Under the Romanian Law it is highly debatable if the contractor could have used this procedural pathway to obtain a clarification from a lower court with regard to the arbitral institution to administer its arbitral case. Also highly debatable is whether a Court could have issued a decision on which arbitral institution would have jurisdiction to administer the arbitral case in lieu of the appointed Arbitral Tribunal and before the issuance of an award on jurisdiction by the Arbitral Tribunal.

However, the injunction issued by the Bucharest Tribunal has only an interim nature under the Romanian Law. This means that at the end of the arbitral case when an award will be finally issued under the auspices of the ICC International Court of Arbitration, the Bucharest Court of Appeals will still have the full power to set aside the arbitral award in accordance with its previous jurisprudence, irrespective of the injunction issued by the Bucharest Tribunal.

3. The jurisdiction of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania according to the Romanian Law

The analysis of the legal framework in effect at the moment when G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 were issued by the Romanian Government suggests not only that the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania is actually the arbitral institution contemplated by the aforementioned enactments, but also that what was considered for a long time being a controversed modification brought by Appendix to Tender to the arbitration clause provided by Sub-Clause 20.6 of the General and Particular Conditions of Contract, is in fact a solid solution, strongly sustained by legal arguments and consistent with the applicable provisions of Romanian Law and of the international conventions to which Romania is a signatory part, provisions which were in effect at the moment when G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 were issued by the Romanian Government.

3.1. Sub-Clause 20.6 of FIDIC Conditions of Contract - a mandatory arbitration clause under the Romanian Law

The debate on which arbitral institution has jurisdiction to administer the arbitral cases under G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 has gravitated so far around arguments related to interpretation of contracts and priority of contractual documents from the perspective of the will of the signatory parties exclusively. However, the matter was not analysed from the lawmaker's perspective to date.

It is noteworthy that whilst the FIDIC General Conditions of Contract applicable to the public works administered by the units subordinated or under the authority of the Ministry of Transportation and Infrastructure, including the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania were adopted by G.D. no. 1405/2010, the Particular Conditions of Contract, Appendix to Tender and Contractual Agreement applicable to the public works administered by the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania were adopted by Order no. 146/2011. Therefore, all the provisions of the FIDIC General and Particular Conditions of Contract, Appendix to Tender and Contractual Agreement, including the provisions of Sub-Clause 20.6 [Arbitration] are part of the Romanian legislation, being mandatory for the parties involved in the construction of infrastructure, the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania and the contractors alike, by the effect of the law.

Thus, with the occasion of initiation of a public tender, the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania has only the liberty to choose which FIDIC Conditions of Contract will be applicable: Red Book or Yellow Book, including in this regard into the tender documentation the relevant Conditions of Contract provided by G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 for information of the participants.

The decision of the interested contractor to participate at a public tender organized by the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania implies the contractor's adherence to the tender documentation, including Sub-Clause 20.6 of the relevant Conditions of Contract provided by G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011, in a "take it or leave it" manner[9].

Therefore, when later on the winner of the public tender signs the Contractual Agreement, Appendix to Tender and Conditions of Contract, it only reinforces its commitment to comply with the relevant provisions of G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011.

In other words, the content of the FIDIC Conditions of Contract applicable to public works, in Romania, including the content of Sub-Clause 20.6 [Arbitration], is not the result of the parties negotiation materialized in a "common intention/understanding of the parties", but the result of the lawmaker's will.

Under these circumstances, Sub-Clause 20.6 represents a mandatory arbitration clause imposed by the Romanian law, an arbitration organised under such auspices being a mandatory arbitration, and not a voluntary one, based on the parties' agreement.

In view of the aforementioned, in order to determine which arbitral institution has jurisdiction to administer the arbitral cases under G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 it is therefore not important to establish what was the so-called „common intention of the parties" at the conclusion of the contract, but to understand what was the intention of the lawmaker when G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 were issued.

3.2. Sub-Clause 20.6 of FIDIC Conditions of Contract imposes a certain institutional arbitration under the Romanian Law - the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania

The intention of the lawmaker at the issuance of G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 may be revealed by an analysis of the legal framework applicable to arbitration in force at that moment in Romania. It is noteworthy that when it issued the aforementioned enactments, the lawmaker had to comply entirely with the Romanian legislation applicable to arbitration at that moment.

In particular, the analysis of the following enactments are relevant for the scope of this research:

- The Code of Civil Procedure (1865);
- European Convention on International Commercial Arbitration (Geneva 1961)[10];
- Law no. 335/2007 of the chambers of commerce

[9] Pursuant to Law no. 98/2016 on public procurement and Law no. 101/2016 on remedies and appeals concerning the award of public procurement contracts, sectorial contracts and of works concession contracts and service concession contracts, and for the organization and functioning of the National Council for Solving Complaints, the participants to a public tender have the legal right to challenge the requirements of the tender documentation considered too restrictive or illegal. However, the legal means whereby a contractor would challenge the legal provisions of G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 in a public tender procedure are not forming the scope of our research

- 2010 Rules of arbitral procedure of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration[11].

The ad-hoc arbitration was regulated by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (1865), Book IV, art. 340-371, which remained unchanged until 1993. It is noteworthy that between 1948 and 1990 the rules of ad-hoc arbitration were used exclusively in the state mandatory arbitration organized under Law no. 5/1954[12], the voluntary arbitration being practically inexistent in Romania in the period of the communist regime.

In this regard, by Decree no. 495/1953 it was founded the Commission of Arbitration attached to the Romanian Chamber of Commerce and Industry, having its headquarters in Bucharest. This Commission of Arbitration had jurisdiction "to settle the disputes resulted between the Romanian organizations of international commerce and their foreign partners."

Later on, the Decree-Law no. 139/1990 regarding the chambers of commerce and industry in Romania conferred to the chambers of commerce organized under the new legislation the jurisdiction to administer the ad-hoc arbitration initiated under the Code of Civil Procedure. Further to the issuance of Law no. 15/1990 regarding the reorganisation of the state economic units into autonomous administration and commercial societies which formally allowed to such entities to refer their disputes to arbitration, the provisions regarding ad-hoc arbitration comprised by the Code of Civil Procedure were modified, being included[13], inter alia, a new article - art. 341[1], providing that:

"The Parties may agree to have their arbitration organized by a permanent institution of arbitration or by a third party".

In 2007 it was issued a new law of the chambers of commerce in Romania - Law no. 335/2007, whereby, by art. 29 (1), it was clearly stated that:

"The Court of International Commercial Arbitration is a permanent institution of arbitration, without legal capacity and operates attached to the National Chamber[14]."

Moreover, art. 2 [Organisation of the institutional arbitration] of the 2010 Rules of arbitral procedure of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration reinforced that:

"Organisation of the institutional arbitration is made by the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, hereinafter referred to as the Court of Arbitration, based on the Rules of organisation and operation of the Court of Arbitration, the Rules of the College of the Court of Arbitration, provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure to the extent that the present rules of arbitration procedure, hereinafter referred to as rules, do not provide otherwise."

In view of the aforementioned, it results that the reference to "the Court of International Commercial Arbitration" included in the Appendix to Tender adopted by Order no. 146/2011 is a clear referral to the arbitral institution provided by art. 29 (1) of Law no. 335/2007 of the chambers of commerce in Romania, and by art. 2 of the 2010 Rules of arbitral procedure of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration respectively, which is beyond any doubt the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania.

Therefore, contrary to the arguments brought under the Theory of Semantics, when issued Order no. 146/2011, the lawmaker identified in a correct and complete manner the arbitral institution to administer the disputes related to the public works administered by the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania, taking over the name of this arbitral institution exactly as it was provided by the relevant law in force - Law no. 335/2007.

3.3. The rules of arbitral institution v. the institution of the arbitral rules under the Romanian Law

Pursuant to Article 4 [Organization of the Arbitration] of the European Convention on International Commercial Arbitration (Geneva 1961), ratified by Romania by the Decree no. 281/1963:

„1. The parties to an arbitration agreement shall be free to submit their disputes:

(a) to a permanent arbitral institution; in this case, the arbitration proceedings shall be held in conformity with the rules of the said institution*;*

(b) to an ad hoc arbitral procedure; in this case, they shall be free inter alia

(i) to appoint arbitrators or to establish means for their appointment in the event of an actual dispute;

(ii) to determine the place of arbitration; and

(iii) to lay down the procedure to be followed by the arbitrators."

Therefore, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (1865) and Decree no. 281/1963, whenever an arbitral clause such as Sub-Clause 20.6 of the Appendix to Tender, provides that the disputes shall be submitted to a permanent arbitral institution, the rules of the said institution will become automatically applicable.

Moreover, that also means that, under the Romanian law, whenever there is nominated in the arbitration clause a certain arbitral institution to administer the arbitral case, but by using the rules of another institution, the arbitral institution which will have jurisdiction to administer the case will be the one expressly nominated and not the one to which the rules referred to.

Consequently, not only that the reference to "the Court of International Commercial Arbitration" included in the Appendix to Tender adopted by Order no. 146/2011 denotes a clear intention of the lawmaker to refer the disputes resulted from the execution of public works administered by the National Company for Administration of Road Infrastructure in Romania to this arbitral institution, but also this reference implicitly excludes the application of the Rules of Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce stated by Sub-Clause 20.6 of the General and Particular Conditions of Contract.

Under these circumstances, the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania is the arbitral institution which has jurisdiction to administer the arbitral cases under G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011, by using its own arbitration rules in force at the date when the arbitral case is initiated.

Last but not least, it is noteworthy that provisions of the new Code of Civil Procedure, entered into force on 15.02.2013 maintained the rule of prevalence of the arbitral institution nominated in the arbitral clause over the institution to which the rules mentioned in the same clause referred to. In this regard, art. 619 [Arbitral rules] para. 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure (2013) reads:

„By designation of a certain institutional arbitration as having jurisdiction in settlement of a certain dispute or type of disputes, the parties automatically opt for the application of its own rules of procedure. Any derrogation from this provision is null, unless, taking into consideration the circumstances of the case and content of the rules of procedure indicated by the parties as being applicable, the management of the institutional arbitration which has jurisdiction decides that it may be applied also the rules elected by the parties, establishing if the application of the latter is effective or by analogy."

However, in the legal doctrine[15] it was emphasized that:

"The rules of procedure elected by the parties may be applied only exceptionally, and under certain circumstances, further to the decision of the arbitration institution management, taking into consideration the circumstances of the case and content of the rules of procedure indicated by the parties."

4. Conclusions

Once adopted by G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011, the FIDIC Conditions of Contract became part of the Romanian Law. Thus, the contractual nature of their provisions was replaced by the mandatory nature of the law.

Under these circumstances the intention of the lawmaker when issued the aforementioned enactments prevail over any other argument based on interpretation of the will of contractual parties.

From the analysis of the legal framework in force at the moment of approval of G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 it results a clear intention of the Romanian Government to submit the disputes resulted from the performance of public works to the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, which will settle such disputes pursuant to its own rules of arbitration.

These conclusions confirm the fairness of the Bucharest Court of Appeals decisions which decided in a couple of recent cases to set aside the final partial awards issued by the ICC Court of International Arbitration, considering that the institution which has jurisdiction to settle the disputes resulted from performance of the contracts concluded under G.D. no. 1405/2010 and Order no. 146/2011 is the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania instead, yet for different reasons than those analysed within this paper.

HOW TO INCLUDE AND REWARD INVESTORS TO AN IDEA

Dan-Alexandru SITARU

Abstract

More and more it can be found that platforms, mostly online nowadays, tend to fish for new idea s that some other might have and reward them by putting in contact with potential investors, of their have market value. But this opens up the big problem of sharing the burden of realising the business, sometimes the heavy task of creating and implementing and nevertheless the final share of profits. These may rise lots of judicial problems starting from the very human component. The objective of the paper is to focus on the small guide regarding what does a partnership between a person having an idea or a know-how and its potential investor might look like. As the author, from personal experience has noticed, most people are more focused in financial matters and/or on their creation rather than the fine print of the contract the investor, as more versed, gives them to sign. Since usually the one with the idea is just a simple person starting out from a garage, it does not have the expertise or the resource to pay a qualified person for assistance. Without having exhausting the subject, which is huge, one may find some stating point or some advantages or disadvantages that may give an idea what king of future partnership it should have with the investor. Also, from the investor perspective, since idea may be good or bad, profitable or not, this small presentation may provide some points to look after.

1. Introduction

Investment is a notion that subsumes two aspects: one that refers to economics and represents the financial and money aspects of the investment and one that refers to the legal side. The latter is our main focus because however important money may be without a proper legal back setting any investment is soon to be proven a failure or result in crime or contravention that might attract fines or even penal sanctions.

But recently another aspect has arisen, started from the mistrust of the investors or from the desire to control your partner. Any mistrust might come from the fact that id a person has an amount and is willing to invest it (money must circulate) history has proven that although the investment is sound the person that takes care of the investment, sometimes the agent, is untrustworthy. Our paper however shall focus on the other idea, regarding one controlling the business partners that will invest in your business from future acquiring so much power and by becoming major shareholders or by taking over, either hostile or by more votes, and thus protecting the founder's position, not so see themselves become minority. The notorious case of Steve Jobs, the founder of Apple, sets as an example were only his resourcefulness and wit made the new investors call him back after being expunged.

Therefore, in the content of the present paper our goal is to show the most common and well used legal solutions for attracting investors but keeping them under check while returning only their investment or even if they become partners not to give them the possibility to ever threaten the founders position. At all solutions there will be a set of pro and cons that might help from a practical perspective.

All this becomes helpful in situations such as when a person launches a business plan to develop a certain idea or type of business, such as in the IT business where platforms for various aspects, selling, buying, transactions, gatherings, idea expression, debate, applications etc. Sites that advertise for finding investors for new idea, were anyone may enter a business plan and might find an investor willing to pour money into its development, is no longer an exotic concept. But taking the case of such and entrepreneur that came with the idea of an online platform for exchanging crypto currency, being a well thought plan, it got an enthusiastic response and more than fifty investors were lining up to finance his project. Of course, they all desired to pe rewarded or compensated for their initial investment, some of them only wanting the return of their investment, like a loan plus interest, and mostly wanting to participate as some form of partners.

At first glance the solution seems simple, but the Romanian Law for companies states in the chapter regarding the stock company that loans and other forms of credit from the company to the shareholders or managers are not permitted[1]. Also, the offering of bonuses or guarantees for personal endeavours of the shareholder or manager are not permitted also.

However, the Romanian Fiscal Code[2] states that under a certain amount loans may be realised and paid between the company and its shareholders, managers or third parties, but the amount is low and limited by daily transactions thus making it inconvenient for large or expanding business. Hence, the Romanian law is iv favour of allowing loans only to be distribute by banks and financial companies, were regulation is strict and controllable.

2. Content

2.1. Becoming a shareholder.

The fist solutions we bring forward is to insert the investors into the initial company, by means of making them shareholders, with all the legal consequences that derive from this status.

This solution presents particularities because of the two main types of companies regulated by Company law, the stock company and the limited liability company.

As for the stock company we will refer furthers below at a different section, but as for the limited liability company any person that desires to become a shareholder must be voted in by the other members[3]. This comes from the idea that such a company is set up on the idea that all members are intuitu personae. So, if all members are chosen in consideration to one another this means and leaving or entering the company must be approved by at least ¾ of the members, by law.

So, in short, being a shareholder gives the person at least the following rights:

- to participate and vote in the general assemblies of the shareholders;
- to convene and to be taken consul with it in management decisions;
- to contest and ask for annulment of the decisions of the general assembly of shareholders;
- to veto any entry or exit of shareholders, if ¾ of the remaining members do not decide otherwise;
- to receive dividends, should this be voted by the general assembly of shareholders. The value of the received dividends is always proportional to the percentage of share ownership of the company.
- to receive a portion of assets at the liquidation of the company, proportional to the percentage of share ownership of the company.

The main problem with this solution is that this procedure implies the dilution of the shares hold by the founding members. The solution is to increase the number of shares and distribute them to both the newly come shareholders and to the initial members. This will allow for the share distribution to remain the same, and the percentages of ownership to be unchanged, thus not allowing the new members to gain control or more votes.

But even so, two addiction problems arise from this, one being that the new shares must be bought and the initial members must come up with the sum from personal funds, and second that the status of shareholder is forever, until the company enters liquidation/bankruptcy or the shareholder decided to sell.

In dealing with the fists problem, one might add that a compensation for unpaid dividends may be implemented, settling thus the need to bring additional finances by the initial members. Also, since the Fiscal code allows certain minimum amounts of loans between the company and its shareholders and that there is no actual need for shareholders to actually cash in any of those loans, such operations might be only set in motion in order to prepare a near future emission of new shares and then the shareholders compensate their uncashed loans and interests with new shares, bringing them to the same or similar ownership percentage as before.

In dealing with the second problem, a contract might be drafted between the parties stipulating that the investors will only enter the company for a limited time period, until their investment is returned with interest preagreed. This contract shall be a sale-purchase agreement in advance that will enter into force once the conditions are met. If any party refuses to acknowledge and execute this agreement in the future, the other party may address the court to rule for the realisation of the sale purchase agreement[4].

As for the stages for implementing this solution, no special conditions must be fulfilled other than those stated by art. 202 of the Company law. A validation by the Trade Office and the passing of the minimum required term is mandatory.

If one should analyse the law and the scope for such solution to be implemented, the following advantages and disadvantages might be noticed.

One advantage is that it is a simple, step by step and already verified solution. It also involves very few steps, good for urgent situations.

Another advantage is that it is very advantageous for investors, conferring them trust that once they have invested, they may not be pushed out discretionary. The contract and the shareholder title make them safe against any exclusion from the company other than fraud or serious charges[5].

Another advantage is that being part of the general assembly of shareholders it may vote the sharing of dividends or contest the lack of sharing should the other members decide to vote against the investor's rights.

Another advantage, which regards all, is that neither the shareholders nor the investor may not leave the company without the approval of a minimum of ¾ of the total shareholders. This makes for a secure situation for all parties.

As for the disadvantages, one might be that the presale agreement should be carefully negotiated and drafted because of the chance that the investors might reconsider. Once the new person enters the company and gains shareholder status it becomes equal in rights to all other shareholders. This might become an issue since that shareholder may try to use his position to overcome the effects of the presale agreement and remain in the company.

[3] Art. 202 of Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies.
[4] See art. 1279 of the Romanian Civil Code
[5] See for the causes for exclusion art. 222 of Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies.

Also, since they have equal rights the new shareholders may intervene and actively participate in the day to day affaires of the company, either blocking it or slowing it down. This does not indicate ill faith, but more likely an excessive desire to protects one's rights.

Another disadvantage it that the existing shareholders must pay, at least once, a supplement of money for the purchase of the new issued shares, in order to keep their percentages of stock ownership. Should none of the solution provided before be possible, regarding compensation with past debts owed by the shareholders, it might be very difficult if not impossible to retain control of the company.

Not the least, all amendments to the constitutive acts of the company must be taken by all shareholders. This might create all sorts of problems and arguments between shareholders. However, the unanimity condition may be fined down by vote of the shareholders.

Summing up intro some pro and cons, it could be said that the negative aspects tend to overwhelm. However, this is the case only when you take into consideration a large expansion involving lots of investors who will potentially become shareholders. But for small or step by step progressive growth that takes one of few investors at a time it might be the most effective means to controlling them, especially having signed a pre selling agreement.

2.2. Creation of transformation of a company intro a stock company followed by issue of shares to the new shareholders (investors)

A second solution might be either transformation of a limited liability company into a stock company or the creation of a new one and the main shareholder being the limited liability company and the inclusion of the investors as new shareholders.

Basically, the effect is the much the same as the former solution but the advantages are for the initial shareholders that a new company has its own juridical personality and it is fully independent, therefor any issues or potential risks that might be encountered will not be reflected upon the initial company. Also, having shareholders, it is much simple to enter and exit the company without having the need for a general assembly of shareholders.

Separately, this solution might also fit to creating a comandita stock company. The idea is that investors might feel threatened by the creation of stock company, either independent or resulting from conversion, because they might feel that the old shareholders could at any time leave them to go bankrupt and deprive them of the possibility of recovering their investment. In order to provide credibility, one might use a comandita stock company that, in essence, is composed by law of two types of shareholders, one with full liability, who control the company and make up the general assembly and one with liability only in the limit of its initial investment. There for the old shareholders retain the control of the company but become liable and thus give securements to the new shareholders who only come in as investors and do not participate at the day to day activities of the company.

To sum up the effect of this solution, the transformation to a stock company would have as affect the becoming of shareholders to the new company. They will gain mainly the same rights as before mentioned, such as the right to participate and vote in the general assembly (condition is is not a comandita company), the right to be informed regarding the activity and financial statements of the company, the right to contest the general assembly's decision and ask for annulment, the right to freely sell their shares etc. One special right that only shareholders of a stock company have is the right to take oneself off the company by demanding that the company buy back their shares[6]. But this right is not likely to be made us of it because it will mean losing part of the initial investment and interest.

As for the steps needed to take intro effect this solution, the procedure of rising the capital by supplementing the number of shares is to be followed[7]. This includes the steps made obligatory by the Trade Office[8].

The main advantage for this solution is that it is the most versatile one, it covers a large potential solution to different conditions and special demands that investors might have while offering credibility. Also, it is the safest one for the initial shareholders since it will always keep the investors in check.

Another advantage is that by means of modifying the constitutive acts, while implementing this solution, the voting power of the new shareholders may be diminished. So, the Company law indicates that usually 1 share gives 1 vote, but this may be modified to so that 2 shares give only one vote, this limiting the votes of certain shareholders[9]. The new shareholders have the right to either accept or not the proposal since this is a package deal modification of the constitutive acts.

Not the last, by this solution we separate all issues either to a new company or between the shareholders. Old shareholders might even have special privileges for a period of five years resulting in them taking a part of the dividends in advance and regardless of remaining other dividends for the rest of the shareholders[10].

[6] See art. 132 of Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies for conditions that need to be fulfilled and necessary procedure. Not all are allowed to take themselves off but only those who are under one criteria set forth by the law.

[9] See art. 101 of Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies.

The main disadvantage is that creating a stock company requires a minimum investment of 90.000 lei [11]. This may present as a financial challenge as it is also going to be topped with the investment need to keep the percentage of the ownership of capital at the same level. Although only 30% is required to be given at beginning, the entire sum must be put forward by the end of the procedure.

Another disadvantage, in contrary to the previous solution, here the no show of the investors as new shareholders to the special or extraordinary general shareholders meeting will result in a lack of minimum participation quorum and thus the assembly may not vote. Also, the old shareholders must always retain 51% of the votes in order not to lose the majority.

Last, also regarding the shareholders assemblies, if one may ask for annulment of a decision take by the general assembly it may also ask for suspension of the decision until the courts final rule. This equals to the blocking of the company.

Summing up the pro and cons one may still see that this is the most effective solution of them all, should the investors insist to participate of have a big role in the company that they are investing in. Otherwise, the next solution may prove the best yet.

3.3. Drafting joint-venture agreements with investors

Another solution consists of drafting of joint-venture contracts either of civil association[12] or independent ones. By this contract the investors come as simple persons willing to give finance and receive the guarantee of the return of their investments. The receiver of the finance participates with the idea or business plan and also will take responsibility for implementing and making profit. Profit shall be split according to the party's choice.

One partner should be manager of the joint-venture and usually that is the one who implements the contract. But exceptions are known to have been agreed.

This type of contracts is by definition free of any specific rules and do not give birth to legal entity. It is flexible, well known and hugely implemented, there for is a beaten path that may hold no surprises for any of the parties.

Each contract with all investors, regarding how many they are, can be tailor made to suit their interests or special demands. Any clause may be inserted and there is no limitation to what goods or the amount of investment that is poured into the joint-venture. Since the initial partner, has nothing beside the idea or business plan it may very well only bring into the contract this know-how and it would be enough to ask for finance. No risk involves the initial investor as due to the contract's confidentiality, that might be agreed by the parties, the know-how is protected should the deal fail. However, the investor stands to lose the investment, should it not take back the money in due time, according to a before agreed clause in the contract.

According to Romania law, the contract is only to be declared at the fiscal administration. The option of either opening or not a separate bank account for each contract or one for all is at the free to be decided by the parties. It is necessary only to keen accounting book for all contracts.

This also represents the main advantage of this solution, that it has no limitations and with the exception of the registration at the fiscal administration parties may not disclose the content or exitance. Negotiation of all the clauses is free.

Another advantage is that the investor becomes only a creditor to the company of the initial partner and does not have the status of shareholder and none of the deriving rights. It does not give the right to obtain a part of the profit of the initial partner and only gives right to taking back the investment and some interest. This investment is legal and free of the restrictions of loaning between a company and its shareholders or third parties.

Another advantage is that by not giving both to a legal entity none of the partners may need to register a group of companies, which would make them oblige special law provisions.

Last, but very important, it does not generate addition costs and the level of taxes are the same for any other transfer of goods or money.

The disadvantages consist of that fact that accountability must be kept for each contract. So, one must reflect all incoming and outgoing transfers from all contracts with precision.

And a final disadvantage, more from the investor's perspective, is that the initial partner, the one with the know-how who implements the contract, pours revenue intro the joint-venture and for this it pays taxes. Once the revenue is distributed both partners have to pay another tax, this time on the revenue that is coming t them as personal income.

Summing up the pro and cons, this solution is inclined to having more advantages for both partners. It is clean, transparent and does not tie any of them together in other than a binding contract.

3. Conclusions

Co-opting a partner to finance your investment is no easy task, but one may find that a negotiation is non other than the realisation of both partners dreams and the overcoming of their fears. The paper does not pretend to exploit or present all the possible ways in

THE COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN UNION'S INTERPRETATION OF REGULATION (EU) NO 650/2012

Silviu-Dorin ŞCHIOPU

Abstract

According to the European legislator, European citizens should be able to organise their succession in advance, especially in the context of a succession having cross-border implications. To this end the European Parliament and the Council of the European Union have adopted Regulation (EU) no. 650/2012 on jurisdiction, applicable law, recognition and enforcement of decisions and acceptance and enforcement of authentic instruments in matters of succession and on the creation of a European Certificate of Succession, that applies to the successions of natural persons who died on or after 17 August 2015.

Since its enforcement, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) had the opportunity to interpret its provisions four times. In the Kubicka Case (C-218/16) the Court ruled on the refusal to recognise the material effects of legacies 'per vindicationem' in a Member State in which such legacies do not exist (the delimitation of the rules on succession and the rules on property). In the Mahnkopf Case (C-558/16), the Court ruled on the inclusion of an individual provision of German law in the scope of the law applicable to the succession (the delimitation of the rules on succession and the rules on matrimonial property regimes). In the Oberle Case (C-20/17) the Court ruled on the jurisdiction over procedures for issuing national certificates of succession. Last but not least, in the Brisch Case (C-102/18) the Court ruled on the nature of Form IV (Application for a European Certificate of Succession) as set out in Annex 4 of Commission Implementing Regulation (EU) No 1329/2014.

For a better understanding of Regulation (EU) no. 650/2012, this short overview presents, on the one hand, the premises situations which led to the CJEUs rulings mentioned above, and, on the other hand, some of the main arguments behind these decisions, without overlooking a case still pending before the Court of Justice of the European Union.

Introduction

The European Parliament and the Council adopted on the 4th of July 2012 the Regulation (EU) no. 650/2012 on jurisdiction, applicable law, recognition and enforcement of decisions and acceptance and enforcement of authentic instruments in matters of succession and on the creation of a European Certificate of Succession[1].

This legislative act applies throughout EU to the succession of natural persons who died on or after 17 August 2015, with the exception of the United Kingdom, Ireland and Denmark which didn't take part in its adoption and aren't bound by it or subject to its application.

Since its enforcement, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) had the opportunity to interpret its provisions four times: in the Kubicka Case (C-218/16), in the Mahnkopf Case (C-558/16), in the Oberle Case (C -20/17) and recently in the Brisch Case (C-102/18).

The interpretation of its provisions is all the more important as, on the one hand, the correct understanding of this Regulation allows citizens to organise their succession in advance, and on the other hand, the rights of heirs, legatees and of creditors of the succession can be effectively guaranteed only to the extent that its provisions are correctly applied in each given case.

That is why, in the following, we will present the four situations in which, till now, CJEU interpreted the provisions of Regulation (EU) no. 650/2012, without overlooking a case still pending before the Court of Justice of the European Union.

1. Kubicka Case (C-218/16)

In the first case, Ms. Kubicka, a Polish national married to a German national approached a notary practising in Poland in order to make her will. She wished to make a will containing a legacy 'by vindication' (legatum per vindicationem) that transfers the ownership of an object directly from the testator to the legatee, provided by Article 981[1] (1) of the Polish Civil Code, in favour of her husband, concerning her share of ownership from the jointly-owned immovable property situated in Germany.

The notary refused to draw up the will considering that such an act would be unlawful since such a legacy is contrary to German legislation and case-law relating to rights in rem and land registration, which must be taken into consideration under Article 1

(2) (k) and (l) and Article 31 of Regulation (EU) no. 650/2012.

The German Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch) knows only the legacy 'by damnation' (legatum per damnationem), provided by art. 2174, according to which a legacy creates a right for the legatee to demand delivery of the bequeathed object from the person charged and the legatee's claim arises at the time of the inheritance, so that the legatee is not ab initio the holder of a real right, as in the case of the legacy 'by vindication'. That's why, in Germany, a legatee may be entered in the land register only by means of a notarial instrument containing an agreement between the heirs and the legatee to transfer ownership of the immovable property.

In the end, the testator brought an appeal before the Regional Court, Gorzów Wielkopolski – Poland which decided to refer the following question: "Must Article 1(2)(k), Article 1(2)(1) and Article 31 of Regulation (EU) No 650/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 July 2012 on jurisdiction, applicable law, recognition and enforcement of decisions and acceptance and enforcement of authentic instruments in matters of succession and on the creation of a European Certificate of Succession be interpreted as permitting refusal to recognise the material effects of a legacy by vindication (legatum per vindicationem), as provided for by [Polish] succession law, if that legacy concerns the right of ownership of immovable property located in a Member State the law of which does not provide for legacies having direct material effect?"[2]

Article 1(2)(k) and (l) provides that the nature of rights in rem and any recording in a register of rights in immovable or movable property, including the legal requirements for such recording, and the effects of recording or failing to record such rights in a register are excluded from the scope of the regulation.

According to Article 31 on the adaptation of rights in rem, where a person invokes a right in rem to which he is entitled under the law applicable to the succession and the law of the Member State in which the right is invoked does not know the right in rem in question, that right shall, if necessary and to the extent possible, be adapted to the closest equivalent right in rem under the law of that State, taking into account the aims and the interests pursued by the specific right in rem and the effects attached to it.

However, as the Advocate General rightly pointed out[3], in the Kubicka Case the choice of a legacy 'by vindication' rather than a legacy 'by damnation' doesn't alter the content of the right to be exercised with regard to the asset, but it simply allows a right in rem to be transferred directly to the legatee, rather than being passed on indirectly by establishing a right in personam for the legatee. Therefore, as noted by the CJEU[4], both the legacy 'by vindication', provided for by Polish law and the legacy 'by damnation', provided for by German law, constitute methods of transfer of ownership of an asset, namely a right in rem that is recognised in both of the legal systems concerned. As such, the direct transfer of a property right by means of a legacy 'by vindication' concerns only the arrangement by which that right in rem is transferred at the time of the testator's death in accordance with the law governing succession.

The Court went on to state that Article 31 of Regulation no. 650/2012 doesn't concern the method of the transfer of rights in rem, but only the respect of the content of rights in rem, determined by the law governing the succession (lex causae – Polish law), and their reception in the legal order of the Member State in which they are invoked (lex rei sitae – German law). Therefore, since the right in rem transferred by the legacy 'by vindication' is the right of ownership, which is recognised in German law, there is no need for the adaptation provided for in Article 31.

It should be noted that in the present case, although, at the time of the death of the testator, the transfer of ownership will operate under Polish law, and the legatee, by virtue of the European certificate of succession, will be able to obtain the registration of the property over the inherited assets in the corresponding German register, according to recital (19) of Regulation (EU) no. 650/2012, the law of the Member State in which the register is held (the German law) will determine when the acquisition takes place[5].

2. Mahnkopf Case (C-558/16)

In the second case, Mr. Mahnkopf died on 29 August 2015, leaving behind as heirs a widow and a son. Until the time of his death, the deceased and his widow were subject to the German statutory separate property regime with equalisation of accrued gains, they had not entered into a marriage contract and the deceased made no dispositions upon death.

Since the deceased owned a half share in the ownership of a property in Sweden, his widow applied for a European Certificate of Succession in order to be used to record the transfer of ownership of the property in Sweden to the heirs of Mr. Mahnkopf. This application was rejected by the national court, which held that paragraph 1371(1) of the German Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch – BGB) concerns questions relating to matrimonial property regimes, which do not fall within the scope of Regulation no. 650/2012.

Consequently, the deceased's spouse challenged this judgment by an appeal lodged with the Higher Regional Court, Berlin – Germany, which decided to refer the following question: "Is Article 1(1) of the EU Succession Regulation 1 to be interpreted as meaning that the scope of the regulation ('succession') also covers provisions of national law which, like Paragraph 1371(1) of the German Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch (BGB, Civil Code), govern questions relating to matrimonial property regimes after the death of one spouse by increasing the share of the estate on intestacy of the other spouse? […]"[6].

Article 1931 from the BGB on the right of intestate succession of the spouse provides in paragraph (1) that the surviving spouse of the deceased as an heir on intestacy is entitled to one quarter of the inheritance together with relatives of the first degree, and paragraph (3) specifies that the provisions of Article 1371 of the same code are not affected. In the Mahnkopf case, according to this provision, the widow received one-fourth of the estate.

According to paragraph (1) of Article 1371 on the equalisation of accrued gains in the case of death, if the property regime is ended by the death of a spouse, the equalisation of the accrued gains is effected by the share of the inheritance on intestacy of the surviving spouse being increased by one quarter of the inheritance and it's irrelevant whether the spouses in the individual case have made accrued gains. This legislative solution allows the simplification of the liquidation of the matrimonial regime between the surviving spouse and the other heirs of the deceased, and it is not necessary to prove any potential patrimonial growth. So the widow's total was half the inheritance in accordance with the national rules on the legal devolution of the inheritance.

Since the German lawmaker solved a problem arising from the patrimonial aspects of matrimonial regimes by resorting to succession law[7], neither the case-law, nor does the doctrine offer a united view on this matter. Some authors include this norm in the field of law applicable to the matrimonial regime, even when the deceased's inheritance is governed by a foreign law[8], while according to other authors the rule is applicable only if the German law is applicable to both the matrimonial regime and the succession[9]. On the other hand, some authors qualify par. (1) of Article 1371 from the German Civil Code as succession rule[10].

The Court of Justice of the European Union concluded that paragraph 1371 (1) of the BGB concerns not the division of assets between spouses but the issue of the rights of the surviving spouse in relation to assets already counted as part of the estate. Accordingly, that provision doesn't appear to have as its main purpose the allocation of assets or liquidation of the matrimonial property regime, but rather determination of the size of the share of the estate to be allocated to the surviving spouse as against the other heirs. Therefore such a provision principally concerns the succession to the estate of the deceased spouse and not the matrimonial property regime. Consequently, a rule of national law such as that at issue relates to the matter of succession for the purposes of Regulation no. 650/2012[11].

This interpretation follows also from the principle that the law governing the succession should govern the succession as a whole, Article 23(2)(e) of Regulation no. 650/2012 providing that it governs "the transfer to the heirs and, as the case may be, to the legatees of the assets, rights and obligations forming part of the estate"[12].

However, the qualification of the norm made in the context of the application of EU law will not always lead to an identical result compared to the classification effected in the context of national conflict-of-law rules, considering that the German Federal Court of Justice decided that paragraph 1371 (1) of the BGB applies as a provision of law applicable to a matrimonial property regimes and, even if the law applicable to matrimonial property regimes is German law and the law applicable to the succession is the law of another State, the surviving spouse continues to be entitled to a share of the estate under paragraph (1) of article 1371 from the BGB[13].

3. Oberle Case (C-20/17)

In the third case, Mr. A. Th. Oberle, a French citizen with his last usual residence in France, died on 28 February 2015. The constituent elements of the succession were located both in France and Germany. The deceased left behind two sons. A French court issued a national certificate of succession stating that the two brothers each inherit half of the estate.

Subsequently one of the heirs applied to the Local Court, Schöneberg, Berlin – Germany for the issuing of a national certificate of succession limited to the estate located in Germany[14]. That certificate was to state that the estate is inherited by the two brothers under French law. The court declared that it lacked jurisdiction to issue a national certificate of succession under Articles 4 and 15 of Regulation no. 650/2012 because the provisions of German law cannot determine international jurisdiction since the provisions of national law must yield to the provisions of Regulation no. 650/2012. In the court's view, the French courts, as the courts of the Member State where the deceased had his habitual residence at the time of death, and not the German courts, have jurisdiction to rule on the succession as a whole, including the application.

Consequently, an appeal was brought against that decision before the referring court which decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: "Is Article 4 of Regulation (EU) No 650/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 July 2012 on jurisdiction, applicable law, recognition and enforcement of decisions and acceptance and enforcement of authentic instruments in matters of succession and on the creation of a European Certificate of Succession 1 (Regulation No 650/2012) to be interpreted as meaning that it also determines exclusive international jurisdiction in respect of the granting, in the Member States, of national certificates of succession which have not been replaced by the European certificate of succession (see Article 62(3) of Regulation No 650/2012), with the result that divergent provisions adopted by national legislatures with regard to international jurisdiction in respect of the granting of national certificates of succession — such as Paragraph 105 of the Familiengesetzbuch (the Family Code) in Germany — are ineffective on the ground that they infringe higher-ranking European law?[15]

Article 4 of Regulation (EU) no. 650/2012 on general jurisdiction provides that the courts of the Member State in which the deceased had his habitual residence at the time of death shall have jurisdiction to rule on the succession as a whole.

So, the referring court asked for clarifications as to whether Article 4 defines 'exclusive jurisdiction' also over procedures for the issuing of national certificates of succession, or in other words whether Article 4 determines jurisdiction over procedures for issuing national certificates of succession, in the case of Member States where the judicial authorities can issue national heir certificates.

The Advocate General argued that even from an earlier stage of the legislative process it was assumed that the international jurisdiction of the authorities of the Member States over the issuing of national certificates of succession would be decided not by national law but by the uniform rules of jurisdiction contained in the regulation[16], and this view is confirmed by the literal, systematic and teleological interpretation, supported by the historical interpretation of Article 4 of Regulation (EU) No 650/2012.

The Court of Justice of the European Union embraced this point of view and decided that Article 4 of Regulation (EU) No 650/2012 […] must be interpreted as precluding legislation of a Member State, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which provides that, although the deceased did not, at the time of death, have his habitual residence in that Member State, the courts of that Member State are to retain jurisdiction to issue national certificates of succession, in the context of a succession with cross-border implications, where the assets of the estate are located in that Member State or the deceased was a national of that Member State"[17].

This interpretation upholds its previous judgment rendered in Kubicka case[18] according to which an interpretation of the rules of Regulation No 650/2012 which would lead to the fragmentation of the succession would be incompatible its objectives and one of those objectives is precisely to establish a uniform regime applicable to successions with cross-border implications, including the harmonising the rules relating to the international jurisdiction of the courts of the Member States in both contentious and non-contentious proceedings.

4. Brisch Case (C-102/18)

In the fourth case A German national with the last usual habitual residence in Cologne (Germany) died on 2 June 2017. The executor of the deceased's last will, pursuant to Article 65(1) of Regulation no. 650/2012, Mr. Brisch, applied to the Local Court in Cologne on 16 October 2017 on the basis of a notarised instrument of 11 October 2017 for a certificate in respect of the deceased's estate located in Italy, but did not use Form IV in Annex 4 to Implementing Regulation No 1329/2014 ('Form IV').

The Court requested the use of Form IV but Mr. Brisch refused to accede to that request and asserted that he was free - but not required - to use that form. Therefore, the court rejected the application for the certificate on the ground that Mr Brisch did not use Form IV and that therefore the application had not been lodged in the prescribed form. Consequently, Mr. Brisch brought an appeal before the Higher Regional Court on the ground that it follows both from Article 65(2) of Regulation no. 650/2012 and from Form IV itself that the use of the latter is optional.

The referring court decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: "Is the use of the form as set out in Annex 4 as Form IV, established in accordance with the advisory procedure under Article 81(2) of the EU Succession Regulation, mandatory or merely optional for the purposes of an application for a European Certificate of Succession under Article 65(2) of the EU Succession Regulation, in accordance with Article 1(4) of the Implementing Regulation for the EU Succession Regulation?"[19].

According to Article 65 on the application for a certificate, for the purposes of submitting an application, the applicant may use the form established in accordance with the advisory procedure referred to in Article 81(2), and Article 1(4) from Regulation no. 1329/2014 states that the form to be used for the application for a European Certificate of Succession referred to in Article 65(2) of Regulation No 650/2012 shall be as set out in Annex 4 as Form IV.

The Court of Justice of the European Union considered that the wording of Article 65(2) of Regulation No 650/2012 is not ambiguous as regards the optional nature of the use of Form IV and Article 1(4) of Implementing Regulation No 1329/2014 and must be read in conjunction with Annex 4 to that regulation, to which it refers and which includes Form IV, since in the section 'Notice to the applicant', which heads Form IV, it is clearly specified that Form IV is optional. Therefore, it is clear from a literal interpretation of Article 65(2) of Regulation No 650/2012, read in conjunction with Annex 4 to Implementing Regulation No 1329/2014, that, for the purposes of an application for a certificate, the use of Form IV is optional[20].

This interpretation confirms the position of the doctrine that the regulation only suggests the use of the form but the applicant has all the interest in using it as it facilitates the mission of the authority responsible for issuing the European Certificate of Succession[21]. In addition, the claimant may also use a form provided for in the national law of the issuing authority where the Member State also has a national procedure for the issue of national succession certificates[22].

5. WB Case (C-658/17)

Besides the four judgments outlined above, there is a case still pending before the Court of Justice of the European Union. This fifth case provides the Court with the opportunity to offer useful guidance on the limits of the notions of "decision" and "court" within the meaning of Regulation no. 650/2012, establishing in particular whether a notary to whom national law confers jurisdiction to issue certificates of succession exercises "judicial functions"[23].

In the opinion of the Advocate General the notary who draws up a certificate of succession on the joint application of all the parties to the notarial procedure under the provisions of Polish law does not fall within the definition of "court of law" within the meaning of that regulation and, consequently, the Polish national certificate of succession drawn up by the notary does not constitute a "decision" within the meaning of Article 3 (1) (g) of Regulation (EU) No 650/2012, but it constitutes an "authentic instrument"[24].

The upcoming judgement of the Court of Justice of the European Union will be particularly relevant since it will also have an impact on the national certificates of inheritance issued by notaries in Romania, as they are part of the Latin type notarial system, together with their colleagues in Poland.

Instead of a Conclusion

This instrument in matters of succession, dealing, in particular, with the questions of conflict of laws, jurisdiction, mutual recognition and enforcement of decisions and a European Certificate of Succession, has a bright future ahead in supporting citizens to organise their succession in advance, and its clarifying interpretation by the Court of Justice of the European Union can only strengthen the freedom, security and justice in the European Union.

CHALLENGES OF MODERN MARRIAGES - NON-PATRIMONIAL RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS OF SPOUSES

Nicoleta Roxana ŞERBĂNOIU

Abstract

The evolution of contemporary private law is due to the recognition of the importance of human rights, knowing a real progress lately, which has led to the protection of the person's subjective civil rights. It is very important that, in addition to legal coercive values, society should accept the importance of subjective rights and respect them. In terms of family law, the personal obligations of spouses are important. In order to be effective, these rights must be applied carefuly and it is necessary that they come to defend a person both physically and mentally. It is very important that, in addition to legal coercive values, society should accept the importance of civil subjective rights and respect them. Although at European level we can observe an exponential increase of the values protected due to European Convention on Human Rights and its implementation, in Romania the respect of the civil subjective rights remains at the discretion of individuals, force can not cover all the cases that may arise. Civil subjective rights and obligations, in terms of family law, are impotant, especialy the personal obligations of spouses. Personal rights and obligations are inseparable from spouses and can not be alienated. They can not be the subject of the matrimonial agreement or of any other contracts. This provides an essential principle of family law - the equality of spouses in family – that is based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Convention on the Political Rights of Women, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, Civil Code.

1. Introduction

Over time, marriage has undergone significant changes due to legal regulation. Marriage, since the beginning of legal regulation, has been the union between man and woman.[1] The purpose of this union was, and continues to be, the founding of a family, the procreation and growth of children.

The family in the old Dacia was based on marriage. There are some documents that tell us that the husband had to pay a price for his wife so that when he wanted to marry, the husband had to pay a certain price to the woman's parents. The woman contributed to marriage by some material goods that constituted her dowry.[2]

In the sense of Roman law, the family was formed around the power given to the leader of the family, which could be absolute, having the power to decide the life of the persons under his power.[3] The situation of the children (filli or filiae familiae), but also of the married woman was that of alieni iuris, who designate those who can not decide for them, these being under the power of a pater familiae. It is fair to say that the Roman family had a patriarchal character.[4]

During Augustus reign, Roman citizens were forced to observe a series of new rules on morality. During the same period of the Roman Empire, the natality rate had a downward trend, and Augustus's main goal was to maintain the birthrate, and thus issued rules to force the citizens of Rome to raise more children.[5]

Lex Julia maritandis ordinibus established the obligation of age difference. The age of legal consent for a marriage was 12 years for girls and 14 for boys.[6]

When we talk about marriage, men and women needed to respect the morality of a relationship and to consider marriage to each other sacred. These legal provisions applied to both men and women who were never married and to those who were divorced and wanted to remarry. The noble women married earlier. This aspect had in mind that an aristocratic woman had to be virgin at the time of her marriage.

As we have seen in previous lines, the basic principle was the morality of marriage and family life. Some of the rights and obligations that husbands had in ancient Rome have been preserved today, such as the principle of monogamy, which has been preserved in our current legislation.

The main purpose of marriage at that time was procreation, though current legislation no longer provides for an obligation in this respect, as Augustus had stated in the ancient Roman Empire, it still remains a right that spouses have today.

Lex Iulia de adulteriis provided a series of possible punishment for married women committing adultery. There is now a duty of loyalty, and the sanction for this violation of non-marital obligations of spouses is divorce.

2. The non-patrimonial rights and obligations of spouses in the context of the modern family

The rules of family law determine the pecuniary relations between its members and non-patrimonial also. The legislator wishes to establish a material solidarity between the members of the family. In the following, however, we will consider the non-patrimonial rights and obligations of family members and their consequences.

The legislator establishes certain rules regarding personal rights rights and obligations arising from family relationships, such as the regulation of marital relationships.

Values are important for family members, but especially for spouses. The laws must be in line with the collective ideals set by a society and the outcome. The functioning of the legal system is important, so the legislator had to regulate these values as predictable and desirable as possible.[7]

Decreasing sanctions clearly affects the non-marital relationship between spouses and is due to the principles of freedom and equality that have been promoted by both the legislator and the specialized doctrine. Most sanctions in previous legislation have disappeared, and criminal penalties have diminished, except for family abandonment, rape between spouses and domestic violence.

On the other hand, it is not wrong to suppress certain criminal sanctions that no longer apply to modern family law, but there are certain situations where they should be replaced by civil sanctions. We believe it is necessary to provide a legal framework that gives the spouses the opportunity to defend their rights and sanction the spouse who violates non-patrimonial obligations.

We believe it is time to give individuals a flexible right, more adapted to family transformations and modern needs. Thus, even if the legislator has lately made an act of withdrawal, non-interference in family relationships, this is not entirely wrong. With this desire not to interfere in the non-patrimonial relationship of the family and especially of the spouses, the legislator leaves free the possibility of establishing the form of the non-patrimonial legal relationship that they want during the marriage.

The contemporary legislator makes recommendations and avoids editing coecitive rules, leaving it to each family to choose the non-patrimonial relationship they want to have.

This freedom, however, must be achieved without hindering a member of the family without being able to hurt him and forcing him to do something he does not want. It is necessary to provide legal groud that gives the possibility of concluding contracts stipulating the will of the spouses. The clauses of a contract that stipulate the non-marital relationships of the spouses must be clearly stated, they must contain sanctions in case of non-exercise or guilty exercise, but, most importantly, must represent the will of each spouse.

The objective of the legislator, proposing different models of family relationship building, ensures freedom for everyone to choose what suits them best; “For every family, for every right,” wrote the famous French author Jean Carbonnier.[8]

However, it should be emphasized that if the choice of the desired non-marital relationship model is free, compliance with legal obligations must be achieved by compelling individuals to respect the legal consequences of their contractual choice. For example, in the choice of marriage, people show the option of adhering to the legal rules governing spouses' relationships.[9]

This right of option on legal consequences is an indirect process that allows individuals to influence their constraint. When such persons find themselves in breach of legal rules, they should not be subject to inappropriate individualisation of the mandatory rule, but to the one resulting from the legal regime they have chosen.

For example, at the time of divorce, the spouses can agree on the sanction for the violation, and then present this conventional agreement to the court.[10]

Through these agreements, spouses could escape an individualization that they regard as wrong. The possibility of concluding these conventions is important if a certain interest is to be protected. Thus, the protection of the interests of spouses leads to the promotion of family interests, and the protection of social justice can be achieved through clauses that establish appropriate protection and be grounded on public order.[11]

3. The importance of adopting appropriate legal solutions

From a legal point of view, besides imperative rules, there have always been rules that depend on the will of the person. In general, the contractual clauses are negotiated by the parties, representing their unwarranted will. The contract even concluded between spouses, under the scope of establishing their extra-patrimonial relationship, must have the power of law between the two, both during the marriage and in the event of a divorce. Thus, the simple behavioral act that seems appropriate for the spouses needs to be well-defined by a legal framework, which results in a structured set of rights and obligations bound by a contract.

In family law, there are some examples of legal prevention that relate to the defense of the rights and obligations of spouses. Our current law seems to encourage marriage, as it gives the spouses certain advantages that are not offered to people living in concubinage. Here we mainly refer to those legal provisions that bring an advantage over the non-patrimonial relationship of spouses. An eloquent example of this is the name of the spouse, since only spouses can use a common name or can wear during marriage and the name of the other, according to art. 282 Civil Code. In case of death, spouses can inherit the other's property without any legal formality prior to the date of death. Also, only a surviving spouse can claim a survivor's pension. It should also be noted that only marriage allows the foreign spouse to obtain a residence permit, having an entitlement to the right of her husband.

Besides the advantages mentioned, the law also provides coercive techniques such as punishment. Legal sanctions are the legislator's orientation to straightening individual behavior by punishment when preventive activity reaches certain limits and becomes ineffective. In such situations, spouses must comply with a certain pattern of behavior, and a penalty is also required to ensure compliance with this obligation.[12]

We have an eloquent example of this, namely, the moral damage that may be suffered by the wife during marriage due to the husband's abusive behavior.[13] After a marriage that lasted for thirty years, the wife decides to seek divorce. Together with the divorce, the wife also seeks to cover the moral prejudice suffered by her husband's abusive behavior.[14] We consider this claim to be well founded and to be moral, in so far as it can be proved. Although moral damage is evident, in most cases the Romanian courts have agreed to reject such requests.

In a recent ruling[15] by the European Court of Human Rights, the widow of an employee exposed to asbestos at work has asked the employer for damages for the moral damage caused by her husband's death. In parallel to this action, the children of the deceased continued the civil liability action commenced by their father before his death. None of these actions had a positive result, as the national courts claimed that the action was prescribed due to a period of ten years after the last exposure to pathogens. The widow and children have appealed to the European Court of Human Rights, alleging violation of the rights guaranteed by Article 6 § 1 of the Convention. In its judgment, the Court emphasized that the right of access to a court is not an absolute right and that the States have a margin of discretion in setting the time limits for action, and that these delays must be compatible with the requirements of Art. 6§1 and must not affect the very substance of this right, but it is not the case when those periods of time could deprive a person because the damage occurs after the expiry of these time limits.

From the point of view of non-patrimonial rights and obligations of spouses, we are confronted lately with certain problems in respecting the religion of the other husband. US states allow insertion of certain clauses in this sense if there are some reasons for that husband to have a certain religion. In recent years, some couples have included social life clauses relating to the use of social media networks, stipulating provisions for use in their prenuptial agreements that may be used in the context of marriage.[16]

We recall, in this respect, the recitals of the criminal decision no. 564/2017 of the Iaşi Court of Appeal,[17] which condemned a man for accessing multiple emails and internet banking accounts without the prior consent of his wife. He has taken several actions in the criminal resolution by opening and reading conversations and monitoring his wife's bank accounts. The husband claimed in his defense that he had the initial permission of his wife, so that since she had her consent, she was presumed until her express withdrawal or change of account password, which the court did not agree with. The Court of Appeal of Iaşi recalled by the recitals no. 564/2017, that the acts committed constitute the constitutive elements of the offenses of illegal access to a computer system, provided in art. 360 par. (1) and (2), violation of the correspondence secret, provided in art. 302 par. (1) and unauthorized transfer of computer data, provided in art. 364 of the Criminal Code.

In the same sense, we have the criminal sentence no. 183 / 26.11.2018 by the Alba Tribunal[18], the defendant was convicted of illegally accessing a Facebook account of "jealousy." This was confirmed by the Criminal Decision no. 92 of 5 February 2019, the Alba Iulia Court of Appeal dismissed the defendant's appeal and the court held that the defendant had committed a violation of privacy, and his motivation regarding jealousy did not attenuate but, on the contrary, amplified the deed. The court shows that the defendant has attempted to intimate a person, which is a serious deed, because he treated the other person as his own, his property, considering himself entitled to use his privacy, to know who she is talking to and what she is talking about.

We consider these examples to be eloquent in highlighting the need to restore values in terms of the life of the modern family, but especially with respect to the non-marital relationship of spouses.[19]

A person injured in a right of his own may request the court to defend his rights through a defensive action.[20] Depending on the situation or the moment of the action, it can be materialized in a request:

- prevention, when there is a real possibility of a violation.
- cessation, when the breach of non-patrimonial rights and obligations has occurred and persists at the date of the action.
- to find out when the touch has ceased.

If the there are facts imputable to the offender, the injured party may request compensation for the damage caused. Remedies may only be made by the holder of the non-patrimonial right or obligation infringed.[21]

The claim for reparation of the damage by the actions regarding the protection of the extra patrimonial rights and obligations of the spouses can be formulated according to the provisions of art. 253 par. 4 of the Civil Code, and actions for reparation of the damage may be in reparation of the patrimonial damage suffered or in the repair of the moral damage.

The action for reparation of the patrimonial damage involves covering the damage caused by a diminution of the patrimony of the rightholder, which must be proved. As regards the extra-patrimonial rights and obligations of spouses, this action may be brought in order to recover the damage caused by one of the spouses when it disregards a non-patrimonial right of its spouse. An example of this is the sale of the family home by one of the spouses, with the disregard of the right of the other spouse or of their children.

In order to determine the reparation of the moral damage caused, it is important to determine its nature and extent. The severity of the damage suffered, which may materialize in a suffering, due to a physical or mental injury, must be assessed. The injured person must prove the facts and the circumstances in which they happened.

4. Conclusions

We conclude that prevention and sanctions are coercive techniques that the legislator is relying on to impose certain behaviors and to limit actions that could cause harm.

We can, however, consider that the legislator no longer wants an absolute involvement in the rights and obligations of the spouses, so we notice a tendency to withdraw the constraint. This wish of the legislator not to interfere in the extra-patrimonial relationships of spouses results in the impossibility of applying any legal sanction in the case of a spouse's violation of the rights and obligations of the other spouse.

Under the influence of the new values of equality and freedom, indirect techniques of behavioral orientation are in decline. In couple relationships, for example, rules that seek to benefit married couples and disadvantage unmarried couples have gradually disappeared.

However, we must bear in mind that while the work of prevention tends to be reduced to the non-patrimonial right of the family due to the influence of freedom and equality, we must not conclude that it disappears. This also applies to the sanctions applicable to spouses.

LEGAL ASPECTS REGARDING THE EXPRESSION OF BINDING CONSUMER CONSENT

Gabriel VASII

Abstract

The purpose of this study is to analyse the effect of the party's intent to enter into a legal relationship, in such cases where the powers of one party are significantly higher than the ones of the other contracting party. The articles aims to acquire a practical approach on the effects of lack of intent expressed by consumers which are on unequal grounds with their contracting party, from the lenses of EU principles of effectiveness, proportionality and dissuasiveness in the area of consumer protection. Given that within commercial legal relationships, the intent to produce legal effects is presumed, the question is whether the same can be affirmed in respect to consumer agreements, which are likely to be concluded for services deemed as essential by the consumer, such as electricity, utilities, telecommunications or even banking services. The proportions of the discussion regarding a party's intent have increased considering that any aspect of modern society, from the access to Google or Facebook to the access to basic survival services, requires the consumer's consent to enter into a legal relationship.

1. Introduction

Under Romanian law, the contractual theory has received a wide analysis by scholars throughout time, since its utility is establishing fundamental concepts which can be further used in practical applications. Pursuant to a well-renowned scholar[1], the theory of contracts is governed by three fundamental principles, namely contractual freedom, consensualism and mandatory force.

The contract in itself is viewed as an instrument used for individual and collective interests, in support of goods' circulation and social values. It represents an essential legal mechanism for economic activity and is one of the main instituitions of civil law, which is identified in legal systems throughout the world.

Its importance lies not only on its functionality but also on the manner in which contractual relationship stem from a valid, duly performed contract.

In clasical legal literature, the concept of contractual will and the autonomy of contractual will was of high significance but recent views show that contractual will must be correlated with the respect owed by contracting parties to the law[2]. In addition, contractual will must be analyzed both from the point of view of the real, internal will and the will expressed externally. Of course, the autonomy of a party's will must be in strict correlation with the contractual freedom said party benefits from, within the limits of the law. In certain cases, however, the court may intervene into the parties' contractual relationship, by modifying the parties' consent with respect to certain clauses. For example, legal doctrine[3] reveals that in case of imprevision (art. 1271 of Romanian Civil Code) or in case of a penal clause (art. 1541 of Romanian Civil Code) the court is allowed to intervene in order to adjust the contractual conditions in order to adapt the contract to current conditions and respectively, to reduce the value of the penalty established by the parties.

Since legal acts may be classified into consensual, solemn or formal and real acts, a party's consent plays a valuable role in the accurate performance of a duly binding contract. The element exteriorizing the party's will is the contractual consent, which can be formed prior to the execution of the agreement itself, in the negotiation phase or at the exact moment of the execution of the agreement, in which case, the consent along with the fulfilment of the validity conditions result in the conclusion of the contract[4]. In contract law, consent is generally regarded as pivotal for contractual validity.

Pursuant to art. 1179 Romanian Civil Code, the conditions for the validity of a legal act are the party's capacity to enter into a contractual relationship, the party's consent, the determined and licit object and a licit and moral cause. For solemn agreements, the ad validitatem form is added.

In order to produce legal effects, consent must be free, serious and expressed with the direct intent to produce binding legal effects (animo contrahendi negotii).

As opposed to classical civil agreements which are characterized by formalism, commercial agreements concluded under Romanian law are generally performed without formalities. Therefore, commercial agreements may be concluded through letters, telefax, fax, verbally or telephonically or through more modern electronic means (electronic contracts or smart contracts performed via blockchain technology)[5].

Although generally, consent is viewed as a mandatory condition for the conclusion of a duly valid contract, this particular element is somewhat disrupted in consumer agreements, where the consumer may unwillingly enter contracts where the contractual balance is tilted in favour of the legal professional, whose contractual position is more characterized.

2. Consumer consent

2.1. General aspects regarding consumer consent in European Union jurisdiction

Each time an individual buys a product or service from a professional trader, they're entering into a contract, irrespective of the fact that they're buys their weekly grocery, they're ordering a gift online or they are signing up for a gym membership. In order for that contract to be concluded, the consumer must express a valid consent, for which it requires a full and adequate understanding of the commercial terms and conditions set out by the professional trader/service provider.

In the current modern world, most contracts are concluded online, in electronic form or most recently, as smart contracts using blockchain technology. Even if online concluded contracts contain standard terms, it is mandatory for the consumer to be well informed of those terms in order to express a valid consent. Also, in case the consumer was implicitly forced into accepting certain terms and conditions, where the consumer's consent was not fully provided, EU policies provide that effective remedies must be available.

In continental law, consent is viewed as a substantial condition for the materialization of a contractual relationship. The expression of consent represent an element of the contractual mechanism which is in its whole characterized by good-faith. For example, the principle of good faith (section 242, German Civil Code[6] (BGB)) is a fundamental principle of law in Germany, which applies when contract negotiations commence. Also, under German law, the parties' consent has a high value, considering that the lack of agreement is not an obstacle to the creation of the contract if the parties start implementing the contract by mutual consent and by doing so show that they do not regard the lack of conformity to be material[7].

While in continental law, consent is treated under more strict terms, under common-law, thing are a bit different.

For example, even if English contract law is based on the principle of freedom to contract without limitations, the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 (UCTA) applies in a number of circumstances including when a party is contracting on its 'written standard terms'. In such circumstances, the UCTA restricts a party's ability to exclude or limit its liability for breach of its obligations in such a contract. Also, in the United Kingdom, there is no implied obligation to use good faith when performing a contract[8].Good faith in negotiating commercial contracts is not presumed in Irish law, either. This aspect results from constant case law, such as the Irish Court of Appeal case of Flynn and Anor v Breccia and Anor (2017), which overturned an Irish High Court ruling that there was a general principle of good faith in Irish commercial contract law[9].

2.2. Recent developments and tendencies regarding consumer protection in the European Union

A press release of the Council of the EU dated March 2019 reveals that the European Union is improving the protection of consumers' rights. Member states' ambassadors meeting in the Council's Permanent Representatives Committee agreed on the Council's position on a draft directive which amends four existing EU directives protecting consumers' interests. The envisaged directive aims to amend the unfair commercial practices directive 2005/29/EC, the consumer rights directive 2011/83/EU, the unfair contract terms directive 93/13/EEC and the price indication directive 98/6/EC. It was proposed together with a proposal on representative actions for the protection of the collective interests of consumers as part of the 'New Deal for Consumers' launched by the Commission in 2017.

Most relevant provisions regarding the protection of consumers in the European Union are aimed to address the following issues:

- more transparency for consumers in online marketplaces. The directive requires online marketplaces to clearly inform consumers about:

a) the main parameters determining ranking of the different offers,
b) whether the contract is concluded with a trader or an individual,
c) whether consumer protection legislation applies and
d) which trader (third party supplier or online marketplace) is responsible for ensuring consumer rights related to the contract (such as the right of withdrawal or legal guarantee).

In addition, digital applications such as online marketplaces, comparison tools, app stores and search engines have the obligation under the envisaged directive to indicate to their users which search results contain 'paid placements', i.e. where third parties pay for higher ranking, or 'paid inclusion', i.e. where third parties pay to be included in the list of search results;

- the protection of consumers in respect of 'free' digital services, namely digital services for which consumers do not pay money but provide personal data, such as: cloud storage, social media and email accounts.

All the envisaged remedies of the draft directive are aimed to assure transparency of contractual clauses, so that consumers may express a valid and committed consent, irrespective of the form of the agreement they are entering into - a direct one or an electronic one.

3. Consumer Rights Directive (2011/83/EU)

The Directive[10] aims at achieving a real consumer internal market, striking the right balance between a high level of consumer protection and the competitiveness of enterprises. The Directive will apply to contracts concluded after 13 June 2014.

With respect to the conclusion of off-premises contracts, the Consumer Rights Directive provides that the trader shall give certain information to the consumer on paper or, if the consumer agrees, on another durable medium. That information shall be legible and in plain, intelligible language. Such information includes but is not limited to, as per art. 6 (1) of the Directive, the main characteristics of the goods or services, to the extent appropriate to the medium and to the goods or services, the identity of the trader, such as his trading name, the total price of the goods or services inclusive of taxes, he arrangements for payment, delivery, performance, the time by which the trader undertakes to deliver the goods or to perform the services and, where applicable, the trader's complaint handling policy and the a reminder of the existence of a legal guarantee of conformity for goods. This type of information is required so that the consumer is well aware of the legal binding relationship it is entering into and that the consent the consumer expresses is in strict connection to what the professional is offering.

Also, the Consumer Rights Directive stipulates that the trader shall provide the consumer with a copy of the signed contract or the confirmation of the contract on paper or, if the consumer agrees, on another durable medium, including, where applicable, the confirmation of the consumer's prior express consent and acknowledgement. Where a distance contract is to be concluded by telephone, Member States may provide that the trader has to confirm the offer to the consumer who is bound only once he has signed the offer or has sent his written consent. Member States may also provide that such confirmations have to be made on a durable medium.

In addition to the consumer's express consent with respect to the main elements of the contract, the Consumer Rights Directive provides that before the consumer is bound by the contract or offer, the trader shall seek the express consent of the consumer to any extra payment in addition to the remuneration agreed upon for the trader's main contractual obligation, thus enabling the consumer to be fully aware of all and any supplementary costs which may arise and affect its will to undertake contractual obligations. If the trader has not obtained the consumer's express consent but has inferred it by using default options which the consumer is required to reject in order to avoid the additional payment, the consumer shall be entitled to reimbursement of this payment.

Consumer Rights Directive also tackles the situations when the consumer receives certain goods or is provided services which it did not request. In such case, the consumer shall be exempted from the obligation to provide any consideration in cases of unsolicited supply of goods, water, gas, electricity, district heating or digital content or unsolicited provision of services, prohibited by Article 5(5) and point 29 of Annex I to Directive 2005/29/EC[11]. In such cases, the absence of a response from the consumer following such an unsolicited supply or provision shall not constitute consent.

The Consumer Rights Directive is completed by Unfair Commercial Practices Directive (2005/29/EC) and Alternative Dispute Resolution Directive (2013/11/EU), so that a complex legal framework is created to be comprehensive and address all the necessities of European consumers.

4. The Principles of Effectiveness, Proportionality and Dissuasiveness in the Enforcement of European Union Consumer Law

Even though consent is thought to be the pillar of contracts' formation, the conditions for a validly expressed consent differ from one legal system to another. Such differencies may also result in cases

[10] Directive 2011/83/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 25 October 2011 on consumer rights, amending Council Directive 93/13/EEC and Directive 1999/44/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council and repealing Council Directive 85/577/EEC and Directive 97/7/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council (Consumer Rights Directive).

[11] Directive 2005/29/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 May 2005 concerning unfair business-to-consumer commercial practices in the internal market and amending Council Directive 84/450/EEC, Directives 97/7/EC, 98/27/EC and 2002/65/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council and Regulation (EC) No 2006/2004 of the European Parliament and of the Council ('Unfair Commercial Practices Directive').

when the consumer's consent was not validly expressed and measures must be enforced for supporting said consumer and protecting its position within the contract. This circumstance may be the direct consequence of the application of the principles of effectiveness, proportionality and dissuasiveness in the enforcement of EU consumer law.

The principles of effectiveness, proportionality and dissuasiveness derive directly from EU secondary law provisions[12]. Effectiveness refers to the relationship between a particular goal set by the policy maker and the legal remedies available to reach the goal set by the legislator. (e.g. consumer protection or fair market competition)[13]. With respect to consumer law, Directive 2009/136/EC amending Directive 2002/22/EC on universal service and users' rights relating to electronic communications networks and services, Directive 2002/58/EC concerning the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector and Regulation (EC) No 2006/2004 on cooperation between national authorities responsible for the enforcement of consumer protection law provide that Member States shall lay down the rules on penalties, which must be effective, proportionate and dissuasive.

The joint application of these principles leads to the conclusion that the national judge plays (and shall play) an important function in settling the procedural conditions for an "informed" remedial choice on the part of the consumer.

Conclusions

Even in view of recent changes brought by the immersing IT revolutionary tools into law, the contract's importance has remained unchanged What previous and continous developments in connection to the conclusion of an agreement may produce are solely a consequence of the world's constantly evolving nature, manifested in legal grounds. Irrespective of such developments, the parties' consent within a contract becomes even more relevant when analyzing electronic or smart contracts, since the possibility to verify such consent, and consequenly, the possibility to verify whether the contract itself was duly concluded depends not only on legal knowledge but also on the close collaboration between legal specialists and IT experts.

Here is where the European legislator comes to amend the gaps in legislation in order to ensure a higher consumer protection policity, this being the trend of the current legislation adoption process.

Even if functionality and rapidness might be ensured by using more modern contractual methods, such as the electronic form of a contract or a smart contract, these methods bring inherent probation issued which should be carefully adressed by the legislator so that any disruptions in the contractual mechanisms may be prevented ab initio.

THE PRINCIPLE OF "POLLUTER PAYS" IN INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS GOVERNED BY LAW 85/2014

Candit Valentin VERNEA

Abstract

By means of this article the author, will analyse the incidence of the fundamental principle of environmental law "polluter pays" in the current national legislation and will identify its applicability, especially in what concerns insolvency proceedings.

The article is structured in three parts. The first part aims to define and identify the particularities of this principle in both contemporary Romanian law and International law.

The second part points out how the company's liability for environmental damage can be attracted in each of the phases of the insolvency proceedings.

The third part correlates the provisions of Law No. 85/2014 with the provisions of Government Emergency Ordinance No. 68/2007 on environmental liability by formulating a de lege ferenda proposal designed to increase the efficiency of environmental damage coverage in insolvency proceedings.

Keywords: Insolvency proceedings, environmental damage, polluter pays, environmental liability

1. Principles of environmental law applicable to companies;

The principles of environmental law applicable to companies, but especially to companies under the Insolvency Act, have particularities in their application. The need for environmental protection in our country has been stated since 1973, when Law No. 9 was passed, which stated that the environmental protection activity constitutes a matter of national interest. The Constitution passed in 1991 provides under art. 135 paragraph 2 D "the obligation that the State has in exploiting the country's natural resources, in accordance with national interests". From article 135 paragraph 3 D of the Romanian Constitution one can conclude that "no human activity can be carried out without complying with environmental protection rules, and therefore, this represents a general obligation for all public, central and local authorities, such as natural persons and legal entities"[1].

As regards the owner of an activity with an impact on the environment, we show that this person can be both a natural person and a legal entity, whichever being legally liable. The owner of a project authorising an activity shall be either the applicant, natural person or legal entity, or the public authority initiating a project.

The category of legal entities incudes those established based on Law 31/1990 on commercial companies, whether these are limited liability companies or share companies. Thus, companies may be subject to environmental law as legal entities established based on legal norms. Article 1 of law 31/1990 states that "for the purpose of carrying out lucrative activities, natural persons and legal entities may be associated and establish companies with legal personality, in compliance with the provisions of this Law".[2] The company may be established for carrying out a lucrative activity, but it can also be established without the main objective being that of the activity undertaken to gain profit. The activity which companies carry out in order to gain profit or not must be one stemming from lawful actions, as such, any activity thereof must comply with the legislation of the environmental law as well.

If the commercial company established for a lucrative purpose not only does not gain profit, but also incurs consecutive losses, which cannot be covered by external sources, it may enter in default, which is followed by insolvency. In other words, a company in default is one small step away from to the opening of insolvency proceedings, which can be followed by a successful reorganization or bankruptcy of the debtor.

The insolvency, as it has been defined, shows that it represents that state of the debtor's estate, which is characterized by the insufficiency of money funds for the payment of definite, liquid and payable debts[3]. The text of art. 5 item 29 a) and b) of Law 85/2014 distinguishes between imminent insolvency and presumed insolvency. Regardless of the state of insolvency of the debtor, be it imminent or presumed, we can speak of a commercial company in insolvency only if, following the analysis made by the syndic judge, invested with such an application, it is established that all legal requirements are fulfilled and a sentence or closure to open the procedure are issued.

Companies, being legal entities, since their establishment must comply with all legal provisions relating to environmental law, if these are applicable to the specificity of their business. Companies are entities born as a result of the will of one or more persons, either natural persons or legal entities, or a combination thereof. It is assumed that the activity that a company carries out is one of a much larger scale and with a higher complexity as compared to any activity that a natural person can carry out on an individual basis. The risk that the ecological balance is affected is even greater, as the extent of the carried out activities is greater, as such, in the case of commercial companies, the risk is high. Depending on the activity that each company will carry out, it may be necessary to have a certain authorisation, which may also be an environmental one, before its start.

The National Agency for Environmental Protection is an entity of the central public administration, whose tasks are represented by strategic planning and monitoring of environmental factors, but also the authorisation of all activities that have an impact on the environment. In Romanian legislation on the environment, there is a number of regulatory enactments (agreements, endorsements, authorisations) that economic operators will have to obtain, under specific criteria and rules. Such agreements/authorisations or endorsements are not intended to give the right for pollution or to affect the environment, but are intended to prevent or at least minimise such negative effects.

The authorisation of environmental impact activities is one of the current techniques currently used by all the States of the European Union, in order to prevent and limit environmental harm. The obligation to obtain special authorisations for the carrying out of certain activities verifies the fulfilment of minimum operating and control conditions that the future economic operator will have to carry out, in order to comply with all environmental requirements. Whether or not a company is in insolvency, it is obliged to comply with all environmental obligations regulated by the enactments in force.

The principles of environmental law have both the guiding role of the legislator, when drafting new regulations, and the role of guiding the activity of any economic operator subject to the rules laid down by that law branch. These regulations will have to be complied with by any of the current or future economic operators performing or wishing to perform activities that may affect the environment. The principles of environmental law are laid down by art. 3 of G.E.O. no. 195/2005 on environmental protection[4], these being the general principles.

The subject of environmental law may be a natural person or a legal entity, but not all the principles of law stated under art. 3 of G.E.O. 195/2005 on environmental protection shall apply to these categories of operators. As regards the application of the principles of environmental law, a particularity in their application is the application of the provisions of art. 3 h) of G.E.O. 195/2005 on environmental protection. The principle laid down by art. 3 h)[5] has two parts, one of "public information and participation of the public in the decision-making process" and another related to "access to justice in environmental matters". If all the principles of law set out by G.E.O. 195/2005 on environmental protection apply to both natural persons and legal entities, the subject of law of the first component of item h) of art. 3 may only be a natural person, commercial companies of any kind being unable to participate in the decision making process.

This principle with two different components has as subjects different persons. Subjects of law for information and participation in the decision-making process related to environmental issues can only be natural persons, and access to justice can have all subjects of law, be they natural persons or legal entities.

The principles of law stated under art. 3 of G.E.O. 195/2005 on environmental protection were designed to prevent pollution and then repair or call on the liability of persons causing environmental damage. In a sense, it is normal for the prevention to be often a much better and more accessible solution than repair, which in the environmental law, can often be very difficult to achieve or is unattainable.

One of the principles of environmental law that represents the foundation of this branch is the "polluter pays" principle.

2. Development of the "polluter pays" principle;

In the European Union, "polluter pays" as a principle of environmental law, was introduced in the [4] G.E.O. no. 195/2005 on Environmental Protection, published in Official Journal no. 1196 of December 30th, 2005, under art. 3 states "The principles and strategic elements underlying the present emergency ordinance are:

a) The principle of integrating environmental policy into other sectoral policies;
b) The precautionary principle in the decision-making process;
c) The principle of preventive action;
d) the principle of withholding pollutants at source;
e) the "polluter pays" principle;
f) the principle of preserving biodiversity and ecosystems specific to the natural biogeographic framework;
g) sustainable use of natural resources;
h) public information and participation in the decision-making process, as well as access to justice in environmental matters;
i) development of international cooperation for the protection of the environment."

[5] G.E.O. no. 195/2005 on Environmental Protection, published in Official Journal no. 1196 of December 30th, 2005

Treaty on the functioning of the European Union, but also by means of Directive 2004/35/EC[6] of the European Parliament and of the Council of 21.04.2004 on environmental liability in relation to the prevention and remediation of damages. Member States were allowed to transpose the directive into national legislations by April 30th, 2007. All Member States have transposed the directive into national law. In Romania, Directive 2004/35/EC was fully transposed by means of Government Emergency Ordinance No. 68/2007[7] on environmental liability with reference to the prevention and repair of environmental damage, which has been approved by means of Law 19/2008[8].

The "polluter pays" principle is enshrined in the national legislation under art. 3 e) of G.E.O. 195/2005[9] on environmental protection, being a principle underlying both this enactment and other enactments in the field of environmental protection. The principle finds its applicability in art. 94 of G.E.O. 195/2005[10] on environmental protection, which provides for the obligation of both natural persons and legal entities to protect the environment, being obliged to bear the cost of repairing the damage and restoring the conditions prior to their occurrence.

In special laws, the principle shows the need to develop an appropriate legislative and economic framework, so that the costs of reducing pollution are borne by their producer. In G.D. 731/2004 on the approval of the National Strategy for the protection of the atmosphere, it is shown that "the polluter pays principle establishes the need to create an appropriate legislative and economic framework, so that costs for reducing emissions are borne by their generator. The responsible for deterioration of the quality of the atmosphere must pay in accordance with the seriousness of the effects produced[11]".

3. Environmental liability under the ' polluter pays ' principle;

This principle of environmental law shows that the polluter is obliged to bear the costs of achieving both pollution prevention measures and possible damage caused by pollution. A policy of economic operators to reduce pollution prevention costs, including by not adapting to the latest available technologies, sooner or later will lead to higher costs, in order to combat the negative effects pollution can have on human health or the environment, in its entirety. In order to avoid such situations and to "correct" the costs that the economic operator will have, there is the "polluter pays" principle, which, in the environmental law, also has the role of imputing the cost of environmental attainment to the polluter. In the doctrine,[12] it is shown that "all expenditure in relation to the protection of the natural environment is, by default, an expense leading to the creation of profit. It will always be the economy that will bear the consequences in the short term, and additional expenditure will be based on export prices." In our view, the main purpose of applying this environmental principle is to educate economic operators so that starting from the "polluter pays" we can reach the idea of the polluter does not pollute.

The economic justification for the "polluter pays" principle is that the failure to carry out expenditure, prevention and environmental protection in time will entail high costs of the economic operator, consisting in combating the negative effects occurred. All costs of combating negative effects on the environment will have to be covered by the polluter, and the only option is to reflect these costs in the price of the services offered. If the price of the services offered increases with these additional costs, there is a possibility that the economic operator will suffer a significant decrease in activity, as a result of the high price that can even lead to the blocking of the entire activity and, not lastly, to the entry into insolvency, followed by its deregistration.

In the literature,[13] it is shown that "broadly, the principle seeks to cast to the polluter the load of the social cost of the pollution it causes. This implies the training of a mechanism of responsibility for ecological damage, covering all the effects of pollution, both those produced in relation to goods and persons, and those produced on the environment, as such." The same authors show that "in a narrower sense, it requires the polluters to bear only the cost of anti-polluting measures and cleaning." The polluter pays principle is nothing but an attempt to raise awareness of economic operators that if there are environmental pollutions caused by them, they will have to bear the consequences arising therefrom. On the other hand, the principle seeks to educate the economic operator, with a view to its use of the latest generation of available technologies, which have the lowest degree of pollution. The principle takes into account the liability of polluters, based on the idea of risk and guarantee for the actions perpetrated.

The application of the polluter pays principle may not be solitary, because this would lead to the situation where any economic operator would pay an amount of money as a pollution tax, which could be perceived as a payment to be able to pollute. This principle must be read in conjunction with the principle of prevention and the prohibition of pollution, in order not to lead to inadmissible consequences such as "I pay, therefore I can pollute[14]". We believe that the principle has been adopted so that the party responsible for the production of the pollution can be held accountable and pay environmental damage.

This principle of environmental law is the basis of Directive 2004/35/EC on civil liability in relation to the prevention and remediation of environmental damage. This Directive 2004/35/EC provides that the fundamental principle must be that an economic operator, whose activity has caused an environmental damage, must be financially liable. The aforementioned directive puts particular emphasis on preventive and environmental remedies, because most of the time the ecological destruction can have irreversible effects. This directive was transposed into national law by Emergency Ordinance No. 68/2007[15] on environmental liability in relation to the prevention and repair of environmental damage.

Emergency Ordinance No. 68/2007[16] on environmental liability shows, under article 1 that "it establishes the regulatory framework for environmental liability, based on the polluter pays principle, for the prevention and remediation of environmental damage". This regulation provides a guarantee in addition to the observance, prevention and repair of damage that professional activities may have on the environment. The environmental liability provided for by G.E.O. no. 68/2007 shall apply to all natural persons or legal entities (called operators) who bring harm to the environment, irrespective of the type of professional activity they carry out.

Environmental liability is not a classic tort liability, in the sense that the one who will pollute will be obliged to cover the damage caused, but the operator will also be obliged to take all measures to ensure that the work carried out by it does not pollute or if pollutes, it falls within the limits of the law, and the technology used is one that complies with the environmental law. On the other hand, the operator will have to take all measures required so that, if a disaster occurs, it may be able to remedy it. According to the provisions of the environmental law[17], the one carrying out a risk-incurring activity has no financial guarantee obligation before the action is started, the only activities subject to this regime being those of mining and waste storage.

4. Application of the ' polluter pays ' principle to companies in insolvency;

As regards commercial companies in insolvency, the provisions of G.E.O. no. 195/2005 on environmental protection anticipate their eventual disappearance and show that environmental obligations must be met with priority in dissolution and liquidation procedures or upon termination of the activity[18]. By means of this provision, the legislature attempted to deter the transfer of activities from one subject of law to another, without the fulfilment of environmental obligations. However, the provisions of G.E.O. no. 195/2005 on environmental protection, as well as those of G.E.O. no. 68/2007 on environmental liability are not correlated with the insolvency law, as such, the basic "polluter pays" principle cannot be applied with much success in such procedures. The "polluter pays" principle in cases of insolvency does not have the levers necessary to be able to give maximum efficiency to the provisions of G.E.O. 68/2007 on environmental liability, although the legislator has been thinking of further laws aiming at the companies in insolvency, but this has never happened. According to art. 33 of G.E.O. 68/2007[19] on environmental liability, the obligations incumbent on companies in insolvency should have been established by a government decision, within 12 months from the entry into force of said order, a decision that has not been issued until now. The application of the "polluter pays" principle in light of the provisions of G.E.O. 68/2007 on environmental liability shall be made through the environmental agency, which is assisted by the Environmental Guard and who also has the role of notice entity. The economic operator that has caused damage to the environment has several obligations set out in G.E.O. 68/2007 on environmental liability: to notify the competent authorities, in this case the Environmental Guard, of any environmental hazard; The operator must take all preventive measures necessary to combat environmental damage; The operator is required to take all necessary measures to remedy the environmental damage. Failure to fulfil these obligations may entail contravention sanctions, but also the employment of criminal liability. The environmental agency may carry out preventive measures and repairs at its own expense, under art. 11 d of G.E.O. 68/2007[20] on environmental liability, and the amount spent will be recovered from the economic operator that had the obligation to execute them. In order to recover such expenditure under art. 29 of G.E.O. 68/2007[21] on environmental liability, the environmental agency may establish a statutory mortgage on the immovable property of the Operator. It is thus shown based on these provisions that the competent bodies do not have an obligation to intervene if the polluter operator does not, but they can do so, if the necessary amount is allocated by means of decision of the Government from the intervention fund.

[18] G.E.O. no. 195/2005 on environmental protection published in Official Journal no. 1196 of December 30th, 2005, under art. 10 paragraph 4, states that "the fulfilment of environmental obligations is of priority, in the case of procedures for: dissolution, followed by liquidation, bankruptcy, termination of activity"

As far as environmental liability is concerned, under the "polluter pays" principle, we believe that there is a discrepancy between environmental and insolvency provisions. A first issue in applying the principle for commercial companies in insolvency would be to enrol the debtor in the statement of affairs. Environmental obligations are usually obligations that entail actions, and the provisions of the Insolvency Act do not entitle the creditor to enter such an obligation in the statement of affairs. The practice shows that such obligations are not placed in the statement of affairs, although the environmental remediation value may represent an important amount of money from the total debts of the debtor company, as a result of the risk assessment[22]. We believe that the best option is for the environmental agency to have acted at its own expense, in order to remedy environmental damage before the insolvency proceedings are opened, because in this case there would be a quantified value of environmental obligations which were not executed by the debtor, and as such they could be entered in the statement of affairs. If there is also a legal mortgage prior to the opening of insolvency proceedings, then the claim to be entered in the statement of affairs shall receive orders of priority in future distributions, within the procedure. If there is no such guarantee, the environmental agency will be entered with the amount requested in the statement of affairs, with the order of priority of a budget claim, so that in order to extinguish it, distributions in insolvency proceedings must first provide for the payment of guaranteed creditors, and only thereafter the budgetary ones.

If the environmental agency intervenes, in order to carry out the necessary remedies for the environmental damage done by the operator, after the opening of the procedure, the amounts resulting from this operation may be classified under art. 102 paragraph 6[23] of Law 85/2014 on insolvency, as being current claims to be paid, in accordance with the resulting documents, which are not required to be entered in the statement of affairs of the debtor. On the other hand, these greening operations could be regarded as representing a financing during the insolvency proceedings, which would entail the prior approval of creditors, as the greening operation is not considered a current activity of the general debtor. According to the [19] G.E.O. No. 68/2007 on environmental liability published in Official Journal no. 466 of June 29th, 2007 provides under article 33 paragraph 1 that "defining forms of financial collateral, including insolvency cases, and measures to develop the supply of financial instruments on environmental liability, enabling operators to use them for the purpose of guaranteeing their obligations under this Emergency Ordinance, shall be determined by means of decision of the Government, based on a proposal from the central public authorities for the protection of the environment and for public finances, within 12 months from the entry into force of this emergency ordinance "

[20] G.E.O. No. 68/2007 on environmental liability published in Official Journal no. 466 of June 29th, 2007 under art. 11 d) shows that "at any time the County Agency for Environmental Protection has the possibility to exercise the following duties: ... d) take the necessary preventive measures "

[21] G.E.O. No. 68/2007 on environmental liability published in Official Journal no. 466 of June 29th, 2007, under art. 29 paragraph 2 states that "in order to ensure the recovery of the costs incurred, the Environmental Protection Agency establishes a mortgage on the immovable property of the operator and a precautionary garnishment, in accordance with the legal rules in force"

[22] G.E.O. No. 195/2005 on environmental protection published in Official Journal no. 1196 of December 30th, 2005 provides under article 2 paragraph 32, the following: "risk assessment – this is the work drawn up by a natural person or legal entity who has this right, according to the law, which carries out the analysis of the probability and seriousness of the main components of the environmental impact and establishes the need for preventive, intervention and/or remedial measures " provisions of art. 87 of Law 85/2014[24] on insolvency proceedings, operations exceeding the company's current activity will have to be approved by the creditors' committee, at the request of the special administrator or judicial administrator, as the case may be. It is hard to believe that creditors of the debtor who are also part of the creditors' committee will agree, from any sums, which are to be distributed in the procedure, to pay the costs of greening. Because, on one hand, G.E.O. 195/2005 on environmental protection obliges the operator to pay its environmental obligations, and on the other hand, Law 85/2014 on insolvency proceedings does not provide for a priority or exception from payment related to these environmental obligations, so we can think that there are situations in which these obligations will not be complied with. We believe that we can be faced with the situation where the polluter pays principle cannot be applied, as the law provides for the pollutant operator to be held accountable by the judicial administrator/liquidator under the provisions of Law 85/2014 on insolvency proceedings.

In the fortunate event, in which the environmental agency intervenes for greening before the insolvency proceedings are opened and enters the statement of affairs of the debtor with the corresponding amounts, and these are not paid in the procedure, they may only be recovered in the situation in which persons have been identified as leading to the insolvency of the debtor, and they are also subject to liability for the not recovered liability, by means of an action filed under art. 169 of Law 85/2014[25] on insolvency proceedings.

The application of the polluter pays principle with reference to the liability of judicial administrators/judicial liquidators for unhonoured environmental obligations by the debtor company, the Statute for organising and exercising the profession of insolvency practitioner[26], allows, by means of art. 117 paragraph 2 e)[27] the insolvency practitioner to ask for funds necessary for any greenings from the National Union of Practitioners in Insolvency proceedings Fund. However, the insolvency practitioner who will request and receive these necessary funds will be obliged, under art. 116 paragraph 4 of the Statute on the organisation and exercise of the profession of insolvency practitioner[28], to ensure that these funds are returned immediately after the assets have been capitalised. If the assets, which are to be redeemed, do not cover such expenditure advanced by the Union, the judicial administrator or the liquidator, as the case may be, shall bear the amounts not covered by means of personal property, making it difficult to reach the decision to request these funds necessary for greening.

5. Proposals to amend the legal provisions;

The problems identified concerning the application of the "polluter pays" principle in what concerns economic operators under the Insolvency act lead to the ever-growing necessity to amend the legal provisions, but also to harmonise the provisions of the two areas of law. The necessity comes as a result of both the country's economic development and the very large number of insolvencies that UNPIR practitioners manage.

Firstly for the payment of environmental obligations, Law 85/2014 on insolvency proceedings should provide that these represent a priority, either by assimilating them to conservation costs and the administration of goods, as provided for by article 161 paragraph [29]1 of the law or by means of a distinct [24] Law 85/2014 on insolvency and insolvency prevention procedures published in Official Journal no. 466 of June 25th, 2014, under art. 87 states that "during the observation period, the debtor will be able to continue carrying out the current activities and make payments to known creditors, who fall under the usual conditions for the exercise of the current activity, as follows: Under the supervision of the judicial administrator, if the debtor has made a request for reorganisation, within the meaning of art. 67 paragraph 1 g), and the right of administration has not been lifted; b) under the direction of the judicial administrator, if the debtor has been excluded from the right to administer it. 2. Documents, transactions and payments exceeding the conditions laid down under paragraph (1) may be authorised in the exercise of supervisory tasks by the judicial administrator; the latter shall convene a meeting of the creditors' committee for approval of the request of the special administrator, within a maximum of 5 days from the date of its receipt. If a particular operation exceeding the current activity is recommended by the judicial administrator and the proposal is approved by the creditors' committee, it will be met by the special manager. If the activity is run by the judicial administrator, the operation will be carried out by the latter, with the approval of the creditors' committee, without the request of the special administrator.

Fees, stamps or any other expenditure relating to the procedure established by this title, including the expenditure necessary for the conservation and administration of assets of the wording, in the same article, granting these priority in terms of potential distributions.

Second, when the situation requires the application of Law 85/2014 on insolvency proceedings, it must provide for an exception to the rule of approval by the creditors' committee, in terms of the necessary remedial operations and the payment of the damage produced. This modification must also be made based on the long duration of the convening and approval of any operations necessary for the remedy. If the polluter would immediately pay the damage caused, and also the measures to prevent and extend them, one could prevent in this manner other negative effects that the passage of time might have on the environment in which the operator activated.

OWNERSHIP TRANSFER AND SELLER'S OBLIGATIONS. LOOKING FOR UNITY IN SALE AGREEMENT REGULATION

Dan VELICU[*]

Abstract

The Renaissance intelectuals, mostly Italians, considered Rome the climax of the European civilization and from this assumption it seemed self - evident that the Roman law was superior to any kind of regulation of other people in the Middle Ages. Later, for almost two centuries as a consequence, in a kind of inertia, in European civil law, Roman law has been taken as the sole model in order to elaborate modern civil codes. Main legal institutions belonging to Roman law were deeply analysed and their sense were strongly disputed in the frame of the European universities.

If the Roman legal structure was considered a superior one to the Middle Ages peripheral usages, in the frame of the sale agreement and other contracts as well, it has looked normal that regulating seller's obligations or ownership transfer to take place under the shadow of the Roman law.

However, the authors of the modern civil codes have ignored the fact that Roman law had had a long evolution and sometimes contradictory or at least difficult to assess; unfortunately, they avoided that the rules designed by them will have to be analyzed beyond the perception of Roman law.

This article aims to briefly highlight the evolution of Roman law in order to see if the full takeover of some of its institutions is justified today. We shall try also to point out the possible way to reconcile what now it seems to be irreconcilable in the sphere of European systems influenced by ius civile.

1. Introduction

Undoubtedly, the sale agreement is the most complex and also the most used contract in order to exchange of goods in modern society.

Despite its obvious importance, its international regulation has been permanently obstructed even the level of international exchanges has increased strongly within the frame of the latest waves of globalization.

It is notorious that after many attempts before and after the World War Two, under the tutelage of the United Nations Organization, on 11 April 1980 it was signed in Vienna the Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CSIG) which entered into force as a multilateral treaty on 1 January 1988, after being ratified by 11 countries.

On the other hand, the EU grounded from the first treaty on the "four freedoms". There is no need to explain that at least the free movement of goods needs a uniform regulation.

Some may say that the CSIG could be a modern regulation which would foster the economic exchanges between EU states but also between EU states and other states. However, even most of the European states ratified it in the 1990s, the parties – having expressly this option – prefer many times to avoid the application of the CSIG to their agreement.

A new attempt to create a uniform sales law was the "Proposal for a Regulation on a Common European Sales Law"[1].

Unfortunately, in some main points this project seems to be rather a compromise between great legal systems than coherent regulation.

At this moment we risk being in a real paradox – if the project would be adopted – and to have three regulations: the international, the European and the national one.

More, finding a compromise solution will lead to extensive, difficult, and perhaps contradictory regulation.

Even the sale agreement is the most complex contract its regulation is far from being similar in EU states.

Unfortunately – as we shall point to –, the successive codifications tried to solve old issues, but these only leaded to diversified rules.

The scientific research was focused mainly on the Roman law even this law was not codified until Justinian.

This paper tries to discuss some key issues of the sale regulation by focusing on the social and economic interaction between the parties rather than reinterpreting the Roman law.

2.The Modern Sale Regulation. Unsolved Issues

2.1. The Contradictions of the Code civil

As we know, at the climax of his power, Napoleon Bonaparte, first consul of the French republic, enacted the civil code which had to be the main and general regulation of the contracts. The code was applied not only in the territory of the actual France, but in all the territories annexed by the republic, and later the Napoleonic Empire. It is not hazardous to affirm that in that decades there was an uniform civil law – at least in Western Europe – compared to the present diversity.

Returning to our topic, we remember that dealing with the sale[2] the code recognised the effects of the mere consent of the parties in art.1583: "Elle est parfaite entre les parties, et la propriété est acquise de droit à l'acheteur à l'égard du vendeur, dès qu'on est convenu de la chose et du prix, quoique la chose n'ait pas encore été livrée ni le prix payé".

According to the art. 1603 of the French Civil Code, the seller has two distinct obligations: that of delivering and that of warranting the thing which he sales [Il a deux obligations principales, celle de délivrer et celle de garantir la chose qu'il vend].

Delivery was defined by the art.1604 as the transferring the thing sold into "the power and possession of the purchaser" [la délivrance est le transport de la chose vendue en la puissance et possession de l'acheteur] meanwhile the warranty regulated by art.1625 took into account "the peaceable possession of the thing sold" and the absence of defects [la garantie que le vendeur doit à l'acquéreur a deux objets : le premier est la possession paisible de la chose vendue ; le second, les défauts cachés de cette chose ou les vices rédhibitoires].

However, despite the apparent accuracy there are some aspects which can be considered as contradictory.

Even the mere consent of the parties generated the ownership transfer on immoveable property a law of the First Republic[3] did not permit this transfer if the parties had not registered the agreement. The rule was stated again by a law as of 23 march 1855[4]. In other words, the seller could sign agreements with two different buyers, and if the second would be the first to register his agreement he would be recognised as the owner. In that specific case, the question raised would be: Which is the effect of the art.1583? And what does the second buyer register if the ownership was transferred according to the same article? For sure, there is no possibility to generate two ownership transfers.

Secondly, if the mere consent of the parties generated the ownership transfer why the seller has to warrant the buyer? If the seller was not the owner when the agreement was concluded he had nothing to transfer so he will be liable only for breaking his promise. If the seller was the owner why he has to warrant for his successive factum. In fact, the buyer became the new owner. More, if the thing had occult defects did the agreement generate effects? It's obviously that a defect good was not that the buyer wanted so the ownership transfer had no ground.

2.2. From Unity to Diversity

The regulation promoted by the Code civil was received literally by some civil codes of the nineteenth century. E.g. the rules we observed above were maintained in the civil code of new Italian Kingdom entered into force in 1865[5].

Despite this trend, some French authors did not agree with concept promoted by the code. Even they admitted the existence of a warranty against eviction, referring to the article 1641 they sustained that in fact there was no warranty, but a simple liability of the seller[6].

In other states, the rules were changed without modifying the sale mechanism as it was provided by the Code civil. For instance, the authors of the Romanian civil code from 1864 went further and modified the definition of the sale. According to the art. 1294, the sale supposed the ownership transfer [vânzarea este o convenţie prin care două părţi se obligă între sine, una a transmite celeilalte proprietatea unui lucru şi aceasta a plăti celei dintâi preţul lui].

More, the art.1603 of the Code civil was modified so the art.1313 of the Romanian Code did not retain the notion of warranty. In fact, on one hand, the seller had to deliver the thing, and on other hand, he is liable for it [vânzătorul are două obligaţii principale, a preda lucrul şi a răspunde de dânsul]. In other words, they extended the observations of Aubry and Rau to both warranties.

Obviously, this liability which emerged in case of eviction or for occult defects was conceived in a similar way to the warranties regulated by the Code civil[7].

The Spanish civil code – enacted in 1889 – maintained the traditional definition of the sale in art. 1445: "Por el contrato de compra y venta uno de los contratantes se obliga a entregar una cosa determinada y el otro a pagar por ella un precio cierto, en dinero o signo que lo represente".

Despite this, its authors removed also the notion of warranty. The art.1461 stated that "el vendedor está obligado a la entrega y saneamiento de la cosa objeto de la venta" while according to art.1474 "en virtud del saneamiento a que se refiere el artículo 1.461, el vendedor responderá al comprador:

- De la posesión legal y pacífica de la cosa vendida.
- De los vicios o defectos ocultos que tuviere".

The next European codifications oscillated between traditional views and innovation. On one hand, the German civil code – Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch (BGB) – did not permit the ownership transfer by mere consent, but imposed to the seller two obligation considered essential: to deliver the thing and to transfer the ownership to the buyer (§433).

The idea of a warranty was mentioned also (e.g.§459).

On the other hand, the codice civile – enacted in 1942 – which was supposed to modernize the civil and commercial regulation maintained the sellers's warranties even the definition of the sale was improved so art. 1470 stated that "la vendita è il contratto che ha per oggetto il trasferimento della proprietà di una cosa o il trasferimento di un altro diritto verso il corrispettivo di un prezzo".

Therefore, according to art. 1476 "le obbligazioni principali del venditore sono:

1. quella di consegnare la cosa al compratore;
2. quella di fargli acquistare la proprietà della cosa o il diritto, se l'acquisto non è effetto immediato del contratto;
3. quella di garantire il compratore dall'evizione e dai vizi della cosa".

3. Returning to the Roman Law

The Napoleonic Code was often marked by the Roman law, whose study contributed essentially to the foundation of the Western medieval universities.

For this reason, many times the nineteenth century commentators felt compelled to resort to the study of the Roman law in order to understand better the reasons beyond the rules that they tried to interpret in the modern age.

We shall do the same thing even compared to the medieval scholars we have some hesitations in considering the Roman law as a strong and mandatory influential source of private law given the fact that the Roman law suffered many transformations between different ages and because it was probably altered by the contacts with numerous different cultures exactly at the when its main concepts were definitized.

As we all know it was generally admitted by the scholars that emptio venditio (the Roman sale) was possible under three forms: mancipatio, in jure cessio and traditio. The first two were formal institutions of the ius civile[8] while the latter was part of the ius gentium.

Learning exactly the content of the seller's obligation has been for long time a complex issue in the studies of emptio venditio. It was traditionally held that the Roman sale had no translative effect but to generate obligations[9].

The first two forms, the mancipatio and in jure cessio decayed in practice while traditio became the most used form for it was easier (by vacuum possessionem tradere) than the others; it was accessible even to the people which had not the Roman citizenship, it permitted to transfer a Roman goods and the seller had not a duty of dare[10].

A great impediment in this research was that the sources used by scholars have had a dual and contradictory nature many times[11].

Despite these features, the traditional interpretation of the Roman sources was that the vendor does not transfer the dominium or the ownership but "the peaceable possession of the thing sold". According to the definition provided by the art.1582 of the French "la vente est une convention par laquelle l'un s'oblige à livrer une chose, et l'autre à la payer" and as we have noted earlier "la délivrance est le transport de la chose vendue en la puissance et possession de l'acheteur".

Therefore, both articles made us think that the authors of the civil code were outlining the modern sale agreement as it was perceived by the medieval and renaissance Roman law commentators.

In other words, the vendor is obliged to possessionem tradere on one hand, and on other hand the same has to assure the habere licere intended as assuring a peaceful possession[12].

If the traditional interpretation of the emptio venditio was leading to an opposition between the sale as contract and the ownership transfer[13], the contradictoriality seemed to be harmful in the regulation provided by the French code.

On one hand, the sale agreement generated the seller s duty to deliver the thing sold, and on the other hand the same regulation (art. 1583) admitted that the ownership is transferred automatically by mere consent : Elle est parfaite entre les parties, et la propriété est acquise de droit à l'acheteur à l'égard du vendeur, dès qu'on est convenu de la chose et du prix, quoique la chose n'ait pas encore été livrée ni le prix payé.

Therefore, despite the sale definition and the enumeration of the seller s substantial obligations the ownership transfer occurred by mere consent (of course, we exclude the sale which concerns genera and required individualization).

Recent studies on the emptio venditio have argued that the sources belonging to the classic age must be interpreted again. The revisionist research has sustained that there is a link between the emptio venditio and the alienatio[14]. In fact, through the habere licere, the ancient formalism was transcended, and by habere the ownership transfer occurred[15].

4. Finding a solution

Unfortunately, reinterpreting the Roman law is not the solution to the key issues we have mentioned above.

The history indicated us that the diversity was created by the different interpretation of various scholars which were for sure romanists.

It could be better, in our opinion, to focus on the social and economic interaction between the parties rather than reinterpreting the Roman law.

At the end, the sale agreement has as main purpose to transfer the ownership and the good to the buyer. In fact, the latter wants to enter into the possession of the thing in order to use it and to be owner in order to have the exclusivity on the thing or to make capital out of the goods.

Therefore, the German regulation could be criticised because it states two essential obligations (§433). If the sale agreement generates the duty to transfer ownership only by traditio or by registration why the delivery must be considered an essential obligation?

If the sold object is moveable the ownership transfer is generated only by traditio; according to the §929 Einigung und Übergabe "zur Übertragung des Eigentums an einer beweglichen Sache ist erforderlich, dass der Eigentümer die Sache dem Erwerber übergibt und beide darüber einig sind, dass das Eigentum übergehen soll. Ist der Erwerber im Besitz der Sache, so genügt die Einigung über den Übergang des Eigentums".

If the goods is an immoveable the ownership passes from seller to buyer or by registering the (second) agreement; according to the §873 Erwerb durch Einigung und Eintragung:

(1) Zur Übertragung des Eigentums an einem Grundstück, zur Belastung eines Grundstücks mit einem Recht sowie zur Übertragung oder Belastung eines solchen Rechts ist die Einigung des Berechtigten und des anderen Teils über den Eintritt der Rechtsänderung und die Eintragung der Rechtsänderung in das Grundbuch erforderlich, soweit nicht das Gesetz ein anderes vorschreibt.

(2) Vor der Eintragung sind die Beteiligten an die Einigung nur gebunden, wenn die Erklärungen notariell beurkundet oder vor dem Grundbuchamt abgegeben oder bei diesem eingereicht sind oder wenn der Berechtigte dem anderen Teil eine den Vorschriften der Grundbuchordnung entsprechende Eintragungsbewilligung ausgehändigt hat.

Practically, the buyer became owner when the thing was delivered or registered and both need another agreement.

If the seller was not the owner or the thing had defects that means the agreement did not produce legal effects, but the seller is liable for breaking the contract.

In a closer sense to Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch –I would say softly –, according to art.184 from the Swiss Code of obligations "La vente est un contrat par lequel le vendeur s'oblige à livrer la chose vendue à l'acheteur et à lui en transférer la propriété, moyennant un prix que l'acheteur s'engage à lui payer".

Sauf usage ou convention contraire, le vendeur et l'acheteur sont tenus de s'acquitter simultanément de leurs obligations.

The ownership trasnfer is regulated by the Swiss Civil Code which state that "la mise en possession est nécessaire pour le transfert de la propriété mobilière" (art. 714).

"L'inscription au registre foncier est nécessaire pour l'acquisition de la propriété foncière" (art.656). In both cases, there is no need of a new agreement.

The sale agreement is the titulus adquirendi while the delivery or the registration is the modus adquirendi.

The French regulation could be criticised because it permits an ownership transfer even the seller had in fact transferred the ownership to the first buyer who did not register it or did not take into possession the thing.

5. Conclusions

It seems to me that a logical reconstruction of the sale regulation can be develop from these considerations.

Therefore, it would be better to renounce to the ownership transfer by consensus principle as the BGB did, just because it protects better the third party or the first buyer.

Secondly, if after the transfer the court declares another person as the original owner that means the agreement was broken by the seller whose duty was to transfer the ownership so he will be liable and he will return the price and pay damages to the buyer.

If the thing is defected in order "to restructure" the agreement – saneamiento in the Spanish code – the seller is liable to repair or to replace the good – if possible and agreed by the buyer – or to return the price and to pay damages to the buyer.

SUBSTITUTION OF PARENTAL CONSENT WHEN MINORS TRAVEL ABROAD: SANCTION OR REMEDY?

Anca Magda VOICULESCU[*]

Abstract

Decisions on establishment of minors' place of residence fall within the sphere of application of joint parental authority, along with decisions concerning the form of education and professional training, complex medical treatments and surgical interventions, respectively administration of minors' property.

As a consequence, the principle is that common parental consent is necessary when minors leave national territory in order to travel abroad. In case of parental disagreement, the case-law established a specific line to be followed in courts: substitution of parental consent.

The scope of the present article is to analyze from a double perspective (theoretical and practical) the main issues to be considered in solving cases of this type, as well as the implications of judgements pronounced in this area on other interconnected aspects concerning both parents and the child.

The objectives of this study are to examine relevant procedural and substantial matters as they derive from the experience so far and propose solutions based on the vector principle of best interests of minors (e.g., the urgent procedure in Romanian Procedural Civil Code called "ordonanţă preşedinţială" is admissible, or the procedural path to follow should be the general procedure on the merits of the case; substitution of parental consent should be specific, or also accepted in a general manner, with no reference to the period and location of the minor abroad, etc.).

At the same time, the study will ponder on implications of judgements substituting parental consent related to other institutions in the sphere of national law (e.g., common or exclusive parental authority) or international law (incidence of 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil aspects of international child abduction).

Keywords: common parental authority, joint parental decisions, parental disagreement, substitution of parental consent, international child abduction

1. Introduction

The sphere of joint parental authority applies to important decisions regarding children (including decisions on establishment of minors' place of residence) which request consent of both parents.

Exercise of the right to free movement in the European Union and, more broadly, the possibility to move freely throughout the world has led to the emergence of a new type of litigations in the field of family law, in case parents disagree on establishment of minors' place of residence, either for temporary periods (going abroad for tourism purposes) or definitive (relocation to another country).

The present study aims to analyze in both procedural and substantive terms the remedy offered by jurisprudence for this situation, namely substitution of parental consent (more precisely, substitution of consent of only one of the parents, namely the oppozant parent).

The theme under consideration is important both from theoretical and, above all, practical point of view, since case-law is not always unanimous, and practical situations raising this issue are very frequent. On the other hand, legal literature in this particular field is practically non-existent.

In this context, the study will concentrate on identifying the procedural means available in domestic law, the main substantive issues raised by this type of litigations, as well as the implications of judgments pronounced in this matter on other institutions of domestic law (parental authority) or international law (international abduction of minors).

2.1. The framework

Article 483 of Romanian Civil Code ("Parental Authority") defines parental authority in terms of general provisions as follows: "(1) Parental authority is the set of rights and obligations concerning both person and property of the child which belong equally to both parents." (our underline)

Law no. 272/2004[1] entails special prescriptions, to be corroborated to the general provisions abovementioned.

With relevance for the subject in discussion, Article 36 of Law no. 272/2004 provides: "(1) Both parents are responsible for raising their children. (2)

[1] Law no. 272/2004 concerning protection and promotion of children's rights, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 557/23.06.2004, successively modified and lastly republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 159/05.03.2014.

Exercise of parental rights and obligations must be in the best interests of the child and ensure material and spiritual welfare for the child, especially by providing care, maintaining personal relationships and providing growth, education and maintenance, as well as legal representation and administration of patrimony". (our underline)

The general rule in case of divorce is that parental authority is jointly exercised, according to Article 397 of Romanian Civil Code: "After divorce, parental authority rests jointly to both parents, unless the court decides otherwise"[2].

It can be concluded from legal provisions presented that parental authority is generally jointly exercised and includes rights and obligations of both parents, concerning the person and also the property of the child. In all cases, exercising parental authority must respect the vector principle of the best interests of the child[3].

In this context, it is of significant importance to identify decisions on which parental agreement is necessary (substitution parental consent intervenes but in case an agreement of both parents is necessary and it cannot be reached).

To this respect, Article 36 Para 3 of Law no. 272/2004 (actual form) [4] provides that: "If both parents exercise parental authority, but do not live together, important decisions, such as type of education or training, complex medical treatment or surgery, residence of the child or administration of property shall be taken only with the consent of both parents." (our underline)

Juridical literature explained that major decisions are to be distinguished from day-to-day decisions[5] (routine decisions) taking into account their importance and their nonrepetitive nature[6]; also, major decisions are to be considered those which "exceed daily needs of the child"[7].

Decisions on establishing minors' place of residence (which encompass the situations when minors travel abroad) are therefore important decisions requesting common parental consent.

For this particular situation, Article 31 Para 3 of Law no. 248/2005[8] provides that: "If there are disagreements between parents regarding the expression of agreement or it is impossible for one of the parents to express his or her will, the departure of minors from Romania shall be allowed only after the disputes have been resolved by the court in accordance with the law, except for situations provided in Article 30 Paras (2) and (3)"[9].

The aforementioned legal prescription is in fact a particular application in a specific matter (departure of minors abroad) of Article 486 of the Romanian Civil Code, which provides in general terms that in case of disagreement of parents on decisions concerning the child and belonging to the sphere of parental authority: "(…) the guardianship court, after hearing their parents and taking into account the conclusions of the report on the psychosocial inquiry, decides according to the best interests of the child."

Nevertheless, Article 486 offers only a solution in principle (the court decides according to the best interests of the child), without explaining in concreto the juridical mechanism.

It was therefore left for the case-law to conceive this mechanism, which was contrued as „parental consent substitution"[10] and explained as follows: "The mechanism of consent is regulated precisely to ensure that a decision is made when parents cannot reach an agreement, but also to prevent an abusive refusal by one of the parents, all in order to ensure that the minor's best interests are respected."[11]

2.2. Specific situations when (common) parental consent is not necessary

Even in case of joint parental authority, there are situations when coparental consent is not necessary so that minors should travel abroad accompanied by a single parent or another major person.

[2] Exclusive parental authority is conceived by Romanian legislator as an exception. Nevertheless, the case-law tends to seriously analyse each particular case and grant exclusive authority either for objective situations (stipulated by Article 507 of Romanian Civil Code) or subjective situations (provided by Article 398 of Romanian Civil Code and Article 36 Para 7 of Law no. 272/2004).

[3] Per Article 2 Para 6 of Law no. 272/2004: "In determining the best interests of the child, at least the following shall be considered: a) the needs of physical, psychological, educational and health development, security, stability and belonging to a family; b) the child's opinion, depending on the age and degree of maturity; (c) the child's history, particularly with regard to situations of abuse, neglect, exploitation or any other form of violence against the child, as well as the potential risk situations that may occur in the future; d) the capacity of parents or persons to care for the child's growth and care to meet his or her specific needs; e) maintaining personal relationships with persons to whom the child has developed attachment relationships."

[4] The initial form of Law no. 272/2004 prescribed neither which types of decisions were important, nor at least general criteria for evaluation.

[5] For a detailed comparison, A.-M. Voiculescu, Parental authority versus common custody, Lex et Scientia International Journal, no. XXV, vol. 1/2018, published by Nicolae Titulescu University and Foundation of Law and International Relations Niculae Titulescu, Nicolae Titulescu Publishing House, pp. 43 – 44.

[8] Law no. 248/2005 on the regime of the free movement of Romanian citizens abroad, published in the Official Gazzette of Romania no. 682/29.07.2005.

[9] These exceptions will be discussed further on.

[10] „Therefore, substitution of parental consent when making a decision concerning the minor can be interpreted as an exceptional measure, to be taken in the best interests of the child, when parents cannot agree (…) Another interpretation would deprive of effects legal provisions (…) seriously and irremediably affecting the superior interest of the child, thus paving the way for abusive attitudes of one of the parents on the background of the tensions that arose after the divorce." (Bucharest Tribunal - IVth Civil Section, case no. 14285/302/2018, decision no. 4131A pronounced on 05.11.2018, not published).

[11] Bucharest Tribunal - IVth Civil Section, case no. 14285/302/2018, decision no. 4131A pronounced on 05.11.2018, not published, precited.

Subsequent to numerous practical cases which have appeared, when the superior interest of the child was seriously affected by impossibility to make judicial decisions on substitution of parental consent in due time, Romanian legislator decided to modify Law no. 248/2005 and prescribed specific cases when coparental consent/consent of the minor's legal representative is not necessary for minors travelling aboad.

According to Article 30 of Law no. 248/2005:

"(2) In situations provided in paragraph (1) b-d (when the minor travels with a single parent or another major person) it is not necessary the declaration of the parent deprived parental rights or, as the case may be, declared missing according to the law, if the accompanying person proves to this effect, unless both parents are in this situation and the declaration of the minor's legal representative is mandatory".

Also, according to Para 3 of the same Article, the border police bodies allow accompanied minors to travel from Romania abroad:

a) if the attendant justifies the necessity to travel abroad by the fact that the minor needs medical treatment which is not possible on the territory of Romania and in absence of which his or her life or health are seriously threatened, on the condition of presentation of documentary proofs issued or endorsed by Romanian medical authorities, indicating the period and the state or states in which the respective medical treatment is to be granted, even if there is no agreement of both parents, the other parent, the surviving parent or the legal representative;
b) if the attendant demonstrates that the minor is travelling for official studies or competitions by presenting appropriate documents showing the period and state or States in which these studies or competitions are to be conducted, even if there is consent of a single parent.

The situations provided by the law when coparental consent/consent of the minor's legal representative is not necessary can be systematized in two categories, namely related to the parents (deprived of parental rights or declared missing), respectively to the child (medical treatment or official studies or competitions).

For the last situation (concerning the child), it should be noted that decisions on complex medical treatment and education are important decisions, to be taken in consent by both parents.

It is therefore necessary to make a distinction between major decisions on medical treatment and education on the one hand, and major decisions for minors traveling abroad on the other hand (the legislator excluded coparental consent only for the last one)[12].

Moreover, the law clearly indicates that, in case of medical treatment (as detailed in substantial terms by Artcle 30 Para 3 a), there is no need for parental consent at all for the child to go abroad (the minor can leave the country without the consent of both parents, accompanied, for example, by a relative).

2.3. Substitution of parental consent – procedural aspects

The most argued procedural aspect relates to admissibility of the urgent procedure regulated in Romanian Procedural Civil Code[13] as "ordonanţă preşedinţială"[14].

The case-law largely oriented towards acceptance of urgent procedures in cases of parental consent substitution[15]; there were nevertheless situations when these procedures were denied, and parties were instructed to follow the general procedure on the merits of the case.

For reasons to be explained below, we agree to the first opinion.

Article 997 Para 1 of the Romanian Procedural Civil Code enshrines the situations when urgent procedures may be used: "The court, establishing that there is the appearance of law in favor of the plaintiff, will be able to decide provisional measures in urgent cases, in order to maintain a right which would be prejudiced by delay, to prevent imminent and irreparable dammage, as well as to remove the obstacles that would arise in the course of execution."

Starting from this legal basis, juridical literature[16] systhematised conditions to be met in cases of "ordonanţă preşedinţială": urgency, transitoriness, appearance of law in favor of the plaintiff (no analyse on the merits).

We are of the opinion that all these conditions are satisfied in case of substitution of parental consent for minors traveling abroad, and therefore urgent procedures are admissible in this matter.

The urgency relates to the right of the child to free movement[17], which could not be exercised in case of [12] By decision of first instance (Judecătoria Sectorului 5 București, case no. 8875/302/2017, decision no. 9150 pronounced on 19.12.2017, not published), the court decided substitution of mother's consent so that minors could travel in Germany for medical treatment accompanied by their father. No reference was made to the fact that the mother did not agree on the medical treatment itself. Bucharest Tribunal - IV$^{th}$ Civil Section changed this judgement by decision no. 4486A pronounced on 28.11.2018, not published, substituting the consent for medical treatment also.

delay, taking into account the specific circumstances to be detailed further on.

Thus, as a premise situation and in the majority of cases, substitutions of parental consent are requested for limited periods of time and touristic purposes.

On the one hand, a vacation is generally planned for up to 2-3 months before the expected departure date.

On the other hand, a case following the general procedure on the merits cannot be expected to be solved by a definitive judgement apt to be executed eventually by forced execution (first instance and appeal) in the short period of 2-3 months.

In tis context, the only pratical solution which allows the child to exercise the right of free movement is an urgent procedure.

The temporary nature of the measure results from the very limitation in time (substitution of parental consent is generally granted for individual periods during scholar vacations).

Finally, the appearance of law in favour of the plaintiff (which is the most problematic of the conditions, considered sometimes to imply judgement on the merits) has been argued in the sense that the plaintiff, associated to common parental authority, has the right to take decisions concerning the child and ask for the intervention of the court in case of disagreements[18].

Having argued the admissibility of urgent procedures, we further consider that it is not even necessary that an application by means of the urgent procedure should be doubled by an application on the merits.

To this respect, it is obvious that a procedure on the merits cannot be decided by a definitive judgement before the established date of departure and therefore it is often the case that such applications on the merits will finally be rejected as remained without object.

In this context, we consider necessary to make a short refference to Article 920 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code, in correlation to a recent judgement of the European Court for Human Rights (although this case concerns a programme of personal ties, the reasoning of the Court is relevant and should also apply to substitution of parental consent).

Article 920 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code has a specific application limited to the period of divorce trial, and some courts considered it was derogatory from Article 997 of the same Code (although situated in the same Book of the Code, the articles mentioned reside in different Titles[19]).

As a consequence, it was argued that, in case a divorce was pending, only measures expressly and limitedly mentioned in Article 920 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code were allowed, if formulated by using of urgent procedures.

In the recent case Cristian Cătălin Ungureanu[20], the Strasbourg Court held violation of Article 8 of the Convention[21] in view of the fact that the applicant was unable to visit his son during the divorce proceedings (for 3 years and 5 months).

The national court rejected the emergency ordinance by which the applicant requested the establishment of the right of access until the divorce proceedings had been completed.

The denial was argued in the line of reasoning already mentioned, according to which national law did not provide for the right of access during divorce proceedings. Thus, during the divorce trial, courts were allowed to make decisions only in matters strictly indicated by Article 920 (domicile of the child, maintenance allowance, state child allowance and use of the family home), and not other measures falling under Article 997 (even if they were urgent).

Noting that other national courts have admitted similar requests by way of emergency ordinance, the Court essentially sanctioned the insufficient clarity of domestic legislation on this issue and concluded that, as regards the granting of visiting rights during divorce proceedings, Romanian authorities failed to meet their positive obligations arising from Article 8 of the Convention.

2.4. Substitution of parental consent – substantial aspects

Analysis of case-law revealed the existence of some problematic aspects, which will be presented and discussed in the following.

A very frequent situation is represented by applications requiring substitution of parental consent for an indefinite period and non-individualized locations (for example, supplementing sine die the consent for travels in the European Union).

It was decided[22] that "consent of the defender could not be supplemented except for one trip abroad, a journey in respect of which both the date of departure and the date of return were established, the country of destination, the route followed to the State of destination (…) however, the applicant's request does not include the travel data, and the court cannot substitute the consent of the defender for any journey to be made (…) this consent must be requested for each individual journey."[23]

Another common situation concerns relocations of one parent together with the child in another country, generally refused by the other parent and therefore resulting in applications in courts for substitution of parental consent.

Some courts analysed this type of applications according to Article 36 Para 3 of Law no. 272/2004 (important decision requiring parental agreement, doubled by the sanction of substitution in case of abusive refusal).

Other courts[24] took into account Article 497 of Romanian Civil Code ("Change of the child's domicile"), which states: "(1) If it affects the exercise of parental authority or parental rights, the change of the child's domicile, along with the parent with whom he or she resides can only take place with the prior consent of the other parent. (2) In the event of a misunderstanding between parents, the court shall decide the best interests of the child (…)."

It seems that Article 497 of Romanian Civil Code institutes an exception from Article 36 Para 3 of Law no. 272/2004, which qualifies the decision on establishment of minors' place of residence as major and asks for parental agreement in all cases.

Article 497 brings extra nuances, namely that agreement is not always necessary, but "if it affects the exercise of parental authority or parental rights".

Without choosing an excessive formalism with regard to formulation of the judgement (e.g., "disposes substitution of parental consent for change of domicile" versus "admits the request for change of domicile"), we consider that incidence of Article 497 has clearly the consequence of non-admisibility of the urgent procedure.

We argue that analyse of conditions imposed by Article 497 ("if it affects the exercise of parental authority or parental rights") exceeds the "appearance of law" specific to provisional measures and involves analysis of the merits of the case.

Finally, another situation which often appears in parctice is a double request substitution: for issuing the passport of the minor[25] and for traveling abroad with the child.

In this case, the focus transcends from juridical to practical aspects: issuance of minor's passport requires the presence of the child in front of the Service for passports for taking the child's picture.

In practice, there were cases when the child's personal ties programme did not overlap with the programme of the Service for passports, and therefore, after having gained in court the substitution case, the petitioner could not put in practice the judgement (practical inconveniences already mentioned and the refusal of the other parent to allow personal ties outside the framework of the programme).

We consider that, in such cases, the application should also ask for supplementing the personal relashionship programme with one day, necessary for the presence of the child at the Service for passports.

2.5. Implications of judgements substituting parental consent

Decisions for substitution of parental consent for departure of minors from the country may produce multiplied effects, which overcome the sphere of the dispute in which the decision of substitution has been pronounced.

These effects can arise both in connection with domestic law institutions (for example, exercise of joint or exclusive parental authority) and international law[26] (international abduction of children[27]).

2.5.1. Institutions of national law

Repeated decisions on substitution of parental consent[28] denote a pattern of an abusive way of

[23] A similar line of reasoning was adopted by Judecătoria Sectorului 4 București, case no. 30372/4/2017, decision no. 15399 pronounced on 13.12.2017: "(…) the opposition of the defendant regarding the displacement of the minor abroad, at any time and for a period not determined in concrete terms, cannot be presumed to be a manifestation of the abuse of rights (…) substitution of the defendant's consent to the movement of the minor outside the country, anytime and anywhere, equates to deprivation of the parent (…) of parental rights (…)."

[24] Judecătoria Sectorului 1 București, case no. 71299/301/2014, decision no. 7127 pronounced on 21.05.2015, not published; Bucharest Tribunal - IV$^{th}$ Civil Section, case no. 34377/301/2016, decision no. 2683A pronounced on 03.07.2018, not published.

[25] Matters concerning issuing of the passport for a minor are considered to fall in the area of application of the concept of "parental authority" (CJEU, Decision adopted on 21.10.2015, C-215/15, case Gogova v. Iliev). In this case, the child was a Bulgarian national who lived in Italy (where both parents lived separately). When the mother sought to renew the child's Bulgarian passport, the father refused to grant his consent, which was required under Bulgarian law. The Bulgarian Supreme Court made a reference for a preliminary ruling to the CJEU on the issue whether the passport renewal fell within the meaning of "matters of parental responsibility" for the purposes of Article 8 of the Regulation no. 2201/2003 (Council Regulation (EC) no. 2201/2003 concerning Jurisdiction and the Recognition and Enforcement of Judgments in Matrimonial Matters and the Matters of Parental Responsibility, repealing Regulation (EC) no. 1347/2000, published in the Official Journal L338/1, 23 December 2003). The CJEU ruled that the concept of parental responsibility was given a broad definition in the Regulation and that the action in this case was clearly within that definition.

[28] They may concern not only the situation when minors travel abroad, but also other important decisions which come into the sphere of common parental authority.

exercising parental authority on behalf of the parent whose consent was substituted.

In this situation, the case-law considered deciding upon exclusive parental authority on the basis of Article 398 of Romanian Civil Code and Article 36 Para 7 of Law no. 272/2004[29] (which gives the courts possibility to appreciate in subjective situations, depending on circumstances specific to each individual case).

We consider that the situation mentioned is a "serious reason" in the meaning of Article 398 of Romanian Civil Code, related to "risks for the child that would derive from the exercise by that parent of parental authority".

To this effect, it cannot be ignorred that judicial substitution of consent on every important decision obviously implies postponing the timing of the decision making until a final judgement is taken, with the inevitable consequence of affecting the best interests of the child by mere lack of decision in due time.

According to juridical literature30, Article 1628 of German Civil Code prescribes an interesting solution in such situations, namely the court may transfer authority to take that type of decisions to one of the parents.

Romanian juridical system does not have such a legislative solution, and therefore the solution of excusive parental authority offerd by the case-law should be pondered on in situations of repetitive substitution of parental consent.

2.5.2. International institutions

The Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction[31] (the 1980 Hague Convention) is an intergovernmental agreement which aims „to secure the prompt return of children wrongfully removed to or retained in any Contracting State (…)"[32].

The principle is that the court in the state where that child has been removed/retained will order the immediate return of the minor, except for a few situations provided in Article 12 of the Convention (integration of the child into the new environment), Article 13 of the Convention (serious psychological or physical risk to the child in the case of return) and Article 20 of the Convention (the return is not allowed by the fundamental principles of the requested state with regard to the safeguarding of human rights and fundamental freedoms).

For the matter under discussion in this study, Article 12 of the Convention presents significant relevance in the light of the provisions of two paragraphs, according to which: „(1) When a child has been illegally removed or retained (…) and a period of less than one year has elapsed from the moment of removal or retaining (…) the requested authority shall arrange for its immediate return. (2) The judicial or administrative authority, having been notified even after the expiration of the one-year period provided for in the previous paragraph, shall also order the return of the child, unless it is established that the child has integrated into his/her new environment". (our underline)

The period of 1 year to which the Convention makes reference is of high importance as to juridical consequences: if less than 1 year has elapsed from the moment of removal or retaining of the child in another state, the court shall decide immediate return of the child; on the contrary, if more than 1 year has elapsed, the court may appreciate upon integration of the child in the new environment and reject the return in the state of origin.

Taking into account the aspects presented above, we consider that substitution of parental consent so that minors should travel abroad for periods that exceed 1 year might lead to an interpretation of integration of the minor into the new environment and thus indirectly open the possibility to change the child's domicile in another country by a rather simple procedure[33].

This is another reason why we consider important to make the distinction between substitution of parental consent for touristic travels outside the country and the change of domicile of the child abroad.

It is also the reason why we do not agree to some (few) situations when the case-law decided to substitution of parental consent for periods of even 3 years[34].

This type of judgements was probably pronounced starting from a provision of national law

[29] Article 398 of Romanian Civil Code („Exclusive parental authority"): "For serious reasons, given the interests of the child, the court decides that parental authority is exercised exclusively by a parent. (2) The other parent retains the right to watch over the child's care and education and the right to consent to adoption" (our underline). Article 36 Para 7 of Law no. 272/2004 exemplifies the subjective reasons mentioned by Civil Code in a general manner: "There are considered serious grounds for the court to decide that parental authority is exercised by a single parent alcoholism, mental illness, drug addiction of the other parent, violence against children or against the other parent, convictions for human trafficking, drug trafficking, crimes concerning sexual life, crimes of violence, as well as any other reason related to risks for the child that would derive from the exercise by that parent of parental authority." [31] Concluded at The Hague on October 25, 1980, during the 14th Session of the Hague Conference on Private International Law, which entered into force on 01 December, 1983.

[32] Article 1 of 1980 Hague Convention.

[33] If formulated by way of an emergency ordinance, the merits of the case will not be analysed, and the application will be judged taking into account the mere appearance of law.

[34] E.g., Judecătoria Sectorului 5 București, case no. 8875/302/2017, decision no. 9150 pronounced on 19.12.2017, not published, precited, decided on substitution of consent to travel abroad for a period of 3 years "considering that this is a reasonable period both for completing the medical treatment and traveling for recreational purposes".

relatively recently introduced in Law no. 248/2005 by Law no. 169/2016[35].

Article 30 Para 1 b of Law no. 248/2005 (actual form) stipulates that minors can leave the country accompanied by a single parent „if the accompanying parent shall submit a declaration of the other parent showing his or her agreement to travel abroad for a period not exceeding three years from the date of the declaration". (our underline)

In the larger context presented so far, we consider that a clear distinction should be made between situations when parents agree on minors traveling abroad, respectively there is a judiciary judgement on parental substitution consent.

In a logical interpretation of Article 30 Para 1 b previously cited, only the first situation (parents agree) falls within its sphere of application (period of three years), as the text automatically implies an agreement of the parent who accepts to offer the declaration for the minor to travel abroad (and therefore judicial substitution is not necessary).

The literary interpretation leads to the same conclusion, as the text associates the period of three years to the declaration of the parent (not a judgement of parental consent substitution).

Finally, if an agreement intervenes and parents decide to make an agreement declaration for 3 years on the basis of mutual trust, it significates that the parents voluntarily take the risk of a potential application of Article 12 Para 2 of the Convention (non-return of the child for integration in the new environment).

Such possibility should nevertheless not be opened in an indirect way by the court itself in a situation of substitution, when it is clear that parents disagree and do not trust each other (and therefore the risk of non-return is higher).

Moreover, there are situations when parents justify their refusal invoking exactly the fear that the other parent will not bring back the child, which should carefully be analysed depending on particular aspects of the case[36].

3. Conclusions

According to Romanian national legislation, the important decisions enshrined in the sphere of application of joint parental authority are decisions on establishment of minors' place of residence, form of education and professional training, complex medical treatments and surgical interventions, respectively administration of minors' property.

The principle is that the abovementioned decisions cannot be taken but with the consent of both parents.

The law prescribes nevertheless situations when coparental consent is not necessary in case of decisions on establishment of minors' place of residence (more precisely, for traveling abroad during limited periods of time).

These situations are related either to parents (deprived of parental rights or declares missing), or the child (medical treatment or official studies or competitions).

On the other hand, if co-agreement is necessary and parents cannot reach it, the remedy conceived by case-law for safeguard of the principle of the best interests of the child is substitution of parental consent by national courts (judicial limitations of common parental authority).

This remedy in favour of the child is at the same time a sanction for the parent who acts in an abusive manner and out of the scope of common parental authority.

The courts seized with applications for substitution of parental consent should therefore carefully consider the balance between the interest of the child and the reasons invoked by the oppozant parent, according to the individualities of each case.

From a procedural point of view, both urgent procedures of provisional measures, and procedures on the merits of the case should be available (although only urgent procedures can be efficient, as urgency is of the outmost importance in such cases).

Decision on substitution of parental consent should be seriously pondered on, as the effects overcome the sphere of the dispute in which the decision of substitution has been pronounced.

In terms of national law, repetitive decisions of substitution of parental consent may have the final outcome of exclusive parental authority, as they profile the pattern of an abusive parent.

In terms of international law, an unclear decision on substitution of parental consent may indirectly lead to a change of domicile of the child in another country in consideration of Article 12 Para 2 of 1980 Hague Convention (integration of the minor into the new environment if the period elapsed from departure/non-return exeeds 1 year).

For reasons presented, decisions on parental substitution for minors traveling abroad should always clearly indicate the precise location and the period during which the child may remain abroad without the consent of the other parent, which should not exceed 1 year.

[36] "The refusal of the defendant can be considered abusive since she has not argued her reluctance in terms of the superior interest of the minor, not explaining in concreto why the travel is not appropriate, expressing only the concern that the applicant would not return the child to her home, without any substantiated arguments" (Judecătoria Sectorului 4 București, case no. 31918/4/2017, decision no. 15855 pronounced on 21.12.2017, precited).

THE RULE OF LAW-CONSTITUTIONAL AND CONTEMPORARY JURISPRUDENTIAL SIGNIFICANCE

Marius ANDREESCU[*]

Abstract

The doctrine of the rule of law originates from German theory and jurisprudence, but is now a requirement and a reality of constitutional democracy in contemporary society. At present, the rule of law is no longer a simple doctrine but a fundamental principle of democracy consecrated by the Constitution and international political and legal documents. In essence, the concept of the rule of law is based on the supremacy of the law in general and of the Constitution in general. Essential for the contemporary realities of the rule of law are the following fundamental elements: the moderation of the exercise of state power in relation to the law, the consecration, the guarantee and the observance of the constitutional rights of man especially by the state power and, last but not least, the independence and impartiality of justice.

In this study we analyse the most important elements and features of the rule of law with reference to the contemporary realities in Romania. An important aspect of the analysis refers to the separation, balance and cooperation of the state powers, in relation to the constitutional provisions. The most significant aspects of the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on the rule of law are being analysed.

1. Introduction

The notion of state attributes means its defining dimensions as they result from constitutional provisions, as an expression of the political will and determined by the political regime and at the same time values of principle of constitutional order.

The rule of law, pluralism, democracy, civil society are unquestionable universal values of contemporary political thinking and practice and are found to be expressed in the Constitution of Romania as well as in international documents. The state attributes configure its quality as constitutional law subject and define the power, but also the complex reports between the state and citizens and the other constitutional law subjects. The attributes of the Romanian state regulated by the provisions of art. 1 paragraph (3) of the Romanian Constitution: 1. rule of law; 2. social state; 3. pluralist state; 4. democratic state.

The rule of law is one of the most discussed concepts of constitutional law and is unquestionably related to the transition from the state law to the rule of law. In the literature, contradictory opinions were sometimes affirmed, according to which the rule of law corresponds to an anthropological necessity or is a myth, a postulate and an axiom, and on the other hand, the rule of law is a pleonasm, a legal nonsense.

The concept of the rule of law is a constitutional reality whose foundation is found in the mechanisms of the exercise of state power, in the relations between power and liberty of every individual of society and in the application of the principle of legality to the entire state activity, but also in the behaviour of each member of society.

The rule of law has formed and spread over three major models:

1. The English model of "Rule of Law" is characterized by the limitation of the monarch's power and, on the other hand, by preserving the power of the parliament, which in terms of constitutional law means:a) the restriction of the powers of the monarch and their recognition of a power constituted by the norms of positive law, b) the necessity to found acts of the executive directly or indirectly on the authority of the Parliament, c) the obligation of all subjects of law to submit to the law of jurisdiction. 2. The German concept emphasizes the need to ensure the legality of the administration and its judicial control; 3. The French conception regards the rule of law as a legal state, proclaiming and maintaining the principle of legality. 3. The French concept considers the rule of law as a legal state, that proclaims and defends the principle of legality.

In the expression rule of law there are two aspects of the legal, seemingly contradictory but still complementary: normativism and ideology. In the normative plane, the rule of law appears as a structural principle of the Constitution along with other essential attributes of the state, materializing the fundamental values on which the existence of society and state are based.

2. Content

From the normative point of view, the requirements of the rule of law are manifested in a double sense: a) the formal meaning expresses the requirement that the state and its organs observe the laws, strictly subordinate to the juridical rules regarding the composition of the state bodies, their attributions and their functions. and b) the material meaning - the requirement that the state bodies, exercising their functions, comply with the legal guarantees concerning the exercise of citizens' fundamental rights and freedoms.

In the field of ideology, the rule of law confers a logical system of ideas by which people represent their society, the state, in all its manifestations, and which confer the legitimacy of the state.

The term "rule of law" is not a simple logical concept but it expresses a fundamental constitutional necessity according to which: a) the state is indispensable for the law in order to create for it its norms and to ensure the finality and effectiveness of the legal norms; b) the law is indispensable for the state to express power by establishing a general and binding behaviour.

In essence, the rule of law expresses a condition of power, a movement to rationalize it, but also a new conception of law, its role and functions. Professor Tudor Draganu, in his paper "Introducere în teoria şi practica statului de drept" (Introduction to the Law and Practice of the Rule of Law), proposes an interesting and comprehensive definition of this concept of constitutional law: "The rule of law is considered to be that state which was organized on the basis of the principle of separation of powers of the state, the application of which justice acquires real independence and pursues through its legislation the promotion of the rights and freedoms inherent in human nature, ensures the strict observance of its regulations by all its organs in all their activity. "

The definition defines the main elements of the rule of law - the separation of powers as a reality of the state activity, in the application of which justice acquires real independence and pursues through its legislation the promotion of rights and freedoms inherent in human nature, ensures the strict observance of its regulations by all its organs, in their entire activity".

This definition renders the basic features of the rule of law – separation of powers, as reality of the state activity, the application of the principle of legality in the activity of all the state bodies, the observance and the guarantee of fundamental human rights. Also, from the same definition result the basic features of the rule of law, respectively: a) the freedoms of the human being require guarantees of security and justice through the primacy of law and in particular the Constitution; b) the moderation of the execution of the power requires the organization and adaptation of the functions of the erratic organisms and a hierarchical normative system.

In the final document of the Copenhagen Summit in 1990 was stated that the rule of law does not simply mean a formal legality, and in the Charter of Paris from 1990 the rule of law is prefigured not only in terms of human rights but also of democracy, as the only governing system.

From the corroboration of the principles written in international documents, as well as in relation to the constitutional law doctrine, we consider as conditions or characters of the rule of law the following: 1. the accreditation of a new concept concerning the state, especially under the following aspects: the voluntary or consensual nature of the state, the delimitation of the state from the civil society, the responsibility of the state and the authorities that make it, and the moderation of constraint as a means of intervention of the state in society by appropriate and reasonable forms; 2. capitalization of the rations and mechanisms of the principle of separation of powers in the state; 3. the establishment and deepening of an authentic and real democracy; 4. Institutionalization and guaranteeing of the rights and freedoms of man and citizen; 5. the establishment of a coherent and hierarchical legal order and of an area of law.

The systematic functionality and consistency of the rule of law must be ensured by a number of regulatory systems, namely: a) political control by Parliament as one of its essential functions through various institutional means b) administrative control that is carried out in the system public authorities, either on their own initiative or at the initiative of citizens; c) judicial review of the legality of administrative acts entrusted to either the courts of common law or the specialized courts; d) control of the constitutionality of laws; e) control of the observance of fundamental rights and freedoms through the bodies of the authority and the judiciary; f) the conciliation and control procedure, which is carried out through the institution of the "ombudsman" or the People's Advocate; g) free access to justice and organizing the court activity in several degrees of jurisdiction.

The consecration of the rule of law in the Constitution of Romania is achieved not only by art. 1 paragraph 3 of the 1st thesis, but also by many other constitutional provisions expressing the content of this principle of organization and exercise of power in a democratic society. In this respect we reiterate the provisions of art. 16 paragraph (2), which provide that no one is above the law and those of art. 15 paragraph (2) proclaiming the principle of the unretroactivity of the law, principles essential to the entire construction of the rule of law. The content of the rule of law is expressed in particular in the constitutional provisions regarding the separation and balance of state powers as well as those regarding the organization, functioning and attributions of the state institutions. The provisions refer to the fundamental rights, freedoms and duties of the citizens, to the mechanism of the separations of powers, pluralism, free access to justice, independence of courts, and the organization and functioning of parliamentary, administrative and judicial control. They can be considered as a constitutional normative expression of the content and requirements of the rule of law

The rule of law is not a state whose essence is exhausted by constitutional regulations and other normative acts at a given moment. The rule of law is not exclusively an institution of constitutional law but must become a reality found at the level of the conduct of each subject of law, whether it is a state organ or a simple citizen. This means and implies a complex evolutionary process in which all the structures of society participate, and at the same time a process of perfection on the ideological and moral level in order to improve the activity of the organs of state and to effectively establish the principle of legality, to form a civic behaviour in the spirit of observance the law and the fundamental values of democratism.

The Constitution of Romania establishes, in its normative content, the main guarantees of the rule of law:

a) the constitutional regime, that is, the establishment in the Constitution of the fundamental principles of organization and activity of the three powers. Establishing the legal regime applied to the revision of the Constitution;
b) the direct or indirect popular legitimacy of state and public authorities;
c) ensuring the supremacy of the Constitution through political or judicial control, as well as ensuring the rule of law, over other normative acts;
d) he exercise of fundamental rights and freedoms may be restricted only temporarily, only in cases expressly determined in proportion to the circumstance justifying the restriction and without suppressing the very right or fundamental freedom;
e) independence and impartiality of justice.

Therefore, art. 21 paragraph (2) of the Constitution of Romania stipulates that no law may impede the free access of a person to justice for the protection of legitimate rights, freedoms and interests.[1]

From the complexity of the issue of the rule of law, we further on refer to the implicit application of the principle of proportionality in the constitutional provisions on the state organization of power.

This principle is explicitly expressed in the Constitution of Romania only in the provisions of art. 53, but it is implicitly found in other constitutional regulations as it has been emphasized in the specialized literature. The constitutional principle of proportionality is a synthesis of other principles of law and expresses the ideas of fairness, and the correctness of the state's dispositions to the intended purpose. We consider it a criterion in relation to which the powers of the state are organized in a state of law because by its application a dynamic and functional balance is realized in the institutional diversity of the state system. We also underline the fact that this principle confers legitimacy and not only the legality of state decisions and is a criterion already used in jurisprudence which establishes the demarcation between the exercise of power within the limits of the Constitution and laws and on the other hand the excess of power in the activity of the organs of the state in situations where state decisions have the appearance of legality but are also not legitimate because they are not appropriate to the intended purpose defined by constitutional or secondary legislation We believe that the constitutional principle of proportionality can be considered a requirement of the rule of law.

Further on, briefly analyze the application of the principle of proportionality to the state organization of power in our country, as it results explicitly or implicitly from the constitutional provisions applicable.

The principle of the separation of powers in the state, considered to be a foundation of democracy, is at the same time a reflection on the moderation and rationalization of state power. “Balancing these powers by judiciously distributing the powers and equipping each of them with effective means of control over the others, thus defeating the inherent tendency of the human power to grasp the whole power and to abuse it is the condition of social harmony and the guarantee of human freedom”. In its classical form, as it is known by the decisive contribution of Montesquieu, the principle of separation of powers in the state affirms that in any society there are three distinct powers: legislative, executive and judicial power. These three powers must be exercised by separate organisms independent of each other. The purpose of this division is that power should not focus on a single state organ, which would naturally tend to abuse the prerogatives entrusted to it. “In order that power not be abused, it is necessary that by the arrangement of things power stop power” -says Montesquieu. At the same time, the division of state power is necessary to respect individual rights and freedoms, so that one power opposes the other and creates itself instead of a single force, a balance of force.

