The draft of the withdrawal agreement contains dispositions regarding the recognition of the professional qualifications done before the end of the transition period, which "shall maintain its effects in the respective State, including the right to pursue their profession under the same conditions as its nationals[2], where such recognition was made in accordance" with the Directive 2005/36/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 7 September 2005 on the recognition of professional qualifications, Directive 98/5/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 February 1998 to facilitate practice of the profession of lawyer on a permanent basis in a Member State other than that in which the qualification was obtained, Directive 2006/43/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 17 May 2006 on statutory audits of annual accounts and consolidated accounts, amending Council Directives 78/660/EEC and 83/349/EEC and repealing Council Directive 84/253/EEC and the Council Directive 74/556/EEC of 4 June 1974 laying down detailed provisions concerning transitional measures relating to activities, trade in and distribution of toxic products and activities entailing the professional use of such products including activities of intermediaries.

Ongoing procedures on the recognition of professional qualifications will be solved according to the European law mentioned above.

Nowadays, according with the withdrawal draft agreement, the rules regarding the recognition of the professional qualifications are the following:

"As of the withdrawal date, United Kingdom nationals will be third country nationals and hence Directive 2005/36/EC no longer applies to them. It follows that:

- The recognition of professional qualifications of United Kingdom nationals in an EU-27 Member State will be governed by the national policies and rules of that Member State, irrespective of whether the qualifications of the United Kingdom national were obtained in the United Kingdom, in another third country or in an EU-27 Member State.
- The temporary or occasional provision of services by United Kingdom nationals in an EU-27 Member State, even if they are already legally established in an EU-27 Member State will be governed by the national policies and rules of that Member State.

Concerning EU-27 nationals, qualifications obtained in the United Kingdom (hereafter "UK professional qualifications") as of the withdrawal date are third country qualifications for the purpose of EU law. Recognition of such a qualification is no longer covered by the recognition regime of Directive 2005/36/EC (both in respect of EU citizens and of United Kingdom nationals) but, in accordance with Article 2(2) of Directive 2005/36/EC, the recognition will be governed by the national policies and rules of each of the EU-27 Member States."[3]

For the UK's Government, "The proposed new system of recognition of professional qualifications will:

- Protect recognition decisions that have already made; allow applications for recognition which have been made before exit to be concluded under the same rules as far as possible; and allow individuals to complete temporary and occasional service provision which started before exit.
- Retain a general system for recognition where UK regulators will be required to recognise EEA and Swiss qualifications which are of an equivalent standard to UK qualifications in scope, content and level.
- No longer include certain obligations on regulators such as offering compensation measures, partial access and temporary and occasional provision of services. However, it will leave regulators with the discretion to decide how to treat non-equivalent EEA or Swiss qualifications.
- Correct deficiencies in the Regulation of Professional Qualifications Regulations so that the system that is being retained can still function effectively and professionals will retain a route for recognition of their professional qualification"[4].

In the same way, "EEA lawyers will be able to practise in England and Wales under the regulatory arrangements and rules that apply to lawyers from other third countries. However, this change will mean:

- EEA and Swiss lawyers will no longer be able to provide legal activities normally reserved to advocates, barristers or solicitor under their home state professional title in England/Wales and Northern Ireland. (Reserved activities are: the exercise of a right of audience, the conduct of litigation, reserved instrument activities (conveyancing), probate activities, notarial activities and the administration of oaths)
- EEA and Swiss lawyers will no longer be able to seek admittance to the English/Welsh or Northern Irish profession based on experience"[5].

In Romania if the no deal scenario applies, the recognition of professional qualifications will be done considering the status of British citizens – if they obtain or not a legal status like the EU27 citizens[6]. As already mentioned, the Romanian competent authorities will continue to recognize the decisions pronounced before 29 March 2019 and the ongoing procedures will be solved according to the EU law in this matter[7].

The Directive 2005/36/EC has introduced three systems of the recognition of the professional qualifications in order to exercise a regulated profession in a Member State[8] but only for seven professions there are specific provisions included for the harmonisation of the training at the level of all Member States; the qualifications for these professions are automatically recognised by the competent authorities of the Member States whereas the qualifications for the other regulated professions are recognized on the general system of recognition or on the automatic recognition of the experience mentioned by the Directive. Considering the exercise of the internal competence of the Union in this domain we appreciate that an external competence could be allowed at supranational level[9]; that can be a reason for accepting this kind of external competence. Apart from that, the shared competences between EU and Member States are defined as exclusive competencies based on their exercise while the exclusive competences mentioned by the art. 3 TEU – Treaty on the European Union are defined as exclusive competencies based on their nature[10].

In this context, if a withdrawal agreement will be concluded, "During any implementation period, arrangements would be put in place with partner countries so that the UK is treated as an EU member state for the purposes of international agreements, including trade agreements…In the event of a 'no deal', there will be no implementation period. In this scenario, the government (UK) will seek to bring into force bilateral UK-third country agreements from exit day, or as soon as possible thereafter…In the event of a 'no deal', EU trade agreements will cease to apply to the UK when we leave the EU. Our intention (UK's Government) is that the effects of new bilateral agreements will be identical to, or substantially the same as, the EU agreements they replace."[11].

The withdrawal agreement doesn't contain any disposition regarding the provision of the professional services, which will be regulated through a possible separate international agreement between European Union and United Kingdom.

This kind of agreement will be negotiated and concluded by the EU in the field of the common commercial policy which is included into the exclusive competence of the Union according with the art.3 para.1 letter (e) of the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union or with para. 2[12]: "The Union shall also have exclusive competence for the conclusion of an international agreement when its conclusion is provided for in a legislative act of the Union or is necessary to enable the Union to exercise its internal competence, or in so far as its conclusion may affect common rules or alter their scope".

2.2. Provisions of services

The provision of services is regulated at the EU level through the Directive 2006/123/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December 2006 on services in the internal market[13] which "establishes general provisions facilitating the exercise of the freedom of establishment for service providers and the free movement of services, while maintaining a high quality of services" (art. 1.1)[14].

Regarding the application of this Directive, the UK Government informs the citizens that "UK businesses providing services in the EEA would no longer be covered by the EU Services Directive. As a result, countries in the EEA could treat them in the same way as they treat third country service providers. In many EEA countries, the regime for third countries has different requirements. This could result in additional legal and administrative barriers for UK firms, such as requirements based on nationality, re-submitting information to regulators and potential loss of access to any online portal to complete mandatory applications and licenses where this is only available to EEA nationals"[15]. Also, "when the UK leaves the EU, EEA businesses will be treated like other third country service providers as the Regulations will need to be amended to comply with the UK's commitments under World Trade Organisation rules"[16].

The document „Internal EU27 preparatory discussions on the framework for the future relationship: "Mobility" elaborated by the European Commission, Task Force for the Preparation and Conduct of the Negotiations with the United Kingdom under Article 50 TEU and presented by the Council at Brussels, 21 February 2018 mentioned the implications for mobility regarding Schengen border crossing, Visa regime, Migration, Trade in services (mobility related aspects), Social security coordination. The main consequence of the UK withdrawal is the "GATS fall-back" which supposes:

"Professional mobility remains possible for service providers falling within the Mode 4[17] categories defined in GATS, for the sectors covered

- For those persons, labour market tests ("economic needs tests") and numerical restrictions could be partially avoided
- Service suppliers and their employers do not benefit from social security coordination or any right to equal treatment
- Labour market rules of individual Member States apply in full
- Lack of recognition (e.g. of qualifications) may imply supply of a service only possible based on host state qualifications
- Mobility of persons not fitting within GATS follows the regime applicable to third-country nationals — partly harmonised (for transferees) and partly set by individual Member States."

GATS does not covered: "Recently recognised categories of skilled service providers (trainees, independent professionals, various short-term business visitors); Service providers with low- and medium-level qualifications; Subcontracting or employment-agency type work; Anyone who is not a service provider or an investor (e.g. jobseekers, workers, students)".

3. International trade agreements

During the last years, the European Union started to negotiate international commercial agreements with third countries which have a developed economy such as the USA, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, Singapore etc. which include specific provisions on the professional services; these agreements strengthen the EU economic position worldwide and increase the growth and competitiveness at Internal Market level. "The EU wants to help the least-developed countries and others to boost their production, diversify their economy and infrastructure, and improve their governance. The EU's trade and development policy emphasises that these countries should have ownership of their own development strategies. They need to implement sound domestic policies and make necessary domestic reforms to stimulate trade and investment, ensure that the poor benefit from trade-led growth and make sure their development is for the long-term"[18].

In the field of the common commercial policy, "There are three main types of agreements:

1. Customs Unions
   - eliminate customs duties in bilateral trade

[13] The Directive has been transposed in Romania by the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 49/2009 approved by the Law no. 68/2010.

- remove or reduce customs tariffs in bilateral trade.

3. Partnership and Cooperation Agreements

- provide a general framework for bilateral economic relations
- leave customs tariffs as they are."[19]

Regarding the professional services and recognition of the professional qualification these agreements have included specific dispositions which stated that these aspects will be regulated by a future separated international agreement concluded by the Union. For example, the Free Trade Agreement between the European Union and the Republic of Singapore[20] mentions, in the article 8.16 Mutual Recognition of Professional Qualifications of the SECTION E Regulatory Framework Sub-Section 1 Provisions of General Application that "the relevant professional bodies in their respective territories to develop and provide a joint recommendation on mutual recognition to the Committee on Trade in Services, Investment and Government Procurement established" by the Agreement. "Such a recommendation shall be supported by evidence on:

a) the economic value of an envisaged an agreement on mutual recognition of professional qualifications (hereinafter referred to as "Mutual Recognition Agreement"); and
b) the compatibility of the respective regimes, i.e., the extent to which the criteria applied by each Party for the authorisation, licensing, operation and certification of entrepreneurs and service suppliers are compatible". After a specific verification of the conformity with the Agreement's provisions, "the Parties shall take necessary steps to negotiate, through their competent authorities or designees authorised by a Party, a Mutual Recognition Agreement".[21]

It is obvious that the Parties are European Union and the Republic of Singapore not the Member States and consequently the Union will conclude the Mutual Recognition Agreement with the Republic of Singapore not the Member States having as legal basis this exclusive competence of the Union for common commercial policy.

We appreciate that such exclusive competence in the field of mutual professional recognition can not be founded on an international trade agreement considering that at internal level this competence is shared with the Member States. The paragraph 6 of the art.207 of TFEU which establishes the uniform principles of the common commercial policy mentions very clear that "6. The exercise of the competences conferred by this Article in the field of the common commercial policy shall not affect the delimitation of competences between the Union and the Member States, and shall not lead to harmonisation of legislative or regulatory provisions of the Member States in so far as the Treaties exclude such harmonisation"; the fundamental principle of the EU – principle of conferral of the competences has priority against other specific policy rules of the Union.

On the Agreement mentioned above, the Court of Justice of the European Union stated in its Opinion no 2/15[22] which is the domain of the exclusive competence of the Union[23].

In the light of this Opinion, it seems that the Union could have the exclusive competence to conclude an international agreement on mutual recognition of professional qualifications. The Court did not pronounce on that specific topic which will be regulated in a future separate agreement but on a joint recommendation on the mutual recognition of professional qualifications which will be set up by the competent authorities in Singapore and European Union:

provisions referred to in paragraphs 258 to 267 and 269 to 273 of this opinion also fall within that competence, for the reason set out in the previous paragraph. The same is true of Chapter 17 of the envisaged agreement, in so far as it relates to the Committee on Trade in Goods, the Committee on Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures and the Committee on Customs."

"267. Chapter 8 of the envisaged agreement, which deals with services, establishment and electronic commerce, envisages, in Article 8.16, that the competent authorities in the European Union and in Singapore will develop a joint recommendation on the mutual recognition of professional qualifications and provide it to the Committee on Trade in Services, Investment and Government Procurement. That chapter also provides for cooperation regarding telecommunications (Article 8.48) and electronic commerce (Article 8.61)".

The Court's reference to a joint recommendation not to an international agreement is clear and entitles the Union and the Member States to conclude this agreement based on the recommendation (at the level of the European Union law, the recommendations are not mandatory acts according with the art. 288 TFEU).

A similar provision is included in the draft of the new Agreement with Chile[24] (SECTION B PROVISIONS OF GENERAL APPLICATION Article 5.4 Mutual Recognition of Professional Qualifications – art. 5.4 "3. On receipt of a joint recommendation, the [Committee] shall, within a reasonable time, review the joint recommendation with a view to determining whether it is consistent with this Agreement. 4. When, on the basis of the information provided for in paragraph 2, the joint recommendation has been found to be consistent with this Agreement, the Parties shall take necessary steps to negotiate, through their competent authorities or designees authorised by a Party, a Mutual Recognition Agreement"); "the EU and Chile concluded an Association Agreement in 2002, which includes a comprehensive Free Trade Agreement (FTA) that entered into force in February 2003 covering EU-Chile trade relations"[25].

"As a member of the EU, the UK currently participates in around 40 free trade agreements with over 70 countries. These free trade agreements cover a wide variety of relationships, including:

- Economic Partnership Agreements with developing nations
- Association Agreements, which cover broader economic and political cooperation
- trade agreements with countries that are closely aligned with the EU, such as Turkey and Switzerland
- more conventional free trade agreements"[26].

4. Future relationships between EU and UK

The article 50 of TEU mentions that the withdrawal agreement[27] will be negotiated and concluded "taking account of the framework for its future relationship with the Union"; this provision could determine the elaboration, at the same time, of two international agreements – the withdrawal agreement and the international agreement on the future relationship between UK and EU. In fact, both Parties did not work on such an approach[28] and it would be very difficult for the EU institutions to act on two directions for the first exit from the Union (the Greenland exit in 1984 had not had such major implications). In its Guidelines from 23 March 2018 "the European Council restates the Union's determination to have as close as possible a partnership with the UK in the future. Such a partnership should cover trade and economic cooperation as well as other areas, in particular the fight against terrorism and international crime, as well as security, defence and foreign policy… As regards the core of the economic relationship, the European Council confirms its readiness to initiate work towards a balanced, ambitious and wide-ranging free trade agreement (FTA) insofar as there are sufficient guarantees for a level playing field."[29] This kind of agreement would address the principal domains such as trade in goods, appropriate customs cooperation, trade in services and "access to public procurement markets, investments and protection of intellectual property rights". Also, "the future partnership should include ambitious provisions on movement of natural persons, based on full reciprocity and non-discrimination among Member Particular attention should be paid to safety guidelines, ensuring the existence of a supply of time-sensitive medical resources, protecting the rights of EU citizens involved in Euratom projects and clarifying the situation of property rights over facilities and resources housed by the withdrawing state".

This unfortunately will have negative economic consequences, in particular in the United Kingdom".

States, and related areas such as coordination of social security and recognition of professional qualifications"[30].

We appreciate that it is also possible that in the case of hard Brexit/no deal scenario, the future relationship between UK and EU should be formalised through an international trade agreement based on the existing models[31] because the Member States did not have competence to conclude international trade agreements with third countries considering the exclusive competence of EU in this matter. Moreover, "the EU has offered a Free Trade Agreement[32] with zero tariffs and no quantitative restrictions for goods. It proposed close customs and regulatory cooperation and access to public procurement markets, to name but a few examples"[33] and UK did not take a clear position on that suggestion of the EU. Concerning the application of the trade policy rules, "in the event that the UK leaves the EU without a deal, from 11pm GMT on 29 March 2019, many UK businesses will need to apply the same processes to EU trade that apply when trading with the rest of the world"[34].

Conclusions

At 21 March 2019, as reponse of the letter of the UK Prime-minister from 20 March 2019, "The European Council agrees to an extension until 22 May 2019, provided the Withdrawal Agreement is approved by the House of Commons next week. If the Withdrawal Agreement is not approved by the House of Commons next week, the European Council agrees to an extension until 12 April 2019". At 29 March, Members of the Parliament did not vote the Agreement negociated by the Prime-Minister.

In conclusion, the UK withdrawal could determine the elaboration of a new type of an international agreement; EU is competent for concluding such agreements in the field of common commercial policy including provisions on free movement of persons and services.

At the same time it seems to be obvious that the Court of Justice of the European Union did not state very clear on the possibility of the Union to conclude a separate agreement in the field of tjhe recognition of the professional qualifications which facilitates the provision of professional servicies. At this moment, the legal better solution could be the conclusion of a mixed agreementon considering the shared competence in the matter of Internal Market where the recognition of perofessional qualifications is included.

Also, it is possible that UK will benefit from a special treatment in relationship with EU leading to the elaboration of a new type of international agreement; it depends from the reaction of the EU traditional partners like the Member States of EEA or the new ones like Canada, Singapore etc.

The UK Government expresses its intention to continue allowing the same regime for the EU27 citizens as that before the withdrawal based on the principle of reciprocity. The application of the Directive 2005/36/EC continues to be very important for the UK authorities and in fact it seems to be obvious that the minimum training requirements for the seven regulated professions can not be changed neither in EU27 nor in the UK and the automatic recognition of those professional qualifications must be applied by both Parties.

THE PRINCIPLE OF PROPORTIONALITY, THE IMPLEMENTATION OF EU LAW, THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION. GENERAL AND PRELIMINARY ASPECTS

Oana ŞARAMET[*]

Abstract

Fundamental principle of EU law is governed, at present, by Article 5 (4) of the EU Treaty, as well as Article 5 from the Protocol no 2 of the Lisbon Treaty, the Protocol on the application of the principle of subsidiarity and proportionality. This principle implies that the content and form of Union action shall not go beyond what is necessary to achieve objectives of the Treaties. Established constitutionally by the provisions of Article 53 (2) of the Romanian Constitution, the principle of proportionality cannot and should not be ignored in public administration, obviously. In our opinion, taken into consideration our national constitutional regulation could come off an erroneous conclusion that the proportionality concerns only the restriction of certain rights, not being necessary to govern the activity of public administration. But such an assertion cannot be supported at EU level where its action, its institutions actions and the Member States action that falls within the sphere of EU law are conditioned on the compliance with this principle. Moreover, even at national level, by the Strategy for consolidation public administration for 2014-2020, adopted by Government Decision no. 909/2014, the principle of proportionality is recognized as one of the general principles underpinning this strategy and, especially, the public administration through its activity. Also, for example, the proportionality was settled as a principle in the draft Code of Administrative Procedure, a relevant issue even if this bill did not become a law until now. In same context, after the ECJ decision in the case C-8/55 Fédération Charbonnière de Belgique v. High Authority of European Coal and Steel Community, the Court of Justice consistently recognized, in its jurisprudence, the existence and the applicability of this principle, such as is revealed by the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of Romania.

Good governance, but also the control mechanisms developed to protect and guarantee such governance requires a Member State, such as ours, the implementation of EU law by national authorities by taken into consideration even of the principle of proportionality that will focus on the policies chosen to be applied, the administrative and judicial measures applicable, the recognized, protected and guaranteed rights..

1. Introduction

Nowadays the constitution of any state provides, expressly or not, that the power owned by the people is organized on the basis of the principle of the separation and balance of powers - legislative, executive, and judicial.

Especially the contemporary period has shown and still shows us that there are reciprocal tendencies of some authorities which are exercising one of the three constitutional powers to acquire and even to exercise specific attributions of the other two powers.

In our opinion, certainly, the independence of the judiciary power must not be affected in any way by the actions of the public authorities of the other two powers.

However the increased role of the executive branch compared to that of the legislative power is a reality.

Accelerating the rhythm of everyday life requires that sometimes some attributions of legislative power, such as law-making, even be taken over by the executive branch, unfortunately not just temporarily.

In this context, we are asking ourselves this question – exercising the constitutional powers this way does not affect the balance between the powers, and then even their independence?

Thus, one of the keys to the existence of a democratic state and a state of law is to ensure the balance between the three powers - legislative, executive and judiciary, but especially the balance between the legislative and executive powers.

At the same time, the relationship between governance and administration must be respected. The governing keys belong to the legislative power, which has to determine the limits in which the governance should be accomplish by the executive authorities, including through the administration of public affairs.

Whether we are talking about good governance or good administration, or both of them, those two - governance and administration must be realised only for the benefit of the public interest, but without neglecting the principle of proportionality.

Analysing the principle of proportionality in EU law, it was pointed out that „in any proportionality inquiry the relevant interests must be identified, and there will be some ascription of weight or value of those interests, since this is a necessary condition precedent to any balancing operation" [1].

Starting from this statement and extrapolating, we appreciate that this principle of proportionality could and should contribute to ensuring the balance between the three powers - legislative, executive and judicial. This way it would be created an optimal framework for achieving good governance and, implicitly, good administration.

2. Good administration or good governance?

As we mentioned above, these two concepts - good governance and good administration - do not have the same meaning.

In our opinion, the governance should involve taking the most important political decisions to ensure the leadership of a state, and the optimal development of a nation.

In contrast, administration should aim to solve the daily problems of a community or individual person, and the public authorities, through their actions, should ensure the concrete transposition of the decisions taken by governance.

Regarding a possible definition for „good governance", it is well known that „there is no single and exhaustive definition ...nor is there a delimitation of its scope, which commands universal acceptance"[2].

This term of good governance „[i]s used with great flexibility" and „depending on the context and the overriding objective sought, good governance has been said at various times to encompass: full respect of human rights, the rule of law, effective participation, multi-actor partnerships, political pluralism, transparent and accountable processes and institutions, an efficient and effective public sector, legitimacy, access to knowledge, information and education, political empowerment of people, equity, sustainability, and attitudes and values that foster responsibility, solidarity and tolerance"[3].

In a draft report on the notion of „good governance"[4], the Venice Commission has noted that the definitions of „good governance", but also of „good administration", vary considerably. However, the Venice Commission could identify a set of similar elements used by these definitions, for example: „ accountability, transparency, responsiveness to the people's needs, efficiency, effectiveness, openness, participation, predictability, rule of law, coherence, equity, ethical behaviour"[5].

The authors of this draft report have concluded that „the present preoccupation with the issue appears to have originated in the World Bank and the other financial institutions, whose primary concern was to ensure that government became a reliable institution for sustainable growth"[6].

At present, we also consider that „the term of governance came to be used to define the reinventing of public administration"[7] to make it more receptive to the needs of the people. Also we agree that "good governance" is referring to a „public service that is efficient, a judicial system that is reliable, and an administration that is accountable to its public"[8].

Thus, when we are talking about good governance, we are referring to the „favourable political framework conditions for social, ecological and market oriented development as well as responsible use of political power and public resources by the state"[9].

Taking into consideration what we have mentioned until now, we could notice that when we are talking about terms like governance or good governance, theirs definition „range between social and political concerns and those of more technical economic nature"[10]. But it is also possible to distinguish from so different definitions, more characteristics of good governance like: „openness, participation, legitimacy, transparency, effectiveness, efficiency, accountability, availability, predictability or coherence”[11].

In our opinion all different definitions and characteristics identified by doctrine or legislation, some of them mentioned above, „are similar to and overlap with the nine „core characteristics” of good governance articulated by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) in 1994”[12]. In the UNDP it was stipulated that „[g]ood governance is, among other things, participatory, transparent and accountable. It is also effective and equitable. And it promotes the rule of law. Good governance ensures that political, social and economic priorities are based on broad consensus in society and that the voices of the poorest and the most vulnerable are heard in decision-making over the allocation of development resources”[13].

The bodies of the Council of Europe have tried to find the most consistent definition of good governance. We consider that one of these definitions is more comprehensive and it states that „good governance has become a model for giving real effect to democracy, the protection of human rights and the rule of law”[14].

In European Union, the European Commission has identified five principles of good governance in a White Paper on European Governance[15]: openness, participation, accountability, effectiveness and coherence.

But, „the article 41 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of European Union stipulates that every person has a right to good administration towards the institutions or bodies of the European Union”[16].

If good governance can be understood like „a process whereby societies or organization make their important decisions, determine whom they involve in the process and how they render account”[17], „good administration is an aspect of good governance”[18].

Governance means taking fundamental decisions for the future of a nation[19] while administration is just a dimension of governance.

Analysing good administration, like an aspect of good governance, we can identify some specific elements like: impartiality, fairness, termination of proceedings within a reasonable time, legal certainty, proportionality, non-discrimination, right to be heard, effectiveness, efficiency[20].

Even if we pointed out that good governance and good administration are not similar concepts, terms, and more than that we underlined that good administration is just an aspect of good governance, we also must emphasize that both of those concepts could be related to public administration.

It is also important to mention that the principle of proportionality is a benchmark for both concepts. Thus, as we have mentioned above, this principle is a key element in studying good administration. But also „[i]n regard to checks and balances there a number of key institutions namely, parliament, the courts and the high councils of state that play a control role in the realization of good governance. The parliament as the representative of the people and charged with the control of the government must play a determining role in the realization of good governance"[21]. But the authorities that are exercising their specific powers to control the realization of good administration, they also have to analyse even the proportionality of the measures or actions decided by the public authorities, especially by the authorities from the public administration.

3. Principle of proportionality – the benchmark of good administration

Identified and developed by the German administrative law, especially by doctrine and jurisprudence, from the beginning of the twentieth century, the principle of proportionality has not found its legal consecration in the constituent treaties of the three original European Communities.

But, in time, the Court of Justice of the European Coal and Steel Community has been obliged to examine various aspects of the principle of proportionality in various cases. Even though the Court has not mentioned expressly that it was about the principle of proportionality, we can identify different aspects of this principle as they were highlighted by German administrative courts.

In the German system, the courts have developed a uniform structure for controlling the principle of proportionality, the application of which is also a uniform one[22], to answer to the following requirements that attesting to or not respecting the principle:

- legitimate aim[23]- in administrative law, the identification of the aim is more than a didactic effort, because the administration – in applying a statute – has to pursue the aim that the legislator wanted to achieve by adopting the statute[24], and this is because the discretionary power of the public administration must not exceed the limits of legality;
- suitability (compatibility) of the measure[25]–the assessment of this requirement of the principle of proportionality should not reflect how optimal is the measure taken by the public administration, but rather whether it is probable that the aim of the measure will be achieved or at least that its achievement is encouraged, fostered[26];
- necessity[27]- means that, among several measures that are comparably effective, the administration has to choose the one measure that is the least burdensome for the addressee[28]. This requirement of the necessity of the measure to be answered clearly and correctly by the administration for application of the principle of proportionality has been „the historical nucleus"[29] of this principle and „it has remained the center of its gravity until today"[30];
- - adequacy (adequacy or proportionality stricto sensu)[31]– „means that in an over-all balance of all relevant factors, the infringement of the rights of the addressee of the administrative measure has to be proportionate in relation to the advantages for the general public"[32].

The principle of proportionality „was not imported" mutatis mutandis from German law into Community law, first of all, different component parts have been taken over by the Court of Justice as we can see in some of its judgments.

The European Court of Justice has justified its particular approach by asking itself: „Does that mean that the fundamental principles of national legal systems have no function in Community law? No. They contribute to forming that philosophical, political and legal substratum common to the Member States from which through the case-law an unwritten Community law emerges, one of the essential aims of which is precisely to ensure the respect for the fundamental rights of the individual. In that sense, the fundamental principles of the national legal systems contribute to enabling Community law to find in itself the resources necessary for ensuring, where needed, respect for the fundamental rights which form the common heritage of the Member States. "[33]

Thus, in the Case Fédération Charbonnière de Belgique v High Authority of the European Coal and Steel Community[34], analysing the reduction or withdrawal of equalization as regards certain undertakings by taking into consideration different arguments of the applicant, the Court of Justice has mentioned also that „equalization must, therefore, not exceed the limits of what is strictly necessary in order to neutralize to a certain extent the effects of the disadvantage resulting from those differences, which does not imply a guarantee that the original level of receipts will be maintained". Also, responding to another argument of the applicant, the Court has underlined that „[i]n accordance with a generally accepted rule of law such an indirect reaction by the High Authority to illegal action on the part of the undertakings must be in proportion to the scale of that action"[35].

In another relevant case, analysing even the possible violation of the principle of proportionality, in his Opinion, Mr. Dutheillet de Lamothe concerning the Case 11/70[36] of the European Court of Justice, has stated that this principle in the one „which citizens may only have imposed on them, for the purposes of the public interest, obligations which are strictly necessary for those purposes to be attained".

In time, by its judgments, European Court has acknowledged the principle of proportionality itself.

Therefore, in different judgments, it has been mentioned that „[t]he Court has consistently held that the principle of proportionality is one of the general principles of Community law"[37]. In this particular case, the Court has mentioned that „[B]y virtue of that principle, the lawfulness of the prohibition of an economic activity is subject to the condition that the prohibitory measures are appropriate and necessary in order to achieve the objectives legitimately pursued by the legislation in question; when there is a choice between several appropriate measures recourse must be had to the least onerous, and the disadvantages caused must not be disproportionate to the aims pursued"[38].

Meanwhile „the principle of proportionality acquired the status of a treaty when the Treaty of Maastricht entered into force"[39], and now this principle „is one of the few principles expressed explicitly in the European Union's acts"[40].

In another case[41], „[d]ealing with the question whether a Member State may make provision for a general, indefinite and automatic ban on exercising civil rights that also applies to the right of citizens of the Union to vote in elections to the European Parliament"[42], the Court has established that „Article 52(1)[43] of the Charter accepts that limitations may be imposed on the exercise of rights such as those set forth in Article 39 (2) of the Charter, as long as the limitations are provided for by law, respect the essence of those rights and freedoms and, subject to the principle of proportionality, are necessary and genuinely meet objectives of general interest recognised by the European Union or the need to protect the rights and freedoms of others". So in the case in point, the deprivation of the right to vote was provided for by law[44], and also it did not call into question as such the right to vote referred to in Article 39(2) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights since it has the effect of excluding certain persons, under specific conditions and on account of their conduct, from those entitled to vote in elections to the

[37] The Queen v Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and Secretary of State for Health, ex parte: Fedesa and others (C-331/88, ECLI:EU:C:1990:391), paragraph 13.. But before this judgment, in another one – Bela-Mühle Josef Bergmann KG v Grows-Farm GmbH & CO. KG - (C-114/76, ECLI:EU:C:1977:116), the principle of proportionality has been mentioned and analysed in the decision of Court, at paragraph 5. More than that, in this last judgment, other European institutions have referred to the principle of proportionality. Therefore, the Council and the Commission have pointed out that „ [t]he principle of proportionality is not a purely abstract one. It leaves the legislature with plenty of room for manoeuvre in deciding whether the legislative measure concerned, viewed in its context, is in the circumstances proportionate to the objective pursued. " (See paragraph 1 letter d) from Written observations submitted to the Court) In the same sense, these two institutions have shown that [t]he general principle of proportionality must be the only test in determining whether the infringement of this fundamental right serves a purpose which is in itself acceptable, whether it is such as to enable this objective to be attained and whether it does not constitute an arbitrary and intolerable burden". (See paragraph 2 letter d) from Written observations submitted to the Court)

Subject to the principle of proportionality, limitations may be made only if they are necessary and genuinely meet objectives of general interest recognised by the Union or the need to protect the rights and freedoms of others. Parliament [45]. In this context, and more important for our research, the Court also underlined that „such a limitation is proportionate in so far as it takes into account the nature and gravity of the criminal offence committed and the duration of the penalty and in so far as national law provides for the possibility of a person who has been deprived of the right to vote applying for, and obtaining, the lifting of that measure"[46]

In a recent case[47] with further reference to the migration crisis, on 6 September 2017, the Grand Chamber of the Court delivered its judgment in which it dismissed in full the actions seeking annulment of Council Decision 2015/1601 establishing provisional measures for the mandatory relocation of asylum applicants[48]. „The Council had adopted that decision on the basis of Article 78(3) TFEU in order to help Italy and Greece deal with the massive inflow of migrants in the summer of 2015. It provided for the relocation from those two Member States to other Member States, over a period of two years, of almost 120 000 persons in clear need of international protection. Slovakia and Hungary, which had voted against the adoption of that decision in the Council, asked the Court to annul the decision. In support of their actions, they argued, first, that the adoption of the contested decision was vitiated by errors of a procedural nature or was founded on an inappropriate legal basis and, secondly, that the decision was neither a suitable response to the migration crisis nor necessary for that purpose"[49]. In this judgment, concerning the principle of proportionality, the Court has established that „according to settled case-law of the Court, the principle of proportionality requires that acts of the EU institutions be appropriate for attaining the legitimate objectives pursued by the legislation at issue and do not go beyond what is necessary in order to achieve those objectives; when there is a choice between several appropriate measures, recourse must be had to the least onerous, and the disadvantages caused must not be disproportionate to the aims pursued"[50]. Thus, in this context, „[t]he objective of the relocation mechanism provided for in the contested decision, in the light of which the proportionality of that mechanism must be considered, is, according to Article 1(1) of the decision, read in conjunction with recital 26 thereof, to help the Hellenic Republic and the Italian Republic cope with an emergency situation characterised by a sudden inflow, in their respective territories, of third country nationals in clear need of international protection, by relieving the significant pressure on the Greek and Italian asylum systems"[51]. The Court has also ruled on that „it cannot be denied that the contested decision, in so far as it includes provision for a compulsory distribution between all the Member States of migrants to be relocated from Greece and Italy (i) has an impact on all the Member States of relocation and (ii) requires that a balance be struck between the different interests involved, account being taken of the objectives which that decision pursues. Therefore, the attempt to strike such a balance, taking into account not the particular situation of a single Member State, but that of all Member States, cannot be regarded as being contrary to the principle of proportionality"[52].

In another case[53] the Court has ruled on „the chargeability conditions for excise duty, within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 9 of Directive 2008/118 concerning the general arrangements for excise duty, interpreted in the light of the principle of proportionality"[54]. Thus, the Court has reminded that „as the Advocate General pointed out in point 32 of her Opinion[55], in the exercise of the powers conferred on them by EU law, the Member States must comply with the general principles of law among which are, in particular, the principle of proportionality which the Commission considers has been breached in the present case"[56].

[55] In this Opinion, the Advocate General has underlined that „[t]he Court usually begins its examination of the proportionality of a measure in the field of indirect taxation by stating that the Member States must employ means which, while enabling them effectively to attain the objectives pursued by their domestic laws, on the one hand, cause the least possible detriment to the objectives and principles laid down by the relevant EU legislation, on the other. In accordance with a more precise formulation of the requirements imposed by the principle of proportionality that has been established by case-law, a measure must be appropriate for attaining the legitimate objectives pursued by it and must not go beyond what is necessary to achieve those objectives. When there is a choice between several appropriate measures, recourse must be had to the least onerous; furthermore, the disadvantages caused must not be disproportionate to the aims pursued." [56] Commission v Portugal (C-126/15, EU:C:2017:504) paragraph 62.

From the above-mentioned cases and not only, we can see that the Court of Justice of the European Union has analysed the compliance and application of the principle of proportionality in multiple and varied areas like: the common agriculture policy, the competition law in European Union, the free movement of workers, tax provisions from the European Union law, common foreign and security policy, etc. In these cases, the Court of Justice has examined compliance with the principle of proportionality in governance or administration by the European Union's institutions, bodies, offices or agencies, inter alia, in order to make it possible to ensure good governance and good governance within European Union and, implicitly, within the Member States. Even by sanctioning of any breach of the principle of proportionality, the Court of Justice contributes, exercising of its specific competence, to respecting the institutional balance in the European Union.

4. Conclusions

The authorities from the executive branch participate in the governance of a state, mainly through the realization of its internal and external policy and less as the deciding factor of this policy.

However, to ensure the implementation of the domestic and foreign policy of the country, the same authorities, generically identified in this context as public administration, exercise the general management of public administration, but also achieve specific administrative activities, so their contribution to the right to good administration it will be essential in any state of law.

But a right of appreciation is recognized for the authorities and institutions from public administration. On the other hand, exercising this discretionary power, the public administration authorities may infringe the principle of proportionality. But, the acts they issue exercising of their competence, the public administration authorities must not only affect the legality, but also the opportunity. In our opinion this is the moment when, public administration authorities, first of all, have to ensure the compliance and the enforcement of the principle of proportionality.

So, if „the function of the principle of proportionality is to control the manner in which the European Union exercises its power, both in relation to Member States and individuals, and to assess the activities of those states”[57], we appreciate that this function should be adapted at national level and public administration authorities should exercise theirs power taking into consideration this principle in relation with individuals, legal persons or other public authorities. This way it will be easy for any state to ensure good governance and, also, good administration for everyone.

Through this study we initiated a research on the principle of proportionality and its importance in European Union law emphasized by legislation, the case-law of the Court of Justice, and doctrine.

This way, we wanted to highlight the relevance of this principle in achieving good governance, but above all good administration because it is important to develop new regulations regarding this principle in our national legislation.

First of all, we consider that it is appropriate to be mentioned, expressly, in our Constitution this principle of proportionality and also its meaning. Now we have just a reference of proportionality in the Article 53 paragraph 2 of Romanian Constitution[58].

In the Administrative Code that was adopted by our Parliament, but was declared unconstitutional by Romanian Constitutional Court[59], the legislative authority has provided a definition[60] for the principle of proportionality, and has mentioned about proportionality in other articles[61].

Even if by the Strategy for consolidation public administration for 2014-2020, adopted by Government Decision no. 909/2014[62], the principle of proportionality is recognized as a general principle of public administration in relation to its own activity[63]. We appreciate that the indirect references[64] to proportionality that we can find in Law no. 554/2004 of the contentious administrative, are not enough to ensure full implementation of this principle, and also of the right of good administration.

We have the same opinion regarding the right to good administration, appreciating that it is mandatory to establish it, expressly, even in our Constitution.

[60] Article 9 from the Administrative Code has provided that the principle of proportionality represents: „The forms of activity of the public administration authorities must be appropriate to the satisfaction of a public interest and balanced in terms of effects on individuals. The provisions or measures of the public administration authorities and institutions are initiated, adopted, issued, as the case may be, only after assessing the needs of public interest or the problems, as the case may be, the risks and impact of the proposed solutions”. Proportionality has been mentioned even like principle of administrative liability in Article 574 paragraph 2.

[63] In this Strategy, the principle of proportionality is defined as follows - any action taken must be appropriate, necessary and appropriate to the intended purpose. See Strategy for consolidation public administration for 2014-2020, p. 18, available at: http://www.dpfbl.mdrap.ro/documents/strategia_administratiei_publice/Strategia_pentru_consolidarea_administratiei_publice_2014-2020.pdf, accessed on: 04.04.2019

COMPARISON BETWEEN THE LEGAL PARTICULARITIES OF ROMANIA'S AND THE UNITED KINGDOM'S MEMBERSHIP OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

Maria-Cristina SOLACOLU

Abstract

Since its early accession to the European Economic Community (the predecessor of the European Union), the United Kingdom has, at times, shown itself reluctant to fully integrate and adopt the acquis communautaire. The UK has chosen to negotiate several opt-outs – more than any other Member State – regarding certain EU policies, with notable examples being the Monetary Union and the Schengen Agreement. Despite being granted such exemptions, the UK has remained a more sceptical member of the EU and has become the first to ever invoke the applicability of Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union, starting the process of withdrawal from the organisation. According to the terms provided by Article 50, the completion of said process should take place in the first half of 2019, coinciding with the rotating Presidency of the Council being taken over by Romania, who only joined the EU in 2007. Its legal standing is noticeably different compared to that of the UK: Romania's participation in the aforementioned EU policies, which the UK has opted out of, is mandatory, but conditioned by the fulfilment of specific criteria. Romania is also, alongside Bulgaria, the object of certain safeguard measures designed to address the specific issues faced by the two states.

The purpose of this article is to compare certain legal particularities that characterise Romania's and the United Kingdom's membership of the EU, and to determine their consequences with regard to each of the two states' relationship with the organisation, as well as to the complex position the EU finds itself in during the first half of 2019.

Keywords: Opt-out – Integration – Area of Freedom, Security and Justice – Schengen Agreement – Economic and Monetary Union

1. Introduction

The United Kingdom, while a strong proponent of the free market and of the liberalisation of trade, has often been considered one of the more reticent Member States with regard to the integration process and the transfer of powers toward the European Union, starting with its refusal to participate in the founding of the European Communities[1] - a decision which has since been called a mistake by some historians[2] – and continuing, after the UK's eventual accession, with its attempts to steer the organisations towards enlargement, as opposed to the deepening of the integration process[3]. Several times, when other Member States agreed upon a new or enhanced form of integration, the UK chose not to participate and was granted an opt-out. While not the only state to enjoy such benefits, it became the Member State with most opt-outs[4], regarding the Schengen Area, the Economic and Monetary Union, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and the area of freedom, security and justice. This feeling of detachment from the European Union, reflected in the general population, became more and more accentuated over the years and culminated, in 2016, with the referendum regarding the UK's withdrawal from the EU[5], when a little under 52% of the voters decided that they wanted the state to leave the organisation. This decision came about despite the fact that, a few months prior to the referendum, the UK's government had negotiated with the EU and had managed to obtain several desired changes regarding EU legislation[6].

[1] The United Kingdom decided not to take part in the Schuman Plan, that lead to the establishment of the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) in 1952, and later withdrew from the negotiations held at Messina regarding the creation of the European Economic Community (EEC) and the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom). The UK finally joined the European Communities in 1973; its first application to join the European Communities had been made in 1961, and its second in 1967, but both had been vetoed by France.

[3] The United Kingdom's preference for a less involved form of cooperation lead to its founding of the European Free Trade Association, in 1960, as an alternative to the EEC. It soon became clear, however, that the UK's economic interests would be better served as part of the integration-based EEC, especially due to the fact that trade with the Commonwealth countries – who had traditionally been the UK's preferred economic partners – had entered a decline. See Helen Parr, op. cit., p. 122.

[4] Three other Member States currently have opt-outs: Denmark has three (regarding Defence, the Economic and Monetary Union and the Area of freedom, security and justice), the Republic of Ireland has two (regarding the Schengen Agreement and the Area of freedom, security and justice) and Poland has one (regarding the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union). Noticeably, all opt-outs concern the same few areas of competence.

[5] It was not the first referendum the UK held regarding this issue. In 1975, two years after the UK had become a member of the European Communities, a referendum was called regarding said membership. That referendum had a significantly different outcome: two-thirds of the electorate expressed support for the UK's accession to the Communities.

[6] For more on the results of these negotiations, see Andrew Glencross, Why the UK Voted for Brexit. David Cameron's Great Miscalculation, Palgrave Macmillan, 2016.

A state that has benefited from the UK's push toward the enlargement of the European Communities is Romania, who became a Member State in 2007, alongside Bulgaria, following a general move toward integrating countries from Eastern Europe in the EU[7]. Upon its accession to the organisation, Romania was made the subject of a series of special conditions and its participation in the Schengen Area and in the Monetary Union was deferred until the state would fulfil the necessary conditions. Twelve years after its accession, Romania has still not become a member of the Schengen Area and has not adopted the Euro.

This article will present and compare the relationship between the EU and the United Kingdom and Romania, respectively, with regard to these areas of policy where the process of integration has proven more complicated, either due to the state's reticence to fully participate, in the UK's case, or the state's failure to fulfil the required conditions, in Romania's case, with a view to identify the causes and potential solutions to this state of affairs.

2. The Schengen Area

The European Communities were founded in the 1950s and took the Member States through an intense process of integration that involved significant changes in national legislation, an economic boom, and several clashes between European leaders based on the differing views regarding the future direction of the Communities[8]. In comparison to this eventful and tumultuous period in European history, the late 1970s and the first half of the 1980s have been called "a period of relative political stagnation in the EEC".[9] While the first steps towards the realisation of the single market had been taken by the implementation of the free movement of goods between 1957 and 1968, the free movement of capital, services and persons were properly put into practice only through the Treaty of Maastricht.[10]

An important step was taken in 1985, with the signing, on 14 June, of the Schengen Agreement by five Member States of the European Communities: France, Germany and the Benelux Economic Union (comprised of Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands). This Agreement was the result of several debates regarding, in particular, the free movement of people between the Member States and the definition of this concept, as well as that of the concept of citizenship[11]. Some Member States held the view that the freedom of movement applied only to their own citizens, which meant that border controls needed to be upheld. Other Member States considered that the freedom of movement should be applied to other citizens as well, and that the territory of the European Communities should be frontier-free.[12] This would necessitate, in turn, particularly thorough controls at the external borders of the European Economic Community (presently, of the EU) as well as the establishment of a common policy regarding visas, asylum and the status of refugees.[13] The Agreement defined several important notions, regulated the way border controls were to be carried out and laid out several rules on the matter of visas, but was not part of the European acquis and was not mandatory for the Member States of the Communities who had not signed it.

The Schengen Agreement was later supplemented by the Schengen Convention,[14] signed on 19 June 1990, which concerned the Agreement's implementation. The Convention was integrated in 1999 in the EU's legal framework by means of a Protocol annexed to the Treaty of Amsterdam[15] and allowed for the elimination of all border controls between Member States and the creation of a single external border, where all controls would be carried out according to a unified procedure.[16] Consequently, the policy regarding visas, asylum and border control were included in the acquis communautaire[17] as part of the area of freedom, security and justice, and all Member States, except those with opt-outs, became legally [7] Ten states, most of them from the former Soviet area of influence, had joined the organisations in 2004.

[11] With regard to the notion of citizenship, the Court of Justice stated that the matter remains strictly in the competence of the Member States and must be settled in accordance with their national law. See Massimo Condinanzi, Allessandra Lang, Bruno Nascimbene, Citizenship of the Union and Free Movement of Persons, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 2008, p. 6. The United Kingdom defined the term "national", referring to those who enjoyed freedom of movement, as including "British citizens; persons who are British subjects and have the right of abode in the United Kingdom, and British Dependent Territories citizens who acquire their citizenship from a connection with Gibraltar. Consequently, other British Dependent Territories citizens and British overseas citizens are excluded". In a unilateral declaration, Denmark stated that EU citizenship is different from the concept of Danish citizenship, as defined by its national law.

[17] The Schengen acquis was defined by the Council Decision 1999/435/EC concerning the definition of the Schengen acquis for the purpose of determining, in conformity with the relevant provisions of the Treaty establishing the European Community and the Treaty on European Union, the legal basis for each of the provisions or decisions which constitute the acquis.

bound to join the Schengen Area upon fulfilling the technical requirements.

Since 1985, almost all other Member States of the Communities have integrated the Schengen acquis, starting with Italy, in 1990, and even the states that are part of the European Free Trade Association[18] have decided to participate. However, when signing the Treaty of Amsterdam, the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom obtained opt-outs regarding the Schengen acquis.[19] The Member States negotiated protocols saying they could decide, on a case by case basis, whether to participate in certain acts adopted regarding this matter and to implement them (in the case of the latter two states, the unanimous vote of all states that are party to the Agreement would be necessary). In 1999, the UK asked to participate in certain provisions of the Schengen acquis, such as police cooperation, and its request was approved in 2000.[20] The Republic of Ireland followed with a similar request, which was approved in 2002.[21]

The UK's reasoning regarding its decision to opt out of the Schengen acquis was that, being an island nation, it had the possibility to better control the access of third country nationals onto its territory.[22] Moreover, an inquiry held by the UK's House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities had found that, while the abolition of internal frontiers with respect to goods, services and capital was fully possible and advantageous, the elimination of border controls on persons would represent a security risk.[23]

At present, the only Member States of the European Union – excluding the ones who have opt-outs – who do not participate in the Schengen Area are Cyprus[24], Bulgaria, Romania and Croatia. All four states are legally bound to integrate the Schengen acquis, according to the Treaties of Accession.[25]

Romania's request to participate in the Schengen Area was approved by the European Parliament in 2011, but was denied by the Council, with particular opposition from the Dutch and Finnish representatives. In December 2018, the European Parliament once again voted – unanimously – in favour of allowing both Bulgaria and Romania to join the Schengen Area. A unanimous decision from the European Council is needed in order to achieve this aim.

While it is to be expected that a recently joined state will not have yet fulfilled the requirements for integrating the Schengen acquis, the debates in Romania's case have been centred on political arguments as much as on technical ones and, as such, the possibility of its joining the Schengen Area remains hard to predict.

3. The Economic and Monetary Union

The signing and ratifying of the Single European Act (SEA) was another sign of the quickening pace of European integration, with its stated objective being that of creating, by the end of 1992, a single market where all impediments to the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital were removed[26]. The SEA was signed in 1986 by all Member States, despite the differing views on the relevance of the Treaty: France and Germany saw it "as a means of advancing the cause of political, economic and monetary integration". This view was strongly supported by the Commission, led by French-born Jacques Delors, who proposed, in 1989, "a three-stage plan for full economic and monetary union" and "a social charter of workers' and citizens' rights".[27]

These plans were debated in 1990 and led to the signing, in Maastricht, of the Treaty on European Union (TEU), bringing about several significant reforms, such as "provisions for a Social Chapter (previously known as the Social Charter) and for a common foreign and security policy (CFSP) which envisaged a more influential role for the EU in the international system".[28] Of particular relevance was the Economic and Monetary Union (EMU), which would be built in three stages. The final stage would have to be reached no later than 1999, with as many members as were found to satisfy the convergence criteria for joining the Euro area.[29] The idea of the EMU had existed for many years, but it was always considered that its realisation would necessitate a stronger political union and deeper integration – something that would be achieved through the Treaty of Maastricht.[30]

The signing of the Treaty of Maastricht showed how opposed the UK was to further integration.[31] During the negotiations regarding the Economic and Monetary Union, the United Kingdom expressed its desire to be excluded from the obligation to adopt the Euro, asking for an opt-out.[32] Most Member States disagreed with this request, but after extended debates it was decided that the UK would be exempt from participating in the final stage of the EMU, on the condition that it would not hamper the other Member States in furthering integration in this area.[33] Considering the fact that the Treaties do not, at present, provide for a legal procedure of opting out of the Monetary Union, it is widely considered that adopting the Euro is a legal obligation for all Member States who fulfil the convergence criteria, especially considering the fact that "for candidate countries, adherence to the aims of economic and monetary union constitutes one of the prerequisites for accession to the EU."[34]

British opposition to the adoption of a single currency had first been expressed by Margaret Thatcher.[35] Her successor, John Major, shared her interest in creating a strong single market and her reticence toward further integration and transfer of national sovereignty, opposing the idea of a single currency.[36] Their position was partially motivated by recent international events that had had a serious impact on the UK's economy: "That Britain joined the EC when the latter was going through one of its periodic bouts of radical change scarcely facilitated a smooth entry. […] The collapse of the Bretton Woods fixed exchange system in 1971, followed by a fourfold increase in international oil prices during 1973-74, triggered off a new phase of monetary instability and sluggish economic activity. So far as Britain was concerned, the situation was aggravated by the impact of the 1974 miners' strike and the major sterling crisis that blew up in 1976. […] All the available evidence conclusively showed that Britain's economic performance was significantly worse than it had been in the years immediately before entry to the EC. It also remained inferior to that of most other Member States."[37]

According to Romania's Accession Treaty, upon joining the European Union, the state became a member of the Economic and Monetary Union, with a derogation from the obligation to adopt the Euro until it would fulfil the convergence criteria. As of 2019, Romania has yet to be considered as having satisfied said criteria and, unlike the case of its participation in the Schengen Area, the arguments against its adopting the euro are of a technical, rather than political, nature.

4. The Area of Freedom, Security and Justice

The Treaty of Amsterdam spoke of the importance of creating an Area of Freedom, Security and Justice (AFSJ) comprised of the policy on visas, asylum, emigration and other provisions regarding the free movement of people, as well as the Schengen acquis. Following the reforms brought about by the Treaty of Lisbon,[38] the AFSJ forms the subject of Title V of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union and has been expanded to include not only the policy on border controls, asylum and immigration, but also police and judicial cooperation in criminal and civil matters.

When signing the Treaty of Amsterdam, the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland negotiated another Protocol, distinct from the one that contained the opt-out regarding the Schengen acquis. According to this second Protocol, the two Member States were not bound by the provisions concerning the AFSJ, but "could choose whether or not to opt in to proposed measures in this area", in a three-month term. If they did not express an option, they would be considered as having opted-out.[39] The Treaty of Lisbon preserved the Protocol[40] and extended it to the entirety of the ASFJ, in its expanded form, providing that it also applies to "amendments to measures in relation to which those states have previously opted in", which could, if put into practice, render those measures inapplicable and lead to certain complications.[41] As before, the two Member States can decide to opt-in at any time.

Contrary to the UK, Romania is a relatively eager participant in the Area of Freedom Security and Justice, being one of the Member States who agreed, in 2017, to establish the European Public Prosecutor's Office as a form of enhanced cooperation.[42]

5. The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

The decision to draw up a Charter of Fundamental Rights was taken in June 1999, during the European Council in Köln, with further details regarding its elaboration being agreed upon a few months later, during the European Council in Tampere.[43] The Charter was drawn up in less than a year, was proclaimed by the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission and was unanimously approved by the European Council in Biarritz, in October 2000. Following the adoption of the Treaty of Lisbon, the Charter of Fundamental Rights gained the same legal status as the Treaties, taking precedence over secondary EU law and all national legislation.[44] Despite the fact that the drawing up and the approval of the Charter did not encounter any hurdles, when the time came to integrate its provisions through the Treaty of Lisbon two Member States, the United Kingdom and Poland[45], negotiated a Protocol meant to limit the legal effects of the Charter.[46] While this Protocol has been considered an opt-out, it has been debated whether its effect is anything more than declaratory. The Court of Justice of the European Union answered the question by ruling that "Protocol No 30 does not call into question the applicability of the Charter in the United Kingdom or in Poland, a position which is confirmed by the recitals in the preamble to that protocol."[47] Said Preamble states that the purpose of the Protocol is that "of clarifying the application of the Charter in relation to the laws and administrative action of Poland and of the United Kingdom and of its justiciability within Poland and within the United Kingdom." This, correlated with the fact that a Member State could not opt-out of the values enshrined in Article 2 of the Treaty on European Union, made the CJEU's ruling unavoidable. [48]

6. The safeguard clauses provided by the Treaty of Accession of the Republic of Bulgaria and Romania

Bulgaria and Romania's Treaty of Accession included three safeguard clauses intended to solve certain issues arising from the states' joining of the EU: a general safeguard clause, an internal market safeguard clause, and a justice and home affairs safeguard clause.[49]

In addition to these three provisions, which can also be found in the Treaty of Accession of the ten Member States who joined the organisation in 2004, a special safeguard clause, specific to Bulgaria and Romania, was introduced. According to this clause, the accession of either of the two states could have been postponed by one year, to 1 January 2008, if there had been clear evidence of them "being manifestly unprepared to meet the requirements of membership by the date of accession of 1 January 2007 in a number of important areas". Furthermore, Romania's accession could have also been postponed if "serious shortcomings" had been observed in its fulfilment of "one or more of the commitments and requirements" regarding the area of justice and home affairs and that of competition.

Upon Bulgaria and Romania's accession, the safeguard clause regarding the area of justice and home affairs was invoked and a Cooperation and Verification Mechanism was created by the Commission, in order to monitor the progress of the two states and to ensure that they fulfilled their obligations. While the Accession Treaty states that such measures should be taken in a period of up to three years after the accession and should "be maintained no longer than strictly necessary", it also allows for them to be applied "beyond the period specified in the first paragraph as long as these shortcomings persist". As of 2019, twelve years after the two states joined the EU, the

The first states that "The Charter does not extend the ability of the Court of Justice of the European Union, or any court or tribunal of Poland or of the United Kingdom, to find that the laws, regulations or administrative provisions, practices or action of Poland or of the United Kingdom are inconsistent with the fundamental rights, freedoms and principles that it reaffirms" and that "nothing in Title IV of the Charter creates justiciable rights applicable to Poland or the United Kingdom except in so far as Poland or the United Kingdom has provided for such rights in its national law." Article 2 provides that "To the extent that a provision of the Charter refers to national laws and practices, it shall only apply to Poland or the United Kingdom to the extent that the rights or principles that it contains are recognised in the law or practices of Poland or of the United Kingdom." Cooperation and Verification Mechanism is still in effect.

On the whole, it is noticeable that in the case of Romania (and Bulgaria), the other Member States have provided the possibility of stricter measures being taken with regard to the fulfilment of obligations and the adoption of the acquis communautaire.

Conclusions

For the UK, every step taken towards further integration has meant the necessity of finding a balance between national interests (which have been considered as diverging from those of the EU), the traditional preference of many British politicians for a less-involved participation, and the interests and well-being of the European Union[50]. While trying to slow down the process of deepening integration in certain areas, like that of social policy or the elimination of internal borders, [51] the UK has been an active supporter of the development of the single market and of the liberalisation of trade.[52] This duality of interests has resulted in the UK being the Member State with most opt-outs. The EU's willingness to allow this can partially be explained by its desire to keep the UK as a Member State, due to its important role on the international stage, its economic power and its shared history and values with the other European states. Yet, following the Brexit referendum, it has become clear that these opt-outs were less effective than hoped for: the UK's desire to maintain greater control over certain areas of competence was apparently not satisfied to a sufficient degree and, at the same time, the integration process between the other Member States was unnecessarily slowed down.

The process has been further hampered by the fact that newer members of the EU have not been able to join the Schengen Area and the Monetary Union, either due to a failure to fulfil the required criteria or, in certain cases, to political circumstances. The idea of a "multi-speed" Europe is not a new one – it was debated as early as the Fontainebleau European Council, in June 1984, when the Member States of the EEC, France in particular, suggested that the states who were prepared to integrate further should be allowed to do so, with the rest joining them at a later date.[53] However, the evolution of the UK's relationship with the EU suggests that, in the future, in order to avoid the fracturing of the European Union, a deeper integration should be prioritised for all Member States, in order to ensure that they do not feel either overlooked by, or disconnected from the rest of European Union

BREXIT AND THE ROMANIAN PRESIDENCY OF THE COUNCIL OF THE EUROPEAN UNION – LEGAL ASPECTS AND POSSIBILITIES

Maria-Cristina SOLACOLU

Abstract

The first half of 2019 finds the European Union facing two challenges: the rotating Presidency of the Council of the European Union is held by Romania, one of the newest members of the organisation, while the United Kingdom prepares to withdraw, after being the first state to invoke, in March 2017, Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union.

Romania assumes this position of great responsibility for the first time since its accession to the EU and finds itself confronted with a task that has raised problems even for other, more experienced, states that have held the Presidency of the Council after the UK notified the EU of its intention to leave. Moreover, March 2019 marks the end of the two-year term provided by Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union for the enforcement of a withdrawal agreement, placing Romania as President of the Council of the EU at the moment when the UK would be expected to officially lose its status as a Member State, unless an extension is agreed upon by the European Council and the UK.

In this context, it is important to take note of the progress made in the matter of the UK's withdrawal from the EU, to identify the legal means the Presidency of the Council has at its disposal to ensure that a satisfying solution is reached and to analyse the role that the Romanian Presidency, specifically, plays in this process.

1. Introduction

The Presidency of the Council of the European Union has been the subject of several debates aimed at improving and adapting it to the ever-changing realities of the intricate international organisation that is the European Union. In recent years, this position has gained considerable importance,[1] with reasons cited for such a development being the necessity for a more robust central administration in the EU and a strong leadership in the Council, the growing complexity of the EU's decisional structure, and the increase of its power, which makes cooperation between institutions even more significant for the Union's well-being.[2]

During the first half of 2019 Romania chairs the Council of the European Union for the first time since its accession in 2007. At the same time, the UK prepares to depart from the EU – the first Member State to do so[3] since the formation of the European Communities in the 1950s. The fact that the projected date of the UK's departure from the EU coincides with the Romanian Presidency of the Council is particularly important for the Member State: Romania has the opportunity to prove its ability and its commitment to advancing the EU's interests by ensuring that the process of withdrawal moves forward as swiftly and as efficiently as possible, in order to limit the negative effects that the uncertainty of the situation has on the Union and on the other Member States. Furthermore, a post-Brexit context could favour the development of a stronger relationship between the two European states in matters of foreign policy and defence. It has been argued that a potential "deep and special partnership" would be beneficial for them, especially considering the fact that both the UK and Romania prioritise the preservation of European security and are supporters of the transatlantic alliance.[4] Romania could help the UK express its interests in front of EU authorities (seeing as the UK would no longer be able to directly vote on matters regarding the EU's Common Foreign and Security Policy) while increasing its own role in the "making of foreign, security and defence policies in the EU and in the politics of NATO"[5].

In this context, it is important to identify the exact role that the Council of the European Union plays, according to the Treaties, in the process of a Member State's withdrawal from the EU, to follow the way this procedure has been put into practice after the UK's decision to invoke Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union and leave the organisation, and to analyse Romania's role as President of the Council during the expected finalisation of the Brexit process.

2. The rotating Presidency of the Council

During the drafting of the Treaty of Lisbon[6], the following rules were established regarding the Council's Presidency: the Council meets in various configurations, depending on the subject being discussed, with the list of these configurations and their presidencies determined by the European Council, acting by a qualified majority[7]. The General Affairs Council and the Foreign Affairs Council are exempt from these rules, their existence being mandatory and the latter's Presidency always being held by the High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy.

The Council Decision 2009/937/EU adopting the Council's Rules of Procedure established that the Presidency of the Council is to be held by pre-established groups of three Member States, for a period of eighteen months. When deciding upon the composition of these groups, the European Council must respect the principle of equal rotation among Member States and must take into account their diversity and geographical balance[8]. Each of the three states holds the presidency of the Council for a period of six months, with the other two offering support and assistance according to a common programme previously drafted in consultation with the High Representative of the Union, the Commission, and the President of the European Council. The draft programme, which lays out their activities and must be approved by the General Affairs Council[9], covers the upcoming eighteen-month period of their Presidencies and serves as a starting point for each of the state's own six-month programme. It is also possible for the members of the team to decide alternative arrangements among themselves.[10]

The future President of the Council, after consulting with the other two member states that are part of its group, sets the dates for the Council meetings seven months before the beginning of its Presidency[11] and establishes, a week before taking office, the indicative provisional agendas for the next sixth months. Furthermore, during its term, the Member State that holds the Presidency is responsible for setting the provisional agenda for each Council meeting.[12] The provisional agenda is formally adopted during the meeting of the Council. It is divided into two sections, legislative deliberations and non-legislative activities, with each of these sections being further divided into matters that can be decided upon without being discussed, and matters that require debate.

During its six-month term, the President is responsible for convening, on his own initiative or at the request of one of the other Members or of the Commission, the Council[13] and is allowed to develop policy initiatives that interest either the Council in its entirety or the Member State in office. It has been noted that policies which are too narrow in scope, concern strictly the Member State holding the Presidency or go against the interests of most Council members are likely to be criticised and rejected.[14]

The Presidency must plan and chair meetings in all Council formations and preparatory bodies (with the exception of the Foreign Affairs Council), it must ensure that the rules of procedure are respected during these meetings, and it represents the Council in its relations with other institutions of the European Union, with the aim of reaching agreements on legislative projects. In certain circumstances, the President of the Council may be asked to represent or even chair the Foreign Affairs Council, replacing the High Representative, when matters of a commercial nature are being discussed.[15]

One of many important changes brought about by the Treaty of Lisbon is the separation of the President of the Council from the person Chairing the European Council. The latter institution now has its own President, elected for a two-and-a-half-year term, which can be renewed only once. This complicates the task of the President of the Council, who must ensure that its policies and initiatives respect and are aligned with the general strategy set out by the President of the European Council.[16]

3. The Romanian Presidency of the Council

The trio of Member States set to chair the Council during the 2018-2019 period is comprised of Romania, Finland and Croatia, with Romania taking over the position during the first half of 2019. This is the first time that the Member State has held the Presidency of the Council since its accession in 2007. The inherent challenges of the Presidency are further added to by the fact that March 2019 marks the end of the two-year period provided by Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union for the negotiation, signing and ratifying of a withdrawal agreement between the United Kingdom and the EU.

According to its 6-month programme, the Romanian Presidency's main objective regarding Brexit is to maintain the remaining Member State's unity, to ensure that the UK's withdrawal from the organisation takes place in an orderly fashion and that European citizens and companies are prepared for a „smooth transition towards an EU of 27 Member States". Particular importance is placed on „ensuring clarity and transparency" during the process of withdrawal and on the close cooperation between the Romanian Presidency, the EU's institutions and the other Member States „in order to follow all the institutional procedures arising from such developments, including those related to the implementation of the agreement after 29 March 2019". The programme also mentions that the Romanian Presidency aims to contribute to a strong future partnership between the EU and the UK, after the latter's departure from the organisation.[17]

The brevity of this passage, despite the topic's importance for the European Union, and the rather general terms used can be explained by the fact that, at the moment of the programme's elaboration, there had been little progress made towards the finalisation of the UK's withdrawal process. The mentioned agreement, which was expected to be implemented after 29 March 2019, was approved by the EU, but not by the UK Parliament. Consequently, the future President of the Council was faced with the task of preparing for a situation that could have evolved in multiple, vastly different ways. The provisional agendas for Council meetings covering the term of the Romanian Presidency did not mention the United Kingdom's withdrawal specifically.

The 18-month Programme of the Council, corresponding with Romania's, Finland's and Croatia's Presidencies, mentioned Brexit only in passing, noting that the three Member States, when chairing, in turn, the Council, will „devote all efforts to ensure the effective and timely handling of all work required by the Brexit process, fostering the unity of the 27 Member States".[18]

4. The Council's role in the process of negotiation and conclusion of the withdrawal agreement

While leaving the European Union has always been possible,[19] the Treaties did not provide a specific procedure for a Member State's withdrawal from the Union – likely due to a lack of interest in such a mechanism. Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union was introduced by the Treaty of Lisbon specifically to address this omission and states that the conclusion of a withdrawal agreement will take place according to the provisions of Article 218 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, which governs the process of negotiating, signing and ratifying international treaties between the EU and other organisations or states. Negotiations must follow the guidelines provided by the European Council, with the aforementioned agreement being concluded on behalf of the Union by the Council, acting by a qualified majority, after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament.[20]

Article 218 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union regulates the negotiation and conclusion of agreements between the European Union and third countries or international organisations, establishing that the EU institution with the most authority in this matter is the Council, acting by a qualified majority. The Council is the institution with the power to "authorise the opening of negotiations, adopt negotiating directives, authorise the signing of agreements and conclude them"[21]. After receiving recommendations from the Commission or the High Representative, depending on the subject of the agreement, the Council is the one to nominate the Union negotiator, to whom it can address directives, and may also designate a special committee meant to provide consultation during the negotiations. Based on the proposals of the negotiator thusly named, the Council will adopt a decision authorising the signing of the agreement and a decision concluding it. Depending on the subject of the Agreement, the Council must either seek the approval of the European Parliament or simply consult it, before adopting the decision concluding the agreement. While Article 218 does not mention withdrawal agreements specifically, Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union provides that, for this particular type of agreement, the consent of the European Parliament is necessary.

5. Timeline of the negotiation and conclusion of the Agreement on the withdrawal of the United Kingdom from the European Union and Euratom

In June 2016, the United Kingdom held a referendum regarding its possible withdrawal from the European Union, with the result of the vote being in favour of leaving the organisation. Immediately after the outcome of the referendum was announced, the President of the European Parliament, Martin Schulz, the President of the Commission, Jean-Claude Juncker, the acting President of the Council, Mark Rutte, and the President of the European Council, Donald Tusk, released a joint statement,[22] saying that they respected the UK's decision, which represented the result of a democratic process, and that they were ready to launch negotiations with the UK as soon as possible in order to settle the terms of withdrawal agreement. However, the UK officially invoked Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union on 29 March 2017, which effectively gave the state another year, in addition to the two-year period provided by the Treaty, to prepare for its withdrawal from the EU.

The Council did not wait for the UK's official notification in order to start preparing for Brexit and, in 2016, created a task force dedicated to the issue of the UK's withdrawal from the EU, its main responsibilities consisting of overseeing the negotiations carried out between the Commission and the UK, keeping the Member States informed about these negotiations and providing an overview of the envisioned future of the UK-EU relations. The Commission's own task force and negotiators were put in charge of carrying out the negotiations and working out the technical aspects of this process.[23] The Commission's working procedure and detailed mandate for negotiations were established based on the European Council's guidelines, after consulting with the Council and with its approval.[24]

Upon deciding to leave the EU, the United Kingdom had to give up its place in the rotating Presidency of the Council (the UK was due to occupy the position in the second half of 2017). This led to the adoption of a new list by the European Council, which no longer mentioned the UK, with its place being taken over by Estonia, who was supposed to chair the Council in 2018, instead. Consequently, Romania (like all other countries on the list) had to assume the Presidency of the Council six months earlier than it had been anticipating, a significant change considering the fact that taking on a role of such importance necessitates adequate preparation, especially for a state that has recently become a Member State and has never before held the Presidency of the Council[25]. It must be noted that the UK lost the opportunity to hold the Presidency of the Council despite not having officially notified the EU of its decision to trigger Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union. The fact that the UK had held a referendum on this matter and had publicly announced that it intended to put its result into practice was considered sufficient reason to modify the list of the Member States who were to take over the Presidency of the Council.[26]

On 22 May 2017, the Council, following the rules set out in Article 218 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union and the guidelines established by the European Council[27], authorised the Commission to open negotiations with the UK regarding a withdrawal agreement. At that time, it was expected that the negotiations would focus on issues regarding the freedom of movement, social benefits and competition regulations,[28] and that reaching an understanding on these issues would result in the conclusion of an agreement, but the reality would prove different.[29] Negotiations were officially launched on 19 June.

More than a year later, on 14 November 2018, the negotiators of the EU presented the draft withdrawal agreement that they had agreed on with the negotiators of the UK. They also presented an outline for a political declaration on future EU-UK relations. The next day, on 15 November, the EU's chief negotiator, Michel Barnier, handed the draft of the withdrawal agreement to the President of the European Council, who proposed the deal be finalised during the extraordinary meeting of the European Council scheduled on the 25

A hard border – necessary between a state that is a member of the EU and one that is not – would break the Good Friday Agreement, which prohibits the creation of such a border. November 2018.[30] On that day, the European Council endorsed the Agreement on the withdrawal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland from the European Union and the European Atomic Energy Community and approved the Political Declaration on future EU-UK relations.

During the General Affairs Council held on 19 November 2018, in Brussels, the participating ministers discussed the draft withdrawal agreement that had been presented by the negotiators on 14 November and advised the chief negotiator on the elaboration of the political declaration. Three days later, on 22 November, the President of the European Council sent the Member States the negotiated draft political declaration regarding the future relationship between the EU and the UK.

In December 2018, the Commission began the procedure for the signing and the conclusion of the Agreement on the withdrawal of the United Kingdom from the European Union, adopting a proposal for a Council decision on the signing of the Agreement and one for a Council decision on the conclusion of the Agreement.

On 11 January 2019, with Romania holding the Presidency, the Council adopted Decision 2019/274 regarding the signing of the Agreement on the withdrawal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland from the European Union and the European Atomic Energy Community.[31] The Decision authorised the President of the European Council and the President of the Commission to sign the Agreement on behalf of the EU and of Euratom.[32] At the same time, the Council adopted a draft decision on the conclusion of said Agreement, sending it to the European Parliament for approval.[33]

The Agreement mandates the creation of a Joint Committee,[34] comprised of representatives of the EU and of the UK and co-chaired by the two, as well as the establishment of several specialised committees on issues such as citizens' rights or Northern Ireland.[35] The Joint Committee will be responsible "for the implementation and application" of the Agreement and will have the power to make recommendations to the EU and the UK and to adopt, by mutual consent, legally binding decisions that must be implemented by the two.[36] According to the draft Council Decision on the conclusion of the Agreement on the withdrawal of the UK, the Commission will be the institution representing the EU in the Joint and specialised committees and expressing its positions,[37] while the Council will be the one establishing these positions as an exercise of its policy-making, decision-making and coordinating functions.[38] The Commission will also play a major role in direct interactions with the UK, being responsible for providing the state with the information and notifications required in the Agreement, consulting the UK on specific matters and inviting its representatives to attend international consultation or negotiation meetings. All these tasks must be fulfilled after consulting the Council and taking into account its advice.

The United Kingdom is authorised to negotiate, sign and ratify international agreements regarding matters that are part of the exclusive competences of the Union, but these treaties can only enter into force after the end of the transition period, when the UK is no longer be a member of the EU. In exceptional circumstances, the Council can, by means of implementing acts, provide an authorisation for the treaties to enter into force during the transition period.[39] The Council can also authorise Ireland the Republic of Cyprus and Spain to negotiate and conclude bilateral agreements with the UK in matters that are otherwise of exclusive EU competence,[40] given the "very specific situations" these countries find themselves in with regard to the UK.[41]

[32] The text of the Agreement was attached to Council Decision (EU) 2019/274. A particularly interesting provision is the one regarding the transition period, during which "notwithstanding all consequences of the United Kingdom's withdrawal from the Union as regards the United Kingdom's participation in the institutions, bodies, offices and agencies of the Union – Union law, including international agreements, will be applicable to and in the United Kingdom". Consequently, the United Kingdom must be treated as a Member State for the purposes of the withdrawal agreement during the transition period. Should the transition period be prolonged, the Council would have to act in accordance with the guidelines established by the European Council. This opens the possibility for the United Kingdom to try and protract the process of withdrawal in order to keep its status of Member State (albeit one not represented in the institutions of the Union).

The agreement must be concluded by the Council, acting on a qualified majority, after having obtained the European Parliament's approval. As opposed to the case of modifying treaties or mixed agreements,[42] Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union does not mandate the presence of the other Member States during the signing and the ratifying of the withdrawal agreement.[43] The President of the Council is the one to officially give written notification, on behalf of the EU, regarding the completion of the internal procedure necessary for the entry into force of the Agreement.[44]

In order to enter into force, the Agreement must be signed by the representative of the UK, by the President of the European Council and the President of the Commission. On 14 January 2019, the latter two exchanged letters with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, expressing their intention to do just that as soon as the Agreement is approved in the UK's Parliament. After that moment, the process of the UK's withdrawal began to stall – arguably not for the first time since its beginning. Several votes were held in the national Parliament, but the Agreement, in the form negotiated by the EU and the UK, did not gather the necessary support, leaving the EU waiting for a decision, one way or the other, to be taken by the UK.

On 19 March 2019, the Speaker of the UK Parliament blocked the possibility of holding a new vote on the existing Agreement. While negotiating a new deal would be possible in theory, if the EU agreed to it, 29 March 2019 marks the expiry of the two-year term provided by Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union, and various representatives of the EU and of the Member States have already stated that they will not grant the UK an extension without being presented with a serious and precise proposal regarding future actions. On 20 March, the Prime Minister of the UK sent a letter to the President of the European Council, asking for an extension period until 30 June 2019.[45] The answer came that same day, stating that, while a short extension could be possible, it would be conditional on a positive vote on the Withdrawal Agreement in the UK Parliament.[46] On 21 March, the European Union offered the United Kingdom an extension until 22 May 2019, on the condition that the UK Parliament vote the negotiated Agreement. Upon the failure to meet that requirement, a shorter extension, until 12 April, would be offered.

Conclusions

At the start of the negotiations, it was noted that the two-year time frame provided by Article 50 is rather a short one for an undertaking of such scope, especially since the withdrawal agreement should, ideally, be finalised well before the expiry of said period, in order to allow for the fulfilment of the necessary formalities regarding its approval and ratification by the EU and the Member States. In the beginning of the process, the EU's chief negotiator in the matter of the UK's withdrawal suggested that the agreement should be decided upon in a period of 18 months, with the following 6 months being allocated for its ratification[47]. Over time, it has become clear that those estimations were optimistic: at the end of the two-year period, a withdrawal agreement has been drawn up, but its signing and ratification are held up by the disagreements taking place in the UK Parliament.

The fact that both the negotiations between the EU and the UK and the debates held in the UK's Parliament have been mired by numerous difficulties suggests that the consequences of the UK's withdrawal had not been seriously analysed before the Brexit referendum, and neither had the positives of such a move been properly weighed against the negatives by those who endorsed it.[48] A possible way of preventing such a situation in the future, were another Member State to decide it wants to withdraw from the EU, would be to provide an obligation for that state to prepare a proposal for a withdrawal agreement before being allowed to trigger the application of Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union. While a term longer than the current two-year one might help by allowing more time for negotiations and preparations, it could also prove an unnecessary delay if the Member State does not fully take advantage of it. Considering how intricate the relations between the EU and its members are, and how each Member State has its own set of challenges and special circumstances, it is difficult to envision a single procedure that could be adequately applied to all Member States.

As evidenced by the provisions of the Treaties, of the draft Agreement on the withdrawal of the UK from [40] As a rule, Member States cannot negotiate agreements – or, indeed, adopt any sort of legislative acts – in matters regarding the EU's exclusive competences.

[42] Mixed agreements are international agreements concluded in matters that do not fall under the exclusive competence of the European Union. Consequently, they must be signed by both the EU and the Member States.

[43] This has been considered in accordance with the use of the qualified majority in the Council, as opposed to an unanimous vote, and with the will of the treaties' authors, whose intention was "to create a simple and efficient procedure in order to limit the duration of the withdrawal process" (unofficial translation). the EU and the draft Council Decision on the conclusion of the Agreement, the role of the Council in this process is an essential one and the Member State chairing the institution at such a time has a particularly difficult task. If Romania manages to successfully navigate this challenge, proving its capability and its dedication to the well-being of the EU and of the other Member States, it could use this experience to strengthen its relationship with both the European Union and the United Kingdom.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION TO VOLUNTARY ABORTION

Mihail STĂNESCU-SAS

Abstract

This paper is the result of exploring the contact zone between the freedom of conscience (and religion) exercised by professionals providing healthcare services, in the form of conscientious objection, and the right to voluntary abortion as invoked by the beneficiaries of these services. Is there a right to voluntary abortion or any positive obligation of the State to provide or to ensure these services are provided on an effective basis, what is the legal nature of the conscientious objection, do the two conflicting rights ever meet in the same plan and, if so, under what conditions one of them prevails or their balance is supposed to stand, at what point discrimination is set to arise in the equation are deeply sensitive topics which have the tendency to elude shaping a comprehensive theory. Without undervaluing the creative effect which court case law might eventually have while settling disputes, the legal science holds the burden to build such a theory, providing answers meant to serve as ante factum guidelines.

The broadness of the legal conditions for voluntary abortion should truthfully reflect the general moral attitude within the society concerning the exercise of this choice, since only maintaining this equation can effectively hold the basis for balancing the two conflicting rights, which both express the same principle of personal autonomy.

Keywords: conscientious objection, voluntary abortion, positive obligations, non-discrimination, balancing conflicting rights

1. Introduction

Voluntary abortion appears to be legal in Romania only because it is not anymore incriminated by the criminal law, starting the abrogation, by Decree-Law no. 1/1989[1], of articles 185-188 of the former Criminal Code, concerning the criminalisation of abortion, and of Decree no. 770/1966 regarding the regulation of the termination of pregnancy. The conscientious objection to voluntary abortion also appears legal just because it is not expressly prohibited.

As the conscientious objection is traditionally associated with different legally recognized avatars, of which the matter of voluntary abortion is just one, the legal science has been quite reluctant to recognizing a general applicability in this regard. Even though it has been defined in reference to a context "when a deeply held belief based on the deeply held moral values of a group or of an individual runs into the demands or determinations of the law"[2], it is barely seen "in most cases [as] the outcome of tolerance"[3]. However, the State is supposed to grant rights, not just to be tolerant. The emphasis on tolerance leads to the idea of the State discretionary power to grant conscientious objections only in separate cases and following solely its sovereign assessment, secured from any charge of discrimination. Its qualification as a right values the true mission of the State and forms the basis for a general application of the conscientious objection, subject only to legitimate restraints under the conditions provided for all restraints to freedom of conscience.

It is therefore no negligible theoretical effort to ascertain that the conscientious objection is provided, as a principle, by article 29 paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Constitution[4], regarding the freedom of conscience, so interpreted in accordance with article 9 paragraph 1 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[5], as stipulated in article 20 paragraph 1 of the Constitution[6]. In the same time, the right to voluntary abortion will prove to be generally guaranteed by the Constitution, especially under article 26, concerning the respect for the intimate, family and private life, but also under article 22 regarding the right to life, to physical and psychological integrity, and not to be submitted to an inhuman or degrading treatment. None of the two rights is absolute, as they may be restrained under the general conditions of article 53 of the Constitution, when they tend to manifest against each other.

Both conscientious objection and voluntary abortion are under-regulated legal realities and this situation may lead to a practical difficulty when one of them is pretended to hold supremacy over the other. While our enterprise is a long beat plea for freedom of conscience, it is also an affirmation of the need to balance the conflicting rights.

In this regard, we are to determine the comparable nature of these rights and whether the acknowledgement of an absolute character for any of them, at least in consideration to protecting the rights of others, might result in suppressing the competing right and in discrimination.

Our research follows the Romanian constitutional framework, which includes within the domestic law, according to articles 11 and 20 of the Constitution, the ratified international treaties, of which those regarding human rights take prevalence over the domestic law. Therefore, an increased attention is paid to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights [hereinafter referred to as ECHR]. However, since the conscientious objection to voluntary abortion has not been addressed directly by the Court, due consideration will be given to the relevant recommendations of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and to comparative law, stemming from the constitutions and secondary legislation of other States.

2. The right to voluntary abortion

2.1. Is it a right or just a permission?

The premises of this paper are that voluntary abortion is allowed on request, under either broad or restrictive conditions, but in the same time medical practitioners are entitled to manifest their freedom of conscience, in the form of conscientious objection to performing a termination of pregnancy. Should there be no right to voluntary abortion, but instead a right to life of the foetus, the law itself would oppose this practice and a conscientious objection would not be needed any longer.

We narrow our research to the topic of voluntary abortion because we find the situation when choice prevails over necessity to be the core of the matter. Our conclusions will be, mutatis mutandis, applicable when necessity outweighs choice, only then the impact of conscience over treatment will be much less significant than in the case of a mere expression of personal autonomy. Omission to apply a scientifically necessary medical procedure cannot be justified in terms of conscience if it leads to affecting life or physical or psychological integrity; it may only allow a prompt referral to a non-objecting practitioner, provided that the patient's life or physical or psychological integrity is not put under any threat.

Voluntary abortion is generally allowed in States practicing Western standards on human rights, in consideration of "health, safety and autonomy of the mother"[7], thus appearing as a component of the right to respect for the individual's private life[8]. The ECHR indirectly acknowledged that this fundamental right encompasses the right to voluntary abortion, finding that the prohibition of such a procedure constitutes an interference with the right provided by article 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[9]. Therefore, the Court's assertion that "article 8 cannot be interpreted as conferring a right to abortion"[10] remains to be interpreted only in the sense that this right is not absolute, so it may be restrained according to paragraph [6] Article 20 paragraph 1 of the Constitution of Romania reads: „The constitutional provisions regarding the rights and liberties of the citizens shall be interpreted and applied in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the covenants and with the other treaties to which Romania is a party".

[8] This principle is based upon the conception that the right to respect or the private life, mainly its component of personal autonomy, „incorporates the right to respect for both the decisions to become and not to become a parent". – ECHR, Grand Chamber, judgment of 10 April 2007, Evans v. United Kingdom (application no. 6339/05), http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-80046, paragraph 71.

[9] ECHR, Grand Chamber, judgment of 16 December 2010, A., B. and C. v. Ireland (application no. 25579/05), http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-102332, paragraph 216; the Court enunciated that this right is not absolute and may be subject to suffer restraints, so that „[t]he woman's right to respect for her private life must be weighed against other competing rights and freedoms invoked including those of the unborn child" (paragraph 213); „it would be equally legitimate for a State to choose to consider the unborn to be such a person and to aim to protect that life" (paragraph 222), the state enjoying a broad margin of appreciation in this regard, due to the lack of international political and scientific consensus related to the moment life begins (paragraph 237) and the ethical nature of the matter (paragraph 233). However, the Court avoided to state whether the unborn are to be regarded as persons, so that the prohibition in question to be interpreted as protecting their rights, but instead found that the sole legitimate aim pursued by the State (despite being proclaimed for "health and/or well-being reasons") was found to be one of ideological nature, namely the protection of the "profound moral values concerning the nature of life which were reflected in the stance of the majority of the Irish people against abortion during the 1983 referendum and which have not been demonstrated to have changed significantly since then" (paragraph 226).

[10] ECHR, Fourth Section, judgment of 30 October 2012, P. and S. v. Poland (application no. 57375/08), definitive on 30 January 2013, http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-114098, paragraph 96.

2 of the said article[11], but however not in the sense that it exceeds its scope.

For better or for worse, the recognition of a "right to life of the unborn […], equal to the right to life of the mother", as article 40 paragraph 3.3 of the Irish Constitution used to provide until 18 September 2018[12], would entail a set of consequences which are highly unlikely to be assumed: the foetus would be regarded as a person and therefore the abortion would become an interference with the right to life; the circumstances in which the pregnancy occurred, even in cases of rape or under-age, would become irrelevant.

Moreover, in a state of necessity concerning the life of the mother, when only one may or is scientifically likely to survive, a choice would have to be made, since an "equal right" theory becomes useless, according to nothing more than ideological grounds, be they ethical or just political. This eventually leads the matter where it all started, that is in the area of a chosen social ideology favouring natality over choice, the mother over the foetus or vice-versa, where prevailing imperatives are utterly separate from the protection of human rights: a policy to increase or, on the contrary, to decrease the birth rate for mainly economic reasons (to ensure a steady economic growth), but also military (to ensure enough soldiers), ecological (to prevent overpopulation and eventually the destruction of natural resources) or even racist motives (to prevent the need for mass immigration, which appears when the population is constantly declining). And since a mainly political choice would most of the time favour the mother or the foetus in a state of necessity, it will continue to govern the matter in any conditions. Once a mainly political choice gets to prevail outside the paradigm of human rights, the whole debate about the right to life becomes irrelevant.

It is actually the original blending of external moral and political arguments that make the accommodation of the mother's rights to those of the foetus' rights, should the latter be eventually recognized, logically impossible in terms of human rights; if these rights become contending, meaning mainly that the mother does not want to give birth, but also that she endangers her life or health by doing this, one of these rights will have to concede. If there is a risk to the mother's life, it would be ethically impossible to determine whose life is more important, so the choice will be made according to additional criteria. Considering the rights of others, mainly the family members, it will be the mother whose life might appear to be more important; but this is just a social criterium and it is not valid all the time, for example when the mother has no close family. An economic approach aimed to increase the birth rate would favour the mother, since she is an economically active adult, she has other children to raise and at least she may give birth to several children in the near future. Only, allowing an economic approach in this matter might just prove that this is the real motivation followed by the State. After all, the Romanian communist regime did not ban voluntary abortions for ethical reasons, nor by recognizing the right to life of the foetus, but for purely economic grounds, to produce a fast growth of the population. On the other hand, an economic approach aimed to decrease the birth rate, like that followed in China during the one-child policy, would necessarily favour voluntary abortion.

Even the above-mentioned article of the Irish Constitution was logically incompatible with the right to receive information about abortion services legally provided abroad, as the same article stated in order to ensure the compatibility of the overall illegality of voluntary abortion with the right to receive information, as a part of the freedom of expression[13]. If the life of the unborn was really protected equally as the life of the mother, then any kind of aid facilitating a voluntary abortion as an illegal act, including providing information, in conditions exceeding a state of necessity arising from a threat to the mother's life, would also be illicit. It is only the prevalence of the mother's undiminished and legitimate choice, despite voluntary abortion being forbidden, that lead the ECHR to the conclusion that restricting the access to information about abortion facilities abroad is a violation of article 10 of the Convention. However, at least when the prohibition of voluntary abortion applies only on the national territory and there are no restrictions to travel abroad and no concern for physical and psychological integrity is applicable, the Court has not found that this prohibition was, in principle, a violation of article 8 regarding the right to the respect of private life[14].

It follows that the conflict between the right to life of the mother and, if even recognized, the right to life of the foetus, is inextricable in terms of human rights, since a life is as important as the other, no matter the [11] European Commission of Human Rights, decision of 19 May 1976, Brüggemann and Scheuten v. Germany (application no. 6959/75), http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-74824, paragraph 5: „the legal regulation of abortion is an intervention in private life which may or may not be justified under Article 8 (2)".

[12] According to the 36-th Amendment to the Constitution of Ireland, article 40 paragraph 3.3 currently reads: „Provision may be made by law for the regulation of termination of pregnancy." – Bunreacht na hÉireann. Constitution of Ireland (Dublin: The Stationery Office, 2018), xiv; 154.

[13] Considering that under the Irish law it was not a crime to travel abroad in order to have an abortion, the European Court of Human Rights had found that restricting the provision of information concerning abortion facilities abroad was in violation of article 10 of the Convention, since this information „may be crucial to a woman's health and well-being" and „the injunction has created a risk to the health of those women who are now seeking abortions at a later stage in their pregnancy, due to lack of proper counselling, and who are not availing themselves of customary medical supervision after the abortion has taken place". – ECHR, Plenary, judgment of 29 October 1992, Open Door and Dublin Well Woman v. Ireland (application no. 14234/88 and 14235/88), http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-57789, paragraphs 72 and 77.

social implications, including the effects suffered by other people. This is valid both in a state of necessity, when the mother's life or health is in a scientifically proven danger, and outside such a state, when the pregnancy is the result of a rape or when the mother is herself a child, because the foetus cannot be blamed for the circumstances of its conception. In the end, it is not possible to interfere with the foetus' right to life without killing it, which means that, if its right to life is ever to be recognized, there will be no right to voluntary abortion, no matter the circumstances[15]. Moreover, since we find it hard to believe that it can be proven in due time that a certain pregnancy is absolutely impossible to contribute to the mother's death or injury, or at least to some deterioration of her health, this being actually treated in terms of conjectural (im)probability, any pregnancy involves a risk to life of both the mother and the foetus.

Therefore, in order to avoid the impossible choice in favour of any of them in terms of human rights and the transfer of this choice towards additional external criteria, mainly of political and economic nature, it has to be agreed that the only way to ensure the coherence of the human rights system is, indeed cynically, to prevent the affirmation of the right to life of the foetus, with the consequence of recognizing a right to voluntary abortion[16].

2.2. The positive obligation of the State to ensure voluntary abortion services being provided effectively

"Medical termination of pregnancy, performed in accordance with the law of the State in which it is carried out, constitutes a service"[17] and therefore falls into the scope of the freedom to provide services, stated in article 56 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union[18]. This does not mean, in terms of EU law, that the provision of these services may not be forbidden in a Member State and, regardless of the doubts expressed about them not being possible to forbid, by a State who decides to ban them on its own territory, to its own nationals even when they access them in another Member State, where they are legal[19], article 56 of the Treaty actually prevents a ban from being exported to another Member State, even in the consideration of the banning State's nationals[20].

Generally, the State cannot be responsible for organizing and facilitating the performance of all that is not prohibited, nor for establishing public services corresponding to all aspects of human freedom which are transposed into rights and freedoms. For example, the individuals enjoy the freedom of religion, but it is not for the State (at least for the democratic one) to create religions and set-up churches; they have the freedom of assembly, but it is not the State's duty to provide reunion halls; they have the freedom of expression, but the State does not have to come up with partners for one to discuss with, a place within the media or instruments of writing. If, however, the State decides to provide public services, like renting reunion halls or selling pens and paper, this does not necessarily mean that it has assumed a positive obligation in this regard.

Theoretically, the mere fact that a medical procedure like the voluntary abortion is not prohibited doesn't necessarily mean that the State is under an obligation to perform it, unless a positive obligation is identified in this regard. But since in practice the State regulates the healthcare system and also provides most of the medical services, operating a healthcare insurance scheme to sustain the system, it becomes responsible for the supply of lawful abortion services, as well as, like any public or private service operator, for the non-discriminatory nature of its services.

Therefore, ab origine, there is no obligation for the State to perform these procedures by itself, in State owned facilities and by State employed medical staff, but only to ensure their proper functioning. But when the private market of these services is underdeveloped or when such private services are inaccessible, even for only certain individuals, the State, whose primary role is that of organizer, will have to undertake the role of provider as well.

A positive obligation of the State to actively engage with abortions being carried out arises firstly when the mother's life or physical and psychological integrity are threatened by the pregnancy. In such a case, the positive obligations of the State to act in order to preserve these values correspond to guaranteeing her right to life or, respectively, her right to physical and psychological integrity, the latter falling, as a distinct component, under article 8 of the ECHR concerning the right to respect for private life[21]. When a risk of this kind is exhibited, even when voluntary abortion is generally forbidden and only allowed in such exceptional cases, the State has the positive obligation to provide „an accessible and effective procedure"[22] for establishing such a risk.

[15] According to article 53 paragraph 2 of the Constitution of Romania, a legitimate restraint of a right cannot affect the existence of that right. Hence, there is no possible way to restrain the right to life; once it exists, it is either respected or violated.

[16] Otherwise, there will always be room for equivocal proclamations, like that of the right to life being protected, „in general, from the moment of conception", as article 4 paragraph 1 of the American Convention of Human Rights provides. – http://www.oas.org/dil/treaties_B-32_American_Convention_on_Human_Rights.htm.

Consequently, even when abortion is generally prohibited and only allowed in exceptional circumstances, and a fortiori when it is generally allowed, the State holds a positive obligation to preserve the woman's life or physical and psychological integrity by ensuring, when these values are at an immediate or concrete risk, the access to medical services performing voluntary abortions[23].

This positive obligation extends to the situations when abortion is generally allowed in respect for the private life, as a legal manifestation of personal autonomy.

In this regard, it should me borne in mind that abortion holds by its own nature an urgent character, even when life or physical and psychological integrity are not in concrete peril, since the medical risks of this procedure have the tendency to increase during the pregnancy, until a point when abortion is no longer feasible; by that moment, if procrastination is imputable to the State, finding a violation of article 8 of the Convention is unavoidable.

Moreover, when access to a lawful abortion or to receiving a scientifically trustworthy diagnosis regarding the situation of the foetus, in order to make an informed decision to have an abortion or not, is rendered excessively heavy and time-consuming, the suffering induced to the patient may result in a violation not only of the right to respect for the private life, but also in an inhuman or degrading treatment, prohibited by article 3 of the ECHR[24].

3. The right to conscientious objection

3.1. The legal nature of the conscientious objection

The conscientious objection is a manifestation of freedom of conscience, in the form an opposition to civic or professional duties which entangle with a person's sincere moral convictions about essential individual and social issues. It is a typical individual manifestation of freedom of conscience and one of the most important aspects defining the derogatory nature of this fundamental right, as compared to the freedom of expression, since the general terms of the latter provide only a right to express an opinion, but not a right to resist performing an obligation.

A conscientious objection may be religiously or philosophically grounded, but its constant lies with deeply held moral values, for which a distinction concerning the individual attitude towards religion is irrelevant. In order to refuse a conscientious objection, insincerity must be proven without a doubt.

Its prominent avatar is the conscientious objection to military service, which is recognised equally in the consideration of religious[25] and non-religious[26] convictions. Sometimes it is strategically hidden between different constitutional provisions, as it happens in article 9a paragraph 4 of the Constitution of Austria, related to the alternative military service[27], or in article 42 paragraph 2 letter a) of the Constitution of Romania, providing that the work performed instead of [23] In this regard, it has been pointed out that „[a] ban on abortions does not result in fewer abortions but mainly leads to clandestine abortions, which are more traumatic and increase maternal mortality and/or lead to abortion "tourism" which is costly and delays the timing of an abortion and results in social inequities." – Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, Resolution 1607 (2008) – Access to safe and legal abortion in Europe, paragraph 4, http://assembly.coe.int/nw/xml/XRef/Xref-XML2HTML-en.asp?fileid=17638. Consequently, the Parliamentary Assembly invited the Member States to „guarantee women's effective exercise of their right of access to a safe and legal abortion" (paragraph 7.2) and to „allow women freedom of choice and offer the conditions for a free and enlightened choice without specifically promoting abortion" (paragraph 7.3) – Ibidem.

With all the declaratory tendency to state its exceptional nature, subject to an express provision of the law[28], the conscientious objection is a general principle of freedom of conscience. Therefore, it can be refused only as a restriction of this fundamental right, under the standards of article 9 paragraph 2 of the ECHR[29]. This renders ineffective, at least under the standards of this international instrument, any intention to generally deny it, as a result of interpreting national constitutional provisions, no matter their more[30] or less[31] categoric terms.

There is a difference concerning the effects of the conscientious objection, as it implies duties meant to satisfy exclusively the State's interest, like the military obligations, or happen to be integrated in a framework of conflicting fundamental rights. As this distinction falls outside the scope of this paper, because the first hypothesis is logically excluded in the matter of voluntary abortion, it suffices to point out that dealing with conflicting fundamental rights creates a necessity for balance, meaning that, as a matter of principle, restricting all of them to the concurrence of the balance point, or better to say balance margin, may prove the only way to respect all, meaning not to suppress or render ineffective any of the rights involved and still grant them to most possible extent.

We find it undoubted that voluntary abortion involves a moral choice and fundamental implications for the individual conscience, notoriously sustained by religious or secular doctrines who tend to give prevalence to the value of life of the foetus and its human nature; therefore, there is no point in empirically demonstrating that there are people who, for reasons of conscience (involving both religious and non-religious convictions), so in exercising their fundamental right to freedom of conscience, are in the position to resist a legal or contractual obligation to take part in a voluntary abortion, as a medical procedure.

The fact that medical practitioners have voluntarily chosen their job is irrelevant in respect to the conscientious objection, since this is not an argument to deny it[32].

There is no much need for balancing fundamental rights when, for example, one out of many physicians in a medical facility refuses to carry out a voluntary abortion, because there would be no impediment that the issue is dealt by one of the other physicians. The workload will be possible to balance, considering other medical activities. At least the whole matter may unhappily result in a disciplinary procedure, in which only the doctor's freedom of conscience will be involved, so there will be no reason why, being the only fundamental right in question, it should not prevail over his or her general legal or contractual obligations.

In the modified version the Hippocratic Oath provided by the Romanian Law[33], any physician undertakes the obligation to fulfil his or her profession "with conscience and dignity", as well as not to accept any religious considerations interpose between his or her duty and the patient. Even if this is an obvious alteration of the original oath providing the obligation not to "give a woman a destructive pessary"[34], this modern oath insists upon guarding, even under threat, "full respect for human life from its beginnings", implying that, in a systematic approach, defining the beginnings of life (which is far from a purely scientific concept, since the word is used in its plural form, suggesting a rather ideological meaning) is subject not just to material law, but also to conscience[35]. It follows that the above-mentioned religious considerations, which may not interpose between the doctor's professional duties and the patient, refer only to a duty of non-discrimination on grounds of patients' religion or lack of religion, but not of religious self-neutralization of the physician, by forbidding a conscientious objection as a general manifestation of conscience.

There will be however a need for balance when the exercise of the conscientious objection by several medical practitioners will result in rendering the voluntary abortion service ineffective or significantly difficult, provided that the State has a positive obligation to ensure the functionality of these services, as a guarantee for a concurring fundamental right (respect for the private life, if not other rights), a matter which will be approached further on.

3.2. The right to voluntary abortion colliding against the freedom of conscience

Both these rights originate in the principle of personal autonomy, involving a personal critical appreciation of the good, as a common value shared as well by the whole society. It is this common origin that makes any abstract choice between the two rights the result of a moral choice, which is usually ideologically integrated. This remark is no more than a mere application of the general postulate stating that "[e]very individual judges in terms of conscience the orders and the social norms whose addressee is"[36], because any law is, essentially, no more than a result of a conscientious choice and conscience is naturally and continuously challenging its products.

In a case where voluntary abortion was allowed only under restrictive conditions, including when the pregnancy is the result of a rape, the ECHR found that, such conditions being met, the "unwillingness of numerous doctors to provide a referral for abortion or to carry out the lawful abortion as such constituted evidence of the State's failure to enforce its own laws and to regulate the practice of conscientious objection"[37].

In follows that, since the right to voluntary abortion is, under restricted or a fortiori under broad conditions, a component of the right to respect for the private life, the State has the positive obligation to ensure the functionality of such procedures; this obligation includes a predictable use of conscientious objections, so that this does not transform into a de facto denial of the right in question. Once the State has instituted either broad or restrictive conditions for voluntary abortion, "the legal framework devised for this purpose should be shaped in a coherent manner which allows the different legitimate interests involved to be taken into account adequately and in accordance with the obligations deriving from the Convention"[38].

"States are obliged to organise their health service system in such a way as to ensure that the effective exercise of freedom of conscience by health professionals in a professional context does not prevent patients from obtaining access to services to which they are entitled under the applicable legislation"[39].

In the presence of a conflict between individual rights, the right to respect for the private life on the part of the patient and the freedom of conscience on the part of the medical staff, it is not a solution of prevalence which is to be sought, but one of proper balance. In principle, there is no way the medical practitioner's right to object is guaranteed differently than by allowing him, when motives of conscience are involved, to refuse the performance of a voluntary abortion. However, if theoretically all doctors were to raise the same issue, there would be none left to perform this otherwise lawful service. Finding a proper balance between the interests involved may be based on the premise that such an extreme scenario is not happening and only some of the medical practitioners actually raise conscientious objections. Should it indeed happen, a rational exercise shows that it would be an expression of the largely shared moral views within the society which would consequently result in more restrictive conditions for voluntary abortion, equating in congruent restrictive conditions for the conscientious objections.

Thus, when conflicting individual rights are involved, it appears that the conscientious objection has a quantitative dimension, showing that its width is indirectly proportional with the percentage of objectors. When they become a majority, either they can change the law, so there will be no need to object anymore, or, not being able to change it because that would make it undemocratic, a similar outcome will apply to their objection.

Therefore, in the case here discussed, the conscientious objections raised by medical practitioners will be more successful as they form a narrower minority; when a physician will not perform a voluntary abortion due to a matter of conscience, but there is a colleague right next door with no impediment in this regard or any other, there are no individual rights to balance; the patient will be easily able to resort to the other physician. When it is more difficult to find another one, due to any practical reasons, the objecting physician will have to refer the patient to a compatible colleague. The ECHR found this practice, together with that of communicating the objection in writing to the patient, to be compatible in principle with both rights involved[40].

4. The need for balance

4.1. Ways to balance the conflicting rights

Although we discern isolated conscientious objections from a wide-spread phenomenon, and this distinction can prove itself useful when settling a dispute, it may prove useless in terms of prevention. The legislator may know or not know the frequency and intensity of conscientious objections in the ranks of medical practitioners across the country but is unlikely to always anticipate any significant developments in this regard. A regulatory action is more desirable to intervene outside an already existing conflict, because when acting in a particular ideological context there will be a greater risk for the State's intervention to be perceived as a back up for one of the parties. Because the rules are normally supposed to be set before the game and not changed during its course, the observance of the State's obligation of neutrality and impartiality may impair its possibility to act in order to regulate the rights and obligations of already conflicting parties. Therefore, we find for the adoption of a principled regulatory framework before a conflict between fundamental rights arises, integrated in a philosophy of dynamic balance; the law must be able to react by self-adjusting to society's moral needs.

By Resolution 1763 (2010), the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe invited the Member States "to develop comprehensive and clear regulations that define and regulate conscientious objection with regard to health and medical services, and which: 4.1. guarantee the right to conscientious objection in relation to participation in the medical procedure in question; 4.2. ensure that patients are informed of any conscientious objection in a timely manner and referred to another health-care provider; 4.3. ensure that patients receive appropriate treatment, in particular in cases of emergency"[41].

These three requirements make up an original solution to the conflict of fundamental rights involved in the matter of voluntary abortion, meant also to prevent any discrimination. There is a particularly wide space for the conscientious objection, since no quantitative cap appears to be set to prevent it, not in terms of numbers of objecting medical practitioners, nor in terms of distance or costs involved. Paragraph 4.1 pleads for an absolute right to object for reasons of conscience, if read in conjunction with paragraph 1, stating that "[n]o person, hospital or institution shall be coerced, held liable or discriminated against in any manner because of a refusal to perform, accommodate, assist or submit to an abortion, the performance of a human miscarriage, or euthanasia or any act which could cause the death of a human foetus or embryo, for any reason"[42]. Balancing the physicians' freedom of conscience to patients' rights, when a voluntary, on request, abortion is in question, seems to remain just a matter of proper information and referral to a non-objecting practitioner.

This original solution stems from assuming a reasonable quantitative equation. If theoretically there was practically or almost no practitioner left to perform a voluntary abortion due to a quasi-unanimous conscientious objection, this would not be a result of a doctors' conspiracy aimed to violate the fundamental right to respect for private life or to discriminate against women whose conscience prescribes or at least allows voluntary abortion or against women who are poor or just uniformed; on the contrary, it would be the result of a twist of general moral opinion about the value of life which served as a legitimate purpose for the Irish constituent when adopting the recently abolished ban on voluntary abortions, that is to institute a restriction upon the right to respect for private life, as approved by the ECHR in the A., B. and C. v. Ireland case, as discussed above in paragraph 2.1.

A fortiori, when such an extreme peradventure is not actual, objecting medical practitioners must only promptly inform the patient about his or her conscientious objection and immediately refer her to another practitioner[43]. This firstly implies the duty to obtain information in this regard at an institutional level, a task which cannot be entirely put upon the objecting practitioners. Ultimately the State is responsible for gathering and disseminating relevant information to all medical facilities and indirectly to their employed practitioners, so that the latter, in case they decide to object, can promptly pass that relevant information to the rejected patients.

The ultimate triumph in matter of conscientious objection is, be it for concurrent reasons too, the recognition of a discretionary right to object without procedure was available to them under which they could have their views heard and properly taken into consideration with a modicum of procedural fairness" (paragraph 108).

[41] Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, Resolution 1763 (2010) – The right to conscientious objection in lawful medical care, paragraph 4, http://assembly.coe.int/nw/xml/XRef/Xref-XML2HTML-en.asp?fileid=17909.

[42] Ibidem. This paragraph does not extend, as was stated and criticized (Elena-Ancuta Franţ, Legislația românească privind avortul în context European [Romanian legislation on abortion in European context], Analele Științifice ale Universității Alexandru Ioan Cuza din Iași, seria Științe Juridice, no. 1/2013, 62), the applicability of the conscientious objection to legal entities like the hospitals or institutions there referred to, but only deals with the consequences of raising such objection by the individual practitioners, upon the hospitals or institutions in which they activate.

[43] To this respect, article 33 of the Code of Medical Ethics of the Romanian College of Physicians, adopted by Decision no. 3/2016, published in Monitorul Oficial, partea I, no. 981 of 7 December 2016, titled „Refusal to provide medical services" reads: (1) Refusal to provide medical assistance may occur under the strict conditions of the law or if by the request of the individual in question the physician is asked to perform acts which derogate from the professional independence, affect his or her image or moral values or the request is not in conformity with the fundamental principles of exercising the profession of physician, with the purpose and the social role of the medical profession. (2) In any case, the physician will explain the individual in question the reasons for his or her refusal, will ensure that due to the refusal of providing medical services the life or health of the said individual are not endangered and, inasmuch as the refusal is based upon the breach of his or her moral convictions, will refer the individual in question to another colleague or to another medical facility".

any reference to conscience, as provided, for example, by the French Public Health Code[44]. This can also be an example of how the urge to take out the conscience issues outside the public sphere can turn against the recipients of public service, should many medical practitioners make use of that discretionary right.

Nevertheless, the viability of such a solution essentially depends upon the functionality of the equation we have envisaged above. If the objectors eventually form a majority and the still lawful medical service in question is no more properly functional, because the access to it has become practically impossible or significantly difficult, resulting in discrimination against women[45] who, for example, do not afford to travel abroad or to a remote area of the same country in order to benefit from it, and there is no normative change as a result to this moral approach within the medical community, a collision of the conflicting rights will result in a breach of the legal right to a voluntary abortion. If, despite a moral choice largely shared within the society, the law maintains no restraint upon the right to voluntary abortion, it will be the conscientious objection which shall disproportionately bear the cost. So conflicting rights will have to be balanced, either by the way of an evolving legislation or by the way of applying a static legislation; both ways are never detached from the social context, but instead have to provide solutions to the latter's disfunctions.

4.2. Coordinates of discrimination in the context of conscientious objection to voluntary abortion

Besides the State's positive obligation in terms of access to voluntary abortion as a medical right, the situation here discussed involves not only this patient right, but also her conscience, as well as the medical practitioner's conscience. For if the medical practitioner's conscience opposes the performance of a legal medical procedure, and the access to it becomes ineffective or significantly difficult for a patient whose conscience, if it doesn't prescribe it, at least it allows it, then there would be a conflict in terms of conscience between the patient and the medical practitioner; the ideological neutrality of the State, which is one of its basic obligations in a democratic society[46], compels it not to take sides in an ideological conflict like that concerning the rightfulness or wrongfulness of the legal abortion, since this matter inevitably involves choices of conscience. If the State backs up the majority of the objecting medical practitioners, so that the individuals who are entitled to a legal voluntary abortion cannot actually obtain it, the State would inherently adopt the ideological position of the former and reject that of the latter. This would amount to discrimination as much as not recognizing any right to conscientious objection.

Therefore, the State is about to discriminate against the medical practitioners if it denies the exercise of the right to object for reasons of conscience as well as against the patients if it allows the medical practitioners to object up to the point the lawful voluntary abortion becomes practically impossible or is rendered significantly difficult. This perspective envisages a need to balance the conflicting conscience rights of medical practitioners on one side and those of the patients on the other.

The Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe highlighted "the need to affirm the right of conscientious objection together with the responsibility of the State to ensure that patients are able to access lawful medical care in a timely manner", showing concern for the fact "that the unregulated use of conscientious objection may disproportionately affect women, notably those with low incomes or living in rural areas"[47], thus resulting both gender and economic status as supplementary discriminatory criteria. This observation is generally related to healthcare services, therefore is also applicable to voluntary abortion.

A separate discrimination issue may involve the circle of individuals who are entitled to object to voluntary abortions, given the diversity of the medical professions and their direct or less direct implication in the performance of such procedures. Conscientious objections are genuinely associated with the physicians who perform voluntary abortions, but the situation of the other medical staff involved in the process is comparable. It has been shown that "[t]he scope of conscientious objection allowed by the law may differ accordingly among different practitioners"[48]. This limits the objectors' group to those who have a close and concrete (or direct) involvement in the abortion procedure, or otherwise said "a certain level of complicity"[49], letting aside those who do not have such an involvement, like the staff who only care for a woman who will or has had an abortion, who prepare the necessary medical instruments or who clean the surgery room, as well as the medical students who have the obligation, despite their convictions, to learn all the relevant medical information, including that which concerns abortions[50].

[44] Article L-2212-8 of the French Public Health Code reads: „A physician or a midwife is never obliged to perform a voluntary termination of pregnancy, but has to inform the interested person, without delay, of his or her refusal and to immediately communicate the names of practitioners or midwives susceptible to realize such intervention [...]. No midwife or nurse, no medical ancillary, of any kind, is not compelled to concur to an abortion. A private health institution may refuse voluntary termination of pregnancies being practiced in its facilities. However, this refusal may not be opposed by a private health institution authorized to ensure the hospital public service, unless other institutions are capable to respond to the local needs [...]". – https://www.legifrance.gouv.fr/affichCode.do?cidTexte=LEGITEXT000006072665.

It follows that a possible, yet erroneous distinction is to be avoided in what regards nurses and other medical auxiliary staff, following the application of two irrelevant criteria: their ancillary role as compared to the physicians' and their professional subordination to the latter[51], who enjoy a rather independent professional statute. The valid criterium is the nature of the activity in question, not the statute of the objector, so that an objecting nurse will still have to perform any activity which is not in close and concrete connection with the abortion itself; the only thing which he or she may object to is the actual participation to voluntary abortion, consisting of helping the physician to carry it out, from the moment it is initiated until it is completed. Therefore, the conscientious objection does not cover pre-operative or post-operative care.

In cases where the functionality of one or several healthcare institutions, as far as voluntary abortion is concerned, is affected by the great proportion of objecting medical practitioners, a favourable circumstance for discrimination is most likely to be experienced either way.

Raising a conscientious objection cannot be a disciplinary offence, so it can never result in a disciplinary sanction, the less in a disciplinary dismissal, since that would be an inadmissible breach of both freedom of conscience and right to work. A layoff, as a consequence of a post or function being abated, would be equally unjustified, since in principle, precisely for reasons of non-discrimination, posts or functions contained by an organization chart of a medical facility cannot be divided between objecting and non-objecting staff, unless carrying out voluntary abortions is a "genuine and determining occupational requirement"[52]; this is generally not the case, since the medical practice, even only in the field of obstetrics and gynaecology, is notoriously vast; it can only happen if the posts or functions are established precisely for practicing voluntary abortions, which circumvents the possibility of layoffs to specialized abortion clinics.

As regards the acts of employment, when the functionality of voluntary abortion practice is seriously affected by the high percentage of medical practitioners already working in a medical facility, according to the nature of each position, the employer may consider the fact of non-objecting as a "genuine and determining occupational requirement" and therefore may refuse to employ, in this specific context, the practitioners who declare they object or fail to make any statement in this regard. However, nothing impedes the practitioners who did not object to carrying out voluntary abortions at the time of their employment to sincerely become objectors afterwards. They cannot be discriminated against due to this choice of conscience, which cannot in itself be a reason for a layoff. If, however, the employer can prove that he was deceived, because for example the medical practitioner in question has a long history of objecting to voluntary abortions with previous employers, the employment contract can be annulled for undue influence. It will still not be the case for a disciplinary sanction, because the fraudulent conduct regards the act of employment itself and not its exercise.

5. Conclusions

In follows that the right to respect for private life encompasses the right to voluntary abortion, which is not absolute, but may be restrained for the protection of morals. A right to life of the foetus does not enter the legal equation, since it cannot be only restrained, but only suppressed.

The right to voluntary abortion, recognized either under broad or restrictive conditions, like those related to foetus impairment, pregnancy resulted from a rape or under-age pregnancy, involves a positive obligation for the State to ensure the functionality of the necessary healthcare services, so that women have an indiscriminate access to such lawful medical services. The State's failure in this regard results in a violation of the right to private life and may also cause violations of the rights to life or to physical and psychological integrity, or not to be submitted to an inhuman or degrading treatment, as well as discrimination based on conscience of belief, gender, social or economic status.

A highly sensitive moral approach regarding voluntary abortion is unavoidable, as well as an ideological stand, either in favour or against it. Hence, it is altogether legitimate that medical practitioners enjoy the right to object for reasons of conscience to carrying out voluntary abortions.

Despite the tendency to attain an absolute right to conscientious objection, this option is conditional upon the functionality of the healthcare system. This may be achieved naturally, if there are enough available non-objecting medical practitioners, or by restraining the right to object, which proves that the affirmation of an absolute right to object, to the limit of the least complicity, is not feasible.

[50] Learning is to be differentiated from performing, under supervision, a voluntary termination of pregnancy, which even a medical student may object to, invoking an obstacle of conscience. See, B. M. Dickens, R. J. Cook, op. cit., 76.

[51] Idem, 72.

[52] Article 4 paragraph 1 of Directive 2000/78/EC establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation, published in the Official Journal L 303/2 December 2000, reads: „Notwithstanding Article 2 (1) and (2), Member States may provide that a difference of treatment which is based on a characteristic related to any of the grounds referred to in Article 1 shall not constitute discrimination where, by reason of the nature of the particular occupational activities concerned or of the context in which they are carried out, such a characteristic constitutes a genuine and determining occupational requirement, provided that the objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate."

There is instead only room for balance and not for the full supremacy of any of the rights involved, which both originate in the principle of personal autonomy. The idea of balance implies that not just one of these rights is supposed to concede to the other, but they both need to be subjected to mutual concession, to the point they both remain in force to the greatest possible extent. In order to ensure the viability of such a system, the State should not forbear restraining both rights involved, because it is the affirmation of just one's false absolute nature which conducts directly to a violation of the other. This statement equally regards the freedom of conscience and the right to respect for the private life.

Nevertheless, restraining the freedom of conscience can never attain the same level of efficacy as restraining the right to voluntary abortion.

In the first case, the restraint may follow a progressive approach, discerning cases when choice prevails over necessity, so that a conscientious objection cannot be allowed up to the point it leads to any rational endangerment of a patient's life or physical or psychological integrity; then, even when abortion is carried out on request, a minimum involvement may be asked from the objecting practitioners, precisely by rendering information and promptly referring patients to non-objecting practitioners, as well as informing their employers about their principled decision to object; also, the employers may assume priority in hiring non-objectors instead of objectors, meaning that they may also decide to make such an inquiry when hiring, should there not be any non-objectors left among the already employed or they be in such short numbers that the functionality of the service in question is affected.

In the second case, there is need for consonance between the way voluntary abortion is morally understood within the society and the broadness of the conditions of its legality.

In the end, the constitutional standards allow the right to voluntary abortion to be restrained for the protection of morals, as a democratically determinable subjective reality, which can be approached gradually, but do not allow that objecting medical practitioners are coerced to carry them out or sanctioned following the exercise of their right to conscientiously object.

LEGAL STATUS OF ANTI-DRONE SYSTEMS UNDER INTERNATIONAL LAW

Andrei-Alexandru STOICA

Abstract

The idea behind countering drone systems has been an ongoing issue for both states and the international community as it became clear that unmanned vehicles are going to become an integral part of any state's arsenal and infrastructure.

As drone technology developed so did the necessity to protect communities, borders and even rights from prying eyes and possible incursions. Furthermore, the requirement to protect communities and high value objectives has been detrimental after drone technology became accessible to a larger demographic, but while a large spectrum of drones can be bought by almost anyone, the same can't be said about counter-drone technology, which is currently sparse or exclusively in governmental control. Most anti-drone systems on the market are variants of existing anti-weaponry devices that were given another capability, but sometimes without meeting the requirements for certification or receiving a proper updated mechanical or software part.

This paper will focus on outlining a series of anti-drone systems that are available and how they are being currently used by states inside and outside their borders, but also to show who is allowed to use them and under what circumstances. Furthermore, the paper will showcase why international law is important in governing how counter-drone systems are deployed and used by states and why international law will be a frontrunner in the legalization process of said systems.

As a conclusion, the paper will mediate between current legal systems from states that have adopted anti-drone systems and how the international community must ensure the safety of other states and their citizens from the growing threat of unlawful drone deployment

1. The legality of drone systems under current international law.

In aviation, space, or ever roads, drones have achieved a level of implication that robotics and automation failed to gather and as such a drone is considered an unpiloted craft that can be used in such a way that the safety of the pilot is put firsthand, while ensuring less mechanical difficulties.

As such, drones have been around for a long time, some of the earliest recorded usages were from the time period of 1848-1849 when the Austrian Empire attacked Venice with a revolutionary tactic for that time period, an air raid. The air raid was conducted with balloons strapped with explosives while a copper wire acted as a trigger mechanism for dropping the bombs[1]. The bombs did not cause major damage but the psychological impact was devastating to the inhabitants.

Once technology evolved, drones were supposed to help the Allies in World War 2 to carry out bombing runs without the need to put lives in danger[2]. As such, B-24 bombers were supposed to be remote controlled so that they can destroy German bunkers in occupied France, but unfortunately the program ended in a disaster.

Later on, development went from controlled aircraft to controlled missiles, which offered the real proto-drone by today's standards. This marked the usage of surveillance drones in conflicts such as Vietnam, where over 550 drones had been lost and over 3000 intelligence missions were conducted[3].

While these drones had the capability to use weapons during combat situations throughout the Vietnam, Bosnia, Kosovo, Yemen conflicts and culminating with the Taliban insurgency, the first proper drone strike featuring the signature targeted killing nomenclature was in 2001 when the United States of America used a Predator drone to strike Mullah Omar, a Taliban leader, but failed to strike the target and instead caused other insignificant damage to the Taliban cause. This strike alone almost caused the operation to come to a halt[4] and caused a rupture in the chain of command.

The need to equip drones with lethal and non-lethal equipment came after CIA failed to take out Osama bin Laden in 2000, when after flying a drone over bin Laden's compound US forces figured that by the time the Tomahawk missiles would hit the area, bin Laden would have gotten away and would go into hiding. This moment sparked the need to equip drones with equipment needed for different outcomes.

Seeing the growing spectrum of activities where drones are active it's only safe to assume that a need to counteract these devices and vehicles from illicit activities is a must in a democratic society that acknowledges the rule of law.

While drone usage has skyrocketed signaling a global market value of over 127 billion dollars[5] , so must the legal framework ensure that only legal drone systems are permitted to operate inside a state's border and outside of it. Drones operate in helping with traffic solutions, energy transportation and production, but also in city and rural infrastructure development and as such the possibility of an illicit action must be countered.

The issue with drone defense mechanism is that the legality mechanism described by Article 36 of the Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions (1949) has to be met before the mechanism is deployed[6]. As such, a minimum legal standard has to be achieved before drones and anti-drone systems are deployed in both conflict and peace activities.

But seeing as how drones have been around for hundreds of years and only after two world wars where they acknowledged through the Paris Convention of 1919 and Chicago Convention of 1944 when unmanned aircrafts (balloons, unmanned planes and guided aircraft) had to be integrated in the airspace of a state and ensure that state actors and citizens respect territorial limitations and also obtain the proper documents to legally own and fly said devices[7]. No aircraft capable of being flown without a pilot shall be flown without an onboard pilot over the territory of another State without special authorization by that State and in accordance with the terms of such authorization. Each State undertakes to insure that the flight of such aircraft without a pilot in regions open to civil aircraft shall be so controlled as to obviate danger to civil aircraft.

However, state practice has downplayed the efficiency of these norms, meaning that both public and private entities have to find other, more long-term solutions that also fall into these legal limitations outlined by current treaties.

2. Means and methods of countering the unmanned vehicle threat.

The growing drone technology implementation in agriculture, tourism, law enforcement and transport also brought new threats to these fields, while also endangering data protection legislation.

For example, U.S. forces captured drones belonging to the Islamic State which were supposed to be used as improvised bombers. The sound of the drone rotors gave them away and as such the ground forces managed to take out the drones using standard ammunition[8]. A similar scenario played out in Venezuela in 2018, when two drones had been spotted near President Nicolas Maduro who at that time was giving a speech. One drone exploded near the venue and another missed the mark and crashed, but while the attack did not injure anyone, the psychological impact of the explosion dispersed the crowd.

Another important event in which a drone was countered is marked by the downing of the RQ-170 Sentinel drone that was spying Iranian facilities in 2011[9]. The drone was taken out not with conventional anti-air methods, but instead had its software hacked and flown down without causing real physical damage. Fast forwarding to 2018, Israel confirmed shooting down a drone that was similar to the old RQ-170 Sentinel model that was captured by Iranian forces in 2011[10].

The year 2018 also marked a growing trend of drones being captured or destroyed in armed conflicts as Russian forces captured drones armed with explosives near its army bases near Lattakia (Syria). Of the 13 drones that were identified, 7 where taken out with conventional anti-air methods and 6 had been hacked by electronic warfare units[11]. Albeit primitive looking by todays standards, the makeshift design choice was intended as it helped the craft avoid jammers and radars while also lowering production costs, but still relied on satellite navigation.

Other counter-drone incidents involved the usage of Patriot Missile Defense Systems deployed in Israel, in 2017 and 2018, as a means to enforce the 1974 Agreement on Separation of Forces and as such to enforce the demilitarized zone between Syria and Israel[12]. This sparked a lot of criticism from western states since a standard Patriot missile costs somewhere in between 1 to 6 million USD dollars, while the drones involved in these skirmishes were very cheap.

All these incidents show how easy drone can be used to create cheap and efficient chaos on the battlefield and can spark a new trend in terrorism threats and conducts on civilian targets far away from any battlefields.

jihadi phenomenon[13] highlighted that ISIS used drones for terrorism acts and intelligence gathering activities since 2014. A lot of these drones had been acquisitioned from Europe and delivered to Syria and Iraq to be used against the national and foreign forces deployed there.

After the downfall of the Islamic State, terrorists' part of the movement issued threats that retaliatory terrorist acts would be taken against western cities via drones. Propaganda videos developed in Syria and Iraq showed how drones released bombs on unsuspecting targets in cities and caused collateral damage as result.

Further analysis of this type of new-age terrorism revealed that operatives had to fill-out feedback forms on the results they achieved or did not achieve[14]. In the early years of the conflict, the Islamic State tried to use drones as efficient spy planes, but later on changed their tactics to better reflect those of the United States or United Kingdom, both of them using armed drones to strike targets with signature strikes. About one-third of the aircraft, some as small as model airplanes, dropped bombs or were rigged with explosives to detonate on the ground, while Iraqi officials said bombs dropped by the drones, which were primarily quad copters, had killed dozens of governmental soldiers, caused a lot of injuries and it had a particular value as a propaganda tool.

The document also points out that most of these drones had been commercial drones that anyone can buy from a store and had been retrofitted with explosives with ease, making them lethal, but not really a game-changer in the conflict.

The RAND Corporation and World Economic Forum also published a report[15] that explains how there is basically no barrier in acquiring and arming a store-bought drone and how the proliferation of certain emerging technologies has effectively diffused power and made it available at the lowest levels.

This potential to take down airliners, governmental buildings, landmarks or to conduct assassinations has no limit and current means and methods of defense cannot stop this growing phenomenon.

The report also claims that Hezbollah and Houthi rebels have managed to learn, without external aid, how to operate small drones in order to take down air defenses, while also concluding that the worst nightmare for any security service or law enforcement agency is that anyone can drop chemical, biological or nuclear poisoned materials from drones, more so as 2020 will spark a boom in drone transport technology.

One of the most acknowledged events in which drones caused serious discontent was marked by the 2018 Gatwick airport chaos[16] that was caused by individuals who operated personal drones very close to the airport and by doing so almost caused an aviation incident that could cost human lives. The incident led to a 36 hour lockdown and at least 6 arrests, while also causing western based governments to admit that a nationwide counter-drone strategy is required in order to prevent unlawful drone usage.

The problem with the Gatwick incident is that most drone using states had been warned in advance regarding such vulnerabilities. The FBI told the U.S. Senate that drone threats are escalading and that security agencies require new tools in order to protect civilian lives and property[17] and so President Donald Trump gave new powers to federal authorities in order to develop programs, deploy tools and tackle emerging drone threats by removing them, however it would be deemed necessary, from the sky. Since 2017, the Federal Aviation Agency has banned drones over military bases, national landmarks, nuclear sites, airports and other sensitive areas, ever since the 1 million drones' registration mark had been hit.

Others claim that Gatwick was just the tip of the iceberg as terrorists would much rather hit objectives where mass gatherings happen, such as stadiums. These gatherings can average around 40 000 people at a time and as such a terrorist attack would much rather take place there than at an airport[18].

To counter such a threat, the U.S.A. devised a radar that can identify targets based on their physical characteristics, meaning that the radar can identify birds, balloons and drones, while also communicating the flight path to the radar operator. Afterwards, the drone can be intercepted with electronic jammers or lasers. This radar was tested and certified by the Federal Communications Commission in 2019 as the radar was used to protect the Super Bowl LIII event[19].

This radar came as a legal response to a loophole that forbid local law enforcements to tackle drones as these unmanned vehicles could only be targeted and handled by federal agencies. To help local authorities, the Trump administration opened up projects that will help both public and private sectors to control ongoing drone traffic around sensitive areas and as such to deter potential unlawful activities.

The United Kingdom used the Drone Dome[20] to counter drones by soft-killing and ceding control in order to safely land the threat. The Drone Dome was first used in the conflict against ISIS and helped coalition forces to liberate Mosul. The system itself is mounted on a moving platform and can jam controls in a 360 degrees arc. The manufacturer also sells a laser mounted system that can hard-kill targets. The radar itself can identify different kinds of targets from up to 5 kilometers away[21].

While technology against technology might seem the proper answer, other states tried to find a cheaper alternative to combat drones. The Netherlands[22] and Russian Federation[23] tried using hawks to hunt drones, but later found out that these birds of prey are not capable in tackling heavier drones and instead tried using falcons to capture drones, both states having success on a small scale and will require a lot of time before it can be implemented in every large city.

Japan saw a need to counter drones after the 2015 Tokyo incident, when a drone carrying a poisonous substance was found on the roof of the Prime-Minister's house. This sparked the Japanese police to train a special taskforce capable of preventing and capturing drones that fly to close to sensitive locations by flying a drone armed with a large net[24].

The Russian Federation on the other hand developed the Stupor gun, an electromagnetic pulse gun that can take out drones and even small aircraft or helicopters by knocking out the link between the operator and his craft. Support documentation explains that the device is capable of suppressing navigation and transmission channels used by unmanned aerial vehicles, as well as their photo and video cameras within the electro-optical range of frequencies[25].

While most the aforementioned equipment is found mostly in the hand of specialized operators that are part of state public authorities, a lot of accessible anti-drone equipment can be bought by individuals who want to protect their property from unlawful operations.

For example, SkyWall100[26] is a shoulder mounted gun that fires a homing projectile, which opens up and captures the drone with a net, then pulls the drone down to the ground with a parachute, making it a non-lethal approach to drones. On the other hand, the DroneShield[27] is a gun that fires electromagnetic pulses towards the drone, terminating the connection with its operator and so allows the gun owner to control the drone and land it without destroying it.

Both these options are based on already tested equipment that is found in the arsenal of army and law enforcement agencies. Also, it's important to note that a lot of other similar equipment have been showcased, most of these means and methods of countering drones having spawned a plethora of similar competition.

However, the most efficient anti-drone system was the software-lock that drone manufacturers integrated from the start, at least in advanced drones that offer their own operating system. For example, the Chinese drone manufacturer, DJI, developed a software based mechanism that prevents the drone from flying in an unlawful manner or close to protected areas, while also making the drone to refuse commands if the operator does not update the drone to meet legislative criteria[28]. The software-lock also offers a kill-switch meant to allow authorities to neutralize a threat preemptively, but unfortunately the locking software was later hacked by different hacker groups and was easily bypassed by anyone interested.

This prompted DJI to integrate a new mechanism instead of the lock, a mechanism that requires the user to pass a flight knowledge quiz that also involves understanding legal aspects of lawful flight[29]. The software was tested in the United Kingdom, Australia and China and could be implemented by other drone manufacturers at a later stage.

One of the shortcomings of inefficient drone traffic control and improper registration in a national registrar is that crimes get more efficient due to new technologies being introduced into the fray. For example, the United Kingdom face a growing number of drone operators that act as drug dealers and use their drones to smuggle drugs inside prisons[30]. A similar practice was also spotted in Canada, Australia and the United States of America.

To counter the drug carrying drones, prisons started using more barb-wire as an efficient low tech solution, but are also testing anti-drone electronic jammers and guns.

Still these solutions are in a testing phase and current legislation found in almost all drone operating states does not offer enough of a guarantee that operators will have a lawful conduct nor does it offer enough protection for potential victims of unlawful conduct.

Without a proper certified anti-drone mechanism, states have to resort to improvised solutions while testing methods of countering drones and certifying these methods to ensure a legal and fair use. For example, Germany and the United Kingdom have been testing an automated response system that connects to different and existing gathering tools (satellite, radar, cctv) and afterwards deploys a counter drone that after it acquires its target it captures it with a net-gun[31]. However, the manufacturer has yet to certify the mechanism and also claimed that such technology is still in early stages, meanwhile other incidents such as Gatwick can happen anytime.

Meanwhile, drone incidents continue to rise and the potential of these types of conducts to cause a tragic event will continue uncontested. In China a person was detained for flying up-close to a commercial airliner that was doing a landing maneuver near an airport[32], while in Canada a drone hit a plane, causing light damage, with the owner remaining unidentifiable and forcing the government to start a real legal reform[33].

3. The legal standpoint regarding anti-drone systems.

Drone legislation has been passed in a number of states, in thanks to the International Civil Aviation Organization and European Union paving the way and thus ensuring that states have a similar legislation in regards to operators and their obligations to fly or operate under strict guidelines, anti-drone technology is relatively new and has yet to fully comply with article 36 of the Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions (1949) or other international covenants.

The problem with legislation is that major players in the drone industry, such as the United States of America, forbid usage of counter-drone technology to the general populace and only certify state actors to handle with such technology. Counter-drone mechanisms have been tested during armed conflicts, but in an internal state affair, it could cause collateral damage and could be considered disproportionate[34]. For example, by using a drone jammer it would affect not only the targeted drone but also other gadgets, radio-communication devices and even the health of living beings.

Authorities could end up violating national statues regarding wiretapping, sabotage and computer fraud laws if the countermeasures are deployed without a clear understanding of the rules and regulations that apply. The common denominators in counter-drone technology are detectors and defenders. These terms are being advertised as counter drone technology are not really counter technology but are just drone detectors, the systems can't really do anything to stop drones, rather they identify the drone and its operator and also alert police forces in order to locate the drone operator on the ground and force the drone to the ground.

In the European Union detectors (radars) that have the possibility to detect drones have been tested and will be fully integrated in the European Aviation Safety Agency and EUROCONTROL air traffic and navigation system once the unified airspace regulation will be adopted.

Although many radars exist, they do not all comply with the laws, because they either use the right frequencies but are not yet certified or they do not use the appropriate frequency for a given state. Frequencies allocation is not the same for every state and all of these allocations must be done by a certified authority[35]. Also, most radars are placed near seaports or airports and have a technical radius of detection so a lot of space inside a state remains uncovered.

Other methods of detection include acoustic, optical and infrared detection, but all of these have shortcomings when dealing with homemade drones or drones that are not equipped with telecommunication capabilities. For example, unmanned underwater vehicles have low acoustic and electromagnetic signature, making them difficult to locate by these means, thus making them ideal for underwater intelligence gathering, mine detection and neutralization and can also traverse the polar ice cap[36].

While almost all radar systems are certified and article 36 (Additional Protocol I, Geneva Conventions of 1949), some are currently being developed to be integrated inside a drones, meaning that drones can identify drones in their respective field of activity. For example, the JY-300 is a Chinese drone, equipped with an autonomous module that can perform take-offs and landings, also the drone can be mounted with sea-target detection radar, synthetic aperture radar and optical and electronic surveillance apparatus[37].

As noted, the identifying a target does not equate to neutralizing the threat and so it must be used in conjunction with other methods.

The most common target-neutralizing methods described are the classic radar and conventional lethal or non-lethal ammunition. This means that the Convention on Certain Conventional Weapons[38] (1980) and its 5 protocols has to have its criteria met beforehand in armed conflicts. Out of the protocols, Protocol IV[39] has an interesting prohibition regarding the usage of lasers seeing as how lasers are not expressly prohibited unless they were designed to inflict blindness.

However, drones and their operators cannot be blinded since the Protocol does not prohibit attacks against binoculars, periscopes, telescopes, and other optical equipment because the attack does not affect the operator who in most cases watching from very far away or is behind a screen and allows for attacks on electronic optical equipment, because damaging it would not cause human injury, as such drones only get their internals destroyed and not the human operator.

Legally countering drones can also be done with firearms and depending on who the shooter is (private person, police force, and army), weapons can be used from small scale and small stopping power, such as pistols, to heavier ordinance such as missiles or shells.

Jamming and hacking seem like the more elegant solution since a drone requires telecommunication channels to function, and in most cases the link between operator and drone is not encrypted.

Both jamming and hacking represent a kind of approach that has side-effects, meaning that it is indiscriminate and disproportionate if used without proper planning. For example, the United States of America through the Federal Aviation Agency in 2018[40] explained in a circular letter sent to airports that jamming technology can create a host of problems, such as electromagnetic and radio interference affecting safety of flight and air traffic management issues.

The object of jamming is to render radio transmissions unintelligible by causing interference, as such, but by using said jamming devices civilians and law enforcement agencies could very well fall short on the standards developed by the International Telecommunication Union in 2016 regarding Radio Regulations[41] and also the Union`s Constitution[42]. The risks associated with counter-drone methods involve the usage of blocking transmissions that are reserved for special situations (police, medical or firefighters) and can even block air traffic control radar beacons.

Jamming in armed conflicts can however be permitted as long as it does not violate article 8 of the Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property[43] and the attack complies with Rule 8 of the Customary International Humanitarian Law adopted by the International Committee of the Red Cross[44]. As such, civilian communication lines have to be protected from jamming as they are not military objectives per-se, yet numerous military manuals and official statements consider that an area of land can constitute a military objective if it fulfils the conditions contained in the definition and in turn a jammer can hit that entire area, drones included, without it being considered a violation of international humanitarian law.

Drone jamming, done in either civilian or armed conflict situation, has to also comply with article 36 of the Additional Protocol I, as the device must be certified by a state authority and has to have a legal basis to operate. Most states have criminalized the interference with lines of communication and as such only state actors could legally take down a drone with jamming devices, this means that the law prohibits willful or malicious interference to government communications; subjects the operator to possible fines, imprisonment, or both.

Hacking (or spoofing) on the other hand is subject to a series of conventions and guidelines that are not legally binding, except for customary law that is common in all situations of armed conflict and international human rights law. For example, the Tallinn Manual 2.0[45] applies the doctrine of state responsibility, codified mainly in the International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility (2001) and so any kind of cyber operation targeted towards any specific terminal (including drones) translates to international responsibility for a cyber-related act that is attributable to the state and that constitutes a breach of an international legal obligation, neither physical damage nor injury is required for a cyber-act to be an internationally wrongful act and geography is not determinative in determining state responsibility.

While traditional counter-drone methods such as lasers or bullets can offer a near irrefutable indication of attribution of an activity to a state's actors, jamming and hacking cannot be so easily be traced. However, all state actors implicated in the usage of hacking and jamming technology must respect human rights law regardless.

As an example of how the legal system could react to counter-drone mechanisms, a U.S.A. national court had analyzed a case regarding the shooting down of a drone that was hovering near private property. The local judge in Kentucky that judged the criminal charges that were brought against the drone slayer stated that he had the right to shoot the drone since it was an invasion of privacy. Later, the decision was appealed to a District Court, the appeal was dismissed as lacking of subject matter jurisdiction and thus the protection of private property against drones saw a surge in the need of proper anti-drone devices[46]. It's important to point out that the drone slayer case happened in a state (from the United States of America) that allows citizens to fire weapons more freely, other states from the U.S.A., Europe or other places will not tolerate illegal weapon discharges and will require interested parties that suffered from unlawful drone usage to seek protection from state authorities.

Currently the Federal Aviation Agency and the European Union Aviation Safety Agency both have similar classification for types of drones, some being in the same category as aircraft and so using counter-drone mechanism could be a criminal act since some drones fall under a special category that has a very special legal protection.

In 2018, a man in Texas was arrested for criminal mischief after he shot a drone that was operated by his neighbor. The drone was not on his private property but on the neighbor's side but the attacker claimed that it caused some light damage to the trees near his house and as such protected his property. Since the drone was not violating his property, the attack was deemed as a criminal offense[47].

As counter-drone systems allows the possibility to take-over the drone and its controls, state legislation requires that operators (in certain categories) be certified and/or own a pilot license for that type of vehicle. This means that if a person counters a drone by taking over the drone, which said person should own a certification to also operate it as operating without proper papers could also lead to administrative measures and even criminal offenses.

In a Congress Report compiled by the United States Government Accountability Office[48] found that over 6000 drone sightings near sensitive objectives had been reported in the U.S.A. since 2014, but only 49 of these were followed by a legal action. In most cases, the operator could not be identified and the drones rarely show up on current radar technology. Until a unified space for both traditional aircraft and drones is set up, small flying drones will continue to cause problems for authorities.

As it stands I.C.A.O.'s Manual on Remotely Piloted Aircraft Systems[49] and JARUS's recommendations[50] are the only generally civilian and commercial norms that are accepted on an international scale, and as such offer the best perspectives for states to adopt a stance on countering drone threats. What the Congress Report compiled by G.A.O. did outline was that only a handful of states (members of the international community) adopted national legislation that requires drone operators to obtain operational certificates and to register with a national registrar, thus allowing an uncontrolled proliferation of unmanned vehicles.

Currently, the United States of America has started a legislative reform to allow governmental agencies to mitigate drone threats that come close to sensitive areas, while also exempting counter-drone activities from federal criminal laws[51], while the European Union adopted the Drones Amsterdam Declaration[52] in order to implement the U-space Demonstrator Network, a system that will allow better security and privacy legislation and enforcement mechanisms in order to prevent unlawful usage of drones.

As drones become smaller and faster so must the response to unlawfulness be on par with the development of said drones. In the future, soldiers will have to carry anti-drone equipment when going on the battlefield and so military squads will compromise of drone and anti-drone users, with their respective gear[53].

4. Conclusions

To summarize, counter-drone legislation is an integral part of drone legislation, one cannot function without the other, but technology has evolved in a rapid burst and so states must identify the best solution to counter not only legally manufactured drones but also homemade drones that function on other frequencies and with different load-outs than the commercially available ones.

As more states open registrars for different kinds of drones and adopt better detection capabilities, so will homemade drones have to comply to universally accepted standards or face legal action from state authorities in order to comply. There are enough counter-drone devices, both work-in-progress and traditional to ensure that private property and privacy are protected from unlawful conduct and also to protect military objectives. The only downside is that everyone is going for the cheaper alternative instead of trying to identify solutions that do not require the usage of force or tampering.

Such solutions are already offered by international organizations in the form of registrars, universal design standards and the possibility to impose fines and even jail time to those who do not comply to socities rules. Unfortunetly, society had to endure the growing fear of ISIS terror threats of improvised drone bombs to grasp the problem while other incidents where human lives where put in harms way, such as the 2017 Seatle incident where a person got 30 days of jail time and a fine for crashing a drone in a person and causing said person to be knocked unconsciously[54].

The year 2017 also saw the incident between a civilian drone and an army helicopter, back when the United Nations General Assembly was in session. The army helicopter was doing a patrol mission, while the drone was in a no-fly zone, and so the operator was found guilty of flying the drone in the no-fly zone.

Unless states move to adopt a common position on how to treat unlawful conduct, then drone countering devices will remain needed and must be certified in order to be used by law enforcement agencies and private contractors or civilians.

The lack of express legislative actions in counter-drone devices should be seen as an inaction of state actors, but rather it should be seen as a continuation of adapting current legislation to current issues.

However, unless a unified space for drones to be accepted in is not developed, then the proliferation of drones will remain a problem that will have to tackle and so even a soft-ban of drone could happen, a move that may seem counter-productive to the current economy where aautomation represents a key development in combating lack of human resources. Current estmations point out that 2030[55][56] will be the year of autonomy in jobs, where drones and robots in general will overtake the number of people and so being able to counter rouge or hijacked robots will be deemed mandatory.

COOPERATION AND VERIFICATION MECHANISM(CVM) REPORT 2018 AND THE CHALLENGES OF THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM

Florin STOICA

Abstract

Although it is an increasingly popular theme in the romanian public space, justice, as a power in a state, faces European challenges and internal challenges. Current legislative changes impact or halt the progress made during the ten-year mechanism of cooperation and verification of romanian justice. We wonder if the eleventh year is a crossroads one for the judiciary, or if it is a year of rearranging the progress made in the ten years of monitoring. We also raise the question of the effect of this public service and the impact it shall have on the population. If at this moment Romania has a black spot in the European filter regarding justice and if this public service serves the public interest are the premises from which we will go during this study. The obvious progress made so far can be jeopardized by this controversial period of the system, the period in which this state power is subject to political and public pressure. Could civil society influence the outcome of the latest Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM) Report, or politics is the one that attracted this result, there are two other key questions for the context in which Romania is at this moment. Activating the famous Article 7 of the EU Treaty, dubbed the media "nuclear weapon" against Member States that violate the values of the Union, is one of the challenges that the Romanian state has to face.

1. Introduction

To begin with the starting point of the establishment of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM), namely, with the date on which the Benchmarks Objectives were adopted as a part of the CVM , notable progress is being made, regarding the Case-law of the Court of Justice and the ECHR, standards, best international practices[1] and the availability of comparative information regarding the national judicial systems found in the EU[2] which also contribute to picturing the local landscape in an objective manner , the evolution of the judiciary system and the fight against corruption in Romania.

In 2017, the European Commission noted the progress which the romanian state had had in ten years of monitoring by the cooperation and verification mechanism and at the same time provided twelve recommendations aimed at completing the monitoring process. The European authorities therefore considered that the recommendations of January 2017 are satisfactory and shall clearly lead to the conclusion of the CVM[3], the only impediment being the national one, namely whether the evolution of the situation would have clearly reversed the meaning of progress. On this subject, the Council's proposal was to put an end to the cooperation and verification mechanism for Romania when the four milestones in place shall be achieved in a sufficient manner[4].

National challenges regarding judicial independence have had repercussions at the level of the Council and the Commission, which emphasized to the romanian authorities, the importance of complying with the community legal framework and the obligations arising as a result of the statute of member and of adhering to the accession treaty.

From the theses of the latest CVM report, we know that the majority of the measures taken by the romanian state have prompted the Commission to reconsider the basis on which the overall assessment has been built. In its actions, the Commission considered the negative opinions, which the Venice Commission issued, aiming the legislative changes made by the competent romanian authorities.

In terms of the latest monitoring report, we need to realise whether current legislative changes have made an impact or stopped the progress achieved in these ten years of cooperation mechanism and verification of the romanian justice and should realise whether we are witnessing an evolution or involution of the romanian judicial system. In the following, we shall try to analyse the effects and recommendations of the report on the romanian system of justice.

2. Content

2.1. Current Premises

Not only the socio-political context, but also judicial and social factors shall be considered the most relevant for the romanian state's ability to perform reforms of its own judicial system. Thus, on an X-ray of the romanian national system, we find that the difficulties in stabilising consist of inadequate legislative practices, confrontations between the political system's actants, but also the difficult media context. At a simple reading, we would be tempted to emphasise that these shortcomings are not subject to the CVM report, but indirectly the impact on the progress of judicial reforms is felt strongly.

Following the report in year 2017, progress stagnated, and the up above mentioned factors did not suffer any changes, but on the contrary, attracted an unfavourable image and context to the progress of justice.

Thus, fundamental legislative changes, adopted hastily, without consultation, the media landscape, the press attacks on magistrates, the conflict between authorities, the pressure on civil society, the implications of the Constitutional Tribunal, public demonstrations are part of the factors that generated concern at the level of the European Union authorities and which attracted the involution of an independent judicial system and the reform of judiciary against high-level corruption.

With the entry into force of the GDPR, Member States are required to ensure the protection of freedom of expression and information in relation to the mass-media.

Facing the european authorities, the motivation to adopt legislative changes by speeding them up, namely the protocols of cooperation between judicial institutions, mainly the criminal prosecution bodies and the romanian intelligence service, were a source of systemic abuses, especially in Corruption cases, is not a solid foundation. Thus, the recommendations of the european assessors lead to conducting independent surveys to establish the implications of other entities and to determine whether systemic deficiencies have been recorded.

3. Progress towards the January 2017 report and the current context

The foundation of the previous report necessitated the reconsideration of two key areas, namely the judiciary acts and the legal safeguards for the independence of the judiciary. The Commission and has paid particular attention to the revocation of the chief prosecutor of the Anti-Corruption Directorate.

Thus, the three judiciary acts, drawn up and in force since January 2004, govern the judiciary, the statute of judges and prosecutors, the functioning of the courts and prosecution offices and the Superior Council of Magistracy. The CVM Report of January 2017, attracted the attention of the romanian authorities on the necessity for an open, transparent and constructive legislative process in which the independence of the judiciary is to prevail.[5] The reform of the romanian judicial system can ensure its durability if the opinion of the Venice Commission is taken into account.

Although the laws of justice are now amended, these amendments in force [6] , contain a number of measures which instead of strengthening the judiciary system, they weaken its independence, and are likely to undermine the independence of legal actors and therefore lead to a decrease in trust in the judiciary.

Among the most problematic legislative changes, include the creation of a special section of prosecution for investigating offences committed by magistrates, the new provisions on the material liability of magistrates for their rulings, restrictions on freedom of expression in the case of magistrates but also the new provisions on the revocation of members of the Superior Council of Magistracy[7].

All these mentioned changes are not consistent with the recommendations of the last report, which involved legislative amendments to the procedure of appointing high-ranking prosecutors. Thus, the result of these changes materialised in the strengthening of the role of the Minister of Justice[8] and in weakening the character of independence of the judiciary. External observers, including the Venice Commission, the Group of States against GRECO corruption[9] noted that these changes could lead to the undermining of the independence, efficiency and quality of the judicial system.

All these assessments do nothing but highlight the constitutionality check and the socio-political context, which is an important factor in making these legislative amendments.

that any interference with the freedom of expression of a Judge in a high position requires strict supervision and aspects of the functioning of the Judicial system must be rewarded a high degree of protection, in accordance with the right to freedom of expression.

3.1. Independence of the judiciary and judicial reform

Among the most important recommendations of the CVM report of 2017, the establishment of an independent system for appointing high-ranking prosecutors and the establishment of a code of conduct for parliament members.

Successive reports have revealed the inefficiency and the deficiency of the selection system of high-ranking prosecutors. The Commission notes the limited role of the Superior Council of Magistracy and the power given to the Minister of Justice in this procedure. Unlike the previous report, during the last period under analysis there was no progress to be achieved in this respect and the romanian authorities avoided to ask for the advice of the Venice Commission. Instead, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe notified the institution[10] referred to. The opinion of the Venice Commission specifically refers to the importance of making changes, so that the appointment and revocation process is neutral and objective, thus ensuring a balance between the functions of different institutions[11]. All amendments brought to the legal package of laws of justice led to the weakening of the role of the Superior Council of Magistracy and the role of the President of Romania in the process of appointing high-ranking prosecutors. This can only be noted as a regression in relation to this recommendation.

In The Code of Conduct for parliament members, where clear provisions on mutual respect between institutions and respect for the independence of the judiciary should have been included. However, this recommendation has also not been complied with and has not made progress. Thus, during the year 2018, the criticisms that covered the judiciary, as a whole was constant. These critics came from government and parliament representatives, and their effect translates into the weakening of the trust in the judiciary.[12]

Although the 2017 report took note of the adoption of a code of conduct by the Parliament and the Government, the socio-political context and the turning point recorded by the judiciary system in 2018, lead to a setdown in this area. Thus, the Commission was misinformed of the cases in which proceedings were initiated in Parliament, which could be the answer to a statement that prejudices the independence of the judicial system.

Recommendation 3 referred to the completion of the process of reform for the Code of Civil Procedure, and this evolution illustrates the lack of stability in the development of key legislative acts. Although in December 2016, a new deadline was set, namely 2019, for the implementation of the other provisions of this code. The CVM report of November 2017 noted that measures were being adopted to establish the necessary infrastructure to respond to the new system. However, in June the Parliament adopted amendments that made substantial changes to the code of Civil Procedure, namely the elimination of the Council Room stage in civil procedure. The High Court of Cassation and Justice challenged many of the amendments at the Constitutional Court.

The reform process also takes into account the conclusion of the current phase of the amendments targeting the Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure. The amendments reflected the need to adapt to the decisions of the Constitutional Court and to transpose EU directives[13]. Nevertheless, commencing with the bill adopted in the year 2017, the amendments added before the debate of the law adopted in 2018 were contrasting as these radically changed the content of these norms.

These changes constitute a profound revision of the codes published in the year 2014, referring to the procedural aspects of criminal investigations and procedure, as well as to the balance between the public interest in sanctioning criminal offences, the rights of victims and the rights of suspects. At the same time, these changes restrict the scope of corruption as a criminal offence, which would lead to a setback of the recorded advances. However, these amendments have not entered into force at the time of the publication of the report, as they were being challenged by the Constitutional Court[14]. But not only constitutionality was the issue of these changes, they have also raised problems of a legal and political nature.

To these amendments, the Venice Commission[15] was very critical, stressing on concerns about the status of law by the fact that offences remain unpunished, the lack of quality of legislation at hand, the shortcomings in drafting and the contradictions with the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights and international obligations of the country, in particular, the fight against corruption. The Venice Commission recommends reassessing the changes made to criminal [11] Opinion no. 924/2018 of the Venice Commission, 20 October 2018. The Venice Commission admitted that it might be necessary to amend the Constitution in order to make changes to ensure a fair balance between the role of the different institutions.

[12] See Recommendation CM / Rec (2010) 12 of the Council of Europe about Judges: Independence, Efficiency and Responsibilities, paragraph 18: "If commenting on court decisions, the executive and legislator should avoid criticism that would undermine the independence of the judiciary or weaken trust the public in justice. codes in such a way as to draw up a robust and coherent legislative proposal.

Transparency and predictability of the legislative process for legislation regarding the reform of the judicial system and the fight against corruption is another problematic remark of the CVM report. Since most of the proposed provisions have not enjoyed a certain degree of transparency and clarity. The fact that in the opinion of the Commission of Venice on the laws of justice was found that major problems remain in these laws, also the concerns that changes to the Criminal Code and the Procedural Code may not be compatible with the legal obligations undertaken by Romania at EU level and also internationally, illustrates the risk of these accelerated procedures. Thus, it cannot be considered that this process is in line with the recommendation.

The efficiency of the judicial system translates also in compliance with the judgements and enforcement of these judgements given by courts[16]. Following a conviction handed down by the European Court of Human Rights in 2016, Romania proposed to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe an action plan aimed at solving structural problems caused by non-enforcement of judgments against the State.[17] With regard to this action plan, steps are being made in order to make progress, thus a set of measures to be taken are being presented to the government. Proposals refer to amendments of the legal framework in order to ensure timely implementation and a mechanism to monitor and prevent the late execution of judgements in which the Member State is the debtor. The Ministry of Justice and the Superior Council of Magistracy also record further progress on the computerised register of Judgments in which the state is debtor or creditor.

Regarding the structural reforms that target the judicial system, the CVM report of 2018 noted the progress on the implementation of an action plan which establishes structural reform measures which are to be taken by 2020 for the development of the judiciary, noting that this should be an instrument that brings considerable advantages to users of the judicial system and to strengthen public confidence. The action plan also addressed issues such as the creation of a permanent mechanism for dialogue between the representatives of these three state powers and updating the informatic system in terms of data protection[18].

Recommendation 7 referred to the Transparency and accountability of the Superior Council of Magistracy, a measure that has no advance and no regression because the political context has put difficulties in the optimal functioning of this body.
The Superior Council of Magistracy encountered increasing difficulties in maintaining the approach described in its priorities, the government rejecting a number of its opinions. The report from year 2017, underlined the importance of presenting public reports by the Superior Council of Magistracy, regarding all activities carried out, in order to defend the independence of the judiciary and to protect the reputation, independence and impartiality of magistrates. However, the SCM has not publicly issued a firm measure even if the public opinion was quite hostile to this professional category.

3.2. Integrity framework and National Integrity Agency

The placing in service of the system PREVENT is one of the achievements of the current report, this system has the role of preventing conflicts of interest in public procurement procedures by creating an ex-ante verification mechanism and by providing the possibility for the contracting authorities to remedy the problems before awarding the contract. There are currently no shortcomings in the implementation of this project, the system being fully operational and the National Integrity Agency's (NIA) reports recording of positive results[19]

In addition to warnings, PREVENT has led also to a greater awareness among contracting authorities. The preventive approach gains ground and the increasing will of the great majority of the contracting authorities to remove potential conflicts of interest before the signing of contracts, demonstrates its quality. The CVM report notes the legislative amendment regarding the possibility of imposing a fine on the contracting authority that does not respond to alerts received through the PREVENT system.

However, the report emphasises that, although the balance sheet of the agency remained constant regarding the cases of incompatibility and conflicts of interest of an administrative nature, the stability of the legal framework for integrity still faces challenges. In particular, two legislative proposals were adopted by the Parliament, which include mentions about a perscription period of three years for the facts leading to the occurrence of conflicts of interest or [18] The Superior Council of Magistracy, the National Institute of Magistracy, the National School of Clerks and the Judicial Inspection successfully applied for projects within the specific objective 2.3 of the Administrative Capacity Operational Program. The Public Ministry also implements several projects funded under the same strategic objective.

[19] From the start of operations in June 2017 to September 1, 2018, PREVENT analyzed 16,102 procurement procedures with a cumulative value of approximately EUR 15,470 million. Eight percent of the procedures under review related to EU funds. ANI issued 57 integrity warnings, some of them on high-value purchases. The total amount of the value of the procurement procedures for which an integrity alert has been reported is EUR 112 million. In 48 cases, contracting authorities eliminated possible conflicts of interest. In 9 cases, the potential conflict of interest was not addressed. ANI launched a conflict of interest investigation in two of these cases.

incompatibilities[20] and the regime of penalties for conflict of interest in the case of local elected officials. The report also notes the challenge of financial resources of the National Integrity Agency, these becoming increasingly limited[21].

The implementation of judgements relating to Parliament members has since 2016 been the concern of the International Observers, whereas it is necessary to clarify the rules on incompatibilities and conflicts of interest in such a way as to meet the CVM refference objective concerning the adoption of ' binding decisions that can lead to the application of dissuasive sanctions.

The Commission considers that there is significant progress as long as functioning of the Prevent System is ensured and as long as the clarity of the rules issue is solved.

3.3. Fighting corruption at a high level

The various movements that took place since the last report, evolution which ocurred since the CVM Report from November 2017 led the Commission to reexamine its evaluation. This practice of putting pressure on institutions that have a central role to play in the fight against corruption raises concerns about their ability to continue to achieve results and therefore to the irreversibility of the fight against corruption.

The Commission underlines in a critical sense, the pressure to which the National Anti-Corruption Directorate (NAD) was subjected, pressure that affects its independence. Harsh criticism from the media and high-ranking politicians, but also the failed attempts to appoint the chief prosecutor, have attracted many doubts about the process. Thus, regarding the legal framework, the amendments to the Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, adopted by Parliament before the summer period, could also undermine the fight against corruption. The impact of corruption has been highlighted in widespread, frequent criticism about these changes. Therefore, investigations, prosecutions and convictions were put into danger and the facts considered corruption offences were restricted. Moreover, also noted by the opinion of the Venice Commission[22] that emphasizes: "Taken separately, but in particular, having the view of their cumulative effect, many changes will severely affect the effectiveness of the criminal justice system in Romania with regard to combating different forms of criminality, including corruption-related offences, offences committed with violence and organised crime.

Recommendation 10 is centered on the Parliament's responsibility for its decisions reffering to applications for the authorisation of preventive measures and also on applications for authorisation to investigate a Member of Parliament when he/she holds or has held the function of minister. Provision, which was provided by the fundamental law reflecting many parliamentary systems where immunities exist for the protection of members of parliament in the exercise of their mandate for which they were elected. The recommendation relates to the application of this competence.

During the year 2018, there was no follow-up action in relation with the Government's invitation to amend the legislation in order to enlighten the fact that ministerial immunity applies only to actions undertaken by ministers during their term of office.

The recommendation also proposed the presentation of reports regarding decisions and organising a public debate. A starting point in this direction is that the debates held in parliamentary committees and plenary sessions are transmitted live and can be viewed online also in a later stage.

With regard to this recommendation, the Commission reconfirms its conclusion in the year 2017, namely the need for further efforts in this area. In order to close this benchmark, Objective 3 from the current report of the Commission proposes additional recommendations.

3.4. Fighting corruption at all levels

Starting from the latest report, in 2017, reffering to the national anti-corruption strategy, progress has been made, by organising thematic evaluations of public institutions with the aim of verifying how these institutions define the risks of corruption in key areas and the measures in place to prevent incidents like these. The Commission appreciated the publication of the first monitoring report[23] done by the Technical Secretariat of the Ministry of Justice, in March 2018.

Among the objectives of the strategy is to increase the performance terms of the fight against corruption by imposing criminal and administrative sanctions.

Since the establishment of CVM reports, a key point has also been the development of the National Agency for Administration of Divested Goods (NAADG). It is currently fully operational and continues to develop its work. The Commission notes the progress made in the development of a national integrated system for monitoring the measures taken by the authorities at each stage of the process of recovering the goods. The Commission recommends the agency to develop activities regarding the public and social reuse of confiscated property, where the legislation provides support for the civil society projects such as those in the field of legal education, prevention of crime, assistance to victims and other public interest projects.

As with the other benchmarks, also in this case it proposes further efforts in order to make progress towards concluding this benchmark. Corruption prevention is hampered by the political developments which undermine the credibility of progress.

4. Conclusions

Even though during the year that has passed since the last report, Romania has taken steps to implement some of the recommendations, the negative measures are questioning the progress made and implemented successfully in the decade of monitoring.

If initially, through the draft of amending the legislation regarding the judiciary it was attempted to discover the most effective legislative solutions that can improve the work and organisation of the judicial system, activity, quality of which is directly influenced by the quality of the human resources that perform justice, in all its shapes: professional knowledge, balance, maturity, seriousness and dedication, currently by the entry into force of the revised legislation the advances that by far seemed implemented, had been cancelled.

Instead of shutting down the justice monitoring process now acquires new valences and new recommendations. Thus, the remedies to which the report for the year 2018 refer to are the revision of legislation by complying with the recommendations of the international observers. The Commission also recommends suspending the implementation of the current legislation.

The sensitive recommendations of the current report also take into account appointments and revocations in the judiciary, but also to remedy deficiencies in codes and their implementation, which must be in terms of compatibility with the european law and other international instruments to which Romania is a party.

Faced with the latest challenges, Romania may face activation of Article 7, a rather difficult situation for its economic position.Often qualified as an "institutional nuclear weapon", Article 7 may eventually lead to the suspension of certain rights of a Member State, in particular its right to vote in the EU Council.

Strengthening reforms and enhancing legislation appears as a necessity to the multiple analyses carried out by various internal and international entities. Even if the organisations in the field criticize these draft laws, the revision is essential, and completion of the system's institutional reform process cannot be achieved otherwise. Political actants need to assume responsibility and clarify these dysfunctions. We can define them as dysfunctions, as Romania's multiple convictions to the ECHR are an indirect consequence of this situation. The conclusion of the reform process and the remediation of all shortcomings in the justice system will lead to the lifting of the measures put in place for Romania as in Bulgaria's situation.

RECENT ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE LITIGATIONS LAW NO. 554/2004

Elena Emilia ȘTEFAN[*]

Abstract

The common law instances or the administrative instantces competence over the litigations that have administrative contracts as object have been the subject of many doctrinary disputes but not only, the legislation being inconsistant over more than 25 years, from 1990-now.

The recent modification of the administrative litigation law no. 554/2004 shed light over many aspects regarding the litigations that have administrative acts considered illegal as objects but also over the instance's competence to solve litigations regarding administrative contracts. The increase of the limit that determines the material competence of the administrative and fiscal litigation from tribunals and Courts of Appeal to solve administrative litigations from 1.000.000 to 3.000.000 lei but also the elimination of the filtre procedure for the recourse that the High Court of Cassation and Justice has competence over are only some of the legislative modifications that we are going to present in the curent study.

The current study's object is, on one hand to inventory the most important legislative modifications brought to administrative litigation and, on the other hand to confirm the fact that the legislator has taken into account the doctrine and jurisprudence to modify the legislation, being a well known fact that the administrative law domain was many years in the situation in which the law was left behind the society's evolution, not having a codification, like there is in civil or criminal law.

Keywords: the administrative litigation Law no. 554/2004, administrative contracts, article 52 from the Constitution, the recourses filtering procedure, competence.

1. Introduction

The public authorities administrative acts are subject to some formal regulations that flows from their character as acts of power, essentially these being acts of authority. The legality of the administrative acts but also their opportunity are two aspects that have made the object of administrative litigations and the national jurisprudence is rich under this aspect. Law no. 212/2018 for the modification and completion of Law no. 554/2004 of the administrative litigation and other normative acts[1] has managed to bring those essential modifications taken from the evolution of the society in administrative litigation matter, with the extraordinary contribution of the jurisprudence created in the last years.

The constitutional ground for the administrative litigation is article 52 from the Constitution entitled the right of the plaintiff of a public authority. Line (2) of article 52 expressely states: "the conditions and limits of exercising this right are esteablished by organic law". In our case, the organic law that the legislator of Law no. 554/2004 of the administrative litigation[2] refers to. The jurisprudence of both the Constitutional Court but also the European Human Rights Court has admitted the possibility of some limitations brought through law to exercising the free access to justice[3]. "The existance of the judicial constant does not preclude the process of law's change, of its permanent evolution[4]", the doctrine states. On the other hand, the national legislator is also forced to always keep in mind that the legislation armonization with the communitary acquis[5] but also with the tendences that come out of the social evolution. In this regard we share the oppinion according to which: "Any state has its right legislated, in accordance to its own socio-political exigences, with the traditions and values that it proclaims[6]". Also, yet again it is confirmed the affirmation according to

Thus, in the current study, our attention is focused only on the legislative modifications brought to administrative litigation, which we choose to present selectively. The methods we used are comparative method, deductive method and more.

2. Content

Law no. 212/2018 for the modification and completion of the administrative litigation Law no. 554/2004 and other normative acts that we choose to present selectively in the following pages, brings important clarifications over the competence, both material and territorial, of the administrative litigation instances but also the litigations that have administrative contracts as object but not only.

2.1. About the competence

Article 10 of the administrative litigation Law no. 554/2004 was modified from many points of view, regarding the competent instance to solve the administrative and fiscal litigation: both the territorial but also the material competence.

New aspects about the material competence

The legislative modifications regard, on one hand the limit that establishes the instances competence from tribunals to Courts of Appeal, administrative and fiscal litigations sections, and on the other hand it fixates the competence for litigations referring to non-refundable finance from the European Union.

The doctrine showed[8]: "the material competence for the substance of the matter is regulated by the law based on two criteria: the emitting public authority of the illegal act positioning in the system of the public administration (central/local authorities); the value of the toll, tax, contribution, custom debt that is the object of the contested administrative act. Thus, there are two types of competence, depending on the object of the administrative act. So, if the object of the administrative act is not toll, tax, contribution or custom debt, the competence is established after the position of the emitting organ, the amount of the asked compensation being irrelevant[9] ".

About the limit, the value criteria, it is increased from 1.000.000 to 3.000.000 lei.

Thus, line (1) from article 10 has the following wording: "The litigations regarding the administrative acts emmited or closed by local or country public authority, but also those that regard taxes and tolls, contributions, custom debts, and their accessories up to 3.000.000 lei are solved in their substance by the administrative fiscal tribunals, and those regarding the administrative acts emitted or closed by the central public authorities and those that regard taxes and tolls, contributions, custom debts and their accessories bigger that 3.000.000 lei are solved in their substance by the administrative and fiscal litigation sections of the Courts of Appeal administrative and fiscal sections, if by organic law it is not mentioned otherwise".

A new modification regards the competence for the litigations that refer to the non-refundable finance from the European Union in the sense that the exclusive competence of the Court of Appeal for these litigations has been eliminated, thus article 10 line ($1^1$) states: "the demands regarding administrative acts that have as an object the non-refundable financing from the European Union are solved according to the ammount criteria, and the demands that have as an object administrative acts that cannot be evaluated in money are solved according to the autority's rank, according to the rules mentioned in line (1)". By 2018 article 10 line ($1^1$) stated: "all the demands regarding the administrative acts emitted by the central public authorities that have as an object amounts representing non-refundable financing from the European Union, no matter the amount, are solved in their substance by the administrative and fiscal litigation sections of the Courts of Appeal".

This legislative modification also has many aspects: it eliminates the exclusive competence of the Court of Appeal for such litigations; the expression " in its substance " vanishes; it imposes the two criteria , the value and the rank of authority one and for this type of litigations regarding the administrative acts that have as an object amounts representing the non-refundable financing from the European Union.

Article 10 line (3) from the administrative litigation Law no. 54/2004 has two thesis:

Thesis 1 – "the plaintiff natural or legal person of private law adresses solely to the instance from its domicile or its headquarters ".

Thesis 2 – "the plaintiff public auhtority, public institution or assimilated addressed solely to the instance from the domicile or the headquarters of the plaintiff". Prior to this modification, the territorial competence was alternative in the sense that article 10 line (3) had the following wording: "the plaintiff can address the instance at his domicile or the one at the defendant domicile". Which means that the option of choosing the instance belonged to the plaintiff. Nowadays, on one hand the possibility of choosing between two instances is eliminated and on the other hand it delimitates the plaintiff natural person from the plaintiff public auhtority.

Also new, there is a new line (4) to article 10 that has the following wording: "the territorial competence of solving a cause will also be respected when the action will be introduced in the plaintiff's name by any person of public or private law, regardless of its quality in the litigation". This new line regards the administrative law in which the action is introduced in the name of the plaintiff by the People's Lawyer, prefect, the Public Ministry, the National Agency for Public Functionaries etc.

2.2. Regarding the filtre procedure for the recourse

With a different occasion we showed that: "the entry into force of the new civil procedure Code in February 2013[10] meant for the administrative litigations, as novelty, the applicability of a new filtering procedure of the recourses, for the recourses that enter into the competence of the High Court of Cassation and Justice". Studies about the recourse in the administrative litigations have been written into the national doctrine, but, in our oppinion, the most ample material is a study published in the Public Law Magazine[11] because this annalyzes the recourse not only in theory but also in practice, jurisprudential, the author being a High Court of Cassation and Justice, administrative and fiscal section judge.

Doctrine shows that: "although there has been another attemp of introducing the recourse filtre procedure through EGO no. 58/2003 regarding the modification and completion of the civil procedure Code[12] it was abrogated through Law no. 195/2004 regarding the EGO no. 58/2003[13] and through the New civil procedure Code it was reintroduced for the recourses that are in the competence of the High Court of Cassation and Justice[14] ". We critized on that occasion the recourses filtering procedure: "in our oppinion, nowadays, the filtering procedure applicabile to the recourses in the administrative litigations matter practically signifies an abolishion of the double degree of jurisdiction[15]". We concluded at that moment that: "having in mind what we showed in the current study, we consider that in reality there is no need for the filtering bench to analyse the admisibility in principle of the recourse to the High Court of Cassation and Justice but that all the elements analysed by the filtering bench can be very well brought into discussion at the first term with the parts present[16]".

And, in another oppinion, it was stated: "about the filtering procedure of the recourses (...), at least the activity of the administrative and fiscal litigations Section in this regard was burdned by the requirements of article XVII from Law no.2/2013, especially until the apparition of Law no. 138/2014, but also having into consideration the volume of activity, in the works being the litigations solved by the Old civil procedure Code but also those solved by the New civil procedure Code and the accute lack of personnel (judges, magistrates, assistants and clerks )[17]".

Thus, during 2018 through Law no. 212/2018 the administrative litigation Law no. 554/2004 was modified that, through other modifications, eliminated the filtering procedure. This means that what we anticipated was confirmed by the judicial practice that being: the inutility of this procedure but also the burden for the administrative and fscal Law from the High Court of Cassasion and Justice. Concretely, article 20, line 2, 2nd thesis of the administrative litigation Law no. 554/2004 was modified: "the recourse suspends the excutioning and is judge urgently. The procedure forseen at article 493 from the civil procedure Code is not applied in the administrative litigation matter[18] ".

2.3. Regarding the administrative contracts

2.3.1. About the term the action should be introduced, the mentions about the verbal process of finalizing the conciliation procedure

Thus line (1) letter e) is abrogated; it had the following wording: "the date of the verbal process of finalizing the conciliation procedure, in the case of the administrative contracts ".

2.3.2. Any mentioning of the conciliation is thus eliminated, such as the content of article 7 about the first complaint

- The introductive part is eliminated and letter b) of line (6) is modified: the first complaint in the case of the actions that have as object administrative contracts have to be made in a 6 month term that have to flow (...).

2.3.3. The problem of the litigations competence that have as objects administrative contracts, delimitating:

- Litigations that show up in the first phases of the closing of the administrative contracts, legal litigations or the anullment of the administrative contracts.
- Litigations that flow from the executing administrative contracts.

[10] Law no. 134/2010 regarding the civil procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette no. 247/2015 ( with the latest modification through EGO no. 1/2016 for the modification of Law no. 134/2010 regarding the civil procedure Code, but also some connex normative acts, published in the Official Gazette no. 85/2016); law no. 76/2012 for the applicability of Law no. 134/2010 regarding the civil procedure Code, published in the Official Gazette no.365/2012, apud Elena Emilia Stefan, Considerations on the recourse in the administrative litigation matter in RDP no. 1/2016, p.79.

[18] We would like to remind you that the article 493 from the civil procedure Code is entitled the filtering procedure for the recourses.

Thus, for the first category of litigations, thesis 1 of article 8, line (2): " the administrative litigation instance is competent to solve the litigations that show up in the first steps of the closing of the administrative contracts and any litigations tied to the closing of the administrative contract, including the litigations that have as an object the anullment of an administrative contract". For the second cathegry of litigations – 2nd thesis of article 8, line (2): "the litigations that flow from the executing the administrative contracts are in the solving competence of the civil instances of common rights ".

2.3.4. For some "b", it also fixates the competence either of the common law instance or of the administrative litigation instance, delimitating the moments:

- Litigations that flow from the formalities before the closing of the contract, those regarding the nullity of the contract etc.
- Litigations that flow from the execution of the contract.

It is about Law no. 101/2016 regarding the remedies and the attack ways in matter of attributting the public aquisition contracts, of sectorial contracts and of concession contracts of works and service, and also for organisation and functioning of the National Counsel of Solutioning of the Contestations[19].

Thus, line (1) of article 53 from Law no. 101/2016 (...) is modified: " the processes and the requests regarding the accordance of the damages for the repairment of the prejudices caused in the attribution procedure, and those regarding the anullment or nulity of the contracts are solved in first instance, urgently, by the administrative and fiscal litigation section of the tribunal in the circumscription where the contractant authority has its headquarter, through benches specialised in public aquisitions".

Line ($1^1$) is introduced: "the processes an demands that flow from the execution of the administrative contracts are solved in first instance, urgently, by the civil instance of common law in the circumscription in which the contractant authority has its headquarter ".

Line ($1^2$) is introduced: "the actions mentioned at line (1) and ($1^1$) can also be introduced in the instances of the place where the contract has been closed, if in such a place there is a functioning unit that belongs to the contractant authority ".

2.4. Other legislative modifications regarding the first procedure

Article 7 of the administrative litigation Law respectively:

"Before we address the administrative litigation competent instance, the person that thinks it was wronged in one of its rights or in a legitimate interest through an individual administrative act that is addressed to the person, it must ask the emitting public authority or the higher ranked authority, if it exists, in a 30 day term from the communication of the act, the revocation in whole or in part. For strong motiffs, the plaintiff, recepient of the act can introduce the prior complaint, in case of the individual administrative acts and more than 30 days but not later than 6 months from the emmitting date. The 6 months term is a prescription term ".

About the damaged third party, "it can introduce the prior complaint in 30 day term from the moment the damaged person knows, in any way, about the content of the act. For strong motiffs the prior complaint can be formulated over the 30 day term but not later than 6 months from the date that it knows, in any way about its content (...)". Thus, for the damaged third party, the term flows from the date he knows.

3. Conclusions

The administrative litigation Law no. 554/2004 has passed through recent legislative modifications, surprised by us, selectively in the current study. The most important regard the competence, both material and territorial of administrative and fiscal litigation but also the elimination of the filtering procedure for the recourses that are in the High Court of Cassation and Justice competence.

The most pregnant conclusion that we have reached at the end of our analysis is that law is dynamic and not static. The social reality and the society's evolution forces the law to always be updated and even more in the administrative law domain, in which the administrative authorities, daily, are put in situations to make decissions. In the same order of thoughts the doctrine says: "No state has a legislation that is effective for all the times[20] ".

We consider that we have accomplished the objective of our study by surprising the legislation in regards of the administrative litigation, but the legislative modifications the are left unmentionned will be the object of another study that we intend on writing, also using the relevant jurisprudence.

RECENT MODIFICATIONS OF THE CONTRAVENTION JUDICIAL REGIME

Elena Emilia STEFAN[*]

Abstract

The legislation in the contraventional law domain has recently been modified, an opportunity to analyse in the current study the main modifications brought and their impact on the public and private activity. Now it is already known that, towards the end of 2017 the prevention law was addopted and then a government decision was addopted for the establishment of the contraventions that get under the new law incidence but also the remediation plan.

During 2018, other legislative modifications intervened regarding the contravention judicial regime, modifications that had impact on the ongoing activity on the level of public and private domain authorities, such as, amongst others, the modification of the payment term of the contraventional fines and many more. We will focus on these aspects in the current work, this being our primary objective. Also, a secondary objective of this work refers to the fact that, through the case study we propose, we wish to surprise, from the activity of different public authorities, the dinamic of the contraventional sanctions applicability. Therefore, the most notable study methods used in the current study are: the statistic method, the deductive and informational method.

In the end, we will draw the conclusions that we have reached from our documentation over the analysed subject.

Keywords: the Government's Ordonance no. 2/2001 regarding the contraventional judicial regime, the contraventional fine, sole payment account, warning, the Romanian Court of Counts.

1. Introduction

When this study is being written, in Romania there is no administrative or administrative procedure Codes, like there is for criminal or civil law. Like we mentioned in a prior study[1], in the contraventional law at the end of 2017 and begining of 2018 one could notice: "(...) the recent adopting of Law no. 270/2017 from December 12th, 2017 for prevention (hereinafter reffered to as prevetion Law[2]) and of the Government's Decision no. 33/2018 regarding the establishing of the contraventions that go under the prevention Law no. 270/2017, and of the remediation plan model[3], with new legislative character". In this context, we are signaling wat another author has noticed: "No state has a legislation that is valid for all the times[4] ".

It is more than a year since the forementioned legislative modification intervened, year in which it has begun to chrystalyse, step by step and jurisprudence about the abiding or not abiding the remediation plan, this being in fact the prevention law philosophy, the temporary clemence for the offender of not being sanctioned with a fine directly but with a warning and establishing a term in which it has to abide what was being suggested in the remediation plan by the agent. Like it has already been mentioned, recently, in doctrine: "the contraventions domain is without a doubt a domain with profound and more complex implications in the day to day life of the citizens and thus in the administrative practice of the suthorities with attributions in matter[5] ".

The administrative deviation is, perhaps, the most common form of breaking the law. "To eliminate any arbitrary situation in apreciating the social danger degree of a deed in order to qualify it as being a contravention or a crime, through normative acts it is expressely mentioned in what category a certain illicit conduct is classified[6]", another author shows. "In the European Human Rights Court[7], the contravention is considered a criminal fact (…)[8]", noticed in the specialized literature. "The European Union Law embraces the monism theory, meaning the existance of a single judicial order that encompasses in a unitary system the international and national law[9] ".

2. Content

Law no. 203/2018 regarding the efficiency measurements of paying the contraventional fines[11] represents the modification act of G.O. no. 2/2001 regarding the contraventions jurdicial regime[12]. Like it was shown in doctrine: "any state has its law legislated, in accordance to its own socio-political exigences, with traditions and values that ir proclaims[13]".

Concretely, amongst the most important legislative modifications brought to this normative act regard:

- The fine's payment term

In the presentation of motives of the law[14] it is mentioned: "because the 48 hour term may be insufficient to quickly identify certain amounts of money, it is proposed an intervention on the conditions in which half of the minimum of the fine mentioned in the sanctioning normative act is paid. Therefore, there is a general rule (not only for the situations in which through special laws this possibility is mentioned) to pay half of the minimum of the fine in a 15 day term from the date the verbal-process was handed over. Exceptions from this rule will be established through special laws only if the payment terms will be bigger than 15 days ".

- The constitution of a sole payment account opened at the State's Treasury destined to collect the contraventional fines. According to article 6 of the Law, the payment in cash of the contraventional fines is possible at any unit of the State's Tresury, at the cash registers of the territorial administrative units / subdivisions or at any entity that is established through applicability norms to the present law, no matter the domicile of the natural person. It is of utmost importance that, in case of unpaid fines on the grounds of present law, the offender is not forced to prove the payment to the agent.

- The electronic debt title is formed and it has the contravention verbal process data. The debt title is then transmitted electronically, to the organ that the agent is part of, the competent fiscal organ for collecting the fiscal debts.

- The content of contravention constation verbal process changes.

Article 16 from G.O. no. 2/2001 (...) line 1 shows that "is mandatory for the contraventional official record to mention: the date and place where it is closed; name, surname, quality and institution of the agent; name, surname, domicile and identity number of the offender, the description of the contraventional fact with indication of the date, hour and place where it was done, but also it has to show the circumstances that can serve to apreciate the gravity of the fact and the evaluation of the possible damages caused; the indication of the normative act through which the contravention is established and sanctioned; the insurance society, in case the fact produced an accident; the possibility to pay half of the minimum amount mentioned in the normative act in a 15 day term; terms in which it can be atacked in justice and the instance where the complaint can be submitted ". In article 16, it is expressly mentioned the 15 day term to pay the fine, unlike the 48 hour term from the prior reglementation.

- The lack of some nemtions in the official report that get its annullment are also modified: " the lack of one of the mentions regarding the name and surname of the agent, the identity number for the persons that have such a code, and, for the legal person, lack of name and of its headquarter; of the done deed and the date when it has been comitted or the agent's signature". The nulity can also be given ex officio.

Of course, there are many more legislative changes, but we only wanted to mention these in the content of our analysis.

3. Case study

In the following, we analysed, selectively, the activity of some public authorities to observe if there were any violations of the contraventional legislation but also in the case of detection of some situations, if any contraventional sanctions were applied and what the sanctions were. Thus, the selection took into account the activity of the General Inspectorate for Emergency Situations, of the Romania's Counts Court, of Romanian Police, of the Medium National Guard, of the State Inspectorate for Traffic Transport Control, of the National Authority for Sanitary Veterinary and for Food Safety, of the romanian Gendarmerie. And so it was surprised the dynamic for the contraventional sanctions applicability during 2017 or 2018.

From the activity of General Inspectorate for Emergency Situations - GIES[15], in the emergency situations prevention, the document entitled "The evaluation of the activity in the year 2018", section Control and inspection, by comparing 2017 to 2018, one can notice:

- "Number of prevention controls grew from 39.978 in 2017 to 40.031 in 2018
- The number of detected deficiencies dropped from 160.381 in 2017 to 147.704 in 2018
- The number of fines gre from 22.2017 in 2017 to 41.401 în 2018 ".

About the activity Romania's Counts Court, from the 2017 activity report[16] of the institution, one can notice: " During 2017 there were 16 control activities, through which the following were noticed: in the case of five public entities, the aspects included in the complaints were not confirmed; the other 11 checked public entities a number of 46 irregularities from legality, three of which were fixed during the control". In the same report the following is noticed: "the consequence for the irregularities from legality were: 143,8 thousand lei prejudice, out of which during control 1,55 thousand lei were collected (...); the control actions had the following consequences:

- Five contraventional fines amounting to 26 thousand lei were applied to four public entities
- 11 decisions containing 44 measures regarding the irregularities from legality were emitted
- a number of three contestations were formulated against three emitted decisions (...) ".

From the Romanian Police activity, we mention the 2018[17] activity report (the document entitled: the evaluation of the conducted activities by the General Direction of Bucharest during 2018). In the public Order domain, page 29 of the report it is mentioned that: "75.196 contraventional sanctions were applied, amounting to 21,61 million lei, out of which 58.933 (78%) contraventional sanctions to Law no. 61/1991". At page 32 it is showed that: "security systems: 8.319 controls carried out (...): 2.301 applied contraventions, 3 certificates revoked, 3.361 given notices, 1.034 schools checked under the aspect pf security, out of which 104 doorms ".

At page 34, traffic safety, it is mentioned: "activities of maintaining and imposing the law: 5.386 executed missions, 485 actions for the fighting the main generating causes of serious accidents, 179.216 established contraventions (...) ".

Regarding the Medium National Guard activity, in the activity report on 2018[18] is mentioned: "in the Medium National Guard during January 1st – December 31st, 2018, a number of 39.841 inspections in the pollution and biodiversity domain, biosafety and natural protected arias were done (...). A number of 1.570 warnings were given and 2.606 contraventional fines, amounting to 39.121,420 lei. 140 activity stopping dispositions were enforced, 1 activity stopping disposition, 53 proprositions to suspend the medium accords / authorisations. 25 criminal complaints were formulated (...) ".

At pages 3 and 4 of the same document it is mentioned: "checking the townships' sanitation state and communication ways – between March 20th and July 15th, 2018 an unplannified thorough control was taken to check the townships' sanitation state and communication ways. As a result, 2.323 inspection actions and control were done (2.263 to local public administrations, 7 to roads / railroads administrators, 18 to economic agents / natural persons and 35 to sanitation operators. Following these controls (...) a number of 313 warnings and 611 contraventional sanctions were given amounting to 2.137.200 lei, like this: 595 to local public administrations, amounting to 1.535.000 lei; 6 to economic agents / natural persons, amounting to 79.000 lei; 10 to sanitation operators, amounting to 523.200 lei ".

In the same document it is stated that: following these controls, it was noticed that, from the 2.263 local public authorities, 701 UATs have not implemented the selective collecting system of towship waste. From 595 contraventional sanctions applied to local public administrations, 69 contraventional sanctions were given, amounting to 928.000 lei and 131 warnings for the lack of implementing the township waste collecting system ".

Regarding the National Authority for Consumers Protection – NACP, from the 2017[19] annual report it is apparent, from noticing the Contraventional sanctions applicability:" (…) the irregularities regarding the consumers' protection domain was noticed, in 43.420 cases constraventional sanctions were applied, amounting to 79.53 million lei. The official records ratio of applied fines is: 39.7% to groceries; 30.9% to non-groceries; 9.9% grocery services; 1.7% financial services; 2.4% other segments ".

Regarding the activity of The State Inspectorate for Traffic Transport Control SITTC[20]from the public informations for the 3rd trimester of 2018:

"Following the control and inspection activities carried out by the inspectors from the State Inspectorate for Traffic Transport Control, in the 3rd trimester of 2018, in 48.823 vehicles / vehicles ensambles were checked in traffic, out of which 43.055 held by romanian operators / transport enterprises and 5.768 held by (...). With this occasion 9.608 official records of contravention were made: 9.029 for romanian operators / transport enterprises and 579 for foreign transport operators. 2.853 vehicles were checked in traffic for the maximumd dimensions and / or masses for which 297 official records of contraventions were done. Also, from the technical point of view 1.506 vehicles were checked in traffic and 955 official records for contravention were made. Also, 2.105 controls were done at the headquarters of the enterprises (...) at the end of which 528 official records for contraventions were done ".

Regarding the Romanian Gendarmerie activity, the institution's activity report for 2018: "during public order missions 15.165 crimes were noticed, 15.975 authors were identified and 130.255 contraventional sanctions were applied, amounting to 34.389.764 lei[21]".

From the activity of National Sanitary Veterinary and for Grocery's Safety Authority - NSVGSA[22] report for 2017: " during 2017, the public clerks from the Litigation Service have inssured the interest defence for NSVGSA in 373 cases, out of which 26 cases had the annullment of an administrative act as an object, 14 cases had the suspenssion of an administrative act as an object, (...), 15 cases had a contraventional complaint as an object, 6 cases had execution complaints as an object, (...)", mentioned at page 10, from the document.

4. Conclusions

Last legislative modifications that have occurred in contravention domain, we consider they come in handy for the sanctioned ones. The relaxation for th payment term for the contraventional fines, from all domains, in the sense of its growth from 48 hours to 15 days or the establishment of a sole way to pay, are just two of the measures that we apreciate to be a progress in the philosophy of the contraventional sanctions aproach by the legislator.

The case studies, from the domain we have chosen, to public but also private institutions, domains such as traffic transport, sanitary veterinary, public order, traffic police etc. have underlined the fact that, all the domains subjected to the control have revealed contraventional legislation breaches, for which diverse contraventional sanctions were applied both in 2017 and 2018 and the amount was fairly big.

In conclusion, through our analysiswe consider we have achieved the purpose and objectives established in realising this study, that of presenting the modifications to contraventional legislation, and through our case study, we surprised the dynamic of the contraventional sanctions applicability, in diverse domains.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH. CONSIDERATIONS ON CONSTITUTIONAL COURT'S DECISION NO. 649/2018

Cristina TITIRIŞCĂ

Abstract

Pursuant to article 30 paragraph (1) of the Constitution, freedom of expression is inviolable, but according to article 30 paragraphs (6) and (7) of the same Constitution, it cannot prejudice the dignity, honour, private life of the person and nor the right to one's own image, being forbidden by the law the defamation of the country and the nation, the exhortation to war of aggression, national, racial, class or religious hatred, incitement to discrimination, territorial separatism or public violence, as well as obscene, contrary to good morals. The limits of freedom of expression fully accord with the notion of freedom, which is not and cannot be understood as an absolute right. The legal and philosophical concepts promoted by democratic societies admit that a person's freedom ends where the other person's freedom begins.

Keywords: freedom of speech, freedom of expression, limits, Constitutional Court, decision

1. Introduction

In the autumn of 2018, some changes to the Chamber of Deputies' Regulations, which essentially concerned the following issues, were subjected to the Constitutional Court's analysis:

a) the imposition of a ban on MPs concerning the adoption of defamatory, racist or xenophobic behaviour and languages and the holding of placards or banners in parliamentary debates;
b) the imposition of a sanction for deviations from the Regulation, worded as follows: „without prejudice to the right to vote in the plenary sitting and subject to a strict compliance with the rules of conduct, temporary suspension of the MP's participation in all or part of the activities of the Parliament for a period of two to thirty working days".

The decision of the Constitutional Court in question[1], whose considerations will be given below, has brought to the attention of law specialists, as well as the general public, the complex content[2] of the freedom of expression, enshrined at constitutional level by the provisions of article 30 of the Basic Law[3], which is why we believe that the legal community will find the use of a paper which addresses, in a systematic manner, the emphasis added in the case-law of the Constitutional Court of Romania.

2. The political dialogue and the freedom of expression

With regard to the above-mentioned prohibition, the Court held that by its Decision no.77/2017 regarding the Code of conduct for deputies and senators, the legislator has established in article 1 para. (3) that „Deputies and Senators have the duty to act with honour and discipline, taking into account the principles of separation and balance of powers in the state, transparency, moral probity, responsibility and obedience of the reputation of the Parliament". As to the conduct to follow, article 6 of the Code provides that „Deputies and senators must ensure, through attitude, language, conduct and carriage, the solemnity of the parliamentary meetings and good progress of the activities conducted into the parliamentary structures" [para.(1)] and „not to use offensive, indecent or calumnious expressions or words" [para.(2)].

Thus, through this decision of the Parliament of Romania, the reputation of the Parliament is recognized as a value protected through regulations and rules of conduct, alongside with the principles of separation and balance of state powers, transparency, moral probity and accountability. The reputation of the Parliament, as the sole legislative authority of the country is valued, according to the conditions in which the deputies and senators act with honour and discipline, adopting the attitude, language, conduct and the outfit that would ensure the solemnity of the parliamentary meetings and the good progress of activities into the parliamentary structures.

[3] According to article 30 of the Romanian Constitution, with the marginal name „Freedom of expression": „ (1) Freedom of expression of thoughts, opinions, or beliefs, and freedom of any creation, whether by spoken words, in writing, in pictures, by sounds or any other means of communication in public, is inviolable. (2) Any kind of censorship is prohibited. (3) Freedom of the press also involves free founding of publications. (4) No publication may be suppressed. (5) The law may require that the mass media disclose their financing sources. (6) Freedom of expression shall not be prejudicial to dignity, honour, privacy of person, nor to one's right for his own image. (7) Defamation of the Country and Nation, any instigation to a war of aggression, to national, racial, class or religious hatred, any incitement to discrimination, territorial separatism, or public violence, as well as any obscene conduct contrary to morals are forbidden by law. (8) Civil liability for any information or creation released for the public falls upon the publisher or producer, author, producer of an artistic performance, owner of copying facilities, or radio or television stations, subject to the law. Indictable offences of the press shall be established by law".

Also, according to article 232 of the Regulation of the Chamber of Deputies, as it was amended through the single article point 5 of the Decision of the Chamber of Deputies no.47/2018, „Deputies, as representatives of the people, exercise their rights and meet their duties throughout the whole time of the legislature for which they were elected. Deputies are obliged, through their behaviour, to keep the dignity of the Parliament, to follow the values and the principles defined in the Statute of the MPs, in the Code of Conduct of Deputies and Senators, as well as into internal regulations. The behaviour of the deputies is characterized by mutual respect and should not compromise the ongoing parliamentary works, the maintaining of the security and internal order" [para.(1)]; „In parliamentary debates, deputies are bound to obey the rules of conduct, of courtesy and parliamentary discipline, to refrain from committing deeds that prevent or hamper the activity of other MPs, from using or showing provocative, injurious, offensive, discriminatory or calumnious expressions" [para.(2)].

Based on the constitutional provisions of article 61 on the role and the structure of the Parliament and of article 64 on the internal organization of each Chamber of the Parliament, the Constitutional Court underlined, in its case-law, that „each Chamber is entitled to set, within the limits and with respect of the constitutional provisions, the rules of organization and operation, which, in their substance, make up the Regulation of each Chamber. As a result, the organization and functioning of each Chamber of the Parliament are established through its own regulations, adopted through the decision of each Chamber, with the vote of the majority members of that Chamber. Thus, in virtue of the principle of regulatory autonomy of the Chamber of Deputies, established in art.64 paragraph (1) first sentence of the Constitution, any regulation concerning the organization and the functioning of the Chamber of Deputies, who is not provided by the Constitution, may and must be established through its own Regulation. Consequently, the Chamber of Deputies is sovereign in adopting the measures considered needed and advisable for its good organization and operation"[4].

The Court also retained that, „in the field of parliamentary law, the main consequence of the elective nature of the representative mandate and of the political pluralism is the principle suggestively enshrined by the doctrine as the majority decides, while the opposition expresses itself. The majority rules whereas by virtue of the representative mandate received from the people, the majority opinion is allegedly presumed that reflects or meets the majority opinion of the society. The opposition expresses itself as a consequence of the same representative mandate, underlying the inalienable right of the minority to make known its political options and to oppose, in a constitutional manner, the majority in power. This principle assumes that through the organization and the functioning of the Chambers of the Parliament, it is ensured that the majority decides only after the opposition had a chance to express itself, and the decision which it adopts is not obstructed within the parliamentary procedures. The rule of the majority involves necessarily, in the parliamentary procedures, the avoidance of any means that would lead to an abusive manifestation on the part of the majority or of any means which would have as scope the prevention of normal conduct of the parliamentary procedure. The principle of the majority decides, while the opposition expresses itself necessarily implies a balance between the need to express the position of the political minority on a certain issue and the avoidance of use of means of obstruction for the purpose of ensuring, on the one hand, the political confrontation in Parliament, respectively the contradictory character of the debates, and, on the other hand, the fulfilment by the Parliament of its constitutional and legal powers.

In others words, parliamentarians, either from the majority or from the opposition, must refrain themselves from abuse in exercising their procedural rights and respect a rule of proportionality, that would ensure the adoption of decisions following a debate public beforehand. As regards the legislative process and the parliamentary control on the Government or the realization of the other constitutional powers, parliamentarians, in exercising of their mandate, are, according to the provisions of article 69 paragraph (1) of the Basic Law, «in the service of the people». The parliamentary debate of the important issues of the nation must ensure the compliance with the supreme values enshrined in the Basic Law, such as the rule of law, political pluralism and constitutional democracy". This is the reason for which the Constitutional Court found that „it is necessary the exercise in good faith of the constitutional rights and duties, both by the parliamentary majority and the minority, and the cultivation of a conduct of the political dialogue, which does not exclude beforehand the consensus, even if the motivations are different, when the major interest of the nation is at stake"[5].

Just for realization of this wish of political dialogue, it is forbidden the use, in the parliamentary works, of offensive, indecent or slanderous expressions or words, as well as the adoption of a hostile behaviour that would remove any possibility of communication between political entities, having some politically different views, sometimes even to the contrary. So being, not only occurs as natural, but as needed the regulation brought into the Regulation of the Chamber of Deputies, according to whom „it is prohibited the disruption of the parliamentary activity, the uttering of insults or slander both from the tribune of the Chamber and in the hall of the plenary, of the committees or of the others working bodies of the Parliament". Apart from the fact that it determines the violation of the duties regarding the compliance with the rules of honour and discipline incumbent to each deputy, the manifestation of an inappropriate or offensive behaviour may determine the prevention or the impairing of the activity of other parliamentarians, thus constituting the premise for the disruption of the activity of the entire legislative forum. In conditions in which the statement of reasons in support of a legislative initiative, the proposal of amendments, the presenting of pros and cons opinions, their debate, therefore the political dialogue at the tribune of the Parliament or in committees, or the activities through which the Parliament fulfils its constitutional functions, represent issues related to the essence of parliamentarism, the prohibition of the disruption of parliamentary activity by uttering insults or slander or through adoption of denigrating, racist or xenophobic behaviour and languages give phrase to the need to discipline this dialogue and to create the premises for the compliance with the principle the majority decides, while the opposition expresses itself.

On the other hand, the principle cited ensures the right of the opposition to freely express itself, to make known its opinions, to express criticism on the positions adopted by the parliamentary majority. In exercising their mandate, deputies and senators are in service of the people and, respecting in good faith the constitutional rules and the parliamentary procedures established through the Regulations of the two Chambers, are obliged to defend the interests of the citizens they represent, by adopting an active, advised and responsible behaviour, to comply with the general interest.

Moreover, such as any citizen of Romania, the parliamentarian has the freedom of expression, guaranteed by article 30 of the Constitution, and, according to article 72 paragraph (1) of the Basic Law, he does not respond legally for the vote or for the political views expressed into the exercising of the mandate. But he/she is called to find the best suitable means of expression, which, on the one hand, ensure the exercising of the mandate with objectivity and probity and which, on the other hand, do not hinder the progress of the activities of the legislator.

3. Limitation of the parliamentarian's freedom of expression and the sanction by suspending his/her activity

Regarding the newly introduced provisions, namely the thesis that, in parliamentary debates, deputies „do not carry placards or banners", the Court has determined that they do not contradict the provisions of article 30 of the Constitution.

In order to determine as such, the Court has held that, given the definitions of the Explanatory dictionary for placard and banner, these are ways of expressing ideas in visual, written or drawn form, used in public areas, sometimes with the occasion of public demonstrations, for the purpose of transmitting a message, a slogan or a catchphrase.

It is true that under article 30 para. (1) of the Constitution, freedom of expression is inviolable, but it is not an absolute right. In this sense, article 57 of the Constitution provides for the express duty of the Romanian citizens, of foreign citizens and of stateless citizens to exercise their constitutional rights in good faith, without breaking the rights and freedoms of others. An identical limitation is also provided in article 10 paragraph 2 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, according to which „The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary", as well as in article 19 paragraph 3, of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which sets that the exercise of the freedom of speech involves special duties and responsibilities and that may be subject to certain restrictions which are to be expressly provided by law, taking into account the rights or reputation of others. Being a norm with a restrictive character, to circumscribe the framework in which the freedom of expression can be exercised, the enumeration made by art. 30 para. (6) and (7) is strict and restrictive[6].

By regulating the duty of deputies that, in parliamentary debates, they do not adopt denigrating, racist or xenophobic behaviour and languages, and neither to carry out placards or banners, the Chamber of Deputies, in virtue of its autonomy of regulations, transposed at an infra-constitutional level the limits of the freedom of speech established by the constitutional norm. In other words, the statutory provision prohibits the denigrating, racist or xenophobic behaviour and language, regardless of the way in which they manifest themselves, including the written way by posts displayed on placards or banners. The ban does not target the wording of the political message itself through the placard or banner, but only the content of the message, that should not circumscribe to the „denigrating language, racist or xenophobic". The use of different forms of expression of political opinions must circumscribe the framework, the purpose and the reputation of the legislator, must respect the solemnity of the plenary sittings of each Chamber and must not harm the image of the Parliament and, even less, its activity. Therefore, it is necessary for the freedom of expression, the limits of which are set only by the Constitution, to find appropriate forms of manifestation, that, on the one hand, answer the imperative of the parliamentary right of the opposition and of each deputy or senator, individually, to express themselves and to make known their opinions , political positions and, on the other hand, are not just a declaration of rights, without being followed by a real debate on political opinions, legal arguments presented by MPs into the formal framework of the activity of the legislator.

As such, the Court found that the provisions of art.153 par. (3) of the Regulation of the Chamber of Deputies meet the requirements, on the one hand, of the freedom of expression of deputies, enshrined in article 30 paragraph (1) of the Constitution, and on the other hand, the constitutional limits of this freedom, provided by article 30 paragraphs (6) and (7) of the Basic Law.

Regarding the sanctioning of the deputy by prohibiting him/her from participating in the activities of the Parliament for a certain length of time, the Constitutional Court retained its unconstitutionality. Analysing the criticism of unconstitutionality, the Court held that, in principle, some legal obligations must be matched by legal sanctions, in case of failure of their observance. Otherwise, the legal obligations would be reduced to a simple goal, without any practical result into the social space relations, thus being cancelled the very reason for the legal regulation of some of these relationships. If the Regulation of the Chamber states the actions of deputies which constitute deviations from the parliamentary discipline, it imposes the establishment, in same framework, of sanctions applicable to the guilty person.

Thus, the new regulation provides as disciplinary sanction, applicable to MPs, the temporary suspension of his/her participation at a fraction of or at all activities of the Parliament, for a period contained between two and thirty working days. The rule provides, however, that the temporary suspension „Does not bring touch to the right to vote into the plenary session", being taken „subject to the strict compliance of the rules of conduct".

Upon the disciplinary penalties applicable to members of the Parliament, the Constitutional Court ruled, during the a priori constitutionality review exercised on a law for the amendment and supplementing of Law no.96/2006 on the Statute of MPs[7]. With that occasion, the Court found that the regulation of disciplinary sanctions of the MP found in conflict of interest, consisting of the „ban on the participation in the works of the Chamber he/she belonged to, for a period of no more than six months", affects the parliamentary mandate. The Court held that „the parliamentary mandate is a public dignity acquired by members of the Chambers of Parliament through election by voters, in view of exercising through representation their national sovereignty, a conclusion based primarily on the following constitutional provisions: article 2 paragraph (1) – „National sovereignty belongs to the Romanian people, who shall exercise it through their representative bodies established as a result of free, periodic and fair elections, as well as by means of a referendum", article 61 paragraph (1) first sentence – „Parliament is the supreme representative body of the Romanian people [...]" and article 69 paragraph (1) – „ In the exercise of their authority, Deputies and Senators are in the service of the people". The Constitution also establishes, in article 63, the duration of the office of the Chamber of Deputies and of the Senate , and in article 70, the moment when deputies and senators enter on the exercise of their office, respectively „upon the lawful convention of the Chamber whose members they are, provided that credentials are validated and the oath is taken... ", as well the time/ cases of termination of the office, respectively „when the newly elected Chambers have lawfully convened, or in case of resignation, disenfranchisement, incompatibility, or death".

Therefore, the Court found that the newly introduced provisions into the Law no.96/2006 contravene „the constitutional provisions on the rule of law and of those who configure the legal regime of the parliamentarian office". In this respect, the Court held that „the representativeness of the parliamentary office, as it is established by the provisions of the quoted provisions of the Basic Law, has important legal consequences. One of these refers to the duties of the MP, which are exercised continuously, from the moment when he/she enters into office until the date of the termination of office, the legislator having the duty not to hinder their fulfilment by means of the regulation it adopts. Participation in the sittings of the Chamber is a duty which relies on the essence of the parliamentary office, as it results from the whole set of constitutional provisions that enshrine the Parliament, included into the Title III, Chapter I of the Basic Law. This is regulated specifically by Law no.96/2006 on the Statute of MPs in article 29 paragraph (1) – a text that did not suffer any change through the law subject to the constitutional control, being characterized by the legislator as a legal and moral obligation. Consequently, preventing the MP to attend the sittings of the Chamber he/she is part of, for a period of time which represents half a year out of those four years of mandate of the Chamber constitutes a measure likely to prevent him/her to accomplish the office given by voters. Taking into consideration that every MP represents the nation in its entirety, the conditions for the effective exercise of the office must be provided for, conditions which must be considered when regulating disciplinary sanctions".

For these considerations, the Court found that the provisions of Law no.96/2006, as subsequently amended and supplemented, are unconstitutional.

Given the identical hypothesis that targets the matter of the disciplinary sanctions applicable to deputies, the Court appreciated that the arguments on which it based the admission solution pronounced beforehand by the Court are applicable in full to this situation. So, since the duties of the MP are exercised continuously, from the moment when he/she enters into office until the termination of the office, the legislator, through the regulations it adopts, whether laws or regulations, cannot prevent their fulfilment. Just as the Court held into the decision cited above, the participation in the sittings of the Chamber he/she belongs to is a duty of the essence of the parliamentary office, as it results from the whole set of constitutional provisions and rules that govern the Parliament, so that any norm or regulation that affects the way in which the MPs meet their legal and constitutional duties constitutes a violation of his/her constitutional statute.

The criticized norm provides for the thesis according to which the disciplinary sanction „does not touch the right to vote within the plenary". But this provision is not likely to remove the unconstitutional effect of the temporary suspension. The duties of the MP, inherent to the constitutional office are not limited to the exercise of the right to vote into the sittings of the Chamber, and since the sanction concerns the suspension of the participation of the deputy to a part or to all activities of the Parliament for a period contained between two and thirty working days, it is obvious that this would prevent him/her to exercise the office in fullness of his/her rights and duties.

4. Conclusions

As stated above, the freedom of expression cannot be understood as an absolute right. Moreover, the Romanian Constitution, in article 53, as well as the international documents on human rights, such as the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms or the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, admit the possibility of reasonable lowering of the level of protection offered to certain rights in certain circumstances or moments, subject to certain conditions, as long as the substance of the rights is not attained[8].

DEATH PENALTY IN INDONESIA: WHAT AND WHY? IS IT NOT AGAINST UNIVERSAL HUMAN RIGHT PRINCIPLE?

