1405/2010, Order no. 146/2011, Sub-Clause 20.6, Appendix to Tender

1. Introduction

The Government Decision no. 1405/2010 regarding the approval for the use of some conditions of contract of the International Federation of Consulting Engineers (FIDIC) for the investment objectives from the field of transportation infrastructure of national interest financed by public funds ("G.D. no. 1405/2010") imposed to all the units subordinated or under the authority of the Ministry of Transportation and Infrastructure, including the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania, the obligation to apply the General Conditions of Contract of FIDIC Yellow Book or Red Book to the execution of public works. G.D. no. 1405/2010 entered into force on 20 January 2011.

Taking over the wording of the standard ICC arbitration clause, Sub-Clause 20.6 of both FIDIC Books approved by G.D. no. 1405/2010 reads [...]:

„Unless otherwise agreed by both Parties:

(a) the dispute shall be finally settled under the Rules of Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce.

(b) The dispute shall be settled by three arbitrators appointed in accordance with these Rules [...]."

On 1 March 2011, the Ministry of Transportation and Infrastructure issued Order no. 146/2011 regarding the approval of particular conditions of contract for plant and design build, and for building and engineering works designed by the employer of the International Federation of Consulting Engineers (FIDIC) for the investment objectives from the field of transportation road infrastructure of national interest financed by public funds ("Order no. 146/2011"), whereby it approved standard forms of Particular Conditions of Contract, Appendix to Tender and Contract Agreement for execution of public works. Order no. 146/2011 entered into force on 17 March 2011.

Whilst Sub-Clause 20.6 of the particular conditions of contract remained unchanged, reiterating the wording provided for that sub-clause by the General Conditions of Contract of FIDIC Yellow and Red Books as approved by G.D. no. 1405/2010, the classic form of the Appendix to Tender provided by FIDIC was amended by Order no. 146/2011, being added supplementary information fields regarding the number of arbitrators (1), arbitration language (Romanian), seat of arbitration (Bucharest) and arbitral institution (the Court of International Commercial Arbitration, apparently an incomplete reference to the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania).

[*] PhD Candidate Faculty of law, Nicolae Titulescu University, e-mail: razvanrugina@gmail.com

The modification of the arbitration clause comprised by General Conditions of Contract and Particular Conditions of Contract by the Appendix to Tender created a lot of confusion in the community of construction law practitioners with regard to the arbitral institution designated to administer the arbitral cases under G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011, and the rules which should be used for the appointment of arbitrators and settlement of such cases by an arbitral tribunal.

There were two (2) main approaches of this matter to date, both being based exclusively on arguments related to interpretation of contracts and priority of contractual documents. Whilst a part of the construction community interpreted the provisions of Sub-Clause 20.6 of G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 in the sense that the ICC International Court of Arbitration would be the arbitral institution designated to administer arbitral cases resulted from execution of public works in Romania, the other part considered that that institution would be the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania.

In an attempt to clarify which arbitral institution has jurisdiction to administer such arbitral cases, this research focuses on the analysis of the legal framework in effect at the moment when G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 were issued by the Romanian Government, which suggests that the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania is actually the arbitral institution contemplated by the aforementioned enactments, yet for different reasons than those expressed within the community of construction law practitioners and by the Courts to date.

2. Actual perspectives on interpretation of Sub-Clause 20.6 of G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011

2.1. Arguments in favor of the jurisdiction of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania (The Theory of Hybrid Clause)

Under the Theory of Hybrid Clause[1] it was considered that the mention regarding the arbitral institution comprised into the Appendix to Tender denotes a clear intention to modify the said institution to administer the arbitral cases resulted from the contract.

In this respect it was argued that a corroborated reading of the provisions of Sub-Clause 20.6 included into the Appendix to Tender with the provisions of the same Sub-Clause of the General and Particular Conditions of Contract would take to the conclusion that the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania is the arbitral institution which should administer the arbitral cases under G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011, by using the rules of another institution, i.e. the ICC International Court of Arbitration.

However, having in mind that at the beginning of 2012 the International Chamber of Commerce issued a new version of its Arbitration Rules, expressly providing, inter alia, that: „The Court is the only body authorized to administer arbitrations under the Rules [...]"[2], it was concluded that since the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania cannot use the ICC Rules anymore, it would become applicable its own rules.

