The International Conference

– CKS 2012 –

Challenges of the Knowledge Society

Bucharest, May 11–12, 2012, 6th Edition

PRO UNIVERSITARIA
BUCUREŞTI
2012®

ISSN 2359-9227
ISSN-L 2068-7796

Indexed by EBSCO-CEEAS, DOAJ, Index Copernicus Database and Ulrich`s

THE PROCEDURE REGARDING THE ADMISSION OF GUILT

ANDREI ZARAFIU[*]

Abstract
Considering the present normative framework, even if in criminal matters the transactions between the judicial organs, which exercise the procedural function of indictment, and the defendant are not permitted, the admission of guilt appears as an incipient form of negotiation of penalty. In anticipation of a future special procedure regarding the accord of admission of guilt, the present institution has generated a great amount of controversy which has, inevitably, caused a matchlessly practice to appear. The purpose of this study is to identify the primary consequences of the norms which now regulate the judgment regarding the admission of guilt and to offer concrete and punctual solutions to the grave problems generated by a defective normative framework. The article has as basic study a documentary material which is comprised not only of normative guidelines, but also of a judicial practice generated by the application of these norms for almost a year. Last, but not least, the actual dimension of the admission of guilt procedure is also underlined by the dealing of the legal issues introduced by the Constitutional Court's recently handed down decisions in these matters.

Keywords: admission of guilt, special procedure, guilt acknowledgment, penalty, judgment.

Introduction

The Constitutional Court in its attempt to eliminate the contradictions generated by the appearance of a deficiently regulated institution, has pronounced two important decisions in the matter of admission of guilt.

Being only a supervisory organism with jurisdictional attributions, the Constitutional Court, through the two decisions mentioned above, has determined a legislative intervention which would transpose, on a normative level, the findings of the constitutional litigation court.

By adopting the Government's Emergency Ordinance no. 121/2011, the content of the institution of judgment in case of admission of guilt has gained new dimensions, whose judicial consequences will manifest in the cases of trials started before the coming into force of this procedural institution.

The goal of the present article is to identify the procedural impediments generated by the introduction in Romanian Criminal Procedure of the judgment in case of admission of guilt.

The study also proposes appropriate solutions for the problems which appeared as a consequence of the intervention of the Constitutional Court.

The purpose of Law No. 202/2010, at both declarative and institutional levels, was the simplification and acceleration of the judicial activity criminal in nature.

With respect to the settlement of criminal causes in the first court of law, the lawmaker's intervention materialized into the introduction (regulation) of a new special procedure for judging the causes in case guilt is acknowledged.

Anticipating the new similar institutions regulated by the future Criminal Procedure Code, i.e. judgment in case guilt is acknowledged (the new Criminal Procedure Code, Art. 374) and the settlement of causes under the acknowledgement agreement (the new Criminal Procedure Code, Arts. 478-488), the current institution generated, as a result of a deficient regulation, a non-unitary judicial practice and doctrine-related controversies.

Although institutions with a similar content are recognized in normative terms also in the legislation of other European states (Germany, France, Greece, Belgium), the settlement of criminal causes in the first court of law through a simplified procedure, even based on guilt acknowledgement, should present serious guarantees for the person who is to be convicted.

[*] Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (email: andrei.zarafiu@mnpartners.ro).

It is precisely the absence of sufficient guarantees, complying with both the exigencies related to the protection of the trial-related rights of the accused, and with the purpose of the criminal lawsuit, as foreshadowed in Art. 1 of the current Criminal Procedure Code, the fact that led to the dispute of this institution.

The juridical consequences of introducing this new institution claimed the intervention of specialized organisms meant to rectify the emerging deficiencies.

Therefore, before establishing the current juridical nature and the finality of judgment in case of guilt acknowledgement, the interventions of the Constitutional Court and of the Government foreshadowing the current content of this institution need to be analyzed.

In this way, the Constitutional Court was notified of the exception referring to the unconstitutionality of the provisions of Art. 320^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code, which exception was raised in files regarding criminal causes which are in different times of the lawsuit (judgment on the merits, appeal, second appeal and challenge to enforcement).

To motivate this exception, authors stated that the provisions of Art. 320^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code breach the constitutional provisions of Art. 15 regarding the Universality of law, of Art. 16 regarding Equality in rights and of Art. 21 regarding the free Access to justice, of Art. 23 para. (11) regarding the presumption of innocence, of Art. 24 para. (1) regarding the right to defense, of Art. 53 regarding the Restriction of the exercise of certain rights or freedoms, and of Art. 124, para. (2) regarding the uniqueness, impartiality and equality of justice, and of Art. 6, paragraph 1 of the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms regarding the Right to a fair trial.

The authors of the exception also stated that the provisions of Art. 320^1 para. (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code breach the application of the most favorable law principle, equality in front of the law and public authorities and the right to a fair trial, since it creates the possibility that, in the event that two co-perpetrators are referred to judgment in different files, the judicial inquiry starting for one of them and not for the other one, only the latter should benefit, in case of guilt acknowledgment, from a reduction of the penalty limits provided under the law.

Examining the exception raised in the files which are in the merits, in the appeal and second appeal stages, for which no final rulings were issued, the Court ascertained that the disputed provisions do not order in terminis with regard to a different penalization of those persons who are in the same juridical situation.

Being a newly introduced institution, its implementation into the criminal lawsuit system may generate, due to differing interpretations, consequences related to the annihilation of the retroactive application of the more favorable criminal law, for discriminating considerations which do not pertain to a certain attitude assumed by the defendants or to any other objective and reasonable reasons.

The Court also emphasized that such drawbacks could have been removed by introducing transitory norms in the body of Law No. 202/2010.

In this sense, the Court referred to the jurisprudence of ECHR (Ruling of September 17, 2009, issued in the Scoppola versus Italy cause), specifying that although the lawmaker did not provide in terminis the way to be followed in case of guilt acknowledgement by the defendants who were referred to judgment under the former law, but who, overrunning the trial-related time for the beginning of judicial inquiry and until the final settlement of the cause, are to be judged according to the new law, the Court established that the more favorable law application principle is applicable in such a case.

In this way, in the case of such transitory situations, consideration should be given to the mixed nature of the provisions of Art. 320^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code, which consecrate a kinder character by reducing penalty limits.

In conclusion, the Court ascertained that the provisions of Art. 320^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code are not constitutional to the extent that they do not permit the application of the more favorable criminal law to all the juridical situations born under the former law, which continue to be judged under the new law until the conviction order remains final.

With respect to the exception raised in the files which are in the challenge to enforcement stage, for which final rulings were issued, the Court ascertained that the exception related to the unconstitutionality of the provisions of Art. 320^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code referring to the judgment under guilt acknowledgment is not connected to the settlement of the causes in which it was invoked, because –as revealed by its marginal name- the wording contemplated a judgment, belonging, with the exception of transitory situations, only to the merits and which must be also applicable only until a final ruling is issued.

Consequently, it is not susceptible of the applicability of the more favorable criminal law retroactivity principle.

With regard to the provisions of Art. 320^1 para. (8), providing a judge's possibility to reject the request for the defendant's guilt acknowledgement and to proceed with judgment according to the common law procedure, the Court ascertained that –due to its equivocal meaning- the article wording does not meet the clarity and predictability requirements which should have been contained by any normative provision. Thus, in the absence of certain objective criteria, the possibility granted to a judge may turn into an abuse that cannot be censored.

The Court established that the prevailing issue is not the establishment of the defendant's deeds or of the data regarding his/her person (the meanings of these criteria do not have univocal correspondents as compared to the ownership of other terms from the criminal law or criminal lawsuit fields), but the determination of the circumstances that a deed exists and that, according to the evidence produced, it was perpetrated by the defendant, and not by any other person.

Therefore, not the mere acknowledgment of guilt is decisive for rendering efficient a lawsuit performed within the limits of lawfulness and impartiality, as they constitute only a procedural condition, but the establishment of guilt [is decisive].

Any eventual criteria instituted by Art. 320^1 para.4 of the Criminal Procedure Code are insufficient for characterizing Art. 320^8 as a clear and predictable norm.

Consequently, the Court ascertained that the provisions of Art. 320^1 para. (8) fail to offer the persons brought to justice the trial-related rights and guarantees sufficient to defend the interests related to their trial position.

For these considerations, the Constitutional Court, by its Decisions Nos. 1470 and 1483 of November 8, 2011 admitted the unconstitutionality exception and established that the provisions of Art. 320^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code are unconstitutional to the extent that they remove the application of the more favorable criminal; the Court also admitted the unconstitutionality exception of the final paragraph of Art. 320^1, ascertaining that it is unconstitutional, and it rejected as inadmissible the unconstitutionality exception of the provisions of Art. 320^1 raised within the challenge to enforcement.

In order to harmonize the provisions of Art. 320^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code with the Decisions issued by the Constitutional Court and in order to avoid a non-unitary judicial practice, Emergency Government Ordinance No. 121 was enacted on December 22, 2011 for the amendment and supplement of certain regulatory acts. This Ordinance amended Art. 320^1 of the Civil Procedure Code, in the sense that para. (4) of the articles currently has the following wording: "The court of law shall settle the criminal side when the evidence produced within the criminal prosecution indicates that the deed exists, it can be construed as a crime and it was perpetrated by the defendant", while para. (8) provides that "the court of law shall reject the request when it finds that the evidence produced within the criminal prosecution are not sufficient to establish that the deed exists, it can be construed as a crime and it was perpetrated by the defendant. In this case, the court shall proceed with the judgment of the cause according to the common law procedure".

In conclusion, further to the matters stated by the constitutional control court, the lawmaker complied, and established clear and precisely formulated criteria, according to which, in each and every case, the competent courts of law shall deem whether the admission or the rejection of the request for judgment is required in case of guilt acknowledgment.

Although they have a special character by comparison to their application field, the provisions consecrating such criteria are coming under the general conditions according to which the criminal side is settled in the first of law. Thus, according to Art. 345 para. 2, a defendant shall be convicted if the court of law finds that a deed exists, it can be construed as a crime and it was perpetrated by the defendant.

In spite of this new legislative intervention, the logical and juridical connection between the settlement of the request for judgment in case of guilt acknowledgment and the settlement of the criminal side on the merits, in the first court of law, shall be consolidated, in the sense that the admission of the request for judgment according to this special procedure is also foreshadowing the merits solution.

As we shall show hereinbelow, the conviction solution is the only solution possible in case of guilt acknowledgment, so that the report on the admission of the request to apply such procedure shall have an interlocutory nature.

Moreover, when they verify the fulfillment of the conditions necessary to apply this procedure, in fact they appreciate in advance also the evidencing material relevant for the merits of the cause, since the same conditions are necessary both for the admission of the request for judgment in case of guilt acknowledgment and for the ruling of the conviction solution: that the deed exists, that it can be construed as a crime and that it is perpetrated by the defendant.

Since it involves essential elements of the conflict relation, the analysis of these conditions prior to the judicial inquiry and the debate stage seems a risky operation, which may be sometimes equated to a form of prior ruling.

In order to be able to judiciously identify the consequences of any interventions occurring in this field, a careful, institutional and functional analysis of the judgment in case of guilt acknowledgment is required for the beginning.

Even if it is not legally qualified in this respect, the judgment procedure in case of guilt acknowledgment has the nature of a proper special procedure, since its object is represented by the clarification of the content of the juridical conflict relation and, implicitly, by the entailment of the criminal liability of the perpetrators of crimes.

In this way, it becomes the fourth proper special procedure known in our judicial system, after the procedure for the prosecution and judgment of certain flagrant crimes, the procedure in the causes with underage criminals and the procedure for entailing the criminal liability of a legal person, all of these procedures implying the settlement of the merits.

The analysis of the content of Art. 320^1 indicates that the procedure in case of guilt acknowledgment is primarily composed of the norms of a regular procedure, supplemented by complementary and mandatory provisions; an express mention in this regard would have been useful, according to the model of the regulation of the special procedure applicable to underage individuals.

Unlike the other proper special procedures, this procedure contains norms derogatory only with reference to the judgment in the first court of the causes in which guilt acknowledgment occurs.

This special procedure essentially implies a simplified judicial inquiry, which takes place during a single hearing; in the essence of express provisions, the performance of the criminal prosecution, of the preliminary stage, of the debate, deliberation, ruling and drafting of the decision related to the judgment in the first court, as well as the performance of judgment in the challenge means shall be done according to the regular procedure of common law.

The procedure in case of guilt acknowledgment shall apply in every criminal cause except for those causes regarding crimes punished by life imprisonment.

The exception shall operate regardless of the provision of life imprisonment as an alternative punishment by imprisonment or as an autonomous punishment. We believe that the interdiction shall apply even if the crime retained as incumbent on the defendant remained an attempt, because the text refers to the punishment provided by law for the crime contemplated by the criminal action exerted in the cause, regardless whether, in fact, the crime was perpetrated in its standard form or it remained an attempt.

The procedure shall be initiated further to the defendant's personal statement, made verbally in front of the court of law or made under an authenticated writ.

This expression of will must occur until the commencement of the judicial inquiry, so until the reading of the notification act.

The lapse of this lawsuit term shall lead to the rejection of the request as filed late; a solution should be ordered under a separate court report as provided by Art. 320^1 para. 8, and not simultaneously with the merits settlement sentence.

In case the re-judgment of the cause was ordered further to the admission of the appeal or of the second appeal, the court that would proceed to the re-judgment of the cause might theoretically apply this special procedure, if the decision to admit the appeal or the second appeal cancels all the procedural acts performed in front of the first court, while the re-judgment limits do not explicitly or implicitly prevent guilt acknowledgement.

This solution results from the fact that the law does not make any distinction in such a situation, and the provisions of Arts. 384 and Art. 385^{19} establishing the procedure of re-judgment in case of admission of the appeal or second appeal provide that such procedure shall be performed according to the rules of judgment in the first court (Special Part, Title II, Chapters I and II, therefore and Art. 320^1), which shall apply accordingly.

In case guilt is acknowledged during the criminal prosecution, the judicial activity shall be carried out according to the usual procedure, as long as there are no derogations in this respect, and – according to Art. 202, para. 2- the duties of the criminal prosecution body related to the collection of the evidence necessary for a just and complete settlement of the cause need to be fulfilled even if the accused person or the defendant acknowledges his/her deed.

The statement made by the defendant during the guilt acknowledgment procedure must contain two ordering acts: an act for the acknowledgment of the deeds retained in the court notification act, and an act requesting that the judgment should be made on the basis of the evidence produced in the criminal prosecution stage.

In consideration of this aspect, guilt acknowledgment should not apply to those defendants who were underage at the crime perpetration time, even if their ordering acts were approved by their legal representatives.

This solution results, in the absence of an express provision, from the manner in which the law regulated this procedure, and it is confirmed by the fact that another special procedure for prosecution and judgment shall be applied to those underage persons who perpetrated crimes; these persons shall automatically benefit from a cause for reducing the punishment limits by half, according to the substantive provisions of Art. 109 of the Criminal Code.

Also, at the level of principles, the special procedures pre-judging the merits cannot be applied concomitantly, due to the legal treatment related to derogatory norms, which solution results also from the interpretation of the provisions of Art. 479 para.1.

The essential premise for the special procedure in case of guilt acknowledgment is the existence of a criminal prosecution stage in which the evidence would have been duly produced and sufficient for the entailment of criminal liability.

The partial acknowledgment of the deeds retained in the notification act is not sufficient for the procedure application, as in civil law. Such an incomplete acknowledgment may be, however, appreciated as a judicial mitigating circumstance.

Even if the defendant acknowledges his/her guilt, his/her statement cannot have an absolute character.

In this way, if the evidence were unduly produced in the criminal prosecution stage, the defendant's acknowledgment statement made under the conditions of Art. 320^1 cannot cover the produced illegality.

The court of law, in virtue of its active role and of its obligations deriving from the regulation manner of the proof burden in the criminal lawsuit, does not have any possibility, according to Art. 64 para. 2, to use this proof, not even to apply the special procedure for guilt acknowledgment.

This solution is the consequence of the fact that the sanction which occurs, under Art. 64 para. 2, in the case of the means of evidence illegally obtained, has a sui generis character, and it consists in a general impossibility to use the unlawfully obtained information in evidence; this sanction of "dismissal" shall not be confounded with nullity, which knows, at least as far as relative nullity is concerned, the confirmation possibility.

If the special procedure is applied, the judicial inquiry shall be simplified and shall imply the performance of only two acts with a probating character: a mandatory act, hearing the defendant, and an eventual act, the production of evidence by writs as mitigating circumstances.

The drafting manner of Art. 320^1 reveals the following intention of the lawmaker: this simplified judicial procedure, just like the proper judgment, in fact, should be performed during a single court hearing.

As a result, if the production of evidence by writs as mitigating circumstances requires another court hearing, the court shall either reject the evidence and shall settle the cause according to the special procedure, or they shall continue judging the cause according to the common law procedure.

Also, if the settlement of the civil action at law requires the production of evidence, the severance of such action is imposed.

In such a hypothesis, even if the solution to be issued in the civil action at law depends on the evidence to be produced, yet such solution shall be largely subordinated to the conviction solution (the only possible one) issued in the special procedure, due to the res judicata authority of the decision settling the criminal action with respect to the existence of the deed, of the person who committed it and of the guilt of such person (Art. 22).

To be able to settle the criminal side based on the special procedure, the court must analyze the evidence produced in the criminal prosecution stage and must deem it as sufficient, so that it should lead to the result that the deed exists it is a crime and it was committed by the defendant.

The law permits a change of the juridical classification of the deeds retained as incumbent on the defendant within this procedure; however, the new classification needs to be covered as far as its constitutive content is concerned by the already produced evidence; if the new classification is not supported by the probating evidence, the judgment shall continue according to the usual procedure with the production of the evidence necessary to clarify the cause in all respects.

As we have shown, the special procedure in the case of guilt acknowledgment shall be initiated by the defendant's verbal statement, made in front of the court of law, or by his/her written statement, made in the form of an authenticated writ.

Failing an express provision, in case there is a crime-related complex formed of several defendants in a criminal cause, and only some of such defendants request to be judged on the basis of guilt acknowledgment, then, if the court admits their request, the court should severe the cause, under the same report, forming a new file regarding the deeds of those defendants who requested the application of such procedure; this file shall be settled according to the special provisions applicable in this field.

The initial file, in which the application of the special procedure was not requested, shall be judged according to the norms of common law.

The procedure per se implies the succession of the following acts: interrogating the defendant in order to confirm his/her request and in order to make sure that such defendant is aware of the implications of his/her acknowledgment (Art. 320^1 para.3), hearing the defendant, the eventual production of writs for mitigating circumstances (320^1 para. 2), as well as raising for the contradictory discussion by the parties and the prosecutor of the defendant's request to apply the special procedure.

Concerning the first aspect, the law indicates that the court of law is bound to ask the defendant whether s/he requests that judgment should take place on the basis of the evidence produced in the criminal prosecution, known and recognized by him/her.

This last hearing does not have any legal coverage since, in the Romanian criminal procedure, no evidentiary means, not even the statement made by the defendant to acknowledge his/her deed, has a character binding on the court of law only through the fact of confirmation, appropriation or failure to challenge by the party to which such means relates.

As a consequence of the binding nature of the criminal action at law, as well as in consideration of the principles of truth discovery, official nature and active role, the court of law has the duty to appreciate the evidence under the imperative conditions of Arts. 62 and 68, inclusively from the perspective of their production by another judicial body.

If the evidence was obtained by violence, threats or by any other means of constraint or through the failure to comply with the procedure for producing evidence in the criminal prosecution stage, as we have shown, they cannot be used (or are dismissed) even in the special procedure for guilt acknowledgment and even if the defendant shows that s/he recognizes them.

The evidence by writs as mitigating circumstances can be approved only for the defendant and only if such evidence can be produced at the hearing in which the procedure is performed.

For the other parties, the law does not permit the approval of evidence by writs or of any other evidence, unless such is necessary for the settlement of the civil action at law and this action was severed.

Art. 320^1 para. 3 provides that, after hearing the defendant, the court of law shall allow the prosecutor and the other parties to plead. The analysis of the content of the entire article reveals that, at this time of the lawsuit, the prosecutor and the parties shall not be allowed to plead on the merits, but with respect to the defendant's request to be applied the special procedure.

Thus, after disputing the defendant's request, the court of law may ascertain the failure to meet the conditions provided by law.

In this situation, the request shall be rejected under a report, while the court shall continue to judge the cause according to the common law procedure.

If the court finds that the conditions for acknowledgment are met, the court shall admit the request and shall allow the prosecutor and parties to plead on the merits, since this procedure also implies a distinct stage of the debates, according to Art. 320^1, para. 6.

After the admission of the request for the application of the special procedure, the only solution through which a cause can be settled is the conviction solution; as a result, the admission of the request under a report has an interlocutory nature.

The punishment limits shall be reduced, however, by one third, in case of punishment by imprisonment, or by one fourth, in case of punishment by fine.

This special procedure implies, therefore, a distinct cause for reducing the punishment, a procedure which is unknown in case of the other proper special provisions. At the same time, the cause for reduction implied by the guilt acknowledgment procedure is the only such cause regulated by the procedural and substantive law.

Since the law does not contain any express interdictions, in the special procedure for guilt acknowledgment, other causes for mitigating or reducing the punishment, provided in the general or special part of the Criminal Code may be simultaneously applied, if their applicability is ascertained by means of the evidence produced in the criminal prosecution stage or by means of the writs produced as mitigating circumstances directly in front of the court of law.

The lawmaker unfortunately omitted to regulate the manner in which the punishment should be established in case of a competition between the reduction cause provided by this procedure and the causes provided by the general or special part of the Criminal Code.

The conviction solution shall be ordered under a sentence, this being the only type of Court ruling by mean the cause is settled on the merits in the first court, regardless whether such settlement occurs by way of the common law procedure, or by way of the special procedure.

Failing a contrary provision, the conviction sentence in case of guilt acknowledgment shall be subject to appeal or only to a second appeal, under the conditions of the common law.

In consideration of the purpose of this procedure, good use could have been made of a provision which should either regulate the final character of the sentence ruled in this field, or which should limit the reasons for appeal or second appeal only to issues pertaining to a re-consideration of the conditions under which the procedure can be applied, to any eventual consent flaws; or to the defendant's error related to the object or person, according to the model of other decisions ruled in case of acknowledgment, but in the civil field.

In conclusion, after we established the nature and functionality specific to this institution with a hybrid character in the criminal field, which involves substantial consequences in procedural norms, we have to point out the limits or the material applicability of the procedure, by comparison to the issues consecrated by the Constitutional Court with respect to the more favorable criminal law application principle.

In this sense, the transitory provisions regulated under Art. XI of Emergency Ordinance No. 121/2011 are extremely important; the said ordinance becomes thus lex generalia in this field.

In order to establish the application in time of the norms composing the judgment procedure in case of guilt acknowledgment and to settle the potential conflict of applicable regulatory acts, the Constitutional Court identified 3 analysis hypotheses.

1. A first situation envisages the hypothesis in which defendants were referred to judgment after the enforcement of Law No. 202/2010. With regard to such defendants, the text allows no discussion whatsoever, being applicable in its entirety. Since the procedural norms have an immediate application, guilt acknowledgment may also be pleaded in the causes in which criminal prosecution was carried out under the former law, as long as –at the time when the request was filed- the maximum term established in this respect, i.e. the reading of the notification act in the first court of law, was not overrun.

2. A second situation is that in which defendants, although having been referred to judgment prior to the issue of Law No 202/2010, the lawsuit term for initiating the judicial inquiry was not overrun. The text is applicable without any differentiation whatsoever also in this case.

3. A third situation envisages the case of those defendants who were referred to judgment under the former law, but who overran the term for the initiation of the judicial inquiry. For this last category, two sub/groups may exist; these two sub-groups have a differing legal treatment.

In this way, if the defendants have already been finally judged under the former law, the entry into force of Law No. 202/2010 cannot affect the positive and negative effects generated by the fact that a court order remained final. Consequently, it is not susceptible of the applicability of the retroactivity principle of the more favorable law.

Also, a contrary thesis cannot be admitted, since the stability of juridical relations would be impaired; in the absence of such stability, we cannot speak about the rule of law.

As a result, if the provisions of Art.320^1 of the criminal Procedure Code are invoked in causes that are finally settled by way of reviews, challenges pending cancellation, challenges to enforcement, etc., such request must be rejected as inadmissible.

In the case of the second sub-group, envisaging the defendants referred to judgment under the former law who overran the initiation time of the judicial inquiry, but who have not been finally judged yet, the provisions of Art. 320^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code shall be applied according to the transitory provisions of EGO No. 121/2011.

According to Art. XI of this regulatory act, in the causes pending for judgment in which the judicial inquiry in the first court had started prior to the enforcement of Law No. 202/2010, the provisions regarding judgment in case of guilt acknowledgment shall accordingly apply at the first hearing with the complete procedure that immediately follows the entry into force of this emergency ordinance.

Therefore, even if the special provisions for reducing punishment may be applied also to these defendants, such provisions should be invoked in consideration of certain procedural conditions which are just as precise (the first hearing with the complete procedure that immediately follows the entry into force).

Also, the provisions of Art. 320^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code may be invoked in compliance with this procedural term, even if the respective criminal cause is judged in the first court or in appeal or second appeal. The interpretation derives from the wording, which refers to causes that are generally pending for judgment, without distinguishing the type of judgment (in the first court, in challenge means or in re-judgment after cancelation or cassation), therefore prior to the remaining final of court ruling for merits settlement.

Conclusions

Ever since it appeared the institution of judgment in the case of admission of guilt has generated doctrinal controversy and an uneven judicial practice.

The intervention of the supervisory constitutional court has determined, after only one year of existence, the normative content of this institution.

Despite the double intervention, jurisdictional as well as legislative, the procedure of judgment in case of admission of guilt further presents numerous controversial aspects.

This institution represents a form of transition of the regulations in the new Criminal Procedure Code, expected to come into force in the near future..

The evolution of the changes of the present institution will offer the legislative bodies the solution for a supple and coherent normative framework in the matter of the admission of guilt agreement.

References

- THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT, Decision No.1470/08.11.2011 published in Official Gazette No. 853/02.12.2011 and Decision No. 1483/08.11.2011 published in Official Gazette No. 853/02.12.2011.
- Emergency Government Ordinance No. 121/2011, published in Official Gazette No. 931/29.12.2011.
- NEAGU, Criminal Procedure Treaty. Special Part, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009
- CRIŞU, Criminal Trial Law, 2nd Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, 201 ;
- ZARAFIU, Criminal Procedure, Law No. 202/2010, Comments and Solutions, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest 2011.
- MICU, Criminal Trial Law. Special Part. Course, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2010.
- G.THEODORU, Criminal Trial Law Treaty, IInd Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2008.

VIOLATING THE RIGHT TO PRIVATE LIFE UNDER THE NEW ROMANIAN PENAL CODE

MIRELA GORUNESCU*

Abstract
It is more and more difficult nowadays that the private life of a person to remain out of other people intervention and out of public visibility. In this context, the present paper is concentrated of a new criminalization included in The New Romanian Penal Code - article 226 from this law. It is about the violation to the right to private life which is for the first time incriminated by the Romanian Penal Code.

Keywords: private life protection, criminal liability, The New Romanian Penal Code, crime

INTRODUCTION

1. This study focuses on the new legal framework concerning the private life penal protection, as it results from the New Romanian Penal Code. It is well known that, nowadays it is more and more difficult nowadays that the private life of a person to remain out of other people intervention and out of public visibility. That is why the Romanian legislator felt the need to create a special chapter dedicated to the facts which violate the domicile and the private life.

2. From our point of view it is very important for all the actors involved in applying the penal law to correctly understand the law, because this is the indispensable premise for a correct application in particular cases. That is why the present study aims to analyze the constitutive elements of the offence incriminated by the article 226 New Romanian Penal Code and to explain them in accordance to some settlements of the European Court of Human Rights.

3. We will use the monographic analyze method to reveal the main elements of the crime of private life violation. Also, the study will focus on the way the European Court of Human Rights case decisions influenced the new criminalization. Moreover, we will put the new offence in the larger framework created by the legal rules included in the Chapter IX from the Title dedicated to the crimes against the person from the special part of the New Romanian Penal Code.

4. In terms of the Romanian doctrine in the field of interest, the present study has the merit to be among the first studies ever published on this topic. At national level it was already observed that the European Court of Human Rights pays a special attention to the domicile and private life protection. An important number of decisions of the European judicial institution were given in this domain and realized a large concept of private life, which cannot remain out of penal law protection. The Romanian legislator accepted in 2009 this perspective.

A NEW PENAL CODE AND A NEW CONCEPTION ON PRIVATE LIFE PROTECTION

In June 2009, the Romanian Parliament adopted the Law no. 289 concerning the New Romanian Penal Code[1] which is about to enter into force in short time[2]. This new law abolished the Law no. 301 from 2004[3] concerning a former project of penal code, and the Law no. 294 from 2004

* Associated Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, (email: mire_gor@yahoo.com).

[1] Published in the Romanian Official Journal, First Part, no. 510 from 24 June 2009.

[2] According to article 446 from this law, the new code will enter into force at a moment to be indicated by a law which will be especially adopted to rule the entering into force of the code. Until now, this law is still a draft.

[3] Published in Romanian Official Journal, First Part, no. 575 from 29 of July 2004.

on execution of punishments and measures ordered by the court in criminal proceedings[4], two normative acts which have never been intro force[5]. In this way, it is possible for Romania to have in a short time a new Penal Code, a modern one, adapted to the need to combat more efficient the nowadays antisocial behaviours.

The new code was elaborated in a period during which Romania was the subject of several condemnation in cases brought in front of European Court of Human Rights by its` nationals. That is why the Romanian legislator made consistent efforts to adapt the new code to the European standards. This effort manifested also in the field of private life protection.

A clear proof of this effort is the fact that in this legal instrument there is a special chapter dedicated to the offences against the private life. This chapter has no correspondent in The Penal Code which is into force since 1969, but has in its content both new offences definitions (the violation of professional office) and definitions of some traditional offences (the violation of the domicile).

In the legislator's new conception, a special chapter is needed in order to assure better protection for this important social value. In this way, the importance of the value will be stressed and all the society will receive the right message.

In this chapter, there are four articles which refer to crimes traditionally known by the Romanian legislation: the violation of the domicile (article 224 New Romanian Penal Code), the disclosure of the professional secret (article 227 the New Romanian Penal Code), but also, to crimes defined for the first time in our legislation: the violation of the professional office (article 225 New Romanian Penal Code) and the violation of the private life (article 226 New Romanian Penal Code).

The social value protected by all these legal norms is represented, according to the doctrine, by all the social relations which refer to the people's intimacy ant to the right to have a normal life, with the respect of private life against the acts that could endanger it[6].

THE RIGHT TO PRIVATE LIFE FROM THE EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS PERSPECTIVE

According to the article 8 from The European Convention of Human Rights:

"1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

As observed, the Article 8, in the first part, paragraph 1, sets out the precise rights which are to be guaranteed to an individual by the State – the right to respect for private life, family life, home and correspondence. In its second part, the Article 8 paragraph 2 makes it clear that those rights are not absolute in that it may be acceptable for public authorities to interfere with the Article 8 rights in certain circumstances. These must be only interferences which are in accordance with law and necessary in a democratic society in pursuit of one or more of the legitimate aims listed in Article 8

[4] Published in Romanian Official Journal, First Part, no. 591 from 1st of July 2004.

[5] This technique was possible due to the modification of Law no. 24 from 2004 concerning the legislative technique rules (published in Romanian Official Journal, First Part, no. 777 from 25 August 2004 – by the Urgent Ordinance of the Govern no. 61from 2009 - published in Romanian Official Journal, First Part, no. 390 from 9 June 2009). According to a new text, under article 1^1, a normative act may be modified and even abolished before the moment of entering into force. So, the Law 301 from 2004 is not and never were the active Romanian Penal Code, even some electronic documentation sources indicate it in this position – ex. http://legislationline.org/documents/section/criminal-codes.

[6] V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, Drept penal, Partea specială, Editura Wolters Kluvert, Bucureşti, 2011, p. 176.

paragraph 2 will be considered to be an acceptable limitation by the State of an individual's Article 8 rights[7].

In the doctrine it is observed that, concerning this article, that The Court has held that, given the fundamental nature of the Convention rights, the first paragraph should be widely interpreted, and the second one narrowly. Rights must therefore be "stretched", and limitations limited. Also, individuals need only show that there was an interference with a right protected by the Convention in their case; the State then bears the onus to prove that that interference was lawful and justified in Convention terms.[8]

As it concerns the definition of the private life, as a social value, protected by the penal law, according to the European Court, this is a broad concept which is incapable of exhaustive definition[9]. The only consensus which exists is that the concept is clearly wider than the right to privacy, however, and it concerns a sphere within which everyone can freely pursue the development and fulfilment of his personality. In a particular decision, the European Court stated that it would be too restrictive to limit the notion of private life to an "inner circle" in which the individual may live his own personal life as he chooses and to exclude there from entirely the outside world not encompassed within that circle. Respect for private life must also comprise to a certain degree the right to establish and develop relationships with other human beings[10].

It is said that the 8th article of the European Convention of Human Rights is only the first text from a series of four articles which protect rights meaning the social respect due to the individual[11]. In this series are included: the right to the private life and to a family life, the right to domicile and to correspondence (article 8), the right to the freedom of thought, conscience and religion (article 9), the freedom expression, and to information (article 10) and the freedom of association (article 11).

In this context, it is accepted by the doctrine that the respect for the private life is a complex right, with multiple aspects, as it results from the European Court of Human Rights jurisprudence. It includes, for instance, the privacy (the private life secrecy), the right to a personal identity and, as a new come, the right to a healthy natural environment[12].

The first component refers to the private life secrecy, as a right to live protected from the foreign eyes, as a right to be left alone. This right includes also the protection of the domicile, as the space the private life takes place. Under this prerogative enters the private opinion secrecy, protected against the correspondence secret violations or against any modern investigation methods authorities might use: tapping, creation and communication of personal data files, storing and using data without person's accord[13].

The protection is extended over the particulars' intrusions and that is why the state has the duty to prevent and to punish the abusive behaviours by a strict legal regulation of the private detectives and journalists' responsibility.

The absence of protection against press intrusions or the disclosure in the media of highly intimate, non-defamatory details of private life has not yet been subject to significant challenge in European Court of Human Rights jurisprudence. Some complaints have been declared inadmissible

---

[7] Ursula Kilkelly, The right to respect for private and family life. A guide to the implementation of Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, http://echr.coe.int/NR/rdonlyres/77A6BD48-CD95-4CFF-BAB4-ECB974C5BD15/0/DG2ENHRHAND012003.pdf.

[8] Douwe Korff, The Standard Approach under Articles 8 – 11 ECHR and Article 2 ECHR, http://ec.europa.eu/justice/news/events/conference_dp_2009/presentations_speeches/KORFF_Douwe_a.pdf.

[9] Costello-Roberts v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 25 March 1993, para. 36.

10 Niemietz v. Germany, judgment of 16 December 1992. 11 Appl. No. 8257.

[11] Corneliu Bârsan, Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului, Comentariu pe articole, Editura C.H. Beck, București, 2005, pag. 593.

[12] Bianca Selejan-Guțan, Protecția europeană a drepturilor omului, Editura C.H. Beck, București, 2004, p. 150..

[13] Leaner v Suedia Case, 1987.

for failing to exhaust domestic remedies[14]. Determination of whether issues might arise under private life in relation to press intrusion might be influenced by the extent to which the person concerned courted attention, the nature and degree of the intrusion into the private sphere and the ability of diverse domestic remedies to provide effective and adequate redress.

This is the component the Romanian legislator from 2009 chose to protect by criminalizing the facts described by the article 226 from The New Romanian Penal Code.

THE PRIVATE LIFE VIOLATION UNDER THE NEW ROMANIAN PENAL CODE

Under all these influences, in the article 226, the New Romanian Penal Code incriminates for the first time in Romania, the private life violation. The offence consist, in its basic form, in a behaviour of a person who affects the private life of a person, without legal justification, by photography, by capturing or recording images, by listening with technical instruments or by tapping a private conversation held in a house, in a room. In a close relationship with this first form, the second paragraph of the article 226 of the Romanian New Penal Code states that represent an even more serious offence these facts: the unlawful disclosure, dissemination, presentation or transmission of sounds, conversations or images provided in the first paragraph to another person or to the public.

According to paragraph 5 from the article 226, represents an offence even the fact to place without an authorization technical devices to audio or video tapping, in order to commit the private life violation.

According to the Romanian doctrine, the norm from the article 226 New Romanian Code respond to a necessity to prevent the unlawful use by the press, by any person or by some specialized authorities of modern technical recording instruments in order to tape private conversation and to interfere with the victim 's right to privacy[15]. In the same time, it is observed that the new criminalization is formulated in a manner which allows the press to fulfil its role in a democratic society, and to realize a correct equilibrium between the right to private life and the freedom of expression[16].

That is because the legal text itself, in the paragraph (4), indicates four causes to justify the facts described by the rest of the provisions. In these cases the fact will lose its unlawful character: the author participated to a conversation with the victim and taped the sounds, the images or the conversation in this occasion, having a legal interest to do this; the victim explicitly acted in a way to make her (him) seen or heard by the author; when the author tapes a person committing a crime or proves an offence; when the author tapes public interest information, and their divulgation brings more important advantages than the prejudice created for the individual.

The criminal law specialists[17] have already expressed their concern about this last hypothesis, because it will be impossible as in concrete situations to determine when the prejudice produced by the divulgation act is less important than the prejudice for the private life. That is because often this prejudice has a moral nature, which makes it impossible to quantify.

Such an offence might be committed in the future by a private detective hired by a jealous wife who uses technical recording at distance instruments to tape images or conversations the husband has with his mistress in her home[18].

Because of the way the legal text is formulated, there are already disputes in the doctrine concerning the incriminated behaviour. For instance, in one opinion, this element is represented by [14] Case no. 18760/91 v. Ireland, 1993; Case no. 28851/95 and 28852/95, Spencer v. the United Kingdom, 1998.

[15] P. Dungan, T. Medeanu, V. Paşca, op cit., p. 247.

[16] V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., p. 175-176.

[17] P. Dungan, T. Medeanu, V. Paşca, op cit., p. 254.

[18] V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., p. 176.

the „private life perturbation", seen as any action which facilitates by all means a direct contact with someone's private life[19]. In another opinion, the illegal behaviour consists from facts such as shooting, capturing or recording images, listening with technical instruments or tapping a private conversation held in a house, in a room[20]. We agree this second opinion, because the private life perturbation is the result which the offence produces and not the interdicted behavior.

There are some essential conditions to be met in order to establish the offence was committed. Firstly, it is necessary to see that all the acts described by the law were committed without having a valid legal order to allow them, or, without having the victim's consent. This special condition takes into account the fact that, under some particular circumstances, it is possible for the judicial authorities to tape the sounds, the conversations or the images without breaking the law. For instance, according to the article 138 from the New Romanian Penal Procedural Code, during the investigations may be used some special survey techniques. Among these techniques there are: the interception of conversations and communications, the access to a computer, the video, audio photo survey, the localisation or the taking of a person, getting the phone calls listing, etc. So, it is possible to conduct all this activities without committing the offence defined by the article 226 from the New Romanian Penal Code. But, in order to remain in the legal framework, all the conditions imposed by the law must be respected. For instance, according to the article 140 from this legal instrument, the technical survey is possible only after the judge for rights and liberties authorises it. In special cases, the prosecutor has also this possibility, but only for a short duration (48 hours).

Secondly, in the assimilated modality, it is necessary to observe that the offender disseminated the sounds, the conversations or the images to other people or to the public. In the doctrine it is opinionated that, in this modality, when the person keeps the sounds, the conversations or the images for himself, the offences defined by the article 226 paragraph 2 the New Romanian Penal Code cannot be committed[21].

Defined as we have seen, the private life violation offence from the article 226 of the New Romanian Penal Code has a modern content, in accordance with the legal texts from other European countries legislation.

For instance, the Penal Code of Spain, in the first chapter from the 10th title defines „The offences against the intimacy, the right to a personal image and the right to the privacy of the domicile". According to the article 197.1 from this chapter, a person will be punished for facts committed in order to discover someone's secrets or to affect someone's private life, without the victim's consent will use personal documents, letters, postal messages, electronic postal messages, or intercepts he victim's communications or uses interception, transmission, tapping technical instruments.

In the same way, the Italian Penal Code regulates, in the article 615 bis, the offence of illicit interference with someone's private life. According to this text, anyone who, using audio or video taping devices gets in unlawful way information or images which affect someone's private life will be punished under this legal text.

CONCLUSIONS

1. The present paper has as a starting point the Romanian legislator's decision to include under the penal law protection a new area – the private life.

The decision was taken under the influence of some European Court of Human Rights decisions. Moreover, the social value protected by the legal norms from this chapter is defined not by the national legislation, but by the European judicial institution decisions. The new offence is about to become effective in particular situations (once the New Romanian Penal Code will enter into force). That is why the present paper analyzed its particularities in order to facilitate a better understanding of the new legal text.

[19] P. Dungan, T. Medeanu, V. Paşca, op cit., p. 251.
[20] V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., p. 176.
[21] P. Dungan, T. Medeanu, V. Paşca, op cit., p. 253.

2. This study represents a documentation source for every person interested in criminal law field, both theorists and practitioners. The impact on the doctrine will be an important one because there are only a few such studies published in Romania, which reveal the specific elements of a new offence incriminated by The New Romanian Penal Code – the private life violation. Also, the paper has the merit to include an analysis of the way the European Court of Human Rights jurisprudence has influenced the definition included in the article 226 from The New Romanian Penal Code.

The study will be interesting for the practitioners in order to have a doctrinal guidance when the new law will enter into force. In this way, the text will be better understood and better applied.

3. This study opens the perspective for future researches related to this topic. It is about a new domain included under the influence of the Romanian penal law and that is why such future studies should concern some particular aspects of the right to private life and the way penal law succeeds in creating effective guaranties for their protection. It might be interesting to observe the component of the right to a healthy natural environment and the way that the penal legislation protects it. A subject like this is interesting from the both theoretical and practical perspective as well.

References

- V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, Criminal Law, Special Part, Wolters Kluvert P.H., Bucharest, 2011.
- Ursula Kilkelly, The right to respect for private and family life. A guide to the implementation of Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, http://echr.coe.int/NR/rdonlyres/77A6BD48-CD95-4CFF-BAB4-ECB974C5BD15/0/DG2ENHRHAND012003.pdf
- Douwe Korff, The Standard Approach under Articles 8 – 11 ECHR and Article 2 ECHR, http://ec.europa.eu/justice/news/events/conference_dp_2009/presentations_speeches/KORFF_Douwe_a.pdf
- Costello-Roberts v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 25 March 1993, para. 36.
- Corneliu Bârsan, European Convention of Human Rights, C.H. Beck P.H., Bucharest, 2005, pag. 593.
- Bianca Selejan-Guțan, European Protection of Human Rights, C.H. Beck P.H., Bucharest, 2004.
- P. Dungan, T. Medeanu, V. Paşca, Criminal Law, Special Part, Universul Juridic P.H., Bucharest 2010.

INTERNATIONAL TRAFFIC OF NARCOTICS

NICOLETA-ELENA BUZATU*

Abstract
The present essay tries to analyze the infringement referring to the international traffic of narcotics, an infringement regulated, together with other infringements regarding the traffic of narcotics, by Law no 143 of July 26, 2000 with regard to the prevention and fight against the illicit traffic and consumption of narcotics. Article 3 of this Law stipulates that the bringing in and the taking out of the country, as well as the import and export of dangerous narcotics without a legal approval are punished with prison from 10-20 years and with the interdiction of certain rights. In paragraph 2 of the same article it is mentioned that whether the deeds enumerated in paragraph 1 refer to narcotics of a very high risk, the prison penalty is from 15-25 years and the interdiction of certain rights. The analysis of the infringement referring to the international traffic of narcotics is made in conformity with the structure mentioned in the doctrine and includes: the object and the subject of the infringement, the constitutive content: the objective aspect including the material element, the immediate consequence and the casualty connection; the subjective aspect of the infringement, as well as form and modalities of these infringements and the respective applicable sanctions.

Keywords: traffic, trafficker, dangerous narcotics, high risk narcotics, infringement

Introduction

All through history the narcotics phenomenon had an ascending evolution; although in antiquity the healers used them with medical and therapeutic aims, nowadays they are cultivated, manufactured and commercialized by transgressive networks akin to the organized criminality.

Today, the traffic of stupefacients has turned into a rough reality for the contemporary world. After 1990 Romania has changed from a transit country into narcotics consuming country: from the lighter to the high risks narcotics consumption.

The consumption of various categories of narcotics - of a vegetal or synthetic origin - has disastrous consequences for the human body and for the social relationships the addicts participate in.[1] The gravity of this addiction or flagellum - as it is rightly considered to be - arouses the interest of the states and of the whole international community. Various measures have been taken: from social and medical, involving the police or the army to a war declaration against the producers of cocaine or opium.[2]

A large quantity of narcotics is already known, but the effects of the highly advanced technologies are the appearance of newer and more numerous synthetic substances. The clandestine labs permanently change their locations for not being traced and, the costs for the manufacturing of certain narcotics are higher in the detriment of others. Some categories of narcotics are manufactured more frequently than the others: opium, morphine, heroine, cannabis, cocaine, L.S.D. – dextro-lysergic acid diethylamide, mescaline and ecstasy.

The illicit traffic of narcotics is considered to belong to "the highly serious criminal transbounadry branches" - mentioned by the Reform Treaty of the European Union, signed in Lisbon

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Juridical and Administrative Sciences, „Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University, Bucharest (email: nicoleta_buzatu@yahoo.com).

[1] The term "addict" defined by Law no 143/2000 on the illicit traffic and consumption of narcotics was replaced with "consumer" by art 1, point 2 of Law no 522/2004.

[2] Emilian Stancu – Introduction in General Criminology, II[nd] edition, (Bucharest: "Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University, 1996), p. 112.

on December 13, 2007 in art 69 B, in the attempt of giving it a unique definition and with a view to create a common basis for improving the cooperation among the European countries.

Content

In the current speech the drugs are the products and the stupefacient or toxic substances, given the same definition and prohibited by the national and international legislations.

In the Dictionary of Penal Law and Penal Procedures[3] the drug is defined from two aspects: 1) a substance used in the preparation of pharmacy/medicinal drug products 2) a name applied to certain substances (cocaine, morphine) which then when swallowed inhibit the nerve centers and produce a state of physical and psychical inertia. Within certain conditions, such types of disturbances can lead to acts of penal irresponsibility. The drugs that are considered to be stupefacient are submitted to a special legal regime.

The Dictionary of Criminology[4] offers a definition taken over from DEX to which the following specification is added: "They can be identified by modern methods offered by physics and chemistry, as gas – chromatography, thin layer of chromatography, infra red spectrophotometry, etc."

In the opinion of the World Health Organization[5] the drug is the substance that, once absorbed by a living organism, modifies one or several functions of the respective organism. In agreement with certain recommendations given by this International Body, substances or classes of psychoactive substances (drugs) that produce such modifications and generate addiction are: alcohol, opium containing substances, compounds of cannabis, sedatives and hypnotics, cocaine, hallucinogens, volatile solvents, other psychoactive substances and substances belonging to different classes, used in a mix association.

In a strictly pharmacologic way, the dug is a substance used in medicine, whose abusive consumption can produce physical or psychological addiction or serious troubles of the mental activity, perception and behaviour.[6] In this context, the name of drug is applied to the substances that are also known as stupefacients.

In conformity with art 1 of Law no 143/2000, drugs are defined as being plants and stupefacient or psychotropic substances or mixtures containing such plants and substances (included in tables I - III), classifying drugs into two large categories:

1. High risk drugs: heroine, mescaline, morphine, amphetamine, cocaine, codeine, opium, phencyclidine, etc

2. Dangerous drugs: cannabis, cannabis resin, cannabis oil, diazepam, meprobamat, etc.

Very many persons are involved in activities connected with drugs traffic and consumption; for them there are no national or geographical frontiers especially because the two already mentioned activities disregard the frontier and have a transboundary character.

The transport of drugs is made is various ways: from the human body to land vehicles, aircrafts or ships. They use false matriculated land vehicles wearing transit numbers or private automobiles which do not appear in the police records. The drugs are also hidden in auto-trains (of

---

[3] George Antoniu, Costică Bulai – Dictionary of Penal Law and Penal Procedure, (Bucharest: Hamangiu Printing House, 2011), pp. 301-302.

[4] Nicolae Dan, Ion Anghelescu (coord.) – Dictionary of Criminology, (Bucharest: Scientific and Enciclopedic Printing House, 1984), p. 62.

[5] Founded in 1948, it is the specialized Health Agency of the USA. Its aim is to ensure that all the nations get the highest health level. The WHO has a decisive role in adopting prophylactic measures for preventing and fighting against the abusive usage of drugs and the setting forth of methods for treating the addicts. In conformity with the provisions of the Unique Convention on Stupefacients of 1961, the WHO appoints a number of five persons, out of which two are members of the International Organization for the Control of the Stupefacients.

[6] See more in Ioan Dascălu, Cristan-Eduard Ştefan, Cătălin Ţone, Maria Surduleac – Drugs and the Organized Crime, (Craiova: Sitech Printing House, 2009), p. 31.

the TIR type) with or without the knowledge of the driving personnel, in general, scattered among perishable nutriments for not being kept in the customs for a too long time.

The transports entering or leaving Romania without an import or export certificate, as well as those that do not correspond to the certificate specifications are retained by the competent authorities until the legal justification or until the final decision of the Court which decided their confiscation.[7]

The fight against the illicit drugs traffic and consumption used to be and still is s really complex social national and international preoccupation. Its evolution, its effects and the ways meant to solve all these aspects are the main concerns of all the institutions of the states as well as of the public opinion, because this is an utterly serious and dangerous phenomenon with negative effects for the sanity of the population and for the economic and social stability, as well for the favorable evolution of the states' democratic institutions.

Since very ancient times people knew about the proprieties of the drugs[8] but, it is round the second half of the XIXth century that the states of the world realized the proportions of this phenomenon and it was no longer than the XXth century that initiatives meant to control - at the planetary level - the traffic of stupefacients appeared.

In the striving efforts to control and - at the same time - adapt the international legislation to this situation, the Romanian law-maker adopted Law no 143 of July 26, 2000 on preventing and fighting against illicit drug traffic and consumption.[9] Through the Decision of the Government no 860 of July 28, 2005[10] the Regulations to apply the dispositions of Law no 143/2000 regarding the prevention and fighting against the illicit traffic and drug consumption, together with its further modifications was approved.

The Legal Content of the infringement regarding the international traffic of drugs

Art 3 of Law 143/2000 stipulates that „bringing or taking drugs off the country, as well as the import and export of dangerous drugs, without authorized certificated can be punished with prison from10-20 years and with the interdiction of rights.

If the deeds stipulated in paragraph 1 refer to high risk narcotics, the penalty is from 15-25 years followed by the interdiction of rights."

---

[7] Traian Dima, Alina-Gabriela Păun – Illicit Drugs (Law no 143/2000, Jurisprudence and Commentaries), (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Printing House, 2010), p. 187.

[8] For more details about the history of the drugs, see Emilian Stancu – quoted work, pp. 615-619; Ioan Gârbuleț – Traffic and Illicit Drug Consumption. Essay on Legislation, Doctrine and Jurisprudence, (Bucharest: Hamangiu Peinting House, 2008), p. 7 and next.; Bercheşan, Vasile Bercheşan, Constantin Pletea – Drugs and the Traffickers of Drugs, (Piteşti: Paralela 45 Printing House, 1998), pp. 90-112.

[9] Published in the Official Gazette no 362 of August 3, 2000. Amended by Law no 169/2003 on modification and completion of the Penal Code, of the Penal Procedural Code and of some special laws; Law no 39/2003 on preventing and fighting against organized criminality; Law no 522/2004 for modifying and completing Law no 143/2000 on preventing and fighting against the illicit traffic and consumption of drugs; the Emergency Ordinance of the Government no 6/2010 for the modification and completion Law no 143/2000 on preventing and fighting against the illicit traffic and consumption of drugs and for the completion of Law no 339/2005 regarding the juridical regime concerning herbs, substances and the stupefacient and psychotropic substances; Law no 92/2010 about the approval by the Emergency Ordinance of the Government no 6/2010 for modifying and completing Law no 143/2000 and for completing Law no 339/2005 regarding the juridical regime concerning herbs, substances and the stupefacient and psychotropic substances; the Government Decision no 575/2010 for actualizing the Annex of Law no 339/2005 regarding the juridical regime concerning herbs, substances and the stupefacient and psychotropic substances, as well as the Annex to Law no 143/2000 on preventing and fighting against the illicit traffic and consumption of drugs, The Emergency Ordinance of the Government no 105 of November 30, 2011 for the modification of art 1 of Law no 143/2000 on preventing and fighting against the illicit traffic and consumption of drugs, as well as of art 8 of Law no 339/2005 regarding the juridical regime concerning herbs, substances and the stupefacient and psychotropic substances, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no 855 of December 5, 2011.

[10] Published if the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no 749 of August 17, 2005.

The Object of Infringement

The juridical object of the infringement stipulated in art 3 of Law no 143/2000 consists of the social relations connected with the public health, whose existence and normal evolution depend on the strict observance - by all those whom the law addresses to - of the legal dispositions regulating the regime of drugs traffic, as well as the social relations referring to the health of the drugs addicts.[11]

By the deed incriminated in art 3 of Law 143/2000 the customs juridical regime is also involved. Thus, Law no 86/2006 - Customs Code of Romania[12] - stipulates in art 271 that "the illegal bringing or taking off the country of weapons, ammunition, explosives, drugs, precursors, nuclear materials or other radioactive and noxious substances, debris, residua or any other dangerous chemical materials, is considered a qualified smuggling infringement and is punished with prison from 3-12 years and with the interdiction of rights, unless the penal law does not stipulate a greater punishment."

The Romanian law-maker intended to protect - through penal law norms - the social relationship that appear in connection with the establishment of certain interdictions regarding the transboundering of the goods subordinated to special regimes, such as narcotics, and which cannot be brought or taken off the country without observing the conditions imposed by the law.

The two incriminatory laws create a set of qualifications meant to be solved according to the principle of subsidiarity. The incriminatory norm included in art 271 of the Customs Code is applied only when the penal law does not stipulate a greater penalty; this means that art 3 of Law no 143/2000 has priority as it stipulates a greater penalty than the one applicable for the infringement of qualified smuggling.

The material object of the infringement is the dangerous drugs and the high risk drugs as stipulated in the Annex Tables of Law no 143/2000 that is I, II and III, which are submitted to the national control.

In case the forbidden activities which become the material element of the objective aspect of the infringement stipulated in art 3 of the above mentioned law are using other plants, substances, products or medicine that are not considered by the law maker to be narcotics submitted to the national control, then the deed could not be counted among the infringements connected with the international traffic of narcotics.

The penal investigation body is obliged to order a technical and scientific analysis in conformity with art 112 and 113 of the Penal Procedural Code in order to establish whether it is about dangerous drugs or high risk drugs. These results will finally decide for their juridical specification.

Subjects of the infringement

The law maker does not ask for any special quality from a subject as to consider that his deed is an infringement, so that the direct active subject of this infringement is not qualified. Then when the active subject is a member of the medical personnel or is a member of an organization which is legally involved in the fight against drugs or exercises an office investing him with public authority, and the deed was committed while he exercised his office, one can speak about the aggravating circumstance stipulated in art 14 of Law 143/2000.

This infringement is liable to penal consequences in all its aspects: co-participation, instigation and complicity.

The main passive subject is the state. The secondary passive subject is the natural person who suffers the already produced consequences or those to be produced because of the committed deed that could endanger his health.

---

[11] Mihai Adrian Hotca, Maxim Dobrinoiu – Crimes Provided in Special Laws. Commentaries and Explanations. 2nd edition, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck Printing House, 2010), p. 160.

[12] Published in the Official Gazette Part I no 350 of April 19, 2006, with further modifications.

The objective aspect

The bringing or taking off the country, the import or export of dangerous drugs - without a certificate - is practically the material element of this infringement.

The bringing or taking off the country dangerous drugs or high risk drugs is, in fact, that action through which they are introduced in the country.

The taking off the country of these drugs is that action through which the dangerous or the high risk drugs are taken off the country.

The import[13] means the total operations with a commercial character through which goods produced in or bought from other countries are introduced in another country.

The export[14] is that operation with a commercial character through which part of the goods produced, processed, completed or repaired in one country are sold in the markets of other countries.

In agreement with art 20 of Law no 339/2005 regarding the juridical regime of plants, substances and stupefacient and psychotropic compounds, the import-export with plants, substances and compounds included in Tables I, II and III of the Annex of this law are made in the basis of a export-import license, issued by a specialized department of the Ministry of Health for each and every operation, in conformity with the pattern stipulated by the methodological norms of this law.

Art 21 stipulates that all import-export operations with plants, substances and compounds included in tables I, II and III of the annex can be made only by the holder of the license mentioned by the law, in the limit of the annual estimations.

In agreement with art 27 the commercial, customs or transport documents, as well as other expedition documents shall mention the names of the plants and of the substances - the way they are inscribed in the tables of the international conventions - and, depending on the situation, the commercial name of the products, the exported quantities from the national territory or of those to be exported, the name and address of the exporter, of the importer and of the receiver.

According to art 28 of Law no 339/2005 regarding the juridical regime of plants, substances and stupefacient and psychotropic products it is forbidden the storing in warehouses and in the free zones of the plants, substances or products containing stupefacient or psychotropic native or imported substances. On the territory of Romania there also forbidden imports simulating transports directed to a customs warehouse; the only exception is when the competent authority of the importing country mentions its approval in the license accompanying the transport.

In art 29 of the above mentioned law it is mentioned that the transports entering or leaving Romania - without an import - export license - as well as those which are not in conformity with the accompanying license are retained by the competent authorities until the transport is justified and legal or until the definitive and irrevocable decision of the court shall order the confiscation of the transport.

In conformity with art 31, a transport crossing the Romanian territory with plants, substances or products containing substances mentioned in tables I, II and III of the annex to Law no 339/32005 is allowed only if the import-export license accompanying the transport is presented to the customs checking points. The destination of a transport that transits Romania can be modified only if a new import-export license is issued by the competent authority of the exporting country. No transport of plants, substances or products containing substances mentioned in tables I, II and III of the annex to Law no 339/32005 transiting Romania cannot be submitted to any treatment meant to alter its nature or packing.

In agreement with art 32 of Law no 339/2005 the above mentioned regulations are not in force in case of a transport by air. In case the aircraft lands or is submitted to an emergency landing, the transport will be considered the same as any other transport from Romania to the country of destination only in unloading conditions or if the circumstances require such a procedure.

---

[13] DEX - Explanatory Dictionary of the Romanian Language II[nd], (Bucharest: "Univers Enciclopedic" Printing House, Academy of Romania, 1998), pp. 478.

[14] Idem, pp. 359.

The immediate consequence of the infringement provided by art 3 is applicable in case the public health and the health of the consumers are endangered; it is also available for the national customs regime.

In the present case the casualty implication shall not be proved, as it derives in the ex re, by the very deed committed, so that the state of risk in case of committing such infringements is inevitable.

The subjective aspect

From the subjective point of view, in case of an international traffic of drugs infringement, the described deed shall be committed intentionally. Intention means that the doer knew about the nature of the products or of the substances his action was aimed at. The intention can either be direct or indirect.

The mobile that determined the action of the doer and the aim in view do not influence the existence of the subjective aspect of the international traffic of drugs infringement. They can be taken into account in the individualization of the judiciary penalty.

Forms. Modalities. Sanctions

Forms

Both preparatory deeds and the attempt are incriminated.

The infringement mentioned in art 3 paragraph 2 of Law no 143/2000 is committed in the form of an attempt not in the form of a committed deed then when the infringement was discovered on the corridor leading to the exist from the country, before crossing the border of Romania.[15] The attempt is punished, in conformity with art 13 of the above mentioned law. The production or the obtaining the means or instruments, as well as the measures taken with a view to committing these infringements is also considered to be attempts in the international traffic of drugs infringement.

Modalities

In practice, beside the norms analyzed in the paragraph about the material element, there can be other numerous modalities for committing such infringements. The incriminatory text includes two types of infringements/ crimes: simple and aggravating.

In the case of the simple type the traffic of drugs refers to dangerous risks and, in the second case it refers to the high risk drugs. The difference between these two types is given by the object of the crime/ infringement.

Sanctions

Bringing or taking off the country, as well as the import or the export of dangerous drugs - without legal permission - is punished with 10-20 years and the interdictions of rights.

If the deed refers to high risk dugs, the punishment is prison for a period of 15-25 years and the interdiction of certain rights.

The Court can dispose the security measure of expulsion in case of foreign citizens, as stipulated in art 117 of the Penal Code.

The drugs, as well as other goods that were the object of the crime mentioned in art 3 are confiscated, as provided in art 17 of Law no 143/2000. In case these things are not found, the convict is obliged to pay their equivalent value. There are also Money confiscated money, values or any other goods obtained through the selling of drugs or of other goods that made the object of the infringement mentioned in art 3. The sums resulted from the confiscated money and goods are considered incomes of the state budget and are put in a special account of the state budget.

[15] The High Court of Justice and Cassation, Penal Department, decision no 4914/2003, Penal Law Magazine no1/2004, p. 174. For in extenso content of this decision see a www.scj.ro.

Conclusions

The evolution of our country with regard to the traffic of drugs was influenced by several factors: social, politic and economic but also by her geographical position in the European continent, by the insufficient legislative measures able to regulate the drugs problem in the post-totalitarian years, by the lack of a police specialized in fighting against such crimes and by the lack of necessary technical devices.

In conformity with the national reports regarding the drugs, the traffic is in a remarkable ascension proved by the increasing number of confiscations.

Firm measures shall be taken - at the level of the society - for making the people aware of the risks deriving from the drugs traffic and consumption. The state institution shall also cooperate and have common actions in order to fight against this phenomenon. This flagellum can be eradicated from the very beginning, but it can be kept under a drastic control.

The necessity of incriminating and penalizing the bringing and taking off the country, as well as the import or export of dangerous drugs and of high risk drugs is materialized by the already analyzed text of law, especially because this phenomenon afflicts the public health, the order of law and economic security of any state.

References

- George Antoniu, Costică Bulai – Dictionary of Penal Law and Penal Procedure, (Bucharest: Hamangiu Printing House, 2011).
- Vasile Bercheşan, Constantin Pletea – Drugs and the Traffickers of Drugs, (Piteşti: Paralela 45 Printing House, 1998).
- Nicolae Dan, Ion Anghelescu (coord.) – Dictionary of Criminology, (Bucharest: Scientific and Enciclopedic Printing House, 1984).
- Ioan Dascălu, Cristan-Eduard Ştefan, Cătălin Ţone, Maria Surduleac – Drugs and the Organized Crime, (Craiova: Sitech Printing House, 2009).
- Traian Dima, Alina-Gabriela Păun – Illicit Drugs (Law no 143/2000, Jurisprudence and Commentaries), (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Printing House, 2010).
- Ioan Gârbuleț – Traffic and Illicit Drug Consumption. Essay on Legislation, Doctrine and Jurisprudence, (Bucharest: Hamangiu Peinting House, 2008).
- Mihai Adrian Hotca, Maxim Dobrinoiu – Crimes Provided in Special Laws. Commentaries and Explanations. 2nd edition, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck Printing House, 2010).
- Emilian Stancu – Introduction in General Criminology, IInd edition, (Bucharest: "Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University, 1996).
- DEX - Explanatory Dictionary of the Romanian Language IInd, (Bucharest: "Univers Enciclopedic" Printing House, Academy of Romania, 1998).
- Law no 143/2000 regarding the prevention and fight against the illicit traffic and consumption of drugs, published in the Official Gazette no. 362 of August 3, 2000, with further amendments.
- Law no 86/2006 – Romanian Customs Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania Part I no 350 of April19, 2006, with further amendments.

JUDICIAL ASSISTANCE OF A WITNESS IN THE CRIMINAL TRIAL

BOGDAN-FLORIN MICU *

Abstract
As the title suggests, this study will analyze the controversial issue of a witness' legal assistance. The term "controversial" is used due to the fact that in the Criminal Procedure Code there is no mention of judicial assistance for a witness, only that for the defendant, injured party, civil party and the civil responsible party. Despite this lack of regulation, the Romanian Constitution and European Union legislation introduce the principle to a fair trial according to which any person involved has the right to be legally assisted. The article will begin with a short presentation of what the quality of a witness entails and what does legal assistance mean. Further on into the study, it will be demonstrated beyond any doubt that a witness can very easily become a defendant, and without proper legal assistance the fundamental principles of law can be broken. A problem can also be identified if one considers the fact that a defendant does not have to declare facts which might incriminate him, whereas the witness has to declare all that he knows, and thus he can incriminate himself. All these issues shall be dealt with in this study, as well as some propositions of lege feranda because there may be a growing need for a more rigorous regulation of this issue.

Keywords: assistance of witness, Criminal Procedure Code, defendant, perjury, equitable trial

Introduction

Judicial assistance of a witness, despite not being regulated in the Criminal Procedure Code, is an issue that can arise anytime during a criminal trial, thus it needs to be dealt with. According to the Romania's Constitution, in article 21 and to the European Union's legislation, in article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights, all people are entitled to a fair trial, which entails being legally assisted. Despite regulating the right to a fair trial of any citizen, a few article further the Constitution regulates the right to legal assistance, in article 24, but it specifies that the parties of the trial have this right.

An interpretation of the word "parties" is in order, due to the fact that the Criminal Procedure Code includes in this category the defendant, the injured party, the civil and the civil responsible parties. Lato sensu, the witness should be included because he can become a defendant, if he declares anything that is not true or that could incriminate himself.

Apart from the Constitution, and the European legislation, there is also the law (51/1995) which regulates the legal profession, in which it is stipulated that a lawyer should represent the legal interests of any person and the client is used, without exemplifying any specific qualities.

As mentioned above, any person has the right to a fair trial. On a close analyses of this statement, we can and should understand that not only the parties, as defined in the Criminal Procedure Code, have this right and implicitly the right to legal assistance, but also the witness, the expert and other people who are involved in the criminal trial.

The Criminal Procedure Code outlines the cases in which legal assistance is mandatory, all of them include the defendant, the other parties having the right to choose a lawyer, or if they cannot afford it, one will be provided if requested. The problem encountered is that a witness must declare everything he knows, whereas the defendant declares only what he considers only what he considers to be necessary, and cannot incriminate himself through his declarations. By not having a lawyer present, a witness can declare facts that may incriminate him, or he may perjure himself and thus quickly become a defendant. Legal assistance is needed in order to insure that his legal rights and liberties are protected.

* Associate Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e–mail: bogdan.micu@mnpartners.ro).

Before a witness is questioned the criminal judicial body informs him about the object of the cause and he is presented the facts that must be proved through his testimony and he is told that he must declare everything he knows. What is not told to him is that he can have a lawyer present at any time, chosen or appointed for him. Thus, the witness may declare a fact that might incriminate him, becoming a defendant, and not being able to invoke a breach of procedure, his testimony being admissible in court against him.

This situation should be specifically regulated, the right to a lawyer should be made known to the witness so that his rights and liberties will not be breached and the principles of a fair trial and of finding of the truth will be upheld.

Legal assistance.

Any person implicated in the criminal trial can provide his own defense, but legal assistance can also be provided. By legal assistance we understand the support given by lawyers to their clients, including advice, clarifications and interventions, as specialists in the domain.[1] It is regulated in the Criminal Procedure Code, in articles 6, 171, 172 and 173.

According to article 6 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the right to defense is guaranteed to the accused person, to the defendant and to the other parties all throughout the criminal trial.

During the criminal trial, the judicial bodies must ensure the parties' full exertion of their procedural rights, under the circumstances stipulated by the law and must administrate the evidence necessary for defense.

The judicial bodies must inform the accused person or the defendant, immediately and before hearing, of the deed of which he is held responsible and of its judicial status, and must ensure the preparation and exertion of his/ her defense. Any party is entitled to assistance by defender during the criminal trial.

The judicial bodies must inform the accused person or the defendant, before his/ her first statement, on his/ her right to be assisted by a defender; this will be recorded in the official report of the hearing. Under the circumstances and in the cases stipulated by the law, the judicial bodies must provide judicial assistance for the defendant, if the latter has not chosen a defender.[2]

Due to the fact that legal assistance is given by lawyers, and only by them, it was also defined as "technical assistance" by some specialists in the field.[3] There are two types of legal assistance: voluntary or mandatory.

Voluntary assistance constitutes the rule[4] and it means that the parties can choose whether or not to be assisted by a lawyer. The defendant has the right to be assisted by a lawyer during the whole criminal trial, during the criminal investigation and the actual judgment. Previous regulation did not oblige the criminal judicial body to inform the defendant of his right to be assisted. Actual regulation introduced the rule that the defendant should be informed, but it mentions nothing about the witness.

A legal assistance contract is signed between the lawyer and the client, and a fee is agreed upon by the two. If a party wishes to hire a lawyer, the court can give a continuance so that one can be chosen or appointed.

---

[1] O. Stoica, "Rolul avocatului în realizarea dreptului de apărare a cetățenilor", R.R.D. nr. 3/1972, pg. 111 – 112.

[2] Article 6 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

[3] G. Leone, "Dritto procesuale penale", ed. VII, Neapole, 1968, p. 204.

[4] Ion Neagu, „Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală.", Bucureşti, 2008, p. 237.

Some categories of people (those stipulated in law 25/1990) can have free legal assistance, and the person can choose the advocate, contrary to other legislation that stipulates that those who can have free legal assistance must accept the lawyer who is appointed to them.[5]

Apart from voluntary legal assistance, there is also mandatory assistance, stipulated in the Criminal Procedure Code. This type of assistance applies only for the defendant, and the criminal judicial body is mandated to provide assistance if he cannot afford to. Not being provided with legal assistance is a breach of procedural regulations and all the acts drawn up can be annulled.

According to article 171, the accused person or defendant has the right to be assisted by a defender all throughout the criminal investigation and the trial, and the judicial bodies must inform him/her of this right.

Judicial assistance is obligatory when the accused person or defendant is a juvenile, military in service, military with reduced service, called-up reservist, student of a military educational institute, held in a re-education center or in a medical-educational unit, when arrested in another case, or when the criminal investigation body or the court appreciate that the accused person or defendant could not defend himself/herself, as well as in other cases stipulated by the law. During the trial, judicial assistance is obligatory, also in the cases in which the law provides for the offence committed life detention or imprisonment for 5 years or more. When judicial assistance is obligatory, if the defendant has not chosen a defender, measures are taken for appointing one ex officio.

When judicial assistance is obligatory, if the chosen defender does not appear, without reason, at two consecutive summons, according to the case, at the date established for an action of criminal investigation or at the date settled for trial, thus creating difficulties for the development and solution of the criminal trial, the judicial body appoints an ex officio defender to replace the chosen one, granting him/her the necessary time to prepare the defense, which may not be shorter than 3 days, except the solution of requests regarding preventive arrest, when the due time may not be shorter than 24 hours.

The delegation of the ex officio defender ceases once the chosen defender appears. If the defender is absent from the trial and cannot be replaced, the case is postponed.

When judicial assistance is obligatory, the criminal investigation body will ensure the presence of the defender at the defendant's hearing. In case the defender of the accused person or defendant is present at the performance of a criminal investigation act, this will be mentioned and the act is also signed by the defender. The arrested accused person or defendant has the right to get in touch with the defender, the confidentiality of talks being ensured.

Article 173 stipulates legal assistance for other parties, assistance which is not mandatory. The defender of the victim, of the civil party and of the party bearing the civil responsibility has the right to draw up requests and statements. During the trial, the defender exerts the rights of the party that he/she assists.

When the court considers that, for certain reasons, the victim, the civil party or the party bearing the civil responsibility cannot handle their own defense, it orders, ex officio or upon request, enforcement of the measures for appointing a defendant.

Statements of the witnesses as means of evidence

The first provisions that deal with the witness' rights and liberties, but also with his/her obligations are from article 78 to article 86. Article 78 offer a definition of what a witness is: the person who knows of any fact that may lead to finding the truth in the criminal trial.

There are people who cannot be witnesses and who may not declare what they know if they prefer it so. The person obliged to keep a professional secret cannot be heard as witness in relation to facts and circumstances that he/she learned about while exerting his/her profession, without the approval of the person or institution. Also, the accused person or defendant's spouse and close relatives are not obliged to testify as witnesses.

[5] W.J. Ganhof van der Meersch, "Convention europeene de droits de l'homme", 1983, p.148.

The quality of witness comes before that of defender, in relation with the facts and circumstances that a person learned about before becoming defender or representative of one of the parties. Also, according to article 82 the injured person may be heard as witness, if he/she does not constitute himself/herself as a civil party and will not take part in the trial as victim.

Also, the Criminal Procedure Code stipulates the possibility for a juvenile to be heard as a witness. Up to 14 years old, his hearing will be conducted in front of one of his parents or of his tutor.

The witness is obliged to come at the place and on the day and hour mentioned in the summons and has the duty to declare everything he or she knows in relation to the deeds of the case. The witness is first asked about his name, surname, age, address and occupation.

After the identity of the witness is confirmed he/she will be asked whether he/she is a spouse or relative of any of the parties and about his/her relations with the latter, as well as whether he/she has suffered any damage as a result of the offence, so that the risk of any prejudice against the defendant is eliminated.

Before being heard, the witness will take the following oath: “I swear to tell the truth and not to hide anything that I know. So help me God!” The witnesses who, from reasons of conscience or religion, do not take the oath, will utter the following formulation in front of the court: "I oblige myself to tell the truth and not to hide anything that I know."[6]

After taking the oath the witness will be informed that, by not telling the truth, he commits the offence of false testimony. The witness is informed about the object of the case and the deeds and circumstances for whose proof he/she was proposed as witness, being asked to declare everything he/she knows in relation to them.

After the witness has given his statement, he may be asked questions connected to the deeds and circumstances that need to be acknowledged in the case, related to the parties' person, as well as to the way in which he learnt about the things declared.

If there is evidence or solid indications that by declaring the real identity of the witness or his/her place of domicile or residence the life, corporal integrity or freedom of the latter or of another person might be endangered, the witness may be given permission not to declare this information, being attributed a different identity under which to appear in front of the judicial body.

This measure may be disposed by the prosecutor during criminal prosecution and by the court during trial, upon motivated request from the prosecutor, witness or any other entitled person.

The information about the real identity of the witness is mentioned in an official report that will be kept at the prosecutor’s office which performed or supervised the performing of the criminal investigation or, according to the case, at the court, in a special place, in a sealed envelope, in conditions of maxim security.

The official report will be signed by the person who handed the request, as well as by the one who disposed the measure. The documents concerning the real identity of the witness shall be presented to the prosecutor or, according to the case, to the panel of judges, in conditions of strict confidentiality. Other persons who may be heard as witnesses that were attributed another identity are undercover investigators.

According to the Criminal Procedure Code there are special modalities of hearing the witnesses who are protected. If there are appropriate technical means, the prosecutor or, according to the case, the court may allow the witness to be heard without actually being present at the place where the criminal investigation body is or in the room where the judgment takes place, through technical means.

[6] Criminal Procedure Code, article 85.

Recording the witness' statement will be performed in the presence of the prosecutor. The witnesses may be heard through a television network, with the image and voice distorted so as not to be recognized. The statements of the witnesses heard are recorded through technical video and audio means and are rendered entirely in written form.

Apart from his obligations of being present on the day decided by the criminal investigation body and to declare what he knows related to the facts and circumstances that he witnessed, he has also rights: according to article 68 Criminal procedure Code he is entitled to protection against violence and threats like any other person who gives statements during the trial, the right to ask that his statement (given so that he considers it to be accurate) is recorded and to refuse to answer any questions which are unrelated to the cause, and he has proprietary rights, the right to be awarded legal expenses, travel and boarding expenses and the income which he lost from his workplace because he had to be present in court.

Legal assistance of a witness during the criminal trial

As presented above, legal assistance is stipulated for the parties of the criminal trial, and especially for the defendant there are cases of mandatory assistance. Introducing a norm which would regulate legal assistance for a witness is necessary so that the fundamental principles of the criminal trial are upheld.

Article 81 of the Criminal Procedure Code contain the provisions according to which a juvenile can be a witness in a criminal trial, if he is up to 14 years old, but his hearing will be conducted in front of his parents, tutor or a person to whom he/she has been given for upbringing and education.

There are two problems which can arouse from this legal disposition. On the one hand, there is no mention of a lawyer in this article. The parents, the tutor or the person to whom the education of the juvenile has been given are sufficient to guaranty the rights and liberties of the juvenile because they do not have the necessary judicial training.

A lawyer is necessary when a juvenile is questioned, especially taking into consideration the fact that the people involved are emotionally involved and professionally unprepared to protect the interests and safety of the juvenile involved in the criminal trial.

On the other hand, only juveniles who are up to 14 years old can be questioned with the obligation of the parents to be present. There is no mention of juveniles who 14 and older. According to the Penal Code, minors who are between 14 and 16 is presumed to be responsible, but it is necessary to prove this through evidence before he can be held responsible for his actions.

If defendants who are minors between 14 and 16 years old need to be proven responsible for their actions, then why should witnesses of this age be considered to be responsible for what they are declaring? A lawyer needs to be present to these questionings so that the accuracy of these declarations be established correctly and so that these minors are not influenced in any way.

Juveniles' mental stability can be altered by what they have seen, they can be frightened and confused and they certainly do not have any knowledge of legal regulations, they cannot know what are their rights and liberties, therefor they should have somebody qualified to represent their interests.

The Criminal Procedure Code stipulates confrontation as a method to verify the veracity of statements. Articles 87 and 88 state that if there are contradictions between the declarations of persons heard in the same case and if it is necessary for the clarification of the case, the respective persons are confronted, the persons confronted are heard on the deeds and circumstances in relation to which the previous declarations contradict each other. The criminal investigation body or the court may approve that the confronted persons ask one another questions. The declarations made by the confronted persons are written down in an official report.

These confrontations can be emotionally unstable for all the participants involved, they can be accused of offences and so the presence of a lawyer is highly necessary to keep the defendants, injured and civil parties and witnesses, especially if they are minors, well aware of their rights and obligations.

Mandatory legal assistance is stipulated in article 171 of the Criminal Procedure Code and is applicable only to defendants. There is a disposition that states that if a defendant is a minor then the legal assistance is mandatory. If legal assistance is mandatory for a defendant who is a juvenile, then a witness who is a juvenile should be granted the same procedural protection. Legal assistance should be mandatory for all juveniles, without distinction to whether they are defendants, injured or civil parties or witnesses.

Another issue that should be discussed is that during the criminal investigation or during the judgment, a juvenile witness can become a defendant in the current trial or in a different one by declaring something that is inaccurate or by not declaring everything he/she knows.

After identifying the witness, it is made known to him that if he does not declare everything he knows or what he declares is not the truth, than he commits the offence of false testimony, or perjury.

According to the Criminal Code, the offence of false testimony is the act of a witness who, in a criminal, civil or disciplinary cause or in any other cause in which witnesses are heard, makes false statements, or does not tell everything he/she knows regarding the essential circumstances concerning which he/she was questioned, shall be punished by strict imprisonment from one to 5 years.

Apart from the offence of perjury, a witness, due to the fact that he/she has to declare everything he/she knows, may reveal facts or circumstances that can incriminate him, whereas the defendant is not bound by this obligation.

If, in light of his testimony, a witness incriminates himself or commits perjury then he becomes a defendant and has the right to be assisted by a lawyer. The witness can become a defendant in the criminal trial in which he was declaring or in a separate one.

Through his statements a witness can become an author, accomplice, instigator or coauthor. If the penalty is higher than 5 years than legal assistance is mandatory.

Also if the witness who becomes a defendant is a minor, then the legal assistance is mandatory no matter of the punishment. In the case when legal assistance becomes mandatory, any statement given without this assistance cannot be used in the trial due to procedural breaches, because all statements must be signed by the advocate as well as the defendant.

Another reason for which legal assistance should be accessible for witnesses is article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights which states that in the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law.

The minimum rights guaranteed are also outlined: to be informed promptly, in a language which he understands and in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him; to have adequate time and the facilities for the preparation of his defense; to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing or, if he has not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so require; to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him.

This article refers to a person against whom a criminal charge exists, the defendant, but it has proven that a witness can become such a person through his statements, thus legal assistance should be available and also permitted to the witness, this right should be recognized for all those involved not only the parties.

It can be argued that the presence of an advocate of the witness is most needed during the criminal investigation, due to the fact that this phase is not public and it may present a danger to the rights of the witness, he can incriminate himself, he can give a less than objective testimony due to error, or under the influence of the criminal investigation bodies.

This provision does not preclude, however, the witness' right to have legal assistance of a lawyer throughout the criminal process. Given the fact that all processes are presumed to be public, the lawyer shall be entitled to attend the public processes in which his client as a witness makes statements, obviously, having procedural right.

Despite being able to be present, in theory, at the actual trial the advocate cannot intervene in favor of his client, cannot speak on behalf of the witness because a witness' testimony is given, exclusively, in consideration of his person. The testimony is important to the trial because it is a personal recollection of the facts and circumstances which occurred. During the trial the witness can incriminate himself and he can commit perjury, if he does not have the legal assistance of an advocate, who is qualified and who knows the law.

Despite the fact that a witness does not have the duty to inform the criminal investigation body of his own initiative, the quality of a witness is gained once he/she is called to give a statement, if the criminal investigation body discovers that the witness had knowledge of a crime having been committed and did not inform the proper authorities than the witness may be accused of committing the crimes regulated in articles 170 and 262 of the Criminal Code: non-denunciation (the act of non-denunciating the commission of any of the offences provided in art. 155-163, 165, 166^1, and 167 shall be punished by strict imprisonment from 2 to 7 years.) and the non-denunciation of certain offences (the act of not denunciating the commission of any of the offences provided in art. 174, 175, 176, 211, 212, 215^1, 217, 218 and 276 shall be punished by strict imprisonment from 3 months to 3 years).

According to the New Criminal Procedure Code offers the witness a little more protection than the present one. When a person gives statements his/her health should be taken into consideration. Concerning this aspect, the New Criminal Procedure Code stipulates that if during a hearing of a person, he/she accuses excessive tiredness or the symptoms of a disease which affects his/her physical or psychological capacity to participate at the hearing, then the judicial body must put a stop to the hearing and takes measures so that the person is consulted by a medic.

The principle of loyalty of administration of evidence is also outlined in the New Criminal Procedure Code. Therefore, it is forbidden to use violence, threatening or other means of constraint as well as promises in the scope of obtaining evidence (in this case a statement from a witness).

Tactics or methods of hearing the witnesses or parties which may affect a person's ability to remember or to consciously and voluntarily relate the facts, the interdiction applies even when the person gives his/her consent to be heard using such a method.

Also, it is forbidden for the judicial bodies or other persons who act on their behalf to provoke a witness to commit or to continue to commit a criminal act in order to obtain new evidence. The statements which have been obtained through torture cannot be used during the criminal trial.

Article 118 is introduced in the New Criminal Procedure Code, as an element of novelty and states that a witness' statement cannot be used against him/her in a criminal trial against him/her.

The European law also protects the witnesses through articles that regulate the right to a fair trial, the right to be protected against torture, inhumane treatments or unlawful prosecution.

There have also been opinions which state that a witness should not be legally assisted during the prosecution or the judgment. Such is the opinion of the prosecution office of the High Court, according to which a witness does not have to be assisted due to the fact that he is not a party in the criminal process, and if a new criminal trial begins against the witness, because of his/her statements, then the witness, as a defendant is entitled to legal assistance.

Conclusions

The witness is an important factor in determining the outcome of a trial. His/her statements can shed light on the events which took place and can assist the courts in determine whether a crime has been committed and whether the defendant is the one at blame or not.

The European Convention of Human Rights guarantees the right to a fair trial. Legal assistance plays a big role in a trial. Despite the fact that the witness is not a party in a trial, this does not entail that he/she is not entitled to be assisted.

Through his/her statements, a witness may commit perjury and so a new criminal trial may begin against him/her or he/she may incriminate him/herself and so he/she may be included in the existing trial as a coauthor, instigator or accomplice.

There are opinions for and against the legal assistance of a witness in a criminal trial. The main reasons against are the fact that the witness is not a party in the trial and that, if he/she commits perjury and a new trial begins then the witness beneficiates of all the rights the defendant has.

The New Criminal Procedure Code includes some dispositions which offer the witness a few more rights: statements given by him/her cannot be used against them, they are protected against torture or any method which may affect their ability to correctly remember the events.

To conclude, despite the fact that the witness is not a party in the criminal trial, he/she should be legally assisted during the criminal trial, in order to insure the protection of the right to a fair trial.

References

- Neagu Ion, "Tratat de procedură penală. Parte specială.", editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2009;
- Crişu Anastasiu, "Drept procesual penal", editura Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2011;
- Gheorghe Dumitru, "Drept procesual penal", editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2011;
- Volonciu Nicolae, "Tratat de procedură penală. Parte specială", editura Paideia;
- Theodoru Gheorghe, "Tratat de drept procesual penal", editura Hamangiu, 2008;
- Zarafiu Andrei, "Procedură penală, Legea 202/2010. Comentarii şi soluții", editura C.H. Beck, Bucureşti, 2011;
- Dongoroz Vintilă, „Explicații teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român", ed II, C.H. Beck, 2003, Bucureşti;
- Stoica O., "Rolul avocatului în realizarea dreptului de apărare a cetățenilor", R.R.D. nr. 3/1972;
- Leone G., "Dritto procesuale penale", ed. VII, Neapole, 1968;
- Ganhof van der Meersch W.J., "Convention europeene de droits de l'homme", 1983.

PROCEDURAL IMPLICATIONS OF THE ILLEGAL ADMINISTRATION OF EVIDENCE DURING A CRIMINAL TRIAL

BOGDAN-FLORIN MICU *

Abstract
As the title suggests, the purpose of this study is to analyze the procedural implications of the illegal administration of evidence. The present paper begins with a short presentation of criminal trial probation, and continues with the analyses of the conditions with which a proof has to comply in order for it to be administered in the trial, as well as the analyses of the procedures of administration themselves. Another part of the study deals with the principles that should govern the administration of evidence during the criminal trial, respectively the principle of legality and loyalty (regulated in article 64 respectively 68 of the Criminal Procedure Code) as well as the European Court of Human Rights regulations. In spite of the weak criminal framework that exists regarding the illegal administration of evidence, the outcome of a trial can be radically changed based on how the evidence is administered. Therefore, this study also focuses on the consequences of the illegal administration of evidence in the criminal trial, which will be dealt with by analyzing which sanction should be applied, if any exists. The study will not be based solely on the normative guidelines, but also on the judicial practice contained in decisions, which exist in this criminal framework, given by various courts in the country. Last, but not least, this study shall present the legal changes which will occur once the new Criminal Procedure Code shall come into force.

Keywords: administration of evidence, criminal trial probation, legality and loyalty principles, Criminal Procedure Code, criminal framework

Introduction

One cannot imagine a criminal trial without evidence. In doctrine it has been defined as being the element with informative relevance over all aspects of the criminal cause.[1] Articles 62 to 135 of title III of the Criminal Procedure Code regulate the means of evidence. The outcome of a trial relies on the legality of illegality of the evidence administered.

According to article 62 of the Criminal Procedure Code in order to find out the truth, the criminal investigation body and the court must clarify the case under all its aspects, on the basis of evidence.

Article 63 states that any fact that leads to the acknowledgement of the existence or non-existence of an offence, to the identification of the person who committed it and to the discovery of the circumstances necessary for the fair resolution of the case is considered evidence.

The value of the evidence is not established in advance. The criminal investigation body and the court appreciate each piece of evidence according to their own convictions, formed after examining all the evidence administrated, and using their own conscience as guide.

The means of evidence are outlined in article 64, these are: the testimonies of the accused person or the defendant, the testimonies of the victim, of the civil party or of the party who bears the civil responsibility, the testimonies of the witnesses, the writings, the audio or video recordings, the photos, the probative material means, the technical-scientific findings, the forensic findings and the expertise.

* Associate Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, (e–mail: bogdan.micu@mnpartners.ro).

[1] Dongoroz I, „Explicații teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român", ed II, C.H. Beck, 2003, București,p. 168.

Beginning with this article the illegality of evidence is brought into discussion and it is clearly stipulated that pieces of evidence that were illegally obtained may not be used in the course of the criminal trial.

Before regulating each mean of evidence individually, the Criminal Procedure Code regulates the problems of administrating the evidence, the right to prove the inconsistency of evidence, the conclusiveness and usefulness of evidence and the interdiction of means of constraint. The task of administrating the evidence during the criminal trial belongs to the criminal investigation body and to the court.

Upon request from the criminal investigation body or the court, any person who knows of a piece of evidence or holds a means of evidence must reveal or present it. The accused person or the defendant benefits from the presumption of evidence and is not obliged to prove his/her innocence.

In case there is evidence for his/her guilt, the accused person or the defendant has the right to prove their inconsistency.

During the criminal trial the parties may propose pieces of evidence and may request their administration. The request for administration of a piece of evidence cannot be rejected, if the respective piece of evidence is conclusive and useful.

Approval or rejection of requests shall be motivated. It is forbidden to use violence, threats or any other constraints, as well as promises or encouragement with the purpose of obtaining evidence. Also, it is forbidden to force a person to commit or to continue committing an offence with the purpose of obtaining evidence.

European Dispositions Regarding the Illegality of Evidence

With the European Convention of Human Rights a series of problems regarding the legality of evidence have arisen. Illegally obtained evidence consists of evidence obtained in violation of a person's human rights guaranteed by the European Convention of Human Rights. It will usually be in breach of their right to respect for private life under article 8 ECHR or in violation of the prohibition on torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment guaranteed by article 3 ECHR.

Article 6 European Convention of Human Rights requires a presumption of innocence on the accused. To prove its case, the prosecution must obtain evidence, and not only one piece of evidence, but as many as possible in order to be able to corroborate them.

The prosecution may resort to improper means to gather evidence in support of their position especially if obtaining evidence in conventional ways proves unfruitful. Evidence obtained in this matter cannot be accepted so that the right to a fair trial and the principle of finding out the truth.

The exercise of the courts discretion to exclude evidence has not been drastically altered as a result of the incorporation of the European Convention of Human Rights into domestic law by way of the Human Rights Act 1998.

The European Court of Human Rights confirmed that real evidence obtained in breach of the accused's right to private life guaranteed by article 8 ECHR such as through covertly obtained video or audio recordings remains admissible and does not violate the accused's right to a fair trial guaranteed by article 6 ECHR as the right to private life is not an absolute right.

The fact that their decisions are in accordance with article 3 ECHR is guaranteed by the courts which states that torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment are strictly prohibited.

The guarantee is given due to the fact that the right against torture is an absolute right. It acts as a means to ensure conformity with the accused's fundamental right against self-incrimination and is also a means of deterrence, to ensure that torturers will never be rewarded for their improprieties.

According to article 148 of the Romanian Constitution, the European legislation has to be applied, thus the right to a fair trial, the right to respect of private life and article 3 against torture need to be upheld during a Romanian criminal trial.

Analysis of the Means of Evidence

In order to determine what the conditions for the legality of evidence are, an analysis of each means of evidence is required. The Criminal Procedure Code begins with article 69 with the statements of the accused person or the defendant.

According to this article the statements given by the accused person or defendant during the criminal trial may lead to the truth only to the extent to which they are corroborated with facts and circumstances resulted from all the evidence in the case.

Article 71 regulates the modality of hearing, thus every accused person or defendant is heard separately. During the criminal investigation, if there are several accused persons or defendants, each of them is heard without the others attending.

The accused person or defendant is first left to declare everything he/she knows in relation with the case. The hearing of the accused person or defendant cannot begin by reading or reminding the statements that the latter has previously given in relation with the case. The accused person or defendant cannot present or read a previously written statement, but he/ she may use notes for details that are difficult to remember.

Another means of evidence are the statements of the victim, the civil party and the party bearing the civil responsibility. The hearing of the victim, of the civil party and of the party bearing the civil responsibility is conducted according to the provisions regarding the hearing of the accused person or defendant, enforced accordingly. (article 77)

Witnesses' statements can prove to be a crucial means of evidence. When there are contradictions between the declarations of the persons heard in the same case, the respective persons are confronted, if this is necessary for the clarification of the case. These statements, despite being a crucial part in finding the truth need to be corroborated with other evidence.

According to article 89 documents may serve as means of evidence if they contain reference of deeds or circumstances that may contribute to revealing the truth. The forms in which any statement is to be recorded, at the stage of criminal prosecution, shall be recorded and numbered beforehand, as forms with a special status, and after filling in, will be introduced in the case file.

One of the most controversial means of evidence is audio or video interceptions and recordings. Article 91 regulates conditions and cases of interception and recording of conversations or communications, the bodies performing interception and recording, certification of recordings, image recordings and checking the means of evidence.

These means of evidence may be technically examined at the request of the prosecutor, of the parties or ex officio. The recordings presented by the parties, may serve as means of evidence, if they are not forbidden by the law.

The interceptions and recordings on magnetic tape or on any other type of material of certain conversations or communications shall be performed with motivated authorization from the court, upon prosecutor's request, in the cases and under the conditions stipulated by the law, if there are substantial data or indications regarding the preparation or commitment of an offence that is investigated ex officio, and the interception and recording are mandatory for revealing the truth.

The authorization is given by the president of the court that would be competent to judge the case at first instance, in the council room. The interception and recording of conversations are mandatory for revealing the truth, when the establishment of the situation de facto or the identification of the perpetrator cannot be accomplished on the basis of other evidence.

The authorization of interception and recording of conversations or communications is done through motivated closing, which shall comprise: concrete indications and facts that justify the measure; reasons why the measure is mandatory for discovering the truth; the person, the means of communication or the place subject to supervision; the period for which the interception and recording are authorized.

The Criminal Procedure Code contains regulations of material probative evidence. The objects that contain or bear a trace of the deed committed, as well as any other objects that may serve to reveal the truth may serve as material means of evidence. The objects that were used or destined to be used for committing an offence, as well as objects that are the result of an offence are also material means of evidence. (article 94 and 95).

Technical – scientific and legal – medical acknowledgments and expertise are also considered to be means of evidence. Article 112 states that when there is the danger that some means of evidence might disappear or some states of facts might change, and the immediate clarification of deeds and circumstances related to the case is necessary, the criminal investigation body may resort to the knowledge of a specialist or technician, ordering ex officio or upon request a technical-scientific acknowledgment.

The technical-scientific acknowledgment is usually performed by specialists or technicians working for or affiliated to the institution to which the criminal investigation body belongs. It may also be performed by specialists or technicians working for other bodies.

Article 115 states that the operations and conclusions of the technical-scientific and forensic acknowledgment are written down in an official report. The criminal investigation body or the court, ex officio or at the request of any of the parties, if they consider that the technical-scientific or forensic report is not complete or that its conclusions are not accurate, has it redone or orders an expertise.

When redoing or completion of the technical-scientific or forensic acknowledgment is ordered by the court, the report is sent to the prosecutor, in order for the latter to take measures for its completion or redoing.

Articles 116 to 127 regulate expertise as a means of evidence. When, for the clarification of certain deeds and circumstances of the case, in order to find out the truth, the knowledge of an expert is necessary, the criminal investigation body or the court order, ex officio or upon request, an expertise.

When the criminal investigation body or the instance discover, ex officio or upon request, that the expertise is not complete, it orders an expertise supplement, either to the same expert or to another.

Also, when it is considered necessary, the expert is asked for supplementary written explanations or is called to give verbal explanations in relation with the expertise report. In this case, the hearing is conducted according to the provisions regarding the witnesses' hearing.

Supplementary written clarifications may also be requested from the forensic service, the criminological expertise laboratory or the specialized institute that completed the expertise. If the criminal investigation body or the court has doubts about the accuracy of the expertise report conclusions, they order a new expertise.

Field investigation and reconstruction play an important role in the criminal process. Article 129 stipulates that field investigation is done when it is necessary to establish the situation of the place where the offence was committed to find out and settle the traces of the offence, to establish the position and condition of the material means of evidence, and the circumstances of the offence.

The criminal investigation body performs the above mentioned investigation in the presence of assistant witnesses, except for the case when this is impossible. The investigation is performed in the presence of the parties, when this is necessary. The parties' failure to come after having been informed does not impede the investigation.

The accused person or defendant who is held or arrested, if he/she cannot be brought to the investigation place, is informed by the criminal investigation body that he/she has the right to be represented and is ensured, if he/she requires it, representation. The court performs the field investigation after summoning the parties, in the presence of the prosecutor, when the latter's attendance in the trial is obligatory.

The criminal investigation body or the court may forbid the persons who are present or come to the place of investigation to communicate between them or with other persons, or to leave before the investigation is over.

The criminal investigation body or the court, if they find it necessary for checking on and clarification of some data, may perform a total or partial field reconstruction of the way and conditions in which the deed was committed.

If the procuring of evidence is proving to be difficult for the judicial body it has at his disposal the rogatory commission and delegation. When a criminal investigation body or the court cannot hear a witness, perform a field investigation, take away objects or perform any other procedural act, they may address another criminal investigation body or another court, who have the possibility to perform them.

Initiating the criminal action, taking preventive measures, approving the evidence gathering procedure, as well as ordering the other procedural acts or measures are not the object of the rogatory commission. The rogatory commission may only address a body or a court that are equal in rank. (article 132)

When the rogatory commission was ordered by the court, the parties may ask questions that will be communicated to the court which is to form the rogatory commission. At the same time, any of the parties may ask to be summoned when the rogatory commission is formed. When the defendant is under arrest, the court that will form the rogatory commission appoints an ex officio defender who will represent the defendant.

The criminal investigation body or the court may order, the performance of a procedural act by delegation as well. Only a hierarchically inferior body or court may be delegated. The dispositions regarding the rogatory commission are enforced accordingly in the case of delegation.

Analysis of Modifications in Romanian Legislation

With time the legislation in the matter of evidence has changed. Also the new Criminal Procedure Code brings about numerous modifications. The Law no. 202/2010 has modified article 91^6 regarding the verification of evidence.

If in the previous legislation these means of evidence could only be subject to a technical expertise, in the present, these can be the object of any kind of expertise destined to assure their conformity with reality.

Furthermore, by eliminating the restriction referring to the possibility of a technical expertise of the means of evidence and only this, the possibility of a complex evaluation of the information obtained through audio or video recordings arouse. [2]

The Law no. 135/2010 (the New Criminal Procedure Code) also introduces a few novelties in this domain.

The first novelty appears with the definition of means of evidence. This definition has not been changed much, but the necessity of the evidence contributing to the finding of the truth is outlined, as a general principle of the criminal trial.

Apart from the means of evidence regulated in the present Criminal Procedure Code, the legislator has introduced any other means of evidence which is not contrary to the law. Photographs have also been introduced as a specific means of evidence.

Article 98 of the New Criminal Procedural Code introduces a whole new topic, respectively the object of probation, this being the existence of a crime and it having been committed by the defendant; the deeds regarding civil responsibility, when a civil party exists; the facts and the factual circumstances on which the applicability of law is based; any circumstance necessary for the just solving of the cause.

The burden of proof is also modified. Unlike the present legislation which sets that the burden of proof pertains to the judicial body and the court in article 99 of the New C.P.C. it is clearly stated that the burden of proof pertains to the prosecutor, in a criminal case, and in a civil one to the civil part or to the prosecutor who exerts the civil action in the case when the injured party is without the capacity to exercise his/her rights of his capacity is diminished.

[2] Zarafiu Andrei, "Legea nr. 202/2010. Procedură penală. Comentarii şi soluţii.", ed. C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2011, p.45.

Also, it is stated that the suspect or the accused which is innocent until proven guilty, not being obliged to prove his innocence, also has the right not to contribute to his own prosecution. During the criminal trial the injured party, the suspect and the other parties have the right to propose to the judicial bodies the administration of evidence.

During the prosecution, the criminal investigation body gathers and administers evidence both in favor and against the suspect or accused, ex officio or at request. During the judgment, the court administers evidence at the request of the prosecutor, of the injured party or the other parties and, subsidiary, ex officio, when it considers it necessary for its own conviction.

The request regarding the administration of evidence formulated during the prosecution or during the judgment of the persons entitled is accepted or rejected by the judicial bodies.

The judicial bodies can reject such a request when: the means of evidence is not relevant; when the means of evidence already administered are considered sufficient; when the means of evidence is not necessary because the fact is notorious; the evidence is impossible to obtain, the request has been formulated by a person who is not entitled or the administration of evidence is contrary to the law.

The principle of loyalty of administration of evidence is also outlined in the New Criminal Procedure Code. Therefore, it is forbidden to use violence, threatening or other means of constraint as well as promises in the scope of obtaining evidence.

Tactics or methods of hearing the witnesses or parties which may affect a person's ability to remember or to consciously and voluntarily relate the facts, the interdiction applies even when the person gives his/her consent to be heard using such a method.

Also, it is forbidden for the judicial bodies or other persons who act on their behalf to provoke a person to commit or to continue to commit a criminal act in order to obtain new evidence.

The evidence which has been obtained through torture, as well as the evidence derived from this cannot be used during the criminal trial. Also, evidence which has been obtained illegally cannot be used in the criminal trial.

In exceptional cases, these dispositions do not apply if the means of evidence presents imperfections or procedural irregularities which do not produce a maleficence which cannot be removed without the exclusion of the evidence.

The derived evidence is excluded if it has been obtained directly from the illegal obtained evidence and could not be obtained in another way.

An article on the appreciation of evidence has also been introduced. The evidence does not a predefined value and is subject to the free appreciation of the judicial bodies after having evaluated all the evidence administered in the case.

In taking a decision regarding the existence of the crime and the guilt of the defendant the court decides with motivation, making references to all the evidence administered. A conviction is given only when the court is convinced beyond reasonable doubt. The decision of the court cannot be based solely on the testimony of the undercover agent or on the statements of the protected witnesses.

When a person gives statements his/her health should be taken into consideration. Concerning this aspect, the New Criminal Procedure Code stipulates that if during a hearing of a person, he/she accuses excessive tiredness or the symptoms of a disease which affects his/her physical or psychological capacity to participate at the hearing, then the judicial body must put a stop to the hearing and takes measures so that the person is consulted by a medic.

A series of incriminations are set in order to exclude the possibility of using of evidence obtained illegally. Thus, one can find in Title IV of the special part of the new Criminal Code the abusive investigation (the promise, threats or violence against a prosecuted or trailed person in a case made by a prosecuting body, a prosecutor or a judge in order to determine that person to make a statement or not, to make a false testimony or to withdraw his testimony), the inhuman treatment of the person (forcing a person to execute a penalty, security or educative measure in any other way than the one stipulated by law, forcing a person to degrading or inhuman treatment during the arrest, detention or the execution of a safety or educative measure or imprisonment), or torture (the act of the public officer who has an office which implies the exercise of the state authority, or of any other person who acts upon the instigation of or with express or tacit consent of a person, causing serious mental or physical sufferings to someone.). The New Criminal Procedure Code introduces elements of novelty which concern each means of evidence regarded individually. For example, articles have been introduced regarding the use of undercover investigators, supervised delivery, the identification of the number holder, the owner or the user of a telecommunication system or of an access point to an informatics system, the obtaining the list of the phone calls.

A disposition which has never even been mentioned in previous codes is included in the New Criminal Procedure Code is the photographing and the taking of the fingerprints of the suspect, the defendant or of other persons.

The judicial bodies may decide, that the suspect of defendant and other persons be photographed or fingerprinted, even without their consent, if there exists a suspicion that they have committed a crime, if they were present at the scene of the crime.

The judicial investigation body can authorize that a photograph of a person be made public, when this measure is necessary in order to establish his/her identity or, in other cases in which the publication of the photograph is important for the continuance of the criminal investigation in optimal conditions.

If it is necessary to identify the fingerprints which have left at the scene of the crime on certain objects or of the persons who can be put at the scene or who have a relation to the crime, the criminal investigation body may take the fingerprints of the persons who are supposed to have been in contact with those objects, respectively photographing those who are believed to have any relation to the crime or who have been present at the scene of the crime.

Also, as an element of novelty, exhumation is introduced as a means of evidence, in the category of expertise. Exhumation can be disposed by the prosecutor or by the court in order to establish the cause of death, to help identify the body or any other elements which are needed for solving the case. The exhumation is done in the presence of the judicial investigation body.

The New Procedural Code outlines the special surveillance techniques. These are: the interception of communications and discussions; the access to an informatics system; audio, video surveillance or photographing; location and tracking through technical means; obtaining the list of telephone conversations; retaining and searching of the mail; solicitation and obtaining of data regarding financial transactions; the use of undercover investigators; supervised delivery, the identification of the number holder, the owner or the user of a telecommunication system or of an access point to an informatics system, the obtaining the list of the phone calls.

As jurisprudence, there is the Decision of the High Court, no. 199 from the 18th of February 2010. In this decision the court ascertained that from the time when the biological evidence had been taken and upon their analyses three days had passed. Thus, the legal dispositions had been breached (art. 6 (a) of the Order no. 376 of 10 April 2006 of the Minister of Health and article 14 (3) of the Order no. 376 of 10 April 2006 of the Minister of Health).

These dispositions state that biological samples taken must be submitted for processing immediately, being accepted that, in exceptional cases, it is carried out in maximum 3 days and only on condition of being kept in a refrigerator at a temperature between 0 and 4 degrees Celsius.

The Court also noted that the prosecution had failed to prove the alleged emergency situations that had caused delays in the transportation and deposition of the biological samples, thus exceeding the time allowed by the legal norm which guarantees the keeping of the biological samples unaltered and which ensures the correct outcome of the final report. Furthermore, it was not proven by any evidence, that the biological samples collected from the accused were kept under conditions imposed by the said legal disposition.

Conclusions

The outcome of a criminal relies mainly on the relevance of the evidence administered. It is not sufficient to administer only one piece of evidence, no matter if it consists of a statement, writing or surveillance, but it has to be corroborated with other means. Only the admission of guilt of the defendant can be sufficient in a criminal trial.

Administration of evidence which has been obtained through a method which is contrary to the law is considered to be a breach of national as well as European law. As regards to European law article 3, 6 and 8 ECHR that guarantee the right to a fair trial, to one's private life and the right to be protected against torture.

In the present, but especially in the New Criminal Procedure Code, there are articles which contain regulations against the use of illegal obtained evidence. This kind of evidence cannot be used during a criminal trial, nor can any other evidence derived from those obtained illegally, if it cannot be proved that the respective evidence could be obtained by other method which is legal.

The prosecutor must administer evidence both in favor and against the accused, without prejudice. The defendant does not have the obligation to prove his own innocence, the burden of proof falls upon the judicial bodies.

There are two principles which should be taken into consideration when the judicial bodies want to administer evidence. The principle of legality presupposes only the administration of the means of evidence provided by law, under the conditions set by the Criminal Procedure Code, specialized legislation and the case law of the European Court of Human Rights.

The second principle is that of loyality which stipulates that use of violence, promising an illegal benefit, threatening with an unjust prejudice or using any other illegal constraining means for the purpose of gathering evidence are forbidden.

Also, any hearing methods or techniques that affect one's ability to remember or tell consciously and voluntarily the deeds that represent the object of the evidence shall not be used. Apart from respecting these two principles, general conditions of evidence cannot be drawn up due to the fact that every piece of evidence is unique both in content and in the method of how it is obtained. Therefore, the judicial bodies, in order to avoid any illegality, must, very attentively, analyze the conditions specific to each means of evidence.

To conclude, the illegal administration of evidence is and will continue to be severely sanctioned by the legislator. Excluding the evidence is a specific procedural sanction, applicable to the evidence administered by breaching the two principle presented above. A difference shall be made between this sanction and the annulment applied to most of the trial or procedural acts.

Excluding the evidence can be ordered if there is a substantial and significant infringement of a legal provision on administering the whole evidence which affects the whole outcome of the criminal trial.

References

- Neagu Ion, "Tratat de procedură penală. Parte specială.", editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2009;
- Crişu Anastasiu, "Drept procesual penal", editura Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2011;
- Gheorghe Dumitru, "Drept procesual penal", editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2011;
- Volonciu Nicolae, "Tratat de procedură penală. Parte specială", editura Paideia;
- Theodoru Gheorghe, "Tratat de drept procesual penal", editura Hamangiu, 2008;
- Zarafiu Andrei, "Procedură penală, Legea 202/2010. Comentarii şi soluţii", editura C.H. Beck, Bucureşti, 2011;
- Dongoroz Vintilă, „Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român", ed II, editura C.H. Beck, Bucureşti, 2003.

THE CRIMINAL LIABILITY OF CORPORATIONS – OVERVIEW ON RECENT CASE LAW OF THE ROMANIAN COURTS

ANDRA ROXANA ILIE*

Abstract
Although the criminal liability of corporations is now consecrated in Romanian for more than five years, there is however some reticence in engaging the liability of such person. Nonetheless, in the past years, it can be noticed an emergence of the files where the problem of the criminal liability of corporations is raised. The purpose of this paper is to present the main issues from the Romanian case law in this field. Several topics are to be mainly discussed, such as the enforcement of criminal sanctions such as the winding-up or the diffusion of the decision, the application of precautionary measures and interim measures against corporations, the possibility to call a corporation in the criminal trial both as accused and as third party called liable for other person's acts etc. During this analysis, it can be noticed that the most common crimes perpetrated by corporations are related to employment issues, copyright, corruption, illegal drug trafficking etc. Therefore, the objectives pursued by the present study are to provide an approach on the most recent court decisions where criminal charges against corporations were carried out and to see how the relevant legal provisions were applied in these cases.

Keywords: criminal liability, corporations, sanctions, precautionary measures, interim measures*

Introduction

As mentioned in a previous study[1], in Romania, the criminal liability of corporations was first announced by the doctrine, recommended through an important number of applicable international documents until it (re)gained its place in the Romanian legislation in 2006, when Law no. 278/2006 for the modification of the Criminal Code and of other laws[2] was adopted. Until that moment, only the administrative liability of corporations could have been engaged.

The criminal liability of corporations therefore celebrated its first five years of life in the Romanian legislation. Like in the situation of any new institution, it is obvious that there are numerous problems raised by the case law in the field of the criminal liability of corporations. Although there are few decisions given by the Romanian courts so far, the issues that such decisions address start to create a framework of the most important matters raised by the "new" institution. Moreover, there are many other files currently being judged by the Romanian courts where the criminal liability of corporations is engaged. This is why it is particularly important to study these decisions or the relevant indictments in this field.

In order to answer these questions, the present study shall present the main issues answered by the Romanian courts in the field of the criminal liability of corporations. In this respect, the relevant decisions shall be evaluated following the same topics as the ones studied for the analyze of the material aspects of the criminal liability of corporations, namely the conditions required by the law in order to engage the criminal liability of corporations and the criminal and criminal procedural consequences.

* Lawyer, Bucharest Bar; Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (email: ailie@stoica-asociatii.ro).

[1] See Andra-Roxana Ilie, „Considerations regarding the Criminal Liability of Corporations – the Romanian Way", (CKS e-Book 2011): 120-121.

[2] Published in the Official Journal no. 601 of July 2006. The provisions regarding the criminal liability of corporations entered into force 90 days after this date.

As mentioned already, the criminal liability of corporations is still a new institution in the Romanian legislation. Hence, there is little case law and little literature on this topic. However, this study shall not deal with all the matters that the said case law refers to. Therefore, this paper is meant to offer a perspective over the main issues raised so far by the criminal liability of corporations in Romania.

I. Relevant case law regarding the conditions required by the law for the criminal liability of corporations

According to art. 19^1 of the Romanian Criminal, the corporations[3], excepting the State, the public authorities and the public institutions which develop activities which cannot form the object of the private field are criminally liable for the crimes committed when performing the object of activity, to their benefit or on their behalf. The Code also states that the criminal liability of corporations does not exclude the criminal liability of the natural person who contributed, in any manner, to the perpetration of the same offence.

The main questions raised by this article in the recent case law refer to the domain of the criminal liability of corporations. In this respect, it must be reminded that the doctrine, either Romanian or foreign (from the states which inspired the Romanian legislator) affirms that the criminal liability of such entities is general[4]. This means that it is applicable to all legal persons and to all crimes, provided by the Criminal Code or by special laws.

Therefore, the case law in the field of the domain of the criminal liability of corporations include its analysis from both personal perspective, through the examination of the legal persons which can be subjects of the criminal liability (1), and material one, through the delimitation of the crimes which can be perpetrated by a legal person (2).

1. The legal persons which can be subjects of the criminal liability: tendencies of the Romanian courts

Regarding the legal persons subject to criminal liability, art. 19^1 of the Romanian Criminal Code clearly states that the corporations, excepting the State, the public authorities and the public institutions which develop activities which cannot form the object of the private field are criminally liable.

Based on this article, it is clear that all private legal persons can be liable under the Romanian Criminal Code, including the commercial companies. Actually, this category of legal persons is mainly concerned by art. 19^1 of the Code, taking into account that they are frequently met in the economic landscape and the most capable of perpetrating crimes through their activities, but the Criminal Code also concerns syndicates, economic interests groups, European economic interest groups, owners associations, political parties, associations, foundations etc.

It can be stated without any doubt that the Criminal Code concerns the lucrative legal persons, as well as the ones without lucrative purpose. Of course, the criminal liability of corporations was mainly created for the lucrative legal persons[5]. In this respect, taking the example of France, a country with more experience than Romania in this field, it is important to mention that, out of 97 decisions against corporations, given in the first four years after the consecration of their criminal liability, 60 were given against commercial companies (limited liability companies or stock companies)[6].

---

[3] For the purpose of this paper, we used the term "corporation" in order to define the collective entities which are liable under the Romanian Criminal Code. As explained below, only the legal persons (which acquired legal personality) can be held responsible, with the exceptions provided by the law.

[4] Francis Le Gunehec and Frédéric Desportes, General Criminal Law, (Paris: Economica, 2006), 573.

[5] See Le Gunehec and Desportes, General Criminal Law, 573.

[6] See Claude Ducouloux-Favard, "Four Years of Criminal Sanctions against Corporations", Recueil Dalloz (1998): 395.

In Romania as well, from the analysis of the first decisions against legal persons, it can be noticed that only commercial companies were sentenced. Although the law recognizes the possibility to engage the criminal liability of all kind of commercial companies, it must be noticed that mostly limited liability companies were subject to criminal proceedings and penalties.

In order to decide on this matter, the courts have also sentenced the directors of the companies Indeed, although according to the Romanian Criminal Code, the criminal liability of corporations is distinct from the one of its legal representatives (also meaning that the first one can be engaged without even being necessary to identify a responsible natural person), the courts tend to

The analysis of pending trials leads to the same conclusion: from all the range of legal persons, prosecutions are being carried out only against limited liability companies. There is one exception known so far, a file where three limited liability companies are being prosecuted together with an association having as object the common administration of pasture, lawns and forests (asociatie composesorala, in Romania), established based on the provisions of Law no. 1/2000 for the reconstitution of ownership right over agricultural and forestry fields[7]. The association is being prosecuted for money laundering and forgery, the file currently being judged by the Harghita Tribunal.

In accordance with the principle according to which only legal persons (persons which acquired legal personality), are criminally liable, no prosecutions were carried out against person which lack legal personality, as it would be difficult to establish who could represent such entities in a criminal trial and the enforcement of sanctions would be hard to conceive with respect to the principle of the personal character of the criminal liability[8]. There is still no case law against corporations which perpetrated offences before the finalization of their registration procedure or during the transformation phase. There is however a criminal trial where a corporation is being judged through its liquidator, as it deals the insolvency procedure. It is therefore confirmed, although the Criminal Code is silent in this matter, that the corporation is criminally liable during the insolvency procedure, taking into account the fact that it does not lack legal personality.

With respect to the public institutions, their criminal liability is excluded only if they develop an activity which cannot form the object of the private field. As mentioned in previous studies, such solution is yet criticizable. Normally, in the legislations of the States which provide the same exception, only the legal persons which committed the crime while performing an activity which cannot form the object of the public domain are excluded. Such opinion also exists in the New Criminal Code.

Until now, there is only one public institution subject to criminal prosecutions, i.e. a public hospital which is being prosecuted for manslaughter of six babies following a fire caused by a short circuit. The file is currently being judged by Bucuresti District 6 Court.

With respect to other public legal persons, it must be mentioned that, as resulting from art. 19^1 of the Romanian Criminal Code, the criminal liability of the State and of public authorities is expressly excluded.

2. The most common crimes perpetrated by corporations

The domain of the criminal liability of corporations also includes the determination of the crimes which can be committed by moral persons, meaning the material domain of the criminal liability of corporations[9]. The Criminal Code into force, unlike Law no. 301/2004[10], provides for a [7] Published in the Official Journal no. 8 of January 12, 2000.

[8] See Florin Streteanu and Radu Chiriţă, Criminal Liability of Corporations (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2007), 100.

[9] See Andra-Roxana Ilie, The engagement of criminal liability of corporations, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2011): 99-120.

[10] Please note that Law no. 278/2006 is not the first law on the criminal liability of the legal person. Some precationnary measures against corporations were provided by the Criminal Code in 1937. Also, Law no. 299/2004 on criminal liability of legal persons for crimes of forgery of currency or other values (published in the Official Journal no.

general liability, meaning that corporations can be held liable for all crimes provided by the Criminal Code or by special laws.

As mentioned in a previous study[11], the justification of the special liability, provided by Law no. 301/2004 and other foreign laws is related on the crimes which could be attributed to corporations. It was mentioned that such entity cannot commit crimes such as rape, incest, bigamy, desertion etc. However, it must be noticed that all these crime can be perpetrated by corporations, as instigator or accomplice. It is therefore almost impossible to identify a crime which can totally exclude the implication of a legal person from its perpetration[12]. A corporation can be thus sentenced for being accomplice to rape when it allows natural persons to enter its headquarters on this purpose or for helping natural persons committing bigamy, by furnishing forged papers[13].

The criminal decisions against corporations given so far engaged their liability for crimes related to copyright[14], accidental injuries and breaches of the labor law[15], fraud, tax dodging[16]. Also, there are currently criminal prosecutions against corporations for illicit drug trafficking, tax dodging, money laundering, manslaughter, bribery, forgery, using or presenting forged documents which have as a result obtaining European funds and other crimes provided by special laws.

Therefore, it can be noticed that the most common crimes perpetrated by corporations are related to employment issues, copyright, corruption, illegal drug trafficking, money laundering, tax dodging, meaning mostly economic crimes. Such conclusion confirms the idea that the criminal liability of corporation was recognized especially for those type of crimes, as they are most likely to be perpetrated by such entities.

II. Relevant case law regarding the consequences of a criminal trial against corporations

Of course, once a criminal trial begins against a corporation, there are two sorts of consequences which could be triggered. The first category refers determines the analysis of the criminal sanctions applicable to corporations (1), whilst the second one relates to the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code. In this respect, it must be underlined that, when the criminal liability of corporations was set forth in the Romanian Criminal Code, the legislator also modified the Criminal Procedure Code, by introducing a special chapter in this respect (2).

1. The most common criminal sanctions applied to corporations

Under the Romanian Criminal Code, there are only two categories of sanctions which can be applied to corporations: a main penalty and complementary penalties.

The single main sentence which may be inflicted on the commercial companies is the fine. The criminal fine which may be inflicted on the commercial companies is between the common limits RON 2,500 and RON 2,000,000 (approximately euros 575 – euros 460.000). The Criminal Code provides that the fine it must be calculated taking into account the penalty provided by the law for the natural person. Thus, in the cases in which, for an offence perpetrated by a natural person, the 593 of July 1, 2004) came into force in 2004, but could not be applied in the absence of appropriate procedural provisions. Also Law no. 301/2004 on the Criminal Code (published in the Official Journal no.575/2004) provided for the criminal liability of corporations, but it never came into force and was repealed by Law no. 286/2009.

[11] See Ilie, „Considerations regarding the Criminal Liability of Corporations – the Romanian Way": 123.

[12] See Andra-Roxana Ilie, "Between the Principle of Specialty and the General Criminal Liability of Legal Persons. View on the New Criminal Code", 4 Curierul Judiciar (2009): 234.

[13] See Streteanu and Chirită, Criminal Liability, 397.

[14] See Sibiu Tribunal, criminal decision no. 105/2009, in Anca Jurma, The Legal Person – Subject of the Criminal Liability (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2010), 246-248; Sibiu Tribunal, criminal decision no. 126/2009, unpublished.

[15] See Iasi District court, criminal decision of March 31st, 2010, commentary by Andra-Roxana Ilie, 5 Legal Currier (2010): 280-282.

[16] See Ploiesti Court of Appeals, criminal decision of February 2011, unpublished, in Ilie, The engagement of criminal liability of corporations: 119.

law provides a maximum penalty of 10 years' imprisonment or a fine, the special minimum of the fine inflicted on a legal person is of RON 5,000 and the special maximum of the fine is of RON 600,000. In the cases in which, for an offence perpetrated by a natural person, the law provides the life imprisonment or the penalty of more than 10 years' imprisonment, the special minimum of the fine for a legal person is of RON 10,000 and the special maximum of the fine is of RON 900,000.

Up to now, the fines applied to corporations were of RON 20,000 (for crimes regarding copyright), RON 12,000 (for accidental injuries), RON 10.000 (for breaches of the labor law), RON 15,000 (for fraud) and RON 6,000 (for tax dodging). It can be therefore noticed that the judges tend to apply the fines towards the minimum provided by the law. This could represent a solid argument in favor of the idea that the criminal liability of corporation is not meant to be a reason for ruining the activity of corporations, but mostly a way to prevent serious breaches of the law taking into account the preventive role of punishments.

In this respect, it must be reminded that fine can be applied in criminal matters, as well as in civil, administrative, disciplinary, fiscal or procedural disputes. It is interesting to notice that, many times, the regulations which provide fines different than the criminal ones are even more serious than the Criminal Code with respect to the amount of the pecuniary sanction which can be applied to corporations.

For instance, in the field of capital market, the fines go up to 5% of the share capital of corporations, which can obviously exceed the amounts provided by the Criminal Code. Also, the Romanian Competition Law provides for fines up to 10% of the turnover of the corporations.

We do not plead for an exaggerated high level of the criminal fines applicable to corporations. We do not plead either for the ruining of corporations through the application of fines, irrespective of their nature. However, it is questionable whether a legal system can provide that an administrative offence be punished with a fine much higher than the one provided for a criminal offence. For example, according to a recent Report of the Romanian Competition Council[17], a corporation was fined with an amount exceeding more than 74 times the higher general limit provided by the Criminal Code.

There are to possible solutions to this problem. On one side, it would be possible for the legislator to rethink the Competition Law (and other laws) in the sense of reconsidering some offences as crimes (and not administrative offences). Of course, there are various arguments against such solutions, including the possibility that such actions do not have in fact the level of social danger necessary for crimes. Another solution would be the consideration of the turnover of corporations as an element for the individualization of the fine. Such solution exists in several States (for instance, in Poland) and is recommended by the Romanian legal literature[18]. The New Criminal Code provides for this approach, although the fine which can be imposed to corporation is capped to RON 3,000,000.

As per the complementary penalties, they can be applied together with the fine, whenever the judge consider necessary. They are however mandatory whenever the law provides as such (for example, in case of forgery). The service of the complementary penalties shall commence to run from the date on which the conviction sentence remains final.

The complementary penalties are as follows: the legal person's winding-up; the suspension of the legal person's activity for a period of 3 months to one year or the suspension of one of the activities performed by the legal person, in respect of which the offence was perpetrated, for a period of 3 months to 3 years; the closing down of certain working points of the legal person for a period of [17] See the Report of February 15, 2011, available at www.competition.ro, visited on February 3, 2012.