Rima Yuwana YUSTIKANINGRUM[*]

Abstract

Even though Indonesia has ratified International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) in 2005 which directly recognizes the right to life, at the same time Indonesia has committed to apply the death penalty in its law system. Strengthened by the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Indonesia through its verdict, the legality of the death penalty implementation in Indonesia cannot be void, considering the natures of the Court verdict which are final and binding. However, the issue of the death penalty is debatable among society because it is clear that under article 28I paragraph (1) of the 1945 Constitution to protect its people right to life. Besides, the ineffectiveness justice system in Indonesia also become one of the main grounds for cons groups to propose to the government for abolishing the death penalty as a form of punishment in the Indonesian law system. Aiming to comprehend this issue reasonably, this paper is not only going to explore the grounds of the government of the Republic of Indonesia for promoting and supporting the death penalty as one of real punishment in Indonesia but also explain the details of types crimes in which can be sentenced a death. Under article 6 paragraph (2) of ICCPR, there is a room for a country which has not to abolish the death penalty to sentence a death but only for only the most serious crimes. Thus, Do the type of crimes which can be convicted a death in Indonesia meet the definition of the most serious crimes agreed by international law and the national security interest? If so, Is this policy against the human right to life? This article will expose some scholars' arguments, cases, jurisprudence, and verdicts to show the standing of the author in this issue.

1. Introduction

The paper covers the grounds of the government of the Republic Indonesia for applying the death penalty in its law system, despite at the same time Indonesia has ratified ICCPR, which directly recognizing the right to life for all people. This issue has become a hot issue since this topic is never ended among society. However, it is clear that in this stage, it is essential to bear in mind that not all the types of crimes can be sentenced to death in Indonesia. Since the finding reveals that drugs narcotics dealers' cases are a crime which its defendant mostly sentenced to death, this paper will elaborate the grounds of the government and the district court to sentence a death to the defendant for drugs narcotics cases. Also, since the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Indonesia ("the Court") has been affirmed that the death penalty is constitutional under the law, this paper will explore the perspective of the Court regarding the death penalty in such a particular case. Accordingly, in the end, the readers can find the answers to these kinds of questions.

1. Does such a case meet the definition of the most serious crimes which notably agreed by international laws and the national security interest?
2. If so, is this policy against the principle of the human right to life?

and then comprehend the grounds of the government of the Republic of Indonesia ("the government") to the supports death penalty under the Court's perspective.

This topic is necessary to discuss because it is important to straighten out misunderstandings among society about the implementation of the death penalty in Indonesia. The recent research published that the most type of crime which sentenced a death is that drugs (narcotics) cases.[1] It reaches about 63.5% of the total cases which sentenced death. It is safe to submit that the government commits to fight drugs (Narcotics) cases and consider it as a crime which equals to the most serious crimes. By ratifying United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotics Drugs and Psychotropic Substance 1988 ("the Convention") through Act Number 7 Year 1997, the Court affirms that sentencing a death for drugs (narcotics) cases is a form of Indonesia as a state parties and it is a form of national implementation which following as consequence of ratifying the Convention.[2]

However, there are many negative speculations addressed to the district courts, which has authority to handle this such of cases, such as the accusations of unfair trial proceedings and ineffective trial process before sentencing the death penalty to the defendant. At the same time, those groups of people also submit that drugs (narcotics) cases are not supposed to be considered as one of the categories for the most serious crimes under international law perspective.

Accordingly, misperceptions about the death penalties for drugs cases which is supported by the government grows more extensive from time to time. By writing this topic in this paper, the writer submits that the public needs to know well about the government's considerations of supporting the death penalty. It is also essential in this stage to clarify the missing points about this issue which is likely to lead the public's perceptions or opinions about the government or the district courts in Indonesia.

To answer the questions above, the writer uses research based-desk methodology to gather all academic information needed in this paper. The resources which used are that related Court verdicts, the national or domestic laws, the international laws, the research findings, and some journals articles.

Regarding the question about the relation between the paper and the already existent specialized literature, it submits that the existence of this paper serves as a complementary paper. Aiming for balancing the debate about the death penalty in Indonesia, this paper stands on pro groups, but it will be more concern on elaborating the Court and the government's perspective on supporting the death penalty in Indonesia.

2. Right to Life: Non-Derogable Rights and Death Penalty in Indonesia

Those who argue that by sentencing death penalty as punishment after committing in a crime, such as drugs dealers cases in Indonesia, it means that there is an act which attempts to abolish one of the people non-derogable right, namely right to live. Under international law, the right to live is a right which is protected and recognized under article 6 paragraph (1) of ICCPR. In other words, the commitment for not arbitrarily deprived of people's lives is a form of another way to affirm that everyone in this world, including a criminal, has the same right to life and has a right to be protected. Recognizing the same spirit as article 6 paragraph (2) of ICCPR[3] about the right to life, Indonesia has its national law which acknowledges and preserve the right to live. Under article 28A and article 28I paragraph (1) of the 1945 Constitution ("the Constitution"), it is clear that every person shall have the right to live and to defend his/her and existence. Thus, it is safe to submit that Indonesia is a state which commits to protecting its citizen's right to live. However, it is essential to bear in mind that discussing about death penalty, it means that the court has obligations to consider some aspects before taking a decision, such as the death penalty perspective itself, the categories of crimes which can be sentenced a death, criminals sentenced to death, victims perspective, and perspective of the victims' families.[4]

Further, for answering the arguments which concern on non-derogable rights in death penalties cases, the Court submits that these views eliminate the quality of the evil nature from a crime which threatened with the death penalty. What means by this is that the crimes, which are threatened by the death penalty, are such crimes which attacking other people's rights to life directly or indirectly. In this stage, criminal punishment shall be seen as an effort to restore the social harmony which has been disturbed by those kinds a form of crimes. As a way to restore social balance, abolishing criminal punishment in the law system is hurt justice among society. In this stage, the Court also highlights the big question, "why does the defense of the criminal's right to life, who is threatened with capital punishment, is more valuable than the defense of the victim's right to life?"

2.1. The Limitations

Under article 29 paragraph (2) of Universal Declarations of Human Rights[5] ("UDHR"), it is clear that in the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due to recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and of meeting the just requirements of morality, public order, and the general welfare in a democratic society. It is safe to submit that there is no absolute way to exercise right and freedoms but limited by law to secure and respecting other people's right and freedom. In national law, article 28J paragraph (2)[6] of the constitution and article 73 of Act Number 39 the Year 1999 about Human Rights ("Act of Human Rights") regulate same spirit and rules as article 29 paragraph (2) of the UDHR

Article 28J paragraph (2) of the Constitution stipulates:

> "In exercising hi/her rights and freedoms, every person shall have the duty to accept the restrictions established by law for the sole purposes of guaranteeing the recognition and respect of the rights and freedoms of others and of satisfying just demands based upon considerations of moralilty, religious values, security and public order in a democratic society."

Regarding non-derogable rights, on a national scale, there is a law explaining about the right to life in Indonesia and mentioning two limitations about right to life. Under article 9 paragraph (1) and its explanation of Act of Human Rights, it is safe to submit that right to life can be limited into two points, namely:

1. In the case of an abortion for the benefit of his/her mother's life;
2. In the case of capital punishment based on a court decision.

[3] For more detailed about ICCPR, it can be seen through https://www.ohchr.org/Documents/ProfessionalInterest/ccpr.pdf.

[6] Further detailed about the Constitution can be read throgh https://www.ilo.org/wcmsp5/groups/public/---ed_protect/---protrav/---ilo_aids/documents/legaldocument/wcms_174556.pdf.

Under only to the two reasons above, the right to life can be limited.

Article 6 paragraph (2) of ICCPR stipulates:

"In countries which have not abolished the death penalty, sentence of death may be imposed only for the most serious crimes in accordance woth the law in force at the time of the commission of the crime and not contrary to the provisions of the present Covenant and to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. This penalty can only be carried out pursuant to a final judgement rendered by a competent court."

In this stage, it is safe to submit that right to life cannot be applied entirely absolute and ICCPR allows states parties to impose capital punishment in their respective national laws. However, the UN Commission on Human Rights identified this limitation as one of the critical safeguards 'guaranteeing the protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty." And the UN Human Rights Committee has called upon states to abolish [capital punishment] for other than the "most serious crimes".[7]

2.2. The Most Serious Crimes

Drug-related executions are on the rise in some regions, including Iran, Indonesia, and China.[8] In Indonesia, the majority of those who sentenced a death penalty is that the convicted person in the drugs cases. The percentage for drugs dealers case reaches around 63.5%, and premeditated murder cases get the second largest rate, namely 24.5%. The rest, for premeditated murder accompanied by other criminal acts cases and premeditated murder accompanied by criminal acts of rape against children cases respectively reach 7% and 5%.[9] It is essential to bear in mind that there are 4.5 million people in Indonesia suffers from drug-related problems, and around 1.2 million people of them cannot be cured. It means that there are approximately 33 to 50 people each day die because of it.[10] Comparing to the number of people who suffered caused by drugs narcotics in 2007, 4.5 million is a massive number of people. The data shows that in 2007, the number of drugs narcotics suffered people reach about 15.000 people a year.[11] In other words, less than ten years, the number of drugs narcotics victims increased dramatically. Moreover, data in 2007 revealed that the community funds which spent in drugs narcotics cycle are about 292 trillion per year. This data proves that the spread of cycling of illicit drugs trafficking is widespread.[12]

Based on the data mentioned above, it is clear to submit that in Indonesia, drugs dealers cases are considered to be a type of crime which can endanger the generation in Indonesia. Seeing from the significant impact can be caused by the danger of drugs narcotic cycle in Indonesia, the government needs to maximize the necessary step to prevent the threat grows bigger. A death penalty is an answer for the defendant who is legally proven distributing drugs narcotics before the court. In this point, the debatable about the death penalty emerges. Many people start questioning the law system in Indonesia. Most of them also start asking about the international legal basis which defining drugs cases as a type of the most serious crimes.

These cons groups submit that drugs cases do not meet the requirement of the most serious crimes by adding the argument that the submission of categorizing drugs cases as one of the most serious crimes is against the international definition. Besides, the UN Human Rights Committee and the UN Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions has stressed that drug crimes do not meet the definition of the most serious crimes.[13] The UN Human Rights Committee has indicated that the definition of 'the most serious crimes' is limited to those directly resulting in death.[14] Further based on the reports of the Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions have consistently emphasized that 'the death penalty must under all circumstances be regarded as an extreme exception to the fundamental right to life, and must as such be interpreted in the most restrictive manner possible.' Therefore, from the perspective of UN Human Rights treaty bodies and special rapporteurs, the interpretation of the most serious crimes has to satisfy[15]:

1. 'Most serious crimes' should be interpreted in the most restrictive and exceptional manner possible;
2. The death penalty should be considered in cases where the crime is intentional and results in lethal or extremely grave consequences;
3. Countries should repeal legislation prescribing capital punishment for economic, non-violent or victiumless offences.

Regarding argument which stated that drugs cases do not meet the definition of the most serious crimes, the Court in this stage submits [16] that phrase "the most serious crimes" under article 6 paragraph (2) of ICCPR cannot be read separately with the phrase "in accordance with the law in force at the time of the commission of the crime.", Which also stipulates in the same article. In the national level, the applicable law is that Act about narcotic drugs, meanwhile in international level, the applicable law is that the Convention. As a consequence of ratifying the Convention, Indonesia obliges to maximize the effectiveness of law enforcement measures in respect of those offenses as stipulated under article 3 paragraph (6) of the Convention.

Besides, Indonesia shall consider the drugs crimes as a serious offense as mandated under article 3 paragraph (5) of the Convention. By interpreting the articles in the Convention systematically, the attacks which mentioned in the Convention classify as particularly serious crimes. Further, the Court also notes that if the offenses specified in the Convention consider as particularly serious crimes compared to the other crimes, which has been recognized as the most serious crimes, such as genocide crime and crimes against humanity, then there is no different substantively between the two groups of crimes. It is because both groups of crimes adversely affect the economic, cultural and political foundation of society and bring a danger of incalculable gravity. Accordingly, the Court affirms that drugs narcotics cases are equals to the most serious crimes as referred under article 6 of ICCPR.

In different pages, the Court also declares that Indonesia is a state which has the largest Muslim population in the world and becomes a member of the Organisation of Islamic Cooperation. Accordingly, it is essential for Indonesia to consider the content of the Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam[17]. Under article 2 (a) of Cairo Declaration, it is stipulated that:

"Life is a God-given gift and the right to life is guaranteed to every human being, It is the duty of individuals, societies and states to protect this right from any violation, and its prohibited to take away life except for a Shari'ah prescribed reason."

Based on those rules, the writer submits that the state has no authority to sentence a death to a man without a clear regulation, laws, and purpose. In other words, the countries which recognize death penalty as a form of punishment in its law system, the aim must be related to the state's obligation to protect its national security and public safety purpose. If a state arbitrarily takes away other people live without clear purpose and prescribed reason, under Islamic law, it is prohibited. In this case, the government of the Republic of Indonesia obliges to obey the Convention's mandates and keep the social harmony in sync. By considering drugs narcotics cases as one of the most serious crimes, Indonesia attempts to protect its national security and public safety purpose. As mentioned above, there are 4.5 million people in Indonesia suffers from drug-related problems and around 1.2 million people of them cannot be cured.[18] Thus, based on those data that drugs narcotics cases only bring adverse effect to society, threaten public safety which leads to national security in Indonesia, it is safe to submit that those reasons meet the standard of prescribed reason referring under article 2 (a) of the Cairo Declaration and sentence a death to those drugs narcotics dealers are allowed.

Moreover, based on the survey result conducted by Indo Barometer 2015, it shows that about 84,1% of Indonesians agree that the drugs dealers deserve a death penalty punishment because drugs endanger Indonesians generations' life.[19] Accordingly, most of Indonesians comprehend well that the impact caused by drugs narcotics endanger its state safety.

2.3. Death Penalty Against the Constitution and Principle of Human Right?

National Anti-Narcotics Agency ("NANA") affirms that perpetrators of narcotics crimes do not only eliminate the right to life, but also disturb the social harmony among society and damage the young generation. Further, NANA states that the impact of drugs narcotics can also omit the freedom of thought and the right not to be enslaved.[20]

Regarding the human right violated in the death penalty issue, it is essential to comprehend the human right which recognized in the Constitution. As mentioned earlier that there is a limitation stated in the constitution under article 28J paragraph (2). What limits the people right in Indonesia are that stating in the article 28J paragraph (2), namely: the recognition and respect of the rights and freedoms of others and of satisfying just demands based upon considerations of morality, religious values, security and public order in a democratic society; and the norms in the PANCASILA.

PANCASILA, pronounced Panchaseela, is the philosophical basis of the Indonesian state.[21] In other words, Pancasila is a guidance for the government to run the state, to be a direction of the development and the ideals of the Indonesia. PANCASILA comprises five inseparable and interrelated principles, namely:

1. Belief in the One and Only God;
2. Just and Civilized Humanity;
3. The Unity of Indonesia;

4. Democracy Guided by the Inner Wisdom in the Unanimity Arising Out of Deliberations Amongs Representatives;
5. Social Justice for the Whole of the People of Indonesia.

Prof. Achmad Ali, former National Commission on Human Rights has stated that there are two principles inside PANCASILA in favor of death-sentenced for the most serious crimes, namely: the first principle and second principle. The meaning of the two laws contained in PANCASILA cannot be separable. It is essential to bear in mind that there must be a balance of injustice by taking into account the position of the victims of narcotics crimes. The justice cannot be seen on the perpetrator side only, but it shall recognize the victim side.[22]

Considering the impact of drugs narcotics circle which threaten to omit other people's right and potentially damage other's people live, it is safe to submit that it is against the ideology of a state, especially a goal and the idea of the government as mentioned under the Constitution. In other words, there is no respect and recognition of the rights and freedoms of others in drugs narcotics dealers cases because they are well-proven acting beyond their limit in term of recognizing other people right to live well and well aware that their actions can harm and risk other people life. It is safe to submit that this such a crime against consideration of morality, religious values, security and public order in a democratic society, as mandated under article 28J paragraph (2) of the Constitution.

Conclusion

There are 4.5 million people in Indonesia suffers from drug-related problems, and around 1.2 million people of them cannot be cured. It means that there are approximately 33 to 50 people each day die because of it. Comparing to the number of people who suffered caused by drugs narcotics in 2007, 4.5 million is a massive number of people. The data shows that in 2007, the number of drugs narcotics suffered people reach about 15.000 people a year. In other words, in less than ten years, the number of drugs narcotics victims increased dramatically. Moreover, data in 2007 revealed that the community funds which spent in drugs narcotics cycle are about 292 trillion per year. This data proves that the spread of cycling of illicit drugs trafficking is widespread rapidly.

In this stage, it is essential to bear in mind that In Indonesia, the majority of those who sentenced a death penalty is that the one in the drugs cases. It reaches about 63.5% of the total death penalty cases in percentages. Indonesia considers drugs narcotics cases as equals to the most serious crimes. Although there are many groups of people who disagree with this rule, the government keeps supporting this such a capital punishment for drugs narcotics cases. Besides, the Court through its verdict submits that phrase "the most serious crimes" under article 6 paragraph (2) of ICCPR cannot be read separately with the phrase "in accordance with the law in force at the time of the commission of the crime.", Which also stipulates in the same article. In the national level, the applicable law is that Act about narcotic drugs, meanwhile in international level, the applicable law is that the Convention. As a consequence of ratifying the Convention, Indonesia obliges to maximize the effectiveness of law enforcement measures in respect of those offenses as stipulated under article 3 paragraph (6) of the Convention.

In addition, Indonesia shall consider the drugs crimes as a serious offense as mandated under article 3 paragraph (5) of the Convention. By interpreting the articles in the Convention systematically, the attacks which mentioned in the Convention classify as particularly serious crimes. Further, the Court also notes that if the offenses mentioned in the Convention consider as particularly serious crimes compared to the other crimes, which has been considered as the most serious crimes, such as genocide crime and crimes against humanity, then there is no different substantively between the two groups of crimes. It is because both groups of crimes adversely affect the economic, cultural and political foundation of society and bring a danger of incalculable gravity. Accordingly, the Court affirms that drugs narcotics cases are equals to the most serious crimes as referred under article 6 of ICCPR.

Then, does the death penalty against the principle of human right, especially the right to life? As mentioned above that there is a limitation regulated in the law system, either in the international level or on a national scale. In the international level, it is regulated under article 29 paragraph (2) of UDHR which is also similar to article 28J paragraph (2) of the Constitution. It is safe to submit that under both laws; there is no absolute way to exercise the human right. Specifically, stipulate that we are the people have to accept the restrictions established by law for the sole purposes of guaranteeing the recognition and respect of the rights and freedoms of others based upon considerations of morality, religious values, security and public order in a democratic society. Furthermore, under article 9 paragraph (1) and its explanation of Act of Human Rights, capital punishment based on a court decision is one out of two reasons that right to life can be limited in Indonesia. Accordingly, the death penalty has a legal basis in Indonesia, and those legal bases are in line with international law and respect the human right principle.

By presenting the implementation of the death penalty in Indonesia, the writer expects that the wider society, especially the international community, can comprehend the reasons on why the government supports the death penalty for drugs cases. Also, this paper is expected to answer those who are question the legal basis of death penalty implementation in Indonesia. Since this is a sensitive issue and many people are likely to take misperception about Indonesia and its policy, the writer hopes that this paper can give a clear description of the death penalty issue. In this section, the writer also suggests to the other writers or researchers to do some research about the death penalty system in Indonesia. Many scopes can be dug in details, such as the specific law of death penalties, the judges' consideration while handling the case, or the possibility of Indonesia to abolish the death penalty in the future when drugs cases do not exist anymore.

To sum up, sentence a death to the drugs narcotics dealers is in line with the laws, including national/domestics and international; and respect and recognize the human right principles. In this stage, the writer also invites the other researchers to take part in this issue by researching the death penalty in Indonesia.

TRENDS IN INTERNATIONAL TAX PLANNING: NEW QUALIFICATIONS AND TAX JURISDICTION SHOPPING

Vladimir TROITSKIY

Abstract

In 2015 the unprecedented leak of 11,5 million files from Mossack Fonseka, one of the world's biggest offshore law firms, echoed around the globe after demonstrating variety of sophisticated ways in which the wealthy can use offshore tax jurisdictions. It brought public concern about tax evasion to an exceptional level and put pressure on governments to make world financial system even more transparent. The Panama Gate became a strong trigger to start the last phase of new international tax control system formation.

Six years before, in 2009, a meeting was held by The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) in Mexico City. Although the official agenda pointed at transparency and global economic growth as targets, some commentators described the goal of this gathering as "creating a global high-tax cartel". The practical output of this meeting was establishment of the new global "tax standard" based on a wide information exchange between the tax authorities. The OECD negotiators persuaded eighty-seven states to join the standard.

Since 2010, with the enactment of the Foreign Account Compliance Act, known as FATCA, by the United States, the free flow of money, which seemed to be an essential attribute of open market, doesn't look that free any more. FATCA now requires non-US financial organizations – foreign financial institutions - to implement advanced compliance system and report directly to the US Internal Revenue Service (IRS). Due to the size of the US economy and globalized world economy the number of those affected directly or indirectly is overwhelming.

The article is analyzing changes in international tax planning as a business process and a type of consulting service through research of regulatory changes and law enforcement practices worldwide. Particular focus will be made on several jurisdictions that used to provide or still offer now beneficial tax regimes.

Keywords: tax planning, tax optimization, low tax jurisdiction, offshore, compliance

1. Introduction

The fundamental changes in international tax regulations taking place in the course of last two decades have virtually redrawn international financial systems, letting the freedom of capital movement become history and turning the banking secrecy into a combination of words with no semantic meaning. This all happened within twenty years after governments leaded by OECD adopted their views that tax havens or offshores were causing the tax shortfall in the industrialized countries. That changed the hierarchy of the core principles in regulating international markets. Freedom of entrepreneurship was widely replaced by the principles of tax harmony, avoidance of tax competition, transparency and ability of governments to get "fair share".

The described situation inevitably caused transformation of tax planning process for companies and individuals. Though changes were stretched in time, the comparison of the tax-planning process twenty years ago and today would bring us to "revolution" as a more appropriate characteristic of this change rather than "evolution". It is not just that tax planning is far more difficult now than it has ever been before but it is also about the revision of the very nature of this process.

With a very slight degree of exaggeration we can state that the practice of international tax, enforced by the developed countries, turned to consider governments the ultimate clients of banks and even tax advisors. In fact, one of the main concerns for a modern bank now is to dutifully make sure all clients and their operations fully comply with all possible rules and "recommendations" of regulative authority, which means complying with the dictates of every tax system worldwide in case bank works with any type of foreign transactions. International tax planners and advisors have been transformed into agents of the tax authorities spending time and clients' money on researching numerous complex regulations.

There were several publications released in recent years covering various topics of new tax planning reality. A comprehensive review of planning techniques without taking into account a specific jurisdiction was made in 2017 by authors of "Fundamentals of international tax planning" edited by Raffaele Russo[1], which is a new edition of previously published work. A more practical guide to international tax planning incorporating real life case studies was published by Rohit Gupta in 2015 under the title "Principles of International Tax Planning"[2]. One of the most recent comprehensive publication under the title "Principles of International Taxation" by Lynne Oats, Angharat Miller, Emer Mulligan presents tax planning in a global context, explaining policy, legal issues and planning points central to taxation issues[3].

Some more specific studies address particular jurisdictions or types of business planning activities. In 2018 and 2019 several publications appeared reviewing tax planning issues for particular countries in regards to specific types of businesses. The 4th Edition of International Taxation in Canada - Principles and Practices, by Jinyan Li, Arthur Cockfield, J. Scott Wilkie released in 2018 provides a Canadian view on policy governing international tax rules as well as how foreign tax laws interact with Canadian laws[4]. Meyyappan Nagappan published "The Indian approach to taxing virtual presence" analyzing complex nature of taxing IT services[5], "Chile's approach to the taxation of the digital economy" by Manuel José Garcés addresses related issues but with the focus on Chile and MERCOSUR regulations[6]. Due to the dynamic nature of the subject, earlier publications can mostly be used as a good source of information to conduct a comparative study and review changes in international tax planning.

This article focuses mostly on identification of trends in international tax planning rather then on a comprehensive research of tax planning mechanisms and practices or tax regulation in particular jurisdiction. Such study based on analyses of legislation and real cases from various jurisdiction with particular attention to problem of tax planning qualification, tax compliance growing importance and nature of modern tax jurisdiction shopping will enable drawing conclusions on what is tax planning process now after such drastic policy changes that took place in course of last two decades.

2. Tax optimization and its legal qualification

The legality of the very idea of business allocation and structuring aimed at tax optimization is widely questioned. Many governments strongly believe that taxes do not distort the allocation of resources by private enterprises and therefore companies which consider taxes as a cost of business operations should be treated as engaging in illegal activities. This thought that would sound ridiculous twenty years ago is becoming the dominant point of view for the world tax authorities. Yet in 2017 in the article "New trends in international tax planning and international tax control"[7] , I was referring to the IRS website recommending US taxpayers along with other useful tips to choose the corporate structure and place for domiciliation so that a business would pay minimal taxes. This recommendation is not there anymore. It was replaced by a much more neutral one. "The business structure you choose influences everything from day-to-day operations, to taxes, to how much of your personal assets are at risk. You should choose a business structure that gives you the right balance of legal protections and benefits."[8] The broad interpretation of this text still allows the entrepreneur to infer that tax optimization criteria is something that is allowed to be considered while choosing the corporate structure, but it is now far more ambiguous. It would be still wrong to say that new tax philosophy is that private business operations generate the maximum tax for the government to distribute to various social groups but the shift in tax policies that could be observed in a course of the last ten years is drastic. Earlier, tax planning consisted of jurisdiction shopping, proper business structuring, meaning potential necessity to split business between several units, selection of appropriate corporate form, structuring business processes the way it would minimize the tax base, consider all possible allowances, deductions, rebates, exemptions, and so on as well as any other imaginable measures to diminish tax burden as soon as they are not directly forbidden by law. Now most of these steps moved to the "gray zone" and are often treated as illegal. So, what is the extent to which entrepreneurs are still free to do anything to structure their businesses in case such activities cause tax savings?

There is no unequivocal answer. Practice of courts and tax authorities worldwide allows to say that the criteria widely applied are whether such structuring, choice of jurisdiction and other steps were exclusively or predominantly aimed at benefiting from tax savings or there were other business-related motivations. The Supreme Arbitration Court of Russia on 12.10.2006 adopted a Resolution N 53 "On evaluation of the validity of tax savings" which interprets as unjustified tax saving any mode of taxpayer's behavior different from the most reasonable behavior from commercial point of view and having tax saving as a main purpose.

The practice formed in the United Kingdom adds to this that tax planning can be seen as aggressive and hence potentially illegal "when it involves using financial instruments and arrangements not intended as, or anticipated by governments as a vehicle for tax advantage. For example, the use of overseas tax havens."[9]

Many countries now have an extensive system of laws and practices designed to preserve national tax base by preventing income from being shifted among related parties through the inappropriate pricing of related party transactions. They try to enforce the transfer pricing regime, ensuring goods and services transferred between related companies are done so transparently and are priced based on market conditions that permit profits to be reflected in the appropriate tax jurisdiction. That often means that any type of business splitting among various entities which governments don't like is considered a usage of tax shelter that increases the tax gap. Based on that, entrepreneurs can suddenly face the situation when there is a bureaucratically determined taxable "profit" under some governmentally developed theory of pricing. Moreover, by not paying of this artificial "price", the company, either domestic or foreign, could not only be civilly liable but criminally liable as well. Needless to say, that fair transfer pricing criteria may differ from one country to another and eventually generate collisions when two or more tax authorities will figure that particular business unit earned the biggest share of profit in their country.

The borderline is not yet drawn, however the legitimacy criteria of tax optimization are not where they used to be before, meaning "Everything is allowed unless it is directly prohibited by the law". The line has significantly shifted towards a much more conservative form of tax planning but new coordinates will be determined by further regulations and mainly by the enforcement practice.

3. Tax compliance as a key factor for modern tax planning

Whenever tax optimization struggles for its right to remain essential part of international tax planning, tax administration and compliance have gained core positions. Modern international tax compliance is undoubtedly a heavy burden for entrepreneurs involved in any type of international commerce. The 2018 Report by the US National Taxpayer Advocate[10] points that the most serious problem facing taxpayers – and the IRS – is complexity of Internal Revenue Code (the "tax code"). It takes "excessive time, hiring costly professional tax preparers and using costly computer software, obscures comprehension, facilitates tax avoidance, and undermines trust in the tax system, among many other problems"[11]. The tax compliance became itself the critical factor for tax planning: even big companies are to consider not only financial consequences of applying one or another tax architecture but costs and risks related to tax planning as well. Governments are quite aggressive in doing various tax audits, which affect not only transnational corporations but also regional businesses on very early stages of international expansion.

The described constitutes a new Non-Tariff Barrier (NTB) for international trade and investment. Popular NTB description as restriction that results from prohibitions, conditions, or specific market requirements that make importation or exportation of products difficult and/or costly[12] totally fits characteristics of modern compliance requirements and tax audit practices. Whenever NTBs traditionally are thought of as unjustified and/or improper application of Non-Tariff measures such as sanitary and phytosanitary measures and other technical barriers to trade applied by foreign government, tax compliance and audit measures are often barriers built by the company's national fiscal authorities. This behavior conceptually is based on two beliefs which are popular among modern political establishment and tax bureaucrats. First is considering any business unit a part of national welfare and thus ought to not only contribute to the growth of GDP and create jobs but also generate maximum tax for the government that would be further distributed among different social groups. The attempt to retain part of the profit by optimizing tax burden is associated with cheating and taking money from someone. Voices of governments and social activists in the US, Europe and the rest of the world keep counting how much tax revenues "they" are losing due to offshore tax abuses. Some researchers point at about 70 billion US dollars that United States is losing every year due to the shifting of corporate profits to tax havens[13], while the official sources (Parliament Sub-Committee on Investigations of the United States Senate) report 100 billion[14]. For European Union the hypostatized numbers mount to 75 billion US dollars a year[15] as revenue costs of tax havens. The credibility of these numbers is much under doubt. Mostly, these are very rough estimations lacking real methodology and primarily aimed to raise the question of some extent of additional taxes that might be paid by corporations and individuals in the country, which are not paid or paid somewhere else affecting national interests. The interests of shareholders who invested capital and are carrying all risks are considered as having subsidiary nature. Higher tax burden is an obvious decelerator of business growth and demotivation of entrepreneur incentives. The extent to which entrepreneurs will continue to generate comparable revenues when forced to give bigger share of their earnings to a third party have never been estimated.

Second belief is that tax compliance rules and expenses do not have significant impact on international trade and investment. This statement could be hardly treated as something other than a speculation. According to the World Bank, a low cost of tax compliance and efficient procedures can make a significant difference for firms[16]. The so-called Munich group, a research center consisting of the Center for Economic Studies (CES), the Ifo Institute and the CESifo GmbH (Munich Society for the Promotion of Economic Research), is regularly publishing research with deep analysis on how corporate taxation and regulatory requirements affect the localization of financial sector. Their results show obvious negative effect of host country taxes on the probability of choosing a particular host location. They also demonstrate a strong influence of regulatory compliance environment. The stronger (more expensive, complicated, time consuming) are the compliance requirements the smaller is the chance of choosing particular jurisdiction by the businesses.

4. Banking compliance

Banks are not the same type of institutions they used to be throughout their history. Forced by OECD, IRS, national central banks and tax authorities they turned into effective agents of the regulators and tax collectors. Such term as bank secrecy becomes anachronism. Banks cannot be recognized as reliable or client-oriented similarly as one cannot call reliable or client-oriented the tax collector because they are not just providing services but withdraw client's earnings, though sometimes in a very polite way. Things were changing gradually but an active phase of this shift happened after the financial crisis of 2008. Many countries have seen a need to restrict banks' national and especially international activities. They went unprecedentedly far introducing restrictions and controls. More and more global banks complaint about excessive compliance costs associated with stricter regulations. Many financial institutions reconsider their international strategies as the costs of being global often exceed benefits thereof.

For example, the estimate costs for a bank to meet FATCA compliance requirements might average at 10$ per account per month[17]. For smaller banks expenses per account are higher as they have to distribute fixed costs on installing software among fewer clients. This became a barrier for many European banks to enter markets of some types of financial services. It turned into a worldwide trend that non-US banks are just denying to provide services to any individuals and corporation residing or by any mean related to the United States. Many financial institutions in Eastern Europe, especially in Baltic States, went further and totally ceased all bank settlements in US dollars except intra-bank operations.

The basic principles of banking regulations have shifted. For example, paragraph 3 Article 845 of Russian Civil Code states: "The bank shall have no right to determine and control the trends of using the client's monetary funds and introduce other restrictions on his right to dispose of cash at his discretion which are not provided by the law or the bank account agreement". Article 849 adds: "The bank shall be obliged to charge cash placed on the client's account within the day that follows the day of the receipt by the bank of the relevant payment document, unless the bank account agreement provides for a shorter period. The bank shall be obliged to pay out cash or transfer it from the depositor's account within the day that follows the day of the receipt by the bank of the relevant payment document, unless the law, the bank rules introduced in accordance with it or the bank account agreement provide for different time-limits". 10 years ago, Russian Central bank was actively penalizing banks for any delays in executing wire transfers or refusal to withdraw cash. The bank license could be suspended as a result of repetitive violations of that type. It is not that case anymore. Banks in Russia and all over OECD can virtually block anyone's accounts with minor suspicion of the account owner carrying malicious operation or formal refusal to present activity related documents. Financial institutions got the right and sometimes obligation to request almost unlimited amount of information and documents, including those containing trade secrets or personal data. Being "de facto" turned into another law enforcement institution, banks had to change core basics of their businesses.

Bank compliance became also a tool to stop wide use of offshores. Once again suppressed by OECD and IRS, banks just stopped opening accounts to offshore companies thus making even survived tax havens useless for international businesses. The old account holders were gradually forced to close their accounts or disclose ultimate beneficiaries.

5. New jurisdictions and tax havens

While traditional jurisdictions are increasing their transparency levels and closing doors to foreign businesses, some new players come to the empty market. The jurisdictions with growing popularity could be divided into three groups.

I. Previously known as relatively low tax jurisdictions that try to adjust legislation in order to formally meet the OECD criteria to be removed from various grey and black lists. United Arab Emirates, Singapore, Hong Kong, Cyprus and some other countries and territories are examples of this class. Normally, they bring up costs of maintaining a company to foreigners by introducing requirements of presence in the country, meaning owning or renting real office (not a post box), hiring at least some local employees (normally 3 to 6) and reporting regularly to the local tax authorities. That allows these jurisdictions to claim that they are not tax havens but countries with friendly environment for "local companies" carrying international operations. Such jurisdictions are normally successful in case of having relatively developed national banking system. The transparency is reasonably high and requests disclosure of beneficiaries and at least formal explanation of income sources.

II. Jurisdictions that have never been considered as "offshores" but are proposing businesses formally moving to their territory a relatively low tax burden. Romania, Latvia, Estonia, Montenegro, Bulgaria, Paraguay are belonging to this category. All of these countries request regular tax reporting and accountability but under some conditions allow using either very low tax rate or even avoid paying some or all of the taxes.

For example, Romania imposed a special tax regime for micro-companies. Under the condition of having a maximum revenue of 1 million euros (EUR) at the end of the previous year, the income tax rates could be as low as 1% for micro-companies with one or more employees and 3% for micro-companies with no employees. Hence for companies carrying no operations inside the EU (meaning they are not subject to VAT taxation) the overall tax burden can be effectively limited to 1%[18]. Estonia is another example. All undistributed corporate profits in this country are tax-exempt. This exemption covers both active and passive types of income as well as capital gains from the sale of assets, including shares, securities, and real estate. This tax regime is available to Estonian resident companies and permanent establishments of non-resident companies that are registered in Estonia[19]. The transparency level and corporate data accessibility differs from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Estonia has one of the most IT developed governments and its registers are open and easily accessible. Paraguay, on the contrary, doesn't have any open corporate or tax register.

III. The third group is presented by the only state that is the major economic power in the modern world. And this example is mostly not about low tax burden but about low transparency level. FATCA enables the government of the United States to obtain the most intimate of individual financial information, financial relationship, and future financial plans. This expansion of power is being exported out of the US via intergovernmental agreements to other countries, which then coordinate their exchange of information. These agreements are made through a simplified procedure and do not need approval of Congress. Even more effective mechanism for spreading FATCA is through direct enforcement of banks worldwide to search their records and to report to the IRS about any individuals having connection to the US.

Although the United States is fully devoted to the target of obtaining all possible tax information from all foreign sources, the US tax information collection machine is not working in a reciprocal way. It is against the US law to provide information about any taxpayer's affairs unless the US has signed a treaty that allows such information exchange. US is not part of OECD Automatic Exchange of Information (Common Reporting Standards) and has not so many bilateral treaties on financial or tax information exchange. This makes the situation when a non-US resident owns a US company or account is quite the opposite stance to the situation when a US resident opens an account in Europe or anywhere else. In real life, this almost fully shields the foreigners' US financial activities from the scrutiny of foreign tax authorities. The situation does not look like something temporary. In 2017 a bill named "The International Counter-Money Laundering Act" was turned down by the Congress. This bill would have given foreign authorities the right to ask US banks to release customer information based on "reasonable grounds". The US congress was firm to keep financial information secrecy even though FINCIN (Financial Crimes Enforcement Network – part of US Treasury department) reported before Congress hearings that almost $300 billion US dollars is laundered in US each year.

The corporate registers are available online in most states. However, only directors and officers are listed in the registers. Furthermore, there are easy ways to hide their names using legal nominee services or registering a factitious DBA (doing business as) name and placing it into the registers. Hence, any foreigner keeping his funds either on his own name or on the name of a corporation in the US has really low chance to be disclosed to his national tax authorities. There are virtually no "know your customer" mandatory regulations in US requesting disclosure of actual owners of a limited company or corporation.

The US active participation in international anti-offshore campaign may be used in the future by other nations as a precedent to force the US authorities raise taxes and step to more transparent policy, but it doesn't look like something that can change the situation in the next few years.

In addition to extremely low transparency for foreign businesses' data, US tax legislation offers "inshore" low tax jurisdictions like Delaware, Vermont, Nevada, Alaska, Rhode Island or Kentucky that virtually turn United States into the dominant safe-haven in the world. Several of the named states have recently enacted legislation allowing the establishment of structures, which previously were an attribute of offshore notoriety. For example, Alaska and Delaware have passed asset protection trust law. Montana and Colorado have established onshore financial centers offering foreign investors exemption from estate tax as well as financial privacy and advanced asset protection.

If the US limited company is fully owned by the foreigners and operates foreign sourced transactions with other non-US entities there is no US tax implied. However, for the rest of the world such transaction will look as a transaction with US company and will not arouse any suspicions.

For individuals the US tax system also provides a myriad of tax avoiding opportunities. For example, the US has relatively high estate tax ranging from 18% to 40%. However, it could be fully avoided by foreigners. The criteria for applying estate tax is not based on residency, but on whether the alien is domiciled. Hence the non-US individual who may be resident in the US for the purposes of income taxation may not be considered to be domiciled in the US and consequently can avoid exposure to the US estate and gift tax by using any foreign corporation.

The US 30% withholding tax on dividends, interests and other fixed periodical income paid to foreign persons. But US tax legislation gives a special benefit to foreign investors. Foreign investment paying interest can be structured as "portfolio debt" which can legally pay interest free of any withholding tax. Such debt structured as debentures are allowed to be in bearer form, which gives the highest possible level of anonymity.

In case a foreigner is not doing real business or trade in the US and simply parks his capital in a US bank, insurance company or other type of financial institution in form of a deposit, the interest earned is qualified as foreign-sourced income and is not taxable in the United States. Besides, as such funds are deemed to be foreign property, they are not subject to estate tax as well.

Foreigners investing on stock exchange independently on the amount and frequency of operations are not subject to capital gain tax on securities transactions.

These benefits obviously do not cover all business needs and all possible situations but are an effective mechanism to attract international businesses. However, these advantages come at a cost. The US tax legislation is convoluted, the tax code is very complicated and precedents volume is enormous. The tax advisors are costly and need to be highly qualified to guide clients through an extremely complicated tax system. Moreover, there are significant discloser requirements set by IRS and sometimes by the state authorities. Hence, the US is an attractive jurisdiction for those businesses and individuals that can allow high level of tax professionalism, costly tax consulting and are ready to restructure their business architecture.

6. Customized jurisdiction solutions

Years ago, costs of company establishment and maintaining were key criteria for picking particular jurisdiction. Nowadays, both survived offshores and low tax jurisdictions are customized to accommodate particular types of businesses. If businesses are closely tied to the ground and physical presence are hardly objects of international tax planning through tax optimization, some new and old businesses which have little connection to particular territory can highly benefit from international corporate architecture.

For example, traditional intellectual intangibles obviously have tremendous value for the global business. They have no actual physical presence. There are hardly many good reasons for entrepreneurs to hold intellectual property in a high tax jurisdiction when by means of sophisticated tax planning the exposure to tax can be limited or avoided in a low or no tax country. Especially if such jurisdiction is participating in major international treaties on intellectual property and has a developed double taxation avoidance treaty network.

Another example is related to Internet businesses. Cyberspace is a new humongous business environment, which undermines traditional relationship between what is considered legally significant and physical presence. World wide web is gradually eroding the direct connection between geographical location and business activities, thus dramatically mitigating power of governments to control online businesses and the ability of physical location authorities to cover cyberspace by its regulations.

As states are still an important social institution even most of IT businesses need to have a harbor. Creating such harbors became a priority task for some traditionally "offshore" jurisdiction. Unable to continue their "no tax for everyone" regime they compete in creating more attractive climate and regulation for those who by the nature of their businesses are almost not depending on major regulators. Switzerland, Puerto Rico and Singapore are working hard to be pioneers in accommodating various blockchain project, facilitate use of crypto currencies and introduce regulations for advanced business technologies like smart contracts. This might eventually turn into a world where major businesses would exist without being covered by any government regulations. However, this trend is only in its nascent stage and is beyond the scope of this article, thus, requires a separate research.

Conclusions

Last decade brought tremendous changes to international tax planning as a service and as a business process. The legality of tax optimization as a form of retaining part of personal or corporate earnings by means of using foreign companies is widely questioned by governments and OECD. Banks, financial institutions and tax consulters have deviated from their traditional roles and converted to executers of governments' policies requesting full transparency, compliance, disclosure and total governmental control over any international monetary or asset transactions.

Traditional "no tax" jurisdictions are disappearing as a result of international tax and monetary authorities pressure on their government and on banks carrying international operations.

Simultaneously some new tax planning opportunities have appeared as a response to ubiquitous tightening of international tax regulation. Some of these new solutions brought growing popularity to the new "low tax jurisdictions" which were not qualified as offshores before. Estonia, Latvia, Hungary and Romania became comfortable European shelters for some businesses agreeable to some level of transparency and regular reporting and prepared to pay a very low tax calculated based on revenue. Same characteristics can be given to jurisdictions from other parts of the planet like Paraguay or Georgia. Few traditional "offshores" like UAE and Singapore are trying to preserve their place on this market by implying rules demanding some extent of physical presence in their country meaning having real office space and some paid employees in order to formally avoid being qualified as offshores. Surprisingly, one of the quickly growing safe harbors is the United States with its extremely low transparency level for foreign authorities due to not participating in Global Reporting Standard and tax regulations in some states allowing international businesses to effectively minimize their tax burden.

Another tax planning opportunity is related to customization of jurisdictions to be capable to accommodate particular types of businesses especially having low connection to particular territory. IT businesses and particularly businesses based on blockchain technologies are to be the easiest ones to accept formal link to any territory that will provide better environment and lowest tax. In the future, this trend may further develop in fleeing of many businesses out of any governmental control and regulations and this topic deserves separate research efforts.

INTERDISCIPLINARY JUDICIAL COOPERATION: MUTUAL RECOGNITION OF PROTECTION MEASURES IN EUROPEAN UNION

Anca Magda VOICULESCU[*]

Abstract

Violence under multiple forms has become an increasingly worrying phenomenon in current society, leading to adoption of various legislative instruments, in order to effectively combat it.

According to particularities of each state, there is a wide variety of instruments adopted at national level, different either in name (interdiction orders, protection orders, restrictive orders, etc.), as well as juridical nature (civil or criminal). The same variety also appears at EU level, related to the type of legislation (mandatory or not; primary or secondary) and the area it covers (civil or criminal). The panel of legislative instruments is completed by a series of international conventions on preventing and combating violence.

In this large context, the purpose of the article is to analyze interdisciplinary issues related to judicial cooperation within European Union in civil and criminal matters, for the particular case of protection measures adopted by different authorities of Member States.

The principle is that exercise of the right of free circulation and establishment in European Union imposes that protection granted to an individual in a Member State should be maintained and continued in any other Member State to which that person travels or moves. In particular, this goal is achieved by recognition in a Member State of the effects of judgments providing protection measures handed down in another Member State.

The objectives of this study are to identify the relevant compulsory EU legal instruments in the field of civil and criminal areas, as well as a comparative perspective concerning the relation between previously identified EU law and national legislations and their sphere of application. Equally, the comparative approach will extend to establishing the main issues specific to exequatur procedure both at EU and national level.

Keywords: judicial cooperation, mutual recognition, protection measures, civil matters, criminal matters

1. Introduction

The goal of the present study is to analyze interdisciplinary issues related to judicial cooperation within European Union in civil and criminal matters, for the particular case of protection measures adopted in different Member States.

The subject presents significant importance, as victims of (repetitive) violence have an increased need for protection against offenders, which lead to adoption of a large panel of various instruments at national, European Union and international level.

A comparative perspective over these legal instruments concludes that one way of safeguarding is to issue protection orders, a juridical instrument which appears in national legislations of all Member States of European Union.

There are, however, discrepancies among national protection order laws and quite various domestic approaches[1].

At the same time, it should be ensured that the legitimate exercise by citizens of European Union of their right to move and reside freely within the territory of Member States, in accordance with Article 3 Para 2 of the Treaty on European Union (TEU)[2] and Article 21 Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU)[3], does not result in a loss of their protection.

It was therefore necessary to adopt at EU level binding legal instruments, in order to ensure mutual recognition in all Member States of protection measures adopted by different domestic authorities.

In this context, the study will identify the relevant mandatory EU legal instruments in the field of civil and criminal areas, their sphere of application, and also how they interact with national legislations.

Equally, the study will take into discussion the the main issues specific to exequatur procedure both at EU and national level.

Where having been expressed, juridical opinions will be pointed out, in close connection to discussion of relevant case-law.

2.1. The framework of judicial cooperation in civil and criminal matters

As European Union has the objective of developing and maintaining an area of freedom, security and justice, according to provisions within the Treaty of Amsterdam[4], the gradual establishment of this area implied measures to improve, simplify and expedite effective judicial cooperation between Member States in civil and commercial matters, as well as criminal matters.

By Council Decision no. 2001/1470/EC from 28 May 2001[5] there was established a European Judicial Network in civil and commercial matters, which began operating on 1 December 2002[6].

Similar to the area of civil and commercial matters, a European Judicial Network functions in criminal matters, created by Joint Action of 29 June 1998[7], and adopted by the Council on the basis of Article K.3 of the TEU.

At legislative level, there were different types of juridical instruments, all of them promoting the idea that the main tool for facilitating access to cross-border justice is the principle of mutual recognition[8] (based on mutual trust between Member States and direct judicial cooperation among national courts).

TFEU structures the themes belonging to the European area of freedom, security and justice in four domains, related to border control policies, asylum and immigration, judicial cooperation in civil matters, judicial cooperation in criminal matters and police cooperation[9].

The legal basis of judicial cooperation in civil matters is Article 81 Para 1 of the TFEU.

Articles 82 to 86 of the same TFEU provide legal basis of judicial cooperation in criminal matters.

Also, Article 5 of the TEU has generally been used to justify the Union's competence to legislate at EU level. According to Article 5, the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality are applied when European Union uses its competence to legislate a specific matter.

2.2. EU legal instruments on mutual recogition of protection measures. National and international legal instruments

Going in-depth from the general framework, a new specific mechanism was conceived, composed of two EU legal instruments, one applying in civil matters, and the other in criminal area.

The main legal cooperation instrument in civil area is the regulation (part of secondary legislation, mandatory, directly applicable, capable of complete direct effect[10]).

Based on these characteristics, regulations are frequently compared to national laws, and part of juridical literature has referred to them as "European law"[11].

In particular for cooperation in protection measures, the relevant legal instrument is Regulation (EU) no. 606/2013 of 12 June 2013 on mutual recognition of protection measures in civil matters of the European Parliament and of the Council[12] ("the Regulation").

In Romania, there were established measures necessary for application of the Regulation by Law no. 206/2016 for completing the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 119/2006 on certain measures necessary for the application of some Community regulations from the date of Romania's accession to the European Union, as well as for the modification and completion of the Law on Public Notaries and Notarial Activity no. 36/1995[13].

According to Recitals 40 and 41 of the Regulation, United Kingdom and Ireland have notified their wish to take part in the adoption and application of the Regulation; Denmark is not taking part in the adoption of the Regulation and is not bound by it or subject to its application.

[13] Published in the Official Gazzette of Romania no. 898/09.11.2016. In this context, it is important to point out that, even if regulations are directly applicable, national authorities are allowed to take the measures provided for by the regulations themselves or measures which prove

With respect to criminal matters, under the former third pillar (police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters mentioned before), the legal instrument for cooperation was the framework decision, as a form of intergovernmental cooperation[14].

Framework decisions were somehow similar to directives, as they required Member States to achieve particular results without dictating the means of achieving that result. By contrast to directives, framework decisions were not capable of direct effect[15], and failure to transpose a framework decision into domestic law could not lead to enforcement proceedings by the European Commission.

As the old "pillar structure" disappeared under the Treaty of Lisbon[16], the "abolition" of the former third pillar led to a change of legislative instruments in the field of criminal law, transgressing towards the instruments specific to the former first pillar (regulations, directives, decisions).

In particular for protection measures in criminal area, there was adopted Directive 2011/99/EU of the European Parliament and the Council of 13 December 2011 on the European protection order[17] ("the Directive")[18].

Directives are EU juridical instruments of secondary legislation, mandatory, not directly applicable, possessing restricted direct effect[19].

In transposition of the above mentioned Directive, Romanian legislator adopted Law no. 151/2016 on the European protection order, as well as for amending and completing some normative acts[20], applying only to measures adopted in criminal field (Article 1 b).

On the other hand, Law no. 217/2003 on the prevention and combating of domestic violence[21] deals protection measures in civil area, as already established by Romanian Constitutional Court in decision no. 264/27.04.2017[22].

As elements of comparative domestic law, it is interesting to note that, in Spanish legislation, there are legiferated "restriction orders" which belong to the sphere of criminal law[23]; in Bulgaria, for example, the legislator has incorporated the implementing rules of the Directive into the law on family violence[24].

At international level, the most significant instrument is the Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence[25] (known as "Istanbul Convention"), necessary given the shortcomings of the regulations (T. Ștefan, B. Andreșan-Grigoriu, Drept comunitar, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007, p. 213).

[14] A. Ghideanu (authors A. Ghideanu & others), op. cit., p. 76: "A framework decision was a kind of legislative act of the European Union used exclusively within the EU's competences in police and judicial co-operation in criminal justice matters".

(54) When national courts apply domestic law they are therefore bound to interpret it, so far as possible, in the light of the wording and the purpose of the framework decision concerned in order to achieve the result sought by it."

[17] Published in the Official Journal L 338, 21 December 2011, pp. 2 – 18. According to Recitals 40 - 42 of the Directive, United Kingdom has notified the wish to take part in the adoption and application of the Directive; Denmark and Ireland are not taking part in the adoption of the Directive and are not bound by it or subject to its application.

[18] The rationale temporis in adopting two distinct EU legal instruments was explained as follows (A. Sievälä, op. cit., p. 30): "The Directive on the European protection order, which was accepted in December 2011, created a mechanism for mutual recognition of protection measures in criminal matters. However (…) this was not enough. (…) Since the Directive only enabled mutual recognition of protection measures which have been adopted based on a crime or the possibility of a crime, those systems which give the possibility to issue a protection measure protecting from other than criminal acts were left outside of the scope. (…) The Regulation on mutual recognition of protection measures in civil matters filled this gap, at least a part of it. The Regulation was adopted 18 months later than the Directive, in June 2013."

which has been ratified by European Union[26], but not all Member States[27].

The Istanbul Convention deals only with violence against women and domestic violence and recommends that: "Parties shall take the necessary legislative or other measures to ensure that appropriate restraining or protection orders are available to victims of all forms of violence covered by the scope of this Convention"[28]. (our underline)

It is important to note that (similar to EU legislation) the Convention does not impose a certain legal nature of the measures adopted at national level by means of restriction/protection orders (civil, criminal, etc.) establishing only that the orders should be available irrespective of, or in addition to other legal proceedings[29].

2.3. Relation between EU legal instruments on mutual recognition of protection measures and national law of Member States

2.3.1. Direct/non-direct application

Direct applicability means that EU law does not require transposition measures adopted internally by Member States.

As laid down in Article 288 Para 2 of TFEU: "A regulation shall have general application. It shall be binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all Member States". (our underline)

Direct applicability of regulations has been unanimously accepted in juridical literature[30] and case-law of the Court of Justice in Luxemburg from the very beginning[31].

By contrast, in accordance to Article 288 alin. Para 3 of TFEU: "A directive shall be binding, as to the result to be achieved, upon each Member State to which it is addressed, but shall leave to the national authorities the choice of form and methods". (our underline)

In consequence, directives are not direct applicable and need adoption of national transposition measures („a procedure similar to adoption of Government decisions in order to ensure application of laws and ordinances"[32]).

It should be highlighted in this context that the role of regulations and directives is different, as regulations are designed to ensure uniformity by their direct application, whereas directives aim to harmonize domestic legislations (indicating the directory lines and the result to be achieved, but at the same time leaving states a discretion regarding the implementing measures to be adopted[33]).

Criminal area has always been a delicate matter for each Member State, and therefore the option of the EU legislator to adopt a directive in this field is justified[34].

On the other hand, a clear reason for adoption of a directive (instead of a regulation) can be found in Article 82 Para 2 of the TFEU, according to which mutual recognition of judgements and judicial decisions in the area of judicial cooperation in criminal matters are to be dealt with by means of directives.

By contrast to criminal area and according to Recital 4 of the Regulation applicable in civil matters: "In order to attain the objective of free movement of protection measures, it is necessary and appropriate that the rules governing the recognition and, where applicable, enforcement of protection measures be governed by a legal instrument of the Union which is binding and directly applicable". (our underline)

2.3.2. Direct/non-direct effect

Direct effect has been defined as the attribute of EU law to create rights in the patrimony of natural and legal persons, which they can invoke directly before national courts, against other natural or legal persons or public authorities and the state.

Unlike direct applicability, direct effect of regulations can not be deduced from Article 288 TFEU, and was tehrefore consacrated by the case law of the Luxembourg Court of Justice[35].

The same case-law established that regulations have complete direct effect (both vertical and horizontal), conclusion to which juridical literature fully agreed[36].

Foundation of direct effect of directives is also exclusively jurisprudential, based on the idea of state fault for non-transposition or wrong transposition[37].

As a consequence, directives cannot have but vertical ascendent direct effect (only particulars can invoke directives against Member States)[38].

2.3.3. EU case-law

The study of EU case-law in civil matters has not led to identification of requests for preliminary rulings on interpretation or validity of the Regulation[39], based on Article 267 of the TFEU[40].

In criminal matters, there has been identified a single request, denied by the Luxemburg Court for reasons of clear lack of competence[41].

In this context, we consider important to point out that the preliminary ruling procedure has been qualified as an instrument of cooperation between national courts and the Court in Luxemburg[42], which might have been useful in case of EU legal instruments regulating recognition of protection measures, for reasons to be presented further on.

2.4. Sphere of application - delimitation between civil and criminal matters

Decision to legiferate civil and criminal matters concerning protection measures in two different EU binding legal instrument, doubled by the multitude of national laws providing protection measures either in civil or criminal area, will create difficulties for national courts in deciding to apply the Regulation or the Directive.

Undertaking a comparative approach between the Regulation and the Directive, we consider that delimitation between "civil" and "criminal" matters is not clear enough.

Juridical literature[43] supports our opinion, proposing, e.g., that delimitation might depend on the degree of danger in the conduct that led to adoption of the measure establishing the protection order.

According to both the Regulation and the Directive, the civil, administrative or criminal nature of the authority ordering a protection measure should not be determinative for the purpose of assessing the civil/criminal character of a protection measure[44].

In addition, the Regulation stipulates that: "The notion of civil matters should be interpreted autonomously, in accordance with the principles of Union law"[45].

As there have not yet been preliminary rulings on interpretation of the Regulation or the Directive concerning protection measures, we consider appropriate to shortly present the EU case-law dealing with the concept of autonomy of the notion "civil and commercial matters" in case of other regulations, covering different matters in civil area.

Establishing the sphere of application of the concept of "civil and commercial matters" in a case concerning application of Regulation no. 2201/2003[46], the Court explained[47] that it "must be regarded as an independent concept to be interpreted by referring, first, to the objectives and scheme of the Brussels

In a more recent ruling related to Regulation no. 44/2001[48], the Luxemburg Court stated[49]: "It follows from settled case-law of the Court that that scope is defined essentially by the elements which characterise the nature of the legal relationships between the parties to the dispute or the subject-matter thereof (see, in particular, Case C-406/09 Realchemie Nederland [2011] ECR I-9773, paragraph 39, and Sapir and Others, paragraph 32)".

Stressing once again the importance of theleological interpretation, the Court underlined the necessity to take into consideration the scope of the EU (and not domestic) legal instruments, doubled by general principles which stem from the corpus of the national legal systems and a concrete analyse of elements which characterise the nature of the legal relationships between the parties or the subject-matter.

Applying these directory lines in order to establish the delimitation between civil and criminal matters in protection measures, it can easily be seen that the first criteria is not relevant, as the objectives of the Regulation, respectively the Directive are formulated in almost identical terms[50].

On the other hand, applying the second criteria which refers to national legal systems and concrete elements of the case, leads to a delimitation according to domestic law.

In practice[51] there have already appeared cases where the character of the protection measure was determined according to national law of the Member State of origin/issuing Member State, and this orientation of case-law seems to find support in juridical literature[52].

Indeed, it seems sensible to draw the line between the Regulation and the Directive by following a simple reasoning: if the protection measure was adopted to protect a person from an act which is criminalised in the issuing Member State, the Directive should apply; all the other situations should fall under the application of the Regulation.

Moreover, this line of reasoning avoids eventual situations when protection measures adopted in Member States should not fall under the application either of the Regulation, or the Directive (e.g., administrative character of the measure under national law).

Nevertheless, it should not be forgotten that in the beginning the Court made reference to EU law when determining the scope (and therefore sphere of application) of EU legal instruments, wchich is also reasonable in order to ensure uniformity.

References for preliminary rulings should be very useful in this context, also taking into consideration that the speedines of recognition procedure is esential in the area of protection measures (or, the first and very important element which defines functional civil or criminal competence of the national court seized with the exequatur procedure is the legal instrument to be applied: the Regulation or the Directive).

2.5. Exequatur procedure

2.5.1. Decisions subject to mutual recognition (court decisions/extrajudicial decisions)

As a general rule, Article 81 Para 1 of TFEU stipulates that "the Union shall develop judicial cooperation in civil matters having cross-border implications, based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and of decisions in extrajudicial cases". (our underline)

According to Article 3 Para 1 of the Regulation, "protection measure" means "any decision, whatever it may be called, ordered by the issuing authority of the Member State of origin (…)". (our underline)

In addition, Recital 13 of the Regulation provides that: "In order to take account of the various types of authorities which order protection measures in civil matters in the Member States (…) this Regulation should apply to decisions of both judicial authorities and administrative authorities provided that the latter offer guarantees with regard, in particular, to their impartiality and to the right of the parties to judicial review. In no event should police authorities be considered as issuing authorities within the meaning of this Regulation". (our underline)

Corroborating the provisions aforementioned, it results that the principle of mutual recognition of [48] Council Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters, published in the Official Journal L 12, 16 January 2001, pp. 1 - 23.

[49] ECJ, Decision adopted on 12.09.2013, C-49/12, case Sunico and others.

[50] The Regulation provides in Recital 6 that it "should apply to protection measures ordered with a view to protecting a person where there exist serious grounds for considering that that person's life, physical or psychological integrity, personal liberty, security or sexual integrity is at risk, for example so as to prevent any form of gender-based violence or violence in close relationships such as physical violence, harassment, sexual aggression, stalking, intimidation or other forms of indirect coercion".

Similarly, the Directive applies to protection measures which aim specifically to protect a person against a criminal act of another person which may, in any way, endanger that person's life or physical, psychological and sexual integrity (recital 9 of the Directive).

[51] Prahova Tribunal, case no. 41/105/2019, criminal sentence no. 16 pronounced on 18.01.2019, not published; Prahova Tribunal, case no. 7579/105/2017, criminal sentence no. 546 pronounced on 14.11.2017, not published.

[52] A. Sievälä, op. cit., p. 21: "The limitation to decisions in criminal matters means that the Directive applies only to protection measures which have been given to protect a person against crimes. Therefore, if actions such as stalking are not criminalised in the criminal law of the Member State, the Directive does not apply." (our underline) protection measures in civil matters covers both judicial, and extrajudicial decisions.

The situation is different in criminal matters, starting from the very legal basis for cooperation in this area.

Article 82 Para 1 of TFEU stipulates that "Judicial cooperation in criminal matters in the Union shall be based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions". (our underline)

Subsequently, the Directive provides no exception from this rule.

It is therefore clear that only judicial decisions can make the object of recognition in criminal area.

2.5.2. Mandatory (or not) character of the exequatur procedure

According to Article 4 Para 1 of the Regulation: "A protection measure ordered in a Member State shall be recognised in the other Member States without any special procedure being required and shall be enforceable without a declaration of enforceability being required".

Subsequently, Para 2 of the same Article enumerates the acts necessary to be presented when a protected person wishes to invoke in the Member State addressed a protection measure ordered in the Member State of origin.

Based on the provisions mentioned above, juridical literature[53] expressed opinion that the exequatur procedure is necessary under the Regulation.

In our opinion, the exequatur procedure is not necessary, as it results from a logical interpretation of Article 4 Para 1 of the Regulation, which stipulates that recognition is granted "without any special procedure being required".

In addition, theleological interpretation of Recital 4 of the Regulation leads to the same conclusion: "Mutual trust in the administration of justice in the Union and the aim of ensuring quicker and less costly circulation of protection measures within the Union justify the principle according to which protection measures ordered in one Member State are recognised in all other Member States without any special procedure being required ". (our underline).

Nevertheless, if a person asks for recognition of a judgement, this application should be analized (and not rejected de plano, related to arguments presented above) according to rules provided in Articles 4 – 14 of the Regulation (this was the solution adopted by national case-law in case of other regulations)[54].

On the contrary, in criminal matters the exequatur procedure is mandatory, acording to Article 9 Para 1 of the Directive: "Upon receipt of a European protection order transmitted in accordance with Article 8, the competent authority of the executing State shall, without undue delay, recognise that order (…)." (our underline)

2.5.3. Changing the character of the protection measure through the exequatur procedure

When Member States recognise protection measures adopted in other Member States, the procedure always reffers to protection measures granted on different grounds by different domestic authorities.

As national protection measure systems are very different, a natural question raises: the character of the protection measure as it derives from the national legislation under which it was approved can be changed by the process of recognition (e.g., a measure belonging to the criminal area in the issuing Member State can be recognized in the form of a civil measure in the addressed Member State)?

As clearly stated in Recitals 14 and 20 of the Regulation, the type and civil nature of the protection measure may not be affected by adjustment of factual elements[55].

In the same line of reasoning, Article 10 Para 1 (c) of the Directive states that the competent authority of the executing State may refuse to recognise the European protection order if it relates to an act that does not constitute a criminal offence under the law of the executing State (the principle of double criminality as a ground for non-recognition).

By corroborating the provisions aforementioned in a literal interpretation, we conclude that the legal nature of the protection measure (civil or criminal) cannot be changed by process of recognition[56].

Systematic and theleological interpretation lead to the same conclusion, as both EU and national legal instruments legiferate separately civil and criminal protection measures.

2.5.4. Differencies concerning the exequatur procedure in civil and criminal matters

The framework construed by the Regulation and the Directive related to recognition in one Member State of protection measures adopted in another Member State is similar.

In both cases, the EU legislator starts from the same premises (existence of a protection measure adopted in one Member State) and afterwards figures a mechanism of recognition implying two states (the

[54] Similar provisions in Regulations nos 44/2001 and 2201/2003 resulted in Romanian case-law in occasional denial of the exequatur procedure, justified on lack of interest for the applicant, as recognition operates de jure. Nevertheless, the case-law generally admitted the possibility to follow the exequatur procedure in consideration of practical difficulties encountered by applicants with different national authorities when having requested recognition de jure, without presenting an exequatur judgement.

[55] "Based on the principle of mutual recognition, protection measures ordered in civil matters in the Member State of origin should be recognised in the Member State addressed as protection measures in civil matters in accordance with this Regulation" (Recital 14 of the Regulation); "(...) the type and civil nature of the protection measure may not be affected by such adjustment" (Recital 20 of the Regulation).

[56] A. Sievälä, op. cit., p. 54: "(…) the form in which a protection measure is transferred from one Member State to another is defined by the nature of the matter in that State (…)".

Member State where measure was adopted and the Member State where it is to be recognised)[57].

Also, both the Directive and the Regulation emphasise as a general rule that this procedure does not require the Member States to change their national systems for ordering protection measures.

In general, it is accepted that the framework in civil and criminal matters is similar "since all the different types of protection measures found within the area of the Union are a part of the same entirety and since the idea has been to adopt a coherent system of mutual recognition of protection measures. By creating two fundamentally different systems depending on the nature the protection measure has in the national system the Union would have created a more complicated system which would have put the citizens and the Member States of the Union in different positions"[58].

Apart from the same general framework, there are nevertheless important differencies in substance and procedure, the most significant of which shall be presented below.

Substancial differencies

The first and most important different element between civil and criminal areas related to recognition of protection measures is adjustment of factual elements in recognition of civil measures, respectively approximation of laws in criminal measures.

According to Article 11 and Recital 20 of the Regulation, the addressed Member State has the right to adjust the factual elements of the protection measure where such adjustment is necessary in order for the recognition of the protection measure to be effective in practical terms.

As provided by Recital 20 of the Regulation, factual actual elements include the address, the general location or the minimum distance the person causing the risk must keep from the protected person, the address or the general location.

Therefore, the adjustment is to be done according to the national law of the addressed Member State, but limited to the elements provided by the Regulation.

As for procedural aspects, Article 11 pts 2 and 5 of the Regulation states that the procedure for the adjustment of the protection measure shall be governed by the law of the Member State addressed, exempt for the suspensive effect of the appeal, if stated by domestic law.

The protected person, as well as the person causing danger must be informed about these adjustments, and they have the right to appeal against them.

On the other hand, according to Recital 20 of the Directive: "Since, in the Member States, different kinds of authorities (civil, criminal or administrative) are competent to adopt and enforce protection measures, it is appropriate to provide a high degree of flexibility in the cooperation mechanism between the Member States under this Directive. Therefore, the competent authority in the executing State is not required in all cases to take the same protection measure as those which were adopted in the issuing State, and has a degree of discretion to adopt any measure which it deems adequate and appropriate under its national law in a similar case in order to provide continued protection". (our underline)

Nevertheless, as pointed out before, this cannot lead to a change of the civil/criminal original character of the protection measure, but only to adoption of the closest measure belonging to the same sphere.

Secondly, there are significant differencies related to grounds for non-recognition under Regulation, respectively the Directive, which can result in different degrees of effectiveness of these EU legal instruments.

The Regulation (Article 13) allows refusal of recognition only in two cases: if the recognition was "manifestly contrary to public policy in the Member State addressed" or "irreconcilable with a judgment given or recognised in the Member State addressed".

The grounds for non-recognition under the Directive are much broader (Article 10 Para 1 provides nine grounds, the majority of them related to the national law of the executing State, thus reducing a protected person's possibility to get protection in some Member States).

Also, there are questions related to respect of principle of equality, deriving from a situation when a person who has been granted protection in one Member State exercises the right of free movement and continuation of the protection in the other Member State depends on national legislation of the latter.

According to the principle of procedural autonomy of Member States, procedural aspects fall within the margins of appreciation of national legislators.

As a consequence, an exequatur procedure for recognition in Romania of juridical effects of protection measures adopted in civil matters in another Member State is to be solved by pronouncing a judgement, according to rules indicated in Articles 1093 – 1101 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code[59].

Applying the same principle in criminal area, an exequatur procedure is to be solved by pronouncing a judgement, according the rules indicated in Article 13 of national Law. no. 151/2016 on the European protection order, as well as for amending and completing some normative acts.

[57] As stated in the Regulation, the "Member State of origin" means the Member State in which the protection measure is ordered, and "Member State addressed" means the Member State in which the recognition is sought (Article 3 Paras 5 and 6 of the Regulation). According to the Directive, the "issuing state" is the Member State which has adopted the protection measure, and the "executing state", is the Member State to which a European protection order has been forwarded for recognition (Article 2 Paras 5 and 6 of the Directive).

By contrast to the Regulation[60], the Directive also establishes in Article 7 and Annex I a special form for issuing a European protection order, clearly identifying the information to be filled-in (this standard form has also been indicated as Annex 1 to Law. no. 151/2016).

We consider that, for reasons of uniformity and speediness, a similar standardized form should be conceived as an Annex to the Regulation.

3. Conclusions

There is a significant amount of variation in national legislations of Member States related to protection measure systems. The level of protection measures (civil or criminal), and also the criteria under which protection may be granted vary from one Member State to another.

At EU level, there is a legitimate right for citizens of European Union to move and reside freely within the territory of all Member States.

In this context, the aim of the EU legislator was to ensure continuous protection of victims within the common area of justice, freedom and security, and at the same time to make sure that persons in need of protection may exercise their right to free movement without losing the protection[61].

In order to reach this goal, it construed a mechanism based on mutual recognition of protection measures adopted in one Member State in all other Member States[62], by adopting a Regulation for civil matters and a Directive for criminal matters.

The principle of mutual recognition is based on mutual trust and direct judicial cooperation among national courts. It follows as a general direction that Member States are to recognise the validity of decisions pronounced in other Member States and give them the same juridical value and effects as if they were national decisions.

Apart from the general framework, important aspects are still in question, and there are also significant elements specific to each EU legal instrument, either in substance or procedure.

It is of great importance that a clear limit concerning the sphere of application of the Regulation, respectively the Directive is not established in the corpus of these legal instruments (functional competence of domestic courts seized with exequatur of protection measures and application of either the Regulation or the Directive depend on this).

As a consequence, juridical literature and the case-law argued that the legal nature of a protection measure is to be appreciated in accordance to national laws, and this legal nature cannot be changed through the exequatur procedure.

There are also specific elements attached to the substance of each EU instrument, some of them deriving from their different juridical nature (Regulation, respectively Directive).

The first and most important different element relates to adjustment of factual elements in civil measures (restrictively indicated by the Regulation), respectively approximation of laws in criminal measures (on which Member States have a margin of appreciation). As stated, regulations have the function of ensuring uniformity (allow less at the appreciation of Member States), and Diretives are used to harmonise (there is always a margin of appreciation for Member States).

Secondly, the grounds for non-recognition under the Directive applicable in criminal matters are much broader than those allowed by the Regulation for civil cases. Since the possibility to refuse recognition in criminal area is significantly broader, the effectiveness of the Directive in ensuring the cross-border protection may be smaller than the effectiveness of the Regulation.

Also, the possibility to refuse recognition on grounds related to national law which has been left to Member States in criminal matters (e.g., refusal to recognize measures based on acts which are not crimes according to the legislation of the executing State) clearly has implications on effectiveness.

If grounds for non-recognition provided by the Directive would have been reduced to those stipulated by the Regulation, the practical impact of the whole mechanism of mutual recognition of protection measures would have been stronger.

There are also formal/procedural differencies, which might affect uniformity and speediness in cross-border recognition of protection measures.

To this respect, a similar standardized form as the one indicated in Article 7 and Annex I to the Directive should be conceived as an Annex to the Regulation.

Standard forms unify the process of issuing and recognising protection measures in Member States and and smooth mutual recognition of protection measures within the European Union.

[60] The Regulation does not include a ready-made form to be filled in in case of protection measures in civil area (according to Article 19 of the Regultion, this kind of a form will be established by the Commission). At present, Article 5 of the Regulation reffers only to a certificate, indicated by Article 2 as one of the documents necessary to be provided when a protected person wishes to invoke in the Member State addressed a protection measure ordered in the Member State of origin.

[61] Thus, a person in need of protection will not have to apply for a new protection measure in the new Member State of residence when exercising the right to free movement.

[62] A. Sievälä, op. cit., p. 38: "The Directive on the European protection order and the Regulation on mutual recognition of protection measures in civil matters extend the principle of mutual recognition to cover protection measures. The ground for this is the same as it has been with the principle of mutual recognition all along, both in the case law and the legislation of the Union: to ensure the functioning of the free market. In addition to this, the special nature of the position of crime victims and other persons in need of protection has also been used in reasoning the creation of the new mechanism for mutual recognition of protection measures. This fits well with the growing importance of fundamental rights in the EU".

At national level, harmonising the criteria for adopting a protection measure within domestic legislations of Member States would help[63].

Finally, the whole mechanism on mutual recognition of protection measures is rather new and not sufficiently applied in practice, and therefore professional training of magistrates in this area should be useful[64].

ADMINISTRATIVE AND PATRIMONIAL LIABILITY OF MILITARY CIVIL SERVANTS

Adelin-Mihai ZĂGĂRIN[*]

Abstract

In exercising the functional attributions, military civil servants are liable for the damages caused by the actions taken, according to the law. The patrimonial liability engages in the determination of the guilt and the causal links between the actual act and the effects produced. This type of administrative accountability has in the center the material liability of the military and normative acts in which we find both the means of establishing the guilty and the way of recovering the damages in conjunction with the remedies.

Keywords: administrative responsibility, patrimonial responsibility, military civil servant, liability, administrative guilt, damages, remedies

1. Introduction

This Article aims to analyze the concept of administrative and patrimonial liability of military personnel in the case of state's responsibility for the damage caused by administrative acts.

Given that the military civil servants compared to civil servants are part of the whole, we consider it appropriate to analyze their administrative and patrimonial liability, especially regarding their material liability for damage resulting from the management of financial resources or with pecuniary character. We treat this subject as a distinct situation which, although approached by the doctrine of labor law, falls to accompany the administrative and patrimonial liability of military personnel not only for reasons of disciplinary unity but also for the coherence of the analysis of the institutions under discussion.

A particular case where the military personnel bears the administrative and material liability is the case when they are held accountable for deeds related to the damage resulting from the formation, administration and management of the financial and material resources, caused by the fault of the military personnel and in connection with the fulfillment of the military service or of the job duties.

Material liability of military personnel towards the public institution intervenes both for the actual damage and for the unfulfilled benefit, a legal notion similar to the material liability in the labor law, but with which it is not confused, since the recovery of the damage is carried in accordance with a special procedure provided by Ordinance no. 121 of 1998 on material liability of military personnel.

2. Military civil servants – special status civil servants

The hypothesis from which we start our approach is based on the fact that the military personnel are civil servants, according to all the rigors of the legal rules, which makes them bear the administrative and patrimonial liability as other civil servants, accepting the discipline and conduct rules specific to them.

According to the provisions of Article 16 paragraph (3) of the Constitution of Romania stipulating that public positions and dignities may be civil or military, the statute of military personnel does not fall under the provisions of the Labor Code.

We support the idea of the late Professor Antonie Iorgovan, according to which the military personnel are a category of civil servants with a special statute that are distinguished from the civil servants mainly by the valences related[1] to the discipline that guides their professional conduct. According to Article 2 of Order no. M64 of June 10th, 2013 approving the Military Discipline Regulation, published in the Official Gazette No. 399bis of July 3rd, 2013, the military discipline represents the strict compliance of legal provisions, of the rules of order and conduct mandatory for the maintenance of the functional status, the fulfillment of the specific missions and the smooth running of the activities by all categories of military personnel, being considered as one of the determining factors of the operational capacity. For military discipline there is a need of conscious acceptance of the rules of conduct and of a reward and sanction system, expressly regulated.

As a proposal of lex ferenda, to eliminate the errors of interpretation, we consider it necessary the appointment of the military personnel in Article 5 paragraph (1) of the Law no. 188/199 on the Statute of Civil Servants, among those public services benefiting from special statutes. In situations that do not concern military discipline and the rigors specific to this category of civil servants, the above mentioned Statute is the common law applicable to them. The statute of military civil servants, namely Law 80 of July 11th, 1995 contains provisions applicable to them, regardless of the central public authority or the autonomous authority where they work[2]: the Ministry of National Defence, the Ministry of Internal Affairs, the Romanian Intelligence Service, the Foreign Intelligence Service, the Special Telecommunications Service, the Protection and Guard Service.

The fact that military personnel are a special category of civil servants is regulated both by the Constitutional Court by Decision no. 34 of February 9th, 2016, section 26[3] and by the High Court of Cassation and Justice by Decision ICCJ-RIL no. 10 of April 16th, 2018, section 49[4].

In order to delimit the military personnel among civil servants and to eliminate mistakes or erroneous interpretations of the presumption that they are in legal employment relationship (under the Law 53/2004 on the Labor Code[5]), in our approach we started from using the notion of "military civil servants". Let us not forget that in addition to the fact that military civil servants are serving the nation[6], compared with other civil servants they are obliged by oath[7] to live for the nation in whose service they operate.

This hypothesis is based on both the constitutional provisions[8] of Article 16 and their role in society, keeping in mind that "the military personnel have to observe the most important social values, if not the essential ones for the existence and proper functioning of a society, in the current political context of Euro-Atlantic country, being engaged in a compendium of activities, including:

- Collective defence as the main common goal of Romania and the North Atlantic Organization (N.A.T.O.)[9].
- European security and defence, according to the Common Security and Defence Policy of the European Union[10];
- National security and defence of Romania and its interests in the field of internal and external information[11];
- The defence of public order, of citizens' fundamental rights and freedoms, of public and private property[12];
- Fire prevention and extinction[13];
- The protection of Romanian and foreign dignitaries working in Romania[14].

Military civil servants vested with the exercise of public authority are found both within the central administrative authorities and within the autonomous administrative authorities, such as: the Ministry of National Defence (MapN), the Ministry of Internal Affairs - (MAI), the Romanian Intelligence Service (S.R.I.), the Foreign Intelligence Service (SIE), the Special Telecommunications Service (STS), the Protection and Guard Service (S.P.P.), having among the general duties: ensuring the defence needs of

[2] According to Article 3 of Law 80 of 1995 on the Statute of military personnel, they can be in the following situation: without military position but they meet the conditions provided by the law for military service in reserve and if necessary, as military men in activity; in retirement, when, according to the law, they can no longer be called for military service.

[3] Section 26. Further, analyzing for the same purpose other legal texts, the Court finds that, according to Article 85 paragraphs (1) and (2) of Law no. 188/1999 on the Statute of Civil Servants, which represents the general framework for civil servants (the military personnel being a special category of civil servants): "(1) The repairing of the damage to the public authority or institution in the situations referred to in Article 84 a) and b) is ordered by issuing a decision or a imputation order by the head of the public authority or institution, within 30 days of the finding of the damage or, as the case may be, by undertaking a payment commitment, and in the situation stipulated in section (c) of the same article, on the basis of the final and irrevocable judgment. (2) The civil servant concerned may file an appeal against the decision or the imputation order before the administrative court". It follows from the combined interpretation of the abovementioned legal provisions that the imputation order is an administrative act, since the litigant can address the administrative court against the contested act.

[4] 49. Since neither Law no. 80/1995 nor other normative acts do not specify the court with jurisdiction in work conflicts of military personnel, the cases are constantly solved by the administrative courts. At the present stage of the legislation, the solution was judged to be judicious because, according to the Constitution of Romania (Article 16 paragraph (3)) both public positions and public dignities are, as appropriate, civil and military. So, in essence, the military personnel (whose statute is governed by Law 80/1995) are all civil servants. Thus, it is natural that, having regard to Article 1 of the Law no. 188/1999, jurisdiction should belong to administrative courts, according to Article 109 of the same law. It has been concluded that the military personnel (in service) are a variety of the civil servants, a variety which has imposed on them the adoption of a special statute (Law 80/1995), a statute which, where appropriate, complements the statute of civil servants (Law 188/1999), general regulation in the matter [Article 1 paragraph (1) of the aforementioned law].

Romania, preventing and counteracting actions that constitute, according to the law, threats to the national security; preventing and fighting terrorism; management of the special telecommunication domain for the public authorities in Romania; the defence of public order, the defence of life, bodily integrity and freedom of the person, public and private property, the legitimate interests of the citizens, the community and the state; ensuring the protection of Romanian and foreign dignitaries and of their families during their stay in Romania, etc.

Particular attention and increasing interest are observed on the responsibility of the military resulting from the inherent risks of a social organization. The focus is particularly on ensuring that the risks inherent imposed by the general interest are not manifested, among those risks we mention those arising from exceptional situations in terms of devastating effects on society in general and on the individual in particular (damage to persons who fall victim to acts of terrorism, war, warfare, insurgency, riots; compensation for persons who have fallen victim to crimes whose author is unknown; victims of natural disasters or air, naval, terrestrial traffic accidents, etc.).

We could add numerous situations of devastating effects resulting from military actions and operations:

- public exhibitions of military equipment of military forces;
- handling dangerous weapons from a constructive and operational point of view for both handlers and third parties;
- the movement of the technique in the area of responsibility, during tactical maneuvers or during logistic support;
- accidents resulting from military training;
- explosives resulting from work with explosives during various pyrotechnical drills;
- defusing suspicious packages on public space;
- performing bomb squad works in the interest of various communities, etc.
- performing secret missions, etc.

3. Definition, features and principles of administrative and patrimonial liability

The Constitution of Romania of 1991, revised and republished in 2003 has various articles subject to a right of compensation for the damages caused by the public authorities by administrative acts, by their delay in handling the citizen's petition or by remaining silent with regards to the latter.

Analyzing the constitutional provisions, we found various articles describing such a fundamental right: Article 44 The right of private property, Article 52 The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, Article 73 Classes of laws. From their analysis and interpretation, it turns out that we have one of the following actions[15]:

1. An action brought exclusively against public authorities;
2. An action brought exclusively against the actual civil servant;
3. An action brought exclusively against both the public authority and the civil servant.

These actions are regulated by Law no. 554 of December 2nd, 2004 on administrative litigations, with subsequent amendments and completions, where in Article 52 paragraph 1, by way of an extinctive interpretation, the expression administrative acts includes also the administrative contracts drawn up by virtue of its public law legal capacity (procurement contracts[16], service contracts, etc.).

The administration's responsibility is recognized as manifesting itself under three forms: responsibility for fault, responsibility for risk and responsibility for job error[17].

Among the definitions of the administrative and patrimonial liability, we remember the opinion of professor Anton Trăilescu, according to which: "administrative and patrimonial liability is that form of legal liability consisting in requiring the state or, as the case may be, territorial and administrative divisions to compensate for the damage caused to individuals by an unlawful administrative act or by the unjustified refusal of the public administration to solve a petition for a right recognized by the law or for another legitimate interest"[18].

The constitutional principles upon which is based the liability of public authorities and their civil servants (of state) for the damage caused, are listed in a research paper, as follows[19]:

a) Patrimonial liability belonging exclusively to the state as a result of the damage caused by judicial errors (with the possibility of seeking legal remedy or redress against the civil servants who have exercised their office in bad faith or with serious negligence).

The constitutional base of this principle is described in Article 52 paragraph 3 of the Constitution, developed by Article 96 of Law 303/2004 on the Statute of Judges and Prosecutors, stipulating in paragraph 2 "the joint liability of the state and judges and prosecutors for the exercise of their office in bad faith or with serious negligence.

A particular situation is that of the military prosecutors and judges working in the military courts, with jurisdiction in criminal cases involving military civil servants, having extended material jurisdiction since the introduction of the New Criminal Procedure Code compared to the old regulation that was strictly limited to job offenses committed by them. Although there have been many discussions about the necessity of military courts, we continue to support them, as a result of the rigor and discipline specific to any form of military organization, conduct and deontology that must be observed throughout the military trial based on the presumption of innocence. It might be said that these courts have a dual coordination: from the administrative point of view, they are managed by the Ministry of National Defence through the Military Courts Division, and from the point of view of the separation of powers, they are part of the judiciary.

b) Patrimonial liability of public authorities as a result of the damage caused both by administrative acts causing damage and as a result of not solving within the legal term a petition made under the law (there is the possibility that the civil servant guilty of violating the law be brought in the proceedings);

The administrative act was defined in a research paper of the interwar period as a manifestation of will by a competent administrative body, creating a general or individual legal situation governed by the rules of public law, in which we find the idea of domination and command[20].

Current definitions describing with precision and concision the contents of the administrative act are given by the famous professor Antonie Iorgovan and by the distinguished lady Ph.D. professor Verginia Verdinaș, a disciple of the late "spiritual father of the Constitution", retelling the last author: the administrative act is the main legal form of the public administration activity consisting of an express and unilateral manifestation of will subject to a public power regime and of the legality control of courts, issued by the administrative authorities or private persons authorized by them, under which collateral[21] obligations and rights arise, are amended or are paid off.

Administrative acts causing damage are those administrative acts issued that affect a person's patrimonial or non-patrimonial interests (including moral damages that hurt the honor, prestige and reputation of a person). Consequently, we are in a situation in which a person has suffered a material or moral loss caused by the issuance of the administrative act in question, which implies the accountability of the state, respectively of the guilty public authorities and civil servants.

Also, the administrative and patrimonial liability is involved both for failure to answer a petition within the time limits and for the failure of the administration to answer or to respond. The statement is supported by Article 51 of the Constitution regarding the citizen's right of petition and by the provisions of Government Ordinance no. 27/2002 on the regulation of the activity of solving petitions.

c) Joint patrimonial liability of public authorities and civil servants for damage caused to the public domain as a result of a faulty functioning of public services.

The public domain, that community of goods forming the object of public property – domain assets, is given by its owner and the different legal regime, these features being the object of property ownership. The manner of procuring public property rights is regulated by Article 863 of the new Civil Code, which lists the possible forms[22], as follows: expropriation on grounds of public utility, donation or legacy, onerous convention, the transfer of an asset from the private domain to the public domain, other manner provided by the law.

The damage caused to the public domain entails the administrative and patrimonial liability of the state if a person's legitimate right or interest is damaged, ensuring fair compensation within the limits set by the law.

We consider that the faulty functioning or the poor functioning as it is termed in a pejorative manner or the unsatisfactory functioning of public services can be assessed objectively only in the light of the effects of the administration of public affairs and their judgment in terms of efficiency and effectiveness as well as with regards to the satisfaction of the beneficiaries. In other words, we are interested in the perspective of the administration's performance and the relationship of the public administration with those whose public affairs are being administered[23]. The right to good governance is already enshrined as a fundamental right[24], defined in the doctrine as the right of every person to have his or her affairs handled impartially, fairly and within a reasonable time by the Community institutions and bodies[25].

Among the situations of faulty functioning of "military public service" we find: breach of the obligation to motivate the administrative acts issued, both those concerning its own employees and those concerning other individuals, in other words, the lack of motivation of the administrative acts, the lack of transparency in the taking of individual measures by not hearing the person concerned, the failure to grant or allow a person the access to his or her own file taking into account the intervention required by the law regarding the observance of the legitimate interests related to confidentiality, secret of service, state secret, professional and/or trade secret. Failure to observe such conditions by the central public authorities, respectively the autonomous administrative authorities where military civil servants work may entail suspension or annulment of the administrative act by the court[26].

d) Exclusive patrimonial liability of public administration authorities for limits of public service.

Conclusions:

Administrative and patrimonial liability of military personnel is subject to Law no. 554/2004 on administrative litigations, completed by the other rules of administrative law and the civil procedure provisions, where Article 28 provides that the law mentioned is completed with the civil procedure provisions, provided that they are not incompatible with the procedure set by the law, the specificity of the authority relationship between the public authorities, the legitimate rights or interests of the aggrieved parties.

In the administrative law treaty of Professor Antonie Iorgovan in 2005, Vol. II, it is stated that the compensation for damage is conditioned by the annulment or the establishment of the unlawful nature of the administrative act in question, respectively the establishment of the failure to answer a petition within the time limits or the unjustified refusal to answer. Both aspects presented are associated with a violation of a legitimate interest, so the actions for damages and annulment are filed at the same time.

According to the law of administrative litigations, the aggrieved person may file a petition for summons of the military civil servant guilty for failing to answer a petition within the time limits, for unjustified refusal, for issuing an unlawful administrative act. According to Article 16 of the reference law, the latter can make a claim against his hierarchical, if he received a written disposition to issue or not to issue the act in question.

The law of administrative litigations describes the preliminary procedure on Article 7, as a preliminary administrative appeal before filing an action for annulment in conjunction with an action for damage before the administrative court. Further it describes the time limits for filing the preliminary complaint, differentiated according to the administrative act under discussion: for individual administrative acts, the time limit for filing a preliminary complaint is 30 days of the time the aggrieved person became aware of the contents of the act, accepting the exception that, for good reasons, the complaint may be filed within a period of up to six months; for normative administrative acts the complaint can be filed at any time and for administrative contracts the time limit is 6 months. It must be stated that those time limits are limitation periods and, after the preliminary procedure, at the judicial stage, the grounds invoked in the request for annulment of the act are not limited to those invoked in the preliminary complaint lodged with the issuing or hierarchically superior authority.

For military public authorities organized on the principle of hierarchy, the request is lodged with the entity hierarchically superior to that issuing the damaging act, as an example, if the act was issued by the Inspectorate of Gendarmerie within the Ministry of Internal Affairs, the preliminary complaint may be addressed directly to the minister. Note that, according to Article 7 paragraph 5, the preliminary stage is mandatory, except for actions initiated by the prefect, the ombudsman, the Public Ministry, the National Civil Servants Agency related to claims by persons aggrieved by orders or parts thereof, as well as cases against administrative acts that cannot be revoked because they entered the civil circulation and produced legal effects, cases concerning the unlawfulness and cases of unjustified refusal to answer a petition regarding a legitimate right or interest, respectively failure to answer the applicant within the legal time limit.

We consider as lex ferenda the introduction of provisions obliging military public authorities to submit annual reports or to highlight in their annual activity reports the stage of responding petitions, their number, the way of settlement and closing, etc. given the importance of this fundamental right constitutionally enshrined.

THE ACTIVITY OF TRANSPOSING DIRECTIVE 2014/94/EU OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND COUNCIL OF 22 OCTOBER 2014 ON THE DEPLOYMENT OF ALTERNATIVE FUELS INFRASTRUCTURE. THE POST-TRANSPOSING ATTRIBUTIONS OF THE ROMANIAN ENERGY REGULATORY AUTHORITY

Ionela-Alina ZORZOANĂ

Abstract

This article proposes an analysis of the activity of transposing the Directives, an obligation of the Member States of the European Union provided by the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union. The transposing obligation entails that the Member State to which a Directive is addressed has the option to choose the form and means and the important issue is that the obtained result should be the one set up by the concerned Directive. Following up the study, we shall analyze the sanctions that can be implemented by the European Commission in case of failure of transposing or partially transposing a Directive. We further proposed ourselves to analyze the case of Directive no. 2014/94/EU of the European Parliament and Council from 22 October 2014 on the deployment of alternative fuels infrastructure. The analysis shall refer to the scope of issuing the Community deed, but especially to the challenges recorded during the process of transposing Directive 2014/94/EU in Romania and the triggering of the infringement procedure against Romania. The article shall also compare the stage of transposing the Directive in other Member States. Last, but not least, we shall also make an analysis of the attributions of the Romanian Energy Regulatory Authority in domestic law.

1. Introduction

In the first part, this study proposes an overview of "directive" - concept, especially in regard to the obligation of the Member States of the European Union to transpose the Community act. The first part of the study also addresses the sanctions that may be taken against a Member State of the European Union in case of partial transposition or non-transposition of a European directive.

The second part of the study is dedicated to the particular case of the Directive no. 2014/94/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 October 2014 on the deployment of alternative fuels infrastructure through the difficult course of transposing this Community act in Romania. We have chosen this Community act as it is topical, namely the European-wide project to remove petroleum-based fuels and the transit to alternative fuels.

The study analyzes the stages of Directive no. 2014/94/EU from the point of view of the European institutions issuing the Community act.

An essential issue of the study is a comparative analysis of the transposition of the Directive by other Member States of the European Union. Romania and Malta are the last two countries to have fully transposed the Directive, under the threat of sanctions that could be applied by the Court of Justice of the European Union, as the final stage of the infringement procedure.

The study also analyzes the attributions of the Romanian Energy Regulatory Authority following the transposition process of the Directive, in the light of the status of this regulatory authority.

Last but not least, the study aimed to draw attention upon the "restrictions", especially such of financial nature regarding on one hand, the necessary investments to be made in infrastructure following the transposition of the Directive in Romania and, on the other hand, the reluctance of the population to purchase alternative fuel vehicles.

2. Content

2.1. General considerations on the concept of the directive

2.1.1. Directive – binding act for Member States of the European Union

Each action undertaken by the EU is based on treaties - legally binding agreements signed by all EU countries setting out EU objectives, rules of operation of European institutions, decision-making procedures and relations between the European Union and its Member States.

Treaties are the starting point for EU law and are known in the European Union as "primary law".

The legislative corpus deriving from the principles and objectives of the Treaties is known as

* PhD Student, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu University", (e-mail: alinazorzoana@gmail.com);

"secondary legislation". This includes regulations, directives, decisions, recommendations and opinions.

Directives require from Member States to achieve a certain result, without imposing the means by which they can do this. Member States must adopt measures incorporating directives into the national law ("transposition") in order to achieve the objectives set by them. National authorities must notify the European Commission about such measures.

According to Article 288 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU)[1], the Directive is binding on each recipient Member State in regard to the outcome to be achieved, leaving the competence to national authorities concerning the form and means to achieve the result. Thus, it can be said that "the directive imposes results and leaves to the recipients the competence in regard to the form and means to achieve the targeted results, within the established deadlines."[2]

In essence, the directive theoretically requires the intervention of the national authorities to produce legal effects in the domestic law of each recipient Member State. Deriving out of the Community decision-making process, the correctly published or notified directive creates an obligation on the receiving Member State to take the necessary measures for its effective application in the national legal order. The obligation derives directly from the requirement imposed by art. 288 TFEU.

It follows that the "normal" situation corresponds to the adoption by the competent national authorities of an act transposing the Community Directive.

2.1.2. Obligation to transpose directives

The transposition of the Directive is the operation by which the Member State receiving a Community Directive takes the necessary measures to implement such. The state has the choice of "form" (in terms of the legislative or regulatory technique of each state) and "means" (legal institutions likely to achieve the stated objective) and it is essential that such lead to the achievement of the result. The State may adopt laws or regulations, as may be required to repeal or amend internal provisions incompatible with the provisions of the Directive.

For a directive to enter into force at national level, EU countries must adopt a law to transpose such. This national measure must achieve the objectives set by the Directive. National authorities must communicate such measures to the European Commission.

The transposition must occur within the deadline set at the time of adopting the Directive (generally within two years).

2.1.3. Sanctions that can be taken in case of non-transposition/partial transposition of directives

In accordance with art. 17 para. (1) from the Treaty on European Union, the European Commission has the scope to ensure the application of the Treaties by the States that have ratified them, the measures adopted by the institutions for that purpose, and also oversees the application of EU law under the control of the Court of Justice of the European Union.

If the concerned Member State fails to communicate measures fully transposing the provisions of the directives or fails to take action to remove the suspicion that EU legislation has been infringed, the Commission may initiate a formal infringement procedure. The procedure follows a series of stages provided for in the EU Treaties, each of which ends with an official decision[3].

The "infringement" procedure is triggered by the European Commission against states that do not respect their community obligations.

The triggering thereof may be caused in three cases:

a) Omission of notification of national normative acts transposing and implementing directives - Member States have the obligation to notify transposing legislation and implementing legislation;
b) Non-compliance of national legislation with Community/EU requirements - this means that domestic legislation has to be in full compliance with Union requirements;
c) Inappropriate application of Community/EU normative acts - Member States are also required to ensure the application of Community provisions.

This procedure involves several steps: from the notification about the failure to comply with EU directives, the submittal before the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) and until a fine (lump sum or periodic penalty payment) is imposed upon the Member State.

Therefore, we shall briefly outline the stages of the procedure to explain the current situation of Romania (with reference to the specific case subject to analysis, transposition of Directive 2014/94/EU), what exactly the three infringement procedures relate to and, we shall also briefly present the situation which the state may reach, if the non-compliance with directives continues (CJEU notification by the European Commission).

In the first stage of commencing the procedure, the Commission draws up a "letter of formal notice" which it sends to the concerned State and in which are itemized the infringements of Community law. The letter means the formal opening of the infringement procedure.

The second step is the possibility for the Member State to defend itself. This stage is called "Member State Observations" and aims to protect the interests of that State. However, the State cannot rely on any current provision, practice or circumstance in domestic

[1] Ex-Article 249 (3) of the Treaty establishing the European Community (the Directive is binding on each Member State of destination with regard to the outcome to be achieved, leaving the national authorities competent in form and means).

[3] https://ec.europa.eu/info/law/law-making-process/applying-eu-law/infringement-procedure_ro; law to justify the failure to comply with the Community law.

The next step is the "Reasoned Opinion", i.e. the last warning by the Commission prior to the referral to the CJEU, a warning issued in the absence of the observations of Member State or if they are considered unsatisfactory.

The "Member State reply" followed therefore to the reasoned opinion, meaning the measures taken by the State to comply with the Commission's opinion. The deadline for compliance is set by the latter, and if the State does not make the necessary changes, the Commission shall refer the case to the CJEU in order to start the contentious procedure.

If the Court resolves the case in favour of the Commission[4], the state is bound to align the domestic national law to the European one. If State still fails to comply thereafter, then the Court is required to pay a lump sum or periodic penalty payment until the obligations laid down in the first judgment have been complied with. Penalties are proposed by the European Commission, but the decision on their amount pertains to the CJEU. It follows that, in the specific case of Member States which have not implemented the directives within the period agreed by the Council of the European Union and the European Parliament, the Commission may ask the Court to penalize the Member State in financial view, when it first adopts the decision.

This possibility, introduced by the Treaty of Lisbon, is provided in Article 260 (3) TFEU. If, despite the first judgment, the Member State fails to take the necessary measures, the Commission may initiate a new infringement procedure pursuant to Article 260 TFEU by sending a single written warning before notifying the Court again.

If it does indeed refer the matter to the Court again, the Commission may propose to it to impose financial penalties on the Member State, depending on the duration and gravity of the infringement and the size of the Member State. There are two elements:

- a lump sum, determined on basis of the time elapsing since the ruling of the first decision;
- and a daily fine, calculated as of the date of the second decision, until the Member State ceases the infringement.

2.2. Directive no. 2014/94/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 October 2014 on the deployment of alternative fuels infrastructure

2.2.1. Scope of the occurrence of Directive no. 2014/94/EU

The European Commission has announced at the level of 2013 an ambitious package of measures to create alternative fuel stations across Europe with common design and usage standards.

The package was based on analyses of each type of fuel:

- Electricity: the situation of electricity charging points varies considerably across the EU. Leaders in this area are Germany, France, the Netherlands, Spain and the United Kingdom. The Commission's legislative proposal provides for the imposition in each Member State of a minimum number of recharge points equipped with a common socket outlet. The objective was to have a sufficient number of loading points so that car manufacturers could launch a mass production at reasonable prices. The concept of "common socket outlet" at EU level has been established as an essential element for the widespread adoption of this fuel.
- Hydrogen: Germany, Italy and Denmark already have a significant number of hydrogen refuelling stations, although some are not accessible to the public. Common standards are still required for certain components, such as fuel hoses. Under the proposed measures, existing power stations will be connected to form a network with common standards, ensuring the mobility of hydrogen vehicles. This applies to the 14 Member States that currently have a hydrogen network.
- Biofuels: already represent almost 5% of the market. They are used combined with traditional fuels and do not require any specific infrastructure. A major challenge will be to ensure their sustainability.

– Liquefied (LNG) and compressed (CNG) natural gas: LNG is used for water transport, both sea and river. LNG infrastructure for the supply of vessels is at a very early stage, with only Sweden having bunkering (fuel supply to a ship) with small-scale LNG for seagoing vessels, with plans to build such facilities in several other Member States. The European Commission has proposed that, by 2020 and 2025, LNG refuelling stations should be installed in all 139 maritime and river ports that are part of the trans-European transport network. It is not about large gas terminals, but fixed or mobile refuelling stations. All major EU ports are targeted. LNG: Liquefied natural gas is also used by trucks, but there are only 38 filling stations in the EU. The Commission has proposed that by 2020 refuelling stations should be installed every 400 km on the roads that are part of the trans-European transport network.

– CNG: Compressed natural gas is mainly used by cars. Currently, one million vehicles use this fuel, which represents 0.5% of the fleet; the sector aims to increase this figure by 2020. The proposal of the Commission will ensure that publicly available refuelling points with common standards at intervals of no more than 150 km are available throughout Europe.

- LPG: Liquefied Petroleum Gas. No action for LPG is foreseen, with core infrastructure already in place.

[4] By the CJUE Decision from 13 February 2014 in Case C 530/11, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland was convicted for the non-transposing of a directive in an action of assessing the failure to fulfil obligations under Article 258 TFEU Committee

The European Strategy for Alternative Fuels and Appropriate Infrastructure has been materialized into the following documents:

1. European Commission Communication "Europe 2020: A European Strategy for a Smart, Green and Inclusive Growth Favourable to Inclusion"[5] having as scopes:
   - improving competitiveness
   - improving energy security
   - more efficient use of resources and energy.
2. Commission White Paper for the period 2011-2020[6] with the aim of reducing oil dependence of transport by:
   - a multitude of policy initiatives, including the drafting of a sustainable alternative fuels strategy, as well as an adequate infrastructure
   - a reduction by 60% until 2050 versus the values from 1990 for greenhouse gas emissions from transport
3. Communication from the Commission from 2013 entitled "Clean energy for transport: a European strategy on alternative fuels":

The main alternative fuels that have the potential for long-term substitution of oil:

- electricity
- hydrogen
- biofuels
- natural gas and liquefied petroleum gas (LPG)

There is a possibility to use such simultaneously and combined, for example through dual fuel technology systems.

In the Official Journal of the European Union, series L 307[7], was published DIRECTIVE 2014/94/EU OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND COUNCIL on the deployment of alternative fuels infrastructure.

The purpose of the adoption of the Directive was to establish a common framework of measures for the installation of alternative fuels infrastructure in the Union in order to minimize oil dependency and reduce the impact of transport on the environment. The directive also set minimum requirements for the creation of alternative fuel infrastructure, including refuelling points for electric vehicles and natural gas refuelling points (LNG and CNG) and hydrogen, to be implemented through national policy frameworks of Member States, as well as common technical specifications for such recharging and refuelling points, as well as user information requirements. The Directive entered into force on the twentieth day following its publication in the Official Journal of the European Union (28 October 2014), i.e. until 18 November 2016.

Thus, the emergence of the Directive has made it mandatory for each Member State to adopt by 18 November 2016 a national market policy framework for the development of alternative fuels in the transport sector and the installation of the relevant infrastructure with the ultimate goal:

- Supply of electricity for transport
- Hydrogen supply for road transport especially for networks
- Providing natural gas for transport
- Informing users

The installation of alternative fuels infrastructure within urban agglomerations has the following levels to achieve:

1. Electricity for transports:
   - a suitable number of publicly accessible recharging points shall be installed by 31 December 2020 to ensure that electric vehicles can circulate at least in urban/suburban agglomerations and other densely populated areas and, where appropriate, within networks established by the Member States
   - the number of recharging points is determined by taking into account, inter alia, the estimated number of electric vehicles by the end of 2020
   - recharging points for electric vehicles installed or renewed as of 18 November 2017 comply at least with the technical specifications set out in the Appendix to the Directive and with the specific safety requirements applicable at national level.
2. Natural gas for transports:
   - a suitable number of publicly accessible GNC refuelling points is installed by 31 December 2020 to ensure that CNG operated vehicles can drive in urban/suburban agglomerations and other densely populated areas
   - Developing standards, including detailed technical specifications, for refuelling points for LNG and CNG vehicles
   - CNC refuelling points for vehicles installed or renewed as of 18 November 2017 comply with the technical specifications set out in the Appendix to the Directive.
   - an appropriate number of LNG refuelling points is installed in inland ports by 31 December 2030 to allow LNG-operated ships to circulate throughout the TEN-T central network (the Trans-European Transport Network).

2.2.2. Difficulties encountered in transposing the Directive in Romania. Adoption of Law no. 34/2017 insufficient for the European Commission; Transmitting Reasoned Opinion; Referral to the European Court of Justice; Comparative analysis to other EU Member States

In order to transpose the Directive in Romania, a working group was established, the activity of which started in April 2015 with the aim of having a transposition act by the end of 2015.

However, almost two years after the Directive was issued and numerous warnings from the European Commission in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 214/29.03.2017 was published Law no. 34/2017 on the deployment of alternative fuels infrastructure.

The Law regulates measures destined to install the alternative fuel infrastructure, in order to reduce to a minimum the oil dependence and mitigate the impact of transport on the environment.

To achieve this goal, the Law set minimum requirements for the creation of the alternative fuel infrastructure, including refuelling points for electric vehicles and refuelling points for compressed natural gas, liquefied natural gas and hydrogen, to be implemented through national policy frameworks and common technical specifications for such recharging and refuelling points, as well as user information requirements.

The Law had a deadline of 60 days as of the date of its publication in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, and the Ministry of Energy, as the competent regulatory authority, informed the European Commission in this view.

On a first analysis of the text of the normative act, it was easy to see that it was a true copy of the Directive's provisions without application norms and without presenting to the Commission a strategy to be followed in order to fulfil the purpose of Directive 2014/94 /EU.

This issue was also raised by the Commission, which initiated the infringement action against Romania for the complete non-transposition of the Directive, according to the purpose established by the Community act.

Thus, although on March 30, 2017, the measure transposing the Directive was notified to the Commission, and the Conformity Table was remitted on 12 April 2017, the European institution initiated the infringement procedure in a non-contentious phase by sending a Letter of late payment.

Therefore, on 13 July 2017, the Commission summoned Romania, along with 6 other Member States, to fully transpose the rules on the deployment of the alternative fuel infrastructure.

The Commission sent a reasoned opinion to Greece, Ireland, Malta, Romania, Slovenia and the UK, asking them to notify their national policy framework based on the EU rules on the deployment of alternative fuels infrastructure (Directive 2E).

The national policy framework is the main tool foreseen by the Directive to ensure the creation of sufficient infrastructures for alternative fuels, including recharging points for electric vehicles and gas and hydrogen refuelling points, and to avoid fragmentation of the internal market. Accelerating the deployment of alternative fuel infrastructure is indeed essential in order to give all Europeans green and competitive mobility, as set out by the Commission in the "Europe on the move" package adopted in May 2017. These seven Member States had at their disposal two months to fulfil their obligations under the Directive; otherwise, the Commission could decide to refer the case to the EU Court of Justice. Furthermore, the Commission also decided to send a letter of formal notice to Sweden, which notified a national policy framework not comprising the minimum elements required by the Directive[8].

On 4 October 2017, the European Commission informed that Bulgaria, Denmark, Estonia, France, Lithuania, Malta, Poland, Romania and Sweden have to fully transpose EU rules on the installation of alternative fuels infrastructure, according to a communiqué of the EC[9].

The main objective of the Directive, to be transposed by 18 November 2016, was to establish a common framework for the large-scale deployment of alternative fuels infrastructure in Europe. The nine Member States had two months to notify the Commission of the concerned measures, otherwise the Commission may decide to refer the case to the EU Court of Justice.

On 25 January 2018, the European Commission decided to refer Malta and Romania to the EU Court of Justice for failing to fulfil the obligation of notifying about the national policy frameworks under Directive 2014/94/EU on the deployment of alternative fuel infrastructure[10], whereas the other 7 states manages to evade the threat of being sanctioned by the CJEU.

Initially, Member States (including Romania and Malta) were requested to notify the Commission about the national policy frameworks by 18 November 2016. Until the date of the referral to the CJEU, Malta and Romania have not answered to this request, although they received from the Commission a letter of formal notice and a reasoned opinion on 15 February and 13 July 2017 respectively.

Accelerating the deployment of infrastructure for alternative fuels is essential to give all Europeans green and competitive mobility, as announced by the Commission in the "Clean Mobility Package" adopted in November 2017[11].

2.2.3. Competences of the Romanian Energy Regulatory Authority after the transposition of the Directive

By the entry into force of Law no. 160/2012[12] for the approval of Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 33/2007 on the organization and functioning of the Romanian Energy Regulatory Authority, its statute has been substantially reconfigured, ANRE becoming an administrative authority with legal status, under parliamentary control, which is not part of the executive power and has no right of legislative initiative.

As a peremptory argument in this respect are also the provisions of Article 35 from the Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council concerning common rules for the internal market in electricity and repealing Directive 54/2003/EC, art. 39 of Directive 73/2009/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council concerning common rules for the internal market in natural gas and repealing Directive 55/2003/EC, which consecrates the thesis according to which "Member States shall guarantee the independence of the regulatory authorities and ensure that they impartially and transparently exercise their powers. For such purpose, the Member State shall ensure that, when carrying out their regulatory tasks under this Directive and the relevant legislation, the regulatory authorities: are legally distinct and functionally independent from any other public or private entity".

By virtue of the legal provisions regarding the relations with third parties, mentioned in art. 11 paragraph (1) of the aforementioned normative act, regarding the responsibilities of ANRE for "collaboration with the ministries", without the Authority acting or being permitted to act as initiator or co-initiator of the draft law on the transposition of the Directive 2014/94/EC, the indirect contribution of the regulatory body consisted of the following issues:

- According to current regulations in the field of electricity, operators of recharging points are free to purchase electricity from any electricity supplier in the European Union if it is interested in concluding contracts for the supply of electricity with operators of loading points on the territory of Romania and it either holds a license for the supply activity granted by ANRE, or it has acted or acts in order to be confirmed by ANRE the right to supply electricity in Romania under a license or an equivalent right granted by the state from the European Union where it has its registered office, according to art. 10 paragraph (5) of the Regulation for Licensing and Authorizations in the Electric Power Sector, approved by ANRE President Order no. 12 / 2015[13];

– The relation of electricity distribution/transmission operators to economic operators that install and/or operate publicly available recharging points fall within the type of relations covered by the regulations regarding the access to the public electricity networks and the provision of the service distribution of electricity. The principles laid down in Art. 25 and art. 44 paragraph (2) of Law no. 123/2012 on Electricity and Natural Gas, as subsequently amended and supplemented[14], were expressed in the following regulations relevant for this analysis:

– Regulation on connection of users to public electricity networks, approved by ANRE President Order no. 59/2013, with subsequent amendments and supplementations[15];

– The general conditions attached to the license for the provision of the electricity distribution service by the economic operators concessionaries of the power distribution service and the General Conditions related to the license for the provision of the electricity distribution service by operators who are not concessionaries of the distribution service electricity, both of which are approved by ANRE President Order no. 73 / 2014[16];

- In the field of natural gas, any economic operator may acquire natural gas from a license holder for carrying out natural gas supply activity, Romanian or foreign legal entity. Thus, relevant for the transposition of Directive 2014/94/EC, in accordance with the provisions of Article 7 letter a) of the Regulation on the granting of licenses for the establishment and licensing of natural gas, as subsequently amended and supplemented, approved by the Order of the ANRE President no. 34/2013[17], ANRE issues licenses for natural gas, biogas/biomethane, liquefied natural gas (LNG), compressed natural gas for vehicles (CNGV) and, according to art. 7 pt. (V) of the same regulation, ANRE issues licenses for the operation of the LNG terminal operation. It is also worth mentioning that, according to the provisions of art. 6 lit. (f) and (g) of the Regulation, it is necessary to have establishment permits for LNG and CNGV facilities.

– According to the general principles, the connection of LNG and CNGV facilities to the natural gas transmission system, to the upstream pipelines or to the distribution systems shall be carried out in a regulated regime in accordance with the provisions of Law no. 123/2012, respectively of Government Decision no. 1043/2004 approving the Regulation on Access to the National Gas Transmission System and the Regulation on access to upstream pipelines, as subsequently amended and supplemented[18];

– Regarding the general regulatory framework for LNG and CNGV, it is established by the LNG Technical Code, approved by ANRE President Order no. 109/2013 and the Technical Code for compressed natural gas for vehicles, approved by the ANRE President's Decision no .;

– Regarding hydrogen, ANRE does not have attributions for this TP.

From the analysis of these issues, it can be noticed that the Regulatory Authority has no legislative initiative, but only technical and regulatory support after the transposition of Directive 2014/94 / EC.

3. Conclusions

The EU has clearly outlined a European vision and strategy for alternative fuels and appropriate infrastructure.

With regard to the alternative fuels infrastructure was adopted Directive 2014/94/EU. The transposition deadline of the Directive was 18 November 2016, but Romania reached the stage of referral to the Court of Justice of the European Union for not fully transposing the Community act.

Although initially the Romanian authorities believed that a Transposition Law was sufficient enough to comply with the provisions of the Directive, the European institutions took a different view, initiating the infringement procedure, which came to the notice of the CJEU.

Faced with this reality, the Romanian authorities have stepped up cooperation to speed up the development of a Strategy on the National Policy Framework for the Development of the Alternative Fuels Market.

Thus have been outlined the following steps:

- Establishing the current market situation in relation to (a) alternative fuel vehicles and (b) installed infrastructure;
- Inventory of incidental national legislation and relevant strategic and programmatic documents;
- Establishing criteria for analyzing future market development;
- Analysis of future market development;
- Establishing the targets set by the Directive;
- Establishing the necessary measures to achieve the targets set by the Directive;
- Consultation of relevant players, including producers' associations, industry etc.

Almost one year and a half after the deadline for transposition, including after the CJEU has been notified of the violation of Art. 258 TFEU, on 7 June 2018, the Court ordered the case to be closed, with the Romanian authorities succeeding in convincing the Commission that they have developed a strategy on a credible and feasible national policy framework[19], in accordance with the scope targeted by Directive 2014/94/CE. The aim of the Strategy is to reduce greenhouse gas emissions in transport by promoting alternative fuel infrastructure, including refuelling points for electric vehicles and natural gas refuelling points (LNG and CNG) and hydrogen, and promoting vehicles clean and energy-efficient road transport.

Although Romania escaped the threat of a CJEU decision, the question remains whether Romania's infrastructure is ready to implement the Strategy, which at least at the theoretical level seems ambitious. Obviously the answer is negative, unfortunately, but what is to be done? When investments is needed, who will do such? The state or private sector? Is the state able to stimulate private sector investments in creating the infrastructure necessary to implement the Strategy outlined following the transposition of Directive no. 2014/94/EC?

Furthermore, the question arises, which is perhaps the most difficult one, whether at a mentality level we are able to take the step towards modernization and accept the evolution?

"Clean" fuels, as they are called in the current language, have three main impediments: the high cost of vehicles, low consumer acceptance, and the lack of recharging and refuelling stations. It's a vicious circle. No refuelling stations are being built because there are not enough vehicles. Vehicles do not sell at competitive prices, because there is no sufficient demand. Consumers do not buy vehicles, because they have high prices and there are no stations.

By modifying national regulations to encourage the involvement and investment of the private sector, Romania, as other Member States, should be able to implement these changes without necessarily involving public spending by developing projects to benefit of aid from the EU.

PLAGIARISM AND SCHOOL WITH ITS "SINS"

Ioana Victoria BĂLAN (MAFTEI)

Abstract

The paper aims to highlight those aspects of education that hinder the development of autonomous and creative personality (focusing on students) and that favour"germ" plagiarism.

In addition, the present paper offers suggestions for good practices by which to improve and/or to combat those types of behaviour that could lead to the spread of plagiarism.

1. When and how do we commit plagiarism?

In accordance withart. 4 from Law no. 206/2004on good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation[1], plagiarism represents*"exposure in written work or oral communication of texts, phrases, ideas, demonstrations, data, hypotheses, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from written works, including in electronic form, of other authors, without mentioning this and without referring to the original sources."*

In accordance with art. 35 of Law no. 8/1996 republished[2], "without the consent of the author and without paying any remuneration, the following uses of a work previously made known to the public are permitted, provided such are compliant to good habits, do not contradict the normal exploitation of the work and do not prejudice the author or holders of usage rights (b) the use of short quotes from a work for analysis, commentary or criticism purposes or as an example, insofar their use justifies the extent of the quote".

The right of third parties to use a work without the author's consent is limited and this limitation of the patrimonial right of the author in doctrine is called the "right of quotation".

I found a perfect illustration of the right of quotation in the following opinion formulated by A.C. Renouard: "to forbid writers to quote their predecessors, to refuse for the progress of science and public discussion the use of any passage in a work in the private domain is undoubtedly an exaggeration. It must be said that an author who quotes another person or makes him the one he relies upon or disapproves of, indicating that he did not want to assume the capacity of an author of another's work is, of course exempted from any defaulting conduct. But anything can be abused of."[3]

In accordance with Law no. 8/1996, "in all cases (...) the source and the name of the author should be mentioned, unless this proves impossible".

In order to belegal, the quotation should observe"the quantitative and qualitative correlation between the quoted text and the own contribution of the author who used the quote to accomplish his work"and the reproduction of the quoted passages should be"identifiable in the work in which it is incorporated, and it is traditional to warn by settingthe quotation between quotation marks and indicating the author's source and name, for example by a footnote, "the purpose being justified by" critical, polemical, pedagogical, scientific or guiding nature of the work in which the quotations are embedded."[4]

The ultimate condition for reproduction to be licit is that it should not prejudice the quoted author. Prejudice occurs"whenever, as a result of incorrect quotation (...), it becomes unnecessary to read his work, the right to inviolability of the work is impaired or the quote turns into an act of disloyal competition."[5]

In attempting to define plagiarism, to a certain extent as a supplement of the law, or rather to place it in a certain space and to find certain coordinates, the specialized literature used an abundance of epithets and stylistic constructions such as "theft", "wound","abuse in evaluation", "a phenomenon that suffers from the increase of social sobriety", "phenomenon that took grotesque forms","phenomenon of feudalization","phenomenon that reached incredible odds","phenomenon attributed in*school life*the label of quasi-rule","subject of tabloids".[6]

Should this be the reason why "plagiarism" has caused rivers of ink to flow? So that it could be the "the subject matter of tabloids"? Because it meets our need for quarrel, blood and circus? This is sad. I did not intend to make an analysis of the reasons that prompted others to write about plagiarism - which I personally do not consider a phenomenon. However I proposed myself to explain my motivation in approaching this issue and to find out the possible causes that determine the"litigants"to plagiarize.

"In all approaches involving principles, causes, or elements, understanding and knowing result from being aware thereof, as we believe that we know each one after finding out the prime causes and the prime principles and we <have reached> the elements".[7]

Further to explaining the possible causes, I dare propose also possible fighting measures.

I admit that there is a rich case-law of those who have massively plagiarized, impertinently stealing entire chapters, of those who have recorded an authortwo or three times in the bibliographical list, changingeither his surname or the forename in the "quotation indication"(!), of those who massacred valuable works and the work of valuable creators, of those who, in the desire to satisfy their egos, to accumulate notoriety or obtain additional symbolic statutes, and who, afterwards , in the meagreness of their minds and character, also declared themselves aggrieved by the criticism. I condemn acts of plagiarism and firmly support their annihilation and sanction.

What I would like however to signal is that plagiarism accusations, which are in many cases ungrounded, with no legal basis, manipulate and discourage those, who are at the beginning of the research activity. The tools they dispose of and by which they can survive these pressures are the model in the person of the coordinating teacher, the intrinsic motivation, the ethical principles and mandatorily hard work.

Yes. I also agree with the wound that plagiarism causes through the PhD (as the abundance of epithets listed above refers to this category). In fact, I also have a set of "values" attributed to plagiarism, and with which I can enrich the list: "loopholesin self-evaluation""superficiality,""sufficiency,""opportunism." I also agree that the presentation as an original of a plagiarized material implies serious deontological deficiencies, defective relating to the phenomenon of knowledge, its axiology and ethics. "Guilty" situations result in disregard, discredit and defacing of the higher education institution.

In my opinion, the institution of the PhDmeans or should mean maturity. The paidean approach of the PhD candidate supposes a "plus", supposes growth, accumulation, interrelation and interdependence, all the results of search and reflection. The PhD thesis should imply an epistemological dynamics based on personalized resettlement, an enriched reconfiguration, on a reform of certain issuesrelated to the knowledge base. And all these under the imperative sign of originality.

However, by generalizing the PhD plagiarism in the press (in all press categories), calling it an onerous, perverted phenomenon, validated by a "political", unethical, circumstantial and conjectural tool, circumscribed to the sphere of banality, I consider that great injustice is done to those who aspire to this title by real efforts, toil, honesty, authenticity, and perhaps, sometimes, sacrifice. I mean the category of those who have the property of each written comma, have their own perspective, original approach and dialectics, authentic creation, discipline, principles and creed, those who have a well-articulated cognitive, emotional, volitional and attitude psychological profile, ordered, organized , determined and ambitious ones.

"Ambition should not be moderated, but it should be given an honest, wise, and great purpose".[8]

For this latter category of PhD candidates, I have a piece of advice, rather an encouragement: all minuses assigned to the obtaining of the PhD title should give them more faith in showing their value. Trying to reverse polarity, turning these shortcomings into motivational tools.

I appreciate the fighting spirit and I do not have a biased attitude towards plagiarists, but to decide what is plagiarized, to distinguish nuances, to estimate the theft in percentages, to blame responsibility on the measurement, to decide how much is plagiarized and how much "plagiarism elemements", to identify the cut or mosaic, this should not be left to pseudo-specialists. Because, insofar civic spirit is appreciated, in the created vortex, it is hard to distinguish between born and *made*ones.

The authentic PhD candidateis subject to the perspicuous tug of the vulgus with only the blame for aspiring to a title. And for such purpose he/she is making an effort. An assumed one. He/she is assessed by public opinion, by the perception of society in the manipulated part, partly in error, partly justified. This PhD candidate is called "dottore" and receives eventually, in the happiest case, a stethoscope as a birthday gift from a joker.

What he/she has not assumed, and what is eroding, is that when he.she enters the PhD program, he/she becomes the presumed author of counterfeiting in the opinion of society. And I'm not referring here to "*á la manierede*works (homage or parody to one's style)"[9], but to our tendency to parody everything and all, to trivialize, to treat unfairly.) In such a case, the honest aspirant to the title, but the presumed falsifier, so much the more and especially in our times has to supply evidence of authenticity. And if there is something to separate here, the persons authorized to do so will do this. "(...)to judge a PhD thesis requires you to master the field of the thesis well, and to know more than the one who wrote it, i.e. to have the professional authority (including the moral one) to judge the writings of another person in an impartial manner and according to objective criteria".[10]

Quoting Hennig –The Apology of Plagiarism - I concluded that the two antagonistic parties, plagiarists and plagiomen, both reactive, should think well before throwing the stone: "After all, how much science can a poor man bear in one's lifetime? And how much erudition do his fellow men bear to trace and denounce him as an impostor? For whom accepts these considerations, the plagiarism charge becomes a stone that cannot be lifted."[11]

Petre Ţuţea said that"original is only God". I would have liked to read a continuation of this saying dedicated to those who, for various reasons, choose to start crusades, make ado, set the index, plagiomen who in the name of ethics have been in their turn plagiarists (history proved this!) and in the name of morals (perhaps even the Christian one), they beat heavy spikes in the flesh of the so-called impostures.

Those who are real creators are entitled to talk about plagiarism. How many?

Take a step forward those of you, who think you created "Any", "Anyone", "Anything", "Anywhere", "Anytime".

Take a step back and first judge your creation, putting it after that of the Creator.

Then judge the creations of others!

2. SCHOOL AND "ITS SINS"

"Educate children and it won't be necessary to punish people!"

Pitagora

Education is the answer to the community's question and its formulation is closely connected to its needs. And, logically, as society evolves and realities are constantly changing, education is subject to the same route. The only constant remaining is the need for training. Through education we achieve culture, integration and networking. We are changing approach tools, methods, and techniques according to the new goals. The new purpose in the context of the present reality is the formation of a complex type of personality: creative, autonomous and mandatorily active-participative.

What does "actual reality" bring, and in what way does it demand that the above-mentioned requirements are in place to justify the purpose?

First of all it brings, in a general way, a "guilty disorder". One of the musings of Blaise Pascal positions and, at concurrently brilliantly explains the "status" of disorder in people's lives: "The most unreasonable things become the most reasonable due to people's disorder."[12]

And when we refer to "disorder," we actually mean undesirable behaviours resulting from an altered thinking. Throughout history, enlightened minds have "calibrated" the "disorder" on several levels: moral, political, legal, beginning with Moses' Tablets, the Sermon on the Mount, precepts of Roman law, Aristotelian logic of sophism vs. correct reasoning, the Magna Carta or the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The current disordered experienced by all of us suffers from a sublime mixture of values, a profound mutation in their dynamics, a plague exfoliating the decision-making power, making it more difficult to delimit the plus from the minus, the truth from falsehood, the good from the bad, a difficulty in discerning among the multitude of challenges, beautifully packedimposture and histrionics, rough manipulation and dissonant horizons. All this, by the echo that it generates, makes it more difficult to choose and to assume responsibility.

This is, from my point of view, the current radiography of the Romanian society to which I would add Daniel David's claim: "I believe that the Romanians' psycho-cultural profile is dominated by mistrust in people, which makes us less tolerant and cooperative with others for the common benefit (our cooperation is especially one for survival, not for success). Lack of cooperation does not enable us to use our intellectual and creative potential, which generates performance below its level. This leads both to the exaggeration of the positive - any achievement is amplified as a sign that, although not seen, the potential is there - on a background of increased emotionality and the exaggeration of the negative - by the frustration that we cannot unlock our potential, on a background of competitiveness not doubled by discipline/self-discipline, increased cynicism and scepticism. Perhaps this psycho-cultural profile was born based on chronic insecurity/uncertainty throughout history".[13]

I chose to present this perspective because, in the generous context of the theme of "education", it offers a nuanced understanding of the dynamics of individual's adaptation (beneficiary of education) and of the functioning of society. At the same time, the logical thread of the analysis supposes also the identification of the failures resulting from it.

Amidst this reality lies the school, also subjected to changes, reforms, reconfigurations, recalibration and the whim of the decision-making structures.

Unfortunately, the rapid succession of reforms in education, approaches in which the New no longer lives with the Old, contradictory provisions, some hasty decisions, taken without the assessment of the consequences, without a contextualized vision, discontinuity in the application of the measures caused by the succession of different governmental teams, the New for the sake of updating, without waiting for the result of the "innovation"by the previous team and the failure to correlate between the personal needs and the community ones, gradually led to a precarious state of Romanian education, characterized by poor scores in standardized tests, abandonment, de-motivation, inconsistency and unsubstantiality.

The reform in education has brought and subjects to attention, on one side, issues related to curricular, methodological and procedural documents and on the other side, the process concerns both the system in its entirety and individually.

The educational process supposes the interaction among several interdependent entities: the teacher, on the one hand, and the pupil (together with the family) on the other, as beneficiaries of education.

The analysis further identifies the shortcomings assigned to each category and which, once identified, could be corrected.

"If we need to help a science", said Emmanuel Kant long ago in"The Critique of Pure Reason", then all difficulties and even those that are hidden on nits party have to be disclosed; each of them resorts to a remedy that cannot be found without increasing for the science either the extent or the accuracy, sothat the very obstacles become incentives to increase the solidity of science".[14]

The teacher is or should be a model. A model of competence, authority, autonomy, empathy, flexibility, trust, reciprocity, dialogue partner, creativity, motivation, kindness, gentleness and a master in harmoniously managing all of them. The list is long because its mission is a noble one, but the ones I chose to develop herein refer to competence and motivation.

"He who wants to educate must be educated himself (...) The first place is occupied by parents, ordinary people (...), who remain themselves children for all their lives, to the extent of one half or in their entirety. After all, is anyone expected that all these parents have "personality"? In exchange, we expectof coursemore from the educator, the specially trained specialists, who were anyway taught psychology, whether in a proper or poor way (...) about young people dedicating their lives to the teaching profession are supposed to be themselves educated (...). The way we raise the issue of education is generally unilateral, exclusively considering the child to be educated and, rendering instead no attention to the adult educator himself/herself (...). It is desirable to say about him/her that he/she is skilled and masters his/her domain and not that he/she doubts himself/herself and his/her competence.

The specialist is convicted to competence, without the right to appeal."[15]

In the context of rapid change, competence cannot be maintained without the desire of continuous improvement. This important component puts him/her in the position of a director of the instructive-educational process and is a barrier to self-sufficiency and belief in the infallibility of his/her knowledge. The model he/she provides is transmitted by cultivating in his/her students the desire to know, to seek, to initiate, to incite to discovery. These are small steps in the formation of autonomous, trained and responsible individuals. His/her competence model forms competences, both for the present and for the future. In the anticipatory approach, the teacher prepares his/her disciples for adaptation, for security, in the context of future changes, leading them away from the danger of inadequacy and inefficiency. The competent teacher contributes to the formation of the spirit, the modelling of the character and hygiene of conduct.

However, in my opinion, the highest goal of the teacher is to teach students the lesson of competition with oneself, of overachieving, of self-fulfilment.

An unmotivated teacher will not know how to motivate his/her students. His/her reasons, whether concerning insufficient salary, the aggressive intrusion of parents – a fact that sometimes perturbs the school climate - frequent and unsuitable changes, sometimes the obligation to draft "paperwork" (too many and sometimes too little justified) should not deprive the pupils of motivation. I theoretically say "should not". Practically, this happens independently of the teacher's will. An unmotivated teacher is an inefficient teacher; he/she produces a state of lack of motivation for the entire collective. The student's lack of motivation in learning has several forms of manifestation. The frequent one is the shorting of the search process, the copy-paste shortcut, manifestations that inhibit the creative potential. "This should not omit the fact that the system as such should offer a coherent and tailored motivation strategy to teachers. In order for the self-motivation process to work, a minimum of motivation offered by the education system in its aggregate is necessary". Besides the elements"which the management of the education system should elaborate in relation to the human resource, the teacher should not forget that the person who sends him/her to school daily, which helps him/her perform and be happy and satisfied in the life he/she is leading is precisely his/her person. If a teacher does not like what he/she does, then, no matter what the education system would do for its members, the entire process is damaged."[16]

Not long ago, I read a study drafted by the scientists from NASA, applied on a sample of 1,600 children aged 4 to 5.

[16] Ion Ovidiu Pânișoară, The Successful Teacher, Polirom, Iași, 2009, p. 21-23

Following the replication of these tests over a million times - which eliminates any suspicion in the veracity of the results - it was concluded that "we are born geniuses, but the education system is hindering us".[17]

The test aimed to analyze the ability of the subjects to come up with innovative ideas on certain proposed topics, in other words, it tested the level of creativity and imagination. The amazing results showed that 98% of the children received a genius score. Repeating the study on children aged 10 years, they noticed that only 30% of children genius scores obtained; in case of 15-year-olds, the percentage was 12%, and in the case of adults only 2%.

Gavin Nascimento, author of the study, says that we are born with the ability to be geniuses of creativity, but while in the first years of life we predominantly use the right brain hemisphere (the one responsible for divergent thinking and creativity), we exchange in time this process with convergent thinking (the left hemisphere of the brain).

Divergent thinking is the one used to find solutions to generate predictions, probabilities and a high number of possibilities, while convergent thinking is the one - which in the opinion of researcher George Land, who designed the test on the request of NASA - "suppresses imagination. We have discovered that education shows children how to use both types of thinking. So, when someone comes and asks you to give him a new idea, as these ideas cross your mind, you repress them: that's a bad idea, that's what I tried and did not work, it will not work and so on."

"When we look at what happens in the brain, we notice that neurons struggle with each other and diminish the focusing ability of the brain, as we constantly judge, criticize, analyze, censure. When we think driven by fear, we use a smaller part of the brain."adds Land.

Unfortunately, the "truth" from school is well defined, students receive processed materials, which they only have to memorize. School and family should provide opportunities for children to develop divergent thinking. "Letchildren disagree with us, encouraging them to find more than one way to solve a problem"says Christine Carter.[18]

Student management in the learning activity, performed with much tact, under the sign of developing creativity, on the one hand, careful to avoid subjective assessments, indirect references, random, informal observations and generally avoiding a brutal or sentential attitude, can turn the student into an active subject of his own formation, and not just as a desideratum, as a fundamental principle of pedagogy, beautifully formulated in the book, but as an active and autonomous manner in its own development.

"Some men see things as they are and say, why; I dream things that never were and say, why not?"(George Bernard Shaw)

And indeed, "why not?", as long as"creativity is just connectingthings"(Steve Jobs).Connections give rise to other connections, and knowledge involves a long tethered string of synapses.

"Wonder connected with a principle of rational curiosity is the source of all knowledge and discover".(Samuel Horsley).

I was talking above about the high percentage of creativity at children aged 3-5 years. Have you ever noticed such a child, how amazed, but how patiently he looks for minutes on end the movement of a row of ants coming out of the anthill?

And then, it's natural to wonder what's going on with his curiosity, his desire for knowledge? Where, on the route is the process being short-circuited, how is his universe ruined, why is the endowment wasted and why does he get to set himself limits and look for shortcuts instead of sharpening his skills of finding answers? I found a survey these days on a social network asking for the answer to the next question:"*What do you think should be changed in the education system – the curriculum/textbooks or teaching style?"*I later understood that the answers were expressed in somewhat balanced proportions.

I also believe that textbooks / curriculum and teaching style should be "regenerated".

What is the teaching style? It is a set of methods and procedures used by the teacher in the teaching process he/she performs. The definition is not comprehensive. It is obvious that the success of a lesson depends on many elements: first of all how the design was made, its quality, the way in which goals, objectives, contents, skills were formulated, which the teacher proposes himself/herself to form, the used didactic materials, the judicious planning - the temporal resource - the moments of the lesson in the design of the activity of the concerned didactic strategy and the assessment methods. But for this analysis, I chose to develop the issue of adapting the methods to a lesson, and because the pace of change involves reconfiguration, I will not refer to all traditional methods playing a valuable role in the economy of a lesson, and I am far from the thought of criticizing such. What I want to emphasize, however, is related to the need to intertwine them with other alternative methods, such as, for example, critical thinking methods.

Critical thinking methods develop a structured aggregate of functional competencies and ensure the transition from "what do we learn?" to "how do we learn" in the general picture of "lifelong learning".

"Criticism" from the content of the notion refers to the awakening of consciousness, the participation in the building of one's own personality, the active involvement of the pupil in a flexible didactic approach, representing from this perspective a way of promoting another learning method.

"...R.W.C.T. methods -reading and writing for the development of critical thinking-are not a study subject,

[17] Gavin Nascimento, We Are Born Creative Geniuses But The Education System Dumbs Us Down, Surprising Results of a NASA Study
[18] Quotation indication Ion Ovidiu Pânişoară, Who Anihilates the Child's Creativity

a teaching discipline, but a positive approach, an active process of constructive interrogation that forces the student to think in an authentic way about "what does this knowledge mean to me?","How and where can I use this knowledge?","What happens if I apply this knowledge?"[19]

"The levels at which critical thinking develops the student's abilities are: personal/public, heteronymous/autonomous, intuitive/logical, unidirectional/multidisciplinary"[20]

Asignificant issue to be emphasized is, on the one hand, as I have claimed before, the need to combine these methods with the classic ones, but especially their proper choice, taking into account the specificity of the chosen topic, the individual characteristics and the peculiarities of each age, with the contextual transactions in which they are used.

The critical thinking methods most often used in didactic activity are the following:"Brainstorming","Bundling Method","Tour of the Gallery","Double Journal","The Quintet","I Know-I Want to Know-I learn","Venn-Euler Diagram".I chose for exemplification purposes three of them:

- Brainstorming

Teacher's question: "What message does the following quotation send to you?"

"What is the writer? A creator of moral monuments made with the spirit and hand." -George Călinescu

Ideas are orally expressed by the students and written on the blackboard:

Inspiration; challenge; guide; memories; vision; imagination; creativity; fulfilment; courage; strength; adventure; love of peers; emotions; effort; development; knowledge; wisdom, expression, model (4$^{th}$grade, Middle School Titu Maiorescu, Bucharest)

- Quintet

Draft a quintet on the topic"Mother", in which:

- the first verse is made up of a word that would express a name;
- the second, two words to express characteristics;
- the third, three words expressing actions ending in "ing" (verbs in the gerund);

Fourth, a four-word sentence expressing feelings on the topic;

- the fifth, a word that encompasses the essence of the first verse.

Mama,
Beautiful, gentle,
Loving, labouring, understanding,
She'san entire universe,
Treasure (V.S.- 4$^{th}$grade, Middle School Titu Maiorescu)

- Thinking Hats

Application based on the text"Silver Skates"by Mary Elizabeth Mapes-Dodge[21]

The White Hat - informs:

Who were Hans and Gretel?

The Red Hat - say what you feel:

Tell me how you feel about Hans wanting to buy skates or a coat for Gretel, and she insists that Hans should buy skates for himself.

The Black Hat - negative issues:

With what elements (situations) presented in the text do you not agree?

The Yellow Hat - positive issues:

What qualities did Hilda have?

The Green Hat – generate new ideas

Continue the story with a end imagined by you.

The Violet Hat –clarifies:

Why do you think the text is titled "Silver Skates"?

Other activities that can be carried out in schools to develop creativity can be:

"Create a logo to represent you"or"Write a script for a play based on a funny experience you've been through", "Write a story in exactly (a certain number of clearly specified words) that one of your grandparents told you"(saga).

These creations can participate in competitions and can be awarded. Benefits can be multiple: develop constructive competition, give examples, share with colleagues and, last but not least, develop creativity.

Children learn by imitating adult behaviour. That is why the advice of specialists is "to take time for our own creativity".

Creativity in school can be educated and developed through many types of activities in all education subjects. One of the tools to stimulate creativity is self-assessment.

Self-assessment is another process that forms confident and independent students, helps them actively think in different ways in which one can solve a problem, focusing on the process, not on the goals. Self- assessment develops skills to appreciate the own progresses. When the criteria and purposes are clearly specified, he focuses on more than to look for mistakes, collaborates, offers feedback, and develops objectivity.

The meta-cognitive thinking "prise de conscience" - whose founder was Piaget - represents the active and autonomous manner of its own formation. It enables the control of cognitive processes, organizational capacity, sequence of stages, planning and estimation of expected outcome.

A proposal to modify the manner in which the stages are handled within a lesson refers to the frequent introduction of self-assessment moments. The result will be notable in the register of intrinsic motivation, self-esteem and perseverance.

And if we judge self-assessment (along with assessment) as a subsystem of the social system, we have achieved an objective of helping the individual to position himself correctly in different types of interactions that shall render him a future placement (on the labour market) unaffected by the inconsistency of thestatus. The objectivity with which he has learned to assess himself will save him in the future from failing in unrealistic or illusory expectations, will responsibly identify his own minuses and will have the ability to issue value judgments for either improvement or design of a goal.

I could not conclude the analysis of the "human resource in education" without reminding the role of the parents, the family, or more precisely, how their involvement can influence, disturb and even alter the finality of the educational act designed by educators for the benefit of educators.

Current psychological studies show that pupils, especially young children, suffer from a lack of affectivity, which is due to the absence of parents for much of their child's life. This "hunger" of affection, in the plan of manifestations, unfolds on a wide field. Children become reactive, some sad, some fearful, self-contained or uncooperative. There is obviously no performance under these circumstances. As a consequence, the parent misunderstanding the cause of the inefficient management by the child of its own emotions and needs exerts even greater pressure on the child. The child will make efforts to fulfil his expectations. He will consume his resource inefficiently by trying to cope with pressure, and from here to imbalance is just one small step.

The parent must correctly understand the notion of involvement. Look at it with realism, offer options, show confidence. Proper involvement in the child's life may be a motivational factor, but when imposed standards are unrealistic, the effect may be devastating. Coercion and punishment disrupt performance. This kind of parenting causes the occurrence of blockages and severe behavioural disorders.

Harmonious development involves valorization, supporting, encouraging awareness that every good thing is done for your own development, putting this asset into practice, encouraging passions, warm, compliant climate and joy.

I do not think that this can be directly imputed to the school. I would not even have what. What school can do is to signal to parents the change of child's behaviour and school results in order to achieve a parent's congruence and collaboration as a partner in the joint effort to form a desirable personality.

Another issue of parents' inappropriate involvement refers to the pressure they exert on the teacher by asking for "quantity". As a result, they work much and not always efficient in class: sheets, collections, ancillary staff, additional training for various school competitions, etc., based on the idea that much should be good too. And many teachers, in order to avoid conflicts with parents, give up at this pressure, forgetting that they have attended a school where they learned the methodology of teaching all education subjects, forgetting that they are specialists who learnt psychology and pedagogy, mitigating quality in this way. How can I otherwise see a situation where the child did not understand how a mathematical problem is properly judged, but has to work at least ten plus two sheets plus four pages from a collection? How has it occurred that this child does not know how to judge a problem? The answer is simple. The method of solving a problem in mathematics involves the following mandatory steps, and nothing justifies omitting any of them.

Thus, in order to solve a problem, it is necessary to observe the following steps - the learning by the student of the predication of the problem. For the purpose that the student learns the predication, it is necessary to read the problem, then to explain unknown words or expressions. If there are students who fail to understand or represent the context described in the problem, discussions are held on the content and/or appeals to intuitive means that should lead to an understanding of the text are made. Then the problem data is written, its schematization, and the problem is repeated. This step is mandatory because it provides the teacher with feedback on the assimilation of the predication. Only now follows the examination or judgment of the problem, the drafting of the resolution plan and the actual solution. I things do not stop here.Additional activities in writing follow and materialize in the numerical expression to adequately solve the problem, looking for all solutions to the problem, if the problem admits more, composing problems of the same type, and finally trying to "complicate" the problem, i.e. find also other possible questions or extensions for it, possibly by changing or inserting new data. This stage is the one that contributes to the development of divergent thinking, to the cultivation of creativity. That's how the book provides that a problem is correctly solved. I wonder, however, how many reach the solving of problems in this last stage. Because in this methodically correct manner, only one or two problems are solved in one hour.And because the student has only one problem solved in an hour, the teacher risks being judged as incompetent in comparison to other teachers and eventually indicted. And then, in order not to complicate himself, the teacher compresses as much as he can, being aware that he renounces to quality in favour of quantity. But that's what is requested ...

Another highly discussed issue is the need to rethink the curriculum and the quality of school textbooks, the latter partially non-compliant to the psycho-pedagogical requirements, some of which are "guilty" of precarious scientific content (!) How do they arrive on the desks? Have decision-makers learnt about the utterly unfounded grievances concerning the quality of textbooks? Do they have anything to say about the team that made possible the printing of such (study!)materials? We speak of expertise, responses to all statements and reactions that have been largely objective. I can only wish these questions were not just rhetorical.

The option of digital textbooks, especially in the current context of digitization, should be welcomed. It's just that the curricular support that arrived in schools is far from what teachers have been expecting. The projection referred to interactive content, which requires students to process them, or additional information to supplement those that were representing the nucleus of the lesson's core knowledge, a prolongation of the basic support, an extension. However, what we currently call digital handbook is an identical copy of the basic support (classic manual), but in electronic form. I personally do not see their usefulness, or perhaps only to the extent that I explain a possible tendency to convert the classical formative trajectories, meaning that the culture of the didactic approach based on the traditional support - the printed textbook - disappears altogether. And this could be possible, because we live in the era claiming communication only on basis of technique. This phenomenon has naturally also its advantages and disadvantages, but the most profound disadvantage that I identify is depersonalization - handwriting conveys a personalized message - and the suppression of the emotional side of communication will result in a spiritless, dilutedcommunication, which at some point will also lead to the cancellation of the teacher's job, as long as writing is no longer learned in schools and the Internet abounds in tutorials of all kinds.

Education should be viewed within the broad context of bio-psychosocial transformations in a given spatial-temporal coordinate system. Although the realities of Romania are different, I think it would help if we learn from the good practices that more clever people than us offer.I chose for exemplification purposes Finland and not necessarily because it provides a steady model of the extremely good results of the PISA Student Program, where it occupies the leading position in Europe, but for many other reasons I will present below.[22]

Education in Finland is the most important vector and a true reporting axis for all the other segments of the administration. Finland does not have a "secret ingredient" about which everybody speaks, but it has well-established educational and social strategies and policies.

Thus, one important issue to remember is that the Finnish government subsidizes the research-based master's degree - a prerequisite for a teaching position. In 2012, the Helsinki University received 2300 applications for the 120 places in the training program of the primary didactic staff. At such a competition, followed by the condition of a 5 to 7.5 year-probation (only then they are allowed to run their own class), it is easy to understand why Finland grants teachers a high level of autonomy in classrooms. They have a great deal of freedom in the management of the curriculum applied to their own class.

Another educational strategy emphasizes both equality between schools and students. The state offers resources to help weaker pupils to recover. All teachers are prepared to homogenize collectives.

Finnish teachers have personalized methods for assessing students' performances. The paradox is that, although they do not have standardized tests (they do not see their utility because their human aspect must take precedence in their philosophy), their pupils get the best results at international tests.

Finnish children start school at the age of seven (although informally they start it earlier), and children's "well-being" is cultivated in all school activities and outside it. They have fewer lessons and more time for "play and joy".

In Finland there are very few private schools and even schooling fees are forbidden. The vast majority of children attend public schools.93% of students are graduates of secondary school or of a vocational school, and the State will still pay for schooling to one of the 8 national universities. The percentage of those continuing higher education -66%, is one of the largest in the European Union.

Conclusions

Inthis analysis, I have punctually addressed certain issues embodied in applications in different education subjects, but we addressed the shortcomings in a general way, related to curriculum, textbooks, teaching style. Though treated in a general way, I think they form an aggregateleading to a decrease in implicit and university school performance, including plagiarism, the theme that is the subject of this paper.

I tried an analysis of the Romanian school in its entirety but, as I think it was noticed, my concern lies more with the primary education area due to the following reasons: it is the school cycle where the first bricks are placed, the age of the most important acquisitions, both cognitive and behavioural-attitudinal: learning writing, reading, adding, assuming and applying. Their formative and valorization role will accompany the child in all future steps to impose and capitalize the self.

I am convinced that the quality of the foundation depends on the solidity of the edifice.

Education shapes the future and the future that we dream of depends on the qualityof the current teaching projection.

The question I asked myself when I proposed this approach was the following: "In the multitude of deficiencies that the Romanian school suffers of, what can we do to balance it?" Of course what I found as"cracks", refer only to a part of what should be improved. I do not claim that I accomplished a complete radiography of the education system or that I have found the best "healing" solutions. Besides, I did not intend to look for all the negative aspects that the school of the present times is guilty of. I just wanted to identify those that favour the appearance of the germ of plagiarism. And I think I succeeded. Only that the shortcomings I am talking about do not refer to the school with its walls (impersonal form). Although it refers to the institution, the shortcomings are attributed directly to people, namely behaviours and attitudes, which take different forms. And then, where is the "sublime" in education, where is the art in education? Hegel said that "education is the art of making man ethical." Probably also those who should practice this art lack the ingredient that would call them artists - that ingredient called "creativity." And perhaps they lack even "ethics."

But there would be too much to say. Or maybe too tough. Perhaps there is no lack of ethics, but adaptation to the contextual framework. Thus, on the contrary, in the notion of shortcomings, the majority of teachers in Romania (admit that its is a small flock that has not a black sheep) has the same merits as those of the high-performance education systems, and one more merit: to adapt, in an attempt to make it possible to perform on quite a rough terrain, with a large number of students in classes, with loaded school curricula, inadequate textbooks, decisions that suffer from unpredictability and amateurism, incompetence and carelessness, lack of appreciation, and to recognize the authority of the psycho-pedagogue.

The Romanian teacher forms competences, enriching its model of professional competence with abilities that those from the education systems with tradition in Europe do not have: with resistance to pressure, aligning the technical coordinates with the action-ones, maximizing the few resources to reach the projected finalities, i.e. the ability to crack the whip...

I wonder what the Romanian education system would look like if this huge potential from the chair, materialized in creativity, resistance to stress, adaptability, resilience, empathy, vision and perspective, would be also duplicated by supportand especially, if they understand that it is imperiously necessary that these constants are perpetual.

When I get the answer to this question, I will ask the next one: "Is enough attention paid (and I am not referring to the attention of the press, but to the school) to plagiarism?" But only then, considering that one is a consequence of the other, mandatorily in that order. And then I would dare to formulate opinions in which to include the word "ethics".

Without accents and percentages!

DEONTOLOGY AND ETHICS –SOME DETAILS ON THE VIOLATIONS OF RULES IN SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH ACTIVITY AND THEIR SANCTIONING

Corina DABIJA (BARDĂ)

Abstract

This study concentrates on ethics and deontology rules which apply in the scientific research activity and has the aim to outline the main violations encountered in practice and their correlative sanctions. The topic is treated both from a philosophical perspective and from a legal point of view, linking ethical theories with real situations. This analysis illustrates our vision regarding the terminology of academic ethics and also presents the main legal, international and national instruments in this respect. Research findings are presented taking into account the more complex framework of collective morality and highlight the causes for which people are tempted to circumvent imposed requirements.

Keywords: morals, ethics, deontology, scientific research, violations and sanctions

1. Introduction

The themes of this study focuses on certain aspects of ethics in general, containing detail mentions with regard to the rules of ethics and deontology as pertaining to the scientific research activity. More specifically, for this theme, we will take into account the possible infringements of the rules invoked, together with their correlative penalties.

The importance of this work comes directly from the main purpose of the intervention, that is, to create a very relevant informational data medium, analyzing elements of a - continuously evolving and of interest - subsection of academic ethics. At the same time, it is a scope, the shaping of an overview of the various evolutions pertaining to ethics in the broadest sense, through the analysis of segments among the numerous theme correlative notions, as well as highlighting changes we can deem fundamental in the field. Giving examples regarding the practical use of the information presented is intended to be completed by the presentation of real situations, through the lens of ethical theories.

The means through which we want to achieve the said scope is that of researching the provisions of international laws pertaining to this field, as well as those of the relevant national legislation, together with the analysis of publications which take into account the philosophical dimension of such concepts. Examining the afore mentioned will lead to an assertion of the main ideas in the area, and of personal theoretical conclusions, all of the said designed in a style that should be accessible to all those interested in this field and not only to the specialists in legal sciences.

By this synthetic analysis, having as a major scope the rules of ethics and deontology in the scientific research endeavors, it is desired to complete the list of available information from the specialized papers at this time. Even if the doctrine cannot be considered insufficient in this respect, it is essential that it be added new research, which meet the challenge of being in agreement, from several perspectives, with this dynamic area.

1.1. Conceptual clarification

Pythagoras claimed that for you, the man, the first law should be that you respect... yourself. Keeping with the same reasoning, we would add that each person is the first judge of their ethics, but "the morals of each individual is rational when analyzed by comparison with the morals of society."[1]. The usage of two concepts, "ethical" and "moral", the first of Greek origin, -ethos, the second having its roots in the Latin mores, often overlaps in the common contemporary language. One explanation could be that the basic meaning of the initial terms is the same, namely that of "habit".

According to Cecilia Tohăneanu[2], in philosophy, many of the authors[3], deem the two terms to have different meaning which, although in close connection, are far from identical. Through the lens of morality, good and evil appear sketched as absolute standards. Just as absolute is deemed the duty of distinguishing between approving what is considered good and blaming, slandering, separating ourselves, as through a wall, (by) what is evil. If this applies to morals, ethics is different at least through the fact that it "approaches good and evil taking into account the imperative of reciprocity between people, the need to facilitate their common life. Thus, the difference between ethics and morals is the social dimension."[4]. Therefore, for this dimension we pick as a central term coexistence, while we can look at solidarity, empathy and tolerance as sine qua non values of contemporary ethics.

Without attempting to exhaust the meaning of this notion, we should add that the doctrine distinguishes between philosophical ethics and "regular" one, which refers to "a collection of standards in regards to which a group of community of people decide to regulate their behaviour - in order to separate what is legitimate or acceptable in pursuing their goals by that which is not"[5]. On the other hand, in general, philosophical ethics deals with the study of a set of principles, it is a theory about "people's life as people"[6]. While staying within the same scope and continuing with a similar type of classification - general (not exhaustive) - we would like to add that, in turn, philosophical ethics includes two big categories, namely theoretical ethics or "moral philosophy"[7] and meta-ethics. The later aims to research exactly the notions used for this subject, analyzing the veracity of justifications for the formulated theories.

Moral philosophy draws guiding lines, with the potential of finding applicability in the collective behaviour, regardless of the particular one. Where does my right or liberty begins and where does it end (if it does)? This question started effervescent debates among today's children - the most often we hear "My right ends where yours begins" or "I can enjoy my right as much as I wish, but without disturbing others. They have their rights, too, maybe the same as mine, maybe some others" - and such debates create all the conditions to remind us that two decades ago, the same kind of statements were the leitmotifs of such discussions. "How should people act or behave, what should they do and what they shouldn't?"[8] is the question theoretical ethics, a normative subject, tries to answer.

Meanwhile, we answer this question daily, due to the fact that many of the dozens of decisions we make imply decisions based upon ethics or morality (most of the times, without even realizing it). In this case, we can legitimately assert that the existence of the principles of this subject matter was embedded in the collective consciousness, the example of the children being just one of the many situations with the potential to be invoked in support of this idea. The naturalness with which such situations are approached (or not) is reflected both in the private behavior and the collective one, thus we can say, without doubt, that "Morality is so present in our lives that so often we no longer see it... Just in difficult or dilemma inducing situations do we become conscious of the ethical weight or decision making[9]. It may seem that morality involves many requirements, sometimes seemingly or actually contradictory, and we, rational human beings, find ourselves face to face with the difficulty of choice: what actions are allowed, what actions we shouldn't undertake, and, especially, what are our guiding principles. In essence, this is how the big moral theories were born, true ethical systems containing rules which manage to determine what is correct from a moral standpoint.

At this point of our analysis, we want to note that "they very rarely differ from the recommendations given for the daily, mundane cases (all these theories, for basic situations, tell us we should do pretty much the same thing)". Regarding differences, we like to add that they appear "more likely... in the justification and theoretical grounds for normative requirements." Being aware that we are not dwelling in the most appropriate context for analyzing such theories in detail, we believe, however, appropriate to mention the most important ones: deontology - or the theory of the duty of Immanuel Kant, utilitarianism - or "theory of the largest delights"[10] of John Stuart Mill, and, of course, the ethics of virtue - having a founding father in Aristotle.

Continuing our brief classification, we will skip the specificity of descriptive ethics (without wishing to minimize its meaning), in order to approach applied ethics, as it presents elements closer to the focus of this paper. Petre Singer[11] is one of the main proponents of this subject and he maintains that the value of rules ranking as principles is confirmed by their direct applicability in various contexts of human activity. Otherwise, aside the fact that it can be considered a script of form without substance, the very theoretical nobility is diluted –"…an ethical judgment with no practical value has a theoretical deficiency, too"[12]. Applied ethics is a field of ethics which becomes stronger and stronger nowadays and refers to the application of ethical principles in certain domains of activity, being made up of rules adapted to the specificity of the respective (professional) activity. As an example, we mention the following subdivisions or directions of applied ethics: medical ethics, political ethics, environment ethics, animal rights ethics, ethical aspects regarding technology and digital issues, administrative ethics, legal ethics, academic ethics. A practice gaining popularity is the codification of specific rules for each domain through instruments with a "particular" title, which don't have a general applicability but intended recipients, like, for example, a certain professional group.

2.1. Academic Ethics. Essential elements.

Next we will cover a segment of academic ethics, namely the rules of ethics and deontology in the scientific research activity. Even if certain elements of the aforementioned seem not to be in direct connection with our topic, we believe they constitute a greatly summed up presentation of the notions with which we shall work, that could not be eliminated, for the sake of consistency. Moreover, "the common morality" and the important historical theories of ethics are useful for contextualizing and understanding situations specific to academic ethics. Reader PhD Emanuel Socaciu[13] states that "It would be strange should we discover that the ethical duties we have as professors, researchers or students are constantly contradicting our more general duties we have as human beings" - an opinion we support ans regarding which we would like to add that the relationship between the two can be seen as one from the whole to the part but that, exactly this interaction represents, at the same time, the reason for which we might find ourselves in a dilemma - something harder to identify in practice, but plausible.

Customizing, academic institutions or organizations are susceptible of being one of the "spaces" where acts which contradict morality take place, because the people who work under the coordination of or for the said institution find themselves, as we all do, in the situation of having "… morally debatable options, because we don't find in ourselves the means to resist temptation"[14]. Thus, they are also subjected to "akrasia"[15]. Moreover, the above are valid because the subject matter of academic ethics is the result of the convergence of multiple aspects, including some regulatory ones, having to do with research ethics, professional ethics, but also the management of ethics and integrity in academic organizations.

To the extent in which we will continue to illustrate the main breaches of ethics and deontology rules in the scientific research activity, as well as the ways to punish such breaches, we deem it important to start from establishing which are the possible causes making a person commit these breaches. One of the situations for which we could find relatively convenient solutions (but which is surely not the main cause for immoral or illicit actions) would be that in which people breach the rules because they do not know them, they do not know their obligations – "The morality deficit is not, most of the times, generated by a lack of knowledge"[16]. In such a hypothesis, accessing the information or conceiving and implementing an educational program in this regard could be a salutary, immediately applicable solution. Still, studies show that most of the breaches are committed knowingly, the lack of motivation to do things right from the moral standpoint being the missing element - and thus the link to akrasia. However, we believe in the importance of being informed and debating, in the fact that the aforementioned give birth to the premises which can create the intrinsic will to have an appropriate behaviour.

Before restricting the scope of our approach to the juridical dimension of ethics and deontology in the scientific research activity, we would add a few conceptual considerations connected with the "interferences" between morals/ethics and law, meant to support us in the following analysis.

According to Kant, in relation to its "decisive impulses"[17], the law can be of two types - juridical (which institutes obligations) and, respectively, ethical ("the idea of duty resulted from the law is, at the same time, the impulse to action"[18]). Therefore, the philosopher underlines that legality refers exclusively to compliance with the law (morals), while "morality means the determination of will by the moral law, to act based upon the respect for the moral law, no matter the consequences the human action will bring"[19]. Duty appears as a common element between law and morals, but both have ample specificity[20]. In connection to them we will limit ourselves to mentioning two aspects. First of all, the laws represent the encoding of rules meant to keep the social peace and equilibrium and don't have universal applicability, as it should happen in case of moral rules. Probably, in an ideal society, the laws would pass the moral test and between the two concepts there would be an almost complete overlap, but in our situation, here is the first major difference: only the obligations having a juridical nature can be imposed by using coercion, too.

But what is the place of deontology (deontos means what is appropriate, logos - science) in this scheme? Because it refers, in essence, to the rules pertaining to the exercise of a profession, we find deontology at the border between law and morals, or, more likely, in the convergence area of the two. It shows characteristics of both concepts – for example, a set of rules which regulate a type of professional behaviour. Part of those rules are established through legislation or contracts; the other category deals with rules which cannot be imposed by coercive force, the person's conduct being possibly sanctioned at most by the public opinion (moral rules)[21]. We cannot neglect the fact that there is a tendency to codify multiple deontological norms, for example, in a Code of Ethics, which can suggest, leaving differences aside, the thin demarcation line between "legal" rules and moral ones.

The successful achievement of professional ethics stipulations could be translated by the fact that the "reciprocal expectations[22]" of a professional community and those of the community in general could be fulfilled, the general success being interdependent upon the fulfillment of obligations by both "parties". An obvious trend is present also regarding academic ethics, respectively the ever growing preoccupation[23] for it, which, although referring also to elements which were subject of debate "from the dawn of modernity… the field experienced a significant self reliance in the last 20-25 years, especially as a need to give an articulate theoretical answer to requests coming from bodies funding research and education, and from the public opinion, too"[24]. For the academia, given its nature, we think it is absolutely normal that society has expectations, hopes, higher wishes regarding ethics, and doesn't limit itself exclusively to the aspects stated by legal norms.

Narrowing the area of our discussion to the ethics of scientific research, we wish to underline that the elements related to it show a variety of forms, which should answer to an entire palette of equally challenging issues, which manifest starting from choosing a theme through bringing results into the public space and obtaining an eventual profit. The doctrine shows the analysis of two meanings of this concept; the first refers to scientific ethics seen as an "area of theoretic reflection, in which moral dilemmas which can appear in the research activity appear, or… normative proposals for the approach of such dilemmas"[25]. Obviously, the dilemmas are very varied, each field of research having its own specific issues, "classic" in this regard, but there can be new issues with the development of each particular case.

A second meaning of the notion we bring into discussion takes into account an institutional system, through which the regulations in force pertaining to the matter are put into practice. Among others, it contains the bodies which grant an opinion on ethics for a research project, but also those which supervise compliance with regulations, or work to their development, in order to harmonize it with the new social developments[26].

2.2. The legal dimension of ethics and deontology in scientific research.

2.2.1. Historical perspective, international rules

The great number and diversity of issues which can appear in this matter, as well as the specificity of each particular research field - aspects we already mentioned - are factors which make the application of good practices and customs popular, but which, at the present time, the legal stipulations can no longer be ignored, and they institute a pretty comprehensive framework. The rules of ethics and deontology in scientific research which are applicable in our country, too, are stated, mainly, at the following levels: international, European Union, national or of the various institutions involved in the process of education and research. An essential role in respect to the understanding and interpretation of such provisions is played by jurisprudence.

These rules were absolutely necessary, given the subjectivity with which each individual appreciates what is allowed or not from the academic ethical and deontological point of view. Thus, "benchmarks for human behaviours… rules through norms coming with sanction which can be applied generally, undifferentiated based upon the spatial or temporal context, and impersonal, undifferentiated based upon the respective actors or the researched subject"[27] are imposed. We would also like to add that the rules in question have as a scope both research itself and the exploitation of the research results.

Declaration of Helsinki[28], which has as its principal regulatory object medical research on human subjects, establishes a series of guidelines in this respect. By way of example, we mention: in research involving human subjects, their welfare shall prevail over any scientific or social interest; experimental procedures should be detailed in a protocol which must be submitted for the approval of the Revision Committee for Ethics; the participants in the study must agree, having been informed; informed consent must be documented; consent must be obtained under such conditions as to reduce to a minimum any inappropriate influence; the subjects participating in the study have the right to protect their own integrity. Another tool for the international coding of rules regarding conduct in medical scientific research is the Oviedo Covention, which regulates elements regarding bioethics and human dignity[29].

The rules governing today's scientific research in the medical field (involving human subjects) were designed as the international community's response to immoral medical experiments performed over time worldwide and culminated with those occurring during the Nazi regime[30]. According to the Scientific Research Ethics Committee of the University of Bucharest, after Second World War, appalling abuses committed by some Nazi doctors were discovered. These subjected the prisoners to inhumane scientific experiments, because of which, most often, death occurred (Acad. M. Dinu Antonescu, president of the National Bioethics Commission for Medicines and Medical Devices provides the following examples in an interview: Dr. Joseph Mengele - experiments on twins at Auschwitz; Dr. Sigmund Rascher -freezing experiments at Dachau and Auschwitz; Dr. Erwin Ding Schuler -immunization experiments at Sachsenhausen, Dachau, Natzweiler, Buchenwald). All these occurred without informing the "patients" and, obviously, without their consent. Classified as crimes against humanity, the acts were tried at the Nuremberg Tribunal and have resulted in "adopting a first code of good moral conduct in scientific research, inspired by this historical episode's mistakes: the Nüremberg Code"[31]. Please note that the new elements introduced by this Code were: "informed consent; risk-benefit analysis (development of a theory of risk in ethics); recognition of subject's right to withdraw of the experiment at any time, without being penalized"[32].

Because drawing up a complete list of international legal norms regarding ethics and deontology in scientific research would demand a separate study, having it as it's main object, we will limit ourselves to name juridical instruments which are interesting through the fact that, although this is not their main scope, they contain stipulations regarding scientific research correlative to the field they regulate. We consider the following: The Treaty on the Non-proliferation of Nuclear Weapons[33] ; The Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction (opened for signature at London, Moscow and Washington on April 10, 1972)[34] ; the international conventions on chemical or biological weapons.

We cannot end the segment dedicated to international regulations without reference to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights - adopted and proclaimed on 10 December 1948 by the UN General Assembly, by resolution 217- which was designed to become "a common standard of achievement for all the peoples of the world, thus gaining the vocation to become a true fundamental law of humanity[35]. The preamble of the declaration begins with the following words: "Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity of all members of the human family and of their equal and inalienable rights is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world...", which gives an essential meaning to the value of dignity, which is reiterated in the first sentence of Article 1: "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights." Even if we can not support that this Statement refers explicitly to academic ethics, it has a special importance, because it is an indisputable source for the theme of ethics in general. We are arguing this idea because liberty, justice and peace in the world have as a basis, aside equal and inalienable rights for all persons (thus, also in front of moral norms), the recognition of their inherent dignity. Dignity is, also, a special value from the perspective of moral philosophy, Kant himself being the suporter of the idea that the one who is moral would not be necessarily happy, but will obtain something much more important, namely the dignity of being happy.

Mentions about dignity, considered to be a "general human value"[36], also appear in those constitutional stipulations which can be considered as sources for ethics. The first indication of this is found in the very first article of the fundamental law, specifically the third paragraph, which lists the supreme values guaranteed by the state: "…human dignity, the citizens' rights and freedoms, the free development of the human personality, justice and political pluralism"[37].

Another relevant stipulation is article 30, which enshrines, in the first paragraph, the freedom of expression, considered an essential value for any democratic society: "Freedom of expression of thoughts, opinions, or beliefs, and freedom of any creation, by words, in writing, in pictures, by sounds or other means of communication in public are inviolable."[38]. Of course, this is not an absolute freedom, it is subject to legal restrictions, in order to protect other essential values for society, next to which the freedom of expression must coexist. As exactly the same article governs, one of these values is dignity - "Freedom of expression shall not be prejudicial to the dignity, honour, privacy of a person, and to the right to one's own image."[39].

Among the myriad constitutional provisions relevant for the ethics field, we would like to add article 57, because we deem it relevant for the scope of the present study. It establishes two essential legal principles for the regime of rights and liberties, respectively good faith in exercising them and the respect for other persons' rights. The obligation to respect these principles is incumbent on both Romanian citizens and foreigners and stateless persons. The concept of bona fides is a traditional principle of civil law, but it was and will be a key concept of morality[40].

The fundamental law is again that which, through article 148, second paragraph, consecrates the priority of European Union law over opposite stipulations in the internal legislation. Among the priority laws should be considered, besides the European Union's primary legislation, the derivative one (but only the mandatory acts - the regulation; directive and decision, for recipients); also, in certain cases, the norms coming from external commitments, jurisprudence, general principles of law. Without detailing the technical and juridical issues such a priority implies, or the numerous situations in which this constitutional article finds applicability, we deem relevant in the present context to underline that there are various regulations at the level of the European union which have, among others, as their scope the ethics in the scientific research. We give as an example Directive 2001/20/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 April 2001 on the ownership of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States relating to the implementation of good clinical practice in the conduct of clinical trials on medicinal products for human use[41].

Related to scientific research at European Union level we add, as a curiosity, that there is a guide for this subject matter, which suggests focusing exclusively on the non-military, civilian research activities. It is interesting to follow this guide, which we consider will have an evolution in the direction of opening also towards "military research", for the purpose of collective defense, given the international contemporary context, but also current challenges, like the threat posed by terrorism, which the European construct must face.

Nationally, there are a number of regulatory documents governing, from different perspectives, academic ethics and integrity. We will give a short selection of those we consider relevant for the matter of ethics and deontology rules in the activity of scientific research, underlining the most common violations appearing in practice, as well as their correlative sanctions. A specialized journal expresses the idea that "using scientific research methods implies, ipso facto, compliance with deontological and ethical rules which form integrity regarding research"[42]- an opinion we support -, agreeing, also, that "it cannot be a valid method of scientific research that which does not respect the deontological and ethical rules". Examples are given of : plagiarism, falsifying scientific data, eliminating some results invalidating the hypothesis which is supposed to be demonstrated by the act of research.

The framework for research and development activities is established through the Government Ordinance no. 57/2002 regarding scientific research and technological development and contains: "scientific research (which includes fundamental and applied research), experimental development and innovation based upon scientific research and experimental development"[43].

The Order no.4492/2005 on the promotion of professional ethics in universities establishes the obligation of accredited or authorized to operate provisionally higher education institutions to adopt a Code of Ethics of the University, which should stipulate for the ideals and principles, but also the standards of professional ethics which the members of the concerned academic community shall undertake to comply with. The code of ethics is mandatory and, as a general rule, is part of the Charter of the University[44], containing also correlative sanction for the failure to comply with the obligations imposed. A new requirement the institutions need to comply with, according to this Order, is that of establishing, coordinated by the University Senate, a University Ethics Commission, having attributions related, mainly, to the analysis and settlement of claims regarding breaches of university ethics. All the University commissions of accredited or authorized to operate provisionally higher education institutions are monitored, can receive consultancy on the development and application of ethic codes. Practically, they are in a certain measure subordinate to the University Ethics Council, established at the Ministry of Education, as stipulated in the aforementioned Order.

We believe, however, that the legislative act which represents the principal basis of the subject matter of our analysis is the Law no. 206/2004, with subsequent amendments and supplements, on the proper conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation. In article $2^1$ it states the facts which constitute violations from the rules of good conduct (referring both to research itself and to its evaluation and exploitation of results), as long as they are not considered crimes under criminal law. In order to emphasize the variety of violations that are likely to take place in practice, we will indicate a number of them, as they are covered by that Article:

- making up results or data and presenting them as experimental data, as data obtained through calculations or numerical computer simulations or as data or results obtained through analytic calculation or deductive reasoning;
- forging of experimental data, data obtained through calculations or numerical computer simulations or of data or results obtained through analytic calculation or deductive reasoning;
- deliberate hindering, blocking or sabotaging the research and development activity of other persons, including by unjustified blocking of access to research and development premises, through the damaging, destroying or manipulating experimental equipment, equipment, documents, computer programs, data in electronic format, organic or inorganic substances or living matter needed by other persons for running, carrying out or completing research and development activities;
- plagiarism;
- self plagiarism;
- the inclusion in the list of authors of a scientific publication of one or more of the co-authors who have not contributed significantly to the publication, or the exclusion of co-authors who have contributed significantly to the publication;
- failure to observe confidentiality in assessment;
- the discrimination, within the framework of the assessment, on the grounds of age, ethnicity, gender, social origin, political or religious orientation, sexual orientation or other types of discrimination, with the exception of affirmative measures stipulated by law;
- abuse of authority in order to obtain the status of author or co-author of publications by subordinates;
- abuse of authority to unduly impose their own theories, concepts or results on subordinate persons.

In order to outline the complete framework of violations of good conduct in the scientific research activity, the provisions of Law no. 206/2004 must be read in conjunction with those of other normative acts. Among them, Law no. 1/2011, as mentioned right in Law No 206/2004, article 4, second paragraph: "Serious deviations from the proper conduct in the research and development activity are those referred to in Article 310 of Law no. 1/2011". This is the article text: "It is a serious offense against the conduct in scientific research and academic activity to: a) plagiarize the results or publications of other authors; b) make up the results or replace results with fictitious data; c) introduce false information in applications for grants and funding". We note, however, that this correlation between provisions of multiple laws establishing provisions on the ethics and deontology of scientific research must be carried out continuously and as a whole, as is the case for any subject matter, not only in the case of these specific references. By way of example, we note another provision of the National Education Law which has a bearing on our subject, namely that which provides for the establishment of the Council for University Ethics and Management, as a body of the Ministry of National Education, unincorporated and aimed at developing the culture of ethics and integrity in Romanian Universities[45].

Returning to Law no. 206/2004, in its provisions we can also find the procedures, but also the competent bodies which are to establish whether or not an infringement was committed. In case the answer is yes, one or more sanctions, as the case may be, could be applied, by the management of the unit where the person who is the author of such infringement activates or by the National Council for Ethics[46] – while in compliance with the procedures established by the present law. Of these, we mention:

- written warning;
- the withdrawal and/or correction of all the works published by breaking the rules of good conduct;
- reduction of the basic salary, combined, where appropriate, with the management, guidance and control pay;
- the dismissal from the management of the institution of research and development;
- the withdrawal of the academic teaching title or the degree in research or demotion;
- the disciplinary termination of employment contract.

3. Conclusions

The complexity of the subject we analyze is also reflected in the planned regulations applying to it, which is why we did not propose a thorough analysis of them, but wanted to give an overview that can be considered a starting point for further research and extensive peer review. On this line, we will add a few more normative acts which are important in the study of the matter: The Code of Professional Ethics and Deontology of Workers in Research and Development; Law no. 64/1991 regarding patents, republished, with subsequent changes and additions; Law no. 129/1992 regarding the protection of drawings and industrial models, republished; Law no. 8/1996 regarding copyright and related rights, with subsequent changes and additions; The Code of Academic Doctoral Studies.

As mentioned, the academic ethics field is a complex one, and at the moment it surely passes through a transformation that we courageously call evolution (or, at least, we dare to hope that this is the manner it will finally result), despite turbulent times which, we must admit, affect it (or, more properly said, affects its authors).

Certainly, our study did not exhaust elements pertaining to theories, ethical principles, practical examples, nor the aspects of the juridical dimension regarding the violation of ethical and deontology rules in the activity of scientific research, reason for which we express our conviction that this analysis will be expanded in future research.

As we began by remembering Pythagoras's words, respectively "your first law should be to respect yourself", we will close by underlining Nicolae Bagdasar's words, presented in the introduction to one of the works of Immanuel Kant[47]: "... act outwardly in such a way that the free use of your own free will may coexist with everyone's freedom, according to a universal law..."[48].

AUTOPLAGIARISM AND SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH ACTIVITY

Cristian Răzvan CERCEL[*]

Abstract

Writing a PhD thesis involves a long and profound scientific research activity. In this context of research, a number of incident factors may lead to the elaboration of a PhD thesis that is original or not. Some of these factors would be plagiarism and autoplagiarism. This paper aims to highlight the issue of plagiarism and autoplagiarism in the context of scientific research activity, while at the same time reaching some essential points regarding the intellectual property right. Last but not least, this paper aims to present some issues related to the current regulation of plagiarism and autoplagiarism, through legal provisions aimed at ensuring good conduct in the scientific research and development activity, but also their relations with the rules on the protection of intellectual property rights.

Keywords: Intellectual property right, copyright, plagiarism, research activity, autoplagiarism

1. Introduction

1.1. Intellectual property right

In order to understand the phenomenon of plagiarism and autoplagiarism, the matter that governs and protects scientific, literary works, copyright and not only has to be identified. So, before we come to the essence of the issue, we will present some essential elements about the importance of intellectual property right.

In the doctrine, the intellectual property right was defined as "the set of legal rules regulating the relations regarding the protection of intellectual creation in the industrial, scientific, literary and artistic fields, as well as distinctive signs of trade activity"[1].

However, it is also shown that, "in accordance with international provisions, which have been taken up in our domestic law, the intellectual property right has two sub-branches: a. copyright and rights related to copyright; b. industrial property"[2].

Thus, the notion of copyright has several meanings: (i) the legal institution that includes the rules and principles applicable to intellectual creation; (ii) the subjective right itself, which belongs to the author of a work.

Copyright has been defined in the literature as "the set of legal rules governing the social relations that arise from the creation, publication and exploitation of copyrighted works[3], namely: all works in literary, scientific, artistic, musical, cinematographic, visual art, architecture, maps etc., these being exemplified in Art.7 and Art.8 of the Law no.8/1996 on copyright and related rights."[4]

As far as copyright subjects are concerned, it should be noted that "author" has several meanings. In a first sense, author means "the creator of the literary, scientific or artistic work", and in a second sense, "author" means the person from whom, in favour or on behalf of another person, a right or obligation or a universality of rights and obligations is transferred[5]. To conclude, the subject of copyright is the person in whose favour the copyright is acknowledged, so we cannot put the mark of equality between the capacity of author of a work and the capacity of copyright holder.

Therefore, in the literature it is stated that "the author (s) of the intellectual creation work is/are the person (s) who created the works, and the copyright owner is the person who acquired/owns the copyright on an intellectual creation work. But, if the identity between the capacity of author of the work and that of copyright holder of a work does not exist, then the rights enjoyed by the author and, where appropriate, the subject of copyright, are different. Only the author of the work, the primary subject, enjoys all rights"[6].

The location of the matter in this issue is Law no.8/1996 on copyright and related rights. Art.3 para.(1) stipulates that the subject of copyright may be only the natural person or natural persons who created the work, per a contrario, the legal person may not be the subject of copyright. This is a natural issue because the legal person is a creation of law that is not capable of performing a literary work, for example. The legal person lacks those elements specific to man, such as intelligence, emotion, creativity, originality, etc., which prevents it from expressing its personality through a work, and therefore is not original in the sense of copyright.

Further, according to Art.4 para.(1), it is presumed to be author, unless the contrary is proved, the person under whose name the work was first brought to the attention of the public. The law establishes a relative presumption, which can be overturned by any means of proof. Thus, it is obvious the interest the author has to bring to the attention of the public the work he has done.

As shown in the doctrine, the author of a work acquires, by the creation and the power of the law, the capacity of subject of copyright. "But the capacity of author and the capacity of subject of copyright are two distinct notions: if the former is a matter of fact, the second is a matter of law; as we will see, a person may have the capacity of author without having the capacity of subject of copyright and vice versa; a legal person may not have the capacity of author, but may be the subject of copyright prerogatives; the capacity of author derives from a legal fact, the capacity of subject of copyright derives from a legal document."[7]

1.2. Scientific research activity

Scientific research activity is a factor contributing to the social and economic development and implicitly is a fundamental component in the writing of a scientific paper, especially a PhD thesis.

Research activity, in the form of scientific research, consists of theoretical activities carried out mainly in order to acquire new knowledge without aiming, in particular, the immediate application or use[8].

This matter is governed by Law no. 206/2004 on good conduct in scientific activity, technological development and innovation.

As stated in Law no. 206/2004, as it appeared in its original form at the time of entry into force, the research activity is based on a series of rules and principles. As early as in Art.1 of this law, it is shown that:

"(1) Ethics in scientific research, technological development and innovation activities, hereinafter referred to as research and development activities, is based on a set of moral principles and procedures for their compliance.

(2) The moral principles and procedures for their compliance are those incorporated in the Code of Ethics and Professional Deontology of research and development staff, elaborated by the state authority for research and development.*

(3) Compliance with these moral principles determines good conduct in the research and development activity."*

Therefore, ethics, moral principles and good conduct are an integral part of scientific research activity and play an important role in making a work, regardless of its type, which fulfils the condition of originality.

In Art.2 para.(1) of the aforementioned law, it was stated that "the research and development activity must be carried out in respect for the human being and dignity as well as for the suffering of the animals, which must be prevented or minimized."

Also within the same Art., good conduct "must be carried out with the protection and restoration of the natural environment and ecological balance, ensuring their protection against any aggression produced by science and technology.", and this excludes: "a) hiding or removing unwanted results; b) making results; c) replacing results with fictitious data; d) deliberately distorted interpretation of results and deformation of conclusions; e) plagiarizing the results or publications of other authors; f) deliberately distorted presentation of the results of other researchers; g) not correctly assigning the paternity of a work; h) introducing false information in grant or funding applications; i) non-disclosing conflicts of interest; j) misappropriating research funds; k) non-recording and/or non-storing the results, as well as the erroneous recording and/or storage of the results; l) the lack of informing the research team, before the start of the project, regarding: salary rights, responsibilities, co-authorship, rights to research results, funding sources and associations; m) lack of objectivity in evaluations and non-compliance with confidentiality requirements; n) repeated publication or funding of the same results as scientific novelties."

Subsequently, the Law[9] indicated above was amended by Law no. 398 of October 30, 2006; Ordinance no. 28 of August 31, 2011; Ordinance no. 2 of January 19, 2016. The most important contribution to bringing the law in the current form and which brought the greatest changes was Ordinance no. 28/2011. Through this Ordinance, Art. 1 was amended and it was stipulated that: "(1) Good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation activities, hereinafter referred to as research and development activities, is based on a set of good conduct rules and procedures for their compliance. (2) The rules of good conduct are set out in this law and are supplemented and detailed in the Code of Ethics and Professional Deontology of research and development staff, hereinafter referred to as the Code of Ethics, provided by Law no. 319/2003 on the Status of research and development staff, as well as in the codes of ethics by field, elaborated according to Art.7 (b). (3) Procedures to comply with these rules are brought together in the Code of Ethics, in compliance with the provisions of this law and of the National Education Law no. 1/2011. (4) Compliance with these rules by the categories of staff carrying out research and development activities, stipulated in the* Law no. 319/2003, as well as by other categories of staff, from the public or private sector, benefiting from public research and development funds, determines the good conduct in the research and development activity.[10]"

At the same time, Art. 2 was amended, having the following content: "Rules of good conduct in research and development activity include: a) rules of good conduct in scientific activity; b) rules of good conduct in the communication, publication, dissemination and scientific popularization activity, including within the funding applications submitted within publicly funded project competitions; c) rules of good conduct in the activity of institutional evaluation and monitoring of research and development, evaluation and monitoring of research and development projects obtained through actions within the National Plan for Research, Development and Innovation and of people assessment for awarding degrees, titles, positions, prizes, distinctions, bonuses, certifications or certificates in the research and development activity; d) rules of good conduct in leading positions in research and development activity; e) rules of good conduct on respect for human being and dignity, avoiding the suffering of animals and protecting and restoring the natural environment and ecological balance.[11]"

Further on, it was introduced a new Art .2[1] where, in para.(2), it is shown that the deviations from the good conduct rules provided by Art. 2 (b), to the extent that they do not constitute a criminal offense under criminal law, include: a) plagiarism; b) autoplagiarism etc.

Thus, it can be noticed that, in the scientific research activity, plagiarism and autoplagiarism constitute serious violations, contrary to the rules of good conduct.

Before going into the issue of plagiarism and autoplagiarism, it should be noted that, in the case of PhD theses, an important ground is added, namely, GD 681/2011 on the approval of the Code of Doctoral Studies, together with the Annex regarding the Code of Doctoral Studies.

2.1. Plagiarism

According to The Explanatory Dictionary of the Romanian Language, to plagiarize means "to appropriate, to copy totally or partially someone's ideas, works, etc., presenting them as personal creations; to commit a literary theft." The word plagiarism entered the Romanian language vocabulary through the French word plagier, and has its etymology in the Latin word plagium, which, in Roman law, meant the kidnapping of a slave or a child.

Initially, in Law no. 206/2004, plagiarism was defined, in Art. 4 (d), as "the appropriation of the ideas, methods, procedures, technologies, results or texts of a person, regardless of the way they were obtained, presenting them as personal creation."

Subsequently, this article was amended by Ordinance no. 28 of 2011 whereby plagiarism was defined as "exposure, in a written work or oral communication, including in electronic format, of texts, expressions, ideas, demonstrations, data, hypotheses, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from written works, including in electronic format, of other authors, without mentioning this and without referring to the original sources".

The same definition of plagiarism is found in Order no. 3482/2016 of March 24, 2016 on the approval of the Regulation on the organization and functioning of the National Council for Attestation of University Titles, Diplomas and Certificates, issued by the Ministry of Education and Scientific Research.

"An author of scientific literature, in order not to be accused of plagiarism, must meet two essential conditions. Above all, he has the obligation to very clearly delimit his own ideas, interpretations and formulations from those of other authors, whose works he consulted during the documenting process. The second condition is originality: the work must be the result of an innovative synthesis and reflection effort, not just a concatenation of formulations and ideas taken from other sources, even if they are quoted correctly."[12]

Therefore, it is not enough for the author of a scientific/literary work to correctly indicate or quote the source of inspiration but he must also present an element of originality, the author's vision/perspective must be captured. Such a work or paper does not fulfil the condition of originality if it is merely a compilation of works, texts and paragraphs, either with accurate and precise indication of the source.

At the same time, as mentioned in the previous quote, the author of a scientific work must have a very clear delimitation between his own ideas, interpretations, formulations, expressions, etc. which do not belong in fact to the authors studied, their resumption, but in another form, but to be personal.

I believe that the condition of originality is fulfilled if the author brings an element of novelty, if he succeeds in putting the results of his research in another light and if he brings a point of view about the things envisaged in the documenting process.

Plagiarism knows several forms[13]. A first form is that of qualified/absolute plagiarism, when the plagiarist presents a work, regardless of its form, elaborated by someone else, as his own creation. Another form is plagiarism by copying from the original source, when the author copies paragraphs, passages he inserts into the paper/work and presents them as his own expressions, without indicating the source quoted. In this form of plagiarism is also included the takeover or use of quotes from the papers consulted, without indicating the original source or the source that originally consulted them. Another form of plagiarism is the use of footnotes after each sentence or paragraph, because no sentence or no paragraph belongs to the author, the condition of originality not being met. Partial plagiarism or partial compliance with the citation rules is the case where the author indicates the original source, but only for some of the ideas, and he paraphrases the rest of them or appropriates them as his own creation. Plagiarism by paraphrasing involves changing certain sentences, restructuring their word order or replacing words with synonyms and without indicating/quoting the source. If such a method is used, it is imperative that the author quotes the paraphrased source, because the idea is not original, it does not belong to him. This issue leads us to the last form of plagiarism, namely plagiarism by not using quotation marks, when the author, although indicating the source, does not put between the quotation marks the sentence/paragraph taken as such, leaving the impression that it is a paraphrasing.

Art. 310 of Law no. 1/2011 on the National Education Law, with the subsequent amendments and completions, stipulates that plagiarizing the results or publications of other authors are serious violations of good conduct in scientific research and academic activity.

Finally, it should be noted that, according to Art.20 para.(3) of GD 681/2011 regarding the approval of the Code of Doctoral Studies, plagiarism within the doctoral school is academic fraud, a violation of academic ethics and a deviation from good conduct in scientific research.

2.2. Autoplagiarism

After the above, regarding the issue of plagiarism, it is time to go to the quintessence of the present work, namely what autoplagiarism is and what problems it raises.

In Law no. 206/2004, with the subsequent amendments and completions, autoplagiarism was defined, in Art. 4 para.(1) (e), as being: "the exposure, in a written work or oral communication, including in electronic format, of texts, phrases, demonstrations, data, hypotheses, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from written works, including in electronic format, of the same author (s), without mentioning this and without referring to the original sources.[14]"

"The legal definitions of (plagiarism and autoplagiarism) share two cumulative requirements to qualify a deed as plagiarism and autoplagiarism: retrieving information from the categories listed, from other previously published works without mentioning this and without referring to the original sources.[15]"

As stated above, plagiarism and autoplagiarism represent, in accordance with Law 206/2004, deviations from the rules of good conduct in research and development activity.

At the same time, autoplagiarism is not a form of plagiarism, it is self-standing. In the case of autoplagiarism, the takeover is not done from the works of other authors, but from its own works, but without showing/indicating that the "new" work reproduces or copies a former work of the same author (s).

Plagiarism is a poor scientific conduct and also a deviation from the rules of good conduct in the research activity. This has to be discouraged, as it can lead to the unfounded professional recognition of an author by repeatedly publishing the same work in several forms or under multiple names, not being, in fact, several intellectual creation "products" but the same one.

A person is therefore responsible for autoplagiarism when it publishes, once again, under another title or with another content or in other context, a text or ideas from a text already published/made known to the public, presenting it as a new creation.

"Incriminating" autoplagiarism is justified because it prevents a person from obtaining scientific recognition without making an additional effort, by presenting the same work "endlessly" as a new and original one.

With the help of autoplagiarism, the author creates the false public impression that he is the author of several papers/works, being in fact just one, thus gaining undeserved benefits.

Like plagiarism, autoplagiarism knows many forms. A first form is qualified/absolute autoplagiarism, through which the author takes over entirely a work already made known to the public and changes its title; for example, the author changes the title of a book already released and presents it as a new own creation. Another form is partial autoplagiarism, through which the author takes passages, paragraphs, sentences (in full), from a previous own work and without indicating/quoting the previous source. Another form is "using your own text already published in a magazine or volume without requesting the publisher the right to publish (this is not just autoplagiarism but also the violation of intellectual property rights).[16]"

"The translation of a PhD thesis to be published in another country does not constitute autoplagiarism, but its use to get a new doctoral degree in that country is fraud.[17]"

I believe that textbooks, books and treatises appearing under a new edition are not circumscribed to autoplagiarism, because the author "warns" the reader that it is the same volume (as the one previously published) but in an edited form, by using the formula "x edition, revised and added", being obvious that it is the work of the same author, but in a new, edited and supplemented form.

It is important to note that autoplagiarism does not sanction the takeover of own ideas, texts, arguments expressed in a previous own work, but their takeover without mentioning that they are taken over, without referring to the original source.

Considering that the mission of the scientific research and development activity consists in the scientific development and the generation of new knowledge[18], it is easy to understand why autoplagiarism is a violation of the rules of good conduct in research and development activity.

3. Conclusions

The subject of plagiarism or autoplagiarism has been and is being debated for a long time in the Romanian press, overexciting the attention of the public.

Both plagiarism and autoplagiarism are defined in Romanian law but not also by Law no.8/1994 on copyright and related rights.

"Regulating and sanctioning plagiarism and autoplagiarism as "deviations from the rules of good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation" [the provisions of art. 2[1] para.(2) and of art. 14 para. (1[2]) and (2) of Law no. 206/2004], or as "serious deviations from good conduct in scientific research and academic activity" [the provisions of art. 310 of Law no. 1/2011 on national education] or as "[…] academic frauds, violations of academic ethics or deviations from good conduct in scientific research […]" [art. 20 para. (3) of GD no. 681/2011], distinct from the regulation of the legal regime applicable to copyright and other intellectual property rights corresponds to the standards of good conduct in academic activity already adopted and acquired in European universities"[19].

Both plagiarism and autoplagiarism can take on many different forms, but the "effect" they produce is the same, it affects the activity of scientific research.

Economic and social development cannot take place through scientific research activity if it is full of plagiarized or autoplagiarized works. Recognition of a work that fulfils the criterion of originality must be based on a long, thorough and serious scientific research activity, that comes up with something new and that brings, as I said, the economic and social development.

Autoplagiarism and plagiarism are a real problem, as claimed authors appropriate creations that do not belong to them (plagiarism) or which, although belonging to them, exploit the same work several times - without indicating this - in order to gain scientific recognition and to benefit from a greater number of benefits, such as financial ones (autoplagiarism).

1. Introduction

Intellectual property rights (IPR) are assuming an increasingly important role in international trade, in investment and in economic relations and are valuable commercial assets and a driving force in technological progress leading to increasing competitive capability and resultant empowerment in the international marketplace.

The globalization or universalization or internationalization of trade and economy, and the multilateral rules that most of us have accepted to be bound by, require us to adopt a post approach regarding IPR through close interaction between government, industry and the creative / inventive segment of society.

The international norms and national laws on copyright and related rights, while recognizing that the promotion of creativity and cultural and information production is an important public interest, also take into account other public interests, such as those which relate to the availability to the public of all the information necessary for the participation in social and political activities, public education, scientific and scholarly research, etc. For these purposes, these norms and laws contain appropriate exceptions to and limitations on the rights of copyright and related rights owners.

2. Content

The intellectual property system might play the main role in modern economic policy, and even though a decade ago it was thought that protecting IP rights for software might determine the chances of an economy to recover or to become competitive, the reality we live in proves that society is becoming more and more global, linking people together by their needs and interests and yet still leaving room for national or regional specificity without creating a conflict in between the two areas, but proving that there are natural ways of evolving in your specificity and yet be connected and be a part of the global.

Software industry and IP is increasingly becoming an important tool for sustainable development. Understanding and appreciating the social, cultural and the economic foundations of intellectual property and the copyright system, is a prerequisite for comprehending its increasing importance and role in national strategies for enhancing competition.

In software solutions, intellectual property is not and should not become the end in itself, but a catalyst for accelerating social, cultural and techno-economic growth and development and it's evolution in offering effective protection and use has proven spurs socio-economic growth through providing the necessary incentives for increasing creativity, inventiveness and competitive capability. It is (was) believed that a quality conscious approach towards economic management would generate higher growth and greater resources for social programs although this approach might increase the gaps between humans, communities, interests.

Intellectual property comprises creations of human mind, of the human intellect. It consists mainly of two branches, one dealing with industrial property comprising technological inventions, utility models, trademarks for goods and services, industrial designs, etc. and the other being copyright. The existence of such exclusive rights is also the legal basis for contractual arrangements between the creators or the ones developing the idea, on the one hand, and the institutions or entrepreneurs wishing to use those ideas in the manufacturing process, on the other. The recognition of the creator, the protection of his rights and the rights of those who invest in the making of his creations, contributed positively to socio-economic development of a developing country and yet now we can see some of the side effects and forsee possible questionable consequences.

With the extension of this system during the last two decades to the protection of computer software, a considerable size of commercial activity of a country involves use of rights protected by copyright. Until recently, one did not have a real idea as to the extent of the economic dimensions of the copyright or cultural industry. In the last two decades, however, independent surveys and studies in certain industrialized countries have indicated how sizeable the industry is. All these studies indicated the contribution of the copyright or cultural industries to their GNP, in Australia 3.1%; Germany 2.9%; India 5.06%; Netherlands 4.5%; New Zealand 3.2%; Sweden 6.6% (although Jennifer Skilbeek in the economic importance of copyright published by the International Publishers Association places it at 3.16%, which seems more likely); the United Kingdom 3.6%; the United States 3.3% for the core industry and 5.8% for the total copyright including the dependent industry.

Computer software industry is a classic example of what effective intellectual property protection can do to ensure economic growth. Protected as a literary work under copyright law since 1984, the industry has grown to be of the foremost in the world with a compounded growth more than 50% between 1990 and 1997, and is increasingly becoming the driving force in information technology. Exports of software increased from US $225 million in 1992-1993 to US $1760 million in 1997-1998, to US $2650 million in 1998-1999 and up 57% to over US $4 billion in 1999-2000; the projection was that this wioud go up to US $9 billion by 2001-2002, to US $25 billion by 2004-2005 and to US $50 billion by 2007-2008[1] and it was confirmed. By then the country's software industry is expected to earn an annual revenue of US $85 billion. The exports, for example, in 1998-1999 were 61 billion to the USA and North America and 23% to Europe. The compound advantage of the software industry is based on its cost effect world class quality, high reliability and rapid delivery of all of it powered by the state-of-the-art technologies.

China's software industry, has made a substantial contribution to the country's economic development. This industry has created more than 60.000 jobs. The average annual growth rate of the software industry was expected to be 28% in the 5 years, 2000 to 2005. It was also estimated that China will by become one of the world's largest Internet markets and that estimation was confirmed. The number of Internet users in China increased, for example from 2.1 million in 1998 to 8-9 million in 1999. The websites were expected to grow to e-commerce activities and their e-commerce turn over was expected to reach US $1.2 billion by 2002[2].

The digital economy is becoming an ever more important part of the global economy. It offers many new opportunities for inclusive and sustainable development. It also comes with serious policy challenges – starting with the need to bridge the digital divide. Both the opportunities and challenges are top policy priorities for developing countries. The digital economy is fundamentally changing the way firms produce and market goods and services across borders. Digital multinationals can communicate with and sell to customers overseas without the need for much physical investment in foreign markets. Their economic impact on host countries is thus more ethereal and less directly visible in productive capacity generation and job creation. And, today, the digital economy is no longer just about the technology sector and digital firms, it is increasingly about the digitalization of supply chains across all sectors of the global economy. The digital transformation of international production has important implications for investment promotion and facilitation, and for regulations governing investor behavior. Rules designed for the physical economy may need to be reviewed in light of new digital business models. Some countries have already taken steps to modernize policies; others face the risk of letting rules become obsolete or of unintentionally slowing down digital development. Many countries around the world have development strategies for the digital economy. Yet most of these strategies fail to adequately address investment issues. And those that do tend to focus exclusively on investment in telecommunication infrastructure. The investment policy dimension of digital development strategies should be broadened to enabling domestic firms to reap the benefits of digitalization and easier access to global markets. The World Investment Report 2017 makes a cogent argument for a comprehensive investment policy framework for the digital economy. It demonstrates how aligning investment policies with digital development strategies will play a pivotal role in the gainful integration of developing countries into the global economy and in a more inclusive and sustainable globalization in the years to come. This is an indelible contribution to the discourse on how to narrow the digital divide and meet the enormous investment challenges of the 2030 agenda on sustainable development[3].

The most attractive industries include services and technology-based activities. The annual parallel survey of IPAs in 2017 provided a ranking of the most promising industries for attracting Foreign Direct Investment in their region. The results for 2017 are broadly in line with responses from past years, with IPAs in developed economies focusing on IT and professional services, while those in developing economies all mention agribusiness among the most attractive industries. Information and communication – which includes telecommunication, data processing and software programming – is emerging as an attractive industry in selected developing regions, confirming that the digital economy is growing in importance beyond developed economies[4].

Of all suppliers of copyrightable works, suppliers of computer software generate by far the greatest added value. Markets for business software and entertainment software (for example video games) are much younger than other copyright industries and as a rule, they have grown rapidly over recent years. Software is also unique because in contrast to literary texts, movies or sound recordings, the market for software has been subject to unauthorized, digital copying for as long as it exists.

In 1980, software has enjoyed copyright protection in the USA, analogous to literary texts. In many other countries, software also falls in the realm of copyright law but enforcement varies, as will be discussed below. In contrast to other types of copyright works, machine-readable software can also be patented if it is accepted as non-obvious (or considered to constitute an 'inventive step' in many European countries). Suppliers of software thus have a choice. Copyright protection concerns the code itself, requires no registration fee, lasts longer and allows for the software itself to remain a trade secret[5]. Patent protection prevents others from putting software with equivalent functions to use, requires complete disclosure, a test of non-obviousness and a registration fee.

There may be a particularly great rift between legal arrangements regarding copyright protection and protection in practice. For example, peer-to-peer file-sharing of copyright works is illegal in most major economies today, but it still occurs on a massive scale. Part of the problem is that in contrast to patents, benefitting from the ideas and works protected by copyrights does not require much expertise or capital. Copyright infringements occur more frequently and often in the private domain, which inhibits effective enforcement of copyright law. This is one reason why most studies on unauthorized, digital copying use measures of copying rather than measures of the strength of copyright law to assess IP protection.

One problem in research on copyright is that most research on innovation has deliberately ignored the types of aesthetic and intellectual innovations covered by copyright law. To be sure, in the copyright industries technical innovations do occur as well. The adoption of new media technologies is a case in point. However, much innovation in the copyright industries concerns the creation of new media content. In order to measure innovation in copyright industries, it is useful to distinguish between more conventional 'humdrum innovation' and 'content creation'. Humdrum innovation concerns all facets of technological innovations and can be assessed with the familiar instruments of empirical research on innovation. 'Content creation' concerns aesthetic and intellectual variations that distinguish different copyright works from each other. To measure content creation, it seems necessary to adapt traditional methods of innovation research. Innovation input is traditionally measured by the size of R&D departments. Regarding content creation, there are two outstanding problems. First, much content creation occurs in relatively small firms and particularly volatile organizational set-ups. Second, content creation is not usually conducted in formally defined R&D departments. Other measures of innovation input are necessary to deal with innovation in small enterprises, with self-employed creators, or with user / amateur innovation that seems to play an important role in the cultural sector (e.g. regarding user-generated content)[6].

Empirical studies concerned with so-called 'piracy' of computer software often deal with copyright and patent infringements at the same time, and the authors rarely bother with this distinction. Many empirical studies on software piracy precede the current interest in copying of other types of copyright works. The bulk of this literature takes a business and management perspective. It is less concerned with social welfare and implications for public policy but with the interests of private business, in particular suppliers of software. Furthermore, in contrast to research on unauthorized, digital copying of recorded music or movies, the extensive literature on software 'piracy' features few original assessments of the impact on sales and rights holder revenues. Estimates of lost sales due to piracy come from software suppliers and their representatives.

The academic literature mostly discusses piracy rates (the ratio of users utilizing legitimate software and users of pirated software) but does not quantify the likely impact on rights holder revenues. There may be several reasons why academic researchers hesitate to forward estimates of lost sales due to piracy. The rapid rate of product innovation in the industry makes it hard to isolate the effect of unauthorized use on sales. There may have been few sudden and substantial changes in the de facto level of copyright protection for software, which could have been analyzed as natural experiments. Furthermore, the rapid growth of the market for computer software could reduce the concern for sales displacement from piracy[7]. The coincidence of rapid revenue growth, great innovation intensity and extensive piracy seems to have motivated many studies on how network effects may mitigate any adverse effects of piracy[8].

The role the protection of copyright and related rights is above all the promotion literary, musical and artistic creativity, the enrichment of national cultural heritage and the dissemination of cultural and information products to the general public. Such protection offers the indispensable incentives for the creation of new valuable works and for the investment into production and distribution of cultural and information goods. This is done through granting appropriate economic and moral rights to authors, performer, producers and publishers, through establishing adequate framework for the exercise of these rights, and through providing efficient mechanisms, procedures, remedies and sanctions that are necessary for their enforcement in practice.

It was accepted that an efficient and well-balanced system for the protection of copyright and related rights is necessary for the preservation of national culture and identity. Experience shows that for this, it is not sufficient to grant protection to national creators, producers and publishers. Without adequate protection also for them, foreign works and cultural products may inundate the markets of the given country and create a kind of unfair competition for any domestic creations and publications[9]. Yet again, one cannot stop wondering nor question, g iven the today market, how it was possible for the software protection of certain products to motivate and chalenge a fearcefull competition provoked by markets like Vietnam or China.

It is / was accepted and embraced by a large part of the academic community the idea that an appropriate copyright system is also indispensable for the participation of international cultural and economic cooperation. Without this, a country may not be able to attract foreign investment in a number of important fields, and may not get access to certain cultural and information products and services in such an obstacle-free manner as it would be desirable for the acceleration of the social and economic development. Yet, the paradox faced by the economic development for areas that use world heritage inovations to provide alternatoves without trademarks for disproportional law prices that allow the consumers south east Asian markest to benefit of the same technology as western Europe or American markets for sometimes less then 10 percent of the EU or US market price.

The protection of IP is based on many examples to prove that an appropriate, well-balanced copyright regulation may contribute both to the survival and to the success – sometimes spectacular success – of smaller and medium-sized enterprises.

One example is an old story- but the example is from an early period of its history when, on the basis of the present criteria, it still could have been regarded a kind of developing country: the United States of America from the period when it had just obtained its independence and was in the stage of establishing its own economic, social and legal system. As far as copyright was concerned the first idea – which, at the first sight, perhaps seemed to be attractive and clever – was to promote local culture and creativity through granting copyright protection for the works of domestic authors, leaving, however, foreign works – first of all works published in England – unprotected. The results proved to be catastrophic from the viewpoint of what the isolationist approach to copyright was believed to serve. Those publishers – according to our present comparative scale, certainly small or, at least, medium-sized ones – that had chosen to invest in the publication of some still less well-known American authors were unable to compete with the others which achieved easy and safe success by publishing unprotected works of famous and popular English writers and poets without any need whatsoever for bothering with obtaining authorization and paying remuneration to them. The then "SME" publishers supporting local creativity either went bankrupt or changed publishing policy in abandoning their patriotic extravaganza.

Another example is from a developing country, and quite a huge one, which just as a consequence of the success story involved, is emerging as one of the most important players in the field concerned: India. The great success of the Indian software industry has even started its dynamic extension also to the European and U.S. markets (and not only through "exporting" its excellent experts). There is general agreement that, in the success story of the numerous software SMEs of that huge country – some of which, of course, in the meantime, have grown out this category – in addition to certain other factors (such as a well-thought governmental development strategy and an advantageous educational structure), the early introduction of a well-balanced copyright protection for computer programs played a decisive role.

Another one is from a country which, at the time of the story was still a reluctant member of the group of the so-called socialist countries (although, as the Western press put it, the merriest barrack in the camp), which then happily became a "transition country", and in 2004, became a member of the European Union: Hungary. Copyright protection was recognized in the statutory law (the first time in Europe) in 1983. This alone would not have been sufficient in a so-called socialist country to become the basis for an SMEs success story. By that time, however, certain economic and political changes allowed the establishment of small private enterprises (or sometimes even medium-sized ones). The carrier of the small software houses established in that period became truly a great success story, bringing Hungary into the frontline of software development in Central and Eastern Europe and contributing – along with many other factors – to a smooth transformation of the (ever less) centrally planned economy into a full-fledged market economy.

At the end of the 70's and the beginning of the 80's, there were still a lot of heated debates at the international level on what kind of intellectual property protection might be adequate for computer programs, the growing importance of which at that time was becoming evident. During those debates, patent protection – which now, in certain countries, has started a spectacular, although in some aspects controversial, new carrier – was, in general set aside and rejected as a major option. The possibility of a sui generis system was considered more or less seriously (of which still there are some very much articulate arrière-guard advocates), but copyright was emerging as the most ready-made and most easily applicable option. The breakthrough towards copyright as a generally accepted option took place in February 1985, at a meeting organized in Geneva at the WIPO headquarters. It was due to the excellent working paper, to the thorough discussion at the meeting, but also to the existing positive examples to which the working paper had been able to refer. At that time, in addition to some positive developments in the case law of some countries, there were already five countries where statutory law explicitly recognized the copyright protection of computer programs.