In order to achieve these goals, the organs of the state must be independent of one another in the sense that no one can exercise the function entrusted to the other. Consequently, it is not possible for an organ of the state to be subordinated to another, if it exercises a separate power.

The doctrine states that: “The theory of separation of powers is in fact an ideological justification of a very concrete political purpose: weakening the power of the governors as a whole, limiting one another. It is considered that the separation of powers has two well-defined aspects: a) separation of parliament from the government; b) separation of jurisdictions against the governors, which allows them to be controlled by independent judges[2]. The theory and principle of the separation of powers in its classical form were criticized in doctrine. "Montesquieu's error", wrote Carré de Malberg, "is certainly to have thought it possible to regulate the game of the public powers by their mechanical separation and, in a certain way, mathematical, as if the problems of the state organization were susceptible to be solved by procedures of such rigor and precision"[3]

In the doctrine, other inaccuracies and limitations were noted as well, among which we recall: from the terminology used, it is not clear whether a "state body" or a "function" is to be understood by power; power is unique and indivisible and belongs to a single titular - the people. That is why we cannot speak of the division of powers, but, possibly, the distribution of the functions involved in the exercise of power; the separation of powers, conceived in the form of opposition between them, is likely to block the functioning of state authorities. It is not possible for the sovereign exercise of the completeness of each of the static functions to be assigned to a separate authority or group of authorities. None of the state organs perform a function in integrity, and consequently the steady organs cannot be rigidly and functionally separated; in most constitutional systems, as a result of the existence of political parties, the real problem is not the separation of powers, but the relationship between the majority and the minority or, in other words, between the governors and the opposition. There is no antagonistic relationship between parliament and government. A government that has a parliamentary majority will work in close association with the parliament, which is considered a modern state of their efficiency; the legislative function is not equal to the executive function. Execution of the law is by definition subject to legalization. If the two functions are in hierarchical relations, then the organs that perform those functions are in the same ratios.

It should also be underlined that, in doctrine, there is more and more talk of a decline of legislative power in favour of the executive; the separation of powers does not solve the issue of guaranteeing fundamental human rights. Constitutional justice is the main guarantor of respect for fundamental rights, but it does not find its place in the classic scheme of separation of powers in the state[4].

In the case of the theory of separation of powers in the state it was said that "the myth" far exceeds the reality. In fact, it is the dogmatic confidence to impose on a concrete reality a pre-established theoretical and abstract framework[5]. The criticisms formulated and the modernization tendencies cannot result in the abandonment of this principle. "The great force of the theory of separation of powers in the state - said Professor Ioan Muraru - lies in its fantastic social, political and moral resonance[6]. It should not be forgotten that the principle is enshrined, explicitly or implicitly, in the constitutions of the democratic states. From the perspective of our research theme, it is important to consider the autonomy of the state authorities and the relations between them in order to prevent separatism and rigidity.

The myth of absolute separation of powers is in fact, Carré de Malberg says, irreconcilable, "with the principle of unity of the state and its powers"[7]. The will of the state, he continues, being necessarily a single one, must be maintained between the authorities that held a certain cohesion, without which the state would risk being harassed, divided and destroyed by the opposite pressures to which it would be subjected. It is thus impossible to conceive that the powers in the state are equal. "That is why, in any state, even in those whose Constitution is said to be based on Montesquieu's theory and pursues a certain equalization of powers, invariably will find a supreme organ that will dominate all the others and thus achieve the unity of the state".[8] As the author states, it is not so much about separation, but rather about the "gradation of powers". There would then be a single power that would first manifest through acts of initial will - the legislative power - and would be exercised at a lower level through law enforcement acts - the executive power.

It follows that the powers of the state are unequal, but this cannot have the significance of subordination, nor can allow for excess power. "State means also force, hence the risk of escaping from the control of the holder, of considering himself being the owner of the power"[9]. At the same time, a coherent functioning of the organs of the state is not possible, nor can it be conceived, unless there are some relations between them.

It was said that, given the existence of political parties and their access to power, "the real problem is not that of the relations between the institutionalized powers but of the relations between the majority and the minority, between the government and the opposition, especially when the government comes from a parliamentary majority, comfortable and homogeneous and leaning on it".[10]

In a wider sense, it must be stressed that democracy generates a majority that leads, imposing its will and values to minorities, but they also have the opportunity to express themselves and their rights have to be respected. Achieving the democratic and functional balance between the majority and the minorities is the solution to avoid what the doctrine is called the "tyranny of the majority". Undivided power - says Giovani Sartori - is always an excessive and dangerous power. Thus, the tyranny of the majority, relevant from a constitutional point of view, is defined according to the rights of the minority, especially if the right to opposition is complied with or not[11]. The main problem in this context is that the minority or the minorities have the right to oppose, have the right to opposition.

The relationship between the majority and the minority involves the analysis of the very complex interaction between those that govern and the ones that are governed. Interaction consists of a multilevel process in which majorities and minorities are materialized in different ways and at different levels. The rule that allows the functioning of such a complex system of democracy is the application of the principle of majority in decision-making. However, Hamilton observed very well: "Give all the power to many, and they will oppress the few. Give all the power of the few, and they will oppress the many".[12] Therefore, the problem is to avoid giving all or most of the power to all, by distributing it, alternately and/or at the same time to the majority and minority.

Therefore, in order to avoid dogmatism, in order to respond to these problems of social, political and state realities, it is necessary to reconsider the theory of the separation of powers in the state from the point of view of the principle of proportionality. The fundamental idea has already been stated: the moderation of power and the balance in the exercise of power that actually reflects, to a certain extent, the balance of social forces[13]. When discussing the content and meanings of the separation of powers, it is less about separation, but especially about the balance of powers[14]. Balancing the powers in the state by judiciously distributing the powers and equipping each with effective means of control over the others, thus stabilizing the tendency to capture the whole power and to abuse it, is essentially the application of the principle of proportionality to the organization of state power. This is the condition of social harmony and the guarantee of human freedom [even though, until now, an explicit reference to the principle of proportionality has not been made in the specialized literature, it results from the context of supporting some authors: "So, weight and counterweights in the power tiles so that none of them dominates the others. It would not be so much a separation of powers, but especially about their relative autonomy and their mutual dependence: the balance of powers ".[15]

Rethinking the separation of powers in terms of the constitutional principle of proportionality can be answered, in our opinion, to all the problems listed above.

The principle of the separation of powers in the state was not explicitly enshrined in the Constitution of Romania before its revision in 2003, but from the analysis of the constitutional texts, the doctrine ascertained that the balance of state powers as a principle was found in the content of the norms of the Constitution Through the Review Law, the Romanian derived constituent expressly enshrined this principle, referring not only to the separation of powers but also to the balance between them: "The State is organized according to the principle of separation and balance of powers - legislative, executive and judicial - within constitutional democracy"[Art. 1 paragraph (4)].

The necessary balance between state authorities is the expression of the principle of proportionality applied in the matter of organizing the institutional system of power in Romania. State authorities are neither equal nor independent in the absolute sense. The balance that a proportionality relationship implies is based on differences but also on interrelations that allow the functioning of the institutional system so as to avoid excessive concentration of power or exercise of the same, as well as the excess of power, especially by violating human rights and fundamental freedoms. The finality of the proportionality ratio between public authorities is "the establishment of balanced correlations between the governors and the ones that are governed, complying with the public freedoms"[16]. We will refer to some of the constitutional regulations concerning the Romanian state institutional system, which reflects the principle of proportionality:

A. Elements of difference between state authorities, meaning the autonomy of each category of organs and their position within the system: public authorities are governed distinctly by the rules contained in Title III of the Constitution. These are the "three classic powers" in the traditional order: legislative, executive and judicial power.

The Constitution confers a certain degree of prerogative to Parliament in relation to the other state authorities: "Parliament is the supreme representative body of the Romanian people and the sole legislator authority of the country" (art. 61 paragraph (1).

Besides the classic scheme of the separation of powers in the state, the Constitutional Court achieved constitutional power (art. 142 and subsequent of the Fundamental Law), which is the guarantor of the supremacy of the Constitution, the only constitutional jurisdictional authority of Romania, independent of the any other public authority [art. 1 paragraph (3) of the Law no. 47/1992 on the organization and functioning of the Constitutional Court, republished]. The People's Advocate is also independent of any other public authority. He is appointed by the Parliament in the joint session of the Chambers [art. 65 paragraph (2) letter i)]. Ex officio or at the request of persons injured in their rights or freedoms, the People's Advocate may refer the matter to the public authorities in order to take measures to eliminate acts or facts that affect subjective rights or legitimate protected legal interests (article 58 and subsequent). It has the power to notify the Constitutional Court, in the situations provided by art. 146 letters a) and d);

The bicameral structure of Parliament is an expression of the balance involved in the principle of proportionality. Thus, Chambers are equal but are functionally differentiated in the exercise of their legislative powers. The distinction between the Chamber referred first (of reflection) and the Decision Chamber, made by article 75, expresses the "quasi-perfect" bicameralism, which is a proportionality ratio. We agree with the opinion expressed in the literature, according to which "the system of parliamentary bicameralism in Romania must be preserved, but it must be transformed into a differentiated bicameralism. Thus, to the law of democratization and efficiency can be ensured, and to the legislative organ a representativeness and responsibility increment."[17]

The difference between the length of the term of office of some state authorities contributes to a proportionate ratio between the powers of the state, is the expression of the balance and not of the formal equality, in order to ensure the good functioning of the Romanian institutional system. Thus, the duration of Parliament's mandate is 4 years (Article 63), of the President of Romania is 5 years (Article 83), of the members of the Superior Council of Magistracy is 6 years (Article 133), the mandate of the judges at the Constitutional Court is 9 years, and the president of this institution is elected for a period of 3 years (Article 142), the judges of the courts appointed by the President of Romania have practically an indefinite mandate in time because they are irremovable under the law (art. 125). The People's Advocate mandate is 5 years (Article 58).

B. The specialty literature highlighted the particularities of the relations between the state authorities, which in our opinion materialize the principle of proportionality, because the relational balance also implies the difference. In this respect, it was stated that: "The election of the President of Romania by the people, an essential feature of the presidential republics, combines in our country with the pre-eminence of the Parliament, as a result, mainly, of the parliamentary origin of the government, thus defining a semi-presidential political regime" [18].

The set of interrelations between the different categories of organs of the state is the form of achieving the balance and mutual control of the powers. These relations, which form the "identity card of the state power system"[19], presuppose the autonomy of the state authorities and the differences between them. The complex structure of the state power system is a concretisation of the principle of proportionality, in other words, it strikes a balance between the powers of the state, which are based on autonomy, differentiation and interrelations. The more the constitutional regulations in the field manage to materialize the requirements of the principle of proportionality, the more exists the guarantee of avoiding some forms of concentration of the state powers, the tyranny of the majority or minorities and obviously the excess of power.

The concern of the Romanian constituent legislator to achieve a functional balance between the powers of the state, between these and society, is obvious, if we refer to the provisions of art. 80, according to which: "The President exercises the function of mediation between the powers of the state as well as between state and society", but also to the provisions of art. 146 letter e) according to which our constitutional court has the competence to resolve constitutional legal conflicts between public authorities. We also need to remember the role of mediator and balance factor for the powers of the state, but also for the society that justice has. In this respect, the provisions of art. 124 of the Constitution consecrate the general "uniqueness, impartiality and equality" of justice, which represents important guarantees for the achievement of the functions of the judicial power in society.

Of course, the system of state power is an open, dynamic one, implying not only the multiplication of its constituent elements or their reorganization, but also of the functions that correspond them and of the interrelationships between the elements of the system. Within the internal system, the social-political system, and externally the system of the international community of states represent the "environment" with which the state authorities interact. Therefore, the balance, as a particular aspect of the principle of proportionality, between the powers of the state must be understood in its dynamics, including in the continuous process of interpreting and applying the constitutional provisions in the matter.

Proportionality, as a principle of constitutional law, has a concrete dimension. The existence of a proportionate, balanced relationship between the state authorities, between them and society, is verified in practice through the functioning of the political and social system, the avoidance of crises, or, when they occur, through the capacity of the state authorities to manage these, complying in any situation with the principles of the rule of law. Essential for the fulfilment of the requirements of separation and balance between the powers of the state, but also for stability, in its social and political system dynamics, from the perspective of pluralism in society, there is the existence of a proportionate balance between the majority and the minorities between the government and the opposition, "especially when the government comes from a comfortable and homogeneous parliamentary majority and relies on it".[20]

At the end of this analysis we shall refer to some decisions of the Constitutional Court which we consider relevant to the rule of law.

The Constitutional Court identifies the fundamental feature of the rule of law, namely the supremacy of the Constitution and the obligation to observe the law. See to that effect[21].

At the same time, it has been stated in the jurisprudence of the constitutional court that the rule of law, ensuring the supremacy of the Constitution, also realizes "the correlation of all laws and all normative acts with it"[22] .

The requirements of the rule of law concern the major purposes of state activity, namely the supremacy of law, which implies the subordination of the state to the law. In this respect, the law provides the means by which the political options or decisions can be censored and performs the abolition of any abusive and discretionary tendencies of the state structures. Further on, the rule of law ensures the supremacy of the Constitution, the existence of the regime of separation of the public powers and establishes guarantees, including of a judicial nature, that ensure the observance of citizens' rights and freedoms, primarily by limiting the state authority, which represent the framing of the public authorities' activities within the limits of the law.

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court expresses the main requirements of the rule of law in relation to the goals of the state activity. Thus, by jurisprudence is achieved a very eloquent synthesis of the doctrine on the notion and features of the rule of law. It is significant in this respect the Decision no. 17 of January 21st 2015[23], by which the Constitutional Court gives an explanation concerning the state of law, enshrined in art. 1 paragraph (3) thesis I of the Constitution: "The requirements of the rule of law concern the major purposes of its activity, prefigured in what is commonly called the reign of law, a phrase involving the subordination of the state to the law, the guarantee of the means to allow the law to censor political choices and, in this context, to weigh the potential abusive, discretionary tendencies of the static structures. The rule of law ensures the supremacy of the Constitution, the correlation of laws and all normative acts with it, the existence of the regime of separation of the public powers that must act within the limits of the law, namely within the limits of a law expressing the general will. The rule of law enshrines a series of safeguards, including jurisdictional, to ensure that citizens' rights and freedoms are complied with by the state's self-restraint, namely the involvement of public authorities in the coordinates of law".[24]

The principle of stability and security of legal relations is not explicitly enshrined in the Constitution of Romania, but, like other constitutional principles, it is involved in the constitutional normative provisions, respectively art. 1 paragraph (3), which enshrines the rule of law. In this way, our constitutional court accepts the deduction, by way of interpretation, of the principles of law implied by the express rules of the fundamental Law. In this respect, by means of the Decision no. 404 of April 10th 2008[25], the Constitutional Court stated that: "The principle of stability and security of legal relations, although not explicitly enshrined in the Romanian Constitution, is deduced both from the provisions of art. 1 paragraph (3), according to which Romania is a state of law, democratic and social, and from the preamble to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, as interpreted by the European Court of Human Rights in its jurisprudence". See also Decision no. 685 of November 25th 2014[26]. Furthermore, our constitutional court has considered that the principle of security of civil legal relationships is a fundamental dimension of the rule of law[27]

Constitutional Court decides constantly for clarity and predictability of law, which are requirements of the rule of law. Thus, "the existence of contradictory legislative solutions and the annulment of legal provisions through other provisions contained in the same normative act lead to the violation of the principle of security of legal relations, due to the lack of clarity and predictability of the norm, principles which constitute a fundamental dimension of the rule of law, as it is expressly enshrined in the provisions of art. 1 paragraph (3) of the fundamental Law[28].

Concerning the rule of law, the Constitutional Court has shown that justice and social democracy are supreme values. In this context, the militarized authorities, in this case the Romanian Gendarmerie, exercise, under the law, specific powers regarding the defense of public order and tranquillity, of citizens' fundamental rights and freedoms, of public and private property, of prevention and detection of crimes, and other violations of applicable laws, and the protection of state institutions and the fight against acts of terrorism. Consequently, the Constitutional Court ruled: "By the possibility of militarized authorities to find contraventions committed by civilians, art. 1 paragraph (3) of the Constitution is not affected in any way, regarding the Romanian state, as a rule of law, democratic and social"[29]

Human dignity, together with the freedoms and rights of citizens, the free development of human personality, justice and political pluralism, are supreme values of the rule of law (art. 1 paragraph (3)). In the light of these constitutional regulations, it has been stated in the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence that the state is forbidden to adopt legislative solutions that can be interpreted as being disrespectful of religious or philosophical beliefs of parents, which is why organizing school activity must achieve a fair balance between the process of education and teaching religion, and on the other hand with respect for the rights of parents, to ensure education in accordance with their own religious beliefs. Activities and behaviours specific to a certain attitude of belief or philosophical, religious or non-religious beliefs must not be subject to sanctions that the state requires for such behaviour, regardless of the person's motivation for faith. "As part of the constitutional system of values, freedom of religious conscience is attributed to the imperative of tolerance, especially to human dignity, guaranteed by art. 1 paragraph (3) of the fundamental Law, which dominates the entire value system as a supreme value"[30]

It is also interesting to note that our constitutional court considers human dignity as the supreme value of the entire system of values constitutionally consecrated, value that is found in the content of all human rights and fundamental freedoms. At the same time, it is an important aspect that requires the state authorities in their entire activity to first consider respecting the human dignity.

It should be noted that in its jurisprudence the Constitutional Court also identifies the content components of human dignity, as a moral value but at the same time constitutional, specific to the rule of law: "Human dignity, in constitutional terms, presupposes two inherent dimensions, namely the relations between people, which refers to the right and obligation of the people to be respected and, in a correlative way, to respect the fundamental rights and freedoms of their peers, as well as the relation of man to the environment, including the animal world".[31]

3. Conclusions

Antonie Iorgovan said that an essential problem of the rule of law is to answer the question: "where discretionary power ends and where the abuse of law begins, where the legal behaviour of the administration ends, materialized in its right of appreciation and where the violation of a subjective right or legitimate interest of the citizen begins?" Therefore, the application and observance of the principle of legality in the activity of state authorities is a complex issue because the exercise of state functions presupposes the discretionary power with which the organs of the state are invested, or in other words the authorities' "right of appreciation" regarding the moment of adoption and the content of the measures imposed. What is important to emphasize is that discretionary power cannot be opposed to the principle of legality, as a dimension of the rule of law.

The excess of power can be manifested in these circumstances by at least three aspects: a) the appraisal of a factual situation as an exceptional case, although it does not have this significance (lack of objective and reasonable motivation); b) the measures ordered by the competent authorities of the State, by virtue of discretion, to go beyond what is necessary to protect the publicly threatened public interest; c) if these measures unduly and unjustifiably restrict the exercise of fundamental rights and freedoms constitutionally recognized.

The key issue for the practitioner and the theorist is to identify criteria by which to establish the limits of the discretionary power of the state authorities and to differentiate it from the excess of power that must be sanctioned. Of course, there is also the question of using these criteria in court practice or constitutional litigation.

Concerning these aspects, the opinion of the specialized literature was that "the purpose of the law will be the legal limit of the right of appreciation (of opportunity). For discretionary power does not mean a freedom beyond the law, but one permitted by law. Of course, "the purpose of the law" is a condition of legality or, as the case may be, the constitutionality of the legal acts of the organs of the state, and can therefore be considered a criterion for delimiting discretionary power from excess of power.

As can be seen from the case law of some international and domestic courts in relation to our research theme, the purpose of the law cannot be the only criterion to delimit discretionary power (synonymous with the margin of appreciation, term used by the ECHR) of the State may be an excess of power not only in the case where the measures adopted do not pursue a legitimate aim but also in the case that the measures ordered are not appropriate to the purpose of the law and are not necessary in relation to the factual situation and the legitimate aim pursued.

The adequacy of the measures ordered by the state authorities to the legitimate aims pursued is a particular aspect of the principle of proportionality. Significant is the opinion expressed by Antonie Iorgovan, who considers that the limits of discretionary power are set by: "positive written rules, general principles of law, principle of equality, principle of nonretroactivity of administrative acts, right to defense and principle of contradictory, principle of proportionality Therefore, the principle of proportionality is an essential criterion that allows the discretionary power to delimit excess of power in the work of state authorities. And by this is an essential principle of the rule of law.

CASE-LAW CONTRIBUTIONS TO CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW'S DEVELOPMENT IN ROMANIA

Marius ANDREESCU[*]
Claudia ANDREESCU[]

Abstract

To the Romanian system of law, jurisprudence does not have the quality of a formal source of law. Nevertheless, a legal reality, viewed from a historical perspective, has demonstrated the essential role of judicial practice in interpreting and enforcing the law, in constructing argumentative practices, in clarifying the will of the legislator, and in discovering the less obvious meanings of legal norms and, last but not least, in unifying thought and legal practice. Therefore jurisprudence, along with doctrine, is an important component of the Romanian system of law.

Based on these considerations, we intend to highlight some aspects of constitutional jurisprudence in this paper. We underline its contribution to the constitutional review of laws in Romania. Under the Constitution of 1866, which did not regulate institutionally such a control, the courts have assumed this competence by interpreting the law and by way of jurisprudence.

Important aspects of the Constitutional Court jurisprudence and of the courts in the development of constitutional review in our country are presented and analysed. We support the idea that jurisprudence currently plays an important part in the interpretation of constitutional norms, including with regard to deepening the constitutional review forms.

1. Introduction

Constitutional supremacy would remain just a theoretical matter if not for proper guarantees. Indisputably, constitutional justice and its particular form, constitutional review is the main guarantee of Constitution's supremacy, as is expressly stipulated by the Basic law of Romania.

Teacher Ion Deleanu believed: "Constitutional justice may be deemed, alongside many other things, a paradigm of this century"[1]. The emergence and evolution of constitutional justice is determined by several factors to which the doctrine refers; of these, we mention: man, as a citizen, becomes a cardinal axiological benchmark of civil and political society, and the fundamental rights and freedoms are no longer just a theoretical speech, but a normative reality as well; democracy is reconsidered, within the meaning that minority's protection becomes a key requirement of the rule of law and, at the same time, a counterweight to the principle of majority "parliamentary sovereignty" is submitted to the primacy of law and especially to the Constitution; as a consequence, the law is no longer an infallible act of Parliament, but conditional upon the Constitution's norms and values; last, but not least, reconsideration of the role and place of constitutions, within the meaning of qualifying them, especially as: "fundamental establishments of the governed, not of the governing people, as a dynamic act, as a continues shaping and as an act of society"[2].

The regulatory activity of law elaboration should continue by the activity of enforcing the rules; in order to enforce them, the first logical operation to carry out is to construe them.

Both the Constitution, and the law come as an assembly of legal rules, but these rules are expressed under the form of a legislative text. This is why it is not the legislative texts that constitute an object of interpretation, but the legal texts or the one of the Constitution. A legal text may comprise several legal rules. By way of interpretation, a constitutional rule can be deduced from a constitutional text. The Constitution text is drawn-up into general terms, which influences the determination degree of the constitutional rules. The constitutional rules are identified and determined via interpretation.

What also needs to be underlined is that a Constitution may comprise certain principles that are not clearly expressed expresis verbis, but they can be deduced by systematically interpreting other rules.

Within the meaning of the above, the speciality literature stated: "The determination degree of constitutional rules using the basic law text may justify the need for interpretation. The Rules in the Constitution are very suited for a progress of their course, because the text is par excellence imprecise, formulated into general terms. Constitution's formal superiority, its rigidity prevent its review under very short time-spans and then the interpretation remains the only way to adopt the normative content, usually older, to the social reality which is permanently changing. As the meaning of constitutional rules is by their very nature of outmost generality, its precise determination depends on the interpreter's will"[3].

The scientific justification of the interpretation arises from the need to ensure the effectiveness of the rules comprised both by the Constitution, and by the laws via institutions mainly carrying out the activity of interpreting the rules provided by the author.

These institutions are first the courts of law, and the constitutional ones.

Checking compliance of a normative act with constitutional rules, institution which represents the constitutional review is not a formal comparison or mechanical juxtaposition of the two categories of rules, but a complex work relying on the interpretation techniques and procedures both of the law, and the Constitution.

Consequently, the need to construe the Constitution is a condition of applying it and securing its primacy. The constitutional review is essentially an activity of construing the Constitution, and the law. There need to be independent public authorities competent to construe the Constitution and to examine in this manner compliance of the law with the Constitution. These authorities are the Courts and the Constitutional Courts within the European template of constitutional justice.

2. Content

Evaluation of the constitutionality of the laws is the constitutional justice's main form and it is the basis for democracy, guaranteeing a democratic government is to be accomplished, complying with the Constitutional and law supremacy.

George Alexianu thinks legality is an attribute of modern state. The idea of lawfulness in the author's conception is formulated as follows: all state bodies operate based on a rule of law decided by the lawmaker, which needs to be complied with.

When referring to the Constitutional supremacy, the same author claimed with full justification and in relation to today's realities: "When modern state organizes its new look, the first idea with which it is preoccupied is to crack down the administrative abuse; hence the intervention of constitutions and jurisdictionally, the establishment of an examination of legality. Once this abuse established, another one arises, much more serious, that of Parliament. Constitution's supremacy is then invented and various systems to guarantee it. The idea of legality thus acquires a strong strengthening leverage"[4].

An important aspect is also that of defining the notion of evaluation of the constitutionality of the laws. The legal doctrine[5] has underlined that this duty's problematic should be included in the principle of legality. Legality is a fundamental principle for the organization and operation of the social and political systems. This principle has several coordinates: existence of a hierarchized legal system, on top of which lies the Constitution. Consequently, the ordinary law should be compliant with the Constitution in order to meet the legality condition; State's bodies should carry out their duties by strictly complying with the competency set out by law; normative acts' drafting should be made by competent persons, by a predetermined procedure, complying with the provisions of the superior normative acts with legal force and by complying with the law and the Constitution by all State bodies.

The doctrine has defined constitutional review as: "Organized activity of checking the conformity of the law with the constitution and from the point of view of the constitutional right, it comprises rules about the competent authorities making this check, the procedure to follow and the measures which can be taken after this procedure has been fulfilled"[6].

It follows, from the definition's examination that the constitutional review has a complex meaning. This is an institution of the constitutional law, i.e. the assembly of legal norms on the organization and operation of the competent authority of exercising control, as well as the assembly of legal norms with procedural character, which regulate and may be ordered by a constitutional court.

At the same time, there is also an organized activity whereby Constitutional supremacy is guaranteed, as compliance of the norms comprised by laws and other normative acts with constitutional regulations.

Essentially, constitutional review supposes checking compliance of the law as a legal act of Parliament, but also of other categories of normative acts with the rules comprised by the Constitution. Compliance should exist both in terms of a formal aspect (competency of the issuing body and the drafting procedure), as well as from a material standpoint (content of the norm in the ordinary law should be compliant with the constitutional requirements).

Historically, the judicial review of constitutionality established in the U.S.A. in the beginning of the 19th century holds particular importance, although the Constitution does not regulate procedural rules.

The Supreme Court ruled on the case of Marbury v. Madison for the first time in a case of this nature, declaring the Federal Constitution as a supreme law of the state and removing an act of Congress contrary to the Federal Constitution. The Court's decision is drawn-up by Judge John Marshall and is the basis on which the American case-law is founded in the matter of constitutional review.

The rationale that the American judge employed was as follows: the judge should enforce and construe laws. Constitution is the supreme law of a state which should be enforced with priority towards any other law. As Constitution is a law, it shall be construed and enforced by the judge, including to a particular case being the subject matter referred for trial.If the law is not compliant with the constitutional rules, the latter shall be enforced given the Constitution's supreme character.

The European template of constitutional justice is characterized from an institutional point of view in constitutional courts or district courts. During the inter-war period, this template was noticed in: Austria (1920), Czechoslovakia (1979), Spain (1931) and Ireland (1938).

In our country, constitutional review has evolved, being marked by the national particularities and successive application of the two templates presented above.

The Constitution from 1866 did not regulate the constitutional review. However, the provisions of Art. 9 of the Constitution may be mentioned, according to which the Lord "punishes and promulgates the laws" and that He "can refuse its punishment". Consequently, the head of State could refuse to promulgate a law if they believed it to be unconstitutional. Obviously, this wasn't exactly an evaluation of the constitutionality of the laws, but it is a precursor means to such a check. During the period in which the Constitution of 1866 was in force, the head of State never resorted to such a procedure.

The constitutional review made by a court of law, not by a specialized institution, different from the judicial power, was accepted on the European continent as well. The constitutional history mentions a Romanian priority in this case. Thus, during the period 1911/1912, first Ilfov County Court, then the High Court of Cassation and Justice extended their powers to check the constitutional compliance of laws in the dispute known as "the tramway matter" from Bucharest.

What is interesting is that the rationale employed by Ilfov County Court and by the High Court of Cassation and Justice in arguing the possibility to achieve, using a pretorian way, constitutional review. Essentially, the considerations were the following: 1) the Court did not assume competency ex officio to rule on the constitutionality of a law and to cancel it, since such procedure would have constituted a mixture of the judicial power in the law making powers' duties. Consequently, the court undertook this competency, since it had been referred to check the constitutionality of a law; 2) based on the duties given, judicial power's main mission is to construe and enforce all the laws, either ordinary or constitutional. If an invoked law contravenes the Constitution, the court may not refuse to settle the matter; 3) There is no provision in the Constitution of 1866 by which to expressly prohibit the judicial power's right to check whether a law is compliant or not with the Constitution. The provisions of Art. 77 of the Constitution are invoked; according to them, a judge, as per the oath taken, is under the obligation to enforce the laws and the country's Constitution; 4). Unlike ordinary laws, the Constitution is permanent and it can only be revised as an exceptional measure. As it is the supreme force law, Constitution is imposed by its authority on everybody and this is why the judge is obligated to enforce it with priority, including in the hypothesis where the law based on which the dispute is settled is contrary to the Constitution[7].

Decisions ruled by Ilfov County Court and by the High Court of Cassation and Justice have been well received by the specialists of that time. Here is a brief comment: "This decision was a great satisfaction to all the people of law. It is a big step in the advancement of this country toward progress, for it enshrines the principle that this country's Constitution, its foundation, the palladium of our rights and freedoms, and no one should disobey them. We are proud our justice is showing even to the justice in the Western countries what is the true path to progress in the matter of public law"[8].

In exercising its duties, the Constitutional Court regulates a work of interpreting the law and the Constitution. The constitutional court cannot amend, complete or repeal a law.

In its former drafting, before the Constitution's review, Law no. 47/1992 prohibited the Constitutional Court to construe those normative acts making the subject matter of the constitutional review. Naturally, the current regulation has removed this ban, since the activity of checking compliance of the normative regulations with the provisions of the Constitution the constitutional judge carries out is essentially a work of enforcing the law relying on the interpretation of the legal rules.

The Constitutional Court participates in the fulfilment of the legislative function in the State, but not as a positive lawmaker, but as a negative lawmaker, whose purpose is to remove the "unconstitutionality venom" from a normative act. This is why the Court, by its duties, is not subrogated to the Parliament's activity, since the amendment, completion or repealing of a law is an exclusive attribute of the Parliament.

The Constitutional Court's constructive interpretation by case- law of the Basic Law also arises from this institution's role to "support the good operation of public powers in the constitutional reports of separation, balance and mutual control". The principle of separation and balance of powers in the State is still, despite all the critiques some authors expressed, the fundament of democratic exercise of state power and the main constitutional guarantee of avoiding excess or abuse of power from any of the State's authorities.

The relationships between State's authorities are complex in nature, but they must also secure their proper operation, by complying with the principle of Constitution's legality and supremacy. To carry out this desideratum, it is very important that a state balance is maintained between all its forms and variants, including as social balance.

The separation and balance of powers no longer concerns just the classical powers (legislative, executive and judicial). Other powers are added to these, rendering new dimensions to this classical principle. The relationships between the participants in the state and social life can also cause conflicts which need to be settled in order to preserve the balance of powers. Some constitutions refer to disputes of public law (Constitution of Germany- Art. 93), to conflicts of jurisdiction between the State and autonomous communities or conflicts of duties between the State's powers, between the State and regions and between regions (Constitution of Italy – Art. 314).

Romania's Constitution speaks of judicial conflicts of constitutional nature between the public authorities [Art. 146 sub-par. c)] and regulates the mediation function between State powers that the President exercises.

The Constitutional Court is an important guarantor of the separation and balance of the State's powers, since it settles legal conflicts of constitutional nature between public authorities and by the duties it has in the matter of control of constitutionality prior to laws and checking constitutionality of regulations of chambers, it intervenes in ensuring balance between the parliamentary majority and minority, effectively ensuring the opposition's right to express itself.

The Constitutional Court is a guarantor that the fundamental freedoms and rights are complied with. This fundamental part the constitutional court plays in the rule of law is accomplished by interpreting Constitution's case-law and of the laws. As a general rule, there are three key guarantees from a constitutional point of view on the rights and freedoms of citizens established by the Constitution:

Constitutional supremacy; b) Constitution's rigid character; c) citizens 'access to the constitutional review and to the control of legality for the acts subordinated to law.

In Romania, the procedure of the exception of unconstitutionality ensures citizens 'indirect access to the constitutional justice.

Our constitutional court's case-law brings its contribution to the constitutional review in Romania by several aspects. We would like to analyse some relevant decisions in this matter next.

The Constitutional court has construed the notion of "law" in order to determine the scope of competency of the constitutional review on normative acts. The case-law has mentioned that the term of "law" provided under Art. 146 sub-par. b) of the Constitution is not widely used consisting of all normative acts, but only in its strict meaning, of law, by which the normative act is understood, adopted by the Parliament and promulgated by the President of Romania. At the same time, this scope also includes ordinances which are normative acts adopted by the Government based on a legislative delegation. "The concept of law arises from the combination of the formal criterion to the material one, since the content of law is determined by the importance paid by the lawmaker to the regulated aspects…settlement of the exception of unconstitutionality concerning other normative acts is not of the Constitutional Court's competency, as these acts are controlled in terms of legality by the administrative disputes courts" [9]. This decision of the Constitutional Court is important, particularly because it follows that the courts, particularly the administrative disputes ones, in relation to the legal rules of competency, may check the legality of a normative act, including in terms of its constitutionality.

The Court has determined that its role is to set out that the provisions of law criticised are constitutional and, at the same time, if the interpretation given to them abides by the Constitution's requirements, as such that, to the extent the legal text criticised may be conferred a constitutional interpretation, the Court shall find the legal provision's constitutionality in this interpretation and shall exclude any other possible interpretations from this application[10]. This solution of our constitutional court is important because it identifies, from a constitutional point of view, the so-called interpretative decisions of the Court, by which the legal text criticised for unconstitutionality is not removed, but interpreted within the meaning of the constitutional rules to produce legal effects.

The Constitutional Court has constantly, in its case- law, decided that it does not have the competency to control facts materialized into actions or inactions, but only the "extrinsic and intrinsic conformity of the normative act adopted with the Constitution"[11] in connection with the scope of the Constitutional Court's competency to exercise constitutional review a priori on the laws, especially if the constitutionality check is required by a normative act amending a law whereby it was decided by the case-law that "In accordance with Art. 146 sub-par. a) of the Constitution, the a priori constitutional review s exercised by the Constitutional Court only on the laws before they are promulgated, not on the provisions of laws in force. Irrespective of the connections that can be made between the amending text and the amended text, the Constitutional Court, on grounds of Art. 146 sub-par. a) of the Constitution, cannot make a ruling within the a priori control over the law-amending text to be submitted to promulgation and it cannot expand constitutional review over the amended text from a law in force"[12].

Decision no. 799 of 17 June 2011 made by the Constitutional Court is important, because it established competency of this court of ruling over the constitutionality of the review law, adopted by the parliament before being subjected to referendum. In this regard, it decided that: "The review law adopted by the Parliament needs to be submitted to referendum, under the conditions of Art. 151 par. 3 of the Basic Law to be examined by the Constitutional Court to find out, on the one hand, whether the Court's decision on the law draft or proposal for review of the Constitution was respected or not and, on the other hand, whether the changes and completions made to the draft or proposal for review in the procedure for parliamentary debate and adoption complies with the constitutional provisions concerning the review."[13] .

More decisions have been ruled by our constitutional court in connection with the determination of its competency of ruling on the constitutionality of decisions made by the Parliament. In this regard, we refer to an important matter arising from the case-law in connection with the scope of constitutional review in this matter. In this regard, the Constitutional Court has constantly ruled that only decisions made by the Parliament can be subjected to the constitutional review, adopted after this competency has been conferred by the lawmaker, affecting constitutional values, rules and principles or, as applicable, the organization and operation of authorities and institutions with a constitutional rank.[14].

At the same time, the Constitutional Court stated that the task of controlling the decisions made by the Parliament "is an expression of the Rule of Law's requirements and a guarantee of the fundamental rights and freedoms… lack of jurisdiction control is equal to a transformation of the parliamentary majority into judges of own acts"[15] In the same regard, it was claimed that accepting the contrary thesis, leading to the exclusion of the exercise of constitutional review of the decisions made by the Parliament, made by violating the express provisions of the law, would lead to the placement of the supreme representative body of the people- the Parliament- above the law and accepting the idea that it is precisely the authority which legitimately adopts the laws constitutionally may breach them without any sort of punishment.[16]

One of the most important problems to have made the object of analysis by the Constitutional Court refers to the competency of this court of ruling on the conformity of a normative act with a legal act of the European Union institutions. In this regard, the case-law has constantly stated that the constitutional court has no competency to carry out a conformity control between a directive and the national normative act whereby it is transposed. A potential non-conformity of the national act to the European one does not implicitly draw the unconstitutionality of the national act of transposition. The competency of conferring greater protection in the national law towards the legal instruments of the European Union devolves on the lawmaker.[17]

In connection with the constitutionality check of the decisions ruled by the High Court of Cassation and Justice in settling appeals in the interest of the law, the Constitutional Court has ruled in its case-law that according to the legal rules in force, it has not such competency[18]). However, if, by a decision ruled in an appeal for the interest of the law, a legal text is given a certain interpretation, it cannot exclude the competency of the Constitutional Court of analysing the respective text, in the interpretation given by the court of last instance. "From the perspective of relating to the Constitution's provisions, the Constitutional Court checks the constitutionality of the applicable legal texts, in the interpretation enshrined in the interest of the law. Admitting a contrary thesis contravenes to reason of existence itself of the Constitutional Court, which would deny its constitutional role, accepting that a legal text is applied under the limits which would collide with the Basic Law[19]."

The case-law has established that the constitutional disputes court may rule in connection with the constitutionality of a repealing rule, seeing as, on the one hand, the presumption of constitutionality of the law is a relative presumption and, on the other hand, the provisions of Law no. 24/2000 lay down that it is impossible to reinstate the initial normative act by repealing of an prior repealing act.[20]

With regard to the competency of the Constitutional Court of settling legal disputes of constitutional nature, several relevant decisions have been ruled.

A first aspect is the definition given by the Constitutional Court to the legal dispute of constitutional nature: "The legal conflict of constitutional nature implies specific acts or actions whereby one or more authorities assign themselves powers, duties or competencies which, according to the Constitution, belong to other public authorities or the omission of public authorities, consisting in the declination of their jurisdiction or refusal to carry out certain acts falling within their obligations". Consequently, according to the court's case-law, legal disputes of constitutional nature are not limited to just disputes of positive or negative jurisdiction, which could create institutional blockages, but aim at any conflicting legal situations whose occurrence reside directly in the Constitution's text.[21].

The case- law has set out that political parties, public persons of public law are not in the category of public authorities that are susceptible of being parties involved in a legal dispute of constitutional nature which, according to the provisions of Art. 8 par. 2 of the Basic Law, contributes to the definition and expressing of the public will of the citizens. Hence, it is the Constitutional Court's opinion that political parties are not public authorities. Also, parliamentary groups as well are not public authorities, but structures of the chambers of Parliament. "A potential conflict between a political party or a parliamentary group and a public authority does not fall within the category of conflicts that can be settled under the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, as per Art. 146 sub-par. a) of the Constitution".[22]

By the same decision, the Constitutional Court ruled that opinions, judgments of value or allegations of a public dignity mandate holder- as is the President of Romania, or the leader of a public authority- concerning other public authorities cannot, by themselves, constitute legal disputes between public authorities, because they cannot trigger institutional blockages, if not followed by actions or inactions which may prevent these public authorities from carrying out their constitutional tasks.

Judicial review is an important way to guarantee the Basic Law's supremacy, since the courts, by the nature of their duties, they construe and enforce the law, which also implies the obligation to analyse compliance of the legal acts subjected to judicial review with the Constitution's rules. Consequently, the courts have competency in the matter of constitutional justice. We are taking into consideration not only the general obligation of the judge to comply with and enforce the Constitution rules or the duties conferred by law to refer the constitutional court by an exception of unconstitutionality, but particularly the possibility to censure a legal act in terms of constitutionality.

Recent case-law and doctrine in the matter look into the competency of the courts to check some legal acts in terms of compliance with the constitutional rules. An unconstitutional legal act is an act issued with misuse of power.

The unconstitutionality of a legal act may be ascertained by a court if the following conditions are cumulatively met:

1. the court exercises its duties within the limits of the competency set out by law;
2. the legal act may be individual or normative; it may be binding or elective;
3. not to have to the case the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court to rule over the constitutionality of a legal act;
4. settlement of the case should depend on the legal act being criticized for its unconstitutionality;
5. there is a pertinent, sufficient and reasonable motivation of the court on the legal act's unconstitutionality.

If these conditions are cumulatively met, the boundaries of the courts 'duties are not exceeded, but on the contrary, the principle of the Constitutional primacy applies and effectiveness is given to the judge's role of applying and interpreting the law correctly. Such a solution is justified in relation to the judge's role in the rule of law as well: to construe and enforce the law.

Fulfilment of this constitutional mission, particularly important and difficult at the same time, requires the judge to enforce the law by complying with the principle of Constitutional primacy; consequently, to evaluate the constitutionality of legal acts forming the object of the dispute referred for trial or which apply to the settlement of the case. Enforcement of the legal acts is made by the judge taking account of their legal force, by complying with the principle of Constitutional primacy. In this regard, the provisions of Art. 4 par. (1) of Law no. 303/2004 also need to be mentioned, which force the magistrates to ensure the supremacy of law through their entire activity.

Another problem is that of knowing what are the solutions that the courts can rule, by complying with the conditions shown above, where they find the unconstitutionality of a legal act. There can be two situations: In a first hypothesis, the courts can be directly vested with checking the legality of a legal act, as is the case of the courts of administrative disputes. In this case, the courts can find by making a decision, the absolute nullity of legal acts, on grounds of unconstitutionality. The other situation takes into consideration the hypothesis in which the courts are not vested directly with checking the legal act criticised for unconstitutionality, but that legal act applies for settling the case referred for trial. In this case, the courts can no longer order the cancellation of the unconstitutional legal act; however, they shall no longer enforce it to settle the case.

3. Conclusions

In our opinion, the Constitutional Court's role as a guarantor of the Basic Law should be enhanced by new duties aiming at limiting the excess of power of the State's authorities. We do not agree to what the specialty literature states, i.e. that a potential improvement of constitutional justice could be achieved by reducing the constitutional disputes court's duties[23]. It is true that the Constitutional Court ruled some questionable decisions in terms of abiding by the limits of exercising the duties incumbent upon it under the Constitution, by undertaking the positive lawmaker role.[24]. Reduction of the duties of the constitutional court for this reason is not a solution as legal basis. Surely, reducing the duties of a state authority leads to the removal of the risk of faultily exercising such duties. This is not how the activity of a state authority is improved in a rule of law, but by searching for legal solutions of carry out the duties which turn out to be necessary to the state and social system under better conditions.

Proportionality is a fundamental principle of the law explicitly enshrined by constitutional, legislative regulations and international legal tools. It is based on the values of the rational law of justice and equity and it expresses the existence of a balanced or suitable relationship between actions, situations, phenomena; it is a criterion for limiting the measures set out by the state authorities to what is necessary to reach a legitimate goal, this way guaranteeing the fundamental rights and avoiding the abuse of power by the state's authorities. Proportionality is a basic principle of the European Union's law, being expressly enshrined by the provisions of Art. 5 of the Treaty on the European Union[25].

We estimate that this principle's express regulation just in the contents of the provisions of Art. 5 of the Constitution, applied in the field of narrowing the exercise of rights is insufficient to emphasize the principle's entire meaning and significance for the rule of law.

In a future review of the basic law, it would be useful to add another paragraph at Art. 1 of the Constitution, foreseeing that "The exercise of State power should be proportional and non-discriminating". This new constitutional regulation would become a genuine constitutional obligation for all State authorities, and they would exercise their duties as such that the measures adopted would register within the limits of the discretionary power recognized by law. At the same time, the possibility is created for the Constitutional Court to penalize the abuse of power in the Parliament and Government's activities, via the constitutional review of laws and ordinances, using the principle of proportionality as a criterion.

Among the Constitutional Court's duties can be included the one of ruling on the constitutionality of those administrative acts exempted from the legality control of the administrative disputes court. This category of administrative acts, to which Art. 126 par. 6 of the Constitution refers, along with the provisions of Law no. 544/2004 of administrative-disputes are particularly important to the whole social and state system. Consequently, constitutionality review is necessary since, in lack thereof, discretionary power of the issuing administrative authority is limitless and it may lead to the excessive narrowing of the exercise of the fundamental rights and freedoms or to the breach of important constitutional values. Our constitutional court should, for the same arguments, be able to review the President's decrees instituting the proceedings of referendum, in terms of their constitutionality.

The High Court of Cassation of Justice has the competency to adopt decisions in the appeal procedure for the interest of the law, which are binding for courts. If there is no legality or constitutionality control, practice has demonstrated that the court of last resort has, in numerous situations, exceeded its duty of construing the law and, by such decisions, has amended or completed normative acts, acting like a genuine lawmaker, thus violating the principle of separation of powers in the State[26]. We believe that, under these circumstances, the Constitutional Court must be given the competency to rule on the constitutionality of the decisions made by the High Court of Cassation and Justice adopted in the appeal proceedings for the interest of the law, in order to avoid the abuse of power from the court of last instance.

CONSIDERATIONS RELATING TO THE ROLE OF THE COUNCIL IN THE INSTITUTIONAL UNION OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

Dragoș Adrian BANTAȘ

Abstract

As a part of what the specialized doctrine calls the "bicameral legislative of the European Union", the Council, representing the Member States, is undoubtedly one of the most important decision-making institutions in the EU. Its modus operandi, however, can be analyzed on two levels. One of these, consisting of the rules according to which the acts are adopted (in particular, the necessary majority) is found in the treaties on which the European Union comes. The second level, however, which can be called "diplomatic", is the work of the representatives of the Member States, meeting in the Committee of Permanent Representatives. Although it enjoys less visibility, compared to the Council formations, it is in fact responsible for most of the acts adopted in the Council. In the following paper we will analyze the functioning of this institution and its role in the institutional ensemble of the European Union.

Keywords: European Union, Council, role, member states, Permanent Representatives, decision making

1. Introductory considerations. The characteristics of the institutional set-up of the European Union.

Since the beginning of the implementation of the European Union project, through the building of the European Communities, they have been endowed with an institutional system designed to ensure the achievement of their objectives. This system had different traits than those of the classical, intergovernmental, international organizations that have until then and after that time. On one hand, for example, this unique institutional system and the way in which the institutions interact in the decision-making process have provided a part of the doctrine with the necessary arguments to characterize the European Communities and later the European Union as a closer construction by the notion of a federal entity, rather than by an international organization.

On the other hand, the institutional system of the European Union, which, as I said in the above lines, differs from that of the international classical organizations, cannot be considered the same as that of the states, whether unitary or federal.

In support of these statements, we invoke, for example, those emphasized in the specialized doctrine, in that „the division of responsibilities between the four (as for that moment) institutions does not overlap with the Montesquieu inherited scheme, a scheme according to which the Parliament is the legislative, the government is the executive, the judges exercising the judicial power."[1]

Also, the Treaty establishing the European Coal and Steel Community "enshrined 4 principles, taken from the Schuman Plan (...) which constitute the basis of the current European Union, namely the superiority of institutions, the independence of institutions, collaboration between institutions and equality between states."[2]

One specific element of the institutional framework of the European Union is that it must ensure the sharing of sovereignty, which "represents at a Union level the fact that the Member States delegate a part of their decision-making powers to the joint institutions they have decided to take in some areas of common interest, through a democratic process at European level."[3]

Due to space considerations, we do not intend in this study to detail the content of these principles. What we consider to be important, however, is that their existence and the differences between those principles and those governing the relations between the central institutions at the level of a state (in particular the principle of the separation of powers) lead to the existence and a different role of each institution of the Union within it.

In this context, we raise the central question of our study, namely: what is the place and role of the Council in the institutional ensemble of the European Union and whether it can be assimilated to different roles fulfilled by national institutions, for example, those in Romania that have the advantage of a understandings superior to those in other states, with which the author is not as familiar.

2. The Council - General Aspects.

As stated in the specialized doctrine, in a Union which, unlike the Member States, does not function to a considerable extent on the principle of separation of powers but after the representation of interests, "the Council is and has always represented national interests. We cannot know for sure whether those who drafted the Treaty of Rome were surprised or not by the way the Commission and the Council interacted with the foundation of the Community. They hoped that the establishment of the EEC would announce an era of greater collaboration, in which class, national interests would diminish, in relation to the interests of the Community as a whole. The initial decision-making structure of the EEC was certainly proof of the central role assigned to the Commission, which was also reflected in its broad spectrum of tasks. Clearly, the Council had to approve the legislation, but the Commission was the one who held the reins. This was due to the Commission's competence to establish the legislative agenda, its institutional resources for the development of Community policies, and the fact that, although the adoption of the legislation required the approval of the Council to amend any Commission proposal, unanimity was required in the Council."[4]

Moreover, the Treaty on European Union enshrines, even if not exactly in these words, the representation of the interests of the Member States by the Council. According to him, "the Council shall be composed of a representative at ministerial level of each Member State empowered to employ the government of the Member State which it represents and to exercise the right to vote"[5].

As far as its functions are concerned, we can see from the same Treaty on the European Union that the Council institution "carries out legislative and budgetary functions together with the European Parliament"[6] as well as "policy-making and coordination functions, in accordance with the conditions set out in the Treaties"[7].

Although at first glance, the expression of Article 16 of the Treaty on European Union may, as far as we consider it, be sufficiently comprehensive with the doctrine of specialty that it does not cover all the functions assigned to the Council by the Treaties. Therefore, in the continuation of our study, we will try, following a structure inspired by the author Robert Schutze, to identify the different roles that the Council occupies in what the Court of Justice considered to be the system of the "basic constitutional charter"[8] of the European Union.

3.The Council as guardian of respect for the values listed in Article 2 of the Treaty on European Union.

We start our analysis by stating the first role the Treaties devote to the Council, namely the guardian of respect for the values listed in Article 2 of the Treaty on European Union.

On this occasion, we make it clear that we prefer to treat the places and roles enshrined in the treaties of this institution in the order in which they appear in the TEU and the TFEU, as we do not want to achieve a hierarchy of them, which we believe can only be based on inherently subjective criteria. In this idea, a presentation that follows the order of the Treaties presents both the advantage of avoiding hierarchy and the pursuit of the logic of the Treaties.

The Treaty on European Union therefore sets out, in Article 2, a series of values that the Union is founded on. In its Article 7, it also establishes a mechanism for monitoring compliance by Member States and for sanctioning their violation.

The history of this mecanism, although not particulary long, is nevertheless rich. Thus, according to the specialized doctrine, "the initial text established the competence and described the procedure which allowed the Council to determine the existence of a serious and persistent breach by a Member State of the principles mentioned above and to apply the sanction of suspending certain rights of that state deriving from membership status, such as the right to vote in the Council. Further, the Treaty of Nice added a first paragraph that permitted the Council to determine even just the existence of a clear risk of a serious breach of the principles and to address appropriate recommendations to that state. This leaves the necessary room for a diplomatic solution before the fait accompli (...). The last amending treaty that reformed EU constitutional law, the Treaty of Lisbon, inserted current Article 2 in TEU and modified Articles 7 and 49 TEU accordingly, replacing the reference to the principles set out in former Article 6 paragraph 1 TEU with the reference to the values EU is founded on. It also replaced the words <<The Council, meeting in the composition of the Heads of State or Government and acting by unanimity>> with <<The European Council, acting by unanimity>>, in order to differentiate between the Council and the European Council"[9].

In particular, the article referred to states that "on a reasoned proposal from one third of the Member States, the European Parliament or the European Commission and with the consent of the European Parliament, the Council, acting by a majority of four fifths of its members, may find that there is a clear risk of a serious infringement of the values laid down in Article 2 by a Member State. Before proceeding with this finding, the Council shall hear the Member State concerned and may issue recommendations to it, acting in accordance with the same procedure."[10]

In addition, "the Council shall regularly verify that the reasons which have led to this finding remain valid".[11]

In a more severe situation, finding a serious violation of the values in art. 2 TEU, this time taken by the European Council, "acting unanimously on a proposal from one third of the Member States or the European Commission and with the consent of the European Parliament," [the Council] "acting by a qualified majority may decide to suspend certain rights to the Member State concerned following the application of the Treaties, including the right to vote in the Council of the representative of the government of that Member State. In so doing, the Council shall take into account the possible consequences of such suspension on the rights and obligations of natural and legal persons. [The] Council, acting by a qualified majority, may subsequently decide to amend or withdraw the measures taken pursuant to paragraph 3 in response to a change in the situation which has led it to impose such measures."[12]

Therefore, we note that, without diminishing the importance of this issue, the Council is not the only guardian of the Member States' compliance with the values in Article 2 but, together with the institutions of the Commission, the European Parliament, and the European Council, , in the tradition of the system of mutual equilibrium, from a "special unit" whose mission is to ensure that the values to which the candidate states have had to prove to be able to be among the Member States of the Union do not become a letter dead on reaching this goal. However, the extreme political difficulties associated with the activation of such a mechanism have made it play a role similar to Cold War nuclear weapons, a deterrent element whose use can draw consequences to blur the differences between the victors and the losers.

4. The role of ensuring the democratic representativeness of the institutional framework of the European Union.

Although, when we refer to the concept of democratic representativeness, the first institution to which we think is that of Parliament (be it European or national), and the Council is not totally deprived of this feature.

Moreover, the Treaty on European Union states that "the functioning of the Union is based on the principle of representative democracy"[13] and this is ensured by the European Parliament, representing the citizens of the Union, by the European Council, made up of Heads of State (directly elected by the to the citizens of their own countries or to the national Parliaments, composed of elected representatives of the citizens) or to the government (invested after the trust of the national Parliaments) and, albeit to a different extent, by the Council, made up of representatives at the ministerial level of the Member States, "who in turn respond democratically either to national parliaments or to their citizens."[14] Together, the European Parliament, the European Council and the Council give the Union double legitimacy (democratic) from citizens directly and from Member States, who also receive this legitimacy from citizens. In practice, the Union benefits from direct democratic legitimacy (through Parliament) and indirect (through the European Council and the Council), both from citizens.

5. The role of a component of the bicameral legislature of the European Union. Legislative and budgetary responsibilities.

The next role we find in the Council is that part of the bicameral legislature of the European Union. In this respect, Article 14 TEU states that "the European Parliament shall, together with the Council, exercise legislative and budgetary functions"[15]. Moreover, the same Treaty also stipulates that "the Council shall exercise, together with the European Parliament, legislative and budgetary functions. It shall exercise policy-setting and coordination functions in accordance with the conditions laid down in the Treaties".[16]

Basically, in the above expression we find the main functions that national parliaments have and which they exercise according to the unicameral or bicameral system applied in each state. As regards the Council, however, it appears both as a component of the bicameral legislature and as a legislative one, so to speak, unicameral. In this section we only refer to the first of these.

Article 228 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union states that "for the exercise of Union competences, the institutions shall adopt regulations, directives, decisions, recommendations and opinions"[17]. As regards the procedures under which these acts are adopted, the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union has two categories: the ordinary legislative procedure, defined by the TFEU as "the joint adoption by the European Parliament and the Council of a regulation, directive or a decision on a Commission proposal"[18] and what the doctrine calls[19] "special legislative procedures, which may consist of" the adoption of a regulation, a directive or a decision by the European Parliament with the participation of the Council or the Council with the participation of the European Parliament"[20].

The totality of 'acts adopted by [a] legislative procedure constitutes legislative acts'[21], thereby exercising the competences of the Union in order to achieve its objectives.

Regarding the ordinary legislative procedure, it is used, according to the doctrine of specialty, in almost 95% of possible situations[22]. As far as their list is concerned, it would be too broad to circumscribe our approach, but in the specialized doctrine we find the following examples: "services of general economic interest (Article 14 TFEU); citizens' initiatives (Article 24 TFEU); applying the rules on competition to the common agricultural policy (Article 42 TFEU); Common Agricultural Policy (Article 43 TFEU); the exclusion of a Member State from certain activities from the scope of the provisions on the right of establishment (Article 51 (2) TFEU); extending the benefit of provisions on the provision of services to third-country nationals established in the Union (Article 56 (2) TFEU); liberalization of services in certain defined sectors (art. 59 paragraph. (1) TFEU]; immigration and the fight against trafficking in human beings (art. 79 par. (2) TFEU]; judicial cooperation in criminal matters (art. 82 par. (1) and (2) TFEU); Eurojust [Art. 85 par. (1) paragraph. 2 TFUE]; Europol [Art. 88 par. (2) TFEU]; measures necessary to use the euro (Article 133 TFEU); public health (art. 168 par. (4) TFEU]; Structural Funds (Article 177 (1) TFEU); energy [art. 194 par. (2) TFEU]; the Staff Regulations and the Conditions of Employment of other servants of the Union (Article 336 TFEU)"[23]etc.

Under these circumstances, "it is no surprise to assert that we are witnessing the existence of a bicameral legislation at the level of the European Union, if we consider the primary headquarters of the matter, namely the Treaty on European Union (TEU) and the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union )"[24]. Moreover, "the reference to the bicameralism of the European Union legislature is also present in the Protocol no. 2 on the principles of proportionality and subsidiarity, which, at art. 4, regulates the fact that the draft legislative acts and the Commission's amended drafts are transmitted to national parliaments and to the <<European Union legislative body>>"[25]. In addition, "it is worth mentioning that, for the first time, we find the use of this syntagm (in singular!), Which means that it is a single legislative entity made up of the two institutions (the European Parliament and the Council) are enshrined in art. 14 par. (1) TEU and Art. 16 par. (1) TUE"[26]. It seems almost natural that, under these conditions, a parallel between the European Union and the federal states should be made, in which "<< Parliament is compulsorily composed of two legislative bodies. The first room comprises the representatives of the nation>>[27] (in the case of the European Union, it is the European Parliament) and <<the second chamber consists of the representatives of the states that form the federation" >> (at the level of the European Union such a composition is known to the Council)"[28].

As far as the actual implementation of the ordinary legislative procedure is concerned, it is detailed in Article 294 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union. The same Treaty regulates the budgetary procedure, which has many similarities to the one regulated in art. 294 TFEU.

Apart from this, where the European Parliament and the Council behave like a bicameral legislature, adopting together the legislative acts that the Treaties state that they must be adopted under the ordinary legislative procedure, there are also many cases in which the Council behaves as if it is allowed to speak, one-chamber legislative, by adopting acts on the initiative of the Commission (or, in some cases, the Member States[29]), without the participation of Parliament. We will refer to these in the following.

6. Council as single-chamber legislation. Special legislative procedures.

Unlike the ordinary legislative procedure, which has a unitary enshrinement in the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, the special legislative procedures are not regulated in the same way, and their inclusion in a single article of the Treaties is likely to present neither so many advantages practical. Instead, the Treaties opt for the description of each legislative procedure used in each provision referring to a special legislative procedure. Thus, when the Treaties have excluded the application of the special legislative procedure and are in the process of making use of a special legislative procedure in the decision-making process, it is described in the following, which in a way facilitates their application.

However, classifications of special legislative procedures not only can be carried out, they have even been done in doctrine. For example, starting from the content of art. 289 TFEU, which states that "in specific cases provided for in the Treaties, the adoption of a regulation, directive or decision by the European Parliament with the participation of the Council or the Council with the participation of the European Parliament constitutes a special legislative procedure"[30], Professor Augustin Fuerea asserts that "from the contents of the headquarters of the matter referred to above, we appreciate that the wording" special legislative procedures "is appropriate given the existence of the two ways of adopting legal acts, as follows (...) Analyzed by comparison, we find that in <<the ordinary legislative procedures>>, compared to the ordinary legislative procedure, the Commission lacks the legislative initiative belonging either to the Council or to the European Parliament. Depending on the areas subject to legislation, a procedural or other procedure is followed, in accordance with the Treaties, in full agreement with the established competencies and the principles governing the matter"[31].

We also appreciate that the special legislative procedures in which acts are adopted by the Council can also be classified according to the role of the European Parliament, which can be adopted after consultation of the European Parliament, in which case its position does not oblige the Council, either with the approval of Parliament , where his position is ignored by the Council, which cannot adopt the acts in question without Parliament's approval, but in which, as pointed out by the specialized doctrine, the non-dominant institution (in our case the Parliament) cannot influence the content of the adopted act, may or may not agree with it in its entirety[32].

Here are some examples of special legislative procedures that illustrate the situations outlined above.

Thus, art. Article 21 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union provides that "for the same purposes as those referred to in paragraph 1, and where the Treaties have not provided powers for action, the Council, acting in accordance with a special legislative procedure, may adopt measures in the field of social security or social protection. The Council shall act unanimously after consulting the European Parliament".[33]

Or, in an example corresponding to the second hypothesis, art. Article 19 of the same Treaty states that "Without prejudice to the other provisions of the Treaties and within the limits of the powers conferred on it by the Union, the Council, acting unanimously in accordance with a special legislative procedure and with the consent of the European Parliament, may take the necessary measures to combat any discrimination based on sex, race or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation"[34].

In any case, examples of special procedures can be identified throughout the duration of the Treaty, but their number and scope do not allow us to list them within the space boundaries of this approach. We consider, however, that the examples set out above are appropriate for illustrating the exposed principle.

It should be noted that, by virtue of organizing the institutional framework of the European Union on the basis of checks and balances, even if the Council or another institution adopts seemingly unilateral acts, a role may be identified, albeit secondary, of at least one of the other institutions, as is the case of the Parliament in the examples above. For its part, the Council can also play such a role, for example in the three situations in which the European Parliament adopts acts with the participation of the Council, but, for space-related reasons, we will not devote a special section of our study to this situations.

7. The Council as part of the Union Executive.

We make an exception to the above-mentioned rule that we look at the roles of the Council in order of their consecration in the Treaties to present a hypostasis closely related to the constituent part of the legislature. Thus, at the state level, after the adoption of legislation, it has to be put into practice, executed, adapted to concrete situations. In general, this prerogative lies with the executive power. One of the ways in which, at least in Romania, the described process is carried out is the issue of law enforcement acts, such as government decisions, ministerial orders, etc.

At European Union level, this is generally the case for the Commission. For example, art. Article 291 (2) TFEU provides that "where uniform conditions for the implementation of legally binding Union acts are required, those acts confer on the Commission implementing powers or, in special and duly justified cases, as well as in cases referred to in Articles 24 and 26 of the Treaty on European Union [both concerning the Common Foreign and Security Policy], the Council"[35].

Nowadays, "the Regulation (EU) no 182/2011 of the European Parliament and the Council lays down the rules and general principles concerning mechanisms for control by EU countries of the Commission's exercise of implementing powers"[36]. "This control is performed by means of what is known in EU jargon as 'comitology' procedures[37], i.e. the Commission is assisted by committees consisting of EU countries' representatives and chaired by a representative of the Commission"[38]

In the literature, reservations were expressed regarding the provisions of art. 291. More specifically, the author Robert Schutze considers that constitutionally, the exercise of the executive function by the Council appears problematic, because it assumes that one of the components of the Union legislature puts into effect its adopted acts.[39] However, the fact that, through the Lisbon Treaty reforms, this situation is definitely the exception (as demonstrated by the wording of Article 291, which we have just mentioned above), makes the frequency of such an occurrence overlaps between powers remain low.

8. Delegator of the legislative duties.

Just like a national legislature, art. 290 TFEU provides that "a legislative act may delegate to the Commission the power to adopt non-legislative and non-legislative acts which supplement or amend certain non-essential elements of the legislative act"[40]. As a legislative act, we conclude that the delegation will be the institution or the institutions that adopt the legislative act in question, i.e. the Parliament and the Council, the Council or the Parliament. The same institutions shall be empowered to exercise control over the manner in which delegated powers are exercised and may decide, including revocation, under the conditions set forth in art. 290 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union.[41]

9. Platform for coordinating Member States' policies

The Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union has, for the first time in the history of European construction, enshrined the existence of categories of competence. Among these, we also find the category enshrined in Article 6 TFEU, the powers ...

Examples of Member State policy co-ordination appear in different areas, and the Council behaves in almost all of these situations as a platform for the interaction of the states concerned.

For example, art. 71 TFEU provides that "a Standing Committee is set up within the Council to provide for the promotion and strengthening of operational cooperation in the field of internal security within the Union"[42]. The task of the Committee is to promote coordination of the action of the competent authorities of the Member States.

Also, Art. 121 states that "Member States shall regard their economic policies as a matter of common concern and coordinate them within the Council in accordance with Article 120. [To that end] "The Council, on a recommendation from the Commission, shall draw up a draft general guidelines economic policies of the Member States and of the Union and shall report to the European Council on this. The European Council, on the basis of the Council's report, discusses the conclusions on the broad guidelines of the economic policies of the Member States and of the Union. On the basis of these conclusions, the Council adopts a recommendation setting out these general guidelines. The Council shall inform the European Parliament of its recommendation."[43]

In the same vein, "for the purpose of ensuring closer coordination of economic policies and sustainable convergence of Member States' economic performance, the Council, on the basis of the reports submitted by the Commission, oversees economic developments in each of the Member States and in the Union, and aims to ensure closer coordination of economic policies and sustainable convergence of the economic performance of the Member States. the consistency of economic policies with the general

Legislative acts shall explicitly define the objectives, content, scope and duration of the delegation. The essential elements of a given area are reserved to the legislative act and can not therefore be subject to the delegation of powers. (2) The legislative acts expressly lay down the conditions for the application of the delegation; these conditions may be the following: (a) the European Parliament or the Council may decide to revoke the delegation; (b) the delegated act may enter into force only if no objection has been expressed by the European Parliament or the Council within the period laid down in the legislative act. For the purposes of points (a) and (b), the European Parliament shall act by a majority of its component members and the Council shall act by a qualified majority. 3. The title of the delegated acts shall enter the adjective "delegated" or "delegated".

Similarly similar provisions can also be found in Article 146 TFEU (with reference to the coordination of national employment policies, to achieve the objectives referred to in Article 145 TFEU) and beyond. Although the role of the Council may appear to be different in these articles, their commonality is its relatively low involvement, which appears either as a platform for the reunification of Member States or as the issuer of recommendations or other non-binding acts , The Treaties leaving Member States the task of adopting concrete measures.

10. External action

As regards the Union's external action, we can see that the role of the Council can be classified according to the general or specific nature of the procedures followed for the Union's external action, understood as the totality of the situations in which the Union acts as a subject of public international law , in relation to third parties.

Thus, with regard to the Common Foreign and Security Policy, its principal place of business can be identified in the Treaty on European Union. Accordingly, "the Council shall develop the common foreign and security policy and adopt the necessary decisions for its definition and implementation, on the basis of the broad guidelines and strategic lines defined by the European Council"[45]. Moreover, "the Council and the High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy shall ensure the unity, consistency and effectiveness of Union action"[46].

Article 28 TEU also states that "where an international situation requires an operative action by the Union, the Council shall take the necessary decisions. They shall set out the objectives, the importance, the means to be made available to the Union, the conditions for their implementation and, where appropriate, their duration. [In addition] "where there is a change in circumstances which has a clear incidence on a situation which is the subject of such a decision, the Council shall review the principles and objectives of that decision and take the necessary decisions' [and in the event of] the implementation of a decision referred to in this Article, any Member State shall refer the matter to the Council, which deliberates and seeks the appropriate solutions.[47]

Also within the CFSP, "the Council adopts decisions defining the position of the Union on a certain issue of a geographic or thematic nature"[48] and exercises its authority over the Political and Security Committee, which it may authorize "for a crisis management operation and during its term, in accordance with those established by the Council, take appropriate decisions on political control and strategic direction of the operation. "[49] By the same token, the Council "may entrust the task of a group of Member States with a view to defending the Union's values and serving its interests"[50].

Of course, these are just the main coordinates of the Council's role in the CFSP. For space considerations, we summarize these, making it clear that this section can be developed by exposing the concrete mechanisms for transposing the mechanisms presented.

Turning to the issues covered by the TFEU, we can identify the procedure with general applicability for the negotiation and conclusion of international agreements, the procedure applicable to exceptional situations, such as the Common Commercial Policy, but also other distinct regulated procedures.

Thus, Article 218 TFEU is the seat of the matter for the procedure applicable, as a rule, to the negotiation and conclusion of international agreements. According to him, the Council authorizes the opening of negotiations, adopts negotiating directives, authorizes signing and concludes agreements. The same Council may address directives to the negotiator and may designate a special committee, the negotiations having to be conducted in consultation with this committee. The Council, on a proposal from the negotiator, shall adopt a decision authorizing the signing of the agreement and, where appropriate, its provisional application before entry into force and at the proposal of the negotiator, adopt a decision on the conclusion of the agreement.[51]

Similar, but not identical, procedures are also regulated in Art. 207 TFEU, art. 213 (granting financial assistance to third countries), art. 215 (interruption or restriction, in whole or in part, of economic and financial relations with one or more third countries and restrictive measures against natural or legal persons, groups or non-State entities, etc.

Also, as regards the procedures for the accession of third countries to the Union or the withdrawal of a State within it, the Council also plays a leading role. Thus, under the first hypothesis, art. 49 TEU provides that "the requesting State shall address its request to the Council, acting unanimously after consulting the Commission and after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament, which shall act by a majority of its constituent members. The eligibility criteria approved by the European Council are taken into

The Member State which decides to withdraw shall notify its intention to the European Council. On the basis of the European Council guidelines, the Union negotiates and concludes an agreement with that State setting out the conditions for withdrawal, taking into account its future relations with the Union.* This agreement is negotiated in accordance with Article 218 (3) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union [therefore, on the basis of the above procedure, the dominant role of the Council being maintained]. It shall be concluded on behalf of the Union by the Council*, acting by a qualified majority, after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament*[53].

11. The role of the Council in economic and monetary policy

A special situation arises in the aspects related to Economic and Monetary Union, as well as other aspects related to the economic aspects. In particular, the Council is entrusted with decision-making powers and occasionally complements the action of the European Central Bank. In this sense, we might consider that the institution under consideration behaves like a unicameral parliament, but with the same ease we can give up trying to assimilate this Council role with a similar domestic function, accepting the sui generis character of its prerogatives.

According to the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, in particular, "in the event of exceptional circumstances where the movement of capital from or to third countries causes or threatens to cause serious difficulties for the functioning of the economic and monetary union, the Council may, adopt, on a proposal from the Commission and after consulting the European Central Bank, with regard to third countries, safeguard measures for a period of up to six months where such measures are strictly necessary ".

Also, if it is established, in the procedure provided for in paragraph 3, art. that "the economic policies of a Member State (...) risk compromising the proper functioning of the economic and monetary union, the Commission may address a warning to that Member State and the Council, on a recommendation from the Commission, may address the necessary recommendations to the Member State concerned. The Council, acting on a proposal from the Commission, may decide to make its recommendations public and to decide, in a spirit of solidarity between Member States, to take appropriate measures in the economic situation, particularly where serious difficulties arise in the supply of certain products, energy ".

Where a Member State is in difficulties or is seriously threatened with serious difficulties due to natural disasters or exceptional occurrences outside its control, the Council, acting on a proposal from the Commission, may grant financial assistance to the Member State concerned from the Union, under certain conditions.[54]

Where the Commission considers that there is an excessive deficit in a Member State or is likely to occur, it shall address an opinion to the Member State concerned and shall inform the Council accordingly. It shall, on a proposal from the Commission, taking into account any observations by the Member State concerned and after a global assessment, decide whether or not there is an excessive deficit. When making this finding, the Council, acting unanimously without delay, shall adopt, on a recommendation from the Commission, the recommendations addressed to the Member State concerned with a view to bringing the situation to an end within a given time limit. If the Council finds that no effective action has been taken within that timeframe in response to its recommendations, it may make its recommendations public. If the State concerned continues to disregard the Council's recommendations, it may decide that the Member State concerned shall within a given time adopt the deficit reduction measures which the Council considers necessary to remedy the situation. In such a case, the Council may require the Member State concerned to submit reports according to a precise timetable in order to examine the adjustment efforts accepted by that Member State. As long as a Member State does not comply with a decision adopted in the context above, the Council may request the Member State concerned; to publish additional information to be specified by the Council before issuing bonds and securities; to invite the European Investment Bank to revise its lending policy towards the Member State concerned; to require the Member State concerned to establish, besides the Union, until the date on which the Council considers that the excessive deficit has been corrected, an interest-free deposit in an appropriate amount or, finally, to impose fines in an appropriate amount.[55]

The Council shall wholly or partly abrogate its decisions or recommendations in so far as it considers, from its point of view, that the excessive deficit in the Member State concerned has been corrected. Where the Council has previously made its recommendations public, it shall publicly declare, as soon as the said decision has been repealed, that there is no excessive deficit in the Member State concerned.[56]

The Council, acting either on a proposal from the Commission and after consulting the European Parliament and the European Central Bank or on a recommendation from the European Central Bank and after consulting the European Parliament and the Commission, shall adopt the provisions referred to in Articles 4, 5.4, 19.2, 20, 28.1, 29.2, 30.4 and 34.3 of the Statute of the ESCB and of the ECB.

In order to ensure the place of the euro in the international monetary system, the Council, on a proposal from the Commission, shall adopt a decision establishing common positions on issues of particular interest to the economic and monetary union within the competent international financial institutions and conferences. The Council shall act after consulting the European Central Bank.

After consulting the European Parliament and after discussion within the European Council, the Council, acting on a proposal from the Commission, shall decide which Member States qualify for a derogation fulfil the necessary conditions on the basis of the criteria set out in paragraph 1 and terminate the derogations concerning those Member States. irrevocably the rate at which the euro replaces the currency of that State and decides the other measures necessary for the introduction of the euro as the single currency in that Member State.

The Council also intervenes in the competition policy. In particular, "at the request of a Member State, the Council, acting unanimously, may decide that aid granted or to be granted by that State shall be considered compatible with the internal market by way of derogation from Article 107 or from the regulations provided for in Article 109, where such a decision is justified by exceptional circumstances ".

12. The Council as a component of the Union Constituent

If we accept the theory of the existence of a Constitution of the European Union, stated, among others, by the author Robert Schutze, then we should also accept the existence of a constitutive power. Of course, in this capacity, we are mainly meeting the Member States, gathered at an Intergovernmental Conference that can review the existing Treaties, but outside of it, the review procedures set out in the TEU and the TFEU also play a role for the Council.

Thus, in the ordinary revision procedure, its place is not a dominant one, and the Council is mainly endowed with the prerogative of receiving Parliament's and Commission's draft revisions initiated by any of the Member States, to submit them to the European Council and be notified to national parliaments.

But a much more important role is left to the Council by Article 352 TFEU. It states that "where Union action proves necessary in the policies defined in the Treaties, in order to attain one of the objectives set out in the Treaties, without their having provided the necessary powers, the Council, acting unanimously at the Commission proposal and after approval by the European Parliament, shall adopt the appropriate measures. Where those provisions are adopted by the Council in accordance with a special legislative procedure, it shall act unanimously on a proposal from the Commission and after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament. " In other words, in the case of application of Article 352 TFEU, the Council presents itself as a constituent of the Union, although, as I said above, that role is exercised in cooperation with the other Union institutions referred to by the legislation in question.

13. Conclusion.

As a conclusion of our study, instead of resuming the issues we have already presented to the distinguished reader, we would like to ask a question about which we would be happy to represent a starting point for an interesting debate: to what extent does the role of the Council in the institutional architecture of the European Union resemble the role of a single-chamber legislative or of a chamber of the bicameral legislative in the Member States? To draw an answer, let us resume the functions we have assigned to the Council. Thus, we considered that it behaves as one of the "guardians" of respecting the values of art. 2 TEU. But if we give these values a constitutional nature, do we not find the same role in the national parliaments in procedures such as the referral of the Constitutional Courts or the suspension of the Presidents? We have further stated that the Council acts as a component of a bicameral legislative or as a one-chamber legislative. In this case, a comparison with the National Parliaments appears almost redundant. As far as the component of implementation of legislative acts is concerned, national parliaments are generally not competent here, but the general framework and the means by which the executive exercises this power, internally, are determined by laws as acts of parliaments. Legislative delegation, especially during parliamentary holidays, or the approval of emergency ordinances are also mechanisms known by the constitutional systems of the Member States. The role of platform to coordinate the actions of the Member States is, by its nature, not to be exercised internally. On the other hand, national parliaments play a less powerful role in foreign policy than the Council at EU level, almost by merely ratifing the agreements concluded by the executive branch, but some means of controlling the exercise of these prerogatives exist, and I have addressed them in a previous study. Also, in budgetary matters, national parliaments have an important and obvious role, mainly in adopting laws on the state budget or those relating to its sources, such as taxes and duties. These issues are closely related to monetary policy, although this is in the Member States and the Union, mostly exercised by the central banks. Last but not least, the National Parliaments find themselves in the position to act as constitutive powers, the last of the positions we have found in our study.

THE ROLE OF THE PRESIDENCY IN THE FUNCTIONING OF THE EUROPEAN UNION ROMANIAN PRESIDENCY OF THE EU COUNCIL - CHALLENGES AND OPPORTUNITIES

Dragoș – Adrian BANTAȘ[1]

Abstract

This year, for the first time in the history of its membership in the European Union, Romania exercises the rotating presidency of the Council of the European Union. As far as the Council is concerned, it is undoubtedly one of the most important decision-making factors, part of what the specialized doctrine calls the "bicameral legislative of the European Union". The manner of exercising the presidency, the role of the Presidency in the proper functioning of the Council, the challenges and opportunities related to it are, in our opinion, topics of interest for the Romanian public and their approach can bring more clarity to the debates held in this honorable, but the difficult period. That's exactly why the aforementioned subjects are the research topic of the research paper that we submit to your attention in the lines below.

Keywords: Romania, EU, Council, Presidency, role, opportunities, difficulties.

1. Introductory considerations.

As we said in the abstract of the research that we are now subbmiting to your attention, this year, Romania exercises, for the first time in the history of its membership of the European Union, the Presidency of the Council. This gives us the opportunity to analyze both the role of the Council in the institutional set-up of the European Union and the role of its Presidency, in two related research.

Thus, if in the previous study we analyzed the place and the role of the Council in the institutional structure of the EU and we noticed the multiple postures in which it can be found, in the present study we are going further in the same direction and, without repeating the above, making a step towards a detailed analysis of the role of the Council Presidency. To this end, unlike the previous study, we will focus especially on the provisions of the Council's Rules of Procedure and its Annex, complementing our statements with aspects underlined by the specialized doctrine.

Having said that, we will proceed to the analysis of the relevant provisions of the Rules in question.

2. The role of the Presidency in the finctioning of the EU Council.

Thus, Article 2 of the Annex to the above-mentioned Rules of Procedure contains general aspects concerning the Council formations and the role of the General Affairs and Foreign Affairs formations. It deepens some of the provisions of the Treaties, stipulating how the General Affairs Council "ensures the consistency of the work of the various Council configurations" and "prepares the meetings of the European Council and aims to implement the measures taken in cooperation with the President of the European Council and the Commission"[1]. Apart from these aspects, the same rule reminds us that "its responsibilities include general policy coordination, institutional and administrative issues, horizontal dossiers affecting several Union policies, such as the multiannual financial framework and enlargement, as well as of any dossier entrusted to it by the European Council, taking into account the rules of operation of the economic and monetary union"[2].

All these duties are exercised, however, under the coordination of the rotating presidency of the institution concerned. This, as provided for in the Treaties, "provides for a period of 18 months pre-established groups of three Member States (...) formed on the basis of an equal rotation of the Member States, their diversity and the geographical balance of the Union "[3]. Regarding the balanced constitution of these groups of Member States, it seems useful to remember that the current group includes, besides Romania, two Member States from different geographical regions of Europe, such as Austria and Finland. Within these groups, "each member of a group ensures, for a six-month period, the rotating presidency of all Council configurations, except for the Foreign Affairs configuration"[4] (this is always ensured by the High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy except for the situation in which he is "replaced, if necessary, by the member of that formation representing the Member State holding the six-month presidency of the Council"[5] or by another exception - by exception - representing the "the situation in which the Foreign Affairs Council is convened to deal with matters of common commercial policy and when its chairman can be replaced by the six-monthly presidency in accordance with Article 2 (5) second subparagraph)"[6]. In regard to the other members of the group, they "support the Presidency in fulfilling all its responsibilities on the basis of a joint program"[7] and each of them, "at the request of the Presidency and acting in accordance with its instructions, replaces it, as if necessary, release certain tasks and ensure the continuity of the Council's work. "[8] In other words, the groups in question (or the troika, as sometimes called in the doctrine or in the public space) must, in my view, be regarded as a whole, that is the meaning we infer from the Rules of Procedure. In this way, instead of each Presidency of each state being a strictly individual exercise, by virtue of the fact that each state participates in virtually 3 rotating Presidencies of 6 months (one as the State to take over the Presidency, one in a state holding it and one as a state holding it), a link is made both between the member states of a group and between them and the following groups.

Also, the Rules of Procedure offer states a fairly high degree of flexibility in making mutual arrangements between members of a group, stipulating that they "can reach other understandings"[9].

In a general look at the role of the Council Presidency, it can be said that the Presidency has an important role to play in the Council's debates, not only because the Presidents are calling for the meetings, but also that the states holding the presidency will be held responsible for the way in which the meetings of the Council are held during their term of office[10]. Therefore, the ministers whose states run the Presidency will have the task of preparing and leading the work of the Council. The practice so far has been to stress the role of the Council Presidency and, in particular, the Presidency of the General Affairs Council. It is responsible for establishing the main coordinates of the work of the Presidency, convening the Council and establishing its provisional program. In reality, however, depending on the main points of the program, it is possible that all ministers of the Romanian Government will be involved in the presidency of the EU Council.[11]

But what, in fact, does the work of the member states of a group, of what we refer to? According to the Rules of Procedure, "for each period of 18 months, the predetermined group of the three Member States holding the Presidency of the Council during that period shall (...) draw up a program of Council activities for the period in question."[12] which is almost impossible to avoid), the program includes issues that interfere with the activities of the Foreign Affairs party, it must be drafted together with its President, in this case, with the High Representative. Also in all cases, the draft program "shall be drawn up in close cooperation with the Commission and the President of the European Council, following appropriate consultations (...), in the form of a single document, at least one month before the beginning of the period concerned, so that it can be approved by the General Affairs Council"[13]. We deduce from them that the program of 18 months of presidency is the work of the members of the group of 3 states that exercise it materially and formally but cannot be drawn up without consulting the representatives of the Commission and the Council European institutions, so these institutions also have a decisive contribution, and the program as a whole is approved by the General Affairs Council, so it must be mastered by all Member States. In other words, the program of a period of 18 months for the exercise of the Presidency must be the result of an interinstitutional collaboration and, consequently, of a broad consensus, without this expression being a cliché, a consensus of which each 3 states must take into account.

So, we described, in the aforementioned the elaboration of the program for a period of 18 months of exercising the Presidency. Naturally, the next step would be to analyze what role the program plays in the economy of the Presidency.

Thus, the Rules provide in this respect that "the Presidency which will carry out its mandate during that period shall draw up, after appropriate consultations, for each Council formation, draft agendas for the meetings of the Council scheduled for the following semester, legislative and operational decisions envisaged. These projects shall be drawn up at least one week before the start of the semester concerned, on the basis of the 18-month program, after consulting the Commission. Projects for all Council configurations are included in a single document. Where appropriate, additional Council meetings may be envisaged in addition to those previously planned. If, during one semester, any of the meetings planned during that period is no longer justified, the Presidency shall not convene that meeting again"[14].

Further development is described in article 3(1) of the Annex to the Council's Rules of Procedure. Specifically, the provision in question states that "in view of the Council's 18-month program, the chairperson shall draw up the provisional agenda for each meeting (which he / she) sends to the other members of the Council and the Commission at least 14 days before the beginning of the meeting (and, at the same time, national parliaments and Member States) "[15]. In other words, the cooperation referred to above expands, knowing also a dimension that we can call qualitative (regarding the nature of acts subjected to it) as well as quantitative (in its exercise a part of the institutions of the Union are involved and some of the components of democratic legitimacy at Union level, national parliaments).

The provisional agenda we have referred to "contains the points for which the request for inclusion on the agenda submitted by a member of the Council or the Commission and any related documents were submitted to the General Secretariat at least 16 days before the start of that meeting [and] (...) shall indicate (...) by an asterisk the points on which the Presidency, a member of the Council or the Commission may request a vote. Such an indication shall be made after all the procedural requirements laid down by the Treaties have been met."[16]

The way of exercising the above is also described in one of the footnotes (sic!) of the Annex, which refers to the statements relating to this article, which states that "the President shall endeavor to ensure that in principle, the provisional agenda for each meeting of the Council devoted to the implementation of the provisions of the TFEU title on the area of freedom, security and justice and any documents relating to those items shall be forwarded to the members of the Council at least 21 days before the beginning of the meeting"[17].

"The Presidency shall remove from the provisional agenda the items relating to draft legislative acts whose examination has not been finalized by Coreper by the end of the week preceding the week preceding that meeting, except where a different form of action is required urgency reasons"[18].

Once the agenda is transmitted, it is time to move our attention to the actual meetings of the Council. In this respect, the Rules stipulate that it "votes at the initiative of the President". In other words, we have already identified one of the roles of the President, to put to the vote the adoption of the acts on the agenda of the Council meeting. But this action is not done in a discretionary manner. The same Rules provide that "the President must initiate a voting procedure on the initiative of a member of the Council or of the Commission, provided that a majority of the Council members so decides"[19]. "The Council can vote only in the presence of the majority of the members of the Council entitled to vote in accordance with the treaties[20] (which, moreover, respects the general philosophy of the rules regarding the conditions under which they may decide the other institutions involved in the Union decision-making process) . When voting, the President, assisted by the Secretariat-General, shall verify that the quorum is met. "[21]

At this point, we must also refer to voting procedures within the Council so that we can become a less visible body, but where the presidency plays a role perhaps even more important than that of its own meetings - the Council said.

Thus, Article 12 of the Rules enshrine the existence of two types of procedures for the adoption of Council acts, written and tacit. The latter is also called the simplified written procedure.

In particular, "Council acts on an urgent matter may be adopted by a vote in writing, if the Council or Coreper decides unanimously to use the said procedure. In special circumstances, the Chair may also propose the use of this procedure; in this case, the written vote may be used if all the members of the Council agree to this procedure. Where the written vote relates to a matter which the Commission has submitted to the Council, the Commission shall be required to accept the use of the written procedure."[22]

At the initiative of the Presidency, however, the Council may also use a simplified written procedure. It is used: "for the purpose of adopting the text of a reply to a written question or, as the case may be, a question for oral answer to the Council by a Member of the European Parliament, after the draft reply has been examined by Coreper; for the purpose of appointing the members of the Economic and Social Committee and the members of the Committee of the Regions and their alternates after the draft decision has been examined by Coreper; for the purpose of making the decision to consult other institutions, bodies, offices or agencies, whenever consultation is required by the Treaties and for the purpose of implementing the common foreign and security policy through the << COREU >>

network.[23] In cases where this procedure is used, "the relevant text shall be deemed adopted at the end of the period set by the Presidency, depending on the urgency of the matter, unless a member of the Council objects."[24]

In turn, the Presidency plays an important role in the way in which Council meetings take place, for example in determining whether they are public or closed. It may decide that the Council's further deliberations on non-legislative proposals on "the adoption of rules that are legally binding in or for Member States through regulations, directives, framework decisions or decisions on on the basis of the relevant provisions of the Treaties, with the exception of internal measures, administrative or budgetary acts, acts on interinstitutional or international relations or non-binding acts (such as conclusions, recommendations or resolutions)[25], which are initially public, to preserve this character unless the "Council or Coreper decides otherwise". Also, the Presidency, but also the Member States or the Commission, may propose "specific themes or topics for these debates, taking into account the importance of the issue and the interest it presents to citizens."[26]

The Presidency is also responsible for complying with the Rules of Procedure and the smooth running of the Council's work, particularly with regard to its working arrangements.

In this regard, it may, "s*ave where the Council decides otherwise, take all appropriate measures to ensure that the time available during meetings is as effective as possible, in particular: (a) to limit, for a particular debate point, the number of persons in each delegation present in the meeting room and decide whether or not to authorize the opening of an additional room; (b) establish the order in which the points and the duration of the debates are addressed; (c) organize the time allocated to the debate on a particular point, in particular by limiting the time for the participants to speak and setting the order of their interventions; (d) request delegations to submit their proposals in writing for the modification of a text under discussion before a certain date, accompanied, where appropriate, by a brief explanation; (e) request delegations having identical or similar positions on a specific point, text or part of a text to designate one of these delegations to express their common position at the meeting or in writing before the meeting*. "[27]

In addition, for the smooth and operational conduct of the Council's work, "the Presidency shall organize the Council's agendas by grouping the items on the agenda which are linked to each other in order to facilitate the participation of the national representatives concerned, especially if a specific Council formation a number of distinct topics need to be addressed."[28]

Following the adoption of the acts, they must be signed by the "acting President at the time of their adoption and by the Secretary-General"[29] who may delegate the signature of the Directors-General of the Secretariat-General.

In the framework of mechanisms relating to the democratic functioning of the Union's institutions, "the Council shall be represented before the European Parliament or its committees by the Presidency or, with the latter's agreement, by a member of the pre-arranged group of three Member States (...) , by the next Presidency or by the Secretary-General "[30].It may also be represented by senior officials of the General Secretariat, but they also act in accordance with the instructions of the Presidency. As a rule, these provisions do not apply to the Foreign Affairs Council, where representation of the Council before the EP rests with the High Representative, but as an exception, it "may be replaced by the member of that Council formation representing the Member State exercising half-year presidency of the Council "[31].

We are now moving to another important role of the Presidency to note that it does not concern only Council formations, with the exception of the General Affairs group, but also the chairmanship of certain bodies coordinated by the Council or whose activities are closely related to it.

Coreper is mainly responsible for preparing the work of the Council. Coreper is also empowered to adopt procedural decisions in the cases provided for in the Council's Rules of Procedure. Although it does not have the power to decide on the merits, in practice, Coreper has become a genuine decision maker.[32]

Or, as the doctrine emphasizes, based on the provisions of the Council's Rules of Procedure, "Coreper is responsible for preparing the work of the Council and for carrying out the mandates entrusted to it by the Council. In all cases, it ensures the consistency of the policies and actions of the European Union and ensures that the (...) principles of subsidiarity, proportunity (...), justification of acts, rules (s) for determining the competences of institutions, bodies and agencies Union, budgetary provisions, rules (procedure), transparency and quality of drafting".[33]

Coreper brings together senior civil servants (from Member States) and operates on two levels: Coreper II, consisting of permanent representatives of the ambassadorial rank, with competence in sensitive or controversial affairs, such as economic and financial affairs or external relations, and liaises with national governments, and Coreper I, consisting of permanent deputy representatives, responsible for issues such as the social affairs, the internal market and transport.[34]

The role of Coreper in the internal decision-making process, the Council, and the Union as a whole is, in our view, more important than the primary or secondary law provisions could refer to.

"Coreper shall examine all items on the agenda of a Council meeting, unless the latter decides otherwise. (He) makes every effort to reach an agreement at its level, which is submitted to the Council for adoption. It shall ensure that the dossier is adequately submitted by the Council and, where appropriate, provides guidance, options or suggestions for solutions. In the event of an emergency, the Council, acting unanimously, may decide to deliberate without this prior examination to take place."[35]

In particular, Coreper examines the legislative proposals that emanate from the Commission and helps set the agenda for Council meetings. This agenda consists of Parts A and B. The first part (List A) covers the subjects on which Coreper has agreed that they can be adopted by the Council without debate, while the second part (list B) contains the themes on which they are additional debates are needed. In the specialized doctrine it is estimated that approximately 70-80% of Council decisions prepared by Coreper and / or working groups are then only formally passed through the Council as points A. "Coreper's decision-making process tends to be a consensus, and in cases where voting rules make it necessary for a qualified majority[36], which contributes both to facilitating this process and to greater legitimacy and acceptance of adopted acts.

For its part, Coreper is supported by about 150 working groups, composed of national experts, examining the Commission's proposals, and can also receive information from specialized committees set up by the Treaties or secondary legislation.[37]

Article 19 of the Rules of Procedure lists, more specifically, part of the tasks of Coreper. It may "adopt the following procedural decisions, provided that the items relating to them have been included on the provisional agenda at least three working days before the meeting. A unanimous decision shall be taken within Coreper for any derogation from that period: (a) the decision to hold a Council meeting in a place other than Brussels or Luxembourg; (b) the authorization to make a copy or extract of a Council document for use in legal proceedings; (c) the decision to hold a public debate in the Council or not to hold a specific deliberation of the Council in public; (d) the decision to make public the results of the votes and the statements entered in the minutes of the Council (...); (e) the decision to use the written procedure; (f) the approval or amendment of Council Minutes (...); the decision to publish or not to publish a text or an act in the Official Journal (...); (h) the decision to consult an institution or body whenever such consultation is required by the Treaties; (i) the decision to establish or extend a deadline for consultation of an institution or body; (j) the decision to extend the deadlines laid down in Article 294 (14) TFEU; and (k) the approval of the wording of a letter to be sent to an institution or body. "[38]

Before returning to the role of the Presidency, we also need to emphasize the fundamental distinction between Coreper and the approximately 150 committees and working groups. Thus, in the specialized doctrine, it has been stressed how Coreper occupies a fundamental place in the Union's decision-making process (which I have described above), prepares the Council's work and executes the tasks assigned to it, and establishes and controls the Council's working groups, while committees and working groups only assist the Council (and Coreper) in preparing the work.[39]

First of all, under the Rules, "Coreper's Presidency is assured, depending on the items on the agenda, by the Permanent Representative or the Deputy Permanent Representative of the Member State holding the Presidency of the General Affairs Council."[40] "The chair of the training groups shall be assisted by a delegate of the Member State holding the Presidency of that formation, except where the Council decides otherwise, by a qualified majority."[41] Moreover, the Rules also provides that "for the preparation of meetings of Council configurations meeting once a semester, where such meetings take place during the first half of the semester, meetings of committees other than Coreper and those of working parties the course of the preceding semester shall be chaired by the Member State delegate who shall chair

the meetings of the said Council." [42]Also, assuming that we are not in the presence of an exception, and subject to an agreement between the Presidencies concerned, "if a case is mainly dealt with during a semester, a delegate of the Member State holding the Presidency during that semester may, during the previous semester, chair meetings of the committees, with the exception of Coreper, and of the working groups, when they debate the dossier."[43]

An exception is also the situation of the examination of the Union budget for a given financial year, in which case "the meetings of the Council's preparatory bodies other than Coreper, which are responsible for preparing the items on the Council's agenda for the examination of the budget, are chaired by a delegate of the Member State holding the Presidency of the Council in the second half of the year preceding the financial year in question (which happens, with the agreement of the other Presidency) and when discussing the above-mentioned budget items. The Presidencies concerned shall consult on practical arrangements. "[44]

As far as committees and working groups are concerned, the Presidency "organizes their meetings so that their reports are available before the Coreper meetings at which they are to be considered."[45]

She "ensures that working groups or committees transmit their files to Coreper only when there is a concrete prospect of advancing or clarifying positions at this level. Conversely, files are returned to working groups or committees only when necessary and in any case only for the purpose of resolving precise and well-defined issues. "[46]

It is also up to the presidency to ensure that work progresses between meetings. In doing so, it may, with the agreement of the working group or the committee concerned, carry out "the most effective consultations on specific issues with a view to reporting possible solutions to the working group or committee concerned [and] written consultations requesting delegations to respond in writing to a proposal before the next meeting of the working group or the committee."[47]

For the smooth running of the preparatory work of the Council, "the Presidency shall, as soon as possible, present to Delegations, in preparation for Coreper, all necessary information to enable Coreper to carry out a thorough preparation, including information on the objective which the Presidency is trying to achieve following the discussion of each item on the agenda. To the contrary, the Presidency, if necessary, encourages delegations to inform the other delegations, in preparing Coreper work, on the positions they will adopt in Coreper. In this context, the Presidency finalizes Coreper's agenda. If the circumstances so require, the Presidency may convene more frequently the preparatory work groups for Coreper. "[48]

For reasons of efficiency, "the Presidency avoids the inclusion on Coreper's agenda of purely informative points, (...), [such as] the outcome of meetings in other fora, with a third State or another institution, the problems of procedure or organization, etc. [which must be] transmitted to delegations in the preparation of Coreper, in writing, whenever possible, and shall not be repeated during the Coreper meetings"[49].

Once the Coreper meeting is opened, the presidency provides all the necessary additional information on the deployment and particularly indicates the time it intends to allocate to each point, avoiding "long introductions and repeating information already made available to delegations"[50].

If need be, and if urgency does not require the adoption of another mode of action, "the Presidency shall postpone for a subsequent meeting of Coreper the points relating to legislative acts on which the committee or working group has not completed its work for at least five days working before the Coreper meeting "[51].

In the course of deliberations on substantive issues, "the Presidency shall, subject to the type of debate required, provide the delegations with the maximum duration of their intervention [which ideally] shall not exceed two minutes."[52]

Surprisingly, it is in principle excluded that all participants take the floor, and this can only happen "in exceptional situations where specific issues arise, with the Presidency setting a time for each speech"[53], and "the Presidency focuses as much as possible much more to the deliberations, especially by inviting delegations to respond to compromise texts or specific proposals"[54]. In the context of the almost tortious search for operability, in which the Presidency's main role is to speed up the pace of Coreper work,"during the meetings and the conclusion the presidency avoids long summaries of the debates and confines itself to concise conclusions on the (substantive and / or procedural) results obtained."[55] Finally, let us further point out that, unless the presidency states otherwise, ”delegations do not speak when they agree to a particular proposal; in this case, silence is considered as a principle agreement "[56].

In a way, the Council Presidency is also linked to the work of other institutions. For example, the Rules of Procedure of the European Council provide that, at least four weeks before each ordinary meeting of the European Council (...), its President, in close cooperation with the member of the European Council representing the Member State holding the six-monthly Presidency of the Council and the President of the Commission, shall submit to the General Affairs Council an annotated draft agenda.[57]

Conclusions.

At first glance, out of all the above, the role of the Council Presidency would appear to be a technical one, mainly linked to the most operative deployment of the works. This perspective, though it would provide a multitude of challenges, would not leave much room for opportunities for the Member State holding the Presidency. However, we are of the opinion that, in a direct relationship with the abilities of the representatives of a state, the Presidency's ability to streamline Council meetings offers appreciable opportunities for the closure of numerous dossiers, some of which are of particular interest to the State concerned, without neglecting the Union's overall interests. In fact, this is the opportunity that this period offers to Romania, but its actual capitalization is related to the capacity of our country's representatives to act as a balancing and dynamic factor in the general economy of the Council's work.

AN ATYPICAL FORM OF CIVIL LIABILITY – THE LIABILITY FOR THE ENVIRONMENTAL DAMAGE

Florin Octavian BARBU[*]

Abstract

The problem of environmental pollution is one of the most serious of today's society, with the consequence of deteriorating man's living conditions and the development of the future civilization.

Environmental law appears as a mixed right, being at the limit of public law with private law, and thus the right of civil liability can be considered as a means of enforcing environmental regulations , with the same title as administrative law.

Thus, civil liability does not make distress between damage (damage) and as such extends to the ecological field, the two cohabiting, based on interfering principles: the precautionary principle, the polluter pays principle and the principle of prevention.

Art. 44 para. Article 7 of the Constitution refers to the protection of the environment in the scope of the right to property: "The right to property oblige to observe the tasks related to the protection of the environment and to ensure good neighbourliness, as well as the observance of the other tasks which, according to law or custom, belong to the owner".

As regards the responsible person / person who may request the prevention or repair of environmental damage, it is necessary to consider, first of all, the general provision of art. 94 par. 1 lit. i from GEO no. 195/2005, which establishes the "polluter pays" principle. Also, Art. 1 of GEO no. 68/2007, which is a special law, states that environmental liability is based on the "polluter pays" principle, both for the purpose of preventing and repairing environmental damage.

Keywords: the protection, envirommental pollution, special law, the precautionary, the consequence.

1. Introductory notion

The The Romanian Constitution, adopted in 1991, included several tangential provisions regarding environmental law, establishing the state's obligation to "restore and protect the environment" and the obligation to protect the environment related to the right to property[1].

On the occasion of the revision of the Constitution[2], the fundamental right of man to a healthy environment[3] has been established, consecrating the legal framework for the exercise of this right, correlated with the obligation of natural and legal persons to protect and improve the environment[4]. We agree with the view that[5], in the content of human right to a healthy environment, its right to correct information on the possibility of ecological damage, an uncertain possibility, but which may cause possible dangers, must also be included.

We emphasize that other countries have been and are concerned about the protection of the environment, enshrining principles in fundamental laws[6].

By GEO no. 195/2006 on environmental protection[7] and by GEO no. 68/2007 on environmental liability with regard to the prevention and remedying of environmental damage[8], the legislator has established

2. Civil Liability in Environmental Law

Therefore, Tort law civil liability, according to some authors, must be considered in terms of its foundation, as follows: liability based on fault, liability of the commissioners for the deed of their offenders, faultless liability for the deed of work and special objective liability which includes the legal regime established by the Protection Law environmental liability, liability for nuclear damage, objective liability of the aircraft operator, liability for damage to persons and goods not on board during take-off, flight or landing[9].

In this area, liability can be subjective, based on the proven fault of the person who committed the act of damage or objective, for the deed of work, under the conditions established by the Civil Code or under the special provisions regarding the regime of this liability.[10]

As far as we are concerned, we consider that civil liability for environmental damage is determined by the existence/non-existence of fault[11], namely:

- subjective liability, based on fault;
- objective liability, which may be governed by the Civil Code or special laws[12].

Government Emergency Ordinance no. 195/2005 regulates the protection of the environment in our country. As a result of the efforts to take into account the Acquis Communautaire in the field, in art. 95 of GEO no. 195/2005 provides:

1. Liability for environmental damage shall be objective, independent of fault; in the case of the plurality of authors, the liability is jointly and severally.
2. Exceptionally, liability may be subjective for damage caused to protected species and natural habitats, according to specific regulations.
3. Prevention and repair of environmental damage shall be carried out in accordance with the procedures of this Governmental Emergency Ordinance and the specific regulations.

As stated in the doctrine, GEO no. 195/2005 established a regime of liability for environmental damage, close to the one established in Community law[13].

With the accession to the European Union in 2007, it was necessary to transpose the Council Directive and the European Parliament no. 2004/35/EC of 21 April 2004 on environmental liability, with particular reference to the prevention and remedying of environmental damage[14].

Thus, Romania transposed the Directive through GEO no. 68/2007, with the same title[15].

Taking into account the GEO no. 195/2005 and GEO no. 68/2007, in order to highlight the particularities of civil liability for environmental damage, it is imperative to analyse the notions of injury (which we have developed in the previous report) or the environmental damage, the responsible person and the persons who can demand the repair of the environmental damage, preventive and reparatory measures or actions, as well as the powers of the public authorities, the basis of liability and the legal nature of such liability[16].

Therefore, both categories of damage, pure environmental damage and ricochet damage are and must be repaired. As such, the repair of pure[17] ecological damage takes place according to provisions no. 95 of GEO no. 195/2005 and the special provisions of GEO no. 68/2007. On the contrary, reparation of damages caused by ricochet, caused to natural persons and private legal entities as a consequence of the damage to the environment, will be done under the conditions and according to the rules of the common law (Article 3 paragraph 4 of GEO 69/2007).

The State's obligation to guarantee the right to compensation for the damage suffered is regulated in Art. 5 let. E, from Law 256/2006, and the basis of liability for environmental damage is enshrined in art. 95 of Law 256/2006. [18]

Therefore, the objective basis of liability is the risk of dangerous activities for the environment or for people's lives, from which we conclude that the liability of the polluter will be committed only if there is evidence of a causal link between his activity and the environmental damage that has occurred.[19]

Objective liability is based on the idea of the risk of activity for environmental damage[20], aiming to ensure greater protection of victims of environmental damage.

Objective responsibility is based on the idea of the activity risk for environmental damage, aiming to ensure greater protection of victims of environmental damage in the future.[21]

Civil liability concerns the culpability of the responsible person who is assessed in terms of the normality of his preventative conduct, the sanction intervening for lack of precaution.[22]

As regards the responsible person, the person who may request the prevention or repair of environmental damage, it is necessary to consider, first of all, the general provision of art. 94 par. 1 let. I, and from GEO no. 195/2005, which establishes the "polluter pays" principle. Also, Art. 1 of GEO no. 68/2007, which is a special law, states that environmental liability is based on the "polluter pays" principle, both for the purpose of preventing and repairing environmental damage.

Under these circumstances, liability is both reparatory and preventive.[23]

Any natural or legal person may have the status of polluter, however, according to art. 2, art. 10-15 and art. 26 and following of GEO no. 68/2007, the polluter is designated the operator of professional activities. Thus, according to art. 2 point 10 of GEO no. 68/2007, an operator means any natural or legal person governed by public or private law who carries out or controls a professional activity or who has been entrusted with decisive economic power over the technical functioning of such an activity, including the holder of a regulatory act for such an activity or the person who registers or notifies such an activity[24].

Professional activity[25] is any activity carried out in a business or enterprise, irrespective of its private or public character, profit or non-profit.

As regards the sphere of persons entitled to demand the prevention or repair of environmental damage, it is necessary to consider the provisions of Art. 5 letter d) of GEO no. 195/2005, which is in conformity with Community rules and provides that the State recognizes, by virtue of the right to a healthy environment, the right to address, directly or indirectly (through environmental organizations), to the competent authorities in environmental matters, irrespective of whether or not an injury has occurred.

Article 20 para. 6 of GEO no. 195/2005 provides that non-governmental organizations have the right to legal action in environmental matters, having an active procedural capacity in such litigation.[26]

In art. 20-25 of GEO no. 68/2007 regulates the right of any natural or legal person to address to the competent public authorities, in the case of environmental damage, which has affected this person, solving the complaint/request following the steps of the established administrative procedure[27].

Against the decisions taken by these authorities, dissatisfied persons can act in administrative litigation. We emphasize that this right also belongs to non-governmental organizations that have the mission of protecting the environment.

Concerning preventive and reparatory measures, GEO no. 68/2007 clearly establishes that polluters are required to take all measures to prevent and repair damage to the environment[28], while setting out how to bear the costs of these actions.

As such, any operator is obliged to prevent imminent damage and to inform the competent authorities (the county environmental protection agency and the County Environmental Guard)[29] within the time limit set by law.

Also, the necessary preventive measures must be proportionate to the imminent threat and lead to the avoidance of injury, taking into account the precautionary principle in making decisions[30]. All these activities are an expression of preventive liability for such damages.

According to the law, the county environmental protection agency may at any time request the operator to take the necessary preventive measures, as well as the possibility to take and carry out the necessary preventive measures itself. [31]

According to art. 2 point 10 of GEO no. 68/2007, reparation measures are any action including injury mitigation or interim measures aimed at restoring, rehabilitating, replacing damaged natural resources or providing an equivalent alternative to those resources or services.

According to art. 14 par. 1 lit. a of GEO no. 68/2007, polluters have the obligation to act immediately to control, isolate, eliminate the negative effects on human health or worsening the deterioration of services.

Also, the operator is obliged to take the necessary reparation measures established according to the law by the county environmental protection agency under the conditions and according to the procedures.[32]

We emphasize that remedies must be proportionate to the damage caused, also taking into account the precautionary principle in making decisions.[33]

Repair of damage according to Annex 2 to GEO no. 68/2007 may be of three kinds:

a) Primary repair (reduction of natural resources and services affected at the initial[34] state or close to it); b) complementary repair (the remedial action to be taken in relation to natural resources to compensate for the fact that the primary repair did not lead to full recovery); c) compensatory reparation (compensation for the loss of natural resources that took place between the date of the damage and the moment when the primary repair takes its full effect).

The costs of preventive and reparatory actions are borne by the operator who caused the damage.[35]

If these costs were borne by the county environmental protection agency, they will be recovered, except in the cases provided by the law, from the polluter operator[36].

In order to guarantee the recovery of these costs, a legal mortgage of the agency is set up on the operator's real estate and an insurance indemnity, according to the law. The registration of the mortgage in the land register and the establishment of the seizure shall be made on the basis of the order of the head of the county environmental protection agency which has established the preventive and reparatory measures that it has carried out.[37]

Operators' liability is jointly owned if two or more operators are concerned.[38]

There are also exceptional situations when the operator is not obliged to bear the costs of the preventive and repairs measures that have been taken.[39]

To attract objective liability, hazardous activities must be found in Annex 3 of GEO no. 68/2007.

From the provisions of art. 95 para. 2 of GEO no. 195/2005 that the legislature did not completely distance itself from subjective liability based on fault, since it held that "exceptionally, liability may also be subjective for damage caused to protected species and natural habitats, in accordance with specific regulations".

As it follows from the above, for the liability of an operator, the following conditions[40] are necessary: the existence of the damage[41], the unlawful act and the causal relationship between the damage and the unlawful deed.

3. Conclusions

Thus,

Finally, we consider that the right to compensation is based on the legal basis not on the behaviour of the author of environmental damage, but on the right of everyone not to be deprived of the value of a good or an advantageous situation in the normal state of the environment in which he lives.

The burden of proof, relating to the existence of elements of tort or delict, lies with the person who is acting in court, usually the victim of environmental damage.

As regards proof of legal action (stricto senso), any evidence is admissible, including witness evidence.

Difficulties are seen in proving guilt because it is a psychic, internal element. Because of the subjective nature of this element, its direct proof is virtually impossible. What can be proved are only the external elements of behaviour, the author's deed and the illicit character of the deed, the eventual circumstances of place and time, the personal ones of the author. At the same time, the injured party has the right to do the opposite, on the facts and circumstances that may remove his guilt.

Expertise may also be available to determine the environmental damage and the causality ratio between the deed and the damage and to determine the amount of damages.[42]

Civil liability lies in environmental law as a last resort, with techniques and tools, especially those of an economic and fiscal nature being given priority.

PERSONAL DATA PROTECTION ISSUE REFLECTED IN THE CASE-LAW OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF ROMANIA

Valentina BĂRBĂȚEANU

Abstract

Over the past few years, data privacy became more and more an issue that stirred on European level lots of debates and determined the adoption of a new set of rules, imposed with the compulsory force of a European regulation. Thus, the EU General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) replaced the Data Protection Directive 95/46/EC and reshaped the way the data are managed in various fields of activity. In Romania, the Constitutional Court had to bring light over important areas that involved the use of personal data and developed a relevant case-law regarding the concordance with the essential standards implied by the protection of private life enshrined both in the Romanian Basic Law and in the European Convention on Human Rights. The paper intends to depict the main challenges that faced the constitutional review and the measure that the Romanian vision over this problem is consistent with the European landmarks set in this field.

Keywords: right to privacy, personal data, European regulation, constitutional review, constitutional case-law.

1. Introduction

The digital age that reigns nowadays has changed not only the way people interact, but also the way the states themselves position their legislation towards the technological progress. Day by day, due to the constant increase of accessibility of various kind of electronic devices, more efficient and attractive the electronic communications become and more complex and diverse are the tasks and activities that ordinary people can be involved in. Consequently, the higher becomes the risk of privacy breaches. The so-called 'datacraty' imposed its authority over the quasi-entirety of the social life[1]. In order to avoid the negative effects of exposure of the citizens' personal data, a set of rules meant to diminish this risk has been implemented at the European Union level.

The main idea that is in the core of all these rules is the protection of the right to respect for private life, also referred to the right to privacy. The right to personal data protection derives in a logical manner from the first mention right. Each state has also created a national system of protection, taking into consideration the European general framework.

This European framework also includes the Council of Europe's system, as well. In this regard, the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), one of the first major regulations at the European level, provides, in Article 8, that everyone has the right to respect for his or her private and family life, home and correspondence. Interference with this right by a public authority is prohibited, except where the interference is in accordance with the law, pursues important and legitimate public interests and is necessary in a democratic society. An iconic judgement of the European Court on Human Rights recognised in 2017 that Article 8 of the ECHR, that grants the right to respect for private life also "provides for the right to a form of informational self-determination" (ECtHR, Satakunnan Markkinapörssi Oy and Satamedia Oy v. Finland, No. 931/13, 27 June 2017, para. 137).

Romania has embraced the European normative spirit. The legal provisions adopted to this end have made the object of the constitutional review performed by the Constitutional Court. It played an important role in correcting the deviations from the principles of the Romanian Basic Law which grants the right to private life, also keeping in mind the European philosophy in this field. The present paper will focus on the case-law of the Romanian Constitutional Court in the area of protection of personal data, trying to offer a comprehensive view on this topic. The paper will integrate the overview on the fore-said case-law with the case-law of Court of Justice of the European Union and other constitutional courts in Europe.

2.1. Legal framework at the European level

A clear view over this topic requires a brief presentation of the legislative acts that regulates over the time and some of them still regulate the mechanism of personal data protection.

At the European level, the basic provisions in this field are represented by Article 16 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union that recognize to everyone the right to the protection of personal data concerning them.

This right is further provided by Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (the Charter), Article 8 (right to protection of personal data). It details its content, stressing, in the second paragraph, that such data must be processed fairly for specified purposes and on the basis of the consent of the person concerned or some other legitimate basis laid down by law. It also grants to everyone the right of access to data which has been collected concerning him or her, and the right to have it rectified.

For quite a long period of time, Directive 95/46/EC on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data[2] (Data Protection Directive) has been the source of inspiration for all the member states in what concerns this issue. It has been in effect until May 2018, when the new General Data Protection Regulation entered into force.

Of great importance was also the Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks.

The fore-said directives co-existed with the Council Framework Decision 2008/977/ JHA on the protection of personal data processed in the context of police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters[3], which was in effect until May 2018.

The overwhelming development of electronic communications raise the need of a more complex and more safeguarding set of rules. Thus appeared the Regulation (EU) 2016/679 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 27 April 2016 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data (the so-called General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR)[4]. It regulates the processing by an individual, a company or an organization of personal data relating to individuals in the European Union. It means that EU data protection rules apply also to organizations and other entities that are not established in the EU, if they process personal data and offer goods and services to data subjects in the Union or monitor the behavior of such data subjects.

To complete the European legal framework a last directive has been adopted: Directive (EU) 2016/680 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data by competent authorities for the purposes of the prevention, investigation, detection or prosecution of criminal offences or the execution of criminal penalties, and on the free movement of such data.

All these European normative acts have shaped the member states of the EU have re-configured their national regulations in this field. Accordingly, Romanian Parliament has adopted several laws that took over the provisions of the cited directives.

2.2. CJEU's relevant case-law regarding the personal data protection issue:

The introduction in the European Union's normative acts wouldn't be complete if we do not mention the European Court's of Justice judgement that declared void the main directive dedicated to the protection of personal data.

Thus, Directive 2006/24/EC was declared invalid through the Judgment of Court of Justice of the European Union of 8 April 2014, pronounced in the joint cases C-293/12 — Digital Rights Ireland Ltd v. Minister for Communications, Marine and Natural Resources and others — and C-594/12 — Kärntner Landesregierung and others. Through the above-mentioned judgment, the European court found that the analyzed directive violated the provisions of Article 7, Article 8 and Article 52 (1) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.

The Court of Justice of the European Union concluded that the measures stipulated by Directive 2006/24/EC, although they are able to achieve the pursued objective, represent an interference with the rights guaranteed by Articles 7 and 8 of the Charter, which does not comply with the principle of proportionality between the taken measures and the protected public interest.

The Court noted in this regard that the data which made the object of the invalidated directive's regulation led to very precise conclusions on the private life of the persons whose data have been retained, conclusions that may relate to the habits of everyday life, the places of permanent or temporary residence, the daily movements or other movements, the activities, the social relations of these persons and the social environments frequented by them (paragraph 27) and that, in these conditions, even if it is prohibited to retain the content of the communications and pieces of information consulted by using an electronic communications network, those data retention can affect the use by subscribers or by registered users of the communication means stipulated by this directive and, therefore, their freedom of expression, guaranteed by Article 11 of the Charter (paragraph 28)).

The Court of Justice of the European Union also indicated that the interference with the fundamental rights enshrined in Articles 7 and 8 of the Charter, caused by the provisions of Directive 2006/24/EC, was wide-ranging and must be considered as being particularly serious, and the circumstance that data retention and their subsequent use were performed without the subscriber or registered user being informed about this was likely to generate in the minds of the persons concerned the feeling that their private life makes the object of a constant supervision (paragraph 37).

It was also alleged that Directive 2006/24/EC did not stipulate objective criteria to limit to the absolute minimum the number of persons who have access and can subsequently use the retained data, that the access of national authorities to stored data is not conditioned by the prior control performed by a court or by an independent administrative entity, limiting this access and their use to the absolute minimum for the achievement of the pursued objective and that the obligations of Member States to establish such limitations is not stipulated (paragraph 62).

2.3. The Constitutional Court's of Romania case-law regarding the personal data protection

2.3.1. One of the most worthy details to be mentioned when approaching this issue is the fact that prior to the fore-cited judgment of the CJUE, the Constitutional Court of Romania had rendered a decision, Decision no. 1.258 of 8 October 2009[5], by which it stated that the Law no. 298/2008 on the retention of data generated or processed by the providers of publicly available electronic communications services or of communications networks, which was the first transposition in the national legislation of the Directive 2006/24/EC, was inconsistent with the provisions of the Romanian Basic Law.

We notice the clairvoyant attitude of the Romanian Constitutional Court that has foreseen the radical solution adopted by the CJUE five years later. We also underline that on the 2nd of March 2010, soon after the Romanian Constitutional Court, Federal Constitutional Court of Germany has also rejected the German legislation requiring electronic communications traffic data retention that implemented the similar EU Directive[6].

By Decision no. 1.258 of 8 October 2009, the Court held that Article 1 (2) of Law no. 298/2008 also included in the category of traffic and location data for individuals and legal entities "the related data necessary for the identification of the subscriber or registered user", without expressly defining what is meant by the phrase "related data". It was indicated that the absence of precise legal rules that would determine the exact scope of those data needed to identify the user - individuals or legal entities, left room for abuse in the work of retention, processing and use of data stored by providers of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and that the restriction on the exercise of the right to intimate life, secrecy of correspondence and freedom of expression must also occur in a clear, predictable and unequivocal manner, as to be removed, if possible, the occurrence of arbitrariness or abuse of authorities in this area.

Likewise, the Constitutional Court noted the same ambiguous wording, not compliant with the rules of legislative technique, also as concerns the provisions of Article 20 of Law no. 298/2008, reading as follows, "In order to prevent and counteract threats to national security, State bodies with responsibilities in this area, in the terms set forth by the laws governing the activity of protection of national security, can have access to data retained by service providers and public electronic communications networks". The legislature does not define what is meant by "threats to national security", so that in the absence of precise criteria of delimitation, various actions, information, or normal activities, of routine, of natural and legal persons can be considered, arbitrarily and abusively, as having the nature of such threats. Recipients of the law may be included in the category of suspects without knowing it and without being able to prevent, by their conduct, the consequences that their actions may entail and that the use of the expression "can have" also leads to the idea that the data covered by Law no. 298/2008 are not retained solely for the use thereof only by State bodies with specific powers to protect national security and public order, but also by other persons or entities, since they "can have", and not just "have", access to such data, according to the law.

By the same decision, the Constitutional Court has found that Law no. 298/2008, as a whole, established a rule regarding the continuous retention of personal data, for a period of 6 months as from the time of their interception. Or, in the matter of personal rights, such as the right to personal life and the freedom of expression, as well as of processing of personal data, the widely recognized rule is to ensure and guarantee their observance, respectively of confidentiality, the State having, in this respect, mostly negative obligations, of abstention, by which should be avoided, insofar possible, its interference in the exercise of such right or freedom. It was underlined that exceptions are restrictively allowed, in the terms expressly provided by the Constitution and the applicable international legal instruments in the field, and Law no. 298/2008 represents such an exception, as it results from the title itself.

The Court has also found that the obligation to retain data covered by Law no. 298/2008, as an exception or derogation from the principle of protecting personal data and confidentiality thereof, by its nature, extent and scope, deprived this principle of content, as it was guaranteed by Law no. 677/2001 for the protection of individuals concerning the processing of personal data and free circulation of such data and Law no. 506/2004 on the personal data processing and protection of private life in the electronic communications sector. Or, it is widely recognized in the caselaw of the European Court of Human Rights, for example, by Judgment of 12 July 2001, rendered in the case of Prince Hans-Adam II de Lichtenstein v. Germany, paragraph 45, that the Contracting States under the Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms have assumed such obligations to ensure that the rights guaranteed by the Convention are practical and effective not theoretical and illusory, the legislative measures adopted following the effective protection of rights. But the legal obligation that requires the continuous retention of personal data makes the exception to the principle of effective protection of the right to personal life and freedom of expression, absolute as a rule. The right appears to be regulated in a negative fashion, its positive side losing its predominant character.

Therefore, the regulation of a positive obligation on a continual limitation on the exerciser of the right to a private life and secrecy of correspondence cancels the very essence of the right by removing the guarantees applying to its exercise. Natural and legal persons, mass users of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks are continually subject to the interference in the exercise of their personal rights to private correspondence and free expression, without any possibility of a free, uncensored manifestation, only under the form of direct communication, to the exclusion of the main means of communication currently used.

Likewise, through Decision no. 1.258 of 8 October 2009, the Court held that in a natural logic of this analysis the examination in this case of the principle of proportionality was also necessary, which represents another mandatory requirement needed to be respected in cases of limitation on the exercise of the rights and freedom strictly provided for by Article 53 (2) of the Constitution. This principle states that the extent of restriction must be in line with the situation that led to its implementation and also that it must cease once that cause determining it disappeared. Law no. 298/2008 requires retention of data continuously from the time of entry into force, respectively of its application (i.e. 20 January 2009, respectively 15 March 2009 as concerns traffic data of location corresponding to the services of access to Internet, email and Internet telephony), without considering the need to terminate the restriction once the cause that has led to this measure has disappeared.

The Court held that, although Law no. 298/2008 referred to data of a predominantly technical nature, the same were retained in order to provide information and the person and his private life. Even though according to Article 1 (3) of the law, it shall not apply also to the content of communication or information accessed while using an electronic communications network, the other data stored, aimed at identifying the caller and the called party, namely the user and recipient of information communicated electronically, of the source, destination, date, hour and duration of a communication, type of communication, the communication equipment or devices used by the user, the location of mobile communication equipment, as well as of other "related data" — undefined in the law —, were likely to prejudice, to interfere with free expression of the right of communication or expression.

It was indicated that the legal guarantees for use in particular cases of data retained — concerning the exclusion of content of the communication or information consulted, as object of data storage, by the prior and reasoned authorization of the president of the court entitled to judge the offence for which criminal proceedings have been initiated, as provided by Article 16 of Law no. 298/2008 and implementing penalties covered by Articles 18 and 19 of the same — were not sufficient and adequate as to remove the fear that personal rights, of private type, are not violated, so that their occurrence would take place in an acceptable manner.

Thus, the Constitutional Court did not deny the purpose in itself considered by the legislature in adopting the Law no. 298/2008, in that it is an urgent need to ensure adequate and effective legal means, consistent with the continuous process of modernization and technologization of the media, so that crime can be controlled and prevented. This is the reason for which individual rights cannot be exercised in absurdum, but can be subject to restrictions that are justified by the aim pursued. Limiting the exercise of certain personal rights in consideration of collective rights and public interests, aimed at national security, public order or prevention of crime, was always a sensitive operation in terms of regulation, so as to maintain a fair balance between the interests and rights of the individual, on the one hand, and those of the society, on the other. It isn't less true, as noted by the European Court of Human Rights in the Judgment of 6 September 1978 rendered in the case of Klass and others v. Germany, paragraph 49, that taking surveillance measures, without adequate and sufficient guarantees, can lead to "destruction of democracy on the ground of defending it".

2.3.2. Another decision that had a very strong echo in the society was the Decision no. 440 of the 8th of July 2014 on the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of Law no. 82/2012 on the retention of data generated or processed by providers of public electronic communications networks and by providers of publicly available electronic communications services, as well as for the amendment and supplementing of Law no. 506/2004 on personal data processing and protection of private life in the sector of electronic communications[7].

The Court noted that the Law no. 82/2012 represented the second transposition into national legislation of Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006. In its analisis, the Court considered necessary for a precise understanding of the retention of the data mechanism, to distinguish between two different stages. Noting that the data in question relate mainly to traffic and location data of persons and data necessary to identify a subscriber or registered user, the mechanism covered involves two stages, the first being that of the retention and storage of data and the second, that of access to the data and their use.

The retention and storage of data, which is the first operation from the chronological point of view, is in the responsibility of providers of public communications networks and publicly available electronic communications services. This operation is a technical one and it is conducted automatically on the basis of software as long as the law obliges providers designated by law to retain those data. Whereas both under Directive 2006/24/EC and under Law no. 82/2012, the purpose of the retention and storage is a general one and thereby ensuring national security, defense, prevention, investigation, detection and prosecution of serious crime, retention and storage not being linked and determined by a particular case, it appears as obvious the continuing nature of the obligation of providers of public electronic communications network and service providers to retain data on the entire period expressly provided for by the legislative framework in force, namely for a period of 6 months, under Law nor.82/2012. At this stage, as only the retention and storage of a mass of information are concerned, identification or location of those who are subjects of electronic communications are not actually carried out, this will take place only in the second stage, after being granted access to the data and their use.

The Court stated that given the nature and specificities of the first stage, since the legislature considers necessary the retention and storage of data this operation by itself is not contrary to the right to personal, family and private life, or to the secrecy of correspondence. Neither the Constitution nor the Constitutional Court case-law prohibit preventive storage of traffic and location data, but on condition that access to the data and their use be accompanied by guarantees and be made in compliance with the principle of proportionality.

Consequently, the Court considered that only in relation to the second stage, that of access and use of such data, it arises the question of compliance of legal regulations with the constitutional provisions. Examining the provisions of Law no. 82/2012, concerning the access of the judiciary and other State bodies with tasks in the field of national security to data stored, the Court found that the law did not give the necessary guarantees for protection of the right to personal, family and private life, secret correspondence and freedom of expression of individuals whose stored data are accessed.

As it was stated earlier, under Article 1 of Law no. 82/2012, prosecution bodies, courts and State bodies with tasks in the field of national security have access to data retained under this law. However, according to the provisions of Article 18 of Law no. 82/2012, only the prosecution bodies are obliged to comply with the provisions of Article 152 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, as this requirement does not cover also the State bodies with tasks in the field of national security, which can access these data in accordance with "special laws", as provided by Article 16 (1) of Law no. 82/2012. Therefore, only the request by the prosecution bodies to the providers of public communications networks and providers of publicly available electronic communications services for the transmission of retained data is subject to the prior authorization of the judge of freedoms and rights.

Requests for access to data retained for use for a purpose designated by law made by State bodies with tasks in the field of national security are not subject to authorization or approval of the court, thereby lacking the guarantee of effective protection of the data retained against the risk of abuse and against any unlawful access and use of such data. That situation is liable to constitute an interference with the fundamental rights to personal, family and private life and secrecy of correspondence and thus contravene the constitutional provisions which enshrine and protect these rights.

Having examined the "special laws in the matter", mentioned in Article 16 (1) of Law no. 82/2012, the Court found that State bodies with tasks in the field of national security can access and use data stored without the need for court authorization. Thus, Law no. 51/1991 on the national security of Romania establishes, in Article 8, the State bodies with tasks in the field of national security, i.e. the Romanian Intelligence Service, the Foreign Intelligence Service and the Protection and Guard Service and in Article 9 it states that the Ministry of National Defense, the Ministry of the Interior and the Ministry of Justice organize own intelligence structures with specific tasks in their respective areas of activity. The Court also noted that, according to Article 13, let. e) of the law, the bodies responsible for national security, while there is a threat to national security of Romania, as defined in Article 3 of Law no. 51/1991, may request the obtaining of data generated or processed by providers of public electronic communications networks or providers of publicly available electronic communications services, other than their content, and retained by them according to the law, and neither this Article nor Article 14 of the law provides that such a request must be authorized by a judge.

The Court noted, moreover, that according to Article 9 of Law no. 14/1992 on the organization and functioning of the Romanian Intelligence Service "in order to determine the existence of threats to national security provided for in Article 3 of Law no. 51/1991 on national security of Romania, as amended, intelligence services may carry out checks in compliance with the law, by: [...] e) obtaining data generated or processed by providers of public communications networks and providers of publicly available electronic communications services other than their content, and retained by them in accordance with the law". But, like the provisions of Law no. 82/2012 and of Law no. 51/1991, the provisions of Law no. 14/1992 do not impose the obligation of such intelligence service to obtain the authorization of the judge to have access to data stored.

At the same time, the Court noted that Law nor.1/1998 on the organization and operation of the Foreign Intelligence Service, provides in Article 10 (1) that "the Foreign Intelligence Service is allowed to use undercover legal persons established in accordance with the law, to use specific methods, to establish and maintain appropriate means for obtaining, verification, assessment, protection, recovery and storage of data and information relating to national security", and, according to paragraph (3) of the same Article, "use of the means of obtaining, verification and recovery of data and information must not adversely affect any rights or fundamental freedoms of citizens, private life, honor or reputation or to make them subject to unlawful restrictions". Furthermore, according to Article 11 of Law no. 1/1998, "the Foreign Intelligence Service shall be entitled, under the conditions laid down by law, to request and obtain from the Romanian public authorities, economic agents, other legal persons and natural persons the information, data and documents necessary for the performance of its tasks". The Court therefore found that Law no. 1/1998 does not regulate in a distinct manner the access of the Foreign Intelligence Service to data retained by providers of public communications networks and providers of publicly available electronic communications services, this access is however covered by Article 13 of Law no. 51/1991, unencumbered therefore by the prior authorization of a court.

However, the lack of such authorization has been criticized, inter alia, by the Court of Justice of the European Union by the Judgement of 8 April 2014, i.e. such lack is equivalent to the insufficiency of procedural safeguards necessary to protect privacy and other rights enshrined in Article7 of the Charter of fundamental rights and freedoms and the fundamental right to the protection of personal data, enshrined in Article 8 of the Charter (par. 62). III. For all of those reasons, the Court upheld the exception of unconstitutionality and noted that the provisions of Law no. 82/2012 on the retention of data generated or processed by providers of public electronic communications networks and by providers of publicly available electronic communications services and amending and supplementing Law no. 506/2004 concerning the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector are unconstitutional.

In what concerns the effect of this decision, the Constitutional Court itself has stressed (paragraph 78 and 79) that at the publication in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, of this decision, becoming lacked of legal basis from the point of view of the European law, as well as of the national law, the activity of retention and use of data generated or processed regarding the supply of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks. Specifically, it means that since the publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania, the providers of public electronic communications networks and of publicly available electronic communications services do not have the obligation anymore, nor the legal possibility to retain certain data generated or processed within their activity and to put them at the disposal of judicial bodies and of those with powers to protect national security. By exception, these providers can only retain the data necessary for invoicing or payments for interconnection or other data processed for marketing purposes only with the prior consent of the individual whose data are processed, as stipulated by Directive 2002/58/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 July 2002 on the processing of personal data and protection of confidentiality in the sector of public communications (Directive on confidentiality and electronic communications), in force.

Accordingly, until the adoption by the Parliament of a new law on data retention, to comply with constitutional provisions and exigencies, as they were highlighted in this decision, the judicial bodies and State bodies with powers to protect national security do not have access anymore to data that have been already retained and stored pursuant to Directive 2006/24/EC and to Law no. 82/2012 in view of their use within the activities defined by Article 1 (1) of Law no. 82/2012. Likewise, the judicial bodies and those with powers to protect national security lack a legal and constitutional basis for the access and use of data retained by the providers for invoicing, payments for interconnection or for other commercial purposes, to be used within the activities for the prevention, research, discovery and criminal prosecution of serious crimes or for the settlement of cases with disappeared persons or for the execution of an arrest warrant or a penalty enforcement warrant, precisely because the character, nature and different purpose thereof, as stipulated by Directive 2002/58/EC. Moreover, even Law no. 82/2012 establishes at Article 11 that these latter retained data are exempted from the legal provisions, having another legal regime, being submitted to the provisions of Law no. 506/2004 on the processing of personal data and the protection of private life in the sector of electronic communications.

2.3.3. Another important decision is Decision no. 461 of 16 September 2014 on the objection of unconstitutionality of the provisions of the Law amending and supplementing Government Emergency Ordinance no. 111/2011 on electronic communications[8].

The Emergency Ordinance implements a number of directives regulating the authorization of electronic communications networks and services. It essentially regulates the rights and obligations of providers of electronic communications networks and services, the regime of limited resources, the rights of end-users, the universal service, the obligations of providers of electronic communications services and networks with significant market power.

The changes envisaged by the new regulation are aimed at the registration of users of prepaid cards, the identification of users connected to Internet access points provided by legal persons, the collection and storage of data concerning the users of communications services, the conditions for specific technical operations and corresponding responsibilities incumbent upon providers of electronic communications services, the personal data retention period and the imposition of penalties for breaches of legal obligations. The legislative initiative was motivated by the need to adopt measures to facilitate criminal investigation activities or those aimed at identifying, preventing and countering risks or threats to national security.

By the impugned rule, the legislature has expressly regulated the data necessary to identify a subscriber or user, by providing, in addition to the name and telephone number or communications service identifier, the personal identification code, the series and number of the identity document and the issuing country with regard to individuals, respectively the tax identification code, with regard to legal persons. It should be stressed that Law no. 82/2012 did not provide the obligation to retain the personal identification code, the series and number of the identity document, respectively the tax identification code needed to identify a subscriber or a user, and the database set up according to the provisions of Article 4 of this law refers, both for fixed line and mobile telephone networks and for Internet access services, electronic mail and voice over Internet Protocol, only to the telephone number, as well as to the subscriber or registered user's name and address. Therefore, in the light of the reasons held by the Court in Decision no. 1.258 of 8 October 2009, the challenges on the accuracy and foreseeability of rule no longer subsist as the new rule precisely determines the area of the data necessary for the identification, but, by taking into account the supplementing of data required to the subscriber or to the user, as well as their strictly personal nature, the amending legal provisions should have been properly supplemented by provisions ensuring high standards in terms of their protection and security throughout the entire process of retention, storage and use, precisely so as to minimize the risk of infringement of the right to personal, family and private life, the secrecy of correspondence, as well as the citizens' freedom of expression. However, the Court noted that the Law amending and supplementing Government Emergency Ordinance no. 111/2011 does not make any change regarding the protection of these rights, therefore the reasons on which the decision of unconstitutionality of Law no. 82/2012 was based, are all the more justified in this case.

The amending rule widens the category of persons who must identify the users of electronic communications services, by expressly providing the obligation of legal persons providing Internet access points to public to retain the users' identification data: the telephone number or the identifier of the communications service with advance and subsequent payment; the surname, forename and personal identification code, the series and number of the identity document, respectively the issuing country – for foreign persons; the identification data obtained through bank card payment; any other identification procedure which, directly or indirectly, ensures that the user's identity is known. The retention obligation is doubled by the obligation to store the data for a period of 6 months as from the time of their retention.

The Court noted that currently, legal persons providing public Internet access points are private legal entities, especially in commercial and recreational facilities, cafeterias, restaurants, hotels, airports etc., or legal persons governed by public law – public institutions that give citizens direct and rapid access to information of public interest (including those distributed on their own webpages), like town halls, educational institutions, health clinics, public libraries, theatres, etc. The imposition of the obligation incumbent upon such persons to retain and store personal data requires, correlatively, the specific regulation of adequate, firm and unequivocal measures, ensuring citizens' trust that the manifestly personal data that they make available are recorded and kept confidential. In this respect, the law merely establishes the measures of retention and storage of data, without amending or supplementing the legal provisions with regard to the guarantees that the State must provide in the exercise of its citizens' fundamental rights.

However, the regulatory framework in such a sensitive field must be clear, predictable and devoid of confusion, so as to remove, as much as possible, the possibility of abuse or arbitrariness in relation to those called upon to apply the legal provisions.

The Court mentioned that the provision that identification is achieved through "any other identification procedure" ensuring, directly or indirectly, that the user's identity is known, represents an imprecise regulation likely to create the prerequisites for certain abuses committed in the process of retention and storage of data by the legal persons covered by this rule.

Data retention and storage clearly constitutes a limitation of the right to the protection of personal data, respectively of the constitutionally protected basic rights relating to personal, family and private life, secrecy of correspondence and freedom of expression. Such a limitation may operate solely in accordance with Article 53 of the Constitution, which foresees the possibility of restricting the exercise of certain rights or freedoms only by law and only if necessary, as the case may be, to protect national security, public order, public health or morals, citizens' rights and freedoms, for conducting a criminal investigation, preventing the consequences of a natural disaster or an extremely severe catastrophe. The restriction measure can be ordered only if necessary in a democratic society, it should be proportional to the situation having caused it and applied without discrimination and without infringing upon the existence of such right or freedom.

However, given that the measures adopted by the law subject to constitutional review are not accurate and foreseeable, that the interference of the State in the exercise of the abovementioned rights, although laid down by law, is not clearly, rigorously and exhaustively formulated so as to offer confidence to citizens, that its strictly necessary nature required in a democratic society is not fully justified, and that the proportionality of the measure is not ensured through the regulation of appropriate guarantees, the Court ascertained that the provisions of the Law amending and supplementing Government Emergency Ordinance no.111/2011 on electronic communications violate the provisions of Article 1(5), Articles 26, 28, 30 and 53 of the Constitution. Therefore, the limitation of the exercise of such personal rights by considering certain collective rights and public interests related to national security, public order or criminal prevention, breaks the right balance which should exist between the individual interests and rights, on the one hand, and those of the society, on the other hand, as the impugned law cannot regulate sufficient guarantees to ensure the efficient protection of data against the risks of abuse and any unlawful access or use of personal data.

2.4. Relevant decisions rendered by foreign constitutional jurisdictions in the matter of personal data protection

This sesitive issue concerned many other constitutional courts which performed a consistent constitutional review of the respective legislation. In this regard, are considered particularly relevant the decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court of Germany, of the Czech Constitutional Court and of the Supreme Administrative Court of Bulgaria.

By the Judgment of 2 March 2010, the Federal Constitutional Court of Germany declared unconstitutional the provisions of Articles 113a and 113b of Law on the new regulation of the telecommunications surveillance of 21 December 2007, and of Article 100g of the Criminal Procedure Code of Germany, indicating that they violate Article 10 (1) of the Constitution of Germany on the secrecy of telecommunications.

As for the unconstitutionality of the provisions of Articles 113a and 113b of the Law on the new regulation of the telecommunications surveillance of 21 December 2007 it was indicated that the storage without a special occasion of traffic data in telecommunications does not make the object of the strict prohibition of preventive storage of data according to the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court and that, if attention is paid to this intervention and it is adequately realized, the proportionality requirements can be met.

It was underlined the importance of the storage of traffic data of the telecommunications sector for preventive purposes, but also the necessity of certain regulations sufficiently strict and clear on the security of data and the limitation of their use, in order to ensure transparency and legal protection. It was emphasized however that such storage represents a wide-ranging interference even while the content of the communications does not make the object of storage, as the retained data make possible a detailed knowledge of the intimate sphere of the individual, especially as concerns the social or political affiliation, preferences, inclinations and weaknesses of individuals, allowing the preparation of some relevant profiles and creating the risk of submitting some citizens, who give no reason to be submitted to investigations, to be exposed to such actions.

It was found that the provisions of Articles 113a and 113b of the Law on the new regulation of the telecommunications surveillance of 21 December 2007 violates the principle of proportionality, not being accomplished the constitutional requirements referring to data security and the transparency of their use, nor those on the protection of individuals. To this effect, it was hold that the impugned legal provisions refer only to the necessary diligence, generally, in the field of telecommunications, but relativize the security requirements, leaving them at the choice of the telecommunications operators, who are not required to comply with sufficient high standards in ensure the security level and for which higher penalties are established for breach of the storage obligation than for the violation of the security data.

It was also held that the provisions of Article 100g of the Criminal Procedure Code also allow the access to data in other cases than the individual ones, without the judge's agreement and without the person concerned being informed, for which reason they are unconstitutional.

Similarly, the Constitutional Court of the Czech Republic, through Decision of 22 March 2011, found the unconstitutionality of the provisions of section 97 paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Act no. 127/2005 on the electronic communications and amendments referring to related normative acts (Act on electronic communications) of the Decree no. 485/2005 on data retention regarding the traffic, location, date and duration of communications, as well as the form and method of delivery of these ones to authorized authorities.

In the content of this decision the Court held that the impugned texts do not offer to citizens sufficient guarantees regarding the risk of abusive use of stored data and arbitrary. It was found that the examined normative acts do not define at all or insufficiently and ambiguously define the rules on the compliance with the requirements on the security of data retention and restriction of third parties' access to retained data. On this occasion is was underlined the importance in the context of the current level of development of the society of traffic data retention in the field of communications, but also the need to maintain a balance between public and individual interests. By the same decision it was also found the lack of definition of the means that should be put at the disposal of the affected persons in order to benefit of an efficient protection against arbitrary and abusive use of stored data.

Finally, the Supreme Administrative Court of Bulgaria, through Decision no. 13.627 of 11 December 2008, has annulled an Article of the national law on data retention that allowed the Ministry of Internal Affairs the access to retain data in the computers' ter qa3minals and, also, the supply of access to such data to security services and to other law enforcement institutions, without the authorization of a judicial body, motivating that the annulled legal provisions did not provide any guarantee for the protection of the right to private life and that no mechanism was established in order to guarantee this protection against illegal interferences, so as to avoid the breach of honor, dignity or reputation of an individual.

3. Conclusions

The emergence of the massive computer use and the huge variety of activities based on the internet services brought unexpected risks to the right to respect for private life. Consequently, the need to protect it has led to the new set of rules meant to focus on the collection, storage and use of personal data.

The new General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR), acronym that already entered into the linguistique patrimony of all member states of the European Union[9], is the most recent and also modern instrument meant to provide a set of guarantees in what concerns the privacy of the individuals when it comes to processing and storage of their personal data.