2.2. Arguments in favor of the jurisdiction of the ICC International Court of Arbitration (The Theory of Semantics.)

On a different note, the supporters of the Theory of Semantics[3] considered that the mention regarding the arbitral institution included into the Appendix to Tender did not modified but completed the provisions of Sub-Clause 20.6 comprised into the General and Particular Conditions of Contract.

In this regard it was contended that, since there are a lot of Courts of International Commercial Arbitration worldwide, a reference to a "Court of International Commercial Arbitration" alone, such as the one comprised by the Appendix to Tender, would not provide sufficient information to accurately identify one arbitral institution or another, from Romania or from another country, so that the said reference cannot be construed in any case to be a reference to the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania.

It was also argued that as long as the documents forming the Contract are to be taken as mutually explanatory of one another, and the Appendix to Tender did not modify the applicable Rules for appointment of arbitrators and for procedure to be followed during the arbitral case provided by Sub-Clause 20.6 of the General and Particular Conditions of Contract, the „real intention of the parties" resulting from interpretation of the contract provisions as a whole would have been to submit their disputes resulted from such contracts governed by G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 to the ICC International Court of Arbitration,

[1] The name of the theory was given by the author for an easier reference to the arguments grouped under this theory

[2] Art. 1 – International Court of Arbitration, para. 2) of the 2012 Rules of Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce (the provision was maintained in the latest version of the Rules of Arbitration of International Chamber of Commerce issued in 2017)

[3] The name of the theory was given by the author for an easier reference to the arguments grouped under this theory

i.e. „the only body authorized to administer arbitrations under the Rules [...].”[4]

Another argument brought in favor of the jurisdiction of the ICC International Court of Arbitration was that the contracts governed by G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 are at the end of the day FIDIC Conditions of Contract. Therefore, except the case when the Appendix to Tender would have actually modified the General and Particular Conditions of Contract, the international contractors - professional users of FIDIC Conditions of Contract – would have been entitled to believe that when they concluded such contracts of public works with the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania, the disputes resulted thereafter shall be referred to the ICC International Court of Arbitration, in accordance with the international custom and the applicable Rules of the ICC.

2.3. Actual jurisprudence of the arbitral tribunals regarding the jurisdiction

Based on the Theory of Semantics a significant number of contractors submitted their disputes with the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania to the ICC International Court of Arbitration. In the majority of cases the Arbitral Tribunals constituted under the Rules of the ICC International Court embraced the arguments brought under the Theory of Semantics and retained the arbitral cases for settlement.

For instance, in an Award on Jurisdiction issued in 2017 (unpublished), an Arbitral Tribunal concluded:

“The effective contextual and systematic interpretation of the Appendix, considering all other contractual documents and the hierarchy of documents agreed by the Parties, leads the Tribunal to find that the reference in the Appendix can be interpreted as being consistent with the arbitration agreement in the Contract of the Parties. Consequently, Sub-Clause 20.6 has not been amended by the Appendix and clearly refers disputes to be resolved under the auspices of the International Court of Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce.

Since the arbitration agreement refers disputes to the ICC for resolution and this Tribunal has been validly constitute under ICC Rules it does have jurisdiction to resolve this dispute [...].”

The same approach of retaining for settlement the arbitral cases related to contracts governed by G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 was adopted by the Arbitral Tribunals constituted under the Rules of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, which, based on the arguments brought under the Theory of Hybrid Clause, decided that they have full jurisdiction to settle the arbitral cases received so far, by using its own Arbitration Rules.

In this regard, in an Arbitral Decision issued in 2018 (unpublished), an Arbitral Tribunal constituted under the Rules of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania concluded:

“Therefore, having in mind:

- the provisions of art. 6 (1) of the Rules of arbitral procedure of Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, in force at the date of the request for arbitration referral (“Rules of arbitral procedure”), which provides that they are applicable whenever an arbitration is lodged to the Court, and
- the provisions of art. 6 (3) of the Rules of arbitral procedure, according to whom, in the situation in which the Parties opted for the application by the Court of the whole package of procedural norms of another court of arbitration, their applicability is possible only if the said norms do not explicitly forbid this, by reference to
- the provisions of art. 1 (2) of the Rules of arbitral procedure of the ICC International Court of Arbitration,
- the Arbitral Tribunal concludes that the parties’ will, by the last modification brought to the arbitral convention in Sub-Clause 20.6 of the Particular Conditions of Contract[5], was in the sense of application of the Rules of arbitral procedure in settlement of the disputes between them […].”