It may not be a surprise that the United States of America was among the first five. In the case of that country, the contribution of copyright protection might not be so easily and evidently identified as the single key factor for the enormous success of the software industry, although its important role could hardly be neglected. However, India and Hungary were also among those first five countries, and, in the case of these countries it is easier to identify what kind of impact copyright protection had made.

Yet again, one cannot ignore the history and the lessons that past times emphasize: the main basis and premises for some of the national economies to emerge was, at least at a certain point, the ability to use freely, without financial restraints, the world heritage of the best creation of human kind. My wonder: how will the evolution of the world software development is going to be influenced by the lack of reglementation / zero recognition for IP on markets like east south Asian markets. Furthermore: is it possible that overprotective regulations that focus on the software's author s financial rights might turn into a subtle, masked brake for triggering the creativity and the evolution from public usage? And how well is the example of decompilation of computer programs is actually being taken seriously.

There is no need to elaborate on some very well known examples where the breathtaking success of certain software enterprises – which at the beginning were born even not just as small or medium-sized ones but as micro-enterprises – has led. They have obtained quite an extensive market dominance with the possibility of their proprietary products obtaining the status of de facto world-wide standards relegating by this their potential competitors (among them all software SMEs) into the depending status of simple clients.

This evolving scenario was recognized and duly taken into account in the European Community in the framework of the preparation and adoption of the directive on the legal protection of computer programs. The directive (Council Directive No. 91/250/EEC of 14 May 1991) contains certain provisions to protect users of computer programs against the dangers of overprotection in favor of software developers: such as the ones guaranteeing for the lawful owners of copies of computer programs to be able to use it for the intended purpose, including error protection (Article 5(1)), to make back-up copies (Article 5(2)) and to observe, study or test the functioning of the program in order to determine the ideas and principles underlining any element of the program (Article 5(3)).The latter provision has already quite a substantial relevance also for the possible competitors – among them many small medium enterprises – in the software markets. However, what is particularly important for them – especially for the more vulnerable SME's of the field – is the regulation of the issue of "reverse engineering" or "decompilation" of programs in Article 6 of the directive. This regulation became necessary in order to eliminate the possibility of some anti-competitive practices of owners of certain widely used computer programs based on the exclusive right of reproduction and / or the exclusive right of adaptation (and translation) granted to them by Article 4 of the directive. In the absence of an appropriate regulation, owners of rights in such programs would have been able to prohibit the transformation of the programs (only made available by them in object code form) into source code form (this transformation is called "decompilation" – or "reverse engineering" of the program). And without such decompilation, the potential competitors would not have been able to develop and make any computer programs that would have been able to function together – "interoperate" – with the existing and widely used, quasi standard programs. Such a consequence would have been, of course, particularly disastrous for SMEs of the software development sector. The regulation was not easy. There was quite an important resistance against any specific rules authorizing decompilation, since some major software houses were afraid that the new norms may be used also for simple piratical activities. It seems, however, that the provisions in Article 6 of the directive have established an appropriate balance between conflicting legitimate interests and eliminated the possible dangers as much as possible. The said Article of the directive provides that the authorization of the rightholder is not required where reproduction of the code and "translation" of its form are indispensable to obtain the information necessary to achieve the interoperability of an independently created computer program with other programs, provided that certain conditions are met. These conditions serve as guarantees that the limited freedom granted in this field does not prejudice the legitimate interests of owners of rights. The conditions are as follows: (a) these acts are performed by the licensee or by another person having a right to use a copy of a program, or on their behalf by a person authorized to do so; (b) the information necessary to achieve interoperability has not previously been readily available; (c) these acts are confined to the parts of the original program which are necessary to achieve interoperability; (d) the information obtained must not be used for goals other than to achieve the interoperability of the independently created computer program; (e) it must not be given to others except when necessary for the interoperability of the independently created computer program; and (f) must not be used for the development, production or marketing of a computer program substantially similar in its expression, or for any other act which infringes copyright[10].

It was proven that software piracy determined economic development. Most leading studies on software piracy are cross-sectional or panel studies with countries (or US states) as the unit of analysis: there were explored explanations for different piracy rates for business software, there were resoults that suggested highly developed countries exhibit lower piracy rates, there were conclusions stating inverse relationship between development and the extent of software piracy as well.

Next to income / economic development, the literature discusses a number of other factors determining software piracy, like the fact that culture that puts greater emphasis on individualism rather than collectivism correlates with less business software piracy . Also, it was stated that various indicators of the strength of the legal and judicial system are associated with less piracy.

While dealing with official, secondary data is usually considered to be preferable among economists, existing data does not address many specific phenomena related to unauthorized copying. Surveybased studies on the determinants of software piracy confirm that increasing retail prices are associated with greater piracy rates, consistent with what economic theory predicts for relative prices of close substitutes. Unauthorized copies seem to be inferior goods in the sense that demand for them decreases with wealth. Also, it was concluded that the type of education mattered.

It seems clear enough that unauthorized copying occurs in part because of financial incentives. With access to some widely diffused ICT, the pecuniary costs of acquiring an unauthorized copy are usually much lower than retail prices[11].

Unauthorized copies are no perfect substitutes for authorized copies, however, in software domain, it might be that the quality of the the unauthorized copy is just as good as the original. Also, decompliation and the ability to modify, adapt a nd improve a software might have better consequences for the consumer

3. Conclusions

This well-balanced and precise regulation has made it possible – not only in the European Community but also in other countries where this model has been taken over and applied – *for software-developers to continue and extend their creative activities with a chance to succeed, and many of them have used this opportunity with great efficiency. The big chalenge is still to be ruled by the free market, a natural consequence of globalization, and that will still provoke major debates with no certain forseeble effects on software intellectual property rights.

NEW TYPES OF TRADEMARKS – PROTECTION OF MULTIMEDIA TRADEMARKS

George-Mihai IRIMESCU[*]

Abstract

The Directive (EU) 2015/2436 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 December 2015 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trademarks.and the Regulation (EU) 2017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 14 June 2017 on the European Union trade mark changed one of the classical registration conditions for trademarks. More specifically, the graphical representation of the trademarks was replaced by the possibility to represent trademarks in a manner that enables the competent authorities and the public to determine the clear and precise subject matter of the protection afforded to its proprietor.This change enabled a more appropriate representation for sound marks, motion marks and holograms and, more important, made it possible to register a new type of trademarks – the multimedia trademarks. The complexity of multimedia trademarks could raise interesting practical challenges regarding their scope of protection, assesing their distinctiveness and their opposability . Moreover, given that such marks represent a combination of sound of images, the overlap with other intellectual property rights, such as copyrights, is more probable. Considering this element of novelty, this paper aism to analyze the early stages of the practice and anticipate potential challenges that multimedia trademarks would create, also based on the practice so far with respect to other types of non-traditional marks.

1. Trademark definition. Registration conditions for trademarks according to the current Romanian legislation[1].

From the point of view of international regulations, the possibility of registering non-traditional trademarks was strongly encouraged by the Singapore Treaty of 2006 which, in its Implementing Regulation, at Rule 3 it details the content of the trademark application for registration of three-dimensional marks, holograms, motion, color or positioning marks, as well as non-visual signs. With particular relevance to the subject matter of this paper, we reiterate the provisions on the representation of the motion trademarks, to which the Regulation establishes that: Where the application contains a statement to the effect that the mark is a motion mark, the representation of the mark shall, at the option of the Office, consist of one image or a series of still or moving images depicting movement. Where the Office considers that the image or images submitted do not depict movement, it may require the furnishing of additional images. The Office may also require that the applicant furnish a description explaining the movement.[2].

The doctrine also considers the Singapore Treaty to be the first international instrument to remove the condition that a trademark consists of visible signs. However, as rightly pointed out in the cited article, and as we will further detail, the difficulty of registering such signs as trademarks remains because of the absence of a direct link between the trademark and the goods and / or services applied to, the difficulty or the impossibility of graphic representation, and last but not least, the lack of distinctiveness[3].

The national law lists, without limitation, a series of signs that can be registered as trademarks. As the doctrine has identified, the phrase such as clearly indicates that it is a non-exhaustive enumeration of signs that may constitute marks[4].

Prior its republication in 2010, the Trademarks Law contained a less detailed list of possible types of trademarks. The doctrine thus concluded that the amendment of this article in Romanian law is the direct result of the Treaty of Singapore[5]. We do not exclude the fact that the reformulation of this article, following the republication, is to be done in the spirit of the new international commitments ratified by Romania, considering that even the Directive 2008/95/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 October 2008 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trademarks, which stood at the base of the republishing of the Romanian law in 2010, also provided for a relatively limited list of possible trademarks[6]. We only wish to point out that, apart from affirming the possibility of registering certain types of trademarks, such a change is not aimed to permit the registration of those marks per se. Before republication, as it is the case today, we share the opinion that the listing of Article 2 of the Trademarks Law was and is not exhaustive. Consequently, not legislative confinement is the main obstacle to the registration of non-traditional trademarks, but the way in which they may or may not meet the conditions imposed by the definition of the mark.

In turn, Directive (EU) 2015/2436 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 December 2015 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trademarks maintains this narrow list of signs that can be registered as trademarks[7], despite the fact that it opened the door to new types of trademarks due to amending the trademark registrability conditions.

According to the current form of Law no. 84/1998 on trademarks and geographical indications, republished, the trademark is defined as any sign capable of being represented graphically, such as: words, including personal names, designs, letters, numerals, figurative elements, three-dimensional shapes and, particularly, the shape of goods or of packaging thereof, colors, combinations of colors, holograms, acoustic signals, as well as any combination thereof, provided that such signs are capable of distinguishing the goods or services of one enterprise from those of other enterprises [8].

This legal definition includes essential elements, which we consider to be relevant in this presentation related to the protection of multimedia trademarks.

First, it highlights a first condition for a sign to be a trademark, namely that it is susceptible of graphic representation. Thus, this condition is one of the main obstacles to the possibility of registering certain categories of non-traditional trademarks, including, for example, sound trademarks. From this perspective, non-traditional trademarks are defined by doctrine as those marks that are not directly perceptible or for which it is difficult to achieve a graphic representation[9], if not impossible, we might add.

Second, through the condition that the trademark distinguishes the goods or services of an undertaking from those of other undertakings, the Romanian law defines the distinctive character of the mark.

As regards the distinctiveness of a sign, the doctrine emphasizes that it shoul not be confused with the novelty, originality or creativity of the sign[10]. The first two concepts are rather linked to the condition of availability of the sign as a mark. As regards the third element, namely creativity, it may be a factor in assessing the distinctiveness of a trademark, in the sense that a more creative sign sets the premises of a stronger, but not necessarily, distinctive feature. It is not enough for a sign to be creative to be considered distinctive. We will see how this aspect is particularly important in interpreting the distinctiveness of new types of trademarks, especially multimedia trademarks that, although they enjoy originality, as a form of manifestation of the creativity of those who have created them, they are not necessarily and distinctive.

The distinctiveness, that is, that capacity to distinguish the goods and / or services of an entity from those of another entity, is therefore appreciable in relation to the goods or services designated by that trademark. It is equally important that this appreciation is made through the public filter, the consumers of those goods and / or services. As a consequence, the doctrine has very rigorously defined distinctiveness as a triangular relation between trademark - product - public. Moreover, distinctiveness, although it is a condition of registration of the sign, it is not a characteristic of the sign per se (although in practice we say that a trademark is distinctive), it is rather a characteristic of the relationship trademark - goods. Moreover, as the doctrine rightly emphasizes, the distinctiveness of a sign cannot be determined in isolation from the designated goods[11]. Although we agree with all the considerations underlying this view, another possible approach is to take into account the fact that although the distinctiveness undoubtedly leads to an analysis of that relationship, it is rather a characteristic of the trademark, of course characteristic relating to the designated goods and / or services.

Also related to distinctiveness, it should be noted that this characteristic is variable in time. The distinctiveness of a trademark must be maintained, either by its use as a trademark, in the case of trademarks with acquired distinctiveness, or, in case of the intrinsic distinctiveness, itself may be lost if its proprietor does not take care that the trademark does not become a common or generic name for its goods or services[12].

2. Trademark definition following the EU legal developments

As regards the trademark definition, article 3 of the Directive renounces to the phrase signs capable of being represented graphically, stating that trademarks should be represented on the register in a manner which enables the competent authorities and the public to determine the clear and precise subject matter of the protection afforded to its proprietor[13].

The European trademark regulation, like the directive, defines the European Union mark as being any signs, in particular words, including personal names, or designs, letters, numerals, colors, the shape of goods or of the packaging of goods, or sounds, provided that such signs are capable of:

a) distinguishing the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings; and
b) being represented on the Register of European Union trade marks ('the Register'), in a manner which enables the competent authorities and the public to determine the clear and precise subject matter of the protection afforded to its proprietor[14].This change is essential to open the path of recording multiple types of unconventional trademarks, especially those that are perceived by other senses than the sight. Thus, the new regulation allows the register to be adapted in a manner that trademarks could be shown through any technological form, as long as it is able to accurately determine the scope of its protection. For example, in terms of sound trademarks, they are traditionally rendered by a portative. However, we consider this only to be a compromise solution, given that not every consumer, who consults a register, may have the representation of a musical piece only by reading its portative (only a rather limited number of consumers have this capacity). For example, how many consumers can "read" the national sound trademark no. 062091, from the simple view of a fairly long portative?:

Much more effective is, for example, uploading an audio file, a practice that was not categorized as a graphic representation of the sign. From this point of view, we will detail below Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's attempt to record the famous lion roar as a trademark at European Union level in 1996 (application no. 000143891) for goods and services in classes 09, 38 , 41 and 42, a sound that is impossible to reproduce accurately through a portative. It was represented by a spectrogram, with the description the sound made by the roar of a lion and represented in the attached spectogram. The mark was refused, one of the invoked reasons being that the graphic representation of the mark is not such as to enable the public to perceive the sound, even with the above-mentioned explanation[15]. However, the new definition allows offices to use the appropriate technical means to reproduce a sound trademark in such a way that it is perceived precisely by the public, as the EU IPO has already implemented even before the adoption of the new regulation, as we will see in the following.

Nevertheless, the use of new technical means could allow for a better and clearer representation of motion trademarks or holograms and, more recently, of multimedia trademarks, a new type of trademark established by the European legislation and practice. However, if the EU IPO is now ready to represent trademarks by means of video files, as we shall see, part of the Member States' offices (some of which have not even implemented the new directive yet) are not yet prepared. Under such circumstances, how could a European multimedia trademark be converted into a national trademark? Thus, a first aspect that we can now point out is the gap between the EU IPO's technical means and the national ones, which could hinder the cooperation between national systems and the European trademark system.

3. What is a multimedia trademark, what does it protect and how is it filed for registration

The European Trademark Regulation does not provide a definition of multimedia trademarks. Nevertheless, the article cited above has opened the way for the representation of motion marks and holograms by means of video files, given that traditionally, if we can talk about the representation of non-traditional trademarks using such wording, they were represented by a stream of images that would indicate possible movements.

As regards the European Union Trade Mark Implementing Regulation, its only reference to the multimedia trademarks is that of the formal requirements for the constitution of the regulatory deposit: Where the application concerns any of the trade mark types listed in points (a) to (j), it shall contain an indication to that effect. Without prejudice to paragraphs 1 or 2, the type of the trade mark and its representation shall accord with each other as follows:

1. in the case of a trade mark consisting of, or extending to, the combination of image and sound

[13] Art. 3 of Directive (UE) 2015/2436;
[14] Art. 4 of the Regulation (EU) 2017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 14 June 2017 on the European Union trade mark, published in OJ from June 16, 2017;
[15] EU IPO's refusal decision concerning EUTMA 000143891 issued on 29.09.199, pg. 1;

(multimedia mark), the mark shall be represented by submitting an audiovisual file containing the combination of the image and the sound;[16]

Thus, a first possible definition of these marks, namely that they are a combination of images and sounds, is delineated.

As for motion trademarks, uploading a video file is not the only way for it to be represented. Although preferable, such video can be replaced with a sequence of images, as it was the practice before the implementation of the technical means for uploading video files. Such a file is, however, the only one able to represent, in an acceptable manner, a possible combination of sounds and images, which are today the multimedia trademarks. However, it is interesting that in the case of multimedia trademarks it is not permissible to submit a description thereof, given that, as recently claimed in an on-line webinar hosted by the EU IPO, for such marks such descriptions could rather tangle than help[17].

Therefore, it is important to note that the representation of this type of trademark is the only one that indicates the extent of its protection, without any additional information (description of colors, visual elements, image sequence etc.)

The EU-IPO's joint communication on the representation of new types of trademarks sets out the technical limits for the submission of multimedia trademarks. Thus, they can be represented by uploading an audio-visual material in MP4 format, this document also showing that at this time only Hungary and Latvia have expressed their opinion on possible acceptable formats for representing the multimedia trademarks[18], which again shows the very long distance up to the harmonization of European-wide practice on with respect to this type of marks. It is also established that the uploaded video materials cannot exceed 20 MB[19]. It is noteworthy that the materials have no limitations in terms of their duration. It is true that file size delimitations are, in fact, a time limitation, but this is not an accurate one, a lengthier video material of poorer quality having the same dimensions as a shorter one but having a better-quality image. We insist on this issue, because, from our point of view, the lengthier a multimedia trademark is, the more its distinctive character may be affected, given that it would be more and more difficult for a consumer memorise it, or retain its message. Moreover, even new types of trademarks, including the multimedia trademarks, in order to be registered must comply with the conditions laid down in the Sieckmann judgment, namely to be clear, precise, self-contained, easily accessible, intelligible, durable and objective[20]. We are of the opinion that a video, the longer it is from the point of view of its duration, the harder it is to meet these conditions.

As regards the Commission Delegated Regulation (EU) 2018/625 of 5 March 2018 supplementing Regulation (EU) 2017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council on the European Union trade mark, and repealing Delegated Regulation (EU) 2017/1430, it does not provide any provisions on multimedia trademarks.

On the basis of the above, it follows that multimedia marks are therefore combinations of sounds and images. Thus they could consist of a fairly wide range of trademarks themselves: first of all traditional trademarks, whether word marks, figurative or combined, sound trademarks, three-dimensional trademarks, motion trademarks, color marks and so on. Or, being signs that combine such a wide range of elements, we consider that they are likely to raise a number of practical questions.

To this end, we are looking forward to EU IPO's rendering of the first opposition decision involving a multimedia trademark. The registration of EUTM 017961198 THUNDER BALL consists of a 7 seconds clip, where initially the name THUNDER BALL is depicted, along with the appearance of an animated thunder, and at the end of an animated blue sphere with a thunder inside. The mark also consists of the sound of a voice saying "THUNDER BALL":

This mark was opposed based on the following UK national trademark registration:

Regardless of the outcome of the opposition, the EU IPO's decision and reasoning will certainly be an interesting read.

In its chapter regarding the assessment of distinctive character, the EU IPO Practice Guidelines describes the multimedia trademarks as follows: a multimedia mark is a trade mark consisting of, or extending to, the combination of image and sound. The term 'extending to' means that these marks cover not only the combination of sound and image per se but also combinations that include word or figurative elements [21].

Therefore, what we consider as specific to this type of trademark is that it represents a possible combination of elements that in turn can be non-traditional trademarks, as will be explained below.

Multimedia trademarks are the natural consequence of diversifying the technical possibilities of creating a trademark deposit. As regards the EU IPO, this development began with the difficulties of registering sound trademarks, where the fulfillment of the graphic representation requirement raised difficulties for certain trademarks that could not be reproduced on the portative. We will summarize, briefly, the evolution of the representation of the sound trademarks before the EU IPO.

Concerning the graphic representation of these signs, in line with the current practice of OSIM and the EU IPO, it was emphasized that a trademark, as long as it can be represented on the portative, fulfills the condition of susceptibility to graphic representation[22].

There are, however, sounds which, although they can be considered distinctive, in the sense that a consumer makes a direct connection with the commercial origin of the goods or services they designate, cannot be represented in the form of a portative. We have mentioned above that Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer wanted to register the famous lion roar as a trademark at European Union level and how that mark was refused, one of the reasons being that the graphic representation of the mark does not allow the public to perceive that sound[23].

Although filing an audio file would be more conclusive, such a practice could not at this time be categorized as a graphical representation of the sign. One of the most relevant decisions from this point of view was Case C-283/01 Shield Mark, where it was established that a sound trademark can be constituted only by a sound susceptible to graphic representation, and that its representation must be clear, precise, self-contained, accessible, intelligible, durable and objective. As a consequence, onomatopoeias, animal noises or other sounds that cannot be represented graphically were excluded from protection[24].

In 2005, a first step was taken by the decision of the President of OHIM (at that date) on the electronic filing of sound trademarks, which established that it is possible to upload an MP3 document, having a maximum size of one Megabyte. According to this decision, loops and / or streams are not allowed[25]. The first European mark registered by this procedure is European trademark no 004901658 on behalf of INLEX IP EXPERTISE, where the audio file can be downloaded directly from the trademark file of the EU IPO database[26].

Another interesting case is the attempt to register Tarzan's cry of Edgar Rice Burroughs, Inc. We quote from the EU IPO press release of 5 November 2007 (at that time OHIM) on the efforts to register this trademark, summarizing the above developments: We all know that Tarzan of the monkeys, the character created by American novelist Edgar Rice Burroughs, has a distinct cry (...). Over the years, (...) OHIM (...) received three requests to register this appeal (...). The first application, in February 2004, included a graphical representation of the call. It was refused by the OHIM examiners on the grounds that it did not comply with the requirement that the graphic representation of the mark should be clear, precise, self-contained, easily accessible, intelligible, durable and objective and concise. The independent Boards of Appeal confirmed the examiner's objection on 27 September 2007. (...) However, a second application for the musical notation, also made in February 2004, was accepted for registration because it complied with the above formalities and "the cry" which he described was considered to be distinctive. In addition, a third

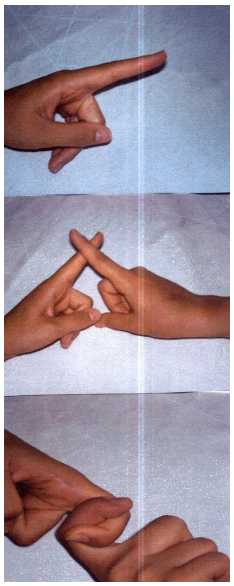
This was possible through a change in legislation in 2005, which means that the Office is capable of accepting sonograms provided they are accompanied by an MP3 audio file at the time of filing.* It is also reiterated the increased interest in such trademarks in the market, the availability of the EU IPO to sound trademark registration as well as the need to adapt the protection conditions to the development of technological possibilities[27].

On the same line of development, we may consider that the emergence of multimedia trademarks was also the result of the difficulties of graphic representation of trademarks such as, for example, motion trademarks.

Motion trademarks consist of a series of two-dimensional images that, if succeeded by a certain frequency, give the feeling of movement[28]. An example of this is the national trademark no. 080630, registered as a motion trademark, consisting of successive images of the disposal of fingers of a hand:



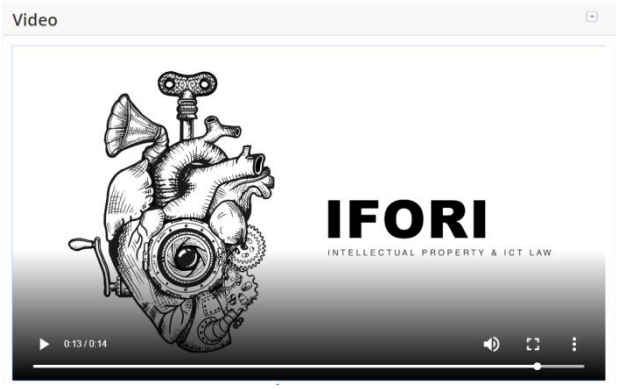
However, by means of multimedia trademarks allowing to represent motion and hologram trademarks by means of the availabe technology, such a movement can now be rendered per se and not only suggested by a series of images in which the position of its elements is altered, since it is possible to represent the motion, holograms and multimedia trademarks before the European Office via video files.

4. The distinctiveness of multimedia trademarks

The practice of the Alicante office has been generous to these trademarks. At the time of writing this paper, 21 trademark applications have already been filed, of which 13 have already been registered

In fact, the EU IPO Practice Guidelines mentions, in the case of multimedia trademarks, that: in the absence of relevant case-law, the general criteria for the assessment of distinctiveness will apply to these marks. The mark will be distinctive within the meaning of Article 7(1)(b) EUTMR if the sign can serve to identify the product and/or services for which registration is applied for as originating from a particular undertaking, and thus to distinguish that product/service from those of other undertakings. This distinctiveness will be assessed by reference, first, to the goods or services for which registration is sought and, second, to the relevant public's perception of that sign. These marks will not necessarily be perceived by the relevant public in the same way as a word or figurative mark (our underlining) [29]. Or, we consider this last sentence to be essential in terms of the distinctiveness of the multimedia trademarks.

The first multimedia trademark applied for registration before the EU IPO was EUTM 017279704, a trademark designating intellectual property services and legal services in Class 45. This mark consists of the stylized representation of a moving heart, from which various other visual elements emerge, from a sound representing heart beats and the text IFORI INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY & ICT LAW:



The mark has been registered without any objection to its distinctiveness.

Another trademark that we find interesting is EUTM 017411315, registered, among others, for games similar to gambling. It consists of a topper that falls from a ball in the shape of a dice, a topper that has attached some paper bills, all this movement being accompanied by a drum sound, like the one who creates suspense before a draw. This mark successfully passed the examination on absolute grounds, probably on considerations that, although it contained a number of evocative elements of gambling, their combination was considered to be only allusive and "creative" enough to confer distinctiveness:

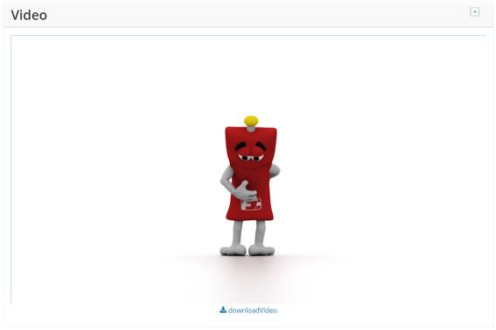
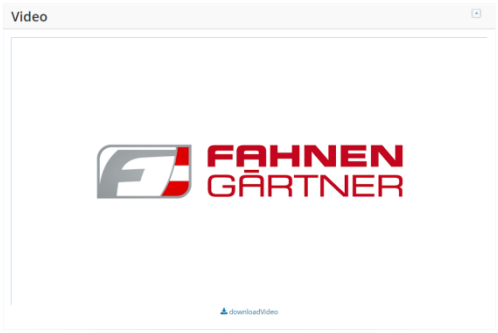
However, by analyzing other multimedia marks accepted by the Alicante Office, we cannot fail to notice that, through them, the advertising function of a trademark becomes increasingly important. Thus, if trademarks are generally directly applied to marketed products, non-traditional trademarks in general and multimedia trademarks in particular are often encountered by consumers separately from the products or services they designate. To this end, the doctrine noted that the advertising role of a trademark is rather linked to the originality of the mark itself, by the ideas and impression it raises to the public, its attraction, thus becoming an autonomous element of the commercial success thereof[30]. Or, if we take a look at trademarks such as trademark no. 017451816, it does not move away from a possible advertising spot: it begins with a character waving its hand, taking a bow while ovations and applause are heard in the background, the final sequences showing the animated logo of the trademark owner:





We ask ourselves, looking at this material, what is the scope of protection for the trademark represented through this video material? The red character? The combined trademark depicted at the end of the video? Both? In the latter case, this trademark has a scope of protection that, traditionally, could have made the subject of several trademark applications. The answer to this question is important because it will subsequently determine issues such as its opposability to other subsequent trademarks or, for example, what constitutes effective use thereof if it is challenged in order to remain valid.

In fact, the more complex the uploaded video material is, the more complicated we find it to assess the extent of its scope of protection as a trademark.

We take another example to this end, in respect of which the examination procedure has not yet been completed. It's EUTM no. 01728220, consisting of sequences from a video game, where the track of projectiles gone from what appears to be a sniper's weapon is followed, and the way they reach their human targets. Going beyond the possible objections based on public policy considerations, these images being able to overcome the tolerance of violence, even for the target audience, namely consumers of video games, we believe that this mark could also raise questions regarding its distinctiveness. To give a picture of this 25-second video, we've provided some screenshots of this trademark below:

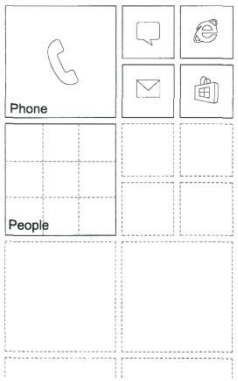
Again, it is quite difficult to imagine what could be the extent of protection for such a mark in the event it is registered. We quote an article that, although does not originate from a specialized source of intellectual property, being a website dedicated to video games, is edited by a specialist in the field and provides an interesting insight into the breadth of the protection of a multimedia trademark. This article highlights the fact that multimedia trademarks can revolutionize the means of protection for so-called game mechanisms, which are difficult to protect because they squeeze between different types of intellectual property rights: patents are often not applicable because the condition of novelty is difficult to fulfill, and methods are exempted from patent protection, copyright protects the source code, images, movies, but not ideas or game mechanisms, and industrial designs protection is limited to the external shape of a product. That's why, video game cloning is a common phenomenon[31].

However, we are of the opinion that the protection of ideas should not be subject to trademark protection, and that the multimedia trademarks should not be used to obtain a monopoly in that direction. It is to be taken into account that these images are obtained once the game is played, so not at the time when a consumer makes his choice and therefore are not meant to indicate a commercial origin.

Also, starting from this trademark application, the problem has arisen in the same recent EU IPO-hosted webinar[32], if the interface of a computer program could be registered as a multimedia trademark. There is no clear answer yet, and the practice is in far too early stages to give a solution. Although, of course, such situations are to be examined on a case-by-case basis, it is not necessary to overlook the purpose of a trademark, namely to indicate the commercial origin of a product or service, and not to monopolize certain ideas or creations.

An interesting example in this regard is the attempt by a well-known software company that tried to gain protection for its operating system interface. Thus, it applied for registration the EUTM no. 011752863, for specific products related to the computer program interface:



This trademark has been refused, and the applicant did not successfully appeal the decision. In maintaining the rejection decision, the Board of Appeal noted that the arrangement of the multi-square interface is common for mobile phones or tablets, so that it is not meant to indicate the commercial origin of the designated products. Thus, such an interface can be registered as a trademark only to the extent that it is capable of attracting public's attention and of indicating the commercial origin of the product.[33].

However, there are cases where protection for multimedia marks has been refused. For example, the European multimedia trademark no. 017889338 whose claimed figurative element is the '€' symbol, has been refused registration and is now pending appeal proceedings. We continue the hard work of talking about multimedia marks in a written work, but we will try to overcome this obstacle through its verbal description, accompanied by screenshots. Basically, this trademark consists up of a colored circle, placed on a black background, the size of which changes in a pulsation motion. Also, its color changes at intervals. In the middle of the circle are displayed different values, followed by the symbol "€". At the end of the video, the sound of 3 bells is heard:

[33] Decision of the EU IPO's Fifth Board of Appeal of November 7, 2014;

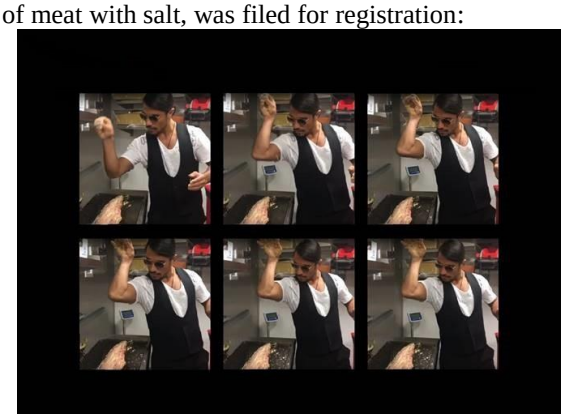
The initial test of the refusal is not available in the EU IPO electronic database. However, it is clear from the decision that this refusal was issued for the infringement of Article 7 (2) of the European Trade Mark Regulation, namely for lack of distinctive character. A thing that we recognize as interesting for a trademark consisting of visual elements, dynamic elements, colors, words and even sounds.

Despite this, the Office starts to argue that the trademark does not contain any verbal elements which could serve to identify the commercial origin of the designated goods / services. As for the number sequence, negative when the fund is red and positive when it is green, the office asserts that it is usual in commerce to reflect amounts, so they are not an element of identification. The amounts shown in the video can be used in connection with any product or service. The presentation of these elements is common and the form of presentation of the number sequence consisting of colors and sound elements is not sufficient to offer the mark distinctive character[34].

We chose this example to highlight the fact that, in our opinion, with regard to these types of trademarks, the test of distinctiveness appears to be more rigorous than for other traditional trademarks. Moreover, the fact that the trademarks are composed of a combination of several elements in themselves unusual for a trademark does not in itself confer distinctiveness for the mark. We therefore reiterate the conclusion that it is not the originality of the manner the elements are combined that is the one that takes precedence in appreciating the distinctiveness of the multimedia trademark, but the analysis of the perception of the sign as a whole.

Therefore, we believe that for these trademarks, the distinctiveness test will move from the realm of the analysis of the trademark – product – consumer trinomial and will rather concentrate on its ability to indicate a certain commercial origin. The objection of the Office in the example above is also analyzed among these lines. Thus, although it does examine the constituent elements of the mark, their combination and their distinctiveness in relation to the goods and services designated, the way in which the mark as a whole is capable of indicating a commercial origin seems to have more weight in the overall assessment. What is perhaps natural, since these types of trademarks are often not attached to the designated goods or services.

In fact, we consider that what is being analyzed is the overall message transmitted by such video material at a higher abstraction level than for traditional trademarks, so that the eventual distinctiveness of component elements is lost in what the trademark transmits overall. An example that we find interesting about this is referring to a trademark that, although it is a motion trademark, the basis for its partial refusal may also be applicable to multimedia trademarks. EUTM no. 016433369, consisting of a cook that spices a piece of meat with salt, was filed for registration:



Although the applicant argued that the way the chef spices that piece of meat is far from being a common one, explaining in detail every movement known as the "saltbae" technique belonging to the cook Nusret Gökçe, the Board of Appeal did not find this as a convincing argument. It held that this mark essentially consists of the image of a chef who seasoned a piece of meat with salt, the way he moves his hand not being of the essence of the mark. Therefore, the image of a chef who performs a banal act in the kitchen cannot be distinctive for some of the services designated under the trademark, so that the mark cannot fulfill its essential function[35]. It is interesting to see that what the Board of Appeal has examined has been the overall message of the trademark, abstracted, without giving a significant importance to other creative elements of te motion trademark.

5. Conflict with other intellectual property rights – copyright

Specific to some types of non-traditional trademarks is the fact that some of them are more likely to interfere with possible protection for other categories of intellectual property rights.

A good example of this is the three-dimensional trademark, where the shape of a product or packaging is traditionally the subject of industrial design protection. It would appear, at first sight, that a right-holder has a choice between two possibilities, namely to register the shape of his product both as an industrial design or as a trademark. The doctrine considered that although the industrial design appeared to have a competitor, namely the three-dimensional trademark, it must not be forgotten that although the trademark appears to offer a preferable protection, at least by the fact that the protection is unlimited in time, the possible objections to the registration of a a three-dimensional sign as a trademark makes this a solution to be chosen only when that shape has the ability to distinguish the commercial origin of the designated product. Thus, an important point is emphasized, namely the need to synchronize the marketing strategy with the strategy of protection of intellectual property rights, since the acquired distinctiveness is proved by intensive use, whereas protection through industrial design registration implies the novelty as a condition[36].

Thus, the role and function of each means of protection must be taken into consideration: if a trade mark has the role of determining the commercial origin of products and services, industrial designs have the function of protecting the aesthetic appearance to a product[37]. In other words, the trademark protects the consumer against the risk of confusion, as long as the industrial design protects the product itself.

It should also be emphasized that through the imposed prohibitions, the trademarks law seeks to limit the cumulative protection of three-dimensional marks with other intellectual property rights, such as patents (when the form of the product is necessary for a technical result) or copyright (for forms which give a substantial value to the product)[38].

After the expiry of a certain patent, however, by prohibiting the registration of a three-dimensional sign consisting of a form necessary to obtain a technical result, it is also intended not to establish a monopoly by registering as a trademark on that shape. This would partly circumvent the legal provisions on the limited protection in time of the patent by monopolizing as a trademark a certain shape relevant from a technical perspective[39].

Reverting to the multimedia trademarks, the most likely overlap is copyright protection. However, with regard to this overlapping, the prohibition to exclude from protection those shapes which give substantial value to products has a low relevance, and may be applicable only to potential situations in which the multimedia trademarks contain the image of the designated product. Originality in the case of multimedia trademarks may consist of the way in which their elements are combined. Therefore, the overlapping of the two types of rights is more likely.

If, with regard to overlap between trademarks and industrial designs, the conditions for protection can be delimited with some clarity, the boundaries are not very clear when it comes to the intersection of multimedia trademarks and copyright.

With regard to the protection of copyrights, the condition of their protection is originality, which, without going into discussions about the objective and subjective conceptions about it, is generally defined in the continental legal system as the personal footprint the author gives to his work and, moreover, it is presumed, so that the infringer has the burden of proving, on a case-by-case basis, that the violated work is not, in fact, original[40].

However, although distinctiveness and originality are different notions, with different purposes, overlaps between them are not negligible. Most of the time, distinctiveness derives from a creative process, like the one behind the original creation. Elements of originality can also be found in traditional trademarks, in their figurative elements, or in non-traditional trademarks such as sound trademarks. Even more so, in the case of multimedia trademarks, which consist of combined sounds and images in a way so that they may be original.

The importance of this intersection is also due to the fact that copyright protection is spontaneous, starting with the creation of the work, while industrial design protection (with the exception of the unregistered European designs under certain conditions) or trademark protection depend on the choice of its holder to take the necessary steps to apply for registration.

Faced with these developments, the following issues, raised over time by jurisprudence and doctrine, go back to the present: circumventing the limited term of protection for copyrighted works by registering them as trademarks and the possibility or the impossibility of registering as a trademark the works fallen in the public domain, which we will especially analyze.

Regarding the registration as a trademark of works that fell into the public domain, the EU IPO

Guidelines does not seem to exclude this possibility. For example, in the case of sound trademarks, the Guidelines enumerates so-called sounds from the public domain, such as Beethoven's Für Elise, which may be registered as trademarks if the proprietor proves the distinctiveness acquired on the market[41]. Moreover, through a decision that triggered the criticism of part of the doctrine, EU IPO accepted, in 2017, the registration of the EUTM no. 016613903, on behalf of a known Intellectual Property Agency, consisting of the Rembrandt Harmenszoon van Rijn's painting The Nightwatch:

That law firm continued its "experiment" before the Benelux Office for Intellectual Property, which rejected the trademark, a decision maintained by the Hague Court of Appeal, which, in addition to the lack of distinctive character of the trademark due to the fact that it is a well-known work which may not indicate the commercial origin of a product, it held that the applicant has no interest in requesting this trademark for registration. The Benelux Office also claimed that the registration of such a trademark would be contrary to public policy, being unacceptable for a company to obtain protection in respect of a good belonging to the cultural heritage by applying the law on trademarks[42].

Can we, however, consider the acquired distinctiveness to be sufficient to register a mark in spite of a public interest, perhaps greater?

In this regard, the Shield Mark judgment is not representative only for determining of the registration conditions for trademarks. The opinion of Advocate General Ruiz-Jarabo Colomer of 3 April 2003 contains a final remark which, although going beyond the framework of the questions referred, raises questions as to the possibility of registering works fallen in the public domain as trademarks: it must not be overlooked that the sound signs which Shield Mark claims as being in its exclusive ownership are a cockcrow and the first notes of what is perhaps the best-known piece for piano in the history of music, a work by one of the great composers, whose genius was quickly recognized by the other composers of his day (…).Two points must be made. First, there are considerations of public interest that militate in favor of limiting the registrability of certain signs to enable them to be freely used by all traders. The theory of the need to keep certain signs available has been evaluated by the Court of Justice in its judgments in Windsurfing Chiemsee and Philips. I find it difficult to accept that individuals may, by means of a trade mark, perpetuate exclusive rights in natural indications and signs or those that are a direct manifestation of nature. I find it more difficult to accept, and this is the second refinement, that a creation of the mind, which forms part of the universal cultural heritage, should be appropriated indefinitely by a person to be used on the market in order to distinguish the goods he produces or the services he provides with an exclusivity which not even its author's estate enjoys[43].

Another interesting decision in this respect is the one issued by the EFTA Court, whose role is the interpretation of the Treaty on the European Economic Area. The context in which this decision was issued was Oslo Municipality's application for registration of trademarks consisting of works that were to enter the public domain under Norwegian law, including the works of Gustav Vigeland, one of the most important Norwegian sculptors. Some of these requests have been refused entirely or partially. At the appeal stage, the Board of Appeal, following the ruling of the German Federal Court of Inventions in the Mona Lisa case, raised the question of whether, if well-known works of art are refused registration on grounds of lack of distinctiveness, raises the possibility of obtaining protection by proving the acquired distinctiveness, allowing, at least theoretically, any undertaking to obtain the trademark registration of a valuable work. On the basis of this issue, the Board of Appeal sent EFTA a preliminary question asking whether the trademark registration of works of art whose copyright period has expired may be rejected as trademarks contrary to public policy and morality, and if such rejection is conditioned by the well-known character or the value of the work.

In its recitals, the Court held that:

The term of copyright protection serves the principles of legal certainty and the protection of legitimate expectations, providing a pre-established timeframe, after which anyone can use the creative content of others. Considerations of the public domain serve, to a certain extent, the general interest in protecting the mind's creations from commercial greed. The public domain entails the absence of individual protection for, or exclusive rights to, a work. Once communicated, creative content belongs, as a matter of principle, to the public domain. In other words, the fact that works are part of the public domain is not a consequence of the lapse of copyright protection. Rather, protection is the exception to the rule that creative content becomes part of the public domain once communicated. The Court also notes that the interest in rescuing the public domain is superior to individual protection or exclusive rights to the work that is the subject of a possible trade mark. Referring to the question referred to it, the Court emphasized that, in order to be applicable to that ground of refusal, it is not necessary to consider only the situation in which that mark is contrary to public policy but whether the very act of registration of such a trademark would be equivalent to a trademark removal in the public domain, is contrary to public order. This should be considered on a case-by-case basis. Thus, the Court concluded that the answer to the first three questions is that registration of a sign consisting of works for which copyright protection has expired as a trademark is not in itself contrary to public policy or to principles of morality. If registration of signs consisting of works of art as a trademark can be refused on the basis of the principles of accepted morality, it depends, in particular, on the status or perception of the relevant works of art in the relevant EEA State. The risk of misappropriation or profanity of a work may be relevant to this assessment. Registration of a sign can be refused only if the sign consists exclusively of a work belonging to the public domain and if the registration of that sign constitutes a genuine and sufficiently serious threat to a fundamental interest of society[44].

(To early for) Conclusions

Starting from the mere trademark definition, the registrability of nontraditional trademark encountered serious obtacles to registration mainly due to the condition that a trademark should be rerpresented graphically. However, the changes brought by the EU legislation brought a fresh perspective on trademark registrability, and multimedia trademarks were created. Nevertheless, many steps are yet to be taken until the practice with respect to this type of marks will be harmonized at EU level, considering that now EU member states will need to find their own solutions for the purpose of implementing their new ways of representing non-traditional trademarks.

The complexity of such signs will probably create a very diverse practice with respect to assesing the distinctive character of such trademarks and to their enforcement. In these early stages, one can only anticipate that that the distinctiveness assesment will focus on the overall message and concept transmitted by the trademark.

As for the potential overlap with copyright, an important issue that we see is the potential registration of works fallen in the public domain. To this end, the courts will need to assess wether transferring the cultural meaning of a short movie to a commercial one is acceptable, or it would represent a cultural impediment, considering that a monopoly established through trademark rights could represent a potential censorship of derivative work.

In any case, these recent changes represent, for sure, a new era in trademark protection, and we certaily look forward to practice developments.

TEXT AND DATA MINING EXCEPTION - TECHNOLOGY INTO OUR LIVES

Monica LUPAȘCU

Abstract

Since 2016, when the Copyright Reform Directive (Directive in the Digital Single Market) had been proposed for adoption, two major versions of the text were under examination and negotiation in the European Parliament. The comparative study of those two legal texts proposed allowed a more comprehensive understanding of the provisions' scope as well as of the different public interests that sustained the recently introduced exceptions. This paper focuses on interpretation of the proposed provisions of text and data mining exceptions by mostly explaining the technical concepts involved. The text and data mining exception has a very important place between the proposed legal texts since its corresponding provision addresses some new type of uses that should be understood in a technological context and have the potential to affect our lives.

Keywords: data-mining, copyright exceptions, Copyright Reform, public interest, technology, Big Data,

1. Introduction. The need to know the technical implications of data-mining in the context of the new copyright changes

This paper aims at presenting the content of the text and data mining exception from a comparative perspective, showing the provision proposed in 2016[1] in parallel with the one adopted[2], to highlight some of the main changes made within its content, namely: (i) the ones regarding the expansion of the sphere of beneficiaries, (ii) modification of the automatic analysis sphere, following which data mining will function over "works and other subject matter", (iii) expanding the analysis scope, by highlighting the fact that the information generated through the process of data mining will not need to be limited to "trends, patterns, and correlations".

Without doubt, these changes would be relevant to be studied from the perspective of the interests that generated them, but before we can study the extent to which an exception can or cannot support public interests, as it is normally and naturally determined by the concept of "exception" itself and in relation to the position that the exception has as a norm, we will focus on the importance of the technical details involved, since this paper incorporates a lot of technical explanations that will translate the relevant terminology.

In addition to the importance that the technical explanations will demonstrate in relation to the study of some of the abovementioned modifications, these will also facilitate the understanding of the exception as a whole and the value it has in the general legislative framework, and not only as a part of what was called "Copyright Reform" at a European level. To identify just one example, as we will show, "data mining" is not limited only to pattern extraction or, even if it will be understood exclusively in relation to pattern recognition[3], the implications of such an assessment brings the process itself closer to artificial intelligence, and this will certainly have its say in appreciating the way in which the expansion of the beneficiary sphere can be understood, indeed as supporting public interests or, on the contrary, certain private interests.

On the contrary, omitting to study the exception by relating to as profound and correct of a study of the technical details involved in data mining, risks limiting the interpretation, the application sphere being incomplete or even completely misunderstood. The example of the erroneous translation of the Romanian version is a small one, yet edifying, the exception of the text and data mining being translated as "extraction of text and data", a title that contradicts not only what the usage within the industry defines as text and data mining, but even the very provisions of the Directive which define the activity itself[4]. The similarities with extraction of text and data, even if they exist from a semantic point of view, do not explain the activity of data mining, the extraction at all, though it exists, concerns a completely different object, with an aim to generate completely different information to the data on which the process of data mining is performed (namely, certain patterns, correlations, etc.). Without advancing too far with the details of the following chapter, we only mention that the wrongful interpretation of the process as "data extraction" takes the reader towards completely different activities, such as data analysis[5], there being some significant differences[6] between that and data mining.

In any case, this paper aims at studying the exception from the perspective of the technology involved, without insisting over some personal opinions, which, even if they could be inferred from subsequent interpretations, do not represent an objective in itself, their role being rather informative, the study being presented as a start for a future and more complex approach of the same subject not only from the standpoint of the new Copyright Directive, but also of the Directive regarding databases, the new Regulation[7] regarding the protection of personal data, as well as of the Commission's communications in the field of Artificial Intelligence[8].

2. Technical details about text and data mining

What does "text and data mining" actually mean? The Romanian version of the Directive's proposed text, mentions exclusively the extraction of text and data, which would sound, at least for a connoisseur of copyright, quite similar to the terminology that identifies the permission to use short extracts from works. This would not be hard to understand, because "mining" identifies, indeed, the action of "extracting", "removing", "taking over", in a broad sense – "separation of a substance from a compound". And yet, even if perceived exclusively as an individual term, neither "mining", nor its activity of "text and data mining", is not resumed to just that, a complete interpretation leading to concepts such as "exploitation", "transformation", and even "the release of some ideas or conclusions from a set of facts."

In fact, the technical details of data "mining", highlight, clearly, the fact that the main purpose of this activity is not the data itself, the process of extraction, although it operates on them, regards, in fact, the patterns and corresponding knowledge of this data, and not the data itself[9].

Specialized literature tends to equate data the mining of data to its exploitation, to further highlight the analytical and transformative process that is the foundation of this activity. The difference between the simple analysis of data and the exploitation of data (data mining), also mentioned in the introductory chapter, is that "data analysis" is used to test models and hypotheses on the data set in question, for example, analyzing the efficacy of a marketing campaign, regardless of the quantity of data, however, data mining (also known as "data exploitation") uses models of automated learning and statistics to discover clandestine or hidden models in a high volume of data. The analysis process and the purpose of each one is, therefore, different, the main task[10] being the semi-automatic and automatic analysis of large quantities of data[11] in order to extract previously unknown, potentially useful patterns from databases[12], such as data records (cluster analysis), unusual records (anomaly detection), and connections between data (association rule mining, sequential pattern mining).

Although a definition can be identified, including relating to what the European law has defined as being this process, "text and data mining" represents an operation fairly hard to appreciate in relation to other technological processes that work in the pattern sphere, of generating new knowledge or predictabilities, being often presented as an expression used interchangeably to also define "pattern recognition", "knowledge discovery" in databases (KDD), the abovementioned "data analysis", "artificial intelligence", and even the entire field of "data science". The differences between data mining and each of the aforementioned processes exist and, nevertheless, using data mining to designate other technological phenomena is not exactly a mistake, because such operations merge with each other, most often, being even difficult to delimit. Without a doubt there are works that have established differentiating elements, useful for both the industry, as well as for the study of the phenomena in question and implications, for example, it is stated that pattern recognition, although aiming at the same purpose as data mining, represents, along with machine learning, a supervised method, as opposed to data mining that is presented as being one of the unsupervised[13] ones.

[5] "The difference between data analysis and data mining is that data analysis is used to test models and hypotheses on the dataset, e.g., analyzing the effectiveness of a marketing campaign, regardless of the amount of data; in contrast, data mining uses machine-learning and statistical models to uncover clandestine or hidden patterns in a large volume of data." - Olson, D. [9] It should also be mentioned that, in the general sense, text information is integrated in the data category, being, in other words, a subset of it. Although the legal definition identifies, in the designation of this type of analysis, both "text" (text information), as well as "data", the explanations in this paper will regard, without any distinction, the mining of data, which practically includes the operations of the first category.

[11] Big Data

[12] It not being yet clear for most people that "text and data mining" is not just text extractions but, primarily, computerized analysis of information, and that "databases" is not limited to MySQL, but involves any collection of information, user-generated content platforms, for example, being based on such databases, collections with information generated by the activity of the users of such platforms.

In this context, it must be mentioned that, although data mining represents and activity known and practiced for approximately 20 years with profound implications including in regards to the lives of each and every one of us, and pattern extraction, although previously done manually, is hundreds of years old[14], its regulation and the regulation of technologies associated with this type of data analysis, artificial intelligence and automated data processing, only now knows a sustained approach[15], including by attempting to develop ethics policies[16] in the field of artificial intelligence. For example, the definition of artificial intelligence as it was set out through the Communication[17] of the European Commission, presents such an AI system[18] as being that which analyses the environment[19] and acts, with some autonomy, to reach certain goals[20], which would bring the concept closer to those unsupervised methods of data mining, mentioned above, perceived as being some of the analysis methods with the purpose of extracting patterns and correlations, or other types of knowledge. Of course, there is no equality sign between the two "phenomena", artificial intelligence not limiting itself to pattern extraction, and being able to autonomously act (but, in other words – unsupervised, in an independent manner in relation to other systems, or even with the human admin) to reach a larger, wider palette of purposes, nevertheless, the data mining algorithms are frequently used by AI systems, an operation which in itself represents, sometimes, the main component of such a system. On the other hand, as it's been identified through recent studies[21], the knowledge process of it is specific to both methods, and AI techniques can further augment the ability of existing data mining systems to represent, acquire, and process various types of knowledge and patterns that can be integrated into many large, advanced applications, such as computational biology, Web mining, and fraud detection.

But that "knowledge" is more than an abstract concept and the need to understand (to assimilate that knowledge) was transposed into computerized systems for a certain reason. "The traditional method of turning data into knowledge relies on manual analysis and interpretation. (…) The specialists then provide a report detailing the analysis. Be it science, marketing, finance, health care, retail, or any other field, the classical approach to data analysis relies fundamentally on one or more analysts becoming intimately familiar with the data and serving as an interface between the data and the users and products. For these (and many other) applications, this form of manual probing of a data set is slow, expensive, and highly subjective. In fact, as data volumes grow dramatically, this type of manual data analysis is becoming completely impractical in many domains. The need to scale up human analysis capabilities to handling the large number of bytes that we can collect is both economic and scientific. Because computers have enabled humans to gather more data than we can digest, it is only natural to turn to computational techniques to help us unearth meaningful patterns and structures from the massive volumes of data. Hence, KDD is an attempt to address a problem that the digital information era made a fact of life for all of us: data overload[22]."

But, perceived in abstract, mining and the data on which it operates, may seem like algorithms willing to perform only on a series of 0s and 1s. From a certain perspective this simplification wouldn't be wrong either, but despite that, we would be far from identifying real mining examples. Indeed, the process itself would not mean anything if we wouldn't be able to appreciate the environment in which these types of algorithms function, more precisely, the data that is now in abundance and that is known, effectively, as the World Wide Web, an enormous collection of information – the largest database that gathers information (or in which information gathers) in text, video, and audio formats, transposing works that are protected by copyright or not, personal data, metadata. This association with databases is not a coincidence, disposing all of the information available online, publicly, and through cloud and intranet systems, being subordinated to databases in which all of this information is organized in such a way as to be administrated or accessible to the public in a certain form. The electronic data collections that define the concept of database according to Directive 96/9/EC regarding databases[23], are not limited to those MySQL formats that professionals in the field recognize as such, being available for all desktop and mobile applications. To give an even more simple example, even if we are used to interact with the interface of a website, in fact, the interaction is made with the collection of information belonging to that website, the access of which, in reality, is called "database access."

[13] although there are several unsupervised data mining techniques (or predictive) which are appropriate when you have a specific target value you'd like to predict about your data. The targets can have two or more possible outcomes, or even be a continuous numeric value.

So, aside from the private collections[24] of research organisms and institutions, or the collections identified as such, aside from the specialized format, such as MySQL, all online information is accessible within some databases[25], whether we're looking at simple websites, or large user-generated data platforms, or e-commerce websites, news and media outlets, the only difference lies only in the size and content of the database or in the method through which it can be accessed.

Simplification of the multitude of information mentioned previously and which is found in any types of databases, public or private, is part of the mining process, the knowledge it aims towards meaning, practically, the order of some information disposed randomly and provided from different sources, to identify patterns and correlations. The essence of the data -mining is „the Pattern" - that "Consistent and recurring characteristic[26] or "trait" that helps in the identification of a phenomenon or problem, and serves as an indicator or model for predicting future behavior." Futurist and entrepreneur Ray Kurzweil considers pattern recognition so important that in his recent book, How to Create A Mind, he argued that "pattern recognition and intelligence are essentially the same thing. Expertise, in essence, is the familiarity of patterns of a specific field." A related concept is that of cause and effect[27]. "We expect meaning in the patterns we see because, in a random universe, it takes energy to create order. So when we see a particular pattern, we expect that through investigation we can identify the force that caused it. That's how we learn new things." Due to its predictable characteristics[28], patterns are also used to predict some phenomena and behaviors, and reports can be made regarding the extent to which the present databases will be capable of generating others, similar or identical. In fact, in the study "From Data Mining to Knowledge Discovery in Databases", the author stated that „data are a set of facts (for example, cases in a database), and pattern[29] is an expression in some language describing a subset of the data or a model applicable to the subset." But the relationship between data and patterns, and the fact that the latter transpose real rules for data, doesn't wholly explain what data mining is, because the result being sought isn't limited to restoring some order in chaos or a certain structure in a set of unstructured data set, but, more than that. As it's explained above, through pattern recognition it's attempted to identify causes of that other information that generated the data itself. These examples also explain the transformative process that data is subjected to, following mining there being discovered some hidden patterns and correlations, non-evident through mere analysis, highlighting them creating a completely new perspective over initial data.

From concretely identifying the elements specific to data mining, namely - databases and the type of information that is being operated on, the essential piece of the puzzle that would be missing for an integral perception of the concept, would be the concrete examples of data mining.

If we were to transpose in actuality the hypothesis in which we should understand a part of all that is stored at the level of the Internet, in a type of social media platform (an example of database in which users are the ones generating the information that end up being stored in the database of the platform in question), we should first organize the chaos of comments, photos, likes, discussion groups, and location tracking, group them according to preferences and observe what kind of correlations there are between them. These would be just a part of the possibilities that would make way for other types of information – the knowledge being sought through data mining. The example of the social media platform (Facebook, Instagram) is not coincidental, other very important examples being that of e-commerce platforms (Amazon, eMag), and especially those of large communities – like Flickr, Github, Gitlab, which constitute immense data resources generated by users, the latter two being extremely relevant to open-source development. Businesses that incorporate these services, which generate information (data) or collects it, either through user activity, or by making available some methods of interaction with products or services, are, in fact, the best examples for this paper, because in each of these cases, the providers make use of data mining methods, for all kind of reasons including those that can translate into improving user experience or subordination to various marketing strategies.

"For the purposes of this Directive, 'database' shall mean a collection of independent works, data or other materials arranged in a systematic or methodical way and individually accessible by electronic or other means."

[24] The term 'database' (...) includes a method or system of some sort for the retrieval of each of its constituent materials. A fixture list for a football league such as that at issue in the case in the main proceedings constitutes a database within the meaning of Article 1(2) of Directive 96/9. The expression 'investment in … the obtaining … of the contents' of a database in Article 7(1) of Directive 96/9 must be understood to refer to the resources used to seek out existing independent materials and collect them in the database.

Below are examples that also show specific data mining methods used to obtain certain results[30].

"Cluster Analysis is a data mining technique that is useful in marketing to segment the database and, for example, send a promotion to the right target for that product or service (young people, mothers, pensioners, etc.). Regression analysis, another data mining technique enables us to study changes, habits, customer satisfaction levels and other factors linked to criteria such as advertising campaign budget, or similar costs. Classification analysis is the data mining technique that enables recognizing the patterns (recurring schemes) inside a database thus allowing us to detect spam and improve your marketing strategy performance. To eliminate any database inconsistencies or anomalies at source, a special data mining technique is used called anomaly detection. To avoid using databases infected by intruders (individual values added by hackers, or even viruses that duplicate the data) it is sufficient to search for the intruders, a data mining technique that decontaminates the database and guarantees greater security for the entire system. Association rule learning is used for all product sale activities, especially when large volumes are concerned. Neural networks is one of the latest data mining applications whereby the means you use for marketing operations, i.e. the computer managing your database, "learns" to identify a certain pattern containing elements with precise relationships with each other. The outcome of this learning is the recognition and storing of patterns that will be useful, perhaps not immediately, but in the future to decide whether and how to pursue a goal. The same neural network can also help to recognize the composition of the product or service target more precisely. The last, essential data mining technique, or better said application, is data warehousing. We are now in the sphere of customer (and not only) profiling, especially regarding Big Data processing. Data warehousing means simplifying your database, extracting the most interesting data about your customers, simplifying the creation of detailed reports and much more besides."

3. How does the European law define data mining

The definition given by the Directive in its initial phase[31] (the DSM version proposed in 2016), identified mining of text and data as being any automated analytical technique that aims at the analysis of text and data in digital form in order to generate information such as patterns, trends and correlations. This definition has added, in the final form (meaning the version adopted on 26 March, 2019), details regarding the object over which the mining activity will be operated, replacing "text and data" with "works and other subject matter" to make even more evident the fact that not only copyrighted information are subject to mining, but also other works (including other "data" not classified as "works" that we can identify as being personal data plus data that is unprotected/unprotectable – still being, for various reasons, part of the public domain).

For a more precise highlight of the modifications from 2016 to 2019 over the exception from the directive, find below a comparative presentation of the text of art. 2, paragraph (2), as it's presented in both versions of the law:

| "text and data mining means any automated analytical technique aiming to analyse text and data in digital form in order to generate information such as patterns, trends and correlations;" | "text and data mining means any automated analytical technique aimed at analysing text and data in digital form in order to generate information which includes but is not limited to patterns, trends and correlations." |

The change made in the adopted text also generated a clear increase in the scope of the mining activity, which no longer limits to patterns, trends and correlations. It's much clearer the fact that the extraction doesn't concern the data itself that the mining will be performed on, but the previously unknown and potentially useful information of the data stored in databases[1]. This useful information represents, in essence, a first component of the knowledge sought to be obtained as a result of this analysis, which may consist of patterns, trends and correlations, but not only, obtained through the application of some techniques such as classification or characterization. It's not by accident, as shown above, that the data mining can be confused with the whole process of knowledge discovery, since the data extraction, although just one stage, represents an essential component of the process of "Knowledge Discovery in Databases" (or "KDD"). Going through such a system allows the extraction of the essence from the evaluated information, highlighting the connections between data and even the methods through which some of the data is capable of generating similar ones, as part of a process whose goal is predictability.

The legislation supports a part of these technical explanations that identify data mining as part of a data discovery and transformation process, within the recitals of the proposed Directive[2], a relevant role in this context belonging to recital 8 and the following.

In the context of the explanations that the legislator offers regarding the relevance of the new technologies for the automate analysis of electronic data, in the initial form of recital 8[3], it was appreciated that these new types of technologies would allow researchers to process high quantities of data to obtain new knowledge and discover new trends. The researchers are no longer mentioned in the new adopted version of the paragraph, mentioning only that the text and data mining activity allows for the read and analysis of a high quantity of digitally stored data with the purpose of gaining new knowledge and discovering new trends.

The lack of a limitation in the new version of the law creates, in fact, an expansion of the sphere of beneficiaries, the activity being no longer associated with a certain subject group. This is also supported by the modification process of recital 5, shifting from research to innovation[4], implying, in fact, an expansion of the sphere of beneficiaries.

Another important aspect of the provision is the fact that both versions of recital 8 mention the term of "process" or "processing", the first mention of its kind that brings copyright reform closer to the other European initiative regarding privacy[5] – as data mining and the analysis involved, regardless of the form in which it is perceived and the data on which it operates, is, above all, data processing[6], the new Regulation applicable in the field even treating in detail a form of data mining applicable to personal data, namely – online profiling[7], defined as being "any form of automated processing of personal data consisting of the use of personal data to evaluate certain personal aspects relating to a natural person, in particular to analyse or predict aspects[8] concerning that natural person's performance at work, economic situation, health, personal preferences, interests, reliability, behaviour, location or movements."

An intermediate form of the Directive (from September 2018)[9] which, even not adopted, is important to consider because it brought information to complete the definition of mining as part of a more ample process of interference on data. The text of recital 8 a) provided limitations in exercising the right of text and data mining, the "right of access" to information (lawful access) being mentioned as a condition that needs to pre-empt the activity itself to ensure what the norms called "content normalization", meaning the method through which the content's format is changed or it is extracted from a database in a format that allows the mining of data. The text of this recital 8 a) explained that the process of data mining in itself does NOT present relevance in the field of copyright, but, rather the action through which content is accessed, as well as the procedure through which a certain information is normalized to allow automatic analysis, so long as this process involves database extraction. So, the exceptions of the text and data mining need to be understood as referring/being applicable (to) processes relevant to copyright needed for mining, considered to be, at least according to the paragraph in question, not mining in itself, but "the right of access" and the right to

[2] Recitals 5-18 have been identified as being relevant for the new exception of text and data mining introduced through the proposed directive regarding copyright on the digital single market.

[3] New technologies enable the automated computational analysis of information in digital form, such as text, sounds, images or data, generally known as text and data mining. Those technologies allow researchers to process large amounts of information to gain new knowledge and discover new trends. Whilst text and data mining technologies are prevalent across the digital economy, there is widespread acknowledgment that text and data mining can in particular benefit the research community and in so doing encourage innovation. However, in the Union, research organisations such as universities and research institutes are confronted with legal uncertainty as to the extent to which they can perform text and data mining of content. In certain instances, text and data mining may involve acts protected by copyright and/or by the sui generis database right, notably the reproduction of works or other subject-matter and/or the extraction of contents from a database. Where there is no exception or limitation which applies, an authorisation to undertake such acts would be required from rightholders. Text and data mining may also be carried out in relation to mere facts or data which are not protected by copyright and in such instances no authorisation would be required.

[4] If in the initial form of this paragraph, only the "research" (meaning the activity of examination and profound analysis in a certain field made by certain identified entities) was appreciated as representing a public interest solid enough to enforce the implementation of an exception for ensuring a state of equilibrium with the rightsholders, in its revised form, "innovation" joins in as a distinct type of activity, which, although it supposes a smaller scope of actions, being limited by the creation of an improvement, of an added value, can be exercised by any entity, no longer representing a specific of certain entities.

reproduction in a format that allows automatic analysis – "but the process of accessing and the process by which information is normalised to enable its automated computational analysis, insofar as this process involves extraction from a database or reproductions." This "normalization process" is no longer taken over in its adopted form except as an independent mention within recital 8, but its explanations, as they were expressed in the intermediate form of the directive, can remain valid, because they transpose that which is essential to be studied in the context of data mining operated on data protected by copyright, namely the fact that exceptions work to create a right of access and adaptation, operations which are implicit to reproduction and other transformation specific to data mining.

In any case, even if the form adopted in 2019 no longer takes the full process description, the explanations are available, as they describe correct technical explanations, with strict regards to an essential aspect of mining, namely the data access, in our opinion implicit, but which, as we will see, will be regulated in a different way within the new articles introduced in the adopted version of the directive, namely art. 3 and 4, texts which represent, in fact, primary provisions in the context of this paper, regulating the new exceptions of text and data mining, through which transposes the permissions to perform acts of reproduction and extraction for the purpose of data mining.

Aside from the expansion of the sphere of beneficiaries, the first paragraph of art. 3 states that the subjects indicated as beneficiaries of the exception are conditioned by the existence of a "right of access" to works and materials over which the computerized analysis will be performed, which contradicts, from a certain viewpoint, what would be specific to mining, from a technical standpoint.

The term of legal access imposed as a preemptive condition in this situation, seems to contradict the very activity aimed at being legalized, as well as the concept of exception itself, which should, at least theoretically, transpose granting of some freedoms, some rights, in essence, of reproduction or extraction. But these freedoms ( or rights) cannot be exercised, in fact, except by accessing the works, for what value would granting rights of reproduction to other subjects, if the access would remain conditioned on the rightsholder's permission? It would be, most probably equivalent with granting a freedom only theoretically, as in practice it would still depend on the rightsholder's will, whereas the existence of an exception in the field of copyright consists of precisely the freeing of the public from the necessity of authorization.

Moreover, if in the case of reproduction, the possibility could be admitted that the "access" represents an earlier stage, therefore different, and which can manifest in time, previously to the act of reproduction itself, in the case of extraction, access could be confused with the action of extraction itself, and it cannot be admitted that, in fact, an extraction could be made without the actual access to the database.

The "legal access" phrase cannot be conceived outside of the concept of consent, legal access being, above all, the access that is granted, which is allowed, unrestricted, consented or accepted by those entitled to grant and coordinate it, meaning the rightsholders. The permission to access the work is, in a way, synonymous with what we could call authorization but does the lawfulness of access depend entirely on consent?

Or, in other words, are these rightsholders the only ones entitled to intervene within the action of accessing works to grant the legal attribute, to legalize it? The answer seems to be affirmative in regards to works already attributed (or that are the object of protection) but what happens in the case of those outside the scope of protection or works that, although belong to certain rightsholders, can be used/modified, in certain limits and circumstances by other individuals specifically identified as part of certain exceptions?

It's possible that the answer to these questions depends largely to the way in which the institution of copyright exceptions and limitations is interpreted, as involving rights of access or not. For more details, refer to the author's paper - Public Domain Protection. Uses and Reuses of Public Domain Works[1], in which it's appreciated that the same so-called freedoms derived from the applicability of copyright exceptions and limitation, could not be exercised without the existence of an implicit right of access, because the lack of it and the uncertainties in regards to its existence question even the validity of the exception since it is impossible to imagine the public having the possibility to reproduce texts for private purposes without first accessing those works. To call these possibilities (freedoms) "rights", whether we're talking about the right to reproduce for private purposes or the right of access (implicit, prior, necessary, obligatory) to works for the purpose of reproduction (in the same private purpose), depends on the perception of copyright as a whole, to the extent to which the public interest is or isn't appreciated as being valuable in its relationship with the interests of rightsholders.

Coming back to the text and data mining exception, a correct interpretation of what "legal access" means depends the validity of the exception itself, as a whole, as the rights conferred through derogation itself could not even be exercised in the case in which they are conditioned by an access that could be legal only to the extent that the rightsholders would decide it. Admission of this situation would be equivalent with a right of reproduction awarded only to the extent to which the rightsholders consent to it but this would have been achievable anyway, even without any regulation in regards to it, because rightsholders can grant authorization for any kind of use, including for data mining activities.

Until the emergence of the new directive[2], a legal definition of what "lawful access" means does not exist, however. Benjamin Ferrand[3] said that lawful access is not limited only to obtaining a permission, but rather to obtaining the permission that is needed for the intended use, a first conclusion that can be drawn from this opinion being that of the existence of an equivalence between right of access and right of use, as the access detached from the granted permission cannot be admitted. In this vision, the access is not general, but regards a certain type of usage.

Despite this, and especially, in the context of the new provisions in the field of copyright, we cannot place an equal sign between "access" and "use", especially considering the fact that, at the level of the current legislation the term of "access" doesn't replace but, on the contrary, is presented in addition to the term of "usage". An example is the Directive regarding databases itself, which, in Melanie Dulong de Roney's[4] opinion, grants the maker the right of "access" and "reuse". We will render below a selection of dispositions from the aforementioned Directive, in which the terms of access and use or reuse are mentioned, especially, with regards to the authorized/lawful user.

"Whereas, nevertheless, once the rightholder has chosen to make available a copy of the database to a user, whether by an on-line service or by other means of distribution, that lawful user must be able to access and use the database for the purposes and in the way set out in the agreement with the right-holder, even if such access and use necessitate performance of otherwise restricted acts;"

"Whereas the term 'database' should be understood to include literary, artistic, musical or other collections of works or collections of other material such as texts, sound, images, numbers, facts, and data; whereas it should cover collections of independent works, data or other materials which are systematically or methodically arranged and can be individually accessed*;"*

"art.1. (1) For the purposes of this Directive, 'database' shall mean a collection of independent works, data or other materials arranged in a systematic or methodical way and individually accessible by electronic or other means*."*

"art.6 (1) The performance by the lawful user of a database or of a copy thereof of any of the acts listed in Article 5 which is necessary for the purposes of access to the contents of the databases and normal use of the contents by the lawful user shall not require the authorization of the author of the database."

Indeed, each of the above texts seems to identify differently and distinctly "access" over "use", making the term of access to be perceived more as identifying the action of visualization preemptive to any form or usage. Despite this, we must consider that the general definition of access does not identify visualization or, at least, not the superficial form through which a user becomes aware of the content, but diving deeper, more profoundly, entering. We will remember this definition and we will observe that this context of databases allows the interpretation according to which, most likely, the meaning taken into account by the legislator is that access involves entering the database, similarly to the permissions which require passwords for accessing certain platforms, networks, systems.

To access, therefore, does not only mean to view and is, probably, an action that also depends on the intention of the database maker, who controls entry at the level of the data collection he owns. However, that is, even in the context in which they are accepted as being different actions, the idea of a common permission must not be rejected, which is, exactly as the law says – the access and use (being performed in the same time) (of a certain type). This is explained because, in practice, it's harder to accept a situation in which permission is granted only for access, but not for a method of usage. A different example, though, would be the one in which the lawfulness of the access depends on the rightsholder previously making available the work for the public, in which case a lawful access could be observed in the case of all information made available to the public from the rightsholder's initiative.

Without a doubt, there are also arguments for which a lawful access can only be authorized expressly by the rightsholder, the permission not being deduced from the simple public release of the work. In these two latter cases, in which, therefore, access must be authorized previously and distinctly from any other form of use, one could ask the question, what will be the situation of public information? Would these need express explanations regarding access and use for the purpose of in-depth analysis (automated processing), for example (text and data mining)? To answer this question, we can look to the new text of art. 4, interpreted in corroboration with recitals 10[5] and 14[6], newly introduced with the adopted directive, both texts transposing a view of the legislator in regards to the works made available online. And because reference to free license works – identified as being open source or creative commons, were mentioned within recital 10, a concrete example of the software development communities would be relevant to study in this context. Gitlab[7] or GitHub[8], for example, represent two of the platforms that make available software works in a collaborative system, being subordinate to open-source licenses, each of them having an immense database to which access is offered through sign-up. Undoubtedly, the interest for the mining of such databases is quite high and mainly due to the popularity among software developers, these communities attracted developers from all over the world, who brought important contributions to the industry that lead to many developments including in the field of artificial intelligence. The specific nature of these works lies, however, in the fact that they are freely licensed, most of the applicable licenses allowing reuse of those specific works[9].

Referral to art. 4 in this context is justified by the fact that, in essence, this article transcribes a data mining permission in a context that is not subordinate to research[10], permitted, practically, to all subjects of right, but conditioned by the same lawful

[5] (10) Union law provides for certain exceptions and limitations covering uses for scientific research purposes which may apply to acts of text and data mining. However, those exceptions and limitations are optional and not fully adapted to the use of technologies in scientific research. Moreover, where researchers have lawful access to content, for example through subscriptions to publications or open access licences, the terms of the licences could exclude text and data mining. As research is increasingly carried out with the assistance of digital technology, there is a risk that the Union's competitive position as a research area will suffer, unless steps are taken to address the legal uncertainty concerning text and data mining.

[6] (14) Research organisations and cultural heritage institutions, including the persons attached thereto, should be covered by the text and data mining exception with regard to content to which they have lawful access. Lawful access should be understood as covering access to content based on an open access policy or through contractual arrangements between rightholders and research organisations or cultural heritage institutions, such as subscriptions, or through other lawful means. For instance, in cases of subscriptions taken by research organisations or cultural heritage institutions, the persons attached thereto and covered by those subscriptions should be deemed to have lawful access. Lawful access should also cover access to content that is freely available online.

[9] However, an essential attribute of free licenses is the fact that reuse is conditioned on making the work available with the same open source terms. There are variations, of course, there being several types of similar licenses.

[10] Art. 3 and 4 transcribe, in fact, the two exceptions that will function for data mining operations, one that will have a purpose dedicated exclusively to research field, deduced also from the title of art. 3 and from the restricted beneficiary sphere in the field of research organizations and cultural heritage institutions, and the other – art. 4, which isn't constrained by such a beneficiary sphere, the absence of an express access mentioned in art. 3. An additional mention, which also marks an essential difference between the exception provided by art. 3, is pt. 3[11] of this article 4, in which it's mentioned that the permission in question will function only if the right was not expressly reserved by rightsholders. This mention allows the interpretation that, in the absence of an express mention that would exclude data mining from the authorizations accepted by rightsholders, the beneficiaries of the exception will be allowed to perform data mining activities on the data in question. As opposed to the art. 4 situation, in the context of mining performed by researchers (art.3), the mentions in recital 10 allow the interpretation according to which, even in the situation in which the terms of licensing will exclude mining, the permissions granted by virtue of the exception will be able to function, this also being, most probably, the reasoning that justified the adoption of a mandatory exception for the field of research.

For an overview on the way in which mining will function according to the two articles from the Directive, we consider the text of recital 14, which, although debuts with a referral to the research sphere, can be applicable in both situations, as the definition it incorporates is no longer aimed at a specific field of beneficiaries. Another argument in support of general applicability is the fact that research organizations were mentioned only with the title of example or in contexts which represent an alternative to situations of (non-differentiated) access to content based on free licenses.

"(14) Lawful access should be understood as covering access to content based on an open access policy or through contractual arrangements between rightholders and research organisations or cultural heritage institutions, such as subscriptions*, or through other* lawful means*. For instance, in cases of subscriptions taken by research organisations or cultural heritage institutions, the persons attached thereto and covered by those subscriptions should be deemed to have lawful access.* Lawful access should also cover access to content that is freely available online*."*

By virtue of the above text, a text made publicly available or to which the access is based on free license, involves, clearly, a context in which access is appreciated as being lawful, allowing mining, even in the context of art. 4, that is even in other purposes other than those of research, if we consider the provisions within the Directive. As the text of recital (14) expresses, access is interpreted as not being able to be differentiated from "viewing", with the mentions previously stated in this paper, a paper made available without the restriction of an imposed password, being considered freely accessible and, most important, freely to be mined.

We come back to the example of the aforementioned big collaborative development platforms to mention that this interpretation can only be to the detriment of these communities, the results of which could be accessed lawfully by any entity, by virtue of the above mentioned provisions. The only way to make this exception inapplicable would be, as per the text of art. 4, pt. 3, providing some special exceptions to forbid data mining, but this would only contradict the spirit by virtue of which these communities were created.

4. Conclusion

The issue of data mining is far from being resolved through this paper. Moreover, as it was mentioned at its beginning, this was not the purpose, not only due to the fairly complex technical details, but especially to the fact that the text and data mining permissions are newly regulated, there being no history of neither jurisprudence nor doctrine to support the method of approach and nuanced interpretations. In addition, the implications of the operation in itself, are multiple because, as could be seen in the chapter on technical details, operations included a lot of specific techniques, any one of which being able to operate for a variety of purposes and on a diversity of data. In this context, an aspect that could not be integrated in this paper and is necessary to be approached in other studies, is the information on which mining would be performed, the existing differences between them giving rise to new possibilities of interpretation.

Another aspect which wasn't analyzed in its entirety is that of the sphere of beneficiaries, this subject being one that could be discussed in a separate paper, as beneficiaries are to be appreciated including in correlation with the types of data on which mining could be performed. This is one very important aspect since the appropriate identification of the beneficiaries has relevance for the study of the public interest that justified the adoption of the new exceptions in the European legislation on copyright.

Despite the shortcomings generated, mainly, by the extent of the subject, this study primarily clarified essential technical details needed to understand any subsequent interpretation on the legal text of the exceptions. Moreover, the study of lawful access in this context, brings new light on works presented/made available online, especially those under free licenses.

THE PUBLIC LENDING RIGHT (PLR)

Ana-Maria MARINESCU

Abstract

The study underlines the main characteristics of the public lending right (PLR) and the systems implemented at the level of the European Union and also internationally.

In brief, the public lending right (PLR) is the economic right that allows authors and other copyright owners to receive payments in order to compensate the free loan of their books by public and other libraries. Usually, the payments are ensured by the state budget of the state in which the system is implemented.

Most PLR systems are founded in Europe (Denmark being the first country to establish a PLR system in 1946, followed by Norway in 1947 and Sweden in 1954), where the member states of the European Union are required by law, under the Rental and Lending Right Directive (Directive 2006/115/EC), to provide authors with an exclusive right over the lending out of their works or at least to provide them with a remuneration for the lending out of their works. Other systems are implemented also internationally, at the present in the world are established 33 systems and 27 countries are counted as in development, even that the public lending right is not compulsory required under any international convention or treaty, by consequence the states are not obliged to regulate or to implement it. This demonstrates the importance of the public lending right in the general context of copyright development and infrastructure.

Also, the study draws attention to the fact that in Romania the system is neither implemented nor functional, which has caused prejudice to authors and other copyright holders who have not been remunerated for the use of their works through the public lending made in libraries.

1. Introduction

The public lending right is one of the economic rights establish in the favour of the rights holders.

At international level, the treaties and conventions in the field of copyright and related rights are regulating distinctively the right of lending and the right of renting. The first is referring to activities that are made without looking for a profit, and the second for those made with the scope of obtaining a profit.

The rental right was regulated for the first time under the TRIPS[1] Agreement in connection with the letting of the originals or copies of computer programs to the public. Subsequently, the World Intellectual Property Organization Copyright Treaty[2] (Article 7) extended the scope of rental right to computer programs, cinematographic works and phonograms, and the World Intellectual Property Organization Performances and Phonograms Treaty[3] (Article 9 and 13) to works and interpretations fixed on phonograms. The Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works and the Rome Convention for the Protection of Performers, Producers of Phonograms and Broadcasting Organizations do not regulate the rental right.

The public lending right is not governed by any convention or international treaty or the TRIPS Agreement. In the mid-1990s, the World Intellectual Property Organization proposed a Protocol to amend the Berne Convention to regulate the lending right, but the proposal was not supported by the Member States.

In 1992, the European Commission adopted the Renting and Lending Right Directive[4], which is currently the only supranational law on lending, and which sets out the specific legal framework for the recognition by the Member States of the lending right for the copyright and related rights owners.

Article 1 of the Directive regulates the exclusive right of lending and Article 2 provides the definition of the lending right meaning: making available for use, for a limited period of time and not for direct or indirect economic or commercial advantage, when it is made through establishments which are accessible to the public.

The rightholders and subject matter of lending right are[5]: the author in respect of the original and copies of his work; the performer in respect of fixations of his performance; and the phonogram producer in respect of his phonograms; the producer of the first fixation of a film in respect of the original and copies of his film. The exceptions to the subject matter are: buildings and works of applied art.

The lending right may be transferred, assigned or subject to the granting of contractual licences.

Article 6 of the Directive establishes a derogation from the exclusive public lending right. In this way, the Member States may derogate from the exclusive lending right in respect of public lending, provided that at least authors obtain a remuneration for such lending. Member States shall be free to determine this remuneration taking account of their cultural promotion objectives.

Most PLR systems are founded in EU, where from 28 member countries 24 implemented PLR systems, namely: Austria, Belgium, Croatia, Czech Republic, Cyprus, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Netherlands, Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden and United Kingdom. The 4 countries in EU that have not implemented PLR systems are: Bulgaria, Greece, Portugal and Romania.

Denmark was the first country in the world that established a PLR system in 1946, followed by Norway in 1947 and Sweden in 1954.

At international level, the countries that implemented PLR systems are: Australia, Canada, Faeroe Islands, Greenland, Island, Israel, Liechtenstein, New Zeeland and Norway.

By consequence, at the present in the world are established 33 PLR systems[6]. The PLR system is not implemented in USA or Russia.

The number of the countries that implemented PLR systems demonstrates the importance of the public lending right in the general context of copyright development and infrastructure.

Still at international level, 27 countries are considering implementing PLR systems[7]: Albania, Andorra, Armenia, Butan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Switzerland, Ethiopia, Greece, Hong Kong, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kosovo, Macedonia, Malawi, Mauritius, Moldova, Mozambique, Portugal, Romania, St. Lucia, Samoa, Serbia, Singapore, Turkey and Ukraine.

Maureen Duffy, writer and veteran of the authors that led to the right being introduced in the UK in 1979 after a twenty-year struggle, summarizes PLR as follows: "First and foremost, PLR upholds the principle of 'no use without payment'. This is the basis for the concept of 'fair remuneration' which then carries over into photocopying and digital uses. It is based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by which we are entitled to receive income from any exploitation of our work. If it is claimed that this interferes with another universal right – to access to knowledge and culture – our answer is that it supports the creation of new work, and we do not ask teachers to work for nothing."[8]

2. Content

Analysing the established PLR systems in the world[9], result their main characteristics which in some cases can vary between countries.

In most of the countries the legal basis for the PLR is the copyright law like: Austria (1993), Belgium (1994), Croatia (2003), Czech Republic (2006), Estonia (2000), Finland (1963, 2007 and 2016), Germany (1972), Hungary (2008), Ireland (2007), Latvia (2000), Lithuania (1999), Luxembourg (2001), Netherlands (1988), Poland (2015), Slovakia (2015), Slovenia (1995), Spain (1994) and Sweden (1954). Some other countries provide for a particular law regarding PLR like: Australia (1974), Faeroe Islands (1988), France (2003), Italy (2206), Norway (1987) and United Kingdom (1979), and other countries regulate the PLR system through the law on public libraries: Denmark (1942), Greenland (1993) and Island (1988 and 2007). Few countries implemented the PLR system without any legal regulation like: Canada, Cyprus, Israel, Liechtenstein, Malta and New Zeeland.

All the PLR systems establish eligibility criteria for the rights holders, usually they have to register their works within the system, they must be citizens or have permanent residence in the country in which the system is implemented and must distribute the remunerations also for the foreign rights holders based on reciprocal agreements concluded with similar bodies or collective management organisations abroad. So, some of the criteria are referring to citizenship and/or language requirement. For example, in Austria beneficiaries of the PLR system are Austrian/EU citizens and permanent residents of Austria; in Canada beneficiaries are Canadian citizens wherever they reside and permanent residents of Canada; in Germany, there is no nationality or language restriction, but the distribution to foreign authors is made only through the collecting management organisations. For small countries, like Faeroe Islands and Greenland, the language and/or the citizenship are considered core restrictions, by consequence the beneficiaries must have the Faroese citizenship or must write in the Faroese, respectively the publications must be in Greenlandic or translated into Greenlandic. The same is the situation in Israel, where beneficiaries are only the citizens of Israel who write in Hebrew or Arabic.

In the majority of the countries that have implemented PLR systems the method of calculation of the remunerations is the loans based (Austria, Belgium, Croatia, Czech Republic, Estonia, Finland, Germany, Hungary, Island, Ireland, Israel, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden and United Kingdom). In some other countries, the method is the stock count (Australia, Denmark, Faeroe Islands, Greenland and Norway), or the titles published and how many libraries hold a copy of each title (Canada), or the number of copies of each eligible material (New Zeeland), or direct grants paid to rights holders (Cyprus, Finland and Norway). In France, the method of calculation is complex formed by payment per copy purchased (6% of book price) and Euro 1.5 per library member and Euro 1 for university library members.

In conclusion, the remuneration due to the rights owners is calculated based on the number of loans of the work made through public libraries, or remuneration is paid depending on the number of copies of books of an author under the stock libraries, or on the number of users of public libraries, or through direct grants to the rights holders.

The eligible materials are in the majority of the countries the books. Some other eligible materials are the audiovisual works (Austria, Belgium, Germany, and Italy), recorded music or phonograms (Denmark, Latvia, and Lithuania), multimedia materials (Netherlands) and sheet music (Latvia). Very important, in some of the countries, eligible materials are also the e-books and/or the audio books (Belgium starting from 2017, Denmark starting from 2018, Germany, Greenland, Island, Italy, and United Kingdom starting from 2010 for the audio books and from 2017 all the e-books).

For introducing the e-books as eligible materials and for establishing the notion of e-lending, the judgement of the Court of Justice of the European Union in the Case C-174/15 Vereniging Openbare Bibliotheken v Stichting Leenrecht, a reference for a preliminary ruling from the Rechtbank Den Haag — Netherlands, was very important.

The Court ruled that the[10]:

- Article 1(1), Article 2(1)(b) and Article 6(1) of Directive 2006/115/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December 2006 on rental right and lending right and on certain rights related to copyright in the field of intellectual property must be interpreted as meaning that the concept of 'lending', within the meaning of those provisions, covers the lending of a digital copy of a book, where that lending is carried out by placing that copy on the server of a public library and allowing a user to reproduce that copy by downloading it onto his own computer, bearing in mind that only one copy may be downloaded during the lending period and that, after that period has expired, the downloaded copy can no longer be used by that user.
- the EU law, and in particular Article 6 of Directive 2006/115, must be interpreted as not precluding a Member State from making the application of Article 6(1) of Directive 2006/115 subject to the condition that the digital copy of a book made available by the public library must have been put into circulation by a first sale or other transfer of ownership of that copy in the European Union by the holder of the right of distribution to the public or with his consent, for the purpose of Article 4(2) of Directive 2001/29/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 May 2001 on the harmonisation of certain aspects of copyright and related rights in the information society.
- Article 6(1) of Directive 2006/115 must be interpreted as meaning that it precludes the public lending exception laid down therein from applying to the making available by a public library of a digital copy of a book in the case where that copy was obtained from an illegal source.

Some of the systems are excluding from payment categories of materials like: textbooks for student use, remaindered books, old or used books, sheet music, self-published books sold by authors, journals, magazines etc. (France) or non-fiction books (Israel).

Taking into account the eligible materials the main eligible recipients (rights owners) are the authors, illustrators, editors, translators and publishers. In some countries, the eligible recipients are also the performers and producers (Belgium, Latvia), photographs (Czech Republic, Ireland, and Netherlands), composers (Denmark and Island), film producers (Latvia), directors and screen writers (Slovenia). The diversity of the PLR systems indicates that some countries limit the eligible recipients only to authors (Hungary, Malta, New Zeeland, Norway, Slovakia and Spain) or are excluding from the payment the editors/publishers (Denmark and Finland).

The general fund for PLR is allocated from the state budget, central or local. In general, the remunerations distributed to the rights holders are modest, establishing the maximum and the minimum remunerations to be paid. For example, the maximum remuneration that can be paid to an author in United Kingdom is £ 500.

From this point of view, was very important the judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Union in the Case C-271/10 Vereniging van Educatieve en Wetenschappelijke Auteurs (VEWA) v Belgische Staat, a reference for a preliminary ruling from the Belgian Raad van State (Belgian Council of State)[11].

VEWA, a Belgian collective management organisation, brought an action in the Belgian courts to annul the Royal Decree transposing Directive 92/100/EEC on rental right and lending right and on certain rights related to copyright in the field of intellectual property (now replaced by 2006/115/EC). According to VEWA, by fixing a flat rate of remuneration of 1 EUR per adult per year and 0.50 EUR per child per year, Article 4 of the Royal Decree infringed the provisions of Directive 92/100/EEC which require that 'equitable remuneration' be paid in respect of a loan or rental.

Consequently, the Belgian court asked the Court of Justice whether Directive 92/100/EEC precludes a national system under which the remuneration payable to authors in the event of public lending is calculated exclusively in accordance with the number of borrowers registered with public establishments, in particular libraries, on the basis of a flat-rate sum fixed per borrower per year.

The Court of Justice ruled that the remuneration must enable authors to receive an adequate income; its amount cannot be purely symbolic. Even though it is in the discretion of the Member States to determine the most relevant criteria when calculating the amount of the remuneration within their own territory, the amount of the remuneration payable should take account of the extent to which those works are made available, as that remuneration constitutes consideration for the harm caused to authors by reason of the use of their works without their authorisation. Thus, a public lending establishment should take account of the number of protected works made available. Large public lending establishments should pay a greater level of remuneration than smaller establishments. Also, account should be taken of the number of persons having access to the protected works, i.e. the borrowers registered with an establishment.

Also, the Court of Justice ruled that the Belgian royal decree takes into account the number of borrowers registered with public lending establishments, but not the number of works made available to the public. Moreover, given that the Royal Decree provides that in case a person is registered with a number of establishments, the remuneration is payable only once regarding that person, that system may have the result that many establishments are, de facto, almost exempted from the obligation to pay any remuneration in accordance with Directive 92/100.

In conclusion, the Court of Justice held in the VEWA Case that the Belgian law does not comply with Article 5(1) of Directive 92/100/EEC, as it does not take into account, on the one hand, the number of a copyright owner's works made available by a lending establishment, and, on the other hand, the number of establishments lending a particular work.

In some systems, the remuneration shall be distributed also to pension funds, health insurances, grants or scholarships (for example, in Austria 26% of funds are allocated to the social needs of the authors, in Germany 55% for health insurances, in Slovenia 50% for grants and scholarships, in Sweden and France for supplementary pensions).

In the majority of the countries, the system is managed by a collective management organisation (in Austria by Literar Mechana[12], in Belgium by Reprobel[13], in Croatia by ZAMP[14], in Czech Republic by DILIA for authors, translators, adaptors and by OOA-S for illustrators, photographers, in Finland by SANASTO for authors, KOPIOSTO for artists and TEOSTO for composers, in France by SOFIA[15], in Germany by VG Wort for authors and Bild Kunst for artists, in Hungary by MISZJE[16], in Latvia by AKKA/LAA[17], in Liechtenstein by ProLitteris[18], in Lithuania by LATGA-A[19], in Luxembourg by LUXORR[20], in Netherlands by Stichting Leenrecht[21] working with LIRA[22], in Poland by Copyright Polska[23], in Slovak Republic by LITA[24] and in Spain by CEDRO[25]). Also, in other countries the system is managed by state or government departments (Australia, in Canada by PLR Commission under the Canada Council for the Arts, in Denmark by the Agency for Culture and Palaces / Literature, in Estonia by the Authors Remuneration Fund, Island, in Ireland by the PLR office under The Library Council, in Malta by the National Book Council, Norway, Slovenia by the Slovenia Book Agency and in Sweden by the Swedish Authors Fund), by the writers unions (Cyprus and in Italy by the Federazione Unitaria Italiana Scrittori) or by the National Library (Faeroe Islands, Greenland, New Zeeland and United Kingdom).

In the majority of the PLR systems, the libraries covered are the public ones, including specific libraries like educational or scientific ones (Australia, and Austria), on contrary in some countries the educational or scientific libraries are excluded (Belgium, Italy, Latvia and Luxembourg), and also the university and schools' libraries (Denmark, Faroe Islands, France, Germany, Island and Norway).

In Romania, according with the Article $14^4$ alin. (1) of Law on copyright and related rights, lending means making available for use, for a limited period and without a direct or indirect economic or commercial advantage, of a work through the agency of an institution allowing access of the public for this purpose, and PLR is regulated at the same article alin. (2) and (3) as follows:

"(2) Lending through the agency of libraries does not require author's authorization and entitles him to an equitable remuneration. This right cannot be waived.

(3) Equitable remuneration provided for under paragraph (2) shall not be owed, if the lending is made through the libraries of educational establishments as well through public libraries with free access".

The Rental and Lending Directive was transposed into Romanian domestic law starting from 2004, based on the provisions of Law no. 285 amending and completing the Law no. 8/1996, thus regulating the legal regime of PLR.

As results from the above-mentioned legal dispositions, the provisions of the Directive have been incorrectly transposed into the national law, since libraries in all educational institutions and all public libraries with free access are exempt from the payment of PLR equitable remuneration. For this reason, the PLR system has not been put into practice, and currently there is no methodology on PLR, so the collective management organisations have not collected PLR remunerations, and the right holders have not benefited from the appropriate remuneration.

Not even in 2018, when the Law on copyright and related rights was republished, as amended and supplemented[26], this problematic aspect of PLR, wasn't took into consideration by the legislator.

The latest developments in the field date from 2018, when the collective management organisations in the field of written works (books) and visual arts under the supervision and coordination of the Romanian Copyright Office have proposed new amendments of the Law on copyright and related rights regarding the PLR and have argued to the Ministry of Finance the necessity to allocate from the state budget a minimum amount for implementing the PLR system. The Ministry of Finance has declined its competence in the field, indicating the Ministry of Culture and National Identity as the specialized body of the central public administration with attributions regarding the drafting or endorsement of normative acts in the field, including PLR, as well as the initiator of the Law on copyright and related rights.

By consequence, the copyright holders and the collective management organisations in the field will continue their efforts towards the Ministry of Culture and National Identity and the Romanian Government in order to implement the PLR.

3. Conclusions

The PLR systems are covered under the umbrella of PLR International (PLRI) that brings together countries with PLR systems in order to facilitate the exchange of best practice. PLRI also provides advice and technical assistance to countries looking to set up PLR systems for the first time[27].

PLR currently applies in many countries to both printed books and a range of audiovisual material (including 'talking books') lent out by public libraries. In these countries a wider range of creators will therefore be eligible for payment, including authors, composers, publishers, producers and performers[28].

Being an important source of remuneration for the copyright owners, the states should pay more attention for regulating and implementing in the national legislation the PLR system. The same is the case of Romania in which the PLR system is not implemented nor functional.

All the Romanian interested entities, including the Romanian Government should take the necessary measures for implementing the PLR.

PLAGIARISM IN THE CASE OF DOCTORAL THESIS AND THE SANCTIONING OF THIS TYPE OF PLAGIARISM

Dantes MARCOVICI[*]

Abstract

Considering the magnitude of the phenomenon in general and the public debate on plagiarism, in the present study I proposed to analyze the plagiarism situation, with particular reference to doctoral theses.

Thus, I will present the regulation in the Romanian legal framework of the notion of plagiarism and the content of the obligation regarding the violation of good conduct in research and development through plagiarism and self- plagiarism.

At the same time, will be annalyzed the possible consequences of the plagiarism ascertained both before and after the granting of the doctor's degree, with the presentation of the situation of notifications through the CNATDCU, the way of sanctioning the plagiarism deeds, as well as the participation of the general public in the reporting of breaches of the norms of academics conduct on publicly presented doctoral theses.

Introduction

It is unequivocal that plagiarism makes the world of knowledge more fragile and, in this context, there is justification for the growing concern of the public to report such facts, especially from the academic sphere.

As the phenomenon of plagiarism in general and the public debate on plagiarism is of interest, I will analyze the plagiarism situation, with particular reference to doctoral theses.

At present, in Romania, there is a strong concern at the legislative level for the prevention, detection and sanctioning of plagiarism deeds, as well as the participation of the general public in the reporting of violations of the academic conduct norms regarding publicly presented doctoral theses.

1. The notion of plagiarism and self-plagiarism

1. 1. Etymology and short history

The term plagiarism comes from the Latin word "plagiarius", which translates as a person that kidnaps children or who sells a free person as slave and was first used when the Roman poet Martial accused his rival, Fidentinus, of unfair appropriation of his lyrics.[1]

The concept of plagiarism was born in the form close to the one we know today as a result of two important socio-cultural revolutions: the transition from an oral culture to a culture of writing and the mass reproduction of written texts after the descovering of the tipography in the years 1440.[2]

However, the exclusive outline of the negative meaning of the term appeared only in the 18th century[3], with the valorisation of the idea of originality, although the historical and cultural context of those times polished the idea of originality so as to encompass, for example, the writings assumed aluzive, imitative or derived from previous literary[4] or scientific[5] writings.

With the gradual overturning of the humanist trend, suggesting a return to the Greek-Roman antiquities, considered to be the real standards of life, of thinking and artistic creation, and the adoption of the principles of Romanticism, which included the emergence of an economic link between the authors and the recipients of works, the idea of protecting intellectual property has emerged.

As a result of the French Revolution, this principle was first established in France in the Chapelier Law of 1791, which stated that "the most sacred and personal of all properties is that of the creation - the fruit of a writer's thinking."

These ideas were subsequently transposed into many legal systems in Europe, in particular. However,

Plagiarism was not perceived as an act devoid of academic ethics than in the second half of the nineteenth century.[6]

1.2. Legal regulation in the Romanian legal framework. Definitions

According to Art. 310 of the National Education Act Nr. 1/2011, constitutes serious misconduct from good conduct in scientific research and university activity: a) Plagiarism of other authors ' results or publications; b) Manufacture of results or replacement of results with fictitious data.

The deed of plagiarism can meet the material element of a crime, according to art. 141 of the Law No. 8/1996, which criminates the action of appropriation, without right, of the work of another author and the presentation of that work as an intellectual creation of the perpetrator.

According to art. 4 para. (1) letter d) of Law No. 206/2004 on good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation, Plagiarism is defined as "exposure in a written work or oral communication, including in electronic form, of texts, expressions, ideas, demonstrations, data, assumptions, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from written works, including in electronic form, of other authors, without mentioning this and without referring to the original sources ".

At the same time, the self-plagiarism, according to art. 4 para. (1) letter e) of Law No. 206/2004, represents 'the exposure in a written work or oral communication, including in electronic form, of texts, expressions, demonstrations, data, assumptions, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from written works, including in electronic form, of the same author/s, without mentioning this and without referring to the original sources '.

From the legal definitions of the two terms, it follows that there are certain traits for the qualification of a deed either as plagiarism or as self-plagiarism, as a proxime type:

1. The preexistence of a written work, which constitutes the source of inspiration;
2. The appropriation of texts, phrases, demonstrations, data, assumptions, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from that pre-existing written work by inserting into another written work;
3. Lack of a bibliographical reference to draw attention to this.

The specific difference characteristic of self-plagiarate is that the pre-existing work belongs to the same author/s.

As regards the third condition, it must be noted that that obligation implies either the performance of a classical reference, by indicating the name of the author, the name of the written work, the publishing house which published the pre-existing works, the place and year of publication, identification of the takeover by the corresponding page/chapter number, by an unambiguous delimitation of the appropriated text and of its own contribution (e.g. by quotation marks) or a simplified reference, with references to the content of another work.[7]

It is appropriate to mention the definition that the National Ethics Council for Scientific Research, technological development and Innovation in the Ministry of Research and Innovation included it in a guide published by this institution. Thus, "plagiarism is the takeover by an author of elements of the intellectual creation work of another author and their presentation in the public space as components of their own works. Plagiarism is the result of the action to raise and refer to the work generated by unlawful takeover, intentional or not, from a deontological standpoint. "[8]

It is worth noting, as is also inferred from the legal texts, that it is not relevant in the aspect of the subjective side if the deed is committed intentionally or by fault, or as a simple mistake. For example, the plagiarizing person does not know the rules of academic citation or considers, wrongly, that the text that it appropriates belongs to the public patrimony.[9]

We can conclude, by using real examples to show the facts of possible plagiarism in the academic field, that there may be plagiarism in the case of the contraction of an original idea by paraphrazing, but the indication of the source is omitted, by using, in the contents of an academic work, tables, images, graphs, data, etc. originating from another written work, but without indicating the bibliographical source, the partial or total translation of a text without mentioning the original bibliographical source, The use of the Grosso modo of a work drawn up by another person and its presentation as own, etc.

The object of the academic activity must, on the one hand, prove the ability to investigate and draw up a research paper with a certain scientific value and, on the other hand, advancement in research, which is, in fact, the primary purpose of justification of such action.

Finally, it should be noted that ideas, assumptions, theories are not protected in itself by intellectual property rules, by copyright Law No.

8/1996, which excludes from the protection of the ideas, but it is incumbent upon the authors to take academic ethics to mention the takeover of other authors ' IDs and to report their own contributions in connection with them in accordance with Law No. 206/2004.[10][10]

1.3. The personal scope of the rules

As previously stated and the provisions of art. 1 para. (1) of the Law No. 206/2004, it protects good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation.

According to the provisions of art. 1 para. (4) of Law No. 206/2004, the obligations relate to the categories of staff provided for in Law No. 319/2003, as well as to other categories of staff, from the public or private environment, benefiting from public funds of development and investigations.

In accordance with the provisions of art. 6 of Law No. 319/2003 on the Staff Regulations of the investigation-development personnel, the categories of staff referred to in are research-development staff, academics, auxiliary staff from the research-development activity and staff in the functional apparatus.

In interpreting the notion of investigation-development staff, it must be used the provisions of article 26 letter (a) of law No. 319/2003, according to which the professional improvement of the investigation-development staff is mainly carried out, inter alia, through doctoral degrees.

By G.R. No. 681/2011, the code of doctoral studies was adopted. According to art. 17 para. (5) letter (e) of this act, the Doctoral School regulation establishes mandatory criteria, procedures and standards for, inter alia, ' ways to prevent fraud in scientific research, including plagiarism '.

As regards the addressee of special liability, art. 20 para. (3) of the Code establishes that ' in the case of possible academic fraud, violations of university ethics or misconduct from good conduct in scientific research, including Plagiarism, the PhD student and/or doctoral director respond under the law. “

Specifically, according to art. 65 para. (7) of that code, ' the doctoral director shall be held accountable with the author of the thesis on compliance with the standards of quality or professional ethics, including ensuring the originality of the content, according to the provisions of art. 170 of the Law No. 1/2011 “.

Therefore, the obligations relating to good conduct in academic scientific research arising from the identification and elimination of the facts of plagiarism and self-plagiarism are incumbent to the PhD student and/or the doctoral leader under the law.

2. Content of the obligation on good conduct in investigation-development, plagiarism and self-plagiarism

There are two types of obligations set out in art. 24 of Law No. 319/2003 on the investigation-development staff duty, to respect the ethics and deontology of the research and development activity and to respect intellectual property rights.

For these facts, the penalties are laid down distinctly, for the first obligations there is a sanctionality set out in the code of Ethics and professional deontology of investigation-development staff and for the other obligations there are penalties provided for in Law No. 64/1991 on invention patents, republished, with the previous amendments, in Law No. 129/1992 on the protection of designs, republished, and in Law No. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, with subsequent amendments and additions.

The conclusion drawn from the mere reading of the indicated normative provisions shows that the legislature does not assimilate the obligation to respect the ethics and deontology of the investigation-development activity with the obligation to respect intellectual property rights. These obligations are distinctly regulated, as are the incident sanctions, which can also be applied cumulatively, and the procedures for the application of sanctions.

As previously stated, the Law No. 8/1996 penalises, inter alia, the act of plagiarism falling within the sphere of criminal offence, and the Law No. 206/2004 penalises the contravention offences concerning plagiarism.

2. 1. Synthetic description of the process of obtaining a doctor's title

The organisation and functioning of doctoral schools is governed by Law No. 1/2011. According to art. 158 para. (1) of the law, ' doctoral degree programmes shall be organized in doctoral schools accredited or provisionally authorised '. Likewise, “universities, i.e. partnerships or consortals of one or more doctoral schools accredited or provisionally authorised constitute an organisational institution of doctoral University studies”.

Para. (6) of the same legal text mentions two types of doctoral studies: Scientific doctorate, “which has as its purpose the production of original scientific knowledge, internationally relevant, on the basis of scientific methods, organised only in the form of a frequency education ', respectively the professional doctorate, ' in the field of arts or sports, which has as its purpose the production of original knowledge on the basis of the application of the scientific method and the systematic reflection '.

The duration of a doctoral study program is of 3 years, but can be extended by 1-2 years, with the approval of the University Senate. The ministry's funding is achieved through the annual allocation of grants, based on a methodology for calculating the funding of universities.

The process that a PhD student goes through to get a doctor's title is long and etapized. First, the doctoral work is elaborated at universities, under the guidance of a scientific coordinator. Subsequently, if an agreement is obtained for the realisation of public presentation, from the Guidance Commission and the Scientific Coordinator, the latter will propose a doctoral committee consisting of at least five members, the specialists in the field of reference, of which at least two are not affiliated to the institution that organizes doctoral University studies, and one is the scientific leader. The composition of the Commission will be approved by the Council of Doctoral and University school.

The members of the Board of support shall individually analyse the work and carry out a reference, the doctorate will publicly present the work, in the presence of at least four members of the Committee, and the references shall be made public with this circumstance. The President of the Commission will form minutes of the presentation. If the doctoral student receives one of the "excellent", "very good", "good" or "satisfactory" ratings, the work is submitted for analysis to a specialized committee in the reference field, which operates within the CNATDCU.

CNATDCU bases the measure of approval or rejection of the doctoral thesis reference. In the case of approval of the reference, the award of the University's PhD is made by order of the Minister of Education.

2. 2. Possible consequences of plagiarism found prior to the granting of a doctor's title

According to art. 65 para. (5) of the Code of doctoral studies, "The doctoral thesis is an original work, and it is compulsory to mention the source for any material taken over". Article. 67 para. (3) provides that ' following the identification of breaches of good conduct in Investigation - Development inclusively the plagiarising of the results or publications of other authors, the production of results or the replacement of results with fictitious data, when it is made the evaluation of the PhD thesis by the PhD leader or the Guidance Committee, the public support agreement shall not be obtained. "

It is therefore incumbent on the doctoral leaders and the Guidance Committee to identify the violations of good conduct in Investigation - Development and the sanction which they apply to the doctoral student, in the event that an infringement of the the abovementioned obligation, is the failure to grant the public presentation of the doctoral work.

The first thesis of art. 68 para. (2) of the code, provides that, if a member of the Doctoral Committee identifies in the assessment of the thesis, prior to public presentation, serious misconduct from good conduct in scientific research and academic activity, including the Plagiarism of the results or publications of other authors, it is for him to refer the matter to the ethics committee of the Higher Education institution in which the student-PhD is registered and the Ethics Committee of the institution in which is employed the doctoral leader for the analysis and resolution of the case, including by expelling the PhD student, according to art. 306-310 and 318-322 of the Law No. 1/2011 and the provisions of Law No. 206/2004 on good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation.

According to the second sentence of art. 68 para. (2) of the code, if a member of the Doctoral committee identifies, in the assessment of the thesis, in the public presentation, serious misconduct from good conduct in scientific research and academic activity, including the plagiarism of the results or publications of other authors, shall be subject to the following obligations:

- The obligation to notify the ethics committee of the higher Education institution in which the PhD student is registered and the Ethics Committee of the institution in which the doctoral leader is employed for the analysis and settlement of the case, including by expelling the PhD student, according to art. 306-310 and 318-322 of the Law No. 1/2011 and the provisions of Law No. 206/2004 on good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation;
- the obligation to bring the deviations to the knowledge of the other members of the doctoral Committee and to propose the award of the ' unsatisfactory ' qualification.

According to the provisions of art. 69 para. (5) of the same act, if such a qualification is attributed, the doctoral committee must show the content to be remade or supplemented in the doctoral thesis and calls for a new public presentation of the thesis.

The second public presentation of the thesis takes place in front of the same doctoral committee as in the case of the first one. If the same qualification is obtained at second public presentation, the title of Doctor shall not be granted and the PhD student is expelled.

After the public presentation of the work, it may happen that the National Council for Attestation of titles, diplomas and university certificates (hereinafter referred to as "the CNATDCU") argumentatively invalidates the doctoral thesis, and the institution that organizes studies of Doctoral degree receives from the Ministry of Education, Research, Youth and Sport a written motivation of invalidation, drafted on the basis of the CNATDCU observations. The doctoral work may be retransmitted to the CNATDCU within one year from the date of the first invalidity. If the PhD thesis is invalidated for the second time, the title of the doctor will not be granted, and the student-doctor will be expelled.

It is therefore possible for the plagiarate to be identified prior to public presentation and prior to the establishment of the Doctoral committee,by the doctoral coordinator or any of the members of the Guidance Committee, who are required not to give their consent to public presentation under such conditions.

Prior to public presentation, but subsequent to the establishment of the Doctoral committee, any of the members of the Commission who founds indications of plagiarism are required to notify the ethics committee of the higher education institution in which it is registered the PhD student and the Ethics commission of the institution in which the doctoral leader is employed for the analysis and resolution of the case, including by expelling the PhD student.

In the context of public presentation, any of the members of the doctoral committee who find that there are indications of plagiarism the publications of other authors, have both the obligation to refer the ethics committee of the higher education institution in which it is registered the PhD student and the Ethics Committee of the institution in which the doctoral leader is employed for the analysis and resolution of the case, including by expelling the PhD student and the obligation to notify the other members of the Doctoral Committee about the deviations and propose the awarding of the ' unsatisfactory ' qualification.

After the public presentation, but prior to the granting of the title of Doctor by Order of the Minister of Education, CNATDCU, in the context of the evaluation of the doctoral thesis, has the obligation to observe a possible failure to comply with the standards of professional ethics, including the existence of Plagiarism, in the thesis and/or activities that led to its realization. If such a finding occurs, members of the CNATDCU invalidate the doctoral thesis, communicate these findings to the other members of the evaluation Board and notify the matter to the General Board of the CNATDCU for the analysis of the responsibility of PhD leader or of the doctoral school.

According to the provisions of art. 69 para. (5) of the Code, the General Board of the CNATDCU, notified by one or some of the members of the CNATDCU that evaluate the PhD thesis, may decide to withdraw the quality of doctoral leader and/or withdraw the accreditation of the doctoral school, if the case may be.

These penalties will be applied by taking into account the social hazard of the offence, the manner of plagiarism or violation of the standards of professional ethics, the consequences of such deeds, the possible complicity of the members of the Committees of Evaluation of the thesis, etc. For example, in the context of the individualisation of the Act, the CNATDCU General Council cannot decide to withdraw of the accreditation of the doctoral school, where plagiarism is not coarse/gross, and the institution has taken the incumbent measures upon it according to the law to avoid such situations.

Anyway, according to Order No. 5403/2018 on the establishment of the methodology for the evaluating of doctoral studies and the systems of criteria, standards and performance indicators used in the evaluation, for the accreditation and periodic evaluation of doctoral schools and of doctoral academic studies, the institution of doctoral academic studies must meet certain criteria, standards, performance indicators, including:

- the existence and use of a software and evidence of its use to verify the percentage of similarity in all doctoral theses;
- to allow each doctoral student the access, on request and with the consent of the doctoral leader, to an electronic system for verifying the degree of similarity with other existing scientific or artistic creations.

In the light of the foregoing, it must also be pointed out that the failure to comply with the obligations imposed by law in relation to the discovery and sanctioning of the facts of plagiarism to the members of the Guidance Committee and the Doctoral Committee may be penalised from disciplinary perspective and/or, where appropriate, criminal.[11][11]

2. 3. Possible consequences of plagiarism found after the award of the Doctor's title

According to art. 1 para. (3) of Law No. 206/2004, the procedures for the application of disciplinary sanctions provided for in the Code of Ethics and professional deontology of the investigation-development staff are ' brought together in the code of ethics, in compliance with the provisions of this law and of the Law on national education no.1/2011 ".

With regard to the power to ascertain the conduct of plagiarism and self-plagiarism and to impose sanctions, it should be noted that it does not lie with the courts. However, the courts may, if they are seised, verify the legality of the administrative provisions issued by the competent bodies under the special legislation in the matter, in particular according to Law No. 554/2004 on administrative litigation, supplemented by common law rules of civil procedure. Under Art. 10 of that law, the substantive settlement of the application requesting the annulment of acts issued by the central organs of the public administration (such as the Minister for Education or the CNATDCU) is the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal of the applicant's domicile.

The procedures for the application of penalties under the laws of intellectual property rights are governed by special laws and by the Code of Civil Procedure, and the power to resolve infringement proceedings rests solely with the judicial courts.

According to art. 68 para. (3) of the code, "if the PhD student has fulfilled all the requirements laid down in the scientific research program and the assessments on the doctoral thesis allow the attribution of the qualification " excellent ", " very good ", " good "or " Satisfactory ", the Doctoral committee proposes to grant the title of Doctor. The proposal shall be submitted to the CNATDCU for validation. CNATDCU, following the evaluation of the file, proposes to the Minister of Education, Research, Youth and Sports to grant or not to grant the title of Doctor. "

According to art. 69 para. (1) of the Code, "the title of Doctor shall be awarded by order of the Minister of Education, Research, Youth and Sports after the validation of the doctoral thesis by CNATDCU".

2.3.1. Referrals via the CNATDCU

After granting the title of Doctor, under the above-mentioned conditions, any natural or legal person, including the members of the CNATDCU and of the doctoral academic study institution, may refer in writing, through the Executive establishment for the financing of higher education, research, development and innovation (public institution subordinated to the Ministry of Education), the General Council of the CNATDCU on non-compliance with quality or professional ethical standards , including the existence of plagiarism, in a doctoral thesis, irrespective of the date of its presentation, and of the date of the award of the Doctor's title.

The importance of complying with anti-plagiarism rules may be drawn from the fact that no limitation period has been foreseen for the finding and sanctioning of such a fact.[12][12]

If such a referral is recorded, the General Council of CNATDCU shall have a period of 45 days to analyse and decide on the basis of the evaluation of the work within the limits of the referral. In order to resolve the referral, the General Council may consult any other members of the CNATDCU and/or decide to consult external experts. In the choice of these consultants, the lack of any conflict of interest with the author or the doctoral leader must be ensured.

Within the period of 45 days, the General Council of the CNADTCU shall request the institution of Doctoral University studies the opinion on those presented in the referral. The institution shall, in turn, have a deadline of 30 days from receipt of the request to formulate in writing the point of view. If the institution confirms the violation of standards of quality or professional ethics, it shall transmit to the CNADTCU the decision on the proposal to withdraw the title, signed by the Rector or, as a matter of case, by the president of the Romanian Academy, duly endorsed by the Legal view of the university or, in the case, by the Romanian Academy.

Within the period laid down in para. (2) The General Board of the CNATDCU decides whether or not the standards of quality or professional ethics have been complied with, including the existence of plagiarism, and the president of the CNATDCU shall transmit to the author of the referral, to the author of the thesis and to the Doctoral academic studies organisers the decision of the General Council of the CNATDCU and its motivation. These Parties shall have 10 days to formulate any appeal concerning the procedure and the General Board of the CNATDCU has 10 days to respond to the appeal.

Where the General Council of the CNATDCU decides that the standards of quality or professional ethics have not been complied with, including in relation to plagiarism, the president of the CNATDCU proposes to the Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research one or more of the following sanctions, as provided for in art. 170 of the Law No. 1/2011 that refer to the same penalties:

a) withdrawal of the quality of doctoral leader;
b) withdrawal of the doctor's title;

The minister, following this proposal, on the basis of the legal opinion of the Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research, has the obligation to take these measures, if any. The Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research shall inform all parties of the provisions issued.

Specifically, with regard to the penalty for the withdrawal of the title of Doctor, the Minister for National Education and Scientific Research shall issue an order[13] in this respect, in accordance with art. 13 para. (3) of GR No. 44/2016 on the organisation and functioning of the Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research. Under this administrative text, "in the exercise of its duties, the Minister of National Education and Scientific Research shall issue orders and instructions under the law."

2.3.2. Proposals formulated by CSCS, CEMU or CNECSDTI

According to art. 170 of the Law No. 1/2011, the Ministry may take one of the abovementioned sanctions also on a proposal from the National Council for Scientific Research, the Council of Ethics and university management or the National Ethics Council for Scientific Research, Technological development and innovation.

I. CSCS

According to art. 158 para. (4) of Law No. 1/2011 and the order of the Ministry of Research and Innovation No. 213/2017 on the approval of the regulation on the organisation and functioning of the National Council for Scientific Research and its nominal composition, the National Scientific Research

[12] The absence of a limitation period for the finding and sanctioning of the offence is found in most of the law systems. For example, in Hungary, on 29 March 2012, to the President of the Hungarian Republic, Pál Schmitt, they withdrew his Ph.D. for a thesis presented 20 years before the Olympics, which takes a French text of a Bulgarian author. He was forced to resign from the post of President of the Republic of Hungary on 2 April 2012

Council (hereinafter referred to as "CSCS") has, among others, the drafting tasks of the reports on the quality of research for the evaluation of doctoral schools. In exercising this task, it may propose penalties such as the withdrawal of the accreditation of the doctoral school, if a violation of the rules on quality or professional ethics is found, including in relation to Plagiarism.

II. CEMU

According to art. 23 of the rules of organisation and functioning of the Council of Ethics and University management, approved by the Order of the Minister of National Education and Scientific Research Nr. 6085/2016 on the establishment of the Ethics and University Management Council and the approval of the regulation on the organisation and functioning of the Ethics and University Management Council, that body (hereinafter referred to as ' the Cemu ') shall rule on the university ethics disputes and examines cases relating to deviations from ethical and university management norms, following referrals or by self-referral, according to the law, after their subject was analyzed in the Faculty/University.

By Art. 24 para. (1) any physical or legal person may refer the matter to the CEMU in relation to non-compliance by a higher education institution or by a member of the university community, inter alia, of the obligations laid down in art. 170 of the Law No. 1/2011.

It is incumbent upon the Cemu to investigate the matters referred to it within 3 months of the date of receipt of the referral. Cemu decisions shall be forwarded to the parties through the Commission's Technical Secretary Department.

The Cemu shall reply to the Ministry, by means of a judgment, within one month from the date of referral, where it is requested to draw up a report assessing compliance with professional ethics standards in relation to doctoral activity, in accordance with the provisions of art. 170 of the Law No. 1/2011. The CEMU shall inform the Ministry of the complaints received and of the judgments adopted.

In conducting its analysis, the CEMU may hear persons directly or indirectly involved in the facts referred to, the sender of the referral, persons from the management of the institutions involved in the facts referred to or independent experts, with the keeping of the privacy.

III. CNECSDTI

According to art. 4 letters b) – e) of the rules of organisation and functioning of the National Council of Ethics of Scientific research, technological development and innovation, approved by the Order of the Ministry of Research and Innovation, the National Council of Ethics of Scientific Research, Technological Development and Innovation (hereinafter referred to as "cnecsdti") has the following tasks:

- Monitors the application and compliance with the legal provisions relating to the rules of ethics and deontology in research by the establishments and institutions of the national research, development and innovation system, as well as by the staff of research and development;
- Develops reports with analyses, opinions and recommendations on ethical issues raised by the evolution of science and knowledge and ethics and professional deontology in the research and development activity, which they submit for approval to the MCI Management;
- analyses cases relating to violations of good conduct rules, following complaints/appeals received or by self-referral;
- issues judgments on the cases which they analyse and where deviations have been found, appoint the person or natural and/or legal persons guilty of those deviations and determine the penalties to be applied, in accordance with the law.

In exercising of those tasks, regarding the doctoral theses, may propose the penalties provided for in article 170 of the Law No. 1/2011, if a violation of the rules on quality or professional ethics is found, including in respect of plagiarism, pursuant to art. 158 para. (4) of Law No. 1/2011.

At the same time, according to art. 324 of the Law No. 1/2011, for deviations from good conduct in the Investigation-Development of the staff from the higher education institutions, established and proven, this institution shall establish the application of one or more of the following penalties:

- Written warning;
- Withdrawal and/or correction of all works published in violation of the rules of good conduct;
- Withdrawal of the university teaching title or of the degree of research or degradation;
- Dismissal from the management position of the higher education institution;
- Disciplinary termination of the employment contract;
- Prohibiting, for a specified period, access to funding from public funds for research-development.[14]

Conclusion

It is unequivocal that plagiarism makes the world of knowledge more fragile. In this context, it appears to be justified and commendable to the growing concern of the public for the reporting of such facts, particularly in the academic sphere.

[14] By way of example, by Decision no. 13 / 12.07.2018, CNECSDTI concluded that are met all the material and intentional elements that characterize guilty perpetrators of a work of plagiarism deviations and the making of results, applying to them the sanction of prohibition for a period of three years of the access to public funding for research and development and the suspension for a period of five years of the right to enter a competition for a higher position or for a management , guidance and control function position or as a member of the competition commissions. The judgment is published at http://cne.ancs.ro/wp-content/uploads/2018/10/Hotararea%20CNECSDTI%20%2013%20din%2012%2007%202018%20si%20Raportul%20final%20nr.13 .pdf, last visited on January 28, 2019.

The frequent disregard of the rules of academic conduct is sociologically anticipated in anomic societies, in transition such as the one in which our state was found until recently.

At present, however, in Romania, there is a sustained concern both at the legislative level for the prevention, discovery and sanctioning of plagiarism and regarding the participation of the general public in the reporting of infringements of the rules of conduct concerning the academic thesis on publicly presented doctoral theses.

In this respect, the use of software which estimates, in percentages, of the similarity of the texts in the work subject to analysis with the texts belonging to other authors is extremely useful for detecting violations of the rules of academic conduct. However, it must be pointed out that the results obtained in this way cannot replace the scientific assessments carried out by experts designated specifically to carry out qualitative analyses of scientific work.

Therefore, the verdicts appearing in public spaces strictly on the basis of such computer applications must be viewed with reserve, especially in areas where the results obtained thus are often invalidated by expertise. This is particularly the case of the legal area, which involves taking over legislative, administrative texts, conclusions from the case-law, but also a restrictive technical language that can, more easily, induce a false positive result of plagiarism.

In any case, for cases of plagiarism confirmed by the competent institutions, the system of sanctions proposed by Romanian law appears to be effective and in agreement with the principles imposed at European Union level for the recognition of diplomas, possible according to Article 53 of the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union.

THE PROTECTION OF OLFACTORY CREATIONS

Viorel ROȘ[*]
Andreea LIVĂDARIU[]

Abstract

The olfactory works/creations, the perfumes that everyone likes are some of the oldest intellectual goods. Their creation involves science, imagination, talent. But in spite of the spectacular evolution of this category of creations, the huge number of consumers and their importance in everyday life, and despite the openness that intellectual property law has generally manifested towards intellectual creations, including the new ones (cinematography, computer programs and pharmaceutical and biotechnological inventions being the fastest received and more fully integrated into a protection system), olfactory creations have remained the Cinderella in this field. Perhaps also from the perfume manufacturers lack of interest. Creators, that is. Or maybe because the protection by secrecy is enough. We're trying to find out.

Keywords: olfactory works, perfumes, patents, copyright, intellectual rights, work secret,

1. Introduction

Is it necessary and possible to protect perfumesc by intellectual rights? Doctrine and jurisprudence are not unitary in relation to the vocation of perfumes to be protected by intellectual rights (copyright, invention patents, design and / or model certificates or trademarks or work secrets). They were not even consistent. And it seems that perfumers particularly interested in financial success, are rarely interested in the system of protecting their creations and their exclusive rights, and rarely claim their violation. The secret, kept aloof, seems to provide the necessary and sufficient comfort as long as the secret remains secret. In essence, what would they need to create a perfume for which the patented protection is for only 20 years when the secret could provide them with much longer lasting protection, and stealing the recipe and producing the same perfume could be sanctioned by action in unfair competition? In addition, the perfumers' world is quite small, and the consumers that matter become a loyal clientele as long as they like the perfume. Conscious, intuitive, simply attracted, consumers will look for and choose quality perfumes, marked with well-known brands and produced by known perfumers and in which they trust.

But the inside of the perfume industry is populated only with honest people? We do not think so, even if the risk of counterfeiting a protected fragrance by a perfumer inside the profession is reduced. Large perfume manufacturers are few[1], are organized in associations (like writers, plastic artists, musicians, architects, etc. do), and a perfumer accused of counterfeiting a competitor's perfume risks losing not only the respect of competitors but also the clientele and exclude itself or be excluded from this industry. An unwritten code of honour that would make the protection of perfumes unnecessary by rules of law and recourse to justice. An idyllic vision and invalidated by what is happening around us.

The most expensive perfume, Clive Christian's Imperial Majesty, can be purchased for 251,000 dollars, packed in a Baccarat container with a gold frame and a 5-carat diamond. It is true that the content is worth only 15,000 dollars and contains a few hundred ingredients. The rest is the price of packaging, a "support" in which the fragrance is fixed, and which is usually not a simple package, it is itself a valuable work of art even it lacks content, but a work of a particular kind. Because this support is multiplied, even in the case of such perfume, it is an industrial product, the support loses its quality to be unique and original in the sense of copyright, and used as a container for a liquid product, it is not capable of be the external form of a three-dimensional product, as required by the law of industrial designs.

Perfumes released for the general public are subject to rules other than very expensive fragrances, but we do not believe that the latter are the target of counterfeiters, but rather products for the general public.

Until the nineteenth century, perfumes were created entirely on the basis of natural ingredients, obtained by pressing and then by distillation from plants or animal extracts (for example, musk). In the year 1000, Avicenna[2] (Ibn Sina) invented the process of distilling the fragrances of flowers, and it made it possible to produce large-scale modern perfume.

[1] Producer Dove claims that there are around 900 qualified perfumers in the world, but the information cannot be verified.https://www.unilever.ro/whats-in-our-products/your-ingredient-questions-answered/fragrances.html

[2] Abu Ali Sina or Ibn Sina, known in the Western world under the Latin name of Avicenna (980-1037), Persian, was a physicist, astronomer, physician, philosopher, writer, inventor of the golden years of Islam. His medical work has been at the heart of the medical study for 500 years in the Orient but also in the West.

Expensive, however, because obtaining natural flavours involves the raw material, a lot (for one kilogram of royal jasmine flowers, for example, 10,000 flowers are needed and for one kilogram of gross jasmine essence, 350 kilograms of petals are necessary).

Synthetic aromas (invented and produced since 1874) have made it possible to produce perfumes at affordable prices for everyone. With today's possibilities and the flavours available for perfumers today, the production of a perfume bottle costs around 10 euros, but on the market, such bottle is sold for at least 10 times the production price. The perfume price therefore means the costs of production, the value of the container (not very high in the final price), the reputation of the manufacturer (its brand) and the perfume brand. Perhaps there is no industry (admitting that perfumery is just industry) where brands can influence so much the price of the product offered on the market. And for which brands themselves are so illicitly used.

Counterfeit perfumes are sold at prices three to five times lower than the original ones, those whose brands are illegally applied on their packaging[3], the gains from illicit activities with fragrances are not as high as in the case of drug trafficking, but also the risks to which perfume counterfeiters are exposing are much smaller. However, millions of consumers now use counterfeit perfumes, and Romania has become a transit and consumer territory for such products. Hazardous to health. And for that, it's only a way: buying perfume with a certain origin. I mean, from authorized distributors.

Counterfeiting, in the case of perfumes, does not interfere with the composition of the original perfume unless it deteriorates its image. No copyright or inventor's rights is violated by counterfeiting in this area, but by trademark right. Famous perfume trademarks are applied to fragrance packaging whose content does not usually have any connection with the original fragrance. That is why the action for damages will concern the counterfeiting of the trademark and not the counterfeiting of the perfume (smell) and the violation of the rights on it.

This may be a real cause of the lack of interest of perfumers for intellectual property protection of their products.

However, it is well known today that many essences and ingredients of those used in perfumery are allergenic or even injurious to health, and their use is subject to more and more severe rules from the International Fragrance Association. The list of allergenic and toxic products includes both natural and synthetic ingredients, and the list of prohibited or low-tolerant perfume products is on the rise. There are even natural allergens, such as the essences of the lichen Evernia prunastri (which grows on the oak or other tree bark) and the essences of ylan ylan jasmine. However, counterfeit fragrances are not subject to any control, and the risks to consumers are very high, some of which are unnoticeable in the short term from their use.

I have previously pointed out that in the doctrine and jurisprudence the problem of perfume protection is controversial, the positions expressed being most often at the extremes. We believe that perfumes are intellectual creations and that they are protectable by intellectual rights. As for perfume brands, they make this product category an immense favour, and in their case best suits the statement that in the absence of souls, things have trademarks.

2. The International Fragrance Association (IFRA) and its role in the perfume industry

Creators live with the feeling of belonging to a profession, but also with the need to associate in order to protect and promote their interests through collective actions. The organization does not make them "craftsmen", and they remain creators. Things are the same with parfums.

Perhaps the existence of the International Perfume Association and its (assumed) attributions support the idea that perfumery is a profession (for few, the number of qualified perfumers is, according to some sources 700, according to others 900, however none of them seems plausible), and that making new perfumes is simply a craft and not an art. The production of quality and safe to use perfumes is usually carried out in large production units, where only qualified personnel in this line of work conduct such activities, having the status of creative employees. Obviously, there are also independent creators. IFRA declares itself to be representative in the perfume industry, but its members are not creators - natural persons, but producers and producer associations.

The international association is constituted, as we have seen, also of national associations, however not all national associations are IFRA members. One of these (Fragrance Creators Association, formerly until 2018, International Fragrances Association of North America - IFRANA) represents, according to the information posted on its website[4], farmers, artists, researchers, inventors, scientists, perfumers which compose the fragrance community. People who, as stated on the association's website, "spend a few years creating beautiful smells and enhancing the beauty of life." Its purpose is consumer olfactory education, safety, sharing scientific information of interest. A documentary film released by IFRANA, entitled "The Story of Fragrances", that gives a look at the artistic and scientific world behind fragrances, the effort made by manufacturers for the quality of perfumes and the most important goal of perfumers, keeping the consumers safe.

Associations such as the ones mentioned above are many in the world and their essential objectives are the same: consumer protection through quality products and the protection of the interests of perfume manufacturers.

The IFRA was established in 1973 and is headquartered in Geneva, with an operations centre in Brussels. The members ("regular members") are 8 multinational companies and 21 national associations, plus another 8 associate members from countries where there are no national parfums associations. IFRA keeps a register of all ingredients used in perfumery, in active formulas at the time of publication, and includes flavoured ingredients and functional ingredients or components, that is, those substances that are essential for fragrances such as antioxidants, diluents, solvents, preservatives, colours, etc. Each listed ingredient is rated for safety, but the responsibility for the safety of the ingredients used lies with the manufacturers.

IFRA has a research institute (RIFM) which is the scientific centre of the perfume industry (IFRA's annual budget for research is $ 8 million), it has standards for all products that are raw materials in perfumery but also for perfumes, those being published in IFRA Code of Practice, which is updated according to the association's procedures. The standard decision belongs to the experts. At the RIFM's proposal, the International Fragrances Association has forbidden or restricted the use of 186 substances in perfume making, and its members are bound to comply with these standards, their compliance being a condition of belonging to IFRA. The Association has a body of independent and renowned experts in areas such as dermatology, toxicology, pathology and environmental sciences which has the role to evaluate data on perfume ingredients and to ensure that their usage does not pose a risk to the consumer. In those cases where the assessment reveals risks, experts propose restricting or banning that product, either by issuing a standard or by restricting or banning a material. But IFRA standards are only mandatory for members of this association so that the risk of using allergenic or even toxic ingredients in the perfume industry is still high.

As far as perfume associations are concerned, their existence cannot influence the qualification of perfumes, the nature and the creative domain they belong to, the rights of the creators or the protection system. Since the world, perfumery has not yet occupied its deserved place among protected intellectual creations, and a system of protection tailored to their specifics is in the interest of both creators and consumers.

3. A bit of history ... fragrant

The history of fragrances, fascinating, challenging and a worthwhile research from a biblical and secular perspective, helps us to understand perfumes. Their place and role in our lives and the fact that they are intellectual creations.

3.1. Sacred Origin and Perfumes in the Old Testament

Perfumes are appreciated by (almost) everyone. Surely God likes them too, Who, when created everything, also created Havila country, where you can find gold ("good," the Bible says, strangely enough), onyx stone (semiprecious, easy to process, later appreciated even by crowned heads) and bdellium (a resin produced by an oriental palm), also He was the one who left to people "the craft of making flavours" and two special recipes of perfume[5], one liquid and the other solid. Recipes He had revealed to Moses, asking him to put them into the works but reserving their use for himself (in the Temple) and for the priests who were to serve in the Temple (Aaron and his children), but even for them only for religious purposes, on the altar of incense. The Temple and the Altar that Moses was also taught how to make them (a true architectural project describes the Bible in their case), where and how to be placed (in a tent to be built following God's plan precisely and in which the altar is to be placed) and on which the perfume should burn eternally and the smoke emanate to make the connection between man and God.

The ingredients and the recipe of this fragrance were revealed by God to Moses, which had to make it out of "the best spices" and which are specifically indicated: selected myrrh (500 shekels worth), spicy cinnamon (250 shekels), aromatic cane (250 shekels), cassia (500 shekels, the cassia being, apparently, the honeysuckle, but the name is also used for cinnamon) and a hin[6] of olive oil[7]. "Of them, God told Moses, you will make a fragrant myrrh after the craft of the perfume makers; this will be the oil of the holy anointing (...) with it you will anoint the tent of testimony and the ark of the testimony and the altar of burnt*,* Aaron and his sons (...) to serve Me as priests" *and "*human body will not be anointed with it, and in the image of its composition, do not make for yourself the same myrrh (...) the one who will do something like that, or the one who gives it out to whom he does not have to give, will be cut from his nation". "[8].

God gives Moses a second recipe for the product and process for incense (technically speaking, it is a solid fragrance), saying: "get your spices: stacts [9], oniha[10], galbanum [11] and pure incense, all the same measure, and make of them by the craft of aroma makers, a mixture of incense, with addition of salt, clean and holy. Crush it fine and put it in front of the ark of the covenant, in the tent of tabernacle (...) Incense so made is not to be used for you (...) who will do such a mixture (...) that soul will be cut out of his kind."[12].

[7] Exodus, Chap. 30, The Altar of Incense, 30.23 - 30.38

As you can see, there are two products, one with an oily consistency, the second one, a solid product (but which does not make it less perfume), both well-smelling. The indications given to Moses are recipes / inventions of products and processes brought to the attention of the people and for which the Inventor of the recipe has given a limited right of use, i.e. a production and use license in order to ensure a permanent relationship between Him and man through intermingling the smell and smoke produced by the two perfumes. The smoke that has the meaning of the people's speaking to God, while the light (candle) has the meaning of God's speaking to his people. Thus, two inventions of perfume / perfume products have been conveyed to Moses, with the right to manufacture and to use perpetual but limited (to a social class, that of the priests and respectively for a place, that is, only in the Temple) which means that inventions can never fall into the public domain, which is not entirely in accordance with the law of inventions as conceived by people who have limited the duration of the inventor's exclusive right and have made it possible for the invention to fall under public domain where the usage is free.

The assertion sometimes made in the sense that God would have stopped people from using perfumes is contrary to the Bible. As I have shown, God has given Moses two recipes, asking him to make "fragrant myrrh after the craft of the perfume makers" and "incense after the crafts of the same perfume makers", that is, after a known and cherished craft and which if it would be contrary to God's wish (will) would certainly not have been recommended to be used to make the holy myrrh and incense. But the trade with flavours was, as the Old Testament reveals many times, ordinary and flourishing. The sale of Joseph, one of Jacob's 13 sons, by the brothers of some essence merchants who bought people also demonstrates how active the perfume essences trade was and how valuable the flavours were.

3.2. Fragrances in the New Testament

Our conclusion that God loves perfumes is also reinforced by the New Testament, which speaks of perfumes at two important moments of Jesus' life: Birth and Crucifixion.

According to Matthew (2.11), the Eastern Magi (whose number and occupation are not mentioned by the Evangelist) guided by the star, traced Mary and Joseph in the very Night Jesus Was Born and gave to Child Jesus, gold, myrrh and incense. The Magi are numbered and called, however, by a Gospel of the Armenian Church, and according to it they would have been: Melkon (King of Persia), Gaspar, King of India, and Baltazar, King of Arabia. Other sources, however, consider them Persians of Zoroastrian religion, astronomers and great priests and, undoubtedly, rich and entrusted with the events that were to come and which they were eager to honour. And their gifts also given as symbols: believers offering a portion of the wealth to the poor (gold), freshness, hope for eternal life, and for the miracle cure (myrrh) and people identifying themselves with the Church and with prayer (incense).

Declare saints of the Roman Catholic Church for their gesture of giving gold, myrrh and incense to Child Jesus, and being the first mortals who believed in the miraculous Birth and in Jesus, the Magi continue their relation with perfumes also in eternal life, because their relics are in the Dome of Cologne (the second high in Germany - 157 meters), built especially for this purpose between 1248-1473[13] on the site of another church and which became a place of pilgrimage [14], the city being visited in our century by over 6 million people each year.

How is it known and believed to be the genuine relics in the Dome of Cologne, some 3,500-4,000 kilometres from the place where they were ended their lives? This is related to the history and especially to the traditions of the Church.

According to the tradition of the Catholic Church, the relics of the Magi would have been discovered on Mount Victor by Empress Hellen [15] (Emperor Constantine's mother) during her pilgrimage to the Holy Land, a few years before she died, an occasion with which she discovered the Place of Nativity and the Holy Cross (along with those on which were crucified with Jesus, the two thieves). She would have brought the relics of the Magi to the Holy Church of [9] Pliny the Elder mentions this ingredient in Natural History as used by Syrians in medicine and ... in perfumery. Obviously, the resin with this name must be produced by a plant, but we have not identified it. In his Natural History, Pliny the Elder describes several perfume recipes.

[10] Oniha or onihas, a plant unidentified by botanists and / or theologians, the term being out of use. It can only be a plant from which extracts of aromatic essences are used for the holy oil.

[11] Galbanum is probably an aromatic plant (ferrule galbaniflua), hard to identify, as well as other aromatic plants to which the Old Testament refers. The identified one grows in Iran, Afghanistan, India. Cut to the extremities, produces a milky juice that strengthens and takes the form of a gummed resin. It is not known in Romania

Constantinople, from where they would have been taken by the Crusaders to Milan and given to Bishop Eustorgius [16]. In 1162-1163, the city of Milan was defeated and almost destroyed by Emperor Frederic Barbarossa [17], the relics of the Three Magi being taken away from the church and transferred to Cologne in 1164, by the order of Emperor's counsellor, Archbishop Rainald von Dassel [18] of Koln- a town where the famous Dome was later built.

Marco Polo tells, however, that in 1270, in the city of Sabaa (south of Tehran), he saw three great, next to each other and beautiful tombs, in which the three Magi were buried: Baltazar, Melchior and Gaspar. "Their bodies - said the famous traveller - are still unspoiled, with hair and whole beards. „It's just that the history of Marco Polo's life says he would have started his journey that brought his celebrity in 1271! Well?

Are the relics of the Magi in the Cologne Cathedral some fakes? At the beginning of the second Christian millennium, trade with false sacraments (as well as with indulgences) was an ugly plague on the cheek of the Christian Church. It was "a vermin and, being a vermin, it was impossible to destroy it. When you were able to eradicate it in one place, it appeared in another. All the well-meaning priests and the popes denounced (falsifiers, n. a.) Fought against them, but without any result. Their pursuit was one of the most lucrative and hard to prove. In 1274, Umberto de Romani, ex-general in the Order of the Dominicans, declared that these sales exposed the Church in derision and demanded heresy. One of the first tasks of the Inquisition, said Pope Alexander IV, is the quenching of this scandalous trade."[19].

We do not believe that there is any conflict between faith and science about the Magi and the place of their eternity, but only a mystery that we cannot unravel. In fact, it is said about the relics that "it is faith that makes them true, not they prove faith"[20]. And the Cologne does all it can to strengthen their authenticity: the city's coat of arms is made up of three wreaths of the Holy Magi and 11 tears of St. Ursula and her companions [21], who have been martyred in Cologne.

Cologne's connection with perfumes does not end at the famous Dom where the relics of the Magi are laid, because as we shall see later, Cologne City Hall also offered a place of honour on the front wall of the building that houses it, to a statue of a perfumer that brought glory to this old city, whose name comes from the Latin "colony", the fragrances it created here and a distinguishing sign that became generic (odicolon): Joseph Maria Farina, who founded the oldest perfume factory in operation in the world.

If Matthew told us in his Gospel about the gifts made by the Magi to Child Jesus, Mark tells us (14.3 - 14.9) that two days before Easter, while he was with his crowd in Bethany, at table in the house of Simon The Leprous, a woman (to whom Evangelist Mark, unlike Evangelist John, does not mention her name) came with an alabaster[22] bowl filled with "clean, nard myrrh of great importance". According to the Gospel of John the Apostle (12.1-12.3), the event took place 6 days before Easter on the day of entering Jerusalem before the beginning of the Passions, and the woman was Mary Magdalene, sister of Martha and Lazarus (as shown in The Gospel of John "And Mary was the one who anointed the Lord and wiped His feet with the hair of her head, whose brother Lazarus was ill (...)"). And breaking the bowl poured the myrrh (perfume) over the head and feet of Jesus, wiping his feet with her hair, to the displeasure of some of the disciples who murmured against the woman, saying, "Why did this waste of myrrh?"(...) "this ointment could have sold for more than 300 dinars and give that money to the poor." But Jesus upbraided the murmurers by saying to them, according to the testimony of Evangelist Mark: "Leave her. Why are you upsetting her? She has done a beautiful thing for Me" (...) and according to Evangelist Matthew "(...) That she, turning this ointment on My body, made it to My burial ", the event prefiguring the embalming that no one of those present did not understand. The most dissatisfied member of Jesus crowd, Mark tells us, none other than Judas Iscariot, who was also the keeper of the money bag of the group (from where he stole now and then for himself), went after this incident to the archbishops ("

[17] Frederick I, also called Barbarossa (1122-1190), was anointed emperor of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation in 1155. He invaded Italy four times and was in conflict with the papacy, being excommunicated (in 1177) by Pope Alexander III. He had as counsellor and chancellor Archbishop Rainald von Dassel (1120-1167). He set up a crusade and went to the Holy Land with his army but died drowning at crossing the Goksu River in Anatolia. The attempt to keep his body in a barrel of vinegar was not successful, so he was buried in Antioch. The legend says he would not have died, and that he sleeps in a limestone cave in Germany, waiting for the right time to give his country the grandeur of the past. That's why Hitler gave his Russian invasion operation his name (Operation Barbarossa).

[18] Rainald von Dassel (1120-1167) was a close friend of Emperor Fredrick Barbarossa and archbishop of Cologne, a town in which he spent less than a year because of the missions he had besides his emperor. In the Dome of Cologne there is a statue of his body, without his arms and without the bottom of his body. R. von Dassel doubted the authenticity of the relics, placing their garments (which looked like ones of troubadours) to be changed with others like the ones of bishops, archimandrites or even popes.

most important priests ") to sell Jesus. That is, "a clean and very expensive" perfume bottle (which could not be the same as that made for the incense altar and reserved for the use only by the priests) was also a cause of the sale of Jesus by Judas!

The Bible also mentions a situation similar to what is known as the "Anointing of Bethany," the occurrence preceding the one above, while Jesus was in the house of a Pharisee when a sinful woman "knowing that He is sitting at the table in the house of the Pharisee, brought an alabaster with myrrh. And standing by the back near His feet, crying, began to wet His feet with tears and with the hair of her head she wiped the tears away. And kiss His feet and anoint them with a myrrh."

3.3. Is the Bible against Fragrances?

If the Bible were against perfumes, if perfumes were evil things, then of course we would all have a problem, because we would sit outside of the holy teachings. And it would be an important argument for one part of the world to exclude them from protection or that we could not ignore in any case.

But as we have said, God has made all of them, including raw materials and perfume recipes for the use of the Church and the priests, and He has also given people the "craft" to do the others, and in His turn, Jesus received the gesture of perfuming Him (from head to toe) with a "high-priced nard myrrh" before being crucified, like Mary, His mother, who gladly received the gifts of the Magi in the name of Jesus, both moments symbolizing and being related to death and birth, end, and beginning. All of this tells us that the Bible is not against perfumes.

It is true, however, that some of the Fathers of the Christian Church have been hostile to perfumes and that even today, not all theologians seem to be in the admiration of perfumes that have passed the sacred area to become part of our everyday life. Let's recall two of the most hostile.

The first one is Tertullian of Carthage [23], a lawyer in his first youth and one of the most prolific authors of the Christian Church, in "De cultu feminarum" (About Women's clothing) criticized vestments dyeing and the women's use of makeup, under the word that it would violate the will of God. *„It cannot be legitimate, said Tertullian, which is achieved by violating this will. What God did not make; he means he does not like it. Do you think God could not have commanded the sheep to produce purple or sky-coloured wool? If he could and did not do, it means that he did not want it and what God did not want, we have no right to manufacture. What does not come from God, the author of nature, is not good for nature. It is not difficult to understand that these things (dyed clothes and makeup, etc.) come from the devil, which is a forger of nature"*[24]. We find, however, that Tertullian, who was a great lawyer before becoming a great theologian, contradicts himself the Bible that often speaks of the colours of the garments, blue and purple being the favourite colours in Bible writings. Tertullian was criticized even in his lifetime because he was excessive and paradoxical in his judgments.

The second is Saint John Chrysostom [25] who, two hundred years later, says more firmly compared to Tertullian that "you do not have to wear perfume, but virtue! Nothing is more unclean than a soul that has a body that wears a perfume. The scent of the body and of the garments is the sign of the inner spirit and impurity. When the devil rushes to ruin the soul and mourn it, then it fills in the body, with the help of perfumes, the dirt of its wickedness. "

It is hard to contradict this Church Teacher, but we are of the opinion that he has nevertheless accepted the use of natural fragrances, weak, to remove unpleasant odours, his interdiction was only towards "spiritual soldiers," i.e. priests. But as we have seen, God gave them (his priests) a perfume for them only.

Lux (the origin of the word is luxura, which means in Latin, dissipation) in which the Romans lived did not partake of perfumes and their excessive use. Perhaps from here and from the condemnation of all that the Romans have done against Christians comes the hostility of some Church Fathers to perfumes. And it is hard to say how perfume fashion survived in the dark Middle Ages, dominated by the Christian Church, hostile to science, art, luxury and bathing (weird, because the Bible reminds us of foot washing several times, Jesus himself doing this gesture ) and criticism of all kinds of sins and vices (but whose development in the very heart of the Church could not prevent it, which generated the movement of Luther and Reformation), but it is certain that at the beginning of the Renaissance there were well-known perfumers and that then liquid perfumes appear, as we know them today, which could not happen on a virgin land. Since the 13th century, the art of perfumery has grown a lot, and we must not be very surprised about it, because alchemy and alchemists were then many and in vogue, even if they were ending up on the cleansing fires of all sins by the feared Inquisition.

Did Moses followers respect the divine will to use the ointment made according to the recipe revealed by God? It seems not, but I also didn't find arguments in the sense that the perfume, except for the priestly ointment, would have been another forbidden apple to men, the Bible giving us a lot of evidence to the contrary and making perfumes continue their march.

[23] Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus, known mostly as Tertullian of Carthage (150 / 160-220), is the father of Western Christendom and founder of Western theology. He is the first theologian who used the word Trinitas to designate the Holy Trinity https://ro.orthodoxwiki.org/Tertulian

[25] St. John Chrysostom (347-407), considered holy both in the Eastern Church and in the Western Church, worshiping him as the doctor of the Church. His theological work, preserved in its entirety, comprises 18 volumes. His critical Jewish works were used during the Second World War to persuade German Christians that Jews deserve to be exterminated.

And we have also identified a link over millennia between Biblical fragrances and perfumes that people use today.

Moses was married to the Ethiopian (black as coal) Sephora (or Tzipporah), the precious daughter of some wandering pastors in the desert, who saved his life after he had killed an Egyptian who was wrongfully and cruelly beating a Jew. In Greek sephos means beauty. And tzipporah means bird in Hebrew. These words are the result of a combined, inspired choice of perfume that led to the name of the famous perfume brand "SEPHORA", which belongs today to the group Louis Vuitton Moet Hennessey (LVMH) that is selling more than 250 brands of perfumes and maintenance cosmetics. Promote these fragrances, women like to believe, as a token of appreciation for them, ignoring that, in reality, industry operates according to the rules of trade, and that in commerce products have no souls, but brands and if there is concern for feelings, it is just to attract and maintain customers for financial gain.

And we have learned that, by ignoring Tertullian, 20th century designers (Paul Poiret's debut) began dressing up women elegantly (and cheaper) using printed fabrics and adding to their garments also perfumes. After him, all great fashion houses combine the launch of new models of clothing, protected by intellectual rights, with new perfumes.

The origin of the perfumes is, as it can be seen, sacred, but it did not prevent their penetration into everyday life, so that they gradually lost from the aura of absolute holiness and closer to us, as we shall see, and from the naturalness in which there have existed for many millennia. But not from the idea of cleanliness, pleasure, attractiveness and courtesy when used wisely!

3.4. Fragrances of non-Christians

Perfumery has become an art and a science (we cannot determine precisely when) and a fabulous business, its transformation into industry, however, is also related to the lack of hygiene of crowned heads, some trying to cover their filth and odor by using large quantities of perfume and others were wearing them because they simply adore the pleasant smells.

Indeed, perfumes have been known for a long time and were also known by non-Jews and non-Christians. They knew and manufactured them, using it not only for religious purposes, the Sumerians (many of their perfume recipes were discovered in their "libraries", including Tapputi's name, the first perfumer of profession identified by historians), the Egyptians (who used the perfumes from birth to death[26] bathing in fragrant water as part of their habits), the Chinese, the Hindus, the Persians (who invented, through Avicenna, the process of extracting essences / essential oils from the flowers by distillation in the year 1000, then used through the world, and nowadays), Greeks, Romans, Arabs (Al Kindi is the author of "The book of the Chemistry of Perfume and Distillations" containing over 100 perfume recipes). The Arabs, unable to use alcohol, because of the interdiction have replaced it with oil and solid perfumes, their refinement in the creation of scents being unmatched.

The Greeks, Homer tells us, have been taught by the Olympian gods to make and use perfumes, and they are the first who made liquid perfume and have organized industrial production, setting up numerous workshops for this purpose (in Crete, for example, ruins were discovered a 4 millennia perfumery with a surface area of more than 4,000 sqm, but the perfume industry was well known and developed on other islands, the oldest perfume being discovered in the Pyrgos town of Cyprus[27]) which was hardly facing the demand. The same Greeks were engaging an intense perfume trade, although commerce, workers' work, and the work of artists, including perfumers, were not highly valued, to either the Greeks or the Romans, which, on the contrary, were considered dishonorable.[28]

The Greeks used for the perfume, among other plants, the rosemary[29], a Latin word composed of ros and marinus, meaning the dew of the sea. The plant, which is aromatic and has both culinary and medicinal properties, was also called incense, because the Greeks burned her leaves as incense, considering it sacred and having some of the spices of Aphrodite and of the sea (in whose foam, the legend says that the goddess was born and emerged). Out of it was also made the crown worn by the grooms as a covenant of faith and fidelity, called the "incense ring", but also the crown that was placed on the statues of gods in order to thank them (a habit of Romans proven plagiarists of the Greeks in many ways, not only in the arts, they also used it for a while). The plant it is used for cooking and the tradition tells us that, women who use will always remain beautiful and have loyal partners.

In ancient Greek the name of rosemary was however livanos, meaning the incense tree, a name that stems from the Semitic root of the word lvn or lbn, which means white, the explanation being that when burning, the incense gets milky white. This word lbn gave the name of Lebanon, the country whose mountains are brilliant white, are always covered with snow.

[28] Cicero considered „unworthy of a free and despicable man the earnings of all employees whose ability and value we do not pay; In these earnings the salary is itself the guarantee of servitude (...) All craftsmen are engaged in a despicable job, the workshop does not mean anything noble and the less acceptable are the occupations that serve the pleasures: butchers, cooks, fishermen; add, if you like, perfumers, dancers and all gambling*. Instead, for jobs that involve more caution or from which an important service is expected, such as medicine, architecture, teaching knowledge of the nobles, these trades for the ranks they take advantage of - beautiful crafts (...) But of all companies that benefit from it, nothing is better than agriculture, nothing more productive, nothing more enjoyable, nothing more worthy of a man and a free man"*. Cicero, De Officiis, Book I: 42, 150-151.

[29] The scientific name of the plant with so many qualities is Rosmarinus officinalis.

Everything was happening in Athens had to reach also in Rome (the Romans reproduced statues of Greek artists without shocking anyone and doing it because they did not consider themselves capable of doing something more beautiful) also the perfumes followed the rule and Rome became, in time, not only a city of power, but also a city of civilization and good taste, where elegance and beauty were of great value, and perfumes, some of which used in excess (birds, dogs and horses and they were also wearing perfume) could not be missing. Martialis[30] tell us (the father of the word "plagiarized" with the meaning it has today and denouncing as a plagiarist of his works of Fidentius), mocking the excessive use of perfume in his time, one of his epigrams entitled even „To a woman that wears too much perfume ": „Whenever you show up in to the world, you smell so good,/like you are carrying Cosmus Booth/Its heavy scent accompany you on the road,/Filling the atmosphere with waves of perfume./O, Gallia, I don't like your cheap manners:/If I shell perfume it my mutt would smell the same". Note, of course, the reference to Cosmus (and his store), which indicates the origin of the term "cosmetics".

3.5. Perfume and … animals

By the way, perfuming dogs (and other animals), as seen, the idea to make them smell good is very old, and if we were to apply our famous Law no. 204/2006 regarding ethics in research, we find that, a famous perfumer is a plagiarist of ideas and should be punished if living in Romania. Thus, the famous perfumer South African Etienne de Swardt has joined the few and conquered his bosses from LVMH (Louis Vuiton Moet Henessy), Paris and the fashion world with his luxury fragrance for dogs created by him (one for cats was a failure). But the dogs, like horses or birds, as we have seen, are perfumed for a long time, so the idea of a dog perfume is not its own (it's not time for discussion and ideas, but it is worth remembering briefly: Swardt worked at Louis Vuiton, from whom the world was waiting for a perfume. He proposed to his bosses that it would be a "good joke" to make a perfume for dogs, but his bosses took the joke seriously, and he did it and became immediately famous. But the idea was known for two thousand years!). And it's beautiful what the famous, now, perfumer Swardt, graduate of Versailles school, apprentice at Givenchy say: I love poetry and the perfume is a poetry.

Recently, the porcine perfume was created, a perfume created by an American scientist, John McGlone, from Texas Tech. In fact, it is a breakthrough that has identified practical applications. McGlone noticed that androsterone, a steroid acting as a pheromone produced by male pigs and contained in their fat and saliva, calms down dogs. Together with his colleagues it has done research and experiments and determined that the product is useful in calming down the noisy dogs, which can be extremely useful for noisy dog owners. And how in US anything new made under the sun is patentable, the product will be, certainly, patented in the near future.

Fragrances for animals, especially for pets and particularly for dogs, are a great success among people. However, it is unlikely, for a dog who has the odor more than a thousand times developed than the human smell to really appreciate the fragrances, it is well known that they do not like the smell of pepper, citrus and alcohol, forming part of the recipe of many perfumes.

3.6. The first "modern" perfume

History claims that in 1370 would have been created the first modern perfume at the request of Queen Isabella of Hungary, called Water of the Queen of Hungary, which it would have been used to seduce the King of Poland and marry him. The recipe is described in a work paper without a known author, printed in 1660 and the perfume is as real as possible: 30 ounces of alcohol and 20 ounces of rosemary essence. Only that, in the 14-th century that there was no Hungarian queen with this name[31] and no Polish king married to a Hungarian queen. Moreover, it also follows from the content of the recipe, that the named queen is the one who would have refused the marriage request from the Polish and that her product would have had also therapeutic virtues, that cannot be denied because the perfume has always had curative, protective and antiseptic qualities due to the alcohol content (also, in the Great Museum of Paris are exposed perfumes used against the plague). However, the legend is more beautiful than the historical truth[32].

However, it is undeniable that perfumes have been, are and will be used by women to conquer men and men to conquer women. And that for women, they were (maybe they still are) a "weapon". Even though fragrances have often had to endure also the ungrateful role of unpleasant odors mystificator generated by the lack of water and soap of some (including crowned heads) or of the stench in the urban agglomerations that made Queen Elisabeth I's visits to London to be preceded by perfuming the streets she was passing by on her way in order to save the Glorious and / or Good Queen Bes (as her subjects love to call her) who could not stand bad odors. Queen Elizabeth was also famous for her statement: "Whether it is needed or not I still wash myself once every three months". But compare [30] Marcus Valerius Martialis, 40-104 d. Hr. is the author of 15 Epigrams books that identify the circumstances of Rome's life during Domitian, Nerva and Trajan. His epigrams have been translated into Romanian by Tudor Măinescu (1892-1977), who was a judge (1924-1948), satirical poet, epigram writer, fabulist, storyteller and translator.

[31] Still, there was a Hungarian woman, Isabella (1519-1559), married with Ioan I. Zapolia, king of Poland, but she lived during the 16th century and was regent in Transylvania.

[32] Some sources placed this fragrance on Queens Elizabeth of Hungary account. There was an Elisabeth of Hungary, descended from Andrew II, but she lived between 1207 and 1231. I COULD NOT identify a Queen Elizabeth of Hungary, who lived between 1305-1380, as claimed in some papers.

the Queen of England with Queen Isabella of Castile, who would have sworn not to wash herself until she would banish the Moors out of Spain (which it happened after many years of wars, only in 1492), while others say that she would have washed herself only twice in her lifetime: at birth and when she got married!

In history, men are no more different in terms of cleanliness. The Russian ambassador to Paris, for example, wrote about the King of the Sun (Louis the 14th [33]) that „its majesty stinks like a wild animal" and about one of his predecessors, Henry the 4th it is said that his ugly smell have been provoked the faint of Maria de Medici at their first encounter. Thus, it is explained the origin of the bride's flower bouquet: its need to cover the unpleasant smell of the groom.

In such an ugly smelling environment the development of perfumery was more than necessary and it became an art in France, sometimes a "weapon" of seduction or by case a deadly one and an industry. And not only that! Caterina de Medici[34], mother of three kings, a queen herself, famous for her Machiavellian nature and her passion for the poisons (cyanide with pleasant smell of almonds), with which her opponents were liquidated and produced by her perfumer from Florence, named Renato, is the one who opened the first perfume shop in Paris. Today, PUR POISON ("pure poison") is a famous perfume of Dior House, Pur Poison being a non-descriptive brand for content.

3.7. Perfumes with ... gloves and guillotine with perfume

The perfumes had their path and future assured even without the intervention of the ones that did not know the "craftsmanship of flavor makers". But the need to remove the unpleasant smells of gloves made of animal skin to make them more attractive has made the tanning industry in the seventeenth century to link with that of parfums (in 1656 they also set up a guild), which would radically change the destiny of the French city of Grasse de Provence. Thus, a craftsman from Grasse "came up with the idea" of impregnating gloves he produced with perfume, and then began to produce the flavors necessary to apply his idea, but they are authors who claim that the idea was put into practice in other lands, so the French in Grasse would be just copiers[35]. It is certain that his scented gloves have been very successful (Queen Maria Antoinette bought 18 pairs of gloves from Grasse weekly), so his recipe was quickly and by many copied, the production of perfumes in Grasse growing ever since. The growing was that great, so he took the lead in the gloves industry and turned the city of Grasse into the world capital of raw materials (flowers) and perfume production (more than 60 companies are based there) and later became the host of the International Museum of Perfumes, a museum that now has over 50,000 exhibits. The city also hosts two festivals: roses of May and of jasmine (in August).

The development of the perfume industry was also determined by the increasing demand of the consumer market as such that much later the perfume became an ingredient for detergents, soaps, cosmetics, etc.

During Louis, the 15th [36] lifetime his court was named due to the high consumption of erfumes, "le cour parfumee". A royal court where the beautiful, smart, cultivated and good perfumes lover, the Pompadour marquise[37] occupied an important position, which is why she has gained a lot of enmity. However, it is hard to say that the beautiful courtesan would have been the one who, six years after her death, would have determined in 1770 the adoption in France of a law punishing women who abused perfume to seduce men. This story with the perfume as a men's bait, has a long history as we can see, on behalf which, as I have already shown, there is a lot fabulizing about.

It is not the only oddity of the French in terms of perfumes, which they loved very much, since during the Revolution they even created perfumes. One of these was called "Parfum á la Guillotine"! Of course, it was not created to drive away the stench of blood from Place de la Ville, where dozens of executions by guillotine took place accompanied by the ecstatic screams of the crowd. A Parfum Sophistic Guillotine (unisex) is still produced today, the basic ingredients being lichen, orange and bloody grapefruit.

3.8. Perfumes, Napoleon, Josephine and Queen Mary

Napoleon Bonaparte was a great perfume lover, he used high-quality perfumes (two-liter violets fragrance per week!) and loved, over the power of understanding of many of his contemporaries, a single woman, Josephine[38] and whom himself crowned her as a queen, forgiving her infidelities that made him enormously suffer and scandalizing even his close relatives. Even after the divorce, the Emperor loved Josephine (platonically, say his admirers), but she also loved Napoleon until her death (May 29, 1814).

Josephine was an elegant woman who, apart from the many vaporous dresses she regularly orders, loves the fragrance of musk, the smell of which is said to

[35] But Magda C. Ursache claims the fashion of scented gloves was brought to Paris by Caterina de Medici. In other words, gloves' scent was known in Italy long before being used by the Grasse tanners, and if that was true and the Italians had been patented, the French would have been just counterfeiters.

[36] Ludwig the 15th, 1710-1774. Also called "The Most Loved One" and "The Lazy King".

[38] „My husband does not love me, he adores me, I think he will go insane", wrote Josephine in a missive from 1796 that was auctioned at 36,655 EUR. A collection of 50 letters and 400 documents of the Empress regarding the French Revolution were sold for 700,000 EUR.

persist today in her bedroom in the Malmaison Palace (today' being a museum at 15 km of Paris center) where, it is said that she died of Napoleon's longing. The emperor who was left without a crown and who, even before being exiled to the island of Elba, frequently visited the one he had divorced from state reasons and made long walks with her through the palace garden full of roses that were also her favorite flowers. Emperor Napoleon died on the cursed island where he was exiled with a small box containing two burning perfume pills (solid) by his head, Houbigant, one of his favorite perfumes.

Josephine's musk perfume, however, made many victims among the deer that produced the so expensive essence and which, in order to be harvested, was to be preceded by the killing of the animal, the species being threatened even today with extinction. The chance has revealed, as we shall see, the synthetic musk aroma, and that helped save the little deer producer of natural musk.

It is said - and certainly, it is not just a legend - that the French perfume industry has moved its weight center of gravity from Grasse to Paris and has developed vertiginously in the eighteenth century due to Napoleon's passion for perfumes. In a family of gloves producers, Grasse Francois Rance was born who when he decided to dedicate himself exclusively to perfumery (1795), quickly became known and became Napoleon's favorite perfumer for whom he created the perfumes "Le Vainqueur", "Triomphe" and "L'Eau de Austerlitz". Later, his descendants created perfumes for Napoleon the Third and his wife, among them „Heroique". Rance's descendants are the owners of Le Procope Restaurant, Paris's oldest restaurant [39] where famous characters such as La Fontaine, Hugo, Balzac, Voltaire, Diderot, Verlaine, Anatole France enjoyed the culinary delights and ... Napoleon Bonaparte, whose lieutenant hat (given by him) is a valuable showcase of the restaurant[40].

In 1752, Jean-François Houbigant was born in Paris, who, helped by the family to whom his parents were servants, studied (at Grasse [41]) the art of perfumery, ascending then, in a France where people were exaggerated to hide the odors generated by precarious hygiene. In 1775 he opened in Paris, on Rue Faubourg Saint Honore (an area in development and inhabited by aristocrats), a shop of gloves, perfumes and flowers, his small business prospering rapidly thanks to the products that conquered the world and became the famous perfume house (one of the oldest in the world and the first one who isolate coumarin[42] from the Tonka beans, a vanilla-like substance) „Houbigant"[43] and perfume provider for many royal homes, including for the Queen Mary of Romania.

The beautiful (the most beautiful queen of Europe, her many admirers were saying), the elegance ( by attitude and dress style combined with quality perfumes), intelligent, spiritual and diplomatic (conquered the world and all the important people she met, and there were many, working for the benefit of the country), loving beautiful (queen of arts called by others) Queen Mary, she adored quality perfumes.

In 1921 Queen Mary accepted to become the image of the perfume "Quelques Fleurs Royale" (the first multifloral fragrance created in the history of perfumes [44] in 1829 and still produced today) and „Mon Budoir" (created in 1912 and no longer produced since 1978) made by the Houbigant House. Queen Maria was the first crowned head who accepted an association of her name with Pond's cosmetics, that led to a sensational increase in sales.

Specialists say that the Queen's Peleș rooms would preserve the smell of Mon Boudoir, a perfume that the French want to recreate.

3.9. Odicolon, the first degenerate fragrance brand

In 1709, an Italian perfumer, Giovanni Maria Farina[45] (German version Johann Maria Farina, French version Jean Marie Farina) settled in Köln (Cologne in French), in Germany, where he open a perfume factory that still exists today (it is the oldest in the world and reached the eighth generation of perfumers). Here he created a delicate, fresh, light fragrance from a blend of Hesperides, Mediterranean flowers and aromatic plants that quickly became famous in the world and indisputably from the royal courts of the time (whose official supplier became) and whose creator, granting him German citizenship, as a gratitude to the city that embraced and adopted him and named him Echt

[40] Among many other pieces of historical and artistic value, there is also the farewell note of Queen Maria Antoaneta written by her shortly before being guillotined, on a napkin which still retains the traces of her tears.

[42] Coumarin (C9H6O2) is a toxic, flavoring substance with vanilla-like odor, used in perfumery and cosmetics and forbidden in food. It was discovered in 1822 in Tonka beans, synthetically produced since 1868. Warfarin, a coumarin derivative, is used in medicine (anticoagulant) in the manufacture of fluorescent dyes and poisons for mice.

The brand has lost its former glory, sadly says Dominique Valentin, seeming to be forgotten by the great public. http://www.racinesenseine.fr/puteaux/pages/rose0008.html

[45]Johann Maria Farina (1685-1766), learned the art of fragrance in Venice, in the studio of his uncle Carlos Gennari, a producer of perfumes for aristocrats.

Kolnisch Wasser (True Köln Water) or in the fashionable French of those times „Eau de Cologne". As it is known today trademark degenerated (in Romania) in the word "odicolon", a word that, according to DEX, designates light perfumes. Neutral noun and it can be no other way because the perfume is unisex. Köln-ul also has become thanks to Farina's perfumes, world famous and as a sign of gratitude to Farina, he was awarded the title of the honorary citizen of the city and on the facade of Cologne City Hall one of the many statues (second floor, left) depicts the famous perfumer. The word "colony", pronounced with emphasis on the second "o" it means fragrant liquid, made of alcohol and various aromatic vegetable oils used in cosmetics. 100 years later, Napoleon Bonaparte was to be, without his will, the origin of another German perfume, bearing a mark consisting of figures: 4711.

A winner, in just 19 days, against the Prussians at Jena and Auerstadt, Napoleon Bonaparte put an end to the Roman Empire of the German Nation (on October 27, 1806 he entered Berlin, bowing with respect in front of The Great Frederick funeral's monument[46]) and ordered that all the houses in the occupied territory be numbered. In Cologne, a house located on Glockengasse Street, belonging to a certain Carlo Francesco Farina (a character unrelated to Johann Maria Farina, the founder of the famous Farina fragrance house), received the number 4711. The German Wilhelm Mulhens, who was a modest perfumier, but with a special sense of business, bought from the owner of house number 4711 the right to use the name, the same as that of the famous Cologne perfumer, as a business name (trademark), taking advantage of the lack of laws protecting the distinctive signs and inventions in Prussia.

Buying the name of the owner of that house and taking advantage of the troubled times and the lack of legal prohibitions, Mulhens produced in his firm Farina perfumes under the name of the famous perfumier: Farina. Of course, you notice the conflict between brand and firm (trade name) or between the firm and the trademark and the priority violation of the first perfume producer, Farina and Eau de Cologne, but at the time of the events, the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, brands and firms was not even a project.

However, in 1875 under the trademark law adopted in Germany (unified) only a year before, the sign 4711 with a bell and other figurative signs (green color) was registered as a perfume mark. Mulhens was not the only one who parasied Farina and the perfume that made him famous and the Cologne. The Eau de Cologne could have been counterfeited, sometimes counterfeited, sometimes tolerated or even encouraged by the Farina family (as we shall see) and anyway impossible to sanction in the absence of legal regulations, so that the name became generic and the brand has made history!

A descendant of the famous creator, named Jean Marie Joseph Farina, settled in Paris in 1806 and established his own company under the name of Farina, with the permission of his family in Cologne, creating a different perfume for another audience. The company he later sold to Roger & Gallet, who still produces another fragrance "Roger & Gallet Jean Marie Farina". And that's how we got to mess with the real Farina.

However, as I have said, also the name of Eau de Cologne comes from Cologne to which the true Germans call it Echt Kolnisch Wasser. True Cologne Water. To know: it was, is and will only be "colony water" produced in Cologne. Any other Cologne is likely to mislead the true origin of the product. But Eau de Cologne is a long history, degenerating into the "odicolon", a word that, not only in Romanian language, has the meaning of a faint fragrance.

It is true that before a complete degeneration, a famous perfumer, Pierre-François Pascal Guerlain, also created a "related" perfume called Eau de Cologne Impériale, for a good friend of the Romanians, the engraved Emperor Napoleon III[47], a perfume that brought notoriety to its creator, because it soon became the favorite of many houses of kings and emperors.

4. And yet ... is the fragrance a work of intellectual creation?

Asking this issue is only useful for the creative perfumer. For the one who works at random, for the one who copies or reproduces a recipe to another, it cannot be a creative activity generating opera, intellectual creation and protection by any intellectual right.

Fragrance is defined as a combination of aromatic essential oils or aromatic compounds, fixative agents and fragrance-friendly solvents! Or even shorter: a fragrance is an odor obtained by combining several elements. Which means that the perfume is defined by itself and that is why this definition cannot say much about perfumes! Sounds anosmic, does not have pepper

[46] Frederic the 2nd or The Great Frederic (1712-1786), surnamed royal warrior, was a friend of Voltaire. Art lover (he was a talented musician, philosopher, poet), a complete military (he won important victories and made Prussia a powerful and respected kingdom), misogyn (he was forced to participate in the execution of an officer with whom he was suspected of having an indecent relationship), builder of Sans Souci palace (without care) which is associated with the legend of the miller who responded to the aggressive royal offer, of buying his mill that "the king may want my mill at any cost, but there are also judges in Berlin". In front of his funeral monument, Napoleon Bonaparte asked his generals to discover himself and said, "If he were alive, we would not be here today."

[47] Charles Louis Napoleon Bonaparte (1808-1873), the nephew brother of Napoleon Bonaparte, President of the Second Republic (1848-1852), became Napoleon III, Emperor of France (1852-1871). He had an adventurous life (he was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1840, escaped in 1846, returned to the country). It has made an important contribution to the industrialization of France and the modernization of Paris. Defeated in the Battle of Sedan on September 1, 1870, he became captive to the Germans and was released on March 19, 1871. He settled in Chislehurst, England where he died and was buried on January 9, 1873. Unforgiven by the French for losing the battle at Sedan is called the "Forgotten Emperor", being the only French monarch buried in foreign land.

and salt, has no charm, has no substance! It may be appropriate for exact science this definition, but not for the needs of intellectual property law. Which, as it is well known, operates, and not only in the field of copyright, with subjective and relative criteria even when it imposes a protection criterion such as the novelty that is only apparently objective. And this, because the novelty of the invention is an objective criterion only in relation to what we know and identified as a state of the art or a stage of skill, not with everything that really exists in the state of the art. And fragrances are a good example to prove that novelty is not as absolute as we often find it. Perfumes contain many elements, the most important being fragrances, essences or essential oils. For many years (thousands of years) the essence of flowers such as rose, lavender, lily of the valley, rosemary, lilac, violet, bergamot, iris, lily, jasmine etc., flowers of fruitful fruits such as lemon, orange, cherry, plants such as vanilla, patchouli (patchouli), mint, basil, safflower, acanthus, almond, coriander, cinnamon, pepper, vanilla, herbs with aromatic properties (oak mussels), by-products such as resins and incense (which was more precious than gold), or products of animals such as musk, amber, clover, castoreum - obtained from killed animals or painful procedures for animals, or hyraceum - fossilized badger excrements. Synthetic vanilla was invented in 1874 (vanillin[48]), and since then perfumes have entered into a new era, that of inventions, of multiple blends, but also of perfumes with allergenic potential or even worse.

Perfumes seem to us to a certain extent like words. Of words that do not build (like stones, for example) in a real, immediate, visible, palpable manner. Immaterial words that we use and set one after the other to say what we think in the original way are suggestions indirectly communicated. That's how the perfumes are. No solid substance (they still have a substance) and losing their materiality in the air where they are lost in a short time. We "get drunk" temporarily with their flavors! It inspires us! They give us a nice air! Or on the contrary. It brings or turns on the one who we wanted to meet on the way! Because fragrances create moods, they influence behaviors. Provides confidence, relaxation, pleasure, attraction, sympathy, goodwill, or rejection response. It is not only about the scent in case of fragrances. It's also our own way of reacting to smells, combinations of flavors when they are successful or, on the contrary. Something that is transmitted to our minds, something that, without knowing it, influences our attitude. Which makes a interlocutor a loser or a winner. Of the soul, mind, grace and heart! Fragrances appeal to smell (considered fainter as weaker than sight, hearing, and tactile sense) and are more persuasive than spoken or written words.

But the book does the same thing: it tells us what its author is able to tell us, and probably always less than he wants to tell us, to convey to us. Even now our words, as easily seen here, will not be able to tell everything about a perfume and describe a perfume.

A successful Parisian perfumer in Paris, Octavian Coifan, with a workshop across the Eiffel Tower, says that perfumery is the eighth art. It is correct to say that perfumery is an art, but Hegel[49], undecided how he used to be, and how are almost all the philosophers, in his "Aesthetics Lectures" (which also tells us that intellectual goods are an extension of human personality), divided the arts into only six categories[50], much later, some added three others, of which, unfortunately, perfumery is nowhere to be found. Her place in the arts is fully deserved, as Mr. Coifan says, who added that the perfume is a poem. A silent poem that addresses an important sense of smell. Fragrances have always been fascinated, being considered sacred products, the art of which masters were respected and almost frightened, and in antiquity they were seen as gods secrets holders[51], and later in the Middle Ages they became not only fragrant but and alchemists or connoisseurs of poisons and at risk of being considered heretics and then usable products from common people to crowned heads.

For about three centuries, since fragrance became a symbol of civilization and then an indispensable accessory, perfumers are seen as artists or as inventors, or at least as specialists who, when valuable, are also hunted by big houses productive, a true professional being very difficult to prepare and keep in a world where competition is particularly strong.

However, we believe, that no other activity of man is so subtle as the art, science, innovation of fragrancy and the entry, in 1874 (when the synthetic vanilla flavor was invented), in the era of synthetic perfumes only increases the inventive side of this fabulous domain! Perfumery continually creates: essences (which are no longer mere chance discoveries), ingredients, combinations of flavors, colors, and product presentation. Perfumers work a lot searching and researching, and some of them say that, even their sleep is haunted by essences, combinations or formulas, and that their encounters with nature are a [48] The first to use vanilla in a perfume was Guerlain, in 1889, for the Jicky perfume, which is still produced today.

[49] Georg Wilhelm Hegel (1770-1831) is the main representative of the classic German philosophy. He learned the first Latin decline at the age of five. His favorite readings were, among other things, the Greek tragedies, preserving his preference for Greek language and culture all his life, translating Longin ("On the sublime"), Epictet ("The Handbook"), Sofocle ("Antigone"). His fundamental work "Spirit Phenomenology" was published in 1807. He was a graduate of Fichte at the philosophy department of the University of Berlin. He died of cholera. After his death, the disciples split up into the "Right Hegelians", who represented political conservatism, and "left Hegelians" or "Hegelian youths" who pronounced themselves for atheism and liberal democracy. Karl Marx belongs to this current.

[51] Cicero was not sharing same opinion, but he put all the artists among those paid for their work for the benefit of others, and who was not worthy of the appreciation enjoyed by warriors, athletes, and those who worked their own land. Cicero, De Officiis, Book I: 42, 150-1 duty and an opportunity for olfactory indulgence in the first place and only then visual delight, that for them the street and crowds are full of smells, each betraying something of the personality of the bearer and of the person who created it and which they are trying to identify.

Quite similar to classical works (written, painted, played, filmed in the creator's own style), fragrances are also combinations of elements, some existing, others invented in particular, from which a product, a perfume is obtained. When the product is original, new it is the result of a creative process, and the perfumer is a creator, which is synonymous with an author or an inventor. What difference can be made between the author of an original book and the author of an original perfume? What difference could we make between the one who invented a molecule and made an innovative drug and the one who discovered a molecule with which it gets a new perfume? We do not see any, and we see no reason why the fragrance, when it's original or when it's an invention, is excluded from protection! Fragrances, said Charles Baudelaire, who was a great lover of such products,[52], „ must express the emotions of our soul and our senses".

Three protection systems are seen as possible for fragrances: copyright, patent, and manufacturing secret (or service). But also cumulation. Industrial designs and brands have a special role in perfumery. These give them an appearance of shape and ... soul.

5. Perfume protection by copyright

As I have already said, we do not see any impediment to the protection of perfumes by copyright. A protection with more specific rules, but copyright laws contain special rules for many categories of creations (computer programs are the best known, but they add to cinematographic works to photos and many more).

The "form" of intellectual creation must be widely understood as the way in which the work is expressed, it is exteriorized. The form of the musical work is in the score and includes the rhythm, the harmony, the melody, the form of expression of a mime is in his gestures, of a ballerina in the movements of her body, of a perfume in its smell, etc. The reluctance expressed with regard to protection of fragrances can be explained for non-perfumers, for those people who cannot perceive so many smells as the perfumers do (20,000 some may say, but who can count them? We believe that they are infinite!) Or for those who cannot explain in the case of perfumes neither the originality nor the novelty, nor the differences or similarities that can be seen by specialists, using similar concepts and criteria of evaluation identical with those used in the classical works, demonstrating - in the case of perfumers, the necessity of admitting and applying the criterion of originality with variable geometry. Because if we compare the infinite essences, smells and ingredients of words, their combination in a personal manner, the original cannot be but a creation of expression, form, which is protectable by copyright. And when a new aromatic molecule is invented, such molecule and the product made by combining it with other elements can undoubtedly be an invention. As well as the combination of known elements, it can represent an invention.

Making a perfume is not a simple skill as it sometimes people claim on no ground [53]. In such a vision, photographing or painting should also be just skill, and the result, excluded from protection. It is difficult to say what's more about perfume: learning, discoveries, science, knowledge of the chemical formulas of essences (there are about 3,000 synthetically produced flavors at this moment time, respectively organic compounds synthesized in laboratories) and ingredients, choices and combinations of essences and ingredients the imagination and the special sense of the creator, the personality of the one who combines them so successfully that the perfumer, in time, becomes legendary for his miraculous creations. Or, maybe his developed sense of olfaction that helps him to distinguish several times more odors than ordinary people (about 10,000 after some authors) and handles them, just as the writer wielder of words does in his art.

It cannot be generalized because not all perfumes are original at the time of their production, they are not the result of a creative activity. There are well known perfume recipes, or forgotten, abandoned, lost recipes and based on which good perfumes can be produced without intellectual activity by their producers. A perfume made after a known recipe does not imply creative activity and will not be protected by an intellectual right, such as the reproduction of works of art. Similarly, the banal smell (even if the law does not condition copyright protection, a writing, a drawing, a perfume when it is banal, cannot be a work in the sense of the copyright law and will not be protected).

In a new fragrance, in a good fragrance that attracts the audience we talk about observation, it is art in combining essences and ingredients, it is grace, soul, passion, personal touch, there is much and incontestable originality in a perfume, that is why perfume, even if it involves a little physical work (infinitely less than a plastic artist does or even a writer) it can only be an intellectual creation.

[52] She also wrote a poem "Perfume Exotique," which inspired Byredo (Ben Gorham) to create a perfume. The idea of the perfume was born after Ben Gorham visited his mother's hometown in India. He studied plastic arts, but meeting with a great perfumer, Pierre Wulf, made him change his way. Lacking perfumery studies, he is considered an outsider in the field and even an anomaly. Explaining his olfactory wishes, he creates helped by great perfumers (Olivia Giacobetti and Gerome Epinette). However, he is considered an authentic and personal artist in the world of fashion, art and perfumery.

Octavian Coifan, mentioned before, says an important thing for qualifying perfume as a workpiece and the perfumer as a subject of copyright: "Obtaining a pleasant smell does not make you a perfumer. It's just about the difference between an artist and the coloured pencil box that you give to a child. Art begins only when you master such fragrances. A kind of an art of illusion. As if the flower or landscape is under your nose."

Flavours, odours used and obtained, proportions of mixtures, all demonstrate that demonstrate that works can "wear" the most diverse forms of expression, and the form is indifferent to the law when it recognizes or refuses to protect a creation of the original spirit which is genuine. Or, the same essences, the same ingredients used by two perfumers, may have different results, which are given by the personal nature of each perfumer in the way of usage and mixing, by the proportion of mixtures, the reactions that are caused by these mixtures, the final product being objectively and precisely identifiable.

The parfumier does not create a new form of expression, which already exists (as we have seen from the creation of the world), through its creation (the perfume), expressing his personality in a particular form, appropriable under the condition of originality, by copyright. The law does not condition copyright protection on the mode or form of creation, copyright being indifferent to the techniques used in order to create. The fact that pre-existing techniques ("the craft of aroma makers," says the Bible) does not make the obtained product non-appropriable. In a contrary interpretation, it would mean that plastic artists, musicians, writers, etc. who learn techniques to create, are not the authors of their works, and they cannot be protected, which obviously cannot be admitted. Whatever the techniques of realization and mode of expression, the law equally protects all works that fulfil the condition of originality. Seen as a fingerprint, as a manifestation of the author's personality in his creation (Article 7 of Law No. 8/1996).

According to art 7 of the Romanian Copyright Law, the original works of intellectual creation in the literary field, artistic or scientific field, regardless of the way of creation, the way or the form of expression and regardless of their value and destination, are subject to copyright, and the list is formulated as exemplary ("how are"), so if the perfumes are not on this list, doesn't mean that they are excluded. Values, on the contrary, implicit admission. The excluded achievements are limited in Art. 9 of the law and this text does not contain the perfume also.

There can therefore be no discrimination or exclusion depending on the creator's form of expression. Whatever form of expression, and smell is a form of expression [54], it is susceptible to appropriation (we prefer to call it protection), and in order to protect a work, only its (original) form is taken into account. The term "form" has to be understood in a broad sense: form is the way in which creation is expressed, exteriorized, and there are no limitations regarding the way of expression, the form the work can take.

The condition of the concrete form of expression is indifferent to the Romanian legislator, and the perfume has such a shape that makes the product identifiable objectively and sufficiently precise. The harmony, the rhythm and the melody line in music, the chain of words in which the ideas are written in a written work, the paths chosen to reach the results in computer programs, the scent of a perfume, are all (concrete and different) forms of expression. Form is not a secondary element of a protectable creation by copyright and the law has not "frozen" the form of the appropriable good by copyright. "It can make the only difference in things: so it happens with literature and music, where the elements used to create are limited in number: words, notes, smells"[55].

It is always stated and sometimes too vehemently that merit or value is indifferent to the recognition of intellectual creation nature. We do not all agree with this idea (nor us), because banality does not meet the condition of originality, and in the case of perfumes, this is even more obvious. We do not, however, believe that the judge can be absolutely indifferent to the value, because in its absence there is no "work" to talk about. Of course, a criterion of value induces the idea of subjective appreciation, but so do the things in examining the fulfilment of the originality condition. However, the banal is excluded by default from protection because it cannot be considered "work". Which means that we operate, however, with a value criterion, and that we keep it from saying or recognizing it.

The destination of the work or the sense by which a work is perceived must be neutral to copyright, a solution derived from the principle of unity of art. Designed for contemplation, leisure reading or study, viewing and / or auditioning or other uses with aesthetic or utilitarian effect, intellectual creations with original forms are equally protected, excluding those which, considering the destination, the law expressly excludes from protection. This is not the case with the fragrance, for which there is no exclusion from legal protection. In addition, since they are not expressly excluded from protection, fragrances are protected as some that fall into the category of those which, without being listed, are implicitly admitted.

As for the argument that works are generally intended to be perceived by the sense of seeing and hearing and that the other senses are inferior and lacking in the ability to perceive the works, it is false, the demonstration being simple to do: the written works are perfectly perceptible by the touch sense as soon as they are "written" in Braille, or by hearing, when recorded and presented in this way to the "reader" (the listener). But to claim that only perceptible works by hearing or vision are protected, it means adding to the law, because no provision of Law no. 8/1996 does not permit the conclusion in the sense of limiting protected works in relation to the sense of their perception.

Neither fixation, the possibility or the impossibility of attaching the perfume to the support cannot be a reason for exclusion. Firstly, because the product can be stuck in its container. True, it is a form of attachment different from other works. But fixing computer programs did not break previous barriers? And in addition to computer programs, in themselves, they cannot be perceived by humans directly, with no sense. To be perceived, it takes a machine, a computer that makes it only partially perceptible. And then, the law does not provide for such a condition. Even more, it recognizes protection even of unfinished works. In the French doctrine, referring to the jurisprudence of the courts, it was found that the protection of perfumes is not conditional on fixation, according to the old rule stating that intellectual goods are independent of their possible support as soon as the form is perceptible. Accordingly, Nicolas Binctin points out, "a perfume is therefore capable of being a work of protectable creation" on the basis of copyright laws. It is true that the Berne Convention (Article 2 (2)) provided that Member States could make the protection of works subject to their attachment to a support. It is a faculty of states, not an obligation, and the Romanian law and all EU countries, except for Germany, do not provide for such a solution. But even if it was provided, we believe that in case of perfumes the possible condition of attachment is fulfilled, its support being its container.

Of course, the perfume has a peculiarity. Looked at it does not say (pretty) much. Only after being smelled and used, it says what is all about, however the fact that the fragrance addresses to the sense of smell does not make it either imperceptible or unprotectable. The sense of smell it may be the least understood, but it is not less important than other senses except for those who do not want to see the truth. There are also many authors who designate fragrances as "olfactory works".

6. Jurisprudence - protection of tastes and fragrances

The Court of Justice of the European Union has been questioned about the possibility of protecting the taste of a food product by copyright, the facts being as follows: "Heskenkaas" is a food product containing cheese, cream and herbs, created in 2007 by a private farmer, the rights to this being divested in 2011 to the Dutch firm Levola Hengelo BV (Levola). On July 10, 2012, a patent for this product was granted. Another Dutch firm, Smilde Foods BV (Smilde), marketed in 2014 a product called "Witte Wievenkaas" of the same taste and distributed in stores in the Netherlands. Levola sued Smilde complaining that by placing on the market a product of the same taste it infringes his copyright on the taste of his product "Heskenkaas" and that the product "Witte Wievenkaas" constitutes a reproduction of this work, which is why he asked the Dutch court to ban the production and marketing of the "Witte Wievenkaas" product".

The first Dutch court rejected the request on the grounds that the Claimant did not specify which elements or combinations of elements of the 'Heskenkaas' taste would give the product an original, individual note without considering it necessary to analyse whether the 'Heskenkaas' taste was susceptible to protection by copyright. However, the court hearing the appeal has found it necessary to refer the CJEU on several questions, the first and most important being whether, under EU law, the taste of a food can be protected by copyright. In the reasoning of the request for referral, the Dutch appeal court also mentioned a judgment of the Supreme Court of the Netherlands rendered on June16, 2006 in which it was accepted that a perfume is protected by copyright[56].

Having to respond to the questions of the Dutch court, the CJEU rendered a Judgment on November 13, 2018[57] only on the possibility or the impossibility of protecting the taste of a food product, considering that in relation to that response, the others were no longer necessary and held that:

I. the taste of a food product could be protected by copyright under Directive 2001/29 only if such a taste could be classified as a 'work' within the meaning of that directive. And for an object to be classified as a "work" within the meaning of Directive 2001/29, two cumulative conditions must be met: a) the object to be original, that is, to constitute an intellectual creation proper to its author, and b) "work" within the meaning of Directive 2001/29 is limited to elements which are the expression of such intellectual creation. This necessarily implies that there is an expression of the subject-matter of protection under copyright which makes it identifiable in a sufficiently precise and objective manner, even if that expression is not necessarily permanent (comments 35 to 40).
II. Authorities and economic operators must be able to clearly and accurately identify protected objects in favour of third parties, in particular to other competitors. On the other hand, the need to remove any element of subjectivity, which is detrimental to legal certainty, in the process of identifying the protected object implies that the latter may be the object of a precise and objective expression (comment 41).
III. The possibility of precise and objective identification of taste is lacking in case of taste, and there is no means in the current state of technology to make this possible (comments 42 to 43).

IV. It must therefore be concluded that the taste of a food product cannot be classified as a 'work' within the meaning of Directive 2001/29 and that, in view of the need to interpret the concept of work in the Union uniformly, it must be concluded that Directive 2001/29 precludes national legislations from being interpreted as conferring on the taste of a food product protection under copyright (comment 44 and the operative part).

Apparently, there can be no connection between what the CJEU has decided to exclude from protection tastes and fragrances protection. In fact, the grounds of the judgment allow the conclusion that judgment rendered on November 13, 2018 of the CJEU does not contain any grounds for excluding copyright protection from perfumes. On the contrary.

Thus, first of all, it should be noted that both Levola and the Dutch court referred to the judgment of the Supreme Court of the Netherlands of June 16, 2006, which allowed, in principle, the possibility to recognize a copyright on a perfume and this argument was not contradicted by the CJEU. Secondly, in its judgment of November 13, 2018, the CJEU, in argument 40, refers to the possibility of protection even in the case where the expression is not permanent and then added that the possibility of precise and objective identification is lacking with regard to taste of food products in the current state of development of science and technology, which means that in the future such precise and objective identifications could be made, and the issue of protecting the tastes of food could be reconsidered.

In the case of perfumes, this problem does not arise, the state of the art permitting the precise and objective identification of at least the elements which make up a perfume and its smell.

On the other hand, in the case of fragrances, the problem of non-permanent expression is not an issue. In copyright, ephemeral creations are non-permanent but protectable, such as those made out of sand, ice, but the range of this type of creation is infinite and was never in question the exclusion from the protection of ephemeral creations. The perfume is not even such an ephemeral creation, even if used as intended, its smell disappears over time. In the case of perfumers, identical compositions will give identical scent and there is the possibility of reproducing these compositions at infinity (as in the case of written works).In the case of perfumes there is a connection between the product (liquid, solid, oily perfume) and the smell it generates and releases the composition. The same composition will generate the same smell, and the composition and smell produced are objective and precisely identifiable with the technical means we have.

Decision no. 116 of 2006 of the Supreme Court of the Netherlands is not singular. In a judgment of the Paris Court of Appeal rendered on January 26, 2006, it is stated that "and in the case a perfume meets the patentability conditions, by addressing a technical issue, patent protection still does not exclude a protection on behalf of copyright"[58]. The court's argument was a response to the counterfeiter's defence, which, considering the creation under its chemical aspect, claimed that the victim L'Oréal had not submit the patent on the composition of its perfumes, so it cannot plead a counterfeit. However, the court said, this approach is legitimate, but it is not exclusive. The perfume may have multiple ownership regimes, claiming one not impeding the exercise of others.

Nicolas Binctin also reveals the inexplicable inconsistency of the French courts, usually creative and open to the new. Especially in the field of intellectual property rights. Thus, he states that by a decision of 13 June 2006 and decisions of 1 July 2008 and 22 January 2009, the Court of Cassation, repeating the same wording, attempted to reinstate the consideration of the perfume as being a creative act, rejecting its assessment from the point of view of copyright. Twice the Court has stated that "the smell of a perfume, which comes from the mere implementation of a technique, is not the creation of a form of expression that can benefit from the protection of works of creation"[59]. The approach found by the Court, according to Binctin, is contrary to the legal regime of copyright, which is not interested in the method of production, but in the originality of the final result.

Our conclusion is that perfume is not just a chemical formula and is not primarily a chemical formula. Fragrance is a particular form of expression and, consequently, can be considered work protectable by copyright. When the perfumer creates a perfume, the chemical formula is not the one sought and invented by the creator, but the perfume, even if it requires a composition and a chemical formula. Human imagination.

7. Fragrances protection by patent

We believe that the fragrance, seen as a combination of chemical elements, can also be protected by the patent, even though, as we have seen before, ... a perfume is not just a chemical formula. However, the molecule of a new scented substance, which is part of a perfume composition, can be protected by patent. P.-Y. Gautier, not very determined, states that "the protection of fragrances or dishes, the outcome of a laboratory research and expressed in its chemical form, comes rather from the Law on patents"[60].

[58] Apud N. Binctin, op. cit. p. 57.

From what I said before going into this subchapter, making a perfume seems to resemble by some authors with mixing some substances after a " craftsman of fragrances " recipe and which does not necessarily have to be new to give a good perfume. A recipe that was old at the time of its use, was new once, it was original, as everything was new under the sun (all that man did for the first time on earth was new: from the stone carved knife, to the computer that has become an extension of our hands and minds). A situation that closely resembles with that of medicines, in which we have, on one hand, innovative medicines and, on the other hand, generic medicines, which are nothing else but originally innovative medicines, their composition coming into the public domain following the expiration of protection period.

Today, the perfume industry relies more on synthetic chemicals (aromas) and less on flowers or animal elements that were exclusively used to produce essences until the emergence / invention of synthetic flavours in 1874. The appearance of synthetic aromas in fragrance world, rather due to chance (but also penicillin is the result of a random discovery) and which resulted in the replacement of rare and expensive natural flavors with synthetic flavors that could be produced in any quantity and led to abandonment of many crops (of flowers) and many factories of natural essence, even in Grasse. In Grasse, for example, there were 2,200 flower crops in 1975, while in 1995 there were only 150 rose crops left and 20 jasmine crops (since then a they had a slight growth trend), perfume made of flowers being still popular, but much more expensive than synthetic ones. Fragrances with synthetic essences are cheaper. But more dangerous (and among natural flavors are some allergenic and / or toxic).

The year 1874 was marked by the invention of synthetic vanilla flavor (also called vanillin, although vanillin is the essential component of the vanilla extract having the chemical formula C8H8O3), much cheaper than natural vanilla[61] (the price of one kilogram of pods is 500 dollars, and one kilogram of vanilla over 11,000 US dollars) and took the place of the latter in food and beverages. But Synthetic Vanilla took the place of expensive natural vanilla into perfumery and made possible to produce much cheaper perfumes that became accessible to a much larger number of consumers. Undoubtedly, synthetic vanilla was an invention, but we did not find if was patented. The distinction between vanilla and vanillin: the first is a complex mixture of several hundred compounds, the second one is derived from phenol and is of great purity. In practice, the difference between the two is hard to make, but not impossible.

The natural mosque was (and is) the most expensive product used in perfumery. Obtained from a musk deer male gland[62], 160 bags are required to obtain one kilogram of musk, which made the species threatened with extinction, since 1979 it was put under protection by banning its hunting. But the mossy deer is still in danger due to poaching, on the market the price of one kilogram of musk is 45,000 dollars (much more precious than gold), which is the most expensive ingredient in perfumery. Musk is obtained, with musk-like sacrifices and other animals but of inferior quality to that produced by the musk deer, as well as by plants, the latter being valuable by its natural properties, but it is difficult to obtain (the crops are expensive, of long duration, reduced quantities).

In 1888, the German chemist Albert Baur, trying to obtain a stronger explosive than the nitrotoluene of Alfred Nobel, found that the product he experimented with (which generated a small explosion) emanated a pleasant smell of …musk which he named Nitromusk. But the product was chemically unstable and toxic and could not be used in perfumery. Continuing his research, Baur obtained nitric acid with 3-tert-butyltoluene a musk-smelling product, later known as the Baur musk. After six years of research, he obtained the white musk, product with an odour very close to that of the natural musk and which became indispensable in the perfume industry. Recently, however, it has been discovered that synthetic white musk is an allergen and carcinogen, but a replacement has not yet been found. On the other hand, many people do not detect this musk, so combinations of musk are used to make it identifiable.

The number of synthetic flavours has since grown continuously, and as with molecules in pharmaceutical field, there can be no impediment to their protection by patent if they meet the proper invention conditions (novelty, inventive activity and industrial applicability).

Are combinations of elements protectable?

In the case of new combinations of known products or combinations containing novel elements not known at the time of the invention, things are simple: the perfume is the result of a new chemical formula, derived from an inventive activity, and is patentable. The invention, however, consists of the chemical formula of the perfume, not in its smell, which is protected by copyright. Moreover, a new chemical formula for a perfume gives rise to a patent right

[61] Natural vanilla, isolated for the first time in 1810, is obtained from the pods of species of huge lianas (growing in the equatorial area), related to the orchid. The flavor has been discovered by chance because it is hidden in the pods and is released only after nine months of fermentation, using wool padded boxes for this process.

There are over 100 species of vanilla, but only three are used for their special flavor. The most valuable is Vanilia Bourbon. Its acquisition involves huge crops of lianas with long production cycles, where even pollination is done manually, natural pollination being made by a bee living in a small area, which is why liana could not be easily acclimated to other countries of the world, and fermentation takes place in special baskets in not less than 9 months regardless of the quality of the smell, but if the smell is banal, it cannot be protected by copyright as well.

The combinations of known elements (molecules, essences, ingredients, fixatives, solvents) of compounds or chemical combinations that produce unexpected results different from those known may be inventions and can be protected by patents according to art. art. 47, paragraph 9 of GD no. 547/2008, approving the Regulation for the enforcement of Law no. 64/1991 on patents for invention. New uses of known substances may be inventions and within the meaning of art. 63 (2) lit. b) the European Patent Convention and Art. 43 (2) of the CBE Enforcement Regulation, which also speaks about inventions having as object a way of usage of a product in our case of a molecule. Also, Directive 98/44 / EC on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions, in comment no 28 of the reasoning, also states that "a patent may be granted for any new application of a patented product" (of a new patented molecule).

The doctrine also considers that we are in the presence of a product invention in the case when obtaining a new practical use of the product, previously unachieved and that in such cases we can speak of a "new product" even if it is not substantially, a new body[63]. In other words, in principle, the new use of a product (molecules) can be a product invention (perfume).

The protection of chemical formulas by patent is almost unanimously admitted. Even those who are opposed to the protection of perfume by copyright, accept the protection by patent or by work secret. Thus, F. Pollaud-Dulian states that "the formula of a perfume comes from the industrial technique in the cosmetics sector (...). Their protection comes from patents and / or from unfair competition and not from copyright, because the process or industrial product is the one that is trying to be protected and not an arbitrary external form that would give an industrial product"[64]

We find a contradiction in F. Pollaud-Dulian's argument: if the perfume is the result of an intellectual creation activity, it must be protected by an intellectual right as one that is not expressly excluded from protection. Protection as an invention is conditioned by the fulfilment of novelty conditions, inventive activity and industrial applicability, a patent cannot be granted if these conditions are not fulfilled cumulatively. Protection by copyright, of the fulfilment of the condition of originality. Is it then possible that a perfume to be an intellectual creation under the inventions regime but not to be considered the same under the copyright regime? We recall the general rule that states, under the umbrella of intellectual property rights there are products for the spirit, united by their common origin and separated by the protection regime.

However, we agree with the author quoted when he states that the process or product is the one for which protection is sought. We find here, even indirectly, the idea that the product can be protected by patent, both the product (the perfume) and the process of its realization (the recipe). And it is not unusual, the law of inventions allowing for patent protection of the product and the production process.

8. Is it better to protect fragrance by work secret?

Once created, whether it is a work protected by copyright or a patentable invention, the perfume recipe can become a work secret and kept as it is. With a benefit that can be higher than patent protection or even copyright. Fragrances are created on the market for hundreds of years and whose recipes are kept secret by the creators' successors or by their successors to rights.

The patenting of an invention is not obligatory, requiring the issuance of a patent for invention being a faculty for the person seeking a protection for the created invention, a title which, once released to the inventor or to the person entitled to the grant of the patent, renders opposable to third parties recognized / conferred by the patent, ensuring the protection of the exclusive right recognized by law. And it is possible that the number of inventions that even after the adoption of the patent protection system have not been patented, although they have contributed tremendously to the progress of mankind, exceed those that have been patented[65].

Patenting the invention is the necessary solution for the inventor (or his successor in title) who wishes to protect himself against unauthorized use of his invention by third parties, but also those who may reach the same result without knowing the pre-existing invention, thus ensuring their competitive advantage over those operating in the same field, an advantage which is even the economic value of the invention. This is because, it is well known, in the matter of intellectual property rights, the rule is that of recognizing the right in favor of the person who first submits the patent application. But patenting is also the means by which, assuring its competitive advantage as an effect of the exclusive exploitation right, the inventor and those who invest in research and development provide the return of the often huge investments.

If the person who created an invention, considering the benefits he/she would obtain, opts for protection by secret[66], this assuming protection by means of fact, the inventor (or its successor in title) will have to take the necessary measures to ensure that all essential data of the invention and which would allow the reproduction of the result, they remain confidential. The protection of the secret and the commercial secret of an invention depends, in efficiency and duration, on the quality of the means used to preserve the secret, the number of persons to whom the invention is objectively or subjectively revealed, the volume and quality of the information in the invention is made available, to those whose information is to be disclosed, their preparation, their good faith, the interest and value of the invention kept secret, the quality of competitors in the field of invention, etc.

Secret invention is particularly vulnerable to reverse engineering procedures[67] which allow for reduced or similar efforts to achieve similar products than those obtained by the application of the secret invention and which, in this way, loses its practical utility. Or the exclusivity conferred by the invention patent is not secured by way of fact. The exclusive right conferred by the patent and its erga omnes opposability allows the holder, during its term of validity, to be the only one able to use the invention or to authorize any exploitation of the invention and to oppose unauthorized use and to be paid damages for use unauthorized by him.

The preservation of the secret of the invention does not mean, however, that the owner is deprived of any means of defense, the procedural means at its disposal being the action in unfair competition, a kind of action in civil tort liability that sanctions the acts of competition contrary to honest commercial practices. But while in the case of keeping the secret of the invention, with the intent of appropriation as a commercial secret, there is only a general and abstract obligation of all not to prejudice others (in this case, the owner of the commercial secret = invention secret) by acts/ acts of unfair competition, patenting involves obtaining a title of protection conferring erga omnes opposing rights to the inventor (its successor in title) so that the patent owner will have at hand to obtain sanctioning the violation of his / her exclusive right, the most convenient and efficient way of action in counterfeiting.

There is only one exception to the optional nature of the patent. This is the case for pharmaceutical products for which manufacturers are required to make the composition known but also other products for the obligation to provide complete information in order to protect consumers.

In the case of perfumery products, such an obligation does not exist at this time, so the secret protection of the perfume production is fully possible. It is affordable, convenient and with a fairly high degree of safety for perfumes.

9. Perfumes protection as models or industrial designs

We have never thought that a liquid product could be protected as a design or a model. How could a liquid nevertheless fulfil the "condition of being a design or model" (Article 2 letter d) of Law no. 129/1992)? As regards the other two conditions (Article 6 of the Law on Models and Designs), namely, novelty and individuality if we were to assess them by taking into account the principle of "variable geometry" and that of "degree of freedom" in elaborating the design or model, we believe that they could be met if the fragrances were shaped.