The role of constitutional jurisdiction is crucial in improving and strengthening of all the safeguards attached to the right to the private life, intimacy and, last but not least, freedom of consciousness. Their statements bring light over the legal provisions and benefit to the quality of legislation. Accordingly, the Constitutional Court of Romania has already proved its important role in high-lightening the values of democracy, in respect of fundamental human rights. Considering the outstanding process of technical development, the chances of further requests of reviewing the constitutionality of subsequent normative acts are significant. The Court will have to keep in mind both the European compulsory regulation and also the national Basic Law's provisions granting the full exercise of fundamental human rights.

CONSIDERATIONS ON PROFESSIONAL DIGNITY

Izabela BRATILOVEANU[*]

Abstract

Dignity is a polysemantic notion. According to the Dictionary of Neologisms, in a first sense, dignity means position, function, situation or high rank in a State, in a large organization. This approach refers to the concept of "dignitas" which in ancient Rome was associated with a public function and defined the duties of the one who occupies that function. Third parties have a general obligation to comply with that office or high rank in the State or ecclesiastical hierarchy, which is legally sanctioned. Our study analyses the legal provisions sanctioning attitudes and behaviours affecting the dignity of certain professions, such as lawyers and magistrates, referring also to the recent case law of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Five judges Panels and the Constitutional Court.

Keywords: professional dignity; dignitas; disciplinary deviations; magistrates; jurisprudence

1. Introduction

Dignity is a polysemantic concept.

In the Anthological and synonyms dictionary of Romanian language of 1978, for the noun dignity we find the following meanings: dignity, honour, prestige, authority, prominence, good presence; seriousness, sobriety, reliability. Recognition, reputation, (good) name, fame, celebrity; glory, pride, greatness, praise. Value, price, merit. Significance, importance. Respect, respectability, compliance, esteem, honour, fairness, honorability (rare), appreciation, consideration, deference, condescendence. Pride, self-esteem.

According to the Dictionary of Neologisms[1], edited in 1986, the term dignity has the following meanings: 1) the quality of being dignified; prestige; seriousness, greatness; 2) position, function, situation or high degree in a State, in a large organization.

In the New Explanatory Dictionary of the Romanian Language [2], edited in 2002, the term dignity has the following meanings: 1) dignified character; competence; 2) dignified attitude; 3) dignified behaviour; high rank in a State.

In a first acceptation, dignity is associated with a position or high office in the State or in a large organization. This approach of dignity is considered in the specialty literature as representing the "traditional approach" because it refers to the concept of dignitas which in ancient Rome was associated with a public function, directly bearing certain particular obligations incumbent upon the person occupying that position related to the fact it represents the law, the public interest etc.[3] On the other part, dignity implies a general obligation of respect on the part of third parties to this rank or function - a legally sanctioned obligation[4]. Encountered in administrative contentious, violation of dignity in this first meaning in terms of chronology means the prejudice brought to the image of a function [5].

This first meaning of the notion of dignity is different from the modern meaning, the equal dignity of all human beings, regardless of any particular additional status and exclusively related to the human nature of the individual. Art. 305 of the Law of National Education no. 1/2011 makes the distinction between the human and professional dignity of teachers: "The teaching staff and the students are protected in the academia by the authorities responsible with the public order.

They are protected against the person or the group of persons who affect the human and professional dignity of the teaching staff or who prevent the exercise of its rights and obligations. The protection is requested by the person authorized according to the University charter (s.n.)".

2. Professional dignity of the lawyer

Some examples in this respect: Art. 16 par. (2) of the Constitution mentions "public offices and dignities"; Law no. 161/2003 refers to public dignity offices; Art. 64 letter f) of Law no. 47/1992 provides that judges of the Constitutional Court shall be under an obligation to abstain from any activity or manifestation contrary to the independence or dignity of their office; art. 21 par. (2) letter f) of Law no.

155/2010 stipulates that the local police officer is forbidden to carry out activities likely to damage the honour and dignity of the local police officer or of the institution which he is a member of; the Code of Ethics of the bailiff provides certain standards for the bailiff's conduct as to be in line with the honour and dignity of his profession.

Non-compliance with the particular obligations incumbent on the persons occupying these positions shall entail their disciplinary liability in a range of professions, such as lawyers or magistrates. In this case, the sanction is aimed at that particular person whose conduct brings a prejudice to the dignity of the position he/she holds. In this respect, dignity protects the office, not the person occupying it.

The Code of Ethics of the Romanian lawyer presents 10 fundamental principles guiding the lawyer's morality: freedom and independence; legality and respect for the rule of law; respect for professional secrecy; preventing conflicts of interest; dignity, honour and probity; professionalism and loyalty towards the client; professional competence; respect for their colleagues and all the persons with whom the lawyer engages in professional relationships; autonomy and self-regulation of the profession of lawyer; loyalty to the profession. In line with Art. 8 par. (1) of the Code of Ethics, these principles are the values which the lawyer relies on and that he defends (in the exercise of his profession and in the social life) and in connection to which all the deontological norms and his/her conduct shall be interpreted. The principle of dignity, honour and probity requires the lawyer to comply with the highest standards of moral integrity. Whenever, through his/her conduct in the exercise of the profession or beyond it, he/she does not live up to these standards, the lawyer harms not only his/her reputation, but also that of his/her profession which may affect public confidence in the profession of lawyer. In line with Art. 13 par. (4) of the Code of Ethics, the lawyer shall abstain from formulating denunciations for the purpose of gaining legal advantages. Therefore, the lawyer's dignity means the adequacy of his/her personal qualities, image and conduct to the requirements of his/her profession.

In the exercise of the profession, the lawyer shall have to comply with the solemnity of the court hearing, not to use words or expressions likely to harm the dignity of the magistrates, his/her colleagues lawyers or the representatives of the parties involved in the trial, the non-compliance with these provisions being considered a serious disciplinary offense.

Can become a member of a bar in Romania, the person who cumulatively meets the conditions provided for by Art. 12 par. (1) of the Law no. 51/1995, namely: has the exercise of civil and political rights; is a graduate of a faculty of law; is medically fit for the exercise of the profession; is not found in any of the cases of lack of dignity provided for by art. 14 of the law.

Art.14 of Law no. 51/1995 provides 4 cases of unworthy attitude: a) the person finally convicted by a court order to imprisonment for committing an intentional offense, such as to prejudice the prestige of the profession; b) the person who committed abuses which violated the human rights and fundamental freedoms, established by court decision, or has committed serious disciplinary offenses punishable by the exclusion from the profession as a disciplinary sanction; c) the person who was punished by the prohibition to practice the profession, during the period established by a court or by disciplinary decision and d) the person in charge of whom was found, on the basis of a final court decision or acts of the lawyers' profession, the act of having practiced or supported, in any form whatsoever, the unlawful practice by a person of the profession of lawyer.

Furthermore, Art. 15 of the Law no. 51/1995 provides for the incompatibility with the occupations damaging the dignity and independence of the lawyer's profession.

The status of the lawyer's profession, as adopted by Decision no. 64 of December 3, 2011 of U.N.B.R. (National Association of Romanian Bars) Council, dedicates subsection 3 of Chapter II, Section 1, to the dignity of the lawyer's profession. The aforementioned cases of lack of dignity shall be verified by the Bar Council upon admission to the profession of lawyer, on the occasion of re-enrolment in the list of lawyers with the right to practice the profession and throughout the practice thereof.

The Constitutional Court ruled in its case law in the matter, Decision no. 629 of 27 October 2016[6], that "the regulation in the matter of the lawyer's unworthy attitude is a normal one, giving the assurance that the persons practising this honourable profession have an impeccable moral profile, and it is inconceivable that persons with (serious) criminal convictions take part in the act of justice. The legislator understood to place under the incidence of this maximum sanction - exclusion from the profession - only the commission of intentional offenses, thus excluding the involuntary offenses, considering that, if there is no intention on the part of the lawyer, it cannot be said that his/her probity and fairness are affected". In the recitals of the same decision, the constitutional contentious court holds that the disciplinary sanction of exclusion from the profession of lawyer reflects the principle of the dignity and honour of the lawyer's profession, thus representing a guarantee of the morality and probity of the members of the lawyers' bar association. Thus, the legislation in the matter is governed by certain principles and rules that ensure a good, normal and lawful conduct of the lawyer's activity, the latter having the obligation to abstain from committing acts that would cast a negative light on him/her.

The Constitutional Court, by Decision no. 225 of April 4, 2017[7], found that the phrase "likely to prejudice the prestige of the profession" of lawyer in Art. 14 letter a) of Law no. 51/1995 is unconstitutional and violates Art.1 par. (5) of the Constitution because its drafting lacks clarity and accuracy, by not clearly defining intentional offenses that may prejudice the prestige of the profession of lawyer. The Constitutional Court held that "the express non-circumstantiality of offenses committed which are likely to prejudice the prestige of the lawyer's profession leaves some room for arbitrariness, making thus possible to apply the sanction of exclusion from the profession in a differentiate manner, depending on the subjective consideration of the structures of the profession of lawyer able to reflect on the case of lack of dignity". The lack of clarity, accuracy and predictability of the aforementioned phrase created prerequisites for being applied in a different, discriminatory manner as a result of arbitrary judgments. Or, the predictability of law also implies the precise drafting of normative texts[8]. According to the Constitutional Court, Decision no. 1 of January 10, 2014, any normative act shall comply with certain qualitative conditions, including predictability, which implies that the normative act must be sufficiently clear and accurate in order to be applied, the formulation with sufficient precision of the normative act allowing those interested, who may call upon the advice of a specialist, if necessary, to provide, in the reasonable extent, the circumstances of the case, the consequences which may result from a given action.

3. The professional dignity of the judge and the prosecutor

It was rightfully stated that "the dignity of justice in the singular is first and foremost an image, an appearance, in the eyes of those who observe it. But, as it can only be observed through the eyes of the persons serving it, the dignity of justice is confused with that of the magistrates themselves. In other words, the consideration, the esteem, the respect that citizens have towards justice are precisely those of the magistrates themselves"[9]. Magistrates must be respected not only for the office they occupy, but also for their competence and irreproachable conduct, therefore they have to show self-control in public situations. As stated, judges and prosecutors have to comply with high standards, both in their private and public life, because their conduct affects the entire judicial system. Consequently, the standards of conduct for the employees in the judicial system (judges and prosecutors) are much higher than those required of an ordinary citizen.

The Code of Ethics of Judges and Prosecutors[10] contains their conduct standards in accordance with the honour and dignity of the profession and is structured in seven chapters with regard to the independence of justice, the promotion of supremacy of law, the impartiality of judges and prosecutors, the exercise of professional duties, dignity and honour of the profession of judge and prosecutor and activities incompatible with the judge or prosecutor position. The Code includes a special chapter, Chapter VI, generically entitled "The Dignity and Honour of the profession of Judge or Prosecutor" (Articles 17-20) which has to be understood in connection with Art. 90 par. (1) of the Law no. 303/2004[11] which states that "Judges and prosecutors are obliged to refrain from any actions or deeds likely to compromise their dignity in their profession and in society". With regard to the conduct of judges and prosecutors within the judicial system in general and in courts, respectively the prosecutor's offices where they operate, Art.18 par. (1) of the Code provides that "the relations of judges and prosecutors within the collective community where they carry out their duties must be fair, based on respect and good faith, regardless their seniority in the profession and their position." If the conduct of a judge or prosecutor towards his/her colleagues is inappropriate, this will also give rise to a doubt as regards his/her attitude towards his/her own profession. According to the following paragraph the judges and prosecutors cannot state their opinion on the moral and professional probity of their colleagues. Furthermore, Art. 19 of the Code states that judges and prosecutors can publicly express their opinion in exercising the right to reply, if defamatory assertions addressed to them were published in mass media. Finally, Art. 20 of the Code stipulates that judges and prosecutors cannot perform actions that, by their nature, financing origin or execution, could, in any way, infringe upon the fulfilment of their professional duties, with impartiality, honesty and within legal terms. With reference to Chapter VI, the "Practical Guide of Professional Ethics for Judges and Prosecutors"[12] which explains the regulations in the Code shows that judges and prosecutors are permanently in the public eye, therefore they must accept in their personal lives certain limitations that may be considered as burdensome for ordinary citizens and they must do so freely and with good will. In other words, the judge and the prosecutor must behave in accordance with the dignity of their profession.

[12] Approved by the Plenum of the Superior Council of Magistracy (C.S.M.) in session of November 22, 2016.

Judges and prosecutors respond from a disciplinary point of view for deviations from professional duties as well as for actions that affect the prestige of justice, disciplinary deviations being expressly provided for by art. 99 let. a) - t) of Law no. 303/2004. In the sense of Art. 44 par. (1) of the Law no. 317/2004[13], the Superior Council of Magistracy fulfils, through its sections, the role of a court in the field of disciplinary liability of judges and prosecutors. According to art. 44 par. (2) of the same normative act, the section for judges also acts as a disciplinary court for the assistant magistrates of the High Court of Cassation and Justice. Against the decisions of the sections of the Superior Council of Magistracy for settling the disciplinary action, an appeal may be lodged within 15 days of the notification by the sanctioned judge or prosecutor or, as the case may be, by the judicial inspection, and the competence to settle the appeal belongs to the 5 Judges Panel of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, according to the provisions of art. 51 par. (3) of Law no. 317/2004.

It is of interest for this study the disciplinary offense provided for by art. 99 letter a) of Law no. 303/2004 which consists of "manifestations which affect the honour or professional probity or the prestige of justice, committed in the exercise or outside of the exercise of the professional duties". The content of this deviation is represented by the standards of conduct imposed on magistrates by the provisions of: Art. 90 of Law no. 303/2004, Art. 17, 18 and 20 of the Code of Ethics for judges and prosecutors, as well as Art. 104 of the Law no.161/2003[14] which stipulates: "Magistrates are forbidden any manifestation contrary to the dignity of their position or which may affect its impartiality or prestige."[15]. These provisions are corroborated with the provisions of Art. 4 paragraph (1) of Law no. 303/2004, which states: "Judges and prosecutors are obliged, through their entire activity, to ensure the supremacy of law, to respect the rights and freedoms of individuals as well as their equality before the law and to ensure non-discriminatory legal treatment to all participants in judicial proceedings, regardless of their quality, to comply with the Code of Ethics of Judges and Prosecutors and to participate in continuing professional training". Furthermore, Bangalore Principles on Judicial Conduct (2002), with respect to value no. 3 entitled "Integrity", state that the judge shall ensure that his or her conduct is above reproach in the view of a reasonable observer, thus reaffirming the people's faith in the integrity of the judiciary. Furthermore, as regards value no. 4, the term "goodwill" states that the judge will avoid violating the rules of goodwill or the appearance of its lack in all his/her activities, and his/her conduct must be in accordance with the dignity of the magistrate position. Last but not least, the Declaration on Judicial Ethics[16] adopted by the General Assembly of the European Network of Legal Councils, within the meeting in London in 2010 stipulates the obligation of probity of the magistrate and the obligation to a worthy attitude and honour.

It should be outlined that in order to be considered a disciplinary offense, an action must be illicit in nature and meet the following constitutive elements: the object, the objective side, the subject and the subjective side.

The legal object of the disciplinary deviation as provided for by Art. 99 let. a) of Law no. 303/2004 is represented by the professional obligations or the norms of conduct established by laws, decisions or regulations, which all judges and prosecutors have to observe, in the consideration of their profession, and which are prejudiced by the unlawful deed[17].

With regard to the material element of the objective side, it consists of the manifestations of the active subject which prejudice the honour or professional probity or the prestige of justice. In the New Explanatory Dictionary of the Romanian Language[18] (2002), for the term honour we find the following meanings: 1. Moral dignity, which characterizes conduct; honesty. 2. Moral authority that someone enjoys. 3. Self-esteem. 4. Distinctive sign that is given to someone for acknowledged merits; honesty. Honour is not only about interiority, but it has a social character; to lose one's honour, is to lose the consideration of his/her peers, thus resulting the connection between honour and reputation[19]. The Declaration on Judicial Ethics states in point 2.2 that professional honour implies the fact that the judge must ensure that through his/her professional practice and his/her person does not jeopardize the public image of the judge, the court or the system of justice. According to point 2.1 of the same international document, professional probity requires the judge to refrain from any tactless or indelicate behaviour, and not just the behaviour which is contrary to law. Last but not least, the doctrine defines the prestige of justice as being the positive public appreciation of the judicial system as a whole. As it has been shown, this global assessment is made in relation to the magistrates' professional honour and probity as a result of their individual public assessments[20].

With regard to incrimination as a disciplinary deviation of the conduct of judges and prosecutors consisting in manifestations that may prejudice the honour or professional probity or the prestige of justice, Art. 99 letter a) of Law no. 303/2004 enshrines, in fact, the obligation of reserve incumbent upon them. This obligation expresses a practical synthesis of the general principles of professional deontology consisting of independence, impartiality, integrity and involves a certain moderation and restraint in professional, social and private life. The obligation of reserve must also be looked into in the light of the need for the magistrate to comply his/her conduct in accordance with the moral and ethical principles as recognized by society and to act in all circumstances in good faith, with fairness and decency.

The variety of situations that may arise in practice made the legislator not to be able to draw up an exhaustive list of manifestations of the kind to prejudice honour, professional probity or the prestige of justice.

In the case law, based on the evidence presented, the discipline court inferred the existence of the objective side of the deviation as provided for under Art. 99 letter a) of Law no. 303/2004 as republished, with subsequent amendments and supplements, being thus demonstrated beyond any doubt the inappropriate attitude and improper behaviour which the defendant public prosecutor has manifested in the public place, within a restaurant, materialized in the use of threatening expressions addressed to a waiter, in the unjustified presentation of the prosecutor's card, followed by contacting by phone a police officer to whom he requested assistance in order to "organize an operation for catching in the act (...) for the offense of abuse of service", as he had previously left the restaurateur without paying the entire price of the products ordered[21].

In one case, it was noted that the objective side of the disciplinary deviation we refer to is outlined by several elements, namely: i) the defendant proceeded to hearing his colleague prosecutor as a witness in a tactless, distinct, singular manner, given the fact that the hearing was made in the presence of an ex officio lawyer who was not requested as a witness and a chief police commissioner, as an assistant witness; ii) the ex officio lawyer who attended the hearing mentioned in the witness statement given in this disciplinary proceedings that Mrs. Prosecutor D was clearly affected by this situation; iii) Mrs prosecutor, heard as a witness, qualified the questions raised by the defendant prosecutor as having a teasing character and were likely to prejudice his authority before the two persons who assisted in making the statement, as she was asked questions about the start date of her activity in the prosecutor's office and about the position she occupied in the department where she carries out her activity, unimportant aspects from the perspective of the subject of evidence or the credibility of the witness; iv) the presence at the hearing, as a subscribing witness, of a police officer is likely to affect the report of authority specific to the supervision relationship of the criminal investigation carried out by the criminal prosecution authorities, and v) the defendant proceeded to the hearing of his colleague using the institution of the subscribing witness, which was provided by the old Code of Criminal Procedure, but which is no longer regulated by the current Code, an institution which in practice was used by the criminal prosecution bodies to hear as witnesses uneducated persons who could not write or read[22].

In another case, it was noted that a magistrate, like any other person, cannot be deprived of the freedom of expression, but this right is not an absolute right as the State can legally intervene in order to limit it, according to the conditions provided for by Art.10 par. 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Furthermore, it has been shown that although the status of magistrate does not deprive the judge of the protection provided for by Art. 10 of the text of the Convention, the responsibility for maintaining the image and status of the position requires caution and moderation in expression. In the present case, the manner of expression the defendant judge chose to express his opinions regarding the activity of the judicial system, through the statements made on his personal blog, thus explicitly formulating certain suspicions and fears about the alleged criminal offenses committed by the two dignitaries, about the alleged influences on public institutions, thus suggesting the existence of a potential social danger as a result of their release, constitutes a violation of the obligation of reserve, given the fact that the defendant's statements exceeded the limits of the freedom of expression stipulated by par. (2) of Art. 10 of the text of the Convention[23].

Under this disciplinary deviation, the immediate consequence is affecting the public image not only the image of the judge or prosecutor concerned, but also of justice as a public system and service.

Relating to the aspect of the subjective side, the disciplinary deviation provided for by Art. 99 letter a) of Law no. 303/2004 may be committed intentionally or unintentionally. The guilt of the judge or of the prosecutor shall be assessed in relation to the standards of conduct set out in the aforementioned normative provisions and in relation to the requirements of the society embodied in complying with certain values that are unanimously accepted.

According to Art. 99 letter c) of Law no. 303/2004, disciplinary deviation is represented by "attitudes that are not worthy in the exercise of their duties towards their colleagues, the other personnel of the court or the prosecutor's office, judicial inspectors, lawyers, experts, witnesses, the persons subject to trial in a court of law, or the representatives of other institutions".

In the case of this disciplinary deviation, the material object is identified with the passive subject (the judge's or the prosecutor's colleagues, the other staff of the court or the prosecutor's office, judicial inspectors, lawyers, experts, witnesses, the persons subject to trial in a court of law or the representatives of other institutions).

In the doctrine, the phrase "unworthy attitudes" takes two meanings:

- lato sensu, it designates any manifestation of a judge or prosecutor that is contrary to the standards of conduct required by the laws, the decisions and the regulations governing their activity, and
- in a narrow sense, it designates the gestures, words, attitudes, expressions, etc. out of the civilized and decent behaviour that should govern social relations [24].

In this context, we should mention that in Decision no. 708 of November 15, 2018 regarding the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of art. 90 par. (1) and Art. 99 letter c) of Law no. 303/2004 on the status of judges and prosecutors and Art. 51 par. (3) of Law no. 317/2004 regarding the Superior Council of Magistracy, the Constitutional Court found that the legislator did not violate the requirements of clarity and predictability of the law by using the phrases "actions or deeds likely to compromise the professional dignity" and "unworthy attitudes" because the significance of the two phrases can reasonably be understood by magistrates acting as recipients of the rules. As correctly retained by the Constitutional Court, the legislator could not provide an exhaustive list of actions and deeds likely to prejudice the dignity of magistrates in their profession and in society, just as it could not draw up an exhaustive list of unworthy attitudes while exercising their professional duties. Thus, adapting the conduct of the magistrates to the prescriptions of the norm shall be analysed in relation to the concrete circumstances, characteristic to each factual situation.

For the existence of the disciplinary deviation provided for by art. 99 letter c) of Law no. 303/2004, in terms of the material element, two conditions have to be met cumulatively:

1. the unworthy attitude of the judge or the prosecutor to be achieved by an action or lack of action towards one of the passive subjects;
2. the unworthy attitude of the judge or the prosecutor shall be achieved during the exercise of his/her professional duties.

In the case of law, it was considered to be included in the disciplinary deviation under analysis, the attitude of defendant Judge A, who, given a tense atmosphere, during the deliberations following the session of March 16, 2016, addressed using a raised voice and throwing a file to judge C who attended the deliberations. In the present case, the veracity of the defendant's improper conduct was confirmed by corroborating the evidence administered in the case, namely the statements of Judge C, the statements of Judges E and F, and the content of the mobile phone recording made by Judge C, from which it results that the defendant judge implicitly acknowledges her unworthy attitude[25].

In one case, it was noted that the manner in which the defendant judge acted in the court sessions of November 2, 2015, April 4, 2016, June 6, 2016, September 12, 2016, October 24, 2016, by using inappropriate expressions, by initiating dialogues without any legal relevance, by expressing criticism towards her fellow magistrates and the solutions delivered by the judicial control court fulfils the legal premise of the unworthy attitude[26].

In another case, it was held the objective aspect of the disciplinary offence stipulated by art. 99 letter c) of Law no. 303/2004 as it was demonstrated beyond any doubt that during the settlement of file no. x/212/2014, the defendant judge had inappropriate behaviour towards the injured parties and their lawyers, making inappropriate judgments and thus understanding to impose her point of view by initiating a dialogue without any legal relevance, perceived as a genuine interrogation with each of the present civil parties, insisting on bringing the minor children before the court, without showing any concern or respect towards their feelings, which was likely to incite doubts about the magistrate's concern to ensure respect for the interests of the minors in terms of hearing which does not affect them emotionally[27].

The immediate consequence of this disciplinary offence is the deterioration of confidence and respect for the magistrate's function, with the consequence of affecting the image and prestige of justice as a public system and service.

Regarding the subjective side, the disciplinary offence stipulated by art. 99 letter c) of Law no.

303/2004 may be committed with a direct or indirect intent.

For the purposes of Art. 99 letter s) of Law no. 303/2004, shall constitute a disciplinary offence "the use of inappropriate expressions in court judgments or judicial acts of the prosecutor, or the obvious reasoning contrary to the legal reasoning, such as to affect the prestige of justice or the dignity of the magistrate function".

It should be emphasized that the regulation of the disciplinary offence stipulated by art. 99 letter s) of Law no. 303/2004 does not concern the establishment of control over court judgments, but it shall sanction the judge for a certain conduct; court decisions are subject to legal remedies under the law.

The disciplinary offence under analysis has no material object.

The passive subject is the State, directly interested in complying with the normative provisions on the content of court judgments or judicial acts of the prosecutor.

The disciplinary offense provided for by Art. 99 letter s) of Law no. 303/2004 can be implemented in two ways, namely:

- the use of inappropriate expressions in court judgments or judicial acts of the prosecutor, likely to affect the prestige of justice or the dignity of the magistrate function;
- the statement of reasons clearly contradicts the legal reasoning of court decisions or judicial acts of the prosecutor, such as to affect the prestige of justice or the dignity of the magistrate function.

Therefore, in one case, it was noted that the expressions used in the judgments, in which the magistrate edited explicit criticisms regarding decisions delivered by the court of judicial control, recorded as rhetorical questions, in relation to their own professional experience, reveals a subjective, biased attitude and constitute elements contrary to an impartial judgment, so that they can be considered inadequate both from the perspective of the judge's reserve obligation and the content of the considerations of the court judgments, as regulated by Art. 425 par. (1) letter b) of the Civil Procedure Code. According to the 5 Judges Panel of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the content of the personal assessments thus expressed, which essentially puts into question the professionalism and impartiality of judges from the judicial control court, is likely to cause a negative public judgment regarding the judicial system as a whole[28].

We also agree with the opinions expressed in the literature that the immediate consequence is conditional for the existence of the disciplinary deviation stipulated in Art. 99 letter s) of Law no. 303/2004, because the use of inappropriate expressions in court judgments or judicial acts of the prosecutor or the reasoning obviously contrary to the legal reasoning of court judgments or judicial acts of the prosecutor will constitute disciplinary deviation only if the prestige justice or dignity of the magistrate function[29] is affected.

The disciplinary offense under analysis may be committed with direct or indirect intent.

4. Conclusions

In this sense, dignity implies particular obligations incumbent upon those who occupy a position. Magistrates are required to refrain from any acts or deeds that might compromise their dignity in office and in society.

With regard to the duty of respect incumbent upon third parties, we can exemplify it by the offense of violating the solemnity of the hearing (Art. 278 of the Criminal Code) , which incriminates offensive or obscene manifestations during a court proceedings for the purpose to protect the solemnity of the court hearing and the respect due to the judicial authority and the incrimination of the offense of contempt of the court (Art. 279 of the Criminal Code). As stated in the Explanatory Memorandum of the Criminal Code, the justification of the incrimination of the offense for contempt of the court consists in the fact that "by the will of the law, the judge, the prosecutor or the lawyer have the most important judicial powers, and the manner in which they are performed decisively depends the good conduct of a trial and its outcome, so that providing increased protection against any form of violence exerted on them is, from this perspective, justified". Furthermore, the irreverent manifestations of the parties, witnesses, experts, interpreters or of any other person towards the judge or the prosecutor shall constitute a legal offense according to Art. 283 par. (4) letter i) of the Criminal Procedure Code. For the purposes of Art. 188 par. (1) of the Civil Procedure Code it shall constitute a legal offence the non-observance by either party or by other persons of the measures taken by the court to ensure the order and the solemnity of the court hearing. This first meaning of the notion of dignity is different from the modern meaning, the equal dignity of all human beings, regardless of any particular additional status and exclusively related to the human nature of the individual, which we will address in a next study.

Gheorghe BOCSAN[*]

Abstract

Often, the delimitation between criminal law per se and other branches of public law involving the application of sanctions by the authorities of the Member States or by the institutions, bodies, offices and agencies of the European Union is difficult to operate.

From the point of view of the guarantees of the fair trial, as they are regulated by art. 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and art. 6 of the Council of Europe Convention for the Protection of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, both the ECJ and the ECHR have developed, through continuous and elaborated jurisprudence, autonomous concepts on the basic notions by which aforementioned guarantees operate: "criminal charges", "criminal proceedings "," criminal sanction "," court "," court with jurisdiction in criminal matters "etc.

The present study analyses the mechanisms of the influence exercised by the autonomous concepts developed in the ECHR case-law on the mentioned legal topic on the legal acts of the Union, but also the uniform meanings resulting from the corroboration of these autonomous concepts with those of the ECJ jurisprudence in the same field.

Starting from some basic concepts of ECHR jurisprudence on the notion of criminal offence, synthesized in the Engel Criteria and many subsequent cases, such as Bendenoun v. France, Jussila v. Finland, Ezeh and Commons v. United Kingdom, the issue of the delimitation we have referred to above acquires contours in the case-law of ECJ in relevant cases such as Bonda, Baláž or Hans Åkerberg Fransson.

Keywords: Criminal liability, disciplinary liability, administrative liability, financial liability, the right to a fair trial, autonomous concepts in ECHR jurisprudence and ECJ case-law, court, criminal charge, criminal offence, criminal sanction, Engel Criteria, criminal court.

1. Preliminary considerations

The various forms of legal liability, characteristic of public law branches, involve the commission of unlawful acts and the application of sanctions, which are often difficult to distinguish from their raw typology: criminal liability and punishment as a typical criminal sanction.

The basic criterion of the distinction, which is easy to see at first glance, is the gravity of the unlawful act that generates the liability and the legal nature of the applicable sanction, namely its preventive / repressive character (in the case of criminal liability) and the absence of such a character of liability specific to other branches of public law).

The importance of fair interpretation of the legal nature of liability is particularly important in the context of respecting the right to fair trial and other fundamental rights and freedoms in procedural context. Thus, the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, concluded in Rome in 1950, establishes binding minimum guarantees for the conduct of a fair trial, which are distinct according to the criminal or civil nature of the matter submitted to litigation, under Article 6 of the Convention. Paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Article apply only where the safeguards of the fair trial relate to criminal proceedings while paragraph 1 applies to any type of trial.

Regarding the importance of establishing procedural boundaries depending on the criminal or non-criminal nature of the legal matter submitted to trial from the perspective of the same Convention, Additional Protocol no. 7, done at Strasbourg in 1984, by art. 4, entitled "The right not to be tried or punished twice" refers exclusively to criminal proceedings. In this context, paragraph 1 of the above article states that "No one shall be liable to be tried or punished again in criminal proceedings under the jurisdiction of the same State for an offence for which he has already been finally acquitted or convicted in accordance with the law and penal procedure of the State". The principle is known in the European Union as well as in the world, in its Latin formula: "ne bis in idem".

For the Member States of the European Union, as well as for the institutions (in particular the Court of Justice), the Union's bodies, offices and agencies, when applying directly European Union law, the fair trial guarantees and the ne bis in idem principle are governed by the provisions of the Charter of fundamental rights of the European Union.

In this context, there is the issue of coordination fundamental freedoms regulated by the Charter and the same safeguards, as regulated by the

[*] PhD Candidate, University "Nicolae Titulescu" of Bucharest, gbocsan@gmail.com

Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The issue seems very simple in the view of the Treaty on European Union (abbreviated as TEU), whose art. 6 par. (2) sentence I states that "the Union shall accede to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms".

Notwithstanding this provision as part of the Union's constitutional basis for the protection of fundamental rights, the opinions[1] drawn up by the Commission for the accession of the Union to the Convention have been rejected by the Court of Justice. The doctrine raised pertinent and essential questions about the Court of Justice's two refusals to endorse the Commission's proposals for the conclusion of an agreement on the Union's accession to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms: "Is there political and legal will to continue the process for the European Union to become party to the European Convention on Human Rights? Are we facing a permanent blockade or only a crisis that will naturally be overcome by profound reflections, reflections that will at one point materialize in a positive legal text accepted by the parties? This question intervenes in the conditions in which we refer, to the provisions of art. 218 TFEU, according to which a Member State, the European Parliament, the Council or the Commission can obtain the opinion of the Court of Justice on the compatibility of an envisaged agreement with the provisions of the Treaties. In the event of a negative opinion from the Court, that agreement may enter into force only after its amendment or revision of the Treaties"[2]

However, until the accession of the Union to the aforementioned Convention (which would greatly simplify the situation), the provisions of the fundamental treaties of the Union, those of the Charter and those of the Convention must be interpreted in a coherent and unitary manner, supported by case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union and the European Court of Human Rights (abbreviated as the ECHR), in order to build a fair, solid legal interface between the Charter's protection system and that of the Convention.

As stated above, the main fundamental rights to which we refer in this study are: the right to a fair trial and the right not to be prosecuted or punished twice for the same offence (ne bis in idem). In the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the Union, Art. 47 establishes the right to an effective remedy and to a fair trial, and art. 50, the right not to be tried or convicted twice for the same offense. The provisions of the Charter apply, in accordance with Art. 51 par. (1), to Union institutions, bodies, offices and agencies, in compliance with the principle of subsidiarity, and to Member States only if they implement Union law. On the other hand, the Charter does not extend the scope of Union law beyond its powers (Article 51 (2) of the Charter).

There are, of course, many situations in which the application of the Charter's provisions fall within the scope of art. 51 thereof; to illustrate our approach in the present study, we point out: the application of administrative sanctions under Art. 5 of Regulation No 2988/95 on the protection of the financial interests of the European Communities[3] by the authorities of the Member States or by OLAF under Council Regulation 883/2013 on OLAF's investigations[4], the application of measures and penalties provided for the implementation of the common agricultural policy or other Union sectoral areas in which aid is granted, the administrative or penal sanctions applied by the Member States under national transposing legislation of Council Directive 2006/112 / EC of 28 November 2006 on the common system of value added tax[5] and of the Implementing Regulation of Directive 2006/112 / EC on the common system of value added tax[6].

Also, regarding the legal interface between the Charter and the Convention, the provisions of art. 52 par. (3) of the Charter, which states that in so far as the Charter contains rights which correspond to rights guaranteed by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the meaning and scope of those rights shall be the same as those laid down by the said Convention. This provision shall not prevent Union law providing more extensive protection.

By virtue of this provision of the Charter, when it is necessary to determine the extent of the right to a fair trial or that of ne bis in idem principle, the interpretation of art. 47 and 50 respectively of the Charter must be made in the light of Art. 6 of the Convention and Art. 4 of the Additional Protocol no. 7 to the Convention. interpretation of the latter legal texts was done over decades by the ECHR case-law and of the first by the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of the European Union. In the case of that Court, the interpretation was undergone in the light of some fundamental principles of interpretation established by the ECHR, of which the most important is the "criminal charge".

2. The autonomous concept of the "criminal charge" in the context of the interpretation of the right to a fair trial, set out by Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms

The principle of equity has totally circumvented purely national logic in the interpretation of art. Article 6 of the Convention, which acquires a transnational and supranational legal vocation: "it leaves the Member States a fairly limited freedom: Article 6, unlike others, such as Articles 8 to 12, does not allow national data to be taken into account at all. That is why we are talking about the rigidity of Article 6 "[7].

The first important case of the ECHR, where the issue of the distinction between disciplinary and criminal liability in the matter of the right to a fair trial, as provided by Article 6 of the Convention was Engel and others against the Netherlands[8]. The ECHR's decision in this regard was to consecrate both the autonomous concept of "criminal charge" and the criteria for determining it, which remained in the judicial history under the name of "Engel Criteria". Some prestigious academics, looking at the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union, have carefully observed how these criteria form the basis of the demarcation between criminal law and other branches of law in European Union[9], consolidating the autonomous concept of "criminal nature of the accusation". Thus, although they are formally distinct, the "criminal charge" and the "criminal nature of the accusation" complement each other when the criminal matter has to be distinguished from the civil nature of an accusation, procedure or sanction.

Nominally, the autonomous concept of "criminal charge" was stated in the ECHR decision in Deweer v. Belgium (1980)[10], §. 42 para. 2 and the conclusion on the definition of this autonomous concept was that the criminal charge is the official notification of an individual made by the competent authority about the allegation that he had committed an offence. The formula is a synthesis of the previous jurisprudence (§. 42 para. 3 of the judgment's motivation), where, in connection with the application of the reasonable time principle of the criminal trial, it was established that the starting point of the trial is, as the case may be: the one in which a person has been arrested, the one in which he/she has been formally notified about being prosecuted before o court of law or when the person has been notified that pre-trial investigations have begun.

Coming back to Engel case, the state of affairs concerns three military servicemen of the Dutch Army committing deviations from military discipline, on the basis of which they have been subject to disciplinary sanctions. The essential question to which the Strasbourg Court had to answer was whether the right to a fair trial under Art. 6 of the Convention applies to those disciplinary proceedings in its criminal dimension[11]. The choice of the state to criminalize conduct is discretionary, but necessarily implies the enforcement of the safeguards of the fair trial in criminal matters[12]. The omission by the unique will of the national states to apply the rules of the fair criminal trial is not acceptable[13]. A partial conclusion of the ECHR, expressed in §. (81) the last paragraph is that "«the autonomy» of the concept of «criminal» operates only in one sense."

From § (82) to § (85) of the Decision, the Court sets out the so-called "Engel Criteria" as follows:

a) the provision of illicit deed in the law as a criminal offense[14];

[11] Engel Decision, §. 79 second paragraph: "Led thus to examine the applicability of Article 6 in the present case, the Court will first investigate whether the said proceedings concerned "any criminal charge" within the meaning of this text; for, although disciplinary according to Netherlands law, they had the aim of repressing through penalties offences alleged against the applicants, an objective analogous to the general goal of the criminal law".

[12] §. (81) paragraph 4 Engel Decision: "The Convention without any doubt allows the States, in the performance of their function as guardians of the public interest, to maintain or establish a distinction between criminal law and disciplinary law, and to draw the dividing line, but only subject to certain conditions. The Convention leaves the States free to designate as a criminal offence an act or omission not (...) constituting the normal exercise of one of the rights that it protects. This is made especially clear by Article 7. Such a choice, which has the effect of rendering applicable Articles 6 and 7, in principle escapes supervision by the Court".

[14] §. (82) paragraphs 1 and 2: "Hence, the Court must specify, limiting itself to the sphere of military service, how it will determine whether a given "charge" vested by the State in question - as in the present case - with a disciplinary character nonetheless counts as "criminal" within

b) the nature of the offence[15];
c) the severity of the sanction[16].

By the jurisprudence which followed the decision in Engel and others v. the Netherlands, the accusation that failed to fulfil any of the "Engel Criteria" does not automatically lead to the disqualification of a "criminal charge" in the sense of the autonomous concept established. On the other hand, the qualification as a "criminal charge" has often been recognized by the ECHR only by verifying a single "Engel criterion" (less the first, considered formal).

Most cases of accepting the qualification of a "criminal charge" on the basis of the verification of one of the criteria set out above referred to the criterion of the nature of the offence, assessed in terms of the punitive and deterrent nature of the sanction provided by the law for the illicit deed subject of the charge.

A first example of this is the ECtHR's decision on Öztürk v. Germany[17]. By a decision of an administrative authority, the applicant Öztürk, a Turkish citizen resident in Germany who did not speak German well enough, was fined for a road traffic offense. Just a few years ago, the same illicit deed was foreseen as a crime, but later it was decriminalized due to the need to simplify its sanctioning procedure, being considered minor, and imposing sanctions in approximately 5 million cases annually at Germany's level. The applicant challenged the sanction before the competent court but, in the course of the proceedings, dropped the appeal. By the judgment in question, the applicant was ordered to bear the costs of the proceedings, including the fees of the interpreter used by him during the proceedings. The applicant filed an appeal against the first-instance judgment, challenging his obligation to pay the court costs; the court dismissed the appeal.

In his complaint to the Human Rights Commission, the complainant alleged the violation by the German State of the provisions of Art. 6 par. (3) lit. (e) of the Convention, according to which any person charged within criminal proceedings has minimum rights, including the right to free assistance of an interpreter if he/she does not understand or speak the language used in court.

The fundamental legal issue in this case was also to decide whether the charge to the plaintiff, on the basis of which a fine was imposed, was a "criminal charge" in the sense of the autonomous concept developed by the ECHR in interpreting the terms of the guarantee the fair trial set out by art. 6 of the Convention. Given that the interpreter was not made available free of charge by the court to the applicant Öztürk, but only if payed, his complaint concerning the violation by Germany of Art. 6 par. (3) lit. (e) of the Convention should have been admissible only if the ECHR considered that the charge originally filed with the applicant was a "criminal charge" (which, moreover, was the case).

The ECHR found that the offense was not set out at the time of its commission by the criminal law, but until recently (reported at the time of the sanctioning) was a formal criminal offense. The reason for the decriminalization was the need to simplify the sanction procedure (§ 47 of the decision).

Paragraph 48 of the Decision recalls the criteria set out in the judgment Engel and others v. the Netherlands, and §. 50 of the decision reaffirms the autonomy of the concept of "criminal" in the context of art. 6 of the Convention.

Although the fact that the illicit act committed by the applicant is not a criminal offense but a violation of the substantive German law, the ECHR noted that procedural law provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure apply to the sanctioning of this infringement by analogy, by continuity with the previous legal nature, established by law until 1975, that of a criminal offense (§ 51 of the decision).

The second "Engel criterion," the nature of the offence, was analysed by the ECHR in terms of the legal nature of the sanction prescribed by law for the perpetration of the offence. Thus, within §. 52 of the Decision, the Court sees a number of substantive and procedural differences in the nature of the sanction: German law distinguishes between the fine as an administrative sanction and the fine as a criminal penalty, and the prison sentence was not provided for contraventions, but only for criminal offenses. Also, the contravention sanctions are not retained in the criminal the meaning of Article 6 (art. 6). In this connection, it is first necessary to know whether the provision(s) defining the offence charged belong, according to the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law, disciplinary law or both concurrently. This however provides no more than a starting point. The indications so afforded have only a formal and relative value and must be examined in the light of the common denominator of the respective legislation of the various Contracting States".

[15] §. (82) paragraph 3: "The very nature of the offence is a factor of greater import. When a serviceman finds himself accused of an act or omission allegedly contravening a legal rule governing the operation of the armed forces, the State may in principle employ against him disciplinary law rather than criminal law. In this respect, the Court expresses its agreement with the Government".

[16] §. (85) of the Decision. The ECHR further examines the maximum penalties that could be applied by the Supreme Military Court to plaintiffs. For Engel, the sentence taken into account by the Court was two days 'strict arrest', which is, in the ECHR's view, a penalty too soft to be considered a criminal punishment. Into the §. (85) par. 4 of the Decision, the Court considers that the sanctions applied to the applicants by Witt, Dona and Schul were indeed based on "criminal charges" because their purpose was to impose serious sentences involving deprivation of liberty.

In the end of §. (85) of the Decision, the ECtHR states that, although in the present case the Supreme Military Court unequivocally condemned the applicant de Witt to only 12 days of 'aggravated arrest', in other words, a sentence not involving deprivation of liberty (§. 62), the final outcome of the appeal could not diminish the severity of the sanction initially taken into consideration.

The paragraph close with: "The Convention certainly did not compel the competent authorities to prosecute Mr. de Wit, Mr. Dona and Mr. Schul under the Military Penal Code before a court martial (paragraph 14 above), a solution which could have proved less advantageous for the applicants. The Convention did however oblige the authorities to afford them the guarantees of Article 6 ".

record. These arguments tend to plead for a legal nature of administrative sanctions in that case different of the criminal one.

However, the Court notes in §. 53 of the decision that the sanction consisting of the fine imposed on the applicant for a contravention was punitive, which is the "distinctive feature of the criminal sanction". Also, in the same paragraph of the decision, the Court points out that the system of tripartite division of offenses according to their gravity, in crimes, felonies and misdemeanours still persists in many contemporary states, suggesting that the latter do not really have a legal nature fundamentally distinct from that of crimes and felonies, as criminal acts of greater or less seriousness. We consider that this perspective is particularly interesting because it addresses in a historical manner and subject to the necessity of the judiciary to dispose of an enormous burden of causes without significance, the need to transfer the decision of sanctioning from the judicial system to the administrative one. This pragmatic solution does not interfere with the legal nature of the accusation: it stays criminal.

By the judgment in Öztürk v. Germany, the ECHR supports the idea that the legal nature of the sanction applicable to an unlawful act should not be assessed in a quantitative way, but in a qualitative one, by assessing the punitive nature of the sanction versus a purely preventive nature. Taking the clear signs of the influence of classical doctrine of criminal law, the ECHR does not seem to assume a positivist view of the nature of the punishment: it is still regarded as repression, and not simply as prevention or removal of the danger.

Also, in the effort to assess the nature of the offence, according to the second "Engel criterion", the Court examines the addressability of the legal rule violated by the illicit deed, starting from another dogma of the classical doctrine of criminal law, according to which the norms that protect those social values that form the object of criminal offenses have general addressability. They are not designed for determined groups of people nor for individuals seen alone. From this point of view, the ECHR addresses the issue from the perspective that the rules in the present case, imposing the social value of road traffic safety, must be respected by everyone in the society as user of public roads.

This latter criterion, of the general addressability of the legal norm infringed by the illicit act, should be considered as circumscribed to the second "Engel criterion" (the nature of the act) because it relates to the nature of the criminal act through the legal object, namely the social value protected. However, in the jurisprudence of the ECHR that would follow the Öztürk case, it would become a true fourth criterion of the Engel type.

Thus, in the ECHR judgment in Bendenoun v. France[18], in which the applicant Michel Bendenoun was involved in three parallel proceedings, all based on the same legal context: the first a customs procedure, the second a fiscal one and the third an undoubted criminal one, the Court, in §47, refers to the "four factors" to be analysed "in the light of the case law and in particular the Öztürk case".

The first criterion assessed in § 47 of the decision is precisely the general addressability of the rules that protect the legal object of the illicit deed, the Court considering that the provisions of the General Code of Taxes relating to the offences in the case "concern all citizens, in their capacity as taxpayers, and not a particular group with a special status ".

In the continuation of legal syllogism, the Court examines the nature of the unlawful deeds, from the point of view of the nature of the sanction provided for by the law for the offence, considering that the tax increases are not intended as a compensation for damage but "essentially as a punishment to deter reoffending". In conclusion, the Court stated that those sanctions are preventive and repressive.

According to the third "Engel Criterion", the seriousness of the sanction stipulated by the law for committing such offences, in §. 47 par. 5 of the decision, the Court considers that these penalties, consisting of fines of FF 422 534 for the applicant and FF 570 398 for his company (therefore very important), cumulated with the possibility of transforming the first fine into days of imprisonment in case of non-payment in due course, outlines the seriousness of the sanction.

In concluding the evaluation of the "Engel Criteria", the last paragraph of §. 47 notes: "Having weighed the various aspects of the case, the Court notes the predominance of those which have a criminal connotation. None of them is decisive on its own, but taken together and cumulatively they made the "charge" in issue a "criminal" one within the meaning of Article 6 para. 1, which was therefore applicable".

What is specific to this ECHR decision is that, for the first time, for the purposes of determining the criminal nature of a charge as an autonomous concept, it considers a combination of criteria already established by the case-law of the Court which, does not characterize the accusation as criminal, but only partially and conjugated, leads to such a conclusion.

In Ferrazzini v. Italy[19], following a transfer of immovable property to a company founded by the applicant for the purposes of agritourism, he requested the Italian tax authority to apply reductions to three taxes to be paid, of which the former was VAT. With regard to VAT, the tax authorities found from the tax declarations of the applicant that the property transferred to the company was undervalued, for which reason the applicant was liable to pay the tax corresponding to the real value of the property plus penalties. Following the administrative appeal of the sanction applied, the tax authorities waived the case as a result of accepting the applicant's tax relief requests.

Regarding the situation of the other taxes and duties owed, the fiscal authority informed the applicant that his claims for reduction of payment amounts were rejected and that he would be required to pay administrative penalties equal to 20% of the amount of the sums due if he did not pay them within 60 days of the date of communication. The complainant challenged the decisions before the tax commission (administrative body), which subsequently rejected them. In October 2000, the applicant appealed before the regional tax commission and then applied to the ECHR invoking the breach of the reasonable time rule, guaranteed by Art. 6 par. (1) of the Convention, in the context in which the first procedure lasted for more than 10 years and the second procedure for more than 12 years.

The position of the Government was that the provisions of Art. 6 par. (1) of the Convention do not apply to tax proceedings, and in the present case they did not concern a "criminal charge". Moreover, the Government argued that, in Italy, the procedure for the enforcement of a tax provision is carried out in accordance with the procedure laid down by law for civil liability. The complainant expressed a similar position, considering the nature of the proceedings as civil and not criminal.

At §. 20 of the Judgment, the Court held that: " The parties having agreed that a "criminal charge" was not in issue and the Court, for its part, not perceiving any "criminal connotation" in the instant case (see, a contrario, Bendenoun v. France, judgment of 24 February 1994, Series A no. 284, p. 20, § 47), it remains to be examined whether the proceedings in question did or did not concern the "determination of civil rights and obligations".

Analysing the belonging to the public or the private law of the fiscal legal matters, §. 29, third sentence, of the Judgment states: " The Court considers that tax matters still form part of the hard core of public-authority prerogatives, with the public nature of the relationship between the taxpayer and the community remaining predominant". Hence the conclusion expressed in the last sentence of the paragraph mentioned: "It considers that tax disputes fall outside the scope of civil rights and obligations, despite the pecuniary effects which they necessarily produce for the taxpayer".

The Court concludes in the sense of that inapplicability of the provisions of Art. 6 par. (1) of the Convention.

A complete and systematic analysis of the criteria for determining the incidence of the provisions of Article 6 (1) of the Convention is implemented by the ECHR in the Jussila v. Finland Judgment[20].

The complainant, manager of a car repair company, has filed tax returns in 1998 on VAT. By detecting a number of inaccuracies, particularly of an accounting nature, in those statements, the fiscal authority made an estimate of the turnover of the company, which was higher than that declared by the company, which led to the increase in the amount owed as VAT. The tax authorities communicated to the applicant a decision on the basis of which he had to pay an increase equal to 10% of the amount of the rights he was ultimately considered to be debtor (308.8 Euro). Subsequently, the applicant challenged the tax decision by administrative means, and then in court. In the appeal proceedings, before an administrative tribunal, the applicant requested the hearing in court of himself, of the tax inspector who handled the file and an ex parte expert. However, the court was pleased with the submission by the tax inspector of written observations and the submission of an ex parte expert report. The Administrative Court rejected the applicant's request to be heard in the proceedings before the court and the request for the fiscal inspector and the ex parte expert to be heard, considering that all the parties involved were aware of their claims and the hearings in those circumstances became useless. In the applicant's appeal, the Supreme Administrative Court also rejected the complainant's request for hearings.

In the reasoning developed by the ECHR to determine whether Art. 6 par. (1) of the Convention is applicable in this case, the following steps were taken:

a) excluding the application of art. 6 of the Convention in its civil aspect - the case-law - explained in the Ferrazzini decision against Italy;
b) analysis of the Engel Criteria as follows:

- the provision in law of the criminal nature of the act - the Court notes that both the Engel v. the Netherlands Judgment and that of Ezeh and Connors v. the United Kingdom[21] do not attach any particular importance to the verification of this criterion, which is purely formal, but the accent goes instead to the nature of the offence and the severity of the sanction[22];
- the lack of seriousness of the sanction provided by law is not such as to remove the criminal nature of the act[23];
- the admissibility of both a partial analysis of each criterion and the possibility of a cumulative assessment as a whole in order to draw the conclusion that the accusation is criminal[24];

- the criterion of the seriousness of the sanction, which the Court did not consider particularly important in the cases Öztürk v. Germany and Bendenoun v. France, however, gains significant value in its judgment in Morel v. France[25];

c) the conclusion was based solely on the second "Engel criterion", namely the nature of the act, deduced from the "preventive and repressive" purpose of the sanction[26], and thus the incidence of art. 6 of the Convention, but without any breach of the fundamental guarantee of the fair trial by the fact that the courts rejected the requests for hearings in question, while respecting the contradictory nature of the written procedure[27].

The partially dissenting opinion shared by the judges Costa, Cabral Barreto and Mularoni, to which Judge Calfish has also rallied, expresses the view that, among the criteria considered to establish the applicability of Art. 6 par. (1) of the Convention, the criminal aspect, only two are satisfied in Jussila v. Finland: the general applicability of the rules on tax obligations and the punitive / preventive nature of the sanction, while the act is not provided for by the criminal law and the value of the sanction is modest. Applying the Bendenoun cumulative assessment, the supporters of the opinion consider that the conditions of the autonomous concept of "criminal charge" are not fulfilled and, on the other hand, following the decision of Ferranzzini v. Italy, there cannot be either the civil respect of the right to a fair trial.

In the partially dissenting opinion of Judge Loucaides, to which the judges Zupančič and Spielman have also stated they adhere, it was expressed the view that the rules of the fair trial require the national courts to hear the plaintiff and to have a genuine public debate as a requirement of the right to a trial fair. The partially dissenting opinion insists on the fact that the small amount of the sanction applied is insignificant compared to the sanction itself, which implies ipso facto an infamous character, a social stigma for the applicant. In this equation, the state does not appear as a subject of law, but as a holder of the power to enforce the law.

In support of this last dissenting opinion, we also bring the following arguments:

- interpersonal communication, manifested in court by orality and the unmediated reach of the evidence by the judge, is a value eo ipso;
- the perception of the defendant who is denied the right to speak in his or her own trial is that of the contempt and arrogance of the judges, who probably see in his/her hearing only a waste of time;
- the right to question witnesses and experts as part of the right of defence is fundamental; most of the time, from this newly created relationship results precious cognitive elements;
- the public procedure guarantees observance of the process of administration of justice by society; it is a way of verifying compliance with the principle of the rule of law, since no one can simply be obliged to believe in the rule of law without evidence in this respect and without personal experience;
- the mere fact of the public and oral procedure does not impede the effectiveness and speed of the procedure;
- the ideas of the defence and prosecution are developed successively during the court hearing, feeding each other on the way of the orality and spontaneity it induces.

The same reasoning on the use of the "Engel Criteria" to outline the concept of "criminal charge" and "criminal trial" respectively was also used in many other ECHR cases, including some more recent ones, such as Zolotukhin v. Russia[28] and Grande Stevens v. Italy[29].

In the decision in Grande Stevens v. Italy, the applicants were administratively sanctioned by CONSOB[30] for "manipulation of the market"[31] with fines ranging from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 Euros. On appeal, the Court of Appeal in Torino reduced the amount of the fines to some of the claimants, reaching France, §. 47 last paragraph: " These factors may be regarded however in context as relevant in assessing the application of the second and third Engel criteria to the facts of the case, there being no indication that the Court was intending to deviate from previous case-law or to establish separate principles in the tax sphere. It must further be emphasised that the Court in Bendenoun did not consider any of the four elements as being in themselves decisive and took a cumulative approach in finding Article 6 applicable under its criminal head".

[25] ECHR, Décision finale sur la recevabilité de la requête 54559/00, présentée par Jean Morel contre la France (translated from French by the author of the stydy)- the applicant was sanctioned because he did not file a VAT return even though his turnover exceeded the level for which the declaration was mandatory, pursuant to certain provisions of the Fiscal Code. He was required to pay a 10% increase of the payment amount, 4450 FF, ie 678 Euros. The amount of the tax penalty was considered "of minor importance" by the Court (paragraph 10 of the motivation). However, the ECHR based its decision not to consider that the provisions of Art. 6 par. (1) of the Convention are applicable in that case on the whole assessment of the "Engel criteria".

between € 600,000 and € 1,200,000. Marrone and Grande Stevens have remained with CONSOB's initial sanction of 5 and 3 million respectively.

The Court of Appeal also noted that, besides the application of administrative sanctions by CONSOB, this authority informed the Prosecutor's Office that the same persons committed the offense set out and punished by art. 185 §. 1 of the same Legislative Decree no. 58 of 24 February 1998[32].

By the indictment of 7 November 2008, the applicants were brought to trial before the Turin Tribunal for the aforementioned offense, with the same content as the offense for which they were administratively sanctioned. Before the court, the applicants alleged breach of the ne bis in idem principle. The Prosecutor's Office opposed that defence by stating that the Italian legal texts in question were merely transpositions of the provisions of Directive 2003/6 / EC of 28 January 2003[33], which did not prohibit the cumulation of administrative and criminal penalties. In this regard, the court ruled that the two sanctions would not have been applied "for the same deed" because only the text of criminalization required the intention to be an element of the subjective side of the offense, while the administrative text also accepted the guilt; on the other hand, only the text of criminalization provided the requirement that the behaviour be capable of causing a significant change in the value of financial instruments. Moreover, the court also noted the incidence of the provisions of art. 14 of Directive 2003/6 / EC, which provide for the possibility of imposing penalties as well as administrative sanctions for violations of its provisions.

By the judgment of 28 February 2013, the Torino Court of Appeal convicted the plaintiffs Gabetti and Grande Stevens for the offense withheld against them by indictment (the other defendants being acquitted on various grounds of fact and law). In so doing, the Court of Appeal held that there had been no violation of the ne bis in idem principle.

Before the ECHR, the applicants invoked the violation of the right to a fair trial in the proceedings before CONSOB and the breach of ne bis in idem principle, stipulated in art. 4 of the Additional Protocol no. 7 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

As regards the applicability of the provisions of Art. 6 par. (1) of the Convention, the Court again referred to the 'Engel Criteria', pointing out that they were alternative rather than cumulative, by making the usual point-by-point analysis from the previous case-law[34]. Thus, the Court held that the acts which gave rise to the sanction applied by CONSOB were not provided for by the criminal law, but by their nature the legal provisions infringed by the applicants were designed to guarantee the integrity of the financial markets and the confidence in the security of transactions. The Court "considers that the fines applied were essentially designed to punish, in order to prevent a repeat of the violation." The sanctions were not applied to repair the financial damage, and their basis was the seriousness of the facts and not the damage suffered by the investors. The fines applied were, however, not transformable into prison days in the case of their default (as was the case in Anghel v. Romania) [35]. Finally, the Court notes the severity of the sanctions provided by law and even applied by CONSOB for violation of the provisions of the Legislative Decree: fines of up to EUR 5,000,000, pointing to §. 99 decision that those sanctions "were criminal, as nature". The logical consequence of this reasoning was that of determining the applicability of art. 6 par. (1) of the Convention.

3. The link between the autonomous concepts of "criminal charge" / "criminal matter" and the "same facts" in the context of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms

The autonomous concepts of "criminal charge"/"criminal matter" are particularly relevant to determining the incidence in a particular criminal case of the ne bis in idem principle. Thus, often, the question is to establish the existence of a violation of this principle when, for the same facts, a person is sanctioned administratively, fiscally or disciplinary, and later or even simultaneously, the person is investigated, prosecuted and sometimes even convicted.

The ne bis in idem principle is a fundamental guarantee in the domestic law of the national states[36], being in principle provided by numerous constitutions of the EU Member States[37], by art. 4 of the Additional Protocol no. 7 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and Art. 50 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, as well as in numerous international conventions[38].

The ne bis in idem principle, from the perspective of art. 4 paragraph 1 of Additional Protocol no. 7 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, reads as follows: "No one shall be liable to be tried or punished again in criminal proceedings under the jurisdiction of the same State for an offence for which he has already been finally acquitted or convicted in accordance with the law and penal procedure of that State".

It is noted that the wording of Additional Protocol no. 7 to the European Convention on ne bis in idem principle refers only to the situation where the element "idem", namely the prosecution or conviction, occurs in the same state where the person has been acquitted or convicted. There is no transnational perspective of this principle.

Nothing in the text of art. 4 para. 1 of Additional Protocol no. Article 7 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms does not preclude a person being convicted or acquitted in a particular member of the Council of Europe and then prosecuted or convicted for the same facts in another Member State[39]. This will no longer apply in the context of the autonomous concept consisting of the ne bis in idem principle of European Union law (the Charter or the Convention Implementing the Schengen Agreement), where this principle becomes transnational and supranational.

From the point of view of a supranational jurisdiction, such as the ECHR, in relation to a legal text of the kind previously cited, almost all concepts with which that rule operates are accepted as defined in the domestic law of the State concerned, less the concept of "the same fact", which must have a common meaning for the interpretation of the rule, which is why it was defined as an autonomous concept in ECHR jurisprudence.

An act that cannot be classified as object of a "criminal charge" from the point of view of this autonomous concept, cannot attract a punishment and therefore cannot constitute a "same fact" as an autonomous concept that removes the possibility of a new investigation, prosecution or new punishment.

We do not intend in this study to carry out a thorough study of the ne bis in idem principle, but only to highlight the deep and intimate relationship established between the two aforementioned autonomous concepts.

To that end, we note that many ECHR decisions aim to establish the right to a fair trial in criminal matters (Article 6 § 1 of the Convention) as a first step before addressing the issue of the incidence of the ne bis in idem principle.

For the purpose of illustrating this mechanism, we turn to the ECHR judgment in Grande Stevens v. Italy, as we have referred to above, in terms of applying the "Engel Criteria" to determine the incidence of the autonomous concept of "criminal matter". As we have already seen, CONSOB, having sanctioned the plaintiffs by administrative means for manipulations of the securities market, sent the evidence to the prosecutor's office, who, following a criminal investigation, prosecuted the plaintiffs for an offence qualified by law as a crime. The applicants alleged violation of the ne bis in idem principle, but the Italian courts rejected the defence with a motivation mainly referring to the subjective side of the offence.

In their application to the ECHR, the applicants have again invoked the violation of the same principle by the Italian national courts. As explained above, the ECHR considered that the sanction applied to the applicants was based on a 'criminal charge', in a 'criminal matter' thus creating the premises for the analysis of the ne bis in idem principle incidence.[40]

In pursuing its legal syllogism, the ECHR examines whether there are "same facts" in the CONSOB decision and in the indictment of the prosecutor's office. The Court has, through this concept, understood the material identity of the facts, and not the conditions under which acts or inactions are prescribed by law as offenses[41]. The concept was also defined in previous ECHR cases in this area[42].

Following the analysis of the CONSOB sanctioned facts materiality and of those sent before the court by the Prosecutor's Office, the ECHR concluded that: "the procedures clearly referred to the same [39]For further explanation, see P.P. Paulesu, Ne bis in idem and Conflict of Jurisdiction in R. E. Kostoris, Editor, Handbook of European Criminal Procedure, Springer International Publishing AG, Switzerland, 2018, pp. 398-402. The aforementioned author finds the same situation in the case of the ne bis in idem principle of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Article 14 (7)).

[40] ECHR, judgment in Grande Stevens v. Italy, §. 222: "Applying those principles to the case at hand, the Court notes, firstly, that it has just concluded, under Article 6 of the Convention, that there existed valid grounds for considering that the procedure before the CONSOB involved a "criminal charge" against the applicants (see paragraph 101 above) and also observes that the sentences imposed by the CONSOB and partly reduced by the court of appeal constituted res judicata on 23 June 2009, when the judgments of the Court of Cassation were delivered (see paragraph 38 above). From that date, the applicants ought therefore to be considered as having been "already finally convicted of an offence" for the purposes of Article 4 of Protocol No. 7".

[41] Ibid. §. 224: "It remains to be ascertained whether those new proceedings were based on facts which were substantially the same as those which had been the subject of the final conviction. In this regard, the Court notes that, contrary to what the Government seem to be asserting (see paragraph 217 above), it follows from the principles set out in the case of Sergey Zolotukhin, cited above, that the question to be answered is not whether or not the elements of the offences set out in Articles 187 ter and 185 § 1 of Legislative Decree No. 58 of 1998 are identical, but whether the offences with which the applicants were charged before the CONSOB and before the criminal courts concerned the same conduct".

[42] ECHR, Zolotukhin v. Russia, cited above, §. 82: "Accordingly, the Court takes the view that Article 4 of Protocol No. 7 must be understood as prohibiting the prosecution or trial of a second "offence" in so far as it arises from identical facts or facts which are substantially the same".

conduct of the same persons and on the same date"[43] and therefore, "this finding is sufficient to conclude that there has been a violation of Art. 4 of Protocol no. 7 "[44].

The question of whether or not the accusation underlying one of the "convictions" was to be found as criminal, based on the "Engel Criteria", following a constant practice in the application of the Criteria, started to be doubted by the ECHR, in the judgment in case A and B v. Norway[45]. In the case, the applicants together with other persons have traded in the financial market and the proceeds from these activities were not declared at the tax authority, which discovered the facts in the course of an audit, almost four years after they were perpetrated. Total damages to the state as a result of non-payment of taxes related to undeclared income were 3.6 million Euros. The tax authority notified the prosecutor's office, who, after conducting the criminal investigation, prosecuted the plaintiffs for the offense of tax evasion. Before being convicted of imprisonment on the basis of the indictment, the applicants were sanctioned by the tax authorities forcing them to pay penalties representing 30% of the amount of the taxes owed to the income they did not declare. The applicants have raised a claim before the ECHR that a violation of the ne bis in idem principle occurred in the Italian justice system.

In §. 105 of the Judgment, the Court recalls its jurisprudential tradition, also expressed in the Zolotukhin case, to establish the criminal character of the charge on the basis of the "Engel Criteria", but at §. 107 points out that it does not appear justified to start from such an analysis in the present case, applying more precise criteria than those mentioned above. Moreover, the Court noted that there was a need for a 'calibrated approach' as regards the way in which the ne bis in idem principle is applied in procedures combining administrative and criminal penalties.

Within this new "calibrated approach" to which the Court refers, the "States should be able legitimately to choose complementary legal responses to socially offensive conduct (such as non-compliance with road-traffic regulations or non-payment/evasion of taxes) through different procedures forming a coherent whole so as to address different aspects of the social problem involved, provided that the accumulated legal responses do not represent an excessive burden for the individual concerned"[46].

Thus, the ECHR no longer considers that an integrated approach combining administrative and criminal penalties for the same facts in their purely material sense would defeat ne bis in idem, especially when the two categories of sanctions would present different purposes and would be in the competence of different authorities.

In order to allow such cumulation, at §. 132 of the Judgment, the Court sets out precise rules:

- the procedures pursue complementary goals and therefore address not only abstractly but also concretely different aspects of incorrect social behaviour;
- the duality of the proceedings in question is a foreseeable consequence, both legally and practically, of the same behaviour (idem);
- inquiries should be carried out in such a way as to avoid, as much as possible, duplication of gathering and evaluation of evidence, in particular through appropriate interaction between the various competent authorities to ensure that the evidence in a procedure is acquired also for the other procedures;
- the sanction imposed in the procedures that become definitive earlier should be taken into account in those that become definitive later, ultimately preventing the person from incurring an excessive burden, the latter risk being the lowest if there is in place a mechanism which is designed to ensure the proportionality of the total amount of sanctions imposed;
- there is a certain temporary link between procedures that is sufficiently tight to protect the individual from uncertainty and prolonged delays[47].

Analysing carefully the above criteria, the ECHR concluded that, in the case, to each of the complainants, there is a sufficiently close link, both in substance and in time, between the decision on tax penalties and the subsequent criminal conviction for that they can be considered as part of an integrated system of penalties under Norwegian law for failing to provide accurate information in a tax return resulting in a faulty assessment of taxes[48].

4. The concept of "criminal charge" and the principles "ne bis in idem" and "nulla poena sine culpa" in the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union

Because the criminal dimension of European Union law has appeared relatively late, especially since the Amsterdam Treaty, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU/ECJ) was seized with very few cases before 1997.

Such a case is Hansen & Søn[49]. In application of Regulation (EEC) No. 543/69 of the Council from 25 March 1969 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to road transport, which obliges employers in this field to oblige drivers to have specific driving and resting intervals, by means of a Danish ministerial order, it was set out the provision that the employer would be fined if the employee did not comply with the rules on rest referred to in that regulation, even if the employer had no guilt in respect of that breach of law. In such a case, Hansen & Søn was sanctioned with a fine in absence of the existence of any intention or fault on its part in connexion to the unlawful act perpetrated by an employee. In those circumstances, the Danish Court of Appeal asked the CJEU a preliminary question as to whether the regulation at issue prohibits the adoption of national provisions under which an employer whose drivers are in breach of the provisions of that regulation may be subject to criminal sanction, even if the violations are not an intentional or negligent act of the employer.

This request for a preliminary ruling raises the question of whether, in application of Community law, the adoption by the Member States of rules based upon objective criminal liability is admissible. Hansen & Søn also argued that the criminal sanctioning of employers in that context extends the scope of the Regulation and that only Denmark has chosen to apply criminal sanctions for the unlawful acts of the employees, a situation which is likely to distort fair trade competition in the economic field of road transports.

In response, the CJEU stated that the Regulation leaves the discretion of the Member States to the implementation of its provisions, and Article 18 of the Regulation allows Member States to determine the legal nature and severity of the sanctions to be imposed in the event of its breach. Moreover, the Court also refers to the provisions of Art. 5 of the EEC Treaty, which required Member States to take all necessary measures to ensure the effective application of Community law.

The preliminary ruling stated that neither that regulation nor the general principles of Community law does not preclude the application of national provisions according to which an employer whose drivers are in breach of the provisions of the Regulation on working and resting time may be the subject of a punishment decided in criminal proceedings, despite the fact that such violations cannot be attributed to an intentional unlawful act or negligence on the part of the employer, provided that the foreseeable punishment is similar to those imposed for violation of national law for acts of similar nature and importance and proportionate with the severity of the violation committed.

In so doing, the Court insisted on the principles of Community law generally applicable in such cases: the effective and dissuasive nature of the sanction, the principle of proportionality and assimilation, referring to the case-law on the "Greek maize case"[50], taking note of the fact that in Denmark, the protection of the working environment is ensured mainly by the application of criminal penalties, as well as by assessing the proportionality of the sanction against the seriousness of the facts.

By the aforementioned decision, the Court implicitly accepts criminal liability which is not based on guilt (objective) but only under condition that national law allows it. Such a position violates a fundamental principle of law, concomitantly seen as a fundamental rights guarantee: nulla poena sine culpa. We can validly deduce the importance of this principle in guaranteeing the defence rights in criminal proceedings, per a contrario, by applying the presumption of innocence principle (set out in Article 48 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and Article 6 (2) of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms)[51].

However, in §. 47 of the CJEU's judgment in Käserei Champignon Hofmeister, the Court notes: "in other areas, the Court has accepted that a system of strict criminal liability penalising breach of a Community regulation is not in itself incompatible with Community law". The quote refers to §. 19 of the Hansen & Søn judgment.

The preliminary ruling in Käserei Champignon Hofmeister appears confusing because in Hansen & Søn, the Court was not questioned whether the objective criminal liability is contrary to Community law but rather whether the existence of such a liability in the national law of a Member State legitimates its existence also in Community law. However, it must be made clear that at the time of the judgment in Hansen & Søn (1990) there were no provisions in the fundamental treaties of the Communities on human rights or on the issue of criminal justice in the Community context and the Charter was not yet adopted.

The Court's ruling in Käserei Champignon Hofmeister (abridged KCH) has brought to light, as a response to Hansen & Søn, the autonomous concept of the CJEU on the principle nulla poena sine culpa, but also the autonomous concept of "criminal charge" and "criminal matter". The latter was approached, [50] CJEU, Judgment of the Court of 21 September 1989, Commission of the European Communities v. Hellenic Republic, C - 68/88, ECLI:EU:C:1989:339.

[51] CJEU, Judgment of the Court (Fifth Chamber) of 11 July 2002, case Käserei Champignon Hofmeister GmbH & Co. KG v. Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Jonas, C-210/00, ECLI:EU:C:2002:440.

In §. 29 of the judgment, the Court has noted that "KCH argues that, in the light of its importance and the fact that it does not aim merely to eradicate the consequences of an unlawful act, the penalty laid down in Article 11 of Regulation No 3665/87 is of a criminal nature. Since it allows the imposition of such a penalty even in the absence of any fault, the provision is contrary to the principle 'nulla poena sine culpa', which is part of the general principles of Community law. This is a principle recognised by Article 6(2) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, signed in Rome on 4 November 1950 (hereinafter 'the ECHR'), by the law of the Member States, and by Community law itself".

More, §. 30 of the same judgment states that nulla poena sine culpa is also applicable to administrative sanctions.

seemingly unrelated to the ECHR jurisprudence based on the "Engel Criteria" check, to which we have referred above. Although the CJEU ignored such an approach in its decision, the similarities are clear. As in the case of Hansen & Søn judgment in 2002, when the Käserei Champignon Hofmeister decision was handed down, the Treaties did not refer directly to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union has not yet been written. However, as we have already shown (in footnote 51) and we will continue to do so, the CJEU's awareness of the acquis of the European Convention has progressed significantly.

The case concerns the application to the exporter KCH by the German customs authorities of financial penalties for breach of the provisions of Regulation (EEC) No. 3665/87[52], art. 11 para. (1) subparagraph (1) (a). In fact, KCH stated that it has exported a quantity of melted cheese for which it had applied for export refunds, receiving an advance of DEM 30 000 on the basis of statutory refunds, but subsequently on the occasion of a check by the customs authority, it was found that the product also contained vegetable fats, in these conditions not fulfilling the conditions to allow for any export refunds to be paid.

KCH challenged the financial penalty imposed by the customs authority in the framework of the domestic justice system, claiming that it has purchased the product subsequently exported without being aware that the supplier did not complied with the quality standards of the goods and has not had a reasonable opportunity to carry out checks to the supplier. In law, KCH argued that the principle of nulla poena sine culpa had been violated and, in the alternative, that there was a case of force majeure consisting of the impossibility of carrying out prior checks at the supplier's premises.

As regards the nulla poena sine culpa principle, the interpretation of which was to be given by way of the preliminary ruling, the Court held that this principle applies only where the charge is of a criminal nature and hence the Court's first task within the legal syllogism constructed is to determine whether the sanction in question was based on a provision of a criminal nature[53].

Further to the reasoning, the Court holds that:

- the legal rules infringed are not of general application, but are addressed only to economic operators who have chosen to avail themselves of the benefits of an aid scheme in agricultural matters[54];
- the amount of the payment under the sanction provided for by the Regulation is directly proportional to the amount unreasonably levied by the economic operator before the irregularity has been discovered by the authorities[55];
- it is difficult to give accurate export declarations, that is why the sanction merely encourages exporters to carry out checks on suppliers adapted to the frequency and intensity of the concrete needs or to be sheltered by contractual clauses which provide for compensation from contractors when the goods are inadequate or to conclude insurance policies for the same purpose[56];
- the proof of a possible fraudulent intention of the exporter is so difficult to produce that the regulation constructs exporters as the last link of the export-purchase chain for exported goods that can ensure compliance of the goods with the export declaration[57];
- " In the context of a Community aid scheme, in which the granting of the aid is necessarily subject to the condition that the beneficiary offers all guarantees of probity and trustworthiness, the penalty imposed in the event of non-compliance with those requirements constitutes a specific administrative instrument forming an integral part of the scheme of aid and intended to ensure the sound financial management of Community public funds "[58].

The Court's conclusion was that an accusation like the one based on Art. 11 para. 1 subparagraph 1 (a) of Regulation (EEC) No. 3665/87 cannot be regarded as a criminal charge[59].

Seeing the arguments above presented, we note that the CJEU, without saying it, has only analysed the ECHR criteria for determining the autonomous concept of "criminal charge", with certain nuances coming from the specific regime of Community agricultural aid (general applicability of the norm, the nature of the offence and the nature of the sanction). In so doing, the Luxembourg Court has begun to construct a self-contained concept of the "criminal charge" or, more precisely, of the "criminal sanction". Between the two autonomous concepts, however, there is a strong link, based, whether it is labelled as such or not, on the "Engel Criteria".

Concerning the issue of the same text of the aforementioned regulation in the context of nulla poena sine culpa principle, the CJUE's decision in Société d

[52] Commission Regulation (EEC) No 3665/87 of 27 November 1987 laying down common detailed rules for the application of the system of export refunds on agricultural products, OJ 351/1987.

Under art. 11 para. (1) subparagraph (1) of the Regulation, where it is found that, for the purposes of granting an export refund, an exporter has claimed a refund higher than that applicable, the refund due for the export in question shall consist of the refund applicable to the product actually exported, reduced by an appropriate amount:

a. half the difference between the requested refund and the one applicable to the actual export made;

b) double the difference between the requested refund and the applicable refund if the exporter deliberately provided false data.

'Exportation de Produits Agricoles SA (SEPA) case, also relying on previous rulings, noted that "The liability on which that penalty is based is essentially objective in nature. It follows that the reduction referred to in point (a) of the first subparagraph of Article 11(1) of Regulation No 3665/87 must be applied even if the exporter has not committed any fault "[60].

Turning to the issue of the autonomous concept of "criminal charge" and the "Engel Criteria", Advocate General Juliane Kokott, in her conclusions in Bonda, examined precisely the applicability of these criteria in order to establish the criminal or administrative nature of the sanctions in question also for observing the ne bis in idem principle[61]. Starting with §. 51 of the conclusions, the evaluation of the "Engel Criteria" is made by the Advocate General (hereinafter referred to as AG) by reference to the CJEU's decision in Käserei Champignon Hofmeister, referred above. AG also points out indirectly to the equivalence of the "Engel Criteria" with those applied by the CJEU in Käserei Champignon Hofmeister, even if the CJEU did not use that well-known name and made no reference to ECHR jurisprudence in the matter[62]. By analysing upon this method, AG reaches the conclusion that there was no "criminal charge" in the matter, so that the ne bis in idem principle was not violated.

In fact, Łukasz Marcin Bonda, an independent Polish farmer, submitted an application to the managing authority for agricultural aid in 2005, in which he made inaccurate declarations on the area under cultivation and on the types of agricultural crops. By finding that the declaration is inconsistent with the reality, the administrative authority rejected the farmer's application for aid and applied to him an administrative measure prohibiting entitlement to agricultural aid for three years further from that time under Article 138 of Regulation (EC) No. 1973/2004 of 29 October 2004[63]. Subsequently, Bonda was convicted in first instance for committing the offense of subsidy fraud set out by Article 297 (1) of the Polish Penal Code, to eight months' imprisonment with conditional suspension of execution, the trial period being two years and a fine of 80 days, calculated at a rate of PLN 20 per day. On appeal, the court asked the CJEU a preliminary question as to the legal nature of the sanction set out by the EU regulation and the incidence of the ne bis in idem principle.

In the judgment[64], the Court relied on the analysis made by AG Kokott in her approach to the autonomous concept of 'criminal proceedings'[65], based on the 'Engel Criteria' analysis, by reference to the previous case-law, including Käserei Champignon Hofmeister case, with references also to the provisions of art. 325 TFEU, on the protection of the financial interests of the European Union and to the provisions of the so-called PIF Regulation[66]. Express references to "Engel Criteria" were also made largely in §. 37-45 of the Judgment, concluding that they have not been accomplished.

Thus, "the Court has previously held that penalties laid down in rules of the common agricultural policy, such as the temporary exclusion of an economic operator from the benefit of an aid scheme, are not of a criminal nature" [67]and "there is nothing to justify a different answer being given with respect to the measures provided for in the second and third subparagraphs of Article 138(1) of Regulation No 1973/2004"[68].

The conclusion of the preliminary decision was that: "the measures provided for in the second and third subparagraphs of that provision, consisting in excluding a farmer from receiving aid for the year in which he made a false declaration of the eligible area and reducing the aid he can claim within the following three calendar years by an amount corresponding to the difference between the area declared and the area determined, do not constitute criminal penalties".

A similar issue is also addressed in the CJEU's judgment of Hans Åkerberg Fransson[69]. The only notable difference is that the sanctions regarding to whom the question whether they are criminal or not related to statements inconsistent to the reality of the suspected taxpayer, which led to the undervaluation of the VAT due to the state budget and to the Union budget, through the mechanism of the VAT common system. The Court's conclusion was that the penalties imposed on the petitioner under the national legislation transposing Directive 2006/112 / EC[70] are not criminal in nature.

In order to do so, the Court once again verified the fulfilment of the "Engel Criteria" without naming them[71].

A somewhat similar legal issue is addressed in the CJEU judgment in Menci[72]. Thus, in the transposition of Directive 2006/112 / EC on the common system of VAT, the Italian law provided both an administrative penalty for non-payment of VAT at the prescribed time, representing a percentage share of the amount owed to the tax with that title and a criminal penalty (imprisonment from 6 months to 2 years) for the same fact. Again, the criminal nature of the administrative sanction, the ne bis in idem principle, and the necessary and proportionate nature of the cumulation between the two types of sanctions is being discussed, as tax returns have been made in accordance with reality and there are no indications of fraud being committed.

In that decision too, the Court applies the "Engel Criteria" to determine the possible criminal nature of the act sanctioned with the percentage increases in the payment amount as a tax liability[73]. However, unlike previous cases when, as a result of the analysis of the Engel Criteria, the finding was that the facts in question were not criminal, in the present case, with regard to the administrative sanction, the Court ruled that, by the repressive nature of the sanction and by its seriousness it has, in fact, a criminal nature (§ 33).

As regards the principle of ne bis in idem, the criterion of the identity of the material facts was applied or, rather, "the existence of a set of concrete circumstances which are inextricably linked together which resulted in the final acquittal or conviction of the person concerned" (§ 35) as well as ECHR jurisprudence. Given the criminal nature of the administrative sanction applied before the prosecution of the defendant Luca Menci for an offense with largely the same content, the Court considers that this would be acceptable from the point of view of the ne bis in idem principle only if seen as a restriction of a fundamental right which, according to Article 52 (1) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the Union must be provided for by law, respect the substance of rights and freedoms, be necessary and proportionate to the aim pursued.

Another judgment, which concerns the criminalization in Italian criminal law of the offense of non-payment of VAT, is that of Mauro Scialdone [74](the case has many similarities with the Procura della Repubblica v. Luca Menci).

Thus, Siderlaghi, having Mauro Scialdone as its manager and administrator, was found by the financial administration not to have paid the VAT for the annual declaration for 2012 in the amount of 175 272 Euros within the time limits set by law. The tax authority imposed on the company an administrative penalty consisting in the payment of penalties representing 30% of the total amount of VAT owed. The Prosecutor's Office filed an indictment against the defendant Scialdone for committing an offense having the same constitutive content as above (being a criminal offence only if a minimum threshold of 50,000 Euro was due). During the trial, a partial repeal of the incrimination rule occurred, in the sense that the fact was no longer an offense if the amount due was less than EUR 250 000 (when the debt was due to non-payment of VAT) and less than EUR 150 000 (when the debt came from the non-payment of income tax).

In those circumstances, the Tribunal of Varese referred to the CJEU a number of preliminary questions, which were subsequently restructured by the Court, having as a common denominator the idea of separating the amount due from which the act constitutes an offense according to whether the debt represents VAT or, respectively, income tax. The same tribunal also questioned whether the partial decriminalization of the offense did not violate the provisions of Art. 325 TFEU, in order to create less favourable regulatory conditions for combating fraud against the financial interests of the Union.

The Court has built its legal reasoning based on the ideas of the constitutive treaties (Article 325 TFEU) and the legal acts of the Union, according to which Member States must combat fraud and any illicit activity affecting the financial interests of the EU through measures that are effective, dissuasive, proportionate and consistent with the principle of assimilation. The scope of VAT is covered by these provisions.

The fact of failing to pay the VAT-based debt, provided that the declarations establishing that charge were made in accordance with the reality does not constitute a "fraud" relating to the financial interests of the Union (the frauds being expressly described in the Convention drawn up on the basis of Article K. (3) of the Treaty on European Union, on the protection of the financial interests of the European Communities, also called the PIF Convention[75])[76]. Non-payment of VAT due falls within the category of "illegal activities" likely to affect the financial interests of the Union within the meaning of Art. 325 para. (1) TFEU, which therefore requires effective and dissuasive sanctions[77]. In this respect, the Court's reasoning continues with the analysis of the effective, dissuasive, proportionate and respecting of the principle of assimilation character of the legislative criminalisation text. The Court's conclusion is that all of these criteria are met in relation to the partial decriminalization of the VAT non-payment in the sense that it no longer constitutes an offense under Italian law but only from a threshold of EUR 250 000.

5. The autonomous concept of "court having jurisdiction in particular in criminal matters"

This autonomous concept was developed by the CJEU in the case of Marián Baláž[78]. The legal act of the Union interpreted in the context of this judgment is Council Framework Decision 2005/214 / JHA on the application of the principle of mutual recognition to financial penalties[79] and the basic notions of that Framework Decision are "decision", "court having jurisdiction in particular in criminal matters" and "financial penalty ".[80]

In the present case, the Czech citizen Marián Baláž was sanctioned for a violation of a provision of the Austrian Road Code when he ignored the meaning of the indicator "prohibiting access to motor vehicles with a mass greater than 3.5 tons ". The sanction applied was a fine of EUR 220 or, in case of non-payment, 60 hours of imprisonment. The offender did not contest the sanction applied by the administrative authorities, although he was informed about that and the right to challenge it. Because it was not enforced in Austria and the offender was living in the Czech Republic, the Austrian authorities sent the financial sanctioning decision to the judicial authorities in the latter country for recognition and enforcement. The decision was recognized in the Czech Republic. Subsequently, the offender filed an appeal against the recognition decision, arguing in particular that the decision could not be enforced as long as it was not susceptible of being the subject of an appeal before a "court having jurisdiction in particular in criminal matters".

The Prague High Court therefore addressed a preliminary ruling request for the interpretation of the aforementioned concept, asking CJEU, inter alia, whether it is an "autonomous concept".

The Court has held that it is indeed an 'autonomous concept' by applying its constant doctrine that whenever the legal act of the Union does not refer to the national law of the Member States, that notion must be understood in a unitary manner throughout Union in the context of that provision and in the light of the objective pursued by the legal act[81].

The Court deconstructs the concept in question by examining first the "court" component, taking into account criteria such as: "whether the body is established by law, whether it is permanent, whether its jurisdiction is compulsory, whether its procedure is inter partes, whether it applies rules of law and whether it is independent"[82].

In order to analyse also the second structural component of the autonomous concept, namely the quality of the court to have " jurisdiction in particular in criminal matters", the Court undertakes an analysis that is in fact a parallel to the one when, in various cases, among which those referred to above, established the character of a "criminal charge" of facts qualified by national law as contraventions. The Court moves the debate from the periphrasis cited in the first part of this paragraph to the concept of "criminal [75] Published in OJ C 316 from 27.11.1995.

[76] Scialdone case §. 39: " Likewise, a failure to pay declared VAT does not constitute 'fraud' within the meaning of the PFI Convention. For the purposes of that convention, according to Article 1(1)(b) thereof, 'fraud' in respect of EU revenue involves 'non-disclosure of information in violation of a specific obligation' or the 'use or presentation of false, incorrect or incomplete statements or documents'. As is apparent from paragraph 37 above, such failures to comply with declaration obligations are not at issue in the present case. Moreover, while that provision also refers to the 'misapplication of a legally obtained benefit', it should be pointed out, as the German Government observes, that failure to pay declared VAT within the time limit prescribed by law does not give the taxable person such a benefit since the tax is still payable and the taxable person is acting unlawfully by failing to pay it ".

[78] Judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber) of 14 November 2013 in Case C-60/12, preliminary ruling in proceedings for the enforcement of a financial penalty issued against Marián Baláž, ECLI: EU: C: 2013: 733.

[79] Council Framework Decision 2005/214/JHA of 24 February 2005 on the application of the principle of mutual recognition to financial penalties (OJ 2005 L 76, p. 16), as amended by Council Framework Decision 2009/299/JHA of 26 February 2009 (OJ 2009 L 81, p. 24)

[80] In the sense of art. 1 lit. (a) of Framework Decision 2005/214 / JHA, the concept of "decision" means "a final decision requiring a financial penalty to be paid by a natural or legal person where the decision was made by (iii) an authority of the issuing State other than a court in respect of acts which are punishable under the national law of the issuing State by virtue of being infringements of the rules of law, provided that the person concerned has had an opportunity to have the case tried by a court having jurisdiction in particular in criminal matters". Art. 1 (b) of the same Framework Decision defines "the financial penalty" as "the obligation to pay a sum of money on conviction of an offence imposed in a decision".

[81] Judgment Marián Baláž. §.26. The Court refers to several decisions it has made in cases concerning autonomous concepts relating to the European Arrest Warrant procedure, such as those in Mantello and Kozłowski (C-261/09 and C-66 respectively / 08).

proceedings"[83] and this is naturally related to the "criminal charge" because criminal proceedings applies to a criminal accusation.

The CJEU's conclusion was that an independent administrative authority such as the Unabhängiger Vervaltungssenat (Independent Administrative Senate) in Austria is a "court having jurisdiction in particular in criminal matters". The main reason for awarding such a qualification is that, even though it is de facto an administrative authority, according to Austrian law, it has the power to judge appeals against decisions on sanctioning contravention[84].

In conclusion, the Court defines the autonomous concept of "court having jurisdiction in particular in criminal matters" as "any court or tribunal which applies a procedure that satisfies the essential characteristics of criminal procedure"[85].

6. Conclusions

In international law and European Union law, before supranational jurisdictions, fundamental notions known by all contemporary national law systems acquire unitary meanings, otherwise it would be impossible to interpret the legal norms that these systems of law impose. This phenomenon occurs whenever supranational rules do not expressly refer to the meaning of the respective notions of the national law of each state.

An essential question of contemporary law is where the field of criminal law regulation begins and ends in its lato sensu meaning, both in substantive and procedural terms. In short, what are the "criteria" that define "the criminal" and delimit it from other branches of law that impose similar sanctions as the nature of the punishment. Such branches of law are administrative law and tax law, and sanctions similar to those of criminal law are administrative, disciplinary, financial and fiscal.

This study demonstrates the permanence and ubiquity of the so-called "Engel Criteria" in the conceptual delimitation referred to in the previous paragraph. By applying these criteria, the European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Justice of the European Union have defined "autonomous concepts" (unrelated with the meaning they have in the national law of the states) to allow the isolation of what we call "criminal". Such an epistemological separation is essential in the matter of respecting human rights and fundamental freedoms, whether it relates to the Council of Europe Convention having that object, or whether the legal instrument under consideration is the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. Between the two there are clauses that coordinate them, as we have seen in Section I of the study, laid down in the fundamental treaties of the Union but also in the Charter. As a result of these clauses, the autonomous concepts of the ECHR migrate into the legal order of the European Union, itself an autonomous legal order, where they are adapted by the Court of Justice of the European Union to the realities of the latter.

The first autonomous concept was that of the "criminal charge" (Deweer case), followed immediately by "criminal matter" linked directly to the "Engel Criteria" with particular importance in the context of the right to a fair trial and the ne bis in idem principle, in its turn a different concept from the point of view of its content in the context of the Convention and the Charter. Concerning the efforts to delimit the "criminal charge", the concepts of "criminal penalties", "criminal proceedings", "court having jurisdiction in particular in criminal matters" and, last but not least, the principle "nulla poena sine culpa" were also defined as autonomous concepts.

All these autonomous concepts together form an orderly system that allows a coherent interpretation of the national law of the Member States of the Council of Europe, the interaction of these systems of law between themselves and separately of the European Union law.

CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE LEGAL STATUS OF HERALDIC REPRESENTATIONS IN THE ROMANIAN SYSTEM OF LAW

Claudiu Ramon D. BUTCULESCU

Abstract

Heraldry is a science that studies and governs the use and regulations of certain symbols utilized for distinguishing persons, legal entities, legal bodies etc. Sometimes heraldry is defined as an art, when it comes to the visual representations of the aforementioned symbols on flags, seals, shields etc. In the actual Romanian System of Law, heraldic representations, both ancient and modern may be considered as intellectual property rights or cultural rights or eventually as elements related to the legal status of a person, namely as identification attributes of a person. In many European countries, as well as in other civilized countries, there are legal frameworks that strictly regulate the use, display and rights over heraldic insignia. In the Romanian legal system, such a framework does not yet exist, and for that reason, this article addresses the possibility of creating such a legal framework within the Romanian System of Law and tries to answer to the following questions: 1) Is it possible for such a legal framework to be enacted and enforced in the Romanian System of Law? 2) What purpose would be served by the enactment and enforcement of such a legal framework? 3) What should be the legal nature of the rights pertaining to such a legal framework? 4) Is it possible to create within this framework an armorial which will comprise all the heraldic representations, of ancient and modern origins, belonging to moral or natural persons? 5) What kind of legal protection would be appropriate for the successful implementation of the framework? Hopefully, the contents and conclusions of this article will be able to answer at least some of these questions and perhaps will lay the first bricks in a future project that would lead to practical and tangible results concerning the protection of rights related to heraldic representations.

1. Introduction

Heraldry represents a system in which inherited symbols, called charges are displayed on a shield, or escutcheon, for the purpose of identifying individuals of families[1].

These symbols are known as armorial bearings or coat of arms[2] and serve to identify individuals or families, even legal entities such as religious orders, public authorities, professional bodies, universities etc. Sometimes, an armorial bearing may distinctively identify an individual within a family, such as a child born from an illegitimate line or a certain line itself within a family, such as a senior line.

The graphic representations are usually displayed through various methods and conventions and the science of literally describing armorial bearings is called blazonry[3].

This article addresses the issues regarding the legal status of heraldic representations or armorial bearings as we defined them earlier, from the perspective of the Romanian System of Law. In Romanian Law, certain armorial bearings are protected, specifically the state armorials, the coat of arms of cities, municipalities and villages and also coat of arms pertaining to some public institutions. These armorial bearings are clearly within the public domain of Romanian law and should be treated as public property. The legal situation of these coats of arms is governed by the Law no. 102 of 21th September 1992, which regulates the legal status of the coat of arms and seal of Romania. The same law contains provisions regarding the coats of arms of public authorities, districts, municipalities, cities and villages[4]. The methodology for drafting and adopting coat of arms for administrative regions was enacted by the Government Decision no. 25 of 16th January 2003 concerning the establishment of the methodology of drafting, reproduction and use of coat of arms of districts, municipalities, cities and villages. There are also some Decisions edicted by various State Departments concerning the same issue, which shall be detailed in the content section of this paper. The aforementioned norms only regulate today's public symbols, although these symbols evolved from princely coat of arms of belonging to ancient rulers of medieval Romanian States. Many of these symbols which have not been incorporated in current coat of arms have no legal protection at all. Moreover, private coat of arms, both ancient and modern do not benefit from a law that directly regulate their use. The matter researched in this paper presents a significant importance, as the coats of arms of medieval times are part of the Romanian Cultural Heritage and a component of the immaterial cultural patrimony of Romania. The fact that these coats of arms are no longer in use does not mean that they should not have any legal protection whatsoever.

The coat of arms belonging to private persons are also important because they can be envisioned as means of identification for persons in the past and also for living individuals or active legal private entities. The coat of arms belonging to known historical families of Romania (other than the ruling ones) are also, to a lesser extent part of the cultural national heritage and more importantly an essential part of the legacy of that family for its members. It may be possible that the legal status of the armorial bearings mentioned before (the ones not in use anymore and the private ones) may be regulated through more general legislation, concerning intellectual or industrial property. Still, in the present, no legal framework exists that could encompass the rights over all the coat of arms, whether in use or not, public or private. In order to address this issue, at least theoretically, I proposed a series of questions within the abstract of this paper, concerning the possibility of enacting such a legal framework, namely: 1) Is it possible for such a legal framework to be enacted and enforced in the Romanian System of Law? 2) What purpose would be served by the enactment and enforcement of such a legal framework? 3) What should be the legal nature of the rights pertaining to such a legal framework? 4) Is it possible to create within this framework an armorial which will comprise all the heraldic representations, of ancient and modern origins, belonging to moral or natural persons? 5) What kind of legal protection would be appropriate for the successful implementation of the framework? I intent to answer to this matter by analyzing the actual regulations, and by proposing new measures which could improve the actual legal status.

Besides the analysis of the national legislation concerning the protection of heraldic representations, analysis from a comparative point of view may also prove useful. Certainly, the comparative analysis will also yield some contrasting approaches. For example, in states where the form of government is monarchy there will likely be more numerous and specialized laws that in countries which have a republican form of government.

In the specialized literature, there are numerous works that treat heraldry[5] as a science and distinctively as an art. Also, there are bibliographical works[6] that compile most of the works published in the field of heraldry. However, there are few studies that address the legal status of heraldic representations. This study comes as a continuation of some earlier works I have written, some regarding the legal protection of coat of arms of the nobility[7] and others concerning the heraldic insignia of institutions and companies in contemporary law[8].

This paper aims to identify useful legal means by which the rights over the heraldic representation could be protected, and where no such means are identified, to propose directions which may be taken to achieve the goal of protecting these representations.

2. Content

At the present time, the Romanian system of law does not have a legal framework in which heraldic representations such as coat of arms, crests, insignia are regulated and protected. As shown above, only the state heraldic representations and some heraldic coat of arms belonging to public authorities are regulated and protected. All the other heraldic signs, whether new or ancient can only be protected through the civil law, although no specific regulation exist to specifically address the rights over these signs. Vaguely, the Romanian Civil code enumerates at article 1141 certain family memorabilia which could possibly include heraldic insignia, without specifically naming them. Thus, in the absence of specific legal rules, the protection of the rights arising from the creation and use of heraldic representations is difficult, the only sources of law available would be the general rules prescribed by the civil law and the general principles of law (analogia juris)[9].

Newly created heraldic representations could be governed by some provisions contained in the Law no. 8 of 1996 which regulate intellectual property rights[10]. For example, article 7 of Law no. 8 of 1996 states that graphical works of art, like sculptures, paintings, engravings are the object of intellectual property rights. However, the field of heraldry is a vast one, spanning over at least eight centuries, and even more in Western Europe and defines itself as a highly specialized field, having codified images and a specialized language used in blazonry.

None of the laws mentioned above can sufficiently protect the entire field of heraldry, so a new system of laws and regulations should be adopted for this purpose. Having established the utility of such a framework, next comes the analysis regarding the possibility of its enacting and enforcing. From a comparative point of view, there are several countries which have such a legal framework such as England, Sweden, Denmark, Netherlands, Spain etc. All of these countries are constitutional monarchies, and as such have a long tradition in maintaining and strictly regulating the use of heraldic symbols. Romania is today a semi-presidential republic, which means that for accurate comparative results, we should research if there are legal frameworks regulating heraldry symbols in countries which are not monarchies but have a republican form of government. In the Slovak Republic, for example, there is an official heraldic register[11], operated by the Ministry of the Interior in which there can be included coat of arms belonging to natural persons, moral persons and is not limited only to official or state coat of arms.

Also, in the Republic of Moldova, the use of heraldic symbols is regulated by the Law no. 86 of 28th of July 2011. Article 7 of the aforementioned law states that private symbols are: the personal coat of arms or the family coat of arms; the banner and other personal or family vexillary insignia; the family hymn and the personal or family armorial seal. All these heraldic symbols are officially recognized as public symbols and are registered din the General Armorial of the Republic of Moldova, following the request of the owner and based on the decision of the National Heraldry Committee. The decree regarding the establishment of the General Armorial Regulation of Republic of Moldova was enacted in 2014[12].

In Canada, there is a Canadian Heraldic Authority that creates coats of arms, flags and badges. The authority was created in 1988 and all the coats of arms granted, registered, approved f confirmed are included in the Public Register of Arms, Flags and Badges of Canada[13].

Some countries have laws that protect the creation and use of coat of arms but have no official bodies to register them. Still, in many of these countries there are reputed private associations which register and publish coat of arms. For example, in the French legal system, armorial bearings are considered a form of incorporeal property, having an accessory nature and being irrevocably attached to family name[14]. However, there is no state body that registers the coat of arms and the usage and protection of arms is regulated according to the French Civil Code.

Similarly, in Germany, the published personal armorial bearings are protected under article 12 of the German Civil Code, which regulates the name rights. The coat of arms is considered closely linked to the surname and as such it enjoys the same protection.

There are also countries in which there is no official body to regulate the use and protection of heraldic insignia and also the legal protection is scarce, but there are associations which draft and register newly created coat of arms, such as Poland, Russia, Portugal etc.

Having shown that there are several countries which successfully regulate the field of heraldry, concerning the drafting, use and protection of heraldic representations, it is logically to assume that such a framework is also possible to establish in Romania.

The purpose of such a framework would be to regulate the use of heraldic insignia and to protect the bearers from usurpers. The state symbols are protected, as I shown earlier, by the provisions of the Law no. 102 of 21th September 1992, however the historical heraldic symbols are not. If the use of such heraldry symbols would be placed under the Romanian copyright law, then most of them would be practically in the public domain and may be used freely. However, such symbols are part of national history and as such, should be protected by law against abusive use. The historical coat of arms, whether bore by the ancient princes or rulers of past Romanian kingdoms should be included in a newly formed patrimony of significant heraldic symbols of Romania. Also, excepting scientific or historical research, their use should be prohibited. Another exception in which their use could be permitted should concern cases where such symbols were inherited or transmitted through generations to contemporaneous holders. Similarly, historical heraldic insignia used by various nobles, individuals and even corporations, if they are not claimed by rightful users (descendants, inheritors etc.), should also be places in this patrimony, with a strict prohibition of use.

The family or personal coat of arms, whether newly created or inherited should be protected also, by strictly regulating their use, the rights of their bearers, including the prohibition of unlawful use by other persons, publicly or privately. Only by enacting a legal system that will regulate the drafting, use and protection of armorial bearing an adequate protection will be provided.

As to the nature of the rights pertaining to a legal framework regulating heraldic representations, firstly, the protection should be provided by a special law, with specific rules, and not by the Civil code or the copyright law. Although the Romanian Civil Code, which entered into force on 1st of October 2011 contains modernized[15] provisions which may apply to heraldic representations, the complexity of the heraldic system requires a specific law to regulate the rights and obligations arising from the creation and use of coats of arms. Such a law, which comes from the legislative power of the State[16], should define the heraldic representations and should classify them in heraldic representations of significant importance and heraldic representations belonging to private persons, which could be recognized if they abide by the strict rules of heraldry. The nature of the rights should follow the nature of the heraldic representations themselves: for heraldic representations of significant importance, the rights should pe places in the public domain of the law, while the heraldic representations of private persons should be placed in the private domain of the law.

The heraldic representations of significant importance should be inalienable whether conventionally or forced and imprescriptible. The use of such heraldic representations by private persons should be prohibited, with the exception of scientific historical research. If such symbols are inherited from legitimate holders, the rules of inheritance stated by the Romanian Civil Code should apply. When there are no inheritors, the heraldic representations should become property of the state and used only for historical researches.

In order for the legal protection to be adequately ensured, registries should be created, containing all the coat of arms, whether ancient or contemporaneous, belonging to public or private persons, natural or moral. Firstly, a national registry, called "armorial" should be established and strictly administered by a public entity. Considering that according to the Law no. 102 of 21th September 1992, within the Romanian Academy there is a national committee which certifies the coat of arms of administrative units of Romania, this national armorial could be kept and administered by this committee. Aside from the national registry, regional registries should be kept by local subsidiaries of the Romanian Academy: for example, for the Moldavian Region, a prestigious institution like the Institute for Heraldry and Genealogy "Sever Zotta" could accomplish such a task. Likewise, for Transylvanian heraldry, the Center for Transylvanian Studies could accomplish such a task. In a more detailed view, all the districts of Romania should have regional registers, but these should be kept by private associations, as bodies of research in heraldry and accredited by the Romanian Academy.

The protection given to the rights arising from the creations and use of coat of arms should be civil and penal. For minor breaches of law, the punishments should include only pecuniary measures, but for major breaches of the law and abusive use of heraldry symbols of significant importance, the penalty should consist of substantial fines and even deprivations of privileges or liberty, with the limits set by the European Union Law and the European Court of Human Rights, regarding the proportionality of the punishment, the equality of arms, an equitable trial[17] etc. Similar punishments exist in Romanian laws for the unauthorized use of distinctive signs, such as emblems, logos etc. For example, the Law no. 11 of 29th January 1991 on combating unfair competition states in article 5 that the use of an emblem which is likely to cause confusion with that legitimately used by another trade is punishable by imprisonment from 3 months to 2 years or by fine. Although the provision mentioned above concerns unfair competition, as an infringement of the freedom of trade[18], its essence could be successfully translated, mutatis mutandis, as a conceptual basis for future regulations regarding heraldic representations.

3. Conclusions

The main outcome resulting from this study addresses the need to design and enact a legal framework that may be able to offer protection to heraldic representations, regardless of the time they were drafted and incorporated into coats of arms, within the Romanian system of law. The arguments presented in the main contents of this paper strongly suggest the need to implement such a legal framework, which should include rules regarding the protection of existing coats of arms, the registration of new ones, the establishment and development of a national armorial to include all armorial bearings and specific rules regarding the drafting and use of such armorial bearings.

The expected impact of this study concerns the possibility of enacting legal provisions concerning the protection and use of heraldic representations. The first step in the road to achieving the goal of a heraldic legal framework will be the creation of professional, dedicated associations, which will hold registries in every district of Romania and will oversee the creation, use and protection of heraldic representations. These associations should be recognized by law and accredited by the National Heraldry Committee of the Romanian Academy. The national registry or national armorial should comprise the heraldic representations included in the district registries and also the heraldic insignia of state authorities.

This paper tackles the possibility of creating a legal framework regarding heraldic representations in the Romanian system of law and tries to set a few directions for the establishment of such a legal framework. The future studies should research the concrete ways in which such a legal framework will be successfully established, implemented and administered.

WORKS CONTRACT - ADMINISTRATIVE CONTRACT. THE IMPLICATIONS OF LEGISLATIVE CHANGES ON ONGOING WORKS CONTRACTS

Doina CUCU [*]

Abstract

Law no. 98 of 19 May 2016 on public procurement has been continuously amended and submitted to additions. The Emergency Ordinance 114 of December 28, 2018, issued by the government, which stipulates that between 1 January 2019 and 31 December 2019, by way of derogation from the provisions of Art. 164 par. (1) of the Law no. 53/2003 – Labour Code, republished, with all further amendments and additions, "in the building sector, the state guaranteed gross minimum wage is determined in cash, without any other bonuses and supplements, at the amount of 3,000 lei per month, for a normal work schedule of an average of 167,333 hours/ month, representing 17,928 lei/ hour ".

The increase of the minimum basic gross salary guaranteed by the state directly influences the price of the contract and in this article we will analyze the influence on the works contracts.

1. Introduction

As defined in the Civil Code, in Art. 1166 the contract is "a legally recognized agreement by which two or more persons have expressed their intention of creating, modifying or extinguishing a legal relationship"[1] within the limits of law, public order and good morals. Thus, the contract shall be terminated when "The Contracting Parties shall have expressed their consistent wills in line with the conditions of the fund and the form required by law, by reference to the specifics of each contract"[2] if the law does not impose a certain other formality or form. The administrative contract has its origin in the French law, being the result of the jurisprudence of the State Council.[3] In our country, this theory has emerged simultaneously with the development of legal relations between public administrations and the private entrepreneurs with the object of contracting various public works or services.[4]

A further stage of the evolution of the administrative contract's theory is the period after December 1989 "starting from the fact that the very Constitution of 1991 recognizes it without qualifying it expressly with the name of an administrative contract".[5]

2. Content

"The administrative contract is an agreement between a public authority in a position of legal superiority, on one hand, and other subjects of law on the other hand (individuals, legal persons or other public bodies subordinated to the superior entity, the purpose of which is to satisfy a general interest through the provision of a public service, the performance of public works or the use of a public good which is submitted to a political power regime."[6]

Concluding, we can say that a contract is an administrative contract if it fulfills at least the following criteria:

- Minimum one of the parties is a public entity;
- Its subject or object is to ensure a public facility or a public interest;
- The terms of the contract are governed by "unilateral administrative law or acts in order to protect public interests and conventional clauses negotiated by the parties".[7]

The administrative contract is also defined "to represent an agreement of will, totally or partially submitted to a regime of public power, between a public institution or another subject of the law authorised by it, on the one hand, and a private or any other public institution, on the other hand, in pursuing the satisfaction of a general interest, through the provision of a public service, the execution of public works.

Putting the value of a good of public property into the legal relationship of public office."[8]

Thus, we can deduce the following features of the administrative contract:[9]

a) it is a multiparty agreement of will or settlement;
b) one of the parties is a determined subject, namely a body acting in the exercise of public power, an administrative body or another subject of law authorized by a body of administrative law;[10]
c) different from civil contracts where there is a position of legal equality for the parties concerned, as when talking about the administrative contract, the parties involved are not in a position of legal equality, but one of them, namely the public authority, has a superior position towards the other subject of the administrative contract;
d) the object of the administrative contract is determined, in pursuing to satisfy a general public interest and thus obtaining one of the following characteristics: obtaining a public service, capitalizing on a public good, performing public works;
e) the setting, by law and conventionally, of the clauses of the administrative contract;
f) due to the superiority of the public authority, it may determine the possibility of unilaterally modifying or terminating the administrative contract, if the public interest so requires;
g) "governed by a regime of public power, unlike civil contracts, which are governed by common law";[11]
h) "the written form of the administrative contract, which, like the administrative act, cannot be of a consensual character, involving an authority acting on behalf of the public authority";[12]
i) in order to solve potential litigations arising from the execution of an administrative contract, the competence to resolve them is the Administrative Contentious Courts.

The principles underlying the awarding of public procurement contracts and the organization of solutions competitions are: non-discrimination, equal treatment, mutual recognition, transparency, proportionality, accountability.

In Romanian legislation, we distinguish several types of administrative contracts. Among the types of administrative contracts, public procurement contracts are distinguished by the large number of contracts concluded by public authorities.

According to Law no. 98[13] of 19 May 2016 on Public Procurement, Cap. I, art. 3(b) public procurement is "the acquisition of works, products or services by means of a public procurement contract by one or more contracting authorities from economic operators designated by them, whether the works, products or services are intended to ensure a public interest or not. "

Under the same law, Cap. I, art. 3(l) the contract of public procurement is "the contract for onerous interest, assimilated by law to the administrative act, concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities, which has as its object the execution of works, the supply of products or provision of services".

Public procurement contracts are distinguished by the large number of public works contracts.

"Public works contract - public procurement contract having as its object either: exclusively the execution, or both the design and the execution of works in connection with one of the activities listed in Annex no. 1; either solely the execution, or both the design and construction of a building; or the construction by any means of a building which meets the requirements set by the contracting authority exercising decisive influence over the type or design of the construction)".[14]

Conclusion of public works contracts

As with any other contract, the first rule to be observed in the conclusion of public works contracts is the parties' agreement. Specifically, "in the case of an administrative contract, the administration is the one who invites and accepts and the applicants (candidates) are the ones who offer."[15]

The object of the contract is highlighted by the necessity report and / or the specifications drawn up at the level of the department requesting the acquisition and approved in advance by the management of the public authority.

The contract price is appreciated by the compartment making the necessity and / or specification and is made up of the price without V.A.T. to which is added V.A.T. according to the legal provisions in force at the date of the invoice issuance by the provider.

Payment methods and duration of the contract are also required by the necessity report and / or the specifications drawn up at the level of the compartment requesting the purchase. The term for the duration of the contract is imposed by the date of signing the contract by both parties.

It is the public authority that will choose among the offers received the most satisfactory tender in relation to the necessity report or the specification.

During the course of the contract the price may change in the following situations:

1. in the case where "certain conditions have occurred on the market resulting in the increase / decrease of the price indices for the constituent elements of the offer, the effect of which is reflected in the increase / decrease of the costs on which the price of the contract was based"[16].

However, in order to ensure the principle of transparency, the public authority must specify in the works contract and in the documentation on which it was based the possibility of adjusting the price. This is to be argued by the "actual price adjustment, the indices to be used, and the source of information on their evolution, such as statistical bulletins or commodity exchange quotations".[17] In the case of contracts ranging from 6 months to 24 months, the contracting authority may choose to include price adjustment / revision clauses, but for contracts that run for more than 24 months this clause is mandatory.

2. If "the legislative changes occur or were issued by local administrative acts which have as their object the establishment, modification or waiver of certain charges / local taxes, whose effect is reflected in the increase / decrease of the costs on which the price of the contract was based ".[18]

In both situations, the price of the contract can be adjusted only to the extent that the costs of substantiating the contract price are covered and this is the way in which the final result should not be different from the initial one of the award procedure.

On January 11, 2018, goes into effect the Government Resolution no. 1 of January 10, 2018 for approval of general and specific for certain categories of procurement contracts related to the investment objectives financed from public funds which considers the application of general and specific conditions and model framework agreement contract for public procurement contracts or sectorial works, on the execution of works on the one hand, and on the design and execution of works, on the other. Government resolution refers to the investment objectives financed from public funds including grants and / or reimbursable whose estimated value must be "equal to or greater than the thresholds provided by art. 7 (1.a) of Law no. 98/2016 on public procurement, as amended and supplemented ".[19]

It deals with price adjustment in Clause 48 and uses other time references when referring to the duration of the contract. Thus, if the duration of the contract is less than or equal to 365 days, it is considered that the contract prices are firm and can only be modified if the increase or decrease of the value of the contract is a consequence of the amendment of the law and this will prevent the contractor to fulfill its contractual obligations. If the duration of the contract is longer than 365 days, it is considered that the prices have been established taking into account the price and market conditions at the time of the offer and will be adjusted with the increase or decrease of the price indices.

4. Conclusions

The issue of the Emergency Ordinance no. 114 of December 28, 2018 regarding the establishment of measures in the field of public investments and fiscal-budgetary measures, the modification and completion of some normative acts and the extension of some deadlines in Article 71 stipulates that by way of derogation from the Law no. 53 of 24 January 2003 - Labour Code, republished, as amended and supplemented, art. 164, par. 1 the country's minimum gross salary for the construction sector between January 1, 2019 and December 31, 2019 is 3,000 lei per month for an average work schedule of 167,333 hours per month. It was thus established without including bonuses and other additions.

Emergency Ordinance no. 114 of 28 December 2018 does not show how the calculation of the value of the work will be adjusted in the works contract and how it will change this total value of the works contract.

The National Agency for Public Procurement issues on 21 December 2018 Instruction no. 2[20] regarding the price adjustment of the public procurement contract wishing to support both contracting authorities and economic operators by clarifying certain legal provisions aiming at ensuring a transparent framework and avoiding non-uniform interpretation in contradiction with the principles of public procurement / sector.

Thus, art. 1, par. (2.a) provides that by price adjustment an adjustment coefficient is to be applied regardless of the occurrence of an unforeseeable situation such as: legislative changes or other administrative acts having an effect on increases or decreases in costs on which the price of the contract was based, the minimum applicable wage, the modification of the technical norms, the increase or decrease of the price of some raw materials, materials or other products, the extension of the contract award procedure over the validity period of the offer (initially established through the awarding documentation), the tenderer's obligation to change the declared supplier bid due to bankruptcy or incapacity to perform the works. Art. 1, par. (2.b) provides for a price adjustment "even if the price adjustment was not provided for in the procurement documentation / public procurement / sectorial procurement contract".

This article has given rise to many controversies. Is it fair that a contract that has the clause "the price of the contract remains firm and the contract price adjustment during the contract period is not acceptable" can be modified based on an instruction?

THE MODIFICATIONS BROUGHT TO THE LAW OF THE CONTENTIOUS ADMINISTRATIVE: CRITICAL PERSPECTIVE

Marta-Claudia CLIZA[*]

Abstract

In 2018, the lawmaker decided to amend the Law of the contentious administrative, and some of these changes can be deemed essential. However, the changes of 2018 do not reflect a knowledge of the realities of the contentious administrative. This is why, this study comes in order to criticize most of these changes. The amendments which were brought do not simplify certain situations, but make them more difficult, and we are sure that such thing will be reflected in the practice of the contentious administrative courts.

Keywords: law of the contentious administrative, legislative changes, jurisdiction of the court, prior procedure

1. Introduction

"The term of contentious administrative represents a traditional meaning of the administrative law, considered inappropriate for "the realities specific to socialist traditions" and, therefore, used in the respective period rather for the purpose of historical evocation (A. Iorgovan, op. cit., 2002, p. 451).

Etymologically speaking, the word contentious originates from the Latin contendere meaning to fight.

This is a metaphorical fight, a fight of opposing interests between two parties, one of which will be victorious (V. Vedinas, op. cit. 2002, p. 156).

Therefore, the term contentious expresses the conflict of interests, the contradictory nature of the interests (Al. Negoita, op. cit., 1996, p. 216)

In the administrative law, the term contentious started to be used in order to delimit jurisdictional remedies from ordinary administrative second appeals."[1]

"The contentious administrative represents the totality of the litigations between public authorities, on the one hand, and the individuals whose rights and legitimate interests were damaged, on the other hand, deduced from typical or assimilated administrative acts considered illegal, which fall under the jurisdiction of the contentious administrative divisions of the courts of law, governed by a predominantly public-law regime."[2]

The emergence of Law no. 554[3] in 2004, the so-called new law of the contentious administrative, was a long-awaited moment for all law theorists and practitioners, especially for those of the administrative law.

Law no. 554/2004 repealed Law no. 29/1990, a pre-constitutional law that had to be often interpreted rather than applied in the strict meaning of the terms used. The contentious administrative (the contentious where the private sector fought against the "state"), fundamentally rethought after the Revolution of December 1989, when it had been urgently transposed into a law. Subsequently, the enforcement of the Constitution in 1991, made the law of 1990 already subject to the interpretations in the light of the fundamental constitutional notions.

Here is how 2004 represented the time when the contentious administrative was based on new and modern bases, exceptional lawyers led by the late professor Antonie Iorgovan, thus creating the premises of a performant legislation that was to respond to such great challenges caused by such a field.

Judges, lawyers, the entire legal spectrum were pleased with the idea of implementing a modern jurisdiction centered on two levels: the genuine contentious administrative, which entailed the attack against typical or assimilated administrative acts, issued by public authorities and fiscal contentious, which entailed the attack against fiscal administrative acts.

The implementation of the new law took three years, in which there were already noted deficiencies that generated contradictory situations in practice. In 2007, Law no. 554 is substantially amended by Law no. 262[4], this time a new adjustment made with the objective realities of the contentious administrative being targeted.

Until 2018, Law no. 554/2004 has undergone changes, but the substance has never been modified.

2018 is the year when certain regulations of the contentious administrative are rethought by the lawmaker and apparently, are placed into a new perspective, meant to improve the judiciary system. If this is true or not, if the amendments made are able to create an improvement of the system that governs the contentious administrative, here are just a few questions that the present study aims to clarify, obviously from the perspective of the author, theoretician and practitioner of the administrative law.

On a brief analysis of the old form of the Contentious administrative, as it had settled down after all the amendments, especially after the essential one of 2007, such a great need for amending the law was not revealed. Basis were laid, a construction was substantiated.

It is truth that the enforcement of the new Code of Civil Procedure entailed the adjustment of certain regulations in the field of the contentious administrative. We could no longer speak of "irrevocable decision", the second appeal should be seen as an extraordinary remedy, yet ordinary in matters of contentious administrative, could we impose the procedure for filtering second appeals before the High Court of Cassation and Justice in matters of contentious administrative? All these referring to the special nature of Law no. 554/2004, in relation to the Code of civil procedure.

All of these amendments and adjustments were indeed necessary, but in addition to these, the law also underwent other amendments, at least critical to a more sensitive analysis.

2. Amendments to Law no. 554/2004, analysis of the implications

In order to understand why the lawmaker justified that the amendment of Law no. 554/2004 was required in 2018, it is obvious that we have to start from the memorandum of reasons accompanying draft Law no. 212/2018[5], which is the amending law.

The first reason was the long term required for trial settlement. This aspect is reflected in the contentious administrative in two directions: the regularization procedure, on the one hand, and the procedure for filtering second appeals before the High Court of Cassation and Justice, on the other hand (we point out that in contentious administrative, the remedy against the court of first instance decision is represented by second appeal, corroborated with the regulation according to which the Court of Appeal is the court of first instance in many contentious administrative litigations, therefore second appeals were filtered before the High Court of Cassation and Justice).

The memorandum of reasons leads to the reasoning according to which the activity of the courts is dominated by the field of the contentious administrative which represents about 30% of the activity of the tribunals of the courts of appeal and almost 40% of the activity of the High Court of Cassation and Justice.

Furthermore, the memorandum of reasons revealed concrete data showing the trend of increasing the number of the cases in this field[6].

Furthermore, another reason was generated by the fact that, especially within the High Court of Cassation and Justice, an average term of 2 years has passed between the writ of summons and the date of the first hearing, this being an interference with the right of the litigant to solve the case within a reasonable time.

Furthermore, within the High Court of Cassation and Justice, an activity disproportion was created, the division of contentious administrative had to settle a double number of cases compared to the other non-criminal divisions.

The same discrepancy was noted within inferior courts (tribunal and courts of appeal).

Therefore, the lawmaker concluded that the legislative amendment having the effects below was required:

- To reduce the term of case settlement;
- To balance the activity volume between the divisions of the courts and between the courts under the fulfillment of their professional competencies;
- To create the legal premises of the fulfillment of the right of the citizens to access the court and to settle the cases in due time.

In legislative terms, the amendments were made by taking into account the following axis, thus considering that their impact would be positive:

- The modification of the jurisdiction for certain types of cases that can be settled by other sections or specialized court panels. In this respect, litigations coming from the execution and termination of administrative contracts were taken into account;
- Keeping the distribution of the cases in the field of the contentious administrative at national level, as established according to the jurisdiction to settle the cases by removing derogation procedures;
- The modification of the jurisdiction on levels of court in the field of the contentious administrative;
- The removal of procedural mechanisms which generate large delays without a procedural benefit justifying them (filtering procedure and regularization procedure in cases the scope of which is represented by urgent cases the stay of execution of the administrative act, petitions for the enforcement of administrative acts and replacement of the common law procedure for the submission of the statement of defense and of the answer to statement of defense in common law cases) by a faster procedure.

[5] Law no. 212/2018 for the amendment and supplementation of Law no. 554/2004 of the contentious administrative and of other normative acts, published in the Official Journal, Part I no. 658 of July 30th, 2018

[6] According to the report on the status of justice for 2016: In the field of the contentious administrative and fiscal, in 2016 the number of new cases was 139,407 cases, with 23713 cases more than in 2015, which represents an increase of 20.5%.

Last but not least, it was noted that the accordance of law no. 554/2004 with the decisions of the Constitutional Court was required.

Starting from these arguments, the lawmaker proceeded with the actual modification of the law, in the end, some changes were beneficial, but others were at least questionable in terms of practical impact in the settlement procedure.

A first significant amendment concerns the "Prior administrative procedure. Therefore, the prior procedure was regulated in order to grant stakeholders the possibility to settle their complaints in a shorter term and operative manner, the notified administrative body being able to reconsider the previously issued act and to issue another one accepted by the plaintiff.

Some authors analyze the prior administrative procedure as a first stage of the contentious administrative procedure, prior to the actual stage, before the contentious administrative court (...).

The new law of the contentious administrative maintains the mandatory nature of the prior procedure, although there were proposals in the opposite direction in the doctrine and even the draft law entailed the idea of enshrining its facultative nature. [D. Apostol Tofan, Modificarile esentiale aduse institutiei contenciosului admnistrativ prin noua lege cadru in materie (I), in C. Jud. nr. 3/2005, pp. 90-103]."[7]

"By means of the exercise of the administrative second appeal, the applicant of the prior complaint aims the dismissal or amendment of the act deemed illegal by the issuer, and by means of the hierarchical administrative second appeal, the initiator aims to cancel the act by means of the public authority superior to its issuer or to determine the issuer of the act to dismiss or amend it, in order to avoid an action in contentious administrative."[8]

"By means of law no. 202/2010[9] regarding some measures for accelerating resolution process (Law of the small reform in justice), art. 109 of the Code of civil procedure was supplemented by a new paragraph, (3), which shall read as follows: "The failure to fulfill prior procedure can only be claimed by the defendant by statement of defense, under penalty of preclusion."

This provision is found with identical content in the new code of civil procedure in force as of February 15th, 2013, in art. 193 para. (2).

We are wondering whether this rule of procedural law also applies in contentious administrative, regulated by special organic law, which requires the administrative procedure as a prerequisite for the exercise of the right of action.

Art. 7 of law no. 554/2004 regulates the rule of the mandatory nature of the administrative prior complaint; the terms and conditions under which the prior procedure is exercised; cases where the prior procedure, by way of exception to the rule, is not mandatory.

The aforementioned law does not entail provisions on the following: the nature of the motion to dismiss on grounds of the non-fulfillment of the prior procedure; the conditions under which it can be claimed (hearing, subjects); the legal sanction entailed by the failure to fulfill the prior administrative procedure.

The legal nature of the prior procedure, that of exercising the right to action, enshrined in the doctrine and case law, was deducted from the provisions of art. 109 para. (2) of the Code of Civil Procedure 1865, current art. 193 para. (1) of the New Code of Civil Procedure, the general regulation the hypothesis of which aims precisely the situations in which, by special law, it is stipulated that the notification of the court is performed only after the fulfillment of the special procedure.

Therefore, the fact that the Law of the contentious administrative establishes the obligation of the prior procedure does not exclude the incidence of these texts of the codes of civil procedure; on the contrary, places the action in contentious administrative, in its regulation field.

According to the rules applicable in case of the competition between general regulation and special regulation, where special regulation <<falls silent>>, general regulation applies, with the tone introduced by art. 28 para. (1) of Law no. 554/2004, in order to determine the compatibility of the rules of civil procedure with the specifics of the contentious administrative reports."[10]

The amendments made to the law of the contentious administrative in the field of prior procedure can be structured on the following directions:

- The obligation of the injured third party to file prior complaint within 30 days as of the date it took knowledge, by any means, of the content of the act (art. 7 para. 3 of Law no. 554/2004).
- Rethinking the reasons which can be detailed in the prior complaint, meaning that the grounds claimed in the petition for the annulment of the act are not limited to those claimed by means of the prior procedure (art. 8 para. 1 final thesis of Law no. 554/2004).

We will detail each and every amendment and we will point out positive and negative aspects detached from the analysis of the text.

took knowledge of the content of the act, the impact of the change is in two directions.

First of all, the modification occurs on the background of the Decision of the Constitutional Court no. 797/2007 published in Official Journal no. 707/2007[11], whereby art. 7 para. 7 of Law no. 554/2004 in old wording was declared unconstitutional, in the sense that the 6-month term as of the issuance of the act shall not apply to the prior complaint filed by the person injured in his / her right or in a legitimate interest, by an administrative act of individual nature, addressed to another law subject than the recipient of the act.

The effect of the Decision of the Constitutional Court has not been transposed into law within the deadline of 45 days, so that a non-unitary interpretation of the law was noticed in practice, certain courts going so far that they have ruled that the injured third party could file prior complaint within 6 months, the 30-day term not being opposable to him/her.

The amendment of 2018 and which basically establishes the 30-day deadline for both the beneficiary and the injured party is beneficial, due to the fact there is practically no reasoning that justifies a term for the recipient and another for the third party.

The second amendment undergone by art. 7 para. 3 in its new wording entails certain discussions. Therefore, the third party shall file the prior complaint within 30 days since he/she took knowledge of the content of the act.

In practice, it was noted that an individual administrative act, such as the land owner certificate is communicated only to the beneficiary and the legal effects in connection with the mandatory nature and executory nature ex officio are produced as of the moment of the communication to the beneficiary.

The time when third parties took knowledge of the existence of an injurious administrative act is related to extrinsic elements, to acts or deeds occurred subsequently, to which the judge gives the appropriate significance in relation to circumstances of the case, by keeping a just balance between the interests of the parties to litigation."[12]

In connection to this amendment, we are wondering if wording "took knowledge of the existence of the act" was not enough. It will be very difficult for the third party to effectively take knowledge of the content of the act. Therefore, will the issuance authority issue a counterpart of the act, provided that he/she is not the beneficiary? Which are the real means whereby the third party can effectively take knowledge of the content of the act?

We believe that it was sufficient for the third party to claim the existence of the act and the alleged injuries brought to him and subsequently, if the act was not revoked by the issuing authority, the court would judge the damage and eventually, cancel it.

Therefore, the phrase "content of the act" seems to be too burdensome for the third party, especially correlated with the rest of the provisions of the law, which do not seem to lead and to be interpreted in the same sense.

In conclusion, according to the new express provisions of the law, both for the recipient of the unilateral individual administrative act, and for third parties, the rule is that of exercising prior complaint within the 30-day deadline, which starts as of the communication date, for the recipient, and as of the date of the acknowledgment of the act, for third parties.

"The 6-month deadline, which starts as of the issuance of the act, for the recipient, and as of the date of the acknowledgment of the act, for the third party, is an exceptional one, conditioned by the existence of certain substantiated grounds, consisting in circumstances likely to make impossible the administrative proceedings within the 30-day deadline."[13]

"The rewording of the texts by means of Law no. 212/2018 brought a high quality by means of the express regulation of the running of the deadline for third parties as being the date of the actual acknowledgment of the content of the act, and not the date they took knowledge of the issuance of the act, as provided in previous form."

Notwithstanding, we remain with the opinion that it was sufficient to speak about the "existence of the act" and not about the content of the act.

We also refer here to the amendment undergone by art. 8 para. 1 final thesis, which allows the plaintiff to file prior complaint, in order to check the completion of the procedure, and subsequently, in court action, to state the reasons for annulment, as he/she wishes.

"Starting from the premise that the general regulation of the administrative prior procedure, referred to in art. 7, does not establish binding content elements, foreseeing only that the injured person must request the dismissal, in full or in part, of the administrative act, art. 8 para. (1) was supplemented by Law no. 212/2018, namely that "the grounds claimed in the petition for the annulment of the act are not limited to those claimed by means of the prior complaint".[14]

In case of this modification, the analysis must start from the terms specific to administrative law, respectively the dismissal which can be ordered by the issuance authority and the annulment, which can be ordered by the court of law.

Provided that certain grounds can be claimed in prior procedure, grounds which can be subsequently supplemented or can even become new grounds in the action for annulment, we are naturally asking what is the role of the prior procedure?

As we showed above, the prior procedure, mandatory as a rule, it is the remedy left to the authority in order to revoke the act, when it is notified on illegalities involved.

Provided that the prior complaint becomes only a formality, the dismissal regulation lacks of substance.

Provided that new/other grounds can be claimed on the illegality of the act, which would be the point of preserving the prior procedure?

In this light, the amendment suffered by law no. 554/2004 appears to be of the essence. Although, apparently, we can say that this is a benefit granted to the litigant, who can go to the action in annulment with all grounds deemed substantiated so as to impose the annulment of the act, grounds that he/she may not have been able to discover until the filing of the action, there remains the natural question: what is the importance of the prior procedure? From this perspective, the prior procedure remains only a formality.

A major impact amendment is also the new wording of art. 8 para. 2 of the Law which establishes that "in case of administrative contracts, the court can be vested with litigations which concern the stage preceding the conclusion of an administrative agreement, as well as any litigations in connection with the conclusion of the administrative contract, including litigations the scope of which is the annulment of an administrative contract.

The litigations arising from the execution of the administrative contracts fall under the jurisdiction of the common law civil courts."[15]

There can be noted a division of the material jurisdiction of the courts in case of the administrative contracts:

- The litigations preceding the conclusion of the administrative contract, litigations in connection with the conclusion of the administrative contract and litigations the scope of which is the annulment of an administrative contract shall fall under the jurisdiction of the contentious administrative courts of law;
- Litigations arising from the execution of the administrative contracts shall fall under the jurisdiction of the common law courts of law.

From this division of the litigations the scope of which is the administrative contract, the following question occurs: to the extent that the administrative contract is defined as a species of the administrative act, is it normal for the courts of common law to rule on it, in certain situations?

We believe it would be natural that the courts of contentious administrative remain competent on all sectors and issues raised by the administrative contracts.

It is often difficult to distinguish between matters of annulment and, for example, matters of execution, and the aspects to be intertwined.

We believe that cases where courts or parties claim lack of material jurisdiction will be frequent, and the matters of jurisdiction will train the litigation more than other matters which were taken into account by the lawmaker, when he/she modified the jurisdiction, in an attempt to relieve the divisions of contentious administrative.

We consider that this change is not beneficial and all litigations having as object the administrative contracts should remain in the jurisdiction of the divisions of contentious administrative, by taking into account the specific of this field.

Another significant amendment is represented by the new wording of the text" para. (3) of art. 10, which currently includes a standard of protection in favor of private law subjects involved in disputes of contentious administrative and fiscal, thus establishing the exclusive territorial jurisdiction of the court over their domicile or registered office, when they have the capacity of plaintiff, and the jurisdiction of the court over the domicile or registered office of the defendant, when the plaintiff is public authority, public institution or assimilated to them.

The special regulations of exclusive territorial jurisdiction introduced in Law no. 554/2004 by Law no. 212/2018 exclude the incidence, in litigations of contentious administrative and fiscal, of alternative jurisdiction established by art. 111 of the New Code of Civil Procedure (petitions filed against public law individuals), according to which the petitions filed against the state, central or local authorities institutions, as well as other public law individuals can be filed before the court with jurisdiction over the domicile or registered office of the plaintiff or before the court with jurisdiction over the defendant.

According to the new par. (4), introduced in art. 10 by means of Law no. 212/2018, "the territorial jurisdiction to solve the case shall be fulfilled when the action is brought on behalf of the plaintiff by any public or private law person, regardless of the capacity in the trial."

Equally, the situations referred to in art.1 para. (3) and (4) of Law no. 554/2004, which shall read according to below, shall fall under the typical hypothesis of this regulation:

"The Ombudsman, following the control performed by him/her, according to his/her organic law, if he/she considers that the illegality of the act or the refusal of the administrative authority to carry out the legal duties can only be removed by way of justice, he/she may bring the matter to the competent contentious administrative court with jurisdiction over the petitioner's domicile. The petitioner acquires de jure the capacity of plaintiff, and he shall be summoned in this capacity. If the petitioner does not assume the action filed by the Ombudsman at the first hearing, the contentious administrative shall cancel the petition.

If the Public Ministry, following the exercise of the duties provided by its organic law, considers that violations of the rights, freedoms and legitimate interests of individuals are due to the existence of individual unilateral administrative acts of public authorities issued by means of abuse of power, under their prior approval, notifies the court of contentious administrative with jurisdiction over the domicile of the natural person or of the injured legal person. The petitioner acquires de jure the capacity of plaintiff, and he shall be summoned in this capacity."

In what concerns the territorial jurisdiction regulated by Law no. 554/2004 there are exceptions provided by special laws, such as: Competition Law no. 21/1996[16], which in art. 19 para. (7) stipulates the special jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal Bucharest in what concerns the legality control of the decisions of the Competition Council; G.E.O. no. 194/2002[17] on the regime of foreigners in Romania, approved by Law no. 357/2003[18], which provides the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal Bucharest in responding to the refusal to grant the right of long-term residence in Romania [art. 74 para. (3)]"[19]. All these derogations remain in force.

In what concerns the amendments undergone by "article 13 of the Law of the contentious administrative, we note that this regulates a series of measures on the summoning of the parties and the preparation of judgment, by derogatory regulations or, as the case may be, by supplementing those referred to in the Code of civil procedure (art. 153, art. 201, art. 202, art. 203)."[20]

In the absence of an express derogatory provision, art. 13 of Law no. 554/2004 must be interpreted and applied in connection with the provisions of art. 200 of the New Code of Civil Procedure, therefore, upon the receipt of the petition, the panel to which the case was assigned follows the procedure for verifying and adjusting the petition.

As soon as the judge notes the observance of the terms provided by the law for the sue petition, the judge orders, by resolution, its communication to the defendant, by notifying the defendant that he will be bound to file statement of defense, under the terms provided by art. 201 para. (1) of the New Code of Civil Procedure, as well as the obligations arising from the provisions of art. 13 of Law no. 554/2004.

At the same time, the correlation of art. 13 with art. 17 para. (1) of Law no. 554/2004, in its new wording, leads to the conclusion that the filing of the answer to the statement of defense is not mandatory in contentious administrative, the first hearing being set in such a way that at least 15 days have passed since the date of the communication of the statement of defense.

Modifications were also brought to art. 14, in terms of the court proceedings, in order to ensure the urgency of judging the suspension petition. Art. 14 has also suffered significant amendment in 2007. "By means of the amendments brought by Law no. 262/2007, the wording of art. 14 in connection with the suspension of the execution of the act was clearer. Therefore, according to para. (1), in justified cases and for the prevention of imminent damage, after notifying (not at the same time with the notification, as provided prior to the amendment) under the terms of art. 7 of the public authority which issued the act or of the hierarchically superior authority, the injured person can request the competent court of law to order the suspension of the execution of the unilateral administrative act until the decision of the court of first instance. Furthermore, the supplementation brought by Law no. 262/2007 is also pertinent, namely, if the injured person fails to file action in annulment within 60 days, the suspension ceases de jure and without any formality.[21] Therefore, "the petition is urgently judged and especially, by summoning the parties, and, in order to ensure the urgent nature of the procedure, art. 14 para. (2), as amended by Law no. 212/2018, provided expressly the exception from the provisions of art. 200 and art. 201 of the New Code of Civil Procedure, the prior stages of verifying and adjusting the petition not being applicable in this field.

The content of the special regulation provides that as soon as the judge was assigned the suspension of execution, the judge must set the first hearing and, at the same time, to order the communication of the petition to the defendant, by making him aware of the obligation to file statement of defense, at least 3 days before the hearing.

The plaintiff shall acknowledge the content of the statement of defense filed with the case, but, according to the complexity of the case, in order to ensure the fulfillment of the right to a fair trial, the court can grant a new hearing in case the plaintiff requests the postponement in order to take note of the content of the statement of defense."[22]

Art. 16 of Law no. 554/2004 has often raised discussions about the availability principle. Therefore, in case of a trial in contentious administrative, the following circumstance must be taken into account "the administrative law is a branch of public law, therefore, on the one hand, in case of a substantial administrative law report, the right, legitimate interests and obligations of private entities are always balanced with public interest, and, on the other hand, the parties are in a position of legal inequality. This inequality should not be reflected in the procedural plan, by ignoring the "equality of arms" principle, because the essence of the contentious administrative is precisely the protection of private entities against the abuses of the administration."[23]

"The new content of art. 16, as amended by Law no. 212/2018, takes almost literally the corresponding provision of the Civil Procedure Code, thus having the capacity to end disputes in addressing the question of compatibility and correlation of the special rule with the general procedural and civil regulation."[24]

In what concerns the remedy, "in contentious administrative the court of first instance decisions cannot be appealed by means of appeal, the only possible remedy being the second appeal.

The special regulation referred to in Law no. 554/2004 remained applicable even after the enforcement of the Code of civil procedure, situation expressly regulated by art. 7 para. (3) of Law no. 76/2012[25], according to which in the field of the contentious administrative and fiscal, including in the field of asylum, the provisions of para. (1) and (2) of the same article, quoted in section Legislation are not applicable.

It was decided in the unitary case law of the Division of contentious administrative and fiscal within the High Court of Cassation and Justice that in cases where the Code of civil procedure provides the appeal of judgments with appeal (e.g. presidential ordinance), in contentious administrative, the remedy that can be exercised is the second appeal, by applying art. 28 of Law no. 554/2004, which enables the specialized court to check the compatibility of the general procedural and civil regulations with the specifics of the administrative law reports."[26]

The second appeal grounds, the other terms for the exercise of the remedy and court procedure are those regulated by the Code of civil procedure, except the solutions pronounced by the court of contentious administrative, in respect of which the law derogates partially from the rules provided by art. 497 and art. 498 of the New Code of Civil Procedure.

We have to outline that the second appeal in contentious administrative does not have the same meaning as in civil proceedings, and the court will behave completely differently.

Conclusions:

This study aimed to reveal that the amendments undergone in 2018 by Law no. 554/2004 can be analyzed from various perspectives. There are some changes that definitely have a beneficial impact (i.e. raising the ceiling in terms of shared jurisdiction between tribunal/court of appeal for fiscal litigations to RON 3,000,000) but there are also amendments with negative impact. Certainly, the impact of these amendments cannot be yet quantified, either in what concerns the litigant, or in what concerns the courts of law. We believe, however that any amendment should be made in conjunction with the meaning of the regulations (i.e. it makes no sense to divide the jurisdiction of the courts of law in the field of the administrative contracts).

The regulation of the contentious administrative is ultimately a specialized one and, therefore, the whole issue arising from this regulation should have been left to the competence of the specialized courts.

Notwithstanding, we will see in the future how the new vision brought by the lawmaker will be reflected in the judicial practice and we will continue the analysis started by means of this study.

FAMILY - CONSTITUTIONAL, LEGAL, SOCIAL AND HUMAN PERSPECTIVE

Marta-Claudia CLIZA[*]

Abstract

The idea of family represents a concept almost as old as law. The sense that we give to family is oscillating between legal definitions and social and human concepts. The year of 2018 brought to the attention of all a natural question: how can we define family from the constitutional, legal and human perspective? The organization of a referendum by the Romanian authorities in what concerns the redefinition of the family in the Constitution brought great controversies. By starting from this legal action (the referendum), we are trying to analyze, by means of it, what does this old, but at the same time new concept, mean: the family.

Keywords: family, referendum, legislative regulation, social impact, husband, wife, children

1. Introduction

The family is an institution with old roots, the family existed before the state, we cannot conceive mankind without the notion of family. Therefore, we wonder why this subject is so topical?

2018 brought this institution to the attention of Romanians, in an unexpected and surprising way.

A referendum was organized on October 6th and 7th, 2018 and the question to which the voters were called to answer was: 'Do you agree with the law on revising the Constitution of Romania in the form adopted by the Parliament?' It should be mention that the decision of the Legislative aimed the revision of art. 48 of the Constitution, meaning that the family is founded on the marriage between a man and a woman and not between spouses, as currently governed by the Constitution.

The new wording of art. 48 para. 1 of the Constitution should be reformulated: 'The family is founded on the freely consented marriage of the spouses, their full equality, as well as the right and duty of the parents to ensure the upbringing, education and instruction of their children.'

Statistically speaking, 21.10% of the population voted in the referendum for the redefinition of the family in the Constitution, and from the total of votes, 91.56 were 'YES', 6.47% were 'NO', and the rest were null.

Out of the 18,279,011 voters, only 3,857,308 came in order to express their vote.

The referendum would have been valid if the turnout had been 30%, and 25% of the votes had been valid votes.

So, here is the real impact of this issue in Romania in 2018, according to actual data.

The scope of the referendum was that the constitutional text explicitly provided that family is the union between a man and a woman, by removing words 'between spouses', which could have led to confusions, by considering that spouses may also be persons of the same sex.

Notwithstanding, it should have not been disregarded that the Civil Code expressly provided, as we shall see below, on the definition of spouses as the man and the woman united by marriage.

However, due to the fact the Constitution is the fundamental law of the state, and Civil Code has organic law value, inferior to the Constitution as legal power, it was considered that the notions must be correlated, thus amending the constitutional text.