[18] See Anca Jurma, "Some Proposals de lege ferenda regarding the Criminal Liability of the Legal Person", 5 Legal Currier (2010): 284.

3 months to 3 years; the prohibition to take part in any tender procedure for a period of 1 to 3 years; the posting or dissemination of the conviction decision[19].

The initial decisions given by the Romanian courts against corporations did not provide for any complementary sanction. The further decisions however provided for the posting or dissemination of the conviction decision as well as for the winding-up of a corporation (for fraud and tax dodging)[20]. It is interesting to notice that, when the decision was given (by the first court, by the Court of Appeals and by the High Court), the insolvency procedure was already opened against the corporation and, until the cause was re-judged by the Court of Appeals and the decision remained definitive, the corporation had been already radiated following a civil decision.

There is also a safety measure provided by the Romanian Criminal Code which can be applied to corporations: the seizure of the assets.

In order to apply this measure, the seized goods shall meet one of the following conditions: (a) such goods are obtained by means of the perpetration of a deed provided by the criminal law; (b) such goods have been used, in any manner, for the perpetration of an offence, in case they belong to the perpetrator, or, in case they belong to another person, such person was aware of the purpose for which they have been used. This measure may not be ordered in respect of the offences perpetrated by means of the press; (c) such goods have been produced and adjusted with a view to perpetrating an offence, if they have been used for the said perpetration and if they belong to the perpetrator. In case such goods belong to another person, the seizure is ordered provided that their production and adjustment has been performed by the owner himself/herself or by the perpetrator and with the full awareness of the owner; (d) such goods have been offered with a view to cause the perpetration of an offence or to reward the perpetrator; (e) such goods have been acquired by perpetrating a deed provided by the criminal law, if they are not returned to the aggrieved person and if they do not serve as a remedy for such person; (f) it is prohibited by the law to own such goods. Up to now, there is no decision in this respect given by the Romanian courts.

2. The application of the procedural provisions relevant to criminal trials against corporations by the Romanian Courts

Art. 479^1 of the Criminal Procedure Code states that its provisions are also applicable to offences perpetrated by legal persons, being amended by the special provisions contained in the Chapter referred to the enforcement of the criminal liability of corporations.

As mentioned in a previous study[21], a first problem related to a criminal trial against a corporation is related to the person who can represent the legal person, especially that mostly the representative of the corporation is also the person who perpetrated the offence. Thus, if solely the legal person is held liable, it shall be represented for the fulfillment of the procedural steps by its legal representatives. Second, if for the same deed or related deeds, the criminal proceedings have been initiated against the legal representative of the legal person as well, the latter shall appoint an attorney-in-fact to represent it. In the event that the legal person fails to appoint an attorney-in-fact, such appointment shall be made by the body conducting the criminal proceedings or by the court, from among the legal practitioners in the field of insolvency procedures.

In the file where a Romanian corporation was sentenced to the winding-up, the administrator of the said corporation was also prosecuted for the same facts. For this reason, the corporation was represented in the criminal trial by the sister of the administrator, which is at least questionable from the point of view of the observation of the principles which govern the representation of corporations during the criminal trial.

[19] See Andra Roxana Ilie, „Criminal Penalties Applicable to Legal Persons. Comparative Study regarding France and Romania" (Dissertation for the Master 2, Fundamental Criminal Law, Montpellier 2008); Ioan Lascu, „Penalties Applicable to the Legal Persons in case of Criminal Offences", 3 Law (2007): 123.

[20] See Ploiesti Court of Appeals, criminal decision of February 2011, unpublished.

[21] See Ilie, „Considerations regarding the Criminal Liability of Corporations – the Romanian Way": 125.

Another issue concerns the interim measures which can be applied to corporations. The Romanian Criminal Procedure Code provides that during the criminal trial, either the judge or the court may order, for grounded reasons in order to ensure the good and proper development of the criminal trial, one or more of the following measures: the suspension of the legal person's winding-up or liquidation procedure; the suspension of the legal person's merger, division or reduction of the share capital; the prohibition of any specific patrimonial operations that may entail the significant reduction of the patrimonial assets or the legal person's insolvency; the prohibition to execute certain legal instruments, established by the legal body; the prohibition to perform activities of the same nature as those underway or as those that occurred when the offence was perpetrated[22]. There are no known files up to present where such measures have been taken.

The Criminal Procedure Code also provides for the possibility to take precautionary measures against a corporation (the distraint and the garnishment). These precautionary measures may be taken with a view to ensuring the special seizure, the remedy of the damage caused by the offence, as well for securing the service of the sentence represented by a fine. The distraint was already taken against corporations in several cases by the Romanian prosecutors.

Another important issue raised in the current cases refers to the possibility to call a corporation in the criminal trial both as accused and as third party called liable for another person's acts. Until now, there is a file where the court admitted such possibility. Although we can agree that such solution is legal, it must be observed that the same person could not be punished in both qualities for the same act, because this would mean that a corporation is criminally liable both for its own actions and for another person's acts although we are facing the same offence perpetrated.

Conclusions

As a conclusion, from the analysis of all these aspects, we can determine the main problems that the Romanian courts dealt with in the field of the criminal liability of corporations in Romania.

It can be therefore noticed that up to present only limited liability companies were punished by the criminal courts and that, with one exception, only such legal persons are being prosecuted. Also, it must be noticed that the most common crimes perpetrated by corporations are related to employment issues, copyright, corruption, illegal drug trafficking etc. The companies were always convicted together with their administrators for the same crimes.

With respect to the criminal sanctions applied to corporations, it can be concluded that until now courts applied fines oriented towards the minimum provided by the Criminal Code. Complementary sanctions such as the posting or dissemination of the conviction decision and the winding-up began to be applied by the courts.

Regarding the criminal procedural aspects, the most important issues are related to the representation of corporations during the criminal trial and to the precautionary measures which can be taken towards corporations. The distraint is widely used by the prosecutors in the cases against corporations.

All the aspects raised by these decisions show that there is still a long way until this institution shall be fully understood and applied. The decisions offer however the chance to see why it is so important to the consideration of the turnover as a criterion for the individualization of the sanctions applicable to corporations, what should happen when the same corporation is called in the criminal trial both as accused and as person liable for other person's acts, why it should be considered to create new criminal penalties etc.

---

[22] See Dorina-Maria Costin, Criminal Liability of the Legal Person in the Romanian Law (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2010): 529-535.

Rererences

Books

- Costin, Dorina-Maria, Criminal Liability of the Legal Person in the Romanian Law (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2010
- Gunehec, Francis Le and Desportes, Frédéric, General Criminal Law, (Paris: Economica, 2006).
- Ilie, Andra-Roxana, The engagement of criminal liability of corporations, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2011).
- Jurma, Anca, The Legal Person – Subject of the Criminal Liability (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2010).
- Streteanu, Florin and Chiriță, Radu, Criminal Liability of Corporations (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2007).

Journal Articles

- Ducouloux-Favard, Claude, "Four Years of Criminal Sanctions against Corporations", Recueil Dalloz (1998).
- Fanu-Moca, Adrian, "Criminal Liability of Corporation", 1-2 Romanian Law Studies (2004).
- Ilie, Andra-Roxana, "Between the Principle of Specialty and the General Criminal Liability of Legal Persons. View on the New Criminal Code", 4 Curierul Judiciar (2009): 234.
- Ilie, Andra-Roxana, „Considerations regarding the Criminal Liability of Corporations – the Romanian Way", (CKS e-Book 2011)
- Jurma, Anca, "Criminal Liability of Corporation", 1 Criminal Law Review (2003): 99-118.
- Jurma, Anca, „Sanctions Applicable against Legal Persons", I Univeristy of Bucharest Annals (2010).
- Jurma, Anca, "Some Proposals de lege ferenda regarding the Criminal Liability of the Legal Person", 5 Legal Currier (2010).
- Lascu, Ioan, „Penalties Applicable to the Legal Persons in case of Criminal Offences", 3 Law (2007).

Dissertations

- Ilie, Andra-Roxana, „Criminal Penalties Applicable to Legal Persons. Comparative Study regarding France and Romania" (Dissertation for the Master 2, Fundamental Criminal Law, Montpellier 2008)

Reports

- Competition Council, Report of February 15, 2011, available at www.competition.ro, visited on February 3, 2012.

Court Decisions

- Iasi Court of Appeal, criminal decision no. 69 of January 2010, commentary by Andra-Roxana Ilie, 12 Legal Currier (2010).
- Iasi District court, criminal decision of March 31st, 2010, commentary by Andra-Roxana Ilie, 5 Legal Currier (2010).
- Sibiu Tribunal, criminal decision no. 105/2009, in Anca Jurma, The Legal Person – Subject of the Criminal Liability (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2010).
- Sibiu Tribunal, criminal decision no. 126/2009, unpublished.
- Ploiesti Court of Appeals, criminal decision of February 2011, unpublished, in Andra-Roxana Ilie, The engagement of criminal liability of corporations, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2011).

THE NEW ROMANIAN CRIMINAL CODE – CHANGES SUGGESTED IN THE GENERAL PART

MIHAI ADRIAN HOTCA*

Abstract
Through Law no. 286/2009, it was adopted a new Criminal code. The new Criminal code brings more changes both in the General part as well as in the Special part. Through this Criminal code, the Romanian lawgiver mainly pursued: to create a coherent legal framework from the criminal point of view by avoiding the useless overlapping of the norms in force existing in the current Criminal code and in the special laws; to facilitate the quick and unitary enforcement of the criminal legislation in the activity of the judicial organs; to transpose the regulations adopted at the European Union level into the national criminal legislative framework; to harmonize the Romanian criminal law with the systems of the other member states of the European Union. The study proposes to underline the main changes occurred in the General Part of the Criminal code.

Keywords: Criminal code; Romanian criminal law, offence, punishment, justifying causes, immutability

I. Introduction

The change of the legislation from the criminal point of view is, as in other domains, an issue that usually appears in the cases in which there are transformations of political, economic, social and cultural nature in the evolution of the society.

In the recitals that accompanied the draft of the new Criminal code, it was showed that the current sentencing regime regulated by the current Criminal code (come into force on January 1st 1969), submitted to some frequent legislative interventions on different institutions, led to a non-unitary enforcement and lack of coherence of the criminal law with repercussions on the efficiency and finality of the justice act[1].

Another argument invoked during the recitals points out to the necessity of placing the sentencing treatment within the normal limits, considering that the practice of the last decade proved that the efficient solution for fighting criminality was not the extreme increase of the punishment limits[2].

Nevertheless, through the new Criminal code, the lawgiver intended the simplification of the incrimination texts, the avoiding of the overlapping between various incriminations, as well as the overlapping of the special norms with the ones of the general part.

Finally, starting from the idea of ensuring the unity in the regulation of the offences, it was considered that it was necessary that some offences stipulated at present in the special criminal laws

* Professor, Ph. D. Dean of the Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: mihaihotca@gmail.com).

[1] See www.just.ro.

[2] In the recitals, it is stipulated that during 2004-2006, about 80% of the punishments in the process of being enforced through prison punishment for theft and qualified theft were of at most 5 years of imprisonment which indicates that the courts of law did not consider necessary to apply the sanctions to the maximum upper limit stipulated by law (12 years in the case of a simple theft, 15 years, 18 years and 20 years in the case of the qualified theft respectively). On the other hand, the extremely wide range between the minimum limit and the maximum one of the punishment (from 1 to 12 years, from 3 to 15 years, from 4 to 18 years) led to more different solutions in practice with regard to the punishment applied for similar deeds or to greater punishments for infractions with a low injuriousness, which does not ensure the stipulated character of the justice act.

and that had a greater frequency in the judicial practice should be included in the content of the new Criminal code (information offences, road offences, etc.).

According to the recitals, the draft of the new Criminal code pursued the carrying out of the following targets:

- building a coherent legislative framework from the criminal point of view by avoiding the useless overlapping of the norms in force existing in the current Criminal code and in the special laws;
- simplifying the lawful regulations meant to facilitate their quick and unitary enforcement in the activity of the judicial organs;
- ensuring the complying with the exigencies resulting fundamental principals of the criminal law stipulated by the Constitution and by the pacts and treaties regarding the fundamental human rights to which Romania takes part;
- transposing the regulations adopted at the European Union level into the national criminal legislative framework;
- harmonizing the Romanian criminal law with the systems of the other member states of the European Union as a premise of the judicial cooperation from the criminal point of view based on mutual acknowledgment and trust.

Through Law no. 286/2009, the lawgiver adopted the draft of the new Criminal code that would come into force on a date set by thereof enforcement law (probably on March 1st 2013)[3].

Furthermore, we will present the main changes to the new Criminal code considering the provisions of the General part.

II. Analysis of the main changes existing in the General part of the new Criminal code[4]

1. Changes with regard to title I – Criminal law and its enforcement limits

Unlike the previous Criminal code, where it was dealt with in a single article, in the new Criminal code, the principle of the incrimination lawfulness and of the criminal law sanctions is „divided" into two articles: incrimination lawfulness (art. 1) and criminal law sanctions (art. 2). In the recitals, it is mentioned that the lawgiver pursued draw the attention on the consequences resulting from these rules – especially the forbiddance of the retroactive enforcement of the criminal law - both for the lawgiver and for the practitioner.

In art. 1 para. (2) of the new Criminal code, the content of art. 11 of the Criminal code in force appears slightly different. In art. 2 para. (2) and (3), there are the new provisions. According to art. 2 para. (2) of the new Criminal code: „A punishment can not be applied or an educative measure or a safety measure can not be taken if this is not stipulated by the criminal law on the date when the deed was committed". According to art. 2 para. (3): „No punishment can be set and applied outside the general limits thereof".

In relation to the criminal law enforcement, the lawgiver reversed the order of the two sections of chapter II, placing in the first section the norms regarding the criminal law enforcement in time and in the second one those regarding the criminal law enforcement in space.

The provisions regarding the more favorable criminal law enforcement during the criminal trial were completed with the provision of art. 5 para. (2) regarding the juridical regime of the unconstitutional normative acts (rejected or approved emergency ordinances with amendments), given that these continue to be applied to the juridical situations that are at the moment influenced by them to the extent they are obviously more favorable, although they cease their activity either entirely or partially.

[3] Law no. 286/2009 regarding the Criminal code was published in the Official Gazette no. 510 on 24.07.2009.

[4] For the analysis of the existing changes in the General part of the new criminal code, see the collective work Explicații preliminare ale noului Cod penal, Vol. I-II, coordinator George Antoniu, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011.

Regarding the criminal law enforcement in transitory situations, the lawgiver opted for maintaining the compulsoriness rule of the more favorable criminal law incidence (art. 6) and for giving up the facultative enforcement of this law in the case of the definitive punishments, considering that this can not conciliate with the lawfulness principle.

We note here that art. 7 para. (2) of the new Code defines the expression of „temporary criminal law", unlike the previous regulation that does not contain such a definition. According to this text, the temporary criminal law is the criminal law that stipulates the date of its coming out of force or the enforcement of which is limited through the temporary nature of the situation that imposed its adoption.

Regarding the territoriality principle of the criminal law, besides the changes regarding the definitions of the expressions used within art. 8 of the new Criminal code that were posted in the same article, comparative to the technique used in the previous Criminal code that stipulates these definitions within the title reserved to the understanding of some terms and expressions, the lawgiver makes very important explanations.

It is the observations according to which the offence is considered committed on the territory of Romania also when an act of enforcement, instigation or complicity was committed or it even partially produced the result of the offence on this territory or on a ship under Romanian flag or on a ship registered in Romania.

For the incidence of the personality principle of the criminal law, it was introduced the condition of the double incrimination, but limited to the situation of the low and medium severity offences (at most 10 year prison punishment).

Regarding the reality principle of the Romanian criminal law, the lawgiver extended the incidence domain, including any offences committed abroad against the Romanian state, a Romanian citizen or a Romanian legal person.

The text designated for the universality principle of the criminal law was completely reformulated, considering that the current regulation has not been enforced in practice although it seems to offer an extremely wide competence to the Romanian juridical organs. The new content of the universality principle limits its enforcement exclusively to the situations when the interference of the Romanian criminal law is imposed in considering some internationally assumed engagements.

Finally, in the new Criminal code, it is regulated a new procedure, that is, the delivery to an international tribunal[5].

2. Changes in the field of the offence institution

The new Romanian Criminal code also stipulates a general definition of the offence, but essentially different from the one in the Criminal code in 1969. According to art. 15 para. (1) of the new Criminal code: „The offence is the deed stipulated by the criminal law committed with guilt, unjustified and imputable to the person that committed it".

It is noticed that, besides the essential feature of the guilt and the deed stipulation in the criminal law, features that are found in the former definition, it has been added two more, that is: antijuridicity (unjustified character) and imputability (imputable character).

---

[5] For the analysis of the new texts that regulate the application of the criminal law in time and space, see George Antoniu, în Explicaţii preliminare ale noului Cod penal, Vol. I, page 21 and the following one. For a comparative approach of Criminal code in 1969 and Criminal code in 2009, see also Ilie Pascu, Petre Buneci, Noul Cod penal Partea generală şi Codul penal Partea generală în vigoare – Prezentare comparativă, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010.

The unjustified character of the deed stipulated by the criminal law assumes that this is not allowed by the juridical order, being possible that a deed, although stipulated by the criminal law, should not be illicit because its committing is allowed by a legal norm. The causes that exclude the unjustified character of the deed are called justifying causes in the Criminal code. These are: self-defense, state of emergency, consent of the injured person and exercise of a right and carrying out of an obligation. Within the occidental theory and legislations, there is usually a demarcation between the two cause categories that determines the inexistence of the offence, that is: justifying causes[6] (based on the right of committing certain deeds called also objective causes of non- responsibility or that remove the unlawfulness or the illicit character of the deed) and non- imputability causes (called also non- culpability causes or subjective causes of non- responsibility – based on the lack of guilt).

The imputable character of the deed stipulated by the criminal law is achieved in all the situations when there is not a non- imputability cause. These are: physical constraint, moral constraint, irresponsibility, minor age of the doer, intoxication, error, non- imputable excess and fortuitous case.

The feature of the social danger lacks from the general definition of the offence because it was a useless one and at the same time specific to the Soviet inspiration legislations without connection to the traditions of our criminal law.

With regard to the deed stipulation in the criminal law, this assumes the requirement that the committed deed that is to be qualified as offence should correspond precisely to the description that the lawgiver makes in the incrimination norm.

Regarding the guilt feature, the lawgiver introduced in art. 16 para. (1) a provision without a correspondent in the Criminal code in force according to which the deed is an offence only if it was committed with the form of guilt required by the criminal law.

Another novelty is the provision of art. 16 para. (5) that defines the oblique intent (praeter intentionem) as a form of guilt. According to this norm, it is a case of oblique intent when the deed consisting of a deliberate action or inaction, causes a severe result that is owed to the doer's fault.

Finally, we state that the lawgiver unified the sentencing regime stipulated for the action and inaction committed with the same form of guilt. So, according to art. 16 para. (6), the deed consisting of an action or inaction is an offence when it is intentionally committed. The intentionally committed deed is an offence only if it is precisely stipulated by a law.

In art. 17 of the new Criminal code, the offence by omission is regulated as new in our criminal legislation.

According to art. 17 of the new Criminal code, the commissive offence that assumes the producing of a result is considered committed also by omission when:

a) there is a legal or contracting obligation of taking action;

b) the author of the omission, through a previous action or inaction, created a state of jeopardy for the protected social value that eased the producing of the result.

The definition of the attempt was revised in the new Criminal code. In para. (1) of art. 32, the new Criminal code defines the attempt as the „enforcement of the intent of committing the offence", unlike the Criminal code in 1969 [art. 20 para. (1)], that defines the attempt as the „ enforcement of the decision of committing the offence".

Another change regards the cancellation of the provisions of art. 20 para. (2) of the former Criminal code, considering them as useless as long as the grounds of not producing the result in the case of the attempt have no relevance, being of any nature, but independent from the will of the doer in order to engage the criminal liability of this one.

---

[6] For more data regarding the justifying causes, see: George Antoniu, Noul Cod penal, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005, page 145 and the following one; Mariana Narcisa Teodosiu, Cauzele justificative, in R.D.P. no. 8/1998, page 109.

Chapter V is properly entitled the „unity and plurality of offences", because, along with the norms that regulate the plurality of offences, there are also norms designated to set the juridical regime of two of the forms of the legal offence unity (complex offence and continuing offence).

The legal definition of the continuing offence was modified, being introduced a new condition, that is, the unity of passive subject.

Another change regards the definition of the complex offence where the expression „as aggravated element or circumstance" is replaced by the expression „as constitutive element or as aggravated circumstantial element", change required especially by the criminal doctrine.

The new Criminal code brought two necessary completions that it included in art. 37 para. (2) and (3). According to art. 37 para. (2), The complex offence is sanctioned with the punishment stipulated by law for that offence and according to art. 37 para. (3), the complex offence committed with oblique intent is sanctioned with the punishment stipulated by law for the consumed complex offence, if only the severer result of the secondary action was produced.

Regarding the main punishment enforced in case of concurrence of offences, the lawgiver opted for the absorption system, if life imprisonment was enforced for one of the concurrent offences, to the juridical plurality with an obligatory and fixed addition (of one third of the easy punishments) respectively, if only imprisonment punishments and fines were enforced for the concurrent offences.

As for the punishment of the concurrence, it was introduced a special provision that allows the court to be able to enforce life imprisonment in the case of having been committed more extremely severe deeds even if this one was not set for none of the concurrent offences.

Regarding the recurrence institution, we identify new elements both with regard to the definition and terms of the recurrence and with regard to the punishment. The temporary character of the recurrence is underlined when defining it. The terms of the recurrence were changed in the sense of increasing their limits.

Regarding the sentencing treatment of the recurrence, this one differs, being regulated the arithmetic addition in the case of post-sentencing recurrence and the increase of the special punishment limits with half in the case of the post- enforcement.

When the second term of the recurrence is made out of a concurrence of offences, it was set an algorithm of punishment enforcement difference from the existing one, enforcing first the provisions regarding the concurrence and then the ones incident in the case of the recurrence, system that is enforced even if only one of the concurrent offences are in a recurrence state, the rest being in intermediary plurality because the capacity of recidivist has to draw the treatment specific to this plurality form. As an exception as in the case of the concurrence of offences, it is stipulated the possibility of enforcing life imprisonment even if the set punishments consist in imprisonment when the number and severity of the committed deeds would justify it.

In Chapter VI, starting from the quality distinction that exists between the doer (co- doer) and the other participants (the doer directly commits the deed stipulated by the criminal law and the instigators and the accomplices intermediately commit the deed through the doer or co- doers), the new Criminal code stipulates distinctly the doer and the co- doers.

3. Changes with regard to the punishments

Regarding the new regulation of the punishment categories, this starts with the main punishments, continues to the accessory punishments and ends with the complementary punishments.

In the category of the complementary punishments, it was introduced a new punishment consisting in publishing the final decision.

In the new Criminal code, the licence supervision is no longer regulated in the chapter regarding the main punishments, but in the chapter regarding the punishment individualization, because, in practical terms, the licence supervision is an individualization form of the punishment.

The fine punishment has a new regulation, but also a significantly wider enforcement domain compared to the criminal code in force by increasing the number of the offences and their variants for which the fine can be enforced as sole punishment or as alternative punishment to the imprisonment punishment.

The calculation of the fine is made through the fine day system which, through the determination mechanism of the amount, is estimated that it ensures a better individualization of the punishment both in terms of proportionality expressed in number of fine days and in terms of efficiency by determining the value of a fine day by considering the patrimony obligations of the convict.

Another new element regards the introduction of the possibility of enforcing the cumulative fine with imprisonment punishment when the doer pursued to obtain patrimony assets through the committed offense. We believe that through this regulation, the lawgiver made a remarkable progress because the purpose of many offenders is to obtain material advantages.

Starting from the shortcomings of the previous regulation, which stipulates that the bad faith elusion of the convict from paying the fine leads to the replacement of the fine punishment to imprisonment only if the offense for which the sentence was delivered stipulates the fine punishment as an alternative to the imprisonment, the new Criminal code allows the replacement of fine punishment with the imprisonment punishment or of the enforcement of the fine punishment by providing community service.

The accessory penalty is regulated significantly different from the previous legislation in terms of both enforcement and content, as this accompanies the life imprisonment punishment or the imprisonment punishment.

With regard to the complementary punishments, the changes consist in reducing the maximum limit from 10 years to 5 years and in increasing the number of rights that are contained in this punishment. It was introduced in the content of the complementary punishment also a part of the sanctions that is at present in the safety measures, that is, the prohibition of being in certain localities, the expulsion of the foreigners and the prohibition of returning to the family home for a determined period of time, because these have a strong punitive character by their nature and mainly pursue to restrict the freedom of movement and only indirectly, because of this effect, it is achieved the elimination of the danger state and the prevention of committing new offences.

Another change regards the prohibition of exercising some rights, which is possible both besides the imprisonment punishment, regardless of its duration, and besides the fine punishment.

Other changes refer to the starting moment of the complementary punishment enforcement of prohibiting the exercise of some rights; two exceptions from the enforcement rule of this punishment are set after the imprisonment punishment was carried out or considered carried out. It regards the conviction to fine punishment or, if it was ordered the measure of the conditional suspension of the sentence under supervision, the circumstances when the complementary punishment enforcement of prohibiting the exercise of some rights starts from its final decision.

Finally, it was introduced a new punishment, the publication of the final sentence in order to increase the efficiency of the justice act and to provide the moral repair to the victim.

The new Criminal code gives up to mention as individualization criteria the provisions of the general part and special part of the code, the causes that mitigate and aggravate criminal liability respectively, because these lead to the setting of the limits between which the judicial individualization will take place and know the specific regulations.

According to art. 74 para. (1), the setting of the punishment duration or quantum is made based on the severity of the committed punishment and the offender's injuriousness which is evaluated according to the following criteria:

a) circumstances and modality of committing the offence, as well as the used means;

b) state of danger created for the protected value;

c) nature and severity of the produced result or of other consequences of the offence;

d) ground of committing the offence and its purpose;
e) nature and frequency of the offences that are criminal records of the offender;
f) conduct after having committed the offence and during the criminal trial;
g) level of education, age, health, family and social status .

As for the mitigating circumstances, there are changes that regard the content of the mitigating circumstances and the effects of the mitigating circumstances. Under the aspect of the content, it was removed the circumstance regarding the good conduct behavior before having committed the offence and with regard to the effects, it was rethought their regulation under the aspect of the extent and determination modality of these effects.

The existence of the mitigating circumstances leads to the reduction by a 1/3 of the maximum and minimum special limit of the punishment stipulated by law. The reduction both of the minimum special limit and of the maximum one of the punishment gives the judge a greater consideration freedom in establishing the concrete punishment through the fact that it is no longer forced to lawfully enforce a punishment under the special minimum of the punishment, but it maintains this possibility to the extent the individualization operation leads to such a conclusion. At the same time, by reducing the special limits of the punishments with a fraction (1/3), it is achieved a proportional determination of the mitigating effect considering the abstract degree of danger set by the lawgiver for a certain offence.

Regarding the content of the mitigating circumstances, the lawgiver proceeded to a reevaluation of the circumstances that determined the worsening of the sentencing regime.

The aggravating circumstance regarding the committing of the offence due to low reasons was removed, because the committing of the offences is determined in most cases by immoral reasons and the content of this circumstance was never precisely delimited by the doctrine and jurisprudence.

In exchange, it was introduced a new aggravating circumstance consisting in committing the offence by taking advantage of the obvious vulnerability state of the injured person due to age, health, infirmity or other causes.

If there are aggravating circumstances, it can be enforced a punishment up to the special maximum. If the special maximum is not enough, in the case of the imprisonment, it can be added an addition of up to 2 years that can not exceed a third of this maximum and in the case of the fine, it can be added an addition of at most a third of the special maximum.

The new Criminal code regulates two institutions that have no correspondent in the previous Criminal code, that is, the giving up to the punishment and the postponing of the punishment enforcement.

The giving up to the punishment enforcement is the right of the court of not enforcing a punishment to a person that has committed an offence, considering the fact that it is enough for that person in order to improve to be enforced a warning because a punishment enforcement would risk to produce rather negative consequences than to contribute to the reeducation of the person in question.

The postponing of the punishment enforcement is the second new institution through which the punishment individualization can be achieved and consists in setting a punishment for a person that committed an offence, but which is not temporary executed if the set punishment is a fine or imprisonment of at most 2 years and the court considers that, based on the personal situation of the offender, the immediate enforcing of a punishment is not necessary, but it is imposed the surveillance of its conduct for a fixed period of 2 years, considering the persona of the offender and the conduct before and after having committed the offence.

The punishment enforcement suspension under supervision is the only individualization measure of the punishment execution of the three ones existing in the previous Criminal code (conditional remission of sentence, conditional remission of sentence under supervision and the punishment execution at the place of work), that was kept by the lawgiver.

The punishment enforcement suspension under supervision was reformed under more aspects that we will present further.

Thus, the carrying out of an unpaid job as community service is a characteristic that regards the punishment execution suspension under supervision because the obligation of carrying out such activity is set in charge of the convict, but only with its consent.

Another new element is that, in the new regulation, the punishment enforcement suspension under supervision does not cause the intervention of the lawful rehabilitation when the supervision term expires, but the rehabilitation will operate according to the common law and the term will derive from the reaching of the supervision term.

Starting from the idea of protecting the offence victims, the producing of the suspension effects is conditioned by the full carrying out of the civil obligations set through sentence, except for the case when the person proves that it had no possibility of carrying them out.

The regulation of the licence supervision institution is far different compared to the previous one; its changes regard the granting conditions and the social reintegration process of the convict through the active and qualified involvement of the state through probation councilors.

Under the aspect of the granting conditions, the lawgiver uniformed all the types of licence supervision (women, men, convictions for intentional and third degree offences, minors etc.). Thus, when granting the licence supervision, it is exclusively considered the conduct of the convict during the punishment execution (except for the persons over 60 years), considering that only in this way the conduct of the convict can be more efficiently influenced and shaped that gets an extra motivation knowing that a good behavior gets it closer to the release from prison.

4. Changes with regard to the safety measures

According to the new conception, the safety measures can be ordered including in the presence of a non- imputability cause, but not of a justifying cause. The lawgiver, as we saw, passed a part of the safety measures to the complementary punishments. These are: prohibition of being in certain localities; prohibition of returning to the family home and the expulsion of the foreigners.

The reasoning of such a change regards the fact that such criminal law sanctions become incident in case of committing such deeds stipulated by the criminal law and due to their specific nature, it is necessary the completion of the direct repression expressed through the main punishment with differed secondary repression expressed in these complementary punishments[7].

Another new element is the reformulation of the content of the obligation to medical treatment and hospitalization.

5. Changes with regard to the criminal regime enforced to minors

According to the provisions of the new Criminal code, the only sanctions that can be taken against offending minors are the educative measures that can be divided into two categories: deprived and non- deprived of freedom.

The rule is that that the enforcement of the non- deprived of freedom educative measures [art. 116 para. (1)] has a priority because the deprived of freedom educative measures can be taken only in the case of severe offences or of those committed under the form of plurality of offences [art. 116 para.(2)].

The educative measure of the civil formation stage consists in the minor's obligation of taking part to an at most 4- month program in order to help him understand the legal and social consequences to which it exposes in the case of committing offences and in order to make it responsible with regard to its future behavior. The organizing, ensuring of the participation and supervision of the minor during the civic formation course are made under the coordination of the probation service without affecting the school or professional program of the minor.

[7] See recitals (www.just.ro).

The educative measure of the supervision consists in controlling and guiding the minor within its daily program for a period of time of two to 6 months, under the coordination of the probation service in order to ensure the participation to school classes or job formation classes and the prevention from carrying on some activities or coming into contact with certain persons that could affect the improvement program of this one.

The educative measure of the detention in weekends consists in the minor's obligation of not leaving the home during Saturdays and Sundays for a period of time of 4 to 12 weeks, except for the case that during this period, it has the obligation of taking part to some programs or of carrying on certain activities imposed by the court. The supervision is carried out under the coordination of the probation service.

The educative measure of the daily assistance consists in the minor's obligation of observing a program set by the probation service that contains the timetable and conditions of carrying on the activities, as well as the interdictions set to the minor. The educative measure of the daily assistance is taken for a period of time of 3 to 6 months and the supervision is carried out under the coordination of the probation service.

During the carrying out of the non- deprived of freedom educative measures, the court can impose the minor one or more obligations.

The educative measure of hospitalization in an educative center consists in the hospitalization of the minor in an institution specialized in minor recovery where it will attend a school preparation and job formation program suited for its skills, as well as social reintegration programs.

The educative measure of hospitalization in a detention center consists in the hospitalization of the minor in an institution specialized in minor recovery with a guard and surveillance regime where it will pursue intensive social reintegration programs, as well as school preparation and job formation programs suited for its skills.

6. Criminal liability of the legal person

Regarding the criminal liability of the legal person, it was maintained the principles contained in Law no. 278/2006, such as the direct liability of the legal person (assigned by the Belgian and Dutch law) and the necessity of the existence of a legal personality as premise for engaging the criminal liability of the collective entities.

According to art. 135 of the new Criminal code, the criminal liability of the legal person can be engaged by any natural person that acts under the conditions stipulated by the law and not just by the actions of the organs or thereof representatives.

The engaging of the criminal liability of a legal person is conditioned by the identification of a subjective element that can be different from the one found in the case of the natural person material author at least hypothetically.

Compared to the previous regulation, we note that the lawgiver operated the restraining of the criminal immunity of the public institution that carry on an activity that can not be the object of the private domain, this restraining to the offences committed in the carrying on of such activities.

The lawgiver brought changes also with regard to the individualization of the sanctions enforced to the legal person determined by the introduction of the fine day system.

The new Criminal code stipulates a new complementary punishment enforced to the legal person – placement under supervision that consists in the designation by the institution of a legal administrator or legal proxy that will supervise the carrying on of the activities that caused the committing of the offence for a period of time of one to 3 years.

7. Changes with regard to causes that eliminate the criminal liability

Title VII of the previous Criminal code was divided into three titles: Title VII "Causes that eliminate the criminal liability"; Title VIII "Causes that eliminate or alter the sentence" and Title IX "Causes that eliminate the consequences of the conviction".

When examining in comparison the provisions regarding the causes that eliminate the criminal liability, we consider that in the new Criminal code, it is mentioned with certain changes the previous provisions. Thus, in the text that regulates the amnesty [art. 152 para. (1)], the expression "eliminates the criminal liability for the committed deed" is replaced by the expression "eliminates the criminal liability for the committed offence";

It is also stipulated the date since when the prescription term of the criminal liability starts in the case of the offence and of the progressive one (since the date of committing the action or inaction and it is calculated based on the punishment corresponding to the definitive result).

8. Changes with regard to the causes that eliminate or alter the sentence

The provisions in this title are similar to the ones in the previous Criminal code, with two distinctions, the exclusion from pardon of the punishments the execution of which is suspended under supervision, except for the case when it is ordered differently through the pardon act and the breaking off of the prescription of the fine punishment execution if the obligation of paying the fine is replaced by the obligation of delivering an unpaid job for the community service.

9. Changes with regard to the causes that eliminate the consequences of the conviction

In this title, it is regulated the two rehabilitation forms: lawful rehabilitation and court rehabilitation.

With regard to the lawful rehabilitation, this one operates in the case of the fine punishment, imprisonment punishment that do not exceed 2 years or the imprisonment punishment the execution of which was suspended under supervision if the convict did not commit another offence within 3 years.

On the other hand, the court rehabilitation terms were reduced compared to the ones in the Criminal code in force. Thus, according to art. 166, the convict can be rehabilitated by the court, upon request, after reaching the following terms:

a) 4 years in the case of the conviction to an imprisonment punishment greater than 2 years, but that it does not exceed 5 years;

b) 5 years in the case of the conviction to an imprisonment punishment greater than 5 years, but that it does not exceed 10 years;

c) 7 years in the case of the conviction to an imprisonment punishment greater than 10 years or in the case of the life imprisonment punishment commuted or replaced by imprisonment punishment;

d) 10 years in the case of the conviction to life imprisonment punishment considered executed as a result of the pardon, reaching the prescription term of the punishment execution or licence suspension.

The convict deceased before reaching the rehabilitation term can be rehabilitated if the court considers that it deserves this benefit after having evaluated the behavior of the convict up to its death.

10. Changes existing within title X- Understanding of some terms or expressions in the criminal law

Compared to the previous Criminal code, the new Criminal code brings certain amendments and completions. First, we note that some definitions were transferred from this title to others. It regards the expressions: „the territory of Romania", „offence committed on the territory of Romania".

Regarding the meaning of the notion of crime law, this was agreed with constitutional regulations in force. According to art. 173, by criminal law, it is understood any provision with criminal character included in organic laws, emergency ordinances or other legal acts which were acting as laws (laws, decrees of the former State Council, law-decrees) by the time of their adoption.

The notion of public clerk was reformulated. The new Criminal Code opted for the assimilation of the natural persons that carry out a profession of public interest that requires a special ability of the public authorities and that is subjected to their control (for instance, notaries and judicial executors) to public clerks.

The notion of family member in the new concept absorbs the notion of close relatives, including also persons who established bounds similar to those between spouses or between parents and children on condition of living together.

The content of title X was completed with more definitions that are not found in the old Criminal code and that are used in regulating some offences taken from the special legislation (information system, exploitation of a person and electronic payment instrument).

III. Conclusions

Based on the above analysis, we can notice that the new Criminal code brings numerous changes within the institutions of the General part. Some of the changes operated by the lawgiver are meant to improve certain legal deficiencies that were encountered in practice. For instance, with regard to the causes of inexistence of the infraction (consent of the injured person, exercise of a right or carrying out of an obligation) or with regard to the forms of the legal unity of the offence.

Other changes were brought in order to stop certain controversies existing in the specialty doctrine of in the juridical practice. For example, with regard to the content of some circumstances (low reasons, conduct of the offender, etc.) or of the institution of the deed that does not have the social danger degree of an offence.

On the other hand, we notice that certain changes of the General part of the new Criminal Code reflect a change of the criminal policy of the Romanian state. We note here the sentencing regime of the offense plurality, the general definition of the offense, the criminal law application over the time, sanctions regime or the regime applicable to juvenile offenders, the enforcement of the criminal law in time, the punishment regime or the regime enforced to the minor offenders.

Only time will tell if the General part of the new Criminal code is or is not a step forward from a legislative point of view.

References

- George Antoniu, Noul Criminal code, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005;
- Mariana Narcisa Teodosiu, Cauzele justificative, in R.D.P. no. 8/1998;
- George Antoniu (coordinator) Explicații preliminare ale noului Criminal code, Vol. I and Vol. II.
- Ilie Pascu, Petre Buneci, Noul Criminal code Partea generală şi Criminal code Partea generală în vigoare – Prezentare comparativă, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010;
- Mihai Adrian Hotca, Noul Criminal code şi Criminal code anterior. Aspecte diferențiale şi situații tranzitorii, Bucharest, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2009;

CRIMINAL LAW PROTECTION OF DATABASE AT A GLANCE

LUCIAN T. POENARU*

Abstract
Database protection is provided in Romania by the general law on copyright no. 8/1996. According to the law, it is considered to be a crime making available to the public, by any means, the special rights attributed to database owners or copies thereof. This paper will focus on, one hand, presenting the way database and database related products can be subject to a copyright general protection and, on the other, revealing the special sui generis right attributed to database owners. In such a context, criminal instruments for protecting such rights seem to be quite annoying for the perpetrator, but less effective when it comes to a proper enforcement by the criminal bodies. This paper will therefore try to compare the way guilty actions of the culprit are effectively sanctioned by the criminal instruments provided by the law.And because the Romanian law on copyright does follow at least the letter of the European Directives on copyright and the protection of database, this paper will also search the spirit of the relevant European case-law and its applicability by the Romanian authorities.

Keywords: Law 8/1996, copyright, database, sui generis right, criminal sanction

Introduction

The database protection appears to have long been a topic of general debate. Originating from the US copyright vision and sliding towards the European protection, the debate usually focused on trying to find a suitable answer to the way a database is effectively protected.

While the US had a real problem in framing database protection (out)side copyright, on March 11, 1996, the European Union structured database protection and launched a new form of intellectual property protection by passing the database directive no. 96/9/EC[1] (the Database Directive).

According to the aftermath of a well-known US Feist case-law[2], the reliance on copyright law as a comprehensive form of database protection has clearly diminished. Before such case-law, the US courts wanted to include database in general copyright protection, showing that, irrespective of their originality, all hard work authorship must be protected by the bias of copyright (the "sweat of the brow" doctrine[3]).

What led to the diminishing of the mere copyright for database was the concept of originality as the basic, yet constitutional for the US, requirement for copyright, even in case of compilations[4].

As a consequence, simple facts are not original. They lack the creativity and they do not stand to copyright protection. Feist wanted to make this very clear in the US and provided that copyright protection shall stick to originality.

On the other hand, EU Database Directive moved things forward and provided a sui generis form of database protection. Wanting to further solve the concern of protectable copyright fact (or row data), the Database Directive divided the protection into two distinctive elements: (i) database

* Lawyer, Bucharest Bar; Ph. D. Candidate, Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (email: lucian-traian.poenaru@drept.unibuc.ro).

[1] Council Directive no. 96/9/EC, O.J. L 77/20 (1996).

[2] Feist Publications, Inc. v. Rural Tel. Serv. Co., 499 U.S. 340, 363 (1991).

[3] This doctrine protects factual compilations. As a general rule of this doctrine, labor done in compilation overcomes the requirement of creativity in a work.

[4] W. Matthew Wayman, "International Database protection: a multilateral treaty solution to the United States' Database Dilemma", 37 Santa Clara L. Rev. 427 1996-1997, p. 432.

shall be protected under copyright law to the extent that the selection and arrangement of the data is original, and (ii) database shall be protected by a special sui generis right against the unfair extraction of all or a substantial portion of the database's contents.

In fact, the Database Directive has it all. It protects both the original format and unoriginal data within a database.

In this context, Romania fully benefits from the (clear) protection provided by the Database Directive. And because joining the EU in 2007 required some amendments to the internal laws, the Romanian law 8/1996 on copyright and related rights (the Romanian Copyright Law) did copy the "facts" of the Database Directive in a less "original format".

As such, Romania provides a distinctive protection to database on both copyright and special sui generis rights, making the best out of such protection, even by pure criminal protection. It goes without saying that "database" refer not only to paper based compilations but also to electronic databases; the latter being a collection of information stored so that they can be selectively searched and the desired information retrieved using a computer[5].

But is such criminal protection of database proper for the economical and/or money needs of the right holders? This paper will try to argue this question presenting both the way database is protected against copyright crimes (I), as well as against criminal infringements to the special sui generis rights (II). The criminal liability for database rights infringements becomes important especially in relation with the Romanian efforts to have general copyright protected by all means. Such efforts were visible before Romania joining the EU and were slightly tempered after 2007.

Because database criminal protection in Romania was poorly debated, this paper will try to shortly present the implications of such a criminal protection in this domain.

I) COPYRIGHT PROTECTION FOR DATABASE FORMAT. PROTECTING DERIVATIVE WORKS

This section will firstly define databases and place them in the general concept of copyright (A), showing then the way criminal copyright protection stands for database infringements (B).

A) Placing database in general copyright

As a general rule, all databases consist of two basic elements: the selection and arrangement of data and the data itself[6].

According to the Database Directive, "database" means a collection of independent works, data or other materials arranged in a systematic or methodical way and individually accessible by electronic or other means[7]. The Database Directive does not apply to computer programs used in the making or operation of databases accessible by electronic means[8].

Moreover, as per the Database Directive, "the term <database> should be understood to include literary, artistic, musical or other collections of works or collections of other material such as texts, sound, images, numbers, facts, and data. [I]t should cover collections of independent works, data or other materials which are systematically or methodically arranged and can be individually accessed. [T]his means that a recording or an audiovisual, cinematographic, literary or musical work as such does not fall within the scope of the Directive"[9].

---

[5] Terry M. Sanks, "Database protection: national and international attempts to provide legal protection for databases", 25 Fla. U. L. Rev. 991 1997-1998, p. 992.

[6] W. Matthew Wayman, see supra note 4, p. 431.

[7] Art. 1 para. 1 of the Database Directive.

[8] Id. para. 2.

[9] Id. recital point 17.

The above definition appears to be broad enough to provide protection to any sort of compilation. Because there are no limits to the medium of the database, any compilation should be protected under the Database Directive.

On the other hand, the Romanian Copyright Law defines the database (in translation) as a compilation of works, data or other independent elements, protected or not by copyright or related rights arranged in a systematic or methodical way and individually accessible by electronic or other means[10].

At a glance, one could say that the above provision related to database in the Database Directive and the Romanian Copyright Law is similar. In fact, it is identical, making it easier to understand the rationale behind the Romanian legislator's intentions.

As per the provisions of the Romanian Copyright Law, database is expressly a subject to the pure copyright protection. According to the law, all derivative works (compilations) are considered to be protected by copyright but only as it regards the way the material is selected or displayed[11].

As a consequence, all compilation of work is protected in Romania by copyright, provided that the selection and arrangement of data forming the database is original, therefore representing the author's own intellectual creation. Thus, the Romanian copyright retakes once again the general principles laid down by the Database Directive.

On the other hand, the Romanian law provides that it shall not be subject to copyright protection the simple facts and data. Consequently, data is not protected, even though it is included in a compilation or data base.

Protecting database by copyright is therefore possible provided that the database is what the Romanian law on copyright calls derivative work. Database will be a derivative work if it is original by the way the data is selected or displayed and it will be legal to create such derivative work if the author (or the right holder) agrees to such a work.

This is why article 13 of the Romanian Copyright Law provides that one of the patrimonial rights of the author is to authorize or to prohibit third parties the making of derivative works[12].

It seems to us important to note that the provisions related to derivative work in the Romanian Copyright Law are at least confusing as it regards the way such (original) work can be made. As mentioned above, derivative works can be made (and once made, will be protected by copyright) only if they do not prejudice the rights of the authors of the original (prior) work[13]. Such derivative work will always refer to another original work, because the law expressly requires this.

On the other hand, the same law provides that it is up to the author (or the right holder) to authorize or to prohibit the creation of derivative work. As such, it can result that derivative works can be made only if there is an authorization from the author (or the right holder) of the work based on which the derivative work was performed.

It results from the above that not having the consent of the author of the original work creates a legal presumption that the rights of the latter author were damaged by the simple creation of the derivative work. The law, therefore, cannot imagine a situation in which the database resulted following a compilation of copyrighted data can be made (in such a way that constitutes a new original work) without prejudicing the patrimonial rights of the author by not requesting the latter's consent.

We, do, however imagine such situations which basically refer to any data compilation of artistic work (i.e. movies) duly arranged in a systematic or methodical way and individually accessible by electronic or other means.

---

[10] Art. 122[1] para. 1 of Romanian Copyright Law.
[11] Id. art. 8 let. b).
[12] Id. art. 13 let. i).
[13] Art. 8 of the Romanian Copyright Law.

It is therefore difficult for us to understand why in such an example one would need the consent of the authors of the respective work that was compiled or how are such databases prone to prejudice the right holders if they are, for instance, used in a private environment (i.e. my movie database, creatively organized and arranged), or even made public, as a creatively new work (in all cases, without including the copyrighted content, i.e. the movies themselves).

The relevant legal literature[14] timidly tried to detail the dependence of the prior original work to the derivative work[15]. According to such literature, in case of derivative works, the originality criteria for the derivative work can absolutely be fulfilled only if the dependence of the derivative work to the original work was maximum, meaning that without the original work, the derivative work could not have been created. This is the classic example of literature (the original book) and a booklet about a book (the derivative work).

We do agree that in the above example, the consent of the author for producing the derivative work is essential, since without the original, the derivative would not have existed (as such).

On the contrary, if the original work was just a support to the derivative work meaning a simple impulse to create a (separate and original) work, the latter, even though derivative, will not require the consent of the first original work. This is why we consider that an original and highly creative database about movies in a library, for instance, would not require the consent of every right holder that can, at some point, exist in the library.

Database will also be subject to protection by copyright if the raw data was public and free and was arranged in such a way that is creative and original. There is case law[16] on the subject. The typical example refers to public data available on the internet (i.e. site names on different subjects). If one would compile such data in a format that is by far original, creative, easy to reach, etc, the resulted work will be derivative and will be subject to copyright protection.

The copyright database protection is of utmost importance in respect of the criminal liability as it will be shortly detailed.

B) General criminal database protection

Facing criminal charges for copyright infringement is something not out the blue anymore. The criminal liability for copyright infringement was mainly envisaged back in 2004 by the Directive 2004/48/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the enforcement of intellectual property rights (Directive 2004/48/EC)[17].

According to the Directive 2004/48/EC, "without prejudice to the civil and administrative measures, procedures and remedies laid down by this Directive, Member States may apply other appropriate sanctions in cases where intellectual property rights have been infringed[18] (emphasis added)".

And because the same Directive 2004/48/EC observed that infringements of intellectual property rights appear to be increasingly linked to organized crime[19], the only other appropriate sanctions legislators could think of were the criminal ones. Moreover, it was also noticed that the increasing use of the Internet enables pirated products to be distributed instantly around the globe. Approximation of the legislation of the Member States in this field is therefore an essential prerequisite for the proper functioning of the internal market.

---

[14] Viorel Roş, Dragoş Bogdan, Octavia Spineanu-Matei, "Copyright and related rights. Treaty", All Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2005 p. 173.

[15] Yolanda Eminescu, "Tratat de proprietate industriala", vol. I, Ed. Academiei, 1982, p. 87.

[16] Cass. Fr. Criminal Section, November 27, 1869 in Viorel Roş, Dragoş Bogdan, Octavia Spineanu-Matei, see supra, note 14, p. 184.

[17] O.J. L 157, 30.4.2004.

[18] Art. 16 of the Directive 2004/48/EC.

[19] Recital 9 of the Directive 2004/48/EC.

As a consequence, Member States did regulated (in)appropriate criminal sanctions for intellectual property rights infringements. For the scope of this paper, we will focus only on those criminal sanctions related to copyright and, in particular, to copyright database criminal protection as provided by the Romanian Copyright Law.

At a small glimpse on how the criminal protection of copyrighted database works in Romania, we will notice that, according to the Romanian Copyright Law, it is considered to be a criminal offence[20] and will be punished with imprisonment ranging from one month to two years or with a fine, (with relevance for this paper) any performance of a derivative work, without the authorization or consent of the relevant right holder[21]. Because a database is a derivative work according to the law, the felony will be applicable to such databases.

As detailed above, the relevant right holder has the patrimonial right to authorize or to consent to the making of a derivative work. As such, infringing that particular right of the author, meaning the making of a database based on the original work without the consent of the author, will be considered a criminal offence and will be punished in accordance with the law.

Keeping in mind our examples above, it is, for us, strange how easy the legislator went for a criminal liability with a case-by-case situation, creating only the ground general rule for the liability, without any exception. It would have been however more strange if we would have found relevant case-law in Romania on the particular issue. The reality is that such a criminal copyright liability for third parties creating a database without the consent of the author of the original work is excessive and, if not properly interpreted, can lead to serious misjudging.

What it is protected by criminal instruments is not the creativity of the selection and arrangement of the data, but the mere infringement of one patrimonial right of the author (or the right holder) of an original work. This is why the object of the felony is represented by the general social relations related to the protection of the author's patrimonial rights.

From a technical standpoint, the material object of the felony is the original work itself based on which was illegally created the derivative work. The author of the crime is any person who makes a derivative work based on the original work of the right holder. It goes without saying that, starting 2006, the subject of the crime can also be a moral person – a company. In respect of penalties that can be applied to companies, there are two such categories: the main penalty and complementary penalties. The single main sanction that can be inflicted on companies is the fine[22].

Because there is the money element in all intellectual property construction, imagine that the criminal liability for companies will fully work in our case. The typical felony is that, for example, a limited liability company (LLC) dealing with the editing of translated works does this job without the authorization or consent of the author of the original work (or the right holder).

In this case, the LLC who illegally makes the derivative work can face criminal charges and fines can be inflicted in an amount ranging from RON 2,500 to RON 2,000,000. As a general rule, the amount of the fine for companies is established taking into account the penalties applicable to natural persons.

The felony is conditional on the existence of an original work, irrespective if it was made public. Such an original work will be protected by its simple creation, even if not yet finalized[23].

From an intentional standpoint, the felony can be committed by direct or indirect intention, which means that the culprit must either foresee the result of his action wanting to produce such [20] For the purpose of this paper, it will be named "criminal offence" or "felony" all what the Romanian Law calls "infracțiune".

[21] Art. 140 let. f) of the Romanian Copyright Law.

[22] A.R. Ilie, "Considerations regarding the criminal liability of corporations – the Romanian way", Challenges of the Knowledge Society, Bucharest, April 15-16, 2011, 5th Edition, p. 127.

[23] Ciprian Raul Romițan, "Intellectual property criminal protection", C.H.Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2006, p. 153.

result by committing the guilty action or, foresees the result of his action and, although he does not wants to commits the action, he accepts the possibility that the result will be produced.

In our case, the illegal making of a derivative work will always be committed by intention, either direct or indirect, meaning that the natural person or the company will always seek to create a derivative work from the original creation of the author, without searching the authorization or consent of the right holder.

As such, the law criminally sanctions the making of a database without the consent of the right holder of the original work. This is a fact under the Romanian Copyright Law. In practice, however, the applicability of such a felony can be subject to serious concerns due to the general wording related to the illegal actions of the culprit.

As anticipated above, we do consider that making a derivative work does not always require the authorization of the original work right holder and it should be more carefully established the most suitable ways to protect creative derivative works, instead of strongly prohibit the general use of related works.

According to the Romanian Copyright Law, sui generis rights intend to protect database owners against the unfair extraction of all or a substantial portion of the database's contents. As it will be detailed below, the Romanian legislator wanted to criminally sanction the extraction and/or re-utilization of the database contents made without the owner's consent.

II) A SUI GENERIS RIGHT FOR DATABASE PROTECTION

This section will firstly present the meaning of the special sui generis right (A) and will secondly try to understand how one can face criminal charges for making available to the public the content of a database (B).

A) The relevance of special protection attributed to database owners

Articles 122^1 to 122^4 of the Romanian Copyright Law provide special sui generis right protection of database. The provisions were introduced in 2004 by law no. 285/2004 for the modifying of the Romanian Copyright Law[24]. According to the law, the creator of a database (database owner) is either a natural person or an entity which made a substantial quantity or quality based investment in order to obtain, verify and/or present the content of a database.

As a general rule, the database owner has the patrimonial right to authorize and to prohibit the extraction and/or re-utilization of the whole or of a substantial part, evaluated qualitatively or quantitatively, of the contents of that database.

Up to this point, it is obvious that the special sui generis rights do not require any level of creativity attributed to databases. Even if the provisions on the special sui generis rights are copied from the Database Directive, neither one of the instruments provide a definition for "qualitatively or quantitatively" investment, nor for "substantial investment".

The "extraction" and "re-utilization" are however defined both by the Database Directive and the Romanian Copyright Law. The "extraction" means the permanent or temporary transfer of all or a substantial part of the contents of a database to another medium by any means or in any form and "re-utilization" means any form of making available to the public all or a substantial part of the contents of a database by the distribution of copies, by renting, by on-line or other forms of transmission[25]. The law also expressly provides what is not considered to be an extraction or re-utilization, and that is the public lending (although not defining the terminology).

---

[24] Law. no. 285/2004, published in the Official Gazette no. 587 of June 30, 2004. The law retakes the provisions of the 1996 Database Directive.

[25] Art. 7 point 2 of the Database Directive. Art. 122^2 para. 2 of the Romanian Copyright Law retake the definitions with some minor wording adjustments.

Both the Database Directive and the Romanian Copyright Law duly establish the exceptions to the sui generis right.

As such, lawful users of a database which is made available to the public in whatever manner may, without the authorization of its maker, extract or re-utilize a substantial part of its contents: (a) in the case of extraction for private purposes of the contents of a non-electronic database (emphasis added); (b) in the case of extraction for the purposes of illustration for teaching or scientific research, as long as the source is indicated and to the extent justified by the non-commercial purpose to be achieved; (c) in the case of extraction or re-utilization for the purposes of public security or an administrative or judicial procedure.

The law allows therefore the extraction for private purposes but only of non-electronic database. Even though "private purposes" are not expressly defined by the Database Directive, we consider that private purposes do refer to the general possibility to make a private copy, without the consent of the right holder, provided by the Directive 2001/29/EC on copyright.

Such private copy is however possible only for non-electronic database, which means that any substantial extraction of the contents of an electronic database, even in private purposes, is fully prohibited by the law. Without going into much detail, it was interpreted by the relevant doctrine that "private use" may refer to the normal family circle, including friends[26].

Such findings are essentials considering that the majority of available databases are electronically created and refer to data made and available on the internet (or some other electronic networks).

On the other hand, European courts have formulated different factors in determining what constitute a substantial investment in the creation of a database which will qualify for a sui generis protection. It goes without saying that such factors usually refer to money.

The Database Directive expressly states it that the making of databases requires the investment of considerable human, technical and financial resources[27]. Recital 39 speaks more generally of the financial and professional investment and recital 40 in the Database Directive assures that the investment may consist in the deployment of financial resources and/or the expending of time, effort and energy of the database maker.

Summarizing the provisions in the Database Directive pertaining to the investment, it results that the investment can be material, financial or human. "Financial" means money, "human" means time, effort and energy for the maker and "material" basically represents the buying of materials and equipment necessary for creating the database.

Courts have generally been confronted and interpreted all types of investments which trigger sui generis protection of database. For instance, employing a number of persons to collect data was qualified as a human investment[28] and the acquisition of computer equipment has been seen as a material investment[29].

The substantiality of the investment is only indicated by the Database Directive. As such, "as a rule, the compilation of several recordings of musical performances on a CD does not come within the scope of this Directive, both because, as a compilation, it does not meet the conditions for copyright protection and because it does not represent a substantial enough investment to be eligible under the sui generis right" (emphasis added)[30].

---

[26] P-Y. Gautier, "Propriété litteraire et artistique", Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1996; C. Colombet, "Propriété littéraire et artistique et droits voisins", Dalloz, 1997; André Bertrand, "Droit d'auteur et les droits voisins", 2eme édition, Dalloz, Paris, 1999.

[27] Recital 7 of the Database Directive.

[28] See for example, Union Nationale des Mutualites Socialistes v./ Belpharma Communication, TPI Bruxelles, 16 March 1999; British Horseracing Board v./ William Hill, 2001.

[29] See for example, British Horseracing Board v./ William Hill, 2001.

[30] Recitat 19 of the Database Directive.

We therefore tend to react to such a provision by saying that all what it is above such a (minimum) level of investment will have to be considered substantial. As a consequence, if a compilation of musical performances on a CD is, as a rule, insubstantial investment, what happens to compilation of data on a server, for example, or a relatively large compilation of movie based data that apparently just fit a DVD? Are such systematic works substantial? In fact, the answer will have to be on a case by case basis answered in court.

In a Spot case[31], company Spot explored a cinema based internet site which was used to reveal the programming of theatres in Belgium. In September 2000, Spot concluded with Numedia Channel a contract according to which the latter company monthly purchased the programming of theatres from Spot. The contract was terminated in May 2001.

However, Numedia Channel continued to extract information from cinebel.be, making them available on its own website, allocine.be. As part of the Numedia Channel defense in court was that cinebel.be is not a substantial investment in accordance with the provisions of the Database Directive.

The ECJ established however that in order to argue the insubstantiality of the database investment, it must be taken into consideration not only the prior and preliminary investments for creating the database (even if the expenses were amortized), but also any current expenses necessary to maintain and update a database.

In such a context, think, for instance, any job site that offers a variety of workplace offers. Is such a site a real database which should benefit from a sui generis protection provided by the law?

The answer will in fact depend on the way the job finder site was created and if such a database reflects an investment. What happens in practice is that the job finder site usually means a compilation of job announcements gathered on the site by the applications (job offers) sent by employers. The investment in this case is therefore the one associated with the financials and technology for creating the site (i.e. domain name, servers, personnel, etc.).

Because the information in the site goes public, the risk for the creator/ owner of the database will always refer to the general possibility for illegal extraction and / or re-utilization of the database content. Such illegal actions are basically made by so-called aggregators (search engines) which collect the information available on different specialized sites and put it together so as third parties can easily find it.

Even if such a practice can be favorable to end-consumers, the problem raised refers to the (illegal) extraction of the information contained in the database. According to the law, criminal liability is therefore foreseeable.

B) The illegal making available to the public of database content

As a general observation, the Database Directive does not provide a clear guideline for determining if a database qualifies for the sui generis right. This is without a doubt applicable for the Romanian Copyright Law dealing with this special right.

It is essential to observe that the Romanian Copyright Law chooses to criminally sanction the infringements to the protectible databases. We find this yet shocking in such a context where European Courts have not found a definitive test for database infringement. We consider this approach a little too drastic to cope with.

According to the Romanian Copyright Law, it is considered to be a crime and it will be punished with imprisonment ranging from one to four years or with a fine, the making available to the public, including by internet or by other computer networks, without the consent of the right holder, of sui generis rights or copies thereof (emphasis added), irrespective of the medium, so that the public can access them in any place or moment individually selected[32].

---

[31] Spot (cinebel.be) v/ Canal Numedia (allocine.be), Bruxelles January 18, 2002.

[32] Art. 139^8 of the Romanian Copyright Law.

Carefully analyzing the verbum regens of the above felony, it will be noticed that the crime retake the content of the patrimonial right of the database maker to re-utilize the entirety or the substantial part of a database. As detailed above, the re-utilization of a database content means, in particular, any form of making available to the public the content of a database by distributing copies, renting or making available to the public the content of the database.

According to the ECJ case law, the extraction and re-utilization which affects the totality or a substantial part of the database require without a doubt the authorization of the maker of the database even if the database is partially or totally made available to the public or if the maker of the database authorized third parties to distribute to the public the database[33].

From a criminal law standpoint, the object of the felony is represented by the social relationships assuring the protection of database right holders[34]. Such a protection will obviously be activated if the compilation of data is a database as defined by the Database Directive and the Romanian Copyright Law.

The material object of the felony is represented by the database itself or, as expressly provided by the law, by the copies of the database.

In this way, it is important to note that according to a largely debated Google case law[35], as a general rule, Google automatically index all web pages by the "Googlebot" program and, in addition, creates a copy of every page that it indexed and stores it in a file called "cache" file.

Alongside the results of a search in Google, such results will also include the results of the cached pages. Accessing the cache page will redirect the user to the copy of the webpage made by Google and not to the original webpage. Field claimed in front of the court that Google infringed its rights by the fact that user accessed the cache pages and downloaded information thereof.

Without going in to much detail, Google won the Field case and the arguments of the court referred to the general "fair use" principle in the US Copyright Act as it regards the copying and distribution of protected works by cache indexing.

Such a "fair use" principle is not however fully applicable as per the provisions of the Romanian Copyright Law. The Romanian law does not contain a general fair use principle to justify the copying (extraction) of the contents of a database. Consequently, according to the letter of the law, it will be a felony any making available to the public of the contents of a database or the copies of such data, without the consent of the right holder.

In this way, it doesn't really matter the scope of usage of the indexed data as long as such data was illegally extracted or re-utilized without the proper consent. However, according to the ECJ case law, they tend to measure the substantiality of the extraction by looking at the data's value or at the infringing activities from a database maker's perspective[36].

Thinking again of our dedicated search engines (aggregators) it was observed in practice that such a search engine infringed an online telephone directory owner's database right, because it provided its users the extracted data without referring them to the original directory[37].

As such, for both the extraction and the re-utilization, their scope lies in the breadth of the definition of substantial part. Only knowing if the extraction and/or re-utilization were substantial can make the action illicit and (probably) request criminal charges for the culprit.

---

[33] ECJ, The British Horseracing Board Ltd and others v/ William Hill Organization Ltd, para 61.

[34] Constantin Duvac, "Analysis of the felony provided by art. 139[8] on Law 8/1996", RRDPI, 4/2007, p. 45.

[35] Nevada Districtual Court, US, Blake A. Field v/ Google Inc., January 19, 2006.

[36] Xuqiong (Joanna) Wu, "E.C. Database Directive, Foreign & International Law: Database protection", 2002 Berkeley Technology Law Journal & Berkeley Center for Law and Technology, Vol. 17:571, p. 583.

[37] See P. Bernt Hugenholtz, "The New Database Right: Early Case Law from Europe" (paper presented at Ninth Annual Conference on International IP Law & Policy, Fordham University School of Law, New York, Apr. 19-20 2001), available on http://www.ivir.nl/publications/hugenholtz/fordham2001.html (visited on January 31st, 2012).

Conclusion

It goes without saying that the Database Directive has primarily set the agenda for national and international database protection. This happened back in 1996 and managed to internally influence the protection granted by the Romanian Copyright Law since 2004.

As a consequence, the Database Directive and the Romanian Copyright Law provide a two-pronged test to determine if a database is eligible for protection[38]. Firstly, the database will qualify for the protection by copyright if it contains information arranged and/or structured in an original, yet systematic way. Secondly, the database will benefit from a special sui generis right if was created by a substantial investment.

In both cases, the Romanian criminal protection of database appears to us excessive. Even though there isn't much Romanian criminal case law on the issue, the consequences that may appear by interpreting the provisions of the law are huge and can lead to disproportionate criminal charges.

In a pure internet era, criminal liability attributed to almost any data exchange or "extraction" can cause damages not only to the public data exchange process, but also to the private use of households, those individuals that can, at some time, be original and create their own work, being further protected. The recent debate triggered by the adoption of ACTA provides an argument in this line.

This paper only tried to draw the attention on the practicalities around having database infringements criminally sanctioned. The herein presentation is thus intentionally non-exhaustive. It will take more than a study to help the criminal authorities understand that the special sui generis right infringements are naturally related to the rationale of general intellectual property rights: creativity generating money.

References

Books:

- BERTRAND, André, "Droit d'auteur et les droits voisins", 2eme édition, Dalloz, Paris, 1999.
- COLOMBET, C., "Propriété littéraire et artistique et droits voisins", Dalloz, 1997.
- EMINESCU, Yolanda, "Copyright", Lumina Lex Publishing, Bucharest, 1994.
- EMINESCU, Yolanda, "Copyright. Law no. 8 of 14 March 1996. Annotated", Lumina Lex Publishing, Bucharest, 1997.
- EMINESCU, Yolanda, "The legal regime of intellectual creation", second edition, Lumina Lex Publishing, Bucharest, 1997.
- GAUTIER, Paul-Yves, "Propriété litéraire et artistique", Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1996.
- LAZĂR, Valerică, "Criminal charges for intellectual property rights", All Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 1999.
- LAZĂR, Valerică, "Criminal charges for intellectual property rights", Lumina Lex Publishing, Bucharest, 2002.
- ROMIȚAN, Ciprian Raul, "Intellectual property criminal protection", C.H.Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2006.
- ROȘ, Viorel; SPINEANU-MATEI, Octavia; BOGDAN, Dragoș, "Copyright and related rights. Treaty", All Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2005.

Journal articles:

- ANECHITOAE, Constantin; STAN Mădălina; CASAPU Mariana, "Sui generis rights for database creators (I)", RRDPI, 2/2007.
- ANECHITOAE, Constantin, "Sui generis rights for database creators (II)", RRDPI, 3/2007.

[38] Xuqiong (Joanna) Wu, "E.C. Database Directive, Foreign & International Law: Database protection", 2002 Berkeley Technology Law Journal & Berkeley Center for Law and Technology, Vol. 17:571, p. 578.

- ANECHITOAE, Constantin, "Sui generis rights for database creators (III)", RRDPI, 4/2007.
- BULANCEA, Marius Bogdan, "The felony of making available to the public, without the right holder consent, of copyrighted products, related rights or sui generis rights for database makers", RRDPI, 4/2006.
- DUVAC, Constantin, "Analysis of the felony provided by art. 139[8] on Law 8/1996", RRDPI, 4/2007.
- FEWER, David, "A sui generic right to data? A Canadian position", Canadian Business Law Journal, 30 Can, Bus. L. J. 165 1998 (HeinOnline).
- HUGENHOLTZ, P. Bernt, "The New Database Right: Early Case Law from Europe" (paper presented at Ninth Annual Conference on International IP Law & Policy, Fordham University School of Law, New York, Apr. 19-20 2001), available on http://www.ivir.nl/publications/hugenholtz/fordham2001.html (visited on February 1, 2012) (HeinOnline).
- ILIE, A.R. "Considerations regarding the criminal liability of corporations – the Romanian way", Challenges of the Knowledge Society, Bucharest, April 15-16, 2011, 5th Edition.
- ROMIȚAN, Ciprian Raul, "The felony of public communications of works or related products protected by copyright or related rights", RRDPI, 2/2006.
- SAKSENA, Hailshree, "Doctrine of <Sweat of the brow>", 2009, available on http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1398303 (visited on February 1, 2012).
- SANKS, Terry M., "Database protection: national and international attempts to provide legal protection for databases", 25 Fla. U. L. Rev. 991 1997-1998 (HeinOnline).
- WAYMAN, W. Matthew, "International Database protection: a multilateral treaty solution to the United States' Database Dilemma", 37 Santa Clara L. Rev. 427 1996-1997 (HeinOnline).
- WU, Xuqiong (Joanna) „E.C. Database Directive, Foreign & International Law: Database protection", 2002 Berkeley Technology Law Journal & Berkeley Center for Law and Technology, Vol. 17:571 (HeinOnline).

IMPLEMENTING A NATIONAL PREVENTIVE MECHANISM FOR THE PREVENTION OF TORTURE AND OTHER FORMS OF CRUEL, INHUMAN OR DEGRADING TREATMENT OR PUNISHMENT IN PLACES OF DETENTION IN ROMANIA

RADU-FLORIN GEAMĂNU[*]

Abstract

With the ratification of the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (OPCAT) by Law no. 109/2009, Romania has taken a further step in strengthening the preventive monitoring of places of detention by an independent body as a form of preventing and combating torture and other forms of ill-treatment in different places of detention. Consequently, Romania is to establish a National Preventive Mechanism (NPM) for the prevention of torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in places of detention.

The paper will focus on the study of the OPCAT provisions regarding the NPM, aimed at establishing a system of regular visits undertaken by an independent national body to places where people are deprived of their liberty. Due attention will be granted to the existing domestic mechanisms and to the analysis of the legislation of certain European states that already implemented OPCAT.Furthermore, this article will assess the difficulties which the implementation of a NPM in Romania poses, the shortcomings of such an endeavour, with a view to the understanding of the minimum pre-requisites for an effective functioning of such a national body and taking also into consideration the Principles Relating to the Status of National Institutions for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights (Paris Principles).To close with, the study will attempt to present some recommendations meant to ensure a firm and efficient implementation of the NPM in Romania.

Keywords: Places of detention, United Nations, Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture (OPCAT), National Preventive Mechanism (NPM), Romanian legislation, torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Introduction

Acknowledging the fact that the persons deprived of their liberty are in a fragile position, it is the duty of the states and of the international community to ensure the full respect of their fundamental rights. This was the reason for the United Nations to come with the adoption of the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (OPCAT)[1], being convinced, according to the Preamble, that further measures are necessary to achieve the purposes of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT)[2], strengthening the protection of persons deprived of their liberty against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

---

[*] Legal Adviser, Ministry of Justice, Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: radurfg@yahoo.com).

[1] The Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment was adopted on 18 December 2002, entered into force on 22 June 2006 and was ratified by Romania through Law no. 109/2009, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 300 of May 7, 2009. For the full text of the OPCAT, see http://www2.ohchr.org/english/law/cat-one.htm, accessed on January 25, 2012.

[2] Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment was adopted on 10 December 1984, entered into force 26 June 1987 and was ratified by Romania through Law no. 19/1990, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 112 of October 10, 1990.

The efforts of the United Nations in ensuring protection for the persons deprived of their liberty are continous, just to mention the recent discussions within an open-ended intergovernmental expert group in order to exchange information on best practices, as well as national legislation and existing international law, and on the revision of the existing United Nations standard minimum rules for the treatment of prisoners so that they reflect recent advances in correctional science and best practices, with a view to making recommendations to the Commission on possible next steps.[3]

A presentation of the existing control mechanisms in Romania and a brief analyse of the legislation of certain European states will help us to assess more accurately the current situation in Romania and to observe different models of already implemented national prevention mechanisms, consequently allowing us to look at the whole picture, having all the elements, thus drawing the best fitting solutions in implementing a solid and functional national preventive mechanism in Romania, in full respect with OPCAT requirements.

CONTENT

I. The Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

1. General presentation. Observing that the protection of human rights is of paramount importance and is subject to continous evolution, the United Nations adopted the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment stressing out that further measures are necessary to achieve the purposes of the CAT and to strengthen the protection of persons deprived of their liberty against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Although Romania ratified the OPCAT in 2009, based on the declaration made in accordance with article 24, paragraph 1, the implementation of the obligations under Part IV, concerning national preventive mechanisms[4] was postponed for three years, thus no NPM was designated in Romania up to this point. The three year period of postponement will expire on 1 August 2012, leaving a tight timeframe to the relevant national stakeholders in order to designate a NPM within the assumed term.[5]

Unlike other optional protocols to human rights treaties, the OPCAT is viewed as an operational treaty rather than a standard-setting instrument.[6] In this sense, it was stated that the OPCAT breaks new ground within the UN human rights system for four main reasons[7], namely: it emphasises prevention; it combines complementary international and national efforts; it emphasises cooperation, not condemnation and it establishes a triangular relationship (between the States Parties,

---

[3] See the open-ended intergovernmental expert group meeting on the United Nations standard minimum rules for the treatment of prisoners, 31 January - 2 February 2012, Vienna, Austria, as requested by the General Assembly, in operative paragraph 10 of its Resolution 65/230 of 21 December 2010, entitled "Twelfth United Nations Congress on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice", accessed on February 2, 2012, http://www.unodc.org/documents/justice-and-prison-reform/AGMs/General_Assembly_resolution_65-230_E.pdf.

[4] According to article 17 of the OPCAT, each State Party shall maintain, designate or establish, at the latest one year after the entry into force of the present Protocol or of its ratification or accession, one or several independent national preventive mechanisms for the prevention of torture at the domestic level.

[5] According to article 2 of the Order no. 47/2010 of the minister of foreign affairs, published in the* Official Journal of Romania*, Part I, no. 100 of February 15, 2010, the OPCAT entered into force for Romania on August 1, 2009, so the three year period of postponement will expire on August 1, 2012.

[6] Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT) and the Inter-American Institute for Human Rights (IIHR), Optional Protocol to the UN Convention against Torture: Implementation Manual, revised edition, 2010, p.11, accessed January 31, 2012, http://www.apt.ch/index.php?option=com_docman&task=doc_ download&gid=784& Itemid=256&lang=en.

[7] For an in-depth analysis of these reasons, see APT and IIHR, op. cit., p.12 - 14.

the Subcommittee on Prevention and NPMs). In this respect it makes more sense to expose places of detention to public scrutiny and to make the entire system in which police, security and intelligence officials operate more transparent and accountable to external monitoring.[8] More specifically, the fact that detainees are locked away from society also means that society is prevented from knowing the truth about life behind bars. Many detainees feel that society has forgotten them and that nobody is interested in their fate. In fact, most people have never seen a place of detention from inside and are not really interested to know what is going on in closed institutions.[9]

The Optional Protocol aims to protect persons deprived of their liberty against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment by preventive non-judicial means, approaching the problem from two sides, as it establishes a system of regular visits undertaken to places where people are deprived of their liberty by an independent international body – the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment of the Committee against Torture and by national preventive mechanisms for the prevention of torture at the domestic level, due to be created by each Member State.

The main mandate of the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment of the Committee against Torture shall consist of visits in the places of detention and in making recommendations to States Parties concerning the protection of persons deprived of their liberty against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In order to give assistance to the States and NPMs in fulfilling their obligations under the Optional Protocol, bearing in mind the provisions set out in the OPCAT, the Subcommittee on Prevention issued the Guidelines on national preventive mechanisms[10] aiming to add further clarity as to the expectations of the Subcommittee on Prevention regarding the establishment and operation of NPMs.

The National Preventive Mechanisms shall have both functional and personnel independence and shall visit the national places of detention in order to examine regularly the treatment of the persons deprived of their liberty, with a view to strengthening, if necessary, their protection against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Also, they shall have the right to make contacts with the Subcommittee on Prevention, to send it information and to meet with it. It should be stressed out that the Guidelines of the Subcommittee on Prevention emphasize the fact that the NPM should complement rather than replace existing systems of monitoring and its establishment should not preclude the creation or operation of other such complementary systems.

When analysing the implementation of OPCAT, one should observe with particular attention the content of the notions of "places of detention" and "deprivation of liberty" explained in article 4, since the meaning of them is different from the commom understanding. Place of detention shall mean any place under the jurisdiction and control of the member states where persons are or may be deprived of their liberty, either by virtue of an order given by a public authority or at its instigation or with its consent or acquiescence.

Deprivation of liberty shall mean any form of detention or imprisonment or the placement of a person in a public or private custodial setting which that person is not permitted to leave at will by order of any judicial, administrative or other authority.

So, it can be clearly outlined that places of detention falling under the provisions of OPCAT are broader, as they include not only the "classical" places of detention (penitentiaries, places of

---

[8] See Manfred Nowak, Interim report of the UN Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, A/61/259, 14 August 2006, para.67, accessed January 25, 2012, http://daccess-dds-ny.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N06/468/15/PDF/N0646815.pdf?OpenElement.

[9] See Manfred Nowak, op. cit., para. 46.

[10] The Guidelines on national preventive mechanisms were adopted by the United Nations' Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment on 15–19 November 2010, accessed January 29, 2012, www2.ohchr.org/english/bodies/cat/opcat/docs/SPT_Guidelines_NPM_en.doc.

arrest, detention centers), but any place where a person is or may be deprived of his or her liberty, either by virtue of an order given by a public authority or at its instigation or with its consent or approval, in this category being included, for exemple, psychiatric institutions, centers for the refugees, orphanages and homes for the elderly. Thus the NPMs' visiting mandate has a very wide range, as it comprises the right to visit all places where people are or may be deprived of their liberty. It was however emphasized that the aim of the OPCAT is the prevention and visits are only part of that preventive mandate. It is very important that any NPM looks to the broader picture of prevention under the OPCAT.[11]

2. National Prevention Mechanisms. Further, the paper will focus on analysing the provisions contained in the Optional Protocol regarding the National Prevention Mechanisms. Although the OPCAT does not prescribe a particular structure for the NPMs' it does set out several paraghraphs (articles 17-23) about the mandate and minimum powers the NPMs' must be given by States Parties. In accordance with article 19, NPMs shall be granted minimum the following powers:

"(a) To regularly examine the treatment of the persons deprived of their liberty in places of detention as defined in article 4, with a view to strengthening, if necessary, their protection against torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment;

(b) To make recommendations to the relevant authorities with the aim of improving the treatment and the conditions of the persons deprived of their liberty and to prevent torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, taking into consideration the relevant norms of the United Nations;

(c) To submit proposals and observations concerning existing or draft legislation."

The NPM should have a functional independence and an independence of its personnel, which has to have such capabilities and professional knowledge[12] necessary to achieve the scope of the mechanism.

In fulfilling the requirements of OPCAT, besides the pre-existence of the human resources requirements, the functional and budgetary independence, the experts within the NPM should have, in accordance to the provisions of article 20 of the OPCAT, access to all information concerning the number of persons deprived of their liberty in places of detention, the number of places and their location; access to all information referring to the treatment of those persons as well as their conditions of detention; access to all places of detention and their installations and facilities. Also, they must have the opportunity to interview, in private, the persons deprived of their liberty without witnesses, either personally or with a translator if deemed necessary, as well as with any other person who can supply relevant information.[13]

3. The notion of "torture". As to the notion of torture in the sense of the United Nations' Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment[14], the

---

[11] Rachel Murray, Malcolm Evans, Elina Steinerte, Antenor Hallo de Wolf, Summary and Recommendations from the Conference OPCAT in the OSCE region: What it means and how to make it work?, held on 25-26 November 2008 in Prague, University of Bristol, 2009, p.5, accessed February 1, 2012, http://www.bris.ac.uk/law/research/centres-themes/opcat/opcatdocs/prague2008/proceedingspraguenovember2008.pdf.

[12] E.g.: prior experience in visiting places of detention, membership in certain professions relevant to the scope of the mechanism (lawyers, doctors, psychologists, psychiatrists, social workers etc.), moral authority and respect within the society.

[13] As a consequence of this provision, article 21 of OPCAT underlines the fact that no authority or official shall order, apply, permit or tolerate any sanction against any person or organization for having communicated to the national preventive mechanism any information, whether true or false and no such person or organization shall be otherwise prejudiced in any way.

[14] According to article 1 para.1 from the CAT, the term "torture" means any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a accepted approach under international law has been to avoid drawing up an exhaustive list of acts that could be considered to amount to torture because of concerns that such a list may prove too limited in its scope and, thus, may fail to adequately respond to developments in technology and values within societies.[15] Also, the lack of a definition of "other forms of ill-treatment" from the text of the Convention is useful as it ensures that other types of abuse that may fail to meet the strict definition of torture as a crime, but that nevertheless cause suffering to individuals, are also absolutely prohibited.[16]

It can be observed that this definition has a four-part test: the intentional infliction; of severe pain or suffering weather physical or mental; for any purpose including, for example, to obtain information, inflict punishement or intimidate him or a third person; by a public official or person acting in an official capacity.[17] To strengthen the prohibition of torture, article 2 from the CAT[18] states the absolute prohibition of torture. Thus it can not be subject of defences, statute of limitations or amnesty and efforts by some States to justify torture and ill-treatment as measures to protect public safety or avert emergencies can not be recognized.

Evaluating the distinction made between torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, the thorough analysis of the travaux préparatoires of articles 1 and 16 of CAT as well as a systematic interpretation of both provisions in light of the practice of the Committee against Torture leads one to conclude that the decisive criteria for distinguishing torture from [cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment] may best be understood to be the purpose of the conduct and the powerlessness of the victim, rather than the intensity of the pain or suffering inflicted, as argued by the European Court of Human Rights and many scholars.[19]

One common element of the definitions of torture and other forms of ill-treatment under the Convention against Torture is that all must involve a public official or someone acting in an official capacity. However, for the purposes of the CAT, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment may "not amount to torture" either because it does not have the same purposes as torture, or because it is not intentional, or perhaps because the pain and suffering is not "severe" within the meaning of article 1.[20]

Indeed, the definition of torture in the United Nations' Convention is reflected also to the purpose of the actions, which is in opposition to the provisions of the article 3 from the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[21], refined through the public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions.

---

[15] APT and IIHR, op. cit., p.27.

[16] APT and IIHR, op. cit., p.28.

[17] Jim Murdoch, The treatment of prisoners. European standards, Council of Europe Publishing, Strasbourg, 2004, p.118.

[18] According to article 2 para.2 from the CAT, no exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture. Moreover, according to article 16 from the CAT, each State Party shall undertake to prevent in any territory under its jurisdiction other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which do not amount to torture as defined in article I, when such acts are committed by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity.

[19] Manfred Nowak, Civil and political rights, including the questions of torture and detention. Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. Report of the Special Rapporteur on the question of torture, Manfred Nowak, E/CN.4/2006/6, 23 December 2005, p.13, para.39, accessed February 1, 2012, http://daccess-dds-ny.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/G05/168/09/PDF/G0516809.pdf?OpenElement.

[20] Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT) and the Center for Justice and International Law (CEJIL), Torture in International Law. A guide to jurisprudence, 2008, p.12, accessed February 1, 2012, http://www.apt.ch/index.php?option=com_docman&task=doc_download&gid=326&Itemid=260&lang=en.

[21] Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, adopted on November 4, 1950, as amended by Protocol no. 11, together with Protocols no. 1, 4, 6, 7, 12 and 13 were ratified by Romania through Law no. 30/1994, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 135 of May 31, 1994.

European Court of Human Rights case-law, stating that "no one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment", as the European aproach proceeds upon degrees of severity of the suffering caused in setting up a distinction between torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

II. Presentation of the national legislation regarding the current Inspection Mechanisms in Romania

1. Mechanisms of inspection under the authority of the Minister of Justice and the National Administration of Penitentiaries. According to the provisions of articles 21 and 33 from the Government Decision no. 652/2009[22], the control competences of the Ministry of Justice are exercised by the Directorate of Internal Control[23] placed under the direct coordination of the minister of justice. The Directorate can carry out preventive and reactive visits, ex officio or as a reaction to a direct complaint and, while not having a special focus, it includes the analysis of torture or ill treatment of the persons deprived of their liberty placed in the penitentiaries under the authority of the National Administration of Penitentiaries. The recommendations given by the Directorate as a result to such visits are binding to all penitentiaries throughout the country.

The internal inspection mechanism within the National Administration of Penitentiaries is the Directorate for the Inspection of Penitentiaries[24], placed directly under the General Director. The Directorate has competence to control all 45 penitentiaries with a total number of approximately 30,600 inmates and its main tasks are: conducting general inspections, which have various purposes such as inspecting safety, health and financial aspects as well as the rights of the detainees, ad hoc controls, as a reaction to a complaint, usually to inspect only on a particular aspect, concerning the complaint received and exercising thematic controls concerning an aspect decided upon by the National Administration of Penitentiaries.

The personnel of the Directorate for the Inspection of Penitentiaries has access to all facilities, information and documents regarding the place of inspection, it can hold interviews with the detainees in private and is not subject to restrictions from the administration of the penitentiaries. After each visit the Directorate issues a note with its findings, recommendations and a deadline for the penitentiary to implement the recommendations.

2. Mechanisms of inspection under the authority of the Ministry of Administration and Interior and the General Inspectorate of the Police. The internal control mechanism within the Ministry of Administration and Interior is the Directorate of Internal Control[25], directly subordinated to the minister of administration and interior, having competence to all the structures within or subordinated to the Ministry.

The Directorate for Internal Control within the General Inspectorate of Romanian Police has the competence to visit and control all 54 police detention facilities. It specializes in organizing and [22] Government Decision no. 652/2009 regarding the organisation and functioning of the Ministry of Justice was published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 443 of June 29, 2009. Consolidated text as of December 8, 2011.

[23] See articles 74 – 76 from the Order no. 120/C/2011 of the minister of justice on approving the Regulation for organization of the Ministry of Justice, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 116 of February 16, 2011. Consolidated text as of October 6, 2011.

[24] See articles 46 – 54 from the Order no. 2003/C/2008 of the minister of justice on approving the Regulation for organization of the National Administration of Penitentiaries, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 603 of August 13, 2004. Consolidated text as of January 5, 2009.

[25] Order no. 118/2011 of the minister of administration and interior regarding the organization and execution of internal controls within the Ministry of Administration and Interior, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 443 of June 24, 2011.

carrying out inspections, checking petitions, preventing and countering infringement of law within the personnel of the General Inspectorate of Romanian Police and subordinated units.

3. Mechanisms of inspection under the authority of the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection and under the public local administration. The internal control mechanism within the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection is the Directorate of Internal Control.[26]

The protection of children that are placed in institution where they are not allowed to leave at will is ensured both on a central and local level. The main institution of the central public administration having competences in the protection of the children rights is the National Authority for the Protection of the Rights of the Child, subordinated to the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection. It is the responsibility of the public local administration authorities to guarantee the rights of children within their territorial range.

4. Mechanisms of inspection under the authority of the Ministry of Health. In Romania there are approximately 37 psychiatric hospitals, 4 of which being psychiatric hospitals for safety measures, where patients are not free to leave at will due to the danger state they may pose to themselves or to others.

According to the provisions of the Government Decision no. 144/2010[27], the Directorate for Control functioning within the ministry inspects the hospitals in order to renew their licensing. If deficits are found, binding recommendations are made and a time frame for improvements is given.

Also, regarding the mental health institutions, according to the provisions of the Government Decision no. 1424/2009[28], the National Centre for Mental Health, a subordinated structure to the Minister of Health, deals with various issues regarding the management of mental health institutions and the medical treatment of the patients, carrying out preventive and reactive inspections, as it monitorises and evaluates the mental health services.

The preventive visits of these 2 mechanisms usually have the purpose of inspecting a broad range of issues and specifically to check the compliance with the medical and professional standards.

5. Conclusions on the existing mechanisms under the executive branch.

Despite the fact that all the above presented mechanisms functioning under the executive branch can carry out reactive or even preventive visits and can hold interviews in private with the persons deprived of their liberty, having access to all facilities and relevant persons and documents when visiting a place of detention, they lack the human and logistic resources in order to visit a relevant number of places of detention falling under their competence and, being subordinated to the executive branch, they lack functional and budgetary independence. Consequently, the relevant conditions needed to effectively and objectively examine the treatment of detainees and the conditions of detention, as required by OPCAT, are not present. Nevertheless, the executive mechanisms can function as useful partners for the future NPM, as they have a broad expertise regarding the administration and management of places of detention and could be able to implement recommendations of the NPM in an appropriate manner.[29]

---

[26] Government Decision no. 11/2009 regarding the organisation and functioning of the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection was published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 41 of January 23, 2009. Consolidated text as of August 23, 2011.

[27] Government Decision no. 144/2010 regarding the organisation and functioning of the Ministry of Health was published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 139 of March 2, 2010. Consolidated text as of January 11, 2012.

[28] Government Decision no. 1424/2009 regarding the organisation and functioning of the National Centre for Mental Health was published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 842 of December 7, 2009.

[29] Moritz Birk, Ulrike Kirchgaesser, Julia Kozma, Final Report on the possible solutions for the establishment of a National Preventive Mechanism in Romania, p.8, accessed January 31, 2012, http://www.just.ro/LinkClick.aspx?fileticket=M%2B4HHbNMs10%3D&tabid=690.

6. Delegated Judges. The new legal framework in the field of execution of criminal penalties, namely Law no. 275/2006[30], envisages a modern development of the Romanian prison system, as a delegated judge on the execution of prison penalties was introduced, thus the execution of these penalties being carried out under the surveillance, control and authority of this judge, ensuring the lawfulness of the execution.

Delegated judges are not part of the penitentiary administration, as they mentained their status of judge of the Romanian court system. Thus, they are independent from the executive branch and only subordinated to the judicial branch. According to article 15 para.(2) from the Government Decision no. 1897/2006[31], they are competent to carry out current, occasional, unexpected, thematic and specialised inspections and controls ex officio or based complaints. The delegated judges have the right to access all relevant facilities within the penitentiary and hold interviews in private with any detainee or staff member.

In conclusion, the delegated judges, although independent in exercising their competences, do not carry out preventive visits, but only react to the complaints filed by inmates and aiming to prevent ill-treatment of these persons, do not have the necessary expertise, logistics or budgetary independence to realise a full evaluation of a place of detention in order to prevent torture and other ill-treatements, not to mention the fact that their offices are placed on the premises of the penitentiary, thus their independence and credibility can be undermined.

7. Ombudsman. Avocatul Poporului (the Romanian Ombudsman) was established in 1991 through the Constitution, as an independent and autonomous public authority, with its own budget and having the purpose of defending the individuals' rights and freedoms in their relationship with the public authorities. The Ombudsman tries to unblock the conflicts between citizens and public administration, conflicts emerging, especially, from bureaucracy, as this was and still is a heavy disease of the state administration.[32] It shall exercise his powers ex officio or at the request of persons infringed in their rights and freedoms, within the limits established by law, including the possibility to visit public places of detention, but not private ones.

Avocatul Poporului is organised by Law no. 35/1997[33], has its headquarters in Bucharest and 14 regional offices. According to these legal provisions, the domain of justice, police and penitentiaries falls under its competence. Consequently, the authorities of places of detention must provide anyone who is under arrest or detention, the right to address the Ombudsman concerning a violation of his/her rights and freedoms, except for the legal restraints.

Although he is empowered to deploy preventive visits, from the public reports it can be seen that it rarely does so; of two surveys in 2009, one focused on the rights of detainees in a penitentiary and the other on child and youth protection and the right to health care according to human rights standards in a children placement centre.

The Advocate of the People shall report before the two Parliament Chambers, annually or at the request thereof. The reports may contain recommendations on legislation or measures of any

---

[30] Law no. 275/2006 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings was published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 627 of July 20, 2006. Consolidated text as of May 22, 2010.

[31] Government Decision no. 1897/2006 for the approval of the Regulation of application of the Law no. 275/2006 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings was published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 24 of January 16, 2007. Consolidated text as of December 4, 2010.

[32] Ioan Muraru in Mihai Constantinescu, Antonie Iorgovan, Ioan Muraru, Elena Simina Tănăsescu, Constituţia României revizuită – comentarii şi explicaţii (Romanian Constitution revized – comments and explanations), All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004, p.116.

[33] Law no. 35/1997 on the organisation and functioning of the Institution of the Advocate of the People was re-published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 844 of September 15, 2004. Consolidated text as of January 16, 2011.

other nature for the defence of the citizens' rights and freedoms. The recommendations cannot be subject to parliamentary or judicial control.

Sumarising, the Ombudsman usually visits places of detention upon a complaint and it does not have the necessary human or financial resources to systematically carry out preventive visits as required by OPCAT. In spite of these shortcomings, the Ombudsman is, unlike the other mechanisms analysed, a truly independent institution.

8. Non-Governmental Organisations. In Romania there are several non-governmental organizations which carry out an intensive activity in monitoring places of detention (e.g. Association for the Defense of Human Rights in Romania - the Helsinki Committee, Romanian Group for the Defence of Human Rights, Centre for Legal Resources).

According to the provisions of the Law no. 275/2006, the representatives of the non-governmental organisations that carry out activities in the field of protection of human rights may visit the penitentiaries in the subordination of the National Administration of Penitentiaries or places of arrest in the subordination of the General Inspectorate of the Police and may contact the inmates, with the agreement of the general director of the National Administration of Penitentiaries or of the warden of the place of arrest. The meetings among the representatives of the non-governmental organisations and the persons deprived of their liberty are confidential, with visual surveillance.

The representatives of the non-governmental organisations performing visits need an annual general approval by the Romanian authorities for the visits. In addition, the approval is verified by the respective prison or police unit before each visit.

Regarding the psychiatric hospitals, the non-governmental organisations have an annual protocol signed with the Ministry of Health, by which representatives of these organisations can visit such hospitals, having access to all the facilities within the institution. Also, interviews with the patients are conducted in private.

Although non-governmental organisations are fully independent from the State, not receving any funding of any sorts for the monitoring visits and carry out preventive visits in the "classical" places of detention, they do not have the capacity neither the resources necessary to carry out systematic visits to all places of detention throughout the country, lacking, also the multidisciplinary expertise and the legal provisions to ensure that they can issue recommendations to the visited institutions.

In conclusion, while in Romania a comprehensive system of monitoring of places of detention already exists, the current inspection mechanisms display significant shortcomings in view of independent preventive monitoring[34], none of these mechanisms being in compliance with the Paris Principles[35] and with the minimum requirements of OPCAT in order to be appointed as the National Prevention Mechanism.

III. Short analyse of the implementation of the National Preventive Mechanism in certain European Union states.

1. The Czech Republic ratified the Optional Protocol in 2006 and, subsequently, the Act on the Public Defender of Rights (Ombudsman) was ammended in order to implement the OPCAT. The law came into effect as of 1 January 2006. From this date on, the Public Defender of Rights (Veřejný ochránce práv) acts as a NPM, as it has independence both functionally and institutionally.

Being appointed as a NPM, the Defender was obligated to undertake systematic, comprehensive and preventive visits in places of detention, with the objective of strengthening the protection of these persons against torture or cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment and other maltreatment.[36] Places of detention falling under the mandate of the Defender are: facilities performing custody, imprisonment, protective or institutional education, or protective treatment or preventive detention; other places where persons restricted in their freedom by public authority are or may be confined, especially police cells, facilities for the detention of foreigners and asylum facilities and places where persons restricted in their freedom are or may be confined as a result of dependence on the care provided, especially social service facilities and other facilities providing similar care, healthcare facilities and facilities providing social/legal protection of children[37], regardless if they are state or private. Thus the Defender's competence is not limited to the places of detention where persons are deprived of their liberty de jure, as a result of a direct interference of a public authority, being included, also, places of detention where the freedom of a person is restricted de facto, giving the dependance of that particular person on institutional care.

[34] Moritz Birk, Ulrike Kirchgaesser, Julia Kozma, op. cit., p.7.

[35] The Principles relating to the Status of National Institutions (The Paris Principles) were adopted on 20 December 1993, accessed January 26, 2012, http://www2.ohchr.org/english/law/parisprinciples.htm.

Ombudsman´s staff empowered to carry out visits consists of a special department of 12 lawyers and other ad hoc experts, such as doctors, psychologists, psychiatrists. Visits of one to three days are carried out according to a prepared plan for a specific period, each visit being finalized with a report. If it considers necessary, the team can make recommendations or proposals for remedial measures, adressed to the director of the visited place of detention.[38] Recommendations following the visits may vary, in the case of remand prisons, from the necessity to give a preventive inspection to people taken into custody by a doctor on the same day they are admitted, to the possibility for the inmates to combine their own underwear with prison-issue clothing or, in the absence of work opportunities, to the recommendation that prison administration should offer defendants as wide a range of leisure-time activities as possible.[39]

2. In France the General Inspector of Places of Deprivation of Liberty (Contrôleur général des lieux de privation de liberté) was set up as the NPM, through Law no. 2007-1545 of 30 October.

The General Inspector in charge to control all the places where people are deprived of liberty is independent, cannot receive instructions from any authority and cannot be prosecuted for his opinions or for the actions he carries out in his functions, and has the power to check that all the fundamental rights of people in the places of detention are respected. So, the aim of the institution is not only to prevent torture and any other inhuman and degrading treatment in custodial establishments but rather to ensure the full respect of all the fundamental rights of persons deprived of liberty. Consequently, the Contrôleur général has three main tasks: to make sure that rights which are inherent in human dignity are enforced; to make sure that a good balance is established between fundamental rights enforcement of people who are deprived of freedom and observations on public order and security and to prevent any violation of their fundamental rights.[40]

The core of the NPM in France is formed of 12 full time appointed "contrôleurs" and 9 part time "contrôleurs". In the performance of their tasks, the inspectors are under the exclusive authority of the General Inspector.[41] Also, the Contrôleur général and all his team are compelled to

---

[36] Section 1 para.3 from the Act no. 349/1999 on the Public Defender of Rights.

[37] Section 1 para.4 from the Act no. 349/1999 on the Public Defender of Rights.

[38] See Filip Glotzmann and Petra Zdrazilova – Presentation on the National Preventive Mechanism in the Czech Republic, Conference OPCAT in the OSCE region: What it means and how to make it work?, held on 25-26 November 2008 in Prague, accessed January 25, 2012, http://www.bristol.ac.uk/law/research/centres-themes/opcat/opcatdocs/prague2008/presentationglotzmann.pdf.

[39] For an in-depth analisys, see Public Defender of Rights Report on Visits to Remand Prisons, 2010, p.2, accessed January 25, 2012, http://www.ochrance.cz/fileadmin/user_ upload/ENGLISH/2010_ vazebni_veznice_ ENG.pdf.

[40] Central tasks of the Contrôleur général des lieux de privation de liberté: taking care of the respect of fundamental rights, accessed January 29, 2012, http://www.cglpl.fr/en/the-tasks-of-the-controleur-general-des-lieux-de-privation-de-liberte/.

[41] Article 4 para.(3) from Law no. 2007-1545 of 30 October establishing a Contrôleur général des lieux de privation de liberté. Consolidated text as of 31 March 2011, accessed January 25, 2012, http://www.cglpl.fr/wp-content/uploads/2009/04/Loi_CGLPL_EUK-v.pdf.

professional secrecy, ensurying that no information allowing persons subject to the inspection to be identified is included in the documents published under the authority of the Contrôleur général or in his public statements.[42]

Based on article 8 from Law no. 2007-1545, the Contrôleur général can visit more than 5,000 custodial establishments, such as: prisons, psychiatric hospitals, hospitals where people stay without their consent, police custody cells, places of custody or customs detention, centers for detention of foreigners, court cells, administrative detention centres and facilities, waiting zones, secure educational centres and vehicles which are used to transport people deprived of freedom, where people are kept in custody.

There is an exception provided by the law regarding the visiting powers of the NPM: the authorities responsible for a place of detention may, for serious, compelling reasons connected with national defence, public security, natural catastrophes or serious disturbance within the visited facility, object to the visit, with a due justification for the objection and with the information of the NPM when the exceptional circumstances come to an end.

In the specialist literature it was said that, according to a model of classical action for the control of independent places of deprivation of liberty, the Contrôleur général may issue opinions and recommendations.[43]

The broad activity of this institution aims to highlight the good practices, on the one hand and to make recommendations when the fundamental rights of the persons deprived of their liberty are not fully respected, on the other hand.

Although an activity report in 2011 was not yet published, the opinions and recommendations given by the General Inspector are available. For example, the General Inspector issued an opinion on telephone usage in the places of detention, specifically prisons and detention centers[44], as the right for such a person to use the telephone is one of the ways to recognize his or her right to family life and to defend itself. The opinion tells, amongst other problems, about the respect of private and family life, in this sense, the abandonment of the installation of telephones in activity rooms or collective rooms being required. Also, it is desired to install telephone boots in order to protect the privacy of the inmates' conversations from the other inmates, several reccomendations already being made by the General Inspector in this sense. Further, it states that there is no possibility for the spouses or parteners, both of them being deprived of their liberty, to contact one another via telephone, despite the fact that they have the right to maintain the bonds of the family life.

3. The Federal Republic of Germany signed OPCAT on 20 September 2006 and it entered into force for Germany on 3 January 2009. The rights and responsibilities of the German NPM are defined in the Law of 26 August 2008 as well as in the Administrative Order of 20 November 2008, for the federal component and the State Treaty of 25 June 2009, for the Länder component.

Because of the Germany's federal structure, the NPM comprises two institutions: a Federal Agency for the Prevention of Torture for the Federation's jurisdiction, with competences over detention facilities operated by the Federal Armed Forces, Federal Police and the German Customs Administration and a Joint Länder Commission for the jurisdiction of the Länder with competences over the majority of the places of detention, namely: police, judicial, detention facilities in psychiatric clinics, establishments of custody pending deportation, nursing homes, youth welfare establishments.

The Agency and the Commission work together, they have the same material and personnel resources, and, most importantly, they are independent, not being subordinated to any federal or state

---

[42] Article 5 from Law no. 2007-1545.

[43] Jean-Paul Céré, Le système pénitentiaire français in Les systèmes pénitentiaires dans le monde, sous la direction de Jean-Paul Céré, Carlos Eduardo A. Japiassù, 2nd edition, Dalloz Publishing House, Paris, 2011, p. 183.

[44] Opinion of of the Contrôleur général des lieux de privation de liberté from 10 January 2011, regarding the telephone use in places of detention, published in the Official Journal of 23 January 2011, accessed February 1, 2012,http://www.legifrance.gouv.fr/jopdf/common/jo_pdf.jsp?numJO=0&dateJO=20110123&numTexte=25&pageDebut=&pageFin=.

ministry.[45] They both have to report annually to the federal and state governments and to the federal and state parliaments.

Regarding the Composition of the German NPM, both components of the German NPM are headed by honorary members.[46] In consequence, no salary or professional fee is allocated to them. Only travel expenses and daily allowances are paid.

There is no explicit selection procedure prescribed, the candidates being selected and proposed by the Federal Ministry of Justice and the Länder ministries of justice.

The NPM may be complemented by experts who could accompany the team during inspection visits. These experts might as well belong to a non-guvernmental organisation, but then they would act in their function as associated experts to the Mechanism.

The role of the Federal Agency's and of the Joint Commission of the Länder is to carry out regular or ad hoc visits to places of detention, identify problems and make recommendations to the relevant authorities. The German law has not reiterated the OPCAT provisions regarding the NPM right to submit proposals and observations to existing or draft legislation.

The Administrative Order and the State Treaty explicitly offer the Mechanism the right to enter any place of detention, with or without notification, access to any kind of information and the right to conduct confidential interviews with any person in the detention facility, but there is no special procedure provided to enforce access to places of detention. Regarding the places of detention, the German legislation does not explicitly name all relevant institutions that fall under the application of OPCAT. But the commentary to the Federal Law of 26 August 2008 mentions the following places as encompassed by article 4 of OPCAT: police stations, prisons (including remand prisons), closed units of psychiatric hospitals, centres for asylum seekers and persons awaiting deportation, international airport transit zones, police stations, youth welfare centres, secluded juvenile shelters, geriatric and nursing homes[47].

As to the NPM created in Germany, there can be raised serious suspicions about the efficiency and the conformity of this mechanism with the OPCAT. In this sense, the Committee against Torture is concerned about the lack of sufficient staff and financial and technical resources provided to the National Agency for the Prevention of Torture, comprised of the Federal Agency for the Prevention of Torture and the Joint Commission of the Länder, owing to which places of detention can be currently visited only once in four years, preventing the adequate fulfilment of the Agency's monitoring mandate and about the fact that the Joint Commission of the Länder had to announce, in some instances, its intention to visit the places of detention to the respective authorities in advance in order to gain access.[48]

4. Slovenia ratified the Optional Protocol in 2007 and, subsequently designated the Ombudsman as National Preventive Mechanism, which can give its agreement for the participation at the visits to the representatives of the non-guvernmental organizations registered in Slovenia or of organizations that have obtained the status of humanitarian organizations in Slovenia (the so-called Ombudsman plus' model).

---

[45] According to article 4 of the Administrative Order of 20 November 2008 and article 4, para.1 of the State Treaty of 25 June 2009, accessed February 2, 2012, http://www.antifolterstelle.de/fileadmin/dateiablage/Dokumente/Presse/Organisationserlass_OPCAT_01.pdf.
http://www.antifolterstelle.de/fileadmin/dateiablage/Dokumente/Presse/Staatsvertrag_Laenderkommission.pdf.

[46] According to article 4 of the Administrative Order of 20 November 2008 and article 4, para.1 of the State Treaty of 25 June 2009.

[47] See the Printed paper of the Bundestag no. 16/8249, commentary to Article 4 OPCAT, 2008, p. 27, accessed February 2, 2012, http://dip21.bundestag.de/dip21/btd/16/082/1608249.pdf.

[48] See the Committee against Torture, the Forty-seventh session, Consideration of reports submitted by States parties under article 19 of the Convention. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture. Germany, 2011, p.3-4, para.13, accessed February 1, 2012, http://www2.ohchr.org/english/bodies/cat/docs/CAT.C.DEU.5_en.pdf.

As set out by the OPCAT and taken over by the Slovenian law, the scope of the visits and of the Mechanism itself is not to criticize, but to assist. A visit by an NPM should be based on cooperation rather than on confrontation. The Ombudsman visited the first place of detention as a NPM on 19 March 2008[49].

The Slovenian law recognizes the importance of the financial independence of the mechanism, which is indispensable in order to achieve its functional independence as required by the OPCAT. The source and nature of funding is specified in the law and the budget for the Ombudsman and the NPM is based on the proposal of the Ombudsman. The staff and premises are shared by the Ombudsman and its NPM unit.

The mandate of NPM is mainly to carry out visits[50] (programmed, ad hoc or follow-up visits) at the detention places in order to examine the situation of persons deprived of their liberty, both in relation to the treatment of detainees and the conditions of detention. Its mandate and recommendations cover very different aspects of factual and legal nature such as living and material conditions, health-care services, social conditions, procedural guaranties, behavior and training of the staff etc. According to the Slovenian law, within the meaning of place of detention can fall police detention units, prisons for remand and sentenced prisoners, means of transport for the transfer of prisoners, re-education centers for juveniles or young offenders centers for illegal immigrants, homes for asylum seekers with closed units, border police facilities and transit zones at international ports and airports, psychiatric hospitals where patients in the criminal or civil context are hospitalized against their will, closed wards of social care institutions, including homes for the elderly, special social care institutions where residents with learning difficulties, physically or mentally retarded residents are accommodated. Members of a delegation can move inside the place of detention without any restriction and they have access to any facility or space within the premises of a place of detention.

The visits result in a report containing an assessment of the facts found and, if necessary, some concrete recommendations to improve the situation, which are not obligatory neither legally binding. If there is an urgent need to improve the treatment of persons deprived of their liberty, the delegation can make immediate observations

5. In Poland, the competences of the National Preventive Mechanism are entrusted to the Ombudsman (Commissioner for Civil Rights Protection), an independent body established since 1987. The Constitution ensures the independence of the Commissioner from the executive branch and the Ombudsman Act provides that the right to appoint the Commissioner belongs to the Lower House of the Parliament (Sejm). The Parliament also holds the right to dismiss the Commissioner, only in the event of the Commissioner resignation, permanent inability to fulfill his or her duties or betrayal of the oath of the office.[51]

At present, the tasks of the NPM are carried out by four dedicated teams in the Office of the Commissioner for Civil Rights Protection: Team for Penal Executive Law; Team for Public Administration Issues, Healthcare, Protection of Aliens Rights; Team for Rights of Soldiers and Public Officers; Team for Labour Law and Social Insurance. Also, two staff members in each of the Commissioner offices in the country were assigned to permanent cooperation with the Mechanism.

---

[49] About the National Preventive Mechanism of the Republic of Slovenia, p.2, accessed February 1, http://www.varuh-rs.si/fileadmin/user_upload/pdf/DPM/ABOUT-NPM-SLO.pdf.

[50] In 2010, the Mechanism performed 44 visits in prisons, remand centers, police stations, asylumsm aliens centers, psychiatric institutions, special social care institutions, retirement homes and juvenile facilities, as mentioned in the Report on the National Preventive Mechanism under the Optional Protocol to the UN Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment on the year 2010, p.7, accessed February 2, 2012, http://www.varuh-rs.si/fileadmin/user_upload/pdf/DPM/DrzavniPreventivniM-2010-web2.pdf.

[51] Articles 3.1 and 7.1 of the Act of 15 July 1987 on the Human Rights Defender (Ombudsman Act) accessed February 2, 2012, http://www.rpo.gov.pl/index.php?md=7512&s=3.

Depending on the type of place of detention visited, the visiting groups may be completed with external professionals, such as physicians, psychologists, psychiatrists or addiction treatment specialists.

The objectives of the NPM are: to regularly examine the treatment of the persons deprived of their liberty in places of detention, with a view to strengthening, if necessary, their protection against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; to make recommendations to the relevant authorities with the aim of improving the treatment and the conditions of the persons deprived of their liberty and to prevent torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment taking into consideration the relevant norms of the United Nations; to submit proposals and observations concerning existing or draft legislation and to raise awareness of the society on the issues of preventing torture and on the relevant norms concerning the treatment of people deprived of their liberty.[52]

The NPM carries out visits in institutions such as: prisons, custody suits, juvenile detention centers, juvenile refugees, juvenile reform schools, youth sociotherapy centers, spaces within Police organizational units designed for persons apprehended or brought in to sober, emergency centers for children, detoxification centers, social care facilities, psychiatric institutions, guarded facilities for foreigners, deportation custody facilities, and military disciplinary custodies. There are about 1826 institutions in Poland that can be identified as places of detention, according to the definition provided by. In 2010 the National Preventive Mechanism carried out 80 visits to 79 to such places of detention.[53]

After each visit a report is prepared within two – three weeks, with an attached opinion by a psychologist, psychiatrist or other external expert. Annual reports are also published and disseminated, in conformity to the requirements of the OPCAT.

IV. Implementing a National Preventive Mechanism for the prevention of torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in places of detention in Romania. Challenges regarding the implementation.

1. When evaluating the shortcomings regarding the implementing the National Preventive Mechanism in Romania, it should be emphasized that this mechanism must not replace the national monitoring systems already in place. Moreover, the OPCAT does not interdict the States to designate an existing institution as a NPM, if this institution fulfills both the requirements set out in OPCAT and in the Paris Principles.

It should be stressed out that no specific form is prescribed in the Optional Protocol as to the implementation of a NPM in domestic legislation. When analysing the different European NMPs already in place, some models can be outlined:

- designating one of the existing monitoring bodies (e.g. Ombudsman in Czech Republic or Poland)

- Ombudsman plus' models (e.g. Slovenia), where the NPM mandate is carried out by the Ombudsman office and non-guvernmental organisations. Involving civil society organisations may also help to legitimise both an NPM mandate and its credibility as an institution, not least because civil society organisations are often structurally independent of the government.[54]

- new visiting body (e.g. France and Germany).

---

[52] See The role of the National Preventive Mechanism and its activities in practice in Report of the Human Rights Defender on the activities of the National Preventive Mechanism in Poland in 2009. Bulletin of the Human Rights Defender No.5, Sources, Warsaw, 2010, p.98, accessed February 2, 2012, http://www.rpo.gov.pl/pliki/12821222200.pdf.

[53] Report of the Human Rights Defender on the activities of the National Preventive Mechanism in Poland in 2010, Warsaw, 2011, p.13, accessed February 2, 2012, http://www.rpo.gov.pl/pliki/13125459170.pdf.

[54] APT and IIHR, op. cit., p.215.

In order to reach a conclusion regarding the designation of a NPM, several aspects must be taken into consideration:

a) The institutional framework, namely: the necessary number of members and employees of the mechanism; how can one become a member, the minimum professional requirements and what are the neccesary professions that have to be present in the mechanism; costs needed to set up the mechanism; the necessary budget as to ensure its proper functioning.

b) Jurisdiction: what types of institutions will be controlled; how is regulated the access to all facilities subject to inspection; access to classified information; what is the subject of the controlling visits; the procedure to be followed when acess is prohibited for the experts.

c) Composition of the visiting team: the criteria needed to choose the members for the visiting team; the number of persons taking part in a visit; the participation of other experts to the visits, together with the permanent members of the NPM.

d) Working method: announced and unannounced visits; planned or ad hoc visits; the estimated number of controls per year, duration, frequency and the criteria needed to select the places of detention that will be visited; the right to obtain information and conduct interviews in private with the persons deprived of their liberty.

e) Consequences of the visits: best practices; the possibility to make recommendations; whether or not subsequent visits can or must be carried out in order to verify whether or not the recommendations were implemented; the documents prepared as a result of the visit and publication of such documents; the publishing of an annual report toghether with the communicated position of the authorities and with the recommendations issued as a result of the visits.

In evaluating the conditions needed to be respected when implementing the provisions of Part IV of the Optional Protocol, one has to look at the Guidelines on national preventive mechanisms issued by the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. In the area of basic principles[55], it must be noted that the future NPM should be established at constitutional or legislative level, fully respecting the provisions of the OPCAT as to the mandate and powers of the mechanism. Also, the future mechanism must have complete financial and operational autonomy when carrying out its functions, thus permitting the effective operation of the institution.

The NPM should have the right to visit all places of detention as analysed above in Section I of the paper and the state authorities should cooperate with the Mechanism in order to ensure the proper implementation of the recommendations issued, as mentioned in article 22 of OPCAT, with a view to strengthening the protection of the persons deprived of their liberty against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

In the Guidelines, the Subcommittee on Prevention stressed out the possibility for the experts within the NMP to conduct private interviews with those deprived of liberty, the right to carry out visits in the manner and with the frequency that the NPM itself decides, including unannounced visits at all times to all places of deprivation of liberty. Also, the NPM must be able to make proposals or observations on any existing or draft policy or legislation relevant to its mandate.[56]

In accordance to article 23 of OPCAT, the State should publish and widely disseminate the Annual Reports of the NPM.

When pursuing a functional and independent national mechanism, some principles must be observed as to the NPM itself and its members. Firstly, the NPM should carry out all aspects of its mandate in a manner which avoids actual or perceived conflicts of interest and any confidential information acquired in the course of its work should be protected and, in accordance with the proivisions of article 21 of OPCAT, no personal data shall be published without the express consent of the person concerned. Moreover, the NPM should plan its work and its use of resources in such a way as to ensure that places of deprivation of liberty are visited in a manner and with sufficient frequency to make an effective contribution to the prevention torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. When appropriate, the visit reports or the annual reports should contain recommendations addressed to the relevant authorities.

---

[55] Guidelines on national preventive mechanisms, op. cit., para.5-15.

[56] See Basic issues regarding the operation of an NPM in Guidelines on national preventive mechanisms, op. cit., para.24-40.

The liason with other NPMs and with the Subcommittee on Prevention is of great importance in ensuring a proper functioning of the Mechanism, by sharing the experience in reaching the aim set out in the Optional Protocol, eventually, with the adoption of a set of good practices available to all national mechanisms.

It should be stressed out that all the aspects mentioned above must be fulfilled by the NPM, disregarding if it will be a new institution or the competences of an already existing institution will be enlarged (the Ombudsman in the case of Romania).

In the process of designating an institution as NPM, due attention must be given to the background, capabilities and professional knowledge of the personnel, necessary to enable it to properly fulfill its mandate. This should include, inter alia, relevant legal and health-care expertise. In other words, members of the NPM should collectively have the expertise and experience necessary for its effective functioning.[57]

Today, when evaluating the implementation of a NPM in Romania, one should bear in mind the economic resources as well as the human resources needed to achieve a functional implementation from the two possible solutions: new body or enlarging the competences of the Ombudsman. In this sense, it goes without saying that the designation of an existing body is the most economic solution, both as to the budgetary impact and as to the human resources and logistic effort.

In establishing a proper support for setting up an efficient National Preventive Mechanism, the Ministry of Justice of Romania coordinated a twinning project[58], in which were involved all the stakeholders from Romania, representatives of the non-guvernmental organisations and experts from Austria, Czech Republic, France, Germany, Poland and Slovenia, with the sole purpose of assisting the Romanian Government in implementing its obligations under the Optional Protocol and establishing a National Preventive Mechanism for the prevention of torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in places of detention.

In evaluating the possibilities mentioned above (designation of an existing visiting body or creating a new visiting body), there can be found both advantages and disadvantages on the part of either one of these solutions[59]:

a. Establishment of a new body as a NPM in Romania. Arguments and criticism. In the current economic circumstances, not only in Romania, but in all Europe, a new institution will be met with great reluctance especially when the national policy regarding the budgetary expenses is aiming to reduce bureaucratic structures and public expenses. Also, this new established NPM would have to be granted legal guarantees of independence at legislative level. Establishing a new body is not however without its own particular challenges. A new body will need time to demonstrate its independence and establish its legitimacy and credibility.[60] Also, it will have to ensure a tight trusty relation with all the public authorities in order to provide the NPM with the support necessary to exercise its powers, as it is the case with the Ombudsman.

---

[57] Guidelines on national preventive mechanisms, op. cit., para.17-20.

[58] For the findings in this Twinning project, see Moritz Birk, Ulrike Kirchgaesser, Julia Kozma, Final Report on the possible solutions for the establishment of a National Preventive Mechanism in Romania.

[59] For an in-depth analisys of these solutions, see Moritz Birk, Ulrike Kirchgaesser, Julia Kozma, op. cit., p.36–40.

[60] Debra Long, Report on the current state of play and possible solutions to assist the process of designating or establishing a National Preventive Mechanism in Romania, Human Rights Implementation Centre, University of Bristol, August 2011, p.19, accessed February 1, 2012, http://www.bristol.ac.uk/law/research/centres-themes/hric/hricdocs/romaniavist.doc.

On the other hand, it was said that the establishment of a new body presents the opportunity to properly implement all requirements of OPCAT learning form the potential shortcomings of the existing institutions such as the Ombudsman office.

b. Designation of the Ombudsman office as NPM in Romania. Arguments and criticism. The Ombudsman, under the current conditions mentioned above in Romania, is most suitable to be the proper institution for taking over monitoring of human rights due to its previous expertise and experience in dealing with complaints of human rights violations. Moreover, the designation of the Ombudsman as NPM will ensure the much needed speediness and cost effectiveness of the implementation process, bearing in mind the fact that it will be able to use the existing structures. Also, the cut-costing policy will be evidentiated as the 14 regional offices of the Ombudsman can be used for the infrastructure and logistic support for the mechanism.

This institution has a strong legal basis in the Romanian Constitution and is explicitly provided with autonomy and independence from any public authority, with a separate budget at its disposal, thus complying with the criteria of independence purported by OPCAT and the Paris Principles.

The designation of the Ombudsman as a NPM must be substantiated by enlarging its structure with an additional number of positions in order to recrute experts in this field and its budget will be supplemented, thus ensuaring its proper functioning.[61]

It cannot be disputed that valuable synergies between the current functions of the Ombudsman and the preventive mandate of a NPM could develop if the NPM was installed within the existing Ombudsman's structures.

Of course, one could argue that when integrating the NPM into the Ombudsman, it risks taking over any of its potential problems and shortcomings in terms of competences, independence, composition and overall effectiveness.

2. As to the possible solutions, after analysing all the requirements of the OPCAT, the Guidelines set out by the Subcommittee on Prevention and the advantages and disadvantages when designating a NPM in Romania, the optimal solution in implementing the OPCAT in the national legislation could be the designation of the Ombudsman office as NPM, in opposition to the creation of a new body. In this sense, it is necessary to ammend the Law no. 35/1997 on the organisation and functioning of the Institution of the Advocate of the People. Of course, the designation of the NPM has to be endorsed by an open and transparent process that involves besides the Ombudsman itself, all the stakeholders and the representatives of the civil society.

This designation is likely to strengthen the role of Ombudsman in defending rights and freedoms of individuals in their relations with public authorities in the context of a very broad definition of places of detention, which includes not only traditional detention centers (penitentiaries, hospital-penitentieries, penitentiaries for the minors, detention centers), but also other places that require careful consideration of the rights of persons deprived of their liberty de jure or de facto (e.g. psychiatric hospitals, elderly homes, children's homes, refugee centers, centers for foreigners etc.).

The designation of Ombudsman offices as NPM (as it was done in countries like the Czech Republic, Slovenia or Poland) is understandable as it has been observed that Ombudsman offices normally enjoy considerable guarantees of independence and their mandate is often grounded in the national constitution.[62]

---

[61] According to the Government Decision no. 5/2002 regarding the organisation and functioning of the Ombudsman office, republished in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 758 of October 27, 2011, the maximum numbers of the persons working within the Ombudsman can not excede 99.

[62] Elina Steinerte, Institutions of Ombudspersons as National Preventive Mechanisms: Some Preliminary Observations, presentation at the Opening Plenary of the Conference OPCAT in the OSCE region: What it means and how to make it work?, held on 25-26 November 2008 in Prague, University of Bristol, 2009, p.1, accessed February 1, 2012, http://www.bris.ac.uk/law/research/centres-themes/opcat/opcatdocs/prague2008/presentationsteinerte1.pdf.

In ensuring its financial independence, the NPM must have its budgetary independence. Of course, the experts should recive an adequate honorarium and training on human rights monitoring in places of detention, possibly with the consultation of international experts, ensuring a highly qualified personnel for the visits.

When designating the Ombudsman as NPM, a different structure within the Ombudsman institution must be created, comprising in a Pool of Experts (acting as the core of the NPM) and administrative staff, in full respect to the Subcommittee on Prevention Guidelines stating that where the body designated as the NPM performs other functions in addition to those under the Optional Protocol, its NPM functions should be located within a separate unit or department, with its own staff and budget. The Commission of Experts will have a tripartite composition:

- experts working within the NPM (weather they are currently working with the Ombudsman office or they will be recruted in the future)
- representatives of non-guvernmental organizations with relevant experience in this area;
- representatives of institutions involved.

This solution will ensure a balance of the NPM core, as the representatives of the institutions involved and of the non-guvernmental organizations will bring the much needed know-how both from the point of view of the state authorities and of the civil society.

Also, the law on implementing the national mechanism should specify in what manner the experts are choosen (an objective, open competition, announced in the media and over the internet, organized through a highly transparent process by a selection commission, the minimum requirements regarding the necessary qualification, the professional expertise in one of the required disciplines, the minimum working years of experience, the experience in human rights, the prior experience in monitoring places of detention, the good reputation, the absence of a criminal record, being desirable). The experts will have different backgrounds necessary to fulfill the NPM mandate: lawyers, medical doctors, psychologists, psychiatrists, social workers and others.