The condition of "being a model or design" seems impossible to us only for liquid perfumes. This is because the liquids, which occupy an intermediate position between solids and gases, do not have their own shape and flow, thanks to the large particle mobility. Liquids, although they have volume, their shape depends on outside conditions. Without a stable outer form, they cannot in themselves constitute two-dimensional or three-dimensional shapes. Or the designs are defined by art. 2 lit. d) of Law no. 129/1992 regarding the models and designs as the exterior appearance of a product or part thereof, reproduced in two or three dimensions, resulting from the combination of the main characteristics, lines in particular contours, colours, shapes, texture and / or materials of the product itself and/or its ornamentation.

But fragrances can also be solid (as they may be in the form of gases) in which case the perfume, having a solid form, could be an industrial model. Or if there is such a possibility (for example, pills, sticks, candles, bath salts, soaps, etc.) and we see no impediment to giving the perfume a three-dimensional shape, we believe that the remaining issue here is the interest in protecting a perfume in this way and not to exclude all fragrances from industrial protection. Protectable as models will only be those that meet all the conditions for protection (it is a model, has novelty and has an individual character). Protecting the outer form of a (solid) perfume seems to be a weak and unexciting protection. The parfumier will want to protect the smell and the recipe, the product and the process, and copyright or patent protection seems to us a much more effective solution.

And yet, the models have had and still have a huge impact on liquid perfumes!

The (great) nephew of Napoleon Bonaparte, the famous perfumier Francois Coty[68], the founder of a [67] Reverse engineering consists of the study of goods/ products/ man-made intellectual creations and the process of extracting knowledge from them. Helps to identify the solutions and operating principles of a device / good / creation by analyzing their structure, functions, operations. Involves disassembly or decomposition of the device or system and analysis of its operation in order to achieve similar products. In the case of scientific research, the natural phenomena are not goods / products / creations made by man.

[68] Joseph Marie Francois Spoturno, descendent of one of Napoleon's aunts, Isabela Bonaparte. After the conscription he arrived in Paris, where he was the secretary of a Corsican politician (Emmanuel Arene), then he studied perfumery in Grasse, returned to Paris, created the successful company - Coty Inc. - was the first to understand that an attractive recipient will contribute to the commercial success of the perfume and then collaborated with ceramist and jeweller René Lalique who made the recipients and labels of his products, but also with other famous designers. And he is also the one who (born in 1874, that is, the year when the first synthetic essence – vanilla was invented) created fragrances with synthetic flavours, cheap and consequently accessible to those with low incomes. And who said: *"Give a woman the best product made, wrap it in a perfect container, beautiful in its simplicity, but with impeccable taste, ask for a reasonable price for it and you will be assisting the birth of a business of a size that the world has never seen before."

Perfume recipients can be industrial designs when they are not works protectable by copyright. And they can generate wars, like the case of the shape of the champagne stopper as a perfume recipient.

In the early 1990s, Yves Saint Laurent put on the market a fragrance called Champagne in a recipient that replicated the well-known stopper shape of the famous French sparkling wine and for which protection is ensured by indication of the Champagne region. Owners of the IGP Champagne right have reacted against such use, not because of the loss of customers (impossible for the products and the target customers, but because a third party took advantage of the notoriety that was gained long ago but very hard obtained and not easily maintained by sparkling wines with this name. Having to rule on the dispute submitted by the champagne producers the Paris Court of Appeal by decision of 15 December 1993, decided that by adopting the name 'Champagne', protected by IGP, which enjoys a notorious exception in both France and abroad, to launch a new luxury perfume, choosing a presentation that reminds of the characteristic cork of the bottles of this wine and by using in the promotional arguments the image and the taste sensations of joy and celebration they evoke (the famous champagne, n.a.), the manufacturer of this perfume wanted to create an attractive effect borrowed from the prestige of the disputed name and, by a constitutive procedure of parasitic act, diverted the notoriety of which only champagne producers and sellers can use for marketing the wine entitled to this name"[69]

Our conclusion is that there can be solid perfumes and for which protection as an industrial model is possible, but such protection is weak and of a reduced practical interest.

The containers in which fragrances are packaged may be works of art that can themselves be protected when they fulfil the condition of originality (the fact that they also have a practical application is not excluding them from protection), but they are often applied works of art and give, like any creations applicable in industry, charm and attractiveness to the product called perfume. Or the opportunity to make the perfume a visible and perceptible product and a commercial good as the canvas makes possible the creation of the painting and the opportunity to perceive the painting. And which containers, according to the old model of Raymond Loewy's famous Coca Cola bottle, can also be protected as three-dimensional brands.

10. In conclusion, why olfactory creations cannot be protected as brands?

From freshly mown grass fragrance for tennis balls, to rose perfume for tyres, from the scent No. 5 for Chanel perfumes to the bitter scent of beer for dart games, from the scent of plumeria flower for sewing threads up to the smell of cinnamon for advertising, all were attempts (some successful, others not) to record olfactory "marks" as brands. However, in the case of olfactory marks admitted for trademark, the protection was obtained for an (olfactory) mark registered as trademark, i.e. for the use of an odour in order to identify one merchant's products and / or services in relation to the services and / or products of the same kind of other merchants. The market knows such examples, but their success is reduced, because few people respond to such stimuli ... olfactory when they want to buy goods or services. The incentive rather concerns the possibility of identifying where a product or service known to the consumer is located and stores located in large shopping malls have adopted this custom (Massimo Dutti, Adidas, etc.) to make their presence felt, olfactory marks being used as a trade marks, not product. Recently, Anabelle Kaznov-Cofinet[70] has created eight different unisex fragrances of natural essences with two main categories, one with a touch of freshness, the second with a woody note, specially designed for the BMW 7 Series and inspired by this brand of cars. Perfumes that do not impregnate in passenger's clothing. The car maker and BMW perfume creator claim that fragrances, which are not impregnating in passenger clothing, give the luxury automobile an olfactory identity and an emotional perfume La Rose Jacqueminot, which he tried to sell on the street without much success. Breaking a perfume bottle that slipped from his hand inside a shop drew attention to the smell of his perfume and soon brought his celebrity. He built near Paris "La Cité des parfums", a complex containing laboratories and factories producing his perfumes where 9,000 people were producing 100,000 bottles of perfume per day, and to meet the demand in the US market, created production centres in the US. He also unsuccessfully tried to enter politics and press business.

experience that enhances the user's well-being and even "improves the comfort of the new car"[71].

The brand's ability to enhance perfumes is huge and, as I have already said, there are few areas of goods and services production where brands have such an important role and are so counterfeited. Specifically to perfume brands is the fact that they must make a difference also between the perfumes of the same manufacturer. And for that they use a brand of the manufacturer and a brand of the perfume (same situation we also encounter in the case of automotive manufacturers).

The brand or brands for perfume and olfactory brands are, however, two different things. The ones for perfumes are marks that distinguish between perfumes and are not olfactory marks. We also believe that olfactory marks for perfumes could not be registered because such marks would be devoid of distinctive character, they would be constituted of common marks in perfumery and it would in fact represent the product's characteristics, the technical result that give substantial value of the product (which is why the olfactory brand No. 5 for Chanel's perfume No 5 itself was refused to be registered). But also because for a consumer would be difficult or even impossible to identify perfumes on the shelf by its own sense of smell.

Susceptibility to registration of olfactory brands (which has raised delicate issues, including the possibility of graphic representation of these "marks", the creation of a brand repository that lasts over time, the relativity of fragrance perception through the sense of smell - a possible threat to the security of registration, and , consequently for the security of legal relations) was for the first time clarified by the European Court of Justice by the means of a preliminary question formulated in 2002 by The Federal Patent Court in Germany (although previously when registering the freshly mown grass smell , the OHIM examiner / current EUIPO drew attention to some particularly interesting issues[72]).

On that occasion, the Court explained the condition of graphic representation "in the sense that a mark may consist of a sign that cannot be visually perceived, provided that it can be represented graphically. This graphic representation must allow the sign to be represented visually by images, lines or characters in order to be accurately identified. [73]"

The European Court held that the requirement of graphic representation was established in order to know as precisely as possible the object of protection conferred by registration to the trade mark proprietor, the registration of the mark in the public register in order to make it accessible to the authorities, the general public and the economic operators: In order for the individuals accessing the registers to be able to precisely identify the nature of a trademark based on the registration, the graphic representation in the register must have a stand-alone status, easily accessible and comprehensible. In addition, in order to fulfil its registered trademark role, it must be perceived unequivocally and in the same way by everybody, so that the mark can be a guarantee for the indication of origin. In view of the duration of the registration of a trade mark and the fact that, as required by the Directive, it can be renewed for different periods, representation must be durable. Finally, brand representation must avoid any element of subjectivism in the process of identifying and perceiving the mark. Consequently, the means of graphic representation must be unequivocal and objective"[74].

The comments were subsequently taken up in the Directive (EU) 2015/2436 of the European Parliament and of the Council on December 16, 2015 on the approximation of the laws of Member States regarding trademarks, in Regulation (EU) 2015/2424 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 December 2015 amending Council Regulation (EC) 207/2009 on the Community trade mark and subsequently in Regulation 1017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 14 June 2017 on the Mark of the European Union, being known as the "Sieckmann Criteria": in the preamble of the mentioned legal acts is provided that EU legislation "should authorize that a mark is to be represented in any appropriate form by means of generally available technology, not necessarily by means of graphics, as long as the representation is clear, precise, autonomous, easily accessible, intelligible, durable and objective."

If European legislation so permits the registration of such distinctive unconventional signs of trade, why cannot olfactory creations be protected as trademarks?

The answer is found on one hand in the functions of marks and on the other hand in the principle of the specialty of marks. It does not only apply to olfactory brands, but to all distinctive marks of trade activity. Thus, in a first aspect, the main function, both legal and economic of a trade mark is to distinguish between the goods and services of its own proprietor and the products and services of other competitors. Therefore, what is protected by the exclusive right of registration is not the product of the creative activity, the intellectual creation resulting in the registered trademark, but the relational tringle proprietor-brand-product / service. In other words, the mark is protected by reference to the designated products / services and which the holder of the mark sells under that trade mark.

[72] "From my point of view, the examiner said, the mark was not represented graphically. What has been provided is a graphic representation of a description of what the brand means and not of the brand itself. And being a verbal communication of what the brand is, the extent of the mark protection purpose is not clear. For example, what is the difference between "the smell of freshly cut grass" of fresh grass or simply cut grass? "The decision of the Appeals Chamber of 11.02.1999 given in Case R 156 / 1998-2 . 4.

[73] Case C-273/00 of 12.12.2002 concerning the interpretation of Art. (2) of Directive 89/104 / EEC on the approximation of Member States laws relating to trade marks, concerning Ralph Sieckermann, comments 45 to 46.

Under a second aspect, the principle of the trade mark's specialty implies that its use is limited to the goods and services for which it was registered and, implicitly, to the trade mark proprietor's field of activity: the right over the mark does not concern any creation or innovation, but exclusively what the holder has chosen to protect closely with a particular category of products and services.[75] And the principle of specialty has a profound significance for the trademark protection system: at the time of filing the application for registration, the conditions of distinctiveness, availability and even licit (for example, misleading brands) will be examined by reference to the products and services that the holder has chosen for his mark[76].

In conclusion, answering to the question in the title, we reaffirm that olfactory works cannot be protected by distinctive marks of trade activity (in this case marks) because what is protected by the registration of a mark is not the mark in itself regarded as an intellectual creation, but the exclusive character of the use of the mark by its proprietor for certain categories of goods and services for which it was registered. Exclusivity or monopoly over the mark helps the trademark owner to keep customer loyalty and distinguishes itself among its competitors. And even if the mark itself is made of a creation, whether it is a special graphic representation, a logo, a slogan, then it will be able to benefit from the protection conferred by copyright or, as the case may be, designs or models in the extent to which the conditions of protection are met. And with regard to the olfactory brands that represents stand-alone works, their protection would be conferred by the other rights, subject to the wording in the previous sections.

THE AUTHOR(S) OF THE PHD THESIS AND HIS/THEIR MORAL RIGHTS. JOINT LIABILITY OF THE PHD CANDIDATE AND OF THE PHD SUPERVISOR FOR THE OBSERVANCE OF THE ETHICS AND DEONTOLOGY RULES

Ionela-Alina ZORZOANĂ[*]

Abstract

In the first part, this study proposes an analysis of the phrase "Author(s) of the PhD thesis" by reference to the principle The real author of the PhD thesis and the moral rights of the author of a scientific work provided by Law no. 8/1996 on copyrights and related rights. We thought it was necessary to pay special attention to the right of informing the public about the work, in the light of the limitations provided by law in case of PhD theses, especially by the Law of National Education no. 1/2011, Law no. 288/2004 on organizing PhD academic studies and Government Decision no. 681/2011 for the approval of the Code of PhD academic studies. The analysis mainly refers to the guidance activity carried out by the PhD supervisor throughout the PhD study years, an obligation provided by Law no. 1/2011 and Government Decision no. 681/2011. Thus, in the first part of the study, we shall answer the question whether the guidance activity of the PhD supervisor is sufficient, so that he should become the author of the PhD thesis alongside the PhD candidate and benefit of the moral rights to the same extent as the latter.

In the second part of the study, we proposed ourselves to analyze the joint liability of the PhD candidate and of the PhD supervisor for the observance of the rules of ethics and deontology, by relating such to the guidance obligation of the PhD supervisor. We shall perform this analysis by reference to the said regulations, but also to Law no. 206/2004 on the proper conduct in research activity and Law no. 319/2003 on the status of the research-development staff.

Keywords: the author of the PhD thesis, the moral rights of the author of the work, the limitations of the right to inform the public about the author of the PhD thesis, the guidance activity of the PhD supervisor, the rules of ethics and deontology in the activity of scientific research, the joint liability of the PhD candidate and the PhD supervisor, the sanctions applicable for the infringement of the ethics and deontology rules.

1. Introduction

In the first part, this study proposes an analysis of the collocation "The Author / Authors of the PhD Thesis" by reference to the Principle of the true author of the PhD thesis and to the moral rights of the author of a scientific work under Law no. 8/1996 on copyrights and related rights. I considered it was necessary to pay special attention to the right of informing the public about the work, in the light of the limitations provided by law in the case of PhD dissertations, especially by National Education Law no. 1/2011, Law no. 288/2004 on the organization of academic studies and Government Decision no. 681/2011 for the approval of the Code for Academic PhD Studies. The analysis mainly focuses on the guidance of the PhD supervisor during the years of performing the PhD studies, an obligation provided by National Education Law no. 1/2011 and by Government Decision no. 681/2011 for the approval of the Code for Academic PhD Studies. Thus, we shall answer the question whether the guidance activity of the PhD supervisor is sufficient for him/her to become the author of the PhD thesis besides the PhD candidate and to enjoy moral rights to the same extent as the latter.

In the second part of the study shall be analyzed the joint responsibility of the PhD candidate and PhD supervisor for the observance of the rules of ethics and deontology, referring to the PhD supervisor's guidance obligation. We shall analyze in relation to the mentioned regulations, but also to Law no. 206/2004 on proper conduct in the research activity and Law no. 319/2003 on the status of R&D staff.

2.1. The author(s) of the PhD thesis and his/her/their moral rights

2.1.1. True Author-Principle

According to art. 3 paragraph (1) from Law no. 8/1996 on copyrights and related rights[1], "The individual(s), who created the work is/are the author."

As it results from the legally quoted text, copyright is closely related to the person of the author, granting to him/her patrimonial and moral attributes. The principle governing copyright is that of the true creator of the work, which links the capacity of an author to the capacity of the subject matter of the copyright even when the author of the creation is not known. As mentioned by Professor Viorel Roș, " Even when its author is not known, has not revealed his/her identity, it has an author and no one can assume the capacity of an author, no one can usurp the capacity of the author of the work accomplished by another, regardless if unknown, no one can claim for himself/herself the capacity of the author of a work that he/she has not created himself/herself"[2] .

[1] Republished, in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 489/14 June 2018;

On the other hand, according to art. 4 paragraph (1) of the Law no. 8/1996, "the person under whose name the work was made public shall be presumed to be the author until evidence to the contrary".

2.1.2. Is the PhD candidate the true author of the PhD thesis?

Starting from the above principle, by reference to the theme analyzed in this study, appears the question "Who is the true author of the PhD thesis?"? "The PhD candidate? The PhD supervisor? Or both jointly? Although, apparently, the answer can be simple, relying on the provisions of art. 65 paragraph (5) of the Code of Academic PhD Studies which expressly provide that "The PhD candidate is the author of the PhD thesis and assumes the accuracy of the data and information presented in the thesis, as well as of the opinions and demonstrations expressed in the thesis", the questions has anyway its justification.

It is true that the PhD candidate is the one who researches, analyzes, creates and who finally drafts the PhD thesis, but what role does the "guidance" given by the PhD supervisor play? Is everything resumed to the fulfilment of certain legal obligations by the latter? Or does he/she have any contribution to the creative process of the PhD candidate?

We find legal provisions regarding the PhD supervisor's obligation to "guide" in several regulations. The first of these is Law no. 1 / 2011[3] of the national education, with subsequent modifications and completions, which at art. 162 par. (1) refering to the fact that " the PhD candidate is working under the guidance (...) of a PhD supervisor". To the same "guidance" refers the Code of Academic PhD Studies, approved by Government Decision no. 681/2011 with subsequent amendments and supplementations. Thus, the regulations refers both of a right of the PhD candidate - to benefit from the support, guidance and coordination of the PhD supervisor (Article 71 para. (1) lit. a), as well as an obligation of the PhD supervisor - to provide scientific, professional and deontological guidance of each PhD candidate (Article 72 para. (3) lit. a))[4].

According to the Explanatory Dictionary of the Romanian Language, 2nd supplemented and reviewed edition (2009), "guidance" means correction, steerage, routing. Therefore, the PhD supervisor has an obligation to guide the PhD candidate, but on his own chosen path, the one of his own creation. In other words, in our opinion, the PhD supervisor does not go ahead the PhD candidate, creating in his place and with him, creating together, but more, behind the PhD candidate, taking care not to turn on a wrong way.

In conclusion, although the contribution of the PhD supervisor is indisputable in the final form of the thesis, the creation itself belongs to the PhD candidate, who is the sole author of the thesis.

2.1.3. Moral Rights of the Author(s) of the PhD Thesis

I. Brief Considerations on Moral Rights and the Legal Nature thereof

Moral rights are those non-patrimonial personal rights, which the author of intellectual creation enjoys in this view, representing non-patrimonial prerogatives of non-patrimonial nature recognized to any author in regard to his/her work, irrespective whether it is protected in the field of copyright[5].

The Bern Convention of 1886 for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works has been ruled by art. 6bis "1. Independently of the author's economic rights, and even after the transfer of the said rights, the author shall have the right to claim authorship of the work and to object to any distortion, mutilation or other modification of, or other derogatory action in relation to, the said work, which would be prejudicial to his honor or reputation.

2. The rights granted to the author in accordance with the preceding paragraph shall, after his death, be maintained, at least until the expiry of the economic rights, and shall be exercisable by the persons or institutions authorized by the legislation of the country where protection is claimed. However, those countries whose legislation, at the moment of their ratification of or accession to this Act, does not provide for the protection after the death of the author of all the rights set out in the preceding paragraph may provide that some of these rights may, after his death, cease to be maintained.

3. The means of redress for safeguarding the rights granted by this Article shall be governed by the legislation of the country where protection is claimed"[6].

Regarding the said provisions, it was noted in the specialized foreign literature "art.6bis represents a

The law of the State where protection is claimed is liable to state whether, after the death of the author, the heirs will be able to claim the moral right.*"[7]

Law no. 8/1996, art. 10, itemizes the following moral rights of the author: "a) the right to decide whether, how and when the work will be made known to the public; b) the right to claim recognition as the author of the work; c) the right to decide under what name the work will be made public; d) the right to claim the observance of the integrity of the work and to challenge any modification, as well as any prejudice upon the work, if it prejudices its honour or reputation; e) the right to withdraw the work, indemnifying, where appropriate, the holders of the usage rights, who have suffered damage as a result of the withdrawal".

As far as the legal nature of copyright is concerned, such are non-patrimonial rights, i.e. absolute, binding erga omnes rights.

Law no. 8/1996 does not contain such provisions, but the following legal characters can be deduced from its contents; thus, moral copyrights:

- are closely related to the person of the author: the author personally has and exerts the right to decide when and under what name the work will be brought to made public, how this will be done and the withdrawal of the disclosed work due to reasons that are left to the sovereign discretion of the author;
- are inalienable (Article 11 para. (2) from Law no/1996[8]) and indistinguishable, meaning such cannot be either alienated or traced;
- are of perpetual nature[9] (art. 11 para. (2) from Law no. 8/1996) and are not time-limited: the use of the work cannot affect the memory of the author and the work cannot be dissociated from its creator even after his/her demise. After the author's death, the exercise of the right to claim recognition of the author's capacity and the right to claim the observance of the integrity of the work and to challenge any alterations and prejudices impairing to the honour or reputation of the author are transmitted by inheritance. On the other hand, the lack of barring moral rights in time means that such may be exerted as long as the work remains in the memory of people and is subject to exploitation.

II. Right of disclosure (public disclosure); Are there limitations to this moral right in the case of PhD dissertations?

From among all moral rights provided by art. 10 from Law no. 6/1998, the one stipulated in letter a) - The right to decide whether, how and when the work will be brought to the attention of the public.

In the specialized literature, it was stated that the right to divulge the work enables " the author of the work to decide: not to make the work public; to make the work public; when it will make the work public and how it will make the work public; to appeal to the coercive force of the state for the protection of this right".[10] Starting from this opinion, without insisting on general issues, it has to be analyzed whether and to what extent the right to disclose the work is applicable to the subject analyzed in this study - the PhD thesis.

In a first view, we believe that the PhD dissertation cannot pose the problem of not making the work public, considering that the final goal of the PhD studies is to obtain the PhD title in a certain field, and in the absence of public support for the thesis, this goal cannot be achieved. Moreover, there is a legal provision limiting in time the maximum period until which the PhD candidate may defend the PhD thesis. In accordance with the provisions of art. 12 from Law no. 288/2004[11], on the organization of academic studies, with subsequent amendments and supplementations "Academic PhD studies usually have a term of 3 years. In special situations, when the subject matter requires a longer period of study or experimentation, the term may be extended by 1-2 years, with the approval of the university senate, at the proposal of the PhD supervisor. The defence of the PhD thesis can be done within a maximum of 4 years as of the graduation of the academic PhD studies with the approval of the university senate and the PhD supervisor." Therefore, the moment when the PhD is made public does not entirely belong to the decision of the PhD candidate, as he/she has a time limit provided by the law in which he/she must publicly defend the thesis and neither is it at the discretion of the PhD candidate "how" the PhD dissertation is made public, as this may be performed only in written form and by oral public support of the thesis.

In accordance with the provisions of art. 168 para. (9) from Law no. 1/2011 "The PhD thesis is a public document. It is also written in digital format. In the field of arts, the PhD thesis may be accompanied by the recording on digital media of the original artistic creation. The PhD thesis and its annexes are published on a site managed by the Ministry of Education, Research, Youth and Sport, by observing the legislation applicable in the copyright field". From the analysis of the text of the law, it results that a public nature is rendered upon the PhD dissertation by publishing it ex officio on the said website. On the other hand, in the

However, we cannot omit observing the contradiction between the public nature of the PhD thesis explicitly stipulated by law and the moral right that the author of the thesis has, according to art. 10 letter a) from Law no. 8/1996.

A similar provision is also found in art. 66 par. (1) and (2) of the Code approved by Government Decision no. 681/2011, according to which "(1) PhD theses and their annexes are public documents and are also written in digital format. In the field of arts, PhD theses can be accompanied by the recording on digital media of original artistic creation. The PhD dissertation and its annexes are published on a site managed by the Ministry of Education, Research, Youth and Sports, in compliance with applicable copyright laws. (2) The protection of the intellectual property rights on the PhD thesis shall be ensured in accordance with the provisions of the law." Concurrently, special attention should be paid to paragraph (4) from art. 66 (inserted by the Government Decision no. 134/2016 for the amendment and supplementation of the Code of Academic PhD Studies approved by Government Decision 681/2011), according to which " The structure and access to the "PhD file" will be regulated by a procedure developed by CNATDCU and approved by order of the Minister of national education and scientific research, in compliance with the legislation in force. This procedure will comply with the following rules: a) the abstract of the thesis is published on the website of the university or, as the case may be, of the Romanian Academy and may be publicly consulted after the issuance of the order for the appointment of the support commission; b) the printed version of the thesis may be consulted at the library of the university or, as the case may be, of the Romanian Academy at least 20 days before the date set for public defences thereof. The PhD thesis remains a public document at the university library or, as the case may be, of the Romanian Academy ; c) if the PhD candidate does not choose a distinct publication of the thesis or some chapters from it, the digital form of the thesis is made public and it can be freely accessed on the national platform after issuing the order to grant the PhD title; to the thesis will be granted a copyright protection license; d) if the PhD candidate chooses the distinct publication of the PhD thesis or of some chapters thereof, he/she shall receive a grace period of maximum 24 months for this publication; after the expiry of the grace period, if no notification has been received at IOSUD regarding the separate publication of the thesis, the digital document becomes freely accessible on the national platform, granting a copyright protection license; e) after the publication of the thesis or some chapters thereof, the author has the obligation to notify IOSUD of this fact and to submit the bibliographic reference and a link to the publication, which will then be made public on the national platform; f) after granting the PhD title, within maximum 30 days, IOSUD is under the obligation to send a printed copy of the PhD thesis to the National Library of Romania, where it can be accessed on request."

From the analysis of the legally quoted text, we can safely claim that although the author of the PhD thesis apparently enjoys the moral right to disclose the work (with all its consequences), he/she is however subject to certain express limitations.

III. Some considerations about the other moral rights and their applicability in the analyzed situation

Besides the right to disclose the work, Art. 10 of Law no. 6/1998 provides additional four moral rights, but we believe that without a particular interest in the subject matter analyzed in this study:

- the right to claim recognition as the author of the work - lit.b); we shall not reiterate the arguments regarding the capacity of an author of the PhD thesis, since the law itself stipulates that the PhD candidate is the author of his/her creation. However, art. Article 4 (1) of Law no. 8/1996 establishes the presumption that the person under whose name the work was first made public is also the author of the work, therefore such capacity must be recognized to it and, therefore, all the rights rendered by the status of the author of the work. However, the public support of the PhD thesis cannot be performed under the name of another person, since the final goal of the PhD candidate is to obtain the PhD title following the public support of the thesis;
- the right to decide under what name the work will be made public - lit.c); This right refers to the fact that the artist has a discretionary right to make his name public or to use a pseudonym under which to present his work. Given the specific nature of the PhD thesis, it is obvious in my opinion that this right cannot be implemented in the particular situation that we are considering, having regard to the fact that the PhD title is to be given precisely to the person who has drafted and subsequently defended the thesis;
- the right to claim the observance of the integrity of the work and to challenge any alterations, as well as any prejudice to the work, if it damages its honour or reputation - lit.d);
- the right to withdraw the work, compensating, where appropriate, the holders of usage rights, who have been harmed by the exertion of the withdrawal - lit.e); from our point of view, I believe that the analysis of this moral right can raise an interesting question. What happens to the PhD thesis after the public support, given that it becomes public, and unless the PhD candidate chooses the distinct publication of the thesis or chooses but has not observed the 24-month deadline to perform this publication, "the document becomes freely accessible"- art. 66 par. (4) lit. d) from the Code of Academic PhD Studies. We consider that the author of the thesis may at any time exert this right, but obviously there can be no compensation, as long as the access to his work is free and it is difficult to prove an alleged prejudice.

2.2. Joint liability of the PhD candidate and PhD supervisor for compliance with the ethics and deontology rules

2.2.1. Obligation of the PhD candidate and the PhD supervisor to observe the rules of ethics and deontology; Manners of infringing these rules (considerations regarding plagiarism and auto-plagiarism)

We can find in the legislation sufficient references to the norms of ethics and deontology and implicitly to the obligation to observe them in the scientific research activity (as is the case with the activity carried out both by the PhD candidate and the PhD supervisor throughout the research in order to draft the thesis). What are the rules of ethics and deontology? A set of norms that we have to observe or, in other words, types of deviations from which we must refrain. We can find references to these rules in Law no. 206/2004[12] on good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation, with subsequent amendments and supplements, which unifies the rules of ethics and deonotology in Article 1, under the notion of good conduct, and provides that:" Proper conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation (...) activities is based on a set of rules of proper conduct and procedures to comply with them". Compliance with these rules is mandatory, especially since, at Art. 2^1 are provided the types of deviations from such rules.

Referring to the specific case stated in the title of the study, the obligation to observe the rules of ethics and deontology is provided by art. 20 par. (1) from the Code of Academic PhD Studies, according to which "The PhD school together with the PhD supervisor are under the obligation to inform the PhD candidate about the scientific, professional and university ethics and to verify the observance thereof, including: a) Compliance with the ethical provisions on completion of PhD research; b) Observance of the deontological provisions in the elaboration of the PhD thesis."

As far as the PhD supervisor is concerned, we find the obligation expressly stipulated in art. 72 paragraph (3) letter k) of the same Code, according to which "The PhD supervisor has the following tasks: a) to ensure the scientific, professional and deontological guidance of each PhD candidate".

Perhaps the first impulse would be to ask why we don't find such an obligation expressly provided also for the PhD candidate. However, we find the answer in the very validity conditions of a PhD thesis as a creation of its author. The obligation of the PhD candidate to observe ethical and deontological norms when writing and elaborating the thesis.

In accordance with the provisions of art. 1 para. (4) from Law no. 206/2004 The observance of these norms by the categories of staff carrying out R&D activities, stipulated in Law no. 319/2003, as well as by other categories of staff, from the public or private sector, benefiting from public R&D funds, determine the good conduct in the R&D activity."

Although art. 6 from Law no. 319/2003 on the status of research and development staff [13] itemizes the following categories of staff:"a) R&D staff; b) university teachers; c) auxiliary staff from the R&D activity; d) staff from the functional apparatus ", who carry out R&D activities, we also include PhD candidates here.

In support of this statement are the provisions of art. 26 lit. a) from Law no. 319/2003, according to which ''The professional development of the R&D personnel is mainly accomplished through the following forms: a) PhD thesis; (...)".

At the same time, Article 17 para. (5) lit. (e) from the Code for Academic PhD Studies provides that "The PhD School Regulation establishes mandatory criteria, procedures and standards regarding at least the following aspects: (...) e) methods of preventing fraud in scientific research, including plagiarism"[14].

Once established and identified in the law the obligation of both the PhD candidate and the PhD supervisor to observe the rules of ethics and deontology, should be mentioned the deviations from the norms of "proper conduct in the scientific research activity", as provided by art. 2 and 2^1 from Law no. 206/2004. Further the analysis of the two articles, we can delimit the following types of infringements that may be suspected of being committed by the PhD candidate and/or the PhD supervisor:

- the production of results or data and their presentation as experimental data, as data obtained by computer numerical calculations or simulations, or as data or results obtained by analytical calculations or deductive reasoning;
- falsification of experimental data, of data obtained by computer numerical calculations or simulations or data or results obtained by analytical calculations or deductive reasoning;
- plagiarism;
- self-plagiarism;
- the unauthorized publication or dissemination by the authors of unpublished results, hypotheses, theories or scientific methods.

Although, as can be noticed, there are several types of deviations from ethical and deontological norms, perhaps because of media pressure in recent years, the term plagiarism has become almost obsessively used. Nevertheless, we are convinced that many people use the word by inertia, or perhaps it is "cool" or so they have heard in the media. Unfortunately, in the last few years, most of us have become specialists in plagiarism, as it is easier to judge in areas where we do not even have a day of study. On the other hand, without going too far on this subject, it is unfair that, with the media pressure, suspicions were raised about certain PhD dissertations and, implicitly, certain PhD supervisors. And once the label of a plagiarist or PhD supervisor of a plagiarist is placed, it is difficult, if not almost impossible, to overthrow a guilty presumption with such an impact.[15]

Closing the parenthesis and returning to the subject under consideration, in line with the times we live, we proposed ourselves to analyze the first two ways of violating good conduct rules, probably because they are the most frequent ones.

PhD thesis, like any other creation, must be original, so that it does not come under suspicion of plagiarism. What can be anyway more beautiful, noblest than originality? We try to understand why many choose the complicated way of attempting (sometimes succeeding) to plagiarize others when it is so simple to be original. As a comparison, we see plagiarism as a lie, as it is easier to tell the truth, so you do not have to remember your own lies. What we do not understand is that originality makes us unique in a world and so dominated by too many "copy-paste" – users.

A definition of plagiarism is found in art. 4 para. (1) letter d) from Law no. 206/2004 as being "exposure in a written work or oral communication, including in electronic form, of texts, phrases, ideas, demonstrations, data, hypotheses, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from written works, including in electronic form, without mentioning this and without referring to the original sources".

The committing of the deed of plagiarism is regulated, according to art. 2^1 para. (2) from Law no. 206/2004 as a "deviation from the rules of good conduct in scientific research". On the other hand, art. 310 from Law no. 1/2011 provides that the committing of the plagiarism deed is "serious violation of good conduct in scientific research and academic activity", and Article 20 (3) of the Code of Academic PhD Studies regulates plagiarism as "academic fraud, violation of university ethics or deviation from good conduct in scientific research". The seriousness of the act is given, in particular, by the way in which it is committed, that it can only be with the intention of plagiarism, and negligence cannot be called into question. Thus, both the PhD candidate and the PhD supervisor may not invoke any attenuated circumstances, because you cannot copy "by error", as long as the final goal is the drafting and finalization of the thesis.

As regards self-plagiarism, such is defined by the same article, letter e) and represents "the exposure to texts, phrases, demonstrations, data, hypotheses, theories in a written work or oral communication, inclusively in electronic format, results or scientific methods extracted from written works, inclusively in electronic format, of the same or the same authors, without mentioning this and without reference to the original sources".

The High Court of Cassation and Justice noted very clearly in its practice, speaking of originality through lack of self-plagiarism, the fact that an original work is "a creation of he/she who claims he/she is the author, and not a mere copy of a previous work".[16]

The two mentioned deeds are only defined in Law no. 206/2004. In fact, we believe that this is also natural, since the normative act regulates conduct in the scientific research activity and plagiarism, which only means a lack of integrity in such activity. Plagiarism is nothing more than a theft of theories, words, phrases or even of another author's works. It is a stigma on the academic integrity that both the PhD candidate should have, but especially the PhD supervisor, who is guiding him/her during the PhD studies. More problematic is the situation of self-plagiarism when you have to copy yourself.

In doctrine, it is believed that " Considering that the subject matter of Law no. 8/1996 is the protection of copyright and related rights, while the reason for the adoption of Law no. 319/2003, Law no. 2006/2004, Government Decision no. 681/2011 and Law no. 1/2011 is to ensure the development of the R&D activities itemized by law in order to develop scientific knowledge and to generate new knowledge, in compliance with the norms of good conduct, incompatible with the plagiarism and self-plagiarism, we are of the opinion that Law no. 206/2004 and Law no. 8/1996 are not in conflict"[17].

2.2.2. The principle of joint and several liability of the PhD candidate and PhD supervisor for infringing the ethics and deontology rules din rafting the PhD thesis

The relevant legal texts in the analysis of this principle are the following:

- art. 20 para. (3) from the Code of Academic PhD Studies: "In case of possible academic frauds, violations of university ethics or deviations from good conduct in scientific research, including plagiarism, the PhD candidate and/or the PhD supervisor is/are liable in accordance with the law",
- art. 65 para. (5) from the same Code: " The thesis is an original work and it is mandatory to mention the source for any taken over material" and para. (7): "The PhD supervisor is jointly liable with the author of the thesis for the observance of the quality or professional ethics standards, including the assurance of the originality of the content, according to the provisions of art. 170 from Law no. 1/2011."

Further to the analysis of the mentioned legal texts results the existence of the principle of the joint liability of the PhD student and the PhD supervisor in the situation of infringing the norms of ethics and deontology in drafting the PhD thesis.

[15] It is just a personal opinion and the triggering factor of enrolling the undersigned at PhD school classes; because I am convinced that many of my colleagues have experienced the same frustration of not being able to change anything;

[17] Sonia Florea, in Plagiarism and the Infringing of Copyrights, Juridice.ro;

Besides, this kind of liability results precisely from the obligations of both the PhD student and his/her PhD supervisor. Thus, the PhD supervisor is under the obligation to observe the rules of deontology in his/her guidance activity and, on the other hand, the PhD student is under the obligation to observe these rules in drafting the PhD thesis.

From the above it is clear that the first who is interested in observing the rules of ethics and deontology is precisely the PhD supervisor, as according to how he/she directs the PhD candidate depends whether he/she will suffer the rigors of the law for the non-observance thereof.

If, however, in the unlikely situation in which the PhD candidate violated the rules of ethics and deontology without the contribution of the phD supervisor, he/she (together with the guidance committee) has the possibility in accordance with the provisions of art. 67 para. (2) letter c) of the Code of Academic PhD Studies, to refuse the submission of the thesis for public support.

If the PhD supervisor (and implicitly the PhD candidate) fails to observe the rules of conduct in the process of guidance for the drafting of the thesis, the provisions of art. 68 para. (2) of the Code of Academic PhD Studies provides for the PhD Commission assessing the thesis, the obligation that " If a member of the PhD Commission identifies in the assessment of the thesis both before and during public support serious violations of good conduct in scientific research and academic activity, including plagiarizing the results or publications of other authors, forging results or replacing the results with fictitious data, the member of the PhD Commission is under the obligation to take the following measures: a) to notify the ethics committee of the higher education institution where the PhD candidate is enrolled and the ethics committee of the institution where the manager is PhD supervisor is employed for the analysis and resolution of the case, including by expelling the PhD candidate, according to art. 306-310 and 318-322 from Law no. 1/2011 and the provisions of Law no. 206/2004 on good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation, with subsequent amendments and supplements; b) to notify the deviations of all members of the PhD committee and to propose the award "unsatisfactory".

The finding of violation of deontological norms can be done by CNATDCU even under Art. 68 para. (6) of the Code of Academic PhD Studies according to which "If the members of CNATDCU in an evaluation committee of a PhD thesis find that the professional ethics standards, have not been complied with in the thesis and/or the activities that led to its creation, inclusively the existence of plagiarism, they shall invalidate the PhD dissertation, inform about these findings the other members of the evaluation committee and notify the General Council of the CNATDCU for the analysis of the responsibility of the PhD supervisor or the PhD school and for the application of the provisions of art. 69 para. (5)."

Last but not least, it is worth mentioning that any individual or legal entity may notify about potential violations of deontological norms in a PhD thesis, under the terms of art. 50 para. (2) of the Code of Academic PhD Studies.

2.2.3. Sanctions applicable to the PhD candidate and/or the PhD supervisor for violating ethical and deontological rules; The legal nature of the liability for violating ethical and deontological rules; Consequences

A first sanction for non-observance of the rules of ethics and deontology in the PhD thesis drafting is found in the provisions of art. 67 para. (3) of the Code of Academic PhD studies and consists in the refusal of the PhD Commission to issue the public support agreement of the thesis. As a result of this situation, the PhD Commission, in accordance with the provisions of art. 68 para. (4) of the Code " In case of the "unsatisfactory" rating, (...) it specifies the content items to be remade or completed in the PhD thesis and calls for a new public support for the thesis. The second public defence of the thesis takes place in front of the same PhD Committee as in the first case. If the second public support session is awarded the "unsatisfactory" rating, the PhD title is not granted and the PhD candidate is expelled."

Another sanction is provided by para. (6) of the same article, according to which "If the members of the CNATDCU in an evaluation committee PhD thesis find that the professional ethics standards have not been complied with in the thesis and/or the activities that led to its completion, including plagiarism, they invalidate the PhD dissertation, inform about these findings the other members of the evaluation committee and notify the General Council of the CNATDCU for the analysis of the responsibility of the PhD supervisor or of the PhD school and for the application of the provisions of art. 69 para. (5)." Thus, the content of art. 69 para. (5) of the Code provides that "If the General Council of the CNATDCU decides that the quality standards or the professional ethics have not been observed, inclusively in regard to plagiarism, the president of CNATDCU proposes to the Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research one or more of the following measures: a) the withdrawal of the capacity of a PhD supervisor; b) the withdrawal of the PhD title; c) the withdrawal of the accreditation of the PhD school", whereas (6) of the same article refers to the obligation of the Minister of Education "to take the measures provided for in art. 170 from Law no. 1/2011, with subsequent amendments and supplements. The Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research informs all parties about the issued orders".

Sanctions are also provided by the provisions of art. 170 from Law no. 1/2011 according to which"(1) In case of non-observance of the quality or professional ethics standards, the Ministry of National Education, on basis of external evaluation reports prepared, as the case may be, by CNATDCU, CNCS, by the Ethics and University Management Council or by the National Council of Ethics for Scientific Research, Technological Development and Innovation, may take the following measures, alternatively or simultaneously: a) the withdrawal of the capacity of a PhD supervisor, b) the withdrawal of the PhD title, c) the withdrawal of the accreditation of the PhD school, which implies the withdrawal of the right of the PhD school to organize an admittance contest to select new PhD candidates. (2) The re-accreditation of the PhD school can be obtained after at least 5 years as of the loss of this capacity, only after resuming the accreditation process, according to art. 158. (3) The regaining of the title of a PhD supervisor may be obtained after at least 5 years as of the loss of this capacity, based on an IOSUD proposal, on basis of an internal evaluation report, the assessments of which are validated by an external evaluation carried out by CNATDCU . The positive results of these procedures are necessary for approval by the Ministry of National Education. (4) PhD leaders are evaluated once every 5 years. The evaluation procedures are established by the Ministry of National Education, at the proposal of CNATDCU."

From the corroboration of the said legal texts, it results that, in essence, we can speak of administrative responsibility, both in regard to the PhD candidate and the PhD supervisor. The administrative nature of liability also derives indirectly from the provisions of Article 69 para. (1) of the Code, according to which "the PhD title is assigned by the order of the Minister of Education (...)", the withdrawal of the title being made by the same type of administrative act, according to the principle of symmetry of the legal act. Further, like any administrative act, it can be challenged by administrative litigation, an additional argument in support of the theory of administrative responsibility of the PhD candidate for the violation of the deontology rules in drafting the PhD thesis.

The law does not provide the possibility of attracting the civil liability of the PhD candidate, but it is possible that in certain situations expressly stipulated in the PhD studies contract, such a situation should occur and then we are in the presence of contractual civil liability.

In regard to the responsibility of the PhD supervisor, it is clear from the quoted legal provisions that this is an administrative-disciplinary liability.

4. Conclusions

Starting from the idea that the PhD candidate is the only author of the PhD thesis, we reach the natural question, why the responsibility is a joint one, his/her liability and such of his/her PhD supervisor. It can be noticed that in his capacity of mentor of the thesis, the PhD supervisor is jointly liable with the PhD candidate, risking a sanction up to the withdrawal of this capacity, which he/she can recover only after 5 years. Unfortunately, in Romanian society, the label of a PhD supervisor who has warranted or may even contributed to the violation of ethical and deontological norms is very difficult to remove.

We believe that such a "joint" liability of the PhD supervisor with the PhD candidate for violating the ethics and deontology rules should be regulated in more detail or even reconfigured. We appreciate this in view of the fact that it is relatively easy to prove the intent of the PhD candidate to violate ethical and deontological norms (mainly by plagiarism/self- plagiarism). It is more difficult to prove the intention of the PhD supervisor for such purpose, of collaborating with the PhD candidate in infringing the ethical rules. We appreciate that we can claim at most negligence, correlated with a less severe administrative penalty (instead of the withdrawal of the capacity with the possibility of regaining it after at least 5 years). We also consider necessary, by lex ferenda, a delimitation of the accountability of the PhD candidate from that of the PhD supervisor, so that each one responds pro rata to his/her own default, and not jointly[18].

This type of approach would be maybe also imposed by the fact that the author of the PhD thesis is the PhD candidate, not the PhD supervisor, who – as we showed throughout the study – plays a guidance, coordination role, not one of creation. Therefore, if the rights are not the same, why is liability a joint one?

EVALUATION OF THE SERVICE QUALITY AND SATISFACTION IN THE TURKISH HIGHER EDUCATION IN TERMS OF INTERNATIONAL STUDENTS

Nizamettin BAYYURT[*]

Abstract

Purpose- The purpose of the study is to explore the service quality of Turkish higher education, the satisfaction level of international students and the critical SERVQUAL dimensions in terms of international students' satisfaction

Research Methodology- A questionnaire was designed and applied by using SERVQUAL model to collect data from international students. The survey was conducted with 198 international students from different nationality, sexes and ages.

Findings- The results reveal that international students are poorly satisfied in general. They find the service quality of higher education poor. They are at most satisfied in tangible and reliable sense from their universities while the least satisfied area is assurance. The significant SERVQUAL dimensions for satisfaction were reliability, empathy and tangibility. Responsiveness and assurance were not significant.

Research limitations- Survey was implemented via internet. Face to face interview might be beter to make sure respondents understand the questions correctly.

Practical implications- The number of international mobile students was reached 5 million in 2016 and is estimated that will exceed 7 million by 2020. The expenditures of foreign students is around 30 thousand US dollars annually on average. Economically, 7 million international students will create a $210 billion total market in 2020. The quality of education is the first element considered by foreign students in determining the country and university to study. Therefore, the service quality of higher education and the resultant satisfaction levels of international students must be determined consistently to attract international students.

Originality/Value- This study is one of the few studies regarding the service quality and satisfaction especially in the context of international students in the Turkish higher education.

Introduction

According to UNESCO Institute for Statistics, the number of international mobile students was 2.1 million in 2000, reached 3 million in 2005, 4.1 million in 2012 and 5 million in 2016. It is estimated that this number will exceed 7 million by 2020. Around one third of the international students in the world were studying in North America and one third in European countries. The first five countries that accept the most international students are USA, UK, France, Australia and Germany. Nearly half of international students are in English-speaking countries, including Canada and New Zealand (http://data.uis.unesco.org). Turkey is one of the major sources of countries that send students abroad.

In recent years Turkey has witnessed an enormous expansion in higher education. The capacities of universities have increased and consequently the enrollment rate in higher education has risen dramatically. Parallel to these important developments, the internationalization dimension of the Turkish universities could not be neglected. The number of international students in Turkey has increased recently. Students who come to study in a country provide economic and social benefits to that country. Foreign students spend on different items such as accommodation, health, nutrition, entertainment, and tuition fees. The expenditures can vary by countries and universities, but briefly the sum on average is around 30 thousand US dollars annually. Therefore, from an economic point of view, 7 million international students will create a total market of $210 billion in 2020.

According to the US Department of Commerce in 2000, the contribution of foreign students in higher education to the US economy increased to the fifth rank in the service sector (Stephenson, 2004).

Hosting international students makes significant contributions to a country not only economically but in many different ways. International students helps to improve the quality of education, increase international project partnerships, contributes to culture and art as well as the economy. After graduation when students return to their home country they create commercial partnerships and they become volunteer advertisers of host countries. The satisfaction of foreign students is important for these reasons. The quality of education is the first factor considered by foreign students in determining the country and university to study (Becker & Kolster, 2012). Therefore the service quality of higher education and the resultant satisfaction levels of international students must be determined consistently to attract international students. However, academic researches on service quality in the Turkish higher education and satisfaction are few. International students in those studies were ignored. Some of the researches in Turkish higher education are as follows:

Tayyar and Dilseker (2012), studied the effects of service quality and image on students satisfaction. Isık (2012) examined the relations between demographic features and students satisfaction. Cevher (2015) investigated the perception of quality considering the service quality factors. Rahim Uddin et al. (2017) investigate how students perceive the environment, quality, and services that they are offered at a Turkish university and how satisfied they are with them. Ozturk and Cankaya (2015) and Cevher (2016), determines the level of satisfaction of foreign students in a university. Kondakci (2011), examines the rationales of in-bounding student mobility in Turkey.

To improve the satisfaction level of international students their problems must be clearly determined and solved. Studies have shown that the most important problem experienced by foreign students is economical (Deressa and Beavers, 1988). But, all of the problems of international students are not economical. International students have experienced loneliness, psychological maladjustment, shyness, cultural shock and psychological problems (Biggs, 1999; Furnham, 1997). Yang (2006) in a qualitative study with 12 Chinese students in the UK, found out that socio-cultural adaptation was the most important problem of Chinese students. Mori (2000) and Sandhu (1995) found that cultural differences and being homesick are important sources of stress for foreign students. In addition, there are many studies in the literature showing that students' prejudices about foreign students complicate the situation and cultural cohesion (Yoon ve Portman, 2004; Winkelman, 1994).

Unlike the previous studies in the Turkish Higher Education this study focuses on international students. There are three aims of the present study: the first one is to determine the perceived service quality of the Turkish higher education of international students by using SERVQUAL model. The second one is to determine the satisfaction level of international students with the Turkish higher education and the third aim is to examine the critical dimensions of SERVQUAL model in terms of international students' satisfaction in the Turkish Higher Education.

1. Service Quality

Quality has recently become one of the most important factors in global competition. Intensifying global competition and the demand for better quality products by customers have made more companies aware that they need to provide quality products and services to compete successfully in the marketplace. Quality concept is as old as the production activity of human beings. It has been developed and expanded in time according to technological advancement, increase of consciousness of the consumer and increase in competition conditions. The concept of quality control is initially assumed as sense of eligibility of design and producing product considering standards that determined during the design phase. The objective of quality control has been detecting the quality of final products and preventing defective products before customers. Nowadays, the concept of quality control focuses on control of production process instead of control of products. In process control, the process is monitored during the production for making corrections by necessary interventions to prevent producing defective products. Quality control techniques have been developed in order to achieve the goals and aims of quality. Statistical quality control techniques which are collecting, monitoring, evaluating and commenting data are very important in measurement and evaluation of the product quality. Statistical quality control techniques differentiate of manufacturing and service sectors.

Advances in information, technology and communication with globalization, the importance of service sector has increased in time. Proportionally, as the level of development of countries rise up, the share of service sector also increases in economy. Service is defined as a valuable action, deed, or effort performed to satisfy a need or to fulfill a demand. It is not measured numerically. In service sectors such as fields of health, education, banking, insurance and etc., quality is assessed by perception of consumers. That's why different techniques have been developed for measuring the perception of the service quality.

Service differentiates from products in terms of 4 basic features which are accepted most commonly (Fitzsimmons and Fitzsimmons, 2004):

Intangibility: service cannot be seen, tasted, or touched in the same manner as we can sense tangible goods.

Inseparability: service is produced and consumed at the same time

Heterogeneity: since services are performances, frequently produced by human beings, no two services are precisely the same.

Perishability: service cannot be saved, stored, resold or returned

Researches have shown that customers perceive the quality from many different perspectives such as performance, features, reliability, durability, conformance, service ability, aesthetics etc. (Kenyon, G., & Sen, K., 2012) . Therefore, quality cannot be completely assessed from one dimension. Service quality is an area that many researchers, particularly academicians and industry practitioners have worked and payed attention on forming service quality measurement models. Some of the main and mostly accepted and implemented service quality models in the field of service quality measurement are listed below.

Gronroos model, technical and functional model (Gronroos, 1984), Gap model (Parasuraman et al., 1985), Service quality - SERVQUAL (Parasuraman, et al., 1988), Servperf (Cronin and Taylor, 1992), Hierarchical model (Dabholkar et al., 1996), E-service quality model (Santos, 2003), HedPerf model (Firdaus, 2005-2006), E-S-QUAL model (Parasuraman, 2005)

Among these models, service quality model of Parasuraman (1988) has served as a framework for researchers in service industry for many years. The SERVQUAL model has been popular among researchers and used by numerous researches in measuring service quality due to easy application and detached simple theory. The model can be worked out by both quantitative and qualitative method. Parasuraman et al. (1988) has identified five basic key factors of service quality which were adopted and implemented for most of services. These dimensions of service quality and their perspective components are defined as follows:

Tangibles: Representing the service physically, are defined as the appearance of physical facilities, equipment, staff appearance, and communication materials that are used to provide the service.

Reliability: Ability to perform the service dependably and accurately. This means that organization delivers on its promises regarding delivery, service provision, and problem solution (i.e. a firm performs the service right the first time and honors its promises over a period of time).

Responsiveness: Willingness to help customers and provide prompt service. It is defined as willingness or readiness of employees to help customers and to provide prompt service. This dimension emphasizes attentiveness and promptness in dealing with customer requests, questions, complaints, and problems.

Assurance: Employees' knowledge and courtesy and the ability of the firm and its employees to inspire trust and confidence.

Empathy: Treating customers as individuals is defined as caring, individualized attention that the firm provides to its customers. The customers need to feel understood by and important to, firms that provide service for them.

2. Foreign Students In Turkish Universities

In recent years, Turkey has witnessed an enormous expansion in higher education. The capacities of universities have been increased and consequently the rate of schooling in higher education has risen dramatically. In parallel with these important progresses, the internationalization dimension of the universities could not be neglected. According to the Turkish Higher Education Council (YOK), the number of foreign students in the Turkish universities was 7661 in 1990, 16 thousand in 2000, 43 thousand in 2012, 55 thousand in 2014 and reached 110 thousand in 2017 (https://istatistik.yok.gov.tr/). (https://istatistik.yok.gov.tr). However, Turkish universities which contain only 1,7 percent (by 2016, http://data.uis.unesco.org) of the international students that circulate all over the world, have not reached the desired level in terms of internationalization yet. But, Turkey's higher education has significant advantages in terms of internationalization to achieve the desired level. It has 206 higher educational institutions, over 163 thousand teaching staff serving 7,5 million university students. Turkey is the most attractive country in terms of the quality of education in the region. The major source countries sending their students to Turkish universities are Azerbaijan with around 15000 students, Syria with 15000, Turkmenistan with 10000, Iran with 6000, and Iraq with 5000. The potential that Turkey has in higher education can increase the number of international students in its universities.

3. The Methodology And Data Analysis

This study aims to determine the service quality and satisfaction level of international students in the Turkish universities and the critical factors of SERVQUAL dimension in the Turkish higher education in terms of international students' satisfaction. A questionnaire which was designed by using SERVQUAL dimensions by Oliveira (2009), was applied in this research to collect data from foreign students. In the survey, there are 25 questions (table 2) and they were exhibited via internet platform in two languages, English and Turkish to make foreign students to understand questions well.

The survey was conducted with 198 international students from different nationality, sexes and ages (table 1). 113 of the students were males, 85 were females. Survey includes 176 bachelor and 22 graduate students. 70 students in the survey were between 18 to 21 years old, 95 of them were 22-25 age group, 31 students were 26-30 range and 2 students were older than 31. The questionnaire was applied to the students via internet platform. A 5 point Likert scale is employed to measure students perceived quality on the service attributes, ranging from 1 (strongly disagree) to 5 (strongly agree).

| | | Frequency | Percent |
|---|---|---|---|
| Sex | Male | 113 | 57,1 |
| | Female | 85 | 42,9 |
| Program | Bachelor | 176 | 88,9 |
| | Graduate | 22 | 11,1 |
| Age | 18-21 | 70 | 35,4 |
| | 22-25 | 95 | 48,0 |
| | 26-30 | 31 | 15,7 |
| | 31+ | 2 | 1,0 |

4. The Results

The completed questionnaires were checked for accuracy before entering the data processing software. Based on the tests done on the five dimensions of SERVQUAL in many industries and countries indicate that they are reliable and valid (Brysland & Curry, 2001; Lee, Kim, & Ahn, 2011; Naik, Krishna, & Gantasala, 2010).

In the table 2 the applied SERVQUAL questionnaire to the students and the results can be found. The SERVQUAL scale uses 22 questions to measure the five dimensions of service quality: reliability, tangibility, assurance, empathy and responsibility and 3 questions to measure the satisfaction. Questions 1 to 4 refer to the tangibility dimension, which obtained an overall average of 3,46. The reliability dimension is analyzed in questions 5 to 9, which obtained an overall average of 3,46. Questions 10 to 13 of the questionnaire refer to the responsiveness dimension and its overall average was 3,40. Questions 14 to 17 in the adapted SERVQUAL scale refer to the assurance dimension, which obtained an overall average of 3,28. The next five questions, 18 to 22, refer to the empathy dimension, which obtained an overall average of 3,33. The final 3 questions refer to satisfaction and its overall average was 3,36. Tangibility and reliability dimensions have the highest scores on average while assurance has the lowest average score.

According to the results of survey, foreign students are poorly satisfied with overall service quality of institutions. The mean scores of satisfaction and all SERVQUAL dimensions are under 4. While the area that foreign students are mostly satisfied with universities among others are that when something is promised by a certain time, it is always provided by staff, staff is well dressed and neat in appearance and the teaching staff respects lecture and exams schedules. International students are at least satisfied with the service of non academic faculty members such as faculty staff is friendly and polite, the behavior of faculty staff instills confidence in you and students are able to trust the faculty staff. Foreign students gave the lowest scores to the behavior of non academic staffs. Generally, they are mostly satisfied in tangible and reliable sense from their universities while the least satisfied area in their universities is behavior, trust sand friendship of staff.

Table 2: Descriptive statistics of SERVQUAL dimensions

| | | Mean | Std. Dev. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Tangibility | The faculty has modern and latest equipment | 3,39 | 1,165 |
| | The appearance of the physical facilities of the faculty is attractive | 3,47 | 1,237 |
| | Staff is well dressed and neat in appearance | 3,53 | 1,116 |
| | Library has the latest literature in your area of interest | 3,43 | 1,215 |
| Reliability | When something is promised by a certain time, it always is provided by staff | 3,57 | 1,034 |
| | When student have problem, staff is courteous, even if not able to help | 3,41 | 1,099 |
| | Courses are taught by highly knowledgeable professors | 3,45 | 1,133 |
| | The teaching staff respects lecture and exams schedules | 3,52 | 1,102 |
| | Faculty staff keeps accurate records | 3,33 | 1,046 |
| Responsiveness | Students are informed of schedules and changes in schedules in advance | 3,46 | 1,125 |
| | Service hours of learning facilities accommodate all students | 3,48 | 1,06 |
| | Faculty staff is always willing to help you | 3,3 | 1,007 |
| | Administrative staff are never too busy respond to student requests promptly | 3,35 | 1,083 |
| Assurance | The behavior of faculty staff instills confidence in you | 3,21 | 1,091 |
| | Students are able to trust the faculty staff | 3,21 | 1,083 |
| | Faculty staff is friendly and polite | 3,21 | 1,141 |
| | Teaching staff is dependable | 3,49 | 1,098 |
| Empathy | Faculty provided personal attention to every student | 3,3 | 1,121 |
| | Professors have convenient office-hours to advice student | 3,43 | 1,043 |
| | Staff member give students individual attention | 3,25 | 1,026 |
| | Faculty has students best interest as a major objective | 3,38 | 1,078 |
| | Faculty understands the special needs of students | 3,31 | 1,104 |
| Satisfaction | I am satisfied with my decision to attend this University | 3,47 | 1,084 |
| | If have a choice to do it all over again, I still will enroll in this University | 3,35 | 1,12 |
| | I am happy that I enrolled in this University | 3,26 | 1,157 |

The next aim of the study is to determine the critical factors of SERVQUAL dimensions for students' satisfaction in Turkish higher education. For this reason the following linear model was run.

Satisfaction = $\beta 0 + \beta 1$ Tangibility + $\beta 2$ Reliability + $\beta 3$ Responsiveness + $\beta 4$ Assurance + $\beta 5$ Empathy + u

The results show that (table 3) the model fits as the f-value = 30,13 and p-value <0,001. Moreover the R-square is 0,44 which translates that 44% variance of the dependent variable (international students satisfaction) can be explained by the 5 SERVQUAL dimensions. Multi collinearity statistics results from table 3 show that there are no serious multi collinearity among SERVQUAL dimensions VIF of all variables are within the acceptable level, VIF<5

Table 3: Effects of SERVQUAL dimension on student satisfaction

| | B | Std. Error | t | Sig. | VIF |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| (Constant) | ,361 | ,252 | 1,434 | ,153 | |
| Tangibility | ,138 | ,079 | 1,745 | ,083 | 2,095 |
| Reliability | ,342 | ,104 | 3,296 | ,001 | 2,565 |
| Responsiveness | ,043 | ,109 | ,398 | ,691 | 3,081 |
| Assurance | ,114 | ,097 | 1,180 | ,240 | 2,755 |
| Empaty | ,246 | ,093 | 2,630 | ,009 | 2,154 |

Dependent variable: Satisfaction, R-square=0,44 F=30,13 Sig=0,000

The most important SERVQUAL dimensions are reliability and empathy which are significant at 1% level. One unit increase in their values increases international student's satisfaction by 0,342 and 0,246 units respectively. The third significant SERVQUAL dimension is tangibility and it is significant at 10% level. Responsiveness and assurance seem not statistically significant at an acceptable level. For high level of international student's satisfaction university administrations must consider the 3 important dimensions at most.

Conclusion

As a result of globalization, advances in information, technology and communication have resulted in a significant increase in service sector. The developments that have taken place in these areas have shown that the period we live in is called information age and in this age learning should be continuous and lifelong. One of the most important institutions in the information age is the educational institutions. From this point of view, the quality of the service that is provided by educational institutions becomes important. Therefore, studies have carried out on the measurement and development of the service quality in the educational sector has an important place in the service industry. As the result of this survey, the quality dimensions which are adopted from SERVQUAL, had taken medium scores from international students. Even the highest scores taken by reliability and tangibility of these institutions they are still low (3,46 both and under 4: agree or satisfied). International students gave the lowest scores to assurance dimension of service quality. International students satisfaction level is also low (overall average is 3,36 which is under 4: satisfied). The most important SERVQUAL dimensions which are affecting satisfaction are reliability, empathy and tangibility. Therefore university administrations should take care on these dimensions to improve satisfaction and attract foreign students. Responsiveness and assurance were not found significant for satisfaction at an acceptable level in this study.

International students spend on different items such as accommodation, health, nutrition, entertainment, and tuition fees. The expenditures can vary by countries and universities, but briefly the sum is around 30 thousand US dollars annually on average. Therefore, from an economic point of view, 7 million international students will create a total market of $210 billion in 2020. Turkey has 206 higher education institutions, 7,5 million university students and over 163 thousand teaching staff. Therefore, Turkey's higher education has significant advantages in terms of internationalization. However, it is seen that the Turkish universities, which contain only 1,7 percent (by 2016) of the international students circulating all over the world, have not reached the desired level in terms of internationalization yet and are the steps to be taken in this regard. Hosting international students has significant benefits for a country not only economically but in many different ways such as improvement the quality of education, increasing international project partnerships, contribution to culture, art, peace and commercial partnerships.

Since the quality of education is the key element that is considered by foreign students when determining the country and university to study (Becker & Kolster, 2012), the most important point that needs to be developed is to improve the quality of education and to increase the number of researches carried out in universities to increase the number of international students. Universities can increase their chances of competition in the globalized education area by obtaining quality certificates from international organizations. The number of undergraduate and graduate programs providing education in foreign languages for international students should also be increased. Education ministries and higher education councils should organize exchange programs with countries. Universities should provide sports, music, and talent scholarships as well as achievement grants for attracting qualified students. Dormitory facilities for international students should be increased. Foreign students should be provided expedite and ease with bureaucratic issues such as visas, residence permits and work permits. International student office websites should be well structured and kept up-to-date with all the information and documents required by the students in multi-language. Since foreign students usually face with nonacademic staffs in the universities such as student affairs to solve their problems, nonacademic staffs should also know foreign language. There must be psychological units in the universities for international students to support them in case of their psychological problems.

DOMESTIC R&D INTENSITY, TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER AND GROWTH OF PRODUCTIVITY: AN EMPIRICAL INVESTIGATION OF TUNISIAN'S CASE

Ahmed BELLAKHDHAR

Abstract

This paper aims to investigate the determinants of productivity growth in the Tunisian economy context over the period 1976 to 2010. Our theoretical model incorporates as key variables, domestic innovation, human capital, distance to technology frontier and external technology spillovers through import of high-tech products and foreign direct investments. Empirical results identify that the impact of domestic R&D intensity on the productivity growth is negative but not significant in all alternative regressions. The effect of import of technologically advanced products is positive and more enhanced by the distance to technology frontier but the effect of foreign direct investment is significantly negative. Our findings confirm also that human capital has a positive impact on technology accumulation in Tunisia but not highly significant. Its role is rather more important in the assimilation and absorption of foreign technology.

1. Introduction

Endogenous growth models emphasize innovation as the engine of growth. In the first generation endogenous growth models of Romer (1990), Grossman and Helpman (1991) and Aghion and Howitt (1992), TFP growth is positively related to the levels of R&D. This leads to an assumption of scale effects in ideas production, i.e., new ideas are proportional to the stock of knowledge. However, these models are not consistent with the evidence. In particular, Jones (1995) shows that the significantly increasing number of scientists and engineers engaged in R&D in the US since the 1950s has not been followed by a concomitant increase in the growth rate of TFP, thus refuting the first-generation R&D-based endogenous growth models. Consequently, endogenous growth theory has evolved into the two following second-generation theories: semi-endogenous growth models and Schumpeterian growth theory. The semi-endogenous models of Jones (1995), Kortum (1997) and Segerstrom (1998) abandon the scale effects in ideas production by assuming diminishing returns to the stock of R&D knowledge. Thus, R&D has to increase continuously to sustain a positive TFP growth. The Schumpeterian growth models of Aghion and Howitt (1998), Dinopoulos and Thompson (1998), Peretto (1998), Young (1998), Howitt (1999) and Peretto and Smulders (2002) maintain the assumption of constant returns to the stock of R&D knowledge. However, they assume that the effectiveness of R&D is diluted due to the proliferation of products as the economy expands. In other term, to ensure sustained TFP growth, R&D has to increase over time to counteract the increasing range and complexity of products that lowers the productivity effects of R&D activity. Endogenous growth theory has also increasingly focused on the roles of technology transfer and absorptive capacity in explaining productivity growth across countries (Eaton and Kortum, 1999; Howitt, 2000; Xu, 2000; Griffith et al., 2003, 2004; Kneller and Stevens, 2006; Madsen et al., 2009). Absorptive capacity captures the idea that the benefit of technological backwardness enjoyed by a laggard country can be enhanced if it has sufficient capability to exploit the technology developed in the frontier countries (Abromovitz, 1986).

Despite the rapid progress in the quality of studies and econometric techniques, the assessment of the effects of R&D productivity and spillovers through empirical analysis remains a controversial subject. To make the empirics of the theoretical model tractable, it is necessary to overcome a series of methodological and conceptual difficulties. In this paper, we first attempt to develop an endogenous model of technology accumulation that incorporates as crucial determinants, domestic innovation efforts, human capital, distance to technology frontier and the diffusion of foreign technology through import of high-tech products and foreign direct investment. Then, several alternative regressions are estimated and many graphical analyses are used to investigate the empirical effects of research intensity, human capital and technology transfer on productivity growth in Tunisia over the period 1976 to 2010.

The rest of the paper is structured as follows. The second section presents the theoretical model of technology accumulation and the regression equations to estimate. The third section reports empirical results with necessary interpretations. The last section concludes.

2. Technology accumulation model

The basic idea behind endogenous growth theories is that in the long run the main underlying determinant of economic growth is the long-run growth rate of total factor productivity (TFP), which in turn depends mainly on the rate of technological progress. Theoretical modeling and empirical investigations in this field have been the subject of an increasing attention in the literature to understand the differences between developed and undeveloped countries. There are two obvious candidates to explain the different levels of TFP across countries or across regions within countries. The more important one is the amount of research carried out in that region/country. A vast literature investigating the national sources of economic growth (e.g., Cameron, 2003) underlines the linkage between R&D expenditures TFP, and growth. The second one is human capital. A sufficient level of knowledge in the workforce is necessary to acquire and exploit technology. The literature analyzed a third important channel that can affect TFP. Since developing countries carry out little or, insignificant R&D activities, the degree of technological diffusion from countries close to the frontier is likely to be one of the key drivers to accelerate the TFP growth in those developing economies (Savvides and Zachariadis, 2005). Coe and Helpman (1995) stress the role of international trade in driving technological spillovers through the imitative process that determines the technological performance of countries that cannot sustain an endogenous technological growth process. Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) by the Multinational Corporations (MNCs) may be another channel for the international transmission of technology (Savvides and Zachariadis, 2005). Distance to the frontier also plays a particularly important role in the convergence debate. Countries that are more backward technologically may have greater potential for generating rapid growth than more advanced countries (Gerschenkron, 1952), essentially because backwardness reduces the costs of creating new and better products (Howitt, 2000). However, backwardness needs not automatically lead to growth since the increasing complexity of products requires large investments in knowledge in order to take advantage of the technology developed elsewhere (Aghion et al., 2005).

Based on these theoretical models and empirical findings, we propose to develop an endogenous model of productivity growth that incorporates as key variables, domestic innovation, human capital, distance to technology frontier and the transmission of foreign technology through import of high-tech products and foreign direct investments. Empirical findings identify that the theoretical specification of the technology accumulation function the most consistent with data takes the following general form:

Where, $A$ is the level of TFP or, knowledge and $\dot{A}$ is the change in TFP. The function $f(X, \mathrm{A})$ indicates domestic innovation, $X$ indicates R&D input, measured by either the flow of R&D labor, or the flow of productivity adjusted R&D expenditure on labor or human capital and $S^f$ stands for the international technology transmission. The function $f$ takes the following general form $f(X, \mathrm{A}) = \lambda \left(\frac{X}{Q}\right)^{\sigma} A^{\varkappa}$, where, $\lambda$ is a parameter of research productivity, $\sigma$ is a duplication parameter ($0 < \sigma \leq 1$), $\varkappa$ is the return to knowledge and $Q$ is the product variety ($Q \propto L^{\beta}$ or $Q \propto Y^{\beta}$). $L$ is employment or population, $Y$ is the output and $\beta$ is a parameter indicating product proliferation. The ratio between $X$ and $Q$ is termed as research intensity. In literature different indicators are used to measure research intensity like, $\left(\frac{R}{Y}\right)$, $\left(\frac{L_R}{L}\right)$ or $\left(\frac{H_R}{L}\right)$, where $R$ indicates the real R&D expenditure, $L_R$ is the number of scientists and engineers engaged in R&D and $H_R = hL_R$, where, $h$ is the human capital level.

To develop the model of $S^f$, our approach is largely based on the studies of (Coe & Helpman, 1995, Lichtenbergh & Van Potteisberghe, 1998, Savvides and Zachariadis, 2005, Islam, 2010 and Madsen et al., 2013).These authors have tried to model the transfer of foreign technology via import of technologically advanced products and foreign direct investment.

International technology spillovers from import are measured by an import-ratio weighting scheme as follows:

Where, $i$ stands for the host country (it's Tunisia in this study), $n$ indexes Tunisia's import partners (example l'EU-15 in our case) and $m_{ij}$ is Tunisia's import of high-technology products from country $j$.

We indicate by $Y_{Leader}$ the output of the leader partner. This country is assumed to be close to the technology frontier and having the highest level of knowledge noted by $A_{sup}$ . at any period of time it's possible to express the output of a partner country as follow:

$Y_j = ב_j Y_{Leader}$, where $ב_j$ is a positive constant. So that, it's possible to define $S_i^{mf}$ by the following general form:

Where, $(M/Y_{Leader})$ is ratio of the total average value of imports to the output of the leader. Technology transfer via foreign direct investment will be modeled in the same way. International technology spillovers from foreign direct investment (FDI) are measured by an FDI-ratio weighting scheme as follows

Where, $Y_j \propto K_j$ and $K_j$ is the physical capital in the country $j$. $FDI$ is the total average value of inward FDI flows from partners. We assume that the country $i$ has the technological level $A_i$ and all other variables are defined as before. Note that "distance to frontier" has been measured using the relative gap of Tunisia's TFP to the leader's one $(A_{sup} - A_i)$. This difference indicates the technological gap in terms of the number of varieties. Based on works of (Hammami & Menegaldo, 2001; Cecchini et al., 2008 ; Ang & Madsen, 2013), the integrated model describing the international technology transfer can be specified by the following general function:

Where, $a$ and $b$ are the elasticities of technology transfer via import and FDI, respectively. If we replace the different elements of Eq.5 by their expressions, we obtain the following model:

If we replace the parameters $(a\gamma)$, $(b\gamma)$, $(ab\gamma)$ et $(\varkappa + ab\gamma)$ by $\epsilon$, $\tau$, $\gamma$ et $\emptyset$, respectively, we obtain the following integrated model of technology accumulation :

Where, $\delta' > 0$ is a parameter of research productivity. We assume that $0 \leq \theta < 1$ and $0 \leq \emptyset < 1$. Log-linear transformation of Eq.8 gives the empirical model as follows (Ha and Howitt, 2007):

Where, $\varepsilon$ are identically and normally distributed shocks with zero mean and constant variance. In the above equation, TFP growth, or the left-hand term should be stationary (Ha and Howitt, 2007; Zachariadis, 2003), because in steady state, TFP growth should be constant. This model is estimated in the tunisian economy context over the period 1976 to 2010. This country is from the southern shores of the Mediterranean that has signed the bilateral partnership agreements with the EU-15. In order to upgrade its economic sectors, it's necessary to have certain choices to make, as well as reform and modernization efforts to deploy. Since the resources are limited, it needs to invest constantly in education and encourage enterprises and industrial support institutions to integrate innovation and R&D into their strategies. Besides modernizing and improving the competitive capacity of the national industrial system, other factors, such as foreign direct investment and trade liberalization, especially with Europe, contribute to the productivity growth in Tunisia.

3. Empirical results and interpretations

3.1. Data and measurement Issues

The basic dataset for this study combines variables from different sources. In order to calculate the TFP growth rate, we follow growth accounting decomposition procedure by considering an aggregate production function, where a country's real gross domestic product (GDP), $Y$ , is stated as : $Y = AK^{\alpha}H^{1-\alpha}$, where $K$ is real physical capital stock and $L$ is the total labor force. It is measured in log as follow: $log\ A = logy - \left(\frac{\alpha}{1-\alpha}\right) log\left(\frac{k}{y}\right) - log\ h$.Where $y$ is the output-worker ratio $(Y/L)$ and $k$ is the capital-worker ratio $(K/L)$. Capital's income share $(\alpha)$ is set to 0.30 following Gollin (2002). The ratio $(k/y)$ is constructed using from various issues; Penn World Table (PWT version 6.3) and World Bank. The individual worker's human capital $h$ is obtained from the estimation of a Macro-Mincer model integrating the number of years of schooling and the quality of education in nonlinear form. Average years of schooling in the population aged 15 and over and the ratio of public education expenditure to GDP as a proxy for quality of education are extracted from Barrow and Lee (2010) schooling dataset and Institute of Quantitative Studies (IQS), respectively. This study treats human capital as affecting domestically produced technological innovation and firms' absorptive capacity of new knowledge.

3.2. Estimation results

Estimation results are reported below in Table 1 (Appendix A). The impact of domestic R&D intensity ($logu_R$) on the productivity growth is negative (-0.069), but not significant at 5% significance level in all alternative regressions. These findings don't provide support for the Schumpeterian theory (Aghion & Howitt, 2009, Ang & Mabsen, 2012, Islam, 2010, Vandenbussche, Aghion & Meghir, 2006). There are several reasons for this surprising finding. Chellouf, Outtara and Dou (1999), for example, show that in Tunisia only a very limited effort was made to increase funding for scientific research. The innovation is negatively affected because there is no efficient cooperation between industrial firms and partners (universities, research centers, foreign corporations, etc.). In Tunisia, the economy is dominated by public sector, with an excessive control and a centralized authority. This leads to a fragmented strategy of the Research and Innovation value chain, biased by a sectorial approach. To gather all stakeholders and to produce a common ground for a coherent Innovation Agenda, it's necessary to support interface agencies involved with scientific research, to assist the R&D programs and initiatives implementation, to facilitate the Tech Transfer through collaborative projects (Hatem, 2007).

Figure 1 (Appendix B) shows a non significant relationship between R&D intensity and the average TFP growth rate over the period 1976-2010. Many raisons explain this result. One possible raison is that Tunisia allocated an insufficient amount of financial resources to the R&D, as suggested by the low estimated level of its expenditure of the GDP. In addition, the statistics on the researchers in Tunisia include a non-negligible proportion of student researchers with master and doctorate degree. It's important also to note that productive sector in Tunisia is dominated by very small enterprises with less than five employees, with little money to invest in an R&D department and more generally in the innovation activities.

Our estimations indentify that human capital has a positive impact on technology accumulation but not highly significant. One percentage point increase in the human capital creates a 0.05 percentage point increase in the average growth rate of the TFP. This finding does not strongly support the recent endeavour of the Tunisian government in improving the whole nation's education level. It can be explained by a mismatch between training and the needs of productive structures ("Education, Labor Market and Development: The Requirements of Adequacy", 1999). Tunisia has to deepen their efforts in innovation by improving the efficiency and adaptability of skilled workers as well as by adopting external know-how via more active technological collaborations with foreign partners, local laboratories, and universities.

By removing the non significant variable (R&D intensity) from the regression equation, the statistical significance of the explanatory variables was improved except for the human capital (column 2). A new interactive variable ($Loghu_R$) that combine between skill level and the number of scientists and engineers engaged in R&D was created. The results show that this interactive variable has a positive impact on productivity growth (0.031), but not significant. This confirms the Schumpeterian theory of endogenous growth that considers that the rate of technological progress depends positively on the intensity of domestic R&D corrected by the skill level.

The estimated coefficients of distance to frontier are positive and statistically significant at the 5% level in all alternative regressions. In other word, the further a country lies behind the technology frontier, the greater will be its potential to accelerate productivity growth. These results are consistent with the results of Griffith et al. (2003, 2004). Figure 2 (Appendix B) shows that the relationship between technical progress and the distance to frontier is positive but not linear. The productivity growth is negative for a reduced gap ($DTF \leq 73\%$). Beyond this value, TFP growth is found to be enhanced by the distance to technology frontier. For a large technology gap the productivity growth is not very important. This implies that catch-up will be more difficult, complex and very expensive for a high technological distance.

The estimated coefficients of import of technologically advanced products are highly significant in all columns. A one percentage point increase in this variable creates an increase in the average growth rate of the TFP by more than 0.5 percentage points. This finding confirms that this variable is an important channel for the international transmission of technology in Tunisia. It is in line with the results of (Baumol, 1993; Mansfield and Romeo, 1980), among others. The graphical analyses show that the relationship between technical progress and the import of technology is not linear (see Figure 3). The productivity growth is very low for a reduced ratio $\left(\frac{M}{Y} \leq 25\%\right)$ and the positive impact on the accumulation of technology doesn't appear only beyond this value.

Estimations reveal some surprising results concerning the effects of the variable $FDIY$ on technology accumulation. Its coefficient is negative and significant thereby rejecting the idea that foreign direct investment constitutes incentives for innovation in Tunisia. One percentage point increase in the share of FDI creates a reduction of 0.11 percentage point in the average growth rate of the TFP. This result doesn't support the theory that consider FDI an important factor of building local technological capabilities for developing countries, and an important channel through which international diffusion of knowledge and technology takes place. Several reasons can explain this unexpected result. In Tunisia, the large share of FDI is concentrated in low value-added activities, including an external control of sourcing, and reliance on expatriates in managerial and technical positions. This is aggravated by the weak domestic absorptive capacity through a very limited effort to increase funding for scientific research and barriers in the domestic business climate.

The economic literature shows that developing countries need to focus more on the acquisition and assimilation of foreign technology through imitation and cooperation with multinational firms, given the high cost of creating new and better products (Howitt, 2000). In addition, technology transfer is not systematic (Sjöholm, 1999). It is closely related to the "absorptive capacity" (Blomström et al., 2000). For this purpose, we create multiplicative variables to measure the importance of the absorptive capacity in the technology spillovers. Some alternative regression will be estimated in the next section.

3.3. Technology spillovers and Absorptive capacity

Countries may differ in their effort and ability to understand and adopt new technologies compatible to their local condition which is popularly known as 'absorptive capacity' (Arrow, 1969). Abromovitz (1986) and Nelson and Phelps (1966) assume that absorptive capacity depends on the level of human capital, whereas Fagerberg (1994) and Griffith et al. (2003, 2004) assume that the absorptive capacity is a function of domestic innovation activities.

Tables 2 and 3 (Appendix A) summarize estimated results of TFP growth with absorptive capacity for Tunisia. Our empirical results (column1 in table 2) show a negative and significant relationship between the interactive term $(Logu_R \times LogFDIY)$ and the TFP growth rate. The second column shows that the human capital based absorptive capacity exhibit negative relation with productivity but not significant (-0.148). This implies a weak complementarity between the two factors to generate productivity gains. This result is contradictory to the empirical findings results that found positive and statistically significant relationship between human capital based absorptive capacity and TFP growth. It seems that this result is explained by the existence at the lack of learning capacity and concentrated FDI in low value added activities.

Interestingly, while incorporating interaction term between $FDIY$ and distance to frontier $(LogDTF \times LogFDIY)$ in the regression, the independent effect of FDI indicator becomes positive (0.13) but statistically non significant. The coefficient associated to the multiplicative variable is positive (0.967) and significant. This implies that, the further a country lies behind the technology frontier, the greater will be technology spillover from FDI. Figure 4 (Appendix B) shows that the real relationship between technical progress and the interactive term $(LogDTF \times LogFDIY)$ is positive but not linear. For a technological gap less than 74%, the correlation is positive. Beyond this threshold value, the correlation becomes negative.

Empirical evidences identify that knowledge spillovers through the channel of imports are not only important because they play an important role for growth in endogenous growth models but also because trade has often been highlighted as playing a key role in facilitating convergence (see for example Nelson and Wright, 1992 ). The idea behind this spillover hypothesis is that the variety and the quality of intermediate inputs are predominantly explained by R&D and, therefore, productivity is a positive function of R&D.

To test the degree of complementarity between the import of technologically advanced products and FDI to have technology transfer, we create the interactive variable

$((LogMY \times LogFDIY)$ (regression 4 in Table 2). The idea behind this spillover hypothesis is that the local absorptive capacity measured by the degree of openness of the country. The estimated coefficient is positive (0.48) but statistically non significant at the five percentage significance level. This result clearly explains the low technological potential of FDI inflows into Tunisia, which justifies the lack of interaction between the two variables. In other hand, technology spillovers from import of high-tech goods depend on domestic R&D intensity and the distance to technology frontier. For this raison two interactive variables

$(LogMY \times Logu_R$ and $LogMY \times LogDTF)$ are incorporated in the model (Table 3).

Our estimations show that the impact of $(logMY \times Logu_R)$ on the growth rate of TFP is negative but not significant. A positive and significant correlation is between productivity growth and the interactive variable $(LogMY \times LogDTF)$.We remark that by the introduction of this last multiplicative variable, the effect of human capital becomes more significant. The total marginal effect (independent and interactive) of imports of technologically advanced goods on productivity growth is given by the coefficient $\alpha_{MY}$ formulated by the following relation $\alpha_{MY} = 0.696 + 0.415 \times LogDTF$, (regression 2). If we use the average value of $LogDTF$ calculated over the period 1976-2010 in this equation, we obtain a $\alpha_{MY}$ =0.57. This empirical value shows that the import of technologically advanced is a main vector of the transmission of foreign knowledge in Tunisia. Its effect is positive and more enhanced by the distance to technology frontier. The graphical representation of the relationship between TFP growth and $(LogMY \times LogDTF)$ is reported in the figure 5. This graph confirms the presence of a positive impact of the import of technology. This effect is important for a high technological gap but negative reduced distance.

Conclusion

This paper aims to investigate the determinants of productivity growth productivity growth in the Tunisian economy context over the period 1976 to 2010. We first examine the effects of key determinants such as domestic innovation, skills, etc. on the productivity growth. We then attempt to show how these effects are moderated by liberalization as measured by the opening up to foreign investment and by import of technologically advanced products, especially from Europe.

Empirical results show that the impact of domestic R&D intensity on the productivity growth is negative but not significant in all alternative regressions. The effect of foreign direct investment is significantly negative. Its interactive effect with capital human on the productivity growth is also negative but not statistically significant. This implies the weak complementarity between the two factors to generate productivity gains. Apparently, Tunisia needs to have reached a certain level of development in education, technology, infrastructure before being able to benefit from a foreign presence in their markets. Our findings confirm that the import of technologically advanced products is an important channel for the international transmission of technology in Tunisia. Its effect on the knowledge accumulation is positive and more enhanced by the distance to technology frontier. Our results identify also that human capital has a positive but not significant impact on technology accumulation in Tunisia. Despite the high priority given by Tunisia to education and training young people, the capacity for innovation is still limited. The role of human capital is rather more significant in the assimilation and absorption of foreign technology.

An innovation strategy for Tunisia should therefore focus not only on creating technology, but also on technology adoption and adaptation. Tunisian firms have to deepen their efforts in innovation by improving the efficiency and adaptability of skilled workers as well as by adopting external know-how via more active technological collaborations with foreign partners, local laboratories, and universities.

Abstract

Romania has a multitude of natural and cultural attractions, with five of the European biogeographical regions and seven sites included in the UNESCO heritage, but it does not sufficiently exploit its touristic potential. This paper provides a statistical analysis of tourism in the Central Region of Romania with a focus on rural tourism and an analysis of the cultural potential. The aim is to identify new opportunities of the development of cultural tourism in the region. In order to highlight the rural tourism, there were selected only agrotouristic boarding houses in communes and villages. Having an extremely generous nature and a cultural heritage of great value, the areas analyzed in this study have a high and diversified touristic potential.

1. Introduction

According to the UNWTO, "Cultural tourism is a type of tourism activity in which the visitor's essential motivation is to learn, discover, experience and consume the tangible and intangible cultural attractions/products in a tourism destination." (Twenty-second session of the UNWTO General Assembly in Chengdu, China, September 2017). Cultural tourism includes the following components: arts, architecture, historical and cultural heritage, culinary heritage, literature, music, creative industries, the living cultures, characterized by their lifestyles, value systems, beliefs and traditions (Twenty-second session of the UNWTO General Assembly in Chengdu, China, September 2017). On the other hand, the Association for Tourism and Leisure Education (ATLAS) (2010) defines cultural tourism as "the movement of people to cultural attractions that are far away from their place of residence, with the intent to collect information and new experiences in order to satisfy their cultural needs" (Tigu, G. et.al , 2014).

The most recent trends in European cultural tourism reveals that four out of ten tourists choose their destination based on its cultural offer. A survey performed by UNWTO on 38 countries provides an estimate of the cultural tourism market size. Thus, cultural tourists have a share of 35.8% out of the total number of tourists, representing 530 million cultural tourists in 2017 (UNWTO Report on Tourism and Culture Synergies, 2018).

The need for a more detailed analysis of Romania's tourism potential comes from the contradiction between the highly valuable cultural patrimony on the one hand and the modest economic performance of Romania's tourist activity on the other. Cultural traditions are often much better preserved in rural areas (Aleksieva, Stamov, 2005). Given that there is currently a tendency towards rural tourism, the importance of this type of tourist destination can be enhanced by promoting the cultural potential of rural areas. Creating a stronger link between culture and tourism can be a source of growth in economic performance and in the development level of tourist destination regions. "Culture and tourism have a symbiotic relationship. Arts and crafts, dances, rituals, and legends which are at risk of being forgotten by the younger generation may be revitalized when tourists show a keen interest in them. Monuments and cultural relics may be preserved by using funds generated by tourism. In fact, those monuments and relics which have been abandoned suffer decay from lack of visitation.", it is stated by World Tourism Organization (2001), in Cultural Heritage and Tourism Development, UNWTO, Madrid. This type of tourism is characterized by possibilities of involvement in locals' life, of participation in local specific events, and sometimes this kind of touristic products are combined with cultural tourism products. Rural tourism becomes most important especially to Western and Central European Countries, approximately 20% from all tourist trips in the European Union are made in rural areas (Mileva, 2004; Georgiev, 2010).

A number of studies in the literature have outlined the cultural tourist profile: high socio-economic status, high educational level and above average financial possibilities. Thus, the study of Eusébio et al. (2012) analyzes the determinants of cultural holiday spending patterns. The results show – based on a 27 country-survey, from different continents – that the holiday spending are significantly positively influenced by: hotel accommodation, air travel, purchase of package holidays, income and age. Factors with a significant negative influence on the holiday spending of cultural tourists are: the size of the travel group and the length of stay. According to a UNWTO report on Tourism and Culture Synergies (2018), one in 10 tourists are motivated by cultural interests in the choice of tourist destination, while 4 out of 10 tourists have more general motives in choosing their tourist destination, but they also do cultural activities during holidays (UNWTO, 2018). According to a recent ATLAS survey, a large number of tourists who practice cultural tourism at international level are young, which is in contradiction with the results of other older studies, according to which most cultural tourists are older people. And 60% of cultural tourists are graduates of a higher education form (Richards G., 2018).

Figueroa et al. (2018) analyze how cultural factors influence the efficiency of tourist activity in destination countries, considering Chile case study. The results reveal that the cultural and natural attractions of a tourist destination can have a significant positive influence on the efficiency of that region, by increasing tourist flows and attracting foreign tourists. It is therefore necessary to effectively promote the cultural and natural potential of the region.

Peoples' destructive activity disturbs now, more than ever, the environment integrity, so sustainable tourism becomes more and more important. In this context, Díaz & Rodriguez, (2016) analyze the main factors of the sustainability of a destination country, as a key element in determining long-term competitiveness. Thus, the authors identify among these factors the cultural offer of a tourist destination, with the following components: historical patrimony, museums and cultural heritage. Research results show that the cultural offer of a tourist destination is directly and significantly correlated with its performance level, but not with the tourists' performance. The authors' explanation is that although the cultural patrimony has an invaluable value, adding value to the region, it is less familiar and known to tourists. Hence - the need to a more efficient promotion of the cultural side of a tourist destination, in order to increase its attractiveness in the tourists' eyes.

The key to sustainable tourism can even be given by tourists' focus on rural areas, where they can observe and participate in the lifestyle, traditions and habits of locals. These rural areas can become true cultural-cores which, although out of regular cultural routes, can act as a cultural network that can place rural areas on the European tourism map (Shishmanova, M.V. (2015).

2. Central region of Romania – a culturally favored region

The region under discussion is culturally favored, being the owner of a tremendous treasure of archaeological vestiges, historical monuments, architecture or art, as well as an invaluable patrimony that attests the evolution and continuity of work and life on these lands, the development of culture and the art of the Romanian people. Among the archaeological vestiges that witness the existence of various civilizations on this territory, we mention Sarmizegetusa Regia (the kingdom) which was the capital and most important military, religious and political center of the Dacian state before the wars with the Roman Empire or the Dacian Fortress Chapel located in Alba County and raised during the reign of Burebista. There are also a large number of localities in the region that still retain medieval features: houses with thick walls and roofs of olans, towers with entrance gates or fortress walls. The medieval fortresses, Sighişoara, Alba Iulia, Sibiu, Brasov, Făgăraş, Sebeş, the peasant castles Râşnov, Rupea, Slimnic, Feldioara etc., the Saxon fortified churches, Biertan, Prejmer, Viscri, Câlnic, Harman, medieval, Renaissance or Baroque castles , Bran, Lazarea, Criş, Balta Citadel, Brâncoveneşti, Avrig, Gorneşti, etc., make up a dense network of first-class tourist attractions in this area. Museums of history, art, ethnography, documentary libraries in Sibiu, Târgu Mureş, Braşov, Alba Iulia host interesting collections and objects of heritage. In fact, historical and architectural monuments, some of which are of great value, can be found throughout the region. In the analyzed areas there are also many prestigious traditional festivals, among which we mention: the Pentecostal Pilgrimage from Şumuleu-Ciuc, the Găina Mountain Girls' Fair, etc. Relatively small distances between cultural vestiges make it possible to create various thematic circles.

Romania has about one third of Europe's mineral water springs, many of which are located in the counties analyzed in this paper: Sovata, Covasna, Băile Tuşnad, Balvanyos, Borsec, Red Lake, Ocna Sibiului being just a few of them. Emphasizing the demographic aging process makes inclusion in touristic packages and this wellness and spa component a great opportunity for tourism development in the area.

Also, rural tourism, especially attractive for families with children or for those seeking a quiet and healthy environment, is a direct means of knowing authentic authentic civilization, being a direction that can be developed in the future not only of Romanian tourists but and foreigners interested in Romanian culture.

The cities of Brasov, Sibiu, Alba Iulia, Targu Mures, Sighisoara, Miercure-Ciuc, Sfantu-Gheorghe and Suceava are cities with a complex cultural heritage. Although the historical past of these cities is very rich and with a valuable architectural and cultural heritage, although these cities are extremely dynamic and economically important, but we will put particular emphasis on the historical cultural heritage elements of the countryside.

The analyzed region is very rich in archaeological vestiges. Roșia Montană, a 2000-year-old town, is the oldest documented mining settlement in the country. The traces of gold exploitation of the Roman period have been excellently preserved to this day. The Chapel is a Dacian fortress, a site included in the UNESCO Heritage List, along with 5 other Dacian fortresses in the Orăștie Mountains. At Tilișca and Covasna there are ruins of Dacian fortresses. Cacica is a common one that existed in the old operation of salt from brine recrystallized (by boiling and evaporation) in Europe (evidenced by archaeological findings in 1989).

The fortified churches of Transylvania are part of the German heritage of Transylvania. They still have a strong "German" fingerprint. Urban structure, regular street tram, specific architectural style (houses with high walls) are preserved intact for hundreds of years. The churches in these villages, usually built in the highest area of the settlements, have fulfilled a double role in history: sacred and defense. Another element of uniqueness is their great density. There are about 150 churches spread over a rather narrow geographical area. 7 of them were included in UNESCO's patrimony: Biertan, Valea Viilor, Prejmer, Viscri, Saschiz, Câlnic, Dârju, considered by experts to be the most beautiful and representative.

Also, the fortified churches of Alma, Moşna, Dealu Frumos, Merghindeal, Iacobeni (located in the northern part of Sibiu County) are among the most important fortified churches in Transylvania, built between the 13th and 15th centuries, being listed in the national patrimony list architecture. The fortified church in Barsa Country, Harman, built between the 13th and 15th centuries, is a combination of Romantic and Gothic styles. The Church of Cisnadioara, "the most important monument of the Saxon ecclesiastical architecture", is the oldest romanian church in Romania, preserved in excellent conditions dating back to 1223. Due to its good acoustics, the church hosts concerts and theater performances.

An impressive number of medieval settlements, some of which have preserved vestiges of almost a millennium, remained in Transylvania. The most important medieval fortifications were built on hills with steep slopes or terraces, and they contained large enclosures surrounded by waves of earth or trenches. They were raised near the strategic routes and the large rivers like Mureş and Someş, important navigation channels of those times. The fortress Calnic (Kelling), listed on the UNESCO World Heritage List, is one of the oldest and most interesting architectural monuments in Romania. The fortress was built in XIII century (1269) by Count Chyl de Kelling, as his residence. The village of Viscri in the UNESCO World Heritage is renowned as one of the most beautiful Saxon peasant fortresses, which includes among its walls one of the few churches-Romanesque Hall of the XIII century in Transylvania, preserved to this day. Fagaras Fortress is one of the best-preserved fortresses in Romania, whose construction began in the 14th century. The fortress, provided with several bastions and surrounded by a ditch filled with water, played an important role in the defensive military system of Transylvania. Currently, the fortress shelters several cultural institutions, among which we mention the Făgăraş Country Museum. Rupea fortress, built on a basalt massif, on the site of an older fortification, was first certified in 1324. Since the end of the 17th century the fortress has begun to be abandoned by the inhabitants, which will gradually lead to ruin it. The city is currently undergoing a vast process of restoration and redevelopment. Feldioara fortress was built by the Teutonic knights who settled in Transylvania between 1211 and 1225, afterwards the Feldioara inhabitants enlarged and strengthened the original fortification, becoming one of the most powerful peasant fortresses in Transylvania. Râșnov Peasant Fortress, built by the inhabitants of the settlement in the 14th-15th centuries, became a filming platform for several historical production productions. The Slimnic peasant fortress, built in the 14th-15th centuries, has seen a tumultuous history with numerous sieges and devastations. In spite of the damages suffered, the fortress remains one of the most beautiful cities built and ruled by a peasant community.

Moreover, Romania has numerous palaces or castles on its territory, over which time has been spent, and often forgetting. There are palaces in the central area of Romania, such as Bran Castle or Bruckental Palace, which enjoy a great media coverage, but there are also spectacular palaces that are less known to the general public but very well preserved. There are a lot of castels built in $14^{th}$-$16^{th}$ centuries: Kemeny Castle, Castle Lazarea, Castle Turnu Rosu, Castelul Bethlen Haller , Zalbala Castle Feudal Castle or castels built in $17^{th}$ -$18^{th}$ centuries: Bethlen Castle, Racoș, Gurghiu Castle, The Kemeny Castle All these palaces were, in their time, sumptuous residences, and the stories of those who built and inhabited them are true stories that should be known and publicized.

3. Tourism in Central Region of Romania

The material base of tourism in Central Region was 2818 accommodation units in 2018, accounting for 33% of the total tourist accommodation facilities in Romania. The density of accommodation units is 7.1 tourist accommodation structures per 100 sq. Km in Central Region, compared to 3.6 at national level. Braşov county has the highest density of tourist accommodation units (17.9), followed by Mureş County with 9.8 tourist accommodation units per 100 sq. Km. The lowest density of tourist accommodation units is found in Alba and Covasna counties with densities below the national average (3.3 and 2.8 tourist units per 100 sq. Km respectively). In the counties from Central Region 43% of the accommodation units are in agro-touristic houses. Among them, Braşov is highlighted by increasing the number of tourist accommodation establishments, from 2008 to 2018, the number of these being doubled. Harghita and Sibiu are two counties in which the evolution has not been steadily increasing over the last 10 years but after a stagnation period in 2008-2010, there has been a decrease in the number of accommodation units followed by an increase in their number starting with 2014, more pronounced in Sibiu than in Harghita.

The existing accommodation capacity in 2018 in Central Region of Romania was 82848 seats (23.4% of the national accommodation capacity), which gives to the region an extremely important position in country tourism. The accommodation capacity is 79% higher than in 2008, with the highest increases in the counties: Alba by 189%, Sibiu by 97%, Braşov by 90% and Mureş by 83%. The county with the lowest increase in accommodation capacity is Harghita county with an increase in accommodation capacity of only 22% (compared to the national average of 20%).

The share of accommodation in boarding houses is 23.9% in counties from Central Region compared to a national average of 13.7%. The counties with the highest share of accommodation capacity in the boarding houses are: Alba (41%), and Harghita (36%). Mureş County has the lowest share of accommodation capacity in rural tourism, only 9.5%.

The total number of tourists arriving in the tourist accommodation structures in the analyzed counties was constantly increasing during the period 2008-2017, from 1,520,582 in 2008 to 3,242,234 in 2017 tourist arrivals (an increase of 113% in 2017 compared to 2008). The importance of Central Region in the national tourism is demonstrated by the extremely large share of the total number of tourists arriving in the tourist accommodation establishments in this region compared to national level, which has been increasing in the last 10 years, from 17.5% in 2008 to 23.5% in 2017.

The county with the highest registered number of arrivals of tourists in 2008-2017 was Alba County, where the number of arrivals increased in the period 2008-2017 by 236%, followed by Harghita County, with an increase of 167%. Among the tourists arriving in the area, only 19% were foreigners compared to the national average of 23% in 2017. The counties with a percentage above the national average of the arrivals of foreign tourists are Sibiu with 29% and Harghita with 24% foreign tourists' arrivals in 2017. Covasna was the county with the lowest number of foreign tourists arrived in the total number of arrivals of tourists in the county in 2017. As to the type of accommodation structures, 13.7% of the total arrivals in 2017 took place in boarding houses. In Alba and Harghita the arrivals of tourists in agro-touristic hostels held a much higher share than the other counties. The main reason is that the capacity of accommodation in the agro-touristic pensions is much higher compared to the other counties.

4. The relationship between tourism and cultural potential of counties from Central Region

In order to study the relationship between tourism and cultural potential of each county from Central Region there are studied the Spearman correlation coefficients between the accommodation capacity, the number of tourist arrivals, the number of historical monuments and the number of museums (Figure no.7).

By representing the relationship between the accommodation capacity, the number of tourist arrivals and the number of historical monuments it could be observed that the counties with the highest number of historical monuments have the highest number of tourists. However, in Sibiu and Mures counties the accommodation capacity could be developed. In case of Harghita and Alba, both increasing accommodation capacity and the promotion of historical monuments through complex tourist programs should increase the number of tourists.

5. Conclusions

The study concludes that overall, the Central region has enormous touristic potential in terms of cultural patrimony. But the characteristics of every country in the region are given by the heterogeneity of some specific indicators: accommodation units, accommodation capacity, density of tourist accommodation units per 100 sq. Km, share of accommodation in boarding houses and number of tourist's arrivals.

By investigating the relationship between the accommodation capacity, the number of tourist arrivals and the number of historical monuments/the number of museums, the study underlines that the touristic potential of Central region of Romania could be improved by developing the network of accommodation units and by promoting the historical monuments and museums.

CONTRIBUTION OF EVA LEVERAGE TO THE TOTAL LEVERAGE EFFECT ON THE COMPANY

Kristina Jančovičová BOGNÁROVÁ

Abstract

The concept of Economic Value Added (EVA) and Market Value Added (MVA) has opened up new insights into the leverage effect of fixed costs (operational leverage) and interest (financial leverage), and for determining what effects the changes in sales would have through leverage, not only on profits, but also on EVA and MVA. The paper also introduces the leverage effect of the cost of equity as a new concept and illustrates how it reacts in conjunction with operating leverage and financial leverage to determine the total overall leverage of the company. A spreadsheet model was developed using a given level of operating leverage and financial leverage. The relationship between profits (after interest and tax) and EVA was determined by using the cost of own capital (equity), and this fixed amount can therefore be described as a leverage factor for EVA. Furthermore, the EVA leverage factor was combined with the operating and financial leverage in order to illustrate how the expected percentage change in EVA and MVA can be predicted, given a certain percentage change in sales (or profits). The results of the model were than analysed to reach conclusions.

1. Introduction

1.1. Introduction

In this article the theoretical concept of economic value added (EVA), market value added (MVA) and leverage will be discussed briefly. Thereafter we develop a spreadsheet model to extend the leverage analysis of profits to EVA and MVA. The leverage effect of the equity cost is also investigated.

The cost of equity will also have a leverage effect on the profits (and EVA and MVA) of the company, just like fixed costs and interest. We attempt to quantify this leverage effect and to use it, together with operating leverage and financial leverage factors, to determine the total leverage for the company. Then it would be possible to predict what effect any change in input will have on profits, EVA and MVA.

The objectives of this paper could be summed up in this way:

- To link leverage analysis and value analysis;
- To determine how changes in inputs will affect the shareholder value;
- To introduce the leverage effect of the equity cost;
- To determine its connection with operating leverage and financial leverage in the context of determining the total leverage.

The findings of this paper could be useful for managers at all levels in a company, but especially for financial managers. Existing shareholders and potential investors would also benefit from the findings, but the company data needed as inputs for the model would not be available to them.

2. The theoretical background

2.1. EVA and MVA

EVA is a performance measure that attempts to measure the true economic profit produced by a company. Such a metric is useful for investors who wish to determine how well a company has produced value for its investors, and it can be compared against the company's peers for a quick analysis of how well the company is operating in its industry. MVA is not a performance metric like EVA, but instead is a wealth metric, measuring the level of value a company has accumulated over time. In order to maximise the value for shareholders, companies should strive towards maximising MVA and not necessarily their total market value.

EVA is determined by calculating the difference between the cost of a company's capital and the return earned on capital invested, and multiplying it with the amount of capital invested in the company.

r = the return on the capital invested

WACC = the company's after-tax cost of capital

This mesure quantifies the surplus return earned by the company. In those cases where a company is able to earn a return that is higher than its cost of capital a positive value for EVA is calculated. A negative EVA value is calculated when the cost of capital exceeds the return on the invested capital.

* Faculty of National Economy, University of Economics in Bratislava (e-mail: kristina.jancovicova-bognarova@euba.sk);

Alternatively, the measure can be calculated by comparing the net operating profit after tax with the total cost of capital invested.

$$EVA_t = NOPAT_t - Total\ cost\ of\ IC = = NOPAT_t - (WACC * IC_{t-1})$$

where:

$NOPAT_t$ = Net operating profit after taxes

If a company is able to earn NOPAT values in excess of its total cost of capital invested it generates a positive EVA figure. However, should NOPAT be insufficient to cover the company's total cost of capital, a negative value for EVA is calculated.

A company's total market value (MV) is equal to the sum of the market value of its equity and the market value of its debt. In theory, this amount is what can be taken out of the company when all shares are sold and debt is repaid at any given time. The MVA is the difference between the total market value of the company and the invested capital. The invested capital (IC) is the amount that is put into the company and is basically the fixed assets plus the net working capital.

$$MVA = MV\ of\ company - IC$$

From an investor's point of view, MVA is the best final measure of a company's performance.

The link between MVA and EVA is that theoretically, MVA is equal to the present value of all future EVA to be generated by the company.

$$MVA = present\ value\ of\ all\ future\ EVA$$

If the company is not operating at optimal levels of financial gearing, changing the proportion of debt relative to equity can lower the WACC, so that the capital structure is closer to optimal. This will also unlock value for the company as a whole, including the shareholders.

2.2. Leverage

Operating leverage (OL) is a measure of the degree to which a company incurs a combination of fixed and variable costs. The higher the degree of OL, the greater the potential danger from forecasting risk, where a relatively small error in forecasting sales can be magnified into large errors in cash flow projections.

Most of a company's costs are fixed costs that occur regardless of sales volume. As long as a company earns a substantial profit on each sale and sustains adequate sales volume, fixed costs are covered and profits are earned. Other company costs are variable costs incurred when sales occur. The company earns less profit on each sale, but needs a lower sales volume for covering fixed costs.

The percentage change in the earnings before interest and taxes (EBIT) relative to a given percentage change in sales is defined as operating leverage.

Degree of operating leverage (DOL) = % change in EBIT/% change in sales.

The equation can also be written as follows:

$$DOL = Contribution / EBIT$$

Financial leverage (FL) is the degree to which a company uses fixed-income securities such as debt and preferred equity. The more debt financing a company uses, the higher its financial leverage. A high degree of financial leverage means high interest payments, which negatively affect the company's bottom-line earnings per share.

The percentage change in earnings per share (EPS) due to a given percentage change in EBIT is known as financial leverage. Degree of financial everage (DFL) = % change in EPS / % change in EBIT. The following equation can also be used to calculate DFL:

where

EBT = Earnings before tax

The total leverage is the outcome of the multiplication of operating leverage and financial leverage.

$$Degree\ of\ total\ leverage\ (DTL) = DOL\ x\ DFL$$

$$DTL = \%\ change\ in\ EPS / \%\ change\ in\ sales$$

If a company has a high amount of operating leverage and financial leverage, a small change in sales will lead to a large variability in EPS.

If the cost of equity is subtracted from profits (after interest and tax), the result is EVA. This amount (subtracted as cost of equity) is a fixed amount in the case when the capital structure and the cost of equity percentage remain unchanged. This fixed amount of the cost of equity also has a leverage effect that causes EVA to change more dramatically than profits when there are changes in the sales volume.

This EVA leverage effect is is calculated as follows:

$$Degree\ of\ EVA\ leverage = Earnings\ after\ interest\ and\ tax / EVA$$

3. Research method and model inputs

A spreadsheet model was developed in which we use a given level of operating leverage and financial leverage. The relationship between earnings (after interest and tax) and EVA was determined.

Furthermore, the EVA leverage factor was calculated and combined with the operating and financial leverage to illustrate how the expected percentage change in EVA and MVA can be predicted, given a certain percentage change in sales.

The results of the model were than analysed to reach conclusions and to allow some recommendations to be made.

The model inputs are as follows. It was assumed that a company has operational assets consisting of fixed assets and net current assets of 4 million. These are financed by 50 % equity capital and 50 % long-term debt. This is in our model an optimal (or average) capital structure with the lowest WACC of 15 %. The cost of equity at this level is 20 % and the after-tax cost of debt is 10 %.

A tax rate of 20 % and a return on assets before tax of 45 % (36 % after tax) are assumed. Furthermore, an asset turnover of 1 is assumed; meaning that the total assets of 4 million will yield sales of 4 million. The cost structure of variable costs of 40 % of sales and fixed costs of 600 000 per year is considered average.

The model inputs for the basic scenario (average level of fixed costs, optimal capital structure) are contained in Table 1.

Table 1 Model inputs

| Items | Amount or % |
|---|---|
| Total assets | 4 000 000 |
| Equity (50% of total capital) | 2 000 000 |
| Debt (50% of total capital) | 2 000 000 |
| Cost of equity | 20 % |
| Cost of debt | 10% |
| Weighted cost of equity | 10 % |
| Weighted cost of debt | 5% |
| WACC | 15 % |
| Tax rate | 20% |
| Interest rate before tax | 12,5% |
| Interest rate after tax | 10% |
| ROA (before interest and tax) | 50% |
| ROA (after tax) | 40% |
| Asset turnover (total sales / total assets) | 1 |
| Variable costs = 40% of sales | 1 600 000 |
| Fixed cost per year | 600 000 |

The model was based on the assumption that the asset turnover remains the same and that there is no inflation. Fixed costs therefore remain the same in total amount and variable costs remain the same percentage of sales.

4. Results and conclusions

In this section the earnings, EVA and MVA are calculated according to tha model inputs stated in Table 1. We proceed as follows:

Contribution = sales – variable costs =
4 000 000 – 1 600 000 = 2 400 000

When the fixed costs are subtracted from the contribution, the result is Earnings Before Interest and Tax (EBIT):

EBIT = 2 400 000 – 600 000 = 1 800 000

Next the interest is subtracted to give Earnings Before Tax (EBT):

EBT = 1 800 000 – 250 000 = 1 550 000

After subtracting the tax, the Earnings After Tax (EAT) remain:

EAT = 1 550 000 – 310 000 = 1 240 000

In order to calculate the EVA, the cost of equity capital is subtracted from EAT. The cost of equity is calculated as 20% × 2 000 000 = 400 000.

EVA = 1 240 000 – 400 000 = 840 000

An alternative calculation, using the WACC, is used to confirm the EVA.

EVA = return spread x invested capital = (ROA – WACC) x invested capital =
(0,36 – 0,15) x 4 000 000 = 840 000

The MVA is calculated in three ways, according to three different assumptions about future growth in EVA. $MVA_1$ is calculated as if there will be no future growth in EVA.

$MVA_1 = EVA / WACC =$
$840\,000 / 0.15 = 5\,600\,000$

$MVA_2$ assumes a constant future growth rate of 5% in EVA:

$MVA_2 = EVA \times (1 + g) / (WACC - g) =$
$(840\,000 \times 1{,}05) / (0{,}15\text{-}0{,}05) =$
$8\,820\,000$

$MVA_3$ assumes an abnormal growth rate in EVA of 15% for the first five years and a constant growth rate of 5% after that.

$$MVA_3 = 840\,000 \times (1{,}15) / 1{,}15 + 840\,000 \times (1{,}15)^2 / 1{,}15^2 + 840\,000 \times (1{,}15)^3 / 1{,}15^3 + 840\,000 \times (1{,}15)^4 / 1{,}15^4 + 840\,000 \times (1{,}15)^5 / 1{,}15^5 + [840\,000 \times (1{,}15)^5 \times (1{,}05) / (0{,}15 - 0{,}05)] / 1{,}15^5 =$$
$$8\,820\,000$$

As a check for the reasonableness of this calculation, the Market to Book ratio was calculated.

M / B ratio = market value of equity / book value of equity.

Calculation for $MVA_1$:

4 000 000 + 5 600 000 = 9 600 000

Market value of equity = total market value – debt
= 9 600 000 – 2 000 000 = 7 600 000

M/B ratio = 7 600 000 / 2 000 000 = 3,8

Calculation for $MVA_2$ and $MVA_3$:

Total market value = total assets + $MVA_2$ =
4 000 000 + 8 820 000= 12 820 000

Market value of equity = total market value – debt
= 12 820 000 – 2 000 000 = 10 820 000

M/B ratio = 10 820 000 / 2 000 000 = 5,41

The ratios calculated for all three versions of MVA range from 3,8 to 5,41 and are considered reasonable. Another test for reasonableness is the MVA/EVA multiple. It ranges from 6,7 for $MVA_1$ to 10,5 for $MVA_{2,3}$. This is in line with the research findings of Stern Stewart, namely that "each $1 increase in EVA brings, on average, a $9,50 increase in MVA."

Table 2 Earnings, EVA and MVA

| Items | Amount |
|---|---|
| EBIT | 1 800 000 |
| EBT | 1 550 000 |
| EAT | 1 240 000 |
| EVA | 840 000 |
| $MVA_1$ (in case EVA remains same, that means no growth) | 5 600 000 |
| $MVA_2$ (constant EVA growth) | 8 820 000 |
| $MVA_3$ (abnormal growth of EVA) | 8 820 000 |
| Market to Book ratio for $MVA_1$ | 3,8 |
| Market to Book ratio for $MVA_2$ and $MVA_3$ | 5,41 |
| $MVA_1$ / EVA | 6,7 |
| $MVA_{2,3}$ / EVA | 10,5 |

Table 3 shows the calculation of the leverage factors for the basic scenario, where average levels of operating leverage and financial leverage are maintained.

Table 3 Calculation of leverage

|---|---|
| DOL = contribution / EBIT | 2 400 000 / 1 800 000 = 1,33 |
| DFL = EBIT / EBT | 1 800 000 / 1 550 000 = 1,16 |
| TDL = DOL x DFL | 1,33 x 1,16 = 1,54 |
| EVA leverage = EAT / EVA | 1 240 000 / 840 000 = 1,48 |
| Total leverage including EVA = TDL x EVA leverage | 1,54 x 1,48 = 2,28 |

This means that for every 1% change in sales, the EBIT changes by 1,33%, the EAT changes by 1,16%. For every 1% change in EAT, EVA will change by 1,48%. If this is combined with the TDL, than for every 1% change in sales, EVA (and MVA) changes by 2,28%.

In table 4 the effect of changes of -10% and +10% on sales was calculated to verify the correctness of the leverage factors for the basic scenario.

Table 4 The effect of changing amount of sales (in mil.)

| Items | Sales -10% | Current sales | Sales +10% |
|---|---|---|---|
| Sales | 3,6 | 4 | 4,4 |
| VC | 1,44 | 1,6 | 1,76 |
| Contribution | 2,16 | 2,4 | 2,64 |
| FC | 0,6 | 0,6 | 0,6 |
| EBIT | 1,56 | 1,8 | 2,04 |
| Interest | 0,25 | 0,25 | 0,25 |
| EBT | 1,31 | 1,55 | 1,79 |
| Tax | 0,262 | 0,31 | 0,358 |
| EAT | 1,048 | 1,24 | 1,432 |
| Cost of E | 0,4 | 0,4 | 0,4 |
| EVA | 0,648 | 0,84 | 1,032 |

Table 5 shows the relative changes of EBIT, EAT, EVA and MVA for every 10% change in sales.

Table 5 Changes in EBIT, EAT, EVA and MVA in case of a 10%-change in sales

| Item | Change by % |
|---|---|
| EBIT | 13,33 |
| EAT | 15,48 |
| EVA and MVA | 22,86 |

As we can see, results of Table 3 are in line with the results of Table 5.

In this paper the spreadsheet model was used to investigate the leverage effect of three items, namely fixed costs (DOL), interest on debt capitaI (DFL) and the cost of equity (EVA leverage).

It is recommended that companies make use of the suggested spreadsheet model in order to investigate and analyse the effects of changes in sales and other input items (such as selling prices, costs and the cost of capital) on the crucial performance measures of EVA and MVA. As illustrated, these changes in EVA and MVA represent a direct quantification of shareholder value creation. The techniques discussed can be applied in performance measurement, valuations, cost/volume/profit analysis, sensitivity analysis, value management and scenario planning. The techniques can even be used to develop a performance-based reward system for all employees of a company that creates value for its shareholders.

Further research could focus on the effect that other factors, such as changes in the financial structure and costs, would have on EVA and MVA.

A MULTI-CRITERIA DECISION-MAKING SYSTEM BASED ON A BUILD-UP ALGORITHM

Felicia Alina CHIVULESCU

Abstract

The organization can be considered a real decision-making machine. Through the decision-making system problems are being addressed, searching for and proposing a solution and the steps to take which creates value for the organization and implicitly for its stakeholders. Whether it's about choosing the best resources, finding the best way to interact with customers, or taking the best position in front of a competitor, management has to decide. The current business environment imposes on organizations a high degree of rigor in developing strategies and a great complexity in substantiating managerial decisions in all areas of activity.

This paper presents a multi-criteria decision model based on a build-up algorithm. Thus, there are correlated methods that satisfy the necessity to include complexity and uncertainty in the decision-making process in order to achieve a high level of performance in the contemporary economic and social conditions.

Keywords: algorithm, decision, risk, sustainability.

1. Introduction

Planning and developing activities, designing the structure and culture of an organization, providing anticipated responses to occurring environmental events, choosing a technology to deliver products and services, defining a strategy to maximize the value of staff knowledge and skills to achieve performance, are elements which presuppose taking decisions.

Any activity carried out within the organization involves decisions, even though they differ in complexity and importance. The organization can be considered a real decision-making machine. At all levels and in any department, people make decisions at all times, and their degree of optimality significantly determines the level of value created by the organization.

Today, the decision-making process has a high degree of complexity due to innovative models and technologies, applicable to the new economic environment, to some resources with a high degree of novelty and the influence of some insignificant external factors so far. Decisions include social, ecological and economic concerns, and are much more complex and interrelated than in the past (Gong et al., 2016).

Organizations and their decision support systems must adopt procedures that are capable of interacting with this complexity (Courtney, 2001). Success must be planned and evaluated according to the principles of two great theories: complexity theory and chaos theory. Globalization and sustainable development are concepts that require new rules that underpin contemporary performance.

Under the globalization conditions and the dissolution of international barriers, there is a growing focus on global change.

Therefore, the global business community is characterized by a permanent change in the economic, political and social environment, the de-escalation of trade barriers, integrated economic markets, global consumers, diversified preferences, technological innovation, globalized production and cultural management, and today's change is faster and dominated by uncertainty.

This paper concentrates on the results of the in-depth research in the theory and practice of economic management and modelling, and presents the hybrid model developed on the basis of the interdependencies between the elements of sustainability, mathematical optimization and computer programming.

The suggested approach is based on a multi-criteria decision model. As such are correlated methods that satisfy the necessity to include complexity and uncertainty in the evaluation and selection of optimal decisions in order to achieve a high level of performance in the contemporary economic and social conditions. The model presented in the paper is specific to the investment decision, but it can be adapted to any other decision-making category in the business environment.

2. Background

Classical methods of substantiating decisions have a great inconvenience, which reduces the actuality of their use in terms of a development based on the sustainability of the surrounding world: they include exclusively monetary factors. However, the evolution of decision systems indicates the analysis of a decision for all categories of benefits, opportunities, costs and risks (Liang & Li, 2008), starting with the financial ones, but using additional and specific aspects of environmental protection or community development.

* Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Economic Sciences, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: alina.chivulescu10@yahoo.com)

In terms of decision to invest, most companies use the expected economic value of the business as a basis for substantiating it. The classic indicators used to make such an assessment are: the recovery term, the economic return, the internal rate of return and the net present value. Two widely used methods, both in the internal evaluation of the projects of some organizations but especially as an integrated part of the evaluation process carried out for the financial allocation of the Community funds, are those aimed at determining the recovery period and the calculation of the updated cash flow cumulative or net present value (referred to in key industry papers also as value added / net present (Stancu, 2007), or net current income (Vasilescu, 2006)). This is often added to the analysis of the internal rate of return. Also, in addition to these (Vasilescu, 2006), it is considered necessary the inclusion in the evaluation also of some efficiency indicators, such as: the ratio between the updated revenues and the updated costs, the economic efficiency or the recalculated specific expenditures.

In determining the value of the updated cash flow, are considered elements such as the "time value" of money, the inflation rate, and the rate of return accepted by the investment organization (hurdle rate or cut off rate - the minimum rate required by the profitability of the company in the investment decision, the proposals not exceeding this threshold being rejected). Thus, in obtaining net present value (NPV), the annual cash flow (Inputs - Outputs) is updated and accumulated. Usually, in the first years of the analysis, the value of the flows is negative due to the investment effort, as the investment objective is functional at full capacity, the forecasts reflect positive values. A positive cumulative annual flux (NPV) indicates the acceptance of the evaluated project as the expected gain exceeds the rate imposed by the business standards involved. Given the need to choose a variation from many possible choices, the variant with the highest NPV should be chosen because it involves the lowest level of risk (the risk of not exceeding the required rate of return).

$$VAN = \sum_{t=1}^{d+D} V_t \cdot \frac{1}{(1+a)^t} - \sum_{t=1}^{d+D} (I_t + C_t) \cdot \frac{1}{(1+a)^t}$$

Where:

$F_t$ = the expected net cash flow for the period t n = number of periods

a - discount rate

t - the year in which you spend/receive income

$V_t$ - annual revenue

$I_t$ - the amount of the annual investment

$C_t$ - annual production costs

d - the duration of the investment

D - running time

Including the potential effect of the inflation or deflation rate in the equation, converts the discount term $(1 + a)^t$ into $(1 + a + i_t)^t$, where $i_t$ is the estimated inflation or deflation rate for the period t.

Two of the problems faced by evaluation, which require studies to define a performance methodology, aim to include indicators that consider respecting the dimensions of sustainable development, as well as choosing and substantiation of the discount rate in this context characterized by a new vision on the whole economy.

What is really important, but also very difficult, is to determine the rate imposed by the organization's standards in the selection of investment projects. Correct cash flow update requires an estimate of the appropriate discount rate. For many projects, the selected discount rate is the cost of the organization's capital, although it is often set too high, as a general risk tolerance.

The financial approach considers an investment a net gain if the promised internal rate of return proves to exceed the cost of the enterprise's capital (Schmidt, 2011). Each project must, however, be evaluated according to its own specificity and the imposed rate must take into account the risk class in which the rated project can be classified, not the whole business. For the case where the project is in competition with other alternative investments to obtain funding, the discount rate may be the opportunity cost of the capital (the rate of return to which the firm must give up if it invests in the project instead of investing in another alternative (ACCA , 2011)).

The causes of the risk and the possible changes that may influence the size of the discount rate should be carefully analysed, not randomly chosen. Any mistake in dimensioning it directly influences the investment decision. Therefore, the dimensioning of the factor used is one of the objectives of top-management. I believe that the existence of a concrete and complete model of calculation is a challenge in the field and a good opportunity to optimize the investment decision.

An increase in the discount rate implies a reduction in the predicted VAN, thus favouring the short-term selection of projects. The element that determines the recording of these results is the importance of the value of amounts according to the degree of removal of the period when they are obtained. In a long-term project, the costs recorded at the beginning are high in value, while revenues are delayed for several years, with lower and lower values. Implications may be far-reaching, for example (Mantel et al., 2011), the high interest rate levels of the 1970s, 1980s and 2000s in the US have imposed on organizations the focus on short-term projects and indifference to long-term investments as main sources of technological development, which has led to the decline of US companies' competitiveness on the global market.

Moreover, the traditional approaches to substantiating the efficient allocation of capital in investment projects based on efficiency indicators imply implicitly throughout the life of the project the same business conditions as those underlying the investment decision.

However, market conditions change over time, and such changes could affect both future cash flows and estimated update rates, and thus the performance indicators of a project. A project that seems to be attractive today may not be so good at a later date when the business turns out to be no longer as favourable as predicted.

Therefore, in order to benefit from the investment opportunities offered by the national and especially international economic environment, in order to obtain the competitive advantage in a certain context, it is necessary to study the determinants of the respective context and the forecast of its evolution. The investment decision is strongly influenced by the specificity of the business environment in which the activity of the beneficiary organization is taking place and, implicitly, by the changes occurring or to occur at this level.

The macro-factors that influence the business environment and implicitly the investment decision are: legal system, economic conditions and cultural norms.

A country-specific business environment consists of all the factors that influence the benefits, costs and risks of running a business in that country. The size of the market, the purchasing power of the population or the expectations and needs of consumers are elements that need to be known in order to achieve organizational success. At present, they are characterized by ever more rapid and unpredictable changes.

An example in this regard is provided by Gomez-Mejia et al. (2005) on the situation of Argentina, which in the 1940s was among the states with the “healthiest” economy, and in the 21st century is not even among the top 40 countries, currently being characterized by political instability, poor economy and corruption. On the opposite side, we can discuss South Korea's evolution, which from a very poor third world country in the 1960s, it became one of the top 10 largest economies in the world and fourth in the world trade rankings after Japan, USA and Germany.

Managing a business implies also respecting the rules of the country in which you operate, these rules quickly becoming items with financial implications for the lead organization. Government taxes, holidays paid to employees, free days, double the Christmas salary, lack of infrastructure, or specific requirements for the quality of the products and raw materials used are different from one country to another and from one culture to another.

Carrying out an economic activity and, in particular, carrying out an investment, undoubtedly implies a certain level of risk. The risk differs significantly depending on the context in which reporting is made. However, in my opinion, in an environment characterized by complexity and uncertainty as the current one, risk is a positive element. Transforming uncertainty into risk is one of the greatest challenges, which decisively influences the performance of a decision. Risk cannot be avoided nor should such an approach be adopted; it is important to quantify it in order to substantiate decisions on a realistic basis.

In literature (Yean Yng Ling & To Phuong Hoang, 2010; Restrepo et al., 2012), risk is classified into three categories: political risk - specific to developing countries; indicates government changes, social disturbances, strikes, terrorism, or violent conflicts. This risk category is rated for each country by specialized agencies such as Bank of America World Information Services, Business Risk Management Intelligence BERI, Control Risks Information Services, Economist Intelligence Unit EIU, Euromoney, Institutional Investor, Standard and Poor's Rating Group, Moody's Investor Services (Ball et al., 2002); economic risk - captures elements that significantly influence the decision to invest, such as inflation rate, exchange rate or interest rate in a country; and legal risk.

The legal system of a country consists of rules defining what is allowed or illegal, the law enforcement process and procedures used to punish and redress offenses. The legal system of a nation reflects its culture, religion and traditions. A prime necessity in substantiating a business is law and compliance. The three major legal systems adopted by the countries of the world are: common law - in countries with historical or Anglo-Saxon influences, where the Court-based antecedents have an important role to play in interpreting the law (US and other 26 states); civil law - interpretations and sanctions are based on a complete set of rules that is part of a structured code (in about 70 countries, most in Europe and Japan); Muslim law - based on religious beliefs, regulates behaviour in about 27 Islamic countries (Gomez-Mejia et al., 2005).

The uncertainty of the economic environment is one of the factors that decisively influence the evolution of the business environment. The rate of inflation influences the evolution of an organization both by differentiation according to the host country and by the undergoing changes.

The exchange rate, another fluctuating macroeconomic indicator, also has implications for how to manage an investment. Considering an American company operating in Romania with a potential devaluation of the local currency (leu) in relation to the national currency of the country of origin of the organization (the dollar), it will receive less for the goods and services than was foreseen if the company perceives tariffs in the currency of the host country). In order to maintain the level of profit, the company must increase the price, which may lead to a reduction in future sales.

An example of this is provided by Darling & Nauss (1995) and addresses the effects of the exchange rate fluctuation on US companies in Mexico in 1995. The 40% reduction in the value of the Mexican currency against the dollar in January 1995 led to a decline in corporate income American presence on the Mexican market. Due to the price increases and demand reduction, industries such as cars, represented by companies such as Ford or General Motors, have experienced the influence of this indicator's variation. Another example may be tourism in France, whose profits dropped by 30% between 2002 and 2004, in which the value of the dollar diminished by 35% against the euro, which reduced the number of American tourists. Taxes are the third important economic factor that influence the activity of an organization. The variations in the tax policy are reflected in the value of each company's results. In Europe, income tax paid by companies varies from one country to another; so, in Bulgaria or Cyprus it is 10%, in Germany and France it reaches 30% (CWTFS, 2012). Another element that differs between countries is the licensing policy, which requires innovative firms to consider different copyright limitations and patent durations.

Culture is "collective programming of thinking that distinguishes members of one group from another, culture includes value systems, and values are the basis of culture" (Hofstede, 1984). Culture reflects specific characteristics of the social structure, religion, history of a region.

Internationalization requires organizations that attach great importance to performance, understanding and quick adaptation to cultural change. Cultural differences are grouped and categorized in five dimensions by Hofstede (2001): distance from power, individualism, avoidance of uncertainty, masculinity / femininity and long / short orientation.

3. The build-up algorithm

Decisions are significantly influenced by the forecasts on the evolution of the factors presented above, the design and the evaluation referring to the minimum level of profitability imposed by the conditions of the environment where the business is developed. In the context of sustainable development, efficiency and optimal decision-making acquire new dimensions characterized by increased complexity, which makes it even more difficult to quantify the level of a predicted risk based on which a correct justification and assessment can be made, indicating the decision generating the maximum performance level.

The key element for accurately planning and quantification the efficiency indicators is the rate or discount factor. Complying with the multi-dimensional reporting trends highlighted the need to quantify new investment risk factors. Thus, in order to determine the discount rate, a calculation model based on Build-up algorithms (Ibbotson, 2005) will be used further on.

Source: author

The suggested model is described by the following formula:

$$a = \bar{R}_k + \pi^+_{R_i} + \pi^-_{e_i^*} + max(ri_i, rd_i) + Rm_z$$

Where:

a - discount rate;

$R_k$ - the average risk rate of the industry/area of activity k recorded at the level of the European Union;

$\pi^+_{R_i}$- the country risk premium against the risk rate of the European Union;

$\pi^-_{e_i^}$ - the risk premium against the sustainable efficiency e of country i;

$ri_i$- country inflation rate i;

$rd_i$ – interest rate in country i;

$Rm_z$ - organization z size risk.

In order to draw a clearer picture of this model, the calculation algorithm is highlighted by the logic scheme shown in the figure 1.

4. Discussions

The risk is the alternative the individuals are most often confronting with, the idea that it represents a permanence of the human activity in general being unanimously accepted. Under these conditions it can be said that the activities with a high safety degree almost do not exist anymore, the risk notion becoming complementary with the activity one. Thus, we live in a risk's world, as Louis de Broglie (French physician, Nobel laureate in Physiks in 1929) was affirming, we have to chase the risk because it represents the key of all succeses. In this context, the risk received a very big importance in all domains, its assuming becoming a common practice in the internal and international business environment.

Under these conditions, taking into account the path irreversible entered by the bond between the results of the economic activity and of the social and political environment, the analists but also the subjects directly implied in the international economic flows assign an increased importance to the concept of country risk. Under the conditions of the economic globalization, for the realization of some international investment flows under rentability conditions, there is imposed the identification and management of the risks that might appear in the receiving economied due to the particular political-economical and social conditions under which each national economy handles.

Any activity performed in the global economic environment is influenced by a basis risk, named riskless rate. If everybody runs with the same speed, we can say that we are all stand still. This safe risk rate id registered in USA under the titles of a mature capital market. The medium rate $R_k$ has in its composition two risk categories: the general risk of the Euro zone and the medium risk of the k industry at the European Union's level. The general risk is determined as a risk premium to the global risk. According to the data bases built by teacher Damodaran (2013a), over time the risk premium of Euro in comparison with the basis rate is 0. It results thus that $R_k$ has in its composition the risk rate of the titles in USA and the risk of the industry k in the UE. To this risk rate there will be added the country risk premium, namely the supplementary risk of the country to the risk of the Euro zone. Because the sustainable development plays an important role in the contemporary conditions, the model also has in its composition a risk rate of sustainable efficiency. Its determination is realized as a risk premium of the country's efficiency in the context of the sustainable development reported to the medium efficiency of EU-27 (Dinu, 2013).

For the complete definition of the rate there will be also taken into account a discounting rate of the inflationary phenomenon. Although reference papers in the domain add up the values of the inflation rate and of the interest rate, the proposed model takes into account the maximum of the two ones. The interest rate should have the minimal value equal with the inflation rate for the justification of the deposit's benefits and thus the economical theory would indicate the inclusion in the model of the interest rate. The motivation regarding the choice of the maximum is based on the results obtained through the evolution's study and the correlation of the two rates at Romania's level, which highlight the registering of some inflation rates superior to the interest rate in certain periods.

At organizational level, the discount factor determined according to the proposed model relates to the company's size risk (Joshi & Anand, 2018). $Rm_z$, also named size rating of the company z is being chosen by framing the indicator's value $interestcoverage = \frac{EBIT}{dobânzi}$ in the corresponding class (Damodaran, 2013b).

Thus determined, the discount rate value assigns the proper importance to the multiple risk classes implied in the decision-making system within the actual economy's context.

5. Conclusions

The distrust of investors in the implementation of sustainable principles but also the lack of such an evaluation model so far are the main limits of its application in practice.

The complexity, the risk and the uncertainty of the business environment are not, however, totally assessed and quantified using the suggested model, and probably will never be. The main contribution considered aims at adjusting the discount rate with a new class of risk, the efficiency of the development of investments in the context of sustainable development. The limits of the proposed model and also the main directions for further research on this particularly important detail in planning and obtaining a business' success, can refer to issues such as those presented in the conclusion of this article.

Defining country and industry risk is based solely on data provided by Professor Damodaran. The justification for choosing these databases is the recognition of their quality and correctness at the level of the world scientific community, through numerous articles published by the author, as well as references to them in important journals in the field.

If, given the existence of complete and up-to-date data on the evolution of some macroeconomic indicators, country risk could be quantified based on a multiple regression model or PANEL data, the industry's risk requires a complex and difficult task-based study that depends on the business environment, through their component organizations and their representatives, who often threat the research with indifference and find no time to engage in such a project.

That is why, an element that should be included in the suggested model for determining the discount rate is the industry risk premium for each country. Such an analysis may represent the goal of an entire research program, which will customize for each country the risk for carrying out activities in a particular field in the context of sustainable development.

The main contribution and originality element, the Sustainable Efficiency Premium, is determined for each country. The model does not quantify the efficiency of making a sustainable investment at the level of a field of activity and does not take into account aspects specific to the importance and necessity of including elements of sustainable development in the evaluation of projects belonging to different domains. A study for identifying, for each industry, of the risk quantification models is suggested for further research.

The inclusion of additional risk categories, the addition of other countries, choosing other time frames to analyse and the customization for other decision-making classes represent also limitations of the proposed model, which may be regarded as ideas for future research.

DISTRIBUTED MULTI-AGENT SYSTEMS FOR SUPPORTING COLLABORATIVE NETWORKED ENVIRONMENT

Adina-Georgeta CRETAN

Abstract

This paper proposes a distributed multi-agent system to model and support parallel and concurrent negotiations among organizations acting in the same industrial market. The complexity of the approach is given by the dynamic environment in which multi-attribute and multi-participant negotiations take place. The metaphor Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs) is used to model the parallelism and the non-deterministic aspects of the negotiation processes that occur in Collaborative Networked Environment.

1. Introduction

The advent of the Internet and more recently the cloud-computing trend have led to the development of various forms of virtual collaboration in which the organizations are trying to exploit the facilities of the network to achieve higher utilization of their resources. We try to provide support to these collaboration activities and we propose negotiation as a fundamental mechanism for such collaborations.

The concept of "Virtual Enterprise (VE)" or "Network of Enterprises" has emerged to identify the situation when several independent companies decided to collaborate and establish a virtual organization with the goal of increasing their profits. Camarinha-Matos defines the concept of VE as follows: "A Virtual Enterprise (VE) is a temporary alliance of enterprises that come together to share skills and resources in order to better respond to business opportunities and whose cooperation is supported by computer networks"[1].

In this paper we present how organizations participate and control the status of the negotiations and how the negotiation processes are managed.

The starting point in the development of this work was the goal to support small and medium enterprises that are not able or are not willing to perform alone a large contract since in this situation the association in a virtual alliance provides the opportunity to subcontract the tasks of the contract to other partners within the alliance. To achieve this goal, research was dedicated to the development of a model to coordinate the negotiations that take place within an inter-organizational alliance. Our research was focused on the topics of virtual alliances, automation of the negotiations and of coordination aimed to provide the mechanisms for coordinating the negotiations that take place among autonomous enterprises that are grouped in a virtual alliance.

Assuming that the nature of the roles that may be played in a negotiation are similar in multiple approaches, the number of participants involved at the same time in the same negotiation is considerably different.

Depending on the number of participants involved in a negotiation, we may distinguish various negotiation types: bilateral negotiation (one-to-one); one-to-many negotiation; many-to-many negotiation.

Taking into account the complexity of the negotiations modeled by multi-agent system, we can state that to conduct in an efficient fashion one or many negotiations that involve a large number of participants and to properly account for all negotiation dimensions, it is necessary to develop a coordination process that is defined outside of the specific constraints of a given decision mechanism or communication protocol.

The negotiation process was exemplified by scenarios tight together by a virtual alliance of the autonomous gas stations. Typically, these are competing companies. However, to satisfy the demands that go beyond the vicinity of a single gas station and to better accommodate the market requirements, they must enter in an alliance and must cooperate to achieve common tasks. The type of alliance that we use to define their association emphasizes that each participant to this alliance is completely autonomous i.e., it is responsible of its own amount of work and the management of its resources. The manager of a gas station wants to have a complete decision-making power over the administration of his contracts, resources, budget and clients. At the same time, the manager attempts to cooperate with other gas stations to accomplish the global task at hand only through a minimal exchange of information. This exchange is minimal in the sense that the manager is in charge and has the ability to select the information exchanged.

When a purchasing request reaches a gas station, the manager analyses it to understand if it can be accepted, taking into account job schedules and resources availability. If the manager accepts the purchasing request, he may decide to perform the job locally or to partially subcontract it, given the gas station resource availability and technical capabilities. If the manager decides to subcontract a job, he starts a negotiation within the collaborative infrastructure with selected participants. In case that the negotiation results in an agreement, a contract is settled between the subcontractor and the contractor gas station, which defines the business process outsourcing jobs and a set of obligation relations among participants[2].

The gas station alliance scenario shows a typical example of the SME virtual alliances where partner organizations may be in competition with each other, but may want to cooperate in order to be globally more responsive to market demand.

The collaborative infrastructure, that we describe, should flexibly support negotiation processes respecting the autonomy of the partners.

We are starting with a presentation in Section 2 of a formal interaction model to manage multiple concurrent negotiations by using the metaphor Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs). Section 3 presents an example of the proposed interaction model using the IAMs metaphor. Then, we are briefly describing in Section 4 the collaborative negotiation architecture. Finally, Section 5 concludes this paper.

2. Building the Negotiation Model

In this section we propose a formal model to settle and to manage the coordination rules of one or more negotiations, which can take place in parallel. We will introduce the metaphor of Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs) to describe the negotiation model. We introduce the Program Formula to define the methods used to manage the parallel evolution of multiple negotiations.

2.1. The Metaphor Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs)

The metaphor Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs) will be used to facilitate modeling of the evolution of a multi-attribute, multi-participant, multi-phase negotiation. In IAMs, a system consists of different entities and each entity is characterized by a state that is represented as a set of resources [4]. It may evolve according to different laws of the following form, also called "methods":

A1@…@An <>- B1@…@Bm

A method is executed if the state of the entity contains all resources from the left side (called the "head") and, in this case, the entity may perform a transition to a new state where the old resources (A1,…,An) are replaced by the resources (B1,…,Bm) on the right side (called the "body"). All other resources of the entity that do not participate in the execution of the method are present in the new state.

The operators used in a method are:

- the operator @ assembles together resources that are present in the same state of an entity;
- the operator <>- indicates the transition to a new state of an entity;
- the operator & is used in the body of a method to connect several sets of resources;
- the symbol "T" is used to indicate an empty body.
- In IAMs, an entity has the following characteristics:
- if there are two methods whose heads consist of two sets of distinct resources, then the methods may be executed in parallel;
- if two methods share common resources, then a single method may be executed and the selection procedure is made in a non-deterministic manner.

In IAMs, the methods may model four types of transition that may occur to an entity: transformation, cloning, destruction and communication. Through the methods of type transformation the state of an entity is simply transformed in a new state. If the state of the entity contains all the resources of the head of a transformation method, the entity performs a transition to a new state where the head resources are replaced by the body resources of the method. Through the methods of type cloning an entity is cloned in a finite number of entities that have the same state. If the state of the entity contains all the resources of a head of a cloning method and if the body of the method contains several sets of distinct resources, then the entity is cloned several times, as determined by the number of distinct sets, and each of the resulting clones suffers a transformation by replacing the head of the method with the corresponding body. In the case of a destruction of the state, the entity disappears. If the state of the entity contains all the resources of the head of a transformation method and, if the body of the method is the resource T, then the entity disappears.

In IAMs, the communication among various entities is of type broadcasting and it is represented by the symbol "^". This symbol is used to the heads of the methods to predefine the resources involved in the broadcasting. These resources are inserted in the current entity and broadcasted to all the entities existent in the system, with the exception of the current entity. This mechanism of communication thus executes two synchronous operations:

- transformation: if all resources that are not pre-defined at the head of the method enter in collision, then the pre-defined resources are inserted in the entity and are immediately consumed through the application of the method;

- communication: insertion of the copies of the pre-defined resources in all entities that are present in the system at that time instance.

2.2. Modelling the Negotiation Process

According to our approach regarding the negotiation, the participants to a negotiation may propose offers and each participant may decide in an autonomous manner to stop a negotiation either by accepting or by rejecting the offer received. Also, depending on its role in a negotiation, a participant may invite new participants to the negotiation. To model this type of negotiation, we will make use of the previously defined particles and we will propose the methods to manage the evolution of these particles.

As we have seen, a characteristic of negotiation is its multi-node image, which allows parallel development of several phases of negotiation. A possibility to continue a negotiation is to create a new phase of negotiation from an existing one. In this regard, the Figure 1 presents the possible evolutions of a ph0 phase of negotiation described by the atom (s,ph0).

Fig. 1. Evolution of negotiation process by cloning an atom

In accordance with the aspects of negotiation for which changes are made, three new negotiation phases are possible:

- evolution of negotiated attributes and / or of their value from atom(s,ph0) to atom(s,ph1): a participant sends a new proposal thus achieving either the contraction of the negotiation attributes, or their extension, by the introduction of new attributes to negotiate;
- evolution of the negotiation status perceived by one of the sequences sharing the new negotiation phase: one of the participants accepts - atom(s,ph2) - or refuses a proposal - atom(s,ph3);
- evolution of participants and of dependences among negotiations by the evolution of the number of sequences sharing the same negotiation phase: a sequence can invite a new sequence to share a new phase of negotiation atom(s,ph4).

Through the use of the metaphor IAMs, the evolutions of the negotiation phases correspond to the evolutions at the atoms level. The evolution may be regarded as a process consisting of two stages: a cloning operation of the atom existent in the initial stage and a transformation operation within the cloned atom to allow for the new negotiation phase.

The cloning operation is expressed by a set of methods involving the particles event and these methods are used to facilitate the evolution of the negotiation.

We propose the following methods associated to the particles event to model the cloning of an atom where new message particles are introduced:

- The method Propose is associated to the particle event clone_propose(Id, New_id, Msg) and models the introduction of a new proposal (clone_propose), made by one of the participants to the negotiation.

This method is expressed:

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_propose(Id, New_ id, Msg)<>- (enable @ name(Id)) & (freeze @ name(New_ id) @ propose(Rname, Content))

The atom identified by the particle name(Id) is cloned. The new proposal contained in the particle propose(Rname, Content) will be introduced in the new atom name(New_id).

- The method Accept is associated to the event particle clone_accept(Id, New_id, Msg) and models the case when one of the participants has sent a message of acceptance of an older proposal (clone_accept).

This method is expressed:

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_accept(Id, New_ Id, Msg) <>- (enable @ name(Id)) & (freeze @ name(New_ Id) @ accept(Rname))

The atom identified by the name(Id) is cloned. The acceptance message contained in the particle accept(Rname) will be introduced in the new atom name (New_id).

- The method Reject is associated to the event particle clone_reject(Id, New_id, Msg) and models the denial of an older proposal (clone_reject) made by one of the participants.

This method is expressed:

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_reject(Id, New_ Id, Msg) <>- (enable @ name(Id)) & (freeze @ name(New_ Id) @ reject(Rname))

The atom identified by the particle name(Id) is cloned. The refusal message contained in the particle reject(Rname) will be introduced in the new atom name(New_ id).

- The method Create is associated to the event particle clone_create(Id, New_id, Msg). This method models the invitation of a new sequence (clone_create) made by one of the participants for sharing the newly created negotiation phase.

This method is expressed:

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_create(Id, New_Id, Msg) @ <>- (enable @name(Id)) & (freeze @ name(New_Id) @ create(Rname, Type))

The atom identified by the particle name(Id) is cloned, and a particle create(Rname, Type) is introduced in the new atom name(New_ id) that will further generate the occurrence of a new representation particle for the new sequence participating in the negotiation.

These methods are described in a generic way. Thus, new particles may be added depending on how the current sequence builds negotiation graphs.

By these methods of the event particles, the duplication of an atom has been modeled, in which new message particles are introduced (Figure 2). In the new atom, the representation particles for the current negotiation phase remain identical with those of the first atom.

Fig. 2. Evolution of negotiation process by transformation of an atom state

According to our approach, the evolution of the negotiation process takes place by changing or creating a new negotiation phase. This phase can evolve according to: i) status; ii) attributes negotiated; iii) number of sequences participant in the negotiation, as in the following:

- The sequence of the statutes is the following: i) the sequence s finds itself in the initiated state at the creation of a first atom and of a first phase of negotiation; ii) the sequence s switches to the undefined state at the moment of emission or reception of a message; iii) if a participant accepts or declines a proposal, the s associated sequence may pass to a success or failure statute.
- Referring to the negotiated attributes (Issues), the different messages contribute to the evolution of the multitude of attributes and their values.
- The introduction of a new sequence in the current negotiation is modeled by inserting a new particle of representation on the current negotiation phase, which models the instant image of a new sequence on the current phase of negotiation.

In order to model these evolutions at the level of a negotiation phase, the message-type particles described above have been defined. The message particles participate in the transformation methods, which change the negotiation phase of an atom by replacing the representation particles of the negotiation sequences involved in the creation or in the reception of the exchanged messages.

In the following, we propose the basic forms of the transformation methods. Depending on the particular constraints of the negotiation, other transformation methods and other particles can be defined for modeling the foreseen constraints.

- The transformation method associated to a propose(Rname, Content) particle contributes to the local evolution of a negotiation phase regarding the status and the attributes negotiated. This evolution takes place by replacing, in the existing atom, all representation particles that are involved (depending on the method) with the new particles that have the status changed to undefined. Further, the set of the negotiated attributes (Issues) contains the new proposal expressed in the Content of the message particle.

freeze @ localr(Rname1, S1, I1) @ extr(Rname, S2, I1) @ propose(Rname, Content)<>- enable@ localr(Rname1, undefined, I) @ extr(Rname, undefined, I)

The atom changes the state by consuming the propose() particle as well as two representation particles to create new representation particles that describe the new proposal received.

- The transformation method associated to an accept(Rname) particle leads to the local evolution of a negotiation phase in terms of status. Evolution is achieved by replacing, within the corresponding atom, the representation particles involved, with the new particles whose status has been changed from initiated or undefined into success :

freeze @ localr(Rname1, S1, I1) @ extr(Rname, S2, I1) @ accept(Rname) <>- localr(Rname1, success, I1) @ extr(Rname, success, I1)

The atom changes the state by consuming the accept() particle and two representation particles to create the new representation particles whose status is changed in success.

- The transformation method associated to a reject(Rname) particle. This method is similar to the accept(Rname) particle, except for the fact that the evolution of the negotiation phase is achieved by changing the status of the representation particles concerned from initiated or undefined into failure :

freeze @ localr(Rname1, S1, I1) @ extr(Rname, S2, I1) @ reject(Rname) <>- localr(Rname1, fail, I1) @ extr(Rname, fail, I1)

The atom changes the state by consuming the accept() particle and two representation particles to create the new representation particles which have changed the status into failure.

- The transformation method associated to a create(New_r_name, Type) particle contributes to the evolution of a negotiation phase in terms of number of sequences that participate to this negotiation phase. This evolution is achieved by introducing, in the corresponding atom, a new representation particle:

freeze @ create(Rname, type) <>- extr(Rname, init, ∅) @ enable

As this sequence is just invited in the negotiation, its status is initiated and its set of the negotiated attributes is the empty set.

Thus, the negotiation phases and the evolution of these phases have been described using representation particles, event particles and message particles.

Given the fact that IAMs metaphor achieves a non-deterministic execution of the methods, we have introduced the c*ontrol* particles (see section 3.3) in order to counter this disadvantage and achieve a coherent execution of a negotiation process.

The evolution of all negotiation atoms and the negotiation phases take place in parallel.

To model the coordination of the execution of the negotiation process within a sequence, we used the communication mechanism among the existing negotiations. This type of particles that are part of the communication process among different negotiation atoms communicate to all negotiation atoms a certain result.

In the negotiation processes, the messages hold meta-information regarding the content of the messages that describe the proposals in terms of the value of different attributes of the negotiation object. We assume that all the negotiation participants use the same language and ontology.

Next section presents an example of modeling a negotiation composed of a set of negotiation sequences.

3. Example - modeling the negotiation process using the IAMs metaphor

In this example, a simple negotiation scenario will be presented, whose negotiation process corresponds to an exchange of proposals leading to an agreement.

In the proposed scenario, we consider a carpentry workshop of the p1 participant. The participant p1 decides to outsource a job (the assembling for 10K LM at a cost less than 2€/LM, within less than 5 days) to another carpentry workshop of a p2 participant.

The negotiation N that occurs between p1 and p2 is a bilateral negotiation.

It is described by two sequences: $N(t) = \{s_1, s_2\}$ with $s_1 \in$ sequences$(t,p_1)$, $s_2 \in$ sequences$(t,p2)$ and role(t,p1,N)=initiator, role(t,p2,N)=guest.

The scenario modeled subsequently takes place in three distinct steps:

- step1: after a first proposal made by participant p1 to participant p2, the participant p2 decides to send a new proposal;
- step2: the participants decide to agree on the second proposal;
- step3: the agreement is established and the negotiation stops.

Modeling takes place as it follows:

Figure 3.a) shows the $s_1$, $view(s_1)= (p_1,N,R_1)$ negotiation sequence with an a1 atom corresponding to a negotiation phase described by two representative particles, a local one and an external one, and two control particles, (enable and name(a1)). This atom can be considered as being the proposal made by p1 to p2 at the beginning of the negotiation.

Going on with the scenario, there is assumed that within the a1 atom of the $s_1$ negotiation sequence, the clone_propose(a1, a2, cost=18K delay=3) event was introduced in order to announce a new proposal.

By using the Propose method, the $s_1$ negotiation sequence will contain two atoms (see Figure 3.b)): a1 atom that has changed by consuming the clone_propose particle and an a2 new atom, which is the a1 clone (representation particles not involved in the method remain unchanged in the two atoms). The expression of this method is:

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_propose(Id, New_ id, Msg)<>- (enable @ name(Id)) & ( freeze @ name(New_ id) @ propose(Rname, Content))

Fig. 3. a) – Proposal of p1 to p2 contained in a1atom, b) – Transformation of a1 atom in a2

From now on, the negotiation is described through the two negotiation atoms, in which the negotiation process can evolve independently.

The following methods will help us to model the fact that the (name, freeze, propose) new particles introduced in the a2 atom will make that the negotiation phase attached to this atom have a different evolution in comparison to that of a1 atom.

For the propose particle, the following method will be used:

freeze @ localr(Rname1, St1, I1) @ extr(Rname2, St2, I1) @ propose(Rname2, Content)<>- enable@ localr(Rname1, undefined, I) @ extr(Rname2, undefined, I)

This method exchanges the representation particles, which preserve the old values of the attributes, with the new representation particles that describe the new proposals received.

Thus, to move from an extr(p2s2, undefined, size=10K cost≤20K) representation particle, and from a propose(p2s2, cost=18K delay=3) message particle to an extr(p2s2, undefined, size=10K cost=18K delay=3) representation particle, the existence of a computational-type particle called construct(I1,Content,I) has been supposed, which calculates this transformation (see Figure 3.c)).

The expression of this method is:

freeze @ localr(Rname1, St1, I1) @ extr(Rname2, St2, I1) @ propose(Rname2, Content) @ {construct(I1,Content,I)} <>- enable @ localr(Rname1, undefined, I) @ extr(Rname2, undefined, I)

Fig. 3. c) Evolution of a1 and a2 atoms

Step 2

Further, we assume that p1 participant examines the two proposals and decides to accept the second proposal. Acceptance is modeled as follows:

i) the atom containing the proposals to be accepted is duplicated by Accept method associated to an event clone_accept() particle;

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_accept(Id, New_ Id, Msg) <>- (enable @ name(Id)) & ( freeze @ name(New_ Id) @ accept(Rname))

ii) the clone atom evolves by consuming the accept() message particle;

freeze @ localr(Rname1, St1, I1) @ extr(Rname, St2, I1) @ accept(Rname) <>- localr(Rname1, success, I1) @ extr(Rname, success, I1)

Thus, in Figure 3.d) the s1 negotiation sequence of a p1 participant is composed of three negotiation phases. The third a3 atom contains a negotiation phase in which success is the negotiation status.

Fig. 3.d) Negotiation phases of the s1 sequence of a p1 participant

Step 3

The a3 atom can thus be perceived as the image of a negotiation phase on which the two participants have agreed. The existence of this agreement has to imply the fact that the negotiation has to come to an end.

In Figure 3.e), a3 atom changes its state and, at the same time, communicates to the other atoms to stop. The expression of this method is:

localr(Rname1, success, I1) @ extr(Rname2, success, I1) @ ^stop(I1) <>- ready(I1)

Fig. 3.e) Transformation of a3 atom state

The method stop <>- #t makes that, at a certain moment, the atoms containing stop particles be dissolved (see Figure 3. f.), the only active atom being the one containing the agreement (see Figure 3.g)).

Fig, 3. f) Dissolution of a1 and a2 atoms containing stop particle, g) The active atom: a3 atom containing the agreement

Thus, in this section, the negotiation process by using the IAMs metaphor has been defined, and the negotiation composed of a set of negotiation sequences has been modeled. Each of these sequences was represented by a set of negotiation atoms, which, at their turns, each of them administrates independently a private negotiation phase as well as the set of the snapshots associated to the phase.

A snapshot describes the status of the negotiation and the set of the negotiated attributes. Also, a negotiation is characterized by the role of participants and the policy of coordination attached to it. These policies can be described by using different methods. The proposed model of the negotiation process allows describing the evolution of a negotiation by a parallel development of negotiation atoms associated to methods modeling the coordination policy.

In the next sections, the coordination model will be defined by using this describing model of the negotiation process. Our objective is to achieve a correspondence between the coordination policy that a sequence has to satisfy (static model), and the set of methods modeling the evolution in time of a negotiation sequence (dynamic model).

Given that each negotiation is composed of a set of negotiation sequences, the coordination process of one or more negotiations will be structured into modules (services) that correspond to the sequences involved in the negotiation.

In the next section, we will briefly describe the architecture of the negotiation system in which the interactions take place.

4. The Collaborative Negotiation Architecture

The main objective of this software infrastructure is to support collaborating activities in virtual enterprises. In VE partners are autonomous companies with the same object of activity, geographically distributed.

Taking into consideration, the constraints imposed by the autonomy of participants within VE, the only way to share information and resources is the negotiation process.

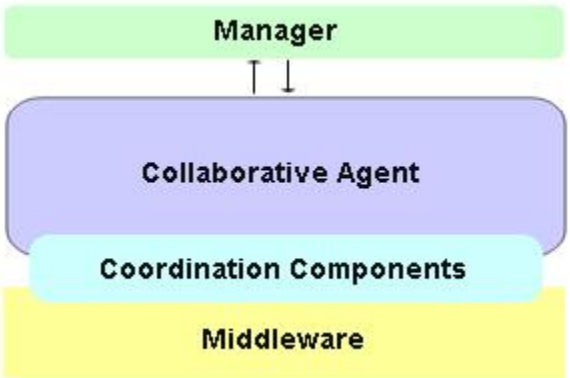

Fig. 4. The architecture of the collaborative system

This infrastructure is structured in four main layers[1]: Manager, Collaborative Agent, Coordination Components and Middleware. A first layer is dedicated to the Manager of each organization of the alliance. A second layer is dedicated to the Collaborative Agent who assists its gas station manager at a global level (negotiations with different participants on different jobs) and at a specific level (negotiation on the same job with different participants) by coordinating itself with the Collaborative Agents of the other partners through the fourth layer, Middleware[2]. The third layer, Coordination Components, manages the coordination constraints among different negotiations which take place simultaneously.

A Collaborative Agent aims at managing the negotiations in which its own gas station is involved (e.g. as initiator or participant) with different partners of the alliance.

Each negotiation is organized in three main steps: initialization; refinement of the job under negotiation and closing[3]. The initialization step allows to define what has to be negotiated (Negotiation Object) and how (Negotiation Framework)[4]. A selection of negotiation participants can be made using history on passed negotiation, available locally or provided by the negotiation infrastructure[5]. In the refinement step, participants exchange proposals on the negotiation object trying to satisfy their constraints[6]. The manager may participate in the definition and evolution of negotiation frameworks and objects[7]. Decisions are taken by the manager, assisted by his Collaborative Agent[8]. For each negotiation, a Collaborative Agent manages one or more negotiation objects, one framework and the negotiation status. A manager can specify some global parameters: duration; maximum number of messages to be exchanged; maximum number of candidates to be considered in the negotiation and involved in the contract; tactics; protocols for the Collaborative Agent interactions with the manager and with the other Collaborative Agents [9].

Conclusions

This paper proposes an intelligent mechanism for modeling and managing parallel and concurrent negotiations. The business-to-business interaction context in which our negotiations take place forces us to model the unexpected and the dynamic aspects of this environment. An organization may participate in several parallel negotiations. Each negotiation may end with the acceptance of a contract that will automatically reduce the available resources and it will modify the context for the remaining negotiations. We have modeled this dynamic evolution of the context using IAMs metaphor that allows us to limit the acceptance of a negotiation to the available set of resources. The proposed negotiation infrastructure aims to help the different SMEs to fulfil their entire objectives by mediating the collaboration among the several organizations gathered into a virtual enterprise.

A specific feature that distinguishes the negotiation structure proposed in this work from the negotiations with imposed options (acceptance or denial) is that it allows the modification of the proposals through the addition of new information (new attributes) or through the modification of the initial values of certain attributes (for example, in the case of gas stations the gasoline price may be changed).

In the current work we have described in our collaborative mechanism only the interactions with the goal to subcontract or contract a task. A negotiation process may end with a contract and in that case the supply schedule management and the well going of the contracted task are both parts of the outsourcing process.

In order to illustrate our approach we have used a sample scenario where distributed gas stations have been united into virtual enterprise. Take into consideration this scenario, one of the principal objectives was related to the generic case and means that this proposed infrastructure can be used in other activity domains.

Regarding research perspective continuation, we will focus on the negotiation process and the coordination process taking into consideration the contracts management process. In this way the coordination can administrate not only the dependence between the negotiations and the contracts which are formed and with execution dependences of those contracts.

ASSET PRICING IN A CAPITAL MARKET

Valentin Gabriel CRISTEA[*]

Abstract

This research shows us risks in acquiring assets on capital markets. Behavior of investors uses limited rational theory, adaptive theory of expectations and mind theory. Simon asserted in 1955 that "a normal human being is not entirely rational in making his decisions because of various heuristics and behavioral prejudices." The hypothesis of adaptive expectations asserts that "adaptive rationality of human preferences and expectations, given that individual decisions are prefered over time, incomplete information, and different learning environments" (Brocas and Carrillo, 2000; Hey, 1994). Compared to EU firms investing in the financial market, Romanian firms invest less because of poor asset quality, labor market uncertainty and inadequate transport infrastructure, according to the EIB survey of December 4th, 2018.

1. Introduction

Asset pricing theory is an important foundation for financial theory, practice and policy. The asset pricing model is dated on 1960s evolves and it was improved over time.

The behavioural asset pricing centers on the role of behavioural forces on investor, asset prices, and market behaviours. The behavioural finance views investors are not rational in their investment decisions. This means systematic deviations of asset prices and market efficiency from rational point of view. In respect with this, Shiller, 1981; Shefrin and Statman, 1985; De Long et al., 1990; De Bondt, 1998; Shleifer, 2000; Baker and Nofsinger, 2002; Shiller, 2003; Shiller et al., 1984; Statman, 2008, many evidence point to the ideas that the pricing in the stock market is complex, and relies not only on the fundamental forces, but also on human emotion and mistakes.

1.1. Asset pricing testing strategy

Based on the above theoretical perspectives, the behavioural asset pricing theory ensures theoretical foundation on the roles of both fundamental and behavioural risk factors in asset pricing determinants modelling. Acket et al., 2003; Lucey and Dowling, 2005; Statman et al., 2008 studied multiple sources of behavioural risks that could be categorized as cognitive heuristics (cognitive shortcut) and affective biases (sentiment, emotion, and mood). Then, in practice, Baker and Wurgler showed in 2007 that there are issue related to the choice of behavioural factors; how to measure them, how to understand the variations in investor behaviour over time, and how to determine which stocks have limited arbitrage potential. Moreover, empirical evidence highlighted that risk and returns relationships are heterogeneous due to many causes.

In asset pricing testing strategy, the factor and style investing framework has been employed to collect the heterogeneous risk-return relationships. Baker and Wurgler, 2006, 2007; Kaplanski and Levy, 2010; Kurov, 2010) demonstrated that the behavioural finance paradigm is giving an alternative views on the roles of factor and style investing in asset pricing behaviour. In factor investing, it has been observed that the firms' equity risk and returns profile are heterogeneous given different firm and industry characteristics. In style investing, Graff, 2014, behavioural finance interest is to capture specific stocks that are prone to behavioural risks influence.

Based on the above theoretical perspectives, the behavioural asset pricing theory provides theoretical foundation on the roles of both fundamental and behavioural risk factors in asset pricing determinants modelling.

2. Content

The foundations for investor behaviours are found on bounded rational theory, adaptive expectation theory, and theory of mind. Simon said in 1955: "The bounded rational theory asserts that a normal human being is not entirely rational in his/her decision making due to various behavioural heuristics and biases". Brocas and Carrillo, 2000; Hey, 1994 stated that this theory is complemented with the adaptive expectation hypothesis that postulates adaptive rationality of human preference and expectation given that individual decisions are under timeinconsistent preferences, incomplete information, and different learning environment. Meantime, the theory of mind provides a cognitive neuroscience perspective to justify the dual process -cognitive and affective- on the human neural basis that rationalizes the rational -cognitive logic- and irrational -cognitive heuristics and affective bias- affect human decision making stated Camerer et al., 2005; Shimp et al. in 2015.

Shefrin and Statman studied in 1994 the behavioural asset pricing theory that provides theoretical foundation on the roles of both fundamental and behavioural risk factors in asset pricing modelling. Statman assume in 2008 four statements in the behavioural finance asset pricing models (BAPM): (i) investors are normal, (ii) markets are not efficient, (iii) investors design portfolios according to the rules of behavioural portfolio theory, and (iv) expected returns follow behavioural asset pricing theory. The behavioural portfolio theory (Shefrin and Statman, 2000) proposed an optimal portfolio construction that is segregated into multiple mental accounts that resemble both bonds and lottery like features. Shefrin and Statman (1994) stated the behavioural asset pricing theory which focuses on firm features or characteristics that are possibly describe what normal investors want namely utilitarian, expressive, and emotional benefits studied by Shefrin and Statman, 1994; Statman, 2008.

The behavior of the financial market is explained by the study of the limited rational market and the adaptive market hypothesis. Miller suggested in 1987 the limited limited market theory (Bounded-EMH) as the result of rational limited human behavior. Lo introduced the adaptive market hypothesis in 2004, 2005, 2012. Nawrocki and Viole showed in 2014 that these theories provide a theoretical basis for the dynamic behavior of financial markets due to a complex combination of investor behavior that adapts to changes in time, information and technology.

Fundamental factors are based on firm fundamentals and macroeconomic fundamentals. Company fundamentals - The role of accounting variables on stock returns is reported in the equity model (Ohlson (1995)). Graham and Dodd (1934) used the use of accounting information in stock valuation in "the practice of choosing to justify the farm is limited to dividend yields (DY), earnings per share (EPS) and earnings ratio (PER)." These variables are the only information reported in newspapers and are available to all investors. Lee and Lee (2008), Ong et al. (2010), Tee et al. (2009) and Thim et al. (2012) provided empirical evidence to support these statements. For eaxample, the importance of EPS in influencing the return of shares in Malaysia is supported by Pirie and Smith (2008) and Thim et al. (2012). Indeed, support for DY as one of the determinants of return of shares in Malaysia is provided by Pirie and Smith (2008), Dehghani and Chun (2011), Kheradyar et al. (2011) and Lee and Lee (2008), Economic Factors determine the firm's business and therefore return stocks as postulated in the theory of arbitration prices according to Ross, 1976. Clare and Priestley, 1998; Ch'ng and Gupta, 2001, show that "the evidence of macroeconomic factors that are significant in explaining stock prices in Malaysia is not conclusive." This research shows that macroeconomic factors are determinants. Considering several larger macroeconomic variables, three aggregate indicators of the macroeconomic index, namely the Coincident Index (CI), the Lead Index (LEI), and the LAI, are used. Izani and Raflis, 2004 showed that variables were significantly correlated with stock yields in Malaysia.

H1: Company fundamentals determine stock returns.

H2: The main macroeconomic factors determine stocks.

According to the survey provided by the EIB in December 2018, "investment firms remain focused on replacement and tangible assets". The EIB says that "investment in intangible assets is below the EU level (25% vs. 36%)." The innovation-focused analysis of Romanian firms shows that "most innovative firms use solutions rather than their development," says the EIB "Approximately 12% of companies face funding constraints and dependence on domestic sources of funding remains high," the EIB quotes. "Access to finance is a major problem in Romania than in other EU countries, and innovative firms in the field advanced technologies, find it hard to find external financing. "The lack of adequate transport infrastructure is a major obstacle for Romanian companies compared to similar EU enterprises", says the report. "The lack of adequate transport infrastructure is a major obstacle for Romanian companies compared to similar enterprises in the EU", concludes EIB.

This research gives an insight into the theory and practice of price behavior of assets. This research has shown that the asset pricing model includes fundamental risk factors (ie firm and macroeconomic fundamentals) and behavioral variables (ie investor sentiment and emotion), both through rational and irrational elements of investor decision.

Shefrin and Statman in 1994 explained the role of behavioral factors in inventory returns, while the popular behavioral factors invested are investor sentiment and investor sentiment. For sentiment, this article shows that consumer sentiment index (CSI), business conditions index (BCI), and stock index futures (FKLI) are behavioral factors. These indicators represent consumer opinion, business and institutional investors. Mat Nor et al., 2013; Tuyon et al., 2016). (Ahmad and Rahim, 2009, Chan, 1992, Cornell, 1985, Garbade and Silber, 1983, Stoll and Whaley, 1990 used these variables to explain Malaysian behavioral factors, because institutions normally use this mechanism as a hedging mechanism (Tuyon et al., 2016). In terms of emotions, this research proposes an emotional index through the volatility of the stock market, which is the investor's emotion in terms of Taylor (1991) demonstrated that negative events evoked rapid, rapid and social psychological, cognitive and emotional reactions rather than positive ones. Lo and Repin (2002) noted that traders with more experience experienced a stronger excitement in response to short-term market fluctuations than more experienced traders.

H3: Investors' sentiment affects the return on equity.

H4: The investor's emotion determines the stock.

In practice, there are the results of this research that highlight useful practical implications. As a rule, behavioral risks distorting fair fundamentals must be controlled both in risk modeling and in portfolio management. In portfolios management, Shefrin and Statman (2000) created behavioral portfolios theory and showed an optimal portfolio construction that is spread over several mental accounts that resemble both bonds and lottery features. Mauboussin, in 2002, points out that "an adapted investment strategy is argued to be more efficient in a complex market system that changes over time due to constant information and technological change." In line with this intuition, several authors have proposed behavioral investment approaches as follows. Livanas (2007) shows that the value of portfolio gains should be greater than the value of portfolio losses to hedge investors' risk of asymmetric risk tolerance. Ma (2015) described three different ways to develop investment strategies with the ability to adapt to economic regimes, market yields or changes in market volatility. Jacobs and Levy (2014) wrote about the dynamic selection and diversification of the portfolio must take into account the multidimensional source that affects the return on inventories. Montier (2007) highlighted the need to have portfolios and risk diversification strategies.

In theory, investors are assumed to be rational and adaptive human beings, demand for stocks would be influenced by rational (fundamental) and irrational (behavioral) forces. We can reconcile the previous ones with the interdependent behavioral theories of the decision, the limited rational theory (Simon, 1955), the theory of perspectives (Kahneman and Tversky, 1979) and the adaptive expectation of human behavior (Tinbergen, 1939). Moreover, it is important for investor investors that there is a risk that investors will be forced to pay for their investment. Due to the limited adaptive nature of investor behavior, stock prices will have dynamic behavior. Dynamics show that inventory trends in nonlinear fashion relationships and risk / return relationships are heterogeneous under certain conditions. This was shown by previous researchers as (Baur et al., 2012; Blume and Easley, 1992; Fiegenbaum, 1990). The limited-adaptive trait of behaviour behavior of the investor and behavioral dynamics will lead to limited, adaptive market efficiency as postulated in EMH (Miller, 1987) and AMH (Lo, 2004, 2005, 2012). Current research complements the theoretical research of empirical evidence on the predictability and adaptive nature of capital market efficiency / inefficiency (Kim et al., 2011).

Research has studied and found that both fundamental and behavioral risks should influence the return on assets, thus quasi-rational risk factors. Within the multifactorial model of pricing of existing assets, both economic and firm foundations have been recognized as a source of risk in equity investments, namely fundamental risks. They were most investigated separately. Ross's APT framework motivates economic factors, and firm foundations have been investigated according to Graham and Dodd's (1934) own equity model, or Ohlson's own equity modeling model (1995). This research combined these two factors into the multifactorial factor of asset pricing. For macroeconomic factors, instead of using individual economic variables as commonly used, this research uses three macroeconomic indices (coincident index, leadership index, delayed index) that represent large economic variables. For a fundamental farm, this research uses three robust fundamentals (earnings ratio, dividend yield, earnings per share) that are commonly used by industry practitioners to assess equity. In short, all of these fundamental factors are very significant in influencing returns. Behavioral Risks - In the behavioral research of existing asset prices, the risk of popular behavior used is emotion and emotion. In general, these behavioral variables are significant in influencing the return of shares in Malaysia and provide confirmation of evidence of the validity of the BAPM framework (Shefrin and Statman, 1994).

Heterogeneity of risk-return relationships - Given the limited investor rationality, the predictability of risk-return relationships is also expected to be heterogeneous for various reasons. The empirical conditions that determine the heterogeneous relationships between risk and profitability relationships are the characteristics of the industry (Kaplanski and Levy, 2010, Kurov, 2010), the characteristics of the firm (Baker and Wurgler, 2006, 2007), market states in loss and earnings Bassett and Chen, 2001; Lee and Li, 2012; Ni et al., 2015; Pohlman and Ma, 2010). Therefore, in the asset pricing test, the pooling of stocks in similar industry groups and company-specific groups provides companies with a homogeneous feature to correct the possible source of specification (Barber and Lyon, 1997; Filbeck et al., 2013 ). This research examines possible differences in behavioral risk impacts on defensive and speculative industrial stock groups, with the belief that the latter is subject to behavioral prejudices. While company-based subgroups of portfolios are segmented on the basis of size, value and prices due to differences in return on inventories in different company characteristics documented in existing literature (Banz, 1981, Rosenberg et al., 1985, Shefrin, 2000; Drew and Veeraraghavan, 2002). This research classifies the penny stock based on 1 ringgit or lower share price, according to De Moor and Sercu (2013). Behavioral Finance Students have argued that the relationship between stock characteristics and trading behavior is due to different psychological traps (Chang et al., 2015). In particular, company characteristics use investors to distinguish the group that has a higher or more popular relative value. In investment practice, popular stocks are in news and are highly traded by retail investors. As such, popular stocks may be associated with a misinterpretation of farm characteristics, which is not due to fundamental elements (Ibbotson and Idzorek, 2014; Shefrin, 2015).

As far as the small business is concerned, they are recommended by many analysts, despite the fact that they have a higher risk and are highly speculative stocks, because these stocks are attractive, affordable and popular among retail investors with a presence (Bhootra, 2011; Chandra and Reinsten, 2011; Chou et al., 2012; Wood and Zaichkowsky, 2004).

Behaviors have a greater impact in negative situations (with the states in crisis market). Behavioral factors during the crisis period depend and are higher than in non-crisis periods. Influences of fundamental and behavioral risks are stronger in crisis than in non-crisis situations. This judgment is embraced by a higher individual coefficient for these risk factors during the crisis state. Hence, investors are more sensitive and sensitive to negative and negative news. They are panicked in the event of a market crisis.

Analyzing in addition the lag effect of fundamental and behavioral factors on return of inventories, delayed accounting variables are performed to mitigate concerns about the delayed effect of inventory returns. The economic and behavioral effects will be delayed to determine the feedback effects of historical return information. All fundamental and behavioral variables are significant determinants of return of shares. It is noticed that in crisis situations dynamic / risk relations are distorted.

Basic analyzes are conducted by the European Investment Bank (EIB) on Romanian companies samples to observe the current effects of the determinants on stock returns.

The results obtained revealed four models, namely fundamental factors, economic fundamentals, behavioral factors and combined factors. In the first models, all firm and economic fundamentals determine the profitability of stocks. It is noted that all behavioral factors are significant. In the latter model, all fundamental fundamental factors remain significant determinants of risk. However, economic risks and behavioral risks are significant. Statistics show that behavioral factors remain very influential in determining stock returns, followed by firm fundamentals and, ultimately, economic factors with minimal influence on stock performance.

Jacobs and Levy (1988) have introduced the disadvantage of the industry and the effects of the firm on the purification of real resources. Jacobs and Levy, 2014 showed the consistency of this idea. The research in question studies and expands this idea from the perspective of behavioral finance. The ideas of Jacobs and Levy can be expanded through this analysis to provide a discussion of the disaggregation of behavioral effects across different stock groups to find and manage the degree of risk of risky behavior in the equity portfolio.

In the asset pricing model, it is tested on different groups of industrial companies. The industry group can be divided into defensive and cyclic industrial groups. All core risk groups have a significant value in stocks in the defensive industry. Concerning behavioral risks, we can see that only two behavioral risks are significant as risk factors. This is in line with the theory that defensive stocks should be less vulnerable to behavioral risks.

3. Conclusions

"Access to finance is a major problem in Romania than in other EU countries, and innovative firms in the field advanced technologies, find it hard to find external financing. "The lack of adequate transport infrastructure is a major obstacle for Romanian companies compared to similar EU enterprises", says the report. "The lack of adequate transport infrastructure is a major obstacle for Romanian companies compared to similar enterprises in the EU", concludes EIB.

This research gives an insight into the theory and practice of price behavior of assets. This research has shown that the asset pricing model includes fundamental risk factors (ie firm and macroeconomic fundamentals) and behavioral variables (ie investor sentiment and emotion), both through rational and irrational elements of investor decision. Asset pricing is achieved through the factor and style investment Framework to provide behavioral justification on the role of investment characteristics and style. Empirical analysis demonstrates limited instability and heterogeneity of risk factors (dynamic). The previous analysis is in line with the behavioral theories mentioned and previous empirical evidence reflected in the literature of financial behavior. For practitioners, research findings show how we can manage the dynamic risk-return relationship and excessive exposure to behavioral risks using the suggested behavioral risk quadrant. There are many possible sources of behavioral risks, characteristics, style and possibly new elements that can determine the heterogeneity of risk / return relationships in the impact of asset price formation in financial research. These issues need to be investigated in future behavioral pricing research on global assets.

APPLICATIONS OF FAIR VALUE PRICING

Valentin Gabriel CRISTEA

Abstract

The 2008 crisis prolonged and deepened divergences in fair value measurement as the most reliable and other measurement systems. The introduction of IFRS 13 contributed to improved results at the level 3 asset prices observed in companies operating on the Bucharest Stock Exchange. The literature has shown that in International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) 7, different levels of fair value are relevant to value.

This research analyzes market prices of the different levels of fair value hierarchy reported under IFRS 7. It is noted that fair value assets measured at different levels of hierarchy are relevant for value, while liabilities are valued differently.

Keywords: asset, asset prices, pricing, liabilities, fair value measurement, levels of fair value.

1. Introduction

Song et al., 2010, described the model used to calculate the correct values are based on unobserved or firm values generated data and are also referred to as brand-to-model, unlike Level 2 financial instruments.

In this study we specifically discover the effects the requirements of IFRS 7 on the Romanian financial sector were also written by Song et al., 2010 and Goh et al. 2009. The market reaction is examined against the fair value (assets and hierarchy levels reported under IFRS 7). The study applies to all listed companies on the BVB Bucharest Stock Exchange. BVB is relevant in this respect links the economy of Romania and the global economy.

The World Economic Forum (2016) classifies BSE on the largest stock markets in the world, according to the Global Competitiveness Index.

1.1. The different fair value levels

Using the balance sheet and the Ohlson model (1995), the results of this article shows that the fair value of tier 1, 2 and 3 assets as and the fair value of debt level 3 are relevant over time, while the fair value of liabilities 1 and 2 is irrelevant.

The calculations also show that the setting of market prices for the level 2 and 3 fair value assets (debts) is not lower for rating companies the high debt to low debt equity. In this respect, the calculations show that the price at level 3 assets improved by the introduction of IFRS 13 and the position the 2008 financial crisis. The article in question, An additional advantage of this article is that he searches for differentiated prices in the three correct ones value levels for IFRSs when there was a level comprehensive and binding. IFRS 13 shows how to the fair value is measured on the three levels of hierarchy and compare it with pre-IFRS 13. Deaconu et al. (2010) stated that, prior to the mandatory application of IFRS 13, it must to disclose the hierarchy levels in IFRS 7. IFRS refers to the Statement of Financial Accounting Standards (SFAS) 157. SFAS 157 represents the Financial Accounting Standards (FASB) equivalent to IFRS 13; SFAS157 and IFRS 13 to handle the measurement of the fair value and thus to influence the value presentation of IFRS 7. Hopewell Hlatshwayo and Mbalenhle Zulu showed that "Deaconu et al. did not disclose accurately hierarchy in terms of IFRS 7 during the sampling period because there was no complete and mandatory description a fair value measurement standard in accordance with European standards in the IFRS 7 disclosure requirements. "

The introduction of IFRS 13 has had an impact on investors' perception in terms of liquidity and information asymmetry of assets (liabilities) with fair value of level 2 and 3, as they exist now a comprehensive standard dealing with fair value.

The results of this study is important for standard suppliers and investors and will help you understand the impact of fair value hierarchy presentation IFRS 7 in financial sector in Romania.

The article is organized as follows: firstly, relevant literature is presented and it is specified hypotheses. Sample selection is described procedure, data and method of research to be used in the study and then discussing the results of the study, and finally exposing conclusion.

2. Content

Measuring fair value is important because the values of financial instruments presented in the statement the financial position influences the disclosure of the fair value hierarchy of IFRS 7. IFRS 13 defines " fair value as a price that would be received to sell an asset or to pay to transfer a debt into one the orderly transaction between the market participants from measurement data "(IASB 2011). Using the above, we plan to measure the assets and liabilities that are not traded on active markets, because fair values need to be estimated by other methods. IFRS 13 is extremely important for this article because IFRS 7 entry into force before IFRS 13 and fair principles the values of the valuation hierarchies in IFRS 7 are determined by IFRS 13. IFRS 13 is an accounting standard that addresses the measurement of fair value, and before that there was no such approach.

Barth et al. (2001) say that studies of the relevance of value many times examine the relevance and reliability of the amount in question. Barth, Beaver and Landsman 1996; Carrol, Linsmeier and Petroni 2003; Petroni and Wahlen 1995 asserted that the information content carried by the fair values in the financial statements are relevant.

Goh et al. (2009) showed that one of the FV-A objectives is to ensure transparency in evaluation of the financial elements, to allow investors to sound economic.

In some articles, the relevance of the FV-A value is studied have produced incoherent results.

An article written by Goh et al. (2009), using a survey of US bankers, obtained that the level 1 fair value assets are significantly differently valued from fair value assets of levels 2 and 3. Moreover, there were no major differences between the level 2 and 3 assets with fair value. Song et al. (2010) conducted a study on a sample of US banks found that level 1 and 2 fair value assets are significantly different from level 3 of fair value assets. However, they do not record significant differences in pricing at fair value of level 1 and level 2. Deaconu et al., 2010 have obtained similar results to Song et al. in a study conducted on a sample of European banks. Previous results from this study are valuable through its relevance studies and are based on efficient market theory (Deaconu et al., 2010). Deaconu et al. (2010) show that during the financial crisis, in 2008 the markets were not efficient. Thus, the financial crisis might have confused effects on the results of these studies and their recognition, Deaconu et al. cites this as one of the limitations of their study. In these earlier studies, focusing on the periods before and during the 2008 financial crisis, this article focuses on the post-financial crisis of 2008, and also compares the current financial crisis to the financial crisis. Dechow, Myers and Shakespeare 2010 says that "management's decision is necessary to determine the correctness of values to some extent," while Song et al., 2010 assumes that "fair values are inherently subject to error measurement, and this creates an incentive for management to manipulate figures ". Song et al., 2010 states that "the combination of information asymmetry and sensitivity of fair values to management manipulation and error casts doubt on the reliability of fair values. " There is still a debate on the reliability of fair values, although accountant counselors seem to reach consensus on the relevance of fair value.

Some accountants such as Song and co. 2010 asserts in support of the fair value that information extracted using fair value capture the reality better, volatility and ease of financial reporting, while other scholars say that fair values are less verifiable investors because they are inherently prone to a error of estimation greater and susceptible to manipulation by those charged with governance (Penman 2007).

There are arguments against FV-A showing an asymmetry of information challenge between management and investors or owners.

De Klerk, De Villiers and Van Staden 2015 asserts that information asymmetry occurs when people who administer a the entity is different from investors or owners. So, Healy and Palepu 2001 say that "its investors owners will require relevant information to evaluate and monitoring the performance of management or companies. "

The first hypothesis analyzes the relevance of the three values and fair value hierarchy of IFRS 7. It has been established that investors need relevant and reliable information about the future revenues and cash flows.

We set that goal FV-A is to ensure transparency in the financial assessment. IFRS 7 disclosure requirement and valuable instrument categories can be seen as an instrument to achieve it.

Disclosure of different levels of hierarchy of fair value in terms of IFRS 7 allows investors to assess how financial liquidity has been calculated and determined, tools and informational risk associated with fair values.

Goh et al., 2009 concludes that the level 2 and 3 fair values have a higher risk of investor information. This is because Level 1 instruments are traded on active markets and levels, and Level 2 and 3 are not actively traded, but are based on model ratings. In this context, Goh et al. (2009) states that the level 2 and 3 fair values have a higher value, and investor information risk being input from models that are not publicly available. Goh et al. still notice that during anytime economic fluctuations active assets play a crucial role in growth capital and therefore have a price premium as far as they are moderate by liquidity surprises (Holmström and Tyrol 2001).

In contrast to liquid instruments (level 1), we assert that investors want to observe the fair values of illiquid instruments (levels 2 and 3). This argument is supported by Goh et al. through worry during the financial crisis of 2008, there were several banks with the fair values of their assets were below the market especially levels 2 and 3, thus suggesting investors most likely these assets were reduced.

The information asymmetric challenge (information risk) along with a fair value measurement error can cope unreliable amounts. Therefore, this study states that level 2 and 3 fair values are more prone to errors because they use them models of fair value determination, as they have been suggested similarly in studies on this topic (Deaconu et al., 2010, Dechow et al., 2010; Goh et al. 2009).

Epstein and Schneider (2008) show this as poor quality information may have a negative impact on prices, results in the measurement error. And we believe that in the risk of information on level 2 and level 3 levels is high compared to level 1 as it is involved in similar studies (Deaconu et al., 2010, Dechow et al., 2010, Goh et al., 2009; Song and colab. 2010).

Investors will lower asset prices and passives with a high level of information asymmetry (Easley, Hvidkjaer & O'Hara 2002).

Hlatshwayo and Zulu showed in 2019 that "the fair value of assets level 1, 2 and 3, as well as the fair value of liabilities level 3 are value relevant".

Therefore, we affirm that fair value assets of level 1 and the debts will have the highest price combination on (value value) because they are traded on active markets and subject to less or no estimation errors and information risk. For level 2, suppose a relative value less than level 1 as active level 2 and debt is based on models, but higher than level 3.

Finally, we estimate that the level 3 assets and liabilities should have the least relevance of value, because they are based on unseen data, therefore, higher estimation errors and information risks.

Therefore, the first hypothesis is given as follows:

H1: Value of Financial Instruments " the fair values are inversely proportional to the order of the hierarchy level IFRS 7.

The second hypothesis refers to the effect of capital adequacy of the price of assets and liabilities at fair value " levels of hierarchy presented in terms of IFRS 7. Deaconu et al. (2010) affirm that banks with a poor financial position have an incentive to manage earnings by using them discretion to improve reporting on the financial situation.

Goh et al. (2010) noted that the price of investors is the largest brand-to-model asset for banks with a stronger financial position. Unlike level 1 assets and level 1 fair value liabilities, setting fair values for level 2 and level 3 activities and liabilities require management discretion.

Thus, poor capital adequacy increases susceptibility the handling of assets and liabilities with a fair value level 2 and 3 as management discretion is applied in determining them (Deaconu et al., 2010).

The second hypothesis is shown as follows:

H2: market price for 2 and 3 value assets at fair value and the liabilities presented in accordance with IFRS 7 are lower for companies with high indebtedness than companies with a report on reduced equity.

The third hypothesis is about the effect of the introduction of IFRS 13 on the pricing of different financial instruments the values of the fair value hierarchy presented in terms of IFRS 7.

IFRS 7 entered into force before IFRS 13 and previous research suggested that pre-IFRS 13 refers to SFAS 157 for guidance on disclosure of hierarchy levels with respect to IFRS 7.

This article shows that there is a possibility not all IFRS listed on SFAS 157 and having a direct direction taking into account the liquidity and the risk of informing the fair value hierarchy presented in IFRS 7 terms of IFRS 13 period. At level 1, the fair value of assets and liabilities is based on the observable prices market (Goh et al., 2009), liquidity and the risk of information is noticeably diminished. It shows that the market will react differently at levels 2 and 3 assets and liabilities at fair value reported in the period before and after IFRS 13.

The third hypothesis is:

H3: Determination of market prices for value assets 2 and 3 at fair value and obligations presented in accordance with IFRS 7 are expected to be different in the previous period and after IFRS 13.

The fourth hypothesis relates to the effects of the 2008 financial crisis on price setting at fair value hierarchy levels assets and liabilities presented in accordance with IFRS 7.

Studies on this topic have produced incoherent results and is differentiated on the three fair value hierarchies IFRS 7 levels. We affirm that the 2008 financial crisis has had confusing effects on the prices of the different the hierarchy of the fair value assets and liabilities in EUR the terms IFRS 7.

In line with our argument, Deaconu et al. (2010) shows that during the financial crisis of 2008 prices were not effective. Goh et al. (2009) showed that the financial crisis of 2008 had an accentuated liquidity risk and level 2 and risk information 3 assets with fair value. Therefore, it is suggested that it will impact the price differentiation in the three hierarchies levels during or in the period before the 2008 financial crisis.

The fourth hypothesis is expressed as follows:

H4: Differentiated price of assets and liabilities at fair value in the three levels of hierarchy presented in accordance with IFRS 7 will be different during and after the 2008 financial crisis.

Deaconu et al., 2010 proposed the most common model used in the relevance studies of the value of the balance sheet and residual income approach. The balance sheet approach says that asset value (FVA) minus fair value of Liabilities (FVL) is equal to the market value of equity (MVE) (Landsman 1986). Although this approach is easy to understand and apply, its disadvantages are that the fair values of all assets and liabilities must be determined which is not the case; Second, not all assets and liabilities are measured at fair value; and third, not all assets and liabilities are recognized in accordance with IFRS 7 (Deaconu et al., 2010).

Barth and Landsman (1995) state that to highlight the effect off-balance sheet items, net income (NI) should be introduced in the equation to act as an intermediate for these elements.

The Residual Income Approach or the Ohlson Model (1995) tells us that the MVE is equal to the book value of equity (BVE).

The 2008 crisis prolonged and deepened divergences in fair value measurement as the most reliable and other measurement systems. The introduction of IFRS 13 contributed to improved results at the level 3 asset prices observed in companies operating on the Bucharest Stock Exchange. We note that 12.5% of the companies that operate on the Bucharest Stock Exchange are in the banking sector. The literature has shown that in International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) 7, different levels of fair value are relevant to value.

3. Conclusions

"Access to finance is a major problem in Romania than in other EU countries, and innovative firms in the field advanced technologies, find it hard to find external financing. "The lack of adequate transport infrastructure is a major obstacle for Romanian companies compared to similar EU enterprises", says the report. "The lack of adequate transport infrastructure is a major obstacle for Romanian companies compared to similar enterprises in the EU", concludes EIB.

This study analyzes asset pricing and fair value the levels of the hierarchy of commitments in line with IFRS 7.

The article proposes the effects of the high debt the equity ratio and possible price differences, the result of the introduction of IFRS 13 and the impact of IFRS.

During the 2008 financial crisis, H1 results show that fair value assets in the three hierarchy levels are positive associated with share price. Contrary to expectations, the results have been completed that the hierarchical level of debt at fair value level 2 is positive associated with the share price, which presents a gap in literature for future studies. Assets and liabilities at fair value hierarchy levels are different, except for prices for assets at fair value levels 1 and 3. H1 was not confirmed in compliance with the financial sector as a whole, but has been confirmed for the insurance industry as regards fair value assets.

Our results have found that investors in the financial sector does not reduce assets and liabilities at fair value with respect to companies with a high indebtedness, but they place at reducing the value of assets and liabilities at fair value at levels 2 and 3 in the insurance industry. The H3 results show that the introduction of IFRS 13 had the effect of positive effect on asset prices at fair value at level 3 with respect to share price. For H3 we analyzed the differences within it variables between prior and post IFRS 13 and analysis of trend analyzes. Value adjusted after adoption of IFRS 13 increasing, confirming that the results are more explicative in comparison with the previous IFRS 13 period. A limitation of this study is that differences between variables have not been statistically examined, but this can be addressed in the future.

The results in H4 show that compared to the previous period and during the 2008 financial crisis, setting prices at fair value asset level 3 improved in the period following the 2008 financial crisis. However, the explanatory power of the variables used for a low H4 test in the post-crisis period compared to the pre-2008 financial crisis, highlighted by the decline. These tests also included an analysis differences between periods variables during and after the financial crisis of 2008 and trend analysis.

The limitation for the H3 result applies.

There are many possible sources of behavioral risks, characteristics, style and possibly new elements that can determine the heterogeneity of risk / return relationships in the impact of asset price formation in financial research. These issues need to be investigated in future behavioral pricing research on global assets.

APPLYING THE QUALITY MANAGEMENT SYSTEM AND OPTIMIZING ITS COSTS

Andrei DIAMANDESCU

Abstract

The approach of this paper is to optimize the costs of applying the integrated quality management systems in industrial organizations. In this case, the optimization implies the determination of the limit of the costs generated by the quality system to which a maximum benefit is obtained or, in other words, the minimum cost to which the company's activities may materialize in the expected results through the implementation of the quality management system. The cost optimization for quality can be achieved in a complex way that is less used in the practice of organizations by mathematical modeling, or by an easier way – the preferred method by the practitioners – by comparing the performance of the organization with a reference standard (e.g. ISO 9001 ), which captures the difference from performance prior to the implementation of the quality management system. To justify the application of the second way (through comparisons), we propose to present the results of the study conducted by several industrial enterprises in Romania that have implemented the integrated quality management system.

Keywords: optimization, cost of quality, econometric model, quality system, standard

1. Introduction

Currently, most industrial enterprises have integrated quality systems in which, along with ISO 9001, two or more ISO standards have been implemented. In this situation highlighting and optimizing costs for quality becomes more complex, less accurate and costly.

From the study we have undertaken in several industrial enterprises, it has emerged that the quality management system (TQM) based on ISO standards has made a definite improvement in the efficiency and competitiveness of enterprises. Improvement is, however, superior to companies that have implemented an integrated TQM system combined with the implementation of Kaizen continuous quality improvement methods.

As a result, we appreciate that in the future all organizations that will introduce a quality management system will assimilate the system proposed by us, namely the Integrated Management System for Continuous Quality Improvement (SIMICQ). The analysis of the efficiency of such a quality system can be achieved by mathematical modeling, but it is best suited to a methodology based on the evolution of the performance indicators, respectively, of our organization's financial indicators. Therefore, our study aims at developing a methodology for optimizing the quality costs of this model.

2. Optimizing the cost of the quality management system through econometric models

The implementation of the ISO quality system will generate costs on the one hand and benefits on the other hand. The decision of implementation is based on the criterion of economic efficiency, i.e. the impact that the implementation and operation of the system will have on the performance of the organization. This involves recording a minimum cost in order to obtain an expected benefit, or, in other words, getting the maximum benefit at a fixed cost, impact that we can determine with the help of appropriate econometric models. It follows that cost optimization in this case is a typical problem of mathematical analysis whose function, in relation to the objective pursued, may be maximum or minimum, as follows: either a function F for which there is a set of values V belonging to the string of real numbers R and X0 is an element of the R string so that minimizing the cost for an expected result or maximizing the results at a fixed cost can be defined as:

(1) $F(X_0) \leq F(x)$ for minimization

(2) $F(X_0) \geq F(x)$ for maximization

The F (x) function is called the objective function or cost function. It follows that for the optimization of the costs of the quality management system we can use the cost - benefit model which according to relations (1) and (2) is given by the relation:

(3) $VNA = \sum_{n=1}^{D} \frac{B-C}{(1-r)^n}$

In which: [n = 1...D]; VNA = net updated value; B = estimated value results; C = costs;

* Assistant Professor, PhD., „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania (andrei.diamandescu@gmail.com)

r = discount rate; n = reference year; and D = the horizon analyzed in years.

The goal is to maximize VNA, which is the same as determining the minimum costs. The quality generated by the ISO 9001: 2015 standard can be analyzed for a period longer than one year. Thus, to calculate the sum in equation (4) we will include these multiples of years, i.e. $VNA_0$, $VNA_1$, ..., $VNA_D$ for $n_0$ to $n_D$. This series of VNA data allows testing to determine how well the resulting VNA value falls within the proposed limit (E). The best analysis can be done by the chi-square test whose calculation relation is:

$$(4)\ X^2 = \sum (O - E)^2 / E,$$

Where: O = the obtained value; E = the expected value for the VNA

In $VNA_0$, $VNA_1$, ..., $VNA_D$, there is the highest VNA value resulting when the VNA maximum was produced at the lowest cost, that is the optimal cost. We will use the resulting VNA value as a comparison with the proposed VNAE. If this value is within the VNA> VNAE, then the corresponding VNA cost is the optimal cost.

If the difference between $VNA_1$, $VNA_2$, ..., $VNA_D$ is, for example, at 0.95 (Bradley, Hax, Magnanti, 1977) confidence interval for VNA values at time $n_0$, $n_1$, ..., $n_D$ to the degree of freedom 4 (we considered the 5-year period to confirm cost minimization or cost optimization), the chi-square values of the variables analyzed should be equal to or greater than 9.50. The optimal cost is found at the point analyzed for which the difference value is greater than 9.50.

The specialty literature also presents other econometric models that can optimize the cost of the quality system. We mention the Juran model, the Schneidermann model and the improved ISO, Six Sigma econometric models.

2.1. The Juran Model

The basic premise of this model is that the evolution of quality costs in an enterprise is determined by two fundamental variables: prevention costs and failures costs. Each of these cost categories is represented by two curves, one decreasing – the cost of the failures (defects) and another increasing – the costs of prevention and appraisal from the chart in Figure no. 1, and their sum is even the total cost of quality that is sought to be minimized (Figure 1) (Ioniță, 2008).

According to this model, the cost-quality correlation highlights that as the new methods and techniques are implemented to prevent errors, the overall cost of quality is reduced as a result of lower costs due to the defect products. The efficiency with which resources are used in preventive purposes is maintained only up to an optimal point (in Figure 1, the shaded area between points A and B), where the minimum cost is obtained and the quality level is considered optimal. In this interval the costs of defects (Cd) are approximately equal to those of prevention and appraisal (Cp + Ca) of defective products. The efficiency with which preventive resources are used is maintained only at the optimum point where the minimum total cost is obtained. Beyond this optimal area (A and B), increasing the prevention costs leads to a further reduction in the cost of defects, but to a lesser extent compared to effort. Therefore, the total cost of quality increases faster than the quality level. As a result, it is preferable for economic agents to position themselves in the optimal area where there is a balance between the efforts to increase quality and the results that are obtained.

Fig. no. 1. Standard Model of Quality Costs presented by J. M. Juran in 1951

2.2. The Schneidermann Model

This model presents a modern approach to the correlation between cost and quality. The assumption from which it is based is the existence of a theoretical balance between the points corresponding to the minimum total cost, the prevention and appraisal cost and the cost of the failures.

According to the point where the total cost is minimal, a maximum level of quality (quality equivalent to the "zero defects" principle) is achieved, because the implementation of the continuous improvement strategy promoted by the Kaizen management model does not require infinite investment. Because short-term prevention and evaluation costs are cumulative and evolve after the equation of an ascending parable (starting at a minimum), it is considered that these two cost categories may in the long run be zero, while improving the level of quality during the period of use of the good. Thus, in the long-term, it is possible to improve the quality of excellence with low resource consumption. Schneidermann's model therefore relies on the philosophy of excellence, founded in the 1980s, that the quality obtained should not be optimal but perfect in terms of efficiency, which implies minimal expenses, considering being inacceptable the cost-quality correlation promoted by Juran's classic model. In Figure no. 2 it is represented the approach of the cost-quality correlation in the Schneidermann model (Schonberger, 1988, cited by Olaru, 1999).

B. the effects of simplification (long-term) improvement;

Nowadays in the specialty literature, there are presented improved econometric models for optimizing the quality of costs, among which, more significant, we have seen the ISO model and the Six Sigma model.

3. The basis for the decision of implementing the integrated quality management systems by determining the competitiveness gained by the company

If the impact of total quality management system – TQM can be measured by comparing the organization's performance with a benchmark (e.g. ISO 9001) that captures the difference from performance prior to TQM implementation or by optimizing the cost of quality using econometric models that we have presented, in the case of the quality system proposed by us the efficiency / performance will be measured by a methodology based on the analysis of the performance indicators of the organization. This orientation is based on the findings of the companies where we have been documented to prepare this paper, and where the decision to implement cost-optimized quality systems using econometric models is not approved by management.

The results of our research have highlighted several situations that justify the position of managers in this case, as follows:

- The actual reality in industrial enterprises shows that the quality system based on the ISO 9001 standard is outdated, with all industrial enterprises practicing for many years integrated quality systems so, alongside ISO 9001, they were implemented two or more quality standards. In this situation, highlighting and optimizing costs for quality becomes more complex, less accurate and costly;
- By the implementation of the quality system (TQM) based on ISO standards, there has been a definite improvement in the efficiency and competitiveness of enterprises. However, the improvement is clearly superior for companies that have applied the integrated TQM system using Kaizen continuous quality improvement methods;
- In the case of generalizing the integrated management system of continuous improvement of quality, highlighting costs and optimizing them is very complicated.

Since, as we believe, in the near future, all industrial enterprises will move to this new quality system, a methodology should be established to analyze the effectiveness of its implementation, a methodology best suited to the evolution of performance indicators, respectively financial indicators of the company.

4. The system of indicators of economic efficiency analysis of the integrated management system of continuous improvement of quality

The implementation of a quality management system has as its primary objective the performance of the organization. Generally, performance is associated with two key processes – performance management and measurement. Performance measurement appears as a performance management sub process, which focuses mainly on identifying, tracking and communicating performance results using performance indicators. To measure and analyze the performance of some activities, processes, and projects that are essential within the organization, it is recommended to use Key Performance Indicators (KPIs). These indicators are basic elements of the performance measurement and monitoring process that quantifies the achievements of some activities, giving visibility to the performance of organizations. More specifically, once objectives have been set to implement the decision that will lead to increased performance our case – implementation of the chosen quality system, indicators are needed to measure the expected progress. It is this requirement that responds to the KPI, which will show the degree of achievement of the objectives. As a rule, a KPI-type indicator is expressed as a percentage or average, and it should respond in particular to the question, "Why?". Not everything that can be measured is a performance indicator. Thus, the fact that there were found, for example, 20 scrapes is not a KPI, but that there were 25% more scrap and two orders lost due to lack of customer confidence is a KPI.

Therefore, key performance indicators are quantitative measures, both financial and non-financial, on the performance of those tasks, operations or processes within the organization. The most used performance indicators are the financial ones, but the main indicators followed vary according to the industry (production, trade, professional services, etc.) and the function of the company (production, sales, human resources, financial etc.) by destination, could be the following: strategic, managerial or operational.

Strategic indicators provide information to a company's management about: return on invested capital, risk or opportunity, profit on assets used, turnover, market share, share price, employee satisfaction and customer satisfaction.

Managerial indicators provide management information such as availability of resources, effort level, and cost per unit of income.

Operational indicators provide information on individual performance – related to processes, activities, products, specifications, procedures, efficiency.

Although the enterprise's economic and financial performance measurement indicators are considered to refer to past performance, they have very useful information in economic analysis. Thus, the economic efficiency, determined with the help of the financial performance indicators, expresses, in the context of the insider's attributes, precisely the result of the implementation of the quality system, materialized in the continuous improvement of the products, processes, activities and proper involvement of the motivated employees the degree of achievement of the set goals and the satisfaction of a number of customers in line with the company's capabilities and environmental objectives.

For a helpful, meaningful analysis of the objectives we have been pursuing in the case study that we have presented, we have carefully selected the key performance indicators by choosing those who provide the competitive advantages generated by the quality system, are directly related to performance, measurable and provide comparability to various references. In order to highlight the contribution of the implementation and operation of the integrated quality management system to the improvement of the economic and financial results of the analyzed enterprise, we have used the following indicators: turnover (CA), variable costs, variable costs margin (MCV), fixed costs, operational profit, profitability threshold (PR), investment recovery term (T), economic rate of return on investment (RRE), updated net income (VNA), and economic efficiency (R).

5. Applying the proposed method to evaluate the efficiency of quality management system in an industrial company

The company which we will exemplify the proposed method manufactures high-tech electronics and home appliances, used for household needs. It has 2,500 employees and a turnover of 384 million Euros in 2015. The company has implemented an integrated quality management system – ISO 9001: 2008, ISO 14001: 2005, ISO 50001: 2011, implemented in two stages. In 2007 it was implemented the integrated system ISO 9001: 2008 and ISO 14001: 2005, and since January 2014 it was also implemented the ISO 50001: 2011 standard, being a high-energy consumer enterprise.

Together with this integrated quality system, the company has implemented, since 2014, the Kaizen continuous improvement quality management system. Thus, "6 sigma methods", "total productive maintenance", "just in time" have been integrated. As will be shown below, the implementation of the quality management system has had a strong impact on the efficiency of the company.

We have made this case study to demonstrate the efficiency of the implementation and operation of the integrated management system for the continuous improvement of quality in industrial organizations. Thus, we have first analyzed the impact of the implementation of the integrated quality system, comprised of the three previously mentioned standards, for the period 2006-2011 and then the one generated by the combined action of the integrated system and the integrated system of continuous improvement of quality for the period 2011-2015, under the conditions of application of the Kaizen methods.

5.1. Analysis of the efficiency of implementing the integrated quality system in the company during the period 2006-2015

Table 1: Excerpt with the company's financial data before the implementation of the quality management system (Year 2006)

| Economic indicator | Value (thousand Euros) | Percentage of turnover, % |
|---|---|---|
| Turnover | 190,000 | 100.00 |
| Variable costs | 114,750 | 60.39 |
| Variable Cost Margin (MCV) | 75,250 | 39.61 |
| Fixed costs | 66,500 | 35.00 |
| Operational profit | 7,030 | 3.70 |

With these values, the profitability threshold can be determined by the formula:

$$PR = \frac{CF}{MCV} \times 100$$

CV – Variable costs;

MCV – Variable Cost Margin;

PR – Profitability threshold;

CF – Fixed costs;

$PR = \frac{66,500}{75,250} \times 100 = 88.37\%$ of the production capacity

Thus, the profitability threshold expresses the minimum percentage of activity reported to the production capacity, for which the profit is null.

The results show that for the analyzed company the profitability threshold is 88.37% and in absolute values 167907 thousand Euros.