This is why the defenders of the traditional family opened Pandora' box.

However, the topic was not of interest for the Romanian population, which was clearly proved by the poor turnout, despite the propaganda made in religious media.

Without supporting any of the groups, the topic is worth analyzing.

We are in 2018, the year of the referendum, 21st century, when the society faces two realities that cannot be ignored: same-sex couples, whom other countries granted not only the freedom to marry, but also to have children and single-parent families, a growing phenomenon even in our country.

Faced with these realities, the following natural question arises: was the return to traditional formulas required or should we look to the future?

2. Family: parliamentary debates

First of all, we would like to present some of the opinions of the members of Parliament regarding the law on revising the Constitution.

Therefore, the senators had pro and con opinions in the debates on the Constitution revision initiative.

Şerban Nicolae (PSD) argued that every child has the right to grow up in a family consisting of a mother and a father, some liberals backed the project, and USR accused PSD of campaigning.

'There is undoubtedly a religious dimension and a rational one. I have identified the religious dimension in what comes from the individuals' understanding. Procreation can only be done by a man and woman. Three billion man without a woman cannot procreate. 4 billion women without a man cannot procreate. This is a natural law. I believe there is God and he has a creative role. There is a religious dimension. I believe we have the obligation to give a vote that respects what any human being understands by family and marriage. I believe life is the result of a natural process that cannot be questioned. I would like to say a few words about the rational dimension. I believe that every child has the right to grow up in a family consisting of a mother and a father. I do not believe that the first word of every child is by accident 'mother' – the person who he feels the most attached to', Şerban Nicolae stated in the plenary of the Parliament. PSD Senator argued that current phrase of the Constitution, which stated the word 'spouses', emphasized the freely expressed consent, because marriages of post-war period were concluded of interests, by agreements, and that could not be called 'family'.

'For those who do not know, the current phrase taken from the Family Code emphasized the freely expressed consent. The freely agreed marriage, because in the post-war period, in the Romanian society, marriages were still contracted by agreements concluded between parents or in various other forms, and therefore, there was a need for a freely expressed consent, which did not mean marriage was the basis of the family. We are in the situation to discuss another aspect, now there is no question of free consent', Şerban Nicolae added. USR Senator, Vlad Alexandrescu, declared in the plenary, during the debates on the revising of the Constitution for the definition of the family, that family and traditions do not matter for senators who support this modification, but they 'are only campaigning by taking advantage of the Referendum'.

'For USR it is clear that neither the family nor the traditions matter to you, but only the idea of campaigning by taking advantage of the referendum. (...) You have postponed it so many times and decided to vote it now, in order to distract people from the justice laws, from the Criminal Codes. (...) A vote against is not a vote against family. Does PSD really want a referendum on traditional values? What if we organize a referendum on traditional values? Let's organize a referendum in order for those who are criminally convicted to stop holding public functions, for allocating 6% of the GDP for Education, for removing plagiarism. Do you have the courage to ask Romanians what do they think about this? No, you want a useless referendum', USR Senator, Vlad Alexandrescu stated in the plenary.

ALDE Senator, Daniel Zamfir, said that such a draft law cannot be imposed on the senators and that they cannot be told how to vote. 'I strongly believe that this is not a draft law that any parliamentary group should discuss, more precisely to establish how to vote it. It is a draft law on which the senators must not be told how to vote. (...) ALDE has never influenced and will not influence the vote of any member of Parliament. Personally, I can say that I will vote as my conscience tells me'. PNL Senator, Nicoleta Pauliuc, announced she would vote in favor of adopting citizens' initiative, because 'this is a vote for keeping tradition', and PNL supports the stopping of demographic decline.

'I chose to vote today for supporting citizens' initiative. My vote is for keeping tradition. PNL wants to stop demographic decline, which can be achieved by two main ways, including supporting natality. It is not necessary to politicize the desire of over three million Romanians, Pauliuc said from the tribune of the Senate plenary. The leader of the UDMR Senate group, Cseke Atilla, said that there were things that had to be clarified during the debates, the amendment marking an equal sign between the notion of family and marriage.

'If you need a simple sentence on the proposed text, this is a text which is not perfect, but it is better than the current one. The UDMR Senate group analyzed the proposed text and all UDMR Senators agree with the definition of marriage provided that it is freely consented and contracted between a man and a woman. However, there are certain shortages; In some way, the term of family and marriage are put on an equal footing, which is wrong. They tried to induce the idea that if you are not married, you do not have a family. If a couple lives together and has children, is this not a family? It was on this occasion that these situations should be regulated by simple sentences at the constitutional level. Such things could be developed by organic laws. This did not happen, therefore, UDMR Senators will vote as their conscience tell them and they will say the following: We all agree with the contracting of the marriage between a man and a woman. Some will vote for and some will refrain from voting', the leader of UDMR Senate group, Cseke Atilla declared.

Therefore, here is the political dimension of this approach. Notwithstanding, this political dimension should have taken into account the legislative regulations that we will analyze above and from the analysis of which can be concluded that, in fact, the approach remains only a political one.

3. Family: current legal regulation

In addition to the text of art. 48 of the Constitution, already quoted by us, the detailed regulation of the notion of family is found in the Civil Code.

Therefore, art. 258 provides as follows: 'Family. (1) The family is founded on the freely consented marriage of the spouses, their full equality, as well as the right and duty of the parents to ensure the upbringing, education and instruction of their children.

(2) The family is entitled to protection granted by the society and the state.

(3) The state shall be bound to support, by economic and social measures, the conclusion of marriage, as well as the development and consolidation of family.

(4) For the purpose of this code, spouses shall mean the man and the woman united by marriage.

Family is the natural and fundamental group unit of the society. It is a form of social relations between people connected by marriage or kinship[1], a fundamental social institution found in all societies, even if its particular forms differ substantially from one place to another[2].

In legal terms, family represents the group of persons among whom there are rights and obligations that arise from marriage, kinship, and other relations assimilated to family relationships[3].

The sociological and legal notion of family usually concur, overlap, however, as we will show in this study, the phenomenon of single-parent families has increased, which has led to many approaches of the concept of 'family'.

Another example where the stricto sensu notion of family ceases occurs in case of the dissolution of marriage by divorce, when relationships between spouses, 'in sociologic terms, cease, because there is no longer a community of life and interests between them. However, certain rights and obligations, such as family relationships in a legal sense, continue to exist - for example, those relating to maintenance, right to name, common goods, unless they divided at the time of the dissolution of marriage."[4]

In a comprehensive definition, family is the social community by means of which spouses and their children build a life together, by being united by their biological, economic, psychological, spiritual relationships[5].

How can we start a family? We go back to the traditional concepts, in connection with the legal ones.

'The first principle enshrined in para. (1) is the principle of freely consented marriage. The principle is enshrined both internationally, in art. 16 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[6], art. 12 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[7], and nationally, not only in para. (1) of the regulation, but also in the Constitution, which, in art. 48 para. (1) provides that family is founded on the freely consented marriage of the spouses and in art. 259 para. (1) NCC, which provides that family is based on the freely consented marriage between man and woman.

Stricto sensu, this principle of constitutional value means that the concordant will of the future spouses is the only subjective, relevant and indispensable factor for the conclusion of the marriage. The agreement or opposition of the parties or of other persons do not have legal connotations. The freely accepted consent of marriage means that there are no privileges or discrimination of social, racial, ethnic, religious nature in the exercise of the fundamental right of any person to marry and to found a family.

The second principle enshrined by para. (1), is the principle of equality of rights between man and woman. Equality between man and woman is enshrined both in terms of patrimonial and personal relationships between spouses, and between parents and children.

The equality of woman with man in different activities is provided by certain international acts. Therefore, according to art. 16 para. (1) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights "Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution". Furthermore, according to art. 3 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights[8]: 'the States Parties to the present Covenant undertake to ensure the equal right of men and women to enjoyment of all economic, social and cultural rights set forth in the present Covenant'.

Once the marriage is concluded, the spouses have equal rights and duties, both in what concerns the relations between them and their relations with their minor children; together they must ensure their raising and education'[9]. In the relationship between spouses, the rights and duties of each, having the same content, are complementary and have only one purpose: the common interest[10].

Equality between man and woman does not exclude the right of women to a protection regime, as do young people, when social reasons impose such measures[11].

The third principle enshrined by para. (2), is the principle of family protection. The family is protected not only by the state but also by society in general, the right to protection being constitutionally enshrined by art. 26 para. (1). Furthermore, art. 8 of the European Convention regulates the right to respect for private and family life. The respect for private and family life entails the obligation of the authorities to protect family life and, at the same time, the obligation to refrain from any arbitrary interference in it. In the light of the European Court case law, the protection of family life concerns the existent family life, formed after the conclusion of the marriage, and not the family life which is at the planning stage[12].

In connection with the right to family protection, para. (3) of the regulation establishes the obligation of the state to support the conclusion, development and consolidation of marriage. The support can be materialized by means of various economic and social measures. One example would be state allowance for family support. This is another controversial topic, are these allowances sufficient resources or at least a real point of financial support? These allowances should help children, at least in order to ensure a minimal support of the educational process, but the amounts provided are insignificant.

'Law no. 217/2003 for preventing and combating domestic violence was also adopted in order to protect and support family, to develop and strengthen family solidarity, based on friendship, affection and moral and material support of family members, which is a national interest goal.

The principle of marriage and family protection is provided by various international instruments: The Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides in art. 16 that 'the family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the state'; The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights provides in art. 10 para. (1) that 'the widest possible protection and assistance should be accorded to the family, which is the natural and fundamental group unit of society, particularly for its establishment and while it is responsible for the care and education of dependent children'; The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights[13] provides in art. 23 para. (1) that 'the family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State'; the European Convention on Human Rights establishes in art. 8 the right to respect for private and family life.'[14]

Furthermore, for the purpose of this study, we have to take into account the provisions of Art. 259. of the Civil Code: Marriage. (1) Marriage is the freely consented union between a man and a woman, concluded under the law.

(2) The man and the woman have the right to marry in order to found a family.

(3) The religious celebration of marriage can only be performed after the conclusion of the civil marriage.

(4) The conditions for the termination and the nullity of the marriage are set out in this Code.

(5) The marriage ceases by the death of one of the spouses or if the court declares the death of one of the spouses.

(6) Marriage can be terminated by divorce, under the terms of the law.

'Paragraph (1) of this regulation defines marriage as the union between two persons of different sex, founded on their free consent, under the fulfillment of substantive and formal terms required by the law'[15].

The definition of the marriage reveals its characteristics: a) marriage is the union between a man and a woman; the union is established by the consent of the persons who join in marriage and, once achieved, it is governed by the legal regulations; b) marriage is freely consented, meaning that both spouses express their consent freely, based on mutual affection between them; c) marriage is monogamous, this feature naturally deriving from the foundation of marriage, namely mutual affection of spouses; the exclusive nature of love entails monogamy; a person can only be married with one person of opposite sex at a time; the legislation in force punishes bigamy; d) marriage is concluded under the terms of the law; we consider it has a solemn nature, because it is concluded in a certain place, before a state authority, at a date established in advance; e) marriage has a civil nature, its conclusion and registration being of the exclusive competence of state authority; f) marriage is concluded for lifetime; the relationship of marriage is meant to last a lifetime; g) marriage is based on full equality between man and woman; this equality is manifested both in the relationship between spouses and towards children; the equality between man and woman goes beyond the sphere of family relationships, thus existing in all areas of social life; h) marriage is concluded for the purpose of starting a family; marriage is the basis of the family; when we deal with a marriage completed for a purpose other than the foundation of a family, we are in the presence of a fictitious marriage, which is null and void[16].

'The right to marry entails the freedom of choice between celibacy and marriage'[17].

The right to start a family includes in its content the right to have children, so to procreate (including by using artificial fertilization techniques, given the progress in the field of the medically assisted procreation) and the right to adopt children[18].

'The scope of marriage is stated by paragraph (2) of the analyzed wording, namely the founding of a family. Any marriage contracted for any other purpose than that of founding a family is a fictitious marriage, null and void. It does not matter if both spouses or only one of them pursue a purpose other than that of starting a family, such as, for example, getting privileges (for example, the marriage contracted by a graduate of the theological institute to obtain a parish).

Paragraph (3) establishes the obligation of civil marriage and the optional nature of religious marriage, which can only be celebrated after the conclusion of civil marriage, the wording being taken over from the provisions of art. 48 para. (2) of the Constitution.

Marriage has a perpetual nature, it is contracted for lifetime and can cease in case of the death of one of the spouses (either physically found or declared by the court) or the dissolution of marriage can be performed by divorce. Marriage cannot be affected by any term or condition.

The right to marry is regulated by art.16 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, according to which: '1. Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. 2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses. 3 The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State'. This right is also regulated by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as well as by art. 12 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, according to which 'men and women of marriageable age have the right to marry and to found a family, according to the national laws governing the exercise of this right"[19].

Although art. 12 of the European Convention is entitled 'Right to marry', its wording seems like providing two different rights: the right to marry and the right to found a family. Such an interpretation occurred from the use of conjugation "and" in the final part of conventional regulation, which uses the phrase "exercising this right', referring to the founding of a family[20].

In terms of the law applicable to marriage in private international law relations, we distinguish between substantive and formal conditions required for the valid contracting of marriage. The substantive conditions are governed by the national law of each of the future spouses at the time of the marriage, according to art. 2586 NCC. Therefore, if a marriage is contracted abroad between Romanian citizens, the Romanian law shall be applicable; if a marriage is contracted in our country between foreign citizens, their national law shall be applicable; if a marriage is contracted abroad between a foreign citizen and a Romanian citizen, each of the future spouses shall be subject, in what concerns marriage, to his/her national law; if a marriage is contracted in our country between a Romanian citizen and a foreign citizen, the national law of each of the spouses shall be applicable; if the national law of the foreign citizen is aware of an impediment to marriage which, according to the Romanian law, is incompatible with the freedom to contract a marriage, this impediment shall not apply, provided that one of the spouses is a Romanian citizen and the marriage is contracted on the territory of our country; if a marriage is concluded abroad between a Romanian citizen and a stateless person (person without citizenship), the law of the country of domicile shall apply for the latter, and, in the lack of it, the law of the country of residence, while the Romanian citizen shall be subject to Romanian law; if a marriage is concluded in our country between a Romanian citizen and a stateless person, the Romanian law shall apply for the latter if he/she has domicile in Romania, and the Romanian citizen shall be subject to the Romanian law; if a marriage is concluded in our country between two stateless persons, each of them shall be subject to the law of the country of domicile or residence, and if the domicile or residence of the stateless persons is in Romania, the Romanian law shall be applicable[21]. 'The formal conditions shall be governed by the law of the state on the territory of which the marriage is celebrated. In case the marriage is concluded abroad by a Romanian citizen, in front of the diplomatic or consular agent of Romania in the respective state, the marriage shall be subject to the formalities provided by the Romanian law.'[22]

As a conclusion of the aforementioned, 'for the purpose of the New Civil Code, the term 'spouses' designates the man and the woman united by marriage. Therefore, only persons of different sex, married, can have the capacity of spouses, not those who cohabit together, without being united by marriage.'

According to art. 5 para. (2) of Law no. 17/2001, the provisions of the New Civil Code are also applicable to the future effects of legal situations born prior to its entry into force derived from marriage, parentage, adoption and legal obligation of maintenance, if such legal situations subsist after its entry into force.'[23]

This is why, in relation to the entire applicable legislation, we consider that the initiation of a referendum whereby terms 'man' and 'woman' explicitly appear in the Constitution, as persons entitled to found a family, was totally inappropriate.

The legislation already covers this topic, such approach being useless. Eventually, the action entailed only organizational costs, with no ending.

The population showed no interest in this topic, the approach being already imprinted in human patterns. A part of the population appreciates religious concepts and does not conceive another pattern of family than the traditional one: woman/man. In what concerns this part of the population, the approach could have meant at most a support granted to the church, the main promotor of this topic.

However, as already argued, the legislation covers more than satisfactorily the classic concept.

A second tendency that we have to consider is the European one. In many countries of the European Union, not to mention countries outside the European Union, marriage between same-sex persons is allowed.

I Romania, such an approach would entail not only the modification of the Constitution, but the modification of the entire related legislation, where family is regulated. The approach would be a great one and only at that point in time fervent discussions would occur between the groups of supporters.

Taking into account the current national mentality, we do not believe that the population is ready for such an approach. This is why, it is not included on the agenda of any political party and it is not a real subject of discussions.

The third approach should analyze single-parent families, a topic that we have already mentioned in this study.

What is single-parent family?

Single-parent family (monoparental family) is that type of family where children live only with one of the parents. This can happen as a consequence of the divorce, separation of parents, death of one of the parents, the adoption of a minor child by an adult or following the decision of a woman to give birth to a child without being married and without living with a man.

In Romania, as in many other countries of the world, in most single-parent families, the position of single-parent is held by the woman. When family becomes a single-parent one following divorce or separation of parents, the connections between the child and the parent with whom he does not live permanently tend to be interrupted in a very large number of cases.

The single-parent family is a type of family consisting of a parent and his/her child or children; group of persons in kinship relationship, resulted from direct parentage or adoption. It is often approached as a deviation from the nuclear family, made up of husband, wife, and their minor children.

Marriage is no longer the only way to legally found a family, but only the first element of a causal conglomerate: marriage followed by divorce, separation or death. The single-parent family can also be a consequence of undertaking the liability of children born outside marriage.

In this background, we should not lose sight of the share that these families start to have and the impact of such a type of family on society.

Conclusions

This study emerged from a simple question: did the referendum organized in 2018 represent a must for the society?

By analyzing the arguments presented herein, the answer takes a clear shape. The referendum was not necessary from any point of view: in legal terms, the institution of family is extremely well regulated so that additional notes are not required. Currently, it is obvious that in Romania, family and marriage can only be concluded between a man and a woman. The constitutional wording, even if it does not define the term of 'spouses', it is construed together with the other applicable regulations, respectively articles of the Civil Code, which we have broadly commented.

From a sociological point of view, the approach appears as useless. The pattern of the notion of family is very well established in the conscience of the Romanian people, so that any change in regulating marriage between persons of the same sex would lead to extensive debates, supported only by a minority.

That is why the population showed no interest in this approach, which would have no purpose.

Therefore, after long and controversial parliamentary, political and mass-media debates, after organizing a referendum and after centralizing the results, the debated issues remain in their naturel core, as the lawmaker established them.

Despite this, certain realities which currently take shape in the society have also been debated.

Above all, family represents the love of the people towards those they choose to be together with and, later, towards their children. Perhaps this is the most important aspect that neither politicians nor the lawmaker should lose sight of.

THE E-BIKE PATH: LEGAL APPROACH IN EUROPEAN UNION LAW

Alina Mihaela CONEA

Abstract

Are there simple thinks that anyone can do and that can change our world? Some says that using bikes in our cities will make us healthy, more focused and smart, happy, living in cleaner environment, having safer roads and a lively urban life.

E-bikes are becoming more present in our cities and in our lives. One question is how the legal world is coping with new technologies and societal trends. A bicycle with a little e- is just a bike? According to European Union law, the answer is sometimes yes and sometimes no, since the legal definition of e-bikes is not to be found, whatsoever, in the EU legal acts*. As compare to regular bicycles, electrical bicycles are within the scope of by Internal Market legislation. The present paper is concisely address the relevant legal acts applying to e-bikes, the terminology used, the rules governing the use of e-bikes and the ongoing debate related to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles. E-cycling is seen as an integral part of the transport systems of the future.*

This electrical bike legal insight can help us take a brief ride through some of the EU policies: transport, internal market, competition, health, energy and smart cities.

1. Introduction

The European cities are facing a complex set of challenges. 68% of the EU population lives in urban areas, a proportion that is growing as the urbanisation trend continues in Europe and worldwide[1]. As the European Commission points out, cities are facing ever greater social challenges in respect of the environment, transport and social cohesion[2]. One possible smart solution to this puzzle is the use of e-bikes. Studies proved that up to 51% of all logistics trips and 25% of commercial delivery trips in EU cities could be done by electric bicycles[3]. The future smart cities will bring together the demand and the supply of innovative solutions.

One question is how the legal world is coping with new technologies and societal trends. A minor illustration is the way European Union regulates this type of vehicle, the electrical bicycle.

The first aim of the paper is to identify the European Union law rules related to electrical bicycles. The paper address the relevant legal acts applying to e-bikes, the terminology used, the rules governing the use of e-bikes and the ongoing debate related to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles.

The second aim is to point out the awareness of European Union institution over this topic which is apparent from diverse studies, soft law or programmatic acts.

2. Legislation

From the point of view of the Internal Market legislation, bicycles are non-harmonized products and are not covered by a particular EU legislation[4]. Bicycles are covered by the Mutual Recognition Regulation[5] and by the General Product Safety Directive[6]. The principle of mutual recognition states that products lawfully sold and marketed in one Member state, should also be allowed to be marketed in another Member state[7].

As compare to regular bicycles, electrical bicycles are within the scope of Internal Market legislation. The relevant legal acts applying are the Regulation on the approval and market surveillance of two- or three-wheel vehicles and quadricycles[8] and the directives on machinery[9], relating to electromagnetic compatibility[10], on batteries and accumulators[11], on waste electrical and electronic equipment[12] and on driving licences[13].

The Council of the EU, meeting in their Transport, Telecommunications and Energy informal configuration in October 2015 in Luxembourg, endorsed the 'Declaration on Cycling as a Climate-Friendly Transport Mode' and called upon the Commission to consider the following actions: integrate cycling into multimodal transport policy, including smart mobility, stressing the need to promote physical infrastructure and behavioural change programs and to Develop an EU level strategic document on cycling[14].

3. Terminology

Electric bicycle is a term, which covers two different concepts of vehicles with an auxiliary electric motor[15]: 1) cycles equipped with an auxiliary motor that cannot be exclusively propelled by that motor. Only when the cyclist pedals, does the motor assist. These vehicles are generally called, by the cycle industry, pedelecs, and 2) cycles equipped with an auxiliary electric motor that can be exclusively propelled by that motor. The cyclist is not necessarily required to pedal. These vehicles are generally called e-bikes[16].

The terms pedelecs and e-bikes are not to be found having a clear and constant meaning in the EU legislation.

The legal definition of e-bikes is not to be found, whatsoever, in the EU legal acts. It can only be implied, as admitted by the Commission in Implementing Regulation 2019/72 of 17 January 2019 imposing a definitive countervailing duty on imports of electric bicycles originating in the People's Republic of China: As bicycles are undisputedly the most common type of cycles, it is not surprising that the term e-bikes/electric bikes is generally used to refer to all types of electric cycles, in the investigation as well as in the market.[17]

A search on Eur-lex will show the use of the following indefinite terms in the legal acts of the European Union: pedelec[18], bicycles, e-bikes and pedelecs[19], powered cycles, two-wheel mopeds, powered two-wheel vehicles[20], electric power assisted cycles (or pedelecs), motor bikes[21], two- or three-wheel vehicles, fast e-bikes (speed pedelecs), electric bikes[22].

The issue is not without relevance as is obvious in the recent debates concerning the proposal for amending the Directive on insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles.

According to Regulation on the approval and market surveillance of two- or three-wheel vehicles and quadricycles (Type-approval Regulation )[23], L-category vehicles comprise powered two-, three- and four-wheel vehicles including powered cycles, two- and three-wheel mopeds, two and three-wheel motorcycles, motorcycles with side-cars, light and heavy on-road quads, and light and heavy quadri-mobiles.

The category Light two-wheel powered vehicle (L1e) cover the following two types:

Powered cycle (L1e-A vehicle) which are cycles designed to pedal equipped with an auxiliary propulsion with the primary aim to aid pedalling and output of auxiliary propulsion is cut off at a vehicle speed ≤ 25 km/h and output of auxiliary propulsion is cut off at a vehicle speed ≤ 25 km/h and a maximum continuous rated or net power ≤1000 W.

The Type-approval Regulation does not apply to the pedal cycles with pedal assistance which are equipped with an auxiliary electric motor having a maximum continuous rated power of less than or equal to 250 W, where the output of the motor is cut off when the cyclist stops pedalling and is otherwise progressively reduced and finally cut off before the vehicle speed reaches 25 km/h. Accordingly, this cycles will be treated as regular bicycles.

Two-wheel moped (L1e-B vehicle) which is any other vehicle of the L1e category that cannot be classified according to the criteria of a L1e-A vehicle , having a maximum design vehicle speed ≤ 45 km/h and maximum continuous rated or net power (1) ≤ 4 000 W.

So, to sum up, we could consider that there are excluded to type-approval e-bike (below 25 km/h and limited to 250 watts) and type-approval e-bike (powered cycle – below 25 km/h and between 250-1000 watts and moped- ≤ 45 km/h and ≤ 4 000 watts).

The term pedelec (Electrical Power Assisted Cycles- EPAC) is used in 1 EU legal act[24] as a synonym for electrical bicycles and, without a definition, in other various 18 EU documents.

In a confusing way, in some acts, the terms e-bikes and pedelecs are used as referred to different categories[25].

In transport literature[26] the term e-bike refers to electrically power-assisted bicycles with functioning pedals. The terms pedelec or slow e-bike will be used where the electric power output is limited to 250 watts, (available only when the rider places pressure on the pedals) and when the speed is below 25 km/h. Other e-bikes will be called speed-pedelecs or fast e-bikes.

4. Rules governing the use of e-bikes

There are rules governing the use of e-bikes that are, in part, harmonized at European Union level such is the driving licenses or insurance directive. Other, still are in competence of the member states. This kind of rules govern: helmet obligations, number plate, traffic code and age limits.

Romanian legislation states that while driving on public roads, drivers of mopeds and persons carried on them are required to wear an approved helmet[27].

Electric cycles in the type-approval are subject to the European harmonized Directive 2006/126 on driving licences. This imposes the AM driving licence for all two and three-wheel vehicles with a maximum design speed of more than 25 km/h but not more than 45 km/h. As a consequence, speed - pedelec riders (mopeds between 25hm/h and ≤ 45 km/h and ≤ 4 000 watts) must have an AM driving licence.

Licences granted for any category shall be valid for vehicles in category AM. However, for driving licences issued on its territory, a Member State may limit the equivalences for category AM to categories A1, A2 and A, if that Member State imposes a practical test as a condition for obtaining category AM.

The Court of Justice of European Union had the opportunity to interpret Article 13(2) of Directive 2006/126/EC on driving licences, in the case Costin Popescu v Guvernul României[28]. The Court concluded that the provisions of Directive 2006/126/EC must be interpreted as not precluding national legislation, adopted in order to transpose that directive into national law, which terminates the authorization to ride mopeds without holding a driving licence, the issue of which is subject to passing tests or examinations similar to those required for driving other motor vehicles.

5. Internal market -insurances

The European Commission proposed that electric bikes (e-bikes) have to be covered also by Directive 2009/103/EC of the European Parliament and the Council of 16 September 2009 relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles. The European Commission had argued that any vehicle with any type of motor in any traffic situation should be treated as a motor vehicle and its users mandated into taking out expensive motor vehicle insurance, even if they had other 3rd party insurance[29]

According to the definition of Directive 2009/103/EC 'vehicle' means any motor vehicle intended for travel on land and propelled by mechanical power, but not running on rails, and any trailer, whether or not coupled`.

The Commission points out that `the evaluation demonstrated that new types of motor vehicles, such as electric bikes (e-bikes), segways, electric scooters etc., already fall within the scope of the Directive as interpreted by the Court of Justice in its case-law`. The Annex 7 of the Proposal for amending Directive 2009/103/EC relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles [30] specifies three judgements in particular, the Vnuk judgment of 2014, the Rodrigues de Andrade judgement of 2017, and the Torreiro judgement[31] of 2017.

The Vnuk[32] judgment concerned an accident involving a tractor on a private property in Slovenia, a farm. The CJEU ruled that "Article 3(1) of [the] Directive … must be interpreted as meaning that the concept of 'use of vehicles' in that article covers any use of a vehicle that is consistent with the normal function of that vehicle. That concept may therefore cover the manoeuvre of a tractor in the courtyard of a farm in order to bring the trailer attached to that tractor into a barn, as in the case in the main proceedings, which is a matter for the referring court to determine."

The Rodrigues de Andrade[33] judgement provided further clarifications. The case concerned a fatal accident that occurred in a vineyard involving a stationary tractor. The Court stated that the concept of 'use of vehicles' within the meaning of Article 3(1) of that directive covers any use of a vehicle as a means of transport.

The European Parliament decided in 1st reading that e-bikes are excluded from the scope of the directive, since they are "smaller and are therefore less likely to cause significant damage to persons or property than others [such as cars or trucks] are", and their inclusion "would also undermine the uptake of these vehicles and discourage innovation"[34]. According to European Cycle Federation, the draft report which European Parliament voted, uses type approval to define a motor vehicle within the context of the Directive. This then excludes pedal assisted bicycles with power less than 250 watts and with a motor cut off speed at 25 km/h. Speed - pedelecs will not be excluded as they are type approved[35].

According to Romanian law, Art.76(1) of Government Emergency Order No 195/2002 on the use of the public highway[36], `vehicles registered, with the exception of those with animal traction, traveling on public roads shall have compulsory insurance for civil liability in the event of damage to third parties caused by traffic accidents, in accordance with the law`.

Art. 9(1) of Government Emergency Order No 195/2002 on the use of the public highway[37] , states that ` in order to be registered, registered or admitted into circulation, motor vehicles and agricultural or forestry tractors trailers and trams must be type-approved according to the law`. According to Art.12, `In order to travel on public roads, vehicles, with the exception of those drawn or pushed by hand and by bicycles, must be registered, as appropriate, and bear plates bearing the registration or registration number, with the form, size and content prescribed by the standards in force`.

The mopeds (between 25hm/h and ≤ 45 km/h and ≤ 4 000 watts) will fall, accordingly, in this category. By the other hand, *e-bike excluded to type-approval (*below 25 km/h and limited to 250 watts) and powered cycle type-approval e-bike (below 25 km/h and between 250-1000 watts) cannot be registered according to Romanian law, and therefore are not subject to insurance.

6. Health

The EU institutions indicates the health benefits of using bikes. The Council affirms that cycling benefits society. Children who cycle to school concentrate better than those who are dropped off. Employees who cycle to work claim fewer paid sick days. The health benefits of switching from car commuting to bicycle commuting amply outweigh the safety risks.[38] The Commission recognize the health benefits of cycling[39].

Physical inactivity is identified as the fourth leading risk factor for global mortality, representing six per cent of deaths globally. Levels of physical inactivity are rising in many countries. Across the globe, the percentage of children that walk or cycle to school has decreased from 82% to 14% within the last 30 years. International groups, including the World Health Organization, have thus recommended policy changes to combat physical inactivity. In addition, there is a growing recognition that reduced levels of physical activity can partly be explained by the dominance of the private car as a mode of transport in urban society, as well as the role it plays in inhibiting both walking and cycling.[40]

Internationally, transport policy makers and urban planners are interested in encouraging cycling, given the potential to simultaneously achieve a number of goals – including addressing congestion; encouraging a switch from more polluting modes and thereby reducing local air pollution and greenhouse gas emissions; and increasing physical activity and thereby addressing obesity and a range of other health issues. Electrically-assisted bikes are one tool that may help to achieve this goal[41].

Beside the health benefits associated with physical activity, cycling is silent and clean, and shifting from motorised travel to cycling can reduce congestion and greenhouse gas emissions, whilst offering an affordable and inclusive mobility option[42].

7. Smart city

The European Commission affirms that EU has developed a shared European vision of sustainable urban and territorial development. European cities should be places of advanced social progress and environmental regeneration, as well as places of attraction and engines of economic growth based on a holistic integrated approach in which all aspects of sustainability are taken into account[43].

The EU co-funded research project CycleLogistics estimated that up to 51% of all logistics trips and 25% of commercial delivery trips in EU cities could be done by e-bikes. The world's cities are facing a complex set of challenges related to urban mobility, which are predicted to worsen as the volume of traffic caused by commercial delivery services and private trips increases[44].

Many bikes produced today are hi-tech products. New, lightweight materials are being developed and tested that can be used in other areas as well. This is especially true for electric bikes and their innovative components like batteries and new power trains, which have made electro-mobility a reality in the EU. Currently, many more electric bikes than electric cars are sold in Europe. Cycling is also becoming more and more connected, using ICT for applications like route planning, public bike systems or GPS tracking. With these new services, cycling becomes an integral part of the transport systems of future smart cites.

E-velomobility, is as an example of active e-mobility with relatively high user uptake compared to other active modes of e-mobility. Compared to electric cars, e-bikes consume less energy, are a more affordable mode of transport and have potential health benefits. Compared to 'traditional' cycling, e-cycling might appeal to those not currently interested in cycling or encourage existing cyclists to cycle more. It becomes clear that increasing the uptake of e-velomobility would help towards multiple policy goals such as health, sustainable and active transport, and business innovation[45].

Conclusion

Electrical bicycles are within the scope of Internal Market legislation and the most relevant act applying is the Regulation on the approval and market surveillance of two- or three-wheel vehicles and quadricycles. There are rules governing the use of e-bikes that are, in part, harmonized at European Union level such is the driving licenses or insurance directive. Other, still are in competence of the member states.

The legal definition of e-bikes is not to be found in the EU legal acts. There are irregular terms in the legal acts of the European Union: bicycles, e-bikes and pedelecs[46], powered cycles, two-wheel mopeds, powered two-wheel vehicles, electric power assisted cycles (or pedelecs), motor bikes, two- or three-wheel vehicles, fast e-bikes (speed pedelecs) or electric bikes.

Although, e-cycling is seen as an integral part of the transport systems of the future, we can observe a contrast between the unclear definitions of electrical bicycles in European Union law and the impact on the internal market and prospective advantages on future smart cities.

The law is trying to keep up with societal and market trends.

THE JURISPRUDENCE - BASIC CONCEPTS OF BEING A FORMAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL SOURCE OF LAW (I)

Emilian CIONGARU

Abstract

The jurisprudence could be characterised as being a combination of previous but also completed situations in fact, previous but also consumed facts, which have been materialised by legal sentences or guidance decisions given by courts and competent bodies, through which the solution to the problems of law tried, becomes binding for the other lower courts in all similar cases which will be tried, in order to ensure a uniform and unitary interpretation and enforcement of the law throughout the territory of the country. In order to be able to characterise jurisprudence in Romanian law, in the sense of choosing between being or not being a formal source of law, it is firstly necessary to analyse the system, the whole current legal framework, including as regards the organization of the judicial system and of the courts. Romanian national law is characterised through Roman Germanic law as being a procedural law in which the judicial activity is carried out on the basis of strict rules, as is that of the judge, who has the duty to receive and settle any claim within the competence of the courts, according to the law and no judge may refuse to judge on the grounds that the law does not provide, is unclear or incomplete and, in the case in which a case cannot be settled neither on the basis of the law nor of customary practices, and in the absence of the latter, nor on the basis of legal provisions for similar situations, it shall be judged on the basis of the general principles of law, having regard to all its circumstances and taking into account the requirements of equity.

1. Introductory elements of the concept of jurisprudence

Romanian national law is characterised[1] through Roman Germanic law as being a procedural law in which the judicial activity is carried out on the basis of strict rules, as is that of the judge, who has the duty to receive and settle any claim within the competence of the courts, according to the law and no judge may refuse to judge on the grounds that the law does not provide, is unclear or incomplete and, in the case in which a case cannot be settled neither on the basis of the law nor of customary practices, and in the absence of the latter, nor on the basis of legal provisions for similar situations, it shall be judged on the basis of the general principles of law[2], having regard to all its circumstances and taking into account the requirements of equity. It is also prohibited for the judge to lay down generally compulsory provisions through the decisions they issue in cases which are subject to their judgement - New Code of Civil Procedure, Art. 5, Chapter II, Fundamental Principles of the Civil Process.

In classical law the concept of jurisprudence is known under the names of: legal practice or judicial practice or under that of casuistry and is defined in The General Dictionary of the Romanian language[3] as being all the solutions given by courts with regard to legal issues.

Under a strictly legal aspect[4] jurisprudence could be characterised as being a combination of previous but also completed situations in fact, which have been materialised by legal sentences or guidance decisions given by courts and competent bodies, through which the solution to the problems of law tried, becomes binding for the other lower courts in all similar cases which will be tried, in order to ensure a uniform and unitary interpretation and enforcement of the law throughout the territory of the country.

Therefore, the decisions of courts do not have a binding force for other similar causes and therefore cannot be considered as legal precedents, as is the situation in the Anglo-Saxon legal system, system which in fact is a creation of jurisprudence.

In other words, the prohibition provided by Roman Germanic law, which is applied in Romanian law, may not lead to decisions which become legal precedent and consequently, do not receive the quality of formal sources of law, i.e. they cannot have binding force.

However, in accordance with constitutional provisions (Romanian Constitution, Art. 126 para. (3): The High Court of Cassation and Justice ensures the unitary interpretation and application of the law by the other courts of law, according to its competence. Law No. 304/2004, Art. 16 para. (2): The High Court of Cassation and Justice ensures the unitary interpretation and application of the law by the other courts, according to its competence) which are the same as those of the Law on judicial organization, the High Court of Cassation and Justice is given competences which establish that through its jurisprudence, to improve the legislation, for the purpose of ensuring uniform interpretation and unitary and uniform enforcement of the law at the level of the entire system through the procedure of the appeal in the interest of law - New Code of Civil Procedure, Chapter I, Appeal in the Interest of the Law, Art. 516 et seq.

But in the Anglo-saxon legal system jurisprudence has completely different dimensions in the sense that judicial solutions constitute legal precedents which acquire force and applicability equivalent to the law, for both parties and the courts[5].

For this reason, the jurisprudence in this system is given the nature of formal source of law and also within this system, the judge is given wider prerogatives, therefore having a double task, both in respect to the enforcement of the law and in terms of its creation.

2. The importance of jurisprudence in the interpretation and enforcement of positive law

As regards the role and importance of jurisprudence in the interpretation and enforcement of positive law, it can be said that it is an undeniable reality, even if in the Romanian law system it is not assigned the quality of formal source of law[6], and the powers of the Romanian judge are limited, both in the interpretation and the enforcement.

For better understanding it should be noted that the positive law represents all the existing legal rules in a society at a certain given point in time[7].

So, if in the Anglo-Saxon system the law is used as an additional source of law, in the Roman Germanic systems of law jurisprudence constitutes an additional source of law.

In this respect it might be said that, in the context of the evolution of the current legislation, the importance and the role of jurisprudence have acquired increasingly more obvious dimensions in the Romanian legal system as well.

In argumentation, this fact would be highlighted first as a result of the need for harmonization of national law with the provisions of the European legal system.

Secondly, the immediate, direct and priority enforcement of the European legal rules in national law[8] are mandatory principles, consecrated and dictated by the European legal order and also by the jurisprudence of the European Courts of Justice[9].

It should be pointed out in this respect that the legislation of the European Union categorically grants jurisprudence the qualification of source of law with regulatory attributes. [10]

Also in support of the growing role and importance of jurisprudence, it should also be stressed that it has the following characteristics: it contributes to the formation and consecration of the general principles of law; it constitutes an urgent need in the development, interpretation and enforcement of laws; it fills in the shortcomings in law texts, it completes and adapts them in accordance with new realities; it contributes to the elimination of conflicting provisions, to the repeal of those which have become obsolete and last but not least, in the Romanian legal system, through the High Court of Cassation and Justice, it has a primary role in achieving a uniform and unitary interpretation and enforcement of the law by the other courts.

In order to be able to characterise jurisprudence in Romanian law, in the sense of choosing between being or not being a formal source of law, it is firstly necessary to analyse the system, the whole current legal framework, including as regards the organization of the judicial system and of the courts.

Last but not least, a new study and approach to the prerogatives and the powers granted to the courts, to the Constitutional Court, to the Romanian judge, an objective analysis of the judicial practice in contrast with practical realities are necessary.

Not recognizing characteristic of source of law of Romanian jurisprudence has been duly substantiated and justified many times in doctrine by the fact that it would thus infringe the principle of separation and balance of powers in the state, which is one of the defining features of the rule of law,[11] and it would also breach constitutional provisions, and the courts would exceed their authority and acquire legislative powers.

Against such seemingly logical at first sight arguments, the question may arise of how such principles are violated in other countries such as: The U.S.A, Canada, England, France, Germany, etc. - countries which have recognised jurisprudence as formal source of law for a long time?!

Obviously, according to the current legislative framework, this can only be achieved through the adoption of new regulations, both at the level of the system, including that of the constitution, granting adequate powers and organising laws to the entire judicial apparatus, the Constitutional Court, the courts and magistrates.

However, beyond these controversies we could ask the question of what would happen if the current system, taking into account the existing legal realities, would judicial practice decisions be regarded as legal precedents equivalent to the law?

As regards the legality and soundness of decisions, of the effects, great reservations may be expressed, and, furthermore, the fear regarding the separation and balance of powers in the state may arise.

One of the important gains could be a uniform enforcement of the law, and the role of the judge would increase.

In the event that all these technical aspects would be theoretically resolved, with reference to the existing judicial practice, in the concrete realities in Romania, it may be observed, unfortunately, that: many different solutions are issued in similar causes; there are different interpretations of the same text of law; many decisions of the European Court of Human Rights are not complied with; revisions are allowed on the basis of others, although in their contents, the European Court has not found or assigned any quality to the applicant; cases are accepted or rejected by differently invoking the grounds; there is an arbitrary enforcement of texts of special laws; quite a lot of decisions of the Constitutional Court are not complied with or are enforced with delay, etc.

In this context the question arises, what would come out of this kind of Romanian judicial precedents resulting from such decisions, in the case that they would be granted the same powers as in the Anglo-Saxon system?

Numerous studies in comparative law[12], as in the entire literature, reveal on this subject that in order for a judicial decision to become a precedent, it requires an in-depth reasoning before being issued, to be well thought out and to take into account only a situation in law, not in fact.

On the other hand, the judicial precedent involves a much too technical approach, specialized and exhaustive research of decisions, for long periods of time[13], which is less convenient for the regular lawmaker.

In such a case, the question would also be if in such a difficult system, would access to justice be hindered or restricted?...

It is important to emphasise the fact that, regardless of the system, the essence of things is not and cannot be reduced to jurisprudence being or not being the formal source of law.

The quality of the act of justice firstly starts from the interests and will of the lawmaker who, as a general rule, is the representative of the political class, from the quality of the human factor, from creating and implementing settled, coherent and impartial legal system and framework, without the adoption of transient, equivocal, ineffective and inefficient laws for justice seekers as target recipients of legal rules and the justice system.

Furthermore, we should not overlook the most important thing, namely observing the law texts, their consistent enforcement, compliance with the terms and punishing those guilty in the event of non-compliance, the procedural provisions, as well as the accountability of the magistrate, which is one of the main objectives necessary and binding in the functioning of the justice system.

In support of these points of view, which are considered to be essential and of utmost importance, it should be stressed that paradoxes and anomalies are found not only in the Romanian justice system, but in many other systems. The European Court of Human Rights itself, though it does not speedily settle the requests that are addressed to it, in exchange, issues decisions of conviction of European states after many years, invoking reasons such as unreasonable time limits, lack of celerity, etc., which this court itself is unable to comply with.

Another aspect bizarre in the practice of the European Court of Human Rights would be that given the procedure of reference to the Court of actions of the justice seeker, as a copy, it is not even required to be certified.

We should also emphasise in this context that, without a precise definition of the institutions and the significance of the terms with which they operate, also applicable with regard to the text of the European Convention and the activity of the Court, there will still be arbitrary, different interpretations, and therefore such decisions.

In the reality of the Romanian law system, returning with the proposed analysis in order to find a proper answer to the question at hand, reference may be made to a certain category of examples which is considered to be eloquent in supporting, on the one hand, the non-lawfulness of many judicial decisions, as well as the non-uniform enforcement of the legislation.

We may take as an example, on this subject, the actions in the sphere of ownership, particularly claims for real estate, and this being a highly important and, at the same time, controversial matter.

In this respect, it may be observed that, unfortunately, most of the precedents, not judicial ones, but those of non-compliance with the legal provisions, for the non-unitary interpretation and enforcement of the texts of law, are to be found in such cases - many illegal, arbitrary or contradictory decisions in similar cases. For all these - nobody is held responsible, either under the pretext of the independence of the magistrate, of the separation and balance of powers in the state, etc.

Another serious aspect found in the practice of some courts would be that many times evaluations and qualifications of previous law texts are made in terms of constitutionality, going beyond their authority and violating the principle of separation and balance of [12] Ioan Les. Organizarea sistemului judiciar in dreptul comparat, (All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005), 7–31.

[13] Aurel Pop, Gheorghe Beleiu, Drept civil. Teoria generala a dreptului civil, (University from Bucharest, 1980), 75.

powers in the state, which the European Court of Human Rights itself has never done.

So it may be concluded that the property is holy, in fact, exactly in this matter, paradoxically, the most situations in which the real estate fight has gained unimaginable, even tragic, meanings and the connotations, may be observed.

In judicial practice we can also observe a variety of decisions that are issued rather depending on the quality of the person, their interest, lack of interest, or co-interest, by the financial power of the justice seeker or by their relations and position in the political sphere.

We should remember only as an example some of the major cases of this situation in fact, namely: the increase in the instrumentalisation of law; the creation of parallel institutions and instruments which exceed the judiciary apparatus; ephemeral and ineffective laws adopted to serve certain target recipients and, last but not least, n order for them to serve certain election purposes and interests.

By way of example a multitude of legal rules may be mentioned, such as Law 10/2001, Law 112/1995, G.E.O. 40/1999, etc., only for the fact that both the number of former owners and of the tenants or the current owners, represented a special electoral interest, which led to real dramas, the reparation of illegalities committed with the commission of greater ones, which had great social implications on either side of justice seekers.

All these happened with the exclusive intention of achieving the above mentioned purpose, for the materialisation of which the political class resorted, in fact, to a traditional and original course of action in order to please everyone.

Within this category of examples multiple situations, multiple decisions given on the basis of false notary acts, obtained by the would-be descendants of the old owners, which they acquired illegally in various European countries or in other words: to order, without the applicant being required to prove with documents attesting such quality, may be highlighted. On the other hand, the ease of Romanian courts in recognising the content of such documents, judging them perfectly valid only for the simple fact that their translation was certified ?! should also be emphasised.

Another question that has arisen is how is it possible that a building which has been claimed in the whole by a justice seeker claiming to have the right to property, has been restituted in kind to them, and to another in equivalent, and in the case of other claims on the same building, some defendants have won the lawsuit, and others have lost through different decisions - in the same case, with the same parties and the same object?!

Conclusions

Concluding, although the examples could continue, we think a clear answer to the question of whether jurisprudence in Romanian law could be a formal source of law or not, is very difficult to give under the current conditions, meaning that being able to become a judicial precedent is a premature problem at present and that a longer period of time would have to pass in order for this matter to be justifiably discussed, namely to ask the question but also to find the answer of how to achieve it.

RATING THE LEGAL SYSTEM: A STEP CLOSER TO THE FUTURE?

Abstract

Today we have almost everything at the tip of our fingers, or to be more precise, just one click away. Whether calling a cab, ordering food, making a reservation or booking a flight, you just have to log onto an online platform, and you are settled. The great thing is that, after the service is provided, you can - and are encouraged - to leave a comment speaking you mind, praising or complaining, with valid arguments.

Imagine a "platform" where you can not only leave a review of a restaurant, but a "platform" where you can even "rate" the quality of the judicial proceedings by some given criteria's involving the court (waiting room, courtroom's space, public timetable), the court's clerks (manners, efficiency) or, why not, the judges (law knowledge, duration of the process, commitment and celerity).

Would this be an infringement to the judge's independency, or would it bring a benefit to the judicial system by making the judges more aware of how their court decisions affect the people involved in their rulings?

This study is intended to create awareness on the modern changes that can be seen as challenges associated with the benefits or downsides of using the online platforms in the judicial system. The objective is to provide some practical and deontological recommendation which the Superior Council of Magistracy and the National Association of Bars might consider to include (if relevant to the circumstances of their respective jurisdiction) in guidance to their members.

Besides highlighting some deontological considerations, this study also explains the challenges that are of a more technical nature, including those related to maintaining the independency of the judge, the security of personal information and those related to specific ways that a "rate" given can be categorised as being accurate or being given in bad faith.

Keywords: judge's independency, celerity, rating the judicial system, practical recommendation, personal information.

1. Introduction

This paper tries to raise awareness about the modern changes that can be seen as challenges when it comes to innovate the judicial system by introducing and using an online rating platform that brings the parties the opportunity to give practical recommendations or to give some sort of a feedback.

It is intended to foresee the tendency of the artificial intelligence to gain access (also) into the legal system and tries to seek an approach that, in the "hands" of a well-intended authority, could bring mostly benefits to the judicial system.

The idea of an evaluation of a particular "service", even though it is not new on the market, being used by providers of such services (e.g. restaurants, hotels, home rental agencies), has brought numerous advantages both ways, for clients and also for providers, being a tool for improvement in that specific field.

So, the question is, why not such a platform in the legal system where the party interested could rate the quality of the judicial proceedings regarding the court, the clerks or event the judges?

Maybe the reluctance that stopped such a platform from being created was in regard to the sensitive matter of how this will affect the judges' independency or how it will deal with the security of personal data. For judges to be impartial and their ruling to be solely their intimate conviction, there must be confidence that no external influence of any sort is exerted. In essence, without this guarantee, there is a danger that the party would lack the trust in the legal system.

Because of this our legal system has provisions in order to ensure the protection of the right and duty of the judge to be independent and impartial.

Such an online rating platform must not be seen as a way of infringement of those rights, but as a tool to improve some aspects of the judicial proceedings. Having objective categories and criteria of evaluation, knowing which questions to raise, for whom they are intended and how to "translate" the user's recommendations into real actions, this online rating platform could really make a difference in the "life in front of the court".

This paper is intended to answer two important questions: (i) which criteria would make an online rating platform practical and possible and (ii) what rules of deontological conduct might be affected by the use of an online rating platform.

2. The purpose and working method of an online rating platform

The sole purpose of a platform where the people actually involved in the judicial proceedings can leave a "review" of their experience should be to improve the quality of a "service" from which many will benefit.

But for this online rating platform to have actual results there should be strict and objective categories and criteria on who can have access or what can be rated. Likewise, there must be a control over who can monitories the rating process.

The first problem that must be addressed refers to the authorities who should have control over the platform. And because it involves judges, lawyers, court clerks and the court – meaning the building itself, the existing conditions for the ruling process, the most prominent authorities are the Superior Council of Magistracy (hereinafter referred to as SCM) and the National Association of Bars hereinafter referred to as NAB).

The SCM has both the right and the obligation to defend the judges against any act of interference in or related to their professional activity which could affect the independence or impartiality of the judges, in accordance with Law no. 304/2004 on judicial organisation, republished, as subsequently amended and supplemented (hereinafter referred to as Law no. 304/2004), as well as against any act that could create suspicion on them.

Also, the SCM ensures the compliance with the law and the criteria of professional competence and ethics in the professional career of judges, power which is exercised in compliance with the provisions of Law no. 303/2004 on the status of judges and prosecutors, republished, with subsequent amendments and completions (hereinafter referred to as Law no. 303/2004).

Moreover, SCM has a significant role in the judges' carrier and also in the organisation and functioning of courts.

Therefore, it is right to say that, regarding the well-being and well-functioning of the judicial proceedings, the SCM is the authority who has the biggest interest on supervising the online rating platform.

The other authority that might have interest and can benefit by being involved in the online rating system is the NAB.

The NAB has an important role to play in defending the prestige of the lawyer proffesion, by establishing deontological rules and ensuring that they are respected. The provisions of Art. 10 (1) of Law no. 51/1995 for the organisation and practice of the lawyer's profession (hereinafter referred to as Law no. 51/1995) state that the Bars and the National Association of Bars ensure the qualified exercise of the right of defence, competence and professional discipline, protection of the dignity and honour of lawyers.

Therefore, who better to oversee that the lawyers have the best conditions to exercise their role that the NAB?

If these two authorities would work together and align to modern changes by creating and monitoring an online rating platform, it could bring great benefits to the judicial system.

The second and third aspect that should be consider and that refers to the categories and criteria for rating intertwine and can be view as a whole. There are three important specific areas of evaluation that can be accessed on the platform:

2.1. Rating the court itself

The first sign of a civilised and respectful judicial system is shown in the way the court and its surroundings are organised. Hence, a potential user should have the possibility to leave a review of a specific court regarding one or more of the following:

I. location. How far is the court located according to the city's points of interest? Is it easy to reach using public transportation?
II. parking space. Does the court have a parking lot for the people coming to the court: judges, clerks, auxiliary personal, lawyers, legal advisers, people involved in a trial? If it has, are there special parking lots for disabled persons?; are there enough parking lots in relation to the court's numbers of cases?
III. a special design area for photocopying. If the court has one, is it well supplied? Are you given the possibility to pay either by cash or by credit card? Do you have access to a fax machine or a computer for printing online documents?
IV. a postal office. Is there any postal office inside the court or nearby? Can you pay by cash and also by credit card?
V. a cloakroom. Is there a special place for storying clothes, luggage and umbrella?
VI. a vending machine. Is there any possibility to purchase water, juice, coffee, tea or something to eat on the premises?
VII. waiting benches near every courtroom and an electronic system for the pending files that are being judged in that courtroom. Do the parties involved in a trial have the possibility to rest outside, but near the courtroom, until it is their turn, if the courtroom is full? And if so, do they have the possibility to find out which case file is being judged in real time without entering the courtroom?
VIII. a waiting room for lawyers. Is there a special room for lawyers to wait for the hearing to start? Does it have enough space for storying files, robes, legislation books? Is the room provided with an electronic system that announces the pending files and the courtrooms where they are judged? Do lawyers have the possibility to rent a robe?

IX. (viii)the courtroom's space. Is there enough space/ benches for the public? Is there a special place for lawyers/ legal advisers/ the parties to study the case file folder?
X. (ix)the registry. the archives. Are they spacious enough for the clerks or the auxiliary personal to work? Is there a specially arranged place for the public to study documents in a case file and make notes? Are there any forms put at the public's disposal (e.g. request for studying and copying a case file, request for obtaining a certificate that a certain case file exists before that court, request for legalisation of document, and so on)? Is there place for a waiting line? Or even a waiting electronic system, both for lawyers/ legal advisers and for the parties or their legal representatives? Is the public timetable reasonable?
XI. (x) other facilities, like: is the court, courtrooms, waiting room or the registry/ archives equipped with air conditioner? Can you find a public toilet on the premises? Is there a police office nearby or even inside the court? Can you find an office that has a legal assistance service?
XII. (xi) on online platform of the court. Does it have: • the address; • the public timetable; • an online registry where you can upload a file to be attached to your court file, based on a unique user name and passwords; • an online archive where, using the same unique user details, you can consult your case file; • a tracking list of the court's hearings; • an automatic update of any change that was made to your case file?

There should be also a section for recommendations and improvements.

Taking part of a judicial proceeding is stressful as it is, no matter what side you are. It is time and money consuming and can easily get you off your nerves. There is no reason for not trying to ease the process. And the first step should be to identify the court's infrastructure problems and try to address them so the "legal experience" is as smooth as possible.

2.2. Rating the court's clerks

This could appear as a tricky situation, because it involves working and relating to people's needs and problems. And the human factor is very subjective and never constant. It can be affected by emotions, by the person's present state of the mind or the issues that may appear.

Our honest opinion is that, if there were better working conditions and an online interface as suggested above, the flow of actual people entering the court's registry and archives would be smaller and so the court's clerks would have a better management of the problems that are for them to solve.

Also, there should be a distinction between the clerks that work in the registry/ archives and the ones standing beside the judge in the courtroom.

After taking all this into consideration, the areas of evaluation of a court's clerk could be:

I. punctuality. Is there a public timetable? Does the clerk respond to the public's needs in that timeline? Is the clerk available in person in the registry/ archive or reachable by phone/ email during the public hours?
II. efficiency. Is the clerk well trained? Could he/ she help you regarding the issue that brought you to the registry/ archive?
III. respecting the law. First of all, does the clerk know the law provisions applicable to his/ hers profession? Is the clerk acting in the limits dictated by his/ hers attributions?
IV. manners. Does the clerk have the same respect no matter who enters the registry/ archive? Does the clerk show patience, a well-mannered attitude and is he/ she inclined to help with your problems rather than postpone you?
V. waiting time. Is there a reasonable waiting time in relation to your problem and the difficulty arising from it?

Rating the court's clerks on these criteria could give a sense of what are the existing problems: is there not enough personal for that specific court? Can the rating be improved by investing into the personal? Is there a need for training, teambuilding or having more people?

2.3. Rating the judges

Maybe one of the most sensitive parts of an online rating system would be evaluating, in an objective manner, a judge's conduct and behaviour in court. It can be difficult to "rate" the judge's appearing in front of the public and not his/hers decisions, so this is why it is important to find really clear objective criteria to do so. Because, in the end, the judge is the one who has the most powerful impact in the legal proceedings and the way he/ she behaves affects every party involved in a case file.

So, the judge should be a real professional and therefore, he/ she must be "rated" accordingly. There can be specific categories and criteria for evaluation, such as:

I. punctuality. If there is a starting hour of the hearing, does the judge arrive on time?
II. interest in knowing the case file. How well-prepared is the judge? Do he/ she know the documents, the previous rulings, the exceptions or the problems that arise in a specific file?
III. duration of the litigation. When did the trial start and when did it end? How long did it take? Were there any difficulties involving the parties, the documents or it emerged a need to involve other people into the case file, like certain specialists and that is the reason for the delaying of the process?
IV. duration of the writing of the decision after ruling. How long after the judge decided on a case it took him/ she to actually write the decision so the interested party could benefit from it?

V. law knowledge. Is the judge well-prepared, do he/she know the rules and principles not only in regard to a specific case file, but also in relation to the procedure of conducting a court meeting? Does the judge make obvious mistakes repetitively or is he/ she having minor setbacks?
VI. patience. respect. commitment. It may seem that these are three big words, but the problem is quite simple: is the judge patient with the people who do not have legal knowledges and therefore may seem confused of how the proceedings take place? Does the judge offer the same respect and commitment towards the lawyers/ legal advisers as it is requested from the latter regarding: wearing the robe, prioritising the case files where the parties have a legal representative? Does the judge have a neutral attitude and voce tone towards the parties or is he/ she being sarcastic or acts in a manner that can be seen as offensive?

3. Rules of deontological conduct which might be affected by the use of an online rating platform

For such a platform to exist and fulfil its purpose, it is important to identify the areas in which the SCM and/ or the NAB might need to interfere.

First of all, the judges and the court's clerks are no business people, so the online rating platform should not be a commercial one. Taking this into consideration, a level of control must exist and the SCM and the NAB may consider laying down some rules to ensure that the principles protecting the judicial system, in general, and the judges, in particular, are not compromised or threatened.

Second, the judicial system already has its rules intended to protect the people involved in a case ruling, such as: the claimants/ defendants, their lawyers, the prosecutors, if the case, the judges and the clerks. It is vital to adapt these rules to ensure the same level of protection in the online rating platform as it is in the traditional context. There is no objective reason why there should be other or new regulations that would make the judicial system more difficult to access in the digital environment.

In this context, the third and final area of concern for the SCM and the NAB is the legislation subject to be applicable regarding an online rating platform of the judicial proceedings. As it involves both persons outside and also inside the legal profession, this platform falls within the legislation applicable for the legal profession, such as: (i) the Romanian Constitution, (ii) Law no. 304/2004, (iii) Law no. 303/2004, (iv) Law no. 51/1995, (v) the Status of the profession of lawyers from 03.12.2011 (National Association of Bars), (vi) the Rules of internal order of the courts from 17.12.2015 (the SCM).

The use of an online rating platform may affect several professional rules of conduct. The most important challenge that can arise includes issues relating to a judge's independency.

The real question is whether rating a judge's actions in court may be seen as an interference in the ruling or even an infringement to the judge's independency.

According to Art. 124 (3) of the Romanian Constitution, judges are independent and are subject only to the law. This independency must be regarded in relation with the other two state powers: the Legislative and the Executive power. This does not exclude the intervention of the judicial control courts. Also, the judge's independency is not affected by the control of the SCM which is the body that has the authority to promote, transfer or sanction the judges, in accordance to the law.

Art. 2 (3) of Law no. 303/2004 also states that the judges are independent and are subject only to the law and must be impartial.

But what does this independency and impartiality refer to? It is really all about the requirement that the judge, in his ruling, has to settle disputes without any interference from any state authority of from any persons – legal or natural – in fact.

The independence also refers to the impartiality of the judge towards the parties of the case. Therefore, the judge's attitude must be neutral with regard to the position and interest of the litigants.

In accordance with this principle, no one can make suggestions or impose on the judge how to rule in a particular case. Both the appreciation of the state of fact and the choice of law enforcement in each particular case are and must remain the expression of the judge's intimate conviction, which must be formed without any influence or external interference.

Do we find ourselves in the situation of an external interference if, after a ruling is made, the parties involved in the case (the parties, their lawyers or their legal representatives) rate how the proceedings where held?

First of all, we must keep in mind that the rating is given after the judge has ruled in a particular case. Furthermore, the rating should be given even after the decision is written by the judge and communicated to the parties involved. Therefore, in the process of deliberation and decision, the judge is not affected of influenced by any opinion or rating.

Second, the online rating platform, as we see it, has some objective criteria based on which you can state your opinion on the quality of the judicial proceedings. It is definitely not a way to control the decision taken by the judge in a particular case, for that there are remedies given by the law, such as an appeal.

And finally, the results of the online rating platform could be made public to the judges only as part of their three-year evaluation, as regulated in the Decision of the SCM Plenary no. 1179 from 3 November 2015. The results on the online rating platform can be incorporated in the evaluation, based on the Evaluation Guideline of the Magistrates activity, whose purpose is, at it states in Chapter I: to establish the level of professional competence, to improve professional performances, to raise the efficiency of the courts' activities and to raise and maintain the public's trust in the legal system and to strengthen the quality of the system.

4. Challenges associated with using an online rating platform

Besides the deontological considerations presented above, there are also other challenges related to the use of the online rating platform that are more technical but also need to be addressed.

There are two main areas of interest regarding the online rating platform concerning the IT security and the risk of profiling of data subject and reusing of data by the online provider.

When one of the persons interested in using the online rating platform starts generating data on the platform, he or she must be protected from the many dangers lurking on the internet, such as: viruses or malicious codes, identity theft or cyberfraud (e.g. pharming).

In terms of IT security, the platform providers should be selected based on the details provided, like actual information on what kind of IT security it will be attained, having certifications to support their claim.

What appears like an easy to use and attractive platform can have hidden risks, like the ability of the platform provider to analyse and reuse the information. What it would be comforting is if the platform provider would have specific terms and conditions that would clearly exclude profiling and even reusing after anonymisation.

5. Conclusion

To sum up the main outcomes of the paper, we can conclude that there are changes in the online sector that will reach and impact also the legal system. But we should not see this as a downside, but more as a challenge to improve some areas that are up for modification. If there is a real interest from the authorities that are involved directly into the legal proceedings, an online rating platform could result in a real helpful tool to upgrade and modernise the courts as we know them.

Although we must keep in mind that only by having objective categories and criteria, the independecy of judges is not infringed, this online platform can be a really good evaluation for the judges.

We consider this paper only the beginning point for a further more complex study which should involve also opinions from IT specialists on how such an online platform can be effectively implemented.

THE ROLE OF THE HEAD OF STATE IN THE MODERN WORLD

Adrian-Gabriel DINESCU[1]

Abstract

In the modern world there are quite a few different interpretations of the notion of "head of state", varying to a wide degree: from a ruler who has absolute power and is not elected in a democratic manner to a leader who has a mere ceremonial role and who is subject to universal suffrage. There appear to be five main types of states in the modern world, each one with its own type of head of state : states in which the ruler wields absolute power, states in which the ruler wields a considerable amount of power but still shares it with another body not necessarily elected in a democratic fashion, states in which the head of state wields power but within a balance with the other powers of state, states in which the head of state holds little power, fulfilling the general role of mediator between the other powers and finally states in which the head of state has a mere ceremonial capacity. In this short paper we strive to briefly define the modern world with its complexities, to analyze the different types of states and how the role of the head of state is still carried out in these complex times.

Keywords: types of states, head of state, modern day, dictatorships, democracy.

1. Introduction

Since the dawn of time humans, social creatures, have organized themselves into collectives which offer people the possibility of personal and social development, security and especially leadership.

All people crave leadership, as with human beings, conflicting views are something completely natural. Thus, a mechanism to solve stalemates had to be enacted.

This role of "leader" has been fulfilled throughout history by people holding a myriad of titles or functions, from tribe leader to emperor, from chieftain to hereditary monarch.

The manner in which this one leader served the interests of the many has varied. In some societies the leader merely followed his own agenda and fulfilled this function only for his own benefit, whilst other leaders have managed, through political discourse, to determine the way in which society evolved, to find ways in which radically different people with different opinions come to an understanding.

The power of the leader, also, has varied to a wide degree, from being an absolute ruler, who imposed his arbitrary rule upon the people he controlled, for example: absolute dictators, absolute monarchs, to being a simple symbolic representative of this power, fulfilling only ceremonial roles: constitutional monarchs, presidents of some republics etc.

The latter type of societies, fearing the inevitable spiral towards dictatorship if only one individual holds too much power for too long, have, in general, elected bodies in which elected individuals wield this power in the name of the represented.

2. The modern world

First of all, we should make a shot analysis on the concept of "modern world". What do we mean when we refer to "the modern world"? What do we mean when we use the word "modern"?

The term "modern", in general, is acknowledged to refer to contemporaneity, meaning the times in which we live. But modern is also accepted to be an epoch in human history, which started in the 20th century, after the end of the First World War[1].

Modernity meant the disillusion of the old empires, the disillusion of the old ways of life, the end of the great and ancient monarchies and also the emergence of general human rights.

It is well known that the First World War meant an end for the old European empires, but it also meant that new powers emerged, like the United States of America and Japan, but also the USSR, who fought to fill the power void created by the demise of the European empires[2].

Thus many experts claim that modernity began in the early 20th century, with the advent of human rights, of individual freedoms and with the emergence of a state in which the role of government is to ensure these rights.

The 20th century also meant a resurgence of despotic regimes: communism, fascism, nazism, in which, in the name of the general good, the individual was reduced to nothing but a cog in the infernal machine of the state, in which his personal wishes were less fulfilled than in the dark ages.

The 20th century was, practically, a century of extremes, in which, through the advent of new technologies, humanity tried to find a common path towards the future.

Are we still living in modernity?

Some would claim not, as it has been shown that we are currently living in the post-modern era, in which the old values have been abandoned and it has been stated that post-modernity will be the "end of history".[3]

Its values entail that the individual is the most important element, that the fulfillment of his desires is the most and only important thing in the world and that all other concepts and values are without meaning, including the idea of state, leadership etc.[4]

Post-modernism has been said to have brought the relativization of all values, the individual being the core of all existence, and the goal of this existence is just self-indulgence.

Post-modernism was born out of the disappointment of the 20th century, in which the sciences flourished and ideas of utopian societies were widespread. Utopian society were present not only in books and discussions, but were also put into effect with devastating consequences, the dreams of men of a perfectly just and fair society ending in nightmarish dystopian realities.

Post-modernism, thus, allied with global capitalism, rejected these concepts and embraced, generally, self-gratification, a strive towards pleasure and the state and its leaders being only tolerated as long as they fulfilled all of the desires of the individual, having no power to push the individual or to force him in a certain direction.

Post-modernist thinkers consider that, rejecting the idea of state power, of leadership, will bring about a new and true era of prosperity and peace, as it does not recognize many of the concepts who brought war upon humanity.

3. The State

If the individual is the most important element in society, individual right always outweighing general interests, how can states even exist in this reality?

The state in the post-modern world is, generally, a weaker state, in which its powers are limited in favor of individual rights, the role of the state being mainly just to provide the general outline in which individuals express themselves.

However these post-modern states exist in a world in which there are still many failed states[5] or in which other states are still powerful, therefore the individual, for his own protection, has accepted the idea that the state must hold certain institutions which ensure its own survival, against other aggressive societies which did not embrace these utopian ideals of "the self".

Thus the role of the state in the world as is, the modern world, is to ensure the wellbeing of its citizens, to protect them from outside evils and to maintain inner stability.

The old role of the state to impose a direction on its individual has generally been eliminated in the modern democracies, as the individual did not accept the idea that their temporary pleasure must the sacrificed for a general and abstract future good.

However, post-modernism is a philosophy generally accepted in the Western democracies, and in a lesser degree in the rest of the world, which many claim is fully immersed in the modern world, a world in which conflicts between states can still be solved through armed struggle, in which the individual still is of little importance in the general scheme of things.

4. Various interpretations of the notion of "Head of state"

We can acknowledge that there are significant differences between philosophies regarding state organization, between different societies and thus there will be differences between the prerogatives of the head of state within these societies.

There are states in which the head of state still wields absolute power or close to absolute power. Usually these states still contain some sort of mock-Parliament which just rubber-stamps the decision of the head of state. These types of assemblies usually have only a ceremonial role.

These type of states still exist, unfortunately, and they tend to offer citizens a low quality of life, as the "supreme leader" tends to reject the enlightened ideals of democracy, equality and the rule of law.

In our opinion these types of states tend to fail, over time, the leader's power tends to diminish and erode and another more ambitious person will always seek to deprive him of his power and obtain it for himself.

These states have low stability on the long run and more often than not, after the death of the absolute ruler comes a period of high instability or even civil war.

Generally, states which embraced the communist or fascist philosophy tend to breed authoritarian regimes, but not necessarily, as there may be, especially in Africa and Latin American, leaders who through the use of military strength gain power and wield this power in a militaristic fashion[6].

[6] See also W. Weinstein, "Military Rule in Africa", available at :

However it needs to be said that in war-times these types of regimes seem to be stronger, as the ruler will, more than likely, be open to sacrifice a lot more of his people's time and lives to preserve the state than democratic societies which tend to have a low tolerance for war-weariness and constant struggle.

As an example, see Soviet Russia during the Second World War. It sacrificed a large portion of its population, a lot more than the western democracies, and through this struggle, has managed to gain the upper hand over another dictatorship, Nazi Germany. Of course, it can be said that Soviet Russia was weak and needed all this sacrifice from its citizens exactly because the dictator, in this case Joseph Stalin, massively weakened the state with widespread purges and disastrous economic policies.

The self-destructive tendencies of these regimes can be seen perfectly in this example: the Soviet Union was finally destroyed from within, by technological stagnation, economic destruction and excessive military spending. Also the Nazi regime, though initially praised for raising the standard of living by massive building projects, has self-destructed through irrational use of resources and costly wars.

Thus, without democratic discourse, things tend to fall apart over time as stagnation ensues, or the regime will eventually self-destruct through irrational decisions.

The second type of state is a state in which the leader holds a lot of power, but in which there is still a possibility of that leader, through in-fighting, to be deposed of that function.

This type of "authoritarian" democracy we usually see in present-day Asia, where the culture of the individual permits and even encourages this type of authoritarian rule, as human rights are usually accepted and enforced to a lesser degree.

This type of state is more dangerous from a general and historical perspective, as outside observers tend to view it as a stable and productive regime, in which citizens' rights are, more or less, protected by the state and in which business is encouraged and thus bringing a reasonable amount of prosperity for the individual.

This type of head of state tends to welcome business, as prosperity will bring him stability and recognition by the general public.

The danger comes in the form that the head of state holds a disproportionate amount of power and will over time tend to gather more and more power. There is also a tendency to encourage the personality cult and generally neglect the well-being of the individual and of the state.

Thus, on the long run, this type of regime in unsustainable.

Also, having the head of state make most the important decisions leads to a lot of them being bad decisions or mistakes, mistakes that in a democratic society tend to not be made, as there are far more checks and balances making sure that decision echoes the general wellbeing.

As an example of this state : modern-day China[7] which has departed for the absolute authoritarian days of Mao Tse Dong and after 1990 has embraced what has been called "authoritarian" capitalism with a particular blend of democracy, in which the head of state wields a lot of power, but does not impose absurd measures like in the absolute regime states. The head of state decides the general direction of society, and can be in office till death, but through general internal political infighting, his decisions are usually kept in check. Also, having embraced capitalism, the economy has been thriving through the 1990s and 2000s, only now reaching a point of stagnation.

The third type of state is a state in which the head of state has sufficient power, but there are in place sufficient types of checks and balances in order to ensure that the power is not abused.

These type of states usually take the form of presidential democracies, in which the head of state, usually called "President" is elected directly and wields a significant amount of power.

The checks and balances usually come in the form of a Parliament, which directly oversees the executive powers of the President, and can censor his decisions if need be.

As a perfect example of this state: the United States of America. They have embraced this type of head of state, in which the President wields significant executive power, though this power is appointed through democratic means and is censored by a democratically elected Congress.

The President of the United States of America wields a considerable amount of power, having legislative prerogatives, is the supreme commander of the military forces and has a wide degree of executive power.

The United States of America have embraced this type of state in which the separation of the three power of state is considered to be sacred, in which the judiciary is truly independent of the other powers and the Supreme Court has broad jurisdiction to deal with varied issues in the law making and enforcing process.

However, the President of the United States of America is in no way independent from the judiciary, can be and has been indicted[8], so the power he wields is in no way arbitrary and this is exactly what guarantees the separation of powers of state and ensures that no power becomes abusive.

The fourth type of state is that in which the head of state wields a low amount of power, being considered in general to be a neutral power who brings balance between the three powers of state.

Romania has this type of President, who is technically the head of the executive branch, but shares power in relation to the prime-minister. He is also the head of the military and also can review the law making process and can ask the Parliament to review laws before passing them.

Romania does not have a long tradition in democracy, but has fought from the 18th century to try to balance the interests of opposing groups and to ensure that these interests do not collide with the general interests of the population and of the nation.

Prof. Dan Claudiu Dănișor has published in a recent paper an article regarding the "head of state as a neutral power" and has made an excellent summary of the situation of the Romanian President, being "the neutral power, a power that is situated outside the three powers derived from the organization of the state on the basis of the principle of separation of powers, was conceived and institutionalized in various ways. One of them transforms the Head of State into a power that distances itself from political games (...). The Head of State plays the role of balancing power and that of mediator between legislative, executive and jurisdictional power and between state and society."[9]

Thus, it can be seen that the president of such states, wields much less power than that of the third tier countries, as he has a relatively low amount of power, but acts as a mediator between the different powers and ensures the preservation of constitutional rights.

The fifth type of state is where the head of state has a mere ceremonial role.

This is the classic case of constitutional monarchies, where the monarch, generally hereditary, is officially the head of state, but wields a mostly ceremonial role.

For example, The United Kingdom of Great Britain is ruled by a King (or Queen) who acts as head of state and holds this function for life, but has little to no power in matters of state, the Prime Minister being the true head of state, wielding true powers in legislative and executive matters.

Other states which fall under this category are generally the parliamentary democracies, in which the President of the republic is not elected by the people directly, but is elected by Parliament. He generally has a limited role in the function of state.

5. Conclusion

As we could see through-out this short paper, the role of "head of state" in the modern world is varied and ranges from absolute power to minimal, ceremonial power.

This variance has its basis in society itself, its history and its values. A society with a troubled past in which leaders have abused their powers, but which has obtained a certain amount of democratic rule, will tend to have a head of state which has a limited amount of power, and who is elected directly, reducing to a minimum the risk of that leader becoming an absolute one. This is exactly the case in our country which has seen its fair share amount of absolute rulers, ranging from absolute monarchs to absolute dictators.

Our young democracy doesn't have confidence in itself yet and thus reduces the role of head of state to the function of a „mediator" between the other powers, offering firmly most of the power to the legislative branch who also elects the head of the executive, the prime-minister, and who even has the power to suspend the President.

Other countries who have a democratic tradition like the Unites States of America, in general, trust their heads of state and endow them with extended executive powers as to ensure smooth governance, but most importantly, the power to act decisively in case of emergency, whilst still being subject to the rule of law through the Court system.

In Romania, suffering this power void in cases of emergency, the executive has been empowered to pass "emergency ordinances" which come into effect immediately and can deal with a wide array of urgent and difficult situations. But, as any power can be abused, it can be noted that the number of "emergency ordinances" passed by the government is high and, lacking the necessary powers, the head of the state, the president, cannot intervene in this process and thus making his mediator role a mere ceremonial one.

This is a point we would like to make in this paper: as long as there is no trust between individuals in a certain society, as long as the balance of powers is not maintained and enough safeguards put forth to protect this delicate balance, the state will not function correctly and it will not serve the people.

And it's not the "powers" that will suffer the consequences, but the people who put them there in the first place!

TRICK OR TREAT: LINKING EU FUNDS TO RULE OF LAW

Oana DIMITRIU[*]

Abstract

Along with the imposition of financial sanctions in the infringement procedure for failing to fulfil the obligations assumed by the Member States, and whereas in some cases these sanctions are not a sufficiently deterrent factor to determine a certain Member States to comply, it is increasingly more likely creating a mechanism to strengthen the link between EU funding and the rule of law, namely, suspending, reducing or restricting access to EU funds. In this way, respecting the rule of law becomes an essential prerequisite for a sound financial management at Union level.

Keywords: EU funds, rule of law, European Union, financial sanctions

1. Application of financial sanctions: evolution of the methodology

The lack of financial sanctions has shown that it has a major influence on the compliance of Member States. Since 1996, the Commission has developed principles for the application of financial sanctions, principles which have subsequently been supplemented by increasingly clear and easy-to-use technical methods.[1] The Court of Justice has also played an important role in developing this practice, as it is now almost as a rule the imposition of financial sanctions for breaching EU law if compliance is not achieved within the deadlines.

The financial sanctions that may be imposed on Member States for failure to fulfil their obligations under EU law are a lump sum or periodic penalty payments, the cumulation of the two types of sanctions[2] being also requested by the Commission and imposed, even on its own initiative, by the Court of Justice.

Their application is based both on the finding of a failure to fulfill obligations (Article 260 (1) and Article 258 in conjunction with Article 260 (3) TFEU) and on the failure to comply with a judgment of the Court of Justice establishing a failure to fulfil obligations (Article 260 (2) TFEU).

Determining the sanction for States not implementing the judgments of the Court of Justice must be based on the purpose of the measure, namely ensuring the effective application of EU law. Thus, if the lump sum reflects the failure of the Member State to comply with the earlier judgment (in particular where there has been a prolonged delay), periodic penalty payments act as an incentive for the Member State to bring the infringement to an end as soon as possible.[3]

Since there are clear conditions and criteria for imposing and calculating these financial sanctions, any Member State may make an assessment of the sanction that may be imposed on it in the event of a breach of an obligation. Therefore the main purpose is discouragement through these sanctions, the amount of which must be large enough to determine the Member State to correct the situation and to end the infringement (should therefore be greater than the benefit that the Member State has from the infringement), but especially to determine the Member State not to repeat the same infringement.

With regard to the calculation of the proposed financial sanction, the Commission has applied an approach that reflects both the payment capacity of the Member State concerned and its institutional weight, and this is done by the 'n' factor,[4] adding the gravity of the infringement and the duration of which the Commission takes into account when calculating the amount of a proposed penalty. Under the Treaties, 'n' factor was calculated by reference to the GDP of a Member State and the number of votes allocated to it in the Council, thus being an appropriate means to reflect the ability of the Member State concerned to pay while maintaining the variation between Member States within a reasonable timeframe.[5]

In conclusion, the bigger and more economically stable the Member State, the biggest "n" factor is, namely the payment capacity of each Member State.

However, the Court of Justice has recently established that the Council voting rules can no longer be used for this purpose since starting 1st of April 2017 the voting system has changed in the Council and replaced by the double majority system as set out in Article 16 (4) TEU.[6] Consequently, when calculating 'n' factor, the number of votes of a Member State in the Council is no longer of similar relevance, the predominant factor being the Member States' Gross Domestic Product (GDP).[7]

As regards the Member States' institutional weighting when calculating the 'n' factor, the Commission considers that the 'n' factor should not be based solely on the demographic or economic weight, but should also take account of the fact that each Member State has an intrinsic value in the institutional structure of the European Union. Thus, in order to maintain the balance between the payment capacity and the institutional weight of a Member State, the Commission will calculate the 'n' factor on the basis of two elements: the GDP and the number of representatives in the European Parliament allocated to each Member State.[8]

To this end, the Commission will in future use as algorithm the number of representatives in the European Parliament allocated to each Member State. The amounts resulting from the application of this algorithm will not create unjustified differences between Member States and will remain as close as possible to the amounts resulting from the current calculation method, which are both proportionate and sufficiently dissuasive. Under the new methodology, the Commission's approach will continue to be firm, balanced and fair to all Member States. [9] However, the adapted methodology may lead to lower financial penalties compared to the current situation, but the resulting amounts are closer to the Court's practice, which generally sets fines lower than those proposed by the European Commission.

2. Rule of law: condition of membership of the European Union

2.1. The rule of law principle

The rule of law is a legally binding constitutional principle which is one of the basic principles characteristic of all the constitutional systems of the Member States of the European Union.[10]

Considering the provisions of Article 2 TEU, "The Union is founded on the values of respect for human dignity, freedom, democracy, equality, the rule of law and respect for human rights, including the rights of persons belonging to minorities. These values are common to the Member States in a society in which pluralism, non-discrimination, tolerance, justice, solidarity and equality between women and men prevail".

Compliance with these principles is a membership condition to the Union, and Article 7 TEU and Article 354 TFEU give the EU institutions the means to ensure that these values are respected by all Member States.

Therefore, the need to classify a particular action as complying with the rule of law has emerged. Thus, all approaches have been taken into consideration and the rule of law has been defined as guaranting: the separation of powers; the legality of the administration, in particular legal certainty and unity and fundamental rights and freedoms and equality before the law.[11]

2.2. Rule of Law test

Once the criteria for accession to the European Union have been formulated[12], the rule of law has explicitly become a condition that any state wishing to join the European Union must fulfill. For this reason, the problem of the rule of law was treated as a separate chapter in all the European Commission reports on the conduct of the negotiations[13].

Although compliance with the Copenhagen criteria is a mandatory rule for accession to the European Union, enlargement has, over time, shown that they may create difficulties for the Union's ability to ensure respect for its fundamental values once a state has become a member. European Commissioner [12] In 1993, the European Council set out three criteria to be met to become a EU member. These criteria, also called the "Copenhagen Criteria", are: 1. the stability of institutions guaranteeing democracy, the rule of law, human rights and respect for and protection of minorities; 2. the existence of a functioning market economy and the capacity to cope with competitive pressure and market forces within the Union; 3. the ability to take on the obligations of membership, including adherence to the aims of political, economic and monetary union and the administrative capacity to effectively apply and implement the acquis communautaire.

Viviane Reding called this situation "Copenhagen Dilemma".[14]

This creates a problem that needs to be addressed by introducing mechanisms able to make Member States comply with the obligations they have assumed at the time of accession.

2.3. Serious and persistent violation of values

The Treaty of Lisbon brought changes to the procedure laid down in Article 7 of the TEU as regards the Treaty establishing the European Community by referring to the "values of the Union", previously referring to "the principles referred to in Article 6 (1)" - namely, human rights as general principles of Union law.[15]

The Article 7 safeguard procedure for EU values was introduced in the Treaty of Amsterdam in 1997 and includes two mechanisms - preventive measures, if there is a clear risk of breaching EU values and sanctions if such a violation has already occurred."[16]

The so-called 'Article 7 procedure', entitled 'nuclear option',[17] has the following features:[18] it regulates the procedure for sanctioning a Member State's violation of Union values as set out in Article 2 TEU; has a strict scope of application; establishes a prevention mechanism in the case of a risk of breaches of these common values; establishes a sanction mechanism in case of violation of these values; is considered the most severe sanction; allows the suspension of voting rights in the event of a "serious and persistent breach" of EU values by a Member State.

Implementation of Article 7 TEU means that the infringement or the risk of an infringement meets certain essential conditions as listed by the Commission in 2003:[19] (1) either a "clear risk of serious breach" of the values listed in Article 2, for the prevention mechanism; (2) either a "serious and persistent breach" of the values in Article 2 for the sanctioning mechanism. In both cases the violation must be serious. This criterion can be judged on the subject of the violation (i.e. the target population, for example) and its result (violation of a single common value is sufficient to trigger the mechanism, but violation of several values may be a sign of a serious violation).

This procedure does not apply to individual situations of violation of fundamental rights, which fall within the jurisdiction of national, european and international courts, but to violations that meet the dimensions of a systematic problem or threat to the rule of law.

In 2014, the European Commission adopted a framework for analyzing the conditions for the implementation of Article 7 TEU. The Communication adopted by the Commission to this end - "A new EU framework for strengthening the rule of law"[20] - aims to clarify the situations in which the prevention and sanctioning mechanisms can be triggered in case of breach or risk violation of the common values of the Union.

The objective of the framework is to enable the Commission to identify a solution with the Member State concerned in order to prevent a systemic threat to the rule of law, which would become a "clear risk of serious infringement", which could trigger the application of Article 7 TEU. If there are clear indications of a systemic threat to the rule of law of a Member State, the Commission may launch a 'pre-procedural procedure for the Article 7 procedure', initiating a dialogue with that Member State.[21]

The new rule of law framework has the role to complete infringement procedures and to give effect to monitoring within the Union of Member States' compliance with the rule of law.

Creating a new framework certainly provides a mechanism that can solve the "Copenhagen Dilemma". The success of the infringement procedure that somehow inspires this new framework ensures confidence in the Commission's implementation of this procedure. Thus the failure of the "soft power" of the influence of politics and of the "nuclear option" as set out in Article 7 TEU is overcomed.[22]

But to give effect to this procedure, an essential step is to amend the Treaty and include this mechanism. Moreover, the lack of financial sanctions could deprive this framework of efficiency. The European Parliament proposed to sanction by freezing the funds allocated.[23]

From the application perspective, Poland is the first Member State against which the Commission has decided to initiate the procedure provided in Article 7 TEU and has also been subject to the new early warning framework through which a dialogue has been initiated on threats to the rule of law and the identification of solutions before resorting to the existing legal mechanisms referred to in Article 7. Hungary is the second Member State against which the procedure provided in Article 7 TEU was triggered, the European Parliament being the one who exercised the right of initiative given the existence of a clear risk of a serious breach of the values on which the Union is founded, a serious deterioration of the rule of law, democracy and fundamental rights.

3. Liability of Member States for systemic infringements[24]

In general, procedures based on Article 258 TFEU are intended to signal and subsequently sanction specific and concrete infringements of EU law by Member States. It is assumed, however, that these violations are isolated, given that Member States are respecting their obligations deriving from the institutional treaties.[25]

Still, a solution is not provided for situations where a Member State's action is no longer in line with EU law, especially when a Member State disregards the fundamental EU principles of democracy, rule of law and protection of human rights.

The idea of a systemic infringement action has arisen in response to the question: What can the European Union do about the Member States that no longer reliably play by the most fundamental European rules?[26] This question is extremely present, as the Union faces a strong wave of actions contrary to the fundamental principles of EU law by some Member States (Poland, Hungary, Romania).

A systemic infringement is not defined by EU law, neither in primary law nor in secondary law. On the other hand, no regulations can be identified prohibiting the initiation of such a procedure. Further analysis also points out that "the distinction between an isolated violation and systemic or systematic violations is substantial. The difference is not just about repetition or duration, but also about the intensity of the violations."[27]

An action establishing a systemic infringement would enable the Commission to refer to the Court of Justice a general problem of deviating from basic EU principles. This is not possible in the context of a general infringement procedure.[28] In a case which can be considered as a pioneer in defining general and persistent violations, ruled against Ireland in 2005, the Court has held that the existence of a general administrative practice can be deduced from a number of individual breaches so that it can be established a "general and persistent violation" in charge of a state.[29]

If the Commission had the possibility to initiate several infringement actions against the same Member State by grouping complaints on the same subject (eg under Article 2 or Article 4 (3) TEU) in one action, it would be possible to demonstrate that all the collected and analyzed infringements would constitute a more serious infringement than the sum of the individual infringements[30] - so that the systemic breach can be demonstrated, where appropriate.

Amending the EU secondary legislation was suggested in the literature in order to provide the Commission and the Court of Justice with instruments able to determine the Member State concerned to comply with the judgment finding systemic breaches. Practically, secondary legislation could give the Commission the power to suspend EU funds for a Member State that refuses to comply as long as the infringement continues.[31]

Watching the current evolution of some Member States behaviour, the Commission needs to adapt the instruments made available by EU primary law to play its role as "Guardian of the Treaties" and thus respond to the new types of breaches. The initiation of a systemic infringement procedure where the Commission suspects that the Member State in question violates in a generalized manner the fundamental values of the European Union may represent such a development, a right answer which the Court of Justice should confirm.

4. Sanctioning Member States with the suspension of EU funds

4.1. Theoretical premise

Along with the imposition of financial sanctions in case of non-compliance with Courts judgments finding serious violations of EU law, and in particular because of the fact that in some situations these sanctions do not benefit from a deterrent factor strong enough to determine certain Member States to comply, we are in favor of amending European Union law to [24] On the "systemic" notion in the context of the European Convention on Human Rights, see the Resolution of the Committee of Ministers Res (2004)3 of 12 May 2004 on judgments indicating the existence of a fundamental systemic problem (point 13), that states that certain structural or general deficiencies are being taken into account the legislation or practice of the State, or in case of repetitive cases triggered by causes that covers the same situation.

confer competence to the Commission and the Court of Justice to suspend EU funds granting[32] to a Member State that refuses to comply. We believe that this sanction could be proposed especially for those Member States which consistently refuse to respect the fundamental European values and when systemic breaches of EU law occur. Such a change can even be included in the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union either as a complement to Article 260 TFEU or as a complement to the procedure set out in Article 7 TEU and 354 TFEU.

4.2. The EU budget and the rule of law

Commission has proposed in May 2018[33] a pragmatic and modern long-term budget[34] for 2021-2027.[35] A major innovation within the proposed budget is to strengthen the link between EU funding and the rule of law. Respect for the rule of law is an essential prerequisite for sound financial management and for the effectiveness of EU funding. The Commission therefore proposes a new mechanism to protect the EU budget from the financial risks linked to the general weaknesses affecting the rule of law in the Member States.

With the new instruments, the European Union will be able to suspend, reduce or restrict access to EU funding according to the nature, gravity and scale of deficiencies affecting the rule of law. Such a decision would be proposed by the Commission and adopted by the Council by a qualified majority vote.

In turn, European Commission President Jean-Claude Juncker stressed the need for this mechanism: "We will ensure sound financial management through the first ever rule of law mechanism. This is what it means to act responsibly with our taxpayers' money."[36]

The new rule of law mechanism has the role of protecting taxpayers' money in the EU. One of the prerequisites for sound financial management and effective EU funding is the successful functioning of rule of law in sectors such as the proper functioning of the judiciary and the prevention and punishment of fraud or corruption.

Although the role of this instrument is to sanction the Member States concerned, it is important that this mechanism does not affect the individual beneficiaries of EU funds as they can not be held responsible for the overall rule of law functioning.

4.3. Proposal for a Regulation on the protection of the Union's budget in case of generalised deficiencies as regards the rule of law in the Member States

In this context, the European Commission presented the Proposal for a Regulation on 3rd of May 2018.[37] In Parliament, the proposal was submitted to the Committee on Budgets (BUDG) and to the Committee on Budgetary Control (CONT), being requested also opinions from three other committees: the Committee on Civil Liberties, Justice and Home Affairs (LIBE), the Committee on Constitutional Affairs AFCO) and the Committee on Regional Development (REGI).

The European Court of Auditors gave its opinion on the proposal on 17th of August 2018 and made recommendations for clear and specific criteria to define what constitutes a generalized rule of law deficiency that should be established, stressing the need to protect the legitimate interests of EU funds beneficiaries.

On 3rd of October 2018 co-rapporteurs BUDG and CONT presented the draft report on the proposal with a number of amendments. The European Economic and Social Committee (EESC) and the European Committee of the Regions (CoR) endorsed the proposal on 18 September (EESC) and 9 October (CoR).

The report was voted on 13th of December 2018 and presented to the plenary on 18 December 2018. A plenary debate took place on 16th of January 2019 and on 17th of January 2019 Parliament adopted resolution T8-0038/2019[38] on the protection of the Union budget in in case of generalised deficiencies as regards the rule of law in the Member States.[39] Subsequently, the draft regulation was sent back to the BUDG and CONT committees for interinstitutional negotiations.

On 4th of April 2019 Parliament adopted the first reading legislative resolution on the proposal for a regulation. For this act to be considered adopted, it is also necessary for the Council of the European Union to approve it, whose presidency is assured for 6 months, starting with January 2019, by Romania. The application of this Regulation shall be effective from 1st of January 2021.

The Explanatory Memorandum states that there must be a close link between the obligations assumed by the Member States under Article 2 TEU (including the defense of the the rule of law values) and the possibility of accessing European funds. In these conditions, considering consistent gaps in the rule of law and deviations from the rule of law principles in certain Member States, it has become desirable to create a mechanism for Member States to be sanctioned for non-compliance with the rule of law.

As set out in the Regulation, the rule of law requires that all public powers act within the bounds of the law, in accordance with the values of democracy and fundamental rights and under the control of independent and impartial tribunals, especially as the principles of legality, legal certainty, prohibition of arbitrariness of power executive, separation of powers in the state, and effective judicial protection of individuals by an independent court be respected. The rule of law is also a prerequisite for protecting the other EU fundamental values, such as freedom, democracy, equality and respect for human rights. Respect for the rule of law is intrinsically linked to respect for democracy and fundamental rights: there can be no democracy and respect for fundamental rights without respect for the rule of law and vice versa.

Article 3 of the Regulation details the reasons for triggering the rule of law mechanism while setting out cases where it may be considered a situation of generalised deficiencies as regards the rule of law:

a) endangering the independence of judiciary;
b) failing to prevent, correct and sanction arbitrary or unlawful decisions by public authorities, including by law enforcement authorities, withholding financial and human resources affecting their proper functioning or failing to ensure the absence of conflicts of interests;
c) limiting the availability and effectiveness of legal remedies, including through restrictive procedural rules, lack of implementation of judgments, or limiting the effective investigation, prosecution or sanctioning of breaches of law.

Limiting European funds to a Member State may also be possible for another category of reasons:

a) the proper functioning of the authorities of that Member State implementing the Union budget, in particular in the context of public procurement or grant procedures;
b) the proper functioning of investigation and public prosecution services in relation to the prosecution of fraud, corruption or other breaches of EU law relating to the implementation of the EU budget;
c) the effective judicial review by independent courts of actions or omissions by the authorities referred to in points (a) and (b);
d) the prevention and sanctioning of fraud, corruption or other breaches of EU law relating to the implementation of the EU budget;
e) the recovery of funds unduly paid;
f) the effective and timely cooperation with the European Anti-fraud Office and with the European Public Prosecutor's Office.

According to the Regulation, Union actions affected or likely to be affected by the deficiency will be assessed as far as possible (Article 4 (3)).

Sanctions or appropriate measures which may be imposed under the Regulation (Article 4) and which must meet the requirement of proportionality to the nature, gravity and extent of the general rule of law deficiency are: 1. a suspension of the approval of one or more programmes or an amendment thereof; 2. a suspension of commitments; 3. a reduction of commitments, including through financial corrections or transfers to other spending programmes; 4. a reduction of pre-financing; 5. an interruption of payment deadlines; 6. a suspension of payments.

On the application of sanctions, the European Commission has the power to make a proposal to the Council of the European Union which shall become enforceable upon expiry of one month. The Council may invalidate the measure proposed by the Commission if, by a qualified majority, it votes against this proposal.

The Regulation also provides a procedure to lift measures, the Member State concerned being able to prove at any time that the generalised deficiency as regards the rule of law has been remedied (in full or in part) or has ceased to exist (Article 6).

The Regulation is binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all Member States and shall apply from the next multiannual financial framework, 2021-2027.

4.4. Commission concerns on strengthening the Rule of Law

In the series of actions undertaken by the Commission on strengthening the rule of law, a field subjected to improvements, the Commission published in April 2019 the Communication to the European Parliament, the European Council and the Council "Further strengthening the Rule of Law within the Union. State of play and possible next steps"[40], takes stock of the experience of recent years and sets out some possible avenues for reflection on future action. The Communication has as its starting point the public debate on the rule of law in the European Union and calls on the Union institutions - the European Parliament, the European Council, the Council - and the Member States and other stakeholders, including the judiciary and civil society, to contribute ideas to how the rule of law toolbox could develop in the future.

In the Commission's view, strengthening the rule of law could make an essential contribution to the future of the European Union. This would create greater clarity and consistency, help to ensure that all Member States are treated equally and would protect the common interests of all by effectively enforcing EU law in all Member States.

The Communication reviews the tools available for monitoring, assessing and protecting the rule of law in the EU.[41] Experience gained in recent years has shown, in particular, the need for a better promotion of the rule of law, an early prevention of risks or violations of the rule of law, and an effective response to such problems in the Union. The Commission has identified three pillars that could help promote effective enforcement of the rule of law: 1. Better promotion; 2. Early prevention; 3. An adapted response.

As regards effective application, the Commission supports the opportunity of different approaches in specific policy areas, such as the proposal on the protection of the EU's financial interests and some improvements to the existing rule of law framework, including providing early information to European Parliament and the Council, and receiving support from these two institutions, but also setting clear deadlines for the duration of the dialogues.

European Commission will return to this issue with its own conclusions and proposals in June 2019, following the reactions of the institutions and society at large, as well as the evolution European Court of Justice the case-law.

5. Conclusions

The justification for the tightening of the sanctioning system also results from the fact that the founding states (but also the richest in the Union) are the ones that most frequently violate EU law and are subject to the highest financial sanctions, unlike the newer member states of the European Union that demonstrates a higher degree of compliance.

Also, EU Cohesion Funds are important support for Central and Eastern European states to help them overcome the gap between the richer and poorest parts of the continent[42].

However, the proposal to condition the granting of European funds to respecting the rule of law supports the struggle between Brussels and Poland and Hungary on democratic standards. This creates a new conditionality mechanism in terms of respecting the fundamental values of the EU and thus provides a solution to the Copenhagen Dilemma.

Although Jean-Claude Juncker, President of the European Commission, insisted that the plan to protect the EU budget in the case of rule of law generalised deficiencies does not concern a particular Member State, we can clearly interpret it as a strong notice to Poland and Hungary.

The Commission's plan also sends a warning message to other Member States where the rule of law principles are being threatened, such as Romania,[43] Slovakia and Malta.[44]

On the other hand, the big contributors to the EU budget (western Member States) welcome this measure of sanctioning states that, although they are the main beneficiaries of large sums of EU funds, choose not to respect European values.

Among the arguments put forward by the Member States concerned, the pressure of Brussels to respect the rule of law principles has been interpreted as a violation of their sovereignty. Without undermining the importance of state sovereignty, in our oppinion these arguments are losing substance in view of the following: a) values and principles have been ratified by national parliaments and signed by heads of state at the time of EU accession; b) the state of democracy in a Member State affects the state of democracy of the whole European Union; c) heads of State or Government have the right to vote in the Council, effectively controlling the future of the EU; d) the credibility of the EU as a normative power is affected if one of the states does not respect the values of the Union itself.

The different positioning of the Member States is likely to aggravate the very problem it seeks to solve, namely a deep gap between the two halves of the continent.

To address this, the plan was presented as a separate measure that could be adopted by EU member governments with so-called qualified majority, representing 55% of Member States and 65% of the EU population. European Union could apply this measure when it decides that there is a rule of law deficiency or a problem with financial management - and the Member State concerned would need a qualified majority vote to stop it.

The required conditionality thus makes it possible for Member States to take advantage of EU financial support only if they respect the rule of law principles. In other words, tricking rule of law will leave EU Member States with no treats.

[41] We mention that on 11 March 2014, the European Commission adopted a new framework for addressing systemic threats to the rule of law in all EU Member States. This framework sets up an instrument within European Commission can initiate a multi-step dialogue with the Member State concerned to prevent the intensification of systemic threats to the rule of law. The most emblematic, but exceptional, instrument for defending the rule of law is the procedure under Article 7 TEU, which allows the EU to act in the event of a serious violation of the rule of law in a Member State. # ASPECTS OF THE EUROPEAN UNION'S SECONDARY LEGISLATION. CASE STUDY : FREE MOVEMENT OF SPOUSES THROUGH THE PROVISIONS OF THE DIRECTIVE 2004/38/EC OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND OF THE COUNCIL

Corina DABIJA (BARDĂ)[*]

Abstract

This study concentrates on one of the binding legal instruments of the secondary legislation of the European Union, as provided by article 288 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, the directive. Outlining its characteristics especially in comparison with those of the regulation, the paper also contains a short analyse of the evolution of preferences regarding the legal acts of the European Union. What is of significance is that the study refers to elements of both adopting and applying the European Union law. The second part is ensured by the presentation of a brief research into the topic of free movement of spouses in the framework of the Directive 2004/38/EC, as well as considering the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of the European Union. The conclusions achieved are presented taking into account some of the most important contemporary factors which influence the activity of the European construction.

Keywords: secondary legislation of the European Union, directive, regulation, free movement of spouses

1. Introduction

The European Union has an autonomous legal order, acknowledged by the Luxembourg Justice Court through the well known decision given in the case Costa vs / E.N.E.L., in which, the aforementioned was characterized as being "its own legal order, integrated in the juridical system of the member states"[1]. The listed elements should be understood taking into account another corrolary concept, also stated by the Court, who ruled that (the Union) "the Community constitutes a new international law legal order... whose subjects are not only the member states, but also their citizens"[2].

Although the European Union's legal order is susceptible of several understandings, a fact illustrated suggestively by the specialized doctrine [3], we want to direct attention to the idea according to which, in short, the Union's legal order can be presnted as being an ensemble of juridical norms - which can take some of the more diverse forms -, which regulate the entirety of juridical relations which appear, are changed and come to a close according to the European Union law. Taking as a reference the criterion of legal force, we can identify the following categories of legal norms of the Union: "Primary, original law; secondary, derivative law; rules of law coming from the external arrangements of the European Communities/European Union; the complementary law and unwritten law"[4].

One of the reference works in the field[5] states that "The Lisbon Treaty introduced a hierarchy of more formal legal rules than existed previously", appreciating that, at this moment, "there are five categories in this hierarchy". First of all, we are talking of the constitutive treaties[6] and the Charter of Fundamental Rights. To this we add the general principles of law, legislative acts, delegate regulations but, in equal measure, the implementing acts.[7] Thus, within the framework of European Union's juridical dimension, there is a variety of instruments which may be used for carrying out European construct's goals and ideals. Among all these, we will concentrate our analysis on a certain category pertaining to the legislative norms of the European Union - legal acts whose number was reduced when the Lisbon Treaty entered into force[8], from ten to five[9], respectively: regulation, directive, decision, recommendation and opinion - namely the directive category.

[7] Without making extensive comments regarding this "ranking", because that is not the main scope of our analysis, we would like to mention that, on first sight, it seems a mainly formal one, which raises multiple interpretation issues, and even, as the author of the mentioned paper adds, "incomplete, in the sense that there are certain legal acts which are not easily falling into either of these categories."

This study refers both to elements related to the adoption and implementation of this category of legal documents. The second dimension invoked will be presented through the prism of analysis of certain aspects of European Union' substantive law in the field of the freedom of movements of persons. More precisely, part of our analysis is dedicated to the restricted sphere of beneficiaries of this liberty, falling under the category of "family members", respectively spouses.

The importance of this initiative comes from the dynamics of this segment of European union law - recognized, understood and accepted as a separate branch of law - to which it is dedicated and by the necessity of a permanent actualization of information available in specialized papers, given the multitude of practical situations where they are applicable. Having as central scope of our study the directive, an objective we assume is that of underlining the essential elements differentiating this type of legislative act from the regulation or decision. Also, we are taking into account the outlining of criteria taken into account at the moment of choosing to legislate by this type of act, as well as presenting the impact, the legal consequences such option generates. All the above-mentioned shall be highlighted in correlation with a case study on the free movement of spouses, as this subject should be understood within the meaning of the European Union law.

In order to achieve the objectives stated, we will use the following ways: research of the specific primary and derivative legislation of the European Union, but also the analysis of representative decisions in this regard of the Court of Justice of the European Union, as well as the specialized doctrine[10]. Examining the aforementioned will lead to an assertion of the main ideas in the matter and of personal theoretical conclusions, in agreement with the present challenges of the practice in this field, all presented in a style that should be accessible to all those interested in this topic.

Although the doctrine cannot be considered insufficient in this regard, some of the reference works being already mentioned in the above, it is essential to add new research to them, research that answers the challenge to be in agreement, from several perspective, with this field which concerns the citizens directly and which is special because it is constantly transforming, especially in the present international context.

2.1. The directive, legislative act belonging to the secondary legislation of the European Union

The governing rules in the primary law are represented, in this case, by article 288 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union[11] (hereinafter TFEU), the content of which we consider relevant to reproduce for the good understanding of approaching this subject: "To exercise the Union's competences, the institutions shall adopt regulations, directives, decisions, recommendations and opinions./ A regulation shall have general application. It shall be binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all Member States./ A directive shall be binding, as to the result to be achieved, upon each Member State to which it is addressed, but shall leave to the national authorities the choice of form and methods./ A decision shall be binding in its entirety. A decision which specifies those to whom it is addressed shall be binding only on them./ Recommendations and opinions shall have no binding force."

"The ensemble of unilateral acts of the European Union's institutions"[12] represents what is known as derivative, secondary law of the European Union, such institutions using, in order to "accomplish objectives... both mandatory legal rules and non-mandatory ones"[13]; the said have, in certain cases, even the possibility to choose the legal ruling they consider opportune for a given situation - obviously, while respecting certain conditions, stipulated in article 296 TFEU. We are talking about the obligation to respect procedure norms, as well as to exercise this option by taking into account the proportionality principle and not lastly, to offer the reasons. In this context it is mandatory to note another stipulation of the mentioned article, respectively the fact that the institutions may use this "option right" only in case treaties don't establish the type of act which is to be adopted. However, it is necessary to highlight that, at the present time, "the Union has three main types of formal legal norms at its disposal: regulations, directives, decisions"[14], which are adopted in accordance with the rules stated by article 297 TFEU[15], the said three being the legislative acts through which to carry out, to realize "the European Union's policy in any particular field"[16].

According to the provisions representing the governing rules we are discussing[17], the directive can have as recipients one, several or all member states, being mandatory for those it addresses, but only in regards to the result which is to be achieved, while leaving at the discretion of the member states, more precisely to the national authorities, the competence to choose the form and means to achieve its imposed "goal".

Unlike the decision, "the directive is a general applicability text, withing all EU countries"[18], and unlike the regulation, which is applied in the internal legal order of the member states immediately after entering into force[19], the directive is not directly applicable in the internal law system of the countries belonging to the Union, it has to be first transposed into the national legislation before being applicable in each member state. Such transposition is a subject we will cover again in this work, similar to how we will give more explanations regarding the notion of "direct effect", which we will just mention now through the lens of the differences between the specific statute of the regulation and that applicable to the directive. Therefore, comparative to the regulation, the directive "does not benefit from direct applicability and, as a consequence, doesn't benefit from a direct effect either"[20], the resulting rule being that private persons cannot invoke and use the provisions of the directive in front of national courts.

However, there were situations which can be considered exceptions, where "the force of the directives was increased by decisions given by the ECJ"[21]. We believe that this is also due to the fact that "there were enough times when litigants invoked the provisions of a directive in front of the national courts... as a result of the preliminary questions, the Court of Justice in Luxembourg has developed a rich jurisprudence in the field, recognizing, under certain conditions, the direct effect of this legal act of the European Union"[22]. In the specialized doctrine, there is even more vehement support regarding the rulings the Court made in this regard, showing it to have judged as follows: "directives have a direct effect, private person being able to use them in actions directed against the state[23] and including that "a Member State may be responsible for repairing the injury caused as a result of not implementing a directive"[24]. But we cannot neglect the fact that, even in this latter work invoked, which deals comprehensively with the "theory of direct effect"[25] (of the mandatory norms of the European Union), the author stresses that "the significance of the notion of direct effect remains controversial"[26], categorizing directives in the sphere of the legislative acts in connection with which the most problematic aspects have arisen in practice, for many years.

In support of the idea presented above we note, for example, the decision of Judge PhD Carmen Popoiag[27] to address the Court of Justice and raise, inter alia, "the issue of the possibility of direct applicability of communitary law by the Romanian court"[28], exactly based upon the merits of the fact that "since 1974, the Court ruled that the former article 3 paragraph (1) of the Directive 64/221[29] was susceptible to cause direct effects"[30]- in certain conditions; in practice, we are talking about the possibility to limit the right to freedom of movement based upon the exclusive existence of a personal behaviour of the litigant, and of the fact that such conduct must necessarily affect public order[31].

2.2. The right to choose. Regulation or Directive? Advantages and disadvantages

The possibility for the legislative act at the level of the European Union to result in either regulations or directives gives it "a valuable flexibility. The direct applicability of regulations means that they must be able to be directly "parachuted" in the legal systems of member states, in the form they have"[32]. In such a situation, it is understood that the provisions of a regulation must be designed so as to contain references to all the aspects and hypotheses of the "situation" which is the object of the regulation. We do not think it unusual that, in practice, especially when the field which is the scope of the regulation is either a more complex one, or a more delicate one, a lot of difficulties appear in the designing of such a type of normative act. Some of the reasons we appreciate as being relevant are the differences between legal systems or legislation in force in the member states on that matter; we would like to add the differences, some very substantial (in case of certain countries) between administrative, social and even cultural systems.

The above mentioned should not be taken as having the role of diminishing the significance or practical usability of the directive, but only to help us spotlight better the cases in which the decision to choose a directive (instead of elaborating a regulation, but without limitation to just this case) has proven effective, especially through the lens of the fact that it offers the recipient member states the freedom regarding the manner of implementing the directive, more specifically the way to choose and implement measure in order to reach the mandatory goal pursued. "But they shouldn't be considered vague, because they are not. The goals to be reached by the member states are established to the smallest details"[33]. All these characteristics create the ideal legislative act of the European Union for the concretization of great scale legislative reform or for carrying out a process of harmonizing the member states' legislation - the directive.

We cannot continue our analysis without underlining the fact that, in time, the preferences for juridical interventions at the level of (E)EC[34], or at the level of the Union, respectively, have undergone, obviously, a lot of changes[35]. A clear example in this regard is presented in the introduction of the paper "Directiva -act de dreptul Uniunii Europene - și dreptul român" (The Directive - European Union Legal Act - and the Romanian Law) and it refers to the Declaration no. 4 regarding article 100 a of the EEC Treaty, annexed to the final part of the Single European Act[36], which states: "In its proposals, the Commission shall give priority to the use of the directive instrument, in case harmonization implies, in one or more of the member states, changes in legislation"[37].

Regarding the concept of harmonization, we like to note that it is susceptible, in general, to be understood in two ways, namely minimum harmonization and maximum (complete) harmonization, the distinction being important from the perspective of the mandatory requirements. In essence, for the minimum harmonization, the directive imposes minimal standards, these being the situations where in some of the member states there are already higher standards in force. On the other hand, when we speak about maximum harmonization, we have to take into account the fact that the countries in the Union cannot impose stricter norms than those established through the directive[38].

Through all these last clarifications we tried to outline, in short, the situations in which the advantages of using directives bestows upon them (or, at least, used to bestow) a preferential place in relation to the regulation, at times when there is the possibility to choose a certain type of normative act.

We cannot advance in our analysis without bringing into discussion another relevant idea for the aforementioned, namely that "a new directive did not necessarily presuppose transposition into national law"[39]. At present, the situation is completely different, "taking into account the generalization of publishing the directives in the Official Journal of the European Union and of the obligation of the member states to include a link to the directive in the transposition measures, together with designing and publishing a concordance table between the transposition decisions and the directive"[40], to which other reasons having to do with the entire evolution of legislative provisions of the European Union, as well as the legislative differences between the 28 member states are added. Consequently, "exceptions to the obligation for the adoption of (new) internal legal acts, which is the responsibility of the Member State in order to implement a new Directive, can no longer be conceived"[41]. However, some authors indicate situations where there is no need to adopt internal laws in order to transposition some provisions from a directive, but we would like to highlight that in this case we are discussing about certain specific provisions[42].

Moreover, the differences appearing regarding the legal status of the directives can be seen as normal and correlative to the evolution taking place during the years. For example, at the beginning of the European construction, the directive wasn't published, like the regulation, this particular fact creating consequences regarding the moment when the transposition deadline started. The Court of Justice of the European Union states that "according to the second subparagraph of Article 191 of the EEC Treaty, applicable at the time of the adoption of... the directive (with significance for the question concerned), directives are (were) notified to their addressees and enter (were entering) into force by such notification. Therefore, not the date of publication, but the date of notification to... the member state.. was relevant to determine when the period of transposition of such directive began"[43].

As a curiosity, we want to present a short analogy, in terms of terminology, between what the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe - which never entered into force, not being ratified - called the "European framework law", and the meaning of the term "directive" today. The above mentioned treaty defined the European framework law as being "a normative act which constitutes as an obligation for each recipient member state the goal to be reached, while at the same time allowing the national authorities the competence regarding choosing the form and means"[44]. During a simple read through the governing rules on the subject (already mentioned) regarding the directive, respectively the third part of article 288 TFEU, it is clear that the essential disposition in the primary law regarding the directive is identical with that in the Treaty for establishing a Constitution for Europe, which defined the European framework law. The same treaty defined "European law" as being the normative act with a general character "mandatory in all its elements and directly applicable in all member states"[45], the same being also the elements defining, in the present European Union legal order, the notion of regulation.

As mentioned until now, in summary, the situations where using the directive as a normative act offers multiple benefits, but also a few of its evolutive elements -both at conceptual level and on the practical one, we consider that, for a complete analysis, it is necessary to bring into discussion some disadvantages it has, at least regarding the practice in this field.

One of the documents invoking some of these aspects is "The Monti Report", presented by Professor Mario Monti, to the President of the European Commission at the time (May 9, 2010), Jose Manuel Barroso. This report acknowledges the advantage of directives of allowing an adjustment of norms to local situations and preferences, but also indicates the following disadvantages: "the time gap between the adoption at the European Union level and implementation on the ground", but also "the risk of non-implementation or over-regulation at national level." The conclusion in this regard is that "there are more and more reasons to choose regulations than directives as a preferred juridical technique for regulating the single market... our recommendation being to mainly use regulations"[46]. The respective report refers to the single market because that is the main scope of the said document, but we deem that this idea is, surely, applicable in regards to different subjects. Moreover, the European Commission show a constant concern to "identify what areas of the current legislative corpus could be improved"[47]. In this regard, it shall draw up and assess EU policies and rules in a transparent manner, starting from concrete data and integrating the opinions of the citizens and interested parties - all these being carried out through the use of an "Agenda for better regulation".

2.3. Items relating to the application of the Directive, derivative legislative act of the European Union

Returning to the study's main scope, we note the following statement, together with the mention that we agree with its meaning: "In addition to the definition from the Treaty, it should be borne in mind that any directive is in connection with three dates, time periods or events"[48].

First of all, it has to do with the time of the adoption of the directive, after completion of either the ordinary legislative procedure[49], or one of the special legislative procedures. In the first case noted, the adoption moment can be identified in the light of the time of the signing of the document by the president of the European Parliament and by the president of the Council, as is apparent from Article 297 TFEU. The same article states that, in case we are talking about a directive which is adopted in accordance with a special legislative procedure, then it shall be signed by the president of the institution which adopted it. The two types of legislative procedure are determined in accordance with the provisions of article 289 TFEU, the treaty being also the instrument by which the practical manner of their functioning is explained[50].

As mentioned, the next moment having important meaning is the date the directive enters into force, which we will not explain further, as the relevant elements were already mentioned in the present study.

Hereinafter we will discuss the third important moment we mentioned, respectively the transposition date or, if we want to be very precise, the transposition deadline. Each directive states such a deadline, which is calculated from the date of its entering into force, and, according to recent practice, the rule is that it shall not be longer than two years [51], but this period can, obviously, be much shorter[52]. The duration of this deadline is the period available to the member states to adopt all measures necessary so the directive may enter into force in the countries of the Union, respectively to adopt a law which would transpose it, but also any other national measures which aim to reach the goals set by the directive. By the expiration of the deadline, the member states must send the Commission the text for the national transposition measures[53], which integrate the dispositions of the directive into the national legislation and serve to achieve the aims imposed by it. The Commission verifies that the measures are complete and fulfill all necessary conditions for achieving the desired result.

If, after its examination, the Commission finds that the answer is "no", it may initiate the EU law infringement proceedings and may start an action against that country before the Court of Justice of the EU (the failure to enforce its decision may lead to a new conviction, which could generate penalties). As it becomes clear from what we just mentioned, a total lack of care from the member state is not required, the Commission may start an infringement procedure if the directives were not transposed correctly, such being sufficient reason in this regard[54].

Regarding the obligations which the directive recipient, namely the member state, has to fulfill in this determined period, various controversies appeared in practice, the Court of Justice being the one which helped in establishing an unified practice, at least regarding certain aspects. An edifying example in this respect is the decision given in the case C-129/96 (Inter-Environnement Wallonie ASBL vs. Région wallonne)[55], through which it is stated that through this deadline, indicated by the directive, the aim is "mainly to give the member states the time needed to adopt the measures needed for the transposition, thus the said states cannot be held responsible for not transposing the directive in the national legal order before the expiry of the deadline granted"[56]. Regarding the states obligations, it is noted that they shall adopt, during the transposition deadline "the measures needed to ensure the fulfilling of the goal stated by the directive..."[57]. Therefore, although the states shall not be subject to the obligation to adopt such measures before the expiry of the time limit for transposition into national law, the Court shows that "within this period, the member states should be able to refrain from adopting provisions which could seriously compromise the result stated by the directive[58]. We believe that this last requirement is natural, whereas we are of the opinion that the activity to be carried out at national level does not have to take into account just the adoption of legal acts, the target being the implementation of legal acts adopted pursuant to the requirements of the directive.[59]

All these are components of the second phase of the legislative process, that is the implementing phase for the legislation, towards which the European Commission manifests a permanent interest, there being in place even a monitoring mechanism in this regard. Regarding directives, yearly the Commission publishes a report evaluating the results the member states achieved in regard to essential aspects of applying EU law and presenting the main evolutions of that year. The report[60] is also sent to the European parliament and to the national authorities, the most recent such document containing the analysis made during the year 2017.

As mentioned, the Commissin checks if the countries belonging to the European Union communicate the transposition measures and if they transpose fully, correctly and timely the provisions of the directives into the national legislation. However, delayed transposition of directives by the member states of the European Union "remains a problem, due to the persistence of which citizens and businesses can not enjoy the tangible benefits of the European Union legislation"[61]. After 2016, as a result of the publication of the annual report in December, the Union has set the objective of deficit reduction of the transposition into national law at 1%, an objective we deem, at least in the current context, though extremely beneficial, as being very bold.

For the member states the transposition is, also, a subject involving multiple challenges, since they have to face the most varied legal situations, linked to this operation, at the conceptual level, but especially at the procedural one[62]. A complex example in this regard, in Romania, refers to the transposition of the Directive 2004/38/EC[63] of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States, amending Regulation (EEC) No 1612/68 and repealing Directives 64/221/EEC, 68/360/EEC, 72/194/EEC, 73/148/EEC, 75/34/EEC, 75/35/EEC, 90/364/EEC, 90/365/EEC and 93/96/EEC (Text with EEA relevance).[64]

From the full name of the directive we just mentioned, another classification of directives can be made, some having the purpose of introducing new provisions, in a field which was not yet the object of a regulation, others of completing or amending already implemented normative acts. The list can go on with those containing provisions like repeals or establishing provisions titled "framework regulations". Also, in some cases the directive could cover, for reasons of clarity and coherence, two distinct normative acts in the shape of a new regulation.

Next, we will dedicate our study to an analysis of the main scope of Directive 2004/38/EC, concentrating our particular efforts on the free movement of spouses, in the larger context of provisions concerning the free movement of persons.

2.4. Elements of principle on the free movement of persons

The free movement of persons is one of the four basic freedoms of the European union law, together with the free movement of goods, services and capital. According to rules established by the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU), this "in practice refers to... the free movement having as recipients the workers, a freedom which Bernard Teyssié considers to be a fundamental right which national courts have to defend"[65].

The main grounds of this subject matter, part of the primary legislation of the Union, is represented by article 45 TFEU, which we cite in the following, for coherency reasons: "(1) Freedom of movement for workers shall be secured within the Union./ (2) Such freedom of movement shall entail the abolition of any discrimination based on nationality between workers of the Member States as regards employment, remuneration and other conditions of work and employment./ (3) It shall entail the right, subject to limitations justified on grounds of public policy, public security or public health:(a) to accept offers of employment actually made;/ (b) to move freely within the territory of Member States for this purpose;/ (c) to stay in a Member State for the purpose of employment in accordance with the provisions governing the employment of nationals of that State laid down by law, regulation or administrative action;/ (d) to remain in the territory of a Member State after having been employed in that State, subject to conditions which shall be embodied in regulations to be drawn up by the Commission./ (4) The provisions of this Article shall not apply to employment in the public service."

These provisions, fundamental for the field comprising the scope of our study, must be interpreted in the broader context instituted by Title IV of the said treaty and corroborated with the normative acts which govern the field of freedom of movement of the workers, taking into account the categories of beneficiaries, the rights they gain correlative to this freedom, but also the exceptions which can appear. In addition to all these mentioned, we have to take into account the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of the European Union, which is essentially relevant from the perspective of defining the fundamental notions with which the subject matter of free movement of people operates. The diversity and complexity of practical situations that may appear in this field, of great interest and highly dynamic, is reflected both at the level of the regulatory framework, as well as the jurisprudential one.

In order to advance in our analysis, we deem it essential to underline the distinction "between this freedom of movement, relating exclusively to workers, and the freedom of movement in the Union space that is regulated by the Treaty as a right benefiting all citizens of the member states"[66]. We will concentrate on the first case, where "the person, citizen of a member state of the European union, moves on the territory of another state with the stated purpose of accepting an offer of employment actually made"[67] and not the status of the free movement right, based upon which such "movement takes place with any other purpose in mind".

2.5. The main categories of beneficiaries of the freedom of movement

The level of primary legislation imposes, in addition to the category of employees, which we have already indicated, other categories of recipients of this freedom of movement - a fundamental element of the internal market and the European construction in the form in which it is known today.

First of all, article 48 TFEU discusses, in the first paragraph, the migrant employees or those self-employed, to which it adds the persons in their care. The scope of potential recipients is extended, by the provisions of article 49 the second paragraph to include in this category companies, too[68]. Although for a complete and thorough understanding of the beneficiaries of freedom of movement each category should be the scope of a distinct analysis (many of the basic notions were not defined in any treaty or the secondary legislation), given the main scope of the present study, we will limit ourselves to a few essential notes regarding the concept of "worker" which is used, as we have shown, even in the primary law of the European Union.

Currently, the term "worker" is an autonomous concept of the European Union law, as the Court "insisted since the start"[69], with the purpose of avoiding the situation in which each state could offer its own interpretation of such a concept, "according to whim and frustrate the treaty's objectives"[70]. 'The Court has assumed the final authority to define its meaning and scope and self-conferred a <<hermeneutic monopoly>> to counteract any unilateral restrictions" of the member states, with regard to rules on freedom of movement"[71]. In summary, according to the Luxembourg Court, any person who carries out genuine and effective service tasks is a worker, insignificant activities being excepted, when they can be considered "purely marginal and ancillary"[72] . The need for a relationship of subordination[73] is the element that distinguishes economic activity under article 45, from independent economic activities, such as the creation and management of businesses, companies[74]. Thus, the worker is the person who performs, under somebody's leadership, a genuine and effective work, for which he is paid. We also add that we should not forget that the meaning of this notion is not always identical, thus having to pay attention, in our interpretation, to the legal context in which it is used. We deem that such claims shouldn't have been overlooked, being essential for understanding the subject we discuss and having a direct connection to it.

In accordance with article 46 TFEU "The European Parliament and the Council shall, acting in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure and after consulting the Economic and Social Committee, issue directives or make regulations setting out the measures required to bring about freedom of movement for workers, as defined in Article 45…". This provision has resulted in the adoption, over time, of numerous regulations and directives applicable in this matter.

Currently, an example of legislation that strengthened and codified a significant number of regulations is Directive 2004/38 on freedom of movement and residence within member states for Union citizens and their family members[75]. Besides strengthening and codifying, another innovation of this directive "consisted in the introduction of the right of permanent residence for nationals of the European union and their families, after years of uninterrupted legal residence in another Member State"[76]. Regarding regulations, we talk about Regulation no. 492/2011[77], its main scope being the main rights a national worker of the member states can acquire, both for himself and for their family members (the concept of national is clarified by Law no. 157/2005 for the ratification of the Accession Treaty of Romania to the European Union[78], in Article 3: "by national of a Member State we mean the natural or legal person having the citizenship, respectively the nationality of that State, in accordance with the domestic legislation of said state").

Given the above, it is clear that the analysis of this subject is susceptible of being done several ways, but regardless of the variant we choose, we have to relate the study of free movement of persons "both to the primary instruments of European communitary law (the founding treaties and the amending ones, including Romania's Accession treaty to the European Union)… as well as to the derivative instruments of the same European communitary law"[79]. Also we'd like to mention, as a supplementary information, the existence of a transition regime regarding the freedom of movement of persons, which must be taken into account - this is still currently applying, but just in the case of Croatian workers (who joined in July 2013), until June 2020. According to specialized doctrine, the workers right to freedom of movement was "nuanced in relation to the 2004 extension, when ten Central and Eastern European states joined"[80]; this situation was a premiere, in the sense that the European Union admitted new members "refusing them, at the same time, the immediate right to benefit from one of the four fundamental liberties"[81]. This transition regime granted the already member states the right to choose for the "delayed" application (for up to seven years) of the full freedom of movement rights - obviously, referring to workers from the new states. Without getting into detail regarding this transition regime, we note that it ended on April 30, 2011, for the ten states, and in the case of our country and Bulgaria, it ceased to be effective on December 31, 2013[82].

Returning to the list of the main categories of beneficiaries - from the perspective of the derivative legislation, very relevant is the Directive 2004/38 on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the member states. Starting with the directive title, one notices the outlining of another category of persons susceptible to be recipients of such freedom: family members (of salaried migrant workers or of self-employed ones). What this notion means is clarified right in the text of the directive, namely article 2, which clarifies also the meaning of the notions "Union citizen", "host member state"[83]. Therefore, in accordance with article 2 of the directive specified, "member of the family means: (a)/ the spouse; (b) the partner with whom the Union citizen has contracted a registered partnership, on the basis of the legislation of a Member State, if the legislation of the host Member State treats registered partnerships as equivalent to marriage and in accordance with the conditions laid down in the relevant legislation of the host Member State;/ (c) the direct descendants who are under the age of 21 or are dependents and those of the spouse or partner as defined in point (b);/ (d) the dependent direct relatives in the ascending line and those of the spouse or partner as defined in point (b)." Article 3 establishes the recipients of the present directive and takes into account: any citizen of the Union, as well as the members of their family (according to the definition in article 2 we presented), who moves or has their residence in a member state, different than the one whose national he/she is. In this context it is necessary to emphasize that the above mentioned must be understood in conjunction with article 7, paragraph 4 of Directive, under which: "…only the spouse, the registered partner provided for in Article 2(2)(b) and dependent children shall have the right of residence as family members of a Union citizen meeting the conditions under 1(c) above. Article 3(2) shall apply to his/her dependent direct relatives in the ascending lines and those of his/her spouse or registered partner"[84].

2.6. The spouse, family member and beneficiary of freedom of movement. Legal perspective

To achieve the aim of our research, we will continue to restrict the scope of this study to one of the "subcategories" of beneficiaries of the freedom of movement, established explicitly through the legislative acts belonging to the secondary legislation of the European Union - the spouse, family member of the migrant worker or self-employed.

For starters, we will mention a few aspects highlighted by the European Commission, through a communication[85], which we deem relevant for our topic. Regarding Directive 2004/38/CE, which simplified and strengthened the right to free movement and residence for the Union citizens and their family members - so, implicitly, for spouses - the Commission reminds that it "must be interpreted and applied in accordance with the fundamental rights, especially the right to respecting private and family life, the principle of nondiscrimination, children's rights and the right to an efficient recourse[86]". All these are guaranteed by the European Charter on Human Rights, as reflected in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, but also in the case law of the Court in Luxembourg[87]. For spouses, we deem that the possibility to move and, eventually, reside together is a sine qua non condition for the respect of private and family life; we do not deny that this might happen even if the spouse having the capacity of worker is not joined by the other spouse, but the decision should belong exclusively to the two, and they should also have the ability to change it at any time.

Also, the Commission highlights the fact that the aforementioned directive is applied only to Union citizens who are moving or have their residence in another member state (not the one they are citizens of), as well as to their family members who accompany them or join them. An example we find illuminating about this is: "X, citizen of a third party country, lives for a while now in a host member state. She wishes for her husband, citizen of a third party country, to join her." Could the two benefit from the rights bestowed by the directive, even if they are not citizens of the Union? The answer is, obviously, no, "the respective member state having full rights to impose norms regarding the right of spouses of citizens from a third party country, they themselves citizens of a third party state, to join them." We add that we don't, thus, deny the fact that other instruments of European Union law could be applicable, just that in this case we take into account strictly the provisions of the above mentioned directive. Maintaining the same line, we want to add that although the freedom of movement, respective spouses freedom of movement, is a fundamental element for the juridical order of the European Union, and derogation from this principle is of strict interpretation[88], it does not represent, in any case, an unlimited right, and beneficiaries have a series of obligation -we will not mention them in detail, but we need to say they involve respecting the laws of the host country.

Returning to the category of spouses in the meaning of the normative framework set in place by Directive 2004/38, we provide that, "in principle, valid marriages contracted anywhere in the world must be recognized[89]". Those must be separated from the forced marriages, "where the consent of one of the parties is missing or not respected," since they don't fall within the scope of protection established by international law or European Union law. In turn, forced marriages must be differentiated by arranged marriages, which, according to the European Commission, are finalized with the full and freely expressed consent of the parties, when the marriage is contracted, even if a third party is involved, who, generally, has the main role in choosing the partner. All these must not be confused with what is called convenience marriages, according to the directive - "union types contracted exclusively in order to benefit from freedom of movement and residence"[90], marriages which grant the spouses rights they couldn't benefit from any other way. We notice that this type of marriage fulfills all the features to be an abuse of right which, as defined by the directive, "can be defined as an artificial behaviour, adopted strictly with the purpose of gaining the right to freedom of movement and residence, in accordance with communitary law that, in spite of compliance with conditions set out in communitary norms, does not correspond to the goal of such provisions". As it is clear from the above mentioned, in order to be in the presence of an abuse of right - in our case, the convenience marriage - it is not necessary to violate the provisions of the European Union in the strictest sense, the goal being that it must have the "illicit" characteristics, being opposed to the provisions established by law. The same way, the definition of convenience marriages can be extended, finding applicability in case of other types of unions contracted only with the purpose to benefit from the right of free movement and residence. As an example, we add: partnerships, fictitious adoption, "the situation when a EU citizen declares that he is the father of a child from a third party state, so that the child and its mother should benefit from citizenship and residence right, while knowing he is not the child's father and not being willing to assume parental responsibility".[91]

Similar to the rights member states have in regards to protecting themselves against abuse, in the case of convenience marriages, they have the right to adopt certain internal measures, which should not affect the effectiveness of the Union law -through provisions that impinge on the rights of citizens, for example, by stipulating different provisions based upon the nationality criterion.

The judgment given in the ECHR Case Alilouch El Abasse versus the Netherlands is representative for another right the member states have regarding recognizing marriages, respectively that they can choose not to recognize "polygamous marriages, contracted in accordance with the law of a third party state, but which might contravene to the internal juridical order". The directive which is the scope of our analysis also allows states "to investigate individual cases in which there is a well-founded suspicion of abuse of law[92]", but the European Union law "prohibits systematic checks"[93]. For the purposes of limiting the abuse which may be committed by the Member States, this time, the Commission has identified a number of criteria by which the respective state can appreciate, according to the share in which they check out, if they find themselves or not in the case of an abuse of right. Here are a few criteria which can suggest the uncorrupted, from a legal standpoint, relationship between spouses: the spouse who is citizen of a third party state wouldn't have any issue in obtaining the right of residence in their own name or has previously already resided, legally, in the member state of the citizen; the two have a long term relationship; the two own a common domicile/form a single household for a long time; the two already entered into a legal/financial long term agreement, with joint responsibilities; the marriage is long lasting.

[87] As an example, we mention The Court Ruling of April 29, 2004, in the joint cases C-482/01 and C-493/01, Georgios Orfanopoulos et all and Raffaele Oliveri vs. Land Baden-Württemberg, ECLI:EU:C:2003:455.

[88] The restriction of the right of entry and right of residence can be done for reasons of public order, public safety or public health, according to Chapter VI of the directive -which is the scope of our discussion. From the point of view of case law, we mention the Court Decision of July 10, 2008 (request for ordering a preliminary decision issued by Dâmbovița Tribunal - the first preliminary question formulated by a Romanian Court) - Ministry of Administration and Interior - General Directorate of Passports Bucharest/ versus Gheorghe Jipa.

3. Conclusions

Given the above mentioned, we can say that an evaluation of the evolution of normative acts at the level of the European Union is a painstaking activity, for which we must keep in mind not just the "quantity" of a certain normative act, but also elements pertaining to the causes of adopting such an act, other criteria like "adjacent factors... like the number of preliminary rulings regarding a certain directive or actions regarding its validity"[94]. Thus, our opinion is that in such an analysis, we should prioritize the "qualitative-historical[95]" criterion, such a study being able to offer accurate results for directives which have already been in force for a while, and all these, while taking into account various relevant aspects, which could be reflected in the juridical context, for each case.

The complexity of the particulars of the European Union legal order is reflected, as we tried to show through this analysis, in the matter of the dynamics of its normative acts, both from the perspective of their adoption and their applicability. From the point of view of the second line of thinking, that of the implementing the derivative legislation of the European Union, we took into account several elements of substantive law particular to the freedom of movement of persons, particularly spouses, mainly from the perspective of the provisions of Directive 2004/38/CE, without limitation.

Without being able to say we exhausted all aspects correlative to our subject, we are convinced that the present study can be a solid start point for expanding on this subject in a later research. In this regard, we suggest that one must take into account not only the possible changes which are to take place at the level of normative acts, according to the evolution of situations which can involve delicate aspects from a legal standpoint, like Brexit, but also the future guidelines of the Luxembourg Court in this regard.

THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE ROMANIAN CONSTITUTIONAL COURT TO ESTABLISH THE RELATION BETWEEN THE RIGHT TO PROPERTY AND THE RIGHT TO A HEALTHY ENVIRONMENT

Ramona DUMINICĂ[*]
Adriana PÎRVU[]

Abstract

The present study aims to establish the relation between the right to property and the right to a healthy environment from the perspective of the jurisprudence of the Romanian Constitutional Court.

The relation between these two fundamental rights is emphasized by the limitations brought to the attributes of the right to property by the exigencies of the environmental protection. Nowadays, in the context of a more and more polluted environment, property rights are becoming more and more pronounced to circumscribe their attributes of environmental significance.

The study starts from the presentation of the environmental limitations of the exercise of the property right established by the constitutional provisions and continues with an analysis of the main decisions of the Constitutional Court pronounced in this matter.

Our analysis allows us to conclude that the right to a healthy environment contributes significantly to the strengthening of property rights by reference to the requirements of individual welfare and those of the survival of humans and species.

Keywords: the right to a healthy environment, the right to property, limitations, Romanian Constitution, the jurisprudence of the Romanian Constitutional Court.

1. Introduction

The judicial literature[1] considers that property is the basis of the development of human society, being the premise for each economic activity. Over time, this has been treated as a fundamental issue, as well as of the collective existence. It has provided the possibility for individuals to acces and to appropriate natural assets or created by their activities. This possibility, however, has determined the man to gradually give up his symbiosis with the natural environment and to begin a struggle against the nature, permanently seeking to master it. It is an undeniable fact that the miraculous balance of nature and harmony between ecosystems is in danger. One must not ignore the fact that the success of the economic development, remarkable, has affected this balance. Paradoxically, in the age in which the man has became the "master of the planet", he realized that he cannot escape the "laws of the nature" and that he entirely depends on the natural environment.

By referring to this new order, the contemporaneity insists on the contemplation of people's mission of being the guardians of nature and of finding the much-desired balance between economic development and the protection of the environment. For the achievement of this mission, a very important and difficult role was attributed to the law.

The emergence of environmental norms has not been achieved without confrontation but has been supported by a strong consensus that finds its rationale in the categorical imperative of surviving spaces, species, and even in the imperative of human survival. Thus, the statement of certain norms for the environmental protection has established an interaction between the right of individuals to a healthy environment and the traditional right to property.

This interaction has developed and transformed into a complex relation, of mutual conditions and interdependence. Through environmental protection – seen as a major public interest – it is achieved a balance between the individual rights and the general exigences of life.

2. About the limitations of the performance of the right to private property in favor of environmental protection

The right to property is considered as the most important patrimonial right. It represents the fundament for all the other real rights and secures the means of life necessary to an individual. This importance of the right to property for individuals and society has led to its regulation at an international, European, communitarian and national level[2].

In Romania, the regulation of the right to property has had an accelerated evolution after 1990 regarding its statement as fundamental right and as civil subjective law. Starting from the fact that the right to property is the only real right providing to its owner the complete performance of the attributes of an asset, were stated means of restitution, restoration and establishment of the private property, as well as means for its protection[3].

Currently, Art 44, Para 2 Line 1 of the revised Constitution states the right to property, mentioning that "Private property is guaranteed and protected equally by the law, regardless of its owner". The second thesis of the article mentions that the limitations and the content of the right to property shall be established by the law. Para 4 states that no one shall be expropriated, except on grounds of public utility, established according to the law, against just compensation paid in advance.

Regarding the Romanian Civil Code, it defines property in Art 555 Para 1 as being "the right of the owver to exclusively, absolutely and continuous possess, use and dispose of an asset, according to the law".

Starting from these provisions, the judicial literature defined the right to property as being "the real right which offers its owner the attributes of possession, use and disposal (jus possidendi, jus fruendi and jus abutendi) of a private asset, attributes which may be exclusively, absolutely and continuously performed within the material and legal limits"[4].

The statement and guarantee of human rights do not exclude the possibility of their limitation. In this regard, it has been shown that "the existence of certain unconditioned rights, theoretically cannot be accepted within a constitutional democratic system. The absence of the limits and conditions for performance stated by laws, constitutions or international judicial instruments can lead to arbitrary or abuse of rights, because it would not allow the differentiation between legal and illegal behavior. The existence of certain limits for the performance of some fundamental rights is justified by the constitutional protection or by the protection through international legal instruments of important human or state values"[5].

Both the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as well as the two International Covenants of 1966 admit the existence of limitations regarding the exercise of certain rights. This possibility is also found in Art 53 of the Romanian Constitution restricting some rights and fundamental freedoms, but only as exceptions, temporary and conditional, without affecting the very substance of the right[6].

The reasons which could generate the limitation of the exercise of certain rights are of strict interpretation. These are stated by Art 53 of the Constitution and aims: the defense of national security, of public order, health, or morals, of the citizens' rights and freedoms; conducting a criminal investigation; preventing the consequences of a natural calamity, disaster, or an extremely severe catastrophe.

From the constitutional provisions, there are three essential conditions, which must be observed cumulatively in order to be able to restrict the exercise of certain rights, namely: the limitation can be stated only by the law, reasoned by the existence of situations identified by norms, aiming the public interest and the protection of the fundamental rights; the limitation shall be proportionate with the situation generating it; the limitation shall be temporary and not harm the substance of the right or of the fundamental freedom[7].

The provisions of Art 53 must be interpreted in relation to Art 44 Para 1 second thesis of the Constitution, according to which the content and limits of the right to property are stated by the law, as well as in relation to Art 44 Para 7 which states that the right to property compels to the observance of duties relating to environmental protection and insurance of neighborliness, as well as of other duties incumbent upon the owner.

The legal fundament of the limitation is completed by Art 620 of the Civil Code, which states that: "(1) The law may be the limit of the performance of the right to property either for a public interest, or a private one. (2) The legal limits for private interest can be temporarily altered or removed through the parties' agreement. for the opposability to third parties it is necessary the fulfilment of the advertising formalities required by the law".

The content of Art 44 Para 7 of the Constitution is reiterated by Art 603 of the Civil Code. Art 603 states a legal limit, having as starting point the public interest of environmental protection. According to Art 1 of the G.E.O No 195/2005 on environmental protection states that "it represents a major objective of public interest".

The judicial literature8, regarding the obligations for environmental protection, has considered them as extremely complex, being adopted "based on the principles and strategic elements leading to sustainable development" (Art 1 Para 1 of the G.E.O No 195/2005). Acording to Art 6 of the Ordinance, the environmental protection represents an obligation of the central and local public administration authorities, as well as an obligation for all natural and legal persons.

Though both the constitutional text, as well as Art 603 included in Chapter 3 of the Civil Code (Legal limits for the right to private property), Section 1 (Legal limits) use the term "tasks" for environmental protection, we appreciate along other theoreticians[9] that these norms "establish a limitation in the performance of the right to property, not in the meaning of as hindrance, as an obligation of not to do, but in the meaning of the legal obligation of to do". More specifically, the owner has the obligation to comply with the tasks on environmental protection.

Under the conditions stated by Art 626 of the Civil Code, "if the public order or good morals are not violated", there are possible environmental limitations of the right to property through legal acts.

Beyond the limitations of the right to property stated by the Constitution, the Civil Code and the G.E.O No 195/2005, we find important limitations stated by other special normative acts, among which we mention: Law No 50/1991 regarding the authorization of construction works, the General Regulation of Urban Planning approved by Government Decision No 625/1996, the Water Law No 107/1996, Law No 350/2001 on spatial planning and urban planning, Law No 46/2008 on the Forest Code, Law No 18/1991 on land resources etc. As an example, we enlist the most known limitations on the right to private property stated by special laws: limitations of the right to property through land-use measures; restrictions on the exercise of the property right through urbanism plans; limitations of the property right through the protection of historical monuments; limitations of property ownership attributes for priority archaeological interest areas; special expropriation for ecological public utility; legal servitude of the protection and security of energy capacities; property rights limitations resulting from the protection of water resources; property rights limitations on the protection of soil, subsoil and terrestrial ecosystems; protected area regime and property ownership attributes; limiting the use of goods through environmental protection requirements; servitude of the hunting ground etc.[10].

In this context of amplifying the limitations of the right to property for environmental protection, the concept of property is being redefined. Thus, we are talking about an environmental property set up to describe situations where purchases or attributions of property rights are made, in order to improve the protection of the environment and natural resources[11].