The NPM personnel shall have such privileges and immunities as they are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions. Also, the State should not order, apply, permit or tolerate any sanction, reprisal or other disability to be suffered by any person or organisation for having communicated with the NPM or for having provided the NPM with any information, irrespective of its accuracy, and no such person or organisation should be prejudiced in any way.[63]

The experts will have to be independent in exercising their competences, appointed in office by the Ombudsman for a determinated mandate. Also, besides the permanent experts, short-term experts should be incorporated in the mechanism, which will participate to the visits when the permanent experts do not posess the necessary qualification, are not able to participate themselves or when it is more economical to engage in the visiting team a local short-term expert.

The experts will have the right to visit all places of detention as defined by OPCAT, will have access to all the buldings, facilities and installations of such venues. They will have the right to enter such place immediately. If they are prevented from entering the premises, the law must provide for a speedy procedure, permitting the experts to address to the superior authority and to inform the Subcommittee on Prevention. If the denial still persists, the NPM can take an action in court against the act of the authority by which the access of the visiting team is denied. The denial of acces can arise only in strictly limited situations, when there is a clear and immediate danger for the national safety, public health or there is a disaster risk.

The experts will have the right to make both announced and unannounced visits, planned or ad hoc. In planning the visits, experts will analyse the types of places of detention falling under its competence of the NPM, their number, the geographical disposal, the complaints received from the persons deprived of their liberty, prior reports of the mechanism, a certain vulnerability of some venues etc. The visiting team can, if the situation arises, take along interpreters, payed from its own budget.

[63] Guidelines on national preventive mechanisms, op. cit., para.27.

The visiting team will have the right to conduct private interviews with all persons, in particular with inmates. Also, the visited institutions are obliged to forward to the experts all the information or data requested.

The experts will draw up a report in short time, preferably 30 days or, as soon as possible, for urgent matters, when the situation requires immediate remedy, describing the visit and underlining any recommendations needed to be made. Of course, the administration responsible for the visited place can respond to the content of the report, stating their opinion. The state institution will have to respect and implement the reccommendations, the NPM having to engage in a close dialog with the stakeholders in order to ensure the proper implementation of these acts. A procedure is to be set up if a certain institution refuses to comply with the recommendations. If this situation arises, the NPM should have the possibility to address to the superior authorities, to inform about this fact the Subcommittee on Prevention and to make public the refusal.

Given the nature of its work, it is almost inevitable that a NPM will face challenges such as a reluctance within bureaucracies to change structures and practices, a lack of resources to implement recommendations etc., and sometimes negative public opinion.[64] In this sense, it is of paramount importance for the functioning of the NPM that its members will engage, open and sustain all channels of communication with the places of detention, superior authorities, non-guvernmental organizations and civil society as a whole, thus ensuring a permanent dialogue which will facilitate a rapid implementation of the recommendations.

Also, the NPM will adopt an annual activity report which will be published on the internet page of the institution and will be disseminated to all the stakeholders. The annual report will be communicated to the Subcommittee on Prevention as well.

Conclusions

With the implementation of Part IV of the Optional Protocol concerning the establishement of national preventive mechanisms a step forward will be taken in preserving the rights of the persons deprived of their liberty in order to prevent torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment.

The creation of national preventive mechanisms will aim to ensure a strong bond with all the relevant stakeholders, with the places of detention and with the civil society, as the mechanism has a preventive purpose.

As to the implementation of the OPCAT provisions in Romania, the optimal solution could be the enlargement of the competences of the Ombudsman, endorsed by open and extensive consultation with all the actors involved in order to assess the difficulties which the implementation poses, the shortcomings of such an endeavour, with a view to the understanding of the minimum pre-requisites for an effective functioning of such a national body, thus reaching a common position and ensuring the full respect of the Optional Protocol requirements, the Paris Principles and the Guidelines elaborated by the Subcommittee on Prevention.

References

1. Legislation
A. National Legislation

[64] Guidelines on national preventive mechanisms, op. cit., para.4.

- Law no. 35/1997 on the organisation and functioning of the Institution of the Advocate of the People.
- Government Decision no. 5/2002 regarding organisation and functioning of the Ombudsman office.
- Law no. 275/2006 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings.
- Government Decision no. 1897/2006 for the approval of the Regulation of application of the Law no. 275/2006 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings and other minister orders regarding the execution of prison penalties.
- Order no. 2003/C/2008 of the minister of justice on approving the Regulation for organization of the National Administration of Penitentiaries.
- Government Decision no. 11/2009 regarding organisation and functioning of the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection.
- Government Decision no. 652/2009 regarding organisation and functioning of the Ministry of Justice.
- Government Decision no. 1424/2009 regarding organisation and functioning of the National Centre for Mental Health.
- Order no. 47/2010 of the minister of foreign affairs regarding the entering into force of certain treaties.
- Government Decision no. 144/2010 regarding organisation and functioning of the Ministry of Health.
- Order no. 120/C/2011 of the minister of justice on approving the Regulation for organization of the Ministry of Justice.
- Order no. 118/2011 of the minister of administration and interior regarding the organization and execution of internal controls within the Ministry of Administration and Interior.

B. International Legislation and Documents Adopted by International Bodies

- Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, adopted in Rome on November 4, 1950, as amended by Protocol no. 11, together with Protocols no. 1, 4, 6, 7, 12 and 13, ratified by Romania through Law no. 30/1994.
- Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment was adopted on 10 December 1984, entered into force 26 June 1987 and was ratified by Romania through Law no. 19/1990.
- Principles relating to the Status of National Institutions (The Paris Principles) adopted on 20 December 1993.
- The Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment was adopted on 18 December 2002, entered into force on 22 June 2006 and was ratified by Romania through Law no. 109/2009.
- Guidelines on national preventive mechanisms adopted by the United Nations' Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment on 15–19 November 2010.

2. Doctrine. Treaties, courses, monographs, studies published in specialized magazines

- Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT) and the Inter-American Institute for Human Rights (IIHR), Optional Protocol to the UN Convention against Torture: Implementation Manual, revised edition, 2010.
- Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT) and the Center for Justice and International Law (CEJIL), Torture in International Law. A guide to jurisprudence, 2008.
- Ioan Muraru in Mihai Constantinescu, Antonie Iorgovan, Ioan Muraru, Elena Simina Tănăsescu, Constituţia României revizuită – comentarii şi explicaţii (Romanian Constitution revized – comments and explanations), All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004.
- Jean-Paul Céré, Le système pénitentiaire français in Les systèmes pénitentiaires dans le monde, sous la direction de Jean-Paul Céré, Carlos Eduardo A. Japiassù, 2nd edition, Dalloz Publishing House, Paris, 2011.
- Jim Murdoch, The treatment of prisoners. European standards, Council of Europe Publishing, Strasbourg, 2004.
- Moritz Birk, Ulrike Kirchgaesser, Julia Kozma, Final Report on the possible solutions for the establishment of a National Preventive Mechanism in Romania, 2010.

3. Papers presented at a meeting or conference

- Debra Long, Report on the current state of play and possible solutions to assist the process of designating or establishing a National Preventive Mechanism in Romania, Human Rights Implementation Centre, University of Bristol, 2011.

- Elina Steinerte, Institutions of Ombudspersons as National Preventive Mechanisms: Some Preliminary Observations, presentation at the Opening Plenary of the Conference OPCAT in the OSCE region: What it means and how to make it work?, held on 25-26 November 2008 in Prague, University of Bristol, 2009
- Filip Glotzmann and Petra Zdrazilova – Presentation on the National Preventive Mechanism in the Czech Republic, Conference OPCAT in the OSCE region: What it means and how to make it work?, held on 25-26 November 2008 in Prague.
- Manfred Nowak, Civil and political rights, including the questions of torture and detention. Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. Report of the Special Rapporteur on the question of torture, Manfred Nowak, 23 December 2005.
- Manfred Nowak, Interim report of the UN Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, 14 August 2006.
- Rachel Murray, Malcolm Evans, Elina Steinerte, Antenor Hallo de Wolf, Summary and Recommendations from the Conference OPCAT in the OSCE region: What it means and how to make it work?, held on 25-26 November 2008 in Prague, University of Bristol, 2009.

4. Documents in relation with the national prevention mechanisms

- Czech Republic. Act no. 349/1999 on the Public Defender of Rights.
- Czech Republic. Public Defender of Rights Report on Visits to Remand Prisons, April 2010.
- France. Law no. 2007-1545 of 30 October establishing a Contrôleur général des lieux de privation de liberté..
- France. Opinion of of the Contrôleur général des lieux de privation de liberté from 10 January 2011, published in the Official Journal of 23 January 2011, regarding the telephone use in places of detention.
- Germany. Administrative Order of 20 November 2008
- Germany. The State Treaty of 25 June 2009.
- Germany. Printed paper of the Bundestag No. 16/8249, commentary to Article 4 OPCAT, 2008.
- Germany. Committee against Torture, the Forty-seventh session, 31 October–25 November 2011, Consideration of reports submitted by States parties under article 19 of the Convention. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture. Germany, 2011
- Slovenia. Report on the National Preventive Mechanism under the Optional Protocol to the UN Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment on the year 2010.
- Poland. Act of 15 July 1987 on the Human Rights Defender (Ombudsman Act).
- Poland. The role of the National Preventive Mechanism and its activities in practice in Report of the Human Rights Defender on the activities of the National Preventive Mechanism in Poland in 2009, Warsaw, 2010.
- Poland. Report of the Human Rights Defender on the activities of the National Preventive Mechanism in Poland in 2010, Warsaw, 2011.

WAIVER OF PENALTY IN THE NEW PENAL CODE

VALENTIN-BOGDAN DĂNILĂ*

Abstract
This paper is an attempt to expose the novelty brought by the new Penal Code in relation to both prior criminal law and also with the international law. Thus, one of the most debated articles of the new Penal Code is "giving up penalty" - art. 80-82, which has no counter part in our international law. In this context, the "gain" of this new provision is challenged / contract due to the possible subjective nature of the courts. Relevant in this regard is the fact that deprivation of liberty in the prison environment is a special situation, with strong resonances in the living environment of the defendant, both during detention and afterwards released. Moreover, giving up penalty, is one of the measures individualizing sentences and also a way to deplete its possible negative influences subsumed to the rehabilitation process held in prisons, even with the efforts made by the administration of the detention. Specifically, the "waiver of penalty" intends to alert the authors of criminal deeds with reduced gravity on their obligations regarding future conduct.

Keywords: waiver of penalty, international law, penalty, criminal deeds, Penal Code

Conceptual

Based on European and world trends in criminal law, the changes to the Criminal Code with focus both on penalty legislative measures and the integration of offenders should be carefully considered.

This paper aims an exposing of the effects of novelty items wanting to be applied in the Romanian penal law by revealing its positive and negative trends.

Thus, to achieve this purpose was used a brief presentation of the concept of "penalty waiver" thus presenting the advantages and disadvantages by studying the theory and practice of applying alternatives to prison detention in countries abroad and in Romania.

Legislative developments, especially the Penal Code in force and the new Criminal Code adopted by Law nr.286/2009 emerged behind the research on alternatives to detention legislation in Romania.

Imprisonment in the penitentiary environment is a special situation , with strong resonances in its life environment , both during detention and afterwards released. Emotional frustration and information , lack of communication , eternal interest in personal and material always leaves no moral solutions to everyday problems.

Despite efforts by the administration of the detention , assist reorganizations often negative personal values and decreased responsiveness to rehabilitation process carried out in prison , motivated by the fact that the rules by which prisoners conduct their activities and interpersonal relationships sometimes betrayssystem of " nerves " lower reporting for better or worse in terms of personal, low morality[1].

In this context, a custodial sentence is a measure of state coercion - means the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to establish and enforce, through its competent organs, as guardian of the amounts recognized in the company , its reaction to the coercive committing the harmful act.

* Ph. D. candidate, „Mihai Viteazul" National Academy of Information(email: dănilă.valentin.bogdan@gmail.com).

[1] Mircea BORŞ, Efecte ale pedepselor privative de libertate asupra coeziunii familiei, www.edituratrinitas.ro.

Editing new European Prison Rules and requirements ever higher and burning of society have led to law 275 \ 2006 published in Official Gazette number 627 of July 20, 2006 and entered into force 90 days after publicatio .

We must not forget that deprivation of liberty , as a preventive measure or criminal penalty provided for by Law 275 of 2006 is a complex measure that raises a whole series of problems.

In addition to many personal issues of detainees extremely difficult, as are those of: isolation, waiving the normal way of life, temporary removal of the family and society, the reduction of certain rights, complying with a program of health problems , employment and other needs - the execution of the sentence and require considerable effort from the competent bodies of the state to provide observation, guidance and supervision throughout the period of detention.

Good to know

Criminal penalty is a measure of restraint - which suggested that punishment is a reaction to the coercive and binding deed of crime affecting the amounts recognized or accepted in society.

It is also a means of correction and rehabilitation - to sentence the change offender behavior , his belief in the future not to commit such acts , and the cultivation of respect for the values it protected by law .

According to Penal Code punishment goals are to restore social justice , correction and prevention convict committed by convicted , but also by others , the new offenses.

However , the exercise of sentenced persons shall not be limited only within the limits and conditions established by law and the Constitution.

Fundamental rights and freedoms of man and citizen is not only a reality but also an objective of all human activities , that of course the democratic and progressive. Hence due attention is given almost everywhere in today's world , theoretical and practical issues concerning human rights , fundamental freedoms and respect the protection of the human person.

The issue of human rights and fundamental freedoms and constitutional rights of citizens is regulated internally and is also subject to the rules of public international law.

The main international instruments on human rights with a universal character were adopted after the Second World War under the United Nations. These acts must permeate the entire building international legal human rights .They influence national legislation of the Member in this area , their provisions being international standards of human rights.

United Nations Charter was adopted in order to create conditions necessary to maintain international peace and security, justice and respect obligations under international treaties. In achieving these goals, reaffirms faith in fundamental human rights, the dignity and worth of human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small.

Noteworthy that the legal, defense and security system addressed by a national and also supranational perspective don't fit in the immutable, petrified and inflexible understanding paradigm. These values, denoted conceptual and in act, have an historic example, are undergoing processing, depending on the challenges which we must respond and expectations to be fulfilled.

Most research focused on the "penalty waiver" concept have addressed to it without analysing and presenting the need / opportunity for acquisition / integration in our legislation. Currently, the measure creates a series of disputes among the population, being interpreted as a "legal loophole" for a certain category of people. Against this background it is appropriate to provide a "full menu" of the new law.

Waiver of penalty is a measure of individualising the penalty as foreseen in art. 80-82, subsumed under section 3 of the new Criminal Code. Waiver of penalty represents the court's recognized right to permanently waive the establishment and enforcement of a sentence for a person found guilty of a crime, for pointing that, in view of the offense, the person and its conduct previously and after the commission of the offense, is sufficient to apply a warning because the establishment, implementation or enforcement of a sentence is likely to produce more harm than help the recovery of the defendant. Meanwhile, judges may defer to a sentence of less than two years imprisonment, or a fine.

Thus, conditional sentence consists in determining a sentence for a person found guilty of an offense and temporary postponement of its implementation when the specific penalty is a set fine or imprisonment not exceeding two years.

The court also will consider the convicted person and his prior offense attitude. However, the Criminal Code draft hasn't kept criteria for granting release which created differences between men and women or between offenders convicted for crimes committed with intent or negligence. The new Penal Code keeps into account, however, the conduct of the convict, if he made progress towards reintegration into society and if the court is convinced that no longer represents a social danger.

Waiver of penalty may be considered a form of forgiveness. It exists in German, French , English, or Chinese law.[2]

The German law:

The mechanism to waive a penalty allows the Court to forgo the imposition when the consequences of action taken when the author are not so severe, and the applying of a penalty wouldn't be appropriate, provided that the penalty doesn't exceed one year (Article 60 of the Criminal Code).

The French law:

In correctional or contraventional manners (without exception), the court, after declaring the accused guilty, and, where appropriate, the confiscation of dangerous or harmful objects (Article 132-58 of the Criminal Code)[3], may:

· Whether discharge penalty on the defendant

· Whether to postpone its decision

These measures (introduced in 1975) can be used regardless of the criminal record of the author and seriousness of the offense.

Exemption from punishment is granted where:

· It appears that defendant rehabilitation is underway

· The damage is repaired

· Problems resulting from the infringement ceased

Moreover, the penalty waive may be:

· Whether straightforward (in this case, we talk about a true "judicial pardon" there is no penalty but a simple declaration of guilt).

· Be subject (the judge imposes a trial delay. If the conditions are met according to the deadline, the exemption is pure and simple).

The postponement of sentence consists to fixing a series of criteria by the judge which the offender is forced to perform in a certain period of time.

After this period (one year after the decision to postpone), where conditions have been met (offender reclassification, termination issues, compensation), the judge will decide exemption from punishment, and otherwise, will apply punishment of the offender (unless it prefers to postpone again the judgment). The accused should be present at the meeting to postpone the punishment.

Are distinguished as follows:

· Simple postponement

· Delay in implementing the test

· Postponement of notes

[2] http://www.scj.ro/coduri.asp.

[3]http://www.legifrance.gouv.fr/affichCode.do;jsessionid=F7BB5224F210B3390CD7F35141F11A17.tpdjo16v_1?idSectionTA=LEGISCTA000006181749&cidTexte=LEGITEXT000006070719&dateTexte=20120130.

The court may defer the penalty,also by putting the defendant in a trial period not exceeding one year.

This is one of the innovations of the Criminal Code of 1992. His regime is determined by points 132-66 to 132-69. In cases provided by law (or regulations), the court seeking suspension of conviction may order the offender to comply with one or more requirements covered by these laws or regulations.

Deferred at order can only occur once and can be ordered even in absentia (132-68). During the suspention meeting, if the requirements were met within the time (one year after the decision to postpone), the court may relieve guilt or punishment, or impose the penalties provided by law or regulation. If the requirements have been implemented with delay, the judge disposes of penalty (if any) and decides penalties provided by law or regulation.

The British law:

Exemption from penalty may be granted:

• If the sentence is not fixed by law,

• and if the judge believes that a penalty would be inappropriate in terms of:

- Circumstances
- The nature of the offense
- Personality of the perpetrator

Sentencing judge may adjourn the proceedings to enable it to assess the behavior of the offender, whose guilt has been declared to determine punishment (ie, compensation for damages). Postponement may not exceed 6 months.

The soviet law

The "social danger" element played a key role in defining the offense. If it does not exist or have disappeared between the time of the offense and the trial date, an exemption from punishment is possible.

The chinese Law

Exemption may be granted only for minor offenses, provided the offender to demonstrate laudable behavior.

In case of exemption from punishment, the offender:

• may be penalized,

• may be required to make a statement of repentance,

• may be required to repair the damage.

It is also subject to administrative sanctions.

The Belgian law

Waiver of penalty was introduced in 2000 in the Belgian law by Article 21b of the Code of Criminal Procedure. However, it is not possible if reasonable time is exceeded when sentencing offenders. The judge may convict an offender with a minimum legal sentence or settle with a declaration of guilt.

How was the new article seen by the Romanians?

In Romania "Members of the Criminal Code Comission have failed, neither in the second day of debate, to decide about the article that allows the court to waive the penalty, some believing that in the originator's version, almost every criminal can escape.[4]"

In this regard, on the individualization of punishment, the court establishes the right to discharge, which consists in decisive renunciation to establish and implement a punishment for the offender, to the extent that it represents an offense with reduced seriousness, and in relation to an individual offender, the conduct previously to the offense, the efforts to eliminate or mitigate the consequences of crime, and his chances of referral, it is considered that the penalty would be inappropriate because of the consequences that would have on his person.

[4] http://www.mondonews.ro/Comisia-de-Cod-Penal-in-dezacord-fata-de-renuntarea-la-aplicarea-pedepsei+id-8295.html.

If a discharge of penalty is decided, the court will apply the offender a warning stating that it will not attract any disqualification, prohibition or incapacity for the offender. Waiver of penalty will not be operable if the deed is the legal punishment of imprisonment exceeding three years or if the offender was more willing to waive the penalty in the last two years preceding the date of the offense for which is judged.

How does the penalty discharge work?

Simply, by manifestating a judicial clemency. It can also sometimes speak about a judicial penalty discharge, but sanctions exceptions may apply in respect of a person only after the declaration of guilt.

Regarding the introduction of several new Criminal Code penalties alternative to imprisonment, this represents a new vision as a result of European regulatory sources, affirmation and implementation of these types of sentences in the Community measures have social and economic benefits resulting their strong application, but also because they meet the need of diversification penalties, enforcement and their individualized and more effective defense of society.

Waiver of penalty is one of the measures of individualization of punishment and is a court recognized the right to permanently abandon the establishment and enforcement of a sentence for a person found guilty of a crime, for resocialization that, given the gravity of the offense , the individual offender and conduct before and after consideration by the commission of the offense, is sufficient to apply a warning, because the establishment, implementation or enforcement of a sentence is considered inappropriate because of the consequences that would have on his person.

Giving reason to punishment in modern society is the existence of criminal acts that have a reduced gravity , which may be exempt from imposition of a sentence , is sufficient finding their offender warning about future conduct.

Waiver of penalty is only an expression of will of the court, the law setting conditions on the individual offender or the maximum penalty for that special can apply to art. 181 Penal Code. before taking into account only the actual degree of social danger, demonstrated by the manner and means of committing the offense, the purpose, the circumstances surrounding the crime committed, the result produced or which could have produced. We note that these criteria related to the seriousness of the offense were assessed by the court, to the concrete conditions established by law text, the art. 80 para. (2) Penal Code.

On the other hand the relationship between international and domestic law of a country of importance both theoretically and practically .Over time various theories have been developed on the relationship between international law and internal law of States.

They have adapted or changed policy and legislation based on the theory that they considered it as having won. All development doctrine is meant to answer some practical questions, indicating the behavior to be followed by state internally , the legal system and especially in the field of justice, and domestic, international relations changing[5].

How does it work?

As the name suggests, the penalty discharge consists in giving a person's permission not to serve his sentence. But to do this, a number of conditions must be met. First, one must be guilty.

Then, exemption from punishment may be imposed only for crimes or misdemeanors. It will be granted if three conditions are met. First, it is necessary to be granted the reclassification of the convicted person.

[5] Thomas Buergenthal şi Renate Weber, Dreptul internaţional al drepturilor omului, Editura ALL, 1996, pag.216.

It also requires that the damage is fully repaired and then, the disruption resulting from the offense to be stopped. Exemption from punishment will prevent the imposition of additional or complementary penalty. But is likely to be security measures.

Although these conditions are fulfilled, penalty waiver is not granted automatically. This measure favorable particularly to the convicted person it is not possible, however, than in correctional or administrative cases. Therefore it is not applicable in criminal cases.

This measure is more favorable because the judge can decide whether that sentence will not be mentioned in the criminal record. So, with maximum leniency from the judge, the defendant won't serve his sentence, nor have recorded convictions.

Being recognized as responsible, the offender that was discharged of punishment shall bear court costs. And this exemption of judicial punishment is, of course, different from the exemption from punishment, which is legal in nature. So, not created confusion: Waiving penalty is a judicial act, while the exemption from punishment is prescribed by law.

Three examples of application of the statutory provision in question even in the realm of France:

Case Study 1

Michaël Youn (French comedian) was sentenced by the Paris court for insultind and assaulting two police officers, but was not disciplined. A decision "satisfactory" in accordance with the words of his lawyer, Marc-Henri Debusschere[6]. The prosecutor requested a suspended sentence of imprisonment for six months and fined 2,000 euros against the actor.

Alliance (the second union of peacekeeping forces), said in a statement that it "can not be stunned by this decision." "Regarding the attacks against police officers, there is only one answer: the application of the law," he adds. "Every citizen should be subject to the same rules and it seems unbearable to see there are different rules depending on social status," said the union.

Case Study 2

A man of 31 years suffering from multiple sclerosis, which cultivated cannabis at home to relieve pain, was sentenced, but released from punishment by the criminal court in Strasbourg, urging prosecution itself "kind law enforcement ."" In this case, we need to show the humanity, "even if the offense is serious, said the criminal investigation, Gilles Delorme[7].

The young man, who moves with difficulty due to illness, said that he was surprised by the "unexpected". decision. "I thought I would be given a suspended sentence, or at least a fine, although I have no money," he told AFP. The accused was arrested in June 2011 and placed for 24 hours in police custody after being terminated because of cannabis leaves, from his personal plantation, were visible from the street.

He explained so it cultivated inside his home since 2004, forty plants whose flowers are consumed in the form of cakes. "If I could, I would miss it: it is necessary to hide the taste of cannabis to be better Honey" "I tried to limit intake, otherwise my body gets used and reduce the analgesic effect," said him.

During the meeting, he presented a certificate issued by a Swiss physician attesting to consumption of cannabis to alleviate pain and improve motility. For his lawyer, Francis Trapp, "The therapeutic aspect was clear," which led the court to take "an exceptional decision."

Case Study 3

Magistrates Court in Charleville-Mezieres took recently a decision noticed to press due to the unusual. A man aged 45 years was arrested for DWI (EAEC), characterized by the presence in exhaled air of about 1 mg of alcohol per liter.[8] Prosecuted for driving under the influence of alcohol and abuse of police agent (acts punishable by imprisonment even without the existence of injury), he faces up to three years in prison, three years license suspension and a fine of € 45,000.

[6] http://next.liberation.fr/cinema/01012327043-michael-youn-coupable-mais-dispense-de-peine.

[7] http://www.leparisien.fr/strasbourg-67000/il-cultivait-du-cannabis-therapeutique-dispense-de-peine-03-10-2011-1637764.php.

At trial, the defense raised that argument in defense that the defendant was held the degreading detention conditions, calling on the court, because it has the necessary powers (under Article 456 of the Criminal Procedure Code), to go and see what occurs.

And the court has not questioned the words. It estimated that the defendant suffered a "traumatic experience" and "has already paid dearly (..) crimes are not at a level of serious crime." "If cells are kept in custody where the poor are outrageous, if those indicted are retained here for long periods without being provided with minimal personal hygiene (...), it clearly and objectively, and unworthy degrading treatment ". Accordingly, the court issued an exemption from punishment.

Material conditions of detention, as terrible, were included. They can not serve as legal basis for waiving the penalty.

Consequences to be drawn from this is more radical: inhuman, degrading and unworthy are forbidden in France and throughout Europe (section 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights). This prohibition applies primarily by the state: the sovereignty and dignity.

But in this case, the court requires that the person in breach to be harmed regarding freedom (jail), rights (prohibition of driving), assets (fine and costs), for violations. But for this, the state itself violated the law that it also approved. He promised in November 1950 that no person shall be subject to inhuman and degrading treatment, and 60 years later, continues to do so yet. It requires that any violators are punished, and requires that it be applied that maxim to himself.

In our case, the legal punishment of offenders is illegal. So, the criminal convictions would be illegal. The judge must refuse. Specifically through a cancellation procedure. The difference is real: no declaration of guilt, free of charge (€ 90), no mention of criminal record, and in particular no loss of penalty points (6 points in this case).

Conclusions

Detention means the loss of many basic human rights, including the loss of free movement, loss of right to enjoy family, social relationships limit the disqualification to work for themselves or run a business.

We can also mention limiting personal privacy, passing through many humiliating experiences such as intimate body search and imposing other people urinating in front of the test drugs, violence and loss of self respect. And many years before the effects of detention will be felt by social stigma that will limit access in many areas of labor market and will create difficulties in obtaining credit or insurance.

Detention is a serious punishment by social exclusion and clearly marks the distinction between those convicted and others. Inmates often feel offended that they were imprisoned or feel they have been treated too harshly than others. And they spend all day acompaniaşi other condemned colleagues who have similar feelings. They begin to believe they were wronged and tend to forget those who suffered because of their criminal acts.

The relationship between victim and criminal justice underlying concept of reintegration , but unfortunately prisons creates an environment where victims tend to be forgotten .The third factor underlying the RPP suggests that the prison should promote a policy that would contribute to the awareness of crime is criminals effects on those involved.

[8] http://www.maitre-eolas.fr/post/2010/02/18/Un-homme-dispens%C3%A9-de-peine-en-raison-des-conditions-indignes-de-sa-garde-%C3%A0-vue.

However, conditions of detention that violate human rights can not be justified by lack of resources. This lack of resources was and remains the biggest problem facing the whole of Romania, not only the prison system struggling with a lack of material resources. Lack of resources is the main reason that invokes when authorities asked the weaknesses in the system. Thus such a provision would be completely incompatible with the reality of prisons.

It can be said that the law 275/2006 contains provisions that are found in most European prison systems of industrialized countries , having many things to complain , there will be no need for urgent proposals.

The notion of right and wrong, virtue and vice, command and permission, merit and guilt, praise and reproach, remorse and moral satisfaction and assume responsibility proportions require action or free will. If man is not free laws and regulations, advice, prayers and supplications, rewards and punishments have no purpose. These terms do not necessarily imply freedom as check and certainly where there is no freedom as we throw in jail the prisoner.

Freedom is constrained by concession fight for freedom .Not restrict freedom but amplification is the most direct route to solving human problems.

Basic issues of deprivation of liberty and freedom as a human condition which provokes strictly necessary other issues of punishment, intimidation , rehabilitation , factors facilitated the emergence of all of detention. Prison itself is the biggest issue basically whereas there was a lot of problems.

It is not known whether imprisonment is an effective remedy in the treatment of crime. Support and pressure for performance and change comes from many directions: from the government which must meet international standards, from the public wanting information on the safety of prison and quality of recovery activities to be performed with detainees from some stakeholders in collaboration with prisons that human rights non-governmental organizations, with universities and scientific research, with all those interested in the issue of prison global social, psychological, educational, moral and legal.

Finally, why should the court defer pronunciation of the sentence after the other organs of state have documented the defendant or the offense?

References

- http://www.scj.ro/coduri.asp
- http://www.adminet.com/code/CPENALLL-132-58.html
- http://www.legifrance.gouv.fr/affichCode.do;jsessionid=F7BB5224F210B3390CD7F35141F11A17.tpdjo16v_1?idSectionTA=LEGISCTA000006181749&cidTexte=LEGITEXT000006070719&dateTexte=20120130
- http://ledroitcriminel.free.fr/dictionnaire/lettre_a/lettre_a_ai.htm
- http://pythacli.chez-alice.fr/chronoliberticide.htm
- http://combatsdroitshomme.blog.lemonde.fr/2011/11/11/delit-de-solidarite-entre-occasion-et-acte-manque-une-decision-europeenne-a-la-coherence-douteuse-cedh-5e-sect-10-novembre-2011-mallah-c-france/
- http://droit.kazeo.com/cours-de-droit-penal/cours-de-droit-penal,r170395.html
- http://www.commentfaiton.com/fiche/voir/27293/comment-fonctionne-les-dispenses-de-peines
- http://next.liberation.fr/cinema/01012327043-michael-youn-coupable-mais-dispense-de-peine
- http://www.leparisien.fr/strasbourg-67000/il-cultivait-du-cannabis-therapeutique-dispense-de-peine-03-10-2011-1637764.php
- http://www.maitre-eolas.fr/post/2010/02/18/Un-homme-dispens%C3%A9-de-peine-en-raison-des-conditions-indignes-de-sa-garde-%C3%A0-vue
- http://www.liberation.fr/societe/0101618949-un-homme-dispense-de-peine-en-raison-des-conditions-degradantes-de-sa-garde-a-vue.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF EU (CRIMINAL) LAW: LEGALITY, EQUALITY, NON-DISCRIMINATION, SPECIALTY AND NE BIS IN IDEM IN THE FIELD OF THE EUROPEAN ARREST WARRANT

NOREL NEAGU[♣]

Abstract
This article deals with the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union in the field of the European arrest warrant, critically analysing the principles invoked in several decisions validating the European legislation in the field: legality, equality and non-discrimination, specialty, ne bis in idem. The author concludes that an area of freedom, security and justice could be built on these principles, but further harmonisation of legislation needs to be realised to avoid a "journey to the unknown" for European citizens in respect to legislation of other member states of the EU.

1. Introduction

In the EU context, there are a certain number of principles which permeate the system as a whole and with which any individual piece of legislation needs to be in conformity. Some of these principles are formally higher law in that they are explicit in the treaties (such as the principle of non-discrimination on grounds of nationality). Others can only indirectly be linked to the treaties and are rather explicable on the grounds that no European judge could imagine giving effect to a legal system which does not respect them (the so called 'general principles of EU law').[1]

The European arrest warrant is a judicial decision issued by a Member State with a view to the arrest and surrender by another Member State of a requested person, for the purposes of conducting a criminal prosecution or executing a custodial sentence or detention order. The European arrest warrant is based on the implementation by the Member States of the principle of mutual recognition.[2] This principle was recognised by the Tampere European Council as the "cornerstone of judicial cooperation in both civil and criminal matters". It entails quasi-automatic recognition and execution of judicial decisions among Member States, as if the executing judicial authority was implementing a national judicial order.

Mutual recognition is a guiding principle in the field of the European arrest warrant, but it is not the only principle governing this field. Several other principles were taken into account when analysing the legislation and its practical implementation in the Member States. In the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union (hereinafter ECJ), particular attention was given to legality, equality and non-discrimination, specialty, as well as the ne bis in idem principle and to compliance of the legislation in this field with these principles.

[♣] Researcher, Centre for Legal, Economic and Socio-Administrative Studies, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania. This paper is part of a broader research activity which is carried out under the CNCSIS PN II Contract no.27/2010.

[1] Maria Fletcher, Robin Loof, Bill Gilmore, EU Criminal Law and Justice, Edward Elgar Publishing Limited (2008), p. 13.

[2] Annachiara Atti, La decisione quadro 2002/584/GAI sul mandato d'arresto europeo: la Corte di giustizia "disolve" I dubbi sulla doppia incriminazione, Dirrito pubblico comparato ed europeo (2007), n.3, p.114.

2. The Legality Principle

According to Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision,[3] double-criminality should not be verified for a list of 32 serious offences, when those offences are punished in the issuing State by a custodial sentence or a detention order for a maximum period of at least three years. Since each of those offences have not been defined in the Framework Decision and since the wording adopted for them can be considered quite vague (e.g. "computer-related crime"), Member States may have adopted different definitions in their legal systems.[4]

These provisions triggered a complaint before the ECJ for lack of compliance of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant with the legality principle.[5] According to the complainant, the list of more than 30 offences in respect of which the traditional condition of double criminality is henceforth abandoned is so vague and imprecise that it breaches, or at the very least is capable of breaching, the principle of legality in criminal matters. The offences set out in that list are not accompanied by their legal definition but constitute very vaguely defined categories of undesirable conduct. A person deprived of his liberty on foot of a European arrest warrant without verification of double criminality does not benefit from the guarantee that criminal legislation must satisfy conditions as to precision, clarity and predictability allowing each person to know, at the time when an act is committed, whether that act does or does not constitute an offence, by contrast to those who are deprived of their liberty otherwise than pursuant to a European arrest warrant.

The ECJ dismissed the complaint in succinct argumentation, which is presented in the following paragraphs.

The ECJ stated that the Union is founded on the principle of the rule of law and it respects fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, signed in Rome on 4 November 1950, and as they result from the constitutional provisions common to the Member States, as general principles of Community law. It follows that the institutions are subject to review of the conformity of their acts with the Treaties and the general principles of law, just like the Member States when they implement the law of the Union[6]. It is common ground that those principles include the principle of the legality of criminal offences and penalties and the principle of equality and non-discrimination, which are also reaffirmed respectively in Articles 49, 20 and 21 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[7].

The principle of the legality of criminal offences and penalties (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege), which is one of the general legal principles underlying the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, has also been enshrined in various international treaties, in particular in Article 7(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.[8] This principle implies that legislation must define clearly offences and the penalties which they attract.

---

[3] Council Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, published in JO L 190 from 18 July 2002, p. 1-20.

[4] For a thorough analysis of the double-criminality rule, see Stefano Manacorda, L'exception a la double incrimination dans le mandate d'arrêt européen et le principe légalité, Cahiers de droit européen (2007), vol.43, n.1/2, p.149-177.

[5] Case C-303/05 Advocaten voor de Wereld [2007] ECR I-3633.

[6] See, inter alia, Case C-354/04 P Gestoras Pro Amnistía and Others v Council [2007] ECR I-5179, paragraph 51, and Case C-355/04 P Segi and Others v Council [2007] ECR I-6157, paragraph 51.

[7] Proclaimed in Nice on 7 December 2000 (OJ 2000 C 364, p. 1).

[8] See in this regard, inter alia, Joined Cases C-74/95 and C-129/95 X [1996] ECR I-6609, paragraph 25, and Joined Cases C-189/02 P, C-202/02 P, C-205/02 P to C-208/02 P and C-213/02 P Dansk Rørindustri and Others v Commission [2005] ECR I-5425, paragraphs 215 to 219.

That condition is met in the case where the individual concerned is in a position, on the basis of the wording of the relevant provision and with the help of the interpretative assistance given by the courts, to know which acts or omissions will make him criminally liable.[9]

In accordance with Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision, the offences listed in that provision give rise to surrender pursuant to a European arrest warrant, without verification of the double criminality of the act, 'if they are punishable in the issuing Member State by a custodial sentence or a detention order for a maximum period of at least three years and as they are defined by the law of the issuing Member State'. Consequently, even if the Member States reproduce word-for-word the list of the categories of offences set out in Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision for the purposes of its implementation, the actual definition of those offences and the penalties applicable are those which follow from the law of 'the issuing Member State'.

The Framework Decision does not seek to harmonise the criminal offences in question in respect of their constituent elements or of the penalties which they attract. Accordingly, while Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision dispenses with verification of double criminality for the categories of offences mentioned therein, the definition of those offences and of the penalties applicable continue to be matters determined by the law of the issuing Member State, which, as is, moreover, stated in Article 1(3) of the Framework Decision, must respect fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles as enshrined in the Treaties, and, consequently, the principle of the legality of criminal offences and penalties. It follows that, in so far as it dispenses with verification of the requirement of double criminality in respect of the offences listed in that provision, Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision is not invalid on the ground that it infringes the principle of the legality of criminal offences and penalties.[10]

I cannot prevent myself to notice that the ECJ transferred the legality issue from European to national level based on two presumptions: firstly, that there is no harmonisation obligation for the European institutions in respect to the European arrest warrant, and secondly, that Member States must respect fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles as enshrined in the Treaties. While this argumentation is solving the problem of judicial co-operation in criminal matters and preserves the legality of the legislation on the European arrest warrant, it does not solve the problem of the European citizens,[11] which should benefit from an Area of Freedom, Security and Justice where they are able to move freely, but with 27 different set of legislation in the field of Criminal law, each legislation with its own definitions in respect to offences which can give rise to an European arrest warrant. That is a real journey to the unknown, as citizens in other Member States are not in the position to know how other national systems have developed.[12]

So, at least one aspect of the legality principle (lex certa), was not addressed or solved by the ECJ and can be solved only through harmonisation of legislation. In order for citizens to know the exact requirements of criminal offences in a field which can give rise to surrender on the basis of a European arrest warrant, harmonisation of legislation is needed if the double-criminality rule is waived for a certain category of offences.

3. The Principle of Equality and Non-discrimination

In the same case mentioned above, the complainant argued that the principle of equality and non-discrimination is infringed by the Framework Decision inasmuch as, for offences other than

[9] See, inter alia, European Court of Human Rights judgment of 22 June 2000 in Coëme and Others v Belgium, Reports 2000-VII, § 145.

[10] Advocaten voor de Wereld, supra, note 5, paragraphs 44-54.

[11] For a somewhat different opinion, see Nial Fennelly, The European Arrest Warrant: Recent Developments, ERA-Forum: scripta iuris europaei (2007), vol.8, n.4, p.534.

[12] Valsamis Mitsilegas, EU Criminal Law, Hart Publishing (2009), p. 124.

those covered by Article 2(2) thereof, surrender may be made subject to the condition that the facts in respect of which the European arrest warrant was issued constitute an offence under the law of the Member State of execution. That is, for certain categories of offences listed in Article 2(2) the double-criminality rule is waived, while for all other criminal offences there is a condition that the conduct must be incriminated in both Member States. That distinction, according to the complainant, is not objectively justified. The removal of verification of double criminality is all the more open to question as no detailed definition of the facts in respect of which surrender is requested features in the Framework Decision. The system established by the latter gives rise to an unjustified difference in treatment between individuals depending on whether the facts alleged to constitute the offence occurred in the Member State of execution or outside that State. Those individuals will thus be judged differently with regard to the deprivation of their liberty without any justification for that difference.

In response, the ECJ emphasised that the principle of equality and non-discrimination requires that comparable situations must not be treated differently and that different situations must not be treated in the same way unless such treatment is objectively justified.[13]

With regard, first, to the choice of the 32 categories of offences listed in Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision, the Council was able to form the view, on the basis of the principle of mutual recognition and in the light of the high degree of trust and solidarity between the Member States, that, whether by reason of their inherent nature or by reason of the punishment incurred of a maximum of at least three years, the categories of offences in question feature among those the seriousness of which in terms of adversely affecting public order and public safety justifies dispensing with the verification of double criminality. Consequently, even if one were to assume that the situation of persons suspected of having committed offences featuring on the list set out in Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision or convicted of having committed such offences is comparable to the situation of persons suspected of having committed, or convicted of having committed, offences other than those listed in that provision, the distinction is, in any event, objectively justified.

With regard, second, to the fact that the lack of precision in the definition of the categories of offences in question risks giving rise to disparate implementation of the Framework Decision within the various national legal orders, suffice it to point out that it is not the objective of the Framework Decision to harmonise the substantive criminal law of the Member States and that nothing in the Treaties which were indicated as forming the legal basis of the Framework Decision, makes the application of the European arrest warrant conditional on harmonisation of the criminal laws of the Member States within the area of the offences in question.[14]

The Court concluded that, in so far as it dispenses with verification of double criminality in respect of the offences listed therein, Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision is not invalid inasmuch as it does not breach the principle of equality and non-discrimination.[15]

I tend to agree with the Court's reasoning as regards the objectively justified difference between the categories of offences for which double-criminality is not required and other categories of offences, where this condition is imposed for surrender of the requested person. The offences provided for in Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision are serious ones and there is no national legislative system in the European Union which does not incriminate every category as a criminal offence. However, even if there is no obligation of harmonisation in respect to those offences, different rules in different Member States can lead to different treatment of comparable situations and consequently a breach of the non-discrimination principle. That is why, even if not mandatory,

---

[13] See, in particular, Case C-248/04 Koninklijke Coöperatie Cosun [2006] ECR I- 10211, paragraph 72 and the case-law there cited.

[14] See by way of analogy, inter alia, Joined Cases C-187/01 and C-385/01 Gözütok and Brügge [2003] ECR I-1345, paragraph 32, and Case C-467/04 Gasparini and Others [2006] ECR I-9199, paragraph 29.

[15] Advocaten voor de Wereld, supra, note 5, paragraphs 55-60.

harmonisation of legislation in this field must occur in order to comply with fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles as enshrined in the Treaties.

4. The Specialty Principle

Article 27(2) of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant lays down the specialty rule, according to which a person who has been surrendered may not be prosecuted, sentenced or otherwise deprived of liberty for an offence committed prior to his or her surrender other than that for which he or she was surrendered. That rule is linked to the sovereignty of the executing Member State and confers on the person requested the right not to be prosecuted, sentenced or otherwise deprived of liberty except for the offence for which he or she was surrendered. The Member States may waive the application of the specialty rule, which is subject, moreover, to a number of exceptions, laid down in Article 27(3).

In this context, a case was brought before the ECJ where, in the main proceedings, the indictment relates to the importation of hashish whereas the arrest warrants refer to the importation of amphetamines. However, the offence concerned is still punishable by imprisonment for a maximum period of at least three years and comes under the rubric 'illegal trafficking in narcotic drugs' in Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision.[16]

By its first question, the referring court asks, essentially, what the decisive criteria are which would enable it to determine whether the person surrendered is being prosecuted for an 'offence other' than that for which he was surrendered within the meaning of Article 27(2) of the Framework Decision, making it necessary to apply the consent procedure laid down in Article 27(3)(g) and 27(4).

The ECJ answered that in order to decide on surrender of the person requested for the purposes of prosecution of an offence defined by the national law applicable in the issuing Member State, the judicial authority of the executing Member State, acting on the basis of Article 2 of the Framework Decision, will examine the description of the offence in the European arrest warrant. That description must contain information on the nature and legal classification of the offence, a description of the circumstances in which the offence was committed, including the time, place and degree of participation in the offence by the requested person, and the prescribed scale of penalties for the offence. The surrender request is based on information which reflects the state of investigations at the time of issue of the European arrest warrant. It is therefore possible that, in the course of the proceedings, the description of the offence no longer corresponds in all respects to the original description. The evidence which has been gathered can lead to a clarification or even a modification of the constituent elements of the offence which initially justified the issue of the European arrest warrant.

In order to assess, in the light of the consent requirement, whether it is possible to infer from a procedural document an 'offence other' than that referred to in the European arrest warrant, the description of the offence in the European arrest warrant must be compared with that in the later procedural document. To require the consent of the executing Member State for every modification of the description of the offence would go beyond what is implied by the specialty rule and interfere with the objective of speeding up and simplifying judicial cooperation of the kind referred to in the Framework Decision between the Member States.

In order to establish whether what is at issue is an 'offence other' than that for which the person was surrendered, it is necessary to ascertain whether the constituent elements of the offence, according to the legal description given by the issuing State, are those for which the person was surrendered and whether there is a sufficient correspondence between the information given in the arrest warrant and that contained in the later procedural document.

[16] Case C-388/08 PPU Leymann and Pustovarov [2008] ECR I-8983.

Modifications concerning the time or place of the offence are allowed, in so far as they derive from evidence gathered in the course of the proceedings conducted in the issuing State concerning the conduct described in the arrest warrant, do not alter the nature of the offence and do not lead to grounds for non-execution under Articles 3 and 4 of the Framework Decision.[17]

By its second question, the referring court asks essentially whether a modification of the description of the offence, concerning only the kind of narcotics in question and not changing the legal classification of the offence, is such as to define an 'offence other' than that for which the person was surrendered. The ECJ answered that a modification of the description of the offence concerning the kind of narcotics concerned is not such, of itself, as to define an 'offence other' than that for which the person was surrendered within the meaning of Article 27(2) of the Framework Decision.

By its third question, the referring court asks, essentially, how the exception to the specialty rule in Article 27(3)(c) of the Framework Decision must be interpreted, taking into account the consent procedure laid down in Article 27(4) of the Framework Decision. It asks in particular whether those provisions permit a person to be prosecuted and sentenced for an 'offence other' than that for which he was surrendered, requiring the consent of the executing Member State, before that consent has been received, in so far as his liberty is not restricted. It also asks whether the fact that the person concerned is, in addition, detained on the basis of other charges providing a lawful basis for his detention affects the possibility of prosecuting and sentencing him for that 'other offence'.

The Court answered that if the proceedings result in the finding that there has been an 'offence other' than that for which the person was surrendered, that offence cannot be prosecuted without consent having been obtained, unless the exceptions provided for in Article 27(3)(a) to (f) of the Framework Decision apply. The exception in Article 27(3)(c) of the Framework Decision concerns a situation in which the criminal proceedings do not give rise to the application of a measure restricting personal liberty. It follows that, in the case of that exception, a person can be prosecuted and sentenced for an 'offence other' than that for which he was surrendered, which gives rise to a penalty or measure involving the deprivation of liberty, without recourse being necessary to the consent procedure, provided that no measure restricting liberty is applied during the criminal proceedings. If however, after judgment has been given, that person is sentenced to a penalty or a measure restricting liberty, consent is required in order to enable that penalty to be executed. Article 27(3)(c) of the Framework Decision does not, however, preclude a measure restricting liberty from being imposed on the person surrendered before consent has been obtained, where that restriction is lawful on the basis of other charges which appear in the European arrest warrant.[18]

5. The 'Ne Bis in Idem' Principle

The 'ne bis in idem' principle raises a lot of questions as regards judicial co-operation in criminal matters in the European Union. I do not intend to present here an extended overview of the principle, as this has been done elsewhere.[19] I will analyse here only one case of significance for the European arrest warrant, which establishes the connection between the 'ne bis in idem' principle contained in the Framework Decision and the same principle provided for in the Convention implementing the Schengen Agreements (hereinafter CISA).[20]

---

[17] Leymann and Pustovarov, supra, note 16, paragraphs 41-59.

[18] See Leymann and Pustovarov, supra, note 16, paragraphs 64-75.

[19] Norel Neagu, The "ne bis in idem" principle in the case-law of the European Court of Justice (I). The 'idem' issue, Lex Et Scientia 2011, vol.XVIII, n.2, p.34-54. for an extended analysis of the 'ne bis in idem' principle, see Bas van Bockel, The Ne Bis in Idem Principle in EU Law, Kluwer Law International (2010).

[20] The Schengen acquis comprises all the acts which were adopted in the framework of the Schengen cooperation till the incorporation of the rules governing the Schengen cooperation into the EU framework by the Treaty of Amsterdam. Accordingly, it is composed of: (1) the Schengen Agreement, signed on 14 June 1985, between

The 'ne bis in idem' principle constitutes a ground for mandatory refusal of the European arrest warrant. According to Article 3(2) of the Framework Decision, the judicial authority of the Member State of execution (hereinafter "executing judicial authority") shall refuse to execute the European arrest warrant if the executing judicial authority is informed that the requested person has been finally judged by a Member State in respect of the same acts provided that, where there has been sentence, the sentence has been served or is currently being served or may no longer be executed under the law of the sentencing Member State.

In the case raised before the ECJ concerning the 'ne bis in idem' principle in the framework of the European arrest warrant, the referring court seeks to ascertain, in substance, whether the concept of the 'same acts' in Article 3(2) is an autonomous concept of European Union law, or if that concept were to be analysed only in the light of the law of the issuing Member State or of that of the executing Member State.[21].

Were the notion of 'same acts' in Article 3(2) of the Framework Decision to be regarded as an autonomous concept of European Union law, the referring court asks by its second question whether, contrary to German and Italian law as interpreted by the supreme courts of those Member States, that provision of the Framework Decision would require – in order for criminal proceedings to be instituted against a person on the basis of an indictment broader than that in respect of which final judgment has already been given concerning an individual act – the investigators to have been unaware, when the charges which led to that final judgment were first laid, of the existence of other individual offences and of an offence relating to participation in a criminal organisation, which was specifically not the case so far as the investigating authorities in Italy were concerned.

The ECJ answered that the principle of mutual recognition, which underpins the Framework Decision, means that, in accordance with Article 1(2) of the Framework Decision, the Member States are in principle obliged to act upon a European arrest warrant.[22] The Member States may refuse to execute such a warrant only in the cases of mandatory non-execution laid down in Article 3 of the Framework Decision or in the cases listed in Article 4 thereof.[23]

Belgium, France, Germany, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands on the gradual abolition of checks at their common borders; (2) the Schengen Convention, signed on 19 June 1990, between Belgium, France, Germany, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands, implementing the 1985 Agreement (CISA) with related Final Acts and declarations; (3) the Accession Protocols and Agreements to the 1985 Agreement and the 1990 implementing Convention with Italy (signed in Paris on 27 November 1990), Spain and Portugal (signed in Bonn on 25 June 1991), Greece (signed in Madrid on 6 November 1992), Austria (signed in Brussels on 28 April 1995) as well as Denmark, Finland and Sweden (signed in Luxembourg on 19 December 1996), with related Final Acts and declarations; (4) decisions and declarations of the Schengen Executive Committee which was the administrative body of the Schengen cooperation and generally mandated by the CISA "to ensure that this Convention [CISA] is implemented correctly"; (5) further implementing acts and decisions taken by subgroups to which respective powers were conferred by the Executive Committee. The latter two Paragraphs regarding the Schengen acquis refer to further decisions and declarations, which were made in order to implement the 1990 Implementing Convention itself. The Schengen acquis was published in the Official Journal L 239 of 22 September 2000. In order to reconcile the overlap between the Schengen cooperation and Justice and Home Affairs cooperation as introduced by the 1992 Maastricht Treaty, the Member States decided to integrate the Schengen acquis into the legal framework of the European Union. This was achieved in 1997 by means of a Protocol attached to the Treaty of Amsterdam. The Council allocated each provision or measure taken to date under the Schengen cooperation to the corresponding legal basis in the EC Treaty and EU Treaty as amended by the Treaty of Amsterdam (COUNCIL DECISION of 20 May 1999 determining, in conformity with the relevant provisions of the Treaty establishing the European Community and the Treaty on European Union, the legal basis for each of the provisions or decisions which constitute the Schengen acquis, 1999/436/EC, L 176/17, 10.7.1999). As a further result of the incorporation, the Schengen acquis is binding on and applicable in the new Member States from the date of accession onwards (Article 3 Act of Accession, OJ L 236 of 23 September 2003, p. 33).

[21] Case 261/09 Mantello ECR [2010] I-0000.

[22] Leymann and Pustovarov, supra, note 16, paragraph 51.

[23] See, to that effect, Leymann and Pustarov, supra, note 16, paragraph 51.

In that regard, the concept of 'same acts' in Article 3(2) of the Framework Decision cannot be left to the discretion of the judicial authorities of each Member State on the basis of their national law. It follows from the need for uniform application of European Union law that, since that provision makes no reference to the law of the Member States with regard to that concept, the latter must be given an autonomous and uniform interpretation throughout the European Union.[24]

It is therefore an autonomous concept of European Union law which, as such, may be the subject of a reference for a preliminary ruling by any court before which a relevant action has been brought, under the conditions laid down in Title VII of Protocol No 36 to the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union on transitional provisions. The concept of the 'same acts' also appears in Article 54 of the CISA. In that context, the concept has been interpreted as referring only to the nature of the acts, encompassing a set of concrete circumstances which are inextricably linked together, irrespective of the legal classification given to them or the legal interest protected.[25]

In view of the shared objective of Article 54 of the CISA and Article 3(2) of the Framework Decision, which is to ensure that a person is not prosecuted or tried more than once in respect of the same acts, it must be accepted that an interpretation of that concept given in the context of the CISA is equally valid for the purposes of the Framework Decision (emphasis added).

Where it is brought to the attention of the executing judicial authority that the 'same acts' as those which are referred to in the European arrest warrant which is the subject of proceedings before it have been the subject of a final judgment in another Member State, that authority must, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Framework Decision, refuse to execute that arrest warrant, provided that, where there has been sentence, the sentence has been served or is currently being served or may no longer be executed under the law of the sentencing Member State.

Taking all the foregoing considerations into account, the answer to be given to the referring court is that, for the purposes of the issue and execution of a European arrest warrant, the concept of 'same acts' in Article 3(2) of the Framework Decision constitutes an autonomous concept of European Union law. In circumstances such as those at issue in the main proceedings where, in response to a request for information within the meaning of Article 15(2) of that Framework Decision made by the executing judicial authority, the issuing judicial authority, applying its national law and in compliance with the requirements deriving from the concept of 'same acts' as enshrined in Article 3(2) of the Framework Decision, expressly stated that the earlier judgment delivered under its legal system did not constitute a final judgment covering the acts referred to in the arrest warrant issued by it and therefore did not preclude the criminal proceedings referred to in that arrest warrant, the executing judicial authority has no reason to apply, in connection with such a judgment, the ground for mandatory non-execution provided for in Article 3(2) of the Framework Decision.[26]

6. Conclusion

Further clarification was given by the ECJ when analysing case law in the field of European arrest warrant in the light of principles of EU (criminal) law. One of the most important decisions of the ECJ related to uniform interpretation of the 'ne bis in idem' principle in the fields of CISA and European arrest warrant, bringing into the area of the latter all the case law relevant to the former. However, further harmonisation is needed in the field of criminal offences giving rise to a European arrest warrant in order to fully comply with the principles of legality, equality and non-discrimination.

---

[24] See, by analogy, Case C-66/08 Koszlowski [2008] ECR I-6041, paragraphs 41 and 42.

[25] See Case C-436/04 Van Esbroeck [2006] ECR I-2333, paragraphs 27, 32 and 36, and Case C-150/05 Van Straaten [2006] ECR I-9327, paragraphs 41, 47 and 48.

[26] Mantello, supra, note 21, paragraphs 33-51.

References

- Annachiara Atti, La decisione quadro 2002/584/GAI sul mandato d'arresto europeo: la Corte di giustizia "disolve"I dubbi sulla doppia incriminazione, Dirrito pubblico comparato ed europeo (2007), n.3
- Bas van Bockel, The Ne Bis in Idem Principle in EU Law, Kluwer Law International (2010)
- Nial Fennelly, The European Arrest Warrant: Recent Developments, ERA-Forum: scripta iuris europaei (2007), vol.8, n.4
- Maria Fletcher, Robin Loof, Bill Gilmore, EU Criminal Law and Justice, Edward Elgar Publishing Limited (2008)
- Stefano Manacorda, L'exception a la double incrimination dans le mandate d'arrêt européen et le principe légalité, Cahiers de droit européen (2007), vol.43, n.1/2
- Valsamis Mitsilegas, EU Criminal Law, Hart Publishing (2009)

THE LOWER LIMIT OF THE RIGHT TO LIFE OF THE PERSON IN THE LIGHT OF THE NEW CRIMINAL CODE

MIHAELA (ROTARU) MOISE*

Abstract

The right to life is one of the fundamental human rights both nationally and internationally, being provided and guaranteed by a series of legal acts. In the Romanian law, the right to life of the person as guaranteed by the article 22 paragraph (1) of the Constitution is also protected by criminal law. In judicial practice in this matter there was an important and interesting issue regarding the limits of the right to life of people or accurately determining the starting and ending of a person's life. On this aspect, there were several points of view in the law literature, each grounded on its own way. In the current criminal law, the two aspects that I have mentioned above are linked, on the one hand, for instance to the issue of the legal classification of the fetal injury during birth until the cut of the umbilical cord and, on the other hand, to the thesis of tissue and organs for transplantation. The new Criminal Code is inspired by the European legislation. In relation to the criminal offences against the person it brings news to us by introducing a new offence, namely fetal injury, referred to in the article 202. Analyzing the legal content of this offence it is impossible not to call into question the situation of the lower limit of the right to life of the person.

Keywords: right, life, person, offence, limit.

Introduction

1.The study deals with a very interesting criminal law issue relative to the right to life of the person in terms of its lower limit benefiting by legal protection.

2. In the criminal law literature many points of view have appeared over time regarding the starting point of life and hence the start of criminal protection of the individual right to life. The present study makes their analysis and, as a novelty, brings to the foreground the New Criminal Code provisions.

3. The study has a logical structure and the starting point of the analysis is represented by the provisions of the national and international legal acts in the protection of the right to life area.

Ab initio there have been analysed the provisions of the Romanian Constitution and those of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the International Pact on Civil and Political Rights. Then there have been presented some opinions existing in the doctrine regarding the matter that is being studied. Finally, the new Criminal Code provisions are being analyzed in relation to the person's right to life, making reference to the Civil Code and the Decree no. 31/1954 regarding the physical and legal persons.

4. Based on points of view expressed in the criminal law literature over the years, the study brings to the foreground some opinions related to the individual right to life from the perspective of the New Criminal Code provisions.

1. The Purpose of Criminal Law

Although the New Criminal Code[1], in the general part, does no longer contain an article devoted to defining the aim of the criminal law[2], however we can say that criminal law protects by its

* Assistant Lecturer, „Alexandru Ioan Cuza" Police Academy, Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Law, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: mihaela.rotaru@academiadepolitie.ro).

[1] Represented by the Law no. 286/2009, published in the Official Gazette no. 510 of the 24th of July 2009.

[2] The article 1 of the Criminal Code in force provides that „criminal law protects against crime Romania, the sovereignty, the independence, the unity and the indivisibility of the state, individual rights and freedoms, property and the entire rule of law". In the explanatory memorandum of the New Criminal Code, published on the website own means a number of constitutional values, including those inherent to the person. It is about life, physical integrity, health, personal freedom and sexual freedom and its integrity.

In this study we will focus on analysing one of the values listed above, that of a person's life because we want to make some clarifications regarding the lower limit of the right to life.

In the article 22 paragraph (1) of the Constitution[3] it is provided that „the right to life and the right to physical and mental integrity of the person are guaranteed". These rights are also protected by the means of criminal law.

The special part of the Criminal Code in force contains Title II, entitled „Offences against the person", title which comprises four chapters, as follows: chapter I, „Crimes against life, physical integrity and health", chapter II, „Crimes against personal freedom", chapter III, „Sexual offences", and chapter IV, „Crimes against dignity". This last chapter contained articles 205 to 207, relative to offences of insult and slander and the verity proof, items which were repealed by law[4].

In the special part of the New Criminal Code, Title I is dedicated to the description of crimes against the person and contains nine chapters, as follows: chapter I, „Crimes against life", chapter II, „Crimes against physical integrity or health", chapter III, „Crimes committed against a family member", chapter IV, „Attacks on the fetus", chapter V, „Crimes against the persons in danger requiring assistance", chapter VI, „Crimes against personal freedom", chapter VII, „Trafficking and exploitation of vulnerable persons", chapter VIII, „Crimes against sexual freedom and integrity" and chapter IX, „Crimes that affect home and private life".

2. The Concept of „the Right to Life" and that of „Person"

The analysis of the limits of the right to life as guaranteed by the Constitution and protected by the rules of criminal law cannot be achieved by separating the two concepts, namely „the right to life" and „the person".

Although the international documents provide the protection of the right to life of the person, none of them gives the definition of the terms. The same situation can be found in our legislation.

In the article 1 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[5] it is provided that „all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience…". Then, in the article 3 of the same document it is stated that „any human being has the right to life…".

In the absence of legal definitions of „life" or „the right to life" in the criminal literature and the judicial practice, there has emerged an issue that has received different solutions depending on the steps of evolution the society has crossed, that of the legal limits of the person's right to life.

3. The Legal Limits of the Right to Life. Opinions Existing Prior the Adoption of the Law no. 286/2009 and Points of View Expressed after this Moment

By „the legal limits of the person's right to life we understand the starting point of life, id est the lower limit, and the ending of life, id est the upper limit.

The Criminal Code in force, as well as the New Criminal Code, contains in a specific title the offences against the person. These incriminations protect the life, the physical integrity and the health http://www.cdep.ro/proiecte/2009/300/00/4/em304.pdf (last accessed on the 4th of August 2009), it is stated that, having as a model the European criminal codes, in a democracy there is no longer place to define the aim of criminal law.

---

[3] Published in the Official Gazette no. 767 of the 31st of October 2003.

[4] It concerns the Decision no. 8 of the 18th of October 2010, issued by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, in the United Sections on appeal in the interest of law, published in the Official Gazette no. 416 of the 14th of June 2011, it reads that „the criminal rules contained in the article 205 to 207 of the Criminal Code regarding the insult, the slander and the verity proof, repealed by the provisions of the article I, section 56 of the Law no. 278/2006, provisions declared unconstitutional by the Decision no. 62 of the 18th of January 2007 of the Constitutional Court, are not in force".

[5] Adopted by the United Nation General Assembly on the 10th of December 1948 as it is stated on the website http://www.onuinfo.ro/documente_fundamentale/declaratia_drepturilor_omului/ (last accessed on the 10th of December 2011).

of the person since that person is born until its death occurs in a natural way, and also freedom and sexual life.

Regarding the relevant moment marking the beginning of criminal protection[6] of the life of a person, there are two points of view in current doctrine.

In the first opinion[7], the lower limit of the right to life is the moment of the beginning of the birth process. According to the second opinion[8], the majority in theory, the lower limit of the right to life is represented by the cutting of the umbilical cord, when the birth process is complete and when the fetus becomes a child.

Given the New Criminal Code provisions dealing with the criminalization of acts affecting individuals, certain aspects are new and have a particular interest.

First, in Title I of the special part of the New Criminal Code, relative to the offences against the person, a chapter entitled „attacks on the fetus" is found, which consists of two crimes, namely the crime of interruption of pregnancy, provided in the article 201, and the offence of injury to the fetus as provided in the article 202.

The offence referred to in the article 201 New Criminal Code[9] has a counterpart in the Criminal Code in force in the article 185, that of the crime of illegal performing abortion.

The offence referred to in the article 202 N.C.C. has no counterpart in the Criminal Code in force and it has Spanish influence[10].

In the Criminal Code in force it is found the term „person", although undefined, but not that of „fetus". We state this because the above-mentioned legal act includes „crimes against the person", the crime of murder is defined as „killing a person" and so on. There is made no reference about „the fetus".

In the analysis of the crime of illegal performing of the abortion, provided in the article 185 Criminal Code in force, the experts[11] have ruled on its complexity, stating that the legal subject of the crime is the set of social values that appear and develop in order to protect the mother and the conceiving product, that spes homini (life expectancy).

The New Criminal Code contains the notion of „fetus" but without giving any definition to it. According to medical science „fetus" means the conceiving product from the end of the eighth week of pregnancy until birth[12]. The offspring will bear this name until the end of pregnancy, id est until the cutting of the umbilical cord and the total separation of the mother's body, gaining the status of child.

In recent criminal doctrine[13], given the absence of a definition of the „fetus" in the Criminal Code, it has been stated that the „fetus" means „the product of conception in the period between the conception and the moment of birth".

Regarding the crime of injury to the fetus, referred to in the article 202 N.C.C., in the explanatory memorandum of the New Criminal Code it is indicated that it serves to cover the legal void relative to the ensuring of protection of the person between the moment of beginning of the birth

---

[6] George Antoniu, „Criminal Protection of Human Life", Criminal Law Journal no. 1/2002 (2002), 13.

[7] Titus Popescu, „Defining the Person in the Criminal Code", Criminal Law Journal no. 3/1998 (1998), 40.

[8] Octavian Loghin and Tudorel Toader quoted by Popescu, „Defining the Person", 13; Antoniu, „Criminal Protection", 13.

[9] Next N.C.C.

[10] In the explanatory memorandum to the New Criminal Code it is stated that the source of inspiration for writing the text were the provisions of articles 157 and 158 of the Spanish Criminal Code as it is stated on the website http://www.cdep.ro/proiecte/2009/300/00/4/em304.pdf (last accessed on the 4th of August 2009).

[11] Vasile Dobrinoiu, „The Interruption of Pregnancy in the Characterization of the Crime of Abortion", Romanian Journal of Law no. 2/1970 (1970), 111.

[12] The definition is found in Webster's New World Medical Dictionary, third edition, as it is stated on the website http://www.medterms.com/script/main/art.asp?articlekey=3424 (last accessed on the 10th of December 2011).

[13] Petre Dungan, Tiberiu Medeanu and Viorel Paşca, Handbook of Criminal Law. Special Part, volume I, (Bucharest: Legal Publishing House, 2010), 120.

process, at which point we cannot discuss about abortion as a crime because it is no longer possible to be committed due to its conditions, and the moment of ending of the birth process which means that from that point on we can talk about a person that can be a passive subject, a victim of one of the crimes provided in the previous chapters[14] of Title I. This idea is also supported by the very formulation of paragraphs (1) and (2) of the article 202 N.C.C. Thus, in the article 202 paragraph (1) N.C.C. it is provided as follows: „fetal injury during birth, which prevented the installation of extrauterine life, is punishable (…)". And the paragraph (2) of the same article stipulates that „the harm of the fetus during birth, causing the child an injury afterwards, is punishable (…)".

A new element is the paragraph (3) of the article 202 N.C.C. which provides that „the harm of the fetus during pregnancy, which subsequently caused the child an injury, is punishable (…)".

On expressions „during pregnancy" and „during birth", which are found in the article 202 N.C.C., the recent criminal doctrine[15] offered some highly detailed and well documented explanations related to their meaning. Thus, having as arguments forensic knowledge on the four phases of the uterine changes in the birth process, it has been stated that „during pregnancy" means the phase zero and the phase one of birth, that period of time after conception and up to 36-38 weeks, in the last days of gestation taking place the preparation of the uterus for the installation of labour.

The same authors state that „during birth" characterises „the first two stages of labour of the second phase of birth, from its beginning until the expulsion of the fetus".

Analyzing the law so far, one can say that the offence of injury of the fetus is a complex one. The legal object of this crime is complex, as represented by all social relationships emerging and developing in relation to protecting the right to life and the physical integrity of the fetus, on the one hand, and to protecting the physical integrity of the pregnant woman, on the other hand. We say this because if the legislator had wanted to protect mainly the mother's rights he would have introduced this crime in the chapter regarding the crimes against the life, the physical integrity or the health of the person. The phrase „during pregnancy", which is found in the article 202 paragraph (3) N.C.C., leads us to analyze life and the right to life of the person in a double perspective. We will talk about the right to life in the womb and the right to life outside the womb after birth.

The installation of the extrauterine life has as a criteria of recognizing the occurrence of pulmonary respiration with macro and microscopic changes characteristic at this level[16].

We state that the life within the womb occurs at conception, but it enjoys the protection of criminal law only since the embryo becomes a fetus that is in the eighth week of pregnancy.

It is interesting to note, however, that during pregnancy the harm of the fetus by the pregnant woman is not punished as well as the pregnant woman is not punished if she alone interrupts her pregnancy. Such acts are still criminal but those persons shall not be subject to a penalty. Given the consistency of the legislator, we conclude that whenever the right to life of the fetus is in contrast to the pregnant woman's right to dispose of her body, the law is in favor of the latter, but only if the pregnant woman acts alone and voluntary.

4. Proposals for future regulations

Given the above, it will be better for the future that the age of pregnancy to be reduced from 14 weeks to 8 weeks in characterizing the crime of interruption of pregnancy provided in the article 201 N.C.C.

Moreover, in the spirit of better understanding the legal text, we also propose to modify for the future the provisions of the New Criminal Code by inserting therein a definition of the „fetus".

---

[14] The explanatory memorandum of the New Criminal Code, published on the website http://www.cdep.ro/proiecte/2009/300/00/4/em304.pdf (last accessed on the 4th of August 2009).

[15] Vasile Dobrinoiu and Norel Neagu, Criminal Law. Special Part. Theory and Practice, (Bucharest: Legal Universe Publishing House, 2011), 84-85.

[16] Dan Dermengian et al. quoted by Antoniu, „Criminal Protection", 14.

Knowing that the right to life is inherent to the person[17], can we conclude that the fetus acquires the status of a person, in the light of the New Criminal Code as it happens in civil law?

In the article 1 of the Decree no. 31/1954[18] it is stated that „the civil rights of the individuals are recognized in order to satisfy personal interests and education, according to the public interest and the rules of law for a socialist coexistence". And in the article 7 of the same legal document it is stipulated that „the ability for a person to hold rights begins from birth and ends when that person dies. Children's rights are recognized from conception but only if they are born alive".

Moreover, we find the article 36 in the Civil Code[19], entitled „the rights of conceived children", which reads as follows: „children's rights are recognized from conception but only if they are born alive". Although a fetus becomes a child only after cutting the umbilical cord, thus starting his life outside the womb, however, we find in the civil law the expression „conceived child" when the fetus has an interest for his rights to be protected.

Although the criminal law does not confer protection of the right to life from conception, we can still say that the fetus is a becoming person. According to the legal terms dictionary[20], a „person" is a human being who is able to be recognized as a subject of law or holder of rights and obligations. An additional argument is the insertion of chapter IV „Attacks on the fetus", in the Title I of the New Criminal Code, next to the chapters devoted to the description of crimes committed towards family members, towards those in danger requiring assistance and next to the offences related to trafficking and exploitation of vulnerable persons. Family members, those at risk and vulnerable people are persons, no doubt. Then why would not a fetus be one?

Because the right to life is inherent to the person, we can say that its lower limit is not marked either by the triggering of the birth process, either by the cutting of the umbilical cord, but by the moment the embryo becomes a fetus, with the condition that he must be born alive, even if not viable.

Conclusions

1. Analyzing the national and international documents which provide the guarantee and protection of individual's right to life, I noticed and pointed out the absence of legal definitions for the terms used in this documents, namely „person" and „fetus". For this reason, I have proposed for the future, to modify these regulations by inserting the definition of these terms so everyone can better understand their aim and in order to end the controversy existing in the criminal literature.

Given the definition of the „fetus" and analyzing the legal content of the offence of interrupting of pregnancy, provided in the article 201 N.C.C., I have proposed lowering the limit to which abortion is not an offense from 14 weeks to 8 weeks, adding, of course, other arguments for the purpose of supporting this point of view.

Another interesting aspect throughout the study is the presentation of some opinions relative to the lower limit of the right to life of the person, id est the time at which the life of the person benefits of criminal protection.

2. This study adds to the already existing papers regarding this issue in the criminal literature with a new point of view.

---

[17] The article 6 paragraph (1) of the International Pact on Civil and Political Rights, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on the 16th of December 1966, provides that „the right to life is inherent to the human being. This right shall be protected by the law. No one shall be deprived of his life in an arbitrary manner as it is stated on the website http://www.dri.gov.ro/documents/pactul_cu_privire_la_drepturile_civile_si_politice.pdf (last accessed on the 24th of December 2011).

[18] Regarding natural and legal persons, published in the Official Gazette no. 8 of the 30th of January 1954.

[19] Represented by the Law no. 287/2009, republished in the Official Gazette no. 505 of the 15th of july 2011, and entered into force at the 1st of October 2011.

[20] As it is stated on the website http://e-juridic.manager.ro/dictionar-juridic/persoana/3214.html (last accessed on the 9th of December 2011).

3. The dynamics of criminal protection of the individual right to life is directly proportional to the way this right benefits of legal recognition being provided both in national and international documents. We should always analyze the changes in this field.

References

- George Antoniu, „Criminal Protection of Human Life", Criminal Law Journal no. 1/2002 (2002);
- Vasile Dobrinoiu, „The Interruption of Pregnancy in the Characterization of the Crime of Abortion", Romanian Journal of Law no. 2/1970 (1970);
- Vasile Dobrinoiu and Norel Neagu, Criminal Law. Special Part. Theory and Practice, (Bucharest: Legal Universe Publishing House, 2011);
- Petre Dungan, Tiberiu Medeanu and Viorel Paşca, Handbook of Criminal Law. Special Part, volume I, (Bucharest: Legal Universe Publishing House, 2010);
- Titus Popescu, „Defining the Person in the Criminal Code", Criminal Law Journal no. 3/1998 (1998);
- www.cdep.ro
- www.onuinfo.ro
- www.medterms.com
- www.dri.gov.ro
- www.e-juridic.manager.ro

THE REFLECTION OF ARTICLE 7 OF THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS IN THE ROMANIAN CRIMINAL LEGISLATION

ION RISTEA*

Abstract

This study highlights the principle of the legality of incrimination and penalty, as well as the principle of the retroactivity of the more lenient criminal law, as stipulated in Art. 7 of the European Convention on Human Rights. In order to clarify and highlight these principles, some cases of the practice of the Convention on Human Rights are presented. Furthermore, the material shows the way these fundamental principles are reflected in the Romanian legislation, namely the Constitution of Romania, the Criminal Code in force and the stipulations of the new Criminal Code. Understanding these principles at an European normative level and in the Romanian penal legislation, in order to apply them correctly in jurisdictional activity, is of particular importance in the current period of reform and adaption of the Romanian Criminal Legislation.

Keywords:The principle of the legalty of incrimination and penalty; the principle of the retroactivity of the more lenient criminal law; the European Convention on Human Rights; The Constitution of Romania; The Romanian Criminal Code.

Introduction

The European Convention on Human Rights, signed in Rome on 4 November 1950, entered into force on 3 September 1953 (ratified by Romania by Law No 30/1994) is the most important document drafted by the Council of Europe (founded in 1949 which gradually enlarged after 1980, having nowadays 47 Member States) for the protection and development of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The Convention states a series of principles of humanistic inspiration, in order to create a legal framework appropriate for the development of human personality and its protection against abuses from authorities.

These principles have a decisive influence over the legislation of the European countries, Member States of the Council of Europe (Romania was accepted will full rights in the Council of Europe on 4 November 1993) laying efforts to modify their civil administrative, family, labor and criminal legislation in relation to these humanistic principles fully in accordance with the actual stage of the evolution of social relations.

This process of harmonizing national legislation with the principles of the Convention also takes place in Romania.

Thus, starting with the Constitution (in force since 1991), which stated many of the European Convention's principles; all important normative acts are inspired from the solutions stated by the Convention. Also in the criminal doctrine were published studies dedicated to the European Convention[1].

Content of the paper:

1. The European Convention states the principle of the legality of incrimination and punishment, as well as the principle of the retroactivity of the more favorable criminal law.

---

* Associate Researcher at the Legal Research Institute of Romanian Academy; Senior Lecturer Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, University of Pitesti (email: ristea_m_ion@yahoo.com).

[1] G.Antoniu, Implicaţii asupra legii criminale române a Convenţiei Europene a Drepturilor Omului in „Studii de drept românesc" Review, Volume 4 (37), 1992, no. 1, p. 5-13.

According to Art 7 Para 1 "no one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier criminalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed".

Para 2 of the same article states that "this article shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations".

2. The European Court of Justice's jurisprudence clarified and shaped these provisions.

Thus, in the case Welch v United Kingdom, the European Court, noting that the Ordinance of 1986 stated as criminalty the measure of special seizure (resulting from the provisions of the mentioned Ordinance, according to which it is presumed that the assets gathered by a person convicted for drug trafficking for 6 years, are the product of the offence, outside the case where the defendant could prove otherwise; from the fact that it is seized not only the effective profit, but the entire product of the drug trafficking; from the fact that the judge has discretionary power regarding the sum of money that are seized, considering also the degree of guilt of the defendant when this sum, as well as the fact that it is stated the possibility of imprisonment as a mean of paying the money), has decided that in these conditions, special seizure has a repressive feature and must be applied only by respecting the principle of retroactivity of the more favorable criminal law.

In the mentioned case, these measures, though it were not a more favorable solution, were taken by the British court, though it were not stated by the law at the moment of the offence, offering them a retroactive feature and thus violating Art 7 of the Convention[2].

In the case V. v Estonia the plaintiff was convicted for fiscal offences committed during 1993-1995. The court established that it was about a continuous offence and applied the new Criminal Code entered into force in January 2005. Before the entrance into force of the new provisions, the offence committed by the plaintiff was considered to be offence only if the person had previously received an administrative sanction for a tax evasion, which was not the case here. By the new provisions in the area of tax evasion, the condition of a previous administrative sanction was removed.

The court stated that the plaintiff was also sanctioned for the offences committed previous of the entrance into force of the new criminal provisions, as elements of a continuous offence. However, the court decided that at the moment of the offence it could not fall under the incidence of the criminal law, because one the conditions of the offence – the existence of a previous administrative sanction for tax evasion – was not met. As a consequence, the Court decided that the Estonian courts retroactively applied a criminal law violating Art 7[3].

In another case, G v France, the European Court stated that the offences were integrated according to the law, which was more favorable than the law in force at the moment of the offence (the new law states a correctional punishment with more reduced limits than the previous law), the court has correctly applied this law, thus Art 7 of the Convention was not violated[4].

In the case S.W. v Great Britain, the Court considered that the existence of a new interpretation of the British courts more unfavorable for the offender (in the meaning that the husband could be considered as the rapist of his spouse), unlike the interpretation existing at the moment of the offence (at that moment the jurisprudence considered that the husband is not liable for the rape against his spouse, because by marriage she accepted sexual intercourse with her spouse, in any circumstances) is not a violation of Art 7. The Court argues that at the moment of the offence there were debates expressing different advised opinions regarding the consent of the wife for all intercourse with her husband during marriage. This evolution of the interpretation began before the offence was committed by the offender, thus Art 7 of the Convention was not violated. In Court's opinion, the idea of the lack of immunity for the husband in case of the rape of his wife is consistent not only with the nature of marriage in a civilized state, but also with the basic principles of the Convention, which promotes the idea of dignity and human freedom[5].

[2] Romanian Criminal Law Review, II, 1995, No. 2, p. 157.

[3] http://sim.law.uu.nl/sim/caselaw/Hof.nsf/2422ec00f1ace923c1256681002b47f1/5f67e53e55417bc441256c6a005b6945?OpenDocument.

[4] Romanian Criminal Law Review, III, 1997, p. 149-150.

3. The Romanian legislation comprises provisions which largely correspond to the exigencies imposed by the European Convention. Thus, the principle of non-retroactivity of the criminal law, except the more favorable law, is also stated by the Romanian Constitution, in its Art 15 Para 2 stating that "the law shall only act for the future, except for the more favorable criminal or administrative law".

From the comparison of the Convention with the Romanian Constitution we can state, as a first notice, that the exception regarding the application of the more favorable criminal law is wider in the Constitution than in the Convention. Thus, while the European Convention prohibits only the application of a more severe punishment than the one existing at the moment of the offence, the Constitution refers in general to the more favorable criminal law, with the possibility of including in this concept not only the more favorable criminal law in relation to the moment of the offence, but also the more favorable law in relation to the moment of the execution of the penalty.

The wording stated in the Constitution is the base for the Romanian criminal law, which states among the principle of non-retroactivity of the criminal law (Art 11 of the Criminal Code), but also the principle of the more favorable criminal law, both in relation with the moment of the perpetration of the offence (Art 13 Criminal Code), as well as in relation with the execution of the penalty (Art 14-15 Criminal Code). As emphasized by the literature, Art 14 and 15 expand the principle of the more favorable law, the new more favorable law being applied also after the conviction decision remains final to the complete service of a penalty of imprisonment[6].

Second of all, it can be noticed that the European Convention refers to the more serious penalty which cannot be retroactive, which per a contrario means that only the more favourable penalty can be retroactive and not other criminal penalties, such as educational or safety measures. In accordance with these provisions, the Romanian law in force states that only provisions regarding the penalty can be retroactive if are more favourable for the defendant, while the provisions stating safety or educational measures are always retroactive, regardless if are more favourable or more serious (Art 12 Para 2 Criminal Code).

Regarding the economy of the Convention, the quoted text though it refers to penalty, considers all criminal sanctions, concept including the penalties, as well as safety and educational measures. It could be incomprehensible that a law stating a bigger fine does not apply retroactively, while the provision of safety or educational measures, sometimes custodial to always be retroactive. The theoretical justification referring to the fact that these measures are for protection, being preventive and not repressive, in the interest of society and of the offender, seems to be overcome by the fact that these measures can represent serious restrictions of freedom, which would not justify the retroactivity of such provisions, limitations which the Convention is aiming to combat. It seems rational the solution that the principle of the more favorable law be applied, in the case of succession of criminal laws, and regarding the safety and educational measures, especially when represent serious limitations of freedom.

Also to this interpretation leads the Romanian Constitution, excluding from retroactivity the more serious criminal law and not a certain criminal provision stating a more serious penalty. In this way the Constitution expands the interdiction of retroactivity for all criminal provisions (including those regarding the safety and educational measures), which would aggravate the situation of the offender[7].

[5] Romanian Criminal Law Review, III, 1996, p. 137.

[6] V.Dongoroz et al. Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului penal român, Volume I, Romanian Academy's Publishing-house, Bucharest, 1969, p. 89-90.

Therefore, for accordance with the Convention, the new Criminal Code, which in Art 1 states the principle of the legality of incrimination (nullum crimen sine lege), in Art establishes the principle of the legality of criminal sanctions (nullum poena sine lege), explicitly referring to all criminal sanctions, namely penalties, safety and educational measures.

Regarding this aspect, it is also interesting the experience of the German legislation. Thus, Art 2 Para 6 of the Criminal Code, though it states that safety or educational measures are applied in relation with the law in force at the moment when the conviction decision remains final, it is shown that "the law does not provide otherwise" leaving the legislator with the possibility that, case by case, in relation to the gravity of the safety or educational measures, to admit or not their retroactive application. As a result, some serious safety measures, such as the admission into a medical-educatory institute, as well as the prohibition to exercise a certain profession were removed from the possibility of retroactivity[8].

Another observation aims Art 7 Para 2 of the European Convention, stating the possibility that certain incriminating norms established according to the general law principles and recognized by the civilized states, to be efficient even if the national law does not state them. Therefore, there is the possibility of a decision and application of a penalty for a person, as a consequence of an offence stated by international conventions, regardless if, according to the national legislation, the offence was never stated or was decriminalized or the national legislation would state a more favorable provision.

Usually, international offences (delicta de juris gentium), though established by international treaties and conventions are operative if the states incriminate these offences in their national legislation and sanction them in an appropriate way[9]. Such incriminations refer to offences against peace and mankind, international terrorism, piracy, slave commerce, drug trafficking, counterfeiting, dissemination of pornographic materials, women and children commerce etc.

To the extent to which the offences incriminated by international conventions are also states as offences in the national legislations, which is the situation of most the offences incriminated by treaties, are also applied the rules of non-retroactivity and the application of the more favorable law. The issue rising is what happens with the offences which at the moment of their perpetration were not incriminated by the national law; they could subsequently be judged only based on their incrimination in the Convention to which that certain state has not yet adhered to or, even if it has adhered to, has not respected the obligation to incriminate the mentioned offences in the national legislation?

The above question received a positive answer even since the Second World War, by the statute of the Nuremberg and Tokyo courts, considering that the principle "nullum crimen sine lege" must be related both to the national and international law, position established also in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 10 December 1948 (Art II Para 2). Hence, the offences incriminated by international conventions should attract the criminal liability of natural persons, regardless of the national provisions[10].

4. The Romanian criminal law in force offers a framework appropriate for solving cases similar to those submitted to the European Court in this area.

---

[7] G.Antoniu et al. „Reforma legislației penale", Romanian Academy's Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2003, p. 203.

[8] Hans Heinrich Jescheck, Lehrbuch des Strafrechts, Allgemeiner Teil, 3rd Edition, Berlin, Duncker und Humblot, 1978, p.110.

[9] Grigore Geamănu, Dreptul internațional contemporan, Didactic and Pedagogic Publishing-house, Bucharest, 1965, p.826.

[10] George Antoniu, (coord), Reforma legislației penale, Romanian Academy Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2003, p.304.

Thus, according to Art 11 Para 1 of the Criminal Code, safety measures (also the special seizure) have the purpose to remove a danger and to foresee the perpetration of the offences stated by the criminal law. This means that safety measures have a special regime, stated by Art 113 and following of the Criminal Code, only if they preserve this feature as preventive measure designed to remove a danger from the perpetrator[11]. To the extent to which a safety measures receives a repressive feature, it becomes a penalty and is subjected to the regime of penalties (it cannot be retroactively applied unless it represents a more favorable provision).

In the case decided by the European Court, the safety measure of special seizure by receiving a repressive feature, was correctly considered as penalty and subjected to the principle of non-retroactivity of the criminal law (if it is more favorable).

Regarding the offence on the incrimination of rape during marriage, the Romanian jurisprudence and doctrine maintained the opinion that the husband cannot be considered as the active subject of the rape of his wife, because when she consented to the marriage, she also consented to intercourse with her husband during marriage. The husband would be held liable only for injuries caused to his wife during intercourse[12].

The arguments brought by the European Court emphasized the important mutations which took place in the way of interpreting the relationship of the spouses in relation to the basic principles of the European Convention, have determined changes in the Romanian criminal legislation and doctrine (see the modification of Art 197 of the Criminal Code by the Government Emergency Injunction No 89/2001[13], modified and approved by Law No 61/2002[14]).

Conclusions

The analysis of Art 7 of the European Convention on Human Rights obviously emphasizes the fact that the Romanian criminal legislation is in accordance with its exigencies. The examples used in this study of the Romanian Constitution, of the criminal law in force, of the new Criminal Code and of the Romanian jurisprudence and doctrine illustrate the compatibility between the Romanian legislation and the European Convention. This statement justifies the necessity of entering into force, as soon as possible, of the new Criminal Code and of the new Criminal Procedure Code, already approved by the Parliament by Law No 286/2009 and Law No 135/2010.

References

- G.Antoniu, Implicații asupra legii criminale române a Convenției Europene a Drepturilor Omului in „Studii de drept românesc" Review, Volume 4 (37), 1992, no. 1
- Romanian Penal Law Review,II, 1995, No. 2
- Romanian Penal Law Review, III, 1997
- Romanian Penal Law Review, III, 1996
- V.Dongoroz et al., „Explicații teoretice ale Codului penal român", Volume 3, Romanian Academy Pulishing-house, Bucharest, 1971
- G.Antoniu et al. „Reforma legislației penale", Romanian Academy's Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2003
- Hans Heinrich Jescheck, Lehrbuch des Strafrechts, Allgemeiner Teil, 3rd Edition, Berlin, Duncker und Humblot, 1978

[11] Ion Ristea, Drept penal, Partea generală (edition reviewed and modified based on the new Criminal Code), Universul Juridic Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2011, p.339; Ilie Pascu, Drept penal, Partea generală, 2nd Edition, Hamangiu Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2009, p.479; Lavinia Vlădilă and Olivian Măstăcan, Drept penal, Partea generală, Universul Juridic Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2011, p.171.

[12] V.Dongoroz et al., „Explicații teoretice ale Codului penal român", Volume 3, Romanian Academy Pulishing-house, Bucharest, 1971, p.351-352.

[13] Published in the Official Gazette No 338/ 26 June 2001.

[14] Published in the Official Gazette No 65/30 January 2002.

- Grigore Geamănu, Dreptul internațional contemporan, Didactic and Pedagogic Publishing-house, Bucharest, 1965
- Ion Ristea, Drept penal, Partea generală (edition reviewed and modified based on the new Criminal Code), Universul Juridic Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2011
- Ilie Pascu, Drept penal, Partea generală, 2nd Edition, Hamangiu Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2009
- Lavinia Vlădilă and Olivian Măstăcan, Drept penal, Partea generală, Universul Juridic Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2011
- European Convention of Human Rights
- Romanian Constitution
- Romanian Criminal Law in force
- The new Romanian Criminal Code

FINANCIAL CRIME IN THE ROMANIAN BANKING SYSTEM

LUMINIȚA DRAGNE[*]
GEORGE DOREL MATEI[]
ANAMARIA TRANCĂ[]

Abstract
The crime in the financial and banking system, through the disasters it produces, damages and large amount of victims, generates the largest economy damages, both national and international level. This phenomenon occurs and is manifested in a specific environment, the economy and finances one, takes different forms and operates with appropriate techniques. Most of the times, the banking system from Romania, has been used for personal grounds, which leads to serious damage of the Romanian economy. Insufficiently matured economic or imperfect judicial environments are only some of the factors that led to the commission of crimes in this area. Also, this type of crime has been determined, among other things, by the economic status, the social structure or the stage of development of the society.

Keywords: banking and financial crime, corruption, banking fraud.

Introduction

Financial – economic crime, also known as the white collar crime, generates great damages to the international economy. Nevertheless, the transgerssors who do crimes in this field are regarded by the society as people who found a way to avoid the coercitive action of the state, consisting in the increasing taxes and impositions. Therefore, these individuals are not considered criminals, although the criminal law makes no distinction; on the contrary, they are treated with respect, are considered businessmen, persons who don't deserve to be held liable for the fact that they found solutions, illegal even, to elude the financial legislation of the state where they conduct their business.

The phenomenon of the economic- financial crime takes place and manifests in a specific environment, of economy and finances, which can display a large diversity of organisational forms, which are in a permanent transformation, and offer a large gama of possibilities of actions, doubled by the correspondent techniques.

The victims of this phenomenom are the citizens, but, somettimes, are also the business parteners, governamental institutions, the business sector and the banking and financial environment.

The indirect victims are the citizens, those who, as a consequence of the embezzlements, frauds and illegal misappropriation, and of the unauthorized management buy – outs, are seeing their level of life diminished, the medical assistance compromised, the acces to education and information blocked by the illegal downsizing of the social fonds destined to fulfill these objectives.

The criminality in the business sector has as a result, by the great proportion of damages and number of victims, an obvious inbalance of the whole society, with direct impact on the climate of public order and national security[1].

[*] Associate Professor Ph. D., "Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University (email: luminita_ucdc@yahoo.com).
[] Senior Lecturer Ph. D. candidate, "Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University (email: mateidorelgeorge@yahoo.com).
[] Judge, Bucharest Tribunal (email: anatranca@yahoo.com).
[1] C. Voicu, G. Ungureanu, A. Voicu, Globalisation and bancking – financial criminality, Juridical Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005, p. 440.

The long term consequences of this type of criminality are not yet wholy taken into consideration, and in an economy in transition, like the one Romania has experienced, in which the financial and fiscal legislation has had a difficult birth and an even more difficult ageing process, the main consequence was the apparition of the carton – billionaires class, on the background of the pauperisation of the rest of the population.

After 1989 the foreign banking organisations have become available also for romanians, and these institutions offered not only a more evolved and competitive frame for the evolution of business, but also the means of creating an appereance of legality for some illegal activities. The same banking organisations have become also the place where the money coming from criminal activities conducted on romanian territory have found their destination.

From this point of view, the year of 1989 was the moment of the beginning of the great financial and banking criminality in Romania, when the romanian banking system has become concurential and private.

However, the possibilities offered by the sheer existence of this banking system, and also the possibilities given by the unlimited acces to external banking systems were not known but by a group of individuals which was very small in comparison to the rest of the population.

Among these few initiates there were persons who brought their contribution to the growth and evolution of the romanian banking system and who knew to blend their personal interest with the social one, but there were also those initiates who used the system only for their personal interest, in most cases producing great prejudices to the romanian economy.

The bankrupcy of banks such as Dacia Felix, Credit Bank, Bankcoop, Banca Albina, Bancorex and others ment not only the lost of the personal economies for thousands of romanians, but also the impairment of public trust in national banking system. Yet, the earnest effect of these bankrupy was that o great part of the forfeiture were directly or indirectly absorbed by the national economy, which therefore became weaker and more instable.

The infractionality in the financial – banking environment

A. Causes and factors which determine the perpetration of crimes in this sector. The greatest desasters who took place in the world of finances and banks have had as a generator factor, the immense potential this backround can have in the purpose of obtaining a meaningful material gain[2]. The huge profits that can be gained by malevolent use of the banking system determined the apparition of a new type of criminal – dangerous and versatyle – who exercised his illegal inclinations in a social environment characterised by the following factors:

▪ an economic backround insufficiently aged, marked by the easiness with which new economic agents and new financial institutions can appear, offering promissing perspectives, in many cases accompanied by a matching advertising.

In the absence of an established tradition in this field, the system becomes vulnerable due to the fact that the possible intruders like these, who look for an illegal purpose, are tracked down too late. Unfortunatelly, the economic environment existing in Romania in that period of time made possible the action of such organisations who had as only purpose fast enrichment, regardless of means, of a limited number of persons, others then the deponents.

▪ the faulty judiciary environment offers the ideal terrain for the initiation and finalisation of such illegal business, ended in colossal damages. The judicial system is either defective, either constantly behind the pace of business evolution, which is a dynamic environment, with his own laws and economically motivated.

In most cases, the legislative discrepancies are the ones speculated, but, equally dangerous is the abbundance of bills, allways changing, which rends the development of a correct economic activity almost impossible, even when one wants to act in good faith.

[2] Ibidem.

▪ the corrupt political environment is, undoubtedly, the factor who is the base of the economic chaos.

Individuals who took their business to the limit of the law or even broke it, and who gained enormous profits, afforded to buy themselves key positons in politics, which granted them immunity and also an increasing power.

Politicians such these initiated and advocated unhealthy legislative initiatives, poisoned the economic environment and developped an underground world who bolstered their position, but weakened the economic national power in the process.

▪ the utterly deficient external and internal control is another factor that encourages and amplifies the frauds in baks and financial organisations.

The lack of experience, the faulty knowledge of laws, the absence of any motivation, reproched to the organisations empowered with control powers, contributed to the creation of an instable and vulnerable environment, in which the potential factors could manifest themsefves freely.

▪ the defective management of a banking institution cand easily bring upon illegal activities, either from inside the bank as well as the outside of it.

The desire of gaining immense and immediate profits cam generate wrong managerial decisions, with untterly grave consequences.

One of the realities of the period we go through at this moment is the growth of the diversity and dimension of criminality on a global level, and especially on the level of bank criminality. It is obvious that, today, the banking criminality has extended to a wider area, takes new forms, some of which are more sophisticated and unknown untill now, such forms being in fact the product of the actions of criminal groups organised by true specialists[3].

The analisys of the dimensions and forms of the ways of manifestation of the economic – financial crime in Romania of the last 20 or 30 years brings to light the fact that this phenomenom was caused by the state of the economic, social and politic environment, by the social structure, the level of economic development and the levelof social stability. The changes that took place in these fields influenced the content and ways of manifestation of economic and financial crime. There have appeared new forms of delinquence, after the year of 1990 being revealed even a veritable agression towards the state property, materialised in embezzlement and thefts of huge proportions, a real industry of smugglers, a rioting outbreak of pyramidal games, the plunder of the most important banks, of the public finances and the dezastruous colaps of some investments fonds.

Taking advantage of the fact that the legislation regarding the banking activity was not brought to the realities of the day, (the bills were drafted in the seventies), untill 1990 the banks bolstered their positions and intruded in the romanian economy by backing up the private sector, and therefore consolidating their positions by offering a large number of credits, to which they tolled big comissions and interests.

The financial and banking world extended the roots of its power so well and so deep in all the state structures due, mainly, directly to the power of banking and financial institutions, organised and handled according to a strict set of rules etablished by specific laws, regulations and procedures.

Thus, we find ourselves in a spec that is so well guarded, that sometimes seems impenetrable, and so sophisticated, that only the strict professional initiative can change the internal regulations and law provisions, which, often through a appearent confuse enunciation, grants the system "imperviousness" against any instrument of assay and control[4].

B. Banking fraud. The term of banking fraud refers to the illegal acts that affect banks, financial services (loands, investments), and that concern instruments of payment, checks, promissory notes, notes of hand[5].

---

[3] Ibidem.

[4] G. Ungureanu, A. Boroi, Introduction in applied crime, Juridical Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004, p. 51.

[5] C. Voicu , Business criminality, M-I Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997, p. 21.

Accordind to the Explanatory Dictionary of the Romanian Language, fraud means deceit, that act of bad – faith usually comitted in order to gain a material profit from damaging the goods or interests of another person, which is, finally, a sort of theft.

Referring to fraud as a way of deceiving the bank, the term means the summ of the illegal actions and manouvers done by the bankers through the banking entity which is therefore directly damaged by the interloper transfer of some souces of money in the direct benefit of the bankers or other persons[6].

The fraud wave of the banking system started in the USA and extended in Germania, Austria, United Kingdom and Netherlands, in fact comprehended the enttire european community, and the analists forecasted a significant growth of crimes in the financial field.

Organised crime has targeted with predilection financial and banking activities and stock exchange, generating international crime events.

This wave of frauds added in also Romania, which was in a period of transition towards the free market economy, and experiencing an utterly alarming evolution.

Most of these crimes involve the granting ofbanking loans with no guarantees whatsoever or based on false documents, the use of banking deposits fraudulently, the favouring of a few private economic agents in the detriment of state organisations, illegal transfers of money between banking accounts, the essuing of false paying documents with no real coverageacts of abuse and corruption in regards the activity of awarding of loans, the omission of paying the instalments and interests deriving from loans, or the omission of taking the legal measures against some economic agents who broke the financial legislation in this field.

The banking criminality has two components:

- crimes comitted by persons outside the bank, the bank being the victim of the fradulent manouvers.

- crimes comitted by persons inside the banks, by the stuff, with or without the aid of some individuals from outside.

There are some notorious cases - Credit Bank, Dacia Felix, Bancoop, The Fond of Private Property IV– Muntenia, BCR –Timişoara, Ion Țiriac Bank–Brăila, BRD, in which individuals with leading responsabilities, sometimes with the aid of experimented outside elements, began illegal banking operations, by astute means, in order to avoid being caught, produces great damages, by the appropriation of fonds that summ up billions of lei[7].

The beginning of the fight against corruption is indeed a signal that society, at least at decisional level, has noted one of the essential problems that stand at the base of the growth of financial – banking frauds, seldom rising to prejudices of hundreds and thousands of billions.

Irregularities were done also to cover up the huge proportions frauds that resulted mainly from the omission of repatriation of foreign currencies generated by activities of export conducted by the economic agents, the banks faultering in allerting the judicial organisations of the ones who did not complied with the obligation of giving the "collected foreign currencies "[8].

Crime has special aspects in the field of non – traditional banking organisations. Some notoriety was gained between 1991 and 1994 by intra – aid organisations such as Caritas and Megacaritas, a genuine madness of multiplied gaines, and after their collapse the foundation of another, more sophisticated, serious and generous system was put: the investments fonds which began their activity in the absence of any form of control. The increase of non –banking organisations (assurance companies, pension fonds, investment fons, stock exchange), caused a powerfull back stroke to the banks by attracting large sums of money from the public in the exchange of a number of attractive clauuses.

---

[6] C. Voicu, F. Sandu, I. Dascălu, Fraud in the financial – banking and the capital market system, 3 Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998, p. 112.

[7] T. Amza, Criminal conotations and new riscs to the public order, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2000, p.

[8] F. Sandu, Smuggling and organised crime, National Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997, p. 87.

In this period the romanian banking system was used also for the laundring of dirty money which obtained through smuggling and embezzlement, illegal transfers over the borders of large sums of dollars for which there were no justifications, and the hiding of the money coming from ersonal illegal operations under the coverage of the principle of secrecy of operations[9].

The reform of romanian banking system began in 1991 by the creation of two level system, in which the National Bank looses its trait of commercial bank (by the detachment of the Romanian Commercial Bank) and this way the field openes to new categories of banking operators. Since 1990 untill now, despite some syncopes of some banks, negalively received by the public, the romanian banking system is obviously more stable and more well brought under regulation in comparison to the rest of the economy.

C. Underground banking systems. The system *hawalla. Twelve years ago, at the 58 th Interpol General Gathering, in december 1989, were discussed the systems of illegal international financial transactions. This type of underground banking systems exist for a long time, probably before the apparition of banking systems in the nowadays sense and it appears that they have the origins in Orient.

The underground banking system implies, in essence, the transfer, with no tracks left, of large sums of money in various zones of the globe, by avoiding the legal banking procedures, especially in those country which do not have regulations regarding custom control.

The motives of using this system are diverse, from the sending of small sums of money to relatives in poor countries, to the fiscal fraud and financing the great criminality: political and religious terrorism, arms and drug trafficking, etc.

The name under which this system is known varies from zone to zone: "chop shop" in chinese, "chiti", "hundi" or "hawalla" on the indian sub – continent and "stash house" in Lattin America. "Chop" and "chiti" are the names of an important document that keeps place for receipt and also note of hand.

"Hawalla" is a word in the "urdu" dialect and means trust in hindu.

The trust between parteners is the key stone in underground transactions, without which the whole structure collapses. This trust is obtained by any means, firstly through violence, that determines the partener to accept the rules of the game.[10]

On the global level, this type of cases are considered extremelly complicated, with a low procent of solving.

Imigrants which usually, but not allways, come from pauper countries, use a vast number of small magasines, restaurants, internet – caffes and bakeries to send money in the natal countries, as a way of helping. But these stores could be used to laundry money too, and for money transactions ment to sustain terrorism, wars and great criminality.

Since the events of 11 sepptember, the occidental goverments realised that the risc that transfer agencies might well financed terrorism.[11]

Brief conclusions

Banking and financial crime is a phenomenon that has implications not only in banking but in all areas of activity and, by the consequences it produces, affects the entire economy of a state. In fact, the main purpose of this type of crime is just obtaining the economic power.

---

[9] I. Dascălu, The off shore financial centers, Argument Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001, p. 4 - 6.

[10] Emilian Stancu, Treaty of Criminalistics, 3 rd Edition, Juridical Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004, p. 590.

[11] Almost all on Hawalla, the circuit of black Money, in National Courrier, year 11, nr. 4650, Monday, 05.06.2006.

Although several measures were taken, even modalities to combat this phenomenon have diversified and adapted new ways to commit these crimes, some of them very sophisticated; we here refer to those informative means which enable the performance of some banking transactions in just few seconds; banking and financial crime has increased. Some illegal acts are committed not only by blackmail and corruption, and by threats and violence, which considerably increased the danger to them.

Even if the causes, types of financial crime in the Romanian banking system and adverse effects of them are well known, as shown in the above mentioned, then the question arises which prevents us from easily combat the phenomenon and to draw people severely criminally liable consequently guilty and restore the previous situation in the economy minimize negative effects.

The answer, we unfortunately believe, is simple and primarily aimed the incapacity of the criminal repression authorities to identify in real time the indications for committing financial - banking crimes, incapacity generated by objective factors, such as lack of bank obligations to report items showing these hints and opacity of these institutions who plays erroneously the bank secrecy but also subjective factors such as lack of reputed specialists in the field which should be employed among the judicial bodies.

Taking in account a very simple social economic reality, namely that in the budget system, which includes training criminal authorities, salaries are not likely to encourage the highest recruitment specialists, people working in the field being urged on, in most cases, only by passion.

Last but not least, extremely cumbersome judicial proceedings marked by extremely complex financial and banking expertise by legal experts paid from the budget with amounts ranging between 200 and 5,000 EUR, in conditions in which, the defendants are accused of creating damages that far exceed the million hundreds of Euros, are elements of nature to severely delay the criminal proceedings but effective drawing success chance of the guilty to criminal liability and recovering damages.

References

Books

- C. Voicu, G. Ungureanu, A. Voicu, Globalisation and bancking – financial criminality, Juridical Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005
- G. Ungureanu, A. Boroi, Introduction in applied crime, Juridical Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004
- C. Voicu , Business criminality, M-I Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997
- C. Voicu, F. Sandu, I. Dascălu, Fraud in the financial – banking and the capital market system, 3 Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998
- T. Amza, Criminal conotations and new riscs to the public order, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2000
- F. Sandu*, Smuggling and organised crime*, National Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997
- Dascălu, The off shore financial centers, Argument Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001
- Emilian Stancu, Treaty of Criminalistics, 3 rd Edition, Juridical Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004

Journal articles

- Almost all on Hawalla, the circuit of black Money, in National Courrier, year 11, nr. 4650, Monday, 05.06.2006.

OBSTRUCTION OF THE EXERCISE OF ELECTORAL RIGHTS

MIRCEA CONSTANTIN SINESCU[*]

Abstract
Throughout the present study, we analyze the crime of obstruction of the exercise of electoral rights, as it is presented in the New Criminal Code, in comparison with the current regulation within the specific election laws. Taking into consideration the fact that the election crimes have been inserted as a separate title (section) in the New Criminal Code, we need to highlight the vision of the legislator regarding these crimes. Furthermore, this study consists of a synthetic analysis of the constitutive elements of the mentioned crime, as reconfigured in the form provided by art.385 of the New Criminal Code. We consider that examining this crime is a necessity, because of the lack of Court decisions in this area of practice - probably due to the gaps in the legislation preceding the Criminal Code that is to be enforced in the near future.

Keywords: elections, constitutional rights, obstruction, civil and political rights, democratic competition

1. Introductory Considerations

Equality and freedom, as the fundamental principles of the life in any society, need a political and legal correspondent of an institutional type, namely the Fundamental Law, which lays down the principles imposed by the democratic game, allowing the affirmation and the achievement of sovereignty as an exercise conducted through representative bodies.

Elections are, traditionally, the democratic process by which the people, as the holder of national sovereignty, exercise their right to elect and to designate their representative bodies, entrusting them with powers of utmost importance. This operation mechanism of the Establishment is driven by the decisional component of the people, consisting of the constituency, whose free expression of the right to vote legitimates and enforces the power of the state and the state authorities as such.

Political pluralism is in the Romanian society the central pillar of democracy, representing a condition and a guarantee for constitutional democracy. Political parties established by law "contribute the maintaining and the free expression of the political will of citizens".

Under these circumstances, the membership in one political party or another and the supporting of any party's ideology through direct involvement in the political life are fundamental rights of the citizens enshrined in and safeguarded by the Fundamental Law.

As the electorate is the one deciding on the governing and the governed and on the political party alternation to power, its political will ought to be clear and free and restricted only by the rules of democracy and political pluralism, all manifested as a legal corollary designed in such a way as to prevent any sideslips with unpredictable consequences.

Over the time, the defense of the political and the civil rights of citizens has been a constant concern of democratic regimes. During the interwar period, namely in 1936, the Criminal Code was adopted, known as the Criminal Code Charles II, which, under Title II, suggestively headed "Crimes Against the Exercise of Political and Citizens' Rights", was listing a series of offenses against such rights. Although some of these offenses were also incriminated by the electoral laws of the time (The Romanian Election Law of 27 March 1926, Article 122), the lawmakers considered it as an imperious necessity to criminalize them under the Criminal Code as well, as a further warranty for the safeguarding of the political rights of the citizens. In fact, the purpose of this criminalization was to "protect the citizens in the exercise of these rights and freedoms and to punish those attempting to prevent the free exercise thereof."

[*] Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, (email: mircea.sinescu@sinescu-nazat.ro).

The coming to power of the communist dictatorship regime was a new stage, which, judging in terms of the legal safeguarding of such rights, represented a major setback. In spite of these rights being enshrined in the Fundamental Law of 1965, they could not actually be safeguarded due to the dictatorial politics of the ruling party.

After December 1989, the establishment of the political parties and the revival of political pluralism and the parliamentary system called for the need to put in place a legal framework designed to defend the citizens' political rights, which materialized by incorporation in the election laws of specific provisions to criminalize the acts of violating the rights under our consideration.

Nowadays, nearly two decades from the county's return to democracy, the lawmaker has considered it necessary, acting in line with the modern trend towards crime codification system upgrading, to incorporate in the new Criminal Code an additional title, Title IX, covering election crimes. As a matter of fact, we believe that by placing election crimes under Title IX, right before Title X "National Security Offenses", Title XI – "Crimes Against the Fighting Capacity of Armed Forces", and Title XII – "Crimes of Genocide, Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes", the lawmaker has not only wished to stress out the high importance of the social values being safeguarded, which are a mix of public and private interests, in a context where this revised structure of the new Criminal Code is a common trait found in most European codes, but also to reflect the shape and the dynamics of the regulation, in keeping with the established order of incriminating, firstly, the offenses against individual interests and, secondly, the offenses harming the collective interest.

Obviously, election crimes have a complex generic judicial object, which comprises, on the one hand, the social relations dealing with the building of and compliance with the general organizational framework required for the safe running of the election process and the supervision of the democratic process of election of the public bodies, a process which must be governed by the rules of fairness and correctness in order that it may legitimize the results of the electorate vote. On the other hand, all of the criminalization in the New Criminal Code aim at respecting the exercise of the fundamental political rights (right to elect and be elected), which are protecting the individual, as a social relation, seen in relation to his or her appurtenance to the Romanian state.

2. Notion and Legal Content

According to the provisions of article 385 paragraph (1) of the new Criminal Code, prevention by any means of the free exercise of the right to elect or to be elected shall be punished with imprisonment from 6 months to up to 3 years. Also, pursuant to paragraph (2) of the same article, attack by any means against the election place shall be punished with imprisonment from 2 to up to 7 years and the prohibition to exercise certain rights.

Article 385 of the New Criminal Code has no counterpart in the previous Criminal Code, being, in fact, taken over from Article 52 and Article 58 of Law no. 35/2008 on the election of the Chamber of Deputies and of the Senate[1] and from Article 22 and Article 22^6 of the Law no. 33/2007 on the organization and the running of elections to the European Parliament[2], as well as from Article 107 and Article 111 of Law no. 67/2004 on the election of local public administrations[3] and Article

[1] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 196, of March 13 2008, as further amended by the GEO no. 66/2008 and GEO no. 97/2008.

[2] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 28, of January 16 2007, as further amended by the GEO no. 1/2007. GEO no. 8/2007. GEO no. 84/2007, GEO no. 11/2009 and GEO no. 55/2009.

[3] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 271, of March 29 2004, republished in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 333, of May 17 2007, as further amended by Law no. 131/2005, GEO no. 20/2008, Law no. 35/2008, GEO no. 32/2008 and Law no.129/2011.

263 of Law no. 370/2004 on the election of the President of Romania[4]. Compared to the previous regulations, the content of Article 385 of the New Criminal Code brings together and summarizes the provisions of the normative acts dealing with the organization and the running of the different types of electoral processes in Romania. Thus, the article is virtually reiterating identically the crimes criminalized under Article 26^3 of Law no. 370/2004, whose scope of application, however, has been extended to include the types of elections referred to in the previous body of laws, by repealing all the relevant articles from the aforementioned special laws.

The offense of preventing the exercise of electoral rights is regulated in Article 385 of the Criminal Code, in both its standard and its aggravated forms. The standard type of such offense is referred to in Article 385 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code and covers the prevention by any means of the free exercise of the right to elect or be elected. The aggravated form of this crime deals with the attack by any means against the place of election (polling station) [Article 385 (2) of the Criminal Code].

3. Analysis of Constituent Elements

3.1. Pre-existing Conditions

The special legal object consists mainly of the social relations related to the creation of and ongoing compliance with the general organizational framework for the fully safe running of the electoral process, as well as of the social relations dealing with the respect for the exercise of the fundamental political rights of the individual (the right to elect and to be elected).

This bundle of social relationships that are safeguarded by criminalization of the offense against these rights is primarily outlined by the provisions of the Fundamental Law of Romania, Title II, Chapter II – Fundamental Rights and Freedoms and in particular by Article 36 – Right to Elect[5], Article 37 - Right to Be Elected[6] and Article 38 - Right to be elected to the European Parliament[7]. The respect for the election rights of the Romanian citizens is in fact in full agreement with the international regulations and with the provisions of Article 3 of the First Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights, as well as with the provision of Article 25 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, consecrating the right to vote and to be elected at by organization of free elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage and shall be held by secret ballot, guaranteeing the free expression of the will of the electors[8].

---

[4] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 887, of September 29 2004, as further amended by GEO no. 77/2004 and GEO no 95/2009.

[5] Pursuant to Article 36 of the Fundamental Law of Romania: "(1) Every citizen having turned eighteen up to or on the election day shall have the right to vote. (2) The mentally debilitated or mentally alienated persons placed under interdiction as well as the persons disenfranchised by a final decision of the court cannot vote."

[6] Pursuant to Article 37 of the Fundamental Law of Romania: "(1) Eligibility to be elected is granted to all citizens having the right to vote, who meet the requirements in Article 16 (3), unless they are forbidden to join a political party, in accordance with Article 40 (3). (2) Candidates are required to have turned, up to or on the election day, at least twenty-three years of age in order to be elected to the Chamber of Deputies or members of local public administration bodies, at least thirty-three years of age in order to be elected to the Senate, and at least thirty-five years of age in order to be elected to the office of President of Romania.

[7] After Romania's accession to the European Union, Romanian citizens shall have the right to elect and be elected to the European Parliament.

[8] For a detailed analysis of the terms "elections" "electoral process" "right to elect" and "right to be elected" see I. Muraru, E.-S. Tănăsescu, A. Muraru, K. Benke, M.-C. Eremia, Gh. Iancu, C.-L. Popescu, Şt. Deaconu – Elections and Constituency – Ed. All Beck, Bucharest, 2005, pp 1-15; I. Deleanu – Institutions and Constitutional Procedures – Romanian Law and Comparative Law – Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2006, pp 66-68, pp 135-183, pp 489-490 and pp 572-583.

Note should ne made here that the legal status of the organization and conduct of elections in Romania is determined by the provisions of the election laws, namely by Law no. 35/2008 on the election of the Chamber of Deputies and of the Senate, Law no. 33/2007 on the organization and conduct of elections to the European Parliament, Law no. 67/2004 on the election of local public administrations, and Law no. 370/2004 on the election of the President of Romania.

The material object. A crime is usually devoid of material object to the extent to which the social values safeguarded by the standard type of the offense criminalized are abstract values and are not expressed by a material entity[9]. In its aggravated form however, we believe that the material object consists of the place of election (the building as such where the polling station is located, the various items inside the polling station etc.). However, where the crime also affects the bodily integrity of individuals inside the polling station, this does not become the material object of this crime but of another distinct crime, i.e. the crime against the bodily integrity or the health of the individual, in relation to which the offense referred to in paragraph (1) or paragraph (2) of Article 385 of the Criminal Code will be deemed as a concurrent crime.

The active subject. The active subject of the crimes covered by Article 385 of the Criminal Code can be any individual who meets the general conditions of the active subject of the crime. However, there are frequent cases when the active subject holds a certain official position: president or the members of the electoral bureau of a polling station; security officer in charge with public order and peace within the polling area; a member or a supporter of a particular party, faction or political alliance.

Criminal participation may occur in all its forms, in either of the forms of crime subject to criminalization.

The passive subject. The main passive subject is the state by its central and local administrations or its specialized bodies (The Permanent Electoral Authority) in charge with the organization and the running of the various types of elections in Romania.

Secondly, the passive subject is, on the one hand, the citizen who meets the requirements of the law allowing his or her to exercise his or her right to vote, and, on the other hand, the person / political party / political or electoral alliance that runs for the election.

According to the provisions of the Fundamental Law specified above and to those laid down by the election laws, to be a part of the constituency a person is required to meet the following legal requirements: to be a Romanian citizen, to have turned 18 years old before or on the day of election, not to be mentally impaired or alienated and not to be placed under a ban or disenfranchised by a final decision of the court.

On the other hand, the passive subject and the individual who is lawfully entitled to be elected may also be any citizen enjoying the right to elect, who resides in Romania, unless he or she is forbidden to join political parties under Article 40 (3) of the Fundamental Law of Romania. Also, depending on the public function or office the citizen intends to candidate for, he or she must also meet further conditions set out by the Fundamental Law and by the election laws, as appropriate. For example, under paragraph (2) of Article 37 of the Fundamental Law "candidates must have turned, up to or on the election day, at least twenty-three in order to be elected to the Chamber of Deputies or the bodies of local public administration, at least thirty-three in order to be elected to the Senate, and at least thirty-five in order to be elected to the office of President of Romania."

3.2. The Objective Dimension

The material element of the crime referred to under paragraph (1) of Article 385 of the Criminal Code is the prevention by any means of the free exercise of the right to elect or be elected. According to the definition given by the legislator, the action of the active subject may be exercised by both an action and an inaction and can take two forms: in the first sentence the offender prevents the elector from exercising his or her electoral choice, and the second sentence refers to the act of preventing a citizen or a political party or a political/an electoral alliance, that meets all the conditions established by law to run for elections, from obtaining the vote / votes of the constituency.

[9] I. Pascu – Criminal Law, General Part – Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest 2007, p. 157.

It is worth highlighting here that, although these forms of exercising the material element appear as alternative, the exercise of either form would normally involve the exercise of the other form as well, given the fact that prevention of the elector from manifesting an option may indirectly imply the prevention of any of the competitors to take advantage of that vote, and vice versa.

Preventing the free exercise of the right to elect or be elected can take the form of an action, such as, for example, the unreasonable prohibition of access of the elector to the polling station, the unlawful rejection of the candidature file of an eligible candidate etc., or the form of an inaction, such as, for example, refusal to give an elector the ballot ticket to be filled in.

Prevention action may be exercised, according to the legislator, "by any means", an expression which may involve both an act of physical obstruction, and one of a mental nature, such as solicitation or exertion of moral pressures on the passive subject. On the other hand, the action related to the material element may be performed either directly by the active subject or through other people (an order given to the security officer in charge with surveillance of the election place to forbid access onto the premises of certain persons or the blocking of the entry). However, where the action of the offender involves the use of any means that are typically associated with other crimes, such as unlawful deprivation of liberty, threat, blackmail, physical abuse, forgery etc., then the crime referred to in Article 385 (1) is concurrent with that particular offense (multiple offenses), where appropriate.

In its aggravated form, the material element of such crime involves the attacking by any means of the polling station. This manner of committing a crime is always and exclusively by way of action, as defined by the expression verbum regens, which describes an aggression against the election station. We believe that the wording "election station" refers to the building where the polling station is located and any items as may be found on the premises, in which case the action corresponding to the material element is not directly against the persons inside or in the immediate vicinity of the election station.

However, where the assault affects (also) one/several individuals, then we will be dealing with a case of multiple crimes consisting of the offense referred to in Article 385 (2) of the Criminal Code and a crime against the life, the bodily integrity or the health of an individual, respectively, as the case may be.

The main and immediate consequence of this offense is the generation of a hazardous situation, which endangers the exercise of the fundamental political rights of the citizens, while secondarily endangering the proper organization and conduct of the election process.

The causal link results from the materiality of the act (ex re), i.e. preventing the exercise of political rights by any means, which would suffice in itself to endanger the safeguarded values.

3.3. The Subjective Dimension

The form of guilt is usually the direct purport; however, indirect intent may also be considered a form of guilt depending on whether the active subject has sought to actually prevent the exercise of political rights or has only agreed with such a possibility.

The motive and the purpose, though not specifically determined, may also be relevant in determining the form of guilt with which the crime was committed, all the more that crimes of this type are in most cases caused by dissatisfaction with some of the candidates in the elections or are purporting at favoring some candidates in the detriment of others.

4. Forms and Means

This crime is susceptible of all the forms of the offense purported. Thus, while the acts preparatory to the commission of the crime, though possible, are not criminalized, the attempt is criminalized under Article 393 of the Criminal Code. For example, the attempt to commit an electoral crime occurs in the following case: after the voting and the return of the vote stamp, the elector is asked by a member of the election bureau to leave the section without signing the electoral list, thereby purporting to invalidate the elector's vote, although the elector refuses to follow the order and proceeds to the signing of the electoral list.

Consummation of the crime takes place upon the successful prevention of the exercise of the right to elect or be elected or in the case of an attack against the polling station.

5. Penalties

Preventing the exercise of electoral rights, in the standard form, is punished with imprisonment from 6 months to up to 3 years.

In its aggravated version referred to in paragraph (2), i.e. in the case of attack (assault) by any means against the polling station, is punished with imprisonment from 2 to 7 years and the prohibition of exercising certain rights.

Under Article 33 of the Criminal Code, attempt is applied the punishment prescribed by law for crime consumed but reduced to half.

Conclusions

As the legislator states in the Recitals to the new Criminal Code, it was considered preferable to regroup electoral crimes under a separate title of the Criminal Code, in order to give this text of law a greater stability, while also eliminating the overlaps currently existing in the regulation. Indeed, under the various incriminations contained by the election laws in force, although the offenses criminalized by the various laws are to a large extent similar, some correlation gaps and discrepancies have nevertheless pervaded into the regulation, which are totally unreasonable. Therefore we believe that in this case, too, alike in the case of other provisions of the New Criminal Code, the law has returned to the interwar legislator's mindset, with the systematization and the restructuring of these crimes involving also a more just individualization and enforcement of the legal texts in this matter.

Consequently, in the context of this new regulation, we believe that the process of establishment, investigation and punishment of the crimes contemplated herein may take place in conditions that are more favorable than in the past. Moreover, the absence, for various reasons, of previous judicial practice should not obstruct the application in the future of this text of law, taking into account the multitude of electoral processes taking place in Romania after the country's accession the European Union in 2007.

References

A. Treaties, Courses, Monographs

- Deleanu – "Institutions and Constitutional Procedures in the Romanian Law and the Comparative Law", C.H. Beck Publisher, Bucharest, 2006
- C.C. Dosanto – "Federal Prosecution on Election Offenses", 6th Edition, Practicing Law Institute, 1995

- C. Ionescu – "The Fundamental Law of Romania. Revision Law Commented and Annotated with Parliamentary Debates, All Beck Publisher, Bucharest, 2003
- Muraru, E.-S. Tănăsescu, A. Muraru, K. Benke, M.-C. Eremia, Gheorghe Iancu, C.-L. Popescu, Șt. Deaconu- "Elections and the Constituency" - All Beck Publisher, Bucharest, 2005.
- C.G. Rătescu, I. Ionescu-Dolj etc., Criminal Code Charles II, annotated, Volume II, Special Part, Socec & Co. Bookshop S.A. Bucharest, 1937

B. Specialized Studies and Literature

- Dorin Ciuncan – "The Crime of Unlawful Exercise of the Right to vote and Introduction in the Ballot Box of Additional Ballots" – "The Law" no. 12/1997;
- T.V. Gheorghe, "Some Comments and De Lege Ferenda Proposals on the Crime of Electoral Corruption, rev. "The Law" no. 10/2005;
- Mirela Gorunescu Catalin Stănculescu – "The Concept of Fraud in the Romanian Legislation" – "The Law" no. 12/2009;
- Mihai Adrian Hotca – "Comment on the Special Part of the New Criminal Code (II)" – "Romanian Pandectes" no. 1 / 2010;
- Ion Rusu – "Offences against the Exercise of Political and Citizen Rights" – "The Law" no. 6 / 2005.