2.4. Recent jurisprudence of the Romanian Courts regarding the jurisdiction

The arbitral cases we hereby referred to are still ongoing, so that there are not too many final awards issued to date.

Yet, there are a limited number of arbitral cases in which the Arbitral Tribunals constituted under the Rules of Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce issued several final partial awards whereby the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania has been ordered to comply with the Dispute Adjudication Boards’ decisions.

In two (2) such cases[6] the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania requested to the Bucharest Court of Appeals to set aside the final partial awards:

In 2018 the Bucharest Court of Appeals decided in both cases to set aside the final partial awards, considering that the arbitral tribunals were not constituted in accordance with the arbitral agreement of the parties, and that the institution which has jurisdiction to settle the disputes resulted from

[4] Art. 1 – International Court of Arbitration, para. 2) of the 2012 Rules of Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce (the provision was maintained in the latest version of the Rules of Arbitration of International Chamber of Commerce issued in 2017)

[5] It is noteworthy that pursuant to Order no. 146/2011, the Appendix to Tender is part of the Particular Conditions of Contract

[6] In this respect please refer to Court case no. 3261/2/2017 - National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania v. Salini Impregilo S.p.A. (regarding the final partial awards issued in the ICC case no. 21328/MHM/2015); and Court case no. 5771/2/2017* - National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania v. JV Teloxim Con SRL - SC Comsa SA - Aldesa Construcciones SA - SC Arcadis Eurometudes SA (regarding the final partial awards issued in the ICC case no. 21466/MHM (c.21775/MHM)).

performance of the contracts concluded under G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 is the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania.

In deciding so the Bucharest Court of Appeals reasoned that[7]:

"The Court concludes that, by indication of an arbitral institution in the Appendix to Tender ("the Court of International Commercial Arbitration"), the parties understood to modify the arbitral institution chosen by the contract, having in mind the provisions of art. 1268 para. 3 of the Civil Code, pursuant to which "the clauses are interpreted in the sense in which they may produce effects, and not in that in which they would produce none" as well as the fact that the Appendix to tender prevails over the Particular Conditions of Contract.

This interpretation respects also article 978 of the Civil Code which provides that, when a clause has two meanings, it will be interpreted "in accordance with the meaning which may produce an effect, and not in accordance with the no-effect meaning." The defendant's interpretation with regard to the terms "the Court of International Commercial Arbitration" removes any effect of these terms, because it would simply confirm a reference to the ICC arbitration already existent in Sub-Clause 20.6 of the Particular Conditions of Contract.

The Court acknowledges that the name of the institution utilized in the Romanian version of the Appendix to Tender "the Court of International Commercial Arbitration" is almost identical with the official name of the arbitral forum attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Bucharest, Romania.

Moreover, having in mind that the contract language is Romanian, that the language applicable to the procedure is Romanian, that the substantive law is Romanian, and that the election of the city of Bucharest, Romania, as the seat of arbitration, the Court appreciates that election of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania is understandable from the perspective of the relationship of the contract with Romania [...].

Therefore, the Court acknowledges that the arbitral institution indicated in the Appendix to Tender refers to the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania from Bucharest, and not to the International Chamber of Commerce - International Court of Arbitration (ICC), so that the arbitral tribunal was not constituted in accordance with the arbitral agreement of the parties, the reason provided by art. 608 para. 1, letter c) invoked by the plaintiff being grounded."

Even though both aforementioned decisions of the Bucharest Court of Appeals were not final and they could have been appealed at the High Court of Cassation and Justice, only in Court case no. 3261/2/2017 the defendant decided to file such an appeal. This appeal is currently pending.

Confronted with the aforementioned jurisprudence of the Bucharest Court of Appeals, another contractor which submitted its disputes with the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania to the ICC International Court of Arbitration based on the same reasons of semantics and has its arbitral case pending, vested the Bucharest Tribunal with a request to issue an injunction "to remove the hindrance occurred with regards to the permanent arbitral institution which must administer the arbitral case" and to decide that the ICC International Court of Arbitration is the right arbitral institution to administer its case[8]. The Bucharest Tribunal admitted this request for injunction.