The notion of Environmental Property has been established by common law specialists and it is considered as a component of the evolution of the concept of property. This concept has emerged simultaneously with the international affirmation and constitutionalization of the right to environment, so it arose the issue of ecological exigencies in the performance of this right in relation with the other fundamental rights in general, and especially with the right to property. The declared purpose of the notion of environmental property is that of establishing the situations in which a property title has been granted or acquired for the environmental protection or its preservation[12].

3. The contribution of the Romanian Constitutional Court in the establishment of the relation between the right to property and the exigencies of the environmental protection

Over time, in accordance with the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, the Constitutional Court has established through its own jurisprudence that the right to property is not absolute, thus it can be limited through legal provisions.

Notified with requests for non-constitutionality of different norms aiming the environment protection, invoking the violation of Art 44 of the Constitution referring to the right to private property, the Constitutional Court has mentioned that the legislator has the competence to establish an appropriate legal framework for the performance of the attributes of the right to property, without harming the general or particular legitimate interests of other subjects of law, thus stating a few reasonable limitations of its performance[13].

As mentioned by the judicial literature[14], in accordance with the principle of proportionality, the limitations brought to the right to property shall be reasonable. It means that those limitations shall have to be appropriate for guaranteeing this fundamental right.

Also, by applying the principle of proportionality in the area of the protection of the right to property, the Court has stated that it refers to the compliance with the obligations in the area of the environment protection, obligations established for general interest. Thus, the state is authorized to establish norms for the protection of agriculture, silviculture, domestic animals etc. The Court has also underlined that these norms are constitutional for as long as the obligations stated are reasonable.

In this regard, as an example, it has been stated in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court that the natural and legal persons have certain obligations established by the law in the area of the environment protection and insuring this fundamental right and that these obligations "cannot be seen as violations of fundamental rights (…) such as the right to property"[15].

In shaping the relation between the right to property and the right to a healthy environment, it has relevance and worth being debated about, the Decision No 824/7 July 2008[16] on the exception of unconstitutionality of Art 71 of the G.E.O No 195/2005 on environmental protection.

More specifically, by analyzing the exception of unconstitutionality, the Court has stated that its author claimed, mainly, the unjustified limitation of the right to property stated by Art 44 Para 1 of the Constitution. The invoked reason was that the criticized legal text forbids and sanctions the change of the destination of the lands set as green spaces and/or as such foreseen in the urbanization documentation, the reduction of their surfaces or their relocation, irrespective of their legal regime.

The Court stated that the provisions of Art 71 of the G.E.O No 195/2005 have been included in the current regulation by Art 1, Point 1 of the G.E.O No 114/2007, adopted based on Art 115 Para 4 of the Constitution. In the issuance of this act, as stated by its preamble, it has been taken into account the "the degradation of the green spaces on the territory of Romanian localities, caused by their destruction as a result of the development of economic and social activities", aiming "the improvement of the environmental features and life quality by increasing the green areas in localities", the protection and sustainable development of life standards of their inhabitants.

Therefore, the Court stated that "the protection and guaranteeing the right to a healthy environment, stated by Art 35 of the Constitution, represent the purpose of Art 71 of the G.E.O No 195/2005 on environmental protection". Moreover, the Constitutional Court emphasized that the right to property invoked by Art 44 of the Constitution is not absolute, aspect continuously emphasized in its jurisprudence.

Moreover, the Court mentioned that "the limitation of the exercise of the right to property (…) also has a moral and social justification, given that the rigorous compliance with these norms represents a major objective for the protection of the environment, thus of the existing green areas, having a direct connection with the level of public health, which represents a value of national interest".

Therefore, the Court has dismissed as unreasoned the request for unconstitutionality according to which the examined legal provisions are contradictory with Art 44 Para 1-2 and Art 53of the Constitution, regarding the right to property and the limitation of the exercise of certain rights or freedoms, because "the measure ordered by the criticized legal text does not harm the substance of the right, establishing only an objective and reasonable limitation, in accordance with the fundamental principles"[17].

Another litigation through which the Constitutional Court has contributed in shaping the relation between the right to property and the exigencies of the environmental protection is the Decision of the Constitutional Court No 834/2016 – the exception for unconstitutionality of Art 10, Art 17 and Art 51 of the Law No 46/2008 on the Forest Code, as well as of Point 42 of the annex to the Law 46/2008. The authors of the exception for unconstitutionality have claimed that the criticized provisions are unconstitutional because they violate the right to property, taking into consideration that these provisions compel the natural persons owing a forestry fund to provide guard services through a forest district.

As effect of the examination of the exception for unconstitutionality, the Court has stated that "according to Art 44 Para 1 of the Constitution, the content and limits of the right to property shall be established by law"[18]. Also, the court underlined, by maintaining its previous point of view[19], that "based on these constitutional provisions, the legislator has the competence to establish the legal framework for the performance of the right to property, within the principle sense given by the Constitution, so that it does not collide with the general or particular legitimate interests of other subjects of law, thus stating certain reasonable limitations in its capitalization, as a guaranteed subjective right".

The Court also mentioned that the constitutional provision allows the legislator that, in considering certain specific interests, to state rules harmonizing the incidence of other fundamental rights than the property right in a systematic interpretation of the Constitution, so that they will not be suppressed by the regulation of the property right. Not least, the Court has mentioned that Art 44 Para 1 of the fundamental law allows the establishment of legal limitations in the performance of the property right, as constantly stated by its jurisprudence[20], with the purpose of protecting the public interests, such as the interest in sanitation and public health, the social, cultural-historical, urbanistic and architectural interests etc., with the condition that these legal limitations do not harm the very substance of the property right[21].

Regarding the provisions of the Law No 46/2008, the Court has stated that Title 2 and 3 refer to strict rules concerning the obligations of the owner of a forestry fund, regardless of the form of ownership, on the obligation of compliance with the forestry regime and the rules on environmental protection, of forestry arrangements, as well as other obligations. These obligations are an application, legislatively, of the constitutional provisions of Art 44 Para 7, according to which "the right to property compels to respect for the duties relating to environmental protection and assuring neighborliness, as well as to other duties binding on the owner in accordance with the law or as is customary".

Also, the Court has added that in "the virtue of the fact that the forest represents an asset of national interest, the legislator has established a strict legislative framework in the area of the content of the property right over it"[22]. The legislator has established in this respect the content of the property right over the forest/forestry fund, especially for a correct application of Art 44 Para 1 and 7 of the Constitution. Thus, the measures stated by the legal provisions are obligations imposed for the owner in considering the asset in order to insure the sustainable development of the forest/forestry fund.

As a conclusion, given the aimed legitimate purpose, the Court has rejected the exception for unconstitutionality and stated that "that the special regime governing the use attribute, including the obligation for the owners to conclude the management contract/forestry service, is appropriate, necessary and proportionate, respecting a fair balance between the general interests of the company and the particular interests of right-holders property"[23].

Constantly, the Court's jurisprudence[24], that the imposition of standards in terms of urban planning and spatial planning, as well as ensuring security in construction, is a general interest. Thus, the legislator may adopt necessary and customary laws in the field of construction in order to determine the use of the goods in accordance with the general interest, without the property being lipped by its substance.

By way of example, we present the considerations grounding the Decision of the Constitutional Court No 469/2011 regarding the dismissal of the exception for unconstitutionality of Art 47 Para 5 of the Law No 350/2001 regarding urban and territorial planning[25].

In this case, the author of the objection of unconstitutionality argued that the provisions of Art 47 Para 5 are unconstitutional insofar as they permit the modification of the rules on land occupation and the location of the constructions and the related facilities through a zonal urban plan, without the consent of the neighbors affected by the new changes, "which limits the exploitation of the property right as guaranteed by Art 44 Para 7 of the Romanian Constitution".

As effect of the examination of the exception for unconstitutionality, the Court has stated that Art 44 Para 1 of the Constitution states the possibility of establishing legal limits for the performance of the property right, for the protection of certain public interests: for general or fiscal economic interest, in the public interest, in the interests of sanitation and public health, in the social, historical, urban and architectural interest etc., with the condition that these legal limitations do not harm the substance of the property right. According to the criticized legal text, the Local Urbanistic Plan establishes regulations regarding the rules on the building regime, the function of the area, the maximum allowed height, the utilization rate of the land, the percentage of the territorial occupation, the removal of buildings from alignment and the distances to the lateral and posterior limits of the plot, the architectural characteristics of the buildings, the admissible materials. Under these conditions, the Court has stated that the "legislator has the competence to establish the legal framework for the performance of the property right, so that it will not collide with the general or particular legitimate interests of other subjects of law"[26] and has concluded that "through the criticized regulation, the legislator only expressed these imperatives, within the limits and according to its constitutional competence, the criticized text not being contradictory with the invoked constitutional provisions"[27].

4. Conclusions

The jurisprudence mentioned by way of example represents a proof of the contribution brought in time by the Constitutional Court to the definition of the relation between the property right and the exigencies of environmental protection.

The norms regarding the environmental protection limiting the performance of the property right are seen in different areas, such as: water, soil, subsoil and terrestrial ecosystems' protection, in the area of protecting the human settlements etc., but it is important to mention that these limitations are accepted and considered as legitimate only if they do not harm the existence of the right. Also, as it is emphasized by the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence, these limitations of the property right must be reasonable, namely appropriate for guaranteeing this fundamental right.

THE TERM OF "RELEVANT MARKET", AS ELEMENT OF DOMINANT POSITION PROVIDED BY ART. 102 OF THE TREATY ON THE FUNCTIONING OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

1. Terminology issues

The term of relevant market was used for the first time in the Sherman Act of 1890, condemning monopolies or monopoly attempts which can lead to higher prices and lower production than under normal competition conditions.

Currently, the term of relevant market is defined by art. 102 TFEU (former art. 82 EC), as a primary source of the European Union law[1], which provides that any abuse by one or more undertakings of a dominant position within the internal market or in a substantial part of it shall be prohibited as incompatible with the internal market in so far as it may affect trade between Member States.

In what concerns the term of undertakings, we should note that, although the term is used by art. 101 para. 1 TFEU, a definition of the term cannot be found. The EU courts and authorities in the field of competition adopted a broad concept of the term. In case Hofner, the European Court of Justice noted that the term of enterprise covers any entity engaged in an economic activity, regardless of its legal status and the way it is financed.[2]

In essence, art. 102 TFEU concerns the control of market power by either one company or a number of companies under certain conditions. Within this regulation, not the market power itself is prohibited. What is condemnable in the TFEU view is the abuse of power in the market, therefore, the intention of the European lawmaker is to encourage competition and, in this way, the most efficient participants break apart from others in the market as a result of consumers' choices in relation to the goods or services proposed.

This article aims to analyze the term of relevant market, as well as the term of market power, determined by the dominant position of a participant to the economic life.

The relevant market is defined as the place where demand and supply of products or services, interchangeable with each other, are confronting. In the economic literature, the relevant market can also be called pertinent market, reference market, sectoral market etc. Global market and relevant market can be distinguished locally, nationally, regionally.

Defined as the place of confrontation between the demand of supply of products and services which are considered by the buyers as interchangeable with each other, but not interchangeable with other goods or services offered, the relevant market is the place where effective competition between economic operators takes place.

Therefore, the term of relevant market is particularly complex, being characterized by three fundamental dimensions: product (service) market, geographic market, both in close connection, as well as time aspect. The dominant position held by an economic agent within the domestic market, position that can affect trade between the Member States, must be assessed in connection with the three elements referred above.

The definition assigned to the term of product market is in close connection with the term of "product". Product analysis must take into account both demand and supply issues. On the demand side, products must be interchangeable, from the point of view of the buyer. The interchangeable nature of products, from the demand perspective, involves checking cross elasticity of product[3]. It is deemed that cross elasticity of product is high if the increase of the price of the product makes a great number of buyers choose another product of the same type. The existence of cross elasticity reveals that the products are, actually, part of the same market.

From the perspective of the supply, the market includes only sellers who manufacture the relevant product or who can easily change their production to provide substitution or related products. Therefore, even if certain companies manufacture different products, it can be easy at a certain point in time for a company to adjust its equipment in order to produce the goods manufactured by a competitor on the market. Under these terms, the two products can be deemed part of the same market.

2. The view of European case law on the relevant market term

From the perspective of the case law, the term of relevant market of the product is analyzed in case Clearstream Banking AG and Clearstream International SA. The statement of reasons provides that, as resulting from Commission Notice on the definition of relevant market for the purposes of Community competition law[4], "a relevant product market comprises all those products and/or services which are regarded as interchangeable or substitutable by the consumer, by reason of the products' characteristics, their prices and their intended use". In order to define relevant market, we can also take into account the supply-side substitutability, in cases where it would have effects equivalent to those of demand-side substitution in terms of efficiency and immediate level. This means that the suppliers are able to reorient their production to relevant products and market them on short term without significant additional costs or risks, in response to small but permanent variations in relative prices. In this respect, the Commission does not make a manifest error of assessment in holding that there is a specific market for primary clearing and settlement services for securities issued in accordance with the German law, different from the secondary service market, since, due to the fact an undertaking holds a monopoly in fact on the market and is therefore an unavoidable partner for those primary services, there is no substitutability either on the demand side nor on the supply side of those services. Therefore, a secondary market with specific features in terms of the demand and the supply and supplies products or provides services which occupy an essential place and which are not interchangeable on the more general market to which it belongs, must be regarded as a distinct market of goods or services. In this background, it is sufficient for a potential, even hypothetic market to be identified, a situation which occurs when the goods or services are indispensable for the exercise of a particular activity and where there is an effective demand for them from the undertakings pursuing that activity. Therefore, the possibility of identifying two different production stages associated with the fact that the upstream product is an indispensable element for the supply of the downstream product is decisive.[5]

Apparently simple, this definition of the product market raises some issues. First of all, it is necessary to identify the factors that are taken into account in the analysis of the relevant product market.

These were presented as the degree of physical resemblance between the products (services) concerned; the price differences between two products; the cost of switching between two competing products; consumers' preferences for a particular type/category of product to the detriment of another type/category of product; similar or different classifications of the large industry. Secondly, an important element in defining the relevant market is the structure of products demanded by consumers. Therefore, products with the same physical structure are interchangeable (i.e.: butter and margarine). In many situations, consumers may regard certain products as substitutable and therefore classified in the same relevant market, even if they differ in their materiality.

A particular issue is the segment of branded products that typically have a higher price than other less well-known similar products. There are situations where the consumers consider that the products which do not benefit from a reputed brand as substitutes for them, but it should be noted that this will not happen for any type of product. For example, high quality wines are part of the same relevant market, while ordinary table wines will not be in the same category. Therefore, an increase in the price of a high-quality wine cannot lead buyers to move towards a lower quality wine, although it may cause them to buy another high-quality wine. In case France Telecom, the Court of First Instance held that markets of low-speed internet and high-speed internet are distinct, since the possibility of reciprocal replacement of products is insufficient between them.

Therefore, in order to analyze the dominant position of an undertaking in a particular sectoral market, the possibilities of exercising competition must be assessed within the market which groups all the products or services which, depending on their features, can meet constant needs and are hardly substitutable to other products or services. Furthermore, since the definition of the relevant market serves to assess whether the concerned undertaking has the power to prevent effective competition from being maintained and to behave independently from its competitors and service providers, the limitation to the analysis of the objective features of the services in question is not possible, but it is also necessary to take account of the competition conditions and of the structure of the market demand and supply.

[4] The European Commission, Notice on the definition of relevant market for the purposes of Community competition law (97/C 372/03), published in the Official Journal of the European Union of 09.12.1997, vol 003, p 60-6

If a product is likely to be used for different purposes and in case these different uses respond to certain economic needs, also different, it must be accepted that the respective product may, where appropriate, belong to different markets, which may have different characteristics, both from the point of view of the structure and the competition conditions. This finding does not justify the conclusion that such a product can form a single market, the same with all the other products which, in the various uses which it may have, may substitute it and compete with it.

The concept of relevant market entails, indeed, that effective competition may exist between the products which are part of this market, which implies a sufficient degree of substitutability for the same use among all the products on the same market.

The Commission Notice on the definition of relevant market for the purposes of Community competition law provides that "a relevant product market comprises all those products and/or services which are regarded as interchangeable or substitutable by the consumer, by reason of the products' characteristics, their prices and their intended use". According to this notice, the assessment of the substitutability of demand determines the set of products perceived as substitutable by the consumer.

Therefore, with regard to the internet access sector, as there is not just a difference in comfort or quality between high-speed and low-speed internet, these differences in usage, specificity and performance are supplemented by an important price difference between the two, and even though high-speed and low-speed internet have a certain degree of substitutability, it functions asymmetrically, the migrations of customers from high-speed internet offers to low-speed internet offers is negligible compared to migration in the opposite direction, the Commission was right to find that a sufficient degree of substitutability between high-speed and low-speed access did not exist and to define the market in question as that of high-speed internet access for residential customers.[6]

3. The geographic market, part of the relevant market notion

The relevant geographic market comprises the area of the economic agents specialized in the production and supply of the products included in the product market. It is a territory where all traders operate under identical or sufficiently homogenous competition conditions in connection with relevant products or services. The homogeneity of market conditions is not a concept to be viewed in absolute terms. It is not necessary for the objective competition requirements between economic operators to be perfectly homogeneous. It is sufficient that they are similar or sufficiently homogeneous[7]. Therefore, it cannot be considered that only areas where the objective conditions of competition are heterogeneous constitute a uniform market[8]. The establishment of this territorial area takes into account the consumers' behavior regarding the possibility of replacing products manufactured in different geographical areas.

The elements that the Commission considers relevant to define the geographic market[9] in case of a litigation generated by the dominant position within the market, concern, first of all, the aspects in connection with past evidence of diversion of orders to other areas. In some cases, evidence could be available in connection with the fact that some price fluctuations between different areas have led to customers' feedback. Generally, quantitative tests used to define the product market can also be used to define the geographic market. However, it should be borne in mind that some price comparisons at an international scale may be more complex as a result of certain factors, such as exchange rate movements, taxation and product differentiation.

Another relevant aspect in defining geographic market is represented by the basic demand characteristics for the relevant product, which can determine the dimension of the geographic market. Certain factors, such as national preferences or preferences for national brands, language, culture and lifestyle, as well as the need for local presence, have a great potential to limit the geographical scope of competition.

Furthermore, where appropriate, the Commission will contact the main customers and competitors of the parties in its enquiries, to gather their views on the boundaries of the geographic market as well as most of the factual information it requires to reach a conclusion on the scope of the market when they are sufficiently backed by factual evidence.

An examination of the customers' current geographic pattern of purchases provides useful evidence as to the possible scope of the geographic market. When customers purchase from companies located anywhere in the Community or the EEA on similar terms, or they procure their supplies through effective tendering procedures in which companies from anywhere in the Community or the EEA submit bids, usually the geographic market will be considered to be Community-wide.

When the number of customers is so large that it is not possible to obtain through them a clear picture of geographic purchasing patterns, information on trade flows might be used alternatively, provided that the trade statistics are available with a sufficient degree of detail for the relevant products. Trade flows, and above all, the rationale behind trade flows provide useful insights and information for the purpose of establishing the scope of the geographic market but are not in themselves conclusive.

The absence of trans-border purchases or trade flows, for instance, does not necessarily mean that the market is at most national in scope. Still, barriers isolating the national market have to be identified before it is concluded that the relevant geographic market in such a case is national.

The clearest obstacle for a customer to divert its orders to other areas is the impact of transport costs and transport restrictions arising from legislation or from the nature of the relevant products. The impact of transport costs will usually limit the scope of the geographic market for bulky, low-value products, bearing in mind that a transport disadvantage might also be compensated by a comparative advantage in other costs (labor costs or raw materials).

If they exceed a certain profitability threshold, then the cost of transport becomes a major factor in separating distinct relevant markets. The relevant geographic market does not entail the production of economic goods in the same area or locality, but the accessibility to the buyers. In this connection, in case Napier Brown-British Sugar[10], the Commission decided that, in order to establish if a British company was holding a dominant position in the production and sale of sugar, the relevant market was Great Britain, since imports were very limited and functioned as a supplementation for British space, not as an alternative.

Access to distribution in a given area, regulatory barriers still existing in certain sectors, quotas and custom tariffs might also constitute barriers isolating a geographic area from the competitive pressure of companies located outside that area. Significant switching costs in procuring supplies from companies located in other countries constitute additional sources of such barriers.

The third element that should be taken into account when defining the concept of relevant market is the time factor. By analyzing the time element of the markets, an undertaking, under art. 101 TFEU, may hold a dominant position on the market at some point in the year. This is possible when competition from other products is reduced due to their seasonality.

Furthermore, technological progress and changes in consumer's habits change the boundaries between the markets[11], thus giving a time dimension to the concept of product market.

In this respect, in case Elopak Italia Srl/Tetra Pak[12], the Commission considers that the analysis used to define a market should cover only a short period, due to the fact that over a long period, during which technological progress may occur and consumer habits evolve, structures will change and the very boundaries between the various markets shift. A short period corresponds more to the economic operative time during which a given company exercises its power on the market and, consequently, on which one must concentrate in order to assess that power. In connection to the case, the replacement on the market of one type of packaging material by another is essentially the result of changes in consumer habits, changes that are the result of a long-term process.

The Commission does not deny that producers can, to a certain extent, hasten or delay the evolvement of consumer habits through measures aimed at influencing the consumer in his choice of packaging but, this is a costly and long-term process, the outcome of which remains uncertain.

4. Conclusions

It is unanimously accepted at European level that art. 102 TFEU seeks to protect consumers and not certain competitors. This goal requires the protection of the competition process against market foreclosure phenomenon. Although the practice in the field is rich, the settlement of a case based on art. 102 TFEU entails difficult issues in defining relevant market, establishing domination and the notion of abuse.

The limits of the special liability of the dominant companies are not yet clear in the case-law, making it difficult for the dominant company to know what is allowed and what is not. The approach based on the legal form of art. 102 TFEU must be supplemented by the analysis of the economic effect entailed by the liability under this article.

THE PROTECTION OF PERSONAL DATA - AN ESSENTIAL COMPONENT OF THE FUNDAMENTAL HUMAN RIGHTS

Augustin FUEREA[*]

Abstract

In terms of human rights in general, and their promotion and protection, especially, developments have been and will continue to remain diverse and complex. This aspect addresses equally the concerns about the identification of human rights, as well as the establishment, consecration of methods and mechanisms that can lead to the promotion and protection of human rights through legal instruments. A faithful reflection of such developments on the protection of personal data of individuals is provided to us by the reports of the European Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the Economic and Social Committee, the Committee of the Regions and presented starting from 2010, after the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union became legally binding on 1 December 2009, with the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon.

Keywords: human rights; the protection of personal data; the Commission reports; the case law of the CJEU1. Introductory Aspects

In terms of human rights in general, and their promotion and protection, especially, developments have been and will continue to remain diverse and complex. This aspect addresses equally the concerns about the identification of human rights, as well as the establishment, consecration of methods and mechanisms that can lead to the promotion and protection of human rights through legal instruments.

The levels of such concerns have been and will also remain different, with reference to the national, regional (European[1] and not only) level and to the general, universal level. Deepening, in the sense of an appropriate waiver of the areas of interest, and of the necessary correlation of rights with human obligations, has given rise to a considerable diversity, from antiquity to the present day. Whether we are considering the state of peace or war, the man, with his rights, has been at the heart of concerns. Edifying are the developments recorded by the international humanitarian law of armed conflicts, referred to in the doctrine as the "King of Human Rights"[2], for the state of war in which the man has been long enough, but also for the rules governing such rights over time of peace. The state of peace is relative because, very often, we hear or see multiple information that leads to the area of the media war, a war that includes personal data of the individual, of the natural person. The preoccupation for the protection of such data is not at all recent, as it seems, given its intensified concerns over the last period of time.

Being an extremely generous approach, with multiple sides (philosophical, economic, psychological, theological, military, juridical, etc.), we intend to analyse only its legal dimension, in synthesis, at general, international, European and national level. "Among the ever-evolving subjects, the protection of personal data occupies a privileged and secure place"[3].

A faithful reflection of such developments on the protection of personal data of individuals is provided to us by the reports of the European Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the Economic and Social Committee, the Committee of the Regions and presented as from 2010, after the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union became legally binding on 1 December 2009, with the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon[4].

As the European Commission itself states in its first report[5], "the Charter [...] [becoming binding] has led to a substantial reinforcement of European Union governance by the rule of law. It is a milestone on a path begun decades ago"[6]. This is happening on the occasion of the entry into force of the Charter, as the Court of Justice of the European Union was the only one entitled to oblige the Union and, implicitly, the Member States to respect the fundamental rights. At a careful analysis of the content, we cannot help accepting the Commission's statements in the 2010 Report, assertions according to which "the Charter embodies in a single, coherent and legally binding instrument the fundamental rights which are binding upon the EU institutions and bodies"[7].

It is worth noting that, including in the field of data protection for individuals, the Charter applies to Member States only when it comes to the enforcement of the European Union law. The Member States of the European Union have the essential role of guaranteeing compliance with the fundamental rights at national level, according to their own fundamental laws[8].

The international and universal dimension of the European Union's concerns regarding the fundamental rights is reflected in the Union's Annual Report on Human Rights and Democracy in the World, a document distinct from that of the Commission, which presents the Union's actions in non-EU countries. It is the evidence of EU reporting to the UN human rights standards which are referred to in Article 21 of the Treaty on European Union.

2. Developments in the field of personal data protection at EU level

The headquarters of the matter is Article 8 of the Charter, which guarantees the right of individuals to the protection of personal data. Developments in new technologies have been able to increase the concerns of citizens in general, and of the European Union in particular on the most numerous and diverse issues such as video surveillance systems at the workplace; social networking sites; collecting data in census operations; the funding of research into new technologies in the field of security and more.

Given that technological developments enable individuals to get involved in the easy dissemination of a large amount of information about themselves (behaviour, preferences, etc.), reaching out to the general public, even on a global scale, the European Commission required, in 2010 an "exhaustive" study on data protection in the European Union[9].

The concerns of the European Parliament are meritorious in the matter, given that, for example, on 10 February 2010, it stressed the need for data protection to be better taken into account in international agreements on data transfers for the purpose of fighting terrorism, by voting against the proposed agreement on the Terrorist Financing Tracking Programme. Following that refusal of the European Parliament, the Commission drew up a new proposal, taking into account the need for personal data protection, that time being endorsed by the European Parliament and entered into force on 1 August 2010[10].

Starting from the 2011 Report, the Commission has made the assessment that "the Charter became a landmark commonly used in EU policy-making"[11], including, we add, policies that had an incidence on the protection of personal data.

Interesting is the issue of the Commission's approach to develop the legislation on the use of security scanners designed to detect dangerous goods carried by passengers at airports in the European Union. Informing passengers in this regard is important, but also their right to adopt another method. EU Regulation no. 1141/2011[12] provides detailed conditions regarding the respect for the right to the protection of personal data and private life (preservation, storage, copying of data or images).

An important place in the economy of the 2011 Report is covered by references to European Union data storage rules[13], which are analysed in a separate Commission evaluation report. In addition to the positive aspects highlighted in the Report, the Commission insisted on the need to improve the transposition of the Data Protection Directive in the Member States.

Among the important developments in the field of data protection, a special place has the enforcement of

The Data Retention Directive requires Member States to impose on providers of publicly available electronic communications services or public communications networks the obligation to keep traffic and location data for a period of between six months and two years for research, investigation and prosecution of serious crimes.

Regulation (EU) 2016/679[14], in the process of ascending the digitization of the entire social, economic life, and beyond. The regulation is intended to be the result of a process of major reform of the adopted and enforced rules in the field. Data protection is often realistically correlated to the right to privacy, both of which are regulated by the Charter and by the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, plus the European Convention on Human Rights of the Council of Europe[15].

Even if it appears to be a novelty, especially in non-specialized environments, Regulation (EU) 2016/679 does not intervene on an empty ground, but represents, as the Commission pointed out, an update and modernization of the principles enshrined in the 1995 directive[16]. The reform aims, among other things, at greater accountability for operators who process personal data, effectively contributing to the strengthening of the role of independent, autonomous national authorities[17]. The right to delete data or the "right to be forgotten", as metaphorically has been retained by the practice of the field, joins other rights, such as the right to pseudonymization; the right to opposition; the right to restrict processing, and so on. An important component is given by the right to information[18], plus the expression of consent. All this is corroborated with the possibility of facilitating better data protection by the data subjects in the online environment.

A plus of value but also of legal essence is that the proposed and achieved reform "extends the general principles and rules of data protection to police and judicial authorities"[19].

The exceptions included in the reform sought to ensure a balance between the right to data protection and the freedom of expression for journalistic purposes, for example, taken into account by the Romanian legislator, in the law on implementing measures for Regulation (EU) 2016/679[20] (Chapter III - Derogations).

In 2013, according to the Commission's report, visible progress was made on the protection of personal data. An important step was the concern about deepening some legal consequences and the substantiation of certain rights, such as the explicit consent, "the right to be forgotten", the right to portability (transmission) of data and the right to be informed about the violation of the personal data security.

3. The Case law of the CJEU

The Commission's monitoring of the enforcement of data protection legislation aimed in 2013 at the application by Austria of the Court's judgment[21] in 2012, which found that the data protection supervisory authority was not independent. In that regard, Austria took measures to amend the relevant legislation by making sure that "the member of the authority managing the day-to-day (...) [data protection] activity is subject to supervision only by the President of the Authority and that the authority does not take part of the Federal Chancellery, but has its own budget and staff"[22].

In 2010, the Court of Justice of the European Union[23], referring explicitly to the importance of fundamental human rights, the scope of data protection, invalidated those parts of EU law "which required the publication of the names of natural persons that were recipients of funds deriving from the European Agricultural Guarantee Fund and the European Agricultural Fund for Rural Development"[24].

The developments that the society has made, contribute decisively to the agenda with priorities of the European Commission's legislative initiative. This is why the European Commission's 2014 report devotes a distinct part on "human rights in the digital environment", following the enforcement of the provisions of the Charter with a special reference to the field. The case that was the subject of the analysis, justifying the European Union executive's sufficiently careful attention to the topic, is Digital Rights Ireland[25]. The derivative headquarters of the matter at that time was the Data Retention Directive[26], a directive which the Luxembourg Court invalidated, considering that it no longer responded to the provisions of the Charter (Articles 7 and 8) on fundamental rights to respect the privacy and protection of personal data. Significant is that, "the judgment of the Court clarified that EU secondary legislation had to contain certain safeguards to protect the fundamental rights, including provisions on professional secrecy grounds and prior administrative or judicial controls, and that these issues cannot be left to the latitude of the national legislator"[27].

Even if in the same case, the Luxembourg Court found that "keeping data served a legitimate objective of general interest", it "considered that the intervention of the directive (...) in the fundamental rights to privacy and the protection of personal data was not limited to the strict minimum"[28].

The impact of the judgment in this case concerns all the institutions of the European Union which at this level are important links to the legislative process. The concrete reflection materialized in an immediate action by the Commission, which in December 2014 updated its "Guidelines on methodological measures to be taken to verify the compatibility with the fundamental rights at the level of the Council's preparatory bodies", getting involved - even in the Council's staff training activity, in this respect.

The same technological developments contributed to what the Commission called in its 2014 report "the digital revolution", which is likely to worry and that led to the amplification of its efforts above all to collect, use and disseminate personal data, but not only. Developments "on global surveillance programmes highlight the need for more effective measures to protect the fundamental rights, in particular the right to privacy and personal data protection"[29].

Another important tool developed this time by the Council of Europe, which is placed in a universal international context[30], is the "Human Rights Guidelines for Internet Users" (fair access to the internet, discrimination of some people by setting profiles, unequal relationship between recipients of data and providers of this data, intellectual property rights and obligations, etc.).

The origins of Regulation (EU) 2016/679 and Directive (EU) 2016/680[31] are met in the Commission's proposals of January 2012 on the General Regulation on Data Protection and the Directive addressed to police and judicial authorities in the same field. The Commission's negotiations also extended to transfers of data to the USA, in the sense of concluding a framework agreement on data protection, in order to achieve a new regime of safety for these transfers.

"In the case of Google[32], the EU has an obligation to comply with EU data protection law (Articles 7 and 8 of the Charter) and must therefore respond to requests to remove links to certain personal data, under certain conditions ("the right to be forgotten")"[33].

The Head of the European Union's executive[34], in the framework of the political guidelines presented to the European Parliament, went further demanding that the obstacles between Member States with regard to the regulations are adopted in the areas of personal data protection, namely: telecommunications; Copyright; radio frequency management and competition law are removed.

For the 2015 Activity Report, the agreement between the European Parliament and the Council in December on the "data protection reform package" was important. The package covers the protection of fundamental rights to privacy and the protection of personal data[35], both of which are essential for the digital single market.

Efforts on the drafting and adoption of the Regulation and the Directive, which have already been mentioned, continued, and it was established that the enforcement would start no latter than 2018, which has already happened on 25 May.

Continuing work in this area, we find that a proposal in 2014 materialized so that in September 2015, the Commission finalized the EU-US Data Protection Framework Agreement. The Agreement "will provide data protection safeguards for any transfer of personal data between the EU and the US regarding any police or judicial cooperation in criminal matters. Under the agreement, when their personal data is transferred to US law enforcement authorities, and this data is inaccurate or illegally processed, EU citizens - who do not reside in the US - will have access to remedies in US courts. This provision represents a significant improvement in the situation with regard to the US judicial remedy"[36].

Simultaneously with developments in the work of the institutions involved in the legislative process, we cannot fail to notice the CJEU's case-law, which is in line with these developments in the field, and to which the 2015 Commission's Report does not hesitate to refer. This is related to the Schrems[37] accusation where the CJEU invalidated the Commission's Decision of 2000 on the safety sphere. That "was a decision to establish the adequacy of the level of data protection under Article 25 (6) of the Data Protection Directive (...) and authorized the transfer of personal data to a third country, in this case the United States. The decision found an acceptable level of protection under national law or international commitments assumed by the US. The transfer of personal data to US servers by the Irish Facebook subsidiary authorized by that finding of suitability was challenged before an Irish court, in particular, following the 2013 disclosure of mass surveillance by American information"[38].

Since the Luxembourg Court ruled that legislation which gives the public authorities access to the content of electronic communications in general, violated the fundamental right to respect for private life, the Commission published guidance on the possibilities of the data transfer, also making reference to Schrems judgment, "establishing alternative systems for transfers of personal data to the US until a new framework is established"[39].

In its Annual Report of 2017 on the application of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights[40], the Court highlighted Opinion 1/15 on the Canada-EU Agreement Draft on the transfer of data from the Record with the passengers' names from the European Union to Canada, adopted on 26 July 2017. The Commission noted that the Luxembourg Court "found that several provisions of the proposed agreement were incompatible with the right to respect for privacy (Article 7 of the Charter) and the protection of personal data (Article 8 of the Charter)"[41]. "The Court expressed its concern about the proportionality, clarity and precision of the rules set out in the agreement and the lack of justification for the transfer, processing and storage of sensitive data. The Commission is examining carefully the most appropriate way to eliminate the concerns raised by the Court in order to ensure the security of EU citizens while fully respecting fundamental rights, in particular the right to data protection"[42].

To all these, some aspects concerning anonymization[43], activities within a religious community[44], and written answers provided in a professional examination[45] are added.

4. Conclusions

We can conclude that the concern for the respect of fundamental human rights, including from the point of view of the protection of personal data, has been, is and will remain a constant of European and international domestic regulations, in general, and of the jurisprudence of the field, as well as of the specialized doctrine[46] for a long time, from now on.

Abstract

This study seeks to analyze the amendments made to Law no.317/2004 on the Superior Council of Magistracy, which has let to extensive debates in the Romanian public and legal space. The analysis is based on the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of Romania, which claims several important constitutional principles for the organization and functioning of the Superior Council of Magistracy, the independence of the justice being the focus of the Constitutional Court.

Keywords: Constitutional Court, the principle of the independence of justice, Superior Council of Magistracy, the Judicial Power.

1. Introduction

This study seeks to emphasize the importance of the one of the most important principles enshrined both in the Romanian Constitution and in international and regional legal instruments (such as Pacts, Statements and Conventions), namely the principle of the independence of justice, clearly regarded as Judicial Power, within the principle of separation and the balance of the three powers in the state, as they are expressly and univocally mentioned in article 1 paragraph 4 of the Romanian Constitution.

This principle of the independence of justice is well established in the purpose and the main role of the Superior Council of Magistracy, namely in article 133 paragraph 1 of the Constitution, according to which "the Superior Council of Magistracy is the guarantor of the independence of Justice". From the systematic interpretation of the rules governing Title III (Public Authorities), Chapter VI (Judicial Authority) of the fundamental law, it is concluded that this is indeed the main role of the Superior Council of Magistracy, i.e. guaranteeing the independence of justice and all the other attributions of the Superior Council of Magistracy is subsuming this purpose, namely it has the role to enslaving and protecting the independence of justice. A similar constitutional norm is found in article 134 paragraph 4, which emphasizes that a corollary purpose and the essential and primordial role of the Superior Council of Magistracy, namely the "guarantor of the independence of justice".

2. Content

What is the meaning of "Justice" in the Romanian Constitution and in general in the legal language of international public law? The answer is simple and it is consecrated in an ample and precise way. Thus, from the corroboration of article 124 with article 126 paragraph 1 of the Constitution, it can be concluded without any doubt that the justice, i.e. the exercise of the Judicial Power, is only realized by the courts and the judges belonging to these courts, on the basis of procedural regulations that are explicitly and unambiguous established by the procedural law (procedural codes of any kind based on which the courts and, implicitly, the other judicial entities – the criminal investigations bodies of the police, the Public Ministry etc. - are being adopted by law according to article 126 paragraph 2 of the Constitution). In all important international regulations (pacts, conventions and declarations of rights), the term "Justice" has exactly the same meaning as in the Romanian Constitution, namely the courts who have the role of interpreting and applying the law to the concrete cases deducted on the basis of substantive law and procedural regulations governed by the procedural law (civil procedure, criminal procedure, commercial procedure, administrative procedure).

In this respect, we consider that the (very correctly identified) provisions of article 126 paragraph 1 (Justice is made by the Supreme Court of Cassation and Justice and by the other courts established by the law) corroborated with the provisions of article 133 paragraph 1 and article 134 paragraph 4 of the Constitution, which expressly enshrines the role of the SCM (the Superior Council of Magistracy is the guarantor of the independence of justice) the law amending Law no. 317/2004 amends article 24 paragraph 1 of the Law no. 317/2004 establishing that the Superior Council of Magistracy is headed by a president – judge, assisted by a vice-president – prosecutor, who can come only from the judges, or prosecutors elected by the general assemblies of the courts, or the prosecutor's offices. This clarification of the legislator is welcome in order to make clearer this essential role of the Superior Council of Magistracy to defend the independence of justice in the meaning offered by the Constitution on the question of justice as mentioned above.

Therefore, the essential role of the Superior Council of Magistracy is to guarantee the independence of the judiciary – of the Judicial Power listed in article 1 paragraph 4 of the Constitution. It is also noted that article 131 and 132 of the Constitution established the role of the Public Ministry and the status of prosecutors, without any reference to the independence of justice, but to the general interests of the society, the rule of law and the right and freedoms of citizens.

Somehow indirectly, the fundamental law further establishes in article 23 (individual freedom) and article 24 (the right to defense) that, contrary to the activity of prosecutors, there is and is constitutionally constituted the activity of lawyers, i.e. specialized persons who give consistency and effectiveness to the right to defense and the presumption of innocence. Also, taking into account the numerous law cases of the European Court of Human Rights, the prosecutor and the lawyer have equal roles in the courts, in the light of the principle of equality of arms and the right to a fair trial as a whole. It should be noted that the imperative of the equitable process as a constitutional principle is found in the Romanian Constitution in article 21 paragraph 3 (the parties have right to a fair trial…).

As such, if the law would expressly allow for the independence of the justice to be ensured with a presiding Superior Council of Magistracy elected amongst the prosecutors, then, by symmetry within the meaning of article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and article 21 paragraph 3 of the Romanian Constitution, it should be possible the election of a president of Superior Council of Magistracy among lawyers in the field, in order to equalize the two professions with an essential role in the conduct of judicial proceedings before the courts, in order to ensure a fair trial, as stipulated by the provisions of article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, especially the law cases of the European Court of Human Rights, as well as article 21 of the Constitution and the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on article 21 paragraph 3.

Of courts, in several states within the European Union, where these are judicial councils for administering courts and prosecutors' offices, and for the management of judges' and prosecutors' careers, we can find various solutions, for example with a much wider presence of representatives of civil society in those judicial councils (in France, for example, their number exceeds practically the number of judges and prosecutors elected in the two professions), but regardless of the concrete normative solution, the basic law established by the Supreme Council of Magistracy, namely the independence of justice, the other part nowhere is allowed any form of monopoly or interference of the other professional entity in the magistracy – namely prosecutors – over the entire constitutional scaffolding dedicated to the judges' career and the functioning of the courts of law.

For example, in the French or Belgian legislation in this area, the large number of representatives of civil society (i.e. remarkable lawyers from other professions) can determine the leadership of the representative judicial councils from this professional segment outside the magistrates, i.e. it is possible to implement an arbitration function within the Judicial Power and separately within the Public Ministry on administrative and career issued. But a major interference from one magistrate profession to the other is not possible. In the current version of Law no. 317/2004, this interference appears unfortunately to be possible and obviously does not correspond to the purpose and role of the Superior Council of Magistracy as a guarantor of the independence of justice ("ratio legis").

Obviously, article 133 paragraph 3 of the Constitution would allow the Superior Council of Magistracy's president to be elected by the Superior Council of Magistracy's Plenum of the elected prosecutors in accordance with article 133 paragraph 2 letter a, but the consequence is clearly removed from the purpose and role of the Superior Council of Magistracy (guarantor of the independence of justice) interpreted in a natural connection with article 21 paragraph 3 and article 124, article 126 paragraph 1 and article 1 paragraph 4 on the separation of powers in the state.

By Decision no. 61 of February 31, 2018 regarding the object of unconstitutionality of the Law for amending the Law no. 317/2004 on the organization and functioning of the Superior Council of Magistracy as a whole and, in particular, the provisions of article I item 4, 5, 7, 15, 19, 20, 34, 46 and 62 thereof, the Court held, with reference to article 1 item 19 and 20 of the law examined, that the new way of choosing the Superior Council of Magistracy's leadership – the president of the section for judges is the president of the Superior Council of Magistracy and the president of the section of prosecutors is the vice-president of the Superior Council of Magistracy, therefore ope legis the president of the Superior Council of Magistracy is a judge and the vice-president a prosecutor, violate the provisions of article 133 paragraph 3 of the Constitution, in that it makes the difference that the Constitution does not stipulate, regarding the vocation to be elected president of the Superior Council of Magistracy, among the elected members of the Superior Council of Magistracy.

The Court notes that the current Law no. 317/2204 stipulates, in article 24 paragraph 1, the fact that the president and the vice-president of the Superior Council of Magistracy are elected from the judges and prosecutors elected as members of the Superior Council of Magistracy and who are part of different section (it is the expression of the law), but the meaning of this text is to ensure at Superior Council of Magistracy management level representation equal to both judges and prosecutors, but without determining which of the two categories of magistrates an be elected as president of the Superior Council of Magistracy and who as vice-president of the Superior Council of Magistracy.

A modification similar to that under the law examined was introduced on the occasion of the Legislative Initiative of May 23, 2012 on the revision of the Romanian Constitution, the draft of the constitutional revision saying, in relation to article 133 paragraph 3 of the Constitution, that the president of the Superior Council of Magistracy is elected among the 9 judges of the corresponding section. In the opinion sent to the Romanian authorities on that occasion, the Commission for Democracy though Law (Venice Commission) expressed the reservation and the difficulty of accepting such a proposal, since the Superior Council of Magistracy is maintained in its constitutional structure, as a single entity, representative of both branches of the magistracy, but in which the vocation to be elected president must equally belong to any of the judges or prosecutors without distinction. According to the Venice Commission, if there is to be a single council whose mission is to represent the two branches of the magistracy, it would not be right that the president can not be elected from the members of the two branches.

At the same time, the Court notes that following the new organic legislator's philosophy, prosecutors are excluded from the right to vote for the election of the Superior Council of Magistracy's president as a leader and a representative of the Council, as they are not part of the elective assembly for the election of the president of the section of judges, which is the president of the Superior Council of Magistracy, and the judges are excluded from the election procedure, by vote, of the Superior Council of Magistracy's vice-president. However, the Superior Council of Magistracy's president and vice-president represent the joint governing bodies that target the Superior Council of Magistracy as a unitary and unique entity, representing both judges and prosecutors.

However, we note that regardless of the role of the Public Ministry and its constitutional tasks, it is legally impossible for the Public Ministry and prosecutors to be considered part of the Judicial Power (they are part of the judicial authority, including the Judicial Power and the Public Ministry, as well as the Superior Council of Magistracy, but obviously it does not confuse with the courts, having different constitutional roles and legal statutes different from one point away).

The idea that the Public Ministry represents a fourth power in the state is also unacceptable because there is no constitutional text for such an interpretation, but also because there are only three powers in the constitutional democracy – Legislative, Executive and Judicial – to which some public authorities benefiting from a distinct constitutional consecration, stand alone, as is the case with the Public Ministry.

In this context, allowing the interpretation of article 133 paragraph 3 of the Constitution in order that a prosecutor of the elected may be president of the Superior Council of Magistracy means to allow as a matter of plan, one of the parties to the process in the sense delineated by the European Court of Human Rights' cases – that is the prosecutor – become the symbol of the independence of justice, clearly debasing the principle of the fair trial in article 21 paragraph 3 of the Constitution and article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The role and functions of the Public Ministry and, implicitly, of the prosecutors, therefore have in their turn, distinct, special regulations and, as we have seen above, no text in articles 131-132 (Section 2 – Public Ministry) to the independence of justice has an express, explicit, constitutional attribution of the Public Ministry. Moreover, in a very simple logic, since the Public Ministry, through its prosecuting offices, investigates criminal cases and sends the suspects to trial, the courts will decide whether or not there is guilt or justice within the meaning of article 126 paragraph 1 and to the contrary, attorneys ensure sui generis the protection of the persons brought to justice mean that it is absolutely natural for the Public Ministry to fight in such a way that the results of its activity are strengthened by condemning those sent in law, while lawyers, as a rule, try to convince courts of law to the contrary to the reasoning proposed by prosecutors.

So, who has here the essential role to ensure organically the independence of justice? Obviously and logically only the courts and the judges.

The simple question arises: Do prosecutors and judges have the same representation about the notion of the independence of justice? Are all the intrinsic and extrinsic signs of believing that article 6 (right to a fair trial) in the European Convention on Human Rights and article 21 paragraph 3 of the Constitution are properly respected when the president of the judicial council guaranteeing the independence of justice is a prosecutor? Obviously NOT because it is also illogical, not only contrary to the purpose for which the Superior Council of Magistracy is so regulated in the fundamental law.

Besides, it is difficult to answer affirmatively to the above mentioned question, because there are no solid arguments, as in the cases of the European Court of Human Rights and the Constitutional Court of Romania many principles and regulations are enshrined, one of these principles being to ensure credible and consistent public appearance of the impartiality and independence of the Judicial Power and the judges, the public trust that could be created through the entire functioning mechanism of the Council of Magistracy, the functioning of the courts considered separately, the behavior of judges as groups or individually.

It is clear that the Superior Council of Magistracy can unduly influence the judge's evolution in his career and, obviously, the decisions in the cases he solves. a judge may be marked by various forms of distraction or visible influence (i.e. dismissal from the profession as a disciplinary sanction) or diffused, especially in the concrete case where at the top of the hierarchy of the Council of Magistracy is a member chosen from the other profession belonging to magistrates, that is, a prosecutor whose statute is known from European Convention on Human Right cases as "part of the criminal trial."

In this reasoning one can at least observe that the appearance of impartiality that must first exist for justice has maximum deficiencies when the Superior Council of Magistracy president is a prosecutor because the expectations of the management that he can achieve with the greatest good faith may depart from the pattern of the basic profession of that president, namely the prosecutor, to whom other constitutional rules apply than for the Judicial Power and judges.

As such, at the level of abstract perception, in terms of independence, effectively enshrined in the fundamental laws, the necessary independence of the Judicial Power for the proper functioning of constitutional democracy, as specifically stipulated in the Romanian Constitution, the role of the Superior Council of Magistracy, it is absolutely natural that the explicit normative solution adopted the legislator in the law amending Law no. 317/2004, namely that the Superior Council of Magistracy president is always a judge of those elected by the general assemblies, especially since the position of Superior Council of Magistracy president is mostly symbolic, the decisions being made in the overwhelming majority of situations within the collective at either the Plenum or the Sections.

It should be noted that in the case law of the Constitutional Court there are situations in which, despite some seemingly clear constitutional texts regarding the functioning of the Superior Council of Magistracy and the jurisdictional competences of the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Court rightly appreciated some principles constitutional defining for the rule of law, such as free access to justice and the supremacy of the Constitution (article 1 paragraph 5 and article 21 paragraph 3), when it had two constitutional problems. Thus, although article 133 paragraph 7 of the Constitution explicitly provides that the Superior Council of Magistracy judgments are final and irrevocable, except for those in disciplinary matters, however, by Decisions no. 143/2003 (regarding the constitutionality of the draft revision of the Constitution) and no. 433/2004, the Constitutional Court expressly states that, in principle, the Superior Council of Magistracy judgments may be appealed to the courts, that is to say, in justice as a reflection of the principle of free access to justice. Also, by Decision no. 799/2011 (on the Draft Constitutional Revision) the Constitutional Court resumed arguments from the Decision no. 143/2003 regarding the free access to justice and the possibility of the persons interested in attacking the Superior Council of Magistracy's decisions, this time being more transgressive, namely in the sense of abandoning the categorical expression of article 133 paragraph 7 of the Constitution and the replacement to the other paragraph, which expressly provides that judgments of the Superior Council of Magistracy as administrative acts may be challenged in the courts.

Therefore, the principle of free access to justice prevailed in the rationale and interpretation given by the Court in the above judgments, so that some constitutional texts that seemed to receive, de plano, a one-way interpretation (at first sight/reading), these were interpreted much more deeply, namely in correlation with the essential principles defining the rule of law and the constitutional democracy, reporting the way of interpretation to the basic rule of free access to justice.

Similarly (mutatis mutandis) we consider that it is necessary to regard the independence of justice as an end in itself for the existence and functioning of the Superior Council of Magistracy so that the organization and functioning of the Superior Council of Magistracy effectively guarantees this independence of the Judicial Power, the courts and, implicitly, the judges, in order to effectively promote the principle of the separation of powers in the state under article 1 paragraph 4, as well as the entire set of rules for the performance of justice (the principle of lawfulness of judicial procedures, the fulfillment of the law in the name of the law and not in the name of any entity institutional or unipersonal character, the unique, impartial and equal character of justice, the independence of judges and their obedience to the law only) explicitly provided for in article 124 of the Constitution.

Obviously, in this whole institutional picture created by Chapter VI on the Judicial Authority, there is no speculation about the superiority of any of the forensic professions – judge, prosecutor, lawyer – because such speculation of things would be unrealistic and childish.

In our opinion, it is exclusive to the constitutionally determined role assigned to each of these professions, in order to clarify how much and how it is permissible to interfere with each of these judicial professions in safeguarding and guaranteeing the independence of the judiciary as the essential purpose of the existence and functioning of the Superior Council of Magistracy.

We believe that the observation is that the functional independence of the Public Ministry must exist in real terms, and that the method of investigating criminal cases is not at all subjected to any form of interference outside the Judicial Authority and outside the express and clearly regulated criminal procedural framework. In this respect, it is desirable to devote an express legal provision on the functional and full decision-making independence of prosecutors, obviously within the limits provided by the constitutional norms in force, regarding the way of investigating and solving the files that the Public Ministry has in their work , in such a way that the political factor can never interfere, whether we are talking about the Executive or the Legislative, as well as any other foreign entity of the Public Ministry.

In essence, it can be noticed that there are no notable differences between the status of the judge and the prosecutor, but only some rather declarative by the Constitution. However, with regard to the legal content of the functional independence for the two categories of magistrates, there is practically much similarity, except for the legal instrument of hierarchical control within the parquet units, where there are differences specific to this profession in the magistracy. In this respect, there is no solid argument that would lead to a possible reduction of the notion of magistrate/magistracy only to the judge/court.

On the contrary, the terminology of magistrate/magistracy itself would no longer be useful if it referred only to a professional category, that is to say the judge, as sometimes speculated. In reality, magistrates are related to the context of law enforcement by constitutional institutions (i.e. very important in the entire state building), i.e. circumscribed to the Judicial Authority and covering the two regulated professions there – judge and prosecutor. We have mentioned above that they have different constitutional and legal competences and must remain within the limits of these competences each and the interference between the two professions in the administrative and career development plan must be reduced to the minimum to guarantee the purpose and the essence of the Superior Council of Magistracy - the independence of justice – but also to ensure a proper consecration and functionality of the essential principle of the separation of powers in the state (where we only speak of judges and courts).

It is also widely recognized that the roles of the two components of the magistrate (judges and prosecutors) are different in the fundamental law of any state with real democratic standards, as well as in all international and regional legal instruments, the European Convention on Human Rights being the most eloquent example.

As a result, in the letter and spirit of the Romanian Constitution, as set out above, the Superior Council of Magistracy's president must always be a judge of those who are the result of the elections organized in the courts; and, logically, the vice-president elected only among the prosecutors resulting from the electoral process within the professional body of the prosecutors, the two elected persons thus becoming the right presidents of the Superior Council of Magistracy.

The solution proposed by the legislator that the president of the Judges Section is also the president of the Superior Council of Magistracy, namely the president of the Prosecutor's Section, to be vice-president of the Superior Council of Magistracy, based on the arguments set out above, we think is the most appropriate normative solution, since the aim of the fundamental law, and guarantee the independence of justice, it is much safer in this way.

4. Conclusions

In conclusion, let us make some observations on possible unconstitutional rules in the Law amending Law 317/2004, as follows:

I. Misunderstanding emerges from the reading of article 30, where some attributions are attributed either to the Plenum, or to the departments for the protection of justice, and especially to the defense of the independence, impartiality and reputation of judges and prosecutors. From the analysis of article 30 paragraphs 2 and 3 of the new law, it is not explicitly and predictably that the result of the inspections carried out by the Judicial Inspection is subject to the analysis of the sections and then the sections are pronounced by judgment.

The normative void left in the new law in this respect would lead to the abnormal situation that through internal regulations the Superior Council of Magistracy will legally legislate a segment that actually matters to the legislature. It is the legislator who must take steps to foresee and enforce the legal norm in the newly adopted law.

It is only understood from paragraph 6 that the corresponding section is pronounced by decision, but above, in paragraph 3 is used too categorical terminology, namely "in the situation where independence is affected ..." but there are no extra minimal explanations to make the text clear and precise (as the normative technique, the laws must be clear, precise, predictable, to be clear what their recipients are in the overall view, because the Nemo principle censuses ignoring the law to be able to produce effects in objectively and rationally).

Therefore, we believe that it is necessary to supplement or rephrase paragraph 3 where it is expressly stated that the report with the conclusions of the Judicial Inspection is submitted to the vote in the Plenum or, as the case may be, the appropriate section of the Superior Council of Magistracy.

II. Another set of questionable legal norms can be found in article 41 paragraph 2 of the new law, where it is given the competence of both sections to establish the territorial division for the courts (Judges section) and for the prosecutor's offices (Prosecutor's Section). These provisions of the new law are believed to conflict with article 131 paragraph 3 - the prosecutor's offices operate in the courts of law ... - since it is possible to decide different territorial districts in the two departments. The correct solution is that these territorial branches should be further established by the Ministry of Justice with the approval of the Superior Council of Magistracy – i.e. the Plenum to have a unitary picture of the entire judicial system, given the provisions of article 131 paragraph 3 of the Constitution, which correlates the organization and functioning in administrative aspect of the courts and prosecutor's offices in the same territorial district and as a degree of jurisdiction.

The correct solution we believe is to give this task to the Plenum, with the consultation of each statement, i.e. the endorsement of the proposals and separate from the statements.

III. A text that we believe to have unconstitutionality is Article 41 letter c of the new law, as this text delegates practically to the Superior Council of Magistracy – the Section of Judges – attributions of the Parliament, namely to establish by law the competences of the courts – article 126 paragraph 2 of the Constitution. It is true that the text is somehow found in the law in vigor, but it does not cover the flaw of non-compliance with some provisions of the Constitution. Even Parliament cannot delegate its legislative powers to public authorities, in the absence of an express constitutional text that allows something. There is only one constitutional provision that establishes an exception to the rule of parliamentary monopoly on the law-making process, namely the legislative delegation granted to the Government under article 115 of the Constitution.

As such, the text of article 41 letter c) should be redrafted in such a way that the Superior Council of Magistracy acquires an advisory role for a draft law modifying or establishing such procedural powers in order to comply with the provisions of article 126 paragraph 2 – the jurisdiction of the judiciary and the court proceedings are provided only by law – the constitutional text being categorical in this regard.

IV. On the technical argumentation of drafting normative acts, the assignment of a normative symmetry where there is the same juridical decision on the substance and procedural rules (Ubieadem est ratio, idem solutionessedebet), it is worth mentioning a potential constitutionality of article 69 paragraph 4 of the new law, where there is no explicit separation of the Judicial Inspection on two sections – one for judges and another for prosecutors, just as the Superior Council of Magistracy is constantly working in the new law. Moreover, as the texts relating to the functions of president and vice-president are written, respectively covering the holiday situations of these functions, the confusion persists and basically the new law allows an inadmissible interference between the two professions in this sensitive area of disciplinary responsibility and defense of the independence and reputation of the two categories of magistrates.

Therefore, we believe that the law here is unclear, it generates confusions that will not help to apply judicious and compatible with the Constitution, on the contrary will probably generate chaos and confusion, leading very likely to inapplicable solutions and blockages in activity.

Starting from the model of regulation of the two sections of the Superior Council of Magistracy, introduced in the new law with clear boundaries of competences and much better correlated with the constitutional norms in force (and much closer to the letter and spirit of articles 5-6 of European Convention on Human Rights), in similarly, the Judicial Inspection matter should be regulated, with a clear separation between two sections, one for judges and another for prosecutors, as explicitly stated in article 134 paragraph 2 of the Constitution, where it is expressly stipulated that in disciplinary matters the units have attributions for each category of magistrates to which each section refers.

MANAGEMENT OF CLASSIFIED INFORMATION WITHIN THE ORGANISATION FOR INTERDICTION OF CHEMICAL WEAPONS

Maria-Irina GRIGORE-RĂDULESCU[*]
Corina Florenţa POPESCU[]

Abstract

In the relation with international bodies, the Romanian authorities must observe its own rules related to security of confidential information, and in the relations with other authorities, branches, companies from Romania, they have the obligation to observe the national legislation.

This work mechanism, with two different systems of information security, imposes, on level of competent Romanian authorities, some internal rules of equivalence of confidentiality levels, approved by ORNISS. As national authority in the field of security of classified information, ORNISS must know and hold a record of all equivalence regulations of confidentiality levels operated by different international bodies with those of internal legislation.

Keywords: classified information, national authorities, Organization for prohibition of chemical weapons, security systems.

1. Introduction

The classified information[1] circulates in the relations of Romanian authorities with different international bodies: NATO, EU, European Central Bank, International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), Organisation for Prohibition of Chemical Weapons (OPCW) and others.

An interesting and highly rigorous system of protection of classified information has been implemented by the Convention for prohibition of development, production, storage and use of chemical weapons and destruction of it. On level of European Union, one has adopted the Decision (PESC) 2015/259[2] of Council dated 17th February 2015 on the support awarded to the activities of the Organisation for Prohibition of Chemical Weapons (OPCW) for the implementation of EU strategy against proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, article 1 par. (1) stipulating that „For immediate and actual enforcement of certain elements of EU strategy, the Union supports the activities of OPCW*, for the following objectives:*

- consolidation of capacity of member states to meet the obligations incumbent upon it in terms of CWC;
- increase of level of preparation of member states to prevent attacks involving toxic chemical products and to defeat it;
- intensification of international cooperation in the field of chemical activities;
- support of OPCW capacity to adjust to evolutions in the field of science and technology;
- promotion of universality by encouraging non-member states to adhere to the convention".

Romania has signed the Convention on the first day of opening for signing and ratified it on 9th December 1994, by Law no.125/1994[3].

In order to reach its objective, the Convention has instituted a rigorous regime of verification of non-production of chemical weapons in peaceful industry and destruction of existing inventories, by annual declarations and inspections on site.

The enforcement of verification system involves a high volume of information, contained in declarations or obtained by international inspectors.

The Convention pays special attention to the measures of protection of classified information, called confidential, with express disposals in „Annex of confidentiality", for a fair balance between security, freedom and private life[4], in the global context of influencing the international cooperation by a range of specific factors such as crises, conflicts and international tensions[5].

2. Organization for Prohibition of Chemical Weapons

This organization has the seat in Hague and includes three bodies: Conference of Member States; Executive Board; Technical Secretariat.

The Conference of Member States[6] is the main body of the Organization for Prohibition of Chemical Weapons and includes the representatives of all member states, together with alternates and counsellors.

The Executive Board[7] is the executive body of OPCW, formed of 41 members, elected on 2-year term, fairly representing the 5 regional groups. It gathers 4-6 times per year in ordinary sessions, as well as on need, in extraordinary sessions. It presents reports in the Conference of Member States, it supervises the activity of Technical Secretariat and cooperates with national authorities of member states.

The Technical Secretariat [8] is liable for daily enforcement of Convention, supporting the Conference of Member States and the Executive Council in exercising its functions. It centralises and checks the information supplied by member states in the initial and annual declarations.

The Technical Secretariat is managed by a general manager elected by the Conference of Member States for 4 years, and includes operative divisions and other structures.

The 4 operative divisions with the component services are:

- Division verification with the following services: declarations, confidentiality, elaboration and analysis of politics, verification in industry and chemical demilitarisation;
- Inspectorate with the following services: operations and planning, inspection management, analysis of inspections and inspection staff;
- Division of external relations with the following services: relations with governments and political problems, public relations and protocol;
- Division of international cooperation and support with the following services: international cooperation, protection and emergency support.

Note the existence in the structure of the Division verification of Confidentiality Service. The subsidiary bodies includes the Board for settlement of disputes of confidentiality or, briefly, the Board for confidentiality. ## 3. Classification of information within the Organization for Prohibition of Chemical Weapons

In the system of Convention, information is defined based on its capacity and potential to supply, directly or indirectly, data and knowledge, regardless the composition or tangible or intangible nature[9].

The information includes all means which may be used for procurement, transmission or storage of data or knowledge obtained by a person or Organization during the process of enforcement of Convention.

The information may be documents with written data: graphics, schemas, numerical, symbolic, analogical, photographic; photo or video records on inspection; data stored or presented on electronic, magnetic or other physical support [10]. Also, the materials, objects, equipments and even personal objects may represent sources of information. For instance, if an operator within a chemical installation wears gas mask or other relevant protective equipment, the information concluded is that in the installation is present a toxic substance.

The convention related to interdiction of chemical weapons stipulates that all information obtained or communicated by the Organisation for Prohibition of Chemical Weapons (OPCW), deemed confidential, is classified in relevant categories based on sensitivity level.

In determining the sensitivity level of an information the following factors are considered:

- potential level of damages which may be caused by revealing the information to a member state, public institutions, companies or citizens;
- level of potential advantage which the reveal of information may bring to a state, body, company or person.

Related to such factors, the confidential information is classified in three categories:

OPCW – limited access (OPCW Restricted, engl., OPCW Restreinte, fr.);

OPCW – protected (OPCW Protected, engl., OPCW Protegee, fr.);

OPCW – highly protected (OPCW Highly Protected, engl., Hautement Protegee, fr.).

The information not included in any of the categories mentioned is deemed unclassified and properly marked: unclassified (English) and non classees (French).

The information supplied by member states is classified by the authorities within such states; if a state may communicate to the Organisation for Prohibition of Chemical Weapons (OPCW) information which seem confidential, without mentioning the classification level, the general manager of OPCW has the obligation to classify provisionally, to manage it according to such classification and contact the state supplying the information to confirm, amend or change the provisional classification;

The confidential information generated by Technical Secretariat of OPCW is provisionally classified by the officers issuing it. The final classification is the responsibility of general manager or deputy general manager of OPCW.

During the inspection, the initial classification of data is dealt with by the representative of the member state inspected, classification observed as well by the team of inspectors of OPCW during the entire term of inspection. Note that each member state has full authority in determining the classification level of the information supplied.

Usually, the classification assigned to an information remains in force until it ends the validity term determined on issuance or when changed during a reclassification or declassification process.

When it supplies to OPCW confidential information, the member states must state as well the duration of validity of classification level. If not stated the duration of validity of classification, the information is deemed to maintain its nature on indefinite term.

For a viable and effective protection of confidential information and to remove from archives the materials with confidential information with expired validity, the member states and the Technical Secretariat review the confidentiality nature assigned, either to continue enforcing it, or to reduce the category of classification or for declassification. Therefore, periodically, the Confidentiality Service of Technical Secretariat elaborates and implements programs for destruction of information held by Organization. In this respect, it is required the written consent of member states supplying the information, as well as of the states mentioned in the information elaborated by OPCW.

The change of classification category may be done only by the authority classifying the information or with its written consent. This rule is enforced both to the documents submitted by member states, and that elaborated by Technical Secretariat.

The reclassification of an information issued by Technical Secretariat or by a member state may be required when reviewed and amended or completed so as to make a significant difference of confidentiality level

The declassification of confidential information represents passing it to a classification category in the position „unclassified", thus without a confidential nature.

In case of declassification of information, the principles presented are also enforced to change the classification category.

The declassification of confidential information does not entail implicitly the right to publish. This needs a separate process of consultation and approval.

4. Access and transmission of confidential information in OPCW system

The access and transmission of confidential information in OPCW system are ruled by two principles[11]:

- access to confidential information is ruled in conformity to the level of classification of it;
- the communication of confidential information is governed by the principle „need to know".

Such principles generate two practical issues related to treatment and protection of confidential information:

- the level of classification of confidential information is essential in determining the procedures of communication and measures of protection of data;
- the beneficiaries of confidential information are determined based on their proved need to enter in the possession of it, only for enforcement of Convention.

The communication of confidential information to member states is governed by a disposal of Convention, according to which OPCW must regularly communicate to member states the data necessary to make sure that all other states consequently enforce the disposals of this international legal instrument.

The method of transmission by OPCW to a member state will entail a permanent protection, on a relevant level with the classification of such information.

Each member state which is an addressee has the obligation to manage the confidential information received in conformity to classification level of it and to supply to OPCW, on demand, details related to management of the information received.

The Convention rules as well the access to confidential data of other persons or bodies beyond the Technical Secretariat. The selection of laboratories to analyse the samples, the determination of authorised experts etc. are done only against an authorisation issued by the general director or other officer appointed by it, pursuant to determining the level to know, and strictly limited to minimum necessary for accomplishment of a requisite imposed by the enforcement of Convention.

All confidential information is kept and shared recording the identity of each person accessing it, the date and time of access.

The highly protected documents are supervised permanently, so as to be known exactly, on any moment, who had or has in possession such documents.

[11] For principles of informative activity, see, Petrescu, quoted work, pp. 27-31.

Each material or document containing confidential information is marked with a classification level. The confidential documents have coloured covers, as follows:

red –OPCW HIGHLY PROTECTED;

purple - OPCW PROTECTED;

blue - OPCW RESTRICTED.

The multiplication of documents containing confidential information is done based on the fact that the need of number of copies corresponds to legitimate scope approved, so as to reduce it on minimum necessary, and the copies marked according to such level of confidentiality.

The number of copies is registered, and each copy is numbered. The copies are shared only to approved addressees, the operation being recorded in the special register. The additional copies or those no longer useful are handed over for archiving or destruction, this operation being recorded as well.

The operations of destruction, respectively of transmission of confidential information, both on paper, and electronically, have no distinct nature. It must be mentioned only that the performance procedures of such operations are ruled by norms approved by the general manager.

5. Conclusions

In conclusion, the systems of management of classified information experienced and long applied within NATO[12] and EU, as well as within the Organization for Prohibition of Chemical Weapons may represent models for all those called to provide for security of classified information in Romania.

THE MEANING OF NATIONAL COURT IN ARTICLE 267 TFEU AND THE IMPORTANCE OF THE COURT'S INDEPENDENCE

Iuliana-Mădălina LARION[*]

Abstract

The notion of "court or tribunal of a Member State" in Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union has been given an autonomous meaning by the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU), resulting from its rich case-law of preliminary rulings. One of the recent developments in the analysis of this notion concerns the importance of the independence of the judiciary, as an element of the rule of law, one of the key values of the European Union. The study presents the requirements a judicial body must fulfil in order to be allowed to request a preliminary ruling, with emphasis on the criterion of independence and focus on the latest jurisprudence. The goal is to draw conclusions on the effect that measures adopted by the European Union's institutions for the protection of the rule of law in some Member States might have on CJEU's jurisdiction to accept requests for preliminary rulings from the courts of the Member States in question..

Keywords: European Union; preliminary rulings procedure; national court; rule of law; independence of the judiciary.

1. Introduction

Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) is the legal basis for the Court of Justice of the European Union's[1] jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings concerning the interpretation of the Treaties and the validity and interpretation of acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the European Union (EU), at the request of a court or tribunal of a Member State.

The preliminary rulings procedure is a dialogue between the national court and the Court of Justice. It is meant to facilitate the national courts' mission to interpret and apply the EU law and the Court of Justice of the European Union's mission to ensure coherent and uniform application of EU law in all Member States.

This procedure does not establish a hierarchy between the reffering court and the responding court. National courts are EU courts and are the first called upon to interpret and apply EU law. Only if they face difficulties in fulfilling this task, which cannot be overcome by studying the case-law, if they consider that are grounds for a revision of the jurisprudence, if they have doubts about the validity of an EU rule or about its uniform interpretation in all the Member States, they may use this procedural instrument to obtain the opinion of the specialized supranational court, which has the legitimacy and the experience necessary to give rulings with binding effects in the Member States.

In the Court of Justice's own words[2]:

"In order to ensure that the specific characteristics and the autonomy of the EU legal order are preserved, the Treaties have established a judicial system intended to ensure consistency and uniformity in the interpretation of EU law (…).

In that context, in accordance with Article 19 TEU, it is for the national courts and tribunals and the Court of Justice to ensure the full application of EU law in all Member States and to ensure judicial protection of the rights of individuals under that law (…).

In particular, the judicial system as thus conceived has as its keystone the preliminary ruling procedure provided for in Article 267 TFEU, which, by setting up a dialogue between one court and another, specifically between the Court of Justice and the courts and tribunals of the Member States, has the object of securing uniform interpretation of EU law, thereby serving to ensure its consistency, its full effect and its autonomy as well as, ultimately, the particular nature of the law established by the Treaties."

This system of cooperation is founded on the principle of mutual trust between Member States, a principle resulted from sharing the values enshrined in Article 2 of the Treaty on European Union (TEU)[3].

The study aims to clarify, with respect to the relevant case-law of the Court of Justice, the meaning of "national court or tribunal of a Member State", in order to focus on the most recent relevant cases and to determine the possible legal consequences on the application of Article 267 TFEU of the loss of mutual trust between Member States as to some of the Member State's ability to ensure and guarantee the independence of the judiciary, a key element of the rule of law.

[3] Article 2 TEU reads: "The Union is founded on the values of respect for human dignity, freedom, democracy, equality, the rule of law and respect for human rights, including the rights of persons belonging to minorities. These values are common to the Member States in a society in which pluralism, non-discrimination, tolerance, justice, solidarity and equality between women and men prevail."

Since the subject-matter of the study focuses on recent case-law developments, there are few contributions in legal literature and many points open to debate.

2. National court or tribunal of a Member State within the meaning of Article 267 TFEU

The notion of court or tribunal, found in Article 267 TFEU is an autonomous notion in EU law[4]. The Court of Justice determined that its meaning is not limited to the judiciary system, but may include other bodies authorized to render rulings of a judicial nature.

The characteristics of such a body were defined by the Court of Justice in the Broekmeulen[5] case. The Appeals Committee for General Medicine raised a preliminary question in the context of an appeal lodged by doctor Broekmeulen, of Netherlands nationality, who obtained a diploma of doctor in Belgium and was refused authorization to practice medicine in the Netherlands by the Registration Committee. Both the Registration Committee and the Appeals Committee were private bodies, established by the Royal Netherlands Society for the Promotion of Medicine, a private association. The great majority of doctors in the Netherlands belonged to this society.

The Court noted that a study of the internal legislation revealed it was impossible for a doctor who intended to practise in the Netherlands to do so and to be recognized by the sickness insurance schemes, without being registered by the Registration Committee. If registration was denied, an appeal could be made to the Appeals Committee. This body was composed of medical practitioners, representatives of university medical faculties and government representatives, appointed for five years. Thus, it included a significant degree of involvement on the part of public authorities. Also, it determined disputes on the adversarial principle and its decisions could be challenged in the ordinary courts, but that had never happened before.

The Court observed that this body was acting under a degree of governmental supervision and, in conjunction with the public authorities, created appeal procedures which could affect the exercise of rights granted by Community law. Thus, the Court considered imperative, in order to ensure the proper functioning of Community law, that it should have the opportunity of ruling on issues of interpretation and validity arising out of such procedures.

The Court concluded that, as a result of the foregoing considerations and in the absence, in practice, of any right of appeal to the ordinary courts, the Appeals Committee, which operated with the consent of the public authorities and with their cooperation, and which, after an adversarial procedure, delivered decisions which were, in fact, recognized as final, must, in a matter involving the application of Community law, be considered as a court or tribunal of a Member State.

The solution of the Court of Justice was different in the Borker[6] case, in which another professional body, the Bar Council of the Paris Court, was not considered a judicial body able to ask for a preliminary ruling. The Court observed that it does not have jurisdiction to give a ruling, since it can only be requested to give judgments in proceedings intended to lead to a decision of a judicial nature. The Bar Council was not under the legal duty to try the case. It was only requested to give a declaration relating to a dispute between a member of the bar and the courts or tribunals of another member state.

The Court of Justice also had the task to establish, by way of interpretation, the territorial sphere of the notion of court from a Member State. Thus, in the Bar and Montrose Holdings Ltd. case[7], the Court held that its jurisdiction applied to the Isle of Man, which was not covered by the entire Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (TEEC), but to which a special Protocol annexed to the Treaty applied, since the Protocols have the same legal force as the Treaty itself.

The Court also declared its jurisdiction over French Polynesia, in joint cases Kaefer and Procacci[8]. The administrative tribunal was situated in French Polynesia. The Court noted that it was not disputed that the administrative tribunal was a French court and that part four of the TEEC empowers the institutions of the Community, in particular the Council, to lay down provisions relating to the overseas countries and territories on the basis of the principles set out in the Treaty. Since the preliminary reference concerned such a provision, the Court decided it had jurisdiction to answer the question raised by the administrative tribunal.

On the other hand, in the Andersson[9] case, the Court stated that, although it has, in principle, jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings concerning the interpretation of the Agreement on the European Economic Area (EEA) when a question arises before one of the national courts, since the provisions of that Agreement form an integral part of the Community legal system, that jurisdiction applies solely with regard to the Community, so that the Court has no jurisdiction to rule on the interpretation of the EEA Agreement as regards its application in the states belonging to the European Free Trade Association (EFTA). The fact that the EFTA state in question (Sweden) subsequently became a Member State of the European Union, so that the question emanates from a court or tribunal of one of the Member States, cannot have the effect of attributing to the Court of Justice jurisdiction to interpret the EEA Agreement as regards its application to situations which do not come within the Community legal order. Thus, the Court has no jurisdiction to rule on the effects of that Agreement within the national legal systems of the contracting states during the period prior to their accession to the European Communities.

Even a court that belongs to the judiciary system of more than one Member State may ask the Court of Justice to render a preliminary ruling. One example is the Parfums Christin Dior[10] case.

The preliminary reference was sent by the Benelux Court of Justice, a court common to the three Benelux Member States (Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg). The Court concluded that, in order to ensure the uniform application of Community law, this common court, faced with the task of interpreting Community rules in the performance of its function, must be regarded as entitled to refer questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.[11]

According to the settled case-law, the criteria used by the Court to determine if a body is a court or tribunal able to refer for a preliminary ruling are:

a) the body is established by law;
b) it is permanent;
c) its jurisdiction is compulsory;
d) its procedure is adversary (inter partes);
e) it applies rules of law;
f) it is independent.[12]

The enumeration of these criteria is found, for example, in paragraph 23 of the judgment in the Dorsch[13] case.

The preliminary reference was made by the German Federal Public Procurement Awards Supervisory Board, on the interpretation of an article from a Directive, relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts. The Court stated that the German Federal Public Procurement Awards Supervisory Board, which is established by law as the only body competent to determine, upon application of rules of law and after hearing the parties, whether lower review bodies have committed an infringement of the provisions applicable to procedures for the award of public contracts, whose decisions are binding and which carries out its task independently and under its own responsibility, satisfies the conditions necessary to be considered a national court.

The conclusion of the Court was the same in joint cases Jokela and Pitkäranta[14], with respect to the Finnish Rural Businesses Appeals Board, which was established by law and composed of members appointed by public authority and enjoying the same guarantees as judges against removal from office. The body had jurisdiction by law in respect of aid for rural activities, gave legal rulings in accordance with the applicable rules and the general rules of procedure, and, under certain conditions, an appeal could be lodged against its decision to the Supreme Administrative Court.

Another example is the Abrahamsson and Anderson[15] case. The Appeals Commission of the University of Göteborg was a permanent body, set up by law to examine appeals against certain decisions taken in relation to higher education, with members appointed by the government (three must be or must have been serving judges; at least three must be lawyers), the parties were given an opportunity to submit observations and to examine the information provided by the other parties, its decisions were binding and not subject to appeal. Although an administrative authority, it was vested with judicial functions, it applied rules of law and the procedure before it was inter partes. The judgement was given without receiving any instructions and in total impartiality.

On the contrary, in the Syfait and others[16] case, the Court held that the Greek Competition Commission did not satisfy the criteria because it was subject to the supervision of the Minister for Development, which implies that that minister was empowered, within certain limits, to review the lawfulness of its decisions. Even though its members enjoyed personal and operational independence, there were no particular safeguards in respect of their dismissal or the termination of their appointment, which was not an effective safeguard against undue intervention or pressure from the executive on those members.

In the judgment given in the Corbiau[17] case, the Court stated that the Director of the Direct Taxes and Excise Duties Directorate of the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg is not a court, because he answered complaints against the decisions of his subordinates and was himself under the direct authority of the Minister for Finance, so he could not be considered impartial. Furthermore, if his decision was challenged in court, he would be a party in the proceedings.

With regard to arbitral courts, in the Vaassen-Goebbels[18] case, the Court ruled that an arbitral tribunal constituted under Netherlands' law, whose members were appointed by a minister, with permanent activity, bound by rules of adversary procedure similar to those used by ordinary courts of law and bound to apply rules of law, can be considered a national court.

However, in the Nordsee[19] case, the Court conclouded that an arbitrator who decides a dispute by virtue of a clause inserted in a contract between parties is not a national court, because the contracting parties are under no obligation, in law or in fact, to refer their dispute to arbitration and the public authorities in the Member State concerned are not involved in the decision to opt for arbitration and are not called upon to intervene automatically in the proceedings before the arbitrator. The Court stated that, if in the course of arbitration, questions of Community law are raised which the ordinary courts may be called upon to examine in the context of their collaboration with arbitration tribunals or in the course of a review of an arbitration award, it is for those courts to ascertain whether it is necessary for them to make a preliminary reference, in exercising such functions.

Also, in the order given in the Greis Unterweger[20] case, the preliminary reference was declared inadmissible, on the ground that the body asking the preliminary question, a Consultative Commission for currency offences, was not competent to resolve disputes (to give a ruling in proceedings which are intended to result in a judicial decision), but its task was to submit an opinion within the framework of an administrative procedure.

Even if a body may be considered a court or tribunal when it is exercising a judicial function, if the preliminary question is submitted to the Court when the body is exercising other functions, like administrative ones[21], the question shall be declared inadmissible.

As to courts, stricto sensu, their right to refer for a preliminary ruling is recognized irrespective of whether they decide in first or in last instance. Their right cannot be limited by provisions of national law.[22]

3. The independence criterion

In recent case-law of the Court of Justice, the Margarit Panicello[23] case raised the question whether a court clerk (a registrar), who had the exclusive competence to decide actions for the recovery of fees of agents and lawyers, can refer to the Court of Justice a request for a preliminary ruling. The Court decided it didn't have jurisdiction to answer, because the registrar is not a court, within the meaning of Article 267 TFEU. The proceedings were administrative in nature and the clerk could not be regarded as exercising a judicial function. Furthermore, it did not meet the criterion of independence.

As to this last condition, the Court stated: "the requirement for a body making a reference to be independent is comprised of two aspects. The first, external, aspect presumes that the court exercises its functions wholly autonomously, without being subject to any hierarchical constraint or subordinated to any other body and without taking orders or instructions from any source whatsoever (…), and is thus protected against external interventions or pressure liable to jeopardise the independent judgment of its members as regards proceedings before them.

The second, internal, aspect is linked to impartiality and seeks to ensure a level playing field for the parties to the proceedings and their respective interests with regard to the subject matter of those proceedings. That aspect requires objectivity and the absence of any interest in the outcome of the proceedings apart from the strict application of the rule of law."

The Court decided that the registrar fulfils this criterion with regard to the internal aspect, but not with regard to the external aspect, "which requires there to be no hierarchical constraint or subordination to any other body that could give him orders or instructions", since Spanish law provided that the court clerk receives, and is required to comply with, instructions from his hierarchical superior.

The Court's assessment of this criterion was different in the MT Højgaard and Züblin[24] case. The reference for a preliminary ruling was made by the the Public Procurement Complaints Board from Denmark. The Court held that this Board is a third party in relation to the parties to the proceedings and has no functional link with the Danish Ministry for Business and Growth, but carries out its functions in an entirely independent manner. The Board does not occupy a hierarchical or subordinate position and does not take orders or instructions from any source whatsoever. Its members are bound to perform their duties in an independent manner. Most of them are members who come from the ranks of Danish judges and who have a decisive role in the decisions adopted by the Board.

Furthermore, the members of the Board who are members of the judiciary enjoy, in that capacity, the particular protection against dismissal, a protection which also extends to the performance of the tasks of a member of the presidency of the referring body.

Thus, the independence of the judges, who had a decisive role in adopting the decisions of the Board, led to the conclusion that the entire refering body, with judicial functions, is acting independently.

4. Independence of the judiciary

The rule of law is amongst the common values of the Member States of the European Union, values that are to be respected and promoted under Article 2 of the Treaty on European Union (TEU). The independence of the judiciary is a key element of the rule of law and one of the grounds for mutual trust between the Member States.

The Court of Justice has already analysed some of the factors which guarantee the independence of the judiciary. Amongst these factors are guarantees to protect the person who has the task of adjudicating in a dispute against removal from office[25] and the receipt by members of the judiciary of a level of remuneration commensurate with the importance of the functions they carry out[26].

Also, in the TDC[27] case, the Court emphasized the essential role in guaranteeing independence and impartiality of the existence of rules regarding the composition of the body and the appointment, length of service and the grounds for abstention, rejection and dismissal of its members, in order to dismiss any reasonable doubt in the minds of individuals as to the imperviousness of that body to external factors and its neutrality with respect to the interests before it.

In the last few years, the European Union's institutions have expressed concerns about the way in which some legislative measures adopted by some Member States might affect the independence of the judiciary in the Member States in question. The European Commission and the European Parliament have taken steps in triggering the procedure established by Article 7 TEU[28], simultaneously with infringement actions, on the basis of Articles 258-260 TFEU[29].

In this context, in the LM[30] case, the High Court in Ireland asked the Court of Justice to answer two preliminary questions, in order to decide on the execution of a European arrest warrant, issued by Polish authorities for the purpose of conducting criminal prosecutions for trafficking in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances.

The person concerned, detained in Ireland, opposed to being surrendered to Polish authorities. The person argued before the reffering court that he would be exposed to a real risk of a flagrant denial of justice in contravention of Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR)[31]. He contended that the recent legislative reforms of the system of justice in the Republic of Poland deny him his right to a fair trial, as those changes fundamentally undermine the basis of the mutual trust between the authority issuing the European arrest warrant and the executing authority and he relied on the Commission's reasoned proposal of 20 December 2017 submitted in accordance with Article 7 paragraph 1 of the Treaty on European Union regarding the rule of law in Poland.

In the reasoned proposal, the Commission sets out in detail the context and history of the legislative reforms and addresses two particular issues of concern: the lack of an independent and legitimate constitutional review and the threats to the independence of the ordinary judiciary. The Commission invites the Council to determine that there is a clear risk of a serious breach by the Republic of Poland of the values referred to in Article 2 TEU and to address to that Member State the necessary recommendations in that regard.

On the basis of this reasoned proposal the referring court concluded that, as a result of the cumulative impact of the legislative changes that have taken place in the Republic of Poland since 2015 concerning, in particular, the Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court, the National Council for the Judiciary, the organisation of the ordinary courts, the National School of Judiciary and the Public Prosecutor's Office, the rule of law has been breached in that Member State.

The referring court explained that it has based its conclusion on changes found by it to be particularly significant, such as: the changes to the constitutional role of the National Council for the Judiciary in safeguarding independence of the judiciary, in combination with the Polish Government's invalid appointments to the Constitutional Tribunal and its refusal to publish certain judgments; the fact that the Minister for Justice is now the Public Prosecutor, that he is entitled to play an active role in prosecutions and that he has a disciplinary role in respect of presidents of courts, which has the potential for a chilling effect on those presidents, with consequential impact on the administration of justice; the fact that the Supreme Court is affected by compulsory retirement and future appointments, and that the new composition of the National Council for the Judiciary will be largely dominated by political appointees; and the fact that the integrity and effectiveness of the Constitutional Court have been greatly interfered with in that there is no guarantee that laws in Poland will comply with the Polish Constitution, which is sufficient in itself to have effects throughout the criminal justice system.

Following this conclusion, the reffering court considered that there is a real risk of the person concerned being subjected to arbitrary in the course of his trial in the issuing Member State, wich is sufficent ground, under Irish law, to refuse his surrender.

The preliminary questions refered to the Court of Justice concerned the interpretation of Article 1 paragraph 3 of Framework Decision 2002/584[32], relating to the circumstances in which the executing judicial authority may refrain from giving effect to a European arrest warrant on account of the risk of breach, if the requested person is surrendered to the issuing judicial authority, of the fundamental right to a fair trial before an independent tribunal, as enshrined in Article 6 paragraph 1 of the ECHR, a provision which corresponds to the second paragraph of Article 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.

Thus, the referring court asked, in essence, if the executing judicial authority has information, such as that set out in a reasoned proposal of the Commission adopted pursuant to Article 7 paragraph 1 TEU, indicating that there is a real risk of breach of the fundamental right to a fair trial, on account of systemic or generalised deficiencies so far as concerns the independence of the issuing Member State's judiciary, it must determine, specifically and precisely, whether there are substantial grounds for believing that the individual concerned will run such a risk if he is surrendered to that State and, if the answer is in the affirmative, what are the conditions which such a check must satisfy.

The Court of Justice decided to rule in the composition of the Grand Chamber, in urgent preliminary procedure and offered a detailed response. The Court's assessment on the grounds of the case began with recalling that EU law is based on the fundamental premiss that each Member State shares with all the other Member States a set of common values on which the European Union is founded, as stated in Article 2 TEU. That premiss implies and justifies the existence of mutual trust between the Member States that those values will be recognised, and therefore that the EU law that implements them will be respected.

The Court emphasized that the European arrest warrant is the first concrete measure in the field of criminal law implementing the principle of mutual recognition, meant to facilitate and accelerate judicial cooperation in order to contribute to achieving EU's goal of being an area of freedom, security and justice, and is based on the high level of trust which must exist between the Member States. That is why Framework Decision 2002/584 sets the rule that Member States are required to execute any European arrest warrant on the basis of the principle of mutual recognition. Refusal to execute is intended to be an exception which must be interpreted strictly.

The Court underlined that the reasons for refusal are found in Articles 3, 4 and 4a of the Framework Decision 2002/584 and recognised that limitations may be placed on the principles of mutual recognition and mutual trust between Member States in exceptional circumstances. The Court held that, first of all, it must be determined whether a real risk of breach of the fundamental right of the individual concerned to an independent tribunal and, therefore, of his fundamental right to a fair trial, is capable of permitting the executing judicial authority to refrain, by way of exception, from giving effect to a European arrest warrant, on the basis of Article 1 paragraph 3 of Framework Decision 2002/584.

The Court stated that the requirement of judicial independence forms part of the essence of the fundamental right to a fair trial, a right which is of cardinal importance as a guarantee that all the rights which individuals derive from EU law will be protected and that the values common to the Member States set out in Article 2 TEU, in particular the value of the rule of law, will be safeguarded. It recalled that, in accordance with Article 19 TEU, which gives concrete expression to the value of the rule of law affirmed in Article 2 TEU, it is for the national courts and tribunals and the Court of Justice to ensure the full application of EU law in all Member States and judicial protection of the rights of individuals under that law. Consequently, every Member State must ensure that the bodies which, as courts or tribunals within the meaning of EU law, come within its judicial system in the fields covered by [32] Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, published in the Official Journal of the European Union L 190 of 18 July 2002.

EU law, meet the requirements of effective judicial protection, including the criterion of independence.

The Court stated, in paragraph 54 of its judgment: "The independence of national courts and tribunals is, in particular, essential to the proper working of the judicial cooperation system embodied by the preliminary ruling mechanism under Article 267 TFEU, in that, in accordance with the Court's settled case-law, that mechanism may be activated only by a body responsible for applying EU law which satisfies, inter alia, that criterion of independence."

Also, in paragraph 67, the Court noted: "The requirement of independence also means that the disciplinary regime governing those who have the task of adjudicating in a dispute must display the necessary guarantees in order to prevent any risk of its being used as a system of political control of the content of judicial decisions. Rules which define, in particular, both conduct amounting to disciplinary offences and the penalties actually applicable, which provide for the involvement of an independent body in accordance with a procedure which fully safeguards the rights enshrined in Articles 47 and 48 of the Charter, in particular the rights of the defence, and which lay down the possibility of bringing legal proceedings challenging the disciplinary bodies' decisions constitute a set of guarantees that are essential for safeguarding the independence of the judiciary."

The Court held that preserving the independence of judicial authorities is, also, primordial in the case of the European arrest warrant. The existence of a real risk that the individual concerned will suffer a breach of his fundamental right to an independent tribunal, and, thus, of his right to a fair trial, is capable of permitting the executing judicial authority to refrain, by way of exception, from giving effect to that European arrest warrant, on the basis of Article 1 paragraph 3 of Framework Decision 2002/584.

The Court of Justice offered the reffering court the necessary guidelines, stating that the executing judicial authority must, as a first step, assess, "on the basis of material that is objective, reliable, specific and properly updated concerning the operation of the system of justice in the issuing Member State" (paragraph 61), whether there is a real risk, connected with a lack of independence of the courts of that Member State on account of systemic or generalised deficiencies there, of the fundamental right to a fair trial being breached (having regard to the standard of protection guaranteed by Article 47 paragraph 2 of the Charter). Information in a reasoned proposal recently addressed by the Commission to the Council on the basis of Article 7 paragraph 1 TEU is particularly relevant for the purposes of that assessment.

The Court reiterated its findings regarding the criterion of independence in its judgements in cases Wilson, Associação Sindical dos Juízes Portugueses and TDC and noted that they represent a check point for the assessment in the fist stage, in order to determine the existence of a real risk of breach of the essence of the fundamental right to a fair trial on account of systemic or generalised deficiencies concerning the judiciary of that Member State, such as to compromise the independence of that State's courts.

If the risk exists, the second step is to assess specifically and precisely whether, in the particular circumstances of the case, there are substantial grounds for believing that, following his surrender to the issuing Member State, the requested person will run that risk.

An automatic refuse to execute a European arrest warrant could only be founded on a decision of the European Council determining, as provided for in Article 7 paragraph 2 TEU, that there is a serious and persistent breach in the issuing Member State of the principles set out in Article 2 TEU, such as those inherent to the rule of law, and if the Council were then to suspend Framework Decision 2002/584 in respect of that Member State.

Accordingly, as long as such a decision has not been adopted by the European Council, the executing judicial authority may refrain, on the basis of Article 1 paragraph 3 of Framework Decision 2002/584, to give effect to a European arrest warrant issued by a Member State, which is the subject of a reasoned proposal as referred to in Article 7 paragraph 1 TEU, only in exceptional circumstances where that authority finds, after carrying out a specific and precise assessment of the particular case, that there are substantial grounds for believing that the person in respect of whom that European arrest warrant has been issued will, following his surrender to the issuing judicial authority, run a real risk of breach of his fundamental right to an independent tribunal and, therefore, of the essence of his fundamental right to a fair trial.

In the course of such an assessment, the executing judicial authority must, in particular, examine to what extent the systemic or generalised deficiencies, as regards the independence of the issuing Member State's courts, to which the material available to it attests are liable to have an impact at the level of that State's courts with jurisdiction over the proceedings to which the requested person will be subject. The court must regard his personal situation, as well as the nature of the offence for which he is being prosecuted and the factual context that forms the basis of the European arrest warrant.

Also, it must, pursuant to Article 15 paragraph 2 of Framework Decision 2002/584, request from the issuing judicial authority any supplementary information that it considers necessary for assessing whether there is such a risk. In the course of such a dialogue, the issuing judicial authority may, where appropriate, provide the executing judicial authority with any objective material on any changes concerning the conditions for protecting the guarantee of judicial independence in the issuing Member State, material which may rule out the existence of that risk for the individual concerned.

If all the information obtained does not lead to the conslusion that the person concerned shall not suffer such a risk, then the executing judicial authority must refrain from giving effect to the European arrest warrant.

5. Conclusions

Recent case-law of the Court of Justice, with relevance to the notion of national court of a Member State of the European Union, within the meaning of art. 267 TFEU and, in particular, the considerations of the Court in cases where the criterion of the independence was analysed, pose, undoubtedly, innovative aspects.

The legal issues the Court has dealt with in the last few years have a pronounced character of novelty and are the product of the developments recorded in EU's recent history, in the context of the unprecedented challenges that the EU's institutions, as well as Member States, have had to manage. The concerns expressed by the European Commission and the European Parliament in relation to the existence of a clear risk of a serious breach by some Member State of the values referred to in Article 2 TEU, including systemic deficiencies in ensuring the independence of the judiciary and the steps taken to trigger Article 7 TEU, produce legal consequences upon the notion of court of a Member State in Article 267 TFEU, an autonomous notion in EU law.

From the grounds of the Court of Justice's judgment in the LM case, it results the idea that, even in the absence of a decision of the European Council, adopted on the basis of Article 7 paragraph 2 TEU, declaring the existence of a serious and persistent breach by a Member State of the values referred to in Article 2 TEU, national courts have the competence to make their own assessment on the existence of a real risk of breach of the fundamental right to an independent tribunal in another Member State. This competence is derived from the principle of mutual trust between Member States, which is itself grounded on promoting and respecting common values.

Furthermore, another important idea derived form this judgment is that the independence of the national courts is also esenatial for the efficiency of the preliminary procedure machanism, since this procedure can only be initiated by a body that has the task to apply EU law and that fulfills, inter alia, the criterion of independence.

Thus, it is open to debate if one can deduce that, if the Europan Council determines the existence of a serious and persistent breach by a Member State of the value of rule of law, referred to in Article 2 TEU, by not ensuring and guaranteeing the independence of the judiciary, the Court of Justice would lose its jurisdiction to answer preliminary references made by the national courts of the Member State in question. It is also unclear, at this point, if such loss of jurisdiction would be automatic or would remain at the Court's discretion in each particular case, in the situation in which the Council would not decide to suspend the application of Article 267 TFEU for the Member State concerned.

The study intends to encourage debate on these legal points and other that may be identified, as further research topics could include the Court's judgements in other relevant pending cases and the evolution of the jurisprudence in assesing the notion of court of a Member State, for the purpose of appliying Article 267 TFEU.

PRINCIPLES REGARDING STATE JURISDICTION IN INTERNATIONAL LAW

Oana – Adriana IACOB

Abstract

The concept of state jurisdiction in international law is based on the principle of sovereign equality, establishing that each state enjoys the exclusive right to exercise authority (with the obligation of non-interference for other members of the international community) over a given territory, its population and its goods, as well as over events and acts committed within its territorial boundaries. The central focus of the present paper is jurisdiction, regarded as a manifestation of sovereignty, referring to the state competence to legislate and apply law to particular events, persons and property. Traditionaly, jurisdiction has been tightly connected to the concept of territory. However, of particular interest is what happens in situations that involve elements of extraneity, when several states claim jurisdiction over a certain event. In this sense, the five principles governing the exercise of state jurisdiction in criminal law matters will be analysed.

Keywords: jurisdiction, sovereignty, principle of territoriality, principle of nationality, principle of universality

1. Introduction

In an international community characterized by polyarchy and, at the same time, by the interdependence between its members, there are two types of interests and concerns in balance - international concerns of the general community and states' particular interests. In the doctrinal analyses of authority in the international order two perspectives on the allocation of authority[1] have been described: on one hand, a vertical allocation of authority between the general community and the particular states – focusing on addressing international concerns – and, on the other hand, a horizontal allocation of authority between the different states in a (still) very state-centered world, governed by the principle of sovereignty.

According to the principle of sovereign equality – basic principle of international law and fundamental pillar of the existing international order – all states, regardless of their differences and asymetries in areas such as military power, geographical and population size, levels of industrialisation and economic development, have equal rights when it comes to the exercise of sovereignty, at international level, as independent entities in relation to other states, and at internal, domestic level, as authorities solely endowed with the competence of exercising power over a particular territory, as well as population, property and events within their territorial boundaries.

Although the concept of jurisdiction may seem rather technical, referring to procedural applications of domestic law and practical delimitations of competences between states, it is, actually much more than that.[2] The concept of state jurisdiction refers to the allocation of power between the members of the international community, being rooted in the principle of sovereignty of states.

Although the actual term is quite generic and has been used in a variety of senses in the literature of international law, there are, basically, three (interrelated) types of jurisdiction that a state can exercise:

- Legislative/ prescriptive jurisdiction – to elaborate laws applicable to everyone and everything within its territorial boundaries;
- Enforcement jurisdiction – to enforce its laws and regulations against those who breach them;
- Adjudicatory jurisdiction – to exercise judicial authority within its territory.[3]

Traditionally, the concept of jurisdiction was tightly and inevitably related to the concept of territory ("jurisdiction as a mist above the swamp of territory")[4], revolving around the power of states. In this classical view, jurisdiction became a matter of international law only when it involved elements of extraneity (for instance, activities taking place abroad), having to do with another state's territorial authority. The major concern was that such extraterritorial elements could lead to conflicts between states. So, in matters of jurisdiction, territoriality was seen as the valid rule, while extraterritoriality was considered suspicious (if not unlawful).[5] This has been the most widely accepted view on jurisdiction for a very long time. However, the increasing interdependence between states has generated a shift in the conception on jurisdiction in international law.

In some instances, it occurred that the exercise of jurisdiction by a particular state came in conflict with the right invoked by another state to exercise jurisdiction on the same issue. Therefore, between the respective states arose a jurisdictional difference. Over the years, international law evolved towards establishing means of resolution for such differences (either conventional or accepted as customary).[6]

The analysis contained in the present paper focuses on this type of situations, on the rules applicable for their resolution and the controversies that they arise in the practice of states.

2. Principles of jurisdiction

Jurisdictional differences in civil law matters are, usually, resolved in accordance with rules of private international law, elaborated and implemented by the state.

On the other hand, criminal law matters are tied to a greater extent to the public sphere and, thus, jurisdictional conflicts of such type lead to specific effects in international law.

A major turning point in the law of jurisdiction (that has influenced international law's approach on the matter ever since) was the 1935 Harvard Research Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, published in the American Journal of International Law.[7] The Harvard Draft enunciates a series of principles of jurisdiction: territoriality, nationality, protection – security and universality.[8] The "star" of the Harvard Convention remains, of course, territoriality, extraterritorial jurisdiction being considered (still) an anomaly in need of strong justification.

In practice, over time, the principles enunciated by the Harvard Convention have been contested and subjected to a variety of interpretations. Of course, the most widely accepted and applied among states has been the principle of territoriality, according to which a state is authorized to legislate and apply its laws to all events taking place within their borders, regardless whether these events involve nationals or non-nationals of the respective state. Nevertheless, the principle of territoriality sometimes clashed with other jurisdictional principles.

For instance, in the 1988 Lockerbie incident, in which an US airliner was bombed by two Libyan nationals in Lockerbie, Scotland, UK, leading to the deaths of 270 people of different nationalities, there were several claims of jurisdiction over the event: UK claimed jurisdiction because the incident took place on its territory; US did the same, based on the fact that an US registered aircraft was bombed and many of the victims were US citizens; also Libya expressed its intention to prosecute the two suspects, under its domestic law, based on their Libyan nationality.[9] Such intricate jurisdictional differences create many controversies in international practice and doctrine.

2.1. The principle of territoriality

As showen above, according to the principle of territoriality, a state can exercise jurisdiction over everything and everyone within its territorial borders, with some notable exceptions provided by customary or conventional international law (such as, for instance, the case of diplomatic missions premises, under the provisions of the 1961 Vienna Convention on diplomatic relations). Thus, the state exerts comprehensive and continuing authority over its territory (including internal waters, territorial sea and airspace). The wide preference of states for this principle reflects the importance of territoriality in the present-day state system.[10] Actually, the exercise of territorial jurisdiction seems to be an essential and very visible way of manifesting state sovereignty.

However, in practice, the implementation of the principle is often not so easy and clear-cut. What happens, for example, if the crime is initiated on the territory of a state and completed on the territory of another state? In the Lockerbie incident mentioned above, for example, it was believed that the bombs which exploded in the airliner were loaded in Malta, although the explosion took place in UK.[11] Could Malta have had the right to claim jurisdiction, based on the fact that part of the crime was committed on its territory, also violating its domestic norms?

In such cases, the doctrine and practice of international law does not offer a generally agreed answer. There are two theories suggesting two types of jurisdiction tests to be applied in this kind of situations: the objective test theory and the subjective test theory.

According to the objective test, also known as the "terminatory theory", if a crime was completed on the territory of a state, the latter has the right to exercise its jurisdiction, regardless of where the crime was initiated. It is probably the most favoured theory of the two. An argument formulated in the specialized literature to sustain the terminatory theory is the fact that "the state where the last element of the crime occurs is presumably the sufferer from it, and therefore has the greatest interest in prosecuting it".[12]

The subjective test or the "initiatory theory" suggests that a state can claim the exercise of its jurisdiction if the crime was initiated on its territory, regardless of where it was actually completed. The subjective test proved to have an important practical utility, especially in cases of transborder crimes (terrorism or money laundering).[13]

Another variation on the principle of territoriality is the "effect doctrine", according to which a state has jurisdiction over a crime if its effects are felt on its territory, regardless of the fact that it was not initiated, planned or executed in that respective state. Also, according to the effect doctrine, it is irrelevant whether that particular conduct was lawful in the state in which it was executed.[14] In LICRA v. Yahoo! (The Yahoo! Auctions Case, 2000), for instance, two non-profit human rights groups – LICRA (Ligue contre le Racisme et l'Antisemitisme) and UEJF (Union des Etudiants Juifs de France) – filed a lawsuit against Yahoo! in a French court in Paris, because it allowed the auction of Nazi memorabilia on its website, which was accessible to French citizens. The two organizations claimed it violated the French law that incriminates the offering, wearing or public exhibition of Nazi related items under the French Penal Code. Given the fact that Yahoo! is based on the US territory and the acts were not committed in France, the company contesteted the jurisdiction of the French court. Nevertheless, the court rejected Yahoo!'s contestation, finding it had jurisdiction, because the company's conduct caused damage that was suffered in France.[15] Naturally, the effect doctrine sparked some controversies, leading to efforts to limit its application only in cases in which the primary effect or a substantial effect of a crime is felt in a particular state.[16]

2.2. The principle of nationality

The principle of nationality allows a state to impose its jurisdiction on its nationals, wherever they may be: on the the territory of their state, outside the territory of their state and any other states (high seas and airspace over high sea, for instance) or on the territory of another state (with permission). According to this principle, the fact that a state's nationals have the duty to obey its laws even when they are outside its territory entitles that state to regulate their conduct anywhere.

The principle of nationality regards not only natural persons – human beings (based on their relation of citizenship with the respective state), but also juristic persons – corporations, ships, aircraft, spacecraft (based on a relation of nationality).

Concerning the nationality of ships, it has been recognized as that of the flag state – the country of registration (although it is most often related to the fiction of territoriality[17]).

The nationality of aircraft, as regulated by the 1944 Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation, is the state of registration. According to the 1963 Tokyo Convention on Offenses and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft, the state of registration has exclusive competence to legislate and enforce its laws on acts committed on board of their ships.[18]

Regarding objects launched into space, the 1967 Outer Space Treaty does not regulate their nationality, but it stipulates that the control and jurisdiction over these objects and the personnel thereof are exercised by the state of registration.[19]

Referring to crimes or offences committed by individuals or corporations on the territory of another state, the principle of nationality proved to be particularly useful when the state where the act was committed refused to prosecute it because, for instance, it was not incriminated according to its domestic laws or, although it was incriminated, the respective state was simply unwilling or uninterested to do it (for example, in child trafficking cases, in some countries where these crimes are either not properly regulated or their prosecution is generally lax).[20] In such cases, the application of the nationality principle allowed the prosecution of the offenders in their countries of citizenship.

The nationality principle has also been very usefully employed in issues of private international law, in cases of evasion of the law, when a state's domestic legislation forbids certain acts and, in order to avoid these provisions, its national simply commits the acts in another state where the legislation does not contain such legal restrictions (for instance, to circumvent legal conditions related the conclusion of a marriage or divorce). In this type of situations, the nationality principle allows a state to enforce its legislation on its nationals wherever the acts are committed (in such cases, a divorce or a marriage concluded abroad may not be recognised by the state of nationality if they breach its legal restrictions).

2.3. The protective principle

According to the protective principle, a state can exercise its jurisdiction over acts committed abroad by their nationals or by foreign citizens, if those acts threaten the interests, security or functioning of the respective state. Although the protective principle bears some similarities with the effect doctrine mentioned above, the main difference is that the former contains no requirement that the effect of the offence should be felt on the territory of the state that claims to exert jurisdiction.[21]

Articles 7 and 8 of the Harvard Draft Convention refer to the protective jurisdiction of states in cases of crimes against "the security, territorial integrity or political independence" of states or acts of "falsification or counterfeiting, or uttering of falsified copies or counterfeits of the seals, currency, instruments of credit, stamps, passports or public documents, issued by the state or under its authority."[22]

There was an initial reluctance towards invoking this principle, but, in the 1960s, it became more popular (especially for the USA). For instance, in 1985, Alfred Zehe, an East German citizen was prosecuted under US jurisdiction for acts of espionage against the USA, committed in Mexico and in the German Democratic Republic.[23]

The protective principle proved its usefulness in highly sensitive issues. Nevertheless, there were instances in which the invocation of the principle was rather dubious, potentially undermining its integrity.[24]

2.4. The principle of passive personality

The principle of passive personality is the most controversial of all. It was not included among the principles of jurisdiction in the Harvard Draft Convention, one of the reasons being that it could be partially included in the principle of universality.

The principle of passive personality allows a state to exercise its jurisdiction over an act committed abroad by a foreigner, if the respective act injures a national of that state. It is linked to the principle of nationality, but in a somehow reverse manner: while in the case of the principle of nationality, the national is the perpetrator, in the principle of passive personality, the national is the victim. It also resembles to some extent the protective principle, but while in the latter's case the interests and security of the state are affected, in the former's case the interests of the nationals of that state are injured.

There were some early and notable assertions of this principle. One case that is considered the locus classicus of the passive personality principle is the Cutting Case (1866). In this case, Mr. Cutting, an American citizen, published in a Texan newspaper, some offensive materials about Mr. Barayd, a Mexican national, an act which was a breach of the Mexican Penal Code. Mr. Cutting was subsequently arrested, while entering Mexico, and charged with breaching the Mexican law. Mexico claimed it had jurisdiction over the case, based on the principle of passive personality. Of course, the United States strongly opposed Mexico's claim and the case caused some frictions between the two states. Mr. Cutting was later released, because the injured party withdrew the charges. So the case was inconclusive in regard to the application of the principle.

Perhaps the most notable assertion of the passive personality was in the Lotus Case (1927), brought before the Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ). The case referred to an incident that took place on August, the 2nd, 1926, in which S.S.Lotus, a French steamer, collided with S.S. Bozkurt, a Turkish steamer, in the high seas (north of the Greek city of Mytilene), causing the sinking of the Turkish vessel and the deaths of eight Turkish nationals. Turkey claimed jurisdiction over the event, based on the nationality of the victims (passive personality principle), and wanted to prosecute the French officer who was thought to be at fault for the collision. France opposed Turkey's claim, contending that, as flag state, it had jurisdiction over the matter (the principle regarding the jurisdiction of the flag state in such cases was later stipulated in the 1958 Geneva Convention on the High Seas). The case was brought before the PCIJ and the Court decided that there was no rule of international law, at the time, stipulating that criminal proceedings regarding collisions at sea are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the flag state and, therefore, because there was no such prohibitory rule, Turkey had not violated international law by instituting criminal proceedings against the French officer (Lotus principle - states can act as they wish unless the conduct is explicitly prohibited in international law).[25] However, the majority of the PCIJ judges rejected Turkey's justifications, which were based on the principle of passive personality, considering that Turkey had other grounds for holding the French officer liable (effect doctrine or impact territoriality). So, the court's decision was not conclusive on the passive personality principle issue.

Spain had an interesting approach on the passive personality principle in the Guatemala Genocide Case. In 1999, an action was brought before a Spanish court concerning acts committed by certain officials of Guatemala, between 1978 and 1990, in Guatemala, against the Mayan indigenous population. The acts constituted the crime of genocide. During the course of events, some Spanish nationals were also tortured and killed. The Spanish court refused to exercise jurisdiction based on the principle of passive nationality, arguing that the nationality of the victims can not be the sole foundation for the jurisdiction claim. Another essential criterion must be met: the crime invoked before the Spanish court must be the same as the one that forms the basis of the jurisdiction – genocide. The latter criterion was not met in the case, since the Spanish nationals had not been victims of genocide.[26]

As mentioned above, it was considered that there was an overlapping between the passive personality principle and the principle of universality. Thus, the former was seen as somehow redundant. In the Eichmann Case, Adolf Eichmann, one of the major organizers of Hitler's final solution, was captured by the national intelligence agency of Israel (the Mossad) in Argentina, and prosecuted under Israeli jurisdiction. He was found guilty of the commission of war crimes and subsequently executed by hanging (1962). Israel invoked the universality principle as basis for its jurisdiction, but, nevertheless, the District Court of Jerusalem later justified its competence on the ground that the main victims of the defendant's crimes were Jews.[27]

A case in which the passive personality principle was asserted alongside the universality principle was Yunis Case. In this case, Mr. Yunis, a Lebanese citizen, and several accomplices, hijacked a Jordanian airplane in Beirut, in June 1985. The airplane was flown to some locations in the Mediterranean Sea and, eventually back to Beirut were it was blown up. Several victims were American citizens (this was the only actual, direct connection between the event and the United States). The United States went on to prosecute Mr. Yunis, invoking as basis for its jurisdiction the principle of universality (given the international provisions that condemn these sort of heinous acts) and (contrary to their earlier reluctance towards it) the principle of passive personality.[28]

In the practice of states, it was observed that the principle of passive personality can, unfortunately, lead to more jurisdictional differences, especially if the acts are also incriminated in the state where they were committed and/or in the state of nationality of the perpetrator. However, it can be particularly useful in case the latter states are unwilling or unable to exercise jurisdiction.

2.5. The principle of universality

A state is entitled to exercise universal jurisdiction over crimes that constitute a threat to the common interests of mankind, regardless of who committed the crimes, where they were committed and who were the victims. These are acts that, because of their gravity, affecting vital interests of the international community, can be prosecuted by any state, which apprehends or exercises effective control over the perpetrator. No conditions regarding nationality or territoriality are imposed in these cases. What matters is the nature of the crime, that causes universal concern.[29]

The universality principle has a special character that differentiates it from other bases of jurisdiction. The other principles of jurisdiction analysed above derive from national entitlements to legislate and implement law (for instance, entitlements based on a link of territoriality or nationality). Meanwhile, universal jurisdiction is based on an entitlement shared with other states, to implement and enforce international provisions that incriminate universal crimes. So the state exercising universal jurisdiction is simply an enforcer of legal international commitments, without any power of its own to decide which conduct falls under universal jurisdiction and in what conditions.[30]

Moreover, the universality principle goes beyond the classical dichomoty territorial-extraterritorial. Universal jurisdiction is neither territorial, in the traditional sense, nor extraterritorial. It is more of a "comprehensive territorial jurisdiction", based on international proscriptions that are universally applicable.[31]

The category of universal crimes is not new per se, although the number of offenses included in this category has always been rather low. The first (and, until relatively recently, the only) crime of universal jurisdiction was piracy. Acts of piracy occurring in the high seas – a space that does not fall under the jurisdiction of any state – were considered to pose a threat to all states. Prosecuting crimes of piracy was, basically, left to the state that apprehended the perpetrator. Although, initially, the incrimination had a customary nature, piracy was later regulated through conventional norms – the 1958 Convention on the High Seas and the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention.

After the Second World War, the category of universal crimes expanded, with the creation of the first international criminal tribunals in Nurenberg and Tokyo, and it is now considered to include the most serious breaches of human rights and humanitarian law, such as crimes against humanity, war crimes, genocide, apartheid, and certain crimes of terrorism. Most of these are nowadays incriminated through conventional norms, although some of them have had a prior customary reglementation. For instance, after the war, the principles of the Nurenberg Charter and Judgement defined crimes against peace, war crimes and crimes against humanity (at the time, the latter were only considered as such if they were committed in relation to a war). In 1948, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide was adopted, and, in 1973, the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid. The Statute of Rome of the International Criminal Court came into force in 2002, incriminating the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity (this time, with no requirement of any relation to a war), war crimes and (without a clear definition) the crime of aggression. Terrorism is considered an international crime, falling under the universal jurisdiction. However, there is no generally accepted definition of terrorism, but only various international proscriptions incriminating different terrorist acts. A resolution adopted by the UN General Assembly in 1985 (GA Res. 40/61), "unequivocally condemns, as criminal, all acts, methods and practices of terrorism wherever and by whomever committed".[32] Terrorist acts have also been included in the Draft Code of Crimes against Peace and Security of Mankind, elaborated by the International Law Commission, in 1996.[33]

Such crimes can, thus, be prosecuted by any state, according to the universality principle, based on states' recognized, shared competence to impose criminal or civil sanctions with respect to what is proscribed by the international law.

Given its specificity, the universality principle should not lead to jurisdictional conflicts between states (as mentioned above, in universal jurisdiction, states are merely enforcers of international law). Nevertheless, its implementation was not without controversy, especially since the category of universal crimes is quite dynamic and in continuous evolution.

For instance, more recently universal jurisdiction has been invoked in respect of human rights violations, based on the argument that "some human rights have become erga omnes obligations. One important precedent of universal jurisdiction in this field, with an enormous impact in international law, was the Filartiga v. Pena-Irala Case, brought before an American court. In 1978, Dolly Filartiga, a citizen of Paraguay, resident in the United States, lodged a civil complaint before an US court against Americo Norberto Pena-Irala, also a national of Paraguay, former Inspector General of Police in Asuncion. Pena-Irala was, at the time, in the USA, waiting for deportation, after remaining on the American territory past the expiration of his visitor's visa. Filartiga contended before the court that, in 1976, her seventeen year old brother, Joelito Filartiga, was kidnapped and tortured to death by Pena-Irala, as retaliation for the political activities of their father. Initially, the complaint was dismissed, but, in 1980, the US Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit ruled in favor of Filartiga, considering that "freedom from torture is protected under customary international law, which forms a part of the law of the land in the United States."[34] The court declared:

"Among the rights universally proclaimed by all nations, as we have noted, is the right to be free of physical torture. Indeed, for purposes of civil liability, the torturer has become like the pirate and slave trader before him hostis humani generis, an enemy of all mankind."[35]

Thus, the ruling in the Filartiga case was an endorsement that torture is considered an international crime, subject to universal jurisdiction.

Another case with a huge impact, which marked a watershed in international law was the Pinochet Case. General Augusto Pinochet, former Chilean head of state between 1973 and 1990, was arrested in 1998 in London, based on an international arrest warrant issued by a Spanish Court (Audiencia National) for human rights violations committed in Chile. Pinochet invoked before the Law Lords of the House of Lords (that was then the highest British Court) immunity from prosecution as a former head of state. However, the British court rejected Pinochet's claim, reasoning that crimes such as hostage taking and torture could not be protected by immunity. This was the first time the principle of universal jurisdiction was applied in such a manner, against a former head of state.

3. Conclusions

The rules regarding state jurisdiction in international law, traditionally, seek to establish the allocation of competences between sovereign states, based on legitimate jurisdictional links (like territoriality or nationality), ultimately aiming to prevent normative conflicts. The five identified principles of jurisdiction brought some order and predictability in international relations[36], but they are, nevertheless, dynamic, unstable and open to interpretations and controversies.

Among the principles of jurisdiction, territoriality remains the most important and widely accepted in a world that is still state-centered, governed by the principle of equal sovereignty. However, jurisdiction refers to the exercise of power, reflecting the preferred model of governance of a certain time. In a polyarchic, sovereignty-centered international society, it is no wonder that territoriality remains the preferred principle of jurisdiction. But the increasing interdependence between the members of the international community, the advances in technology and communication, that create a more and more interconnected world, could lead to a shift in the way the exercise of power is perceived and, subsequently, to a shift in the law of jurisdiction.

CONTROL ACTIVITY CARRIED OUT BY THE PREFECT. ROLE, MISSION, PERSPECTIVES

Florina Ramona (MUREȘAN) PREDA

Abstract

The prerogative of the control constitutes an efficient instrument in achieving managerial objectives at all levels and in all fields of activity and, by virtue of the professional experience that I have acquired, I have chosen to tackle one of these components, namely the control activity carried out by the prefect.

Bearing in mind the professional interest sparked by this theme, I have elaborated this article starting from the premise that the manner in which one deals with the subjected relating to the control activity carried out by the prefect will contribute, on the one hand, to a better understanding of the general control prerogatives of the prefect and, on the other hand, to raising awareness of the role held and/or to be acquired by the Prefect's Supervisory Body – as a structure specialised in implementing this attribute of an institution management.

Therefore, I have dedicated a section of this article to a concise presentation of the types of control exerted by the prefect, while in another section I will analyse this structure in detail. I consider that this analysis is useful both in terms of its applied character and for a better knowledge of the role of the Prefect's Supervisory Body.

The relevance of the subjected chosen for this article as well as the manner in which I have decided to approach it reside, in particular, in the relating conclusions which, once transposed in new normative acts/additions to the current legislative framework, will certainly trigger a better efficiency of the control activity carried out by the prefect.

Keywords: control activity, Supervisory Body, managerial objectives, administrative instruments, efficiency.

1. Evolution of Regulations on the Prefecture and the Control Exerted by the Prefect

1.1. Introductory Considerations. Identification and presentation of the main legal provisions regulating the prefect and the Prefecture

The prefect's position is regulated in the Constitution of Romania, republished, in Chapter V, Section II, dedicated to local public administration, article 123, entitled the "The Prefect": "(1) The government appoints a prefect in each county and the municipality of Bucharest. (2) The prefect is the local representative of the Government and manages the deconcentrated public services of the ministries and other bodies of the central public administration in the administrative territorial units. (3) The prefect's tasks are set by organic law. (4) The prefects, on the one side, the local councils and the mayors as well as the county councils and their presidents, on the other side, are not in a subordinate relationship. (5) The prefect may bring before a contentious-administrative court all and any act of the county council, local council or mayor in case the former deems such act to be illegal. The act challenged is rightfully suspended."

We can note that the "prefect" is defined in the section on local public administration. Nevertheless, the fact that the prefect is regulated in the section on local public administration, alongside with the mayor, the local council and the city council, does not mean that the former represents an authority of the local public administration.

The prefect and the prefecture form part of the central public administration, conducting activities at local level, notion which includes, according to par 2 article 123 of the Constitution, the deconcentrated services of the ministries and other bodies of the central public administration in local administrative units.

In Law no. 215/2001- Law regarding Local Public Administration, initial version, the "prefect" and "the prefecture" are defined as part of the ensemble of the public authorities carrying out local activities. Some changes were introduced by Law no. 188/1999, as amended by Law 161/2003, in the sense that it includes the prefect in the category of the high officials. Law no. 340/2004 regarding the prefect and the prefecture, by article $9^1$, article $17^2$, article $22^3$, acknowledges the tendency to depoliticise the position of the prefect. Therefore, the prefect becomes a career public servant, subject to the general legislation on public servants and specific legislation on high officials.[4] In accordance with provisions of Law no. 340/2004 regarding the prefect and the prefecture, article 1"(1) The Prefect is the local representative of the Government. (2) The Government appoints one prefect in each county and the municipality of Bucharest, upon proposal of the Minister of Internal Affairs and Administrative Reform. (3) The Prefect is the guarantor of the respect for the law and order at local level. (4) The ministers and the heads of the other bodies of the central public administration under the Government may delegate the prefect some of their managing and controlling responsibilities in relation to the activity of the deconcentrated public services under them. (5) The responsibilities which may be delegated according to par (4) are set by Government decision [5].

(2) The subprefect's tasks are set by Government decision.

[2] Art. 17 According to the law, the prefect and the subprefect cannot be members of a political party or organisation falling under the same legal regime as political parties, under the sanction of their dismissal from such public positions.

[3] Art. 22 (1) In each county there is a prefectural college composed of the prefect, subprefects and heads of the deconcentrated public services of the ministries and other bodies of the central public administration under the Government, of which headquarters are in the respective county.

In reference to the need of professionalizing the category of prefects and subprefects, one may see that it is currently difficult to do so, due to frequent replacements of the people holding this position. In fact, this reflects a profound instability in exerting positions (contrary to the legal provisions which require application of the principle of stability), the administrative incapacity to support continuity in exerting the position of local Government representatives and also lack of appropriate use of the skills and expertise of the persons appointed in such positions. It is important to respect the statute of the high official in correlation with application of the principle of mobility laid down by the Government Decision no. 341/2007 regarding inclusion in the category of high officials, career management and mobility of the public servants.

The body of high officials represents a means towards ensuring continuity and coherence of the administrative decisions required to implement the public policies, and the existence of a clear and constant will at superior levels of public service.[6]

Professionalisation of the functions of prefect and subprefect was promoted and endorsed as part of the commitments to modernising the public administration and depoliticising the public positions[7]. Due to the complex tasks set in the Constitution and the legislation and as a consequence of the important role played by a prefect in representing the executive power at local level, it was necessary to amend the statute and to integrate the prefect into the category of high officials, with implications on all criteria of access, in line and compliance with a series of technical prerequisites which should qualify these persons to fill in such an important position.

We may conclude that, in terms of the prefect's career management, there has been no unitary strategy. Arguments exist both for politicisation and depoliticisation of this position.

As a personal opinion and taking into consideration that the degree of accountability and responsibility is higher for the career prefect, who lacks political endorsement, than for the political prefect, we may state that the career prefect will be able to get involved in long-term projects and will find it easier to gain the trust of the institution's own apparatus. On a long-term, the potential changes of the Government should not lead to replacement of the prefects, who, in their capacity of professionals, should not have to face up to issues relating local monitoring and implementation of the governing programmes of various Governments. This is undoubtedly possible providing that the prefect, as High Official, has a sound professional background required to achieve the tasks laid down by the law as efficiently as possible and will prove to be beyond any suspicion in relation to potential political likes or preferences.

However, the reform of the Prefecture does not rely only on the attempts to depoliticise it. It also relies on the scope of responsibilities which are or will be included in the jurisdiction of this body of public administration. In terms of territorial jurisdiction, we may see that there is no overall model in the European Union states. Therefore, in Italy, for instance, the Government appoints a prefect as their representative in each large city, whereas in France, the territorial jurisdiction of the prefect is wider and circumscribed to a region. In addition, there are essential differences in reference to material jurisdiction. While some European Union states limit the prefect's prerogatives to monitoring the compliance of the acts of the local public administration, others, for example France, grant the Prefect extremely generous powers.[8]

Returning to the politicisation of the position, by the Draft Bill regarding the Administrative Code,

(4) The tasks of the prefectural college focus on the harmonisation of the activities of the deconcentrated public services located in the respective county, as well as the implementation of the programmes, policies, strategies and action plans of the Government at the level of the county and its localities and shall be regulated by Government decision.

[4] At present, the prefect and the prefecture are regulated by Law no. 340/2004, as amended by Government Emergency Ordinance no. 340/2004 regarding the prefecture. Government Emergency Ordinance no. 179/2005 was approved by Law no. 181/2006 and amended by Law no. 262/2007.

[6] Postelnicu, R.P., Proposals on Professionalizing the Position of Prefect, in Local Public Economy and Administration, no. 12/2002, page 30.

[7] An important step in the professionalisation of the prefect's position was taken in 2006, when, according to Article II of Government Emergency Ordinance 179 of 14 December 2005, "the prefects in office upon entry into force of the present emergency ordinance and also the ones who are to fill in vacancies after entry into force of the present emergency ordinance, but no later than 31 December 2005, may be appointed as prefects providing they sit for and pass an examination to attest this public function".

declared unconstitutional[9], the legislator intends to return to the politicisation of these two positions (prefect and subprefect), while the continuity of the activity within the Prefectures should be provided by the Secretary-General of the Prefect's Office. Nevertheless, the Draft Bill regarding the Administrative Code maintains the obligation of the prefect/subprefect to belong to the category of High Officials.

1.2. Control activity exerted by prefects in other European Union member states

In most European Union countries, there are state representatives at local level. They primarily hold positions of administrative police, general administration and monitoring compliance of local authorities' acts.[10]

In Belgium, the governor of the province is an organ of both the federal government and the province; he/she is appointed and revoked by the king, represents the federal government and chairs the meetings of the permanent delegations and the works of the interministerial commission which coordinates the deconcentrated services of the ministries. The governor is responsible for enforcing the federal, community and regional normative acts. It is generally admitted that he/she shall follow the instructions of the federal government and the governments of the communities and regions, within the limits of his/her powers. In this respect, he/she is supported by a clerk who is somehow the secretary-general of the province and therefore the highest official. As to conclude, in Belgium we can speak of a politicisation of the position of province governor.

In Germany, the president of the district is a public servant, politically elected, with a dual capacity: president of the district Assembly and head of the administrative apparatus in the district. As head of the administrative apparatus in the district, the president accounts for carrying out relating tasks. In terms of hierarchy, he/she is superior to district public servants and area state public servants at district level, considered as administrative constituency in charge of their activity. The administrative monitoring of the compliance of district acts is exerted by a deconcentrated intermediary body of the area state under the Minister of Internal Affairs of the Area State. In general, the compliance monitoring in Germany focuses on the compatibility of the municipalities' acts with the hierarchy of the legal norms arising from the federal state or the area state. This means a stricto sensu monitoring of compliance, which is concerned neither with the expediency nor with the discretionary power of the local authority acts.

In Luxemburg, the district commissioner is a state servant appointed by the Great Duke and reports to the minister of Internal Affairs. The district commissioners shall follow the instructions outlined by the members of the government. All commune administrations, except the city of Luxemburg, which is under the minister of Internal Affairs and the Government, are controlled by the district commissioners. Their tasks are varied and multiple. Thus, they pursue enforcement of laws and general and commune regulations and maintenance of order, safety and public peace.

In Portugal, the civil district governor is appointed by the government within the council of ministers; he/she represents the government and exerts powers delegated by the minister of Internal Affairs. It is a tutelage authority and holds police and regulating positions.

In Denmark, there is a surveillance office operating in each region. This office is composed of a prefect, the government's representative, and four members of the regional council, appointed by the former, and exerts a general administrative control, a posteriori, over the municipalities' acts.

In Finland, there are six provinces organised at regional level as administrative and territorial constituencies of the state. Every province has a deconcentrated body entitled the provincial state office, managed by a governor who is appointed by the president of the republic. The governor manages the state services in the province and exerts administrative control over local communities, in accordance with the legislation in force. The provincial state office represents the most important executive and police authority of the province. It is in charge of maintaining law and order, in general, and enforces administrative decisions and court decisions. The provincial state office forms part of the state administration hierarchy, seeks to inform the local administration with regard to the central government's policies and supervises the impact that the implementation of such policies has at local level.

In France, the prefect is categorised as commissioner of the republic and is appointed by decree of the council of ministers signed by the president of the Republic. In the French doctrine[11], it is considered that the prefect holds the following positions: representative of the state; representative of the government; general administration authority and head of the state services in the department. In their capacity of government representatives, "the prefects are expected to be politically loyal to a higher degree than other categories of public servants. This does not mean that they are recruited on political bases. If the government often takes into consideration the elective affinities when assigning them to different positions, the prefectural body is, above all, a body of public servants[12]. The dual nature of the position of prefect, i.e. political and administrative, who is both "government's representative" and in charge of large administrative issues, imposed, in terms of its statute, an initial option: either the government could decide to keep such representatives at their "discretion", which would have implied refusal of all and any guarantee in terms of career; or, inversely, the government could choose to consider such representatives as experts in administration, which would have implied a certain professional background and guarantees for stability.

In Austria - federal state, at the district level – an administrative-territorial constituency which represents a level of deconcentration for both the area state and the federation, there is a prefecture, body of the area state and the federation, which performs their administrative tasks and supervises the activity of the commune administrations. Appointed by the head of the area state government, the prefect represents the area state and the federation and exerts administrative monitoring of compliance, a posteriori, over the acts of the commune authorities.

As to conclude, there is no unitary policy in the European Union states either, while the politicisation/depoliticisation of the prefect's position/relating similar bodies in various states resides in the administrative stability/instability.

1.3. The Prefecture in the context of Romania's integration into the European Union

After the integration into the European Union, on 1 January 2007, Romania entered a new stage of institutional development, as the European Union generated a certain type of institutional and administrative relationships for which the Romanian state was forced to create new procedures and even new institutions. Romania became part of a political and economic union of which member states were built in compliance with some firm principles regarding: existence of a democratic framework, compliance with the common legislation, underpinning of some autonomy principles and the principle of subsidiarity. Romania had to build institutions and amend regulations so that the time of the integration should not catch the state institutions unprepared. [13]

The reforms in the public administration, improving the relating rights, responsibilities and jurisdiction, may be deemed as key elements in the efforts made to increase the degree of performance of public administration and to harmonise them with the requirements imposed to Romania by its status of member state of the European Union. Special attention has been attached to the process of implementing the legal norms, initially abstract and included in various regulations. The measures to prepare, organise enforcement and actually enforce the law, which are obligations incumbent on the public administration, have therefore been enhanced.[14]

To achieve a modern system of public sector management and to accelerate the reform process, the reform of the public position was also required, and implicitly reform of all public positions managing the public administration at higher levels, including the prefect and the subprefect, towards increasing their role and refining harmonisation of such role with other constitutional and legal constraints: the relationship between the government and the local authorities, i.e. relationships which emerge in exerting governmental functions, the manner in which the prefect perform his/her control of compliance by challenging the administrative acts of local public authorities in courts of law. Within this framework of preparation for the adhesion to the European Union, it became urgent to update the norms regarding the prefect and the prefecture. By 2004, the prefect was a high official of the Romanian state, political position intended to locally represent the Government. Turning the position of prefect into a career public servant was initiated by amendments and supplements brought to Law no.188/1999 regarding the Statute of the Public Servant, which materialises the provisions of Law no. 161/2003 regarding some measures to provide transparency in exerting public offices, public positions and in the business environment, prevent and sanction corruption. They refer to setting forth a new category of public servants, i.e. high officials. Therefore, Law no. 161/2003 set forth in article 11 letters d), e) and f) that the prefect, the subprefect and the secretary general of the prefecture were considered to be as of that time high officials of the state. This category of public position was to be regulated at a later date, and, effective 2006, the persons were to be appointed in the positions abovementioned. The amendment focused on the substance and the need to turn the prefect into a career public servant.

It should be noted that, in reality, the status of high official has never materialised to its real value set forth in normative acts. The status was rather a formal one. The access to the category of high officials, though regulated by law, was steadily obstructed by governments between 2016 and 2018, when the National Institute of Administration was re-established. In addition, the arguments and the criteria considered by the legislator in relation to accessing the body of high officials stopped representing a standard to those interested in having access to the highest category of public servants, precisely due to the instability of such positions. Irrespective of the position we refer to, namely secretary general, deputy secretary general, prefect, subprefect or governmental inspector[15], the capacity of high official was only a requirement for appointment, the criterion being in fact political.

Still in relation to the position of prefect, we enumerate below some relevant situations for a better understanding of the fact that appointment in or dismissal from this position has always been related to politics, whether the governments at power admitted it or not. In 2009, the Boc Cabinet brings back an older practice of the governments: tens of prefects, heads of deconcentrated institutions, managers of state-owned companies and employees of ministries, are replaced on political criteria. Although these positions had been depoliticised by PD-L in 2006, in accordance with a law furthered by Vasile Blaga, Prime Minister Emil Boc publicly declared that the prefect should be a politician, a person that the party could trust. The second wave of replacements aimed at management positions within deconcentrated institutions.

In 2016, the Cioloș government reviewed the activity of the prefects and conducted an analysis of their behaviour, both in terms of their capacity to react and their desire not to get involved in political campaigns. Following this assessment, a significant number of prefects were replaced. The spokesperson of the Cioloș government, Dan Suciu, explained that "Considering the short timeframe, the Government will not be able to prepare a contest-based employing procedure. Therefore, the new prefects will be appointed based on a selection from among the high representatives of the Government or the persons who have had good results in their activity as managers in public administration and who will not be politically active in the future. Thus, in the shortest timeframe possible, a significant number of prefects will be replaced".

We may conclude that, even though part of the European Union, Romania has continued, through the governments in power, to make an assessment based rather on political criteria and in line with the best interests of their local representatives, and developed a "chaotic" reform of the public administration.

In the context of Romania's holding the rotating presidency of the Council of the European Union, January - June 2019, as well as through the adoption of the Administrative Code assumed in the Governing Programme, the reform will certainly continue its course. Some changes with regard to the prefect and the prefecture as part of the central public administration are already visible.

2. Role and Mission of the Control Activity Carried out by the Prefect. Theoretical and Practical Aspects

2.1. Presentation of organisational structure of the prefecture in terms of control-related tasks

In accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of Romania, Law no. 340/2004 regarding the prefect and the prefecture, republished, as amended and supplemented by Government Decision no. 460/2006 for enforcement of some provisions of Law no. 340/2004 regarding the prefect and the prefecture, as amended and supplemented, the Prefecture is organised and functions, in each county, as a public institution with legal personality, intended to carry out duties and prerogatives legally-established for the position of prefect.

The activity of the institution is managed countywide by a managerial team composed of the County's Prefect and Subprefect. In this exercise of his/her duties, the prefect has a specialised apparatus organised by prefect's order into services and departments broken down by activities.

The staff of the institution is represented by public servants, public servants with special status and contract staff. The Prefecture's services/departments conducting control activities are:

Contentious Department, Compliance Monitoring, Apostile which exert control over:

- enforcing and observing the Constitution, laws and other normative acts,
- compliance of administrative acts adopted by the local public administration authorities,
- compliance with measures taken by the mayor and the president of the County Council, as state representatives in local administrative units.

Governmental Programme Service, Management of Deconcentrated Services which exert control of:

- compliance with measures taken by the mayor and the President of the City Council, as state representatives in local administrative units,
- implementation of measures taken to prevent emergency situations or adoption of some emergency measures in case of occurrence of emergency situations.

Additionally, this structure conducts thematic and unannounced checks within deconcentrated institutions of the county.

Public Relations, Secretariat and Land Registry which checks compliance with measures taken by mayors or secretaries of the local administrative units with regard to compliance with and enforcement of the legal provisions on land issues.

The Prefect's Supervisory Body. The control activity carried out by the Prefect's Supervisory Body

[15] This category of high officials has been massively developed due to the mobility of the function of prefect. The category of governmental inspectors has proven inefficient in the light of the administrative needs; their activity was formal within the General Secretariat of the Government. As former prefects and subprefects replaced from their functions, they had been assigned doubtful tasks, being difficult to be trusted by the government.

will be enlarged upon in Chapter III of the present paper.

2.2. Types of control exerted by the prefect

2.2.1. Control regarding enforcement and compliance with the Constitution, laws and other normative acts

With regard to control of enforcement and compliance with the Constitution, laws and other normative acts, it should be stated that the prefect carries out this activity by virtue of provisions laid down in article 19 par 1 letter a) of Law no. 340/2004, according to which the prefect seeks enforcement and compliance with the Constitution, laws, Government ordinances and decisions and other normative acts, as well as maintenance of law and order at county level. The monitoring procedure is carried out both through monitoring of compliance of administrative acts submitted to the prefecture and checks at the headquarters of the local public administration authorities.

2.2.2. Control regarding implementation of Government Programme objectives at county level

As local Government representatives, the prefects shall ensure compliance with policies included in the Governing Programme and appoint control commissions to check how such Government-assumed objectives are implemented countywide.

In partnership with the deconcentrated public services and structures of other bodies of the central public administration, autonomous administrations and national companies represented in the county, the Prefect draws up and approves, on an annual basis, the County Action Plan to implement the objectives included in the Governing Programme.

The action plan prepared by the Prefecture comprises chapters and actions for the following sectors of activity: Taxation, Budget, Consumer Protection, European Funds, Tourism, Work and Social Justice, Education, Health, Public Administration, Agriculture and Rural Development, Environment, Waters and Forest Protection, Internal Affairs, Culture, Youth and Sport, Miscellaneous. The Prefecture undertakes some control activities with a view to implementing the objectives included in the Action Plan. The Prefecture reports to the Ministry of Internal Affairs, on a quarterly basis, the performance ratios applicable to this Plan, which, due to its public nature, is posted on the website pages of the Prefecture.

2.2.3. Control regarding the monitoring of compliance of administrative acts adopted by local public authorities

The control exerted by the prefect over local communities is closely related to the already-established principle of local autonomy:

a) At European level, in article 8 point 2 thesis I of European Charter of Local Self-Government, ratified by Romania in Law no. 199/1997, which provides that:

"1. Any administrative supervision of local authorities may only be exercised according to such procedures and in such cases as are provided for by the constitution or by statute. 2 Any administrative supervision of the activities of the local authorities shall normally aim only at ensuring compliance with the law and with constitutional principles. Administrative supervision may however be exercised with regard to expediency by higher-level authorities in respect of tasks the execution of which is delegated to local authorities. 3 Administrative supervision of local authorities shall be exercised in such a way as to ensure that the intervention of the controlling authority is kept in proportion to the importance of the interests which it is intended to protect"[16]

b) At national level, it is regulated in article 123 (5) of the Romanian Constitution[17], as republished and defined in article 3 (1) of Local Public Administration Law no. 215/2001, as republished and supplemented, as being "the right and the actual capacity of local public administration authorities to settle and manage, on behalf of and to the best interests of the local communities which they represent, the public affairs, in compliance with the legislation in force". The autonomy of the local authorities is contingent on the legal framework in which they evolve, namely the skills and resources they have, as well as the control mechanism applicable to them.

Furthermore, the administrative tutelage exerted by the prefect is regulated in: article 115 (7) of Law no. 215/2001– Local Public Administration Law[18], republished, as amended and further supplemented, article 19 (1) letter e) of Law no. 340/2004[19], article 3 (1) of Contentious-Administrative Law no. 554/2004[20], as amended and supplemented. The subjected matter of the legal action grounded on provisions of article 3 (1) of Law no. 554/2004, refers to the type of juridical acts subjected to the monitoring of compliance exerted by the prefect, on the one hand, and, annulment, in full or in part, of the act deemed illegal and forcing performance of tasks as provided by the law, on the other hand. The prefect may not claim damages, as the law - article 8 (1), grants this right only to natural or legal persons.

In the Romanian regulations, monitoring compliance of the administrative acts is seen as a liberal form of supervising the local communities, in which the tutelage authorities are not entitled to annul the act; they may only challenge it before Contentious-Administrative Courts, which are the only institutions which may apply such sanction. The local self-government may not be interpreted as representative of sovereignty and independence, whereas the local communities are neither outside nor independent from the state, which continues to fully exert its sovereignty over local territorial communities. Although the purely administrative nature of the local autonomy is visible in our country, in reality, this is regulated as a counterweight of the central autonomy, representing the key, direct link between the citizen and the state.[21]

The Constitutional Court has constantly stated[22] that the principle of local self-government does not imply a full independence and an exclusive jurisdiction of the public authorities in the local administrative units, which are further forced to comply with general regulations, applicable throughout the country, and legal provisions adopted in order to protect the national interests, as the legal framework is generally mandatory. If local autonomy represents a right, the administrative decentralisation represents a system implying such autonomy. The administrative decentralisation cannot exist in unitary states without an oversight by the state, oversight which the doctrine denominated as "administrative tutelage". This regards only compliance with the administrative acts, and not their expediency.[23] In the organisational and functioning system of the local public administration authorities applicable to Romania, the administrative tutelage materialises in the correlative right and obligation of the prefect, as local Government representative, to challenge in contentious-administrative courts the acts deemed illegal.

The subjected matter of the legal action grounded on provisions of article 3 (1) of Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented, refers to the type of legal acts subjected to the monitoring of compliance exerted by the prefect, on the one hand, and, annulment, in full or in part, of the act deemed illegal and forcing performance of tasks as provided by the law, on the other hand. The prefect may not claim damages, as Law no. 554/2004 – article 8 (1), as amended and supplemented, grants this right only to natural or legal persons.