C. Judicial Practice

- www.scj.ro
- www.jurindex.ro
- www.legalis.ro

EUTHANASIA STIPULATED BY ROMANIAN CRIMINAL LAW, MITIGATING CIRCUMSTANCES VS. OFFENCE

MONICA POCORA*

Abstract
This paper aims to be a scientific approach to the issue of euthanasia, bringing into the debate current and future controversies raised by euthanasia, as a result of the introduction into the Romanian penal law of the criminal offence of homicide by request of the victim. The study represents an approach to moral, religious, constitutional, civil, criminal procedure debates and last but not least to criminal debates regarding the legalization of the euthanasia, as the most difficult task lies with the criminal law.

Keywords*: life, death, assisted suicide, human rights, criminal sanction.*

Introduction

Between the protected rights by the Romanian Criminal law, there is the privilege of life of one fellow. Therefore, the title of this theme is recommended matters looking for protection of this privilege, as well as the situations appeared by a severe illness of one person. I've discussed about euthanasia, the etymology, those three familiar and well-known meanings, as well as appearing controversy regarding to this notion. This subject was concluded through conclusions and suggestions. The suggestions are reporting about the euthanasia. It should be express scheduled of Romanian penal law and considered offences of attempt for human being; or, the euthanasia should be extenuating circumstances of manslaughter when this is imposed by medicine reasons.

Some authors, based on the idea that suicide is a right of every individual claimed that anyone can send another person the right to take life. Last century was born a trend called "right of death" and that advertising for each individual the right to ask to be saved from death throes. This design is dedicated to any legislation, the legislators showing an understandable caution in allowing suppression of life at the request of a person no matter how motivated would be such a solution. For the first killing on request data been settled by German Penal Code which provide that person's request must be "explicit and serious" to be considered. Also, the Hungarian Criminal Code of 1980, regulate the killing on request, provided the existence of a "motivated and serious request." The same condition an advertisement and the Swiss Penal Code in 1916 in the sense of "urgent and serious request." In this category is included the German Penal Code of 1939, which regulate the agreed murder only if the request came from a man seriously ill or injured. Italian Penal Code is stipulated by Art. 579 provision for mitigating the penalty to "murder one who consents." The act was considered an offense on the person.

The main elements of novelty existing in the current criminal legislative reform are rendered by the repositioning of the values that the criminal law protects. Thus, the legislator aims to protect the most important social value, i.e. the person, fact that reflects the fundamental interests of the individual or of the society; this is justified by the fact that the person is, above all, subject to different types of assault into the daily life. Before being incriminated, these offences suppose an assessment of the danger they present. This assessment is made taking into consideration the interests of the society and not those of each individual. Thus, it is possible for a person whose honor has been insulted not to give importance to the offence committed against him/her or, even to judge it as favorable by comparison with a personal code of assessment, such as the biblical precepts. Then, the notion of "important" in terms of the social value system is different from a historical stage to another and from one country to another.

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "Danubius" University of Galati (email: monicapocora@univ-danubius.ro).

The people's perception concerning the euthanasia is marked especially by the existing precepts in connection with the notions of "life" and "death".

Often, it has been demonstrated that the theological vision can provide the sciences of law, sociology, medicine, with the correct premises, so that any person can claim a fundamental right of his/her own. Seen as a divine gift, life is the supreme value of man on Earth, as it is the support of the other values that express it and that impose it ahead them. In accordance with the fact that each human being belongs to the same human race, the right to life is shown to be the fundamental expression of the human existence. As a consequence, the Christian religion believes that nobody is allowed to attempt to take his/her peer's life or his/her own life, as life is a divine gift. This view is joined by both Buddhist and Jewish religions, in the sense that euthanasia, irrespective of its form, should be banned. It was also considered that, if all international conventions on human rights were not premised upon the theological vision on human life and upon the right to life, then, they would risk turning man into a social individual, subject to arbitrary, loose, and unprincipled laws.

Equally, religion considers that we must respect each other, as well as we must respect the other's wishes concerning the end of their life. Regarding this latter aspect, the following question can be raised: why doesn't religion allow the last dying wish of a moribund person, namely that someone puts an end to the moribund person's suffering? In the attempt to provide an answer, we consider that the intrinsic value of that human being is a priority, in disfavor of his/her will.

Legal beliefs

Within this paper, case study and observation method were those that allowed the debate of some of the most controversial issues related to euthanasia, the judicial practice serving as the empirical basis for drawing up conclusions.

Numerous studies approaching the issue of euthanasia have been published, but socio-human realities constantly stir debate and controversy about the assisted suicide. Euthanasia was practiced in ancient times, because it was considered that life should not be preserved at all costs. Later, in countries such as Switzerland, the Netherlands, Australia, the USA, euthanasia was legally practiced[1].

Some authors, starting from the idea that the suicide is a right of every individual, have upheld the idea that anyone can transfer to another person the right to take his/her life. Thus, authors such as K. Binding and A. Hoche pleaded since 1920 for the legalization of euthanasia[2], in the sense that they attempted to prove that legalizing euthanasia was not inhumane, whereas compelling the patient to die in agony was, when there existed the possibility to get rid of the ordeal by accelerating the patient's death. Then, the establishment of a special commission was proposed, commission that had to be composed of physicians and lawyers who had to decide upon the desperate condition of the patient.

The human, creating himself, acquired thought and feeling that, although seem to be independent, have been limited by the restrictions and prescriptions imposed by society. In this sense, in the relation individual- society, the concept of society reflects certain dominant fundamental rules and principles or systems of values that characterize social life.

A new path was opened for humanity, with multiple contradictory aspects in which the interests of science will inevitably collide with the ones of ethics, Christian morality and political interests of the states. The former president of the United States of America, Bill Clinton said: "We have to accept the serious ethical and moral issued raise by this extraordinary revolution". Same as the former American president, the British premier Tony Blair underlined that "humanity has the duty to use the new valuable information in a responsible manner and for the benefit of the entire humanity[3].

[1] http://www.rnw.nl/english/dossier/Euthanasia. (2010, June 26).

[2] O'Mathúna, Dónal P. Human dignity in the Nazi era: implications for contemporary bioethics. Germany: BMC Medical Ethics, 2006.

The objective causes and especially the social ones determine the different human behavior and manners of actions so that the social restrictions acquire a mandatory normative aspect.

The general argument resulting from the relations of the individual with the society consists in the fact that society develops in a positive manner because, within the complex process of education, the individual integrates in the normative and evolutional structure of society[4].

Other authors have equally considered that homicide by request should not be treated in a different way than absurd murder, they being unable to accept the idea of a right to suicide. We can mention here the Spanish Penal Code, the French, the Belgian, the Canadian ones and also the Criminal Code of Luxembourg. Nevertheless, these very laws that regulate the possibility of consented homicide do not allow for it to remain unpunished. The homicide upon the patient's request was for the first time stipulated by the German Criminal Code which provided that the victim's request had to be "explicit and serious" in order to be taken into consideration. In order to exemplify this aspect of the need of the existence of a "serious and motivated request" made by the victim, we may cite the Hungarian Criminal Code, the Swiss Penal Code, and the Italian Criminal Code. Among the law systems devoted to not punishing the homicide by request, we could mention the Russian legislation.

The human body cannot represent an object of law and the human, assimilated to the physical person, cannot be but a subject of law and not an object of law[5]. In this context, the human body, complete and viable, in the actual conception of doctrine and jurisprudence, cannot be sold or donated because it would mean the reestablishment of slavery and transformation of the person in an object of patrimony rights, while the elements of the human body can, in exceptional cases, make the object of acts of dispositions, in the extent allowed by law, because they are not a person in the judicial sense of the word.

In the interwar Germany, it was even introduced a bill in Parliament, that stipulated that the one who wanted his/her own death had the possibility to address the court in order to obtain that. The court, on the basis of a medical assessment, could certify the thoroughness of the demand and could authorize a physician to put an end to the patient's life in a certain way. Subsequently, that bill was censored

The jurisprudence is not unitary either in solving victim consented homicide trials; most courts continue to consider these acts as murder. In some European countries, as well as in some of the American states, acquittal verdicts of defendants who committed acts of murder out of mercy or upon request were nevertheless pronounced. For example, the case of Dr. Herman Sander which used his medical profession in the USA (Eillott C.,Quinn F. 2000). He was charged with the first-degree homicide of a cancer patient, a woman whose end was inevitable and who was terribly suffering, because the administration of painkillers did not have any effect at that stage of her disease. The doctor put an end to her suffering by injecting air into her veins.

Euthanasia in Romania – Past, present and future

Romanian legislation has adopted a resolute position with regard to punishing murder, even if it was euthanasia. The Romanian Criminal Code of 1936 incriminated distinctly the murder of a person if committed as a result of a tenacious, repeated and constant plea of the victim or if committed out of mercy in order to put an end to the agony of an incurable patient (article 468, paragraph 1)[6].

---

[3] Avram, A., Revolutia genetica, Jurnalul Cotidianul, 2000.

[4] Tanasescu, I. et al. (2000). Tratat elementar de drept penal si criminologie. Craiova: Sitech.

[5] Friedman, Y. (2008). Building Biotechnology: Business, Regulations, Patents, Law, Politics, Science. Logoss press.

[6] Dongoroz V.,colab. „Noul Cod penal şi Codul penal anterior". Bucureşti: Editura Politică, 1969.

Initially, three meanings of euthanasia were accepted. Euthanasia was seen: as the suppression of physically or mentally disabled people's life, as the reduction of the final ordeal nevertheless without causing death, and as the acceleration of the death of people who do not have any chance of recovery. As one can see, the first two meanings are no longer justifiable in the meaning of criminal law, as there is no social group that dares to make use of them anymore, the reduction of the patient's ordeal without causing his/her death being now considered as a fundamental responsibility of the medical personnel[7].

The individual behavior becomes more the result of learning rather than heredity so that, if under the aspect of the reaction pattern to external stimulations, it does not seem to have a special signification, regarding the creation of a behavioral prototype of a crowd, or society, it represents the basic rule according to which its members act relatively stable and constant. Within the human behavioral structure, both biological and educational elements are included. The behavioral phenomenon, structuring actions and individual reactions as a manner of human interaction, is protected under the aspect of dignity and identity of the human being[8].

The Romanian legislation that is in effect does not allow murder upon request or by consent, considering that in this case only a judicial extenuating circumstance could be considered in favor of the author. Unlike that, the New Criminal Code begins with Title I "Crimes against the person", Chapter I "Crimes against life", the article 90 stipulating the "Homicide by request of the victim". According to this legislative stipulation, "murder carried out at the explicit, serious, conscious and constant request of a victim suffering from an incurable disease or from a medically certified serious disability causing him/her permanent and unbearable suffering, shall be punished by imprisonment from 1 to 5 years".

In terms of the criminal procedure law, starting from the limits of the penalty stipulated for the crime of homicide by victim's request, it may be presumed that the culprit can meet the circumstances of conditional suspension of sentence, so that he/she does not actually execute the penalty the court mete out to him/her, according to the stipulations of the article 81 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In Romania, the Latin principle of "volenti et consentienti non fit injuria" ("to a willing person, no injury is done" or "no injury is done to a person who consents") excluded the possibility of punishing the person who took the life of a victim upon his/her own request.

The Romanian criminal legislation stipulates, within the framework of homicide, the criminal offence of causing or aiding suicide, provided that the suicide had taken place. The penalty included both in the present law and in the New Criminal Code, is, for the simple version - imprisonment up to 7 years, and if the victim is devoid of discernment, the penalty is imprisonment of up to 10 years. Thus, a first question that could be raised would be whether in the case of euthanasia it is always presumed the fact that the victim has discernment. Could this situation be mistaken for causing or aiding suicide? We state that, because there may be an identity between the victim and the form of guilt in what concerns the author, namely the intention. The main distinction, though, consists in the penalty applied. As a consequence, maybe the suicide attempt should also be incriminated.

Moreover, the correct placement and assessment of euthanasia within the criminal law is relevant also in terms of civil law, namely in the matter of succession. Thus, were the euthanasia beyond the scope of any criminal penalty, any descendant looking for enriching his/her patrimony by means of legacy might claim this situation, easily arguing that the deceased has expressly requested the suppression of his sufferings.

The jurists have opposed to the accreditation of the right of the individual to dispose of their own body, motivating the fact that this type of recognition would lead to the self degradation of humans. The interdiction to commercialize the human body or parts of it is expressly provisioned by the French law on bioethics as well as in the European Convention on human rights and Biomedicine adopted by the Council of Europe. Modern biotechnology has indicated that it can become one of the possible motors of the development of society in the third millennium, being compared with revolutionary methods that have changed human society forever such as the Great Industrial Revolution, the discovery of the atomic bomb or spatial research, promises a considerable medical progress and a possible improvement of the human condition but at the same time, has the potential to create unwanted or unpredictable problems with an impact that can be profound on the right to life, corporal integrity and health of individuals, human dignity but also on the structure of society as we know it now[9]. In its wider sense, the concept of "biotechnology" refers to the technologies using living organisms (virus, bacteria, animal or vegetal cells coming from simple or complex organisms) or their sub cellular components purified in order to obtain useful stocks of commercial products, in order to improve the characteristics of plants, animals or humans or to create microorganisms for specific purposes[10].

---

[7] Pocora, M. „Probleme legate de protectia dreptului la viata la inceput de mileniu III." Conferinta Internationala "Integrarea Europeana-Realitati si Pespective". Galati: Analele Universitatii Danubius, 2007.

[8] Cosmovici, A. (1996). Psihologie generala. Iasi: Polirom.

Conclusions

Life is a "gift" that we receive only once and we must make everything humanly possible to enjoy this miracle. The right to life is an inalienable human right and it is beyond any individual's attempt to dispose of it; nevertheless, one should not omit the distinction between living and being alive, the latter situation being only a purely biological phenomenon. It would be a mistake for us to consider the lives of moribund people as being worthless and to draw the conclusion that it would be better for them to die.

Not punishing the murder committed upon the request of the victim is also to be blamed, because it could lead to serious abuses, including the danger that under the guise of seeming acts of charity one could try to get rid of temperamental children or of the elderly who don't suffer of any disease but who are in the care of others. Moreover, there is the opinion that, the fact of invoking an incurable state would render the use of scientific progress difficult and, in these cases the victim's consent could hardly be acknowledged as being freely expressed. Therefore, we completely agree with the punishment of the murder upon the victim's request, but not as a standalone crime, because the limits of the imprisonment penalty are reduced, but as extenuating circumstances of the crime of homicide, because the limits of its penalty are increased.

References

- Dongoroz V.,colab. „Noul Cod penal şi Codul penal anterior". Bucureşti: Editura Politică, 1969.
- Bustamante, P. I. & Bowra, S. (2002). Biotechnology in developing countries: harnessing the potential of HIGH TECH SMES in the face of global competition. Electronic Journal of Biotechnology
- Eillott C.,Quinn F. Criminal law. London, 2000.
- http://www.rnw.nl/english/dossier/Euthanasia. 26 June 2010. (accesat January 2011).
- http://www.rnw.nl/english/dossier/Euthanasia. 26 June 2010. (accesat January 2011).
- O'Mathúna, Dónal P. Human dignity in the Nazi era: implications for contemporary bioethics. Germany: BMC Medical Ethics, 2006.
- Pocora, M. „Probleme legate de protectia dreptului la viata la inceput de mileniu III." Conferinta Internationala "Integrarea Europeana-Realitati si Pespective". Galati: Analele Universitatii Danubius, 2007.
- http://www.rnw.nl/english/dossier/Euthanasia. (2010, June 26)

[9] Vasiu, I. (2004). Manipularea genetica. Implicatii penale. Revista de Drept Penal.

[10] Bustamante, P. I. & Bowra, S. (2002). Biotechnology in developing countries: harnessing the potential of HIGH TECH SMES in the face of global competition. Electronic Journal of Biotechnology.

- Avram, A., Revolutia genetica, Jurnalul Cotidianul, 2000
- Friedman, Y. (2008). Building Biotechnology: Business, Regulations, Patents, Law, Politics, Science. Logoss press.
- Tanasescu, I. et al. (2000). Tratat elementar de drept penal si criminologie. Craiova: Sitech
- Vasiu, I. (2004). Manipularea genetica. Implicatii penale. Revista de Drept Penal

THE CONCEPT OF PATRIMONY AND COMMON ASPECTS OF OFFENCES AGAINST PATRIMONY REGULATED BY THE CRIMINAL LAW

MONICA POCORA[*]
MIHAIL-SILVIU POCORA[]

Abstract
This study aims to analyze in detail the concept of patrimony and then, will identify the common aspects of all offences against patrimony regulated by the actually Criminal Law. We presented elements of meaning of "patrimony" term, stipulated both by Criminal Law and Civil Law, under this point of view, it can be observed that incriminating the offences against patrimony, the Criminal Law takes into account the illicit action of offender and not the juridical position of victim. Continuing the conceptual analyze of "patrimony", we highlight although the Constitutional provisions. As regarding the common aspects of offences against patrimony, we presented a classification of these crimes, based on identity of material element, as well as result of some foreign criminal legislation (for example, the Italian Criminal Law, French Criminal Law).

Keywords*: patrimony protection, offence, comparative law*

Introduction

According to New Civil Code, any natural or legal person is a heritage owner which includes all rights and duties that can be measured in money belonging to it (Art. 31).

In case of division or offended the rights transfer and duties of an patrimony to other within the same property, is made under prescribed legal conditions and without prejudice the creditors rights on other property.

In terms of doctrine, "patrimony" term means a notion framed precisely of private law: all rights and duties valued in money of a person had an important utility[1] in major areas, such as inheritable transmissions.

Similarly, the property is regarded as an ensemble of assets, somehow separate by owner that can acquire, administer, but whenever he can sale it.

Generally, the property is a legal universality, an ensemble of individual subjective rights who may be converted in money and can be transmitted[2].

In terms of criminal law, "patrimony" term has a different meaning as in civil law. In terms of civil law, the patrimony means all rights and duties of an individual that can have an economical value, that can be measured in money or in other words, all current and future rights and duties of a person[3].

In this regard it can be noted that sanctioning facts affecting the property, criminal law considers illegal actions of perpetrator and not the legal position of victim. This means that offender has to justify he had the right to commit an illicit in relation with prosecution bodies, if he is owner or a simple legal holder of stolen, appropriated or destroyed asset, by committed crime[4].

---

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "Danubius" University of Galati, (email: monicapocora@univ-danubius.ro) .
[] Ph. D. candidate, „Al.I. Cuza" Police Academy, Bucharest, (email: silviupocora@yahoo.com).
[1] Dogaru, I., Cercel, S. Drept civil. Teoria generală a drepturilor reale. Bucureşti: Editura All Beck, 2003.
[2] Djuvara, M. Teoria generală a dreptului. Bucureşti: Editura All Beck, 1995 .
[3] Popescu-Brăila, T.R. Drept civil, vol. I . Bucureşti: Romcart S.A., 1993.
[4] Dongoroz, V. Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului penal Român, vol. III. Bucureşti: Editura Academiei, 1971.

Therefore, criminal law considered that in order to protect the patrimony and its rights. There is no doubt that an asset is keeps the facts situation established and known to those concerned, anyone could claim to have a right on that good and it can effectively exploit. If asset has lost the facts situation (for example, has been appropriated, removed, concealed, destroyed, stolen, etc.), any right capitalization regarding it becomes unenforceable This is the reason why criminal law punishes even the owner if its action helps to changing the facts situation of its asset in detriment of legitimate interests of others (for example, damages offences provided by Art. 217, par. 2-4 Penal Code, or theft sanctioned by Art. 208 par. 3 Penal Code.).

Therefore, the change by illegally means of entities economic situation are crimes provided in Title III of the Criminal Code. Another specificity of this category of crime is under global "crimes against property" name, are hide two important categories of assets likely to be protected by criminalizing acts against property, in relation to various forms of ownership.

Delimitation of basic forms of ownership, subject to criminal protection is stipulated even by constitutional rules; art. 136 par. 1, Constitution provides: "Property is public or private" which means that in our society are not developed other forms of ownership than those listed by Constitution.

As regard the specific objects belonging to one or other forms of property, constitutional norms using differential technique, they are not mentioned directly in categories of assets that belong to private property but only those which form public property. Knowing these types of assets indirectly, we realize the area of assets belonging to private property. In this category will include all assets which not form the public domain. Art. 136 par. 3 by Constitution is stipulates the exclusive assets belonging to public property: riches of public interest of the subsoil, air space, waters with hydropower of national interest, beaches, territorial sea, natural resources of economic area continental shelf area, and other assets established by law. Therefore, in addition to assets expressly provided in the text above can be included the category of assets belonging to public property. So for example, by Law no. 18/1991 on the land as by Law no. 243/2002 on OUG no. 243 of 2002 approving GEO no. 105 din 2001 on the state border of Romania, are listed and other goods.

These laws broaden the assets listed by Constitution through adding other assets which form exclusively public property, as is done by art. 5 Law no. 18/1991, on land as well as art. 7 par. (1) of GEO no. 105/2001 approved by Law no. 243/2002, which refers to the strip border protection and by art. 10 par. (2) on premises of border crossing points.

Another method of broadening the sphere of assets belonging to public property that call these special laws is to indicate the criteria by which it can determine the asset belonging to public property. Art. 5 par.1 of Law no. 18/1991 is states that land which by its nature is used or has a public interest and Art. 4 last par. stipulates that land "affected to a public utility"[5] belong to the public property.

Thus, the nature assets of their by public utilities are the main criteria stipulated by laws referred to delimit assets exclusively belonging to public property. These goods under the Constitution and the law could be found in an autonomous administration, either a public institution or in a company detention that he was hired. If the special law provides otherwise, rental or lease may be made to a company with majority state, or any other company. Public property feature is that it is inalienable, that goods from this class should stay in a public property field. This does not mean it is not possible the movement, a certain transfer of such assets. As noted above even the Constitution in Art. 136 par. 4 provides under law, asset of public property can be managed by autonomous administrations, public institutions or may be leased or rented, also they can be put into free using to public institutions. According to criminal law in force, public property is not differentiated protected likely previously. This means that, within the legal sanction, judges should consider the quality of these assets and treat more harshly those affecting public property.

[5] Dec. pen., . nr. 84-1995 (C. de Apel Piteşti, 2/1996).

Unlike assets of public property that we can identify easily and directly on basis of constitutional norms and special laws, assets of private property is identified indirectly and all other goods non included in public property had this character. Does not matter if these assets are in possession of a individual or legal persons. Also does not matter if they are state property or a private person. As a result, private property can have both state and citizens and legal entities, such as companies. Assets of autonomous administration (other those belonging to public property and gave them for administration) are not state owned, but private property of state. As well as a company assets within state holds majority social capital (except for assets belonging to public property and assigned as concession or rent).

Common aspects of offences against patrimony regulated by the Criminal Code

Patrimony protection is provided mainly by other branches of law (civil law, administrative, labor, etc.) criminal law has just a subsidiary role. It acts only if others ways are ineffective (non-criminal means), but if criminal law is incident and is the most energetic and effective defense of property[6].

For all these reasons, actually the legal framework governing the crimes against patrimony by Romanian Penal Code in force is found in Title III of the Special Part, which has even this name - "Crimes against patrimony". It is a title with no subdivisions, even the doctrine proposed such groups of crimes.

Thus, in relation to specific of each actions which represent the material element of offense, it is proposed a classification of crimes against patrimony in three main categories: circumvention acts (theft, robbery, piracy and concealment), actions made by fraud (breach of trust, fraudulent management, fraud, embezzlement and appropriation of found asset), and arbitrariness acts (destruction and disturbance of possession)[7].

In some foreign criminal law, crimes against patrimony know a certain systematization or classification[8]. Thus, Italian criminal law distinguishes crimes against patrimony as based on violence against the person or things, or based on fraud. French criminal law divided offenses against patrimony in two main categories namely: fraudulent appropriation of property (theft, fraud, funds abduction) and other property attacks (concealment, destruction, degradation, aggression against treatment system of computer data).

1. Legal generic object of offenses against patrimony is patrimony as social value and ensemble of social relationships which are born, develops and grows in relation to namely social value, especially in terms of real rights concerning to property, including the obligation of maintain the initial legal status of assets as part of that patrimony[9].

Some crimes such as robbery had a complex legal subject because as primarily is affected the social value, named patrimony, and secondary the social value represented by life, health, physical integrity or individual freedom.

Material object of crime in general is thing on which moves the material element of offense[10]. Regarding the crimes against patrimony, the material object is represented by mobile or immobile assets against was directed the criminal activity. Some offenses can only had a mobile asset (the crime of theft, robbery, breach of trust, embezzlement or appropriation of found asset), while in others it may be an immobile asset (destruction in any variants or possession disturbance).

---

[6] Pascu, I., Gorunescu, M. Drept penal, partea specială. Bucureşti: Editura Hamangiu, 2008.
[7] Dongoroz, V., şi colab., . Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului penal, vol. III.
[8] Antoniu, G. „Ocrotirea penală a patrimoniului în dreptul comparat." R.D.P. , nr. 2/2000.
[9] Boroi, Al. Drept penal, Partea specială. Bucureşti: Editura C.H. Beck, 2006.
[10] Pascu, I. Drept penal, Partea generală. Bucureşti: Editura Hamangiu, 2007.

The perpetrator of most crimes against patrimony can be any person who carried out general conditions of criminal responsibility[11], if law not provides a special quality for it.

Some of Title offenses are proper in sense of requires a special skill to perpetrator - for example, embezzlement for which law establishes a special quality of perpetrator - the official administrator.

Criminal participation is possible of all crime against patrimony. If the offense requires a special qualification of perpetrator, for joint author existence is required all participants carried out this qualification. When condition is not fulfilled, the joint author is not possible and the simple participant is considered only an accomplice to crime. It is possible the improper participation when deliberate intervention of instigator or accomplice, the author has acted without fault or by negligence.

Some of crimes against patrimony had been characterized particularly by specialty doctrine. It is breach of trust crime that states it can be committed by joint author only if the mobile asset was entrusted to offenders. In case of the fraudulent administration only when offenders were required to manage or preserve assets in common.

Victim of offenses against patrimony can be any individual or legal person, as appropriate, and the state when assets against was directed criminal activity is an object exclusive of public property. It is possible that in certain cases to be a secondary victim, represented by individual or legal person that owns the asset, or who have certain rights on asset unable to turn account such as garnishment creditor or beneficent owner.

In case of complex crimes: robbery and piracy, given the objective particularities of these crimes, there is a mainly passive subject victim, whose patrimony has been harmed by violence, but there may be a secondary victim, namely, the individual that supports violence exercised by defendant, even if it was not injured in his patrimonial rights[12].

The most common crimes against patrimony are not found special conditions of place and time for crime existence. In case of theft or robbery, specific requirements regarding location and time during committed offense can be only aggravation circumstances of offense.

The problems occured by offences against property can not be considered exhausted, and a new research is adequate owing to problems complexity, observed in connection about them.

Inclusively the structure of title including incriminations created in order to protect individual property, is subject to controversy. Although the New Criminal Code is intended to be an improvement of actually Criminal law, we believe that some incrimination text has an ambigous content. Thus, we can see that breach of trust offence by creditors frauding is supposed invocation of fictitious documents (by material element), which can mean either an offences concourse (if we talk about a false document), or a complex offence. In relation of these matters, we believe that penalty is too low (imprisonment not exceeding 3 years or fine). The fraud in the New Criminal Code is maintained only the first paragraph and aggravated according to, is punished more severely, respectively, the fraud committed by using false names or qualities, or other fraudulent means. As the same time, are repealed par.3-5, which refers to inducing or maintaining a person in error upon the execution or signing an agreement, issuing a check on a credit institution or a person, well knowing for its exploitation are no enough supply, both the fraud with extremely grave consequences.

2. Integrant content

Material element of objective side of crimes against patrimony can be either an action, or in most cases, an inaction. From the legal content of these crimes, it appears that some offenses had a single material element as an action (theft), other as alternative actions (embezzlement, destruction, concealment) or cumulative (robbery, piracy), and in other situations, alternative action or inaction (acquiring found asset).

[11] Bulai,C., Bulai, B. Manual de drept penal. Bucureşti: Editura Universul Juridic, 2007.
[12] Mitrache, C., Mitrache, C. Drept penal, Partea generală. Bucureşti : Editura Universul Juridic, 2006.

The result socially dangerous is production of damage to patrimony of individual or legal private or public legal entity. In the case of complex crimes - robbery or piracy, other social values are affected which attracted and adjacent results. If some offences produce very serious consequences (in sense of Art. 146 Penal Code.), it will be retained as aggravated content of offense.

Causative relation between material element and immediate result often provides from materiality of committed offense, while in other cases it must proved by evidence.

The form of guilt found in subjective side of most crimes against patrimony is usually direct or indirect intention. In case of aggravated forms of robbery or piracy the guilt form is superannuated intention. Just a crime against patrimony can be committed by negligence – destruction by negligence.

3. Forms, means and sanctions

a) Preparatory acts are not usually sanctioned they may have a criminal value, of complicity acts if were committed by other person than author and were used it to commit the crime. There are exceptions to this rule provided by art. 209 par. (5) Penal Code which provides as an attempt to perform certain acts (referred expressly by law) which can be used to commit qualified theft under provisions of Art. 209 par. (3) of Penal Code.

b) Attempt, possible for most crimes of this category (except destruction by negligence - art. 219 Penal Code), is sanctioned under provisions of Art. 222 of Penal Code.

c) Crimes consumption against patrimony occurs when the execution of intentional action is totally done, causing specific and dangerous consequence of these crimes.

c) If references crimes are committed in continuous form (for example, theft of electricity) or continued, will exist the exhaustion phase, when the extension acts were stopped or was committed the last action (inaction) of continued crime.

Crimes against patrimony, in order to an extension of generic social danger, can be punished alternative with imprisonment, in lower limits, and the fine penalty, or with imprisonment sanction until to maximum special limit of 25 years.

For some offenses in aggravated variants, it provides additional punishment of certain rights prohibition (qualified theft, robbery, piracy, fraud, embezzlement, qualified destruction).

If conditions of art. 118 C. of Penal Code will be fulfilled, it can be take into account the special seizure as a safety measure.

Conclusions

In criminal law the concept of patrimony in relation to crimes committed against it, may have a narrower meaning and refers to assets not as universal, but individual, likely to be acquired by the offender through any fraudulent means or to be destroyed, damaged, concealed or fraudulently managed, etc. An offense would never be committed against property as a universality of assets because will always exist regardless of assets number or value and even if the subject does not have any debts; no one can be deprived of heritage but up of one or few assets that form its patrimony. Therefore, is more adequate to name these crimes, as offences assets belong to a property (patrimonial) than crimes against property as whole.

References

- Bulai,C., Bulai, B. Manual de drept penal. Bucureşti: Editura Universul Juridic, 2007.
- Mitrache, C., Mitrache, C. Drept penal, Partea generală. Bucureşti : Editura Universul Juridic, 2006.
- Antoniu, G. „Ocrotirea penală a patrimoniului în dreptul comparat." R.D.P. , nr. 2/2000.
- Boroi, Al. Drept penal, Partea specială. Bucureşti: Editura C.H. Beck, 2006.
- Dec. pen., . nr. 84-1995 (C. de Apel Piteşti, 2/1996).
- Diaconu, M. Consideraţii privind patrimoniul comun al umanităţii. www.drept.ucv.ro.
- Djuvara, M. Teoria generală a dreptului. Bucureşti: Editura All Beck, 1995 .
- Dogaru, I., Cercel, S. Drept civil. Teoria generală a drepturilor reale. Bucureşti: Editura All Beck, 2003.
- Dongoroz, V. Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului penal Român, vol. III. Bucureşti: Editura Academiei, 1971.
- Dongoroz, V., şi colab., . Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului penal, vol. III.
- Pascu, I. Drept penal, Partea generală. Bucureşti: Editura Hamangiu, 2007.
- Pascu, I., Gorunescu, M. Drept penal, partea specială. Bucureşti: Editura Hamangiu, 2008.
- Popescu-Brăila, T.R. Drept civil, vol. I . Bucureşti: Romcart S.A., 1993.

THE CONVENTIONS ADOPTED WITHIN THE EUROPEAN UNION WITH REGARD TO THE INTERNATIONAL LEGAL ASSISTANCE IN CRIMINAL MATTERS

VICTORIA CRISTIEAN[*]

Abstract
The study of the legal and penal mechanism by which European Union Member States jointly act for preventing and combating certain categories of crimes, includes the analysis of conventions regarding legal assistance that Member States undertake to grant each other the catching and prosecution of people who commit crimes on their territory, either violating the domestic criminal law or the international criminal law represented by international conventions that require signatory states to incriminate or punish certain categories of crimes, against which they pledged to fight together. Conventions adopted at European Union level concerning international legal assistance in criminal matters, give legal expression to the most complex and most effective form of cooperation between States in the fight against crime, establishing brand new ways of international legal assistance in criminal matters.The importance of the Conventions regarding legal assistance in criminal matters result from the fact that they ensure the correct application of European criminal law relating to combating the worst types of crimes, making possible criminal liability and conviction of various crimes, with the help of other member states of the European conventions.

Keywords: convention, extradition, international legal assistance in criminal matters, international cooperation, European Union.

Introduction

Taking into consideration the importance of the international legal assistance in criminal matters - as a main form of cooperation among the European states in the fight against criminality, and as a means to ascertain the unity of the member states with regard to such an important target - a series of Conventions have been adopted by the European Union, Conventions meant to regulate the modalities through which the international legal assistance can be assured. The adopted Conventions complete the European penal legislation by providing the signatory states the ways toward a mutual assitance meant to apply the respective Convetions to the fight against the international criminality.

This paper aims to identify the conventions adopted within the European Union with regard to the international legal assistance in criminal matters.

The study of the legal and penal mechanism by which European Union Member States jointly act for preventing and combating certain categories of crimes, includes the analysis of conventions regarding legal assistance that Member States undertake to grant each other the catching and prosecution of people who commit crimes on their territory, either violating the domestic criminal law or the international criminal law represented by international conventions that require signatory states to incriminate or punish certain categories of crimes, against which they pledged to fight together.

In order to apply this principle of cooperation and, implicitly, of the international legal assistance in criminal matters, several international Conventions have been issued as meant to fight against the transnational criminality:

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Juridical and Administrative Sciences "Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University (email: victoria_cristiean@yahoo.com).

- the first category of such international documents is the one concerned with the Conventions issued under the aegis of the European Council (a category to be enlarged upon in the present paper);
- another category refers to the Community Conventions that have a larger area of appliance and which hint to the cooperation among the member states with regard to the penal international juridical assistance (they will be spoken about and enlarged upon in the present paper);

Consequently, within the European Union there was and still is a permanent preoccupation for issuing Conventions and documents regarding the penal juridical assistance, among which: the Convention on penal juridical assistance among the member states of the European Union; the Convention on extradition among the member states of the European Union; the Convention on the simplified extradition procedure among the member states of the European Union; the European extradition arrest warrant.

1. The Convention on the simplified extradition procedure among the member states of the European Union

This Convention was issued in the basis of art K 3 of the Treaty on the European Union and later settled in Brussels by the Bill of the Council on March 10, 1995 with a view to simplifying the extradition procedure and of meliorating the penal judiciary cooperation among the member states of the European Union.

The member states of the European Union - considering it necessary to facilitate the appliance - on December 13, 1957 - of the European Convention on extradition by simplifying and improving the extradition procedure, have passed a Bill concerning the simplified extradition procedure among the member states of the European Union on the ground of the following aspects:

- the necessity to simplify the extradition procedure in compatibility with the fundamental principles of their internal law, and with the principles of the European Union on defending man's rights and his fundamental liberties, as well;
- the fact that in a large number of extradition procedures, the person under discussion has no objection for her/ his being extradited;
- improving the criminal juridical cooperaation among the member states with regard to both pursue and sentence the person under discussion;
- the importance of extradition within the judiciary cooperation to the carrying on of these targets;
- the necessity to drastically reduce the period necessary for the extradition or for the imprisonment which are prior to the extradition proper.
- the provisions of the European Convention with regard to extradition continue to be appliable to all the aspects that are not regulated by this Convention.

The Convention is a flexible juridical frame, in as muh as the stipulated procedure is appliable to all the cases of the agreemnt of the competent authority of the required State and of its consideration concerning legality and opportuneness[1]. Besides, from the very first article, the aim of the Convention is clearly underlined: to facilitate the application - among the member states of the European Union - of the European Convention with regard to extradition by compliting its dispositions without being altered by the more favourable dispositions mentioned alongside with mutual or multilateral agreements in force among the member states[2].

The basic principle of the Convention lies in the obligation of handing over the pursued person; the member states commit themselves to hand over the pursued persons with view to their being extradited in the basis of their own accord and in the basis of the agreement of the requested state, both situations being under the conditions of the provisions of the present Convention - the way of obtaining and registering the pursued person is stipulated by art 7.

[1] Ioan Hurdubaie, European Judiciary Cooperation. Penal Conventional Frame (Bucharest: Ministry of Administration and Interior Printing House, 2003), 151.

[2] See art 1 paragraph 1 and 2 of the Convention on the Simplified Extradition Procedure among the Member States of the European Union.

In at least ten days since the extradition decision was communicated, the person shall be handed over; otherwise he/she shall be let free on the territory of the requested country.

In case the pursued person agrees with his/her extradition, at the end of the ten-days period stipulated by the Convention in art 8, the requested state can act into two ways: to either apply the simplified extradition procedure, in case a second new official extradition claim from the requesting state was issued, or this procedure can be applied even if such a request apperead in between[3].

When no request regarding a preventive custody was issued and when the agreement was given after the receival of such an extradition request, the required state can resort to the simplified procedure as provided by the present Convention[4].

2. The Convention on extradition among the member states of the European Union

The discussions around title VI of the Treaty on the Europen Union with regard to various serious forms of criminality very clearly revealed that, when speaking about extradition, it is only by a definite and firm intervention in the very essence of the problem that might lead to a significant melioration of the more important penal procedures, as for instance, those referring to terrorist actions or to organized criminality[5].

On this given basis it was possible to elaborate those articles from the Convention reffering to the double incrimination, political transgressions, extradition of the nationals or referring to problems concerned with the rule on specialty (more inisted upon than upon other really important provisions); all these turn this new instrument into a real innovation in the domain of extradition, in perfect agreement with the general will of the European Union to adapt the whole ensamble of judiciry cooperation from within the penal domain to the present and future needs and requirements"[6].

When referring to the extradition of the nationals, the European Convention, concluded between all member states of the European Union, provides that extradition cannot be refused on the ground that the extradited person might be a national of the requested state. There were numerous reserves in connection with this Convention and, thus the applicability area was visibly reduced.

The Convention provides modern dipositions, as for instance those stipulating that then of a conspiracy or an association of transgressors appears, the requesting state cannot refuse extradition only because its own legislation does not include the item according to which the same behaviour is not consired to be an infringement of the law.

The role of this Convention[7] is mentioned in art 1: to complete the provisions of the European Convention of 1957 on Extradition, the Convention of 1977 meant to repress terrorism, the Convention of 1990 meant to apply the 1985 Schengen Agreement and, on the other side, to facilitate their being applied by the member states of the European Union, without influencing other mutual or multilateral extradition agreements stipulating a more favourable juridical regim in the domain.

3. The European extradition arrest warrant

The European extradition warrant was the object of a draft-resolution within the Council of the European Union (no 2002/584/JAI) of June 13, 2002, with a view to create a more rapid and

[3] Hurdubaie, European Judiciary Cooperation, 153.

[4] See art A 12 paragraph. 2 of the Convention on the Simplified Extradition Procedure among the European States.

[5] Convention relative a l' extradition entre les Etats membres de l'Union Europeenne, Rapport explicatif, Journal officiel no. C 191 of 23 June, 1997.

[6] Hurdubaie, European Judiciary Cooperation, 155.

[7] The Convention referring to the extradition from among the member states of theEuropean Union was adopopted on September 27, 1996 in Brussels.

simpler extradition procedure. It was thus emphasised that "in the future the formal extradition procedure might be abolished from among the membe states for those persons who avoid law after the last erdict was given, and replaced by a simple transfer of these persons, in conformity with art 6 of the Treaty of the European Union"[8].

Unlike the formal extradition procedure, the European arrest warrant is a procedure applied at the judiciary level only (among judges); in such a case the political instances shall no longer interfere.The arrest warrant establishes fixed and compulsory conditions for the development of the procedure, asks for the usage of a unique form and restricts the refusal motivations to a minimum, as ennumerated in the draft-resolution.

The adoption of the draft-resolution with regard to the Europeran arrest warrant - although it was an accepted objective since the Tampere European Council (Octomber 15-16, 1999) - could not be carried on if the tragic events of September 11, 2001 had not happened in the States. Such a tragic event had to happen for the member states of the European Union realized the necessity of adopting a simplified mechanism through which the persons avoiding the law should have to be committed to the courts of law; this mechanism is, at the same time, an extremely efficient means of fight against terrorism and against other serious forms of transnational criminality.

The assaults of July 7, 2005 in London, once again, demonstrated the efficiency of this handing over system, when the persons suspected of terrorism were handed over to the British authorities by the Spanish authorities in only three days, while a normal extradition procedure from Spain elsewhere lasts for more than one year, sometimes [9].

The European arrerst warrant is applied by all the member states of the European Union provided, on one side, of the transposition of the draft-resolution to their own national law, and on the other side, because of the declarations given by the respective states in conformity with art 32 of the draft-resolution. Article 32 leaves it up to the member states' decision the choice of the information according to which the European arrerst warrant shall be applied, on the condition that this decision shall be taken no later than August 7, 2002[10].

The novelty and originality of the European arrest warrant lies in the fact that it is used all through the area of the European Union[11].

Taking into consideration the suggested objective - that of avoiding or reducing formalism which can turn the extradition procedure into a burdensome procedure - the new handing over system - in the basis of a European arrest warrant - eliminates the administrative stage; in this way cooperation in the domain of handing over of the persons who avoid the criminal pursuit, judgment and execution of the penalties are almost exclusively solved between the competent judiciary authorities of the member states of the European Union; the central authorities can, at least, support the competent judiciary authorities of the member states of the European Union or assume the role of transmitting authorities[12].

The European arrest warrant aims to replace the present system of extradition by imposing each and every national judiciary authority (executive authority) to recognize, ipso facto, and by

---

[8] Commission of the European Communities, Proposal for a Concil Framework Decision on the European arest warrant an the surrender procedures between the Members States, COM (2001) 522 final (JOCE no. C 322 E, 27.11.2001), point 4.1.

[9] Florin Răzvan Radu. "The Main Juridical Instruments of the European Union in Extrradition and Handing over the Transgressors", The Law 9 (2007): 148.

[10] France, for example, opted on November 1,1993. Consequently, A European execution warrant cannot be executed in the case the incriminated deeds have been committed before November 1, 1993.

[11] M.Platha. "European arrest; revolution in extradition", Journal'crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (2003): 193.

[12] Florin Răzvan Radu. "Law no 302/2004 referring to the international penal judiciary cooperation – an important step forward to Romania's integration within an area of liberty, security and justice of the European Union and a definite answer against the new attacks of the transboundary criminality", The Law 2 (2005): 14.

means of least controls, the request of remitting a person as it was expressed by the judiciary authority of another member state (issuing authority). Still, the member states are free to apply and conclude bilateral agreements able to better simplify the handing over procedures[13].

As a matter of fact, the mechanism of a European arrest warrant refers to the forced handing over of a person from one member state to another (replacing the traditional extradition procedure) and becomes a horizontal system able to substitute all other types of extradition, by extention, through a mutual recognition in front of the court that shall be automatically executed all over the European Union[14].

This system of the European arrest warrant shall replace the present traditional systems of extradition, as imposed by the exigencies of a mutual area of liberty, security and justice, where the national frontiers lose in importance.

The importance of the draft-resolution regarding the European arrest warrant derives from the very new elements brought about by the procedure of handing over the transgressors, due to a mutual agreement between the member states, through the simplification and operativity with which the judiciary cooperation is achieved within the European Union.

As provided by the very preamble of this draft-resolution, the European arrest warrant is considered to be the first concrete measure in the domain of penal law able to implement the principle of the mutual recognition.

In art 1, paragraph 1 the draft-resolution gives the definition of the European arrest warrant: a judiciary resolution issued by the competent judiciary authority of a member state of the European Union with a view to arresting and handing over to another state of the European Union a requested person as to be criminally prosecuted, judged or forced to complete a punishment or a prison sentence.

In conformity with the provisions of the draft-resolution, the specialized literature[15] mentions that "the European arrest warrant is a juduciary decision issued by competent judiciary authorities of a European Union member state with a view to arrest and hand over to another state of the European Union a requested person as to be penally prosecuted, judged or forced to complete a punishment or a prison sentence".

Consequently, the European arrest warrant is a judiciary resolution that replaces the extradition request and the whole afferent documentation for such a request. It is, practically, said[16] that the European arrest warrant transferred the extradition procedure from the polititicians to the judiciary authorities. Taking into account the aim of this transfer or the limitation of formalism able to turn the extradition procedure into a burdensome procedure, the new system of handing over - in the basis of a European arrest warrant - avoids the administrative stage; the cooperation in the domain of handing over the persons avoiding the penal prosecution and the completion of a sentence are almost exclusively accomplished by the competent judiciary authorities of the member states of the Europen Union; thus, the central authorities might support the competent judiciary authorities or take over the role of transmitting or receiving authorities.

The European arrest warrant contributes to the improvement of the international judiciary cooperation and to the reducibility of the barriers connected with the national sovereignty, and so, the handing over of suspects or convicts to another member state is nothing but a judiciary decision"[17].

---

[13] Ioan Hurdubaie, Instruments of the International Cooperation in the Domain of Turning to a Good Account the Forensic Means of Probation (Bucharest: Era Printing House, 2007), 146.

[14] G. Stroe. "The European Arrest Warrant", The Romanian Law, in the conditions of the post-adherence to the European Union, vol. V, Institute for Juridical Researches (Buchrest: Dacoromână TDC Printing House, 2007) 281.

[15] D.Mercan, "European Arrest Warrant. Procedure of Execution", Penal Law Review 3 (2007): 70.

[16] J.Komarek, European Constitutionalism and European Arrest Warrant: Contrapunctual Principles in Disharmony (New York University School of Law, 2005).

[17] Al. Boroi and I. Rusu, Penal International Judiciary Cooperation (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, Printing House, 2008), 303.

Such a draft-resolution fixes the rules in whose bases a member state executes a European arrest warrant on its own territory although the warant was issued by a judiciary authority of another European member state. The "European arrest warrant" it defined in art 3 and is a request issued toward a judiciary authority of a member state in order to support, pursue, arrest, detain and hand over any person who is the object of a sentence or of a judiciary decision as mentioned in art 2 of the draft-resolution.

The European arrest warrant can be issued in conformity with art 2:

a. to execute certain final judicial decisions uttered in criminal proceedings and certain decisions issued in absentia that involve the loss of liberty or a surety measure of about 4 months in the issuing state;

b. to apply other judiciary executory decisions uttered during the criminal prosecutions which involve loss of liberty or is the object of a transgression that necessitates a surety measure of a maximum 12 months period in the issuing state.

In conformity with the new system, then when a person belonging to a certain state avoids, depending om each separate case, the penal prosecution, judgment or execution of the penalty on the territory of that member state, the respective competent judiciary authority (known as the issuing authority) issues a European arrest warrant of at least 1 year, in the basis of a final loss of liberty sentence, or a preventive detention which is sent to execution to the competent judiciary authority of the member state on whose territory the respective person lives (known as executing judiciary authority, under the note that the handing over conditions respect the European arrest warrant and that the handing over rules are similar to those of the "classical" extradition system)[18].

The draft-resolution provides in chapter 2 the procedural modalities meant to assure a good application of its dispositions and, in chapter 3 both the arrest and detention of the prosecuted person are analysed.

Chapter 4 - made up of two articles - regulates those situations in which the handing over of the arrested person can be refused after having analysed the principle of reinsertion, integration and video-conference.

Chapter 5 deals with solving particular cases and the two articles of chapter 6 deal with the relationship with other juridical international instruments.

Yet, an important difference from the classic system cannot be overlooked when speaking about the conditions referring to the nature of the deed: the new system sets up certain exceptions from the rule of the double incrimination and so, in certain very serious infringments - mentioned in art 2 in the list that is open to be completed by the Council (among which: participation in a criminal organization, terrorism, traffic of flesh, illicit traffic of narcotics, etc) - the handing over is executed without checking the existance of a double incrimnation[19].

One of the most important progresses registered by the draft-resolution is the generelization concerning the handing over of the national which eliminates the refusal of the handing over because of the citizenship of the respective person[20].

In agreement with art 43 of July 1, between the member states there will be no orders in connection with the following juridical instruments:

- The Extradition European Convention of December 13, 1957, its additional protocol of October 15, 1975, the second additional protocol of March 17, 1978 and the European Convention for reprimanding terrorism of January 27, 1977 with regard to extradition;

[18] Radu, "Law no 302/2004", 14.

[19] Radu , ""Law no 302/2004", 14.

[20] Two member states - Portugal and Slovenia - anticipated these difficulties and succeeeded in overcoming them before the draft-resolution was transposed. Later, France revised her Constitution by a law on March 2003.

- The Agreement between the member states of the European Community referring to the simplification and modernization of the modalitiles of transmitting the extradition requests of May 26, 1989;
- The Convention of March 10, 1995 referring to the simplified extradition procedure between the member states of the European Union;
- The Convention of September 27, 1996 referring to extradition between the member states of the European Union.

The dispositions of the draaft-resolution will not influence certain bilateral or multilateral agreements providing simplified procedures.

The last chapters of the draft-resolution contain a series of provisions meant to assure the practical appliance of the draft-resolution, as well as other general and final dispositions.

The European arrest warrant is considered to be a genuine revolution in as far as the extradition and the handing over of persons avoidin the criminal prosecution, judgment and execution of sentence.

The first European arrest warrant was in force was in January 2004, on the territory of the European Union, against a Swedish citizen who was arrested - in the basis of the warrant - in Spain and extradited to the Swedish authorities.

The most important cases in which the European arrest warrants were successfully applied were those regarding the terrorist assaults in Madrid, on March 11, 2004, when the Spanish instances issued European arrest warrants on the names of certain suspects. In 2005 the judiciary authorities from within the European Union issued 6,500 European arrest warrants, and the statistics indicate that in the same year 1,700 pursued persons were localized and identified in the basis of the warrants[21].

At the same time, the European arrest warrant enabled an extremely quick transfer from Italy of Mr Hamdi Issac, of one the presumed authors of the London attacks, on July 21, 2005.

According to an estimation made by the Commission in 2005, the impact of the warrant - since it entered in force on January 1, 2004 - was considered to be positive from the point of view of depolitization, efficiency and the quickness of the handing over. In spite of the initial delay in transposition, the European arrest warrant was operational all through the European Union and in the majority of the cases. The handing over of a person by a member state used to last almost 13-43 days there, where previously, an extradition lasted more than 9 months[22]. According to the same estimation report of the Commission of February 23, 2005, 2,603 arrest warrants were isssued, 653 persons were arrested and 104 were transferred until September 2004.

In agreemnet with the 2005 statistics transmitted to the Council by the member states[23], out of the 6,900 European arrest warrants, France issued 1914, being of the top of the list. Poland is on tthe second place with 1448 issued warrants, followed by Spain wit 519 warrants. As for the countries that receive most of the European arrest warrants, England if on the top of the list followed by Spain, France and Netherlands

In spite of a useful common statistics of the member states for 2006, the information transmitted by the member states acknowledges a generalization of the use of the European arrest warrant and the efficiency of this procedure.

So, in 2006[24] out of the 5,832 European arrest warrants 1,456 persons of 14 member states were handed over. Out of the handed over persons more than a half - more precisely 51% were

[21] C. Drăghici and C.E. Stefan, "Theroretical and Practical Aspects Referring to the Execution of the European Arrest Warrant", "The Law" 10 (2007): 218.

[22] Hurdubaie, Instruments of the International Cooperation,148.

[23] Document 9005/5/06 REV % of January 18, 2007.

[24] Only the data communicated by the member states until July 9, 2007 were taken into account.

handed over in the basis of their own consent[25]. This survey, resulted from the application of the European arrest warrant, seems to be sastisfactory yet, they are to be interpreted from the point of view of the difficulties of transposition faced by numerous member states.

4. The Convention on criminal legal assistance among the member states of the European Union

Trying to meliorate the criminal legal assistance among the memeber states of the European Union and starting from the general interest that these states shall assure its functioning in a more efficient, more rapid and more compatible manner as to go hand in hand with the fundamental principles of their internal laws and with the respect for the individual' rights and for the principles of the European Convention on the safeguarding of men's rights and of his fundamental liberties - signed in Rome on November 4, 1950 - through the Brussels Council Bill of May 29, 2000 - the Convention on criminal legal assistance among the member states of the European Union was issued in conformity with art 34 of the Treaty on the European Union[26].

The Convention on criminal legal assistance among the member states of the European Union is the main juridical instrument, in the domain, to be applied among the member states of the European Union as it contains provisions that enable these procedural documents to be sent by mail; at the same time it regulates the modern ways of assistance as examination, video-conference, under cover investigations, supervised handing-overs, telecommunication interceptions.

The provisions of the Convention on criminal legal assistance among the member states of the European Union are meant to assure a more efficient, rapid and more complete judiciary assistance among the states of the Union in their fight against criminality[27].

In conformity with the provisions of art 26, the Convention is applied within the European Union as it was in the case of Island and Norway.

As for France, the Convention on May 29, 2000 is applied to the metropolitan area as well as to overseas departments, but not to overseas territories. In the case of United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northen Ireland, the Convention will be applied for Gibraltar at the same moment it enetered in force for the United Kingdom. For the Anglo-Normand Isles and for the Man Isle, the entering into force of the Convention shall be accompanied by a written notification to the Council and by a unanimous decision from the part of the United Kingdom.

Provided some possible declarations the Netherlands might express, the Convention shall also be applied to her whole territory as to all her overseas dominions.

The Convention entered into force for a part of the member states on August 23, 2005, as it was only then that the clause of the 8 ratifications was fulfilled. The Convention enetred into force in Romania on December 1, 2007 and is applied in relation with the other member states that subscribed to it up to now[28].

This Convention is made up of 30 articles divided into 5 titles and creates - in the basis of the Convention of the Council of Europe of April 20, 1959 - the legal framework for a criminal legal assistance to be fulfilled. Its aim is to complete the provisions of the European Convention on criminal legal assistance and of its additional protocol (1978), the Convention on the application of the Schengen agreement and of the Treaty on extradition and criminal legal assistance concluded

---

[25] See te second estimation report refrring to the stage of the transposition of the European arrest warrant draft-resolution and the handing over procedures from among the member states, of July 11, 2007, Brussels.

[26] Pavel Abraham and Ioan Hurdubaie, Penal European Conventions (Bucharest: National Printing House, 2001), 58.

[27] See "Guide for Judges and Prosecutors for the Application of the Union Main Juridical Instruments Regarding the Penal Judiciary Cooperation."– Report no. 137620 of November 28 ,2007, issued by Ministry of Justice, International Law and Traties Department.

[28] Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Check Republic, Germany, Danemark, Estonia, Spain, France, Great Britain, Hungary, Lithuania, Latvia, Holland/ the Netherlands, Portugal, Poland, Sweden, Finland, Slovenia, Slovakia.

between Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands in 1962 and amended by the 1974 Protocol, as well as the facilitation of turning into practice of their provisions with regard with the member states of the Europen Union.

The Convention on criminal legal assistance among the member states of the European Union will not influence the application of certain more advantageous provisions included in the bilateral or multilateral agreements between the member states, as provided by art 26(4) of the European Convention regarding the criminal legal assistance, the measures taken in the domain of the of mutual assistance in penal cases agreed upon in the basis of the uniform legistaltion or of a special system providing the mutual use of assistance measures in their respective territories[29].

With a view to harmonize the provisions of the Convention with the provisions of the European Convention on Man's Rights, in art 3 it was inserted a provision according to which the legal assistance is also granted in the procedures debating deeds which are punished by neither the natioanl law of the requested member state nor by the national law of the requesting member state, nor by the both of them and considered to be offences to the regulations controlled by administrative authorities whose decisions may lead to appeal to a competent jurisdiction specialized in criminal matters.

All requests for judiciary assistance and all spontaneous exchanges of information/ data are made in written or in any possible way that can be considered to be written, as for the recipient member state be able to check its genuineness; in emergencies, these requests are intermediated by the International Criminal Police Organization or by any other competent bodied, as stipulated by the Treaty on the European Union.

Title II of the Convention regulates the special forms of judiciray assistance among the member states of the European Union, forms that - for some of them - although new in the domain prove to be efficient in the fight against international criminality. These special forms are: restitution of objects, temporary transfer of detained persons for being trained, hearing witnesses and experts by means of video-conferences, supervised handing-overs, joint investigation teams, private investigations.

Intercepting communications - better said the way this operation is done - is stipulated by title III of the Convention and stipulates: the competent authority able to order the interception of communications, the content of the interception request, interception of telecommunications on the national territory through informers, interception of telecommunications without any technical assistance of another member state and conclusion of certain bilateral agreements.

Article 23 is the very IV -th title of the Convention and regulates the protection of the personal data.

The Convention ends with the final provisions comprised in the V-th title and refers to declarations regarding competent authorities commissioned with the application of the Convention; these declarations that can be issued by the member states when notifying the carrying on of the constitutional procedures concerning ratification, reserves, territorial application, adherence of new member states, entering in force for Island and Norway, as well as the person in charge with the Treaty.

The Convention is also completed by the declaration of the Council with regard to art 10 paragraph 9, by the Declaration of the United Kingdom with regard to art 20 and by the official statement of the secretary general of the Council of the European Union in virtue of art 30, paragraph 2 of the Convention, settled by the Council in conformity with art 34 of the Treaty of the European Union regarding the criminal legal assistance among the member states of the European Union.

The provisions of the Convention were completed with the additional Protocol of October 16, 2001, that came into force on October 5, 2005. Nowadays it is applicable among Austria, Belgium, Danmark, Finland, Latvia, Lithuania, France, Holland/ the Netherlands, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden and [29] Al. Boroi and I.Rusu, Penal, 408-409.

Hungary. For the rest of countries belonging to the European Union the Protocol will come into force in conformity with the notifications made by these states and that shall be analysed, after being posted on the site of European Union.

The essential objective of the Protocol is to include in the text of the Convention the commitment of the participating states to exchange the most complete and detailed bank information/ data. The request can refer to the identification of the bank accounts opened on the name of a natural or legal person (art 1), the decription of the bank transactions for a given period of time (art 2) and the control over the bank transactions for a certain period of time (art 3)[30].

Conclusions

The brief analysis this paper tried to present with regard to the most important Conventions - international instruments in the domain of the international legal assistance in criminal matters - invites to a general analysis of the progresses recorded in the domain, in Europe.

The importance of the Conventions regarding the criminal legal assistance resorts from the fact that it assures a correct application of the European criminal legislation in connection with the fight against the most serious categories of offences, making it possible for their authors to criminally be incriminated and even convicted for their deeds, by the help of the other states members of the European Conventions. Consequently, the adoption of these Conventions by the European Union, which mainly stand for the European Law in force, plays an essential role in creating a new system of laws.

Conventions isued over time were an expression of cooperation among States, born out of their desire to successfully face the international criminality, by both finding the most flexible means of intensifying international cooperation and by strengthening the legal assistance among states.Unfortunately, a significant part of the international documents, issued in order to repress violence within relations among states, were not ratified, depriving them of any legal authority.

The theme chosen and presented all through this paper, proves the necessity of materializing a regional system meant - by the efforts of all states - to help the prevention and removing of certain serious deeds committed in Europe in the latest decades.

Another measure under consideration, is that of tthe necessity of diversifying the instruments meant to achieve the international criminal legal assistance. In this respect there appears the propsal that the EU shall adopt new forms of international criminal legal assistance - since they are the result of the changes occurred in the evolution of society; therefore the nowadaysq trend is directed towards the increase and generalization of the above metioned forms of assitance.

References

Books

- Abraham, Pavel and Hurdubaie, Ioan. Penal European Conventions. Bucharest: National Printing House, 2001.
- Boroi, Alexandru and Rusu, Ioan. Penal International Judiciary Cooperation. Bucharest: C.H. Beck, Printing House, 2008.
- Hurdubaie, Ioan. European Judiciary Cooperation. Penal Conventional Frame. Bucharest: Ministry of Administration and Interior Printing House, 2003.
- Hurdubaie, Ioan. Instruments of the International Cooperation in the Domain of Turning to a Good Account the Forensic Means of Probation. Bucharest: Era Printing House, 2007.

[30] See "Guide for Judges and Prosecutors for the Application of the Union Main Juridical Instruments Regarding the Penal Judiciary Cooperation." Report no. 137620 of November 28 ,2007, issued by Ministry of Justice, International Law and Traties Department.

- Komarek, J.. European Constitutionalism and European Arrest Warrant: Contrapunctual Principles in Disharmony. New York University School of Law, 2005.

Journal articles

- Drăghici, Constantin and Stefan, Cristian Eduard. "Theroretical and Practical Aspects Referring to the Execution of the European Arrest Warrant". "The Law" 10 (2007):204-224.
- Mercan, D.. "European Arrest Warrant. Procedure of Execution". Penal Law Review 3 (2007).
- Radu, Florin Răzvan. "The Main Juridical Instruments of the European Union in Extrradition and Handing over the Transgressors". The Law 9 (2007).
- Radu, Florin Răzvan. "Law no 302/2004 referring to the international penal judiciary cooperation – an important step forward to Romania's integration within an area of liberty, security and justice of the European Union and a definite answer against the new attacks of the transboundary criminality". The Law 2 (2005): 5-23.
- Stroe, G.. "The European Arrest Warrant",.The Romanian Law, in the conditions of the post-adherence to the European Union, vol. V, Institute for Juridical Researches. Bucharest: Dacoromână TDC Printing House, 2007.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE REGULATIONS ON GENDER BASED VIOLENCE IN ROMANIA AND SPAIN

LAVINIA MIHAELA VLĂDILĂ*

Abstract
In this article, I will present the evolution of the regulation of gender based violence in Romania and Spain. This new theme is one of actuality, due to the situations that frequently happen in our social life. Both Romania and Spain have a high level of gender based violence, even if nowadays in our country are few statistics on this matter. But also, both countries now enjoy good legislations, which have been developed in the last 10 years.

Keywords: gender based violence, evolution, crime, family, legal protection

Introduction

The present study aims to present the evolution of the regulation of gender based family violence, by comparison between Romania and Spain in the last decades. It is a general analysis of the phenomenon, without emphasizing a certain aspect of this large area.

The importance of this approach lies in the very existence of the phenomenon.

Though it is widely spread and with an ancient existence, in Romania the number of official statistics on gender based violence is nearly inexistent. In our country, family violence has "generously cohabited" with our ignorance and the acceptation of the great majority of population. Based on the principle that "beating is torn of heaven" it often had serious forms of violence, representing only means of an inhuman expression of frustrations, dissatisfaction and lack of personal control. This is why the ignorance of this phenomenon lasted until, taken out to the surface, it managed to generate a mass effect which subsequently determined various legislative projects, in total agreement with different European and international regulations. In Romania there is a law[1] which directly regulates gender based violence and other ones which are indirectly linked to the first one[2]. Also, in accordance with these special regulations comes the new Criminal Code of 2009, which specifically states the protection of family against any form of violence, especially domestic violence.

By comparison, in Spain, the development of the legislation went hand in hand with the expansion of various statistics in all autonomous communities, and national ones. Moreover, for the Iberian state the initiation of some staggering statistics on the existence and expansion of this phenomenon lead to new regulations or, in other words, to special regulations in this area, being an additional reason for these statistics to develop and to lead to new regulations.

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Juridical Sciences, Socials and Politics"Valahia" University of Târgoviște (U.V.T); Counselor of the Department of Continuing Education and Distance Learning of U.V.T. (email: laviniavladila@yahoo.com).

[1] We are talking about Law No 217/2003 on the preventing and fighting against family violence, published in the Official Gazette No 367/29.05.2003, modified by Government Emergency Ordinance No 95/2003, published in the Official Gazette No 13/8.01.2004.

[2] We can consider among these Law No 211/2004 with regard to certain steps to secure the protection of crime victims, published in the Official Gazette No 505/4.06.2004; Law No 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, published in the Official Gazette No 557/23.06.2004; Law No 202/2002 on equal opportunities between women and men republished in the Official Gazette No 150/1.03.2007; Law No 47/2006 on social assistance published in the Official Gazette No 239/16.03.2006.

Regarding the scientific-juridical analysis of family violence, in Romania we have found several psychological, epistemological debates, but few pure juridical debates, based on the law and on jurisprudence.

In exchange, in Spain there are many juridical studies, presenting the phenomenon under all its possible aspects: historical, phenomenological, juridical, sociological etc.

To start the debate of this subject, we must state that nowadays, at the European and international level, as well as in Spain, is made the differentiation between family violence and gender based violence. Thus, family violence comprises all forms of violence within the family (physical, psychical or sexual committed with intention) against women, men, children, elder persons or against any close relative[3], while gender based violence, as defined in Spain, represents violence as the result of discrimination, inequality and of domination of men over women, exercised against the latter one by her actual or ex concubine (the notion also includes the quality as husband), or by the person to whom the women was or is in an affective relationship, even if they do not share a household together[4]. Therefore, our study will refer to family violence to analyze the Romanian penal framework, and both to family violence and to gender based violence to compare the Romanian[5] and Spanish situations.

This is why we strongly consider that such a comparative analysis will enrich our juridical area with new perspectives on this phenomenon.

I. International awareness of the problem – a few legislative landmarks

The awareness of the existence of a problem on family violence occurred at an international and European level at the end of the 1970s, so that in the next decade there were elaborated a series of judicial documents aiming the protection of women against domestic violence. Thus, on 26 March 1985 the Council of Europe drafted its first Recommendation R (85)4 on violence in the family[6]. Internationally, the General Assembly of the United Nations on its plenary meeting adopted Resolution 40/36 of 29 November 1985 on domestic violence[7] and Resolution 44/82 of 8 December 1989 proclaiming 1994 as International Year of the Family[8]. Another special interest for knowledge and combat of this phenomenon was expressed by the Recommendations of the World Conference of the UN held in Nairobi on 15-16 June 1985, by the Recommendations on family violence drafted by a group of experts reunited in Vienna on 8-12 December 1985 or by the Resolution 46/8 March 1993 of the Commission on Human Rights incriminating violence and violation of human rights, especially referring to women[9]. This first decade of positive reactions was followed by numerous international measures which, with the spreading of the phenomenon, aimed and determined an important involvement of the world states.

United Nations continued the campaign against domestic violence, so by Resolution 48/109/20 December 1993 of the General Assembly was concluded that the most familiar situations of family violence are[10]: Physical, sexual and psychological violence occurring in the family, [3] According to Art 2 and 3 of Law No 217/2003.

[4] According to Art 1 of the preliminary title of the Spanish Law 1/28 December 2004 on the measures for protection against gender based violence, published in the Boletín Oficial del Estado (the official Spanish state bulletin) No 313/29 December 2004 and republished with modifications in B.O.E. No 87/12 April 2005.

[5] Such statement is necessary because, after the entrance into force of Law No 1/2004 also the autonomous communities have adopted their own regulations as a completion of the national law. Due to the fact that the analysis of such subject is extremely comprehensive, it cannot be the subject of our study, but remaining opened to a subsequent debate.

[6] See the official Council of Europe website http://www.coe.int/lportal/web/coe-portal.

[7] See the official UN website http://www.un.org.

[8] Ibid.

[9] Ortansa Brezeanu, Aura Constantinescu, Violenţa domestică. Reflecţii in the Romanian Penal Law Review No 2/2007, p. 68.

[10] According to Art 2 of the UN Resolution 48/109/1993, available on its official website.

including battering, sexual abuse of children in the household, dowry-related violence, marital rape, female genital mutilation and other traditional practices harmful to women, non-spousal violence and violence related to exploitation.

Likewise, after the recommendation of 1985, the Council of Europe drafted until 2008 no less than 11 recommendations and resolutions, as well as a declaration of the Parliamentary Assembly in Vienna concerning this matter[11]. The purpose of these regulations is to offer a definition of family violence and to identify the common European feature regarding the civil or penal norms and procedures which are applicable. Also, in the past few years, were made several differences between general regulations on domestic violence and those on gender based violence, namely those which regard the violence against women in a family or sentimental framework. For instance, in the last decade, the majority of the recommendations made by the Council of Europe emphasize the violence against women, leaving aside the genera framework of the domestic violence. We most note that lat April the European Parliament debated on the incrimination of violence against women, which will be stated in a future directive. But the development of the subject on violence against women, as part of the domestic violence, must be framed in the larger area of discrimination. In the case Opuz v Turkey (2009) the European Court of Human Rights showed that violence against women is considered a form of discrimination which violated the European Convention on Human Rights. The situation of this type of violence, as form of discrimination, is not fully clarified and supported by enough criminal texts, but especially by criminal procedural law texts, which should be supported by financial measures. This is why the debate is still open, including for new legislative projects.

II. The evolution of the regulation in Romania

a. Stage I. General and special regulations of the Criminal Code. In Romania, family violence has been considered as a negative social phenomenon with a great delay, the first positive reactions from the legislator coming in 2000. One of the reasons of such a delay can be that in the former communist states, when any social institution had to be integrated in the public space and subjected to exterior exigencies. On the other hand, in the communist regime, family violence was not even officially recognized as a social issue[12], despite its existence.

Until the modifications of the Criminal Code in 2000, the protection of family was made in a general framework[13], by incriminating the offence of first degree murder against the spouse or a close relative (Art 175 Para 1 Let c) or of particularly serious murder against a pregnant murder (Art 176 Para 1 Let e). Beside these regulations, violence causing bodily harm or heath of the victim, usually woman and child, was stated by Art 180-182[14] or Art 305-306[15] of the Criminal Code. Also,

[11] These recommendations and resolutions of the Council of Europe are: Recommendation R(85)11 on the position of the victim in the framework of criminal law and procedure, Recommendation R(87)21 on assistance to victims and the prevention of victimization, Recommendation R(90)2 on social measures concerning violence within the family, Recommendation R(91)9 on emergency measures in family matters, Recommendation R(98)1 on family mediation, Declarations and Resolutions adopted by the 3rd European Ministerial Conference on equality between men and women, organized by the Council of Europe (Rome, 1993), Recommendation R(2000)11 on the action against trafficking in human beings for the purpose of sexual exploitation, Recommendation R(2002)5 on the protection of women against violence, Recommendation R (2004)1681 on the Campaign to combat domestic violence against women in Europe, Resolution 1512(2006) "Parliaments united in combating domestic violence against women", Recommendation 1759(2006) "Parliaments united in combating domestic violence against women", Resolution R(2007)1582 of the Council of Europe "Parliaments united in combating domestic violence against women".

[12] Olivian Mastacan, Violenţa în familia. Aspecte teoretice şi practice, Valahia University Press, Târgovişte, 2005, p.3.

[13] Ortansa Brezeanu, Aura Constantinescu, op. cit., pp. 75-76.

[14] According to these articles are incriminated as offences hitting or other forms of violence (Art 180), bodily harm (Art 181) and serious bodily harm (Art 182).

[15] Art 305 incriminates deserting of family and Art 306 incriminates ill treatments applied to minors.

until 2002, marital rape was not considered as a form of family violence, not being sanctioned[16]. Because the latter situations, except the offence of ill treatment applied to minors, the offences for which criminal action is initiated upon prior complaint from the injured person, the police not being able to take action, despite all kind of complaints, the violence against women and children continued unimpeded, without the state being able to interfere in an efficient way.

As it was shown above, after the adhesion of Romania to the Council of Europe[17], as well as for the future adhesion to the European area, in 2000 there were taken the first steps for the special incrimination of family violence. We can state that in 2000 were also taken the first steps for the recognition of this phenomenon as a social danger big enough as to the offences of family violence to be considered as aggravated forms of some already existing offences.

The first legislative text which brought to the attention family violence was Law No. 197/13 November 2000 which modified and completed some dispositions of the Penal Code[18]. This law modified Art 180-181 of the Penal Code, the two offences becoming aggravated when the subjects are family members. According to Art 149^1 of the Penal Code, "family member" means the spouse or the close relative, as defined by Art 149, if living and sharing a household with the perpetrator. The terms living and sharing a household were not explained by the legislator. The doctrine has appreciated that living refers to certain permanence in the common coexistence relationships, while the term sharing a household is complementary to the first and refers to the engagement of family members in the administration of their common life. The two aspects – living and sharing a household – has to be simultaneous. Just living without sharing a household, as only sharing a household without living with the perpetrator, do not fulfil the conditions of the legislative text (for instance, a close relative caring for an apartment while the owner is on vacation)[19]. From the definition of the "family member" term, results that in the Penal Code, only the offences occurring in a home are sanctioned as forms of family violence, representing a higher social danger than the other forms of family violence (we hereby refer to the offences incriminated by Art 180-181 of the Penal Code). We shall see the inconsistency resulted from the existence of two parallel regulations on family violence, with the entrance into force of Law No. 217/2003. We must add the fact that the appreciation of the "family member" statute is made in relation to the moment of the offence[20].

Returning to the regulation resulted from the modification of Art 180-181 of the Penal Code, the protection of family relationships is made in the same framework, when the hitting or other forms of violence occur against a family member (Art 180 Para 1^1 of the Penal Code), when hitting or acts of violence that caused an injury needing medical care of up to 20 days (Art 180 Para 2^2 of the Penal Code) and when acts causing to corporal integrity or health needing medical care of up to 60 days (21 to 60 days, including) – simple bodily harm – Art 181 Para 1^1 of the Criminal Code. Procedurally, the text of the two offences, as modified by Law No. 197/2000, states that if the offence is committed against a family member the criminal action is initiated ex officio[21]; in other words, it can be initiated both upon prior complaint from the injured person, as well as ex officio, in the ways stated by the Penal Procedure Code, according to its Art 221 and following. In both cases, even if usually the prior complaint is joined to the involvement of the parties, for violence against [16] Regarding the incrimination of marital rape and until the modification of Art 197 Para 2 of the Penal Code, see the comments of Valerian Cioclei, Drept penal. Partea specială. Infracţiuni contra vieţii, C.H. Beck Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2009, pp. 243-245.

[17] The adhesion took place in 1993.

[18] Law 197/2000 amending the Penal Code was published in the Official Gazette No 568/15 November 2000 family members – despite the fact that the criminal action was initiated ex officio, the legislator allows the reconciliation of the parties[22].

[19] Lavinia Mihaela Vlădilă, Olivian Mastacan, Drept penal. Parte generală, Universul Juridic Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2011, p.187.

[20] Laura Maria Crăciunean, Violenţa în Familie. Circumstanţă agravantă, Romanian Penal Law Review No. 4/2005, p.52.

[21] According to Art 180 Para 3 and Art 181 Para 2 of the Penal Code.

But the modifications brought by Law No 197/2000 did not stop here. In addition to these judicial instruments protecting against family violence, the above-mentioned law added to the general part o the Penal Code another aggravated circumstance, applicable for all offences for which it was not previous stated as aggravating form or as element of other offences[23], namely the offence of violence against family members (Art 75 Para 1 Let b), Thesis II). The law does not define the term of violence which incorporated it in this aggravating circumstance, but in our and other doctrinaires' opinion[24] it can be interpreted as representing any form of violence, from hitting causing bodily harm to hitting needing medical care from 1 up to 60 days, or which causing the results stated by Art 182 Para 2 of the Penal Code, namely loss of a sense or of an organ, cessation of their functioning, a permanent physical or mental disability, mutilation, abortion or jeopardy on the person's life.

We also must note that the law for the modification of the Penal Code has not stated the same aggravating circumstance for the offence of serious bodily harm, limiting only to the two offences stated by Art 180 and 181. This can only be an unfortunate inconsistency. However, if the serious bodily harm occurs, in any of its forms (typical or aggravated), against a family member we consider as applicable the already analyzed aggravated circumstance, stated by Art 75 Para 1 Let b) of the Thesis II of the Penal Code. Nevertheless, in the Romanian penal system, the effects of an aggravated circumstance are not mandatory for the court, being optional[25]. This introduces an unjustified different regime, between the protection of family relationships against soft and serious violence – where the perpetration of such violence determines the aggravation of the offence and the application of a higher penalty, towards the serious bodily harm, where the perpetration against a family member shall optional determine an increase of the penalty, by applying Art 78 corroborated with Art 75 Let b) of the Criminal Code.

Another novelty inserted by Law No 197/2000 has a penal and a criminal procedure feature. It refers to the introduction of a new security measure, namely the "prohibition to return to the family home for a determinate period"[26]. In terms of criminal procedure, the new security measure is the only mean to keep the perpetrator away from its victim. The measure is insufficient and inefficient. Moreover, the fact that we never met a sentence to valorise this measure should "ring a bell" for the legislator. On one hand, this measure can only be invoked by the court when the decision of conviction is issued, which means that during prosecution and trial the victim, in lack of alternatives for a home, should have to bear the manifestations of the perpetrator at her address. The fear for even more serious violence, constant threats can determine the victim to stop the penal trial, thus the "reconciliation of the parties" shall be the best solution for powerless victims.

On the other hand, the court shall use the measure only if the defendant shall be convicted to at least one year of imprisonment. Such decisions of conviction shall rarely be used for the offence of hitting and other violence[27]. And this is not all. Another condition imposed by the law, states that the victim should request the use of this security measure. Previous commentaries regarding the fear of the victim for even serious violence and constant threats, shall determine her to not request this measure to the court. We showed in a different article that, based on its active role, the court should ask the victim if intends to request the application of this measure. The emotion, lack of judicial

---

[22] According to Art 180 Para 4 and Art 181 Para 3 of the Penal Code.

[23] As the case of the offences stated by Art 180-181 or Art 197 of the Penal Code.

[24] Laura Maria Crăciunean, op.cit., p.52.

[25] According to Art 78 of the Penal Code: "In case of aggravating circumstances, one may apply a penalty up to the special maximum".

[26] The new security measure is stated by Art 112 Let g) and Art 118^1 of the Penal Code.

[27] Art 180 Para 1^1 states the punishment by imprisonment from 6 months to one year, and Art 180 Para 2^1 states the punishment by imprisonment from one to 2 years.

knowledge, if the victim is not assisted by a lawyer, shall determine the court to have a minimum moral and judicial support for the victim[28].

The inefficiency of the regulation is incremented also by the serious danger for which this criminal sanction can be applied. In other words, leaving to the court's appreciation, as if all the other conditions would not be enough to restrain the framework of its application, the legislator states that the danger for the victim to be very serious. The legislator considers that "soft" violence does not impose such measure. So, the victim should be supporting more violence, without reacting, because the state is not able to protect her until she ends up in a hospital with three broken ribs, full of bruises, unconscious or almost dead?! Therefore, how long should the victim endure violence, for the court to apply a security measure? Such rhetorical questions judicially aim the core of the issue. Several states have stated in their penal legislation the situation of family violence and gender based violence, have stated penal and criminal procedure means for the victim to enjoy security and to detach herself from a humiliating situation. Such measures, which we have encountered in a project for a legislative modification, sustained by deputies from all the parliamentarian parties – considered to be a valorous initiative, are the restraining order and the interdiction order, with the possibility to invoke temporary measures, even by the prosecutor in the stage of criminal prosecution.

Finally, without debating too long this issue, which is not the object of our analysis, we must add, that along with other authors[29], we consider that this security measure can be invoked not only for the offence of hitting and other violence – the law being vague – but for all types of offences committed in family imply violence or physically or bodily harm the victim.

A final modification inserted by Law No 197/2000 regarded the abolition of Art 197 Para 5 incriminating rape. According to this paragraph, the active subject of the rape was unpunished if he would marry his victim. Several doctrinaires rose against such provision[30], which was the result of the Middle Age's legislation. First of all immoral, such provision offered more chances of getting away with the offence for this person who had no respect for women – who usually are the passive subject of this type of offence.

After one year, Government Emergency Injunction No 89/2001[31] completed the framework of family violence with the special incrimination of rape between family members, especially between spouses[32]. Many renowned authors consider as auspicious the explanation of such incrimination, except the fact that such incrimination received an aggravated form, pleading for its simple form. Some authors (Matei Basarab and colab., op.cit) consider that the simple form is more appropriate for the incrimination of rape, adding the possibility of reconciliation of the parties. A similar solution – to the proposal to separately incriminate the rape between spouses, but with the possibility for reconciliation of the parties or the withdrawal of the prior complaint – is accepted by other doctrinaires, such as Ilie Măgureanu and Alexandru Ionaş, who appreciate as unusual the situation of the spouse, who, disagreeing the right of the other spouse to intimate life, must not be considered as inferior towards other persons with who the victim does not have a family relationship[33]. From our [28] Lavinia Mihaela Vlădilă, Olivian Mastacan, op.cit, p.189.

[29] Ilie Pascu, Interdicţia de a reveni în locuinţa familiei, in the Romanian Penal Law Review No 4/2002, pp.44-45.

[30] Valerian Cioclei, op.cit, p. 248. Ortansa Brezeanu, Aura Constantinescu, op.cit, p.76.

[31] Government Emergency Injunction No 89/2001 amending the Penal Code's offences on sexual life, published in the Official Gazette No 338/26 June 2001, was approved with amendments by Law 61/2002, published in the Official Gazette No 65/30 January 2002.

[32] Matei Basarab, Viorel Paşca, Gheorghiţă Mateuţ, Tiberiu Medeanu, Constantin Butiuc, Mircea Bădilă, Radu Bodea, Petre Dungan, Valentin Mirtişan, Ramiro Mancaş and Cristian Miheş, Codul penal comentat. Partea specială, vol. II, Hamangiu Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2009, p.281; Valerian Cioclei, op.cit, pp.243-244; Alexandru Boroi, Drept penal. Partea specială¸ C.H. Beck Publishing-house, Bucharest, 2006, p.166.

[33] Alexandru Ionaş, Ilie Măgureanu, Noul Cod penal comentat¸ Romprint Publishing-house, Braşov, 2004, pp.170-171; the paper considers the new Penal Code of 2004, but the authors' commentaries are still valid in the actual context.

perspective, though we totally agree with the incrimination of rape between spouses and between family members, we consider that the aggravated form was preferred by the legislator in the context of the separate incrimination of family violence. From our point of view, even if we could agree with the possibility of the offender to reconcile with his victim, or the victim to withdraw her complaint, we consider that in the context of gender based violence, that the aggravated form must be kept. From a person who promises to protect his spouse, to support her in her difficult moments, it is legally expected to act in the same manner regarding their intimate life. Therefore, the failure to respect the sentimental value of the relationship between the parties must be sanctioned with a more serious penalty but in the normal situation of a rape between unknown persons.

b. Stage two. The regulation of the special law. These were the general regulations in the matter of domestic violence until 2003. There have been made considerable progresses after Law number 217/2003 regarding the domestic violence entered into force. Firstly, the novelty that this law brings up is the one regarding the definition of the concept of "domestic violence". Another new aspect refers to foundation of some bodies in order to support the victims of the domestic violence. But, because we were at the beginning concerning the regulation on this matter, we have noticed a few discordances between this law and the provisions of the penal Code. On the other hand, by comparison with other states, the present regulation of the law and of the penal Code can be substantially improved.

The concept of "domestic violence" is defined for the first time within Law 217/2003 concerning its prevention and fighting against it. According to Art 2 of this law, the domestic violence refers to "…any physical or verbal action which is deliberately committed by a family member against other member of the same family and that it causes a physical suffering, a mental distress, a sexual suffering or a material prejudice". In our opinion, these are some forms of violence which are directly committed by family members ones against the others. Besides this form, the law institutes an assimilated form of violence and that is "the preventing of woman from the exercise of her fundamental rights and freedoms"[34].

The application frame of the law firstly refers to family members, notion that involves the husband/wife and also the close relatives as this term is defined by Art 149 of the Penal Code: the ascendants, the descendants, brothers, sisters and their children and also the persons that became such relatives by adoption. According to the penal law, in the category of close relatives also enter the natural relatives, on the supposition of adoption[35]. As Art 3 Para 1 Let b) does not make any difference; we consider that the special law provisions enforce to them too. It can be noticed that Art 3 Para 1 Let b) "does not impose anymore the condition that the close relatives should live or they should run the house together with the doer", thus the term of family member of the special law is larger than the one of the actual Penal Code.

The persons that have established relationships which are similar to those which exist between spouses (the concubines) or between parents and children also belong to this category, these relations have to be proved by the social investigation[36].

Thus, Art 2 generally defines the forms of violence within we include the physical violence, the mental distress, the sexual violence and the material or moral dependence. At the same time, Art 1 Para 2 of the same normative act clearly states the offences which are considered as forms of domestic violence. Thus, amongst the offences which harm the family life are those mentioned in articles: 175, 176, 179-183, 189-191, 193, 194, 197, 198, 202, 205, 206, 211, 305-307, 309, 314-316, 318 and other similar offences provided by the penal Code and also the provisions of Law number [34] According to Art 2 Para 2 of Law 217/2003.

[35] According to Art 149 Para 2 of the Penal Code.
[36] According to Art 4 of Law 217/2003.

47/2006 concerning the national system of social assistance[37]. We notice that two important regulations on this matter haven't been included in the category of legal texts that state offences which are related to the domestic violence: Art 177 regarding infanticide, Art 203 concerning incest and Art 203[1] concerning sexual harassment. Also, the definition of "family violence" includes only the offences committed with intention, but not those committed out of negligence, as the case of Art 178 – homicide out of negligence or Art 184 – bodily harm by negligence, both stated by the Penal Code, opposite to the opinion expressed by some authors, who include bodily harm by negligence in the category of domestic violence[38].

The law encourages non-governmental organizations to support the assistance programs offered to the victims of the domestic violence[39].

The law has initially instituted a body – The National Agency for the Family Protection which had a role in controlling the domestic violence and it also had the obligation to draw up annual reports concerning the evolution of this phenomenon and the measures that were taken in this respect. Because of the difficult financial situation, by Law number 329/05.11.2009 regarding the reorganization of some public authorities and institutions, the rationalization of the public expenses, the support of the business medium and the observance of the frame-agreements with the European Commission and with the International Monetary Fund, the National Agency for Family Protection was dissolved and it has been fused with the National Authority for the Protection of Child Rights, thus it resulted a new body with legal personality – The National Authority for the Protection of Family and Child Rights (ANPFDC). At the same time, all the provisions regarding the role, the objectives and the attributions of ANFP stated in Law 217/2003 were repealed. Then, the Decision of the Government No. 1385/18.11.2009 concerning the setting up, the organization and the functioning of the National Authority for the Protection of Family and Child Rights it was approved; this decision provides only minimal attributions for ANPFDC regarding this matter.

In order to sustain the activity of ANPFDC, the law disposed the formation of a body of social experts that are named family assistants; they have to deal with the cases of domestic violence and they have general attributions as: they identify and they keep a list with the families where there are conflicts which can cause violence, they develop activities in order to prevent the domestic violence; they find non-violent solutions by keeping contact with the respective persons, they can request the help of some natural or legal persons in order to solve the situations that generate violence in the family and they also can monitories the observance of the rights that belong to the persons that are forced by the circumstances to appeal to these public shelters[40].

Another institution that was inserted in order to solve the domestic violence cases is the mediation. The mediation can develop only at the interested person's request. The proceeding develops by the agency of the family council or it can be developed by authorized mediators. The attempt to mediate the situation does not impede the development of the criminal proceeding or the enforcement of the actual law provisions[41].

In order to help the victims of the domestic violence, the law has instituted the so-called shelters which are bodies with or without legal personality. Their principal role is that to ensure the protection, the housing, the care and the counselling of the victims of domestic violence that have to resort to this social assistance service[42]. Besides these shelters, the law has disposed the setting up of recovery centres that beside housing and care, they firstly ensure their rehabilitation and their social [37] The text of Law 217/2003 refers to the provisions of the Law 705/2001, but this law was abrogated by Law 47/2006 which was published in the Official Gazette of Romania No 239/16 March 2006, thus we can consider the text as implicitly repealed.

[38] Ortansa Brezeanu, Aura Constantinescu, op. cit., p.75.

[39] Ortansa Brezeanu, Aura Constantinescu, op. cit., p.76. According to Art 7 Para 3 of Law 217/2003.

[40] According to Art 13 Para 1 of Law 217/2003 as it has been modified.

[41] According to Art 19 and 20 Para 1 and 2 of the Law 217/2003 as it was modified.

[42] According to Art 23 and 24 of Law 217/2003 as it was modified.

reintegration. The law didn't forget the aggressors; for them it has disposed the organization of some assistance centres which are created as bodies with or without legal personality which ensure, in a residential or semi-residential regime, their rehabilitation, their social reintegration, educational measures, counselling and family mediation measures. For them, the measures of family counselling are completed with those of specific treatments, for example: psychiatric treatment, addiction treatment which is developed within medical structures with which there have been drawn up conventions. No matter the situation, the victims' or the aggressors' assistance and internment in the centres mentioned before can be made only having their consent. For the minor, the agreement is given by the non-aggressor parent or by the legal representative[43].

From the procedural point of view, the law states that the security precautions provided by art. 113 and 114 and also the one provided by art. 118^1 can be taken by the court with a provisory character not only during the criminal prosecution but also during the trial[44]. In our opinion, this stipulation seems to be very interesting. Concerning the safety precaution that refers to the interdiction to come back to the family residence, it has to be noticed that the special law departs from the general one, which is the penal Code. This derogation enforces only during the criminal prosecution and during the first stage of trial, when the court analyses the situation and it disposes that the measures taken with a temporary character should cease or they should become definitive, according to the legal text which enforces to them. The provisory measures are disposed by findings which are only submitted to recourse in a term of 3 days which runs from the pronouncing for the present persons and it runs from the communication for those who were absent.

Although Law 217/2003 regarding the domestic violence brought some improvements by comparison with the previous situation, it is not deprived of criticism. Unfortunately, in Romania there is not a restriction or an interdiction order which would give a real protection to the victims of domestic violence, as it exists in other European legislations. As we have already commented, the victims of domestic violence have to live with the aggressor even if they initiate a juridical approach. In our country, the family violent actions for the most frequent situations (Art 180 and 181 of the Penal Code) are not prosecuted ex officio or as a consequence of the denunciation of any person who has information about these actions, as it happens in the majority of the European states, thus, the reconciliation of the parties absolves the doer from criminal liability. The measure provided by the Penal Code in Art 118^1 can be taken after the aggressor is convicted to imprisonment for at least one year and if he represents a serious danger for the other family members. The decision of conviction of the aggressor is the only measure for protection of the victim. Consequently, the actual measures cannot avoid the imminent danger in the case of domestic violence. Besides, there are no measures of protection with a preventive character that could eliminate the danger and prevent the offences stated in the category of domestic violence; detention and remand are subjected to some restrictive conditions and thus, inapplicable in most cases of domestic violence.

c. Stage three. The new Penal Code, adopted in 2009, but did not came into force[45], inserts new important modifications in the system of penal protection of the family.

Thus, to speak about family violence we must, first of all, define the notion of family or family member. According to the new provisions of Art 177, family member includes: (1, a) ascendants and descendants, brothers and sisters, their children, as well as persons who gained this statute through adoption, according to the law (until here the text is identical with Art 149 Para 1 of the actual Penal Code); (1, b) the spouse (here it is added the hypothesis stated by Art 149^1 Thesis I of the actual Penal Code); (1, c) persons who have established relationships similar to those between spouses or between parents and children, if they share a household (it is a new text for harmonizing the Penal Code and Law 217/2003, in accordance also with other European codes, especially with its source of inspiration, the Spanish Penal Code – Art 173 Para 2[46]. The introduction of concubines in the legal content of the notion of family member, it is justified by the existence of a large number of couples who live in a free union, there is no legal reason the deny their protection similar to that offered to married couples[47]); (2) the provisions in the criminal law with regard to close relatives, within the limits of the previous paragraph letter a), shall apply in case of adoption with full effects, both for the adopted person, as well as for his/her descendants and with regard to the natural relatives (text identical to Art 149 Para 2 Thesis I of the actual Penal Code; the text was adapted and harmonized with the actual provisions on adoption, which no longer differentiate between full adoption and restrictive adoption for more than 15 years).

[43] According to Art 25-25^1 of Law 217/2003 as it has been modified.
[44] According to Art 26-28 of Law 217/2003 as it was modified.
[45] The new Penal Code was stated by Law 286/2009, published in the Official Gazette No 510/24 July 2007.

Another significant modification regards the regime of the penalties. The security measure of the prohibition to return to the family home for a determinate period was eliminated, among other security measures – as previously shown it was inoperable anyway. But the new Penal Code replaces it by introducing as elements of the complementary penalty the prohibition of certain rights in the following situations:

- The right to communicate with the victim or her family[48];
- The right to come near the house, workplace, school or other places where the victim unfolds social activities, in the conditions established by the law[49].

Though the Penal Code does not associate these two situations with domestic or gender based violence, we note that they are very close to the content of the restriction and interdiction order.

These two rights can be prohibited for 1 to 5 years, are expressly applied by the court when the law states it, and optional when the court decides for a fine or for imprisonment and when, given the nature and gravity of the offence, the circumstances and the offender consider the penalty as necessary[50]. As well as in the situation of the prohibition to return to the family home for a determinate period, in this situation the efficiency of the penalty versus domestic or gender based violence can be questioned as long as it remains the single way of protecting the victims of such offences. This is because the penalty is executed, partially like in the actual regime, after the decision for conviction or fine or imprisonment suspended under supervision has remained definitive, and in case of imprisonment by execution after it was executed or when it is considered to be executed[51]. Hence, the measure cannot be decided during criminal trial, so that the victim's life, medical condition or freedom shall be subjected to higher risks.

In the area of aggravating circumstances, the new Penal Code introduces some modifications that affect the situation of domestic and gender based violence. Art 77 of the new Penal Code no longer states as aggravating circumstance the perpetration of an offence by violence against family members, maybe because the new Code dedicates an entire chapter to this matter, without considering the situation of other offences which, according to Art 1 Para 2 of the Law 217/2003 represent domestic violence (such as the lack of liberty, rape etc). The impossibility to state one or [46] According to this text of the Spanish Penal Code, which represents an aggravated form of the offence of torture and other offences against moral integrity, it is considered as passive subject the concubine or the person to whom the aggressor was or still is involved in an affective relationship, even if the no longer share a household, descendants, ascendants, natural or adopted siblings, or other related persons of the victim or of the person with who the aggressor shares a household, minors, incapable persons, who lived with the aggressor or who are subjected to the active subject by a relation of power, guardianship, care or protection, or any person who is involved in any type of relationship assuming his integration in a household, as well as against persons, who as a result of a particular type of vulnerability, are under the care of a public or private centre.

[47] The exposure for reasons at the new Penal Code.

[48] The situation is stated by Art 66 Para 1 Let n) Thesis I of the new Penal Code.

[49] The situation is stated by Art 66 Para 1 Let o) Thesis I of the new Penal Code.

[50] According to Art 67 Para 1 of the new Criminal Code.

[51] According to Art 68 Para 1 Let a) - c) of the new Penal Code.

more aggravating circumstances, as a consequence of the abolition of Art 75 Para 2 of the actual Code – motivated by the aggravation of the criminal liability by violating the principle of predictability – the only possibility to aggravate the criminal liability in case of gender based violence is represented by Art 77 Para 1 Let h) (stated by the actual Code in Art 75 Para 1 Let c)) the commission of the offence as a form of gender based discrimination, and in the case of the other forms of domestic violence by applying Art 77 Para 1 Let h), or by using the new introduced aggravating circumstance regarding the commission of the offence by taking advantage of the victim's vulnerability due to her age (in the case of minors and elder persons), health condition (sick persons), disability or other causes.

The special part was enriched with a new chapter[52] dedicated to domestic violence and including two offences. The first offence is stated by Art 199 and it is called "Family violence". The offence has two means of perpetration and refers to, because it borrows the content of other criminal offences, and subordinating its content to the norms from which it has borrowed that content.

The first mean, settled by Art 199 Para 1 consists of the offences stated by Art 188 – murder, Art 189 – first degree murder, Art 193 – hitting and other violence, Art 194 – bodily injury and Art 195 – hitting or injuries causing death. The second paragraph refers to the possibility that for the offence stated by Art 193, the criminal action to be initiated ex officio, making possible the reconciliation of the parties, by comparison with the text of this offence where the criminal action is initiated only upon prior complaint of the victim[53]. But, in addition, though the previous paragraph does not state that family violence includes the offence of bodily harm out of negligence, stated by Art 196, Para 2 refers to the fact that in the situation of this offence if committed by and against a family member the criminal action can be also initiated ex officio. It is just a simple omission? The amended text no longer corresponds with Law 217/2003, stating that family violence is represented only by offences committed with intention. So, we must understand that bodily harm out of negligence is not domestic violence, but though, talking about the protection of family members, it is possible that criminal action to be initiated ex officio, even if the offence is committed out of negligence.

Returning to the content itself of this offence, it is noticed that the new Penal Code has eliminated all those texts – aggravating circumstances of murder, hitting and other violence and bodily injury from the actual code and inserted them in a new text, called family violence.

Thus, it appears a new inconsistency with Art 1 Para 2 of the Law 217/2003 which defines domestic violence not only from the perspective of the offences assuming a direct physical violence committed with intention, but also other offences harming the rights of a person, such as rape, privation of freedom, robbery, referring only to those offences regarding the spouse-victim of gender based violence, but not for the case of other family victims.

So, what is the logic conclusion in this case? A first hypothesis, starting from the principle of specialia generalibus derogant, would be of the application of the special law to the detriment of the Penal Code; the new text is subsequent to this special law, so that the legislator intended to modify the special law by this new provision?! If we use such interpretation, we would deprive Art 1 Para 2 of the Law 217/2003 of its judicial effects and also the definition given by this law to family violence. It only remains of this law the organizational provisions on the assistance of victims and the possibilities for involvement of local authorities and of specialized organisms created by law or non-governmental organizations with the aim to combat this phenomenon. But this would not be much towards the majority of the Western and European penal texts, which develop the situation and do not restrain it to a minimum physical violence. Thus, Romania would fail in respecting its international and European obligations, to which it has subscribed[54].

[52] We are talking about Chapter III – Offences committed against a family member, from Title I – Offences against persons.

[53] According to Art 193 Para 3 of the new Penal Code.

Finally, for the dysfunctions between the two texts that would settle family violence, in the case of entering into force of the new Penal Code, we might add that the second text named by the Penal Code as form of family violence is the killing or harming of the newborn by the mother, offence stated by Art 200[55]. Art 200 Para 1 is the new version of infanticide with significant modifications. But, as we previously mentioned, Law 217/2003 states infanticide as form of domestic violence. It is true that nowadays infanticide originates in a medical disorder suffered by the mother after giving birth, while in the new text, the disorder considers all possibilities, without differentiating on its nature. Extending the reasons of the disorder, in the new context, infanticide as well as harming the newborn, occurred in the same conditions as those stated in the first paragraph, comprises the situations of family violence, but regarding the minor, given his impossibility to defend himself and his early age.

Finally, the last changes in the area of family violence are those regarding offences against sexual freedom and integrity. The new text of rape[56] no longer states the aggravating circumstance on the perpetration of the offence by and against a family member, stated now by Art 197 Para 2 Let b[1]). In exchange, it has partially incorporated provisions regarding incest, thus eliminating the debates on the existence of plurality of offences between rape and incest, and leaving without core the provisions of the appeal for the law resulted from the decision of the High Court of Cassation and Justice No 17/2008 point 2[57]. The same aggravating circumstance is also found in the case of a new offence – Sexual aggressions – Art 219 Para 2 Let b) of the new Penal Code.

As a conclusion, we can state that both the current, as well as the new provisions on family violence of the Penal Code, especially gender based violence, which is in our special interest for the moment, does not enjoy the most comprehensive, coordinated and clear regulations. Moreover, though many recent European texts explicitly refers to violence against women, and in Spain the regulations have reached the protection of this type of violence, as a gender based violence, the Romanian texts are still clumsy and without efficiency.

III. The evolution of the Spanish legislation

The protection order may contain also penal law measures, as well as civil law protection measures. The latter ones can be taken only upon the request of the victim (as previously shown, the protection order containing penal measures can be issued ex officio by the judge), of her legal representative or of the prosecutor, but only if minor children or incapable persons are concerned, if the measures were not already taken by a civil court. The civil law protection measures consist of a decision attributing the exclusive use of the common housing of two persons to the protected person, the establishment of the regime of custody, visits, communication and residence with children, as well as the regime of offering food to them. The civil law protection measures are taken for [54] For instance, it would not respect the European Convention on Human Rights or Recommendation R(2002)5 on the protection of women against violence, Recommendation R(2004)1681 – Campaign to combat domestic violence against women in Europe, Resolution 1512(2006) "Parliaments united in combating domestic violence against women", Recommendation 1759(2006) "Parliaments united in combating domestic violence against women", Resolution R(2007)1582 of the Council of Europe "Parliaments united in combating domestic violence against women".

[55] According to Art 200 of the new Penal Code, killing or harming the newborn by the mother consists of: (1) The killing of a newborn infant, committed immediately after birth, but no later than 24 hours, by the mother who is in a state of confusion, shall be punished by imprisonment from 1 to 5 years; (2) If the offences stated by Art 193-195 are committed against the newborn infant immediately after birth, but no later than 24 hours, by the mother who is in a state of confusion, the special limits of the penalty are from 1 month to 3 years.

[56] See Art 218 Para 3 Let b) of the new Penal Code.

[57] See the official High Court of Cassation and Justice's website www.scj.ro.

maximum 30 days. The protection order shall be communicated to the parties and to the public authorities competent in insuring the protection, security, social assistance, juridical, health, physiological measures or any other kind of measures. Also, the protection order shall imply permanent information of the victim on the situation of the defendant, on the status of the adopted protection measures, as well as on the detention of the offender, if necessary. We also considered as very interesting the establishment and existence of a Central Register for the Protection of Victims against Violence (Registro Central para la Protección de las Víctimas de Violencia Doméstica) where are registered all the protection orders, representing a mirror of the national situation of domestic violence and also a type of record dedicated to this phenomenon.

Finally, one of the last measures adopted by the Spanish legislator to prevent and stop domestic violence and to protect its victims is the Organic Law 1/28 December 2004 on the measures for protection against gender based violence, called Integral Law, as a consequence of the stated measures.

It is for the first time when Spain evolves from generally debating domestic violence to specifically debating gender based violence, the last name not very popular among the Romanian jurists. Besides the entrance the European and international view of the gender based violence was made in the early 1990, but mostly after 2000[58]. For María Luisa Maqueda the domestic and gender based violence are different from the perspective of the victims: for the first, it is the family, and for the second it is the woman, even if she recognizes the majority of cases of gender based violence occur within the family[59].

In the preamble of the Integral Law, it is shown that this form of violence is no longer just an aspect of the private sector, but it represents a problem of the entire society, manifesting itself as the most brutal symbol of inequality in society[60]. This law, the violence that woman are forced to suffer within the extended family stops to be an "invisible offence", generating a collective rejection and an obvious social alarm.

Let us see how this law defines gender based violence, which are its leading principles and its main novelties inserted in the penal system.

According to Art 1, gender based violence represents all types of violence resulted from the discrimination, inequality and domination exerted by the man against women, violence exercised by her ex or actual concubine (the term also includes the quality of husband), or by the man with whom the woman is involved in a relationship, even if they no longer share a household. According to professor Luis Arroyo Zapatero the extension of the term "family" as to include fathers, sons, brothers, uncles by alliance of the husband or concubine, minors or incapable persons that shared a household with the victim, the persons who are within the family framework by any relationship, as well as guardians or tutors in centers for vulnerable persons is an exaggeration of the law, despite the fact that he supported the idea of differentiation between domestic and gender based violence, including in the parliamentary sessions that debated the full text of the law[61].

Regarding the equality between men and women promoted by the Integral Law, María Elósequi Itxaso considers that it has a wide meaning, taking into account not the possible rights in politics, economy or the social area, but also the conditions for their full exercise. It is actually equality, according to the author, which starts from the differences specific to the gender that

---

[58] María Luisa Maqueda, LA VIOLENCIA DE GÉNERO - Entre el concepto jurídico y la realidad social, in the Spanish Penal Sciences and Criminology Review nr. 08-02 (2006), p. 02:2.

[59] Ibid, p.02:4.

[60] See also in this regard the opinion of María Luisa Maqueda, op.cit, p.02:2.

[61] Luis Arroyo Zapatero, op. cit., p. 202. For his presence in the Parliament see the Congress official website (Spanish Chamber of Deputies) www.congreso.es/publicaciones/ on 19 July and 7-9 September 2004.

integrates them, without imposing to the woman the man model[62]. The author shows that the guiding principles for the public authorities in applying this law shall be: equal treatment (it is prohibited any direct or indirect discrimination based on sex, regardless of its manifestation mean), equal opportunities (all public authorities shall adopt measures that will guarantee the effective exercise, for women and men, of their political, civil, economic, social or cultural rights), respecting differences and diversity (all public authorities shall apply the law by respecting the differences and diversity between men and women), integration of the gender based perspective (all public authorities shall integrate the gender based perspective, in the meaning of considering different situations, conditions, aspirations and needs of women and men, aiming to eliminate all inequalities and to promote equality in all the stages of policies and actions: planning, execution and evaluation), positive action, elimination of stereotypes based on sex[63].

Besides these principles applicable for public authorities, Art 2 of the law states certain guiding principles, among which we emphasize: equipping public authorities with efficient instruments in fighting against gender based violence and assisting its victims in an educational, health care and publicity environment, the creation of an emergency information social service for victims of gender based violence, providing an economic support for female victims of this phenomenon, the creation of an administrative guardianship of the state that will impose public policies to support the victims, strengthening the penal framework, offering the possibility for civil entities, associations and organizations to act against gender based violence, ensuring the transversality of the means of support etc[64].

From the penal perspective, the novelties inserted by the Integral Law refer to the enlargement of the framework of offences – as misdemeanors – of domestic violence, which determines higher penalties, temporary imprisonment, the obligation of adopting the superior limitation of a penalty (it shall be punished by imprisonment from 3 months to 3 years) if the offence is committed by gun or other dangerous instruments threat, in front of minors, in the common domicile or in the victim's domicile or by trespassing either the temporary separation order, the adoption of the security measure of separating the offender from the victim, and the adoption of the plurality of offences between the offence against moral integrity and the offence of ill treatments[65].

Essentially, the evolution of the Spanish legislation with its latter modifications was appreciated as positive, revealing many situations, but also succeeding to protect all the victims terrorized by violence or who could have been dead by now.

Conclusions

Searching for documentation for a wider study on domestic and gender based violence, from which this article represents only a part, I found a book of a Spanish author Miguel Lorente Acosta – Mi marido me pega lo normal – Agresión a la mujer: realidades y mitos (Mi husband constantly beats me – Agresion against women: reality and myth). Noticing the title I could not stop remembering all the girls' talk that I have heard in my childhood when a friend of my family got married. Such lines as: "You have a good husband, he does not beat you, does not drink, what more do you want?" were natural in those times (in the vision of communist or non-communist mentalities). The debates on women who were beaten by their husbands or indirect realities, lived by other people, were frequent, about two-three decades ago.

---

[62] María Elósequi Itxaso, Los principios rectores de la Ley orgánica contra la violencia de género, in Pilar Rivas Vallejo, Guillermo Barrios Baudor coord., Violencia de género – perspectiva multidisciplinar y práctica forense, Thomson Aranzadi Publishing-house, Pamplona, 2007, p. 121.

[63] Ibid., pp.121-123.

[64] María Ibáñez Solaz, Catálogo de principios rectores y derechos previstos en la Ley no.1/2004, in Pilar Rivas Vallejo, Guillermo Barrios Baudor coord., op. cit., pp. 132-133.

[65] Luis Arroyo Zapatero, op. cit., pp. 202-203.

We also live painful realities nowadays, within families were women, with a disturbing majority, a little support from a system that starts functioning, manage to survive a severe beating. But after the system offers them and their children shelter and food for one-two-three months, all these women will return in the same violent and dangerous environment due to their financial and household dependence and, why not, their habit of supporting years of beatings.

So, is Romania ready for a special legislation on gender based violence or it shall be the exception? Are Romanian women aware as the Spanish women that a life under terror is not a life of love, but just a life of vices? Are these women aware that they deserve an infinitely better life and if they choose not to hurt the men that beat them by submitting a complaint against them, they could choose to divorce as fast as possible? Shall the Romanian legislation support them, which by comparison with the Spanish one must be improved with measures to be adopted at the beginning of the penal trial, not only at its ending?

This is just a pleading for life and for a mean of stating that the Romanian legislation on domestic and gender based violence must be change in order to effectively support all the women who suffer in silence and ignorance…

References

Books

- Olivian Mastacan, Violența în familia. Aspecte teoretice şi practice. Târgovişte: Valahia University Press, 2005.
- Valerian Cioclei, Drept penal. Partea specială. Infracţiuni contra vieţii. Bucharest: C.H. Beck Publishing-house, 2009.
- Lavinia Mihaela Vlădilă, Olivian Mastacan, Drept penal. Parte generală. Bucuharest: Universul Juridic Publishing-house, 2011.
- Matei Basarab, Viorel Paşca, Gheorghiță Mateuț, Tiberiu Medeanu, Constantin Butiuc, Mircea Bădilă, Radu Bodea, Petre Dungan, Valentin Mirtişan, Ramiro Mancaş and Cristian Miheş, Codul penal comentat. Partea specială, vol. II. Bucharest: Hamangiu Publishing-house, 2009.
- Alexandru Boroi, Drept penal. Partea specială. Bucharest: C.H. Beck Publishing-house, 2006.
- Alexandru Ionaş, Ilie Măgureanu, Noul Cod penal comentat. Braşov: Romprint Printing House, 2004.
- M. J. Cruz Blanca, "*Dreptul penal şi discriminarea pe motive de sex. Violența domestică în codificarea din Codul pena*l", in L. Morillas, Studii penale despre violența în familie. Madrid: Edersa Publishing-house, 2000.
- Eduardo Demetrio Crespo, Luis Arroyo Zapatero, "El uxoricidio por adulterio en la legislación penal española anterior a la democracia", in International symposium on issue of custom and honour killing, Diyabarkir: Ahader Publishing-house, 2003.
- María Elósequi Itxaso, "Los principios rectores de la Ley orgánica contra la violencia de género", in Pilar Rivas Vallejo and Guillermo Barrios Baudor coord., Violencia de género – perspectiva multidisciplinar y práctica forense. Pamplona: Thomson Aranzadi Publishing-house, 2007.
- María Ibáñez Solaz, "Catálogo de principios rectores y derechos previstos en la Ley no.1/2004", in Pilar Rivas Vallejo and Guillermo Barrios Baudor coord., Violencia de género – perspectiva multidisciplinar y práctica forense. Pamplona: Thomson Aranzadi Publishing-house, 2007.

Articles

- Ortansa Brezeanu, Aura Constantinescu, „Violența domestică. Reflecții" in Romanian Penal Law Review (2/2007): 68.
- Laura Maria Crăciunean, "Violența în Familie. Circumstanță agravantă" in Romanian Penal Law Review (4/2005): 52.
- Ilie Pascu, "Interdicția de a reveni în locuința familiei" in Romanian Penal Law Review (4/2002): 44-45.

- Luis Arroyo Zapatero, "Dreptul penal spaniol şi violenţa în cuplu" in Romanian Penal Law Review (3/2008):197 and next.
- María Luisa Maqueda, "LA VIOLENCIA DE GÉNERO – Entre el concepto jurídico y la realidad social" in the Spanish Penal Sciences and Criminology Review (08-02 (2006): 02:2.

Official websites

- High Court of Cassation and Justice official website: www.scj.ro
- Council of Europe official website: http://www.coe.int/lportal/web/coe-portal
- United Nations official website: http://www.un.org/en/
- Spanish Ministry of Health, Social Services and Equality official website:
- http://www.seigualdad.gob.es/violenciaGenero/documentacion/home.htm
- Spanish Ministry of Interior official website: http://www.mir.es/
- Spanish Congress official website: www.congreso.es

HISTORICAL INCRIMINATION OF FACTS AGAINST PATRIMONY

MIHAIL-SILVIU POCORA*

Abstract
The aim of this study arises from the importance recognized to patrimony as a social value of all evolution stages of society. Assuming that all antisocial acts which affects patrimony were always sanctioned, I tried to illustrate their incrimination since slave and feudal period, the oldest Romanian law, also the regulations of modern criminal law systems. Also, I've presented the disposals of Criminal Codes since 1864 (inspired almost from French Criminal Law and Prussian Criminal Law) and nowadays, also some decisions in matter of Constitutional Court. Thus, the study becomes important even through comparative aspects setted of by evolutive way of incrimination of facts against patrimony.

Keywords: historical, evolution, offences, patrimony, incrimination*

Introduction

Given the patrimony importance, recognized as a social value at all evolution stages of society, the acts against society which affects patrimony were always punished, those with highest seriousness are even included under criminal law[1].

During slavery, were harshly punished the theft, robbery, plunder, other acts which affect property were less known, such as fraud, breach of trust, fraudulent management, which were considered as civil offenses.

During feudal period is gradually extending the criminal repression, including all facts which may affect patrimony. Usually, unimportant theft is punishable by flaying, but the third theft was punished by death penalty (tres furtileus). If the theft is serious it could apply this penalty since from the first theft. This harsh of punish shows the frequency and severity of crimes. Against such acts, the mastery was forced to refer to the most inhuman punishment.

Modern criminal law systems, although removed some of exaggerations above, have maintained a fairly severe regime for certain forms of criminal activity against property. Also, is extended during incrimination framework other specific facts of economic relations by modern society.

Chronological disposals

In old Romanian law are founded regulations most detailed relating to these crimes. Thus, Pravilele lui Vasile Lupu (Vasile Lupu Precepts) - "Carte pentru învăţături" (Book for teaching) since 1646 - and Matei Basarab - "Îndreptarea legii" (Law correction) of 1652 - Codicele penale ale lui Alexandru Sturdza în Moldova (Criminal Codex of Alexander Sturdza in Moldova) - 1862 - and Barbu Ştirbei -1850 - in Muntenia (Wallachia), contained provisions relating to offenses against property.

Romanian Criminal Romanian Penal Code of 1864, although mostly copied by French Criminal Code, contained in chapters on "Crimes and offences against property" numerous incrimination inspired by Prussian Criminal Code (art. 306-380) relating to heritage protection in order to ensure by severe means its protection.

The Criminal Code of 1864, offenses against patrimony were included some crimes that were only indirectly related to heritage protection.

Romanian criminal code from 1936 called "The new Criminal Code Charles II" came into force on January 1, 1937 included this matter in Book II, Title XIV entitled "Crimes and offences against property" - art. 524-573; systematized in five chapters as follows: Chapter I - Theft, Chapter II - Robbery and Piracy, Chapter III- Offences against property through reckless confidence, Chapter IV - Abroad displace, abolition of border signs, damage and other disorders of property, Chapter V - Game, lottery, speculation against public economy.

* Ph. D. candidate, „Al.I. Cuza" Police Academy, Bucharest (email: silviupocora@yahoo.com).

[1] Vizitiu, Gh. Delapidarea. Bucureşti: Editura Lumina Lex, 2001.

As it shown, the Criminal Code of 1936 restricted in its natural limits, all crimes against property, grouping them according to the legal object.

Art. 553 of Criminal Code "Charles II", included in Title XIV "Crimes and offences against property," Section VII, the cheating by check, whose forms of executing acts were inspired by art. 84 pt. 2 din of Law no. 59/1934 on check.

Both during the Criminal Code since 1864 and Code since 1936, were in force certain crimes against property, which were provided in special laws, such as Military Justice Code, the Commercial Code, Forest Code, etc..

During the period 1944-1989, naturally were produced some important changes in legislative terms. In this context, was adopted Decree no.192/1950 which content the definition of "public" term and therefore the "common property"[2]. Through this normative act was introduced in Title XIV of Criminal Code of 1936 a new Chapter called "Some offenses against public property", which later was brought changes, especially in punishment aggravation. This decree marked the moment of first appearance of a discriminatory protection, as it was considered "private" or "public".

Criminal Code of 1968 took this concept of differential protection of heritage, which is why, in Title III of its Special Part were provided crimes against private property, and in Title IV, offenses against public or civic property. This structure stood until 1996, until the Law no. 140/1996 was adopted. Thus, were brought substantial changes to the Criminal penal code in force.

Need to adopt this legislation act was claimed by many problems complaining by practice in relation to Criminal Code in force.

Constitutional disposals

As regarding the heritage protection the general regime of property established by Art. 44 (was Art. 42 before its republish since 2003) of Romanian Constitution of 1991 is different from that before 1989, and the differentiate protection of heritage according to its titular was not in compliance with new constitutional provisions.

Art. 44 of Constitution provide that "The property right and claims against State are guaranteed. The content and limitations of these rights are established by law. Private property is guaranteed and protected equally by law, regardless of its owner. Foreign citizens and stateless persons may acquire private property of land only in terms resulting from Romania's accession to the European Union and other international treaties which Romania is part, on the basis of reciprocity, as provided by organic law and legal inheritance. Nobody can be expropriated except the public utility, established according to law, with fair and prior compensation. Are prohibited the nationalization or any other measures of forcible transfer of public ownership of property by social, ethnic, religious, political affiliation or other discriminatory features. For projects of general interest, the public authority can use the subsoil of any real estate under obligation of owner for damage brought to soil, plantations and construction, and for other damages imputable to authorities. Right of property compels to duties observance relating to environmental protection and ensuring good neighborliness, as well as other duties that under law or custom, are accrued to owner. The property acquired legally assets could not be confiscated. Legality of acquiring is presumptive. The assets fated used or resulted from offenses or contraventions can be confiscated only in accordance with law.

---

[2] Nistoreanu, Gh., Dobrinoiu, V., colectiv . Drept penal, Partea specială. Bucureşti: Editura Europa Nova, 1997.

Organizing and functioning Rules . 156 (2 february 2005).

Also, Romanian Constitution includes other rules with a principle value relating to property. Art. 136 par. 2 of Constitution indicates fundamental forms of property, namely, public and private, also are shown they which belongs assets as part of each property form, so public property belongs to state and administrative - territorial units.

Starting from these new constitutional principles, the Romanian courts practice is often stipulated that provisions of Title IV of Romanian Penal Code Special Part are unconstitutional.

Constitutional Court decisions

The most important of the Constitutional Court decisions rendered in this matter is Decision no. 1/1993 of the Constitutional Court Plenum[3] on Criminal Code provisions relating to public property in context of constitutional provisions on property.

In this case, the Constitutional Court was informed by Courts with unconstitutionality exception invoked during processes which having as object the property damage stipulated by Art. 145 of Criminal Code and whole Title of Criminal Code on offenses against public property.

The main legal issue invoked during these exceptions was to determine if the "public property" term used by the Criminal Code is consistent with Constitution of 1991 and, depending on the response, if the differentiate treatment of criminal justice is justified, both to crimes against private and public property.

Constitutional Court Plenum took into account the same court decisions which have admitted the exceptions raises in namely folders, finding that Criminal Code provisions on sanction of offenses against public property were partially repealed according to art. 150 par. (1) of Constitution and therefore these will be applied only on assets provided by art. 136 par. (4) of Constitution, which form the exclusive object of public property. Are expressly indicated by Decisions no. 9, 10, 12, 13, 16, 17 and no. 18/1993, against the General Prosecutor made appealed.

One of two reasons invoked is starting from affirmation that Criminal Code provisions relating to public property are unconstitutional and are not being repealed by Constitution, because the "property" term of the Criminal Code has a content too extended than the notion of "patrimony". The notion of "public property" is assimilated by the patrimony of Civil law, including all real rights, all patrimonial rights and all obligations on entities likely to be evaluated economically. Moreover, it is argued on appeal, the Criminal Code offenses are not named crimes against patrimony, but crimes against property, similar to the Criminal Code of 1936 which relating to crimes against property. Moreover, it was shown, the current Criminal Code does not contravene the Constitution because it not denies the existence of two types of property (public and private) and do not provides other property forms than those mentioned by Constitution.

On appeal, the Constitutional Court has decided to admit in part all appeals declared, admits unconstitutionality exceptions on Art. 223, 224, 229 par. 1 of Criminal Code, but in the last text, only for provision intended the damage against public property and was establish a deadline, on 30 November 1993 for giving to Parliament the possibility of modifying the Criminal Code mentioned above Also, it was shown if until deadline is not adopted the provision modifications of Art. 223, 224, 229 par. 1, from 1 December 1993 will produce effects until their repeal. Until the adoption of amendments by Parliament, but not after 30 November 1993, the listed provisions will be applied. In the same decision is noted "If after entry into force of Constitution of 1991 could not retain the meaning of "public property" term, being contrary to Art. 41 par. (2) (actually, Art. 44), of Constitution, but there is no legal basis to identify the public property with public patrimony, means that legal provisions of Criminal Code relating to public property and appealed to the Court are unconstitutional and therefore, entirely repealed. Thus, the legislator intervention is obligatory ".

Dissenting opinion made in connection with this appeal decision has supported maintaining of solutions gave to the first trial and was found unconstitutional the establishment of a new term in future within the Court's decision will become enforceable and until then, the above mentioned texts of the Criminal Code to be apply, although they were repealed.

[3] Decision. 232 (Constitutional Court, 27 septembrie 1993).

Also, in another appeal, which is the object of file no. 11 C/1993 of Constitutional Court, the judges has decided the trial delay because claims files and intention of majority judges to remove from legal interpretation given by Decision no 38 since July 7 1993, situation which was regulated by art. 26 par. (2) of Organization and functioning Rule of Constitutional Court. Through same conclusion was decided to appeal the Constitutional Court Plenum[4].

Therefore, the Constitutional Court Plenum was convened to give a uniform interpretation of Criminal Code constitutionality provisions regarding to crimes against public property.

The Plenum, examining cases brought to the Court, the constitutional and legal decisions pronounced by judges of Constitutional Court in cases concerning unconstitutionality exceptions, held the following:

1. In order to solve the unconstitutionality exceptions of certain provisions of Criminal Code, panels of Constitutional Court judges gave legal different interpretations in identical legal situations.

2. Pronunciation of conflicting decisions would be contrary to idea of constitutional justice and courts would be unable to achieve consistent interpretation and unitary application of Criminal Code provisions on crimes against property.

3. Organization and functioning rules of Constitutional Court requires the Court judges to comply the Court's interpretation with majority votes of judges.

4. The Court Plenum is asked to decide: a) if provisions of Criminal Code relating to offenses against public property are constitutional, b) if Constitutional Court Decision, definitely, is obligatory and binding and enforceable since date of publication in Official Gazette or Court may establish another term in future from which will produce effects and possible, a condition.