If the variable cost margin is used, determined as a percentage of the turnover, the profitability threshold value is reached, i.e. the minimum value of the turnover for which the profit is null. The calculation formula is:

$PR = \frac{CF}{MCV\%} = \frac{66,500}{39.61\%} = 167,887$ thousand Euros

In the same year, the total costs of non-quality, represented by the cost of internal and external defects, which amounted to 28,000 thousand Euros, equivalent to 14.74% of the turnover, were quantified. This means that, in fact, the actual variable costs were only 75,250 × (100 – 15) = 63,963 thousand Euros, and the difference, amounting to 11,287 thousand Euros, represents non-quality costs.

The successful implementation of the quality management system meant a considerable improvement of the economic indicators, which is noticeable by consulting the company's financial data for 2011 (Table 2).

Table 2: Excerpt with the company's financial data after the implementation of the quality management system (Year 2011)

| Economic indicator | Value (thousand Euros) | Percentage of turnover, % |
|---|---|---|
| Turnover | 253,000 | 100.00 |
| Variable costs | 153,000 | 60.47% |
| Variable Cost Margin (MCV) | 100,000 | 39.53% |
| Fixed costs | 90,330 | 35.70% |
| Operational profit | 12,905 | 5.1% |

As you can see, the value of the turnover reached 253 million Euros. Stabilization of the manufacturing process has led to a reduction in the cost of defects, which has resulted in an 84% increase in profit over 2006.

The results show that the profitability threshold is 90.3% in 2011 and in absolute values of 228,510 thousand Euros.

$PR = \frac{CF}{MCV\%} = \frac{90,330}{39.53\%} = 228,510$ thousand Euros

The fact that the profitability threshold is higher than in 2006 can be explained by the faster growth of turnover and investment.

Also for the year 2011 were quantified the total costs of non-quality, represented by the cost of internal and external defects, which amounted to 23,276 thousand Euros, equivalent to 9.2% of the turnover. This means that, in fact, actual variable costs were only 100,000 × (100 – 9.2) = 90,800 thousand Euros, and the difference of 9,200 thousand euro represents non-quality costs.

The successful implementation of the integrated quality management system and the integrated quality continuous improvement system meant practically an approach to reaching the zero defective target, as can be seen from table no. 3, with the company's financial data for 2015.

Table 3: Excerpt with the company's financial data after the implementation of the integrated quality management system and the integrated quality continuous improvement system (Year 2011)

| Economic indicator | Value (thousand Euros) | Percentage of turnover, % |
|---|---|---|
| Turnover | 384.000 | 100.00 |
| Variable costs | 230.400 | 60.00 |
| Variable Cost Margin (MCV) | 153.600 | 40.00 |
| Fixed costs | 134.400 | 35.00 |
| Operational profit | 19.200 | 5.00 |

As shown in Table 3, the turnover reached 384,000 thousand Euros, representing an increase of 152%. Stabilization of the manufacturing process led to a reduction in the cost of defects, which resulted in an increase in profit of 1.5 times compared to 2011. This means that a 9.2% reduction in defective costs has led to an increase of about 50% profit.

The results show that for the analyzed company the profitability threshold is 87.5%, and in absolute values of 336.000 thousand euro.

$PR = \frac{CF}{MCV\%} = \frac{134,400}{40.00\%} = 336,000$ thousand Euros

Also for the year 2015 were quantified the total costs of non-quality, represented by the cost of internal and external defects, which amounted to 7,680 thousand Euros, (that is, three times lower than in 2011) equivalent to 2.0% of the turnover. This means that, in fact, actual variable costs were only 153,600 × (100 – 2.0) = 150,528 thousand Euros, and the difference of 3,072 thousand Euros represents non-quality costs.

This result shows that by successfully introducing of the integrated quality management system combined with management systems of continuous improvement of quality – Kaizen it was reached the situation very close to zero defects objective (in this appreciation of the result, it must be considered that the integrated management system for continuous quality improvement was only present in three years of the five-year period considered). As a result, we appreciate that in the future all industrial enterprises will move to a quality system of the type that we have presented in this case study. The analysis of the efficiency of such a quality system is best suited to a methodology based on the evolution of performance indicators, respectively, in our case, the financial indicators of the enterprise.

6. Conclusions

It follows that by using the quality management system proposed by us, there is a significant increase in business efficiency and the business is much better protected in case of a potential demand reduction, due to the increased ability of the company to achieve profit. Also, in times of crisis, leadership can earn valuable time to get back on business. At the same time, the possibilities of increasing turnover are improved without any constraints in terms of production capacities or additional investments. However, the benefits obtained are complete only as long as the existing production capacities are fully utilized. This is also the objective of the management, the goal of the owners, but also the interest of the national economy.

AN UNKNOWN TREASURE – HOW DO COMPANIES DETERMINE THE VALUE OF THEIR DATA?

Barbara ENGELS

Abstract

The collection, analysis and exploitation of data are key drivers of the digital economy. But the importance of data for economic success is also increasing in industries that are not primarily associated with the digital economy. The basis of efficient data management is the evaluation of the data processed by the company. This study provides details of the data evaluation methods currently used by German companies. For an empirical analysis, a total of 1,235 firms from different sectors of manufacturing industry and industry-related services were surveyed using the IW-Zukunftspanel 2018. The study asks whether, and for what purposes, companies of different sizes and with different degrees of internationalization and digital orientation determine the value of their data. It also examines the characteristics which lead a company to prefer one data evaluation method over the others. Thus, an overview of the status quo in German corporate data evaluation is built up. The empirical analysis shows that data evaluation is still a side issue for German business. Most companies neither analyse their data now nor intend to do so in the future. Of the companies in this sample, it is mainly those that offer digital products that evaluate their data. Companies are currently unable to capture the potential of the data they possess and hence are unable to exploit the economic potential of digitalization.

1. Introduction

The key drivers of digital transformation are the analysis and processing of data. In the digital economy, data is a central production factor. Even in sectors not primarily attributable to the digital economy, data collection, evaluation and analysis are becoming increasingly important (Yin/Kaynak, 2015). In addition to increasing efficiency and improving production, data management can enable new types of business models. Furthermore, data trading is becoming increasingly important (IDC, 2017). Different companies offer a huge amount of data, including address, market, consumer and spatial data (Dewenter/Lüth, 2018, 20). Data platforms from Industry 4.0, where machine-generated, non-personal data are very important, are less strongly represented so far. One reason for this is that many companies in these industries do not yet manage their data efficiently.

The basis for efficient data management is the ability of the company to evaluate its own data. It needs to be clearly determined what a data set contains and which value it holds for different stakeholders. If a company wants to use data as a production factor, it needs to be able to price its data in order to include it in the production as a cost or profit factor. An evaluation of the data is also indispensable for transferring data to other entities, for example in the context of data trade. Knowing how to determine the value of the data being used by the company contributes to the data sovereignty of the company, and thus to the ability to control data and to use it skillfully and effectively.

This study analyses the extent to which German companies from manufacturing industry and industry-related services sectors determine the value of the data generated or processed in their companies. Through logistic regression analyses, the factors that contribute to the ability and willingness of a company to measure the value of its data are determined. It is also analyzed which methods of data evaluation the companies use and which purposes they pursue through attaching a value to their data.

To the knowledge of the author, this is the first study that empiricially demonstrates the status quo of data evaluation – and hence the potential for data analyses and digital transformation itself. The sample that this analysis is based on – small and medium-sized companies belonging to the manufacturing sector and related sectors – underlines the contribution of this paper, since these companies do not directly belong to the digital economy but have a high digitalization potential within the framework of Industry 4.0. The "data treasure" these companies can take hold of includes data generated by sensors, machine running times and downtimes, and data on product characteristics. This data is used, for example, to make processes more efficient and effective. It can also foster new business models. The analysis and evaluation of these large data sets is becoming a critical success factor.

2. Data

The following analysis is based on an enterprise survey. The sample used is based on the IW-Zukunftspanel conducted in spring 2018. The IW-

* Researcher, MSc., German Economic Institute, Cologne, Germany (e-mail: engels@iwkoeln.de)

Zukunftspanel is a regularly conducted representative survey of managing directors of industrial and industry-related service companies in Germany.[1]The survey includes general data on revenue, industry, age and management structure of the company as well as questions on internationalisation, research and development and innovation activity. In spring 2018, the companies were additionally survey on their data stocks and evaluation.

For the empirical analysis, a total of 1,235 firms from different branches of manufacturing industry and industry-related services were considered. The sample is not representative. Large companies are deliberately overrepresented in order to be able to make comprehensive and broadly-based statements about this subgroup as well. However, this distortion does not play a role in the regression analyses, because they are controlled regarding to the industry and size.

The range of sectors in which the companies surveyed operate is broad. A quarter of the companies surveyed belongs to the metal and electrical industry (excluding mechanical engineering). Almost one fifth belongs to business-related services such as information services, management consulting, auditing, research and development and marketing. As industry-related sectors, logistics and wholesale trade (14 percent) as well as media, iinformation and communication technology (6 percent) are included.

More than two-thirds of the companies have less than 50 employees and one of three even has less than ten employees. One tenth has at least 250 employees. Most of the companies (88 percent) surveyed generated an annual revenue of less than 50 million euros. 27 percent had an annual revenue of up to 1 million euros. With a correlation coefficient of 0.73 there is a clear and statistically significant correlation between the number of employees and the revenue.

The sample also differentiates between digital and non-digital companies. It is assumed that there are different affinities for data evaluation depending on the degree of digital orientation, since data and data sovereignty are particularly important in the digital economy.[2] The survey included an evaluation of the company's own digital maturity as well as the extent to which digital products are part of the company's service offer. Both can, but do not have to be related. Particularly in Industry 4.0, companies focus on digital value-added processes, but often produce non-digital end products or end products with only a few digital components.

The digital maturity of companies was measured by the strength of digitalization of the processes and products (goods or services). 1,177 of the companies surveyed provided information on whether they have virtualised their products, processes or tools in full, in part or not and whether they work with digital models, or whether their business models are based on data models, data analyses or algorithms. 984, or 84 percent, of these 1,177 companies are not rated as digitalized, but as computerized. They therefore tend to use digitalization only partially and in a supportive way (they are rather digitized than digitalized). A clear minority of 16 percent or 193 companies is digitalized. In order to determine the degree of digitalization regarding the company's product offer, the share of total revenue that can be attributed to either entirely digital goods and services (e.g. software, data models, web design), to products with digital components, or to on non-digital products is examined. Non-digital companies are those whose revenue is 100 percent attributable to non-digital products. More than one third of the companies surveyed belong to this group. Only 4 percent of the companies have a revenue that is almost entirely attributable to digital products. 11 percent have a "digital" revenue of more than 50 percent. Overall, the companies surveyed provide digital goods and services only to a moderate level.

There is no strong correlation between digital orientation and the degree of product digitalization in this sample. The correlation coefficient between the two variables is 0.31 and the relationship is statistically significant. Among digital companies, only 15 percent offer only non-digital products; among non-digital companies, the share amounts to 39 percent. All in all, the companies surveyed in Germany are classified as having a low to moderate digital degree. This also renders them very relevant for an analysis of the significance of data evaluation because particularly companies that are still at the beginning of their digitalization possess large data stocks generated in the production process that are neither analysed nor put into efficient use.

3. Data Evaluation Among Companies

A very broad understanding of data has been used in order to determine the extent to which companies determine the value of their data. In this analysis, "evaluation" means defining an economic value, i.e. a monetary value, based on various factors such as quality and currency. Data are per se very heterogeneous. Depending on the source, generator, storage type, analysis method or purpose, numerous classifications can be made:[3] Data can be classified according to their structure (unstructured, structured or semi-structured), their format (e.g. text, image or video file), their reference (person-related, potentially person-related or not person-related) or its generator (machine-generated or not machine-generated). There is also a physical, semantic or syntactic understanding of data. In the present survey, it was left to the respondents' judgement how they view the question they were asked, "Do you determine the value of the data that exist in your company?". It remains unclear how raw or processed the data is that the respondents had in mind. A detailed query of the considered data sets would be desirable because the relevance of the data evaluation probably varies significantly depending on the data characteristics. However, this goes far beyond the scope of this analysis. The empirical analysis shows that the evaluation of data is anything but prevalent among the surveyed companies (Figure 1): Almost 80 percent of the companies do not determine the value of their data, and almost three quarters do not have any plans for a future evaluation either. The fifth of all companies that evaluates data has different evaluation purposes: 9 percent of these companies evaluate their data for internal accounting and reporting purposes, 5 percent for the exchange of data with business partners and 5 percent for both.

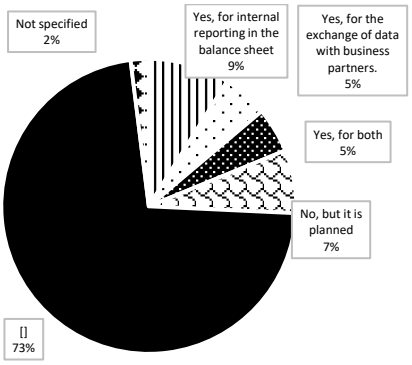
Figure 1: Data evaluation in companies: Share of companies that evaluates data or not (question." Do you determine the value of the data that exist in your company?"); n=1,235



Logistic regression analysis is used to examine which company characteristics influence the probability that a company determines the value of its data (Table 1). The aim is to identify which companies are more likely to be pioneers in this area. The dependent variable is the binary variable "Evaluation of data yes/no". Three models are estimated:

- Model I - General contains the general evaluation as the dependent variable. The enterprise evaluates the data for internal reporting, for the exchange of data with business partners, or for both purposes;
- Model II - Internal contains the internal evaluation as the dependent variable. The company evaluates the data only for internal reporting;
- Model III - External contains the external evaluation as a dependent variable. The enterprise evaluates the data only for the exchange with business partners.

The control variables are the number of employees (different size categories), the revenue (different size categories), the sector, whether companies are engaged in research and development, whether they are innovators, whether they operate internationally, are digitally mature (see above), and what proportion of their revenue is attributable to digital products (see above; different size categories). The category not listed in each case is the basic category to which the resulting estimates refer. This means, for example, that for the control variable "number of employees 10 to 49" the estimated value is compared to those referring to the number of employees in the not specifically listed basic category "less than 10 employees". The numerous control variables reduce the number of companies included in the estimation to 960, as some did not answer the relevant questions. A multicollinearity test showed no alarming multicollinearities that could distort the estimation results. Robustness tests with regressions in which only revenu or number of employees were controlled, but not both at the same time, also lead to reliable results. In order to interpret the results not only qualitatively but also quantitatively, odds ratios were established.

[4] Odds ratio is a measure of association in which two odds are compared with each other. Odds are quotients of the probability that an event will occur and the probability that it will not occur. Odds ratio for the evaluation of data shows by how much greater the probability is that a company will evaluate its data if that company meets a particular property (e.g. being digitally mature) compared to the group without that property.

Table 1 shows which factors significantly increase the probability that a company determines the value of its data. A value of 1 means that the probability is equal to the reference group. This analysis allows the following conclusions:

- The probability that a company evaluates its data increases significantly if the company offers a relatively large number of digital goods and services (product digitalization). However, the strongest effect is not seen among companies with only digital products, but among those that generate more than 50 but less than 95 percent of their sales with digital products. The probability that a company generally evaluates its data increases by a factor of 4.1 if a company generates 95 percent or more of its sales with digital products, and by a factor of 6.4 if the revenue share of digital products is between 50 and 95 percent. This is in comparison to companies with 100 percent non-digital products. However, the small number of cases and the high number of standard errors must be taken into consideration. The probability that a company evaluates its data increases by a factor of 3.6 (2.3) when a company generates 50 percent or more (between 10 and 50 percent) of its revenue with digital and partially digital products. In addition, in the models that analyse internal or external data evaluation, these effects are statistically significant and strongly positive. The highest effects are achieved in Model III (external evaluation). The probability even increases 10-fold if a company owes 50 to 95 percent of its revenue to digital products.
- The revenue has a strong significant effect on the evaluation probability. Again, the highest category value does not produce the strongest effect (except for the internal evaluation). Companies with particularly high sales show no significant effects. On the other hand, the effect for medium-sized companies is significant compared to small companies. The probability that a company evaluates its data increases by a factor of 2.1 if the company has an average revenue (compared to a company with a low revenue of up to EUR 1 million). A similar effect results for the external evaluation.
- Also for the number of employees, there is no estimated effect that constantly increases with the category values. A mid-level category has the only significant value. Revenue and the number of employees therefore influence the probability that companies evaluate their data. However, this does not apply to all size categories. The probability that a company evaluates its data in general changes by a factor of 0.6 if the company has 50 to 249 employees; this means eventually a decrease in probability. The probability of the external evaluation (Model III) changes by a factor of 0.4, i.e. it also decreases relative to the reference group. The estimated value of the internal evaluation (Model II) is not significant. However, in Model II the probability of internal evaluation increases 2.4-fold if the company has 250 employees or more (with a high standard error).
- There are some significant differences depending on the sector, but these are much smaller than those for product digitalization and revenue. It is remarkable that companies from the media and ICT sectors, which are most likely to belong to the data-based digital economy, evaluate their data significantly less ofent than companies from the reference group chemistry/pharmaceuticals. The probability that a company evaluates its data only increases by a factor of 0.4 or 0.3 compared to the reference group if the company belongs to the construction sector or the media/ICT sector. For the construction industry, the probability of internal evaluation changes by only 0.4. Compared to the reference group the probability decreases.
- Research and development, internationalization, being an innovator an being digital mature have no significant impact on the probability that a company evaluates data. The key driver of data evaluation is the degree of product digitalization. This is particularly relevant when focusing on the evaluation of data for the exchange with business partners (external evaluation). The fact that product digitalization has a considerable influence on the probability of data evaluation is logical: Digital products often include or require the [5]Companies with continuous research or development had corresponding expenditures in the years 2015 to 2017. Where such expenditure was not identified every year, research/development was described as occasional.

[6] Innovators are companies that have introduced new or significantly improved products, services or processes since 2015.

[7] Non-international companies are those with no foreign activity. Weakly internationalised companies are those with an export volume of less than 25 percent of turnover. Strongly international companies have an export volume of more than 25 percent of revenue and they have production or research and development partly abroad.

[8] Product digitalization categories are formed according to the percentage of revenues generated by digital products.

analysis and evaluation of data. This applies either to the product itself (in the context of its use) or to the further development and optimisation of the product. If, in an alternative model, the revenue is omitted, for example in order to obtain a higher number of cases, a significant effect of digital maturity is obtained. The probability that a company will generally evaluate its data increases by 1.3 when it is digitally mature, compared to only computerized companies. This also applies to the external evaluation. The internal evaluation does not show a significant coefficient. The quality of the reduced model is lower than that of the initial model. Therefore, the more comprehensive model with the lower number of cases is used.

5. Methods of Data Evaluation

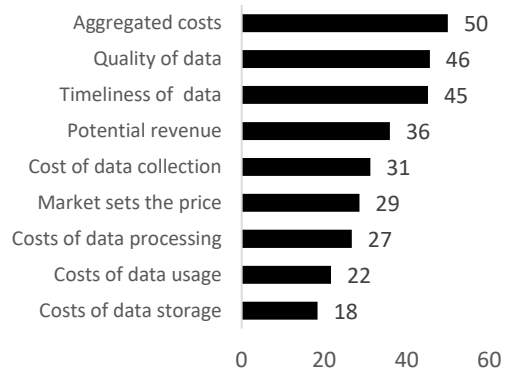
The companies that determine the value of their data were also asked which factors and methods they use to do this. These include cost-based assessments (by cost of collection, storage, processing, use), market-based assessments (potential turnover, market pricing) and property-based assessments (quality and timeliness of data). For simplification, the terms method, factor and aspect are used synonymously in the following. Overall, only a selection of methods is considered in this paper. A full analysis would exceed the scope of this analysis. Figure 2 shows the results based on the IW-Zukunftspanel.

Most companies (50 percent) evaluate their data according to the costs of collection, preparation, use and/or storage. It is reasonable to combine the different types of costs to aggregated costs, as it is difficult to clearly differentiate the costs. 46 percent of the surveyed companies evaluate their data according to quality, followed by timeliness (45 percent). In total, 50 percent of the companies evaluate according to the two related criteria of quality and timeliness. Revenue-oriented evaluation methods follow. Among the cost-oriented methods, the evaluation according to the costs of data collection is particularly relevant; more than 30 percent of companies evaluate data using this aspect. The costs of data storage are almost irrelevant for the companies surveyed.

Figure 2: Methods of Data Evaluation. Share of companies according to data evaluation method, in percent. Multiple answers possible. Number of companies: 218.



On average, the companies consider three factors or aspects when determining the value of their data. Only one fifth uses merely one evaluation method. 12 percent of the companies evaluate their data, but do not consider any of the above aspects. These results show that several aspects play a significant role in data evaluation. There are numerous data evaluation methods that this study could not take into consideration.

There is no difference in the choice of the evaluation method depending on whether the evaluation is made for internal or external purposes. Both the companies that evaluate their data for internal purposes and those that evaluate them for external purposes prefer an evaluation according to costs, followed by quality and the timeliness of the data. Also, among those who evaluate data both for internal and external purposes, these preferences prevail.

Table 2 contains the results of chi-squared tests on the equality of means of the response values of different subsamples of the surveyed companies. These tests can reveal differences between companies according to their characteristics. For this purpose, the surveyed company characteristics (apart from the sector) were defined as two categories per variable. A division of the variables into more than two categories would have led to very small subsamples in the mean value tests, as only a maximum of 218 enterprises commented on the methods of data evaluation. Therefore, regressions based on a small number of cases would not lead to reliable results and are hence dispensed at this point. Instead of distinguishing between four different employee categories, the companies were divided into those with up to 49 and those with at least 50 employees ("many employees"). This limit was also chosen in order to achieve a sufficiently large number of companies in the different categories. A distinction was also made between companies with either small revenue and companies with medium or large revenue ("high revenue"). Companies with digital products are those that generate at least 10 percent of their revenue with digital products. For example, row 1 of Table 2 shows to which extent a statistically significant difference exists when a company determines its data according to costs, data quality or timeliness, potential revenue or market price or not, depending on whether the company is digitally mature or not.

- Digitally mature companies evaluate their data significantly more often according to potential revenue than companies that are not digitally mature. They evaluate them mostly according to quality. This is not shown in Table 2, but in descriptive statistics that are not listed for the sake of space. The same applies to the preferred methods/criteria in the following sections.
- The fact that a company generates less or more than 10 percent of its revenue from digital products has no statistically significant effect on the popularity of the chosen data evaluation method. Companies with digital products most often evaluate their data according to the general costs.
- Companies with research activities evaluate their data less according to the price set by the market than companies that are not active in research. Research companies evaluate more according to the quality of the data, the actuality of the data, the costs in general, the potential revenue and the costs of the collection than non-research companies. For research companies, the quality of the data is most likely to determine the evaluation and not the market price.
- Whether a company is engaged in development or not contributes to small differences in data evaluation. There is only a significant difference in the costs, which developing companies choose significantly more frequently than non-developing companies. Developers most often evaluate according to the general costs.
- When a company is regarded as an innovator, it evaluates its data more in terms of general costs, timeliness of data, potential revenue and cost of use than a non-innovative company. Innovators evaluate most often according to the timeliness of the data.
- Internationally operating companies evaluate their data significantly more often according to the costs than nationally operating companies. They are most likely to evaluate their data based on general costs.
- Companies with a particularly large number of employees rate the timeliness of the data significantly more often than companies with few employees. It is their preferred method of data evaluation.
- The same applies to companies with high revenues compared to companies with lower revenues, except that companies with high revenues primarily evaluate the quality of the data.

Overall, there is no clear preference among companies for an evaluation method. This indicates how complex the evaluation of data sets is in practice. It is remarkable that innovative, researching and digitally mature companies evaluate the quality and timeliness of the data. In addition to the quality and timeliness of the data, the costs also matter. Cost evaluation is a more rational, conservative evaluation method, which is not necessarily effective for data trading, where the potential benefits of both the supplier and the customer, and thus the potential revenue, must be considered. However, the companies surveyed tend not to use market-related evaluation methods. Only digitally mature companies are pioneers in this area and evaluate their data significantly more often according to the potential revenue the data could generate.

6. Conclusion

This empirical analysis concludes that the evaluation of data among German industrial companies and companies from industry-related services sectors is still a marginal issue. Most companies do not evaluate their data and do not intend it either. Among the companies in this sample, it is mainly those that offer digital products that evaluate their data. Data that is collected along the value chain is still a black box for most companies in industry and industry-related sectors. Companies are currently unable to capture the potential of the data they possess. Only a few companies obviously know what their data or data sets are worth.[9]

If German industrial companies and companies from industry-related sectors evaluate their data, they usually use more than one method for data evaluation. A preference for a specific method is not evident from the analysis. This underlines the complexity of data evaluation in practice. Most of the times, companies evaluate their data either according to costs in general, or according to the quality and timeliness of the data. It is advisable to provide companies with standardized assessment tools in order to better assess the quality and timeliness of the data. Standards in data evaluation could also lead to more consistent evaluations and better comparability of data sets, which could simplify their trading and handling inside and outside the company. Organized data infrastructures that offer a clear technological and legal framework could, in addition to further research in this area, lead more companies to use the opportunities offered by data management and consequently better exploit the potential of digitalization.

THEORETICAL APPROACHES ON OPTIMAL CAPITAL STRUCTURE

Maria Zenovia GRIGORE[*]
Mariana GURĂU[]

Abstract

F. Modigliani and M. Miller demonstrated in 1958 that in the context of perfect market the financial structure of the firm does not influence its value. Since then, many researchers have approached the issue of financial structure in less restrictive hypotheses. Without reaching a consensus, they have tried to prove that the optimal capital structure exists. The goal of this article is to synthesize the literature on the financial structure and to relate the theories to known empirical evidence. The main models of the optimal financial structure belong to the agency theory, the signalling theory, the transaction cost economics and the pecking order theory.

Financing decision varies according to a number of factors that may influence capital structure differently: firm profitability, dividend policy, growth opportunities, asset specificity, corporate tax shield, company size and some macroeconomic factors such as inflation rate and capital market condition.

Keywords: optimal financial structure, agency theory, signalling theory, transaction cost economics, pecking order theory

1. Introduction

The capital structure of a firm is the relative proportions of debt (bank loans or bonds issuance) and equity (common and preferred stocks) in the total financing of its assets. Planning the capital structure leads to optimizing the use of funds and the ability of adapting easily to environmental changes.

The goal of this work is to synthesize the theories on the capital structure and where is possible, to relate these theories to known empirical evidence.

An archetypal construction of the image of a theory that relies on a set of hypothesis empirically tested in order to describe the information as foundation element required for the fulfilment of the needs of a company has been shaped by professor Raymond J. Chambers in the '50s. Using this framework as a preceding mechanism to the formation of the positive theory leads to the idea that the theories can present a set of objectives and hypothetical realities based on a process rich in theoretical knowledge.[1]

The first theorists who analysed the optimal capital structure are F. Modigliani and M. Miller who claimed in 1958 that the value of the enterprise is the same regardless of its financial structure[2]. Their research was based on the hypotese of no taxes (either personal or corporate). Five years later, the two authors reverted to this statement, pointing out that in the presence of corporate income tax, the value of an indebted firm is equal to the value of an unindebted firm, increased by the tax savings achieved as a result of indebtedness[3].

The main criticism that can be attributed to F. Modigliani and M. Miller's model is its unrealistic assumptions. According to the two authors, the only goal of the company is to produce cash-flow and share it between shareholders and creditors. They consider that managers always act according to the shareholders' interests and there are no conflicts between the objectives of the creditors and those of the shareholders. For F. Modigliani and M Miller the majority shareholders and the minority shareholders have the same objectives. In addition, information is accessible to all and there is no information asymmetry between those who hold capital and those who need it.

Since F. Modigliani and M. Miller, many researchers have approached the study of the corporate capital structure based on less restrictive hypotheses, trying to find the optimal capital structure. In this paper will be analysed the most relevant results of these researches, namely the agency theory, the signalling theory, the contracting cost theory and the pecking order theory.

2. Theoretical approaches on optimal capital structure

2.1. The financing decision and the agency theory

In the agency theory, the company is no longer seen as an actor, aiming to maximize profit, but as a group of partners, each with its own goal. The company's behaviour is comparable to the market, in the sense that it is the result of a complex balancing process. Different participants in the life of the enterprise (managers, shareholders, creditors, employees etc.), taken separately, have certain goals and interests that are not necessarily conciliatory in a spontaneous manner. Consequently, conflicts can arise between them, especially since the function of the modern enterprise, based on the separation of property and power, requires that the administration be entrusted to managers by those who hold the funds.

The optimal financial structure results from a compromise between the different types of capital (equity or debts) that can solve these divergences of interests, considering that leverage and use of equity diminish certain conflicts and induce others. This financial structure should allow maximizing the company's global value.

In the agency theory, indebtedness is considered a way to resolve potential conflicts between managers and shareholders. In 1976, M. Jensen and W. Meckling[4] showed that in order to find the optimal financial structure of the firm, two consequences of indebtedness must be taken into account:

- In the presence of corporate income tax, managers are interested in indebtedness because interest expenses are deductible leading to reduced corporate tax and net profit growth;
- The indebtedness generates three types of agency costs: control costs (for shareholders) and justification costs (for managers); costs caused by the risks related to the firm's investments, which lead to the increase of the interest rate required by the creditors; bankruptcy costs.

The indebtedness allows shareholders and managers to adhere to same objectives.

Companies are interested to indebt until the point on the increase of its value owed to the financed investments will be equal to the marginal costs generated by the indebtedness. The optimal level of indebtedness is the one that allows the minimization of overall agency costs.

The indebtedness incites managers to be efficient. More the company is indebted, more its bankruptcy risk is higher. For managers the bankruptcy means generally losing their jobs, the remunerations and other advantages. For this reason managers will aim to maximize cash-flow and choose investment projects with positive net present value. In the absence of indebtedness, the bankruptcy risk is limited, but the market will assume that the managers do not aim maximum performance. The value of the company will decrease and, if there exists a managers' co-interest system (remuneration related to the value of company shares), they will lose.

For shareholders, the indebtedness has two advantages over the issuance of new shares. The first is the leverage effect on the return on equity. The second advantage is that the loan does not lead to dilution of the share capital.

The indebtedness resolves certain conflicts of interest between shareholders and managers, but generates new conflicts (between shareholders, sometimes allied with managers, and creditors) and costs (costs of bankruptcy and reorganization, agency costs, monitoring costs).

Allying, shareholders and managers can divert in their advantage part from the company's assets to the detriment of the creditors. For example, they can use a loan to distribute dividends.

In a company with high debts reported to the equity, the owners of the firm could be tempted to take excessively risky projects. Shareholders will practically benefit from all the advantages if the investments turn out to be profitable. Otherwise, most of the losses are borne by the creditors. The interests of creditors and shareholders are therefore in direct conflict. This inefficiency is one of the costs of indebtedness.

Creditors know that shareholders are tempted to choose risky investments or to incite managers to do so. Therefore, they may include in the loan agreement clauses that restrict the managers' abilities to make risky investments on the duration of the loan agreement or clauses that allow creditors to demand early repayment of the debt in case of excessive risk.

The second problem of over-indebtedness is the company's inability to finance profitable investments because its indebtedness level is too high. For example, a company with a debt of EUR 10,000,000 has the opportunity to make an investment of EUR 5,000,000 with a gross profit of EUR 12,000,000 and a net present value of EUR 7,000,000. If the EUR 10,000,000 loan clauses provide for the priority reimbursement of this debt, then no new lender or investor will want to fund the new investment. From the net profit of EUR 12,000,000, the first EUR 10,000,000 will go directly to current creditors, leaving only EUR 2,000,000 instead of EUR 5,000,000 to repay the new loan. This investment cannot therefore be realized, resulting in a loss of value.

In order to find solutions to the conflicts that may arise between shareholders and managers on the one hand and creditors on the other hand, it is necessary to look for the means by which shareholders and managers are prevented from acquiring a share of the wealth of the enterprise to the detriment of the creditors. Therefore, it is necessary to try to limit or avoid decisions that increase the risk of company's assets or that lead to sub-investment and tend to reduce the value of existing debts, even if this involves a decrease of the company's value. In addition to the various legal subtleties that can be incorporated into loan agreements, other solutions are also in practice:

A solution to resolve these conflicts is the special clauses set out in the loan agreement, such as: guarantees or security clauses, setting limits on debt, dividend distribution limitation clauses and early repayment clauses.

[4] M. Jensen and W. Meckling, Theory of the firm: Managerial behavior, agency costs and ownership structure, Journal of Financial Economics, vol. 3, octombrie 1976

Another solution is the issuance of convertible bonds or bonds with stock option. The convertibility clause or the exercise of the stock option may prompt the current shareholders to change the structure and risk of the asset portfolio in order to increase their long-term profit, as this could also come to the bondholders who are potential shareholders.

2.2. The capital structure and the signalling theory

Empirical studies demonstrated that the announcement of a stock issue can drive down the stock price, while additional indebtedness leads to an increase in the stock price. In addition, for complex securities transactions (such as shares with priority of dividends or convertible bonds) or for the simultaneous sale and purchase of securities of various forms (such as bond issue to finance share repurchase), we can see that the more issued securities are more like equity, the more the stock will fall. All of these findings can be explained by the signalling theory.

The basis of the signalling theory is the concept of information asymmetry. Managers of a company know more than outside investors (shareholders or creditors) about the profitability and prospects of the company. Hence, investors may be interested in a signalling activity done by managers.

The information disseminated by managers is not necessarily true. According to the signalling theory, the managers of the performing firms can send specific and effective signals that separate these companies from the non-performing ones. The particularity of these signals is that they are difficult to be imitated by the non-performing companies. The most used signals of this type are the capital structure, the dividend policy or the use of complex financial securities.

Another signal regarding the value of the firm is the degree of diversification of the portfolio of a majority shareholder. If he owns a profitable investment project, he will affect a large part of his savings for this project, to the detriment of other forms of placement. Given the asymmetry of information, the low degree of diversification of his portfolio can be interpreted as a signalling activity tending to prove the value of the project to the market.

Starting from this observation, H. Leland and D. Pyle[5] argue that the value of a company is positively correlated with the share of capital held by the majority shareholder. Any change in the portfolio of the majority shareholder will lead to a change in the market's perception of future cash flows.

Research in this direction is continued by S. Ross[6] who deduces that the financial structure chosen by the managers for their company is a signal regarding the type of the firm. For S. Ross, the market only evaluates the perceived cash flow. Managers, who have privileged information about these flows, can make changes in the financial structure of their business and thus change the perception of the market. Managers must derive an interest in the issuance of these signals and be penalized for the issuance of a misleading signal. A good company is therefore the one that borrows and repays the debts at maturity, according to the loan agreements. The model proposed by S. Ross[7] consists of the balance based on the combination between a signalling activity and an incentive system. This model leads to the following conclusions, which can be compared to those of M. Miller and F. Modigliani: the cost of capital is independent of the financing decision, even if the level of indebtedness is specific to each enterprise; bankruptcy risk is an increasing function of the level of indebtedness.

Despite the reserves and criticisms addressed to S. Ross's model, it presents a coherent theory of the financial structure of the enterprise.

2.3. Transaction cost economics and the financing decision

The contracting cost theories have their origin in the "Nature of the Firm" of Ronald Coase[8], and were developed later by Oliver Williamson in "Markets and Hierarchies"[9]. One of the contractual theories is known as Transaction Cost Economics (TCE) and comes from the work of these authors. TCE argues that in some circumstances a hierarchy (a firm) can make a more efficient allocation of resources than a market (a bargaining system). This is due to imperfections in markets such as imperfect information and bounded rationality. These imperfections generate three types of transaction costs:

- Information costs: costs associated with searching relevant information and meeting the agents with whom the exchange will take place. For example, stock brokers mediate the market transactions of investors and their fees reflect the information costs.
- Bargaining costs: costs associated with coming to a reasonable agreement and drawing up an appropriate contract.
- Policing and enforcement costs: costs related to supervising the fulfilment of the contract and make sure that the other party sticks to the terms of the contract. This category includes the litigation costs.

O. Williamson starts from the observation that after signing a contract, the parties to the contract (shareholders, managers, creditors) can change their behaviour to their advantage, which can lead to perpetual ex-post adjustments to make the long-term contractual relationship viable. In the case of a financing contract, the issue of debt or equity is no longer just a source of funding, but also a means by which these adjustments are made. It is a different approach to what has been presented so far, because the financing decision is taken according to the company's assets, not its liabilities. The decision to issue debts or equity to fund an investment project is similar to the company's decision to buy a product from the market or to produce itself. Loan financing corresponds to the market, while equity financing is closer to the hierarchy.

According to Williamson[10], the choice of funds will be determined by the degree of specificity of the assets. Asset specificity can take a variety of forms, including: location specificity (a buyer or seller locates its facilities next to the other to economize on inventories or transportation costs), physical asset specificity (investments are made in specialized equipment or tooling designed for a particular customer), human capital specificity (one or both of the parties develop skills or knowledge specific to the buyer-seller relationship) etc.

Investment in a specific asset is generally the subject of incomplete contracts between the firm and investors to allow significant subsequent adaptations. The issue of equity is more efficient than the debt to make these adjustments. For example, if the specific investment is a research and development project, the shareholders will tolerate more than the creditors the fact that it does not generate the expected profitability within the planned deadlines.

Instead, indebtedness does not allow for ex-post adjustments because the interest must be paid at regular intervals, the loan must be reimbursed at the due dates, otherwise bankruptcy procedure will occur. Moreover, if the investment is specific, the borrowers will fear this potential bankruptcy and therefore require very high interest rates.

If the asset funded is not specific, debt, which is a simpler financing formula, seems more appropriate. Indeed, the probability of making ex-post adjustments is minimal since this investment will probably generate income more regularly.

In some situations the most advantageous form of financing is leasing, which corresponds to the hybrid form of organization.

Suppose an enterprise needs regular (not specific) equipment and that the purchase of products resulting from the use of this equipment is defective or unsatisfactory. We also believe that this equipment easily supports intensive use (its maintenance and overheating costs are low). Under these circumstances, the most advantageous way for a company to obtain those products is by using that asset under a leasing contract. Firstly, the company has no interest in being the owner and user of the equipment at the same time, the cost of use being the same. Secondly, the owner (the lessor) can specialize in this type of equipment and can resume and rent the equipment more efficiently than a financial lender could do. Leasing appears for the asset considered as the lowest-cost financing method.

2.4. The pecking order theory and the optimal capital structure

If for O. Williamson the specificity of the assets explains the choice of financing mode and therefore the financial structure, for S. Myers and Majluf[11] the preference for a particular way of financing has another explanation.

S. Myers sees the firm as a coalition seeking to increase the volume of corporate wealth, which is made up of equity and organizational surplus. The last one reflects the present value of the costs of overly high wages, too many staff, gratuities, and so on. Creditors can impose reduction of the organizational surplus if the reimbursement of the debt or the payment of interest is compromised. This situation can be avoided if the company is financed by internal funds, meaning by earnings retained and reinvested.

If it is necessary to resort to external financing, the issue of debts will be preferred over the issue of equity that would implicitly require the distribution of additional dividends. The indebtedness has a minor effect on stock price. There is less scope for debt to be misvalued and therefore an issue of debt is a less worrisome signal to investors.

According to the pecking order theory of capital structure companies prefer internal finance, because these funds are raised without sending any adverse signals that may lower the stock price. If external finance is required, firms issue debts first and issue equity only as a last resort. This pecking order is due to the fact that investors consider the debt issue as a good omen and the equity issue as a bad omen.

The pecking order theory seems to work best for mature, profitable companies of most business. But there are exceptions. For example, fast-growing high-tech firms often issue common stock to finance their investments.

3. Conclusions

Considerable work has been done to test the validity of the main theories of capital structure. Table 1 shows a summary of the origins and evidence of these theories.

The inventory of empirical works shows that there is no clear solution for finding the optimal financial structure. The four theories analyzed and their outcomes are valid only under certain conditions and with certain limitations. The conflict arises also between the outcomes and recommendations of the various theories that are often mutually exclusive.

[11] S. Myers and N. Majluf, Corporate financing and investment decisions when firms have information that investors do not have, Journal of Financial Economies, vol. 13, Iunie 1984

In conclusion, there are many factors affecting the capital structure of firms. The most prominent factors that have been correlated to leverage are:

- Firm profitability. The pecking order theory hypothesises that profitability is inversely related to leverage. In contrast, the agency and signalling theories suggest that profitability is directly related to leverage for two reasons: to take advantage of the interest tax shields associated with higher leverage, and to discipline managers by paying out cash to creditors instead of wasting the funds on negative net present value projects.
- Asset specificity. The general consensus among researchers is that debt financing is suitable for low specificity assets, and equity is preferred when the level of specificity is high.
- Size of the company. Size can be considered as an explanatory predictor for variations in firm leverage. Several financial theorists consider that the larger firms can negotiate for loans on more favourable terms, so are more likely to take on more debt than smaller firms. In addition, banks prefer to loan larger firms because they are less risky than smaller firms. Other analysts argue that the fixed costs associated with equity issues should be smaller for large firms. On that account, the company's size should be inversely correlated to leverage.
- Age of the company. Age plays a significant role on firms' ability to acquire debt. Older firms are deemed to be more stable and thus more reputable due to their ability to survive over a longer period of time. Therefore, the prediction is that older firms will have more long term debt in their capital structures.
- Growth prospects. The general consensus among researchers is that growth opportunities are negatively related to leverage, principally because future growth prospects are intangible and hence cannot be easily collateralised.
- Corporate income tax. Modigliani and Miller demonstrated that the tax savings associated with interest tax shields induce firms to take on more debt. Therefore, a positive association between tax and leverage should be observed.
- Dividend policies. Empirical evidence on the relevancy of dividend policy has provided conclusive evidence on the dividend signalling theory, which suggests that dividend increases are associated with managements' confidence of future stability of cash flows. Dividend pay-out ratio is theoretically predicted to be negatively correlated to leverage due to the positive association between dividend pay-out and the market value of equity.
- Institutional, legal and financial factors. Fan, Titman and Twite (2008: 2) examine a cross-section of firms in a heterogeneous sample of firms in 39 countries, and they conclude that institutional differences are an important determining factor of capital structure choices compared to other factors like industry affiliation. For example, they document that firms tend to use less debt in countries where dividends are preferentially taxed.

The cost-benefit analysis of the funding options allows for the optimal financial structure.

Abstract

The accounting community is currently focusing on harmonizing accounting rules by creating a common accounting language at global level to increase the comparability and relevance of financial reporting information.

The current requirements of reporting standards for presenting a true and fair image of the financial position have evolved from the practical necessities imposed by the activity of the economic entities. In this respect, it is necessary to reposition the regulations which define the concrete techniques for assessing the items presented in the balance sheet and in the income statement.

In the accounting field, financial information is important for the users. It can be influenced by accounting policies, by the methods of valuation chosen by the specialist.

This article is a point of view on the requirements of financial reporting, with particular emphasis on the valuation for the presentation of balance sheet and income statement. In Romania, in the absence of a tradition in this field, there is a risk aversion when it comes to evaluating for the purpose of presentation in the financial statements.

We included in these paper an advisory study involving professional accountants and presented their point of view in the field of valuation at different times of the financial year.

Introduction

Accounting theory was developed to support and unify accounting practices, by providing explanations targeted at defining it and served as a force of understanding necessary to ensure a system and logic for accounting practice. In time, the concepts of accounting theory and accounting practice were separate, and sometimes even they came to be contradictory. The practice has become less dependent on random and error.

Accounting research has progressively evolved from normative research to an empirical approach. Regarding the evolution of economic sciences, the introduction of a positive approach required the use of new tools whose first experiments were made on the validation of the decision-making utility hypothesis of accounting information.

Empirical tests have highlighted that the market has the power to predict the content of accounting information to be made public, which has raised the question of the nature of the usefulness of accounting rules and, in general, of the institutional role of accounting as a system for producing financial information.

This article is a synthesis of the research conducted with the objective of developing the concept of positive accounting research and reflecting the importance and timeliness of the assumptions regarding the accounting practices of the entities formulated and tested by positive steps.

In Romanian modern accounting reglementation there was a strong instability. For studding the risk aversion of accounting specialists when choosing accounting policies is necessary an approach to the relationship between accounting and taxation.

The notion of disconnection between accounting and taxation (fiscality) is pretty new. This is the reason for what there are a fear about valuation in the circumstances where taxation does not recognizes it.

In the absence of a modern accounting tradition, the accountant prefers to apply taxation rules in accounting purposes.

This is not a new topic in our work, we already studied the role of accounting policies in the image provided from financial statement, but in this paper we intend to include an advisory study involving professional accountants and provide their point of view in the field of valuation at different times of the financial year.

For this purpose, we have tried to involve fifty five accountant from companies with different business areas. Forty nine accountant have accepted to answer at our questions.

When we started the study, our intention was to detect the opinion of the accountant about the accounting policies, but we have met the ignorance about the difference between valuation and revaluation, between fiscal and accounting depreciation, between fiscal and accounting economic life of fixed assets.

 PhD, Associate Professor, Nicolae Titulescu University, Bucharest, (e-mail: mgrigore@univnt.ro)

At the end of the study we will analyze how the participants in the economic circuit, users of financial information, are affected by this relation starting from the goals of each area.

The topic we approached was analyzed by many researchers.

About the disconnection between accounting and taxation in Oprean and Oprean[1], 2012, p. 20) opinion the synchronization with the accounting firm's taxation system converges towards developing accounting methodologies by which to mitigate and to eliminate the carrying distorted representation of reality and to express achieving equity in financial accounting reports.

According to Băcanu[2] "The similarities between the accounting objectives and the taxation objectives are only at a general level. Thus, both for accounting and taxation there are various secondary objectives, which joined together help for fulfilling a main objective".

1. The Accountant's Aversion To Risk When Choosing Accounting Policies

The objective of accounting (financial statements) is to provide a true and fair view regarding financial information about the reporting entity that is useful to existing and potential investors, lenders and other creditors in the decisions they take on providing resources to the entity.

Information about the financial position aims:

- economic resources controlled by the entity and that are useful for anticipating the entity's ability to generate future economic benefits;
- structure of funding sources, it is necessary to anticipate future needs credit and the possibility of obtaining such loans;
- the distribution of profits and future cash flows, liquidity, solvency of the entity and the ability to adapt to changes in the economic environment in which it operates.

Those who prepare the financial statements are people, and certainly their subjectivism also intervenes. Thus, besides the accounting objective, the company, the tax and the professional accountant also intervene. The accountant is the one that has to answer to all these objectives.

The objective of taxation consists in calculating, charging, placing, tracking payment of taxes and contributions due from economic units, state.

These objectives are achieved by promoting financial policy economic and social. Taxes are a form of sampling a part of the income or property of individuals or legal entities to the state to cover its expenses. This sampling is necessarily non-refundable basis and without consideration of the state. It is necessary that fiscal rules to be known and respected as from payer and the tax authorities.

The objective of the economic entity, of the owner is to make a profit. Ownership unbundling and power within the entity favored the development and other objectives, but whose implementation remains subject to obtaining a satisfactory profit. These goals relate to increasing or maximizing sales and the quality of service rendered or goods.

Making a profit remains, therefore, the first purpose of the entity, but not only.

The accountant objective is to achieve the first three objectives respecting accounting and tax rules so that:

- To present a true and fair view of the financial position, financial performance of the entity and changes in financial position and financial performance (the objective of accounting);
- Ensure the correctness of the calculation and recording taxes owed by the economic entity (which consists of fiscal objective);
- To build the desired result as beneficial owners using tax incentives and accounting and tax treatments, when the choice (within the limits of the objectives of the two fields of accounting and taxation).

In this study we will consider the behavior of the professional accountant, his choices in respecting the three objectives, considering his concern to circumvent the risks.

A comprehensive global financial reporting framework provides greater comparability of financial information, ensures the quality and transparency of financial information, increases user confidence in accounting information.

In order to create such a reporting framework, pursuing the reduction of creative accounting practices and accounting fraud, accounting research focuses on studies on the standardization of corporate governance practices among issuers in different market segments, the harmonization of accounting policies and practices, the laying down of interpretative provisions, allowing for the alignment of the accounting policies of the totally new operations that are basically ignored by current practices, reducing the number of options permitted by accounting policies and their interpretive delineation.

Emphasizing the conformity of annual financial statements with the provisions of accounting reference regarding their true image, M. Ristea[3] underlines the fact that the conformities with the provisions from accounting regulations do not exclude the presence of some liberties.

For the realization of the empirical study we used as scientific research methodology, the accounting positivism, based on hypotheses, even arbitrary, proceed to their empirical testing based on observed data, seeking to explain and predict facts that identify an accountant predictable behavior. Focus of accounting theory is not represented by a conceptual edifice, the whole accounting postulates and principles, because principles are intended now to explain the experimental results without themselves being explained. "If the assumptions do not correspond to the results of empirical observation, theory is invalidated, requiring either abandoning assumptions either their reformulation.

As a research method, we used questionnaire-based research and, as a form of research, the statistical survey.

The questionnaire is a data collection method that includes a predetermined set of questions, built for information or opinion analysis, transmitted directly or by mail to designated respondents in a specific manner.

Respondents should complete the questionnaire without the researcher's assistance, which diminishes the response rate. On the other hand, it is necessary to follow the relevance in the questioning of the questionnaire, which will ensure a short time that should be invested in order to respond and interest for the respondent. The format, content and mode of expression are key elements of the questionnaire. In this respect, an optimal wording must be found that does not bother the respondent, but at the same time ensures access to all the information the researcher needs.

We wrote the questionnaire using both closed questions (which involve answers by simply ticking a variant), but also open questions that offer the possibility of personalizing the response where the respondent considers it necessary.

Closed questions are characterized by the provision of predefined responses, which facilitates comparisons and analysis of the collected information, ensuring a higher understanding of the questions, and the information obtained is of great relevance to the study undertaken.

Open questions are used to test more complex elements that do not know all the categories of response and are usually used to establish the point of view of each respondent.

Open questions are directed to the outline of the professional judgment used in drawing the financial statements.

Respondents also had the opportunity to add their comments if the answers provided did not fully represent their point of view.

We took into account the boundaries of a survey based on a questionnaire reflecting the lack of flexibility, the low response rate, the lack of control over the studied environment, the impossibility of spontaneous reactions.

The general hypothesis of the study is: In choosing the accounting policies, the accountants are prudent, they don't like the risks.

The study was conducted between January and March 2019, and the analysis was conducted on the basis of a sample of fifty-three different business entities, small and medium-sized companies that prepare simplified financial statements.

Our approach resulted in receiving fifty-three completed questionnaires. In the process of building the database for information processing, four questionnaires were filled in incorrectly. Wrongful questionnaires were not considered.

After the first selection stage, there were forty-nine questionnaires. Of these, thirty come from companies that have their own accounting department, of which twelve have part-time employees, and eighteen have full-time employees. Nineteen of the respondent companies chose to outsource the accounting service.

Thus, the responses taken into account and analyzed were received from forty-nine enterprises: thirty with their own accounting department and nineteen enterprises that turned to accountancy firms, information that we systematized in the following table:

<tr><td rowspan="3">Companies participating in the study</td><td rowspan="3">49</td><td>→ Outsourced accounting service</td><td>19</td><td></td><td></td></tr>
<tr><td rowspan="2">→ Own accounting service</td><td rowspan="2">30</td><td>→ Part time program</td><td>12</td></tr>
<tr><td>→ Full time program</td><td>18</td></tr>

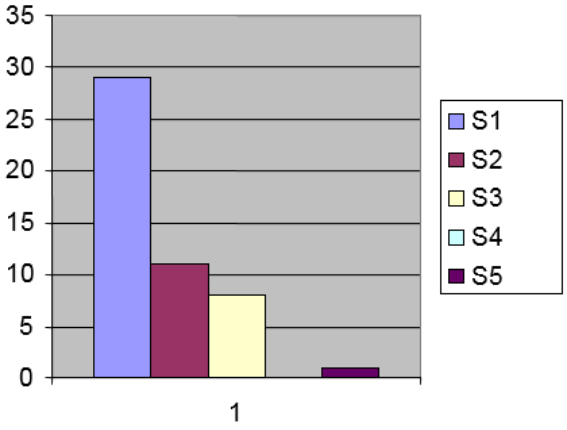
[3] Mihai Ristea, Conformity and Liberty in Accounting Policies of Financial Period Closing, article published in Pro Domo, Monthly Journal of CECCAR, no. 2/2011 pg 19-22

2. Presentation of collected data and their analysis in the context of the formulated hypotheses

The wording of the questionnaire was generated by the fact that in recent years, financial reporting as a product of accounting has become necessary for an increasingly diverse group of users. Therefore, the need to present a true and fair view of the financial position, performance and change in financial position becomes more and more motivated.

Eight respondents were dissatisfied with the lack of clear procedures for accounting and tax rules. What measures do you think should be taken so that the accountant can take time to apply the accounting policies?



S1 = Reducing the frequency of legislative changes;

S2 = Reduction in the number of tax returns;

S3 = Introduction of clear procedures for both accounting and tax rules;

S4 = Improve the accounting and tax knowledge of civil servants;

S5 = Other.

Limits of study and suggestions for future research

WE accepted the small degree of response following the study of Selltiz and the collaborators, taken over by A. Duţescu, who managed to highlight the advantages, disadvantages and elements that lead to the availability or unavailability of answering a questionnaire by mail or traditional.

In this paper we did not propose, in the present study, to analyze the impact of non-compliance with the accounting principles, on the outcome I tried through a case study that I presented in another paper.

For closer the theory to practice, we propose for future research a study witch start from the practical needs to the existing theoretical structures, to explain the extent requires all companies to enter in this carousel of convergence regarding submission of accounting information unpolluted from fiscality.

Understanding of the application of accounting principles through the components and joints philosophy of Recognition and Measurement (as practical) and rules on financial statements and disclosure (that theoretically) are at a very low level, which broadens very abyss between specialists in creating accounting standards and those applying them in practice.

Conclusions

In conclusion, the hypothesis formulated was confirmed, respectively, that a large part of the economic agents is somewhere on the edge between accounting and taxation when drawing up the financial statements from the point of view of recognizing and evaluating the balance elements. Because the time spent as well as the cost of tax processing of accounting information is significant, even an educated accountant professional may be forced to discount the accounting principles with the hope of saving time and administrative costs.

Questionnaires with questions about evaluation included the risk aversion of accountants. Thus, it is found that:

- The knowledge about the valuation of economic assets at the entrance to the entity is largely known. Only two of the respondents had incomplete answers in this area, ie they did not introduce the cost of the internal transport.
- The derecognition valuation rules are known by all accountants in the studio, including those on inventory (FIFO, LIFO, CMP).
- Confusion, (30% of respondents) between evaluation and reassessment is made.
- There are major reluctances to the inventor's valuation for the balance sheet. Forty five of the forty eight respondents answer that they find it risky to use inventory value, because there are no rules to guide them.

As a result of the study, our proposal is to develop detailed rules for the end-of-term evaluation, so that the view reflected by the financial statements of the companies is a true and fair one.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE GDP CONVERSION RATE INTO GNI ON SOCIAL PROGRESS. COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS AT THE EU LEVEL

Elena Mihaela ILIESCU

Abstract

Gross Domestic Product per capita is one of the main and indispensable indicators around which official reports are built representing thusthe comparative macroeconomic outcomes across states, being considered also a benchmark for national wealth analysis and comparison.

However, reality has shown that this results indicator, although one of the most popular and publicized macroeconomic variable, does not reflect a real and complete perspective on the economic and social situation of the citizens of the analyzed country. Proof of the viability of this outlook lies with the World Bank using GNI per capita in order to achieve annual hierarchization of savings in four groups (high income countries, upper middle-income countries, lower middle-income countries and lower income countries). This criterion was also adopted with the European Community in order to establish for each Member State the contribution to the Community's budget as well as the contribution from VAT.

Starting from these points of view and taking into account that, regardless of the level at which the economic activity takes place, the final goal must be the same - the satisfaction of the human needs in rational conditions - the present paper has two objectives: first to analyze comparatively , for the EU Member States, the share of GDP in GDP (per capita) and, secondly, to verify using empirical data the link between the rate of conversion and the social progress of these states. As a variable for measuring the quality of life, the reporting shall be made according to the Social Progress Index. This is because, in order to achieve the economic and social development objectives, financial resources are determinant but not enough - the human resources (and, implicitly, the educational system), the material and informative, along with qualitative aspects such as ethics and equity in the distribution of income represent also indispensable premises.

1. Introduction

Achieving the optimal level of macroeconomic outcomes is the primary objective and decision-maker's resolution, and the level reached, a barometer of confidence in the national economy, for both civil societies, the business environment, the rating institutions and international institutions.

From the broad range of these indicators, GDP per capita represents the most publicized and widespread variable in official reports on the evolution of national economies.

However, considering that it is an exclusive indicator of results, reflecting the economic activity from the point of view of the value added within the national economies (with indisputable implications on the level of employment, evolution of the inflation rate, budgetary revenues), it expresses only the economic power of the country, without providing sufficient information regarding the economic power of national economic agents.

Under these circumstances, gross national income per capita has been imposed internationally, being increasingly used, especially in the context of economic and social globalization, an irreversible process that makes the distinction between local and national more and more visible. Proof of the relevance of this indicator is also the annual World Bank hierarchy of the world's economies, which divides the states into four groups, according to GNI per capita (high income countries, upper middle-income countries, low income countries and countries with lower incomes). This criterion was also adopted at the level of the European Community in order to establish for each Member State the contribution to the Community budget as well as the contribution from VAT.

Moreover, since the interest for personal progress has passed the individual boundaries, becoming an objective of the national and international development strategies, the focus has been on theconversionrate of the domestic results into national incomes, as well as to the extent to which this aspect puts animprint on the quality of life of the citizens, becoming thus a topic of intrigue, both from the theoretical and practical perspective.

In fact, the desire to balance the three directions affecting the individuals' quality of life (economy, society and the environment) has "overthrown" the economy, generating increased attention and commensuration of the other two segments, which resulted in the construction of new indicators, relevant from the point of view of the environment and social welfare.

Thus, if, from the macroeconomic outlook, the degree of GDP conversion into GNI reflects the extent to which the economic strength of the country is transferred to the material prosperity of its citizens,

* Lecturer, PhD, The Faculty of Economics and Business Administration, "Nicolae Titulescu" University" of Bucharest (e-mail: mag_mihaela@yahoo.com) information on social welfare and environmental quality is synthesized and expressed using new indicators of social progress assessment - Social Progress Index, Prosperity Index, Genuine Progress Indicator, Life Quality Index, and so on.

The analysis of the interdependence between these three essential aspects of human life (economic, social and environmental), with direct and immediate implications on the quality of life, is also the subject of the present research paper, with the purpose to determine, on the basis of empirical data, members of the European Union (with a distinct analysis on Romania) can be established a general relation - valid between the rate of GDP conversion into GNI and the overall progress of the society.

Drawing a conclusion in this respect will allow emphasizing the role other factors have on the progress and the society's wellbeing, and most importantly the identification of the ways in which these complementary factors, which are considered to be secondary, can be improved so that the premises for the effective improvement of the quality of human life on all its levels are created.

This is because, one thing is certain - income is a determining, important but insufficient factor. The interest center needs to be moved from how much we invest to what we invest and, above all, on qualitative results.

In fact, this goal was materialized in 2015 in a new Global Action Program, formulated as "Agenda 2030 for Sustainable Development" and adopted by all 193 United Nations member states that set out a plan so that, by 2030, extreme poverty, inequality and injustice are eradicated, while pursuing the protection of the planet (17 global sustainable development objectives).

2. Brief presentation of the methodology

A first step towards achieving the research's objective is to determine the rate of GDP conversion into GNP. In order to allow comparability of the results, the reporting is made at GDP / capita and GNI / capita, both expressed in $, at purchasing power parity. The empirical analysis targets data published by the World Bank for 2017 (currently the most recent definitive data) for the European Union member states.

As a variable for measuring the quality of life, the reporting shall be made according to the Social Progress Index. This option is based on two objective aspects[1]:

- considering that the computing method relates to three essential aspects for determining social well-being and quality of life in general: the degree of satisfaction of basic human needs (food, medical care, water and sanitation, housing, personal safety), access to fundamental well-being (access to basic education, access to communications and information, health and well-being, environmental quality) and the opportunities created (personal rights, personal freedom and freedom of choice, inclusion, access to advanced education), the indicator only commensurate with information about others two factors of interest in this paper, namely society and the environment;
- taking into account the four fundamental principles according to which it was built (excluding social and environmental indicators, attention focused on inputs not on inputs, holistic and relevant for all countries, applicability[2]), since 2014 when the nonprofit organization Social Progress Imperative, with Deloitte's support, publishes annually a Social Progress Index report for 146 countries, it has become one of the most widely used and cited sources of documentation in specialized studies.

Considering that the fundamentals of economic theory suggest a positive correlation between the conversion rate of GDP / capita into GDP / capita and Social Progress Index, the analysis of the relationship between the two variables involves firstly establishing of a link but also determining the intensity and the meaning of this link. To this end, the Data Analysis function is used in the Excel spreadsheet program because it provides the value of the linear correlation coefficient r. Thus, a positive value of the correlation coefficient reflects a direct correlation between the two indices, and a negative value indicates a relationship reverse in terms of their evolution.

Considering that in order to establish the correlation intensity, although there is no unitary approach, the references are made predominantly to the interpretation proposed by Professor Will G. Hopkins in 2000 for the interpretation of the correlation coefficient r we will consider the intervals set by it, thus[3]:

- between 0.0 and 0.1 - negligible correlation between variables;
- between 0.1 and 0.3 - minor correlation;
- between 0.3 and 0.5 - moderate moderate correlation;
- between 0.5 and 0.7 - high correlation;
- between 0.7 and 0.9 - very high correlation;
- between 0.9 and 1.0 - almost perfect correlation.

A first analysis of the correlation between GDP / capita GDP / capita GDP and the Social Progress Index was made for all EU member states, but the uneven distribution of data, the Pearson correlation coefficient of minor value (-0.12933) and the significance threshold greater than 0.05 reveals that there is no linear relationship between the two indicators. This aspect makes the analysis of the graphical representation of the linear function and of the determination coefficient (R2) not statistically relevant.

However, the absence of a linear link does not rule out any link between the analyzed variables.

Therefore, further analysis is justified to identify another type of correlation. In this sense, the EU countries are grouped into two categories - countries with a GDP conversion rate in GNI of over 100% and countries where the conversion rate is below 100%.

As far as Romania is concerned, since the Report on the Social Progress Index was published in 2014, the retrospective analysis of the correlation between the two variables is limited to the period 2014-2017 and the GDP / capita and GNI / capita are also expressed, in $, to purchasing power parity.

3. GDP conversion rate in GNI versus the Social Progress Index

3.1. Comparative analysis across EU countries Content

Grouping of EU countries according to the macroeconomic indicator of dominant output (GNI or GDP) also illustrates an uneven distribution of data as shown in Tables 1 and 2. According to the same data, the distribution is uneven, including from the perspective of correlating the position in countries' rankings according to GDP / capita with the position regarding the conversion rate or the IPS level.

Although for both groups, the Pearson correlation coefficient reflects an average correlation between the variables analyzed (Table 3 and Table 4), the significance threshold of more than 0.05 indicates that there is no linear relationship between the two indicators.

Moreover, the graphical representation of the scatter plot of the two variables values in each of the two groups of countries reflects the existence of a polynomial trend, but of a low intensity (R2 = 29, 8% for the countries with a conversion rate over 1 and R2 = 42% for countries with conversion rate below 1). It should be taken into account that in the case of nonlinear correlations the coefficient R2 no longer reflects the degree of determination but only the intensity of the analyzed trend.

We observe that in countries with a conversion rate higher than 100%, the fact that the national per capita income is higher than the GDP / capitaput their mark, in positive but moderate way (r = 0.36387) on the social progress – the countries with the highestconversion rate in this group also records also the highest level of the social progress index.

In the case of countries with a conversion rate of less than 100%, a national income per capita lower than GDP / capita also influences moderately but in the negative (-0.40009), the level of social progress index - in this group, the social progress index is higher for countries with the smallest conversion rate.

Taking into account the identified restrictions, the analysis of the link between the GDP share in GDP and the degree of social progress will be limited to graphical comparison through column type charts and the identification of a trend of the two variables, depending on the position of the countries in the EU GDP classification / capita.

As a consequence, Chart 1 illustrates comparatively the GDP / capita GDP conversion rate and the Social Progress Index for EU countries where national / capita income is higher than GDP / capita. In this case, the rate of conversion is higher and, although it does not fluctuate much (maximum 2 percentage points), the distance between the two variables increases as GDP / capita decreases.

Chart no. 1 GDP conversion rate into GNI vs SPI for EU member countries with a conversion rate higher than 100%

The situation is not much different for the second category of countries, i.e. those for which the rate of conversion is less than one, as suggestively illustrates graph no. 2.

Chart no. 2 GDP conversion rate in GNI vs SPI for EU member countries with a conversion rate of less than 100%

Source: author's work based on the data in table no. 2

Thus, the smallest conversion rates (70.07% and 81.84%, registered by Luxembourg and Ireland, the first two countries in the GDP / capita ranking), ensure the highest levels of social progress but by passing between the 95% - 99, 8% (which includes the rest of 15countries within the group), as GDP / capita decreases, decreases on average the level of registered social progress, and the gap between the two variables can be seen on the graph.

3.2. Retrospective analysis for Romania

Empirical data and graphical representations for both groups of countries analyzed reflect the direct, positive link between the level of social progress and GDP / capita and also the moderate correlation between the social progress index and the GDP conversion rate in the GNI, situation confirmed by the figures shown for Romania and summarizedin table no. 5.

Table no. 5 GDP conversion rate in GNI vs SPI in Romania

| AN | 2009 | 2010 | 2011 | 2012 | 2013 | 2014 | 2015 | 2016 | 2017 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| GNI/GDP% | 98.7 | 98.49 | 98.34 | 98.25 | 97.84 | 98.72 | 97.68 | 97.37 | 97.31 |

Source: author's work based on World Development Indicators, last update date 3/21/2019 and Social Progress Index, 2017 Report

The limited time horizon for which the data is available, makes an analysis of the correlation between the two variables unviable, but it is worth noting that the value of the Pearson correlation coefficient is also negative for Romania, which corresponds to the general trend determined in the countries of its group (Table 6).

Thus, as illustrated in Chart no. 3, although the conversion rate has decreased during the analyzed period, the social progress index has increased, strengthening the idea that GDP / capita puts its mark on the evolution of the quality of social life.

Tabel nr. 6 Correlation coefficient between the rate of GDP conversion into GNI and SPI in Romania

So, although it is highly discussed and disputed, the relevance of GDP / capita, in the analyzes and reports regarding the standard of living and quality of life in the world states, it proves to be an indispensable but not sufficient source of information.

4. Conclusions

If traditionally, the economic theory focuseses on GDP / capita to analyze and compare the standard of living for the world's states, in the last years it has been noted that particular attention is paid to GNI / capita as a benchmark for countries ranking for the same purpose. This is because it has been found that circumstantial situations can facilitate the increase of the value of the domestic final output, without this favorable situation being transferred to the national economic agents. Moreover, worries about climate change, increasing conflicts and social discrepancies have generated interest for other indicators of measuring the quality of life, social implications gaining priority over the economic ones.

In the light of the foregoing, the present paper has been built on the premise that an empirical analysis at the level of the EU Member States will support these new approaches.

However, reality has shown that the normative approach is not complementary to the positive one, and no clear relationship can be established, generally valid between the degree to which GDP is conversioned into national income and social progress. Furthermore, graphical representations show the same evolution of social progress and GDP / capita.

The moderate correlation level between the GDP conversion rate into GNI and IPS and the declining trend of the social progress along with the country's GDP / capita decline, demonstrate that the macroeconomic outcome indicators remain pillars of the quality of life for citizens of the national states but , lead at the same time to a clear conclusion: factors outside the exclusively economic sphere activities such as politics, education, economic and entrepreneurial culture of the population, traditions, but above all the public administration decision-makers abilities to manage their national wealth, leave a mark to an even greater extent than the macroeconomic results on the standard of living.

As a result, alongside the media coverage of all macroeconomic outputs, the popularization of complementary indicators such as the Social Progress Index would lead to an increase in the level of information and, implicitly, an increaseof the expectations and involvement of civil society as a stakeholder of national economies.

Introduction

Marketing control and auditing is a topical topic of today, and in the future for the following reasons:

- The control, which has emerged in ancient times, is an essential necessity for the regulation of social and interpersonal relations;
- With the time and development of society and economic relations, it becomes of particular importance for the construction and development of different economic systems;
- Control is largely determined by the right to power and ownership of means of production, or, in other words, the owner of capital is most often entitled to exercise control;
- The State exercises control functions to protect state interests and property in tax, social security, redistribution, social spheres, and so on;
- Where we talk about marketing control and auditing, the company's owner or management must implement and develop it for business development, sales growth, profits, and so on. When using an external marketing audit, it is intended to obtain an independent opinion on this type of activity and its possible corrections.

All this implies certain marketing relationships, following marketing control and audit, in order to increase profits, reduce costs and their return, and the purpose of the topic and the relationship with the applied literature.

1. Control as a function of management

Etymologically, the term ,,control" derives from the French word ,,controle", which literally means checking. Essentially, however, the concept of verification is not covered by the content of the control. Usually, checking is to check something that is part of the whole. It gives an idea of the current state of phenomena and processes. Unlike checking, control is checking something finished and whole, with all its components. Over time and scope it has unlimited action.

The subject of this report is control as a function of the management of economic systems or, in particular, of marketing as one of the management functions. In this aspect control arises with the emergence of the state.

Governance according to economic theory is a factor of production (the other factors are labor, capital and land). It is done through some basic functions such as: planning, organization, command, coordination, control, etc. Control not only impacts the results as a feedback management but is viewed as a continuous process.

For the control of economic systems it is appropriate to use the notion of economic control. But the control is mainly involved in the management of economic systems. That is why it is more in line with the name management control. However, the concept of financial control has been adopted in practice. This is because the financial management and financial performance of enterprises through their accounting systems are mainly and most frequently checked.

Depending on the specifics of the control functions, financial (accounting) and management (administrative) control are encountered. The accounting control is exercised over the reliability of the financial statements and the protection of the assets. Managerial control over compliance with the organization's norms. It checks for suitability for economy, efficiency and efficiency. These indicators are critical to control. Economics is the acquisition with the lowest cost of materials or goods, while respecting quality. Efficiency is the achievement of objectives when comparing actual and expected results. Efficiency means achieving maximum results at minimal cost.

Audit derives from the word ,,audio", which literally means listening. It relates to the period from the Middle Ages to the Industrial Revolution, in which the accounts were heard publicly. During the Industrial Revolution, the creation of large enterprises led to the separation of ownership of capital from its management and to the need to protect owners' interests from fraud and error. That is when the organized audit appears. The audit, unlike the control, occurs much later and applies to the financial accounting activity, and for a long time this term was used only to express an opinion on the financial statements of the enterprises. However, performance and compliance auditing is already widespread. Performance Audit is also known as Operational (Managing) Audit and refers to an Efficiency, Efficiency, and Efficiency Assessment. The compliance audit focuses on the assessment of contracts and contractual relationships, tax commitments, the company's credit relations, the company's personnel policy, and management of human resources, marketing, all actions related to norms and rules that affect the end result of the object under review.

2. Origin of Marketing Control and Audit

Unlike the control that has been known much earlier, the idea of a marketing audit has sent us in the 1950s. Rudolf Dallmeier, former director of Boise Allen and Hamilton, recalls the idea of a leading marketing role in 1952. Robert Lavage, president of Ellik and Lavigne, dates back to the use of marketing audit in his company more than two decades ago. In 1959, the American Management Association published the first book on Marketing Audit under the title "Analyzing and Improving Marketing Performance". In the 60th marketing audit, it gained a prominent place in the service offerings of the management consulting companies. Even before the turbulent years of the 1970s, he managed to attract managerial attention.

An important principle in marketing auditing is to start with the market place, explore the changes that are going on, and what problems and opportunities they contain. Then, the objects of marketing strategies, organization and systems are explored. Finally, the auditor, which may be both internal and external, should investigate one or more key functions that are relevant to the company's marketing performance in detail.

3. Marketing control and Marketing audit

Marketing is a way of thinking that no user has any business activity and working to form his clients, the company works for its profits.

By its very nature, marketing brings together activities of: creation of new products, realization of the existing ones, stimulation of producers and consumers, pricing and different types of communications.

All of them are subordinated to a common strategy, an unresolved goal.

By marketing, in addition to achieving high profit, you can also seek to achieve other goals:

- increasing sales volume, increasing market share, increasing the image of the company and products, shifting competition or shrinking its market share and attaining a leadership position .

Marketing is an integral part of marketing, marketing audit, and marketing control. In general, marketing control assesses the achieved market outcomes, the marketing costs incurred and the degree of achievement of the marketing goals.

In turn, the marketing audit evaluates the way it works. Whether the organization of work in the marketing department, the existing rules and procedures provide the necessary prerequisites for achieving the marketing objectives and do not increase the risks over the inherent market risks.

A classic vision for marketing auditing can generally be defined as comprehensive, systematic, independent, and periodic auditing of the marketing environment, goals, strategies, and business activities of the business or its business units to identify problem areas and unused opportunities, and to propose an action plan to improve the company's marketing results.

The scope of marketing auditing in the last decade is characterized by significant changes in marketing theory and practice. The main direction of the changes can be systematized in several directions, or three main fields, which correspond to three fundamental questions:

- How does the company serve its markets and how satisfied its customers are;
- What is the "value" of the products and services the company offers?;
- What is the efficiency "of the actions to implement these products on the market?

The first strand is characterized by the fact that the emphasis is shifted from striving to satisfy consumer preferences better than competitors at all costs, to seeking a maximum return on the money invested in marketing.

The second strand states that marketing theory and practice is handled by modern and rapidly developing tools. This necessitates a constant change in the ways of collecting, processing and evaluating marketing information.

The third strand relates to the fact that, due to the growing marketing competence of the companies and the anticipated growth of supply, competition is sharply intensified and it is much more difficult for firms to achieve a lasting competitive advantage. This requires constant monitoring of objectives, strategies and tactical moves to achieve them. More frequent are the changes that are made in the organization of marketing activities.

All listed leads to an increase in internal and external risks to the organization and in particular to the success of its marketing activities. This fact prompts companies to look for adequate responses to change.

The marketing audit focuses on four of its features - comprehensiveness, systematicity, independence and periodicity.

- Inclusion means that the audit covers all spheres and directions of marketing activity. It is not seen as a series of independent audits of various areas of marketing activity, but as a system of interrelated activities that cover the overall activity of the organization in the field of marketing.
- Systematics of marketing audit requires that it be a continuous process that covers the entire management cycle in terms of time, including planning, implementation, control and evaluation procedures;
- Independence is a key prerequisite for achieving the audit objectives. It is achieved by ensuring functional and organizational independence;
- Privacy means the continuity of the audit process. It should not be seen as a one-time act but as a sequence of steps that include assessment, formulation of recommendations, performance appraisal, formulation of new recommendations, etc.

Marketing control as part of the control function in the company is subject to the general logic of the control process - diagnosis of results, evaluation of results, purpose and corrective actions.

The focus on annual performance has as main task to assess to what extent the goals set in the marketing plan have been achieved. For this reason, senior management is committed to its implementation. The subject of analysis and evaluation is all the main areas of marketing activity, both in terms of results achieved, such as sales, market shares, consumer satisfaction etc., and in the context of marketing costs incurred. Some of the following can be included here: Sales analysis, market share analysis and changes in the market, analysis of financial results related to the company's market positions, consumer satisfaction assessment, valuation of "brand value" owned by company evaluation of product innovation results, overall evaluation of marketing costs effectiveness.

The task is to evaluate the return on marketing costs. The assessment of the return is necessitated by the fact that the marketing costs should be considered as an investment with a certain return. Also, control over the effectiveness of marketing activity is aimed at assessing the results, in the context of whether the marketing resources of the company are being used in full.

Marketing control is so-called strategic marketing control. Its main task is to determine the achievement of the organization's strategic goals and whether the created work organization creates the necessary preconditions for doing so. This control does not focus on the specific direction of the marketing activity or on a certain group of marketing costs. It focuses on the organization of marketing activity in general and therefore does not handle a toolkit of indicators and methods. The importance of strategic marketing control is to generate information on the degree of correspondence between marketing goals and marketing practice in the company. Strategic Marketing Control is a commitment of senior management.

Control often improperly identifies itself with the internal audit of marketing activity. In recent years, however, internal audit includes, covering the marketing activity that has emerged as an independent direction in the business of companies.

4. Marketing planning before Control and Audit

In the majority of companies, the marketing plan is developed after the company's overall business plan has been developed. Marketing is only part, though very important from the structure of the company's plan. Other structural components of the master plan are production, research and development plans, finance, staffing, etc. Efficiency in marketing planning is greatly increased when it is in line with company planning, as a whole, and the marketing plan is developed as part of the company's strategic plan.

The marketing tasks must be consumer-oriented, constantly monitoring their needs and also monitor the behavior of competitors, identify their weaknesses and strengths, and their potential for market behavior. In this sense, the marketing function is leading. It determines the technical, the production policy of the enterprise, the style and the nature of the management of the entire entrepreneurial activity.

The marketing management cycle ends with control, which at the same time launches a new marketing planning cycle.

Marketing control is a process of measuring and evaluating the results of the marketing strategies and plans, the implementation of the corrective actions that ensure the achievement of the marketing goals. As a result, controls are introduced in marketing activity. For example, if the volume of sales is lower than expected, it is necessary to determine what is conditioned and what needs to be done to change the situation. If the sales volume is above expectations, then it should be judged what this is causing and maybe it is possible to raise the price of the product. This may lead to some reduction in sales volume, but it is possible to provide a higher profit.

Typically, four types of marketing control - control of annual plans - are distinguished; profitability control; performance control and strategic control. Carrying out marketing activity implies significant costs and their rationality and effectiveness is precisely the control.

Analyzing the relationship between marketing costs and sales volume allows the company to assess the effectiveness of marketing costs and determine their most acceptable size. Typically, such an analysis is made for individual components of marketing costs. Such as: advertising costs; marketing research costs; costs of sales promotion; the costs of the traders and all related to the volume of sales. The results of this analysis should be evaluated in terms of the company's financial performance. This is necessary to understand at the expense of what and where the company receives money.

The financial analysis is conducted in order to reveal the factors that determine the return on investment. Elevation of a given metric is usually done in two directions:

- first, by increasing profits at the expense of increasing sales volume and / or cutting costs;
- secondly, by accelerating the turnover of capital, which is achieved at the expense of increased sales volume or reduction of assets (inventories, basic funds, number of unpaid bills, etc.). This explains the role of marketing factors in ensuring the financial stability of the firm.

One of the first steps in the marketing planning process is the implementation of a detailed marketing audit aimed at revealing the areas where problems and new opportunities exist and making recommendations for developing a plan to increase the effectiveness of marketing activities.

In other words, a marketing audit is a structured, logically consistent approach to gathering and analyzing information that aims to:

- to clarify the market position of the company at the moment;
- promote potential opportunities and threats in the company environment;
- to determine the organization's ability to meet the "requirements" made by the entity (users, intermediaries, suppliers, competitors) to it.

According to F. Kotler, the marketing audit is a comprehensive, systematic, independent and periodic review of the company's marketing and environment, goals, strategies, activities in terms of identifying problem areas and opportunities, and developing a plan to improve the company's business.

Unlike controls, marketing auditing should include: an analysis of the external environment and the company's internal condition; benchmarking of current activities with historical results; identifying future opportunities and threats that the company would face.

Rapidly changing economic processes require rethinking strategies annually, even monthly. Competitors are creating new products, customers are changing their business, distributors lose their efficiency, advertising costs hit the ceiling, government restrictions are on the way, and consumer unions are attacking. Many companies feel the need for periodic analyzes and research on their marketing operations, but they do not know how to approach them. Some companies make just minor changes that are economically and politically feasible but do not cope with the essence of the problem.

Correctly, companies develop a marketing plan, but management does not take a focused and objective view of marketing strategies, policies, organizations, and start-up operations. At the other extreme, companies take the top marketing leadership, hoping to shake the market. Somewhere in the middle may be the truth in the reorientation of marketing operations, based on changing external influences and opportunities.

Instead of conclusion

From what has been said so far, it can be summed up that while marketing control has the task of assessing the degree of correspondence between planned and achieved in marketing and the return on marketing costs and looking for unused reserves, marketing audit is the means of permanent, an independent and objective assessment of the adequacy of the organization of marketing activities and of the decisions and actions of the employees who carry out the marketing activities of the company.

But whether the marketing audit has reached methodological maturity, the answer is not yet, but the growing need to unify practices can lead to reasonable progress in this area to several years.

The marketing audit may not be the complete answer to the revival of marketing strategies, but it presents a generalized mechanism in pursuit of this necessary goal. Each company can benefit from a competent audit of various marketing operations and it can be of great benefit and maximize results.

In this respect, the imposition, use and development of marketing control and auditing is vital to any self-respecting organization in order to better develop and strengthen the market.

WOMEN AS CONSUMERS - EXPLORING WOMEN'S PURCHASING HABITS

Darija IVANKOVIĆ[*]
Sandra Mrvica MAĐARAC[]
Maja BEGIĆ[]

Abstract

Consumer's behaviour is presented as series of activities that an individual buyer undertakes in the course of a process when selecting and purchasing the product. Resources that are available to the consumer are: time, money and ability to accept and process information's. Behaviour of the consumer is subjected to the influence of large number of factors that can be divided into: social, personal and psychological factors. The modern lifestyle has contributed in changes in purchasing behaviour of women. Women are no longer just housewives and mothers; therefore they have engaged their position in society and at work place. Due to the lack of time, which, apart from their families, is spent on their workplace, the assumption is that their purchasing habits have also changed. In this paper is explored a sample of 150 women for their purchasing habits, different forms of purchasing, the frequency of purchases, their visiting to the retail patterns of trade, and also are explored the differences with respect to the demographic characteristics of women.

Keywords: consumer's behaviour, women, buying habits, shopping patterns, demographic characteristics

1. Introduction

Each consumer has his own buying habits that differ depending on the influence of various factors that can make affection on it. Consumer studies have begun when traders and manufacturers have realized that consumers were not always responding in accordance to their expectations. Today's consumers are autonomous and well-informed, and on their buying decisions can influence: social and personal factors and also psychological processes. Since consumers' behaviour is a complex process, it is necessary to differentiate consumers according to their lifestyles and therefore adjust marketing activities. Since the role of women in society and the family has also changed, due to lack of free time, the assumption is that women's purchasing habits have changed as well, and their habits that differ in terms of demographic characteristics. The main aim of this paper is to identify the women's purchasing habits in Republic of Croatia with regard to their social and demographic characteristics. The following research hypotheses are set out in this paper:

H1: Women's buying habits differ in terms of demographic characteristics.

H2: Women's buying habits differ in terms of the amount of monthly income.

These hypotheses are tested and explained in the results of this work.

2. Behavior of women as a consumer

Consumer behaviour can be defined as a process of studying individuals, groups, households, companies, institutions or different subjects in the role of consumers[1]. American Marketing Association (AMA) defines consumer behaviour as a dynamic interaction of knowledge and environmental factors that result in behaviour and exchange of aspects of consumers' life[2].

The most common grounds for the market segmentation are the demographic characteristics of the population (such as gender, age, degree of education, marital status, occupation, incomes). Here, demographics help to derive the target market more precise, while socio-cultural and psychological characteristics help to describe consumer attitudes[3]. For the purchase is claimed that has been primarily intended for women, that is, purchasing is a woman[4]. The economic circumstances in which a person is situated consists of their "consuming" income (level of income, stability and time frames), savings, wealth, debts, borrowing power, and their attitudes on spending in regards to savings[5]. A contemporary consumer wants a shopping experience, more affordable prices, faster buying and also he wants to simplify life[6]. In the new economy that is dominated by knowledge, digitalisation and speed connects all buyers[7]: therefore, buyers are well informed, they are looking after the quality with the globally competitive prices, expect to get solutions to their needs, fast service, shopping in accordance with their lifestyle and delivering value for money. During the last 25 years consumers' habits have significantly changed. It came to aging of population, the growth of multicultural societies, and also the major differences in purchasing power have occured. Consumer polarization has caused great differences in their needs which is reflected in various ways of buying[8].

Shopping is something that is done in a short period of time between work, going home, family life, and sleeping. In a post-feminist world, women have more money in terms of their employment, so it should be beneficial for sales, but the opposite happens. Because of their job, women do not have so much time and willingness to go shopping. Still, women still love to shop with friends and encourage each other to buy, and assist each other to avoid the wrong choices[9]. Research has shown that women and men are differentiated with regard to the products they buy, the way they buy products, how they respond to promotions and the way they process information's during purchases and also the time they spend in the store.

Women are doing the majority of household shopping, and men are mostly specialized in those things that are used outside the home[10]. Given the change in the traditional role of women in society, there has been a change in the role of men in the household[11]. Research into differentiations in gender-based decision-making is relevant to marketing theory and practice. Differences in purchasing behaviour of women and men affect their purchasing role as a consumer and as such on the marketing strategy of a company[12].

Table 1. Characteristics of consumer decision styles

| Decision style | Characteristics of style |
|---|---|
| The tendency to buy from habit | loyal consumers with certain brands and stores |
| Confusion of consumers with too many choices | lack of consumer confidence when choosing the right product |
| Impulsiveness | consumers inclined to unscheduled buying: they do not care how much money they will spend |
| Price sensitivity | consumers tend to look for and to buy cheaper products |
| The tendency to buy from recreation and pleasure | to buyers, shopping represents fun, recreation and brings pleasure |
| The affiliation to novelties in fashion | consumers tend to buy trend products |
| The affiliation to the brand | consumers tend to buy more expensive and branded products |
| Perfectionism | consumers tend to perfection seeks for the best quality products; they buy more carefully, more systematically and make comparisons between products |

Source: Sproles, Kendall (1986)

In accordance to the research done on consumer decision-making styles[1], women show greater preference for novelties and fashion than men, a greater inclination to buy from recreation and pleasure, they manifest greater purchasing impulsivity and greater willingness to buy from habit.

Women more process information's and evaluates the product according to all its features, while men value information's towards overall problem-solving. Women in shopping often enjoy a range of psychological and sociological pleasures, while men experience shopping as a function of obtaining the products they need[2]. At the end of the 20th century, consumerism has become a "way of life", and as a dominant ideology of modern capitalism, it affects the daily experience of social life[3].

3. Methodology of research

3.1. Sample

The survey was conducted in Republic of Croatia in the area of Vukovar-Srijem and Osijek-Baranja County during the months of May and June of 2018. The study covered 150 respondents (N = 150). Participation in the research was voluntary, and the female respondents who agreed to participate completed an anonymous questionnaire that was specifically created for the purpose of this research. In Table 2. is shown the socio-demographic characteristics of female respondents.

Table 2. Socio- demographic characteristics of female respondents

3.2. Questionnaire

For the purposes of this research a questionnaire was formed. The first part of the questionnaire covers the socio-demographic characteristics of the female respondents, while the second part relates to 18 claims that are related to women's purchasing habits. The respondents were asked to comment on certain statements that are based on a Likert's five-degree scale that follows as*:* 1 = completely disagree, 2 = disagree, 3 = not agree or disagree (neutral), 4 = agree, 5 = strongly agree. All questionnaires were valid and were accepted in the sample.

3.3. Statistical data processing

After the data collection, data from the questionnaire were entered into the SPSS database and a detailed analysis was carried out with the help of the statistical package for social sciences IBM SPSS (Statistical Package for Social Science), version 19.0. The following types of statistical data analysis were used in this study: descriptive statistical analysis and nonparametric statistical analysis. Descriptive statistics were accounted for all variables where appropriate.

As all variables had abnormal data distribution (what was determined by Shapiro - Wilk test), therefore nonparametric statistics (Mann-Whitney U test) was used. The hypotheses were accepted or rejected at the significance level of $\alpha \leq 0{,}05$.

4. Research results of the shopping practice of women

4.1. Socio-demographic characteristics of female respondents

The study involved 150 female participants. The youngest person was 19 years old, while the oldest person in the sample was 77 years old. On Graph 1. is shown the working status of respondents.

With regard to work status, the largest number of respondents, 48,7 % is employed, 14% of them are unemployed, 30% is studying, and 7,3 % of the surveyed individuals are retired.

Graph 2. Marital status of respondents

The largest numbers of respondents, 53,3% are unmarried, 40% are married, 4,7% are divorced, and 2,0% of respondents are widows.

Graph 3. Educational structure of respondents

The highest percentage of subjects is those with completed secondary education (50,6%). Following are the respondents with the acquired vocational / university's Bachelor degree, 26% of them, and 18,7% of the respondent's posses a diploma of a university / university's Master degree. Only 2,7% of female respondents have completed postgraduate or doctoral studies. The lowest number of respondents has completed elementary school (2%).

Graph 4. The place of residence of female respondents

With regard to the place of residence, the largest number of respondent live in the city, 64% of them, while 36% of respondents live in rural areas, i.e. in the villages.

Graph 5. Female respondent's monthly income level

The monthly income level of the largest number of examinees ranges from HRK 4.001 to HRK 8.000 (33,3%) and from HRK 2.001 to HRK 4.000 (23,3 %). Total of 10,7% of respondents have a monthly income of more than 8.000 Kunas. Also, a high proportion of respondents have achieved a low monthly income 2 000 Kunas (32,7%). It is assumed that is attributed to students and retired individuals.

4.2. Differences in purchasing habits with regards to socio-demographic characteristics (H1)

The first hypothesis cannot be accepted. At the set level of significance it is impossible to accept the assumption that the purchasing habits of women differ in terms of demographic characteristics: age, working status, marital status, qualification, place of residence and the level of monthly income.

4.3. Differences in purchasing habits with regards to the amount of income (H2)

Descriptive statistics for numeric variables are presented using the arithmetic mean (AS), standard deviation (SD), and median values (Table 3).

Table 3. Purchasing habits regulated by the amount of monthly income level

| | Up to 4.000 kn | | | | from 4.001 HRK kn | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| VARIABLE | AS | SD | median | N | AS | SD | median | N |
| I often buy in hypermarkets. | 3,34 | 1,196 | 4,00 | 84 | 3,92 | 1,114 | 4,00 | 66 |
| I often buy on the Internet. | 2,23 | 1,196 | 2,00 | 84 | 2,83 | 1,431 | 3,00 | 66 |
| I spend majority of my income on products for children. | 1,65 | 1,058 | 1,00 | 84 | 2,33 | 1,244 | 2,00 | 66 |
| Other people influence my choice of product I will buy. | 2,61 | 1,109 | 3,00 | 84 | 2,02 | ,984 | 2,00 | 66 |
| I do my shopping over the weekend. | 3,17 | 1,096 | 3,00 | 84 | 3,67 | 1,057 | 3,00 | 66 |

Source: author's work

In order to identify the differences in women's purchasing habits due to the level of their monthly incomes, data distribution was tested by the Shapiro-Wilk test. Since all variables had abnormal distribution of data, non-parametrically Statistics or Mann-Whitney U test was used (Table 4).

Table 4. Mann-Whitney test as an indicator of the monthly income levels

| VARIABLE | Mann- Whitney U | Wilcoxon W | Z | Asymp. Sig. (2-tailed) |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| I do my shopping over the weekend. | 2089,000 | 5659,000 | -2,693 | ,007 |
| I often buy in hypermarkets | 2114,500 | 5684,500 | -2,578 | ,010 |
| I often buy on the Internet. | 2112,000 | 5682,000 | -2,571 | ,010 |
| I spend majority of my income on products for children. | 1884,000 | 5454,000 | -3,662 | ,000 |
| Other people influence my choice of product I will buy. | 1946,000 | 4157,000 | -3,261 | ,001 |

The second hypothesis is accepted. Namely, at the given level of significance it is possible to accept the assumption that women with higher monthly income level are buying more often over the weekend ($Z = -2,693$ $p < 0,007$), on the Internet ($Z = -2,571$ $p < 0,010$), they often buy products for children ($Z = -3,662$ $p < 0,000$) and their buying is less affected by the other person ($Z = -3,261$ $p < 0,001$). Women with the higher monthly income level more often buy in hypermarkets ($AS = 3,9 \pm 1,1$ $N = 66$ vs. $AS = 3,4 \pm 1,2$, $N = 84$).

5. Conclusions

Since the traditional role of women in society has changed, the assumption was set on how their buying habits have changed. Buying is no longer just a woman's obligation to buy household goods but shopping has become a pleasure and a form of entertainment. The results of this research that has been conducted in two Slavonian counties, Vukovar-Srijem and Osijek-Baranja County in Republic of Croatia, indicate women's buying habits, the behavioural patterns of women as consumers, and point out to the potential differences between women as consumers in the sense of their socio-demographic characteristics. At the given level of significance, it is not possible to accept the assumption that women's habits of behaviour differ with regard to socio-demographic characteristics such as: age, work status, marital status, educational level and place of residence. Furthermore, the statistically significant differences in purchasing behaviour of women were determined due to their monthly income level. Women of higher monthly income levels are more likely to buy on weekends, in hypermarkets, on the Internet; they more often buy products for children, and their purchases are less influenced by other people. The proceeded research can be used as a basis for targeted market segments according to gender characteristics, as well as the subject for the future research to investigate purchasing habits of women in other counties of the Republic of Croatia and to make comparisons between them.

CHALLENGES FOR THE GLOBAL FINANCIAL SYSTEM

Serghei MARGULESCU[*]
Elena MARGULESCU[]

Abstract

According to the governor of the Bank of England, Mark Carney, the global financial system is currently lagging behind the evolution of the global economy, facing asymmetric concentrations of financial assets in advanced economies relative to economic activity. As the world re-orders, this disconnect between the real and financial is likely to reduce, and in the process other reserve currencies may emerge. By 2030, seven of the world's top 10 economies will be current emerging markets, according to the latest report by London-based multinational banking and financial service company Standard Chartered.

On the other hand, global tensions caused by economic sanctions and trade conflicts triggered by Washington have forced targeted countries to take a fresh look at alternative payment systems currently dominated by the US dollar. The global importance of the Chinese yuan seems destined to rise, according to strategists and economists who say flows in the currency will grow over the long term if Beijing continues to gradually open its financial system. The yuan will be increasingly driven by capital account flows, and not just trade-related flows.

Looking for a proper anchor of value for the international monetary system is becoming also an issue of a paramount importance. Gold is seen by an increasing number of players as a natural anchor of value and some are already preparing themselves to that by increasing their gold reserves. Holding physical gold is definitely the best hedge against a crash of any paper currency but nevertheless, we need a trustful worldwide monetary and financial system.

Keywords: global financial system, reserve currencies, fiat currencies, gold, dollar, yuan.

Introduction

The world re-orders and the worldwide monetary and financial system needs to be adjusted accordingly. Two issues have to be addressed in this respect:

1. The rebalancing of the global financial system in accordance with the evolution of the global economy and
2. The trust issue in respect to the USA dollar which is, for a long time, a fiat currency and is lately aggressively used as a sanctioning tool towards other states.

1. The rebalancing of the global financial system in accordance with the evolution of the global economy

According to the governor of the Bank of England, Mark Carney, the global financial system is currently lagging behind of the evolution of the global economy, facing asymmetric concentrations of financial assets in advanced economies relative to economic activity. As the world re-orders, this disconnect between the real and financial is likely to reduce, and in the process other reserve currencies may emerge.

Let us have a look at the present status and the forecasted evolution of the global economy.

Global merchandise trade reached a total of US$17.7 trillion in 2017. US$6.3 trillion were exchanged between developed economies (North-North trade), whereas trade among developing and transition economies (South-South trade) accounted for US$4.9 trillion. The remaining US$6.3 trillion were comprised of exports from developed to developing economies and in the opposite direction (North-South, and South-North trade). Thus, for developed economies, trade with developing economies was as important as trade with developed.

In 2017, developing economies shipped most of their exports to the United States of America (US$1.3 trillion), and then to China (US$1.0 trillion) and other Asian economies. They also sourced most of the imports from the same economies.

Despite efforts by the Trump administration to pressure Beijing into reducing the US-China trade deficit, the trade surplus with the US still reached $323.32 billion in 2018 – the highest level since 2006. The trade surplus grew 17 percent from around $275 billion in 2017. Exports to the US surged 11.3 percent year-on-year in 2018 to $478.4 billion, while imports from the US to China rose a scanty 0.7 percent over the same period.

The total value of global e-commerce transactions, both domestic and cross border, was also impressive, with US$ 16 trillion in 2013 (UNCTAD), US$ 25 trillion in 2015 (UNCTAD) and US$ 27.7 trillion in 2016 (The US International Trade Commission), with public traded companies like Alibaba, Alphabet, Amazon, Facebook, Microsoft, Netflix, Spotify leading the market.

Global services trade reached US$5.4 trillion in 2017, one third of the value of merchandise exports. Services exports mainly come from developed economies. These supply over two thirds of services traded internationally. However, several Asian developing economies have established themselves as important exporters. The world's top services exporter in 2017 was the United States of America, with US$781 billion worth of services sold internationally, representing 15 per cent of global exports. They were followed, at some distance, by three European Union member states (UK, Germany, France) that jointly captured 17 per cent of the world market.

The top five developing economies were Asian, comprising China, India, Singapore, Hong Kong SAR and the Republic of Korea. These five held a world market share of almost 15 per cent, the same as all other developing economies combined (UNCTAD Handbook of Statistics 2018, annex 6.4).

The rise of digital technologies promises to further transform international trade. We are entering a new era, in which a series of innovations that leverage the internet could have a major impact on trade costs and international trade. The Internet of Things, artificial intelligence, 3D printing and blockchain have the potential to profoundly transform the way we trade, who trades and what is traded.

The nature of competition in digital markets is materially different from competition in traditional markets as it tends to be based on innovation rather than on pricing. Questions have been raised about how much the adoption of digital technologies has raised economic productivity. Measures of productivity in the United States, for instance, suggest a significant slowdown since 2005.

Beyond facilitating trade in traditional services, digital technologies are enabling new services to replace trade in goods, ensuring the continued importance of services in the composition of trade. Another factor that could become more important for trade patterns in the digital age is market size. Digital technologies benefit from access to large amounts of information, which may be advantageous to large developing economies.

In 2017, world foreign direct investment (FDI) inflows decreased by 23 per cent to US$1.43 trillion. Thus, having reached a peak of US$1.92 trillion in 2015, investment fell back to 2013 levels. In developing economies, FDI inflows amounted to US$671 billion, almost double the value of FDI outflows (US$381 billion). Developing economies in Asia and Oceania accounted for more than two thirds of all developing economy inflows and more than 90 per cent of their outflows. Developed economies, by contrast, generate more FDI than they receive. In 2017, they recorded inflows of US$712 billion and outflows of US$1 trillion.

In 2017, developed economies' share of global outward FDI remained unchanged at 71 per cent. Over the last two years, developed economies in America accounted for an increasing proportion. Their share rose from 20 per cent in 2015 to 29 per cent in 2017, thus reaching the same share as Europe. On the recipient side, Asia and Oceania strengthened their position as the main host region of FDI in the developing world, accounting for one third of world FDI.

In the light of the above mentioned realities, we already perceive an asymmetric concentration of financial assets in advanced economies relative to economic activity. China is the leading exporter of the world, surpassing for the third consecutive year the USA. For the developing world it presents already the same importance as USA in terms of exports and imports. For developed economies, trade with developing economies is as important as trade with developed ones. As to the trade in services, five Asian countries held in 2017 the same market share in exports as USA did.

Regarding the FDI flows, developed economies still generate more FDI than they receive, but the share and value of FDI outflows from developing economies is on the rise. In addition we have to take into account some impressive holdings of USA debt by these countries, with China's bond holdings in excess of one trillion.

Even on the gold market, despite the fact that the largest transactions (considering the physical and non-physical ones) are still done on the London financial market, we see a shift of interest to the Asian market which is leading in terms of demand for physical gold and demands a more appropriate price formation based on transactions carried out there.

By 2030, seven of the world's top 10 economies will be current emerging markets, according to the latest report by London-based multinational banking and financial service company Standard Chartered. The long-term projection shows that India is likely to become larger than the US, while neighboring China will reportedly steal the crown of world's most powerful economy (currently held by the US) as soon as 2020. At the same time, Indonesia may break into the top five economies.

The question is how the structure of currencies in use for international payments and in the capacity of reserve currency reflects all these realities. As the world re-orders, this disconnect between the real and financial is likely to reduce, and in the process other currencies, with Chinese yuan to be first considered, will have to win their share.

The global importance of the Chinese yuan seems destined to rise, according to strategists and economists who say flows in the currency will grow over the long term if Beijing continues to gradually open its financial system. The yuan will be increasingly driven by capital account flows, and not just trade-related flows.

Already, in respect of the World Currency Composition of Official Foreign Exchange Reserves, the international financial statistics of the IMF show that the shares of U.S. dollars in the allocated reserves of the states has decreased from 66.00% at the beginning of 2015 to 61.94% in the 3rd quarter of 2018. Shares of Chinese renminbi rose from 1.07% in 2016Q4 to 1.80% in 2018Q3.

2. The trust issue in respect to the USA dollar

The past year was full of events that inevitably split the global geopolitical space into two camps: those who still support using US currency as a universal financial tool, and those who are turning their back on the greenback. Global tensions caused by economic sanctions and trade conflicts triggered by Washington have forced targeted countries to take a fresh look at alternative payment systems and safe assets, currently dominated by the US dollar. Before looking into that, we have to address the wider issue of fiat currencies because dollar is in that position for a long time and some are asking for how long the agreement on this status quo is wise to prolong in the context of the dollar misuse.

2.1. Fiat currencies

Currency that a government has declared to be legal tender, despite the fact that it has no intrinsic value and is not backed by reserves is a succinct definition of fiat currency. Historically, most currencies were based on physical commodities such as gold or silver, but fiat money is based solely on faith.

What Marco Polo had come across in China in the 13th century was the paper money issued by the Yuan Dynasty under the rule of the legendary Kublai Khan. His people had been making use of paper money for several hundred years, dating back to the Song Dynasty in the 8th century. They had to take the value of the printed papers at faith, since they had no intrinsic value on their own.

In Europe the first real fiat currency didn't appear until 1661 in Sweden and then only to a limited effect. Some were tied to gold and silver; some were not. At times, both existed in some countries, with the paper money trading at a discount to the "hard money." In colonial America, individual states issues "bills of credit" and various types of currency over the years. Once again, some were backed by silver or gold, but some were not.

By the turn of the 20th century, most nations had made themselves the sole issuer of bank notes and legal tender. The economic havoc and immense cost of World War I led to the end of conversion of currencies for specie across the board, leading to an infamous example of a pitfall of fiat currencies. Between wars, currencies were extremely volatile. Hyperinflation led to severe deflation and depression. World War II brought another period of intense government intervention in economic activity, price controls, and monetary policy. As the world reemerged from the cataclysmic wars, there was broad consensus amongst the major powers that something had to be done to stabilize currencies, exchange rates, and economies, and to rebuild faith in government control of all of the above.

What emerged was the Bretton Woods System (1944), in which all of the nations tied their currencies to the U.S. dollar through fixed exchange rates. The U.S. dollar was still convertible to gold, but only for central banks. On August 15, 1971, President Nixon unilaterally ended it. It was now a pure fiat currency. The dollar plunged by a third during the stagflation of the 1970s, and currencies destabilized worldwide. What emerged has been called Bretton Woods II, although it wasn't coordinated at all. An international system of interdependency between states with generally high savings in Asia and Western states with generally high spending emerged. This paradigm lasted until about five to ten years ago.

With the global recession and currency wars raging to this day, there are renewed calls for worldwide standards for currencies and banks. Banking regulations in the U.S. and in Europe have been used to address the credit crisis during the recession, resulting in unorthodox monetary easing policies from central banks, but there are still no binding international standards for currencies.

Inflation, hyperinflation, and deflation are all still on the table as individual currencies are completely independent. Fiat currencies only work when inflation is low or moderate. Responsible management by central banks can keep the possibility of high inflation and deflation in check through interest rates and monetary supply. With the Fed's unprecedented expansion of the monetary base, and with interest rates at virtually zero percent, it has no ability to further stimulate the economy without dumping more dollars into circulation. We haven't seen the inflation and depreciation of the U.S. dollar that would be expected so far. But many worry about a delayed effect of the Fed's actions. When a currency is weak, or a central bank is using risky policies that create a loss of faith and an ailing economy, it is better to shift your money into traditional stores of wealth like gold or silver. Without a commodity or good used as a peg for value, there is a point of no return in the collapse of a government, national economy, or both that marks a point of no return for its currency.

"A truth of financial reality is that any prosperity built on paper money has usually been fun for a while, but has always ended in catastrophe" (from Jim Dines's 1975 book, The Invisible Crash). Jim Dines predicted that gold would enter into a historic bull market, rising from government-fixed levels of $35 to over $400. Not only that, but on January 14, 2005, Dines explicitly warned of the coming real estate crash of 2008, saying it would teach a lesson in illiquidity and shake the mortgage markets to its roots.

And right now, Dines is issuing another urgent warning. Americans have been unrelentingly assured by the Washington economic establishment that the economy is still recovering from the 2008 Great Recession. But he has never accepted that there's been a recovery. All that's happened since, including the "rebound" in stock prices, has simply been the result of printing breathtakingly large amounts of money and debt. Now, America is saddled with $22 trillion in debt and that figure doesn't even take into account the "unfunded liabilities" like Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security and student loans. The debt is huge and there's no possible way to pay it down. Before long, payments on the debt will become the third-largest item in the federal budget and something is going to break.

Jim Dines has long warned that cutting the dollar's link to gold wouldn't just lead to chaos, it would be the dollar's death knell. Currencies not backed by anything tangible, like gold or silver, have always left debt and destruction in their wakes. There isn't a paper currency on Earth worth trusting as much as gold and silver. As Dines likes to point out, all countries print money with almost no connection to real wealth. Many countries back their currencies not with gold, but the paper money of other nations. He compares the world's currencies to a bunch of staggering drunks trying to hold each other up. When a key one falls, the whole group will go down. Currency crises will keep happening with increasing frequency until gold is restored as the primary monetary asset.

2.2. Sanctions

We can see that, based on the need of rebalancing the new configuration of economic power with the global financial system and triggered by global tensions caused by Washington, a trend has emerged across the world toward reducing the dollar's role in trade and finance.

The US uses sanctions against other nations as part of its strategy to protect the current global financial system, in which the US dollar plays a dominating role but at the same time it have forced targeted countries to take a fresh look at alternative payment systems and safe assets. Some steps are pointing to that:

a) Challenging the status of a fiat currency
b) Challenging the reserve role of the dollar
c) Challenging the petro-dollar
d) Challenging the dollar as a means of payment or as a third currency in bilateral non-oil transactions
a) Challenging the status of a fiat currency

The global debt has soared to $247.2 trillion in March 2018 (as for the Washington-based Institute of International Finance statistics of August 2018). Central banks have been printing trillions of dollars out of thin air. By the beginning of 2020, global debt could be as high as $300 trillion. According to the IMF, in 2016, the countries with the largest debts, both public and corporate, were the United States with over $48.1 trillion, China with over $25.5 trillion and Japan with over $18.2 trillion. In 2016, the global debt was already at $164 trillion, which was equivalent to 225 percent of global GDP. The global debt-to GDP ratio currently exceeds 318 percent.

"The entire planet is swimming in debt, yet no one seems to criticize the system itself as being fundamentally flawed… our current financial system enslaving the entire world is not sustainable and headed for one hell of a spectacularly ugly crash" Darius Shahtahmasebi, a New Zealand-based legal and political analyst said.

Over-indebted countries are at risk of getting into serious financial trouble.

"The last geopolitical shift that started with WWI and ended with WWII put the US in this dominant position, because they owned and stored 70 percent of the gold reserves of the free world. This was also the main reason, why the USD became the world currency reserve. Central banks moved their gold because they felt threatened by the USSR and saw the USA as their natural ally. The fact that central banks are repatriating their gold shows that this has changed. It also implies that they don't see Russia as a bigger threat than the USA any longer. Europe stands in the center of this geopolitical power shift and some countries obviously believe it's wise to store the gold in their home countries" Claudio Grass, an independent precious metals advisor said.

"Nonetheless, it is obvious that the systematic problems are not solved, on the contrary, the risks became bigger and more fragile than a decade ago," said Grass. "As you know more than 65 percent of all monetary reserves in the central banking system are held in the world currency reserve, which still is the USD. Therefore, holding physical gold is definitely the best hedge against a crash of any paper currency, and "therefore also against a crash of the USD".

Also Kim Dotcom, an American analyst and businessman is telling us straightforward: dump 'worthless' dollar in favor of gold and crypto as US debt spirals out of control.

The amount of gold bought by global central banks in 2018 reached the second highest annual total on record, according to the World Gold Council (WGC). The industry research firm said that central banks bought the most gold by volume since 1967. It was the largest amount since former US President Richard Nixon's decision to end the dollar's peg to bullion in 1971.

According to the WGC, central bank net purchases reached 651.5 metric tons in 2018, 74 percent higher than in the previous year when 375 tons were bought. It has estimated that they now hold nearly 34,000 tons of gold.

"Heightened geopolitical and economic uncertainty throughout the year increasingly drove central banks to diversify their reserves and re-focus their attention on the principal objective of investing in safe and liquid assets," said the report.

It noted that Russia was leading the way as it looks to reduce reliance on dollar reserves. The Russian central bank bought 274.3 tons of gold in 2018. Other big central bank buyers were Turkey, Kazakhstan, India, Iraq, Poland and Hungary.

Russia became the world's fifth largest holder behind the US, Germany, France and Italy.

It also said that Russia has cut the share of the US dollar in the country's foreign reserves to a historic low, transferring nearly $100 billion into the euro, the Japanese yen and the Chinese yuan. The step came as a part of a broader state policy on eliminating reliance on the greenback.

China has joined the global gold rush, increasing its gold reserves to US$79.319 billion (by more than $3 billion compared to the end of 2017) trying "to diversify its reserves" away from the greenback.

Russia, China and Turkey are leading the gold-buying spree. "They are forcing revision and re-introduction of the gold standard," agrees Max Keiser, adding that all those three countries have to do is "introduce gold-backed currency."

The latest trend among European countries of bringing home their gold reserves has been raising concerns in Brussels. According to Claudio Grass of Precious Metal Advisory Switzerland, the process means disintegration, which usually comes with instability, unrest, more government intervention and control. Analysts have pointed out that EU countries see gold as insurance in case they end up returning to their national currencies.

b) Challenging the reserve role of the dollar

In 2016, the Chinese yuan was included in the Special Drawing Right (SDR) basket alongside the US dollar, the Japanese yen, the euro, and the British pound. The move granted the yuan the status of a reserve currency.

The Chinese yuan has strengthened its position among global reserve currencies, rising to 1.84 percent in the second quarter of 2018, according to the International Monetary Fund.

Central banks held $193.4 billion worth of yuan.

The 1.84-percent share is still modest compared to other global currencies like the US dollar, euro and Japanese yen. The share of US dollar reserves decreased to 62.25 percent in the second quarter of 2018 to its lowest level since 2013.

Global financial transfer system SWIFT said in its recent monthly report on the yuan that it was the sixth most used currency in domestic and international payments value in October, just behind the Canadian dollar.

"The yuan will be increasingly driven by capital account flows, and not just trade-related flows," said HSBC. It pointed out that China's financial opening accelerated this year, with portfolio investments by foreigners reaching an all-time high. The bank expects a significant shift coming as China opens the door further: "We believe this is only the beginning of a multi-year trend for portfolio investment rebalancing, globally."

Yuan-denominated Chinese bonds were included recently (on the 1st of April 2019) in the Bloomberg Barclays Global Aggregate index. The move is expected to attract trillions in foreign inflows into China and the reshaping of global capital markets. Over the next 20 months, the index will add 364 bonds issued by the Chinese government. Analysts estimate the full inclusion will attract around US$150 billion of foreign inflows into China's bond market, which is the third-largest in the world after the US and Japan. Meanwhile, several other key index providers (including the JPMorgan Government Bond Index-Emerging Markets and the FTSE World Government Bond Index) are also considering whether to add Chinese bonds in their benchmarks. It is estimated that China would receive as much as $275 billion in foreign inflows as a result of its bonds being added to indexes by Bloomberg, JPMorgan, and FTSE. That would help increase the Chinese yuan's share in foreign currency reserves held by central banks globally. For now, despite the Chinese bond market's large size, the bonds are under-owned by global investors. Foreign holding of Chinese debt stands at only two percent of the $13 trillion in total value. Chinese central government bonds have already a foreign ownership at close to 8 percent, but that is still very low compared to 35 percent for US Treasuries and 28 percent for British government debt.

The People's Bank of China has been also regularly reducing the country's share of US Treasuries. Still the number-one foreign holder of the US sovereign debt, China has cut its share to the lowest level since May 2017.

The Central Bank of Russia has moved further away from reliance on the US dollar and has axed its share in the country's foreign reserves to a historic low, transferring about $100 billion into euro, Japanese yen and Chinese yuan.

The share of the US currency in Russia's international reserves portfolio has dramatically decreased in just three months between March and June 2018, from 43.7 percent to a new low of 21.9 percent, according to the Central Bank's latest quarterly report, which is issued with a six-month lag. The money pulled from the dollar reserves was redistributed to increase the share of the euro to 32 percent and the share of Chinese yuan to 14.7 percent. Another 14.7 percent of the portfolio was invested in other currencies, including the British pound (6.3 percent), Japanese yen (4.5 percent), as well as Canadian (2.3 percent) and Australian (1 percent) dollars.

"It is more of a game changer for the US. As soon as other nations have a real credible alternative to the US dollar, they can dump dollars and switch to the yuan which can spark a dollar crisis. If that happens, not only will there be inflation from the tariffs, but also from the flood of dollars," said Ann Lee, Adjunct Professor of Economics and Finance at New York University and author of the book 'What the US Can Learn From China'.

c) Challenging the petro-dollar

The highly anticipated yuan-backed crude oil futures have been launched in Shanghai International Energy Exchange in 2018. China is the world's biggest oil and in 2017 it outpaced the US as the world's number one importer of oil. Thus, the contracts may not only help to win some control over pricing from the major international benchmarks, but also promote the use of Chinese currency in global trade and diminish the role of the greenback in global financial markets. The futures contract will allow participants to pay with gold or to convert yuan into gold without the necessity to keep money in Chinese assets or turn it into US dollars.

"In the short-term, we believe price fluctuations will reflect domestic crude oil supply and demand. In the long run, yuan crude price will mirror the moves of Brent," said Chen Tong, Shanghai-based senior crude analyst at First Futures. Meanwhile, the high costs of oil storage for delivery into the Shanghai Futures Exchange may scare potential investors away from the new contracts.

Stanislav Werner, head of the analytical department of Dominion, notes that the oil market is worth $14 trillion at the moment, and is bigger than the Chinese economy.

With crude oil becoming also a great chunk of international commerce (with 2 trillion worth of trade in 2017), the potential impact of the new product on oil market dynamics and on global monetary and financial systems could be correspondingly great. That is why "the US has a serious reason to get nervous, because in many ways the hegemony of the US dollar came from oil trading in dollars" Werner said.

As China is the world's biggest crude buyer, the new contract may allow exporters to avoid US sanctions by trading oil in yuan. Such countries as Russia, Iran, Pakistan, Vietnam, China and many other Asian countries are interested in that. Iran will accept renminbi from China now. China and Russia have currently swaps in rubles and renminbis. Caracas has ordered oil traders to convert crude oil contracts into euro and not to pay or be paid in US dollars anymore.

"When US dollar replaced the pound sterling, there was no one really going around trying to do it quickly. But now you have major economies like Russia, China, Iran and others that want this to happen. So, it will happen faster," Jim Rogers added.

"Ideas related to oil trade in currencies other than the dollar arose more than once. Some of them were severely suppressed by the United States, one example is Muammar Gaddafi, who proposed the introduction of a regional currency gold dinar and trading oil in the Middle East in this currency… China has a chance to finish what he started" Aleksandr Egorov, foreign exchange strategist at TeleTrade, told.

"Along with the Chinese role in the global economy and the growing interest in the renminbi, China is also protected by a nuclear shield. It can afford to try to shatter the monopoly in oil trade. This will give even more weight to the Chinese yuan. In addition, China's economy is the world's largest consumer of oil, and consequently, all world producers of raw materials will have to reckon with the strategy of the Chinese authorities," Egorov said.

d) Challenging the dollar as a means of payment or as a third currency in bilateral non-oil transactions

China is trying to internationalize its own currency. Beijing has recently made several steps towards strengthening the yuan, including accumulating gold reserves, launching yuan-priced crude futures, and using the currency in trade with international partners. The Hong Kong Exchanges and Clearing also launched yuan-denominated gold futures in 2017. A metals futures contract denominated in Chinese currency was expected to be launched at the London Metal Exchange in 2018, while the use of the Chinese currency as collateral was already in place.

As part of its ambitious Belt and Road Initiative, China is planning to introduce swap facilities in participating countries to promote the use of the yuan. Moreover, the country is actively pushing for a free-trade agreement called the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP), which will include the countries of Southeast Asia. The trade pact could easily replace the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP), the multi-national trade deal which was torn up by Donald Trump shortly after he took office. RCEP includes 16 country signatories and the potential pact is expected to form a union of nearly 3.4 billion people based on a combined $49.5 trillion economy, which accounts for nearly 40 percent of the world's GDP.

A bilateral currency swap agreement worth $28.81 billion has been clinched between China and Indonesia (November 2018). China's central bank signed the similar deal with the Bank of Japan (October 2018). Moscow and Beijing are working on an inter-governmental agreement to boost the use of the ruble and yuan in mutual trade settlements (in 2017 nine percent of payments for supplies from Russia to China were made in rubles while Russian companies paid 15 percent of Chinese imports in yuan).

India is one of the biggest merchandise importers and is significantly impacted by sanctions applied to its trading partners. Delhi switched to ruble payments on supplies of Russian S-400 air-defense systems as a result of US economic penalties introduced against Moscow. The country also had to switch to the rupee in purchases of Iranian crude after Washington reinstituted sanctions against Tehran. In December, India and the United Arab Emirates sealed a currency-swap agreement to boost trade and investment without the involvement of a third currency.

Ankara is preparing to conduct trade through national currencies with China, Russia, Ukraine. Turkey also discussed a possible replacement of the US dollar with national currencies in trade transactions with Iran. In August 2018, Qatar and Turkey inked a currency swap agreement to boost liquidity and provide financial stability due to hostile US rhetoric towards Ankara, and the economic blockade Doha faced from its Gulf neighbors led by Saudi Arabia. The Turkish economy sank after Washington introduced economic sanctions over the arrest of US evangelical pastor Andrew Brunson on terrorism charges. The lira has lost nearly half of its value against the greenback over the past year.

Sanctions have forced Iran to look for alternatives to the US dollar as payment for its oil exports. The latest round of penalties that went into effect on November targets Iran's energy, finance and shipping sectors. Washington also threatened to introduce secondary sanctions against countries and corporations that continue to do business with Tehran. Earlier, the White House sanctioned Iran's auto industry, carpets, metals trading and access to US dollars. Monetary transactions have become difficult for Iran after the country was cut off from the SWIFT payment system. Without access to SWIFT's interbank payment system, Iran cannot get paid for exports and pay for imports. Iran clinched a deal for oil settlements with India using the Indian rupee. It also negotiated a barter deal with neighboring Iraq. Iraq wants to barter food for desperately needed Iranian gas supplies.

Russia is among the countries pushing for "de-dollarization" (exclusion of the dollar in domestic and international financial interactions). Part of it is its record accumulation of gold reserves. Russia has developed a national payment system as an alternative to Visa and Mastercard and has managed to develop a national system for money transfers that could protect its banking from the possible cut off from SWIFT transfer services in case of tougher US penalties. Moscow has managed to partially phase out the greenback from its exports, signing currency-swap agreements with a number of countries including China, India and Iran. Russia has recently proposed using the euro instead of the US dollar in trade with the European Union.

Russia's largest energy companies preparing to substitute petrodollar in favor of the euro and other currencies in international settlements. Gazprom Neft, Russia's third-biggest oil company by output, said its contracts already have a clause to trade without the US dollar. The largest Russian oil company Rosneft is also interested in diversifying. The firm has opened banking accounts in Hong Kong dollars and Chinese yuan. Surgutneftegas is also reported to be working to reduce dependence on the dollar.

"The new US sanctions are clearly aimed at providing the US with economic advantages, including at the expense of European companies," said the chairman of the German-Russian Chamber of Commerce Matthias Schepp in December 2018. "It's time for Russia and Europe to start looking together for a way out of the sanctions regime," said Schepp.

Two-thirds of German companies doing business in Russia back the idea of setting up a dollar-free alternative payment system.

The BRICS countries consider switching to local currencies for mutual settlements with the Chinese yuan as the lead currency. The New Development Bank (NDB) is expected to be a substantial player in the process. The five banks of the BRICS Interbank Cooperation Mechanism have agreed to establish local currency credit lines. BRICS countries are also considering own cryptocurrency as settlement mechanism.

Russia suggests creating single virtual currency for BRICS and Eurasian Economic Union (EEU). Also more than 40 countries and international organizations, including China, Indonesia, and Israel, as well as some South American countries, have expressed interest in a free-trade deal with the EEU. The trade bloc is also holding negotiations with South Korea, Egypt, and India. It is expected that at least a part of trading will take place in other than dollar currencies.

Even Europe is working on a payment system alternative to SWIFT & IMF in order to attain financial independence from US.

Conclusions

Two trends are to be already seen these days:

- switching to other currencies and payment systems. In the case of China this is a part of its rebalancing strategy aimed at narrowing the gap between its economic power and the role of yuan in the worldwide monetary and financial system. For other countries this emerges from the need of hedging against the sanctioning policy of the USA.
- looking for a proper anchor of value, which could be once again gold, since the main reserve currencies are fiat currencies and the huge debts and growth issues are threatening their prospects.

So, while the mainstream financial press is all sunshine about the economic and financial prospects of the USA, there is a core group of financial gurus who do not agree with it.

Ron Paul, the Libertarian-minded congressman from Texas has never been shy about his distrust of the American monetary system or about his fondness for gold, as indicated by the titles of his best-selling books: "End the Fed" and "The Case for Gold".

While some have written Ron Paul off as paranoid, he has predicted almost every geopolitical event of the last 10 years, from the Arab Spring to the financial crisis, from exploding deficits to the expansion of the Fed, and from record gold prices to the current Iranian oil skirmish (all of them in a single speech from 2002).

At the same time, Paul is no typical congressman. While a typical Congressional portfolio has an average of 10% in cash, 10% in bonds or bond funds, 20% in real estate, and 60% in stocks or stock funds, he has about 20% of his holdings in real estate, 14% in cash and 64% in gold- and silver-mining stocks.

Peter Schiff is also warning against dollar: "It's important to know what types of investments to avoid. Treasuries, or in fact any dollar denominated debt, needs to be avoided because again, either you are not going to be paid back or you are going to be paid back in money that doesn't buy much. So, either way you are losing. So you have to protect yourself; gold/silver, commodities in general, stocks are a way to go although I like foreign stocks better than most domestic stocks, and emerging markets."

Can we see euro as a solid alternative currency? It is hard to believe that unless some serious changes are made.

The decision to create a single currency without the institutions which would make it work was "fatal" for the Eurozone, said Nobel-Prize winning economist Joseph Stiglitz, adding that the "Eurozone must ditch it now to survive".

In his book 'The Euro: How a Common Currency Threatens the Future of Europe, the economist writes the Eurozone was flawed at birth and is destined to collapse unless huge changes are made to its common currency. The structure of the Eurozone, its rules and regulations, was not designed to promote growth, employment and stability. The economist suggested the best way forward for the euro area is a 'flexible euro,' where each member country adopts its own version of the currency. A flexible euro could help southern European countries export more and import less, helping to achieve a trade balance and full employment.

The Eurozone's single currency, the euro, has been a serious drag on the economic growth of almost every member of the bloc, according to a study by German think tank, the Centre for European Politics (CEP) published in February 2019.

Germany and the Netherlands, however, have benefited enormously from the euro over the 20 years since its launch, the study showed. The currency triggered credit and investment booms by extending the benefits of Germany's low interest-rate environment across the bloc's periphery. However, those debts became hard to sustain after the 2008 financial crisis, with Greece, Ireland, Spain, Portugal and Cyprus forced to seek financial aid as growth slowed and financing became scarce.

According to CEP, over the entire period since 1999, Germans were on average estimated to be cumulatively richer by €23,000 than they would otherwise have been, while the Dutch were €21,000 wealthier. To compare, Italians and French were each €74,000 and €56,000 poorer, respectively.

Study authors Alessandro Gasparotti and Matthias Kullas said most Eurozone members had enjoyed periods during which the currency union had been net positive, but these were far outweighed by the periods when it dragged on growth. The study concluded that since the loser countries could no longer restore their competitiveness by devaluing their currencies, they had to double down on structural reforms.

In Europe we also witnessed unorthodox monetary easing policies from the European Central Bank, fortunately not to their extent in USA. The prediction of Nouriel Roubini that the Eurozone will begin breaking up could be just not out of this world. However, with no binding international standards for currencies, euro is certainly a fiat currency too. According to Claudio Grass of Precious Metal Advisory Switzerland "Our system is based on 7 percent paper notes and 93 percent digital units backed up by nothing other than central bank promises to pay back the debt in the future through inflation and taxation. It is just a matter of time before the Euro, the most artificial currency ever, is going to collapse" .

China has also to overcome a crises situation potentially endangering its national currency. Jim Dines has repeatedly predicted that "Its bear market would begin in real estate and banking." Especially considering the scope of its "shadow banking," or banking outside traditional institutions, where there is less oversight. Experts estimate that these transactions have at times been worth an astounding 87% of China's GDP.

China is also quietly desperate to stop its growing housing bubble. House prices in large Chinese cities in 2018 were among the highest in the world in terms of price-to-income ratios, with speculative demand from Chinese investors who see few other good places to park their savings. The result is a staggering 50 million empty homes. China has levied a new housing tax to try and slow the spreading of the bubble. But even if the new tax manages to temper housing prices, it's certain to suck more cash from the already debt-laden population.

London is experiencing some trouble with its pound for some time now, due to the unsolved Brexit, while other trends are also detrimental to it in a longer perspective. The role of a gold depositor is put into question as some countries, whose gold is kept in London coffers, are making the arrangements of bringing it home (see Germany, Hungary, Romania). Others, like Venezuela, are on no legal terms, refused in this respect. The physical gold transactions in London are losing ground to those in Asia where the greatest consumption is located. The derivatives transactions will follow this move. An increasing share of gold futures in London will be denominated in the Chinese yuan instead of British pounds. The Brent benchmark will lose ground to the Shanghai crude oil benchmark. More and more financial institutions are leaving London. The pound will have to mirror those changes.

We can see that, based on the need of rebalancing the new configuration of economic power with the global financial system and triggered by global tensions caused by Washington, a trend has emerged across the world toward reducing the dollar's role in trade and finance.

According to the governor of the Bank of England, Mark Carney, the transition from the dollar to another currency that could become prevailing wouldn't be quick. The greenback has been dominating over the last hundred years after it replaced the British sterling as the key reserve currency. "History suggests these transitions will not happen overnight. The US economy overtook Britain's in the second half of the 19th century, but it took until the 1920s before it became a dominant currency in international trade," Carney said.

It will take some time for the Chinese yuan to gain its fair share in international trade and finance, but the process has started and will be far quicker than the replacement of the British sterling with the dollar.

Looking for a proper anchor of value for the international monetary system is becoming an issue of a paramount importance since the trust in the main currencies is sloping down by the day. Gold is seen by an increasing number of players as a natural anchor of value and some are already preparing themselves to that by increasing their gold reserves. Holding physical gold is definitely the best hedge against a crash of any paper currency. Nevertheless, we need a trustful worldwide monetary and financial system. Paper money should be backed by gold through a comprehensive agreement signed in Bretton Woods or Shanghai. As this scenario of common sense will be strongly opposed by the "dollar establishment", we could see first a "gravitational scenario" when one or more countries will come up with gold-backed currencies, making them trustful means of value storage for those in search of minimizing the risks.

EUROPEAN UNION ECONOMIC INTEGRATION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mihaela MUSAT

Abstract

At European level, the economic integration aims to achieve economic solidarity by forming a complex network of interdependent links between the economic agents of the participant countries.

The viability of European economic integration depends primarily on the sharing of European democratic and cultural values by a state, and then on its economic capacity and performance. To contribute to the European Union development, the economic integration contributes by developing mutual exchanges and interdependences of national economies.

1. Brief history the economic integration concept

The "integration" concept was used, from its first graphic attestation, in 1620, and the beginning of our century, exclusively in the exact sciences. It was subsequently taken over and used extensively in the last half century to denote phenomena, processes, actions or states that were taking place in the sphere of politics, philosophy, culture, and, as "the economy lives in society, cultural, political and social, and these are very difficult to be dissociated from each other, as long as the real is a globality, meaning what we consider to be "the assemblies assembly ", of economy, too. In an economic sense, the term" integration "was initially used to describe the combination of sectors of production and sales units by concluding agreements between competing firms.

2. What is economic integration? Definition and importance.

Economic integration is defined as the main factor in eliminating economic boundaries between two or more economies. An economic boundary in this case is defined as a demarcation over which the actual or potential mobility of goods, services and production factors, as well as of communication flows, is relatively low. On both sides of an economic border, we find that the establishment of prices and quality of goods, services and factors is only marginally influenced by the flows across the border.

Economic integration involves the elimination of economic barriers between two or more states, barriers which can be defined as any obstacles that prevent or distort the mobility of the production factors. In an ideal world, where there are no nation-states or governments, economic integration could remain a mere integration of the markets without suffering any political influence. In the real world, however, economic integration is influenced by political factors, and in the case of the European integration process this aspect is quite obvious.

By economic integration, we also understand the complex process characteristic of the contemporary stage of society's development, which consists essentially in the intensification of inter-dependencies between different states, process conditioned by a cumulus of factors, of which an important role belongs to the technical-scientific revolution.

The fundamental importance of economic integration is represented by the growth of actual or potential competition. Economic integration can be regarded in different ways, depending on the context in which it is used, and can demonstrate various degrees of economic cooperation in a number of fields, such as: labor mobility and capital, payments, fiscal and monetary policies, etc.

At the same time, integration involves the action of embedding, incorporating or harmonizing into one. We understand the concept of economic integration as the need to build more and more economic spaces for the maximum use of production capacities. Economic integration aims to reduce costs for both consumers and producers and to increase trade between the countries involved in the agreement. The viability of European economic integration depends first and foremost on the sharing of European democratic and cultural rights by a state, and then on its economic capacity and performance.

The basic principles of economic integration are:

- Formation of a common economic space;
- Free movement of capital, goods, services and people,
- Legislation harmonization in the economic, monetary, financial and social field;
- Creating common institutions to which the participating countries transfer some economic competencies.

As economies become integrated, there is a lessening of trade barriers and economic and political coordination between countries increases

It can be said that in time, through integration, it is obtained the best structure of the international economy by removing the artificial obstacles, in order to optimize its operation, but also through the introduction of all stages and desirable elements of coordination and unification.

3. Stages of economic integration after B. Balassa

The complexity of economic integration and its depth radically different have led to the identification of several stages of the economic integration process. The stages approach was, in the first phase, outlined by B. Balassa, and its use is very wide.

The five stages and their characteristics, as identified by B. Balassa, are presented in Table 1. Of course that the initial Balassa stages need to be modified in different ways, but the approach is indispensable for understanding the studies and key aspects of the policy making.

Firstly, in the current world economy there are a number of preferential trade regimes whose objectives fail to reach even the first step in the table.

Secondly, the definitions of FEZ (FEZ = Free Exchange Zone/ZLS = Zona de Liber Schimb) and CU (CU = Customs Union/UV= Uniune Vamala) capture the essence of the GATT definitions, being widely used, but are not applied due to the absence of positive integration. In the case of customs unions, the absence of positive integration is deceptive, and it is possible to conceive a customs union only as a tariff union.

Thirdly, Balassa's PC suffers from a lack of positive integration, and if we interpret it, we notice that PC does not involve either the amortization of national economic regulations, nor any transfer of regulatory powers to the Union or or the harmonization of direct or indirect taxation.

| Nr.crt | Stage | Definition | Characteristics/comments |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1. | Free trade area (FTA) | *tariffs and quotas abolished for imports from area members*area members retain national tariffs (and quotas) against third countries | Essence of GATT definition; no positive integration |
| 2. | Customs union (CU) | *supressing discrimination for CU members in product markets*equalisation of tariffs (and no or common quotas) in trade with non-members | Essence of GATT definition; no positive integration |
| 3. | Common market (CM) | * a CU which also abolishes restrictions on factor movements | Is “beyond” GATT; definition should also include services; no positive integration |
| 4. | Economic union | *a CM with’some degree of harmonization of national economic policies in order to remove discrimination…due to disparities in these policies | Positive integration introduces; extremely vague |
| 5. | Total economic integration | *unification of monetary, fiscal, social and counter cyclical policies*setting up of a supranational authority where decisions are binding for the Member States | Centralist; vision of unitary state;Supranationality only introduced here |

Source: B. Balassa, The Theory of Economic Integration, Irwin, Homewood, Illinois, 1961

Fourthly, there is a conceptual problem related to how to differentiate Balassa's common market (CM) from the economic union. In Balassa's acception, the economic union approaches the adapted definition of a CM, combining positive and negative integration.

Fifthly, there is no guarantee that the final stage is a total economic integration. The reference framework seems to be that of a unitary state, which is inappropriate for economic and political reasons. It is possible to imagine more partial unions beyond the economic union, for example, fiscal union, monetary and political union.Due to alternative political assumptions about willingness to share sovereignty, problems can be analyzed using the economic theory of federalism.

Sixthly, the introduction of supra nationality only in the final stage can not be justified by economic or empirical reasons.

4. Advantages and costs of economic integration at European level

The process of European construction - from an institutional, economic or social point of view, but especially from a philosophical point of view, is a unique process in the history of mankind, this process being able to offer to it on one hand, a difficult and contradictory feature, and on the other hand, providing it with an extremely wide range of innovation at all levels.

The expression "economic integration" can have different meanings depending on the context in which it is used, and can at the same time demonstrate different degrees of economic cooperation in areas such as commerce, labor mobility, social security, or the coordination of investment plans.

The process of economic integration was not born and developed on the basis of theoretical constructions, but emerged and developed from a historical necessity, in a well-defined economically and politically bounded framework, developing simultaneously with the development of this economic plan.

In the last decades, the world economy has been deeply marked by the phenomenon of internationalization, the deepening of the world labor division and the growing economic interdependence of countries, that having both advantages and disadvantages.

By following the route, we note that the European Union wishes to promote humanistic and progressive values and to ensure that man is the master and, not the victim of the change in the world. Although the European Union was created to achieve a pacifist objective, the economic aspect was the one that managed to dynamise this European construction.

In order to establish broadly the process of economic integration at European level, in the context in which the main objectives of the European Union are to ensure peace, freedom, equality, respect for human rights, etc., we note that integration involves a permanent dialogue between the participating states regarding the procedures on harmonizing interests, obtaining consensus, developing and applying new forms of economic conduct.

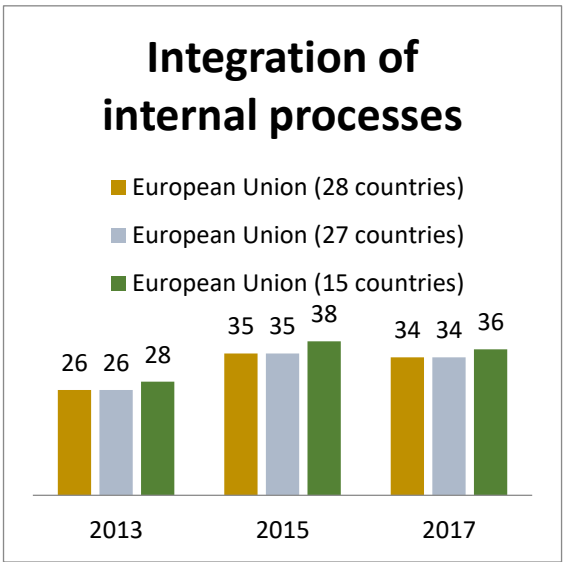
Among the advantages of economic integration, we could remember that this usually leads to a reduction in the trade cost, the availability improvement and a wider selection of goods and services, and the increase in efficiency leading to greater purchasing power, trade liberalization leads to market expansion, technology sharing and cross-border investment flows, and employment opportunities can be favored, and political cooperation between countries can be improved due to stronger economic ties that can contribute to peaceful resolution of conflicts and greater stability.

The question is: "What do the EU Member States gain if they integrate economically?" where the simplest and tangible answers refer to: raising real incomes, increasing national welfare, and immigration leading to poverty eradication.

Regarding to the costs of economic integration, the trade deviation and the national sovereignty erosion could influence the smooth running of the whole process, and goods and services can be harmful to host states, a phenomenon explained by the fact that each state has its own route through which it organizes and carries out its activities. At the same time, as a cost of economic integration at European level would be also considered the conflict of interests between different states.

5. Approaches to economic integration at EU level

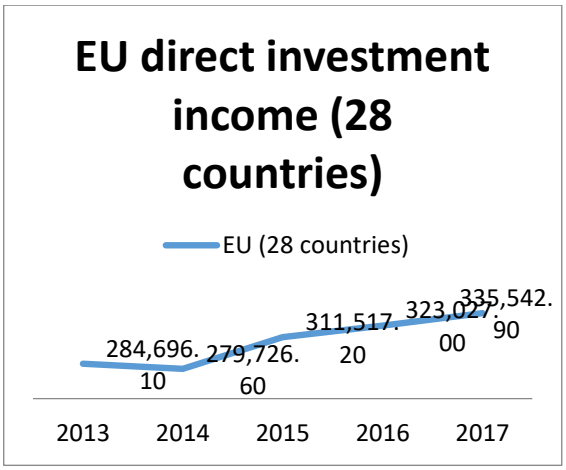
As regards the integration approach, we have identified the level of integration of internal processes at European level over a three-year period (2013, 2015, 2017), and we found that in the European Union consisting of 15 countries, which reflected the number of member countries in European Union before the accession of 10 candidate countries on the 1st of May 2004, the countries being: Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and United Kingdom, integration of internal processes was higher than the European Union consisting of 27 countries or the European Union consisting of 28 countries, with a significant increase in 2015 compared to 2013 and a slight decrease in 2017.



Source: Eurostat

During the 3 years we notice that we have equality in the internal integration process between the European Union consisting of 27 countries and the European Union consisting of 28 countries, the difference being made only by the European Union consisting of 15 countries.

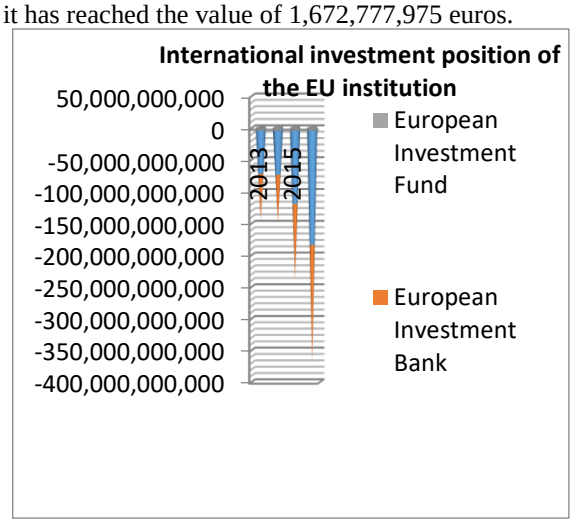
As for the development and the welfare of both the European Union and its citizens, in the process of economic integration the investments at European level are targeted.



Source: Eurostat

Following the analysis, we found that in the European Union direct investment revenue had a year-on-year growth trend. A slight decrease was recorded in 2014 as compared to 2013, but in the following years the growth was stimulated by a much higher value. If we were to explain in figures, we identify 2013, the year with 286,692.10 million and 2017 with a value of 335,542.90 million, which means that in just 4 years there was an increase of 48,850.8 million euros.

As regards the international investment position of the EU institutions, we have carried out a 4-year analysis and we have identified that the European Investment Fund has shown a year-on-year increase. If in 2013 it has a value of 1,119,370,665 euros, in 2016 it has reached the value of 1,672,777,975 euros.



Souce: Eurostat

However, following the European Investment Bank's track, we note that it has recorded the biggest losses. We have a loss in 2013 of -72,969,398,534 euros, an even higher debt in 2014, amounting to -74,831,917,604 and in 2016 it already reaches the amount of -184,726,027,800.

6. Conclusion

The European Union is the most advanced form of integration, it has an interstate and open nature, and it is favored by the existence of a relatively similar lifestyle due to the fact that it has the same type of civilization in most countries, to the existence of a strong political will to achieve integration and to the experience and confirmation of the possibility of advanced integration offered by other integrationist organizations for the creation of common markets in Europe.

The theory of economic integration followed the thread of the pragmatic development of the integrative process, analyzing the quantitative and qualitative transformations, the causes that determine it, the effects it is generates, the factors that favor it, but also the aims towards which it aims. The theory of economic integration is a reflection on the theoretical plan of accumulations where integration, in its various forms, has become an undeniable reality of our day.

Europe presents a unique combination of a high and rising degree of economic integration and the most volatile labor market. Adopting a single currency will remove the possibility of devaluing the exchange rate to boost competitiveness and create jobs at the risk of closing a door that might be convenient for the political system.

We talk about economic integration, and we note that precisely those countries that have not joined the Eurozone understand that they can not benefit from freely using the exchange rate to boost competitiveness.

Labor market institutions are designed to protect employees at the cost of economic efficiency, and directly, the most visible effects are poor employment, and perhaps growth reduction. Economic integration challenges these institutions by sharpening the conflict between social protection needs and economic efficiency. Analyzing things so, we find that, on one hand, each country can find that the general economic environment is more volatile, because there is also a reduced macroeconomic stabilization capacity. On the other hand, economic integration means more competition in Europe and favors countries with flexible labor markets.

We also see economic integration as a process involving a set of common policies in all sectors of the economy, free trade and free movement of people, services and capital, harmonization of legislation in the involved countries or areas, as well as the joint institutions on which the participating countries transfer some competencies of economic nature.

In order to achieve economic integration, it must be seen the fact that it also depends on certain factors such as: excluding discrimination, effective distribution of some competences, focusing on legitimate aspirations or collaborating in decision-making processes.

By economic integration, both the EU economy and the Member States' economies taken separately acquire increased dimensions, internally efficiency and robustness. Economic integration is achieved concurrently, progressively and gradually in all areas. As a result, there are more opportunities to ensure economic stability, accelerate economic growth and create more jobs, all of which bring improvements and direct benefits to EU citizens.

THEORETICAL ELEMENTS OF MOTIVATION IN ORGANIZATIONS

Nicoleta Georgeta PANAIT[*]
Costin Alexandru PANAIT[]

Abstract

The motivation has been extensively analyzed over time and a set of theories and models have been formulated to find answers to the question: "Are people born self-motivated or motivation has to be induced?" Performance at individual, organizational and macroeconomic level have direct implications on the competitiveness of a firm and a country.

The organization can only cope with the required competitiveness changes by focusing managers efforts on what the customer wants or the market; in daily work between subordinate managers, employee motivation/satisfaction will or may not favor the firm's effort on the market. In order to succeed in daily work with subordinates, managers / decision-makers need to know, understand as fully as possible the motivation process within the organizational framework.

There are several theoretical developments that emphasize the organizational factors in trying to explain the motivation of the employee at work, namely the factors that predominantly belong to the company or organization (the salary system, the management team, the control-supervision system, the communication among the members teams, feedback, how to promote positions, admitting employee initiatives, participation in decision-making).

The aim of the research is to structure and highlight both existing and novelty concepts of motivation, to analyze their impact on employee performance within the organization, the link between motivation theory and managerial practice.

Keywords: motivational phenomenon, performance, environmental factors, motivating factors, motivation systems, non-financial motivation.

1. Motivation in the organization

In global management theory, there are several attempts to explain the motivation within the organizational framework, to explain what motivates the employee to be performing in the work he has done. These theories are especially offered by psychologists, sociologists and other specialists, and are based on various hypotheses or social contexts presumed.

None of the approaches, including motivation theories, can be considered as the most correct; each contributes to the understanding of human behavior in an organization and has its limits; on the whole, they suggest what the manager needs to do to motivate his subordinates.

Scientific papers and themes that address the subject of motivation in organizations are numerous. Motivation is a much-researched research theme both in the past and present, supported by the fact that it is a basic element for the disciplines that study the organizational environment - human resource management, organizational psychology and organizational behavior (Latham, 2007) but also by the central position of motivation and work satisfaction.

In more recent approaches about employee motivation and the impact of human potential in the modern economy, we are discussing about identifying the special talents of each employee. Coffman and Molina are of the opinion that the individual's emotions are given by mechanisms that hierarchies the objectives of the human brain; the two authors propose the concept of emotional economy of a complex mechanism of motivation / empowerment of employees.

The research titled "Theoretical Elements of Motivation in Organizations" has as a subject of study the analysis of the issue of the motivation of employees in a double perspective, on the one hand it addresses the motivation through the individual's perspective and its psychology, and on the other hand the motivational practices used organizations.

From a theoretical point of view, the study aims to bring more insight into the definition and analysis of the concept of motivation. It is necessary to understand what motivates/demotes an employee in his work. People are the most important asset category that an organization can use, respectively employee's process information to value other assets; in fact, no organization can exist without the human resources that make up it. Paradoxically, however, people are the only asset that can act against the organization's goals; Simply put, if they are not motivated and interested in the objectives proposed by the company, various groups/teams in the organization will end up dismantling their efforts, generating major conflicts, acting against others and/or against the interests of the organization.

Behavior is a result of the interaction of the personality of the individual with the organizational and working environment, and man, as a social and organizational being, is under the pressure of material, physiological, aesthetic, moral, ideological needs, etc., and under the pressure of some motivational factors which managers direct and direct the behavior of the individual towards the achievement of organizational goals.

Thus, only through a collaborative effort, through appropriate mechanisms to attract employees towards the objectives proposed by the firm, through mechanisms to motivate / influence them through the construction of efficient management teams can create an organizational climate that favors consumption energy and latent creativity of employees.

2. Criteria for defining organizations

In the perspectives of the contemporary authors "Organizations are human creations. They are entities in which individuals interact and interdependently work in a structure to achieve common goals. They are presented in many forms, and their purposes are varied and cannot always be implicitly/explicitly shared among all members of the organization "(Furnham, 1997, p. 6).

At the same time, Furnham release the opinion that "Organizations are complex systems that have inputs and outputs of many different types and paths to turn them into the last ones" (ibidem). The two French researchers Petit and Dubois use the organization cannot be summed up by the sum of individuals, groups, workshops, offices or services - these elements are in a state of necessary interdependence in order to achieve an official objective "Interdependence is the foundation of the unity of the organization, being not only operative, but also of a social nature, enrolling in the psychology of individuals and groups as well as in the relationships of these" (Petit and Dubois, 1998, p. 10 ).

In our opinion, the extensive definitions become enumerating-descriptive without surprising the defining elements of the organizations, and the restrictive ones seem to be elliptical, with many other explanations and additional information. As such, we will present the definition of organizations combining the historical criterion with the problematic one:

- stage 60s - organizations were defined in terms of goals, formal structures and in integrative terms;
- the 1970s and 1980s define organizations in terms of human activities;
- the third stage in the late 1980s and the current period in which we define organizations in terms of controlled performance.

Among the many definitions are in terms of purpose and structure. Defining organizations in terms of goals is based on a general idea present in sociology that sociologists tend to associate and assign goals to any form of social organization, and how organizations are such extremely important forms; it was considered the fulfillment of the goals for which they were created is their defining element:

- "organizations are social units (or human groups) built and rebuilt intentionally to pursue specific objectives" (Etzioni, 1961, p. 207);
- "organizations are structured to achieve a particular type of objective" (Parsons, 1964, p. 118);
- "organizations have explicit, limited and formal objectives" (Udy, 1965, p. 51).

It can be concluded that there are at least two essential characteristics of the organizations: the first - the presence of the purpose as defining notes, and the second characteristic the presence of collective, specific, explicit, limited, official goals, etc.

The major advantage of defining organizations in terms of purpose is that we are provided with information about the specifics of the organization, the purpose of which is to specify the nature of the organization. Then, depending on the degree of achievement of the goal, we can know the level of efficiency or development of the organization. An organization that achieves its intended purpose at a maximum level can be considered as mature, efficient, while another that achieves its goal at a minimal level or even at all will certainly be a troubled organization. Organizational success or failure is therefore directly proportional to the degree of goal completion.

3. Theories about motivation

The human resource is one of the most important resources of the organization (Burlea-Șchiopoiu, 2008). Therefore, one of the factors influencing the quality of human resources is motivation.

From the definition of the motivation concept to the elaboration of human resources motivation strategies in organizations, a series of stages have been carried out and more motives have been developed. Ancient Greece was the cradle of hedonism, through which philosophers explained what motivated human behavior: in pursuit of pleasure, with the least effort, individuals headed for things that would produce comfort and satisfaction (Cherrington, 1989, p. 167-168). The complex issues of the field of motivation generated the formulation of a large number of theories, whose competition and limitation, together with controversies regarding the concept of motivation, are also transferred to the attempts to classify or systematize them.

By chronologically approaching the concept of motivation, it can be seen that, even with Frederick W. Taylor, all authors have attempted to explain the factors that motivate people, but have shown less concern about the causes and ways in which it occurs and sustains motivation in time. Thus, Nicolescu and Verboncu (1999, p. 474) present three categories of theories, delimited by the Spanish professor Juan Pérez Lopez, depending on the hypotheses regarding the nature of the motivation of the staff:

- mechanistic theories, which presuppose that employees are motivated only by extrinsic motivations, human behavior being conceived as a mechanistic system in which a person receives from the outside any stimulus - salary, prize, social status - in exchange for the action he made;

− psychosocial theories, in which human behavior is conceived as a biological system, which considers that employees are motivated by both extrinsic and intrinsic motivations, the latter through the development of abilities, the enrichment of knowledge, the pleasure to perform a certain work generating the satisfaction of needs or desires the person concerned;

− anthropological theories, which also take into account the transcendent motivations besides the extrinsic and intrinsic ones. Transcendent motivations mean those consequences that a person's action generates over others or others, positive consequences that are related to the assumption of satisfaction of needs.

Mathis et al. (1997, p. 40) propose the classification of the main motivational theories into three main groups: content theories, process theories and cognitive theories, whose presentation is in Table no. 1.

Table no. 1. Classification of motivational theories

| Categorii | Caracteristici | Teorii | Exemple |
|---|---|---|---|
| Content Theories | refers to factors that incite or initiate motivated behavior | Need hierarchy (Maslow)X - Y (McGregor)Bifactorial (Herzberg)ERD (Alderfer)Acquisition of successes (McClelland) | motivation through money, social status and achievements |
| Process theories | addresses the factors that direct the behavior | Expectation (Vroom)Equity (Adams)Goals (E.A. Locke) | motivation by the inner start of the individual for work, performance and recognition |
| Theories of strengthening | addresses the factors that lead to the repetition of a behavior | Strengthening (Skinner) | motivation by rewarding behavior |

Motivation is an essential element of success combined with competence; it allows individuals to accomplish what they have proposed. Motivation means working smart, not just working hard. In essence, motivation is the engine, the energy that starts the action. It is also often said that a motivated man is a happy man. However, we must not confuse motivation with satisfaction. Even though the two notions can often be associated, it also happens that dissatisfaction may give rise, due to the state of dissatisfaction it creates, to a great motivation to achieve the set goals. There may also be a link between frustrated degree and motivated degree; as the actual situation of the individual is difficult to bear, even producing frustrations, the more the desire to achieve the goals that allow him to achieve satisfaction is great.

Another interesting proposal found in the literature is Buzea (2010, p. 26) and is based on the combination of two criteria - the chronological evolution in the field of motivation proposed by P. Latham (2007) and the evolution of the organization management theory of the human resource - based on them, resulting in the diagram of the development stages of the work motivation research presented in Figure 1.

Source: Buzea (2010), Motivation. Theories and Practices, European Institute, Iasi, p. 26.

However, the most significant theories can be grouped into two categories, based on the thematic criterion and agreed by many researchers (proposed in 1970 by Campbell, Dunnett, Lawler and Weick), depending on the focus on either the causes of motivation, or on the actual behavior:

- motivation content theories that address the issue of motivation in a traditional manner, addressing the factors that motivate people, direct, support, and stop behaviors;
- theories of the motivation process that promote the approach from a dynamic perspective of work motivation, the way in which behavior is committed, directed, sustained and stopped, and targets the motivational mechanisms that drive human behavior.

As far as we are concerned, we consider it appropriate to analyze the motivational theories according to this final criterion, the thematic one, here being the most influential and presented the theories in the field studied, with implications and applicability in the organizational environment, together with the representative approaches of at the beginning of the last century (scientific management and the school of human relations), which illustrates the issue of motivation.

The theory of expectation or expectation theory was developed and presented by Victor H. Vroom in his work called "Work and Motivation" (1964), being the most well-known process theory and a model developed in the rational choice paradigm. Vroom argues that employee motivation is the result of three key variables, expectation, instrumentality and valence, and has as its starting point expectation or hope - as energizing forces of motivational behavior. In this theory it is stated that motivation depends on the extent to which people want something specific and the degree to which they think they can get it.

Source: Burciu, A. Introduction to Management, Economic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008, p.394

Waiting is an action-outcome association; it has a subjective dimension, as it is the result of a cognitive process of assessing the relationship between behavior and outcome, and expresses the employee's belief that engaging in an action will lead to a certain outcome. Waiting can take different forms of intensity, taking the maximum intensity (value 1 - the action is followed by a result) when the employee is convinced that a certain level of effort will lead to a certain result and the minimum intensity (value 0 - the action is not followed of a result) when the employee is not perceived as capable of successfully pursuing an activity (either due to his / her deficiencies in certain qualifications or abilities required by the activity or due to organizational deficiencies linked to the lack of technical endowment, lack of information or appropriate equipment, etc.), or if the employee expects to be rewarded even if he has successfully completed his work.

Instrumentality is a result-result association and expresses the employee's belief in the likelihood of obtaining rewards commensurate with his performance or contribution to work.

Valence represents a person's preference (desire, attraction) to certain results and is reportable to his or her own work valorization system. Thus, the individual associates work, specific attributes depending on context, from positive to negative, which enhances his attraction, indifference or rejection of engagement in a given work action. Valencia can be: positive when the person prefers to get the expected result of his engagement; null, if the person is indifferent to whether or not he obtains the result; negative, when the person does not want to get the expected result.

Vroom approached his problem theory and the problem of work satisfaction, considered as a dimension of motivation, which he considered to be the conceptual equivalent of labor valence. Thus, he considers that the employee's desire to achieve a positive outcome (positive valence) or to avoid it (negative valence) is not based on the intrinsic value of the outcome, but on the anticipated satisfaction or dissatisfaction associated with the achievement of the results.

Thus, the model proposed by Vroom is shown in Figure no. 3. taking into account that motivation is a resultant combination of the three variables.

The theory of expectation is a complex theory because it takes into account the fact that each action (behavior) of an individual is the result of an individual decision-making process, based on subjective perceptions about the relationship between behavior and outcome. The theory implies that employees have the choice of possible actions that can lead to more results different from each other, some that the individual wants, and others he does not want, those that have the most intense positive force. In this respect, the fundamental question of motivation at work, "why do people work?", Vroom's theory states that "a person will choose to work when the valency of the results he expects as a result of work has a value more intense than the valency of the expected results in the situation when it does not work "(Vroom, 1964/1995, p. 35).

Also, some elements of motivation are treated and felt differently by each individual: thus, for one person, promotion can be primordial, wage growth and gaining experience - very important - and the sacrifice of family and social life can be of negligible importance; for another person, family and social life may be the most important, wage increases may be of medium importance, and promotion may be undesirable because it involves overtime or some additional responsibilities and tasks. In the first case, the individual may be motivated to work a lot and work long hours over the program, while in the second case, the individual may not be motivated to do so.

In essence, motivation is determined by the whole set of outputs, as well as the importance that each individual attaches to each exit, and the force or intensity of motivation according to Vroom's opinion results from the product of differentiated values of valence and expectation:

*Force (motivation) = Valence * Waiting*

The theory of expectation suggests that managers need to be aware of the fact that employees work for several reasons, that these expected reasons or rewards may change over time, so employees need to be clearly shown how they can get the rewards they have I want. It should also be borne in mind that performance depends on abilities and motivation (Performance = Ability * Motivation), and when one of them has low values, then the performance at work will be low. Thus, the theory suggests to managers that they should set up an effective reward system to consider linking rewards to performance levels and personalizing rewards. At the same time, this theory explains motivation as a complex process, in which individuals analyze their chances of obtaining certain results in their work and appreciates the extent to which these results are appealing and useful to them.

Conclusions:

Due to the complexity of motivation and the fact that there is no single answer to the question "what motivates people to work", we analyzed in the second part of the paper the different theories formulated by a number of researchers. We have emphasized that there are many reasons that influence people's behavior and performance. All of these theories provide us with a framework within which we will focus our attention on how we can motivate employees to work efficiently. It is essential for the manager to understand the basics of motivation, given that a highly motivated employee has a greater chance of reaching a higher quality product or service than an employee who is lacking motivation.

In an organization, the success of the the qualitative side of the human factor and his motivation towards the work performed are ensured to the greatest extent. Satisfaction with work is associated with performance up to a point, from which performance influences satisfaction. The direct link between performance and work satisfaction is mainly provided by the feedback and reward system.

Motivation has an essential role in preparing the action we are going to take; is the basis for the choices we make; is the sentiment generated by viewing the purpose of our action.

We found that the majority of theoreticians who developed the motivational theories, approached the motivation from different points of view, generated by the diversity and evolution of socio-cultural conditions, the theories and motivation models of the employees cannot be applied by the managers, they are correlated and combined into a reward system that will have a positive impact on employees' morale and satisfaction, increasing their motivation and involvement in the work done and implicitly in achieving the organization's goals. Only through collaboration effort, through appropriate mechanisms to attract employees to the objectives proposed by the firm, through mechanisms to motivate / influence them through the construction of efficient management teams can lead to increased performance.

From our point of view, a sufficient / appropriate, pre-neuronal or non-precursor motivation of the company's human resources, accompanied by a well-thought-out marketing policy along with appropriate management strategies at the top of the organizational chart, can ensure the success of the business in perspective. In the company's management, the real meaning of an employee's action or behavior, the attitude adopted by him in a given context cannot be perceived without understanding the reasons that have generated them. Thus, behind the action of the individual there are usually some reasons; knowledge of the reasons supports the attempt to predict human behavior, supports the attempt to unify the efforts of an organization aimed at achieving clearly defined objectives.

EXPLORING THE INFLUENCE OF ONLINE CONSUMER BRAND BOYCOTTS ON BRAND EQUITY

Otilia-Elena PLATON[*]

Abstract

When something detrimental to consumer's principles occurs, they tend to criticize the situation and to take up action, using the Internet to virally spread their opinions and adopting a resistance behavior, thus punishing the company and refusing to buy its brands. On social media platforms consumers can become increasingly vocal through boycotts and consumers dissatisfactions spread almost instantaneously on the Internet. Such consumer-led boycotts can affect a company's long-term branding efforts. In this context, the management of brand equity, and especially of brand trust, brand affect and brand loyalty, poses a challenge for companies that do not act or communicate in a suitable way. This paper tries to identify the types of consumer boycotts, the reasons why boycotts can occur, their impact on brand equity and it aims at presenting some reccomendations for managing consumer boycotts.

1. Introduction

A consumer boycott is an important issue for every company because it can affect its general development in a negative way in the long term. Since nowadays consumers can almost instantaneously spread negative information about a brand or a company on social media, it is important to immediately react and solve any problem that can lead to a crisis. Ignoring consumers' complaints can have a great impact on a company's branding efforts. When consumers are deceived by a company or a brand, they distrust the company and its brands and their attitude changes. Consumers are usually involving themselves in boycotting activities as a sign of disapproval and protest and they can refuse to buy certain brands when something detrimental to their principles or beliefs occurs. Although the operationalization of a boycott is represented by the refusal of purchasing a certain brand, the implications of a boycott are much broader. All these actions may have serious consequences, triggering a crisis of brand image, brand trust, brand, affect, brand loyalty or even brand equity overall.

The reasons why consumers engage in boycotting actions are numerous and it is important to identify each driver. This paper aims to form the basis for investigating the factors prompting consumer boycotts and for analyzing the relationship between consumer brand boycotts and brand equity. This paper also aims to identify the reasons why consumers engage in boycotts, to study their potential harm to brand equity and it aims to emphasize the important of adopting a suitable strategy for managing consumer boycotts and protecting the brand against future boycotts.

2. Consumer brand boycotts

The term consumer boycott was defined by Friedman (1985) "as an attempt by one or more parties to achieve certain objectives by urging individual consumers to refrain from making selected purchases in the marketplace"[1]. According to Kozinets and Handelman (1998) a boycott appears when it exists an actively organized and collectively encouraged behavior to punish a company by refusing to buy its brands[2]. Thus, a boycott can be an individual act of resistance and unwillingness to buy a certain brand, but it usually takes the form of a collective activity or reaction.

On social media individuals can be easily influenced and usually a boycott becomes a collective refusal or resistence to purchase certain brands. Consumers' attitude can be easily influenced on social media because the sense of community makes the individuals to feel bonded. The social influence is an important factor involved in this process. Opinion leaders have the capacity to voice opinions and influence others to perform certain behaviors, including calling for boycott campaigns. Although on social media people generally express their personal opinions, their actions are a result of a collectively reaction created around a certain subject of discussion.

An important aspect of consumer boycott is the boycott attitude. The term boycott attitude refers "to the opinions and feelings that a consumer has regarding boycott activities"[3]. As it can be seen, the boycott attitude involves both rational and emotional aspects. According to Chiu (2016), boycott attitude can be driven by: perceived deception, animosity or emotional factors (anger, contempt and umbrage), altruism, and perceived risk. According to Albrecht et al. (2013), other factors that can motivate a consumer to engage in a boycott are: "the perceived success likelihood of a boycott, a consumer's susceptibility to normative influences, the costs associated with the boycott, such as availability of substitutes or preference for boycotted products, instrumental and clean hand motivations, expressive motivations, the desire for social change, self-enhancement, and the perceived egregiousness of the company's actions"[4].

Besides adopting a boycott attitude, consumers involve in the actual boycott due to many reasons. Consumers' involvement "implies that a boycott topic represents an exciting and therefore motivating issue"[5] for them. "Boycott effectiveness is highly reliant upon consumer willingness to engage or disengage in the boycott activities"[6].

Chiu (2016) mentions that consumers tend to participate in a boycott action because they believe that they can cause change. Consumers are becoming more socially aware that their opinions matter and that their behavior and attitude can affect companies. Thus, according to Paek and Nelson (2009), boycotting is perceived by the individuals as a form of socially responsible consumer behavior. Consumers are generally boycotting in order to push companies toward more ethical or responsible practices. Adopting a boycott attitude is considered an altruistic behavior by some consumers because "it is driven by a motivation in which consumers perceive themselves as helpers who can protect others from harmful causes"[7].

According to Sen et al. (2001), boycotts can be classified in two main categories[8]:

- economic boycotts: they occur when consumers intend to change the unfair marketing or business practices of companies,
- social/ethical control boycotts: they occur when consumers try to force companies toward specific ethical or socially responsible behaviors.

In today's marketplace, consumers tend to judge companies against social responsibility criteria and, according to Klein et al. (2004), they "expect companies to act in an environmentally and ethically responsible manner"[9]. If companies ignore these expectations and fail to act in a socially responsible way, they can easily become the target of consumer resistance behavior.

According to Fazel (2015)[10], boycotts are usually triggered for two main purposes, therefore they can be also classified in two main categories:

- instrumental boycotts: they occur when consumers intends to force a company to change a disputed procedure or policy,
- expressive boycotts: they occur when consumers are displeasured by the actions of the company.

Consumers can exert a social control over companies through the collective power that they gain when they decide to engage in a boycott. By their decision to buy or not to buy certain brands "boycotters intentionally use their 'purchase votes' to favour (or disfavour) firms that make (or do not make) positive societal impacts"[11].

3. Brand equity

It is already well-known that brand equity is one of the most valuable assets a company can possess. When a call to action request appears in the form of a boycott much of the branding effort can be affected. In traditional marketing, "the marketer has enormous control over the use of one-way communications that build and enhance brand equity"[12]. But the growth of social media changed the way consumers communicate and poses some important challenges in the management of brand equity, especially of brand trust, brand affect and brand loyalty. In this context, marketers need to become proactive in protecting their brand equity. Any type of information, detrimental to consumer's principles or beliefs, can easily make a brand vulnerable to online consumer boycotts.

Although it is well-known that consumer boycotts have an impact on brand equity, it is very difficult to establish the value of the financial losses attributable to online consumer boycotts because "there are no publically known metrics that help firms measure the discontent and actual boycott behavior"[13].

In general, on social media consumer brand boycotts have a short-term manifestation, but some of them "have the potential for greater long-term harm"[14], influencing consumers' trust or even loyalty.

A significant competitive advantage for many companies, with strong effects on their commercial success, is the consumers' brand loyalty. The customer's loyalty is considered a key factor for long-term success of companies and, because of this, brand loyalty came to be compared by Kapferer (2005) to "a Holy Grail for marketers"[15]. Loyalty is a complex concept and two of the main perspectives from which it is usually approached are: the behavioral brand loyalty approach (the action or intention to repeat the purchase of a certain brand) and the attitudinal brand loyalty approach (the consumer's psychological involvement and commitment towards a certain brand)[16]. As presented in the specialized literature, the main determinants of brand loyalty are brand trust and brand affect[17].

Brand trust is one of the most important elements that form brand equity. "Brand trust involves the credibility, integrity, and benevolence that a consumer attributes to the brand"[18]. In order to build trust, companies have to communicate in a transparent manner with their consumers, in both favorable and unfavorable contexts, and to provide a sense of honesty, openness, respect, responsibility and reliability.

Like brand trust, brand affect is another important element that leads to the development of brand equity. Brand affect represents a consumers' emotional response towards a certain brand. A consumer becomes emotionally and psychologically attached to a brand following positive experiences with it. The main effect of this type of commitment and attachment "is to make consumer behavior more resistant to change by fixing brand choice in the minds of consumers"[19]. For companies and their brands it is very important to ensure positive experiences for consumers. This way, in time, they can develop a close relationship between the brand and consumers. Long term consumer-brand relationships and loyalty are "built on the foundation of brand affect"[20].

4. The influence of online consumer brand boycotts on brand equity

When linking online consumer brand boycotts and brand equity it is important to analyze the effect of the factors prompting consumer boycott attitude on some of the most important elements of brand equity, namely brand trust, brand affect and brand loyalty.

In general, if a company or a brand deceives consumers through a certain type of behavior or attitude, consumers will start to distrust it. The lack of trust further affects consumers' purchase intentions. Building brand trust takes a lot of time and effort, but its collapse can be instantaneous. "Brands failing to earn or maintain trust will inevitably find themselves out of favor"[21] and in the case of a boycott, companies risk to diminish their brand trust.

In this context, the factor that could help a brand is the consumers' attachement towards it. A strong brand affect from a highly committed customer "might be a protective barrier to boycott calls"[22].

Considering that brand trust and brand affect represent the basis of a strong brand loyalty, it is also important to determine whether an increased loyalty makes a customer less likely to participate in a boycott activity. "With respect to boycotts, increased loyalty to a particular brand should increase the psychological 'cost' of engaging in a boycott"[23].

Taking into consideration the main four drivers of a boycott attitude, proposed by Chiu (2016), namely: perceived deception, perceived risk, emotional factors and altruism, and the two main drivers of brand loyalty, namely: brand trust and brand affect, a conceptual model regarding the relationship between all these elements is presented in figure 1.

The model poposes the hypothesis that a consumer's boycott attitude influences brand trust and brand affect. The model also wants to analyze the direct effect of consumer's brand trust and brand affect on brand loyalty and the indirect effect of brand trust on brand loyalty through brand affect. Model validation will be conducted through a future research.

5. Case study: Gillette campaign "We believe: The Best Men Can Be"

As it has been presented, consumers are generally boycotting in order to push companies toward more ethical or responsible practices. But what happens when a company decides to communicate a socially responsible message and the result is consumer resistance behavior and a boycott threat?

The newest Gillette campaign managed to be both appreciated for speaking up about redefining masculinity and also criticized for this attempt at the same time. The campaign called "We believe: The Best Men Can Be" was launched on January 13, 2019 and it was based on an ad addressing the issue of toxic masculinity. The central message of the campaign was that men must change their behavior in order to stop unacceptable behaviors like bullying, fighting and sexual harassment. A part of the message that Gillette posted on its official webpage in order to support the campaign was: "It's time we acknowledge that brands, like ours, play a role in influencing culture. And as a company that encourages men to be their best, we have a responsibility to make sure we are promoting positive, attainable, inclusive and healthy versions of what it means to be a man. With that in mind, we have spent the last few months taking a hard look at our past and coming communication and reflecting on the types of men and behaviors we want to celebrate. We're inviting all men along this journey with us – to strive to be better, to make us better, and to help each other be better"[24].

Although the company intended to communicate a positive message about a social problem, the result managed to polarize the audience in two sides: those who supported the campaign and those who called for the brand boycott.

Gillette started using the tagline "The Best a Man Can Get" since 1989 and for almost 30 years the brand successfully built its communication strategy around this statement. A reason why Gillette created this new campaign was that "there is recent research suggesting that millennials give more credit to brands using corporate social responsibility appeals"[25]. Unfortunately, the overall reaction on social media was overwhelmingly negative. After this campaign was launched, the hashtag #boycottgillette was used by numerous social media users on Twitter and other social media platforms. Many consumers criticised the message, claiming the brand was attacking masculinity. Consumers "slammed the company's marketing strategy and said the ad alienated its entire customer base"[26].

This situation was generated due to the fact that although the brand's intent was right, addressing a key social issues, the execution of the ad was problematic, causing some men to feel insulted by the spot and to consider it offensive and sexist.

Fortunately, the backlash didn't influenced the market share of the brand's parent company P&G and the shares were up by 0.9 percent the day after the campaign was launched (as it can be seen in figure 2), as controversy still rumbled on. Although at the financial level the company wasn't affected, it is important to determine to what extent the brand trust, brand affect and brand loyalty were influenced. It is important to watch over time if the ad has affected the sales and if Gillette somehow has alienated its longtime customers with this social message. Therefore, much more needs to be learned about the nuances of what is right and what is wrong when a brand decide to address a sensitive social problem.

6. Conclusions

For every company the achievement of its objectives is dependent on the consumers' reactions and consent to their business and marketing practices. From an economic perspective, every unfair practice of a company will be immediately punished by the consumers through their refusal to buy certain products or services. From a social perspective, the companies that don't act in a socially responsible way, can easily become the target of a consumer boycott, thus being forced to adopt a specific responsible behavior. The consequences of a consumer boycott can be represented by a loss in sales or even an important damage of brand equity. Therefore, for companies it is important to identify the possible drivers of a consumer boycott and to prevent this kind of actions to happen.

In order to prevent a possible consumer boycott, companies must maintain trust among their consumers. Every perceived deception or inconsistency can make the consumers no longer trust the brand. Ignoring the consumers' interests can lead to protests and boycotts.

Building a strong emotional connection between brands and consumers can also help to prevent a possible boycott.

To enable boycotting to become less harmful, marketers need to understand what makes consumers engage in boycott activities. Also they need to understand the relationship between consumer boycott attitude and three of the main element of brand equity: brand trust, brand affect and brand loyalty.

The proposed model, which will be analysed and validated through future research, aims at offering an input for a strategic analysis of the boycott situations. Researchers in marketing need to understand consumer protest behavior in order to assist managers who wish to develop appropriate strategic responses.

WAYS OF ENHANCING COMPETITIVENESS WITHIN A NATIONAL MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Mădălina Antoaneta RĂDOI[*]
Alexandru OLTEANU[]

Abstract

The interest of the specialized literature for the competitiveness of the organization has derived, on the one hand, from the studies on countries and regions competitiveness and, on the other hand, from the concern of both managers and researchers about identifying effective ways of meeting customers needs and of dominating competitors. Basically, the competitive advantage could aim at either reaching a low cost of products or services or differentiating them in one or several ways against the competitor products.

The competitiveness of an organization derives from the price / performance attributes of the existing products. An organization attains sustainable competitiveness if they succeed creating and maintaining several core competencies that would generate effects through replication and innovation. This approach may be adopted and applied as a specific definition of healthcare organizations competitiveness, as practice shows us that core competences become the fundamentals of the strategy and even competitive advantages and sources of key success factors.

This paper aims at reviewing a healthcare unit having a single specialty providing high-performance and very high difficulty medical services. The original idea was to obtain a competitive advantage by introducing an entirely new, innovative treatment method to the clinic, which is also complementary to the medical services traditionally offered.

1. Introduction

The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) defines competitiveness as "the capacity of competing organizations, branches, regions, and states of sustainably ensuring a high yield from the use of production factors, as well as a high income resulting from the efficient use of the labour force".[1,2]While competitiveness at national level is most often seen as a means used to improve public services for enhancing quality of life based on a rational use of the country's resources, competitiveness at organization level focuses on the capacity of companies of understanding the competition environment and of adjusting to the market needs.

As a matter of fact, Michael Porter shows that productivity is an essential factor in determining long-term quality of life, as this is the basis of the national income, while national competitiveness is expressed by national productivity[3]. This approach could bring in the idea that countries enter competition to ensure a quality of life as good as possible for their citizens, while naturally searching for increasingly high productivity. In today's age of Globalization, the performance of a state is increasingly linked to the contribution companies bring to the national budget. Krugman considers that, in fact, "companies rather than states are the ones competing against each other"[4]. His reasoning is related to the competitiveness outcome: if a non-competitive company cannot pay their employees, suppliers also become bankrupt; not the same applies for a state. Therefore, public policies become extremely important in shaping the companies' competitiveness drivers by means of competition policy, tax system, subsidy award, etc. On the same page, we can also consider the opinion of the Competitiveness Advisory Group[5] (a group of 13 experts appointed by the European Commission in 1995 whose purpose is to study the European Union competitiveness) according to which the competitiveness concept involves productivity, efficiency, and profitability and it's a means of achieving social wellbeing without increasing inflation. Michael Porter provides a clear delimitation: productivity is mainly the prerogative of national competitiveness, while efficiency, profitability, and achievement of market targets are related par excellence to the companies competitiveness[6].

Literature Review

The current competition context shows a clear distinction between static and dynamic competitiveness. Static, conventional competitiveness focuses on competition by price, as companies rely on the low cost of the labour force and of the resources, which enables them to maintain good competitiveness by keeping or reducing production costs[7]. Dynamic competitiveness is associated with the fluctuating nature of the competition environment that not only focuses on the relationship between costs and prices, but also on the capacity of companies to think strategically, to learn, to rapidly adapt to the market conditions, and to innovate. Considering this, competitiveness is defined as the capacity of companies to permanently upgrade their technological facilities in order to manufacture competitive products (Berinde, 2006). Considering the economic reality in most fields, we are entitled to state the dynamic competitiveness approach is much more appropriate nowadays. An organization attains sustainable competitiveness if they succeed creating and maintaining several core competencies that would generate effects through replication and innovation. The factors that could contribute to the correct identification of dynamic competitiveness of an organization include: the leadership, the competences, and the resources of the organization, the strategic options and actions of the organizations and of their competitors, the current competitiveness level, the opportunities, and the threats within the competition environment[8].

The success of the organization mostly depends of the competitive advantages of the organization in relation to their competitors. The need of permanently assessing the competitive position of the company is essential for two reasons: (a) to assess their own capacity of entering and staying on the market (b) to achieve competitive positioning against their competitors, thus achieving competitive advantage.

Peter Drucker[9] has identified eight performance areas with a determinant role for the long-term success of an organization: positioning on the market, innovation, productivity, physical and financial resources, return, managers performance, employees performance and attitude, public responsibility. The achievement and/or maintenance of competitive advantages are considered core priorities for the management of the company. All managers should ask themselves questions regarding the advantages that have enabled their success previously, the advantages currently supporting their business in order to determine the competitive advantages that will ensure their further success.

According to Porter et al.[10], the competitive advantage of a company basically relies on ensuring a low cost of a product or service whose features differentiate it from similar products supplied by the other competitors. Innovation is the main source for effectively achieving competitive advantage. Schumpeter[11] defines innovation as one of the following:

- the emergence of a new product
- the emergence of a new market;
- the introduction of a new manufacturing method;
- the procurement of a new supply source
- the generation of a new form of organization of the specific industry.

The competitive advantage could essentially focus on the following two aspects:

- the cost advantage is to achieve production costs below those of competitors by exploiting economies of scale, gaining experience or any other source of unit cost reduction, maintaining a certain parity or proximity in terms of quality. If cost reduction has a negative impact on quality, this competitive advantage becomes both inoperative and harmful. If buyers don't notice a big difference between the quality of the competitor products and the company's products, the company's profit will exceed the average.
- differentiation generates an above the average rentability of competitors if it enables the company to achieve a bonus in relation to the market price. The organization aiming at differentiating should have to carefully select the product attributes they wish to upgrade in order to pass the "originality test". Additional profit will only be obtained if differentiation does not involve an increase of the manufacturing costs that exceeds the potential price increase.

Nowadays, the reviews on the competitive advantage are less dogmatic, as the idea that this results from a multitude of factors (without emphasizing the special importance of one or another) is accepted. M. Porter[3] has suggested the "value chain" model that has already been adopted by many specialists, despite a few disadvantages it shows.

The value chain consists of breaking the activity of the companies into strategically relevant activities for the purpose of understanding the behavior of costs and of identifying the potential differentiation sources. It consists of two categories of activities:

- primary activities, i.e. the ones directly related to the manufacture of the product / service and its selling, including the post-sale services;
- support activities that ensure material, technological, and work force entries necessary to perform primary activities.

The possibility of increasing competitiveness within a National Medical Institute (INNBNV) whose main activity is specialized healthcare in the field of neurology, neurosurgery and neurovascular emergencies, developed within an integrated program with higher medical education and high-level scientific research, by setting up a department of endovascular interventions, is further analyzed. The goal is to treat, as a matter of urgency, all patients with a pathology whose impact on the population is very high in terms of mortality and morbidity. Studies conducted in European countries that already have neurovascular emergency diagnosis and treatment units show that the economic loss caused by severe debilitation or death resulting from these neurovascular emergency cases not treated in a timely manner amounts to hundreds of thousands euros[12,13].

The social and economic impact of neurological up to the most severe disabilities affecting an active population is very high. The establishment of an emergency service that can also provide quick endovascular treatment in addition to microsurgical treatment aims at significantly reducing major neurological sequelae.

As regards the SWOT analysis of the project, the internal environment factors, the external environment factors as well as the threats to the project for the development of an intervention department within the above-mentioned institute have been analyzed.

Overall, the internal environment has more strengths than weaknesses. This is due to the fact that the unit is recognized throughout the country for the outstanding results obtained in the microsurgical treatment of cerebral aneurysms. This provides a very rich and varied case database that can be treated by endovascular treatment with very good results.

The external environment comprises many more variables, both as opportunities and as threats. This causes most threats, and these are more difficult to control and anticipate because they are external. These are usually related to the economic environment, mentalities, and unfortunately, even to the political environment in our country.

The external factors that positively impact the project are:

1. The evolution of the healthcare system in the EU countries, and not only the ones in the developed West European countries, but also the neighboring countries have such emergency units for neurovascular pathology. For example, Hungary has two such units (Budapest and Szeged) with outstanding results.
2. The medical technology permanently and spectacularly progressing. While new developments in microsurgical treatment do not occur so quickly, materials used in endovascular treatment are developing much quicker.
3. The adjustment of services to the population requirements. Patients are increasingly informed, as mass media and the internet are now available to anyone. Everyone wants to benefit from the most modern techniques, within the shortest time, and as minimally invasive as possible.
4. Many Romanian patients with a very good financial status go the other European Union countries for treatment. Some of these patients pay the treatment themselves, others use the forms of the National Health Insurance House that reimburses the cost of the treatment, justifying that the specific therapeutic intervention cannot be performed in our country. It is easy to understand that the NHIH would prefer to reimburse the costs of these medical interventions carried in Romania, where prices are lower and thus, they would be interested in investing in the establishment of these neurovascular emergency care units.
5. Mass media support that usually promote the establishment of units aligned to the European standards and which are expected to provide positive outcome.
6. Access to European funding has become increasingly easy from a technological point of view; a consistent, well-documented, with predictable and well-grounded results would have high chances of receiving financial support from European funds.

However, there are several external factors that negatively impact the project:

1. The lack of financial resources - the main obstacle in starting any healthcare project.
2. The National Health Insurance House does not reimburse endovascular interventional procedures for the treatment of cerebral aneurysms. This hinders the quick implementation of this procedure within the neurovascular emergency unit. The only money provided by the system for this specialty are obtained through a national program run by the Ministry of Health.

3. Reluctance to new things in the current healthcare system. There is an inertia in the implementation and application of new structures, even if they have been existing for a long time within the healthcare system of civilized countries. The implementation of healthcare policies on an long- and medium-term is difficult.

The establishment of this department could be financed by:

- The Ministry of Health through the National Program of Cerebrovascular Disease and through programs intended for healthcare emergency units
- The Ministry of Labour and Social Protection through European programs aiming at decreasing the number of people unable to work and who require special social conditions
- European structural funds
- Multinational manufacturers of instruments and equipment used for the diagnosis and treatment of neuro cerebrovascular disease.
- Foundations and non-profit organizations whose activity covers the submitted program.

If such a department would be established, the expected results refer to:

- Improving the performance of the hospital by increasing the efficiency, effectiveness and quality of medical services;
- Wide coverage, as this would be an unique department specialized in the simultaneous surgical and endovascular treatment of cerebrovascular diseases;

- Increase of the institute's own income through payments per service;
- Decreasing the average time of hospitalization, the patients being discharged after a few days;
- Selection and differentiated approach towards neurovascular emergencies that will be quickly admitted, examined and treated;
- Intervention in the acute phase, that is within the first few hours after a stroke, that could save many lives.

Conclusions

The establishment of units for the diagnosis and treatment of neurovascular emergencies is extremely important for our country given that we are discussing a pathology that results in high mortality and morbidity rates, with significant social and financial costs, if not treated in a timely manner. We are among the last countries in the EU not having this type of units within the healthcare system.

It is true that the establishment of such units involves costs, and these could be too high for a system where investment in healthcare is always scarce. But benefits throughout time are extremely important. In addition to being a major cause of mortality, the neurovascular pathology that is not appropriately treated results in the most severe disabilities. And this means a substantial financial burden for the government, considering that it affects a relatively young population, thus with a high life expectancy. If treated in a timely manner and by experienced doctors, the neurovascular pathology could lead to spectacular results.

Nowadays, a modern diagnostic and treatment unit clearly involves an endovascular embolization service rather than just a micro-neurosurgical service. Ideally, this project should be a pilot for further development of such emergency care units across the country, covering evenly the Romanian territory and meeting 24/7 requirements when it comes to neurovascular pathology. But the project has to adapt to the economic realities and aims at showing the easiest way in terms of financing, viability and speed to put into practice for a neurosurgical service in Romania.

Considering the specificities of the mentioned institute, the endovascular embolization department complements the treatment of this pathology specifically in cases where neurosurgery cannot offer the best treatment solutions.

The learning curve and the development of authentic specialists are not easy to achieve and they require time, but benefits are outstanding. This trend is irreversible and in the shortest time we will surely become an European state in terms of emergency treatment of neurovascular pathology.

THE REFRACTION STATE OF THE PROFESSIONAL JUDGMENT AT A CONCEPTUAL LEVEL

Viorica Mirela STEFAN-DUICU[*]

Abstract

The conceptual and material construction of the present article involves a high degree of originality and conceptual innovation, the ideas stated here are not to be found anywhere in this world as we know it and it represents the proof of dedication into research, of the will to be involved in the growth of the content and notions regarding the professional judgment.

This article is centred on the description of the professional judgment taking into account its refraction state. In order to explain this posture we have used several concepts and took the following steps: defined the professional judgment, used the specific literature for widening the research area, used analogies and connections with other domains and finally placed the professional judgment in the current organizational environment and explained its refractivity state through the components and existing influence factors.

Keywords: professional judgment, refraction state, innovative concept, factors, organizational environment

1. Introduction

The general concept of refraction state refers to the process of sudden change of a pre-established direction.

Particularizing this concept on our research theme, we can state that the refraction of the professional judgment underline and highlights the mechanisms and processes of the trajectory modification of the professional judgment at a complex level, within an exigent format, in an unexpected mode, having as result new processes owed to the application of the new emerged factors.

When we mention a refraction state of the professional judgment we actually refer to the sudden and fast changes of the outline and formation of it and to what generates this unforeseen changing process.

In an extended survey that we realized having as subject 229 respondents, "at a general level, almost half of the questioned population (48%) considers that the professional judgment is a set of logical judgments linked together in order to obtain concluded results for the activity carried taking into consideration certain circumstances, knowledge, evidences, methods, criteria and proper regulation. The second preference among the respondents has labelled the professional judgment as being the mechanism that forms an opinion and decision making taking into consideration the interaction between the accumulated experience in the domain, the assimilated knowledge and circumstances in a percent of 26.2%. With approximately 13 percent the professional judgment's definitions were a process that intervenes when the domain's legislation does not cover all the situations encountered in the activity carried and as a cognitive process that takes into consideration ethical codes, knowledge, circumstances but also by the employee's behavioural structures.[1]

Prof. Herb Miller defines the judgment as a result that appears after the interaction between education and experience.[2]

2. Influencing factors

Factors that influence the professional judgment are both internal and external, implied and explicit, with a positive or negative impact, with provisory or permanent effect, factors that get to activate the formation and application of the professional judgment at an organizational level. From within these factors, we name: the professional training under all aspects (both by the accumulation of experience by the employee from self-training and by taking several courses and training sessions for the development and assimilation of knowledge in the required field), the economic and social environment that positions the organization under the influence of the economy in which it operates and under the influence of the interaction with the countries from the economic space, access to current information and new technologies, the alignment and the obligation to apply predefined norms of conduct (ethical codes, working procedures, standards, regulations, procedures, referential, working methodologies, internal procedures, manuals) etc.

The accumulation of knowledge is to be considered a premise of a good use of the professional judgment.

The professional training takes a temporal classification that reveals, on one side a general professional training and on the other side a specialized professional training.

The general professional judgment brings into our discussion the stages of intellectual formation of the individual. From this category we name: profile high school studies, diplomas, the experience from international mobility, scholarships, practice and internships within the big companies, university studies etc.

The professional training based on the attendance and pass of accredited studies at a national and international level provides a detailed optic of construction of the formalized informational system by the assembly of knowledge needed for the use of the professional judgment.

The specialized professional training refers to knowledge gathered by filling a post within a company, by fulfilling all the obligations stated in the job description, by overcoming all obstacles and recession or decline periods and also by the valuable positioning of the knowledge into the growth of the company.

The gathering of knowledge conducts to an optimal use of the professional judgment and to the seizure of an extremely important know-how. Within this category the employee gets an experience formalized on the specificity of the job through advanced domain trainings and circumstantial situations solved and also through understanding the causal elements generated by the particular interactions on the company. Within the specialized professional judgment are also included the masters degrees that have as purpose the thoroughgoing of knowledge and the specialization on the designated domain, studies with particularization on the working place etc.[3]

Professional training, under its two particularities, general and specialized, represents a factor of qualification in the determination of the professional judgment and it's found in the important points of its formation.

Shaping the professional judgment with the influences of the psychological factors is realised in a segmented manner through the behavioural structure of the employee, through the environment sub-factors and familial sub-factors.

A determining factor in the use of the professional judgment is the "behavioural structure" because at a conceptual level the discussed judgment is a cognitive process that takes into consideration the ethical codes, knowledges, circumstances but also the behavioural structures of the employee through the highlight of the human characteristics engaged in this process.

In the shaping process of the professional judgment, the inter-disciplinarily of domains is being taken into consideration, also the specificity of the company in which the employee is working and by a o plethora of psychological direct and indirect factors that generate as a final result a multitude of important notions regarding the assembly of information reported to behaviour and to professional judgment.

At a professional level, the conduct implies strict general rules that are subject to certain particularization that appear as a positioning of the human social nature jobs within a micro-economic environment.

The professional judgment, in accordance to Paul Gagnon, is described as an "un-estimable mental power". [4]

Yankelovich Daniel, a renowned opinion analyst transmits the fact that a correct, strong judgment must be used all the time attracting a sustained effort and a whole series of abilities. This type of judgment doesn't exist by its own, doesn't automatically appear, it must be created.[5]

Behavior, in accordance to A. Tilquin, represents "the cumulus of adaptation reactions, objective-observable, that an organism that has a nervous system, is executing as a reaction to the environmental stimulus, which, are also objective-observable". [6]

Fitting a judgment into an organizational environment draws after it written and unwritten rules of the professional circuit.

As example," promoting of the financial and accounting services must respect the limits of professional ethics, as required the rules of professional organizations. Promoting services must respect the principle of professional correct behaviour and not to compromise the profession. According to the National Code of Ethics for Romanian Professional Accountants, the publicity means to communicate to the public the information about the accounting services offered and the skills that has a professional accountant, in order to get works contracts."[7]

Taking into consideration this example or any other examples we can state that access to information influences and directs the professional judgment. In this kind of situations the organizational environment seeks to adapt to the global dimension, social and economic even though "the economy of information is neither perfectly shaped nor perfectly satisfactory"[8], this way leading to an update of general sustained norms by both practitioners and theoreticians from the legislation domain, on which the professional judgment and its use relies implicitly and also explicitly.

Referring to the written rules, in a deontological vision of professional judgment we state the existence of an assembly of documents that guide the deciding mechanism and implicitly the professional judgment. Among it, we state various ethical codes, working procedures, standards, regulation, procedures, referential, instructions, working methodologies, internal policies, manuals etc.

The professional judgment and the decisional process are the essence of many professions. Through its understanding and the communication of the purpose of the decisional factors, valuable contributions are brought both in the domain and the extended professional community. [9]

Our vision of the professional judgment contains the traditional side of judgment with focus on the conclusive reasoning of a demarche and also the general pro-economic side that brings the multitude of progressive effects of the professional environment.

3. The results of exposing the refraction state condition of the professional judgment

3.1. The refraction state of the professional judgment in a straight angle

The doctrinal description of this innovative and original concept refers to presenting a perfect situation in which a perfect fusion is realized between the professional judgment existing at a dogmatic and dialectic level and its organizational modelling factors, obtaining in this way a professional judgment with a flexible character, perfectly integrated at an organizational level. The resulted effect is useful and positive, the refraction state of the professional judgment became a homogenous one by incorporating the new elements in the existing status of the theoretic and practical corpus of the professional judgment.

3.2. The refraction state of the professional judgment in a right angle

The doctrinal description of this concept – this mechanism divides the development of the professional judgment in two categories after the impact of influential organization factors and it refers to the different development of the professional judgment in intrinsic uncontrollable conditions (the type of the organization, existing economy, environmental factors, etc.). The possibility of overlapping the final refraction state imagistic of the professional judgment in the right angle is mostly zero.

3.3. The refraction state of the professional judgment in an obtuse angle

The doctrinal description - the refraction state of the professional judgment in such a conjuncture reflects the expansion of the application of the influence and decisional factors at an organizational level over the existing policies in the company's routine, implementing this way an extensive vision that seeks to adjust the policies and existing means of thinking and to suppress the resistance to new of policies applied until that moment. A positive ending of the refraction state of the professional judgment in an obtuse angle is represented by the passing into the condition stage of the refraction state of the professional judgment in a straight angle.

3.4. The refraction state of the professional judgment in an acute angle

The doctrinal description – this condition of the professional judgment represents a first step of implementing some innovative organizational factors, generating a prior stage to all refraction states above stated and requires the application of a consistent know-how in the management domain and in the collective professional thinking. The integration capacity of the influence factors starts from a low level of homogeneity so next will appear the trajectory given by the refraction states of the professional judgment described above.

4. Conclusions

The professional judgment "is not a matter of simple general rules application towards particular cases on certainly not a simple matter based only on intuition but rather a process that gives a coherence note to the conflictual values from within genera rules and that treats with sensitivity the facts and circumstances extremely contextualized". [1]

The concept of professional judgment represents a centre of interest to us, on which we have concentrated a high level of research, we have invested time and all types of resources and we've concretized the results into a high level research and namely within a PhD thesis in the domain and we further disseminated the research with the help of written articles and studies. We used and perfected starting from the speciality literature and current documentation the concepts involved in the construction of the professional judgment and we introduced pilot concepts where the originality and emergence of ideas permitted so. We treated the professional judgment starting from all the visions that could be started from, taking into consideration both the philosophical side and also the other sides that can be generally more or less accessible: accounting, economic, social, practical, theoretical, administrative, regulating and ruling, juridical, fiscal, historical and deontological sides. We desire, in the future, to consolidate these pilot concepts that we created, to introduce it to qualitative and quantitative studies of maximum importance and to transfer all that is found at a theoretical level into an useful practice, with well-established instruments and with results to enhance the quality of writing into the domain and furthermore to overcome the barrier fixed onto a single domain and find applications of these concepts in various situations and domains that are not necessarily connected with our original starting point.

The professional judgment, under all its conceptual aspects, has been our study subject within the research carried in the last 8 years and will continue to be in our attention.

The concepts highlighted within this article describe various ideas in the casuistry of the research carried so far, ideas that are meant to overcome the linguistic and scientific barriers when talking about creativity and exposure of certain innovative structures of the professional judgment.

The professional judgment, through its refraction state, shows us the assimilation or quality of this system of connected judgments of incorporating the existing influence factors and in the creation of applied policies of a professional judgment and the final outcome after the explosion and taking into account all modelling stages.

THE ROLE OF SOVEREIGN DEBTS IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE ACTUAL MACROECONOMIC ENVIROMMENT

Emilia Cornelia STOICA

Abstract

Globally, the volume of public debt, most of which is sovereign debt, has increased significantly and although the macroeconomic development of most states has made good progress since the consequences of the global financial crisis triggered by the United States since 2007, their share has become a major concern for global financial equilibrium.

In this context, the analysis of the evolution of public debt in each country as well as in the geographic areas of strategic importance for the international economic conjuncture is an imperative for international financial analysts and institutions as well as for those who develop forecasts and propose economic-financial policies in the short term, and especially in the medium and long term.

The analysis of public debt in each country, region or community / association of sovereign states is of major importance both for assessing the financial stability and, implicitly, the economic at national, global as well as presently when capital, as well as goods and services circulate with great ease between countries and continents to identify potential risk factors that may affect the macroeconomic development and social life of the communities involved.

The aggravation of free movement, along with the increase in public debt, along with other factors of an economic, political and social nature, contributes to the establishment of a new world economic order characterized by a new hierarchy of world states, new economic and financial relations between countries with a developed economy and those with important natural and human resources, but whose level of macroeconomic performance is well below the level of developed ones.

Keywords: public debt, gross public debt, net public debt, public debt ratio, budget deficit, public finance, negative balance.

Introduction

The purpose of public debt contracting may have two different directions: on the one hand, balancing public finances, covering current and / or accumulated deficits in previous years, and, on the other hand, funding of investment programs / projects of major importance great for the community, both from the social point of view and as producing added value.

At the same time, the position of the state towards its debtors, especially foreigners, allows analysts to assess the country's financial standing. Thus, international rating agencies, such as Moody's, Standard & Poor's, Fitch, etc., embrace the national economy on a specific risk scale, which has an immediate impact on the behavior of economic agents, both internal and external. Risk degradation causes a decline in national macroeconomic developments caused by the diminished investment activity of domestic entrepreneurs, as well as external capital flows for business financing, so-called foreign direct investment. Also, the international financial environment borrowing funds is worsening in the direction of rising real interest rates, all of which exert an increasing pressure on the domestic currency exchange rate, which makes it even more difficult to pay public debt service, affecting even the sustainability of public finances.

The theoretical approach, in order to evaluate how the evolution of public debt influences macroeconomic development, as well as the social life of a country, takes into account the internal and external conjuncture characteristics as well as the specificity of the respective economy.

There are many currents of thought, but according to the assessment of the consequences, especially in the medium and long term, and the proposed strategies to be applied in the management of public debt and the national economic and financial balance, they can be divided into two distinct categories: classical and neoclassic currents, which argue that the public deficit is damaging to the national economy, and its borrowing funding leads to a drain effect - the crowding-out effect of credit to the private sector means that it is declining due to the targeting of capital temporarily free to the public sector, which has the zero risk, to the detriment of credit to the private sector - the financing of private investment, with immediate consequence in the diminishing of domestic demand, which will lead to the decrease of the domestic productive activity and the accumulation of the added value in the economy. As a consequence, public revenue resulting from taxation, being mandatory levies from the newly created value, will decrease, deepening the primary budget deficit, i.e.

the negative balance between revenues and expenditures of the budget, which decrease the expenditures related to the public debt.

Financing of the deficit by loan will involve contracting new loans, the pressure exerted by the increase in the public debt service - especially as the real interest rates will increase and the national currency will depreciate as a result of the deterioration of the country rating - will contribute to unbalance of public finance.

International financial institutions support these theories, considering that they apply especially to developing countries with a high leverage ratio, their economies being more vulnerable to economic or financial shocks than developed economies.

In the table below, we selected a few countries classified according to the position of the GDP per capita indicator as compared to the world average, eight years after the financial crisis. This indicator shows the level of development of the national economy and the information in the table shows the very large differences between the states of the world, and consequently the degree to which each economy feels the pressure exerted by the public debt. It shows the place that our country occupies in the world hierarchy, which means that together with a sustainable rate of external public debt, it gives the Romanian economy an average level towards low financial risk.

The public debt ratio is determined as a ratio between the actual public debt (contracted and drawn debt minus the reimbursements from it up to the moment of the statistical registration) and the GDP, and the level considered excessive differs according to the appreciation of the analysts and / or international institutions (or regional, in the case of the European Union). Thus, some analysts believe that for the developed countries the excessive level of over-indebtedness would be 90% (Reinhart C. and Rogoff K. (2011)) or even more than 100% (eg. 115% Minéa A.and Parent A. (2012)).

In the Stability and Growth Pact in the EU Treaty, the leverage threshold, established without a statistical basis under the Maastricht Treaty Defined Criteria, is 60%, but most developed Euro zone countries go beyond this threshold.

Interventionist thought patterns originally formulated by J.M.Keynes and continued by neo-Keynesians, claiming that debt contributes to the revival of domestic demand through the financing of new investment programs / projects, the multiplier effect of which increases the value added in the economy.

The positive effects of public debt are felt, according to Keynesian theory, in economies that are experiencing a slowdown or even decline in economic development marked by a significant public deficit. Conversely, if the economy is in a full-time employment cycle, or when demand for money on the domestic market leads to an increase in the interest rate, it is estimated that public debt will have a negative impact on macroeconomic development.

The theories and strategies proposed by both national authorities and international institutions, such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Bank (WB) and the European Union, rely on several factors considered relevant to economic growth, among which the most important are:

- the rate of investment, in direct (positive) correlation with the macroeconomic development rate;
- the population growth rate, which is analyzed according to the economic and social specificity of the country and according to the internal and international situation.

Thus, the negative growth rate of the active population in most developed countries in Europe and North America is considered a negative factor for economic growth. A large number of the active population - the definition of the active person is in accordance with the national law, namely the person in good health, between the minimum and the maximum working age - who has the professional skills appropriate to the current activity is a factor favoring the growth economic development in developing countries, especially in emerging countries (China, India, etc.).

If the population does not have the necessary professional skills and / or the age structure, i.e. the population above the working age, shows the necessity of supporting this category of public funds, the impact on the public finances, respectively the budget deficit and, consequently, the indebtedness is negative . This is the case for many developed European countries, Japan, etc.

1. Theoretical Approach To Public Debt

1.1. Definition of public debt

The terms expressing public debt are numerous and show different structures and compositions, as well as spheres of coverage, depending on the purpose of the analysis for which they are used.

There are two broad categories of public debt: gross public debt and net public debt, and the references that they define are global statistical approaches such as the National Accounts System (SCN) or economic and / or financial institutions which performs macroeconomic analyzes to examine national or regional circumstances and to propose appropriate policies for balancing and economic development. Among the most known such institutions are the IMF and the BM, the European Commission, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), the national statistical institutes and others.

Gross public debt

Government gross debt in the SCN sense is defined, according to the patrimony account of this system, as the total liabilities of the Public Administration as a whole, without consolidation between the constituent institutions.

Gross public debt in the European Union's sense is defined in the Maastricht Treaty (1992) as a consolidated public debt: debts of a public administration to another public administration are deducted from the liabilities of the former and the assets of the latter (the Maastricht Treaty, Protocol No. 12).

According to the BM methodology, gross government debt is composed of all liabilities of the public administration in the form of debt, these items being considered financial instruments that define third party claims on the public sector. According to the BM, they are considered as public debt instruments: Special Drawing Rights (SDRs), which designate the IMF account currency transactions, cash and deposits in public institutions, third-party debt securities to the public sector, loans contracted by public institutions, insurance systems, pensions and standardized guarantees, other payment accounts.

Net public debt

Government net debt is determined in Eurostat - the Commission's statistical data portal - by subtracting from gross public debt in the SCN all financial assets of the same general government. The OECD also calculates net public debt by designating this indicator under the heading of "net government financial commitments".

1.2. Sustainability of public finances

Public finances are said to be sustainable when responsible public authorities can finance all of their budgetary expenditure, including their liabilities from the contracted or guaranteed public debt and not yet reimbursed, in a long time horizon, in the absence of political changes. Public policies are not exclusively economic and financial, but also institutional, because the State's authority is exercised through its institutions, which implies the coherence and high quality of the functioning of the public services under their responsibility.

In this respect, with regard to public finances, the issues to be taken into account are the budgetary process and the electoral cycle, both closely linked to the public policies implemented by policy makers.

The financing needs of the public sector are multiple, the functional structure of public expenditures being able to reveal the priorities that public authorities grant in the respective budget cycle. The negative balance, meaning the budget deficit resulting from a higher level of spending versus public revenue, can be funded mainly by two methods: tax increases and debt leverage, both of which involve risks that may prove important both at macro level, as well as microeconomic.

At macroeconomic level, an inadequate policy of financing the budget deficit may affect the financial stability of the public sector. This stability is defined according to three main criteria: the liquidity, credibility and solvency of the responsible public authorities:

- the liquidity corresponds to all the short-term means of payment available to the state, which allows it to face immediate financial obligations. Potential liquidity means the ability of the State to pay in the near future, three months to one year;

− credibility is the confidence that public authorities enjoy from economic agents, especially when they are state debtors or in their current activity, as operators carrying out public services as a result of delegated authority management, or as investors who borrow the State - private lending banks, natural or legal persons investing in government securities;

− the solvency shows that the state has a real or implicit inter-temporal repayment capacity, meaning it can actually deal with current and future financial commitments. Solvency refers to both potential liquidity, which can be based on the value of public assets that can be capitalized, and on the state's ability to use the tax to increase public revenues.

The impact of mandatory levies on the stability of public finances is different depending on the reaction of economic agents towards an increase in taxation. In this respect, Arther Laffer's theory, which illustrates the relationship between tax revenues and the rate of pressure that taxation exerts on the economy, is relevant. In a period of economic growth, economic agents will not consider increasing mandatory levies as a hindrance to their development and will honor their fiscal obligations correctly so that public revenues will increase and the budget deficit will decrease. It is said that this is a situation of fiscal neutrality. But as tax pressures increase, activity becomes discouraged, demand falls, followed by supply, the tax base narrows, and if a certain sustainability threshold is exceeded, revenue collected from tax and tax will decrease, even if the fiscal pressure will continue to increase.

The budget deficit deepens; public authorities no longer have enough liquidity to finance their short-term obligations or are unable to meet their medium- or long-term commitments, with the stability of public finances being destabilized. Given the constraints imposed by the behavior of economic agents over tax increases, to cover the public deficit, the State may resort to contracting (a new) public debt without involving taxation, obviously under the conditions of national law in that field.

Classical theory (Bachellerie et Couillault, 2005) states that financing the budget deficit through indebtedness will result in economic agents anticipating a systematic tax increase due to the obligation to repay the contracted debt and to pay the cost of the debt. Instead, policy-makers claim that public debt, as an exogenous source of funding, does not make a direct levy from their income, which will immediately diminish their purchasing power. In this way, demand is not affected, individuals do not decrease their consumption, and businesses do not give up planned investments, consequently the tax base and hence tax revenues will remain unchanged. In conclusion, the impact of public debt on the financial stability of public finances is more favorable than the application of a tax policy that would increase taxes to increase budget revenues.

2. THE EVOLUTION OF SOVEREIGN DEBTS

2.1. Recent macroeconomic conjuncture

Economic cycles are driven by aggregate supply and demand fluctuations. Large supply variations are generally related to sudden changes in commodity prices, such as energy products, while large variations in demand are the result of changes in monetary or fiscal policies that restrict or, on the contrary, stimulate private spending. Also, cyclical changes depend on the level of stocks that companies hold and which have a considerable impact on industrial production growth, as they are sufficient or, on the contrary, they are too small to meet needs.

With regard to the current economic cycle, growth dynamics in developed countries seems sufficiently robust to keep the current expansion cycle on the same path in the near future. There are, however, a number of factors that disturb the observed cyclical development.