With regard to the category of acts appealed by the prefect in contentious-administrative courts as part of his/her right to exert administrative tutelage, the jurisprudence of courts in this matter has been different for a long time, despite the fact that, as early as 2008, the Constitutional Court had ruled in this respect[24]. In a first jurisprudential sense, the courts acknowledged that the prefect may appeal before contentious-administrative courts only the acts falling under the scope of those regulated by article 2 letter c) of Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented, grounded on the fact that the prefect may not appeal administrative acts concluded by public local administration authorities with other subjects of law, which entail some civil rights and obligations, without exercise of public power. In another jurisprudential sense, the courts considered that the prefect is entitled to challenge before contentious-administrative courts all and any illegal acts issued by local public administrative authorities such as decisions made by the mayor with regard to waging of the contractual staff, remunerated from public funds. The issue was settled by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, which had been addressed on grounds of article 519 of Civil Procedure Code, which ruled that "in accordance with article 3 of Contentious-Administrative Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented, corroborated with provisions of article 63 (5) letter e) and article 115 (2) of Local Public Administration Law no. 215/2001, republished, as amended and supplemented, and of article 19 (1) letter a) and letter e) of Law no. 340/2004 regarding the prefect and the prefecture, republished, as amended and supplemented, and of article 123 (5) of Constitution, the prefect is acknowledged to have the right to appeal before contentious-administrative courts all administrative acts issued by local public administration authorities, within the meaning of provisions of article 2 (1) letter c) of Contentious-Administrative Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented"[25]. In ruling so and by virtue of the jurisprudence of the constitutional contentious court[26], the High Court acknowledged that, pursuant to article 1 (3) of Law no. 340/2004, republished, as amended and supplemented, the prefect is the guarantor of the respect for the law and order at local level. In addition, only the administrative acts may be issued as public power, which gives them the attribute of being appealed by the prefect, providing that the latter deems them to be illegal; if the act relates to civil law, commercial law or labour law, it will be impossible to censor it in contentious-administrative court; in this case, the act may be challenged only before courts with jurisdiction in these matters. The court also stated that article 123 (5) of the Constitution refers to "an act of the county council (the case under discussion), local council or mayor", without referring to such acts as falling under a certain category. Nevertheless, the text may not be read or interpreted in a truncated manner, namely without taking account of the fact that it also provides that "the prefect may appeal an act in a contentious-administrative court, (the case under discussion) (…)". As a consequence, the administrative tutelage exerted by the prefect relates to the contentious-administrative, as laid down in Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented. Or, the provisions of law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented, limit the oversight exerted by contentious-administrative courts in relation to the administrative act, as it is defined in article 2 (1) letter c) of this normative act. Therefore, one may unequivocally conclude that the prefect may appeal in contentious-administrative courts, by virtue of article 3 (1) of Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented, only the acts issued by public administration authorities, as these are the only acts issued on grounds of exerting a public power, in order to meet a public legitimate interest, within the meaning of article 2 (1) letter b) of Law no. 554/2004, in performing the administrative jurisdiction for which a public authority is responsible.

A first analysis could help us to conclude that only the prefect had the active capacity to stand trial in the legal action filed pursuant to article 3 (1) of Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented. However, in the court practice, there were some attempts to enlarge the scope of the plaintiff's capacity in relation to a certain legal action, with the main reference to the mayor of the administrative-territorial unit. In 2002, the Constitutional Court ruled in relation to the fact that, according to article 123 (5) of Constitution, only the prefect, and not the mayor, has the standing to appeal the acts of the local council which he/she considers to be illegal. Moreover, according to the law, "the mayor is authorised to represent the administrative-territorial unit in court, but this provision aims only at relationships between local communities and third parties, and not the ones with the local council, which is a body of the administrative-territorial unit, as the mayor is, and has the same legitimacy as the mayor"[27]. Nevertheless, the courts required to settle such litigations have ruled differently, which determined the High Court of Cassation and Justice, addressed in accordance with article 519 Civil Procedure Code, to set that "pursuant to Local Public Administration Law no. 215/2001, republished, as amended and supplemented, and Contentious-Administrative Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented, the administrative-territorial unit, by virtue of its executive authority, respectively the mayor, is not entitled to challenge before the contentious-administrative courts the decisions adopted by its deliberative authority, i.e. the local council or, where appropriate, the General Council of the Municipality of Bucharest"[28] . The High Court has also ruled that it is presumed that both the deliberative authority (local council) and the executive authority (mayor) aim at the pre-eminence of the public interest and the compliance with the local community's needs, a purpose which is presumed to be served by exercising the exclusive and shared jurisdictions of the two local public authorities, as regulated by Law no. 215/2001, republished, as amended and supplemented. The compliance of the acts issued by the two public authorities is ensured through performance of the tasks of the secretary of the local administrative unit and the monitoring of administrative tutelage exerted y the prefect. As already asserted in the jurisprudence of the supreme court, "the acts issued by the local council and the mayor have an independent nature, neither of these two authorities being allowed to directly file an appeal against the other symmetric authority; the only public authority authorised to do so is the prefect"[29]

As the administrative tutelage control is set forth to be express and limitative, as a prerogative of the prefect, the court does not however have the possibility to interpret and therefore assign some public authorities prerogatives which were not laid down by the legislator. The Constitutional Court considered that, in case a litigating party criticises the manner in which the contentious-administration court interpreted and enforced the law which entitles the prefect to exert control of administrative tutelage in relation to the legal action taken to court, the latter is "to analyse and assess, depending on the nature of the administrative act subjected to compliance, as well as other concrete circumstances, whether the prefect has a an active legal standing in the respective situation or not". [30]

In its jurisprudence, the Constitutional Court has steadily asserted that the action of the prefect, regulated by article 123 (5) of the fundamental Law, is constitutionally subjected to no conditionality or limitation, and is therefore essentially different from the legal action in contentious-administrative court

[28] High Court of Cassation and Justice - Panel for settling some law issues, Decision no. 11/2015. In the litigation which led to this decision by the High Court, the plaintiff Municipality of Bucharest, by general mayor, requested annulment of a decision made by the General Council of Municipality of Bucharest. In the grounds of the decision, the supreme court acknowledged that, although the mayor is entitled to act and may be summoned to court as representative of the public law entity, namely the administrative-territorial unit, on the one side, neither the provisions of Law no. 215/2001, republished, as amended and supplemented, nor the ones of Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented, set forth expressis verbis the right of the administrative-territorial unit to challenge before the contentious-administrative court the resolutions adopted by its deliberative authority, and the acknowledgment of such right may not be concluded by way of interpretation, on the other side.

initiated by an aggrieved citizen or a legal person, in which case the organic law may set forth exercising conditions and limits [31].

According to the law and in relation to the legal action taken to court by the prefect, the preliminary complaint is not mandatory, as regulated by article 7 (1) of Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented. Moreover, this is exempted from the stamp tax. In line with the opinions expressed in the doctrine, we consider that, for the legal action to be admitted by the court, the prefect should provide evidence of a legal interest in the matter as, for instance, the former would have no interest in having an administrative act which is no longer enforceable (such as a demolition permit) annulled[32]. In terms of the timeframe within which the prefect may challenge the administrative acts which he/she deems illegal, article 3 (1) of Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented, makes references to a six-month timeframe set forth in article 11 (1) of the same normative act, without outlining a distinction between individual administrative acts and normative acts. We mention that we acquiesce to the statements expressed by several specialists[33], according to which the time limits for filing a complaint is six months or, where appropriate, one year from acknowledging the act as illegal, in case of some individual administrative acts. The provisions of article 11 (1) are to apply to normative acts as well, given that the law includes an exclusive reference to this paragraph, which is thus different from the option of any entity whose legitimate rights and interests were aggrieved to appeal the normative administrative act at any time, by virtue of article 11 (4) of Law no. 554/2004, as amended and supplemented.[34]

Bearing in mind that an important component of the prefect's control activity is represented by the compliance monitoring, on a half-year basis, the Prefectures remit the Ministry of Internal Affairs – General Department for the Relations with the Prefectures, the report on the monitoring of compliance of acts issued by local public administration authorities.

2.2.4. Monitoring of compliance with measures taken by mayors and presidents of the County Council, as representatives of the state in local administrative units

When monitoring the administrative measures issued by local public administrative authorities, the prefect seeks:

- compliance with procedures and deadlines for convocation of the local council (in writing, minimum 5 days in advance, in case of ordinary meetings, and minimum 3 days in advance, in case of extraordinary meetings) according to provisions of Law. 215/2001, as amended, prerequisites of Law no. 52/2003 and provisions of Government Ordinance no. 35/2002, as amended;
- compliance with legal provisions on quorum provided by the law for adoption of resolutions, as follows:
- majority of counsellors in office in case of adopting resolutions regarding the local budget and local taxes, resolutions on contracting loans, in accordance with the law, resolutions on taking part to county or regional development programmes or cross-border cooperation programmes, resolutions on urban organising and developing of localities and urban planning or cooperation with other public authorities, Romanian or foreign legal persons.
- duly majority (2/3 of counsellor in office) when adopting resolutions regarding patrimony;
- provided the resolutions adopted by the local council are countersigned, for compliance, by the secretary of the local administrative unit, and when the secretary considers that the resolutions made are not legal he/she shall submit written resolutions;
- communication of the administrative acts adopted by the local council and the mayor to the prefecture: the resolutions adopted shall be promptly remitted to the prefect, within maximum 10 working days of adoption. Should the secretary deem the resolutions to be illegal, remittance shall be supported by his/her written objections. The mayor's decisions endorsed for compliance shall be remitted within maximum 5 working days of the day the prefect signs them. In the event that decisions are deemed illegal, the remittance shall be supported by the secretary's written objection.

The secretaries of the local administrative units will be assisted by Supporting Commissions established within Prefectures so that they should ensure compliance with legal provisions concerning all administrative actions taken by the mayor and the president of the County Council, as representatives of the state in the local administrative units.

2.2.5. Monitoring implementation of prevention measures relating to emergency situations or adoption of emergency measures in the event of occurrence of such emergency situations

The County Committee for Emergency Situations is a supporting interinstitutional body of emergency situations management at county level.

The County Committee reports to the National Committee for Special Emergency Situations, is the head of municipal, town/city/village committees for Emergency Situations and cooperates with the Crisis Action Teams established by companies which are exposed to hazard in case of disasters.

3. The Prefect's Supervisory Body

3.1. Legal Framework

With regard to the legal framework applicable to the activity carried out by the Prefect's Supervisory Body, we have taken into consideration as relevant the prerequisites of the article 1 par 2 which establish, by way of example, the tasks relating to management and supervision which, according to article 1 par 4 of Law no. 340/2006, the ministers and heads of the other central public administration bodies under the Government may delegate to the prefect. Therefore, the prefect may be delegated tasks and responsibilities pertaining to verification of how public funds allocated to deconcentrated public services are used or implementation of objectives comprised in the sectoral strategies.

Following analysis of the provisions of Government Decision no. 460/2006 and comparing them to provisions of Government Decision no. 1019/2003 regarding organisation and functioning of the prefectures, normative act in force until the publication of the norms set forth in Law no. 340/2004, we can see that they no longer enlarge on the activities carried out by the specialised structures in performing the prefect's tasks.

At present, the enumeration of the tasks of the specialised structures within the Prefectures is not explicit when referring to the tasks of the Prefect's Supervisory Body. These tasks may be generically found in article 6 par 1:

1. in terms of enforcement of and respect for the Constitution, laws and other normative acts:

a) they participate, alongside representatives of deconcentrated public services, to actions of verification, in line with their prerogatives, of how normative acts are enforced and complied with at county level, respectively the Municipality of Bucharest, within some joint commissions established by prefect's order;(...)

2. in terms of compliance of administrative acts adopted or issued by local public administration authorities and contentious administrative:

a) they conduct, in accordance with the law, verifications on implementation of the measures taken by the mayor and the presidents of the country council, respectively the president of the General Council of the Municipality of Bucharest, as representatives of the state in the local administrative, including verifications at the headquarters of the local public administration, and submit the prefect, where appropriate, proposals on referrals to competent bodies;
b) they conduct activities intended to guide mayors in relation to performance of the tasks delegated to and executed by them on behalf of the state."

Additionally, article 7 stipulates that "the prefect may order further tasks intended to the specialised structures of the prefecture."

Pursuant to provisions of Government Decision no. 416/2007 regarding organisational structure and the resources of the Ministry of Internal Affairs, as amended and supplemented, the prefecture is an institution reporting to the Ministry of Internal Affairs.

As a consequence, it should be noted that the provisions of Order no. 138/2016 apply to all categories of staff within the Ministry of Internal Affairs, including the Prefect's Supervisory Body. This normative act sets forth general rules regarding the jurisdiction and stipulates norms regarding organisation and conduct of controls.

The Prefect's Supervisory Body within the Prefecture of Dâmbovița County, equipped with two public execution functions, is constituted as a structure under the direct subordination of the Prefect, with a view to exercising the prefect's prerogatives laid down in the normative acts.

Chapter III of the Internal Rules and Regulations entitled "Supervisory Body" presents the main responsibilities of this department:

a) conducts in accordance with the law, activities of verification, support and guidance relating to the sphere of competence of the prefect;
b) cooperates with the local public authorities and competent public institutions;
c) checks the referrals remitted to the prefect in relation to which the settlement of the matters referred imply a high degree of difficulty;[36]
d) prepares reports to inform the prefect on the actions taken;
e) carries out all and any other tasks assigned by the prefect.

[35] By way of example, in 2018, the County Committee for Emergency Situations within the Dambovița Prefecture was convened in 20 meetings (2 extraordinary and 18 ordinary) with a view to discussion prevention and management of emergency situations. As a consequence, 18 actions were adopted. In relation to management of emergency situations and as president of the County Committee for Emergency Situations, the prefect issued 3 orders and approved 2 action plans.

[36] In 2018, the Prefect's Supervisory Body - Dâmbovița conducted checks which may be grouped as follows:

- Checks focused on aspects regarding the activity of the local administrative unit de control. They checked measures taken by the mayor, as representative of the state in the local administrative unit. They also sought to guide the mayor in performing his/her tasks delegated and executed on behalf of the state and to check aspects regarding petitions.
- Checks focused on aspects of the activity of the deconcentrated institutions in Dâmbovița County.
- Checks focused on aspects regarding activity of some economic operators in Dâmbovița County, as a result of some issues petitioned.

Following an overall analysis of Law no. 340/2004 and Government Decision no. 460/2006, we may conclude that the current normative acts no longer regulate the activity of the Prefect's Supervisory Body in a distinct manner. His/her prerogatives are established by comparison to the general norms which we have outlined above.

3.2. Activity of the Supervisory Body

In conducting their activities, the Prefect's Supervisory Body shall comply with the Order of the Ministry of Internal Affairs no. 138/2016 regarding organisation and conduct of monitoring within the Ministry of Internal Affairs, as amended and supplemented, normative act which lays down general rules on the jurisdiction and sets forth norms on organisation and conduct of checks. This leads us to a detailed approach of such rules and norms. It is equally important and opportune to pinpoint the relevant aspects arising from the current activity of such supervisory structure.

To begin with, it is important to bear in mind the types of checks which may be organised and conducted. Therefore, according to article 4 par 2 of the order, these are:

a) inspection – which means the general check ordered, at a higher level, by the minister of internal affairs which seeks a complex, multidisciplinary examination of the activity carried out by the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs, with a view to assessing how the tasks outlined by strategic or own plans are performed and how the objectives planned are implemented. In addition, it seeks to evaluate the skills and the capacity of the leader of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs or other persons in leadership positions, who are directly appointed by the management of the Ministry of Internal Affairs or by persons at higher levels, and to identify and correct all and any deficiencies, dysfunctions or irregularities found;
b) background check – which means the check ordered by the leader of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs, with a view to assessing the activity of the reporting structures or the structures coordinated and controlled in accordance with the methodology, the skills and the capacity of the persons in leadership positions within such structures, identifying and correcting deficiencies, dysfunctions and irregularities found;
c) thematic check – which means the verification seeking to find, analyse, evaluate, guide and/or support a certain activity/certain activities;
d) unannounced check – which means the fully operational verification aiming at identifying some potential deficiencies in relation to compliance, accuracy and correctness of tasks performed at the level of an entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs"

3.2.1. Jurisdiction

In terms of jurisdiction, we mention that the monitoring structures, defined as "direction, service, office or department with control tasks, established at the level of an entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs, except the Minister's Supervisory Body" – art. 3, letter c) – are structures of which jurisdiction is to conduct checks at the level of both an entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs within which they are organised and the structures reporting to, coordinated and controlled by them, in line with methodologies in force. By virtue of provision of article 8 par 2, "the monitoring structures conduct background checks, thematic checks and unannounced checks at the headquarters of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs to which they belong and the ones reporting to them."

3.2.2. Procedure

In reference to the procedural aspects, in accordance with provisions in Chapter IV – "Organisation and conduct of checks" of Ministerial Order no. 138/2016, we highlight the following:

- The checks are conducted in line with a plan entitled Plan for background checks and thematic checks, approved by the prefect, on an annual basis, by January 31. Some unplanned checks may also be conducted providing that unforeseen events occurred require such checks.
- Each check is conducted in line with a plan which is approved by the prefect and is generically entitled control plan. The structure of this plan is the following:

a) aim and objectives of the check;
b) activity timeframe taken into consideration for checks;
c) structure of the control commission and sub-commissions;
d) estimate time for completion of check.

An exception is represented by the unannounced check which may be initiated without a control plan, according to the order of the head of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs. In this case, there is no structure of the control plan and no estimate time for completion.

- The check is conducted by a control commission composed of staff of the control structure, and, where appropriate, specialists of other structures. The members of the control commission are set by the control plan or, in case of an unannounced check, by written order of the person requesting such check. In any of these situations, the control commission is chaired by a president.

The order stipulates that the president of the control commission notifies the head of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs taken into consideration for a check with regard to this action, minimum 5 days prior to suck check. In his/her turn, the head of the entity notified starts preparing the staff for this check and draws up a status report covering the timeframe prior to initiation of the check.

By exception to this rule, the unannounced thematic check and the unannounced check may be conducted without notification of the head of the entity subjected to such checks.

- At the beginning of the check, the head of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs which is subjected to the check provides the commission with the status report. This report is a document bearing the letterhead of the entity and is presented in the structure comprised in Annex 2 to this paper.
- Throughout the check, the members of the control commission prepare statements of findings. They include the main conclusions drawn by the members of the commission after checking each field of activity, each structure of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs subjected to such check. The structure of the statement of findings is presented in Annex 3 to this paper.

The statements of findings are signed and remitted to the heads of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs subjected to the check and the employees directly involved in the field of activity where the deficiencies were found. In addition, the commission prepares an official report on potential observations, objections and standpoints of these employees.

The report and the objections made in writing are enclosed to the inspection report and form part thereof.

- The findings made throughout the check, the conclusions and measures proposed by the control commission are included in an inspection report prepared by this commission and subjected to approval by the person who requested the check, within 30 days from completion of such check.

The inspection report will contain: a) main accomplishments; b) deficiencies, dysfunctions and measures of organisational, administrative and disciplinary nature; c) conclusions of the control commission in relation to the observations, objections and standpoints expressed on the content of the statements of findings; d) other aspects which may improve efficiency and efficacy of the activities carried out.

The Action Plan to remedy the deficiencies and improve activities will be enclosed to the inspection report.

The inspection report approved will be remitted to the president of the control commission, within 5 days from approval, i.e.:

a) the person to whom the head of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs subjected to check reports to, with a view to taking necessary measures towards remedy of the negative aspects found and disseminating the positive aspects – good practices;
b) the head of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs subjected to check, with a view to implementing the measures ordered.

The control structures within the entities under the Ministry of Internal Affairs may check how such measures are implemented within 6 months from submitting the inspection report.

The analysis of these general rules on jurisdiction and main procedural aspects regarding organisation and conduct of checks leads us to the conclusion that the order represents at least an imperfect normative framework and, therefore inefficient. in comparison with all aspects specific to this control activity carried out by a specialised structure within the Prefecture.

In support of this statement, we present the following two arguments:

A. In fact, the control activity carried out by the Prefect's Supervisory Body may aim at any aspect and law matter in relation to which the Prefecture was notified and is not limited only to monitoring the accuracy of some referrals and petitions of which settlement involve a higher degree of difficulty. It also focuses on thematic checks of the activities carried out by deconcentrated institutions of the ministries and other central public administration bodies or mayors. To provide further information and therefore better understand the framework of their activity, one should note that the control teams may be composed of both staff of specialised structures and employees of other departments/divisions and other institutions, which are set up in joint commissions.

B. Throughout its content, the normative act refers to entities under the Ministry of Internal Affairs which conduct checks or are checked, implicitly excluding therefore from its scope the checks conducted by the Prefectures at the headquarters of the deconcentrated institutions, city/town/village halls or other legal persons. Consequently, in order to initiate, conduct and complete such checks, the Prefect's Supervisory Body should provide further legal grounds than just the Ministerial Order no. 138/2016. On the other hand, when conducting such checks, all control structures within the entities under the Ministry of Internal Affairs shall abide by provisions of this order, shall remit the Minister's Supervisory Body all and any inspection reports prepared and shall also remit the synoptic list of all checks conducted in the previous year and the ones planned for the current year.

As a consequence, we may see that there is no erga omnes opposable legal framework regulating such checks in terms of limits of powers and procedures to follow, which in practice entails a genuine challenge, mainly starting from the potential lack of knowledge/acknowledgment of the mandate granted for controlling purposes and ending with the possible ways to exploit findings and measures ordered as a result of conducting such checks. Such regulation is all the more important as, in many cases, the results of such checks lead to identification of some acts which caused damage to some entities' patrimony and may be deemed as crimes. In addition, the regulation would be important in cases when an entity subjected to a check is not satisfied with the measures imposed as a result of the check and intends to contest them, as there is no procedure in this respect.

In order to ensure the legal framework and in the absence of such a regulation, the procedure to follow may be summarised as follows:

- The prefect shall take the initiative and order a check whenever the issues brought to his/her attention are serious and require a thorough check. The prefect shall also order checks to control and analyse the current activity carried out by deconcentrated institutions of the ministries or other bodies at the level of central public administration. The proposal to start a check may also be presented by the Supervisory Body in case they are assigned a complex petition which require such a check in order to understand and settle it.
- The decision to execute such control action is in particular transposed when constituting a joint commission composed of representatives of other structures or experts from other institutions, in issuing by the prefect of an order setting forth both the structure of the commission and, where appropriate, the themes and/or the goals of the check, as well as certain elements of procedure and deadlines.
- Upon completion of a check the control commission prepares a report on the findings, conclusions and, where appropriate, and depending on how serious the acts are, proposals, recommendations, measures, deadlines for implementation. This report is subjected to the prefect's approval.
- The inspection report or an excerpt of it, in particular when it includes measures and deadlines for implementation by the entity subjected to check, will be remitted to the latter and/or to the criminal prosecution authorities.

3.2.3. Administrative instruments in exerting control. Goal of checks

As presented in the previous section, according to provisions of article 22 of Ministerial Order no. 138/2016, the findings, conclusions and measures proposed by the control commission are included in an inspection report. This report is elaborated by the control commission and is subjected to the approval of the person who ordered the check, within 30 days from completion.

The inspection report consists of:

a) main accomplishments;
b) deficiencies, dysfunctions, irregularities and measure of organisational, administrative and disciplinary nature;
c) the commission's conclusions on the observations, objections and standpoints expressed in relation to the content of the statements of findings;
d) other aspects which may contribute to enhancing the efficiency and efficacy of the activities assessed.

The Action Plan to remedy the deficiencies and improve activities will be enclosed to the inspection report.

- the inspection report approved will be remitted to the president of the control commission within 5 days from approval, as follows:

a) the person to whom the head of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs subjected to check reports to, with a view to taking necessary measures towards remedy of the negative aspects found and disseminating the positive aspects – good practices;
b) the head of the entity under the Ministry of Internal Affairs subjected to check, with a view to implementing the measures ordered.

In reference to the nature of the inspection report, we understand that this may be considered an administrative act as it is a "technical – legal act" (it is therefore a legal act which takes legal effects), which includes the measures to implement. In other words, this report sets the obligations (legal effects) for the legal persons subjected to check. By virtue of this qualification, we think that the inspection report may be challenged as any other administrative act, in accordance with Contentious-Administrative Law no. 554/2004. As there is no unitary opinion in the current doctrine as to including the inspection report in the sphere of the administrative acts, we believe, de lege ferenda, that it is necessary to have an express and unambiguous regulation on the legal nature of the inspection report and implicitly, the appeal which may be exerted against it.

4. Perspectives on Improving the Control Activity of the Prefect in the context of the New Administrative Code and Other Normative Acts. De Lege Ferenda Proposals.

With a view to streamlining the control activity of the prefect, we will present a short analysis of the causes which reduce the prefect's control prerogatives and will formulate some lege ferenda proposals.

One issue which relates to the compliance of the administrative acts is represented by the capacity to check of the specialised structures, which, according to Government Decision no. 460/2006, article 6, shall keep records of all administrative acts, shall check the compliance of the contracts concluded and shall make the prefect proposals on notifying, where appropriate, the issuing authorities with a view to reanalysing the act deemed illegal, or referring to contentious-administrative courts, providing them with grounded reasons thereof. In addition, they shall prepare the documentation, draw up the statement to refer to court and present the statement filed before the court. This activity is therefore multiple and requires a lifelong professional training. Consequently, it would be appropriate that the state should support, through specialised bodies, the training and improvement programmes intended for public servants within prefectures.

Another issue refers to the fact that, effective 2006, another human resource involved in the process of supervising the compliance of acts – the secretary general within the prefecture, was lost as a result of turning this function into the function of subprefect, public office for which it is not mandatorily required to have a legal background, as it was the case of the secretary general. By amendments to the Local Public Administrative Law no. 215/2001 and Law no. 393/2004 regarding local elected representatives, the secretary of the local administrative unit was therefore taken out of the authority of the secretary general of the prefecture and implicitly of the prefect. This is how one of the institutional mechanisms which would have enabled an enhanced efficiency of the control, even by the potential refusal of the secretary to countersign the administrative act issued by local and county public administration authorities, was eliminated. Therefore, the subprefect becomes a methodological guide attending the secretaries of the local administrative units. Nevertheless, the subprefect does not have direct responsibilities in the process of monitoring the compliance of the acts, as he/she is only responsible for organising the activity of the prefecture so that the tasks may be carried out appropriately.

The causes for the lack of direct communication are: a. The subprefect is forced to apply the principle of mobility and may not implicitly build long-term communication institutional relationships; b. There are no obligations in terms of specific requirements regarding filling in the public office of subprefect (position which falls under the category of high officials) in the sense of holding a long-term law education degree; c. Correlated with the previous statement and with the fact that the monitoring the compliance of acts falls under the prefect's scope of responsibilities, the methodological assistance of the secretaries may prove to be rather difficult; d. The impact of turning the secretary general of the prefecture into subprefect was not minimised by other measures so as to ensure institutional capacity, at least in relation with the task of compliance monitoring.

As de lege ferenda proposals[37] concerning the activity of the Prefect's Supervisory Body, we may enunciate: (1) setting exclusive prerogatives – reserved to the Prefect's Supervisory Body, as well as the ones shared with other services/departments within the Prefecture, (2) control of the enforcement of and the respect for the Constitution, the laws and other normative acts should be included in the scope of exclusive prerogatives of the Supervisory Body, being by far the most comprehensive and full prerogative, in harmony with the tasks set forth for the Prime Minister's Supervisory Body, (3) regulating the entities which may be the subject matter of a check and the objectives considered by such a check, (4) clearly setting the legal nature of the inspection report, the ways to exploit the conclusions and the measures resulting from the check conducted, the ways to contest way as well as the sanctions in case of failure to implement such measures.

To improve the control activity carried out by the prefect and to enhance the authority of this institution at local level, these conclusions and de lege ferenda proposals should be taken into account by members of the parliament in reviewing the provisions of the Administrative Code, given that the Constitutional Court of Romania declared it unconstitutional by Decision no. 681/06.11.2018.

PATRIMONIAL LIABILITY OF FORESTRY PERSONNEL IN LIGHT OF EMERGENCY ORDINANCE NO. 59/2000 REGARDING THE STATUS OF THE FORESTRY PERSONNEL AND THE JUDICIAL PRACTICE IN THE MATTER

Beatrice-Ștefania NICULAE[*]

Abstract

The present article aims at carrying out a brief analysis of the patrimonial liability of the forestry personnel, regarding the payment of the value of illegally cut shrubs from the forest fund under their guard, taking into account both the jurisprudence in the matter and the provisions of Emergency Ordinance no. 59/2000 regarding the status of forestry personnel.

Keywords: forestry personnel, liability, E.O. no. 59/2000, payment, illegal cuts, shrubs

1. Introduction

The concept of patrimonial liability has been extensively analyzed, both by the doctrine, and by the courts, in the application of various legislation. However, in this article we are considering a patrimonial lisbility that is less common. This is because it represents a smaller percentage than the patrimonial liabilities that we have already been accustomed to. Therefore, the article attempts to deal with the way this concept is applied in reality to the forestry personnel managing districts.

2. Applicable law and forestry offenses.

The forestry personnel benefits from a special regulation, namely Government Emergency Ordinance no. 59 of May 26th 2000[1] on the Status of forestry personnel. The Ordinance is a normative act from which all actions directed against forestry personnel must be initiated. It is a special regulation, which, in certain situations, can be supplemented by other acts.

Thus, the Ordinance sends to the content of article 58 of Law no. 188/1999 on the Status of civil servants[2], the provisions of the latter act being applied to the extent that the emergency ordinance does not stipulate otherwise.

By the Decision of the High Court of Cassation and Justice no. 3/2014[3], pronounced by the panel regarding the referrals in the interests of the law, the court[4] established that "the actions of patrimonial liability against forestry personnel responsible for forest protection and damages caused on the guarded forest districts, under the conditions of art. 1 lit. a) of the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 85/2006, are within the material competence of the labor courts".

Such a judicial approach was necessary, in consideration of the fact that there were cases in which actions regarding the patrimonial liability of forestry personnel were dismissed as inadmissible. For instance, we are referring to Decision no. 697 of February 12th, 2013[5], pronounced by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, stating that: "the reparation of the damages caused by the civil liability of the civil servant to the public authority or institution, shall be set by issuing the head of the authority or the public institution with an order or provision of imputation within 30 days from the discovery of the damage". This particular decision was referring to an action engaged by the employer against a forester, regarding the concept of patrimonial liability.

Consequently, it was appreciated that since the forester also has the status of a civil servant, his liability could have been achieved only through a payment commitment. Thus, considering that there was no such payment commitment, which could have been challenged under the Law no. 554/2004 on administrative litigation[6], it was appreciated at that time that the employer does not have the possibility to follow the classical path of patrimonial liability.

Such an approach could not be tolerated indefinitely, because the forester is also an employee with an individual labor contract, so it is only natural that he should respond to the extent to which he causes damage to his employer regarding his work.

Any patrimonial liability against the forester will have to meet the classical conditions for engaging such an approach, namely: the forester must be an employee who caused the damage, the existence of an illicit deed committed by the person concerned, in connection with his work, the existence of an injury to the employer and the causality connection between the unlawful act committed and both the injury and the guilt of the employee. In the event that one of the conditions mentioned above is not fulfilled, it will not be possible to undertake the patrimonial liability against the forestry personnel.

As a consequence, following Decision no. 3/2014 issued by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the concept of the liability of the forestry staff was clarified with the motivation that such actions were to be engaged on the field of labor law, as it is also stated in the Decision no. 5372 of November 11th, 2015, pronounced by the Craiova Court of Appeal[7].

However, it should be mentioned that, in relation to the patrimonial liability of the forestry personnel, the general labor law conditions will still have to be slightly adjusted, as the High Court of Cassation and Justice even stated by resolving the referral in the interest of the law, namely: "the existence of damage caused to forest vegetation by illegal tree cuts; the damage is detected and evaluated by the assigned forestry personnel; the guarding of the forest vegetation in respect of which the damage was caused is an attribution of the forestry personnel having the professional degree of forester, as stipulated in the individual labor contract; the damage found and evaluated occurred as a result of the failure to guard the forest vegetation; in order to recover the damages found and assessed the injured party will engage an action regarding the patrimonial liability against the guilty person (the person having guard duties), under art. 6 par. (1) of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 85/2006[8]".

Therefore, in order to successfully carry out a patrimonial action against a forester guarding a district, it is necessary that all the above conditions be met cumulatively.

In addition to the Ordinance, the provisions of the Government Decision no. 1076/2009 for the approval of the Forest Fund Guard Regulation[9], which details the organization of the guard duties and obligations of the forestry staff, should also be considered.

Given the issues already exposed, however, in reality we encounter another situation that can ultimately lead to the patrimonial liability of the forestry personnel, namely when a criminal case is opened when forestry offenses are encountered.

The related regulation is mainly found in the provisions of the Forestry Code - Law no. 46/2008[10], more precisely Title VI - Responsibilities and sanctions, art. 104 being more than clear regarding the purpose of this title, namely: the violation of the provisions of this Code attracts, as the case may be, disciplinary, material, civil, contraventional or criminal liability, according to the law.

In a relatively recent article, a difficulty in considering a certain deed either as a forestry contravention or as a forestry offense has been noticed. The whole situation was due to the lack of regulations regarding the value of cubic meters of wood. Thus, it was concluded that "in the given situation, based on the special legislation in the matter, it is simply not possible to distinguish between criminal liability and contraventional liability"[11]. Even the judicial bodies noted that there was a real problem regarding "how to determine the damage caused following the marking, cutting and tree exploitation in unlawful conditions"[12].

Thus, there are a number of regulated deeds, some of which sanctioned as forestry crimes and punished as such.

For example, reading art. 107 of the Forestry Code, we observe some of the deeds the legislators ruled against: "cutting, breaking, destruction, degradation or removal of trees, saplings or undergrowths from the national forest fund and the forest vegetation outside it, without any right, regardless of the form of ownership". These deeds are punished differentially, depending on the amount of damage caused.

Therefore, two situations can be encountered: either the damage is not at least 5 times the average price of one cubic meter of wood at the time of the offense, at which point we will not consider the deed as a forestry offense but a forestry contravention; either the damage exceeds the value at which it could be considered a contravention and thus turns into an offense.

Punishments begin at 6 months and reach up to 7 years, with the indication that, in some cases[13], the special limits of the punishment increase by half when the act is committed:

a) by a person having a weapon or narcotic or paralytic substance on him;
b) during the night;
c) in the forest situated in natural areas, protected areas of national interest;
d) by forestry personnel.

This increase of the punishment is fully justified as it addresses situations that denote more dangerous behavior than just the regular illegal tree cutting activity, which can cause serious environmental consequences. For this reason, the legislator considered it an appropriate approach to increase by half the special limits of the punishment.

Therefore, if a deed fulfilling the conditions to be classified as a forestry offense is committed, the forester, having the status of a verifying organ, will record the event in a report and the competent bodies will be announced thereafter. There are also situations in which the perpetrators are surprised flagrantly, which makes the work of the judiciary bodies substantially clearer.

Thus, if the missing timber is reported by the forester, he will notify the competent police bodies to investigate and find the perpetrator. This can take a long time, depending on the extent of the damages and the presence or lack of evidence.

Once the competent bodies are legally notified of the situation, the prosecutor, along with the judiciary bodies, will most likely send a closing ordinance, mainly based on the "in dubio pro reo" principle. The employer, wishing to recover the damages, will probably complain to the first prosecutor against the closing ordinance, according to art. 339 par. (1) Criminal Procedure Code[14].

Assuming that the first prosecutor communicates to the employer unit an ordinance rejecting the complaint against the closing ordinance, we appreciate that the rational steps will be followed, namely the provisions of art. 340 Code of Criminal Procedure.

Consequently, the situation moves to the next procedural step, meaning the preliminary chamber court, that will analyze the complaint against the closing ordinance. Precisely at this moment, there are two possibilities that the court has: either reject the complaint of the employer or admit it.

In the first case, therefore, when the complaint is rejected, the employer unit gains the certainty that the perpetrator shown in the forester's report did not commit the forestry offense. In this particular situation, the employer can address the court with a patrimonial liability action against the forester.

In the second case, however, by admitting the complaint against the closing ordinance of the prosecutor, the case will be referred back to the prosecutor in order to continue the investigations in the case. Therefore, the entire procedural cycle described earlier will likely be resumed: the closing ordinance, the complaint of the employer to the First Prosecutor, the rejection ordinance and the employer's complaint to the preliminary chamber of the court.

We would like to draw attention to the fact that illegal cuts do not always relate to large amounts, but on the contrary. The perpetrators usually cut timber illegally in order to heat their own home, therefore for personal use. Consequently, the employer unit can end up spending more than it can actually be recovered, since for every closing ordinance the prosecutors give, additional costs can be added.

An act of particular importance is the Government Decision no. 1076/2009 for the approval of the Forest Protection Regulation, which brings more light to the notion of patrimonial liability, as a follow-up to the closing of a criminal case.

Consequently, in accordance with the provisions of the Regulation, the forester is responsible for the way in which he carries out the guarding activity of the district, one of his obligations being to defend "the integrity of the forest fund against the illegal occupation or use of land, illegal cutting of trees and the removal of wood or other forestry products, the destruction of buildings, installations, terminals, crops, degradation of trees, seedlings and undergrowths, as well as any illegal acts"[15].

Therefore, one could consider two situations:

On the one hand, when the persons who committed the forestry offenses are convicted, meaning that the recovery of the damages is left to their responsibility. Usually the forestry units are already a civil party in the dispute. From this perspective, the forester has no cause for concern, as the responsible persons will be held accountable accordingly.

On the other hand, there are complaints about forestry offenses that are not followed by a conviction, for a multitude of reasons. We are especially referring to the "in dubio pro reo" principle. The criminal case ends when the preliminary chamber court rejects the complaint against the prosecutor's closing ordinance.

Thus, in the second situation, the next step will be the introduction of a patrimonial liability action against the forester who has managed the forest area from which the trees were illegally cut.

It is an unusual situation, and maybe even unfair, for at least two reasons: a) Foresters are the ones who immediately announce the committing of forestry offenses, they also have the status of a verifying organ, drawing up a report in this respect; b) the fact that the persons mentioned in the report as those who committed the offense were not convicted, it does not automatically mean that the forester would have a fault in this respect. Besides, the work schedule of a forester should fit within the 8 hours / day.

However, a request for a preliminary ruling pursuant to Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union by the Dâmboviţa County Court is particularly relevant. It states that "under the applicable national rules, a forester has to carry out his duties 24 hours out of 24, seven days out of seven, without receiving any remuneration other than that of a working schedule of eight hours per day, and this is because his liability is permanently and continuously approached"[16]. It is obvious that it's not possible for a single person to guard the whole forest fund, especially since the areas are hardly accessible and difficult.

On the other hand, the National Forestry Office - Romsilva, in paragraph 34 of the same preliminary ruling, held that "a forester such as the appellant in the main proceedings enjoys a flexible program and can therefore carry out his tasks during one day without exceeding eight working hours and not being held to a fixed schedule between 8 a.m. and 4 p.m.".

The Court of Justice of the European Union stated in paragraphs 54 to 55 that "according to the information submitted to the Court, a flexible contract such as that at issue in the main proceedings seeks to allow, depending on the characteristics of the unit in which the worker is employed or on the work performed, a free distribution of working time, provided that it is respected for a normal period of 40 hours a week. Nontheless, in a situation such as that at issue in the main proceedings, it may also be relevant, as the Commission has rightly pointed out, the fact that the forester is the only one responsible for the guarding of a forest district, with no possibility of working in shifts and no other means of fulfilling the permanent security requirement".

As it has already been mentioned above, the prosecutors usually give closing ordinances, incorporating the "in dubio pro reo" principle. Considering that the offenses we have in mind were committed on a surface of a forest fund, we reiterate that the roads are not easily accessible, which is why, when it comes to understand that a deed was comitted, it may have already passed a few days. As the Court has also emphasized, there is no practice of working in shifts, so that the permanent guarding of the forestry fund might actually benefit from a minimum chance of succeeding.

At this point, it is quite difficult for the judicial bodies to find the perpetrators, mainly because we are talking about offenses regarding timber, which is relatively easy to transport and transform, so that the traces may be lost in a short amount of time. Moreover, except the situations where the perpetrators are caught in flagrante circumstances, it is very likely that they will again be able to rely on the principle above, since the means of proof remaining at the disposal of the judicial authorities are, basically, the shrubs of the illegally cut trees. In consequence, having no access to audio-video samples nor to testimonies of other people, it is usually not possible to establish the certain guilt of a person.

3. Conclusions

In view of the above-mentioned issues, we appreciate that a change in legislation may be beneficial, maybe in the sense of explicitly regulating that illegal tree cuts that rise to a certain already established value will be passed on costs. Another possibility could be the exclusion of the patrimonial liability of the forester, if the personnel drafts the report and complies with all the legal conditions, but the judicial bodies, respectively the preliminary chamber, conclude that there is insufficient evidence to establish with certainty the guilt of a certain person, suspected of illegally cutting trees.

However, if the legislator withdraws the foresters from full responsibility, we might reach a point where they may even cause the criminal phenomenon. Thus, they could cut and sell the timber themselves, knowing they can cover simply by completing a report containing the so-called losses.

In any case, the Romanian legislator should find in the future a way in which neither the employer nor the foresters do not abuse such regulations. At the present moment, we find ourselves in the situation where foresters are fully responsible for all damages caused to a forest fund, if no other responsible persons are found, regardless of the fact that it is impossible for a forester to secure the complete guard of a forest fund, at any time, day or night.

PUBLIC SERVICE – MEANS OF ACHIEVING THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION MISSION

Vasilica NEGRUŢ

Abstract

The role of public administration is to satisfy citizens' interests, respecting their rights and freedoms. This goal is achieved by high standards for public services. In this article, using the logical interpretation and the comparative analysis, we intend to investigate the public service as a means of achieving the public administration mission, highlighting aspects related to the need to organize public services, their definition, the features and principles of organization and functioning, establishment, managing and dissolution of public services. Over time, the notion of public service has been extensively analyzed, starting from the notion of belonging to the state, which is organized to meet the general interests of society. At present, there is no normative act regulating the organization and functioning of public services, as also mentioned in the explanatory memorandum of the Draft Law on the Administrative Code adopted by the Parliament on 9 July 2018 declared unconstitutional in November 2018 by the Constitutional Court of Romania. The European Union's policy in this area is based on the principle of free competition necessary to create a single market. In this regard, the European Commission has pursued a policy of liberalization of services of general economic interest, covering transport, postal and telecommunications services as well as the energy sector. It is a public service approach from an exclusively economic perspective, not taking into account the social dimension of the public service. In conclusion, the notion of public service has historical content, representing the "quintessence of public administration", a component with a fundamental role in fulfilling its mission.

1. Introduction

The notion of public service has historical content, representing the "quintessence of public administration"[1], a component with a fundamental role in the construction of administrative law.

In the current French doctrine, after a long period when the notion of public service became "obsolete"[2], even speaking of its decline, the public service is today regarded as a real key to the construction of the state.[3]

The essence of administrative action, as shown in the French legal literature, is to ensure the functioning of public services, which is the reason for being part of the administration.[4]

The expression public service evokes simultaneously three meanings, namely: institutional, juridical and ideological[5].

At European Union level, the expression "public service" is replaced by other forms. The Treaty of Rome, for example, contains the expression "service of general economic interest" (article 86 becomes article 106 of the TFEU) and the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union recognizes the "place occupied by services of general economic interest within the common values of the Union", as well as "their role in promoting the social and territorial cohesion of the Union" (article 14 TFEU, ex-article 16 of TEC). The European Union's policy in this area is based on the principle of free competition necessary to create a single market. In this regard, the European Commission has pursued a policy of liberalization of services of general economic interest, covering transport, postal and telecommunications services as well as the energy

The current French literature shows that public service is the most politically sensitive object of administrative law, occupying an important place in the public debate. For many, it symbolizes the historical economic and social model of France. The public service has experienced many doctrinal and practical crises, but it is always present and indispensable from a social point of view. sector[6]. It is, therefore, an approach of public service from an exclusively economic perspective, not taking into account the social dimension of the public service.[7]

In our country, in the specialized doctrine, the importance of public service is supported in this period of achieving reform in public administration. Professor Antonie Iorgovan stressed that public services "are strictly necessary in our constitutional system", as they "evoke obligations of the state towards the fundamental rights of the citizen"[8].

2. The Public Service - Means of Achieving the Public Administration Mission

2.1. Definition of Public Service

The public service is defined by the Administrative Contentious Law no. 554/2004 by reference to two fundamental notions of administrative law, namely the notion of public authority and the notion of public interest. According to art. 2 par. (1) letter m), the public service represents "the activity organized or, as the case may be, authorized by a public authority, in order to satisfy a public legitimate interest".

According to art. 5, letter t) of the Administrative Code[9], the public service represents "the activity or the set of activities organized by a public administration authority or by a public institution or authorized or delegated by it, to meet a general or public interest need, on a regular and continuous basis".

The notion of public service has acquired constitutional valences by including it in the constitution texts[10]. The Constitution expressly or implicitly refers to the idea of a public service, either as an activity or as an ensemble of means[11] in: art. 6 (the state's guarantee of the right to identity); art. 7 (for the support of the state to strengthen the Romanians' foreign relations in Romania); art. 21 (to ensure free access to justice); art. 22 and 23 (to guarantee life, physical and mental integrity, and individual freedom); art. 26, 27, 28 (to protect intimate life to ensure inviolability of domicile and correspondence); art. 31 (right to information); art. 39 (to guarantee freedom of assembly); art. 50 (for the protection of persons with disabilities), art. 52 (for the exercise of administrative litigation); art. 79 (for systematization, unification and coordination of legislation); art. 118 (to ensure national defense, public order and national security); art. 120 (to achieve the principles of local government); art. 124 (for the performance of justice) and so on.

2.2. Principles of Organization and Operation of Public Services

The administrative code, in art. 587, regulates the principles underlying the establishment[12], organization and functioning of public services: the principle of transparency; the principle of equal treatment; the principle of continuity; the principle of adaptability of

The author carries out a grouping in several categories of the constitutional provisions applicable to the public service: a) regulations laying down general principles established by the Romanian constituent legislator at the basis of the functioning of all public authorities (article 16, paragraphs (1) and (1) equality of rights, article 32 (6) - guaranteeing university autonomy, etc.); b) regulations laying down principles governing the organization and functioning of public administration in general or expressly of public services (article 120 - the principles underlying the organization and functioning of local public administration, namely the principles of decentralization, local autonomy and the deconcentration of public services); c) regulations for the public authorities with competence in the provision of public services (article 122, par. 1), for example, according to which the county council is the authority of the public administration for the coordination of the activity of the communal councils and the town councils in order to carry out the public services of the county interest or article 123 paragraph (2), which establishes that the prefect is the representative of the Government at the local level and manages the deconcentrated public services of the ministries and of the other central public administration bodies in the administrative-territorial units); (d) regulations contained in Chapters II and III on fundamental rights, freedoms and duties.

[12] The public service feature of an activity or a set of activities is recognized by normative acts (article 593 of the Administrative Code). The regulatory act regulating a public service must contain at least the following elements:

a) the activity or activities constituting the respective public service;
b) the objectives of the public service;
c) type of public service;
d) public service obligations, where appropriate;
e) the structure responsible for the provision of the public service;
f) management arrangements;
g) sources of financing;
h) modalities for monitoring, evaluation and control of the provision of public service;
i) sanctions;
j) quality and cost standards, if they are established by law;
k) other elements established by law.

the public service; the principle of accessibility; the principle of providing high quality public services; the principle of ensuring public service responsibility.

Regarding the principle of transparency, the public administration authorities are required to provide information on "the ways of establishing the component activities and objectives, the ways of regulating, organizing, operating, financing, delivering and evaluating public services, and also protection measures and complaint and litigation mechanisms".

The principle of equal treatment in conducting public services presupposes the "abolition of any discrimination of the beneficiaries of public services based on ethnic or racial origin, religion, age, gender, sexual orientation, disability, as well as the enforcement of rules, requirements and identical criteria for all public service authorities and bodies, including in the process of delegating the public service."

The principle of continuity is defined in article 12 of the Administrative Code and it is intended to carry out the activity of the public administration without interruption, in compliance with the legal provisions[13].

The principle of adaptability implies the obligation of the public administration to meet the needs of society through the organization of public services.

In order to respect the principle of accessibility, which presupposes the provision of access to public services for all beneficiaries, especially those services that meet their basic needs, the public authorities must take into account, from the foundation of the public service, aspects regarding costs, availability, adaptation, proximity. Also, public authorities must comply with both the quality standards[14] and the cost standards[15] used to deliver public services.

The principle of responsibility for ensuring public service involves the existence of an authority of the competent public administration for ensuring the public service, independent of the way it is managed and provided/delivered to the beneficiary.

The principles of organization and functioning of public services are also found in normative acts of special nature. For example, the Community Public Utilities Act no. 51/2006[16], republished[17], amended and completed, in art. 7 establishes the requirements for the organization and functioning of these services: universality; continuity in qualitative and quantitative terms; adaptability to user requirements[18]; equal and non-discriminatory access to public service; decisional transparency and user protection. Law no. 51/2006 establishes, in art. 1 par. (3), the following features of public utility services: a) have economic and social feature; b) respond to requirements and needs of public interest and utility; c) have technical-municipal feature; d) have permanent feature and continuous operation regime; e) the operating regime may have monopoly characteristics; f) they presuppose the existence of adequate technical infrastructure; g) the coverage area has local dimensions: communal, urban, municipal or county; h) they are the responsibility of the local public administration authorities; i) are organized on economic and efficiency principles in conditions that enable them to fulfill their specific public service missions and obligations; j) the management way is determined by decisions of the deliberative authorities of the local public administration; k) are provided / rendered on the basis of the "beneficiary pays" principle; (l) the recovery of operating and investment [13] The Administrative Code does not specify what these provisions are, but we take into account the provisions of the Social Dialogue Law no. 61/2011, regarding the obligation to provide certain public services in case of strike organization. We exemplify the provisions of art. 205, according to which "in the sanitary and social assistance, telecommunications, public radio and television stations, in railway transport, in the units providing the joint transport and sanitation of the localities, as well as the population supply with gas, electricity, heat and water, the strike is allowed provided the strike organizers provide the services, but not less than one-third of normal activity." Law no. 61/2011 was published in the Official Monitor of Romania, Part I, no. 322 of May 10, 2011, republished on the basis of art. 80 of Law no. 76/2012 for the implementation of Law no. 134/2010 on the Civil Procedure Code, published in the Official Monitor of Romania, Part I, no. 365 of 30 May 2012, giving the texts a new numbering.

[15] "The normative costs used to determine the amount of resources allocated to the local budgets of the administrative-territorial units in order to provide a public service and / or public service to the quality standard established by normative acts" (article 5, letter yy) of the Administrative Code).

[16] Public utility services are defined as all the activities regulated by law and special laws, which ensure the satisfaction of the essential needs of general utility and social interest of local communities with regard to: water supply; sewage treatment; collecting, channeling and evacuating rainwater; centralized heat supply; sanitation of localities; public lighting; local public passenger transport (art. 1 par. (2)].

According to art. 1 of this normative act, "public institutions and specialized bodies of the central public administration have the obligation to publish, ex officio, information and models of forms or requests related to all public services provided in electronic format on their own website, as well as on the unique electronic contact point defined by the Government Decision no. 922/2010 on the organization and functioning of the Single Electronic Contact Point in its up-to-date version and in a technical format allowing for downloading and editing for the purpose of completing the computer on the beneficiary." costs shall be made through prices and tariffs or fees and, where appropriate, budgetary allocations. The measure may involve elements of the nature of the state aid, in which case the local public administration authorities request the opinion of the Competition Council.

The community services of public utilities ensure the fulfillment of the essential needs of general social utility and public interest of the local communities with regard to: water supply; sewage and sewage treatment; collecting, channeling and evacuating rainwater; centralized heat supply; sanitation of localities; public lighting; natural gas supply; local public passenger transport (article 1, par. (4) of Law No 51/2006).[19]

2.3. Management of Public Services

Regarding the organization and management of public services, the following are distinguished: management through an autonomous administration or a public institution; a concession contract for the valuation of a public property, either for the performance of public works or for the satisfaction of other collective needs; lease; location in management; civil contract; the commercial contract[20].

Recent forms of public service management are mentioned in the recent literature[21]: direct management[22]; delegated management[23]; semi-direct management. They are also listed as forms of organization and management of public services, joint venture[24] and public-private partnership[25].

According to art. 597 of the Administrative Code, the management modalities of a public service are direct management and delegated management[26]. Direct management means "the manner in which an authority of the public administration assumes / exercises its direct competence in relation to the provision of a public service under the law or regulation of the public service" (article 598, par. (1) of the Administrative Code).

Direct management may be carried out by a public administration authority, by the structures with or without legal personality, by the companies governed by the Company Law no. 31/1990, republished, with the subsequent amendments and [19] In November 2018, the draft Government Decision for the approval of the Preliminary Theses of the draft Community Services Code for Public Utilities was publicly debated. As stated in the Fundamental Note, the necessity of adopting such a code is justified by: the lack of legislative coherence in the field, determined by the multitude of existing normative acts; overlaps between provisions aimed at establishing, operating and developing a Community utility of public utilities and provisions in the field of public administration; the lack of clarity of the normative acts in the field and the limitation of accessibility, determined by the successive modifications of the specific legislation; the lack of systematization of the rules governing the activity in the field of community services of public utilities, so that the normative system is understood by all and therefore easy to apply; lack of unitary terminology. It is also considered that "the development of a Community Utilities Code of Practice is an effort to facilitate the implementation of the Strategy for Strengthening Public Administration 2014-2020, approved by the Government Decision no. 909/2014, as subsequently amended, since it is intended to create a framework that provides the most efficient and responsive public services to the needs of society."

[22] Direct management is the way in which the local or state collectivity ensures the achievement of the public service through specialized structures. According to art. 22 par. (1) of the Community Public Utilities Act no. 51/2006, "the local public administration authorities are free to decide how to manage the public utility services under their responsibility. Public administration authorities have the possibility to directly manage public utility services on the basis of a management decision or to entrust their management, i.e. all or only a part of their own competences and responsibilities regarding the provision of a public utility service or one or more activities within the scope of that public utility service under a management delegation contract".

Art. 28 para. (1) of the Law no. 51/2006 defines direct management as "the manner of management in which the deliberative and executive authorities, on behalf of the administrative-territorial units they represent, assume and exercise directly all their powers and responsibilities under the law regarding the provision / provision of public utilities, respectively, to the management, operation and operation of the public utility systems related to them".

[23] In the case of the delegated management, the public authority resorts to a commercial company for the achievement of public service, while retaining its public responsibility (article 2 paragraph (1) letters g) and f), for example, from Law no. 100/2016 on concessions of works and concessions of services, defining the works concession contract, respectively the service concession contract). According to art. 2 of the Law no. 51/2006 "the delegation of the management of a public utility services represent the action by which a territorial-administrative unit assigns to one or more operators, under the law, the provision of a service or activity in the sphere of public utility services, its responsibility. The delegation of the management of a public utility service / activity involves the actual operation of the service / activity, the provision of the public utility system related to the delegated service / activity as well as the operator's right and obligation to manage and operate the public utility system. Delegation of management may also be carried out by intercommunity development associations with the purpose of public utility services in the name and on behalf of the member-administrative territorial units, on the basis of a special mandate granted by them."

[24] Article 1949 of the Civil Code defines joint venture as "a contract by which a person grants one or more persons a share in the profits and losses of one or more operations it undertakes."

[25] The legal framework of the public-private partnership is established by the Emergency Ordinance no. 39/2018. The public-private partnership has as object, according to art. 1 par. (2) "the achievement or, as the case may be, the rehabilitation and / or extension of a good or property belonging to the public partner's patrimony and / or the operation of a public service", under the conditions established by this normative act. Art. 4 of the Emergency Ordinance no. 39/2018 establishes the following forms of public-private partnership: the public-private partnership contract - the public-private partnership under a contract between the public partner, the private partner and a new company whose share capital is wholly owned by the private partner act as a project company; institutional public-private partnership - a public-private partnership based on a contract between the public partner and the private partner, through which a new company is set up by the public partner and the private partner to act as a project company and, after registration in the company register, acquires the capacity as a party to the respective public-private partnership contract. Emergency Ordinance no. 39/2018 was published in the Official Monitor no. 427 of May 18, 2018.

completions[27], with full social capital of the state or of the administrative-territorial unit established by the public administration authorities or other legal entities of private law, as the case may be, in compliance with the legal provisions [art. 598 par. (2)].

Unlike direct management, delegated management is the management way through which the provision of public service is carried out on the basis of a delegation act and / or authorization by the competent public administration authority, in compliance with the provisions of the legislation on public procurement, sector procurement and the concession of services, by the bodies providing public services other than those provided by art. 598 par. (2).

The Administrative Code establishes the legal nature of the act of delegation to an economic operator for providing the service of general economic interest, this being an administrative act, which must include at least the following elements, unless otherwise provided by special laws:

(a) the content of public service obligations, (b) the body providing the public service (s) and, where applicable, the territory it provides, (c) the duration of the service, (d) the nature of any special entitlements granted to the public service provider by the legislator or by the competent public administration authority e) a description of the compensation mechanism and the parameters for calculating, controlling and reviewing the compensation[28] granted for the provision of the public service f) the ways to avoid overcompensation and to recover any overcompensation; g) exclusive rights granted, under the law, to the provider of public services by the legislator or by the competent public administration authority; h) cases and situations of termination of the delegation act; i) rights and obligations of the parties involved; j) performance indicators and efficiency of the service [art. 600 paragraph (1)]. Regardless of how public services are managed, the public administration authorities have the obligation to monitor, evaluate and control the provision of public services within their competence, within the limits set by the legislation applicable to each type of public service (article 601).

According to the provisions of art. 590 of the Administrative Code, the establishment of the constituent activities, the mission, the assigning procedure, the compensation, as the case may be, as well as the provision of the public services shall be carried out in accordance with the standards and requirements established by the specific EU legislation applicable in the Member States.

2.4. The Dissolution of Public Services

Public services may be dissolved at the initiative of the competent public administration authority and following public consultation, if a public service no longer responds to a need in the public interest. The establishment of public services shall be ordered by an act of the same level as the one with which it was established (article 602 of the Administrative Code).

The competence to dismantle or dissolve the structure responsible for the provision of public services belongs to the competent central public administration authority in the case of public services of national interest or the local public administration authority in the case of public services of local interest (article 603 of the Administrative Code).

3. Conclusions

In conclusion, the public service, as a dimension of public administration, has a historical content, representing the "quintessence of public administration", a component with a fundamental role in fulfilling its mission. Therefore, public services "are strictly necessary in our constitutional system" as they "evoke the obligations of the state towards the fundamental rights of the citizen".

XII of Title II of Book II of Law no. 161/2003 on certain measures for ensuring transparency in the exercise of public dignities, public functions and business environment, prevention and sanctioning of corruption, published in the Official Monitor of Romania, Part I, no. 279 of April 21, 2003, with subsequent amendments, giving the texts a new numbering.

[28] At European Union level, the notion of compensation is clarified in the Commission Notice on the application of the European Union State aid rules to compensation for services of general economic interest [2012 / C 8/02]. The Commission Communication 2012 / C8 / 03 establishes the European Union Framework for State Aid in the form of Compensation for the Public Service Obligation (2011).

The Court of Justice of the European Union in the judgment in Altmark's case further clarified the conditions under which public service compensation does not constitute State aid due to the absence of any advantage (Case C-280/00 Altmark Trans GmbH and Regierungspräsidium Magdeburg/Nahverkehrsgesellschaft Altmark GmbH). According to the Court of Justice of the European Union, in order for such compensation in a particular case not to qualify as State aid, a number of conditions must be fulfilled: "the beneficiary's undertaking must be in fact entrusted with the execution public service obligations and these obligations must be clearly defined; the parameters on the basis of which the compensation is calculated must be established in advance, in an objective and transparent manner, in order to avoid conferring an economic advantage which may favor the recipient undertaking compared to competing undertakings; compensation may not exceed what is necessary to cover all or part of the costs incurred in discharging the public service obligations, taking into account the revenue generated by that activity and a reasonable profit; where the choice of the undertaking to be entrusted with the performance of public service obligations in a particular case is not made in the context of a public procurement procedure which enables the tenderer to be able to provide those services at the lowest price for the community, the level of compensation required must be determined on the basis of a cost analysis that a typical, well-run and appropriately-equipped undertaking to meet the public service requirements it would have incurred in discharging those obligations, taking into account the revenue generated by that activity, as well as a reasonable profit for the performance of these obligations".

THE LEGITIMACY OF LAW IN DEMOCRATIC SOCIETIES

Oana Andra NIȚĂ

Abstract

The legitimacy of the state power identifies an interactive relation of balance and cooperation between branches of power in the state, under the condition of a contemporary democratic political regime. The rule of law is based on the legitimacy of the Constitution itself and this quality preconditions can only be achieved by applying and respecting the principle of the legitimacy of state power and the ethical bodies directly involved in the complex process of establishing, mantaining and exercising state power.

Legitimacy is the form of thinking and managing society within a predominant political order, around which a social consensus is built through different processes and at different times.

In this paper we will try to produce an argument showing that the state has a legitimate authority and we need – as we can see – two aspects. On the one hand, the validity of the state's claim to have authority (to order, to issue laws etc.) and on the other hand, the correlated obligation to obey.

People are responsible for what they are doing. They are free to choose, to judge about the choices they are going to make, they take responsibility for their actions and their consequences. As philosopher I. Kant argued, the human person gives these moral norms to itself: to have personal autonomy means to obey the norms you give yourself. By definition, the idea of autonomy opposes the idea of obedience under the will of another. The person's autonomy is incompatible with accepting to act according to the will of another. Sure, the autonomy does not mean that the person always refuses to take into account other people.

1. Introduction

The central concept of politics, legitimacy, has a long intellectual history. Starting with ancient Greece, passing through the Roman Empire, the Middle Ages and modernity, legitimacy has been constantly disputed between the elites and society in order to identify the most appropriate form of government in a certain historical context.

"Legitimacy" is a complex category with multiple meanings and also the topic of research for the general theory of law, philosophy of law, sociology and other disciplines. There are multiple meanings of this concept. We mention a few: legitimacy of power; the legitimacy of the political regime; legitimacy of governance; the legitimacy of the political system, etc. The term "legitimacy" designates the feature which enables an entity to the power to order or prohibit something without resorting to physical violence or even successfully use coercion if necessary, in the last instance, an option recognized as normal. The concept of legitimacy can also be applied to legal acts issued by public authorities, linked to the margin of appreciation to which they are entitled in the exercise of their duties.

In Economy and Society, Max Weber defines the dominance as "the likelihood that certain specific orders will be heard by a certain group of people." At the same time, he states that any form of domination involves a minimum of voluntary compliance, submission. In a political system based on traditional authority, legitimacy is conferred by faith in the validity and sanctity of the old rules, traditions and customs. "In such a system, the ruler is chosen on the basis of traditions, his authority being based on unwritten laws, considered sacred."[1] People owe their leadership for their tradition, their obedience being based, more cases, personal loyalty, or simply ideas shared by each individual.

In this paper we will try to consider the meaning and measurement of trust and legitimacy of law in the context of democratic regimes. We aim to make three contributions. The first is to draw conceptual distinctions between trust and legitimacy, while also clarifying the ground on which these the two concepts are based. The second is to review the content coverage of the existing legislative controls of the legitimacy of law. The third is to consider how trust and legitimacy may variously motivate law-related society behavior.

2. Conceptions of democratic legitimacy

Although in contemporary political philosophy there is a general convergence on the idea that a certain form of democracy is superior to any feasible political regime so far, different approaches to its normative justification (which are sometimes incompatible) were proposed. The common question these approaches are therefore trying to answer is if the policy of the authority established by a democratic regime is legitimate or on what the "permissiveness of a state to issue and impose order" is morally based.[2] Most generally, conceptions of democratic legitimacy are divided into two categories, called democratic proceduralism and democratic instrumentalism.[3]

Democratic proceduralism is the position stating that democratic legitimacy derives from the intrinsic characteristics of the process by which democratic decisions are taken. In its turn, democratic proceduralism can involve two dimensions, even if some of the theories that are part of this family mainly (or even absolutely) focus on one. These two dimensions are: (1) the aggregrative one, which refers to the fairness[4] of the electoral mechanisms, most often operationalized in the form of the principle "one man, one vote"[5] and (2) the deliberative one, linked to the importance of the public debate before voting, being "anchored in the intuitive ideal of a democratic association in which the justification of the terms and conditions of association derives from public argumentation and reasoning among equal citizens."[6] Perhaps the most important proceduralist view of democracy belongs to Robert Dahl. It proposes a series of 5 criteria, the maximum satisfaction of which is the idea of perfect democracy: (1) the effective participation, according to which citizens should have adequate and equal opportunities to express their preferences on the priorities of the public agenda and on the results (2) equality of vote at the decisive stage, according to which citizens must have equal opportunities in collective decisions to express options equal to those of others, (3) an enlightened understanding that citizens must have equal opportunities and appropriate to find out which of the electoral alternatives best serve their own interest, (4) control over the agenda, according to which the demo should have the exclusive opportunity to decide which issues will be prioritized on the public agenda and (5), which implies that all citizens of a state must be included in the demos.[7]

Democratic instrumentalism opposes the procedural approach. This is, according to Richard Arneson, "the combination of two ideas. One is instrumentalism in political arrangements: the form of government that should be established and sustained in a political society is one whose consequences would be better than any feasible alternative. The second idea is that under modern conditions, democratic political institutions would be the best in terms of the instrumentalist norm and should therefore be implemented."[8] This approach may also include several types of distinct theories, depending on how we interpret the idea of good consequences. An intuitive version of this approach assumes that the notion of good consequence is strictly related to the facts produced through the democratic process, considering that they are on average morally superior to those produced by any other political regime. As stated by Joshua Cohen, this epistemic conception of democracy implies three elements: (1) an independent standard (against the outcome of the vote) of what is a right decision, (2) a cognitive perspective on the vote, according to which the vote expresses beliefs about what are the right decisions, not the personal preferences of the voter, and (3) a view of decision-making as a process in which individuals adjust their beliefs about the correctness of a decision based on the available evidence.[9]

Another version, preferred by Arneson, argues that epistemic aspects are not all that matter in the evaluation of the political regime, arguing that "a decision is morally legitimate only if, in the long run, it consists in results that are morally superior to those that would provide any feasible alternative procedure."[10] According to this view, even if democracy did not produce moral decisions superior to any other regime, it could still be preferable due, for example, to the civic culture that it builds in a particular community. It is important to note, however, two common aspects of the two instrumentalist approaches. First, both require the identification of an independent standard of good consequences, which is not derived from the outcome of the vote. Secondly, both allow partial "limitation" of the will of the majority in certain situations, as this limitation will lead to better moral results.

3. The concept of Legality

Legality, as a feature that must characterize the legal acts of public authorities, has as central element the concept of "law", which could be defined as a written general rule established by the public powers after deliberation, entailing direct or indirect acceptance of the governors. Ion Deleanu defines it as "an act containing general and mandatory rules sanctioned by the State's coercive force when its application is not realized by conviction and is susceptible to application whenever the conditions laid down in its hypothesis arises."[11] In a broader meaning, the concept of law includes all legal acts that contain legal norms. The law in its restricted sense is the legal act of parliament drawn up in accordance with the constitution, according to an established procedure and which regulates the most important and general social rules. A special place in the administered legal system has the Constitution, defined as fundamental law, located on the top of legislative system, which includes legal rules of higher legal force, which regulate fundamental and essential social relations, especially those concerning the establishment and exercising of state power.

The state of legality in the work of public authorities is based on the concepts of supremacy of the constitution and supremacy of law. The supremacy of constitution is a quality of the fundamental law that basically expresses its supreme legal force in the legal system. An important consequence of fundamental law supremacy is the compliance of entire law with the constitutional norms. The notion of juridical supremacy of law is considered to be the feature regarding the fact that the norms it establishes must not be in contradiction with constitutional norms or other legal acts issued by state bodies that are subordinated to the constitutional norms in terms of their legal effectiveness. Therefore, the supremacy of law in the sense above is subsequent to the principle of supremacy of constitution. Important is that the legality, as a feature of the legal acts of state authorities involves the observance of the principle of supremacy of the constitution and law. The observance of these two principles is a fundamental constitutional obligation consecrated by the provisions of article 1 paragraph 5 of the Romanian Constitution. Failure to observe this obligation attracts the appropriate sanction of unconstitutionality or illegality of legal documents.

The legality of the legal acts of public authorities involves the following requirements: legal document to be issued in compliance with the competence prescribed by law; legal act to be issued in accordance with the procedure prescribed by law; legal act to respect the rules of law as superior legal force.

4. Legitimacy without politics?

The meanings of the concept of legitimacy, a true political ontology (if we consider its implications that considerably exceed the immediate field of political practice), have always been imposed by elites to those privileged from the point of view of access to the binomial knowledge/power, trying to do their best to justify their position, while convincing societies that the status quo is at least desirable. Political elites have not always acted with the conscious purpose of manipulating the governors, weaving the wires of an esoteric political conspiracy of colossal proportions; the Athenian democrats or the French revolutionary bourgeoisie of 1789 honestly tried to identify the most appropriate governing formulas for their situation without realizing that their policies excluded most of the population from the public decision-making process: women, slaves, alienated in ancient Athens, peasantry and the so-called “passive citizens”, whose political non-involvement was perceived as the result of an individual choice, not as a form of coercion and exclusion of dictatorship - as was the case in revolutionary France.

However, from any form of policy benefits, involuntarily or not, a certain social category, the one whose representatives hold the power at that time and that particular political regime is usually trying to convince the rest of the social categories as convincingly, as possible, to join the social project proposed by it. Legitimacy is a quality attributed to the political regime by the people, a quality generated by the regime's ability to inspire confidence in its own legitimacy. The legitimacy of a political system is linked to its ability to impose and maintain the belief that the existing political institutions are best suited to a given society.

Legitimacy will always mean politics and politics will always mean representation, for which we can not really discuss a genuine political ontology, based on the distinction between the subject of study and the science (policy) of study, but especially its progressive transformation - because the rules and procedures we follow are pure, based solely on daily social practice; but there will always be a certain distance between society and the policy through which there is self-instilling, because we will never have direct access to irremediably fragmented social society, without immediate access through abstractions such as language, law, morality or legitimacy. The concrete is given only by a thick layer of abstractions that transforms us into something intelligible and malleable. Similarly, the (concrete) society exists only through the policy (abstract, which includes many layers of significant deposits over time), these two entities being different and impossible to unify; and yet the latter must remain the ideal of politics in excellence. Legitimacy only makes sense in the space between politics and society, being a contiguous field in relation to both categories, a field whose narrowing is paradoxically translated into exacerbating its exogenous effects, that is by bringing as close as possible the represented to the representatives.

The concept of legitimacy bears more quickly, a character of appreciation, an ethical character and also political one, while legality is associated with a legal-formal character and ethically neutral one. State power is, as a rule, legal. In the same time, it can be illegitimate, meaning that it is not accepted by society, if the people representing the state power make laws according to their own vision and use them as means of organized violence by doing arbitrariness. The legitimacy of state power - this is the recognition of the leading role that the social law is entitled to have in the society. Essentially, the subject that holds legitimate power is trying to create a situation in which the decisions to recognize and respect the law are made not through fear, but through conscience, with faith in the moral equity of judgments and laws. State power can not count on a existence of long duration and actual activity, relying solely on violence, because the voluntary, strengthened consent is needed respecting the legality. By way of threats and repressions, it can be done to obey only a small proportion of citizens, But increasing resistance to power leads to mass disaffection.

The first premise of the voluntary agreement is the sure conviction of the people in the fact that the representatives of the power develop and translate their decisions into life on the path of the interests related to the state, not breaching what is considered private and personal. Where the legitimacy of power is questionable (not certain), the lawlessness and danger of revolutionary unrest.

Legitimacy is not only the legality of power from the point of legal-formal view, but rather the phenomenon of social psychology, which consists of accepting this political power by society or at least passive obedience to it. Thus, new regimes following the revolution, the coup d'etat may become legitimate if it would secure the support of a considerable part of it society. In connection to this, the very nature of legitimacy, its sources and the arrangements for insurance can be enough different, depending on the cultural level, traditions and psychology of the population. Being a complicated social phenomenon, legitimacy manifests itself differently. Talking about the power of legitimacy, we should take into account, on the one hand, its authority, trust, recognition, and, on the other hand, the devotion and the desire of the society to go after it and obey its requirements.

5. Authority, discretional power and proportionality

The meaningful links between these terms "legitimacy" and "authority" are quite obvious. The authority, by its nature, is a characteristic feature of power embodied by a person, an institution, etc. Its specificity is manifested by the fact that those subjects of power relations, to whom authority is characteristic, are given the recognition and trust of those who have invested them with power. The authority presents itself as a phenomenon of autogeneration of power, which transforms over time into one of the forms of its existence, most often related to the legitimacy process.

The application and observance of the principle of legality in the activity of the state authorities is a complex issue because the exercise of state functions also implies the discretionary power with which the state bodies are invested or otherwise being said, the authorities' right of appreciation regarding the moment of adoption and the content of the ordered measures. What is important to emphasize is that discretionary power can not be opposed to the principle of legality, as a dimension of the rule of law.

In our opinion, legality is a particular aspect of the legitimacy of legal acts of public authorities. Thus, a legitimate legal act is a legal act, issued within the scope of the discretion recognized by the public authorities, which does not generate unjustified discriminations, privileges or restrictions of subjective rights and is appropriate to the factual situation that is determined by the purpose of the law. On the one hand, legitimacy makes the distinction between discretionary power recognized by state authorities and, on the other hand, excess power.

Not all legal acts that meet the conditions of legality are also legitimate. A legal act that complies with the formal conditions of legality but generates discrimination or privileges or unjustifiably restricts the exercise of subjective rights or is not appropriate to the factual situation or the purpose pursued by law is an illegitimate legal act. The legitimacy, as a feature of the legal acts of public administration authorities, must be understood and applied in relation to the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution.

Addressing the question of the boundaries between legitimacy and discretionary power, Leon Duguit[12] has achieved an interesting distinction between "normal powers and exceptional powers" conferred on the administration by the constitution and laws, and on the other hand situations in which state authorities act outside the normative framework. The author divides these latter situations into three categories:

1. excess power (when the state authorities exceed the limits of legal authority);
2. misappropriation of power (when the state authority fulfills an act falling within its competence for other purposes than those prescribed by law);
3. abuse of power (when the state authorities act outside their powers, but through acts that are not legal).

Proportionality is a fundamental principle of explicitly enshrined law in constitutional and international legal instruments. It is based on the values of the rational right of justice and equity and expresses the existence of a balanced or adequate relationship between actions, situations and phenomena as a criterion for limiting the measures ordered by the state authorities to what is necessary to achieve a legitimate goal, guaranteed fundamental rights and avoid the excess power of state authorities. Proportionality is a basic principle of European Union law being expressly enshrined in the provisions of Art. 5 of the Treaty on European Union.

Therefore, the principle of proportionality is an essential criterion that allows the discretionary power to delimit excess power in the work of state authorities. This principle is explicitly or implicitly enshrined in international legal instruments or by most constitutions of democratic countries. The Romanian Constitution regulates this principle in Art. 53, but there are other constitutional provisions involving it. In constitutional law, the principle of proportionality is particularly applicable to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. It is considered an effective criterion for assessing the legitimacy of State authorities' intervention in limiting the exercise of certain rights. Furthermore, even if the principle of proportionality is not expressly stated in the constitution of a State, doctrine and case-law consider it to be part of the notion of the State of law. This principle is applied in several branches of law. Thus, administrative law is a limitation of the discretionary power of public authorities and is a criterion for exercising judicial control of discretionary administrative acts.

Proportionality is not only a question of fact but a principle of law, including constitutional law and the courts of ordinary law, administrative litigation or the Constitutional Court can rely on it to sanction excess power. Our constitutional court may explicitly invoke the criterion of proportionality only under the conditions provided by the provisions of Art. 53 paragraph (2) of the Romanian Constitution. Therefore, there is no possibility of sanctioning excess power of the legislature, using the criterion of proportionality, and in other situations, especially in cases where, through the measures ordered, the legislator goes beyond what is necessary to achieve a legitimate goal.

We consider that the express regulation of this principle only in the content of the provisions of Article 53 of the Constitution, applying in the field of the restriction of the exercise of certain rights, is insufficient to give full meaning to the significance and importance of the principle of the rule of law. It would be useful to be added in the context of Article 1 of the Constitution a new paragraph stipulating that "the exercise of state power must be proportionate and non-discriminatory." This new constitutional regulation would constitute a genuine constitutional obligation for all state authorities to exercise their powers in such a way that the adopted measures fall within the limits of the discretionary power recognized by the law. At the same time, it is possible for the Constitutional Court to sanction the excess of power in the activity of the Parliament and the Government on the way of the constitutionality control of laws and ordinances, using as a criterion the principle of proportionality.

In the administrative doctrine, which mainly studies the issue of discretionary power, it was emphasized that the opportunity of administrative acts can not be opposed to their legality, and the conditions of legality can be divided into: general conditions of legality and specific conditions of legality on the grounds of opportunity.[13] Consequently, legality is the corollary of the conditions of validity, and opportunity is a requirement (a dimension) of legality. However, the right of appreciation is not recognized by the state authorities in the exercise of all their duties. There is discrepancy between the jurisdiction of the state authorities which exists when the law imposes on them certain strict decision-making behavior and on the other hand the discretionary power, particularly the situation in which the state authorities can choose the means for achieving a legitimate purpose or generally, when the organ which the state can choose between several variants, within the limits of its law and competence.

Although the issue of discretionary power is mainly studied by administrative law, the right of appreciation in the exercise of certain duties is a reality encountered in the work of all the state authorities. The Parliament, as the supreme representative body and the sole legislative authority, has the widest limits, and manifest discretionary power, which is identified by the very characterization of the legislative act. Since the interwar period I. V. Gruia stressed: "The need to legislate in a particular matter, choosing the moment of lawmaking, choosing the moment when the law was enforced, by setting the date of law enforcement by the legislator, reviewing previous laws that can not bind and oblige the future parliament work, the restriction of social activities from their free and uncontrolled deployment and their obedience to the norms and sanctions of the law, the content of the legislative act, etc., prove the sovereign and discretionary appreciation of the function of the legislative body."[14]

Discretionary power also exists in the work of the courts. The judge is required to make a decision only when he is notified, within the limit of the referral. Beyond this, the right to sovereign appreciation of the facts, the right to interpret the law, the right to fix a minimum or a maximum penalty, to grant or not to attenuate circumstances, to determine the amount of damages, etc. is manifested. Exercising these competences is nothing more than discretionary power. Exceeding the limits of discretionary power means violation of the principle of legality or what in law, doctrine and jurisprudence is called "excess power". Excessive power in the work of state bodies is equivalent to abuse of the law, as it means the exercise of legal competence without a reasonable justification or without an adequate relationship between the measure, the factual situation and the legitimate aim pursued.

The opinion expressed in the specialized literature was that "the purpose of the law will be the legal limit of the right of appreciation. For discretionary power does not mean a freedom beyond the law, but one allowed by law."[15] Of course, the "purpose of the law" is a condition of legality or, as the case may be, the constitutionality of the legal acts of state bodies and can therefore be considered a criterion to delimit discretionary power from excess power.

Conclusions

Analyzing different approaches and concepts regarding the legitimacy of the law expressed through state power, we can mention that legitimacy, as a way of social recognition, presupposes a bilateral relationship: first, the perception of power, the relationship between power and the subject that holds the power; secondly, the understanding by the subject who holds the power of law regarding the defining and practical elements of the power he owns. From the above, we can conclude that state power can only be maintained to the extent that the power structures are legitimate and political decisions, including laws, express general will and are not used against a part of the population. And the legitimacy of a state power can be viewed from a dual perspective: (1) as an act of designating the structures of power (the conquest or act of establishing power); (2) the consistency between the content of political decisions and the expectations of those governed.

Our aim regarding this paper and also further research is to outline the role of normative functions in contemporary society and to define the paradigms of law in relation to the evolution of relations between civic society and public, as well as private institutions.

VOX POPULI - PARADIGM OF CONTEMPORARY LAW

Oana Andra NIȚĂ

Abstract

In the contemporary society, which tends to be more and more close to uniformity and globalization, law tends to harmonize the individual interests with the general one. Social life is guided by all the norms imposed on individuals and collectives, which in some particular cases may be applied even through the coercion of the state.

Public institutions and democratic societies live through the coexistence and cooperation of their members. As long as the constituent elements of the societies are represented by individuals, each of them must also comply with the coexistence and cooperation rules necessary to maintain the balance of the rule of law.

As a society, we need justice, but it is not necessary for people to get tired of pretending justice to be done. Meanwhile, there is a need for a different justice, with a true culture of law and with strong liability.

Lately worldwide events, such as great protests with high impact over national administrative and legal systems, as well as over international political relations have proved to be a massive arm against the entry into force of normative acts.

The purpose of the paper and the objectives pursued by us will try to reveal whereas the initiatives of

1. Introduction

Often invoked in intermediary, economic, and political discourse, the term populism tends to become an infallible label without ideological coverage. The obstacle faced by all those who have tried to define populism is its ambiguity. Margaret Canovan, in her work Populism already reported this diffusion, quoting that the spectrum of the diversity within liberalism or socialism is lower than the one within populism. The primary reason is that the use of the first two terms was determined to the greatest extent by adherents.[1]

Two are the sources of populism: Russian natives and American populists. Both currents marked the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Slavic, orthodox, nationalist intellectuals exalted tradition and fought the modernization and westernization of Russia. Being a synthesis between western socialism and the peasant civil society raised at the standard of political organization, nationalism even theorized the advantages of background economy. The American people, whose political expression was the People's Party, had a different social base. Independent agricultural producers are the core of the movement, and private property is for them the fundamental economic principle. The opponents are the big banks or rail trusts, which played an increasingly important role, to the detriment of small producers. Their political vision implies an increase in federal power in order to defend the interest of the "people." Unlike Russia, the impulse comes here from the people, not from the elite. The identity issue of populism comes from its problematic situation on the right / left axis. A mixture of revolutionary socialism and economic conservatism, it definitely goes out of the way.

Eugeniu Speranția's philosophical conception about law is organically integrated into his conception about the world and society as a whole. Spiritual life is presented into two aspects: one which is subjective or individual and the other one which is objective or social. The close interactions between them will result in their development, their continuous enrichment. Personality cannot form itself and progress, unless this can happen in a properly organized legal society; likewise, society will not be able to reach a high degree of organization, unless it's done by laborious and orderly work of the personalities inside her. There will be no justice, nor order of law in a society where individuals are lacking in logical consistency, but neither discipline nor individual consistency can be done in a society lacking in order and justice. In any case, the two aspects of spirituality are developing together.

2. The concept of the universal norm

In his conception of state and law, E. Speranția does not exclude the aprioristic transcendental factors related to the genesis and functions of the law. The law appears to us as a spiritual, synthetic product, which tends towards a maximum of harmony and consistency; in relation to this, philosophy of law has to be primarily interested in spiritual issues. Spirit creates certain universal and necessary imperatives, which are conditions of rationality.[2] Such a spiritual manifestation is normality - the constitutive dimension of the human being, which explains the natural need of people to obey norms. In all the actions that people do, they realize that there are certain directions to be followed and some limitations that must be respected.

"We know we can not afford anything and that no one has to be able to allow everything in the world, we always and everywhere find out that something must be or not to be. Everything that comes into the field of our attention is subject to evaluation, anything that is the object of consciousness is inevitable subject to appreciation, any fact or thing is a value or a non-value."[3] Therefore, an infallible norm appears to us as dominating our whole world, not as a natural law, but as imperative commander of things; this norm is the norm of universal normalization, it is the norm of norms - a fact that is categorically imperative and, from a logical point of view, all the imperatives emerge from it and are formally justified by it. The imperative character of universal normalization does not specify which are concrete rules that regulate people's actions, but, in any case, it contains the need for a rule to be respected in all circumstances. In a more concrete social plan, people's lives could be adjusted by moral principles, programs, ceremonies, labels, legal norms or technical standards and so on. But all these are alternatives of the general rule in order to implement justice by legislating the social life. Any attempt to limit the universality of any norm is a defeat of the fundamental exigency of the spirit.

Thanks to the imperative of universality, the Ego will conceive the alter as an exterior of its own; any person attributes to an alter the same goal position and the same requirement to obey a universal norm. These premises issue the following results: first of all, the exigency of equality of rights, secondly, the exigency of reciprocity and lastly, the exigency of compensation.

3. The need to legislate

Speranția did not limit himself to enunciating legal mandatory statements, instead he systematically portrayed the form they take in social life. There are two strong tendencies within it: the possession of material goods and the possession of spiritual goods. The first tendency amplifies people's selfishness, shakes and threatens social cohesion, while the latter tends to bring people closer to their hearts and intensifies their sociality. Tempering the contradictory effects of the two tendencies that threaten the cohesion of social life lies in the spiritual power of the human community, which will intervene in regulating the possession tendency of material goods through certain rules. Social life can not dispense with norms, otherwise it would become precarious. Consequently, law is a necessity, it is a rational and intentional creation, similar in terms of technical constructions. But the nature of law can only be understood by taking into account the nature of the spirit, which is always absolute and universal. Our spirit is the source of the initial and an a priori imperative of law, from which the justice will be applied in the social order. Justice, in a social sense, is a perfectly consistent social order with normative principles admitted by our spirit. Compliance with a generally admitted rule, either by the theoretical deduction of other particular norms, or by translating it into an action, constitutes justice. A sentence is fair when it complies with a rule of law. A rule of law is equitable when it is in accordance with a more general one or with a principle which is known and admitted in advance, whereas inconsistency occurs as injustice.

Applied to concrete social relations, the imperatives of justice, along with justice as a perennial value, acquire relativity. Justice is relative because it can not be the same everywhere as long as ideologies and traditions change in place and time. The positive law is an ensemble of elements that change their character and circumstances while passing through history. Moreover, in varied historical times, ideologies and traditions could give to the aprioristic norms some interpretations, acceptations or circumstances that have distorted and denigrated their own meaning, so that the legal positive order ended in being damaged by serious injustices. However, Speranția believed that "there are some universal and eternal foundations of justice and those are the aprioristic normative beliefs grown in the general structure human minds. Compliance with them constitutes absolute and universal social justice"[4]. Such aprioristic rules that derive from the very structure of our mind are, for example, the principle of alterity, the observance of the commitments, the logical imperative of consistency with ourselves, the Christian principle that demands to love your neighbor as yourself or the imperative respect for the human person, the human person being regarded as the supreme value and as the arbitrator of its own values.

Law, as a set of norms governing human actions and interpersonal relationships has, among its essential qualities, the one of favoring sociality and always having in its structure a conformity or logical consistency with certain pre-established principles. The legal rules are varied by the degree of generality, by degree of compulsion; some seem to have axiomatic validity, others seem to be arbitrary related; some are more effective than others; after another criterion - that of their importance for social cohesion and the protection of people, some are crucial, vital. On the latter, E. Speranția called them cardinal rules. However, there are rules that are intended to ensure or to facilitate the application of cardinal norms, called adventive norms. The institution intended to ensure the application of all these types of cardinal legal norms is the State. The need for normalization and the justice of the collectivities can be met by express legislation. The willful creation of the rules of law and the positive legal order implies state goals (plans) and means (procedures, agents, support points, etc.). The actions of purposeful regulation are regulated by valuation values, according to which there have to be established priority programs. The supreme value to which the legislative action is directed is the social peace. Redefining and re-establishing legal values in a new hierarchy by the legislator is very rare in history: such events meet with the revolutions when a new ideology becomes dominated by people's consciousness. According to the principles of the new ideology, there will undergo profound restructuring within the law, new interpretations of the traditional legal norms, some habits, practices will be discussed, it can even get to absurdly altering aprioristic rules.

4. Populism-the opponent of the rule of law?

Legislative actions start from a condition of disaffection of the governors towards the existing society and law, accompanied by a negative assessment, according to which they will elaborate a plan, a possibility of superior justice. In this sense, E. Speranția pointed out that "the legislative activity, being an activity directed to the social order, implies discontent regarding the present given situation and it pursuits a new social order of superior value. It is understood that the way of appreciation, the scale of values of the legislator and its possibilities to conceive the change, the means of service and the degree of success are very variable and depend on a large number of factors: the legislator's own mental faculties, the mentality, conceptions, beliefs, habits and criteria of appreciation of the respective social group, all of these constituting also the circumstances that the legislator will take into account, as well as the material on which the legislator is supposed to act upon, but it also constitutes a decisive factor which, by determining the conscious life of the legislator, determines its mode of action."[5]

Laws, once issued, must be justified and accepted. The more a law will be accepted, the more it will be respected. If legal imperatives are unconditionally accepted due to rational character and they must not be proclaimed by the legislator, then the rules of the law must be convincing, accepted and justified. The most spread concepts of justification of the validity of the law in history, were the religious one and the democratic one.

The religious justification of the authority of law considers that laws are, in one way or another, from God. The stronger the religious belief of citizens will be, the more secure will be their obedience to laws, which are considered to be revealed by the divine will. Speranția had noticed that although religious acceptance seems to be outdated for his time, no other justification could give the positive law created by various legislators a more solid basis than compliance to the multitudes of persuasion. On the other hand, democratic acceptance has a rational logical foundation of the thinking that had as protagonists Marsilio of Padova, the Illuminati, in the forehead with J. J Rousseau, A. de Tocqueville, etc. This could be summarized as it follows: "if the law is the product of the will of all people, if the law decides what they all want, it follows that the law that forces and governs the individual is nothing but the expression of his own will, that no one is more free than the one who obeys the law, for only so he works according to his will. The one who breaks the law contradicts itself (.....) the law, made by all people, wants the good of all and there can be no better lawmaking according to the common good than the one emanating from the general will."[6]

But Speranția considered this doctrine of the legitimacy of the legal norms as having a lower intake to the masses, being dependent on the level of intellectual culture and education of citizens. Plurality identification with mediocrity or chaos is translated into elitism that rejects any attempt or any hope to take into account what people say. If the democratic justification of the law would be complemented by religious interpretation, then the degree of acceptance and compliance of citizens to legal norms would be greater. On the same note, Speranția brought substantial criticism of the justifying currents of the law of his time: the acceptance of national or social mysticism, the acceptance of the mysticism of the state (fascist, Stalinist, etc.), the social antagonisms theory, hedonistic acceptance, utilitarian acceptance, implicitly promoted by legal positivism.

Who decides in one case or another, if there should be taken into consideration the voice of the people or combat him in the name of the public interest? No one knows. In other words, the possible errors and the realized ones of the vox populi, do not permit a reflection upon the limits of the democracy, instead they permit an instrumentalization that allow the leaders of the state to give to the people what they demand or, on the contrary, give them what brings them to silence. In the latter case, when the popular voice finds a way to express itself, the leaders do not have words to describe anger. Contempt of classes is so odious in itself, just as contempt of race. In Europe, the first one is a national sport, meanwhile the second one is a crime. Is talking too easily of “people”, as if it is a delimited and determined entity, as if we could introduce it in an entirety. When we talk about people referring to populism, we talk about a part of the average of people, difficult to quantify and preliminary define. How could populism become such a disputed opponent during the glory of the triumphant democracy?

Law, as one of the social aspects of life, analogically evolves as any vital process. Law, as a spiritual fact, evolves through the gradual assertion of human spirituality. The historical development of the law and the genesis of the new laws simultaneously constitute an individual product, as well as a collective one, as human consciousness in general. The origin of the law can not stand in only one will or in "collective consciousness" - it can not be an exclusively natural product which appears only from "the national soul", placing itself above the individual will. Any legal norm, any legal institution keeps a trail of the mind that created it from the beginning. That's why in every law the intentionality and rationality of her author persists as a fundamental and original element. A legal norm, enrolled in the popular use, forming part of the customs of the community, however, anonymously showing up at some point, must have sprung up from a mind of a man who wanted it, thought and formulated to propagate it in the minds and hearts of others.

The state, as an institution overlapped with the institutions of a collectivity and as the coordinated ensemble of the three powers (legislative, executive and judicial) is subordinated to the rule of law: the state operates in the service of the Law. But neither the law is an end in itself: it exists to secure justice and, through it, social cohabitation, which is a requirement of human spirituality. The latter is the supreme value that condenses all conscious goals and actions.

People's life in the community requires organization; organization requires legal normalization; the beginnings of the political organization of human collectives were marked by the tendencies to normalize the functions of creation and to defend the rules. That's why organizing politics is synonymous with the basic organization of the State. As an institution, the state assumes: a) a systematic ensemble of social actions; b) its actions converge for a determined purpose; c) the actions of the state are carried out according to pre-established rules. Being an institution, the state is not a sum of individuals, nor social group, nor can it be identical to the nation, as "organized nation". The fundamental purpose of the State is to ensure a maximum of justice for a maximum of sociality. In this sense, the State creates and defends the rules that constitute the order of law and for this mission he has to follow certain norms of creation and defense of norms.

The State, as an institution intended to organize the legal norm, is self-regulatory by applying the rules designed to ensure or to apply other norms. Through everything that state does, it will subordinate itself to the a priori and cardinal imperative of the need for justice. That is why all the state bodies and institutions have a concentric configuration, the pivot of which is the need for justice. In the service of this need, the state creates and dispenses by public force - the guarantee of stability, of the achievement of the spiritual goals. State always defends an order of law and a certain spirituality. Law, as a deductive system of social norms, provides that maximum of sociality in a community. That's why, as long as the State goes in a collectivity, so will the power of his laws and vice versa. Therefore, nothing is more likely to jeopardize the unity of a state than the lack of unity of its legislation.

Conclusions

The populist assault on the institutions generates political instability and confusion, apparent cohesion beyond classes and private interests, meaning the fragility of social tissue. The reverse of the medal is the demagogic use of the term "populist" to condemn positions that are not in line with right or left political orthodoxy. In itself, the populist aspiration towards advanced democracy is a progressive one, but it systematically fails in authoritarianism. If we schematize populism in some of the enduring features, it would be: the transideological character, the revolt of the ordinary man against the elite, the distrust in intellectuals and politicians, as a model for the future and the denial of progress, the small private property as the basis of economic dynamism and equity, the inclination towards direct democracy or a strong leader as a form of government. Beyond nationalism, socialism, communism or fascism, or messages of this type. To deny them the right to self-existence by virtue of an analytical sufficiency is an error.

However, the various issues raised by the philosophy of law do not have definitive solutions. The theoretical constructions of the law philosophy are designed to accommodate the endless conflicts of our spirit with itself, the contradictions between the terms, concepts and beliefs that has developed. Avoiding internal contradictions is for the mind what avoidance of pain is for the body. Our philosophical exploration will then continue to look for whether the life of the law, taken in its universality, contains principles around which the whole law is structured and evolves; what is the normality in general and the derivation of the legal; what is the essence of the relationship between logic and right, between legal, social and spiritual, between law, state and nation.

ANALYSIS OF ART. 396 PAR. (2) CIVIL PROCEDURE CODE, IN THE LIGHT OF THE ROMANIAN CONSTITUTIONAL COURT'S DECISION NO. 454/2018

Beatrice NICULAE[*]

Abstract

The present article proposes a brief analysis of the provisions of art. 396 par. (2) of the Civil procedure code, more precisely to conclude whether or not in the future it could be necessary to change the way the courts communicate certain documents of interest to the parties of the trial, thus eradicating the phrase 'through the court's record office'. This provision is analyzed in the light of the Romanian Constitutional Court's Decision no. 454/2018, with a view on the reasonable exercise of possible remedies.

1. Introduction

Considering that, recently, the Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 454/2018 was published, we consider that a closer look is requested regarding the subject of the complaint, the motivations that have been considered and especially the solution reached by the Constitutional Court.

Consequently, this article proposes not only a critical analysis of the way in which the text of art. 396 par. (2) Civil Procedure Code was considered to have been constitutional, but rather we would like to draw attention to the fact that, in certain situations, this particular approach has the real potential to lead to the violation of the fundamental rights of the parties to a dispute. We are particularly concerned with the right to a fair trial, the right to defense, and the principle of publicity of court hearings.

Therefore, in the present article we will continue to discuss the reasoning why, in the future, it might be beneficial to consider modifying art. 396 par. (2) Civil Procedure Code.

2. Summary of Decision no. 454/2018, regarding the constitutionality of art. 396 par. (2) Civil Procedure Code.

By Decision no. 454/2018[1], pronounced by the Constitutional Court of Romania, there have been analyzed complaints regarding several legal provisions, both from the Civil Procedure Code and from other normative acts. In this article, we are expressly interested in the motivations regarding the way art. 396 par. (2) Civil Procedure Code has been interpreted.

The holder of the objection of unconstitutionality is the High Court of Cassation and Justice, through the United Sections, as it is an adopted and unissued law[2].

The reasoning for the objection of unconstitutionality is that "by establishing that the ruling is made available to the parties through the court's record office, it does not allow the precise determination of the moment when the ruling has been given, creating uncertainties regarding this particular moment, considering that the law attributes to this moment of the ruling, in some cases, the function of the initial moment of beginning the timeframe limits for certain remedies. The legislator's option of introducing an alternative way of a ruling made available for the parties implies the adoption of a rule that has the capacity to determine precisely the moment when the ruling has been given and to offer the level of precision ensured by the delivery of the ruling in a public hearing. However, the reference to making the solution available to the parties through the court's record office is insufficient to allow accurate determination of the moment when the ruling has been given, with negative effects on the rights which can be exercised in relation to that precise moment, according to the law".

The Constitutional Court motivated its rejection of the objection of unconstitutionality by means of some main arguments, which bring to light the vision that the Court had in view in this particular situation, namely:

In paragraph 27 of Decision no. 454/2018, the Court argues that "making the solution available to the parties through the court's record office as a means of

I point 37 (referring to art. 402 of the Civil Procedure Code] and point 58 (with reference to art. 497 of the Civil Procedure Code], as well as Art. III point 3 [referring to art. XVIII par. (2) of Law no. 2/2013] and point 4 (with reference to art. XVIII1 of Law no. 2/2013] of the Law for amending and completing the Law no. 134/2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, as well as for amending and supplementing other normative acts, published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 836 of November 1st, 2018, as further amended and supplemented. The Decision is available on the website https://ccr.ro/, accessed on March 18th, 2019.

[2] At the time when the Court was notified, it was about a legislative proposal, which was initiated by 182 deputies and senators, registered at the Senate on April 18th, 2018. Subsequently, as the Court itself states, the certified form of the law was filed, which did not differ in any way from the original proposal As such, the Court considered that it has been legally notified.

achieving the alternative publicity of the ruling, as opposed to a public hearing was a major novelty, imposed for unquestionable practical reasons. By normalizing this particular possibility of pronouncing the ruling, it has been ensured that the solution was effectively acknowledged. However, the very doctrine of civil procedural law has been surprised by the limitation of the hypotheses in which this means of achieving the publicity of the judgment was exceptionally regulated only in the case of postponement of the pronouncement regulated by art. 396 par. (2) of the Code of Civil Procedure".

In paragraph 28 of the Decision no. 454/2018, the Court considers that, in fact, this innovation is an effective way to respect the principle of publicity, in line with the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights.

Next, at paragraph 29, it is expressly stated that it is not possible to reach the conclusion of the breach of the public character of the ruling pronouncement, since any interested person has the possibility to obtain a copy of the solution.

Also, at paragraph 34, the Court stated that the justice system should be properly administered in a democratic society, making reference again to the human rights provided for in the ECHR.

In paragraph 40 we find another argument in support of the constitutionality of this way of communication with the parties to a litigation, namely that, in the Court's opinion, in the last 5 years since the entry into force of the Civil Procedure Code, it has been already applied by the courts.

Finally, it is concluded at paragraph 41 that "in the event that the court postpone the ruling, the date of the ruling is the day for which the postponement was settled. At this date a record is made, which is made available to the parties through the court's record office".

Therefore, the Constitutional Court considers that this way of "communication" is entirely constitutional and therefore does not violate the procedural rights of the parties, namely the principle of publicity of court hearings.

3. The necessary conditions for art. 396 par. (2) Civil Procedure Code to be applied accordingly.

The doctrine has already stated the view that the postponement of the ruling pronouncement established by art. 396 par. (2) Civil Procedure Code should not be made anyhow, a matter of which even the provisions of the new Civil Procedure Code are drawing the attention to.

Thus, the conditions that should be fulfilled at the moment when the postponement of the pronouncement is decided are: "(i) 1 premise condition: the ruling of the decision to be postponed (therefore the solution provided by article 396 paragraph (2) can not be put into practice when the pronouncement of the luring was not postponed); and (ii) two sub-conditions, namely: (a) there was a justified case for postponing the ruling; and (b) the presiding judge has expressly indicated in the content of the ruling that the postponed hearing will be made available to the parties the court's record office[3]".

We appreciate, however, that this mechanism of postponement of the ruling should not be embraced and used by the courts every single time. The reason is to avoid making rulings that are no longer in line with the complete information in the files, precisely because, as it is well known, the burden of files for each judge is higher than average.

Consequently, the freshest information on the files a judge has to rule can be found at the moment when the debates were closed. By postponing the ruling pronouncement, it is possible that errors appear that may prejudice the parties to the dispute. Obviously, in truly delicate and complex situations, it is desirable for the judge to carefully measure the solution he has to pronounce. Nevertheless, it has been noticed an unjustified increase in ruling postponements, although the legal situations in question did not present a particular difficulty.

4. The effects of art. 396 par. (2) Civil Procedure Code regarding voluntary intervention, before and after the amendments brought by Law no. 310/2018.

Considering the brief aspects previously outlined, which summarise the main arguments of the Romanian Constitutional Court, corroboration with a recent regulation, namely Law no. 310/2018[4], is required.

This normative act brings a variety of changes in the civil procedural matter, but for the present article, it would be beneficial to address the changes mentioned in Art. I point 3.

Consequently, we note that, unlike the previous regulation, art. 64 Civil Procedure Code was adapted to the stringent needs of society in terms of remedies against the rejection / admission of a court resolution.

Thus, please note that there is no longer a distinction between resolutions that can be attacked with the ruling itself. Previously, the law stated that the admission of a resolution could be remedied only with the ruling. The court's resolution of rejecting the intervention as inadmissible was granted a different regime of remedy, meaning that it could be challenged only with appeal / second appeal[5] within 5 days. Here it becomes interesting because the previously regulated 5 days term was flowing differently depending on the presence or absence of the parties, as follows: 5 days from the ruling pronouncement for the present parties, respectively from the communication of the ruling for the missing parties.

The question is what would happen in the following situation: on the day of the trial, with all the parties present, the court closes the debates and is about to rule regarding the admissibility of a voluntary intervention. Since more time to deliberate on the ruling is required, the court decides to postpone the pronouncement. However, the judge decides that in this particular case, the solution should be made available to the parties through the court's record office. At the time of the postponement, none of the parties decides to appear, and the judge rules to reject the voluntary intervention as inadmissible.

Consequently, in this particular situation there are two contradictory regulations, both of them having the same legal power. Thus, in the interpretation of art. 396 par. (2) Civil Procedure Code, the Constitutional Court considered that "the date of the ruling is the day for which the solution was postponed", so we would be tempted to consider that the appeal in the above-mentioned situation should be filed within 5 days starting from the date on which the court postponed the pronouncement.

On the other hand, taking into account the provisions from art. 64 Civil Procedure Code, in the initial version, it is clearly specified that the parties, if they wish to appeal the conclusion of the resolution that rejected the intervention as inadmissible, have at their disposal the entire term of 5 days, but specifying two alternatives: from the pronouncement of the ruling for the present parties, respectively from the communication of the ruling for the missing parties.

Considering that none of the parties was present in this particular case, we appreciate, however, that a remedy brought within 5 days of the communication of the resolution should not be considered late. Nevertheless, the act of justice has rarely been applied in a unitary manner, which is why it was necessary to have specially created panels at the level of the High Court of Cassation and Justice to decide, for instance, preliminary rulings for the solving of law matters[6].

Considering that the Romanian society is part of the Roman-Germanic civilization, so not founded on the precedent judicial system, we can only appreciate the new modification of art. 64 Civil procedure code as being beneficial in the particular situation described above. This is because the previous regulation would have breached, in our opinion, the right to a fair trial, the right to defense, and it would have violated the principle of court hearings' publicity.

Thus, there were two regulations, both of which had the same legal force in the event they were simultaneously applied, meaning that they should have been somehow separated. It would have been possible to prioritize the initial regulation on the request for intervention and to consider that, being absent at the time of the pronouncement, the parties were granted a 5-day time limit from the communication of the ruling, in order to be able to challenge the resolution. However, it would have been possible, on the other hand, that the regulation of art. 396 par. (2) The Civil Procedure Code could have been applied first, since the parties were present at the time of the debates and the cpurt decided to postpone the pronouncement, and all the parties were thus informed.

Unfortunately, the situation described above is far from being unique. Thus, in all the cases where there is a certain legal remedy possible either from the ruling pronouncement or from the ruling communication, as the case may be, there is a real possibility that the parties may be prejudiced, despite the fact that the Constitutional Court specified "the date of the pronouncement is the day for which the pronouncement was postponed".

For instance, certains situations may be considered, without limiting the analysis to them, as follows:

1. Regarding the regime of straightening, clarifying and completing the court's decision, art. 444 par. (1) provides that "completing the decision [...] may be requested in the case of decisions given in extraordinary appeals [...] within 15 days of pronouncement. In the case of final decisions given on appeal or second appeal, their completion may be requested within 15 days starting from de decision's comunication[7]";
2. With regard to the appeal, art. 468 par. (4) states that "for a prosecutor, the time limit for appeal shall start from the date on which the decision was pronounced, unless the prosecutor participated in the hearing of the case, in this case the time-limit starting from the communication of the decision[8]". Thus, it can also be imagined a situation where law professionals could introduce a late appeal;
3. Also, the litigation regarding the delaying the dispute can not be overlooked. Thus, art. 524 par.

[5] In accordance with art. 64 par. (4) of the already old regulation of the Civil Procedure Code, the remedy that should have been followed by the party unhappy with the court's resolution regarding the rejection as inadmissible of the intervention was either the appeal or the second appeal, depending on the moment in front of which the enforced resolution was pronounced. Thus, if we speak of the first instance, the remedy was the appeal, and if we consider a superior hierarchical court, the party had to file a second appeal.

[6] Art. 519 – 521 Civil procedure code.

[7] Art. 444 par. (1) Civil procedure code.

[8] Art. 468 par. (4) Civil procedure code.

(6) point 1 states that this litigation can be made "when the law sets a deadline for the completion of a procedure, either by pronouncement or by motivating a decision, but this term has been fulfilled without result[9]";

4. The non-contentious judicial procedure is also affected, which is why we are drawing the attention to the content of art. 534 par. (3): "The term of appeal shall run from the pronouncement, for those present at the last hearing, and from the communication, for those who have been absent[10]";
5. Concerning the precautionary and provisional measures, especially the distraint upon property and the court receivership, art. 957 par. (1) and art. 975 par. (4), in conjunction with the postponement of the pronouncement, may create difficulties as well.
6. Regarding the property sale in the proceedings of the judicial division, we must also draw the attention to the provisions of art. 991 par. (4): "The Regulations provided for in this article may be challenged separately only with appeal, within 15 days starting from the pronouncement[11]".

As one can easily notice, these articles are just a few examples of legal provisions that have the potential to generate frustration and even create discriminatory situations when they will be applied in corroboration with the postponement of pronouncement.

Consequently, it is absolutely necessary to note that the major issue is the formula "by making the solution available at the disposal of the parties through the court's record office". Thus, we consider that it would be beneficial that the the Romanian legislator analize the situation, in order to determine whether this formula actually meets the needs of the society in the field of justice or creates useless difficulties when applied, that could be easily avoided.

5. Conclusions

The normative acts, therefore the legislation as a whole, must be predictable and be drafted in such a way that they can be considered clear. However, we consider that these two requirements are not fully or even partially achieved in terms of art. 396 par. (2) Civil Procedure Code. The article is not clear even for law professionals, not to mention for the parties of a litigation that don't have an attorney, since a decision by the Constitutional Court of Romania was needed to set and try to clarify a specific term.

However, the present article does not question in any way the applicability of the Romanian Constitutional Court' Decision no. 454/2018, since we are not able to begin such an approach. It is believed, nonetheless, that in the future, it can not be ruled out the idea of completing the article in question even with what the Constitutional Court explicitly mentioned in the decision. Thus, we appreciate that it would be welcome to fill in the clarification that the terms that flow from the pronouncement will be considered from the date when the dispute is postponed and the court actually pronounces the solution. In this way, there would be no confusion, as the article would be much clearer than in its present form.

S-ar putea sa se considere pe viitor ca nu este necesara o asemenea adaugire, motiv pentru care articolul ar urma sa fie scurtat in mod corespunzator.

Thn again, a modification of the article should not be totally excluded from the future analysis, in the sense of excluding the phrase referring to making the solution available to the parties through the court`s record office. In fact, this is the concept that has generated the most concerns and even an objection of unconstitutionality, which is why the regulation may need to be further analyzed by the Romanian legislator. Therefore, the legislatior may reach to the conclusion that such an addition is not necessary, which is why it is perfectly possible that the article be shortened accordingly.

THE LIMITS OF RECOURSE TO FORCE IN THE CONTEXT OF CONTEMPORARY GEOPOLITICS

Sandra Sophie-Elise OLĂNESCU[*]

Abstract

Recourse to force represents a highly controversial subject matter, given its political sensitivity, as well as the legal framework that authorizes it.

At the present time, it has commonly been assumed that recourse to force is highly forbidden in International Law. However, modern history has shown that this rule is strictly a desiderate that may be unobserved in certain circumstances by states, with the tacit consent that the International Society has expressed through its inactiveness.

Thus, are military interventions of foreign states within the territory of other states legitimate? If so, how can reasonable motives be regulated to legitimate such actions under International Law?

In this context, is recourse to force infringing the notion of external sovereignty, that serves both at protecting the states' identity and personality, as well as at preserving individuals from armed conflicts?

The purpose of this paper is to find possible answers to these questions, considering the trends in contemporary geopolitics.

Keywords: recourse to force, state, military intervention, sovereignty, infringement

1. Introduction

1.1. Recourse to force – from rule of war to regulated exception in contemporary society

From a historical standpoint, it is widely acknowledged that recourse to force was the main tool for waging wars, "as a legitimate means of policy, its foremost aim changing territorial boundaries"[1].

Moreover, while waiting for the founding of The League of Nations, the right to war (jus ad bellum) was regarded as a normal manifestation of state sovereignty and as a means of resolving disputes between States[2].

In other words, recourse to force was regarded, up until the beginning of the 20th century, on the one hand, as an instrument in the use of military force in international relations between States, in particular for the conquest of territories and State expansion, and, on the other hand, as a legitimate expression of state sovereignty, which could not be bordered by willpowers expressed externally.

As a result, most international treaties concluded between States were more likely regulating the rules of war, rather than stating the rules of peaceful settlement of disputes between States, in order to avoid recourse to force in such cases.

Thus, at the end of the 19th century, the most striking concern at international level was the aim to find optimal solutions which would be in agreement with State sovereignty for the exclusion of war as a means of resolving conflicts between States.

The first attempts to seclude war as a means of regulation of disputes between States and imposing peaceful means therewith took place towards the end of the 19th century.

However, long before this period, there has been another noticeable effort, in the form of the Westphalian Peace Treaty of 1648. According to this agreement, European states arranged to end a distressing long war waged on religious and territorial limitations. The importance of this treaty, as concerns the exclusion of war in international affairs, resides in „the separation of domestic, especially religious, and international affairs, that has strongly influenced both the drafting and interpretation of the prohibition of the use of force". Nevertheless, it should be underlined that in accordance with traditional understanding, „domestic affairs cannot serve as an exception from the prohibition of the use of force in international relations"[3].

Going back to international regulations with an impact on the elimination of war as a legitimate means of resolving international disputes, it shall be emphasized that the Hague Peace Conferences of 1899 and 1907, that were gathered under the auspices of peace, disarmament and arbitrage, tried to solve the problem of disarmament, unsuccessfully. Nonetheless, an important victory of the two conferences resides in the systematization and perfection of the diplomatic procedures for regulating disputes, the consecration of Arbitration under peaceful means, as well as the institutionalization of International Jurisdiction. As an example, regarding the recovery of contractual debts, the Hague Convention II (Drago Porter Convention) imposed a type of prohibition on recourse to armed force provided that the debtor State shall accept and submit to an arbitrational settlement[4]. However, as concerns the settlement of conflicts between states, these two major events could not ascertain a solution to exclude war. Thus, States could continue to determine by their own free will the means of settling international disputes, whether these means were peaceful or involved the recourse to force.

Afterwards, the League of Nations Covenant was primarily aimed at drawing up principles and rules, as well as establishing an institutionalized framework for peacekeeping and organizing nations to prevent and avoid wars. Thus, for the first time in contemporary history, establishing international limitations on the right of States to resort to war was successfully achieved. Despite this notable accomplishment, the Covenant did not prohibit per se the use of war, thus recourse to force in international relations was still permitted.

Following the League of Nations Covenant, a series of treaties and agreements were concluded between States regarding the limitation of recourse to force in International Society. The relevant period during which these treaties have been concluded extends from 1925 to 1935, all of which are aimed at establishing rules of International Law in relation to non-recourse to war and the use of peaceful means of dispute resolution between States. One of the most important treaties is the General Treaty for Renunciation of War as an Instrument of National Policy, known as the Briand-Kellogg Treaty, signed in Paris on 26 August 1928 and entered into force on 24 July 1929.

According to Article 2 of the Briand-Kellogg Pact, "The High Contracting Parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means"[5]. Parties failing to abide by this commitment "should be denied of the benefits furnished by [the] treaty". Nevertheless, the Pact does not provide any sanctions or collective compulsion measures in respect of possible violations of the prohibition on recourse to war. Moreover, this treaty does not even refer to banning of other means of armed force use except for war, which is expressly prohibited by its provisions.

As such, it is once again proved that the International Society was not prepared at that moment for the exclusion of recourse to force in international relations between States.

Finally, with the United Nations Charter (the U.N. Charter), the overall prohibition of recourse to force has become not only an international obligation of Member States, but even a fundamental principle of International Law, governed by o peremptory norms of general International Law. Thus, Article 2 paragraph 4 of the U.N. Charter sets forth a ban on "the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the U.N.". In other words, for the first time in modern history, a general rule of "peaceful means of dispute resolution" (Article 33 of the U.N. Charter) and "general prohibition of recourse to force" was adopted by the International Society. In addition, the U.N. Charter not only excluder war as a means of international relation between Member States but also prohibits measures short of war. The Charter comprises also one exception that permits States to recourse to force as an expression of the right of self-defense.

Probably the most important progress made at international level is that the U.N. Charter provides for express coercive measures that can possibly be taken by the U.N. in case of violation of the general principle of non-recourse to force, as established by Article 39.

1.2. The principle of non-recourse to force or force threat in international relations

As concerns the concept of "recourse to force" it has been linked, in international affairs, to relationship between States. Thus, given that recourse to force has been generally seen as a means of dispute resolution that may occur between States, at a certain time, as well as the consequences following such a conduct (especially World War II), the International Society had to come with better solutions that did not imply the use of military forces. In other words, the 20th century was marked by a quest for States to find an optimal manner to solve international disputes without the high price that humanity had to pay at its beginning.

According to Article 2 paragraph 4 of the U.N. Charter "all Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations".

Hence, the U.N. Charter expressly states that the territory of a State cannot be subject to occupation by use of armed force, nor to territorial expansion by States through use force or force threat exercised against other States. Moreover, it is strictly forbidden to make use of force or of force threats against the political independence of other States[6].

However, the U.N. Charter legitimates recourse to force in merely two exceptional situations: as exercise of the right to self-defense and for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

As concerns the right to self-defense, Article 51 of the U.N. Charter states that nothing "shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defense shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security.".

By interpreting the above quoted text, it follows that recourse to force, even in the case of self-defense, is strictly limited to the period prior to that the Security Council manages to take the necessary measures to maintain international peace and security. Additionally, it shall be noted that the right to self-defense regards not only the State against which is triggered by the armed attack, but also other Member States that are authorized to intervene in order to counteract the armed assault against the targeted Member State.

Consequently, recourse to force under Article 51 of the U.N. Charter shall be legitimate provided that the following requirements are met:

a) recourse to force is necessary to protect the security of the Member State targeted by an armed attack;
b) recourse to force is proportionate to the intensity of the armed attack;
c) measures taken by exercise of the right to self-defense are immediately reported to the Security Council.

The second situation that authorizes recourse to force under the provisions of the U.N. Charter is expressly stated by Article 39. According to this text, "the Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41[7] and 42[8], to maintain or restore international peace and security.". In other words, Member States are approved to use force in order to preserve international peace and security, under the collective security system constituted by the U.N. Charter.

With that being said, there is a legitimate question arising from the system implemented by the U.N. Charter that authorizes recourse to (armed) force: how can abuse of recourse to force be identified and stopped, if it is at the shelter of the mask of an intervention aimed at maintaining international peace and security?

This paper aims to find the answer to this question, as well as to many others, by reporting on a practical case that has put a striking footprint on contemporary International Law: Kosovo.

2. The Kosovo Case Study

2.1. Historical overview

Even before the end of the hostilities in 1945, the United Nations have expressed the natural wish of its Members to ensure peace and prosperity. At least these where the declared objectives.

Despite the development of nuclear weapons and intercontinental missiles, the world did not go through a new global conflict since the end of World War II, although at least two times – during the Korean war of 1951 as well as during the Cuban crisis in 1962 – the risk escalated in that direction.

The United Nations did not always interfere to stop conflicts, many of them leading to heavy fighting, but when they did, the results were not conclusive in all cases, as the Middle East conflict proves it.

The preamble of the U.N. Charter states the wish of the representatives of the nations to "save future generations from the scourge of war which two times during a human life has brought so much suffering to human kind".

The first failure of the U.N. was the actual impossibility to maintain international peace and security and, consequently, the incapacity to adopt efficient collective measures to prevent and remove the threats against peace, suppress acts of aggression and solve through peaceful means the litigations and situations which could endanger peace.

So, the members of the United Nations committed, among others, to solve international disputes with peaceful methods and abstain from using force or threats with the use of force, except for self-defence or maintaining peace and international security cases.

According to the terms of the Charter, the General Assembly and the Security Council could interfere in any litigation whose extension could threaten the international peace and security but limited only to recommendations which were not legally binding.

Only the Security Council has the power to decide, according to Chapter VII, when to actually act in case of a peace threat, of the infringement of the peace or an act of aggression.

So, the Security Council could not only decide on the mandatory preventive coercive measures, but also on the repressive measures involving, if necessary, the use of armed forces.

[7] The U.N. Charter, Article 41: "The Security Council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions, and it may call upon the Members of the United Nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations";

[8] The U.N. Charter, Article 42: "Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of Members of the United Nations.";

For this, it was provided that the armed forces will be made available to the Council by the member states, according to the agreements concluded with it.

With all the "efforts" of Member States permanently in the Security Council to use their veto right in blocking the intervention in certain conflict areas, the U.N. efforts to re-establish peace did not fail. If we stick only with disputes which lead to the appearance of the hostilities, we can consider that since 1945 thirty focal points started in the world.

These conflicts can be grouped in four categories: the "classic", border disputes, especially in Latin America, but also in Africa and the Far East, civil wars, which turned into international conflicts because of the interference of external powers, to which colonization wars and armed conflicts related to the ideological opposition of both East and West blocks were added.

The U.N. did not interfere in at least a third of these conflicts. Three reasons which explain this passivity can be identified, even if they don't justify it:

First of all, various conflicts where examined in a regional framework or at least in that of the Organization of the American States (OSA) (for example, the conflict between El Salvador and Honduras in 1969) or in that of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) (for example: the border conflict between Ethiopia and Somalia in 1964).

Actually, the U.N. Charter encourages the resolution of international disputes in a regional framework, but the ambiguous phrasing of the Charter in chapter VIII questions the priority of notification of the regional organizations.

But the war returned strongly in the centre of the debates related to international law. And it did not return as a final ban practice, but as an aggressive and violent manner used by States to establish their own interests, and not as a scourge which can be avoided and repressed[9]. On the contrary, the war appears as a method to check, in certain contexts, the legitimacy, legal admissibility or even its use as method to apply the law, guaranteeing the compliance with "international legitimacy", "war against terrorism", "preventive war", "war against rogue states".

So, in the current context, we no longer refer to "the war against poverty" or the "war against illiteracy and ignorance", but we face a current reality in which the international community is called to express itself in relation to the threats related to the abusive use of force, according to the various partisan interests.

Each of the "new wars" in the past decade - from the first Gulf war to the Kosovo war, the Iraq war - clearly represent a challenge for the law, in general, and for the international law especially.

From all these wars, we think that Kosovo (March - June 1999) raises the most delicate doubts and problems from this perspective. In fact, this is the most "moral" of all these modern wars, the "fairest": a humanitarian intervention, implemented by the NATO Member States to avoid sacrificing the innocents, to stop the genocide committed by an oppressive regime and a bloody tyrant[10].

No matter if this is accurate, in the case of Kosovo there is a dilemma when there seems to be no other way to save an entire population but by force, through serious infringements of the fundamental rights, the only possibility found being to use the armed force against the government which declares to be a defender and protector of these rights.

In order to express opinions about such cases, the seriousness of the background problem cannot be omitted: if actually an assessment, no matter what this is, which confirms the possibility of an armed intervention, "humanitarian" can mean supplying an easy justification for hegemonic and aggressive policies, to unjustified and violent intrusion acts from one or more states into the affairs of other states and peoples, lethal attacks and military invasions.

On the other hand, such an "assessment" which stigmatizes the other party without any right of appeal, without the right to appeal against the right/ lawfulness of an intervention in force, can offer a convenient alibi, no matter the opinion of the international community in front of a real danger of humanitarian tragedies, contributing in this manner to abandoning the tragedy of a whole population subject to racist and dictatorial regimes.

2.2. The use of armed forces for the protection of human rights in the recent international practice

In order to attempt an assessment of the Kosovo war in general and of the humanitarian military intervention, in light of the current international legislation, it is essential to restore the wider image of the various hypothesis in which, in the past year, the armed force was used to protect human rights at international level.

A first group of cases is related to the system of the United Nations and, especially, to the operations to maintain (or restore) the peace implemented or authorized by the Security Council.

A use – no matter how limited – of armed forces for humanitarian purposes can be provided and took place sometimes in the context of peace maintenance operations in the strict meaning (sending the "blue helmets" in a state or in the border areas), as forces which target separating the forces in conflict or guaranteeing security and public order in serious

[9] In 1945, the founding states of the United Nations have solemnly declared that the Charter they would sign was based on the common interest to "save future generations from the scourge of war, which two times during this generation lead to countless sufferings of humanity".

[10] Regarding the terms "fair" or "moral" in relation to Kosovo, it is worth mentioning the article of President Clinton in The New York Times on May 24, 1999 ("My Just War"), the speech of first Minister Blair at the Economy Club of Chicago of April 22, 1999, Cassese "Le cinque regole per una guerra giusta", in AA. VV., "L'ultima crociata", Roma, 1999, 74 ss., the observations of Brutti, in "Guerra giusta o guerra utile? Le norme, l'esperienza, gli interessi", in Italiani europei, 2002, n. 3, 165-169; internal instability situations) or "the consolidation of the post-conflict peace (sending military and civil staff to adjust the countries destroyed by civil wars, restored the conjunctive tissue of the civil society and political institutions [...], promoting the national reconciliation and the observance of human rights"[11].

In both cases, we refer to the operations established by the United Nations' Security Council (more seldom by the General Assembly), performed under the guidance and control of the General Secretary's Office and implemented with the agreement of the territorial state in which the missions must be performed. In these type of operations, the use of force by the military staff, or by the police sent in the area, is generally allowed for legitimate self-defence or, in the measure strictly necessary to obtain the humanitarian purposes assigned to the mission: for example, to defend the populations in subject against violent attacks, prevent the serious infringement of the fundamental rights, protect humanitarian activity against non-governmental organizations, guarantee the security of humanitarian corridors or protected areas (for example, for groups in a certain ethnic group or refugee camps[12], out of which one can recall the interventions of the United Nations in Salvador (ONUSAL, 1991), Cambodia (UNTAC, 1992), Mozambique (ONUMOZ, 1992), Angola (UNAVEM III, 1995), Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL, 1999) and the first intervention of the "blue helmets" in Somalia (UNOSOM I, 1992)[13].

The use of force for humanitarian purposes does not bring, in this type of operation, specific admissibility problems in relation to international law. In fact, these operations take place with the approval of the territorial state as well as of any other contradictory party present in the area where the mission will take place (groups organized by insurgents, organized ethnic fractions). So these groups do not involve any form of violence against the territorial state, or against other international subjects: consequently they are not an international military coercion.

In addition, even if their legal grounds are not clearly identified, the related operations can be debated in - the Security Council - which has the power to use force in order to maintain international peace and security, and then (the operations) are led by military groups assigned by the states under the guidance and control of the General Secretary of the United Nations, to guarantee the impartiality of the intervention and its compliance with the purposes officially established for the mission.

A higher frequency in the "humanitarian" use of armed forces can be found in the hypothesis in which such use, although appeared in the context of a peace maintenance operation as the previous one, is implemented without considering the approval of the territorial sovereignty and is not limited to the purely "passive" dimension of the legitimate defence and protection of the populations or localities entrusted during the mission. This can happen, for example, in case of an "anarchy" situation, meaning a total collapse of the governmental organization, of the territorial state and when, because of the aggravation of dangers from which the populations must be protected or for the military and civil safety involved in the mission, it is necessary to disarm the hostile groups present in the surrounding territory. In these cases, the Security Council of the United Nations extends the initial mandate of the mission, assigning to the groups sent not only the task to keep the peace, but also apply the peace, apply, by force, objectives which are indispensable to the performance of the mission in that territory, in safety conditions and in a safe environment.[14] The episodes in which such situations appeared: the mandates for ensuring peace assigned to the United Nations protection force in former Yugoslavia (UNPROFOR, 1992), the second Force of the United Nations which operates in Somalia (UNOSOM II, 1993) and the Forces of the Nations sent in Rwanda (UNAMIR, 1992).

In relation to this type of intervention, one must notice that independently of the approval of the territorial state and of the other possible parties at conflict and which needs a real military constraint, this was always decided by the Security Council based on the assumption of its need to keep or re-establish peace and international security, in the presence of a threat against peace or a peace which is already infringed. This would justify its legitimacy in terms of international law as, it is known, it belongs to the Security Council, according to chapter VII of the UN Charta (especially art. 42) which provides using actions through military force in any case considered necessary to maintain international peace and security, in the presence not only of an act of aggression, but also an infringement of the peace or a simple threat against the peace.

Another type of "humanitarian" armed actions, related to the United Nations system, includes the interventions which are not directly organized and performed by the UN bodies, but which are authorized only by the Security Council, to be then implemented in practice by the individual states, groups of states or the so-called regional organizations[15] As examples we have the authorization of the Security Council for the member states "to use all necessary means" to re-establish a safe environment for the humanitarian operations in Somalia, authorization followed by the Restore Hope operation, led by the UNITAF multinational force, with a mainly American structure; the authorization to use all necessary measures to defend the "protected areas" in Bosnia, followed, among others, by the NATO air operations called Air Strikes in April 1994 and the Deliberated Force, in August/ September 95; the authorization to use all necessary means to protect the displaced masses, the refugees and civilians in danger in Rwanda, followed by the turquoise operation, led by six states, under the command of France, which aimed to create a humanitarian security area from June to August 1994.

The compliance with the international law in relation to this type of intervention is not really conclusive in relation to the U.N. Charter, which doesn't explicitly provide the possibility of the Council to directly exercise/use a certain armed force through its own military groups, or authorize the "individual or coalition" member states to use armed measures to maintain international peace and security. Such an authorization is explicitly provided only in Article 53 of the Charter, in favour of the "regional organizations". In any case, if it is considered extended - in virtue of a consolidated practice and not appealed against by the UN member states - the power to authorize the Security Council in favour of some states, groups of states (or organizations which do not fully comply with the requirements established for the "regional organizations" specified by Article 52 of the Charter), it does not mean that the use of armed force in this "authorized context" should not legitimately comply with the precise and pretty strict conditions and requirements.

First, the authorization should involve - as it happened in the actual cases specified above - the existence of a danger situation, clearly qualified by the Security Council as a threat against peace or an infringement of the international peace.

Second, the use of force (elliptically understood with the expression "any necessary means") should be exclusively conceived and limited to the object considered essential by the Council to re-establish or keep peace and security in the region: to re-establish a safe environment for the populations threatened or a situation in which it is possible to prevent a serious infringement of the fundamental rights of this population.

Last, the security measures should take place under the careful and constant supervision of the Security Council, eventually through the U.N. General Secretary, specifically appointed by the Council.

Moreover, this last condition is very difficult to achieve in practice and for sure it was not always performed in a satisfactory manner in the above specified cases. Moreover, it remains more than a doubt in relation to the conformity of the United Nations law in the use of the armed force which took place in these episodes.

No matter the assessment of the individual episodes, one can state, in principle, that the use of force for humanitarian purposes authorized by the Security Council, in the measure in which it complies with the above-specified requirements, is acceptable for the current international law and especially for the law of the United Nations. Still, it is important to recall that in order for the authorization and the consistent use of force to be legitimate, it must be justified by the need to maintain or re-establish a peace and security situation, meaning eliminate or reduce this particular type of peace infringement or peace threat, which consists in serious and systematic infringements of the most fundamental human rights (for example, the right to life, physical and mental integrity, not to be reduced to slavery, not to be discriminated and isolated because of race, ethnicity or religious belief).

Once a "safe environment" was created - a situation in which these fundamental rights are not exposed to the risk of being stepped on - the military force for humanitarian reasons no longer has a reason in the UN system, neither authorized nor applied. This is actually the substantial limit inherent to the coercive intervention provided to the Security Council based on chapter VII of the UN Charter: "guardian of the international public order" (or, if you prefer, "international cop") this body has, without a doubt, the right and obligation to put the state or the organized group which seriously infringes human rights in the situation in which they "cannot harm" (meaning they cannot continue their barbaric brutality), re-establishing security and eliminating this peace threat; but it does not have the right to interfere in another manner or go on.

Consequently, the Council cannot legitimately "judge", "sanction" or "punish" the state or the group in charge, nor does it perform violent constraints to impose a change of political regime. The use of armed forces, even if partially motivated by the humanitarian protection purposes, which has the aim to remove a political regime, would be totally against the rights the United Nations has, would be an illegal action, even if adopted according to the procedural rules of the UN Charter[16]

Another type of cases in which in the past years there an international use of the armed forces for "humanitarian" purposes was, is the interventions established outside the decision-making system of the United Nations, which includes the Kosovo war[17].

A first type is given by the interventions performed with the agreement of the territorial state: the operation performed by ECOWAS ("The economic community of the states in Western Africa"), in Liberia between 1990-1991 with the agreement of the then government in charge (but against the will of the biggest insurgent group there) - a force of about 10.000 men (ECOMOG), mainly Nigerian, with the purpose - at least declared - to maintain public order and prevent the serious human rights infringements as a result of the ethnic tribal conflicts they produced and are still producing. Also, it could refer to the IFOR (Implementation Force) case, the multinational force mainly formed by the groups supplied by the NATO countries, provided in the Dayton agreements in 1995 and performed in Bosnia and Herzegovina, with the approval of all interested parties, Bosnia, Croatia, the Yugoslav Federation, the Croatian-Muslim Federation and the so-called Republika Srpská) with the purpose - among others - to guarantee, if necessary, the use of force, the application of the peace plan and a situation of total respect of the human rights.

In fact, as already observed for the peace maintenance and peace consolidation operations, the decisions adopted in the United Nations Organization do not involve military constraint towards the territorial state or other international subjects.

Very different is the case in which the "humanitarian" armed intervention of the states or coalition of states takes place without the agreement of the territorial state or even openly against that state. Precisely in this category we must follow the intervention of the NATO countries in Kosovo. And in the same category we have another famous episode: the Provide Comfort operation in the Iraqi Kurdistan.

In relation to the latter, it must be recalled that the real humanitarian intervention, meant to allow the humanitarian activity of the United Nations and of the non-governmental organizations in favour of the Kurdish populations submitted to the repressive regime of Saddam Hussein, although the mandate of the UN Security Council was very limited in time and intensity, the ground forces and the aircrafts of the "interfering" coalition's countries (US, France, The United Kingdom, Italy, Spain, The Netherlands and Australia) entered Iraq on April 17, 1991, creating certain safe enclaves in Kurdistan (the so-called safe havens) and establishing a flight free area, above the 36th parallel, without the need to use war violence, but limited to the application of a force threat. Although the next day (April 18) Iraq also reached an agreement (supplemented by the previous agreement of May 25), which allowed not only the performance of the humanitarian aid operations in the area and the establishment of safe havens, but also to the displacement of 500 UN "white helmets". This displacement was performed; the ground troops of the coalition withdrew the next July. But the flight corridor area remained, to which another was added, under parallel 32, by unilateral decision of the United States. It is important to underline that imposing and maintaining both flight interdiction areas have nothing "humanitarian" about them and, consequently, besides being illegitimate, are away from the interest area of this analysis.

In relation to the Provide Comfort operation, the Kosovo intervention had a very different area and resonance: in fact, after this intervention, the world problem was brought in front of the global public opinion, that of humanitarian intervention, with all its implications.

Before attempting a judicial assessment, it is necessary to recall the facts briefly (10). In the spring-summer of 1998, a wide repression campaign was launched against the ethnic Albanian population by the Yugoslav army and police, started also by the intensification of the guerrilla war and of the terrorist activity of UCK, the "Kosovo Independence" army. In autumn, according to the estimates of the High UN Commissary Office for Refugees, there were already over 200.000 refugees. Still, a big part of them (about 100.000) were convinced to return to their places of origin as a result of the agreement between Holbrooke - the US representative and Milosevic, in relation to the withdrawal of a big part of the Yugoslav armed forces in the area, under the control of an international mission established by OSCE.

In January 1999, the situation (Albania's guerrilla war and the Yugoslav repression) worsened again, until the very serious episode of Racak (where - for reasons and conditions not fully clarified - 45 Albanian ethnics were killed and mutilated), sealing in this manner also the failure of the OSCE mission.

In February, the negotiations performed at Rambouillet between an Albanian delegation and a Yugoslav delegation also failed, in the presence and under the pressure of the c.d. Contact group member states (United States, The United Kingdom, Russia, France, Germany and Italy). The proposed agreement was in fact rejected by the Albanian delegation (at it did not clearly stipulate the future independence of Kosovo) as well as by the Yugoslav one (as it provided detaching on the territory of Yugoslavia an international military force under the command of NATO). Still, in March, the Albanian party - convinced by the reinsurances of the United States, declared to accept the proposal. Yugoslavia insists in its refusal, perhaps in the conviction it managed to defeat the UCK guerrillas, despite the NATO military intervention, maybe thinking it could take advantage in case of a wider and more intense conflict, to eliminate for good part of the Albanian population in Kosovo and, in case of a division of the region, to keep a "safe" an ethnically controllable part of Kosovo.

On March 20, a new, painful and repressive campaign of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia starts in Kosovo which, in a few days, leads to 15 000 refugees.

On March 24, the NATO countries start the bombing, which continues until June 9. The strategy followed by the Alliance immediately and clearly shows that the immediate objective is not to avoid an imminent humanitarian tragedy, but to protect the Albanian population in danger.

This is sooner the "mediated" and "indirect" objective wished to be obtained by reaching the objective to defeat Milosevic's Yugoslavia, meaning imposing the abandonment of Kosovo as counterparty for not destroying Serbia.

The Yugoslav military forces are than attacked and the air defence destroyed; but, considering the weak results of this operation, the bombings extend to non-military objectives; industrial plants, oil refineries, oil pipes, bridges, railways and roads, until the bombing of Belgrade and some objectives such as the head office of the Yugoslavian television, the head offices and residences of Milosevic and his family.

Meanwhile - and predictable - the Serbian repression in Kosovo intensifies. The infringement and worsening of the human rights violation, an "Ethnic cleaning" campaign, which determines the massive exodus of the Albanian population in only two months, especially in relation to Albania and Macedonia (The High UN Commission talks about 800.000 new refugees in two months)[18]

At the beginning of June, after Yugoslavia accepted the peace plan drafted between the G8 countries (the plan was also submitted to the general approval of China) and the inclusion of this plan in the resolution 1244 of the UN Security Council, the NATO countries officially ended the bombing, on June 10, 1999.

Between June-November the same year, almost all exiled Albanians returned, but, together with the entry of the mainly NATO multinational force (KFOR, the Kosovo force) and the resumption of the biggest part of the CK extremist fraction, the Kosovo Serbian diaspora starts. Approximately 200.000 Serbians leave their places of origin. Approximately 60.000 of them remain in Kosovo, focusing in certain "leopard-skin" areas, which need constant protection against vendettas and acts of violence. The hope of a multi-ethnic Kosovo seems, at least for the near future, affected for good. [19]

2.3. Arguments supporting the Kosovo war legitimacy thesis in terms of international law

The legitimate question made is if the Kosovo war and - in general - the unilateral and "unauthorized" armed humanitarian intervention can be or not be considered legitimate according to the current international law.

In order to assess this matter, it is necessary to examine the various legal arguments proposed to justify the NATO intervention in Kosovo.

A first series of arguments outline the NATO intervention as descendant or "tangible" in another manner to the international peace and security maintenance system, which operates in the United Nations.

So, it was suggested that the use of force against Yugoslavia was authorized by the previous resolutions of the Security Council, precisely through the Resolution 1199 of September 23, 1998 and 1203 of October 24 the same year.[20]

If read the two resolutions, it is easily obvious that while the situation created in Kosovo is classified as a threat against peace, it did not reveal any authorization, even ambiguous, to use armed forces. On the contrary, those acts of the Council are characterized, as noticed, by a substantial equidistance towards the parties in the already on-going conflict: both parties are actually being reproached the acts of violence already committed, and are called to avoid the catastrophic humanitarian risk[21]

In addition, the resolutions quoted always repeat the obligation of all U.N. Member States to respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Yugoslav Federation, also underlining the main responsibility of the Security Council in relation to keeping and maintaining international peace and security.

In a different manner, and without denying that the NATO bombings were officially "unauthorized" when they took place (because of the lack of authorization by the Security Council) it was argued - in light of a very "free" reading of the 1244 Resolution of June 10, 1999 - that the Council itself would have corrected the inherent vice of the NATO bombings, approving also the implicit adoption of the military action performed by the countries of the Alliance[22] This justification must also be rejected.

First of all, no matter how "generous" are the powers assigned to the Security Council on the UN Charter, they must be understood so that, in virtue of a subsequent practice, what was declared illegal from the start cannot be declared legal. One must not forget that the Council is granted mandatory legal powers only for the specific purpose to establish, during crisis periods, the necessary measures to restore and maintain international peace and security, and not for general governmental purposes or in relation to the assessment and "replacement" of the law[23]

Bur no matter the general aspects, it is enough to read the 1244 resolution previously mentioned to understand it does not involve any approval of the armed intervention. Moreover, in this resolution, the Council, starting from the situation decided as a result of this intervention - meaning from the acceptance of the peace plan by Yugoslavia - starts, according to this plan, the next steps which must be performed to obtain the full restoration of the peace and security in the area and the establishment of a temporary civil administration regime for Kosovo, organized and managed by the United Nations. In other words, the resolution 1244 looks towards the future and does not revise the past[24]

Moreover, one cannot ignore that two important permanent members of the Council - Russia and China - a few days after the bombing, voted to adopt a resolution condemning the military action of NATO[25].

The reality is that the silence regarding the military action, in the text of this resolution, was the only diplomatically viable method to return the Kosovo back in the hands of the United Nations, to entrust the task to manage the "post-war" to the world organization, which would establish and control a peaceful reconstruction of the area, respecting the human rights, the self-determination of the ethnic groups present there and, as much as possible, the territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

If we wish to talk, in relation to this, about the "return to the international lawfulness", it is a substantially accepted statement, but the "return to lawfulness" involves being aware of the "illegality" previously committed by the NATO member states with their intervention and should be understood as a wish to close the "illegality brackets" and not in place of "amnesty" or even a "blessing" for what happened[26]

Briefly, with the silencing of the 1244 Resolution, no armed intervention was approved or implicitly approved; it just spread a veil on it.

Another type of argument, proposed to explain the eligibility of the Kosovo intervention in light of the United Nations law, shifts the focus from the "procedural" size of their approval (or approval) by the Security Council, of the content of prohibition to use armed force, provided in the UN Charter.

It was especially claimed that the NATO intervention did not infringe this interdiction, as it would regard only the use of armed force incompatible with the purposes of the United Nations. And as the NATO member states would bomb the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to protect human rights - especially the fundamental rights of the Albanian population in Kosovo - their action would be legitimate as off-line, de facto, according to one of the main purposes of the UN[27].

We consider this argument at least debatable.

As shown in the specialty literature, art. 2, paragraph 4 of the UN Charter, in this text's preparatory works, as it results from the construction given with the numerous statements of the General Assembly, from the studies made by most part of the most representative doctrine, the interdiction of the states to use armed force in international relations (an interdiction which, as known, is one of the pillars of the whole United Nations legal system) refers not only - always and in any case - to any use of the force against territorial integrity or political independence of a state, but to any use of force incompatible with one of the objectives established by the United Nations. In other words, it is an absolute interdiction (without affecting the legitimate individual and collective defence exception, as well as the hypothesis in which the use of force is legitimately applied or decided by the Security Council)[28]

Indeed, the use of military force, which does not aim to undermine the political independence or territorial integrity of a state, can never be compatible with the objective of "developing a friendly relationship between nations" [article 1 paragraph 2 of the UN Charter] or the "peaceful resolution of international litigations" (article 2 paragraph 1 of the Charter" or "the performance of the international cooperation, the resolution of the international problems of an economic, social, intellectual or humanitarian order" (art. 1, paragraph 3 of the Charter).

Besides the incompatibility of the armed intervention in Kosovo with the various purposes of the United Nations, it is incontestable that this intervention, in its manner, as well as in its objectives, was open against the political independence and, last, against the territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Consequently, it is classified, without a doubt, in the type of war intervention explicitly condemned and forbidden by the United Nations Charter.

A second set of arguments which can be supported as base for the admissibility, in the international law, of a NATO military intervention, do not appear at UN system level, but at international law level.

These are actually the arguments which must be analysed, because of the less clear, as well as more permissive content in relation to the United Nations law, of the international unwritten regulations regarding the obligations of the states to abstain from the use of armed forces and as the admissibility of the "humanitarian" intervention in the customs law field is aligned, in principle, in the presence of certain conditions, even by those which do not hesitate to define the serious specific action performed by the NATO countries in the spring of 1999.

So, a first argument refers to the notion of "state of necessity", which must be understood as the reason for exclusion of the illicit facts approved by the general international law.

As we know, this liability exemption provision excludes the illicit nature of the behaviour of a state, in case such behaviour is the only way the state can protect an essential interest due to a sure, serious and imminent danger. Consequently, one could argue that while the protection of the fundamental rights of each individual and each group, no matter the nationality and territory it is part of - the prevention of "humanitarian catastrophes" everywhere - the whole international community (and, consequently, for each state) must show an interest, an essential preoccupation, so that after the intervention of one or more states towards the state where a humanitarian tragedy took place, no matter how licit or objective is considered, is actually justified if it was the only manner to protect a similar interest, essentially "humanitarian"[29].

However, several reasons leave this type of explanation seriously unclear and, above all, its ability to establish the legal admissibility of an armed intervention such as that in Kosovo.