Regarding the first issue, the Plenum of Constitutional Court considered that "public property" term will not be confused with "patrimony" notion, and although is not nominated by Constitution, it does not appear as unconstitutional, as long as means a general interest of society, is related to public safely and it refers to public property. In the past, the public property was been protected by Law for patrimony protection, published in Official Gazette no. 75/31.03.1937, more efficient than private property of individuals, in sense that urgency procedure was applicable to obvious crimes and extended liability to persons who have not taken prevent measures of public property damage. It has to be noted at that time there is no similar constitutional text art. 41 par. (2) (namely, Art. 44) of current Constitution.

Therefore, it appears natural that offences against public property to be punishable as crimes against public patrimony. Not "public property" category is problematic category relating to criminal treatment, but its sphere and therefore, the criminal liability dimensions and limits.

Court held that private property is equally protected by law, regardless of titular (Art. 41 par. (2) of Constitution – namely Art. 44). Thus, any extension of public property category to private patrimony if wants to be against this provision, is unconstitutional.

Special protection given to general interests is not only a matter of criminal policy, but also constitutionality, if this extension would create a legal regime which contravene to disposals of Art. 41 (44) of Constitution.

Regarding the property it is in addition to any interpretation that actually constitutional disposals establish two forms of property, public and private property. According to Art. 135 par. (3), public property belongs to state or administrative-territorial units. Par. (4) indicate assets that are exclusively object of public property, indicating that other assets established by law can be included in this category.

[4] Organizing and functioning Rules . 156 (2 february 2005).

Therefore, except assets of art. 135 par. (4) and throughout laws which declare it public property, others are private property and private property have both state and citizens and legal entities such as companies.

As a characteristic of public property is inalienable, and under law, assets - public property can be managed by autonomous administrations, public institutions or may be leased or rented.

According to art. 42 par. (2) –current paragraph 44, private property is equally protected by law, regardless of titular, without difference if the owner is state, company or citizen.

It should be highlighted that assets of autonomous administrations and companies are not state owned, but private property, even if state have the most social capital the companies.

Art. 5 of Law no. 15/1990 state that "autonomous administration is the owner of its property assets. Art. 20 par. 2. In exercising ownership, the autonomous administration is possessed, used and disposed independently of its property assets... " of this law provides that "assets belongs to company property are its patrimony...". Art. 35 of Law no. 31/1990, states that "assets constituted as contribution to society become its property."

From those shown, it is clear that autonomous administrations and companies assets are private and not public property. Private property is equally protected, regardless of ownership (state, legal person or individual), according to art. 41 par. (2) (actual 44) of Constitution .

As such, thefts of private property - even if it belongs to state - could not be qualified theft of "public property", these terms will apply only for public property defined by art. 135 par. (4) of Constitution.

General Prosecutor, in his appeal, argued that should continue to apply provisions of Art. 145 of Penal Code, which defines public property as follows: “public” term means all about state organizations, public organizations or any organizations which conduct a useful social activity and which operate according to law".

It is observed that concept of public property, in sense that was defined in previous legal practice includes not only assets of state organizations, but even those which conduct socially useful activity. Were included even assets of tenant associations and companies, with motivation to develop a social and useful activity.

To Art. 41 (actual 44) and Art. 135 of Constitution, the public property term could not be understood as such, it should be reported only to assets which forming the exclusively object of public property.

Complete elimination of special criminal protection, more rigorous of assets which forming the object of public property violates the constitutional provisions, because these goods are inalienable. Lack of protective measures increased of public ownership it was appreciated that have deeply damaging effects. Therefore, the provisions relating to preferential protection of public property must be understood in light of Constitution, to apply to assets which forming the exclusively object of public property.

Regarding the second issue, related to setting the deadline of 30 November 1993 to give to Parliament the possibility of provisions modifying of Criminal Code, which is contrary to art. 41 par. (2) current Art. 44 of Constitution , with mention that, if until settled deadline are not produced specified changes, starting from December 1, 1993 will produce effects of their repeal, and until the adoption of amendments by Parliament, but not after 1 December 1993, namely provisions will be applied - Plenum of Constitutional Court was considered that such solution take into account its constitutional foundation. Furthermore, it was considered that solution is contradictory. Because the Criminal Code provisions on criminal liability in cases concerning public property are declared inconsistent with Constitution, their implementation, for another period, is obviously contrary with their repeal.

First, it should be noted that no legal text do not give to Constitutional Court the right to dispose to Parliament for modifying certain legal texts, because this would be contrary the principle of state powers separation. Second, it is incomprehensible that certain legal texts of legislation are repealed since the entry into force of Constitution - December 8, 1991, and, on the other hand, to declare their application until 30 November 1993. Once a legal text has been repealed, any judicial authority could not extend its existence.

The proposed solution is not based on Constitution into force. When Constitution, by Art. 123 par. (1), states that justice is administered in the name of law is take into account the law in force and a law is and will remain in force through the legislature volition. Justice could not be achieved by a law whose express repeal was achieved by a constitutional text, which was officially established by Constitutional Court. In this case, the Court's constitutional role is to ascertain the Criminal Code provisions have been repealed and therefore to dispose them applicability or enforceability. Court could not interfere to Parliament. No doubt that public authorities with power in legislate create must be involved, but this involvement is a problem that only they decide, under Constitutional rules. Involvement of Constitutional Court in legislate sphere (except provisions of Art. 144 pts. a), b) and h) of Constitution) and criminal policy beyond its competence, being an interference of other state authorities. This is a deviation from law principle in order of manner competence the laws are strictly interpreted. Constitutional Court would arrogate abusive the duty to prolong effects of repealed legislation, by violating competence rules and the balance of power resulting from constitutional provisions.

Due to Parliament is supreme representative authority of people and the sole legislative authority of country, Constitutional Court could not compel him to a certain activity, however important is the problem contained by a decision.

In this case, there are criminal provisions relating to jail sentences, the effects of such solutions are unpredictable, and could create legal and moral irreparable situations by applying a criminal law repealed.

When Constitution allowed the authorities to establish themselves entry into force of a law after a certain period, she made it explicit. Thus, according to art. 15 par. (2), law produces effect only for future, and according to art. 78, law shall enter into force on its publication in Official Gazette (three days after that date, in according to amendment made in 2003) or to date provided in its text.

Taking into account all these allegations, the Plenum of Constitutional Court has established the following:

1. The provisions of Criminal Code relating to offenses against public property are partially repealed in accordance to art. 150 par. (1) of Constitution and therefore they are able to apply only on assets provided by art. 135 par. (4) of Constitution, which form the exclusive object of public property.

2. Decisions of Constitutional Court ruled on resolution of unconstitutionality exceptions become enforceable once they are final, under observing of constitutional and legal rules on its publication and disclosure, not being able to set a further time from which to apply.

Regarding the effects of constitutional decisions, they are regulated by art. 147 of Constitution. Under this text, the provisions of laws and ordinances in force, and those of regulations found as being unconstitutional, stops their legal juridical effect after45 days since decision publication of Constitutional Court if, in the meantime, the Parliament or Government, not agree with unconstitutional provisions of Constitution. During this period, provisions found as unconstitutional are suspended under law. Under these conditions, the declaration of unconstitutionality, from the moment of its publication in Official Gazette[5], creates an obligation only for Parliament or Government, as appropriate, to intervene in order to remedy this situation without through these concrete cases the Constitutional Court, which has no a role of positive legislative and could not propose for modifying texts a form in accordance with Constitution, to intervene on namely act or provision[6].

[5] Constantinescu, M., Amzulescu, M. Drept contencios constituţional. Bucureşti: Editura Fundaţiei România de Mâine, 2005.

Since its publication in Official Gazette, the Constitutional Court decisions of unconstitutionality admission of legal provisions are mandatory, final and irrevocable, being universally valid and produce effects erga omnes[7] and could not be challenged during internal law system either directly or indirectly. Constitutional Court decisions are not appealable.

In this context, it can be stated that provisions found as unconstitutional are legally suspended since publication of Constitutional Court decision in Official Gazette, following that, within 45 days the Parliament or Government to agree these provisions to Constitution. Otherwise, the provisions will not produce the legal effect[8].

Decision of Constitutional Court Plenum, was accompanied by a different opinion. The opinion signatories are not agreed with opinion of judge majority, expressed by interpretation decision above, as following reasons:

1. The criminal term of "public property" has a unitary character, defining the object of a special criminal protection. Between content and extension degree of this notion is an indissoluble connection, so the modifying of some element of content could not lead to change of concept itself.

Therefore, restricting the notion of public property only to assets which forming public property is a modification of this notion, not only for extension degree but also in terms of content. Thus, many aspects stipulated by art. 145 of Criminal Code remain without object.

Since the notion of public property is regulated by law, its changing means law changing, which is exclusive competence of Parliament, "the sole legislative authority of country, according to art. 58 par. (1) of Constitution - the current paragraph 61. Therefore, Constitutional Court, interpreting the concept of public property will be applied only to assets forming the object of public property, has substituted to legislature criminal repression regulating.

The only solution to avoid this substitution is finding the Criminal Code relating provisions regarding to public property are abolished entirely, while the notion of public property through its effects on private property protection, is contrary to art. 41 par. (2)– of Constitution - the current Article 44. This does not mean extending the effects of repeal, but is the consequence of the unitary character of public property notion, mentioned above, which makes impossible to distinguish the effects covered by art. 41 par. (2) of Constitution - the current Article 44. 2 - by other effects without changes the notion of public property.

Supporting that application of public property notion to assets which forming exclusively the object of public property are based on inalienable character of these assets, enshrined by Art. 135 par. (5) of Constitution - the current paragraph 136. 5, are not justified. This provision has only significance to prohibit sale of assets and does not imply automatically more severe criminal repression. Nothing can stop the legislature to establish such repression for public property assets in whole, or only for some categories, but as following interpretation, the Court will not be able to establish such juridical regime. Also, the legislature can establish a different repression for certain categories of private assets, without making distinguish between their affiliation to state or other subjects. Therefore, the difference between public and private property, based on interpretation decision, is irrelevant in order to constitutionality of criminal repression regime, generally.

---

[6] Selejan- Guțan, B. Excepția de neconstituționalitate. București: Editura All Beck, 2005.

[7] Vida, I. Legistică formală – Introducere în tehnica şi procedura legislativă, Ediția a III-a. Bucureşti: Editura Lumina Lex, 2006.

[8] Stancu, E. Efectele deciziilor Curții Constituționale. Revista critică de drept şi de filosofia dreptului, vol. 2, , Bucureşti: Editura Cartea universitară, 2005.

Conclusions

We choose to present detailed arguments during this approach in order to understand why was imposed such a normative act, to state the existing situation regarding to Criminal Code rules, which had as purpose, public property protection. Moreover, the doctrine states this need, considering that different stipulation of "crimes against public property or private" and "crimes against public patrimony" was unjustified, while "the pair offences" (as their name) had different structures and contents. The only difference consists in patrimony affected and sanction regime, more severe than last.

References

- Constantinescu, M., Amzulescu, M. Drept contencios constituțional. Bucureşti: Editura Fundației România de Mâine, 2005.
- Decision. 232 (Constitutional Court, 27 septembrie 1993).
- Nistoreanu, Gh., Dobrinoiu, V., colectiv . Drept penal, Partea specială. Bucureşti: Editura Europa Nova, 1997.
- Organizing and functioning Rules . 156 (2 february 2005).
- Selejan- Guțan, B. Excepția de neconstituționalitate. Bucureşti: Editura All Beck, 2005.
- Stancu, E. Efectele deciziilor Curții Constituționale. Revista critică de drept şi de filosofia dreptului, vol. 2, , Bucureşti: Editura Cartea universitară, 2005.
- Vida, I. Legistică formală – Introducere în tehnica şi procedura legislativă, Ediția a III-a. Bucureşti: Editura Lumina Lex, 2006.
- Vizitiu, Gh. Delapidarea. Bucureşti: Editura Lumina Lex, 2001.

CRIMINAL PROTECTION OF PRIVATE LIFE

RADU SLĂVOIU*

Abstract
This study is meant, first of all, to analyze the incriminations that the new Romanian Criminal Code sets for the protection of a person's private life as a social value of maximum significance both for the human being and for any democratic society as a whole.There are two criminal offences treated in this study that are not to be found in the current criminal legislation: violation of private life and criminal trespassing of a legal person's property. Likewise, the study will bring forth the novelties and the differences regarding the offences of criminal trespassing of a natural person's property, disclosure of professional secret, violation of secret correspondence, illegal access to computerized system and illegal interception of electronic data transfer – acts that when, directly or indirectly, committed can cause harm to the intimacy of a person's life.As an expression of the interdisciplinary nature of this subject, the study also sets out, as a subsidiary aspect, an evaluation of the circumstances under which the new criminal proceeding legislation allows public authorities to interfere with an individual's private life. Thus, the emphasis is on the analysis of the circumstances under which special surveillance and investigation techniques can be used as evidence proceedings regulated by the new Romanian Criminal Procedure Code.

Keywords: New Criminal Code, the protection/violation of private life, harassment, professional office, means of interception of communications*

Introduction.

I. General aspects. Modern society includes, among the individual's most important values, his private life, whilst both international and national legislation being more and more preoccupied with the protection of this fundamental right of human being.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights stipulates under Article 12, that „No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, or to the attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks." Likewise, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides, in Article 17, „1. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, neither to unlawful attacks on his honour and reputation. 2. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks." Article 8 of the European Convention of Human Rights shows that "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence. 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or offence, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others." The American Convention of Human Rights expresses in a similar manner under Article 11, 2-3: "2. No one may be the object of arbitrary or abusive interference with his private life, his family, his home, or his correspondence, or of unlawful attacks on his honor or reputation. 3. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks."

Transposing the international regulations onto national level, Article s 26-28 from the Constitution of Romania establish, as fundamental rights, intimate life, family and private life, home inviolability and the secret of correspondence.

* Ph. D. Candidate, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Faculty of Law, Bucharest (email: raduslavoiu@yahoo.ro).

As none of these terms enjoy a legal definition, it was the duty of doctrine and jurisprudence to establish their meaning and content.

In Western juridical literature, private life was, practically, understood as a secret sphere of the individual's life, where the access of third parties[1] is not allowed. Respect for private life implies the guarantee of a person's physical and moral integrity, the protection of his personal or social identity, of his sexuality, of private places[2], as well as the protection of reputation and the prevention of disclosure of confidential information[3]. A person can consider as being part of his private life any aspect that may be associated with his health, moral, religious or philosophical believes, his sentimental and family life, his friendships[4]. It was also noted that private life includes the individual's right to intimate, personal life, his right to social private life and the right to a healthy environment[5].

Striving to find meanings as precise as possible for the concept of "private life", it was noticed that, Romanian doctrine[6] makes a distinction between the texts of the European Convention and those of the Romanian Constitution, the latter using a concept that the first is avoiding, namely intimate life. It has been noted that intimate life is only a part of private life, which, first of all, contains the right to solitude, that is the individual's right to be with himself, to seclude from the others, to keep the secret of his own thoughts, plans and desires, to be left alone with his ideas and aspirations, but also with his behavior through which he intends to express his personality, unhindered by any outside interference. Secondly, intimate life also implies contacts with other persons "in the presence of whom the subject feels like being only with himself", to whom he can express his deepest thoughts; the contacts with these persons can be oral, when the interlocutors are present, but also through letters, telegrams, telephone conversations when absent.

On its turn, private life is considered to be made of the right to intimate life, with all the above mentioned elements included to which we also add a sphere of the subject's business and professional contacts are also added. Thus, we consider that private life represents a particular area of personal thoughts and acts, of communications and conversations that are not suppressed, a personal inviolable space where the individual can express his inner personality; but it also includes intimate or professional contacts with the others.

When approaching the issue of the protection of private life from its values' point of view, another author[7] notices that the risks associated to this fundamental right regard the violation of the person's solitude, interference into his personal matters, disclosure of personal information – which entails a harm on the individual's image in society – using the name or image of a person for the benefit of the one who uses them, creating IT systems of personal data.

The jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights has proven to be an essential source in establishing the constituent elements of private life, although, several times[8], the European

---

[1] See J. Carbonnier, Droit civil, tome I, Les personnes. Personnalité, incapacités, personnes morales, Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 2000, pg.156.

[2] See R. Clayton, H. Tomlinson, The Law of Human Rights, Oxford University Press, 2001, par.12.85-12.94.

[3] See P. van Dijk, F. van Hoof, A. van Rijn, L. Zwack, Theory and practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 4th edition, Intersentia, Antwerpen-Oxford, 2006, pg.665.

[4] See G. Cohen-Jonathan, Respect for private and family life, in R.St.J. Macdonald, F. Matscher, H. Petzold, The European System for the Protection of Human Rights, Dordrecht: Nijhoff, 1993, pg.405 and the followings.

[5] See Fr. Sudre, Dreptul european şi internaţional al drepturilor omului, Polirom PH, 2006, pg.315; C. Bîrsan, *Convenţia europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articol*e, vol. I, Drepturi şi libertăţi, All Beck PH, Bucureşti, 2005, pg. 600.

[6] See E. Tanislav, Ocrotirea penală a dreptului la intimitate, Revista de Drept penal nr.3/1998, pg.42-53.

[7] See V. Stati, Ocrotirea penală a dreptului la viaţă privată în Republica Moldova, Revista de Drept penal nr.3/2006, pg.146-157.

[8] See: ECHR, judgement of 6 February 2001 case of Bensaid versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 29 April 2002 case of Pretty versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 20 March 2007, case of Tysiac versus Poland.

court considered that it is not possible and neither necessary to give an exhaustive definition to the concept, because its content changes according to various factors (for instance: the period of time it refers to, the society in which the individual spends his life). The Court considers that private life can not be limited only to the inner circle where a person lives his life the way he wants and from which he excludes the exterior world, but, to a certain extent, it also includes the individual's right to build relations with his fellow men, thus there is no major reason for eliminating professional or business activities. In other words, there are areas of interaction between a person and the others, even in a public environment, which can be included in the concept of private life[9]; similarly, data of public nature referring to an individual can also be considered as part of private life, in case they are collected and systematically stored in the records of public authorities[10]. Likewise, the right to respect for private life also comprises the right to its confidentiality[11], the right to the individual's physical and moral integrity[12], including sexual life, the right to information regarding his own or his parents' identity[13], the right to rest in his own house[14], the right to one's own image[15], the right to act in a certain manner[16].

There is an interrelation between private life and the inviolability of correspondence, meaning the right of one person to communicate his thoughts using any means[17] – verbal, letters, telegrams, fax, telex, pager, phone, e-mail, SMS, and MMS – without being known by third parties or censored. CEDH jurisprudence presents a wide range of cases on this matter[18]. The protection of the individual's correspondence is so strong that the Court considered a breach of Article 8 of the Convention when the authorities taped the telephone conversations in which the subject allegedly instigated to murder[19] or the case when the subject admitted he was dealing in drugs[20].

---

[9] See: ECHR, judgement of 25 June 1997 case of Halford versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 25 October 2007 case of van Vondel versus Olandei.

[10] See: ECHR, judgement of 27 October 2009 case of Haralambie versus Romania.

[11] See: ECHR, judgement of 29 March 2000 case of Rotaru versus Romania; ECHR, judgement of 6 June 2006 case of Segersted-Wiberg and others versus Suediei.

[12] See: ECHR, judgement of 16 June 2005 case of Storck versus Germany.

[13] See: ECHR, judgement of 13 February 2003 case of Odièvre versus France.

[14] See: ECHR, judgement of 7 August 2003 case of Hatton versus The United Kingdom.

[15] See: ECHR, judgement of 28 January 2003 case of Peck versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 17 July 2003 case of Perry versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 24 June 2004 case of von Hannover versus Germany; ECHR, judgement of 11 January 2005 case of Sciacca versus Italy; ECHR, judgement of 24 February 2009 case of Toma versus Romania.

[16] See: ECHR, judgement of 18 January 2001, case of Chapman versus The United Kingdom.

[17] See: ECHR, judgement of 22 October 2002 case of Taylor-Sabori versus The United Kingdom.

[18] See: ECHR, judgement of 21 February 1975 case of Golder versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 25 March 1983 case of Silver and others versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 24 April 1990 case of Huvig versus France; ECHR, judgement of 24 April 1990 case of Kruslin versus France; ECHR, judgement of 30 August 1990 case of Fox, Campbell and Hartley versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 25 March 1992 case of Campbell versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 25 March 1998 case of Kopp versus Switzerland; ECHR, judgement of 20 June 1998 case of Schönenberger and Durmaz versus Switzerland; ECHR, judgement of 23 September 1998 case of Petra versus Romania; ECHR, judgement of 4 June 2002 case of William Faulkner versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 24 October 2002 case of Messina versus Italy; ECHR, judgement of 5 November 2002 case of Allan versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 19 December 2002 case of Salapa versus Poland; ECHR, judgement of 29 April 2003 case of Poltoratskiy versus Ukraine; ECHR, judgement of 3 June 2003 case of Cotleț versus Romania; ECHR, judgement of 11 January 2005 case of Musumeci versus Italy; ECHR, judgement of 20 December 2005 case of Wisse versus France; ECHR, judgement of 30 January 2007 case of Ekinci and Akalin versus Turciei; ECHR, judgement of 26 April 2007 case of Dumitru Popescu versus Romania; ECHR, judgement of 4 October 2007 case of Năstase-Silivestru versus Romania; ECHR, judgement of 1 July 2008 case of Calmanovici versus Romania; ECHR, judgement of 21 April 2009 case of Răducu versus Romania.

[19] See: ECHR, judgement of 23 November 1993 case of A. versus France.

[20] See: ECHR, judgement of 12 May 2000 case of Khan versus The United Kingdom.

Both private life and the right to privacy of correspondence are strongly connected to a person's home[21]. According to the case-law of the European Commission, home is an autonomous concept, which is not limited to the meaning given by the civil law; in order to consider a certain area as home we have to take into consideration the real circumstances of each cause, and considering a sufficient and continuous connection with a certain place[22]. „Home" is usually the defined physical area where a person can live his private or family life, including secondary residences, vacation houses[23], a parcel of land in a nomad destined area[24], but, through extension, it is also the place where a person's professional activity is conducted. The headquarters and bureaus of a company[25] can also be regarded, within certain limits[26], as home.

II. Penal protection of private life in Romania. The New Criminal Code of Romania (NCC)[27], passed by Law No 286/2009, brings a significant improvement to the area of means of protection of the individual's private life, both by introducing new incriminations (violation of private life, violation of professional office, harassment), as well as by rephrasing some of the already existing incriminations (violation of home, disclosure of professional secrecy, violation of the secret of correspondence, illegal access to IT system, illegal intercepting of a IT transmission of data, unauthorized transfer of IT data). In respect to the formal systematization, yet, we note that, although these actions harm in a certain way a person's intimacy, they are not totally stipulated under the chapter "offences against the inviolability of home and private life" (chapter IX, Title I, Special Book). Thus, we find again "harassment" under the chapter destined to "offences regarding the obligation of helping those endangered", violation of the secret of correspondence is part of the category "offences relating to working", while other offences are grouped under Chapter VI ("violation of the security and integrity of IT systems or data"). We consider that such systematization was chosen because of the complex specialized judicial object of these offences, the social values and relations protected by the law being, at the same time, part of a lot of fields that the legislator had in mind.

We shall make a short presentation of the novelties brought by the NCC on this matter, generally, approaching a systematization in respect to that part of private life, which is mainly protected by the criminal rule, as follows: the protection of intimacy, the protection of correspondence, the protection of home.

II. 1. The protection of intimacy. We have grouped here the aspects regarding the offences against privacy, the disclosure of professional secrecy and harassment and illegal access to IT system.

---

[21] See: ECHR, judgement of 6 September 1978 case of Klass versus Germany.

[22] See: ECHR, judgement of 25 September 1996 case of Buckley versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 24 November 1986 case of Gillow versus The United Kingdom; ECHR, judgement of 18 November 2004 case of Prokopovich versus Rusiei.

[23] See: ECHR, judgement of 31 July 2003 case of Demades versus Turciei.

[24] See: ECHR, judgement of 27 May 2004 case of Connors versus The United Kingdom.

[25] See: ECHR, judgement of 16 December 1992 case of Niemietz versus Germany; ECHR, judgement of 25 March 1998 case of Kopp versus Switzerland; ECHR, judgement of 16 April 2002 case of Société Colas Est and others versus France; ECHR, judgement of 13 November 2003 case of Elci and others versus Turkey; ECHR, judgement of 28 April 2005 case of Buck versus Germany; ECHR, judgement of 27 September 2005 case of Petri Sallinen and others versus Finland; ECHR, judgement of 16 October 2007 case of Wieser and Bicos Beteiligungen Gmbh versus Austria; ECHR, judgement of 7 October 2008 case of Mancevschi versus The Republic of Moldova. Following this case-study, the Western doctrine (See J.F. Renucci, Traité de Droit Européen des droits de l'homme, Librairie Générale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, Paris, 2007, pg.264) noted there is a consecration of "commercial private life".

[26] See: ECHR, judgement of 6 September 2005 case of Leveau and Fillon versus France. The European court decided that exploitation specialized in pigs breeding, sheltering several hundreds of animals, is not part of – even by extention – the concept of home.

[27] Hereinafter refered to as NCC.

Violation of privacy (Article 226 NCC). This incrimination can not be found in the Criminal Code of 1968. The source of inspiration for the Romanian legislator was the legislations of Western states[28].

The NCC regulates the offence relating to the violation of privacy in a standard, aggravating and absorbed form.

In a standard form, the offence consists in unlawfully harming one person's privacy, by taking, catching or recording the picture of a person, by wiretapping or recording a person who is on a private place, room or one of its auxiliary building or a person's private conversation.

Speaking about the external element (actus reus), the material element for this offence is the act of harming a person's private life, namely to injure, hurt, and prejudice one's own intimacy. From a ruling prospective, the material element can be accomplished by the following means:

a) taking, catching or recording pictures of a person.

Taking pictures refers to the operation through which, using a certain device designed for this purpose or that has a technical function for this purpose (for example, a mobile phone), based on certain procedures specific to optic laws, an image is put on a paper, photographic board, photosensitive tablet or on a photographic film.

To catch pictures means to intercept visual representations, using certain technical means.

Recording pictures means to impress, through electromagnetic methods, visual representations on certain data storage devices (magnetic tape, photosensitive film, etc.). The operation of recording not only implies catching but also saving, storing the pictures. Therefore, recording pictures always implies their catching, but the reciprocal is not valid; we can have an operation of catching a visual representation, but without having it recorded (for example, the subject, unlawfully, acquires and visualizes, with the help of such technical means, pictures of the victim staying in his own home, but he does not saves them by recording).

The three ruling means of the material element are alternative, thus committing any of them constitutes an offence. If the subject commits the act resorting to two or three means, there shall be one single offence.

The doctrine[29] has, reasonably, noticed that the act of tacking a picture or filming a home or a private room is not an offence, but it is required that the act aims at a person being in one of these spaces. Yet, we ask ourselves if the reason and spirit of this regulation – the protection of the individual's intimacy – should not have needed a wider incrimination, which could cover other [28] For example, according to Article 201 of the German Criminal Code, constitutes a crime against a person's confidentiality the act of the offender who unlawfully: (1) records on tape the conversation of another person on a private place; (2) uses or gives to another person such a recording; (3) wiretappings with the help of a device to intercept the discussion of another person on a private place; (4) turns to the public, in order to jeoperdize another's person interests, the text or the content of other people's conversation, that he recorded as above. Article 226-1 of the French criminal code, punishes the person who, willfully, by any mean, harms another the intimacy of a person's private life: (1) by intercepting, recording or transmitting words uttered in confidential or private circumstances, without the consent of their speaker; (2) taking, recording or transmitting the picture of a person who is within a private place, without the consent of the person concerned. Article 226-2, same Code incriminates the act of keeping, bringing or causing to be brought to the knowledge of the public or of a third party, or the use in whatever manner, of any recording or document obtained through any of the actions set outunder Article 226-1. Article 226-8 also sanctions to the publication by any means of any montage made that uses the words or the image of a person without the latter's consent. On its turn, the Spanish criminal Code (Article 197-1) incriminates the act of a person who, in order to find out the secrets or to violate the intimacy of another person, without his consent, intercepts his communications or uses the means of wiretapping, recording or reproducing of sounds or images or any other signal of communication. Also the Italian Criminal Code sanctions, under Article 615 bis. (1) the person who, using the instruments for video or audio recording, illegally procures information and images that harm a person's private life who is on private places or one of its auxiliary buildinges. The law also punishes the person who brings to the knowledge of the public or broadcasts, regardless of the means, the information or images obtained by those means.

[29] See V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, Drept penal. Partea specială. Teorie şi practică judiciară, Universul Juridic PH, Bucureşti, 2011, pg.176.

hypothesis too, when the right to privacy is violated. For example, we consider that a significant harm to intimacy is also made by the act of recording pictures from inside the victim's house, when he is not present, by filming certain personal use staff, indicating a certain sexual orientation (homosexual relations). Such an offence does not fulfil the constituting elements of the offence in question, although it obviously harms the individual's private life. Or, ubi ratio este, idem est jus. One could argue that the perpetrator will be hold responsible for home violation, but we find this argument not functional in all the cases. For example, when, with a telephonic approval of the victim, who is outside the city, a neighbor breaks his door in order to turn off the water, which out of negligence, had been left running and there was a risk of flooding; if the neighbor, out of curiosity, exceeds the approval given by the homeowner and films his bedroom, the offence does not constitute a violation of home and neither of privacy.

Thus, we assess that a form of incrimination that answers adequately to the necessities to protect the individual's intimacy, was postulated under Act No 301/2004, which has not been enforced[30] yet. Thus, Article 209 from this law punishes "the violation of a person's right to private life by using any means of remote interception of data, information, images or sounds from inside the places noted by Article 208 point 1 (namely a dwelling, room or one of its auxiliary buildings – author's note, R.S.), without the consent of the person that uses them or the law authorization". We consider, lege ferenda, that the text of Article 226 NCC should be rethought to cover also the hypothesis of unlawful recording of images from a dwelling, room or one of its auxiliary buildings, even when the person is not at home, if this act harms his private life.

The doctrine[31] also considered that, although the law does not stipulate, the protection is also extended to the enclosed area surrounding the victim's residence and which is enclosed. We are reluctant to this point of view, as – according to our opinion – such a hypothesis is stipulated by the incrimination rule. If the law had intended to mention the enclosed area too, it would have done it explicitly, just as in the case of violation of home. Yet, it is undoubtedly that the legislator's choice is questionable, as, for example, a person's intimacy is harmed in the same way as when he is unlawfully filmed in his courtyard, not only when he is inside the house. An individual's private space does not end at his home door. On the other hand, we do not see the reason for which the act of unlawfully entering an enclosed area of a person's residence, even when he is not at home, constitutes an offence, (the violation of home), and the act of filming[32] a person in his own courtyard does not constitutes an offence. We need to mention that if the acts of taking pictures or filming a person who is on enclosed area representing an auxiliary building do not constitute the of offence of violation of private life, it can still constitute the offence of harassment (they can represent actual means through which the action of observing a person occurs, under the provisions of Article 208 NCC), under the condition that this action is repeated and causes the victim to fear.

b) wiretapping or audio recording

Wiretapping means to seize or overhear sounds, and to record means to fix, impress on a data storage devices sound representations.

These acts regard either simple sounds, or private conversations. Yet, the provisions under Article 226 NCC do not protect all types of private communications, but only direct, verbal ones shared by two or more persons (the so-called indoor conversation). Although private, the communications through technical means (for example, using a telephone) enjoy the protection established by the incrimination of violation of the secret of correspondence, and specifically stipulated under the provisions of Article 302 point 2 NCC. Our conclusion is also confirmed by the verb used by the legislator to designate the material element of the external element; Article 226 point 1 NCC refers to "wiretapping", and not "intercepting" (as it is the case of the violation of the secret of correspondence)[33], the latter being specific to technical means of remote communication.

[30] Law No 301/2004 – The Criminal Code was revoked (before its entrence into force) by Article 446 point 2 NCP. For details, See G. Antoniu, Noul Cod penal. Codul penal anterior. Studiu comparativ, All Beck PH, Bucureşti, 2004, pg.77.

[31] See V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., pg.176.

[32] The issue is related to the acts of taking, catching or recording images, and not to the acts of audio recording of a private conversation that – as we shall present below – is incrimnated regardless of where it is held.

There are several substantial requirements associated to these means of the material element. Firstly, overhearing sounds or conversations is an offence only when is committed through technical means (tape recorder, recorder, etc.). Merely listening to a conversation held inside a dwelling (for example, by keeping the ear close to the separating wall) does not constitute an offence.

Secondly, the act can be associated to either the sounds uttered by the victim or, depending on the situation, the conversations he has inside a dwelling, room or one of its auxiliary building, or private conversations. There are certain differences between the two hypotheses.

Thus, on the one hand, the law protects against the unauthorized interferences all the sounds and conversations that a persons makes within his private space. Taking into consideration the indissoluble connection between a person's private life and home, we can state that the legislator, implicitly, admits a presumption of confidentiality over all that happens inside the individual's private space, a presumption equally originating both in the special nature of this place and in the fundamental principle of the inviolability of home (Article 8 of ECHR and Article 27 of the Constitution). In terms of private space, in the case of the offence relating to the violation of private life, the law has in view the dwelling, room and its auxiliary building, except for the enclosed area around it.

On the other hand, all the other conversations that the individual has outside his home or his room or outside their auxiliary buildings are protected, under the condition of having a private nature. By the following phrasing, in a rather redundant manner, „ wiretapping […] or audio recording of a person who is in a dwelling or room or one of its auxiliary building or of a private conversation (our note – R.S.)"; the legislator intended only to emphasize that the concept of private conversation is a wider category compared to the conversation held in a private space. It is a part to whole type of relations. Practically, the protection of the criminal rule extends not only to the conversations inside one's own home, room or auxiliary building, but also to the private conversations that the individual has outside these places, regardless of the place, whether in another person's private place, or just in a public place. For example, it shall constitute an offence the act of, unlawfully, audio-recording a private conversation held in the courtyard of the residence (an area, which, under the strict meaning of Article 226 point 1 NCC, is not a private space).

The Romanian legislator thought it necessary to resort to this type of phrase construction of text considering that, in absence of a legal definition of the private conversation, doctrine has outlined two theories (criteria) to distinguish the concept[34]. Thus:

- the theory of the privileged place, specific to the British law. According to this theory, the nature of a conversation exclusively depends on the place where it is held. Consequently, we shall have a private conversation only if it is held in a private space;

- the theory relating to the nature of communication, specific to the American and French legislation. According to this theory, in order to classify a conversation as private, the stress does not fall on the place where it is held, but on the corroboration of two elements – the mental element (mens rea) and the external element. The mental element is represented by the subject's expectation that the conversation is known only by his partner, and the external factor consists in the reasonable nature that this expectation must have considering the dominant rules of society.

---

[33] We are reluctant to the author's opinion (Al. Boroi, Drept penal. Partea specială, C.H. Beck PH, Bucureşti, 2011, pg.145) who considers that the material element of this crime is rendered by "the use of means of interception", defined as means by which one can "catch and control a telephonic conversation, a correspondence" (author's note – R.S.) between two persons […] that can be secretly palced in the room where the conversations are to be wiretapped, either insdide the telephone, or on a telephonic line (author's note – R.S.)".

[34] See, for details, E. Tanislav, Protecţia penală a dreptului la intimitate în perspectiva noului Cod penal, pg.123-125; Al. Boroi, M. Popescu, Dreptul la intimitate şi la viaţă privată. Elemente de drept comparat, Dreptul nr.5/2003, pg.163-165.

The Romanian legislator has provided efficiency to both criteria. The theory of the privileged space received an answer through the incrimination of the act of wiretapping and of audio-recording a person being inside a dwelling, room, or one of its auxiliary buildings. Nonetheless, the theory of the nature of communication was enforced by incriminating wiretapping or audio-recording of any other private conversations than those held in one's own private space. For example, the act of someone who, unlawfully, records a private conversation of the victim with a third party in a theatre loge, in a restaurant booth, on a bench in the park, on the street, in a vehicle shall be punished; thus we notice that public places are also taken into consideration, but the accent falls under the confidentiality of the conversation.

The difficulty emerges when trying to establish how the defendant, in a concrete situation, identifies whether a conversation is or is not private. This, because the law has to be predictable so that the subjects to whom it refers can adapt their behavior to the rule stipulated by the incriminating rule. In public places, people behave differently: some whisper, others speak loudly, some hide, others would try to impress even by speech. For example: two young lovers fight, loudly, on a bench in the park; at a family reunion, at a table in the courtyard, some persons talk fiercely about certain events from the lives of the participants. Are the passers-by authorized to record these talks? Or, is the producer of a TV show authorized to record the talks between a cheated wife, the adulterine husband and his mistress, who are observed in public, if only the wife (who had phoned the so-called detective) had consented to that?

The answer to this problem derives from the provisions of Article 226 point 4 letter b) NCC, according to which there is no offence if the victim explicitly acted with the intent to be seen and heard by the offender. The text reveals, per a contrario, that an unlawful recording of a private conversation constitutes an offence in all situations when the victim was apart from any intention to be heard by others or, if such an intention existed, but it was not clearly expressed. Analyzing the entire construction of the Article 226 NCC, we assess that the provisions stipulated under point 4 (including those under letter b) have the status of exceptions from the general rule, namely the private nature of any conversation. Consequently, we believe that the legislator implicitly uses a relative presumption of confidentiality of any communication between two or more persons.

Thus, as we mentioned above, Article 226 NCC protects all the conversations of an individual in his private space, namely his home, room or one of its auxiliary buildings, as well as all the confidential conversations made outside this space. We note that the obligation imposed by the criminal law – not to wiretap or record private conversations on tape – has erga omnes effects, thus applying not only to third parties, but also to the participants in the conversation. Moreover, the act of the subject who unlawfully records a conversation, to which he is part of, shall constitute an offence. This conclusion is deduced by interpreting the provisions of Article 226 point 4 letter a) NCC, according to which the act of a person who attended a meeting together with the victim when sounds, talks or images, were registered, it shall not be a offence, but not under any circumstances, except the case when the subject justifies a legitimate interest. At first glance, such an area of incrimination is superfluous, because a recording is nothing but an exact fixing of an audio representation on a special device. Whether it is obvious that the recording made by a third party, who was not accepted to take part in the conversation between other two persons, is consider to be a violation of the privacy of those two, it seems more difficult to identify the reason for which the recording made by one of the participants in a conversation, even without the consent of the other, was categorized as an offence, and when the collected information is not further disclosed, disseminated, reported or transmitted to others (the problem, under these circumstances, also refers to taking, catching or recording images). The conversation itself, being a private one, involves sharing certain elements of intimacy that the allegedly victim is willingly and consciously revealing to the allegedly offender. One could claim that recording such a conversation does not harm intimacy anymore than the victim himself through his confessions. However, we believe that the criminal rule is welcomed, the legislator's object being, probably, to provide the individual with a strong form of protection against those who, under a pretense friendship and by taking advantage of what the victims is telling, sometimes in cases of emotional vulnerability, turn the life of the victim into a subject of public controversy, deepening his suffering. For such a "friend", recording the confessions of the victim constitutes "the supreme evidence", an "excitement", it represents the proof that the subject is real; further more, it protects him from the scepticism of the public (what else than the voice of the victim could be more convincing?)

Postulating that this was also the legislator's reasoning, we consider that further on the discussion must concentrate on the fairness of some authors' opinion who state that "if the images are recorded, the taken pictures or the audio or visual recordings are kept only for personal purpose, without being disclosed to somebody else or to the public, the constituent elements of this offence are not accomplished[35]". The law makes a distinction not in respect to the destination of the images, pictures or recordings, but to whether the offender (who took part in the meeting with the victim) justifies or not a legitimate interest. We would rather assess that, if the circumstances of the case do not reveal that the recordings, pictures or images had been destined to disclosure, dissemination, reporting or transmission to others or to the public, it is unlikely to prove whether there was an intention to harm the victim's private life, thus the act shall not be an offence due to the failure of accomplishing the conditions of the mental element.

In respect to the problem of unlawful wiretapping or recording conversations, we note that – according to our opinion – there shall be as many offences as participants in a conversation, even if the action of the offender is single. Thus, if the agent recorded a private conversation in which three persons participated, there are three distinct offences, which constitute an ideal concurrence. This is due to the fact that, on one hand, private life, as a social value, has an absolutely personal nature, even when intimate issues are shared to others, and on the other hand, criminal law protects each person's private life, and not the private life. However, we must notice that these offences can be committed in different ruling means. Thus, if somebody unlawfully records a conversation held by a person with his guest inside his home, the offence is represented by the act of recording a person in his home for the homeowner, and the offence of recording of a private conversation for the partner.

The aggravating form of the offence of violation of private life refers to unlawful disclosure, dissemination, reporting or transmission of sounds, conversations or images to another person or to the public, according to the provisions of point 1.

To disclose means to publicize, to reveal; disseminating signifies the spreading, propagation of sounds, conversations or images; to report means to present, show, expose them; and to transmit signifies to communicate, to let the others know about those sounds, conversations and images. All these acts represent the activity of the subject who divulges issues concerning a person's intimacy to unauthorized persons.

The object of these acts is represented by illegally obtained images, sounds or private conversations. The text of Article 226 point 2 NCC explicitly postulates: unlawful disclosure, dissemination, reporting or transmission must refer to sounds, conversations or images "provisioned under point 1 (author's note – R.S.)", those that were unlawfully taken, caught, wiretapped or recorded. If the images and conversations that were recorded are unlawfully divulged, certain particularities are encountered. Thus:

- if the active subject holds a certain profession or position that allows him to know personal secrets, he has, at the same time, the obligation to preserve the confidentiality of these data, the act constituting disclosure of professional secret. (Article 227 NCC). For example[36], if a private conversation was recorded by the law enforcement agency on the bases of a judicial authorization[37]. We consider such a solution to be correct also considering the modification of the legal content of the offence relating to the disclosure of the professional secret, since the legislator has abandoned the condition according to which the information had to be "entrusted" to the offender;

[35] See P. Dungan, T. Medeanu, V. Pașca, Manual de drept penal. Partea specială, Universul Juridic PH, București, 2010, vol. I, pg.253.

- if the offender is any other person, who illicitly intercepted or recorded sounds, conversation or images, the act does not constitute an offence, as it is not stipulated under the criminal law. We regret such oblivion of the legislator. We do not consider the arguments to be pertinent when stating that an unlawful recording of indoor images or private conversations harms intimacy, whilst the unlawful disclosure to the public of some illegally obtained images could not render the same effect. What is the difference, for example, between the situation in which a private event (for instance an onomastic celebration) is unlawfully filmed by an intruder, through the window and then disseminated to the public, and the situation in which one of the attendees films the event with his mobile phone, having the others' consent, and then publishes the film on the Internet, although lacking the others' consent? The same problem also rises in the case of unlawful disclosure of indoor conversations legally recorded. We shall demonstrate, when analyzing the offence relating to the violation of the secret of correspondence that the aggravating form of this act (Article 302 point 4) does not refer to this type of conversations. We consider that not incriminating these acts is a significant loophole for the system of protection of the individual's private life, as it is obvious that they can seriously harm private life. Otherwise, we believe that it is hard to explain the reason for which the NCC incriminates the act of audio-recording of a conversation by one of the participants, without the consent of the other and without a legitimate interest, but it does not incriminate the unlawful disclosure of the content of such a conversation, if it was legally recorded.

For these arguments, to which we add those to be discussed under the section of offence relating to the violation of the secret of correspondence, we propose that the rule provided by Article 226 point 2 NCC is completed, as follows: "unlawful disclosure, dissemination, reporting or transmission to another person or to the public, of sounds, conversations or images stipulated under point 1, legally or illegally collected, is punished […]".

According to the law, the disclosure, dissemination, reporting or transmission must be communicated either to the public, or to "another person", namely to a third party. If the perpetrator reports the recording exactly to the persons that had the conversation, the act does not constitute the content of the aggravating form, and there shall be a concurrence of the offence regarding the violation of private life in its standard form and another offence (for example, assault – Article 206 NCC; extortion – Article 207 NCC).

The actions of taking, catching or recording images, wiretapping, audio-recording, and also the actions of disclosing, disseminating, reporting or transmitting sounds, conversations or images have to be made unlawfully, in other words illegally. Therefore, the actions of video, audio or [36] Another example can be identified in a non-penal law containing criminal provisions. Thus, according to Article 21 Law No 51/1991 regarding Romania national security, the information related to the private life, honor or reputation of the persons incidentally met during the course of collection of data for national security, can not be brought to the knowledge of the public, and the, illegal disclosure or use of this information by the employees of secret services is a crime and is punished by imprisonment from 2 to 7 years (the text is written as it was put forward for change by the project of the Law for the enforcement of the Criminal Code, as it can be found on the site: www.just.ro, 29.01.2012). As it is the case of data obtained during the process of collection of information necessary for national security (therefore, including audio recording operations of indoor private conversations), therefore a licit process, it means that the unlawful disclosure of legally collected information related to private life by the employees of the secret services, constitutes a crime.

[37] For this case, the disclosure of the professional secret could form an ideal concurrence with the disclosure of confidential or non-public information (Article 304 point 1 NCC) or compromising justice interests (Article 277 point 2 NCC).

photographic surveillance do not constitute an offence if made by the law enforcement agencies, as a special technique of surveillance or investigation authorized by the judge for rights and freedoms (Articles 138-139 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure) or in case of a house search (Article 159 point 12 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure).

The absorbed form of the offence regarding the violation of private life is represented by the act of unlawfully placing technical devices of audio or visual surveillance in order to commit the acts pursuant to point 1 and point 2. Placing technical devices for audio or visual recording represents the action of laying, putting, fixing, and installing together with its result. We consider that this equipment must be functional, able to capture sounds or images, regardless of the fact it actually functions or not.

In this case, there are certain preparatory acts necessary to commit the offences pursuant to the standard or aggravating form of the offence, which however, according to the legislator's will, were incriminated as independent and were more seriously punished than the scope-acts themselves. The problem rising is whether there is only one offence or one concurrence, in case a scope-offence was committed. The doctrine[38] stated that only the absorbed form of the offence is to be considered. One can argue this by postulating that if the legislator had intended that the acts constituted a concurrence, he would have explicitly mentioned it, as he had done it in other cases[39].

We consider that one can postulate a separate opinion. We find the uncommon punishing regime for the preparatory acts (even more sever than the one stipulated for the scope-act) reveals the legislator's will that, when the scope-act are committed, the acts shall constitute a concurrence of the offence stipulated by Article 226 point 1 or, depending on the situation, point 2, and the offence under Article 226 point 5 NCC. If only the absorbed form stipulated by Article 226 point 5 is reckoned, the result would be that the preparatory acts absorb the full offence. If the doctrine generally adopts the idea that the full offence naturally absorbs the intended offence and the preparatory acts (the so-called natural complexity[40]), in fact the validity of the mutual thesis has never been reckoned. However, it is hard to admit that the offence, which from an objective point of view is less harmful for the society and individual, could comprise the most severe one.

Admitting this opinion could also raise some inequities; for example, the person who placed technical means of audio-recording of a private conversation, but he failed to commit the actual recording, he would be subjected to a sanction that has the same limits as for the person who succeeded to wiretap the conversation. However, an actual harming of the victim's private life, namely what the criminal law intends to prevent, was done in the second case, and not in the first.

Likewise, if we admit this point of view, it would mean that we encourage the person to use the technical devices for audio-recording he had placed, as he is aware that his situation can no longer be aggravated. Or, the distinct incrimination of these preparatory acts has the nature of an obstacle-offence, meaning an act that – as it renders a social peril by the fact that its own commission allows the commission of another, which is more serious – is specifically incriminated to prevent the commission of the latter.

---

[38] See V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., pg.178.

[39] For example, for the crime of establishing an organized criminal group (Article 367 point 3 NCC).

[40] Specifically see V. Dongoroz, Curs de drept penal, Cursuri Litografiate PH, Bucureşti, 1942, pg.307; I. Fodor în V. Dongoroz, S. Kahane, I. Oancea, I. Fodor, N. Iliescu, C. Bulai, R. Stănoiu, Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului penal român (citat în continuare Explicaţii), Romanian Academy PH şi All Beck PH, Bucureşti, 2003, ediţia a II-a, vol. I, pag.262; C. Mitrache, Cr. Mitrache, Drept penal român. Partea generală, Universul juridic PH, Bucureşti, 2006, ediţia a V-a, pg.265-266; C. Duvac în G. Antoniu, C. Bulai, C. Duvac, I. Griga, Gh. Ivan, C. Mitrache, I. Molnar, I. Pascu, V. Paşca, O. Predescu, Explicaţii preliminare ale noului Cod penal, Universul juridic PH, Bucureşti, 2010, vol. I, pg.361-362. To the contrary, see N.T. Buzea, Principii de drept penal. Infracţiunea penală, vol. I, Iaşi, 1937, pg.138; M. Basarab, Drept penal. Partea generală, Fundaţia Chemarea PH, Iaşi, 1992, vol. II, pag.348; C. Butiuc, Infracţiunea complexă, All Beck PH, Bucuresti, 1999, pg.21.

We believe, on the basis of these arguments, that the act of unlawful placing of technical devices to audio or video record, with the scope of violating private life, has the nature of an autonomous offence in relation to the scope-offence. It would have definitely been desirable that, from the point of view of the legislative technique, this offence had a distinct article, and not a point of the Article 226 NCC, but we consider that this legislator's "negligence" does not impede us to consider a concurrence including the instrument-offence and the scope-offence. It is in fact the solution admitted in the case of other similar situations[41].

Regardless we refer to the standard, aggravating or absorbed form of the offence, the resulting effect is a harm of the person's private life.

In respect to the mental element, the act is committed with intention, most of the time direct intention, and the oblique one can also be encountered. In the absorbed form, the culpability is only direct intention based on its scope.

The active subject of this offence can be any person who fulfils the conditions for the mental element, and penal concurrence is possible in all its three forms.

Article 226 point 4 stipulates four justifiable special causes. Thus, the act constitutes an offence under the following circumstances:

a) when the offence was committed by the one who participated in the meeting with the victim, whereat sounds, conversations and images were wiretapped, under the condition to justify a legitimate interest. The legitimate interest refers to the protection of certain important social values (for example, the offender audio records the conversation with his wife – who is confessing that she is having sexual relations with another man – can be justified by the interest to sustain the reasons for divorce);

b) if the victim explicitly acted with the intention of being seen or heard by the offender. As a premise, this justifiable cause implies that there was no meeting between the victim and the offender, as otherwise it would be confounded with the previous hypothesis. For example, this special justifiable cause can function when several high school students, seeing that on the corridor of their school, a TV coverage is shot, they start talking loudly, due to their specific rebellious behavior, about what they did in a school trip, being aware and with the intent that these conversations are caught and recorded by the technical device used by the reporter; thus they can not complain later about violation of their intimacy.

This situation excludes the offence, on grounds that the victim himself gave up the right to protection of the intimacy, thus one can not ask for more diligence from the third party. The law stipulates that the intention of the victim to be seen or heard is explicit, meaning an obvious, clear and evident behavior. The intention is explicit if any other person in the offender's place had understood the same think from the victim's behavior: that the latter intends to be seen or heard.

Another issue rises, related to this justifiable special cause, whether it functions in the form pursuant to Article 226 point 1 as well as in that under point 2. Still, we find that such a conclusion must be detailed. The content of the text implies that the victim has to behave with the purpose of being seen or heard by the offender, and not by a third party or by the public. If, on the bases of this consent, there is a justification for the act of taking pictures, filming, audio recording, one can not always claim the same in respect to the disclosure, dissemination, reporting or transmission to other persons the information obtain as such. The doctrine[42] presented the example of a woman who widely opened the window and took off her clothes looking in a provocative manner to the offender, who was her neighbor, and it was reasonably demonstrated that taking pictures of that woman was not an offence. We do not consider that the same conclusion can be drawn in regards to the reproduction and display of the picture in the corridor of the condominium where the victim dwells. One can but reluctantly state that, if the victim acted with the intent to be seen by the offender, who is her neighbor, she also acted with the intent to be seen by all the neighbors and that the offender has the right to show the picture he took to the neigbors. Despite this conclusion, the act of disseminating the picture shall remain unpunished (even if the special justifiable cause does not operate) because, as we previously mentioned, the NCC incriminates nothing else but the disclosure, dissemination, reporting or transmission to third parties or to the public, of the indoor images and conversations that were unlawfully recorded; or, for this example, taking pictures is not forbidden by the law, meaning it is licit. It is our opinion that this is another loophole in the protection system of the individual's intimacy stipulated by the NCC;

[41] For example, for the crime relating to the possession of instruments for the purpose of forging of values and the offence relating to forgery of coinage. Specifically see V. Dongoroz în Explicaţii, vol. IV, pag.351 şi pag.356; V. Papadopol în T. Vasiliu. D. Pavel, G. Antoniu, Şt. Daneş, Gh. Dărîngă, D. Lucinescu, V. Papadopol, D.C. Popescu, V. Rămureanu, Codul penal comentat şi adnotat. Partea specială, Ştiinţifică şi Enciclopedică PH, Bucureşti, 1977, vol. II, pg. 230-231.

[42] See V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., pg.179.

c) if the offender observes the commission of an offence or he supports to establish the commission of an offence. This special justifiable cause can be explained by the public interest that the protection of the criminal law over the individual's private life is not debauched into an umbrella for criminality;

d) if the agent notices acts of public interest, which are important for the life of the community and the disclosure of which brings public advantages that are more significant than the prejudice they cause to the victim. The justifiable nature of such circumstances can be explained by the necessity to keep a balance in the interaction between private and public interest, being a specific stipulation of the provisions under Article 26 point 2 from the Constitutional Law, according to which "natural person has the right to decide about himself, if he does not breach […] public order […]".

In the case of the offence relating to violation of private life in its standard and aggravating forms, the prosecution is initiated upon the complaint of the victim. This stipulation does not apply to the absorbed form, which is initiated ex officio.

Disclosure of professional secret (Article 227 NCC). The offence consists of the unlawful disclosure of data or information regarding a person's private life, which can cause harm to a person, by the one who obtained them due to his profession or position and who has the obligation not to disclose these confidential data.

In the Criminal Code of 1968, this offence was incriminated by Article 196. The NCC does not bring significant changes to the legal content of the offence, but it presents certain elements more accurately.

Thus, the generic phrase "the disclosure of certain data", which had an indefinite aspect and thus relatively uncertain, in favor of the one relating to "data or information regarding a person's private life" (for example, those regarding the individual's health, sexual orientation, etc.).

Likewise, the NCC specifies more adequately the active subject, meaning a person who accumulates two conditions: he knows the respective information due to his profession or position and has the obligation not to disclose those confidential data. In the system of the Criminal Code of 1968, the offender could also be a person to whom the information had been entrusted. Article 227 NCC does not maintain this condition, which makes us assess that the offence is committed whatsoever the active subject had known those data with the victim's consent or not[43].

For this offence, the NCC decided for a harsher punishing system than the one under the Criminal Code of 1968.

[43] On the contrary, related to the compulsion that the offenders had known the data with the consent of the victim, SeeV. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., pg.181.

Harassment (Article 208 NCC). This offence is not included in the Criminal Code of 1968. Similar incriminations can be encountered in foreign legislations[44].

Harassment is regulated in a standard and a mitigating form.

The standard form is the act of a person who systematically and unlawfully or without legitimate interest, observes a person or monitors his residence, professional office or other places that the victim usually attends, thus causing him to fear.

The mitigating form is the act of making phone calls or communicating through electronic devices, which due to frequency or content, causes a person to fear.

The standard form, the material element of the offence is, alternatively, represented by the action of observing a person or monitoring his residence, office or other places he usually attends.

To observe a persons – as postulated under Article 208 NCC – means to keep under observation, to lurk, monitor his behavior, programme, and life, such a manner that the victim becomes anxious and worried. We do not believe that verbum regens is limited only to the strict meaning of the verb "to observe", meaning only the action of walking or running after someone; in fact, the incrimination refers to keeping a person under observation, in any way. We base our opinion on the meaning of the term "to harass", meaning not leaving alone, bother, causing all sorts of displeasures.

Consequently, we consider that the material element of the external element is render not only by the offender's action of taking the same road as the victim (although they do not know each other), walking close behind him every morning, despite the fact that the victim – who notices this – changes his schedule or itinerary; or waiting and observing the victim by car, every evening when the latter leaves his working place for home; but also when, for example, the boss repeatedly gives tasks to a subordinate, forcing him to stay over, just in those days when the latter must be, due to family reasons, at a certain hour in a certain place (for example, the school where his child studies), or repeatedly and temporarily hiding objects that are indispensable (for instance, the mouse of the computer) for the victim to urgently write a paper; or ostentatiously displaying food products in the office where a certain person works, each day when the latter, due to religious conviction, fasts (for example, on Fridays), thus being the subject of his colleagues' amusement. For this reason, we consider that, unlike other authors[45], the legislator did not excluded ab initio the teasing gestures of the neighbors from the incrimination sphere of harassment; one must investigate, from case to case, whether such actions are the expression of a control that the offender has over the victim's regular programme. For instance, the fact that every time the victim gets ready to leave home by car, he finds the access area to the parking place blocked by one of his neighbors' car may be considered observation as stipulated under Article 208 NCC.

To monitor a certain place means to lurk, keep under control, under attention. The act of monitoring must refer to the dwelling, working place or other places usually visited by the victim. "Usually visited places" must be understood as those places where the victim regularly goes (for example, a medical office where a pregnant woman systematically goes, the faculty where a student goes almost every day, the bar where the victim meets with his friends every weekend). All theses places mentioned by the legislator – home, working place, usually visited places – define the constancies of a person's behavior, so that their observance indicate the action of keeping under observation the victim's everyday programme. We note that the law does not require that the victim is in those places at the moment when the offender commits the act of observation, this fact being irrelevant.

[44] For example, Article 222-16 of the French Criminal Law sanctions the malicious and repeted telephonic calls or the sounds that troubles the others' rest.

[45] See V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., pg. 105.

Both ruling means express actions through which the offender has a certain control, even temporarily, over the victim's regular life. According to our opinion, this is the substance of the offence of harassment.

Three fundamental conditions are necessary to be fulfilled. First of all, both observing and monitoring must be repeated, which makes harassment a habitual offence. An isolated act of observation or monitoring does not constitute the content of this offence. The law claims for multiple actions (in the case of habitual offences, our judicial practice usually stops at three), made at certain time periods, thus rendering the offender's habit. A thorough investigation of the period of time between actions, but corroboration with the victim's schedule, is extremely significant in the process of establishing whether the offender has or not the victim's schedule under observation. According to our opinion, the key is not the objective period of time between the offender's actions, but whether they are regular in respect to the victim's schedule. For instance, if the victim takes the same route to his working place everyday, the offender's presence on the same route every time, can constitute harassment; likewise, the offender's appearance in front of the victim's house whenever he celebrates his marriage day. For both examples, even if the elapsed time between the material acts is obviously different (a day – a year), there is a correspondence between the offender's and the victim's behavior, thus we can talk about harassment. On the other hand, the sporadic, irregular appearance, endows a rather occasional nature to the offender's action, questioning the existence of the offence.

A second fundamental condition is that the observation or monitoring is unlawful or without a legitimate interest. The act of observing a person's moves and activities, as a special technical of surveillance or investigation used by the law enforcement agencies (Article 138 point 6 New Code of Criminal Procedure), does not constitute the offence of harassment, when it is authorized by the competent judge. Likewise, we assess as legitimate a husband's monitoring of his wife's lover, while the latter is inside, or a journalist's monitoring a dignitary about whom he possesses information of being involved in an illegal activity.

A third fundamental condition is implicit, derived from the resulting effect of the offence, which is the victim's state of fear. The actions of observation or monitoring must be known, observed by the victim[46], even if he does not know who the offender is; otherwise, they could not induce him a state of fear. Such acts do not constitute the offence of harassment, but they can obviously have criminal relevance under different circumstances (for example, repeated covert observation of the victim's everyday schedule can constitute a preparatory act for an offence of theft or robbery).

For the mitigating form, the material element is given by the action of making calls or communications through means of remote communication. The telephone call implies the action that produces a signal, usually an audio one, which indicates the intent of initiating a telephonic connection. To communicate means to reveal, transmit information; in order accomplish the content of this form of harassment, the communication must be made through means of remote communication (telephone, telegraph, mail), and not directly.

The telephonic calls or communications must be made in such a way that, due to frequency, or content, they cause a person to fear.

We agree to the opinion expressed by the doctrine[47] according to which, also in the case of the mitigating form, the offence is still a habitual one, as the law uses the plural (telephonic calls or communications). If there is only one communication that, through its content, causes the person to fear, the action does not constitute harassment, but can constitute an offence of threatening (Article 206 NCC).

We consider it useful, hereby, to stress an essential difference between the offences of harassment and of threatening. The two acts are similar in respect to the resulting effect (state of fear), but are different in respect to the material element of the external element. In the case of threatening, the action is to cause the passive subject a state of fear that harm will be done to him due to an offence or a another damaging act against him or another, whereas in the case of harassment, the state of fear is induced by the circumstances that the victim's life is the object of the offender's observation. In the first situation, the cause of fear is the direct threat coming from the offender; while in the second, there is an indirect cause derived from what might happen if the offender has the control over the victim's regular schedule. In the case of threatening, the peril for the passive subject is known (he is to suffer the offence or the damaging act that he is threatened with), in the case of harassment, the fear comes from an infinite of eventual perils due to the circumstances that the offender has his behavior under control and observation. Hence, we believe that this is also the reason for the subsidiary nature of harassment in respect to the act of threatening, thus, every time, the repeated observation of the victim is doubled by threats of committing offences, and the act shall constitute a continuous offence of threatening and not harassment. For example, when, every evening, on his way from the office back to home, the victim is observed by the offender who threatens to kill him.

[46] See also P. Dungan, T. Medeanu, V. Pașca, op. cit., pg.158.
[47] See Al. Boroi, op. cit., pg.108.

The criminal punishment for the offence of harassment is different in regards to the forms postulated under Article 208 NCC. Thus, for the standard form, the penalty is 3 to 6 months imprisonment or a fine. In the case of mitigating form, the offender is liable to imprisonment from one to 3 months or a fine, if the act does not constitute a more serious offence. Such a case could be encountered when, due to the offender's repeated telephonic calls, the victim panics and thereafter commits suicide; if the offender had a clear foresight and accepts the attendant consequence, the offence is of determining or facilitating suicide (Article 191 NCC), and the law stipulates a harsher punishment.

The prosecution for the offence of harassment is initiated upon the complaint of the victim.

II.2. The protection of home. We shall refer, for this matter, to the offences relating to the violation of home and the violation of professional office.

The violation of home (Article 224 NCC). The standard form of this offence is identical to the one in the Criminal code of 1968.

The NCC has introduced a modification in respect to the aggravating form, abandoning the hypothesis in which violation of home is committed by two or more persons together. When the offence is committed by three or more persons together, this shall determine the legal aggravating circumstances under Article 77 letter a) NCC to be considered.

Another modification was also made in respect to procedural issues, thus the prosecution is initiated upon the complaint of the victim for both the forms of the offence relating to the violation of home.

Likewise, the legislator opted for a milder punishing regime, in respect to the Criminal Code of 1968, in the case of this offence.

The violation of professional office (Article 225 NCC). This offence was not incriminated by the Criminal Code of 1968; but it was stipulated under the Law No 301/2004, which did not come into force, under a similar regulation as the offence of violation of home[48].

This new incrimination is intended to protect intimacy in a working place, the commercial private life, closely tied to the professional premises – the Romanian legislator's source of inspiration being ECHR jurisprudence.

The act is incriminated in a standard and an aggravating form. The standard one constitutes of unlawful entering, by any means, in any of the offices where a legal or natural person conducts its professional activity or the denial to leave it when the entitled persons asks so. The aggravating form can be encountered when the act is committed by an armed person, during the night or by fraudulent capacities.

[48] For details, see G. Antoniu, op. cit., pg.73-77.

As to the legal content, the violation of professional office is significantly similar to the violation of home. For example, the material element is represented by the same actions (the act of entering a certain place or the denial to leave it), there is the same essential condition (unlawfully), the aggravating form is similar, and the punishing regime is identical.

Several comments are necessary regarding the material object of the offence. It is the case for any of the premises where the natural or legal person conducts his professional activity.

Office generally means the place where a public institution, organization or company has its administration and conducts its activity. It is the attribute meant to place an agency within space. From a criminal point of view, the concept of office is not limited only to legal persons, and it also extends to natural persons who conduct a professional activity. It can be a place where central or local authorities, public authorities, companies, familial organizations, authorized natural persons; privateers[49] (lawyers, doctors) conduct their activities.

It is essential that the incriminated activity refers to a place where a professional activity is conducted. As long as this condition is fulfilled, it does no longer matter whether the office is a partially or totally opened space (for example, an enclosed construction site or a land demarcated by signs, from which agricultural workers harvest), if it is immobile or can be divided and moved (for example, a tent where circus rehearsals are conducted). Otherwise, the act of entering a place called office, but where no activity is conducted, does not constitute an offence: for instance, the office of the so-called "shell-companies".

We consider compulsory that the professional activity, related to the office, is a legal one. We do not consider that criminal law intended to provide protection to the spaces where, constantly, illicit activities are carried out, as the legislator can not protect what himself prohibits. Consequently, the protection stipulated under Article 225 NCC does not operate, for example, in the case of the office of an unauthorized cigarettes or fuel factory, brothels, clandestine casinos. On the other hand, we can discuss he problem of committing, associated to these places, the offence of violation of home, under the circumstances those spaces are used at the same time also as home by those involved in such activities (for example, a prostitute who lives in the same building where she receives her clients).

We agree with the opinion that the passive subject of this offence is but a natural person using the office being violated[50], even if the office is owned by a legal person[51]. The offence of violation of professional office is part of the crimes against private life, therefore it can not be otherwise analyzed but in connection with the natural persons. The incriminating form protects the individual's intimacy at his working place, and not the authority of the natural or legal person that conducts the activity inside that office, as the doctrine has stated[52].

II.3. The protection of correspondence. We consider this category includes the offences relating to the violation of the secret of correspondence, illegal surveillance of a transmission of IT data and the unauthorized transfer of IT data.

Violation of the secret of correspondence (Article 302 NCC). The act is incriminated in a standard, three aggravating and an absorbed form.

A first comment over this offence is related to the fact it was included in the chapter relating to professional offences. We find the legislator's motivation criticisable. It is undeniably that violation of the secret of correspondence, if committed by a public servant, also harms the social relations associated to the well-development of the activities and the reputation that public authorities

---

[49] The protection of liberal professions is also regulated by certain specialized laws (see, as an example, Article 35 of the Law No 51/1995 on the organization and conduct of lawyer profession).

[50] V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., pg.173.

[51] Other authors (P. Dungan, T. Medeanu, V. Paşca, op. cit., pg.243) consider that the passive subject can also be a legal person.

[52] Idem.

and institutions ought to receive, but we consider that the key social value that is therefore harmed by this offence, especially when the offender is a public servant, continues to be the individual private life[53]. Moreover, this thesis is also valid if the offence is committed by a non-special subject. As if to deepen more the confusion, the Law of enforcement of the criminal Code (Article 245)[54] stipulates that "the provisions under Article 302 of the Criminal Code apply regardless of them having been committed within professional relationships or outside of them (author's note – R.S.)".

For the standard form, the offence is committed by unlawfully opening, taking, destroying or retaining a correspondence that is addressed to another person, as well as the unlawful disclosure of the content of a correspondence, even when this was sent opened or was accidently opened.

The offence is more serious when it is committed by unlawful interception of a conversation or communication made by telephone or by any other electronic means of communication.

In principle, these two forms of the offence have a content similar to the one in the Criminal Code of 1968, but it has been adopted a more correct systematization of the rules. Thus, the standard form of the NCC includes the ruling means related to the so-called classic correspondence (for example, letters), whilst the form under Article 302 point 2 refers to telephonic correspondence or by other electronic means of communication.

In regards to the second form, we notice – on the one hand – that the legislator refers to the communications made by any electronic means of communication, thus including by e-mail. It would have been better to avoid such a concurrence of rules, especially in the case of a comprehensive law as the Criminal Code. We consider that the offence under Article 361 NCC absorbs the offence of violation of the secret of correspondence, thus it being obvious that its special judicial object is represented not only by the social values and relations associated with the security and integrity of IT systems and data, but also with the individual private life. Likewise, even the punishing system, which is harsher than in the case of illegal interception of a transmission of IT data leads to this conclusion.

On the other hand, direct private conversations and communications between individuals shall not constitute the object of protection stipulated by Article 302 point 2 NCC. Unlawful wiretapping constitutes the offence of violation of private life (Article 226 NCC).

For the second aggravating form, the acts stipulated under point 1 and point 2 are committed by a public servant who has the legal obligation to respect the professional secret and confidentiality of the information he has access to. We notice that the NCC has limited the sphere of the active subject for this form of violation of the secret of correspondence, mentioning only the public servant[55] (as it is defined under Article 175 NCC), and not any other servants.

A third aggravating form consists of unlawful disclosure, dissemination, reporting and transmission to another person or to the public of the content of an intercepted conversation or communication, also when the offender knew about it by mistake or accidently.

We can make some interesting comments in respect to this form of the offence.

---

[53] See V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., pg.512. By comparison, the authors properly note that the unit of offence related to profession, it would have been more appropriate to include the offence related to the disclosure of professional secret, and not the one related to the violation of the secret of correspondence.

[54] We envisage the form existing on the site: www.just.ro, on 29.01.2012.

[55] Under the particular situation in which the active subject is an employee of an intelligence service, the right judicial regulation for this act is under Article 20 din Legea nr.51/1991, which postulates: "running, without a warrant, the activities subject to the authorization under Article 13 (it is also the case of interception of conversations and communications– author's note, R.S.), except for those carried out under the situations postulated under Article 15, or exceeding the authorized warrant is punished by imprisonment from 1 to 5 years, if the act is a more serious cime". Thus because, although the offender is a public servant who has the legal obligation to respect the professional secret and the confidentiality of the information to which he has access, Article 20 of Law No 51/1991 has a the nature of a specialized rule compared to the general rule of Article 302 NCC.

Firstly, the way the legislator conceived the Article 302 point 4 NCC reveals that the law penalizes the disclosure, dissemination, reporting and transmission to another person or to the public of the content of any conversation or communication made by telephone or electronic devices, regardless of it having been legally or illegally intercepted. The content of the Article 302 point 4 makes no reference to the hypothesis under point 2, thus unlawful interceptions have not been taken into consideration. If the NCC would have intended to exclusively refer to illegal interceptions, it would have explicitly mentioned them, as it is the situation, for example, of violation of private life (Article 226 point 2 NCC incriminates disclosure, dissemination, reporting and transmission of "sounds, conversations or images stipulated by point 1 (author's note – R.S.)", thus of those unlawfully recorded). Consequently, the act of unlawful disclosure of a legally intercepted conversation or communication shall constitute an offence, as well as the unlawful disclosure of an illegally intercepted conversation.

Secondly, if the content of an e-mail correspondence is disclosed, we shall have the aggravating form of violation of the secret of correspondence if that specific communication was legally intercepted, and if not, we shall have a concurrence of offences (violation of the secret of correspondence in its aggravating form and the illegal interception of IT data). This is due to the fact that the chapter relating to the offences against the security and integrity of IT systems and data does not incriminate the act of unlawful disclosure of illegally intercepted IT data[56].

Thirdly, the offence of Article 302 point 4 NCC does not envisage the content of direct communications between two persons. Their unlawful disclosure can constitute violation of private life, in its aggravating form, if the conditions under Article 226 point 2 NCC are accomplished.

This issue needs a more comprehensive analysis. By analyzing the incrimination manner of illegal interception of personal conversations helps us notice that the Romanian legislator has somehow distanced from the meaning that ECHR jurisprudence consecrates to the concept of correspondence: the communication of thoughts and information by any means (verbally, by letters, telegrams, fax, telex, pager, telephone, e-mail, SMS, MMS). Inside the NCC, correspondence by means of remote communication (letters, telegrams, telephonic conversations, etc.), the elementary rule that penalizes the interception is Article 302 – the violation of the secret of correspondence; otherwise, for direct private communications or conversations, the basic text is Article 226 – the violation of private life.

We shall analyze the way the legislator regulates the issue of disclosing someone else's correspondence. As we have mentioned above, the unlawful disclosure, dissemination, reporting and transmission of the conversations and communications made by telephone or electronic means of communication, regardless of being legally or illegally intercepted, constitutes violation of the secret of correspondence (Article 302 point 4). The unlawful disclosure of the content of the recorded indoor conversations constitutes violation of private life, but only when the recording was illegally made (Article 226 point 2).

Otherwise, the new criminal law does not stipulate – in principle – that the act of unlawful disclosure of the content of an indoor conversation that was legally recorded[57]. For example, when handwriting a testament, the testator admits him being the father of a child outside marriage, in order to dissolute any eventual doubts, and he asks a friend to assist him and audio-video record him while reading the testament. He also asks him to give the tape to the legal inheritances only after his death. Not happy with his share of the fortune, the friend, before the subject's death, shows this tape to the wife of the testator, thus finding out about her husband's past extramarital affair. The act obviously harms the testator's intimacy. However, it is not stipulated as so by the penal law; the communications of the victim were recorded with his consent, thus their unlawful disclosure does not constitute violation of private life and neither the violation of the secret of correspondence, as they were not made by means of remote communication.

[56] According to Article 181 point 2 NCC, IT data means any representation of facts, information or concepts in a form that can be processed in an IT system.

[57] Some exceptions were mentioned for the analysis of the crime relating to violation of private life.

The above mentioned hypothesis could be considered as included under the provisions of Article 302 point 4 NCC, which refers to conversations or communications, but it does not include also the rest of the phrase in point 2 ("made by phone or any other means of electronic communication"), thus not being detailed. Ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus.

We are reluctant to this argument. The etymology of the terms used by the legislator show that Article 302 NCC has never taken into consideration the indoor conversations, and only those made by means of remote communication. In the case of violation of the secret of correspondence the adjective "intercepted" was used, being derived from the verb "to intercept", which means to detect and control a telephonic conversation, a correspondence between two persons[58]. The new criminal legislation uses the concept of "interception" only when it refers to the conversations and communications made by means of remote communication (in the case of violation of the secret of correspondence, of illegal interception of IT data transfer), whilst in the case of direct conversations between two or more persons, face to face, only the terms "wiretapping" and "recording" are used (as in the case of violation of private life). The criminal proceeding legislation adheres to the same semantics. The Criminal Proceedings Code of 1968 refers, in Article 91^1, to the "interception and recording of conversations and communications made by telephone or by any other electronic means of communication (author's note – R.S.)", whilst Article 91^4, refers to indoor conversations, the legislator uses only the term of recording, avoiding interception. The New Criminal Proceeding Code stipulates it more clearly: according to Article 138, not only interceptions of conversations and communications, but also video, audio or photographic surveillance are considered special techniques of surveillance or investigation. The phrase interception of conversations and communications is defined under Article 13 point 2, by referring to conversations or communications "made by telephone, IT system or any other means of communication (author's note – R.S.)", excluding direct (indoor) conversations, as the latter are associated to video, audio or photographic surveillance, which also means "recording the conversations" (author's note – R.S.)" of persons.

On the basis of these arguments, we reiterate the proposal – already postulated under the analysis of the violation of private life – that the text of Article 226 point 2 NCC is properly completed.

The absorbed form of the offence was introduced by the draft of the Law for the enforcement of the Criminal Code (Article 246 point 10)[59] and consists of unlawful possession or manufacturing of special means of intercepting and recording communications. The act is currently incriminated in a similar manner under Article 19 thesis II Law no15/1991[60].

This form is nothing but the incrimination, as a stand-alone offence, for the preparatory acts of violation of the secret of correspondence.

Several comments ought to be made regarding the absorbed form of the offence.

---

[58] See Dicționarul Explicativ al Limbii Române, Romanian Academy PH, Bucureşti, 1975, pg.434. The doctrine did not give a very accurate definition of this term. Sometimes (See: V. Dobrinoiu, N. Neagu, op. cit., pg.514; Gr. Theodoru, Tratat de drept procesual penal, Hamangiu PH, Bucureşti, 2008, ed. a II-a, pg. 414), the concept of interception was connected exclusivelly to conversations or communications made by telephone or by electronic means of communication, whilst audio recording aimed at all the conversations or communications, thus including the indoor ones. Other authors (See D.I. Cristescu, Investigarea criminalistică a infracțiunilor contra securității naționale şi de terorism, Solness PH, Timişoara, 2004, pg.195-197) gave a definition to the operation of interception by refering to any confidential communications made directly or indirectly by a person. Personally, we noted that this latter opinion that we adopt (See M. Udroiu, R. Slăvoiu, O. Predescu, Tehnici speciale de investigare în justiția penală, C.H. Beck PH, București, 2009, pg.17-18).

[59] We envisage the form on the site: www.just.ro on 29.01.2012.

[60] According to the text, which is to be abolished by the enforcement of the NCC, it shall be a crime and therefore punished by imprisonment from 2 to 7 years, if the offence constitutes a more serious crime, "illegal possession, manufacturing or use of specialized means for the interception of communications".

Firstly, we notice that the legislator atypically uses the term "communications" and not "conversations" or "communications". By communication we understand the action to communicate and its result, meaning to bring something to knowledge, inform, notify, and conversation means a talk, a discussion. Yet, the concept of communications defines the means of communication between different points or technical systems used to accomplish the action of communicating. Thus, communications represent the means through which individuals communicate (telephone, telegraph, mail, radio, electronic mail, etc.) as this is the accurate meaning of the terms, we consider it obvious that it is not the "communications" that can be intercepted or recorded (for example, it is not the telephone that is wiretapped – as we often encounter in everyday speech), but "the communications" or, depending on the situation, "the conversations", namely the communicated information (for instance, by telephonic communications). Therefore, we consider that the legislator misused the word "communications", the syntagma of "special means of intercepting or recording of communications", hereinafter referred to as conversations and communications.

Secondly, as the law does not mention the type of conversations or communications, we assess that unlawful possession or manufacturing constitutes an offence when the special means is destined to intercept or record telephonic conversations or by any electronic means of communication and also when it is destined to wiretap or record private indoor conversations. The exception is for IT devices and recordings designed and adapted to commit the offence of illegal interception of a transmission of IT data, and whose unlawful possession or manufacturing is separately incriminated (illegal operations using illegal IT devices or programmes – Article 365 NCC).

Thirdly, as the absorbed form of the violation of the secret of correspondence postulated under Article 302 point 6 NCC, has the nature of a habitual-offence (it is incriminated in order to prevent the commission of more sever offences, the unlawful interception of a conversation), we consider that it is not absorbed by the aggravating form postulated under point 2, and therefore they shall form a concurrence of offences. Certainly, we envisage the situation in which the possession and interception have the nature of relatively autonomous activities in respect to their frame time, and not the situation when, absolutely naturally, the first is comprised by the second; it is obvious that the operation of interception inherently implies the possession of special means, thus, it can not be the case of concurrence. However, it shall be concurrence when, for example, a private detective possesses such means, in his office, for a long time, using them only on certain occasions, when a client asks him so.

A particular situation is met when the unlawful possession or manufacturing regards the special means for recording the indoor conversations. Thus, if they are placed and later used, we consider it shall be no concurrence of three offences: violation of private life in its standard form (Article 226 point 1), violation of private life in the absorbed form (Article 226 point 5), and violation of the secret of correspondence in the absorbed form (Article 302 point 6).

In respect to the criminal punishment of the violation of the secret of correspondence, we note that unlawful disclosure of the content of an intercepted conversation or communication is punished more sever that the disclosure of the content of a classic communication. The situation is justified due to the ampleness of the interpersonal communication by technical means in modern society. We find it hard to understand the legislator's choice to stipulate a milder penalty for the disclosure of the content of the intercepted communication (imprisonment from 3 months to 2 years or a fine) compared to the offence relating to the unlawful interception of a conversation or communication made by telephone or by any other means of communication (the penalty being imprisonment from 6 months to 3 years or a fine). We find it very important the harm brought to private life, for example, when certain intimate information are disclosed to the public by the offender, thus the person's intimacy becoming a general subject of gossip, compared to the situation in which the offender is the only one to find about that information, when he intercepts a victim's telephonic conversation. Likewise, it is difficult understand why the legislator opted a such a penalty system for the violation of the secret of correspondence, whilst in the case of violation of private life by audio recording of a private conversation and, respectively, by disclosing such a conversation to a third party or to the public, the penalties stipulated by the law are increasing: imprisonment from one month to 6 months or a fine relating to recording, respectively, imprisonment from 3 months to 2 years or a fine relating to disclosure.

Such an inconsistency allows us to conclude that it is a concurrence of the offence provided by point 2 and the one provided by point 4, at least for the case of violation of the secret of correspondence, if the offender discloses the content of a telephonic conversation that was unlawfully intercepted. The situation is relatively unusual as the disclosure is not possible without a prior interception, whereas the penalty requires it; thus being hard to accept that an offence stipulating a milder sanction (the disclosure) could absorb the one stipulating a more severe one (the interception).

The legislator devoted only two of the justifiable special causes specific to the violation of private life, for the violation of the secret of correspondence (if the offender notices the commission of an offence or contributes by evidence that an offence was committed or if he notices acts of public interest, which are significant to the life of the community and whose disclosure has public advantages that are more important than the prejudice caused to the victim); the other two not being compatible with the acts of interception of correspondence or of the conversations or communications made by telephone or electronic means.

From the proceeding point of view, the offence of violation of the secret of correspondence, the prosecution is initiated upon the complaint of the victim, only for the standard form; the initial text of Article 302, which excludes ex officio investigation for any form of the offence, being advanced for a modification under the Law for the enforcement of the Criminal Code.

Illegal Interception of a transmission of IT information (Article 361 NCC). The NCC copied this offence, without any modification in respect to the constituent elements, form the Article 43 of the Law no161/2003. The only distinction refers to the penalty regime, which became milder.

Unauthorized transfer of IT data (Article 364 NCC). The offence of unauthorized transfer of IT data is encountered, in an identical form, under the provisions of Article 44 point 2-3 of the Law no161/2003. Likewise, for this offence, the legislator opted for a milder punishment.

IV. Legal interference with private life. If it is compelling that the law assures a complete and adequate system of protection of the individual's intimacy, making also appeal to the coercion specific to the criminal law, nonetheless we must admit that private life is not an absolute right. Every society admits, for the general interest of its members, the legal possibility of certain public authorities to interfere in a person's intimacy, home or correspondence, related to, for example, the prevention and combat of the criminal phenomenon.

Considering the provisions of the New Criminal Proceedings Code[61], enacted by the Law No 135/2010, we further propose certain comments regarding the methods and proceedings, which are used by the judicial agencies, implying interference with the individuals' private life.

Thus, Article 138 NCPC also regulates, under the phrase of special techniques for surveillance and investigation, the following proceedings:

- interception of conversations and communications – meaning the interception, access, monitoring, collection or recording of conversations or communications made by telephone, IT system or any other means of communication, as well as the recording of trafficking data that indicate the source, destination, data, hour, dimension, duration or the type of communication made by telephone, IT system or any other means of communication;

- access to an IT system – means entering an IT system or IT data storage device, either directly, or remotely, by the use of specialized programmes or of a network, in order to look for evidence;

[61] Herinafter refered to as NCPC.

- video, audio or photographic surveillance – means to photograph persons, to observe or register their conversations, moves or any other activities;

- to locate or survey by technical means – the procedure implies the use of certain devices that determine the place where a person is at;

- to withhold, release or search mail communication – means checking, through physical or technical means, the letters, other mail communications or the objects sent or received by any means, made by the offender, suspect, defendant or any other person suspected of receiving or sending those goods from or to the offender, suspect or defendant.

These measures are taken by the judge for laws and freedoms, if three conditions are accomplished at the same time: (i) there is a reasonable suspicion regarding the preparation or commission of a serious crime (for example, those against national security, acts of terrorism, arms trafficking, drugs trafficking, human being trafficking, corruption[62]); (ii) the measure is proportional with the restraint of fundamental rights and freedoms, considering the particularities of the cause, the importance of the information or evidences to be collected or the seriousness of the crime; (iii) the evidences could not be collected in any other means or their collection may imply great difficulties that could jeopardize the investigation or there is a peril for the safety of people or certain valuable goods.

The measures are mandated during the course of investigation, for a period of maximum 30 days, and can be prolonged, for justifiable reasons; every prolongation must not be longer than 30 days. The total period for these specific surveillance or investigation techniques, related to the same person and the same offence, is of maximum 1 year; the exception being video, audio or photographic surveillance that, when made in private places, can not exceed 120 days.

By derogation from the above mentioned procedure, Article 141 NCPC allows the prosecutor to authorize these proceedings, if the three conditions previously mentioned are accomplished, and also in case of emergency when the time to obtain a warrant from the competent judge could lead to a significant delay of the investigation, or to a loss, impairment, annihilation of evidences, or it could jeopardize the safety of the victim, witness or members of their families. The prosecutor can institute those measures for a period of maximum 48 hours, having the obligation to inform the judge in order to obtain their validation, in a 24 hours timeframe.

Considering the intrusive conspicuous nature of such measures, the law compels the prosecutor to immediately stop the surveillance if the bases on which it was started are no longer justifiable and to inform the person in writing, in maximum 10 tens, regarding the measure taken against him. If the subject, who has been under surveillance, asks for, he has the right to listen to the conversations, communications or discussions and to see the images.

Another specific surveillance technique that implies interferences with the person's intimacy is that of obtaining the list of telephonic conversations. The measure is instituted by the prosecutor, with the previous consent of the judge for rights and freedoms.

Likewise, house search implies interference in the individual's private life. This measure can be instituted if there is a reasonable suspicion regarding the commission of an offence by a person and it is expected that the search leads to the detection and collection of evidences regarding this offence, to the preservation of the traces of the offence or to the catching of the suspect or offender. House searching is instituted by the judge for rights and freedoms, during investigations, and by the institution invested to take it to court, during the course of a trial.

The law explicitly stipulates that house search must not constitute a disproportionate interference in the private life (Article 156 point 2 NCPC). The judicial agencies that perform the search can adequately and proportionately use of force, in order to enter a house, in two situations: (i) for reliable reasons to anticipate armed defence or other types of violence or in case of risk of destroying the evidences; (ii) in case of denial or if no answer was given to the judicial agencies' requests to enter the house (Article 159 point 17 NCPC). Likewise, the judicial agency has the right to open, by force, and avoiding unjustified damages, the rooms, spaces, furniture items and other items that might store objects, documents, evidences of the offence or of the searched persons, if the possessor is absent or does not wilfully want to open them (Article 159 point 12 NCPC).

[62] With exception, withholding, release and search of mail communications can be instituted in case of reasonable suspicions regarding the preparation or commission of any crime.

The law allows that the place and the persons or objects found during the search to be photographed or recorded on tape or film (Article 159 point 12 NCPC).

Conclusions.

A complete analysis of the provisions of the NCC allows us to assess that the system for the protection of the individual's private life has substantially improved. This is welcomed both from the point of view of the practice requirements and also in order to provide the Romanian legislation with the compatibility with the European standards in this matter, and the decision to incriminate certain acts evidently representing attacks on a person's intimacy and that happen more and more often in every day life (the violation of private life or the violation of the professional office). We shall see, in the following years after the NCC enters into force, to what extent the legislation will ensure the prevention function of the criminal law and how it will contribute to the civilizing function that any legal system ought to have for the society to which it addresses.

References

- Antoniu G., Bulai C., Duvac C., Griga I., Ivan Gh., Mitrache C., Molnar I., Pascu I., Paşca V., Predescu O., Explicații preliminare ale noului Cod penal, Universul juridic PH, Bucureşti, 2010, vol. I
- Bîrsan C., *Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articol*e, vol. I, Drepturi şi libertăți, All Beck PH, Bucureşti, 2005
- Boroi Al., Drept penal. Partea specială, C.H. Beck PH, Bucureşti, 2011
- Clayton R., Tomlinson H., The Law of Human Rights, Oxford University Press, 2001
- van Dijk P., van Hoof F., van Rijn A., Zwack L., Theory and practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 4th edition, Intersentia, Antwerpen-Oxford, 2006
- Dobrinoiu V., Neagu N., Drept penal. Partea specială. Teorie şi practică judiciară, Universul Juridic PH, Bucureşti, 2011
- Dongoroz V., Kahane S., Oancea I., Fodor I., Iliescu N., Bulai C., Stănoiu R., Explicații teoretice ale Codului penal român, Romanian Academy PH and All Beck PH, Bucureşti, 2003, ediția a II-a
- Dungan P., Medeanu T., Paşca V., Manual de drept penal. Partea specială, Universul Juridic PH, Bucureşti, 2010, vol. I
- Hotca M.A., Noul Cod penal şi Codul penal anterior. Aspecte diferențiale şi situații tranzitorii, Hamangiu PH, Bucureşti, 2009
- Sudre Fr., Dreptul european şi internațional al drepturilor omului, Polirom PH, 2006
- Udroiu M., Predescu O., Protecția europeană a drepturilor omului şi procesul penal român. Tratat, C.H. Beck PH, Bucureşti, 2008
- Vasiliu T., Pavel D., Antoniu G., Daneş Şt., Dărîngă Gh., Lucinescu D., Papadopol V., Popescu D.C., Rămureanu V., Codul penal comentat şi adnotat. Partea specială, Ştiințifică şi Enciclopedică PH, Bucureşti, 1977

TERMINATION OF RIGHT TO PREVENTIVE MEASURES

RADU MARIUS*

Abstract

Preventive measures were binding, without, however, being procedural criminal sanctions or penalties and not run counter to the freedom of the individual and does not attack the principle of presumption of innocence.They ensure the good running of the criminal process, which has led to the inclusion of modern legislation in all imprisonment by way of judicial review, as a procesuala of the most severe.Termination of right to preventive measures shall designate by virtue of which the legal situation, whether in judicial activities involved some \"incident\" which recognizes ope legis effect subject to extinctive interpretation towards preventive measures, judicial bodies are required to cease such action.

The judicial authority is obliged, therefore, to release the detained or arrested when there is one of the situations referred to in article 140 from the code of penal procedure.This study has proceeded from the need to standardise and judicial practice and the consistent application of the law in the matter of the termination of the preventive measures — as a guarantee of the respect for rights indispensable accused\/defendant in criminal proceedings.

Even if at first glance the law is clear and concise, however, judicial practice has passed different solutions, often giving the misinterpretation, and precisely why during the study I will present some of the most relevant solutions jurisprudențiale, both published and unpublished, as well as the jurisprudence of the European Court of human rights, also commenting on his own option likely controversy.In view of these considerations in the present research wish to realize a complete documentation and jurisprudențiala and doctrinara, trying to force through the comments made on the text of regulations and solutions given by courts to make a judgment necessary and useful to practitioners of law cases of cessation of the right to preventive measures.

Keywords: Preventative measures, preventive arrest, prosecution, custody, reasonable time

Introduction

The procedural measures are procedural penal law institutions used for the functioning of the judicial bodies in the normal and effective prosecution and judgment, their functionality is to prevent or eliminate the circumstances which hinder the realization of condițiuni in criminal proceedings[1].

Of procedural measures, including preventive measures are considered by the legislator as being the most important, having as purpose, as provided for in article 136 of the code of penal procedure, to ensure the proper conduct of the criminal proceedings and\/or prevention of theft indicted or defendant in criminal proceedings, trial or enforcement of penalty.

Preventive measures are provided for in legislation of the Romanian detention pre-trial arrest, the obligation not to leave the city and the obligation not to leave the country.With regard to these preventive measures, the code of criminal procedure reglemeteaza procedure to take roman, revoking, replacement or termination thereof.

The study that I'll develop will treat the main issues raised by the termination of the preventive measures.

The need for this study stemmed from the existence of a national uniform judicial practice, in particular as regards the provisions of article 140 paragraph 2 of the code of penal procedure, in relation to the provisions of article 159, paragraph 8 and paragraph 13 of the code of penal procedure and decision no. 25\/2008 the High Court of Cassation and Justice United Stations, rendered in an appeal in the interest of the law.

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University, Department Of Public Law (email: mariusavocat@yahoo.com).

[1] Nicolae Volonciu, Dealt with in criminal proceedings. The general part, vol. I, Publisher Paideea, Bucharest, 1996, p. 399.

The issue was subject to analysis of the subject and other doctrinal terms, are both as a subheading in the various treaties or specialized courses of the great teachers of the criminal procedural law (Ion Neagu, Nicolae Volonciu, etc.), as well as study alone or as part of the studies published (either by theorists or practitioners) in specialised magazines relating to preventive measures.

Having regard to the numerous and erroneous solutions given in the judicial practice in cases of termination of the pre-trial detention measure, perhaps in a not very distant future, we will have a practice of the European Court of human rights which will see different criminal violation of a fundamental human right, namely the right to liberty, and which likely will condemn the Romanian State to pay damages.

The conclusions at which I got from întocmiri this study were based on both the solutions given by our courts, on the various opinions of scholars and its own analysis of the texts, regulations and cases related to the case with whom I had contact in the practice.

Perhaps, in so far as that will prove correct findings of this study will form a useful support in developing the future Code of criminal procedure.

Prevention measures are procedural penal institutions of law with binding to bind the accused or convicted person is prevented from carrying out certain activities that would adversely affect the attention upon the criminal process or on the aim of this[2].

In view of the fact that by taking measures of prevention, notwithstanding the fundamental right of inviolability of the person, the legislator has established reasonable procedural guarantees, which require strict laws that allow making the replacement, revocation or termination of these measures of procedural law[3].

Termination of right of preventive measures is a legal institution through which in the cases and under the conditions provided for by law judicial (Court or Prosecutor) have, by an order of the Ordinance, immediately putting freedom of the detained or arrested, or termination of the culprit for the accused or the obligation not to leave the place or country, and of all other obligations laid down by the judicial authority when he ordered the taking of such measures.

While revoking measures preventing is a procedural opportunity act which one judges judicial law, cessation of measures for prevention is a legal obstacle against maintaining them[4].

According to article140 of the code of penal procedure, preventive measures shall:

a. law upon expiry of the deadlines laid down by law or established by judicial bodies or at the expiry of the stipulated in article 160^{b} paragraph 1 of the code of penal procedure, if the Court has not made the verification of the legality of pre-trial and continuing in that period.

By decision No. VII\/2006, the High Court of Cassation and Justice – United Stations was considered an appeal in the interest of the law declared by the General Prosecutor of the Prosecutor attached to the High Court of Cassation and justice, on the application of the provisions of article 140 paragraf 1 of the code of penal procedure and decided that: "neverificarea by the Court during the trial, and the continuing legality of pre-trial detention of the accused staff before the meeting period of 60 days referred to in art. $160^{\mathbf{b}}$ paragraf 1 of the code of penal procedure, of the accused minor aged between 14 and 16 years old inaite the expiry of 30 days referred to in art. 160^{h}, paragraf 2 of the code of penal procedure, and of the accused minor more than 16 years before the expiry of the period of 40 days provided for in, art. 160 [h], paragraf 3 of the code of penal procedure, cessation of the pre-trial detention measure taken to inculptati and putting them immediately in freedom \".[5]

[2] Grigore Theodoru, Procedural law criminal. Special part, vol. II, Alexandru Ioan Cuza University, Iaşi, Faculty of law, 1974, p. 194.

[3] Ion Neagu, Handled by the criminal proceedings.The general part, Publisher Legal Universe, Bucharest, 2008, p. 536.

[4] Ion Neagu Handled by the criminal proceedings.The general part, Publisher Legal Universe, Bucharest, 2008, p. 536.

Circumstance that in the judgment the measure of pre-trial detention ceased law cannot constitute a legal basis for a new arrest in the same question, where no cause during the settlement appeared new elements which would justify this measure[6].

In respect of time limits for 60 days, 30 days or 40 days, they, on the restriction of rights of the person, rights conferred outside criminal proceedings may not be substantial than some that will be calculated in accordance with article 188 of the code of penal procedure, time and date of the beginning and ending with its duration.

Imperative nature of the term result of legal text content \"check periodically, but the Court not later than 60 days ...\"; What is missing is the sanction non-compliance with current rules limit that must be terminated as the measure of arrest, other procedural penalties and forfeiture – nullity – mandatory time limits applicable in the case of having no effect in this case[7].

In practice, the Court has ordered the arrest of the accused for a period of 3 days, providing for both the end and the term of arrest, the measure begins on 18 February 2004 and expired on 21 February 2004[8].

We consider the solution given by the Court as one flawed, having regard to the provisions of article 188 of the code of penal procedure, which provide that the calculation of time limits on preventive measures, the hour or the day that begins and ends at that time in its duration.

Thus, taking into account the text of the regulations mentioned above, we find that in this matter the measure of pre-trial detention ceased as on 20 February 2004.

In accordance with article 3001 combined with article 160[b] of the code of penal procedure, where the accused is detained, the Court second seised is obliged to periodically, but not less than 60 days, the legality and appropriateness of pre-trial detention; to collate with these laws, article 140 paragraph 1 of the code of penal procedure, which stipulates that preventive measure shall cease as from the expiry of 60 days if the Court has not made the verification of lawfulness and continuing in this period, the figure in the trial so far as pre-trial detention is limited to a period of 60 days, calculated from the date of conclusion of the Court of the measure; It is theoretically possible that within 60 days of the Court to verify the appropriateness of the measure several times.

Speaking about procedural sanction in case of exceeding the deadline of 60 days in the older doctrine explained that in any event the omission will not have the consequence of termination of the measure of pre-trial detention, the penalty in this case is relative nullity according to article 197 paragraf 1 and paragraph 4 of the code of penal procedure [9].

In another opinion if it considers that the limit is exceeded the term of 60 days of detention occurs termination of verification as a preventive measure with regard to the constitutional and imperative provisions of the code of criminal procedure resulting from the topical nature of this legislation[10].

In judicial practice has raised the question of whether the measure is terminated or not arrest law where the Court of appeal or the appeal does not verify the legality and appropriateness of pre-

---

[5] Official Gazette nr. 475 from 01.06.2006.

[6] The Bucharest Court of appeal, Criminal Division II, criminal decision No. 12\/2005 in Dan Lupascu, Antoneta Nedelcu, Ionut Matei, Collection of practice in criminal matters through Court -2005, Publishing House universe binding , Bucharest, 2006, p.77.

[7] Julius Caesar Dumitrescu, Arrest the accused at the stage of proceedings, in the RDP. 2\/2006, p. 91.

[8] The Superior Council of Magistracy, the 2004-2005 National Jurisprudence, ed. Brilliance, Piatra Neamț, 2006, p. 704.

[9] Mircea I Cretu, The preventive arrest.Recent legislation in the RDP. 3\/2004, p. 129.

[10] Leontin Coras, Foetus, the preventive arrest.Termination of the measure of pre-trial detention of the accused, the No. 6\/2005, p. 181.

trial detention within 60 days from the date on which the Superior Court pronounced a judgment of conviction, by maintaining the State of arrest.

Some courts have considered, wrongly, that the economy of the texts of regulations (article 23 of the Constitution and article 160^b of the code of penal procedure).

It follows that overcoming the cessation of the measure of pre-trial detention, whereas this case not provided for in article 140 and article 350 of the code of penal procedure; violation of this obligation may result not only disciplinary judge guilty of exceeding the deadline of 60 days[11], overcoming time; in the case of 60 days are incidental provisions article 185 paragraf 3 and not those of art. 185 paragraph 2 thereof, which is why the sanction of invalidity relating to article 197 paragraf 1 and 4 the convicted may be an injury caused by overdue check; injury might be interfering, before verification of grounds which would have caused the revocation of the measure[12].

Maintenance of pre-trial detention, failing to indicate a term which shall not be more than 60 days are available only up to the next term of court, to arrest verification failure next trial would lead to termination of the preventive measure for the deadline of the judicial body (article 140, paragraf 1 (a) of the code of penal procedure).[13]

Another preventative measure which may terminate by expiry of the period laid down by law or by the judiciary is retention.

The arrest can be taken as both Prosecutor and criminal investigation body or clues are reasonable for committing an offence by the accused or defendant.

The measure of detention may last for more than 24 hours, but the judicial organ and may be less than the measure of detention.

Where the judicial authority does not consider that it is necessary to take the measure of pre-trial detention, as well as in cases where the Court referred to the proposal of preventive arrest until the Fund does not decide upon the expiration of the duration of detention, then this measure, once safely on time shall cease.

Following the arrest, Prosecutor incetariii is obliged to immediately provide entry into the freedom of the detained, a conduct contrary to the provisions of articles involving the incidence of article 266 of the code of penal procedure, which funds the crime of illegal arrest and abuse research.[14]

Very short term, for which you may order forfeiture, can create, in some cases, the Prosecutor does not have the disadvantage that the material time to draft and submit a proposal for the preventive arrest of Prosecutor in a timeframe that will ensure the possibility of solving the proposed arrest warrant within 24 hours of arrest, what is the consequence of the release of the detained[15].

It is therefore necessary to formulate a rethink of the duration of the measure of detention for the purpose of increasing its length is 48 hours or 72 hours, and this is justified by practical aspects, where due to the short interval of time of detention, very often the accused or convicted person who has ceased to be capable of holding up to rule on the merits of the opportunity to take the measure of pre-trial detention, departing from the courtroom and evade prosecution and judgment although it is arrested in missing.

Crossing borders and the measures to leave the village, crossing not to leave the country-law ceases during prosecution through to arrive at a period where they are extended under the conditions

---

[11] Braşov, Court of appeal, the conclusion of 12.01.2004, file No. 155\/ap\/2004 in Braşov court of appeal, Judicial practice gathering in criminal matters, 2003-2004. Criminal law.The criminal procedural law, Publisher Merona, Bucharest, 2005.

[12] Ioan Cristian Uța, Checks on the arrest of the accused during the judgment against arbitrary-warranty maintenance of preventive measure, the No. 2\/2006, p. 219.

[13] Ioan Cristian Uța, Checks on the arrest of the accused during the judgment against arbitrary-warranty maintenance of preventive measure, the No. 2\/2006, p. 221.

[14] Grigore Theodoru, Criminal procedural law. Treatise, Publisher. Hamangiu, Bucharest 2007, p. 491

[15] L.N. Pirvu, arresting during criminal prosecution against No. 3\/2004, p. 28-44.

laid down by law or by reaching the maximum period laid down by law to an accused or defendant may be forced to leave the city or country.

According to the law, the maximum duration of these procedural measures during criminal prosecution is one year, except where the penalty prescribed by law for the offence is imprisonment for life, or detențiunea for 10 years or more, in which case the maximum duration of the preventive measure is 2 years.

Whereas the rules of criminal procedure do not provide for the duration and the need to verify the legality of the measure and the determination not to leave the crossing place of the Court, concluded that emerges is that the measure of the time of judgment shall be for an indefinite period and lasts until delivery of the solution in the process; in support of this opinion, the provisions of articles we invoke article 350 of the code of penal procedure, which paragraph 1 stipulates that in its decision the Court must first rule on taking preventive measures or revocation on the grounds the solution, this obligation is valid also for the Court of appeal in accordance with article 383 paragraf 1 of the code of penal procedure[16].

In the event that the Court has not acted on the decision expressly on the maintenance or revocation action, crossing borders to leave the village, in the doctrine it was considered that this measure cease as with the pronouncement, it is accepted that the preventive measure, which in essence is repressive of indefinite duration, would haveeven beyond the date on which the procedure acts cycle ends; so far, crossing not to leave the place, when it is not replaced during revocata or judging the case, has processual cycle, and if the Court fails to pronounce the judgment adopted on this measure cease[17].

b. in the event of withdrawal of prosecutions, the termination of criminal prosecution or the termination of the criminal proceedings or acquittal;

The interpretation of the text of the law (art. 140, para. C.proc.pen.) at the stage of criminal proceedings, in the event of removal under criminal investigation or prosecution, the Prosecutor ex officio or following the information of the criminal investigation body, has an obligation to ensure the cessation of the preventive measure, for sending immediately the freedom, detained or arrested for possession of premisesa copy of the Ordinance, or an extract[18].

When the case of termination of criminal prosecution or removal under criminal prosecution of a defendant charged or arrested, the Prosecutor must decide on the termination of criminal prosecution or prosecution under the release on the same day in which he received a proposal for termination or removal from the criminal investigation body, whether the Prosecutor has ordered the cessation or removal under criminal investigationthe measure of pre-trial detention of the accused ceases, or the accused being placed immediately in freedom.

In the Ordinance of the Prosecutor shall make mention of the establishment and termination of the pre-trial detention measure, where the cessation or prosecution under criminal prosecution of a defendant charged or arrested.

Note, however, that, according to article 246 of the code of penal procedure, paragraph 2, as regards the procedure for notification about termination of criminal prosecution, provided that where the accused or the suspect is arrested, the Court shall notify by pre-emptively address the administration of the detention, to put it immediately blamed on the freedom or the culprit; therefore,

---

[16] Costel Niculeanu, Opinion on the termination of the measure, crossing not to leave the place, if the Court fails to rule on the appeal in accordance with art. 350 para. 1 of the code of criminal procedure, law No. 6\/2009, p. 212.

[17] Costel Niculeanu, Opinion on the termination of the measure, crossing not to leave the place, if the Court fails to rule on the appeal in accordance with art. 350 para. 1 of the code of criminal procedure, law No. 6\/2009, p. 212.

[18] Anca-Lelia Lorincz, termination of right of preventive measures in the case of judgment and don't send in the need to adjust the provisions in this area, following the amendments introduced through law No. 202\/2010 in Law no.9\/2011, p, 213.

should be amended and 246 paragraf 2 of the code of penal procedure, in the sense that, in the event of termination of criminal prosecution or removal under criminal detention place administration finance for implementation immediately accused or indicted person freedom of the detained or arrested to be made by the Prosecutor by providing a copy of the Ordinance in which it was found the cessation of the preventive measure[19].

c. when, prior to the pronouncement of a judgment of conviction in first instance, the duration of the arrest reached half the maximum penalty prescribed by law for the offence which is the subject of accusations without being able to overcome, in the course of criminal proceedings within a reasonable period, and no more than 180 days.

According to article 139 of the code of penal procedure, total length of pre-trial detention during criminal prosecution may not exceed a reasonable period, and no more than 180 days.

Having regard to the provisions of article 140 paragraph 2 of the code of penal procedure, we appreciate that the termination of the pre-trial detention may take place and if its duration exceeds a reasonable time without touching but 180 days, being neither distinction between the two categories of maximum time limits[20].

In regards to it within a reasonable time cannot be determined in abstracto but has to be examined on a case-by-case basis depending on the specific features of it.

The time at which it starts to calculate the duration reasonable (dies a quo) is that which the person accused is detained or arrested[21].

In judicial practice has raised the question of whether or not arresting stops right in the event that the appeal against the closure of the extension of the measure of pre-trial detention in the course of prosecution are judges after expiry of the period of pre-trial detention ordered earlier conclusion.

Some courts have held that in this situation the preventive arrest never ceases.

The motivation was that in article 140 of the code of penal procedure, look what causes termination of law among them being mentioned and nejudecarii appeal within the 30-day extension of the State of detention ordered by the conclusion of recurata; If the legislator had wanted to understand the imperative nature of provisions oblige the Court of appeal to hear the appeal within a period of extension of the State of detention ordered earlier by subject to judicial review, the ought to correlate this provision with the provisions of article 140 of the code of penal procedure, the only text on this matter are limiting cases and specifically look for termination of right of preventive measures; These entries have been made per a contrario that result in the legislature did not understand to consider case of termination of the pre-trial detention measure non-recourse înlăuntrul term extension of the measure ordered by the conclusion contested[22].

By decision No. 25\/2008, the High Court of Cassation and Justice-offices-United admitted the appeal in the interest of the law, declared by the General Prosecutor of the Prosecutor attached to the High Court of Cassation and justice, on the interpretation and application of article 159, paragraph 8 of the code of penal procedure, is second sentence concerning the resolution of the appeal brought against the conclusion by which it was decided to extend the pre-trial detention ordered in the course of criminal proceedings and decided that: \"the provisions of article 159, paragraph 8 of the code of penal procedure, second sentence, shall be construed that: (1) the words

[19] Anca-Lelia Lorincz, termination of right of preventive measures in the case of judgment and don't send in the need to adjust the provisions in this area, following the amendments introduced through law No. 202\/2010 in Law no.9\/2011, p, 213.

[20] Julius Caesar Dumitrescu, Considerations relating to the duration of the measure of pre-trial detention, the No. 3\/2008, p. 208.

[21] Mikhail Udroiu, Within a reasonable time of pre-trial detention, Law No 3\/2007, p. 142.

[22] Conclusion No. 168\/R in 04.05.2011 pronounced the Court Bucharest, section II of the Penal Code in the file. 32046\/3\/2011 (with the dissenting opinion of Judge Radu and Ioana Cleopatra), unpublished.

used by the legislator \"before the expiry of the duration of pre-trial detention ordered earlier conclusion attacked\" is binding, and no recommendation;

2. appeal against the closure which has ordered the admission or rejection of the proposal to extend the measure of pre-trial detention always will be solved before the expiry of the period of pre-trial detention ordered earlier conclusion. \"[23]

According to article 5 paragraph 1 of the code of penal procedure, indicate absolution date problems as judged is compulsory for instances of the date of publication of the decision (in the interest of law) in the Official Gazette of Romania, part I.

However there were judges who have come to the conclusion that the measure of pre-trial detention shall cease as the situation.

It was reasoned that although appeals against the conclusion of the meeting declared that it was willing to extend the duration of pre-trial detention have no suspensive nature of enforcement, the solution being substantive court enforceable until the pronouncement of the Court for judicial review, this time of the superior court that was established to be the imperative before the expiry of the duration of pre-trial detention ordered earlier conclusion was taken as against the appeal, concluding that it was willing acceptance of the proposal to extend the measure of pre-trial detention was settled after expiry of the period of pre-trial detention ordered earlier conclusion that the measure was taken, was ordered to arrest the suspect stopped as recurring and should be immediately freely if not detained or arrested in another question[24].

d. in other cases specifically provided for by law according to article 350 of the code of penal procedure, the judge has immediately putting freedom of the accused arrested pre-emptively when pronouncing: a. an imprisonment not more than the duration of pre-trial detention, and b. a punishment with imprisonment with conditional suspension of the execution of the times with a stay of execution under supervision or enforcement to work fine educational measures according to paragraf 6 of the same article the Court convicted the accused and the State of ownership is liberat soon during arrest and detention are equal to the length of the sentence handed down, although the decision is not final.

The difference between the cases of article 140 of the code of penal procedure and article 350 of the code of penal procedure, that is, to produce legal effects, for the situations provided for in article 140 of the code of penal procedure, no need for an express provision of the Court to ascertain that preventive measure in cases of ceased, however, provided for in article 350 of the code of penal procedure, device resolution to obligatorily contain this provision[25].

I might add here and the case against the punishment, which applies in full pardon; this case results from all regulations relating to pardons, as a logical consequence of its application[26].

Another case of termination of the pre-trial detention measure represents a situation where, in the course of criminal prosecution or trial, following the administration of evidence takes place a change of the legal classification of the offence, and the new criminal law provides for offence or pedepasa alternative punishment of prison or fine penalty fine.

Taking into account the provisions of article 136 para 6 of the code of penal procedure, that the measure of pre-trial detention may not be ordered in the case of offences for which the law provides for alternative penalty fine, we consider that in this case the competent judicial body has the

---

[23] Official Gazette nr. 372 fron03.06.2009.

[24] Ioana Radu Cleopatra, No dissenting opinion at the end. 148\/R of the Bucharest Court pronounced 20.04.2011 section II of the Penal Code in the file. 9712.4.2011, unpublished.

[25] Gigel Potrivitu, Alexandra Sibinovici, Discussions regarding some situations for termination of the preventive measures, Law nr. 6\/2009, p. 217..

[26] Ion Neagu Handled by the criminal proceedings.The general part, Publisher Legal Universe, Bucharest, 2008, p.220.

obligation to ensure the cessation of the measure of pre-trial detention and to send a copy of the Ordinance on the device or by the administration of the place of detention for the purposes of the immediately preceding the preventive arrest.

Against the conclusion that the judge shall, during the cessation of criminal prosecution as a preventive measure, the Prosecutor and the accused or the defendant may appeal to the High Court within 24 hours after its pronouncement, for those present, and from the lack of communication, for those.

Conclusion that, in the course of the prosecution, the judge rejected the request for termination of the measure of pre-trial detention is not subject to any appeal.

In this case the High Court of Justice Casatie and decided to file an appeal in the interest of the law as a conclusion of the ordering, during the criminal investigation, rejecting the application for termination of pre-trial detention may not be contested separately appeal.

Participation of Prosecutor in the judgment the appeal is mandatory[27].

The accused or convicted person arrested will be brought before the Court of appeal and will be listened to, legal assistance is compulsory.

The appeal will be examined in the absence of the accused or indicted when he was in the hospital and because of his State of health cannot be brought before a judge, and when his movement is not possible due to a State of necessity or of a case of force majeure.

And in this case, the judgment of the appeal cannot be made only in the presence of the accused\/defendant\/attorney, which gives the word to make conclusions.

Appeal brought against the conclusion whereby it was found as a cessation of the measure of pre-trial detention during the criminal prosecution is not the suspension of enforcement.

In its judgment the Court conclusion date or call ordering termination of a preventive measure may be attacked separately appeal, the accused or the Prosecutor.

Instead the conclusion by the Court or the Court of Appeal rejected the application for termination of the preventive measure is not subject to any appeal.

Appeal brought against the conclusion whereby it was found as a cessation of the measure of pre-trial detention is not the suspension of enforcement.

Having regard to the matters under examination, we appreciate that, in principle, the legal insitutia of the cessation of the preventive measures include modern regulations covering largely the multitude of situations arising in the judicial practice.

The institution has as its main Foundation to avoid abuse in which the accused or the defendant may be subject to criminal proceedings in the course of taking, extension or maintenance to the preventive measures under conditions other than those provided for by law.

Moreover, taking into account the jurisprudence of the European Court of human rights, the roman legislator inserted in the code of criminal procedure, the procedural guarantees to the accused or indicted person, able to lead us to the conclusion that the criminal process itself will take place within the limits and under the conditions provided for by law and with observance of all the principles that govern the conduct of fundamantale.

Emphasize that with the introduction of the article 140 paragraph 2 of the code of penal procedure relative to article 159 of the code of penal procedure in paragraph 13, of the notion of \"reasonable time\", the legislator has given effective roman and Romanian legislation harmonised with the provisions of the European Convention on human rights.

The main problem facing the practice court at this point is therefore that the preventive arrest is terminated or not right where the appeal against the closure of the extension of the measure of pre-trial detention during the criminal prosecution shall be judges after expiry of the period of pre-trial detention ordered earlier conclusion.

[27]ICCJ United stations, Dec. nr. 12\/2005, published in Official Gazette No. 119 of 08.02.2006.

To this aspect and taking into account the solutions which we have argued throughout the trial, we consider as a logical conclusion that is relevant and of nesesar ferenda amending article. 140 C.proc.pen., within the meaning of that provision of express the extent of pre-trial detention law ceases when the appeal against the closure which has ordered the admission or rejection of the proposal to extend the measure of pre-trial detention in the course competencies will have as a basis of settlement once duration of pre-trial detention after expiry of the previously arranged.

References

Books

- Grigore Theodoru, Procedural law criminal. Special part, vol. II, Alexandru Ioan Cuza University, Iaşi, Faculty of law, 1974, p. 194
- Grigore Theodoru, Criminal procedural law. Treatise, Publisher. Hamangiu, Bucharest 2007, p. 491
- Ion Neagu, Handled by the criminal proceedings.The general part, Publisher Legal Universe, Bucharest, 2008, p. 536
- Nicolae Volonciu, Dealt with in criminal proceedings. The general part, vol. I, Publisher Paideea, Bucharest, 1996, p. 399

Journal articles

- Anca-Lelia Lorincz, termination of right of preventive measures in the case of judgment and don't send in the need to adjust the provisions in this area, following the amendments introduced through law No. 202\/2010 in Dreptul no.9\/2011, p, 213
- Costel Niculeanu, Opinion on the termination of the measure, crossing not to leave the place, if the Court fails to rule on the appeal in accordance with art. 350 para. 1 of the code of criminal procedure, Dreptul No. 6\/2009, p. 212
- Gigel Potrivitu, Alexandra Sibinovici, Discussions regarding some situations for termination of the preventive measures, Dreptul nr. 6\/2009, p. 217
- Ioan Cristian Uța, Checks on the arrest of the accused during the judgment against arbitrary-warranty maintenance of preventive measure, Dreptul No. 2\/2006, p. 219
- Ionuț Matei, Bucharest Court of appeal. Collection of judicial practice in criminal matters-2005., Bucharest 2006, p. 77
- Julius Caesar Dumitrescu, Arrest the accused at the stage of proceedings, in the RDP. 2\/2006, p. 91
- Julius Caesar Dumitrescu, Considerations relating to the duration of the measure of pre-trial detention, the No. 3\/2008, p. 208
- Leontin Coras, Foetus, the preventive arrest.Termination of the measure of pre-trial detention of the accused, the No. 6\/2005, p. 181
- L.N. Pirvu, arresting during criminal prosecution against No. 3\/2004, p. 28-44
- Mihail Udroiu, Within a reasonable time of pre-trial detention, Dreptul No 3\/2007, p. 142
- Mircea I Cretu, The preventive arrest.Recent legislation in the RDP. 3\/2004, p. 129

Jurisprudence

- The Bucharest Court of appeal, Criminal Division II, criminal decision No. 12\/2005 in Dan Lupascu, Antoneta Nedelcu, Ionut Matei, Collection of practice in criminal matters through Court -2005, Publishing House universe binding , Bucharest, 2006, p.77,
- Braşov, Court of appeal, the conclusion of 12.01.2004, file No. 155\/ap\/2004 in Braşov court of appeal, Judicial practice gathering in criminal matters, 2003-2004. Criminal law.The criminal procedural law, Publisher Merona, Bucharest, 2005
- Conclusion No. 168\/R in 04.05.2011 pronounced the Court Bucharest, section II of the Penal Code in the file. 32046\/3\/2011 (with the dissenting opinion of Judge Radu and Ioana Cleopatra), unpublished.

- Ioana Radu Cleopatra, No dissenting opinion at the end. 148\/R of the Bucharest Court pronounced 20.04.2011 section II of the Penal Code in the file. 9712.4.2011, unpublished
- ICCJ United stations, Dec. nr. 12\/2005, published in Official Gazette No. 119 of 08.02.2006
- The Superior Council of Magistracy, the 2004-2005 National Jurisprudence, ed. Brilliance, Piatra Neamț, 2006, p. 704

Legislation

- The romanian code of criminal procedure
- Constitution Of Romania
- Official Gazette nr. 475 from 01.06.2006
- Official Gazette nr. 372 fron03.06.2009

THE REFERRAL BACK TO COURT IN CASE OF EXTRADITION

SIMONA TACHE*

Abstract
Article 522 ind.1 Criminal procedure code, governing the referral back to court in case of extradition, refers to article 405-408 provisions review applicable to appeal, but this reference is limited to retrial procedure and solutions that can be pronounced by the court.
The review procedure and the retrial procedure after extradition have a distinct finality: if the review involves removal of essential errors to the facts withheld in a final decision, the purpose of referral back to court in case of extradition is to guarantee the right of of extradited person, who was tried and convicted in the absence, to have a fair trial and, mainly, to exercise the right to defence in a new procedural cycle, which implies the possibility for the person to be heard, to question the witnesses or other parts of the process and to administer favorable evidence, both on the facts, as well as circumstantial.

Keywords : extradition, review, trial, judgement, conviction.

Introduction :

The extradition, as a special and incidental criminal procedure institution (concept) that frames within the criminal procedure realm, is carried out among sovereign states, and presuppose that a state also called the requested state, on whose territory there lives a person that has been investigated or prosecuted by the court authorities of a different state, called the demanding state, it extradites such person to the demanding state upon the special application of the same, for the person to be investigated and judged by the court authorities of such state or for such person to be compelled to carry out a sentence or a detention order ruled against him/her by such authorities.

By the extradition obligation undertaken by the contracting parties they undertake to mutually extradite, according to the rules and conditions provided by the Convention, the persons investigated for committing a crime or searched for enforcing a conviction or a safety measure by the law enforcement authorities of the demanding parties, such action being subject to denial if certain requirements are not complied with.

For eliminating all the inconveniences, interdictions and inabilities initially involved by the procedure of judgement by default, that entered in conflict with the provisions of European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, regarding the right to defence, the right to a fair trial, the right to cross examine the prosecution witnesses and the right to be heard before the court in the criminal law trial, the European Convention on Extradition, concluded in Paris, on 13th of December 1957, when a second Additional Protocol has been added, protocol concluded in Strasbourg, on the 17th of March 1978, introducing several provisions on the judgment by default, i.e. judgment in absentia.

According to this Protocol: "When a Contracting Party requests from another Contracting Party the extradition of a person for the purpose of carrying out a sentence or detention order imposed by a decision rendered against him in absentia, the requested Party may refuse to extradite for this purpose if, in its opinion, the proceedings leading to the judgment did not satisfy the minimum rights of defence recognised as due to everyone charged with criminal offence.

However, extradition shall be granted if the requesting Party gives an assurance considered sufficient to guarantee to the person claimed the right to a retrial which safeguards the rights of defence. This decision will authorise the requesting Party either to enforce the judgment in question if the convicted person does not make an opposition or, if he does, to take proceedings against the person extradited.

* Assistant Lecturer, Faculty of Law, Romanian-American University (email: tachesimona@yahoo.com).

When the requested Party informs the person whose extradition has been requested of the judgment rendered against him in absentia, the requesting Party shall not regard this communication as a formal notification for the purposes of the criminal procedure in that State".

The right to a new trial procedure presents itself thus as a condition for granting the extradition, and the communication of the sentence rendered against him/her by the requested country to the convicted person has no effect towards him/her in the criminal procedure o the demanding country, thus it cannot be considered as the start date as of certain procedural deadlines for exercising the ordinary redress procedures (appeal or second appeal past the prescription) or the extraordinary redress procedures against the conviction order.

The above-mentioned provisions of the Strasbourg Protocol make no distinction whether the convicted person evaded the judgment or not, the reason for which the convicted person reached the territory of the requested country making no difference, from this aspect. The right to a new trial procedure is, thus, opened to both those entering the territory of the requested country, unaware of the existence of a trial brought against them, as well as to those who, although aware of the existence of a trial brought against them, have evaded the judgement.

The Convention warranties the right of the person to defend and to cross-examine or to ask for the interrogation of witnesses, which implicitly presupposes the accused presence in front of the court.

However, in the practice of the European Court for Human Rights the judgment in absentia does not represent a violation of the Convention, if the state has taken the necessary reasonable actions for finding and summoning the accused, the person judged by default being entitled to ask for the referral back of the case, except for the case such person has evaded the trial.[1]

The provisions of the European Convention on Extradition, concluded in Paris, including those comprised in the Strasbourg Protocol, have been initially included in the Law no. 296/2001 on extradition, but the provisions of this law have not been completed with correlative provisions in the Code of criminal procedure, stipulating the right of the person convicted person in absentia to a new trial procedure after its extradition; this completion has only been done in 2003, by the text of the article I pct. 221 of the Law no. 281/2003[2], the Code of criminal procedure being amended by the article 522 index 1 called „The case referral back of the persons judged in absentia in case of extradition", and which provides that „in case of requesting the extradition of a person judged and sentenced in absentia, the cause shall be referred back to the first instance, upon the request of the convicted person". Further, the Law no. 302/2004 regarding the international legal cooperation in the criminal matters, as further amended and completed, has reunited in a single legal instrument all forms of international legal cooperation, by including in the article 34 almost integrally the provisions of the article 3 of the Strasbourg Protocol in 1978.