Thus, the dollar's oscillations tend to destabilize the global economy and financial markets. US trade policy exerts considerable pressure on their trading partners, especially China, but also Mexico, Canada and South Korea, as well as the European Union. This type of aggressive, protectionist US policy is a destabilizing factor not only for bilateral relations between the US and these countries, but also because of the major role of these countries in the global economy, including globally.

The impact of the fiscal-budgetary interventionist policy of the United States is set to decrease gradually, but the so-called quantitative easing period, including investment spending with it, will also fall, and the steady rise in jobs and of wages should extend the cycle in developed countries. At the same time, the rhythm of the growth of the Chinese economy shows a steady trend of slowdown, as Chinese leaders opt for economic consolidation rather than a strong expansionist policy.

In order to analyze the impact of important public debt on financial stability, the macroeconomic environment and imbalances of the different categories of economic agents, such as households and / or corporations, should be observed. Thus, the US financial crisis of 2007-2008 started with the liquidity of households on the mortgage market. However, in the US, household accounts are much less unbalanced than in 2007, and the risk of a financial crisis is very low, despite a significant budget deficit. In the European Union, current and budget account deficits are within acceptable limits, and for developing countries, the situation varies with each economy.

Recent evolution

One of the main risks to the American continent's economy caused by the US President's actions against Mexico and Canada diminished as a result of the renegotiation agreement for the NAFTA treaty between the three states. At the same time, it is estimated that the US economy will continue to grow, even if the effects of expansionary fiscal policy will gradually decline and inflation will increase slightly, with the Fed increasing its benchmark rates accordingly. The US budget deficit will continue to be high, and its long-term funding may become an unsustainable risk. The two neighboring US economies, Canada and Mexico, should benefit from the strong growth of the US economy.

It is also estimated that European economies, mainly those in the Eurozone, will continue the slightly upward trend due to domestic demand, employment growth and an accommodating monetary policy. Also, the strong growth of the US economy, China's macroeconomic stabilization and emerging economies are estimated to be potential export support factors. In addition, the European Central Bank will gradually increase interest rates as a result of higher inflation rates and, in correlation, the euro will appreciate very little, thus supporting foreign trade. An important risk to the European Union as a whole is the uncertainties introduced by Brexit, as well as the predictable crises of public debt, which are reflected in Italy as well as in other indebted European states. Developing and emerging countries are expected to benefit from rising raw material prices and energy resources so that national public finances mark a stabilizing trend.

2.2. Global public debt in the European Union

2.2.1. Public debt worldwide

The most indebted countries in the world are also the richest, the top three countries with the highest debt being in the United States, China and Japan. Together, they represent more than half of world debt (56%), much higher than their combined share of world production (38% of world GDP in 2017, expressed in purchasing power parity (PPP)). Low-income countries account for only 1% of world debt, significantly lower than their share of world production (Duceux Alice Jetin (2019)).

The US public debt has risen to over 100% of GDP, but it does not include some unpredicted commitments. It should be noted, however, that US debt financing is not a problem at the current level of interest rates, and their growth is unlikely, as the Fed may continue to act as a lender of last resort. But in an economy to the maximum of its capabilities, such as the US economy, a relaxation of monetary policy could allow inflation to increase. On the other hand, a restrictive tax policy - higher taxes and / or lower public spending - could improve the fiscal position but risk and mitigate economic growth.

In terms of second place in the world economic hierarchy, China, its debt is mostly denominated in the local currency, and the debt of strategic sectors is guaranteed by the central government, and the financial crisis risk is thus rather limited. In addition, China is making sustained efforts to reduce its public debt and, at the same time, to reduce loans contracted outside the banking system. Changes in financial policy and concerns about over-indebtedness have been and will continue to be obstacles to the growth of the Chinese economy. Current trade-offs between the United States and China and other possible shocks may affect the economic recovery policy proposed by the Chinese State to counter the slowdown in GDP growth, but a financial crisis seems unlikely.

In conclusion, for most countries and sectors, the risk of financial instability appears to be lower than before the 2008 crisis. Emerging countries are those whose companies are more vulnerable due to the high level of indebtedness in foreign currency. Chinese and American companies are also very indebted, but since this debt is mainly in local currencies, the risk is lower. For the euro area, the financial stability indicators have improved significantly, but political risks are still present and, as far as commercial litigation is concerned, they are mainly political in nature and the authorities are not supposed to take action to destabilize financially.

In recent years, many low-income countries have had access to new sources of funding, including private sources and external creditors at the Paris Club, which brings together rich states and institutions with significant financial resources. Thus, underdeveloped states have been able to implement large-scale development projects, but their public debt has grown significantly. Only in the last four years, in low-income countries, the share of public debt in GDP has increased from 30% to 50%, which means that a large part of their public revenues is intended to pay interest on government debt, and public debt service will exert significant pressure on national public finances.

A factor with a very significant contribution to stimulating activity is a low and stable rate of increase in consumer prices and public authorities wishing to implement a policy of revival the economy in the current context characterized by a relative slowdown in the pace of development, must take into account the mastery of inflation, including the proper management of the main factors that determine this inflation.

Due to overcoming the effects of the financial crisis, many economies currently operate close to full labor utilization, with increased pay being a predictable factor, which may involve increasing the deficit and increasing the public debt to finance it. The pressure of the public debt spill may affect the financial stability of the state, thus imposing the need to resort to restrictive budgetary and monetary regimes.

2.2.2. Public debt in the European Union

The following table shows the vulnerabilities stemming from national public debt - the EU Member States being sorted according to the debt ratio recorded in 2017, the last year in which government debt information is statistical data for the year 2018 referring to the end of the quarter third.

Thus, following the rate of government debt to national GDP, in descending order, four states with a rate exceeding 100% are reported: Greece, Italy, Portugal and Belgium, but France and Spain are very close, and in what concerns the financial stability criteria of the Maastricht Treaty on public debt - the highest level of public debt accepted being 60% of GDP - 16 Member States do not respect it.

Gross public debt marked a sharp rise after the financial crisis triggered in 2008, but improvement has been seen in recent years due to the economic reforms and debt reduction policies promoted by the most borrowed European countries, especially Greece. However, as the main concern of the euro area financial equilibrium, the public debt of Italy and Portugal remains, but the high level of indebtedness of other developed Eurozone countries such as Belgium, France, Spain, and should be treated with caution, although they do not present the same risks, due to their structure by type of creditor - most of which is an internal public debt, as in the case of the most indebted country, Japan.

An important problem, which is found in many EU Member States, as in many other countries around the world, is the need to develop and implement a pension policy, including the age and retirement age, the calculation of budgetary allocations for the system social insurance public, etc. This approach in public financial policy, together with other economic stimulus measures, while reducing the cost of public actions, should contribute to budgetary balancing and allow public authorities to reduce government debt.

In this regard, the case of Italy is relevant in the European Union because it has so far managed to manage in the short term the pressure generated by the high level of public debt due, first of all, to the low interest rates on the European financial market as a result of very high inflation low, even negative. However, in the medium and long term, the forecasts for interest rates show a slow but sustained growth trend, which will require a public financial policy approach to diminish the budget deficit, even obtaining a primary surplus and consequently a decrease gradual public debt.

Our country is in the debt-to-GDP ratio among the least indebted countries, but the pace of debt variance compared to the pace of change in macroeconomic development has to be analyzed - at a time when the impact of the economic crisis in the European Union, Romania's public debt has doubled, while national GDP has been downgrading.

Currently, the sustainability of sectors policy funding is being pursued, and in order to diminish the vulnerability of the national economy, the structure of public debt on creditors will change, the share of domestic debt becoming the majority. Thus, the current situation is characterized by an increase in personal income, which makes it possible to stimulate saving, including by attracting investors from the native population to government or local public debt.

Conclusions

Impact of public debt

By the obligations to repay borrowed capital and to pay the cost of public debt, it affects the financial balance of the public administration and implicitly the activity of the public sector. If, however, the public debt pressure on national public finances is high, the impact may be significant, especially if the national economy is not strong and the international economic environment is not favorable.

In this situation, there are many developing countries whose public debt, mainly foreign, has become very important in the context of fragile internal economies, and international financial institutions require repayment of public debt and payment of its cost as a priority obligation to continue to provide financial assistance.

In order to finance public debt service, indebted developing countries have no other choice but to adopt an austerity budget policy, with the lowest possible public spending. This means, however, that the lowest available funds are allocated to key areas for national economic and social life: health, education, public investment in road infrastructure, railways, aeronautics, communications, generating jobs, neglecting research and development, etc.

In order to honor the obligations arising from the external public debt, the public authorities of the developing countries must acquire the contract currency in which the debt is expressed - generally an international currency: USD, Euro, British pound, Swiss franc, yen etc. - which is obtained from exports.

Indebted developing countries can obtain the amounts needed to pay for the public debt service through a high volume of exports, which requires an intensive exploitation of national natural resources - on the basis of which they have also obtained credit from external donors. The intensive exploitation of national resources, whether mineral resources, agricultural products, forest riches, etc., leads to the depletion of the deposits, the destruction of the natural environment, the damage to biodiversity, etc. In addition, as operating costs have to be as low as possible, the living and safety conditions of workers and the population are left second.

Relations between public debt in the sense of the SNA and the general government deficit in the sense of the Stability and Growth Pact

Financial coverage of the public deficit can be achieved in a number of ways: public debt, tax increases, asset depreciation / increase of liabilities in the patrimony account of public authorities in the National Accounts System (SCN). Thus, the public deficit can be financed by the repayment of the contracted and drawn public loans, the transfer of some financial assets held by the public administration, the decrease of the liquidities at the disposal of the public institutions, etc., thus not affecting the gross public debt within the SCN but the net public debt will increase.

In the patrimony account of public authorities, acquisitions of non-financial assets are recorded positively and their negative transfer, affecting in the same way the public deficit if the acquisition of financial assets - Primary shares issued by the private or public sector, whether national or foreign - is financed by a public loan to its creditors, the gross public debt will increase without thereby affecting the public deficit. Explanation of the spread between gross government debt in the sense of SNA and the government deficit is based on the net flow of nominal assets (or financial assets) and different accounting methods. Thus, the budget revenues and expenditures underlying the determination of the public deficit are recorded in accrued entitlements rather than cash - actual receipts and payments. if an expense is found to be unpaid, it is recorded in public debt in the sense of the SCN and the public deficit increases, but the gross public debt in the Maastricht sense does not change.

ECONOMIC POLICIES INSTRUMENTS USED BY DEVELOPED AND EMERGING STATES IN THE CONJUNCTURE OF OUR DAYS

Emilia Cornelia STOICA[*]

Abstract

The objectives of economic policies that public authorities want to implement are economic growth and the improvement of the quality of life of the community members they lead. The success of this approach is ensured by the use of fiscal-budgetary and monetary policy instruments appropriate to both the aims pursued and the correlation with the economic and social conjuncture that characterizes the implementation period. These instruments refer to the tax system - the regulatory, procedural and administrative framework; budget expenditure system, in terms of structure and prioritization; public debt management; the monetary system, referring primarily to the management of inflation, interest rates, lending policy of the national economy sectors, etc.

From the multitude of economic policy tools that have been used over time, with better or worse results, public authorities are developing policies that can fit into one of the following categories: expansionist, restrictive, protectionist, opening up to the market free, and so on.

Applying these instruments to the real economy of a country will generate the hoped results if the appropriate conjunctural conditions are met both within and outside the country, which requires a thorough analysis of the macroeconomic and social development level of the concerned country as well as its position towards partners and neighbors, both from the point of view of commercial and / or investment relationships or political and strategic influence. Identifying the factors that influence the performance of fiscal and monetary policy implementation in each country is a key element as it can be used as a lever for future policy making.

Any activity involves risks, and for each instrument of financial and monetary policy specific risks can be highlighted, which requires their isolation and proposing appropriate measures to address potential risk situations so that they do not negatively affect the overall result.

Introduction

The role of the state in the economies of the 21st century is based on two types of macroeconomic theories: liberalism versus interventionism.

- classical theories (such as Adam Smith's theory in the 19th century) and modern liberalism theory, sustain the state's minimal intervention; the state having to fulfill its sovereign functions and to protect the balance between supply and demand on domestic markets. Thus, market mechanisms will enable self-regulated, autonomous and optimal functioning of the economy.
- interventionist theories, like Keynesist and neo-keynesist theories, that suggest the significant state intervention in the economy to stimulate the economic growth and the implementation of a broad social policy.

Now days, no government applies a purely liberal or exclusive interventionist policy, but a mix of thees two policies, in different percents of combination, from country to country and from time to time. At the same time, it should be underlined that, in democratic states, public authorities have no longer fully liberty of their decision-making power, as they are signatories of international conventions wich laying down operating rules in different fields, rules to be respected by all the countries and which are real constraints for them. For example, a Member State of the European Union must comply with Community rules, but also those established by the World Trade Organization (WTO) for external trade or those established by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) for capital transactions. The objectives of economic policy have been formulated in numerous theoretical works, a few of the most relevant being the three theories, formulated by Musgrave (Musgrave, Richard A. and Peggy B., Public Finance in Theory and Practice, New York, McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1973): market regulation, social redistribution policy and stabilization of economic fluctuations.

Thus, regarding on the regulations about the markets and the states functionning, public authorities must ensure, in the same time, a real competition on the markets and the suppliance of public services, such as education, health etc., for a proper functioning of the economy.

The income redistribution policy is designed to correct inequalities from the distribution of primary incomes (provided by the labor and the capital) in liberal economies. Because the free market mechanisms do not provide regular functioning of the economy, with the possibility of crises, wich triggers unemployment or inflation, the state through its economic policy, aims to achieve four major goals: economic growth, full employment of labor, price stability and a balanced foreign trade.

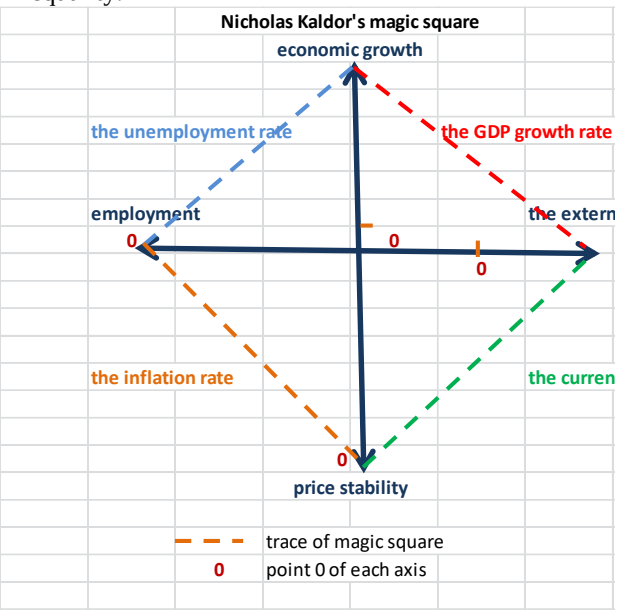
Public authorities' interventions can be classified into two categories:

- those aiming at creating the conditions for a better functioning of the economic system by changing its structures. They are part of the so-called structural policy that includes competition policy, research and innovation policy, sustainable development industrial policy, other policies etc.;
- the policy of regulating economic activity that is subject to short-term fluctuations, called conjunctural policy, which can generate macroeconomic stimulation or stabilization.

As the economic policy is assigned a set of coherent decisions taken by public authorities aimed at achieving the goals that they have proposed a time frame short and medium term, by using economic instruments and / or financial.

The four main objectives of short-term economic policy can be represented in Kaldor's so-called Magic Square, proposed in 1971 by British economist Nicholas Kaldor (1908-1986): full employment, price stability, balance of the external balance, economic growth being difficult to achieve simultaneously.

Long-term economic policy aims to achieve sustainable development, combining economic growth with environmental protection, even minimizing social inequality.



According to this Magic Square, two major macroeconomic relationships are identified: Inflation vs. Unemployment, also known as the Phillips curve and the economic growth relationship vs. unemployment. The Phillips curve shows the dilemma of Keynesian economic policies: rising inflation may reduce unemployment, but fighting inflation leads to rising unemployment.

The relationship between economic growth and unemployment is reversed: the higher the economic growth, the lower the unemployment rate and the wider social security. In economic history, state intervention in social life is a fairly recent event. Thus, in 1883, in Germany (led by Bismarck), compulsory health insurance was created, and in the United Kingdom a model of social security, known as the Lord Beveridge model, was implemented in 1942, operating in accordance with three principles: uniformity, uniqueness and universality.

Conjunctural policy aims at short-term intervention on economic imbalances, using appropriate instruments within a given institutional framework. The main instruments of the conjunctural policy are: fiscal-budgetary policy, monetary policy, currency policy etc.

Structural policy seeks to act in the medium or long term on the fundamentals of the economy (labor market functioning, market competition, market regulation ...) to improve the performance of the economy.

These two aspects of economic policy are complementary. The effectiveness of a conjunctural policy can be enhanced by structural measures, eg reducing the VAT rate on medicines, basic foods, etc., improves living conditions and, implicitly, the functioning of the labor market. At the same time, the term economic policy is now expanding, including social policy. Social policy represents all public interventions aimed at improving the social situation of individuals and can be used for economic purposes, such as supporting education programs.

Section 1 - Economic Policies. Instruments

Before developing and, subsequently, implementing any economic policy, the responsible authorities must analyze conditions and characteristics of the national economy for choosing appropriate instruments to the objectives pursued. In this sense, it can be identified four contextual states:

- expansion, short-term economic growth, as measured by annual growth of Gross Domestic Product (GDP);
- stagnation, in which situation GDP varies slightly;
- recession, in which situation the decline in GDP has been recorded for at least two consecutive quarters. It is considered recession even if the variation in GDP remained positive, but growth rate dropped significantly.
- depression means an economy where productive activity and GDP have experienced significant decreases over a long period of time.

The level of development of the world states is very different, and economic policies have to take that into account in order to be effective. Therefore, countries are ranked according to the average gross national income per capita.

Ranking of countries by average GNI per capita in 2018

| Category of countries | GNI per capita |
|---|---|
| Low-income countries, the most disadvantaged, low income per capita and unstable growth rates | < 995 |
| Developing countries with intermediate income from the lower tranche | 996 – 3 895 |
| Developing countries with intermediate income from the upper tranche | 3 896 – 12 055 |
| Developed countries, characterized by a high GDP per capita and low growth, high incomes | > 12 055 |

Source: https://datahelpdesk.worldbank.org/knowledgebase/articles/906519

Many developing countries show sustained growth rates, including emerging countries with high growth, integrated in world trade, such as the BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China, South Africa) as well as Mexico, Thailand, Turkey etc.

Economic policies are developed using an appropriate model of each country, in terms of level of development, historical traditions and geopolitics. On the other hand, the responsible authorities must take into account the fact that economic growth does not eliminate social inequalities, because in the world there are large inequalities both between countries and within the countries. Thus, 20% of the world's population owns more than 80% of world wealth, and welfare differences do not automatically fall due to economic growth.

Economic Growth Factors

Economic growth depends on the mobilization and efficiency with which the factors of production (labor and capital) are combined, and the different levels of economic growth result from their possible combinations:

- Extensive growth - resulting from the use of a larger number of inputs (capital and labor).
- Intensive growth - results from increased productivity of production factors.

Contribution and efficiency of work-factor depend on its quantity and quality. The amount of available work depends on the number of active population and the duration of work. The active population is defined by the International Labor Office (ILO), that all persons who work or declare that they want to engage in business paid its size depends on demographic variables such as birth rates, age structure, life expectancy at birth etc. The quality of work depends on the skills of those who work and labor productivity.

Capital is defined as a good product in the past and used to make other goods in the future. There are two types of capital, which influence the economic performance of different entities that realize the added value:

- Technical or physical capital - refers to all means of production used to produce goods and services. This includes tangible assets (buildings, equipment, vehicles, etc.) and intangible assets (patents, licenses etc.) and working capital (inventories of raw materials, materials, unfinished production and finished goods etc.).
- Financial capital - refers to the value of a company's equity, which makes it possible to finance part of the technical capital.

The growth rate of GDP results from the quantitative and qualitative increase in the capital factor.

The increase in capital comes from investing in material goods (durable goods) and immaterial (research, training) - aimed at increasing production capacities. The financing of these increases is achieved by mobilizing domestic savings and foreign capital, so-called foreign direct investment (FDI).

The quality of capital is measured by its productivity, i.e. the ratio between value added and fixed capital.

The growth rate can be broken down into components:

Growth rate = growth rate of labor + capital growth + technical progress

Technical progress is a residual element, but its lack of activity in a company condemns it to a gradual disappearance.

After the 80s of the 20th century, new growth theories have considered technical progress as a result of the four types of investments:

1. Investment in physical capital - which increases the productivity of other firms through a profesional training effect, including the knowledge of operation and the accumulation of skills to handle the new equipment (Romer, 1986)
2. Investment in research and development to enhance the knowledge and allow cumulative innovation. (Romer, 1987)
3. Investing in human capital, giving priority to education, training, health, which improves the quality of work (Lucas 1988)
4. Infrastructure investments, that improve the efficiency of private investment in physical capital (Barro 1990)

These four types of investment are identified as endogenous growth factors that can be used. In addition, these investments create positive externalities that can not be fully supported by the private sector. Therefore, state intervention in favor of these activities is necessary at different levels:

- Create an investment-friendly economic and institutional environment
- Directly investing in public infrastructure
- The introduction of economic and financial incentives to encourage training, research and innovation.

2. Economic Policies currently implemented by developed and emerging countries

Conjunctural economic policy aims to steer short-term activity to ensure sustained growth without imbalances such as unemployment, inflation, excessive budget deficits, etc. and may, depending on the state of the economy, be procyclical or anti-cyclical.

- Conjunctural policy is pro-cyclical when the state acts in the direction of the evolution trend of the conjuncture to amplify it. For example, measures to stimulate demand and thus economic growth, while the pace of development has slowed (typical recession);
- Conjunctural policy is counter-cyclical when the state intervenes to counteract undesirable conjunctural developments. For example, in a period characterized by an inflationary slump, rising interest rates will discourage non-government credit, decreasing pressures on prices.

Conjunctural economic policy implementation requires complementary policies: income policy, employment policy etc. The conjunctural stabilization of the activity is achieved through two main instruments:

- The National Public Budget (NPB), which includes the state budget, the administrative-territorial units' budgets and the state social insurance budget;
- Monetary policy.

Fiscal-budgetary policy and monetary policy can be combined to maintain a sustained rate of economic growth and low inflation.

2.1. Objectives and instruments of fiscal-budgetary policy

Fiscal and budgetary policy aims to act in the short term on the economic and social situation, characterized by employment, the pace of macroeconomic development, inflation, external balance (see Kaldor's Magic Sqare) through the NPB, taxes and tax duties, budget expenditures and budget balance.

Fiscal-budgetary policy can be used to achieve two major goals:

- Fiscal stimulation through a budget-development policy that aims at strong economic growth and full employment. The tools that can be used for this purpose are the reduction of the tax burden from some direct taxes or increased allocation of public funds for higher budget expenditures; in this case, fiscal policy means are lower taxes and / or higher public spending;
- • a restrictive budgetary policy, which aims at slowing down the inflationary process by reducing public spending and increasing tax and tax obligations and taxes.

The interventionist theory of economic recovery is also supported by multiplier factors (fiscal and budgetary), including automatic stabilizers. Thus, the concept of the multiplication effect, pronounced in 1936 by British economist J.M. Keynes (1883-1946) justified fiscal stimulus policies and use of the budget deficit as a tool for resuming economic growth. The principle is that in a competition-based economy the change in one of the components of demand (consumption, investment, public spending) will lead to a greater variation in demand, assuming that the economic propensity of consumers remains unchanged.

In conclusion, the main components of the conjunctural policy are:.

- reference interest rates, those that can be managed by the central bank;
- fiscal taxes and compulsory social contributions system;
- public expenditure, in terms of volume, functional and economic structure.

Guidelines on fiscal policy

Setting tax rates (direct taxes: tax on personal income, corporate tax, indirect taxes on consumption) is not neutral and can cause a decrease in disposable income and consequently domestic demand (if taxes are increased) or conversely, a revival of economic activity (if the tax pressure drops).

A reduction of the income tax or VAT leads to an increase in disposable income and therefore increase household consumption. Operation of enterprises will grow to meet market demand, which means that will increase their turnover, including value added, leading to an increase in GDP and hence to economic growth.

For example, the US in 2017 - at the end of the Obama administration in 2016, the US economy experienced a modest annual GDP growth of around 1%, driven by weak private sector investment and stagnation in domestic consumption, as a result of the moderate decline in disposable income.

The newly elected Trump Administration has initiated and implemented since the following year a short-term economic recovery policy based on the sharp fall in tax pressure:

- The tax reform of households' disposable revenues modifies the 7 tax brackets and reduces the rates, with notably an upper bracket which passes to 37% against 39.6% currently, and modified thresholds. Simplification measures are also included, with the removal of a number of tax loopholes.
- The corporate tax rate decreases from 35% to 21% as of 2018 permanently
- the deduction of loan interest payments is now capped (up to 30% of earnings before interest taxes, depreciation and amortization - EBITDA - until 2021 and then EBIT).
- Other provisions, with temporary application of three to seven years, including to discourage international tax evasion by multinationals.

Although the proposed reform has been met with much suspicion, the multiplier effect felt since the first year of implementation, 2017, with the US economy rising to around 3% annually, with employment approaching by the maximum level, the disposable income has increased, so that the most dynamic factor of economic growth has reverted to domestic consumption.

An example of a restrictive economic policy, including its implications for macroeconomic performance, are the measures put in place by the Romanian public authorities in 2010 with the stated purpose of reducing the general consolidated budget deficit. As a result of the economic crisis triggered by the subprime crisis, then the banking crisis triggered in the US in 2007 and expanded across the globe, the Romanian economy marked a strong decline (-6.6% of GDP in 2009, after a record level in 2008 of + 7.3%), a fall in domestic demand of -12% and a budget deficit of -7.2% of GDP. In order to overcome the recession, it was considered that a restrictive economic policy could stabilize negative macroeconomic developments by lowering public spending - reducing budget spending by decreasing the salaries of all the public employees by 25% - and increasing tax revenues - increasing the standard VAT rate from 19 % to 24%.

Positive results were left waiting: in 2010 GDP continued to fall by -1.6%, the budget deficit remained high (- 6.51% of GDP), although VAT receipts increased, as expected, from 6.8% of GDP to 7.7% of GDP, while income tax fell from 3.7% to 3.5%. At the same time, however, domestic demand contracted further (-1.5% from the previous year) due to the decrease in the disposable income - the real monthly average earnings decreased (-3.7% compared to the previous year) - number of employees has diminished in both the budgetary sector (-4%) and in the private sector (-9.5%), as a result of the decrease in activity, and public expenditure on social assistance increased (from 12.7% to 13, 4% of GDP) due to loss of work of a large number of employees, mainly from the private sector.

In the following years the trends in the reform year continued, and the resumption of economic growth took just over a year or even two, which shows, as interventionist theory argues, that the application of a restrictive conjuncture policy in an economy in the recession will accentuate the negative phenomena, the appropriate measures for the exit from the crisis being active measures, supporting investments, production, exports etc. which increase demand as the main factor of macroeconomic development.

Public spending guidelines

Expansion budget policy - aims to promote the development of economic activity; an increase in public spending can lead to an increase in consumer demand and business investment, so growth in production will help reduce unemployment, as rising business activity generates the need for additional labor. Also, there are predictable negative effects such as increased inflationary pressures if demand exceeds supply and, in particular, increase the budget deficit (financing its public debt may lead growth).

The restrictive public spending policy makes it possible to reduce the budget deficit, so reducing public debt, but it also has adverse effects, such as a reduction in consumption levels and a level of investment in business.

In conclusion, economic policy represents all the decisions taken by the public authorities to influence the country's economic activity. Depending on the objectives pursued (low inflation, diminishing unemployment, stimulating economic growth, development of foreign trade), the economic policy instruments inherited by the government will be diverse: fiscal-budgetary policy, monetary policy, income policy.

2.2. Monetary Policy

The primary objective of monetary policy is to control money in circulation, which means to provide businesses with a sufficient but not excessive source of money to ensure a balanced economic growth that does not contribute to the inflationary process nor to push for recession.

By increasing or decreasing the reference interest rates, monetary authorities or national central bank (or, in the case of the European Union, the European Central Bank) influence the distribution of loans, and thus the access of individuals and businesses to borrowing, stimulating or, discouraging their investments.(Stefan – Duicu Viorica, Stefan – Duicu Adrian, "The Influence of Lending Activity Over Consumer's Behaviour", CKS, Bucharest, 2011)

Monetary policy must serve two major purposes: controlling price fluctuations, and controlling the inflation and economic growth. To achieve these objectives, the central bank may determine the reference interest rates and the refinancing rates.

A decrease in the reference rate of the central bank encouraged commercial banks to reduce interest rates on loans. This reduction in the interest rates applied to credit encourages businesses to borrow for consumption and/or investment, with the risk of escalating inflation due to excess demand.

An increase in the reference rate raises the cost of credit granted by commercial banks, causing businesses to borrow less, their activity stagnates or even declines and there is a risk of economic slowdown.

To control inflation, the central bank may limit creating scriptural currency by banks through loans distributed. For this, the central bank may limit access to refinancing in the money market for these banks by increasing the cost of refinancing (increasing refinancing rates) or by limiting available liquidity (reducing open market operations and increasing reserve requirements). In the absence of central bank cash resources needed to deal with withdrawals, banks are forced to pay less credit and thus create less money.

Monetary policy instruments

A national central banks (also the ECB) has two main instruments to conduct monetary policy:

- refinancing interest rate on the interbank market: by fixing the remuneration for money which lends to commercial banks in the money market, it fixes the cost of refinancing the commercial banks;

− action on money market liquidity by using appropriate mechanisms, such as:

- Open market operations - they are conducted at the central bank's initiative and play a role in steering interest rates, managing liquidity conditions in the money market and signaling the monetary policy stance;
- reserve requirements. The central bank (or the ECB in the Eurosystem) requires commercial banks to set up reserves in open accounts in the national central banks' registers. The purpose of reserve requirements is to create and/or handle a structural liquidity requirement for commercial banks.

3. Economic policy coordination in the European Union and worlwide

3.1. Economic Policies in the European Union

Difficult coordination between monetary and fiscal policies

Monetary policy is the responsibility of central banks, including the ECB, all of which being autonomous public institutions and not subordinated to their governmental authorities. But fiscal-budgetary policies remain the responsibility of national governments. This division of roles in Europe leads to a difficulty in coordinating economic policies, the political mix being the sum of fiscal policies and monetary policy. To solve this problem, the European Union has decided to strengthen the coordination between the economic policies of the states. This better coordination requires mandatory measures for states that renounce a part of their autonomy towards the Union.

The measures adopted are the following:

- "golden rule": the structural deficit of a state budget can not exceed 0.5% of GDP under financial sanctions;
- strengthening the Stability and Growth Pact: in times of crisis, the budget deficit can not exceed 3% of GDP and public debt is 60% of GDP. States that violate this rule will be warned and then penalized with amounts calculated according to an algorithm established by the Treaty;
- Europe 2020 Agenda: this is a set of structural reforms designed to increase the Union's competitiveness;
- Growth Pact: European Union committed $ 120 billion to stimulate economic growth.

Financing of economic policy by increasing taxation

To reduce budget deficits, responsible authorities can increase taxes and / or reduce public spending. However, it is likely that this policy will not have the expected results due to lower purchasing power of households, as a fall in demand leads to an economic slowdown. Then, tax revenues will be lower than expected and the social spending will be higher. Therefore, the deficit reduction does not hapened (Greece, Spain and Portugal are facing this situation).

Funding economic policies through indebtedness and the disadvantages of this method

The deficit can be financed by borrowing, but there are significant risks in this situation. Since the state is a safe debtor, it can absorb a large part of the available savings at the expense of private enterprises, which present higher risks to investors. In this way, the phenomenon of "eviction", ie the removal from private sector borrowing, in favor of the public sector, appears. This situation affects the development of enterprises and investments of individuals and, in the end, the decline in the growth rate of national GDP appears.

To ensure macroeconomic stability of the EU, founding members of Euro Zone defined a Stability and Growth Pact (SGP), which is a political commitment of all Member States to control their fiscal-budgetary deficits. However, unlike monetary policy, fiscal policy remains the responsibility of national authorities and the SGP requires the Member States to enhance convergence of economic policies.

The PSC contains two types of provision:

− multilateral surveillance as a precautionary measure: Member States submit yearly medium-term budgetary targets in an updated stability program. A rapid alert system allows the Ecofin Council, which brings together EU economic and finance ministers, to make a recommendation to a state in case of budget slippages.

− excessive deficit procedure: this is triggered as soon as a Member State exceeds the cumulative deficit criterion of central, local and social security administrations (3% of GDP), except in exceptional circumstances. The ECOFIN Council shall make recommendations to the state to end this situation. Otherwise, the Council may impose sanctions, which means that the state concerned will have to pay a fine to the ECB.

The objectives of monetary policy in the Eurozone

The monetary policy of the Eurozone is entrusted to the European Central Bank (ECB). Two main objectives are attributed to it:

− controlling inflation - consumer prices must be below 2% annually in each Member State of Eurozone, defined as a priority (Article 105 of the ECB Statute);

− economic growth and employment: this is a secondary objective, ie the ECB should not undertake growth-enhancing actions if, in addition, they tend to restrict its objective of controlling inflation growth.

As the eurozone has adopted a floating exchange regime for the euro, the ECB doesn’t aim to maintain a stable exchange rate.

Structural Policies in Europe

The objectives and instruments of structural policy in Europe are contained in the Lisbon Strategy (March 2000), which serves as a general framework. This document has set out the broad economic policy guidelines for the Member States to make Europe a competitive and dynamic knowledge-based economic space. In addition, every three years, on a recommendation from the Commission, the European Council draws up the Integrated Guidelines (IDL), which consist of the Broad Economic Policy Guidelines (BEPGs) and the Employment Guidelines (EDL), which are a series of intermediate objectives derived from the Lisbon Strategy. Based on these guidelines, each country sets a list of priorities in a National Reform Program.

Under the Lisbon Strategy, the European environmental policy aims, by 2020, to "the three 20": 20% reduction in greenhouse gas emissions, 20% renewable energies and 20% improvement in energy efficiency.

Competition policy aims at encouraging competition in the European space. This allows the development of all intra-zone commercial transactions and the decrease of many prices due to the expansion of national markets. However, there are strict control rules that prohibit agreements, abuses of dominant position and certain protection measures.

The European competition policy, under the joint responsibility of the European Commission and the EU Member States, aims to promote healthy competition in the European space.

3.2. Coordination of economic policies worldwide

The IMF, the WTO and in particular the G20 have established joint decision-making processes to define broad guidelines for the economic policies worldwide.

This coordination seems essential in times of crisis.

Anticompetitive and restrictive practices on free competition

The market economy, universally applied today, operates on the principle of free competition. This makes it possible to produce at the lowest cost and to sell at the best price for the high satisfaction of consumers' wishes. This market economy success is often perceived negatively by the public as it encourages companies to relocate their businesses to take advantage of lower wages in emerging economies. Industry competition with new producers in remote areas reduces the control capacity of national authorities and also requires deregulation to benefit from greater flexibility. Deregulation and, consequently, the absence of controls could lead to widespread oligopolies, which would dictate their own laws for the weakest competitors, which would gradually disapear and, also, the market economy.

Legal Practices

It is not forbidden to make commercial or financial agreements if the agreement is in the interest of consumers. The law does not prohibit the company to gain a leading position on the market, so a company can benefit - for example, commercial advantages - related to its dominant position. Agreements that do not restrict the market are not declared illegal. For example, an agreement will be legal if it will favor technical progress.

4. Recent developments in the world economy and world trade

The increase in international trade and the further increase of competition between territories is a major feature of the globalization of the economy.

Since the end of World War II, economies have become more open and trade has increased considerably. Thus, between 1950 and 1973 world trade grew two times faster than world production. Many factors have contributed to this evolution. These include a considerable decrease in transport and telecommunications costs and the development of free trade, supported by international organizations such as the World Trade Organization (WTO), the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

4.1. Diversification of trade

The nature of the main traded goods has evolved. After 1945, manufactured goods played a major role in international trade. These goods accounted for 50% of trade in the early 1950s, 75% in 2005 and 65% in 2011. They are now the real engine for the development of world trade.

Increasing the share of manufactured goods in world trade is linked to increased trade between the branches of production, which consists of cross-trade with products belonging to the same branch or the same category of products.

Currently, services represent about 20% of exchanges. Their growth is mainly driven by IT and information services.

Primary goods account for only 14% of trade and have declined significantly since the 1960s. They are made in poorly developed countries which have natural resources but do not process them but export them as such. The economic policies of these countries should aim at creating manufacturing industries that will produce goods with added value so as to increase their national income.

The structure of actors in world trade has changed significantly, last three decades being marked by an increase in the number of emerging countries and the increased role of multinationals.

There are three geographical areas that dominate the global economy: North America (United States and Canada), Western Europe and Asia Pacific (Japan, South Korea and Southeast Asia), all of which having a standard of living higher than the rest of the world.

Before the financial crisis, the developed G7 countries accounted for around 70% of global GDP, 75% of global trade volume and over 90% of global financial operations, but weights have changed with the appearance of emerging markets. Thus, the BRICS group currently accounts for around 20% of world GDP, 40% of the world's population, 15% of the trade volume and 40% of the world's monetary reserves.

4.2. Multinational companies

The multinational company is a company formed by a parent company and subsidiaries located abroad. As major players in the globalization process, multinational companies contribute significantly to increasing international trade and financial flows.

In the traditional international labor division, developed countries have produced and exported manufactured goods and services, while developing countries have exported basic commodities and raw materials to developed countries. The new international division of labor presents another structure of world production and a change in the nations' specialties. Thus, developing countries export mainly manufactured products, their share in exports of goods increasing from 25% in 1980 to 60% in early 2000. In turn, the rich countries are focusing their products and services production in high technology, while poor countries remain confined to low-value primary products.

4.3. Regulating international trade

Applying the principles of global free trade is not always obvious, and highly divergent practices in world trade have made regulation of trade indispensable.

The gradual liberalization of international trade and its strong growth have made the existence of a regulatory framework indispensable. Initiated by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) in 1947, this framework was strengthened with the creation of the World Trade Organization (WTO) in 1995. The main objective of WTO is to promote free trade to foster development of world trade, providing for this purpose, a framework of stable rules negotiated and accepted by all member countries.

Various rounds of negotiations between countries in the WTO allowed to establish principles of trade between nations, of which the most important are:

- Most Favored Nation clause, which provides that any commercial advantage for one country to another country shall be granted to all countries in the WTO;
- equal treatment, which requires countries not differentiate imported products from domestic ones;
- the principle of non-discrimination between trading partners: all partners are involved in the negotiations (multilateralism) and should not be treated differently

Conclusions

1. Economic growth is measured by the GDP growth rate, which is the new created value in a country within one year. Economic growth is therefore a quantitative and monetary indicator, while development is a more complex concept of a qualitative nature.

Development is a process of improving the economic and social situation of a country that improves the well-being of the entire population. Development is based on technical, cultural, social and institutional changes.

Economic growth permits growth as it promotes wealth growth, poverty reduction and income per capita growth, while development is only possible through State involvement, the only one able to build infrastructure (school, bridges, roads ...), to emit stable regulations for trade and to reduce inequalities through redistribution.

2. Trade, one of the most pertinent factors of economic growth, has in recent years marked contradictory developments in geopolitical rather than economic causes. Thus, world trade recovered in 2017 after the economic crisis that followed the subprime crisis. This recovery is mainly due to the increase in demand for imports in East Asia, against the backdrop of domestic demand growth supported by acomodative policies in the region. In a series of large developed economies capital goods imports increased, companies responding favorably to the investment conditions improvement.

Recent reconfigurations of the main trade relations, in particular following the United Kingdom's decision to leave the European Union, the US trade policy to renegotiate the Free Trade Agreement with the other North American countries and revising the terms of its other trade agreements, raises concerns about tougher barriers to trade and exacerbation of commercial litigation. This situation may worsen if other countries, such as China, the world's largest exporter of goods, will implement retaliatory measures.

3. Accelerating economic growth has important implications for the environment. The frequency of climate shocks continues to increase, highlighting the urgent need to strengthen resilience to climate change and to hinder the degradation of the environment.

As we face the risk of exhausting natural resources, primarily energy resources, the issue of renewable energy is becoming more and more acute. China remains the world's largest renewable energy investor, and in 2017, wind energy projects have increased investment in this area in Australia, China, Germany, Mexico, the United Kingdom and the United States. While many countries, especially Africa, continues to experience a severe energy shortage, there are still opportunities to create even now through smart policies and investments, growing conditions ecologically sustainable.

4. Years to date from the 21st century have already marked three different economic periods: at first, the world economy was relatively stable, with an increasing trend manifested in several geographic areas, such as the states of North, South-East, Japan etc.; followed years of financial crisis triggered by the US mortgage market crisis which has spread across Europe, also affecting many other countries in the world; at present, most of the world's economies have experienced performance that outweighs the economic crisis that followed the financial crisis and is implementing growth policies both economically and socially.

5. The reorientation of economic policy should focus on four concrete areas: increasing economic diversification, reducing inequalities, strengthening the financial architecture and eliminating institutional weaknesses

- First, the acute need for economic diversification, which has been perceived for a long time, in countries that remain largely dependent on a few commodities;
- It is also essential to restrict and to correct the ever-increasing inequalities to ensure a balanced and sustainable growth over time. In this context, contextual policies will be needed to increase the living standards of the population and structural policies in the long term to promote equal opportunities, including by investing in education, expanding access to health and training services, and investment in the road network and electrification.
- The third area in which public intervention is essential is the alignment of the international financial architecture with Agenda 2030 for Sustainable Development and the Addis Ababa Agenda for Action. To this end, it will be necessary to develop a new funding framework for sustainable development and to move progressively from the current concerns based on profit (short term), the concerns focused on added value (long-term) in a responsible manner. Macro-prudential policies, if well coordinated with monetary, fiscal and exchange rate policies, can help achieve these goals by promoting financial stability and limiting the build-up of financial risks.
- Governance weakness and political instability remain fundamental obstacles to achieving the 2030 Sustainable Development Agenda. In this context, strengthening global economic growth is not enough. In addition, the priorities of public action must be, among other things, to step up activities to support conflict prevention and resolution and to correct the institutional shortcomings that underlie the many difficulties encountered.

6. In times of economic and financial crisis, public authorities are almost forced to intervene in the economy, but this intervention can be done in different ways.

If the state is social and interventionist, it will intervene in the context of implementing a cyclical fiscal incentive, implementing a budgetary conjuncture policy to stimulate demand - a Keynesian fiscal stimulus policy - and pursuing a social approach to unemployment. But in times of economic crisis, even if the liberal state does not want to intervene, it must develop so-called structural employment policies, called active policies.

In the risky context of financial globalization, States are often dependent on international financial markets that indirectly dictate their fiscal policy with regard to the sustainability of public finances. In this context, the margins of maneuver of states are weak and do not allow them to cover their high sovereign debt.

The public authorities are wondering whether the current economic policy of deficit reduction is necessary and sufficient to stimulate growth. The current economic climate precipitates the economic and political actions of states towards reducing their deficits in order to invest more in the medium or long term in order to revive economic growth.

The policy of reducing deficits by limiting budget spending will force the state no longer to intervene significantly in the economy. Structural economic policies related to infrastructure, innovation and training can be compromised and yet effective for resuming economic growth.

Reducing deficits may involve increasing state revenues by increasing taxes, but this action is likely to aggravate domestic consumption by reducing households' disposable income.

Ultimately, a policy to reduce deficits by increasing taxes may reduce the competitiveness of companies. Indeed, the additional taxation generated by government spending will create a financial burden for companies, which they will transfer to their prices, which will, in the first place, reduce national consumption and international competitiveness in terms of exports.

In conclusion, reducing deficits can be an obstacle to economic growth, although large deficit deficits destabilize public finances and prevent the use of opportunistic policies appropriate to the resumption of economic growth.

ENTREPRENEURSHIP MODELS AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT IN ROMANIA BASED ON THE CULTURAL HERITAGE

Mihaela Andreea STROE

Abstract

Entrepreneurship lays at the basis of the development of society and based on the concept of innovation. The entrepreneurial models developed over time start from the classic concept which states that the owner of resources can play the role of the entrepreneur, the ownership right being very important, this models continue with the diversification of the market, of the industries of the market segments where the state contribution plays a very significant role for example, continuing with modern entrepreneurial theories where innovation plays the leading role by identifying business opportunities. Innovation can be revolutionary or incremental, can be based upon product and process development, systematic and sporadic innovations, entrepreneurial and social innovations. Cultural heritage entrepreneurship plays an important role as the pivot for the heritage tourism development in which concerns rural areas of Romania which represents the main focus of this study. It is important to outline that having into consideration the need of change in the consumption process of the tourist consumer and this implies the development of a new entrepreneurship models based on multiculturalism and innovation.

Keywords: Entrepreneurship, model, cultural heritage, rural, tourism

Introduction

The concept of entrepreneurship is very largely used these days, but a few focus on the basis of rural entrepreneurship. To start, the Global Entrepreneurship Monitor uses one of the more straightforward definitions: "Any attempt to create a new business enterprise or to expand an existing business by an individual, a team of individuals, or an established business" (Zacharis et al.) Entrepreneurship is recognized as a primary engine of economic growth. Without it other factors of development will be wasted or frittered away. Entrepreneurship stimulates economic growth through the knowledge spill over and increased competition of the entrepreneurs (Carree, Thurik , 2005).

The concept of rural development is a subject of constant debate, especially regarding the relative importance of its sectorial and territorial dimension. Rural development is seen as a primary territorial activity, in which the development of agriculture has an important role by the recognition of "the strong support that land provides in terms livelihood". The importance of this topic is based on the fact that it includes not only the economic, social and environmental development of those territories, but also the development of good governance in these areas. The program for rural development can contain, depending on the conditions and needs, the development of: infrastructure, agriculture, tourism, small and medium-sized enterprises and the creation of jobs, but also ideas regarding environmental protection, education, community development. Rural entrepreneurship is one of the newest areas of research in the entrepreneurship field. In opinion of Wortman rural entrepreneurship generally can be defined as creation of a new organization that introduces a new product, serves or creates a new market, or utilizes a new technology in a rural environment.

A specific part of the rural entrepreneurship can be considered the valorification of the cultural heritage which is defined by two main domains: tangible patrimony ((building, books, monuments, works of art, artefacts, landscape) and untangible patrimony (language and knowledge, folklore, oral history, traditions customs, aesthetic and spiritual beliefs etc). There is also another category cultural natural heritage (countryside, natural environment, flora and fauna, landscapes that are proned for cultural tourisme). (Zaman, Ghe., 2015)

Culture is a recognized territorial development factor at the international level, both politically and through dedicated investments. Politically, culture has been recognized as a pillar of sustainable development at local and regional level through the Agenda 21 for Culture (2004), a United Cities and Local Governments (UCLG) Committee approach. "Cultural diversity is necessary for humanity, such as biodiversity in the natural environment; the diversity of cultural expressions generates wealth and is essential for the development of a broad cultural ecosystem with a diversity of backgrounds, actors and content; dialogue, coexistence and interculturality are basic principles for the dynamics of the relationship with and between citizens; public spaces must be seen as cultural spaces. "The preservation of the cultural heritage takes place at various levels, from the concrete actions of study, documentation and inventory of assets, registration and surveying of conservation status, conservation and restoration interventions, heritage management and museum tourism and access to the general public.

The tourism offer in which concerns the cultural heritage is very heterogeneous in which concerns the typology of goods, historical and cultural importance, patrimonial classification and resources, geographical location. On the other hand, a vast unclassified heritage, can be found isolated, protected by local and independent bodies, and sometimes without a well-defined dissemination strategy and with a much smaller historic-artistic and local expression. A different investment is represented by the dissemination of heritage and its valuation as a tourist resource, mainly in Romania the cultural heritage is owned by the state. If the cultural heritage is managed through several national or regional management bodies, with a public management, the tourism agents that use this resource are relatively unrelated to the decision-making process in which concerns investment, promotion and development strategy.

We have to take into account that the intangible heritage has an emotional component as well an emotional trigger, the emotional burden being the blend between history and legend, between facts and imagination. Creating emotional impact and regulating behaviour to embrace values of heritage including protection and conservation objectives, intercultural and interfaith dialogue and political awareness is the quintessence of a quality cultural heritage service. (Papathanasius-Zuhrt, Di Russo, Valentina Vasile, 2016)

The applications to UNESCO intangible heritage of various artistic and cultural manifestations converted items like the Romanian blouse or some folcklor activities like de dance of calusari, represent objects of intangible cultural property. This valorisation of popular culture, which is the identity mark of some regions or places, has as its objective the preservation of techniques and materials through the maintenance of these activities as a way of disseminating the territories, culture and endogenous resources. This factors can lay to the basis of a new entrepreneurship model based on multiculturalism like the Transylvania area, as we will see further.

Methodology

Screening upon literature review and thematic synthesis of actual entrepreneurial models. This is to say that the study aims to make a comparison between the existing entrepreneurial models regarding rural environment through grouping as a method of analysing the characteristics of rural entrepreneurship. Grouping consists in separating the surveyed community into homogeneous categories units after the variation of one or more characteristics, in our case the endogenous or exogenous factors and comparison as a qualitative method of comparing the entrepreneurial characteristics based on criterion such as time or space ( as it can be seen below the three types of entrepreneurship: innovation entrepreneurship, opportunity and enlargement entrepreneurship are analysed based upon a geographical distribution, thus creating several countries' profile.

2. Models of entrepreneurship- stage of knowledge

The presented models should highlight the innovation potential of local entrepreneurs as a condition of success in developing the local tourism and the level of well-being. The approach is justified by the identification of the profile of geographical areas, to start with and going towards the local entrepreneur profile and the role of social and cultural factors upon developing new models of rural entrepreneurship. In other word, we can start from the "big frame", collapsing into the individualisation of cultural heritage as entrepreneurship goal.

Predictive model design- innovation models in entrepreneurship has a large spectrum of interventions from good practice models presented to entrepreneurs to diverse programmes which have been tested and can anticipate problems, having the tendency of generalization.

The model above shows the connections between the entrepreneur characteristics and the entrepreneurial environment that has external features and internal features as input factors of the model, a very important data being the location of the entrepreneurial activity which will impose some particularities if we are speaking about a rural space.

The innovation which boosts the level of entrepreneurship has at its basis the motivation, as we can see also in the figure 1. The process of innovation implies the next stages: process of innovation generation, novelty degree of the innovation strategy, level of entrepreneurial innovation, types of innovation. As main motivation that lay at the basis of the process, there can be outlined: area development, development strategy, stakeholders, financing programs, the level of education, etc.

Fig.1 Predictive model of entrepreneurial innovation in rural environment, Source: Harpa Elena, Monica Sorina, Dana Rus, A predictive model of innovation in rural entrepreneurship, procedia Technology 2014

The strategies to encourage rural entrepreneurship initiative must respond to three major challenges (Steriu, Otiman et al., 2013):

- aspects of economic structure
- low employment opportunities in the primary sectors as a result of structural changes in the economy
- increased by legislative changes far too fast to could be assimilated by the rural population.

The characteristics of rural business environment play a major role having into consideration the difficulty of maintaining a critical mass of facilities in rural areas (infrastructure, market, tax incentives, etc.) and, also, the need to support economic development. (Andreea Feher, Vasile Gosa,2014) accelerated aging of the population associated with extra-rural exodus of young people and (re)turning to rural areas, especially of persons at retirement age are social aspects that can effect in a negative way the chances of potential rural entrepreneurship.

So, as a way of stimulating the entrepreneurial spirit, the Small Business Act for Europe (EC, 2011), proposed a new model based on three pillars of action (Figure 2).

- development of entrepreneurship education and training to support economic growth and driving the emergence of new business;
- creating a favourable business environment for entrepreneurs (providing the access to financing, providing support with the development stages of business, reducing administrative restrictions;
- dynamization of entrepreneurial culture through the use of good practice patterns and stimulation of entrepreneurial initiative of target groups with the potential to become entrepreneurs. (Andreea Feher, Vasile Gosa,2014)

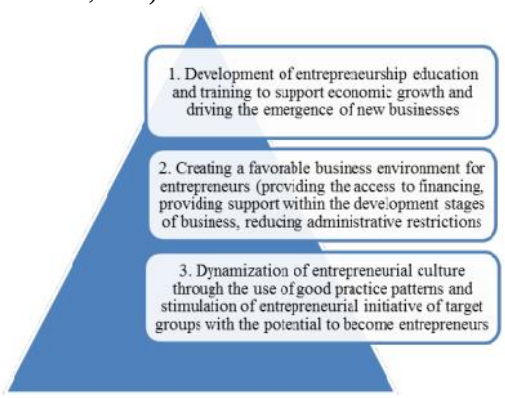

Fig.2 Pillars of Action of rural entrepreneurship development, Source: The development of rural entrepreneurship in Romania, Andrea Feher, Vasile Goşa,Tabita Hurmuyache, Miroslav Raicov, 2014

The first pillar of action covers measures such as (Steriu, Otiman et al., 2013): including among the programs of primary, secondary, professional, and higher education, as well among the adult education, of needed disciplines for skills training necessary for an entrepreneurial spirit development and using structural funds for the revival of entrepreneurship education for youth; The second pillar refers to creating a favourable business environment for entrepreneurs, comprising the following steps: providing support for entrepreneurs in the developmental stages of the business through: rural tax systems more favourable for businesses in the early stages; financing programs and making them known among entrepreneurs or implementing a new payment scheme of VAT at collecting for small businesses. This financial measurement, of course, need to be sustained by educational ones like special programs of training, reducing the number of immigrants each year and creating new employment opportunities for the young people from the rural areas. So, according to social exchange theory, an individual contributes to the institutionalization of entrepreneurship in her social environment by engaging in the activities of opportunity search and resource assembly. In this way, the norms expected from her role attains legitimacy as an entrepreneur.

III. Innovation model in rural entrepreneurship

This innovation entrepreneurship model is based upon the idea of perceiving the information of the market, the need for cultural consumption, for example, and the ability to concretize it using modern technology.

The adapted model of a three-stage entrepreneurial process in the rural development focuses on the idea that the local community is in search for a new business model for their community as a whole, rather than searching for new firms, jobs, growth opportunities and entrepreneurs. (for examples the vacation village hotel or a campus where different households play different role in a holistic manner)

It can be said that on the first stage Innovation is important to perceive the opportunity, the means to put the "vision" into practice using innovative methods. In creating an economic opportunity as a next stage, the entrepreneurs develop a new product, a new activity as an advantage of his own or as a peculiarity of the area. In realising the economic opportunity option (second stage) the main outputs refer to utilising and allocating outputs, contact with institution or creating different partnership. Finally, we can focus on the entrepreneurial objectives and its outputs like external gains (social gains, profit, employment) or internal gains (motivation, satisfaction).

Entrepreneurship is seen more than a way to develop business ideas, but it becomes part of the local structure. In order to sustain the process there is an interplay between communication and history – the where some local successful entrepreneurs share in exterior their vision and innovating idea for the near community, internalising also other stakeholders vision upon the local development their historical deeds and sins, their contemporary community visions and moreover their trustworthiness to outline the future strategic direction. Successful entrepreneurs are constantly engaged in social exchanges with a wide variety of networks to creating social capital through trust, mutual obligation, expectations and norm setting activities.

3. Rural entrepreneurship and cultural heritage in Romania (Transylvania study case)

Rural tourism could be both a chance for the rural areas' revival and a possible solution to the problems affecting them. Moreover, for a sustainable development of rural tourism, beneficial for the local communities, it is also necessary that the businesses be local and capitalize also the favourable nature-based resources and the cultural heritage (i.e. traditions, history and local specifi cities). Consistent with other researches, we found that the supply of funding for rural businesses is somewhat weaker and less competitive compared to the urban-based businesses. In which concerns rural areas, the major form of entrepreneurship are SME's, family firms, individual firms or authorized person. Rural tourism can be a large area to discuss in order to emphaze all the typology that can be deducted out of the multiple forms that are found spread in Romania. The subject of this study does not focus on the economic side of entrepreneurship and the organizational part, such as SME's or financial strategy to enlarge the entrepreneurship area in the country side, the aim of the study being more a qualitative analysis of the rural environment with it's potential of innovation and multiculturality. In this study case, I have taken into consideration a pilot study that addresses to the Transylvania area as an example for the rural entrepreneurship and innovation models that can be developed based on the cultural heritage that can be tangible (touristic objectives) or intangible (customs, tradition ).

In the last half century, in many countries, rural tourism is considered a future strategy that can help reduce population mobility, create jobs, and finally promote socio-economic development of disadvantaged areas. Several elements explain this option:

- rural tourism allows meeting the need for space, opening by practicing recreational, sports and cultural entertainment activities;
- responds to the increasing interest in the natural heritage and rural culture on the part of the urban population, who feels that is lacking the knowledge and pleasure of these values.
- the local government is aware of the opportunity offered by rural tourism (agro-tourism) through its multiplicative effect, which means producing complementary incomes, maintenance a demand for infrastructure and services that interests both the local community and visitors. Studies in France and Norway have shown that the amounts spent for shopping made by tourists in the area, very important in weight, are essential for maintaining and developing commerce and local crafts;

The models shown in the literature review above refer mainly to the mono-culturalism entrepreneurship which operates with the idea of consuming culture in different places but mainly with the same traditions and same culture topic. At the extremes, we can find a mono-culturalism model of visiting the cultural heritage, that implies knowing tradition in one place and making the accommodation in a nearby city, for example you visit the surroundings of Sibiu but you choose to make the accommodation in a hotel in Sibiu, so you will "migrate" in order to make the heritage consumption in the near villages knowing the intangible patrimony as customs, tradition, food in a different place, so you will have a radial consumption model of rural tourism based on rural heritage.

At the other extreme, it can be found a more centered model of mono-culturalism rural entrepreneurship that has into consideration the village-hotel concept that emphases the collaboration between all inhabitant entrepreneurs of the location that provides separately accommodation, food, culture consumption.

In Romania, if we are talking about Transylvania area, certain villages can be considered representative. This area is characterized by multi-culturalsim being a meeting point of some mixed population and tradition such as german, hungarian, romanian, oriental influences, this co-existance leading in time to mixed tradition, mixed culture and mixed activities that particularized the area very much. So, from a rural tourism point of view, we can speak about ethnographic and folklore tourist villages, tourist villages of artistic and craftsmanship, landscape tourist villages.

In the category of ethnographic and folklore tourist villages can be included the localities where the port traditionally, the architecture, furniture and interior decoration of the tourist village, folk music and folk choreography prevails and is required as the essential attributes of the village. (Talaga, Rural Turism, Course notes,2010)

The villages of this type can offer accommodation and dining services to tourists under authentic conditions (furniture, decor, equipment bed linen in traditional style, traditional dishes served in dishes and special cutlery - dishes and dishes pottery, wood spoons etc. Artisanal exhibitions can be organized, and for tourists who do not stay in the locality but only visit it, there can be arranged one or more households with an ethnographic outdoor museum. Also, in these villages popular vocal or instrumental bards can be identified, we can refer also to Sunday horns, and celebrations, other customs and local traditions. (exemplifying those from the localities: Bogdan Vodă, Vaideeni, Lereşti, Sibiel,).

Tourist villages of artistic and craftsmanship. The interests of many tourists are known for artistic artistic creation, and their desire to purchase such creations directly from source, by the manufacturer himself. Until now, only local tourism is practiced in these localities circulation. Such villages offer the possibility of practicing a holiday tourism, in which, in specially designed workshops and with the guidance of famous artists and craftsmen, tourists would be able to initiate popular archeological techniques: glass icon, naive painting, wood sculpture and stone, folk weaving, folk clothing and stitches, ceramics, folk music and dances, etc.

We are considering identifying the possibilities of practicing some of these activities, even within of host households. There are many villages where the basic concerns of households are woven peacock woven fabrics, popular stitching or embroidery, activities where tourists can be initiated as amateurs. Therefore, the essential feature of these villages, their brand image, would be artistic and craftsmanship (examples of localities such as Dealu Frumos, Marga, Bucerdea Vinoasa etc.).

The predominant characteristics of landscape tourist villages. of these villages (for the quiet, solitary walks in a scenic natural setting) are the natural setting and geographic location isolated from crowded centers and large arteries of circulation. The hill and mountain villages, with homes spread over the valleys and hills at some distance with respect to each other, with meadows or orchards, satisfy the fundamental motivation of the numerous tourists of "returning to nature". Examples are localities such as Valea Viilor, Mărginimea Sibiului.

Multiculturalism is an undeniable reality and value in both cultural spaces formed in countries with a large contribution of immigrants, as we can see in some cases in Western space and in cultural spaces with a long historical tradition and a structure that requires coexistence between a majority culture and several historical minorities, such as the Romanian case and in particular the Transylvanian area. Transylvania is a special place with historical, ethnic, cultural and ethnographic values distinguishes itself from the other provinces of Romania. A multiethnic history and multicultural traditions have marked forever this region. Romanians, Hungarians, Saxons and Szeklers - very different ethnic groups - have managed to create a unique world, in which the archaic cultural character was preserved.

The Transylvanian villages with Saxon fortified churches offer a lively picture of the landscape cultural heritage in southern Transylvania. Sibiu, the cradle of the Saxon civilization in our lands, bordering on the west with a grouping of Romanian villages that form an ethnographic unit called Sibiu Surroundings . These villages stand a testimony of the Romanians' cultural identity on these lands.

In the model of developing innovation in the rural entrepreneurship has into consideration the inputs and outputs of the rural system. In the category of inputs there are external factors and internal factors that can lead to innovation. External factors that can influence can be: location, natural resources, landscape. On the other hand, with external influence can be stakeholders (city hall, investments, public organizations or non-profit organization, social capital) that develop program for rural tourism and sustainability of patrimonial heritage. Features such as ethnicity, customs, traditions, consultancy, financing programs and field of activity ( for example the type of activity that is characteristic for a certain area (evening sittings, sewing, weaving, pottery, embroidery, art of wine making, different local preparations and how to prepare such as "gulas" in Transylvania, etc.). To all of this, to the physical environment and social one, it can be added as a feature of rurality as an entrepreneurial middle, the economic environment (infrastructure, business networks, ICT's)

Or if we are referring to tangible patrimony- the touristic objectives of the area, the cultural patrimony such as mansions (example Ambient mansion situated in Cristian village where the history and tradition of the Saxon crafts are still remarked or such as Apafi mansion, Malancrav build by prince Mihaly Apafi in 1920 and thanks to a Romanian-British NGO who has forced to help traditional rural communities in the Transylvanian region, Apafi Mansion is part of the Mihai Eminescu Trust Foundation's projects.

The internal factors regarding the outputs are the internal features of each ethnicity such as their values, way of thinking, religions that leads to a diversity in the inhabited space that becomes an eclectic rural community which offers a diversified tourism offer.

The motivation in innovating, the level of education are certain factors that influence the multi-culturalism level and that can create important outputs for the community. Regarding the level of education as input for the model, two forms of socializing of the individual can be seen in Romania: the first is based on traditional values, values which are transmitted in a structured way of understanding the world and interacting with it, and the second belongs to the formal education system that is different not only in rural area compared to urban area but also in Eastern Europe.

The two social systems complement each other to a point where the individual will build on those social forms that are closest to their own personality structure. The educational gap is favouring the traditionalist orientation of people living in the rural area at the expense of entrepreneurship of Western origin. This generates risk aversion and reluctance to bank financial instruments that can develop rural area and local economy, based on the principle of the minimum allowed.

The process of innovation can lead to various outputs. The innovation is a process that implies a complete circle and it depends of the degree of the innovation strategy (gadget, IT equipment, virtual presentation of the area) and level of entrepreneurial innovation that lead to types of innovation. So, the outputs are important for the development of the area, for their purpose of putting into like different traditions, different kind of particularities regarding a nation or a niche sector. One of the most important output is the effect on the social economy, the social cost, the improvement on the way of living. And if we are talking about a qualitative output, the emphasize is upon the perpetuating traditions, protecting and preserving the rural cultural heritage, improving the living environment of communities, framing the areas in the European coordinates regarding the promotion of cultural heritage and innovation technology.

Rudolf Rezsohazy (2008 ), makes a typology of values regarding rural develpment advancing a classification dividing them into: core values, structural values, peripheral values, final values, instrumental values overall, sectored values, explicit values, default values, hidden values. The persistence of these values related to the specific culture of a nation's culture and social model in culture. (Gabriel Pricina, 2012)

Entrepreneurship models, well applied create impact upon the social economy, reducing the cost of living and contribute to the economic development of the area. This can be seen as the social impact of rural touristic entrepreneurship model. The social economy is an important "employer" with a share of 3.3% of the total number of employees from Romania. (insse.ro)

Besides lower the total social cost, there are positive implication in which regards road construction, sewage and drinking water network. Thus, at the end of 2013, from 31639 km communal roads, only 7% were mostly upgraded being cobbled roads (48%) and earth roads (29%) (insse.ro)

Successful ventures have shown that counter-urbanization and well-managed rural tourism sites can have a positive effect on the area's economic stability and growth. In rural areas, a social enterprise participates in the development of the community as a whole in Sustainable way: Creates jobs for the community or people in difficulty, addresses the problems of each community (education, poverty, promotion crafts, support for local tourism).

Tourists are becoming increasingly interested in rural tourism opportunities, it is necessary to focus on diversifying the tourism offer through the ingenious combination of passive rest with an active involvement in learning crafts and traditions, as well as farm practices in the household, highlighting the educational component of tourism.

For example, in the rural tourism of Romania it can be seen an increase in the number of establishments, increase that lead to a development of agro-touristic tourism and increase in the cultural heritage of the connected areas because big cities like Alba-Iulia, Sibiu, Brasov, etc. act like pole magnets for different type of tourists.

Table 2. Number of rural establishments www.ins.ro, Statistical Brevity, 2018

This data can be related with the development of tourism divided by geographical area that lead, also, to the conclusion that social benefits to the area when rural tourism is managed well. For example, rural tourism in Europe in 2014 provides around 6 million bed spaces in 500,000 establishments, representing around 15% of the total accommodation capacity of Europe. Together with related services, the sector generates more than €100 billion in direct spending. From the corroborated pictures, the one related to rural accommodation such as inn, camping, vacation villages and the one related to total.

existing capacity, we can conclude that the touristic capacity has risen during 2014-2017, the Central region regarding Transylvania has had a capacity 60597 in 2014 and of 71038 in 2017, the most important areas being Sibiu (10902 in 2017), Brasov (29881) and Mures (11491). The big cities act like pole magnets, "selling" also the rural cultural heritage of surrounding villages with social implication of diminishing costs and creating local business, raising the life quality.

In order to support the role of rural tourism with its social benefits, the social networks and stakeholders must be adapted to the rural profile. Social exchange behaviours can involve active positioning within a network. For example, creating strong ties provide support, validation, and market intelligence from stakeholders while fostering weak ties provide information about the macro-environment outside the tourism industry. Therefore, the querie could be to identify and respond to opportunities by facilitating access to technology and social network links between potential entrepreneurs and demand markets.

Conclusions

In this research, the purpose was to realize a literature review that can summarize the main rural entrepreneurial models starting with predictive models based on innovation, external features of entrepreneurial milieu and internal factors such as motivation, level of education, training and continuing with models regarding pillars of action of rural entrepreneurship development, outlining the importance of developing a proper entrepreneurship education, supporting the economic growth and creating a favourable business environment for entrepreneurs.

The main focus is upon the innovation models and, in this direction, I have proposed two models: one adapted after the main characteristics of rurality (Stathopoulos, Psaltopoulos,2014 ) as an entrepreneurial milieu where the innovation is seen as a pre-stage phases and an own innovation model based on multiculturalism and cultural heritage that has the innovation as a central idea based upon the intersection of various customs, traditions, culture, ethnicities, intangible patrimony, touristic objectives that are to generate social, economic and educational outputs for the rural community with positive feedback for the future generation and, nonetheless, for the growth and sustainability of the present community. It is very important to outline the the cultural and educational positive impact that goes along with the economic and social impact (such as low migration rates, low unemployment ratio, school abandonment, etc) and, also, with the impact of lowering the social costs by creating a favourable rural entrepreneurship environment. The innovation lays at the basis of progress, the process of innovation can lead to various outputs, this implies a complete circle and it depends of the degree of the innovation strategy (gadget, IT equipment, virtual presentation of the area) and level of entrepreneurial innovation that lead to types of innovation. The main direction that where outlined regarding the cultural heritage were ethnographic and folklore tourist villages, tourist villages of artistic and craftsmanship, landscape tourist villages, that focus on the idea that multiculturalism is an undeniable reality and value in both cultural spaces formed in countries with a large contribution of immigrants that can lead to multiple inputs and outputs regarding innovation and the methods in which the touristic potential of a rural area can be valorized.

In spite of the fact that the traditional world was unbalanced by eliminating or reducing a component, however, other components of the traditional values have remained present and accounted for substitute work outside the home. The perpetuation of traditional exists in the form of creating rural SMe's, individual firm or family firms or authorized person that can lead an activity in a entrepreneurial framework but the innovation is the key element in boosting tradition and cultural objectives.. It can be observed that after 1990, the trend of returning to areas from regaining ownership, has led to a symbiosis between the two formulas and helped to a new form of minimum entrepreneurship to ensure. The new owners or the potential owners (the future rights of inheritance) compared the alternatives and chose the most convenient formulas by reporting the requirements to ensure their effort. In this context the traditional philosophy was kept, and the rural residents adapted to a modern economic context, so the survival was ensured the minimum by the outsourcing of the economic activities in order to ensure convenient report work-incomes.

Cultural tourism and innovation can be seen as a future model of cultural consumption based on the change in the consumption need of tourist consumer that focuses not only in the culture consumption of the visited place but, also, on the attractiveness of the place regarding the innovation techniques and communication equipment that has raised the problem of an adapted entrepreneurship model based on the need of innovation. When a certain area is visited, the consumer of culture or tourism is no longer satisfied only by cultural aspects or dynamics but, also, by the creativeness of the place. The role of creativity in the development of regions and the innovation of new products in order to create attractiveness is becoming important.

Having into consideration the migration problem and the effects of the economic crisis until de present, in the case of Romania, the rural population is the holder of a traditional cultural heritage and, this, in the economy is only one dimension of a complex system.

If the social identity of entrepreneurs is not institutionalized in rural regions, the pre-startup phase may be more properly viewed as a social exchange phenomenon. So, when the community development is set as an objective, there are required cognitive effort and notification in order to meet the need for change and innovation. So, in this context there are important three directions: will of change, perception of innovation, the human and financial resources.

PRACTICAL METHODS OF SELECTION AND CALCULATION OF SAMPLE SIZE FOR AUDIT SAMPLING

Sandra TEODORESCU[*]
Andreea Paula DUMITRU[]

Abstract

Audit sampling is very important part of audit works. No mater it is financial audit, internal audit and others kind of audit, audit sampling still need to be used by auditors. Sampling is a process of selecting a subset of a population of items for the purpose of making inferences to the whole population. Accounting populations usually consist of a large number of items (debts values, credit values), often totalling millions of monetary units, and a detailed examination of all accounts is not possible. Statistical sampling allows the auditor to draw conclusions supported by statistical inference. The results obtained for the sample extend, in probabilistic terms to the whole population, obtaining the confidence interval for the errors mean. It is critical that the selected sample to be representative for population.

The purpose of this study is to estimate the accounting misstatements related to debts values of 5121 account of an audited company. The study objectives regards determining the sample size to be verified, estimating accounting misstatements of the debts values for the entire population studied. using different statistical sampling methods.

Keywords: financial auditing, statistical sampling, sample size, materiality, accounting misstatement, confidence interval

Introduction

The financial audit represents the evaluation activity made by a qualified person prone to accurately record the fiscal and accounting financial data, to be honest and to undertake only credible economic transactions.

The basic feature of audit is independent of the entity or the auditing activity as well as the global appreciation of the reports issued by this following a critical analysis of its procedures and structures.

The main purpose of an audit mission is to increase the confidence of financial information users, the auditor having to express their opinion on financial reporting in accordance with General Financial Reporting Framework applicable (IFAC, 2013, pp.75).

The methodological approach of a financial audit mission to issue an opinion can be structured in four fundamental phases (Arens et al., 2012, pp. 162). In the first phase, the planning of the audit mission takes place, when the auditor has to set a threshold of significance, in the second phase shall be tested internal control system and performs a series of tests substantial of transactions, in the third phase apply analytical procedures and tests of details of account balances, and in the last phase occurs final review by the responsible mission and issue audit report (Arens et al., 2012, pp. 414-423).

For each of these stage, the auditor should obtain sufficient appropriate audit sampling regarding the existence and functionality of the internal control system, and the main assertions managers on transactions, account balances and other information reported (IFAC, 2013, pp. 405).

The theme chosen aims at studying the audit sampling and other selective testing methods and procedures as this is an extremely important issue especially for the professionals practice in financial audit. The practical procedures of sampling are at the basis of the audit proofs credibility or the financial auditors as well as the auditing entity management are equally interested in it. Moreover, all the users of the information published in the financial situations are interested in its credibility in order not to negatively influence their decisions. The importance of audit sampling is given by the fact that an integral examination of the accounting financial transactions and operations could take as much time as their realization.

1. Literature Review

In order to highlight the importance of knowing and using sampling in audit, we take into account the statistical sampling methods met in the specialized literature as well as the methods recommended by the ISA 530 [11], and the audit professional in Romania, issued by the Chamber of Financial Auditors of Romania (CFAR).

At the stage of knowing the units planning and organizing the audit work, the auditor needs to obtain enough data on the applied accounting system and on the internal control in order to adapt an effective work plan. Before proceeding on testing, the auditor needs to establish the sample size and the elements selected from the population being tested for each audit procedure.

When the auditor decides to test less than 100%, out of population aiming inferences on the total population it is used the term audit survey or survey auditing. Evaluating the audit survey results represents an essential part and often difficult for the audit process. In this way a series of questions rises as follows:

When is a sample size bigger enough to allow for evaluating the characteristics of a population? Does a sample correctly represent the accounting information?

A representative sample is that in which the auditing characteristics are approximately identical to those of the population. That means that the elements included in the sample are similar to those which remain out of it.

The auditor does not quantify a sampling risk in the non-statistical survey. In turn, he chooses to analyze the sample's elements which will provide, in the auditor's opinion and under the given circumstances, the most useful information. The conclusions on the whole population could be drawn in terms of a subjective judgment. For this reason, the non-probabilistic sampling is often called "rationalized sampling". The statistical survey distinguishes from the neon-statistical survey as it allows for quantifying (measuring) the sampling risk within the survey planning and result evaluation by using a series of math patterns. During the courses of statistics, a statistical result is computed at the confidence level of 95%. The confidence level of 95% generates a sampling risk of 5%.

The auditor has the option to choose between a statistical and a non-statistical sampling technique. The three steps to follow, irrespective of whether a statistical or non-statistical technique will be employed, are sample size determination, selection of the sample, and the evaluation of the sample results (Guy et al., 2002:2; IFAC, 2012d ISA 530 par. 6-8).

Hitzig (2004, pp 31) points out that the implementation of a statistical or a non-statistical sampling technique is determined by the sample selection method, and should not simply be an arbitrary decision to apply/not apply statistical techniques, made by the auditor. In addition, the ISA on Audit Sampling 530 (IFAC, 2012d ISA 530 par. A9) indicates that the sample size cannot be used as a criterion to determine whether to use statistical or non-statistical techniques. The choice of non-statistical sampling techniques does not imply the use of smaller sample sizes in order to provide sufficient audit evidence (Crous et al., 2012, pp 257-258).

Gul (2008, pp259-260), mention some principal advantages of statistical:(1) statistical sampling will help the auditor to calculate a precise and reliable confidence level , (2) statistical sampling demands an auditor to properly plan an audit procedure in a systematic and scientific manner, (3) statistical sampling will permit the auditor to interpret sampling results in an objective manner base on the value of statistical precisions and reliability, (4) statistical sampling will permit an auditor to rely on a smaller sample than would have been the case if nonstatistical sampling was to be used.

A sample selection method that an auditor will prefer to use in the process of selecting a sample will largely depend on whether the auditor is using statistical or a nonstatistical sampling approach. However, there are some sample selection methods that can be used for both statistical and nonstatistical audit sampling approaches such as random sample selection method, systematic sample selection method or stratified sample selection method. On the other hand, haphazard, block, or directed sample selection methods are usable in situations where the auditor has chosen to use a nonstatistical sampling approach (Tate & Grein, 2009, pp.171).

Jaba et al (2014) determined the sample size of the customers to be verified, extracting the sample using SPSS 20.0 statistical program.

2. Paper Content

In the proposed study, we refer to the theoretical and practical methods used in the selection of the elements for the testing within an audit process. Here are some methods for selecting the sample, determining its volume and the confidence interval for the population average.

In this study, we analyze the financial statement of an audited firm.

Defining the population

The characteristics of the population are summarised below: 5121 account status (current bank account) of the audited company is as follows: N = 459 items representing the whole population, total credits = 72,566,389.00, total debts = 72,299,809.00. The sampling base is the debit balance. The difference between the accounting data and data from primary documents will be the "error" or "accounting misstatement".

The main objective

The main objective of audit sampling is to detect any kind of error or fraud that could happen in the company as well as financial statements. This involves testing the correctness of calculation by estimating the number of errors mean. The objective of the auditor, when using audit sampling, is to provide a reasonable basis for the auditor to draw conclusions about the population from which the sample is selected.

The variability of population

In devising their samples, auditors must ensure that the sample selected is representative of the population. If the sample is not representative of the population, the auditor will be unable to form a conclusion on the entire population. Before selecting the sample, the auditor should evaluate the homogeneity of the population. It is determined by calculating the coefficient of variation $v = \frac{\sigma}{\bar{X}} \cdot 100$. If $v \leq 35\%$, population is considered homogeneous. If $v > 35\%$, population is heterogeneous, the variation is very high, the average is not representative and the group must be restored. Thus, the auditor will use to stratify the population to reduce the high variability of the elements, by dividing it into subpopulations. Reducing variation within each population allows the auditor to draw a smaller sample, keeping the same level of confidence and precision.

Establishing acceptable sampling risk of 5%.

Thus, the confidence level is set a priori to 95%, while in reality, for certain types of operations, such as unacceptable levels. An audit risk of 5% could also be very high in some cases. The auditor can determine the elements for each task or type of population, depending of their specific, and it is advisable to do so. Only in this way, the audit evidence obtained by analyzing the results of a representative sample may be relevant and credible.

The sample size

The sample size calculation was performed using several versions presented below.

Extraction of the sample and performing audit procedures

The sample extraction can be done using several selection methods. In the following we present three such methods.

Inferential statistics

The results obtained for this sample extend, in probabilistic terms to the whole population, obtaining the confidence interval for the number of errors mean.

3.1. Selection methods

3.1.1. First selection method (systematic selection of the sample)

This method involves selecting items using a constant interval between selections, the first interval having a random start. We assume that the auditor proposes to choose 10% of items to create the sample. Then, $n = 10\% \cdot N$=45 items for the sample. In this case, the sampling interval is $\frac{N}{n} = 10$. Thus, every 10th sampling unit is selected (from 10 to 10 starting from a first randomly selected item).

The auditor chooses, according to the audited company, a maximum materiality level. This level differs from one company to another, and is measured in units of currency.

When applying a statistical method, the audit authority will estimate most likely misstatement in the population and compare this to materiality in order to evaluate the results. It is expected that the actual known errors found will be corrected. If the obtained difference (accounting misstatement or error) between the accounting data and the primary documents data is below the materiality level, then it is said that the error is insignificant. If the accounting misstatement is greater or equal than materiality level, the error is significant. In case an significant error occurs, it must be either corrected, or displayed accordingly. Consequently, the auditor will consider it when providing the audit report (in this case the auditor's opinion may be full responsability or limited responsability).

For example, the auditor choose a sample of 45 items, 10%, randomly. Suppose for $n_0 = 40$ items, there was insignificant misstatements and for $n_1 = 5$ items, the errors were significant. Let, B, be a binary random variable:

$$B = \begin{pmatrix} 0 & 1 \\ \hat{p} & \hat{q} \end{pmatrix} = \begin{pmatrix} 0 & 1 \\ \frac{40}{45} & \frac{5}{45} \end{pmatrix},$$

where $\hat{p} = \bar{X} = \frac{n_1}{n_0+n_1} = \frac{5}{45}$ is the error sample proportion and $\hat{q} = \frac{n_0}{n_0+n_1} = \frac{40}{45}$ is the correct sample proportion. The sample variance is $S^2 = \hat{p}(1-\hat{p}) = \hat{p} \cdot \hat{q} = \frac{5}{45} \cdot \frac{40}{45} = \frac{200}{45^2}$ and sample standard deviation will be $S = \frac{\sqrt{200}}{45} = 0{,}314$.

Assuming that the auditor selects without replacements sampling, then the confidence interval for whole population errors mean is

$$\bar{X} - Z_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}} \cdot \frac{\sqrt{S}}{n} \cdot \sqrt{1-\frac{n}{N}} < \mu < \bar{X} + Z_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}} \cdot \frac{\sqrt{S}}{n} \cdot \sqrt{1-\frac{n}{N}} \quad (1)$$

where

$\bar{X}$ = sample mean,

$N$ = the whole population size,

$n$ =the number of units being sampled,

$Z_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}}$= a $Z$- normal value corresponding to confidence level $1-\alpha$, or to the $\alpha$ audit risk, $\mu =$ the number of errors mean in the whole population (the expected error frequency or the expected number of misstatements, not their values).

In performing audit sampling procedures, the auditor is interested to estimate the confidence interval of the errors mean value that could occur in the debts of 5121 account.

Thus, the confidence interval is defined by the limits of:

$$= \left[\bar{X} - Z_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}} \cdot \frac{\sqrt{S}}{n} \cdot \sqrt{1-\frac{n}{N}}\ ;\ \bar{X} + Z_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}} \cdot \frac{\sqrt{S}}{n} \cdot \sqrt{1-\frac{n}{N}}\right] =$$
$$= \left[\frac{5}{45} - 1.96 \cdot \frac{0{,}314}{45} \cdot \sqrt{1-\frac{45}{459}};\ \frac{5}{45} + 1.96 \cdot \frac{0{,}314}{45} \cdot \sqrt{1-\frac{45}{459}}\right] =$$
$$= [2{,}4\%;\ 19{,}8\%]$$

The maximum number of misstatements the auditor can expect in the population, based on the sample, at a 95% confidence level, is 19,8%.

3.1.2. Second Method (block selection followed by a statistical or a non-statistical selection)

In situations when the auditor uses block selection as a sampling technique, many blocks should be selected to help minimise sampling risk. An example of block selection is where the auditor may only examine the documents values that are higher than 500,000. For the rest of items, the auditors use the first method of selection or even use a non-statistical method, the mechanical one. Depending on the number of errors found, the sample can be increased.

3.1.3. Third Method selection (without replacement simple randomly selection)

Sampling without replacements provide the sample size to be extracted, calculated using the formula:

$$n = \frac{\frac{Z^2_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}} \cdot S^2}{2}}{\frac{Z^2_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}} \cdot S^2}{\Delta^2_{\bar{X}} + \frac{N}{N}}} \quad (2)$$

where $\Delta_{\bar{X}} = Z_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}} \cdot \frac{S}{\sqrt{n}}$ is tolerable error, $\frac{S}{\sqrt{n}}$ is standard error,

$S^2 = \frac{\sum_{i=1}^{n}(x_i - \bar{X})^2}{n-1}$ is the sample variance estimator.

As neither $\Delta_{\bar{X}}$ nor $S^2$ are known, invariably depending on the sample size, the above formula can not be determined. In fact, empirically, however, it can be determined. Below are three alternatives for computing of the sample size.

3.2. Alternatives for computing of the sample size

3.2.1.Version 1 for computing of sample size (S is assumed to be known )

However, given the fact that the firm activity, procedures, the company employees, accountants have not changed in time, the auditor considers that historical data may be used to estimate the standard deviation in the population. In practice, the auditor will have to rely either on historical knowledge (standard deviation of the population in the past period) or on a preliminary sample (the standard deviation of which being the best estimate for the unknown value).

Based on a randomly selected sample of operations, the size of which has been computed according to the formula (2) and for a tolerable error $\Delta_{\bar{X}}$, defined by the auditor (at the level of the operations, e.g. 1% or 2% from total debts), the observed misstatement mean in the sample can be projected to the whole population, yielding the expected population misstatement. The sampling error can then be added to the expected population misstatement to derive an upper limit to the population misstatement at the desired confidence level (e.g. 95%).

3.2.2. Version 2 for computing of sample size (S determined from a pilot sample)

Version 2.1. The first step, for the auditor, is to filter the sampling base to eliminate the values exceeds the materiality. These items must be tested individually. Eliminating from the 459 items, those with debts values are greater than materiality, a new sampling basis is obtained.

The second step is to determine the standard deviation for the rest of items, named the pilot sample. The next step is to compute the tolerable misstatement, which is 1% of the total book value. From this information, the sample size can be determined as

$$n = \frac{1{,}96^2 \cdot 49{,}3^2}{7{,}81^2 + \frac{1{,}96^2 \cdot 49{,}3^2}{459}} = 29{,}881 \approx 30 \; units$$

If the sample size, n, exceeds 5% of the whole population size, then the Cochran correction form for the sample size can be used

Thus,

$$n_{Cohran} = \frac{n}{1+\frac{n}{N}} = \frac{30}{1+\frac{30}{459}} = 28 \; units$$

The 28 units will be included in the sample and will be tested. For an assumed risk of 5%, the auditor can expect accounting misstatement mean will be covered by the confidence interval shown in (1).

Version 2.2. Alternatively, the auditor could select a $n'$ value of the sample (according to Method I of selection). The evaluation is sumarized in the table below:

| No. | Data from primary documents | Accounting data | Difference (error, accounting misstatement) |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1 | | | |
| 2 | | | |
| $n'$ | | | |

For these debts values, data from primary documents will be compared with the accounting data and the difference will be note, if it occurs. For this pilot sample, created randomly, the standard deviation, S', corresponding to the errors found, will be calculated. A new value n will be calculated with (2) formula

$$n = \frac{Z^2_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}} \cdot S'^2}{\Delta^2_{\bar{X}} + \frac{Z^2_{1-\frac{\alpha}{2}} \cdot S'^2}{N}}$$

where tolerable misstatement, $\Delta_{\bar{X}}$ is 1% of the total book value.

The auditor will compare this new n value, with the n' value used in establishing the tested sample. If $n \leq n'$, then it is no longer necessary to increase the basis for selection. If, however, $n > n'$, then the auditor will have to increase the sample with n' - n units.

3. Conclusions

When auditing a company, auditors use a combination of professional judgment and statistical sampling methods to estimate account balances. The concept of "sampling method" actually encompasses two elements: the selection method (statistical or non-statistical) and the actual sampling method, which provide the framework for computing sample size and allowing for projection of the results. There are various sampling methods available to auditors and ISA 530 [11] recognises, the standard itself covers the principal methods. In reality there are a number of ways in which sampling can be applied. If the audit authority is of the opinion that the sampling method initially selected is not the most appropriate one, it could decide to change the method.

In the case study three selection methods were featured: a systematic selection of the sample, a block selection followed by a statistical or a non-statistical selection, respectively without replacement simple randomly selection. Also, there are three alternatives for computing of the sample size. We presented how the standard error and confidence interval are calculated, and the interpretation of the confidence interval. The latter is especially important for explaining findings to others who may not have much understanding of statistics. Future works includes stratification in a particular case of heterogeneous population.

BOUNDED RATIONALITY IN DECISION-MAKING

Abstract

The purpose of this paper is to study the relationship between rationality and decision making. As a specific objective it will be explained the benefit of learning in the decision making process derived from its results. The research question is: How does bounded rationality impact the decision making of organizations? The initial hypothesis is that the organization, as a social system, seeks to maintain the balance between the behavior that determines the positions of people and the structure of values and beliefs shared among them, but that is bounded to the rationality of the decision maker. The research method used is descriptive, being a qualitative analysis, that follows from the understanding of the behavioral theory of the firm also the behavioral decision theory, in terms of behavioral decision-making processes and the analysis through learning. The main conclusion is that bounded rationality occurs when companies lack context information of the results of their actions, being forced to make less than optimal decisions because they have to adjust to the conditions in which they operate. Decisions involve a commitment of large amounts of resources of the organization for the fulfillment of the objectives and purposes of the organization through the appropriate means. These means can be translated into models that help reduce the limits of rationality in organizations.

1. Introduction

This document is a reflection of the decision-making process in organizations, and the growth of companies through the behavioral theory of the firm. Decision making is analyzed from the point of view of bounded rationality, this with the aim of clarifying how decisions are made considering the human aspect of who decides. From a general point of view, the decision is an act that leads to the action of choosing between different alternatives. The adequate selection of these depends, to a large extent, on their success or failure, since they must cover the risk, certainty and uncertainty inherent in the decision and the action (Egan, 2007).

In organizations there is evidently a complex network of decisions and actions, the latter consisting of events that can be attributed to a system (Luhmann, 1997), while the decision finds its identity in the choice between alternatives, understanding that the decisions are much more sensitive to context than actions and, therefore, not equal to stable. Simon (1947) describes how organizations influence the decisions of their members, trying to make them compatible with the global objectives of the organization.

The theory of decision making, under different schemes, indicates the steps for a decision to be rational (Eduards, The theory of decision making, 1954). The people in charge try to do it this way, but in the real world it is not always possible. It is argued that an adequate study of human behavior in organizations should take into account the motivational, attitude and rational aspects of human behavior. In this way, both the works of economists on planning processes and the work of psychologists on organizational communication and problem solving capacities (March and Simon 1958), cited in (Vargas-Hernández, Guerra-García, Bojórquez-Gutiérrez, & Bojórquez-Gutiérrez, 2014).

In this regard, Cyert & March (1963) in their book "A Behavioral Theory of the Firm" offered four main research topics; a) A small number of key economic decisions, b) Development of a general theory, generalizing the results of studies of specific companies, c) Linking empirical data to models, d) Orientation towards the process instead of the results. They argue that, the behavior approach takes the company as the basic unit of analysis, trying to predict the behavior with respect to the decisions of price allocation, production and resources; the decision-making process is emphasized.

On the other hand, economists and some psychologists have produced a large number of theories and experiments that have to do with decision-making with a particular focus on rational behavior.

Alfred Marshall proclaimed in his principles of economics that economics was a science of psychology, stating:

Economy is a study of humanity in the ordinary business of life; examines that part of individual and social action that is most closely related to achievement and to the use of material welfare requirements. Therefore, it is on the one hand a study of wealth; and on the other hand, and more importantly, a part of the study of man. Because the character of man has been shaped by his daily work and the material resources that he therefore seeks, rather than by any other influence, unless it is that of his religious ideals. Marshall, 1890, (quoted by Simon, 1979, p.493)

Subscribing to the previous contribution, Simon (1979) mentions that economic science has focused on a single aspect of human character, which is the use of reason, and particularly the application of it to problems of decision making. The organization, as a social system, seeks to maintain the balance between the behavior that determines the positions of people and the structure of values and beliefs shared among them, that import a certain order between individuals and the dynamics of organizations.

The behavioral theory of the firm takes from the theory of games, and research of operations, between several branches of social sciences in which there is interdependence and complementarity; models to express a way of anticipating problems, and simulate a solution of them in a given context. This document will not address these models in detail.

Why bounded rationality? Answering this question is not possible only in one way, that is why Conslick (1996) provides four reasons; the first, there is abundant empirical evidence that is important. Second, models of bounded rationality prove themselves. Third, justifications that assume that rationality is not bounded are not convincing in general. Fourth, the deliberation of an economic decision is a costly activity and a good economic decision requires that all costs be covered.

2. Background of the study of bounded rationality in decision making

In recent years there has been growing interest in the description of decision making that refers and analyzes the way people perform these actions in real contexts, which mostly prevents them from taking them rationally and in what conditions they will actually be relatively rational. This problem was analyzed by Barnard (1938), in which he defined formal organization as a consciously coordinated system of activities or forces of two or more people; He also emphasized the role of the informal organization, in which the individual personality is maintained against certain effects of the formal organization that tends to disintegrate the personality. In fact, Barnard (1938) concludes that: "the expansion of cooperation and development of the individual are mutually dependent realities, and that due to a proportion or balance between them is a necessary condition for human welfare" (p. 16).

This of course is related to the incentives of formal organizations, which are related to the social capacity in which people feel in the work environment, the condition of communion or camaraderie. On the other hand, authority is also mentioned as the character of a communication or order in a formal organization by virtue of which the dependents accept that order. The latter has greater impact on the issue of decision making, since the holder of the authority must have the rationality to take an action from among the alternatives within his reach and communicate this to his dependents through the authority that he enjoys.

From this point one of the fundamental problems of the organizations with respect to the communication begins, since the signature is considered like a processor of information more efficient than the individual, having failures in the communication or understanding, deriving from her a complex system cognitive called bounded rationality, of which the behavioral theory of the firm centers its study (Simon H., 1955).

After Barnard, one of the authors of the Behavioral theory of the firm, Herbert Simon, describes the importance of organizations in the decision-making of its members, considering these organizations remove such individuals as part of their autonomy and replace it with an organizational process of decision making (Vargas-Hernández et al., 2014). In this theory is provided a self-conscious attempt to develop linguistic and conceptual tools appropriate to reality, and meaningfully applied to organizations. The main thesis of Simon (1947) is that decision making forms the heart of the organization, and that the vocabulary of organizational theory must be derived from the logic and psychology of human choice.

From the perspective of the vision of rational systems, the behavior of organizations is considered as actions carried out by determined and coordinated agents. In this sense, Simon (1947) is consistent with the logic of economics and uses the flow of information, efficiency, implementation and design. Insists on reaching good terms with cognitive limitations, implying that the rationality of the behavior of organizations with clearly specific limitations. Regarding bounded rationality, Simon (1947) observes that a person does not live for years in a particular position in an organization, exposed to some currents of communication, protected from others, without profound effects on what the person knows, believes, wait, emphasize, fear and propose.

So, the organization provides positions of responsibility to exercise authority and influence over others, executives who make decisions and take actions, they must do so with an eye on the situation and another eye on the effects of this decision and future effects on the organization. This means that decisions are also influenced by the authority relationship. The major contribution of Simon (1947) to the economics of the organization is the argument that it is precisely in the realm where human behavior is intentionally rational, but only in a bounded way.

Organizational behavior is the theory of intentional and bounded rationality: it is about the behavior of humans that satisfy because they do not have the capacity to maximize (Simon, 1947). While the "economic man" maximizes and selects the best alternative among all available, the "man of the organization" satisfies, seeks a course of action that is satisfactory or "good enough." The economic man deals with the real world "in all its complexity. The world organization that man perceives is a drastically simplified model of the real world (Eduards, The theory of decision making, 1954).

The limits of rationality are the central theme that is addressed in this document. Rationality requires a choice between all possible alternative behaviors, in reality only a few of those alternatives come to mind. Complete rationality is "bounded" by the lack of knowledge. At the simplest level, performance may be bounded by manual dexterity or reaction time, and decision-making processes may be bounded by the speed of mental processes (Simon., 1979). Individuals are also bounded by their values and the conceptions of purpose that influence them in making their decisions, and these tend to be shaped by their organizational experience.

For example, if the loyalty of the executives of the organization is high, their decisions can show sincere acceptance of the set of objectives given within the firm. As mentioned above, people are bounded by their knowledge of the relevant factors for their work. This limitation applies both to the basic knowledge required in decision-making (bridge designers must know the fundamentals of mechanics) and to the information required to make appropriate decisions in a given situation.

On the other hand, Cyert & March, (1963) proposed that companies in reality, aim to "satisfy", instead of maximizing their results. That is, some groups can settle for "good enough" achievements instead of fighting for the best possible outcome. Again, this comes from bounded rationality. In the authors' model, the objectives are not established to maximize the relevant magnitudes, such as profits, sales and market share. Instead, the objectives are commitments negotiated by the groups of the organization. In the decision-making process the information is required to take the most appropriate, however, the collection of information by itself has a cost and requires resources.

The information is not transmitted immediately or automatically from its point of origin to the rest of the organization. Vargas-Hernández et al., (2014) affirm that there is often a lack of information transmission upwards, simply because subordinates cannot visualize the information with precision that their superiors need. These authors suggest that the problem also exists in an inverse situation, since the superior can retain information from subordinates; It can be accidental or fraudulent. This is a weight variable that affects rationality, again limiting the feasibility with which decisions are made.

This current work focus on investigating the close relationship of the decision-making process and the rationality in them. Then the following research question will be pursued: What is the impact of bounded rationality in the decision making of organizations?

In the study, only the relationship between the decision factor is analyzed, which in this case will depend on the bounded rationality of the person who performs the decision actions and what to do with the behavioral theory of the firm.

3. Conceptual theoretical review

3.1. Bounded rationality

It is known that behavior can be rational or irrational, then, it could be inferred that preferences, beliefs, expectations and the decision-making process are also. Cyert and March (1963) mention that the company is an institutional, functionally rational response to uncertainty and bounded rationality. How much of this can be observed in reality is to be doubted. Rationality in the real world is a complex concept, due to which there are numerous research works that argue that rationality is bounded by the lack of knowledge.

Human beings struggle for rationality, but it is restricted within the limits of their knowledge. The rational choice is feasible as the bounded set of factors on which the decision is based corresponds to a closed system of variables, Vargas-Hernández et al. (2014). This indicates that decisions can be made without taking into account the possible results derived from knowledge biases. A branch of the social sciences that tries to mitigate these biases, along with the economy, is operations research, however, the behavioral part is incorporated into these areas to try to explain and solve the limitations of the decision making in the firms.

A decision can be called objectively rational, if, in fact, it is the correct behavior to maximize the values given in a specific situation. A decision is subjectively rational if it maximizes achievement relative to the subject's actual knowledge (Mahoney Joseph, 2012). From this it can be inferred that an action is consciously rational insofar as the adjustment of the means to the ends is a conscious process. This resembles what economic man (homo economicus) represents, since it has characteristics such as being fully informed, sensitive and rational.

An economic man according to the theory of the decision, has complete information, assuming that he knows not only all the courses of action, but also his results. It is sensitive to the available alternatives. The crucial fact about the economic man is that he is rational. This means that their preferences are complete, transitive and that there are perfect substitutes; and on the other hand he makes his decisions to maximize his utility (Eduards 1954). The same author refers to the behavior in the decisions, mentioning that humans are neither perfectly consistent nor perfectly sensitive.

The above makes sense to the extent that it is understood that in the tensions that exist between society and the individual, there is a great demand to compete within the individual conscience. Where rational economic approach is to think individually, as well as the economic man who seeks to maximize its utility derived from instrumental rationality (rational choice). And since the capacity of the human mind to formulate and solve complex problems is very small compared to the size of the problems, whose solution is necessary for objectively rational behavior in the real world, instrumental rationality becomes, so to speak, bounded rationality.

The Theory of the instrumental rationality or rational choice, assumes that, in a situation of decision, the means, the information, the beliefs and personal analyzes, are optimal; the estimates of probabilities are easily realizable; the individual has at his disposal information about all possible alternatives and has a complete and consistent system of preferences that allows him to make a perfect analysis of all of them. It does not present difficulties or limits in the mathematical calculations that it must carry out to determine which is the best, therefore, it guarantees that the chosen alternative is a global optimum (Aumann, 1997).

The theory of bounded rationality, sees the decision process from a very different point of view. In the decision-making process, even in relatively simple problems, a maximum cannot be obtained since it is impossible to verify all possible alternatives. People differ in both available opportunities and desires (influenced by environmental factors). When an individual must decide, they influence him, both the desires that he possesses and the opportunities that he thinks he has. It is not certain that these beliefs are correct: it is possible that the individual is not aware of some opportunities that are actually viable to him or, he may believe that certain opportunities are favorable to him, which in reality are not, therefore it cannot be guaranteed that choose the best alternative (Elster, 1990).

As mentioned in Vargas-Hernández et al. (2014), about bounded rationality, referring to the fact that human behavior is rational first intention, but bounded by information asymmetry. And as mentioned earlier, the ability of the human mind to formulate and solve problems is small and is bounded by neuropsychological issues on the one hand and language limits on the other. Physical limits are the individual abilities to receive, retrieve and process information; those of language refer to the inability of individuals to articulate their knowledge or feeling by the use of a word, so that they can be understood by others (Williamson, 1979).

3.2. Decision Making

The theory of the decision under the behavior Paul & Fischhoff (1977), mentions that the decisions taken under a system of perceptions have, in a certain degree, to do with the uncertainty about the states of the environment in which the decision maker is. For example, who takes an umbrella depends on something that is not known with certainty that is the weather; or if you are a smoker, the decision will depend on the point of view of the loss of health due to smoking.

With this respect the theory of the decision making of Eduards (1954), three main ideas are assumed, first of all, there are options to choose from, so if a doctor wants to measure the reflexes when hitting the knee with a Neurological hammer, produces an automatic reaction, therefore there is no decision made (by the patient). However, from the doctor's point of view when he chooses between the two knees of the patient to hit, he makes a decision, because he has options (the legs). So, the theory of decision is about deciding with different options.

Second, this theory assumes that decisions are made in a non-random way. So it does not make sense to investigate the mechanisms of decision making, if these decisions are random. And finally, as a third point it is assumed that the decisions are oriented in specific goals. In general, decision theory is concerned with goal-directed behavior, in the presence of options.

Paul & Fischhoff (1977) mention that there are two types of decision theories; normative and descriptive. The first, explains how decisions should be made, the second describes how decisions are actually made. The behavioral decision theory in a descriptive way tries to explain the real behavior. In this context it makes sense to separate the decisions in different stages, then, different philosophers and psychologists, and scientists, separated the decision-making process in different stages, but more or less, all of them suggest, that first, we identify the problem, then, we collect information related to the problem; solutions are produced, alternatives are evaluated and finally selected among them. Figure 1 explains the above.

3.3. Behavioral theory of the firm

The behavioral theory of the firm has had an enormous influence on the theory of organization, strategic management, and socio-scientific research fields. Its central concepts have given motivation and foundation of theoretical and empirical works focused on the organizational phenomenon. In the present investigation the behavioral theory of the firm is used to explain the relationship in decision making and bounded rationality. The authors are mentioned, Barnad (1938) studied the functions of executives; where he emphasized the role of the individual personality in the informal organization, which subsists against the current of the formal organization. In the studies of administrative behavior, Simon (1947) and organizations March & Simon (1958), a behavioral theory of the firm Cyert & March (1963), were three contributions of the Carneige School that founded the scientific studies of the administration and behavior of the signature. Again Simon (1982) publishes a paper entitled "Models of Bounded Rationality". In the following paragraphs their contributions that form the behavioral theory of the firm will be analyzed.

3.3.1. The functions of the executive of Barnard (1938).

Barnard (1938) notes that successful cooperation is an abnormal condition rather than normal. In his work it is mentioned that, within innumerable failures of cooperation, it can see successes that survive these. Both the failures of cooperation and those of the organization are characteristic of human history. Its purpose is to provide a comprehensive theory of cooperative behavior in formal organizations. The main characteristics of the contribution of Barnard are: The willingness to cooperate, the ability to communicate and the existence and acceptance of a purpose. In this work it is argued that there is a zone of indifference in each individual, in which the orders are accepted without consciously questioning them about their authority.

It is pointed out that the art of executive decision making consists in not deciding questions that are not pertinent, in not deciding prematurely, in not making a decision that cannot be made effective, and in not making decisions that others must make. Such good judgment of the executive preserves morality, develops competence and preserves authority.

It is concluded that the expansion of cooperation and development of the individual are mutually dependent realities, and a due proportion or balance between them is a necessary condition for human well-being, Barnad (1938) cited in Mahoney (2012).

3.3.2. Administrative behavior of Simon (1947).

Simon's main thesis is that decision-making is the heart of the organization and must be derived from the logic and psychology of social choice. Three roles of the organization are highlighted: Organizations influence people's habits, organizations provide means to exert authority and influence over others; and organizations influence the flow of communications. Simon (1947) argues that it is precisely in the realm where the behavior is intentionally rational, but only in a bounded way, that there is room for a true theory of organization.

Organizational behavior is the theory of intentional and bounded rationality. In this sense, the term bounded rationality is used to designate a rational choice that takes into account the cognitive limitations of the person responsible for decision making, limitations of both knowledge and computational capacity. Bounded rationality is a central issue in the behavioral approach to economics, which is deeply rooted in the ways in which the actual decision-making process influences the actions that are taken.

Considering the brain as a scarce resource, Simon (1947) states that the information processing systems of modern civilization swim in an extremely rich soup of information. In a world of this kind, the scarce resource is not information; it is the processing capacity to attend to the information. Attention is the main bottleneck in the organization's activity, and the bottleneck becomes increasingly narrow as we move towards the top of the organizations.

3.3.3. Organizations de March & Simon (1958)

This model imposes a responsibility on the managers, which is to continuously seek to complement the information of their assignment of tasks. An organizational model that neglects economic incentives will be, for most humans, a poor predictive model; and the behavior of the organization can often be predicted by knowing previous behaviors and routines (March & Simon, 1958).

The characteristics of its organizational structure model was the optimization was replaced by the "satisfy", the alternatives of the action and its consequences are discovered sequentially through the search process, and each specific action deals with a bounded range of situations and a bounded range of consequences. It can be interpreted as the search is partially random, but in the effective search for problems is not blind, given that the design of a search process by itself is often an object of a rational decision (Mahoney Joseph, 2012)

3.3.4. A behavioral theory of the firm of Cyert and March (1963)

His work contains four research commitments: 1) Focus on a small number of key economic decisions made by the company; 2) Develop models oriented to company processes; 3) Link the company's models as close as possible to the empirical observations; and 4) Develop the theory with generality beyond the specific studies of the companies.

According to Cyert & March (1963) the organizations consist of a series of coalitions and that the function of the administration is to achieve a quasi-resolution of conflicts and avoid uncertainty. The problematic search that is stimulated by a problem with (or lack of) an existing routine is assumed to be motivated, simplified and biased, reflecting unresolved conflicts within the organization.

3.3.5. Models of bounded rationality by Simon (1982)

To cover the conflict of objectives and uncertainty, Simon (1982) mentions that we need to know something about perceptual and cognitive processes to predict short-term behavior. Also, the filtering of information is not a passive process, but an active process of attention, which is influenced by hopes and desires. (Simon., 1979).

The abundance of information means the scarcity of something else: the scarcity of information consumed, the information consumes the attention of its recipients. Information systems need to listen and think more than they speak. Establishing the problem of organization in this way leads to a very different system design that deals with information overload, (Simon H. A., 1997).

In this work we also talk about two concepts, one called Substantive Rationality, which deals with an appropriate behavior for the achievement of the given goals within the limits imposed by the given restrictions. In this vision of the economy, given the objectives, the rational behavior is determined in its entirety by the characteristics of the environment in which said behavior develops. And the other concept is Procedural Rationality, which is a search for better heuristics (heart of intelligence). Organizational economics is a description and explanation of human institutions. Decision processes, like all other aspects of economic institutions, exist within human reasoning. This is subject to changes in what humans know, and with each change in their means of calculation, (Simon H. A., 1997). A commercial company equipped with the operations research tools does not make the same decisions, for example, in regards to inventory management, as it did before it possessed such tools (Simon., 1979).

In this work it is concluded that complexity is profound in the nature of things, and the discovery of approachable procedures and tolerable heuristics that allow to select large spaces selectively is the core of intelligence, whether human or artificial (Mahoney Joseph, 2012).

4. Research methods

The present investigation is of descriptive character, being a qualitative analysis that follows from the understanding of the behavioral theory of the firm of Simon (1947, 2000; Cyert and March, 1963), the theory of the behavior of the decisions, (Paul & Fischhoff 1977; Busemeyer & Bruza, 2012; Gonzalez & Pegah, 2017), in terms of behavioral decision-making processes and their analysis through learning, which significantly influence the process of making decisions that help mitigate rationality bounded to a certain degree due to this key factor, which is learning.

Sources: Own elaboration with information from Natural Reviews, Neurocience. Volume 9. July 2008.

As can be seen in figure 2, the main difference with respect to figure 1, is shown in the learning that adds value to the decision process is learning. From this valuable concept, the results of each action will be evaluated. The learning process can modify all the states of decision making. It is likely that flexibility, which characterizes learning by greater openness of ideas, greater discussions, allowing for the possibility of being creative contributing to rational decisions (Hart & Banbury 1994), and in this way, mitigating its limitations, less in an aspect that is the adequate use of information, obtained through learning.

It is considered by what he mentions (Raport, 1975) that learning is of great importance because decisions are not always static. Static decisions are characterized by a single option and are often conceptualized as linear processes: one observes explicit alternatives and makes a decision, but one cannot learn from the consequences of those decisions (Gonzalez, 2012). Alternatives in typical static decisions are often described by probabilities and probabilities. A choice between an alternative that gives $ 3 with security and one that gives $ 4 with a probability of 0.8 and $ 0 otherwise is an example of a static decision (Gonzalez & Pegah, 2017).

There are other types of decisions that are dynamic decisions. These, in contrast to static ones, involve a sequence of choices made in an environment that can change exogenously or based on previous choices and where decisions are sequentially linked to each other through their effects so that an action at a specific time influences directly or indirectly future actions. Consider the previous example about finding the best couple. If we continue to see a person affects or not our chances of knowing a better or worse candidate. This can occur because dynamic environments vary in their inclusion of delayed feedback, interrelated actions and their effects over time, and dependence on time, where the value of actions is determined when an action is taken (Gonzalez & Pegah, 2017).

Simple tasks can have a dynamic complexity, arising from the relationship between the choices and their effects over time, from the sequential nature of these interdependencies, and the different lags between the actions and their effect on the environment and looking for the best partner is influenced by who we know and with whom we spend time, before making a marriage decision (Gonzalez & Pegah, 2017).

According to figure 2 and the theoretical analysis of Raport (1975) another very common approach for the modeling of learning in the tasks of the decision-making process is reinforcement learning (Reinforcemente Learning from now on RL). In a typical RL problem, an agent tries to find an association between an observed result and the previous actions using either its memory or environmental cues. An agent performs an action in each state (for example, by selecting an option in a binary choice task) and the environment delivers a reward or punishment based on the action state pair and changes the agent's current state. It is important to note that an RL agent tries to estimate the dynamics of the environment when experiencing it.

5. Analysis of results

As discussed above, an agent learns how good or bad each action is, based on the reward received. These characteristics can be probabilistic or deterministic and can be modified dynamically over time (Busemeyer & Bruza, 2012). This vision of the learning process originates in the work of Simon (1955), Edwards (1962), and the research paradigms that followed from the Behavioral Theory of the Firm. Under this tradition, the effects of real-world characteristics of decisions were investigated, such as time constraints, delays in feedback and cognitive workload, and how people handle such environmental constraints and learning everything. This process.

The thought cannot be thought stable and according to general objectives, the individuals that make up the group responsible for decision making are the matrix of ramification of the objectives, which are rationally subjective and then give coherence to what has to be decided, with personal interests, as a result of the rational limitations offered by the generalization to which it subscribes. Due to this, the learning of the predictive becomes a meta-theoretical challenge about the rationality of the organization; Only from this challenge can the organizational objective be generalized: "Learning, in the sense of reacting to perceived consequences, is the main way in which rationality manifests itself" (Simon, 1978, p.162) cited in (Hart & Banbury (1994).

In the solution of problems, human thinking is governed by programs that organize a multitude of simple information processes, in ordered and complex sequences that respond and adapt to the environment of the task and to the data extracted from that environment as develop the sequences. The secret of problem solving is that there are no secrets: it is done through complex structures of simple and familiar elements of learning in a decision process (Simon., 1979).

6. Conclusions

From a rational point of view, Simon (1979) states that choice is the process by which an alternative behavior for each moment is selected. For this, the possible alternatives must be selected, determine the consequences of each alternative and compare them. Being able to determine the consequences of the decisions taken is complex, since we must know the actions of other individuals or firms. However, from a logic of the limits of rationality in individual behavior it is not possible to reach a high degree of rationality (Simon 1947).

Choices made by an individual usually take place in an environment where premises are given, which are accepted as the basis of choice; and the behavior only fits within the limits set by these given environments. One of the functions of the organization is to establish its members in such a psychological environment that it helps to adapt their choices to the objectives of the firm, providing the necessary information to make their decisions.

Bounded rationality occurs when companies lack perfect information, that is, they do not have context information about the results of their actions, for example; they have bounded resources, and are restricted to the ability to process information. Under these conditions, firms are forced to make decisions, based on the data available for this, their resources and capacities to process information (Simon., 1979). This implies that firms can make decisions that are not completely optimal because they have to adjust to the conditions in which they operate.

Decisions involve a commitment of large amounts of resources of the organization for the fulfillment of the objectives and purposes of the organization through the appropriate means. These means can be translated into models that help reduce the limits of rationality in companies (Grosvold., Stephan, & Hoejmose, 2013).

7. Recommendations

Addressing the bounded rationality and complexity of the problems that organizations have to deal with, implies that the personnel of the organizations adopt a number of reductionist strategies, that is, that allows them to simplify their representation of the situation that presents a problem, trying to include the outstanding information, before trying to model the objective reality. For example, to contribute to a better understanding of the decision-making processes, recent research has reduced the control tasks to its fundamental elements: a stock, an inflow and an outflow, and called for judgments about the relationships between these elements over time (Gonzalez & Pegah, 2017).

Recent efforts present cognitive explanations of failure in decision making, suggesting the importance of human capacity to observe the similarities between experienced patterns of behavior.

Although research on complex and dynamic tasks will continue to inform the limits of human behavior. By studying simple tasks, we can focus on the study of human decisions that depend on the relationships between choices and their effects over time, and thus in the decision process, when repeated decisions are made, it can be observed and obtained feedback on the results.

IMMIGRANTS' ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL INTEGRATION IN HOST COUNTRY- FROM PRECONCEIVED IDEAS TO REAL LIFE. CASE STUDY ON THE ROMANIANS'

Valentina VASILE

Abstract

Reticence towards Romanian migrants is a matter of interest in the analysis of migratory flows in the EU by country of origin. Since Romania's pre-accession to the European Union, among developed countries such as Great Britain, France, Germany, etc., there have been opinions on the fact that Romania's accession also implies increased pressure on the labor market entry in this developed countries . Moreover, even after the 7-year transition period in which some states have set up barriers for Romanian citizens, fears have been maintained that after 2014 new waves of migrants will enter the developed countries of the European Union. Although this estimate was far too exaggerated, and reality has proven through many good practices that Romanian migrants are useful for destination areas - they cover local employment deficits and their work is appreciated - there are still negative, even discriminatory opinions.

The fear of the large number of Romanian migrants who have entered the European Union is materialized also by the fact that they are regarded as "social risk" people with "integration problems". Thus, in recent years public opinion has succeeded to provoc a political backlash (i.e. in France or UK) regarding Romanian migrants. The aim of our research is to analyze the situation of Romanian migrants in the destination countries and to highlight the factors of economic and social discrimination.

Keywords: immigrant, labour market, discrimination, social vulnerability, Romania.

1. Introduction

One of the most debated topics in recent years is about the economic and social impact of immigrants on destination countries. The greatest increase in the migratory flow in recent years has taken place from East to West. The same direction of migration was registered in the case of the Romanians, who chose Western Europe, USA and Canada as destination states. With Romania's accession to the European Union, there has been a growing debate about the impact of Romanian migrants on destination countries. Cultural erosions, threats to national identity, and the notions of "us towards them" are often identified directly or indirectly in the speech of immigrant opponents. Although the economy has acknowledged the beneficial effect of immigrants on the labor market of developed countries with accelerated demographic aging, (IMF 2019; IMF 2018; Kahanec et al. 2017) the socially discriminatory discourse is often fueled by the fear of altering/alienating the traditional socio- cultural pattern. The expansion of these non-economic concerns largely depends, on the one hand, on the natives 'perception of immigrants' expectations and, on the other hand, on the ability of immigrants to socialy integrate. The speech of assimilation versus multiculturalism (The Independent, 2015) gains different accents depending on the country of destination of migrant workers and affects their position on the labor market - in fact favors economic discrimination (Arai et al. 2004) - the quality of jobs, access to some professions, salary levels, career advancement, etc., which often do not strictly relate to their economic performance (productivity and quality of work), but on the contrary. Moreover, they are perceived as a threat to the employability of natives, although often a false problem (natives do not want native jobs or do not meet the selection criteria). For immigrants, social integration also means developing a sense of belonging to the host society. This often implies acceptance and action in accordance with the values and norms of society and, if necessary, the constitution of the social capital deemed necessary by the host country's institutions, because migrant integration is about the stimulation of economic growth (Abdou 2019). The role of indigenous peoples is equally important: social integration is only possible once immigrants are accepted as members of society and treated equally without any discrimination and repercussions.

2. Evolution of Romanian migrants on the labor market of destination countries

Romanians labour migration has been and remains the main option for emigration, but accession to the EU has allowed the development of the temporary migration option, being more and more preferred the multi-year mobility option. Thus, by 2017 the stock of Romanian migrant workers has exceeded 3.6 million people, by 1.5 million more than in 2005 (Chart 1).

Regarding the destination countries, we notice that during the period 2010-2017 the preferences of the Romanians did not register any significant changes (Table 1).

So, Romanian's preferred destinations for work were both in 2010 and in 2017 Italy and Spain. If the stock of Romanian workers in Italy is around 28% of the total Romanian migrants, with an increase in the absolute value of more than 200 thousand in the period 2010-2017, the number of Romanians left in Spain, in the same period it was reduced by more than 150 thousand people and their weight by over 11 percentage points, respectively from 29.26% to only 17.46%. The reduction of the Romanian stock in Italy and Spain can be explained by circulatory migration, the Romanians are moving to countries with more attractive economic opportunities, and by the increasing number of naturalization of Romanians in these states (ANSA 2017).

At the same time, we notice that the largest flow of Romanian migrants is recorded in Germany, about 400 000 from 2010-2017, and their share in total Romanian migrants rises from 4.8% to 14.56%, thus exceeding the traditional destination - Italy.

Another significant increase in the number of Romanian migrants is recorded in the United Kingdom, so that from 2010 to 2017, the number of migrants has increased almost 7 times to 340,000 and represents over 9% of all Romanian migrants.

The increase of the Romanian migrant flows in Great Britain and Germany is due to the fact that these countries have some of the highest wage differentials at the level of the European Union states compared to Romania, although they have supported a selective entry by field of activity, also requesting a certain level and profile of education and specialization.

Thus, the Romanians who chose to migrate to Germany in 2017 were motivated by the possibility of earning a salary 5 times higher than in Romania (Table 2) and the low probability of becoming unemployed, in Germany being one of the lowest rates of unemployment among migrants in the analyzed states. The United Kingdom is also an attractive destination for Romanian migrants as a result of a 6.13-fold wage differential compared to Romania at the level of 2017 and an unemployment rate among migrants of only 6.4%.

An analysis of the pressure of the Romanians on the destination countries' labor market gives us a different point of view (Table 2). Mobility incentives in destinations with a significant share of Romanians are strongly differentiated by language criteria (Hungary, Germany), medium and low qualification level (Italy and Spain) and high level of qualification , Austria, Belgium, etc.).

Although the average salary in Hungary has similar values to Romanian one, the historical and ethnic considerations favor migration to this country. The reasons for the high number of Romanian migrants who choose Hungary as a destination state can be found in language similarities, because in Romania there are many bilingual schools with teaching in Hungarian, access to the Hungarian labor market is much easier. Thus, we observe that over 200 thousand Romanian migrants in Hungary represent almost half of all migrants in this country, but the share in the total employed population is only 4.4%, which indicates the lack of pressure on the labor market.

Italy is the second state after the share of Romanian migrants in total migrants, so the 1 million Romanians account for 17.65% of the total number of foreigners in 2017, with an insignificant decrease of 0.57 percentage points compared to 2010. Thus, Romanian workers exercise the higher labor market pressure in 2017 - 4% - after Hungary. Although there is a large number of Romanian workers in Spain (more than 650 thousand), their share does not exceed 10% of the total of foreigners in 2017 and the labor market pressure is much lower, around 2.7%. Similar pressure is also found in Israel, the country with tradition in accepting Romanian workers - in various indistrial activities and in construction. Although, the number of Romanian migrants in Israel does not exceed 103 thousand people, being over 6 times smaller than in Spain.

In contrast, there are states such as the United States, the United Kingdom or France, where the share of Romanian migrant workers does not exceed 1.25% of total active migrants on the labor market and 0.3% of the total employed population, although the number of Romanian migrants increased in 2017 compared to 2010 in the United Kingdom and France.

There are some factors that influence this mobility:

- the occupation profile is complementary, migrants accepting jobs, denied by natives; however, the reputation of the Romanians in the labor market is good, being appreciated, even preferable to other categories of migrants (in construction are preferred in Israel and Germany; in the medical field (OECD 2015) in Italy and Belgium, where almost 50% and 18% of foreign nurses are Romanian, in France over 16% of foreign doctors are Romanian, and in the United Kingdom there are 2140 Romanian doctors, etc.)
- starting with the pre-accession period and later in the post-accession period when it was liberalized (gradually and / or selectively or even totally in some Member States) the labor market for Romanian workers, there was an increase in the share of those with a high level of education, but not necessarily the quality of employment in the country of destination, which is why the proportion of over-qualified persons has increased. (OECD 2018).
- there is greater availability for employment in marginal jobs on the labor market of destination countries, from "dedicated" jobs to migrants, to common jobs, but for which migrants are preferred to natives, being less paid (construction, transport, etc.).

Mobility for work currently depends more on the opportunities and comparative advantages of employment than on distance (Bunduchi et al. 2019). Digitization has allowed real-time communication and practically eliminated constraints on distance, as well as the development of means of transport and the promotion of flexible forms of employment.

3. Access of the Romanians to the labor market of the member states

With the start of Romania's accession to the European Union, according to the experience of other states that joined in 2004, fears appeared in the developed countries of the Union (EU15) on migratory flows from Romania that would cause tensions on the labor market, both in number and by accepting lower salaries, with effects on the natives - the risk of vacancy and the reduction of the average salary level.

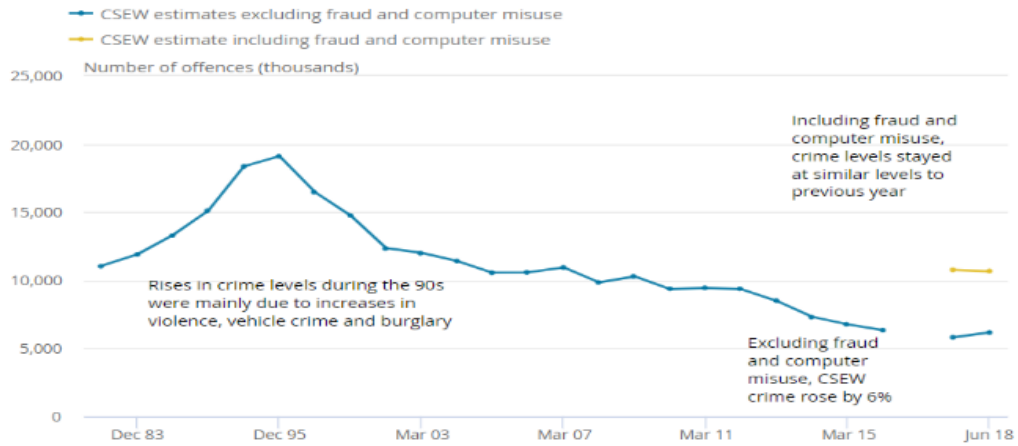
This was the reason why a number of EU Member States have introduced the controlled (monitored and limited) traffic regime within a maximum of 7 years, as required by EU law. Some countries have applied restrictions for shorter periods of time (Denmark, Greece, Portugal, Spain and Hungary have applied a restrictive circulation regime abolished in 2009, but in 2012 Spain has reintroduced restrictions by invoking the increase in unemployment) and others for longer periods (Ireland, Italy and Luxembourg have lifted the restrictions only from the beginning of 2012).

And Germany, the United Kingdom, Austria and France have decided to restrict access to the internal labor market for Romanian migrants for the entire period of up to 7 years, with few exceptions for highly qualified staff.

During this period, the media in the destination countries promoted repeated campaigns against migrants in several countries, such as France, the United Kingdom, etc., in which was promoted a distorted picture of the negative effects of immigrants on the labor market and society in general.

They even mentioned that migrants only aim at accessing social care systems without the intention to work. At the end of this period (January 1, 2014), there were again fears about the "invasion" of the Romanians, but they did not materialize.(Vasile et al. 2013).

Chart 2 Crime rate evolution in UK, 1983-2018



Source: Office for National Statistics, 2019

The same thing happened in the United Kingdom, where the British press and government initiated an entire anti-Romanian immigrant campaign. Knowing the influence it has on citizens, the British press speculated that with the arrival of a wave of both Romanian and Bulgarian immigrants, the crime rate will increase, linking this theory to the year 2004, when 10 eastern states joined the European Union, and with that the number of immigrants in the UK has increased. So in the period 2004-2009 in the British press, there were 691 articles related to the theme of Romanian immigrants (Fox et al. 2012).

Firstly, the media presented in false data and figures, such as the article "Prepare for the Romanians' Invasion" (Daily Express 2006) which announced in 2006 that 450,000 Romanian immigrants are expected to "invade" the Kingdom Unit, although the official statistics show clearly that in 2010 there were 53081 Romanians, and in 2015 they reached 89402 persons (World Bank 2018). At the same time, in addition to the fake number of newspapers, the titles of newspapers on Romanian immigrants contained terms such as invasion, horde or flood, leading to obvious discrimination and encouraging racism.

These journalistic assessments must be analyzed with caution because, in fact, the opening of the labor market to migrant workers in the new Member States, including Romania, has been gradually achieved, being closely monitored. Thus, we have two periods in the analysis of migration in the context of Romania's accession to the European Union:

- the 2004-2006 pre-accession period, in which access to member countries was restricted by bilateral agreements, even in the first years of Romania's transition to a market economy (eg Germany, the United Kingdom, France, Spain, etc.), the period in which migrant movement was monitored through visas and work permits, labor contracts concluded before arriving in the country of destination, well-defined periods of stay, etc.

This selection of Romanian workers for the labor market of the destination countries was in fact associated with the employment policy of the destination countries, the number and professional profile of the migrants accepted being associated with the needs of the local labor market. The presence of the employment shortage not covered by native workers has generated the availability of employment, demanded by the business needs of the country of destination and not based on the wishes and expectations of migrants.

- 2007-2014, the monitoring period for the opening of the labor market and the gradual liberalization of the movement for the Romanian migrants. Bilateral agreements have been promoted with each of the member countries establishing the labor market monitoring process, from free movement in 2007 to limitations for the entire period allowed by EU legislation, ie 7 years. In fact, free movement was still limited in some countries, so we can not talk about uncontrolled migration or invasion. The number of Romanian migrants was managed by the limits established annually by the receiving states.

In the United Kingdom, the increase from 53 000 to 89 000 was achieved at a time when traffic restrictions were well established and the profile of migrants was strictly defined according to the needs of the labor market of the destination country, on the one hand, job completions, unoccupied by natives, on the other hand, jobs with a deficit in employment by natives (illustrative example is the medical field). In Germany, the number of Romanian migrants increased by more than 300,000 in the period 2010-2015, especially as a result of the bilateral agreement on seasonal workers, the number of contracts depended on the needs of the labor market of the two countries. In France, the increase in the number of Romanians in the same period was determined by the needs of the French labor market, the authorities reducing the restrictions on jobs with recruitment difficulties.

In addition to discrimination on the labor market - by limiting labor migration, lower salaries compared to native workers, limitations of career development, quasi-generalized over-qualification, etc., Romanian migrant workers have been subjected to exaggerated social pressures, based on isolated cases promoted exaggeratedly by the media than on the official statistics of the destination countries. Such proof of discrimination was the association of Romanian immigrants with the term "crime". A British press study, which comprised over 4,000 articles published by the 19 most important national newspapers in 2012-2013, conducted by the Migration Observatory (2014) showed that references to Romanians had a strong association with crime, gangs of criminals and the poverty of the country of origin. The language used by tabloid newspapers to describe and discuss Romanians has often been centered on crime and antisocial behavior (gang, criminal, beggar, thief), while the statistical data show no direct link between the increase in the number of immigrants Romans and increasing crime.

Romanians and Bulgarians were considered criminals before the accession, as many of them arrived in the UK through illegal methods. Although a person is illegally in a country, he can not be considered a criminal, just because he used illegal methods to reach that country. Illegal access is generally associated with the existence of an alternative to employment in the informal economy, a way of occupying existing in all countries of the world, albeit in very different proportions and shapes. Thus, the press did not emphasize the concrete illegal facts made by the Romanian immigrants, but only presented them as criminals (Carnegie Europe 2014). However, according to official data(Office for National Statistics 2019) of the British authorities, since 2002 and so far, crime rates in the UK have a declining trend, and no significant increases have been recorded either as a result of the accession of the 2004 member states or after the accession of Romania and Bulgaria (Chart 2).

In a Daily Mail (2013) article it is mentioned that for every 1,000 Romanians in London, 183 are arrested. Due to the fact that the number of arrested Romanians does not exceed 700 persons (Table 3), it is assumed that the total number of Romanian migrants does not exceed 3800 persons, while there are actually 103 421 persons. It is useless to mention that "arrested" is different from "convicted" or "defendant" and in many cases the same person has been arrested several times. It went so far that a simple ID check could become an "arrest" if the person is invited to the police station and registered in the database (MAE 2013). Thus, we notice that the number of those sentenced to imprisonment is lower than that of persons arrested. The share of Romanians convicted in total convictions is below 1% which proves once again that the data presented by the press only had the role of denigrating and discriminating against the Romanian migrants, without any statistical arguments regarding the higher criminality of the Romanians compared to other migrants.

Although official statistics show real data, the British press showed exorbitant figures that Romanians are responsible for 92% of the 2012 ATM frauds (The Daily Express, 2013)

Table 3. Situation of arrests among Romanian migrants in the period 2012-2018, persons

Even if organized crime is a global business and the British press indicates that gangs in Romania are involved in such frauds, official police data shows us a totally distinct situation, namely that of the total of 6,511 ATM frauds, only 5.8% were carried out by Romanian immigrants, and not 92%, as the representatives of the media presented.

The fear of the British, fed by the press, that the increase in the number of Romanian migrants will lead to an increase in the crime rate was a false one. The Romanian anti-immigrant campaign was a denigrating, discriminatory and false-based campaign that does not correspond to the official data of the authorities. Such discriminatory actions against Romanian migrants are not singular in the United Kingdom, in other member states have also appeared, but statistical evidence has not proved the validity of the scale and impact. Such actions are often associated with political discourse during electoral campaigns (BalkanInsight 2018; ENAR 2016; Open Democracy 2013).

Statistical data officially registered in the EU states shows another image, but the discrimination promoted by different sources brings major damage not only to those targeted - migrants - but also to natives in those countries. The fact is that the labor force moves according to the demand of the labor market, and the competition for employment is a natural phenomenon of the competitive economy. Discrimination promoted on the labor market and in the social environment generally only adjusts the efficiency of human resource allocation, with direct effects on business profitability, reduced demand on the consumer goods and services market, and finally adjusts the welfare of all.

Conclusions

Mobility for work is a phenomenon of the current society and the trend is to increase labor force circulation as a form of ensuring the efficient allocation of production factors. In addition, developed countries experiencing an aging population aging require external resources - migrants - to cover the labor market shortage and as a source of functioning of insurance and social security systems. Paying pensions on the PAYG system requires state budget sources from labor-related taxation. In addition, special services are developed for third-age people, as do many other digitization professions.

Ensuring the labor market with the necessary workforce to create an appropriate offer for demand is a perennial need which, under the current conditions, is particularly regulated by the opening of the labor market for migrants because the demographic increase of the native population does not cover the employment deficits. In addition, migrant workers are generally young people whose children are born, raised, live and then work on the destination labor market, helping to improve the demographic deficit.

Although with profound unfavorable effects for less developed countries of origin, labour migration towards more developed countries is a phenomenon with historical roots and deep social motivation.

Since 1990, the number of Romanian migrants has been on the rise, with market globalization and promoting the free movement of labor across the EU. Mobility for work from less developed countries to the most developed is and will be primarily complementarity and not just marginal to substitution. The business environment, through employers, is the one that supports mobility through demand for work, according to the principle of optimal allocation of factors of production. In the first years after accession, the main European destination countries were Italy and Spain, adding Germany and the UK. The increase in the number of Romanians in Germany and the United Kingdom after 2007-2014 can be explained by the restrictions imposed by the authorities of the two states, which were in force until 2014, to manage the inflows of persons with a well-defined migrant profile depending on the needs of the labor market, from the perspective of the profession and the level of qualification.

If we are to take into account the tendency of relocation of productive activities in developed countries in recent years (see US policy and others), it is expected that migrant workers' flows will increase, both in the form of spatial mobility and teleworking activities. Therefore, the labor market of the developed countries will be increasingly dependent on the migrant labor force, as an economic factor supporting profitability and, indirectly, fueling fiscal revenues from taxes.

Regulating the labor market and industrial relations is the responsibility of the states, but according to universally accepted moral rules this can not be achieved under conditions of economic and social discrimination. The business environment is continuously developing and outperforming the episodic and / or periodic interests of political discourse, predominantly in its electoral stages. Examples such as that in the United Kingdom or France over Romanian migrant workers are not singular but must be treated with social responsibility because adverse effects are much more difficult to manage. The workforce, respectively human capital, requires significant public and private costs associated with education and training, requires time and the business environment is the main designer of its spatial and professional distribution through the demand of the labor market.

THE RECYCLING BEHAVIOR OF ROMANIAN CONSUMERS

Mirela-Cristina VOICU

Abstract

For any of us, protecting the environment should no longer be an optional activity, taking into account the negative effects of the environmental degradation that is becoming increasingly acute these days. Yet a positive attitude toward protecting the environment is still lacking for many of us, not to mention the lack of positive behavior in this direction. As the field of environmental protection requires a multidisciplinary approach, the marketing also contributes to the achievement of sustainable economic development in our country, especially through the researches carried out on consumers ecological behavior. Both the business environment and public organizations require reliable information about the determinants of consumers' environmental behavior. One aspect of this ecological behavior is the recycling behavior. Given that the need to meet the European recycling standards is becoming increasingly stringent, it is also necessary to know all the factors that can determine an appropriate environmental behavior. In this context, the following paper reveals some important aspects regarding the current situation of the recycling activity in Romania together with the characteristics of the recycling behavior of Romanians that require a specific marketing activity conducted in this field.

Keywords: green marketing, consumer environmental behavior, recycling, circular economy, sustainable marketing

1. Introduction

It's been quite a while since the environmental issues have been put on the table, and yet they are far from being resolved. Moreover, experts in the field warn us every year about the continuous degradation of the environment. The volume of solid waste has increased, while the number of areas where we can store it is getting smaller, toxic waste has contaminated the soil and water, gas emissions are increasingly diminishing the ozone layer, plastic finds itself already in the most protected areas of the Earth[1] and in our intestines for some time[2]. It is quite clear that, despite the increasing number of those who support the environmental protection movement, more and more consumers must be persuaded to think about the consequences of their consumption decisions.

Recycling is one of the solutions that contribute to improving the quality of the environment or at least slowing down the degradation process. The recycling industry is basically about taking over used materials, such as plastic or glass containers, and converting them into new materials, thus saving them from the landfill. The idea behind recycling is to reduce energy costs, reduce air and water pollution, and encourage the use of "clean" raw materials.

What is actually happening in this area shows that the solution to the recycling problem requires an interdisciplinary scientific approach. Under these circumstances, marketing plays an important role given that the key element that determines the success of recycling programs is the consumers participation. On the other hand, given the situation in which Romania is currently in, placing at the bottom of the ranking regarding the recycling activity, it is necessary, among other things, to know the determinants of the Romanian recycling behavior as well as the characteristics of the marketing activity leading to changing behavior in the desired direction.

2. Recycling in Romania

Before analyzing the recycling phenomenon in Romania, it is advisable to understand the importance of this activity. Thus, recycling can be defined as the process through which products or other materials are recovered or diverted from the waste stream for use as raw materials in the manufacture of new products[3]. Recovering materials reduces the need to re-produce those materials, which leads to the conservation of vital resources. For example, collecting approximately 1kg of used garments means saving roughly 3.6 kg of carbon emissions and 5,678 liters of water[4], or collecting one liter of waste oil saves one million liters of water[5].

The recycling industry takes on materials such as glass, paper, metal, plastic, textiles and electronics. Food and garden waste can be transformed into compost, and then used as fertilizer, thus giving them back to the soil and helping to protect the environment. By recycling, the quality of the environment improves and becomes stable.

Unfortunately, Romania is still at an early stage when it comes to consumer behavior oriented towards recycling or the consumption of recycled materials. According to the European Commission report, in 2016 Romania had very low recycling and composting levels, i.e. 16%, compared to the European average of 44%, as well as high rates of waste storage. By comparison, Germany recovers 65% of recycled material annually, the rest of the waste being incinerated for energy production. Even Croatia, which joined the European Union in 2013, does five times better than Romania in this respect, according to the European Environment Agency[6].

Practically, Romania is everyday wasting a significant amount of reusable materials, taking into account that, according to Elena Gaşpar-Ion, the representative of the Environ Association (an organization that created the EcoRampa in Bucharest, the first selective waste collection center with 10 different streams), household waste contains about 16% -20% paper/cardboard, 5% aluminum/metal, 5% glass, 10% -15% plastics, 15% other materials, and only 39% biodegradable debris[7].

On the other hand, according to European directives, Romania has to achieve a number of recycling targets by 2020: a minimum of 50% rate of reuse and recycling of the total mass of waste (paper, metal, plastic and glass) at least 70% level of preparation for re-use, recycling and other material recovery operations of at least 70% of the mass of non-hazardous waste resulting from construction and demolition activities, 60% recycling of packaging waste from the total packaging placed on the national market. Also, our country will have to reach an annual amount of 4 kg per inhabitant of collected electronic waste and to collect bio-waste separately for composting and fermenting[8]. Yet Romania was in 2018 the only European Union country that had not yet adopted waste prevention programs, since the new European laws adopted on 22 May 2018 included the obligation to monitor waste prevention measures and to report how the waste was reused[9].

Even worse, the Environment Ministry warned that Romania is liable to pay a fine of 124,000 euros per day since 2018 due to the failure of the authorities to close non-compliant municipal landfills. Also, Romania is liable for infringement for failure to comply with the requirement to collect and recover at least 50% of waste, with a minimum fine of 200,000 euro day[10], given that in 2018 this figure was 5%[11].

One of the biggest obstacles to achieving these goals, along with the disinterest of state bodies, is the lack of public interest in environmental protection.

3. Consumer recycling behavior

Recycling involves a behavior that is different from most consumer behaviors. In this case, consumers do not show an immediate interest for recycling and the benefits of this activity are not immediate, but accumulate over time in society, while the costs of time and effort are immediate.

In terms of recycling behavior, individuals can fall into the following categories[12]:

- Non-recyclers who do not believe in recycling and its benefits and act in accordance with this belief;
- Not-assumed recyclers are people who recycle but do not strongly believe in this activity;
- Recyclers who believe in recycling and its benefits and act according to this belief;
- Involuntary non-recyclers represent a segment of consumers who believe in the principles of recycling but do not recycle, often due to the absence of recycling facilities or misperceptions about the lack of facilities.

Whilst the motive for most recyclers is based on the belief that recycling is environmentally beneficial, the quantification of the positive impact of recycling is not enough to convince a number of consumers that recycling does have an impact and that it is a behavior to be adopted. Aside from the fact that consumers usually associate sustainable behaviors (such as recycling) with a series of costs (money, time, effort and inconvenience), for many consumers there is a fragmentation between individual recycling behavior and its positive impact on the environment that cannot be measured in the short term, which leads to poor consumer feedback. Given that consumer actions have no consequences that can be noticed, they will not be motivated to continue to conduct themselves in that manner. For example, one of the beneficial effects of recycling that consumers cannot see is the reduction in greenhouse gases which they perceive as harmful. Thus, the lack of feedback on the impact of recycling perpetuates consumer inactivity[13]. Although consumers have a theoretical understanding of the benefits of recycling, these benefits do not have a tangible impact on everyday life, so good intentions do not translate into good recycling behavior.

Studies in this field have shown that recycling is a decision on which consumers do not spend too much time thinking, and habit and inertia block the change[14]. Also, consumers' attitude towards recycling is the determining factor of consumer recycling behavior, the attitude being influenced, first of all by the opportunities, facilities and knowledge regarding recycling, secondly by the obstacles involved in the actual process of recycling (time, space and inconvenience)[15]. Under these circumstances, efforts to stimulate recycling should focus primarily on making it a convenient process, visible for others and having personal rewards.

4. Objectives of the marketing activity regarding recycling

The marketing specific to recycling can be considered to be analogue to consumer goods marketing, just that the purpose involves the formulation of a rather delicate proposal consisting in encouraging voluntary behavior encumbered by tangible costs and less tangible future benefits.

Marketing activity in the field of recycling collection programs targets mainly the following specific objectives:

- Increasing the recycling rate. The recycling rate is the share of collected recycled materials in relation to the total generated waste;
- Increasing the quantity of recyclable materials;
- Increasing the number of consumers who recycle or the participation rate (the percentage of people recycling in the total potential recyclers).

In addition, it is well-known that as the various recyclable materials are more mixed, the recycling process gets more complicated, more costly and the risk of contamination increases. The recycling becomes costly and inefficient. The problem underlying the inefficient recycling is the way to recycle, the way individuals take into account the specifications listed on collection bins available on the street, in schools and office buildings. Most times, people don't know what can and cannot be introduced into these containers either because of the lack of education in this area or because of the faulty way in which the collection containers are labeled (for example, the "plastic" label may lead us to mistakenly consider polystyrene as recyclable material). Under these circumstances, one of the marketing objectives in this field is to obtain a less contaminated collection from the consumer by increasing the level of their involvement, raising awareness and standardizing the labeling of collection containers. In other words, one of the marketing objectives regarding recycling is to persuade the population to hold different types of waste in the household, to collect them in a certain period of time, and to dispose of them separated into categories.

5. To do's in marketing regarding consumer recycling behavior

Any attempt to implement or improve recycling systems and / or recycling behavior should take into account the following three issues[16]:

- a well-designed recycling infrastructure;
- specific recycling knowledge;
- a general understanding of environmental issues.

A high recycling rate should be achievable given that consumer motivation is high enough and the conditions for achieving this task are simple.

Taking into account the characteristics of the recycling behavior presented in the previous section, the paths to be followed and the strategies to be implemented to achieve the recycling marketing objectives are outlined on the following coordinates:

- Identifying the target of the recycling promotional activity. Only by clearly identifying the consumer segment we want to persuade to recycle we can develop a good marketing strategy in this area. Thus, the segment may be represented by producers, traders or individuals, each segment determining the selection of a different strategy.

Social marketing strategies in this area may target a particular territorial area, a neighborhood or multiple neighborhoods of a city being integrated into a recycling program, a single apartment block or a whole apartment complex, a school or more, a collection point or more, a specific collection activity (for example, the collection of home appliances or household oil), a single shopping complex or a whole chain of stores.

Depending on the target segment, the communication and motivation of consumers will also be adapted. In this context, a distinction will be made between those segments with a more individualistic orientation than those with a collectivist orientation[17].

In addition, in organizing and carrying out marketing activities in this area, it is imperative that in the target audience investigation process, to properly understand which barriers/obstacles the consumers perceive in adopting the recycling behavior[18].

- Educating the public. Unfortunately we can't state about the Romanian consumers that they are an educated public when it comes to recycling. We have not yet reached a culture of recycling. Thus, most of the efforts of those interested in this field must be directed towards education, bearing in mind that before attempting to change consumers' behavior regarding recycling, it is important to provide people with a strong reason that explains the programs focused in this direction. A rational justification for the recycling incentive program will increase the likelihood of developing an intrinsic justification for the desired behavior and the continuation of that behavior even in the absence of extrinsic reasons (such as rewards and punishments). The public should be informed about the benefits of implementing a recycling program at home, at work and in public spaces: reuse of materials that would otherwise reach the landfill, protect the environment from pollution by non-breakdown materials, etc. In addition to programs to build a positive attitude towards recycling, public education should also be done through individual programs focused on certain categories of waste (batteries, electronics, waste oil, clothing, etc.).

On the other hand, with regard to the organization and implementation of educational programs, research has shown that education aimed at changing consumer behavior is much more effective on small groups than large groups and should include interactive demonstrations and discussions rather than lectures or watching films by a passive audience, following the principle: "Tell them and they will forget - Demonstrate and they will remember - Involve them and they will understand"[19]. In this context, we shouldn't overlook the fact that public education programs on recycling should focus not only on the education component, but also on motivation. We must not lose sight of the fact that relying solely on information to change behavior is not enough. Changes in consumer behavior are difficult to achieve, including when the new behavior has considerable advantages over the old one. In order to determine changes in the behavior of Romanian consumers in terms of recycling, it is necessary to focus the education activity towards direct experimentation of what recycling means, an approach that will have a much stronger influence on behavior than indirect experiences (learning only theoretically!). For a lasting change in consumers' recycling behavior, the creation of attitudes through direct experience must be determined.

It is advisable to organize and carry out education campaigns especially during the launch of a recycling program or in the event of changes to certain existing programs.

- Using the Internet. It goes without saying that today, those that don't turn to the online for promotion, don't exist. Thus, for an interested organization, it is important to promote the idea of recycling on its website, including the hours and days of waste collection or the location of the containers it provides for collection, as well as information on the types of materials the organization is interested in collecting and the tariff offered for each material (taking the example of „Uleiosul", „Sigurec" etc.).
- Creating news. Press releases, providing advice and information on the importance of recycling, information on innovative technology in the industry, and how waste is transformed into other products complement consumer education campaigns. In addition, given that the lack of feedback on the impact of recycling perpetuates consumer inactivity, providing data on what has been achieved through macro-level (national, regional) recycling can significantly contribute to remove feelings of individual helplessness and inefficiency which accompany the recycling behavior.[20]
- Carrying out social campaigns aimed at raising awareness and sensitize the population. It has been proved that the use of emotional messages in social campaigns has most often influenced the consumer's intention to recycle[21].

Usually, traditional social marketing campaigns emphasize the low level of participation of the target segment in the recycling process. This type of campaign sometimes induces feelings of aversion against the promoted request as well as feelings of guilt and resentment, considering that not everyone is delighted to be told what to do. Traditional campaigns tell the public that it has a similar behavior to everyone else (in the sense that the best environmental decisions are not adopted), which has been shown to reinforce unwanted behavior. In this context, in social marketing campaigns, the emphasis should be placed on the environmental behavior that consumers have already adopted, a situation that can lead to an improvement in their attitude towards recycling[22], and can raise public awareness regarding the campaign's request to adopt an additional pro-ecological behavior, such as recycling. Placing the emphasis on the ecological behavior adopted by individuals in the past will cause the target consumers to repeat that behavior in the future. Studies in this field have shown that individuals who perceive themselves as ecological consumers are motivated to act in the direction of this perception.

Another aspect to be considered in organizing campaigns in this area is the need to provide multiple and explicit examples of positive environmental changes as a cumulative result of recycling behavior to alleviate the perceived uselessness that accompanies recycling[23].

In this context the use of creative visualizations in waste collection locations (on the street, inside institutions, restaurants, etc.) should not be ignored, as they have the power to trigger an immediate emotional response from consumers. These visualizations can evoke positive emotions of joy and delight, causing consumer's greater responsiveness to recycling and increased willingness to adopt this behavior.

In addition, from the research on ecological marketing, we can conclude that associating recycling behavior with a positively assessed social identity in campaigns to stimulate recycling is much more effective. In other words, the recycling activity would be particularly stimulated if it were to associate this behavior with a prestigious image at the same time as associating an "outdated" identity to the anti-ecological behavior[24]. An additional boost may come from using social norms in pro-recycling campaigns, those unwritten rules about how to behave, given that we all want to integrate into the society we live in.

- Creating a well structured and convenient collection system where consumers can participate as easily as possible. People will recycle when the necessary infrastructure is provided. As long as the services in this area remain at the same low level of development, a pro-recycling behavior cannot develop. In Romania, things have begun to catch a minimal momentum in this area, a statement based on some examples. First example is the infrastructure developed by Sigurec, coupled with convenient location near the major commercial areas with a positive impact on waste reduction and increased recycling. For now, hypermarkets are one of the most convenient solutions for recycling. The most important hypermarkets in Romania (Cora, Carrefour or Auchan) have installed in most of their locations, systems that collect PETs, aluminum and glass recipients as well as other types of waste, such as electronics and home appliances.

It is particularly important to create and place recycling facilities as close as possible to those who are expected to recycle. In order to create a convenient recycling system for consumers, the following aspects should be considered:

- the distance consumers are willing to travel to the collection point;
- number of collection points;
- placing collection points in convenient locations for consumers (such as commercial premises);
- visibility of collection points;
- the variety of waste collected. The more diverse the types of waste collected, the more convenient the recycling system is for the consumer.

- Introducing the „pay as you throw" system a situation where consumers pay in proportion to the amount of waste dumped. People would be encouraged to reduce the amount of waste generated and pay a lower bill for waste collection.
- Using incentives, whether of financial nature, such as those currently used, in the form of coupons offered for recycling PETs, paying with PETs for services (such as in Indonesia with transport services), the „Rabla" program for used cars, discounts for old appliances, old clothing and shoes, etc. when buying new ones, promotional contests (such as the competition organized by Kaufland Romania in partnership with the ViitorPlus Association for the "Recicleta" program to increase the paper recycling rate for a number of 300 apartment buildings in sector

2 of Bucharest[25]), or incentives of a moral nature. However, we must be aware that the use of financial incentives (or, on the contrary, the use of punishments) only motivates the consumer to obtain the reward (respectively to avoid punishment) rather than promoting a pro-environment behavior, so that with the elimination of the incentive system, the pro-recycling behavior is also stopped. In this context, we reiterate the idea that consumers need a positive feedback to reward their altruistic impulses such as communications on the benefits to the community and the environment as a result of their recycling activity in order to change the behavior on the long term.

5. Conclusions

For recycling to become an efficient and effective waste treatment method, it is necessary to achieve a high, usual and regular level of participation in the separation, storage and collection of household waste and this can only be achieved by changing the attitudes of Romanian consumers, a goal much more difficult to achieve given that attitudes change much harder and through a long-term process. Success in achieving this depends significantly on the extent to which this behavior will be considered normal.

Changing the behavior of Romanian consumers with regard to recycling is a challenge of great importance for the development of a circular economy. Manufacturers and retailers have the power to make this change, and many of them have already proceeded in reaching this goal. Governmental and non-profit organizations as well as local authorities should incorporate creative campaigns aimed at creating environmental attitudes, social responsibility, and consumer perception of the power they have over policymakers and policy into recycling strategies.

Approaches to achieving a change in the Romanians' recycling behavior can take the form of intervention through education to change attitudes and to increase consumer knowledge, either a religious and moral approach that employs a sum of values aimed at changing general beliefs and opinions, either in the form of effort focused on behavior that is sensitive to material incentives and, last but not least, an approach through community management, involving the establishment of common rules and expectations. By far, the most effective programs for changing consumer behavior regarding recycling involve combining the four types of intervention[26].

FOREIGN UNIVERSITIES IN QATAR: A CRITICAL REVIEW OF POLICY AND SUSTAINABILITY ISSUES

Fethi B Jomaa AHMED

Abstract

Qatar is transitioning toward knowledge society and aims at becoming a hub for international education. The Permanent Constitution and the Nation Vision 2030 of Qatar explicitly refer to the role of government in promoting sound education as making it the prime driver of human, social and economic development. The government has invested 3.5% of its GDP in education. Since 1998, Qatar has succeeded in contracting 11 International foreign universities to open branches in Qatar. These International Branch Campuses (IBCs) include Texas A&M University, Weill Cornell Medical College, Georgetown University, University College London and University of Calgary. The IBCs offer a range of specializations and degree programs such as medicine, engineering, foreign affairs, journalism, and tourism. Qatar spends more than US$400 million annually on the six US branch campuses only excluding construction expenses. Hence, this study attempts to examine Qatar's policy on the IBCs and investigate its sustainability. The author focuses on discussing critical policy issues including English as language of instruction, mixed-gender education, and the 'glocalization' of the IBCs. Moreover, he addresses sustainability issues related to the IBCs such as the political will, diversification of the economy, and the contribution of the IBCs to Qatar's society. Ultimately, the author is enthusiastic that this library-based, theoretical and critical study would provoke more scholarly debates on Qatar's unique model of hosting foreign universities campuses.

Introduction

Despite its small geographical and population size, Qatar has emerged as a country renowned for its remarkable achievements in education, human development, business, media and politics. A few decades ago, the social, political and economic institutions of the State of Qatar were traditional and conservative. The country's economy was solely dependent on hydrocarbon resources and the government almost funds all projects from oil and gas revenues. However, a huge transition has taken place since the ratification of the Permanent Constitution in 2004 and the approval of the Vision 2030 in 2008. These two documents explicitly refer to the role of government in promoting sound education and making it the prime driver of human, social and economic development. Qatar is now transitioning toward knowledge society and aims at becoming a hub for international education, media, culture and business. Hence, the government has invested significant resources in education and is now earmarking 3.5% of its GDP to it. Since 1998, Qatar has worked on inviting prominent global higher education institutions from USA, Canada, UK, France and the Netherlands to open branches in Qatar. There are 11 International Branch Campuses currently operating in Qatar including Texas A&M University, Weill Cornell Medicine, Georgetown University, University College London and the University of Calgary. These IBCs offer a range of specializations and degree programs such as medicine, engineering, foreign affairs, journalism, and tourism. Qatar spends more than $400 million annually on these IBCs excluding construction expenses. A cursory review of the literature would suggest that there is lack of material on studying the status-quo and future of these IBCs in Qatar. Therefore, it is important to examine Qatar's pressing policy and sustainability issues regarding the IBCs. The discussion focuses on three major policy issues and three sustainability issues. The critical policy issues include English as language of instruction, mixed-gender education, and the 'glocalization' of the IBCs. The three core sustainability topics include the political will, the diversification of the economy, and the contribution of the IBCs to the socio-economic wellbeing of Qatar' present and future generations.

Reflecting on these issues, the author explains how the political will is in favor of the IBCs existence and future, analyze Qatar's endeavors to diversify the economy in order to secure the endurance of adequate funds for the IBCs to continue operating in Qatar. The author elucidates the contributions of the IBCs to the current and future job market in terms of feeding it with highly skilled workforce and leaders, and to the general advancement of the Qatari economy and society. This relates essentially to the raison-d'etre of the IBCs in Qatar and their sustainability.

This library-based study is both descriptive and analytical, theoretical and critical study. It also applies some normative perspectives because the author uses the participant observation method to incorporate some insights from his work experience as he worked for more than five years with Hamad Bin Khalifa University, which is a member of Qatar Foundation that hosts most of the IBCs. The author has also participated, attended several events organized by these IBCs, and maintains good relations with their academic staff and students in Qatar. The significance of this study stems from the fact that it is relatively comprehensive in terms of the scale of topics covered; up-to-date in terms of data; and original in terms of referring to primary sources and references. It begins by providing an overview on Qatar history, geography, socio-political and economic setup. Then, it explains the education system and its key institutions including Qatar University, Qatar Foundation and the IBCs. The body of analysis provides a critical discussion of three major policy as well as three sustainability issues. The author concludes by highlighting the findings of this study including that the policy and sustainability issues are resolvable as far as the Qatari leaders, policy and decision makers are committed to the cause of IBCs and their positive role in the society and the government endeavors to diversify the economy and sustain the IBCs in many ways. This study deems successful, if it provokes more scholarly debates on Qatar's unique model of hosting foreign university branches.

1. Country Profile

Qatar is a relatively small peninsula located on the coast of the Arabian Gulf with a total area of approximately 11,627 sq. km. It shares a land border with the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia to the South and a maritime border with Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates and Iran. Qatar's capital city Doha, has emerged as a center for education, culture, media, and business. (Hukoomi n.d.; Al-Sharqawi 2013, 189)

Qatar is inhabited since 4000BC however the origin of the country's name is uncertain, but according to some references it dates back at least 2,000 years since the term "Catharrei" was used to describe the inhabitants of the peninsula by Pliny the Elder (1st century AD), and a "Catara" peninsula is depicted on a map by Ptolemy (2nd century AD). The Ottomans ruled Qatar for four consecutive centuries until 1915. Then, the country became a British protectorate from November 3, 1916 until it gained independence on September 3, 197. The Al-Thani family has been prominent in Qatar society and ruled the country since 1868 AD. (Al-Sharqawi 2013, 196-198; Hamdan 2012, 111-113; Central Intelligence Agency n.d.)

Among prominent leaders of the State of Qatar Sheikh Khalifa bin Hamad Al-Thani ruled the country from 1972 to 1995. Some observers viewed him as the real founder of the State of Qatar for amending the Provisional Constitution, forming the first Council of Ministers, establishing the different government structures such as the Ministries, Shura (consultative) council, and the Audit Bureau. The Father Emir, HH Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa Al-Thani ruled Qatar from 1995 to 2013. He is regarded as the father founder of modern Qatar for the reform and changes he introduced in almost all aspects of the Qataris life particularly education, socio-economic, political, and media. HH Sheikh Hamad peacefully abdicated on June 25, 2013, and transferred power to his son, the current Emir HH Sheikh Tamim bin Hamad Al-Thani who became the ninth Emir since the beginning of the rule of Al-Thani. (Hamdan 2012, 111-126, 155; Weber 2014, 63)

Qatar society traditionally consists of nomadic Bedouin tribes, also Indian and Iranian trading families clustered in villages of Doha, Al-Wakra, Al-khor and Al-Zubara. Traditional Qataris dependent on pearl diving, fishing, farming, hunting, camel breeding, and trade. Their social and cultural values such as tolerance and generosity are rooted in the Islamic tradition. They are family-oriented people; consanguinity and arranged marriages are widely practiced; segregation of men and women in education and workplaces is enforced; and respect of kinship ties and the elderly is widely observed.

As of 31 March 2019, the total population of Qatar is about 2,76 million with a gender distribution of over 2 million males and about 0.7 million females. However, based on the latest United Nations estimates, as of April 15, 2019 Qatar's population is equivalent to 0.04% of the total world population making the country number 142 in the list of countries by population. The total population includes some 11.6% Qatari and 88.4% non-Qatari, whom are mainly male immigrant workers arriving in Qatar on work visas without their families. Population growth rate estimated at 2.27%. Qatar is a young society with the median age of population is 31.4 years - more than 25% are under 25 years old; over 70% are under 55 years old; only 1% are over 65 years; and life expectancy is 78.9 years. Over 99% of the population lives in Doha city and the suburbs on the eastern side of the peninsula with a considerable community clustered in Dukhan and Al-Khor villages. Arabic is the official language in Qatar, with English commonly used as the second language. Islam is the official religion of the State of Qatar and Islamic Law (Sharia) is the principal source of legislation. Qataris are generally conservative Sunni Muslims but there are other religious groups living in Qatar namely Christian, Hindu and Buddhist. (Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics n.d.; Central Intelligence Agency n.d.; Worldometers n.d.)

Qatar is one of the world's most dynamic and fastest growing economies. In the second quarter on 2018, its GDP stood at approximately US$47 billion. With its US$124,900 GDP per capita in 2017, Qatar ranks the wealthiest nation in the world. According to the official figures, the real GDP growth stood at 1.6% in 2017 and the IMF projects an overall 2.7% GDP growth for 2018. Qatar started exporting oil in 1949, and oil and gas revenues have huge positive impacts on the society particularly the living standards and welfare of Qataris. During 2017, the non-hydrocarbon and oil and gas sectors were the main drivers of GDP growth with a share of 67.3% or and 32.7% respectively. Revenue from oil and gas in 2017 stood at US$36.35 billion and represented the main source of public revenue with a share of 88.7%. Qatar's vigorous economy has enabled the country to boost its investments in general infrastructural development and mega projects in line with the Qatar National Vision 2030. A few examples include US$45 billion for Lusail City, US$25 billion for Doha Rail, $11 billion for Doha International Airport, and US$5.5 billion for new Doha Port. Backing Qatar's booming economy and society is the Qatar Sovereign Wealth Fund (SWF), which currently stands at US$335 billion. (Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics n.d.; Qatar Central Bank 2017; IMF n.d.; Weber 2014, 64) Public spending has witnessed an increase in the pace of economic development to achieve the Qatar National Vision 2030. With this in mind, Qatar has earmarked 3.5% of its GDP for public spending on education. The youth literacy rate is above 98% of the total population and unemployment is 0.3%. (Hukoomi n.d.; Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics n.d.; Al-Sharqawi 2013, 189; World Economic Forum n.d.; Central Intelligence Agency n.d.)

2. The Education System

2.1. Historical development

Traditional education in Qatar before the 1950s was based on few schools and informal classes (kuttab) offering religious, Qur'an reading and reciting, and Arabic language lessons. Traditionally trained teachers usually conduct these classes at mosques or at home. However, some families have sent their children to pursue their traditional studies abroad mainly in Egypt and Lebanon. Qatar's modern education system has only been formalized in 1951 with the establishment of the Ministry of Ma'arif (education) by which the state has replaced the within-family education and became directly responsible and involved in supervising and developing education from all angles, in addition to allocating substantial budgets. The education system is guided by three principles; (1) protecting the heritage of the Muslim nation, (2) preserving the Arab-Islamic identity of the people, and (3) developing the education system and curricula through benefiting from the modern era achievements in technology and educational methods and techniques. The government built modern public schools and relevant infrastructures in the 1950s and 1960s. For instance, the first school for boys established in the school year 1952-1953, the first school for girls established in the academic year 1954-1955, adult and illiteracy education began in 1954. The first secondary school for boys began operating in 1961 and the first secondary school for girls started operating in 1965. The tertiary education system began with the establishment of the College of Education in 1973 with a vision to place education as a priority in the country's expansion. In its first year, the College enrolled 57 male and 93 female students. The primary, secondary and vocational education has remarkably expanded throughout the years because of rapid demographic growth and the government support and spending on education infrastructure, employees and development. For instance, the government covers costs of schooling in public schools and provides textbooks, stationary, health services, electricity and water free of charge. The Supreme Education Council (SEC) founded in 2002 and the Emir of the State himself oversees it. SEC is the highest educational authority responsible for the education policy, planning, development and enforcement. It includes three executive departments that are the department of education, the department of evaluation, and the department of higher education. (Hamdan 2012, 199-207; Al-Sharqawi 2013, 203-206; Powell 2014, 258-259) In the quality of education systems' ranking "Qatar is the highest among the GCC countries." (Tripathi and Mukerji 2008, 157)

2.2. Qatar University (QU)

After the establishment of the Ministry of Education in 1951 and due to the country's rapid development and need to provide additional areas of specialization, Qatar University was founded in 1977 as the national institution of higher education in Qatar. The university currently offers a wide range of academic programs including five PhD programs, 20 Masters, 45 Bachelors, three Diplomas, in addition to 13 PhD and seven Maters programs that are available in 2019. The university is also the home of more than 15 research centers. QU currently boasts a population of over 20,000 students, and an alumni body of over 43,000. It also employs over 2,000 local and international highly experienced teaching and research faculty. Since 2003, the University embarked on an ambitious strategic reform plans to increase the efficiency of its administrative and academic processes, promote quality education and research, and effective services to meet the needs of the public. Qatar University has recently launched its five-year strategy (2018-2022) 'From Reform to Transformation'. This strategy is in line with Qatar National Vision 2030 and seeks to promote excellence in four key areas; education, research, institution, and engagement with a view of occupying an outstanding position in the map of excellent education providers at the international and regional levels. (Qatar University n.d.; Hamdan 2012, 207) Qatar University seeks to "promote the cultural and scientific development of the Qatari society while preserving its Arabic characteristics and maintaining its Islamic cultural heritage." (Powell 2014, 267) It strives to make an impact on a global scale and to this end Times Higher Education (THE) ranked Qatar University 401-500$^{th}$ in the World University Ranking and 3$^{rd}$ in Arab World Ranking. QU ranked seventh in QS Arab Region Universities Ranking (Qatar University n.d.). In 2017, Qatar University registered three patents within the top Patent Cooperation Treaty. (WIPO n.d.)

2.3. Qatar Foundation for Education, Science and Community Development (QF)

His Highness Sheikh Hamad Bin Khalifa Al-Thani, the Father Emir, and his wife Her Highness Sheikha Moza bint Nasser founded QF in August 1995. The Sidra tree (Ziziphus spina-christi) in the logo of QF symbolizes the essence of the vision and mission of the organization. It is a native tree, which grows in the wild and flourishes in the harsh and arid climate. Its deep roots regarded as a strong anchor, connecting contemporary learning and growth with the country's culture and heritage. Poets, scholars and travelers would traditionally gather in the shade of the Sidra's spreading branches to meet and talk. This aspect of the Sidra's role is reflected in QF's commitment to education and community development as well as being a naturally healthy and comfortable place at which to gather and exchange knowledge and opinions. The Sidra's fruit, flowers and leaves provide the ingredients for many traditional medicines, which reflects QF's science and research objectives. The branches of Sidra represent the diversity of QF today meanwhile the leaves, flowers and fruits equate to the individual lives that the tree nourishes, with the fruits going on to produce seeds that guarantee sustainability and a healthy future. The Foundation consists of about 50 entities and it is the largest non-profit organization in Qatar. Among its main objectives is to help shape the future of the Qataris through advancements in education, R&D, community development, make Qatar a vanguard for productive change in the region, and a role model for the broader international community. Through its wide range of activities and institutions, the Foundation promotes a culture of excellence and furthers its role in supporting an innovative and open society that aspires to nurture the future leaders of Qatar, develop sustainable human capacity, social, and economic prosperity for a knowledge-based society. QF's Education City is a 2,500-acre campus launched in 2003, and today it is the home of Hamad Bin Khalifa University (HBKU), eight of the eleventh IBCs such as Georgetown University, Texas A & M, Weil Cornell Medical College in addition to several research establishments such as Qatar Science and Technology Park (QSTP) and many world platforms for creative thinking, research and innovation such as the World Innovation Summit for Education (WISE) and the World Innovation Summit for Health (WISH). (Qatar Foundation n.d.; Al-Sharqawi 2013, 216-217; Hamdan 2012, 207; Powell 2014, 269) The QF "Education City's vision is about more than education, it is about establishing Qatar as a leader in innovation, education and research." (Stolarick and Kouchaji 2013, 232)

2.4. International Education

The Qatari government began investing in higher education more than 40 years ago. It has adopted a unique policy, which consists of two programs; (a) to sponsor Qatari students to study abroad, and (b) to contract prominent universities from around the world to open branches in Qatar. The first program began since the 1970s, whereby the government had designed a scholarship scheme and provided generous scholarships for Qataris interested in studying undergraduate and graduate programs in four geographical regions which are: Qatar, Arab region and Australia, United Kingdom and Europe, and United States and Canada. To institutionalize this system, the government established the Higher Education Institute (HEI) under the Supreme Education Council (SEC) in March 2005. HEI's primary role is to manage the scholarship system including administering the previous (pre-HEI) scholarship programs, which consist of Emiri; Hamad bin Khalifa Al-Thani and Tamin bin Hamad, the National, and the employee scholarship programs in both undergraduate and graduate study options. The prime goal of this program is to broaden the intellectual and cultural horizon of the students and help them make educational and career choices based on their interests, abilities, and values as well as the needs of the Qatari labor market. Ultimately, the students acquire knowledge and skills at an international standard and bring them back to Qatar. (HEI n.d.; Stasz et al. 2007, 71-75)

After almost three decades of the launch of first scholarship program, and based on the principle that every Qatari should have equal premium higher education options within the country, the second program came into existence. Hence, the government has invested substantially in attracting the best international higher education institutions to open branches in Doha. The policy adopted by the government is that instead of finding one worldly renowned university to open various schools in the country, it is more useful to contract different institutions from around the world, which would each provide one specialty in which it had a particular strength. Therefore, in the period from 1998 to 2012, Qatar entered into agreements with 11 of the best higher educational institutions in the globe particularly from USA, Canada, UK, France and the Netherlands. Each institution has been selected for its ability to educate and train students in fields that will help Qatar grow and diversity as well as prepare students for employment and for global citizenship by emulation of global principles and norms adapted to local or national contexts of Qatar. The IBCs offer specializations and programs, that are accredited by the same bodies as their home universities, such as medicine and health sciences, engineering and applied sciences, IT and design, foreign affairs, journalism, and tourism and hospitality (see Table 1). Admission standards into the IBCs are high, English is the language of instruction, and the offices and classrooms are equipped with cutting-edge facilities. The general goal set by QF is that each of the IBCs is to have at least 50 percent of its undergraduate students Qatari citizens. QF Education City is an impressive academic hub that hosts eight out of the eleventh branch campuses including six American universities, a British and a French university. In terms of finance, Qatar Foundation covers all expenses for the IBCs and guarantees them academic freedom. For instance, the Foundation spends more than US$400 million to fund the operations of the six American institutions hosted in Education City excluding construction expenses. In return, the IBCs pledge to provide educational programs that are equal in quality to those in their mother campuses. They also agree not to establish similar programs elsewhere in the Middle East and consult the foundation about the choice of each branch's dean and vice deans. The IBCs basically share the same mission which essentially endeavors to achieve Qatar's National Vision 2030, help develop Qatar knowledge society, and produce global citizens. (Ministry of Education and Higher Education n.d.; Hamdan 2012, 123; Powell 2014, 259-270; Bollag n.d.; Havergal n.d.) It is worth mentioning that Mr. Omran Hamad Hamad Al-Kuwari, executive director of Qatar Foundation, indicated that each program offered by the IBCs has come for a reason and the government has no plans to increase the number of foreign campuses. (Bothwell n.d.)

3. Policy Issues

3.1. English as Medium of Instruction (EMI)

The IBCs use English as medium of instruction, research and communication. Their graduates are well known of their excellent command of English and the fields they study. These two factors enhance their competitive power in the job market. Obviously local employers and even abroad would easily consider recruiting them. However, the issue of foreign language such as English as medium of instruction is a bit contentious not only in the Qatari context but in the Arab region in general. Therefore it is important to address the language policy and ultimately come to a clear conclusion.

Arabic is the official language of Qatar and it has been used since long time as medium of instruction in both traditional and modern education. However, due to some social and economic factors, and the need for response to the globalized English as language of science, diplomacy and business. Also the low scores of Qatari students in international assessment tests such as PIRLS, TIMSS, and PISA. For example, in the year 2009 PISA tests, Qatari students scored 368 in Mathematics meanwhile the OECD average was 496, scored 379 in science whereas the OECD average was 501, and scored 372 in reading while the OECD average was 493 (Weber 2014, 71-72). Moreover, most of the Qatari employers showed concerns about the poor English and communication skills of Qatari graduates. Hence, in 2001 the government initiated the reform of the education system, and a part of it, was "the introduction of English as the medium of instruction (EMI) in K-12 mathematics and science classes." (Eslami, Seawright and Ribeirto 2016, 132) This policy instigated some tension, controversies, and frustration among Qataris. The people responded differently to such policy as for instance some students, parents and members of the community showed their dissatisfaction and viewed it as a threat to their Arab-Islamic identity, cultural values, and heritage. Meanwhile, others, particularly students, have positive attitude toward English and consider it as extremely important to their future career and are effectively using it in campus and even outside.

However, in January 2012, the Supreme Education Council (SEC) changed the policy and decided to revert to Arabic as the language of instruction in both government schools and at Qatar University with either abandoning or lowering the English language requirements for some courses. Apparently, the two main reasons that prompted this decision are: first, the poor English language preparation of Qataris taught in Arabic government schools. Second, the fear that young Qataris lose competence in Arabic language writing and speaking, and lose their cultural heritage too. However, it is generally admitted among most contemporary scholarship that the general perception of Arabic and English in both country and university is gradually changing. Besides, there is a growing sense of acceptance of the fact that they are two key languages and English should not be viewed as a threat to Arabic and students' national identity. (Weber 2014, 72; Eslami, Seawright and Ribeirto 2016, 132-145; Powell 2014, 268; Stasz et al. 2007, 29) This conclusion is therefore in favor of the IBCs and support their current smooth running and future endurance.

3.2. Mix-gender Education

Gender is a controversial matter which involves complex questions of social, cultural, religious, economic and political nature. Arab and majority Muslim societies are obviously viewed by some Westerners as patriarchal and gender bias. This view point could be attribute to the bad treatment of women in some Arab and Muslim cultures and communities whether in the past or modern times. Most often, the problem with this is the difficulty in making distinction between the ideals and values of the Islamic faith and the Arab or Muslim cultures relating to gender issues. In some cases, cultural and lifestyle differences are not tolerated and this has been observed in both "developed societies" and "developing/underdeveloped societies" alike. For instance, some liberal communities and cultures view single-gender education as a sign of backwardness and injustice toward women. They also think it is not right and beneficial for teaching and learning and in the education setup in general. Meanwhile, developing communities could regard mixed-gender education as something not right, a source of some moral problems, and would affect the academic achievement of students as such education setup perhaps lay the ground for disruption and gender tension. Yet, the debate on the cost-benefit analysis on these issues is still going on. However, it is obvious that "developed societies" and liberal values tend to exercise some kind of hegemony on other cultures and communities particularly through globalization mechanisms.

However, the issue of mixed-gender education in the Qatari context takes an interesting form that is worth highlighting. Despite the fact that the Qatari society is conservative, it recognizes the great value of the family institution and considers it as the nexus of the society. Men and women are socialized to complete each other roles with respect and courtesy. The Permanent Constitution as well as Qatar National Vision 2030 do not make any distinctions between males and females. All Qataris, weather men or women, enjoy fundamental rights to various services such as education and health, and are equally held accountable for their actions before the law. Despite the fact that gender segregation in educational institutions such as in government schools and universities, or in accessing some government services is widely observed in Qatar, the Qataris, residents and visitors cope with it as social reality without problems. Besides, mix-gender environment in education, workplaces and some services is available as an option. Within this context the IBCs provide education services in a mixed-gender environment enabling female student both Qataris and residents "to have an international education without traveling abroad." (Stolarick and Kouchaji 2013, 241) However, according to a study, many Qataris interviewees believe it is essential to preserve the single-gender study environment option because "some women do not want to study in a mixed-gender environment and are therefore unlikely to pursue post-secondary education unless a single-gender option is available." (Stasz, et al. 2007, 76) Yet, studying at local universities in single-gender environment is perhaps the perfect option for some female students and their families. This perhaps explains the fact that "the large majority of female students at Qatar University results from their higher probability of seeking higher educational opportunities close-to-home." (Powell 2014, 269) The most important result of both single and mixed gender setups, is that female students have more options and flexibility to further up their post-secondary studies in Qatar whether in IBCs or local universities and that they have the opportunity to become better educated over time and earn respected university degrees.

3.3. 'Glocalization' of the IBCs

There are some concerns regarding the potential of marginalizing the national education system understood from the government excellent full support of the IBCs. Moreover, some people viewed that the IBCs could disturb the traditional Arab-Islamic values that are well observed in the society. They think that the IBCs provide Western model of education, which not only bring in high standards academic programs, but also values and culture. (Powell 2014, 269-270; Bollag n.d.) The leaders and policy makers in Qatar are aware of the importance of both the global character of the IBCs system and programs, as well as the national educational and societal value systems. Therefore, they are exerting enormous efforts on various fronts to keep the global character and world standards of the IBCs, and at the same time indigenize it in the local social and cultural atmosphere. Stasz, et al., (2007) highlighted some of the gaps in the education business and emphasized on the need for the coordination and cooperation in all aspects and phases. It seems, the Qatari government and policy makers have seriously taken their input and thus endeavored to integrate the IBCs in the tertiary education system and support all types of planning, coordination and cooperation among the IBCs and across multiple organization including SEC, QF and QU in post-secondary education projects. While doing this, they did not overlook employers' feedback because it is useful for understanding the labor market demand for educational services.

One of the striking examples of coordination and collaboration mechanisms is the cross-registering between IBCs in general and between the six American universities in the Education City in particular. Students who officially belong to one college can have access to six universities and have their courses cross credited. Bothwell (n.d.) reported that Mr. Omran Hamad Al-Kuwari, executive director of Qatar Foundation, explained that such collaborative approach creates a very unique innovative environment for students and it is indeed rare as some universities hardly accept cross-registering. Some IBCs went a step further in collaboration and improving the integration between them by offering joint courses and programs. For instance, VCU, TAMU and WCM in Qatar have co-designed a new course "happy society" launched in January 2018, and made open to any education city students in their junior year. (VCU-Q n.d.; TAMU-Q n.d.; WCM-Q n.d.; Bothwell n.d.) Further examples include strong collaboration between GU and NU in Qatar as they begun allowing students to study a major subject at one institution and a minor at the other. (GU-Q n.d.; Bothwell n.d.) Moreover, in the academic year 2018/2019, CMU is offering registration of joint programs, training and workshops in between Education City universities (Al-Sharq n.d), and NU is considering Master's program in health communication in collaboration with HBKU, and launch a Master's program in Sport Media and communication in collaboration with mother University in USA. (Abdurahman n.d) WCM went with its collaborative efforts beyond the Education City and IBCs to work in partnership with Qatar University in medical education, health care, and research in Qatar (International Universities n.d.). QF leaders have also realized that cooperation and coordination is vital in recruiting students and faculty. Therefore, the Foundation has adopted a marketing strategy to advertise Education City as a 'whole value position'. (Bothwell n.d.)

4. Sustainability Issues

The huge financial and human recourses investments in contracting the 11 IBCs and facilitating their smooth operations in Doha obviously face the challenge of sustainability. This particularly in view of some questions and concerns raised by some observers that "these investments have been oriented mainly to Western models without sustained reflection on and tackling all of the contextual conditions needed to implement and sustain them." (Powell 2014, 266) Besides, there is an emphasis on the need for balanced policy approach, which integrates local and foreign institutions and supports the development of both of them. Therefore, it is important to highlight three important factors that would ensure the stability and endurance of the IBCs in Qatar.

4.1. Political will

The political leaders and the government of the State of Qatar have always been in favor of and highly committed to promoting education, science, research and innovation. They also have a clear vision and abundant resources to achieve their strategic goals. For instance, HH Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa Al-Thani, who ruled Qatar from 1995 to 2013, is considered as the pioneer of building the knowledge society where education is the prime drive of all aspects of reform and development. He founded Qatar Foundation, which among its roles overseeing the IBCs. Moreover, during his rule, the Permanent Constitution was ratified and the National Vision 2030 was launched. The Permanent Constitution includes 150 articles that regulate all aspect of life in the country pertaining to rights and duties. There are numerous articles that explicitly refer to the right to education and emphasize on the role of the state in promoting sound education, fostering and encouraging scientific research, helping disseminate knowledge in addition to making general education compulsory and free of charge. For instance, Article 25 states that "Education is one of the basic pillars of social progress. The State shall ensure, foster and promote education." (The Permanent Constitution of the State of Qatar 2004) Besides, Qatar National Vision 2030 has explicitly emphasized on education and knowledge production activities. (Qatar National Vision 2008) Her Highness Sheikha Moza bint Nasser, wife of HH Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa, initiated the World Innovation Summit for Education (WISE) in 2009. WISE is an international, multi-sectorial platform for creative thinking, debate and purposeful action. Its community is a network of education stakeholders; from students to decision-makers, coming from about 200 countries that share ideas and collaborate to seek creative solutions to solve challenges facing education. While WISE leaders recognize that education is lacking innovative approaches in both policymaking and in the classroom, they envision education as the key to addressing the toughest challenges facing communities around the world today. Therefore, WISE is a response to the necessity of revitalizing education and providing a global platform for the development of new ideas and solutions. It has become a global reference for innovative approaches to modern education. (WISE n.d.; Hamdan 2012, 199-206)

4.2. Diversification of the economy

Qatar discovered oil in the 1930s but began exporting it after World War II in 1949. It has been reported that Qatar oil reserves is expected to last for next 57 years and its natural gas reserve is expected to last for perhaps the next 100 years. They concluded that the revenue earned from hydrocarbon will not last forever. (Stolarick and Kouchaji 2013, 226) The leaders of Qatar became aware of the fact that oil and gas are depleted resources and their prices are fluctuating, and have sharply declined in recent years. The sharp decline of oil and gas prices has inflicted heavy losses of revenues and consequently crippled the government capability in funding projects and creating uncertainties for national planning since hydrocarbon wealth is the essential fuel of the economy. To this end, the government made considerable efforts to plan for diversification of the economy to reduce gradually the dependency on hydrocarbon recourses and the dominance of oil and gas sectors. The non-hydrocarbon sectors include manufacturing, financial services and construction. For instance, the government founded Qatar Investment Authority (QIA) in 2005 to strengthen the country's economy by diversifying into new asset classes for long-term strategic investments that help complement the state's huge wealth in natural resources. The QIA is structured to operate at the very highest levels of global investing and adhere to the strictest financial and commercial disciplines. For example, Qatar Sovereign Wealth Fund (SWF) currently stands at US$335 billion. (World Economic Forum, n.d.; Qatar Central Bank 2016) Moreover, an action plan has been put in place to develop the infrastructure by using the most advanced technology and production methods in the existing oil and gas fields, create new sources of renewable energy, and encourage recycling projects and systems. In addition to crude oil and natural gas production, the Qatari government has also introduced other industries such as ammonia, fertilizer, petrochemicals, steel reinforcing, aluminum production, and plastics. The hydrocarbon sector still constitutes one of the main sources of public revenue. For instance, In 2017, oil and gas returns stood at about US$36.35 billion and represented the main source of public revenue with a share of 88.7%. However, the share of hydrocarbon in real GDP marginally declined to 48.2% in 2017 from 53.2% in 2014, while the share of non-hydrocarbon in real GDP increased from 46.8% in 2014 to 51.8% in 2017. (Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics n.d.; Qatar Central Bank 2016, 2017; IMF n.d.; Weber 2014, 62-69) Another aspect of economy diversification is to reduce the dominance of the public sector on the economy and engage the private sector and Small and Medium Enterprises (SMEs). This would enable them to play an essential role together with the public sector in contributing to the economy and achieving sustainable development. (Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics n.d.; Secretariat for Development Planning 2008; Weber 2014, 68-69) Despite the fact that the dependence on the hydrocarbon sector is gradually reduced, the implementation of the long-term reforms to diversify the economy is moving toward a sustainable development system. This system would enable the government to ensure and preserve the right of present and future generations to benefit from their wealth recourses and finance existing and strategic projects particularly in education such as the IBCs.

4.3. Contribution of IBCs to the Qatari present and future wellbeing

The positive impacts of the IBCs on Qatar society and economy are extremely important in the survival and sustainability of these institutions. To develop an understanding of this matter within the limitations of this research, the author adopts the qualitative method because the quantitative method, which includes study techniques such as the questionnaire and interview, could be used in another study to measure the scale and scope of the IBCs on the Qatari economy and society. The huge financial and human resources investments in contracting the 11 IBCs and supporting them to continue operate in Qatar are basically meant for a strategic purpose which is to feed the country, the region and the world with highly qualified graduates ready for employment. It is very hard to size all the contributions of the IBCs to the present and future wellbeing of the Qataris. Nevertheless, some illustrative examples are discussed in the following paragraphs.

The IBCs have been present in Qatar for almost two decades whereby the eldest is 20 years-old and the youngest is about six years old (see Table 1). The most striking example of the positive impact of the IBCs on the Qatar society during these years, is the large number of graduates who presumably most of them are employed in various sectors of Qatar economy such as government services, engineering, business, media, design, tourism, and health. For example, there are some 6200 students who graduated from College of the North Atlantic with degrees in applied sciences (CNA-Q n.d.), 800 students graduated from Carnegie Mellon University with various degrees in computer science (CMU-Q n.d.), some 750 students graduated with engineering degrees from Texas A&M (TAMU-Q n.d.), about 680 students were awarded degrees in design from Virginia Commonwealth University (VCU-Q n.d.), more than 600 students obtained their degrees in tourism and hospitality from Stenden University (SU-Q n.d.), some 450 students earned their degrees in foreign affairs from Georgetown University (GU-Q n.d.), about 440 student graduated with different degrees in nursing and health sciences from University of Calgary (UC-Q n.d.), and in May 2008, Weil Cornel Medical College graduated its first class of 15 doctors. (WCM-Q n.d.)

The IBCs did not only feed the local work force with thousands of qualified employees, but also play an active role in building capacities and contributing to the efforts toward establishing a modern knowledge society. For instance, Weber (2014) highlighted the significant role of Northwestern University in the growth of the media industry in Qatar including journalism, film and computer media, by offering journalism and communications program in QF Education City. The demand for the graduates from NU-Q is very high as many employers such as Al-Jazeera Media Network, Qatar News Agency, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and the communication departments especially in the universities compete to recruit them. The University of Calgary is also playing a leading role in delivering world class health care in Qatar. It is assisting the Qatari government in its efforts to redefine health care in Qatar and the Gulf region. (International Universities n.d.) VCU-Q is deeply involved with emerging design companies in Qatar (Universities in Qatar n.d.). GU-Qatar houses a large library, which is open to public patrons. Furthermore, it conducts many public lectures and panel discussions addressing current issues in local, regional and world politics. (ibid.; Redden n.d.) Moreover, Bollag (n.d.) highlighted the impact of research published by Georgetown University faculty members over the past years about work conditions for foreign construction workers on helping the government lead the reforms. HEC Paris management programs are designed to meet the specific needs of high-potential professionals and executives already in senior management positions in Qatar. For example, since launch of the HEC Paris Executive Masters of Business Administration (EMBA) program in 2011, 500 students graduated, 75 percent of the them are Qatari off whom more than half were women. Moreover, in April 15, 2018 HEC held a Public Masterclass, titled 'Understanding Accounts and Financial Strategy in 60 Minutes' which is tailored to advance the financial strategic skills of the attendees. (HEC-Q n.d.; Redden n.d.; Qatar Tribune n.d.)

The cultural influence of the IBCs has also been noticed in the society. In addition to bringing their educational systems and world-class academic standards, the IBCs also brought their culture and values. All IBCs provide the same Western-style education as at their home campuses. For instance, classes are co-educational, and students are expected to have strong opinions and to voice them in-class and beyond. All IBCs students and alumni communicate in English so this language has become widely beyond campuses. This is perhaps what prompted one researcher to say: “the American culture and educational methods exert a strong cultural impact on the country as Education City graduates enter the work force.” (Weber 2014, 63)

Conclusions

Qatar is a relatively new country, which has changed from a tribal community to contemporary state in a matter of few decades and has achieved prominent position in the world in human development and literacy. Qatar leaders, decision and policy makers recognize the strategic importance of education and its strong correlation with comprehensive development. The government spends generously on education as it earmarks 3.5% of the GDP to provide free education in primary and secondary levels and scholarships for tertiary studies in Qatar and abroad. Qatar's education system is sustained by the favorable government decision to engage and support prominent foreign universities to open their branches in Doha and become part of the education setup with internationally accredited programs. It is an endeavor to bringing world-class education to Qatar's doorsteps.

Qatar's model in dealing with the IBCs could be viewed as unique in a sense that almost all these branches belong to the top ten ranked universities in the world, they all use English as medium of instruction, and conduct their classes in a mix-gender environment. This model faced serious challenges and controversies particularly in relation to certain policies as well as raised some concerns on the sustainability of this project for Qatar present and future generations. This study addressed three important policy issues which are English as medium of instruction, mixed-gender education, and 'glocalization' of the IBCs into the national education system.

It has been stressed that the issue of the medium of instruction is controversial as Arabic is the official language in the country as well as in government educational institutions. There were ad-hoc debate on the rationale behind the introduction of English as medium of instruction. Despite the fact that the matter is quite sensitive as English was viewed as threat to the identity of the young Qataris and the future of Arabic language, the general trend is now going toward considering English and Arabic as necessary and complementary. Similarly, the issue of mixed-gender education is sensitive as many families and female students still want to study in a single-gender environment. But in the current Qatari context both single-gender and mixed-gender education are considered as rivaling options more than conflicting choices. Maintaining the global nature of the IBCs programs and academic standards and integrating them in the local tertiary education system which is rooted in the Arab-Islamic heritage and value system proven to be a challenging policy issue. The government in general and Qatar Foundation in particular endeavored to sustain the process of 'glocalization' of the IBCs by favorable policies like the language and mixed-gender education policy and by encouraging cooperation and coordination mechanisms and activities such as courses cross-registering, join programs, and activities. However, it is important to highlight that the collaboration and coordination mechanisms and efforts have gain momentum only in recent years and the challenge of relying on the expertise of the expats in teaching, research, and other education services need careful planning in the long run. This long-term planning should be supported by review and development of existing labor laws and policies to be well aligned to the nation educational goals. Besides, it is vital to provide more financial as well as performance incentives for the national tertiary education institutions to uplift their level to an adequate international standard. This balanced policy approach will ensure the sustainability of the 'glocalization' process.

The question of whether or not the engagement of the IBCs is sustainable is legitimate essentially in view of the substantial financial and human resource engagement in it, the instability of hydrocarbon revenues due to the sharp fall of oil and gas prices in the past two years, and the feasibility of the positive impact on the job market as well as on the economic and social wellbeing of the present and future generations. The political will of the Qatari leaders, government and policy makers was favorable to host and support the IBCs to operate and endure in Qatar. Therefore, the government decision to diversify the economy is a significant step in the right policy direction to avoid any potential risks that might affect the availability of adequate funds for the IBCs to continue operating and grow. The current situation of the proportion of the oil and gas and non-oil sectors shows that the hydrocarbon sector is still the main source of the public revenue and the non-hydrocarbon sector is growing in a slow motion. Besides, the IBCs have proven their significance by their enormous contribution to the Qatari economy and society quantitatively and qualitatively. Thousands of graduates from the IBCs have joined the workforce and the demand for their expertise is very high. Moreover, some of the IBCs have visible contribution to some projects, institutions, and the overall development of Qatar. Nevertheless, the IBCs have yet to make Qatar self-sufficient in professionals and their impact on the Qatari economy and society needs further investigation particularly by conducting field studies using quantitative research techniques such as the questionnaire and interviews to measure the scale of their contribution.

EFFICIENCY, EFFECTIVENESS AND EQUITY IN PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION - THE ROLE OF THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR

Constantin BRAGARU

"I think there's no higher calling in terms of a career than public service, which is a chance to make a difference in people's lives and improve the world. "
Jack Lew Service, People, Think, World, Chance

Abstract

The public administrator (city manager) has to be a professional in mastering the science of planning, organizing, directing, coordinating, reporting, and budgeting. He must be equipped to research issues and offer solutions, draft proposals for legislation and regulations, prepare statements and presentations for testimony, conduct negotiations, build coalitions, and advocate client positions to legislators, other elected/appointed officials, and their staffs. Public administrator must provide representation at the state and other levels of government for businesses, associations, individuals, and non-profit organizations.Having as a role model the good politics from the other european union member states,the institution of public administrator has proven it's utillty in Romania due to full initiative of several mayors and presidents of county councils.

Keywords: Public Administrator, city manager,capabilities, planning, organizing, directing, coordinating, reporting, budgeting, research issues, solutions.

1. Introduction

There are various roles that are played by the Public Administrator. It must be important that the role of the administrator is not to be confused with his or her job, although, the role of the administrator may be defined by his or her job. For example, an administrator may have a job where he or she compiles data gathered from subordinates and analyzes the data to develop effective solutions to a problem in the form of policies. This may be his or her job, and the job may be titled Assistant Administrative Analyst, but this may not necessarily be his or her role. Given the description of duties, one may infer that the role of this administrator may be that of a problem Solver. This study distinguishes between various roles of the public administrator.

2. A brief review about public administrator terms of evolution,various roles and bureaucracy.

In a study of democracy and Public Administration, John P. Burke focused on the tension between democracy and bureaucracy. It is here that the role of the Administrator is defined as a guide that is responsible for taking the efficient bureaucratic organization through the moral aspects of a responsive democracy. Burke does not go into detail on how the administrator guides the organization but his next depiction shows how the organization may have an affect on the role of the administrator. Burke addresses the dilemmas faced by officials on a daily basis. Officials have their morals tested and are expected to follow organizational protocols impartial to what their personal beliefs may entail. Burke gives administrators the role of actors because they have their personal beliefs and agendas in their private lives, but once they come into the work place, they are expected to act accordingly to the demands of an efficient and effective organization. Some may feel sorry for administrators but as Burke points out, "Administrators, in choosing careers in public service, are often well aware of the moral pitfalls"[1] . They are analogous to the stunt persons who are aware of the dangers the stunt may do to their bodies in an attempt to perform a spectacular act for the enjoyment of the moviegoers (clients/citizens) in exchange for the appropriate pay. They have come undercontract and have agreed to perform such duties even at the possibilities of such risks.

In another study conducted by Pamela B. Teaster , the term Guardian was used to describe the role of the Public Administrator. This study focuses on care given to the indigent, the senior citizens, the people with diseases, and the children who are neglected and have insufficient care. The term "Parens Patriae" is used and is defined as "the duty of the sovereign to care for its citizens who cannot care for themselves"[2] .

This has vast implications in that it means that the role of Public Administrators come with the responsibility of providing medicine, shelter, clothing, and food to those in need. Being that there may be an enormous population of people who need these services, developing methods for effectively and efficiently distributing these services may become intricately burdensome. After all, how is one to define and measure the criteria for who should get what services, when, where, how much, and for how long? In addition, because resources may be scarcely limited and not everyone may be able to receive services, where should the lines of priority be drawn? It may fall into the jurisdiction of the Public Administrator to make such decision, which is another problem in its own: discretion. This discretion is the administrator's ability to make decisions when it may not be clearly defined or described in their agencies contract or manual or when there may be multiple options on various steps that may be taken concerning a certain situation.

Teaster , when describing the responsibility given to administrators concerning wards of the state, labels administrators as Surrogate Decision Makers. Some of these decisions, according to Teaster, "included medication and other medical decisions, habilitation decisions, financial decisions, and care and quality-of-life decisions"[3] . These decisions are not necessarily made according to a schedule or some seasonal activity but may spontaneously arise in the event of new wards entering into the system, wards becoming ill, or other factors that may submerge. The administrators must be aware of what procedures they may take, where available resources are located, and have the proper funding and planning available in the event of contingencies. If the administrators are not prepared in the event of catastrophes, the affected parties may file litigation against the agencies responsible for rendering these services.

Another author focuses on the actor role of Public Administrators the Theatre Metaphor used by many to portray officials and administrators in different lights. Larry D. Terry has discussed how in the Reagan era, administrators were portrayed as villains and in defense of that categorization, supporters of Public Administrators attempted to cast the role of hero on these officials. Sometimes it is not necessarily the administrator that attempts to assume these roles, but most of the time they are type cast for these roles. For example, when a person attempts to get a straight answer from a bureaucratic organization and is transferred from one administrator to another without completely having his or her concern addressed, the administrators may have the role of villain attributed to them. When the disaster resulting from Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans, Louisiana, and FEMA was slow to respond to the needs of the people, their administrators also received the role of playing the villain. On the other hand, when administrators develop effective programs that address the concerns of a specific population, the role of Hero is attributed to them. Even though the overall role may be that of an actor, the individual roles are given favorable or detestable attention depending on the outcomes resulting from the actions or inaction of various administrators. Terry points out that both of these roles may be problematic because when administrators are depicted as villains, government is given less credibility and is seen as "an evil force that must be conquered and destroyed" [4]. In addition, the depiction of the administrator as a hero may be problematic because this gives the officials an unrealistic level of expectations to which that may not be able to meet. Some problems may be wicked and unsolvable, and deeming administrators as heroes may be setting them up for failure.

For the purpose of this discussion, one final role will be included. Not that there are not more than the roles listed here, but it would serve to keep the attention of the viewer focused on the issue at hand b listing more than one role so that he or she may know that there are various roles taken on by Public Administrators. The final role discussed here was described with due recognition by Charles T. Goodsell ; Goodsell described the role of the Public Administrator as that of an Artisan. In his own words, Goodsell states,"It is, rather, to argue that the carrying out of common professional duties by public administrators can, with considerable payoff for both administrator and citizen, be viewed as the execution of an applied or practical art… it embodies a specialized skill that is capable of creating results that are both usable and pleasing to behold. Specific objects are created and tasks performed, yet in ways and with consequences that establish in the minds of both creator and audience a sense of intrinsic satisfaction, above and beyond the utilitarian purpose at hand."[5] .

The specialized skill here may be analyzing data, evaluating data, conducting research using various methods of polling and surveying constituents. These tasks performed may bring about plans, policies, and legislation which may be the objects referred to by Goodsell. When these "objects" bring about social services that provide shelter to the homeless, food stamps to those in hunger, clothing to those without, and even jobs for the disenfranchised, the intrinsic satisfactions becomes salient. Using the term science alone to describe what administrators do seems to take away the human creativity that is put into the tasks performed by administrators. The depiction of the administrators as artisans denotes that the work done by them is a work of beauty in its most precious form.

There may be hundreds of roles fulfilled by Public Administrators. This discussion has presented a few of the roles that are most often seen among people who come into contact with various agencies and their officials. These roles include guides that lead the organization on a path that serves the people, actors who are to put personal issues aside for the sake of performance, guardians who care for and act on behalf of the helpless, surrogate decision makers who utilize discretion concerning issues that affect the lives of the disenfranchised, villains when things go wrong, heroes when things go right, and artisans who utilize artistic talents and craft objects that bring forth satisfaction. These roles give the field of Public Policy and Administration romanticized features that most would not recognize when thinking about bureaucracy. Administrators can be seen as daring, compassionate individuals who take on the difficult task of being the problem solvers in society. Some may see it as a dirty job, but someone has to do it.

3. The European experience in practicing public administrator (city manager)[6] position

The quality of public administration is important for Europe's competitiveness. Modern, innovative and efficient public administrations is essential to sustaining the recovery and unlocking Europe's growth potential.The growth-friendly public administration scoreboard was published as part of the Member States' Competitiveness Report in September 2014.

The scoreboard is the first EU-wide exercise to analyse how "fit for purpose" the Member States' public administrations are, as regards promoting growth and competitiveness. It analyses a number of features important for competitiveness, so as to encourage improvements in government and public administrations.

The scoreboard delivers mixed results:

- Overall, government effectiveness has not improved for the EU over the past five years;
- Member States' budgetary, regulatory and implementation capacities vary;
- Red tape and high compliance burdens are negatively impacting on those wishing start a company and obtaining licences, pay taxes, participate in public procurement, export goods and services, or settle legal disputes.

Political and administrative organizations of local authorities in European Union countries have a number of basic characteristics in common.First, the political bodies in each municipality representative,is the result of democratic elections. In almost all municipal entities there is a political leader, recognized as such, whether the function of such person is mentioned or not. This leader can be elected directly by citizens or by the governing board members or appointed by the central government. Political and executive powers of the people can vary greatly.

Also, in most municipalities have at least one person whose role is to:

- manage, coordinate and supervise the organization of government;
- to provide advice to politicians;
- to ensure rational use of public resources, efficiently and in accordance with law.

These three features reflect the principles governing the organization of local government. Two decades ago, City Manager was usually a senior civil servant (age than in the organization), with a basic training in financial and legal. Experience in local government was seen as the most important requirement to fill such a post. This experience was gained through specialized training programs in public administration training institutes in their respective countries.

As regards public administration, legislation in European countries has not institutionalized a stable space professionalized management that can be separated from politics. The legislature has often opted for a president of local government, leaving the option of delegation of management tasks. The political dimension as prevail in the executive or management functions, the administrative expense of the organization[7].

Therefore, in recent years, European governments have chosen to modify some parameters bureaucratic organization for flexible management methods, with emphasis on the economic side and individual performance. Attitude in the City Manager has changed as a result of awareness that managerial skills are more important than specialized training. Effective management of public institutions realizes that an organization requires management skills and specific knowledge on effective use of human resources. Currently, among the decisive factors for the appointment of a City Manager holds the largest share of the management skills, combined with experience in local government.

"Professionalization" management has its sources in the need to differentiate the role of elected officials from that of technical professionals in other words; policy must be distinguished from the implementation [8].

Among European countries now applying a model of coordination of local public services by a person other than the Mayor, City Manager shall include: Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Ireland, Latvia, United Kingdom, Netherlands and Sweden. Given the strategic position they occupy City Manager, it is preferable to have higher education.

Expertise is less important because the management team, City Manager working with department heads, who have specialized training. Implementation of effective management in public administration has its origins in the United States and Western European countries (especially Anglo Saxon), where community services are organized based on specific mechanisms of the private sector, in coordination with City Manager / Executive Director.

Such notice the existence of the following items from the U.S. literature the role of City Manager is defined and explained so well (Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory): "Many times the city manager faces an important issue that influences political existence. According to this article, which has as its main subject study investigating the mechanisms that lead officials elected to postpone work to develop policy manager, city manager faces a number of factors such as experience, professionalism, relationship with Council members, which is the main reason of failure. Data from this study show that city managers leading image detrimental earn their administrative authority through their ability to manage and develop policies to achieve objectives. Thus, managers must reconcile the inherent tension between responsibility and respect. "In other words the content of this journal of public administration refers to the City Managers ability to impose its political influence in their activities, to achieving the targets. Such notice, the influence of a City Manager gets stronger at the expense of their administrative authority.

The definition of the City Manager in foreign literature we find in Elgie McFayden Jr.'s conception, in his "City Managers: Impact on Citizen Participation in Local Government", that the objective side of this concept: "A city manager is a administrative officer, who is usually appointed to serve as chief administrative officer within the Board. A city manager is clearly responsible for the City Council, but is much less likely that the image of responsible dethrone a strong mayor. To be held accountable for their decisions often unpopular fiscal policy they should respond to voters. Another fact to consider is that it is difficult for voters to hold board members responsible for inadequate social and fiscal policies, because power is decentralized; city manager is appointed and usually has a contract with well established tasks legal point showing their performance in some time. This paper analyzes the impact of the Government Board on the relationship between citizens and local Administrative. The objective of this paper is to determine whether a current city manager has a negative peace on the level of interaction between citizens and local government and if it decreases the influence of citizens in social and fiscal policies

On the other hand as "The International Conference on Business and Commerce" on the topic "The city manager: from the U.S. experience to Romanian reality" city manager is seen as an entrepreneur, a bureaucratic set in contrast with the political entrepreneur is relatively more prudent in the proposed policy and more likely to support new ideas that have been "verified" their associated professionals. The literature offers another perspective on the city manager. This route to success is their move to larger cities and better paid, but there are still a few city managers who enjoy office in small towns, poorly developed.

4. The actual stage of public administrator evolution in Romania

Having as a role model the other E.U. states know-how and good politics,the institution of public administrator has begun to prove it's utility also in Romania,through the initiatives of certain mayours and county councils presidents. The main tendencies in developing public administrstor's function are aiming for implementation and also research and evaluation above the influence of those measures in reforming local public administration system. All these eforts were synthetized in the project called "Public administrator – a key for a succesfull local management", financed from Social European Funds and having as a purpose developing public administrator institution by increasing the level of informations regarding the employment of public administrators and supporting the creation of a functional operational network in this case.

In Romania, public administrator function was regulated by Law no.286/2006 amending and supplementing Law no. 215/2001 local government. One of the innovations introduced by Law no.286/2006 is the introduction of public administrator, creating the legal framework for delegating certain tasks to the mayor / chairman of the county public administrator.

The legislative framework provided by this law allows mayors / presidents of county councils to engage, under a management contract, a public administrator responsible for coordinating specialized device or public service at local / county. By delegation, he may exercise the chief quality officer. Public administrator may be employed on a proposal Mayor / Chairperson of the county, with approval of the local / county as a result of competition, the maximum number of posts approved. Appointment and dismissal of public administrator are made by the mayor / chairman of the county on the basis of procedures and specific tasks approved by the local / county.

Also, intercommunity development associations may decide to appoint a public administrator for management services of general interest subject association.

Recruitment, appointment and dismissal of public administrator intercommunity development associations are made according by Law.286/2006 amending and supplementing Law no.215/2001 on local public administration, republished, based on specific procedures by their boards of directors and approved by decisions of local and county councils concerned. (Law no.215/2001 on local public administration republished, Chapter VIII, Art.114).

Institution as a public administrator is bottom up initiative of local government in an attempt mayors and presidents of county councils to delegate a multitude of their duties. Romanian public administrator has increasingly become a reality in communities inspired model City Manager. Its presence has emerged as a viable solution for local officials in the separation of attributes specific management representative and current activities. Public administrator function comes as an alternative local Romanian, was introduced into law in mid 2006.Local realities require a change in system performance by redistributing tasks locally by primary and / or presidents of county councils, to streamline administrative act.

Although the institutions of public administrator work in some administrative units, it was not yet introduced a bill. No local government law.215/2001 does not restrict the adoption of local development policies, but does not specify the nature of these initiatives, which required an amendment.

The main duties of public administrators in Romania are: exercise main credit quality, coordination of various public services (Service Management and Community Public Service and Fire Emergency, Community Police Service, security and order of services for social assistance, Department of Population, education, health service, sports, culture, public service for local public finance, local taxes), direct relations with the public (audience, addressing petitions), media relations, relationship with non governmental organizations, writing extra budgetary funded projects. Note that these duties are not distributed uniformly in terms of public administrator job description, at the county councils and / or municipalities (of city, town or village). Not all public administrators have the same powers, but they differ from one political subdivision to another. For example, not all public administrators have been delegated the task of authorizing officer. Others were delegated this authority, limited to a certain level or not.