One must not forget there are important conditions for the "state of necessity" to justify the performance of an illicit international act. As it results from the International Liability Project of the States of the International Law Commission, a State may invoke the "state of necessity" as justification only if its conduct does not in turn undermine the essential interest of the State to which it is addressed (Article 25 of the CDI Project).

It is undeniable that an intervention like that of NATO in Kosovo seriously undermines the essential interest - actual and legal protection - of the state against which one acts: the interest in not violating its territory, not interfering with external forces in the affairs its internal (as a reflection of non-interference in the internal affairs of the state, territorial integrity and inviolability of the frontiers and the failure to return to armed force or the threat of force as fundamental principles of international law, as stated in the UN Charter, art. 1, paragraphs 4, 7 of the Charter). This is, in particular, the interest not to be subjected to forms of armed constraint against political independence, territorial integrity, not to say against the right to life of its own citizens.

In addition, the "state of necessity" cannot be invoked no matter the circumstances, and, in any case, to justify the infringement of the peremptory norms of the general international law (i.e. the jus cogens regulations), according to article 26 of the CDI Project.

NATO's armed action - objectively taken into account in terms of conduct, scope and intensity - outlines a clear example of an armed attack against a state, a behaviour that is undoubtedly in contrast with the meaning of the obligation which arises from the general international rule of law that requires states to refrain from using to armed forces in their relations. No "humanitarian" or other kind of necessity would be proper to justify such a behaviour.
For this series of reasons, the concept "state of necessity" proves to be insufficient to justify the specific case of NATO's intervention in Kosovo, it is difficult to generally use the basis of the legal admissibility of armed humanitarian interventions.

According to another argument, the use of force for humanitarian purposes would be allowed through an ordinary ad hoc standard established before the entry in force of the San Francisco Charter and the UN Constitution, which has so far survived the prohibition to use force established in the United Nations system and in the existence of which the decision of the NATO countries to intervene in Kosovo is an important manifestation and confirmation[30]

Also, this explanation is not convincing. Regardless of the fact that the doctrine of legitimacy of humanitarian intervention is supported by a minority part of the internationalist doctrine (generally by the Anglo-Saxon culture), the data of the practice and beliefs repeatedly expressed by most states to reject it.

The period before the end of World War Two is not considered. It is well known that until then the use of the armed force in international relations and war as a direct means for a state to affirm its interests was admitted in the international law, in more comprehensive terms than "it was a contemporary legal state" (the one that has begun - to be introduced - with the United Nations). It should also be noted that, even in the less recent past, the practice of armed humanitarian interventions has been extremely rare, unless they date back to the mid-nineteenth century and, in particular, relate to interventions of the European powers.

The intervention cases mainly motivated by humanitarian purposes and put in practice in the presence of a real humanitarian emergency where very few:

- the intervention of the Arab Countries in 1948

[29] Ronzitti, Diritto internazionale dei conflitti armati, Torino, 2001, pp. 30-34;
[30] Ronzitti, Diritto internazionale dei conflitti armati, Torino, 2001, 30-34;

(after the proclamation of the State of Israel), motivated - among others - by the protection of the Arab population present in Palestine, which was immediately followed by strong protests in many states, including the United States and the Soviet Union;

- the intervention in 1971 of India against Pakistan over Bangladesh, for which India has, however, invoked beyond any legitimate defence and protection of the right to self-determination;
- the interventions, between 1978 and 1979, of Vietnam in northern Cambodia against the Pol-Pot regime and Tanzania in Uganda against the Amin regime; but even in these cases, the reasons for the interventions essentially refer to legitimate defence or to the matter of territorial sovereignty and have revealed the real intentions of the intermediate states to create or consolidate in their favour an area of regional influence (such interventions have, however, provoked the wide and intense disapproval of many states and, in particular, of European countries);
- the US interventions in Grenada (1983) and Panama (in 1988); In these cases, in addition to the fact that there is no evidence of humanitarian urgency, the US did not refer to humanitarian motivations but to the need to protect its compatriots in danger abroad and / or the existence of a consensus to intervene with the territorial state;
- the Provide Comfort Operation in the Iraqi Kurdistan in 1991: however, it has taken place in a context of widely and differently justified use of force against Iraq, in the absence of which it is unlikely that the humanitarian intervention in question in favour of the abandoned Kurds would have been done.

A different reasoning line, according to which the admissibility of the armed humanitarian interventions, like those in Kosovo, would be proven, refers to the obligation theory, erga omnes[31].

This theory starts from noticing the increasing importance in the international law of a limited core of regulations, placed to protect the fundamental values of the entire international community, from which precisely each erga omnes state obligation would derive, that is, the obligations to this community considered as a whole (or, according to another version of the theory in question, to all and each state)[32]. These rules include, for example, the prohibition of aggression, respect for the self-determination of peoples, prohibition of serious human rights violations. The violation by a State of the obligations under these rules would entitle any other state or group of states to act in order to undertake responsibility for the state which caused the violation. This would happen regardless if the State which acted was or was not "personally" affected by the violation, meaning if it suffered direct damage or the prejudice of its own subjective right. Rather states would have the right to act against the responsible state, as it is called "on behalf of and on behalf of" the entire international community or, if you prefer, to protect the value of the fundamental interest for these communities, affected by the violation committed. Each state or group of states may therefore claim from the responsible state: the cessation of the unlawful conduct still in progress, the repair (in a broad sense) of the material and moral damages produced, as well as the guarantee that the violation committed shall not happen again. And above all, each state would have the right, in order to obtain the performance of the obligation by the responsible state, to resort to "countermeasures" against it, if necessary: that is to say, sanctioning behaviours which, per se, violate the rights of the responsible state , but which lose their illegality because they appear as a reaction to an offense already committed. This final right would expand to allow - in case of very serious violations of the erga omnes obligations - the unilateral use, by one or more states, to armed force against the responsible state. This would be acceptable in particular when the collective security system provided by the UN Charter and centred on the coercive powers of the Security Council has been paralyzed, that is, due to the veto of a permanent member and to implement, if necessary, the use of military force to sanction the responsible state and to guarantee the protection of the fundamental value violated by the behaviour of the state concerned.

Such a hypothesis would be given precisely in the presence of serious and systematic infringements of the human rights by a state, for which the Security Council could not establish a term by using the forces authorized by the states or regional organizations. The case of Kosovo would offer a clear example of this situation[33].

Also, it is not the case to refer to the evolutions of the related theory, which give rise to bigger doubts. These concerns regard, in particular, the interpretation of the United Nations Collective Security System as an appropriate mechanism for the enforcement of the author's liability obligations for the serious violation of the international law and the consideration of the intended Security Council's role as a "material body" usable by the international community to impose real sanctions against the responsible state[34].

However, there is at least one point worth approaching from the analysed perspective, namely that, in order to ensure that erga omnes obligations are complied with, in the event of their serious violation, the use by states or group of state of countermeasures involving even the use of force against the responsible state is approved.

This corollary - because the truth is not indispensable in a general theory of the erga omnes obligations - cannot be shared.

[33] The International Court of Justice in the Nicaragua case (1986);
[34] Picone, La 'guerra del Kosovo', cit., pp. 309, 343;

On the other hand, the evolution of the general international law in the period after the incorporation of the United Nations and the prohibition of the armed force in art. 2, paragraph 4 of the Charter has gradually progressed towards adopting the "absolute" interdiction of the states to use armed force in their relationships, to the legal status of the regular regulations and, in addition, to mandatory force.

Notwithstanding the right to self-defence (individual and collective) in the face of an armed attack, not even the serious violation of the obligations considered to be of fundamental interest to the entire international community - such as genocide or systematic and widespread violation of fundamental rights to a certain community - would make legitimate the unilateral use of the armed force by a state or a group of states against the responsible state (or, with more classical terminology, would justify the use of armed retaliation) in times of peace; and if the state or group of states interfere - ut singuli - in order to protect their own subjectively violated right, regardless of whether they claim to intervene to protect the fundamental values of the international community as a whole.

The existence in international law of such a mandatory limit for all counter-measures - including those that can be adopted in response to the erga omnes breach - has recently been reaffirmed by the two most authorized global authorities, designated to know international law: The International Court of Justice, which, in its 1996 opinion on the lawful use of nuclear weapons, has expressly denied any legitimacy of the counter-measures in times of peace[35] and the U.N. Commission on International Law, Article 50 of its Project regarding the liability of States has put countermeasures in contradiction with the obligation to refrain from threatening or using force, as laid down in the Charter[36] among the counter-measures prohibited by the international law.

Briefly: although it is considered acceptable for one or more states to react unilaterally to serious and systematic human rights violations committed by another state - such as those committed against the ethnic Albanian population in Kosovo - in violation of the rights of the responsible state, as countermeasure for the infringement of the erga omnes obligations, this reaction cannot legitimately constitute a use of armed violence against that state, as happened, in turn, with NATO's military action against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

If we refer to the analysis performed until now in relation to the various arguments proposed in relation to the Kosovo war:

- at a general level, the military intervention for humanitarian purposes, performed unilaterally by a state or a group of states, was, at the time of NATO's military action, a case prohibited by international law;
- at particular level, the NATO countries which did not have (before, during nor immediately after the intervention) any valid title or justification for their action, seriously infringed Article. 2 paragraph 4 of the U.N. Charter, which orders the U.N. Member States to abstain from the threat and use of force in international relations, as well as the general rules which prohibits the use of armed forces.

Even if it were determined by more actually human humanitarian motivations and led in a humane and efficient and less devastating manner, the intervention would have violated international law: perhaps less seriously, but would have violated it anyway.

Moreover, judicial experts are aware of the fact that when we start to discuss based on relative, subjective and flexible parameters (such as "good faith", "proportionality" or "necessity"), it is always possible to find, in the assessment the actual situation - of the real and presumed facts, of the statements and counter-statement - it is easy to adopt an attitude that is not the most objective in favour of a conclusion or even the opposite of it. In this respect, the Kosovo case is not an exception[37].

Still, the judicial reflection on the Kosovo war cannot be considered concluded. Meaning it cannot stop to the existing law assessment, as it is said.

We still have the question, according to the intended law, if the Kosovo intervention and the manner in which it was received by the so-called international community does not represent an important element, a significant precedent, in the context of a replacement process of the current law or, if someone prefers, the effects of forming a usual regulation which would allow the armed intervention for humanitarian purposes, in certain conditions?[38].

From this perspective, some data should be reported, it is especially relevant that the official position of NATO (and, also, of the European Union) to justify the intervention was to appeal, mainly (but not exclusively) to the need to prevent a humanitarian catastrophe in danger [39]. This position was also developed and clarified in legal terms by some member states of the Alliance, especially by the United Kingdom, which repeatedly claimed, through the change of its previous orientation, the international lawfulness of the humanitarian unilateral interventions, even in the absence of the Security Council's approval[40].

Also, one cannot ignore the absence of any explicit disapproval of the action of NATO by the bodies of the United Nations, contextual or subsequent to the intervention.

Most important are the strong reserves about the lawfulness of the intervention, explicitly exposed by one of the NATO members: especially in France and, more than anywhere, in Germany, which explicitly declared the exceptional nature of the intervention, in the meaning of the incapacity to establish a valid precedent in terms of the extreme danger, as well as the illegality of any "humanitarian" intervention practice implemented outside the authorizing system for the use of force in the UN Security Council[41].

Last, we must not forget that the "international community" does not include only the member states or the NATO friends. Then, the various convictions and official protests regarding the serious opposition against the international law of the NATO action, coming from the most various geopolitical areas of the world, cannot be ignored: from Russia to India, from China to the twelve Latin-American countries of the "Rio Group", to the 114 countries of the "non-aligned movement"[42].

Paraphrasing Antonio Cassese, with reference to the Kosovo intervention[43]: "one could state, in relation to this that, at least for the moment, ex injuria jus non oritur (unjust actions cannot create a right): a «humanitarian» war, such as the one lead by NATO, besides not finding any support in the existing international law, could not even improve this already inadequate and primitive legal system".

THE CRIMINAL NORM IN DIFFERENT LEGAL SYSTEMS – COMPARATIVE PERSPECTIVE

Alexandru Vladimir OLĂNESCU

Abstract

This paper aims to analyze the structure and evolution of the criminal norm in the context of various existing legal systems at the global level, showing both the similarities and the differences between these systems. Thus, in the context of increasingly prominent globalization and unification of legal systems, there is some reticence registered within states in relation with the "modernization" and uniformity of the criminal norm.

Therefore, a comparative presentation of criminal norms in certain representative legal systems, namely China for the Asian legal system, the United States of America for the North American legal system, Lebanon for the Islamic law system, and Italy for the European law system, is desirable.

Also, the paper shall highlight the historical evolution of criminal norms as well as their development according to the existing cultural valences in each region.

Moreover, this paper provides an overview of the development of criminal law in different legal systems and underlines the social and cultural factors as well as the space and time matters that customize the legislation of each state subject to analysis.

Keywords: criminal norm, legal systems, development, globalization, state

1. Introduction

"Il faut éclairer l'histoire par les lois et les lois par l'histoire"[1] – "We must highlight history by laws and laws by history" said Montesquieu, which clearly shows that legal and historical subject matters are closely interrelated.

The drafting of the law is conceived only in the light of the past: the legal norm is always created based on empirical observations attesting an abnormality that should be corrected. The reason why we resort to the link between the two subjects is simple: events and facts with historical impact have influenced the evolution of the Criminal Law envisaged as a whole.

History is not a monolithic notion, in the sense that it refers to two main ideas that we have to underline.

Defined by Petit Larousse on the one hand as "the relation of past facts and events related to life of mankind, of a society, of one person" and, on the other hand, as "the study and science of past events, of evolution," history designates both the sequence of past events, and the discourse originated therefrom, i.e. the relation of these facts. Etymologically, the very notion of history refers to narrative, the Greek verb "historein" means "to attempt to know", "to say".

Paul Ricoeur places of interest the distinction in German between the future of mankind and the discourse related to this becoming: "The history we write, the retrospective history (die Historie) is made possible by the History that was made (die Geschichte)"[2].

History and criminal law meet in force, essentially as follows: if criminal law, through its deterrent effect, has a preventive role, it also aims at sanctioning the hypothetical behaviour of a thing of the past. There is no problem of advance punishment, repression can only focus on a crime committed. At first glance, Criminal Law seems rather to have to know history in the sense of the German Geschichte, i.e. of the events from the past. In this respect, time is considered of the essence: Criminal Law does not intend to return forever to the past, and the passage of time generally hinders sanction. But, in some cases, the criminal law is working backwards, taking into account the facts whose oldness would have suggested they would escape the sanction of criminal law. Different mechanisms may, however, be taken into consideration: one may believe that when one created the statute of limitation for a public action, a crime should be considered history. The more serious a crime, the more stringent the need to enter the domain of the past and, therefore, of the unpunished. It is also possible to refer to more specific provisions[3].

But history is above all the discourse regarding sequence of events; history is the story of past events.

Originally, the story aims to revive the memory of the past, as Herodotus begins his "Historia" with the following words: "Herodotus of Halicarnasus presents here the results of his investigation so that time does not destroy the memory of people's actions and the great explorations made by the Greeks or the Barbarians do not fall into oblivion".

The work of Herodotus, called "the father of history" by Cicero[4] has essentially a memorial vocation. It is a matter of history to guarantee the sustainability of past events. In this sense, history was seen by positivists as science [5], such as mathematics and physics. Henri Irénée Marrou[6] said, with reference to history, that it is "the knowledge of the human past", and that "history is the relationship, the conjuncture established by the initiative of the historian between two planes of mankind, the past lived by the ancient people, and the present moment in which we witness developing the effort to recover this past for the benefit of the future[7]. "History is therefore extremely subjective, because it depends on the manner in which each historian retains the past to extract a certain truth therefrom". For Serge Carfantan, history is "a representation that links the values of today's people to the past lived by the ancient people and their values"[8].

As time goes by, history is rewritten, reinterpretation is enriched and becomes more refined; the story never ends. In this regard, Criminal Law can be brought forward in several respects in the sense that it is not limited to the assimilation of the past facts but it also knows the discourse resulting from these facts by framing the subjective history.

History therefore refers to two realities: the sequence of facts transmitted in se, but also the discourse - especially historical - corresponding to this chronology.

Consequently, we need to see in what context Criminal Law can be brought to the cognisance of history as it has just been defined [9], because many of the sanctions provided in the Criminal Law are based on the very relation between events and historical facts, especially when we refer to the Muslim space.

The story must find a balance between, on the one hand, the need for fighting against forgetting the past and, on the other hand, using this past as a precedent that allows man to progress. Man must feed on the past, learn from it, but must not be paralysed by it. Many punishments provided by the Criminal Law, in many parts of the world, have remained at an original stage without evolving in line with the time to which we relate.

As regards Criminal Law, it is about knowing the past and assimilating it: history hinders the passage of time, prevents the memory of the past from disappearing. In order to fight against oblivion, the historian presents a narrative of events in order to pursue and maintain consistency. Jean Favier believes that "History, first of all, is a narrative, and then an analysis, a reconstruction of the past, and finally an attempt to understand the past.[10]

Thus, history necessarily implies a certain subjectivity. Even if in principle it does not have the role of making important assessments of the past, it can engage and influence perceptions of past events /facts. (we refer to history as science). As a rule, historians enjoy great freedom in their activity of research and reconstitution, which explains why they oppose any dogma, taboo or order [11].

According to Madeleine Rebérioux, historians can be considered "revisionists not by ideological will, but by profession".[12]

Criminal Law it is not as fluid as the historical discourse; there is indeed a principle of legal certainty that requires some stability in the legislative system, especially with regard to the repressive device that affects individual freedoms. If history is essentially an evolutionist science, Criminal Law tends to solidly define its object and therefore to be perennial. However, within these developments we witness the fact that Criminal Law has not ceased to intervene in the elaboration of a historical truth; repressive law treats history as a discourse about the past.

Criminal law has no choice but to know the past, it is in its nature to deal with past facts. Some of these facts have a special dimension allowing them to be described as "historical" because of their age or the impact they have had on mankind.

Criminal Law must "digest" the past, know history in the "event" dimension; it is its duty to assimilate facts related to history.

The first actor who has the possibility to retain facts of a historical nature is the legislator, who, through the creation of incriminations and the definition of their regime, can influence history or be influenced by it. Certain mechanisms make it possible to note that history, through the special crime it has generated, requires an adequate criminal response, even if the passage of time is generally a factor of impunity; it is essentially the creation of retroactive incriminations. Other mechanisms allow, on the contrary, to anticipate the potential difficulties, deciding that in the future certain facts can never be resumed in history, and that their objective gravity requires they are given an adequate response at all times: these are the imprescriptible crimes.

As for the timely implementation of laws, the legislator has the opportunity to understand facts that, hypothetically, belong to past or even to history. In principle, material criminal law is intended to apply only to future situations, a new law can only apply to the acts committed after its entry into force. The past seems, on the contrary, to be granted a certain immunity because, according to the principle of legality, it does not seem possible to punish a person for facts that have not been incriminated. The principle stated in Article 8 of the Convention on the Rights of Man and Citizen of 1789, "The right to respect for private and family life", has been and is interpreted in relation to various contextual elements.

Criminal Law is used by lawmakers to sanction behaviours that require a response according to the gravity of the act.

If we proceed to a comparative analysis of the criminal legislation in different cultural-religious backgrounds, namely the United States, China, Italy and the Middle East (the Muslim space), we find specific peculiarities, some of them extracted from historical facts, others remained unaltered and unchanged since they were stated.

2. Muslim Criminal Law

The Muslim criminal legislation is based on Sharia law, the tradition.

Sharia, charâ'a or sharî'a (in Arabic: الشريعة) represents, in Islam, the tradition preserved by Prophet Mohammed, a set of doctrinal, social, cultural and relational rules received through revelation. The term used in Arabic in the religious context means "a way to obey [God's] law".

In the West, reference is made to "Sharia", meaning the Islamic term, which is an approximate translation, since it only partially covers the true meaning of the word (this term is also used instead of the Islamic law). Sharia codifies both public and Muslim life aspects, as well as social interactions. Muslims consider this set of rules to be the emanation of God's will (Shar). The level, intensity and extent of Sharia's normative power vary considerably in historical and geographical terms [13].

In the world, some of these rules are considered incompatible with human rights, particularly as regards freedom of expression, freedom of belief, sexual freedom and women's freedom.

The link to the past we mentioned earlier, analysing the relationship between history and Criminal Law, referred precisely to this aspect, namely that historic events / facts serve for the capacity of rebuilding the coherence and chronology of past events; it is correct to accept the past and look toward it, but to adapt it in order to understand the present.

Sharia, little applied during colonisation, when European law was often imposed (in Lebanon legislation is still predominantly French), is back in some Muslim majority states (for example, Sudan has reintroduced amputation for theft).

Many countries have promulgated Islamic criminal law codes including Afghanistan (Criminal Code 1976), Brunei (CC 2014), Iran (CC 1991, reformed in 1996 and 2013), Kuwait (1960, 1970), Libya (1953, 2002), the Maldives (1961, 2014), Oman (1974), Pakistan (1860, as amended by the Hudood Ordinances in 1979), Qatar (1971, 2004), Sudan (2003), the United Arab Emirates (1987), Yemen (1994) and several provinces in Malaysia (Kelantan in 1993), Nigeria (about ten provinces) and Indonesia Aceh, 2014)

Although the Muslim law is in no way limited to criminal law, it is often the most known because of the severity of certain punishments.

2.1. Categories of crimes

Sharia distinguishes several categories of crimes and related sentences:

Crimes falling within "God's law" and divided into two categories:

Crime that may give rise to revenge, according to the equivalent of the law of reprisals (qisas); hudud, which are "fixed phrases" defined by the Qur'an; less serious or offenses unknown in the Qur'an that fall within tazir [14].

Due to the severity of the prescribed condemnations (hudud), Muslim jurists often had the tendency, except the Zahirite school (present in the 9th and 10th centuries in Iraq, then in the 11th century in Spain), to apply a criterion of doubt, shubha, to the deed, which allows the "modelling" of the sentence or even its non-application (by casting doubt on the person responsible for the crime or on the legal framing of the punished deed[15].

Thus, the application of Sharia was, in fact, more flexible than what written texts 16 seemed to grant. The criminal codes promulgated in the twentieth century, however, disregard this canon, shubha, the legislator resorting most often to the earliest written sources of the Muslim law, contrary to medieval legal practice17 - with the notable exception of the 2013 reform of the Iranian Criminal Code, which incorporates this canon (Articles 120 and 121)[18].

However, this canon is sometimes invoked by judges and / or lawyers (for example, in 2002, in Nigeria, to defend Amina Lawal, the lawyer invoked this canon, as well as the case of Ma'iz illustrated in the Qur'an for to annul the death penalty as a result of the adultery committed by her[19].

Finally, there is a fourth category of punishment, which falls under the competence of the leader and does not aim to punish a person for what that person has done, but to preserve the general interest and / or to protect society against persons committing a crime that poses a threat against public order (fitna)[20].

This category of punishments is in the form of certain sentences, siyasa, and often consisted either in life imprisonment or in permanent exiles or in capital punishments - under the Ottoman Empire, siyasa had become synonymous with capital punishment[21]. These punishments are justified on the basis of a historic fact that would have occurred under Caliph Omar (634-644), who exiled a certain Nasr b. Hajjaj because he was too handsome, threatening thus all the women in the city by tempting them through his beauty , though he was not doing anything condemnable[22].

2.1.1. Talion (qisas) and compensation (diya)

Qisas may be applied to murders and intentional injuries [23]. It may be replaced by diyya, financial compensation or "blood money", according to the recommendations of the Qur'an [24]. Therefore, there is "a desire to replace private revenge (when accepted or acceptable) by compensating victims" [25], the doctrine specifies the conditions for such compensation (possibly even in the case of homicide[26]). The amount of compensation, which can never be strictly equivalent to the damages produced, varies according to gender and religion [27].

These provisions were detailed in the Ajarif Charter (1405) used by the Berbers of the Anti-Atlas[28]. For example, to the burden, al'hamal, diya was attached [29]. Thus, in accordance with the traditions of Bedouins in Egypt, besides diya, the tribe whose member has caused injury must also ensure the birth of a male child in the opposite group / tribe to compensate for the loss of a person [30].

The murderer had to lend his wife, sister or daughter to one of the victim's relatives so that she could give birth to a son and restore the balance of tribal powers [31]. This provision has disappeared from the most recent Anti-Atlas documents (at least from the 16th century); it was replaced by the exile of the murderer, a measure that remained in force until the imposition of French laws on the Anti-Atlas tribes in 1934 [32].

Some contemporary authors (Ali Kazemi-Rached [33]) saw in diya a possibility to theorise moral prejudices[34].

2.1.2. Hudud

Hudud (literally meaning "limits") include the crimes and sanctions defined by the Qur'an that cannot be challenged by judges; these offenses are considered to be committed against God Himself. Islamists are the ones who defend most the introduction to the positive law of this type of punishment[35] (and, in people's conception, what is often understood by the "restoration of Sharia").

There are seven such punishments [36]:

- sex outside marriage, called zina الزنا
- false imputation of this crime, called القذف بالزنا
- wine drinking, called شرب الخمر
- theft, called السرقة
- banditism, called الحرابة
- apostasy / abandonment of Islam, called الردة
- rebellion, called العصيان

2.1.3. Ta'zir

The penalties and crimes from the ta'zīr category (التعزيرات: the corrections) are discretionary judgements (established by public authorities and ruled by judges) which, by definition, vary according to circumstances. They are not fixed either in time or space. These penalties vary depending on the judge's assessment of the seriousness of the crime and the criminal provisions[37]. Sanctions range from sermon or verbal exhortation to death penalty for violation of divine or individual rights that threaten social peace or the security of individuals [38].

Apart from whipping, no corporal punishment can be given under ta'zīr[39] [with the exception of the Malachites - Muslim Sunnis following madhhab (a legal-religious school founded in Medina in 796 AD by Mālik ibn Anas) where amputation of the right hand is practiced in case of forgery of documents][40].

In practice, because of shubha (doubt), often expressed, about hudud crimes, the ta'zīr's sentences were, by far, the most common[41]. Lawyers have often tried to impose limits on kadis' discretion[42].

Thus, according to jurisprudents, the maximum number of blows varies between 10 (for some Shafists and Hunbalites[43] – Sunni Muslims belonging to certain juridical-religious schools founded by Abdullah Muhammad ibn Idrīs as-Shāfi'ī and Muhammad ibn Hanbal) and 39 (according to Abu Hanifa, 699-767 [44]) or 79 (Abu Yusuf, 731-798)[45].

2.1.4. Qissas

The Qissas category (القصاص) is autonomous in relation to the two previous ones and would, according to Jacques El Hakim, be in line with a survival of private revenge shifted into retaliation. This category is used for murder or bodily injury. In these cases, the victim or his or her legal heirs may choose to enforce reprisals or to receive damages (called "diya" for murder and "arche" for bodily injury)[46]. Exercising reprisals or collecting the allowance does not exclude a correction (ta'zīr) that would be made by public authorities in the case of a voluntary offense[47].

2.2. Sanctions

The Qur'an defines the punishment applicable to each "had", and Sunnah (Sunnis) adopted rules for other crimes whose punishment was not foreseen in the Qur'an. Qur'an punishments are usually performed in public, but with the covering of the body parts that do not need to be displayed publicly.[48]

2.2.1. Whipping

The punishment by whipping is stipulated for non-marital sex, false accusation, alcohol consumption and other offenses from the correction category.

Jurists offer different sanctions according to the Madhhabs (legal-religious schools). According to a hadith reported by Abû Burda al-Ansari [49], Prophet Mohammed forbids the exceeding of 10 blows when the punishment to be applied is not defined in the Qur'an or in Sunnah.

The Qur'an provides 100 whips for sex outside of marriage. The Malachites, however, allow over 100 blows, while other schools present this number as a limit that cannot be overcome [50]. There are 80 strikes stipulated for false testimony [51] and 40-80 strikes for alcohol drinking [52]. The number of whips varies between 10 and 100.[53]

2.2.2. Amputation and crucifixion (in case of armed robbery)

Based on Sura 5, paragraph 33 of the Qur'an [54], jurists indicate four fixed sentences for armed robbery (or banditism): capital punishment, crucifixion, transverse amputation (one hand and the opposite leg), or exile[55].

Shiism believes that the state (represented by the ruler or judge) may establish one of these sanctions in accordance with their own will.

The Malachite School sets fixed penalties according to the gravity of the offense: exile if there was intention, but the theft was not carried out, amputation if it was theft; crucifixion or capital punishment if, in addition, there was a homicide.

Other schools affirm a strict correspondence between sentences and the nature of armed robbery (the judge cannot exceed the maximum punishment etablished)[56]. Thus, if the theft was not completed, exile may be replaced by imprisonment until the perpetrator's repentance is detected; cross-amputation if there is a theft of a good with a minimum value (nisab) or, according to some Chafeists and Malachites, if there was rape or sexual assault; death penalty when a man died (not theft) and ultimately crucifixion for armed robbery having led to death.

Hanafi, however, believes that in the latter case, the head of the state may impose the simple amputation of both hands rather than the death penalty associated with the crucifixion [57]. Ultimately, these strict punishments do not apply if the victim is close to the perpetrator.

According to certain jurists who dissociate crucifixion from capital punishment, the tortured (the crucified) can receive food and drinks and must be executed by the end of the third day.

This sentence may also be imposed as a result of a crime in the ta'zir category, without being followed by execution.[58]

2.2.2. Death penalty

Death penalty is stipulated for apostasy [59] (which corresponds to an abandonment of Muslim religion), rebellion, insurrection, murder or sometimes adultery [60].

2.2.3. Sanctions for the correction of the offender

The sanctions for correction are left to the judge's discretion. Therefore, he may choose the most appropriate way to apply the penalty depending on the circumstances, the severity of the offense and the personality of the perpetrator. The judge may choose imprisonment, fines or moral sanctions. Moral punishments are warnings (ظعولا), reprimand (خيبوتلا), threat (with punishment) (ديدهتلا) or the perpetrator's public exposure. As these punishments are not defined in the Qur'an and Sunnah, judges have the right to apply more lenient sanctions.[61]

2.2.4. Specific sanctions

Sexuality outside marriage is considered zinā and strictly condemned (hudud).

The term "zinā" can cover both adultery and simple prostitution or acts homosexuality. Penalties range from exile for one year, from 50 to 100 whips, to even stoning.[62] The criteria for proving the crime are, however, very strict (for the most serious sentences, four separate witnesses and four depositions), leading to the enforcement of these sentences very rarely encountered before the 20th century; also the false witness (qadhf) is severely punished (jurists rely on Surah 24, 4, which prescribes 80 whips)[63]. A monetary compensation (equivalent to the dowry that would have been paid) is often accepted.

2.2.5. Adultery

Adultery in Islam for women involves having sex with someone other than the husband[64].

For men, adultery is to have sex with someone other than the wife.

The penalty is exile for one year. Under strict conditions, whipping (from 50 to 100 blows) may be applied, followed by a one-year interdiction. The Qur'an (Surah 24: 2) only refers to whipping [65], hadith-based stoning. For the last two sentences to be executed, it takes four witnesses who must be able to testify that sexual penetration has taken place and, according to most legal-religious schools. The punishment does not apply to the person who refuses the act [66].

According to the Chafite School, if the perpetrator who testified to the deed tries to escape during stoning, he must be allowed to flee Mâiz [67] on the basis of hadith.

2.2.6. Fornication

Fornication in Islam refers to the fact that there are sexual relations between two unmarried persons of opposite sex, the penalty being public flagging if four witnesses can testify that sexual penetration has occurred, and the deed has been admitted four times [68]. In the latter case, the penalty is not applied to the second person if the latter denies the act [69].

2.2.7. Homosexual relations

Men who have homosexual relationships (sodomy) are punished or even executed. Women are not executed (because there is no sexual penetration) but must be morally punished. There are significant differences regarding the penalties to be applied to people who have had a homosexual relationship. They range from a hundred whip blows [70] to the throwing from the highest bridge in the city. This latter punishment is included in law books, but jurists claim that there is no known case of applying this form of punishment.

2.2.8. The apostate

The apostate, the one who renounces Muslim belief, is punished by death in all jurisprudence schools. However, according to the Hanefit ritual, women who give up Muslim religion is not executed, but is imprisoned until she regains her Islamic religion[71].

2.2.9. Blasphemy

Any blasphemy is punished. There is no canon about this, unless it is about a pregnant woman, where the punishment is not the death sentence, but the guilty person is punished by 100 blows.

2.2.10. Piracy

Piracy must be punished by amputation of the hand. To be considered theft, it needs to meet strict conditions[72]: the theft has been committed in secret (as opposed to object theft), it targets a low-value mobile asset (nisab) - the Hanafite school does not, in fact, retain the theft crime if its object is a food product [73]; the stolen object does not belong in part to the "thief" (a soldier who appropriates his pre-war warrant prey before being divided will not be considered a thief);

Aisha, Prophet Mohammed's wife, would have said that the Prophet would have explained that the theft of any object less than 1/4 dinars in value should not be punished[74]. Also, if someone steals from a close relative, the sentence is not enforced.

Punishments according to Malachite and Chafeite rituals: at the first theft, the right hand is cut off, at the second the left leg, at the third the left hand, and finally the right leg [75]. If, despite these facts, the perpetrator is still able to steal and does steal, that perpetrator must be executed.

The punishment according to the Hanafite and Hanbalite rituals: the right hand is cut for the first theft, and if there is a second theft, the left foot is cut off.

2.2.11. Alcohol

It is forbidden for a Muslim to drink, transport, sell, produce or serve alcohol. According to rituals, this condemnation comes from an extension of the ban on consuming wine (present in the Qur'an). Anyone who drinks, transports, sells, produces or serves alcohol is punished by 80 whips. The whipping for this crime is not based on a verse or hadith but was introduced at the request of Mohammed's successors. In principle, whiplash counts cannot exceed 10 unless it is based on a recommendation from Prophet Mohammed, a situation where 100 blows can be applied.

All the offenses and punishments presented seem very strange, if not even barbarian, for the time and the age in which we live, but they have strong historical roots granting them justification and validity in the context of the socio-cultural space in which they apply.

3. Particularities of Criminal Law in the U.S.A.

The United States has by far the highest incarceration rate in the world. According to a Pew Centre study conducted in 2009, one in one hundred American adults is imprisoned and one in forty-five is released. For a European observer, one can identify the hardness of the American criminal system.

For example, for a first conviction, for a minor deed, the defendant sometimes receives a brief period of detention or conditional release. But the magnitude of the sanctions increases considerably if the defendant in indicted in one or more criminal cases, whether on serious facts or not.

For crimes such as drug sale worth $ 15 (10 Euros), they are frequently charged with five to ten years in prison for re-offending. The major problem is that little money is spent on rehabilitating detainees. Many times, their prolonged incarceration is described as long-term "storage". However, we know that a prolonged period of imprisonment prevents reintegration and risks to destabilize detainees or even to make them become more dangerous.

For crimes classified as violent or potentially violent, sentences are the most ruthless. More burglaries can lead to more than a dozen years of imprisonment. Life sentence is regularly imposed in murder cases, regardless of attenuating circumstances, such as the young age of the accused or his or her mental disorder.

The persons convicted for sexual crimes, similar to those for which they accused Dominique Strauss-Kahn, may be closed for decades. They must then register with the sex offenders register, a blacklist that can be accessed by the general public.

With regard to the death penalty, a court ruling made it inapplicable in New York State, despite the opposition of the Republicans.[76]

The difference is, however, that in a country that promotes human rights and equality of opportunity, wealthy people usually escape draconian sentences because of their social status and the provision of good and costly lawyers that not anyone can afford . Harsh punishments are applied to the needy, especially to Blacks and Latinos, but also to many white people in disadvantaged environments, the so-called "profound America" [77].

The large budget allocated for mass incarceration could be used to develop crime prevention programs to improve public schools. Criminal cases are overwhelmingly resolved through agreements between the prosecutor and the accused, in order to obtain a more lenient sentence, especially because the recognition of guilt in front of a jury leads to a greater punishment than if it were "unofficially" punished. Given the severity of the sentences, few defendants take the risk of going to trial.

It is true that serious crimes deserve severe sentences to discourage crime and protect society. In addition, the death penalty - a fundamental violation of human rights - is being enforced in many states, and we may say it is a peculiarity of the American system. Politicians, prosecutors and judges do not pay too much attention to the socio-political and human consequences of such a repressive system [78]. Lawyers claiming that the application of overly long sentences dehumanizes justice are rarely taken seriously.

Political leaders pay little attention to studies showing how their policies are counterproductive and costly. Some Americans, especially the progressive and intellectual, oppose this criminal system, though they do not realize it is a repressive system incomparable with any other democracy.

Delinquency and criminality are social problems that can be easily resolved, but there seems to be little political will in the United States, just like in France to solve such problems [79].

An interesting case is that of Dominique Strauss-Kahn who managed to regain his freedom in return for a $ 1 million deposit. The payment of a $ 1 million deposit for DSK made it possible to ensure that the accused, although free in his moves, will appear at all the hearings he was summoned to. If he does not comply with this obligation to present himself every time he is summoned, he loses the total amount of the deposit. On the other hand, if he respects the agreement imposed by the bail, the deposit is automatically returned to him, regardless of whether he is found guilty or not. In the case of Strauss-Kahn, this obligation also involved a $ 5 million deposit that the defendant has to pay to the court if he does not comply with all the conditions regarding home arrest, bracelet wearing, his apartment monitoring by a guard at his expense [80], etc.

The eighth amendment to the Constitution of the United States declares that "no excessively high bail will be required, neither excessive fines will be imposed, nor unrestrained and brutal punishment will be enforced." The amount of the deposit is fixed by a judge at the first hearing. The magistrate takes into account the nature and circumstances of the case, the accusation brought, the social and family environment, family resources, personality, and criminal record.

In the case of Strauss-Kahn, he himself offered a one-million-dollar deposit. The question is: is this a frequent practice? According to Jean-Eric Branaa, lecturer at University Paris 2, American law specialist, "... this is almost the rule for two reasons: the first is of an economic nature because US prisons are full, the second is based on the presumption of innocence - it will always be preferable to leave an innocent person go free rather than in prison Very rarely have defendants the amounts requested in cash in a short time This is why they can demand bail guarantees called " bonds". The defendant must provide bonds in a guarantee deposit, such as 40% of the cash value of the bail or a property at least equal to the total amount owed. In exchange the guarantor, the issuer of the bonds, submits to the court a contract by which he agrees to pay the guarantee if the defendant does not appear at the hearings. These contracts are largely funded by insurance companies capable of providing the available capital.

A peculiarity in the US criminal law is also the introduction of cultural elements into the trial. The introduction of cultural elements can be done: before the trial, when deciding whether or not the person should be prosecuted; during the trial, in order to eliminate an element of criminal prosecution, to support an established defence, such as consent or provocation, to mitigate the sentence. This type of defence is accessed, among other things, by immigrants charged with serious violence against a woman. An example is the 1984 case of Kong Pheng Moua, who lived in the United States for six years, married Xiong, a woman of the same cultural background she had forced to sexual acts. Xiong then complained to the police and accused him of abduction and rape. In his defence, Moua claimed that they had followed a traditional marriage practice, "marriage of capture" meaning that even if marriage was made by free consent, the woman had to resist to show her virtue to the man. Moua explained that he did not realize that Xiong's resistance was real. The old idea that a woman, saying "no" to a man, actually does not really believe in refusal is still widely accepted in many cultures. Men who are accused of rape frequently invoke the cultural element, but this must also be supported by evidence. They seek to perpetuate the cultural practices that keep their women in a subordinate position.

The court rejected the allegations of rape and kidnapping and retained only the sequestration: Moua was sentenced to 120 days in prison and fined to pay $ 1,000 - State v. Moua, summary of file no. 315972-0.

Feminist organisations objected to this judgment and filed a complaint with the State Judiciary Conduct Commission requesting an investigation[81]. Mr. Yen, Prosecutor Brooklyn Holzman said: "There must be one standard of justice, and it should not depend on the origin of the accused person's culture. It cannot be admitted that the existence of barbarous customs in different parts of the world excuse the criminal behaviour in the US".

[81] A. D. Renteln, The Cultural Defense, op. cit., p. 480;

What is noteworthy is that by invoking certain cultural, traditional, even barbaric practices, a more favourable sentence can be obtained in the circumstances in which the deed can even be murder. An American who kills his wife or boyfriend can successfully use a culture-based defence that can result in a more favourable indictment and a more lenient punishment.

This type of defence is not called "cultural", but it is based on deep-rooted cultural assumptions about what is or is not a reasonable behaviour of two individuals.

The resort to the cultural argument may allow an immigrant who has murdered his wife (Dong Lu Chen, People v. Chen, no 87-7774, Supreme Court, New York County)[82] "in the heat of passion" to get an easier conviction compared to an American for the same deed.

More and more US law no longer treats women as the property of their spouses, and doctrine is no longer worded in terms of "honour": we speak of "passion" or "extreme emotional suffering." But the law did not cease to show indulgence to the deceived husband, who may even kill his wife, since he defends himself by invoking the fact that he was provoked.

The vast majority of US jurisdictions now accept broader definitions of the term provocation: judges are much more attentive when it comes to ruling a homicide verdict and consider a wider range of provocative behaviours

It should be noted that about half of American jurisdictions continue to try in terms of "provocation" and "*passionate fir*e" and that nearly twenty states have abandoned these categories only to replace their terminology with "extremely emotional" (Cynthia Lee, MPC 1962). In addition, the argument of the provocation is not obviously neutral from the point of view of gender, both in its formulas and in its impact. Thus, it is said that the current formulations refer to the male model of a sudden and temporary loss of self-control, in the context of a unique confrontation, limited in time, between two men of more or less equal power.

About 9% of murder cases committed in the United States are committed between partners, that is, as defined by the Department of Justice, between spouses or lovers, past or present. Men represent more than 90% of those arrested for murder (all categories), and nearly three-quarters of the victims of homicide are women.[83] It seems that men have more chances than women to invoke the argument of provocation: according to some authors, "it is difficult to find situations where a woman has benefited from an easier sentence based on this argument after killing her husband or her fiancée " [84]

Victoria Nourse, after fifteen years of jurisprudence involving the categories of "passion fire" and "extreme emotional distress", also shows that the courts have extended the doctrine of provocation to include not only the adultery of the wife, but also the "infidelity of a fiancée dancing with another person, of an ex-girlfriend who dates someone else, of a former wife who started a new relationship a few months after the final divorce trial" [85]. The American courts believe that the victim of this "betrayal" the man, deserves a much higher degree of compassion and indulgence before the law than that for a woman.

In the light of the above, one can argue that „defence through culture" could have the effect of protecting patriarchal practices among minorities and that, even beside this first factor, some more commonly established means of defense in the criminal trial support these practices?

Brian Barry claims: "If it is justified to allow people to respect their norms / cultural traditions, they cannot be barred from the proper exercise of justice, it must be understood that the latter cannot admit the acquittal of those who violate the law, only by using the cultural reason"[86].

It is essential that, in order to offer equal treatment to minority members, one acknowledges the "defence through culture", but this does not imply that those who invoke it are right. One of the roles played by cultural elements in criminal trials is to illustrate the accused's mood by highlighting his origin cultural context which constitutes the context of his actions. But this cultural framework can very well reflect the patriarchal norms, which will be strengthened by the successes achieved in the courts through the defence established on the basis of cultural arguments. The use of these arguments by immigrants, not only in the US but also in the EU, will have the same effect as their use by members of the majority: to favour male violence against women.

All in all, the issue raised by some cases of "defence through culture" refers not only to the norms and practices of minority cultures, but also to those of majority cultures in Western societies. The problem will not be solved by merely rejecting or accepting the defence through culture in its entirety - what is necessary is the re-evaluation of the norms and doctrines of the majority culture. This problem of intercultural resonance and mutual reinforcement of norms between majority and minority cultures is not limited to the problem under scrutiny but is found in many other contexts - beyond the Criminal Law.

4. Particularities of criminal law in Italy

The first criminal code of United Italy was the 1839 Criminal Code of the Kingdom of Sardinia, which was subsequently replaced by the 1859 Criminal Code, extended to the rest of the peninsula after Italy's unification. However, from 1861 to 1889, two separate criminal codes coexisted because Tuscany continued to use its own code (which provided for the abolition of the death penalty in 1859 after it had been reintroduced in 1853). The normative unification took place through the Zanardelli Code, which bears the name of the Minister of Justice, Giuseppe Zanardelli, promulgated on June 30th, 1889 and come into force on January 1st of the following year.

The criminal code currently in force in Italy is the result of a five-year legal process since the promulgation of the law of December 4th 1925, with which the government was delegated to amend the then-valid criminal code (the so-called Zanardelli code) , until October 19th 1930, the day when the new Italian criminal code, technically executed under Manzini, was promulgated, and the Regio Decree of October 19th 1930, no. 1398, published in the Official Gazette of October 26th 1930, no. 251 came into force on July 1st 1931. The Royal Decree of Promulgation contains the signatures of the King of Italy Vittorio Emanuele the Third, the Head of the Government Benito Mussolini and the Minister of Justice Alfredo Rocco; this is why the Criminal Code is called the Rocco Code[87].

Although it has been amended over the years, following the Constitutional Court's judgments, the 1930 code is still in force. Numerous sectoral reforms are often uncoordinated. Numerous study committees have drafted reports and pleaded for the approval a new criminal code, and several political parties criticized the Rocco Code[88]; furthermore, the academic world and legal practitioners have repeatedly expressed their views on the achievement of a modern criminal code that fully respects constitutional principles.

The Code was largely modernized and cleansed by the most authoritarian provisions of fascist origin, which, after the founding of the Republic, proved to be in conflict with the Constitution. This has happened both through partial reforms and by decisions of illegality ruled by the Constitutional Court. However, some important changes have already been made: for example, all death sentences have been abolished.

An organic reform of the criminal code has never been launched. After the fall of fascism, the doctrine of criminal law (Pannain, Delogu, Leone) considered impossible the restoration of the 19th century Zanardelli Code and even opposed a zero-based reform, claiming that the rigorous technical system of the Rocco Code was necessary to immunize it , in the basic aspects. In the following decades, many reforms have taken place, but they have been partial and disconnected from one another without having a unique model. All this led to the loss of the logical consistency and logic of the criminal code.

Decades after the entry into force of the Constitution, the need for a more modern code, inspired not only by constitutional principles, but also by international conventions and the theme of new rights, has been widely felt and the projects have been presented and institutional reforms (commissions of Ministries Pagliaro and Grosso, from 1988 and 2001). The new Code of Criminal Procedure promulgated in 1988 entered into force on October 24th 1989.

A peculiarity of the Italian Criminal Code refers to crimes relating to mafia associations and groups, Art. 416 bis of the Criminal Code and Article 41-bis.

The law in question aims to protect public order, threatened by the use of intimidating force and the subsequent condition of subjugation and conspiracy of the silence that arises from it.

The offense in question is a permanent offense that is consumed when a partnership is actually created that is likely to disrupt public order or when the organisational structure assumes the hazard characteristics.

The Mafia method is outlined on the active side for associates to use the intimidating force arising from the mafia association and, on the passive side, for the situation of subjugation and silence that this intimidating force causes in the community to induce unwanted behaviours, even through the use of real threats or violence.

It is sufficient for the association to enjoy a certain fame of violence, the potential for oppression, to develop a real, concrete and stable power in the community through intimidation. The user of the intimidating force must, however, "use" or at least allow the passive subject to understand that he is a member of the association.

It is important to stress that the danger to public order is given by the very existence of the mafia association, regardless of the purposes it pursues. The association may also have legitimate activities.

The concept of "belonging" to a mafia association, which is relevant to the implementation of preventive measures, includes behaviours that, although it cannot be attributed as "participative", are incorporated into action, with associative purposes, excluding situations of mere contiguity or association to the criminal group.[89]

Article 41-bis refers to a legislative provision of the Italian Republic provided for by the Italian penitentiary system. It is part of the Gozzini Law approved on October 10th 1986 and published in the Official Gazette on October 16th 1986.

The provision was introduced by the Gozzini Law, which amended the Law no. 354 of July 26th 1975, (concerning the Italian penitentiary system) and originally referred only to situations of revolt or other serious emergencies in Italian prisons.

[87] Gazzetta Ufficiale del Regno d'Italia No.251 of 26 Oct.1930, first part;
[88] Critiche al Codice Rocco, Corriere.it, 19 June 2001;
[89] Criminal invalidation, United Section, sentence no. 111 of 4 January 2018;

Following the Capaci massacre of May 23rd 1992, when Giovanni Falcone, his wife and his entire escort lost their lives, one introduced by decree-law no. 306, dated June 8th 1992, (the so-called Martelli-Scotti anti-mafia decree), converted into Law no. 356 of August 7, 1992, a second paragraph of the article, which allowed the Minister of Justice to suspend for serious reasons of public order and public security the treatment rules in the penitentiary for detainees belonging to the criminal organisation of the Mafia. While discussing the extension of the law, Leoluca Bagarella, in a teleconference during a trial in Trapani, reads a statement against article 41-bis, accusing politicians of failing to honour their promises (referring to Totò Riina).

A letter signed by 31 Mafia heads is made public, with some warnings to their lawyers who, after becoming MPs, have forgotten them. Then, an escort is attributed to some of these attorneys, including to Dell'Utri.

In 1995, the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CP) visited the Italian prisons to verify the conditions of detention of persons subject to the regime under Article 41a. In the opinion of the delegation, this particular case of the detention regime was the most difficult of all those taken into account during the inspection. The delegation saw the restrictions as extreme and defined them as inhuman and degrading. Detainees have been deprived of all activity programs and have been found essentially detached from the outside world. The prolonged duration of the restrictions has caused harmful effects that have led to changes in social and mental faculties, often irreversible.

The norm was temporary: its effectiveness was limited to a period of three years after the entry into force of the conversion law. Its effectiveness was extended for the first time until December 31st 1999, the second time until December 31st 2000 and the third time until December 31st 2002. Ten years after the Capaci massacre of May 24th 2002, the Council of Ministers proposed a bill to amend Articles 4-bis and 41-bis which was subsequently approved by the Parliament as Law no. 279 of December 23rd 2002 (the amendment of Articles 4-bis and 41-bis of Law No 354 of July 26th 1975 on prison treatment), abrogating the transitional provision that sanctioned the temporary nature of this discipline and stipulating that the ministerial provision may not be less than one year and may not exceed two years and that subsequent extensions may only have one year each; the heavy prison regime has been extended to those convicted of terrorism and subversion.

The Article 41-bis regime applied for very long periods, even to persons who have not been finally convicted, it is considered by some jurists to be unconstitutional, but so far Constitutional Court rulings (with reference to Article 27 of the Constitution of the Italian Republic) and of the European Court of Human Rights (under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms) confirmed the legitimacy of the provision.

An American judge refused to extradite Mafia head Rosario Gambino in 2007 because, in his opinion, Article 41a would be similar to torture. In 2013, the Constitutional Court declared illegitimate the limitations regarding the talks with the defence attorney.

The regime is applied to prisoners individually and seeks to prevent their communication with outside criminal organisations, the contacts between members of the same criminal organisation in prison and the contacts between members of different criminal organisations, as well as avoiding offenses and guaranteeing public security and order even outside prisons.

5. Particularities of the Chinese Criminal Law

The constitutive elements of the crimes under Chinese law are the same as in French law.

We consider the requirement of a legal element, a material element and an intentional element. The intentional element is of great importance in Chinese criminal law because it determines the classification of crimes.

In China, the notion of public order covers both public orders, as it is conceived by most Western countries, and the protection of socialist ideology.

Public order in the traditional sense of the term is protected in China by incriminating several categories of offenses, including crimes against citizens' personal and democratic rights, crimes against public security, material damage, public order offenses. Certain acts that represent the responsibility of civil liability in EU countries are sanctioned because of the importance given to them in the Chinese tradition.

No provision of the Code penalizes political offenses or crimes of opinion. But the protection of socialist ideology is ensured by the criminalisation of acts affecting the security of the state, repression is promptly made for all actions aimed at overthrowing the socialist system and those related to violations of sovereignty, territorial integrity and security of the People's Republic of China. Articles 102 through 113 of the Criminal Code list are not limited to those acts that include: incitement to desertion, espionage, and incitement of the masses to rebellion. The Chinese Criminal Code punishes various acts that harm the socialist economic order. These include financial fraud, tax and customs fraud, smuggling and infringement of intellectual and industrial property rights.

Certain perfectly legal economic activities in most modern legal systems may be considered to prejudice the socialist economic order. In 1988, a television import contract between a French company in the field and a subsidiary of the Chinese Aviation Ministry was considered a huge fraud affecting the economy. The commercial agent employed by the French company, who received a commission and received a substantial deposit on behalf of his employer, was jailed for smuggling and misappropriation.

He was in a position to receive the death penalty because, being of Chinese nationality, he could not benefit from the preferential treatment of expatriates. The Chinese authorities involved in signing the contract were fired and arrested for smuggling. Criminal liability and the sanctions imposed depend on the personality of the offender and on the seriousness of the deeds.

In China, the age for criminal liability is 16 years. But juveniles under the age of 14 are punished for certain offenses considered to be seriously detrimental to public order, such as intentional homicide, serious injury, drug trafficking, rape etc. The sanctions applied are lower than those prescribed by the law. Like in most legal systems, mental patients who are not aware of the scope of their actions are declared irresponsible.

Similarly, force majeure and self-defence are exonerated from liability.

In any case, Article 3 of the Criminal Code stipulates that unintentional offenses are punished only in the cases provided by the law.

Most unintentional offenses are punished, but sanctions are much more lenient. For example, in case of intentional murder, the punishment is death, life imprisonment or imprisonment for at least 10 years. If mitigating circumstances are used, the penalty ranges from 10 years to 3 years of imprisonment (Article 232 of the Criminal Code). On the other hand, when homicide is involuntary, the penalty ranges from 3 to 7 years of imprisonment. If there are mitigating circumstances, the punishment ranges between 3 years and 6 months of imprisonment (Section 233 and 45 of the Criminal Code). For any offense, the accused may benefit from attenuating circumstances, the main cause of the reduction or even the exemption of punishment in minor offenses being voluntary surrender.

The Chinese Criminal Code provides for five main sanctions and three accessory punishments.

The main sanctions are: (i) release for three to two years of a penalty without imprisonment obligating the convicted person to report on his activities and obtain authorisation for all trips; (ii) detention from one month to six months in a detention facility where the sentenced person is engaged in a remunerated activity; (iii) imprisonment from 6 months to 15 years; (iv) life imprisonment; (v) death penalty that has been enforced since 1982 for economic crimes. People's courts may, in an ancillary manner, rule either a fine or the deprivation from political rights for a period of one to five years, or total or partial confiscation of property.

The judicial system is divided by Article 3 of the Code of Criminal Procedure between the public security bodies responsible for the preparatory investigation and the preventive detention, the People's Prosecutor’s Office that approves the arrest, verifies legality and executes the public action.

The public security body intending to make an arrest must obtain the authorisation of the Tribunal or of the Prosecutor's Office. In case of refusal, it may request a review. It is also the only power at its disposal when the prosecutor's office refuses to initiate criminal proceedings after a preliminary investigation. In case of emergency, the public security body may detain the persons caught or suspected of serious crimes without being authorised to do so. In this case, it must inform the Prosecutor's Office within three days and, if the latter does not authorise the arrest, within three days, the detained person must be released immediately.

Detention during the preliminary investigation may not exceed two months. If the investigation cannot be completed after this period, the Prosecutor's Office may grant an additional period of one month.

This was the case with the aforementioned import contract.

The commercial agent was detained for 12 months without the People's Court having been notified with any charges. A first indictment for misappropriation of funds was handed over to the tribunal after four months of detention. The court rejected it for lack of evidence, a new indictment was filed after three months. Despite the rejection of the second indictment, only a release of "medical guarantee" was obtained 5 months later. This release was made possible by the prisoner's acquisition of French citizenship as a spouse of a French citizen.

The right to defence is supported by the Code of Criminal Procedure; in addition, the law of 2001 and 2008 on the exercise of the profession of lawyer has reaffirmed and strengthened the rights of lawyers in criminal proceedings to ensure their defence for the client.

The criminal proceedings are accusatory, the debate being between the accused, the prosecutor and possibly the civil party. The usual methods of evidence are recognised. Magnetic records, which are very common in China, have probative force even when they were made without the knowledge of the interlocutor.

The presumption of innocence is not recognised by the Code of Criminal Procedure. The defendant's lawyer has the capacity to provide evidence to recognise the defendant’s innocence. In practice, the defendants' lawyers are often appointed by the Tribunal. Their mission is to encourage their "client" to admit the facts in order to facilitate the manifestation of truth and to benefit from the judges’ lenience.

In any case, when the judges deliberate, they have the obligation to communicate the decision to the parties within five days. On the other hand, when the decision is postponed to a subsequent hearing, the copies of the judgment must be sent to the parties immediately. The appeal period applies only after the date of receipt of the ruling.

Despite the relative independence of judges from the prosecutor's office, experience has shown that, as far as economic crimes are concerned, it is difficult for the accused to establish good faith.

Over the last decade, there has been an important debate on crimes against state security, Criminal Law, capital punishment and rights of the defendant in criminal proceedings, which have had all the positive consequences in criminal law. Therefore, it is important to note that the Chinese Criminal Law has considerably evolved and has made much progress; one can only hope that it will meet both the requirements of China's social evolution as well as those of the international context.

The brief presentation of the peculiarities comprised in the Criminal Law of four different legal systems reveals major discrepancies in addressing and treating the same type of crime, the fact that what is allowed in a legal system is severely or even worse sanctioned in another.

CYBERTERRORISM: THE LATEST CRIME AGAINST INTERNATIONAL PUBLIC ORDER

Sandra Sophie-Elise OLĂNESCU[*]
Alexandru Vladimir OLĂNESCU[]

Abstract

Cyberterrorism has become the latest global threat that highlights security leaks in the digital world and its outcomes.

Nowadays economic and social context as well as the advances in the field of information technology facilitated individuals, private entities and governments to become increasingly interconnected through computer structures.

Cyber-attacks have seen an alarming development, and they have been successfully used in paralyzing activities, such as rail, naval and air traffic, being even used by some state entities in military and economic espionage.

Moreover, cyber-attacks have been able to block activities of state institutions, corporations, financial and banking institutions, cross-border trading companies, as well as individuals, viewed as single end users of products or services.

Thus, it would be an understatement to say that cyber terrorism has become a worldwide menace; it is a live global phenomenon that spreads fear whilst being impressively effective in terms of seriousness and widespread damages.

Given the significance of this global negative phenomenon with potential devastating effects, depending on the severity with which it manifests, cyberterrorism has been chosen as the subject matter of this paper.

The aim of the paper is to go into the depth of this global phenomenon, starting from the economic, political, social and technological factors that favored the emergence and hasty development of cyber-terrorism.

Keywords: cyberterrorism, cybercrime, international public order, Internet, victim

1. Introduction

In the current social and economic background and taking into account the progress in the field of information technology, individuals and private and governmental entities, in the course of their current activities, are increasingly interconnected by means of IT structures.

There were many cases when cyberattacks have been able to block the activities of state institutions, corporations, financial and banking institutions, cross-border trading companies, by taking on different proportions on individuals, considered as ut singuli in the capacity of final users of certain products or service.

Furthermore, in 2017, cyberattacks increased alarmingly, being successfully used in activities carried out in order to block transportation means, respectively rail, naval and air traffic, being used by certain state entities in military and economic espionage.

It should be noted that, given their damaging effects, cyberattacks have begun to be preferred even by terrorist organizations in place of classical assaults, with an even greater impact on society, being able to affect a wider range of individuals (natural persons/legal entities) by means of the immediate effect of these types of criminal activities.

Therefore, the protection of the information systems integrity has become, both for the states and for the individuals, a real concern, on the one hand, by the need to provide networks for effective protection of information systems, and, on the other hand, at legislative level, by creating a regulatory framework that includes the widest range of illicit activities in order to prevent and protect information systems from "cybercrime" activities.

2. Cybercrime and cyberterrorism

In order to be classified as cyberterrorism, virtual space activity must have a 'terrorist' component, which means that it must include terror and have a political motivation. Therefore, we have to make the distinction between terrorism that uses information technology as weapon or target and terrorism that simply exploits information technology, this side being the most visible and intensely used at the time being.

At this level, a distinction should be made between cybercrime and cyberterrorism, the essential tiebreak criterion being represented by the "terrorist component".

The notion of "cybercrime" defines all the deeds committed in the area of information technologies, within a certain time period and on a certain criterion. As any social phenomenon, cybercrime represents a system with own properties and functions, distinct from those of the constituent elements in terms of quality.

Although at the international level there is no unanimously accepted legal definition on cyberterrorism, a number of definitions have been formulated at the conventional level, among which we will mention that of the US Federal Bureau of Investigation, which is the most eloquent: cyberterrorism is a phenomenon that is "a premeditated, politically motivated attack against information, computer systems, programs and data which results in violence against noncombatant targets by subnational groups or clandestine agents"[1].

Cybercrime is one of the fastest-evolving branches of the criminal spectrum, given its specificity, namely:

- the speed that perpetrators can exploit in committing cybercrime through internet;
- the comfort these perpetrators can enjoy at the shelter of anonymity in committing a wide range of illicit activities that do not know physical or virtual boundaries;
- the magnitude of the consequences of these unlawful actions and
- the potential benefits that can be gained from the commission of such crimes.

As far as the European Space is concerned, an important step in identifying, qualifying and attaining criminal responsibility for cyberattacks was made by the adoption of the Directive on attacks against information systems ("Directive 2013/40/EU") in 2013, establishing minimal rules on the definition of criminal offences and penalties in the field of the attacks against information systems and providing operational measures to improve cooperation between authorities.

Although Directive 2013/40/EU has led to significant progress in terms of the criminalization of cyberattacks at a comparable level in all Member States, the improvement of the way it is implemented by the national transposition regulations is possible by updating them with the continuous evolution of the cybercrime, this process being certainly achievable with the assistance of the European Commission (the "Commission").

Directive 2013/40/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of August 12th, 2013 on attacks against information systems and replacing Council Framework Decision 2005/222/JHA of the Council, published in the Official Journal of the European Union L 218/8 of August 14th, 2013.

Furthermore, as of 2018, the Commission has been adopting concrete proposals to facilitate rapid cross-border access to electronic evidence, nowadays practical measures being taken to improve cross-border access to electronic evidence for criminal investigations, including the financing for training on cross-border cooperation, the development of an electronic platform for the exchange of information within the European Union and the standardization of forms of judicial cooperation between Member States (Joint Communication to the European Parliament and the Council: Resilience, Deterrence and Defence: Building strong cybersecurity for the EU[2].

At the international level, according to INTERPOL, cybercrime can be classified into two major categories of cybercrimes, namely:

- Advanced cybercrime (or high-tech crime) – sophisticated attacks against computer hardware and software;
- Cyber-enabled crimes – many "traditional" crimes have taken a new turn with the advent of the Internet, such as crimes against children, financial crimes, theft, fraud, illegal games, sale of counterfeit medicines and even terrorism.

According to the INTERPOL data, cybercrimes have seen an impressive evolution, their authors changing their profile with the evolution of the crimes: from individuals or small groups, cybercrimes are nowadays committed by complex cybercriminal networks bringing together individuals from across the globe in real time to commit crimes on an unprecedented scale. Such organized criminal groups use increasingly the internet as a means to facilitate their activities and to maximize profit in the shortest time possible[3].

Most importantly, cybercrime is characterized by internationality and a rapid evolution, both at the organizational level in what concerns the perpetrators and at the level of crimes complexity, leading to worsening the consequences resulting from the commission of such crimes, therefore, the security of IT networks and systems appears to be a necessity for any of the "potential victims".

3. Relevant international documents on cyberterrorism

Foremost, the Resolution 2133 (2014) adopted by the United Nations Security Council within its 7101st meeting of January 27th, 2014 is one of the most important text to have ever been drafted on cyberterrorism. This document refers to the general phenomenon of terrorism, including the manifestation of cyberterrorism, as follows: "reaffirming that terrorism in all forms and manifestations constitutes one of the most serious threats to international peace and security and that any acts of terrorism are criminal and unjustifiable regardless of their motivations, whenever and by whomsoever committed and further reaffirming the need to combat by all means, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts". It also reveals, among other things, that: it "reaffirms its resolution 1373 (2001) and in particular its decisions that all States shall prevent and suppress the financing of terrorist acts and refrain from providing any form of support, active or passive, to entities or persons involved in terrorist acts, including by suppressing recruitment of member of terrorist groups and eliminating the supply of weapons to terrorists."

Another significant document is the Report that the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) published in 2012, in Vienna. This Document aimed at helping and advising countries in the fight against 'terrorists' using Internet (cyberterrorism) to plan attacks, to recruit and to make propaganda.

In respect of cyberterrorism as a Psychological Weapon in Modern War, Army corps general Fabio MINI, former commander of the General Staff of UN Command for South Europe, coordinator of Comando Interforce for Balkan operations, commander of UN peace operations in Kosovo-KFOR stated that: "The war has changed, we can no longer be tributaries of the concept of traditional war when they shot each other. The war has changed not only because the people directly involved in this process and those collaterally interested are numerous, but especially because control systems are multiple: we no longer refer to traditional weapons, but to a multitudine of other types of weapons. A fundamental weapon of the modern war is the PSYCHOLOGICAL WEAPON, the weapon of influence being exerted on all and by all means, especially by computer, IT means […]. In 45 years of career, working all around the world, I have seen a lot of aspects that cannot even be described […]"[4].

4. The notion of cyberterrorism

The concept / notion of cyberterrorism was certified for the first time in November 1794;

Initially, it defines the "doctrine des partisans de la Terreur", the doctrine of partisans of terror, representing the exercise of power by means of intense and violent struggle against those who acted and manifested against the revolutionaries – the French Revolution. It was a way of exercising power, not a way of acting against it, as defined today.

The term evolved during the nineteenth century and currently defines not a state action (the revolutionary state), but an action against it (terrorism). Its use, in anti-governmental respect, is attested in 1866 in Ireland and in 1883 in Russia (the nihilist movement-doctrine or attitude, based on denying all values, beliefs and opinions.

As François-Bernard Huyghe stated, "Terrorism, in a modern sense, is born simultaneously with the emergence of current media institutions"[5].

"Criminal acts of political or other purposes intended or calculated to provoke a state of terror in the general public, from a group of persons, regardless of the reasons behind such political, philosophical, ideological, racial, ethnic, religious or any other kind are unjustifiable and condemnable" (the United Nations).

4.1. Cyberterrorism – definition

"Cyberterrorism" is a controversial term, which is difficult to be defined, especially due to the lack of clear clarifications on terrorism itself.

Certain authors define it as being "the multitude of attacks against information systems in order to destroy them and to generate a state of alarm and panic". According to this limited definition, "it is difficult to identify all actions and activities of cyberterrorism".

As Kevin G. Coleman (The Technolytics Institute, article 6/23/2017) detailed, "Premeditated actions / activities aimed at destabilizing information media / systems, with the intention of causing social, ideological, religious, political or any other kind of damage, with the ultimate goal of intimidating individuals or a group of individuals in order to force them or other groups / groups of individuals; to act / react in a certain sense".

5. Cyberterrorism – the context of occurrence

The issue of cyberterrorism actually came into being with the events of September 11th, 2001, when the US administration announced it would implement a new defense strategy.

One month after the events of September 11th, 2011, US President George W. Bush signed The Patriot Act, (i.e. "Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001"), the first global document that provides for legislation on terrorist activities[6].

The Patriot Act is an exceptional law the provisions of which initially extended for 4 (four) years. In July 2005, The American Congress permanently endorsed 14 of the 16 provisions.

After a long dispute, the American Congress, during the winter of 2005-2006, permanently endorsed most of the tasks assigned to the police and security forces.

Briefly, The USA Patriot Act:

- strengthens the power of government agencies– FBI, CIA, NSA and the army, thus reducing the right of defense;
- introduces the status of 'enemy combatant' and "illegal combatant";
- provides that any kind of intervention within an information system can be assimilated to a terrorist act;
- authorizes FBI to intercept all electronic messages and to preserve any trace of web navigation of persons suspected of terrorism or of contact with a person suspected of terrorism;

- authorizes the phone interception of any person suspect of having close or distant links with a person suspected of terrorism. In August 2006, a federal judge found the inconvenience of telephone interceptions and ordered the cancellation of the secret interception program run by the National Security Agency (NSA).

Under these circumstances, associations for the protection of human rights started strong advertising campaigns on the consequences of the US Patriot Act, such as: attenuation of the right to defense or the violation of the right to privacy by authorizing electronic interceptions of any kind and telephone interceptions. They draw the attention on the risk of the agencies to interfere in the act of justice.

"The problem is that all these derogatory procedures introduced in the name of the fight against terrorism have ended up by becoming rules. If they prove to be effective in combating this monster, which is the terrorism, therefore being used to fight against it in several areas, they have ended up contaminating the whole criminal law"[7].

6. European Regulation. VIGIPIRATE

Starting with 2002, the European Union starts to issue framework decisions "inviting" Member States to adjust national legislation to the concept of prevention and fighting against terrorism.

For example, France adopted the VIGIPIRATE – an anti-terrorism plan drawn up in 1978 after the attack of Orly, of May 20th, 1978, and the taking of hostages at the Embassy of Iraq in Paris. The plan was completely rebuilt after the events of September 11th, 2001 and is continuously maintained at red level after the attacks of London.

VIGIPIRATE is a set of measures applied in any context and circumstances: "…even in the absence of precise threat signals".

In 2007, the latest version of VIGIPIRATE plan was released, founded on a clear principle: "terrorist threat must be considered permanent". This instrument was updated in 2016.

In 2006, the Law on combating terrorism (LCT) presented by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of France, based on the articles of The USA Patriot Act, widen the obligation to preserve traffic data, even in case of 'cybercafés'[8]

The law allows intelligence services operating in the field of preventing and combating terrorism to obtain access to the control of the information media – electronic surveillance – in the lack of a judicial authorization.

The surveillance on the internet is thus placed outside the judicial control.

VIGIPIRATE represented the source of inspiration for the European legislation in the field.

The amendments of 2014: widen the area of the operators involved – territorial communities and economic operators; decodes part of the plan of measures; restores the action plan[9].

7. Regulations on prevention and combating terrorism in Romania

Terrorism offences are regulated, in the Romanian criminal law, by Law no. 535/2004 on the prevention and combating terrorism.

Such provisions are included in the current Criminal Code, in Title IV, as being the offences "committed for the purpose of seriously disrupting public order, by intimidation, by terror or by creating a state of panic".

As far as cyber space and its reference relations are concerned, the Romanian legislator did not at any time question the existence of terrorist actions.

The computer and the cyber media are considered by the lawmaker as simple instruments by which terrorist offences and acts can be committed.

The amendments of 2018 of Law no. 535/2004 refer to, inter alia, the notion of terroism: "Terrorism is the ensemble of actions and/or threats that represent a public danger affect life, body integrity or human health, the ensemble of social relations, material factors, international relations of the states, national or international security, are politically, religiously or ideologically motivated and are committed for one of the following purposes: intimidating population or a segment of it, by producing a strong psychological impact, compelling a public authority or international organization to fulfill, not to fulfill or to refrain from the fulfillment of certain act, serious destabilization or destruction of fundamental political, constitutional, economic or social structures of a state or international organization".

Terrorist propaganda materials are defined as follows: "any material on hard copy, on audio, video media or other information data, as well as any other form of expression that makes the apology of terrorism or exposes or promotes ideas, concepts, doctrines or attitudes to support and promote terrorism or terrorism entity".

The legislator provides the offences which are taken into account in this field, as follows:

a) the offences of homicide, second degree murder and first-degree murder, bodily injury and serious bodily injury, as well as illegal deprivation of freedom, all provided by the Criminal Code;
b) the offences provided by art. 106-109 of Government Ordinance no. 29/1997 on the Aerial Code, republished;
c) the offences of destruction provided by the Criminal Code;
d) the offences of non-observance of the regime of arm and ammunition, non-observance of the regime of nuclear materials and other radioactive matters, and of non-observance of the regime of explosives, provided by the Criminal Code;
e) production, acquisition, possession, transportation, supply or transfer to other persons, directly or indirectly, chemicals or biological arms, and research in this field or development of such arms;
f) introducing or spreading into the atmosphere, on the soil, into the subsoil, or into water, products, substances, materials, micro-organisms or toxins that are likely to jeopardize the health of persons or animals or the environment;
g) threatening with the commission of the acts in a)-f).

Other offences are provided by Articles 33-39 of the same law – offences assimilated with terrorist acts (Article 33), acts of terrorism committed on the board of ships or aircraft (Article 34), the deed of a person who leads a terrorist entity (Article 35), making available to a terrorist entity movable or immovable assets (Article 36), terrorist threats (Article 37) and terrorist alarming (Article 38), the administration of the assets belonging to a terrorist entity (Article 39).

8. Cyber Space Attacks

The main actions performed by ISIS, Al Qaeda and Hamas groups were mainly focused on propaganda, fundraising by cryptocurrency, as well as recruiting by social media and messaging applications (especially those protected by cryptography, such as Telegram);

If we analyze ISIS groups, these activities are declining, especially after the loss of 'capital' Raqqa in Syria. Nevertheless, despite the forced abandonment of their neuralgic center for the production of information materials for propaganda purposes, the external communication of 'black flags' was not completely disrupted, because of cells dispersion and their renewed autonomy allowed the maintenance of an operational continuity.

By analyzing action methods: propaganda, fundraising and recruiting, these are activities generally addressed to a mass audience and are therefore transmitted through the social media.

Nevertheless, Deep Web and Dark Web are spaces where certain actions are performed, such as such as the sale of arms – as in case of the attacks of Paris, in 2015.

Military equipment and materials pose a limited risk of being intercepted by the authorities on the internet. Jihadist terrorism, mentioned in the annual report of TIC presented by Eitan Azani, Deputy Executive Manager of the International Institute for Combating Terrorism, uses fundraising activities by means of cryptocurrency that guarantees the anonymity of the payer.

Several campaigns, such as Jahezona, of the Akhbar al-Muslim site or of Aaaq Foundation, remain alive and contribute to maintaining the work of the Islamic State.

The Isis-coins.com website invites users to change circulant currency on the territory of the caliphate – now dismantled – into virtual currency.

The existence of encrypted messaging applications facilitates communication: in addition to classical applications, some programmers who support Jihadists developed an encryption program called 'Muslim crypt', distributed by Telegram MuslimTech channel.

As far as the propaganda carried out in the social media is concerned, ISIS is committed to teach militants to protect online identity, as Bahaa Nasr, the manager of Lebanese project Cyber Arab explains.

The Justpaste.it platform provides manuals of the Caliphate in order to use Vpn (such as: http://justpaste.it/2ip); or advice collection on information security, from browser navigation to mobile phone (such as: http://justpaste.it/itt3).

The Global Islamic Media website uses source instruments and "Islamize" them: among them, an encrypted messaging program with Arabic and English tutorials.

ISIS has been lately focused on software and encryption programs for Android and Symbian that encrypts files, text messages, and emails.

Scott Terban, expert in cyber security and terrorism declared for 'Il Espresso' that: "Besides classical propaganda, the main IT activity of ISIS is to personalize such programs (encryption). Malware Hunters of Citizen Lab of the University of Toronto found in December evidence of the software delivered by e-mail to the anti-ISIS Syrian activists behind site «Raqqah is Slaughtered Silently». The program, if downloaded as a harmless attachment, can locate the victim. It is a rudimentary instrument, not as sophisticated as the one used by the pro-Assad Syrians (who have violated «Le Monde» Twitter profile by exploiting OpFrance visibility, but that are not part of the cyber jihad). ISIS is, therefore, the number one suspect".

In June 2017, hundreds of thousands of computers of Europe, America and Asia were hit by one of the most aggressive cyberattacks in history, performed by one of the most advanced malware programs ever created.

The scope of the hackers was above all the networks and systems of the medium and large companies including TNT, Reckit-Benkiser, Maersk and others. Hackers hit victim devices by using a redemption program, a program that, after infecting target computers, delete the entire content, unless the owner agrees to pay a redemption.

According to estimations, NotPetya (the name of the ransomware), costed companies more than EUR 1 billion, including the amounts paid and the damages caused to the production activities. NotPetya expands by exploiting a vulnerability in Windows operating systems: according to the investigations performed by ESET, the antivirus software manufacturer, the attack started in MEDoc servers, a program extended in Ukraine for the management of tax payments.

9. Forecasts

Ariel Levanon, vice-president of Cyber & Intelligence group stated that "The challenge of Western intelligence agencies is not only to find terrorists, but to fully understand their capacity and motivation. Performing cyberattacks and transmitting messages over the Internet will, in fact, become more and more simple, with the increase in digitization of every aspect of life. At the same time, it will be more and more difficult to ensure the protection of the cyber space. It is expected that in the next five years, terrorist attacks in Western countries take place against the transport system and it is expected that an IT component support these attacks. There are no realistic solutions that do not take much time. It is essential to protect the information ecosystem by legal regulations, by the involvement of private companies, but above all, by teaching these problems in school".

According to computer security experts, ransomware is one of the fastest cyberattacks to be multiplied in the future.

The European Union, by Directive 541/ 2017, included attacks against information systems in the category of "terrorism offences", by adopting a third legislative approach.

ANALYSIS OF THE INCREASING ROLE OF NGOS IN INTERNATIONAL PUBLIC LAW

Patricia Casandra PAPUC

Abstract

In this paper we offer an analysis of the increasing role of NGOs in international public law and assess whether NGOs can be considered subjects of international law.

We give a brief overview of how modern NGOs came into being in the 19th century, and how they gained prominence on the world stage with the growth of international public law in the 20th.

Using the examples of Interpol and the International Federation of the Red Cross, we give our view on the debate concerning whether these as NGOs can be considered subjects of international law.

As we subscribe to the definition of professor Besteliu that NGOs must be a creation of „legal personalit[ies] registered in the domestic legal order of a state" we come to the conclusion that, although the importance of NGOs has grown tremendously in an international legal context, currently no NGO can be subject of international law.

Keywords: NGOs, international public law, United Nations, Interpol, International Federation of the Red Cross

1. Introduction

As Non-Governmental Organisations (NGOs) are growing in size and scope around the world, so is the academic interest on the area. Within the legal field of studies, and in particular that of international public law, this leads to some interesting questions and debates addressing the role NGOs are playing in this context.

The purpose of this paper is to offer an analysis of the increasing role NGOs take on in international public law. We will offer this analysis by giving a brief overview of how NGOs have been incorporated as actors on the international scene. Furthermore, we will explore the extent of this incorporation by answering the question: can NGOs be considered subjects of international law?

In order to do this, we will look at the origin of NGOs and try to offer a definition of NGOs before analysing how NGOs and international public law have grown alongside each other throughout the 20th century, looking to the creation of the League of Nations and the United Nations.

Finally, we will weigh in on the debate on whether NGOs can ever be considered subjects of international law. Currently, some scholars argue that Interpol and the International Federation of the Red Cross are examples of this. However, in this paper we will argue that this is not the case since NGOs can only be indirect contributors to the creation of new norms and not to any actual law.

2. The historical context that led to the establishment of NGOs

Entities resembling what today would be considered NGOs have always existed in one form or another because people have always been part of associations designed to support different ideals, whether they are social, political or economic.

Because of this we cannot know for sure exactly when the first non-governmental organisation was formed, but what we do know is that NGOs became known in the middle of the 19th century.

According to Szazi Eduard (NGOs: first known NGOs are from the 19th century. One fought against slavery (The Anti Slavery Society) and another fought for the right to life (The International Committee of the Red Cross).

NGOs had an important role also in creating international public law, for example the NGOs that did lobbying for the creation of the Institute of International Law[1].

The Institute of International Law also promoted the creation of an Arbitration Court which advised countries on signing numerous treaties, among which we can mention the Hague Peace Conferences.[2]

The Peace Conferences in The Hague were perfect occasions for NGOs to lobby in order to support

* Phd Candidate in International Public Law, President of the NGO Issues Without Borders (https://www.issueswithoutborders.org/) and Scrum Master at EON Romania(e-mail: patricia_papuc@yahoo.com)

[1] The Institute of International Law was founded in Gent, on the 8th of September 1973 by eleven famous lawyers. The institute is a learning platform and the mission of this platform is to promote the progress of international law. The Institute was also offered the Nobel Prize for Peace. More informations can be consulted here: http://www.idi-iil.org/en/

[2] The Peace Conferences from the Hague (1899 and 1907) represent a number of treaties and international declarations which were signed during the two peace conferences. Together with the Geneva Conventions , the Hague Conventions represent the first treaties that explain the rules of how to conduct war and war crimes are forbidden for the first time in history. More informations can be seen here: https://www.britannica.com/event/Hague-Conventions their causes; lobbying still being one of the main tools that NGO use in order to accomplish their mission.

A very important moment for NGOs in international law is the moment when the League of Nations was created.

NGOs have collaborated with the League of Nations in various fields such as: education, refugees, minority issues, finances and many more.

In the 20th century, NGO have also had a contribution in drafting important international conventions, from human rights, to the environment and many others.

The most important moment for NGOs was the moment when they were formally recognised by the United Nations. Article 71 of the UN Charter mentions that: „The Economic and Social Council may make suitable arrangements for consultation with non-governmental organizations which are concerned with matters within its competence. Such arrangements may be made with international organizations and, where appropriate, with national organizations after consultation with the Member of the United Nations concerned."

An interesting fact is that in the preliminary version of the UN Charter there was no provision describing the collaboration between the UN and private entities, but the lobbying groups insisted so much on this provision that it was finally included during the San Francisco Conference where the UN Charter was signed.

As a consequence of this, the NGO concept started becoming used by the UN and from the 1970s it became a concept used and known at a global level.

However, even if the NGO concept is used at a global level, there is still no universal definition of it.

So in the next part of the article we plan to present the most important definitions that have been given to NGOs in time and we will also try to give our own definition of the concept.

3. Attempts to define NGOs

Throughout history there have been many attempts to define NGOs.

The Encyclopaedia of Public International Law defines the NGO as: „a private organisation not established by a government or intergovernmental agreement, which are capable of playing a role in international affairs by virtue of their activities, and whose members enjoy independent voting rights"[3]

In Stromquist's opinion, NGOs: „do not belong to state structures, they are voluntary organisations that belong to civil society which operate in the field of services for groups or disadvantaged group of people socially speaking, for the implementation of programs aimed at consolidating local communities and promoting sustainable development in collaboration with the state or other entities".[4]

On the other hand, P. Wahl defines NGOs as: „voluntary associations, independent from the state and from political parties, charitable and non profit, which accept members regardless of race, ethnicity, religion and sex"[5]

The International Law Dictionary defines an NGO as a „private international organization that serves as a mechanism for cooperation among private national groups in international affairs"[6]

The World Bank defines NGOs as: "private organizations that pursue activities to relieve suffering, promote the interests of the poor, protect the environment, provide basic social services, or undertake community development"[7]

NGOs are defined from a sociological perspective as: "self-governing, private, not-for-profit organizations that are geared toward improving the quality of life of disadvantaged people. They are neither part of government nor controlled by a public body".[8]

As we already mentioned it is very difficult to give a definition to NGOs. But there are some characteristics of what NGOs cannot be. For example NGOs cannot be criminal organisations.

Lester Salamon and Helmut Anheier mentioned 7 criteria to define NGOs in their paper: „ Social Origins of Civil Society"[9]:

- Institutionalise
- State separation
- Non distribution of profit
- Autonomy

According to professor Besteliu, an international non-govermental organisation can be defined as: „ an international association created by a private or a mixed initiative, groups of natural or legal persons with different nationalities, which has a legal personality registered in the domestic legal order of a state and which does not pursue lucrative goals".[10]

We subscribe to the definition given by professor Besteliu. Furthermore, we would also add the 7 criteria described above by Salamon. In our opinion, the members of an NGO must also have the same goal in mind.

4. NGOs in the UN system

NGOs have been playing a key role in the UN system for some time now.

We now plan to present the most relevant legal documents that describe the role of NGOs in the UN system.

The first document which created a formal structure between the United Nations and NGOs was article 71 from the UN Charter.

4.1. Article 71 from the UN Charter

Article 71 of the United Nations Charter: „The Economic and Social Council may make suitable arrangements for consultation with non-governmental organizations… Such arrangements may be made with international organizations and, where appropriate, with national organizations after consultation with the Member of the United Nations concerned."

Even if also during the League of Nations NGOs were consulting the member states of this organisation, still the introduction of article 71 in the UN Charter represents a very important step in our opinion. It is the first multilateral treaty where the international community recognises the importance of NGOs in international relations.

4.2. ECOSOC Resolution 1296/1968

From the preamble of the ECOSOC Resolution 1296 the UN makes its intention of growing its partnership with NGOs clear: „Recognising that arrangements for consultation with non-governmental organisations provide an important means of furthering the purposes and principles of the United Nations, Considering that consultations between the Council and its subsidiary organs and the non-governmental organisations should be developed to the fullest practicable extent".[11]

According to this ECOSOC Resolution, the role of NGOs can be divided into three categories:

a) NGOs which are covering part of the activities conducted by ECOSOC;
b) NGOs which have a special mandate and which are only interested in some activities conducted by ECOSOC, where they can have relevant contributions;
c) NGOs that are in the roster system; these types of NGOs can be consulted ad hoc.

4.3. ECOSOC Resolution 1996/3

This ECOSOC Resolution defines NGOs as: „any international organisation not established by a governmental entity or by an intergovernmental agreement." [12]

The ECOSOC Resolution 1996/31 explains the types of consultations that exist between NGOs and the UN: the general consultative status, the social consultative status and including the NGOs in the roster. What is then the difference between them?

The first category refers to the general consultative status. This type of status applies to big NGOs, which have various activities regulated by ECOSOC.

The second category refers to special consultative status. This type of status only applies to NGOs that have some skills, in some of the activities which are regulated by ECOSOC.

The third category refers to including NGOs in the UN roster. The NGOs which are included in the roster can have occasional contributions to the work conducted by ECOSOC.

5. The role of NGOs in international law

The role of NGOs is becoming more and more important in international law. According to Charnovitz from Yale University „This is especially true in environmental affairs where NGOs regularly take part in multilateral conferences and monitor the implementation of treaties".[13]

The importance is also recognised in the 1993 Vienna Declaration which stresses „the important role of NGOs in the promotion of all human rights and in humanitarian activities at national, regional and international levels […] to the promotion and protection of all human rights and fundamental freedoms"[14]

The lobbying activities by NGOs have increased in the last 20 years within the UN system. We can give examples such as The Rio Declaration on Environment and Development,[15] World Conference on Human Rights,[16] World Conference on Women,[17] United Nations Conference on Human Settlements,[18] The Fourth Conference on Landmines,[19] and World Summit on Sustainable Development.[20]

Furthermore, the Cardoso Report [21] reiterates the importance of the partnership between the UN and NGOs. There are voices who claim that NGOs have to be included in the daily activity conducted by the General Assembly but also other important events.

The Cardoso Report also mentions the importance of involving civil society more in the General Assembly and the Security Council.

Because our aim in this paper is to emphasise the increasing role of NGOs in international public law, in the next part of the paper we plan to present the Red Cross and the Interpol.

Both the Interpol and the Red Cross are considered by some to be subjects of international law, together with states and intergovernmental organisations. We do not agree with this argument but we do consider that these NGOs represent the best examples of NGOs which help develop international law.

5.1. Interpol

The status of Interpol as an NGO is disputed within the academic community. The debate centres around the membership structure of the organisation; while some treat Interpol as an intergovernmental organisation, others argue that it is a non-governmental organisation because its members are official police bodies (which are public legal persons of national law) and not states directly (public legal persons of international law). For the purposes of this paper, we subscribe to the view that Interpol is an NGO for this reason.[22]

Interpol's role is to facilitate the work conducted by police forces across the globe. In order to achieve this, Interpol has a complex infrastructure.

The mission of Interpol is to connect police departments from across the globe and help them communicate and share information in the most efficient way possible. Interpol's motto reads: „Connect the police for a safer world".[23]

As we said before, Interpol is considered by some as a subject of international law. It is considered a subject of international law because it ensures mutual assistance between all the authorities working in criminal law, and which are creating a new criminal law framework across the globe.

Interpol could not function without the protection given by international law. Its daily activities are conducted under the framework of its constitution, a legal document which was agreed upon by the founding states in 1956 and which has binding force.

Interpol's constitution defines its scope, objects and reiterates the importance of police cooperation across the globe.

The constitution also defines and explains the structure of the organisation, its budget and its partnership with other organisations, focusing also on the respect for the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Because the respect for human rights is such an important thing for the Interpol, it collaborates frequently with other international criminal tribunals in order to process the data of people in the most lawful way possible.

Furthermore, the Interpol also collaborates with other entities in order to achieve its mission. We can give the example of the United Nations or the European Union, not to mention the help offered by the signatory sates, which signed among themselves different documents meant to facilitate the trade of sensitive information.

Without this support the Interpol could never accomplish its mandate.

Also, according to its constitution, the Interpol can sign international agreements on its own behalf; this right has been used by the organisation in the past.

However, even if the Interpol is contributing to the creation of international public law norms, due to the structure already described, we do not consider this sufficient for the organisation to be a subject of international law.

5.2. The International Federation of the Red Cross

The International Federation of the Red Cross is an independent and neutral organisation which offers assistance to victims of arm conflicts as well as other types of violence.

The International Federation of the Red Cross is formed by the Red Cross and the Red Crescent and its members consist of national Red Cross societies.

The International Federation of the Red Cross is regulated through the Geneva Conventions from 1949, the Geneva Protocols and the Statute of the organisation.

The main activities of this organisation are to organise humanitarian actions meant to respond to different emergencies across the globe, while respecting international humanitarian law.

6. Conclusion

NGOs started getting prominence in the 19th century with the establishment of recognised civil society groups fighting for causes such as the abolition of slavery and, noticeably, the international Red Cross movement.

With the introduction of intergovernmental organisations in the 20th century (most importantly the League of Nations followed by the United Nations) and, as a consequence, of modern international law, NGOs started enjoying special status under these new legal frameworks. In 1945 the UN Charter became the first official document to recognise NGOs in an international context.

However, the definition of an NGO to this day is still not clear, with various definitions are used for different purposes. Core to the argument we use in this paper is that NGOs are a construct of legal personalities of national law which is what separates them from intergovernmental organisations.

As we have seen in this paper, the closest definition of NGOs as established in international law comes from the ECOSOC Resolutions. However, this definition only works by way of exclusion („no governmental entity or intergovernmental agreement") and does thus not offer a definition as such, but it relates nicely to our argument that NGOs are separated from intergovernmental organisations on these exact terms.

The ECOSOC Resolutions also identify the different ways in which NGOs can enter into partnership with UN agencies and thus play an important part in the increasing role of NGOs in international public law.

This leads to the discussions we have addressed as to how big a role NGOs play in international public law and more specifically: if NGOs can now be considered subjects of international public law. In this context, some scholars have argued that two NGOs specifically present an example of this, namely the International Federation of the Red Cross and Interpol.

However, as we have argued in this paper, we do not share this view as subjects of international law must be a construct of legal personalities of international law, and both Interpol and the Red Cross are per definition not. And seeing as these two are the most prominent examples of NGOs which by some are considered subjects of international law, we can conclude that, according to the arguments we put forward in this paper – and although NGOs have enjoyed an increasingly special status within international law for several centuries now – NGOs can still not be considered subjects of international law.

Further research in this topic would monitor future legal developments in the area of NGO mandates and compositions, as well as changes to the creation of international public law.

THE REALIZATION OF THE FUNDAMENTAL GUARANTEES RIGHTS, A CONSEQUENCE FOR ENSURING OF A GOOD ADMINISTRATION - SELECTIVE ASPECTS

Cătălin-Radu PAVEL[*]

Abstract

The aim of the present study is to analyse the realization of the fundamental guarantees rights as a consequence for ensuring of a good administration. The objectives of this study were to analyse the fundamental guarantees rights: the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, the petition right and the correlation with ensuring of a good administration. In this research we have highlighted the importance of granting the two fundamental rights, named in the doctrine guarantees rights and the contribution to the developing of a good administration of the state in the favour of the citizens, bringing value to the citizens in a democratic state.

Keywords: fundamental rights, guarantees rights, petition right, the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, good administration

1. Introduction

The purpose of this study is to analyse some selective aspects referring to the realisation of the fundamental rights that are guarantees as a consequence of ensuring good administration.

The study is structured as follows: several selective aspects have been analysed with regard to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, the right of petition and the correlation with ensuring good administration.

The subject matter is important because ensuring the good administration of the state to the benefit of its citizens brings value for citizens in a democratic state.

The present paper intended to approach the subject matter with an analysis of the importance of granting the two fundamental rights, named in the doctrine guarantees rights.

As regards the relation between this paper and the already existent specialized literature, the analyses conducted so far have dealt less frequently with the topic approached here, which is the analysis of the guarantees rights and the correlation with ensuring good administration.

2. The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority provides the constitutional guarantees for any citizen who, having been aggrieved with regard to his rights or a legitimate interest by a Romanian public authority, irrespective of the authority concerned, through an administrative act or by the non-settlement of a request within the term provided by law, may request and is granted legal protection through his fundamental right to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the act and the reparation of damage.

The citizen is granted equal constitutional protection for prejudices caused by miscarriages of justice. Therefore, a person aggrieved through miscarriages of justice has the right to take action against the state in order to be compensated for the damage suffered. The magistrates who acted in bad faith or serious neglect in the course of their duties are in turn liable in relation to the state for the damage caused to aggrieved persons.

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, "granted by Article 52 of the fundamental law of Romania, together with the right of petition, previously analysed by this study, form the class of rights that are guarantees".[1]

The rights-guarantees ensure the protection of the manifestations of citizens' will in relation to public authorities and also of other rights, freedoms and citizen interests, thus ensuring the good administration of the state to the benefit of its citizens.

In the Constitution of Romania, the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority was brought under regulation by Article 52: (1) A person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest, by a public authority, through an administrative deed or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law, is entitled to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage. (2) The conditions and limitations related to the exercise of this right are provided for by an organic law. (3) The State has patrimonial liability for any damage caused by miscarriages of justice. The liability of the State is determined under the law and does not eliminate the liability of the magistrates who acted in bad faith or serious neglect."

In our opinion, the legal protection of the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority is provided through the right of free access to justice granted by Article 21 of the Constitution of Romania.

The guarantees of a person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest have been governed by an organic law, namely the Romanian Law of Administrative Dispute 554/2004[2].

A doctrine author[3] stated with regard to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority that "the category of jurisdictional guarantees which protect the citizen against public authorities, whichever they might be, may include the right of a person aggrieved by such an authority through an administrative deed."[4]

Another author[5] showed that "for a definition of the concept of "fundamental rights", the following have been considered: (a) the fundamental rights are subjective rights of the citizens; b) these subjective rights are essential to citizens' life, freedom and dignity, and indispensable to the free development of human personality; c) the fundamental rights are established by the Constitution and granted by the Constitution and by the laws."

With regard to the institution of administrative dispute, our opinion is that it "represents the citizen's guarantee, granted by the state to restrain any possible abuses by the public authorities for protecting the citizens' rights and freedoms."[6]

Examining an exception of unconstitutionality, the Constitutional Court of Romania found that, according to Article 52 of the Constitution, "a person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest, by a public authority, through an administrative deed or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law, is entitled to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage. In the opinion of the Court, this constitutional text should be correlated with the constitutional provisions of Article 21, which govern the free access to justice and those of Article 126 para. (6) first sentence, according to which, the judicial review of the administrative deeds of public authorities, by means of administrative dispute, is guaranteed."[7]

The Constitutional Court of Romania, in settling the exception, held that in the judicial phase where the claimed right or legitimate interest is recognised, the aggrieved person should have all legal prerogatives and constitutional guarantees granted by Article 21 para. 3 and Article 6 Right to a fair trial of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The right to a fair trial should be interpreted in the light of the principle of the rule of law, which assumes the existence of an effective legal remedy enabling citizens to assert their civil rights (Judgment of 12 November 2002 in the Case Běleš and others v. The Czech Republic, paragraph 49).

At the same time, the Constitutional Court of Romania considered that "the right of access to a court of law should be "practical and effective". The effectiveness of the right of access requires that an individual "must have a clear, practical opportunity to challenge an act that is an interference with his rights" (Judgment of 4 December 1995 in the Case Bellet v. France, paragraphs 36 and 38). Therefore, the effectiveness of the right of access to a court requires that the exercise of such right is not affected by legal or factual obstacles or impediments, which are likely to question its very substance."[8]

Moreover, the Constitutional Court of Romania held that "within the context of the constitutional regulation of the rights of persons aggrieved by a public authority and of the inherent guarantees of this right, it is crucial to determine the passive procedural capacity of the law subjects that issue acts of public power, because this is one of the admissibility criteria for an administrative dispute action. Therefore, the Court holds that Article 2 para. (1) letter b) of the Law of Administrative Dispute 554/2004 defines the "public authority" as being any of the bodies of the state or of the administrative-territorial units which acts, within a public power regime, to fulfil a legitimate public interest."[9]

In conclusion, the Constitutional Court of Romania found that "the single article point 2 sub-point 4 of the law for the approval of the Government Extraordinary Decree no. 21/2015 violates the right to a fair trial of a person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest by a public authority, stipulated by Article 21 para. (3) of the Constitution and Article 6 paragraph 1 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the legislator not having met its obligation to take legislative measures which enable the enforcement of court decisions. The Court held that, in accordance with its own jurisprudence and that of the European Court of Human Rights, the legislator has the responsibility to find appropriate means to ensure the effectiveness of court decisions, by adopting legislative measures which are intended to reduce the duration of and simplify the enforcement procedure, while observing the constitutional requirements of the rule of law. However, in this case, by adopting the criticised regulation, the legislator intervened in the civil lawsuit, in the enforcement phase of a judgment pronounced by a court of law, depriving the jurisdictional act which has the authority of res judecata of its legal effects. By preventing the enforcement of a court decision, the legislator disregards the principle of balance and separation of powers of the state, consecrated by Article 1 para. 4 of the Constitution, which devolves on the authorities of the state the obligation to exercise their legal and constitutional duties in the framework and within the limits provided for by the Fundamental Law. By adopting the criticised regulation, the legislating authority acted ultra vires, going beyond its constitutional competences to the detriment of the judicial authority."[10]

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority has been granted in the Constitution of the Republic of Moldova by Article 53: "(1) The person aggrieved with regard to a right by a public authority, through an administrative deed or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law, is entitled to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage. (2) The State has patrimonial liability, under the law, for damages caused by miscarriages of justice in criminal trials by the investigation bodies and the courts of law."

With reference to Article 53 of the Constitution of the Republic of Moldova, according to a first author[11], the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority was "granted through the establishment of some control over the administrative acts, and also of the patrimonial liability of the state for damages brought to persons by illegal acts or errors made by public servants. The fundamental right previously stated is a constitutional guarantee for other constitutional rights and freedoms, a type of legal support for the exercise of various forms of control on the activity of public authorities."

In the Republic of Moldova, in order to grant the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, a fundamental right provided for by Article 53 of the Constitution of the Republic of Moldova, on 10 February 2000, the Parliament of the Republic of Moldova adopted the Law of Administrative Dispute 793 – XIV, published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Moldova no. 57-58/375 of 18.05.2000, a law which "is based on the establishment of jurisdictional control on the activity of the public administration authorities."[12]

The Parliament of the Republic of Moldova adopted, on 25 February 1998, the Law 1545-XIII on the reparation of the damage caused by illicit actions of the criminal prosecution and preliminary inquiry bodies, the prosecutors and the courts of law, which was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Moldova no.50-51/359 of 04.06.1998.

The Constitutional Court of the Republic of Moldova, in the settlement of a case, revealed that "the exercise of the constitutional right of a person to have the damage caused by a public authority repaired comes under the scope of the constitutional principles of universality, equality and free access to justice. By virtue of these principles, the citizens of the Republic of Moldova benefit from the rights and freedoms consecrated by the Constitution and other laws and have the obligations provided by them; the respect for and the protection of the individual is a primary duty of the State; any person is entitled to effective satisfaction from the competent courts of law against those acts which violate his rights, freedoms and legitimate interests; no law can restrict the free access to justice (Article 15, Article 16 para. (1), Article 20 of the Constitution)."[13]

A second author[14] from the Republic of Moldova, with regard to the fundamental article, held that "the right of a person aggrieved with regard to a right by an illegal act by a body of the state to ask the competent bodies, under the law, to annul that act and to repair the damages is in close connection through its content with the right of petition; this right also appears as a general judicial guarantee of the exercise of fundamental rights. On the grounds of this right, the citizen has the freedom to approach the competent bodies against any grievance by a body of the state, a legislating body, a body of the administration, or a judicial or prosecution body. The citizen may ask the competent bodies both to annul the act and, implicitly, to repair the damage; the request may be addressed both to the issuing body and to its superior body. If the law allows the reparation of damage, the request may also be addressed to other state bodies which are declared competent."

The constitutional regulation of the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority refers to all administrative acts issued by the public authorities; its constitutional legal force not being limited to acts issued by executive authorities. It does not apply to laws issued by the Parliament; however, it applies to administrative deeds issued by the Parliament. The regulation has no applicability in the area of court decisions, but is applicable to administrative deeds issued by the courts of law, prosecutors or other structures of the state.

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority was granted by Article 52 of the Constitution of Romania, which provided for the possibility for the aggrieved person either to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest or the annulment of the act and the reparation of damage. Aggrieved persons may realise their rights by exercising the right of free access to justice under Article 21 of the Constitution of Romania.

3. The petition right

The right of petition is a fundamental citizen right which grants a right to demand and to make requests before the authorities of the state. This right to demand, being an essential right, warrants the existence and the observance of all other fundamental citizen rights and ensures the good administration of the state for the benefit of its citizens.

The right of petition grants the citizen's civil liberties.

One of the first iconic documents where we can find the historical sources of human rights is Magna Carta [15] (Magna Carta Libertatum), a document issued in England in 1215.

Based on our research, the right of petition was the first fundamental human right acknowledged by Magna Carta in 1215. Therefore, we have found in the content of the aforesaid document, in Chapter 61 (in other translations Chapter 70 – author's note), that a petition announcing an act of injustice should be settled within 40 days.[16]

Another British document which is among the first constitutional provisions, namely The Bill of Rights[17], acknowledged, in 1689, in Article 5, that the citizens who brought petitions to the king would not be condemned or accused for making them.[18]

On 15 December 1791, the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States[19] was adopted, which is part of the Bill of Rights that granted the citizens' right of petition for having the injustices repaired[20].

We can find among other British documents containing some of the first constitutional rules: The Petition of Rights[21], adopted in 1628, which attempted the exercise of control by the Parliament over the British armed forces[22]. The control of the regime of finances[23] was established in 1698 by The Bill of Rights. A first attempt to establish the independence of justice[24] was brought under regulation by The Act of Settlement[25] in 1701.

Later, other documents were also issued in the Great Britain, as constitutional sources, like The Parliament Act[26] (1911) and The Representation of the People Act[27] (1949) with regard to the British election system.

The right of petition falls into the category of fundamental citizen rights, freedoms and duties according to the Constitution of Romania[28].

In the author's opinion, "the right of petition has the value of a right-guarantee, being a person's right to appeal to the state thorough its administrative bodies anytime when its intervention is required."[29]

The Romanian doctrine held that "through the right of petition, citizens are in a direct relation to the authorities of the state, at their own initiative, and they have the opportunity to settle both personal problems, and issues of a general interest."[30]

In the contemporary legal system, the right of petition, as a fundamental right in Romania, is governed by Article 51 of the Constitution of Romania republished in 2003: "(1) Citizens have the right to address to the public authorities through petitions formulated in the name of their signatories. (2) Legally established organisations have the right to address petitions exclusively in the name of the groups they represent. (3) The exercise of the right of petition is free of charge. (4) Public authorities have the obligation to answer petitions within the terms and in the conditions established by the law."

Article 47 of the 1991 Constitution of Romania was not changed by the Reviewing Law 429 of 2003, its form being replicated by the 2003 Constitution of Romania.

The right of petition was considered by a first author[31] "a right of first generation" because the appeal to this right has as consequence an action by the approached public authorities and not only a confirmation that the citizens' petitions have been received.

The right of petition was qualified as "a right-guarantee, meaning a right by means of which, in fact, effective legal protection is ensured for other rights and legitimate interests too, at the same time with the protection of a particular form of citizen manifestation."[32]

A second author[33], held about the right of petition that it is part of "the main human rights (...) which is free of charge".

A third author[34] affirmed that "The right of petition, (...) is one of the most important organised guarantees of the fundamental rights and freedoms, being classified as a right-guarantee for all rights and freedoms of the citizens."

The same author[35] held, about the right of petition, that "is one of the most important organised guarantees of fundamental rights and freedoms, being classified as a right-guarantee for all rights and freedoms of the citizens."

The right of petition was characterised as "a citizen right with tradition in the Romanian legal system, falling into the category of rights that are guarantees, being also a general legal guarantee for other rights and freedoms."[36]

The right of petition is granted at EU level by Article 44 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[37]: *"Any citizen of the Union and any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in a Member State has the right to petition the European Parliament."*

In our opinion, the right of petition has the characteristic of being unique in respect of its scope and the legal effects it generates. Through its effects, it guarantees all the fundamental rights and freedoms of the citizens.[38]

The Constitutional Court of Romania, with regard to the right of petition, provided by Article 51 of the Constitution, "has held in its jurisprudence that this is a right benefiting citizens individually or groups of citizens, no matter if these groups are ad-hoc or organised in the forms provided by law. On the other hand, the free access to justice, provided for by Article 21 of the Constitution, means that any person may appeal to justice for the protection of his rights, freedoms and legitimate interests, and no law may restrict the exercise of this right."[39]

In other cases, the Constitutional Court of Romania analysed the aspects related to the charge of some legal fees in the course of the act of justice: "with regard to the alleged violation of constitutional provisions referring to the just assignment of fiscal duties, the Court remarks that this cannot be held, because the criticised provisions are just an application of those provided for by the Constitution, and the expenses incurred in the act of justice are public expenses, to which the citizens have the obligation, pursuant to Article 56 of the Constitution, to contribute through taxes and fees, determined under the law."[40]

Any citizen may exercise his right of petition and, in parallel, his right to appeal to justice or the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, whether by formulating a complaint based on Article 21 or a petition based on Article 51 of the Constitution of Romania: "the formulation of a complaint based on Article 2781 of the Code of Criminal Proceedings is not such as to prejudice the right of the person to approach the public authorities with petitions, consecrated by Article 51 of the Constitution, or the right of a person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest, by a public authority, through an administrative deed or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law, to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage, according to Article 52 of the Constitution."[41]

The constitutional dispute court has made, with regard to the right of petition, a clear distinction between any type of request or noticed addressed to the courts of law in civil matters, granted by Article 21, and the right of petition: "the approach of the courts of law under Article 4 para. (1) second sentence of Law 221/2009 by any natural person or legal person concerned, or ex officio by the prosecution office attached to the tribunal competent in the area of residence of the concerned person, after the death of the person, for the purpose of compensation for the moral prejudice suffered as a result of the conviction is not an aspect of the right of petition. And this is because the right of petition takes the form of requests, complaints, notices and proposals in connection with the settlement of personal or group issues which do not involve the way of a legal action, and to which public authorities have the obligation to respond within the terms and in the conditions determined under the law, while the citations, which initiate a civil law suit, are settled based on the specific rules of legal actions."[42]

The Constitutional Court of Romania held about the appeal to citizens' subjective rights that "the approach of the courts of law for appealing to a subjective right disregarded or violated or for the realization of an interest which may be obtained only through a legal action is not an aspect of the right of petition, but it is governed by rules specific to court activity."[43]

Therefore, the Constitutional Court of Romania provided an accurate definition with regard to citizens' rights to address to the public authorities with petitions and the obligations of the latter to respond. Moreover, the Constitutional Court also pronounced a decision on citizens' right of free access to justice, which should not be mistaken for the right of petition and which entitles citizens to appeal to justice for the protection of their rights, freedoms and legitimate interests.

The right of petition, being a fundamental right, has the characteristic of a legal guarantee, benefitting on one hand from the systems warranting the constitutional provision and, on the other hand, from the legal guarantee of a subjective right, ensuring the good administration of the state to the benefit of citizens.

The right of petition is part of the category of rights-guarantees, rights which provide legal protection for the citizen and ensure the good administration of the state to the benefit of its citizens. The right of petition ensures a citizen's right to address to a public institution and to receive an answer within the term provided by law.

4. Correlation with ensuring good administration

In our opinion, the right of petition and the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, known in the doctrine as rights-guarantees, are rights that ensure the good administration by the public authorities for and to the benefit of citizens. Therefore, with their guarantee as fundamental rights, they serve as basis and foundation for all fundamental human rights.

In our view, a strong correlation has been found between the rights that are guarantees and ensuring good administration.

The right of petition ensures and guarantees the right of any citizen to petition and, correlatively, the obligation of the public authorities to respond to that petition within the terms and in the conditions stipulated by the organic law. Depending on the type of petition, the legislator provided for various ways of settlement. Petitions may be formulated as different types of requests, complaints, proposals or notices. In the Constitution of Romania, the right of petition is free of charge. Therefore, the right of petition ensures the legal protection of the citizen, of all fundamental citizen rights generally[44] and, particularly, the good administration of the state.

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority ensures, generally, the protection of all fundamental citizen rights and, particularly, the good administration. The two rights, the right of petition and the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority respectively, make the class of rights-guarantees, as they are referred to in the doctrine.

In our opinion, approaching the subject of good administration in a state governed by the rule of law, to the benefit of its citizens, is a topical legal matter. Approached at constitutional level, in our opinion, the good administration is ensured by the realization of right-guarantees. Therefore, granting the right of petition and the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority provides legal protection to all fundamental citizen rights, ensuring in this way the good administration of the state to the benefit of its citizens.

The rights-guarantees, namely the right of petition and the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, are guaranteed and provided similarly in the Constitution of Romania and the Constitution of the Republic of Moldova.

A person aggrieved by a public authority, with regard to a right or a legitimate interest, is entitled to the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the act and the reparation of damage.

Good administration has been an ongoing concern of international bodies.

Therefore, with the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty, the "Charter of the Fundamental Rights of the European Union[45] became legally binding, and this led to some substantial reinforcement of the role of the rule of law in the governance of the European Union".[46]

The right to good administration was consecrated expressis verbis by Article 41 of the Charter of the Fundamental Rights of the European Union.

It represented therefore a stage in a journey which started decades ago. Before, it had been the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice which determined the Union to respect the fundamental rights. Now, "the Charter brings together in a single, coherent and legally binding instrument the fundamental rights which are bonding upon the EU institutions and bodies"[47].

In the European Union, the protection of fundamental rights is granted both at national level by the constitutional systems of its Member States, which precede the Charter and have a more developed jurisprudence, and at EU level, by the Charter. The Charter applies to the actions of all EU institutions and bodies.

Another document adopted at European level is the Recommendation[48] CM/Rec (2007)7 of the Committee of Ministers of the member states of the Council of Europe with regard to good administration.

The Preamble of the Recommendation held as considerations for its adoption that public authorities have the obligation to provide citizens with services, instructions and rulings, and that when the public authorities are required to take action, they must do so within a reasonable period.

Other considerations in the Preamble of the Recommendation hold that maladministration[49], whether as a result of official inaction by the public administration (silence of the administration in our doctrine, the author's note), or delays in taking action or taking action in breach of official obligations, must be subject to sanctions through appropriate procedures, which may include judicial procedure.

The Recommendation also held among its considerations that good administration must be ensured by the quality of legislation, which must be clear and accessible, and the services of public administration must meet the basic needs of society.

The principles of the right to good administration have also been identified in Article 2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights[50], being set out in its thesis.

The right-guarantees "ensure the protection of the manifestations of the citizens' will in relation to public authorities and also of other rights, freedoms and citizen interests"[51], thus ensuring the good administration of the state to the benefit of its citizens.

In French administrative law, the phrase mission of the administration or mission administration is used to identify the duty of the administration to devise and contribute to the implementation of solutions intended to provide answers to novel problems, considered, rightfully or not, as impossible to be solved only by appealing to the techniques of classical administration[52]. Next, the author states: The ambiguity of this type of administrative action arises from the fact that the Mission Administration needs a suppleness of intervention which, generally, makes it benefit from a legal regime which departs, to a variable extent, from the common administrative law, modelled by the law and the judge in order to guarantee the rights of those subject to administration and the requirements of the general interest.

Antonie Iorgovan[53], in a focused formulation, defined public administration "as the ensemble of activities of the President of Romania, the Government, the central autonomous administrative authorities, the local autonomous administrative authorities, and, as appropriate, their subordinate structures, by means of which, within the regime of public power, the laws are fulfilled or, within the limits set by the law, the public services are delivered".

As viewed by the author named above, the phrase the laws are fulfilled has at least the following significances: a) the law is the ceiling of public administration; b) the principle of lawfulness is a fundamental principle of public administration; c) the application of the law also involves the adoption of regulatory documents by the administration; d) the regulatory administrative documents has less legal force than the laws and are ranked depending on the position and the competence of the issuing body; any individual act or any material operation (paving a street, transportation of people, directing the traffic, the constraint to medical treatment in case of transmissible diseases, blocking goods which do not meet quality standards, sacrificing animals so as to prevent the spread of epizooty, issuing an authorisation, applying a sanction, etc.), is a practical execution of the law. In other words, the fulfilment of the law involves both an activity concerned with the organisation and preparedness of the execution, of a regulatory nature (dispositions, circulars, instructions from the government downwards), and an activity involving the execution in a concrete situation (issuance of unilateral acts, conclusion of contracts, carrying out material operations).

The author named above also defined public administration in a formal organic sense and in a functional material sense[54].

In the formal organic sense, the mentioned author evoked the following authorities: the President of Romania, the Government, the ministries and other bodies directly subordinated to the Government, autonomous specialised central bodies, institutions subordinated to the ministries; the prefect; local specialised bodies subordinated to the ministries and managed by the prefect; autonomous local bodies (the county council, the local council, the mayor) and their subordinate institutions.[55]

In a functional material sense, the notion of public administration evokes legal documents and material operations by means of which the law is executed, either through the issuance of subsequent rules, or through the organisation or, as appropriate, the direct provision of public services.[56]

Verginia Vedinaş[57] defined public administration as the "ensemble of activities carried out by the administrative authorities of the state, the local autonomous authorities, the inter-community development associations and bodies providing public services and public utility bodies of local or county interest, by means of which, within the regime of public power, the law is executed in a material, practical sense or by the issuance of regulatory documents of a lower legal force than the law, or by means of which public services are delivered".

Dana Apostol Tofan[58] stated about public administration that it represents "the central notion of administrative law", and with reference to the notion of administration, she set out that "it is a fundamental notion also for the science of administration, which analyses it in its multiple senses, its complex content comprising the imperatives: to provide for, to organise, to lead, to coordinate and to control".

Considering the existence of the most parallelisms between the organisational structuring of public administration in Romania and in France, this study has held from the French administrative doctrine the following definition, which determines the content of the concept or notion of public administration.

Professor Jean Rivero[59] defined administration as "the activity through which public authorities proceed, using the prerogatives of public power if necessary, to satisfy the needs of the public interest".

An analysis of the Constitution of the Republic of Moldova[60] identified the notion of right to administration, governed by Article 39, according to which: "(1) Citizens of the Republic of Moldova are entitled to participate in the administration of public affairs directly, as well as through their representatives. (2) Any citizen is ensured, under the law, the access to a public position."

We have also identified in the Constitution of the Republic of Moldova, besides the rights that are guarantees, namely the right of petition (Article 52) and the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority (Article 53), the right to administration (Article 39), which is legally protected by the two rights-guarantees.

Therefore, the good administration was guaranteed in the Republic of Moldova at constitutional level by the provisions of the right to administration as a fundamental citizen right.

If we compare the two constitutions, of the Republic of Moldova and of Romania, we can see that the right to administration, as a fundamental right, is not found in the Constitution of Romania.

In the opinion of an author[61], "the citizens of the Republic of Moldova are entitled to participate in the administration of public affairs directly, as well as through their representatives. The specifications necessary in this context are concerned with: 1) the condition of being a citizen of the Republic of Moldova; 2) the definition of public affairs; 3) the direct participation to administration; 4) the participation in administration through representatives."

Article 39 grants the right to administration only to citizens of the Republic of Moldova. With regard to the notion of "public affairs", the same author defines it as follows "the notion of public affairs is identified with that of business (positions, duties, competences, prerogatives, etc.) of public authorities, the activity of which is represented by the ensemble of activities of the Parliament, the Government, the President of the Republic of Moldova, of central and local public administrative authorities, as well as of their subordinate structures, by means of which the laws are fulfilled and public services are delivered. The category of public affairs also includes issues raised at the level of public interest, meaning activities which satisfy some social needs. Precisely, the right to participate in the administration of public affairs means the right to occupy positions (posts, ranks) in the public authorities, where activities of a general (public) nature take place."[62]

Any citizen of the Republic of Moldova is entitled to participate in public affairs and may elect representatives. This is a constitutional provision of the right to administration which, in turn, confers to the citizen the right to appoint representatives based on the right to vote, freely expressed. The democracy of a state governed by the rule of law is so ensured, the representatives of the state being elected by the free vote of the people.

In our opinion, good administration is the result of good public administration. For the identification of a definition of the concept of good administration, we have conducted an analysis of the doctrine in the matter.

A first author[63] said that "there is not a universally valid definition of good administration, beyond the regulatory texts which refer to this concept."

The same author held that "the principle of good administration is an old and well-founded idea. Its specific content has developed gradually, so that, at present, this is one of the key concepts of modern administrative law."[64]

The same author also mentioned with regard to good administration: "administrative institutions have the obligation to exercise the rights and responsibilities which are conferred to them by laws and other regulations based on the concept of law, so as to avoid any rigid application of legal provisions (...) institutions must adapt the legal rules to the social and economic realities."[65]

A second author[66] affirmed that "Although there is no express provision with regard to the right to good administration in the domestic legislation, the elements of this right are contained, the majority of them, by the provisions of the fundamental law." The same author held in the article previously quoted that with the correlation of fundamental provisions in the Constitution of Romania, namely: Article 16 Equality of rights, Article 21 Free access to justice, Article 24 right to defence, Article 31 Right to information, Article 51 Right of petition, Article 52 Right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, Article 115 Legislative delegation, Article 120 Basic principles, the right to good administration is guaranteed, these fundamental rights being essential components of the right to good administration.

A third author[67] mentioned about the right to good administration that "it is a complex legal institution and has the legal nature of a fundamental right, with a general content which includes a multitude of attributes referring to the organisation and functioning of the administration, recognised as freestanding rights. Therefore, in relation to the state, the right to good administration is asserted as a sum of obligations which the state has in connection with the organisation of public administration, on one hand, and for guaranteeing the effectiveness and compliance with the law of the activity of the public administration, on the other hand."

In our opinion, good administration is ensured by the realization of the rights-guarantees. Therefore, the rights-guarantees ensure the realization of good administration. The protection of the citizen's rights before public authorities is realised at constitutional level through the correlation between the right of petition and the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority.

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority is the constitutional guarantee which underlay the adoption in Romania of Law 554/2004[68], namely the Law of Administrative Dispute.

The right of petition ensures the right of citizens to address to a public authority and to receive an answer. The right of petition is the constitutional guarantee which underlay the adoption of Government Decree no. 27/2002 [69] on the activity of settling petitions, approved with changes and additions by Law 233/2002.

The right of petition is a legal guarantee of all fundamental rights. Its realisation ensures a citizen's right to request, to formulate a petition, understood as the "request, complaint, notice or proposal, formulated in writing or through electronic mail, which a citizen or a legally established organisation may address to the central and local public authorities and institutions, to the decentralised public services of the ministries and other central bodies, to national companies and societies, to companies of local or county interest, as well as to autonomous companies, hereinafter called public authorities and institutions."[70]

In practice, several types of petitions and how they should be settled by the public authorities have been brought under regulation, guaranteeing in this way the right of citizens to address to any public authority and establishing correlatively the obligation of those authorities to respond within the legal term to citizens' petitions.

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority ensures the constitutional guarantees of a citizen who, having been aggrieved with regard to his rights or a legitimate interest by a Romanian public authority, irrespective of the authority concerned, through an administrative act or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law, may request and is granted legal protection through his fundamental right to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the act and the reparation of damage.

The person aggrieved by a public authority has the guarantee of legal protection provided by the constitutional provision, irrespective of the public authority which aggrieved that person, and to that end the Constitutional Court of Romania held that "Article 2 para. (1) letter b) of the Law of Administrative Dispute 554/2004 defines the «public authority» as being any of the bodies of the state or of its administrative-territorial units which acts, within a regime of public power, to satisfy a legitimate public interest."[71]

In our opinion, with the "interdependence with the right to good administration consecrated at European level by the Charter of the Fundamental Rights of the European Union, there are at national level, under the aegis of fundamental rights, inscribed in texts of a higher legal values, the right of petition and the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority."[72]

At the same time, there is also a provision at constitutional level for citizens' protection in case of dame caused by miscarriages of justice. The right of a person aggrieved by miscarriages of justice to take action against the state for recovering the damage suffered is so ensured. The magistrates who acted in bad faith or serious neglect in the course of their duties are in turn liable in relation to the state for the damage caused to aggrieved persons.

5. Conclusions

In our opinion, the right of petition and the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, known in the doctrine as rights-guarantees, are rights that ensure the good administration by the public authorities for and to the benefit of citizens. Therefore, being granted as fundamental rights, they serve as basis and foundation for the legal protection of all fundamental human rights.

The right of petition ensures and guarantees the right of any citizen to petition and, correlatively, the obligation of the public authorities to respond to that petition within the terms and in the conditions stipulated by the organic law. Depending on the type of petition, the legislator provided for various ways of settlement.

The right of petition is a fundamental citizen right which grants a right to demand and to make requests before the authorities of the state. This right to demand, being an essential right, warrants the existence and the observance of all other fundamental citizen rights and ensures the good administration of the state for the benefit of its citizens. The right of petition guarantees the citizens' civil liberties.

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority ensures, generally, the protection of all fundamental citizen rights and, particularly, the protection of good administration.

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority ensures the constitutional guarantees of the citizen who, having been aggrieved with regard to his rights or a legitimate interest by a Romanian public authority, irrespective of the authority concerned, through an administrative act or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law, may request and is granted legal protection through his fundamental right to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the act and the reparation of damage.

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, together with the right of petition, previously analysed by this study, form, according to the Romanian doctrine, the class of rights-guarantees.

The rights-guarantees ensure the protection of the manifestations of the citizens' will in relation to public authorities and also of other rights, freedoms and citizen interests, thus ensuring the good administration of the state to the benefit of its citizens.

SELECTIVE ASPECTS ON THE EVOLUTION OF THE REGULATIONS REGARDING THE JUDICIARY IN THE ROMANIAN CONSTITUTIONS AND IN THE ROMANIAN LAW 100 YEARS AFTER THE GREAT UNION

Nicolae PAVEL[*]

Abstract

This study has the following title: Selective aspects on the evolution of the regulations regarding the judiciary in the Romanian constitutions and in the Romanian law 100 years after the great union

Using a Key- Scheme, the following parts of the study are analyzed successively, called: 1. Preamble. 2. The identification of the constitutional regulations on the judiciary in the Romanian constitutional system - selective aspects. 3. Romanian doctrinal references on the judiciary. 4. Judicial references on the judiciary in the decisions of the Constitutional Court of Romania. 5. Conclusions.

Keywords: the judiciary, the Romanian constitutions, the doctrinal references, the Constitutional Court decisions.

1. Preamble

The object of study of this research will be circumscribed to the scientific analysis of the four great parts thereof, i.e.: 2. The identification of the constitutional regulations on the judiciary in the Romanian constitutional system - selective aspects. 3. Romanian doctrinal references on the judiciary. 4. Judicial references on the judiciary in the decisions of the Constitutional Court of Romania. 5. Conclusions.

For the purposes of this study, it is worth highlighting the approach on the regulations on the the judiciary in the constitutional system starting with the first document with constitutional value, i.e. the Developer Statute of the Paris Convention of 7/9 August 1858 until this day, i.e. the Constitution of Romania of 2003, the republished form of the Constitution of Romania of 1991.

Considering this generous topic of study of over 145 years of constitutional evolution of the regulations on the judiciary in Romania we should point out since the very beginning the need of a diachronic approach of this topic by identifying all the Romanian Constitutions which regulated the constitutional regime during this period.

Moreover, we should also point out that during the stated period, Romania had several forms of government, i.e., monarchy, people's republic, socialist republic and semi-presidential republic.

For a full but not exhaustive coverage of the area of study, we present a selection of the doctrinal and jurisprudential references to the judiciary.

On the other hand, it is important to mention here that the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of Romania contributed to the constitutionalization of the judiciary ever since its establishment.

According to the bibliographic research, the judiciary is new in point of formulation, but it is not new in point of its existence. Starting from this axiom, and paraphrasing K. Mbaye[1] we may say that: „The history of the judiciary overlaps the history of humankind".

The proposed study opens due to this approach a complex and complete view, but not exhaustive, in the current sphere of the judiciary.

In our opinion, the field under analysis is important for the constitutional doctrine, for the parliamentary law doctrine, for the comparative law doctrine, for the general theory of law, for the legislative activity of elaboration of the normative acts, for the legislative technique as well as for the research activity in the field covered by the theme of the study.

Even if the regulation and theorization of the judiciary goes back in time to the first constitution written in Romania, the theoretical interest to resume it is determined by the fact that the current specialized literature has not always paid enough attention to the three aspects, normative, theoretical and jurisprudential concerning the judiciary, analysed here.

We used the phrase the judiciary recalling of the famous theory of the separation of power in a state released by John Locke (Traité du government civil, 1690). This theory was later elaborated and consecrated by Montesquieu in his De l´esprit des lois (1748), a work which brought its author the title of father of the classical theory of the separation of powers in the state.

1. The identification of the constitutional regulations on the judiciary in the Romanian constitutional system - selective aspects.

1.1. Developer Statute of the Paris Convention of 7/9 August 1858[2]

A special attention should be paid to the Developer Statute of the Paris Convention of 7/19 August 1858. In our opinion, the Statute may be considered a Constitution, considering the provisions of art. XVII which set out the following: "All civil servants, without exception, when taking office, should pledge allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the country and faith to the Lord".

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Statute shows that it contains no regulation concerning the judiciary.

1.2. The Romanian Constitution adopted at 29 June 1866[3]

It should be noted that the Fundamental Law of Belgium of 1831 was an inspiration for the constitutions of other states among which the Romanian Constitution adopted at 29 June 1866.

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in Title III entitled On the powers of the state, the following fundamental principle concerning the judiciary is consecrated, under the following phrasing: "The judiciary is exercised by Courts and Tribunals. Their decisions and sentences are pronounced under the laws and executed in the name of the Lord".

1.3. The Constitution of Romania of 29 March 1923[4]

At the onset of the study we should specify that the Fundamental Law of Romania of 1866, remained effective for 57 years, though meanwhile important economic and political transformations occurred.

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in Chapter IV, Title III, entitled On the judiciary, the following fundamental principles concerning the judiciary are consecrated, under the following phrasing:

1. Art. 101. – No jurisdiction can be set up except under the power of a certain law. Extraordinary commissions and tribunals cannot be set up under any name and any word whatsoever with a view to certain trials, either civil or criminal, or in order to judge certain persons.
2. Art. 102. – There is only one Court of Cassation and Justice for the entire Romanian State.
3. Art. 103. – It is only the Court of Cassation in united sections that has the right to judge the constitutionality of the laws and to declare as unenforceable those laws which are contrary to the Constitution. The judgement on the unconstitutionality of the laws is limited only to the case on trial.

The Court of Cassation will pronounce just like in the past on the conflicts of assignments.

The right of cassation appeal is constitutional.

4. Art. 104. - The judges are irremovable under special conditions set by the law.
5. Art. 105. – The jury is set in all criminal matters and for the political and press crimes, except for the cases set forth by this Constitution.

The action for damages resulting from press facts and crimes cannot be filed before the same jurisdiction where the offense was committed.

6. Art. 106. – Military justice is organized under a specific law.
7. Art. 107. – Special authorities of any kind, having assignments of administrative litigation, may not be established.

Administrative litigation is within the scope of the judiciary, according to the special law.

The injured person, either due to an administrative act of authority or due to a management act made by breaking laws and regulations, either by bad intention of the administrative authorities to settle the claim of a right, may file a petition to the courts for the recognition of his right.

The bodies of the judiciary judge whether the act is illegal or not, they may cancel it or may pronounce for civil damage until the date of restoration of the injured right, also having the power to judge the claim for damages, either against the administrative authority summoned to court, or against the guilty civil servant.

The judiciary has no authority to judge government acts or the military headquarters acts.

1.4. The Constitution of Romania of 28 February 1938[5]

In the preamble of this study we should point out that the Fundamental Law of Romania of 1923 remained effective for 15 years.

Under the historical conditions of 1938, the new Constitution Draft was subjected to plebiscite on 24 February 1938. The Constitution was promulgated and was published in the Official Gazette Part I, no. 48, from February 27, 1938.

From the systematic analysis of the constitutional content of the Constitution, it follows that this in Art. 73 - Art. 78 of Chapter V of Title III, titled About Judicial Power, establish the following fundamental principles regarding the judiciary, under the following form:

[3] Ibidem, pp. 29-60.

[4] Ibidem, pp. 61-92.

[5] Ibidem, op. cit. 93-119.

1. Art. 73. - No jurisdiction can be established except in the power of a law.

Commissions and extraordinary courts cannot be created, under any appointment and word, in view of certain processes, whether civil or criminal, or for the trial of certain persons

The jury is abolished.

2. Art. 74 - For the entire Romanian State there is only one Court of Cassation and Justice.
3. Art. 75 - Only Court of Cassation and Justice in united sections has the right to judge the constitutionality of laws and to declare those that are contrary to the Constitution inapplicable. The Judgment of the unconstitutionality of the laws is bordering only to the case

The Court of Cassation and Justice will speak of conflicts of attributions.

Right of appeal in cassation is of order constitutional.

4. Art. 76 – The judges are irremovable. Immovability will be established by a special law which will intervene no later than six months since the promulgation of this Constitution.

In this time, disciplinary sanctions will be applied by the Royal Decree.

5. Art. 77 - Military justice is organized by law.
6. Art. 78 - Administrative litigation is in the fall of the judiciary, according to the special law.

The judiciary has no power to judge acts of government as well the acts of command with military character.

1.5. The Constitution of 13 April 1948[6]

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in Title VII, entitled The Judiciary and the Prosecutor's Office consecrates the following fundamental principles, having the following phrasing:

1. Art. 86. – The courts are: the Supreme Court, one for the whole country, the Courts, the tribunals and the popular district courts.
2. Art. 87. – Special courts for certain branches of activity may be established under the laws.
3. Art. 88. – In all the courts, except for the Supreme Court, the judgement takes place with popular referees, unless otherwise ordered by the law for certain cases.
4. Art. 89. – The first president, the president and the members of the Supreme Court are appointed by the Presidium of the Grand National Assembly of the People's Republic of Romania at the proposal of the government.
5. Art. 90. – The Supreme Court oversees the judicial activity of the courts and judicial bodies, under the laws.
6. Art. 91. - The debates are public, unless otherwise provided by the laws for certain cases.
7. Art. 92. – The right of defence before any court is guaranteed.
8. Art. 93. – The judges of any rank are subject only to the law in the exercise of their duties and enforce the laws equally for all citizens.
9. Art. 94. – A law shall determine the organization and functioning of the courts, as well as the way of appointing and removing the judges of any rank.
10. Art. 95. – In the People's Republic of Romania, the Prosecutor's Office supervises the compliance with the criminal laws, both by the civil servants and by the other citizens.
11. Art. 96 – The Prosecutor's Office watches especially the prosecution and punishment of the crimes against democratic order and freedom, of economic interests, of national independence and sovereignty of the Romanian State.
12. Art. 97 – The Prosecutor's Office consists of a general prosecutor of the People's Republic of Romania and several prosecutors.

    It will be determined by law the organization, assignments and functioning of the prosecutor's office.
13. Art. 98, - The General Prosecutor of the People's Republic of Romania shall be appointed by the Presidium of the Grand National Assembly of the People's Republic of Romania, at the proposal of the government.

1.6. The Constitution of 24 September 1952[7]

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in Chapter VI, entitled The courts and the Prosecutor's Office consecrated the following principles, having the following phrasings:

1. Art. 64. – Justice in the People's Republic of Romania is served through the Supreme Court of the People's Republic of Romania, the regional tribunals and popular tribunals, and by the special courts established under the laws.

The organization, jurisdiction and procedure of the courts are set by the law.

2. Art. 65. – The tribunals defend the regime of popular democracy and the achievements of the working people; ensures popular legality, public property and citizens' rights.
3. Art. 66. – Judgment of the lawsuits in all courts is done with the participation of the popular referees, unless otherwise provided by the law.
4. Art. 67. – The Supreme Court of the People's Republic of Romania is elected by the Grand National Assembly for a five-year term.

The judges and popular referees are elected according to the procedure provided by the law.

[6] Ibidem, op. cit. 123-139.

[7] Ibidem, op. cit. 143-166.

The appointment of the judges in special courts is determined also under the law.

5. Art. 68. – In the People's Republic of Romania, the judicial procedure is in Romanian, and providing in the regions and districts inhabited by a population of a different nationality than Romanian, for the use of the maternal language of that population.

The parties who do not speak the language of the judicial procedure may get acquainted, through a translator, with the parts of the file, and the right to speak in court and draw conclusions in the maternal language.

6. Art. 69. – In all courts judgement is public, unless otherwise provided by the law.

The accused is guaranteed the right of defence.

7. Art. 70. – The judges are independent and subjected to the law only.
8. Art. 71. – The courts pronounce their decisions in the name of the people.
9. Art. 72. – The Supreme Court of the People's Republic of Romania supervises the judicial activity of all courts in the People's Republic of Romania.
10. Art. 73. – The General Prosecutor of the People's Republic of Romania exercises superior supervision of the compliance with the laws by the ministries and other central bodies, by the local bodies of the state power and administration, by the civil servants and the other citizens.
11. Art. 74. - The General Prosecutor of the People's Republic of Romania is appointed by the Grand National Assembly for a five-year term.

The deputies of the General Prosecutor of the People's Republic of Romania and the prosecutors of the local units of the Prosecutor's Office are appointed by the General Prosecutor for a four-year term.

12. Art. 75. – The General Prosecutor shall be accountable to the Grand National Assembly of the People's Republic of Romania and – in the interval between sessions – to the Presidium of the Grand National Assembly and to the Council of Ministers.
13. Art. 76. – The Prosecution is independent from local authorities, subordinating only to the General Prosecutor of the People's Republic of Romania.

1.7. The Constitution of 21 August 1965, as republished[8]

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in Title VI, entitled The Judiciary and in Title VII, entitled The Prosecution the following fundamental principles are consecrated, having the following phrasing:

1.7.1. Title VI – The Judiciary

1. Art. 101.– In the People's Republic of Romania justice is served, under the laws, through the Supreme Court, county courts, district courts and military courts.
2. Art. 102.– Due to their judgement activity, the tribunals and district courts defend the socialist system and the individual rights, educating the citizens in the spirit of compliance with the laws.

The tribunals and district courts aim, by enforcing criminal sanctions, at the correction and re-education of the offenders and at the prevention of new crimes.

3. Art. 103.– The tribunals and the district courts judge the civil matters, the criminal matters and any other matters under their jurisdiction.

In the matters provided by the law, the tribunals and district courts exercise control on the decisions of the administrative or public authorities with jurisdictional activity.

The tribunals and district courts judge the claims of the injured in their rights by administrative acts and may pronounce under the laws on the legality of these acts.

4. Art. 104. – The Supreme Court exercises general review on the judgement activity of al land any tribunal and district court. The exercise of this review is set by the law.

9. Art. 109. – In the People's Republic of Romania the judicial procedure takes place in Romanian, providing in the administrative and territorial units inhabited by a population other than the Romanian, for the use of the maternal language of that population.

The parties who do not speak the language of the judicial procedure are provided for the possibility of taking note, through a translator, of the pieces of the file, and for the right to speak in court and to draw conclusions in their maternal language.

[8] Republished under art. 11 of Law 19 of 23 October 1986, published in the Official Journal of the People's Republic of Romania, Part I, no. 64 of 27 October 1986.

10. Art. 110. – The judgement takes place in public session, unless otherwise provided by the law.
11. Art. 111. – In the judgement activity, the judges and the popular referees are independent and are subject only to the law.

1.7.2. Title VII – The Prosecution

1. Art. 112. – The Prosecution of the People's Republic of Romania exercises supervision of the activity of the criminal prosecution bodies and the punishment enforcement bodies and watches, under the laws, upon the observance of legality, the defence of the socialist system, of the legitimate rights and interests of the socialist organisations, of the other legal persons and of the citizens.
2. Art. 113. – The Prosecution is led by the general prosecutor. The Prosecution bodies are: General Prosecutor's Office, county prosecutor's offices, local prosecutor's office and military prosecutor's offices.

The Prosecution bodies are hierarchically subordinate.

3. Art. 114. – The General Prosecutor is elected by the Grand National Assembly during the legislature, in its first session, and functions until the election of the new general prosecutor in the first session of the next legislature.

The prosecutors are appointed under the law, except as provided by Art. 87 pct. 6.

4. Art. 115. – The General Prosecutor shall be accountable to the Grand National Assembly for the activity of the Prosecutor's Office, and in the interval between sessions, to the State Council.

1.8. The Constitution of Romania of 8 December 1991[9]

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in Chapter VI, Title III, entitled the Judicial Authority, it consecrates the following fundamental regarding: The Courts – Section I, at the Public Ministry – Section 2, and, at the Superior Council of Magistracy – Section 3, having the following phrasing:

1.8.1. Section 1 - The Courts

1. Art. 123: - Serving justice
   - Justice is served in the name of the law.
   - The judges are independent and are subject only to the law.
2. Art. 124: - Status of judges
   - The judges appointed by the President of Romania are immovable, according to the law. The President and the other judges of the Supreme Court of Justice are appointed for a 6-year term. They may be re-invested in office. The judges' promotion, transfer and sanctioning may be ordered only by the Superior Council of Magistracy, under the laws.
   - The judge office is incompatible with any other public or private office, except for the teaching positions in higher education.
3. Art. 125: - The Courts
   - Justice is served through the Supreme Court of Justice and by the other courts as set by the law.
   - It is prohibited to establish extraordinary courts.
   - The jurisdiction and judgement procedure are established by the law.
4. Art. 126: - Public character of debates

The judgement session is public, unless otherwise provided by the law.

5. Art. 127: - The right to an interpreter
   - The judicial procedure shall take place in Romanian.
   - The citizens belonging to national minorities and the persons who do not understand or speak Romanian are entitled to take note of the acts and deeds of the file, to speak in court and to draw conclusions, by interpreter; in the criminal trials, such right is ensured for free.
6. Art. 128: - Use of remedies

The stakeholders and the Public Ministry may exercise against the court decisions remedies, under the laws.

7. Art. 129: - Courts police

The courts shall have special police in their service.

1.8.2. Section 2 – *Public Ministry

- The Superior Council of Magistracy also performs other duties set forth by its organic law, while fulfilling its role of guarantor of the independence of justice.

2. Romanian doctrinal references on the judiciary.

We will select from the Romanian doctrine the opinions of authors with recognized prestige, who studied the judicial power or authority.

2.1. The first opinion[11] mentioned for this study analyses The Judicial Authority.

The term justice has two meanings. In a sense, justice means the judicial bodies, and in the second sense we understand the activity of settling civil, administrative, commercial, criminal, work etc. trials, of applying sanctions, of restoration of rights and violated legitimate interests. In ordinary words, serving justice means making justice

As social life should be led according to the constitution and laws, there should be a function (a power, an authority) which might know and be able to interpret them and correctly enforce them when they are violated, when the rights and freedoms are violated, when the rights and freedoms of citizens are endangered, neglected.

The term jurisdictional authority (power) does not diminish the role of justice, but it emphasizes the similarity of content and principles among several activities which are imperative when the laws are not enforced. Justice remains the substantial part of jurisdictional activity.

The fundamental principles according to which justice is serviced are the following: 1. principle of legality, 2. justice is unique, impartial and equal for all. 3. use of official language and of maternal language in justice. 4. right of defence. 5. presumption of innocence. 6. independence of the judge subjecting him only to the law.

The bodies of the judicial authority are set forth by Title VI of the Constitution of Romania, entitled The Judicial Authority.

2.2. A second opinion[12] mentioned for this study analyzes The Judicial Authority.

The Constitution of Romania in Chapter VI (art. 124-134) deals under the term "Judicial Authority" three different institutions: the courts, the Public Ministry and the Superior Council of Magistracy, which form together the judicial authority.

The courts are represented in Romania by a) the High Court of Cassation and Justice; b) courts of appeal; c) tribunals; d) specialized courts; e) military courts; and f) district courts.

1. The notion of justice has two meanings. In a wide sense the notion of justice designates the idea of justice, of equity and equality before the law.

In a narrow sense, justice means all institutions by means of which the act of justice is exercised: courts, magistrates, lawyers, bailiffs, etc. from this point of [11] Ioan Muraru, Elena Simina Tănăsescu, *Constitutional l*aw and political institutions, 14th edition, volume II, C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, pp. 286-295.

[12] Ștefan Deaconu, Political Institution, Edition 3, C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, pp. 292-314.

view, justice is a public service exercised by the state specialized institutions.

2. Judicial power means only the judges who work in courts.
3. The irrevocability of judges is the strongest guarantee of justice independence, of the judge's independence and good administration of the act of justice.
4. The principles underlying the making of justice are the following: a) Principle of legality. b) Principle of independence of justice. c) Principle of free access to justice. d) Principle of uniqueness, impartiality and equality of justice for all individuals. e) Principle of the right of defence. f) Principle of the presumption of innocence. g) Principle of usage of official language and of maternal language in court. h) Principle of justice as a state monopoly. i) Principle of sessions' advertising. j) Principle of justice functioning on the hierarchy criterion.