In addition, by the article 69, the above-mentioned law provides that, by the extradition request, the Romanian state shall guarantee – by the Ministry of Justice – the referral back of the case for its judgment in the presence of the extradited person. Moreover, the lawgiver has provided by the art.72 paragraph 2 that "if the extradited has been sentenced in absentia, he/she will be put to trial again, upon request, by complying with the rights provided under the article 34 paragraph (1)".

It is thus noticed that the regulation of the institution of case referral after extradition is provided in both the Code of criminal procedure, as well as in the Law no. 302/2004. Considering the laws sequence in time, the conditions that should be considered on the case referral for a re-judgment of a case subsequent to the extradition are the ones in the more recent legal instrument, i.e. Law no. 302/2004, as further amended and completed.

[1] D.Bogdan, M.Selegean, Fundamental rights and freedoms in the E.H.C.R Jurisprudence, Ed.All Beck, Bucharest, 2005, p.245-247.

[2] Published in Official Romanian Gazette, part I, no.468 from 1 st of July, 2003.

Unlike the provisions of the article 522 paragraph 1 Code of criminal procedure stipulating the cumulative compliance of two conditions, i.e. the person should have been judged and sentenced in absentia, the Law no. 302/2004, by its article 72 paragraph 2 provides solely the condition that the person to have been sentenced in absentia.

The right of the extradited person to benefit of the case referral back can be limited in the cases when the judgment in absentia is the consequence of the voluntary waiver from the accused to the right of being present in court for its defence. Thus, this right of the accused to the opening of the procedure is recognized only if such accused has missed the judgement of his / her cause duet o reasons beyond his/her will, caused by force majeure or other grounded reasons (see the cases Colozza vs. Italy, Demebeikov vs. Bulgaria, Medenica vs. Switzerland, and Sejdovic vs. Italy etc.).

The lack of compliance with these conditions can lead to the conclusion of a faulty procedural conduct of the extradited person, which cannot be invoked in supporting the claim for referring the case back, such conduct being unprotected by the provisions of the article 34 of the Law no. 302/2004 on international judicial cooperation in criminal matters and the Convention on extradition.

However, the summary nature of the provisions of the article 522 index 1 Code of cr. pr. raises enough questions, and numerous debates among the practitioners and generating already a series of legal interpretation problems.

A first issue of interpretation and application is whether by these provisions there has been established a new extraordinary redress procedure or a new ground for review, the references in the paragraph 2 to the procedural provisions on the review judgment, offering some grounds for such interpretation. To this end, there must be considered that in both the case of review as well as in the case of referral back to the court that has passed the decision after extradition, the first court can face the situation of recalling its own decision. Moreover, in both cases the result can be the cancellation of final court decisions.

Both the review, as well as the case referral back after the convicted person extradition renders possible the amendment of the conviction decision, both in the criminal matter and the civil matter. However, although there are obvious similarities regarding the consequences and there are even some common procedural provisions, it cannot be concluded that the case referral back after the convicted person extradition would represent a new case of review, existing major differences between the two procedures.

Paper content :

The review procedure is an extraordinary redress procedure, grounded on reasons related to the substance of the case related to new evidence that might prove the innocence of the convicted person, or by the distortion of truth by false documents or by the existence of final court decisions that cannot be reconciled, while the case re-judgment after the extradition of the convicted person is a new court procedure meant to secure the right to defence of the convicted person. However, the procedure provided by the article 522 index 1 Code of cr. pr., establishes a new redress procedure as to the reference to the provisions of the article 405-408 Code of cr. pr., an extraordinary redress procedure that might recall final court decisions, the exercise of which cannot be denied to the person facing the situation described under the article 522 index 1 paragraph1 Code of cr. pr.

The principle of guaranteeing the right to defence supersedes the res judicata principle applicable to the court decision ruled in absentia against the convicted person, thus the judgement in absentia seems rather a procedure meant to secure the direct service of evidence to the court and the preservation of such evidence until the identification and extradition of the convicted person, the case referral back after the extradition completing the procedure carried out in the absence of the convicted person by the contradictoriality ensured by the right to defence, principle that could not be complied with by a judgment in absentia.

The review can be requested by any of the parties in the trial, within the limits of its standing to bring proceedings, by the husband and by the close relatives of the convicted person, even after its death, as well as by the prosecutor, while the case referral back after the extradition can be exclusively requested by the extradited convicted person, who at its own discretion can accept the conviction or the referral of the case back to the court that has passed the decision.

A major difference is the fact that the review can be requested both in favour as well as against the best interest of the convicted person, while the case referral after the extradition of the convicted person can only be in its favour. Due to this fact, the effects of the case referral after the extradition of the convicted person are more extended than in the review case. If, after the review, the decisions can, in principle, only be completely opposite, i.e. conviction in case of acquittal and acquittal in case of conviction, the case referral back to the court that has passed the decision after the extradition of the convicted person can also have the effect of re-individualizing the sanction, of removing the relapse, of decreasing the quantum of the damage, etc.

Article 522 index 1 Code of criminal procedure regulating the referral back of the case after extradition makes reference to the provisions of the article 405 - 408 Code of criminal procedure, applicable to the extraordinary redress procedure of the review, however this reference is limited to the back referral procedure and to the solutions that can be ruled.

Practically, the review and the referral of the case after extradition have a different finality: if the review entails the removal of some major errors on the facts held in a final decision, the case referral back to the court that has passed the decision in case of extradition has the purpose of guaranteeing the extradited convicted person, judged in absentia, the right to a fair trial and, in principle, the exercise of the right to defence within a new trial, which presupposes its possibility to be heard, to interrogate witnesses or the parties in the trial and to service evidence in his/her defence, both regarding the de facto situation and the circumstantial evidence.

If there is no contrary disposition, the case referral back to the instance in case o extradition does not limit to the removal of an essential error on the facts, but it can also have effects on the individualization of the punishment and, therefore, even if the list of evidence submitted on the case referral confirms the de facto situation and the guilt of the accused, the request of the same can be accepted exclusively on the individualization of the punishment, the consequence of which being the ruling of the new decision, if the evidence presented as circumstantial evidence lead the instance appointed for judging the case again to a different conclusion on the individualization than the one established in the first trial.

Even if the article 522 index 1 Code of criminal procedure makes reference to the legal provisions applicable in the matter of review, this reference is limited to the case referral procedure and to the court decisions that can be ruled at the end of it.

In other words, although they are partly identical, the review and the case referral back to court in case of extradition have a distinct finality: if the review entails the removal of some major errors on the facts held in a final decision (mainly, the conviction of an innocent person or the ungrounded acquittal), the case referral back to the court that has passed the decision in case of extradition has the purpose of guaranteeing the extradited convicted person, judged in absentia, the right to a fair trial and, in principle, the exercise of the right to defence within a new trial.[3]

If there is no contrary disposition, the case referral back to the instance in case o extradition does not limit to the removal of an essential error on the facts, consisting in a possible conviction of an innocent person, but it can also have effects on the individualization of the punishment, if the list of evidence submitted on the case referral shall lead to a different conclusion than the one established for the same case during the first trial.

[3] H.C.C.J, penal decision no.560 from 17 th of February, 2009.

Besides the differences between the two institutions, this solution is the obvious choice, considering the situation of the extradited person, that is to be convicted in absentia, which presumes the fact that it had no possibility to submit evidence for his/her defence, both from the guilt point of view, as well as from the aspect of the applicable sanction.

This means that, even if the de facto situation and the guilt of the accused shall remain unchanged due to the list of evidence submitted on the referral of the case back to the court, the request of the accused shall be admitted exclusively on the individualization of the punishment (which might result in ruling a new decision), if the evidence submitted as circumstantial evidence lead the court appointed for judging the case again to a different conclusion regarding the sanction to be applied.

For the reasons presented above, the regulation of the procedure of case referral in case of extradition by the references to the court decision review procedure are insufficient and meant to generate doubts and interpretations of the laws, therefore a more complex regulation of such procedure is required, as the problems raised by the legislative instruments above quoted, of the case referral in case of extradition, cannot be have a unitary settlement by reference to the provisions of the article 405 – 408 C. c.pr.

Another aspect that raises numerous interpretations in the legal practice is related to the absence of the convicted person during the case judgment, as long as the referral procedure is opened solely upon the request person judged and convicted in absentia, without specifying however, whether the absence of the convicted person is relevant for all the procedural stages or only in the trial court.

Thus, is shapes the first situation that provides the fact that the accused did not participate either to the trial judgment, or to the other redress actions, being of no importance whether the accused has evaded or not from the case judgment or had no knowledge of that. In this case, the access to the procedure of case referral back to the court after extradition cannot be challenged.

A different situation might be that in which the accused has participated to the judgment of the case in the first instance and has exercised the right to defence, and later he/she evaded the judgment in appeal and second appeal, if such redress procedures have been exercised by the prosecutor. In these cases, too, the access of the extradited convicted person to a new judgment could not be denied, as this procedure is precisely meant to provide the due exercise of the right to defence, such right presupposing even the possibility to challenge the grounds for appeal or second appeal lodged by the prosecutor. The practice of the courts considers the priority of the principle of guaranteeing the right to defence as to the principle of res judicata related to the sentence ruled in the absence of the convicted person, by showing that the judgement in absentia seems rather a procedure meant to assure the direct service of evidence to the court and the preservation of the same as to the identification and extradition of the convicted person, such procedure being solely requested by the extradited convicted person and solely in its best interest.

If, in case of review procedure the court is asked to rule on new evidence, in case of case referral back to the court after the extradition, the reason for referring the case back to the court consists in the need to establish the procedural framework for exercising the right to defence, which would require the resuming of the judgment from that stage of the trial where such right could not be exercised.

Another possible situation would be the existence of an acquittal decision for the accused by the trial court and the absence of the accused from the case appeal, when, due to the reassessment of the evidence, the court rules a verdict that convicts the accused. Moreover, there is a similar case when the accused is acquitted by the first instance, the sentence remains the same in the appeal procedure, but the accused that fails to participate to the second appeal procedure, is convicted person by the second appeal court due to the second appeal lodged by the prosecutor. For the reasons shown above, the access of the convicted person to a new trial procedure cannot be denied.

The situation is identical also when the conviction occurs during an extraordinary redress procedure (review unfavourable to the acquitted), if the judgment of the case has been carried out in the absence of the convicted person.

If the accused participated to the judgment of the case in the first instance and had the possibility to exercise the right to defence, and subsequently, after being convicted, lodged an appeal against the court decision, however he/she failed to present to the court for supporting can no longer argument in the same manner his / her access to a new trial.

Considering the fact that the right of the accused to be present in the court is recognized in the International pact on the civil and political rights and the article 6 paragraph 3 from the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms recognizes for the accused „the right to defend himself" and „the right to interrogate witnesses", the European Court of Human Rights has established that the accused presence is basically obligatory when judging the case. The Court constantly states that in the case of appeal or second appeal procedure article 6 of the Convention applies less strictly, even admitting the regularity of the procedure where the hearings take place in the absence of the accused (the Ekbatani Decision). Exceptions from the rule according to which the accused must be present when the compliance with such condition would result in the unjustified delay of the procedure, especially that this situation has been checked and ascertained and if the accused is faulty missing from the court (the Colozza and Rubinat Decision).

For securing the access to a new trial for the extradited convicted person, presupposing the existence of final criminal decisions, the court referred for settling such request having to examine whether the request could be qualified as an over lapsed appeal or second appeal, or if there are reasons for acting as a relief of the defendant from the effects of the expiry of the time for appeal or second appeal, in which case the request shall be removed and no longer pending with the court and sent to the court competent for judging these redress procedures.

Regarding the possibility of admitting the request for case referral in case of extradition of a convicted person that has been judged in absentia but has been represented by a chosen lawyer, we consider that the solution that should be ruled by the court should be to admit the application, as the legal request for judgment in absentia is complied with, as the law makes no distinction for the situation in which, being absent, the accused benefited of legal representation or not, and the interpretation according to which, by the presence of his / her lawyer, there has been respected the right to defence of the convicted person, would be an addition to the law, which is unacceptable.

Moreover, in the case of an appointed lawyer, when the person convicted was absent from the judgement, the court should admit the request for referring the case back to the court after the extradition because, if in the above-illustrated example the court might find the accused absence as an interpretation of failure to comply with the right to defence – as long as the one absent from the court had however a chosen lawyer (opinion that is not shared by the author, as also mentioned above) – in the case of an appointed lawyers, the initial trial procedure has been carried out with a formal defence.

The request for case referral back to the court after the extradition of the convicted person is de lege lata falling always under the jurisdiction of the first court. The jurisdiction is similar to the one established in the case of review procedure, when, with the exception of existing decisions that cannot be reconciled, it is still the first instance that is the competent one for settling the review application (article 401 Code of criminal procedure). We consider that this provision should be reformulated, in the sense that the application should be referred to that court that ruled the sentence of conviction, as the need to take the case for a new judgment in front of the court of first instance or of appeal, when the decisions of such courts acquitted the accused, seems completely unjustified.

Still related to the jurisdiction of the first court there can be also raised the question whether the judge participating to the judgment of the case on the merits can judge again the same case based on the request for case referral back after extradition, or is incompatible according to the article 47 paragraph 2 Code of criminal procedure, as such judge has previously expressed his / her opinion on the decision that might be ruled in the case.

The judgment of the review request can be performed by the same panel of judges, as there is no incompatibility, the judge being asked to rule over new evidence that were unknown during the first judgement, therefore, for similar reasons, there is no incompatibility for the same panel of judges to judge the case after extradition, as the panel directly took note of the evidence serviced during the first trial and the presumption of impartiality in judging the case again could not be affected, as long as it is summoned to rule based on the new statements of defence formulated by the convicted person, defences based on evidence unknown during the first trial.[4]

In the E.C.H.R. practice, there has been stated that the presumption of impartiality of the court also subsists if, after quashing and referring the case back to court, the court vested again with the judgment of the case substance has the same structure as the one that ruled the quashed decision, situation that is totally forbidden by the Romanian criminal procedure (article 47 paragraph 1 Code of criminal procedure). Moreover, the impartiality of the court cannot be doubted in a procedure based on new evidence. We consider that there is no case of incompatibility either the case in which the convicted person understands to benefit of the provisions of the article 320 index 1 Code of criminal procedure related to the procedure of pleading guilty, by which the convicted person asks the court to rule based on the evidence serviced during the stage of criminal investigation.

As a gap of law, the provisions of the article 522 index 1 Code of criminal procedure do not establish a term for the convicted person to ask the referral of the case back to the court, such gap being able to generate procedural abuses, on one hand, and, on the other hand, the res judicata authority regarding the decision of conviction cannot be suspended for the whole period of sanction execution. Therefore, there should be established a term within which the convicted person can request such a procedure; when establishing such term there should be considered the fact that the communication of the sentence by the requested state can have no effect on the procedure applied in the demanding state.

We consider that such a term could be calculated from the moment the convicted person that was extradited is delivered to the imprisonment camp, on which occasion he/she could be informed, in the presence of a chosen or appointed lawyer, on the right to ask the case referral back to court, to this end drafting a protocol that would record the convicted person option, existing thus, enough guarantees that the exercise or waiver to such exercise of this right are the result of an informed decision.

The term for exercising the right to case referral back to court should be sufficient for the convicted person and for the defendant to study the file and to prepare the defence, considering that, in principle, we start from the assumption that the whole trial would have been carried out in the absence of the accused.

As far as the admission in principle is concerned, these provisions involve an option of adapting the procedural provisions on review to the procedure of case referral back to court after extradition, operation that presents its own difficulties.

According to the article 405 paragraph 1 Code of criminal procedure, the case referral to the court after the admission in principle of the review application is done according to the rules of criminal procedure on the judgment by the first instance. The provisions of the article 522 index 1 Code of criminal procedure, regarding the case referral back to court after the convict extradition make no reference to the admission in principle of the review application, provided by the article 403 Code of criminal procedure

The due application of the provisions of the article 405 paragraph 1 Code of criminal procedure to the procedure of case referral back to court after the extradition means however the existence of an admission in principle of the referral request, although the lawmaker made no reference to the provisions of the article 403 Code of criminal procedure, neither does it distinctly and actually regulate the stage of admission in principle, the provisions of the article 405 paragraph 1 Code of criminal procedure refers to the procedure subsequent to the admission in principle of the application.

[4] D.V.Mihaiescu, V.Ramureanu, The extraordinary redress procedures in criminal trial, Scientific Ed., Bucharest, 1970, p.275.

In this stage, the judge shall examine whether the conviction decision is final or the request for case referral back to the court can be qualified as an appeal or second appeal over lapsed, or whether there are reasons for a relief of the defendant from the effects of the expiry of the time, in which case the judge shall send the request to the competent court.[5]

Moreover, the court must render certain prior investigations regarding the object of this procedure, and in particular whether the decision in the case is final, regarding the purpose of the extradition of the convicted person – i.e. if it has been carried out for executing the sentence or based on a temporary arrest warrant, which results in the verification of the trial jurisdiction and ordering accordingly -, regarding the manner the initial trial has been carried out, that is whether the judgment has been carried out in the absence of the convicted person or, on the contrary, the convicted person has been present to the judgment of the case, in which case it shall dismiss as inadmissible the case referral request.

If the court finds that the extradition has been done based on a temporary arrest warrant, the request shall be sent to the court settling the case that involves the accused, considering the principle of extradition speciality.

By admitting in principle the request for case referral back to the court, the court shall also establish the limits for such action, proceeding obligatory to the hearing of the convicted person, further examining the evidence submitted by the convicted person, and the new evidence requested by the convicted person shall be analyzed in the light of their pertinent and conclusive nature of the same, the court ruling on all the requested evidence, in the sense of either admitting it, fully or partially, or reasoning the dismissal of those considered not to be pertinent and conclusive, or, if it deems necessary, it shall resubmit the evidence presented during the first trial.

The court has the obligation to proceed to the hearing of the convicted person, hearing during which the court, in case of the convict judged in absentia, would have the opportunity to take note of the convicted person version of the events unfolding or of his/her option on the procedure of pleading guilty, in accordance with the provisions of the article 320 index 1 of the Code of criminal procedure.

In no case there shall be denied the convicted person requests to ask questions to the other accused persons, as well as to the prosecution witnesses, this right being guaranteed by the provisions of the article 6 of the Convention; as to other new evidence requested by the convicted person, the court shall rule depending on the pertinent and conclusive nature of such evidence.

The admission in principle of the request for case referral back to court has no effect on the conviction decision. Subsequent to case referral back to court, after submitting the list of evidence requested by the accused, if the court finds that it has no influence on the decision ruled in the first trial, shall dismiss the request for referral back to court and shall maintain the ruled decisions. This solution would result from the due application of the provisions of the article 406 paragraph 4 of the Code of criminal procedure.

If, from the evidence presented it results that the decision passed in the first trial is ungrounded or illegal, the court, after judging the case again, annuls the decisions of the first instance, even if the conviction decision has been ruled by the court of appeal or the court of second appeal, and rules a new decision according to the provisions of the article 345 – 353 Code of criminal procedure.

The court shall be able to rule, by reference to all the evidence, to pass any of the solutions provided by the article 345 Code of criminal procedure, i.e. the conviction, the acquittal or the termination of the criminal trial, as resulting from the due application of the provisions of the article 406 Code of criminal procedure. By convicting the accused, the court shall not, however, be able to create a less favourable situation than the one already created by the first conviction. The case referral back to the court is an exclusive option of the convicted person, therefore the principle non reformatio in peius is also applicable in the procedure of case referral after the extradition of the convicted person.

[5] Viorel Pasca, The referral back of a case in case of extradition, The Right Review no.2/2007.

In the case referral back to the court, the court can proceed to a re-individualization of the sanction, but only in the sense of decreasing it, as fast as such decrease is allowed based on the evidence presented during the case referral back to court (i.e. mitigating circumstances, the change of legal framing to a less serious crime, the adoption of a more favourable law, etc.).

The case referral back to the court upon the request of the convicted person that has been extradited can have an extensive effect on the case of other convicted persons that would not have been able to use this procedure. Thus, the acquittal of the convicted person for no illegal deed, the lack of substantiating elements of the crime or the existence of a cause that removed the criminal nature of the deed with in rem effects (i.e. self defence, state of necessity, fortuitous case), is also reflected upon the other convicted persons in the case. There shall have the same extensive effect the real mitigating circumstances (the extension of the self defence or of the state of necessity).

The extensive effect of the case referral back to the court after extradition of the convicted person results from the due application of the provisions of the article 406 paragraph 2 of the Code of criminal procedure that make reference to the extensive effect of appeal (article 373 of the Code of criminal procedure).

If, after the case referral back to court, the extradited convicted person is acquitted, the referral court shall order the return of all the seized assets and of the legal expenses if paid or enforced against the convicted person (article 406 paragraph 3 Code of criminal procedure).

The case referral back to court has effect also on the civil part of the criminal trial, the referral court being able to exempt the convicted person from de payment of the civil compensations, or to reduce the quantum of such compensations as far as the need to adopt such a solution results from the evidence presented.

The provisions of the article 522 index 1 Code of criminal procedure do not have an imperative nature, leaving the court to assess whether the judgment should be rendered again, thus: „in case it is requested the extradition of a person judged and convicted in absentia, the case can be referred back to the court that was the first court of instance, upon the request of the convicted person".

From the analysis of the legal text it results that for proceeding to the case referral back to the court there are certain conditions that must be complied with: to be in the case of extradition to Romania of a convicted person, for the execution of a prison penalty, applied by a national court, i.e., the person whose extradition has been requested by the Romanian state must have been judged and convicted in absentia. As for the second request, the text of law requires the compliance of an essential condition, i.e. the person must have been judged and convicted in absentia, even in this situation, resulting that the case referral back to court must be seriously grounded by essential violations of the convicted persons rights, the new procedure having the purpose of safeguarding the rights to defence of such person, who, judged and convicted in absentia, was in no position to defend herself.

Therefore, the competent court opts for the admission or dismissal of the request for case referral after extradition depending on the need to go again through the stages of the trial for ensuring the compliance with the extradited person's right to a fair trial and to defence.

However, even if the article 522 index 1 Code of criminal procedure does not impose on the Romanian courts the obligation to retrial the case when by the extradition decision this is expressly stipulated, as it is a conditioned extradition according to the article 73 of the Law no. 302/2004 on the international cooperation in criminal matter, the case referral procedure becomes obligatory for the Romanian court.

Moreover, the procedure of case referral of the extradited person that has been convicted in absentia is also provided under the article 72 paragraph 2 of the Law 302/2004 that makes reference to the provisions of the article 34 of this legislative instrument that stipulates that the extradition shall be granted if the demanding state, i.e. the Romanian one, provides sufficient proofs to the requested state of guaranteeing the person to be extradited the right to a new trial securing the right to defence of such person. The fundamental right resulting from the above-mentioned norms is closely related to the provisions of the art.6 of the E.C.H.R., any interference in the right to benefit of the case referral back to court according to the article 522 index 1 Code of criminal procedure being analysed in this context.

The legal text shown above has the purpose of harmonizing the Romanian law with the international regulations, especially for the compliance with the provisions of the article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights providing, as an implicit guarantee for the application of the procedure of a fair trial, the right of the convicted to be present in front of the court. As the Court constantly held in its case law, the possibility of the accused to take part to the trial, results from the object and the purpose of the provisions of the article 6 of the Convention, as the letters c), d) and e) of the paragraph 3 of the same article recognize the right of „any accused" „to defend himself", „ to examine or have examined witnesses", „ to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court", all these actions being unconceivable in its absence. The presence of an accused in the court is of at most importance considering both its right to be listened, as well as the need to control the accuracy of his/her allegations, to confront it with the ones of the victims, if the case, whose interests should be protected, as well as with the witnesses' statements.

By analyzing the case law of the European Court of Human Rights there can be established the content of the notion „judgment in absentia", which includes solely the situations in which a person has been sent to trial and convicted without being heard by an independent, impartial court established by law, did not have the possibility to defend herself / himself in the court, thus as to analyze the solidity of the deeds he / she is accused of (the case Constantinescu vs. Romania). Such a conviction in absentia of a person shall however meet all the requirements of the article 6 of the Convention if from all the details of the case it results that the accused, by its own will and beyond doubt, waived the right to be heard and the right to defend himself in the court (see the case Mihaies vs. France etc.). In the same time, the right to stand in court in person is not an absolute right, therefore during the redress procedures it can be subject to certain limitations, such as the case when the second appeal regards only the applicable law and not the actual deeds, limitations allowed as far as during the judgment of the case on the merits the accused has benefited of such right to stand in court in person (see the case Ekbatani vs. Sweeden).

Therefore, a person can claim she / he has been judged and convicted in absentia when the court judging the case has ordered her/his conviction, regardless of the sanction and of the enforcement means, without proceeding to the hearing of such person, without such person to have knowledge of the judiciary procedure carried out against her/him, without being defended by a law specialist, without enjoying the right to lodge statements of defence, to counter argue the evidence presented by the prosecution, to participate to the trial, to the witnesses' cross-examinations etc. More precisely, a person is judged and convicted in absentia, as provided also by the article 34 of the Law no. 302/2004, amended, when the trial procedure carried out with him/her as the accused ignored the right to defence recognized to any person accused of committing a crime, or, in a more wide approach, the right to a fair trial.

From the interpretation of the provisions of the article 34 paragraph 1 of the Law no. 302/2004, to which the provisions of the article 72 paragraph 2 of the same law make reference to, it results that the Romanian law, as requested state, can deny the extradition when the person has been judged in absentia and the judgment failed to comply with the right to defence; however, it can grant extradition, if the demanding state guarantees the extradited person the right to have the case judged again, this time with the compliance of the rights to defence. The reference that the text of the article 72 paragraph 2 of the Law no. 302/2004 makes to the provisions of the article 34 paragraph 1 of the same law must be interpreted in the sense that, based on the reciprocity principle in the matter of international cooperation, Romania, if it is a demanding state, must offer the same guarantees and insurances as the ones that Romania can demand when it is a requested state.

Moreover, the article 69 of the Law no. 302/2004 amended and republished, called the referral back of the case of the extradition, provides that, the Ministry of Justice is the one guaranteeing the case referral back to court in the presence of the extradited person, according to article 34 paragraph 1.

Therefore, this article provides the obligation of the Ministry of Justice to guarantee to the requested state the fact that the person requested for extradition shall benefit of a new judgment, if the initial judgement was rendered in absentia.

In conclusion, the above-mentioned texts of laws illustrate the will of the Romanian legislator to establish, as a guarantee granted to the requested states, the possibility that any extradited person to Romania, that has been convicted in absentia, to benefit upon request of the case referral back to court, thus as to comply with such person's right to defence.

In the case Colozzo versus Italy from 12th of February 1985, E.C.H.R. established that, although the accused has the right to participate to hearings, according to article 6 of the Convention, this right is not absolute, but when the national laws allow the judgment in absentia, the convicted person must have access to a new procedure regulating in the accusations against him / her, the contracting states having a wider liberty in choosing the necessary means for this purpose. As illustrated above, E.C.H.R. makes no distinction on whether the person convicted in absentia was or was not extradited, but, it denies the right to a new procedure to those evading the trial.[6]

Conclusions

We have shown that, according to the Strasbourg Protocol, to the Convention on extradition adopted in Paris, there has been introduced in the procedure of extradition the requirement according to which the requested state guarantees the right to a new trial to the extradited convicted person. The procedure regulation however, is rested with the national legislator.

The possibility of exercising the right to a new trial granted solely to the extradited convicted person creates an unequal treatment, which might result in the violation of the constitutional principle of equality in front of the law (article 16 of the Romanian Constitution), as well as of the provisions of the article 6 of the Convention as to the persons convicted in absentia, but who remain in the country and who are not extradited, who shall have no access to this procedure. If we consider the realities of the Romanian justice that show that most of the extradited convicted persons evaded the criminal investigation and criminal trial, some of them being the authors of crimes that have been widely covered by the media, the unfairness of the procedure seems even more obvious. To this end, there must be a distinct regulation on this special procedure included in a section regarding the judgment in absentia, the E.C.H.R. practice pointing out the same solution.

References

- Ion Neagu, Tratat de procedura penala, Partea speciala (Treatise on Criminal Procedure. Special part), Vol.II, Bucharest, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2010.
- S.Bouchard, Procedure par contumace et par defaut au regard de l'article 6-1 Conv.E.D.H.G. in „Revue de science criminelle et de droit penal compare'', 2003, 517.

[6] „Criminal science review and comparative criminal law'', Sirey, Paris, 1985,p.267.

- D.Bogdan, M.Selegean, Drepturi si libertati fundamentale in jurisprudenta Curtii Europene a Drepturilor Omului, (Fundamental rights and freedoms in the E.H.C.R Jurisprudence), Ed.All Beck, Bucharest, p.245-247. 4. F. Streteanu, Tratat de drept penal. Partea generala (Treatise on Criminal Law. General part), vol. I, C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008, 284.
- Viorel Pasca, Rejudecarea cauzei dupa extradarea condamnatului (The referral back of a case in case of extradition), Revista Dreptul nr.2/2007 (The Right Review no.2/2007), 168-77.
- D.V.Mihaiescu, V.Ramureanu, Caile extraordinare de atac in procesul penal (The extraordinary redress procedures in criminal trial), Ed.Stiintifica, Bucuresti (Scientific Ed., Bucharest), 1970, 275.
- H.C.C.J, penal decision no.560 from 17 th of February, 2009, www.scj.ro.
- Revue de science criminelle et de droit penal compare'', Sirey, Paris, 1985, 627.
- Curtea de Apel Bucuresti, decizia penala nr.30/R/07.01.2010, (Bucharest Court of Appeal, criminal decision no.30/R, January 7, 2010) www.jurisprudenta.org.
- Curtea de Apel Constanta, decizia penala nr.45/17.04.2008, (Constanta Court of Appeal, criminal decision no.45, April 17, 2008), www.jurisprudenta.org.
- Curtea de Apel Galati, decizia penala nr.763/R/15.12.2008 (Galati Court of Appeal, criminal decision no.763/R, December 15, 2008), www.jurisprudenta.org.
- Curtea de Apel Ploiesti, decizia penala nr.45/16.01.2008 (Ploiesti Court of Appeal, criminal decision no.45, January 16, 2008), www.jurisprudenta.org.
- Curtea de Apel Ploiesti, decizia penala nr.109/25.01.2008 (Ploiesti Court of Appeal, criminal decision no.109, January 25, 2008), www.jurisprudenta.org.
- M. Udroiu, Explicatii preliminare ale Legii nr. 202/2010 privind unele masuri pentru accelerarea solutionarii proceselor in domeniul penal (Preliminary explanations on the Law no. 202/2010 on certain measures for speeding up the criminal law trails),[3] The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Joint Sections, Decision no. 1/2006, published in the Official Monitor of Romania, part I, no. 291 on March 31st 2006.[4] M. Udroiu, op. cit.

THE ORGANIZATION OF JURISDICTION FROM A EUROPEAN UNION PERSPECTIVE

MIHAELA AGHENIȚEI[*]

Abstract
Nowadays, universal jurisdiction is the favorite technique used to prevent impunity for international crimes and it is one of the most effective methods to deter and prevent international crimes by increasing the like hood of prosecution and punishment of its preparators. In regard to the defendant's rights, the European Union states consider applicable all the rights that are necessary to assure that the trial is equitable and expeditious. There is no exception to the right to a fair trial. So, a defendant who is being prosecuted on the basis of the universality principle can rely on all the procedural rights provided for the Convention on Human Rights and the domestic code of criminal procedure without any restrictions. In Germany, the Federal Constitutional Court, in a case concerning genocide committed abroad, declared expressly that no special criminal proceedings must be provided for specific crimes.

Keywords: "universal jurisdiction", "human rights", "European Union", "criminal procedure"

Introduction

According to the principle of mandatory prosecution who prevails in many countries such Belgium, Croatia, Hungary, Spain, Sweden and Turkey, the criminal prosecution authorities are obliged to initiate the measures necessary for prosecution when they gain knowledge or form a suspicion of the commission of a criminal offence.

This means that they have no discretion as to whether to initiate criminal proceedings; they are deluged to take the necessary investigative measures. No particular national rules are set up with regard to the exercise of prosecutorial discretion as far as crimes are concerned that are subject to universal jurisdiction. In Belgium the Public Prosecutor (procureur federal) has a duty to ask preliminary judge to investigate, if a complaint is submitted, with exception.

In contrast, the principle of discretionary prosecution allows prosecuting authorities to refrain from prosecution in certain cases. Regarding the prosecution of extraterritorial crimes, some countries recognize specifically the principle of discretionary prosecution.

The application of a pure universal jurisdiction can cause a lot of problems. For example, due to the lack of restrictions, the prosecution of crimes subject to universal jurisdiction can create political problems. Also, the risk of overstretching national investigative resources exists in those cases in witch it appears to be very unlikely that a criminal trial over be completed.[1]

The principle of discretionary prosecution can solve some of these problems, because the prosecutor can refrain from prosecutor, taking into account the political ramifications of the case or the case or the existence of "prima facie" evidence.

Concerning the principle of universal jurisdiction, a distinction can be made between two systems.

First, the prosecution of crimes committed abroad in general depends on the approved of the Prosecutor General, exercising his discretion, such in Croatia and Finland. In Hungary, the Attorney [*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., „Constantin Brâncoveanu" University, Pitesti, Braila district (email: m_aghenitei@yahoo.com).

[1] Florian Jessberger, National Reports (CD Rom annexe), at XVIII-th International Congress of Penal Law (Chine.-2007).

General has the right to exercise discretionary power in deciding whether or not to initiate proceedings based on universal jurisdiction.

In some countries there are guidelines for the prosecutor on how to make use of his discretion. For example, in Finland, the prosecution order procedure is needed, because it enables a case-by-case consideration of whether prosecution in Finland is appropriate. The consideration must take into account factors such as the sovereignty of other states and possible conflicts of multiple jurisdictions. In practice, the lack of necessary evidence might prevent prosecution.[2] In Croatia, concerning crimes against international war and humanitarian law, the Chief state Prosecutor may deport from the "ne bis in idem" principle if he believes that proceedings in another state were concluded contrary to internationally recognized standards of a fair trial.

In the Netherland, the general rule is that the Public Prosecutor may decide not to prosecute of this in the general interest. No particular national rules are set with regard to the exercise of prosecutorial discretion as far as crimes are concerned that are subject of universal jurisdiction. Notwithstanding there is a Regulation on the Consideration of Accusations With Regard to Crimes Included in the International Crimes Act 2003 wich deals with a significative question. The Public Prosecutor must consider whether there is a reasonable case in order to initiate further investigations. So, reference is made to the existence of "prima facie" evidence. Moreover, the accusation must be sufficiently specified as for as time and place are concerned. Subsequently, the Public Prosecutor has to weigh all the facts and circumstances in order to establish whether there is a reasonable prospect of successful investigations and subsequent criminal proceedings within a reasonable time. The Public Prosecutor has to take into account: 1)when were the alleged acts commited; 2) what are the chances that witnesses will be willing to be present in court in the Netherlands; 3)will it be possible to gather sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction; 4) will other states be able and willing to render assistance if requested.

The second, in Germany, the scope of prosecutorial discretion varies depending on whether universal jurisdiction is exercised under international crimes or under treaty-based crimes.

Regarding treaty-based crime, the public prosecutor can exercise his or her wide discretion and refrain from prosecution.

With regard to the scope of universal jurisdiction over international crimes such genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes committed abroad, investigation and prosecution are mandatory. But the law provides for discretion whether to prosecute genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes committed abroad only if a foreigner who is accused of the crime is not present on German territory and he is not expected to enter German territory or a German who is accused of the crime is not present on German territory, his entry into Germany is not expected and if the offence is being prosecuted before on international court of the state on whose territory the offence was committed or whose national was harmed by the offence.

The law contains some guidelines for the prosecutor. According to these, the prosecutor is encouraged to refrain from using his power to prosecute if the following conditions are fulfilled: a) a German is not involved in the crime, either as preparator or as victim; b) the offence is being prosecuted by a primarily responsible international or foreign jurisdiction ; c)the accused is not present on German territory and he is not expected to enter the country or his transfer or extradition to a primarily responsible international is permissible and intended.

It is interesting that even if the conditions are met, and prosecution is discretionary, prosecution and trial remain permissible.

The decision to refrain from or to terminate investigations or proceedings is the exclusive responsabillity of the Federal Attorney General. The prosecutor can withdraw the charges at any stage of the proceedings, even if charges have already been preferred. The Federal Attorney General has full discretionary power.

[2] Isidoro Blanco Cordero, Universal Jurisdiction-General report-International Rewiew of Penal Law (vol. 79), p. 68-69.

In some countries, such Germany and Belgium, concerning the prosecutor's discretionary decision, it is final and it is not subject to appeal. In Belgium, the arbitral Court has repealed the law, because the decision not to prosecute in some cases is not taken by a judge. Neverthless , in the Netherlands, if the Public Prosecutor decides not to initiate criminal proceedings, an interested party can file a complaint against this decision.

Regarding the competence, there is no concentration of prosecutorial or adjudicative competencies concerning the exercise of universal jurisdiction. In Croatia, crimes against values protected by international law must be judged by panels of the competent court, composed of three judges distinguished by their experience in the most complex cases. Therefore, all courts of the states are able to exercise universal jurisdiction, such in Japan.

However, regarding the competence of courts rationae materiae concerning crimes subject to universal jurisdiction, in some countries there is a specific judicial organ. For example, in Japan the judicial organ competent to exercise universal jurisdiction is the Audiencia National, in Belgium, the Cour d'assises with a popular jury is competent to prosecute the graves crimes. In the Netherlands, with regards to international crimes, the District Court at The Hague has been declared exclusively competent. In Germany, as regards international crimes, special rules applies: the competence to prosecute international crimes is concentrated; exclusive competence lies with the Federal Attorney General and the Higher Regional Court (Oberlandesgericht) in whose district the provincial government is situated .

Regarding all other crimes over which universal jurisdiction has been established exclusively that no court has been appointed exclussively. The competent court therefore has to be determined according to the general principles of competence as are set out in the Code of Criminal Procedure, such in the Netherlands, Germany, Finland, Hungary and Turkey. In Netherlands, the Code of Criminal Procedure states some rules: the Court in which district the alleged offender is present is competent; the Amsterdam District Court is also competent if the crime has been committed at sea and again, the Amsterdam District Court if no other Court has been declared competent.

In Germany, if a local venue cannot be established in any domestic court, the Federal High Court decides which court shall be competent. In Finland, according to the Criminal Procedure Act, the competent court for an offence committed outside Finland is the court of the place where the person to be charged lines, is resident or is found.

In Sweden, due to the fact that are specialist prosecutors chambers for international crimes, in practice the prosecution will be usually concentrated in only certain district courts, in particular the Stockholm district court.

Concerning international arrest warrants or detention requests for crimes subject to universal jurisdiction, can be distinguished three systems.

First, in some countries (Finland, Croatia, Germany, Hungary, Romania, Sweden) no particularities need to be taken into consideration concerning crimes over which universal jurisdiction has been established. So, in Croatia only the court before which criminal proceedings are pending can issue on international arrest warrant.

Second, in other countries the institution competent to issue on international arrest warrant depends on the crime concerned. In the Netherlands, the National Prosecutor 's Office, located in Rotterdam, has been declared exclusively competent concerning international crimes.

So, only the Public Prosecutor located at this office may issue on international arrest warrant with regard to war crimes, genocide, crimes against humanity and torture. Regarding the other crimes subject to universal jurisdiction, any Public Prosecutor can issue on international arrest warrant as far as those crimes are concerned.

Third, if the presence in the territory of the European Union state is necessary to initiate criminal proceedings, the competent court cannot issue on international arrest warrant against perpetrators of the crimes residing abroad (for example, in Croatia, in cases of international crimes subjects to universal jurisdiction).

In the context of the European Union, extradition between European Union members states has been replaced by another instrument: the surrender of a requested person which can be arderd by an European Arrest Warrant and is prescribed by the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between member states.[3]

Because of the existence of the European Arrest Warrant, the transmission of arrest warrants and inprisonement requests between the European Union States became easier and faster.

References:

- Bassouini, M. C., 2001, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes: Historical Perspectives and Contemporary Practice, Virginia Journal of International Law, vol. 421, p. 81-182;
- Council Framework Decision of 13June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between member states (2002/584/IHA,OJ ECL 190 of 13 June 2002, 1
- De La Cuesta, J. L., 2006, Résolutions de Congrès de l'Association International de Droit Pénal (1926-2004), Revue Internationale De Droit Pénal;
- Florian Jessberger, National Reports (CD Rom annexe), at XVIII-th International Congress of Penal Law (Chine-2007)
- George P. Fletcher, Against Universal Jurisdiction, "Journal of International Criminal Justice 2003, p. 580-584, 58;
- Isidoro Blanco Cordero, Universal Jurisdiction-General report-"International Review of Penal Law" (vol. 79), p. 68-69.
- Jessberger F., 2008, Revue Internationale De Droit Pénal, vol. 79, p. 63;
- Muciorama Maja,2008,Report," Revue Internationale De Droit Pénal", rd. 79, p. 61-62 (Spain);
- Neue Juristische Wochenschrift, 2001, p. 1848;
- Revue Internationale De Droit Pénal, 1933, rd. 10, p. 156-161 (French).
- Revue Internationale De Droit Pénal, 1948, rd. 19, p. 418-421 (English)
- Revue Internationale De Droit Pénal, 2008, Vol. 79, p. 60-61.
- The United States Constitution, article 1, section 8, clause 10
- Van Elst, R., Van der Wilt, H., 2008, Netherlands, International Review of Penal Law, vol. 79, p. 62.

[3] Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between member states (2002/584/IHA, OJ ECL 190 of 13 June 2002, 1).

THE CONCLUSION OF THE CONTRACT FROM THE PERSPECTIVE OF THE NEW CIVIL CODE

STANCIU D. CĂRPENARU*

Abstract
The New Civil Code regulates in large the general rules regarding the conclusion of the contract. These rules regard the formation of the contract, between parties that are either present or at a distance.
The rules in question have as foundation the classical principles regarding the formation of the contract and also reflect the realities of the modern society.

Keywords: offer to contract, offer's acceptance, offer's withdrawal, acceptance withdrawal, offer's ineffectiveness, closing of the contract

1. Having as basis the dogma of will autonomy, The Romanian Civil Code of 1864 did not regulate formation of contract. Such loophole was partially covered, by The Commercial Code of 1887, which, in art. 35-39, regulated the conclusion of contract "between remote persons".

Taking into consideration this reality, the new Civil Code comprehensively regulated the general rules of form and contract (art. 1182-1203). These rules regard the conclusion of contract both between present persons and between absent ones.

The rules established by The Civil Code rely on the classic principles of contract conclusion, yet considering also the realities of modern society.

2. The contract is the will agreement between two or more persons intending to constitute, modify or terminate a legal relation (art. 1166 of The Civil Code).

Any natural or legal person may freely manifest their will, according to their interests, it being possible for them to conclude any contract, with any partner and having the contents the parties have agreed on, within the limits imposed by the law, public order and good customs.

Concluding the contract means, in essence, reaching the parties' will agreement on the contractual clauses.

The contract is concluded by the parties' simple will agreement, if the law does not impose a certain formality for its valid conclusion, such as in the case of real and solemn contracts.

Will agreement, which signifies the conclusion of the contract, is achieved by the concordant match of an offer to contract with the acceptance of such offer[1]. To this end, pursuant to art. 1182 of The Civil Code, the contract shall be concluded by its negotiation by the parties[2] or by acceptance without reference of an offer to contract.

As the contract is concluded by the parties' agreement, one party's will may not be replaced by court decision[3].

---

* Professor, Ph. D., Law Faculty, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: carpenaru_stan@yahoo.com).

[1] See C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, Civil Law, General Theory of Obligations, 9th Edition, revised and enlarged, Bucharest, Hamangiu Printing House, 2008, p. 37.

[2] On contract negotiation, see Gh. Piperea, Introduction in Professional Contract Law, C.H. Beck Printing House, Bucharest, 2011, p.86 and the next; Mariana Buric, Legal Aspects of Contract Negotiation, in Revista de drept comercial no. 11/2004, p.114 and the next; Ivanița Goicovici, Progresive Formation of Contract – Notion and Scope, Walters Printing House, Bucharest, 2009; S. Deleanu, Letters of Interest, in Revista de drept comercial no. 1/C 995, p. 110 and the next.

[3] The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Commercial Section dec. no. 876/2002, in Revista română de drept al afacerilor no.3/2004, p.199.

For the conclusion of the contract it is sufficient that the parties achieve the will agreement on the essential elements of the contract, even if some secondary elements are left aside in order to be agreed subsequently, and entrust their determination to third parties. If the parties do not reach an agreement on the secondary elements in question and the person entrusted with their determination makes no decision, it is the court of law the one that will complete the contract, at the request of any of the parties, taking into account, depending on the circumstances, the nature of the contract and the parties' intention.

Upon negotiating and concluding the contract, and also during the performance of the contract, the parties have to act in good faith, which is presumed until proved otherwise.

According to the law, the parties have the liberty to initiate, have and break off negotiations, without being responsible for their failure, if they responded to the exigencies of good faith. It goes without saying that the conduct of the party initiating or continuing negotiations without intending to conclude the contract is contrary to the exigencies of good faith.

Initiating, continuing or breaking off negotiations against good faith entail the liability of the breaching party for the damage caused to the other party. Liability cannot be but a civil liability ex delicto, in the conditions of art. 1357 of The Civil Code. Upon establishing the compensations, the expenses incurred for the negotiations, the other party's waiver of other offers and any other similar circumstances will be taken into account.

In the negotiation for the conclusion of the contract, the parties can have in view certain information with confidential character. In such a case, the law imposes on the parties a confidentiality obligation. The party that has been communicated, during negotiations, confidential information is forbidden to disclose it or use it in its own interest, no matter if the contract is concluded or not. The breach of the confidentiality obligation engages the civil liability ex delicto, under the conditions of art. 1357 of The Civil Code.

In certain cases, during the negotiations, a party can insist on reaching an agreement on a certain element or on a certain form. In such a case, the contract will not be concluded until an agreement is reached in connection to the above, no matter if the element in question is an essential or a secondary one or the form is not imposed by the law for the validity of the contract (art. 1185 of The Civil Code).

Conclusion of any contract involves the meeting of the essential conditions required by the law for the validity of the contract: the capacity to contract; the parties' consent; a determined and licit object; a licit and moral cause (art. 1179 of The Civil Code).

In those cases in which the law provides a certain form of the contract, this has to be observed, under the sanction provided by the applicable legal provisions. Consequently, the manifestations of will forming the will agreement, and namely the offer to contract and the acceptance of the offer, have to take the form required by the law for the valid conclusion of the contract (art. 1187 of The Civil Code).

3. The offer to contract is a proposal of a person, addressed to other person, to conclude a certain contract. This comprises a manifestation of will expressing the offeror's intention to obliges itself, in case of its acceptance by the recipient.

Pursuant to the law, in order to constitute an offer to contract, the proposal must contain sufficient elements for the contract formation (art. 1188 of The Civil Code).

According to doctrine, the offer to contract must be manifestation of real, unvitiated will, concretized in a precise, complete and firm proposal[4].

[4] See C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, op.cit., p.41; L. Pop, p.41; L. Pop, Civil Law Treaty. Obligations, Volume II, The Contract, Universul Juridic Printing House, Bucharest, 2009, p.156-160; Albu, Civil Law. The Contract and the Contractual Liability, Dacia Printing House, Cluj-Napoca, 1994, p.72-73.

The offer is precise and complete when it comprises all those elements that are necessary for concluding the contract, indispensible to the recipient of the offer for making a decision, in the sense of acceptance or rejection of the offer. These elements are not the same for any contract, being specific to the various categories of contracts.

The offer will be firm, if it expresses a legal engagement of the offeror, which, by its acceptance by the recipient, would lead to the conclusion of the contract. This condition is not met if the proposal comprises certain reserves.

The offer to contract can be exteriorized expressly, in writing, verbally, exhibit of the merchandise by displaying the price, or tacitly, resulting without any doubts from the behavior of a person; for example, the conclusion of the lease contract, in case of tacit relocation (art. 1810 of The Civil Code).

According to the law, the offer to contract may have as issuer the person who has the initiative to conclude the contract, which determines its contents or, depending on circumstances, the person that proposes the last essential element of the contract.

The recipient of the offer may be a determined person, generically determined persons or undetermined persons (the public).

In what regards the offer addressed to undetermined persons, the new legal regulation makes certain distinctions.

Pursuant to the law, the proposal addressed to undetermined persons, even if precise, is not equal to the offer to contract, but, depending on circumstances, request for offer or intention to negotiate (art. 1189 of The Civil Code).

Exceptionally, the proposal is equal to an offer if this results from the law, from usual practices or, undoubtedly, from circumstances, for example, standing of a taxi in the taxi stand, with the meter indicating "vacant". In these cases, the revocation of the offer addressed to the undetermined persons produces effects only if made in the same form with the offer or in a way allowing it to be known to the same extent with this; for example, the standing of the taxi in the taxi stand, with the meter indicating "occupied".

The request of undetermined persons or more determined persons to formulate offers does not stand, in itself, for the offer to contract. In such cases, the requesting party becomes the recipient of the offer.

The offer to contract represents a unilateral manifestation of will of its author. As provided by the law, the offer to contract produces effects only from the moment when it arrives at the recipient, even if this does not take note of the offer for reasons that are not imputable to it (art. 1200 of The Civil Code).

Consequently, until it arrives at the recipient, the offer produces no effects, and can be withdrawn without consequences for the offeror, but only if the withdrawal arrives at the recipient prior to or simultaneously with the offer.

It goes without saying that, if the offer makes provision for an acceptance term, the offeror must comply with the term granted. The acceptance term elapses from the moment when the offer arrives at the recipient.

For the purpose of this solution, art. 1191 of The Civil Code provides that the offer is irrevocable as soon as its author undertakes to maintain it for a certain term.

Yet, pursuant to the law, the offer is also irrevocable when it may be considered as such, under the parties' agreement, under the practices settled between them, negotiations, contents of the offer or usual practices.

One should note that, whereas the term offer is irrevocable, any statement for revocation of such an offer produces no effect (art. 1191, paragraph 2 of The Civil Code).

The matter that has been discussed in the past and that is also currently debated regards the offer without acceptance term. The new Civil Code establishes the fundamental doctrine solutions, distinguishing between the offer being addressed to a present person or to an absent one.

If the offer without acceptance term is addressed to a present person, this remains without legal effects if not accepted immediately (art. 1194 of The Civil Code).

The solution is the same also in the case of the offer transmitted by phone or by other means of remote communication.

If the offer without acceptance term is addressed to a person that is not present, this has to be maintained in a reasonable term, depending on circumstances, in order for the recipient to receive it, analyze it and dispatch the acceptance (art. 1193 of The Civil Code).

Such an offer can be revoked and prevents the conclusion of the contract, but only if revocation arrives at the recipient before the offeror receives the acceptance or, as the case may be, before carrying out the act or fact determining the conclusion of the contract, under the terms and conditions of art. 1186, paragraph 2 of the Civil Code.

Revocation of the offer before the expiry of the reasonable term, provided by art. 1193 of the Civil Code, engages the offeror's liability for the damage caused to the recipient of the offer (art. 1193, paragraph 3 of The Civil Code).

In the past, against the background of inexistence of any regulation in The Civil Code, there were discussions on the mandatory force of the offer and the grounds for liability for revocation of the offer[5].

Both doctrine and judicial practice admitted that the withdrawal of the offer, before the expiry of the acceptance term provided by the offer entails the offeror's liability for the damages caused as a consequence of the unexpected revocation of the offer. The issue that was subject to the controversy was the legal ground of the offeror's liability.

In general, it has been sustained that unexpected revocation of the offer, which causes damages, entails the civil liability ex delicto of the offeror (art. 998 of the old Civil Code)[6].

Some authors considered that the legal ground for liability is not the illicit and guilty deed of revocation, but the legal fact of the abusive exercising of the right to revoke the offer[7].

Other authors found the justification of the obligation to maintain the offer in the term provided by the offer, in the idea of validity of the unilateral will engagement representing the offer to contract[8].

The new Civil Code comprises provisions regarding the offeror's liability for the damage caused by the revocation of the offer (art. 1193, paragraph 3 of The Civil Code).

Still, one should note that this liability of the offeror regards the case of the offer without term addressed to an absent person, which was revoked before the expiry of the reasonable term considered by the law for the recipient to receive it, analyze it and dispatch the acceptance.

As regards the offer in which the offeror undertook to maintain it for a certain term, this is, pursuant to art. 1191 of The Civil Code, immediately irrevocable. Moreover, any statement of revocation of the irrevocable offer produces no effect (art. 1191, paragraph 2 of The Civil Procedure Code).

As the offer with acceptance term cannot be revoked by the offeror, and any revocation produces no effects, it means that the offer "revoked" before the expiry of the term can be accepted and, consequently, leads to the conclusion of the contract.

As regards the liability of the offeror for the damage caused by the offer revocation, in the conditions of art. 1193 of The Civil Code, its ground is the illicit and guilty deed of the offeror (art. 1357 of The Civil Code).

---

[5] See T. R. Popescu, P. Anca, General Theory of Obligations, Ed. Ştiinţifică, Bucharest, 1968, p.75 and the next; C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, op.cit., p.41-44; L. Pop, op.cit., p.167 and the next.

[6] See T. R. Popescu, P. Anca, op.cit., p.78.

[7] See C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, op.cit., p.44.

[8] See I. Albu, op.cit., p.75; D. Chirica, Civil and Commercial Special Contracts, Volume I, Rosetti Printing House, Bucharest, 2005, p.145; L. Pop, op.cit., p.172.

In certain cases, the offer to contract may become null and, therefore, may no longer produce legal effects. The cases of nullity of the offer are the ones provided by art. 1195 of The Civil Code.

Thus, the offer will become null if the acceptance of the offer does not get to the offeror in the term laid down in the offer or in the reasonable term provided by art. 1193, paragraph 1 of The Civil Code.

Then, the offer becomes null when refused by the recipient.

Finally, the irrevocable offer becomes null in case of the offeror's decease or incapacity, but only when the nature of the business or circumstances impose so.

To conclude here, it has to be specified that the offer to contract should not be mistaken for the promise to contract (sale promise). Unlike the offer, which is a unilateral manifestation of will, the promise to contract (sale promise) is a pre-agreement (art. 1669 of The Civil Code).

In the case of bilateral sale promise, the promissory party undertakes to sell, and the beneficiary undertakes to buy a certain asset, at a certain price, based on a sale-contract to be concluded in the future.

In the case of the unilateral sale promise, the promissory party undertakes to sell, or, as the case may be, to buy a certain asset, and the beneficiary reserves the faculty to subsequently manifest the will to purchase, respectively to sell the promised asset.

In both cases, the sale promise is a pre-agreement giving rise to an affirmative covenant, and namely that of concluding a sale contract in the future.

4. Acceptance of the offer is the manifestation of will of the recipient of the offer to conclude the contract in the conditions provided by the offer.

Pursuant to art. 1196 of The Civil Code, acceptance of the offer means any act or fact of the recipient, if it undoubtedly indicates its consent to the offer, as formulated, and arrives in due term at the offer author.

The conditions required by the law for the validity of acceptance of the offer result from this definition.

Thus, the acceptance of the offer may consist in a legal act, and namely a manifestation of the recipient's will, in the sense of conclusion of the contract, or in a legal fact, such as the dispatch of the merchandise to which the offer refers.

Then, from the recipient's act or fact it must undoubtedly result the recipient's consent with regard to the offer, as formulated by the offeror.

Consequently, in order for it to stand for an acceptance, the recipient's manifestation of will cannot be confined to the confirmation of the receipt of the offer, but it has to undoubtedly express the recipient's will to legally engage, and namely to conclude the contract in the conditions proposed in the offer[9]. This means that acceptance must be total and have no reserves or conditions.

According to the law, the recipient's answer does not represent acceptance when it comprises amendments or supplementations that do not correspond to the offer received (art. 1197, paragraph 1, letter a) of The Civil Code).

An answer of the recipient comprising changes or supplementations to the contents of the offer may be considered, depending on circumstances, a counter offer (art. 1197, paragraph 2 of The Civil Code).

Doctrine has sustained the necessity to distinguish between the essential and non-essential amendments and supplementations comprised by the acceptance of the offer and that only in the case of essential amendments and supplementations, acceptance should have the value of a counter offer. As regards the non-essential amendments and supplementations, if the offeror does not immediately manifest its disagreement with them, the contract should be considered concluded in the terms of the recipient's acceptance[10].

[9] See The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Commercial Section dec. no.35/2009, in Buletinul Casației no.3/2009, p.33.

In supporting this solution, one could invoke the provisions of art. 1182, paragraph 2 of The Civil Code, pursuant to which in order to conclude the contract it is sufficient for the parties to reach an understanding on the essential elements of the contract, even if they leave aside certain secondary elements to be subsequently agreed on.

Still, we consider that it is only the recipient's agreement with regard to the offer, as formulated by the offeror, that leads to the conclusion of the contract. Any amendment or supplementation, even if a non-essential one, involves an insecurity element in what regards the conditions of the conclusion of the contract. Therefore, an acceptance with any amendment or supplementation represents a counter offer addressed by the recipient to the offeror, which can be accepted or rejected.

Finally, in order for it to have legal value, the acceptance of the offer must reach the author of the offer in due term.

Acceptance of the offer will be legally inappropriate, if it reaches the offeror after the offer has become null (art. 1197, paragraph 1, letter c) of The Civil Code).

According to the law, the offer will become null if the acceptance does not reach the offeror in the term set out in the offer or, in absence, in the reasonable term, necessary for the recipient to receive it, analyze it and dispatch the acceptance (art. 1195 of The Civil Code).

The offer will also become null if this is refused by the recipient or in case of the offeror's decease or incapacity.

One should show that, according to the law, also tardy acceptance, and namely that has reached the offeror after the term set out in the offer or after the reasonable term contemplated by the law, may lead to the conclusion of the contract.

Tardy acceptance produces effects, i.e. leads to the conclusion of the contract, only if the author of the offer immediately informs the accepting party of the conclusion of the contract (art. 1198 of The Civil Code).

For the case in which the acceptance was performed in due term, but it reached the offeror after the expiry of the term, for reasons that cannot be imputed to the accepting party, the law provides that such an acceptance will produce legal effects, and namely will lead to the conclusion of the contract, if the offeror does not immediately inform the accepting party accordingly.

For the conclusion of the contract, acceptance of the offer, like the offer itself, has to take the form required by the law for the valid conclusion of the contract.

If by the offer a certain form of the acceptance of the offer has been established, acceptance will be inappropriate if it does not comply with the required form and, therefore, produces no legal effects (art. 1197, paragraph 1, letter b) of The Civil Code).

Like the offer, acceptance of the offer may be express or tacit.

Express acceptance of the offer may manifest itself by a written record or verbally or by certain gestures signifying the recipient's agreement to the received offer.

Tacit acceptance consists in an act performed by the recipient involving the idea of conclusion of the contract in the conditions formulated in the offer; for example, dispatch of the merchandise to which the purchase offer refers or payment of the price of the merchandise received from the seller.

The problem that has been discussed in the past was that of knowing whether the acceptance of the offer can result from the recipient's silence. Doctrine distinguished between silence accompanied by positive attitudes and simple silence of the recipient[11].

[10] See L. Pop, op.cit., p.176.

[11] See T. R. Popescu, P. Anca, op.cit., p.74; I. Albu, op.cit., p.76.

In the case of silence accompanied by positive attitudes of the recipient, silence means, in fact, tacit acceptance; for example, dispatch of the merchandise object of the offer.

In case of pure and simple silence, silence cannot have the significance of acceptance of the offer, whereas the principle "who is silent, consents" does not apply in law.

Exceptionally, doctrine admitted that silence can have the value of acceptance of the offer in the cases provide by the law or agreed by the parties or when the offer is made exclusively in the recipient's interest[12].

The solutions of the doctrine have been taken over and recognized in the new civil code. Pursuant to art. 1196, paragraph 2 of The Civil Code, the recipient's silence or inaction stands for acceptance only when it results from the law, from the parties' agreement, from the practices settled between them, from usual practices or from other circumstances.

A known case provided by the law in which silence is equal to acceptance of the offer is tacit relocation.

Art. 1810 of The Civil Code provides that if, after the elapsing of the term, the lessee continues to hold the asset and to fulfill the obligations without resistance on the lessor's part, it shall be considered that a new lease has been concluded, in the conditions of the old one, including in what regards the guarantees.

In commercial activity there may be legal relations between certain partners with continuity, and for facilitating the conclusion of contracts, they agree to conclude them in the simplified form, by order followed by execution, without there being necessary a formal acceptance of the order. Such an understanding between partners may lead to the establishing of practices between them, which makes superfluous the acceptance of the offers.

In certain areas of activity, usual practices can impose that the recipient's silence be equal to the acceptance of an offer to contract.

Acceptance of the offer must be communicated to the offeror. Communication must be made by means at least as fast as the ones used by the offeror for transmitting the offer, if by the law, from the parties' agreement, from the practices settled between them or from other such circumstances does not result otherwise (art. 1200, paragraph 2 of The Civil Code).

It being a unilateral manifestation of will, acceptance of the offer produces effects only from the moment at which it gets to the offeror, even if this does not become aware of the same for reasons that are not imputable to it. Consequently, the recipient may withdraw the acceptance of the offer, provided that the withdrawal reaches the offeror previously or simultaneously to the acceptance (art. 1199 of The Civil Code).

5. Conclusion of contract implies the achievement of the parties' will agreement on the contract clauses.

As showed, the parties' will regarding the conclusion of the contract manifests itself in the offer to contract and the acceptance of the offer.

If these two manifestations of will are concordant, the will agreement is achieved, i.e. the contract is concluded.

The matter brought forward by the conclusion of the contract is that of the moment of achievement of the agreement of will, as this represents the moment of conclusion of the contract.

In absence of a legal regulation in the old civil code, establishing of the moment of conclusion of the contract between absent parties was the subject of a controversy.

Civil and commercial law doctrine has proposed several theories (systems) regarding the determination of the moment of conclusion of the contract between absent parties[13].

---

[12] See C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, op.cit., p.47-48; L. Pop, op.cit., p.179-181.

[13] See C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, op.cit., p.49-50; L. Pop, op.cit., p.186 and the next. See also St. D. Cărpenaru, Romanian Commercial Law Treaty, p.451-453.

According to the theory of issuing, named also the will declaration theory, the contract shall be considered concluded at the moment when the recipient has manifested its will to accept the offer received, even if such offer was not communicated to the offeror.

This theory was criticized for not allowing to establish exactly the acceptance moment and, therefore, the moment of the contract conclusion. Moreover, this does not offer any certainty, because, not being known to the offeror, acceptance may be revoked.

According to the theory of dispatching, also named the transmission theory, the contract should be concluded at the moment when the recipient dispatches the answer regarding the acceptance to the offeror.

The theory has been contested for not ensuring total certainty of contract conclusion, whereas, although the acceptance of the offer was dispatched to the offeror, its author can revoke it until the arrival of the acceptance at the offeror, using a faster means of communication. At the same time, by applying this theory, the offeror takes note of the conclusion of the contract after the moment when the same took place, and namely upon the receipt of acceptance of the offer.

In the theory of receiving, also named the theory of acceptance receipt, the contract is considered concluded at the moment when the offeror receives the answer regarding the acceptance of the offer, even if the offeror did not take note of such answer.

It has been showed that, although it offers a higher guarantee regarding the certainty of the moment of contract conclusion, still, the inconvenience of this theory lies in the fact that it considers the contract concluded, even in the case in which the offeror is not aware that the offer has been accepted[14].

Finally, according to the theory of informing, named also the theory of knowledge of the acceptance, the contract should be considered concluded at the moment when the offeror actually becomes aware of the acceptance of the offer.

This theory found legal support in art. 35 of The Commercial Code, according to which synallagmatic contract shall not be considered concluded ”if acceptance was not brought to the notice of the proposing party”. In other terms, the contract is considered concluded at the moment when the offeror becomes aware of the acceptance of the offer.

In relation to the theory of informing in has been objected, for good reason, that this does not ensure the possibility to exactly establish the moment when the offeror became aware of the acceptance of the offer. Moreover, by relating the moment of conclusion of the contract to the moment of actual knowledge of the acceptance of the offer one creates the possibility for the offeror to prevent the conclusion of the contract, by not opening the correspondence containing the acceptance of the offer.

Considering its advantages, but also the objections to it, the theory of informing has been applied in practice, using the simple presumption that the offeror has taken note of the acceptance of the offer at the moment of receipt of the answer regarding the acceptance of the offer. As presumption is relative, it could be overthrown by contrary evidence, in the sense that, without being in a breach situation, the offeror has not become aware of the acceptance of the offer upon the receipt of the correspondence, but at another date.

By applying in this manner the theory of informing, practically one applies the theory of receiving, considered the most correct both theoretically and practically and, for such reason, recommended for being adopted in future civil legislation[15].

Taking into account the past situation, the new civil code adequately regulates the moment of conclusion of the contract.

---

[14] The theory of receiving was adopted by the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (art.18 item 2), Vienna, 1980.

[15] C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, op.cit., p.50.

In the case of the contract that is concluded between present persons, in which case each party's will is received by the other party directly and instantaneously, the contract shall be considered concluded at the moment of acceptance of the offer. To this end, art. 1194 of the Civil Code provides that the offer without term addressed to a present person remains effectless if not immediately accepted.

The solution is the same also in the case of the offer transmitted by phone or by other such means of remote communication.

In the case of the contract concluded between the persons that are absent, in which case the offer and the acceptance of the offer will be communicated by correspondence (letter, phone, fax) and, consequently, there is a time interval between the offer and acceptance, the contract will be considered concluded at the moment when the acceptance of the offer arrives at the offeror. To this end, pursuant to art. 1186 of The Civil Code, the contract will be concluded at the moment and in the place in which acceptance arrives at the offeror, even if this does not take note of it for reasons that are not imputable thereto.

As one can notice, in relation to the moment of conclusion of the contract between absent parties, the new Civil Code provides for the theory of receiving.

In order to ensure full certainty and exactness of the moment of contract conclusion, the new regulation is more categorical; in all cases, the contract is considered concluded at the moment when the answer regarding the acceptance arrives at the offeror, even if the offeror does not become aware of the answer for reasons that are not imputable thereto.

The new Civil Code regulates the moment of conclusion of the contract in simplified form (art. 1186, paragraph 2 of The Civil Code).

In the case in which, according to the offer, practices settled between the parties, usual practices or nature of the business, the offer may be accepted by a conclusive act or fact of the recipient without informing the offeror any longer of the acceptance of the offer, the contract will be considered concluded at the moment when the recipient performs the conclusive act or fact (for example, dispatch of the merchandise that is the object of the offer).

Establishing the moment of the contract is of interest not only theoretically, in relation to the conclusion of the contract, but also practically.

Thus, the effects of the contract produce from the moment of its conclusion, except for the cases in which the parties have agreed otherwise.

Then, at the moment of conclusion of the contract, one assesses the meeting of the validity conditions of the contract (capacity, consent flaws etc.).

Also, in relation to the moment of conclusion of the contract, one determines the law applicable to the contract with extraneity elements.

Finally, the moment of conclusion of the contract serves to determining the venue of conclusion of the contract.

The new Civil Code regulates not only the moment of contract conclusion, but also the venue of contract conclusion between absent parties.

According to art. 1186 of The Civil Code, the contract shall be concluded at the moment and in the venue in which acceptance arrives at the offeror. So the venue of contract conclusion is the locality where the offeror is and where acceptance of the offer arrives at the offeror.

We consider that this solution of the law is applicable also in the case of conclusion of the contract by phone or by other such means of remote communication.

In the case of conclusion of the contract in simplified form, when the contract is considered concluded at the moment when the recipient performs a conclusive act or fact (for example, dispatch of the merchandise that is the object of the offer), the venue of conclusion of the contract is the locality where the recipient of the offer is (art. 1186, paragraph 2 of The Civil Code).

Determining the venue of contract conclusion is of practical interest.

Thus, depending on the venue of contract conclusion one determines the competence of the court of law (territorial competence) for the resolution of the disputes regarding the contract.

Then, the venue of contract conclusion is of interest for determining the applicable law, in the case of a conflict of laws in space regarding the contract with extraneity elements.

6. By concluding the contract, the parties agree on the contract clauses, which synthesize each party's obligations.

Of course, the parties are bound by the obligations assumed by the contract clauses, which express their will.

The new Civil Code regulates also the legal regime of special clauses regarding the conclusion of the contract. The external clauses, the standard clauses and the unusual clauses are being contemplated.

The contract concluded by compliance with the law obliges not only to what is expressly stipulated, but also to all the consequences that the practices settled between the parties, usual practices, law or equity confer on the contract, depending on their nature.

Pursuant to the law, the parties shall be also bound by the extrinsic clauses to which the contract refers, if the law does not provide otherwise (art. 1201 of The Civil Code).

The law has in view also the conclusion of contracts using standard clauses (art. 1202 of The Civil Code). These standard clauses are stipulations previously established by one of the parties in order to be generally and repeatedly used and that are included in the contract without having been negotiated with the other party; for example, the general conditions regarding the leasing contract.

In principle, the conclusion of the contract in which standard clauses are used is governed by the general rules for the conclusion of the contract, provided by art. 1178-1203 of The Civil Code, which apply accordingly.

But, according to the law, the clauses negotiated prevail over the standard clauses.

In the case in which both parties use standard clauses and do not come to an agreement regarding such clauses, the contract will be still concluded based on the agreed clauses and on any standard clauses that are common in their substance. The contract shall not be concluded if either of the parties notifies the other party, either before the moment of conclusion of the contract, or afterwards and immediately, that it does not intent to be bound by such a contract (art. 1202, paragraph 4 of The Civil Code).

In order to ensure the parties' protection, upon the conclusion of the contract, the law especially regulates the legal regime of unusual standard clauses. There are contemplated the clauses providing for the benefit of the one proposing them the limitation of liability, the right to unilaterally terminate the contract, to suspend the fulfillment of the obligations or providing to the detriment of the other party the losing of rights or from the benefit of the term, limitation of the right to oppose exceptions, restriction of the liberty to contract with other persons, tacit renewal of the contract, applicable law, arbitration clauses or clauses by which one derogates from the norms regarding the competence of the courts of law.

Such unusual standard clauses produce effects only if expressly accepted in writing by the other party (art. 1203 of The Civil Code).

7. All that have been showed above lead to the conclusion that the regulation of the new Civil Code regarding the conclusion of the contract stands for actual progress in comparison with the previous legal regulation.

Even if, in many cases, the solutions adopted are not a novelty towards the solutions accepted by the civil law and commercial law doctrine, as well as by the judiciary practice, they have the merit of offering legal support and, therefore, a guarantee for the security of contractual relations.

References

Treaties, university courses, monographic courses:
- St. D. Cărpenaru, Romanian Commercial Law Treaty, Universul Juridic Printing House, Bucharest, 2010;
- C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, Civil Law, General Theory of Obligations, 9th Edition, revised and enlarged, Bucharest, Hamangiu Printing House, 2008, p. 37;
- Gh. Piperea, Introduction in Professional Contract Law, C.H. Beck Printing House, Bucharest, 2011;
- Ivanița Goicovici, Progresive Formation of Contract – Notion and Scope, Walters Printing House, Bucharest, 2009;
- L. Pop, Civil Law Treaty. Obligations, Volume II, The Contract, Universul Juridic Printing House, Bucharest, 2009;
- Albu, Civil Law. The Contract and the Contractual Liability, Dacia Printing House, Cluj-Napoca, 1994;
- T. R. Popescu, P. Anca, General Theory of Obligations, Ed. Ştiinţifică, Bucharest, 1968;
- D. Chirica, Civil and Commercial Special Contracts, Volume I, Rosetti Printing House, Bucharest, 2005;

Articles:
- Mariana Buric, Legal Aspects of Contract Negotiation, in Revista de drept comercial no. 11/2004;
- S. Deleanu, Letters of Interest, in Revista de drept comercial no. 1/C 995;

Jurisprudence:
- The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Commercial Section dec. no. 876/2002, in Revista română de drept al afacerilor no.3/2004;
- The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Commercial Section dec. no.35/2009, in Buletinul Casației no.3/2009;

Legislation:
- The United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (art.18 item 2), Vienna, 1980

THE EFFECTS OF THE COLLECTIVE LABOR CONTRACT

AURELIAN GABRIEL ULUITU*

Abstract
The modifications operated on the first part of year 2011 over the work legislation (by Law no 40/2011 for the modification and completion of Law no 53/2003 – Labor Code, and by Law no 62/2011 of the social dialogue) assumed interventions over some regulation solutions which, in time, had shaped as constants of the specific standardization. Concurrently, new institutions received a legal commitment, whose validity shall be confirmed or, on the contrary, infirmed by the practice of the individual reports and of the working collectives. Not at last, there is to be remarked also the taking over – with minor changing, most of the times of terminological nature – of previous solutions, which proved their utility within the practice of the working juridical reports.

Keywords: social dialogue; labor collective contract, effects of the contract, extension of the labor contract's effects, collective agreements, opposability of the collective labor contracts

Introduction

One of the most important juridical institution in the field of the labor law is the social dialogue. The framework of the collaboration between the social partners is the same both international and national level. Since 1919, when International Labor Organization (ILO) was founded, the dialogue between workers representatives, employers' representatives and Governments were a constant concern in order to keep – or restore – the social peace.

Social dialogue is possible only when certain conditions are fulfilled[1]:

- Strong independent workers' and employers' organizations with the technical capacity to access relevant information for participating in social dialogue;

In article 3 paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution there is a reference to organizations which are "most representative". Also Article 3 (a) of the Collective Bargaining Recommendation 1981 (No 163) enumerates "the recognition of the representative" employers' and workers' organizations as a mean of promoting collective bargaining. Consequently, social dialogue is only possible between strong partners. An employer would be unlikely to consider negotiation otherwise.

- Political will and commitment to engage in social dialogue on behalf of all the parties; social dialogue is only possible if the parties are, to some extent, willing to sit around the table;
- Respect for the human rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining; freedom of association and collective bargaining are the two cornerstones of social dialogue;
- Appropriate institutional support.

Social dialogue assumes interferences on behalf of the authorities. Even if they did not participate in social dialogue, "measures appropriate to national conditions (should) be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements" – Article 4 of ILO Convention No 98.

The base of the social dialogue – at the national level – is the relation between the (individual) employer and its workers. The content of the social dialogue at this level implies the consultation, the information, the negotiation and the agreement between the parts.

---

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Nicolae Titulescu University Bucharest, Faculty of Law, Private Law Department (gabi_uluitu@yahoo.com).

[1] See Mark Rigaux, Jean Rombouts (eds.), The Essence of Social Dialogue in (South East) Europe. A primary comparative legal survey, Intersentia, Antwerpen – Oxford, 2006, p. 3-4.

1. A. Law no 62/2011 of the social dialogue[2] regulates under the title of „the effects of the collective labor contracts" (name of Chapter II of the 7th Title – "Work collective negotiations") the means of applying the clauses of the collective labor contract in terms of the ending level. Hence, according to the article 133 paragraph (1) from the law: „The clauses of the collective labor contracts produce effects as following:

a) for all the employees within the unit, in case of the collective labor contracts concluded at that level;

b) for all the employees hired in the units that belong to the group of units for which the present collective labor contract has been concluded;

c) for all the employees hired within units belonging to the field of activity for which the collective labor contract was concluded and who belong to the employer's organizations, subscribers of the contract".

We mention that the collective negotiation within the enterprise is compulsory, except when the enterprise has less than 21 employees. The employer's refusal to negotiate may lead to a collective labor conflict. When the employer does not initiate negotiation, this takes place at the request of the union or the employees' representatives, within 15 days from the date of submitting the request. In Romania, as in most European States (except United Kingdom), negotiation at the enterprise level is used to complement the collective agreements concluded for the sector as a hole[3].

But, the employer's obligation to negotiate does not mean that the conclusion of the collective contract is a mandatory effect of the negotiation. The parts could agree to conclude a contract or not to conclude a contract (to postpone the negotiation for at most 12 month). If they do not agree, a collective labor conflict could be started.

Collective negotiation at the sector level[4] at the level of groups of enterprises is carried out between the representative trade unions and the representative employers' organizations. Whilst quantitative matters (wages and hours) are still regulated mainly by way of collective labor agreement at enterprise level, there is a tendency to shift to agreements at sector level.

B. Analyzing the legal text – article 133 paragraph (1) –, it results that there cannot be any interpretation and application problems regarding the opposability erga omnes of the effects of the collective labor contract concluded at the unit's level: the clauses of this contract are applicable to all the employees from that particular unit, including to those who:

- having the statute of employee of the unit at the moment of negotiation and conclusion of the collective labor contract, were not represented by the specific representation forms [the representative syndicate or the representatives of the employees, or the syndicate federation representatives where the non representative syndicate is affiliated to together with the representatives of the employees – art. 134 point B letter a) correlated with art. 135 paragraph (1) letter a) from Law no 62/2011];

- acquire the statute of employee of the units, subsequent of the conclusion of the collective labor contract, anytime during its validity term [presently, determined by art. 141 paragraph (1) and (2) from the law][5].

---

[2] Published within the Romanian Official Monitor, part I, no 322 from May 10th 2011.

[3] See Mark Rigaux, Jean Rombouts (eds.), op. cit., p. 208. 933 from December 29th 2011.

[4] The sectors of activity were regulated by the Government Decision no 1260/2011, published within the Romanian Official Monitor, part I, no.

[5] See I.T. Ştefănescu, Theoretical and practical paper for labor law, Universul Juridic Editor, Bucharest, 2010, p. 173.

C. Still, regarding the effects of the clauses of the collective labor contracts concluded at higher levels, it is necessary, in our opinion, in order to establish a correct area of manifestation of the opposability of the collective contractual clauses, the correlation of letters b) and c) of article 133 paragraph (1), on one hand, with the dispositions of art. 143 paragraph (4) and paragraph (5) and of art. 136 paragraph (2) from the law, on the other hand.

Art. 143 paragraph (4) from law no 62/2011 establishes as an express request that, for the collective labor contracts concluded at the units group's level and, respectively, area of activity, the file made by the parties in order to register the contract within the Ministry of Labor, Family and Social Protection, must also comprise "the list of the units for which the contract is applied..."[6]. It results, per a contrario, that it is accepted the existence, either within the group of units, or within the area, of the activity of some units – the employers – to whom the clauses of the collective labor contract concluded at that level, are not opposable. The effects of the collective labor contract would be limited, as applicability, only for the employees of the units highlighted on the list found within the file made for the registration[7].

In case the collective labor contract concluded at the level of the sector of activity, the solution we highlighted is confirmed also by the option of the legislator expressed in 143 paragraph (5) from the law (text on which we have developed a number of ideas infra, point 3 of the present material). To the extent that the effects of the collective labor contract concluded at the activity sector level, it would presume the application of clauses of the contract of all units from that respective sector and their employees; it would have no procedure justification for the extension of the contract by ordinance of the ministry of labor, family and social protection. But, as a result of this extension – operated administratively and normatively – the collective labor contract concluded at the level of the activity sector acquires ope legis a character of opposability erga omnes.

For the hypothesis of the collective labor contract concluded at group level of units, the highlight of the group units to whom that contract applies is justified only in case the group was not made only for the negotiation (and conclusion) of the contract at this level. The solution comes from the interpretation per a contrario of art 143 paragraph (2) letter d) from Law no 62/2011, in which it is expressly highlighted the situation of constituting the group of units „only for negotiating a collective labor contract at this level". Hence, the group of units:

- can be constituted into one of the modalities mentioned in art. 128 paragraph (3) the second thesis from the law (voluntarily, the cause of the constituting agreement being the negotiation of the collective labor contract itself);

- can be constituted independently of the manifestation for a negotiation intention for the collective contract, this manifestation of the group being achieved, at a certain point, during its existence (for example, we highlight in this second category the association mentioned by art 41 from the Emergency Ordinance of the Government no 34/2006 regarding the attribution of public acquisition contracts, of the concession contracts for public works and services concession contracts).

Within this last situation, it is possible that one or more units from the group wish not to participate at the collective negotiation. The collective labor contract concluded following the getting through the negotiation step, shall not apply within those units [which did not give express mandate to the representatives art 136 paragraph (1) from the law refers at].

We underline that, no matter the manifested situation – from those presented above – if the member unit of the group or found within the domain of activity is highlighted on the list found within the file made in order to be registered, the effects of the contract shall produce for all the employees of the respective unit.

[6] See A. Ţiclea, Paper on labor law, 5th edition, revised, Universul Juridic Editor, Bucharest, 2011, p. 251.

[7] We highlight that under the action of the previous regulation – art. 13 from Law no 130/1996 – the solution was the same: the collective labor contracts concluded at the level of the field of activity were applicable in the units mentioned in the contract, respectively in the component units of the established field and mentioned by the parties negotiating the contract (at branch level).

2. As a particular expression of the principle pacta sunt servanda, regulated as a common norm rule by art. 1270 paragraph (1) Civil Code, article 148 paragraph (1) from Law no 62/2011 stipulates that the execution of the collective labor contract is compulsory for the parties. According to the paragraph (2) of the same article, "the lack of fulfillment of the obligations assumed by the collective labor contract attracts the liability of the parties which are to be blamed for it".

The compulsory effects of the contract, which assume a specific conduit of its parties in executing the obligations that come up, lead to the contractual liability of the party who fails to fulfill its duties.

If this party is the employer himself, we believe that the other party – the employees as a collective (article 134 from the law) – can act in front of any Court requesting the obligation of the unit to respect the contractual frame.

Even if the legislator suppressed any reference to what under the rule of the previous regulation (Law no 168/1999 regarding the solution of the working conflicts) constituted in collective right conflict, we believe that art. 148 paragraph (2) from Law no 62/2011 bases the procedural approach of the employees (represented or not by the syndicate or in other form of representation) to act this way.

In our opinion, it is not justified the option found in practice to disjoint such a cause in so many files as the number of the employees having the quality of complainants, especially given that the obligation of the employer – expressing, correlatively, the subjective right of the employees – it has as a single source the collective contract (not being "disseminated" in the individual labor contracts).

3. Article 143 paragraph (5) from Law no 62/2011 decides:

„In case it is fulfilled the condition mentioned in paragraph (3), the application of the collective labor contract registered at the level of all units from the sector, by ordinance of the ministry of labor, family and social protection, with the approval of the Tripartite National College, on the basis of a request addressed to it by the subscribers of the collective labor contract at sectorial level".

Regarding this text, the following ideas can be expressed:

- the approach of the extension belongs solely to the subscribers of the collective labor contract; we believe that the request should be submitted to the ministry by all the signatories of the contract, and not by one part of them;

- the approval of the Tripartite National College represents a letter of conformity; it represents a condition of legality (validity) of the expansion paper, being necessary – even if the text does not distinguish – its expression previous to the issue of the ministry's ordinance;

- the expansion document is, from the juridical point of view, an administrative normative paper, which can be contested during the procedure regulated by Law no 554/2004 of the contentious administrative; the active standing in such a cause belongs, hypothetically, to any unit over which the expansion is being done;

- the extension cannot be achieved for the collective labor contract concluded at the level of units.

4. Although it is not aimed at the factual effects of the collective labor contracts, we appreciate that it presents interest, within a larger context of the analysis of the effects provided by the collective conventions, and article 153 from Law no 62/2011 that rules:

„According to the principle of mutual recognition, any trade union organization legally constituted can conclude with an employer or with an employer's organization any types of agreements, conventions or understandings, in written, that represent the law of the parties and whose provisions are applicable only for the members of the signatory organizations".

The quoted norm raises the problem of identification of the elements of content of such agreements, conventions or understandings which – from the perspective of the effects they produce – are totally governed by the principle of relativity of the contract's effects (article 1280 Civil Code), unlike the effects of the contracts or of the collective labor agreements. So to say, is it possible that by means of such juridical papers to be established certain elements of content common with the ones of the labor collective contracts or agreements ("clauses regarding the rights and obligations that come up from the labor relations"), or it must be delimited the content of the collective contracts or agreements from those of the juridical documents it was made reference to by means of art. 153 from Law no 62/2011?

We believe that the second solution is the correct one. We start our argumentation from the premise that a superposition would not be justified – logically and juridical – even a partial one, between the content of the contract or from the collective labor contract and those of the juridical documents named in article 153 from the law. The latest have a distinct content, negotiating and elements of agreement being able to be determined analytically by reporting to the attributions of the syndicate attributions, regulated by article 25 and art 27 – 31 from Law no 62/2011, other than those which target the labor relationships of the employees and of the employers.

There can be, hence, determined – without the enumeration to be exhaustive - the following domains of negotiation and agreement which bring content to the juridical papers mentioned by article 153 from the law:

- the material support of the syndicate members in exercising the profession, to which, hypothetically, the employer participates too;
- the setting up of aid houses for the syndicate members, to which the employer contributes;
- commonly editing and printing own publications;
- setting up and administration, in common, within the legal conditions, for the benefit of the syndicate members, of social, culture, study and request units in the domain of syndicate activity, commercial companies, insurance companies as well as the bank;
- setting up of funds for helping the syndicate members, with the participation of the employer;
- organizing and support for the material and financial issue in common of the cultural – artistic activity;
- organizing and developing, in common, of preparation courses for professional qualification, in the conditions of the law;
- drawing up/or promoting in common of certain legislation proposals.

Synthetically, the content of the agreements, conventions or understandings evoked by article no 153 from Law no 62/2011 can be determined as following: according to the principle of contractual liberty, the syndicate organizations can conclude with the employer or with an employer's organization, a juridical bilateral document by which it is established – in full compliance with the principle of the specialization of the usage capacity of the juridical person – clauses related to any area of activity except those related to the labor relationships of the employees and employers.

5. A collective labor agreement has similar binding effect to a law, at the level at which it was concluded, for its parts, and the lower levels. At the ground level, as a rule, it is therefore compulsory not only for those that signed it, but for all employees working for that employer.

The general binding nature represents a significant exception from the principle of agreements, relativity of common right, as well as from the principle of freedom of will. That is why criticism was sometimes formulated with regard to the doctrine postulating that if a collective labor agreement has not been concluded at a certain level, the provisions of the labor law should become directly applicable.

The actual regulation having object the effect of the collective labor contract and other collective agreements has the merit that clarify – as we already have presented – some issues occurred while the previous regulations were applied. But, there are some parts which still need some clarification, because the practice of the collective labor relations has to activate on a clear legislative framework. We are referring especially to the institution of the extension of the collective labor contracts' effects – concluded at the sector level of activity – to all the employers activating in that sector.

Conclusion

The legal framework of the social dialogue implies specific rules of law. It is mandatory for such regulations to be as close as possible to the social partners, in order not to make more difficult the social dialogue.

De lege lata, it is clear that the effects of the labor contract are general at the employer's level. At the level of group of units and activity sector, the effects occurring only the parts of the contracts.

Another important aspect is the elimination of the collective labor contract at the national level.

The trade unions can conclude with the employer or with an employer's organization, any juridical bilateral document by which it is established. Its clauses are related to any area of activity except those related to the labor relationships of the employees and employers. The effects are produced only to the parts of the accord.

References

- Mark Rigaux, Jean Rombouts (eds.), The Essence of Social Dialogue in (South East) Europe. A primary comparative legal survey, Intersentia, Antwerpen – Oxford, 2006.
- I.T. Ştefănescu, Theoretical and practical paper for labor law, Universul Juridic Editor, Bucharest, 2010.
- A. Ţiclea, Paper on labor law, 5th edition, revised, Universul Juridic Editor, Bucharest, 2011.

PROBATION PERIOD IN THE INDIVIDUAL LABOUR CONTRACT

ADA HURBEAN[*]
LAURA CETEAN-VOICULESCU[]

Abstract
This study wants to present the period of probation in the labour contract as an optional way to verify the sills of the employee, because of the Labour Code changes and from the view of the legal practice in this field. In fact, in actual labour relations, often, the work performed during the period of probation is consider performed outside of labour contract legal frame. Even more, period of probation appears, sometimes, as a unilateral manifestation of the employer's will and it manifest itself as a resolutory condition of the contract and not as a forfeiture clause of this contract. All these led us to achieve a clear and thorough research of the probation period and of the specific employment relationship during the course of it.

Keywords probation period, forfeiture clause, dismissal, optional valability clause, seniority.

Introduction:

The valid conclusion of the individual employment contract supposes the cumulative meeting of some general[1] and special[2] conditions of validity. The general conditions must apply to all contracts and are stipulated by the common law. The special conditions must take into consideration the provisions of Articles 27-33 from the Labour Code. Article 29 Labour Code expressly stipulates that the individual employment contract can be concluded only after the verification of professional and personal skills of the future employee. In this case, we find ourselves in the presence of a prior condition that is specific and mandatory for the valid conclusion of the individual employment contract. In other words, the employer has the legal obligation to verify the already mentioned aptitudes before concluding the individual employment contract, but he has the possibility to choose (except the public institutions and the budgetary units) the way to realise this verification, within the limits stipulated by Article 29 paragraphs 3 and 4 Labour Code. But, according to Article 30 Labour Code, the employment for the public institutions and authorities and other budgetary units can only be done by examination or contest.

Further, the same normative act regulates another way to verify the employee's skills, namely the probationary period. But, this time we are in the presence of a facultative and subsidiary verification to the contest and examination, that take place after concluding the individual employment contract[3].

The employer and the employee establish the probationary period, with one accord. Its existence, respectively the verification of employee's skills in such way does not presume, even if the [*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., „1 Decembrie 1918" Alba Iulia University, Law and Social Sciences Faculty (adahro@yahoo.com).

[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., „1 Decembrie 1918" Alba Iulia University, Law and Social Sciences Faculty (lauravoiculescu@yahoo.com).

[1] The legal capacity of the parties, the agreement, the object and the cause of the contract.

[2] The condition on health status, conditions of studies or training, conditions of seniority and studies, condition of work repartition, conditions of prior approval or authorization, conditions concerning the verification of personal and professional skills, conditions of election, appointment or accreditation, conditions referring to the conclusion, in Romania, of the individual employment contracts of foreigners and of the staff of foreign social commercial representations and that of the economical organizations.

[3] In this regard, Al. Ţiclea, Tratat de dreptul muncii, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2007, p. 413 and next, L. Uţă, F. Rotaru, S. Cristescu, Codul muncii adnotat, vol. I, Ed. Hamagiu, 2011, p. 209 and next.

text law does not expressly stipulate it. The probationary period represents one of the employer's obligation of notifying, according to Article 17 paragraph 3 (n) Labour Code. Consequently, it may be the object of negotiation between the future employee and the employer, along with other contractual clauses.

If before the amendment of the Labour Code by Law No. 40/2011, the failure to inform the employee of the probationary period led to the withdrawal of employer's right to verify in such way the skills of the employee, we question ourselves (with reason) if it did not changed into one-sided measure of the employer, according as the above stipulation was rescinded. In other words, from the per a contrario interpretation of the new regulations, the failure to inform the employee of the probationary period, prior the conclusion or modification of the individual employment contract, does no longer influence the validity of the probationary period established by contract. According to Article 17 paragraph 2 Labour Code, the obligation to notifying, completely, shall be deemed to be fulfilled when the employee signs the individual employment contract. But, the presumption is a relative one, if we relate this text of law to Article 19 Labour Code. Thus, if the employer does not fulfil his obligation to informing (which, as we have already mentioned, includes the probationary period, too), the future employee or the employee (if the contract changes) may refer the matter to court and seek appropriate compensations according to the damage he suffered, as a result of the infringement in question. We cannot ignore that, today and in this field, the violation of the right to informing the employee is not sanctioned, except for the eventual damage caused. As it had been well shown by the legal literature in matter[4], in the Labour Code as subsequently amended, the obligation to inform is a mere formality, whose failure does not influence, in a significant way, the labour relationships developed later.

Returning, the reason of the possibility of resorting to the verification of the employee's skills during the probationary period is, firstly, that of giving to the employers the possibility to verify if the employee fits to his qualification, if he/she holds the aptitudes they consider to be necessary for executing the duties, and secondly, to provide them with a legal mechanism that allows them to dismiss the person that does not correspond to the requirements. On the other hand, this stipulation can work for the employee, too, because, during the probationary period, he can observe if he is content with the given job[5].

The beginning of the probationary period is marked, in principle, by the moment of concluding the individual employment contract, if the parties did not convened that the performance of the contract shall start after a certain period.

During the whole length of the probationary period, the work's performance must be done under normal conditions for the respective job. In other terms, the employee cannot be obliged, during this period, to perform work under other conditions, different or additional to those specified by the respective job[6].

Specifically, this probationary period is directly influenced by the category of the employees to which it applies and by the type of the individual employment contract. As a consequence, the effective length of the probationary period is established by the employer, but it cannot exceed 90 calendar days for the operational positions and up to 120 calendar days for the managerial positions[7].

---

[4] R. G. Cristescu, C. Cristescu, Codul muncii. Analize şi soluţii, Ed. Hamagiu, Bucureşti, 2011, p. 83.

[5] J. C. Jevellier*, Droit du travail*, 6e édition, L. G. D., Paris, 1998, pp. 211-250.

[6] I.T. Ştefănescu*, Perioada de probă în reglementarea Codului muncii*, in the magazine Dreptul nr. 8/2003, p. 29.

[7] Before the amendment of the Labour Code by the Law No. 40/2011, a probationary period for the unskilled workers was established, but it could not exceed 5 working days. Nowadays, the special legal legislation applicable for the probationary period in the case of this category of employees has been abrogated. Thus, this category of employees respects the general legal legislation of the probationary period, by reference to the operational position they occupy and by reference to the concluded individual employment contract.

These periods are applicable, by category of employees, to the individual employment contracts for an unlimited duration, representing the rule in the field.

As for the modality to calculate the length of the probationary period, it has been established by jurisprudential[8] means that it is not question about a legal procedural term and that the provisions of Article 101 paragraph 1 Code of Civil Procedure do not apply in this situation. Therefore, when calculating the probationary period established in the individual employment contracts of unlimited duration, all calendar days shall be counted, inclusively the day when the probationary period starts and the day when it ends[9].

According to Article 85 Labour Code, the probationary period, for the individual employment contracts of limited duration, shall not exceed:

- 5 working days for a length of the individual employment contract of less than 3 months;
- 15 working days for a length of the individual employment contract between 3 and 6 months;
- 30 working days for a length of the individual employment contract exceeding 6 months;
- 45 working days for the employees in a management position, for a length of the individual employment contract that do not exceed 6 months.

Special lengths of the probationary period are regulated for the activities developed through a temporary employee. In this particular case, according to Article 97 Labour Code, the probationary period that can be stipulated for the accomplishment of the mission shall not exceed:

- 2 working days, when the temporary employment contract has been concluded for a period shorter or equal to 1 month;
- 5 working days, when the temporary employment contract has been concluded for a period between 1 and 3 months;
- 15 working days, when the temporary employment contract has been concluded for a period between 3 and 6 months;
- 20 working days, when the temporary employment contract has been concluded for a period exceeding 6 months;
- 30 working days for the employees in a management position, when the temporary employment contract has been concluded for a period exceeding 6 months.

It is obvious that in all these situations, the maximum length of the probationary period is regulated by imperative norms. Thus, including in the individual employment contract a probationary period that exceed the maximum length stipulated by law will engender, on the one hand, the nullity of the clause and its replacement with the applicable legal provision, and, on the other hand, the employer's engagement of the contraventional liability, under Article 260 paragraph 1 (d) Labour Code.

In the case of persons with disabilities and in the case of graduates of higher education institutions we find derogatory disposals to the norm according to which the probationary period has a subsidiary and facultative character.

Thus, the probationary period for the employees with disabilities has, first of all, an exclusive character, meaning that no other way is accepted to verify the professional skills in this situation. Since it does not exist the prior verification of the professional skills before concluding the individual employment contract, the probationary period turns into a condition of validity of the employment contract. Secondly, the probationary period for the persons with disabilities has a mandatory character: its insertion cannot be negotiate by the contractual parties.

Regarding the length of this probationary period, there are two normative acts that establish different durations. Article 31 paragraph 3 Labour Code stipulates a length of the probationary period that shall not exceed 30 calendar days; Article 83 paragraph 1 (d) of Law No. 448/2006 regarding the protection and promotion of the rights of disabled persons, republished, stipulates a length of the probationary period when concluding the contract for at least 45 working days. As the principle of right specialia generalibus derogant works for the case of labour relationships, too, we consider that, when hiring persons with disabilities, the employer must take into consideration the length stipulated by the special law in matter: respectively to establish a minimum length of 45 calendar days[10].

[8] C. A. Bucureşti, s.a VII-a civ., confl. mun. şi asig. soc., dec. nr. 2009/R/2010.
[9] R. G. Cristescu, C. Cristescu, op. cit. p. 86.

Another regulation of exception, in this field, can be found in Article 31 paragraph 5 Labour Code. In this case, the graduates of higher education institutions, at the beginning of their career, benefit by an obligatory period of stage of six months. This term comes into force from the moment of their employment for the job or profession they obtained a licence. The length of 6 months is a general length, because, by special laws, different periods of stage can be regulated[11]. In this specific case, most of the liberal professions involves the performance of an obligatory period of professional stage when starting the career – it is the case of lawyers, notaries, legal executors, and others.

It must be specified the fact that, the probationary period, as understood by the Labour Code, must not be confused with the period of stage. The stage represents the, limited, length in which the employee, without a professional experience has the possibility to develop his/her skills, to put in practice the theoretical knowledge he acquired during his/her studies, and, last but not least, it supposes the accumulation of work experience. All this while the probationary period aims exclusively to verify the professional skills of the employee[12].

In this regard too, it must be specified that the probationary period cannot be mistaken for the professional certification, which represents the verification of the professional preparation during the execution of the individual employment contract, having as purpose to keep the employee further in the function or the job he/she performs by contract.

Coming back to the professional stage, it is provided that the employer has the obligation, at the end of the stage, to issue a graduation certificate for the employee, certificate confirmed by the territorial labour inspectorate. Also, it is forbidden to establish a probationary period for the same job after graduating the professional stage.

The exact way to realise the professional stage, respectively the rights and obligations of the parties involved in the individual employment contracts during this period, is regulated by special law.

As we had shown, the probationary period has both an optional and an obligatory character. The two features do not contradict each other, because they refer to two distinct moments. The optional character refers to the parties' possibility of negotiating a probationary period in the individual employment contract, within the limits stipulated by law. In other words, even if the initiative of introducing a probationary period belongs to the employer, it cannot be imposed to the employee. The parties' agreement is mandatory, as long as the employer and the employee find themselves on positions of legal equality. Moreover, nothing stops the employer to renounce at the probationary period in the employment contract he is about to conclude (or the concluded one).

On the other hand, the obligatory character follows two aspects. Firstly, if the parties agree on including the probationary period in the individual employment contract, this will be specified in a contractual (optional) clause, or accordingly, in an addendum to the employee's individual contract. Secondly, the employer has the obligation to verify the professional skills of persons with disabilities under the form of the probationary period. This time, as we have already seen, the law regulates a

---

[10] In this regard, R. G. Cristescu, C. Cristescu, op. cit. p. 89.

[11] According to Law No. 514/2003 on organisation and practice of the profession of legal adviser, this professional category has the obligation, at the beginning of career, to perform a professional stage for 2 years, under the surveillance of a legal adviser.

[12] In this regard, Ş. Beligrădeanu, I.T. Ştefănescu, Perioada de probă în reglementarea Codului muncii, in the magazine Dreptul nr. 8/2003, p. 25; R. G. Cristescu, C. Cristescu, op. cit. p. 91.

special legal status which is derogatory from the norm established by Article 31 paragraph 1 Labour Code.

When concluding the individual employment contract, it can be established a single probationary period. If the individual employment contract is affected by a suspension, the probationary period shall not exceed the moment when the employee effectively begins his/her activity. If until this moment the employer did not express his will to verify the employee's skills in this particular case, he will not be able to negotiate a probationary period during the performance of the labour relationship.

According to Article 32 paragraph 2 Labour Code, during the performance of the individual employment contract, a new probationary period may be negotiated, if the employee enters a new position or profession with the same employer or is to perform the activity in a difficult, unhealthy or dangerous workplace[13].

There is also a case when the employer may only one time negotiate and establish a probationary period in the individual employment contract. It is the situation regulated by Article 74 Labour Code, according to which, the employer who made collective redundancies resumes his activity within 45 calendar days from the date of the collective redundancy, the dismissed employees have the right to be reemployed, with priority, on their jobs without any examination, contest or probationary period.

Following the same reasoning, the employer's right to negotiate and establish in the individual employment contract more probationary periods is limited. If, before the modification of the Labour Code, the limitation referred to the number of persons that could be employed on probation for the same position[14], at present the limitation is a temporal one. Thus, the employer can make successive employments on probationary periods for several persons, for the same position, only within 12 months. When this period ends, the employer can no longer establish a probationary period for that position. This term produces effects from the date of the first employment for the specified position, for which it had been established a probationary period[15].

The probationary period is part of the individual employment contract and it makes the object of an optional contractual clause, as we have already shown. Consequently, during its length, the employee shall enjoy all rights and duties provided for, negotiated or established by the individual employment contract, the collective labour agreement or the internal regulation. It is expressly[16] stipulated that, the probationary period represents length of service[17] and it counts as stage of contribution for the social insurance systems.

---

[13] Workplaces are classified into normal workplaces, workplaces with special conditions and workplaces with special conditions as determined by legal regulations. The employees engaged in such workplaces will be subject to a compulsory medical examination conducted by the occupational physician, in the conditions and terms established by the collective labour contract at the unit and institution. In case one or more of the special conditions are found for all employees of an establishment, a department, a workshop or a workplace, it will be set for them by negotiating wages. The amount of these basic wages will not be lower than the amount of the basic wage and of the negotiated increases. For providing work in jobs with heavy, dangerous, harmful, painful or in other similar conditions, the employees are entitled, if necessary, to increases to the basic wage, to reduced duration of working time, to food to strengthen the body's resistance, to free equipment protection, sanitary materials, additional leave, provided by collective labour contracts at branch level, groups of units, units and institutions; the lengths to reduce the retirement age are those stipulated by law. At workplaces with specific conditions, where only a part of the employees are working in such conditions, only they will receive bonuses. (Collective labour contract at national level 2011- 2014).

[14] Otherwise, this legal provision was criticized, being considered that it impedes the employer's possibility to select his personnel.

[15] The legal literature has shown that this statutory provision privileges small and middle employers who can, in this way, roll an important number of employees on probationary periods, because they do not have a good recruitment system. (R. G. Cristescu, C. Cristescu, op. cit. p. 91).

[16] Article 32 paragraph 3 Labour Code.

[17] And, according to Article 16 paragraph 4 Labour Code, only the work performed under an individual employment contract shall be included in employee's length of service.

The cessation of the individual employment contract and therefore of the work relationship during or even at the end of the probationary period raised many discussions in the legal literature. The disputes referred, in generally, at the adjustment of the probationary period, under the provisions of the unadjusted Labour Code, but that appeared in practice. In fact, by O.U.G. no. 65/2005 on modification and completion of the Labour Code, it was specified that during or at the end of the probationary period, the individual employment contract could cease by a written notification, on the initiative of either party. The problem of this legal text was that it regulated a possibility that, in practice, met the refusal of the Labour Inspectorate to write this article in the employees' record books.

The jurisprudence of law courts settled this polemic. It established that, during or at the end of the probationary period, the individual employment contract may only cease by a written notification, ground on (old) Article 31 paragraph 4^1 Labour Code, the written form of this notification representing its unique condition of validity[18].

The current legislation in matter is much more clear, because it stipulates the exclusive character of the written notification, as ground for cessing the work relationships, the lack of obligation to give notice, the lack of obligation to motivate the notification[19]. In this way, the probationary period represents a true forfeit clause, the issue of the notification involving immediately the cessation of the individual employment contract, without being necessary other formalities or the motivation of the respective act. It is obvious that, the cessation of the contract during or at the end of the probationary period is an independent situation of the work relationships, different from dismissal (for professional inadequacy) and resignation.

The notification may come from any of the contractual parties – employee or employer, but it must have a written form. Also, the notification must be communicated to the other party in a manner likely to make possible its acknowledgement, but as we have mentioned, it is not necessary to motivate it.

The initiative of any of the contractual parties to denounce the contract by a written notification, at the end of the probationary period, engages the liability of the person in cause[20]. There is also the possibility that the employee goes to law if the forfeit clause was realized by violating the law (without being respected the written form of the notification or without being communicated) or if an abuse of distress has been committed, demanding for compensations. On the other hand, the employer's appreciation of the employee's professional skills and qualifications cannot be limited by the law court, because the employer is the only person capable to assess the necessities in balance with the job description, the demands and the efficiency required.

From the norm according to which, in the situation of ceasing the work relationships during or at the end of the probationary period, there is no right to notice, one exception exists. Thus, in the case of employee's dismissal during the probationary period, either on medical problems or on job abolition, the employer will have to give to the employee a notice period of up to 20 working days.

In conclusion, probation period is a subsidiary and subsequently, in principle, method in relation with contest, examination, interview or any other verification form of the future employee's perofesional and personal skills.

---

[18] C. A Bucureşti, s.a VII-a civ., confl. mun. şi asig. soc., dec. nr. 1421/R/2007; C. A Bucureşti, s.a VII-a civ., confl. mun. şi asig. soc., dec. nr. 3760/R/2010.

[19] Article 31 paragraph 3 Labour Code: "During or at the end of the probationary period, the individual employment contract may only cease by a written notification, without notice, on the initiative of any party, without being necessary to motivate the decision".

[20] V. Barbu, C. Cernat, Analiză critică asupra dispoziţiilor legale privind perioada de probă, in Revista Română de Dreptul Muncii, nr. 4/2008, p. 46.

The setting of the probation period in the individual labor contract is optional, that means it insert into the contract as a mutual clause. In fact, the agreement of the future employee is needed, because the initiatives to verify the profesional skillls of employee wil belong to the employer. But, if the probation period is setteled it becames mandatory, like any other contractual clause. The beginning of the probation period is , also, means the beginning of the individaul labour contract, so, can not conceive of a probationary period of employment outside of a legally binding contract.

On another hand, the settling of the probation period is a mandatory, by law, only in case of employment of disable persons and in case of the graduates of higher education institutions. In this last case, the skills verification takes the form of internship.

We consider that the employment probation period has the legal nature of a forfeiture clause which works for both contracting parties and it produces the consequences provided by law. It can not be considering a resolutory condition because if it would be considering that the labor law will be eluded. In fact, it would violate the provisions that sets the reasons and conditions termination of the employment probation period.

The cease of individual employment contract in probation period is made only by written notice. In other words, whenever the employer considers that the employee does not meet the requirements of the position held or employee does not agree work needed to perform, may terminate the employment contract by giving written notice. Written form of notification is a condition ad validitatem, it should not be grounded in fact or law and is not required prior to completing an employee performance evaluation procedures.

References

- V. Barbu, C. Cernat, Analiză critică asupra dispoziţiilor legale privind perioada de probă, in Revista Română de Dreptul Muncii, nr.4/2008.
- Ş. Beligrădeanu, I.T. Ştefănescu, Perioada de probă în reglementarea Codului muncii, in Dreptul nr. 8/2003 magazine.
- R. G. Cristescu, C. Cristescu, Codul muncii. Analize şi soluţii, Ed. Hamagiu, Bucureşti, 2011
- J. C. Jevellier*, Droit du travail*, 6e edition, L. G. D., Paris, 1998.
- I.T. Ştefănescu*, Perioada de probă în reglementarea Codului muncii*, in Dreptul nr. 8/2003 magazine.
- Al. Ţiclea, Tratat de dreptul muncii, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2007.
- L. Uţă, F. Rotaru, S. Cristescu, Codul muncii adnotat, vol. I, Ed. Hamagiu, 2011

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE GENERAL PROVISIONS OF THE NEW CIVIL CODE IN THE FIELD OF WILL*

ILIOARA GENOIU

Abstract
Generally speaking, the will institution has been reconfigured by the new Civil Code. Even through its general provisions which have been consecrated to will, Law No. 287/2009 brings a few novelty elements. The present work is aimed to analyze the general aspects which characterize will (definition and legal features of will, contents of will, mutual will, proof of will, testator's consent and interpretation of will), in a comparative manner, both in relation to the provisions of the 1864 Civil Code and the provisions of the new Civil Code. Thus, this will allow us to point out the novelty elements brought within the field subject to our analysis by the new Civil Code and to assess their justness and appropriateness.

Keywords: testamentary provisions, mutual will, proof of will, testator's consent, interpretation of will.

1. Introduction

Law No. 287/2009[1] reconfigures the field of successions in general, preserving from the former regulations only those provisions characterized by a justness and actuality which were never doubted throughout time.

The present work aims to analyze the general provisions of the new Civil Code regarding will. They are included in Book IV "On inheritance and liberalities", Title III "Liberalities", Chapter III "Will", Section 1 "General provisions", art. 1034-1039. In relation to these, the new Civil Code regulates the following aspects: definition and legal features of will, contents of the will, mutual will, proof of will, testator's consent and interpretation of will.

In the actual context, the objective of the present work is to analyze the legal provisions mentioned above in a comparative manner, so as to point out the elements which the new Civil Code has preserved from the former civil regulations (the 1864 Civil Code), but also the novelty elements consecrated by the new Civil Code. Moreover, the present work will also make an assessment on the justness and the appropriateness of the novelty elements consecrated by Law No. 287/2009.

Under the circumstances in which, after the new Civil Code entered into force, on October 1st 2011, it has been published only a specialized work relating to successions[2], we consider that our scientific initiative is both actual and useful. We also want to popularize this way the novelties consecrated by law No. 287/2009 in the field of will, so as to contribute, hopefully, to the good enforcement of the justice act. Moreover, we consider that the results of our current analysis can be of interest for notaries public and Romanian diplomatic representatives abroad, judges, lawyers, Law students and any other law subject intending to express his will according to legal conditions.

* This work was supported by CNCSIS-UEFISCSU, project number PN II-RU, code PD_139/2010, contract number 62/2010.

 Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "Valahia" University of of Târgovişte, Faculty of Law and Social-Political Sciences (ilioaragenoiu20@yahoo.fr).

[1] Law no. 287/2009 on Civil Code was republished in the Romanian Official Gazette, Part I, No. 505 from July 15th 2011.

[2] The work in question was written by professor Dumitru C. Florescu and is called Dreptul succesoral, (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publ. House, 2011).

2. Contents

2.1. Definition of will

According to the provisions of article 955 of the new Civil Code, "The deceased's estate is passed on by legal inheritance if the person leaving that inheritance did not leave any contrary provision in his will. A part of the deceased's estate may be transmitted through testamentary inheritance, while the other part through legal inheritance". Thus, the Romanian legal system admits the coexistence of legal inheritance and testamentary inheritance, the former representing the rule and constituting the common law when it comes to the transmission of inheritance estate. The rules instituted by the lawmaker in the field of legal inheritance can be removed, totally or in part, through the deceased's will, expressed in his will. Given that the Romanian legislation has acknowledged the principle of testamentary freedom, any capable person can decide the way his estate will be used after his death by means of a last will act.

According to provisions of article 1034 of the new Civil Code "A will represents a unilateral, personal and revocable act, by means of which a person, called testator, leaves dispositions in one of the forms requested by law, for the time when he will no longer be alive".

Therefore, the new Civil Code, taking into account the criticism stated by the doctrine in relation to the definition of will in the light of the 1864 Civil Code[3], defines in an appropriate manner the last will act, by consecrating its contents not only to legacy (that testamentary provision regarding the inheritance estate or the assets which compose it), but also to other provisions, such as those regarding the establishment of a legatee, partition, rescission of former testamentary provisions, disinheritance, institution of testamentary executors, duties imposed on legatees or legal heirs, other provisions having effect after the deceased's death (art. 1035 of the New Civil Code).

Specialized literature[4] has defined will as a pattern, as a form comprising various freestanding legal acts, with a different legal regime. In order to support the thesis according to which the several legal acts which can take the form of a will do not have the same legal character, by evincing different legal characters, are invoked the provisions of article 416 paragraph (3) of the new Civil Code, which state that the acknowledgement of an outside marriage child's paternity through a will is irrevocable, under the circumstances in which a will is an essentially revocable act. Thus, we are not in front of an exception from the principle on revocable character of the will, but on the presence of the proof that, within will, several freestanding documents can coexist[5].

From the theory according to which a will can comprise several freestanding legal acts, it also results the consequence that the validity of such acts is analyzed separately, so that the nullity of an act does not also trigger the nullity of other acts as well.

In turn, the form flaws of only one testamentary provision trigger the absolute nullity of the will, because the testamentary form is common.

2.2. Legal features of a will

From the definition of will also result the latter's legal features. Thus, the last will act is a legal unilateral act, evincing a personal, revocable, solemn and mortis causa character. Therefore, when it comes to the legal features of a will, the new regulations in the civil field do not innovate, as it was in fact naturally to happen.

---

[3] According to provisions of article 802 of the 1864 Civil Code, "A will is a revocable act by means of which a testator orders the way a part or his whole estate shall be administered after his death".

[4] See: Constantin Hamangiu and others, Tratat de drept civil român, (Bucharest: 1929), 826; Mihail Eliescu, Moştenirea şi devoluţiunea ei în dreptul Republicii Socialiste România, (Bucharest: Academiei Publ. House, 1966), 199-205; Constantin Stătescu, Drept civil. Contractul de transport. Drepturile de creaţie intelectuală. Succesiunile, (Bucharest: Didactică şi Pedagogică Publ. House, 1967), 156-8; Dumitru Macovei, Drept civil. Succesiuni, (Iaşi: „Chemarea" Publ. House, 1993), 69-70. In fact, the same terms are used unanimously by specialized literature.

[5] See Emil Poenaru, „Recunoaşterea prin testament a copilului din afara căsătoriei", in „Justiţia nouă" Magazine (3/1956): 463 şi urm.

a) Will – a legal unilateral act

From the perspective of its constitution, a will is a legal unilateral act, which expresses only the testator's will. In order for a will to be constituted, it is not necessary for the testamentary disposition to be accepted by the legatee. Only through testator's exclusive will, a will can produce legal effects, so that legacy is passed on to the legatee from the moment inheritance is opened, on the condition that the legatee does not reject legacy. The acceptance of legacy constitutes a unilateral act (the inheritance option act), different from will and generating particular legal effects. Thus, the acceptance of legacy must not be confounded with the acceptance necessary for concluding a contract (bilateral legal act).

b) A will is a legal act essentially personal, so that it cannot be concluded through representation or with the legal tutor's consent.

The personal character of a will is not removed if the testator requests and receives specialized advice for drafting his last will act, if such act expresses exclusively its author's personal will.

From the personal character of will (and, equally, from the unilateral and revocable character), it also results the individual character of will, lawmaker[6] clearly forbidding mutual will (by means of which two or more persons leave testamentary provisions within the same act either on each other's behalf or on behalf of a third party).

c) A will is a legal solemn act which, in order to be valid, it has to have the form requested by law, otherwise is declared absolutely null.

A testator has the possibility to choose one of the forms regulated by law[7]. Thus, testator's freedom is restricted by the lawmaker.

d) A will is a mortis causa legal act, since it produces effects only after testator's death.

As a consequence, a legatee receives no right while the testator is still alive, the latter having the right to decide on the assets which make the object of the will. Although a will start to generate effects on the moment testator's inheritance is opened, the conditions in which that will is valid are assessed in relation to the moment when it was drafted.

d) A will is legal act essentially revocable

At any time (until he dies) and in an absolute manner, a testator, through his unilateral will, can revoke or modify his testamentary provisions. A testator cannot give up at his right to revoke his will, since he would perform a legal act upon an inheritance not opened, which is clearly forbidden by law[8].

Thus, from the perspective of its legal features, a will takes the form of an exception from common law, being governed by special background and form rules.

2.3. Contents of will

According to the provisions of article 1035 of the New Civil Code, "A will contains provisions regarding the inheritance estate or the assets which compose it, but also the direct or indirect establishment of a legatee. Together with such provisions or even in their absence, a will may contain provisions regarding partition, revocation of previous testamentary provisions, disinheritance, appointment of testamentary executors, duties imposed on legatees or legal heirs, but also other provisions producing effects after a testator's death".

Thus, a will may comprise[9]:

---

[6] Article 1036 of the new Civil Code.

[7] In relation to testamentary forms, see Ilioara Genoiu, „Formele testamentului în noul Cod civil", in „Dreptul" Magazine (12/2011).

[8] Article 956 of the new Civil Code.

[9] See also the National Union of Notaries Public, Codul civil al României. Îndrumar notarial, vol. I, (Bucharest: Monitorul Oficial Publ. House, 2011), 374-5.

a) legacies (universal, by universal or particular title), which constitute, according to article 986 of the New Civil Code, those testamentary provisions "(…) by means of which a testator stipulates that, at his death, one or more legatees shall receive all his estate, a part of it, or certain determined goods".

As it results from the provisions of article 1035 of the new Civil Code, legacies represent the main object of a will.

b) disinheritances – represent those legal provisions according to which some legal heirs are removed from inheritance, within the limits provided for by law;

c) an appointment of one/or more testamentary executors to insure the enforcement of testamentary provisions;

d) duties (obligations) imposed on the legatee or legal heirs, either of a patrimonial nature, or of another nature;

e) a revocation, total or partial, of a previous will or only of a previous testamentary provision, or withdrawal of the previous revocation;

f) an ascendant partition - represents the partition performed by the ascendant testator among his descendants, regarding all his inheritance assets or only a part of them;

g) the acknowledgement, by the mother, of a child born from unknown parents, or by the father of a child outside marriage;

h) provisions regarding funerals and burial or testator's body after his death (art. 80 of the new Civil Code);

i) the establishment of the person who is to be appointed tutor of testator's children (art. 114 of the new Civil Code) or removal of the possibility for a person to be a tutor (art. 113 of the new Civil Code);

j) provisions regarding that part of assets to which testator's spouse would be entitled at the marriage termination (art. 350 of the new Civil Code);

k) a testator may agree to or forbid the use, after his death, of organs, tissues and human cells sampled from him, for therapeutic or scientific purposes (art. 81 of the new Civil Code);

l) provisions regarding the creation of a foundation;

m) an interdiction on the alienation of an asset, for a period longer than 49 years, on condition that there is a serious and legitimate interest for that matter (art. 627 of the new Civil Code);

n) the empowerment of a person to administer one of several assets or an estate which does not belong to him (art. 792 of the new Civil Code);

o) the choice of the law applicable to one's own inheritance (art. 2634 of the new Civil Code);

p) also other provisions regarding testator's last will, if they do not transgress public order.

2.4. Mutual will

Similar to the 1864 Civil Code, the new Civil Code consecrates two form conditions, which are common to all wills.

a) written form;

b) forbiddance of mutual will

According to provisions of article 1036 of the new Civil Code, "Under the sanction of absolute nullity, two or more persons cannot make provisions, by means of the same will, on behalf of each other's or on behalf of a third party". The aim of the interdiction mentioned above is to guarantee the personal, unilateral and revocable character of a will.

It can be thus noticed the fact that the new Civil Code calls "mutual will" that will by means of which two or more persons make provisions on behalf of each other's or on behalf of a third party. Therefore, Law No. 287/2009 abandons the notion of "conjunctive will", which has been used by the 1864 Civil Code.

As to us, we consider that neither of the two denominations (conjunctive will and mutual will) cover the contents of the will in question. Thus, mutual will covers only that hypothesis in which two persons make provisions, by means of the same act, on behalf of each other, whereas conjunctive will[10] covers that hypothesis in which two persons make provisions, by means of the same act, on behalf of a third party. In our opinion, it would have been more appropriate for the lawmaker to call the second general form condition of a will "separate act interdiction".

Also in the light of the new Civil Code, it can be considered that a will is not mutual if two or more persons make provisions on the same sheet of paper, if the manifestations of their will are distinct, valid per se and separately signed, each of them expressing the will of one person. Thus, a will is mutual only if it represents the common work of two or more persons and if its provisions merge in the same context. There are valid, nonetheless, the separate wills which contain mutual and interdependent provisions. At the same time, one of the spouse's will is valid even if it was signed by the other spouse as well[11].

The transgression of the interdiction on mutual will triggers the sanction of absolute nullity of that will. Still, in some circumstances, the rigour of such a sanction is attenuated or even removed. Thus:

a) the confirmation of a will by a testator's universal heirs or by universal title triggers the fact of giving up to the right of contrary invoking form flaws or any nullity reasons, without prejudicing the rights of third parties (art. 1010 of the new Civil Code)[12].

Thus, the will which does not abide by the essential validity conditions creates a natural obligation for the heir involved, which cannot be imposed by means of any constriction, but which can be executed or confirmed out of good will and full awareness, constituting a valid payment, which is nonetheless not subject to indemnification.

b) The sanction of nullity for form flaws does not concern those testamentary provisions which can be accomplished also in another form. For instance, the recognition of a child outside marriage, by means of an authentic will, but mutual, produces legal effects. According to provisions of article 416 of the new Civil Code, the recognition of a child may be carried out by means of a statement at the Register Office, by means of an authentic document or by means of a will. Thus, if the recognition of the child was performed by means of an authentic but mutual will, the latter has legal effects as a result of the fact that the same recognition could have also been carried out by means of an authentic document. Therefore, when it comes to the recognition of a child, it operates the conversion of an authentic will, which is null as a result of not abiding by the interdiction on mutual will, in an authentic document acknowledging filiation.

At the same time, the revocation of a will through a subsequently authentic one, but which is null for not observing the form of a separate act, produces legal effects (article 1051 of the new Civil Code which refers only to the authentic character of the revocation act).

c) the authentic will, which is null as a result of form flaws (for instance, it was authenticated by an incompetent civil servant), is valid as other testamentary form, if it abides by the conditions provided for by law in what that form is concerned (article 1050 of the new Civil Code).

---

[10] We mention nonetheless that the new Civil Code regulates conjunctive legacy at article 1065, by referring through this type of legacy to that testamentary provision by means of which a testator leaves an asset to more legatees by particular title in the same will, without mentioning the part to each of them is entitled.

[11] Francisc Deak, Tratat de drept succesoral, II edition, updated and completed (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publ. House, 2002), 176-7.

[12] This provision was taken over from the French Civil Code (art. 1339-1340) and is explained by the fact that the act confirming an inform donation made by a testator while he was alive is sanctioned with absolute nullity, since that testator has the possibility to make again that donation in the form provided for by law. Once the testator dies, since such a thing is no longer possible, his heirs have the right to "repair" the donation flaw by confirmation. See the National Union of Notaries Public from Romania, quoted works, 364.

d) absolute nullity intervenes in the case of wills which do not observe the form requisites regulated by lege lata and which were drafted by the Romanian citizens on the Romanian territory. On the contrary, if wills are drafted by Romanian citizens according to other laws or outside Romania, their form rules will be differently assessed. Thus:

- from a temporal point of view, within internal law is applicable the principle tempus regit actum, according to which the validity of a will (also under a formal aspect) is assessed according to the laws in force at the moment the will was drafted.

- from a spatial point of view, the will which was drafted, modified or revoked by a Romanian citizen abroad is valid only if it abides by the form conditions applicable either at the moment when it was drafted, modified or revoked, or at the moment when the testator died, and such conditions were consecrated by one of the following laws (art. 2635 NCC):

- national law on testator;
- law on testator's residence;
- law on the place where the act was drafted, modified or revoked;
- law on the situation of the premises constituting the object of the will;
- law on the court or institution complying with the procedure regarding the transmission of inherited goods;

e) in what the classification of the separate act condition is concerned, specialized literature contains two theories.

According to one of the two, to which we also agree, the interdiction of mutual will constitutes a form condition, its transgression triggering the application of absolute nullity sanction[13]. Such sanction becomes inapplicable in the case of a will drafted by a Romanian citizen in a country having a legislation which does not forbid common will.