Justifying its delegation to the mayor, it may concern different aspects, some referring to the trust and loyalty capabilities.

On the status of public administrator, it is not a public official in the mayor's specialized unit, but has the quality of contract staff, as reflected in the law which states a contract of management between primary and under which the administrator will accomplished latter duties. Moreover, this is strengthened because the not specifying text Law 188/19994 or within Law 286/2006 of any references that we could conclude that the public administrator would be considered a public official.

Quality staff and not official contract implies a lower wage regulating public administrator, which increases the primary instruments available to motivate his subordinate, or to reward their merits. Thus, according to O.G. 10/2007, salary of a public administrator will fall within certain "limits, with the minimum basic salary of secretary administrative unit and the maximum salary of the mayor, president of the county or the mayor of Bucharest, as appropriate" (Government Ordinance no.10/2007).

Conclusions

With national policy-making gaining in complexity and becoming increasingly exposed to international and European coordination, as is the case in all EU Member States, there is an even greater need for public administrators to have a broad perspective and the ability to coordinate their work with national, European and international institutions. In this regard, the EU context and development of multi-cultural skills should be emphasised and included more in the competency frameworks and the training and development activities for top public managers. New ways of developing public administrators in a more structured way have to be found, taking into account their responsibilities and time restrictions. Given the importance of the European environment of public administration, more emphasis should be placed on this dimension in the future. The development of leadership skills is still important in many Member States in order to add long-term strategic thinking and team and people management to the management competencies. To lead permanent change, public administrators have to develop into top public leaders.Long working hours are still the norm for top management positions, whilst telework or flexible working Latest trends in Top Public Management in the European UnionTop public managers (TPM) should perform as leaders instead of only as managers, while being able to bring movement and change to the organisation in a way that encourages most of the employees to want to be part of the movement.time arrangements are still rare. Consequently, establishing flexible working arrangements that help reconcile professional and private life should be allowed also in higher and top management positions so as to enable more women to take up top positions. Another valuable stimulus is a well-designed parental leave system. In the countries with a long-established leave system, it is generally not part of the organisational culture to allow public managers to benefit from these working conditions. The main problem continues to exist, because women or men who are taking care of a child or family often thereby limit their chances of promotion or career development. This is one of the elements that will have to be considered throughout the EU. Political support for changes in this area is essential.

Regarding the presence of a public administrator in administrative units in Romania, the benefits are undeniable. Such advantages are to improve the efficiency of the administrative record, following the introduction of this feature. Streamline flow of documents and information are other arguments in support of the model adopted by other local government units, as a guarantee of professionalization of Romanian modern public management. In these circumstances, an administrator could then support duties Mayor / Chairperson of the county and could secure a more efficient administrative system.

SOCIAL INTEGRATION OF TURKISH IMMIGRANTS IN ROMANIA? SYNCOPES IN THE CONFIGURATION OF A DETERRITORIALIZED IDENTITY

Abdullah DEMIR[*]

Abstract

David Lockwood[1] highlights the distinction between systemic and social integration. If social integration focuses on cultural values, traditions, and identities, the systemic one operates with rules according to which the host community of the immigrant functions, whether they are judicial, economic, civic or political. Although ideally social integration would complement systemic integration, the former is more difficult to achieve, since it presupposes the configuration of a deterritorialized identity of the immigrant. The paper concentrates on the relation between social integration and the configuration of the deterritorialized identity of the Turkish immigrant in Romania. Methodologically, a content analyses of some interviews conducted with Turkish immigrants in Romania will be carried out, by following a series of indicators, such as: the development of social relations outside the ethnic group, the accessing of the various cultural services and those for informal education, the Turkish immigrant's openness toward the values promoted by the Romanian and European culture as well as the attachment toward traditions.

Keywords: social integration, identity, third-country migration, Turkish immigrants, Romania

1. Introduction

The research endeavour materializes starting from David Lockwood's model according to which the integration process presupposes on the one hand the systemic integration, namely the economic and civic integration – and on the other, the social integration, which involves in turn the configuration of a deterritorialized identity. The paper will concentrate on the manner in which the Turkish immigrants relate to the social integration, on their efforts to configure a deterritorialized identity. Deterritorialized identity is a type of identity that forms as a result of cultural interactions that the immigrant has in the new community and it presupposes as well changes at the level of their value and belief systems. Certainly, the immigrant already holds an identity formed during their time in Turkey. However, as they internalize the values and practices from the new culture, they develop as well a new identity, outside the territory from which they emigrated. More often than not, during the first years after the immigration, the immigrants feel Turkish, but after a period of time, they state that they feel Romanian as well. This is how the entire process of identity configuration outside the country of origin, also called deterritorialized identity, could be summarized.

The process of social integration is closely connected to the configuration of a deterritorialized identity, so that, as the immigrant assimilates values, codes and norms from the new culture, they configure for themselves a new identity as well, outside the territory of origin, an identity that gives support in the process of social integration and facilitates this process.

In order to highlight the resources but also the barriers in the Turkish immigrant's process of integration, I have interviewed, during November 2017-February 2019, a total of 60 individuals of Turkish ethnicity who have been living in Romania for at least 2 years, namely 19 women and 41 men, with an average age of 39. Of the 60 individuals, 34 have a university education, 10 have a post-university one, 11 have a high school education, while 3 have a middle-school education.

11 out of the Turkish immigrants hold Romanian citizenship, 1 is a German citizen, 1 a French citizen, 1 a British citizen, 23 desire to obtain Romanian citizenship, while the other 23 do not have a plan to this end. The field research followed social integration indicators such as: the development of social relations outside the ethnic group (I1), the accessing of the various cultural services and those for informal education (I2), the immigrant's knowledge about Romanian culture (I3) and European culture (I4), and the role of traditions in the configuration of the new type of identity (I5).

2. Conceptual aspects

According to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (article 13) any person has the right to emigrate and live within the borders of any state. Migration is defined as a phenomenon that consists of the movement of an individual or a group of individuals from one territorial area to another, followed by a change in residency and/or an engaging in a form of activity in the area of arrival.[1] The movement can be internal when it is done within the territory of the same country or external/international when the migrant[2], as a result of a voluntary act, decides to emigrate (from the country of origin) and to work in another country in order to improve their quality of life. Migration is the result of a multitude of actions of individuals who are considered rational agents and who evaluate the costs, benefits and risks (including emotional ones). The decisions of individuals to emigrate are also a consequence of the traits of the economic, political and social systems from where they originate.

International migration is done under different forms: workforce migration, the migration of the immigrants' family members, migration forced by political or religious persecutions, by calamities and war. To this end, a conceptual specification is welcome related to the frequent confusion between immigrant and refugee. The Geneva Convention[3] stipulates the criteria that are at the basis of categorizing a person as a refugee: the person who has "... justified fears of being persecuted based on race, religion, nationality, affiliation to a certain social group or their political opinions ...". A series of political and social causes are found at the basis of the act of forced emigration: political persecutions, personal insecurity and that of family members, extra-judicial detentions, generalized corruption that blocks the functioning of state institutions in the service of the citizen, the lack of resources for daily living, the lack of access to healthcare and education, humanitarian crises determined by armed conflicts, hunger, diseases, massive violations of human rights.

Any international migrating act is at the same time an emigration and an immigration process. Emigration corresponds to the immigrants' process of movement from their countries of origin, while immigration is associated with the process of entering the destination countries. In the majority of cases territorial, geographic mobility is accompanied by a social mobility, meaning by the change in the social status of immigrant individuals.

Being considered a spatial social mobility (territorial, geographic) the clarification of the concepts of social mobility, status and social role is required. Social mobility generally represents the movement of individuals or social groups in the social space. Peter Sorokin treats the process of social mobility in his paper Social Mobility from 1927, but a richer literature in the field appears after World War II, with authors such as Otis Duncan[4], Martin Lipset and Reinhard Bendix[5], Raymond Boudon[6], Arnold Anderson[7]. If we consider George Gurvitch's[8] perspective, according to which society is formed of social levels, social mobility represents the individual's movement from one level to another (vertical mobility) or within the same social level (horizontal mobility).

Social status represents the position occupied by an individual or a group of individuals in a society. Ralph Linton considers that status is the collection of behaviours that an individual is entitled to expect from others. Talcott Parsons distinguishes between attributed and gained statuses[9]. The attributed status is the collection of attributes that the individual has at birth (sex, name, ethnicity, financial situation etc.) while the gained status is obtained as a result of social mobility, and personal efforts and investments made by the individual. The direction of the mobility can be ascendant or descendant, so that an individual could have an ascendant or descendant vertical social mobility. In the case of the ascendant vertical mobility, the individual changes their status, as a result of socialization and education, having the possibility to accumulate social prestige and economic rewards, but also to develop contacts and exchanges with individuals situated on a superior position within the society. In meritocratic societies, which emphasize the individuals' efforts to gather information and new competences, this type of mobility is frequently encountered. In closed traditional societies, mobility is done on the basis of family ties, blood ties or according to the economic capital held by the families of origin. The descendant vertical mobility is the opposite to the ascendant mobility, the individual goes down the social hierarchy. The horizontal social mobility is associated with the movement of the individual within the same social and professional category, within the same social level/layer, without any change in status (only in the social role in certain cases). A social role corresponds to each social status, in other words the social status is emptied of content without exercising the role. The social role of an individual is considered to be the collection of behaviours that other individuals are entitled to expect from the former. An individual is thus equally characterized by several statuses, such as social, economic, cultural, political, but also by the roles that correspond to these statuses. More often than not there are conflicts and tensions both within the statuses and roles, and between them. The constellation of statuses and roles, the cultural medium in which they are exercised contribute to the configuration of the individuals' identity.

Alan Simmons[10] considers that together with a change in residency, place of employment or profession, the immigration process presupposes a major change in the sphere of social and cultural relations as well. As a result of the social and cultural interactions developed in the new community, there are changes that occur in the values and beliefs system of the immigrant. On the other hand, new beliefs are developed, as well as new frameworks of value that contribute to the configuration of a new identity, outside the territory of origin.

James Fearon defines personal identity as being "a set of attributes, beliefs, desires or principles of action" that distinguish a person from a social point of view and direct its behaviour[11]. The personal identity refers to the unique characteristics of a person, to aspects of their life that are different from those of other individuals.

On the other hand, social identity is defined as the process of the individual's identification with others at the basis of the criteria related to race, gender, nationality, and religion. Social identity offers the individual the possibility to form a self image[12] for themselves. Cultural identity has in turn to meanings, namely individual identity and collective identity. At the individual level it refers to the cultural dimensions, to the cultural medium in which a person was socialized: linguistic context, religious and moral education, attitudes attained in the social medium, manners, etc. Another use of the term takes into consideration the belonging to a cultural group, being thus a synonym to collective cultural identity. A group is considered cultural when its cultural characteristics are combined so as to characterize the way of life of its participants, which determines a type of culture to be different from others.[13] From a cultural point of view, collective identity is different from the personal one since the former does not represent the sum total of individual identities, but the manner in which a group "gets along" and "perceives" itself[14]. Identity takes into account the relation between the self and the other as well[15]. Thus, it is based on differences and it is built through inclusion/exclusion mechanisms.

For Claude Levy Strauss identity is a polysemantic term that is centred on value axes that evoke similitude -the character of what is identical-, unity -the character of what is "One"-, permanence -the character of what remains identical to oneself-, recognition and individualisation -a person is a distinct entity for another person-. Identity is for Strauss similar to a "virtual house". What is to be recalled is that identity does not have a real form, it cannot be tangible but it does explain many connections and processes of a particular relevance.

3. The social integration of the Turkish immigrant in Romania

We have considered it necessary to address a series of questions related to the social relations developed by the Turkish immigrant outside the ethnic group, so that this first indicator translates the availability and resources of the immigrant to explore other social and cultural spaces as well. From our open discussions we have noticed a tendency of the Turkish immigrant to conserve their own cultural customs that they mainly find in their ethnic group. As a result, they mainly frequent persons with the same cultural background. This tendency annuls in many situations the development of social relations with citizens belonging to the society that represents the destination of the immigration. We wanted to verify this presumption by addressing a series of questions that have targeted the types of activities undertaken together with Romanian citizens, the frequency of the visits done by the immigrants to Romanian citizens, the causes for which the Turkish immigrants prefer/do not prefer to develop friendships with Romanian citizens outside the professional medium. The second indicator took shape as a result of a focus group organized in October 2017, when we discovered that all of the 17 participants had not accessed various services offered by associations or NGOs that activate in the field of migration. Although they complained that they feel excluded, that they would like to be supported, helped in learning Romanian traditions and culture, and Romanian, they did not conduct any documentation regarding the existence of associations/NGOs that organize activities of formal/informal socialization with immigrants and refugees. We would like to highlight the motivation of the Turkish immigrant to explore existing resources in the host society and to utilize them. The third indicator translates as well the immigrant's efforts to hold a minimum of knowledge about Romanian culture, a minimum without which one cannot establish certain value reference points in the relation between the immigrant and the society chosen for immigration. Similar to the third indicator, the fourth indicator highlights the efforts made by the immigrant in learning basic notions about European culture, considering the fact that the majority of those interviewed want to spend the rest of their lives in Romania or in other countries in Europe. Moreover, following the open discussions, we were able to deduce that a large part of the immigrants who participated in the study admit that there are important differences between the European culture and the Turkish one, that they present difficulties in understanding certain social and cultural practices. The last indicator makes reference to the role of traditions in the immigrant's process of social integration. The informal discussions revealed that for the majority of the interviewed immigrants the traditions are a substantial component of their lives, an element of distinction and a permanent resource that supports them and guides them in their daily life. Moreover, the act of immigration is considered by a part of them as "a betrayal of the traditions". This indicator was meant to highlight whether traditions truly represent a real resource that support the immigrant in the process of social integration.

Indicator 1. The development of social relations outside the ethnic group

22 (7 men and 15 women) of the 60 interviewed have not developed friendship relations with Romanian citizens. They consider that they feel more comfortable with friends from the same ethnicity or with colleagues coming from Libya, Lebanon, or Syria. A total of 28 out of those interviewed stated that they meet up with Romanian citizens only to discuss business. Another 8 stated they participate, on average, once a year to various activities together with Romanian citizens as follows: sport, eating together, and attending performances. Only two male individuals out of the 60 interviewed stated that 3 times a year on average they exchange visits with other Romanian families and they participate in various Romanian holidays at the invitation of their Romanian friends. 14 of the interviewed men consider that they prefer to invite Romanian citizens in their own houses or to the restaurant, rather than be invited by them. The number of women who did not establish social relations outside the family is larger than in the case of men, with only 4 out of the 19 interviewed women having friends who are Romanian or of a different nationality. They consider that the traditions do not allow them to develop friendships or to visit other individuals without being accompanied by their husbands.

Indicator 2. The accessing by the Turkish immigrant of various cultural services and those for informal education

What is noticeable is the fact that neither of those interviewed did not know, during the research period, names of associations or NGOs that organize cultural activities, Romanian language courses, courses for obtaining citizenship, recreational activities, encounters between Turkish immigrant children and Romanian children, film viewing, games, etc. Despite the fact that 37 of the Turkish immigrants have denounced difficulties in correctly speaking Romanian, only 11 of them seemed interested in the courses organized by Romanian associations and NGOs to this end. The 11 Turkish immigrants who obtained Romanian citizenship answered that the existence of such associations and NGOs is useful, but only 4 of them stated that they would have attended the classes and activities organized by them. Only 10 out of the 23 Turkish immigrants who are planning to obtain citizenship have shown interest in accessing such services with the specific purpose of obtaining detailed explanations about the manner in which a citizenship exam is conducted. Only 9 of those interviewed consider as useful the organization of family cultural activities, such as visits at museum or exhibitions, viewings of cultural shows that have a Romanian or international character.

Indicator 3. What the Romanian culture means for the Turkish immigrant

7 of the respondents do not have knowledge about Romanian culture although they immigrated to Romania over five years ago, 4 consider that it is similar to the Turkish one, 7 consider it a mix of cultures mainly formed from Western and Eastern elements. 3 of the Turkish immigrants associate the culture with the people, namely a culture with warm and welcoming people. A majority of the 39 associate Romanian culture with the name of certain poets, painters, rulers, and sportsmen, such as: Eminescu, Grigorescu, Ștefan cel Mare, Carol I, Hagi. 4 respondents added as well the name of former president Ceaușescu to the four names, while two others complete the aforementioned list with the names of certain entertainment presenters. 10 of those interviewed consider it important to have knowledge about Romanian traditions, customs, and culture in order to better integrate in the Romanian society. A number of 5 individuals visited the Village Museum, 2 visited that of the Romanian Peasant, while 2 visited the History Museum. Although they went through a citizenship exam that contains a series of questions about Romanian culture as well, 19 of those interviewed admitted that they memorized the answers and did not feel the need to visit museums or to read a stanza from the poem of a Romanian author. Only 4 of the 23 individuals who have citizenship stated that in preparation for the exam they felt the need to visit the Village Museum in order to better understand Romanian traditions and customs.

9 of the respondents know the significance of Romanian holidays such as Easter and Christmas.

Indicator 4. The European culture for the Turkish immigrant 9 of those interviewed do not know what European culture means, with 12 of them associating it with democracy, human rights and free travelling. Only 4 of the 60 respondents have attended classes in universal literature within courses organized at the faculty in Romania. Even so, they admit they were not passionate about them and they did not further their studies outside the classes, reason for which they hold vague information about important trends in art, literature, and music, about famous works, painters, composers, and writers from the European cultural space. Only 6 of them have knowledge about the main historic landmarks, such as colonization, world wars, the Holocaust, the Cold War, etc. Neither of those interviewed was able to explain what Renaissance or Enlightenment meant. In regards to the great names from European literature, only two individuals mentioned Emile Zola, Honoré de Balzac, William Shakespeare, and Plato. Only 3 of those interviewed mentioned painters such as Picasso, van Gogh, Michelangelo, Leonardo da Vinci, and Rembrandt. 4 of the respondents know composers such as Vivaldi, Beethoven, and Chopin. 20 of the respondents have visited cities such as Rome, Paris, London, Amsterdam, Luxemburg, Frankfurt, Berlin, and Vienna. Only 8 of them visited historical monuments as well, 4 allocated time for art museums, and 2 for open-air exhibitions.

Indicator 5 The conservation of the traditions of Turkish immigrants

52 of those interviewed consider traditions as being a highly important part in their lives, when organizing their lives. The majority of them have named the following as being a part of the wider category of traditions: respect for parents, religion, prayer, food, dinners with friends, and the help they offer others. Two of the Turkish immigrants consider that in Romania traditions might be lost, but even so they have to remain here, for only here can they develop businesses. 43 of the respondents consider that the supreme force that sets things in motion and that helps them "go forward in life" is Allah. 10 of the Turkish immigrants who participated in the research are married with Romanian women. They consider that it is the duty of the wives (and not of the husbands) to respect the traditions and to learn the customs of the Turkish culture, although they live in Romania. 19 of those interviewed consider that although traditions are very important, these impede them from understanding other cultures. 12 of the respondents stated that after an average of 5-7 years, their perceptions concerning traditions and religion changed over time in a "good way". They shared the fact that they went through major changes to the better at the level of understanding, approach, relating to themselves or to the exterior social medium.

On the one hand, the interviews looked at the efforts made but also the cultural, intellectual resources of the Turkish immigrant. On the other, what was analysed was how the respect and attachment for traditions can facilitate or burden the Turkish immigrants' process of social integration.

In regards to the efforts made by the Turkish immigrants we found that the social relations developed by them outside the professional medium are channelled mainly on businesses as well and less on the immigrants' curiosity or openness toward exploring the new culture in which they decided to immigrate. The tendency of the majority of the target group is to withdraw to the groups of friends belonging to the same ethnicity.

Despite the fact that a series of specialized associations and NGOs develop services meant to help immigrants get used to the cultural medium in Romania, the immigrants did not seem sufficiently motivated to access them, although they thought them as being useful. The data obtained show attitudes of inertia, inaction and even of rejection from behalf more than half of those interviewed. The accessed group is still the ethnic one. The immigrants consider that the friends and colleagues who have been in Romania for a longer period of time tell them "how things happen, what is good to do, what is not good in Romania, what is good to avoid".

A series of questions regarding the familiarization of the immigrants with the values of Romanian and European culture did not have the intention to be a knowledge test. We considered that certain information about the main moments in universal and European history, the main cultural trends, the great names in European art can constitute a useful resource for immigrants, a resource that could attenuate the culture shock, or that could be an intermediary bridge between the pre- and post-immigration stages. The schools frequented by immigrants in their past did not ensure a familiarization with notions of European culture and civilization, even less so with respect to the Romanian one. The supplementary readings and activities conducted by the immigrants were not directed this way. These are also the reasons why a part of those interviewed did not have the curiosity to decipher the codes and cultural values of the new medium, and in addition, they are found in the situation of not understanding, of denying, rejecting and retreating to what they know best, namely their own cultural group. This tendency was encountered in several of the individuals with higher studies. We consider art as a universal language and a resource that could be explored more in the integration processes of Turkish immigrants in Romania.

Both the personal resources and the efforts made are found in a constant competition with the traditions that are considered as the centre of existence for Turkish immigrants. The formal and informal socialization mediums, the family, school and friends have promoted this type of cognitive and affective model based on traditions. Even more, they promoted its superiority in relation to other cultural models. This is also the reason for which the majority of those interviewed consider that the women of other ethnicities and religions married to Turkish citizens have the duty to convert religiously out of respect for their husbands and they have the duty to respect their traditions. Only one of those interviewed answered affirmatively to the question regarding a possible renunciation of this own religious system. Turkish immigrants a priori place faith in the centre of existence and through it they justify for themselves many of the cultural and social facts, phenomena and processes that they are a part of, without resorting to logical or factual arguments.

4. Conclusions

The content analysis of the data obtained from the unstructured interviews highlights the fact that social integration is a slow process, which is at an early stage with over half of the Turkish immigrants, although the immigration took place on average at least two years ago. Moreover, in certain cases, the immigrants who record more than 10 years since they decided to immigrate in Romania, what was noticed was a tendency to become stuck in these early stages. This process of social integration is slower with the interviewed women, since they mainly frequent the familial medium or groups of friends that are very close to this medium.

Although in the present paper we did not focus on systemic integration, the research conducted has highlighted as well the fact that the systemic integration was done more rapidly than the social one, outrunning it. As mentioned in the first part of the paper, systemic integration is focused on economic and civic integration, in other words, on respect for the rules of the economic game but also on the respect for the civic rules that ensure institutional, formal relations for the immigrant in the Romanian society. The majority of immigrants stated that the main cause for their immigration is economic, a fact that shaped their professional and social trajectory after immigration as well. In order to develop their businesses, they learnt to respect the rules imposed by the Romanian society to this end. The situation is different in regards to the social integration that operates with values, beliefs, social interactions, the immigrant's potential to understand and assimilate certain codes, and cultural values. The new culture encountered in Romanian society, constitutes itself as a medium different from the cultural medium where the immigrant configured their identity of origin.

The efforts made for social integration, the cultural and intellectual resources, and the attachment for traditions represent elements that configure the deterritorialized identity of the Turkish immigrant. This type of identity supports in turn the process of social integration that is conducted as aforementioned, at a more profound level, that of cultural values, of cognitive and affective beliefs. The data analysed in this paper highlights the fact that the Turkish immigrant is not prepared to invest in the new type of identity – called deterritorialized in the present paper -, an identity that would ensure social integration. The tendency of the majority is to return to the identity of origin and to protect it, with the risk of feeling isolated in the new immigration medium that they have chosen. This tendency manifests itself even if the configuration of the deterritorialized identity does not presuppose the annulment of the identity of origin. It presupposes in fact its maintenance and, moreover, using it as a basis for building the deterritorialized one, meaning a nucleus of interactions, and cultural values and codes that can ensure the immigrant the understanding of the new social and cultural medium.

WOMEN LEADERSHIP: CHARACTERISTICS AND PERCEPTIONS

Adina-Loredana DOGARU-TULICĂ

Abstract

Over the years women have won many fights during their road to emancipation. One of the main victories took place in the last decade when politics have become a won battle to the feminist representants. After more and more women began to occupy key positions in politics, administration, or the private environment, researchers were interested in the ways women lead. Scholars like Judy Rosener, Alice Eagly and colleagues, Catalyst or Carli have tried to find differences in leadership between women and men, but also the dominant characteristics of women leaders. Common views were that women are more concerned with the welfare of other people (helpful, sympathetic, nurturant etc), women lead in a more democratic and participative style than men and use relational skills to influence others, encourage participation, share power and information. The present research presents chronological references of women emancipation during the history, brings into discussion, according to the reviewed literature, gender differences in leadership, looks over women in leading position worldwide and makes some consideration about public leadership. This paper also highlights, through the focus-group qualitative research method, the main characteristics of women leaders in Romania, also trying to briefly describe how women politicians are perceived by the public. This paper is part of a wider research work that approaches the online communication of women political leaders.

1. Introduction

For several years now, there has been a particular concern about gender relations in leadership. This concern is due, on one hand, to the increased number of women in leading positions and, on the other hand, to the fact that men are the ones with the most influential positions in all areas.

All leaders nowadays, no matter the gender, – political leaders, corporate leaders or civil society leaders – "have to act within the context of a dynamic system of global pressures and trends. (…) Leadership is often seen as one of the most important and effective responses to the challenges and opportunities presented by the global context."[1]

Many scholars have defined the leadership concept over time. To introduce this paper, the author of the present research will refer to some of the most relevant definitions. M. Shanmugam, R.D.G. Amaratunga & R.P. Haigh from Research Institute for the Built and Human Environment, University of Salford, argue that leadership is „ process in which an individual influences a group of individuals to achieve a common goal".[2] Rost sees leadership as "an influence relationship among leaders and collaborators who intend significant changes that reflect their mutual purposes"[3] A integrated and complete definition is presented by Winston and Patterson who argue that "A leader is one or more people who selects, equips, trains, and influences one or more follower(s) who have diverse gifts, abilities, and skills and focuses the follower(s) to the organization's mission and objectives causing the follower(s) to willingly and enthusiastically expend spiritual, emotional, and physical energy in a concerted coordinated effort to achieve the organizational mission and objectives."[4]

The definitions seem simple at first glance and all all point to the leader's power to influence. That is why we ask ourselves the natural question: are not women capable of influencing a group of individuals to achieve a common goal? Are not women smart enough to do this? The author of the present research tries to find the answer to this dilemma, revising the literature and studying people's perceptions about this topic through a focus group.

2. Women emantipation - chronological references

The beginnings of feminism could be marked by Mary Astell's influential work - A Proposal to Ladies (1694). Astell's had dreamed then, in the seventeenth century, about a world where women are able to learn useful things and bring their contribution to society. She claimed that women could become scientists and experts in many fields, even in politics, and stressed that it is essential for women to improve their knowledge and become smarter. Her text was a philosophical one but claimed that women were in a lower moral position than men. After determining the causes of this problem, Astell insisted that women should become rational citizens with the right to a male-like education, to a education based on the right to liberty, with the opportunity to hold any office, with the possibility to be political representated and to have personal dignity. [5]

The second woman that remains important in the history of the feminist movement is Mary Wollstonecraft (1759-1797) known especially for providing a systematic analysis of the subjugated state of women. Like her predecessor, she realizes that the only major difference between men and women is education and insists that women have access to education. Mary Wallstonecraft is famous for the question that feminists had to find the answer, namely: "If all people are born free, how is it that all women are born slaves?" Given that some women were struggling with survival (black women, working women, women in rural areas), the struggle for development and affirmation ranks second among the priorities of these women.

The two mentioned researchers are in the first wave of the feminist movement because, through their work, they have responded predominantly to the problems of certain categories of women: the white, of European culture, belonging to the middle class.

In Romania, the first wave of the feminist movement unfolds in parallel with the Western one. It is a feminist movement of the elites, category of educated women with access to information coming from outside the country. However, it should be noted that at that time 80% of Romania's population lived in rural areas, therefore the Romanian feminist movement can not be integrated or compared with the feminist movement in Europe or around the world, becoming very active and strong only after World War I. The most important period for women in Romania is the period preceding the Constitution of 1923, considered to be the most democratic. In this period, the Romanian women have engaged in intense lobbying to obtain equal civic and political rights with men, got involved in having acces in all institutions, dignities and public functions like men, and in politically prepare women to exercise their rights. The year 1929 also gives Romanian women the right to vote, but we are talking about a restrictive right for educated women aged over 30 years. In the same year the law on administrative reorganization is adopted, whereby women receive the right to be elected in local elections. Only if they had certain studies, they were war widows, women decorated for wartime work, or women running cultural, philanthropic or support societies at the time.

The female vote was not compulsory, however, and the presence of women in the polls was discouraged by men's irony at their expense. Ten years later, for the first time in Romania's history, women also receive the right to be elected in Parliament. As in the case of men, this right applies only to educated women aged over 30, but they were few, because most women did not even have primary education. Only the first Communist Constitution, issued in 1948, states that "all citizens, regardless of gender, nationality, race, religion, degree of culture and profession, have the right to vote and to be elected in all the organs of the State. All citizens who have reached the age of 18 have the right to vote and all citizens who have reached the age of 23 have the right to be elected ".[6]

If the first wave of the feminist movement has achieved its goal of introducing into law equal rights for women with men, the second wave aimed to put them into practice in everyday life, by annihilation of gender differences because women did not want to remain second-class citizens. The second wave of the feminist movement has been a significant gain since many of the feminist policies have turned into state policies: equal pay for work of equal value, access to professions deemed specific to men, policies to combat sexism in education and all areas.

The third-wave of feminism started in 1990's and the followers of this trend "work outside the power/victim framework, aiming to investigate the complicated picture of young feminism and to re-theorise gender". [7] Feminists from the third wave integrated in their work contemporary subjects related to immigration, class conflicts, multiculturalism, globalization and also environmental issues, human rights.[8] Romanian feminism after 1990 has a hybrid approach, representing a combination of the agenda of the second wave, missed as a historical integration due to communism, and the integration into political generation of a network located in cyberspace. [9]

3. Gender differences in leadership

Men played a very important role in the development of mankind because they were the ones who led the world, but the world is evolving and from one decade to another there are major changes in every respect. Thus, in a century marked by unprecedented changes, revolutions and innovations, the most visible and lasting transformation can be considered the involvement of women in the development of humanity.

Arnie Cann and William D. Siegfried[10], professors at Ohio State University, conducted a research examining the perceived gap between men's leadership behavior and women's leadership behavior and concluded firmly that there were differences in how women and men are thinking about driving. Their belief is that men and women differ in their approach of management and therefore offer different qualities.

The theories of gender differences in leadership have started from the most varied assumptions, but at the root of all differences are probably biological differences. Biological theory starts from the premise that leadership is genetically determined, innate in men and therefore inaccessible to women[11]. Another theory, which starts from the concept of gender role, recognizes the role of socialization and explores gender-specific roles as determinants of leadership. A third perspective involves identifying other factors that might make a difference, for example women's attitudes towards leadership, women's confidence in themselves, previous experience, and the predominantly male style of the organization.

Research that compares the leadership styles of women and men can be extended. Alice H. Eagly and Blair T. Johnson of Purdue University (US) evaluated the male and female leadership styles and concluded that women tended to adopt a more democratic or participatory style, a less autocratic style or directional to the style promoted by men[12]. Another point of view would be that women are less assertive and less inclined to promote and negotiate for them, unlike men[13]. These observations and other findings are interpreted in terms of a theory of the "social role of gender differences in society" [14].

A Giddens[15] draws attention, however, that there is a clear distinction between the terms "sex" and "gender". If the first term refers to biological aspects, more specifically to physical differences of the body, the second term refers to the psychological, social and cultural differences between men and women. In his opinion, the distinction between gender and gender is fundamental. According to his theory, the main differences between men and women are not biologically determined, as we are tempted to believe most of us, but rather the results of social-cultural processes, the outcome of a learning process that begins early in childhood. He argues that learning gender roles through all the influences of the social environment (gender socialization) is a process that starts right from the birth of the child. According to his opinion, through "gender socialization", the child learns the behaviors considered appropriate for his or her sexuality and teaches the values accepted at the cultural level with respect to what is specifically male and specifically female. Gender socialization therefore contributes not only to gender awareness, but also to the social recognition and acceptance of gender social stratification in any society, and to the perpetuation of the inviolability of male-female dichotomy. So the male-female dichotomy and all the differences (including inequalities) that it implies are highly naturalized.[16] This also results in practices that are "appropriate" or "inappropriate" for a given genre, as well as prohibitions. These gender differences, which appear to be natural, and which may appear in the form of skills, skills, behaviors, practices, activities, shared knowledge, etc., often take the form of stereotypes that give each gender a number of cultural representations. They have both a descriptive component - traditional concepts of how women and men are, how they behave and what characteristics are specific to each gender, and a prescriptive component - the generally accepted rules on how women and men should be and how they should to behave[17]. Socially shared expectations of an individual's behavior, depending on their gender, have often been conceptualized as "gender roles". Gender roles are different from one culture to another and refer to those behaviors deemed appropriate or acceptable to members of each gender (men and women) respectively. What is typical and therefore "normal" for each gender is learned early in the life of each individual through the socialization process.

Extending these theories in the sphere of leadership, we begin to understand that gender differences lead to an erroneous assessment when one category is supposed to be superior to the other, but research shows that these discriminatory attitudes and behaviors have brought inconveniences to both organizations and societies, and individuals by the limits imposed on how people can contribute to the evolution of society on the basis of the uniqueness and particular characteristics they have[18], therefore, starting from pragmatic arguments, figures and verified results, there is a growing awareness of the need for gender balance and diversity.

As far as leadership styles are concerned, there are researchers who say that women's leadership style differs from that of men, in the sense that women are willing to collaborate and cooperate more with others, and encourage subordinates to self-valorisation.[19]

The research of Eagly, Wood and Diekman[20] shows that men leaders have more agentic characteristics: they are aggressive, ambitious, dominant, powerful, independent, self-confident, competitive characters. In relationships within the organization, men struggle to attract the attention of others, influence others, distribute tasks. On the other hand, women leaders have more communal characteristics: interested in the well-being of others, understanding, interpersonal sensitive. In the relationships within the organization, women do not want to focus on themselves, accept the directions given by others, support their subordinates and colleagues, guide their subordinates, help solve relational and interpersonal problems.

In terms of the five types of leadership types mentioned in specialty literature, Eagly et alii, attribute to each kind of typology a genre. So:

- Autocratic leaders are rather men leaders
- Democratic leaders are women leaders
- Transformational leaders - with many communal charasteristics, are closer women leaders
- Transactional Leaders are rather men leaders
- Laisser-faire – more likely to be men.

Summarizing, leading women have a behavior oriented towards interpersonal, democratic and transformational relationships, while leading men are self-oriented and autocratic.

By studying the literature, we have established that there are gender differences, and we have also clarified where they come from, so it is natural for women and men to behave differently and obviously to adopt different leadership styles. So, which of these styles is more effective? A woman leader, who helps subordinates, who pay attention to their development needs, which is available and friendly, or the a man leader - task-oriented, which requires and expects employees to abide by rules and procedures, that sets high performance standards and maintains the subordinate relationship?!

Of course, we can not say which of the two variants provide the recipe for success, but we find that in recent years organizations have promoted a new leadership style, regarded as visionary, charismatic, inspirational, which led to the emergence of transformational leadership. It involves monitoring and increasing the performance of subordinates, agreements between the leader and subordinates about objectives and tasks, but also rewards for valuable employees. Female characteristics appear to be more appropriate to transformational leadership.[21] New values (sometimes called feminine values) are starting to arise in the business environment, values that contrasts with the competitive and authoritarian approach traditionally associated with masculinity, and are based on consensual relations. Therefore, the success of the interactive leadership style of women has led to a tendency to adopt it by men as well. Organizations begin to appreciate the leadership style that includes behaviors such as: encouraging employee participation, sharing information and power, promoting others and motivating them, which has given leaders flexibility to survive in a competitive and diverse business environment.

4. Women liders in figures

Transformational leadership in organizations seems to be the key to success for many women who want to hold leadership. However, although the number of women in leadership positions in companies is increasing, women are still under-represented in managerial positions. In Poland, for example, in 2016 only 10% of women had leadership positions.[22] In addition, their earnings are even lower today by 20% compared to men. Even in Romania things are not better. In 2016, the number of women serving in large companies was 37%, of which 10% held management positions, 12% had a non-executive role, and 15% were in the supervisory board.[23] The opposite case is Denmark, where women occupy 23% of all managerial posts and over 70% of women have jobs.[24]

A recent research of The Economist [25] shows that in the field of scientific research - men dominated, women have begun to gain ground. Thus, in the European Union and in eight other countries researched, the proportion of women authors increased from about 30% in the late 1990s to about 40% at present. In Japan, on the other hand, only a fifth of the researchers are women, with women being best represented in health-related topics. In fact, this area and that of psychology are the only examples where women are more numerous than men in many countries, including the United States and the United Kingdom. In contrast, less than a quarter of researchers who publish papers in physical sciences are women. Probably as a consequence of this, inventors who register patents are still almost all men. Such large imbalances suggest that there are innumerable physical discoveries and innovative products to be made, because the scientific world do not take full advantage of the intellectual capital of women.

In another study, Gender Differences in Leadership, conducted on 353 companies in the world, it was found that the highest financial results were recorded by companies where the number of women in senior positions is higher, as opposed to companies where they are less represented.[26]

The International Labor Organization, concerned with the issue of gender differences, has found an explanation for the slow advancement of women in leadership positions, especially in male-dominated departments. Thus, the Organization believes that "women lack adequate leadership." From women managers in male-dominated environments is expect a style of leadership that suits the "world of men" to get a status. The so-called "male modes of management"[27] are characterized by competition, hierarchical authority and focus on control. Loden argued that there is a man type of management characterized by qualities such as competitiveness, hierarchical authority, high leadership, and solving analytical problems, arguing that women prefer and tend to solve problems, relying more on intuition and empathy than on rationality.

5. Some considerations about public leadership

Leadership is not an activity that mobilizes only the resources of an institution or organization to make progress with the difficulties it faces, but also the resources of people, countries[28]. At the same time, we are talking about a process of influence within which a person receives the trust and support of others and, without taking advantage of the formal position or the authority of the function, guides the group towards accomplishing one or more tasks[29] Therefore, leadership plays an extremely important role in achieving public reform of a country, being a precious tool for promoting and managing change for all peoples who have engaged in public sector reform.

Leadership is the most powerful and important weapon that any form of government can have. Poor leadership will direct governments and institutions of a country to failures, while strong leadership will lead any form of government to remarkable results. The need for leadership in this area is largely determined by the nature and scale of the reforms. Countries that have chosen the path of progressive reform are less inclined to mobilize a larger number of public leaders at the same time to drive change, but countries that have chosen the path of profound reform, both socially and administratively, need higher leaders in the public domain. The success of a public administration reform is conditioned by organizational aspects, a strategic planning capacity, a leadership change capacity, an ability to promote and coordinate the development of the organization, and the leader is extremely important when it comes to relations between members of the organization motivation of staff within the public organization.

The public leadership, associated by some researchers in the theory of new public management, refers to the ability of public managers to have an intuitive understanding of development, an understanding of the challenges and the changes needed in order to adapt public organizations to the permanent future[30]. Leadership is, in fact, the basic component of good governance, and politically responsible leadership is extremely beneficial to a state, because it will cope both with global changes and with day-to-day problems a government has. That is why a true political leader needs a strong personality, an ethical and cultural character, the ability to mobilize the crowds, bargaining skills, maximizing and streamlining resources. Understanding this concept, politically involved people can help both the development of the public and the private sector.

Political scientists argue that good political leadership requires a combination of charisma and integrity, as well as the ability to assess a situation and make a decision based on what would be best for the greatest number of people. Above all, being a political leader means more than just being a politician, because in order to lead at political level, integrity and desire to sustain what is good are needed, even if this could lead to the loss of a position in a government or the loss of elections for important positions in the state. Political leadership requires focusing on the long-term good evolution of a country, beyond any personal gains. In Hsin-Yi Cohen's opinion[31], a good political leader is: someone who serves as an example of integrity and loyalty to the people he or she represents, for both the public and other political leaders, someone with good communication and interpersonal skills who can work with a series of other people, irrespective of party or political opinion, in order to obtain the greater good for the general population, Also someone who can withstand the various temptations and baits of the political arena, someone with a strong character, with conscience and charisma, someone willing to listen to the needs of ordinary people and to represent them with faith, someone with the courage to stand up and say what it needs to be said - rather than tell the general public what it wants to hear, someone who is willing to make difficult (and possibly unpopular) decisions for the greater good. Therefore, a true political leader needs a lot of qualities and most of them can be acquired.

6. Methodological design. Case-study: women leaders in Romania

The qualitative research of this paper, based on the focus group method, aimed at identifying the main characteristics of female leaders in Romania and started from two research questions:

- - What distinguishes women leaders from male leaders?
- - How are the leading political women in Romania perceived?

The focus group was defined by researchers either as a group interview[32], a rigorously planned discussion group to obtain information on a subject proposed by the researcher[33], or any discussion between selected individuals on a particular topic as long as the researcher promotes and is mindful of participants' interactions[34].

The present paper used focus group as qualitative research method because it is based on the plurality of responses, the objective being to obtain data through perceptions, feelings, attitudes and opinions of a group of people, stimulate the participants' creativity and the sense of co-participation, with specific interactions between the moderator and the participants (in the form of questions and answers), but also among the participants (debates).[35]

The focus group was of semi-structured type, meaning that discussions were held around the pre-set theme, but the theme and the questions only had the role of guidance.[36] The questions were clear, in order not to create confusion for the participants, open (to produce elaborate answers), univocal (they referred to a single subject).[37] The focus group was an advantageous method of research because communication was more natural than in the case of an individualized interview, the moderator was able to see how opinions were built and how the interviewed people interact. The research obtained a variety of views and opinions on the debated issue and the focus group has favored the spontaneity and opportunity of each participant to express themself within the limits of availability and competence.

The objective study group was composed of eight participants, both women and men, with different social statuses and different age categories, being selected primarily for their leadership subject interest - they are graduates of a leadership course titled "Leadership. Motivation, Recognition and Success" taught by former minister and ambassador Cristian Diaconescu. As for the professions and occupations of the eight participant, they are: business woman, economist, political communication specialist, engineer, manager, esthetician, doctor in economics - former general manager of a company, philologist. The focus group took place on 4 March 2019 and lasted 45 minutes.

The interview guide contained the following questions:

1. Do you know women in leadership positions in international or Romanian organizations / companies?
2. Are there differences between the way women and men lead an organization?
3. What Romanian female political leaders do you know?
4. How do you feel about the proportion of women and men in Romanian politics?
5. What should women politician do to get more leadership positions?
6. How are the leading political women perceived in Romania?

Regarding the first question related to leading women in Romanian or international organizations, the participants at the focus group have appointed leading women from their own fields of activity, women who were related with their profession and, at national level, they distinguishing names such as: former head of DNA, Laura Codruta Kovesi, Princess Margaret, Prime Minister Viorica Dancila and Mariana Gheorghe, Petrom's first general manager. To note is that most of the names mentioned by the participants are public figures, highly publicized.

Concerning how leading women lead, the second question, focus group participants unanimously agreed that the leader has no gender, in the sense that women leaders and men leaders, once at the top of an organization, must achieve the same goals. Women leaders are not better than the men leaders and vice versa, but different and equally good at leading. There is no stereotype. However, in an in-depth analysis of the way women lead, the following directions of intervention have been noted:

- Employee valorisation is much stronger in leading women. Women have a more human approach, focus on the added value of the team, do not have an approach that stimulates differences between team members, do not encourage competition.
- Men leaders are efficient, quick decision-makers and communicators. The leading women are more personal, much more nurturing.
- Women leaders communicate better than the men leaders.
- Leading women are more emotional, they react emotionally in relation with their subordinates. Leading women treat their employees and work as their own child, with the same love and care.

- Woman by definition is the leader, because she is the de facto leader of the family.
- Leading women treat women employees more coldly.

Also, during the discussion, it was stressed that in order to succeed in the organization she leads, woman leader should be supported by her life partner, meaning that he takes over the family responsibilities. This is because Romanian society still perceives women as being primarily responsible for maintaining the family core and taking care of children.

Regarding leading women politicians, whom the participants at the discussion know, among the mentioned names were: Elena Udrea, Olguta Vasilescu, Alina Gorghiu, Monica Macovei, Corina Cretu and Raluca Turcan. During the discussions on the above question, an idea unanimously accepted by all the participants was outlined, namely that there are no women political leaders in Romania, but women who gain a position at a certain moment, but who do not really have leadership qualities.

As far as the proportion of women and men in Romanian politics is concerned, all respondents agreed that women have a low representativeness, women are not listened because there isn't a strong voice of a woman leader and, ultimately, this reduced participation of women in political and public life is closely correlated with the level of education and social culture of the people. For example, at the local elections of June 5, 2016, the number of men mayor's mandates was almost five times higher than the mandates earned by women. Thus, 3040 men and just 147 women became mayors, the share of the latter being 4.61% of the total number of 3187 elected mayors (Romanian Permanent Electoral Authority 2016). Also in the Parliament voted on 11 December 2016, the people mandated 90 women out of a total of 465 deputies and senators, which represents almost 20 percent.

Focus group participants have failed to identify the way how women can get more positions in the Romanian political space.

At the last question, related to the way in which the women political leaders are perceived in Romania, all the respondents highlighted the preconceived and outdated ideas that the Romanian people in general and the voters in particular have about women in important political and public positions, the cultural filter of the Romanians, the legacy of the inequality between women and men remaining from the Communist era. Also, the focus group participants reiterated that citizens' preconceptions are fueled by the fact that there is still no strong female voices in Romanian politics. The respondents underlined that the general questions of the public when a woman reaches a political position are not related to her competencies but to how she obtained this position and which man leader helped her.

3. Conclusions

Leadership has no gender. Competence should be the only factor that recommends someone to take a leadership role. As the participants at the above presented focus-group stated, women leaders are not better than the men leaders and vice versa, but different and equally good at leading. There is no stereotype. However, by analyzing the differences between the way women and men lead, the focus group presented in this paper verified the theory that Eagly, Wood and Diekman argued in their research from 2000, meaning that women leaders have more communal characteristics than men leaders. Among this characteristics, based on the focus-group analysis, this research highlights: dedicated to valuing their employees, a more human and personal approach of problems, more nurturing with their team, better communicators, more emotional and interpersonal oriented. In other words, women leaders are have a more democratic leadership style than men.

Another idea that emerged from the case-study was that in Romania there are no political women who have leadership qualities, there are no women political leaders or powerfull voices of women in this public field, only women who gain a position at a certain moment. The underrepresentation of women in Romanian political scene is due to the level of educationin gender equity and social culture of the people, to the general perception that women are primarily responsible for maintaining the family core and taking care of children.

Also, this research states that, in Romania, leading women from politics are still seen with preconceived and outdated ideas, through a cultural filter tightly bound of the legacy of the inequality between women and men remaining from the Communist era. Women political leaders are not perceived in terms of competencies and leadership style, but in terms of how they have gained a certain leading position.

It is clear that in Romania women leaders in all fields are at the beginning of their journey to make their voice felt in the public space, but also in the popular mind, political space being a particular case, especially because of the deep masculine rules governing this field.

A future line of research regarding the subject of political feminine leaders in Romania could be how they respond in terms of communication at crisis situations, differently or not from men in similar positions.

ABOUT THE UNIONS OF THE STATE

Milen IVANOV[*]

Abstract

The report examines the current problems related to the mechanisms of the country's accession to different types of alliances. Analyzing the processes and mechanisms for decision-making at the state level, are made the logical for the state administration decisions, related to the adequacy of the inclusion of a country to such groups. The report examines the adequacy of the Bulgarian practice against the international standards for strategic decision making in the state policy and makes important practical conclusions and gives specific recommendations for optimization of the strategic planning and forecasting processes.

1. Introduction

The main subject of international political relations are states and groups of countries. Nowadays, there are about 200 countries in the world. All of them are formally equal subjects of the global community, but their role and status in world politics are not the same. The role of each state in the international political process depends on its geopolitical position, which is determined by the aggregate of data about its current state and the prospects for its future development. These data include information on the location and size of the territory, natural and human resources, methods and purposes of their use, the existing political regime and the general ideological and political orientation of society, etc.

The second kind of subjects of the international political process are international unions. These are different political, military-political, political-economic and other unions, blocs and coalitions. The foundations of their creation lie in the coinciding interests and objectives of the participating countries. These associations may be of a bilateral nature (for example, economic agreements between two countries) and the jurisdiction of such associations does not extend beyond other countries, but may also be multilateral alliances bringing together diverse interests in a common purpose.

With larger geopolitical weight are multilateral interstate alliances. They are, in principle, formed on a regional principle such as the Organization of American States (OAS); Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), members of which, in addition to european countries, are the United States and Canada; Organization for African Unity (UAE), etc. Much of the oil-exporting countries are united by the inter-state organization - OPEC. Islamic countries are participating in the Organization of Islamic Conference (OIC). Body of collective security in Europe (and not only in Europe) is the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

Any effective integration alliance begins with economic integration entails in most cases and political and military integration, but no matter how diverse fields of cooperation remains mainly political cooperation. Since its effectiveness depends largely on solving tasks interactions in other areas as essential acquires political integration, which is closely linked to economic integration, but not identical, and does not represent a phenomenon of a different nature. Political integration is a process by which two or more political units enhance mutual contacts and mutual co-operation. As a desirable or logical end result of the integration process, political unity is often seen.

2. The decisions

Theorize the topic of a union of states, we must clearly realize what is the mechanism that generates the idea of deciding to join a union. Who is the decision maker, what are his or her motives, is there a mechanism that prevents the state from engaging in a conspiracy under the influence of the emotions or ambitions of a separate state governor?

Such solutions should be the result of analysis, forecasting, optimization, economic justification, and choice of alternatives from multiple options to achieve a specific management system goal. The impulse of decisions is the need to reduce the severity or complete elimination of the problems, i. approach in the future of the actual parameters of the object to the desired ones (the forecast).

To solve any problem it is first necessary to answer the following questions:

- for what needs to be done (realization of ideas, solving problems);
- what to do (what new needs must be met or what quality level is needed to meet old needs);
- how to do (technology);

[*] Associate Professor, Lecturer, PhD, Law Faculty, University of Ruse (e-mail: tacsity2017@gmail.com)

- what costs;
- in what amount;
- in what terms;
- where (place, staff);
- for whom and at what price;
- what does it do to the investor and society as a whole?

The management decision is a choice of alternatives carried out by the decision-maker within his / her duties and competencies, aiming at achieving the organization's goals. However, when we talk about the state decision-making process, we have to look at the problem in two ways: either as a separate act, the moment of choosing goals, determining an optimal alternative, or as a sustainable interaction, a process that, in its basic parameters, government as such. Every decision-making should be seen as the epicenter of the government process that concentrates all the efforts of the heads of state bodies, the functions of the structures and institutions, their resources and capabilities in the process of planning.

The state decision-making process can be decomposed into the following milestones in the overall process:

1. Identify priority issues and shape the political theme of the day. At this initial stage, the preliminary information needed to make the political decision is collected, selected and analyzed. The interests, queries and demands of individual individuals, social groups and social unions are studied, identifying priority issues requiring their resolution, and creating a socio-political agenda for the actions expected from government or other state bodies.
2. Development and consideration of alternative options for political solving of public problems. The development of the options for solution is related to the objective necessity of optimization of the choice of the best solution from several alternatives, as well as the subjective goals and pressure to the decision making process by different social forces, often competing with each other and trying to realize project through a political decision.
3. Final choice, formulation and legitimation of state decisions. This is also the main stage in the decision-making process, which in the democratic countries is technologically implemented by the state government with different means of voting or consensus. At this stage, the decision takes on a generally binding form for all citizens within their competencies.
4. The realization and enforcement in the political practice of the state decisions taken. At this stage, management decisions are actually being implemented and transformed into real life. The state administration, depending on the political regime of the country, uses a combination of means (coercion and persuasion) and separate socio-technical means (manipulation, maneuvering, etc.) in order to implement the strategic decisions taken.
5. Control the implementation of decisions and feedback on the results. This is the final stage of the entire decision-making cycle. The lack of control and feedback leads to the fact that the state solution is either distorted or simply ceases to be implemented or even leads to the opposite of its initial outcome. The essence of controlling the realization of a state solution is the constant comparison of practical events and technological operations with the initial model of the political solution, plans and programs.

The practice of implementing state decisions is closely related to two important aspects of public policy: the regulation of public resources and institutional means, tools and means of managing people, that is, the functioning of the political regime in the country.

3. The Knowledge

The logical to this point leads us to the conclusion that the basis of the problem is the adequacy of the decision that the state should join one or another alliance and the correct orientation in the surrounding environment by the decision-makers - the political leaders.

In ordinary life, people make decisions based on the general picture of situations. But when we talk about the statesman, the leader of the state, knowledge at the level of the intuitive, even if it is the level of science, can not be enough. Such knowledge is called practical[1], and when it comes to state policy, it is actually laic, inadequate ...

In the process of political activity higher stage of knowledge is characterized most often by assessing the military-political and military (operational and so on..) Environments. But defining this process simply as an "assessment of the environment / security environment" (as is done in most models of the decision-making process) is not quite right for the following reasons:

1. This stage involves not only assessing the situation, i. E. Considering the value in coordinates ( "good - bad", "useful - harmful", "profitable - unprofitable," "desirable - undesirable", "important - unimportant "," Interesting - uninteresting ", etc.). Here is a synthesis of cognitive and value-Orientation activity, but in particular the dominant role of knowledge. The evaluation is dominant at the previous stage. Here, it is important to gain objective knowledge of the environment.
2. To call what is taught at this stage "environment" is not correct, as is taught not only the environment but also the object, the means and the subject himself. The meaning at this stage lies in the intellectual preparation of the subject for purpose-making, decision-making and practical activity. At the knowledge stage, the object of the activity is finally determined, its properties and relations are studied in detail, and the conditions and factors of the situation are studied in the required volume.

[1] Dmitriev L.P. Introduction to the logic and methodology of military research. M., ВАГШ, 1996;

That war and politics are different things, say only those who do not understand military art. War and politics are aimed at reforming society on the basis of an idea. Therefore, it is more correct to talk about the more comprehensive and more generalized term "assessment of the military-political situation". It is the comparison of the most important components and factors of the real military-political situation with its imaginary image, the standard, on the basis of a certain system of principles, methods and criteria in the interest of the subject of politics. By its nature, this assessment can be retrospective, ongoing, and prognostic. Conclusions made on the basis of the assessments must include the characteristics of the composition, the location and the ratio of the military-political forces (opponents, allies, neutral forces).

The level of tension and stability of the relationship between them and the overall balance between the military, political and economic power of the countries must be determined. Under wartime conditions, it is also important to identify the possibility of impact of these circumstances during and after the end of the war. Criterion for assessing the military-political environment is the practical activity in this sphere. The main method used is the systematic approach method, which allows to identify the elements, the structure and the main factors that influence the formation of the situation and the tendencies for its change. Mathematical modeling, conducting military-political games, imitation, etc. are used as special methods.

The evaluation requires an analysis of a vast amount of information covering many different areas of public life and people's spheres of activity. Therefore, the process of studying and assessing the situation is divided into three main stages:

Preliminary (preparatory) stage. It is related to the decision of organizational, methodological and methodological tasks.

Clarification of the learning object (global, regional, local), objectives and tasks (current or prospective evaluation, purpose of evaluation, issues requiring particular attention). The performers are defined, the system of their actions, the time to solve the tasks, the form in which the results of the analysis should be presented.

The main stage includes the actual process of analysis, evaluation and summarization of the military-political environment, forecasting its possible changes in the near and relatively distant future.

The final stage involves designing and presenting the results obtained in the form of a military policy review, notes, and in some cases also in the form of proposals.

This activity may end with the inclusion of the results obtained in the relevant documents as the basis for the development and adoption of military policy decisions. The main objective of the assessment of the military-political situation in peacetime is to determine the sources and the extent of external and internal military and other (hybrid, traditional, non-traditional, asymmetric, etc.) threats and dangers. In wartime, the purpose of the assessment is to reveal the factors that can decisively affect the course and outcome of war or armed conflict.[2]

Military-political analysis and forecasting is one of the key stages of the governance process in the formation of foreign policy strategies in their parts of securing state security and is used to assess the development of the military-political environment in the world, in individual regions and at the borders of the state.

The main complexities of military-political forecasting are determined by:

- the existence of a large number of varied uncertainties and the incompleteness of the source information;
- limited opportunities and in some cases the inability to confirm the data from the forecast or the results of the experiment;
- the extraordinary complexity of predicting processes (military projection scale, establishing the size of the criteria, etc.)
- the high cost of the forecast error due to unpredictable consequences;
- the limited time to predict dynamically developing events;
- the need to take into account subjective factors.[3]

The main scientific methods of military-political prognosis are system analysis, mathematical (physical) modeling, probability analysis, and heuristic predictive method, a special case of which is the method of expert assessments. When we talk about these purely scientific methods, we can easily conclude that the problem of pragmatic efficiency and immoral, unfair decisions and actions in state politics arises.

4. The role of the head of state

State policy must be geared to national interests and reflect the interests of the majority of the people. In this regard, the State Chief often faces the dilemma or maximum efficiency of political decisions and practical actions in terms of preserving and using their power, or observing moral and legal constraints and caring for national interests. From a philosophical point of view, this dilemma can be presented as the question: What is more important - personal or social, national or all-human interests and goals?

[2] Lutovinov V.I., Motin Yu.N. Military-political processes in the world and in Russia. M., 2004.

This question, broken in the light of what has been said above, leads us to the uncertainty of how and why the State Chief decides to include the state in an alliance or to come out of another. Why do we join or not join a formation? By joining a union, we win an ally and all its enemies - both secret and obvious. Why, however, will someone want us ally? Because we have common interests? No! The main reason is that he wants either our resources or our territory. No third component!

That is why, with the sharpness, it must be placed on the agenda how this decision maker takes this decision. Here are three main hypotheses:

Hypothesis One: The state governor takes a decision on the technology described in the report after all the decision-making procedures have been completed and an assessment of the military-political situation.

The second hypothesis: The statesman decides on the basis of his personal knowledge and experience and intuitively determines the state policy and the most beneficial for state and society.

Third hypothesis: The statesman makes decisions as a result of external (apparent or secret) impact.

5.Conclusions

In order to ensure a prudent and moral government, it is necessary to build a system that eliminates the possibility that various random factors may influence decisions on the accession of the state to different unions. This should only be done when all "for" and "opposing" arguments are examined and analyzed by rigorous scientific methods and according to a standard procedure that minimizes the emotional factor in such state decisions. In order to be able to achieve this in practice, the following must be done:

1. Strengthen the leading role of the National Security Council at the Council of Ministers in the process of drafting and formulating state decisions. The Secretary of the Council should actively contribute to the analytical provision of this process by establishing the links between the purpose and the structures that can provide the scientific and analytical support of the process - the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences, universities, research centers and others.
2. Organize and become a tradition in bulgarian political life so-called "schools for politicians". Because of the peculiarities of the formation of the Bulgarian political elite, people who do not always have the necessary qualities to take on the heights of their responsibility for such decisions fall into positions where important state decisions are to be made.
3. It is high time to create the Academy of National Security to become a specialized research unit where to concentrate the expertise that is needed for the state organization of political processes related to national security, strategic development issues of the state and nation and to ensure that adequate decisions are made on national causes.

The modern world, characterized by turbulent processes in geopolitics, poses a serious challenge to our political elite, and it must react with the necessary wisdom and foresight to bring the state into the calm waters of a safer future. If this elite fails to do so, it will lose its legitimacy and status as an expression of the nation's aspirations and will step up processes aimed at decaying statehood and losing geopolitical weight on our part of the country on the international arena. Such scenarios will put us at the brink of uncertainty and fear of the future and the emergence of uncontrolled political, demographic and economic processes, the ultimate result of which will be chaos - both mental and paradigmatic.

1. Introduction

The child acquires through education norms, values, models that then manifest as personal choices in his behaviour. The formation and development of human personality is therefore an oriented, organized process award thru education.

In this regard, E. Surdu points out that: "Education traces the hereditary provisions, differentiates them, modifies them, speeds up their functioning, adds to their strength, and makes them qualities."[1] At the same time, "the unorganised influences of the environment are directed by education, giving them to man in the pedagogical form, to make them sustainable and consistent."[2]

It is rightly said that one of the defining elements of contemporary society is change. The new millennium we steped in has inherited many social, economic and political problems that, although they have largely marked the last half century, are far from finding their solutions. Among these issues, international terrorism, racism, trafficking and drug use, increasing the number of the poor, the illiterate and the unemployed, etc.

Education seeks to help alleviate these issues through specific prevention actions. Because of the failure to find solutions, we can say that education is in a crisis situation, through crisis understanding the gap between the learning outcomes and the expectations of society.

2. Education

Essential characteristic of the human being and distinct pedagogical category, educability was enjoyed by the majority of researchers in the field of education sciences, being defined as : "the ability of man to be receptive to educational influences and to achieve, in this way, progressive accumulations materialized in different personality structures"[3] or "the ensemble of the possibilities to influence with educational means the formation of the personality of each human individual within the psychogenetic limits of our species and the innate features that give each one its genetic individuality."[4] or "the ability of the human being to be educated, to be subjected to educational action, to benefit from it in the form of its physical, psychological, behavioral development."[5]

From these definitions, we note the fact that regardless of the multitude of ways of defining, educability is a specific attribute of the human being. In this sense, Kant argued that man alone is educated, because he carries in him the possibility of being different than he is. He is perfectible and perfectibility is the sine qua non condition of education[6].

Progress recorded in biological and psychological research since the middle of the last century have prompted most researchers to focus on the factors that contribute to the formation and development of the human being, to its becoming a biological being in the social being:

- Heredity
- Environment
- Education

The distinction between these researchers consisted in accepting or accentuating a particular factor or another.

2.1. Theories about education

On the field of educability of the human being, different positions of pedagogical thinking have been confronted, having as a criterion of differentiation the accentuation to the absolutization of the role of a factor to the detriment of another in forming the personality of man.

Depending on their orientation, the hereditary theories, the ambientalist theories appeared, and the fundamental contradictions between them determined the specialists to adopt a third orientation, namely the theory of double determination.

2.1.1. Hereditary (inherited) theories

These theories support the fundamental role of heredity in becoming the human being, having its origins in biology research. In their view, heredity determines any evolution of man. I. Dumitru and C. Ungureanu[7] believe that the main limitation of this theory is the discovery of environmental factors and education in the becoming of the human being.

Hereditary conceptions inspired extremist theories that claimed the superiority of some races over others.

2.1.2. Environmentalist theories

Unlike hereditary, the representatives of these theories displayed absolute trust in the power and value of socio-educational factors: the environment and education.

They deny the role of heredity. Although they were in the opposite poles, the representatives of ambiental theories, as well as those of hereditary theories, were inspired to support their ideas from the results of biology research:

- Transformational thesis by Jean Baptiste Lamarck, who argued that in the evolution of living creatures, the environment has the fundamental role.
- The theory of heredity acquired: Experienced acquisitions by members of a species would fit into genetic memory and would then be transmitted from ascendants to descendants.

The limits of the two types of ambiental and hereditaryist theories therefore consist in the absolution of the role of a certain group of factors in the formation and development of the human personality, denying others.

2.1.3. The theory of double determination

With the intention of overcoming the unscientific and unilaterally character of these two guidelines, some researchers have adopted a middle position. They recognized the interaction of the three factors: heredity, the environment, education in the process of forming the human being. Future research in human sciences will certainly bring new clarifications on human personality.

2.2. Factors of the becoming of the Human Being

The educator is often tempted to "rebuild" the one he is educating and is entrusted to him. So, he does not take into account the past of the one he educates. But this is a wrong point and researcher H. Atlan wrote, "We always start by going away from something.[8]" This is an individual marked by past or present individual or sociocultural determinations.

2.2.1. Heredity - a premise of psychoindividual development

Heredity is the biological feature of beings that designate the complex of predispositions that are transmitted from ascendants to descendants through genetic mechanisms[9].

Every human is the bearer of the general features of the human species: the bipedal position, the anatomical-physiological structure, the types of reflections, and the hereditary characters transmitted directly from its own ascendants: the color of the skin, the eyes, the face's conformation, certain features of the blood group, etc.

General and particular heredity make up the material substrate of heredity.The concern of researchers who studied the factors of the human being was centered on the determination of the significance and the weight of the hereditary heritage in the formation of personality. The question they posed was whether heredity can be considered a factor with a determined role in this or vice versa. In conclusion, we can say that heredity does not necessarily determine the types of behavior, but only predispositions.

2.2.2. The environment, framework for existence and psycho-individual development

The environment is the set of natural, material and social conditions that make up the framework of man's existence and give him a diversity of possibilities for psycho-individual development. From this point of view we are mainly interested in:

- what is the structure of the environment;
- which structural components of the environment have a greater influence on human personality;
- how the environment is acting upon the becoming of the human being.

The structure of the environment is as follows: depending on the reference moment in human life, before or after birth, we speak of influences of the internal environment and influences of the external environment.

In the prenatal phase, certain internal influences determined by the intrauterine environment are exerted on the child. This influence is not so important, but it can not be neglected either. The totality of external influences exerted on man throughout his postnatal period is the external environment in which a distinction is made between the influences of the physical or primary environment and the influences of the social or secondary environment.

Physical environment is the natural environment in which man carries out his life and encompasses all the bioclimatic conditions (relief, climate) that influence his biological development and maturity (height, skin color) and the way of life (trades, clothing, specific nutrition). Its influences on human psychological development are regarded by experts as irrelevant. Physical environment does not act and does not directly influence man's mental development. The social-human environment is subjected to social determinations that have a much stronger impact on its psychoindividual development.

From the point of view of becoming the human being, we define the social environment as the set of influences that arise from the interaction of man with all the economic, political and cultural conditions that impose their imprint on psychic development[10]. The influences of the social environment on man are:

- direct, by:

− the schemes of conduct offered by the other members of the community to which it belongs. Man applies these rules throughout his life.

− language as a means of communication and transmission of cultural capital and of the whole knowledge accumulated through the group's experience.

- Indirect, by:

− members of the family who play the role of a medium factor between them and social reality and who themselves are influenced in their behavior by the culture of the group to which they belong.

Human behavior reflects the social culture that is incorporated into its thinking and actions, and thereby ensures its transmission from one generation to another. According to H. Hannoun[11], social culture as a product of the social environment, embodied in certain personality structures, has four components:

1. Technological component

Each social group is characterized by a technique and technology to which all individuals adapt. The European man of the 19th century was adapted to the steam car, the 20th century one at the Information Technology, and tomorrow he will adapt to an environment where the computres will be the basis for communication between groups.

2. The ritual component

The level of social habitus implies specific behaviors for learners. Its members respect a certain ritual, and if a person deviates, she will be marginalized in the group (Eg initiative rituals like baptism, circumcision, polite rituals, etc.).

3. The mythical component

Myths are common ways of thinking more or less stereotypical and characteristic of the group.

4. The language component

Language as a means of communication among the members of the group is a characteristic of their similarity and gives them the feeling of belonging to a certain social environment.

The social environment acts on the psychoindividual development of man through the social group that determines a common habit. The main characteristic of the social environment is diversity, non-uniformity. Depending on their impact and content, as well as their degree of organization, the influences of the social environment are organized and spontaneous.

Organized, institutionalized influences from the social environment are exercised by the family and school, but also by various socio-cultural institutions, mass media, etc.

However, the social environment also exerts spontaneous, unintentional educational influences resulting from everyday activities in the child's entire living environment: urban civilization, village life, age groups, circle of friends, etc.

2.2.3. Education, a determinant of psychoindividual development

Education is the decisive factor of the person's psycho-individual development. It systematizes and organizes environmental influences. It has a social function, being the intermediary between man and environmental conditions.

The child acquires through education norms, values, models that then manifest as personal choices in his behavior. The formation and development of human personality is therefore an organized and educated process. In this regard, E. Surdu points out: "Education traces the hereditary provisions, differentiates them, modifies them, speeds up their functioning, adds to their strength, and makes them qualities.[12]" At the same time, "the influences of the environment, not organized, are directed to education, giving them the pedagogical form, to make them sustainable and consistent.[13]"

It is rightly said that one of the defining elements of our contemporary society is change. The new millennium we step in has inherited many social, economic and political problems that, although they have largely marked the last half century, are far from finding their solutions. Among these issues, international terrorism, racism, trafficking and drug use, increasing the number of the poor, the illiterate and the unemployed, etc. Education seeks to help alleviate these issues through specific prevention actions. Because of the failure to find solutions, we can say that education is in a crisis situation, through crisis understanding the gap between the learning outcomes and the expectations of society.

Among the specific and general solutions found, we mention:

- Innovations in the design and development of educational processes;
- introducing new types of education into the school curricula;
- Strengthening links between school and extracurricular activities;
- Initial and continuous teachers training;
- Cooperation between teachers, pupils, parents and local officials;
- Organizing exchanges of information between European States;
- Rethinking the education process in order to successfully integrate young people into professional and social life.

The problems of the contemporary world have led to the formation of new types of education, including:

- Permanent education or adult education;
- Education for democracy and human rights;
- Peace education;
- Environmental education;
- Health education;
- Intercultural education;
- Leisure time education;
- Education for communication and media;
- Education for change and development;
- Education for a new international economic order;
- Modern economic and modern education.

The content, aims and objectives of the new education propose an approach through which education seeks to respond to the demands of the contemporary world and to bring a change in the educational act in favor of education based on innovative, social and adaptable learning.

The important weight of youth in the contemporary structure of contemporary society as well as its ever-increasing contribution to the different spheres of economic, social and spiritual life reinvigorates older and newer discussions and controversies on the status and role of this highly mobile age group creative. Youth is a social category subject to different bio-psychic and socio-cultural determinations, but individualized through a series of age, thinking, skills, mentality and behaviors.

The experience gained by non-governmental and governmental organizations through its programs of information, education, support, guidance, counseling and practical involvement in preventing and intervening in solving cases where children are victims of various forms of neglect within the family and the society in which we live is particularly important and the fact that many young minors fall prey to drug use and criminal offenses, so many of them reach rehabilitation and penitentiary centers for minors and young people as a result of crimes which they commit, justifies once again the importance of addressing all the resources available to combat this phenomenon.

Conclusions

One of the most important functions of the family is the education and training of young people with a view to their optimal integration into life and social activity. Studies on juvenile delinquency have shown that the atmosphere of disorganized families, the lack of parental authority, control, and their affection, as a result of divorce, have led children to adopt social and antisocial acts.

Also, there are some families that, although organized, are characterized by accentuated conflicting states that can be of varying intensity and can extend over different periods of time. In these families, because of their great sensitivity, children receive and live intensely any “event”.

The main effect of conflicting interpersonal relationships within the family on the personality of children is the devaluation of the parental model and the loss of the possibility of identification with this model. Not infrequently children who feel strongly the influences of the familial conflict climate run away from home and seek to find different groups of belonging which, in their turn, can be antisocially oriented. The escape of children is associated with the lack of purely extra-family supervision with a great delinquent potential.

Also, the excessive severity, with many rigidities, with bans, sometimes not brutal, with all sorts of deprivations, leaves its mark on the process of forming the child's personality. Keeping a child in a hipersever climate gradually drives serious changes into one of the most important dimensions of personality translated into a phenomena of apathy and indifference to what it has to do or to the relationship with others.

In the face of the over-hater and hyper-aggressive parent, the child has no alternative but blind obedience, unconditional in relation to his claims that also affect seriously the development of his personality. There are also superprotective parents who have simply invaded the child with emotional investment, but not assuring educational treatment can lead to delinquent conduct, mostly explained by low resistance to frustration.

The research also confirms that there it is a correlation between delinquent conduct and schooling level, meaning that juvenile delinquents usually have a very low level of school education.

It can be said that the level of juvenile delinquency of a country sufficiently reflects the interest and capacity of this society to resolve the difficulties of raising and educating younger generations, and at the same time warns of the gravity and extent of tomorrow's criminality level.

The teenager of these troubled times encounters difficulties and multiple situations of conflict in the course of his integration into the social and legal field. At the microsocial level, preventive programs should aim at revitalizing the educational and social control functions of the main social institutions: family and school.

Measures taken in the family field consist of economic support (eg increasing the current child allowance) or counseling provided free of charge through family counseling cabinets within social welfare networks. The school in turn asks for a rethink of its role and its functioning system. The steps taken in this area were small, perhaps due to the financial difficulties of the last few years.

Organizational changes and changes to the ideas and principles behind school activity are promising ways to prevent delinquency through school.

Three factors are involved in the formation of human personality: heredity, the environment and education. At the same time, the decisive and particularly important role of education in relation to the environment and heredity must be mentioned.

THE FUTURE OF THE NATIONAL INTEGRITY AGENCY AFTER THE CVM REMOVAL. POSSIBLE SCENARIOS

Daniela-Iuliana MĂNTĂRĂU-GHEORGHE[*]

Abstract

The National Integrity Agency is an institution whose establishment and operationalizing has been assumed by Romania in the process of negotiation for accession to the European Union, in order to solve the problems of incompatibility, conflicts of interests and unjustified wealth among public servants and dignitaries. Once Romania joined the EU, in 2007, in order to monitor the fulfillment of the most important commitments of our country, including those related to the above mentioned Agency, the European Commission has set up a mechanism for cooperation and verification (CVM), for conformity and evolution status checking. Through it, the evolution is analyzed and, in this regard, periodic reports on progress are published.

The Agency's whole evolution has been based on CVM since its inception; due to its pressures, recommendations and alarm signals, the institution has been set up, has become operational and has constantly tried to respond to the challenges and aggression that have come from the political representatives. However, in recent years, especially after Croatia's accession to the EU, which has not been subject to such monitoring, there is an increasing phenomenon of CVM disproof in our country, considering that its elimination is urgent and more than necessary; the reason for this attitude is determined by the selective use of such a mechanism only for Romania and Bulgaria, and not uniformly at the level of all the Member States or, at least, imposed as a condition for the newest states accepted in the EU.

Considering the situation of the CVM elimination, which seems to be predictable in the near future, we ask ourselves what will happen to the National Integrity Agency in its absence. An exercise of imagination and a little anticipation lead us to several possible scenarios: 1) the Agency will continue its course according to the progress made so far; 2) it will be discredited, and the political factor will try to eliminate it given the lack of an external pressure and control mechanism – this will affect its efficiency and effectiveness; 3) the Agency will disappear. In this article, all these hypothetical perspectives will be examined one by one, to conclude the feasibility of each of them.

Keywords: National Integrity Agency, CVM, fight against corruption, asset declaration, unjustified wealth, incompatibility, conflict of interest

1. Introduction

The idea of setting up an autonomous administrative body with a role in combating corruption through administrative means has emerged as a commitment undertaken by Romania to the European Union in the pre-accession process, such authority being considered a solution to the problems existing at national level in terms of integrity. Thus, its role in the institutional structure was to identify situations of conflict of interest, incompatibility and unjustified wealth, by assessing the wealth and interests' statements of dignitaries and civil servants.

From the promise to the promulgation of a law regulating the operational activity of the National Integrity Agency, it has been almost seven years (2000-2007). During this time, several successive attempts were made to allocate similar tasks to existing structures or to newly established and abolished mechanisms at short intervals, which were mainly related to the Government's activity. It turned out that none of them fully complied with the requirements assumed by Romania: they did not cover the categories of personnel concerned exhaustively and did not have the capacity to achieve such a large volume of work, quantified in the number of declarations whose filing had to be monitored, which had to be evaluated, the results of the evaluations made public and, in case of irregularities, the competent bodies referred.

Finally, in December 2006, the establishment of the National Integrity Agency was transformed from a national promise made to the European Union into a conditionality imposed by the latter and monitored through the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM), in order to ensure that the assumed commitments are implemented in a timely and appropriate manner. Six months after this decision was taken by the European Commission, Parliament adopted Law no. 144/2007 on the establishment, organization and functioning of the National Integrity Agency. CVM has been both a pressure factor, periodically monitoring the progress, which has involved drawing attention to the skirmishes and exerting the constraint to speed up the process of setting up the new institution, as well as providing support, advice and know-how.

CVM was not introduced for a fixed period of time, the European Commission affirming that it would only be abandoned when all the benchmarks set and monitored were considered to be met. Lately, however, it is almost unanimous to invoke the idea that the Mechanism must be eliminated, either definitively or to be replaced by another instrument. In this context, given the link of the National Integrity Agency's dependence on the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism, it is legitimate to ask what will happen to ANI with the disappearance of CVM. Therefore, the purpose of the article is to try to find answers to this concern through an exercise of imagination and anticipation.

In the beginning, respectively in the first part, will be presented the framework that determined the appearance of the National Integrity Agency, including the promises made to the European Union regarding this aspect; successive, abandoned or approved legislative drafts to set up such an instrument; the analysis of more or less independent institutional structures that have been warranted over the years with powers of control in the field of conflicts of interest, incompatibilities and unjustified wealth; recommendations made by the most important internal and external actors interested in this issue, etc. At the end of the chapter, we will be fully familiar with the trajectory of the National Integrity Agency, from idea to materialization.

The second part follows the evolution of the Agency in the light of a synthesis of the elaborated reports within CVM in the period 2007-2018; they show a difficult path, with frequent changes to the legislative framework, permanent political pressures and attempts to minimize the authority of the institution as much as possible. The reports of the recent years outline a mature institution capable of fulfilling the role for which it was created, despite ongoing attacks by political representatives.

The third part gives an overview of the prospects for the future of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism, showing both the supporters' opinion and the critics' opinion, which will be detailed in the last part of the article. It starts from the hypothesis that CVM will definitely disappear, either permanently or be replaced by a new instrument more suited to current needs. Thus, starting from the existing possibilities regarding the future of the CVM and taking into account the close link between it and the National Integrity Agency, the fourth part was divided in three ways, by means of three possible correlative scenarios regarding the future of the National Integrity Agency with the disappearance of CVM, which we will see at the right time.

2. Establishment, evolution and role of the National Integrity Agency

2.1. General determinant framework

On December 12, 2001, Romania submitted the Position Paper on Chapter 24 – Justice and Home Affairs to the Conference on EU Accession, where, referring to "Combating Corruption"[1], it is noted that, in order to reduce the phenomenon, Romania adopted the National Program for Prevention of Corruption 2001-2004, which will be implemented in accordance with the National Action Plan against Corruption and with the support of civil society.[2]

The basis for the above mentioned program is the World Bank's 2000 study, which highlighted the problem of seizing the state from private interests, a situation that affects how laws and regulations are shaped. The suggested method of solving is, inter alia, "the introduction of transparency in political life through public declarations of income and goods, the declaration of conflict of interests and transparency in party financing", and among the proposed solutions are the amendment of the legislation on the declaration of wealth and regulation incompatibility regime.

In this direction, the National Action Plan against Corruption 2001-2004 includes two objectives:

1. Statement of assets by amending the legislation in force, as well as establishing a mechanism for monitoring the implementation of the legal provisions. The National Crime Prevention Committee[3], together with the ministries and institutions involved, is in charge of this objective, in partnership with the Legislative Council and non-governmental organizations.
2. Regulating the conflict of interest (incompatibility regime) by amending the conflict of interest legislation. The Ministry of Justice is responsible for this objective in partnership with the Legislative Council.

It is only after two years that the first concrete manifestations in the fulfillment of the assumed objectives begin to emerge, with the occurrence of a governmental scandal reflected at European level. Hence, the first key moment was recorded in October 2003, when Hildegard Puwak, the Minister for European Integration at the time, left the Government following charges of violating conflict of interest laws, being suspected of facilitating husband and son of a non-reimbursable 150,000 euro funding through the "Leonardo da Vinci" program[4]. At that time, Prime Minister Adrian Năstase, while publicly asserting Puwak, said that her resignation was necessary "to eliminate the suspicions and the risk that the government would be forced to explain the minor issues instead of dealing with important issues", referring to the accession of Romania to the European Union[5]. This situation had the role of triggering a more serious mobilization at the political level regarding the fight against corruption in Romania. Therefore, there was an attempt by establishing successive mechanisms to act in this direction, which we will enumerate in the following.

2.2. Successive attempts to create an autonomous body to combat corruption through administrative means

a) First attempt (concretized): Government Control Body (2003)

By Emergency Ordinance no. 64/2003, in Article 16 paragraph (1), "the National Control Authority is established, a specialized body of the central public administration, with legal personality, subordinated to the Government, led by the delegated minister for the coordination of the control authorities"[6], and through Government Decision no. 745/2003[7], the role and attributions of this public institution have been established. Under the charge of the Authority, a Government Control Body is created, a structure with its own legal personality, which takes over from the duties and staff of the Prime Minister Control Body and of the control bodies within the ministries and public institutions (which are abolished), and which will act on the basis of full functional and decisional autonomy.

According to the Decision no. 766/2003 on the organization and functioning of the Government Control Body[8], among the attributions and competences of this body are: verification of the notifications regarding the conflict of interests, according to the provisions of Law no. 161/2003[9] (Article 3 (b)); ensuring the coordination of the fight against fraud and protecting the financial interests of the European Union in Romania as a single point of contact with OLAF; coordinating the monitoring actions for the implementation of the National Program for Prevention of Corruption and the National Action Plan against Corruption.

The Control Body assesses any referral or self-dismissal by the Prime Minister regarding the conflict of interest in the exercise of the office of a member of the Government, Secretary of State, Undersecretary of State or Assimilated Function, Prefect or Sub-Prefect; the result of the verifications shall be submitted to the Prime Minister, who shall decide the necessary measures, and the person who has filed the conflict of interest shall be notified, in writing, within 30 days, the manner of settlement.

b) Second attempt (not materialized): Integrity Council (2004)

In September 2004, the Chamber of Deputies passed draft law no. 484[10], aimed at amending Law no. 161/2003, invoking, in the explanatory memorandum, the recommendations of the Council of Europe Group of Anti-Corruption States (GRECO), contained in the March 2002 Evaluation Report of Romania, as well as the fulfillment of the undertaken commitments, the acceleration of the process of accession to the European Union and the closing of the Justice and Home Affairs negotiation chapter.

The draft law was destined to regulate the conflict of interests and incompatibilities by extending the scope to the elected or political appointees and magistrates; defining the public interest and private interest, as well as the opposition between the two; the establishment of a mechanism specific to the Romanian organizational culture, conducting operative research activities and finding conflicts of interests and incompatibilities, called the National Integrity Council.

The Council will be an autonomous body with its own legal personality, under the control of Parliament, organized at national level and functioning in a single structure. It will also have administrative jurisdictional powers and control and sanctioning powers, consisting of 11 members with a technical apparatus, as follows: 1 judge from the High Court of Cassation and Justice and 6 judges from the courts of appeal, appointed by Superior Council of Magistracy; 2 legal advisers from the Ministry of Justice, appointed by the Minister; 2 prosecutors within the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice, appointed by the Attorney General.

At the request of any legal or natural person, or ex officio, the Council will initiate the procedure to investigate conflicts of interest and incompatibilities; following the inspection, it draws up reports on the basis of which, by a majority of votes, it notifies the competent authorities for taking the necessary measures (the body or public authority of the verifiable person, the court competent to declare the nullity of the legal acts issued, the competent criminal investigation body).

However, although it was presented "as a success" at the time, achieved together with civil society and EU representatives, the project was rejected by the Ministry of Finance because it considered costly the establishment of a new institution.

c) Third attempt (concretized): Government Control Authority (2005)

By Decision no. 25/2005 regarding the modification of the List of the Romanian Government, the position of delegated minister for the coordination of the control activities was suppressed[11], and the Emergency Ordinance no. 49/2005 on the establishment of reorganization measures within the central public administration abolishes the National Control Authority, whose resources are transferred to the Prime Minister's Chancellery.

Within the Chancellery, the Government Control Authority is established, a structure without legal personality, subordinated to the Deputy Minister for the control of the implementation of internationally funded programs and the pursuit of the acquis communautaire application. Ergo, the Authority has the task of verifying the application of the acquis communautaire, the efficiency and transparency of the activity carried out by the local public administration and exercises the control ordered by the Prime Minister on the activity of the central and local public authorities and institutions[12].

d) External analyzes on the state of implementation of the commitments assumed by Romania in the field of institutional corruption management (2005)

In October 2005, Romania received a new series of recommendations from GRECO formulated in the evaluation report adopted at the 25th plenary meeting in Strasbourg[13]. The document was elaborated following the application of questionnaires to the representative authorities, the analysis of legislation and other relevant documents, as well as the visit of an expert team (GET) on the spot, from 21-25.02.2005.

The overall objective of the report was to assess the effectiveness of the measures taken by the Romanian authorities to comply with the requirements of the three themes subject to evaluation at the 10th plenary meeting (July 2002), namely: corruption damages; public administration and corruption; legal entities and corruption. At the time of the GET visit, many provisions on conflicts of interest and incompatibilities in the public system had not yet been harmonized and some categories of officials were not subject to these rules. There is still no authority responsible for monitoring compliance with legislation on conflicts of interest, although a draft governmental decision provided for the establishment of a National Integrity Agency with supervisory powers in the field of conflicts of interest and asset declarations.

It has been noticed that the existing system for verifying asset declarations is not effective, as the investigative commission rarely acts. To this, the high level of evidence required to initiate such a process and the lack of a preliminary and independent administrative examination of the declarations to identify actual or apparent violations of the law, undue fluctuations in civil servants' financial statements, conflicts of interest, incompatibilities and forbidden gifts.

By this Ordinance, the Chancellery of the Prime Minister is abolished and some measures are being set for the reorganization of the Government's working apparatus; the reason is that there were overlaps with the work of the General Secretariat of the Government, as well as the unjustified disruption of some competencies.

[13] GRECO – Group of States against corruption, Second Evaluation Round – Evaluation Report on Romania, adopted by GRECO at its 25th Plenary Meeting, Strasbourg, 10-14 October 2005, p. 22, available online at https://rm.coe.int/CoERMPublicCommonSearchServices/DisplayDCTMContent?documentId=09000016806c7c18, accessed on 03.03.2019.

These requests were included by Romania in the 2005-2007 National Anti-Corruption Strategy (NACS) adopted by the Government after the visit of GRECO's experts, whose mission is "to prevent and combat corruption through the rigorous improvement and enforcement of the regulatory framework, through legislative stability and coherence, institutional strengthening of bodies with decisive powers in the field"[14]. According to the Action Plan for implementing the Strategy, one of the measures under the Ministry of Justice is to revise the legislative framework to designate an institution empowered to verify and control the declarations of assets, interests and incompatibilities[15].

At the conclusion of the accession negotiations of 14 December 2004, Romania committed itself to carry out an independent audit of the results and the impact of the National Anticorruption Strategy 2001-2004 and to translate its conclusions and recommendations into a new multi-annual strategy and concrete action plan, to be drafted by March 2005[16]. It was conducted by Freedom House Washington during January-March 2005 and submitted to the Ministry of Justice on 2 November 2005.

The evaluation report "Anticorruption Policies of the Romanian Government", elaborated through the audit[17], shows that during the period 2000-2004, Romania created numerous legal instruments for the fight against corruption, some of which generated positive effects, but others still the impact is expected. Administrative tools to combat corruption are unused, and the alternative seems to be between prosecution (costly, taking into account the level of spread of corruption practices) and the free practice of corruption[18]. Therefore, it is recommended to extend the definition of conflict of interest and to empower a single authority responsible for integrity monitoring (asset declarations, conflicts of interest, incompatibilities), objectives that could be achieved by amending Law no. 161/2003.

It was proposed to transform the National Crime Prevention Council into an integrity check and coordination on the fight against corruption, renamed the Integrity Council. In addition to monitoring and coordination, the Council should ensure that the verification of dignitaries and civil servants at central level is carried out efficiently and objectively. Under the coordination of the Council, a semi-autonomous Integrity Agency (IA) should operate, with a wide range of tasks in the investigation of corruption cases and sufficient human resources and expertise for rapid settlement of cases. The Agency may notify the National Anti-Corruption Prosecutor's Office in case of problems, which, according to Freedom House, should be rebuilt because it is inefficient and lacking in autonomy.

It is considered that the asset and interest declaration forms have been improved. These were introduced for the first time through Law no. 115/1996[19] for dignitaries, magistrates and civil servants, but their content was not public. By Law no. 161/2003, the status of public information was granted to all declarations of wealth and public institutions were obliged to grant free access to them. However, there is no statement completing guide, which leads to a non-uniform practice in this respect. It should be noted that until then, no prosecutor had ever opened a file of forgery in the declaration of wealth.

The NACS 2005-2007 also invokes the "National Report on Corruption"[20], published by Transparency International Romania in March 2005, which characterizes Law no. 161/2003 as imperfect for several reasons: the definition of conflict of interest creates confusion, does not regulate the situations covered by interfering persons, the public interest vs. the personal interest are not defined, and the manner of publication of the statements do not take into account the logistical possibilities of the local public authorities (especially from the rural area), and the local elected ones are omitted from the chapter on conflicts of interest, which has determined the inclusion of the obligation of filing and the form of the declaration of interests in the Law on the Statute of the Local Elected (a solution determined exceptionally by a special law)[21].

Observations on lack of institutional capacity are also relevant to the incompatibility regime. In this respect, the case of the deputy lawyer Iorgovan, against whom no action was taken, was filed, although he represented in court the state secretary of the Ministry of Agriculture, Reman Domocos, arrested for bribery in the SAPARD file[22].

In the matter of property control, TI maintains the finding on the total ineffectiveness of the mechanism provided by Law no. 115/1996, to which were added successive modifications, but without any real effect. The commissions for asset control at the courts of appeal had little but isolated activity, their research being sold in eight years with only two solutions.

Transparency International Romania has made a number of proposals and recommendations, including consolidating in one single institutional mechanism independent of the executive power and the private or group interests of all the powers to monitor conflicts of interest for all categories of persons prescribed by law.

It should be noted that the recommendations made in GRECO, Freedom House and Transparency International Romania's reports on the establishment of an autonomous administrative body to fight corruption by administrative means come after Romania, at the conclusion of the accession negotiations of 14 December 2004, assumed specific commitments, including this. Thus, on this subject, the documents relied on contain in fact only the reconfirmations presented as "recommendations".

e) Fourth attempt (materialized with great difficulties): National Integrity Agency

As a result of the institutional, procedural and normative pressures exerted in the context of Romania's accession to the European Union, in July 2006 an organic law draft on the establishment of the National Integrity Agency appears as a "legislative priority for integration"; it was drafted by Justice Minister Monica Macovei at the time, and it was the subject of heated debates in Parliament[23], where the suitable NGOs also attended[24].

The draft law was amended by the Legal Commission of the Chamber of Deputies (the first chamber notified), for which reason, in the meeting of 23 October 2006, Monica Macovei requested the deletion of the new amendments, arguing that they overlap the activity of the ANI with that of the Police and the Prosecutor's Office, and assign a single purpose to the Agency, to notify the criminal investigation bodies. Representatives of all parliamentary groups have spoken in Parliament to support one or other of the proposed versions of the law, but reaching consensus was far away.

It was not until May 9, 2007 that the Senate (the decision-making chamber) adopted Law no. 144/2007 on the establishment, organization and functioning of the National Integrity Agency[25]. According to Tudor Chiuariu, the Minister of Justice at the time[26], the basis for the establishment of ANI is found in Decision 2006/928/EC, adopted by the European Commission on 13 December 2006[27], which provided for the establishment of a mechanism for cooperation and verification of progress made by Romania in order to achieve certain benchmarks after accession to the European Union, specific to the reform of the judiciary and the fight against corruption[28].

The decision came as a result of the Commission's identification in the last pre-accession[29] monitoring report of unresolved issues regarding the accountability and efficiency of the judiciary. In this respect, on the basis of Articles 37 and 38 of the Accession Treaty, the Commission established a mechanism for cooperation and verification of progress made after accession, which will operate until the four benchmarks are met. Of these, we are interested in benchmark no. 2, which consists of "establish(ing), as foreseen, an integrity agency with responsibilities for verifying assets, incompatibilities and potential conflicts of interest, and for issuing mandatory decisions on the basis of which dissuasive sanctions can be taken".

The Action Plan for the fulfillment of the benchmarks under the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism of Romania's progress in the field of judiciary reform and the fight against corruption[30] was elaborated under the coordination of the Ministry of Justice by centralizing its own contributions and those formulated by the institutions with attributions in the field of the judiciary and the fight against corruption, with the involvement of magistrates, representatives of professional associations and civil society. As regards the benchmark no. 2, the necessary measures for the operationalization of the Agency have been established, namely: ensuring the resources of any nature necessary for the good functioning of the Agency; administrative consolidation; design and operationalization of the management system for the conduct of the control activity; increasing integrity in the exercise of public functions and dignities through preventive action.

As a consequence, through Law no. 144/2010 in the consolidated version (the ANI Law has undergone a series of successive changes so that the new institution can become functional), the organization and functioning of an exclusive and autonomous administrative authority with legal personality and permanent activity was regulated. The newly created institution – the National Integrity Agency – has authority to verify the declarations of assets and interests, ex officio or at the request of any interested natural or legal person, and performs the control of their deposit in due time.

3. National Integrity Agency: between the national political pressure and the CVM magnifier

According to the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism reports from 2007-2018, the National Integrity Agency's track record was a tough one. Achieving results in investigating cases of unjustified wealth, incompatibilities and conflicts of interest was lenient, despite expectations, since the initial version of the law was incomplete and did not allow for the best possible practical action, which led to successive changes. Following the rectifications to Law no. 144/2007, necessary to ensure the functioning of the National Integrity Agency, the basic staff was hired in 2008 and started the first surveys by taking over the information from the press.

Until 2009 inclusive, the evolution seemed to continue, but the conclusions of the Constitutional Court in 2010, formulated following the lifting of some exceptions of unconstitutionality over the National Integrity Agency Act, interrupted the institution's impetus for several months, its activity being suspended until the entry into force of Law no. 176/2010. According to the European Commission, the new legislative framework weakens the institution, introducing, among other things, prescription terms, which has led the Agency to give up some cases. In addition, the general context at this time is characterized by slow judicial procedures, uneven jurisprudence, insufficient interinstitutional cooperation, few signs to the National Integrity Agency from other bodies, institutions that did not comply with the complaints made by the National Integrity Agency etc.

Subsequently, the scale of the Agency's activity began to increase progressively, following several actions that have used specific risk assessments and prioritization of the worst cases. However, by 2013, although the number of National Integrity Agency's verifications and notifications had become significant, the results were not anticipated. It is only from 2013 that the National Integrity Agency begins to present itself as an authoritative institution: it enjoys the support of the Government at that time, concludes agreements with other government agencies for collaboration, reaches a confirmation rate of over 90% of the decisions challenged in court in situations of conflict of interest, and a high degree of credibility with regard to its actions, is becoming more and more involved in the area of prevention during the electoral moments (2012, 2016), it becomes a model of good practices for other European countries and maintains its position even after the resignation of President Horia Georgescu. Problems remain in court proceedings in cases of incompatibility that continue to last for a long time, and the cancellation of contracts affected by a conflict of interest and the poor performance of the public administration in pursuing such cases lead to losses in public finances.

In January 2017, the fight against corruption was called into question by the adoption of an emergency ordinance aimed at decriminalizing abuse of office and a proposal for a normative act aimed at pardoning, disputed measures at national level, which led to its abrogation. In the penultimate CVM report, the European Commission expresses its willingness to provide additional assistance to ensure the irreversibility of progress and thus complete the oversight process.

All the problems identified regarding to National Integrity Agency are related, in particular, to external factors. Its actions were constantly challenged by the political members, dissatisfied with the checks they carried out, and Parliament and some successive Governments have frequently tried to undermine their authority, both through legislative proposals designed to reduce its attributions and affect its outcomes, as well

4. The Future of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism

Recent comments on the CVM's role show a unanimously accepted view, both supportive and critical, that the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism should cease. The supporters believe that due to the Mechanism, important legislative and institutional progress has been made, often as a constraint on deviations from the commitments made. However, evolution has been slow and frequently attacked, with opposition reactions sometimes leading to regressions, which has led to the need for new accountability tools, perhaps even more powerful than CVMs.

It is not clear what form the new mechanisms might take; several approaches are proposed, such as: the continuation of CVM through the renegotiation of benchmarks with 2-year implementation deadlines; creating a simplified CVM procedure and applying it to all Member States; applying the European semester; the realization of a mechanism adapted to the national context. Other suggestions refer to the continuation of reforms under EU programs applicable to all Member States or under existing national instruments.

Critics have all been of the same opinion that the application of CVM has not led to the anticipated effects and outcomes, so the role of the Mechanism should not be exaggerated. They say that during the European Commission's monitoring, reforms in the pre-accession period have not been maintained, a situation found in the ongoing attempts to amend anti-corruption legislation. It is also noted that models from outside can not be taken and applied without regard to the Romanian specifics and context. There have been no radical reforms, but only surface, because even though official rules have been adopted, they have not been put into practice in real terms. Also, when distinguishing between the impact of compliance and the impact of problem solving, it is found that the view on both is negative – first, due to lack of enforcement powers, and the second due to the deficiencies of the mechanisms, including CVM, reflected by inappropriate recommendations, unconscious practice, etc.

Absence of cooperation and full use of monitoring, loss of motivation in the fight against corruption after accession and its support only at declarative level, lack of mechanisms for guaranteeing the implementation of anti-corruption strategies, constantly changing the requirements and recommendations of the benchmarks, exclusive use only for Romania and Bulgaria – all these affect the efficiency, effectiveness and even legitimacy of CVM. All of the above will be detailed in the next chapter.

5. The Future of the National Integrity Agency in the absence of CVM. Possible correlative scenarios

According to the reports developed and published under the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism, the National Integrity Agency's path was extremely difficult, marked by legislative ambiguities, the desire of the political factor to control it (both from a normative and budgetary point of view), lack of interinstitutional cooperation, corruption in the judiciary, amateurism in institutional organization, lack of will to fight corruption in the public system, etc. Thus, one can notice a constant attempt of institutional isolation of the Agency in the public system, as it was perceived as a threat to the traditional practices of dignitaries and civil servants, in the form of incompatibilities, conflicts of interest and unjustified wealth.

In 2010, the institution was marked by major changes. This happened as a result of a contradiction in terms of Myeong-Gu Seo and W.E. Douglas Creed[31]: One of the premises of institutional theories is that the success of an organization depends on factors rather than on technical efficiency; organizations gain the legitimacy and resources needed due to isomorphism with institutional environments, which can lead to conflicts with technical activities and efficiency requirements. Thus, the contradiction takes place between legitimacy and institutional efficiency. The National Integrity Agency had the goal of achieving technical efficiency, which contradicted the rapid gain of legitimacy, as it depended on the proximity to the political factor (legitimacy was offered by politics). The interference of the political factor, however, did not correspond to the objective of establishing the Agency, which wanted to be an independent and impartial control body.

Generally speaking, the vision of CVM reports on the course and functioning of the National Integrity Agency is a positive one, and the delays in its operation are caused not by the lack of professionalism and ethics of its staff but by the interests of the political factor that has always tried to manipulate the evolution of the institution, so that the impact of its actions will be as low as possible for the dignitaries and civil servants in Romania.

According to the latest reports, the Commission's recommendations based on the findings have been fully complied with. The only major issues that remain to be discussed and resolved are those related to the non-uniform and non-transparent application by the Parliament of final judgments and the lack of a unitary legislative framework on integrity; these are however independent aspects of the National Integrity Agency and have been consistently repeated in the CVM reports without any response to date.

Lately, there is a growing debate about the need to continue or not to monitor Romania through CVM. Some voices, both at national and European level, consider that all benchmarks have not been fully met, so CVM needs to continue; on the opposite side, it is considered necessary to "lift" the CVM because it is believed, or at least publicly expressed, that Romania has responded to the requirements established by the Mechanism, or that progress is registered and irreversible, and evolution will continue even in its absence. Those who want to pursue the CVM fear that, to the contrary, national anti-European political factors and pursuing certain private interests would have every reason to hinder the continuation of any reform or, even more, to influence things in the sense of regress, in this hypothesis targeting the National Integrity Agency.

Hence, in the sense that monitoring through the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism will cease, it is legitimate to ask what the future of the National Integrity Agency will be in its absence. As an exercise of imagination and anticipation, we can think of a series of hypothetical situations about the National Integrity Agency's path with the disappearance of the Mechanism.

a) Scenario 1: The National Integrity Agency will continue its course according to the progress made so far

In tackling this scenario, we are based on an official study conducted at the level of the European Union. Thus, in January 2018, the European Parliament published an analysis entitled "Evaluation of the 10 Years of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism for Romania and Bulgaria"[32], which aimed to achieve the CVM balance sheet so that a support strategy to be outlined for the coming years.

According to the study, CVM was a compromise solution, given that Romania had applied to join the European Union but was not considered ready; if the Mechanism had not existed, our country would not have been able to join in 2007, or, if this had happened, the reform process would have been longer to achieve results. If at the beginning of the monitoring period the emphasis was on introducing new laws to promote CVM objectives, the focus is now on reforming and strengthening their irreversible character.

The Commission's reports of 2014, 2015, 2016 and 2017 highlight a positive trend. Significant legislative and institutional progress has been made, and civil society involvement has been crucial in encouraging reform of the judiciary and adopting significant anti-corruption measures. The pace of evolution has been sluggish in some stages, mainly due to several areas where the reform has been difficult or encountered resistance: doubting the independence of the judiciary and the authority of judgments, as well as attempts to reverse the reforms that were obvious at beginning of this year, in the Romanian Parliament. Thus, it is considered that reporting and accountability mechanisms should be maintained after the CVM is completed.

Therefore, according to the analysis, monitoring should be continued, even if the stage reached has been appreciated: "(...) measures should be taken to replace the CVM mechanism with a (stronger) monitoring framework, managed even by the Romanian authorities. Otherwise, there is a risk of slowing or even regressing the reform process"[33]. At the same time, if the recommendations of the latest CVM reports are not applied, the issue will be "whether the CVM will be closed if it continues without changes or if a completely different approach is adopted"[34].

Continuing monitoring is necessary for a number of reasons: getting closer to the average European standards, combating organized crime and high-level corruption, attracting investors from other Member States, fighting against European fund fraud, executing court decisions, etc.

Given the above, it is clear that even if the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism was eliminated, it is intended to replace it with a new form of control, which would undoubtedly allow the National Integrity Agency to continue its work and progress so far, with no fear of interference with the political factor.

b) Scenario 2: The National Integrity Agency will be discredited and try to eliminate it without having an external pressure mechanism

Sedelmeier & Lăcătus, researchers at the London School of Economics and Political Science, through the article "Post-accession Compliance with the EU's Anti-Corruption Conditions in the 'Cooperation and Verification Mechanism': Bite Without Teeth?"[35], assessed the CVM's influence on internal changes anti-corruption policies.

First, it is mentioned that CVM is a monitoring tool, not a coercive one, so there is no connection with certain sanctions. Secondly, when studying the impact of CVM, we need to distinguish between the impact on compliance – the extent to which the state meets the requirements and recommendations in the reports – and the impact on problem solving – the extent to which corruption effectively diminishes.

The paper notes that there is no clear evidence that the positive image determined by CVM compliance also leads to an effective improvement of corruption issues. However, the authors suggest that a CVM compliance analysis is useful, because it can leave room for optimism, while the analysis of the Mechanism as a tool and its impact on corruption tends to be more critical. The first aspect focuses on institution building and the creation of a legislative infrastructure, and although these do not translate directly or immediately into improved corruption control, they are not negligible as they can create favorable conditions for certain changes.

It is appreciated that in Romania, CVM has supported the creation of strong institutions, including the National Integrity Agency. A new generation of young, motivated and well trained civil servants has used these institutional powers to fight corruption. The creation of this institution has allowed progress in investigating high-level corruption cases, which were very limited until 2010. After the CVM report of July 2010 was extremely critical of the attacks on the National Integrity Agency, the Parliament voted for the restoration of powers, although they have been weakened, by limiting the scope of investigations and eliminating commissions for wealth control. Overall, however, the achievements of the National Integrity Agency have led to a significant increase in public confidence in the institution[36]. Without this body, many cases of conflicts of interest, incompatibilities and unjustified wealth would not have been identified, despite the need for transparency in the field.

However, its impact is still fragile, as a parliamentary coalition seems to intend to limit anti-corruption activities. While this threat weakens progress, this is where CVM comes into play as it has served as a constraint in derailing the fight against corruption, but we must not exaggerate CVM's ability to bring about positive change without an internal initiative. Instead, the impact of the Mechanism is primarily that it limits the ability of Parliament and the Government to openly block anti-corruption efforts and, in particular, to eliminate past institutional achievements.

Therefore, with the disappearance of CVM, there is a possibility that the political factor may continue to try to weaken the authority of the institution and discredit it, this time without hindering in any way the external monitoring tool. Bringing the National Integrity Agency into a shadowy cone and assigning a formal role to it without a real substance seems a situation not far from materializing. The permanent appeal of the Agency from its establishment to the present day determines us to go free to this idea, and the mere fact that the institution is appreciated at European level would cause the political factor not to definitively disband the National Integrity Agency.

c) Scenario 3: The National Integrity Agency will disappear with the CVM lifting

The selective use of CVM in the case of Romania and Bulgaria, Sedelmeier & Lăcătuș points out in its above-mentioned paper, jeopardizing its legitimacy, not being applied to all Member States and even to Croatia, the last state that has joined the EU. Thus, one can speak metaphorically about a "hostage-taking" case that threatens negative consequences and decreases the legitimacy of the Mechanism. In addition, although benchmarks have remained the same over the years, the list of requirements and recommendations under each of the criteria is changing permanently, because some issues are abandoned and new areas of interest are added to the agenda. Also, the limited impact on the problems CVM has to address (corruption, organized crime and the judiciary) is determined by its shortcomings – inadequate recommendations, inconsistent application, lack of focus on practical application, and sometimes deeply rooted cultural ties of post-communist societies.

Martin Mendelski, in the "Romanian Rule of Law Reform: A Two-Dimensional Approach"[37], deals with the question of the rule of law from a two-dimensional perspective, namely, a dimension of judicial capacity and a dimension of judicial impartiality, they being necessary both individually, but which must also be common enough for real progress. In the analysis, the author proposed to show that the two dimensions developed differently in Romania, because, while the judicial capacity has improved for the most part, judicial impartiality remained relatively unchanged. Particular attention is also paid to the role of external and international actors, in particular the potential transformation role of the EU in promoting internal change during and after the pre-accession period.

According to the author, the EU's commitment to the rule of law in Romania has not produced any vertical changes, but has led to superficial reforms that have left the existing power structures unchanged. The result was the adoption of new well-developed rules but which, in practice, have not been implemented, and measures to reform judicial capacity have advanced more rapidly than reforms of judicial impartiality.

Moreover, the pace of reforms has not been maintained after accession. What should be considered are attempts to modify anti-corruption legislation previously adopted or to diminish the power of anti-corruption agencies, recalling here the decision of the Constitutional Court that declared the first version of the law on the National Integrity Agency unconstitutional. According to the European Commission, the revised and less strict version of this law seriously undermines the process of verification, sanctioning and confiscation of unjustified assets. The Commission also noted that exceptions of unconstitutionality continue to delay high-level corruption cases and corruption-related crimes remain lengthy, with only a few prominent politicians at first instance.

[36] Ibidem, p. 19.

[37] Mendeslki, M., „Romanian Rule of Law Reform: A Two Dimensional Approach" in Romania under Basescu: Aspirations, Achievements, and Frustrations during His First Presidential Term, Lexington Books, New York, 2011, pp.155-179.

From the empirical analysis, Mendelski found that some of the issues came from anti-corruption bodies. The selection of staff at the National Integrity Agency was made in an unequivocal manner. The recruitment procedure allowed the recruitment of interviewed persons (rather than written exams) by leaving them room for the preferential treatment of politically connected persons who, although young and reformed, can not always be considered the most competent. The National Integrity Agency and similar bodies were created by emergency ordinances and amendments that are supposed to be inconsistent with the existing constitution. Therefore, ironically, the rule of law was promoted by agencies that might be considered outside the rule of law. The creation of new surveillance agencies does not cause any transformation, unless the actors appointed within them change their mindset.

Creating the rule of law is a complex process in which models can not simply be translated from abroad, and this is demonstrated by the Romanian case. Even when similar formal rules are adopted and judicial capacity is extended, efficacy can be undermined by powerful political actors who use methods of influence in the absence of transparency and supervision. Also, the results are not necessarily better when creating new formal institutions sensitive to the Romanian context. Old habits die hard, especially when they are protected by rooted interests.

Given the above, we are facing a discredited CVM, even considered illegitimate, which did not cause a real positive impact on Romania, but only superficial effects. Consequently, for the authors mentioned above, the lifting of the Mechanism does not affect the situation at all, because internal decisions have not depended on and will not depend on it, but on changing mentalities, a situation that can not occur in such a short time. Power structures remained the same over time, so real progress could not be recorded because there was no interest in doing so. Therefore, with the disappearance of CVM, the National Integrity Agency may disappear too (not necessarily simultaneously but slowly), as the institution is not seen as effective and efficacious in the fight against corruption, given the conditions of its establishment and functioning, mentioned by Mendelski. In addition, it seems irrelevant whether the National Integrity Agency continues to exist or disappears because, without a radical transformation of the way of thinking in Romanian society, this institution does not appear to eliminate considerably the existing practices in the field of conflicts of interests, incompatibilities and unjustified wealth.

Conclusions

Summing up all of the information presented above, we were able to pursue a four-step structured study of the past and future of the National Integrity Agency. Thus, on the one hand, we tried to understand its place and role on the Romanian institutional map, its essential link with a monitoring mechanism established at the European Commission level (CVM), and its ineluctable dependence on the latter; on the other hand, we figured out what could happen to the National Integrity Agency with the removal of CVM, since its entire course, from its establishment to the present, depended and was influenced by it.

The first step consisted in analysing the moments that preceded the attempts to set up an autonomous administrative body, as a measure taken by Romania in the process of joining the European Union, in order to show its involvement in the fight against corruption. There were listed the structures previously established by the National Integrity Agency, a kind of incomplete political annexes, with a superficial role and a lack of clarity, which is the reason why none of them resisted for a long time. The data presented showed their ineffectiveness and inefficiency, as no quantifiable results were recorded from their activity. It is only from 2005 that the problem of setting up this body has been seriously raised, together with the National Anti-Corruption Strategy 2005-2007, which was based on a series of external recommendations. After two failed legislative projects in 2005 and 2006, the momentum of utmost importance was the decision of the European Commission in December 2006 to establish a Cooperation and Verification Mechanism to follow the commitments made by Romania. It was only in mid-2007 that the legal framework for the establishment of the National Integrity Agency was adopted.

The second step consisted in briefly presenting the National Integrity Agency's pathway as reflected in the CVM reports, whose role is to monitor the smooth running of the work and to formulate recommendations for correction of deviations, when it is necessary. It has been stated difficulties encountered by the Agency in its operationalization and functioning, including issues related to the unconstitutionality of several articles of Law no. 144/2007. Consequently, the debut was a difficult one, but the obstacles were perpetuated, given the constant negative attitude of the political factor regarding this institution.

The third step was defined by general considerations on the future of CVM. We have seen that both supporters and critics want to end it, even if for different reasons: first, in order for the Mechanism to be replaced by a new instrument to take over its functions, but more adapted to the current reality, perhaps even stronger, and the last because they have never seen its usefulness and believe that it has not produced any real effects, since after Romania's accession, Romania lost its motivation in the anti-corruption fight.

In the last step, the two visions mentioned above were deepened by presenting some representative bibliographic references. The most important aspect was the correlation between the future CVM and the future of the National Integrity Agency, as the Agency was set up and operates as a direct result of the establishment of the Mechanism. Considering the close link between the two, we tried to imagine what could happen to the Agency with the disappearance of the Mechanism. We have reached three possible scenarios: 1) The National Integrity Agency will continue its work in line with its progress, because it has a very good image at the European Union level and its results are considered satisfactory; 2) it will be discredited and try to eliminate it, the only restraint that would prevent this from happening could be the accusations made by European officials; 3) will disappear with CVM, if the views of those who believe that the impact of the Mechanism did not have a real substance and the situation would be similar, with or without the Agency, will prevail.

In the next period, once the destiny of the Mechanism is decided, we will see which scenarios are more feasible. If the course of the Agency is going to follow any of these, future research could start from our study and can be continued by trying to answer the question "Why did you choose this solution?", analysing, in this regard, all the decisive factors. If the scenarios do not come true, the study can be continued by analysing decisions that have determined another perspective. Moreover, new research could extend the CVM's relationship analysis to the other three benchmarks monitored to follow their evolution since 2007, the current stage vs. expectations, as well as launching potential scenarios for their future with the lifting (rising) of the CVM.

ASPECTS OF ETHICAL MANAGEMENT IN TODAY'S EUROPEAN UNIVERSITIES

Elena NEDELCU

Abstract

The present paper is a theoretical one. Firstly, this paper attempts to reveal to what extent the 21st century universities – with all the characteristics of this period - are concerned about ethical problems.

And if universities are still concerned about this issue, this paper aims to point out to what extent universities are able to create their own values and to transmit them to the others within the present context in which there is an unprecedented interdependence of social domains, a fact which generates negative effects on their autonomy.

There are ethical problems in all universities, domains and societies. The question is how these problems are tackled and if there is a reaction to them or not. We are particularly interested in the young people's attitude. Do young people react to these problems or do they remain indifferent to the ethical problems existing in the academic world?

How do young people relate to the ethical problems in a society that underwent a long period of transition, and of anomie, too? Does ethics remain, like politics, a second hand concern for most of young people in our society?

The present paper also deals with important aspects of ethical management in universities. If we consider some European - including Romanian - research work on this issue, we can notice that they simultaneously present the educational managers' opinions and the students' opinions on the characteristics of ethical management in present universities.

Keywords: ethics, values, autonomy, ethical management, student.

1. Introduction:

Brief analysis of the 21st century education

Motto: Education must /.../ be a continuous process of training human beings who are fulfilled as far as their knowledge, abilities, critical spirit and the capacity to act are concerned; education must allow individual development, the openness of every individual towards environment; it must allow the individual to play a social role both at work and in community (Delors Report, 2000, p. 14).

The mentality according to which the main goal of education is to create adapted individuals and capacities that help them face market needs, competitive, conscious and disciplined producers is obsolete and deeply wrong.

Today, everywhere, so much the more in communist countries, where we often identify profoundly individualistic forms and a tight economic and political competition (sometimes quasi illegal or completely illegal), education is meant to contribute to the formation of a new and essentially ethical humanism. Ever since 2000, The Delors[1] Report pointed out that the pressure put by economic and political competition has determined many of those who had a decision-make position to ignore the universities' mission, i.e. "the mission of offering each one the means that are necessary to benefit to the largest extent from an opportunity".

This situation is identifiable especially in the former communist countries, which underwent a long transition period, a period of anomie and of denial of morality.

In these countries and not only, many agree with the idea that there are solid and "multiple reasons for focusing again on the moral and cultural dimensions of education, so that each of us could perceive the others' individuality and understand the uncertain direction that the world follows towards unity (….); this process must begin with self-knowledge, with an inner voyage whose landmarks are knowledge, reflection and self-criticism."[2]

Fast kinetics, technological and communication progress, the ever increasing globalization phenomenon are new challenges for education, which warn it about a paradigmatic modification in its approach. Trying to face this challenge, we can see that more and more perspectives have appeared, which clearly and insistently put the stress on the training and moral dimensions of today's education, and on the need to develop a moral society. The Delors Report comes up with these perspectives. Sharing the same vision, A. Touraine underlines the huge importance played by moral values in today's society. He considers that "today's <<IT>> and <<programmed society>> –"is a society in which moral categories play a central role, the role played once by political categories, being followed by the economic ones and, before modernity, by religious thinking".[3]

Other perspectives, and not differently from the first ones, point out the role of education in creating individuals adapted to technological changes, to the IT epoch and the globalized world, etc. According to these perspectives, taking into account the characteristics of the 21st century, education should insist less on information and abilities and more on the 4 C's: , i.e.: "critical thinking, communication, collaboration and creativity". The educational system will be able to prepare young people that are capable of facing today's alert rhythm of changes only by developing the "4 C's"[4].

The simple assimilation of the "4C's" may be enough for helping young people keep up with the world; however, nowadays, young people, like the young people of other times, aim at more than that. They are and they want to be the subjects of a new world, they are the ones who build a new and enduring world, at least we hope so. In accomplishing their mission, they need a 5th C, i.e. the ethical compasses, moral principles and values. Young people feel the need of having a moral basis and education that supports their knowledge.

The Delors Report upholds that education has for basic pillars: "Learning to know", "Learning to do", "Learning to be", "Learning to be with the others", offering a special attention to the last one.[5] However, one cannot have a good and pleasant life with the others if he/she does not learn to respect the moral values and norms of our society.

In conclusion, the educational act – at all levels (including the academic one) – should not be a simple transfer of knowledge, but it should also imply an assimilation of values. Education should draw our and the others' attention and make us and the others aware of the ethical mission the the act of "being together" involves us in. In other words, the mission of universities is not only to produce and transmit knowledge and landmarks, it is not only to train specialists and researchers, but it is also to create cultivated and civilized persons, persons who have a beautiful character.

Ever since 1943 Leavis has seen the univerity as "a a shelter of consciousness and humanity in the middle of the inhuman pressure and difficulties of the modern world, and a center in which intelligence /.../ is able to apply an elaborated system of values and to dedicate itself to the problems of our civilization.[6]

2. Debates on university autonomy and the capacity of universities to produce and transmit values

The importance of the role played by the university in producing and transmitting values, as well as in teaching the "right behavior" to the young generation, was the main topic of the Colloquium Institutional Autonomy, Academic Freedom and Imposture in the Academia – Do Academic Core Values Safeguard Against Corruption?", which was held in 2018 at the New Europe College in Bucharest. On the other hand, there are departures from a correct system of values and principles (bribery, extortion, favoritism, nepotism, salaries paid to "phantom" teachers, issuing false diplomas, etc.) "represent, maybe, one of the most malign acts that a society can do against itself."[7]

As the principle of competition has started to prevail on social and economic thought, it is necessary for the university to maintain its position as a place where moral values and principles are cultivated, a fact which will be later seen in the common welfare, and also to remain autonomous, i.e. not to let itself be absorbed by the market mechanisms.

The capacity of universities to maintain their autonomy in relation to nowadays society, with its economic and political environment, and to produce and transmit its own values has made room to a series of discussion in specialized literature.

There are points of view[8] according to which universities do not appear to be institutions that are based on fundamental values, but as organizations which are limited to offer technical services, to voluntarily accept the values imposed on them by their main beneficiaries, especially by the government and the industrial sector.

Thus, ethical issues are endangered to become secondary rather than fundamental issues in modern societies, being directly linked to the main mission of the university. In this context, one can notice that, as to teaching, important debates, such as the ones related to the development of the curriculum, are replaced by debates on the policies and procedures that are meant to prevent or punish plagiarism among students.

The same situation can be noticed as far as research is concerned. The ethics of research is no longer concerned with the morality of military or commercial sponsorhip of the research company; it is, instead, concerned with narrow issues, such as the technical ones, e.g.: presenting incorrect practices and maintaining an accurate research methodology.

[8] Peter Scott, L'étique « dans » et « pour » l'enseignement supérieur, dans: L'Enseignement Supérieur en EuropeVolume XXIX Numéro 4/ 2004, UNESCO-CEPES, pp:439-451).

Peter Scott[9] noticed that, besides the mitigation of ethical bases, the lower and lower intellectual level and traditional standards, universities are often criticized for their incapacity to act independently and efficiently as critical institutions of our society. However, according to him, presenting the real situation of univerities today requires a more detailed description. Distinguishing between the elite universities and the ordinary ones, according to Peter Scott, the former ones have managed to maintain a critical distance from society – according to the general opinion. They have managed to develop their own values system – which are in line with the ones of our society, but which are, however, different – which they have spread through their research work and the scholarships offered to students, and, especially, thanks to their role in forming elites. On the other hand, the development of a knowledge-based society has led to the disappearance of the borders between politics, market, science and culture.

The university – one of the most dynamic institutions in the knowledge-based society – is among the most affected ones by this erosion. Thus, its success in solving scientific and social issues has also generated a loss of its autonomy. The autonomy loss has been greater in the case of mass higher education, which is „based rather on instrumental than liberal (or academic) values", and which is „more oriented on professionalism and less on the scientific dimension". One cand speak about a loss of its capacity to generate its own and distinct systems of values.

A more subtle and more profound analysis – according to Scott – brings into evidence the fact that the relation between higher education and the knowledge-based society is much more ambiguous and complex. „The higher education institutions go across (..) knowledge-based society at different levels – starting with the advanced research and technologies that are developed worldwide, and continuing with professional and technical elite training, to finish with the training of the alumni that graduate universities. If some refer to an even deeper incorporation of higher education in the knowledge-based society, others, on the contrary, uphold the independence of the higher education system - or, if not its independence, the dependence of other social or economic institutions upon the higher education system (Scott, 1999)."

Professor Lazăr Vlăsceanu[10] - the Faculty of Sociology and Social Assistance, the University of Bucharest – considers that we must ponder over the link that exists between university and society without underestimating the idea of value and without encouraging imposture. He also considers that traditional academic values should neither disappear nor be misinterpreted.

As to the link between the capacity of universities to produce their own system of values, opinions are optimistic, trustful and expressed with courage. In fact, some studies demostrate that higher education could not exist without such a set of values. Thus, we can speak about the existence of a set of values that are common to higher education, i.e.:[11]

- the commitment to search for the truth;
- the responsibility to share knowledge;
- freedom of thought and expression;
- the thorough analysis of proofs and the use of rational arguments when trying to reach a conclusion;
- the wish to listen to other points of view and to judge them in conformity with their value;
- considering the way in which our own arguments will be perceived by the others;
- the wish to consider the ethical implications of certain results and practices.

A research work [12] accomplished in Great Britain in 2007 reveals the young people's opinion as to the difficulties that universities encounter in manifesting their autonomy, in expressing academic values in relation to the traditional ones. This work points out fundamental aspects for understanding the ethical problems with which higher education confronts in its attempt to create and deliver values in our society. Of the key statements included in the questionnaire (with which British students partially or agreed or agreed on the whole), I have selected the ones that seem to be actual for the Romanian academic environment, i.e.:

a) Higher education has lost its role of being a critical consciousness within society;
b) The fear to "speak the truth to those who have power" due to the limits imposed by a culture of brutality and culpability;
c) The pleasure of studying has diminished because attention is focused on developing the skills that alumni will need as labour force at the workplace;
d) The integrity of research work has been doubted: through pressure imposed for publishing a paper prematurely or through commercial pressure or through pressure imposed by the sponsor's expectations (e.g. for project orders);
e) Pression imposed by performance indices has generated a certain lenient attitude at exams for maintaining high admission rates and for maintaining a high number of students;
f) Less effort is made for developing an ethical consciousness and a feeling of civical and individual responsibility among students;
g) The university concentrates more and more on the system and less on the people; thus, the human and passionate dimension that higher institutions used to manifest is lost;

h) Competition seen as an ethical value has diminised cooperation among the academic staff;

i) If higher education must serve the public welfare, then the latter is redefined as being economic competitiveness and wealth.

j) Defining and understanding what a mistake/a professional error is are understood today differently by the academic world, so that behavior which previously was unacceptable is now tolerated. This is seen among students, too (or especially) and also among academic staff (to a less extent, however).

k) Nowadays, the students' behavior and expectations are more pragmatic; they are content to obtain a diploma/qualification.

In conclusion, students appreciate that the role of the universities as creators and suppliers of values in society has diminished. They doubt the integrity of research work and the capacity of the university to manifest its role of a critical consciousness within our society They consider that the unviersity is less implied in developing ethical consciousness and civical responsibility among students. Students think that the level of performance and their aspirations, as well as the pleasure of studying, have diminished considerably.

3. Apects regarding ethical management in universities.

Today, ethical exigence has become an integrating part of any institution's image, so much the more of an academic one. Actually, functioning on the basis of ethical values and principles is not just a premise, but also an essential condition for a university in its attempt to accomplish its mission and objectives.

Repeatedly breaking ethical values and norms leads to malfunctioning and seriously hinders academic activity. In order to avoid such a situation, drawing up an ethical code in the university – as it sometimes happens with some of our universities – is not enough. It is necessary to disseminate it within the organization, to make sure that is is observed and to solve the potential ethical problems that might occur; in other words, an ethical code serves to imply ethical management. We agree with D. Menzel, according to whom, "ethical management does not imply the control and sanctioning of the personnel's behavior, or pondering over the ethical issues at workplace. It is rather the whole set of actions that are developed by the managers in order to stimulate ethical consciousness and sensibility that would finally protrude all the aspects of the organizational activities. It is, briefly speaking, promoting and maintaining a strong ethical culture at the workplace." [13]

Ethical management – according to this author – can be approached in four ways: the first approach is based on conformity (compliance), i.e. defining and imposing ethical rules within the organization; the second is the strategy of including in the cost, which consists of approaching all unethical actions as a cost factor that has to be deduced, mitigated or eliminated; the third strategy is learning, which lays stress on the ethical training processes and on the assimilation of ethical dispositions; the fourth strategy is the one of creating a moral organizational culture, which seems to be the most promising of all since it implies all the other ones.

In fact, things are more complicated than theory makes them see. Managers often face up with difficulties related to the possibility of clearly and concretely defining and measuring the morality of an organization. How can we describe an organization that is renowned for integrity? What are the principles according to which a moral organization functions?

C. MacNamara considers that[14] an organization is moral if it respects at least the following four principles: a. It naturally interacts with various beneficiaries and its basic rules make the beneficiaries' welfare be perceived as part of the organizational welfare; b. The members of the organization are extremely sensitive to the topic of impartiality: their basic rules stipulate that the others' interests matter as much as one's own interests; swindling and exploiting clients is their nightmare; c. Responsibility is regarded as being rather individual than collective; one cannot hide behind the organization; its members must be individuals that assume personal responsibility for their organizational actions; d. They regard their activities as objectives; an objective is an operating mode that is very much cherished by the members of the organization and that links them to the external environment.

As it is the case with any organization, universities must define and assess their moral environment and identify the virtues that confirm its existence. According to Kaptein[15], the existence of the following seven organizational virtues assures us that a university is moral:

a) Clarity: the extent to which the university moral exigence in relation to the behavior of its members are expressed clearly, without ambiguities, as a set of rules or behavior directions within the ethical policies and procedures, as well as within informal discussions.

b) Consistency: the degree to which university moral exigence in relation to its members' behavior is coherent and lacks contradictions and it complies with moral norms comprised in its moral policies and procedures.

c) Accomplishment: the university sets up the moral behavior exigence that may be realistically attained by its members (if they have the necessary resources and authority to accomplish the responsibilities that have been assigned to them).
d) Support: the university encourages its members to adopt an ethical behavior (respecting moral norms brings benefits to its members in their daily activities);
e) Visibility: the university ensures the monitoring of immoral behavior, so that they could be identified and made known to the ones that can react against them;
f) Critical attitude: the university ensures the formal and informal means whereby its members may openly discuss about the ethical issues and dilemmas that they face;
g) Sanctioning: the university sanctions the breach of moral rules and rewards its members' moral behavior; sanctioning and rewards must be proportional to the seriousness of the breaches committed by its members, respectively with the merit of observing ethical rules.

An instrument devised to measure the "ethical climate" of an organization is the ethical audit. This consists of examining the ethical state of an organization in order to see whether it is necessary to adopt changes in its ethical policies. Organizations can be companies, especially the transnational ones (which often face up the conflict of values belonging to different cultures), public administration institutions, ethical committees, programs of scientific research or social action projects that require financing within a competitive context etc.

Ethical audit idenitifies the moral profile of an organization, the factors that affect its reputation and the imagine that it has in the eyes of its partners and the public consumers. It is also the process whereby we measure the internal and external coherence of an organization's basic moral values. Ethical audit attempts to determine whether moral values and standards are applied, whether they are observed or not, whether the ethical objectives of an organization are met (internal control) and, on the other hand, whether the organization behaves responsibly and transparently with its partners, considering, when the case may be, cultural and value differences that may appear especailly if partners are located in different countries (external control).

G. Rossouw and L. van Vuuren appreaciate that "organizations undergo an evolution process, in the sense of enhancing the complexity of their ethical performance management".[16] The authors identify five stages of ethical management evolution, starting with the level at which the ethical dimension is totally denied and ending with its total integration in the set of organizational activities. Briefly speaking, these stages are:

a) The stage of immorality , of totally ignoring the ethical dimension of an organization. At this level, one can identify slogans like: "the most adapted one survives" (competition cannot be made with gloves), "we live in a world of wolves" (competition is bling), "educated guys stand in row" (ethical behavior is despised), "all that matters is rating (profit)", etc.;
b) The reactive stage in which managers realize that something must be done for avoiding the risks of an unethical behavior, whereas ethical competence totally lacks. The organizations that have reached this level "pretend to be ethical but their management does not comply with their set of ethical standards". They formally adopted ethical codes but don't do anything with them.
c) The stage of ethical compliance implies the aware involvement of organizations in monitoring and managing their own ethical performance. In other words, "the ethical code does not have only the purpose of giving comfort to its beneficiaries, but also the purpose of becoming the standard/landmark that a company considers for measuring its ethical performance" (G. Rossouw and L. van Vuuren, 2003). The Code is also applied through disciplinary measurements and penalties that are imposed by the administration. The managerial goal is to prevent unethical behavior and to eliminate costs connected to such behavior, i.e. those behviors that affect organizational reputation, e.g. scandals or frauds;
d) The stage of ethical integrity is the one which ensures the internal assimilation of ethical values and standards. It requires special managerial competence – i.e. "forming and implying values" in an organization. The aim of this stage is not only profit, but also the enhancing of ethical performance level, however, not so much by sanctioning unethical behavior, but rather by encouraging ethical behavior.

Organizations become aware that "ethical performance is strategically important and it is an asset when it comes to competition", whereas managerial strategy "facilitates the internal assimilation of ethical standards by all its members of the organization"; (G. Rossouw and L. van Vuuren);

e) The highest level is the one of total compliance , which is characterized by the integration of ethics for the purpose, mission and goals of an organization. Ethics is regarded as part of an organization, without which the latter cannot accomplish its goal and mission". Ethical behavior is regarded as being strategically important, while unethical behavior is only seen as a threat for business success and also as an undermining of its reason of being. Ethical management is meant to reinforce morality as an essential dimension of culture and as an organization's goal. (G. Rossouw and L. van Vuuren, 2003).

Now that we have referred to the 5 stages of ethical management evolution in the universities, we wonder what stage(s) Romanian universities have reached so far. One answer is given by V. Muresan[17] , who in 2009 made a research work based on a questionnaire related to ethical management in Romanian universities and companies.

Without pretending to be an exhaustive presentation, the study that this author wrote brings into evidence essential aspects regarding ethical management in Romanian universities, which still prevail today to a large extent. Thus, this study points out the awareness – of all interviewed subjects – of the importance that moral issues has for universities. Subjects are aware of the fact that observing ethical standards is good for the organization, as they are also aware of the fact that the university is morally obliged to its students. Most of those interviewed think that – in the academic world – there is a pro-ethic organizational culture. Unfortunately, the study also shows that this conviction does not correspond to reality. Here are some of the conclusions that the draws and that question the true existence of an ethical organizational culture in universities:

- All universities drew up an ethical code, however not because this was regarded as an internal need, but rather as an answer to a Minister's order. Many of these codes have an amateur level and are not drawn up by specialists.
- In order to put into practice the ethical codes, ethical committees have been set up in all universities; however, most of them focused on settling down litigation and not on applying and developing the ethical code (for example, by means of ethical training).
- Ethical training is either not done or it is insufficiently done – although this type of training is an important instrument for implementing the ethical code.
- Most universities lack a green phone number for recording the personnel's feedback as to ethical management.
- There are no moral consultants and neither counseling activities.
- There are no ethical audit activities.
- Ethical debates on moral university issues either lack or are not encouraged.
- Ethical criteria are not included in the promotion score sheet.

In conclusion, according to V. Muresan, "the development of moral critical, autonomous thought or the assimilation of ethical decision methods are not clear objectives of our universities; the exercise of public moral debates is also lacking, as the integration of moral criteria in university management is lacking.( ….). Romanian universities find themselves at the conformity stage in the happiest case, of course with differences from one university to another. This stage in the evolution of ethical management has rather a declarative value (….)''[18]

A more recent research[19] comes up with results that we are going to present in the next part of our paper and that on the whole include the same coordinates.

On the one hand, they reveal the existence of a positive perception on the part of managers as to their role and as to the academics' role in creating, developing and maintaining a solid ethical atmosphere in universities.

Other important problems were related to bribe, receiving gifts, nepotism in employment, evaluation of students and the language used by professors or secretaries, each of these issues showing that these aspects are seen by managers as rare phenomena. In other words, while managers tend to exclusively capitalize the positive aspects of an ethical environment, students tend to focus on the negative ones.

The research points out that there are ethical codes and committees in all universities, but, at the same time, ethical codes are poorly communicated through training sessions, debates, the support of specialists etc.

"The research revealed that managers in higher education system from Romania believe in their role as ethical models, but they are not really aware of the possibilities offered by a solid implementation of ethics management. They do not know very well the instruments they can use for raising the ethical level of their institutions (...).[20]

4. Conclusions

Contemporary society, characterized by kinetic acceleration, intensified globalization, an unprecedented progress in communication technology etc., challenges the educational system to reshape its mission and goals. The educational act – no matter the level of education we refer to – should not only aim at transferring knowledge, but also at teaching and at morally training people. Education should not only train young people that adapt themselves to the present and sometimes puzzling economic, political and social situation. Beyond transferring knowledge and developing abilities that are necessary for practicing a profession, for adapting to change, universities also have the mission to produce and transmit to the younger generation moral landmarks, values and principles. The university should not only train specialists and researchers; it should also form cultivated and civilized persons that have a good character and that are able to understand the ethical meaning of „being together".

The university's role of accomplishing this noble mission depends on its capacity to preserve a certain degree of autonomy in relation with the other social domains. The principle of competition dominates today the social and economic thought; however, the university should not let itself subdued to the market mechanism and should not willingly accept the values that its beneficiaries (the government and the industry) impose. To preserve its position of an institution in which moral values and principles are cultivated, the university must preserve a certain degree of independence in society.

The relationship between higher education and the present knowledge-based society is complex, and to a certain degree, ambiguous. That is why it is difficult to establish to what extent can universities preserve their autonomy. However, we believe in the universities' capacity to preserve their autonomy, which is necessary for them to accomplish their goals. Without denying the influence of the other social areas on the university, we believe that the universities also influence them because they are an active subject in economic, social and political life.

We also consider that universities should continuously accomplish their role of a critical consciousness in society and that they should produce and distribute moral values and effects in society, no matter the difficulties that they might encounter; consequently, ethical management strategies should be implemented in universities in general, and, so much the more, in the former communist countries, which underwent a long period of anomie and transition. This is also the case of Romania.

In this respect, research works reveal, on the one hand, a positive perception on the part of managers as to their role and the academic staff's role in creating, developing and maintaining a solid and ethical atmosphere in universities. According to managers, the observance of ethical standards is of good use for organizations; similarly, universities have the moral obligation to respect their students. In their opinion, one can speak of an organizational culture that is favorable to ethics in the Romanian academic environment because there are ethical codes and committees in all Romanian universities. Still, managers do not take into account the low level reached by our universities in communicating ethical codes by means of training sessions, debates and the use of specialists in ethics.

On the other hand, Romanian students have a more critical attitude because they bring into evidence certain drawbacks and shortcomings of the ethical university environment in our country and they underline the necessity of intensifying the implementation of ethical management with all the aspects that this implies.

If managers bring into evidence the role of ethical codes and committees in the universities, the students are more inclined to point out faulty behavior that they have experienced in the academic world, e.g.: incorrect scoring, the violation of the right to confidentiality, plagiarism, small gifts, the erroneous professor-student relationship (arrogant attitude, harassment, etc.).

ISSUES ON POLITICAL TRANSITION IN ALBANIA

Adelina NEXHIPI[*]

Abstract

Like every other Central and Eastern European country, Albania overthrew the communist dictatorship in 1990 and went on building a democratic country. The Albanian transition period towards democracy was multiple: political transition – from a party - state to political pluralism; economic transition – from centralized to market economy; social transition – from a closed and controlled to a free society; national safety transition – from isolated to a country working towards the European integration. It came out to be a long, difficult process with many ups and downs. Despite deep changes and obvious achievements in every aspect of life, there is still work to be done.

This study aims to describe and analyze the democratic processes in Albania and its accompanying issues, determining as main objectives: the analysis of the establishment of the rule of law in Albania, political polarization, election issues and political debate.

The study relies upon archive sources of Albanian and European institutions such as: The European Commission, Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, Venice Commission, the Albanian Parliament, the press, scientific surveys and monographs of Albanian and foreign researchers.

The methodology of the study is concentrated on descriptive, analyzing and comparative method of democratic processes in Albania as compared to those in the Balkans and Central and Eastern Europe.

The expected results of this paper are the identification of difficulties hindering the democratic processes in Albania.

Keywords: Albania, transition, democratic processes, political polarization, legitimacy.

1. Introduction

Albania as well as other Eastern and Central Europe countries suffered the harsh communist dictatorships for almost half a century. The pattern they followed was similar, but unlike other eastern countries, no liberalization element was allowed in Albania; it remained faithful to Marxist-Leninist ideology; no capitalist elements was allowed and after the 1970s the country was totally isolated without being part of any blocs. Liberalizing movements in 1950 – 1960s in the Eastern Europe were forbidden to happen in Albania by the Albanian Party of Labor, whereas the "wind of changes" in the end of 1980s could not be absent in Albania.

In 1989, people from Eastern Europe perceived that the Soviet Union which was almost collapsing socially and economically was unable to brutally suppress the rebellions in the satellite countries. Communist parties that were in power could not oppress the desire for freedom of their people without the support from Moscow. Hence, by domino effect one state at a time, all communist dictatorships collapsed in Central and Eastern Europe. These countries started their transition periods in difficult economic conditions, poor institutions, and lack of confidence. These countries had a lot to do to build democracy and capitalism. Radical and multi-dimensional reforms were undertaken: political, constitutional, institutional, economic and integrating reforms.

Economic reforms were liberalizing, stabilizing and structural and aimed to overcome the crisis and build a capitalist system. "Shock therapy" policy was applied, which aimed deep and fast reforms. Poor public institutions found it difficult to financially control the private sector; therefore fiscal evasion and informality were developed. Economic reforms were followed by high inflation and budget deficit.[1]

Constitutional reform was an important step which would prepare the way for all the other democratic reforms. In East and Central European countries, after the fall of communist governments, old constitutions were amended or new ones were designed that ratified the democratic principles and defined the governance. Institutional reforms differed from one country to another in nature as well as the pace they were applied.

EU integration was the axis of politics in all Central and East European countries. EU membership was considered a return to Europe. As Kadare stated: "The Balkan people are in a queue to enter the doors of Europe"[2] in order to have the cooperation agreements signed.

Albania and Central and East European countries are today co-travelers towards democratization. In such path that was started almost in the same time, they have made their own steps, but through the same trails nonetheless. If we compare the paces of such path, Albania is left behind by its counterparts. If we were to analyze only one aspect of such process i.e EU integration (which indirectly the democratic consolidation), the majority of former communist countries of Central and Eastern Europe became EU members in 2004; Romania and Bulgaria became members in 2008; Albania (11 – 15 years later) has not initiated the EU membership negotiations yet.

This paper's purpose is to analyze the barriers faced by democratization processes in Albania, the mistakes and their effects. This is an important topic for reflecting and analyzing as well as understanding why Albania is behind from the other Central and East European countries, when they started it more or less the same way and almost in the same conditions. This is important to the Albanian society and the political etite. By describing it in details and analyzing the Albanian transition in depth from a social, political and legal viewpoint, we will try to present a clear and full setting of obstacles that Albania faced towards the democratization process. A series of studies and analyses have been conducted by Albanian and foreign researchers on political, social, legal and economic developments in Albania namely: Shinasi Rama, Elez Biberaj, Fred Abrahams, Miranda Vickers, James Pettifer, etc. Reports have been written and published by Albanian, European and other international institutions such as: the European Commission, US Department of State, OSCE, International Monetary Fund, World Bank, Venice Commission, International Transparency etc. Studies on the Albanian transition process are various and numerous, but unlike some others, this study aims to reveal only the repeated problems and issues of the Albanian politics and delays they caused along democratic developments in Albania.

2. Issues of the Albanian political transition

Transition towards democracy in Albania started in difficult conditions: non-functional economy, total loss of confidence, traumatized society, and extreme poverty. As lawyer Hekuran Hysa states: "the Albanian people came out from communist dictatorship being poor, exhausted, numb, stunned, disoriented, infuriating".[3] Whereas Fred Abrahams describes Albania of the 90s as "grey and shabby ... the poorest country in Eastern Europe….. it was as entering a forgotten world, a frozen space, isolated from "imperialist West" and "revisionist East" and forgotten by all".[4] Foreigners visiting Albania in those years saw "Dickensian rusty ugliness, robbed and senseless – giant memorials of crooked Hoxha's vision,"[5] as described by Misha Glenny.

The Albanian transition process needed to heal grave economic, political and social injuries. The process in itself involved a series of important transformations. Democracy building process was associated with devastation too. Hating the communism and everything it left behind, Albanians destroyed everything they had built themselves with so many sacrifices. This is how English anthropologist Clarissa De Waal describes the phenomenon: "To start from zero" was the enthusiastic motto ... It was devastation craziness, very understandable though, which pulled down trees and vineyards, destroyed cooperatives and machineries, thousands of greenhouses and irrigation systems, broke the glasses of factories and households. … In keeping up with the destroying process and closing of factories and mines when there were no job opportunities, it is not clear what form of genesis or income generation they had in mind …[6].

"A tortured path, defined by lost opportunities and deep wounds"[7]- determined Comelli (an Italian researcher) the Albanian transition process. Apart from inherited wounds, the Albanian transition created some new ones such as: nepotism, illegal demographic and migratory movements, fiscal evasion, informality, high unemployment, corruption, trafficking narcotic substances and human beings, organized crime, lack of efficiency and stability of democratic institutions; non constructive and conflicting political dialogue, issues on low application, politicized public administration, over politicized election processes, lack of independence, transparency and accountability on judicial system, neglect from administration and judicial system on human rights, discrimination of marginalized groups. "These acrid phenomena, more than products of the new democracy, were direct outcomes of the communism that was dying away".[8] – were the words of former Prime Minister Meksi in 1992. These phenomena unfortunately, do not belong only to the first transition period, are not sporadic and by being related to one another have created repeated and extended issues in Albania. These phenomena will be treated with details below in this paper.

2.1. Demographic issues

Economic and political reforms after 1991 brought about major social transformations in Albania. Economic changes had different effects of different regions of the country. It deepened further the regional inequalities. Coast, central and southern regions of the country took more advantages than mountainous and northern regions. By closing the mines and metallurgic factories, the crisis in mountainous areas intensified. One of the reasons for the crisis was the fact that the land for developing the agriculture was poor. In such regions were investments and private companies were missing, employment was limited. This brought about the fact that the population in the beginning of the 90s, settled massively in urban areas. Such uncontrolled flow created problems in accommodation, health services, transport, urban infrastructure, etc. the flow caused an almost depopulation of remote mountain areas and a great difference in the development of different regions. Shinasi Rama describes the situation in grey colors. According to him, the country suffered "incredible demographic pressures, migration of population within the country, a lot of problems with ownership, massive escapes, unequal economic development between people and regions, high criminalization dhe non-legitimization of state, worsening of public services, permanent political crisis …"[9]

Economic changes such as: private properties, free initiative, privatizations, immigration brought about social and economic distinctions and not only; there was a huge gap between the rich people (enriching themselves quickly) and poor people (becoming poorer). Such rich class was created by those categories that took advantages by privatization, those were the first who ventured small private businesses or those immigrants who were quickly integrated into societies they entered. According to Sh. Rama's opinion, "the majority of people became rich by entering the politics, by being related to politics or by being part of governing clans".[10]

Immigration also was expanded largely all over Albanian regions; almost each household had one immigrant member. Immigration was individual or family, seasonal or permanent, political and economic. Albanian people immigrated mainly to Greece, Italy, Germany, France, USA, etc. The biggest immigration wave was in July 1990 when Albanians entered inside the Western countries' embassies in Tirana; in 1991 when hundreds of Albanians hijacked the ships in order to sail to Italy. These events happened again in 1997 during the economic, social and political crisis. Throughout this period, illegal immigration was ongoing, through Greek mountains or Ion and Adriatic seas towards Italy. Unemployment, lack of incomes, political instability, lack of perspective and hope made hundred thousands Albanian people leave the country toward the "blessed land".

The Albanian households lost their important role. The Albanian traditional family fit in the new social, economic and political conditions. The Albanian stable and safe household was facing aggressiveness. Crime within families increased and violence was growing fast. Divorce has increased substantially through the years. In communist society in Albania, marriage was considered something sacred; divorce or legal annulment of marriage was rarely allowed under special circumstances. Communist politics encouraged the increase of population, whereas after the 90s, number of births declined. Poverty, increase of living costs, willingness of women for building a carrier or being publicly active, lack of institutional support for children wellbeing, brought about the decline of the number of births. In our society before the 90s abortion and contraception methods were prohibited, whereas after the 90s family planning was encouraged and voluntary abortion was allowed. These facts affected not only the decline of births but the average age of population as well.

Political and economic changes brought about a middle class that encouraged the establishment of organizations and intermediate civic groups which related to structure, organization and operation of society. There were no independent activities or groups in communist Albania to play as mediator between the state and society. There was a lack of civic tradition and independent social movements even before the communist regime. Such lack of tradition prevented the creation of a free and active civil society in Albania. Apart from that, in the post-communist society a large number of professional organizations, joint groups, women's organizations, businessmen's groups, environmentalists, etc were created. They stated their objective as civic activity for the common good by putting pressure on public institutions and affecting the political processes, encouraging political participation, demanding transparency and honesty from the government. The issue with these organizations was the lack of real autonomy from state or political parties. In a study conducted from the Albanian Foundation of Civil Society, a series of problems and concerns are presented as related to Civil Society described briefly as follows:

- Non-governmental sector is still disperse; it is not coherent and cooperative compared to that of EU member countries
- NGOs are lacking cooperation, facilities, networks, information channels and especially the expertise and knowledge how to apply for projects, manage and distribute outputs, lobby and make dialogue with the government.
- NGOs still lack professionalism, transparency of their activities and staff policies.
- NGOs lack membership, social accountability and networking.
- NGOs lack strategic planning, managing structures and use of modern technologies.
- Board members are not prepared for their role to play and NGO financing is depending on donors, i.e, it is insufficient for a sustainable development of this sector.[11]

2.2. Establishment of the rule of law

Rule of law is a basic value of democracy. Rule of law implies the system where the state especially the executive and administrative powers are limited within their own judicial norms (constitution and law), the way how basic human rights are guaranteed. Main principles of the rule of law are: principle of constitutionality and legitimacy, equality under the law and non discrimination, freedom and rights of citizens and minorities, division and limitations of powers, depolitization of public services, independent judicial system, Civil Society, etc.

In Albania ... a lot is lacking, mainly in the rule of law. Fight against corruption and organized crime are important challenges… Albania should continue with the reforms in public administration in order to increase professionalism and depolitization; pursue an inclusive reform in the judicial system;... intensify its efforts against corruption and take further steps against organized crime ... It is essential that the reform process is followed by a constructive and sustainable political dialogue between the government and the opposition .... The Government should ensure that the opposition is able to fully perform its functions of democratic control.[12]

Albania has not established the balance between levels of powers yet. In this aspect, the European Commission as continuously attracted attention. In the progress report of 2010, it was stated that the High Council of Justice had no competences on the Supreme Court, which was politically appointed and had an extraordinary position within the judicial system. Exclusion of higher level courthouse from applicable rules for lower level courts weakened the independence of judicial power as a whole. The fact that the Parliament voted to appoint judges for the Supreme and Constitutional courts brought with it the risk of politization and as a result affect the democracy and independence of institutions. Prosecution system was too centralized and hierarchic. The autonomy of prosecutors was guaranteed in the trial stage, but it was limited in investigation stage which affected the efficiency of investigations. Independence and accountability of prosecution system was especially weakened from the fact that appointing of General Prosecutor was made by simple majority vote in the Parliament.[13]

Independence and striking power of judicial system had been poor as result of the lack of good evaluation systems for judges and lack of appointing and transfers by merits, "there is a lack of transparency in appointing, promotion, transfer and evaluation of judges and there are considerable weaknesses in inspecting system of judicial system".[14] Problems are increased from the fact that too often trials were too long, courts decisions are not applied, enforcement of decisions was poor mostly when the accused party was a public institution. "Cases when decisions of the Constitutional Court were not applied from the government in the course of the last years and politization of voting for appointing the heads of the Constitutional Court and Supreme Court are disturbing because they challenge the basic principles such as judicial independence and application of the rule of law."[15] The judicial system has suffered the issues of transparency, accountability, responsibility and efficiency. Human and financial resources were insufficient, infrastructure was inappropriate. Moreover, what made the situation worse is that in the judicial system and all its links was corruption. As a result, indicators of public perception have marked a very low level of confidence in judicial system.

Unfortunately, corruption was not the only problem in the judicial system; it is an endemic issue in all structures of the country. Progress report of 2010 stated that although the legal and institutional framework had improved, corruption was still in high levels in many sectors and institutions, especially in judicial system, health sector and properties issues, public procurement and financing of political parties … immunity given to a large group of public officials (parliamentarians, ministers and judges) has shown that it is a serious obstacle in investigating corruption. It only increases the risks of this phenomenon…Institutional structure has gaps related to the fight against corruption. Capacities in such fight remain limited.[16]

"Corruption is not a separate entity nor an independent substance; it is the consequence of state dysfunction"- claims Arben Xhaferi in one of his interviews. "If the state works automatically on law bases, corruption is eliminated".[17] The Albanian politics has not shown proper willingness to change the situation. If we refer to indicators in the course of years published by Transparency International, Albania is considered a high corruption risk country in international reports. Data from this institution show that the Albanian Government, politics and administration have not done enough in the fight against corruption. Albania was ranked as one of the most corrupted countries in Europe in Corruption Perception Index performing worse than the average of other countries of the Balkan Region (table 1).

It is a constant concern the issue of trafficking the human beings, narcotic substances, weapons, stolen vehicles and money laundering during the transition

By considering the issue a constant concern, during his visit in Albania in February 2006, Barroso stated: "Albania should make serious efforts in fighting the organized crime and corruption. To do this, Albania should combine strong measures for those who break the law with establishment of a powerful and independent judicial system. This is something that requires the integrity of judges for ensuring law for all."[19]

Although some steps in improving the efficiency of judicial system have been taken, it has operated poorly because of the lack of independence, transparency and results. Legislation planned for addressing these issues was delayed and has been noticed that political willingness is missing for terminating a real reform in this area."Failure in judicial reforms could be attributed to the executive power as well as the judicial itself. The executive power has obstructed the establishment of an independent judicial system so that it may use it for political purposes. Whereas the judicial power has been unable to reform itself because of high corruption levels supported by political immunity given by the executive power."[20]

Worth mentioning is the fact that Albanian has put the Criminal Code in line with the Council of Europe's Convention on criminal law. Also, a specific legislation has been approved on bribery; national strategies on corruption and organized crime have been approved. Although the Albanian Government has undertaken a more strategic approach, still corruption is prevailing and makes up for a serious risk "... prevailing corruption, organized crime and insufficient economic development are the main challenges for a sustainable democratic stability and Albania's European integration,"[21]- stated by Stern and Wohlfeld.

On July 22nd, 2016, the Parliament passed the constitutional amendments that aimed to reform the judicial system, among other dispositions for evaluating judges and prosecutors in Albania. Later on, law on "Re-evaluation of judges and prosecutors in the republic of Albania" passed along more than 20 other necessary laws in applying the judicial reform based on constitutional amendments. Currently, a deep reform in the judicial system is being applied which aims to make it more independent, impartial and efficient.

2.3. Lack of legitimacy

Elections present the convertibility process of the political willingness of citizens in political power. In a democratic country, the Government's authority comes from the consent of the governed ones, whereas the main device to transform the consent into state authority is developing free and fair elections. The universal character of elections comes from their own ability for articulation, political pluralism and democracy as an appropriate form of governance. There is no democratic system without free, general, democratic and fair elections. Sovereignty of people in a democratic system is fulfilled by participating in political decision-making, and the right of electing democratic institutions for running the country. Elections are the essence of democracy or the mechanism it operates with.

"Elections; a lost chance for Albania", was the statement of the Head of the Election Observation Mission of OSCE/ODIHR in Tirana, immediately after the conclusion of local elections in 2007 in Albania. When citing this quote, all reports of OSBE / ODIHR occur to mind, which always qualify for "progress" made after each election process, but this "progress" is never enough to be qualified "successful". In other words, elections are considered the "Achilles heel" for the Albanian democracy.

In order to have free and democratic elections based on European standards, efforts have been made to ensure complete and democratic legal basis. The Election Code was one of the most debated and revised laws in Albania. The code was amended several times in order to ensure free popular willpower and this willpower could be read the right way possible.

On May 8th, 2000, Parliament of Albania passed the Election Code. Based on the Election Code, the Central Election Commission (CEC) was a constitutional institution. It was the highest institution for organizing, managing and supervising the election processes in Albania. CEC established and supervised the local administration bodies of election. The chairman was proposed by the largest party in power, whereas vice chairman was proposed by the largest opposition party. CEC decisions were considered valid when they were signed by both chairman and vice chairman. The composition of CEC has always been the reason for political debate among political parties. According to the Code, Albania would vote based on a mixed election system, majority - proportional. 100 parliamentarians for 140 Parliament seats would be elected by majority voting from the single member areas, whereas 40 seats would be complemented by national multi-member lists of political parties so that to achieve a proportional approach among votes on national level and parliamentarians representing a political party in the Parliament. In order to win a proportional seat, political parties should pass the election threshold of 2.5%, whereas coalitions 4%.[22]

Based on OSBE-ODIHR recommendations and problems or legal shortcomings that were noticed in the parliamentary elections of 2001, it was agreed to revise the Election Code. Its revision was conducted by a parliamentary commission ad hoc by multi-party representation and assisted legally by OSCE and Venice Commission during June 2002 - April 2003. Based on this agreement: the candidate running in the single member list was a winner by simple majority of votes unlike before when absolute majority was required; number of parties that would have representatives in all election administration levels would be 4; voting in these commissions would be made by majority, 5 votes from 7 members and all decisions having legal value should be signed by the chairman and vice chairman who were appointed by the Socialist Party (SP) and the Democratic Party (DP).

After the local elections of 2004, OSBE/ODIHR called for attention to improve some aspects in the Election Code such as: the dominating roles of SP and DP in election commissions; appointment of CEC members from SP and DP, as opposed to the law; uncertainties related to four parties that were proposing members to CEC; update of voters' lists; deadlines set during the complaint process; transparency in financing the political parties during the election campaign; rules on validity or invalidity of the ballot paper; procedures in counting the votes.[23] In improving these problems, the Code was revised again for the period January – April 2005, by a bipartisan commission, SP and DP. As a result of this agreement, a law on determining new boundaries of election areas passed in March 2005. Other changes consisted on the counting process; election management; division of election areas; complaint and appeal process. The agreement defined again the dominating roles of SP and DP in managing the election process. Small parties were limited in their rights to give their election announcements (their timing on TV was limited, half a time set for the two large parties). Also, small parties that were not represented in election administration commissions had no rights to get copies of official tables of the election results from election regional commissions.

By OSCE initiative, an agreement was signed on January 2007. This agreement consisted on some amendments on the Election Code. Based on the agreement, the mandate of local government authorities was extended from 3 to 4 years. The election would be held by a single voting round based on "who ranks first" principle, whereas mandates for local councils would be made by proportional system. The next amendment occurred in CEC, where the number of members increased from 7 to 9.

In December 2008, by consensus of two largest parties, new Election Code was approved. Based on this new code, the majority proportional system transformed into regional proportional system. Parliamentarians were elected by closed lists in election areas coinciding with the administrative division of the country: the region. In order to win seats in the Parliament, parties should pass the threshold of 3% of the votes, coalitions 5% of the cotes on regional level, whereas independent candidates should pass the natural threshold (the number of valid votes divided by the number of mandates). Regional proportional system was contradicted forcefully by small parties because it favored two large parties. The new code made improvements on voters' records, vote counting and complaint process. Although there were improvements, the code was maintaining the dominance of two large parties in the election administration; their unlimited right to change the members of election commissions without a reason; criteria on determining a ballot paper invalid were still unclear; there were uncertainties related to the threshold for being represented in local councils, the campaign financing, deadline of final lists, etc. There were issues related to some dispositions, such as:

- The right of party chairmen to run in as many areas they wish, which conflicts the equality principle.
- The right of SP and DP to dismiss elected judges who deal with election appeals. Such article violated the principle of judicial system independence.
- A limited opportunity for repeating the election in a certain area after election devaluation in one of more election areas.[24]

Having made these amendments in the Election Code, the rate of 30% of female representation in Parliament was ratified. Item 6 of Article 67 of the Election Code provided that "for each election areas, at least 30% of the multi-member list and one out of three first names of the multi-member list should belong to each gender"

Amendments on the Election Code were made in July 2012. Improvements were made in the selection process of commission members; compiling voters' lists; process of candidates' registration was simplified; equal access to media and public funds for campaign financing was made available. Last amendments in the Election Code made considerable improvements, but still the parliamentary elections of 2013 revealed that the Code had gaps, ambiguities that left room for misinterpretation. Two large parties were still dominating the administration of election process. The document "Joint opinion on the Electoral Law and the electoral practice of Albania" of 2011, OSCE called for attention on "depolitization of all levels of election administration, in order to avoid polarization in commissions of all levels which often causes lack of collegiality in decision making. It affected the election process. The actual method of establishing election commissions not only polarizes the process of election administration, but it puts parties' interests before the voters' interests.[25]

The supervision of election processes by political parties is reflected on the CEC's activity too. Although CEC is an independent institution de juro, the determining role of political parties in appointing members of this institution and the fact that they affect the functions of these appointees, affects the independence of this institution. On the other hand, members of CEC often act like party members and reflect encounters and political polarization in CEC activity by creating numerous and frequent problems in the institution and election processes in Albania. Because of frequent repetition of these phenomena, OSCE stated in its report on parliamentary elections of June 23rd, 2013 that "Independence of CEC should be ensured. For this reason, the interested parties should act according to the role they play in CEC activities and election workers should not base their actions and decisions being under the effect of political factors".

Despite frequent changes on legal framework, in order to ensure free and independent elections according to OSCE/ODIHR reports monitoring the election processes in Albania since 1991, elections in Albania have never been fully democratic based on European standards. Progress has been made from one process to another, but they are not sufficient to be qualified as free and democratic. The most frequent and repeated problems encountered during the election processes according to OSCE/ODIHR are:

Election campaigns are characterized by an extremely political polarization. It is difficult to distinguish state activities from election activities during the campaigns, or party from the state. Reciprocal accusations among rival parties blur political programs.

There are frequently repeated problems during the election process varying from procedure problems to technical, logistic and administrative. They vary from family voting, multiple voting, secrecy, pressure, buy of votes, problems with the voters' lists, presence of police at voting centers, non application of legal terms and time, arbitrary decision making, slow counting, lack of transparency, manipulation of results, political pressure on election administrators causing even fatal incidents near the voting centers.

Manipulation of the election results is a phenomenon which is being sophisticating from one party to another. Reports of OSCE/ODIHR on Albanian elections mention numerous examples of records containing different results for the same voting center, or inconsistencies of the number of voters and ballot papers, use of different criteria often illegal, in determining the validity of voting.

Political pressure on election administration coming especially from two large parties in country is a phenomenon which has remained unsolved and often creates conflicts during the voting and counting processes. This phenomenon comes as result of appointing party activists in commissions.

The process of counting the votes is the most problematic during the whole election process. The election history in Albania has been characterized from narrow victories. The difference of votes between the winning party (or coalition) and the largest opposition party (or coalition) is small. Such phenomenon has been noticed especially in the elections of after 2000s. Being aware of this fact, the political parties are trying to "gather as many votes". For this reason the counting process is delayed in order to find ways to get more votes during the process and reduce the opponent's votes. To achieve this, different methods have been used such as: claiming the ballot boxes are irregular for safety or procedural reasons (denying the right of vote to citizens who have already cast the vote in these ballot boxes), use of different criteria in determining the invalidity of a ballot paper, boycott of the counting process from representatives of a certain political party, disagreements between commission members who count the votes and in many cases do not sign the reports for the election results, proclaiming them invalid, counting and recounting the votes even the way how ballot boxes that are recounted are kept which often is doubtful and easy to manipulate.

After the certification of the election results, the political dialogue becomes even more difficult. The losing party begins a series of accusations to the other party for manipulating the elections, buying the votes, falsify the results, etc.

There are numerous remarks for each election process in the reports from OSBE/ODIHR on elections

[25] OSCE / ODIHR, "Joint opinion on the Electoral Law and the electoral practice of Albania" (Strasbourg: 19 December 2011) [online] available in: http://www.aceproject.org/ero-en/regions/europe/AL/albania-joint, retrieve on 11. 04. 2014 in Albania. If we have a quick look at the evaluation reports for each election process, it results that:

- "The conclusions of observation mission are that in many cases the application of Election Law failed. More specifically, in pre-election period and election day 32 out of 79 articles of the law were broken."(Report on parliamentary elections of 1996).
- "The election process was too long, conflicted, uncertain and fragmented" (Report on parliamentary elections of 2001)
- "Local elections were a lost chance for a significant progress towards OSCE commitments and other international standards for democratic elections."(Report on local elections, October 2003)
- "There was competition and voters were given election opportunities among political parties. Although, the process is still too long and often uncertain." (Report on parliamentary elections, July 3, 2005)
- "Elections only met partly OSCE commitments and other international standards for democratic elections ... it is concerning the fact that main political parties in Albania once again put the party short-term interests before the stability and credibility of the election process". (Report of local elections, October 2007).
- "Although most of OSCE commitments were met, these elections did not fully achieve the Albania's potential for fulfilling the highest standards for democratic elections." (Report on parliamentary elections, June 28, 2009)
- "Although elections were transparent and competitive, they were too polarized; with disbelief between the political party in power and the opposition ... two largest parties did not perform responsibly their electoral duties, affecting negatively the election administration." (Report of local elections, 8 May, 2011).
- "Elections were competitive, with an active participation of citizens for the whole campaign duration respecting the basic rights. Although, the disbelief between the two main powers affected the election environment and hindered the whole administration of the election process." (Report on parliamentary elections, June 23, 2013).[26]

These election processes and their irregularities are used as arguments from parties that if they lose the elections, they do not acknowledge the results. No election result in Albania was undisputed from the party / parties that are left in opposition. This is a common practice for political parties in Albania:

- The Socialist Party boycotted the Parliament elected in May 26, 1996 because it claimed elections were manipulated and did not acknowledge the results.
- The Democratic Party did not consider as legitimate the parliament elected in early elections in June 29 1997, because of the conditions they were taking place. As DP called it "Kalashnikov Parliament" was a necessary solution, not popular election.
- DP boycotted the second round of local elections in 2000, because it made accusations for manipulations in their first round.
- After the parliamentary elections in June 2001, the right hand opposition boycotted the Parliament because, according to them, there were irregularities (boycott continued until January 2002).
- DP boycotted the parliament in the end of 2003 as a sign of protest against the Government's attitude and the results of local elections in October 2003.
- Partial parliamentary elections in 2007 were boycotted by the opposition (SP) because of ongoing political debates.
- The socialist opposition boycotted the Parliament after the elections in June 2009, disputing them and not acknowledging the results. Opposition ended the boycott in June 2010.
- After the local elections in 2011 and problems created during the counting process in Tirana, the SP boycotted the Parliament. The boycott continued until September that same year.

Because of not acknowledging the results of elections from all parties, although it is certified by respective institutions, the institutions that are created lack full legitimacy.

2.4. Politization of the public administration

Based on the analysis conducted by Fatos Tarifa, and considering Linz and Stepan, "a consolidated democracy is supposed to fulfill 5 conditions, interdependent and collaborative with one another, such as: Civil Society, political society, rule of law, public bureaucracy that supports the democratic process and economic society."[27] If we analyzed the Albanian public bureaucracy during the transition period, we would face a series of issues: they vary from recruiting the administration clerks on nepotism basis, clientelist policy, arbitrarity of employee transfers and discharges, lack of job practices and necessary logistics to insufficient training, poor job performed by monitoring employee structures in administration, low wages and lack of general motivation for civilians. After every political rotation in Albania, old clerks in the public administration are replaced by new ones. It occurs in high level clerks as well as low level ones.

Nowadays, political studies identify three methods through which political parties in Europe and beyond ensure votes:

- "Vote of belonging" – based on social and class belonging of the individuals and parties' relations with stakeholders.
- "Vote of opinion" – based on preferences of voters about political parties and solutions they offer on economic and social problems, etc.
- "Vote of exchange" – based on different benefits the voters hope to get when parties they voted for come to power.[28]

If we analyzed the ways how political parties get their votes and attract the voters in Albania, we would undoubtedly state that support to political parties is ensured through "vote of exchange" method. Votes are given in exchange of material benefits the parties offer such as: jobs, wages, housing, credits, tax facilities, economic or political favors, power positions, etc. Many people dedicate their lives to politics and regard it as a source of incomes. The only interests of politics are function and power. Many Albanians consider an official function simply as a reward for party services. Functions are not given to those who meet professional demands, but those who helped during elections. This practice regards more important the fact of being loyal to the party than the professionalism, qualifications and willingness to perform tasks. This fact is found to be true by several researchers of the transitions period in Albania. U.Stern and S. Wohlfeld, in their study argue: "Taking over the power is a goal in itself and serves for increasing the personal benefits of those who are in the power. Rarely leaders separate assignments or duties based on objective criteria; they do it by relying on clan and clientelist relations. Those who are involved in a political party, hope to get advantages from possible election winning. During governing changes, the personnel of public authority is subject of many replacements, not only in higher levels."[29]. Also, K.Gërxhani and A. Schram write that: "important clerks of the public administration are replaced by the winner's protégés. The winner of elections in Albania practically controls unanimously all public policies."[30] BTI (Bertelsmann Stiftung's Transformation Index) estimates the transformations towards the democracy, market economy and the quality of political management in 129 countries. In a report of 2014 on Albania it would argue that: "After taking over the power, each party adopts "the winner takes it all" approach which for the Albanian context means "invasion" of state from the governing elite".[31] As for the above, recruiting civilians in the public administration has become the most un-democratic and un-European practice which is based on partial, friend or clan preferences.

Disrespecting the legal rules in public administration appointments has brought about some results according to the Civil Service Commission (CSC): first, hiring employees without considering the equality principle or abilities to perform tasks; second, this has inevitably brought about the loss of faith in free labor power that people are not hired based on preferences or patronage of institutions' directors.[32]

Same issue has been identified in the reports from Public Administration Department. It estimates the decline of public faith on procedure for applying for a job in the public administration: "Contracted employment and job competition of contracted employees for jobs they already have causes the concerned people to not apply for those vacancies, forejudging the whole job competition procedure.[33]

Through supervisions CSC has conducted in central and local institutions, has been identified that although job competitions for vacancies have been held in the public administration, it is disturbing the fact that the participation of job candidates in all job applications is as lower as possible. It results that job competitions are generally organized with 4-5 applicants, reducing thus considerably the quality of the candidate to be selected because of the short list of applicants.

Need for reforms in public administration has been demanded continuously by the European Commission, asking for: compilation of a full and democratic legal basis, establishment of a transparent, accountable and efficient public administration; greater focus on civic and businesses needs; adequate management of human resources, better policy planning, coordination and development; sound administrative procedures and improvement of public financial management as essential aspects for operating and implementing necessary reforms towards EU integration.[34] As the EU asks for a professional, responsible, effective, depolitized administration that takes care of the citizens and businesses' needs, which applies laws and state policies, lack of permanency in administration, lack of training, frequent restructuring affect the increase of civil service in higher professional levels. Annual reports of the European Commission reflect a problematic situation in the public administration:

- "There are still needed considerable efforts for reducing the political appointments in higher levels, improvement of salaries, carrier structures and presenation of a performance management in order to increase the efficiency in public administration"[35]
- "... frequent replacements of civil clerks are affecting the independence of civil service and are incrasing corruption among public officials.... Appointments pass through political party lines as opposing to the Law on Civil Service..."[36]

- Civil service is suffering important shortcomings, mainly those related to the principle of meritocracy during the recruiting process, employment by temporary contracts, rules of promotion, transfers and discharges of clerks. Operation of civil service continues to suffer the politization, especially related to appointments.[37]
- "Further progress is needed for establishing an independent civil and professional service based on merits, free from political influence"[38] demanding repeatedly an improvement of the situation.

This problematic ongoing situation of the Albanian transition affected the fact that state bureaucracy has not always been able to support the democratic processes in country. Because of non-permanency, it often does not possess the experience and skills to respond to democratic demands, integrating processes, needs and rights of the population. By citing Prof. Tarifa, we would admit: "In a time when certain legislation could be compiled within a relatively short time, creation of an effective bureaucracy and transformation of citizens' attitude and activity of institutions into a routine in accordance to the principles of the rule of law require a relatively long time."[39]

2.5. Political parties – Lack of democracy in internal setting

Democratic processes are comprehensive; the society should be involved in them, although reforms that should be undertaken, policies that should be followed, the way how they should be implemented are competence of policymaking institutions. All researchers agree that political parties as organizations that represent people in the legislative institution through their elected persons, play a key role in democratic processes, their progress and successes. Democratic principles in political parties settings are not related only to the party, but they go beyond "in describing the standards of party and governing systems, of a functional democracy and constitutional principle of citizens' sovereignty".[40]

Tens of political parties have been created in Albania since 1990, although the Albanian political setting was dominated by two large parties: Democratic Party and Socialist Party. These two parties have exchanged powers since 1992 to today. Table 2 shows the votes won by these parties in partliamentary elections from 1992 to 2017.

Political parties in Albania were characterized by lack of internal democracy, low level of political culture, mentality of leading with an iron fist, weakness in operating the political structures, ambitions of leading individuals in personalization and identification of themselves with the political party. Political parties are identified by the names of their chairmen, and political leaders do nothing to avoid it. According to Freedom House report in 2002, "changes within parties, other than program and ideological changes, have to do with changes in the personality of their leaders."[1]

In Albania, as well as in other transition countries, political parties have been transformed from popular traditional parties to media parties. The headship of a party communicates with the members, fans and voters through media, leaving aside the internal traditional structures. Each politician's image and their every word is considered politics, and the most unimportant details and monotonous political activities make the headlines on media and main topics for political debate. These types of political parties increase the power of the chairmen and reduce the control over them. Political parties arranged in an oligarchic manner[2] do not allow alternative thinking, which opposes the majority's opinion. According to Krasniqi and Hackaj, "expulsions, getaways from election lists and slandering of critical individuals are present in every party. Counter thinking is equal to a hostile political attitude".[3]

Growth of personal power of a political leader damaging the elected party structures makes the decision making process uncontrollable and deeply personal. Albanian political parties displayed many signs of their control from a narrow group of individuals, often not voted and not elected by the party's structures. "Because of the way of parties are structured, the political power is concentrated on the hands of group of leaders from the winning party. When a party wins the elections, its leader becomes the president or the prime minister of the country …"[4] This lack of democratic culture in managing the political parties is reflected in the whole political life of the country and the relations of parties with one another.

The role and control of the leader are major and practiced on the party's representative in the parliament, on their selection and political attitude. According to the old majority system, among others, a major role on the voter's vote played their assessment of the candidates themselves. Party leaders (or its structures – by law) were prone to elect a candidate who was popular and could ensure victory. Changes in Election Code affected the parliamentarian's status too. By the regional proportional election system, parliamentarians in Albania enjoy totally party mandate. They have been elected by the electorate from closed lists of parties. The political party supports them, affords the expenses for the campaign, often they won votes because of the electorate's support to the party although they do not prefer the candidate him/herself. For all these reasons, the elected representative owes the party his/her victory; therefore the parliamentarian is object of party's discipline and acts according to party's instructions. Otherwise, he/she is risking his/her political carrier. Because of this mandate model, during the process of voting and decision making in the Parliament, the parliamentarians of a certain party vote unanimously. Although their personal opinions or interests of their voters might not agree with party's attitude, they should remain loyal to the party. Parlamentarians elected this way, are considered by Servet Pëllumbi, as "s*oldiers*" of the parties, because they are not elected based on their personal qualities or skills; the mandate they receive is called "popular" which in fact is and "is administered" by the parties.[5]

2.6. Political polarization

Political life in Albania during the transition period is characterized by an increasing conflict that polarized and irrationalized the politics. Political parties in Albania have developed a harsh political fight by creating a polarized pluralist system. Great political upheavals are followed by a harsh political fight for solving critical issues, whose accumulation leads towards qualitative changes, but, according to Prof. Mezini "nowhere has political fight been so sharp and fluctuated in such violent forms as in Albania".[6] According to Janusz Bugajski, Albania suffers six continuous irregularities that have produced numerous problems: "bipolar politics, limited political competition, non-ideological conflicts, political clientelizm, total lack of political culture, political revenge factor".[7]

Political situation in Albania has been troublesome with high party polarization. Confronting rhetoric and lack of dialogue and consensus keep on keeping the political pressure high. This picture is mostly noticed in election campaigns periods when the pressure is higher and debate is harsher. Speeches during campaigns are filled with endless accusations against the adversary party instead of displaying their political programs. In his book, "Albania in transition", Elez Biberaj describes the pressure during election periods as follows: "These two parties considered elections as a race where the winner takes it all and the looser loses it all, often ignoring the democratic norms, manipulating the election procedures, intimidating the justice system and the press and contradicting every unfavorable result"."[8]

The political debate lacks understanding, tolerance, and consensus among the parties. Political polarization has obstructed the democratic processes, undertaking of necessary and timely reforms, has prevented the job of legislative bodies and higher state institutions, has slowed down the EU integration process and polarized the society. According to Stern and Wohlfeld, "Albania has made little progress in developing and consolidating democracy. One of the biggest obstacles is the deep polarization between two large parties, DP and SP and rough personal disputes between their leaders. Such political tension obstructs an effective cooperation among two parties and as result the rapid progress in undertaking the necessary reforms."[9] The analyst on Balkan issues, Janus Bugajski, in an interview for the Voice of America states that: -There is the risk that polarization leads to such a party separation that nothing can be approved in Parliament, that main issues such as fight against corruption and crime are not addressed, that the necessary legislation for achieving them is not applied, that the public debate is too politicized so that it does not allow the legislating system do its job. This is an issue for Albania as well for other countries that could obstruct the progress towards membership to EU.[10]

Party polarization and lack of consensus among political parties in Albania is repeatedly exposed by international institutions, considering such lack of tolerance and understanding as "rodent" tearing democracy into pieces. Venice Commission report underlined the visit of its chairman Antonio La Pergola in Albania on January 8-10, 1998 as follows: "The political dialogue failed. It makes it difficult to find a solution for the situation of the country and it is necessary to make the right political decisions and hold legitimate elections in order to get the country out of economic difficulties, social distress and legal insecurity".[11] European Commission often called for attention the political class in Albania to build constructive dialogue. "Consolidation of political dialogue among the majority and the opposition is necessary for strengthening further the Parliament's democratic operation… It is important that cooperation between the government and the opposition works well to secure solid basis for further reforms".[12] This opinion is supported by Mr. Björn von Sydow, Chairman for Political Issues at the Council of Europe, in his interview for Panorama newspaper on August 10, 2011, as follows: "The political scene in Albania is dominated by political polarization, which has disappointed the Albanian people in these last two decades. The political situation is presented frozen in its looks for almost 20 years. Both main political parties did now show political willingness to reach consensus on essential issues."[13]

Extreme political polarization is shown clear almost in every parliamentary session where one cannot help but criticize the harsh language, insulting words, mutual accusations among parties. Too often, the debate becomes so violent so that Parliament halls are transformed into "gladiators' arena" and there are physical conflicts among parliamentarians; or a place for hunger strikes, such as the strike organized by small parliamentary parties which opposed the constitutional amendments in 2008, of the hunger strike in August 1997, in an office of the Parliament's presidency where the democratic parliamentarian Pjetër Arbnori demanded amendments on the Law on Radio-Television; these halls are transformed into crime scenes such as the case of wounding by fire weapon the democratic parliamentarian Azem Hajdari by the socialist Gafur Mazreku, on September 18, 1997. Cause for this situation according to Arbën Xhaferi, is "the lack of real political offer, lack of real projects for economic and spiritual recovery in Albania."[14]

These uninterrupted conflicts led the main protagonists to use every means to destroy the political rival (considered adversary). Political disputes were associated with many parliamentary boycotts which caused that "half of political potential – the opposition – take very little part in co-governance through opposition with alternatives and not roles that belong to the judicial system".[15] Boycott has been used by both parties as a form of disagreement with the political situation in country, as a contradiction to actions or decisions of the other party, as refusal for supporting the initiatives of the opposite party, or as a need to listen, etc. Therefore:

- During the debates for compiling the Albanian constitution, (a debate that went on for years), the Socialist Party boycotted the parliament. On June 17, 1993 it left the Parliament declaring to go back once the draft constitution was ready.
- The DP boycotted the Parliament in 1998 after the Government decided to prosecute 6 former officials for using deadly gas during the 1997 protests.
- The DP boycotted the parliamentary commission in compiling the Consitution in 1998. According to it, the existing parliament (elected by ealry elections in 1997) did not have the moral authority to approve a long lived constitution. The DP boycotted also the poular referendum for approval of the Constitution on November 22, 1998 and called for its supporters to not participate in it.
- As mentioned above, after each election process the opposition parties have boycotted the Parliament becuase they didn't acknowledge and accept the results of elections.

Boycotts are too common in the Albanian Parliament so that during the first sesion of the Legislation XIX of the Parliament (elected by election of June 23, 2013) Namik Dokle, in the position of leading the session, stated proudly that this legislation was the only one that wasn't boycotted by any political party in Albania.

Conclusions

Since 1990 to present, Albania has made considerable changes in organizaing the state, its legal basis, social mentality, infrastructire, democratizaton of life. Considering the picture and the analysis described above, we understand that democratic processes in Albania were followed by ongoing issues that have created obstacles in the economic development, political stability, European integration, social reforms. Apart from transition problems encountered in all new democracies, problems are more accentuated and ongoing in Albania such as:

- Politization and abusive movements in the public administration. Political, nepotist, clientelist job appointments caused a lack of permanence in the public administration, its inability for responding to democratic processes, lack of attention to people's demands.
- Contested and manipulated election processes. Elections in Albania are still associated with procedure, technical, logistic and administrative problems, by unacknowledging the results by all parties. On the other hand, this leads to full illegitimacy of established institutions.
- Lack of democracy in internal setting of political parties, which portrays them as authoritary or oligarchic groups, where debate, alternative thinking or fair competition are missing or suppresed. Such lack of internal democracy is reflected in the relations among parties.
- Albanian political parties built their political relations based on ongoing controversies, lack of willingness to cooperate and compromise. The party/ parties in power leave little space to opposition party/parties, which on their part, show little or no willingness to cooperate; in many cases they chose radical forms to make opposition. Such polarization in the Albanian political life has obstructed the decision-making processes, undertaking of important reforms and activities of institutions.
- Corruption, is an endemic issue of society and public insitutions; efforts of the executive and legislative powers to supervise the judicial power; lack of independence, tranparency and efficiency of judicial institutions have prevented the rule of law and its establishment in Albania.

These issues have often been tolerated from public institutions; other times reforms have been undertaken which resulted to be insufficient or have not been applied completely. The above mentioned problems have brought obstacles and delays in the path towards the democtratization of the country.

THE TRADITIONAL FAMILY, IN THE ROLE OF THE FUNDAMENTAL MATRIX OF THE FORMATION OF INDIVIDUAL CONSCIOUSNESS – A RADIOGRAPHY AT THE LEVEL OF THE ROMANIAN SOCIETY

Mirela Cristiana NILĂ STRATONE[*]
Bogdan MARINESCU[]

Abstract

The primary group, accepted at all times as the core of society, is subject to a continuous assault. The reason invoked is so-called change, novelty, elements that only open-minded can accept.

The main problem that arises in this approach is that the open mind does not mean the mind that accepts any element of novelty, but the mind that analyzes and selects. Between the acceptance of everything and the selection, it is desired to merge these two elements till total confusion.

But who wants to create this confusion and why? The answer to this question is actually the quintessence of the present study.

First of all, we need to make it clear that the traditional family has an important contribution to clarifying this issue. Of course, in terms of family and open-mind, we must admit that the time has come to make the difference between the modern family and the traditional family.

Another determining element which creates this confusion is represented by the mass media. Regardless of the type of communication channel, interest groups have not bypassed the opportunity of communication channel to reach their objectives through manipulation in the public sphere over time.

Along with the family and the media, with an influence that does not necessarily occupy the last place after the two social factors, we have to take in consideration the church. Of course, we need to make some clarifications at this point: firstly, the difference between the church as an institution, religion and faith, and second, the difference between the dominant religious beliefs in society. However, it should be noted that the church institution accepts only one way of family existence, namely the traditional one. Along with this, the church emphasizes the conservative elements of social and individual culture, guiding the individual on the analytical and selective sphere, which predominantly leads to the positive segment of social values.

Our study aims to highlight the role of the traditional family in the process of building the matrix on which individual consciousness is developed and, in the course of time, in an area comprised of territorial and cultural borders, national consciousness.

Interesting is the barrier that emerged between the Romanian traditional consciousness and the diversified novelty wave, the barrier materialized in an increasingly visible resistance both in material and virtual way in accepting the modern type of family to the detriment of the traditional one.

Keywords: primary group; open mind; confusion; cultural borders; novelty.

1. Introduction

1.1. The family, traditional/alternative valoral model

In pursuit of the purpose of any effort made in the field of scientific research, namely social health, it is imperative to thoroughly analyze the sources from which the alternative values arise, as well as the effects that these values may trigger in the medium or long term in a society fighting for democracy.

It is certainly necessary to review the trajectory followed by social values over time, or only to track the return of some tendencies that are slightly modified or otherwise approached.[1]

Thus, it is worth mentioning that in the traditional societies of the pre-modern period the values embraced a universal pattern imposed on the human individual: social order dictated from the sphere of the church, all knowing and knowing, identical individuals with identical needs, a unique and absolute truth, owned by entities superior to ordinary people.

In the modern age we encounter secularization, the need for science and its explanation, the opening to newness with reason. It is the moment of the emergence of the social norm, which determines the normative model of the individual, the norm being at the same time precursor of social responsibility. However, this normative model maintains identity in terms of human needs and aspirations.

In the 20th century, post industrialism, postmodernism, etc., occult western values and openness to them. Thus, we become acquainted with the tolerance, which, as we shall see in the present material, carries drastic analyzes and interpretations, some of which give rise to errors in the sphere of logic. However, we cannot overlook the positive contribution of accepting the differences between individuals, the need to know and understand these differences, and the need for genuine tolerance. In addition, it takes place in social consciousness and especially in the individual one, precisely the relativity of truth. Also, as a result of social change, there is a need to permanently define the concepts, social needs, values, attitudes and aspirations that matter to the individual, group and society as a whole.

As a balance for all these valences of change, the idea of risk appears and its assumption, in the context in which the risk, in turn, is in constant change, being a fundamental factor of relativism.

As a balance for all these valences of change, the idea of risk appears and its assumption, in the context in which the risk, in turn, is in constant change, being a fundamental factor of relativism.

We are currently witnessing the change of values, with a strong tendency toward post materialism. In Modernization and Post modernization[2], Ronald Inglehart analyzes social values through the hypothesis of rarity and socialization, and then leads to an absolutely obligatory question at least from a sociological point of view: the effect of globalization on values will lead to multiculturalism-the aspect of amalgam of cultures traditional, population-specific, or uniformity - as a common cultural line, universally valid, in which, of course, will prevail the values of politically sustained culture? In this sense, we can speak of a middle path characterized by tolerance and acceptance of value differences, so a certain multiculturalism can become a uniformist vector.

The most important aspect of values is that values are internalized at the individual and then community level, through socialization. As far as socialization is concerned, it is imperative to take into account the relationships that arise between individuals - social interaction, relationship with others. It is clear that changing values undoubtedly drives the social group.

At the same time, changing values or adding value to new groups in the area, as well as creating a new value, are ways to implement what is called alternative values. We are most aware of a conversion of social values, in the sense that old ideas are re-evaluated, reformulated according to the new cultural guidelines. Importantly, these new cultural guidelines are more imposed outside the communities in which traditional cultural elements are governed.

This is primarily about freedom. These are not new social values, but because of the fact that they are re-evaluated, repositioned in the cultural-value system, they acquire new valences and interpretations that lead to derisory morals. Freedom is a fundamental right and also a socio-cultural value conditioned by limits. Without limits and sanctions, the freedom of the individual is at risk of being eliminated, annihilated. Or, the new form of freedom that was born mainly by the removal of traditional moral norms is part of the alternative value baggage that seeks to reconfigure the individual's life and, last but not least, the life of the primary group , the family.

Analyzing the traditional model of the family, it presents itself as a group characterized by association, based on private relations. Structurally, the traditional family is made up of a man, a woman - the marital couple - and children from their sexual relationship.

In parallel with the private domain of the family we are dealing with the public sphere, a complex ensemble of social-political relations that accompanies the family in society, a dimension regulated by social contract. In the traditional family model there is a clear division between the private and the public sphere, but also a linear relationship: the laws regulate the family relations with the public sphere, and the man represents the family in the public sphere.

Regarding marriage, it is governed by a law that is based on the sexual division of labor in the household and society. This is where the gender role, identity with gender and gender stereotypes are discussed. The latter govern as templates of social life, according to which the woman and the man have internalized that social learning that led to the finalization and stability of the traditional family model.

In considerable opposition, the contract model is centered on the autonomous individual in social relationships with others in the form of agreements. Marriage is seen as a partnership similar to partnership with other types of civil associations. The marriage contract does not involve the state's participation, it only calls for the will of the parties. In this respect, the freedom of the parties in respect of family life is absolute, within the framework of the self-imposed obligations, on the basis of the contractual order. Those who promote this family model also highlight certain advantages deriving from these contracts:[3]

- pluralism and diversity in family life;
- the possibility of exceeding the limits imposed by gender stereotypes;
- Alternative ways in which children adopted or born under contract can gain family membership;
- offers the opportunity to devote parents to both gay and single-parent couples.

The community model promotes a specific family ideal, namely to act as the core of human society. The values underpinning the community model of the family are the common values of individuals in a society, influenced by the culture of its origin and subjected to collective judiciary systems. This model presents as a specific limit the appreciation of the social role of the family to the detriment of the private one.

The family-based model of rights predominantly addresses the normative dimension at the family level, which contributes substantially to the promotion of the private character of the family. In this respect, emphasis is placed on the inequalities and dependencies that arise in relations between family members and the rights of family relations are promoted. This model based on rights leads to a conflict between the rights of the individual and the family: on the one hand, the family claims the right to be protected against the interference of the state in its intimacy as a group, and on the other hand the individual claims protection with regard to the possible damage that the state could bring to the family and intimate life - here is the appeal of domestic violence, the right to contraception, etc. The rights-based model fits into a limited theory that in this way family-friendly family issues cannot be adequately managed.

The model based on relational rights and responsibilities is grounded in the idea that family group relationships are part of the vast and complex relational system of proximity, education, religion, politics, ethnicity. For this reason, it is necessary to define a relationship between family life and political and economic order in order to establish the responsibilities that derive from this relationship. A theory of relational rights and responsibilities will encompass not only individual freedoms but also the rights to establish and maintain private associations that are compatible with public perceptions of the responsibilities that those associations bring to themselves, including the connections between families and the wider community.[4]

Actions to influence of consciousness through the virtual environment

In the dynamics of the Romanian society, many groups have emerged that militate against or support some debatable interests from the point of view of democracy and balance which hardly manage to maintain a political/cultural balance between tradition and specific elements of globalization. All this invades social consciousness in the on-line environment, where the fight tends to take a magnitude that would have been difficult to imagine in the printing era.

The most extensive public demonstrations are certainly held in the same on-line environment where the number of protesters reaches the widest representation. The communication opportunities offered by the virtual groups support the discovery and permanent formation of the Romanian collective mentality and beyond.

Relationship and networking offered by virtual platforms inevitably leads to the learning of a new way of social life where elements of traditional values blend with those of new social needs.

Therefore, particular attention should be paid to the way of a healthy development and consultation of these on-line environments, raising the level of culture of the users in appreciating and taking over the messages, especially those related to radicalization actions, referring to totalitarian or extremist attitudes.

A starting point for all platforms, groups, associations, etc. in the constitution of the group of supporters as well as in the presentation of the directions of action and the proposed goals is represented by the on-line environment, especially the social networks, the ways of relations that are within reach of the masses. Among these groups, by far the most infallible defender of the traditional values of the Romanian family is the NGO - Coalition for Family Association, having as objectives:[5]

1. Defining the family in legislation to be a fundamental institution for society. In this sense, it is necessary for the family to be built on marriage. In turn, marriage necessarily implies free consent between a man and a woman, as well as parent-child legal relationships. This form of family definition must be enshrined in the Romanian Constitution.
2. The population is obliged to be fully informed about the importance of marriage and family based on the moral and legal principles mentioned, both for themselves and for society.
3. Society's respect for and support for the family would be mandatory, as these considerations depend largely on the social peace and future of a nation.
4. The unique character of the marriage requires a reassessment and reconsideration of the status. This status needs protection in order to preserve its uniqueness and strength. Protection directly addresses non-recognition of alternative forms of cohabitation, forms that affect marriage both in terms of importance and uniqueness.
5. With regard to family education, emphasis is placed on the need for stability as a child's development environment. That is why public policies and family legislation must start from the family form in which there are a mother and a father, so we mean clearly the traditional pattern.

The most important actions of this association that triggered vehement disputes in public space began in 2013 when the Coalition for the Family campaigned to redefine the family concept (article 48). The request was aimed at a more precise reformulation that fulfilled a restrictive purpose. In particular, the Coalition opposed the legalization of alternative forms of family cohabitation, such as civil partnership. This partnership aims at eliminating the notions of spouse / children, replacing it with that of the family group partners, which leads to losing the importance of the family, throwing in the derision and then gradually eliminating one of the oldest traditional Romanian values. At the same time, this form of private union, which, according to the above, is part of the family group's contractual model makes homosexual couples marrying in public consciousness.

To this end, in 2016, the Coalition for the Family collected three million signatures in favor of replacing the expression "spouses" with "a man and a woman" in Article 48 on the family in the Romanian Constitution.[6] In support of the Coalition's initiative came the Romanian Orthodox Church, the Liberty Counsel and the Alliance Defending Freedom NGO. All these organizations have fought the Constitutional Court for a referendum in support of the Coalition's initiative. In 2016, the Constitutional Court has voted positively to revise the Constitution. Adverse reactions were not delayed: the LGBT community came in counterpart with an online petition signed with 11,000 signatures.

LGBT rights organizations such as ACCEPT, MozaiQ, and TRANSform voiced dissatisfaction with the RCC's decision, arguing that it could "lead to an increase in social tensions and hate crimes." Moreover, 24 Romanian NGOs, including Amnesty International, International Commission of Jurists, ILGA-Europe and European Commission on Sexual Orientation Law, have warned that the initiative will limit the right to non-discrimination and to the private and family life of people LGBT.[7]

2.1. Preservation/loss of national cultural identity

A Europe in which we can trust and which we continue to honor through our work and culture needs to provide us with a social, cultural, and, last but not least, legislative framework capable of satisfying our moral-Christian aspirations.

The need for harmony between individuals includes the relationship between men and women. This relationship is intimate and underpins the status of parent and its role in childcare and education. The greatest honor of an individual is to bring the descendants to the world. The rise and care of the offspring is the profession of the father. The human society's victory implies the renewal of generations, and therefore the Christian peoples will not only support the social policies that encourage and strengthen marriage, oriented towards the fulfillment of the procreation and education of the offspring.

Europe has built itself as a paradigm on a cultural background dominated by Christianity. This has led to a common European culture in which civisms has developed harmoniously forcing civil society.

In parallel, however, another Europe has emerged, which uses the moral prerogatives of true Europe, but whose action is marked by manipulation and pursues the misappropriation of Christian consciousness towards a set of values that are totally opposed to traditional Christian ones. These are the alternative values, which once put into practice (which is the right of some), create danger as potentially triggering social conflict. On behalf of certain civic forces defending tradition, this Europe has been called false.[8]

Also noteworthy are the tools with which the fight in the street, as a continuation of training from the virtual environment, tries to accomplish the desire to achieve uniformity.

The main tool on the social networks remains the discussion group, which uses pro and against of the public good, exactly in the way desired by any well-meaning citizen. On these discussion platforms the habit of planning group meetings was formed, here a certain language is being promoted, consisting of slogans and suggestions that up to a point define groups/citizens. This is the first reason that leads to the numerical growth of the group: goals that defines fundamental human rights.

But as will be seen in the future, it remains important for these goals to direct individual and then collective mentality.

The group in the streets comes to confirm the purpose of online discussions as a crowning achievement of virtual socialization. In fact, there will be many groups in the street that will promote the same values, under the same manipulative form at a given time. Equally important is that these groups occur at the desired moment, and within them are professionally infiltrated conflicting elements of the groups of sports supporters as well as persons who respond to the request to show pro or against anything. Applicants aim to increase the numerical size of the group, the respondents aim to receive money and not only. The interests being satisfied by both sides, we have the painting of a long-running tandem, based on a partnership with immoral tendencies.

We can speak here of a certain type of cohesion of chaos, which defines an accentuated state of involvement, which apparently leaves no room for escape. The common slogans of supporter groups of the new family model, and more specifically of the new lifestyle, complement the picture of uniformity, which is based on the idea of equality and the elimination of differences between individuals. The aim pursued in this case is to eliminate the differences with sexual connotation between the persons, both in terms of family and marriage.

Another element to be mentioned here is the distribution of action groups at European level and beyond. These groups tend to become part of the new normality, demand special rights, benefit from a certain influence in daily life, which gives them advantages and support.

If we look back, we remember the gay parades, which among the Romanian population almost did not find a correspondent. Over time, the Romanian mentality was conquered. There have been Romanians with sexual orientation different from that considered normal throughout the history of the Romanian people. It is not understood that there were no homosexuals in the history of the Romanian people. The novelty and more precisely the shock is the attack on the family.[9] If people with different sexual orientations existed and manifested themselves, the Romanian family of Christian origin has always been made up of man, woman, and children from their sexual union.

Serious is that on the side of these ideas are attracted people who have nothing in common with their sexual orientation towards same-sex persons. But the lack of discernment based on the lack of education in school and in the family leads the crowd to the open mind, where everything new is to be accepted, without analysis, without verification, without additional information. See also the confusion that is made even about the concept of homosexual: not allowed by many specialists in the field, opinion makers, media people, talking about homosexuals and lesbians, as if they were not part of the homosexuals. Early interpretation, lack of attention, conscientiousness, inevitably lead to the chaos mentioned above and, implicitly, to manipulation.

Of course, there has been a solidarity of those who promote these values, and above all, the idea is that they are more open to information gathering, more skilled, more prepared for adaptation, so they are superior. Hence a development of a contempt for the citizens going on the traditional road. In some countries in Europe, this experiment has succeeded. Same-sex marriages have been legalized, they can adopt children, etc. It remains to be seen whether in the Romanian national consciousness these alternative values will take the place of the traditional ones in the case of the family.

2.2. Multiculturalism – denationalization

Promoting non-discrimination is, in fact, aimed at eliminating the borders of religion, identity, race, political orientation, sexual orientation, nation, etc. In part, these efforts are welcome and even necessary, if we consider, for example, the elimination of gender gaps in the labor market as an equal pay for the same work done by men or women. But it is necessary to observe certain limits, which is not desired. Thus, the idea of equality in everything and everything appears in the equation.

The new European stream has boosted by promoting equality. After the idea of equality has been sufficiently promoted, promoters have easily moved to the next stage - multiculturalism.[10]

A Europe of multiculturalism seemed to be acceptable for the first time, considering that it was initially perceived as a sum of identity cultures, each respecting the others without affecting them in any way. In fact, it turned out to be the tolerance of some cultural values for immigrants, then to go even to the annihilation of the peoples' native culture by promoting the culture of the newcomers. Immediately after promotion, support followed. It is well known that large sums of money are being spent in Romania to build camps for immigrants, social aid and especially the construction of mosques - their traditional worship places. These financial efforts are conflicting factors that lead to a potential state of revolt, with the local population being strongly dissatisfied with the shortcomings in national infrastructure.

Of course, it must not overlook the fact that all fall within globalism, where the dominant culture will be the most common number.

The global community is also feeling its presence in Romania. Partly, collective consciousness is very busy with virtual life, which slowly but surely gains solid ground at the expense of face-to-face socialization.

If we consider that individuals relate virtually even when a real group (see the behavior of individuals when summer terraces are in groups of 5-6 people at the same table, but each is engaged in virtual communication through social networking through personal gadgets, as if they did not know each other). Sometimes hilarious, but apparently true quiet is actually an expression of global communication, to the detriment of traditional.

Apparently, one can say that the enslavement of conscience is an ongoing process and most certainly is hope that soon we will have peace of universal collective mind, because everyone will get along with everyone, we all share the same values and ideals created by the uniformity born of globalism, equality and identity of all with all.

2.3. Influence of demographic factors on traditional culture

A mixture of cultures is imminent. Only if we take into account the critical situation in the labor market we will find that the mixture of cultures will lead to the need for an increased degree of tolerance.

Labor emigration leaves a gap in the vacant area in terms of skilled labor. This happens as it is known because of the insufficient or total satisfaction of the needs of individuals, which is why they seek (and find)

[9] Giddens, A., Transformarea intimității. Sexualitatea, dragostea și erotismul în societățile moderne, Ed. Antet, București, 2000.
[10] Broderick, C., History Currents in Family Forms, în Marriage and the Family, Englewood Cliff, New York, Prentice Hall, 1988, p. 112.

what they need in other regions where they are established.

Individuals leaves, but not alone: they take with them the national culture and implement it in the host countries, with or without the acceptance of the local communities. There is still a need for labor in the area left after departure.

In Romania we face, among other things, a huge need for working in agriculture, construction, etc. In this case, the working environment in foreign areas is used by the Romanian and even European culture and civilization. This is how the elements of Asian culture and not only, and then communities, then families appeared in Romanian regions, in which completely different religions, customs, norms and values were interwoven.[11]

Demographic factors determine the change of peoples' culture, first by mixing, then by dominance. The result of the combination of cultures may be closer to one or another, depending on the perception of individuals, their power of adaptation, the degree of annihilation, and any antagonism that might exist between competing values.

2.4. The Romanians' absolute need of belonging to the traditional family

A certain form of chaos that gradually builds up in individual consciousness and then forms the collective matrix leads to a lack of motivation both individually and collectively about aspirations, ideals, the future. It is the land that is conducive to the demotivation of establishing a family to procreate.

Many people are skeptical about the hopes of returning to the previous social order. The despair that emerges in collective consciousness is related to the lack of social order in the context in which groups of immigrants with a totally different educational culture and even the opposite of the collectivities in which they have entered benefit from a certain kind of unofficial autonomy that contradicts the law. This situation gives rise to a state of insecurity and especially loneliness. The individual no longer feels like part of the entire collectivity, he no longer feels protected by the authorities, which leads to isolation. This isolation of everyone in the company of all, represents the general framework of globalism.[12]

Others, on the other hand, argue that there is an alternative to this situation. What would that be? Regarding Romania, we could say that the alternative is the fact that although the Romanians are subjected to the attack of virtual nature, at the end of an activity, a day of work or recreation, they come back within the family. Beyond chaos, virtual relationships, social networks, immigrants with most shocking behaviors, violence in different ways, nothing is overtaking the family, made up of mother, father, sister brothers, etc.

Of course, in Romania, as in any other state, there are monoparental families, etc., but most of the families function according to the traditional model and, above all, the Romanian-born Christian, has the matrix of his own consciousness built on the basis of the primary group, the traditional family. The needs and expectations of the Romanian citizen involve the family in all mental constructs governed by moral values. It belongs to the family having an associated gender parent, a father with an associated gender role, the two statuses being inseparable, in a reciprocal relationship, but never interchangeable. He is the family, and his family belongs in the above form, defines it, gives it dignity, and gives affection.

The gradual loss of sovereignty, de-nationalization, loss of national cultural identity, are the cornerstones of globalization. The last bastion, the most difficult to conquer, refers to culture. Why? Because the elements of culture are deeply entrenched in the mind, and individually bear as many physical deprivations, as long as he thinks how he wants, he judges at will and, in particular, is intimidated. The most important cultural value of the human individual is the family. The family is, among other things, its refuge, the fortress where no intruder penetrates, where it is protected and protected.

It is not hard to note that the followers of the change at any price, the traditional values combatants, operate with values that are unanimously appreciated and promoted: equality, non-discrimination, freedom, etc. It remains to be seen how many of us, the Romanians, especially after a period of limitations and constraints (see the Communist era), have the willingness to digest the scheming through the values we are promoting. Freedom and equality describe us as a nation, but it remains important to us who proposes them, in what form and purpose.

4. Conclusions

So the notion of family (traditional or modern) and the way it is accepted at the level of the Romanian society has given rise to a series of interpretations and sensitivities. Understanding how it is perceived helps to better adapt communication among individuals and avoid tensions that can often degenerate into conflicts between various social groups.

Introducing this study into the curriculum of the CSDP e-learning process and its extension to the other EU Member States would better help to understand these sensitivities and to calibrate approaches on these themes that will lead to the avoidance of escalating antagonistic positions in the approach and implementation of some projects relevant to the Union.

Last but not least, assessing the understanding of the family concept in third countries where the EU external missions under the auspices of the CSDP would help participants to better understand how the family is perceived in that country, the sensitivities generated by these customs and the avoidance of antagonisms in the implementation of the mandate received.

These studies developed before detaching EU representatives to foreign missions and introducing them into the CSDP e-learning curriculum would be of great help in deepening the understanding of social phenomena in the area of responsibility and facilitating a beneficial interaction with the population of that country.

THE URBANIZATION OF RURAL COMMUNITIES, BETWEEN THE SOCIAL NEED AND THE URBAN CULTURE INVASION

Mirela Cristiana NILĂ STRATONE

Abstract

In studying the relationship between urban and rural, it is necessary to address the needs of rural communities through the invasion of technological and informational progress.

Urban rural migration and vice versa determined the translation movement of the traditions of rural communities that he moved to the city. From here, to the village, technology, information, urban values, both negative and positive, have begun.

The existing differences tend to fade away. This is, on the one hand, a positive outcome in terms of improving the living conditions in the countryside, educational level and entertainment. On the other hand, we can also talk about a negative result, as the blurring of urban-rural boundaries leads, among other things, to the elimination and sometimes to the loss, of elements of tradition and folklore.

An extremely important role, of course, is the family, as the nucleus of each community. Of course, it is not to be neglected its particularities, which outline the difference between the village family and the town family.

However, even at the level of the family group we can see cultural changes. This group is opening up more and more, so gradually there can be noticed a diminishing of the differences between the rural family group and the urban family group. The constant migration of family members, from city to village and from village to city, leads to the intermingling of cultural values, a certain uniformization of education, a new family matrix in the future, valid for the entire population of the country. However, the differences will coexist with a certain form of uniformity.

Alongside the vision of village development, it is also interesting to apply the urban culture at the village, the cultivation of traditional family values, as well as the tendency to eliminate the differences between village and city, both in terms of human lifestyle, comfort , and education.

Keywords: the spirit of the communities, revalorization of rural lifestyle, a new typology of rural territories, multitude of ruralitys, the new poverty.

1. Introduction

The study of the differences between urban and rural areas emerged as a necessity to the social need existing on both sides.In the rural area appeared the need for comfort, technology, modernism, new culture, as a response of their lack. They were overlooked over time, as the village human „looked over the fence" and wanted to have what his neighbor had from the city. In the urban environment appeared the need for tradition, the continuity of the authentic, in response to "longing," from home. The urban individual did not look ahead, over the fence, he looked behind and longing took possession of his conscience. And if he does not have roots in the village, if he was born in the city, he does not have "miss home, miss of village". He has curiosity. It's a curiosity born of the ancestral need.

In order to be able to analyze and understand such a relationship, it is necessary first to make some clarifications regarding the borders between the two socio-administrative dimensions, as well as between the complex borders of each these dimensions.

The idea of community is in itself a social construct, the result of a sociological construction. Of the two community models, the rural and the urban ones, the rural community is the one that holds the traditional values, it is the oldest, which existed long before the appearance of the rural community.[1]

The community itself, regardless of its rural or urban sphere - presents itself as a set of interactions, patterns of behavior, and social expectations, all along the well defined and at the same time conscious social role of individuals. The materialization of behavioral actions responds to social expectations, the latter based on norms, values, beliefs, language, all forming a common basis for the individuals who make up the community.