2.3. A third opinion[13] mentioned for this study analyses the Jurisdictional Authority.

2.3.1. Terminology and notions regarding judicial authority

At the onset of the course we should emphasize the place of judicial authorities in the triad of the separation of powers in the state. Concerning this aspect, the constitutional doctrine expresses the following opinion:

"The evolution of the classical theory of the separation of powers also involved the evolution of the explanations and practices regarding the judiciary. This explains the different terminology used to express this power in the constitutions and doctrine, i.e.: the judiciary, the jurisdictional power. The name of judicial authority clearly evokes justice, as a distinct function and as a distinct system".[14]

Moreover, the term justice is understood in a dual sense, „In a sense, justice means the system of judicial bodies, and in a second sense we understand the activity of settlement of civil, administrative, commercial, criminal, work etc. trials, of enforcement of sanctions, of restoration of violated legitimate rights and interests".[15]

In addition, „this function was and is entrusted to a distinct authority (power), vested with state powers which give efficiency and must be independent and impartial".[16]

Concerning the specifics of jurisdictional activity, constitutional doctrine sets forth the following: „in order for justice to be able to fulfil its mission, it has a certain organization, certain principles. The organization of justice is done by degrees of jurisdiction".[17]

2.3.2. Fundamental principles according to which justice is made

With reference to the fundamental principles according to which justice is made, the constitutional doctrine expresses the following opinion: „Justice shall meet certain fundamental requirements. Among these requirement, we may list the following: legality, good administration of justice; access to a court; guarantee of a fair trial; trial advertising; judge impartiality; proportionality in deciding sanctions etc.". [18]

The fundamental principles according to which justice is made, should meet two conditions: they should be principles set forth by the Constitution, or derive from constitutional principles.

The fundamental principles according to which justice is made are the following: 1. Principle of legality. 2. Justice is unique, impartial and equal for all. 3. use of official language and of maternal language in court. 4. right of defence. 5. presumption of innocence. 6. Independence of the judge subjecting him only to the law.

2.3.3. Bodies of the judicial authority

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that judicial authority is designated in Chapter VI, Title III, entitled Judicial Authority, and are regulated in the following order: 1. courts. 2. The Public Ministry. 3. Superior Council of Magistracy.

4. Conclusions.

Considering the above-mentioned we hold the following ideas here below:

4.1. The aim of the study on the Selective aspects on the evolution of the regulations regarding the judiciary in the Romanian Constitutions and Romanian Law 100 years after the Great Union, was attained. in our opinion.

4.2. In our opinion, the analysed area is important for the constitutional doctrine in the matter, for the doctrine of human rights and for the doctrine of the history of the Romanian state and law.

4.3. Constitutional regulations were successively identified concerning the evolution of the regulations regarding the judiciary in the Romanian Constitutions la 100 years from the Great Union.

4.4. The three parts of the study may be considered a contribution to the extension of research in the matter of the evolution of the regulations regarding the judiciary in the Romanian Constitutions la 100 years from the Great Union, in accordance with the current trend in the matter.

4.5. We further point out that this study opens a complex and complete view, but not exhaustive, in the analyzed field.

4.6. The key-scheme proposed, considering the selective approach of the evolution of the regulations regarding the judiciary in the Romanian Constitutions la 100 years from the Great Union may be multiplied and extended for further research in the matter.

OPINION OF ADVOCATE GENERAL WATHELET AND JUDGMENT OF THE COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN UNION IN CASE C-673/16, CONCERNING THE CONCEPT OF "SPOUSE" IN EUROPEAN UNION LAW

Roxana-Mariana POPESCU

Abstract

The interpretation given by the Court of Justice of the European Union to the concept of "spouse", after Advocate General Wathelet submitted his conclusions, represents a breakthrough on gender equality and same-sex couples concerning the provisions of EU legislation on the right of residence of Union citizens and their family members. The CJEU judgment is a recognition of the rights granted to same-sex couples legally married in a Member State who wish to exercise their freedom of movement and who, thus have the opportunity to be accompanied by their spouses, under the same conditions as those applicable to couples of different sexes. The judgment does not force states to legislate same-sex marriage but requires them to recognise the effects of this type of marriage on their territory solely for the purpose of exercising the derived rights that European Union citizens have).

Keywords: the concept of "spouse"; European Union Law; Court of Justice of the European Union; case-law; Opinion of Advocate General.

1. Introductory aspects

On 5 June 2018, the Court of Justice of the European Union[1] ruled for the first time on the concept of "spouse" within the meaning of Directive 2004/38[2] in the context of a marriage between two people of the same sex. As Advocate General Melchior Wathelet also observed, the action was "delicate, involving in the case of marriage, a legal institution, within the specific and limited context of freedom of movement of citizens of the European Union"[3]. The Court's definition of the concept of "spouse" will necessarily affect not only the very identity of the men and women concerned - and therefore their dignity - but also the personal and social concept that citizens of the Union have of marriage, which may vary from one person to another, from one Member State to another"[4].

2. The context of the request for interpretation of the concept of 'spouse' within the meaning of Directive 2004/38

The need to interpret the concept of "spouse" in the above-mentioned meaning appeared in the context in which the Court of First Instance, District 5, Bucharest requested the Constitutional Court[5] of Romania to rule on that plea of unconstitutionality raised in a litigation for settlement. In that case, Adrian Coman, a citizen with dual citizenship (Romanian and American), lived in New York (United States) between 2005 and 2009, together with Robert Clabourn Hamilton, an American citizen. They were married in November 2010. Between 2009-2012, Mr. Coman lived in Brussels (where he worked at the European Parliament) and Mr. Hamilton stayed in New York.

In December 2012, Mr. Coman and his spouse began administrative proceedings with the Romanian authorities in order to obtain the necessary documents for Mr. Hamilton, who was not a national of the Union[6],

[6] A "national" means a natural or legal person having the citizenship or nationality of that State in accordance with its domestic law "(Article 3 (a) of Law no. 157/2005 for ratification of the Treaty between the Kingdom of Belgium, the Czech Republic, the Kingdom of Denmark, the Federal Republic to be able, as a member of Mr. Coman's family, to obtain the right to lawfully reside in Romania for a period of more than three months. "On 11 January 2013, the Inspectorate informed Mr. Coman and Mr. Hamilton that the latter only had a right of residence for a period of three months, because, under the Civil Code, marriage between people of the same sex is not recognised, and that an extension of Mr Hamilton's right of temporary residence in Romania could not be granted for the purposes of family reunion"[7]. Following the reply received, Mr. Coman and others brought an action against the Inspectorate "seeking a declaration of discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation as regards the exercise of the right of freedom of movement in the European Union, and requesting that the Inspectorate be ordered to end the discrimination and to pay compensation for the non-material damage suffered"[8]. According to the applicants, the provisions of Art. 277 par. (1), (2) and (4)[9] are unconstitutional as long as they fail to recognise same-sex marriages concluded abroad so that the right of residence cannot be exercised. Therefore, the article invoked "is an infringement of the provisions of the Romanian Constitution that protect the right to personal life, family life and private life and the provisions relating to the principle of equality"[10]. On 18 December 2015, the Court of First Instance, District 5, Bucharest notified the Constitutional Court of Romania to rule on the exception. "The latter court considered that the present case related exclusively to recognition of a marriage lawfully entered into abroad between a citizen of the Union and his or her spouse of the same sex, a national a third country, in the light of the right to family life and the right to freedom of movement, viewed from the perspective of the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. In that context, that Court had doubts as to the interpretation to be given to several terms employed in the relevant provisions of Directive 2004/38, read in the light of the Charter of Fundamental Rights ('the Charter') and of the recent case-law of this Court and of the European Court of Human Rights on the right to life family. Consequently, it decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling"[11].

3. Preliminary questions asked by the Constitutional Court

As we have already stated, the Romanian Constitutional Court started its legal reasoning from the legal instruments of the European Union in force, namely Directive 2004/38 and the Charter of Fundamental Rights.

Article 2 point 2 (a) of Directive 2004/38 provides that "within the meaning of the (...) Directive [...]' (...) "family member" means: the spouse (...)". In addition, Article 7 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights recognises the right to respect for private and family life, home and communications secrecy, where "the right to marry and the right to found a family are guaranteed under the domestic laws governing the exercise of these rights"[12]. As it is well known, European Union law prohibits "discrimination of any kind based on grounds such as sex, race, colour, ethnic or social origin, genetic characteristics, language, religion or belief, political or other opinion, membership of a national minority, property, birth, disability, age or sexual orientation. Within the scope of application of the Treaties and without prejudice to their special provisions, any discrimination on grounds of nationality shall be prohibited"[13]. The right to equality before the law and protection against discrimination for all persons constitutes a universal right recognised by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination Against Women, the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination and the United Nations Covenants on Civil and Political Rights and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, to which all Member States are signatories[14]. [14] Directive 2002/73/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 23 September 2002 amending Council Directive 76/207/EEC on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions, apud Elena Emilia Ștefan, Opinions on the right to non-discrimination, in CKS e-Book 2015, p.540, http://cks.univnt.ro/cks_2015_archive/cks_2015_articles.html.

citizens of the Member States of the European Union is the freedom of movement and residence within the territory of the Member States. Article 45 (2) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights provides that "freedom of movement and residence may be granted, in accordance with the Treaties, to third- country nationals of legally residing in the territory of a Member State.

In view of those legislative issues, the Constitutional Court wished to find out whether the notion of "spouse" in Art. 2 pt. (a) of Directive 2004/38, in conjunction with Art. 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights also included the same-sex national who was a citizen of a third country to whom a citizen of the European Union was lawfully married in accordance with the law of a Member State other than the host Member State.

Next, the Court requests, if the first question is answered in the affirmative, whether the host Member State must grant the right of residence in its territory for a period of longer than three months to the same-sex spouse of a citizen of the European Union. The question takes into consideration the provisions of Article 3 par. (1)[15] and Article 7 par. (2)[16] of Directive 2004/38, read in conjunction with Art. 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights. If the answer to the first question is in the negative, the Court wishes to know whether the same-sex spouse, from a State which is not a Member State of the Union, of an Union citizen to whom he or she is lawfully married, in accordance with the law of a Member State other than the host State, can be classified as "any other family member" within the meaning of Article 3(2)(a) of Directive 2004/38 or a "partner with whom the Union citizen has a durable relationship, duly attested", within the meaning of Article 3(2)(b) of that directive, with the corresponding obligation for the host Member State to facilitate entry and residence for that spouse, even if that State does not recognise marriages between people of the same sex and provides no alternative form of legal recognition, such as registered partnership. If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, the Constitutional Court raises another question whether the host Member State must grant the right of residence in its territory for a period of longer than three months to the same-sex spouse of a Union citizen under the provisions of Art. 3 par. (2) and Art. 7 par. (2) of Directive 2004/38, read in conjunction with Art. 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights.

4. The relevance of invoking the provisions of Directive 2004/38

Before analysing and formulating a possible answer to the questions referred, both Advocate General and the Court of Justice examined whether the provisions of Directive 2004/38 can be relied on in the main proceedings, since, according to Art. 3 par. (1) of the Directive, they are applied to all citizens of the Union who move to or reside in a Member State other than that of which they are a national, as well as to their family members, as defined in point 2 of Article 2 of the directive, who accompany or join them", which means, at a first reading, that Mr. Hamilton cannot rely on the directive in his favour because it" is not capable of constituting the basis of a derived right of residence on him"[17].

The provision of Article 3 par. (1) of the Directive has been the subject of several interpretations given by the Court of Justice, which held on a number of occasions that the provisions of Directive 2004/38 governed only the conditions determining whether a citizen of the Union could enter or reside in Member States other than that of which he was a national"[18] and did not confer a derived right of residence to third-country nationals who were family members of a citizen of the Union in the Member state of which that citizen was a national"[19].

However, the Court held that an obstacle to the freedom of movement and the right of establishment [15] "1. This Directive shall apply to all Union citizens who move to or reside in a Member State other than that of which they are a national, and to their family members as defined in point 2 of Article 2 who accompany or join them.

2. Without prejudice to any right to free movement and residence the persons concerned may have in their own right, the host Member State shall, in accordance with its national legislation, facilitate entry and residence for the following persons: (a) any other family members, irrespective of their nationality, not falling under the definition in point 2 of Article 2 who, in the country from which they have come, are dependants or members of the household of the Union citizen having the primary right of residence, or where serious health grounds strictly require the personal care of the family member by the Union citizen; (b) the partner with whom the Union citizen has a durable relationship, duly attested. The host Member State shall undertake an extensive examination of the personal circumstances and shall justify any denial of entry or residence to these people".

[16] Article 7(1) and (2) of Directive 2004/38, entitled 'Right of residence for more than three months', states: " 1. All Union citizens shall have the right of residence on the territory of another Member State for a period of longer than three months if they: (a) are workers or self-employed persons in the host Member State; or (b) have sufficient resources for themselves and their family members not to become a burden on the social assistance system of the host Member State during their period of residence and have comprehensive sickness insurance cover in the host Member State; or (c) – are enrolled at a private or public establishment, accredited or financed by the host Member State on the basis of its legislation or administrative practice, for the principal purpose of following a course of study, including vocational training; and – have comprehensive sickness insurance cover in the host Member State and assure the relevant national authority, by means of a declaration or by such equivalent means as they may choose, that they have sufficient resources for themselves and their family members not to become a burden on the social assistance system of the host Member State during their period of residence; or (d) are family members accompanying or joining a Union citizen who satisfies the conditions referred to in points (a), (b) or (c). 2. The right of residence provided for in paragraph 1 shall extend to family members who are not nationals of a Member State, accompanying or joining the Union citizen in the host Member State, provided that such Union citizen satisfies the conditions referred to in paragraph 1(a), (b) or (c).

would occur "where the Union citizen's residence in the host Member State is sufficiently effective to enable him to start or to live a family life"[20] in that Member State. Thus, "any stay of a Union citizen in the host Member State accompanied by a member of his family who is a national of a non-Member State necessarily implies the grant of a derived right of residence to that family member in the Member State of which that citizen is a national when he returns to that Member State"[21]. If no such derived right of residence were granted, that Union citizen could be discouraged from leaving the Member State of which he is a national in order to exercise his right of residence under Article 21(1) TFEU in another Member State because he is uncertain whether he/she will be able to continue in his Member State of origin a family life which has been created or strengthened in the host Member State"[22]. That is why, according to the Court, "the spouse of a [Union] national who made use of those rights must, when the latter resides in his country of origin, have at least the same rights of entry and residence as well as those which it would be entitled to [the Union] 's right to have his spouse choose to enter and reside in another Member State"[23]. Accordingly, "the right to freedom of movement and the right of establishment recognised to the Union's national by the Treaties [could] not have full effects if that national [citizen] could be embezzled from exercising them by obstacles in his own country of origin, in the way of her/his spouse's entry and stay".

In the light of these considerations, Advocate General Wathelet, in his Opinion, stated: "Mr. Coman and Mr. Hamilton did, indeed, consolidate a family life while Mr. Coman, a citizen of the Union was residing in Belgium. When they had lived together for four years in New York and, in so doing, founded a family life, their relationship was indisputably consolidated by their marriage, in Brussels, on 5 November 2010"[24]. The fact that Mr. Hamilton did not live uninterruptedly with Mr. Coman in that city, did not (...) make him capable of rendering their relationship ineffective. Thus, in a globalised world, it is not unusual for a couple one of whom works abroad not to share the same accommodation for longer or shorter periods owing to the distance between the two countries, the accessibility of means of transport, the employment of the other spouse or the children's education. That lack of cohabitation cannot in itself have any effect on the existence of a proven stable relationship (...) and, consequently, on the existence of a family life"[25].Therefore, the fact that the Constitutional Court invokes the provisions of Directive 2004/38 is correct and that is why "the questions asked by the referring court remain relevant since the interpretation of the provisions referred to in the request for a preliminary ruling may be useful in resolving the case before the Constitutional Court"[26].

5. Interpretation of the notion of "spouse"

Relevant to our approach are the opinion of Advocate General and the answer of the Court of Justice to the first question formulated by the Romanian Constitutional Court, namely whether the notion of "spouse" in Article 2 point (a) of Directive 2004/38, in conjunction with Articles 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights also includes the same-sex national who is a citizen of a third country to whom a citizen of the European Union is legally married under the law of a Member State other than the host State. That is why the study will not analyse the other two preliminary questions.

It should also be noted that the Commission, the Dutch, Romanian, Latvian, Hungarian and Polish governments submitted observations in the file. The Union Executive and the Dutch Government consider that "Article 2 (2) (a) of Directive 2004/38 must be interpreted autonomously and uniformly[27]" in the sense that "a third-country national of the same sex as the Union citizen to whom he is legally married under the law of a Member State is covered by the concept of "spouse". Advocate General Wathelet himself states that "a literal, contextual and teleological interpretation of the term "spouse" used in Directive 2004/38 lead to an autonomous definition independent of the sexual orientation of that term"[28]. On the other hand, "the Romanian, Latvian, Hungarian and Polish Governments consider that this concept is not subject to EU law but must be defined in relation to the law of the host Member State"[29].

The Court's reasoning takes as its starting point the perspective expressed in time that "the rights granted to nationals of Member States include [also] the right to live a normal family life both in the host Member State and in the Member State whose Member State citizenship they possess, and on the occasion of their return to that Member State, they shall benefit from the presence of members of their families with them in the territory of that Member State"[30]. The phrase "members of their families" includes, according to Article 2 (a) of Directive 2004/38, also the spouse, namely "a person linked to another person by marriage"[31]. The Court rightly finds that the concept of 'spouse' in the Directive "is gender neutral and is therefore liable to include the same-sex spouse of the concerned citizen of the Union"[32]. Furthermore, the Court observes that the Union legislature, when referring to a 'family member' as the partner, with whom the Union citizen contracted a partnership registered under the legislation of a Member State, refers to the conditions laid down by the relevant legislation of the Member State in which this citizen intends to move or reside"[33], which is not the case for the "spouse".

In interpreting the notion of "spouse", the Court referred to the observations of the governments which argued that the refusal to recognise same-sex marriages concluded in another Member State constituted a restriction on free movement under the Treaty on European Union[34], but such a restriction was justified by grounds of public policy and national identity provided in the Treaty on European Union, Article 4 (2). With regard to such a comment, the Luxembourg Court pointed out that "the obligation of a Member State to recognise a same-sex marriage concluded in another Member State under the law of that State solely for the purpose of granting a derived right of residence to a third-country national, does not affect the institution of marriage in that first Member State, which is defined by national law"[35]. In other words, the Court assures Member States that the institution of same-sex marriage "is limited to the obligation to recognise such marriages contracted in another Member State under the law of that State solely for the purpose of exercising the rights conferred by Union law on such people"[36].

The Court also resorts to the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, recalling that "the relationship of a homosexual couple is likely to fall within the notion of "private life" as well as within the notion of "family life" of a heterosexual couple who is in the same situation"[37].

Therefore, the Court considers that a Member State cannot rely on its national law to oppose the recognition in its territory, solely for the purposes of granting a derived right of residence to a third-country national, of the marriage entered into by a citizen of the Union of the same sex in another Member State in accordance with the latter's right"[38], even if the civil status of the persons, which includes rules on marriage, is a matter which falls within the competence of the Member States"[39] (" thus, States are free to provide or not the same-sex marriage"[40]).

However, the Court considers that the refusal by a Member State to recognise, for the sole purpose of granting a derived right of residence to a third-country national, the marriage of that national with a Union citizen of the same sex legally contracted in another State Member State is likely to prevent the exercise of the right of the Union citizen to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States. "This would make the freedom of movement to vary from one Member State to another according to national provisions governing same-sex marriage"[41].

6. Conclusions

According to the conclusions of Advocate General Wathelet, the legal issue that the Court had to deal with in the Coman case, was not the legalisation of same-sex marriage but the free movement of Union citizens. Member States of the Union are free to regulate same-sex marriage, but they have to respect their obligations under the freedom of movement of citizens of the Union. Since Directive 2004/38 does not include any reference to the right of Member States to determine the status of 'spouse', the Court of Justice has had the task of providing that concept with an autonomous and uniform interpretation. According to the Court, the notion of 'spouse' within the meaning of the Directive is based on a marriage-based relationship but remains gender neutral no matter where the marriage was contracted. Consequently, such a person may therefore permanently reside in the territory of the Member State in which his/her spouse established himself/herself as a citizen of the Union after exercising his/her right to freedom of movement.

Therefore, "in a situation where a Union citizen made use of his or her freedom of movement by moving and actually residing (...) in a Member State other than that of which citizenship he or she owns, and established or consolidated , on that occasion, a family life with a third-country national of the same sex to which he is legally bound in the host Member State (...), the competent authorities of the Member State of which the citizen is a Union's national"[42]do not have the power to refuse to grant a right of residence in the territory of that Member State to that national on the ground that the law of that Member State does not provide marriage between persons of the same sex. Furthermore, the concept of 'spouse' in Directive 2004/38 must be interpreted as meaning that 'in circumstances such as those at issue in the main proceedings, a third-country national of the same sex as the citizen of the Union, whose marriage to that was completed in a Member State under the law of that State, has a right of residence for more than three months in the territory of the Member State of which the Union citizen is a national"[43].

INTERPRETATION AND ENFORCEMENT OF ARTICLE 148 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF ROMANIA REPUBLISHED, ACCORDING TO THE DECISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

Roxana-Mariana POPESCU

Abstract

The provisions of Article 148 establish the internal legal framework, at the level of basic law, in order for Romania to acquire the status of Member State with full rights and obligations, of the European Union. Regarding the interpretation and enforcement of the constitutional text, the case law of the Constitutional Court of Romania has evolved, leading to the following conclusion: the Constitution is the only direct reference in constitutional control.

1. Introductory aspects

The provisions of Article 148 establish the internal legal framework, at the level of basic law, in order for Romania to acquire the status of Member State with full rights and obligations, of the European Union, taking into account the provisions of Article 49 of the Treaty on European Union that provide that "the conditions of admission and the adjustments required by the Treaties on which the Union is based shall be the subject of an agreement between the Member States and the requesting State. This agreement is subject to ratification by all contracting states[1] in accordance with their constitutional regulations".

Having the marginal name of Integration into the European Union, Article 148 of the Constitution of Romania, republished, regulates the following aspects:

- Romania's adhesion to the constituent treaties of the European Union, including the acts revising the constitutive treaties, for the purpose of transferring tasks to the institutions of the European Union, as well as joint exercising with the other member states, of the competences provided in these treaties, is done by law adopted in the joint sitting of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, with a two-thirds majority of the number of deputies and senators;
- as a result of adhesion, the provisions of the constitutive treaties establishing the European Union, the acts revising the Treaties, as well as other binding Union regulations, take precedence over the contrary provisions of the national laws, in compliance with the provisions of the act of accession;
- The Parliament, the President of Romania, the Government and the judiciary authority guarantee the fulfillment of the obligations resulting from the act of accession and from the previous provisions;
- The Government delivers drafts of binding documents to the two Chambers of Parliament before they are subject to the approval of the institutions of the European Union.

"The constitutional text of reference is not distinguished through clarity or detail, so it is the task of the Constitutional Court to establish, based on the systematic interpretation of the Constitution, the relations of legal regulations in the two legal systems and how the rules of the European Union law interfere with the constitutional control"[2]. Furthermore, as the doctrine has shown, "due to the lack of specific regulation of the significance/role of some legal institutions in the Constitution of Romania, it is incumbent on the Constitutional Court of Romania to establish, in its jurisprudence, through binding decisions, the way of interpreting constitutional texts"[3].

2. Article 148 paragraph (1) of the Constitution republished, according to the interpretation of the Constitutional Court of Romania

As it is known, acquiring the status of EU Member State implies, inter alia, the transfer to the EU institutions of some of the competences exercised under sovereignty[4]. Naturally, EU membership is a result of the candidate's consent and compliance with the provisions included in the pre-accession agreements.

The provisions of Article 148 paragraph (1) of the Constitution of Romania, republished, creates the legal constitutional framework necessary for the accession of Romania to the European Union. Thus, the constituent legislator established the rule according to which "the accession to the European Union is by law, adopted by the joint sitting of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, with a qualified majority of two-thirds of the number of members of the Parliament". It should be noted that the option according to which "accession (...) is done by law" is in accordance with the provisions of Article 61 paragraph (1)[5] of the Constitution, which states that "Parliament is the supreme representative body of the Romanian people and the sole legislative authority of the country". According to the Constitutional Court, "the accession rule of law is intended to bring to the attention of the supreme representative body not only the importance of joining the European Union, but also the responsibility[6] that is conferred upon the Romanian state, as it acquires membership of the European Union"[7].

As regards the provision referring to the transfer of "tasks to the Community institutions", the Constitutional Court held that Article 148 paragraph (1) "refers to the sovereign exercise of the Romanian State's will to adhere to the constituent treaties of the European Union by a law, the adoption of which is conditioned by a qualified two-thirds majority. The Act of Accession has a dual consequence, namely the transfer of tasks to the Community institutions and, on the other hand, the joint exercise with the other Member States of the powers provided in those Treaties. As regards the first consequence, the Court notes that, by the simple belonging of a State to an international treaty, it diminishes its powers[8] within the limits set by international law"[9]. "But this consequence needs to be correlated with the second consequence of Romania's integration into the European Union. In this regard, the Constitutional Court notes that the act of integration also has the meaning of sharing the exercise of these sovereign tasks with the other constituent states of the international body. Therefore, the Constitutional Court notes that, through acts of transfer of tasks to the structures of the European Union, they do not acquire, through endowment, a "super-competence", their own sovereignty. In fact, the Member States of the European Union decided to jointly exercise certain attributions that traditionally fall within the scope of national sovereignty"[10].

The transfer of some tasks to the Union's institutions and the joint exercising of competences with the other Member States "do not affect the sovereignty of the states but, on the contrary, ensure that it is achieved at a higher level (...) for the benefit of each and every one"[11].

Under these circumstances, Article 148 paragraph (1) contains a "general Community clause"[12] of delegation of tasks, from national to supranational level, a mark specific to the integration system on which the European Union is based. Thus, we note the surprise of the EU's special functioning as an integration (and not cooperative) organization, which borrows elements relating to the federal organization of competences"[13]. In view of the importance of social relations "(involving the transfer of duties (...) and the exercise of common tasks[14] with the other Member States)", the legislator considered it necessary that the law of ratification of the Accession Treaty would be adopted by a special procedure, "which differs from that provided by the Constitution for other international treaties"[15]. The regulation of such a special procedure leads to the idea that "in the internal legal order, the legal act by which Romania adheres to the European Union has a juridical power inferior to the Constitution and constitutional laws, but superior to the organic and ordinary laws"[16].

3. Article 148 paragraph (2) of the Constitution republished, in the light of the decisions of the Constitutional Court of Romania

The accession to the EU implies a number of consequences. One of these consequences follows from the judgment[17] of the Court of Justice in Luxembourg ruled in 1978, in which the Court ruled that, under the "principle of the supremacy of Community law[18], the provisions of the Treaty and the acts of the directly applicable institutions have the effect, with the mere fact of their entry into force, not only to determine the inapplicability of any provision contrary to that of the existing national legislation, but also - to the extent that those provisions and acts form an integrant part, with the national law of the Member States rank higher than the internal rules of the legal order applicable in the territory of each Member State - to prevent the adoption of new national legislation in force in so far as they are incompatible with Community rules"[19].

The priority of European Union law to the domestic law of the Member States was settled by way of case law in Costa / Enel[20]. According to the Luxembourg Court of Justice, "the incorporation of Community provisions into the law of each Member country and, more generally, the meaning and spirit of the treaty have as a corollary the impossibility of states to prevail against an accepted legal order on the basis of reciprocity, a subsequent unilateral measure which cannot be relied upon in that way".

The interpretation of the Luxembourg Court requires the integration of the acquis of the European Union into national law, as well as the "determination of the relation between Community and national law"[21]. The solution proposed by the Constitution of our country is to implement the EU law in the internal legal order and to establish the rule of priority enforcement of EU law to the contrary provisions of the internal laws, in compliance with the provisions of the act of accession. Thus, according to Article 148 paragraph (2), "as a result of accession, the provisions of the Treaties establishing the European Union and other binding Community rules shall take precedence over the contrary provisions of national laws, in compliance with the provisions of the act of accession". The Constitutional Court notes that "this provision brings no prejudice to the constitutional provisions regarding the limits of the revision or other provisions of the Basic Law, being a particular enforcement of the provisions of the present Article 11 paragraph (2) of the Constitution"[22], according to which "the treaties ratified by the Parliament, according to the law, are part of the national law[23]".

It should be noted that, regarding the notion of "internal laws", the Constitutional Court, in its decisions, made a distinction between the Constitution and the other laws[24], thus pointing out that the provisions of Article 148 paragraph (2) do not take into account constitutional regulations. Thus, according to the Court, "constitutional provisions are not declaratory, but constitute mandatory constitutional rules without which the existence of the rule of law cannot be conceived. (...) The Basic Law is the framework and the extent to which the legislator and other authorities can act"[25]. In the view of the Constitutional Court, the enforcement in the internal legal order of European Union law without distinguishing between the Constitution and the other internal laws would mean that the Basic Law would be in a lower place than the legal order of the European Union because it would lose the binding legal force only by the inconsistency between its provisions and those of the European Union. At the same time, the Constitutional Court also noted the observation that "the accession to the European Union cannot affect the supremacy of the Constitution over the entire legal order"[26]. The Constitutional Court states that this would be impossible to accept because it would amount to "denying that the expression of the people's will is the Constitution itself"[27].

The Constitutional Court "established that binding acts of the European Union were regulations interposed in the framework of constitutional control"[28]. However, there is not one among the attributions of the CCRs concerning the enforcement of the "European Union rules to clarify or establish their content"[29]. "The competence to ensure the interpretation of Union law for the purpose of uniform enforcement at the level of all Member States lies with the Court of Justice of the European Union, which, as a Union jurisdiction authority within the meaning of Article 19 paragraph (3) section b) of the Treaty on European Union, shall give a preliminary ruling, at the request of the national courts, on the interpretation of Union law or on the validity of acts adopted by the institutions"[30]. The legal effects of the preliminary ruling of the Court of Justice of the European Union have been established by jurisprudence. Thus, "the Luxembourg Court held that such a ruling, bearing on its interpretation or validity of an act of the European Union, was binding on the court making the reference for a preliminary ruling and the interpretation, in common with the European provisions it interpreted, was also vested with authority vis-à-vis other national courts, which cannot give their own interpretation to those provisions"[31]. At the same time, "the effect of the preliminary rulings is direct, in the sense that nationals of the Member States have the right to rely directly on European regulations before national and European courts and on retrospective grounds, in the sense that the interpretation of a rule of law of the European Union in a preliminary reference clarifies and specifies its meaning and scope since its entry into force"[32].

The Constitutional Court acknowledges, however, that, due to the place that the European Union's regulations occupy, according to Article 148 par. (2) of the Constitution, in relation to its domestic law, it is "called upon to invoke in its case law the binding acts of the European Union[33] whenever they are relevant to the case, as long as their content is not unequivocal and does not require an interpretation of its own"[34]. However, the Constitutional Court is not competent to rule on issues related to "potential collisions between the domestic and relevant European Union legislation in different areas"[35], because the issue it is brought before "is not a matter of unconstitutionality, but of enforcement of the law, in the jurisdiction of the court ". Per a contrario, "the Court of Justice of the European Union has no jurisdiction to rule on the validity or invalidity of national law"[36].

What it is worthy to be kept in mind is that Romania does not accept the priority of enforcing European Union law based on the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice, but based on its own constitutional provisions.

4. Article 148 paragraph (3) of the Constitution republished

According to Article 148 paragraph (3), Romania's accession to the acts of revision of the constitutive treaties of the European Union is made by a law passed at the joint sitting of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, with a two-thirds majority of the deputies and senators. Unlike the situation regulated in paragraph (1) of the same article (the situation that applied prior to the acquisition by Romania of the status of EU Member State), the situation in para. (3) is different because this time, the status of Romania as a Member State of the European Union is taken into account because the Constitutive Treaties of the European Union are reviewed only by the Member States[37].

5. Article 148 paragraph (4) of the Constitution republished, according to the decisions of the Constitutional Court of Romania

The provisions of par. (4) of Article 148 state that "the President of Romania, the Parliament, the Government and the judiciary authority guarantee the fulfillment of the obligations resulting from the act of accession" and have the competence to guarantee the fulfillment of the obligations resulting from the acts of accession "and the implementation of the constitutional provisions of the Union and the mandatory regulations derived from them. "In this sense, the Government is constitutionally empowered to guarantee the fulfillment of Romania's obligations towards the European Union by the means at its disposal"[38].

However, when it comes to the power of the Government to regulate by means of emergency ordinances, the Constitutional Court ruled that their use "for the purpose of harmonizing the national legislation with the Community law in the situation in which the infringement procedure was imminent before the Court of Justice was fully constitutional[39].

In a case in which the Court held that there was a dispute between the Government and the authors of the objection of unconstitutionality regarding the directive applicable to the contractual and / or institutional public-private partnership, the violation of the provisions of Article 148 of the Constitution was invoked. The Court appreciated that the uncertainty present in the case in question "was given by the fact that the legislature failed to fulfill its obligation to indicate, in the criticized law, the acts of the European Union which are transposed through it, which is inadmissible. Irrespective of the applicable directive[40] (...), the Court noted that both contain conditions which coincide almost to detail with regard to the unilateral amendment or termination of the contract, while the text of Art. 38 paragraph (1) of the law on public-private partnership is unconstitutional] contains a normative solution that tends to evade these conditions. Consequently, the legislative solution contained in the criticized text represents a violation by the Parliament of the provisions of Article 148 paragraph (4) of the Constitution, which regulates its role as guarantor of the fulfillment of the obligations resulting from the act of accession. As a result, the Court admitted, in part, the objection of unconstitutionality formulated and found that the provisions of Article 38 para. (1) of the Public-Private Partnership Law were unconstitutional"[41].

According to the Constitutional Court's opinion, expressed in Decision no. 64/2015[42], "disagreements of the provisions of Art. 86 par. (6) the first sentence of Law no.85 / 2006 with binding acts of the European Union with constitutional relevance during the activity of Law no.85 / 2006 constitutes eo ipso a violation of the provisions of Article 148 par. (4) of the Constitution, since the legislator has allowed legal relations to be governed by these national provisions, and is disregarded by its constitutional obligation to guarantee, at legislative level, at least the same level of protection of the right to measures of social protection of the work with that stipulated in the binding acts of the European Union, as well as to permanently and continuously harmonize the national legislation with the binding acts of the European Union. In fact, the ordinary legislator identified those regulatory deficiencies and changed the legislative solution by Law no. 85/2014 on Insolvency and Insolvency Prevention Procedures"[43].

In Decision no. 602/2016[44], "the Court ruled on the legislator's obligation to adopt rules within the meaning of the judgments of the Court of Justice of the European Union (...)[45], with the effect of reimbursing the amounts collected as motor vehicle pollution tax and the pollutant emissions tax to motor vehicles plus the interest calculated until the date of full payment and court costs as well as other amounts set by the courts. The Court held that the legislator complied with the ruling of the Court of Justice of the European Union precisely through the provisions of the Constitution"[46].

6. Conclusions

The case law of the Constitutional Court of Romania regarding the interpretation and enforcement of the provisions of Art. 148 of the Constitution of Romania, republished, "has seen an evolution that led to the following conclusions in essence: the Constitution is the only direct reference in the framework of constitutional control; a rule of European law can be used in constitutional control as a rule interwoven with the direct reference, which can only be the Constitution, subject to certain conditions (an objective condition, regarding the clarity of the regulation, and a subjective one, which concerns the margin of appreciation of the constitutional relevance of the European Union legal regulation)"[47]. In that respect, the Constitutional Court held that "the use of a rule of law of the European Union in the framework of constitutional control as an interdependent rule (...) [of the Constitution] implied, under Art. 148 par. (2) and (4) of the Constitution of Romania, a cumulative conditionality: on the one hand, this rule must be sufficiently clear, precise and unambiguous by itself or its meaning has been clearly, precisely and unequivocally established by the Court of Justice of the European Union and, on the other hand, the rule must be circumscribed to a certain level of constitutional relevance, so that its normative content supports the possible violation by the national law of the Constitution - the only direct reference in constitutional control . In such a case, the action of the Constitutional Court is distinct from the simple enforcement and

INVOLVEMENT OF THE PEOPLE'S ADVOCATE IN THE CONSTITUTIONALITY REVIEW OF THE GOVERNMENT EMERGENCY ORDINANCES*

Simina Popescu-MARIN

Abstract

The Constitution attributes to the People's Advocate the possibility to notify the Constitutional Court of the unconstitutionality of the Government's Emergency Ordinances on the way of the exception of unconstitutionality. The study proposes an analysis of the legislative evolution in this field, highlighting some solutions regarding the conditions to be fulfilled by the People's Advocate on the occasion of the notification of the Constitutional Court with exceptions of unconstitutionality of some provisions of Government Emergency Ordinances, as they were stated in the Constitutional Court's case law. The mechanism, characterized by a number of peculiarities, proves its practical utility, given that in many cases the exceptions of unconstitutionality raised directly by the People's Advocate were admitted by the Constitutional Court. The exception of unconstitutionality of certain provisions of the Government Emergency Ordinances allows for the quick removal of the vices of unconstitutionality, avoiding the perpetuation of the unconstitutional state contrary to the fundamental rights and freedoms and the functioning of the rule of law.

1. Introduction

The issue regarding the involvement of the People's Advocate in constitutional review of Government Emergency Ordinances, by the exception of unconstitutionality, presents a number of theoretical and practical peculiarities, having an impact on the current state life both for individuals and public authorities. The present study proposes an analysis of the constitutional and legal regulations relating to this matter from the historical perspective of the legislation evolution, while also explaining the legal nature of the Emergency Ordinances, as it was stated by the Constitutional Court in its jurisprudence. It also highlights the procedural rules for resolving the unconstitutionality exceptions raised directly by the People's Advocate before the Constitutional Court, by reporting certain aspects regarding the condition that the emergency ordinance, subject to the exception, to be in force, according with the Constitutional Court jurisprudence. Asked to decide in which cases People's Advocate may raise before the Constitutional Court the exception of unconstitutionality the Court has held that the People's Advocate, on the basis of independence and impartiality it is the only one able to decide on the appropriateness of the exercise of this task, irrespective of the regulatory field in which the emergency ordinances are adopted. Relevant aspects of the case-law of the Court are highlighted in this respect. The presentation of statistical data, the subject matters in which the People's Advocate initiated constitutional review and some examples from the case-law of the Court regarding the settlement of the exceptions of unconstitutionality raised directly by the People's Advocate, aim to highlight the usefulness of exercising this power, which is able to clarify the state of constitutionality in case of the provisions contained in Government Emergency Ordinances, thus ensuring the Constitution supremacy and the rule of law. The study therefore proposes a novelty topic in the specialized literature, from the perspective of its practical valences, by highlighting the recent jurisprudential clarifications, necessary to be known by all those who notice the People's Advocate (individuals, representatives of political parties or public authorities etc.), demanding that some exceptions of unconstitutionality be raised directly before the Constitutional Court.

2. Content

Institution of constitutional democracy and rule of law, the People's Advocate has its own means of action to ensure the observance of the Constitution and its supremacy.

Besides the legal procedures specific to the activities of ombudsman institutions that consist in receiving and solving petitions, conducting inquiries and issuing recommendations to the public administration authorities, if it finds a violation of the rights and freedoms of individuals, the People's Advocate may refer the Constitutional Court with exceptions and objections of unconstitutionality and communicates, at its request, points of view on exceptions of unconstitutionality. An analysis of legal and constitutional regulations in this field shows that relations between the Ombudsman and the Constitutional Court was established in 2002 by Law no. 181/2002 for the modification and supplementing the Law no. 35/1191 on the organization and functioning of the People's Advocate[1], which, through the Single Article point 4, introduced in the Law no. 35/1997, a new article, art. $18^1$ , as follows: "In the case of a complaint concerning the unconstitutionality of laws and ordinances concerning the rights and freedoms of citizens, the Constitutional Court will also request the point of view of the People's Advocate Institution ." The statement of reasons of Law no. 181/2002 stated that, considering the role of the Ombudsman, stipulated in Art. 55 of the Constitution of Romania[2] "it would be useful to have a point of view in the cases of exceptions of unconstitutionality of some normative acts".

The constitutional establishment of the relationship between the People's Advocate and the Constitutional Court was made in 2003, during the revision of the Constitution by Law no. 429/2003 on the revision of the Romanian Constitution[3], which, by Single Article, point $75^1$ amended Art. 144 (a) regarding the role of the Constitutional Court in deciding on the constitutionality of the laws, before their promulgation, and by the Single Article point $75^3$ , which amended Art. 144 (c) on the Court's power to rule on exceptions of unconstitutionality. Law on the revision of the Romanian Constitution no. 429/2003 was approved by the national referendum of 18-19 October 2003 and entered into force on 29 October 2003[4]. Following the renumbering of articles and the republishing of the Constitution[5], Art. 144(a) became Art. 146 (a), and Art. 144(c) became Art. 146 (d) of the Constitution, republished, having the following content: " The Constitutional Court has the following attributions:

a) decides on the constitutionality of the laws, before the promulgation thereof, at the request of the President of Romania, of one of the presidents of the two Chambers, of the Government, of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, of the People's Advocate, of at least 50 deputies or at least 25 senators, as well as ex officio, on initiatives to revise the Constitution;

d) decides on exceptions of unconstitutionality with respect to laws and Government ordinances brought before courts of law or commercial arbitration; the exception of unconstitutionality can also be raised directly by the People's Advocate;".

Involving the People's Advocate in the constitutional review was therefore established at the constitutional level, although by the grounds set out in the Decision no. 148 of April 16, 2003 on the constitutionality of the legislative proposal to revise the Constitution of Romania[6], the Constitutional Court stated that : "With regard to the hypothesis contained in the same provision concerning the possibility of the People's Advocate to raise the exception of unconstitutionality, the Court finds that it does not contain a judicious solution (…), since the fact that the People's Advocate raises the exception of unconstitutionality for the benefit of a person cannot have the meaning of a genuine guarantee or a measure of protection of the citizen, as long as that person, having the capacity to act and being animated by a legitimate interest, has the possibility to exercise the procedural right to raise the exception before the court. In addition, the Constitutional Court notes that the People's Advocate can not invoke a procedural position that would legitimize his participation in a trial before the courts. As citizens are guaranteed with the right to free access to justice and the right to defense, they can defend themselves against the application of unconstitutional legal provisions in the judicial sphere. That is why the People's Advocate would have invested with an excessive, unconscionable role. In fact, the ombudsman institution at European level is conceived as a public authority whose attributions relate to the relationship of individuals with the public administration and not with the courts ".

Subsequent to the specified constitutional norms, rules regarding the involvement of the People's Advocate in a priori and a posteriori constitutional review were established by Art. I point 10 of Law no. 233/2004 for amending and completing the Law no. 35/1997 regarding the organization and functioning of the People's Rights Institution[7], and by Art. I, 12, 15, 16, 17, 24 and 28 of Law no. 232/2004 for amending and completing the Law no. 47/1992 on the organization and functioning of the Constitutional Court[8].

Following the republishing of the normative acts regarding the organization and functioning of the two fundamental state institutions, provisions regarding the possibility of the People's Advocate to refer the Constitutional Court directly, with the exception of unconstitutionality of the Government's emergency ordinances, can be found in Art. 15 par. (1)(i) of Law no. 35/1997 regarding the organization and functioning of the People's Advocate Institution[9], according to which the People's Advocate has the following attributions: (i) may directly refer the Constitutional Court, with the exception of unconstitutionality of laws and ordinances; and in Art. 32 and Art. 33 of Law no. 47/1992 on the organization and functioning of the Constitutional Court[10]. Thus, Court Constitutional decide on the exceptions of unconstitutionality directly raised by the People's Advocate on the constitutionality of a law or ordinance or a provision of a law or ordinance in force.

In the Romanian legal system, the Government Emergency Ordinances are primary regulatory acts, equal in legal force with law, as it is highlighted by the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court ( e.g. Decision no. 5 of 16 January 2001[11]). In terms of their legal nature, the two categories of normative acts- the law and the Government Emergency Ordinance- are not identical, having a different constitutional and legal regime. According to the jurisprudence of the Court, " the Government Ordinance approved by Parliament by law, in accordance with the provisions of Art. 115 par. (7) of the Constitution , ceases to be a stand-alone normative act and becomes, as a result of the approval by the legislative authority, a law, even if, for reasons of legal technique, together with the data of the approval law, preserves the identification elements assigned to their adoption by the Government In other words, the Government ordinance loses the character of a mixed act (administrative act through the prism of the issuer / legislative act through its content) and becomes law. " (see, to that effect, Decision no. 95 of 8 February 2006[12], Decision no. 1.039 of 9 July 2009[13], or Decision no. 761 of December 17, 2014[14] , paragraph 27].

Regarding the condition that the norms forming the object of the exception be "in force", the Constitutional Court, by Decision no. 766 of 15 June 2011[15], stated that "the phrase « in force » in the provisions of Art. 29 par. (1) and Art. 31 par. (1) of the Law no. 47/1992 on the organization and functioning of the Constitutional Court, republished, is constitutional insofar as it is interpreted as subjecting to constitutional review, the laws or ordinances or the provisions of laws or ordinances whose legal effects continue to occur after the exit of their force".

In resolving the unconstitutionality exception raised directly by the People's Advocate, the provisions of L aw no. 47/1992 on the settlement of the unconstitutionality exception raised before the courts or commercial arbitration apply accordingly. However, the Constitutional Court held that the phrase "in force" cannot be interpreted in the same way as in the Decision no. 766 of June 15, 2011, as the settlement of the exception of unconstitutionality directly raised by the People's Advocate is done in the context of an abstract constitutional review, as long as the Constitutional Court cannot determine whether the legal provisions criticized still produce effects or their extent (this appreciation can be made only when it comes to an exception raised before a court of law or commercial arbitration). Therefore, the Court can only reject the exception of unconstitutionality directly raised by the People's Advocate on legal provisions that have been substantially amended or repealed after notification of the Constitutional Court (e.g. Decision no. 1167 of 15 September 2011[16], Decision no. 549 of July 15, 2015[17]).

Continuing its reasoning, by Decision no. 64 of February 9, 2017[18], the Court, by a majority of votes (with separate opinion signed by two judges of the Constitutional Court) held that "the People's Advocate raises an exception of unconstitutionality distinct from any judicial procedure, therefore, without any dispute, not having to defend a subjective right. Moreover, the Court held that, in the context of this abstract constitutional review, it cannot be determined whether the repealed normative act still produces legal effects on concrete legal relationships, which can be assessed only when the exception is raised before a court or commercial arbitration (see Decision no. 1.167 of 15 September 2011 or Decision no. 549 of July 15, 2015 , paragraph 16 ), which demonstrates the inapplicability of the Decision no. 766 of 15 June 2011 .

Therefore, in the latter hypothesis, the Court stated that the constitutionality review under Art. 146 (d) the second sentence of the Constitution can be performed , if the primary legal act criticized by the People's Advocate is part of the active fund of legislation, implicitly, of the legislative solution contained therein; only if the legislative solution was maintained, at the date of the Court's pronouncement, it can be analyzed on the merits under the conditions of the constitutional provision previously mentioned.

In the present case, at the time the unconstitutionality exception was raised, the emergency ordinance criticized by the People 's Advocate was partially in force [Art. II and Art. III par. (2) - (4)], in other words, it was part of the positive law, and partially was to enter into force on 11 February 2017 (art. I and Art. III par. (1)]. Even if the People's Advocate raised the exception of unconstitutionality of the entire emergency ordinance, which, at the time of the referral [3 February 2017], was not yet in force as a whole, the Court noted that in its case-law it recognized the possibility of raising an exception of unconstitutionality on emergency ordinances which, although published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, are not yet in force due to the fact that they themselves provide for a later date of entry into force (see, in this respect, Decision no. 447 of 29 October 2013[19]). However, at the time of judging the exception of unconstitutionality, the essential constitutional requirement is that the normative act, containing the criticized legislative solution, be in force, or be part of the active fund of legislation [see also Decision no. 447 of 29 October 2013, decision by which the Court accepted the exception of unconstitutionality at a date after the enactment of the contested normative act, even if it was not yet in force at the time of Constitutional Court notification]; so, naturally, the Court has jurisdiction to consider the constitutionality of the emergency ordinance, on the grounds of Art. 146 (d) the second sentence of the Constitution , only insofar as it is in force, thus maintaining the criticized legislative solution at the time of the decision. In the present case, the Court finds that the urgency ordinance criticized was no longer in force, being expressly repealed.

Accordingly, the Court held that the condition for the admissibility of the exception of unconstitutionality regarding character "into force" of the normative act subject to constitutional review was not accomplished. Accordingly, since the date of Court pronouncement was later than the date of repealing the criticized emergency ordinance, namely February 5, 2017, the Court rejected the exception of unconstitutionality as inadmissible.

The rules for solving the exception of unconstitutionality of an Emergency Government Ordinance are as follows: The Constitutional Court decides on the exceptions on the unconstitutionality of a Government ordinance or a provision of an ordinance in force. The provisions found to be unconstitutional by an earlier decision of the Constitutional Court cannot be subject of the exceptions on the unconstitutionality. Receiving the exception, the President of the Constitutional Court shall designate the Judge-Rapporteur and forward the judgment act by witch the Court has been notify to the Presidents of both Houses of Parliament and Government, indicating the date by which they can submit their opinions. Obviously, if the People's Advocate is the one who notify the Constitutional Court, by way of an exception of unconstitutionality, is not asked for its point of view on its own exception.

Judge - Rapporteur is required to take the necessary measures to administer the evidence at the time of the trial. Judgment takes place on the basis of the documents contained in the file, with the notification of the parties and of the Public Ministry. The prosecutor's participation in the trial is mandatory.

The decision to declare the unconstitutionality of an Emergency Government Ordinance or a provision of an ordinance in force is final and binding. If the exception is admitted, the Court will also rule on the constitutionality of other provisions of the contested act, of which the provisions referred to in the referral can not necessarily be dissociated.

As a result of the decision of the Constitutional Court, provisions of the ordinances in force found to be unconstitutional shall cease their legal effects 45 days after the publication of the Constitutional Court's decision if within this interval the Parliament or the Government, as the case may be, does not harmonize the provisions unconstitutional with the provisions of the Constitution, as established by Art. 147 par. (4) of the Constitution. Also, for a period of 45 days, the provisions found to be unconstitutional are de iure suspended.

Regarding the provisions of Art. 147 par. (1) of the Constitution , the Court , by Decision no. 415 of April 14, 2010[20], stated that they establish a difference in the obligation to harmonize the unconstitutional provisions with the provisions of the Constitution - between the competence of the Parliament for the provisions of the laws, on the one hand, and of the Government, for the provisions of ordinances, on the other hand.

Decisions by which the Court finds the unconstitutionality of an ordinance or a provision of an ordinance is communicated to the two Chambers of Parliament, the Government and the People's Advocate.

Regarding the legal provisions which may constitute the object of the unconstitutionality exceptions raised directly by People's Advocate it is important to stress upon an issue judicially established by the Constitutional Court on the occasion of solving the unconstitutionality exception of the provisions of Art. 13 par. (1) ( f) of Law no. 35/1997 regarding the organization and functioning of the People's Advocate Institution, which state that: " (1) The People's Advocate has the following duties: [...]

f) may refer the Constitutional Court directly, unconstitutionality exception of laws and ordinances."

Thus, in support of the criticism of unconstitutionality of the provisions of Art. 13 par. (1)( f) of Law no. 35/1997, the People's Advocate, as the author of the exception of unconstitutionality, showed that the legal provisions criticized violate Art. 58 of the Constitution "in so far as they are interpreted as meaning that the People's Advocate may refer to the Constitutional Court objections or exceptions of unconstitutionality also in other cases than those concerning the rights and freedoms of individuals ". The People's Advocate argued that " Article 58 paragraph (1) of the Constitution enshrines the functional specialization of the People's Advocate, limiting its competence to the field of defense the individuals rights and freedoms. The notification of the Constitutional Court by an objection or exception to unconstitutionality is a way of fulfilling its constitutional role. The People's Advocate therefore considered that the objection or exception of unconstitutionality, in addition to the procedural conditions determining the lawfulness of the referral, must be circumscribed to the role and attributions and respect People's Advocate status ".

[19] published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 674 of November 1, 2013
[20] published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 294 of May 5, 2010

Consequently, " if the criticized legal text would be interpreted in the sense of recognizing its competence to raise objections and exceptions of unconstitutionality in all cases, this would be a violation of Art. 58 and 59 of the Constitution".

Finally, the People's Advocate argue that "the Constitutional Court jurisprudence is various in dealing with the role of the Ombudsman as a defender of the rights and freedoms of individuals, invoking in this respect the Decision No. 1.133 of 27 November 2007, on the one hand, for the recognition of its competence to raise exceptions of unconstitutionality in all cases, and of the Decisions no. 1.631 of 20 December 2011 and no. 45 of 20 January 2011, on the other hand, to the contrary ."

Consequently, the People's Advocate considered that "the criticized legal provisions are unconstitutional insofar as they are interpreted as meaning that the Ombudsman may raise the exception of unconstitutionality also in cases that do not concern the rights and freedoms of individuals. "

At the request of the Constitutional Court, the Government communicated its point of view on the exception of unconstitutionality of Art. 13 par. (1)( f) of Law no. 35/1997 , according to which the exception "could be admitted insofar as it is interpreted that the Ombudsman may raise exceptions of unconstitutionality in any case, even if the legal text whose constitutionality is being considered does not affect the rights or freedoms of some individuals " .In this sense, The Government mentioned that "systematic interpretation of the constitutional provisions of Art. 58 and Art. 146 (d) leads to the conclusion that the constitutional rank attribution that allows the People's Advocate to raise ex officio exceptions of unconstitutionality should be circumscribed to the role of the People's Advocate, otherwise it would lead to a distortion of its role in the Romanian constitutional and institutional system . "

The People's Advocate also informed the Constitutional Court, notified with the exception of the unconstitutionality of some legal provisions regarding the modification and completion of the Law no. 370/2004 for the election of the President of Romania , that, "in virtue of the institutional and functional independence it enjoys", "it does not express his opinion on the legal provisions criticized." He argued that "the People's Advocate exercises his powers within the constitutional and legal limits established for the fulfillment of his role as a defender of the rights and freedoms of individuals, without substituting other public authorities who, in their turn, have to fulfill their own attributions, as they are covered by the legislation in force. The issues raised concern mainly the relations between the public authorities, aspects of the functioning of constitutional democracy, which imply an analysis and a policy approach, which would oblige the People's Advocate to overcome his position of neutrality and objectivity and to engage in partisan controversy". Or, the People's Advocate must be impartial and objective, without engaging himself as an arbiter in politically nuanced disputes between state institutions, his fundamental role being [...] to defend the rights and freedoms of individuals in their relations with the authorities of the public administration." (see Decision No. 460 of 16 September 2014[21]).

The legal issue regarding the cases when the Ombudsman may refer the Constitutional Court the exception of unconstitutionality was examined by the Constitutional Court which by Decision. 336 of 24 September 2013[22], rejected as inadmissible the exception of unconstitutionality of Art. 13 par. (1)( f) of Law no. 35/1997 regarding the organization and functioning of the People's Advocate Institution, exception directly raised by the People's Advocate. Such a solution was based on the following reasoning: " The power of the People's Advocate to raise exceptions of unconstitutionality was established by the Law on the Revision of the Romanian Constitution no. 429/2003[23].

Article 13 (1)( f) of Law no. 35/1997 restates at infra-institutional level the provisions of Art. 146 (d) the second sentence of the Constitution , according to which "the exception of unconstitutionality can be raised directly by the People's Advocate".

By Decision no. 1.133 of November 27, 2007[24], the Constitutional Court established that Art. 146 of the Constitution does not set condition, in the manner shown by the Government, on the cases in which the Ombudsman is empowered to address to the Constitutional Court notices or exceptions of unconstitutionality.

The Government, in its opinion submitted and retained in the aforementioned decision, considered that from the systematic interpretation of the legal texts regulating the role and attributions of the People's Advocate, as well as of the constitutional provisions regulating the sphere of the legal subjects that may refer the Constitutional Court to an exception to unconstitutionality is that the People's Advocate has the power to initiate constitutional control by referring the Constitutional Court only in respect of the defense of the rights and freedoms of individuals.

According to the settled case law of the Constitutional Court, the People's Advocate may initiate the constitutional review on the basis of the exception of unconstitutionality irrespective of the issues covered by it, but the direct raising of the exception of unconstitutionality is and remains at the exclusive appreciation of the People's Advocate, that cannot be obliged or blocked by any public authority to raise such an exception.

As a consequence, the Court found that the Ombudsman had its marge in his decision to raise an exception of unconstitutionality, part of the institutional and functional independence he enjoys, so that there is no interest of the People's Advocate in promoting such an exception of unconstitutionality, since, by its very mode of action, it can conform to the constitutional meaning of the text.

In these circumstances, the Court held that, in fact, the Ombudsman wanted to be declared as unconstitutional the interpretation resulting indirectly from an earlier decision of the Constitutional Court (Decision no. 1133 of November 27, 2007, precited ); whereas the criticized legal norm is similar to the constitutional text of Art. 146 (d) the second sentence, the text of which the Constitutional Court has already established its meaning, it is inadmissible to find the unconstitutionality of an interpretation given to the constitutional norm by the Constitutional Court.

In fact, accepting the point of view of the People's Advocate would mean that the exceptions of unconstitutionality raised after year 2003, which did not concern the individuals fundamental rights and freedoms, had been formulated in violation of the Constitution , and the Constitutional Court, given that it analyzed them in substance, had violated the Constitution itself.

The Court also held that Article 146 (d) the second sentence of the Constitution was interpreted in the case law of the Constitutional Court in the sense that the People's Advocate is not limited to referring the Constitutional Court exceptionally only to matters concerning fundamental rights and freedoms; consequently, since the constitutional text has not been revised, such an interpretation of the Constitutional Court can no longer be called into question ."

Summarizing, we observe that the constitutional and legal provisions in the field and the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court recognize the People's Advocate the right to notify the Constitutional Court with exceptions of unconstitutionality of some provisions of Government Emergency Ordinances, regardless of their subject matter, and that the appreciation to exercise of such a power rests solely with the Ombudsman, by virtue of his independence.

By exercising the constitutional review on the Parliament's Decision of dismissal the People's Advocate, by Decision No. 732 of July 10, 2012[25], the Constitutional Court held that "the People's Advocate is only responding to Parliament and its activity is subject to parliamentary control. As a result, the Parliament is the only authority able to assess whether the work of the People's Advocate as a leader of the institution has been achieved within the limits of the Constitution and law".

The emergency ordinances which were subjects of the unconstitutionality exceptions raised directly Ombudsman focused on issues concerning the organization and functioning of institutions or state authorities, rights and freedoms or problems inherent in the functioning rule of law, such as : organizing and the functioning of the Court of Audit, ministerial responsibility, public road traffic, the establishment of measures for the remuneration of education staff in the year 2008, the National Anticorruption Directorate , the public pensions system, state and service pensions, some measures in the field of public finances , ensuring the continuity of the activity of some structures within the Government's working apparatus, amending the Civil Procedure Code, paying certain amounts provided in executive titles for granting salary rights to the budgetary sector personnel, organizing the work of practitioners in insolvency, local public finances, as well as the establishment of financial measures, political convictions and administrative measures assimilated to them, pronounced between 6 March 1945-22 December 1989, strengthening the administrative capacity of the Romanian Office for Copyright Application, fees for crossing the national road network in Romania, establishing financial measures health insurance and public finance , measures in the cultural field , measures to reorganize the Official Gazette of Romania , Romania participation to the proceedings before the European Court of Human Rights and the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe and the exercise of the right of the state to resolve amicable settlements and decisions, insolvency and insolvency prevention procedures, the obligation of economic operators to use electronic fiscal cash registers, disposition of immovable seized property, annuity agricultural payment and holding of the referendum, amendment of Criminal Code, amending some legislative acts regarding education, research, training and health, holidays and benefits of health insurance .

By analyzing the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court in the field, it follows that, since 2006, when the People's Advocate raised the first exception to the unconstitutionality of provisions contained in an emergency governmental ordinance (see, in this respect, Decision no. 544 of June 28, 2006[26], regarding the unconstitutionality of the

[25] published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 480 of July 12, 2012
[26] published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, No. 568 of 30 June 2006

Government Emergency Ordinance No. 43/2006 on the organization and functioning of the Court of Audit) until March 15th, 2019, the People's Advocate notified the Constitutional Court with 27 exceptions of unconstitutionality of some provisions of Government Emergency Ordinances. Of these, 24 were settled by the Constitutional Court and three of them are pending. Following the settlement of exceptions, it appears that, in 14 cases, the Constitutional Court upheld the constitutional criticisms made, while in 10 cases dismissed as unfounded or inadmissible the exceptions of unconstitutionality.

These statistics data prove the usefulness of the role of the Ombudsman in the constitutional review, especially since in the case of Government Emergency Ordinances the exception of unconstitutionality raised by the Ombudsman directly to the Constitutional Court, in the absence of a case before a court of law is the only constitutional and legal way to verify their constitutionality in order to remove the vices of unconstitutionality and restore the Constitution supremacy.

Although there are certain examples in this respect, we can summarize here the Decision no. 1354 of 21 October 2010[27], by which the Constitutional Court upheld the exception of unconstitutionality directly raised by the People's Advocate. The Court held the the reasoning of the People's Advocate, according to which the establishment of a distinct legal treatment between the persons entitled to compensation for political convictions, depending on the moment when the court pronounced the final judgment did not have an objective and reasonable justification and therefore the legal provisions criticized were contrary to Art. 16 of the Constitution regarding the equality of rights.

Also, during nowadays reallity, may occur situations requiring prompt reaction for the verification of the constitutionality of Government Emergency Ordinances in order to eliminate or to reduce the negative consequences arising from a possible state of unconstitutionality. In such cases, the possibility of the People's Advocate to refer the Constitutional Court directly, by the exception of unconstitutionality, is a quick and adequate remedy capable of ensuring respect for the supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law, enshrined in Art. 1 par. (5) of the Constitution.

3. Conclusions

The constitutional and legal regulations on the involvement of the People's Advocate in the constitutional review of Government Emergency Ordinance's Constitution support the aim of extending constitutional and institutional guarantees of fundamental rights and freedoms in line with those conferring similar attributions to Ombudsman institutions in the Member States of the European Union. Moreover, a comparative analysis of the power and duties of Ombudsman institutions is a subject to a separate future study with the purpose to analyze the possibility of involving the Ombudsman in other areas of constitutional review. Being at the sole appreciation of the People's Advocate, but subject to the requirements established by law, whose knowledge is extremely important for people who require the Ombudsman to raise directly the exception of unconstitutionality before the Constitutional Court, exercising this power proves practical its utility by clarifying the uncertainty on the constitutionality of some primary regulatory provisions.

LOCAL TAXES IN BULGARIA- A SOURCE OF REVENUES IN THE MUNICIPALITY BUDGETS

Vanya PANTELEEVA

Abstract

Amendments to the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria were adopted in 2007 and Article 141 empowered the municipal councils to determine the amount of local taxes under the conditions and within the limits established by law. In practice, with this change, municipalities were given real tax powers for the first time. At the end of 2007, the relevant changes were made to the Local Taxes and Fees Act, which laid down these powers of the municipalities. The following years were extremely turbulent for municipal budgets and for fiscal policy in the country at large. Serious revenue growth in 2007 and 2008 was followed by a decline since the 2009 crisis. It was the crisis that challenged the new powers of the municipalities and revealed the lack of sufficient tools for conducting an adequate fiscal policy at the local level. Municipal budgets inevitably shrank during the difficult years and remain heavily dependent on state transfers. Meanwhile, within their limited powers, municipalities have started to pursue their own tax policy and compete on the level of local taxes.

The present article examines the different local taxes according to the tax system in Bulgaria, their rates and their influence in formation of municipality budgets revenues in the Republic of Bulgaria. In the conclusion, the idea of fiscal decentralization is considered and are made recommendations for effective allocation of local tax revenues.

1. Introduction

1.1. Introduction

In the Act amending and supplementing the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria, published in issue 12/2007 of the State Gazette, was made an important change concerning the powers of the legislative body - the National Assembly. This change concerned the organization of taxes. In the amended Article 84, point 3 of the Constitution has been provided that the National Assembly shall establish the taxes and determine the amount of the state taxes. In Art. 141 was created a new paragraph 3, which stipulates that the municipal council shall fix the amount of local taxes under the terms, procedure and within the limits established by law. The amendment of the Constitution is a subsequent step in the implementation of the idea of decentralization of the financial resources to municipalities.[1]

2. Content

According to Local Taxes and Fees Act, the following local taxes enter into the municipal budgets:

1. real estate tax;
2. succession tax;
3. donation tax;
4. tax on acquisition of property for consideration;
5. transport vehicle tax;
6. license tax (in force as of 01.01.2008);
7. tourist tax (in force as of 01.01.2011);
8. tax on the carriage of passengers by taxi (in force as of 01.01.2017);
9. any other local taxes as determined by legislative statute.

Real estate tax is levied on the buildings and land located within the territory of Bulgaria, located within the spatial planning areas of settlements, as well as the lands outside such areas, which, according to a detailed plan, have the purpose under Article 8, pt. 1 of the Spatial Planning Act; and after change of land's purpose where that is required by special legislative statute.

From the scope of taxation are excluded sites occupied by streets, roads of the national and municipal road networks, and the railway network, up to the limiting construction lines, any lands occupied by water basins which are state and municipal property, agricultural land and forests, with the exception of land with buildings and only for the built area and the adjoining it land.

According to Art. 11 from Local Taxes and Fees Act, the taxable persons are the owners of taxable real estates. Tax is due regardless of the fact if the real property has been used or not and the tax is determined on the basis of the value of the real property.

In Art. 22 from the same Act, the Municipal Councils have been ordered by an ordinance to determine the amount of the tax within the limits specified by the law. These limits are from 0.1 to 4,5 per mille of the tax value of the real estate. Therefore, every Municipality has different amount of real estate tax.

Succession tax is levied on the estate of any Bulgarian citizen succeeding located within Bulgaria or abroad property, as well as on the estate located within Bulgaria succeeded by foreign citizens. The estate of any succeeding stateless person is taxed as estate of Bulgarian citizens, if the person has been permanently resident within the territory of Bulgaria.

According to Art. 31 from Local Taxes and Fees Act, succession tax is paid by heirs, beneficiaries and legatees. The Municipal Council determines the amount of the tax separately for each heir or legatee, as follows:

1. brothers, sisters and their children: from 0.4 to 0.8 % for a succession over BGN 250,000.
2. for persons other than those under point 1: from 3.3 to 6.6 % for a succession over BGN 250,000.

Art. 44 from Local Taxes and Fees Act says that with Donation Tax and Tax on Acquisition of Property are taxed properties acquired through donation, as well as acquired real estates, limited rights thereto, and motor vehicles. Subject to taxation are also properties acquired without consideration in any manner other than by donation, as well as any obligations remitted. Tax charge on acquisition of property and is due to the acquisition of real estate and limited real rights over them on prescription According to Art. 45 from Local Taxes and Fees Act, the tax is paid by the person acquiring the property under Article 44, and in the case of exchange, by the person acquiring the property of higher value, unless otherwise agreed. In case that it has been agreed that the tax is due by both parties, they are solidary obliged. If the parties have agreed that the tax is due by the transferor, the other party is a guarantor. If the person acquiring the property is abroad, the person delivering the property is obliged for payment of the tax.

The base for calculation of the tax is the value of the property in BGN at the time of the transfer, a limitation on the acquisition - at the time of issuance of the order certifying the right of property subject to registration.

The value of the property is calculated as follows:

1. real estates and limited rights thereto: at the price negotiated or at a price as set by a state or municipal authority or, if the said price be lower than the tax value, at the tax value under Annex 2;
2. any other properties: under the terms of Article 33 (1) pts. 2, 3, 4 and 5.

From tax are exempted the following:

1. property acquired by:

a) the State and the municipalities;
b) any budget-financed educational, cultural and scientific organizations, as well as specialized social services institutions and institutions providing medical – social care for children;
c) the Bulgarian Red Cross;
d) the nationally representative organizations of people with disabilities and for people with disabilities;
e) any funds providing relief to victims of natural disasters and financing the conservation and restoration of historical and cultural monuments;
f) healthcare institutions under Article 5(1) of the Healthcare Institutions Act.

2. any donations for medical treatment of citizens of member – states of the European Union, or other state party to the European Economic Area Agreement, as well as of technical assistance for people with disabilities;
3. humanitarian donations to persons who have lost between 50 and 100 % of their working capacity and to socially disadvantaged individuals;
4. donations for non -profit legal entities which receive subsidies from the central budget, and any non-profit legal entities, registered in the Central Register for Not-Profit Legal Entities designated for pursuit of public-benefit activities, in respect of the donations received and provided;
5. customary gifts;
6. any property transferred for free under statutory obligation;
7. donations in favour of cultural centers (chitalishte);
8. properties acquired under the Privatization and Post-privatization Control Act;
9. contributions in kind to the capital of a company, cooperative or a non-profit organization;
10. foreign States in respect of acquisition of real property: on a basis of reciprocity.
11. assistance provided under the terms and conditions the Financial Support for Culture Act.

According to Art. 47 from Local Taxes and Fees Act, upon donation of property, tax shall be calculated on the value of the transferred property in rates determined by the Municipal Council ordinance as follows:

1. from 0.4 to 0.8%: in case of donations between brothers and sister and their children;
2. from 3.3 to 6.6%: in case of donations between any persons other than the persons referred to in point 1,

If property is transferred for consideration, the tax is determined by the Municipal Council at a rate of 0.1 to 3 % of the value of the transferred property, and in the case of exchange, of the value of the more valuable property.

Upon partition of property resulting in an increase of the part owned before the partition, tax is calculated on the increase.

With the amendment of Art. 50 from the Local Taxes and Fees Act from 2018, in force from 2019, judges, notaries, regional governors, municipality mayors and other public officials execute the transaction or the act whereby rights are acquired, created, modified or terminated after ascertaining that the donation Tax and Tax on Acquisition of Property has been paid. From 2019, the notary's assessment of the tax paid on the vehicle subject to the transaction is made with:

1. verification by automated exchange of data with the information exchange system, maintained by the Ministry of Finance pursuant to Art. 5a mediated by the information system of the Ministry of Interior, or with
2. provision of a document issued or certified by the municipality, provided that the respective municipality has not provided the continuous automated exchange under point 1.

Transport vehicle tax is settled in Art. 52 from Local Taxes and Fees Act and shall be levied on:

1. motor vehicles registered for operation on the road network in the Republic of Bulgaria;
2. ships registered in the Bulgarian ports;
3. aircrafts recorded in the state register of civil aircraft of the Republic of Bulgaria.

The tax is paid by the owners of the transport vehicles.

The owners of transport vehicles shall declare the transport vehicles owned by them before the municipality where their permanent address or registered office is located, within two months after acquisition of the vehicles. With regard to transport vehicles, which have not been registered for operation within Bulgaria, the two-month time limit begins from the date of registration operation. Upon acquisition of a transport vehicle by succession, the declaration shall be submitted within 6 months after the opening of a succession.

For passenger cars and commercial vehicles with a technically permissible maximum mass not exceeding 3.5 tonnes, the annual tax consists of two components - property and environmental, and is determined by formula.

For other kinds of vehicles, such as passenger car trailers, commercial vehicles trailers, motorcycles, buses etc., the Municipal Council determines the amount of the tax by ordinance.

Local taxes and Fees Act provides tax exemption for transport vehicles owned by state and municipal bodies and by budget-financed organizations which enjoy special traffic privileges, as well as ambulances and fire trucks belonging to other persons; vehicles owned by diplomatic missions and consulates, on a basis of reciprocity; vehicles owned by the Bulgarian Red Cross, where used for the purposes of the organization; passenger cars owned by disabled persons who have lost between 50 and 100% of their working capacity, of an engine capacity not exceeding 2 000 cubic centimeters and engine power not exceeding 117, 64 kW; electrical automobiles.

License tax is an annual tax which is due by any natural person, including a sole proprietor, conducting an activity specified in Annex 4 (License Activities), with regard to the income from any such activity, provided that:

1. the turnover of the person for the preceding year does not exceed BGN 50,000, and
2. the person is not registered under the Value Added Tax Act, with the exception of registration for intra-Community acquisition under Article 99 and Article 100 (2) of that Act.

According to Annex 4, license activities are: collective tourist accommodation establishments or supplementary tourist accommodations of not more than 20 rooms; Mass-catering and entertainment establishments; Paid parking facilities; Carpenter services; Tailor, currier, furrier and knitting services; Trade in, manufacture of, and services involving Articles of precious metals; Cobbler, hatter and milliner services; Metalworker services; Hairdresser and barber services, pet beauty parlour services; Typing and/or photocopying services; Cosmetic and tattooing services; Manicure and chiropody; Watchmaker services, etc. In respect of the license activity carried out, the persons mentioned in point 1 and 2 shall not be taxed under the Natural Persons Incomes Taxes Act. These persons apply the provisions on taxes withheld at source and on taxation of expenses under Article 204 pt. 2 of the Corporate Income Tax Act.

A tourist tax is applied on accommodation. Taxable persons are those persons offering accommodation. These persons pay the tax in revenue to the budget of the municipality according to the location of the places of accommodation within the meaning of the Tourism Act. The tax must be disclosed separately in the document issued by the taxpayer to the person using an accommodation.

The Municipal council determines with an ordinance the amount of the tax in the range from BGN 0.20 to BGN 3.00 per night according to the settlements in the municipality and the category of accommodation.

Tax on the carriage of passengers by taxi. This tax is a new one, it is adopted and is in force from 01.01.2017. The taxable persons subject to a tax on the carriage of passengers by taxi for the activity of taxi-transport for passengers carried out by them or on their behalf. For all other activities taxable persons are taxed by the procedure of the Corporate Income Tax Act, respectively the Income Taxes of Natural Persons Act. Taxable persons are carriers with a certificate of registration issued by the Executive Director of the Automobile Administration Executive Agency and a taxi transportation permit issued by the mayor of the respective municipality under the Road Transport Act. The municipal council determines with an ordinance a year tax rate for taxi transportation of passengers for the respective year in the range from BGN 300 to BGN 1,000 until October 31 of the previous year. The tax due for the taxi transportation of passengers shall be paid to the revenue of the respective municipality, for whose territory a taxi transport authorization has been issued.

As it was mentioned, local finances have been a subject of many changes over the past 10 years. In 2007, amendments were adopted to the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria, which gave more powers to municipalities to determine the amount of local taxes within certain limits, which subsequently expanded. This step towards more tax powers was followed by allocating of some taxes to municipalities - a license (patent) tax (2008), tourist tax (2011) and last tax on taxi transport (2017). However, these steps had a limited effect on the revenue structure of the municipal budget.

After the country's entry into the EU, European funds have also begun to play a leading role in local finances. Their burden has increased greatly after 2011/2012, as European taxpayers practically financing the capital expenditures of municipalities in Bulgaria almost entirely. Although the flow of this resource from outside is felt by local communities - whether through a new treatment plant or renovated urban spaces, the increasing dependence of municipal authorities on European aid also brings negatives to the financial autonomy and sustainability of municipal finances.

In the last 5 years, we have also seen attempts to direct additional resources to the municipalities, but in a form that puts local authorities in dependence with the state. The most striking example was the public investment program "Growth and Sustainable Development of Regions" in 2014, which revealed extremely heavy political dependencies in the allocation of funds and was not repeated[2]. On the other hand, in recent years, we have witnessed the largest regional program in the country's new history - the "National Energy Efficiency Program for Multifamily Residential Buildings", which in 2016 and 2017 directed a huge resource to the municipalities behind which is the state.[3]

All these developments in recent years - steps towards more tax powers for municipalities, an enhanced role for EU funds, state regional development programs, and the municipal financial recovery procedure are key for understanding the attitude towards financial decentralization over the past 10 years. The last decade has been a period in which extremely limited results have been achieved in terms of both the financial autonomy and sustainability of the municipal budget, as well as the possibilities for influence of the municipal budget on regional development outside the state transfers and the European funds.

The constitutional amendments in 2007 allowed municipalities to set local tax levels within certain limits, which gradually expanded. It should be noted that new local taxes have emerged - the transfer of the license (patent) tax to municipalities in 2008, the introduction of the tourist tax in 2011 and the establishment of the tax on taxi transport in 2017. Over the years, we see a relatively active tax policy of the municipalities, but without extremes - municipalities avoid shock increases in tax rates and stay away from the maximum levels. However, especially in 2016 and 2017, there is a clear upward trend in local taxes.[4]

Nevertheless, municipalities continue to rely mainly on transfers from the state budget. In 2017, for example, transfers from the state to the municipalities (we only comment the municipal budgets, excluding EU funds) are in the range of BGN 3.5 billion, and the municipal own revenues are amount to only BGN 2.2 billion. The breakdown of these BGN 2.2 billion shows that most of them are non-tax revenues - nearly BGN 1.3 billion, compared to only BGN 925 million tax revenues. This structure of municipal revenues and transfers has been relatively constant over the years, which means that all steps for more tax powers and small new municipal taxes have had a limited effect.[5]

The breakdown of own revenues clearly shows that they are focused on several specific items. The leading position in municipal tax revenues (BGN 876 million for 2016) are the real estate tax (BGN 306 million), the vehicle tax (BGN 281 million) and the property tax (253 million levs) million). These property taxes carry over 95% of all tax revenues, while other local taxes remain far behind - patent (BGN 17 million) and tourist (BGN 19 million). Non-tax revenues (BGN 1.2 billion in 2016) are dominated by the household waste tax (BGN 553 million), followed by revenues and income from municipal property (BGN 260 million). In practice, the municipalities' own revenues are heavily dependent on property taxes and fees - property taxes and property transactions, as well as the household waste tax, which is again tied to the property.

The structure of revenues in municipal budgets also reveals certain dependencies, mostly from the real estate market. While at macroeconomic level municipal tax revenues are within 16-17% of their budgets, the breakdown by municipalities shows large differences. While in the largest municipalities - for example, the municipality of Sofia, the tax revenues can reach 20-25% of the total budget of the municipality, then in the others, incl. smaller district centers, the share of tax revenues is often within 10-15% of the municipal budget. In smaller municipalities, incl. cities that are not regional centers, the share of tax revenues can be within 5% of the municipal budget. Exceptions are resort municipalities where tax revenues reach 30-40% of the municipal budget.

It is obvious that we can talk about some tax autonomy only in very large cities and resorts - where the value of properties is high and the property market is strong. Even with these municipalities, however, it is impossible to meet all the costs associated with infrastructure provision in the new neighborhoods - such as the case with the capital where the municipality fails to fully fund its investment program specifically in the new neighborhoods. Even assuming that certain changes in property taxes can be made - in terms of the tax base and valuation of property, this instrument is unlikely to play a decisive role in enhancing the financial autonomy of municipalities.[6]

The review of municipal finances confirms that despite the steps taken in recent years for more municipal tax powers, the main problems remain. These include: 1) dominance of state transfers in municipal budgets, 2) dependence on European funds for investment costs, 3) very limited tax revenues and lack of flexibility in terms of own funds, and 4) lack of connection between the economic development of the municipality (excluding the property market) and the municipal budget. These problems are not just a prerequisite for falling into financial difficulties but, more importantly, an obstacle to the potential growth of the regions.

Independence based on a well-functioning financial environment can not be achieved if local authorities continue to be dependent of central government. Whatever mechanism for rescuing and controlling the revenue and expenditure of local authorities is applied, it will not address the causes of problems with the structure of municipal budgets and the incentives it creates. If local authorities are deprived of the ability to raise funds themselves and, accordingly, be responsible for their spending, it is questionable whether they can successfully pursue a policy at municipal level in the interest of their citizens.

The concept of fiscal decentralization contains the way of distribution of financial responsibilities at central and local level in the field of public revenue and expenditure. Analyzing the content of the concept of fiscal decentralization, the following elements can be reached:

- Responsibilities and roles between different levels of government in the vertical structure of the public sector;
- state subsidies and their influence;
- transfers between already established management levels;
- the stabilization of the revenue system at the local level;
- determining the system of delivery of local goods;
- Privatization of local public activities.[7]

Fiscal decentralization is based on two principles - "local self-government" and "subsidiarity". The first concept relates to the right and the real opportunity for local authorities to manage a substantial part of public affairs under their own responsibility and the second with the view that problems are resolved as quickly, easily and efficiently as possible at the lowest possible level at which they can be resolved.

A recent study made by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) states that fiscal decentralization may lead to an improvement in fiscal discipline. One of the reasons for this is the stronger pressure on local authorities to provide public goods and services through more limited resources.[8]

The practice of local taxation in the EU is similar to that in Bulgaria, with much of the tax revenue being generated by real estate taxation. There are only 7 countries in the EU where more than half of real estate tax revenues go to central government (Czech Republic, Denmark, Croatia, the Netherlands, Finland, Sweden and the UK). Bulgaria ranks among the countries where all real estate taxes are targeted at local authorities, along with Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland and Slovenia. Over 80% of these funds are directed to local authorities in Portugal, Slovakia, Romania, Italy, France and Ireland. The situation is similar in countries with a two-tier structure of a regional organization such as Germany and Spain, where funds are distributed almost equally between different levels of local self-government.

The transfer of taxation powers to municipalities in relation with income taxation is well known within the EU. Local authorities in Italy, Denmark, Sweden, Finland have such powers, and in all cases this is done within a set boundary. At the same time, in nearly one third of European countries, local authorities are entitled to part of the income from personal income taxes, although they can not affect the amount of the tax rate or tax base. At the same time, in nearly one third of European countries, local authorities have the right to collect a part of the income from personal income taxes, although they can not affect the amount of the tax rate or tax base. Sharing of a part of the incomes from the personal income taxes is the most commonly used method of decentralizing the fisc, followed by sharing a part of the corporation tax and VAT revenues. On average, for the EU in 2016, only 36% of local government revenues are formed by transfers from the central government, while the share for Bulgaria is about 60%.

In 2016, the local government revenues as a ratio to GDP in our country reached only 7%, with an average of 15.6% for the EU. Such levels are still observed in Slovakia, and lower - in only 7 countries, including Cyprus and Malta and the highly fiscal centralized - Greece and Cyprus. In Romania and the Baltic countries, the rates range from 8 to 10%, and in almost all Central and Western European countries they are over 10%.

How can fiscal decentralization happen in Bulgaria?

The transfer of part of the revenues from the personal income tax to the municipalities can not and must not be isolated change in the structure of the tax system. In order to guarantee the success of such a change, a number of additional steps need to be taken, including:

- Moving to effective program budgeting at a local level, leading to greater efficiency and transparency;
- Improving the efficiency and transparency of finances and the management of municipal enterprises and municipal property;
- Territorial-administrative reform to ensure the long-term sustainability of spatial planning.

A real change in the financial autonomy of the Bulgarian municipalities is possible only through the restructuring of the existing tax system. The imposition of new taxes (eg on turnover) hides the risk of duplication of taxation. The increase in existing local levies will not solve the problem of incentives for local authorities and implies an overall increase in the tax burden in the economy.

Sharing revenue from indirect taxes such as VAT seems difficult to apply, and empowering municipalities to determine its level, or even the tax base of that tax, would lead to absolute administrative chaos and create the prerequisites for the establishment of tax arbitrage in which consumption is artificially targeting to municipalities with a lower tax burden.

This brings us to the most probable and widely applied model of fiscal decentralization in the EU in the form of direct revenue sharing or empowerment in relation to existing direct taxes - incomes of individuals (income tax) or profit (corporate tax).

The big part of the political challenges and administrative obstacles seem easily overwhelming in sharing revenue or empowering local authorities with regard to personal income taxes:

- The link between tax and democratic representation at local level will create incentives for local authorities to work for creating jobs (mainly by attracting investment) and will tie the financial situation of municipalities with the social and economic processes taking place in their territory.
- Incentives for tax arbitrage can be abolished by applying the principle “money follows the identity card” in which revenue from personal income taxes is distributed among individual municipalities based on the permanent address of the persons.
- The link between taxation and democratic representation in personal income taxes is much more pronounced than that of corporate taxation and creates incentives for real tax competition between municipalities.
- The vast majority of personal income tax are monthly transfers from employers to tax administration. Redirection on time of these funds to municipal authorities will provide an additional source of liquidity and can help to meet extraordinary costs.
- Legislative effort and the follow-up to the implementation of such a system are considerably lighter than existing alternatives. Taxes on personal income can be collected in the same order (by the National Revenue Agency), after which the respective part of them is redirected to the municipalities' accounts.

3. Conclusions

Fiscal decentralization in Bulgaria, although officially set as a strategic goal for the country, still remains more wishful than reality. Municipal budgets are heavily dependent on both state transfers and European funds, which limits the opportunities for a successful local policy. The lack of adequate self-sufficiency in municipalities not only leads to frequent financial difficulties and accumulation of current liabilities or arrears but, more importantly, limits the development potential of municipalities.

The solution of this problem passes through the idea of restructuring the tax system and redirecting tax revenues from central government to municipalities. The analysis made in the present paper shows that the best way to do this is income taxation, and in particular by assigning 1/5 of revenue from income tax to municipalities. That would amount to BGN 675 million for 2018 or a growth of nearly 1/3 of its own revenues in municipal budgets. Such a step is fiscally achievable against the background of the state budget situation in recent years.

The transfer of part of the income tax would tie the municipal finances with the development of the local economy, i.e. part of the taxed income of the local population will remain in the municipality, which is logical, both economically and democratically. By applying the rule that money should follow the identity card - the tax passed to the municipality of residence rather than the place of employment (if different). This would stimulate the development of smaller municipalities, and especially of peripheral ones, located near the strongest economic municipalities.

It is important to note that all municipalities will benefit from fiscal decentralization, i.e. each will report an increase in its own revenues. The greater effect will be concentrated where there are more jobs and higher wages, but that is exactly what it should be - the mechanism will simply follow the natural processes. The decentralization process itself implies parallel administrative-territorial reform, including the consolidation of municipalities.

PARENTING AND LABOR ACTIVITY

Maria RADEVA

Abstract

In recent years there has been a public debate in Bulgaria about the reconciliation of childcare and the preservation of labor activity. The government policy regarding maternity support is broadly discussed - length of absence, job retention, salary level, career opportunities, etc.

The state has proposed measures to ensure that parents return to the labor market. One option is to return to work before the end of maternity leave. The resources for implementing this policy are provided to the social security system.

The Employment Agency is carrying out a project aimed at ensuring a better reconciliation of the professional and private life of parents with children from 0 to 12 years of age. The desired result is to have a positive effect by preserving the quality of workforce and labor productivity of parents by enabling them to start or continue their careers. The project is implemented with funds from the European Social Fund and national co-financing.

1. Introduction

Family is a key element of the public system and it should be supported. Within the Bulgarian traditions, way of life and culture, family keeps and protects the fundamental values of the society. The parents in the family carry the responsibility of giving birth to, raising and educating the children.

Children are a priority of the government and the families. Each child has the right to a high standard of living, guaranteeing its well-being as well as the right to the best standards of healthcare and education. Spouses and parents have equal rights and responsibilities for raising and educating children. Ensuring efficient equality of men and women in the family is a basic condition for increasing the birth rate and ensuring the possibility for wholesome personal development and high quality of life for children. The equal opportunities for all for a wholesome social, labour, productive and reproductive life and non-discrimination are prerequisites for balanced demographic development of the population and for sustainable economic development and growth of the country.

Economic stabilization and improvement of the standard of living are the key factors for improvement of the demographic situation in Bulgaria and for the transition to a modern type of reproduction of the population.

2. Posing the problem

Economic and demographic changes in Bulgaria in the recent 30 years have material influence on the volume of the work force, the structure of employment and the standard of living of the population[1] . During that period the work force is decreasing at fast rate due to the ageing of the population. This is one of the reasons for the decline in the economic activity. In the beginning of XX century it reached 85% and in the beginning of the 1950s - about 80%. This high labour activity was due to the employment in agriculture. In the last 45 years and especially after 1989, the economic activity in Bulgaria quickly fell to 50% due to the decrease of the work force on the account of the migration processes and the fast ageing of the population. The decrease of the work force is connected with decrease of employment.

Negative trends in employment, economic activity and unemployment in Bulgaria after 1989 give rise to a number of social problems - decline in the standard of living, increase of the crime rate, increase of the morbidity of the population, decrease of the living potential of the nation, etc.

As a result of the economic instability and the lack of clear perspective about the development in 1997, Bulgaria reached one of the most unfavourable demographic indicators in Europe and registered the lowest birth rate in its history. As a result of the short-term and long-term emigration, the number of women in fertile age (15 - 49 years) has decreased, which limits the opportunities for more children being born in future.

In addition to the permanent trend of decrease of the number of women in childbearing age, there is also a wide complex of social reasons and factors for decrease of the birth rate. Such may be sought in the quick urbanised population and the intensive emancipation of women. The isolation and the subordinate role of women in the traditional families and households in the past has been gradually overcome. Own private space has been established, spouses have started living independent life, the business relations between them have expanded and deepened. Today women often face the dilemma: Profession, career or family and children and increasingly often this dilemma is resolved in favour of the career. The extended period of education and the changes in the cultural stereotypes, especially among women, have contributed about that and as a result the spouses have formed specific attitudes and views about the number of their children and the sequence of births, which today is known as family planning. The achievement of compulsory high education has actually resulted in two-three times lower fertility. In a more remote period of the Bulgarian history, women used to give birth to their first child at quite low age. In the last years there has been a steady shift to births at a later age, which creates preconditions for limiting births to a single child.

A family with two children is the perfect reproductive option for the Bulgarians. However data from a sample survey conducted during the census in 2001 about birth rates show significant mismatch between the perfect size of the family and the realization of the reproductive wills of women at the age of 15 - 49 years. According to the survey, most Bulgarian families (70%) wish to have two children but due to economic difficulties 60% of them could not achieve that.

That is why the efforts of the government should be directed to creating proper conditions for giving birth to, raising, educating, material assurance and social realization of as many children as the couple would like to have.

3. Creating conditions for giving birth to and raising children

In Bulgaria there are many years of experience in conducting demographic policies that focus on encouraging birth rates and creating optimal conditions for giving birth to and raising kids by combining the personal and professional life.

Active government policy started at the end of 1967. Direct measures for stimulating demographic development are being used, such as a system of cash compensation (paid maternity leave, one-off compensation for giving birth to a child and child allowances), whose size is directed to stimulating the birth of a third child in the family. A well-organized network of facilities for raising and educating children at a pre-school age is being developed. Important steps have been made towards bettering the healthcare of children and mothers. A positive indirect effect on birth rates comes from the introduction of legal norms, aimed at preserving the reproductive health of women - labour protection directives, bans on performing heavy and harmful labour, transferring to a more appropriate job for reasons of health and other forms of protection of pregnant women and suckling mothers.

A large part of the measures for stimulating birth rates continue to be in force even after the social-political reforms in 1989. The following years of high inflation, fall of production and growing unemployment have led to devaluation of the family allowances for children and a strong reduction to their stimulating effect. During 2001, there were changes in regards to the maternity leave. Significant changes in the demographic policy after 1990 were brought in by the Family Allowance Act, effective since 2002. Some of the allowances have a universal character and are available to all without accounting for the income of a family member, others have a specific character with a pre-determined income criterion for access.

In accordance with the principle for equality of men and women in regards to labour and social insurance rights, related to the care and raising of children, as well as support for families with children, several legal options have been regulated in the Labour Code and the Social Security Code.

The Ministry of Labour and Social Policy conducts specific programmes to support families and children. Measures for boosted participation of women on the labour market are in progress. They are based on an integrated method, aimed at limiting the barriers to labour, encouraging participation in different forms of life-long learning, better balance between the professional and personal life. Unemployed mothers with small children are one of the vulnerable groups on the labour market with the risk of falling into poverty, which becomes even greater if active government policies are not applied.

Despite the condition of the economic development - growth, decline, recession, depression, recovery and etc. the perspectives for labour of mothers with small children must be supported with purposeful actions on the part of the government.

4. Labour realization and motherhood. Combining the family and professional life

Sociological studies categorically show that the labour status and economic standing are among the most important factors when making a decision about giving birth to children among young people. The transition to market economy led to radical changes in the conditions for professional realization of women and the possibilities for its combination with maternal and familial duties.

The level of economic activity of Bulgarian women is traditionally high.

The difference in the level of economic activity and employment between women and men in Bulgaria in comparison to many countries, specifically in the EU is not as prominent. During 2010 the level of economic activity of population aged between 15-64 is 62,3% for women and 70,8% for men, the level of employment is respectively 56,4% and 63,0% and for the age group 20-64 - 69,1% for men and 61,7% for women. These differences have different dimensions for women and men, relating to education, age, family status, number of children, health status, place of residence, ethnic group. To a certain degree, these differences are owed to the still existing difference between the two genders as to the age for acquiring the right to retirement.

Key factors for achieving equality between genders are: Participation of women in the decision-making process; removing the so called "Glass ceiling for career development"; distribution of chores, prevention of traffic, prostitution, domestic abuse; creating better conditions for combining the family and professional life; guaranteeing leaves adequate for needs of the working parents, diversification and improvement of the quality of the services for raising children or dependent members of the families/households and etc.

Bulgaria has experience in building a normative base and government policies, aimed at combining the family and professional life. Despite that, women continue to delay the birth and raising of children due to the hardships and economic uncertainty that exist on the labour market. The combination of maternity with the professional development of women, set in the regulatory base is not realized in full due to the the lack of proper beliefs in men and women on the one hand and in employers on the other, for it to be applied. The control over the implementation of the labour law is ineffective. There are many cases of employers refusing to hire pregnant women and women with small children or dismissal upon occurrence of any of these circumstances. Under the pressure of job insecurity, many women take a position of self-limitations and compromises, affecting their personal and family life as far back as the initial discussions of employment contracts. Especially worrying is the tendency of violating the rights foreseen in the law that ban overtime, hard or night-time labour, as well as the ban of labour under harmful conditions of pregnant women and women with children up to 3 years old. Allowing unfavourable work conditions affects the reproductive health of Bulgarian women.

Combining the work and family responsibilities is made more difficult by the tendencies of increasing the working hours and wider spread of labour during the weekends, especially in the private sector, the family business and the service sector. All this impacts unfavourably the health of working women and their reproductive attitude, limits the time they have for raising children and wholesome parenting. During the last decade, the social empathy towards unequal extension of the working hours has increased due to the fact that in certain cases, the extra work is not paid and the extended time is not compensated, which contradicts the labour law.

Another factor for the existence of imbalance between professional development and maternity is the young families' access to child care and kindergarten services. In the last years, many municipalities in larger cities, where there is a larger concentration of citizens, opened up kindergartens and helped keep the price and quality of the services as adequate as possible for families. The full use of the existing social infrastructure and building a new one that follows the new forms of raising and educating children outside the state kindergartens and schools, will help overcoming the role conflict between work realization and maternity.

The possibilities for realizing flexible forms of employment, part-time work, work at home, regulated with new amendments of the labour law are underutilized. Applying such practices would change positively the structure of women's employment, carried out in favourable work conditions and work regimes. This would also conserve the reproductive abilities and common health of young women as a pre-condition for giving birth to and raising children.

The flexibility of the work hours is important for combining the professional and family life. Survey results show that out of all the employed people aged 15-64 that take care of children up to 14 years old or of adults, 91.1% work at a fixed start and end of work hours (determined by the employer) and only 8.9% have a more flexible form of work.

The flexibility is expressed not only in the different forms of work hours but in the ability of people, who work on a fixed time basis, to shift the beginning or end of their work day by at least one hour, if necessary, regardless of whether the absence is compensated or not. Of employees who take care of children or elderly and work on a fixed-time basis, 13.8% state that usually they have the option to change their working hours, if necessary, for family reasons (including taking care of children or elderly, disabled people, sick), 36.2% may do that by exception and 50,0% consider it impossible.

The imbalance between the labour realization and maternity is also maintained by the centuries-long division of labour in the family. According to this tradition even nowadays women with two children spend more than 4 hours a day for household work and consider themselves more engaged with household work compared to men. This introduces uncertainty and cause families and women to hesitate whether to have children. On the other hand, engaging with a greater part of the household work, reduces the opportunities of women for education and qualification improvement and therefore their competitiveness on the labour market; limits their social contacts; narrows their opportunities for wholesome recreation and rest. The working lone and divorced mothers as well as mothers of disabled children are in especially difficult situation due to their very limited mobility and limited opportunities for flexible employment.

Therefore an important element of overcoming the imbalance between the labour realization and the maternity is ensuring gender equality with a view to raising and taking care of children. An issue that requires not only regulatory changes but most of all change of the public attitude through civil education and appropriate media policy.

5. Policies supporting maternity

In the context of reduction of the share of employable population and longer life expectancy, ensuring opportunity for women to return to work after maternity leave is of major significance. The employment policy and law provide opportunities to maintain the participation of women on the labour market even without making them leave work during the years of raising their children.

For mothers with young children however, the participation on the labour market is closely connected with the availability of child care services and for women in general - the availability of services for the elderly because if such services are not available, women generally carry the main burden of care, which increasingly often hinders their access to employment.

Within the dynamically changing economy and most of all the private sector development, keeping the job position and guaranteeing the return on the same position after maternity leave are options that are difficult to be realized outside the government sector. Even in such cases women who have benefited of the full leave they are entitled to, experience difficulties upon reintegration due to their loss of qualification and lagging behind.

Government authorities that implement the social policy take into account the problems of women and the need for active intervention for their solution. The Ministry of Labour and Social Policy implements programmes especially designated for women taking into account their specific situation when they return to work after maternity leave.

In a survey within the project "Back to work" it is stated that among the totality of unemployed women, the share of women up to 29-years old is 28.9% and one of the reasons for the high unemployment rate among women up to 29-years old is the unwillingness of employers to employ young women due to the possibility that they may be absent longer due to maternity leave and sick leave.

Among registered unemployed women prevail those with primary and lower education - 54,6% and without occupation - 62,1%. The low level of education and most of all the lack of occupation and qualification affect the duration of registration where more than half of unemployed women - 51.1% are continuously unemployed.

The main purpose of the project is to create conditions for equal access for women to employment and keeping employment by improvement of the quality of work force as well as ensuring conditions for work realization and supporting the professional development of women who have returned to work after maternity leave.

The project "Parents in employment" is realized until 2020. The purpose of the project is to ensure better combination between the professional and personal life of parents of children from 0 to 12 years old and providing employment to unemployed by ensuring opportunities for taking care and raising children.

Through the planned project activities, parents of children from 0 to 12 years old will have the opportunity not only to continue their career development but also to provide secure and high quality care for their children. These activities will contribute to the better combination between professional and family duties of parents and practically will make the labour market more accessible for them. The project will contribute for the return to work of parents who are not able to do that because they raise their children. This will ensure their equal access to employment and jobs.

6. Vision for the future

The reproduction of the employable population is best described by the demographic replacement rate, which shows the ratio between the number of people entering employable age (15 - 19 years old) and the number of people leaving employable age (60 - 64 years old). As a comparison in 2001 every 100 persons leaving employable age were replaced by 124 young people. After 2008 this ratio is opposite - 100 persons leaving employable age are replaced by 91 persons, in 2009 by 82 persons and in 2010 by 74 persons. According to census data, in 2011 that rate is 70, which shows that the country already experiences stagnation with regard to the rejuvenation and development of employable population.

Deterioration of the age structure of the population affects the size and quality of labour resources. The ageing of the work force in the conditions of a dynamic labour market with constantly changing requirements to the qualification and the professional skills of the employed, gives rise to the need of continuous improvement of the general potential and lifelong learning of the work force.

One of the tasks defined in the Updated National Strategy for Demographic Development of the Population of the Republic of Bulgaria (2012 - 2030) is the combination of parenting and professional development. For the fulfilment of that task the following measures are planned:

- Wider use of flexible employment forms (part-time work, reduced working hours, modern information technologies for remote work, etc.);
- Introduction of relieves upon return to work after maternity/ paternity leave (reduced working hours, homework, etc.), for participation in qualification and retraining courses;
- Encouraging employers for active participation in the policy for creating security and protection for pregnant women and mothers at their workplace;
- Expansion of the system of control of employers for observance of the labour law in the part ensuring protection for pregnant women and young mothers and preventing misuse of children's labour;
- Stimulating the equality between women and men with regard to their professional development and their family responsibilities related to raising and educating children.

PROPERTY RESTITUTION – A TYPE OF REPARATIONS MEASURE IN ROMANIA

Bianca Elena RADU[*]

Abstract

The paper intends to highlight the manner in which property restitutions starting with 2001, in Romania, have accomplished the functions of a reparations measure. The analysis will follow on the one hand whether the process of property restitutions have been a part of a wider socio-political mechanism, that of transitional justice, and on the other hand it will analyse whether the legislation in the field has or has not facilitated the property recovery and, as a result, the rehabilitation of victims. From a methodological point of view, the study will use the analysis of official documents and of legislation in the field.

1. Introduction

Research in the field of reparations concentrates on conceptual, operational aspects, on the manner in which reparations programs are implemented, on the social and political mechanisms that determine the application of reparations programs at the national level. The literature in the field[1] also presents the difficulties related to the implementation of reparations programs: the high and very high number of victims; reduced logistical and economic resources; the difficulty to categorize or to quantify the suffering to which victims were subjected; the lack of experience in managing cases of generalized abuses and violence. Studies show that the countries that conceived the reparations programs outside the context of transitional justice did not enjoy receptiveness from the victims.[2] The lack of receptiveness is directly related to the fact that the victims wish for a form of official recognition of the sufferings and abuses, of presenting the truth, which entails in turn a national mobilization and for the new governments to take upon themselves to implement the reparations programs. In the report of the UN secretary general, transitional justice (TJ) is defined as encompassing the various processes and mechanisms implemented by a society in order to handle the abuses committed in the past with the purpose of establishing those responsible, of administering justice and of allowing reconciliation.[3] TJ is not a special form of justice, but a justice adapted to the unique conditions of societies that are in the process of transformation and that have experienced generalized human rights abuses. Most of the problems that result from past abuses are often too complex to be resolved through measures such as ordinary judicial processes. Truth commissions represent the central mechanism of the TJ. The members of the commissions have the responsibility to gather evidence, to analyze the files of the victims of the former regime, to ensure the physical, psychological and moral protection of witnesses, to implement decisions, to establish reparations, and to elaborate the final report. The reparations programs are initiatives sponsored by the state that have the purpose of contributing to the material, moral and symbolic reparation of abuses suffered by victims in the past.

In Romania, after 1989, have been adopted laws with a reparatory character in the matter of buildings abusively seize by the state during the communist regime. The present paper will concentrate on the impact generated mainly by two of the laws with a reparatory character: Law no. 10/2001 regarding the judicial character of certain buildings abusively seized during 6 March 1945-22 December 1989 and Law no. 165/2013 regarding the measures for the finalization of the restitution process, in kind or in equivalent, of buildings abusively seized during the communist

2. Remediation, reparation, return to the "status quo ante".

Colonialism, civil wars, the two World Wars, the Holocaust, totalitarian regimes, military dictatorships, and military conflicts are periods in history where massive, collective and systematic violations of human rights took place. Even the Peace Treaty of Westphalia[4] makes a reference to restitutions. In the periods that followed, the nations that lost wars had to pay the winners certain sums or to offer them certain goods. During the Paris Conference of 1919, for instance, it was stipulated that the central powers (Germany, Austro-Hungary, Bulgaria, the Ottoman Empire) will pay, as a result of their defeat, compensations to the allied and associated forces (France, Great Britain, USA, Italy).

A first category of reparations could come under what Barkan Elazor[5] calls attempts at remediating "history's injustices". Here we could mention the compensations given to Holocaust survivors, the compensatory programs for Japanese-Americans from US concentration camps from World War II, the African-Americans rehabilitated after the slavery period during the American Civil War, and the reparations given to the aborigines in Australia.

The international community has tried to respond to the injustices of history with the purpose of preventing the repetition of similar events, thus creating specialized courts, adapting their norms in international law in order to punish the guilty parties, proposing distribution programs for the physical, moral and economic rehabilitation of victims. If at the beginning reparations were negotiated and given between states, their application sphere has been transferred in time, at the inter-state level, the beneficiaries being the victims of internal violence. All human rights violations involve taking responsibility, in other words, a secondary obligation to repair the violation of a main obligation such as banning genocide, crimes agains humanity, war crimes, torture, and extrajudiciary executions.[6] In time, the introduction of moral and justice indicators in the political sphere has represented a new wave in the manner in which nations have recognized their past abuses and have managed them.[7] The tendency created concentrates on post-conflict or post-authoritarian societies taking responsibility for past crimes.

The 80s represent the years for state reconstructions, for newly installed governments taking responsability for the actions committed by dictatorial and totalitarian regimes characteristic of Latin America and South-Eastern Europe. Victim reparations become a part of the Human Rights and International Law agenda. The efforts have started as early as 1988, when the Sub-commission on the promotion and protection of human rights[8] recognized and drew the attention on the fact that all victims who had their fundamental rights and liberties violated are entitled to benefit from restitutions, equitable compensations, and means to rehabilitate (as much as it is possible) the sufferings they were submitted to.

The study of Theo von Boven (1993)[9] has argued in turn for the necessity to conceptualize and operationalize reparations and mentioned that the right to reparation, to rehabilitation entails two sides: the procedural right to justice and the material right to compensarion as a result of violations of fundamental rights and liberties to which the victims were submitted and which are stipulated in national and international law. The year 2005 marks the adaptation of Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law.[10] The fundamental principles marked a new beginning in regard to the institutionalization of reparatory programs but they stressed as well the necessity to take on at an international level the manner in which reparations are implemented.

In international law[11] reparations are defined as measures through which restitution, compensations, rehabilitation, satisfaction, the guarantee of non-repetition, and measures implemented as a response to abuses suffered by victims-subjects of human rights are targeted. The restitution has as a purpose the "return" of the victim to the state before the abuse, whether it is a matter of recovering social or political rights, or material goods. Satisfaction and the guarantee of non-repetition are connected to other mechanisms of Transitional justice such as truth finding, official recognition of the abuses, and institutional reforms. The types of compensations will be mentioned in the next paragraph, with the presentation of the reparatory typologes in the perspective of Pablo de Grieff.

From a judicial point of view, the definitions for reparations take into consideration all possible situations. However, for the practiciens to be able to conceive a design for a reparations program, it is necessary for them to use a clear definition, focused on a target-group, and to take into account two elements: the type of reparation (material or symbolic) and the form of distribution (individual or collective).

Pablo de Grieff[12] creates a synthesis of the advantages and disadvantages of the main types of reparations: individual, collective, symbolic and material. The author highlights that individual reparations respect personal autonomy; they satisfy the needs and preferences of the targeted subjects; they promote the recognition of the individuals; they contribute to a better quality of life for the beneficiaries; they can be easy to administer. Concerning the limitations of individual reparations, the following can be highlighted: if they are conceived simply as a way of quantifying the losses suffered, there is the risk of being seen as being inadequate; if the payments are blocked under a certain level, they will not be able to contribute to a better quality of life for the victims; if there are no functional institutions from which the beneficiaries could buy services, the money received will not change their quality of life for the better; if they are not articulated to a complete design for reparations, with the possibility for the beneficiary to be able to understand the significance of the received sums, they could be seen as a way of "buying" the victims' silence. On the other hand, reparations addressed collectively with the purpose of developing social investments as well give the impression of being attractive from a political point of view; they give citizens the impression that results can be obtain both in relation to justice and development of the economy; they are seemingly directed toward the real causes of the violence. From the series of the limits one can mention the extremely limited reparatory capacities for the victims and the lack of respect for individual sufferings, and for citizens' rights in general.

Pablo de Grieff differentiates as well between symbolic and material reparations. For instance, letters where regret is presented and forgiveness is asked, photocopies of the reports edited by Truth Commissions that can be consulted by the public are, among others, a part of the category of individual symbolic reparations. These reparations represent a way to manifest respect for individual sufferings, a manner of recognizing sufferings, all without substantial financial costs. In the category of collective symbolic reparations the author mentions public acts of forgiveness, commemorative days, building museums, etc. with the purpose of consolidating collective memory and social solidarity. Material reparations are represented by fix sums, property restitutions, goods, vouchers that replace the value of the goods, service packages such as medical, educational, psychological or domestic assistance ones. They have the advantage of satisfying real needs, they can have positive effects in terms of equal treatment, they can be financially efficient if there already exist institutions that offer the necessary services, and they can stimulate the development of social institutions. On the other hand, the quality of the services depends on existing institutions, most of the programs concentrating on basic services, without being adapted to the needs of the victims.

3. Property restitutions as a reparatory measure in Central and Eastern Europe

A first characteristic of property restitutions in Central and Eastern Europe is an overlap of this procedure with programs of economic development and structural reform at the collective level. In the majority of cases, restitutions were not oriented toward the recovery of individual losses, but toward social desiderata. Either out of a lack of resources or a lack of openness toward reparatory measures, the governments preferred to associate restitutions with collective social investments such as bridges, roads, hospitals, schools etc. Initially, what was desired was the creation of equality among victims, despite the fact that the losses suffered in the past were different both from a value and quantitative point of view. From a desire to move away from the oppressions and injustices suffered during totalitarian regimes, the new political projects proposed, at a declarative level, a society based on human rights and equality before the law. In reality however the reparatory schemes either omitted or took too little in consideration the individual character. Another characteristic of property restitutions in the region was that they were not a part of the transitional justice process, meaning of the process of truth finding, of its official recognition at the national level. The logic according to which these reparations processes have worked and are working is the one according to which the sums of money/restitutions themselves satisfy the needs of those who were abused under the former regime. In Romania, although two Truth Commissions functioned here, restitutions are not seen as reparatory programs stipulated in their reports, from various reasons, one of which being the period in which the two commissioned functioned. The third characteristic of property restitutions is related to certain aspects of interpreting the European/national legislation, but especially to the manner in which they were speculated by former communist states. Significant documents such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights or the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights mention the right to property but they do not make edifying specifications regarding the right to restitution, thus creating a slippery and interpretable space. Moreoever, many of the present Constitutions consider that property represents a protected right, despite the fact that restitution is not constitutionally regulated. Property is always uncertain in internal law, due to the governments' freedom to regulate it at any moment.[13] The fourth characteristic is connected to a series of limitations in the restitution process, limitations imposed by States themselves and that have fragmented the reparatory programs and steered them away from the concrete form of the compensation's size, from their initial mission. Among these limitations we can mention: exacting threshold; the lack of accord regarding types of compensations – the actual restitution and/or vouchers for new acquisition; the manner in which the competent authorities defined the past, meaning the period covered by the reparations program; the lack of accord regarding the types of goods – mobile/immobile-; the unrealistic deadlines for turning in the files.

For example, experts in the field from Lithuania have agreed upon the fact that these limitations and steerings away from the initial form of what a reparatory program should be are unconstitutional.[14] Also, as outlined in the no. 39794/98 to the ECHR, Peter Gratzinger and Eva Gratzingerova v. the Czech Republic, limited prescription deadline acts as a barrier in the practicing of the plaintiffs' rights[15]. As a result of legislative incoherence, of deadline postponements by courts, of the aforementioned limitations, former owners went to CEDO, this being another common characteristic regardting property restitutions in former communist countries.

It can be ascertained that property restitutions in the region only partially fulfilled the characteristics of a reparatory measure, due to the unilateral treatment implemented both by the governments of post-communist countries to this policy, and by the limits imposed by authorized agencies and institutions in the processes of reconvering goods and properties.

4. Reparations restitutions as a reparatory measure in Romania

The European Convention on Human Rights was adopted by member states of the European Council in Rome, on 04.11.1950 and came into effect on 03 September 1953. It was supplemented by 15 additional Protocols that were subsequently adopted by contractant states of which Protocols 15 and 16 have not come into effect yet. Romania ratified the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms through Law no. 30 from 18 May 1994[16] regarding the ratification of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and of the additional protocols to this convention, published in the Official Monitor no. 135 from 31 May 1994, in effect since 20 June 1994. Furthermore, Law no. 30 from 18 May 1994 ratified as well the additional Protocol no. 1 to the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms that was signed in Paris, on 20 March 1952 and that came into effect on 18 May 1954.

By adhering to CEDO, Romania took on the obligation to guarantee the protection of rights and freedoms regulated by the Convention of all individuals found under its jurisdiction. The connection between internal law and international protection of human rights is regulated by art. 11 from Title I entitled "General Principles" and in art. 20 from Title II entitled "Fundamental rights, freedoms and obligations" in Chapter I entitled "Common dispositions" from the revised Romanian Constitution.

To this end, art 11[17] (International and internal law) from the Romanian Constitution states that:

"The Romanian state pledges itself to fulfill literally and in good faith the obligations it has from the treaties of which it is part. The treaties ratified by Parliament, according to law, are part of internal law. In the case where a treaty Romania will become a part of comprises dispositions contrary to the Constitution, its ratification can take place only after the revision of the Constitution."

Art. 20[18] (International treaties on human rights) from the Romanian Constitution states that:

"1) The constitutional dispositions regarding citizens' rights snd freedoms will be interpreted and implemented in accordance to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to the pacts and other treaties of which Romania is a part. 2) If there is disagreement between pacts and treaties regarding fundamental human rights, of which Romania is a part, and internal laws, international regulations have priority, with the exception of the case where the Constitution or internal laws contain more favorable dispositions. "

From the interpretation of these constitutional provisions and taking into acount as well the decision no. 146 from 14 July 2000[19] of the Constitutional Court, it emerges that CEDO is part of internal law and it is directly implemented, similar to any other law in Romania, with the distinction that the former has priority before internal laws that are in disagreement with the provisions of the Constitution.

The right to property represents a fundamental right for any individual, being enlisted together with the other rights and freedoms in the Constitution, in laws and international acts. The protection and guarantee of the right to private property is consacrated in art. 44 from the Romanian Constitution entitled The right to private property. According to the text, this right is not an absolute right but it can involve certain limitations, while the content and limits of the right to private property are established through law.[20] References regarding the right to private property are found as well in art. 136[21] from Title VI entitled The economy and public finances, namely:

"1) Property is public or private. ... 6) Private property is inviolable, under the conditions of the organic law."

The Universal declaration of human rights, adopted in 1948 by the General Assembly of the United Nations states in art. 17 that:

"Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others ... No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property" [22]

Art. 1 from the first additional Protocol to CEDO[23] entitled "Protection of property" stipulates that:

"Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law. The preceding provisions shall not, however, in any way impair the right of a State to enforce such laws as it deems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions or penalties".

Art.17[24] from the EU Charter of fundamental rights (UECFR) states that:

"Right to property. (1) Everyone has the right to own, use, dispose of and bequeath his or her lawfully acquired possessions. No one may be deprived of his or her possessions, except in the public interest and in the cases and under the conditions provided for by law, subject to fair compensation being paid in good time for their loss. The use of property may be regulated by law in so far as is necessary for the general interest. (2) Intellectual property shall be protected."

A turning point in regard to both private property and the right to have it was represented by the instatement of the communist regime in Romania, when normative acts were adopted, by means of which the process of taking possession of buildings from private property and transfering them to state property was regulated. This process subtends a series of abusive measures first of all because they violated provisions from the Constitution that was in effect at that time, those from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights from December 1948, from the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Second of all, abusive was also the manner in which these dispossession provisions were implemented and namely: not giving compensations to the owner, not publishing the acts regarding the taking over of properties by the state.

The post-1989 reparatory policies targeted both the rectification and attenuation of the abuses of previous regimes, one of the measures being the adoption of laws with a reparatory character in matters of buildings taken over abusively by the state during the communist regime in Romania. Out of these, we mention the Law on land resources no 18/1991, Law no. 169/1997 for changing and supplementing the Law on land resources no 18/1991, Law no. 1/2000 for the restoration of the right to property on agricultural and forests lands, required according to Law on land resources no 18/1991 and to Law no. 169/1997, Law no. 10/2001 on the judicial state of certain buildings taken over abusively during 6 March 1945-22 December 1989, Law no. 165/2013 on measures for finalising the restitution process, in kind or in equivalent, of buildings taken over abusively during the communist regime in Romania. To these, we can add the normative acts that exclusively regulate certain categories of buildings, namely GEO no. 83/1999 on the restitution of goods that belonged to communities of citizens part of national minorities in Romania and GEO no. 94/2000 on the restitution of real estates that belonged to religious cults in Romania.

The present paper will concentrate on the impact generated especially by two of the reparatory laws: Law no. 10/2001 on the judicial state of certain buildings taken over abusively during 6 March 1945-22 December 1989, published in the Official Monitor no. 75 from 14 February 2001; Law no. 165/2013 on measures for finalising the restitution process, in kind or in equivalent, of buildings taken over abusively during the communist regime in Romania, published in the Official Monitor no. 278 from 17 May 2013.These laws represent framework laws in matters of buildings taken over abusively by the state and special laws in connection to Law 287/2009 on the Civil Code[25] and Law no. 213 from 17 November 1998[26] on public property and its judicial state.

Law no. 10/2001 on the judicial state of certain buildings taken over abusively during 6 March 1945-22 December[27] 1989, was republished in the Official Monitor, Part I no. 798 from 02 September 2005 and modified through the following acts: Rectification 2005; GEO no. 209/2005; Law no. 74/2007; Law no. 1/2009; Law no. 302/2009; Law no. 202/2010; Law no. 165/2013; Law no. 187/2012; Law no. 135/2014; GEO no. 98/2016. Art. 1 par. 1 from this normative act indicates the goods that fall under the incidence of this special law and the manner of their restitution, namely in kind or in equivalent. From the content of par. 1 and 2 from art. 1 it results that the principle of the restitution in kind is explicitly established, the restitution in equivalent intervening only when the restitution in kind is no longer possible. The principle of the prevalence of the restitution in kind is stipulated as well in pt. 1, letr. a from the the Methodological norm for the application of Law no. 10/2001, approved through GD no. 250/2007.[28] The provisions of art. 21-23 from Law no. 10/2001 establish the administrative procedure precursory of the notification to obtain restitution in kind or through equivalent by the rightful person, as well as the judiciary control on the decisions or dispositions issued within this procedure.

Thus, law no. 10/2001 offers to interested parties both access to an administrative procedure, and to a legal procedure when required.

In its interpretation and application, Law no. 10/2001 has generated numerous litigations, both in national courts and at CEDO. Although Law no. 10/2001 came into effect on 14 February 2001, even at present, after 18 years, there are still restitution requests formulated by individuals who allege they are entitled in the administrative procedure, with some of the requests recorded at national courts, while others at CEDO. In the administrative procedure, the notifications formulated by individuals who allege to be entitled to restitution were either not resolved by authorities or were resolved with significant delay. National courts have interpreted and applied the provisions of the law in different ways, so that there were many situations where there was no unitary point of view of identical situations.

As a result, in order to ensure a singular interpretation and application of the law by all courts, The High Court of Cassation and Justice gave its verdict on the matter of those legal issues that were resolved differently, through definitive judicial decisions, by the courts. Thus the HCCJ has intervened with the purpose of unifying the judicial principles through decisions given in the interest of the law, decisions that are mandatory from the moment they are published in the Romanian Official Monitor, Part I.[29] Thus, according to Decision no. 20/2007 [30] the recourse was admitted in the interest of the law and it's been established in applying the dispositions of art. 26 par. (3) from Law no. 10/2001, republished, the court has the competence to resolve in essence not only the appeal filed against the decision/disposition to reject the requests through which the solicitor requests compensation in the form of real estate that had been abusively seized, but also the action of the entitled person in the case of the unjustified refusal by the owning entity to respond to the notification of the interested party. Another example is Decision no. 52/2007[31] through which recourse was admitted in the interest of the law and it's been established that the stipulations found in art. 16 and the next ones from Law no. 247/2005, regarding the administrative procedure for granting indemnities, does not apply for decisions/dispositions given prior to the law coming into effect, appealed within the terms stipulated by Law no. 10/2001, as it has been modified by Law no. 247/2005.

Under the same category also falls Decision no. 33/2008[32] through which recourse in the interest of the law has been admitted and has been established with respect to the actions based on the dispositions of the common law, having as an objective the reclaiming of property that was seized in an abusive manner from March 6 1945 to December 22 1989, formulated after Law no. 10/2001 came into effect and were unevenly resolved by the courts. The decision mentions that the competition between the special and the general law is resolved in favor of the special law, according to the principle specialia generalibus derogant, even if it isn't expressly stated in the special law. In the case where inconsistencies are noticed between the special law, respectively Law no. 10/2001 and the European convention for human rights, the latter has priority. This priority can be accorded in the case of an act of reclamation, based on common rights, to the extent to which another property law or the security of the judicial report are not thus affected. Decision no. 1/2015[33] through which recourse was admitted in the interest of the law establishes, with respect to the interpretation and application of art. 50 par. (2) and 50 ind. Par. (1) of Law no 10/2001, republished, together with subsequent additions. It's been decided that the court that has the power to resolve a monetary request based on market value, established according to art. 50 ind. 1 par. 1 of Law 10/2001, republished, together with subsequent modifications and additions, can grant the plaintiff the up-to-date price paid at the moment when the sale-purchase contract was signed in accordance with Law no. 112/1995, together with subsequent modification, in the case where it has been established that the conditions stipulated in art. 50 par. 2 of Law no. 10/2001, republished, together with subsequent modifications and additions, are fulfilled only if a head of claim has been formulated in this respect.

In addiction, the HCCJ has contributed to assuring the unitary applicability and interpretation of the law by courts by issuing rulings beforehand in order to resolve certain matters of law [34]. In this sense decision no. 5/2015[35] is mentioned through which the complaints formulated with respect to the pronouncing of a decision were filed and it has been established that: in interpreting and applying the dispositions of art. 26 par. 3 of Law no. 10/2001, republished, together with subsequent modifications and additions, in correlation with art. 4, art. 33-35 of Law 165/2013 it is premature to request an arraignment with respect to the solution on the main issue of the notification that has been unresolved by the holding entity, a request that has been introduced after Law no. 165/2013 came into effect but prior to the fulfillment of terms of the previous procedure that have been regulated by this normative act, coming into effect on 23 April 2015, published in the Official Monitor, part I no. 272 from 23 April 2015. In addition Decision no. 81/2017[36] through which the complaint was filed has established that: in the interpretation and application of the dispositions of art. 42 par. (3) of Law no. 10/2001 republished, together with subsequent modification and additions, apart from the right to preemption, tenants also have the right to opt for purchasing living spaces, a right that is stipulated in art. 9 par. (1) of Law no. 112/1995[37] for the settlement of judicial situations of living spaces, taken by the state, together with subsequent modifications.

The Constitutional Court in turn, has decided in regards to the unconstitutionality of certain provisions from Law no. 10/2001, by conducting an ulterior control of constitutionality by means of the unconstitutionality exception, invoked before the courts, its decisions being definitive and generally obligatory[38]. Thus, through Decision no. 830/2008[39] the unconstitutionality exception was admitted for the dispositions from art. 1 pt. 60 from title I from Law no. 247/2005 on the reform in the field of properties and justice, such as some adjacent measures. The exception was raised ex officio by the High Court of Cassation and Justice – Civil Chamber and intellectual property and it was ascertained that by repealing the syntagm buildings taken over with valid title from the content of art. 29 par. (1) from Law no. 10/2001, the dispositions from art. 15 par. (2) and art. 16 par. (1) from the Constitution are violated. Another decision is 841/2015[40], through which the unconstitutionality exception was admitted and it was ascertained that the provisions of art. 5 par. (1) from Law no. 10/2001 are constitutional as long as they do not allow restitution in kind or awarding reparatory measures by equivalent to individuals who come under the incidence of accords signed by Romania with other states regarding regulating the financial problems in suspension enumerated in Appendix 1 to Law no. 10/2001.

Considering the successive legislative modifications, non-unitary practice, numerous requests were registered at CEDO against Romania through which what was invoked was the violation of the right to property guaranteed by art. 1 of the additional Protocol no. 1 of the European Convention for human rights.

The plaintiffs have claimed the violation of the right to property, either on the basis of fact that the property that they owned was sold by the state to third parties of good faith, either on the basis of the fact that they found themselves in the impossibility of fully recovering their good even when they had at their disposal a definitive motion to force the state to apply the court's decision. In the cases where it has been brought to notice, the Court has analyzed whether the plaintiffs own/don't own a "good" in the sense of art. 1 of Protocol no. 1, whether any violation of property rights are noticed/not noticed to exist, whether the violations of the right to property are justified/not justified. The court has been confronted with such phrases as "state title", "the sale of another's property", "the good-faith of the buyer", "reclaim", "the theory of the appearance in the law". In this sense the Decision from 1 December 2015 in the case of Păduraru versus Romania[41], as well as the Decision in the case of Străin et al. versus Romania [42] In observing these realities, the Court has restated that the only obligation, according to art. 19 of the Convention, is to ensure the respecting of the commitments that result from the Convention for the contracted parties. The Court has shown that it is not obliged to substitute the internal courts, underlining the fact that interpreting internal law encumbers first of all national authorities and in particular courts. In this sense, one can consult the decisions in the cases Garcia Ruiz versus Spain[43] and Păduraru versus Romania [44].

In its jurisprudence, repeatedly, the Court has decided that art. 1 of the First Protocol addendum to the Convention for the protection of human rights and of fundamental liberties contains three distinct norms[45]:

"the first, established in the first thesis of the first paragraph, is of a general nature and lays out the principle for respecting property; the second, found in the second thesis of the same paragraph, refers to the privation of property and subject it to certain conditions; the third norm, registered with general intent. The second and third rules refer to specific examples, where the rights to property were touched upon, rights which therefore have to be interpreted based on the principle that has been consecrated by the first".

With respect to the existence of a "good", the Court has constantly states that the notion of "goods" may include both "actual goods", as well as patrimonial valuables, including debt on the basis of which the plaintiff can claim to have had at least a "legitimate hope" of obtaining effective benefit of the right to property. On the other hand, the hope of recognizing the continuation of an old right to property that has long been impossible to effectively exercise cannot be considered a "good" in the sense of art. 1 of Protocol no. 1. In this sense, one may consult the cases Prince Hans-Adam II of Lichtenstein versus Germany[46], Draon versus France[47], Bock and Palade versus Romania [48], Gratzinger and Gratzingerova versus the Czech Republic [49].

With respect to the justified intrusion, the Court analyzed whether the intrusion is "provided by law", the purpose of the intrusion and scope of the intrusion. In its jurisprudence, the Court has shown that art. 1 of Protocol no. 1 imposes, before anything else, that an intrusion by public authorities in the property rights should be legal. The principle of law implies also the existence of norms pertaining to internal law, sufficiently accessible, precise and predictable. Relevant in this situation are the cases Hentrich versus France[50], and Lithgow et. al. versus the UK[51]. Nevertheless, the Court has limited competence when verifying whether internal law is respected, as has been mentioned in the cases Hokansson and Sturesson versus Sweden[52], Străin et. al. versus Romania[53], Păduraru versus Romania [54].

In a series of law suits against Romania, the Court has noticed that the sale by the state to third parties in good faith of property that had belonged to someone else, represents a privation of goods, even in those cases when such a sale occurs prior to the definitive recognition by the justice system of the right to property of the respective person. Such a privation, combined with a total lack of compensation, is contrary to art. 1 of Protocol no. 1. This situation is also encountered in the following cases: Străin et. al. versus Romania[55], Katz versus Romania[56]; Porțeanu versus Romania[57]; Buttu and Bobulescu versus Romania[58]. Furthermore, in the case Păduraru versus Romania[59], the Court ruled that the state did not fulfill its positive obligation to react in a coherent and timely manner in regards to the general real interest of the return or sale of property that had come under its possession, by virtue of the decrees of nationalization. At the same time, the Court appreciated that the general uncertainty thus created reverberated back to the plaintiff, who found themselves in the impossibility of recovering their property in its entirety, even though they were in possession of a court order that obligated the state to return it to them. Similar situations may be found in the cases Togănel and Grădinaru versus Romania [60], Ruxandra Ionescu versus Romania [61]; Johanna Huber versus Romania [62], Fara versus Romania [63].

In 2010. The Court observed that it had registered requests against Romania similar to those requests that it had settled beforehand and through which it had noticed the violation of art. 6 and 1 of the Convention and art. 1 of Protocol no. 1, although through the rulings Viașu[64], Faimblat[65] and Katz[66] it had indicated that the Romanian state should adopt general measures in order to ensure the effective and rapid realization of the right to restitution.

In relation to what has been noticed and in order to prevent new rulings that would note breaches of the Convention to be passed on similar requests, the Court appealed to the application of a ruling pilot-procedure. As a result, on October 22 2010, the Court issued against Romania its first pilot-ruling, in the case of Maria Atanasiu et. al. versus Romania[67] , Monitor no. 778 on November At the heart of the case are two requests against Romania through which the plaintiffs Maria Atanasiu and Ileana Iuliana Poenaru (request no. 30.767/05) and the plaintiff Ileana Florica Solon (request no. 33.800/06) have called upon the Court, in keeping with art. 34 of the Convention to defend their human rights and fundamental liberties. Through the requests addressed to the administrative authorities and national courts, the author of the complaint and subsequently the plaintiffs themselves requested the return of property that had been unjustly seized by the state during the Communist regime. The plaintiffs utilized administrative and legal procedures, invoking the restitution laws adopted after 1989 or the common law provisos concerning the respect for the right to property.

The Court acknowledged that a lack of response on behalf of the administrative authorities to the restitution requests submitted under Law no. 112/1995 and no. 10/2001, to which are added a lack, throughout the period mentioned, of a plan of attack, had compelled the plaintiffs Atanasiu and Poenaru to suffer through a disproportionate burden, thus touching upon the very substance of their rights of access to a court of law.[68] As a result, they noticed a breach of art. 6 and 1 of the Convention with respect to the plaintiffs Atanasiu and Poenaru. The Court appreciated that, in essence, the fact that the plaintiffs did not receive any compensation yet and have been given no assurances in regards to a date when they will receive any, has laid a disproportionate and excessive burden upon them, which is incompatible with the right to respect for their property, guaranteed under art. 1 of Protocol no. 1.[69] Therefore, they decided that a breach of art. 1 of Protocol no. 1 of the Convention had occurred concerning all plaintiffs. Through the pilot-ruling, the courts in Strasbourg had decided that Romania must take measures to ensure effective protection of rights as stipulated in art. 1 and 6 of the Convention and art. 1 of Protocol no. 1, when dealing with all cases that are similar to that of Maria Atanasiu et. al. versus Romania in accordance with the principles that have been consecrated by the Convention, within 18 months from the date when the ruling in question remains final. At the same time, the Court decided to suspend for a period of 18 months from the date when the ruling in question remains final an analysis of all requests that are the result of the same overall issue. In addition, the Romanian state was obligated to pay the plaintiffs Maria Atanasiu and Ileana Iuliana Poenaru the sum of 65000 Euro, for all damages, in addition to any sums that may be due to taxes, to be converted into the local currency of the state against which the complaint had been filed, at the exchange rate for the date when the payment is made. In addition, Romania was obligated to pay the plaintiff Ileana Florica Solon the following sums, to be converted into the local currency of the state against which the complaint had been filed, at the exchange rate for the date when the payment is made: (1) 115000 Euro for all damages, in addition to any sums that may be due to taxes; (ii) 3151.84 Euro, plus any sums that the plaintiff may owe in tax, to cover the cost of litigation.

Romania requested and obtained a continuance until May 12 2013 for the initial deadline, in order to determine an appropriate mechanism that might protect the right to property in accordance with the Convention. In this context, in order for Romania to fulfill its obligation established in the pilot-ruling Maria Atanasiu et. al. versus Romania, Law no. 165 was published on May 17 2013 in the Official Monitor no. 278, which was later modified and added to through Law no. 368/2013, GEO no. 115/2013, GEO no. 8/2014, GEO no. 21/2015, GEO no. 65/2015, Law no. 168/2015, GEO no. 66/2015, Law no. 103/2016, GEO no. 98/2016, Law no. 251/2016, Law no. 111/2017, Law no. 149/2017, GEO no. 63/2018 and through Law no. 212/2018. This normative act was adopted in order to finalize the restitution process, in kind or its equivalent, for property that was unjustly seized during the Communist regime in Romania, however it did not replace the previous restitution laws, rather it proposed to make them more efficient, to offer an added degree of coherence to the legislative framework with respect to the restitution of property. Art. 2[70] of the law mentions the principles that stand as the basis for granting measures as stipulated in the law:

"a) the principle of prevalence of restitution in kind; b) the principle of equity; c) the principle of transparency of the process through which reparatory measures are established; d) the principles of maintaining just equilibrium between the particular interests of the former owners and the general interest of society."

One can observe that these principles can also be found in part in the Methodological norms for unitary application of Law no. 10/2001. The provisos of art.4 of the law that establishes the requests to which this law applies are also relevant. Within the category of requests one can find: requests formulated and submitted within legal timelines, to the legally invested institutions, unresolved when the present law came into effect; the open cases pertaining to the restitution of property taken unjustly; the open cases at CEDO that had been suspended due to the pilot-ruling of October 12 2010, issued in the case Maria Atanasiu et. al. versus Romania, when the present law came into effect.

From art. 1 par. 1 and 2 and art. 2 it results that Law no. 165[71] has explicitly regulated the principle of prevalence for restitutions in kind, while equivalent restitutions remain incidental in the following two cases: when restitution in kind of the property that was unjustly seized is no longer possible; when the owner has relinquished his rights in accordance with the restitution laws. In this latter case, the only reparatory measure is compensation on the basis of points. However, in the process of applying Law 165 there were difficulties. Arguments in this sense are the numerous modifications and addendums to the law, as well as court rulings that are constitutionally contentious, when resolving exceptions of unconstitutionality that had been invoked.

The Constitutional Court, in analyzing the accordance to the Constitution of certain provisos of the law, by way of exceptions of unconstitutionality, has ruled the following: Decision no. 88/2014, Decision no. 210/2014, Decision no. 269/2014, Decision no. 686/2014, Decision no. 395/2017, Decision no. 44/2017, Decision no. 671/2017. For example, through Decision no. 88/2014[72], the exception of unconstitutionality was deemed admissible and it was noted that the dispositions in art. 4, second thesis, of Law no. 165/2013 are constitutional provided that the terms stipulated by art. 33 of the same law do not also apply to the cases in the matter of the restitution of unjustly seized property, still being discussed in court at the time when the law came into effect. One can also recall Decision no. 671/2017[75] through which the exception of unconstitutionality was deemed admissible and where it was observed that the phrase "only after the depletion of the agricultural land affected by the restitutions in kind identified at the local level" in art. 21 par. Thus it was decided that in the case where the owner has estranged the rights that he/she is entitled to according to the law on property restitution, and the request for restoration formulated under the law on land resources was not resolved through the issue of the property title or through compensation in the benefit of the original owner, their heirs or to a third party acquirer until Law no. 165/2013 came into effect, the assignee, as a person entitled to reparatory measures, has the exclusive tight to the reparatory measure provided by the new law on reparations consisting in compensations through points according to art. 24 par. (2) - (4) from Law no. 165/2013, with its subsequent changes and additions. The Decision 40/2016 [79] through which the formulated complaint was admitted and established that the provisions of art. 41 par. (1) from the Law no. 165/2013, with its subsequent changes and additions, are not applicable to the entitled individuals or to their authors who have obtained compensation titles issues by the Central Commission for Establishing Compensations before Law 165/2013 came into effect and who have not followed the administrative procedure stipulated in chapter $V^1$ section 1 from title VII of Law no. 247/2005 regarding reform in the fields of property and justice, as well as certain adjacent measures, with subsequent changes and additions, not respecting the deadlines regarding capitalizing on these titles. (2) in relation to art. 12 from Law no. 165/2013, as they were modified through Law no. 368/2013 meant to modify and supplement Law no. 165/2013, and to art. $22^1$ - $22^3$ from the Application norms of Law no. 165/2013[80]. It was decided that the goods that can be given as compensation are parcels, with or without constructions on them, and constructions that are finalized or not, no matter the category of the buildings for which the notification was formulated under Law no. 10/2001 regarding the judicial state of certain buildings taken over abusively during 6 March 1945-22 December 1989, republished, with its subsequent changes and additions, while the provisions of art. 12 from Law no. 165/2013, with its subsequent changes and additions, are not applicable.

On 29 April 2014, in the case of Preda et al. versus Romania[81] (requests no. 9584/02, 33514/02, 38052/02, 2582/03, 29652/03,3736/03,17750/03 și 28688/04), CEDO showed that a judicial and administrative practice in the application of Law no. 165/2013 has not yet been developed, since the law had only been adopted recently. Moreover, it appreciated that the doubts expressed by the plaintiffs in regard to the chancess of success of the new internal legislative instrument cannot change this conclusion. The court thus concluded that, except in the situations where there are several property titles that coexist for the same building, Law no. 165/2013 offers, in principle, to Romanians answerable to the law the possibility to obtain a resolution for the complaints at an internal level, a possibilitity that the Romanian state should use. However, on 26 February 2019, in the case of Ana Ionescu et al. versus Romania[82], CEDO condemned the Romanian state to 2.731.632 Euro for not respecting the right to property. The court concluded that through the application of Law no. 165/2013 an efficient remedy for granting reparatory measures for buildings taken over abusively by the communist state is not ensured.

5. Conclusions

Rehabilitation presupposes the victim's "return" to the state before the abuse, whether it is about recovering social or political rights, or material goods. In Romania, after the 89 Revolution what was desired was the configuration of a democratic society, based on respect for the law and for human rights. The victims who were dispossessed of properties and of their right over them during the communist period, wanted a restoration of rights and a recovery of properties.

In order to respond to the first objective established in this paper, we will appeal to mentioning Pablo de Grieff, specialist in TJ. He[83] mentions two reasons for which outlining a reparations design cannot be conceived in a limited manner, but by taking into account the society's political and social projects. A first argument would be the fact that the attorneys' work is concentrated around the behaviors that are exceptions to the norms that ensure social order. The law treaties are conceived to individually respond to human rights violations. However, in the case of a totalitarian regime such as the one in Romania, grave human rights violations did not represent an exception, but a generalized and frequent act. This is why the conception of a unilateral, limited system of reparation was not welcome or recommended, its articulation in the social and political framework would be more appropriate. A second argument focuses on the implementation of the reparations program. In the case where it is supported by the project of societal change, being one of its components, the possibility for it being implemented is higher. The purposes of reparations contain in themselves more than the satisfaction of individual necessities, more than a package of administrative measures. The reparations programs presuppose precisely desiderata such as recognition, civic trust, and solidarity. In the cases of generalized abuses such as those that took place in Romania, the expectations regarding the reparations packages are not to rectify just the particular cases, but also the preconditions of a rule of law, an objective that brings with itself a public, collective dimension, an idea that is found as well in the holistic approach promoted within the General theory of law.

It is true that there were two Truth Commissions that operated in Romania: the Presidential Commission for the Analysis of the Communist Dictatorship in Romania in 2006 for a period of six months, and the International Commission for Studying the Holocaust in Romania in 2004 for a year. Just as it is mentioned in studies on Transitional Justice mention, the truth and reconciliation commissions can generate more positive effects if they are created immediately after the installment of the new regime. The truth and reconciliation commissions represent a central element of the TJ process, which has the role of facilitating according to case, during transitional periods, the crossing from totalitarian regimes to democratic ones, from a state of conflict to a peace one. In the case of Romania, the reports of the two truth commissions recommend individual and collective reparations programs for the victims who were dispossessed of properties in the old regime. Considering that the two commissions operated after 5, and 6 years respectively from the 89 Revolution, it cannot be stated that the recovery of properties was established as a program taken on during a TJ process.

Thus it remained more on the shoulders of those harmed, of the victims of the old regime to put in the efforts to recover their properties. In this endeavor, as it can be deduced from the present analysis, the victims were confronted with a legislation that is in a constant change, with a lack of unity in jurisprudence, with certain syncopes in the implementation of court decisions. In an attempt to become rehabilitated, the victims appealed to both national courts and to CEDO. The present research reveals how in the case of both law no. 10/2001 and law no. 165/2013 there were numerous changes and additions that took place and there were numerous decisions given regarding the unconstitutionality of certain provisions from the laws, in the recourse in the interest of the law and in order to decipher various law matters. Moreover, the abundance of appeals made by plaintiffs to CEDO and to courts of constitutional law presents in turn a hidden risk. Sadurski[84] considers that the strong system of judicial revision can have negative connotations, with the risk for the discourse on rights to be translated from the public setting to the small, specialized world of constitutional experts. It is concluded that the legislative, political, technical and administrative limitations in the field of property restitutions in Romania have lead in many of the cases to the fragmenting of the reparations and to moving away both from the concrete form of the size of the compensation and from its symbolic meaning.

EU TRADE POLICY AFTER BREXIT. PROVISION OF PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Oana-Mihaela SALOMIA[*]

Abstract

The accession to the European Union has been an irreversible and unique process until the Lisbon Treaty and the recent United Kingdom withdrawal.

The legal consequences of such withdrawal cannot be analysed in a separated way from the economic and social ones or from the future United Kingdom status - third country as the European Commission stated - which supposes the application of the same regime as for the actual third countries in the field of the common commercial policy.

The new generation of the trade agreements negotiated with developed third countries such as the USA, Canada (already concluded), New Zealand, Australia, Singapore, or countries as Chile and Indonesia, contains specific dispositions on the provision of professional services with an important economic input facilitating the free movement of persons. The European Union has an exclusive competence to conclude these international agreements in accordance with the art. 3 of the Treaty on functioning of the European Union, but it remains under discussion and analysis its competence to include the recognition of the professional qualifications within these agreements or to conclude a separate one on this matter.

Keywords: United Kingdom withdrawal, international trade agreements, provision of professional services, recognition of professional qualifications, exclusive competence.

1. Introduction

1.1. Legal framework

The free movement of persons as fundamental human right is guaranteed and regulated at European Union level and the provision of professional services is one of the important elements of this freedom.

The provision of professional services is linked with the regulation of the professions by the Member States and the recognition of the professional qualifications under the Directive 2005/36/EC; the European Commission recommends to the Member States to undertake certain reforms in the field of profession regulation for facilitating the free movement of persons and economic development. So, in this context, the provision of professional services by third countries providers must be allowed respecting the equal treatment principle, the fundamental liberties of the European Union (EU), the high-level of the providers training (the training for seven professions is harmonised at the Member States level by the Directive 2005/36/EC), the quality of provided services and the protection of consumers.

According with the art.53 and art.26 of the Treaty on functioning of the European Union (TFEU), the recognition of the professional qualifications is covered by the shared competence between Union and Member States and thus a specific international agreement must be concluded by both actors being a mixed agreement. It seems that the European Commission considers exclusive the competence of the Union to conclude an international treaty on recognition of professional qualifications since such legal document will be necessary and efficient only in the field of the commercial relations with a third country.

Nowadays, European Commission confirms that "The withdrawal of the United Kingdom does not affect decisions on the recognition of professional qualifications obtained in the United Kingdom taken before the withdrawal date based on Directive 2005/36/EC by an EU-27 Member State. As of the withdrawal date, United Kingdom nationals will be third country nationals and hence Directive 2005/36/EC no longer apply to them". The United Kingdom (UK) Government states that "The UK will ensure that professionals arriving in the UK from the EEA after the exit date will have a means to seek recognition of their qualifications. However, this will differ from the current arrangements." (EEA - European Economic Area).

The conclusion of an international trade agreement by the European Union with the United Kingdom including provisions on the professional services must be realized under the existing good practices; at the same time, it is necessary to take into account the former status of the United Kingdom without creating a more favourable regime as it happened until now in relation with the application of EU treaties (see the opt out provisions allowed to UK in different fields[1]).