There has also been stated the opinion according to which the interdiction of mutual will constitutes a form condition, so that a common will cannot generate effects, not even if it was drafted by a Romanian citizen in a country having a legislation which does not forbid this kind of will[14].

2.5. Proof of will

The new Civil Code regulates the proof of will at article 1037. Thus: "Any person claiming a right founded on a will must prove its existence and contents in one of the forms provided for by law" [article 1037 paragraph (1) of the new Cicil Code]. Consequently, the duty to prove the existence and contents of the will belongs to the interested person, according to the rules of common law within the field.

Currently, the common law within the field is represented by the provisions of articles 1169-1206 of the 1864 Civil Code, which constitute the only provisions of the normative act in question which were not abrogated by the entry in force of the new Civil Code. Nonetheless, such provisions regulating the field of proofs will be abrogated at the date when Law No. 134/2010 on the Civil Procedure Code[15] enters in force.

We also mention that the new Civil Code does not contain any provision regarding evidence, such provisions being naturally included in the new Civil Procedure Code.

As a consequence, any interested person can prove the existence and contents of a will, in one of the forms provided for by law, according to the rules contained by articles 1169-1206 of the 1864 Civil Code. Given that the written form of the will constitutes a condition for the latter to be valid,

---

[13] Matei B. Cantacuzino, Elementele dreptului civil, (Bucharest: All Educational Publ. House, 1998), 364; Mihail Eliescu, quoted works, 432; Dumitru Macovei, quoted works., 74; Eugeniu Safta-Romano, Dreptul de moştenire, (Iaşi: Grafix Publ. House, 1995), 180-2.

[14] Constantin Hamangiu and others, quoted works, 822-3.

[15] Law No. 134/2010 on Civil Procedure Code was published in Romania's Official Gazette, Part I. No. 485, from July 15th 2010, but the date when it will enter in force was not yet established.

while its absence triggers the absolute nullity of the last will act, the interested person can prove, as a rule, the existence or contents of the will only by means of a document which observes, as the case may be, the conditions of authentic, holograph, privileged will or of the will regarding deposited amounts of money and values.

Nonetheless, by exception, "If a will disappears as a result of an unpredictable or force majeure case or of a third party's deed, either after testator's death or during his life, but without testator knowing that his will disappeared, it will be possible to prove the validity and contents of the will by using any means of proof" [art. 1037 paragraph (2) of the new Civil Code].

Therefore, only if a will disappears as a result of an unpredictable or force majeure case or of a third party's deed, its validity of form and contents can be proven by using any means of proof. We mention that it can be used any means of poof to prove the validity of the form and contents of the will, even when that will disappeared as a result of an unpredictable or force majeure case or of a third party's deed, during testator's life, if the testator under scrutiny did not know about the disappearance of his last will act.

The provision contained by article 1037 of paragraph (2) of the new Civil Code rests with the exclusive competence of the court.

2.6. Testator's consent[16]

Although the new Civil Code, when regulating the issue of will, refers only to testator's consent, the last will act must nonetheless abide by all the conditions essential for the validity of a contract, which constitute the common law within field. Thus, a will must observe the essential validity conditions provided for by article 1179 of the new Civil Code and regarding capacity, consent, object and cause. Moreover, a will – by being a legal solemn act – must take a solemn form.

We will continue by pointing out only the features which a testator's consent evinces in relation to the field of will.

Thus, according to provisions of article 1038 paragraph (1) of the new Civil Code, "A will is valid only if the person who ordered it had discernment and his contents were not corrupted"

Still, the legal provisions mentioned above must be corroborated with those of articles 1204-1224, which regulate the validity of consent in the field of contract.

Consequently, testator's consent must be serious, free and expressed with full awareness.

In principle, in the field of will, a testator's consent can be vitiated by error, malice (Latin: dolus) or violence, while lesion cannot be encountered in this field.

An error can trigger the vitiation of consent and the annulment of a will only if that will was drafted at a moment when the testator could be found committing an essential error [art. 1207 paragraph (1) of the New Civil Code]. An error is essential and can trigger the annulment of a will only in the following hypotheses:

- regards the identity of a legatee or his essential qualities, in the absence of which a testator would have never bequeathed anything to that legatee (the testator thought that the legatee was his child outside marriage);

- regards the determinant reason of the will (the testator did not know he had blood relatives; if the testator had known he had blood relatives, he would have not instituted legatees);

Similar to the former regulation in the civil field, the new Civil Code does not provide that for the second cause mentioned above intervenes the nullity of the contract. But in the case of will, which is a legal unilateral act, it is necessary for the nullity of that will to be instituted, for such a reason[17].

[16] See also Ilioara Genoiu, „Condiţiile de validitate ale testamentului în noul Cod civil român şi în dreptul francez", in Lumen International Scientific Conference 2011 Volume, „Logos, universalitate, mentalitate, educaţie, noutate", Section Law, (Iaşi: Lumen Publ. House, 2011), 87-106.b. For analyzing the issues in question in the light of the former Civil Code, see, among others, also Dumitru Văduva, Succesiuni. Devoluţiunea succesorală, (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publ. House, 2011), 65-105.

In theory, a will can be annulled as a result of testator's consent being vitiated by physical or moral violence. But in practice such a hypothesis is not encountered, given that the testator whose consent was vitiated by violence has the possibility to subsequently revoke such a will.

In the field of will, malice is most frequently encountered. Article 1038 paragraph (2) of the new Civil Code points out that "Malice can trigger the annulment of a will, even if the malice practices were not used by the beneficiary of testamentary provisions and he was not familiar with them"

Also in the light of the new Civil Code, we can say that malice evinces some features in the field of will, represented by trapping and suggestion. The vitiation of consent by malice consists in the use, by the legatee (or by a representative, delegate or guarantor of his business) of some devious tactics, in order to gain testator's confidence and determine him to make provisions on favour of that person, under the circumstances in which he would have never done that out of his own initiative[18].

It is difficult to make a clear distinction between the two forms of malice, in the field of will, since they are interconnected from the perspective of the activities used and the goal pursued.

In essence, trapping consists in the use, by a person, of some deceiving methods and direct brutal illegal means (such as sequestrating the testator, violating testator's mail, keeping testator's friends and relatives away from him), with the view to gain testator's confidence, by deceiving his good faith and determining him to make provisions on favour of that person in his will.

Suggestion consists instead the use of indirect means, with a hidden, insidious, refined character (such as: tricks, false statements regarding legal heirs, speculating certain conceptions or feelings of the testator), so as to induce to the testator the idea to create a liberality which otherwise would have not made.

Suggestion and trapping trigger the annulment of will only if they altered testator's consent, that is, if in their absence, the testator would have never made that liberality. Thus, trapping and suggestion do not constitute per se causes for annulling a will. Simulated affection shown to a testator or the fact of providing certain services or cures to him do not determine the nullity of a will. The tactics which are typical to malice must not be confounded with the true, natural manifestations of compassion and help between people, which do not constitute the result of a fraudulent intention of trapping and suggestion.

In conclusion, in order to speak of malice in the field of will, the following conditions must be met altogether[19]:

a) the use of some devious, fraudulent tactics and methods;

b) the intent to mislead the testator in bad faith;

c) the use of some fraudulent tactics resulting in altering testator's will, the latter making provisions under the circumstances he would have never done it out of his own initiative.

Taken into account the fact that a will is a unilateral act, it must not be observed for that matter the condition requiring for malice to come from the other party, so that malice can come from any person.

The notary public's assessment, according to which testator's consent was not vitiated at the moment his last will act was drafted, it is considered proof until contrary evidence, being possible to be challenged by any means of proof.

---

[17] Ioan Adam and Adrian Rusu, Drept civil. Succesiuni, (Bucharest: All Beck Publ. House, 2003), 163.

[18] Mihail Eliescu, quoted works, 178-9; Stanciu Cărpenaru, „Dreptul de moştenire" in Drept civil. Contracte speciale. Dreptul de autor. Dreptul de moştenire, Francisc Deak and Stanciu Cărpenaru (Bucharest: Bucharest University, 1983), 430; Francisc Deak*, quoted works,* 171.

[19] Francisc Deak, quoted works, 171; Ioan Adam and Adrian Rusu, quoted works, 165.

In the field of wills with complex contents, comprising several legal freestanding acts, it can be encountered a consent vitiated only partially, so that some testamentary provisions can be annulled as a result of consent being vitiated, while others can stay perfectly valid. Unlike the vitiation of consent, the absence of consent triggers the complete nullity of a will, since it is not conceivable for discernment to exist only in relation to certain testamentary provisions and be absent in relation to others.

Therefore, in the field of wills with complex contents, the court must carry out a very complicated operation, consisting in the establishing, along with the vitiation of consent, also the influence of such vice upon the contents of last will act.

If testator's consent was vitiated, the sanction of relative nullity intervenes. The legal action for establishing relative nullity must be taken by observing the general statute of limitations term.

2.7. Interpretation of will

Although a will is a solemn act, it is drafted by a competent public servant only when it comes to authentic will. Moreover, under no circumstance must a testator's will be expressed in sacramental terms. Thus, will (particularly holograph will) may contain doubtable, ambiguous clauses which must be interpreted. The entity which is competent to perform such a legal operation is the court, the judge not being guided, in principle, in his legal action, by special legal provisions.

Thus, according to provisions of article 1039 of the new Civil Code, "The rules for interpreting contracts are also applicable to will, if they are compatible with the latter's legal features". According to the provisions of paragraphs (2) and (3) of the same legal text, constitute special rules for interpreting a will the following:

- the elements which are extrinsic to a testamentary document can be used only if they are based on the intrinsic ones;
- the legacy in favour of a creditor is not presumed to be made so as to compensate his debt title

Consequently, when it comes to interpreting testamentary clauses lacking clarity, the following rules must be observed[20]:

a) when interpreting testamentary provisions, it must be taken into account the real will of a testator, and not the literal meaning of terms (art. 1266 of the new Civil Code), since in conditionibus (testamenti) primum locum voluntas defuncti obtinet;

b) testator's intent will be sought, first of all, in the contents of the will and only afterwards in exterior deeds and circumstances[21], whereas the extrinsic elements of the testamentary document can be used only if they are based on the intrinsic ones;

c) in case of doubt, a clause is interpreted in favor of legal heirs and not of legatees;

d) a testamentary clause is interpreted as having an effect, and not as not having any [article 1268 paragraph (3) of the new Civil Code];

e) testamentary clauses are interpreted through each others, by providing to each of them the meaning resulting from the whole act (article 1267 of the new Civil Code)

f) the legacy in favour of a creditor is not presumed to be made so as to compensate his debt title.

3. Conclusions

At the end of our analysis, we are listing the novelty elements consecrated by Law No. 287/2009 and regarding the general aspects of a will. Thus:

- unlike the Civil Code in force, the new Civil Code defines will in a complete adequate manner, by referring to its main legal features and by assigning its contents properly;

[20] Francisc Deak, quoted works, 160-1.

[21] Constantin Hamangiu and others, quoted works, 874.

- according to the new Civil Code, the contents of a will can be completed also by other provisions, such as: establishment of the person who is to be appointed tutor of testator's children or the removal of the possibility for a person to become tutor; provisions regarding the part to which testator's spouse would be entitled from his estate, at the end of matrimony; a testator may agree to or forbid the use, after his death, of his sampled organs, tissues and human cells, for therapeutic or scientific purposes; provisions on the creation of a foundation; an interdiction relating to the alienation of a good, for a period of at most 49 years, on the condition that there is a serious legitimate interest for that matter; the empowerment of a person to administer one or several assets or an estate which does not belong to him; the choice of the law applicable to one's own succession;

- in what the form of will is concerned, the new Civil Code regulates mutual will as equivalent of the conjunctive will from the former regulation;

- contains special provisions regarding the proof of will, under the circumstances in which the new Civil Code no longer regulates the issue on evidence, the latter constituting the monopoly of the new Civil Procedure Code;

- states the fact that malice (dolus) triggers the annulment of a will, even if the malice tactics were not carried out by the beneficiary of testamentary provisions or were not familiar to him;

- consecrates two special rules for interpreting a will.

As to us, we consider that new Civil Code, by using an actual specialized language, provides a modern, just and flexible regulation of the general aspects typical to will.

References:

Books:

- Adam, Ioan and Adrian Rusu. Drept civil. Succesiuni. Bucharest: All Beck Publ. House, 2003.
- Cantacuzino, Matei. Elementele dreptului civil. Bucharest: All Educational Publ. House, 1998.
- Cărpenaru, Stanciu. „Dreptul de moştenire" in Drept civil. Contracte speciale. Dreptul de autor. Dreptul de moştenire, Deak, Francisc and Cărpenaru, Stanciu. Bucharest: Bucharest University, 1983.
- Deak, Francisc. Tratat de drept succesoral, II edition, updated and completed, Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publ. House, 2002.
- Eliescu, Mihail. Moştenirea şi devoluţiunea ei în dreptul Republicii Socialiste România. Bucharest: Academiei Publ. House, 1966.
- Florescu, Dumitru. Dreptul succesoral. Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publ. House, 2011.
- Hamangiu, Constantin and others. Tratat de drept civil român. Bucharest: 1929.
- Macovei, Dumitru. Drept civil. Succesiuni. Iaşi: „Chemarea" Publ. House, 1993.
- Safta-Romano, Eugeniu. Dreptul de moştenire. Iaşi: Grafix Publ. House, 1995.
- Stătescu, Constantin. Drept civil. Contractul de transport. Drepturile de creaţie intelectuală. Succesiunile. Bucharest: Editura Didactică şi Pedagogică Publ. House, 1967.
- National Union of Notaries Public. Codul civil al României. Îndrumar notarial. vol. I. Bucharest: Monitorul Oficial Publ. House, 2011.
- Văduva, Dumitru. Succesiuni. Devoluţiunea succesorală. Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publ. House, 2011.

Articles:

- Genoiu, Ilioara. „Formele testamentului în noul Cod civil". „Law" Magazine (12/2011).
- Genoiu, Ilioara. „Condiţiile de validitate ale testamentului în noul Cod civil român şi în dreptul francez". Lumen International Scientific Conference 2011 Volume, „Logos, universalitate, mentalitate, educaţie, noutate", Section Law, (Iaşi: Lumen Publ. House, 2011), 87-106.
- Poenaru, Emil. „Recunoaşterea prin testament a copilului din afara căsătoriei". „Justiţia nouă" Magazine (3/1956): 463 and the following.

SOCIETAS PRIVATA EUROPAEA VERSUS SOCIETAS EUROPAEA

LUMINIȚA TULEAȘCĂ*

Abstract
The stage of political procedures and negotiations related to the statute of a new European company: European Private Company triggers the analysing of the main features of such a company and comparing them to those of the companies regulated in Romania and on other member states of the European Union.
Therefore, we shall have a complete picture on the organic statute of this new company and, especially, on the divergent aspects, aspects having prevented the enactment of the Regulation regarding European Private Company (Societas Privata Europaea).
And not least, it is the only way to determine the extent the new trading company contributes to exceed the current issues of business development in the European Union, in which extent the European private company shall represent or not a progress in the matter of European trading companies, where the main mark is represented by the European Company (Societas Europaea).

Keywords: European company, European private company, transfer of registered office, capital, cross-border element.

I. Introduction

The statistics indicate that more than 40% of the SMEs in the European Union might develop their cross-border activity but claimed that they lack in the needed instrument[1] as the existing transnational companies: European Economic Interest Group (EEIG), the European Company or the European Cooperative Society[2] do not grant a proper type of SMEs[3]

Therefore, according to Libertas - Europaisches Institut GmbH in the member states, during the period 2004 – 2011, only 739 European Companies were established with various sizes (including family business), which operate in various fields of activity amongst which, 47 were dissolved, during the period 1989-2011 only 1361 GEIE were established (out of which 214 are dissolved) and, during the period 2008-2011, 20 SCE[4] were established.

On the other hand, the diversity of the limited liability companies in the member states indubitably generate their lack in flexibility and, in case of groups of companies, it renders difficult the deployment and effectiveness of the activities of their branches from other states of the European Union. The parent company is compelled to establish each branch of another type in each and every

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Law, Romanian-American University, Bucharest, Blvd. Expozitiei nr.1B, sector 1, Romania, tel.0040 212029510, fax: 0040 3183566 (email: luminita.tuleasca@tuleasca.com).

[1] KPMG survey presented at Business Europe's SME Action Day on 21 November 2007.

[2] See respectively Council Regulation (EEC) 2137/85 of 25 July 1985, Council Regulation (EC) 2157/2001 of 8 October 2001, Council Regulation (EC) 1435/2003 of 22 July 2003.

[3] According to a general EU definition, small and medium sized enterprises are those with less than 250 employees. Within this category the following sub-categories are distinguished as per Commission recommendation 2003/361/EC: (i) Medium-sized enterprises [headcount <250 and turnover ≤€ 50 million and/or balance sheet total ≤€ 43 million]; (ii) Small enterprises [headcount <50 and turnover ≤€ 10 million and/or balance sheet total ≤€ 10 million] Micro enterprises [headcount <10 and turnover ≤€ 2 million and/or balance sheet total ≤€ 2 million]; (iii) Micro enterprises [headcount <10 and turnover ≤€ 2 million and/or balance sheet total ≤€ 2 million].

[4] The statistics supplied by Libertas-Europaisches Institut GmbH, are made at the level of November 2011; available at <<www.libertas-institut.com>> (latest visit on January 30, 2012).

member state where established, branches to company to different legal regimes. All this generates costs and inconveniences, barriers for the development of international business[5].

To this end, in order to create a type of company destined for small and medium enterprises, The European Commission drafted a study for the feasibility of an European statute of small and medium enterprises (PME –"Les petites et moyennes entreprise").

Based on the Communication of the Commission to the Council and Parliament from May 21, 2003: "Modernization of trading companies' law and strengthening of corporative management in the EU. A plan to advance"[6] and of the Commission Report for legal businesses of the Parliament in 29.11.2006[7], the European Parliament enacted on February 1, 2007 the Resolution which included the recommendations of the Commission regarding the statute of the European private company and the request for the Commission to present, during the year of 2007, a bill according to the recommendations of the Parliament.

In such background, in June 2008, the European Commission presented in front of the Council a proposal for a Regulation (hereinafter the Regulation) for the Statute of the European Private Company (Societas Privata Europaea; hereinafter, the SPE).

The proposal was made on the grounds of art.352 in the TFUE (article 308 EC Treaty) with the significance that, in order to pass it, they needed the approval of all the 27 Member States of the European Union.

On March 10, 2009, the European Parliament approved the proposal with amendments and adopted a law resolution[8] and indicated the Commission to alter its proposal accordingly.

The revised wording of the regulation of the Council regarding the statute of SPE (hereinafter the Regulation Proposal) is in its final step to be passed, as indicated in the document of the Council DRS 84 SOC 432 from May 23, 2011[9] following to conclude a final political agreement

There is currently a decision making blockage due to the rule of unanimity, proposing as way out of the impasse, the elaboration of a new directive or the amendment of the twelfth directive of trading companies, in order to create a simplified company which shall be established by a sole associate, who shall allow the reduction of the business deployment costs of useless formalities. Such proposal was not agreed upon as it would not reach the targets as good as the SPE related proposal.

There existed no preoccupation in Romania for the SPE and the legal studies in the matter al almost inexistent, the undertakers in Romania are interested in extending their activity on the territory of the single market.

---

[5] Andreas Bernecker, "A European Private Company - Is Europe's single legal form for SMEs close to approval?", Deutsche Bank Research, July 19, 2010, available at: <<http://www.dbresearch.de/PROD/DBR_INTERNET_DEPROD/ PROD0000000000260277 /A+European+Private+Company%3A+Is+Europe%E2%80%99s+single+legal+form+for+SMEs+close+to+approval%3F.PDF>>.

[6] Communication of the Commission to the Council and Parliament from May 21, 2003 entitled: "Modernization of the law of trading companies and strengthening of corporative governing in the EU. A plan to go ahead", COM(2003)284, celex:52003DC0284.

[7] Report from November 29, 2006 of the Commission for legal business of the European Parliament, containing as well regulations to the European Commission related to the statute of the European private company and proposal for the Resolution of the European Parliament in such direction [2006/2013 (INI)] rapporteur Klaus-Heiner Lehne, stage of procedure: A6-0434/2006; This report is based on a regulation draft regarding the statute of EPC jointly promoted by MEDEF and CCI, available at: http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?pubRef=-//EP//NONSGML+REPORT+A6-2006-0434+0+DOC+PDF+V0//EN&language=EN.

[8] European Parliament legislative resolution of 10 March 2009 on the Proposal for a Council Regulation on the Statute for a European Private Company, P6_TA(2009)0094; available at <<http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do;jsessionid= 3A6D2E4B375D4F87B4AF504459A78D53.node2?pubRef=-//EP//TEXT+TA+P6-TA-2009-0094+0+DOC+XML+V0//EN>> (last seen November 12, 2011).

[9] DRS 84 SOC 432 from May 23, 2011, available at:
<< http://register.consilium.europa.eu/pdf/ro/11/st10/st10611.ro11.pdf>> (last seen on November 11, 2011).

We proposed by this paper to analyse the main features of the European Private Company marked out in official documents, to compare them to those of the main European company: the Europea public limited company - Societas Europaea, in order to determine and indicate the extent such new company shall represent or not a progress in the matter of European trading companies and the extent it shall contribute to the removal of the current issues in doing business in the European Union

II. The Main Features of the European Company and of the European Private Company

As indicated, the premise of SPE regulation was created by the current issues existing in the cross-border activity of small and medium enterprises, the SE being, in principle, destined to large enterprises and, by the fact that, SE regulation contains enough limitations of its transnational character.

The statute of the public limited company passed by the European Council Regulation no. 2157/2001 from October 8, 2001[10](hereinafter, the Regulation 2157/2001), was received with lots of enthusiasm by the European legal world and is registered amongst the acts the Council should have passed before 1992 based on the White Paper of the Commission related to the finalization of internal market, approved by the European Council met in Milano in June 1985.

The great advantage of the establishment of a European company is considered that of simplifying the structure of the enterprises which can develop their activity in the entire Europe without the establishment of lots of branches complying with different national regulations[11].

In Romania, the European Company is regulated by Emergency Governmental Ordinance no.52/2008[12] for the amendment and completion of Law no.31/1990 related to trading companies and for the completion of Law no.26/1990 related to the register of companies and, based on such regulation, by the European Regulation no. 2157/2001 related to the Statute of the European Company.

The main features of the Europea public limited company[13] consist of the fact that, it is a capital joint-stock company, with a subscribed capital which cannot be lower than EUR 120,000 and becomes legal person on the date of its registration with the National Register in the member state where its headquarters has the registered office, that is, on the date of its registration with the Register of Companies for those with registered office in Romania, without the possibility for its [10] Council Regulation no. 2157/2001 from October 8, 2001 entered into force in 2004, published in the Official Gazette L 294/1 from October 10, 200, Regulation supplemented by Directive no. 2001/86/CE and of the Council from October 8, 2001 to supplement the Statute of the SE regarding workers' involvement, published in the Official Gazette L 294/22 from October 10, 2001, with subsequent amendments, with the last amendment made by Regulation no. 1791/2006 (adopted as a consequence of the adhesion of Romania and Bulgaria to the EU on January 1, 2007), published in the Official Gazette L 363 from December 20, 2006.

---

[11] F. Blanquet, Pourquoi créer une société européenne?, in: La société européenne, Dalloz, Paris, 2003, p. 5; J. Beguin, M. Menjucq, G. Bourdeaux, A. Couret, B. le Bars, D. Mainguy, H. Ruiz Fabri, J.-M. Sorel, C. Seraglini, Droit du commerce international, Litec, LexisNexis, Paris, 2005, p. 200-214.

[12] Emergency Governmental Ordinance no. 52/2008 for the amendment and supplementation of Law no. 31/1990 related to trading companies and for the supplementation of Law no. 26/1990 related to the Register of Companies, published in the Official Gazette no. 33 from April 30, 2008.

[13] Complete presentation of European Companies and of their evolution in the Report: "Societas Europaea pour une citoyénnete européenne de l'éntreprise" from March 19, 2007, presented by Noelle Lenoir and collectively performed by Ronan Guerlot, Mirko Hayat, Erwan le Meur, Marii-Laure Combet, Marc Guillaume, Reinhard Dammann, Nichel Menjucq, published on the site of the Ministry of Justice of France: <<www.justice.gouv.fr>>;J. Beguin, M. Menjucq, G. Bourdeaux, A. Couret, B. le Bars, D. Mainguy, H. Ruiz Fabri, J.-M. Sorel, C. Seraglini, Droit du commerce international, LexisNexis, Ed. Litec, Paris, 2005, p. 200-21; E. E. Ştefan, O nouă formă de societate. Societatea Europeană (I) (Societas Europaea), în RDC nr. 1/2007, p. 104.

registration to be performed if the company did not conclude any prior agreement related to the involvement of its employees in the activity of the company, under the conditions provided for by Governmental Decision no. 187/2007 related to the information, advise procedures and other employees' involvement methods in the activity of the European Company[14].

SPE is forecasted to be a limited liability company, legal person starting on the date of its registration with the special register of the member state where it has its registered office, being conceived as a closed company which can be established ex nihilo, with a registered capital of minimum EUR 1.

By its field of application, the regulation draft indicates its implacability in the matter of property, tax regime, labour law, insolvency and tort liability. Such aspects are to be regulated by the applicable domestic law.

Below, the study shall exclusively regard the main features of the two types of European companies and those features, especially, which represent weak points in the negotiations to pass the SE regulation, features which lead to the reforming of the current European company structures.

1. Law of Organic Statute

Regarding the law applicable to SE, seeing that it was designed as a real European law company, this aspect is the outcome of a compromise. Although they went for rare referrals to domestic laws, the referrals were more and more frequent, the European company being a hybrid[15].

According to the provisions of art.9 of Regulation 2157/2001, a SE is regulated by: (a) de provisions of the regulation, (b) in case this regulation explicitly allows it, the provisions in its own statute or (c) in case of aspects not regulated by this regulation or, for the aspects partially regulated by it, in case of those elements which are not regulated by this regulation, by : (i) the legal provisions enacted by the member states for applying the community measures related to the SE; (ii) the legal provisions in the member states applicable to a public limited company established according to the law of the member state where the concerned SE has its registered office; (iii) the provisions in the statute of the company, under the same conditions as for a public limited company established according to the law of the member state where the concerned SE has its registered office.

In case of SPE, its applicable law represented one of the most difficult issues of the regulation draft, as it aimed to the strongest autonomization, in proportion to domestic law, of such entity, Article 4 of SPE regulation establishes the applicable right of SPE, organic statute of which shall be governed first of all by the provisions of the regulation and, secondly, by the provisions of the article of association of SPE, creating by it a shield to the application of the Member States' law[16].

The associates, based on the free will principle and on the provisions of art.4 from the Regulation, can insert as well in the articles of association provisions related to the aspects listed in Annex I of the SPE Regulation (additionally to the compulsory content of the articles of association established by art.8 in the SPE Regulation).

The aspects included in Annex I of the SPE regulation are a lot (there are more than 40 positions), and mainly regard the internal organizing of the SPE

[14] Governmental Decision no. 187/2007 related to the procedures of information, consultancy and other employees' involvement methods in the activity of the European Company, published in the Official Gazette no. 161 from March 7, 2007.

[15] Michel Menjucq, Droit international et europeen des societes, 2e edition, Montchrestien, Paris, 2008, p.221-p.222.

[16] Susanne Braun, "Essay-The European Private Company: A Supranational Company Form for Small and Medium-sized Entreprises?", German Law Journal, Vol.05 No.11, 2004, p.1393-1408, available at: << http://www.germanlawjournal.com/article.php?id=518>>.

Nevertheless, the SPE Regulation does not offer the SPE a total autonomy of the legal regime but, the provisions of the domestic law of the company only apply in case of the aspects expressly mentioned by the regulation. The national law of the company or the domestic applicable law is the law of the Member State where the SPE records its registered office

Third of all, the aspects uncovered (unregulated) or partially covered by the regulation and by its Annex I, as well as in case of aspects included in Annex I but not contained in the articles of association, they are object of the laws passed by the member states for applying the regulation and, in default, the provisions of the law applicable to the company

The method to nominate the aspects regulated by the domestic law of the company, by elimination, is criticised in the specialty literature, as there are opinions according to which the application scope of domestic law shall be determined by the interpretation given in each and every Member State to the words: "uncovered by" the Regulation or by Annex I[17].

Obviously, by the legislative technique used by article 4 of the SPE Regulation it is avoided as much as possible the application of the domestic law of the company

2. Formation

2.1. The establishment methods of a company, especially of European companies, have a strong role in the process to choose the establishment type of the company, the simplicity of its establishment offering indubitable advantages.

Unfortunately, being conceived for the development of large businesses, SE cannot be directly established as such, but only indirectly, by four methods[18]:

(i) by merger of two or more public limited companies established based on the law of a member state, having its registered office and headquarters within the Community, provided at least two of them be regulated by the law of different member states.

(ii) by the establishment of an European Holding Company by public limited companies and limited liability company established based on the law of a member state, with the registered office and headquarters on the territory of the Community if at least two of them are regulated by the law of different member states or hold of at least two years a branch regulated by the law of another member state or a branch on the territory of another member state.

(iii) by the establishment of an European Company branch by companies or other public or private law legal entities established on the grounds of the law of a member state, having its registered office and headquarters on the territory of the Community if at least two of them are regulated by the law of different member states or have been holding for at least two years a branch regulated by the law of another member state or by a branch on the territory of another member state.

(iv) by transformation into SE of a public limited company established based on the law of a member state, having its registered office and headquarters on the territory of the Community and if it has been holding for at least two years a branch regulated by the law another member state[19].

---

[17] H.J. de Kluiver, J.Roest, "Expulsion and Withdrawal of Shareholders" and M.I.Lennarts, "Voice Rights of Shareholders", bouth in: D.F.M.M. Zaman et al. (eds.) The European Private Company (SPE). A Critical Analysis of the EU Draft Statute, 2009, p.70 and p.126, indicated by Sandra van den Braak in "The European Private Company, its shareholders and its creditors", Utrecht law Review, Volume 6, Issue 1 (January), 2010.

[18] Romanian regulation does not contain special provisions related to the establishment of European Company, with referrals for such purpose to the European regulation: "related to this emergency ordinance, European company is the joint stock company established under the conditions and by the mechanisms provided for in the Council Regulation (CE) no. 2157/2001 from October 8, 2001 related to the statute of European Company" – art. IV paragraph 1 from Emergency Governmental Ordinance no. 52/2008.

[19] For details related to the establishment of SE, in the Romanian doctrine, please see: Manole Ciprian Popa, Grupurile de societati, Ed.C.H.Beck, Bucuresti, 2011, p.250 si urm.

Unlike all the other current European entities (European company, European groups with economical interest, the European cooperative companies), SPE can be established ex nihilo, according to the traditional method for a trading company formation, by its transformation and by the merger of current trading companies.

We therefore remove a main inconvenient of European company forms which were not to be established as such, from the beginning. Such aspect may have been an obstacle for the option of business agents for an European company.

An SPE shall be established ex nihilo (directly) by one or more private or public law natural or legal persons, according to the provisions of SPE regulation.

The transformation of a current legal person, regulated by the internal law of a member state is the second establishment method for an SPE, under the conditions, according to the regulation*, the member states are compelled to allow the transformation of a limited liability national company in an SPE.* Regarding the other types of national companies, the member states shall allow their transformation in an SPE in the extent domestic law allows their transformation in a limited liability company, in general.

In this establishment method for the SPE, according to the general rules in the matter, the legal person / company which is transformed is neither dissolved nor loses its legal personality.

When domestic law imposes a restriction related to the transformation of a legal person in a limited liability company, such restriction is applied, mutatis mutandis, to the transformation of the SPE as well.

In case the SPE is established ex nihilo or by transformation, the establishment of the company shall be regulated by the regulation.

And not least, the SPE can be established by merger, according to domestic law.

2.2. In any of the establishment methods allowed by the regulation, SPE is established by the signature of the articles of association by the founder members, in written form, it being object of the formal requirements provided for in the applicable domestic law

By such provision, the regulation first concedes in favour of the member states, giving the possibility of the applicable domestic law for the establishment of SPE to impose as well other shape conditions of the articles of association. In this direction, domestic laws include various provisions, in some cases, being imposed the written form for the validity of the articles of association, in others for proving the articles of association and as well its authentic form for its validity

As for example, the Romanian law[20] imposes as regulation the written form of the articles of association, for its validity and, by exception, the authentic form when the limited liability company is established where a land is brought as contribution to the establishment of the registered capital

The opposability of the articles of association is as well obtained, according to the provisions of the applicable domestic law.

The article of association of the SPE must include at least the aspects provided for by art.8 in the regulation.

The inclusion of additional clauses related to the aspects mentioned in Annex I of the SPE regulation is to be appreciated by the founder members. In such case, domestic law is not applied to those aspects in the extent they are included in the articles of association.

The articles of association may include as well other aspects than those compulsory and elective from the regulation but, such other aspects shall not be regulated by the regulation, but by the applicable domestic law.

2.3. For its legal establishment, the SPE must be registered according to the provisions of domestic law, with the register held by each and every origin member state.

[20] Law no.31 from 1990 regarding trading companies and the new Romanian Civil Code.

The same rule applies to the SE which is registered in the member state where it has its registered office, with the publication of the SE registration related announcement, for information, in the Official Gazette of the European Union.

The founder members or any person authorized by them request the registration, which can be performed by electronic means as well.

Article 3 item 3 of the regulation requires as essential element of the registration as European entity of the SPE, its transnational structure.

The current shape of the SPE regulation alienates from the initial proposal which included no referral to a cross-border element as they considered that such requirement might significantly reduce the potential of the SPE. The alteration of conception was determined by the fear that such lack of community dimension as precondition of its establishment as an SPE may infringe the principle of subsidiarity regulated by article 5 in the EC Treaty[21].

The difficulties created by the cross-border components imposed for the existing European entities (European company, European group with economical interest, European cooperative company) are removed by flexible criteria included in the regulation

The needed cross-border structure must be proved in the moment of the registration of the SPE by one of the following elements, very easily to fulfil[22]:

i) an intent to operate in another member state than that where the SPE is registered; or

ii) a cross-border activity object mentioned in the articles of association of the SPE; or

iii) a branch or subsidiary registered in member state different from that where the SPE is registered; or

iv) an associate or several associates with residence or registered in more than one member state or in a member state different from that where the SPE is registered

In order to reduce administrative costs and duties related to the registration of the company, the formalities to register the SPE are limited to the requirements needed to guarantee the legal certainty, and the validity and conformity to the provisions of the regulation and to the domestic law of documents registered in the moment an SPE is created are object of one sole check of legality, performed according to domestic law

Therefore, the member states request the supply of only those pieces of information contained in the Articles of Association of the SPE, the articles of association, the documents certifying the payment of the capital, the police record of the directors, the evidence related to transformations or mergers of the SPE

In all cases, irrespective of the method to check the fulfilment of the registration conditions by an SPE, useless checks of documents and information are avoided.

The sole control of the legality of the articles of association generates the fear of notaries, mainly, in France, Germany and Austria that, the entry of SPE in such form, shall generate losses for their profession[23].

Without derogation from the general rules in the matter of companies, the legal personality is acquired in the moment of registration with the Register of Companies of the SPE constituted ex nihilo and by transformation and, in the moment of the registration of the merger of the absorbing company with the register of SPE resulted as a consequence of the merger

---

[21] Sandra van den Braak, op.cit., p.4.

[22] A.F.M. Dorresteijn, O.Uzuahu-Santcroos, "The Societas Privata Europaea under the Magnifying Glass (Part 2), European Company Law, no.4, 2009, p.159.

[23] Source: Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung. November 4, 2008, p. 21. Wirtschaftswoche.http://www.wiwo.de/politik-weltwirtschaft/bundesregierung-blockiert-europa-gmbh-397226/ (May 19, 2009, called up June 9, 2010); indicata in: Andreas Bernecker, op.cit., p.6.

The attainment of the legal personality by the SE and SPE generate the consequence of the associates' liability for the obligations of the company within the limit of their contribution to the registered capital, with the exclusion of their personal liability for the obligations of SE and SPE, respectively.

3. Registered Capital

The requirements of the minimum registered capital represent one of the most sensitive and debated aspects of a company, which can provide its success or lack of success.

Therefore, one of the three current differences of SPE regulation is represented by that of capital requirements.

Being considered a form for large companies, the capital of a SE cannot be inferior to the amount of EUR 120 000 with the possibility for the law of a member state which provides a higher subscribed capital for the companies developing certain types of activities to be applied to SE with the registered office in the concerned member state.

All the other aspects related to the registered capital of a SE: its maintenance and alteration, as well as the shares, bonds and other similar securities of the SE are regulated by the provisions applicable to a joint stock / public limited company with registered office in the member state where such SE is registered.

For the moment, the SPE is not object of a requirement of compulsorily high capital, as it would be an obstacle for the creation of SPEs. Despite all this, the creditors are protected by excessive distributions to the shareholders, which may affect the capacity of the SPE to pay its debts. For such purpose, they prohibited the distributions consequence of which the liabilities of the SPE is superior to the value of the assets. Additionally, the shareholders may request the executive management body of the SPE to sign a certificate of good standing.

There are, amongst new and especially important provisions which may provide the premises for reaching the targets of the SPE regulation, those related to the minimum registered capital of the SPE of at least EUR 1.

Germany objected to such requirement of minimum capital and, in order to avoid abuses, it requested the introduction of a of a minimum capital related requirement which shall provide the good standing of the company, which means that the minimum capital be of at least EUR 8 000.

The base of the possibility of a EUR 1 registered capital for a private company operating on a single market is given by the alteration of the conception on the guarantees the creditors of a company expect and request.

It is well known that, according to its legal significance, the registered capital represents the general pledge of the company's creditors[24]. Despite this legal reality, the social obligations exceeding by far the value of the registered capital so that, de facto, the assets of the company are those providing or not satisfaction of social creditors[25].

And not least, it is proven that the creditors prefer to request other types of guarantees, individual and enforceable, to that offered by the registered capital, the assets being those value of [24] For this conception effectiveness, please see: Mathias M. Siems, Leif Herzog and Erik Rosenhäger, "The Protection of Creditors of a European Private Company (SPE)", European Business Organization Law Review (2011), vol.12, nr.1, p.152-153; available at: <<http://journals.cambridge.org/action/displayFulltext?type=1&fid=8243692&jid=EBR&volumeId=12&issueId=01&aid=8243691&bodyId=&membershipNumber=&societyETOCSession=>>.

[25] Details in: H.Boschma, L.Lennarts, H.Schutte Veenstra, "The Reform of Dutch Private Company Law: New Rules for Protection of Creditors", European Business Organization Law Review 8, 2007, p.573.

which grants solidity to the company[26]. In certain cases, even the reserve of ownership on grounds of which the seller holds over the property on goods until their full payment presents an important pledge[27].

There is, in the light of the decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Union, the tendency to waive, for the future, the requirements related to the minimum capital.

Therefore, even Germany has recently entered Unternehmergesellschaft with a minimum capital of EUR 1 and The Netherlands is in full progress of removing the capital related requirements for Besloten Vennootshap[28].

Despite such tendencies, a minimum registered capital of EUR 1 represents a level which cannot be accepted by the legal traditions of all the member states of the European Union, for which reason, politically speaking, the opinions are still divergent regarding the capital of the SPE.

Of course such limitation of the liability of the company leads to additional risks for the business; therefore, they quote studies which show that, for example, 90% of the limited liability companies newly registered in Germany which use the legal form of Great Britain with a minimum capital of EUR 1, were erased in 18 months[29]. For such grounds, a minimum registered capital with a significant value is requested for the SPE[30].

Neither the European Parliament agreed to such new conception and, in order to make a balanced compromise, the last version of the regulation includes the possibility of each and every member state to be able to establish for the SPE registered on its territory, a minimum registered capital higher than EUR 1, but not more than EUR 8000.

The large interval between the two minimum thresholds of the registered capital of the SPE shows the difference existing between the member states of the European Union. Poland requests a minimum registered capital of limited liability companies of: EUR 13,869, United Kingdom EUR 1.5, France EUR 1, Hungary, EUR 11,760, Austria EUR 35,000, the Netherlands EUR 18,000, Bulgaria EUR 2,500[31], Romania EUR 45 etc.

We do not believe that the establishment of the minimum capital of SPE by each and every member state, within the interval established by the regulation: 1 Euro- 8,000 Euro, shall lead to the success of the SPE, the minimum share of EUR 1 regarded by the initial proposal being that which, amongst other arguments, may represent an important criterion in choosing this type of private company. There are opinions according to which, such solution related to the share of the capital is capitalized for the Member States which shall set the minimum threshold of the capital, taking into account the particularities of their economical past and the differences existing amongst the economies of the Member States[32].

In all cases, the establishment of the minimum capital to EUR 8000 must not represent a barrier for a trading company which wants to develop international activities but, it must indicate trust in the seriousness of the SPE's associates.

---

[26] Drury, Robert/Hicks, Andrew: "The proposal for a European Private Company", The Journal of Business Law, p.441, 1999, :"But the provisions of a minimum capital has not always the effect of providing any sort of guarantee that the business is sufficiently capitalised to protect third parties dealing with it".

[27] For a comparative analysis, please see: L.-C. Wolff, "Statutory Retention of Title Structures? A Comparative Analysis of German Property Transfer Rules in Light of English and Australian Law", 14 Deakin Law Review (2009) p. 1.

[28] Sandra van den Braak, "The European Private Company, its shareholders and its creditors", Utrecht law Review, Volume 6, Issue 1 (January), 2010, available at:<<http://utrechtlawreview.org>>.

[29] Maul/Röhricht. Betriebs-Berater. Heft 30/2008, p. 1578.

[30] Andreas Bernecker, op.cit., p.6.

[31] Source: Impact Assessment, Working Document accompanying the Proposal for a Council Regulation on the Statute for a European Private Company (EPC), op.cit., Annex A3;

[32] Mathias M. Siems, Leif Herzog and Erik Rosenhäger, "The Protection of Creditors of a European Private Company (SPE)", op.cit., p.156;

Additionally, the creditors of the SPE are guaranteed as well by its obligation not to distribute the dividends of its associates if, on the date of the last tax year end, the net assets resulted from the annual accounts of the SPE is, or after such a distribution, may decrease below the share of the capital plus that of the reserves which cannot be distributed according to the articles of association of the SPE. The member states have the possibility to enter as well the requirements related to the "certificate of good standing" by which the management body of the SPE certifies that the company is able to pay its debts on the maturity term, in one year's term from the dividends distribution date.

And not least, the capital of the SPE is integrally subscribed by the associates who can contribute by contributions in cash and in kind, and divided in shares. The labour and service contributions are not allowed.

Regarding the payment of the registered capital, the regulation establishes that the equivalent of the minimum capital must be fully subscribed and paid on the date the SPE is registered. Where the capital of the SPE is higher than the minimum registered capital, at least 25% of the amount by which the minimum capital is exceeded, shall also be paid on the SPE registration, establishment date

On such grounds, seeing these conditions and the associates' decision, the articles of association of the SPE must include the share of the capital which is to be paid upon its establishment.

4. Registered Office

The placement of the registered office of SPE represents a source of differences, due to the various domestic regulations of the member state by which, they either allow the separation of the registered office from the headquarters, or they impose their coexistence on the territory of one member state.

Regarding the SE, the dissociation of the registered office from the headquarters is expressly sanctioned by art.64 in the regulation 2157/2001, with the liquidation of SE, unless such situation is remedied[33].

Generally, analyzing the issue of the registered office of European companies, we must mention that the cross-border mobility of companies is mainly guaranteed by the freedom for establishment, although, article 49 from the TFUE which established such principle does not recognize to companies according to article 54 from the TFUE, the right to move their registered office from the legal system of the home member state in another member state so that, the companies must change for it their nationality and adhere to the legal regime of a new home state. The case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union is sufficiently clear in this direction and there is no reason to be altered

De facto, the company is a legal fiction existence of which is recognized by a domestic law, applicable law due to the connection existing by the registered office of the company - the registered office[34]-, between the company and the member state where established, laws of which are met upon the establishment of the company. Therefore, the application of a domestic law is the prior condition for the existence of any company.

In essence, the main principle of trading company mobility cannot be only reduced to the possibility to extend its activity on the territory of other member states of the European Union, by the establishment of branches, subsidiaries, representative offices or agencies.

[33] Michel Menjucq, op.cit., p.223.

[34] The registered office of companies is named "the registered office" as, all the companies are registered in a National Register of Companies, held by the member state where it declares its office in the articles of association, register kept according to the 1st Company Law Directive (Directive 68/151/EEC of 9 March 1968).

It includes by its nature, the right of the company to move its registered office from one member state to another, according to the business opportunities.

Of course trading companies must be able to develop their activities on the territory of a state different from that where it was established, based on its settlement right and without national formalities which may excessively limit or prevent the effective exercise of the settlement right.

In such context, SE can transfer its registered office from a member state to another, without it leading to the dissolution and liquidation of the company or to the creation of a new legal entity. Such possibility offers a great mobility to the SE[35].

The only restrictions in the freedom of the transfer of the registered office of a SE are those involved in case SE is in progress of dissolution, liquidation, insolvency or insolvability or in other similar procedures.

In order to allow to enterprises to take advantage of all the advantages of the internal market, the SPE must be allowed to establish its registered office and real office in different member states and to transfer the registered office from one member state to another, without being compelled to transfer as well its headquarters or main registered office. Despite all this, one must take measures in the same time in order to prevent the use of the EPC in order to elude the legitimate legal requirements in the member states.

Germany prefers the registered office and the headquarters of the SPE to be in the same state, in order to avoid the tax evasion, and therefore, the difference on such aspect is still unsettled.

According to the SPE regulation, the SPE has its registered office and headquarters or the main place for the development of the activities on the territory of the European Union, according to the domestic applicable law.

By this provision, the SPE regulation would rather only make half a step on a territory of "moving sands", establishing as principle the possibility of a company to have its registered office different from the real office and, additionally, to have its registered office and real office in different member states. "The step finalization" is launched according to the desires of each and every member state which can accept or not this possibility by its internal provisions

Therefore, the domestic law applicable to the SPE shall decide, by its regulations, if the registered office and headquarters or main place for the business activities should be or not on the territory of the same member state.

More, the SPE regulation allows the SPE to transfer its registered office from one member state to another, under the conditions shown by the regulation, without the dissolution and loss of the legal personality of the SPE.

The transfer of the registered office of the SPE from one member state to another can only get involved if dissolution, liquidation or insolvency or SPE payment suspension procedures were initiated.

The check of the legality to transfer the registered office of the SPE devolves upon the competent national authority. Should the conditions of the transfer of the registered office be fulfilled*, the competent authority with control of such transfer legality from the home state can only oppose to the transfer of the registered office due to public order reasons.*

The same right is also held by the national authority of financial surveillance of the SPE, if the SPE is subject to such a check.

The decision of the competent authority on the home state can be brought to court in front of a judicial authority.

In its turn, the competent authority in the host state shall analyze if all the conditions of the transfer indicated in the SPE regulation are met as well as all the relevant provisions in its law and, if affirmatively, it shall decide the registration of the SPE, moment when the transfer produces its effects.

---

[35] Veronique Magnier, Droit des Societes, Dalloz, Paris, 2009, p.373.

On the grounds of the notification related to the registration of the SPE in the host state, the competent authority in the home state decides the erasure of the SPE from its register.

For the opposability of the new registered office registration and of the erasure of the old registered office, such documents are object to advertising.

5. Organizing structures

According to the organizing structures of the SPE, the regulation does not produce conception alterations seeing that, the main decision making body is the general assembly of the associates, decisions of which must be written down; the management of the SPE is provided by directors which can only be natural persons, the associates having the possibility to decide between the two traditional management methods: unitary or dualist system and, related to the elaboration, delivery, auditing and printing of accounts, SPE is object of the requirements of domestic law.

Out of such perspective, there is no difference between the SPE and the SE, the SE benefiting from the same main corporative organizing structures.

The representation of the SPE in its reports to third parties is a general duty of the management body of the SPE.

The SPE regulation establishes the main attributions of the general assembly and the minimum majority related conditions needed by the general assembly to pass decisions.

Therefore, as a general rule, except for contrary provisions from the articles of association, the decisions are passed by the associates with the vote of the simple majority from the total of the voting rights related to the shares of the SPE. By this provision, the associates have the possibility to establish majority related conditions much lower than those mentioned by the regulation, for passing the low importance decisions for the company

The decisions related to the purchase of its own shares, the increase of the registered capital, the reduction of the registered capital, the transfer of the registered office of the SPE to another member state, the dissolution and amendment of the articles of association are made by the associates with the qualified majority, of at least two thirds of the total of voting rights related to the shares of the SPE, except for the cases when the articles of association provide no higher majority.

An important alteration of the tradition conception related to the convocation of general assembly is marked by the introduction of the principle of non-convocation of the associates' general assemblies.

Therefore, according to article 28 item 3 in the SPE regulation, passing decisions does not need the convocation of a general assembly.

Such principle one cannot derogate from by the provisions of the applicable domestic law is imposed by the need to reduce the costs of the business but as well by the effective use of the time to pass a decision. Therefore, they remove the conditionings included by all laws of the member states related to the observance of a certain number of days which should flow from the date the associates' general assembly is convoked to the date of its occurrence. The expenses needed for the convocations are added.

In order for the associates' general assembly of an SPE to pass decisions, the management body makes available for all the associations the proposals for decisions, together with sufficient information in order to grant them the possibility to pass a decision, in full knowledge of the facts. Decision passing is recorded in writing, as they are object of the formal requirements provided for by the applicable domestic law. Copies of the decisions and the results of the vote are sent to each and every associate.

As a natural reflection of the fact that associates' passing decisions is fully regulated by the regulation, as principle, the decisions passed by the associates of the SPE must meet the provisions of the regulation and of the articles of association.

However, the right of the associates to bring to court the illegal decisions of the associates' general assembly, which infringe the provisions of the regulation and of the articles of association, is regulated by the applicable domestic law.

Due to the fact that one must allow the shareholders a high level of flexibility and freedom for organizing the internal business of the SPE, the private character of the company must reflect as well in the fact that its actions can neither be offered to the public or negotiated on the capital market, nor admitted for transactions or quoted on the regulated markets.

They appreciate that the private character of "closed company" of the SPE can be an instrument for the limitation of the size of the companies constituted in the SPE, by making the possibility for experimented partners to get involved in the company more and more difficult[36].

The condition to distribute dividends and the reduction of the registered capital, the assignment of shares are regulated by the regulation and the articles of association while the transformation in a new legal type, the merger and division, dissolution, liquidation, insolvability, suspension of SPE payments and other similar procedures are regulated by the domestic applicable law and by the Regulation (CE) no.1346/2000 of the Council.

6. Employees' Participation

The third point of difference for passing SPE regulation is that related to employees' participation. This time, Sweden is the one having objected to the initial wording and to the compromise proposals, based on the fear that, the aspects of the regulation related to employees' participation shall not be included in domestic laws.

The blockage created by the issue of employees' participation, extremely sensitive, is no news as the same issue is known to have represented the cause why the passing of SE statute occurred after more than 30 years.

Therefore, directive 2001/86/CE and that of the Council to supplement the Statute of SE related to the involvement of workers[37] offer pledges based on which the establishment of a SE does not lead to the disappearance or attenuation of the employees' involvement regime, which exists in the companies participating to the establishment of a SE.

Such rule set in the matter of employees' participation by directive 2001/86/CE is based on the principle of acquired rights and is known as "avant-apres"[38] principle.

Such a regulation form was used for the employees' involvement seeing the wide diversity of rules and practices which exist in the member states related to the manner employees' representatives are involved in the decision making process at the level of a company, diversity which makes it pointless to introduce a single European model of employees' involvement, applicable to the SE.

Such European directive was transposed in our country by Governmental Decision no.187/2007 related to information, consultancy procedures and other employees' involvement methods in the activity of the European Company.

Employees' involvement represents information, consultancy and participation, as well as any other mechanism by which the representatives of the employees may exert an influence on the decisions to be made within the enterprise and, it is so important as much as, the establishment itself of a SE is subordinated to such involvement.

By the European directive, and according to it, the Governmental Decision no.187/2007 as well establishes concrete procedures to inform and consult the employees, at transnational level, according to the following methods:

---

[36] See Susanne Braun, op.cit., p.1399.

[37] Directive 2001/86/CE to supplement SE statute related to workers' involvement, published in the Official Gazette L 294, November 10, 2001, p. 22-32.

[38] For details, see: Michel Menjucq, op.cit., p.235- p.236.

– Special negotiation group consisting of employees' representatives in case of establishment of a SE, group with the role to decide together with the bodies of the participating companies, by written involvement agreement, the involvement methods of employees within SE;

– Representation body, established on the grounds of Involvement Agreement, which represents the employees, that is, it informs and consults the employees of a SE and its branches and facilities found in the Community.

The significant differences in the matter of employees' participation within a SPE are due to the different legislative traditions of the member states so that, there must be a balance compromise

On the other hand, we must take into account that employees' rights must be of course met, the Member State must not use the law of the European Union and –export the domestic system[39].

In the meaning of the SPE regulation, "employees' participation" means the influence the body representing the employees and/or the employees' representatives has on the activity of an SPE by:

i) the right to choose or appoint a part of the members of the board of surveillance or of directors of the company or

ii) the right to recommend and/or to oppose to the appointment of some or all the members of the board of directors of the company (art.2 item 2 letter f in the SPE regulation).

As principle, the regulation establishes that the SPE is applied the regulations in the matter of the employees' participation, if such case, applicable in the member state where it has its registered office, except for the aspects regulated by the regulation, offering a uniform solution for any SPE[40].

The SPE regulation contains special dispositions to be applied with precedence related to those of the applicable domestic law, for exceptions, cases when one of the conditions is fulfilled:

i) SPE, for a continuous period of three months from the registration, has at least 500 employees usually working in a member state which provides a degree of employees' participation higher than provided for the employees in the member state where the SPE has its registered office; or

ii) In case of transfer of the registered office of an SPE

- at least a third of the employees, but not less than 500, ordinarily working in the home state on the date it is registered in the host state; and,

- employees in the home state had more participation rights than those in the host state.

Despite all this, if the transnational participation system for the employees created according to this article is applied to the SPE in the moment of the transfer, is to be applied after the transfer, if the SPE and the special negotiation body do not decide in another way.

Employees' participation to the management of the company is a sensitive subject for the member states where there is no such tradition, states where no private company accepts intrusions in the development of its businesses which they regard as a private issue and related to which only the associates are entitled to decide.

The SPE regulation does not impose the obligation of the member states to introduce rules related to the participation of the employees in the limited liability companies managing to correct the regulation of employees' participation in the operation of the SPE, without improperly disturbing the legal culture of each and every member state[41] which may discourage the establishment of SPE.

---

[39] Joëlle Simon, "Purpose and tools of European Company Law", Conference on European Company Law: the way forward, 16 – 17 May 2011, p.4, available at: <<http://ec.europa.eu/internal_market/company/docs/modern/conference201105/simon_en.pdf>>.

[40] Daniel Karnak, "The European Private Company - Entering the Scene or Lost in Discussion?", German Law Journal vol.10, No.08, 2009, p.1327.

[41] Situation we meet at the European Company in which case, the regulations related to the employees' participation within SE is applied to all member states (see: Directive 2001/86/CE of 8 October 2001 supplementing the Statute for a European company with regard to the involvement of employees).

III. Conclusions

Even if the regulation related to the statute of the European company was transposed in the domestic law of several states[42], the alterations made by it do not lead and cannot lead for now to a revolution in the matter of trading companies operating the European space, seeing that the European company is endowed with a compulsory but limited European identity, it does not benefit from the advantage of European nationality[43], the organic statute of such companies being mainly governed by the law of the member state where the European company has its registered office and the principle of its mobility is affected by the opposition right found at hand of the public authorities in the host member state, opposition based on public interest reasons[44], in case of the intent to move the registered office in another member state.

Related to the statute of the SE, even in its current configuration, the SPE related regulation proposal represents a significant progress to the regulation of European companies.

The European company was conceived as a transnational company which shall provide for the mobility of the companies by the possibility to transfer its registered office from one member state to another, to enable the merger and the establishment of their branches in other member states. Such daring targets did not benefit from the necessary political support and the proposal was amended many times before its enactment. Under such conditions, statistics indicate that the European company did not represent a progress and does not benefit from success.

SPE presents indisputable advantages to any European entity: the possibility of direct establishment - ex nihilo, reduced minimum registered capital, easily performed cross-border structure, possibility for a registered office in a member state and real office in another member state, possibility of registered office transfer form one member state to another, flexibility of the articles of association, of internal organizing, lack to impose the requirements of SPE employees' participation in member states which do not regulate employees' participation etc.

There is to establish the extent in which the largely more extended incidence of the domestic law applicable to the SPE shall represent an important inconvenient in the use of SPE. There is no doubt that in its current configuration, SPE regulation does not offer certainty related to the role of the domestic law applicable to the SPE and, the more the aspects regulated by the domestic law of the SPE, the less uniform the law applicable to the organic statute of the SPE.

We appreciate as the strongest advantage of the SPE: the deployment of cross-border business within a single market through the agency of an instrument legal regime of which is sufficiently uniform, independently from the member state where it develops its activity, directly or by branches, may determine the success of this new instrument for doing business in the European Union.

References:

- Andreas Bernecker, A European Private Company - Is Europe's single legal form for SMEs close to approval?, Deutsche Bank Research, July 19, 2010.
- J. Beguin, M. Menjucq, G. Bourdeaux, A. Couret, B. le Bars, D. Mainguy, H. Ruiz Fabri, J.-M. Sorel and C. Seraglini, Droit du commerce international, LexisNexis, Ed. Litec, Paris, 2005.
- J. Beguin, Le rattachement de la societe europeenne, în La societe europeenne, Dalloz, Paris, 2003.

[42] For example, France is the member state where the full EU law was transposed, including that related to Societas Europaea – Law no. 2005-842 from July 26, 2005, published in the Official Gazette from July 27, 2005, found as well in C. com. fr. In art. L 229.1 – L229-15.

[43]Please see J. Beguin, Le rattachement de la societe europeenne, în La societe europeenne, Dalloz, Paris, 2003, p. 31 and subs.

[44]The grounds for the opposition right was criticised being considered much too general and generating legal insecurity; for such purpose, Noelle Lenoir Report, op. cit.

- F. Blanquet, Pourquoi créer une société européenne?, in: La société européenne, Dalloz, Paris, 2003.
- H.Boschma, L.Lennarts and H.Schutte Veenstra, The Reform of Dutch Private Company Law: New Rules for Protection of Creditors, European Business Organization Law Review 8, 2007.
- Sandra van den Braak, The European Private Company, its shareholders and its creditors, Utrecht law Review, Volume 6, Issue 1 (January), 2010.
- Susanne Braun, Essay-The European Private Company: A Supranational Company Form for Small and Medium-sized Entreprises?, German Law Journal, Vol.05 No.11, 2004.
- Communication of the Commission to the Council and Parliament from May 21, 2003 entitled: Modernization of the law of trading companies and strengthening of corporative governing in the EU. A plan to go ahead, COM(2003)284, celex:52003DC0284.
- A.F.M. Dorresteijn and O.Uzuahu-Santcroos, The Societas Privata Europaea under the Magnifying Glass (Part 2), European Company Law, no.4, 2009.
- Robert Drury and Andrew Hicks, The proposal for a European Private Company, The Journal of Business Law, 1999.
- 11.Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung. November 4, 2008, Wirtschaftswoche.http://www.wiwo.de/politik-weltwirtschaft/bundesregierung-blockiert-europa-gmbh-397226/ (May 19, 2009, called up June 9, 2010).
- Impact Assessment, Working Document accompanying the Proposal for a Council Regulation on the Statute for a European Private Company (EPC), Annex A3;
- Daniel Karnak, The European Private Company - Entering the Scene or Lost in Discussion?, German Law Journal vol.10, No.08, 2009.
- H.J. de Kluiver and J.Roest, Expulsion and Withdrawal of Shareholders, D.F.M.M. Zaman et al. (eds.) The European Private Company (SPE). A Critical Analysis of the EU Draft Statute, 2009.
- M.I.Lennart, Voice Rights of Shareholders, D.F.M.M. Zaman et al. (eds.) The European Private Company (SPE). A Critical Analysis of the EU Draft Statute, 2009.
- Veronique Magnier, Droit des Societes, Dalloz, Paris, 2009.
- Michel Menjucq, Droit international et europeen des societes, 2e edition, Montchrestien, Paris, 2008.
- Manole Ciprian Popa, Grupurile de societati, Ed.C.H.Beck, Bucuresti, 2011.
- Report from November 29, 2006 of the Commission for legal business of the European Parliament, containing as well regulations to the European Commission related to the statute of the European private company and proposal for the Resolution of the European Parliament in such direction [2006/2013 (INI)] rapporteur Klaus-Heiner Lehne, stage of procedure: A6-0434/2006.
- Report Noelle Lenoir, Societas Europaea pour une citoyénnete européenne de l'éntreprise, from March 19, 2007.
- Mathias M. Siems, Leif Herzog and Erik Rosenhäger, The Protection of Creditors of a European Private Company (SPE), European Business Organization Law Review , vol.12, nr.1, 2011.
- Joëlle Simon, Purpose and tools of European Company Law, Conference on European Company Law: the way forward, 16 – 17 May 2011.
- E. E. Ştefan, O nouă formă de societate. Societatea Europeană (I) (Societas Europaea), în RDC nr. 1/2007.
- L.-C. Wolff, Statutory Retention of Title Structures? A Comparative Analysis of German Property Transfer Rules in Light of English and Australian Law, 14 Deakin Law Review, 2009.

THE FINANCIAL RESTORATION OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

LUMINIȚA TULEAȘCĂ*

Abstract
The entire legal regulation of the insurance market is focused on the protection of the insurance policies holders, on keeping their trust in the insurance system and on the maintenance of the financial market steadiness. Noticing and solving the problems prior to the occurrence of insurers' insolvency situation represents a fundamental aspect for the means of achieving such objective.
By this survey we will analyse the financial restoration procedure of the insurance companies, Romanian legal entities, through the perspective of the whole aggregate of legal issues involved by this extremely complex and sensitive process required by the special nature of the insurance companies and by the impact of the activities carried out by these companies for the economic and social life of a state.
Thus, there have been pointed out the particularities and the special nature of the insurance companies' financial restoration as compared to the reorganization of the regular trade companies, the insurers' means of avoiding the business failure, of avoiding the bankruptcy.

Keywords: insolvency, financial restoration, insurers, financial restoration plan, special management, insurers' bankruptcy

I. Introductory information

The insurance companies, just like the banks, might be subject to temporary or definitive business failure. A risk management lacking certain prudence may result in the speedy deterioration of the financial situation of the insurers. The classical example is the one of the aggressive market policies manifested by establishing insurance premiums that are too law associated with the increase in the subscriptions volume that can lead to major losses determined by the high volume of damages, which is likely to affect the available solvability margin of the insurer and, implicitly, its liquidity.

The entire legal regulation of the insurers' market is focused on the protection of the insurance policies holders, on keeping their trust in the insurance system and on the maintenance of the financial market steadiness. Noticing and solving the problems prior to the occurrence of insurers' insolvency situation represents a fundamental aspect for the means of achieving such objective.

The authorities supervising and controlling the insurance market have an essential role, too, in prematurely identifying the financial problems of the insurance companies and the „treatment" applied for the purpose of restoring the financial balance.

The competence of the supervision authorities from the origin member states grant them the opportunity of noticing both the risks of the insurers' activity that might result in the deterioration of their activity, as well as any difficulty the insurers might face.

The European and domestic laws establish very precise competences, directions and action procedures for the supervising authorities regarding the insurance companies in difficulty or in a financially inadequate situation, companies that will be immediately subjected to restoration of reorganization procedures.

In Romania, the Insurances Supervision Commission is the administrative authority that has exclusive competence in applying any actions or procedures of financial restoration of the Romanian insurance companies and of their branches located in member states or/and in third states.

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Law, Romanian-American University, Bucharest, Blvd. Expozitiei nr.1B, sector 1, Romania, tel.0040 212029510, fax: 0040 3183566 (email: luminita.tuleasca@tuleasca.com).

By this survey we will analyse the financial restoration procedure of the insurance companies, Romanian legal entities, through the perspective of the whole aggregate of legal issues involved by this extremely complex and sensitive process required by the special nature of the insurance companies and by the impact of the activities carried out by these companies for the economic and social life of a state.

We will point out the particularities and the special nature of the insurance companies' financial restoration as compared to the reorganization of the regular trade companies.

II. On the financial restoration of the insurers

In principle, the insurance companies facing a difficult or financially inadequate situation shall be subject to specific restoration and/or reorganization measures, for avoiding the insolvency of such companies, for avoiding the bankruptcy.

The financial restoration procedure represents the aggregate of administrative means and measures ordered by the Insurance Supervision Commission, as the competent authority, meant to maintain or restore the financial situation of an insurance company.

The recovery of the insurance companies' restoration is a specific procedure for redressing the insurers, and not a reorganization procedure as defined by the general regulations on insolvency or by the European laws.

According to the European laws, the insurance companies facing difficulties can be subject to distinct procedures: restoration or reorganization.

In all the cases, the insurers' restoration or reorganization is characterized by the absence of the insurers' insolvency. In the matter of special trade companies, the insolvency situation indicates the impossibility to financial restore and the bankruptcy procedure initiation for these companies.

The existing specific differences between the procedure of financial restoration of the insurance companies and the reorganization procedure of the regular trade companies consist in the differences between the reasons causing the procedures implementation, the features of the same and the purpose of each procedure.

Thus, the financial restoration of the insurance companies excludes he insolvency state of the same, while the judicial reorganization regulated by the Law no.85/2006[1]applies only to a company in insolvency.

The reorganization provided by the Law no.85/2006 has as main purpose the payment of the debtor's duties, while the financial restoration procedure has the sole purpose the financial restoration of the insurer excluding any concern for the payment of its duties.

Basically, this happens because the purpose of any legal procedure of insolvency is represented by the creditors' payment, pari passu, according to the equality of treatment of these creditors[2], in any of the ways provided by the law[3].

According to the general regulation, the priority of the insolvency procedure consists in the best interest of the creditors, the payment of the debts of the debtor towards them, by any of the means used for achieving this purpose, "liabilities cover-up" representing, as rule, the full payment of the declared duties[4].

---

[1]Law no. 85 / 05.04.2006 regarding the insolvency procedure, published in the Off. M. Part I no. 359 on 21.04.2006, as further amended and completed.

[2] Roy Goode, Principles of Corporate Insolvency Law: Student Edition, London, Thompson–Sweet & Maxwell, 2005, p. 56.

[3] I. Turcu, Falimentul. Actuala procedura (Bankruptcy. Current procedure), Editura Lumina Lex, Bucuresti, 2005, p.287; I.Schiau, Regimul juridic al insolventei comerciale (The legal regime of the commercial insolvency), Ed.All.Beck, Bucuresti, 2001, p.81.

[4]See also: Stanciu D.Carpenaru, Vasile Nemes, Mihai Adrian Hotca, Noua lege a Insolventei . Legea nr.85/2006. Comentarii pe articole (The new insolvency law. Law no. 85/2006. Commented articles), Ed.Hamangiu,

Last, but not least, the financial restoration of the insurance companies is an administrative procedure, decided and applied by the Insurance Supervisory Commission while the reorganization of the regular trade companies is always a judicial procedure falling under the exclusive competence of the courts of law.

On the other hand, the financial restoration of the insurance companies cannot be qualified as a reorganization procedure specific for insurers either considering the criterion of differentiating between the judicial reorganization and financial restoration procedures, criterion implicitly imposed under the Directive 2001/17/EC on the reorganization and winding-up of the insurance companies[5].

According to the Directive 2001/17/EC, the "reorganisation measures" means measures involving any intervention by administrative bodies or judicial authorities which are intended to preserve or restore the financial situation of an insurance undertaking and which affect pre-existing rights of parties other than the insurance undertaking itself, including but not limited to measures involving the possibility of a suspension of payments, suspension of enforcement measures or reduction of claims (art.2 let. c) Directive 2001/17/EC).

The criterion of classifying a procedure applied to the insurance company as being a special reorganization procedure, is the one concerning the effects of such procedures: if by the measures adopted under this procedure the pre-existing rights of third parties are affected the procedure applied to the insurance company is itself a reorganisation procedure.

By the definition of reorganisation provided by the Directive 2001/17/EC it results that a reorganization procedure involves the suspension of enforcement measures related to the creditors' claims against the debtor imposed by the courts or by other competent authorities[6].

Usually, the measures by which insurance company and its creditors reach an agreement in relation to the insurer's undertakings, does not determine the classification of a procedure as being a reorganisation measure, if such agreements are reached by other means than by the courts decisions or by the supervisory authorities decisions of suspending the enforcement of claims.

By the insurance companies restoration procedure regulated by the law no.503/2004 regarding the financial restoration and the bankruptcy of the insurance companies[7] the pre-existing rights of third parties are not affected and, this procedure, is not a reorganization procedure specific for insurance company.

The Law no. 503/2004 provides - although quite inadequately by reference to the substance of the differentiation provided in the Directive 2001/17/EC - this characteristic of the restoration procedure of the insurance companies: "The opening of the financial restoration procedure does not affect the rights in rem of the creditors and third parties regarding the corporal or incorporeal assets, movable or immovable assets– both determined assets, as well as aggregates of un-determined assets – belonging to the insurance company and which are situated on the territory of a different member state upon the procedure opening" (art.9 para.7 of the Law no.503/2004).

2008, p.24-25; Gheorghe Piperea, "Despre evitarea procedurilor de insolvenţă şi tratamentul extrajudiciar al crizelor financiare" ("On how to avoid the insolvency procedures and the extra-judicial treatment of the financial crises"), în Revista Româna de Drept Privat nr.3/2007, p.147; In the context of the Law no. 64/1995, which does not differ from the current regulation of the insolvency considering its purpose: Ion Turcu, Madalina Stan, "Compatibilitatea normelor codului de procedură civila cu specificul procedurii insolvenței" ("The compatibility of the norms of the civil procedure code with the insolvency procedure specifics"), Revista de Drept Comercial nr.12/2005, p.12.

[5]Directive 2001/17/EC regarding the reorganization and winding-up of the insurance companies, published in the O.J. L 110/20.04.2001, p.28-39.

[6] Gabriel Moss QC, Bob Wessels, EU Banking and Insurance Insolvency, Oxford University Press, New York, 2006, p.113.

[7]Law no.503 on 17.11.2004 regarding the financial restoration and bankruptcy of the insurance companies, published in the Off. M. Part I no.1193/14.12.2004, as further amended and completed.

Except for this provision of the Law no.503/2004, from the entire regulation of the procedure it results that it does not affect the pre-existing rights of third persons.

III. The features of the financial restoration procedure.

By the specific differences between the financial restoration procedure of the insurance company as to any other form of special or general reorganization of a special or ordinary company, the characteristics of the financial restoration procedure of insurers is emphasized.

(i). The administrative nature

The measures of the insurance company restoration represent the intrinsic component of the permanent process of prudential supervision and control, implemented by the Insurance Supervision Commission.

It is a totally different conception as to the judicial nature of the general reorganization procedure of regular trade companies, such characteristic being deemed to have been imposed by the imperative norms governing the insolvency treatment considered to be a problem of general interest[8].

As far as the matter of general insolvency procedures are concerned, there has been established that, only the court of law is able to impose restrictions or to suspend the debtor's right to manage its own business, to administer its assets[9], and to limit the creditors' rights, in case of insolvency.

Thus, the Insurances Supervision Commission is the only competent authority to order restoration measures by the initiation of the financial restoration procedure by any of the means of enforcing such procedure: based on a plan or by means of special receivership applied to a Romanian insurance company, including its branches from other member states as well as to the branches and subsidiaries of insurance companies from other third parties, with the registered office in Romania (art.5 para.2 of the Law no.503/2004).

Therefore, the financial restoration procedure is an administrative procedure and it excludes the intervention of the courts in applying, implementing and closing the procedure[10].

The Romanian law option for applying the methods and measures for financial restoration exclusively by the competent administrative authority responsible for the supervision and control of the insurance activity is based on the need of speedy adoption of the most adequate measures for the financial restoration of the insurer.

As in the banks' case, the insurance companies can function only if they keep the public's trust and any restoration of judicial reorganization would result in failure, due to the panic that would occur among the policies holders.

On the other hand, the European law regulates the possibility of "financial restoration" of the insurance companies as a distinct action from the reorganization of the same, through the competent authorities with the supervision of the insurance companies (art.37 and art.38 of the Directive 2002/83/EC.

---

[8] Yves Guyon, Droit des Affaires, Tome 2, Entreprises en difficultes. Redressement judiciare- Faillite, 7e edition, Economica, Paris, 1999, p.31; Boy, Guillaummond, Jeammaud, Jeantin, Pages et Piravano, Droit des faillite et restruction du capital, Presses Universite Grenoble, 1982.

[9] The bankruptcy procedure "deprives a person of her or his right to manage her or his own assets", right provided by the European Convention on Human Rights, European Commission on Human Rights, December 10th, 1984, no.10259/1983, ANCA c/Belgique, C. Barsan, "European Convention on Human Rights – Commented articles. Rights and freedoms", Vol. I, Ed.All Beck, Bucharest, 2005, p.409.

[10] See also: R.N.Catana, Dreptul asigurarilor – Reglementarea activitatilor de asigurare. Teoria generala a contractului de asigurare (The right of the insurances – The regulation of the insurance actions. The general theory of the insurance contract), Editura Sfera Juridica, Cluj Napoca, 2007, p.85.

(ii). The preventive nature

The fundamental objective of the supervision and of the control exercised by the competent authority on the insurers is to prevent them from becoming insolvable and for them to carry out an activity that is compliant with the operational and prudential requirements specific for the insurance market.

For this purpose, the Insurances Supervision Commission periodically checks all the essential aspects of the insurer's activity by means of controlling the financial statements, of periodic reporting and informing and by means of analysis, guidance and control actions exercised by the specialized departments of the same authority.

According to the law, the Insurances Supervision Commission has the right to intervene for preventing the insurance companies insolvency and for avoiding the initiation of the bankruptcy procedure in all the cases where there are noticed any irregularities and incompliance with the prudential requirements, especially financial difficulties (art.5 para.1 of the Law no.503/2004).

The preventive nature of the financial restoration presupposes the inexistence of the insurers' insolvency and the avoidance of the same.

The main purpose of the procedure is „the restoration of the financial situation of the insurance company" (art. 20 let. a) of the Law no.503/2004 and art.37 pct.2 of the Directive 2002/83/EC[11])

The preventive nature of the financial restoration procedure explains also the lack of involvement of the insurance company creditors in the procedure.They are simply notified on the content of the redress measures ordered by the Insurances Supervision Commission by the decision of implementing the financial restoration procedure.

(iii). The remedy nature

This characteristic of the restoration procedure is a natural consequence of its preventive nature.

By acting preventively, by speedy and special measures the financial imbalance of the insurance company is settled.

None of the actual measures to be ordered under the financial restoration methods shall not affect its remedy nature.

IV. Initiating and implementing the financial restoring procedure

The causes for applying the financial restoring procedure are common to both methods of implementing the procedure: based on a plan or by means of special receivership.

According to the law, the insurance company enters the financial restoring procedure when:

(i) the insurance company fails to present the Insurance Supervision Commission, in 48 hours term from its request, the financial statement and the minimum solvability margin and when there are ascertain failures in complying with any other legal provisions related to the insurance activity, thus endangering the compliance with the obligations undertaken in relation with the insurance creditors;

(ii) the value of the available solvability margin decreases bellow the minim limit provided by the regulations issued by the de Insurance Supervision Commission;

(iii) the value of the available solvability margin decreases below the minimum limit provided by the legal regulations for safety fund (art.7 of the Law no.503/2004).

[11] Directive 2002/83/EC of November 5th 2002 on the direct life insurance, published in the OJ L 345 on December 19th 2002.

All the causes for opening the restoring procedure indicate the insurance company positioning out of the prudential, operational requirements. Such company faces an insolvency risk.

Statistically, the insurance company can resist with an available solvability margin equal or lower than the legal safety fund value (however, the value of the available solvability margin should not go below half the minimum legal value of the safety fund) but, the activity carried out under these conditions is affected by a high risk of insolvability, risk that is inacceptable for the insurance market.

By way of exception, the insurer is presumed to be in a difficult financial situation when it fails to comply with the Insurance Supervision Commission request to present its financial statements indicating all the basic elements of its stability, the financial situation and the available solvency margin.

The right of the Insurance Supervision Commission to assess the financial situation of an insurance company beyond the classical elements used for such assessment (available solvency margin and safety fund) is pointed out by the possibility of the same to decide the application of the restoration procedure in all the situations where the insurance company endangers its ability to honour its claims to the creditors, by the failure to comply with the applicable legal provisions.

Therefore, the financial restoring procedure can be also initiated as a result of the failure to comply with the liquidities indicator, due to risky investment policies, due to the failure to comply with the requirements on the assets type that should be comprised in the safety fund, a.s.o.

Thus, the sphere of the causes determining the application of the financial restoring procedure of the insurance companies is much wider, the law offering the basic criteria for determining it[12].

The Insurance Supervision Commission orders the initiation of the financial restoring procedure by grounded decision, indicating the means of financial restoring measures applicable to the insurance company in difficulty: restoration based on redress plan or restoration by means of special receivership.

According to the law, regardless of the restoration means that has been opted for, the Supervision Commission can order the adoption of the main prudential measures, which will be the actual means for financial restoration of the insurance company, among which: the insurance portfolio immediate transfer by the insurance company, in whole or in part, within maximum 60 days as of the measure adoption, the insurance company director's obligation to summon an extraordinary general assembly, for proposing some actions of registered capital increase, assembly to take place within maximum 5 days as of the summoning date, and, the increase of the registered capital within maximum 30 business days as of the reception of the decision informing on the initiation of the financial restoring procedure, the interdiction to carry out certain investments, a.s.o. (art.8 para.2 of the Law no.503/2004).

We consider that these main measures for the insurer's restoration shall be ordered by the Insurance Supervision Commission, in principle, in case of opting for the financial restoration by means of special receivership. Our opinion is stated considering the „temporal" differences of the two forms of the financial restoring procedure but also the legal conception regarding the content and the means of adopting the financial restoration of each of these procedures.

In other words, the financial restoration based on a plan entails a more relaxed time-frame than the special receivership one and, additionally, he content of the („short term") redress plan is left with the discretion of the board of directors or of the company supervisory board, subject to the measures ordered by the procedure opening decision and provided that such plan is approved by the Insurance Supervision Commission.

[12] See also: the Insurance Supervision Commission, the Decision no.1068/21.12.2001 on the opening of the financial restoration procedure based on a financial restoration plan of S.C. FORTE Asigurari - S.A., Published in Of. M., Part I, no.9 on 05.01.2012.

The Insurance Supervision Commission can endorse or dismiss such plan and, in the later case, it can force the company to adopt a speed-up financing program (art.15 let. a)of the Law no.503/2004).

The intervention of the Insurance Supervision Commission by „the prudential main measures", indicates an alarming financial situation of the insurance company requiring an immediate and aggressive action, specific for the special receivership even if, the law does not establish an hierarchy for the redress measures based on the criterion of the gravity of the financial imbalance of the insurer.

Applying the financial restoring procedure is not confidential, the compliance with the publicity formalities being compulsory; however the failure to comply with this request does not prevent the application of the procedure.

The publicity of the opening decision of the financial restoring procedure of the insurance company is done by publishing it in the Official Monitor of Romania, Part I, as well as in two other national newspapers.

The Insurance Supervision Commission, as the competent authority, has the duty to immediately inform the supervision authorities in all the other member states on its decision to apply the financial restoring procedure for an insurance company, including also the effects of applying such procedure.

The financial restoring procedure does not affect the pre-existing rights of third persons and is effective within the entire European Union as of the moment of it becoming effective in Romania.

The effects of the financial restoring procedure are the ones provided by the Romanian law, without other formalities even if the laws of the member states do not provide such financial restoring measures or subordinate such measures enforcement to certain conditions that have not been fulfilled.

A) The redress based on financial restoration plan

The insurance company redress based on a plan is enforced by the insurance company by means of the board of directors or of the supervisory board. By this means of financial restoration, the Insurance Supervision Commission offers the insurer the means to choose and to propose the financial restoration measures that it considers to be the most adequate and speedy for restoring the financial balance, even if the insurer decides to appoint a person to supervise the drafting and implementation of the financial restoration plan.

The board of directors or, if the case, the insurer's supervisory board, drafts the financial restoration plan in maximum 20 days from the date of communicating the decision of opening the financial restoring procedure.

The plan must include the perspectives for financial restoration of the company and the actual means and terms for achieving such restoration as well as the terms for complying with the measures and provisions comprised in the procedure opening decision.

The approach of the financial situation of the insurance company must be carried out for a 3 year term considering the main coordinates of the financial aspects of the insurer; income and revenue budget, re-insurance programs, debts payment program, financial resources for covering the outstanding obligations a.s.o.

The Insurance Supervision Commission is the authority that decides the financial restoration plan feasibility of the insurer by approving, dismissing or completing it.

As of the date of communicating the decision on the approval of the financial restoration plan as proposed by the insurance company or as amended and/or completed by the Insurance Supervision Commission, the insurance company has the duty to comply with all its provisions and to communicate to all known creditors, within 5 business days term as of the reception of such decision, the measures and provisions established by the Insurance Supervision Commission.

In case the financial restoration plan is dismissed, the Insurance Supervision Commission, by its decision shall order one of the following measures:

(i) to order the insurance company to adopt an immediate financing program, that must comply with the terms, conditions, and procedures provided by the law for drafting and presenting the financial restoration plan;

(ii) the financial restoration of the company by special receivership;

(iii) the cancellation of the insurance company operating permit.

The decision of the Insurance Supervision Commission of cancelling the operating permit entails the winding-up and the liquidation of the insurance company or, in case of ascertaining the insolvency state, the opening of the bankruptcy procedure upon the request of the Insurance Supervision Commission.

B) Special receivership restoration

The restoration of the insurance company by means of special receivership is carried out through the special receiver (director), appointed by the decision of the Insurance Supervision Commission. In such conditions, the special receiver (director) has the capacity of the Insurance Supervision Commission proxy without the possibility to transfer its attributions to a third person.

Its mandate is an agency mandate, the special receiver being the one representing and hiring the insurance company in its relations with the third parties[13].

As of the date of appointing the special receiver, the insurance company is „temporarily discharged", by suspending the powers of the major shareholders and of the important officers of the company, powers that fall with the special receiver during the financial restoring procedure.

The shareholders right to appoint and revoke the board of directors or the sole director and/or the supervisory board and the shareholders right to receive dividends shall be also suspended during the entire financial restoring procedure interval by means of special receivership.

The powers of the special receiver are established by the Norm approved by the I.S.C. Order no.3122/21.09.2005[14].

In principle, the special receiver shall implement and shall take all the measures required for restoring the financial situation of the insurance company, by complying with the provisions, with the terms and conditions from the financial restoration decision.

V. Closing the financial restoring procedure

Acting as a remedy action, the financial restoring procedure is firstly closed when the purpose of such procedure has been reached and the financial situation of the insurance company is restored.

The closing of the financial restoring procedure shall also occur when, the measures applied within the financial restoring procedure have not been adequately complied with, within the terms and conditions established for such actions, or the application of the same failed to reach the pursued purpose and to eliminate the causes generating it.

The closing of the procedure is decided by the decision of the Insurance Supervision Commission.

[13] For the powers of the special receiver, please see, Vasile Nemes, Dreptul asigurarilor (Insurance Law), Editura Hamangiu, 2009, Bucuresti, p.137.

[14] The Order no.3122/21.09.2005 for approving the Norm on the rights, obligations and competences of the special receiver, Published in the Off. M., Part I no.866/25.09.2005.

By the decision of closing the financial restoring procedure the Insurance Supervision Commission shall order the revocation of the decision to open the procedure when the procedure closing is determined by the restoration of the financial situation of the insurer and, as the case may be, by the revocation of the special receiver.

The impossibility to restore the financial situation of the insurer by means of the financial restoring procedure leads to the adoption of the Insurance Supervision Commission decision ordering the closing of the procedure, the cancelation of the operating permit of the insurer and, if the case, the revocation of the special receiver.

If the insurance company has been subject to financial restoration by means of special receivership, the decision of the Insurance Supervision Commission regarding the procedure closing and the cancelation of the operating permit shall be grounded on the special receiver reports, ascertaining that there are no conditions for restoring or maintaining the financial situation of the insurance companies.

If the insolvency state of the insurance company is ascertained, by the decision for closing the financial restoring procedure is also decided the registration of the request to initiate the bankruptcy procedure.

If the insurance company is not insolvable, the decision to cancel the operating permit due to the impossibility to financially restore shall entail the company winding-up and deletion from the trade register.

The decision of the Insurance Supervision Commission regarding the closing of the financial restoring procedure and the ascertaining of the insolvability situation of the insurance company shall result in the registration of the request to initiate the bankruptcy procedure for the insurer and, as of the decision publication, shall also result in the creditor's right to ask for the payment of the due amounts payable from the Guarantee Fund.

To this end, in 10 days as from the publication of the decision for closing the financial restoring procedure, the insolvable insurance company must provide the director of the Guarantee Fund a complete record of all the damage compensation files, as well as the technical-operational records and the book-records related to such files, for publishing the list of potential creditors, beneficiaries of the amounts payable under the Guarantee Fund. The liability for the failure to comply or for the improper compliance with this obligation shall fall with the liable persons from the insurance company.

In practice, the financial restoration of the insurance companies based on a financial restoration plan and/or by special receivership manages to achieve the avoidance of the insurer's insolvability and there-launching of the same.

A good example on the Romanian insurance market is the one of S.C. ARDAF asigurari reasigurari- S.A. that underwent the financial restoring procedure based on a restoration plan in September 2005, due to the decrease of solvability margin indicators and of the liquidation ratio below the limit established by the regulations of the Insurance Supervision Commission.

The restoration plan has been reached by a capital increase and the financial restoring procedure has been closed.

Subsequently, in June 2006, due to the decrease of the financial indicators S.C. ARDAF asigurari reasigurari- S.A. has been subject to financial restoring procedure by special receivership. The solution for the company financial restoring has been, again, the increase of the registered capital up to the level established by the decision of the Insurance Supervision Commission for opening the financial restoring procedure; thus, in January 2007 there has been decided the closing of the financial restoring procedure[15].

All the decisions of the Insurance Supervision Commission adopted in relation to the financial restoring procedure of the insurers, are administrative documents and they can be challenged by action lodged with the administrative court, i.e. with the Court of Appeal in Bucharest, in 10 days term from its communication (there is a time limitation for such action).

[15] Sursa: S.C.ARDAF ASIGURARIRI REASIGURARI S.A., http://www.ardaf.ro/ro/site/index.php.

For the speediness of applying the financial restoration measures for the insurer the legislator granted that such decisions of the Insurance Supervision Commission shall be enforceable, its challenge with the courts of law not suspending their enforcement.

VI. Conclusions

The procedure for financial restoration, as regulated by the Romanian law, represents the only and the best method for restoring the financial imbalance of the insurance companies and, by its nature and causes, by its purpose and by the accomplishing means, it is significantly different from the judicial receivership provided under the Law no.85/2006.

Thus, the financial restoration procedure of the insurers is a special procedure, imposed naturally, by its special statute of the insurance companies.

As far as its application does not lead to the insurance company financial restoration, such company must be eliminated from the market in a manner as safer and as compliant as possible with the principle of policy holders protection.

References:

- Constantin Barsan, Conventia Europena a drepturilor omului-Comentariu pe articole. Drepturi si libertati, Vol. I, Ed.All Beck, Bucuresti, 2005.
- Stanciu D.Carpenaru, Vasile Nemes, Mihai Adrian Hotca, Noua lege a Insolventei . Legea nr.85/2006. Comentarii pe articole, Ed.Hamangiu, 2008.
- Radu N. Catana, Dreptul asigurarilor – Reglementarea activitatilor de asigurare. Teoria generala a contractului de asigurare, Editura Sfera Juridica, Cluj Napoca, 2007.
- Roy Goode, Principles of Corporate Insolvency Law: Student Edition, London, Thompson–Sweet & Maxwell, 2005.
- Boy, Guillaummond and Jeammaud, Jeantin, Pages et Piravano, Droit des faillite et restruction du capital, Presses Universite Grenoble, 1982.
- Yves Guyon, Droit des Affaires, Tome 2, - Entreprises en difficultes. Redressement judiciare- Faillite, 7e edition, Economica, Paris, 1999.
- Gabriel Moss QC and Bob Wessels, EU Banking and Insurance Insolvency, Oxford University Press, New York, 2006.
- Vasile Nemes, Dreptul asigurarilor, Editura Hamangiu, 2009, Bucuresti.
- Gheorghe Piperea, Despre evitarea procedurilor de insolvenţă şi tratamentul extrajudiciar al crizelor financiare, Revista Româna de Drept Privat nr.3/2007.
- Ioan Schiau, Regimul juridic al insolventei comerciale, Ed.All.Beck, Bucuresti, 2001.
- Ion Turcu, Falimentul. Actuala procedura, Editura Lumina Lex, Bucuresti, 2005.
- Ion Turcu, Madalina Stan, Compatibilitatea normelor codului de procedură civila cu specificul procedurii insolvenţei, Revista de Drept Comercial nr.12/2005.

THE LOAN CONTRACT IN THE NEW CIVIL CODE

LIVIA MOCANU*

Abstract

The new Civil Code maintains, mainly, the stipulations of the Civil Code of 1865 regarding loan contracts, in its both forms (the loan for use and the loan for consumption). As a variety of the loan for consumption, a few new specific stipulations were included, regarding the loan with interest.

This research is focused on the current regulation of the loan contract, including a series of changes, of which the most important refers to: the loan promise, the risk regarding the asset placed in a bailment, property transfer and the risk in the loan for consumption contract, loan return and the interest regime.

Also, what kept my attention is the significant changes brought to the interest regime by the Law for applying the Civil Code, included for now in Chapter I of the O.G. no. 13/2011, regarding the legal compensatory interest and the penalty interest for financial duties, as well as for the regulation of certain financial-fiscal measures in the banking department.

Keywords*: loan promise, loan for use, loan for consumption, compensatory interest, penalty interest.*

1. Introduction

In the present study we aim at analyzing the regulation of the loan contract in the New Civil code, entered into force on the 1st of October 2011, while emphasizing the new elements, which do not exist in the Civil Code of 1865.

Though the new regulation mainly maintains the dispositions of the Civil Code in 1865 in the matter of the loan contract, it also contains a series of important changes which give a new configuration to a contract with a large applicability in the day-to-day life. That is why we consider that the analysis of the loan contract in the light of the new civil regulation is particularly actual and useful; both for specialists and for all those who wish to know the features of the new Civil Code compared to the previous regulation.

Nowadays, multiple economic and social causes generate an extension of crediting, in which case, knowing the juridical rules in the matter became almost indispensable for the parties negotiating the terms of the contract.

As operations like credits have a major importance in doing several activities, and such operations can also be realized by entities, other than those performing crediting activities with professional character, without constituting the object of special regulations in the matter of crediting and financial activities, we think it is necessary to know the dispositions of the new Civil code in this matter and its correct application in the relations with the interested parties. As recipients of the new civil dispositions in this matter we cannot ignore the law courts and other partners of justice, such as lawyers, notary publics, theoreticians of law. Also, we consider the students of faculties of law for who we can ease the process of knowing the dispositions of the new Civil Code in the matter of the loan contract.

At the same time, convinced of the necessity to permanently perfect the juridical rules, we also hope to have a contribution in this direction.

In the present study, we aim at analyzing the juridical regime of the loan contract, while emphasizing the new elements, consisting of: the loan promise, the risk regarding the asset placed in a bailment, property transfer and the risk in the contract of loan for consumption, loan return and the interest regime.

* Professor, Ph. D. University „Valahia" from Târgoviște, Facultaty of Law and Social-Political Sciences (mocanulivia@yahoo. com).

Up to this moment, the loan contract constituted, mainly, the subject of academic manuals elaborated for the students' study, without exhausting the theoretical and practical issue of the loan contract.

The purpose of the present scientific approach is to emphasize the novelties of the current regulation, and we are sure that, in our turn, we can open other gates in this matter.

2. Content

2.1. The loan promise

In the first section of Chapter XIII of the new Civil Code[1] called General dispositions, the legislator regulates the types of loan and the loan promise.

According to art. 2144 of the new Civil Code, the loan is of two types: the loan for use (the bailment) and the loan for consumption[2].

If, in regard to the classification of the loan, the dispositions stipulated in the Civil Code in 1864 are kept, the novelty is represented by the loan promise regulated by the dispositions of art. 2145 in the new Civil Code, according to which: „When the asset is in the possession of the beneficiary and the promisor refuses to close the contract, the court, at the request of the other party, can pronounce a decision to the contract, if the requirements of the law for its validity are met". As a consequence, in these dispositions, one stipulates the possibility for the promise beneficiary to ask the court to pronounce a decision that can substitute the loan contract if the following conditions are fulfilled:

- the asset is in the beneficiary's possession, regardless of its nature;
- the promisor creditor refuses to sign the contract; and
- the other validity conditions for the loan contract are fulfilled.

Thus, so that the action grounded on the dispositions of art. 2145 in the new Civil Code is admitted, which lead to a forced closing of the contract, the court will always check for the existence of these special conditions. Besides, these special conditions, and especially the asset existence in the bailee's possession characterizes this exceptional regulation in the matter of the loan contract, compared to the dispositions of art. 1279 in the new Civil Code, which regulate the promise to sign a contract[3].

These dispositions reflect the parties' will, allowing them to sign the contract without entrusting (tradition) the asset[4]which is already in the beneficiary's possession. In such cases the parties' agreement is enough to validly sign the loan contract or, according to case, the decision that can be pronounced by the court when the promisor refuses to sign the contract.

---

[1] Law no. 287/2009 regarding the Civil Code, republished on grounds of the art. 218 of Law no. 71/2011 to apply the Law no. 287/2009 regarding the Civil Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 409 on 10th June 2011.

[2] The contract by means of which the Romanians took the loan for consumption is designated by the term mutui dație or by that of mutuum, words which suggested the fact that closing the contract meant the transmission of a thing from the creditor towards the his debtor. For details, see, Emil Molcuț, Drept private roman, Edition that was reviewed and completed, (Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004), 269 and the foll.

[3] In accordance with paragraph 3 of art. 1279 in the new Civil Code: „In addition, if the promisor refuses to sign the promised contract, the court, at the request of the party which respected its own obligations, can pronounce a decision to substitute contract, when the nature of the contract allows this, and the requirements of the law for its validity are fulfilled. The stipulations of the present paragraph are not applicable in case of the promise to sign a real contract, unless the law stipulates otherwise."

[4] Both the bailment and the loan for consumption are real contracts, and to close them the parties' agreement has to be followed by handing in the good which is the object of the contract.

The loan promise can also be analyzed in relation to the dispositions of. art. 2193 in the new Civil Code where the credit facility is defined.[5] Regulated for the first time in the new Civil Code, the credit facility is a contract, whose defining element is the financer/creditor's obligation to make available an amount of money for the customer for a determined or an undetermined period of time.[6]

Practice remains to offer us the applications of the loan promise regulation.

2.2. The loan contract: enforceable title

In the legislator's current vision, both the loan contract for use and the loan contract for consumption are considered enforceable titles.

We are in the presence of relevant dispositions for the non-banking contracts that we meet in art. 2157 and 2165 in the new Civil Code, dispositions that accompany the main obligation of the loan beneficiary, which is the return obligation.

Thus, according to the dispositions of art. 2157 in the new Civil Code, „the bailment contract concluded in the authentic form or by a document under private signature with fixed date, constitutes enforceable title, in accordance to the law, in case of termination by the bailee's death or the term expiration". In the 2nd paragraph of art. 2157 in the new Civil Code one stipulated that „unless a term was stipulated for the restitution, the bailment contract constitutes enforceable title, on condition that the use for which the asset was given is not stipulated or the use has a permanent character."

Based on these dispositions, the bailer has the possibility to foreclose the bailee, unless the later executes his obligation to return the asset, based on the bailment contract and without going to court. In accordance to the law, the loan contract for use is considered enforceable title, if the following conditions are cumulatively fulfilled:

- the contract is signed in its authentic form or as a document under private signature with fixed date;
- the contract is terminated by the bailee's death or the term expiration. Bailment without a term is enforceable title only when, in its content, one has not specifically mentioned the use for which the asset was given or the use has a permanent character.

In its turn, art. 2165 of the new Civil Code stipulates, similarly to the bailment, the loaner's possibility to start foreclosure against the borrower if the loan is not returned, based on the contract considered enforceable title and which cumulatively fulfills the following conditions:

- it is signed in its authentic form or as a document under private signature with fixed date;
- it was terminated by the term expiry.

These dispositions keeps the creditor of the restitution obligation from going to court in order to set the debt against the debtor, even in the case of non-banking loans. As for the banking credit contracts, they remain enforceable titles, according to the stipulations of the special law[7]

2.3. The loan for use (bailment). Novelty elements

2.3.1. The capacity to loan

According to the dispositions of art. 2147 in the new Civil Code, „unless forbidden by law or by the contract, any person who has the right to use the asset can be a bailer". The text regulates the capacity to loan. On its grounds, the bailee (not owner) too can loan to third parties the asset subject of the contract, if this transmission was not forbidden by the contract.

---

[5] According to art. 2193 of the new Civil Code: „The credit facility is the contract by which a credit institution, a non-banking credit institution or any other entity, authorized by a special law binds itself to make available an amount of money at the customer's discretion for a determined or undetermined period of time".

[6] For details, see, Rada Postolache, Credit Facility According To The New Civil Code, in the Agora International Journal of Juridical Sciences (2/2011), 2.

[7] In accordance with art. 120 of the O.U.G. no. 99/2006 regarding credit institutions and credit suitability, approved with additional changed by Law no. 227/2007.

2.3.2. Non-observance of the obligations regarding the asset use or restitution by the bailee

According to the dispositions of art. 2149 in the new Civil Code, the bailee is not responsible for the asset loss or damage, if these are the result of asset use for the purpose which constitutes the object of the contract. But, in case the bailee violates the use or the restitution obligations, he is responsible for the asset loss, including for causes of force majeure, according to the 2nd paragraph of art. 2149. In such a case, according to the law, he will be exonerated of his responsibility, if he can prove that asset was lost or damaged as a consequence of force majeure. The novelty compared to the old regulation is that the bailee's responsibility is involved inclusively as a consequence of force majeure, and not just for acts of God (art. 1565 in the Civil Code of 1864).

2.3.3. The lien

As it is mainly a unilateral contract, the bailment does not create obligations for the bailer. Nevertheless, during contract execution, the bailer can have certain extra-contractual obligations, that the new Civil Code stipulates in the dispos. of art. 2151 and art. 2152. Thus, according to the dispos. of art. 2151, par. (2) of the new Civil Code, the expenses that are necessary and urgent, made for the asset maintenance, and which could not be stipulated at the end of the bailment contract will be paid by the bailer. Obviously, the origin of this restitution obligation for the asset maintenance expenses is represented by the business administration or by the enrichment without a right cause.[8] Another obligation of the bailer, this time of penal type[9], is that to repair the damages caused to the bailee by a flaw of the asset. Thus, according to the dispositions of art. 2151 in the new Civil Code, the bailer who, on the signing date of the contract, was aware of the borrowed asset hidden vices, but did not prevent the bailee regarding these vices, is bind to repair the damage suffered by the baillee as a result of this."

In relation to these obligations occurred as bailer's responsibility, the bailee does not have, in any circumstances a lien. The legislator states it expressly in art. 2153 of the new Civil Code, whose dispositions removes the bailee's lien, lien instituted by the dispositions of art. 1574 in the Civil Code of 1864[10].

2.3.4. The asset restitution

As we have already shown, the bailee's main obligation is to return the borrowed asset at due term in its specific nature. If in the system of the Civil Code of 1864 this obligation is a result of the contract definition[11], as novelty element, in art. 2156 of the new Civil Code this obligation is expressly stipulated. Thus, according to the law, the bailee must return the asset at due term or, if not, at the bailer's request. As a rule, the bailer cannot ask the asset restitution before the term set in the contract. Nevertheless, as an effect of the contract free character, and to provide the parties' equity, exceptionally, the legislator expressly regulates this right of the bailee in art. 2156 of the new Civil Code. As a result, according to the law, the bailer can ask for the asset restitution before due term, if:

- an urgent and unpredictable need for the asset has occurred;

---

[8] Francisc Deak, Tratat de drept civil. Contracte speciale, (Actami Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998), 300; Florin Moțiu, Contractele speciale, 2nd edition reviewed and complated, (Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011), 288; Dumitru C. Florescu, Contractele civile (Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011), 257.

[9] Florin Moțiu, op.cit., 288. D. Chirică, Tratat de drept civil. Contracte speciale, (C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008), 212.

[10] Francisc Deak, op.cit., 296; Mircea Mureşan, Drept civil. Contracte speciale, (Cordial Lex Publishing House, Cluj Napoca, 1999), 242.

[11] The bailment is a contract by which someone lends someone else a thing to use it, having the obligation to return it to the creditor (art. 1560).

- the bailee dies, or
- the bailee violates his obligations.

Furthermore, by the new legislative dispositions, one eliminated the possibility for the courts to decide regarding an anticipated restitution of the asset[12].

2.4. The loan for consumption.

2.4.1. Juridical features

The dispositions of the new Civil Code in the matter keeps unchanged the juridical features of the loan for consumption, and this is the contract by which one transfers ownership over certain amounts of money or other fungible and consumptible things, with the restitution obligation. In the matter of the loan for consumption, the law considers that the loan whose object is an amount of money is assumed to be for good and valuable consideration [art. 2159 par. (2)]. As it is a contract with property transfer, the borrower becomes owner and bears the risk of the borrowed asset loss, independent of what happens with the borrowed assets.

2.4.2. The restitution obligation

The siege of this matter is represented by article 2164 of the new Civil Code. In the matter of the loan for consumption too, the main obligation of the debtor is to return at due term, assets of the same type, quantity and quality, regardless of its price variation until the time of restitution. We are in the presence of dispositive rule that represents a reunion of the dispositions in the matter of the Civil Code in 1864. Therefore, the parties can derogate by contract, setting for instance, an adjustment with the inflation or with the evolution of a currency exchange[13]. As for the loan whose object is an amount of money, the debtor must return the nominal amount, and the parties can derogate this rule [art. 2164 par. (2)]. In the last paragraph of art. 2164, the new Civil Code considers the case when it is impossible to return assets of the same quality and quantity, setting that, in such a case, the debtor will return their value, established at the date and place where he will pay. This can be the case of some loans in lei, with due term on a date when Romania will adopt the EURO as official currency.

2.4.2. The restitution term

Here, one must consider an interpretation correlated with the general dispositions in the new Civil Code, regarding the term, namely art. 1411-1420. According to art. 2161 in the new Civil Code, in case of the loan for good and valuable consideration the restitution term is supposed to be stipulated in favor of both parties. As a result, one cannot give up its benefice except by the parties' agreement, and the payment can take place before the term, but only with the creditor's agreement. In the matter of banking contracts, in case of a banking credit at due term, the debtor can unilaterally give up the profit of the term within the conditions stipulated in the contract for anticipated restitution.

According to the dispos. of art. 1417 in the in the new Civil Code, the debtor loses the advantage of the term if:

- he is in insolvency. In the sense of the law, insolvency is a state that will be ascertained by the court, in which the value of the founding asset that can be subject to foreclosure is smaller than the total value of the demandable debts. Until the current regulation in the new Civil Code, the term insolvency could be met in the fiscal regulations;

[12] In accordance with art. 1573 of the Civil Code Codul civil in 1864, if the bailer has an urgent and unpredicted need of the asset, the court could, according to case, force the bailee to return it.

[13] I. Urs, Obligaţia de restituire a împrumutului de consumaţie oglindită în doctrina şi practica judecătorească, in the magazine Dreptul (3/2005), 127-135.

- he is in insolvency;[14]
- deliberately or due to a serious fault, it reduces the warranties given to his creditor or cannot give the promised warranties; or
- because of him, the debtor no longer fulfills an essential condition to sign the loan contract.

Loss of the term advantage triggers anticipated due term of the obligation, with the same effects as coming to due date (art. 1418).

In case a restitution term was not set in the contract, article 2162 of the new Civil Code regulates the possibility to have a term set by the court. Thus, according to the first paragraph of art. 2164, if the contracting parties did not stipulate a restitution term, the court will stipulate, sovereignly, considering the case features. The novelty is found in the dispositions of the 2nd paragraph of the same article, dispositions which limit the sovereignty of the court in setting the restitution term to 3 months only. The petition will be solved according to the procedure of the president's ordinance [art. 2162 par. (3)].

2.4.3. The interest loan

According to the law, the loan for consumption can only be a gratuitous loan, but also a loan for good and valuable consideration. In case of a loan for good and valuable consideration, the creditor pretends from the debtor, besides the obligation to return the loan, another amount of money or other goods of this kind, called interest[15]. For this reason, the loan for good and valuable consideration is called a loan with interest, for which – either by derogation or by fulfilling the rules stipulated for the loan for consumption – the special rules stipulated in the new Civil Code apply (art. 2167 – 2170) or those stipulated in other normative documents[16].

In art. 1 par. (1) of the GO no. 13/2011, one stipulates that the parties are free to set the interest rate by contract. The interest must be set in a written document, otherwise the legal interest is due (art. 6 of the O.G. no. 13/2011).

According to the law, the interests can be[17]:

- compensatory: due by the debtor for the amount of money borrowed, previous to the due date;
- penalizing: due by the debtor for not fulfilling the obligation at due date.

If the law or the contract stipulates that the obligation triggers compensatory and/or penalizing interests, according to case, and the parties did not expressly set their level, the legal interest is due. The legal interest is set at the level of the set at the level of the NBR interest level.

In the civil matter, except for the relations connected to enterprise exploitation[18], the legal interest is set at the level of the NBR reference interest diminished by 20%. In the same matter, the [14] The main element of insolvency, in all its forms, is the lack of finances to pay the eligible debts. For more details, see, Stanciu D. Cărpenaru, Vasile Nemeş, Mihai Adrian Hotca, Noua lege a insolvenței. Law no. 85/2006. Comentarii pe articole, (Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006), 13 and the foll.

[15] According to art. 2168 in the new Civil Code, the interest can be set in money or other performances under any title or name for which the borrower binds himself as equivalent of the asset use.

[16] G.O. no. 13/2011 regarding the legal compensatory or penalizing interest for money obligations, as well as for the regulation of some financial – fiscal measures in the banking field, published in Romania's Official Gazette no. 607 on 29th August 2011. When the GO no. 13/2011 entered into force it abolished the G.O. no. 9/2000 regarding the value of the legal interest for financial obligations.

[17] The new regulation in the matter of interests for financial obligations reflects the opinions expressed in the doctrine regarding the legal definition given to the interest by the G.O. no. 9/2000 considered to be more economic than juridical. For details, see, Gheorghe Piperea, Introducere în Dreptul contractelor profesionale (C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011), 210 and the foll.

[18] According to art. 3 in the new Civil Code, exploitation of an enterprise means to systematical run an organized activity, by one person or several people consisting in producing, administrating or transferring goods or performing services, regardless of this having or not a profitable purpose.

law limits the value of the rate set by the parties, which is the interest cannot exceed more than 50% of the legal interest level (art. 5 of the G.O. no. 13/2011). According to the law, the clauses which violate this limitation are null and void and the creditor loses his right to pretend legal interest. In all cases, the validity of the conventional interest level is determined by relation to the legal interest in force the on the contract signing date [art. 5 par. (3) of the G.O. no. 13/2011].

In the juridical relations with an alien status element, if the Romanian law is applied and the pay was stipulated in foreign currency, the legal interest is of 6% per year.

The interest is calculated starting with the day of remitting the interest (art. 2169 in the new Civil Code). According to art. 7 of the G.O. no. 13/2011, the anticipated pay of the compensatory interest is allowed, but for no more than 6 months. The interest thus received is not subject to restitution, regardless of the reference indices variation. The new Civil Code states as well, in art. 2170 that the anticipated pay of the interest cannot be made for more than 6 months. But in the vision of the common law, if one can determine the interest rate, the possible excesses or deficits are subject to compensation form one rate to another, for the entire period of the credit. The last rate is an exception, as it is always entirely won by the creditor. Thus, one can notice a lack of correlation between the dispositions of art. 7 of the G.O. no. 13/2011 and the stipulations of art. 2170 in the new Civil Code. Therefore, we suggest to the legislator to reformulate this regulation thus as to balance the legal dispositions in the matter.

According to the law, the compensatory interests can be capitalized and can make interests. The current account contract is an exception.[19]

The credit institutions and the non-banking financial institutions are subject to special regulations.

3. Conclusions

From the analysis made in this study, concerning the novelty aspects comprised in the loan contract in the light of the new Civil Code dispositions and of some special regulations, one can obviously notice a reconfiguration of this especially useful tool for civil relations.

Over the time and within the conditions imposed by the new economic and social conditions, the specialty doctrine and practice in the field stated some observations and proposals, now under the form of the juridical rule.

The new Civil Code mainly keeps the previous regulation, but also brings important changes that we aimed at emphasizing in the present study.

As a consequence, concerning the current juridical regime of the loan contract, we emphasize the following novelty aspects in Law no. 287/2009:

- the express regulation of the loan promise;
- within the conditions stipulated by the law, the loan contract, in both its forms, acquires the feature of enforceable title;
- the baille too can borrow the borrowed asset to third parties;
- for non-observance of the obligations concerning the use or the restitution, the bailee is responsible for the asset loss, including as a result of force majeure;
- the bailee lien is removed until all necessary and urgent payments generated by the asset maintenance;
- the court's right to decide an anticipated restitution of the asset is eliminated;
- local entities can make operations like crediting, other entities than those making such operations as a profession, without constituting the object of the special regulations existing in the field of credit and financial activities;

[19] Art. 2171 of the new Civil Code defines the current account contract as the contract by which the parties, called current account operators, bind themselves to register in an account the debts resulting from mutual remittances, considering them non-exigible and unavailable until the account is closed .

- the court's sovereignty is limited when setting the restitution term for the loan for consumption, term set by the law at 3 months only. The petition is solved urgently;

- new regulations in the matter of interest. The interests can be: compensatory and/or penalizing;

- the compensatory interest can be paid anticipatively, it can be capitalized and it can produce interests. Exception: the current account contract.

All these aspects are, in our opinion, advantages of the new regulation in the matter of the loan contract.

Besides the virtues of the new regulation, one can notice a lack of correlation between the dispositions of art. 7 of the O.G. no. 13/2011 and the dispositions of art. 2170 of the new Civil Code, and we suggest the legislator to restate this regulation in order to provide the balance of the legal dispositions in the matter.

Mainly, the new Civil Code, provides a proper regulation of the loan contract, managing to correlate the dispositions regarding this contract and the regulations of the general theory in the matter of obligations.

Thus, we conclude that the current regulation of the loan contract reflects the modernism of the new Civil Code, engaged on the road of juridical institutions reformation, in harmony with the realities and demands of the current Romanian society.

4. References:

Books:

- Cărpenaru, Stanciu , Nemeş,Vasile, Hotca, Mihai, Adrian, Noua lege a insolvenței. Legea nr. 85/2006. Comentarii pe articole, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006.
- Chirică, D., Tratat de drept civil. Contracte speciale, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008.
- Deak,, Francisc, Tratat de drept civil. Contracte speciale, Actami Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998.
- Florescu, Dumitru, Contractele civile Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011.
- Molcuț, Emil, Drept privat roman, Edition that was reviewed and completed, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004.
- Moțiu, Florin, Contractele speciale, 2nd edition reviewed and complated, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011.
- Mureşan, Mircea, Drept civil. Contracte speciale, Cordial Lex Publishing House, Cluj Napoca, 1999.
- Piperea,Gheorghe, Introducere în Dreptul contractelor profesionale, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011.

Articles:

- Rada Postolache, Credit Facility According To The New Civil Code, in the Agora International Journal of Juridical Sciences (2/2011)..
- Urs, I., Obligația de restituire a împrumutului de consumație oglindită în doctrina şi practica judecătorească, in the magazine Dreptul (3/2005), 127-135.

CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION ON CHILD PROTECTION THROUGH THE NEW CIVIL CODE

LAURA CETEAN-VOICULESCU[*]
ADA HURBEAN[]

Abstract
The new Civil Code came into force on 1st of October 2011, has brought some changes to the two main acts of child protection, namely Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children rights and 273/2004 Law on the legal status of adoption.
These changes are not entirely beneficial, in our opinion, the purpose of this paper is to analyze and comment on articles that have been changed.
Will be analyzed in relation to guardianship matters, persons who may be custodians, when the measure of guardianship, who appointed guardian, the substantive adoption, consent to adoption, the date at which effects occur adoption.
Even if we agree that some changes were needed to ensure better protection of child rights, the proposed and introduced by the new Civil Code, which repealed the Family Code and numerous special laws (such as the two which form the subject of this analysis), not as a whole likely to achieve this goal, some of which are wrong in terms of legislative technique, others at odds with practical reality.

Keywords: The child protection, adoption, interest of the child, guardianship, alternative protection

Introduction

The field covered by this study is that of child protection as an institution belonging to family law, particularly important in the current context, importance and concern is apparent the legislature to change the main legislation governing the protection, namely the Law on protecting and promoting children's rights and the law on adoption procedure, recently amended by the same law, namely the new Civil Code.

In this paper we propose that objective analysis of the changes introduced in this area in the field covered by the two basic laws belonging package of laws protecting children, adopted in June 2004 and entered into force on 1 January 2005 and last amended by the October 1st, when the last regulatory occurred through a series of acts. Also point out that an important objective is the legal formulation of proposals to improve the civil code of conduct contrary to good legal relations having as subjects children with special about the child custody measure both parents (joint custody).

How to achieve the main objectives is the critical analysis legislative text, reference to the previous regulation and the oldest in the field, the study of comparative law and legal doctrine and analysis of judicial and administrative practice have been experienced.

To date, the date changes mentioned, few authors have expressed opinions on legal doctrine to these changes, with some articles published in professional journals in adjacent materials[1], and few [*] Author, Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "1 Decembie 1918" University, Alba Iulia, Faculty of Law and Social Sciences, Law and Administrative Sciences Department, (email: lauravoiculescu@yahoo.com).

[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "1 December 1918" University, Alba Iulia, Faculty of Law and Social Sciences, Law and Administrative Sciences Department, (email: adahro@yahoo.com).

[1] For example Emese Florian "Dissolution of marriage in the regulation of the new Civil Code", The Law Magazine no. 10/2011 or Bodoaşcă Theodore, "Some views on the common property of spouses acquired during the marriage, in light of the new Civil Code", The Law Magazine no. 10/2011, Veronica Dobozi "Vision medical assisted human reproduction in new Civil Code," Judicial Review Courier no. 10/2011, Milena Tomescu, "Loss of parental rights under the new Civil Code," Judicial Review Courier no. 10/2011 so on.

courses published after the entry into force of the new Civil Code[2], but special on the field not analyzed.

On the law relating to the protection and promotion of child rights

Of the Law on the protection and promotion of child rights, no. 272/2004 was repealed provisions of 40th articles, first paragraph, 41st and 42nd paragraph.

The 40th article, first paragraph refers to cases where guardianship is established, is repealed because the new Civil Code contains Book I (about people), Title III (Protection of individuals) a chapter on the guardianship of minors, the 110th article provides that "minor guardianship is established when both parents are, where appropriate, deceased, unknown, deprived of the exercise of parental rights or criminal penalty has been applied to prohibit parental rights, placed under judicial interdiction, legally declared dead or missing and if, on termination of adoption, the court decides that the guardianship is in the child interest". Even if nothing has changed in establishing guardianship cases, the legislature has deemed it appropriate to repeal this article. In fact, on several occasions, everything has changed the new Civil Code, the repeal of a law or code of legal rules and legal relationship that brought within its scope. This may justify, if the full repeal a legislative act, but not if some of its articles remain in being, to exist following chapters of laws, consisting of one or several articles, special laws do not define the institution that regulates or conditions that apply, etc.

Also, in the second Chapter of the 272nd Act were repealed both articles which settled the family environment and alternative child care. The first article related to the persons who may be tutors, and the second to the guardian's appointment. So if people can be tutors are, as before, the individual or husband and wife together, not been preserved the condition relating to residence in Romania. Therefore, an individual may be guardian, in the absence of express provisions, even if domiciled in another state. There will probably be called, unless a person established in the manner provided as a priority by the new Civil Code, with priority guardian residing in Romania, applying by analogy the regulation of international adoption as subsidiary to the internal one, but the law does not provide any binding in this sense, therefore remains a recommendation.

Has been also removed, the requirement to assess the moral and material conditions to be met by the guardian to receive a child care, which previously was the responsibility of the General Directorate of Social Assistance and Child Protection.

Given the possibility of appointing a guardian of the child's parents even, indeed, no such verification was necessary, since parents are the ones who know best which is the interest of their child.

The guardian' activity will be, however, checked under the new regulations, on the one hand by the family council, and secondly by the guardianship court on how to tutor exrcise their duties in accordance with the interests of the child. But in the event of his appointment by the court likely would impose such a check.

In the same vein, were repealed provisions of the 42nd article which regulate the appointment of guardians, the appointment by the court is only the exceptional situation, the 118th article, Civil Code expressly providing that "without an appointed guardian, the guardianship court appointed priority as guardian, if not opposed reasons, a relative or a close family friend of the minor' family, able to fulfill this task, taking into account where appropriate, personal relations, the near residences, the material conditions and moral guarantees that we have called the trustee".

Regarding the content changes from in these articles, we emphasize that because of arguments, we agree with the appointment of guardian by parent, first and only alternative to guardianship court. But it would be to inform people about these changes more as we believe that too few parents know what alternative ways to protect their children are and anticipates the possibility of appointing a guardian, in the future.

[2] Emese Florian, "Family Law", the 4th edition, CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, Dan Lupaşcu, Mihaela Crăciunescu Cristiana, "Family Law", Legal Universe Publishing, 2011, etc.

On the law governing the adoption procedure

Regarding the second reference Act in the areas of child rights protection, no. 273rd Act from 2004 on the legal status of adoption, the new Civil Code also brought a number of changes. Thus, implicitly repealed and modified legal relations referred to the 1st article, 5-13, 16, 18th article, the second paragraph, the first thesis, 56th article, (1) - (4) paragraph, the 57th article, 59-63 and 65, with no given that two years before, this law has been amended once[3]. In addition to criticisms related to legislative instability in a procedure as complex and important as the adoption, the amendments to the Civil Code are largely criticism to.

The first article of the 273rd Act was repealed, although included the adoption definition, which was restored in the same form in the new civil code, without any change. Legislature's intent is clear from all the rules to regulate adoption in general in the Civil Code and procedural matters by the special Act. However, defining the procedure in the special Act governing it was not an aspect that had changed objectionable, in our opinion. It is recommended that a special Act defining the institution that governs, even of his first articles. In every piece of legislation that regulated the adoption, from the Family Code which repealed the provisions relating to adoption of the old Civil Code, this institution has been defined.

Second, the substantive conditions for the adoption validity regulated by the special Act, were repealed (5-13 article), which are currently regulated by the Civil Code, the second section of the chapter on adoption, restructured and reclassified in relation to the former regulation. Perhaps this repeal is made by the legislator desire to dedicate all the substantial aspects to the Civil Code and the procedural aspect to the special Act. A future step of the legislature is probably to settle the adoption procedure in the Code of Civil Procedure and fully repeals the special Act.

If the doctrine hitherto classified these conditions in substantial conditions and obstacles, the Civil Code classifies them now in requirements for persons who may be adopted, the persons who may adopt and consent. But the chapter on the conditions was not completely abolished, leaving the valid provisions of articles about the form of giving consent to adoption, in which case no longer justify maintaining the chapter title (it is actually three remaining articles into force of this chapter: the 14th article, the 15th article and the 17th article).

On the content of the substantive conditions, the new Civil Code has not resumed provided on the child's best interest, but it is recognized as a principle of adoption, which is why we do not believe that it will disrupt the action for revocation of adoption input where it is considered that this is detrimental to the interests of the child. Moreover, the absolute nullity of adoption is drawn so its conclusion in contravention of the form or substance, as well as its fictivity, being that done for a purpose other than the superior interests of the child care. We can say therefore that the best interest of the child in adoption procedure is a background implicitly condition in adoption. The other requirements of adoption remained the same, even if they were reversed and reclassified.

Also as a criticism of legislative technique, the legislature has expressly provided the impediment that two persons of the same sex cannot adopt together, provision unnecessary since the same code provides that two people cannot adopt jointly or simultaneously or successively, unless who are husband and wife, and the same-sex marriages are not allowed in Romania.

Even if the legislature had intended to only cover international adoptions (covered in a separate chapter of the Civil Code) this provision has no utility as on the substance, should be respected national regulations of the adopter and adoptee, and adoption by cohabitants is also prohibited.

---

[3]273/2004 Act, republished in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 788 of 19 November 2009, amended by 102/2008 Ordinance, approved with amendments by 49/2009 Act.

Thus, Law no. 273/2004 regulates in a chapter separate from national adoption procedure, international adoption procedure, supplementing its provisions with those of the law governing the relations of private international law, Law no. 105/1992. However, the provisions of this law, the new Civil Code in force only a few items left, taking most of the rules of private international law, including those relating to international adoption. With regard to determining the law applicable to the substance and form, 2607th article provides that the fund is established by the national law of the adopter, and one to be adopted. In addition, they are to meet the conditions that are required for both, established by each of the two national laws shown. Substantive conditions required for the husbands who adopt together, are those established by law that governs the overall effects of their marriage. The same law also applies if one spouse adopts the child of another.

Third, a substantive change is on the point at which take effect, the judicial decision which was declaration of adoption, this time being, after the entry into force of the new Civil Code, that the final remaining court decision which was declaration of, no longer, expecting when his remains irrevocable.

Fourth, also as a critical legislative technique was maintained chapter of the special law on the effects of adoption, although there is in force only article on the obligation to inform the adopted child of his adoption and a paragraph on the effects of the international adoption.

Fifth, a fundamental change is the possibility of forfeiture from parental rights of the adopter or adopters. While before, the special law provided that the adopter has to adopted child, natural parent's rights and obligations to his child, not provide the possibility of forfeiture from parental rights and the doctrine, the majority view was that the only sanction parents natural, and not adopters. In our opinion, the sanction must be applied equally to natural and adoptive parents, because the situation of the adopted child is the same to the adoptive parents and their relatives, and gives reasons for deprivation of parental rights are distinct from those leading to termination of adoption. On the other hand, the measure of forfeiture of parental rights is a provisional exercise of parental rights the court may restore the natural parents or adopted, while cessation of adoption is a final measure.

Many legal rules contained in the new Civil Code are the reference to the special law. Thus, after the general rule provides that information relating to adoption is confidential, the Civil Code provides in Art. 474 that "the manner in which the adoptee is informed of the adoption and the family of origin and legal status of information on adoption is regulated by special law," sending the whole article only, remained in force in the chapter on the effects adoption of special law.

Sixth, the same question of legislative technique, it is noted on the chapter concerning the termination of adoption, of which remained in force across two articles that cover aspects of procedure (citation, court communication). Defective formulation contained in the special law was removed by repealing the 60th Article, which referred to a declaration of invalidity and not to a nullity determination of the adoption, in an absolute void, the Civil Code correcting these provisions ("Adoption terminated by break-termination or cancellation after finding invalid"). However we disagree with the used terminology, the adoption by the break-termination or cancellation. It should apply by analogy the same terms that define how a marriage ends, since we are in the same branch of law governing the two fundamental institutions: marriage and adoption. Thus, we believe that the termination should be understood that adoption terminates upon death, break-termination for failure in the best interest of the adoptee or culpable acts described, and dissolution for the void, or relative nullity.