It is necessary to specify, because we have mentioned the idea of community value, that the fundamental value transmitted by the romanian village (and not only the romanian one) is represented by the feeling of the community.[2]

The borders of communities are not guarantees to preserve their specificity. The borders of communities are blurred. The only stable issue seems to be just the administrative-territorial dimension, although it also suffers changes over time. Beyond that, the interaction between individuals belonging to different communities leads to the blurring of borders, the assimilation of cultural elements, action that includes aculturation, endoculturation, and elements of ethnocentrism, all of which lead to the birth of new cultural values, more or less slightly removed from the original ones. That is why we can safely say that the boundaries of a community are neither precise nor definitive.

Of the two categories of communities, the urban community is the one with the most blurred borders. The cause? The high degree of heterogeneity of population, with regarding to the origin of individuals, language, religion, behavior pattern, etc. If in the rural area the specific community is reduced to the village, in the urban area it can be a neighborhood, in old times a slum, or another urban division. This appears as part of a wider community, such as a city or municipality, which is, as the case may be, a part of a larger administrative-territorial organization, such as megalopolis. When the community is more extensive, the degree of heterogeneity is higher at all levels and borders are more diffuse.

2.1. The social perspective of human settlements

The human settlements are human organizations, with the whole set of social values that make up the social life of the community. Every human community has its own social life, characterized by cultural and moral values, specific social norms and sanctions. From here It results that a human community does not refer only to the sum of houses and not just to a sum of individuals. The human community refers to a socio-cultural system - we speak of one's own way of cultural life, with inter-human relations, attitudes and specific behavioral manifestations - that embraces and transcends the "sum of the lives of its inhabitants"[3].

The cultural lifestyle of a community is learned by humans, because, in addition to the cultural heritage transmitted by tradition, new elements emerge permanently. Is manifest a certain social animation in response to the challenges of change. The social change of the community concerns first of all its social organization. The animation contains a so-called animator, which is nothing but an agent of change. He trains individuals into the race to learn new social elements that will shape the social life of the community in the future.

The notion of community is a socio-cultural construct. The culture of a community consists of people's beliefs, actions, behaviors, but only those learned, both through the process of enculturation (socialization) and the process of acculturation (social re-learning by adding, changing, in order to maintain the status within the community).

It should be noted that the culture transcends the people: she is superorganic, being made up of the sum of the individual crops of individuals, but it is not limited to the sum. The result of these cultures, their sum, gives rise to a new entity, which is the very culture of the community. But she does not reduce itself to the cultural baggage of each individual, because it will not put to eguality what is happening in the community as a whole, with what happens at the particular level of the members of the community. This is the case in which the quantity changes the quality (see the relationship between individual consciousness and collective consciousness). Although a human community is a whole, it does not mean it is governed by harmony. It breathes on the basis of the social conflicts inside her. The conflictual character ensures its cultural renewal, thus continuity.

The spirit of the community

The most powerful liant in a community is represented by its spirit. The spirit of a community lies in the fact that members are aware of their belonging to the community. This awareness includes the idea they all have about themselves, as a collectiv, what it implies a certain fidelity. The community spirit is identified himself with fidelity, and from this connection results the motivation of the members of the community to act for the welfare of the community, as a whole belonging to them and with which, at the same time, they identify themselves.

The role of urbanization in the rural community

- the village-city opposition

Exaggerated urban expansion and degradation of the quality of life in urban space underlies the analysis of the village-city opposition.[4]

The opposition between town and village has emerged in the process of the social work division. This has, among other things, led to the division of society into antagonistic classes. The economic base of the city was constituted on the exploitation of the village's resources. In this way it appeared the specific opposition of village-city, which led to the economic, political and cultural remaining ago of the village compared to the city.

The differences betwen urban and rural continue to mark the everyday life of individuals, even though rural communities in developed societies, have largely urbanized themselves their way of life in response to social needs. The difference can be seen even in social representations.

Continuously analyzing the differences between the village and the city, it is easy to see that the countryside is dominated by positive valences: spiritual cleanliness, harmonious coexistence with nature ... "a space that preserves rather than transforms, is rather visited than inhabited, and belongs to the sentimental domain rather than to the domain of labor."[5]

[5] Abdelmalek A. A., Ethnographie, ethnologie et anthropologie: du singulier à l'universel, colloque AFIRSE, Rennes, 2000, p. 20.

Such a concept certainly refers to the contemporary countryside of developed countries, where modern living conditions offer true relaxation times for visitors. It should be pointed out that such spaces are not represented as a general feature even in all developed countries. Less developed countries, including Romania, although offering scenic areas to visit, are exceptions and are not subject to general representation.

- the agriculture

An expression of the social need but also of the technology interference with the countryside is represented by agriculture. From the perspective of tradition, the footprint of the peasant at the ground is illustrated by individual hand-made agricultural work. However, with the development of the global food requirement, throughout history has emerged the need for expansion and development of agriculture. In this regard it is necessary to mention the fact that the peasant has resorted to technology, of course, to the extent that this was allowed.

The transformations from agriculture, the reconfiguration of the agricultural holding, the whole set of changes that formed the basis to the work of the peasant, as well as the relations between the rural family and the agricultural holding, make the object to the social need of urbanization. This expresses the need for agricultural mechanization, to the emergence of coherent agrarian policies, agriculture demanding its right to a special place in national policy - national - also european and global funding. This involves a whole and complex series of processes with major implications for the rural community, on the rural as a whole, which encompasses and exceeds the agrarian.[6]

- the place of peasants (farmers) in society

The concepts of "peasant" and "rural" are the subject of what in the European discourse is expressed in the notion of "peasant society". This type of society or community is considered complex and organized by rules that oppose modernity and, moreover, advanced modernity. From this conflict, the type of traditional peasant society or community disappears, the place of the peasant being taken by the farmer, a social category formed by other rules, respectively the logic of the market relations in the modern societies.[7]

From this perspective, three determinant dimensions have been emphasized in the modern society:

1. evolution of the place and role of the farmer in the national economy;
2. the transformations of layers and social groups from the agricultural population;
3. the changes from the context of production social relations of the agricultural holding.[8]

The disappearance of the traditional peasant society is one of the results of the peasant's need for new, modern machinery, through which he sought and managed to ease his work and at the same time to cope with the increased need for agricultural production. The shift from individual worck in household to collective work on large fields, the administrative and territorial coordination regarding the raport between demand for food and production required, as was normal, a revolution of simple, primitive agricultural tools. Acestea au fost înlocuite cu mașini mai complexe, care au dus la o creștere a producției agricole, care ulterior a dus la crearea unor mașini mai avansate, automate. Thus, the farmer's work has been relieved, which gradually removes him from the labor process: robots are emerging that are increasingly replacing the human factor.

Of course, it is not fair to say that the traditional peasant has disappeared.

It continues to exist through individual work, in its own household, keeping in a certain proportion the custom and the skill to work the land in simple, traditional style. But these examples are singular and on the verge of extinction. This happens because the individual living in the village feels the need for a more comfortable way of life, the ease of physical work, and the gain of a space of time that in the modern society uses for non-existent activities in the past.

2.2. The developing of rural society

An answer to the social need for urbanization and, at the same time, urban invasion in the countryside is illustrated with success in the arrangement of rural territory in modern society. The modern constructions arise both whith respect to the family houses and other household annexes. Urban utilities such as the water supply network, electricity, gas network, sewerage network, public transport network, public transportation facilities, medical dispensaries, the construction of places of worship, as well as other administrative-territorial units, bring major changes in the lives of individuals and the rural community as a whole. All this is nothing more than a projections of the urban from the big cities, in response to peasants' demand for a decent life in today's society. In this way it was born a new type of community, the peri-urban or the suburban. It should be mentioned that with the territorial reorganization, in the rural community, some agricultural lands have changed their destination, being transferred in to the land for construction, becoming from outside lands, intravilan lands. Thus, local development has gradually led to the development of much of the rural community through modernization, technology and, last but not least, at the change in people's mentality. The resistance to old, to traditionall, has succumbet to the need of comfort, making room for more and more modern urban elements. Romanian sociologist D. Gusti, the founder of the Sociological

School at Bucharest, has analyzed the factors on which the differentiated development of the communities is based:

- • the cosmological or natural framework;
- • the biological framework;
- • the psychological framework;
- • the historical framework.

The natural (cosmological) framework refers to the spatial fixation of communities. Terrestrial space is characterized primarily by heterogeneity and lack of uniformity. As defining elements that structure the terrestrial space we have:

− the hydrophoresis (hydrological network) - has as central element the water, essential to life; the hydrological network is the cheapest means of transport and communication that man has used throughout history; most of the social conflicts of the communities, had as their source the mastery of hydrological networks.

− the atmosphere (the succession of the seasons) determines the pace of community existence;

− the lithosphere (forms of relief) are the basis forms of community settlements / habitation and access to subsoil resources; access to mineral resources leads to a higher level of civilization, an advanced way of life for the privileged/exploitative community;

− the biosphere (flora and fauna): a rich flora creates the development of agro-technical activities, and a rich fauna generates the development of zootechnical activities.

The rural communities depend on the natural environment they live and, as needed, they modify, adapt, transform, according him, to ever-changing requirements.

The needs of a community reflect the culture of the community, expressed on the basis of material and spiritual values - traditions, customs, beliefs and, last but not least, education.

The biological framework

The most well-known theory regarding this dimension is the organicist theory, on the basis of which human communities can be likened to complex biological organisms. Regarding the biological framework, we have the law of natural selection.

Also, the same organicist theory gave rise to racist ideas, which in turn led to extremist ideologies.

The psychological framework is created by psychosociology.

This tries to capture by what methods and how much the community forces its members to impose specific features that can distinguish them from members of other communities.

Each community becomes a matrix of specific behavioral patterns that its members are obliged to assimilate for integration.

The historical framework puts the mark of communities from the perspective of their past at all levels. Here comes into play the collective memory that shapes the social consciousness of community members. n this basis the social action will be manifested. The preserving of the past gives rise to a conservative ideology. In addition, the innovation appears to be an absolutely necessary and determining factor for the progress of communities. The innovation will be internalized on an individual basis and put into practice as a social activity.

Environment

The demand who come from the countryside to implement urban elements in rural life has led to the perturbation of the ecological balance. The exploitation of the rural environment in the interests of industry, tourism, etc., the consumerism that has escaped from control, has inevitably led to the impaired of the natural environment.[9] This has led to the need for rational management and protection of the environment (water, soil, forests, etc.), all relating to man's relationship with nature. Awareness of this is the first step and also the most important in the effort of conservation and keeping the environment, which leads to the salvation of nature and of course of life.

In today's society, we are witnessing a revalorization of rural lifestyle, especially by the urban population subject to stress and pollution.[10] The rural world is considered by the urban individual as a carrying and, at the same time, a belonging of the authentic. For this, the rural life means returning to origin, tradition, and last but not least, at nature. The periurban, dominated by his residential function, which is born under these conditions, is nothing more than the social consequence of the action of increasing revaluation of rurality in public representation.

The urban elements required by the rural community have arrived, but without limits, more than required, so the valences of the rural area are increasingly demanding help regarding of environmental problematic.

On the base of these aspects, we are witnessing the return to rural (retromigration), to specific values. The phenomenon of retromigration makes its presence felt in many areas of the planet. As society is modernized, the peasant and the traditional peasant community disappear, while at the same time subsisting, preserving a different rurality, defined primarily by the spatial or ecological dimension. There is, therefore, a reconsideration of the role of nature, of the environment, in sociological theory.[11]

The rural community is constantly changing. We are witnessing fundamental mutations, including the gradual diminishing of differences between urban life and rural life. In this sense, we are witnessing the emergence of new differentiations. These differentiations can be approached from two major perspectives: one on an inevitable decline, the other on a very interesting revival.

Thus, a new typology of rural territories is being built: agro-industrial, forestry, tourism, peri-urban, residential, etc.[12] This typology of rural areas is the premise of the emergence of a multitude of ruralitys, where we find several rural communities clustered around a nucleus.

2.3. The poverty

The social need of the rural community was born, among other things, also because of the consumption poverty, which is characteristic of the urban environment. This side of poverty is acting and there is depending also on consumption that is done in households. It is much more extensive and at the same time deeper in rural than in urban areas. The solutions to blurring this phenomenon have been appears in economic growth, which has inevitably led to an increase in social inequality.

As such, the rural need regarding of the reduce the level of consumption poverty has attracted in special the forced installation of another social phenomenon in the rural community: the social inequality. The social inequality is also a new form of poverty, called by sociologists "the new poverty". Against the backdrop of the decline in consumer poverty, which is based on economic growth, on the development of the rural community, the new poverty explodes by accentuating the social inequality, weakening the cohesion of the social group and having a clear trajectory towards the ultimate goal: the social exclusion. In this situation, we must point out that the new poverty, is own of the urban, penetrates the countryside, is multidimensional, is extreme and creates vulnerability, the individual's life becoming unpredictable.

Approached as a phenomenon - found between the need of the rural community to develop economically and the penetration from the urban vulnerabilities, lacked of economic security - the differentiation of poverty between urban - rural, highlights four major characteristics[13]:

1. the poverty of consum is in the rural environment, the economic poverty actioning more stronger in urban areas; the action is a violent one, and the causes consist in filling of lack of money with household products, by the peasants, compared to the lack of solutions of the townspeople;
2. the economic and social transformations are more pronounced in the urban environment, which negatively affects the urban population, which has no alternative to the economic crisis to obtain subsistence assets, as in rural areas;
3. the group solidarity differs in intensity from urban - where it is low, to rural - where it is increased; the family group itself does not have the same power of support, understanding, in the event of a crisis in the city compared to the rural family;
4. the sources of risk differ according to the residence environment: in rural areas, the main sources of risk are related to the nature, while in the urban environment they belong of the workplace, and the existence of the salary.

3. Conclusions

It can be said that the urbanization of rural communities has been and continues to be an irreversible phenomenon. It has its origin in the social need of the community, expressed in the peasant's desire to have a livelihood, to improve in different specializations in the non-existent education system in rural areas. Once the educational goal is met, the peasant impregnated with urban values returns to the village and brings with it urban culture.

The need to return to tradition does not take into account the fact that life in the country has changed, and the authentic looking dash has acquired new forms. However, it still exists.

The convergent elements described above show that the urbanization of the village is both an expression of the peasants' need to lighten and improve their way of life and the invasion of the city with all its positive and negative aspects, through which gradually the traditional village disappears and the differences urban-rural fades.

DEMOCRACY AND ELECTORAL OUTCOMES: COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF NIGERIA AND IVORY COAST ELECTIONS

Harrison Oluwaseyi OGUNKALU[*]
Anthony ENIAYEJUNI[]

Abstract

An election is an integral and essential part of democracy, which means that without an election, the concept democracy is impossible and without international accepted democratic process of election, a geopolitical environment cannot be termed democratic system. The quality of such system has to be inclined with the rule of law, freedom of speech and association, free and fair democratic election exercise and some other human necessity that make life livable for every individual residing in such environment. However, most West African states have been confronted with electoral violence and political instability, which has always been caused by electoral malpractices or unjust electoral process. This study will examine the mechanism put in place by International and regional bodies like United Nation, African Union and ECOWAS in relation to the twin concepts, and how it aid lasting solution to the electoral crisis in Nigeria and Ivory Coast, through comparative analysis.

Introduction

An election is a major component of democracy, while it (Democracy) is the bedrock of any social-political society, which makes that society a livable place for the citizen and others. Without a proper election, democracy cannot be identified. And in the absence of democratic rules, the essential livelihood of an individual residing in such geopolitical society will be interrupted or threatened. This has been one of the greatest confrontations most nations in the continent (Africa) have been facing in one way or the other, particularly western part. In other for democracy to be practiced the way it should, ELECTION has to be conducted in an appropriate way and manner (free and fair), which will allow a smooth transition of power and office, that will create amicable passage for the rightful elect to take charge in the corridor of power in such post. Historically, most West African state has been facing differences in democratic settings which have always been created due to the improper or unjust electoral process. From this point of view, scholars and authors in time past have asked salient questions that, on what stand the Africans leaders institute their own democratic system. What attitude are they (Leaders) showing toward this concept? The traditional explanation of African political system shows that most individuals create there political ideology based on their political foundation, which they meet on the ground, or in some cases try to look for a solution to their present societal situation (Mattes and Bratton, 2007).

Furthermore, election and political participation in Africa, according to some analysts, mostly don't put rare fact into consideration, such as an individual may decide to go in line with a particular political tenure or ideology, due to the fact that this individual knows more about their content and possible outcome of such tenure. From the above explanation, it is established that democracy cannot survive without the full participation of the citizen, and by probing this fact, an analytical consideration has to be put in place whereby two political society will be considered, by looking into their electoral system, to establish fact that, is democracy truly in play or a mirage in this societies.

The research will be analytical, the conceptualized approach which will expatiate on why democracy and election in Africa have been experiencing violence and why the democratic process should be giving a prior consideration in the electoral process. In other to achieve this, I will base my argument on previous scholars write up, which negate the fact that democracy can only survive in Africa if colonial interest is at a minimal level. Their influence should not overshadow the real agenda of these states. A typical example is the case of Ivory Coast and some other francophone countries whereby the French has a major say in their democratic process and sometimes decide on the political party to be in power. The same goes to Nigeria and some other Anglophone state too. In some cases, the colonial masters are not directly involved but in one way or the other their opinion count. With the above explanation, the nature of democracy and election process which both countries have been applying and why it has been resulting to electoral crisis, political uphill and democratic instability. The analysis will be directed to 2011 and 2015 presidential election in Nigeria and 2010 and 2015 presidential election in Ivory Coast which brings a new face of democratic process to both countries respectively, also at this period, both countries experience election malpractice according to some international electoral observers, but to some extent there is still some element of democratic process which gives room for transition of power in Nigeria while it lead to civil war in Ivory Coast.

Literature Review

Democracy

Countless authors, scholars, writer, politician, and other practitioners in the field of politic, government and related fields have to shield more light on the definition of democracy. According to (Hollyer et al, 2011), using the concept of Dahl's describe democracy as a conceptual framework that has to be free in the dissemination of information within a system, and must be coupled with the element of transparency in other to actualized its purpose. From this point of view, the election process has to be giving more priority and maintain democratic process in organizing it, which will create an avenue to manage the political challenges and crisis that may come up before, during and after the election. From another point of view, democracy should have some element of sovereignty. From this perspective, democracy can also be described as the system that comprehends in a way that is governed by some group of individuals who take charge of the political affair, of a sovereignty society. The concept of democracy has been long used, which can be traced back to the days of the classical age. But it gains more attention after the wake of the cold war whereby sovereignty nations and society started calling for free flow information, freedom of speech, freedom of association, democratic election processes and so many more human rights to participate in the modern day government (Coppedge, et al, 2011). Furthermore, in a combination of all these ideas, as it was used co-note supremacy. A geopolitical society, in respectful of the size should attain some amount of self-freedom to decide on what they want and do not. This will amount to achieving the true concept of democracy. Another good example of democracy can be deduce from the definition of (Urbinati, 2010), which state that the conceptual framework cannot be avoided in political discussion, because through it lots of issues truncate into an object which the general society will able to determine the worth of such object and make it the matter of public notice and open societal opinion. To buttress Urbinati explanation, in relation to this research work, the democratic process is the key to good governance and this can only be successful through a process of participation by every individual particularly citizenry. Hence, in defining democracy, and its process in a geopolitical society that has once experience undemocratic system in time past, can best describe the way in which power changes hand during 2015 general election Nigeria and lead to abuse of rule of law during 2010 presidential election in Ivory Coast.

Election

It is the primary and systematic way which gives a mandate to an individual or group of people who which to contest for a political post that require competitive screening or consensus by the general public. After the process (election) candidate that emerges with the majority vote, automatically attain autonomy to lead, or as a representative of that state or constituency. Furthermore, an election is a methodology, also avenue that usher new regime informs of changes that can happen to a society. It is also an intricate arrangement of exercise which is made out of various factors that demonstrate and relies upon one another. In addition, we can also see an election as a system of formulating actions of aggregate choice that happens in a surge of associated precursor and consequent conduct. In further explanation, election process includes the interest of the general society in the anticipation of how to choose their own head (Leader) and the way they will be part of the administration (Iyayi, 2004). The exercise (Election), is not only based on the activities of that particular date or period, but it makes up of an important aspect of the process, which simply mean that the exercise is a preprocess and post process. To make this exercise more meaningful and official, enactment and writing documents inform of constitutional backup will be require to formulate this exercise, by taking note of political party's names, re-bursting political parties, production of election documents, manpower, machineries and so many other items that will be needed for the success of the exercise.

In continuation of the importance of an election, we can equally say that elections are the process that institute democracy in a geopolitical society, which logically means that, the absence of election is the absence of democracy and other way round. An election is that machinery that makes governmental administration successful. From the qualitative explanation of how the election is important in a geopolitical environment, it simply says that election is a cognizant aspect of a democratic, economic and continuation process of a state or country. So talking about the election process and how it contributes to the success of democracy, the concept should be considered viable to some developing nation and post-crisis society where it will be of great opportunity for such society to truncate into the crisis-free environment if it's properly managed and make the social democratic process barely adequate. To summarize my explanation, an election process did not only stand for the successful implementation of democracy, but it also makes a political post more challenging and competitive for the participants.

Theoretical Argument

To be honest, it's a fact that can't be thrown away when talking about comparative analysis of democracy and election outcome in Nigeria and Ivory Coast, it may sound not too important, unless it's been stage on the wider perspective of theoretical explanation, in other to give a clear understanding of the main discussion. Furthermore, this will help in a broad way, to give direction in a wider measure on how to indicate the firmness and inadequateness of determining and structuring a democratic electoral process in the near future. This will give us an opportunity to come up with a related decision which can be used in a broader scope. Despite those theories that gives us understanding to circumstances, there is no objection to this fact that theoretical ideal models are most adamant to bend and divide in their definition to translate the electoral crisis tormenting the continent.

Some theories of democracy are without compromise, excessively adamant to explain and plan activities for a democratic election, but are in the standard of putting the preventive measure to the crisis before and after electoral exercise within and beyond a region. Furthermore, in other to analytically explain the electoral outcome of both countries, prior consideration will be giving to rationalist theory. This theory perception is understood that the foundation is seen in social economic of a geopolitical society, with an experimental system in a sociological way. Researchers in time past have attempt to carve a theory to defend the idea that most human acts are basically rational in a natural form, which indicate that human will give absolute consideration of an action outcome, either positive/negative, beneficiary or not before venturing to it.

According to (Downs, 1957, in Geys, 2006), itemize conditions that an individual (voter) should attain before he or she can be considered as a rationalist, which goes thus:

1. Voters may not easily settle on a particular choice when stood with a scope of options (Candidate). They can pick between various options, depending on whom they need to be a leader. The psyche of this group (voters) isn't settled, not realizing what they really need.
2. Virtually every voter will rank all candidate they are faced with in other to select the most needed, superiorly needed and how authentic they are to each other.
3. Voters in some cases decline to a wide range, this is because they estranged to the point were by they think no political party stands for thought or will.
4. Voters will dependably pick among conceivable candidate, which is in the position of their most needed.
5. Voters most times come to a point of no choice than to make their final decision on a particular candidate. This occurs when they are challenged with options of the same idea (Geys, 2006).

To further discuss democracy and election outcome, (Alexander, et al, 2012) from the point of argument emphasis on effective democracy index (EDI), which was based on the fact that EDI is a viable mechanism to demonstrate a link between modernization, social-cultural perspective and democratic system of sovereignty society. A typical example is the rule of law, economic stability, civil society and so many more. In other, for this research analysis to be more analytical the EDIs will be part of variables that will be considered for a detailed explanation. Talking about democracy, the right that makes it an institutional property is one factor that defines it (democracy).Property in this aspect is termed ''concept'', that differentiate qualities, some qualities are with the condition, also this condition may not include in the qualities of a particular conceptual meaning, but in some case, it is useful to elaborate more on the practice of such properties. Furthermore, talking about democratic right, for it to be meaningful, it should contain an element of laws, not just any laws, but the qualitative rule of law. the law in this aspect is not only saying to know the do and don'ts of law enforcement agency alone, but the reason is also simple, knowing this alone is not what define democracy in the modern day system, and cannot be trash when itemizing attribute that makes up democracy. But still, the rule of law is one aspect that makes democratic right quality in modern day politics. In other for this right to be more of effective, the activeness of the rule of law has to come in place by enforcement, to complement the effective democracy index (EDI) in discussing democracy and election outcome in Africa. Models of an election in the region will also be considered as well because of one structural factor that political parties put into consideration before presenting a candidate for a particular post. (Adams et al, 2011) elaborate more on ''Spatial model'' a design that includes valence attribute of a contestant in the structure of aspiring for an electoral post. When talking about contestant valence, it simply means policy component which instigate voter's outcome, i.e. campaign strategies, identification, boldness, ethical principles and a state of commitment to the national interest. The explanation obviously shows that election merit and demerit is linked to contestant valence, which can impact policy standpoint.

Furthermore, the analysis will be structured in line with the extant model, which will differentiate valence attitude, which some citizen mostly admire in a winning candidate. Along the line, criteria's like names known and the way candidate carry out his/her manifesto are sometime germane with strategic valence, but some attribute like boldness, honesty, pragmatism, and commitment to nation building is also in line with character valence. Looking at the dichotomy betwixt strategic and character aspect of valence will establish how important spatial model is. From the expression of this model, it indicated the concept was established to challenge the incumbent.

This was the typical example of 2010 and 2015 election in Ivory Coast and Nigeria respectively that came to limelight due to intrinsic interest in character valence of the eventual winner at those elections. This theoretical explanation shows that elections outcome can be used to challenge the incumbent government results.

The above analysis is a structure on character-based valence, which has an advantage over the incumbent policy, with an upper hand in both district and regional angel. Furthermore, the candidate that did not have the goodwill character against the incumbent will have to go miles far away and has to do with the present priorities. To think that a candidate naturally gives kudus to the attitude of the election successor will sound impossible to many, but from this analysis and previous scholars write up, it is clear that no one will want to go against the notion that, voters priority are mostly on the esteemed character of a candidate that aspire or aspiring a post. In fact, lots of authors and writer in the past argue to support the notion that electors priority are mostly on a candidate attitudinal quality, in which I called ''character valence'', also their priority is not limited to the candidate quality alone as well as the course of actions the candidate will adopt or carry out. For this reason, a candidate can be viewed differently and they relatively differ from the electors, this is not because of their worth, but the right motive that this candidate can manage a post or position giving to him or her. So, relating this to a spatial model of attaining a post, it can be presupposed that a candidate admires to be holding a post always. Why in other models of the above explanation believes in the outcome of their policy, which they hope will serve as a legacy after they descend from the post.

Significantly, the essential aspect that should be observed in the above discussion is that election result in Africa is mostly contested by the opposition parties claiming some irregularity and election malpractice. To recapitulate, election outcome in Africa which mostly lead to the crisis should always be giving prior attention to know the root cause and give time to all parties involved to air their sides of the exercise, in other to establish a structure that will tackle the foundational issue. In the case of Ivory Coast, citizenship identification and ethnicity is the root cause of election crisis. While in the case of Nigeria, both ethnicity and political parties' rotational agenda.

OVERVIEW OF NIGERIA AND IVORY COAST

NIGERIA

Nigeria is a country with an unfortunate amalgamation history, due to the formulation system by the then British colonial masters (Halliru, 2012). Presently in population density, it almost 190 million inhabitants and from this details, Nigeria is seen as the most populated country in Africa, and according to (world meter) ranking, Nigeria is occupying 7th position in the world populated country. Nigeria was put together as a colony in the year 1914, which was term amalgamation era. It is also one of the largest Oil producing countries (OECD, 2002). Nigeria was pronounced as an independent state in 1960, from the British colonial masters, ethical crisis plunge the country into coup d'état in 1966, coupled with three years civil war, that erupted from the eastern part (Igbo) for the agitation of BIAFRA Nation. Almost eight coup d'état occurred between 1966- 1993, amounting to 16 years of military invasion in Nigeria democratic rule, until 1999 when the fourth republic started (Owolabi & Folasayo, 2009).

Due to political instability in Nigeria, ethnic and religious crisis has become a day to day activities, from one region to other. Along the line, the issue of terrorism creped in, and until today in Nigeria, the solution has not been met. The oil production that should benefit the general populace of Nigeria, has only been enjoyed by a few people, who are also in charge of the wealth of the country. Nigeria, is a country where rich get richer and the poor get poorer, people living in abject poverty and below 1$ per day (country watch, 2018).

Nigeria democratic process is a conceptualized framework of the governmental system, which took after the United States of America pattern of government. The U.S.A. democratic system is among the developed democracies of the planet, and if I may say number one in the world. But in the case of Nigeria, it's said categorically that among the developing nations of the world, Nigeria democracy is befitting. In Nigeria, elections outcome has always been an issue, which in time past, usually usher in the military to take over the affairs of the government. But as it may be, 1993 general election (June 12) was a year the country first experience free and fair election and Moshood Kashimawo Abiola (MKO), was declared winner for the presidential seat., Gen. Ibrahim Babangida Gbadamosi who was then military head of state annulled the result and install an interim government in the person of Ernest Shonekan, who only stayed in power for one month before another military personnel in the person of Late Gen. Sani Abacha, took over power. During the cause of the annulment and transitions, the country was experiencing civil unrest and military marginalization, which also truncate into the loss of property and lives (Ifukor, 2010).

Between the periods of 1993-1999, the country was governed by the military heads. Until May 29, 1999, when power was hand over back to a democratic system of government. After the first and second regime of the fourth republic, that end in May 2007, usher in another new transition era, but with the same political party. The main point of my discussion will be drawn from the two later elections, which brought a new face of democracy to the country. Elections of this two period in Nigeria was a historical event, 2011 serves as a preparation period and 2015 was the balancing period (Omodia, 2012). The reason was that power change hand from one political party to another. Looking at Nigeria geopolitical structure as a federal system during 2011 preparation for the general election, which the country comprises of 36 states, aside from the capital, with 774 local council, 8,800 areas for voting registration and 111,119 voting centers, which includes all Senate and state districts across the federation (Jega and Hillier, 2012), indicate the country was fully preparing for a democratic electoral exercise, which also affirms element of democracy.

To sum up 2015 election hyped electoral system in Nigeria and was a progressive step that confronts challenges of time past, which has always been an obstacle to the true democratic process of the election the country and again equally consolidate the foundation that was established in 2011 election exercise. From the look of things, Nigeria electoral body is trying all they could to get to the pinnacle of an advanced system in the electoral process, with time I so much believe Nigeria electoral system will achieve the height of the developed world in all aspect of the democratic process. In other for this to be attained, stakeholders need to be in good relationship with the government and its representative, particularly in the aspect of the electoral process, because election process is a key aspect of a countries developmental plan.

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

This country, used to be one of the leading coffee planting nations in Africa, this geopolitical society is also identified as Cote d'Ivoire, was once viewed as an icon of solidarity among Africa nations in the continent. In 2002, Ivory Coast truncated into crisis-ridden territory after revolutionaries group from the northern part of the country agitated to take control by staging a coup d'état. At this period, it's a new face of a challenge for a nation that as once been regarded as an icon of peace and stability. After the unsuccessful 2002 coup attempt, Ivory Coast has engulfed with diversity among the citizenry, some give support to the south and others north. The strategy to do away ammunition from northern rebel and Gbagbo loyal military was unfruitful. The United Nation force and the French army was given the mandate to carry out this strategic duty, given a complain feedback that insufficient equipment was the reason behind their unfruitfulness.

Transition structure was initiated, immediately, Gbagbo five years term laps in 2005, but due to the Ivorite policy Gbagbo contest again and won, which keep him in power till 2010. Peace Accord signed in 2007 was another hope for the rebel side that, there will be a shift of power in the political arena of the country in the near future. Ivory Coast Electoral system is another sensitive aspect, 30 years after their independent, was a battle for veracious democratic practice, in spite of the country being a sovereignty state, the so call electoral democratic process was not democratically practiced, due to election strategy and party participation. At this period there is only two major political party that functions in the country despite the multiparty practice, which is Parti Democratique de la Cote D Ivoire (PDCI) and Rassemblement Democratique Africain (RDA). Late president Felix Houphouet-Boigny was the pioneer of one of the political party PDCI as of this time and the major reason of coming about the party was to kick against the French colonial rule in Ivory Coast then. During his leadership, he contested for president six-time and won all at a stretch between the spaces of 30 years 1960 - 1993 (Roberts et al, 2016). Moreso, the process was not competitive enough to prove how democratic the country is, because, during this period, there was no other political party to challenge him.

Another cognizant aspect was migration, at some appoint, Ivory Coast opens wide their border to some neighboring countries like Burkina Faso and Mali to migrate into their system, and allowed them to claim citizenship. The inflow of migrant as of 1970 has contributed a quarter to Ivorian population (Nugent, 2004:180, in Robert et al 2016).

As the journey of democratic dispensation continues, the democratic authoritarian leader then, late Felix Houphouet-Boigny remains in power till his death in 1993. Immediately after his demise, his vice ''Henri Konan Bédié'' took over power, which he later contested in 1995 and won. He was later sent out of office in 1999. Furthermore, before Bédié was thrown out of office, he implemented a policy that emphasizes on ethnicity, even to the point of working in government offices, which stated that once you are not a bonafide citizen, that indicate your both parent are Ivorian, you are not entitled to hold a government post. The Ivorite policy was so adamant, to a point that affected the present President (Alassane), who was working with the International Monetary Fund then. Alassane want to contest for the president position back in 2000, but because of the Ivorite policy he was disqualified and nailed that he (Alassane) was not full-blooded Ivorian, indicating that one of his parents was from Burkina Faso and the revised constitution done in 2000 stipulated that for any contestant, in respect the level of post his contestant for, such contestant both parent must come from Ivory Coast. This policy of ethnicity spring civil war in the country from 2002 to 2007 (Mbaku & Initiative, 2015).

Dual round of election occurred in 2010, but in the end it was totally disastrous, but the International body gives recognition to the opponent of Gbagbo, in the person of Alassane. Laurent Gbagbo was arrested and charged for war against Humanity in the international world court. Gbagbo prosecution did not end the Ivory Coast crisis. In 2012 seven UN soldier was killed, displeased Ivorian military strike in 2014 and 2017 indicated that the country is prone to political instability in the near future (Country watch, 2018).

Analysis

Scholastic research and history write up, shows that the political elite that struggles for independent as of this time did it for selfish interest, not for the liberation of their people. A good example is the case of late president Félix Houphouët-Boigny of Ivory Coast, who pioneers their dependency in 1960, and also became the first president and also remain in power till his death in 1993. During his era there was no true multi-party electoral participation, in such a scenario, it's less a democratic dictatorship, which –hides under the pretense of being a democratic leader.

In the case of Nigeria, it was Coup d'état, that crippled the initial concept of democratic participation that was agitated at the early stage of dependency. Three years after the independent, the young and inexperienced country plaque into political instability by a coup. Few years after, the civil war emerge in 1966, research shows that ethnic marginalization in the armed force unit was one major reason for the war out broke. The problem of ethnicity, religion and regional marginalization can be seen in these two countries, also peculiar to most other African countries, if not to the entire continent. The idea of the colonial era in most West African countries, if not all, fairly chose governments representatives via electorate system as most countries do in another part of the globe, this is significant new to the prelude of the political surface in Africa (Kacowicz, 1997: 375 in Pernice, 2013). But the concept of democracy has been sermonized, trusting the fact that its only form of true governmental system that is reliable to human relations, and crisis management. In another way, dictatorship is an idea of a government that engineer crisis in divers of ways (IPA, 2003). Toward the later part of the cold war, the developed world preached the concept of democracy to Africa, equally advice that this concept is the only way forward in the continent (Mitchell, 2011). From this point view, it is understood that, most country that did not allow proper electoral democratic system in their country's i.e. (Ivory Coast) during Gbagbo refusal to accept election result and (Nigeria) during the Abacha era, make the international body to suspend their financial contribution (aid) to this countries until international conduct of electoral process take shape. This gives us the sense of reasoning that, for any crisis-prone society to live to expectation, after the crisis, a rightful mechanism must be put in place (Hanlon, 2005).

Mechanism

It is understood that mechanism can be an arrangement of the analogical idea that will aid the concept of resolution in any situation. A typical example is this research, which along the line itemize contribution of international and regional bodies like UN, AU, and ECOWAS, which create machinery that will resolute crisis before and after the election. In the part of United Nation (UN), a subunit called United Nation Development Project (UNDP) came about an agenda to promote mutual discussion between all stakeholders, from the electorate (political parties) to electoral, NGOs, civil societies and institutions (government and private), which is targeted to establish peace or avert election crisis and its associated occurrence and for everyone involved to concur with outcome of the election in good faith (Amaka, 2014). Furthermore, codes of conduct introduced by the UNDP informs of enactments that gives room for all stakeholders involved in the exercise (election) to have access to a government source. UNDP activities also truncate to supervision, verification, sequence, and accountability, harmonizing and assisting of external/internal bystander (Von Borzyskowski, 2015).

The regional bodies have a similar structure of mechanism with the international body, but with slight dichotomy. African Union and Economic Community of West Africa State try to lay more emphasis on the political formation or composition of each country, in other to create atmosphere whereby citizens will be free to vote and be voted for in respect of geographical locations, political party or post eyeing for as long it all guided by the rule of law and the spirit of democracy is embedded in the whole process (Hammar, 2009:52 in Mapuva, 2013). The political formations of these countries, institute self-reliance electoral management body (EMB) that will oversee a free and fair exercise. Their part EMBs is very important throughout and beyond the exercise. For these bodies to be more effective and respected by all participant, geopolitical constitution backup is introduced (Makumbe, 2009: 156 in Mapuva, 2013). Furthermore, to summarize the mechanism on a global scale, the interpretation of eight democratic theorems embedded in article 25 of International Covenant on Civil and Political Right (ICCPR) of 1966 is a good standing point of explanation on how to achieve the international accepted process of democratic election exercise (López-Pintor, 2010).

The above analytical expression simple tells us that a democratic system is the only reliable form of government that is able for general participation. It's the acceptable form of government, quoted by International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank (WB), as part of the obligatory that can aid developmental structure of any geopolitical society (Kaufmann & Kraay, 2008). It further illustrates that any geopolitical environment that is accountable, continuation in an internationally accepted democratic system, run corruption free society and encouraging of personal business enterprise to their citizen under normal rule of law, can be identified has been responsible and up doing nation.

However, from this point, it indicate that Nigeria and Ivorian crisis are basically ethical which has been in existence from the independent period and over the years it has degenerated into political and economic crisis.

Ivory Coast crisis, that later regenerated from 1999 coup d'état caught the citizen and global community unexpected, but political unrest and other crisis rocking the country were not unexpected. Tracking the situation back to the early days of the country independent, until the mid-90s when seen as a nation experiencing turmoil and political instability, contributed wholly by division, violent clashes and overbearing leaderships, which make the country political structure to some irregularities in the hand of Late Felix Houphouet-Boigny, that paddle the whole affairs of the country and remain in the corridor of power for more than three decades. All this later contribute to democracy uphill in Ivory Coast. Aldo the late president (Houphouet-Boigny) did all he could during his leadership, to make the country as one entity in spite of diversity of different ethnical group, he stick with the nation promise before independent to leave as one family and believe in one cause as a nation, which makes other countries identify Ivory Coast as "le miracle ivorien" meaning the miracle Ivory Coast as of that period.

From advent, Nigeria as a country has once experienced political stability, until 1966 when the armed force took over power from civilian and which also went along the civil war. The following emergencies were event combined of political, ethnic and religious estrangement that plunge Nigeria into ungovernable society for a length of years. Also, the impacts of the common war made clash exhaustion in the prompt post-common war time. There was no genuine risk to peace aside from the political turf where the military oligarchs occupied with the power session of upsets d'état and counter overthrow d'état. Furthermore, democracy in Nigeria has been faced with all sort of obstacle which poses the nation to a democratic messed right from the first coup de teat in 1966, up till the fourth republic in 1999 when the country starts experiencing a beat of democratic practices till date. In other to actualize this aspect, the 2015 general election was a landslide in the realm of democracy, where by-election exercise in Nigeria for the first time in history, after about sixteen years (16) of single political party dominance in the center of affairs was voted out.

One major factor that contributed to the downfall of the ruling party (PDP) was the fractionalization that struck the party and this action pave way for party loyalist from local and state level to migrate to another political party (Omotola and Nyuykonge, 2015). It was what major opposition party see as an added advantage for them to an alliance with other smaller political parties to come up with a mega one that could face People's Democratic Party. The final aspect of exit for the leading party (PDP) was the case of insecurity that Nigeria was faced with, which even amount to reason why the independent electoral commission of Nigeria (INEC) reschedule the exercise date from February 14 to March 28, 2015 (suberu, 2007; Ibrahim and Ibeanu, 2009, in Onapajo, 2014). The 2015 election was a remarkable event in Nigeria, after the country return to the democratic process in 1999 and equally mark the fifth of such exercise in Nigeria.

Conclusion

Finally, looking at the case of Nigeria and the Ivory Coast, it's clearly stated that both countries have a particular issue that has denied them of a proper democratic system. From their historical background, we realized that both countries got independent in the same year, from different colonist, but belong to the same geopolitical region. From an observation, democratic instability in both countries has some element of immaturity at the stage of agitating for self-autonomy. What the research has attempted to bring out is to institute a fact that democracy and election outcome in both countries (Nigeria and Ivory Coast) were not properly manage, in other for proper true democracy to survive in both society. This facts was establish by drawing attention from selected elections in Nigeria i.e. 2003 and 2015 and Ivory Coast 2000 and 2010 general election respectively. Furthermore, the study could briefly explain why then president of Ivory Coast Laurent Gbagbo refused to accept defeat in the 2010 election, but in the case of Goodluck Jonathan in 2015 general election in Nigeria conceded defeat even before the final announcement. From the analytical explanation of the twin concept in this research, indicate the level of democratic advancement of each country in question.

A FORM OF POST-WAR COOPERATION – SOVROM

Florina POPA

Abstract

The end of the Second World War generated major changes that profoundly marked our country's political, territorial, economic and social evolution. Within the activities aimed at the restoration and development of the post-war economy there are found the partnership forms expressed through Romania`s cooperation relations with other countries, the modalities of achievement being different, over time, in relation to the purpose pursued and the circumstances characteristic of the stages in which they were accomplished.

The study focuses on the presentation of the Romanian-Soviet cooperation, in the form of the joint ventures - of SOVROM-type and highlights the ways of establishing the collaboration, the fields and the period in which they functioned, accompanied by concrete examples.

The research methodology was the study of the speciality literature and the selection of examples with practical data in the field.

Keywords: partnership, cooperation, joint ventures, SOVROM, relations.

1. Introduction

The changes brought as a result of the end of the Second World War marked profoundly the evolution of our country at political, territorial, economic and social level. The partnership forms, from the moment of the end of the war, up to the end of the nine decade of the last century, have practically manifested itself within the cooperation relations developed by Romania, differently, externally from internally.

On external level, Romania's cooperation relations with other countries were subordinated to the political and economic situations developed among the world states, generated by the Second World War and to the events that followed its finalization, the form, the content and the consequences being different, according to the context; on internal level, these co-operations integrated and evolved according to the structural changes and the requirements of the Romanian economy, in the efforts of post-war recovery and further development.

On the domestic market, the relations have manifested itself within the cooperativization process, representing forms of organizing and development of production, in agriculture, industry and commerce. The stake was to promote the aid among the co-operative societies, principle, by virtue of which, these organizations manifested autonomy towards the state (Popescu G., 2014, p. 89).

The partnership forms on external level, expressed through cooperation relations with other countries, have manifested, differently, over time, in relation to the modalities of achievement.

Below, the Romanian-Soviet cooperation relations, in the form of SOVROM-type joint ventures will be presented.

1.1. Romanian-Soviet cooperation - through SOVROM-type joint ventures (1945 – 1956)

A form of presence of the foreign capital in post-war Romania was represented by the societies called SOVROM, a partnership between Romania and U.R.S.S., concretized in the creation of mixed-concern bodies that operated, directly, through concessions or exploitation. They were the expression of a particular character of the forms of property existent in the Romanian economy, through the involvement of a significant volume of resources (raw materials, fuel, energy, human resources) and the presence in a certain share, of the foreign capital in Romania, in the period 1945-1956 (Desmireanu I, in Constantinescu N.N. et al., 2000, p. 140).

After the negotiations conducted on May 8, 1945, the collaboration agreements between the Romanian government and U.R.S.S. related to[1]:

- an economic collaboration agreement between Romania and U.R.S.S.;
- a confidential protocol to the collaboration agreement;
- an agreement on mutual delivery of goods between Romania and the Soviet Union, […];
- an annex protocol concerning pricing;
- a protocol for the liquidation of the old accounts […] remained from the former Romanian-Soviet agreement of 1941[2].

The co-operation, materialized in the establishment of 16 Romanian-Soviet societies, included important fields of the Romanian economy (metallurgic, extractive, forestry industry, glassware etc.), the constitution principle being the equal contribution with capital, of the parties; in the case of the Soviet participation, this consisted of the German goods in Romania, which, according to the post-war treaties, came to U.R.S.S., afterwards, the Soviet side increasing its share with its own materials and equipment. (Mureşan M., Mureşan D., 1998, p. 366).

Below, examples of some companies that operated between the years 1945-1956, as well as elements of their constitution, based on agreements between the parties, are presented:

- Maritime transport – Sovromtransport, joint venture established in 1945; the contribution of the parties was as follows:
- Romania contributed with river vessels, tugs, objects of waterside installations and materials of technical provision and renovation of vessel and ports. There were also, leased to Sovromtransport, representative vessels of the Romanian fleet: Transilvania motorship 1100 tons of freight and 380 passengers and the Ardeal ship 6500 tons of freight and 140 passengers and important waterside facilities in Constanta, Galati, Brăila and Giurgiu ports (Banu F., 2004, pp. 134, 135);
- The Soviet party participated with four old cargoes requiring repairs (Naşcu I., in Constantinescu N. N. et al., 2000, p. 228-232 ), ten tugs of 5200 HP, four river barge of 370 HP and 740 tm, 47 non-propelled river barges - 47 447 tm, 23 petroleum tanks without propulsion - 19552 tm[3] - the society was disbanded in 1954 (Naşcu I., in Constantinescu N.N. et al., 2000, p. 228-232).

Founders of the company:

- Of the part of Romania: State Administration of Romanian Fluvial Navigation – N.F.R., State Administration of Ports and Communications on Water (P.C.A.) and Anonymous Danube Navigation Society (S.R.D.) [Administraţia de Stat a Navigaţiunii Fluviale Române - N.F.R., Administraţia de Stat a Porturilor şi Comunicaţiilor pe Apă (P.C.A.) and Societatea Anonimă de Navigaţie pe Dunăre (S.R.D.)].
- Of the part of U.R.S.S.: State Navigation Society for Freight and Travelers Transports on the Black Sea, he State Society for Navigation on Danube and the "Sovfrcaht" Union (Societatea de Stat de Navigaţie pentru Transporturi de Marfă şi Călători pe Marea Neagră, Societatea de Stat pentru Navigaţie pe Dunăre şi Uniunea "Sovfrcaht")[4].

The objective of the company was "the administration and exploitation of river and maritime transports, the use of Romanian river and sea ports; the organization of river and maritime communications, the shipbuilding and sheap repair industry, expedition operations and commercial operations in commission, on the territory of Romania and abroad"[5]; the capital - 3 billion lei represented by 600 000 shares, with a face value of 5000 lei (Banu F., 2004, p. 134).

- Air Transport The Romanian-Soviet Society of Air Transports TARS (Societatea româno-sovietică de Transporturi Aeriene – TARS), established as a result of the 1945 Convention.
- Romania has made available the goods and personnel of the airline transports company LARES - Romanian Air State Operated Lines (Linii Aeriene Române Exploatate de Stat), as well as 12 airports equiped with the related infrastructure; the company was subsidized by the state, and during its operation, the domestic air transport developed (Naşcu I., in Constantinescu N. N. et al., 2000, p. 236-242).
- The U.R.S.S. contributed with the supply of line airplanes, for the most part (Banu F., 2004, p. 135).

The objective of TARS company was "the establishment of the civilian air connections across the entire territory of Romania and in the Black Sea region, on the territory of U.R.S.S., between the civil airoports Ismail, Odessa, Nicolaev, Cherson, Eupatoria, Simferopol"[6]. It had a share capital of 1.8 billion, represented by 36,000 nominative shares (Banu F., 2004, p. 135). A part of the capital would be covered by the right of use of airports, for a period of 30 years. (Banu F., 2004, p. 135).

At the closure of the operation of TARS company, the workers and the goods were sent under the Ministry of Auto Naval and Air Transports (Ministerul Transporturilor Auto Navale şi Aeriene) and TAROM company was established (Naşcu I. in Constantinescu N.N. et al., 2000, p. 236-242 ).

- The Petroleum Industry Sovrompetrol, a company contituied on the basis of the July 1945 convention (Banu F., p. 130, 2004). The confidential protocol in the field of oil meant the establishment of a Romanian-Soviet joint venture whereat the Romanian state and Romanian societies to take part[7]. The participation of the two states consisted of (Banu F., 2004, p.129):
- The Romanian State provided prospects for new, free land, with the common agreement of both

- Banking domain - Sovrombanc. On August 14, 1945, the convention on the conditions for the establishment of the Soviet-Romanian Bank was signed, whereat the constitutive act and the status of the company, as anonymous society, were annexed (Banu F., 2004, p. 134).

The transfer of shares in the U.R.S.S. patrimony was regulated in 1945 (Law No. 573)[9], namely: "the shares of the oil and banking companies (...) that had belonged to physical or legal persons of German nationality and who have passed into the patrimony of the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics to cover the war damage caused by Germany will be transferred to the shareholders' registers of the respective companies, namely: the shares of the oil companies under the name of "Obedininenie Ucmeft" and the bank shares under the name of the bank of long-term lending of industry and electrification, "Prombank" U.R.S.S."[10].

Participants in the social capital of the Soviet-Romanian Bank:

- Participation of the Soviet side was of 600 million lei in return for 6000 shares of the Soviet-Romanian Bank (Banu F., 2004, p. 133).
- The Romanian side paid 2.67 billion lei and also contributed with shares from different banks (The Romanian Credit Bank, Chrissoveloni Bank, Bank of Discount - Banca de Credit Român, Banca Chrissoveloni, Banca de Scont). The Romanian shareholders acquired shares at the Savrombanc at the value of 350,000 lei/share, higher than the nominal value of a share (100,000 lei). Uzinele de Fier and Domeniile Reşiţa paid 102 million lei in cash and received 292 shares of the Sovrombanc bank, in nominal value, of 29.2 million lei[11] (Banu F., 2004, p. 134).

Article 4 of the Constitutive Act of the Soviet-Romanian Bank S.A., Sovrombanc, stated that the Romanian State was to submit in the bank accounts, the amount of 1.5 billion lei, within 15 days, "amount to be returned to the Romanian state, by The Founding Group, respectively, the Romanian shareholders, through the annual deposit at the State House, of 25% of the dividend distributed to the shares belonging to the Romanian Group"[12]. The main activity of Sovrombanc was "financing commercial operations between U.R.S.S. and Romania and of the operations that are to be carried out by the companies constituted in Romania"[13].

- Wood Industry The Sovromlemn Society was established as anonymous society on the basis of the "Convention for the Exploitation, Industrialization and Valuation of Wood Materials" on March 20th 1946 ("Convenţia pentru exploatarea, industrializarea şi valorificarea materialelor lemnoase" 20 martie 1946)[14]. Founders of the company[15]:
- The Soviet side - Stanislavlesprom and "Exportless" Union (Uniunea "Exportless");
- The Romanian side – C.A.P.S., „The Orthodox Church Fund in Bucovina de Sud", „The common goods Ciuc", „The wealthy community of the 44 Guard village in Năsăud", „The cooperative of forest owners for wood exploitation in Gheorghieni", Forestry

According to the Article 1 of the Convention, the purpose of establishing the Romanian-Soviet Forestry Society - Sovromlemn was "collecting, production and distribution of wood materials"[16].

- The Gas Industry - Sovromgaz, founded in March 1946, having as object of activity the exploitation of the reserves of methane gas in Podişul Transilvaniei (Banu F., 2004, p. 141).
- The film industry - Sovromfilm[17], set up in March 1946 for the purpose of introducing Russian culture, for the same purpose, being also the constitution of A.R.L.U.S. Association for Enhance Ties with the Soviet Union (Asociaţia pentru Strângerea Legăturilor cu Uniunea Sovietică), „Cartea Rusă" Publishing House and the Soviet-Romanian Museum (Banu F., 2004, p. 141).
- Three other societies, Sovromcărbune, Sovrommetal şi Sovromconstrucţii[18], were founded on the basis of the conventions of July 1949.
- Sovromcărbune, established in 1949, by Decree no. 546 (Official Bulletin No. 54 of August 20, 1949) (Decretul nr. 546 -Buletinul Oficial nr. 54 din 20 august 1949), with a share capital of 675 thousand lei, the contribution of each party being equal (by 50%)[19], with the following composition (Banu F., 2004, pp. 142, 143):
- the patrimony of the former „Petroşani" society, to which the Soviet side participated with 61.65% of the capital, coming from actions yielded by Hungary, on the war compensation account, and the rest of 38.5% belonged to the Romanian state, follow-up the nationalization. In the year 1947 the "Petroşani" company was taken over by the Soviet side, due to owning majority of shares;
- mining nature goods - mines that constituted share of the Romanian side, Anina, Dorman, Secu, Armeniş and Sinersig in Banat, whereat the Soviet side had a capital share of about 33%;
- assets of the former "Lonea" company; the Soviet side had a share of 5.6%, the remaining of 94.4% belonged to the Romanian state;
- mining nature assets of the lignite mining group in the Schitu Goleşti basin (Câmpulung) which had belonged to the former Concordia company.

The latest SOVROM societies were set up in 1952.

- Sovromutilajpetrolier - the object of activity was the production of oiler equipment; it was consisted of a group of about ten enterprises joined within trust for refineries and oiler equipments building. The newly established trust also supplied Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, giving Romania, the position of the greatest oiler equipment producing country.

At the proposal of the U.R.S.S., the Romanian state accepted that the redemption of 50% of the value of the enterprises belonging entirely to the Romanian state and that were to enter into the new company, to be done by transferring to the Romanian state ownership, of some former German enterprises that U.R.S.S. held in Romania. Thus, the Romanian State and U.R.S.S. were to become equal partners in this SOVROM[20].

− Sovromnaval was established as a consequence of the fact that in Sovromtransport, the shipyards were not used, prevalently, to their entiere capacity (Banu F., 2004, p.144).

In the new society, the contribution of the Romanian state consisted in the shipyards in Galaţi, Braila, Constanţa and Turnu-Severin, owned by the Romanian state (previously leased to Sovromtransport society); these became a joint Romanian-Soviet property by the redemption by the Soviet Union, of 50% of the value of the above yards, less Turnu-Severin[21].

- Sovromquartit established by the signing of the Governmental Convention in December 1951; began to develop its activity in April 1952, with the ore reserves discovered in Băiţa-Bihor[22]. The object of activity was the geological research for discovering the uranium digging in Romania, its extraction and exploitation; also, there have been added construction works, motorways, railways, industrial buildings, dwellings, power lines[23].

The year 1952 was the last stage of establishment of Sovroms and penetration into the Romanian economy, followed-up by a process of decline and liquidation, proving to be disadvantageous.

The largest number of enterprises fuctioned in the fields of transport, trade, extractive industry and wood.

The liquidation of the Sovroms began in the year 1953 and meant the passing of several stages, by obtaining the approval from Moscow, concerning the transfer of Soviet-Romanian joint ventures to the Romanian state property, by redemption of the Soviet side, by Romania, namely: 1953 - 9 societies; 1954 - 5 soceities; 1956- 2 societies.

Following-up the decision taken by the Soviet government, the amount scheduled for redemption, for the enterprises transfered in the Romanian state property, was reduced by 4.3 billion lei, whereby 1.5 billion lei, for the former German wealth. The redemption of the value of the Soviet share ownership part was to be in progress at equal annual installments, echeloned on 15 years, the payment being considered a credit granted to Romania, without interest[24].

2. Conclusions

The SOVROM-type societies in the respective economic branches had as a model, the Soviet-type socialist enterprises and functioned as levers of control over large economic areas.

Following-up signing of the Moscow Treaty of May 8, 1945, the German industrial properties in Romania were included in Romanian-Soviet joint ventures, which have ensured the exploitation of natural resources, over a long period of time. The former German mixed properties, of great importance, in Romania, were taken over by the Romanian-Soviet joint ventures - 1945-1946, and the rest have been managed by the Romanian state, requiring high costs, until 1948, when the last transfers of property were made to U.R.S.S.[25].

In the relations of alliance with the foreign capital, Romania has, incessantly, maintained its political orientation towards ensuring economic independence, regardless of the political regime.

This form of partnership, according to the opinion of some authors, was not advantageous for our country, and the liquidation was, also, done, to the detriment of the Romanian part, by setting-up a amount of money, for the Soviet side, larger, disproportionate to their actual share (Mureşan M., Mureşan D., 1998, p. 366).

The economic relations between the two countries were at the disadvantage of Romania; a series of decisions concerning the production selling-out, the investments, labor force, were subject to the Soviet part accord; it was incumbent on the Romanian state to provide with a part of the benefits, for the Soviet partner, regardless of whether the enterprise made or not a profit (Constantinescu N. N., 2000).

THE IMPACT OF PUBLIC PROCUREMENT LAW TO THE SYSTEM OF PUBLIC FINANCE

Abstract

Public procurement law lays out the processes and procedures that public agencies, authorities, or departments should follow when procuring work or service using public funds. The law stipulates the threshold at which public entities should use public procurement instead of private procurement. Effectively, public agencies spend a considerable amount of government revenue on public services. However, controversy exists on the relationship between government spending and private sector investment. It also remains unclear as to whether public procurement law improves financial management. Thus, the purpose of this study is to determine the relationship between public procurement law and the crowding-out effect, taxes, and finance. The study relies on quantitative research design where data was collected from a sample of 130 participants who comprised of public procurement officials, private investors, and the public. Using a questionnaire, the findings showed that public procurement law increases government spending that in turn crowds out the private sector instead of crowding-in. The need to fund projects often compels government to increase taxes and in turn incur budget deficits due to lack of adequate finances. However, public procurement laws enhance financial planning and control.

1. Introduction

Public procurement entails the acquisition of good, works, and services by a public authority or a procuring entity with the aid of public funds. With the need to ensure a level playing field in the procurement process, countries have enacted public procurement laws to regulate the purchase of public services. The authorities are mandated to follow the established procedure in awarding the contract. The law requires the procuring entities to put in place mechanisms for public procurement for services exceeding a specified threshold (European Commission, 2011).

The regulations govern the management and expenditure of public resources and effectively help in ensuring prudent financial management. However, the rise in public spending is considered to affect investment in the private sector in what is popularly known as crowding-out and crowding-in effect (Basar, Polat, & Oltulular, 2011; Devarajan Swaroop & Zou, 1996). Similarly, public procurement plays a critical role in financial management. It requires the concerned entities to follow the best practices and observe the principles of transparency, accountability, and efficiency in the procurement process. However, it remains unclear whether the public procurement regulation has a positive impact on financial management. Thus, this paper aims to address the relation between public procurement and the crowding-out effect, public finance, and taxes. So finally the main objectives of the paper are: to determine the relation between public procurement and the crowding-out effect; to examine the relation between public procurement law and taxes and to investigate the relation between public procurement law and public finance.

2. Theoretical Principles of public procurement law

Public procurement is a powerful exercise. It demonstrates policy choices and represents the processes involved in the delivery of public services. It provides economic freedom and depicts trade relations among economic players. Essentially, public procurement is a significant non-tariff barrier and it works as an obstacle to the functioning of a competitive internal market (Koninck & Ronse, 2008). Regulation of the procurement process encourages competitiveness and contributes to significant cost savings in the public sector. The EU law provides a platform for all businesses operating in the region. It sets out the minimum public procurement rules that guide procurement process. These public procurement rules are transposed into member states' laws and apply to tenders whose value exceeds certain threshold amounts (Baldan & Pirvu, 2013). If public tenders do not reach a certain threshold value (or below it), national rules of member states' budgetary laws will apply. Although the EU aims to ensure that its economic policy obeys the principles of an open market economy and free competition, public procurement requires authorities to develop a positive regulatory approach. That is why public procurement has now become an essential element of the EU in ensuring a competitive economy. The purpose of this research paper is to examine the EU public procurement law and recommends ways to improve enforcement and the procurement process in the region.

2.1. Directives

The primary legislation that regulates public procurements within the EU is in the public procurement directives. They include Directive 2004/17/EC that coordinates procurement procedures in the energy, transport, postage, and water services (McCrudden, 2007). A recent 2014/25/EU supersedes that 2004/17/EC Directive. Directive 2004/18/EC coordinates procedures involved in the award of public works, service, and supply contracts (OJEC, 2017). Similarly, a recent 2014/24/EU one supersedes the 2004/18/EC directive. Directives 2004/18EC and 2004/17 EC are now Old Directives. The New Directives replaced them following a consultative process coupled with a series of legislative proposals. These rules regulate the purchase of goods and services by the member states and their various bodies. The new rules simply contain procedures of public procurement and make them flexible to the advantage of businesses. They pave the way for electronic procurement that is expected to increase the effectiveness of the procurement process. For example, only winning firms submit the papers to show that they qualify. As a result, the new directives will reduce the documentation required (Thai et al., 2016).

Besides, the procurement law includes several specific rules for different sectors. Defense Procurement Directive (Directive 2009/81/EC) focuses on defense and security. Regulation EC1370/2007 focuses on public transport sector by road and rail. Directive 2007/66/EC amended Directive 92/13/89/665/EEC to increase the protection of tenderers against breaches of the law by contracting authorities when they award public contracts (McCrudden, 2007). It sets out the requirements concerning the remedies necessary for the violation of public procurement procedures (OJEC, 2017). European institutions establish directives as the legal instruments to achieve flexibility. The directives provide discretion to the member states regarding the method and form of implementing public procurement rules. They have the ability to harmonize public markets while considering the existing divergences in the legal systems of different states. The directives ensure that legal systems conform to the objectives of the European Community. However, it must be acknowledged that the divergences will remain. Essentially, this attributes to the fact that the EU does not have the power to override existing national legal regimes and impose a different one (Kapteyn & Verloren, 1989).

Although the New Directives address some of the inherent weaknesses in the Old Directives, issues of transparency still arise (Andrecka, 2016). For instance, Directive 2014/24/EU has not yet clarified the uncertainties that involve in the operation of single and multi-supplier frameworks (Andrecka, 2015). Although one can affirm that some level of transparency exists, it is only present at the pre-award stage. Currently, there are inadequate provisions to guarantee transparency, especially during the award stage of the contract. One of the key issues that arise is the lowest price offer that contracting authorities should accept. A transparent or competitive pattern does not guarantee and provides safeguards against underpriced patterns. However, it automatically disqualifies abnormally low offers as in the case of SA Transporoute ET. Travaux v. Minister of Public Works [1982]. Even so, the New Directives allow for the achievement of societal goals, including environmental protection, as well as stimulation of innovation. They improve efficiency in public spending largely by simplifying existing rules as well as introducing flexibility in the procurement process.

2.2. Governing Principles

The contracting authorities in the public sector are subject to the EU General Principles even when the procurement itself is outside the scope of the New Directives (Ebrecht & Werner, 2017). These principles encompass equal treatment, non-discrimination, proportionality, mutual recognition, and transparency. Others include free movement of products and freedom to provide services. For public sector procurements that are outside the scope of the New Directives, the overriding principles are competition, transparency, and equal treatment. These principles require potential bidders to access the suitable information regarding the intention to award certain procurement. Therefore, it means that they should advertise to ensure that the contract is available to all parties to allow fair competition. The European courts have reinforced these principles in different case laws. In Commission vs. Ireland, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) concluded that the modification of the contract award criteria after reviewing the bids violated the principles of transparency and equal treatment.

2.3. Importance of Public Procurement

Public procurement in the EU is a matter of immense economic value. According to BDI (2017), awarding public contracts to businesses is critical in meeting the public needs and ensuring a cost-effective use of public resources. It also serves as an important factor that allows companies or organizations from different parts of the world to compete fairly. In the EU, member states award public contracts that exceed 2.2 trillion EUR annually (Ebrecht & Werner, 2017). This figure accounts for approximately 12-19% of the GDP. Indeed, these figures show a macroeconomic value of public procurement. Thus, from an economic perspective, public procurement legislation aims to bring competitiveness, increase the penetration of imports, enhance trading of different public contracts, and bring about price convergence (Baldan & Pirvu, 2013). From a legal perspective, public procurement law is essential as it supports the free movement of people, goods, and services, and prohibits discrimination based on the nationality of an individual (Bovis, 2002). Thus, its liberalization reflects the desire of European institutions to end discrimination and preferential purchasing patterns in the public sector. It also shows the wish to create seamless interstate trade links involving both the private and public sector. Due to the importance and value of public procurement, European institutions have developed several rules at a national, regional, and international level. The goal is to create a predictable legislative framework that guides public procurement.

3. Literature Review

3.1. Public Procurement Law

According to the World Bank Group (2018), most countries have enacted public procurement laws which outline the rules and processes that must be followed in public procurement. Most international financial organizations require countries to establish transparent and competitive bidding process in order to receive funding for infrastructural projects. The procurement law requires governments or the procuring authority to publish tenders publicly when the procurement is of a certain threshold (Europa, 2018). According to the European Union (2018) over 250,000 public entities in the EU spend nearly 14% of the GDP on public services. In efforts to establish a level-playing field, the EU law lays out the harmonized procurement rules that stipulate the way public authorities purchase goods and service. According to Fairgrieve and Lichere (2011), public procurement represents over 15% of the EU GDP.

3.2. Public Procurement Law and Crowding-Out Effect and Taxes

Crowding-out arises from expansionary fiscal actions (Sundararajan & Thakur, 1980). Increase in government spending through taxes or debt issuance may curtail investment in the private sector leading to a situation, where the sector feels crowded out (Carlson & Spencer, 1975). Further, Atukeren (2005) indicates that increased government expenditure arising from public procurement laws that requires government to publicly procure goods often leads to excessive borrowing in the capital markets. In turn, the interest rates increase due to the competition for the limited financial resources. As a result, the cost of obtaining capital increases for the private sector, which in turn slows down private investment (Erden & Holcombe, 2005). As Atukeren (2005) indicates, excessive government borrowing to finance public projects often makes the private sector unprofitable. The authors indicate that investment in public infrastructure results to a positive impact on investment in the private sector in the short term. However, some other types of public investment often result in crowding-out (Dash, 2016).

Basar et al. (2011) indicated that the relation between public procurement and private investment is a highly debatable issue. Thus, they investigated the impact of government spending on investments in the private sector within the context of crowding-in and crowding-out hypotheses. Using data from Turkey that had been collected between 1987-2007 combined with Johansen-Juselius cointegration analysis, they observed that total public spending and interest payments by the government resulted in a positive impact on private investments (Basar et al., 2011).

Thus, their findings validated the crowding-in effect hypothesis and rejected the crowding-out effect. Based on their findings, they argued policies that increase public expenditure should be adopted to stimulate investments in the public sector. Similarly, Ahmed and Miller (1999) explored the impact of government expenditure on private investment. The researchers observed that public expenditure on the infrastructural projects increased private sector investment while public sector spending on social security and welfare resulted in a crowding-out effect.

Simcoe and Toffel (2011) examined the connection between public procurement policies and private sector investment in green buildings. The study was guided by the need to determine whether a preference for public procurement stimulates the private sector to develop innovative products. They observed that public procurement policies motivate professionals to invest in their respective sectors and also fuels the demand for green buildings in the private sector. Thus, government procurement policies serve as a means for increasing investment in the public sector. Similarly, both Bazaumana (2004) and Miguel (1994) observed that public investment leads to a crowding – in effect as opposed to crowding-out effect on investment in the private sector. The latter obtained data using Johansen co-integration analysis while the former gathered findings in Mexico. Similarly, Cruz and Teixeira (1999) examined the effect of government spending on private sector in Brazil. Using data from 1947-1990, they observed a crowding-out effect in the short term, but in the long –term a crowding-in effect occurred.

3.3. Public Procurement Law and Finances

Public procurement law and financial management are correlated. As Sarfo and Baah-Mintah (2003) indicate, financial management is comprised of all activities involved in obtaining and utilizing finances effectively. These activities include financial planning, financial control, and financial decision making. Public financial management lays emphasis on efficiency, effectiveness, and economy. Public procurement is critical towards achieving sound financial management by ensuring that there is value for money spent on public projects. Maithya (2014) conducted a study to determine the impact of public procurement laws on financial management among Kenyan public hospitals. The authors indicated that due to the high volumes of government expenditure on procurement, efforts had to be made to enact a law that would govern public procurement within the public sector. This aimed at ensuring effective management of public finances. Consequently, the Kenyan government created the public procurement & disposal Act of 2006. The regulations aimed to bring fairness and an a just system for effective financial management. Using a sample of 45 employees drawn from the procurement & the finance unit of the respective public hospitals, coupled with an additional 20 percent of the suppliers, the authors issued them with a questionnaire (Maithya, 2014). The researcher observed that public procurement law had improved financial control and planning. However, the regulations had not enhanced financial debt management. According to Abebe (2013), public procurement regulations demand high standards of accountability, transparency, and efficiency to ensure efficient delivery of public services. The law calls on the respective parties to adopt the best practices in the management of public expenditure based on the three principles. Efficiency is critical as it ensures that the public obtains value for money. Transparency is also critical as it encourages fair competition among the suppliers. Both transparency and accountability help in promoting integrity that, in turn, prevents corruption in the procurement process (Lynch & Kobo, 2013). Thus, these principles contribute towards efficient management of public resources and finances.

3.4. Summary and Gaps in the Studies

A close analysis of the literature shows the inconsistencies in the findings. While some studies argue that public procurement and by extension government spending creates the right conditions for private sector investment, other studies affirm the contrary. At the same time, some of the studies argue that public procurement squeezes funds from the public and compels governments to increase taxes in order to meet the costs of public procured services. It is also not clear as whether public procurement laws, improves the overall financial management in terms of planning, controlling, and debt management.

4. Methodology

4.1. Introduction

This section outlines the research method used to answer the study objectives. It describes the research design, the sample, data collection, and instruments for data collection. The chapter also describes the data analysis, validity and reliability of the methodology, and the ethical considerations made.

4.2. Research Design

The paper adopted a quantitative research design. This approach was considered as the most valid one based on the purpose of the study. It would allow the researcher to collect data from a large sample size and make it possible to make generalizations. The quantitative approach was easy to operationalize and analyze the data due to the standardized data collection method (Mugenda & Mugenda, 1999). Over and above, the method was considered as the most appropriate based on the fact that the study aimed to establish relationships between the independent variable of public procurement law and dependent variables of crowding-out effect, taxes, and public finance.

4.3. Sampling

The sample population included public procurement officials, economic experts, the public, and investors in the private sector. The diversity of the sample allowed the researcher to obtain more objective data by drawing responses from across the board. The selection of sample size was guided by Mugenda and Mugenda (2003) who indicates that a sample of between 10-30% of the targeted population is adequate for generalization. A total of 150 participants were recruited where some were from the Ministry of Health and others were investors in the private sector. With the need to ensure diversity in the sample, purposive sampling was used to access information from the right people.

4.4. Data Collection

The respondents were conducted via e-mail or telephone and informed about the purpose of the study. They were contacted to arrange for the convenient time to conduct the survey. They were then issued with the surveys through their respective email where they were required to fill them out and return completed survey forms via e-mail. The researcher used closed ended questions to standardize the respondent's responses and reduce the time they would take to complete the questionnaires.

4.5. Validity and Reliability

Validity entails the degree to which the results reflect the issue or subject under study. It can also be defined as the extent to which a data collection instrument measures what it intends to measure (Ngechu, 2004). In this case, the validity of the findings was guaranteed by the use of the right survey instruments with questions that were tailored to answer the research questions. The reliability describes the degree to which the findings can be replicated by another study at a different point on the same population (Neuman, 2000). Reliability was guaranteed by the choice of a large sample size.

4.6. Data Analysis

In analyzing the data, the researcher checked the questionnaire for completeness to make ensure that the data was consistent. Descriptive and inferential statistics were used where the analyzed data was presented in tables.

5. Results

5.1. Demographic Information

A total of 150 participants were recruited and issued with the questionnaires. Out of this number only 130 of them completed and returned the surveys representing 87% response rate. This percentage implied that the data was significant for data analysis considering that Mugenda and Mugenda (2003) indicate that a 50% response rate and above is valid. Out of the 13 participants, 100 (77%) were men while the rest were women 30 (23%). Nearly 38% of the participants were aged 26-35 followed by 30% above 46 years, 18-25 and 36-45 both at 15% each. A large portion of the respondents were officials in public procurement and finance departments in the Ministry of Health at 46%, followed by those in the private sector at 38%. The remaining were the public at 15.4%. Nearly 70% of the participants had a university education and above with the remaining having a college education and high school certificate in equal percentages. Over and above, 84% of those surveyed were German nationals and the remaining 16% expatriates. Indeed, this demographic information shows the diversity of the participants that collectively helped to improve the accuracy of the findings.

6. Discussion

6.1. Public Procurement Law and Taxes

The public procurement law stipulates that government projects above a specified threshold should be awarded to contractors through the laid down processes and procedures. While procurement in the private sector is mainly funded by shareholders and the founders or owners, the funds utilized in public procurement originate from loans and grants as well as taxation (Lynch & Kobo, 2013). When asked whether the amount of taxes on the citizens have increased due to the public procurement law that requires government agencies, departments, and organizations to publicly procure goods and services, an overwhelming 77% of the respondents affirmed with a yes. This confirms that even the public procurement officials were aware of the deleterious impact of increased government spending on projects. In fact, one of the respondents indicated that the government cannot run without taxes from the citizens.

6.2. Public Procurement Law and Crowding-out Effect

When asked whether the public procurement law has resulted in crowding-out effect, 62% of the participants indicated that it has reduced the amount of financial resources available to the private sector, while another 54% stated that it has reduced investment in the private sector. The responses confirm the crowding effect that is brought about by increased government spending. The responses correspond with Carlson and Spencer (1975) who found out that increased government spending through taxes or debt issuance, often impedes investment in the private sector by making it feel crowded-out. For instance, massive government spending in the health sector would effectively kick out private investors due to the lack of demand for their service. If the citizens can receive adequate health services at a lower cost, then it would not make any economic sense for a private investor to consider establishing a hospital to provide similar services. Thus, the feeling of being crowded-out arises as the investors perceive the government to have invaded in the sectors that should have been left for private investment. The responses from the participants conflict with those reported by Basar et al. (2011), Simcoe and Toffel (2011), Bazaumana (2004) and Miguel (1994) who observed that government spending increases investment in the private sector through a crowding-in effect.

6.3. Public Procurement Law and Public Finance

Regarding the relationship between the public procurement law and public finance, 69% of the respondents indicated that it had an increased budget deficit. The law has made it mandatory for government agencies, departments, entities, and organizations to publicly procure goods. As a result, there is increased demand for money. When the government cannot secure financing from the taxes, it resorts to loans from international financial organizations and foreign countries. This phenomenon is quite evident in developing countries where governments have resorted to massive borrowing to finance public infrastructural projects. As a result, these countries have huge budget deficits. Similarly, when asked whether the public procurement law has reduced the financial resources available for the private sector, 77% of the respondents agreed. The competition for money increases when the government increases spending on infrastructure. As a result, the lenders prefer lending money to the government as opposed to private entities which in turn means that the private sector has a few resources to fuel investments. Similarly, the cost of capital increases, which is a disincentive to the private sector. When asked about the efficiency that public procurement law brings in the management of finances, an overwhelming majority indicated that it improves financial planning and control. The responses correspond with Maithya (2014) who found out that public procurement law, enhanced financial planning and control in public organizations. However, the present study established that public procurement regulations did not improve financial debt management. The fact that public procurement laws require the respective parties to follow the best practices and embrace the principle of accountability, transparency, fairness, and efficiency explains why the regulations enhance financial planning and control.

7. Conclusion

Public procurement law sets a level playing field for procuring public goods and works. The law requires public entities to embrace the best practices by observing the principles of fairness, accountability, and fairness, and efficiency.

It is for this reason that it is considered as the cornerstone of efficient financial management in the public sector. However, it has unanticipated negative impacts on the private sector and taxation. The provision in the law that requires government entities, departments, or organizations to publicly procure services when they are of a certain threshold often leads to a crowding-out effect.

As observed in this paper, massive government spending must be funded by higher taxes or loans which implies that it increases taxation on the citizens and elevates the budget deficits. Similarly, by publicly procuring key services, governments edge out the private sector as they reduce the opportunities for the investor. Although critics argue that government spending provides a foundation through infrastructural projects that in turn increase the incentives for private investment, the present study found contrary results. Public procurement laws increase government spending where government borrow excessively from the capital market that in turn increases the interest rates that, in turn, increase the overall cost of capital for investors, which eventually lowers private invest.

Over and above, public procurement law improves financial planning and control, but it does not enhance financial debt management in public institutions and entities.

EUROPEAN UNION REFORM AND THE NEED FOR THE REFORMS OF THE NATIONAL SOCIO-ECONOMIC SYSTEMS

Carmen RADU[*]
Liviu RADU[]

Abstract

This article seeks to analyze the time-being by means of the possibilities to reform public policies (at national and European level) which concern the economic and social area.

The national and European social and economic well-being depends on the sustainability of the economic and social policies and on the determination to reform the system.

We are considering the analysis of the evolution of the governmental policies regarding the status and evolution of labor force, the pension system and the assumption of the key structural reforms for economy and public administration. The economic resources required for the reform are affected by the new challenges emerged internationally: a potential new economic crisis, the management of the developments emerged on the energy markets, the management of the withdrawal of the United Kingdom from the European Union, etc.

Keywords: economic sustainability, structural reform, pension system, social security, public policies.

1. Introduction

This paperwork seeks to find answers regarding the sustainability of the long-term social policy system. Social policies are measures and actions undertaken by the state (strategies, programs, projects, institutions, legislation, etc.) which address the needs of social protection, education, health, habitation etc. In other words, social policies aim at promoting and, as far as possible, supporting social welfare. Social policies aim to change the characteristics of the social life of the community in a direction considered acceptable. The central element is the welfare of the individual, family, collectivity and generally of the society.

We do not have a well-known name of the era we are entering in, but we start to unravel its contours: instability, uncertainty, frustration, deepening of system cleavage vs. anti-system (see the election of Donald Trump at the White House and Brexit), the intensification of contesting movements, especially among young people, increased violence, very rapid changes in the political and economic context, disintegration trends at European and national level, the recrudescence of nationalist currents and racial, ethnic and religious identities, competition which leads to aggressiveness and potential conflict, weakening of the hegemonic power of the United States, the fragmentation of the international system and frequent disagreements within the Western world organization system[1].

Therefore, states and public institutions fail to cope with various and repeated tensions and crisis, which raises the number of problems apparently lacking in political and economic solutions. Economic and social uncertainty, life insecurity, aging of the population and imbalances in pension systems generate confusion and strong economic and social tensions. To all these we can add less visible elements directly in the public space, but with dramatic effects on the individual and society, such as pollution, increased price of access to certain resources and democratic institution discrediting.

Russia "tests" the European Union and NATO by opening conflicts and creating tensions in Eastern Europe (Hungary, Greece, and especially Ukraine and Republic of Moldova), and the West cannot fight back appropriately (politically and militarily). Furthermore, France and Germany and even the European Union, underlines the importance of normalizing the relations of cooperation with Russia. "the new Eastern Europe will remain captive for yet another generation in a gray neutrality area that suits Moscow". "Grey area Europe", namely an Eastern Europe which is more under the influence of Russia than of the European Union, re-draws the political map of the continent and deepens the gap between the West and the East. Therefore, the Eastern Partnership countries and the limits of the West advance towards Russia are now the stake of the re-establishment of the new European order. While the gray area will be reconfirmed for another generation. This is the price of peace with Russia.

It would be interesting to see where a "re-founding speech" would come from nowadays, in the sense of a new European Union argumentative platform[2]. Here are some variants proposed on the continent, none of them perfect, each with its specific interests and limits:

- Cameron version, namely the speech for staying in the EU based on the stimulation of the fears about increasing costs and economic loss in case of Brexit, but at the same time on the political integration stopping. It will be tested soon after March 29th, 2019.
- Merkel version, based on the reiteration of the political and financial solidarity obligations of the Member States in relation to the compliance with the decisions of the European Union, the most recent example being the acknowledgment of refugee quotas;
- Baltic version, based on the fear of Russia aggression and on maintaining European and Euro-Atlantic unity as a guarantee for limiting Moscow expansionist inclinations;
- Van der Bellen version (after the name of the new president of Austria, Alexander Van der Bellen), based on an intense pro-European federalist speech and on an ecological component, on exploiting fear of extreme-right ascension, but also on the opposition to the TTIP, namely to the USA-EU transatlantic agreement on creating a huge trade and investment free trade area, which, according to the Austrian leader, is against Europe's economic, social and environmental interests;
- Two-speed Europe version (respectively the select club and the periphery), generally supported by the competitive countries in the North-West of the European Union, based on accepting the functioning of groups with different parameters within the European Union and on the maintenance or even consolidation and establishment of these differences between Member States, a vision based essentially on the economic, political, social, cultural and administrative realities on the ground;
- The assistant version, which the poor (southern) Europe believes in, based on the idea that the European Union is a bag of money that should be shared generously from Brussels to indebted, non-performant or corrupt economies such as Greece, Romania, Bulgaria etc.;
- Corporate version or generically, "Volkswagen" version, based exclusively on the commercial interest of large companies, of exports on a unified market (without distinctions and political criteria), on the support of the connections with the United States (including TTIP), but also on the resumption of business with Russia, namely on a minimalist, economic liberal and capitalist vision on Europe.

We believe that in the absence of a political outgrowth of the European Union, accepted by a reasonable majority of citizens and European societies, it is unlikely that the next generation still have enough arguments to explain why the 28 Member States should remain together, to pool resources and to obey a single command center (even if they have a share of representation within the decision-making progress), and the entry into the age of sovereign referendums to end the most beautiful and idealistic project of modern Europe.

2. Developments in social assistance

Social assistance services are addressed only to those individuals or groups in difficulty. Social assistance service includes both social services provided by state institutions, and non-governmental organizations. Protecting those naturally disadvantaged categories such as disabled persons, orphans, widows, the elderly, children, poor persons, appears as the central objective of social insurance and social assistance services, by focusing the state's activity at central and local level by specially set up institutions, vested with authority in this direction[3].

The legal framework in the field of social assistance has been developed since 1990, starting with the legislation in the field of child protection. Subsequently, the general framework of the national social assistance system was defined and legislation was drafted for the various disadvantaged social categories: children, individuals with disabilities, low-income individuals and families, victims of violence and human trafficking etc. The elderly people benefit from Law no. 17/2000 which regulates their access to social and medical assistance services. The national social assistance service was initially described by Law no. 705/2001 and redefined according to Law no. 47/2006, which established the organization, operation and financing based on the European principles of granting social assistance in order to promote social inclusion process. Currently, the national social assistance service, regulated by Law no. 292/2011 – Social Assistance Law, is defined as a set of institutions, measures and actions whereby the state, represented by the authorities of the local and central government authorities, as well as civil society interfere in order to prevent, limit or remove temporary or permanent effects of the situations that can generate marginalization or social exclusion of the individual, family, groups or communities[4].

The effects of these evolutions can be summarized as follows:

- the increase of the total number of retirees from 3.58 million in 1990 to 5.223 million in March 2018 (+45.89%)[5] under the decrease of the number of employees from 8.156 million in 1990 to 6.303 million of employees in September 2018 (- 22.71%)[6];
- the total number of contracts registered with the

[6] data of the Ministry of Labor

Ministry of Labor, namely the employees, reaches 6,303,522 contracts, of which 5,821,822 are for indefinite term, and 481,700 are for definite term.

- the demographic dependency ratio increased from 50.1 (as of January 1st, 2017) to 50.9 young persons and elderly per 100 adults (January 1st, 2018). The experts expect a deepening of the demographic decline of Romania over the coming decades. Therefore, the population of Romania will reach 14.5 million inhabitants in 2050, according to a report of the United Nations (UN), published in July 2015[7].
- in the second quarter of 2018, the average state social insurance pension was of RON 1073, and the ratio between the average nominal net social security pension for old age with full retirement contribution (free of tax and social health insurance contribution) and the net average earning was of 48.2% (compared to 51.3% in the first quarter of 2018)[8];
- According to the data published by Eurostat, in 2016 Romania ranked fifth among EU countries as regards the rate of replacement of salary with pension (by excluding other social benefits) with a rate of 0.66 – i.e. the pension represents two-thirds of the salary. Obviously, the situation is a little better for retirees if we took into account a series of facilities they benefit from everywhere in Europe. Luxembourg (0,88) was ranked above us, a particular case in that there are very many people from neighboring countries working there; it was followed at a short distance by Italy (0.69), France (0.68) and Hungary (0.67)[9].

The indicator of the pension replacement rate is defined by Eurostat as being the report between median value (most frequent) of pensions of persons between 65 and 74 years old and the median salary earning of those between 50 and 59 years old. The indicator is based on the EU –SILC standard, on European statistics on income, social inclusion and living conditions.

Notwithstanding, we can consider that the real reform of state social insurance starts with law no. 19 of 2000, which enables the access to the social insurance system of all income-producing persons, without being limited only to the holders of labor agreements.

3. Labor relations and occupational health

Many of the jobs created in the current global economy[10] are ecologic jobs, the so-called green jobs, as well as jobs of the industries created to mitigate negative impact on the environment, by developing and implementing alternative technologies and practice. While green jobs are welcome because they provide new employment opportunities, it is important that they are set up and monitored, so that the new dangers and risks that may arise are known and removed or mitigated.

Furthermore, education plays an important role in developing knowledge/skills in the field of hygiene and body integrity, for those integrated in the Romanian education system.

The occupational health and safety is perhaps the most important chapter of the EU policy on employment and social business[11]. The main purpose of this chapter is the prevention of potential shortages within the labor system, so that human resource activity can work with maximum efficiency. Human resource is at the forefront, the most important goal being the protection of life, integrity and health, as well as the prevention of accident risks and occupational illnesses.

It is well known that the scope of the "Community strategy 2007-2012 on health and safety at work"[12] was permanent, sustainable and homogeneous decrease of the accidents at work and occupational illnesses. Notwithstanding, within the European Union:

- Every year, over 3 million employees suffer a work accident involving absence of more than 3 days from work and around 4000 employees die in the same type of accidents;
- 24.2% of the employees believe that work can affect their health and safety;
- A quarter of the employees consider that their work affects their health [13];
- Over 3% of the gross domestic product of EU represents the level of direct and indirect costs generated by medical leave;
- Last but not least, social insurance costs that can be related to occupational diseases or work accidents are very high.

By taking into account all these aspects, National strategy on health and safety at work for 2018-2020"[14] is correlated with EU strategic directions and with the "European Pillar of Social Rights"[15], a document that takes into account the dynamics of recent changes at EU level, as well as the changes in the labor market. Therefore, according to the pillar, workers are entitled to a high level of protection of their health and safety at work.

In this context, general goals of National strategy on health and safety at work for 2018-2020 are:

- a better implementation of the legislation on health and safety at work, especially in microenterprises and SMEs;
- the improvement of the safety and of the protection of workers' health, especially of those from economic activities of risk, in the priority areas of action, with emphasis on the prevention of occupational illnesses;
- the simulation of joint actions with social partners, by the awareness and involvement in the management of health and safety issues at work and the materialization of an efficient social dialogue;
- the appropriate management of the issue of older workers in the context of the general phenomenon of population aging, respectively of active labor force.

The specific goals of the National strategy on health and safety at work for 2018-2020 are:

- the improvement of the legal background of the health and safety at work;
- the support of the microenterprises and of the small and medium sized enterprises in terms of the compliance with the legislation on health and safety at work;
- the improvement of the process of observing the legislation in the field of health and safety at work by actions of the authorities with duties in the field;
- the approaching of the phenomenon of labor force aging and the improvement of occupational disease prevention;
- the improvement of the collection of statistic data
- the consolidation of the coordination with national partners to reduce accidents at work and occupational diseases.

These specific goals shall be achieved according to the National actions plan for the implementation of the national strategy on health and safety at work for 2018-2020 which is an integral part of this document.

4. Evolution of the labor force

In the short term, it is expected that the labor force reaches 1.1 mil. employees if the economy increases at the forecasted rate and no measures are taken to increase the employment rate. At the same time, it can be noted that there are large differences between the counties in what concerns the labor supply and demand. Therefore, the counties with high demand and low labor supply are the following: Brașov, Bucharest, Cluj, Constanța, Ilfov, Prahova, Timiș, Arad, Maramureș and Sibiu. While at the opposite pole, the counties with low demand and generous supply of human resources are Harghita, Ialomița, Mehedinți, Sălaj, Teleorman, Vaslui, Vrancea, Bacău, Buzău, Dâmbovița, Galați, Gorj, Mureș, Olt and Suceava.

Therefore, Romania's gross domestic product by business area is as follows:

In what concerns labor productivity, our country is at the bottom of the list among European countries, but, however, it has the highest growth rate. According to a study performed by PwC, Coalition for the development of Romania, the following aspects are noted between 2008-2016: If labor productivity in Great Britain fell by 8.4%, in Spain also declined by 1.1% and in Italy by 4.7%, then in Germany there was a growth rate of 0.6%, in Poland increases by 17,7%, in Bulgaria by 15.9%, and in Romania the growth rate is of 23.3%. However, productivity rate adjusted by salary level (the value added divided by the personnel costs) decreased in Romania in most of the business area due to disproportionate salary increases[1].

It is well known that net salaries increased significantly between 2017-2018, partially due to the increases in the public administration.

In terms of the average salary in 2018, the administrative sector is ranked third after information, communication and finance. Despite all the increases, in 2017, there was the highest number of vacancies according to the economic activity which was carried out.

More than half of private sector employers express an acute need for additional jobs to support business growth. This demand may be solved by importing labor force outside the country because the costs are lower than in case of domestic labor resources.

On the other hand, the domestic labor supply is in a continuous decline due to the decrease of the total population of the country. It is estimated that the total population of Romania is falling at a 10-12% rate in the next 20 years. Therefore, if we currently have 19.8 million citizens, it is estimated that in 2040 we will remain below 17.5 million.

It is noted that only in the last 10 years the total population of Romania has decreased by 4.8 %, while labor resources decreased by 9%, representing one of the highest rates within the European Union, according to the data provided by Eurostat.

According to the same data, a population increase is noted, as follows: In Great Britain, Germany and Italy total population, but also labor force (between 15-64 years old) increases, while total population and especially labor force decreases in Poland, Bulgaria and Romania.

The decrease of the population and of the labor force have a common cause, namely migration. In this context, it is estimated that 3.5 million Romanians live abroad. According to the data provided by OECD, 3,547,996 Romanians emigrated to other countries, Spain, Italy and the United Kingdom of Great Britain being among preferences.

The share of public sector employees has grown very much in recent years, so that, in 2016 the average number of employees in the public sector represented 26% of the total number of employees. By regions and geographical areas, there are 37% in the South-West of Oltenia and at the opposite pole 24% in the North-West and Center area. In the same context, for 3.5 million employees in private sector, there are 1.5 million employees in public sector.

The inactive population aged 15 and more registered the following evolution in Romania.

Due to this situation, we are ranked third within the European Union as number of persons outside labor work, after Italy with a share of 35.10% and Croatia with a share of 34.40%. In our country, we have a percentage of 34.04% persons outside the labor market. At the opposite pole, we find the Netherlands with 20.3% of the population outside the labor market, Denmark with 20% and Sweden with 17.9% persons not registered in any economic activity (according to Eurostat July 2017).

5. Pension system – parallel between Romania and the Nordic countries

The population of Romania is an aging population, thus being outside the European trend. The percentage of retirees of Romania, in the total of the population is of 27%, slightly beyond the margin of the European Union countries. According to the data provided by the European Commission in 2017, if in the United Kingdom, at a population of 65 million inhabitants, there are 15.64 million retirees, in Germany, at a population of 81.2 million inhabitants, there are 23.26 million inhabitants, then in Romania, at a total population of 19.9 million, there are 5.3 million retirees, and in Bulgaria, at a total population of 7.2 million inhabitants, there are 2.18 million retirees. This aspect dramatically influences the rate of dependency to the pension system. According to this trend, it is estimated that the rate of dependency to the pension system in Romania in 2050 will be of 96.9 %.

If in 2016, at a population of 8.4 million employees enrolled in an economic activity, there were 5.15 million retirees, thus resulting a rate of dependency to the pension system of 61.3%. It is estimated that in 2020, for an employed population of 8.2 million, there will be 5.18 million retirees, therefore the rate of dependency to the pension system will increase to 63%, and subsequently, in 2050, the number of employees will be almost equal to the number of retirees, thus, for 5.8 million employees, there will be 5.6 million of retirees, which means that all the people working in an economic activity will support financially the retirees.

Compared to Romania, Denmark, together with Finland, Norway and Sweden, belong to the so-called northern social model, the distinctive features of which are related to the promotion of equality and full employment, public responsibilities for welfare and profitable redistribution of income by transfers and progressive taxation. Social services in these countries are provided on an universal basis.

After the deregulation of the labor market in the 1990s, Denmark has one of the freest labor markets in European countries. According to the ranking of the labor markets drawn up by the World Bank, the flexibility of the labor market is at the same level with that of the United States of America. About 80% of the employees belong to trade unions and employment funds are attached to them.

Denmark is a country with a mixed market economy and a highly developed social state, with the highest level of income equality and the lowest level of corruption in the world. Denmark is also one of the few countries in the world that manages to provide its citizens with both a flexible labor market and an old-age pension system fiscally sustainable.

| DENMARK | retirement age: 67 men/65 women |
|---|---|
| GENERAL PENSION SYSTEM | Denmark is one of the first countries adopting a multi-pillar pension system, consisting in both Beveridge elements (unique national pension based on residence criterion) and Bismarckian elements, occupational private pensions based on collective arrangements having the highest share. The universal nature of providing a basic old-age income, coupled with saving under a quasi-mandatory additional pension system is a guarantee that most elderly will not face the risk of social exclusion.The main issue of the occupational pensions is directly connected with their substantiation on collective agreements. Contributions are not paid by individuals who are temporarily out of the labor market or who receive unemployment assistance (child raising, unemployment or illness). This aspect is fined by increased contributions to the fund components of the first pillar, but do not compensate entirely the loss of income. Therefore, there are potential improvements of the system, but, at the same time, we can consider that the shortages of the Danish social protection system are negligible in compared perspective. |
| Pension pillar I | Pillar I belongs to the state and is mandatory, has universal coverage and consists of two tiers.The first tier is a national pension based on residence criterion (folkepension) and consists of two different elements: a) the basic amount, which is unique and depends on the term of the residence and b) pension supplement, dependent on the income.The second tier consists of a number of additional funding pension schemes (and a smaller PAYG type one), with different operational structures and scopes. |

| Pension pillar II | This consists in quasi-mandatory funding occupational schemes. The schemes are based on collective agreements provided by social partners. Their coverage increased exponentially in the 1990s, when the private sector was formally included.The collective agreements provide additional pensions to a percentage of 93% of the Danish employees aged between 30-60 (80% of the total. The rest of 20% does not pose a particularly pressing problem for the future social adequacy of the Danish pension system.In case of occupational pensions, contributions are between 9-17% of gross salaries and are largely exempt from taxes. The benefits are calculated by using actuarial principles, based on paid contributions, interest rate, average life expectancy and the risk profile of the individual fund. The main problem of the occupational pensions is that they do not cover other risks of labor market. The unemployment terms do not entitle the payment of any contribution, the compensation being delegated to other schemes of the pension system. |
| Pension pillar III | The pillar is represented by additional voluntary pension schemes, administered by banks or insurance companies. The investment is regulated and indexing is not mandatory. The contributions are exempt from taxes and benefits are taxed. The enrollment in this pillar is very high, accounting for about one million persons. |

The complex combination of typical Danish flexicurity concept and old-age protection (which characterized the last two decades) led to the so-called Danish employment miracle. From more than 12% at the beginning of the 1990s, the unemployment rate reached only 1.7% in 2008, on the background of a reasonable replacement rate for the vast majority of the population.

With GDP/inhabitant of USD 36130 and a total population of 5.5 million inhabitants, Denmark has a total demographic dependency rate of 52.6% for 2010,40 an economic dependency rate of 28% in 2007, estimated at 40% for 2020,41 as well as an old-age dependency rate of 25.0% in 2010.

Finland has one of the most extended social insurance system of the world, which guarantee decent living conditions for all Finnish and foreign inhabitants who are legally resident. Since 1980, the system has been reduced, but remains one of the largest in the world. Created almost entirely in the first three decades after the Second World War, the social insurance system was a manifestation of the traditional Nordic belief according to which the state is not inherently hostile to the wellbeing of the citizens, but it can interfere in their benefit.

Although the inequality of the income available in Finland remains among the lowest in the EU, it has increased in recent years, despite the substantial decline in the unemployment rates after 1990 recession. As in many countries of the EU, this is a consequence of the increasing globalization and of the modification of the demographic structure.

Table 9: Finnish pension system

| FINLAND | retirement age: variable between 62 and 68 |
|---|---|
| GENERAL PENSION SYSTEM | The pension system of Finland consists of two types of pension plans:a first plan of pensions coming from the performance of an activity (in connection with the earning), the scope of which is the maintenance of a reasonable income level;a second basic national pension plan which aims to guarantee a minimum income for retirees with low salary or very short length of service.These schemes are closely connected because the level of the national pension depends on the size of the earnings-related benefits. The management of the pensions in private sector is delegated to private pension companies, pension trusts and pension funds.The national scheme provides a minimum pension based on the residence term. The retirement age for the national basic pension is 65 years old, but under certain conditions, early retirement is possible at 62 years. The percentage of retirees receiving only national basic pension is in decline. As of January 1st, 2010, national pensions are financed only from general taxes. Before this date, the employer's contributions financed only a part of the costs. |
| Pensions according to salaries | The earnings-related pension scheme includes all the employees (no income threshold), as well as those employed in their own company. The retirement age is flexible (between 62 and 68 years old), accompanied by higher increase rates for the last years of service: 1.9% every year between 53 and 62 years old and 4.5% between 63 and 68 years old instead of the standard growth rate of 1.5%. The pension is calculated based on the salaries received throughout the professional career (as of the beginning of 2005). The benefit formula includes a life expectancy coefficient that reduces the monthly pension value according to longevity increase. The individuals in groups with a higher life expectancy need to work harder to offset the impact of life expectancy coefficient. |
| Pension system financing | The financing of the earnings-related pensions represents a combination of PAYG system[1] and of advance funding scheme system based on pension contributions, both from the employers and from the employees. Approximately three quarters of the earnings-related pensions are financed by PAYG, and the advance funding scheme covers the rest. The market value of the pension fund assets reached 73% of the GDP in 2009. National pensions are indexed with the consumer price index, while earnings-related pensions are indexed by a weighted index which includes 20% of the salaries and 80% of price evolutions. Pensions expenditures represent 10.8% of the GDP in Finland, which places it slightly below the EU 27 average. Due to the relatively recent implementation of the earnings-based system, low basic pension and the low participation of older women in the labor market, the poverty risk of people over 65 years old is higher than the EU average (23% compared to 19%) and of the persons under 65 years old (23% compared to 12%). In 2008, net and gross replacement rates for a worker retired theoretically at 65 years old, after a career of contribution of 40 years, were respectively 69.5% and 61.5%. |

The challenge faced by Finland to ensure long-term sustainability of public finances (on the background of the population aging) was assessed by the European Commission as having medium risk. The long-term projected increase of pension expenditures (3.3%) is higher than the EU average (2.4%). The implementation of pension reform has moderated expenditures growth.

Sweden belongs to the Northern social model, the scope of which in terms of welfare policy is to reduce the gaps between different social groups, thus ensuring citizens protection, the opportunity to evolve and an acceptable economic standard. The eradication of social exclusion is an important target of the Swedish government, mainly delegated to the Ministry of Health and Social Affairs. The old Swedish pension systems combined both Beveridge features (as unique basic pensions financed by taxes - folkpension and pensions supplements) and Bismarck (financed by earnings-related contributions and defined benefits) – ATP. This system guaranteed a very comprehensive and generous protection in old age. In 1980s, the system started to face serious difficulties, requiring the draw up of a ten-year reform that has radically affected the OECD pension system. The new system is substantiated on various pillars, the first combining a unique minimum guaranteed pension (garantipension), an earnings-related pension with notional defined contribution

[1] Pay-as-you-go pension systems, based on the solidarity between generations, are facing growing problems in providing decent pensions. This is mostly due to the decrease of the number of taxpayers and of the increase of the number of retirees by population aging, at the same time with decreased birth rates, increased life expectancy, early retirement.

(NDC), income-related pension (inkomstpension) and a private funding pension (premiereservsystem). The occupational quasi-mandatory pensions are above all the aforementioned schemes.

Table 10: Swedish pension system

| SWEDEN | retirement age: flexible – between 61 and 67 |
|---|---|
| GENERAL PENSION SYSTEM | The reform was possible only due to the existence of the National Pension Fund (AP-Fonden), which invested ATP surpluses during the years, thus reaching the coverage capacity of 5 consecutive years of benefits. Three important goals were achieved by means of the reform:a) Stabilization of long-term financial perspectives of public pension system;b) Introduction of salary-related indexation, thus stopping the erosion of ATP benefits threshold;c) The removal of random redistribution of the formula of the best year by means of the calculation of the assessment base over the lifetime of an individual. |
| Pension pillar I | Pillar I (state and mandatory) It includes three tiers.Tier zero – guaranteed pension replaced in 2003 the old basic pension and related supplements. It is an universal pension, financed by taxes, unique and indexed at price level. It is designed to ensure an income source, both for individuals who are not qualified for public pension and a supplement for low income retirees.Tier one is represented by the income-related pension (ATP) – a very sophisticated NDC system introduced in 1998 for those born after 1954 (a mixed system which applies for those born between 1938 and 1953) and which considers lifetime income.The state covers the contributions for inactive periods – child raising, military service, university studies, illness and unemployment. Retirement age is flexible, a person retires any time after 61, but collective agreements and employers' attitude prevent employment after 67.Tier two is represented by the full funding pension premiums, financed by the rest of 2.5% of the total contributions. The contributions are collected by the National Council of Taxes and administered by the Pension Premium Administration (PPM – Premiepensiinsmyndigheten). The new members can choose between about 800 funds. The annuities are both fixed with a minimum profit rate of 3% and variable. After the death of the individual, the assets are not inherited, but transferred to the newborns. |
| Pension pillar II | This pillar consists in quasi-mandatory occupational funding schemes which supplements pillar I.They are based on collective agreements and cover 90% of the employees. The level of the contributions usually consists between 2 and 5% of the salaries. The pension plans are based either on defined contributions or defined benefits. They address private sector workers with and without training, central government and local administrations. The schemes of all the four categories were transformed from defined benefits (DB) in defined contributions (DC) for the new entrants. The schemes of the private sector are DC plans in full, but many "white collar" workers of the private sector who are already employed will receive a pension according to a previous DB plan. The occupational pension schemes for the employees of public sector are DC plans up to the income threshold of the social insurance pension system, and for what exceeds the respective threshold – a combination of DB and DC plans. The contributions are exempt from taxes as long as certain conditions are met. |
| Pension pillar III | This consists in voluntary additional pension schemes. They accumulate to old-age pension funds or insurance companies. The development of pillar three is favored by tax incentives. |

Before launching the new system based on individual accounts, Swedish government launched a three-year information campaign addressed to potential participants. In this respect, mass media means and Internet were extensively used. Initially, the members received the annual situation of the account for the pension scheme – "orange envelope", together with a brochure containing explanations on the new system. Such a campaign was crucial for the increase of the financial culture and individual responsibilities.

The public pension system is under the responsibility of the Ministry of Labor and Social Protection. The National Insurance Council (Försäkringskassan) administers guaranteed pension and income-related pension. Swedish system is often considered as one of the most stable and consolidated systems of the world.

6. Conclusions

The best practices emphasizing success examples in programs for activating labor force, consider that there are few key interventions for the increase of the participation on labor market. Here are few of them:

- early interventions for the prevention of long-term unemployment among young people;
- profiling of vacancies and counseling and/or assistance in finding a job;
- requalification of labor force over 50 years old, especially in what concerns digital skills;
- subsidies for employers;
- direct employment schemes;
- flexibility of time and labor conditions, gradual retirement;
- actual correlation of national minimum wage with actual labor productivity;
- "brain import" from abroad;
- partnerships between state authorities, business environment and community, especially at local level.

2018 began with the enforcement of certain legislative amendments[1] which affect most of the population, but also the business environment. The most important amendments are: the transfer of social contributions (pensions, health) from the employer to the employee, but the amounts will still be retained and delivered by the employer; the increase of the national minimum wage from RON 1450 to RON 1900; the decrease of the income tax from 16% to 10% and the decrease of the share of contribution to pension Pillar II from 5.1% to 3.75%. The increase of the national minimum wage, without consulting business environment and studies of impact on the evolution of labor productivity, generates inflation and unemployment. Furthermore, at the end of the year, Government Emergency Ordinance 114 endangered the Romanian business environment, long-term sustainability of domestic and foreign investment of Romanian economy.

Various multinational companies which have activated in Romania until 2018 want to withdraw. In this background, successful private companies of the West side of the country announced their withdrawal and therefore, people working there need to look for a new job[2]. The representatives of the companies blame labor fluctuation, in the first place. However, other serious causes are legislative amendments, but also the costs of utilities and salaries which, according to them, have grown alarmingly. For example, Rieker Swiss company, which owns a shoes factory in Lugoj, is the last on the list of those announcing they are leaving Romania. Almost 700 people were employed there, most of them of the neighboring villages. The representatives of the company motivated the leaving from Lugoj by means of the lack of labor force, but also by means of high cost of the transport of the employees from neighboring localities. Furthermore, in the last three months, they recorded an increase by 35% of the utility costs. The representatives of the factory said that the fluctuation of the labor force and salary costs caused a rebound of the business. Unfortunately, the company of Lugoj is not single. All alarming information (and maybe substantiated) on the impact on the business environment are not isolated, the entire business environment (from banking system to energy system companies and to the millions of private individual investors who contribute to pension pillar II) showed dissatisfaction on the frequent legislative changes regarding both the economic and tax environment and the defining elements of the rule of law.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND POLITICAL REALITIES AND PERSPECTIVES IN THE UNSTABLE EUROPEAN CONTEXT

Liviu RADU[*]
Carmen RADU[]

Abstract

After a complex year, with deep trends of geopolitical changes, the new year 2019 promises to be full of events in what concerns the social, economic, political and even geostrategic area. The key events of last year (the uncertain course of the Brexit, the profound lack of reforms at EU level, the year-end social events of France, the hostile manifestations of the Russian Federation towards the West, the oscillating evolution of certain European states in what concerns the values of the rule of law, the economic war between China – the United States, the Presidency of Romania to the EU Council etc.) shall greatly influence the evolution of the economy at the European and global level. This paperwork aims to analyze the main consequences of recent events on short term evolutions from the economic, social and political perspective.

We also aim to analyze the realities and main potential evolutions in what concerns the economic, social and political status of this year of turning for the European Union.

Keywords: public policies, Brexit, geopolitical changes, economic sustainability, economic crisis

1. Introduction

The past few months, respectively the term between the end of 2017 and the beginning of 2019, represented a period of great transformations and evolutions from the economic, social, politic and military perspective. The economic war between the United States and China, the horizons of a new cold war between the Russian Federation and the United States, on the one hand, between Russia and NATO on the other hand, as well as the uncertain evolutions within the EU, all of them point out a period of instability from a geopolitical perspective with major influences in the economic area and traditional alliances. Economic unions, governments and military alliances, that seemed unshakable, are nowadays on the moving sands making any prediction not only uncertain, but risky. The ever-growing ascension of populism and illiberal ideas increasingly removes populations and their actors from the principles of good governance.

In a long-term perspective, the basis of good governance is represented by several defining elements, such as[1]: The participation of citizens and their increased involvement in the decision-making system; Equity and fairness in law enforcement; Decency, responsibility and transparency, aiming at making the taken and implemented decisions available to the citizens. Efficiency and effectiveness, by referring to the care employed in the use of human and financial resources.

The functional categories the consequences of which are reflected in a good governance are the following: civil society, political society, government, bureaucracy, economic society and judiciary system. James Madison said (Federalist Paper no.51) "If men were angels, no government would be necessary". Once we agree that people are far from the behavior of angels, we also agree that we need something or someone to lead us or at least to coordinate our activity. "For the first time in our history, in a multipolar world, too many factors become anti-European, or, at best, Eurosceptic", Donald Tusk wrote in the letter addressed to the 27 leaders of the countries that will remain members of the EU after Great Britain will have left the European Union. The President of the European Council also proposed the topic of the "internal threat of increasing anti-EU feeling, nationalist and increasingly xenophobic". "National egoism becomes an attractive alternative to integration", and centrifugal trend and "the decline of the confidence of the pro-European elites in political integration, as well as the doubts on the fundamental values of liberal democracy" are other topics proposed by Donald Tusk.

And yet, why do we use the notions of "good governance or liberal democracy" and "illiberal democracy"? An explanation[2] would be the increasing of the authoritarian accents in many countries of the world, including in countries with old, solid democratic traditions. Authoritarianism may have its roots in:

- for states, the increasing of the challenges related to terrorism, other unconventional threats (climate change, immigration, border protection, cyber security, etc.), economic insecurity. All these increase the inclination to use direct means of control in the economy and society, in general, the use of means that can go beyond the democratic institutionalized control.

- economic insecurity, which is linked to the underestimation of the less good effects of globalization. In this context, it is worth mentioning the economic ascension of new powers (China, India), which changes the balance of power in the world. Robert Kaplan talks in this respect of "The Return of the Marco Polo World"[3]; it is about the proliferating trade conflicts.
- there is a fear of unknown (of all kinds) and there is the need of people of "comfort" in the environment in which they live in a stable way, which cannot be dissociated from habits, feeling of belonging to communities having identities shared by their members. (see Jochen Bittner, a well-known columnist at the Die Zeit, who talks about the need for "Heimat", which would give consistency to the notion of patriotism.
- social /societal fragmentation and anxiety produced by globalization, new technologies (i.e.: big data, which greatly emphasize the power of some companies) strengthen the inclination to demand protection from the state, which can accentuate interventionist policies.
- there are institutional/political structures characterized by a sole governing party.
- there is a de-connection between economic evolutions and social and political ethos characterized by anger, protest against elites, political establishment, in many countries[4];
- the impact of fake news, by challenging the "truth" (scientific side of other nature) and, not finally, the rejection of "experts" – whose advice would be behind failed public policies (i.e.: the regulatory and supervisory deficit of the financial markets).
- a genuine desire for power in the political area combined with the consolidation of some structures to maintain the status quo that privileges some interest groups can be added to this series of explanations.

Reaction of rejection of mainstream parties by an important part of the society in liberal democracies can be interpreted by several grids: the impact of the Great Recession (the financial crisis) and unilateral public policies in recent decades, which have increased social cleavages; a certain institutional sclerosis (in the spirit of the analyzes of Douglas North, Mancur Olson Jr), which, as we can note, takes place not only in less evolved societies, in terms of level of economic development[5]; the exceptional nature of our times, with a new industrial revolution which seems to confuse political and intellectual elites.

In such a society we live that, in the spirit of correct political thinking, to appreciate an individual or his/her work is the acknowledgment of the inequality between people. The idea of awarding prizes for certain merits is also condemned because the award granted to some persons would mean others feel "offended" and "inferior"[6].

In the spirit of all the aforementioned, we will take the risk to analyze the events that have already happened, by trying to take a look at the not too distant future, starting from paradigm: we are alone and maybe against all (Great Britain) or we are together within the European Union (France) and we accept. And if we accept, then what is the trend and what we are heading for?

2. An evolution under changes and rectifications (2017 – 2018)

The economy of the European Union faced several significant and particularly damaging challenges between 2017-2018: terrorist attacks and geo-political tensions, immigration flows, Brexit, risks associated to banking systems, etc. Compared to the European Commission[7] forecast which considers that the real GDP of the EU is projected to slow its growth rate to 2.3% in 2018 and 2.0% in 2019. In what concerns the Euro zone, the economic growth recorded in 2017 was of 2.3%. Notwithstanding, the European economy recorded a sustained 2.4% growth, largely driven by consumption, while the investment did not have the expected evolution. The 2017 forecasts of the IMF estimated a global economic growth of 3.9% in 2017, both for 2018 and for 2019. According to the IMF, the developed countries were supposed to record an average growth of 2.5% in 2018 and respectively 2.2% in 2019, while the developing countries will have an average advance of 4.9% in 2018 and 5.1% in 2019. The economic growth of China was revised to 6.6% for 2018, with 0.1 pp over the estimation of October 2017, on the background of the expectations on the continuation of the implementation of the economic growth policies. Notwithstanding, the risk of slowing the economic growth of China is still relatively high, provided that the growth is largely based on state incentives, corroborated with crediting expansion and slow progresses in debt reduction across companies. Therefore, for 2019, the growth rate of the Chinese economy is projected to fall to 6.4%.

For 2018, IMF estimated a 2.4% economic growth rate within the European Union (actually it dropped by a percentage point), and for 2019 the dynamics of the real GDP was to record a slowdown of 2.0%. In what concerns the world economic growth pace (EU excluded), the European Commission forecast shows an improvement in the economic perspectives, by estimating for 2018 and 2019, the same annual growth rate of real GDP of 4.1%, exceeding by 0.3 pp the 3.8% increase of 2017.

According to the forecasts of the European Commission, the basic inflation rate which excludes the volatility of energy and non-processed prices to remain moderate, given that the matter of the under-utilization of the labor force is slowly moderate, and salary pressures remain within reasonable limits. Global inflation will continue to reflect the significant influence of energy prices, a moderate growth of it being predicted for the next period. In the Euro zone, the inflation reached 1.7% in 2017, and is to grow up to 1.8 % in 2019. Furthermore, the price projection of Brent crude oil was revised upwards, from 52.8$/barrel in 2017 to 58.2 $/barrel for 2019.

Annually, the European Union GDP recorded an advance of 1.9% in the third quarter of 2018, compared to the similar period of 2017, while the GDP of the Euro zone increased by 1.7%. The Member States with the highest annual growth rate were Poland (5.7%), Latvia (5.5%), Hungary (5%), Slovakia (4.5%) and Romania (4.1%). All EU Member States have experienced economic growth in the third quarter of 2018, compared to the similar period of 2017, the lowest "performance" being recorded by Italy (0.8%). For 2020, The EU executive indicates an advance of 3.6%

The economic evolution of Germany, the main engine of the European economy, was positive for 2017, the growth rate of 2.2% (even if a 2.3% growth had been predicted) representing an increase of 0.3 percentage points compared to 2016. In the second quarter of 2018, the German GDP grew beyond expectations, by recording a 0.5% advance compared to the first quarter of the same year[8]. This growth was due to the increase of the expenses of the state and households, on the one hand, as well as to the increase of the investment. If the German minister of economy estimated a 1.8% growth in the autumn of 2018, at the end of the same year 2018, he revised the growth forecast for 2019 to 1%, following the effects of the Brexit, commercial disputes and international tax background, AFP communicates.[9]

Furthermore, the maintenance of the dynamics of the GDP in 2018 was predicted for Italy, at the same level with the one of 2017 (respectively 1.5%), followed by a slight deceleration in the rhythm of the growth in 2019 of up to 1.2%. In January 2019, the economic date on the Italian economy were again modified and Italy entered in recession for the second quarter[10]. In what concerns France, after an acceleration of the economic growth in 2017 compared to 2016 (1.8% compared to 1.2%), growth rates of 2.0% were estimated in 2018 and a slight deceleration of it in 2019, up to 1.8%. The data rectified in January 2019 indicate a slowdown of France growth rate. Despite this, it is estimated that France will become the sixth world economy, going beyond Great Britain, with the United Kingdom leaving the European Union[11]. As we have already tried to prove, the data of the International Monetary Fund and of the European Commission were rectified in the last quarter of 2018. In this background, for example, if in April 2017, IMF estimated that, in 2018, Malta and Romania will record the biggest economic growth of Europa, of 5.7% and, respectively, 5.1%, in the report published on October 9th, IMF revised downwards the forecasts on the Romanian economy up to 4% in 2018, by 1.1 percentage points less than the estimation of spring, by predicting that in 2019 Romania is to record an economic growth of 3.4%, by 0.1 percentage points less than the estimation of April.

In the Word Macroeconomic Report, called "Less Even Expansion, Rising Trade Tensions", the experts of the International Monetary Fund draw the attention on the enhancement of the risk factors for global economy, such as the escalation of trade tensions between major economic blocs and geopolitical uncertainties. Therefore, the IMF experts forecast the deceleration of the annual dynamics of international trade from 5.1% in 2017 to 4.5% in 2019. Furthermore, FMI projected an increase in production by 3.9% in 2018 globally, by 2.5% in developed economies and 4.9% in emerging economies.

3. Great Britain and the stages of the Brexit

On June 23rd, British citizens voted in favor of leaving the European Union. On June 23rd, 2016, with 51.9%, for leaving and 48.1% for staying, the result of the referendum on Brexit undoubtedly shocked Europe[1]. David Cameron resigned the day after he lost the referendum and Great Britain received a new prime-minister – Theresa May who declared that she would respect the people's will and that "Brexit is Brexit".

The meeting of the Council of Europe of June 28th, 2016 dealt with the results of the referendum of the United Kingdom.

The informal reunion of the 27 states or government heads of the EU took place on June 29th, 2016.

A new informal reunion took place on December 15th, 2016, where the 27 leaders and presidents of the European Council and European Commission formulated a statement to declare they were ready to start the negotiations with the United Kingdom, as soon as it would deliver the notification under article 50.

March 29th 2017 – the United Kingdom officially calls down article 50 of the Treaty of Lisbon in order to leave the European Union. The Treaty of Lisbon, the constitutional basis for the functioning of the European Union, allows Member States to withdraw from the Community bloc. The five paragraphs of article 50 briefly explains the procedure to be followed for leaving the EU. Article 50 has never been called down so far.

April 29th, 2017 – the special European Council – the first summit since the official launch of Article 50 by the United Kingdom. Guidelines for future talks on Brexit are being adopted.

June 19th, 2017 – the negotiations between the European Union and the United Kingdom are being started, focusing on citizens' rights, financial account, the border of Northern Ireland, etc.

July 20th and August 31st, 2017 – other rounds of negotiations take place, by being focused on citizens' rights.

September 26th, 2017 – the president of the European Council, Donald Trusk meets the British prime minister, Theresa May in London, while the 4th round of negotiations takes place in Brussels.

Other three rounds of negotiations took place on October 12th, November 10th, 2017 and February 9th, 2018, where matters on the transition period, Ireland and finding of solutions for the avoiding of strictly controlled borders and the governance of the withdrawal agreement were discussed.

February 28th, 2018 the European Commission publishes the draft of the withdrawal agreement between the European Union and the United Kingdom.

March 7th, 2018 President Donald Trusk issues a draft of guidelines on the European Union relations with the United Kingdom after the Brexit.

June 19th, 2018 - the Joint Declaration of the European Commission and of the United Kingdom on the progress recorded in March 2018 was made.

November 25th, 2018 – the extraordinary reunion of the European Council where the 27 EU leaders approve the draft agreement for the withdrawal of the United Kingdom and the political statement draft on the future relations between the EU and the United Kingdom.

December 5th, 2018 – the European Council launches the procedure for the signing and conclusion of the agreement on the withdrawal.

January 11th, 2019 – the European Council adopts the decision on the signing of the withdrawal approval.

When all the formalities concluded by the European Council were concluded on February 7th, 2019, President Donald Trusk and prime minister May agreed to continue discussions. The deadline for signing the separation agreement is March 29th, 2019.

[1] "EU Referendum Results," BBC News, http://www.bbc.com/news/politics/eu_referendum/results, (accessed on January 31st, 2019).

Great Britain joined the European Union on January 1st, 1973 and it is nowadays the second largest economy and the third most populated country of all the Member States.

Which were the causes leading to Brexit? Of course, the answer is particularly complex, by involving various aspects, such as: issues on immigration, economy, nationalism and democracy which have played a decisive role throughout the campaign. In addition to all these, there is another fundamental, worthy of attention, accumulated over time issue: dissatisfaction and disillusion with the political establishment, the way in which traditional liberal politics is practiced, along with antipathy towards political actors.

The British anti – political feeling was undoubtedly stronger than before in 2016, but there was also a populist movement with a strong Eurosceptic agenda to capture the voters' attention. And here we are talking about the UK Independence Party, UKIP, a populist party committed to withdrawing from the European Union and which made use of this state of mind, by playing an essential role both in the initiation of the referendum and in the balancing of the outcome of the vote.

When David Cameron promised, during the general election campaign of 2015, that he would organize a referendum over the EU, very few would have anticipated that his engagement would result in months of intensive campaign during which politicians would turn against each other in the most imaginative ways. It was not even suspected that the exit/staying ratio could become a new significant political cleavage. After gaining a new mandate in May 2015, Cameron proposed a plan of renegotiating the relation between the United Kingdom with the EU, which included: changes in payments in favor of migrant welfare; financial guarantees and easier ways for the UK to block EU regulation. It was already too late.

The pro and anti-European sides brought, during the debate for the referendum and in the two years since its results, a series of arguments for and against staying in the community bloc, all media agencies in the world report.

Table 2: Arguments for and against Brexit regarding the main topics of interest

| No. | Issues approached | Arguments pro Brexit (Anti-EU) | Arguments anti Brexit (Pro-EU) |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1 | Sovereignty of Great Britain | The British Parliament no longer has sovereignty. Provided that the EU militates for an "even closer union" and for a deeper economic integration, especially after the Euro zone crisis, it is better for London to leave before the relations become even stronger. | In a globalized world, every country has to work as closely as possible with the other countries in order to flourish economically. The desire for isolation, which became an English stereotype, will undermine Great Britain. Furthermore, the British Prime Minister has already obtained in Brussels a number of exceptions to EU treaties and directives. |
| 2 | Defense policy | Great Britain could soon be forced to contribute to an EU army. A situation in which it shall be bound to give its consent in this respect, in return for a series of concessions. This must be prevented because it could undermine the independent military force of Great Britain. | The European countries face together terrorist threats from the Islamic State and an increasingly aggressive Russia and economic threats of China. By working together, they can fight against these challenges – an effort which would be undermined if Great Britain turned its back on the EU. |
| 3 | European legislation vs. British legislation | Too many British laws are conceived abroad, by means of decrees from Brussels and decisions made by the European Court of Justice; the British courts have to become sovereign again. | The supporters of the Brexit exaggerated the number of the laws established by the European Commission. It is better for London to take part in the law-making process at the European level than to withdraw. |
| 4 | The status of power of the United Kingdom and its influence in the world | The most common phrase is "Great Britain does not need EU to thrive internationally". By strengthening the relations with the countries of the Commonwealth (former British colonies), Great Britain can have as much influence as it has within the EU. | According to liberal leader Nick Clegg, Britain "would be turned into a little England, drifting friendlessly somewhere in the mid-Atlantic", if it leaves the EU. In a world where globalization is becoming stronger, the interests of Great Britain are best protected by remaining in the Community bloc, and the American |

| | | | and Chinese leader have already said that. |
| 5 | Finance and capital market | The discussions about a leak of financial capital outside the country have no basis. London will remain an important financial center outside the EU and banks will still want to have headquarters in the UK, due to low taxes. | Banks will withdraw from Great Britain, and City, the financial center of London will collapse, if Britain leaves the EU. Currently, the commercial advantages generated by the fact that Great Britain is part of the Community bloc increase the profit of banks. |
| 6 | Trade and international relations | The connections of Great Britain with the EU undermine its relations with emerging markets – there is no important commercial agreement with India or China, for example. The withdrawal from the European Union would allow Great Britain to diversify its international relations. | About 44% of Great Britain exports reach other EU countries and, at the same time, many countries will limit their exports to the Kingdom. The lifting of barriers to the main commercial partners of the countries would be counterproductive. |
| 7 | Labor market and employment policies | The threat for Great Britain jobs represented by the withdrawal from the EU was exaggerated. By stimulating investment with corporate tax cuts and other measures, Britain can flourish, like Scandinavian countries outside the EU. | About three million jobs are linked to the European Union and they risk to disappear after Brexit because companies will be more reluctant to invest, if the country is outside the community bloc. |
| 8 | Immigration policies | Great Britain will never be able to control immigration, if it does not leave the European Union, because the freedom of movement gives the other EU citizens the automatic right to leave in the United Kingdom. | Leaving the bloc will not solve the immigration crisis, but it will bring it to the door of the United Kingdom, because border controls from the continent will move from Calais (France) to Dover (Great Britain). |
| 9 | Justice and crime | The European arrest warrant allows British citizens to be sent abroad in order to be prosecuted by the foreign courts, most often for minor offenses. The withdrawal from the EU would end this phenomenon. | Those who commit serious offenses in Great Britain can be transferred to the United Kingdom in order to be held liable for their deeds only due to European arrest warrant. The withdrawal from the EU would prevent the functioning of the justice. |

This is why the effects of the Brexit can be immeasurable for many economies, especially for the European ones. A number of European Union agencies based in the United Kingdom will be moved to other countries. And we refer here to the European Medicines Agency (EMA) which will move to Amsterdam (the Netherlands) and the European Banking Authority (EBA) which will be transferred to Paris (France). A group of Portuguese companies and French banks take a series of protection measures after the signing of the EU withdrawal agreement. France began a massive procedure of recruiting customs workers in 2018, by employing 700 persons. At the same time, France increases the budget for customs by 10% per year. 30000 French societies export products to the United Kingdom and 3000 are based there, therefore, employers' organizations call on all members in similar situations to examine the exit consequences for their activity in legal, fiscal, customs, data transfer, certification terms which have not existed so far. Since last year, Germany has already decreased exports for United Kingdom by 3.6% compared to 2017 and increased them for China. Not to mention the effects of the Brexit on Eastern European countries (Romania included) which suddenly see that their European funds are lower, their access on the labor market is restricted and exports are reduced by a great number of products to the UK. Once created the precedent, it is possible, and this is why the EU is most afraid, that other states want to leave the community bloc. Let's not forget that the Grexit was brought into discussions two years ago, when the Greeks, dissatisfied with the restrictions imposed by the EU and Monetary Fund, have chosen to be rather extremist than rational and tactful. This year, nationalist feeling is once again amplified, political, populist, racist and xenophobic political movements are triggered. They were started by the French in November 2018 when the movement called the protest of yellow vests initiated by the members of civil society degenerated into massive street violence and shall be continued this year by groups of Scotland, North Ireland and even Great Britain.

From a rational perspective, an unstable, fragmented and weak European Union is in the advantage of countries such as Russian Federation or China. If we were to think only to the two states, the gain would come from the commercial and financial area put into practice by the conclusion of bilateral agreements. Furthermore, the Russian Federation, strongly dissatisfied with the sanctions imposed to it by Great Britain after the military intervention of Ukraine, will constantly and relentlessly campaign for the destabilization of the North Atlantic Alliance.

3. Business environment and foreign direct investment in Eastern Europe

More than 100,000 Romanian citizens decided to leave to the United Kingdom[1]. Construction companies occupy the first place in the field of activities preferred by Romanian entrepreneurs in London. According to a study conducted by Enterprise and Innovation of Makwana Consulting Ltd of 2014, 15% of the 10-11000 Romanian companies in the UK carry out their activity in construction and real estate field of business and 10% in manufacturing. The document also shows that the average age of the Romanian entrepreneur is 33, 75% are men and one third of companies are based in London, followed by other major cities, such as Harrow or Milton Keynes. In 2014, London took the lead for the first time in the field of the possibility of doing business or making investment. Why?

The most important factors influencing direct foreign investment are:

- General economic and social environment of the host country allows this – the features of the macroeconomic environment of the host country, political (including political risk) and social stability, but also the level of economic freedom;
- Quality of regulations – embodied in the level of corruption, governmental efficiency, bureaucracy, legislative predictability, economic governance, competition policy or financial institution reform;
- Legislation and tax burden –refers to the clarity and stability of tax regulations, level of taxation, government consumption;
- The economy development level – measured by the level and evolution of GDP per capita, the level of industrialization and outsourcing, intensity of creative economy, degree of innovation, investment in research and development;
- Economic openness – materialized in FDI legislation and commercial openness;
- Level of development of transport and communication infrastructure;
- Market size – measured by means of the number of inhabitants, the ratio of the urban and rural population, but also by the size of the income and the purchasing power of the population;
- Labor market – the variables defining the labor market are the size and the level of education of the employed population, the level of salary, the level of unemployment, the labor/capital ratio, labor productivity;

Romania's low performances in attracting foreign investment after 1990 have a number of causes, such as: the lack of a strategic document referring to the stimulation of investment, the lack of economic levers to attract investment, low efficiency of all Romanian agencies in attracting investors. Not to mention the economic, social and legislative instability of the last two years.

In the background of positive net FDI between 1999-2015, the economies in our immediate region experienced an increase in FDI stocks, but the differences between these economies remain important. The most attractive economy from the perspective of FDI stocks was Poland, with a total volume of FDI stocks of EUR 192 billion at the end of 2015, with a compound annual growth rate of 12.88% between 1999-2015[2]. Czech Republic is the second performer of the region, with a volume of FDI stocks of EUR 101.9 billion at the end of 2015, the annual compound growth rate being of 11.3% between 1999 and 2015. The two countries are followed by Hungary (FDI volume of EUR 83.4 billion in 2015 and a compound growth rate of 8.17%). At the end of 2015, FDI stocks of Romania reached EUR 62.29 billion, and those of Bulgaria only EUR 37.95 billion, although annual growth rate between 1999-2015 was the highest for the two countries – 18.73% for Bulgaria and 15.56% for Romania. In 2015, Romania had the second lowest FDI stock of the region, although it experienced a twelvefold growth between 1999-2015.

| 1 | Romania | 5323 | 62291 | 15.6 |
| 2 | Bulgaria | 2048 | 37950 | 18.7 |

| 5 | Hungary | 21842 | 83039 | 8.2 |

Source: UNCTAD

It can be noted that Czech Republic, Poland and Hungary started from FDI stocks significantly higher than Romania and Bulgaria.

In connection with the GDP, Romania has the lowest volume of FDI stocks among all five economies in the region, of only 39% at the end of 2015, compared to 86.0% for Bulgaria, 76.4% for Hungary, 62.6% for Czech Republic and 44.9% for Poland.

Source: A. Horobeț, O. Popovici, Investițiile străine directe: evoluția și importanța lor în România, 2017, p. 32(Foreign direct investment: evolution and importance in Romania)

It should be noted that, in case of Romania, the share of FDI stocks in GDP increased from 15.7% in 1999, and the best years in terms of this indicator were 2012 (the share of FDI in GDP was of 44.5%) and 2013 (43.2%). Of course, the increase is significant, but not enough, if we take into account the evolution of the other countries in the region, especially of Bulgaria, the share of FDI in GDP of which increased from 16.2% in 1999 (value close to that of Romania) to 86% in 2015.

This evolution was generated by the low FDI flows in Romania, especially after 2008, given that Romanian GDP had a downward trend between 2009-2012 (in 2008, GDP amounted to EUR 141.54 billion, and in 2013 to EUR 133.61 billion), followed by a GDP growth up to the value of EUR 160.39 billion in 2015[1].

4. Conclusions

At the end of 2015, the most important economies investing in Romania were, based on the data provided by UNCTAD relating to the FDI stock, the following: the Netherlands, with a share of FDI in the stock of FDI of 24.99%, followed by Austria, with a share of 14.17%, and Germany, with a share of 12.40%.

Unfortunately, Romania is losing attractiveness for foreign investors after 2009, on the background of national economic and political agitation, which are beginning to be felt in the region. FDI flows fall sharply and are almost three times lower in 2009 than a year ago, similar to the situation in Hungary and Bulgaria. By far, however, the weakest year for FDI after 2008 for Romania was 2011, where the FDI flows were more than 5 times lower than in 2008. In case of Romania, we are concerned about the low level of FDI flows in the period up to 2015, in 2015 the FDI flows reaching only the value of EUR 3.05 billion, but on the background of a slightly upward trend after 2011.

Trade between Romania and the United Kingdom The trade between Romania and Great Britain recorded an upward trend, especially as of 2005, following the conclusion of the negotiations of accession to the European Union which took place in December 2004. They reached in 2015 the amount of EUR 3.94 billion, with a commercial surplus of EUR 814 mil. in favor of Romania. In the first 11 months of 2016, the trade reached the value of EUR 3.76 billion, with a commercial surplus of EUR 898 mil. in favor of Romania.

[1] The data are available in the database of the World Bank: http://databank.worldbank.org and were converted in EUR based on the annual average exchange rates USD/EUR calculated by the European Central Bank.

The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland ranks first in the hierarchy of trade-friendly states favoring Romania (EUR +898 million) (The results of the international trade of Romania between 01.01. 30.11.2016.

Chart 3 Evolution of the trade performed between Romania – Great Britain[1]

The imports of Romania from Great Britain represent about 1% of the GDP, and the Romanian exports to the United Kingdom represent about 1.5% of the Romanian GDP.

British investment in Romania In 2015, British investment in Romania amounted to EUR 1,346 billion (position 13 in the ranking of the foreign investors), representing 2.1% of the total foreign investment in Romania.

We should take into account that, given that the regime of foreign investment in Romania is regulated by the European Union, the negotiations on the relation EU – United Kingdom in the post-Brexit period will also address issues on the investment relation between the two countries (the National Bank of Romania).

Table 4 The structure of Romanian exports in the United Kingdom

Source: Department of Foreign Trade – Ministry for Business Environment, Commerce and Entrepreneurship; Ministry of Foreign Affairs

An analysis of the Brexit effect on the Romanian business environment (Coface, 01.07.2016) indicates that, given the size of bilateral exchanges, the direct impact on short term is limited. In 2015, the Romanian exports represented 1.5% of the Romanian GDP, and the British direct investment only 2.1% of the total foreign direct investment in Romania.

Generally speaking, the negative effects will be visible especially at the level of EU budget, as the United Kingdom had a contribution of 13.45 % to the EU budget in 2016, respectively £10.76 billion, being the third largest contributor at European level, after Germany with 19% and France with 16.3%. If the UK leaves the EU, the budget of the Union will be reduced proportionally, which will directly influence the funding of the Cohesion Policy.

An opportunity for the Central and Eastern European countries, including Romania, refers to the relocation process of employees of the UK-based large companies in the financial, legal, research and design services. According to the Association of Business Service Leaders, the demand for jobs in these areas will triple, up to 1 million, between 2015-2025 (Apostoiu, 11.04.2017). Goldman Sachs will be hiring in Poland, reducing London staff by half, Pfizer will be hiring in Czech Republic, JPMorgan Chase could relocate up to 2,500 positions in the region, especially in Poland, and Hewlett Packard Enterprises could relocate in Cluj-Napoca, where it already has offices (Apostoiu, 11.04.2017).

The withdrawal of the Great Britain from the European Union will affect the European Union business environment which trades or operates in Great Britain, as well as the British one carrying out trade activities in the EU. This is why the negotiations will aim to prevent a legislative vacuum once the Treaties have ceased to apply to the United Kingdom. The goal of the European Union is to minimize the costs for the European Union citizens, for business environment, as well as for Member States (Remarks by President Donald Tusk on the next steps following the UK notification, 31.03.2017).

[1] The data for 2016 are available for the term 01.01-30.11.2016

Romania should use this context and negotiate the transfer of the European Medicines Agency from Great Britain to our country, because it is one of the EU countries on the territory of which no European agency is based (Stolojan, 10.04.2017). Furthermore, Romania should also take into account the less positive scenario caused by the Brexit, which could weaken the European Union, effects which will be felt at national level both economically and socially.

By taking into account the perspective of direct interest of Romania and considering the size of the British market, a comprehensive post-Brexit EU – Great Britain trade agreement will be desirable.

1. The European Economic Area / Customs Union – unlikely scenario: the possibilities of the UK accession to the European Economic Area or of the accession to the Customs Union, similar to the one between the EU and Turkey are not plausible because of their similarity to the current situation (the free movement of persons for the European Economic Area, European legislation and jurisdiction for Customs Union).
2. World Trade Organization – temporary likely scenario: the scenario of the application of WTO fees in the post-Brexit period is likely, given that the European leaders have announced their intention to negotiate a trade agreement with the United Kingdom after it stops to be a EU Member State. Therefore, WTO fees would be applied to bilateral trade between the EU-United Kingdom as of March/April 2019.
3. Preferential models – the desirable scenario for Romania: EU has preferential agreements of various types with various states such as Canada, Switzerland, Balkan states, Kazakhstan, South Korea, India etc. According to the statements made by both British and European leaders, it is expected that the United Kingdom goal is to negotiate and implement a trade agreement such as the Comprehensive Economic and Trade Agreement between the EU and Canada (CETA), potentially slightly extended compared to CETA version. Implementing a CETA type trade agreement would reduce or remove tariffs for trade in goods and services between Romania and the United Kingdom. It would be ideal to implement a wider trade and investment agreement between the EU and the UK with a view to harmonizing legislation between the two parties, in order to contribute not only to the removal of tariffs, but also to the removal of non-tariff barriers.

NATIONAL SECURITY AS A LEGAL CATEGORY

Kremena RAYANOVA

Abstract

This article describes such notions as "security", "national security", types of national security, recent changes in the National security of Bulgarian doctrine. According to the author trust and partnership relations between governments changed to the sanctions and misunderstanding, there are also economical, migration, ecological, social and other types of crises, military collisions and other problems, which effect national security of any country.

Keywords: security, ecological security, informational security, national security, military security, national interest, threat to national security.

The development of public ideas to guarantee national security, requires a more precise specification of this concept. Unfortunately, practice and theory do not give an approved definition. National security is a rarely defined concept. Indeed, there is a defining problem that leads either to a narrow orientation of security policy and activities, or to an overly broad and disorienting interpretation.

On the other hand, a natural property of such general and volumetric terms as national security is to have polyvalent meaning. As a consequence, when actions based on broad consensus have to be reached, each of the participants has the opportunity to apply their own point of view and enrich the basis for a common solution. The ambiguity of the concept of national security reflects subjectivism in its perceptions.

However, it is desirable to have a general degree of conceptualization of the notion that guides policy makers and enables public consensus and control of their decisions and actions.

Efforts to draw up conceptual content are not permanent. There are clearly periods of intensification of this aspiration.

The current period of international relations marked by the end of the Cold War is a period of redefinition of this concept for ours and for the countries affected by the change. Obviously, attention to national security is growing in times of crisis in which society clearly notices the inconvenience of existing concepts after failing to deal with emerging threats.[1] Similar examples of the country include periods of caution to economic security in the seventies, and environmental security in the in the seventies and ecological security in the eighties.

It can be concluded that a more general definition implies a sense of greater openness and uncertainty, and consideration of a wider range of potential threats to the country. Again, a narrower interpretation is a consequence of internal imprisonment and the search for guarantees in traditional power means of security.

There is no legislative act in the country covering the determinants of national security. The most important of them, foreign policy, internal politics, defense, the economy have or are undergoing legal normalization but are not systematically subordinated to the common security objectives. Even less are the links of other spheres of public practice with security. Industry, agriculture, commerce, finance, science, education, health care, social protection remain unconnected wirh the issue security. It is inseparable from the security of the subregion, the region and the world because of the open nature of public systems and their interdependence.[2]

Security is an antithesis of uncertainty. Both concepts here refer to the state of the national public system. They reflect the probability of a system transition from a desirable mission-proofing state to an unwanted and non-mission-critical state. Greater certainty means less likelihood of transition and non-fulfillment of the mission.

Security is a measure of the complex ability of the system to perform the mission. More abstractly, this possibility is a function of the ability to achieve the mission in a favorable, ndifferent or unfavorable environment.

The security of the national system consists of internal and external security. It is inseparable from the security of the subregion, the region and the world because of the open nature of public systems and their interdependence.

The issues directly related to the problem are the roles, risks and responsibilities that the country has to take to build its place in the common and indivisible security system. The resulting political, economic and military security, with which the country will build common security, are the result. The classical notion of national security usually comes down to securing national integrity, independence and sovereignty.

Traditionally, national security means military security of the country and is directly related to its defense and power structure. In this narrow aspect of the concept attention is directed to the characteristic of the potential conflicts from which he attempts to draw the necessary qualities of the power structure.

War as a classic form of conflict is seen in close association with the state and politics. Charles Tilly states that War is doing the state, and the state is making war. Dominating the notion that war is a continuation of politics by military means. J.Loeser writes that politics is a continuation of the war with other means. "[3]

With this approach of over-linking war with politics, a major problem and the most important means of ensuring security is building and maintaining the army and the armed forces. Attention is directed to the adequate principles of military construction and to the preconditions for maintaining and developing the military, defense ability. Primitive questions become the spiritual and material foundations of the military (defense) potential and military power.

It is emphasized that military power determines the character of military policy, but also the pace of social, economic and society development.

It is considered as a function of the possibility of triggering the military (defensive) potential of the country determined by the population, capital, territory, political system, form of government and state structure, the nature of domestic politics.

The adoption of a military concept in the construction of the national security system (integrity, independence and sovereignty) involves different perceptions of the acceptable application of force in international relations.

Looking at the issue of national security, however, shows that the traditional paradigm is increasingly inadequate to this problem.

Military security as a foundation of national security does not disappear, but it lags behind other components such as economic, environmental, information security.

In a period of changes and social destabilization, it is clear that security is based on a complex balance of multiple determinants that change their importance and role depending on the current circumstances. Most of them have a non-military nature, but nevertheless reflects serious security threats.

There are various aspects of insecurity. Their addressing to social development, however, makes it possible to relate to the perceptions of public life and the priorities of policy. The issue of the current interests of society and the means of guaranteeing them comes to the fore. Security is perceived as a state of the public system that guarantees current and potential interests and freedom of decision and action. With every change in the security paradigm, arises a discussion about national interests and priorities of the external policy. Combined with the threats and the main means of their prevention, they build a strategic concept of security. Risk analysis explores the interaction of goals, interests and threats and is a necessary element of political, economic and strategic security planning.

A key point in risk analysis and development of security and defense concepts is the determination of the system of public values and interests.

The theoretical problem that arises in defining the notion of interest can be avoided by accepting the practical concept, that public interest is a sign of the possibility of achieving goals-desires, and the satisfaction of related needs arising under specific circumstances and relationships in the public environment. Interest is an urge for activity and a transition from goals-to-goals.

Objects of interest may be different spiritual and material values. Such can be the institutions and the relationships that society creates to preserve its values. Thus, interest becomes a tool that influences the socio-political behavior of the community-state, nation, class. The foreign-political sphere is dominated by state and national interests, while domestic policy is more influenced by class, professional, group, ethnic, minority or other societal-group interests.

Ensuring or preserving the public material and cultural well-being is a major political task, since it meets a major public interest. Ensuring external security is a means of preserving the political interests of the nation and the state. Internal security must ensure the quality of citizens' lives and ownership. [4]

In its operation, the security system, defense faces many risks, threats and challenges. All of them must be kept under control, identified and evaluated depending on their security impact.

In 1983, Richard Ulman gives an interesting definition of the threat by asserting that "it is an action or consequence of an event that seriously threatens to destroy the quality of life of the country's citizens or threatens to significantly narrow the range of political alternatives, available to the state government or personal non-governmental beings (people, groups, corporations) in the state." The first component of this definition is logical because the quality of life is a value of the highest order for society. The second component, however, emphasizes the liberal nature of the state and its main function - to protect individual rights and the right to choose adequate political decisions.[5]

With the rapid evolutionary development of the term national security, the question is how this concept has influenced, influenced and how it will influence the development of the democratic state.

In order to find an answer to this question, we must start from the basic and top-level law - the Constitution. Here is the basic concept of security, the constitutional term of national security. Each chapter, article and paragraph of the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria seeks to reach the so-called state of national security. The correct definition of the constitutional term national security also reveals the essential meaning of the democratic, legal and social state. It is because of this fact that the political, social and economic meaning of this concept is studied. Covering the legal aspect of state security, the constitutional term lays the foundation for the development of a stable and secure public life. These are the directions of action of the constitutional term national security. The first guideline deals with internal order and internal activities carried out on a purely political, economic and social level, linked to the influence of the term security. That is why the Constitution should consider these actions taking place on the territory of the Bulgarian state. The second guideline is tied to external or more international relations concerning our national security. In its role as a basic law, the Constitution directly influences public relations, which is why the very constitutional term of national security is directly related to the building of a stable and secure country. The authors of the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria have pointed the way to opening and clarifying the term national security. Although no modern constitution, in which the term national security is used, there is no precise and clear definition of the content of this term, it can still be understood the direction of political thinking and the frameworks to which the security of the state extends. The constitution itself encompasses every element of national security and defines the basic functions. Any basic and legal wording of the term national security is, and should be, tied to the constitutional view of this concept. At the heart of any modern and democratic state lies the general legal notion of the term national security. The main issues related to Bulgaria's security are mainly considered at the constitutional level and are related to the general principles of democratic governance, which are expressed in the separation of powers and their mutual control. The definition of the Bulgarian state given by the Constitution is that it is a democratic, legal and social state. By formulating these basic values rooted in freedom, equality, peace, justice and tolerance, reveals the direction and purpose of the constitutional term national security. The term national security can be found in five places in the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria. Each one reveals in a separate way how the very notion of security is entangled in complex social relations. Although the definition of national security is not present in the preamble of the Bulgarian Constitution, we can still find its essence related to: "the rights of the individual, its dignity and security are supreme value ". The first reading is one of the main elements of national security, which is personal security. As we know, national security encompasses the values, needs, interests and needs of the person. Their protection is a fundamental objective concerning both the constitution and the constitutional term. Every law concerning the domestic or foreign policy of the country is primarily related to the protection of a fundamental value, comprising and encompassing the whole concept of national security[6]. Bearing in mind that the Constitution is a fundamental law in every country, the definition given to it in the security law automatically becomes applicable to it. Considering the essential characteristics of the Constitution, which are the achievement and protection of public rights and obligations, we can say that it is heavily influenced by the definition of national security at the theoretical and legal level. The organization and management of the national security system takes place at two main levels. These levels cover the internal and external subsystem disclosed by the Constitution.

The external subsystem of national security is a fundamental part of the constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria. [7]

Considering Article 2, paragraph 2 of the Constitution stating that the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bulgaria is inviolable, we can come to the conclusion that the basic purpose of the concept of national security, expressed in the security of a state, has given a fundamental form to that vision. Further, the constitution also mentions the means by which these values are stated. Art. 9 places a particularly important place on the Bulgarian armed forces, which are called upon to guarantee and protect the sovereigns, the security, the independence of the country, to defend its territorial integrity and unity. The Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria creates and defines the duties of every citizen, including those outside the circle of the State Armed Forces. In Art. 59 para. 1 states that the protection of the state is an irrevocable duty and honor for every Bulgarian citizen, and the most serious crimes punishable by the extreme severity of the law are betrayal and treason to the homeland. The Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria demonstrates the conviction and security of the legislator that the protection of independence, territorial integrity, sovereignty of the state can only take place within a "fair international order". This phrase is used in the part of the constitution where the foreign policy of the country is spoken. The first part of Article 24 proclaims the fundamental role of the foreign policy of the Republic of Bulgaria in which it is carried out in accordance with the principles and norms of international law. In the following, the main goals of the Republic of Bulgaria, which are naturally the national security, the independence of the country, the prosperity and the fundamental rights and freedoms of the Bulgarian citizens, as well as the assistance for the establishment of justice and international order are outlined. In the direction of the principle of active participation of Bulgaria in international conditions for peace and cooperation, it should be interpreted and the explicit mention in Art. 4 para 3 that the Republic participates in the construction and development of the European Union. The policy aimed at achieving a fair international order also involves taking care of political refugees. The Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria provides in Article 27 (2) that the State provides shelter to foreigners persecuted for their beliefs or activities in defense of internationally recognized rights and freedoms.

Particularly special regard to the foreign security of the Republic of Bulgaria has some constitutional provisions on information. According to Art. 41 the right of every citizen to seek, distribute and receive information may be restricted for reasons of national security.

The Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria lists a whole set of mandatory internal characteristics of the state. These are the sovereignty of the people, its legal nature, the division of powers, political pluralism, parliamentary rule, the ban on the formation of autonomous territorial education, the state guarantee of life, the dignity and the rights of the individual. The Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria contains some prohibitions concerning direct internal security. Art. 44 para. 2 prohibits organizations whose activities are directed against the sovereignty, territorial integrity of the country and the unity of the nation, to the raging of racial, national, ethnic or religious enmity, to violation of citizens' rights and freedoms, as well as organizations that create secret or militarized structures or strive to achieve their goals through violence.

According to some Bulgarian authors, some of these provisions contradict the international right to freedom of association and established legal standards in developed democracies. International standards in this regard are summarized by the so-called Venice Commission to the Council of Europe in a report that explicitly states that it is permissible to prohibit political parties only in cases where they propagate violence or use of violence as a political means of rejecting the democratic constitutional order. In practice, there are parliamentary parties in Europe working for territorial separation. Examples are the United Kingdom and Spain. The Belgian constitution, for its part, allows the ethnic German population to have its own government, and in Denmark the Danish minority is actively represented in local government bodies.

In today's world, it is becoming increasingly important to define the term national security. In order to convey the form of a major part of the state, it must necessarily be present in its constitutional form. The constitutional term national security defines the boundaries within which the security concept stands. This understanding encompasses the external and internal aspects of the state. Any economic, political or social earthquake directly affects national security. Similarly, the external influence of other countries as well as the international situation of the Bulgarian state can be considered.[8] The foundations on which the constitutional term national security is based lie precisely in the constitution itself. There is no constitution that directly describes the whole structure of national security, but each constitution considers the impact of this term on internal and external processes concerning state related to government. Each constitutional provision sets out some of the most important goals, and these are the building of a stable and functioning state whose function is to protect the rights and freedoms of the individual. It should not be forgotten that the main element of national security is personal security. Secondly, it is public, and as a higher level is state security. Building a stable and above all safe country would be impossible in the face of an unstable economic situation. From a legal point of view, security in one country occurs only when the internal and external situation of the country is in balance with the basic dogmas of national security. In order to build the new kind of public relations related to national security it is necessary for it to find its constitutional expression.

This is naturally achieved through a long process of evolution of the concept of national security. It forms a completely new form of governmental and political governance.

Thanks to the constitutional term national security, it is possible to shape and construct a new concept of domestic and foreign policy of a state influenced entirely by the legal sense of security.

THE ECONOMIC COMPETITION BETWEEN UNITED STATES, EUROPEAN UNION AND CHINA

Ștefan Cătălin TOPLICEANU[*]

Abstract

The economic and political developments at the end of the 20th century, but especially those at the beginning of the 21st century, have led to numerous debates, analyze and forecasts on international power structures. Various debated events, such as economic, social and political crises of multiple magnitudes, military-ideological conflicts in different areas of the world, migration flows and socio-cultural transformations, have announced new phenomena regarding power centers of the world economy. Under the impact of these international events, there is often discuss about the decline of American supremacy, European economic reformation and the rise of emerging economies, especially China. Related to these developments, different models of power structures are emerging, in which countries and groups (especially the United States, the European Union and China) rotate among themselves in the hope of designing a system of world power. Among all the nuances of power, the most important component remains economic power, being the decisive element of the development of other types. For this reason, in the world power relations, a clear picture of the existing power structures is needed. This study aims to analyze the economic competition and the power hierarchy between the United States, the European Union and China.

Keywords: power centers, economic competiton, economic power, American supremacy, the rise of China.

1. Introduction

The power manifestations in the world economy have multiple implications in states and international organizations` lives. Through its various instruments, from different fields as economics, military, sociology, politics, tehnology, culture, international actors exert their power, changing the configuration of world economy. From a historical point of view, there have been several phases of power manifestation in the world economy: ancient empires, colonial powers, bipolarity, unipolarity, multipolarity. Even if multipolarity has been met before; it has never manifested itself at such a high intensity as now, including so many states and actors. Despite the nowadays situation, the most powerful actors remains the United States, the European Union and China, which have developed a great economic competition between them. This competition is worthy to be analyzed since it includes many economic components and it manifests from a long time, causing permanent changes of hierarchy between states. This study aims to offer a clear picture of economic competition between these three great powers, resorting to comparing various economic, trade, investment and social indicators.

2. Literature review

Generally, power is associated with concepts such as influence, force, capability, domination, constraint and authority. An attempt to define power is the one through which power is compared with the imposing of your own will within social relations in spite of the existing oppositions. (Pausenberger, 1983, p. 131)

On the other hand, power describes the ability of a nation or a political actor to influence the behavior of other actors using economic or military incentives. (Bucur, 2015, p. 9) Also, power can be seen as the taking decisions` capacity and the ability of putting it into effect. (Chirovici, 2009, p. 21) These processes are initiated by two instruments: the negative one, which involves coercion, the positive one, which appeals to open acceptance. (Bal et al, 1999, p. 37)

Despite all these attempts, the definition of power can be sum up as the capacity to influence the world economy, manifesting by an economic or political actor, a multinational company or an international organization. The influences of these actors are structured on five dimensions such as economic, military, physical, political and cultural, the economic component being the most important. (Kebabdjian, 1994, p. 297)

Over time, economic power has manifested itself in various forms of power, especially military one. The military and economic supremacy was held by different ancient, medieval and colonial empires, making them either regional or international power. But, that multipolarity was not as intense as it is today, because the economic power is more active (including commercial, investment, financial and monetary instruments) and the military component has turned into various soft power.

After various configurations since post-war period, in the direction of bipolarity-unipolarity-multipolarity, the world economy is looking for a stable power structure.

[*] PhD, Faculty of Economic and Business Administration, „Al. I. Cuza" University of Iași (email: tstefan.catalin@yahoo.com).

A first option is a structure based on American supremacy and some regional powers such as Germany, China, France, Japan, Russia, Brazil, India, South Africa and Nigeria for solving international problems. (Huntington, 1999, pp. 35-36)

Another option is to restore at bipolarity system between the United States and Russia Federation (Achcar, 2002, p. 14), even if there are some differences between these two economies.

There is, also, the possibility of a trio formula, based on the trade triad between the United States, the European Union and Japan (Hirst et al, 2000) or adding India to these. (Mahbubani, 2008)

Considering all of this, we believe that the international structure of economic power is built from three pillars: the United States, the European Union and China. The other states and the entire world economy are influenced by the economic competition between these three great powers.

But, it is considered that even if their decisions can influence the international environment, their actions must be confirmed or blocked by a secondary group of powers, including Japan, Russia and India. (Khanna, 2008, pp. 17-21)

Even if, from different points of view (political, cultural, military, technological, social) there are various models of power structures, demonstrating the multipolar character of world, the economic evolutions after the financial crises of 2007-2008 reveal an economic competition between the United States, the European Union and China.

2. Methodology

In order to analyze the economic competition between the United States, the European Union and China and to compare these three major world power, we use 35 indicators of 2017 from World Bank`s statistical database (Annex 1). These indicators reflect different elements of economic power such as Gross Domestic Product (GDP), trade, foreign direct investments (FDIs), Gross National Income (GNI), export costs, inflation, business environment and labor market.

For every indicator used, the United States, the European Union and China are compared each other and every one gets a score between 3 and 1, of which a score of 3 means that an economy has the best position comparing with the other two and a greater disponibility to manifests his economic power. For example, China`s GDP based on purchasing power parity is almost $23.3 trillion, followed by the European Union with about $21 trillion and the United States with around $19.4 trillion. In this case, China will be scored with 3, the European Union with 2 and the United States with 1.

At the end, the scores of every indicator are gathered, suggesting the economic hierarchy between power centers. The maximum final score for an economy can be 105 points, if that state has only scores of 3 at all 35 indicators. On the other side, if an economy has only scores of 1 at all indicators, the final score may not be less than 35 points.

3. Analysis and findings

According to Annex 2, the European Union is better positioned at 15 indicators, while the United States at 12 indicators and China at 8.

Starting with the European Union, Table 1 reflects the European economy`s advantages, driven by trade, export costs, foreign direct investments and inflation. Thus, the European Union has the lowest cost to export and the fastest time to export based on documentary compliance.

Table 1

| European advantages | China | US | EU |
|---|---|---|---|
| Cost to export, border compliance | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| Cost to export, documentary compliance | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| Current account balance | 2 | 1 | 3 |
| Exports of goods and services | 2 | 1 | 3 |
| External balance on goods and services | 2 | 1 | 3 |
| Foreign direct investment, net | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| Foreign direct investment, net inflows | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| Foreign direct investment, net outflows | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| Fuel exports | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| High-technology exports | 2 | 1 | 3 |
| ICT service exports | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| Inflation | 2 | 1 | 3 |
| Service exports | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| External balance on services | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| Time to export, documentary compliance | 1 | 2 | 3 |

Practically, according to Annex 1, for European Union, the costs to export reach almost $85 regarding border compliance and about $17 by documentary compliance. European Union is followed by United States with $175 for first type of cost and $60 for second one. Also, the European Union`s time to export regarding documentary compliance is almost 1.4 hours, followed by United States with 1.5 hours and China with 21.2 hours.

Beyond the costs and time to export, the European economy`s benefits are related to exports volume, both goods and services, as well as fuels, information and communication technology (ICT) services and high-technology. Thereby, according to Annex 1, the European Union exports goods and services worth $8 trillion, more than China and the United States combined. Also, the European Union`s fuels exports ($278 billion) are higher than American ($165 billion) and Chinese ones ($35.5 billion). Moreover, the European`s service exports reach almost $2.3 trillion, while the American ones are about $797.7 billion and the Chinese ones a little bit over $200 billion.

From those $2.3 trillion service exports, almost $613 billion are represented by high-technology exports and nearly $277 billion by ICT service exports. However, these exports are superior to those recorded by United States and China. The first exports category reaches almost $504 billion in China and $110 billion in the United States. The second one is higher in the United States than China with $15 billion.

It is seems that the economic power of European Union is mainly driven by trade. Even in the case of external balance on goods and services, European Union has superiority due to its trade surplus of almost $653.8 billion, while the Chinese one is about $210 billion and the United States has trade deficit. But, if we are looking at external balance on services, China is the one which has trade deficit, while the American surplus is almost $255 billion and the European one more than $367 billion.

Despite its trade superiority, the European Union is the largest investor and attracts the most foreign direct investments, followed by United States and China. Practically, according to Annex 1, the European Union invests twice more than the United States and seven times more than China. Also, European economy attracts more foreign direct investments than United States and China together, having a net FDI over $160 billion.

The last two indicators to which the European Union is better positioned than the United States and China are the current account balance and the annual inflation rate at consumer prices. In both cases, the European Union is followed by China. Regarding first indicator, the European current account balance reaches almost $443 billion, while the Chinese one is about $165 billion and the American one is negative. On the other side, the European inflation rate is almost the same as the Chinese one, while the United States records 2.13%.

As we mention before, after European Union, the United States has 12 indicators scored with 3, indicating the best position recorded by American economy. Related to Table 2, United States` benefits are multiple: a favorable arms trade, high levels of GDP and GNI per capita, a positive and high net migration, trade surpluses on arms, fuel and services, a low dependency on fuel imports, a small population ages 65 and above and the fastest time to start a business and to export. To almost all of these indicators, the United States is followed by European Union, excluding external balance on fuel, arms and fuel imports.

So, starting with trade, United States is the biggest arms exporter, with almost $12.4 billion, more than European and Chinese export together, as it can be observed in Annex 1.

Table 2

| American advantages | China | US | EU |
|---|---|---|---|
| Arms exports | 1 | 3 | 2 |
| Arms imports | 2 | 3 | 1 |
| External balance on arms | 1 | 3 | 2 |
| Fuel imports | 2 | 3 | 1 |
| External balance on fuel | 2 | 3 | 1 |
| GDP per capita, PPP | 1 | 3 | 2 |
| GNI per capita, PPP | 1 | 3 | 2 |
| Net migration | 1 | 3 | 2 |
| Population ages 65 and above | 1 | 3 | 2 |
| Time required to start a business | 1 | 3 | 2 |
| Time to export, border compliance | 1 | 3 | 2 |
| Unemployment | 1 | 3 | 2 |

Also, the United States has the lowest volume of arms imports, about half of billion, which is translated to a trade surplus of almost $12 billion, twice than the European Union and China together. But, from this trade surplus, it has to be reduced the deficit regarding fuel trade, counted at nearly $40billion. Even so, this deficit is lower than the Chinese one ($231 billion) or the European one ($309 billion), making the American economy to be in a better position. Moreover, the low level of fuel trade deficit is due to the American economy`s independence on fuel imports. Comparing with the European Union and China, the United States imports fuel of only $204 billion, two times less than European Union and with almost $60 billion less than China. The last, but not least, the time to export, related to border compliance, is 1.5 hours in United States, comparing with almost 8 hours in European Union and about 26 hours in China.

Despite all these, the United States can not rise to the commercial power of European Union, which has more trade advantages than United States. But, American economy is more attractive than the European one. The net migration for United States is about 4.5 million people, compared to 4.32 million people recorded by European Union. As far as China is concerned, its net migration is negative, which means that almost 1.6 million people prefer to leave China than stay there.

The American attractiveness results, also, from its high levels of GDP and GNI per capita, based on purchasing power parity. According to Annex 1, in the United States` GDP and GNI per capita reach almost $60.000, bigger than European Union and China values together. In fact, the American`s GDP and GNI per capita are three times higher than the Chinese ones.

In addition, the United States` business environment is attractive for investitors because the time required to start a business is faster than in the European Union and China. For such a process, it takes 5.6 days in United States, twice as fast as in the European Union and four times faster than in China.

However, the United States remains the world` second investor regarding FDIs and the second destination of FDI inflows after the European Union.

Nevertheless, the United States has superiority to the European Union in the social field. European Union has no score of 3 at any social indicator, its power being based on trade, investments and a low inflation rate. In social field, the United States has the smallest population ages 65 and above and the lowest unemployment compared with European Union and China. Therefore, the American population over the age of 65 counts 50 million people, while the European one is double and China has three times more old people than United States. Moreover, the American unemployment is just over 7 million people, while in the European Union there are about 19 million unemployed, almost half as much as in China. So, from a social point of view, the United States is more advantaged and attractive than European Union, while the European economic power is based, mainly, on trade and investments.

In the middle of these two, there is China, which has 8 indicators scored with 3, according to Annex 2, less than the European Union and the United States. But, China is in the middle of these two because here is a mix of power between trade, business, financial reserves and social facts, its advantages being represented in Table 3.

Table 3

| Chinese advantages | China | US | EU |
|---|---|---|---|
| Imports of goods and services | 3 | 2 | 1 |
| GDP, PPP | 3 | 1 | 2 |
| GNI, PPP | 3 | 1 | 2 |
| Labor force | 3 | 1 | 2 |
| Population ages 0-14 | 3 | 1 | 2 |
| Profit tax | 3 | 1 | 2 |
| Service imports | 3 | 2 | 1 |
| Total reserves (includes gold) | 3 | 1 | 2 |

Practically, China has the highest values of GDP and GNI based on purchasing power parity, the biggest young population, a massive labor force, the largest financial reserves, the lowest profit tax and the most reduced volume of goods and service imports.

Starting with Chinese GDP and GNI based on purchasing power parity, their value exceeds $23 trillion, while the European ones are close to $21 trillion and the American ones over $20 trillion, as it can be observed in Annex 1. Also, China has the lowest volume of imports of goods and services, about $2.2 trillion, by which almost 472 billion are service imports. China is followed by the United States with $2.9 trillion, by which nearly 542.2 billion are service imports, while the European total volume of imports reaches $7.3 trillion and nearly $1.9 trillion are related to services.

Regarding business environment, the profit tax in China is 11% of commercial profits, while the European average is 12.41% and in the United States this tax reaches almost 28%, according to Annex 1.

In social field, it is necessary to mention that China`s young population reaches 245 million people, three times higher than European one and about four times more than in the United States. The difference is almost the same for labor force, being about 787 million people in China.

Finally, the last indicator where China has an advantage compared with the European Union and the United States is the size of reserves, including gold. Practically, the Chinese reserves are estimated at $3.24 trillion, more than double than the European ones. In the same time, the United States reserves are below $500 billion.

Nevertheless, China cannot reach the commercial power of European Union or its investitional potential. Also, the United States remains the greatest military power and the most attractive destination for people because of its high living conditions. In these circumstances, China needs more time to develop itself and to minimize the differences which separate it by the European Union and the United States.

4. Conclusions

Power is highly met in all society components, but manifests itself stronger in international relations. It can be defined by an economic, social or political actor (person, state, international organization, multinational company) which influences the other actors` activities through various methods and instruments (economic, political, moral, cultural, military, technological), the economic ones being the most important and decisive. The economic manifestation of power was the most commonly used, even though it was expressed in other forms of power, especially military, over time.

Historic states` evolutions and mutations of economic and social conditions have caused changes in power structures. Over time, many states have had the chance to lead and to hold the power, changing the world hierarchy. Today`s multipolarity has reached a level that has not been reached before, in which economic competition is disputed between the European Union, the United States and China.

| Frequency of scores | China | US | EU |
|---|---|---|---|
| Score of 3 | 8 | 12 | 15 |
| Score of 2 | 8 | 12 | 15 |
| Score of 1 | 19 | 11 | 5 |
| Final score | 59 | 71 | 80 |

In Table 4 there is the scoring summary obtained by the European Union, the United States and China. The first one sums up most of the 3 and 2 scores, followed by the United States. Practically, after comparing these three great powers, the European Union has 15 indicators scored with 3 and the same number of indicators scored with 2. Also, the United States has 12 indicators for each these two score categories, while China has 8 indicators for both. In the same time, the most indicators scored with 1 are met in China`s case, having more than the United States and the European Union together.

However, according to our calculations, the European Union has 80 points, the highest final score. This means that the European economy is better positioned than the American or Chinese one and exerts greater influence in the world economy. The European Union`s economic power is mainly driven by trade, but also by low inflation and an investiment environment, making it the largest investor and the most attractive destination of foreign direct investment.

The second position is taken by the United States with 71 points. Even if the United States cannot reach the commercial and investment power of European Union, the American economy is more attractive than the European one due to higher living conditions and the short time to start a business. Also, the United States` advantages include great military capabilities, high net migration, low dependency on fuel imports and a low population over 65 years.

China is weaker positioned than the European Union and the United States. Its final score is 59 points, but Chinese power is driven by a mix of facts related to trade, business, social issues and financial reserves. With its massive labor force, the youngest population and its large financial reserves, China has the power to recover the gaps which make it inferior to the European Union and United States.

Nevertheless, the economic competition between the European Union, the United States and China remains open. It may be the subject of future research, which could include several indicators or more power`s dimensions.

GIVING REASONS FOR ADMINISTRATIVE ACTS – WARRANTY OF A GOOD ADMINISTRATION

Ionela-Alina ZORZOANĂ

Abstract

This article proposes to analyze the giving reasons for administrative acts, an essential condition of good administration. Starting from art. 41 Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU providing as the condition of a good administration "the obligation of the administration to give reasons for its decisions", we went on to the domestic legislation that does not define the principle of good administration. In regard to the obligation of public authorities to give reasons for acts they issue, the domestic legislation comprises provisions only on normative acts, Law. 24/2000 on the legal technical norms for the issuance of regulations being applicable. Many problems arise in the case of administrative acts of an individual nature where there is no regulated obligation to motivate them.

Thus, the purpose of this article is to draw attention on the necessity of a legal regulation also in regard to the obligation to give reasons for individual administrative acts. This is necessary, considering that this type of administrative acts often provide obligations on the citizen, who is entitled to be informed about the actual reasons.

Otherwise, we believe that giving reasons for individual administrative acts also results in a relief of the contentious-administrative courts, which are ever more often vested with applications for the annulment of such acts, the main reason being such of the lack of giving reasons.

We also hope that both the Administrative Code, but especially the Administrative Procedure Code solves the issue of giving reasons for individual administrative acts, so as to ensure a balanced and transparent relation between the public authorities and citizens.

Keywords: the principle of good administration, the regulation at European level, transparency, obligation to give reasons to administrative acts, the regulation in domestic legislation, regulating administrative acts, individual administrative act, de facto and de jure motivation, administrative-jurisdictional act, contentious administrative court

1. Introduction

This study proposes an analysis of the necessity to observe the obligation of motivating administrative deeds, as a warranty of good administration. The study starts from an analysis of the regulations at European level, where the principle of good administration is regulated in detail and the failure to observe shall result in sanctions upon the Member States of the European Union that do not observe such. The principle of good administration at European level includes among its conditions the motivation of the administrative acts.

If the situation of normative administrative acts does not allow discussions, Law no. 24/2000 expressly providing that such acts must be motivated (being accompanied by certain types of motivational tools, as the case may be), issues arise especially in case of acts administrative, where there is no legal obligation set up.

Taking advantage of this legislative vacuum, in most cases, public authorities issue administrative acts that are motivated only de jure, relying on the principle that no one can invoke the ignorance of the law. However, we cannot accept that it is sufficient to insert only the legal grounds in the preamble of an individual administrative act and thus fulfil the obligation to motivate such. Contrary to the European institutions, in Romania, although the practice of the courts is established, i.e. it obliges national public institutions to motivate the administrative act, they still take small steps in this regard.

Unfortunately in Romania, concurrently with the timid drafting of the two Codes, the Administrative and Administrative Procedure ones, we hope that we shall comply with the European regulations, i.e. there should be an obligation to motivate also individual administrative acts.

However, attention must be drawn to the risks that exist with regard to the express regulation of such an obligation, such of fully motivating all administrative acts. We state this, as it is obvious that in case of individual administrative acts regulating rights granted to a determined person(s) (e.g. study diplomas, various certificates etc.) no vast de facto motivation is necessary. However, issues arise where individual administrative acts impose certain obligations on its recipient(s) and, due to the lack of motivation, they cannot defend themselves before the authority.

2.1. The Principle of Good Administration

2.1.1. The regulation of the good administration at European level

1. Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

PhD candidate, Law Faculty, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, (e-mail: alinazorzoana@gmail.com);

The principle of "good administration" was mentioned at European level for the first time in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. The Charter is a mandatory legal tool for the European citizen to stand before any European court. In October 1999, when the drafting of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union was under discussion, the European Ombudsman proposed that in the Charter should be mentioned "the right of citizens to the quality of the services provided by the administration", claiming even that the 21st century shall have to be the century of good administration. "The right to a good administration" occurs first of all in art. 41 from the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, adopted at the Summit from Nice in December 2000. The right to a good administration according to art. 41 from the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union provides the following: "(1) Every person has the right to have his or her affairs handled impartially, fairly and within a reasonable time by the institutions and bodies of the Union. (2) This right includes: (a) the right of every person to be heard, before any individual measure, which would affect him or her adversely is taken; (b) the right of every person to have access to his or her file, while respecting the legitimate interests of confidentiality and of professional and business secrecy; (c) the obligation of the administration to give reasons for its decisions. (3) Every person has the right to have the Community make good any damage caused by its institutions or by its servants in the performance of their duties, in accordance with the general principles common to the laws of the Member States. (4) Every person may write to the institutions of the Union in one of the languages of the Treaties and must have an answer in the same language." Therefore, at European level, citizens or residents of EU Member States enjoy the right to good administration in relations with the institutions and bodies of the European Union, according to art. 41 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. The Charter also provides for the right of every citizen to complain to the European Ombudsman in the event of maladministration in the work of Community institutions or bodies. Under the Treaty of Lisbon signed on 13 December 2007, amending the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union has acquired primary legal force, having the same legal value as the Treaties.

2. The European Ombudsman

In close connection to the right to good administration, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union provides in Art. 43 the right of every EU citizen or of any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in the territory of any Member State of the European Union to notify the European Ombudsman in case of maladministration in the activities of the Community institutions or bodies, except the Court of Justice of the European Union and the European Court of First Instance in regard to their jurisdictional attributions.

The European Ombudsman is authorized to receive complaints from any citizen of the Union or from any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in a Member State concerning cases of maladministration in the work of the Union's institutions, bodies, offices or agencies, except the Court of Justice of the European Union in the exercise of its jurisdictional functions. Where the Ombudsman finds an instance of maladministration, he/she shall refer the matter to the institution, body, office or agency concerned, which has a period of three months to communicate his/her point of view. The Ombudsman then submits a report to the European Parliament and the concerned institution. The complainant is notified about the outcome of the investigations. The European Parliament may also, at the request of a quarter of its constituent members, set up a temporary inquiry commission to examine the alleged breach of the legal regulations or maladministration in the application of Union law, unless the alleged facts are examined by a court and as long as the judicial procedure is not completed. Therefore, preventing and combating maladministration and implicitly promoting good governance are concerns of EU bodies and institutions in order to achieve good European governance.

3. The European Code of Good Conduct

In September 2001, the European Parliament endorsed the European Code of Good Administrative Behaviour[1], which laid down the standards to be observed by the EU institutions and bodies and their employees in their relations with citizens of the European Union. The Code details the provisions of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, bringing together material and procedural principles that govern actions taken at the level of European institutions and bodies. This document comprises theoretical provisions, such as: legality, non-discrimination, proportionality and impartiality of actions of officials in EU institutions, prohibition of abuse of power, independence, fairness, amiability and objectivity of employees of EU bodies. Procedural rules on receiving, assessing and sending replies to received requests, rules on hearing people whose interests may be affected by decisions of EU institutions and rules on decision-making regarding a request (reasonable time for decision-making, obligation to motivate decisions and indications of appeals). Since the very beginning of the Code it is provided that "This Code contains the general principles of good administrative behaviour which apply to all relations of the institutions and their administrations with the public, unless they are governed by specific provisions"[2]. The Code explains

[1] Reviewed in the year 2013;

[2] The European Mediator of that time, Paraskevas Nikiforos Diamandouros, specified in 2005, in the Foreword to the edition of the Code published on the webpage of the institution that the Code is also "a useful guide and a resource for civil servants, encouraging the highest to citizens the practical significance of this right and what they can expect in a concrete way from the European administration. It is important to mention art. 26 of the Code, which states that any failure of a European institution or official to comply with the principles set out in this Code may be the subject of a complaint to the European Ombudsman. Concurrently with the approval of the Code, the European Parliament also adopted a resolution calling on the European Ombudsman to apply the Code when considering whether a case of maladministration has occurred. As a consequence, the Ombudsman duly refers to the Code in his/her investigations, as well as in his/her proactive furtherance of good administration.

In conclusion, as it results from the above, it can be noticed that at European level, the principle of good administration is well regulated, with the European institutions focusing on the interests of citizen.

With regard to the obligation to motivate the acts issued by the European authorities, the Community case-law noted that the statement of reasons must be appropriate to the issued act and must present in a clear and unequivocal manner the algorithm followed by the institution, which adopted the challenged measure, so as to enable the data subjects to establish the motivation of the measures and also to enable the competent Community Courts of Law to perform the review of the act (Case C-367/1995) and, as the European Court of Justice decided, the extent and detail of the statement of reasons depends on the nature of each case, an insufficient or erroneous motivation is deemed equivalent to a lack of motivation of the acts; moreover, insufficient reasoning or lack of motivation entails the nullity or invalidity of Community acts C-41/1969) and a detailed presentation of the reasons is also necessary where the issuing institution enjoys a wide estimation power, since the statement of reasons provides the act with transparency, as it is possible for individuals to ascertain whether the act is well-founded and concurrently it enables the court to exert the judicial control (Case C- 509/1993)[3].

2.1.2. Regulating the principle of good administration in Romania

4. Normative acts regulating the principle of good administration

In Romania, the principle of good administration is not provided as such in a normative act.

However, starting from art. Article 41 (2) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, quoted in point I.1.1, good administration is the right of every person to be heard before any individual measure which may affect him or her adversely, the right of every person to have access to his or her file, while respecting the legitimate interests of confidentiality and of professional and business secrecy, the right of the administration to give reasons for its decisions.

Although the domestic legislation from Romania does not comprise express provisions on good administration, there are normative acts indirectly regulating the elements of the concept of good administration.

One of the normative acts subject to the principle of good administration is Law no. 52/2003 on decisional transparency in public administration. As stated in art. (2), the aim of the normative act is to increase "the degree of responsibility of the public administration towards the citizen as a beneficiary of the administrative decision" and "the active participation of citizens in the process of administrative decision-making and in the process of drafting normative acts". Another normative act in which is reflected the principle of good administration is Law no. 544/2001 on free access to information of public interest [4], providing in art. 1 that " The free and unrestricted access of the person to any information of public interest, defined by this law, is one of the fundamental principles of the relations between persons and the public authorities".

A direct reference to the principle of "good administration" is found in Law no. 7/2004 on the Code of Conduct for Civil Servants [5] which, in Art.2, provides that "The objectives of this Code of Conduct are to ensure the improvement of the quality of the public service, good administration in the accomplishment of the public interest, as well as to contribute to the elimination of bureaucracy and corruption in the public administration".

From the point of view of the present paper, Law no. 24/2004 is of particular relevance[6] on the norms of legal technique to draft normative acts. The provisions of Government Decision no. 1361/2006 regarding the content of the tool for presentation and motivation of draft normative acts subject to Government approval[7], but also such of Government Decision no. 561/2009 for the approval of the Regulation on the procedures at Government level for the drafting, endorsing and presentation of document drafts of public policies, of normative acts drafts, as well as of other documents in view of adopting/approval are of significance[8].

This latter component of the principle of good administration - the motivation of normative acts (individual acts without express regulation, as will be explained in point II) is part of the subject analyzed in this paper.

5. The Administrative Code and the Administrative Procedure Code

The need for administrative codification was evoked in time, due to the large number of current regulations in the field of public administration. In the explanatory memorandum of the law draft on the Administrative Code, it was mentioned that " the inflation of the normative acts issued and the frequent changes in the regulations that were necessary in the process of their implementation generated parallelisms, overlaps and implicitly difficulties in implementation in practice." Furthermore, at European level, this legislative solution is not a novelty.[9]

In the law draft on the Administrative Code, although there is no explicit reference to the notion of good administration, the principle of transparency in public administration is nevertheless provided in Art. 8, i.e.: (1) In the drafting of normative acts, public authorities and institutions have the obligation to inform and submit to the public consultation and debate the draft normative act, and to allow the citizens access to the administrative decision-making process, as well as to data and information of public interest, within the limits of the law. (2) Beneficiaries of public administration activities have the right to obtain information from public administration authorities and institutions and they have a correlative obligation to set available information to the beneficiaries, ex officio or upon request, within the limits of the law".

It can be noticed that although the draft normative act comprises some principles of good administration, we can nevertheless find no explicit provision of the concept and, obviously, no definition.

In regard to the motivation of administrative acts, the draft normative act refers to normative acts (which is not a novelty), and regarding individual administrative acts, we refer only to the evaluation procedure of civil servants[10]. We shall see what happens to the draft Law on the Administrative Code, considering that on 6 November 2018, by Decision no. 681, the Constitutional Court admitted the objection of unconstitutionality filed by the President of Romania and declared the draft normative act unconstitutional[11].

On the other hand, there is indeed in an early stage also a draft Code of Administrative Procedure[12]. The draft Code of Administrative Procedure "provides the pre-procedural, simultaneous and subsequent procedural conditions to issue or adopt the administrative acts, partly defining each operation, the succession of its development, the place and importance of the procedure of the act (endorsements, agreements, quorum and necessary majority, motivation, drafting, signing, approval, confirmation, publication or communication), in close correlation with the general methodology of applicable legislative technique and regulatory and administrative matters.

Thus, the obligation to state reasons for administrative acts is implemented, consisting of the factual and legal considerations justifying and requiring the adoption of a normative or individual act, ensuring the decisional transparency, strengthening the administrative capacity, simplifying the procedures in the field in regard to the executive citizen report, aiming to eliminate bureaucracy, formalism and corruption in this important segment of public life, concurrently ensuring unrestricted access to information of public interest"[13].

2.2. Motivating administrative acts - a condition for good administration

2.2.1. Motivation - validity condition of the administrative act

The motivation of the administrative act is a condition of its validity, as an external form of manifestation of the authority's will (the written form to which the administrative act being mandatory). On the other hand, as expressly provided by Law no. 24/2000, in case of normative acts is also mandatory the motivation on the merits. As provided in the doctrine, "the implementation of the mandatory nature of the reasoning of administrative acts, which is already comprised in the theses of the future code of administrative procedure, will reduce the risk that the administration would take arbitrary, abusive decisions and shall ultimately improve the work of the administration."[14]

The usefulness of the motivation of decisions has a triple interest, namely: informing about the reasons, which means explaining the decision and thus avoiding possible conflicts between the administration and the addressees of the act; the obligation to motivate determines the administration not to make decisions due to reasons that cannot be brought to the attention of public opinion, so that the administration should guide its activity by moral norms; the motivation enables effective hierarchical control over the content of the [9] The options considered by the European states were the drafting of unique laws in the field (Portugal), field law collections (codices - France) or sectoral codification (France, Germany), but in none of these states there is a law unifying the legislation in several areas of public administration (http://www.cdep.ro/proiecte/2018/300/60/9/em369.pdf)

[10] Article 19 (2) and (3) "(2) The head of the public authority or institution shall settle the challenge based on the assessment report and the reports prepared by the assessed civil servant, assessor and countersignor, within 10 working days as of the date of expiry of the deadline for filing the appeal. (3) On basis of the documents provided in paragraph (2) with the obligation to state reasons*, the head of the public authority or institution shall reject the reasoned objection or admit it, in which case he/she shall amend the evaluation report accordingly. The result of the challenge shall be communicated to the civil servant within 5 calendar days of its settlement*."

[11] Until the date of this account, the Constitutional Court's decision no. 681 / 06.11.2018 has not been drafted.

[12]The codification process of the normative acts regulating the procedural issues of the public administration was more pronounced during 2008, the actions taken being materialized by the adoption of Government Decision no. 1.360/2008 on the approval of the preliminary theses of the Administrative Procedure Code (Published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, No. 734/30 October 2008).

decision, as well as rigorous judicial review of the administrative contentious courts[15].

In fact, what is the motivation of the administrative act? Beyond the legal provisions, which are the legal bases on which the administrative act was issued, it is necessary for its addressee/recipients to know the factual reasons which led to the issuance thereof. There have been frequent (unfortunately) practices in the courts, situations where authorities considered "sufficient" the legal motivation, and only the "conclusion" should be inserted in the act, without any explanation, the so-called de facto motivation of the administrative act. We consider that the de facto motivation of the administrative act (and we refer to the individual administrative act) is necessary, so much the more, as it represents a guarantee of the transparency of the issuing authority in relation to the addressee of the act, even if there is no legal obligation for such purpose at this time. However, such conduct of the authority (which is in any case in a superiority relation towards the addressees of its acts), would be proof of good faith and even respect towards the addressees of its acts.

Last but not least, the motivation of all administrative acts would also have a practical purpose, namely to no longer burden contentious- administrative courts with actions in the annulment/suspension of the enforcement of the administrative act, the first invoked reason of which is most of the times "lack of motivation." The addressees of the administrative acts are entitled to know the reasons due to which such an act is issued and how the obligation imposed by that act has been reached. There are situations where, in practice, authorities only explain through the procedural documents submitted with the file how and for what reasons such an act was issued, whereas it is obvious that the motivation should be made by the very content of the administrative act and not by acts subsequent to its issuance.

These are probably (besides others) also the reasons due to which in the theses of the future Administrative Procedure Code[16], the motivation of administrative acts is mandatorily provided, regardless of their nature.

Besides, it has been noticed in the practice of courts that " In the absence of an explicit motivation of the administrative act, the possibility of challenging in court the concerned act is illusory, since the judge cannot speculate on the reasons which determined the administrative authority to take a certain measure, and the absence of such reasoning favours the issuance of abusive administrative acts, since the lack of reasoning deprives the judicial control of administrative acts of any effectiveness and therefore the motivation is a general obligation applicable to any administrative act, it is a condition of external legality of the act, which is subject to an in concreto appreciation, by its nature and context and its scope is to clearly and unequivocally present the reasoning of the institution issuing the act and the reasoning of the court, the motivation pursues a dual purpose*; fulfils, first of all, a function of transparency in favour of the beneficiaries of the act, who will thus be able to ascertain whether or not the act is well-founded; also enables the court to exercise its jurisdictional control, so that it ultimately enables the restructuring of the judgment made by the author of the act in order to reach its adoption; of course it should appear in the act itself and be made by its author. Thus the motivation implies the clear informing about the de facto and de jure elements, enabling the understanding and appreciation of its legality, (...) therefore, the motivation should enable the judge to exercise control over the factual and legal elements which have served as basis to exert the assessment power and thus it should be performed in a sufficiently detailed manner, by indicating in the present case the reasons due to which the issuing authority has concluded that it is necessary to ascertain the legal termination of the mayor's mandate, in other words, the motivation was to be effective, complete, precise and circumstantial*."[17]

The High Court also ruled in another decision[18], as to the necessity for de facto and de jure motivation, to a degree sufficient to enable unrestricted exercise of judicial review by the court, that "the discretionary power rendered to an authority cannot be regarded in a state of law as an absolute and unlimited power, as to exert the assessment right by infringing the fundamental rights and freedoms of citizens provided by the Constitution, or by law, is an excess of power*, in the context in which the Constitution of Romania provides in art. 31 par. 2 the obligation of the public authorities to ensure the correct information of the citizen about public affairs, as well as issues of personal interest. Therefore,* any decision likely to have effects on the fundamental rights and freedoms has to be motivated not only in view of the competence to issue that act, but also from the perspective of the individual and society's possibility to assess the legality of the measure and the observation of the boundaries between discretionary power and arbitrariness*. To accept the thesis according to which the authority should not motivate its decisions is equivalent to emptying of content democracy's essence and the rule of law based on the* principle of legality".

nature; the particular situation of administrative - judicial acts

From the perspective of the effects they produce, administrative acts are classified into normative and individual.

A fundamental classification on basis of which the difference between the administrative and the individual acts, to which specialists add the internal administrative acts, is the one according to the extension degree of the legal effects. "The administrative normative act contains such general and impersonal rules of conduct as are the laws"[19]. Thus, one of the criteria to distinguish between the two types of administrative acts is that of the determinability of the persons to whom such apply. " The normative act has a general applicability, on an undetermined number of persons"[20], whereas the individual has its effects on a limited and determined/determinable number of beneficiaries, a manifestation of will creating, modifying or extinguishing rights and obligations for its benefit or on behalf of its recipients.

A definition of the normative act can be found in art. 3 lit. a) of Law no. 52/2003 on the decisional transparency in the public administration, as follows: "normative act - the act issued or adopted by a public authority, with general applicability".

Law no. 24/2000 comprises clear provisions establishing the obligation to motivate the normative acts. Thus, Section 4 is entitled - Motivation of draft normative acts. Article 30 itemizes "Presentation and Motivation Tools", providing the obligation that "Drafts of normative acts have to be accompanied by the following supporting documents: a) explanatory statements - in case of draft laws and legislative proposals b) substantiation notes - in case of ordinances and decisions of the Government; ordinances to be submitted to Parliament for approval under the authorizing law and emergency ordinances shall be submitted to the Parliament accompanied by the explanatory statement to the draft law approving them; c) approval reports - for the other normative acts; d) impact studies - in case of draft laws of special importance and complexity and of draft laws approving ordinances issued by the Government under an authorizing law and subject to the approval of the Parliament."

In para. (2), it is specified that " Explanatory statements, substantiation notes, approval reports and impact studies represent tools to present and motivate new proposed regulations" and in paragraph (3)" In the case of draft laws for which the Government assumes responsibility, the motivation documents accompanying such projects shall be the explanatory statement and, as the case may be, the report provided in Art. 29"

Law no. 24/2000 assigns an entire chapter referring to the Content of the motivation in which, at art. 31 lists the elements that this must have, mentioning in paragraph (1) letter a), expressly: the reason for the issuance of the normative act, which represents "requirements imposing regulatory intervention, with particular reference to the inadequacies and inconsistencies of the applicable regulations; the basic principles and finality of the proposed regulations by highlighting the new elements; the conclusions of studies, research papers, statistical evaluations; references to public policy documents or to normative act for the implementation of which is drafted the project. For emergency ordinances shall be separately presented the objective elements of the extraordinary situation requiring immediate regulation, whereas it shall not be suffice to use the urgent parliamentary procedure, as well as possible consequences that would occur in the absence of the proposed legislative measures".

Last but not least, it is important to mention art. 32 according to which, "(1) The motivation documents are drafted in a clear explanatory style, using the terminology of the draft normative act that it presents. (2) The motivation has to refer to the final form of the draft normative act; if certain changes were made to the project as a result of the proposals and remarks received from the endorsement bodies, the initial motivation should be duly reconsidered".

As it can be noticed in regard to the normative acts, the law provides for the obligation to motivate such by recitals, substantiation notes and approval papers, explaining in each case what it should comprise.

The situation differs for individual administrative acts, where there is no general obligation to motivate such. Although we do not have (yet) a generally valid provision regarding the obligation to motivate individual administrative acts, there are still legal provisions to that effect. For example, Government Ordinance no. 27/2002 regulating the petitions settlement activity expressly states the obligation to indicate in the reply sent to the petitioner the legal basis of the adopted solution, and Law no. 544/2001 on free access to information of public interest provides that the refusal to communicate the requested information is motivated and communicated to the petitioner.

The late Professor Antonie Iorgovan[21] estimated that " If, prior to the current Constitution of Romania, the motivation was regarded only as a principle of administrative-judicial acts, de lege ferenda, proposing to extend this principle to all administrative acts, it is now considered that the necessity to motivate any administrative act is implicitly derived from the provisions of the Constitution, at least from the right to information consecrated in art. 31, representing a correlative obligation of the public administration authorities".

[19] Dana Apostol Tofan, Administrative Law, vol. II, 3rd edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, page 21;

[20] Ovidiu Podaru, Administrative Law. Vol. Administrative Act (I) Landmarks for a Different Theory, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, page 61: " there may be an "individual" act that has several hundreds of recipients: e.g., the list of candidates declared admitted/rejected at the magistracy admission exam".

[21] In the Administrative Law Treaty, vol.II, 4th edition, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest 2005, page 62, quoted by Dana Apostol Tofan in Administrative Law, volume II, 4th edition, C.H Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, page 41;

On the other hand, even if in the future Administrative Procedure Code an obligation to motivate all administrative acts (as it results from its previous theses, without having any certainty in regard to the final form of the Code) is established, in the doctrine it was estimated for some types of administrative acts (e.g. diplomas) that "the futility of motivation is obvious".22 Considering that the obligation to motivate administrative acts is a guarantee of good governance, of protecting the recipients of acts against an abuse by the authorities, as well as a guarantee the observance of citizens' right to information, it is unlikely that they will deem illegal a favourable administrative act. As a rule, invoking the lack of motivation or inadequate motivation of an individual administrative act occurs when its content is not favourable to the addressee, e.g. it establishes a payment obligation the amount of which is not defined or creates a refusal of the authority to perform a certain transaction etc.

Although there is no expressly established motivation obligation for individual administrative acts, in many cases " authorities resort to the substantiation of the administrative acts and we support such a procedure, as this is how the legality reasons of an administrative act is substantiated and this is relevant, especially in case of challenging the legality of the administrative act."23

On the other hand, there are often encountered situations when the motivation of the individual administrative act is limited to mentioning the legal grounds, omitting the de facto motivation, which is actually the one of genuine interest for the recipient of that act, a guarantee of the transparency and good faith of the issuing authority. This practice is questionable, as it often leads to the challenging of court acts24.

A category of individual administrative acts that are always motivated by law, are the protocols for the finding and sanctioning of contraventions. Government Ordinance no. 2/2001 on the legal regime of contraventions25 provides in art. 16 para. (1) the elements to be comprised in the contravention protocol " The protocol of finding the contravention shall include: the date and place where it is concluded; the surname, forename, capacity and institution of which the investigating agent is a party; the surname, forename, domicile and personal number of the offender, description of the contravention deed, indicating the date, time and place where it was committed, as well as showing the circumstances that may serve to assess the seriousness of the offense and to evaluate possible damage; indication of the normative act establishing and sanctioning the contravention; indication of the insurance company, if the deed resulted in the occurrence of a traffic accident; the possibility to pay, within 15 days as of the date of handing over or serving the protocol, half of the minimum fine provided by the normative act; the time limit for the appeal and the court to which the complaint is lodged". In art. 17 paragraph (1) is also expressly provided the sanction of absolute nullity for the absence of the following elements: "notes on the surname and forename of the finding agent, the surname and forename of the offender, the personal number for persons who have assigned such a code and, in case of the legal entity, the absence of its name and registered office, the committed deed and the date of its committal or the signature of the assessing agent". Thus, it can be noticed that the law-maker, by establishing the mandatory references to be included in the minutes, aimed at motivating the individual administrative act. In fact, it is the right solution, as long as, through a contravention protocol, a fine is imposed on the offender, including some complementary measures.

Another example is that of the provisions of art. 5 para. (1) from Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 33 / 2007 on the organization and functioning of the Romanian Energy Regulatory Authority26, according to which the authority issues orders and decisions in the regulatory activity and which mainly refers to: a) granting/modifying/suspending/refusing or withdrawing licenses or authorizations; b) approval of the regulated prices and tariffs and/or their calculation methodologies; c) approval of technical and commercial regulations for the safe and efficient operation of the electric, thermal and natural gas industry; d) approving/endorsing the documents elaborated by the economic operators regulated according to the effective legal provisions. Although the legal nature of the said administrative acts is not only normative, para. (2) of the same article implements the motivation obligation for all these acts "The orders and decisions provided for in para. (1) lit. a)-d), accompanied by the motivation tools, drawn up in compliance with the effective legal provisions".

[24] Decision no. 4316/30 November 2006, delivered in File no. 21214/2/2005, having as a subject matter the annulment of an individual administrative act, the HCCJ held that both the legal and factual reasons are necessary, regardless of whether the law expresses this obligation or not, being given as an argument, inter alia, the existence of the right fundamental to the information provided by Article 31 of the Constitution (see Alexandru-Sorin Ciobanu, Administrative Law, Public Administration Activity, Public Domain, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest 2015, page 65);

Another example of individual administrative acts for which the law provides for the motivation obligation thereof are the administrative-tax acts. Thus, art. 43 of the Tax Procedure Code provides that " The tax administrative act contains the following elements: a) the name of the issuing tax body; (b) the date on which it was issued and the date as of which it is effective; c) the identification data of the taxpayer or of the person authorized by the taxpayer, as the case may be; d) the object of the tax administrative act; e) the factual reasons; f) the legal basis; g) the name and signature of the authorized persons of the tax body, according to the law; h) the stamp of the issuing tax body; i) the possibility to be challenged, the deadline for filing the appeal and the tax body where the challenge is submitted;

Last but not least should be mentioned the special case of the administrative-judicial act, which is defined by Law no. 554/2004 to art. 2 (1) (d), as " the legal act issued by an administrative authority with jurisdictional powers in the settlement of a conflict, following a procedure based on a contradiction principle and the assurance of the rights of defence". By acting similarly to a court, administrative jurisdictions must motivate the acts they issue. This is the case, for example, of acts issued by the Court of Accounts of Romania, following the resolution of challenges against decisions by which the audit institution ordered measures. Thus, according to item 223 from the Regulation on the organization and carrying out of specific activities of the Court of Accounts, as well as the capitalization of acts resulting from these activities27, " Conclusions issued by boards of appeal, drafted by the secretary of the meeting, have to be mandatorily motivated and the motivation should comprise the following: a) factual reasons, namely: (i) the submission of arguments and reasoning of appeals to fully or partially admit the appeal or to reject such; (ii) the reproduction of each challenged measure and of the evidence/documents on which the measure was based; (iii) the reasons for the appeal made by the head of the verified entity; (iv) the documents submitted by him/her to support the appeal; (v) the reasons due to which the documents submitted by the head of the verified entity were accepted or, on the contrary, were not considered by the board, as such were not relevant; b) the legal reasons - specification of the legal provisions considered by the board of appeal and on which the given solution is based, in the sense of full or partial admission of the appeal or its rejection;(...)".

2.2.3. Penalties for non-compliance with the motivation obligation

In regard to normative acts (laws, ordinances), if the motivation obligation is breached, the Constitutional Court may be notified, both before the promulgation of the act or subsequently, by the exceptions of unconstitutionality raised before the courts of law or arbitration courts.

Although the Constitution of Romania does not provide such an obligation - to motivate the normative acts, I do however appreciate that it is circumscribed to the principles of predictability and clarity of the legal norm, principles resulting from the principle of mandatory observance of the laws, consecrated in Article 1 paragraph 5 of the Constitution.

Obviously, in order to enable the observance by its recipients, normative acts have to meet certain requirements of clarity and predictability so that these recipients should be able to properly adapt their conduct. Recipients of normative acts generally have different levels of culture and obviously different capacities to understand the content of the concerned act. No one can invoke the ignorance of the law, as long as it has been made public, as the Constitutional Court has held in its practice, in a "natural, in a style and with the means appropriate to the recipients".[28]

Without insisting too much upon the methods of exercising the constitutionality control of laws before promulgation (a priori constitutionality control), it is governed by the provisions of the first sentence of Article 146 lit. (a) thesis one from the Constitution and Articles 15-18 from Law no. 47/1992 on the organization and functioning of the Constitutional Court and is an abstract and direct control, exerted only further to the notification of qualified authors (the President of Romania, one of the presidents of the two Chambers, the Government, the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the Ombudsman, at least 50 MPs or at least 25 senators).

On the other hand, the a posteriori constitutionality control is regulated by Article 146 lit. (d) from the Constitution and by Articles 29-33 from Law no. 47/1992. At this type of control, the Court decides both on exceptions of unconstitutionality regarding laws and ordinances or a provision of an effective law or ordinance, before a court of law or commercial arbitration court and on exceptions of unconstitutionality raised directly by the Ombudsman. The exception of unconstitutionality may be lifted: by the parties to a dispute, ex officio by the court of law or commercial arbitration court; by the prosecutor, before the court of law, in the cases in which he/she participates, directly by the Ombudsman.

In regard to the other normative acts issued by the public authorities, they can be challenged at the administrative contentious court, at any time, considering the provisions of art. 11 para. (4) from Law no. 554/2004[29]. In regard to the deadline for challenging administrative acts of a normative nature, an interesting solution was ruled by the Constitutional Court. Being notified for an exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions from Art. 5 para. (7) EOG no. 33/2007 on the organization and functioning of ANRE according to which "Orders and decisions issued by the president when exerting his/her duties may be challenged in administrative contentious with the Bucharest Court of Appeal, within 30 days as of the date of their publication in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, i.e. as of the date on which the interested parties were notified". By Decision no. 136/08 May 2015, the Constitutional Court noted that " the above text, which is the subject matter of the unconstitutionality objection, does not distinguish between administrative acts of an individual or normative nature, both categories of acts being subject to the same 30-day limitation period in order to be challenged through administrative dispute. The Court finds that if administrative appeals of individual nature issued by the President of the Romanian Energy Regulatory Authority have not been challenged within this time limit, they may be challenged incidentally, without a time limit, through the illegality objection, as provided by the general law on administrative contentious. On the other hand, administrative acts of a normative nature will be spared of the judicial control, since after the expiration of the 30-day term, no direct action may be taken any longer against them, as by virtue of the "specialia generalibus derogant"-principle, the provisions of the general law may not be applied, if there is a special law expressly stipulating a certain term. Also, as has been shown, this type of act cannot be the subject of an illegality exception, as such is a method of specific challenge of individual administrative acts. As a consequence, orders and decisions issued by the President of the Romanian Energy Regulatory Authority, unilateral administrative acts of normative nature would benefit from the absolute presumption of legality after 30 days as of publication, if in that period no economic operator submits with the Bucharest Court of Appeal an administrative dispute in order to verify their legality in the main action for annulment." In considering this reasoning, the Constitutional Court admitted the exception of unconstitutionality and established that*" the provisions of art. 5 par. (7) of Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 33/2007 on the organization and functioning of the Romanian Energy Regulatory Authority, which establishes a deadline to challenge in administrative contentious the administrative normative acts issued by the President of the Romanian Energy Regulatory Authority when exerting his/her attributions, are unconstitutional".*

In regard to individual administrative acts, it is obvious that they can be revoked by the issuer in order to avoid a possible action in court, but it is difficult to assume that once an act is issued, which the issuer considers motivated, it would revoke such. Thus, in most cases, the administrative contentious court is the one deciding whether an individual administrative act is motivated or not. If the lack of motivation is so obvious, the court may even order the suspension of the enforcement of the administrative act (if such a measure was requested), pending the outcome of the action on the merits, or until the final settlement of the case[30]. The High Court of Cassation and Justice stated that " in order to outline the well-grounded case requiring the suspension of an administrative act, the court should not proceed to analyze the illegality criticisms on which the application for annulment of the administrative act itself is based, but must limit its verification only to those de facto and/or de jure circumstances having the capacity to give rise to a serious doubt on the presumption of legality enjoyed by an administrative act. Such de facto and/or de jure circumstances which are likely to give rise to serious doubts in regard to the legality of an administrative act have been noted by the High Court as: the issuance of an administrative act by an incompetent body or by overriding its jurisdiction, the administrative act issued under legal provisions declared unconstitutional, the failure to motivate the administrative act, the important modification of the administrative act in the administrative appeal."[31]

In case of actions for annulment, I appreciate that the solution of the contentious court has a strong subjective side. Thus, it is up to the judge to assess the lack of motivation for an administrative act. Here we include those situations where, even if the act is not very detailed, however, by reference to the capacity of the addressee, the judge may estimate that he/she has the necessary capacity to understand the argumentation underpinning the issuance thereof. It is the professionals who carry out the activity in a certain field and who are obliged to know the entire legislation regulating the concerned field. Thus, in one case, the Bucharest Court of Appeal upheld the applicant's action by partially annulling the Order (…) issued by ANRE regarding the approval of distribution tariffs, an individual administrative act, and noted that " the defendant authority, in the exercise of its attributions provided by law for such purpose, infringed the plaintiff's legitimate rights by exerting such by abuse of power through the approval of those tariffs without showing transparently the reasons determining such conclusion by depriving the beneficiary of the issued administrative act, the guarantees provided by law to request a genuine verification of this order"[32]. n the appeal of the respondent authority, the HCCC admitted its appeal, holding in essence that "Contrary to the court of first instance, the High Court considers that the issued order is motivated, and such relies both upon the report for the approval of the tariffs, and the method of recognizing the investments approved for the period

[30] Under the provisions of Art. 14 and 15 of Law no. 554/2004 of the administrative contentious, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 1154 of 7 December 2004

[31] Decision no. 442 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice from 30 January 2013;

[32] Civil Judgement no. 3108/23 November 2015;

2014-2018 was presented in the appendix to the approval report"[33]. The High Court also notes in the same decision that " The respondent-defendant explained in detail why it cannot recognize these costs by reference to the provisions of Art. 58 of the Methodology (...) stating that ANRE may reject those costs that are not prudent (...). It is true that the motivation of the administrative act is a guarantee against the arbitrariness of the public administration, but the standards regarding the extent and the detail of the motivation depend upon the nature of the act and the circumstances of the case, the purpose of motivation being to avoid abuses of the administration by transparently indicating the mechanism of issuing or adopting the administrative decision, to enable recipients to know and evaluate the grounds and effects of the decision and to enable the effective exercise of the legality control."

A legal institution that has been increasingly used lately is the illegality exception[34], especially in cases where the person interested in challenging the act exceeded the time limit for submitting an action for annulment. Contrary to the action for annulment, the plea of illegality is only a means of defence and, if the court before which it was invoked assesses that the act is unlawful, it cannot annul such, but only solves the case without having regard thereto. Thus, if the plea of illegality is admitted, this solution produces legal effects only in the case in which it was invoked. Most of the time, however, in motivating the objection of illegality, there is a lack of clarity and predictability of the individual administrative act, which, in reality, equates to a lack of motivation.

3. Conclusions

The institution of motivating the administrative acts in aggregate will certainly be subject to many discussions and there will still be pros and cons, some going to the extreme. It is a certain fact that the ordinary citizen is entitled to be informed about the reasons why the public authority has set an obligation in his/her charge or has ordered any measure. It is true that no one can invoke the ignorance of the law, but in a democratic society and a rule of law, the role of the public authorities must be, first of all, to protect citizens, even against their own possible abuses. So much the more so since, due to cultural or educational reasons, the recipients of administrative acts (especially individual ones) do not know that they are entitled to certain legal challenging methods within certain terms that they have to observe.

Concurrently with the implementation of the obligation to motivate also the individual administrative acts, I believe that the relationship between the authorities and the citizens, in their capacity as recipients of administrative acts, could be improved. It is true that, as the doctrine provided (and I mentioned so in the paper), it is preferable not to reach the extreme situation in which any administrative act (including diplomas, certificates, qualification certificates etc.) has to be motivated, but at least those having a negative effect on the citizen. In fact, the solution would also be preferable from the point of view of burdening administrative contentions courts, which would be relieved of the multitude of cases in which the lack of motivation is invoked as the main reason for the nullity of an administrative act.

It remains to be seen whether the future Administrative Code, but especially the Administrative Procedure Code will clarify this concept that is so much debated, but that is also necessary, i.e. the motivation of administrative acts in their aggregate.