On joint custody

If pending the entry into force of the new Civil Code, Family Code provides that the dissolution of marriage or similar situations, the child will be assigned one of the parents, preserving the right for the other parent to have access to the child, as determined by decision court now, in accordance with civil Code (397 article), after divorce, parental authority is shared both parents, except where the guardianship court decides otherwise. From this rule there are exceptions, where there are reasonable grounds, having regard to the interests of the child, the court may decide that parental authority is exercised only by a parent with the other parent right to supervise the growth and education of the child and to consent to its adoption.

This way of exercising parental authority is a legal novelty in our system, so that already sparked numerous discussions contradictory. In Europe is seen as an arrangement for the benefit of children, reducing tensions between the parents, following separation. It is said[4] that the removal of a parent by establishing unique custody would arise tensions, joint custody involves both parents and trains them in the period after divorce in child care and education of their children, remove emotional conflict, reduce costs, etc.

We could add another argument for joint custody, namely when there are more children - brothers ("couterini" and "cosângeni"), where both parents are able to grow them properly, is removed the possibility to be separated by their custody. The divorce caused enough suffering for children, no longer be added trauma of separation from siblings. Thus, instead of entrusting one child to mother and the other to the father, both children will be entrusted with both parents. Is a possibility that reflected the legislature but in another procedure - the adoption - in which is set that the brothers will be entrusted for adoption together, except where it would be in their best interests to be assign separately.

There are already several judgments in which parents were given joint exercise of parental authority, decisions which went to establish child residence with both parents equally. The practical exercise of joint custody is either the residence establishment, during half a year to one parent and half the year to the other parent, The practical exercise of joint custody is either the residence, during half a year to one parent and half the year to the other parent, but also may be sharing the week or another way. It is recommended that in each situation to determine the best way for children, in determining how to exercise parental authority shall have priority interests of the child and not those of the parents who are divorced. In support of this assertion, we quote the provisions of the 2nd article of the Law on protection of child rights, according to which any regulations adopted in respecting and promoting children's rights, "as well as any legal document issued or, where appropriate, completed in this area is subject to the priority interests of the child". This principle is required including the rights and obligations of the child's parents, other legal guardians and any person whom he has been legally entrusted. Best interests of the child principle shall prevail in all actions and decisions concerning children, whether undertaken by public authorities and private bodies, and in cases decided by courts. The provisions of this Article shall be corroborated with those in the art. 263 Civil Code concerning the protection of interests of the child.

Therefore recommended custody - even both parents, but taking into account in determining how to exercise parental authority of school or kindergarten child relationships of affection and friendship that has developed child with grandparents, other relatives, colleagues, friends, etc.

If the child/children has over 10 years of age, their hearing is also required when deciding which parent to exercise parental authority, but also on how to exercise joint custody despite the fact that new provisions governing mandatory listening child in all administrative or judicial proceedings concerning him.

If listening to children under 10 years is only optional, the child reaches that age is required. The child's right to be heard implies his right to request and receive any information, tailored to age and degree of maturity, the right to express opinion and this opinion be considered as rejected or view child make a different by an authority must be grounded.

[4] For more details see Bogdan Catalin, President of the Romanian Association for joint custody, about Proksch report on the benefits of joint custody and child on www.juridice.ro;

Conclusions

The article carried out an ensemble, not an exhaustive list of provisions of the new Civil Code concerning the protection of children, being analyzed in particular the amendments to the Law on protection of child rights, the law on adoption procedure and some aspects related to the joint exercise by parents of parental authority.

We believe that the subject would meet the relevant administrative and judicial bodies to resolve related proceedings involving family law that it involves minors.

Even if divorce proceedings by agreement between the spouses is not an exclusively judicial, the registrar or notary public keeps the same obligations in their work, namely the protection of interests of the children with information and consideration of their opinion.

The main problem might arise is related to education and civilization of our people, unusual, yet, on friendly terms with post-divorce, absolutely necessary in cases where there is natural or adopted minor children in the family.

Certainly law and administrative practice in the future will provide many topics for analysis, jutting out already the problem of impossibility to crossing national borders with the child / children without consent of the other parent, even during the exercise of parental authority is the parent who wants to travel the child abroad, the parents find an opportunity to tease each other, to the detriment of the child / their children.

References:

- Adam Dragoi, Laura Cetean-Voiculescu, "Theoretical and applied course in family law, (Oradea, Agora University Publishing House, 2007);
- Civil Code, the old Family Code, Act 272 and 273/2004;
- www.juridice.ro.

BUSINESS JUDGMENT RULE - EXONERATION OF LIABILITY CAUSE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR. COMPARATIVE LAW STUDY

CARMEN TODICA*

Abstract
Starting from the origin system- the American law, and from the principles of corporate governance which establishes it expressly, the study reveals the regulatory manner in Company law and also the implication of legal practice, of the "business judgment" rule. Seen from a double perspective: as a ground for exclusion of liability clause from civil liability of the administrator, but also as a counterweight to the diligence and prudence duty, the business judgment rule is analyzed in accordance with the legal liability falling within the administrator's duties, both by Law no.31/1990 and the New Civil Code. Discussing also by the standard for appreciating the prudence and diligence- the criterion of the good administrator- imposed by the Romanian legislation, compared with other countries, the paper approaches the manner for regulating the business judgment rule in American law, and the manner in which it has been transposed into the Romanian legislation, its application realm, the invocation method and the consequences of this rule on the civil liability of the administrator. This paper constantly refers to the legal practice solutions in common-law states, where the rule stems.

Keywords*: duty of diligence, duty of prudence, business decisions, no-reliance, duty to inform, duty to care in decision making.*

Introduction

Given the legislative reform in business law and adequacy to the European Union standards, the Romanian lawmaker amended the Law no. 31/1990 on trading companies, including the principles of corporate governance. In this context, the regulations on the administrator's status were revised, instituting a series of legal duties of prudence and diligence toward the company, by applying the business judgment rule.

The study focuses mainly on the role of the business judgment rule within the decision making process in which the administrator is involved and its effects regarding the civil obligations for the adopted decision. Thus for the exercise of the administrative duties of the trading company, the administrator is often faced with options, having to make that decision which, according to the information it holds and based on his own judgment appears to be more profitable for the company. If such a decision is made with the prudence and diligence consistent with the standards set by the Law on trading companies and the New Civil Code, the administrator will not be held liable. In this context the business judgment rule can be seen as a cause for exoneration of liability of the administrator, establishing a type of common error in which all the persons with the same status might find themselves, acting in similar circumstances.

For a better understanding of the operating mechanism of the business judgment rule, within the approach taken, the starting point was represented by the analysis of the content the duties of diligence and prudence, a legal obligation falling upon the administrator, according both to Law no. 31/1990 and to the New Civil Code. Such an analysis is required, firstly, because from the lawmaker point of view the business judgment rule is a counterpart for the duties of diligence and prudence, and secondly, whereas the duties of diligence and prudence require also a new objective evaluation criterion of the administrator, by reference to the standard of behavior of the "good administrator", criterion established both by law no. 31/1990 and by the New Civil code.

* Senior Lecturer Ph. D., „Titu Maiorescu" University, Faculty of Law (email: carmentodica_utm@yahoo.com).

Starting from the American dogma[1] according to which the duty of diligence holds three constituents: duty to monitor the business's activity, in general and of managers in particular, duty of inquiry and care required for decision making, we've tried to define the prudence and diligence concept, by identifying some correspondence of these three obligations in the Romanian legislation. At the same time, while bearing in mind that, currently, the Romanian jurisprudence hasn't offered many cases for the administrator's accountability for breaches regarding the duties of prudence and diligence, context in which the business judgment rule could be invoked as a cause of exoneration of liability, the study presents comparative jurisprudential examples of the common-law states. In an adjacent manner to this issue, the means by which can be claimed the business judgment rule as a cause for exclusion of liability in an eventual proceeding based on the liability of the administrator of the trading company for breaching the diligence and prudence duty evokes interest. The problem arises in the context of the system of origin (common law), the business judgment rule establishes a presumption of good faith when making a business decision, the tendency of the court being not to censor the merits of the latter. In Romanian literature, the problem has been subject to some doctrinal differences, being outlined two opinions. According to one opinion, the rule establishes the presumption of good faith of the administrator in the decision making process[2], in a contrary view[3], the rule doesn't impose in favor of the administrator a defense presumption with consequences in the probative plan. Although we believe that the business judgment rule imposes in favor of the administrator a defense presumption which can be rebutted by the corporate claimant, we believe however that the court should not supersede the administrators' decision and to examine the opportunity of the business decision, but only to verify the fulfillment of the requirements imposed by the business judgment rule, which means to verify if the decision was adopted after a preliminary inquiry and with the belief that the undertaken action was in the company's best interest.

1. Duty of prudence and diligence

Long disputed in the legislative forum[4], the duty of diligence and prudence of the administrator in a trading company has found a well deserved regulation, both within the body of the Law on trading companies no. 31/1990[5] and also in the New Civil Code[6]. Thus according to art. 144^1 paragraph 1 from the Law "The members of the board of directors shall exercise their term of office with loyalty, in the company's interest". The regulation, however, is not limited only to the members of the board of directors, but, it also considers the managers, respectively the management and the supervisory board from the dual system[7] of the joint-stock company, as well as any other

[1] M. Eisenberg, The duty of care of corporate directors and officers, (University of Pittsburgh Riview, 1990): 945.

[2] Radu N. Catana*, "*The diligence and prudence duty of the administrators in the context of law reform regarding the trading companies", Pandectele Române 3 (2006): 195-196.

[3] Lucian Bercea, " The business judgment rule: on the new regime of accountability of the joint stock company administrators*", Pandectele Române* 8 (2007): 47-48

[4] We say much disputed due to the inconsistency of the lawmaker who oscillated between legislative establishment or to suppress. Chamber of Deputies amended the provisions of the article, by removing the obligation of prudence and diligence so that on the date of enactment of Law no. 441/2006 during the meeting of October 31st, 2006, art. 144^1 paragraph 1, contained the following provisions "The members of the board of directors shall exercise their term of office with loyalty, in the company's interest". Through OUG no. 82/2007 the Government intervened, establishing the duty of diligence and prudence in its current form of the analyzed article.

[5] Law on trading companies republished in the Official Gazette no. 1066/17.11.2004, including subsequent amendments.

[6] Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, republished in the Official Gazette. no. 505/15 July 2011 pursuant to Art. 218 of Law no. 71/2011 for the implementation of Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code (Official Gazette. No. 409/10 June 2011).

[7] According to art152, art. 153^2 paragraph 6 and art. 153^8 paragraph 3, that provide that art. 144^1 shall apply accordingly.

administrator, regardless of the company type where he exercises his duties which their position involves. With general applicability to any legal person, the new Civil Code provides the duties of diligence and prudence of the administrator of the legal person in accordance with art. 213 ("the members of the management of a legal person must act in its interest, with prudence and diligence required for a good owner").

1.1. The concept duties of prudence and diligence. The texts above mentioned have a dual role: as an establishment, as a source for the duties of prudence and diligence, but also as an objective criterion for evaluating the administrator in question, with specific reference to a standard conduct as a "good administrator".

Under the first aspect of the concept duties of prudence and diligence, in theory[8] it has been defined by reference to the obligation of loyalty, being considered as bipolar obligations. The loyalty duty implies the exercise of the mandate, without the involvement of the personal interest of the manager; on the contrary, by virtue of the prudence and diligence duty, the administrator must be involved in the activities of the company and must manage them as a good professional and based on profitability criteria.

In the American law, the duty of diligence concerns the administrator task to fulfill his mandate in good faith in a manner in which he considers to be appropriate for the company's interests and with prudence which would reasonably be expected from a good owner acting under similar conditions. The Spanish law establishes as falling in the administrator's duties the general duty of diligence, under which he performs his duty with the care of a tidy entrepreneur and a loyal representative.[9]

In terms of evaluation criteria the US law envisages the prudent owner, while the Spanish law envisaged the tidy entrepreneur. The English law[10] relates the standard of duty of diligence to the conduct a person that has the knowledge, the skills and experience should reasonably have from the moment it holds the position as an administrator.

Under the Romanian law, the standard for appreciating the manner of implementation of the duty of diligence is the one of the "good administrator". Until the amendment of the Law on trading companies, and the establishment of the "good administrator" criterion, the principle of aggravation of responsibility of the administrator was based on art. 1540 Civil Code from 1864 (currently repealed), under which the representative with pecuniary interest was responsible for failure of the mandate for any fault, negligence or imprudence, which was assessed in abtracto, in relation to the conduct of a good owner, honest and diligent, found under the same circumstances as the one incumbed upon the concerned administrator, criterion also undertaken by the New Civil Code. In art. 213 of the New Civil Code "the members of the management of a legal person must act in its interest, with prudence and diligence required for a good owner". Thus we can state that: the criterion of the good owner used by the New Civil Code is similar to the criterion of the good administrator provided by the Law on trading companies.

This criterion for assessing the fault. according to art. 144^1 para.1 from the afore mentioned law, and also according to art. 213 of the New Civil Code, is nothing more but the lawmaker's desire to regulate the accountability of the administrator for the slightest fault – imprudence and negligence. But the accountability of the administrator for the duties of diligence and prudence is engaged in accordance with the predictability of the consequences of the administration act. Thus predictability is analyzed in relation to the good administrator model, respectively to an abstract person who has

---

[8] Radu Catană, quated work, p. 189.

[9] M. Eisenberg, „The duty of care and the business judgement rule in american corporate law*"*, Company, Financial and Insolvensy Review, (1997): 185. ; L.F. De La Gandara, „Le regime de la responsabilite civil de l' administrateur selon la loi espanole sur les societes anonymes*"*, Gazette du Paris, (2000): 165.

[10] Art. 158 of Companies Law Reform Bill, November 2005, on www.dti.gov.uk/bbf/co-law-reform-bill/.

the knowledge, the experience and the skills of a good administrator under the same circumstances. If the abstract model of the good administrator should or could have foreseen the injurious effects of the management actions, then the liability of the administrator concerned shall be engaged[11].

1.2. The content of the prudence and diligence duty. The law on trading companies, as is the law of other states, limits itself to establishing the duties of prudence and diligence, without giving any details. Thus, the doctrine has the task to analyze the elements which constitute these duties.

According to the German doctrine[12], the duty of prudence and diligence provided by art. &93 para.1 AktG[13], contains three obligations. Therefore, the requirement determines the administrators to act in accordance to the legal norms and on the provisions of the constitutive act (legal obligation) and to exercise their mandate with conscientiousness and professionalism, based on adequate information (duties of prudence and diligence in the narrow sense) and to make sure that the other administrators or staff are fulfilling their own obligations (duty to monitor).

In the US[14] doctrine it is assessed that the diligence has three constitutive elements: the duty to monitor the company's activity, in general and of the directors in particular (duty to monitor/oversight), duty to inquiry and the care required to make decisions.

The same three requirements can be found in the Romanian legislation, as it will be shown in the following, and it outlines as we believe, a broader outline for the duties of diligence and prudence of the company's administrator. Thus, the duty to monitor the directors and the staff is established in several legal provisions. In this sense, art. 142 letter d) lists among the basic skills of the administrators' board, "duty to monitor the directors".

The duty to monitor doesn't necessarily involve a review of daily activities in a detailed manner, only a periodic inquiry being sufficient in order to indentify the significant issues related to the company's management.

Similarly the duty of monitoring must also span to the management bodies of the dual system of management of a joint-stock company. Thus, according to art.153^9 letter a) "the supervisory board has the following main attributions : a) exercise the permanent control over the leadership". In agreement with this provision, art. 153^1 para.3 expressly establishes that "the management shall exercise their powers under the control of the supervisory board". And according to art. 153^4, paragraph 3 of the Law " the supervisory board may request to the management any information that it deems necessary for the exercise of its control attributions and may carry out appropriate check-ups and investigations". At the same time, the law establishes also the responsibility of the administrators towards the company for the acts of the managers or of the staff. According to art. 144^2 paragraph 2 " the administrators shall be liable towards the company for the prejudices caused by the acts of the managers or of the staff, where the damage would have occurred if they had exercised the supervision by virtue of the duties which their position involve. The liability for failing to comply with the supervision of the managers and of the staff rests solely with the administrators from the unitary system for the joint-stock company management. In doctrine[15] it has been argued that such a liability is based on the administrator's fault regarding the duty to monitor (culpa in [11] Radu N. Catană, quoted work, p. 193. The author lists several cases of Belgian jurisprudence where the administrator hasn't been held responsible. Thus, the administrators couldn't be held responsible even though their acts lead effectively to the cessation of payment of the company because at the moment when the decisions were made, the prospect of their catastrophic effect could not be foreseen by a prudent and vigilant individual. To the same extent, the act of the administrator can't be held culpable if the shareholders claim that he was supposed to take all the necessary precautions to avoid the harmful effects, but the effects could not be normally and rationally established before.

[12] H. Fleischer, Handbuch des Vorstandsrechts, (Munchen: C.H. Beck 2006): 237.

[13] Under the German law, &93 paragraph 1AktG applies both to the administrators from the unitary system and leadership (vorstand) and to the supervisory board (aufsichtsrat) from the dual system, according to &114 AktG.

[14] M. Eisenberg, quoted work, 945.

[15] Radu N. Catană, quoted work, 196.

vigilando), and not on the warranty idea, so that the plaintiff company must prove the fact that the administrators haven't fulfilled the supervision duties that were likely to avoid the harm brought to the company through the staff's acts.

Closely related to the duty to monitor, the administrator must be well informed also about the progress of the company. The duty to inquiry is mandatory and prior to taking any decision. The administrator's duty to inquire is also established in art. 143^1 paragraph 3 and art. 153^4, paragraph 3 of the Law. According to the afore mentioned texts, by virtue to the exercised control, as noted above, the administrators/members of the supervisory board are obliged to request to the management the information that it deems necessary. According to art. 143^1 paragraph 3 " any administrator may ask from the manager information with regard to the operational management of the company. The manager shall inform the board of directors of the operations undertaken and on those had in view, on a regular and comprehensive basis". According to art. 153^4, paragraph 3 "the supervisory board may request to the management any information that it deems necessary for the exercise of its control attributions and may carry out appropriate check-ups and investigations".

At the same time, the directors/leadership members also have the correlative duty to inform regularly the board of directors/supervisory board regarding the company's activity. Therefore according to art. 144^2 paragraph 3 "the managers shall notify the board of directors of all incongruities established while meeting their attributions". Correlatively art 153^4 paragraph 1 and 2 regulates the duty to inquiry of the supervisory board by the leadership on all the activities of the company and the modalities by which this information is made. Consequently, " at least once in 3 months, the management shall submit a written report to the supervisory board with regard to the company's management, to its activity and its possible evolution". Besides the periodical information, "the management shall communicate in due time to the supervisory board any information with regard to the events that might have a significant influence over the company's condition".

The lack of information or insufficient inquiry of the administrators for the undertaken management acts can seriously injure the company, engaging their liability for the lack or prudence[16].

Another obligation of the company's administrator is the duty to show care in decision making. By virtue of this obligation, the management decision must be motivated and preceded by effective discussions and debates within the management board respectively the supervisory board.

Also in the decision making process the corporate interest is most important, in the sense that it must be favorable, useful to the company and therefore to the shareholders. In other words, before adopting a decision regarding the company's management, the administrator must allow sufficient time and must have access to all relevant information, which should be provided in due time. Also at the time of the adoption of the decision, he must have acted in good faith, respectively with the belief that the actions are taken in the company's interest without entailing his personal interest[17].

Considering the relatively recent introduction in the legislation of the duty of diligence and prudence to which the administrators and directors are held against, respectively the management and supervisory members, currently, the Romanian law hasn't given us case laws for the breach of the administrator's duty of diligence and prudence. Instead, theory jurisprudential examples were cited from the common-law states. Thus, it is considered to be a breach of the administrator's duty of diligence and prudence the action where the administrators concludes contracts under unfavorable conditions for the company without a prior inquiry regarding the market demand; engages the company in an unprofitable operation, operation which is instead profitable for a third party[18]; allows withdrawals from the liquid assets of the company, in order to pay for a contract which clearly was no longer carried out by the contracting partner[19], or confides the liquid assets to a bank whose bankruptcy is imminent. In the same context, of breaching the duty of prudence and diligence lies also the action o f the administrator which carries out groundless investments, concludes credit sales contracts, for long periods, bringing the company to cessation of payments, or doesn't take part in the company's activities (doesn't participate to the board of directors meetings, fails to act in case of nonpayment of a debt by a debtor, doesn't improve the services provided by the company).

---

[16] In the case of Smith v. Van Gorkom, the Supreme Court of Delaware found the directors' negligence – general manager who contracted the credit despite the reservations, given over the telephone, of the rest of the board members, on the possibilities of repaying the loan on time, and took the decision to commit in less than three hours, during a representation at the Chicago Lyric Opera. R.W. Duesenber „Duty of care, duty of loyalty and the business judgment rule", Company Financial and Insolvency, Review (1997): 486.

[17] Timisoara Court of Appeal, Commercial Division, decision no. 64/30 March 2010, the Judicial Courier 11 (2010): p 613, with note by C.B. Nasz. In this case, the corporate interest is not met, while the judicial transaction by which the chairman of the board of directors of a joint-stock company acknowledges and undertakes the obligation to pay an amount that exceeds not only the social capital of the legal person, but also the total capital, to another trading company, owned by him together with a 1st degree relative and whose manager is for approximately 10 years.

However, even if a decision turns out to have negative consequences for the company, the administrator can't be held responsible for the prejudices, if he made the business decision after a prior inquiry and with the justified confidence that he acted in the company's interest. In this case operates the exemption case provided by art 144^1 paragraph 2 according to which the administrator doesn't breach the duty of prudence "if at the time he made that decision, he is reasonably entitled to consider that he acts in the company's interest and based on certain adequate information". This makes it possible for the administrators to adopt business decision, subject to certain conditions, without the fear of being held responsible towards the company.

Through such a regulation the lawmaker has implemented in the Romania law a rule "imported" from the English and American law – the business judgment rule.

2. The juridical nature of the "business judgment "rule in the American law and in the Romanian law.

Currently the business judgment rule is considered to be an integral part of the corporate governance principles, in the sense that the White Paper on corporate governance in South East, drafted under the aegis of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) provides at pct.250 that : "the notion of business judgment or an equivalent provision in the respective legal systems should be introduced in order to protect board members from being held liable for wrong business decisions". "The business judgment rule aims at granting board members and senior management wide latitude in deciding the business affairs of the company. They should not be held liable for the consequences of their exercise of business judgment – even for obvious mistakes – unless certain exceptions apply. These exceptions include fraud, conflicts of interest, acting outside the corporate purpose and failure to be sufficiently diligent and exercise due care in the basic activities of the board member's role (such as attending meetings, seeking to inform oneself and deliberating meaningfully before making important decisions".

In the American law[20], where in fact it has its source, the position of the business judgment rule has been outlined in the sense that "the business judgment rule which began as a minor exception, it is now a defense so consistent, that the only remaining challenge is to try to prove that [18] In this case, the liability of the directors has been held for negligence, given that they incurred a report on the securities which they bought giving the seller the possibility to repurchase them within 6 months at the original sale price, without any gain in the favor of the company from this transaction (case law Litwin v. Allen, 1940 New York Supreme Court, in R. Duesenberg, quoted work, p.200).

[19] O. Caprasse , La responsabilite civile profesionnelle des administrateurs. Actualite du Droit, (Liege, 1997): 486.

[20] D. Bazelon, „Client Aginst Lawyers*"*, Harper`s Magazin (1967): 104.

(it) doesn't cover quite all forms or corporate fraud". But even in this context, the juridical nature of the business judgment rule is controversial, facing two trends[21].

According to the first opinion, the business judgment rules is qualified as a standard for the administrator's liability, which requires an analysis, on behalf of the judge , of the business decision from two perspectives good faith and rational decision. Initially the rule could be rebutted only for cases such as fraud or self-interest, but currently, are accepted also the cases where duty of prudence and diligence are breached in a conscious manner. Thus, the plaintiff must demonstrate the breach of any one of the duties of the administrator (diligence, prudence and loyalty), and the judge may censure the administrator's decision through the triad imposed by the rule.

According to the other current, named the abstention doctrine the administrator's decisions are protected against judge censorship. Therefore, the authority of the administrators in corporate governance is absolute, and the court doesn't have the competence to impose its own decision to the administrator. The court may not rule on the merits of the decision, but can only review if the decision was made in bad faith or in the context of conflict of interests or failure to inform. Under this trend the business judgment rule establishes a presumption of good faith in decision making, without giving the courts the possibility to censure the background of the decision.

In the Romanian legal system, business judgment rule has a twofold purpose: exoneration of liability causes of the administrator/ manager of the trading company, and also a limit to the duty of diligence and prudence which incumbed upon them.

Mainly, it has the juridical nature of an exemption from liability cause of the administrators and directors for any decisions that may have harmed the company. Even if he adopted a harmful decision for the company the administrator, respectively the director shall not be held responsible for the harm done if he adopted the decision in the honest belief and excusable that he acted in the company's best interest and based on an informed basis. Consequently the rule doesn't impose in the favor of the administrator a presumption in defense, to be rebutted by the plaintiff (the trading company). On the contrary in the Romanian law, the administrator's position is opposite to that of the base system, having the obligation of proving effectively all the constitutive elements of this rule. In an eventual action for damages exerted by the company or by the shareholders, the administrator is the one claiming in its defense the business judgment rule, however proving that he acted on an informed basis and deemed to be in accordance with the social interest.[22]

Pursuant to art. 144[1], paragraph 2 of the law: "the administrator, does not breach this obligation if ...." the business judgment rule would be, more of a cause that relieves the illicit nature of the act. In other words, as a result for applying the rule, the administrator, respectively the director is not liable for adopting a bad decision that resulted in harm for the company, if the conditions provided by the legal text are met, namely: when adopting the decision, he considers that he acted in the company's interest and on an informed basis.

In an adverse opinion[23], was claimed that only in appearance, the rule relieves the illicit nature of the act and that in reality it has the value of cause acting on the subjective level, removing fault (guilt). Therefore, the text should be read as follows "the administrator does not culpably violate this obligation, if ...".

---

[21] S.M. Bainbridge, „The Bussines Judgement Rule as Abstention Doctrine*"*, Vanderbilt Law Review 57, (2004): 102.

[22] On the contrary, Radu N Catana, quoted work, p. 195-195. The rule establishes the presumption that administrators have acted, or performed a physical act of management, only after an prior inquiry, and with the rational belief that the he act in the company's interests. To the extent to which, the company (shareholders) fail to prove the failure to meet one of the conditions for applying the presumption, the administrator shall not be held responsible, regardless of the finding of an injury suffered by the company or its shareholders.

[23] Motica I. Radu, Lucian Bercea, "From the business Judgment Rule to the business judgment rule: in search of a link", in Ad. Honorem S. D. Cărpenaru. Selected legal studies, (Bucharest: Publishing CH Beck, 2006): 119.

We believe that the subjective element plays an important role in applying the business judgment rule, so that when making a decision, the administrator should have only the honest belief that he acted in the company's best interest and based on an informed basis. He doesn't have to act effectively in the company's best interest, neither on an informed basis. In order to free itself from the liability, it is sufficient for the administrator to believe that he acted for the company's best interest and that the information on which his decision is based is real. From this point of view, applying this rule excludes making a decision which is deliberately erroneous which, through its gravity, can't characterize a person as diligent and prudent, so that it can't be regarded as a cause which excludes guilt. The rule and its exonerating effects are applied only in the case of culpa of levis and levissima when the administrator makes a decision.

Secondly, in the Romanian legislation, the business judgment rule was introduced as a counterweight to the administrator's duty to act with prudence and diligence provided by art 144^1 paragraph 1 from the Law on trading company and respectively art. 213 of the New Civil Code, and also for the settlement of the action for responsibility against the administrator and directors for the harm caused to the company (art. 155 Law no 31/1990, and art.220 New Civil Code). Thus, the administrator/director must not be absolutely prudent and diligent but, as diligent and as prudent necessary, such that when making a decision to be reasonably entitled to believe that he acted in the company's best interest and based on an informed basis. On the contrary, the administrator's prudence and diligence must be related to "measures concerning the company's management", that is, to the business management process in relation to which the business decision will be made. In this context, the administrator will be liable for the achievement of the duty of prudence and diligence both under common and special conditions of the business judgment rule.

3. The applicability of the business judgment rule under Romanian law

3.1. Application. The scope of the business judgment rule, focuses on two issues, namely whether it is strictly limited to the joint-stock company, and which would be the persons that can claim the cause of exemption from liability.

Regarding the first issue, compared to including analyzed legal text in Chapter IV of Law no. 31/1990 on "Joint stock companies", the conclusion that the business judgment rule found its implications only in the field of joint stock companies, may be required. Related to the effect of the exemption from liability, we could say, with good reason that the company's administrators in a joint stock company are highly privileged in comparison to the administrators of the other type of trading companies. We believe however that the business judgment rule should benefit to the administrators of all trading companies, equally, without discrimination. Given the position of the administrator in a joint-stock company, net differentiated in terms of the legal regime of the liability, compared to the administrator of a general partnership or a limited liability company, de lege ferenda it is required the express settlement of the business judgment rule as a reason for exemption of liability also for the administrators of all the other types of companies.

With regards to the protected persons, the law itself solves this dilemma, stating explicitly who takes advantage of the business judgment rule. Thus, for the unitary system of management, the rule has effects on both on both the management, pursuant art. 144^1 paragraph 2, and on the directors pursuant the legal standard with reference to art. 152 which extend the implementation of the business judgment rule also on the latter ("the provisions ...art. 144^1 .... will apply also to the managers which are under the same situation as the administrators"). For the dual management system, by the legal standards with reference of art.153^2 paragraph 6 and art 153^8 paragraph 3 and the provisions of art. 144^1 the management board and the supervisory board are protected by this rule. In other words, from the exonerator effects of the business judgment rule can benefit both individual invested with executive and non-executive positions.

3.2. Conditions of applicability. The effect of exemption from liability of the rule occurs only to the extent to which the conditions provided by art 144^1 paragraph 2 from the Law are met, namely, when taking a business decision the administrator should have been entitled to consider that he acts in the company's benefit and based on an informed basis. The text examined establishes only the main criteria that are to be considered. In concrete, the requirements shall be assessed on a case by case basis, meaning any evidence can be considered as proof.

Firstly, there has to be a business decision, consisting in adopting or failure to adopt certain measures related to the administration of the company. For the concept of business decision a legislative definition can be found under art. 144^1 paragraph 3 "a business decision shall be any decision to take or not take certain measures with regard to the administration of the company".

When adopting a business decision, the managers must act within their given powers by law and by the constitutive act, the rule and its exonerating effect, not applying if the decision is made by exceeding the legal and statutory powers.

The business decision envisages "measures regarding the administration of the company", namely the company management activities in the sense of ordinary measures, management, with which administrators are usually vested with. Thus, the question that arises is whether the decisions regarding the delegated powers under art. 114 of the law, fall within the provisions of the business judgment rule? Specifically, will the administrator be exonerated as a result of invoking the rule, when taking a wrong decision like changing the location of the registered office , changing the object of activity and increasing the registered capital? We, along with other authors[24], believe that for the case where the board of directors is empowered, by the constitutive act or by decision of the extraordinary general assembly, the powers regarding the revision of the company, the decisions made with the purpose of carrying out these duties, are not subject to the business judgment rule, and don't constitute decisions in the sense of art. 144^1 paragraph 3, because they go beyond the strict duty of administration of the company.

Also the rule finds no application in respect to the administrators who have not consented to the adoption of that certain decision, and who written down their objection in the register of the board of directors and notified the censors or the internal auditor and financial auditor, pursuant art. 144^2 of the Law. Their objection of these individuals to adopt a certain decision is equivalent with the absence of an unlawful act, which eliminates, ab initio, the application of the rule.

Secondly, the administrator, respectively the director, must adopt the decision with the excusable belief that he acted in the company's interest. Stating that " at the time of making the business decision, he (the administrator) is reasonably entitled to believe that he is action in the company's interest...", the business judgment rule establishes a common fault in which all persons with the same statute would find themselves, under the same or similar circumstances.

The rule claims that the administrator should be of good faith, respectively to honestly believe that he acts in the company's interest. Thus, the condition is not fulfilled of the administrator in question pursues a personal interest when making or omitting to make a business decision. In other words, the conflict of interest eliminates the applicability of the business judgment rule.

Thirdly, there should be an inquiry of the administrator, respectively director, appropriate and prior to the adoption of the decision. The rule is preceded by the establishment of the duty of prudence and diligence, which contains the duty of the administrator to inquiry and to request certain relevant information, to consult experts, to assign a preliminary term necessary for the decision making process, depending on the complexity of the decision.

At the same time, the inquiry must be sufficient so that it will give the administrator the possibility to appreciate if he acts in the company's benefit. Whenever there is an insufficient inquiry or the information was obtained from individual who do not have the necessary competence for offering that information, the rule finds no application, and the exonerating effect from liability doesn't occur[25].

[24] Lucian Bercea, quoted work, 47-48.

Once those three conditions are met, the administrator, respectively the director, is not held liable for the harmful effects his decision has towards the company. In this sense a distinction should be made: for the decisions that are harmful for the company, but based on a proper prior inquiry and which are the result of a rational judgment, the administrator shall not be held liable, instead, he will be held responsible for any other harmful decision, taken without prior inquiry and judgment.

3.3. Juridical effects. The main effect the business judgment rule causes is the exemption from liability of the administrator, respectively of the director for any damages caused to the company through the adopted business decision. The rule is based on the common error mechanism where the administrator/director is found, when adopting a harmful decision, believing that he is action in the company's interest and basted on an informed basis.

Alternatively, the business decision cannot be censored, specifically judicially annulled. Therefore, the prejudice will be supported by the company on whose behalf the business decision was made, as loss caused by errors in management not imputable to the administrator. And in particular the shareholders are those who bear the losses caused by the business decision, because, by empowering the administrator, they assumed the risks involved with this choice.

Although the administrator is free from the liability for the harm caused to the company which he managed, the possibility to be dismissed, ad nutum, from his current position with the consequent impossibility of reintegrating in the same position.

Conclusions

However, although much disputed in theory[26], in terms of its regulatory purpose[27], the business judgment rule has established itself in the Romanian legislation, being essential for the business environment. In the absence of such a cause of exemption, if the administrator, you see experienced in any situation, with the possibility to taking personal responsibility for the damages the company, his activity and consequently the company's activity would be blocked.

In this sense, in theory[28] it has been stated that the meaning of "business judgment rule" is to allow the administrators to make decisions and to run affairs without the constant fear that he risks civil liability towards the company. Indeed, by virtue of this institution, the courts may be called rule upon the activities and managerial acts of the trading companies' administrators as long as there is no evidence that they have breached their duty of prudence and diligence or that they have acted in bad faith, in self-interest or on a groundless basis, without any rational support.

---

[25] See the case Trans Union Corp. v. Jerome Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d 858 (Del. 1985), the Delaware Supreme Court. In this case, the Chairman of the Board has been charged with the fault that he limited himself, in a negligent manner, in achieving information only from an employee, about who knew or should have known, that he had interests in the transactions on which the administration was to decide (presented by R. Catana, work quoted, footnote 50).

[26] Lucian Bercea "business judgment rule: an impossible legal transplant" Pandectele Române 3 (2006): 201-208. The rule was described as incompatible with the Civil Code in force at that time, which instituted the principle of aggregation of damnum emergens with lucrum cessans (Art. 1084) and the principle of limitation of liability to the foreseeable harm (art. 1085), context in which the harmful outcomes of a business decision should be seen as predictable, and therefore as avoidable. It was also argued that it was difficult to accept the rule as an exemption of liability cause in a system where the administrators are responsible for culpa levis in abstracto.

[27] Within a year, both in the state of draft law as well as subsequently to its entry into force, the legal provision enshrining the business judgment rule has overlaid until final form, four regulatory options.

[28] Radu. N. Catana, work quoted, 198. The author concludes that without this protection, considered of common sense in the business environment, the companies would be unable to attract competent and motivated administrators.

Related however to the regulatory methods of the business judgment rule only in Company Law no. 31/1990, even though the duty of prudence and diligence is, as noted above, given a general term of applicability by the New Civil Code, we wonder to what extent, invoking this rule as a cause of exemption of liability would exceed the strict framework of a trading company. This is because the New Civil Code, even though it governs the duty of prudence and diligence as a legal obligation incumbed upon the administrator of any legal person, doesn't cover the situation of his exoneration of liability, art. 214 of the New Civil Code being incomplete in this matter. De lege ferenda, an express regulation it is required of the business judgment in the New Civil Code legal text, the more so since it represents a special law with general applicability in relation to the Law on trading companies which is a special law.

References

- Cărpenaru D. Stanciu, Treatise of Romanian Commercial Law, (Bucharest: Universe Publishing Juridical, 2009);
- Ioan Rădulețu, "Managing the joint stock company and the rights of shareholders - new principles of corporate governance in Law. 31/1990 ", in Ad. Honorem S.D. Cărpenaru. selected Legal studies, (Bucharest: Publishing CH Beck, 2006);
- Lucian Bercea "Business judgment rule: about the involution of institution before its birth", Pandectele Române 6 (2006);
- Smaranda Anghenie, Magda Volonciu, Camelia Stoica, Romanian Commercial Law (Bucharest: Publishing CH Beck, 2008);
- Shu- Acquaze, „Smith v. Van Gorkom Revisited: Lessos Learned in Light of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002", DePaul Business and Commercial Law Journal 3 (2004)
- Philip Merle, Droit commercial. Sociétés commerciales, 5e édition, (Dalloz, 1996)

NEW CONCEPTS IN ROMANIAN PRIVATE LAW: THE ENTERPRISE

CRISTIAN GHEORGHE*

Abstract

The new concept of enterprise is laid down in new Civil Code in connection with another new concept: the professional (entrepreneur).

The old commercial terms, commercial acts and deeds and merchant, have been well represented in legal texts in comparison with present concepts. Our new code imported these concepts together with their weaknesses from the Italian and Quebec Codes. The short references within the Code to enterprise and professional put again the burden of clarification on the scholars' shoulders.

The law defines the professionals as the persons who carry on an enterprise and therefore the legislator pursues to the 'carrying on an enterprise" definition. Doing so, in fact the legislator leaves the enterprise concept undefined. The carrying on by one or more persons of an organised economic activity, whether or not it is "commercial" in nature, consisting of producing, administering or alienating property or providing a service, constitutes the carrying on of an enterprise.

The enterprise is a term long time connected with commercial and private law. All past decades, beginning with the old Commercial code, then socialist economy and post-communist era used intensively the concept of enterprise. The meaning of this term differed substantially in every decade.

Present notion need scientific scrutiny in order to crystallize a convergent approach.

In our paper we will consider the notion of enterprise starting from the past perception of this concept then we will try to observe the variety of enterprises under present law.

Keywords: enterprise, professionals, new Civil Code, carrying on an enterprise, commercial law.

Introduction.

Our research intends to observe the institutions of the New Civil Code, in force from 2011, in the commercial field. The new approach of the Romanian law, the unity of the private law, has a direct impact on the commercial law science. Scholars working in commercial field need to explain and apply the new regulation of the Civil Code.

The prominent concepts of the new code in commercial field are the enterprise and the professional (entrepreneur). New commercial law science has to assimilate and construe these concepts and to start building a new commercial doctrine.

The enterprise, as a concept, is connected in the new Civil Code with the concept of professional (entrepreneur). The legal definition of the terms is rather unclear for the enterprise. It is stated that the professional is the person/persons who exploit an enterprise.

The enterprise itself is not defined but the "exploitation of an enterprise" has a legal definition. This indirect approach makes more difficult to explain the enterprise as a concept. Simplifying the terms, the concept of professional doesn't need the enterprise concept in order to be fully determined. Professional means the person or persons who exercise in a systematic manner organised activities (economic ones, as the legal text renders).

Still, the notion of enterprise need scrutiny from scholars as an important concept directly linked with the new commercial law.

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu" University (email: cristiangheorghe@gmail.com).

The enterprise before the Civil Code.

The concept of enterprise was used intensively by the old commercial doctrine. Scholars from commercial science focused on three major types of objective commercial acts and deed: i) intercession in goods supply chains type, ii) enterprise type and iii) auxiliary type. Such distinction applied to commercial acts was well known and well accepted. Even so, the legal term of enterprise lacked of an explicit definition.

The enterprise knew a wide recognition as economic concept. Usually the enterprise is defined as a social body, an autonomous organisation of an activity using production factors (forces of nature, capital and labour) by the entrepreneur for the purpose of accomplishing economic activities. Economic dimension is stressed by the theory of production factors. The juridical dimension should be extracted from organised social group perspective. The old Commercial Code used intensely the concept of enterprise in order to define the commercial acts and deeds. Such specific organisations were translated entirely in commercial law field, without additional tests for particular circumstances. The concept of enterprise was used by the old Commercial Code in connection with two major types of activities, according to their subject: the manufacturing (industrial) enterprises which comprised of construction and manufacturing undertakings and service enterprises which included insurance and commissions, agencies and business offices, publishing companies, printing, library and art, insurance companies, businesses and warehouses docks deposit.

The enterprise was the core part of commercial acts that ensured the accession to merchant legal status.

Communist epoch, which was interposed between the two periods of application of the Commercial Code (1864-1948 and 1990-2011), used intensively the concept of undertaking (socialist) in order to explain economic operators based on state property that existed in the economy at that time.

Economic Law science that emerged at that time was dominated by principles of "state owned economy" totally obsolete in present. Ironically, the present voices advocating the disappearance of commercial law find perfect counterpart in those voices supporting in the past Economic Law instead of old, forgotten Commercial Law.

The enterprise knew a new recent legal recognition. The enterprise is an organised economic activity combining financial resources, workforce, raw materials, logistics and information resources, on entrepreneur's risk, in cases and condition laid down by the law[1]. This ordinance defines the term "entrepreneur" too, concept ignored by the new Civil Code, as "the individual who holds an economic enterprise." From the perspective of the new Civil Code the entrepreneur is professional in an individual form.

Given to the vocation of general applicable law of the Civil Code (true "civil constitution") we cannot support a definition of a general concept from the point of a special law, external to the code. As this ordinance is earlier and particular than present Code, the general vocation of the Civil Code requires the interpretation of its own concepts in accordance with its substance, without external support. It is up to implementing rules of the Civil Code to deal with accommodation of the new code with the body of existing legal system.

Starting from the legal term "exploitation of an enterprise"[2], we underline that the enterprise is an organised activity aiming to produce or trade (administration or sale) goods or services (regardless of the final purpose of profit or non-profit).

---

[1] EGO (Emergency Government Ordinance) no 44/2008, regarding economic activities pursued by authorized natural persons, individual enterprises and family enterprises, amended by EGO no 38/2009 and EGO no 46/2011 published in Official Journal no 350 from 19.05.2011 (Art. 2 lit. f): "economic enterprise means economic activity pursued in an organised, permanent and systematic manner using financial resources, employees, raw materials, logistics and information technology on enterpriser's risk according with the law."

[2] Civil Code, Art. 3.

From this perspective the enterprise is a form of business organisation operated by a professional. Legal text reveals that the professional is the subject of law, the part of the legal relations governed by civil law (in the form of natural or legal person).

Subsequently the enterprise is not itself the subject of law but a type of business organisation. The professional exploits the enterprise established in a particular form of organisation he has chosen. In this context we can distinguish between individual and collective enterprises, including companies. The company is "the professional", in the language of the code, who operates a business that takes the form of a particular organisation (the enterprise). We can therefore talk about a company as a kind of enterprise, as an organisation, without referring to the legal entity itself (as subject) that have to be equated with the professional.

The features of the enterprise in Romanian Law.

Despite the fact the concept of enterprise doesn't have a clear explanation in Romanian Law we can extract the principal features of the concept according to the new code and the past doctrine the code based on.

Organising of the activity is the essential characteristic of the concept of enterprise. This concept accepts a multidisciplinary approach: economic, juridical and even technical. The organising of the activity feature has a predominantly economic background. Financial resources, work force, raw material, logistic information are features used to render a particular conformation to the enterprise.

The enterprise is a complex system with multidisciplinary dimensions that realizes a balance between internal and external factors in order to assure an optimal position in economic environment and a competition advantage for entrepreneur.

Particular activities are involved in the enterprise's goals. Therefore the enterprise intends to produce or trade (administration or sale) goods or services. The enterprise's goals are specific although the reserved activities are broadly enough to cover a large area of particular performances[3].

Dichotomy profit/non/profit. The concept of enterprise is a larger one than the previous approaches. The extension to the non-profit activities asks for a distinction between profit oriented enterprises and enterprises with non-profit goals. The first category covers the economic enterprises[4], commercial ones, and stays for the Commercial Law basis.

Individual and collective enterprises. An enterprise can be operated by a physical person as well as a legal person. Using this feature we can distinguish between i*ndividual and collective enterprises.*

Individual enterprises.

GEO no 44/2008 has already dealt with concepts like entrepreneur, enterprise, division of patrimony, etc. These concepts are used in a related form by the new Civil Code.

Authorized natural person (AFP) and sole member enterprise. Under abovementioned ordinance the authorized natural person is the person empowered to conduct any form of economic activity permitted by law, mainly using his workforce. APF regime governs this person's interaction with other types of undertakings as well as the registration and cancellation of this type of activity. According to updated regulation of AFP this entity may employ, as an employer, third party, based on individual employment contract concluded according to law[5].

[3] Italian Civil Code (Art. 2195) retains as commercial activities, those activities requiring registration in companies register: 1. industrial activities aiming goods production and services, 2. trading activities (intercession in provider – beneficiary of goods, 3. transportation on ground, water or air, 4. banking and insurance activities, 5. other auxiliary activities.

[4] Concept already in place in EGO no 44/2008.

[5] EGO no 44/2008 as amended.

AFP is responsible for his obligations up to his assigned patrimony, whether it was formed, and, in addition, with all his assets. The law used to distinguish by the status of merchant or the absence of such quality in the person authorized thereby, subsequently setting the occurrence of simplified procedure provided for in Law no. 85/2006 regarding the insolvency procedure. Currently this distinction by merchant status disappeared, AFP being subject of insolvency proceedings in any cases. Such enterprise wasn't awarded legal person status at the time it registers with the trade register.

Sole person enterprise, through its holding person, may employ third party based on individual employment contract, can work with other freelancers, entrepreneurs, individuals with other holders of individual enterprises or representatives of family businesses or other legal entity for performing economic activities. The natural person holding the individual enterprise is responsible for its obligations with assigned patrimony, whether it was formed, and, in addition, with the entire patrimony. In case of insolvency the individual enterprise will be subject to simplified procedure provided for in Law no. 85/2006, as amended[6].

Family undertaking. Although this enterprise is a collective one in logical view, given to the mandatory links between its members and the identical legal regulation source, it is natural to study this kind of enterprise along with the above types.

Family undertaking consists of two or more members of a family and is prohibited to it to employ third parties with employment contract. Family undertaking is established by concluding an agreement by writing, providing members full name, representative, date of preparation, participation of each member of the enterprise, conditions of participation, etc.

Like other forms of individual enterprise the family enterprise has not acquired the legal person status. Therefore the members of such enterprise can be hold responsible for the debts of enterprise. The law provide conditions and procedures applying when the family enterprises seize their operations and they are erased from trade registrar. Their winding-up (regarding assigned patrimony) is prescribed by law[7].

Collective enterprises.

Collective enterprises represent forms of economic organisation comprising of at least two members. This time the legal person status can be awarded to collective enterprises. Following such award the enterprise holds a separate patrimony. Lack of legal person status means an assigned patrimony only.

Even so, the legal regulations for juridical person are different in new Civil Code. Under past regulations the legal person status was awarded by authority only (by rendering a judgment or an administrative document). Nowadays the Code stipulates the essential elements for a legal person: distinct organization, assigned patrimony and legal purpose. Any entities which are complying with all these requirements are declared by law legal person.

Obviously all types of enterprises (individual and collective) satisfy these essential elements laid down for legal person. Nevertheless the law explicitly declare the individual enterprise lacks the legal person status. In these circumstances we can distinguish between legal person enterprise and non-legal person enterprise.

Simple association ("society"). Legal forms of association ("societies") are declared by law: simple society (venture), general partnership, limited partnership, limited partnership by share, limited liability company, joint-stock company, cooperative society and other types of companies that are regulated by law[8].

[6] EGO no 44/2008, Art. 26.
[7] EGO no 44/2008, Art. 33, 34.
[8] Civil Code, Art. 1888.

Among such forms simple society is basically an agreement, a joint-venture concluded by two or more associates. The lack of legal person status is an essential characteristic of this society because in the presence of that status the simple society evolved in a compulsory manner to other form of society.

Companies. Profit aimed activities are commonly subject to business in the form of a company. Setting up a company has a declared commercial purpose (for profit). In the view of the Civil Code companies are professionals and the organised form of activities (enterprise form) is chosen from the companies form prescribed by the law.

Companies remain the main part of the commercial law and the most advanced form of economic enterprises. Their regulation remains outside the Civil Code, being a special law, in fact the core of the new Commercial Law science.

Company types are fixed by Civil Code in line with the existed regulation of companies: general partnership, limited partnerships, limited partnership by share, limited liability company, and joint - stock company. The code forgets the limited liability company with sole associate, as the special Company Law Act does. Therefore this company will remain a subtype of limited liability company irrespective of its special characteristics. First of all this company doesn't employ an agreement of society (articles of association) due to the fact of sole associate involved in such undertaking. This situation means that the professional (the company as legal person) exploit in fact an undertaking with a sole associate, an individual undertaking, not a collective one. Still, the legal status of the company and the provisions placed in a special law (Company Law Act) determined us to keep this particular company (limited liability company with sole associate) among other companies and collective enterprises.

Cooperative society. Civil Code exposes among the types of „society" the cooperative society. In national law regulation of cooperative societies[9] replaced, in line with European regulations[10], the old form "cooperative organizations". Old dispute about merchant status of cooperative organizations now ceases to interest. Corporate form and character of collective economic enterprise are now specifically legal established[11]. Antithesis with companies shows that cooperative society is not a legal person with the exclusive purpose of self-profit. Specific to cooperative society is a broader scope that includes non-profit purposes - to promote members' interests, economic interests but social and cultural rights too - and adherence to democratic principles applied to decision making process. Cooperative society is subject to registration with trade register.

Other regulated legal person. The collective enterprises are not limited to legal types already exposed. Civil Code tries to maintain the list open so it declares the vocation of the law to add new type of society to the list. Already there are two types of different collective enterprises: Economic Interest Group (EIG*)* [12] and Societas Europaea (SE) [13]. Both types have an extensive European background fixed in specific Regulations of the European Council.

These types of companies, based on European regulations, have the same juridical form and implementation in all European states due to direct effect of a European regulation in internal law of [9] Law no 1/2005, regarding settlement and operations of a cooperative society, amended, published in OJ 285 from 22.04.2011.

[10] Regulation of the Council no 1435/2003, published in OJ of EU no L 207 from 18.08.2003, p. 1-24.

[11] Civil Code, Art. 1888.

[12] Regulation of the Council no 2137/1985, published in OJ of EU no L 199from din 31.07.1985.

[13] Regulation of the Council no 2.157/2001, regarding the Statue of Societas Europaea.

a member state of the European Union. Still, Company Law Act (Romanian) adopted rules supporting direct effect of European regulation in our national law system[14].

Societas Europaea (SE) is a uniform company type designed for internal European market. From the perspective of our Civil Code SE is a collective economic enterprise Collective enterprises types can be modified or supplemented by the parliament with new corporate creations.

More types of enterprises can be accounted even now but we try to remain behind the line drawn by profit purpose types. Passing this line we encounter many non-profit enterprises, usually situated outside the commercial law border. A new law branch, as "Law of the professionals" could account for a lot more enterprises.

Conclusions

The short references within the Civil Code to enterprise (and professional) ask for scientific scrutiny in order to crystallize a convergent approach.

First we observe de notion of "carrying of an enterprise" as carrying of an organised economic activity, whether or not it is "commercial" in nature, consisting of producing, administering or alienating property, or providing a service. These activities can be done by a sole person or by more persons.

We already have had a notion, enterprise, with some evident characteristic: involves one or more person, requests an organised activity, asks for specific activities to be done, and distinguishes between profit and non-profit end. All these are characteristics of the new notion of enterprise.

The differences between new and old concept (of enterprise) are significant. All past decades, beginning with the old Commercial Code, then socialist economy and post communist period used intensively the concept of enterprise. The meaning of this term differed substantially in every decade.

Present notion need scientific scrutiny under the present regulation, new Civil Code, in order to crystallize a convergent approach in the future.

References

- Civil Code, Law no 287/2009
- Law regarding implementation Civil Code, Law no 71/2011,
- G. Borzoi, Drept civil. Pratea generala. Personable, Third edition, revised and amended, Hamangiu, 2008;
- M.B. Cantacuzino, Elementele dreptului civil, Bucharest: All, 1998;
- St. D. Cărpenaru, Tratat de drept comercial român, Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2009;
- St. D. Cărpenaru, C. Predoiu, S. David, Gh. Piperea, Legea societăților comerciale, comments on provisions, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2009;
- H.L. Carrad, L. Oliphant, The elements of commerce, Cassell Ltd., 1970.
- Fr. Deak, St. D. Cărpenaru, Contracte civile şi comerciale, Bucharest: Lumina Lex, 1993;
- M. Djuvara, Teoria generală a dreptului, Bucharest: All, 1995;
- C. Hamangiu, I.Rosetti-Bălănescu, Al. Băicoianu, Tratat de Drept Civil Român, Bucharest: All, 1996.
- I.L. Georgescu, Drept comercial român, Bucharest: All Beck, 2002;
- C. Gheorghe, Societăți comerciale. Voința asociaților şi voința socială, Bucharest: All Beck, 2003;
- C. Gheorghe, Drept comercial comunitar. Instituții de drept comercial comunitar din perspectiva dreptului român, Bucharest: Logisticon, 2005;
- C. Gheorghe, Drept comercial european, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2009;
- L. Pop, Drept civil român. Teoria generală a obligațiilor, Bucharest: Lumina Lex, 1998, 2000;
- Gh. Piperea, Drept comercial, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2008;
- Gh. Piperea, Societăți comerciale, piață de capital, acquis comunitar, Bucharest: All Beck, 2005;

[14] Law no 31/1990, revised and amended, Title VII (1), Societas Europaea; Cristian Gheorghe, European Commercial Law, Publishing House CH Beck, 2009.

- C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, Drept civil, Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, ed.a a IX-a revizuită şi adăugită, Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2008;
- V. Stoica, Drept civil. Drepturile reale principale, Bucharest: Humanitas, 2006;
- Turcu, Tratat teoretic şi practic de drept comercial, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, Bucureşti, 2008, 2009.

THE NEW CIVIL CODE - IDENTIFICATION OF THE LEGAL PERSON

SILVIA-LUCIA CRISTEA[*]
LUCIAN-FLORIN ONIŞOR[]

Abstract
The article presents issues related to the identification of the legal person in the New Civil Code and in the commercial law special regulations, namely the Law 26/1990 regarding the Commercial Register and the Law no 31/1990 regarding commercial companies. This study aims at identifying the areas where the commercial law, a law for the professionals in the field, has brought changes into the civil law as common law; therefore, this study is meant for academics and professionals in the field. One outcome of this study is the identification of new attributes such as: bank account, registration number for VAT purpose, telephone, fax, and equity, apart from the identification attributes included in the New Civil Code, such as: name, registered office and nationality, registration number and the unique registration number.

Keywords: identification attributes, name, registered office, nationality

1 GENERAL REMARKS

The meaning of the legal person[1] can be comprehensive only when it includes its identification attributes[2].The purpose of this study is to analyze the legal status of the identification attributes of the legal persons.

The list including the identification elements of the legal person may consist of: name, registered office, nationality, „firma" (Rom.) (the material media bearing the name), registration number with the Trade Register, bank account, equity, unique identification number, telephone, fax, e-mail etc. (sections 5 – 8 in this book). The more science advances, the longer the list becomes while the doctrine[3] tries to place them into categories according to their either general nature, applicable to all legal persons, or specific nature, typical of some legal persons only.

The New Civil Code regulates the identification of the legal person in art. 225-231; the identification attributes in the New Civil Code are: name, nationality and registered office; the list including the identification elements is not limited[4].

Taking into account that the Law no 71 of 3 June 2011 for the enactment of the Law no 287/2009 regarding the Civil Code[5] brought about changes in certain special laws like for instance the Law no 31/1990 regarding commercial companies and the Law no 29/1990 regarding the Trade

---

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Law School, The Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies, (silvia_drept@yahoo.com).

[] Ph. D. Student, Marketing Department, The Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies, (luciano@ase.ro).

[1] For the etimology of the word „personna", which in Latin means the word mark and the role of an actor in a play, see P.C.Vlachide „Repetiția principiilor de drept civil"– vol. I, (Bucharest: Europa Nova Printing House, 1994), 33.

[2] For the meaning of the phrase „identification of the legal person" and its importance in practice, see Gh. Beleiu „Dreptul civil român – introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele" – (Bucharest: Şansa S.R.L. Printing House, 1992), 433 – 434.

[3] Gh. Beleiu „Dreptul civil român – introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele", 436.

[4] According to art. 230, depending on the nature of the object of activity, we can have other identification attributes – besides nationality, name and registered office stipulated in 225 – 227 – such as: registration number in the Trade Register, unique registration number and other identification elements, under the law. See section 9.1 in this paper.

[5] Published in the Official Gazette no 409 of 10th June (2011).

Register, this article includes remarks about these and about the effects triggered by these corrections, namely, how the legal status of the identification attributes of the legal persons shall be interpreted, following the comparative reading of the laws in force.

The aim of this study is to identify how long the list including identification attributes can be and what may be the usefulness of this length from the point of view of: their listing in the New Civil Code; their blurred specifics related to inalienability of these attributes and their effects upon the dichotomy civil law/commercial law in the Roman private law.

In order to achieve this goal, the study starts from a presentation of the field of study, by combining the findings of the scientific research in civil law and commercial law; this article uses the solution adopted by the New Civil Code, namely to extend a range of provisions applicable in the commercial law into the civil law as well.

We believe that the originality of this work is both the comparative analysis of the law texts and the conclusions worded with an utmost general applicability (sect. 9.1-9.3).

2. NOTION AND USEFULNESS

„Identification" of the legal person means its particularization as a subject of law participating in legal relations in its own name.

Identification can be seen under two aspects: as legal institution including the totality of the norms that regulate the identification attributes and as identification means, namely: name, registered office, nationality etc.

The usefulness of the identification of the legal person stays in the valences present in: the legal capacity of the person (such as: nationality, registered office), in the jurisdictional competence (depending on the geographical location of the registered office), in the legal protection of the rights acquired (specialized records). The importance of the identification of the legal person therefore exceeds the civil law and acquires special connotation in the commercial law, competition law, intellectual property law, criminal law etc.

3. LEGAL NATURE OF THE IDENTIFICATION ATTRIBUTES. CHARACTERS.

The identification attributes of the legal person[6] are non-material personal rights[7].

Due to this feature, the identification attributes have the following legal characteristics:

- erga omnes opposability: as absolute rights, they can be opposed to any other right; all the other persons shall do nothing to violate these rights (negative obligation of not to do);
- non-prescriptible: they are non-prescriptible, in terms of extinction or acquisition, irrespective of the lapse of time;
- personality: they are closely connected to the person of the holder;
- universality: any legal person can exercise one's non-material personal rights deriving from the name, registered office, nationality etc.[8].

4. LEGAL PROTECTION OF THE IDENTIFICATION ATTRIBUTES

The civil law means to protect the identification attributes – non-material personal rights – is the civil action.

---

[6] Like the identification attributes of the physical person.

[7] Gh. Beleiu „Dreptul civil român – introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele", 433.

[8] Urs and S. Angheni „Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", vol. I, (Bucharest: Oscar Print Publishing House, 1991), 291.

Art. 231 in the New Civil Code includes a rule of law stipulating that any legal person, irrespective of its form, shall inscribe in all documents issued by it the name and the registered office, as well as any other identification attributes, under the law, under sanction of paying damages to the person affected. This provision shall be interpreted in the sense of the possibility to introduce a civil action by the legal person that is holder of an identification attribute and by third parties as well, to the extent to which they incurred damages as a result of the exercise of the rights by the holder legal person.

To note that, unlike the previous regulation, namely the Decree no 31/1954 which was limiting the applicable sanction to fines in favor of the state[9], the new regulation re-establishes the normal logics: the judge shall establish the sanction applicable depending on the seriousness of the offence.

The criminal protection of the identification attributes is ensured by the Law no 11/1991 regarding the countering of unfair competition; for instance, according to art. 5, the use of a company, logo, special designation or wrapping susceptible to produce confusions with the ones legitimately used by another trader shall be considered a crime (see section 5.4 in this paper).

5. NAME OF THE LEGAL PERSON

5.1. Notion:

Starting from the definition given in the legal literature to the name of the legal person[10], the name of the legal person shall be the word or the group of words by which a legal person distinguishes itself[11].

The name of the legal person can have various forms. Sometimes, it coincides with the name of the field in which the legal person is active, some other times, it can be the name of a physical person, a historical or political event, a symbol expressing a certain activity[12].

5.2. The right to a name

The name of a legal person is not merely a non-material personal right but an obligation deriving from the social function it fulfils[13]. These legal provisions include the rule to establish a name and the obligation[14] to have it registered, in other words, to make it public[15]. This obligation comes from art. 231 in the New Civil Code according to which all documents issued by the legal persons shall include the name and the registered office as well as other identification attributes.

---

[9] According to art. 55 in the Decree no 31/1954, abrogated by the Law no 71/2011 for the enforcement of the New Civil Code „If the person who did the act with no right does not perform, by the deadline established by decision, the acts meant to re-establish the right affected, the court of law shall be entitled to make the person pay a fine per day of delay, in favour of the state ..."

[10] C. Stătescu „Drept civil", (Bucharest: Didactic and Pedagogical Printing House, 1970), 107.

[11] C. Bîrsan, chap. II in the paper: „Subiectele colective de drept în România", I.C.J.- High Court of Justice, (Bucharest: Academy Printing House, 1981), 41.

[12] C. Bîrsan „Subiectele colective de drept în România", 41.

[13] According to art. 226 para. 1 in the New Civil Code, „The legal person shall bear the name decided upon under the law in the articles of incorporation, corroborated with para. 2" When the legal person registers itself, it shall write its name in the public register".

[14] To clearly state the identificaton attributes is vital for distance contracts; in this respect, see the Governmental Ordinance 130/2000 which takes over the provisions of the Directive 97/7/CE of 20th May 1997 published in the Official Gazette no L144 of 4th June 1999, stipulating that the service provider shall state its name and geographic location (registered office) in order to ensure the proteciton of the consumers.

[15] Urs and S. Angheni „Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", 293.

In terms of non-material subjective law, the name included the following prerogatives of the holder legal person:

- to use that name which distinguishes the legal person in its concrete civil relations in which it takes part;
- to ask the others to distinguish it by its name;
- to ask in court the recovery of its name when its name has been affected[16].

The principle of legal symmetry shall apply in order to change the name, that is, the principle stating that only the one who decided upon the name can change it[17]. This principle appears as regulation by interpreting art. 228 in the New Civil Code according to which legal persons can change their name or registered office in compliance with the requirements stipulated by the law. The competent body shall be therefore the same body that decided upon the name, unless otherwise stipulated by the law.

5.3. Name and company

The doctrine in the field has formulated the opinion[18] according to which while the name is a general identification attribute of any legal persons, whether they may be public or private, the legal name is a specific name only for traders.

To note that, while „the name" is an extension of the physical person (corresponding to the „name" identifying a physical person[19]), the legal name distinguishes both the trader as a physical person and the traders as legal persons.

5.4. Legal name and logo

The Romanian term for "legal name", "Firma", is a homonym that can refer to several meanings: commercial name, commercial company and material media bearing the commercial name[20].

The Law 26/1990 regarding the trade register uses the first meaning of the term "firma", commercial name[21], with its functions[22]. Thus, according to art. 30 para. 1, "firma"/the legal name is its name or, as the case may be, the name under which a trader does trade and sign.

The logo is, according to the Law no 26/1990, the sign or name which differentiate a trader from another of the same kind (art. 30 para. 2). Since the wording in the law may cause confusions, the doctrine has proposed a definition of the logo as a sign or name distinguishing a sort of trade from another of the same kind[23].

The logo differs from the legal name by the following features:

- although it may have the same functions like the legal name, the logo increases potentials especially when it is not attractive or distinctive enough[24];

---

[16] Gh. Beleiu „Dreptul civil român – introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele", 437.

[17] Ibidem, 437.

[18] Urs and S. Angheni „Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", 293.

[19] G. Boroi, „Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", (Bucharest: All Beck Publishing House, 2001).

[20] L.N.Pîrvu and I.F. Simon „Legea privind registrul comerțului – comentarii și explicații", (Bucharest: C.H. Beck Publishing House, 2009), 214.

[21] Corresponds to the meaning given by art. 1 para. (2) of the Paris Convention for the protection of industrial property of 20th March (1883).

[22] For details on the functions of the „firma" as material media bearing the name of the company, see I. Băcanu „Firma și emblema comercială", (Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 1997), 30-34.

[23] O. Căpățână "Societățile comerciale", 2nd edition, (Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 1996), 278-279.

[24] I. Băcanu „Firma și emblema comercială", 29.

- while the legal name is a name[25] , the logo can be a drawing as well;
- the legal name is compulsory and unique while the logo is optional, a trader can have several logos;
- the legal name can be sold only together with the commercial assets including it while the logo can be transferred separately as well.

5.5. Protection of the legal name and of the logo

According to art. 30 para. 4 in the Law 26/1990 regarding the Trade Register, once the legal name and the logo are registered with the Trade Register, the trader acquires his right of exclusive use. As a result of lawfully making them public, the legal name and/or the logo can be used only by the trader who owns them.

The right to use the legal name and/or the logo can be acquired before registration: two or more traders can use the same legal name and/or logo but they do not enjoy special protection. Before registration, as a result of booking the legal name and /or logo in the legal names catalogue and logo catalogue, the trader does not immediately acquire the exclusive right to use it but only makes the used name temporarily[26] unavailable; because of this reason, the doctrine formulated the opinion according to which, irrespective of which of them is used, the legal name and/or the logo, it shall enjoy protection the one that applies for a proof of availability and books the identification attribute first. The temporary unavailability shall become an exclusive right of use from the moment when the judge delegated to the Trade Register gives a decision to the registration application[27]. From that moment on, therefore, the trader acquires a non-material subjective right over the legal name / logo, with prerogatives of the right to the name analyzed in the previous section of this paper.

The protection of the right of exclusive use over the legal name /logo is done as follows:

- By applying the provisions of art. 301 in the Criminal Code stipulating that the use of certain names in order to mislead beneficiaries shall be punished with a sentence to prison for 2 years or with a fine;
- According to art. 5 para. 1 letter a in the Law no 11/1991 regarding the countering of unfair competition, the use of a legal name in order to cause confusions because of its legitimate use by another trader shall be sanctioned as offence[28];
- The person incurring damages as a result of another person's using his legal name has civil possibilities available to protect the rights of his legal name such as: action for reasons of unfair competition; action for damages; action to force the defendant to stop using one's "firma" and the action for reasons of counterfeit, whose aim is to annul and de-register the company that undermined the rights of the claimant[29].

For the same protection of the legal name,[30] the legal names catalogue is a useful record since, according to art. 4 para. 1 in the Methodological Norms regarding the Trade Register, „the legal name shall remain unavailable for 2 years since its de-registering from the Trade Register. By [25] According to art. 30 in the Law 26/1990, the legal name shall be written, above all, in Romanian. By extensive interpretation, the same stays valid for the logo. In this respect, see L.N.Pîrvu and I.F. Simon „Legea privind registrul comerţului – comentarii şi explicaţii", 216-217.

---

[26] The booking lasts for 3 months. For comments see L.N.Pîrvu and I.F. Simon „Legea privind registrul comerţului – comentarii şi explicaţii", 219-220.

[27] Gh. Beleiu „Dreptul civil român – introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele", 219.

[28] Ibidem, 218 – 219.

[29] I. Băcanu „Firma şi emblema comercială", 74 – 75.

[30] Regarding the contents of the legal name, in the case of the physical person traders and commercial companies, for the interpretation of the contents of these provisions, see L.N.Pîrvu and I.F. Simon „Legea privind registrul comerţului – comentarii şi explicaţii", 225-227.

exception, that legal name shall be available for the legal person that changed its name returning to its previous name booked for this purpose".

The same protection possibilities shall apply to the logo.

Some special situations regarding the legal name are generated by the rules applicable to legal person set up by the state, such as national companies, other commercial companies, autonomous operators etc. set up by legal documents (laws, governmental decisions etc.). The competent authority, prior to the issuing of the setting-up document, the availability of the legal name and of the logo of the new company should be checked[31].

5.6. The brand, identification attribute of the legal person

The brand, according to art. 3 letter a in the Law no 84/1998 regarding brands and geographical indications[32], with further modifications and completions, is a sign susceptible of graphical representation meant to differentiate products or services of a physical or legal persons from those belonging to other persons; brands can be: distinctive signs, such as words, including names of people, drawings, letters, figures, figurative elements, tri-dimensional shapes and especially, the shape of the products or of its wrapping, combinations of colors, as well as any combination of these signs.

We can conclude from the definition formulated that the brand can be confused with the legal name. In fact, although they may have similarities, their legal statuses are different[33].

We consider that, since they have the capacity to distinguish a trader from another trader, or to singularize a producer or a manufacturer[34], both the manufacturing brands and the commercial brands are identification attributes of the legal persons.

This conclusion is confirmed by the functions of the brand: to differentiate products, for competition, to guarantee quality, to organize the market, for monopole, advertising and consumer's protection[35]. Since the first function is, in our opinion, the closest related to the brand – an identification attribute of the trader, we shall analyze only this function.

The first aspect of the function of differentiation of the brand is the possibility to individualize the products of the producer-trader, thus protecting him against possibilities that his brand might be used by competitor-traders.

As a means to attract customers, to the extent to which it acquires a market value, the brand becomes a „reference" of the product sought for, while its connection with its origin tends to disappear. Thus, we reach the second aspect of the issue: the function of origin of the brand turns into a function of identification, a phenomenon caused by the de-personalization of industrial production[36]. Gradually, the brand stops being an indication of origin for the consumer and becomes a means of identification of the product. Thus, the function of differentiation of the producer becomes a function of differentiation or identification of products.

In our opinion, the brand remains an identification attribute of the producer (physical or legal person) despite the migration of its function from the identification of the person to the identification of the object of the activity of that person.

---

[31] Idem, 220.
[32] Republished in the Official Gazette no 350 of 27th May (2010).
[33] L.N.Pîrvu and I.F. Simon „Legea privind registrul comerțului – comentarii și explicații", 221 – 224.
[34] Y. Eminescu, "Regimul juridic al mărcilor", (Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 1996), 73 – 74.
[35] Idem, 23 – 30.
[36] Ibidem, 23 – 24.

6. REGISTERED OFFICE OF THE LEGAL PERSON

The registered office of the legal person is that identification means by which a certain location is indicated, under the law, with this significance[37]. It corresponds to what the residence is for the physical person[38].

6.1. Regulations regarding the institution of the registered office. Background.

Under art. 96 in the Civil Code, „the legal office of a legal person is where that legal person has the headquarters of its management" (abrogated by art. 49 in the Decree no 32/1954 for the enforcement of the Family Code and of the Decree regarding the physical persons and the legal persons). A similar regulation existed in the Law no 21/1924 regarding the legal persons (abrogated by Governmental Ordinance 26/2000 regarding associations and foundations, approved with modifications by the Law no 246/2005, published in the Official Gazette no 656 of 25th July 2009), and in art. 13 according to which „the legal office of a legal person is the main office of its management".

To note that this way of seeing the legal office in relation to the management and administrative office[39] was replaced by allowing the legal person to choose its legal office as it may wish with the obligation to write it in the articles of incorporation.

Thus, according to art. 39 in the Decree no 31/1951 (abrogated by art. 230 in the Law no 71/2011 for the enforcement of the New Civil Code), „the legal office of the legal person shall be established according to the document under which the legal person was set up or according to the statute". The freedom to choose is taken over by art. 227 para. 1 in the New Civil Code[40] according to which „the legal office of the legal person shall be defined according to the articles of incorporation or to the statute".

6.2. Legal status of the legal office

In terms of civil law, the right to a legal office as well as the right to a legal name is a non-material personal right. As an identification attribute of the legal person, the legal office has:

- „erga omnes" opposability (absolute rights, opposable to all); the legal person can ask all physical and legal persons to individualize it by its legal office;
- inalienability; the right to a legal office cannot be transferred by legal documents and its holder cannot give it up[41];
- non-prescriptible (manifested as extinctive)[42].

Classifying the right to a legal office as a non-material personal right does not limit the legal status of the legal office; it can be also classified from the point of view of other law branches. According to the commercial law, the right to a legal office gives the prerogative to use this office[43] (according to art. 74 in Law no 31/1990 regarding commercial companies, republished).

---

[37] Gh. Beleiu „Dreptul civil român – introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele", 438.

[38] G. Boroi, „Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", 391.

[39] This perception made some authors define the legal office of the legal person as the place where the management is. In this respect, see P. Anca „Organizaţiile socialiste ca persoane juridice în România", (Bucharest: Academy Publishing House, 1979), 106.

[40] According to which „the legal office of the legal person shall be established according to the articles of incorporation or to the statute".

[41] While the legal office is a tangible asset that can be transferred under legal documents.

[42] In this respect, see the staff of the Law Department of A.S.E. Bucharest, „Drept civil", vol. I, (Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 2000), pg. 261.

[43] Urs and S. Angheni „ Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", 297.

6.3. Usefulness of identification of the registered office: commercial and fiscal uses a) As an identification attribute of the legal person trader (although, according to the Law 26/90 republished, regarding the Trade Register, a registered office is also the place where the commercial activity takes place, both of the physical person trader and of the family-owned associations with no legal personality). The registered office must be established before the registering of the commercial company with the Trade Register, as a major requirement to register the new subject of law, registered then with the Trade Register and inscribed on all the documents issued by the commercial company. A combination of the identification function with the correspondence function is thus achieved[44].

b) As a starting point in determining the applicable law, the registered office is relevant both for establishing the nationality of the commercial company („lex societatis"), that is, belonging to a certain country, and for establishing the applicable law, according to the conflict law „lex loci actus", where the one undertaking the contractual obligation is the commercial company or, unless otherwise stipulated, the registered office is the place where a contract is executed, in cases where the one undertaking the obligation to execute it is the company itself („lex loci executions")[45].

c) From the point of view of the process, the registered office is useful to establish the court competent to judge litigations in which the commercial company is a party, the place where the proceedings documents shall be sent (subpoena, notifications), the place where advertising takes place (such as advertising during the insolvency procedure of the commercial company), and the place where a real estate enforcement procedure is performed. These three components are solved in the same way from the commercial and fiscal points of view.

d) In the EU, in terms of recognition of the legal personality of commercial companies, the doctrine has two theories regarding the registered office, the theory of registration (the registered office of a foreign commercial company is the place where the company was registered, like in Denmark, Great Britain, Ireland, the Netherlands), the theory of the actual office (aiming at protecting the local interests which considers that the registered office if the place where the core of the major interests of commercial companies is; recognized by France, Germany, Luxembourg, Portugal, Belgium, Spain, Greece)[46].

e) Corresponding to the function of place from which the management run the activity, the registered office is vital because it ensures a way to find the managers of the commercial activity, the „brain" of the commercial company. From this point of view, we understand the reluctance in the doctrine regarding the latest modification made to the Law 31/90 by the Law 441/2006 regarding the possibility to set up several commercial companies with the same registered office if certain express requirements are met.[47]

Regarding the actual nature, seen as the actual place to carry out the activity, we can notice a modification of the regulations regarding the fiscal domicile in the Code of Fiscal Procedures.

On the one hand, if there are no other possibilities to identify the fiscal domicile of legal person, the criterion : „place where most assets are" shall be applied (art. 31 para. 3 in the Governmental Ordinance 92/2003, republished in the Official Gazette no 513 of 31st July 2007). On the other hand, in case of associations and other entities with no juridical personality, the fiscal domicile is „their registered office or the place where the main activity actually takes place"

---

[44] C. Haranga and I.N.Pîrvu, „Unele aspecte teoretice şi practice privind stabilirea sediului social al societăţii comerciale", in R.D.C. no 2/2008, (Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 2008), 92.

[45] B. Ştefănescu and O. Căpăţână „Tratat de dreptul comerţului internaţional", (Bucharest: Academy Publishing House, 1987), 183.

[46] D. Şandru „Societăţile comerciale în U.E.", (Bucharest: University Publishing House, 2006), 18.

[47] C. Haranga and I.N.Pîrvu, „Unele aspecte teoretice şi practice privind stabilirea sediului social al societăţii comerciale", 91 – 104.

(art. 31 para.1 letter d). For physical person as well we can talk about „address where they actually live" (art. 31 para.1 letter a) where actually shall be interpreted as „address of the dwelling that a person uses uninterruptedly for over 183 days during a calendar year", with a few exceptions (art. 31 para.2)[48].

The reason of this clarification is, in the fiscal field as well as in this field, to enable the control of the tax-payers and the enforcement of the assets in case of default. In these cases, the registered office is less important (the office registered with the Trade Register), the actual office matters because it accommodates the financial and accounting documents to check and the assets to be enforced.

The provisions included in the Order no 419/2007 for the approval of the procedure to change the registered office (published in the Official Gazette no 473 of 13th July 2007), and for the approval of the form „Decision to register the registered office and the fiscal domicile "shall be interpreted in the same way; according to these, based on the application of the trader tax-payer who wants to change his registered office, the fiscal administration competence shall pass from one fiscal body to another, depending on the new registered office and fiscal domicile. There is a cause-effect relation between the two juridical institutions (registered office/fiscal domicile) but the fiscal domicile is not the same with the registered office.

6.4. Functions of the registered office

In time, the doctrine identified several functions of the registered office of the legal person.

Just like the domicile of a physical person, the registered office helps identifying the legal person[49].

Secondly, the registered office helps determining the competence of the courts or of the arbitrage, by determining the address to which the legal persons shall be sent subpoenas or where certain procedures shall be enforced[50].

At the same time, the registered office is interesting for the private international law since the registered office is a criterion used to establish the nationality of the legal person[51].

In the recent doctrine[52] the registered office is seen as the place where the mail is received and from where the executive management coordinates the activity for which the legal person has been set up.

6.5. Characteristics of the registered office of the legal person

Obligatory: any legal person shall have a registered office by which it singularizes itself in space as against other subjects of the law. The obligatory nature shall be seen as threefold: it is obligatory to establish the registered office since the moment when the legal person is set up (art. 227 para.1 in the New Civil Code), and it is obligatory to make the registered office public, which is done by registering the legal person[53].

---

[48] S. Cristea „Comentarii la codul de procedură fiscală", (Bucharest: Dareco Publishing House, 2007), 142-150.

[49] C. Bîrsan, „ Subiectele colective de drept în România", 48-49.

[50] Ibidem, 49.

[51] Ibidem. For natioality as identification attribute of the legal person, see section 7 in this paper.

[52] C. Haranga and I.N.Pîrvu, „Unele aspecte teoretice şi practice privind stabilirea sediului social al societăţii comerciale", 91-104.

[53] Urs and S. Angheni „Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", 296.

Advertising is organized under the law; the legal effects of this institution shall become in force against third parties right after the registered office is lawfully established and this moment corresponds to the moment where the legal person acquires its civil capacity[54].

The third aspect is the fact that it is obligatory to include the registered office in the mail of the legal person, under art. 231 in the New Civil Code, „all documents, irrespective of their form, issued by the legal person shall include the name and the registered office ..."

Unique: any legal person shall have only one registered office; which does not exclude the possibility that the legal person may have one or several secondary offices.

Established: the registered office is clearly established and this results from the process of establishing it although during its activity, the legal person may change its registered office (according to art. 28 in the New Civil Code, the legal person may change its registered office or its name, under the law).

6.6. Classifications of the registered office

Depending on the criterion, we can have:

- Depending on the territory of the country, there are legal persons that have: a) their registered office in the country (in Romania) and b) abroad;
- Depending on its nature: a) common law registered office, which is compulsory, and b) conventional office (chosen) which is optional;
- Depending on its weight in the volume of the activity of the legal person: a) main office (concerning the entire activity or the overall activity) and b) secondary office (concerning a part of the activity)[55].

From the point of view of the commercial law, according to the special law on commercial companies, the difference between the main office and the secondary office acquires new juridical values.

6.7. Subsidiaries and branches

Upon the setting up of a commercial company, the shareholders can take into account, since the very beginning, the prospective to develop the activity of the company; that is, the possibility to expand the activity of the company in other towns or in the same town but in a new location. Such an expansion can be done by setting up new subsidiaries and branches with the same commercial activity like the mother-company.

In such cases, the Law no 31/1990, republished, stipulates the requirements to be met in order to set up such legal entities.

The subsidiary, according to art. 42 in the Law 31/1990, is a commercial company with legal personality set up by the primary company (mother company) that owns most of its equity. Thus, although it is a distinct subject of law, the subsidiary is dependent and placed under the control of the primary company.

As a legal person, the subsidiary takes part in the legal relations in its own name; by the legal acts of its representatives, the subsidiary acquires rights and undertakes obligations and commits its own liability.

The subsidiary is a form of company regulated by the Law no 31/1990, republished, and shall have the legal status of the form of company in which it was set up, even if the mother – company has another form.

---

[54] C. Bîrsan, „Subiectele colective de drept în România", pg. 48.

[55] Gh. Beleiu „Dreptul civil român – introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele", 438.

The branch, according to the Law no 31/1990, is a separate part of the commercial company with no legal personality. This sub-unit is provided with funds by the company in order to perform an economic activity included in the object of activity of the mother-company. The branch has certain autonomy within the limits defined by the mother-company.

Since it has no legal personality, the branch cannot take part in its own name in the legal circuit; the legal documents imposed by the activity of the branch shall be concluded by the representatives (representatives in charge) designated by the mother-company.

The legal status of the branch shall be transferred to any other secondary office, irrespective of its name (agency, representative office etc.), which the mother-company sets up and to which it gives the statute of branch.

The branch shall be registered before beginning its activity with the Trade Register of the county where it will operate. If the branch is set up in a town in the same county or in the same town as the mother-company, it shall be registered with the same Trade Register but as a distinct entity, separately.

The representative of the branch shall submit its signature with the Trade Register as requested under the law for the representatives of the company.

The other secondary offices (agencies, representative offices and other such offices) shall be mentioned only with the registration of the mother – company with the Trade Register where the main office is registered[56].

The provisions of the Law no 31/1990 republished, regarding the subsidiaries and the branches shall also apply to subsidiaries and branches set up by foreign commercial companies in Romania. These companies shall be entitled to set up subsidiaries and branches only if this right is recognized by the law governing their statute, and while the branches shall have foreign nationality (of the country in which they have been set up since they have their own legal personality), the subsidiaries shall have the nationality of their mother–company (since they have no distinct legal personality).

6.8. From the registered office to the professional office

According to the Romanian Civil Code, the identification attribute of the physical person – the domicile– corresponds to the registered office for the legal person[57].

This separation disappeared in the commercial law, according to art. 13 in the Law no 26/1990 regarding the Trade Register, the physical person trader shall also prove the registered office of his activity upon registration with the register.[58].

Art. 13 in the Law 26/1990 was implicitly modified by the Governmental Emergency Ordinance 44/2008 regarding the economic activities of the authorized physical persons, sole proprietorships and family-owned enterprises (published in the Official Gazette no 328 of 25th April 2008), which imposes on the traders physical persons to register with the Trade Register with jurisdiction over their professional office.[59]

---

[56] S. Cristea „Dreptul afacerilor", (Bucharest: University Publishing House, 2008), 137 – 139.

[57] G. Boroi, „Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", 391.

[58] In the fiscal law, things are more complicated; the notion of domicile expands over the forms of carrying out the activity of the trader – physical person. For details, see S. Cristea „Comentarii la codul de procedură fiscală", (Bucharest: Dareco Publishing House, 2007), pg. 16 - 17.

[59] For details regarding the documents proving the data included in the registraton application, in the sense of the document attesting the rights of use over the professonal office, see L.N.Pîrvu and I.F. Simon „Legea privind registrul comerţului – comentarii şi explicaţii", 110.

By corroborating these provisions with the explanation of the notion of professional formulated in art. 8 in the Law no 71/2011 for the enforcement of the New Civil Code[60], we consider that, once this normative act is in force, the phrase "professional office" shall extend to all physical person or legal person professionals, so to commercial companies regulated under the Law 31/1990 as well.

7. NATIONALITY OF THE LEGAL PERSON

The registered office of the legal person is interesting for the international private law since it is one of the criteria used to establish the nationality of the legal person. According to this criterion, the legal person shall have the nationality of the country where it has the registered office.[61]

This principle is regulated also in the Law 31/1990 regarding the commercial companies, in art. 1 para.2 according to which „commercial companies residing in Romanian shall be considered Romanian legal persons".

This solution is a tradition in the Romanian international law which, being also governed by the Commercial Code, was taking into account the main office as identification factor for the nationality of a commercial company[62].

In case of legal persons of public law (state-owned) a similar provision is not needed since, by definition, they are Romanian legal persons. The equivalent of the citizenship – identification attribute of the physical person, is the nationality as identification attribute of the legal person.

8. OTHER IDENTIFICATION ATTRIBUTES

8.1. Bank account

Any legal person has a bank account in which it keeps its money and this account is designated by a symbol made of figures. The bank account is a means to identify the legal person in its relations involving its assets[63].

8.2. Registration number with the Trade Register

Following the application for registration with the Trade Register and its approval by decision of the delegated judge, a registration number in the Register is obtained.

Regarding opposability of registrations towards third parties, the law clarifies the general rule of the opposability as entering into force since the registration (art. 5 in the Law 26/1990), not since the data of publication of the data regarding registration in the Official Gazette[64].

This identification attribute given by the National Office of the Trade Register, a juridical institution subordinated to the Ministry of Justice, shall not be taken as the unique registration number allocated by the competent fiscal administration, as we shall see in the following section.

---

[60] According to which: "The notion of «professional" included in art. 3 in the Civil Code shall include the categories of trader entrepreneur, economic operator, and any other persons authorized to perfom economic or professional activities, as these notions are stipulated by the law, upon the date when the Civil Code enters into force".

[61] See section 6.3. in this paper regarding the usefulness of the identification of the registered office.

[62] O. Căpățână "Societățile comerciale", 42.

[63] Urs and S. Angheni „ Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", 298.

[64] L.N.Pîrvu and I.F. Simon „Legea privind registrul comerțului – comentarii și explicații", 48-53.

8.3. Unique registration number

All legal persons that register with the Trade Register shall possess a unique registration number, allocated under the law, which shall be registered with the Trade Register. Commercial companies, national companies, autonomous operators, European companies residing in Romania, groups of economic interests, European groups of economic interests residing in Romania, cooperative companies, agricultural cooperative associations, loan cooperative associations, and their central units that have a legal personality shall obtain their unique registration number. This obligation refers both to traders and non-traders[65], and the provisions regarding the unique registration number included in the Law 26/1990 (art. 13 para.3, corroborated with art. 14 para.2 and art. 15 para.2) refer to entities with legal personality and entities that have no legal personality[66].

The unique registration number is a symbol made of figures that helps identifying the legal person in its fiscal relations and its relations regarding statistical records.

According to art. 72 para.1 in the Code of Fiscal procedure[67], any person or entity that is subject in a fiscal legal relation shall register itself and receive a fiscal identification number (usually, allocated by the relevant fiscal body subordinated to the National Agency of Fiscal Administration). The regulations include, for each category of tax-payer: the way to allocate the fiscal identification number, the obligation to submit the fiscal registration statement, and the deadline to submit the fiscal registration statement[68].

After the allocation of the fiscal identification number, the tax-payers shall write their fiscal identification number on invoices, letters, offers, orders and any other documents issued[69]. The documents submitted to banks, fiscal bodies and other public institutions, tax-payers and other interested persons, without the fiscal identification number of the issuing party inscribed shall not be considered as valid documents[70] (art. 73 Code of Fiscal Procedure).

8.4. Registration number for VAT purpose

It is the number allocated by the competent authorities of a Member State to the persons that have the obligation to register, or a similar registration number allocated by competent authorities from another Member State (for instance, the numbers issued in Romania have the prefix „R").

Starting with the 1st of January 2007, the registration number for VAT purposes allocated to legal persons and physical persons that have independent economic activities or are freelancers shall have the prefix „R", followed by the fiscal identification number allocated by the competent body[71].

8.5. Telephone, telex, fax

Although they may not be expressly identified in the New Civil Code, these identification attributes made of figures are the quickest identification means and the legal persons are registered with these symbols; this is a practice upon conclusion, modification and execution of contracts.

---

[65] For instance, the group of economic interests.

[66] For instance, family-owned companies and sole proprietorships.

[67] Adopted by Governmental Ordinance 92/2003, republished in the Official Gazette no 513 of 31st July (2007), with further modifications and completions.

[68] S. Cristea „Comentarii la codul de procedură fiscală", (Bucharest: Dareco Publishing House, 2007), 51-53.

[69] Failure to comply with the obligation shall be considered as offence and shall be sanctioned with a fine according to art. 219 in the Code of Fiscal Procedure.

[70] S. Cristea „Comentarii la codul de procedură fiscală", 53.

[71] R. Bufan, M. Şt. Minea, „Codul fiscal comentat", (Bucharest: Wolters Kluwer Publishing House, 2008), 534 and 1316 – 1317.

We consider that these communication elements of the legal persons, and, in time, maybe some other documents that may be issued by legal persons as a result of commercial practices, are identification attributes corresponding to the list formulated in art. 230 in the New Civil Code[72].

8.6. Equity

The interpretation of the provisions included in art. 7, 8 and 15 in the Law no 26/1990 regarding the Trade Register means that irrespective of the kind of commercial company or traders legal person – set up by the state, the equity is another identification attribute they shall inscribe in all their documents.

As a sum of the contributions of its shareholders, the equity is an element that is considered to be the general pledge for the unsecured creditors and it shall be, therefore, known by third parties. The version: "subscribed and paid in capital" appears only in the case of legal persons set up as public limited company or limited partnership by shares.

9. Conclusions

We consider that what we have presented so far in the previous sections impose conclusions that are visible at least along three dimensions: the non-limited nature of the list including the identification attributes of the legal person (section 9.1), the blurring of the inalienability of the identification attributes as non-material personal rights, on the one hand, and of the personality, on the other hand, and possibly even of the non-material nature (section 9.2) and finally, „the provision" of the dichotomy: civil law- commercial law in the Romanian private law (section 9.3).

9.1. Non-limited nature of the list including the identification attributes

According to art. 230 in the New Civil Code[73] the list including the identification attribute is not limited.

Along with the attributes newly added and imposed by business practices, we consider it necessary to add another one, the email address.

Expansion of the e-commerce in today's world requires that one of the contact data of a businessman, and not only, should be one's email address. This is a combination of figures and letters by which a person can be identified.

An argument in favor of considering the email an identification attribute is art. 4 para.1, letter b in the Governmental Ordinance 130/2000, regarding the legal status of distance contracts[74], according to which: „the consumer shall be entitled to notify in writing the trader that he gives up buying, with no penalties, and without invoking a reason, within 10 working days from the receiving the product, or, in case of services, since the conclusions of the contract".

Unless expressly stipulated, we consider that the notification in writing shall be sent in electronic version, just as the offer and the acceptance have taken place, and the email address shall be the email address of the trader.

We consider that, de lege ferenda, it would be useful to include the registered office of the trader among the identification attributes to be sent to the consumer, at least from the point of view of [72] The non-limited nature results from the use of the phrase „including other identification elements, under the law" in art. 230 in the New Civil Code.

[73] „depending on the specifics of the object of activity, the legal person can have other identification attributes as well such as: registration number with the Trade Register or another public register, the unique registration number and other identification elements, under the law" (art. 230 in the New Civil Code).

[74] Republished in the Official Gazette no 177 of 7th May (2008).

its importance for the competent court, in case of misunderstanding between the contracting parties (in terms of procedure).

9.2. Current status of inalienability, personality and the lack of financial contents of the identification attributes

While, by their nature, the identification attributes have appeared as non-material personal rights, we are witnessing nowadays a blurring of their non-transmittable nature in the business field. Since „everything" must be turned into cash as much as possible (which reflects the financial nature and the celerity), we can see that the identification attributes acquire the feature of negotiability. While the logo and the brand have formed themselves as legal institutions that can be transferred also separately from the business they come from[75], in time, the legal name can be also transferred with documents among living persons or mortis-causa, only accompanied by the business to which it belongs. Arguments for this are: the possibility to transfer the legal name to the trader physical person without changing the name included, with the condition to add the term "successor" by the civil name of the transferor (a) or the possibility to take over the business as sole proprietorship by the legal successor of the owner of the enterprise, with the condition to accept the succession within 6 months since the date when the owner passed away, and in this case, according to the Governmental Emergency Ordinance 44/2008, only the registration with the Trade Register and the authentic succession acceptance statement are needed[76] (according to art. 27) (b), or, in case of a limited liability company, according to art. 36 in the Law 26/1990 regarding the Trade Register, the legal name cannot include the name of one or several shareholders; unless otherwise stipulated, we shall interpret that, in the case of a business cession, along with the other elements, the transferee shall take over the previous legal name, and may add the term „successor", as previously stated under letter a above!

The personality of the name/legal name, of the logo, brand – as identification attributes considered as non-material personal rights – is increasingly blurred, as stated in the section dedicated to the brand, this reflecting less and less the personality of the trader and more and more the features of the product (merchandise). Another change in the personal and unique nature of the identification attributes is the Governmental Emergency Ordinance O.U.G. 44/2008 regulating the institution of the special-purpose assets by which we have a dual perception of the assets: civil assets of the person and distinctly, commercial assets – submitted as exclusive security for commercial debts[77].

The financial nature of the legal company, logo, brand – identification attributes of the legal person has been proved not only by their negotiability but also by their weight in the assessment of the business that are part of. The higher the value of a component, the more the value of the whole business – a guarantee to fulfill the contractual obligations undertaken – thus ensuring the protection of the creditors by „securing" the enforcement of debts.

9.3. Survival of the dichotomy civil law /commercial law in the Romanian private law

The cause that separated the civil law from the commercial law has not disappeared. Trade and traders have needed a specialized regulation although the doctrine formulated the opinion [78] that „differences from the civil law have never been in the contents but in nuances".

---

[75] S. Angheni, M. Volonciu, C. Stoica „Drept comercial pentru învățământul economic", (Bucharest: University Publishing House, 2008), 77-78.

[76] S. Cristea „Dreptul afacerilor", (Bucharest: University Publishing House, 2008), 85.

[77] L. Herovanu „Dreptul român și patrimoniul de afectațiune" in R.D.- The Law Magazine no 6 (2009), 64 – 76, and also S. Cristea „Dreptul afacerilor", 82 – 83.

[78] P.C.Vlachide „Repetiția principiilor de drept civil", 25.

A legislative argument in maintaining commercial law is the Law no 71/2011 for the enforcement of the Law no 287/2009 regarding the Civil Code, in the sense of modifying some special commercial laws such as: the Law 31/1990 regarding commercial companies; the Law 26/1990 regarding the Trade Register; the Law 136/1995 regarding insurance and re-insurance in Romania; the Governmental Emergency Ordinance 86/2006 regarding the activities of insolvency practitioners etc. without abrogating them, as it happened with the 1887 "Codicele de comerț" (Business Code).

Refereces

- Anca Petre „Organizațiile socialiste ca persoane juridice în România", Bucharest: Academy Publishing House, 1979;
- Angheni S., Volonciu M., Stoica C. „Drept comercial pentru învățământul economic", Bucharest: University Publishing House, 2008;
- Băcanu I. „ Company and trade mark", Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 1997;
- Beleiu Gh. „Dreptul civil român – introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele"– Bucharest: Șansa S.R.L. Printing House, 1992;
- Bîrsan C., „Subiectele colective de drept în România", I.C.J.- High Court of Justice, Bucharest: Academy Printing House, 1981;
- Boroi G., „Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", Bucharest: All Beck Publishing House, 2001;
- Bufan R., Minea M. Șt., „Codul fiscal comentat", Bucharest: Wolters Kluwer Publishing House, 2008;
- Căpățână O. "Societățile comerciale", 2nd edition, Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 1996;
- Cristea S. „Comentarii la codul de procedură fiscală", Bucharest: Dareco Publishing House, 2007;
- Cristea S. „Dreptul afacerilor", Bucharest: University Publishing House, 2008;
- Decree no 31/1954, abrogated by the Law no 71/2011 for the enforcement of the New Civil Code;
- Eminescu Y., "Regimul juridic al mărcilor", Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 1996;
- Governmental Ordinance 92/2003, republished in the Official Gazette no 513 of 31st July 2007;
- Governmental Ordinance 130/2000 which takes over the provisions of the Directive 97/7/CE of 20th May 1997 published in the Official Gazette no L144 of 4th June 1999;
- Haranga C. and Pîrvu I.N., „Unele aspecte teoretice şi practice privind stabilirea sediului social al societății comerciale", in R.D.C. no 2/2008, Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 2008;
- Herovanu L. „Dreptul român şi patrimoniul de afectațiune"in R.D.- The Law Magazine no 6/2009;
- Law Department of A.S.E. Bucharest, „Drept civil", vol. I, Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 2000;
- Official Gazette no 409 of 10th June 2011;
- Pîrvu L.N. and Simon I.F. „Legea privind registrul comerțului – comentarii şi explicații", Bucharest: C.H. Beck Publishing House, 2009;
- Stătescu C. „Drept civil", Bucharest: Didactic and Pedagogical Printing House, 1970;
- Șandru D. „Societățile comerciale în U.E.", Bucharest: University Publishing House, 2006;
- Ștefănescu B. and Căpățână O. „Tratat de dreptul comerțului internațional", Bucharest: Academy Publishing House, 1987;
- Urs I. and Angheni S. „Drept civil – partea generală. Persoanele", vol. I, Bucharest: Oscar Print Publishing House, 1991;
- Vlachide P.C. „Repetiția principiilor de drept civil"– vol. I, Bucharest: Europa Nova Printing House, 1994.

"THE UNDERTAKING" AND "THE RELEVANT MARKET": KEY CONCEPTS IN THE ANALYSIS OF ANTICOMPETITIVE PRACTICES

CRISTINA CUCU[*]

Abstract

The desire to maintain themselves on a particular market, at a higher level of profitability or at a reasonable level at least, can lead the undertakings to adopt an anticompetitive behaviour more easily. This may result from either the existence of anticompetitive agreements and concerted practices, or the tendency to abuse its dominant position which the undertaking has on a certain market.

"The undertaking" and "the relevant market" are the key concepts in the analysis of anticompetitive practices.

The active subject of anticompetitive practices is "the undertaking". This concept has a particular significance in the competition law, different from the common law. Competition rules apply to the conduct of undertakings and associations of undertakings so that the concept of undertaking makes it possible to determine the categories of actors to which the competition rules apply. However, the term undertaking is nowhere defined in the EU Treaties; as such, the concept has generated a complex body of jurisprudence.

"The market" is a term with pronounced economic resonances; synthetically, the market is the place where supply meets demand. In the context of the competition law, "the market" means "relevant market". The relevant market is the market of product/service in terms of demand and supply, and then superimposed on the geographic market.

The analysis of these key concepts necessarily entails the conceptual delimitation of the notions. On this purpose, the relevant legal provisions will be identified in the Romanian and EU law, together with the decisions of the European Court of Justice in this matter.

Keywords*: competition law, undertaking, relevant market, the market of the product, the geographic market.*

Introduction.

The purpose of this paper is the analysis of the notions "undertaking" and "relevant market" which represent key concepts in the analysis of the anti-competitive practices which can distort the competition. The undertaking is the active subject of the anticompetitive practices to which the competition law address, and the relevant market is the market on which the potential restriction of competition is analysed.

The study of these notions is important because the anticompetitive practices, which restrict natural competition, are practised, in most of the cases, by undertakings. As concerns the competition, the notion "undertaking" has a specific meaning, different from the common law.

The competition rules apply to the conduct of undertakings and associations of undertakings, so that the concept of undertaking makes it possible to determine the categories of actors to which the competition rules apply. However, the term "undertaking" is nowhere defined in the EU Treaties; as such, the concept has generated a complex body of jurisprudence, which has to be identified. "The market" is a term with pronounced economic resonances; synthetically, the market is the place where supply meets demand. In the context of the competition law, "the market" means "relevant market". The relevant market is the market of product/service in terms of demand and supply, and which is then superimposed on the geographic market.

[*] Ph. D. candidate, Law Faculty, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest; judge, Bucharest Tribunal – commercial branch (email: cristinaeremia@yahoo.com). The study is elaborated under the observance of Professor Stanciu D. Cărpenaru.

On this purpose, we will analyse the special significance of each of these two notions, "the undertaking" and "the relevant market", we will identify and analyse the main normative dispositions with regard to these aspects, both at national and European levels, and we will present more jurisprudential solutions of the European Law Court, from which are resulted the criteria that have to be taken into consideration for both the identification of un undertaking and the determination of the relevant market.

In comparison with other already existent specialty literature on competition law, the present paper intends to present the conceptual evolution of the analysed notions, paying special attention to the entities (including the ones without juridical personality or members of liberal professions) which can be qualified as undertakings as defined by the Romanian competition law.

Content.

I. Introductory aspects

The existence of a competitive and undistorted milieu is a fundamental condition for the existence of a functional market economy. Thus, it is necessary to protect the market against acts or facts that could lead to the restriction, distortion or even removal of the competition. Among these, the anticompetitive practices of undertakings are especially harmful, irrespective of the way in which they take place: anticompetitive agreements or the abuse of dominant position on a certain market.

The analysis of any anticompetitive practices begins necessarily with the identification of the active subject(s) of such practices and the verification whether or not the entities at hand represent an "undertaking" to which the competition rules address. In addition, due to the fact that undertakings act within a certain market, it is necessary to analyse the market in which competition takes place (the relevant market), in order to establish a potential competitive illicit.

II. The undertaking – active subject of anticompetitive practices.

II. 1. The settlement of the notion "undertaking".

In the European Union Law, The Treaty on the functioning of the European Union (EU Treaties/TFEU)[1], contains the primary legal regulation with regard to competition, which applies to undertakings and "associations of undertakings".

According to article 101 TFEU, "The following shall be prohibited as incompatible with the internal market: all agreements between undertakings, decisions by associations of undertakings and concerted practices which may affect trade between Member States and which have as their object or effect the prevention, restriction or distortion of competition within the internal market". Moreover, any abuse of one or more undertakings of dominant positions within the internal market or in a substantial part of it should be prohibited as incompatible with the internal market in so far as it may affect the trade between the Member States (art. 102 TFEU).

However, EU Treaties does not define the concept "undertaking". This task was attributed to the European Commission and european courts, which have established a wider meaning of the concept of "undertaking", as it will be mentioned later.

In the Romanian Law, the common law regulations[2] define the undertaking as an activity organised in order to provide goods and services, not as a subject of right. In the context of the New Civil Code (NCC)[3], the undertaking is also regulated as an organised activity, and not as a subject of right, as it results from the dispositions in art. 3 NCC, because it is "exploited by a professional", and the "exploitation of an undertaking" is "the systematic exertion of an organised activity...".

With regard to the competition right, the Competition Law no. 21/1996[4] 2nd article, 1st paragraph defines the undertaking as a "private individual or a legal entity, of citizenship,

[1] Official Journal of the European Union C 83/1, 30.3.2010.
[2] O.U.G. nr. 44/2008.
[3] Law no. 287/17.07.2009.
[4] M.Of. no. 88/30.04.1996.

respectively nationality, Romanian or foreign", and in the 2nd art., 2nd paragraph, as representing " any economic operator who offers goods/services on market, as it is defined in the European Union jurisprudence". From the legal definition of the notion "undertaking" the following conclusions can be drawn:

- In the competition law, the notion of "undertaking" has a specific meaning, different from the one in the common Law.

- The conception of the notion in the definition is the subjective one, different from the objective one in the Romanian Law, because it regulates the undertaking as a legal entity/ subject of right and not as an organised activity, in the conditions in which the legal text stipulates purposely that the undertaking is a "private individual", "a legal entity" or an "economic operator".

- the way in which "undertaking" is defined is at least unusual in the Romanian law, because a concept is defined by means of jurisprudence

- in the conditions in which the legal definition from the national law refers expressis verbis to the European Union jurisprudence, the full understanding of the notion of undertaking imposes the presentation and the analysis of this jurisprudence.

II. 2. The European Union jurisprudence with regard to competition. A few defining notes of the concept of "undertaking".

At the level of the European Union, the first definition of the undertaking is to be found in Mannesmann Case[5]: the existence of an undertaking is given by the unitary organisation of personal, material and immaterial elements, attributed to a subject of autonomous right, and pursuing, in a lasting way, a given economic goal.

In the Polypropylene Case,[6] the Comission concluded that the "subjects of the European law of the rules of competitions are the undertakings, concept which is not identical with the problem of juridical personality in the sense of the commercial enterprises law or of the fiscal policy, however it refers to any entity engaged in commercial activities". In the same case, The Law Court regulated that "the subject of the competition rules is the undertaking, a concept that is not identical with the matter of the juridical personality used for the commercial or fiscal law. It can refer to any entity that performs commercial activities".

The sphere of the notion of undertaking was enlarged in the Hofner Case[7]: in the context of the competition law, the term "undertaking" covers any "entity that performs an economic activity, regardless of the juridical status and the way in which it is financed".

This is the decision which crystalised the concept of undertaking, the Court's jurisprudence being then constant, through the reconfirmation of the concept thus delineated in numerous subsequent causes, such as: Case Poucet and Pistre vs. Assurences Generales de France, C- 159-160/91; Case Sat Fluggesellschaft vs. Eurocontrol C-364/92; C-244/94, Federation Francaise des Societes dAssurence vs. Ministere de lAgriculture et de la Peche ; Case Pavlov, C- 180-184/98; Case Fenin vs. Comisia, T – 319/99; Case Cisal di Battistello, C-218/00; Case Aok Bundesverband, C-264/01; Decision of 11.07.2006, FENIN/Comisia, C-205/03; Case Cassa di Risparmio di Firenze SpA C-224/04; T-155/04, Selex Sistemi Integrati SpA vs. Comisia, decision of 12.12.2006.

Last but not least, it is worth mentioning that, in order to constitute an undertaking, the Court has regulated that it is necessary for the respective eentity to have decisional autonomy, to be able to establish freely the behaviour on a market, problem which arises especially in the case of the entities which belong to the same group (Case Begelin, C-22/71; Case Viho Europe BV vs. Comisia, C-73/95; Case Akzo Nobel, C-97/08).

---

[5] Case Mannesman, C-19/61, decision of 13.07.1962. This case, like the other to which we refer throughout this paperwork are published on the website of the European Union Court of Justice, www.curia.eu.int.

[6] Case Polypropylene, 1986 , JO nr. L 230, 1988.

[7] Case C-41/90 Hofner and Elser vs. Macroton GmbH.

From the presented jurisprudence, we draw the main defining notes of the concept of "undertaking": it will constitute an undertaking in the sense of the competition law any entity which: i) performs an economic activity, ii) the juridical status having no relevance, iii) the way of financing, whether public or private, having no relevance, and which iv) has an autonomous behaviour on the market.

i) Entity that perfoms an economic activity

Perfoming an economic activity represents the essential element that leads to the inclusion of the entity in the sphere of the "undertaking" concept.

But what precisely does an economic activity represent? In a jurisprudence that is remarkably constant, the economic activity was definied as being that activity consisting in offering goods and services on a market (e.g., Cases: Comisia vs. Italia C-118/85; Ambulanz Glockner C-475/99; Comisia v. Italia C-35/96; Penin v. Comisia C-205/03; Pavlov C-180-184/98), susceptible, at least in principle, to be done by an undertaking in order to make profit (C-67/96 Albany International; C-180-184/98, Pavlov), being irrelevant whether the entity, in fact, does not make profit or whether the entity is not configured for an economic purpose (C-155/73, Italia vs. Saachi).

Thus, the economic activity represents the essential criteria for qualifying the entity that perfoms it as being an undertaking.

The exertion of an activity that, in its nature, by means of the rules that it obeys and by means of its object, is different from the sphere of the economic activities, hinders the qualification of the entity that does it as an undertaking in the sense of the competition rules.

In this category are included, for instance: the activities which join the exertion of the prerogatives of the public power (in this sense, in Case Selex Sistemi Integrati SpA vs. Comisia[8], the European organisation regarding the control of the aerial navigation (Eurocontrol) was not qualified as undertaking, retaining that its activity, through its nature and objective, represents a prerogative of public power and it does not present an economic character which justifies the application of the competition rules) or activities which regard the administration of the public service of social security, together with those that aim at the system of health insurances or old age pensions (because they have an exclusively social character and are built on the principle of national solidarity, it does not represent an economic activity, and the organism commissioned to administrate them – the health insurance fund or the pension fund – cannot be qualified as undertaking, as they cannot influence the amount of the dues or the use of funds[9]).

ii)The legal status or form of the entity is immaterial.

The preoccupation regarding the activities of the entity, in consensus with the pragmatic vision and the economic objectives of the TUFE deprives of relevance the juridical status of the undertaking: the exertion of the economic activity can be performed both by a private individual and a legal entity, even by state organisms.

iii) The lack of relevance of the financing way, public or private.

The competition right does not contain special derogations in the benefit of the public undertakings, for the only reason that they are under the control of the state.

The different allotment, private or of the state, to the constitution of the capital of an undertaking cannot represent a criterion to lead to the inapplicability of the competition rules for a certain category of undertakings. In this sense, the article 106 TUFE establishes undoubtedly the application of the competition rules and the public undertakings, and the European law courts did not hesitate to declare them, having a character of principle, applicable[10].

iv) An autonomous behaviour on the market.

[8] Case Selex Sistemi Integrati SpA vs. Comisia, T-155/04, decision of 12.12.2006.

[9] Case Poucet et Pistre, C-159/91.

[10] Case C-41/90 Hofner şi Elser c. Macroton GmbH.

In order to be able to be qualified as an undertaking to which the competition rules address, the entity at hand has to have decisional autonomy, the ability to establish freely its behaviour on the market. In the absence of the decisional autonomy, situation which appears especially in the case of the enterprises that belong to the same group[11], the entity cannot be qualified as undertaking.

II. 3. The definition of the undertaking. Bearing in mind what has been exposed, we will define the undertaking as being any entity with decisional autonomy, irrespective of its juridical status and the way in which it finances, engaged in an economic activity (consisting in offering goods or services on a market), susceptible of making profit, even if the goal of the entity is not lucrative.

II. 4. Determining the sphere of the concept of "undertaking" in the Romanian Law.

In order to determine the categories of active subjects of the anticompetitive practices in the plan of the national legislation, we will distinguish between: private individuals (A), legal entities (B) and entities without juridical personality (C), following to establish concretely which entity precisely can be qualified as undertaking in the Romanian law of competition.

A. Natural persons.

i) In the old Commercial Code, a private individual acquired the quality of trader in the conditions of the 7th article, respectively if they fulfilled cumulatively the following conditions: to do objective acts of commerce; these acts to be done in behalf of its own; the performance of the acts of commerce are to have a character of profession[12]. As a consequence of the adoption of the New Civil Code (NCC), the Commercial Code is abrogated, and the notion of trader is not longer defined as such. The New Civil Code has radically modified the the overall conception of the subject, opting for a monist conception of regulating the rapports of private right, according to which the regulations regarding the commercial relations have been embodied in the Civil Code, the traditional division between civil rapports and commercial rapports was no longer maintained and there were consecrated differentiations of the legal system according to the quality of the professional, respectively non-professional of those involved in the compulsory juridical rapport.

In these conditions, the institution of the commerce acts and the institution of traders are to be reconsidered, having as basis the concepts of undertaking and professional.

According to the 3rd article, 2nd and 3rd paragraphs of the NCC, those who exploit an undertaking are not considered professionals; it constitutes the exploitation of an undertaking the systematic exertion, by one or more people, of an organised activity that consists in the production, administration or alienation of goods or in providing services, irrespective of its lucrative or non-lucrative goal. The notion of "professional" stated in the Civil Code includes the categories of trader, entrepreneur, economic operator, together with any other people authorised to engage in economic or professional activities, in the way in which these notions are declared in the law, on the date when the Civil Code was brought into force[13].

In the conditions of the competition right, because the competition rules apply only to the entitites with autonomy of decision that perform economic activities, as it has been shown, we will conclude that the private individual can be an active subject if they represent a private-individual professional who perfoms an economic activity.

In this context we can identify as "undertaking" in the sense of the competition rules: the authorised private individual, the appointed person of the individual undertaking and the members of the familial undertaking. The conclusion results from the provisions of the OUG nr. 44/2008, which stipulate that the private individuals can perform economic activities on the Romanian territory, in all domanins, professions, occupations or professions which the law does not forbid purposely for the free initiative, on the condition of registration and authorization, in the conditions of this normative act. The private individuals can take part in the economic activities as follows: i) individually and independently, private authorised individuals; ii) as appointed entrepreneurs of an individual undertaking; iii) as members of a familial undertaking. In the conditions in which these people have as a declared purpose taking part in an economic activity, they represent undertakings in the sense of the competition right.

[11] It will be analised infra, II. 4.

[12] St. Cărpenaru, Tratat de drept comercial, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2009, p. 77-82.

[13] Art. 8 of Law no. 71/2011 (M. Of. nr. 409/10.06.2011).

ii) Other private individuals. From those exposed in part i), it results that it represents an undertaking in the sense of the competition right the private individuals who perform economic activities, but who, at the same time, are subject to a legal regime of authorisation and registration. In the European Union jurisprudence, the sphere of the concept of "undertaking" has been extended beyond these limits, underlining that an inventor, private individual, constitutes an undertaking in the sense of the competition rules when, holding a patent license, commercialises his invention (Commision's decision from 2.12.1975 in Case 76/29/CEE AOIP vs. Beyrard).

Besides, an artist (opera singer) is assimilated to the undertaking, if he exploits commercially his performance (Comission's decision 516/78/516/CEE in Case Radioetelevisone Italian vs. Unitel Film und Fernesh Produktionsgessellchaft GmbH).

I appreciate that, in the hypothesis in which a private individual, even unauthorised and unregistered, could exert economic activities in an apt mannaer to restrict competition, he could be qualified as an undertaking being subject to the competition rules. Even if it is more likely that such situations may arise in connection with aspects that are related to the intellectual property, we cannot exclude them de plano, because, on the one hand, it would contravene the interpretation from the EU jurisprudence, and on the other hand, the conclusion is founded on the dispositions of the 2nd article from Law no 21/1996, which sends generally to "private individuals", without instituting the requirement of its authorization/registration.

iii) The members of the liberal professions. The directive 2005/36/CE of the European Parlament and of the Council from 7th September 2005 regarding the recognition of the professional qualifications defines the liberal profession as being any profession exercised on the basis of some corresponding professional qualifications, with personal title, on one's own liability and independent from the professional point of view, offering intellectual and conceptual services in the interest of the customer and public. In Romania, the liberal and conceptual professions enjoy special and distinct regulations, without the existence of a general definition and a regulation of them. The domamain is a vast one, comprising of one of the most varied professions/qualifications, such as: juridical (lawyers, notaries, bailiffs), economic (authorised accountants, chartered accountants, auditors, tax consultant, management consultants), medical (doctors, dentists, chemists, dental technician, nurses, midwives, psychologists, veterinarians) and technical (architects, technical experts, surveyors).

In the European law, the members of the liberal professions have been considered as representing undertakings in the sense of the competition law, because they perform an economic activity, offering services on the market for remuneration. The complex and technical nature of the services provided and the regulated character of the profession are not enough in orderer to exclude the qualification as undertakings[14]. In Wouters case, related to the profession of lawyer, the Court underlined that lawyers offer, for a remuneration, services of legal assistance, which consisted in the preparation of the notices, contracts and other documents, together with the representation and defence. In addition, they take financial risks afferent to the engagement in these activities, because, in case of an imbalance between income and expenses, the lawyer himself covers the deficit appeared. In these conditions, the lawyers engage in economic activity and consequently, establish undertakings, without having the complex and technical nature of the services that they provide and the fact they their profession is such regulated so that it can affect this conclusion. The conclusion has also been confirmed in the case of the liberal profession of architects[15].

[14] Case Wouters (J.C.J. Wouters, J. W. Savelbergh and PRICE Waterhouse), C- 309/99.
[15] Decision of 24.06.2004, JO L4, 06.01.2005, in the case of the liberal profession of architects from Belgium.

In the Romanian doctrine, the problem that the members of the liberal professions may be considered as undertskings in the sense of the competition right has not received unitary responses. Thus, it has been appreciated that it represents undertakings because they engage in an activity of an economic character, resulted from: the nature of the operations undertaken (offering the knowledge from different specialisations instead of some amounts of money), the nature of the goal (making profit), keeping minimal accountancy[16]. On the contrary, it has been considered that the lawyers, notaries, bailiffs, cannot represent an "undertaking", even if their activity is economic (providing services), because it is of civil and not commercial nature, conclusion presumed from the tax law, which in the case if these people, establishes the direct taxation and not the profit tax[17].

As far as i am concerned, I consider that the members of the liberal professions have to be considered as undertakings in the sense of the competition right, because all the conditions resulted from the European Union jurisprudence that qualify them as undertakings are fulfilled (it should not be forgotten that, in the legal definition of the notion of undertaking, the Romanian legislator refers purposely to the EU jurisprudence): they engage in economic activities, with an autonomous character of decision; the economic character of the activity done (in his special sense related to the competition) it results clearly from these circumstances that receiving a remuneration, an amount of money, is sought, for the specific pprovision offered on the market, and the economic activity the financial risk is taken.

In practice, the Romanian national authority, The Competition Council, has retained that the members of the liberal professions are considered undertakings as related to the competition right, retaining as principal argument the EU jurisprudence: "the complex and technical nature of the members of the liberal professions and the fact that their profession is regulated are not calculated to exclude their qualification as undertakings". Thus, the chartered accountant[18] or the dental technicians[19] have been assimilated to the notion of undertaking.

iv) The Wage Earners (employees). Many times, they perform, in fact, economic activities. Because the activity is performed by wage earners according to their employers' indications, without taking the financial risk of the business, we conclude that they cannot be qualified as an undertaking, because they lack the autonomous and decisional behaviour on the market[20].

v) The Intermediaries. There may be qualified as undertakings in the sense of the competitive rules only the independent intermediaries, because only they can freely determine their behaviour in the activities performed on the market, the typical example being represented by the agent in the case of signing an agency deal.

B. Legal Entities.

- Commercial enterprises; in the conditions in which they are started on the declared purpose of performing activities with lucrative goals[21], therefore they do an economic activity, oriented towards making profit, the commercial enterprises (irrespective of the juridical form in which it organises: enterprises with collective name, partnerships en commandite, enterprises with limited liability, joint stock companies) represent an undertaking in the sense of the competition rules.

- The national companies, the national enterprises and the autonomous administrations because they are subjects of autonomous right, which exert an economic activity, represent undertakings in the sense of the competition rules, because, as it has been shown, the way they finance is of no relevance, and the public undertakings are subject to the competition rules.

---

[16] E. Mihai, Competition Law, Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti, 2004, p. 32.
[17] T. Prescure, Curs de dreptul concurenţei comerciale, Ed. Rosetti, Bucureşti, 2004, p. 183.
[18] Decision of The Competition Council, no. 47 of 02.11.2010, www.competition.ro.
[19] Decision of The Competition Council, no. 19 of 26.03.2018, www.competition.ro.
[20] Employees are not undertakings (Case Becu C-22/98 and Case Albany C-67/96).
[21] Art. 1 of Law no. 31/1990 (Republished in the Official Gazette no 1066/17.11.2004).

- Economic interest groups and the European economics interest groups[22], because they are constituded on the purpose of easing and developing the economic activities of their members and they pursue a patrimony goal, represent undertakings in the sense of the competition rules.

- Corporations and the corporatist organisations represent undertakings in the sense of the competition rules, because they do economic activities.

- Credit institutions have the quality of undertakings, because the economic character is the essence of their activities.

- Non-profit organisations, in principle*,* do not engage in economic activities, thus they cannot constitute undertakings. We take into consideration the patronal and syndicate organisations, together with the associations, foundations and federations. However, in the hypothesis in which the non-profit organisations perform economic activities, the European instances have qualified them as undertakings[23], conclusion to which we acquiesce. In addition, the conclusion is based on the Romanian law relating to the legal dispositions which regulate such organisations and allow them to perform certain economic activities.

Thus, the associations, foundations and federations[24] may start commercial enterprises and may perform economic activities, and the syndical and patronal organisations can set up commercial enterprises, insurance enterprises, together with their own bank[25]. In situations such as these, the economic character of the activity that is performed is obvious and it attracts the incidence of the competition rules. Behind the commercial enterprise there is the organisation at hand, which thus becomes apt for being qualified as subject of the competition right.

- The authorities and the institutions of the public central and local administration can be subjects in the rapports of the competition right in two situations: a) in the hypothesis in which, by means of the emitted decisions or by means of the adopted regulations, they intervene in the market operations, influencing directly or indirectly the competition[26]; in such a situation, they cannot be qualified as undertakings, because they act in exerting their prerogatives of public power, but represent the second big category of active subjects of the anti-competitive practices; b) in the situations in which they interneve directly in operations of market, as any undertaking, without exerting prerogatives of public power; in such a case, they can be qualified as undertakings. Such a hyphothesis exists in the case in which such authorities engage in an economic activity, as if the activity had been done by a private undertaking (e.g. building a football field, an ice rink etc., the access being allowd in return of a price).

- Subsidiaries. Because the subsidiary has a distinct juridical personality as compared with that of the parental company and it is a commercial enterprise which perfoms economic activities, they represent an undertaking in the sense of the competition rules.

The situation is not as simple as in the case in which the behavioral authonomy of the subsidiary on the market is affected. The problem may appear in the case of some existing anticompetitive agreements in the same group of enterprises, respectively between the mother enterprise and its filial/filiale, respectively if "the relationships between them are so close that it would be realistic to be regarded as a single undertaking"[27]. The European instances treated the problem from the perspective of the concept "a single economic unity". The Court has stated that the notion of undertaking, placed in the context of the competition, has to be understood in the sense that it designated an economic unity, even if from a juridical point of view this economic unity is

[22] Law no. 161/2003 (M. Of. no. 279/21.04.2003).
[23] Cases C-209/1978 – C-216/1978 and C-218/1978 Heintz Van Landewyck SARL ş.a vs. Comisia.
[24] According art. 47-48 of OG no. 26/2000 (M. Of. no 39/31.01.2000).
[25] Art. 25 and 62 of Law no. 62/2011 (M. Of. no. 322/10.05.2011).
[26] Art. 2 and 9 of Law no. 21/1996.
[27] Wish, Richard, Competition Law, ed. 4, Ed. Butterworths, London, 2001, p. 72.

constituted from more private individuals or legal entities[28]. The different undertakings which belong to the same group constitute an economic entity and thus a single undertaking, unless the enterprises at hand establish autonomously their behaviour on the market[29]. The behaviour of a subsidiary can be imputed to the mother- enterprise especially when, although it has distinct juridical personality, this subsidiary does not decide autonomously the behaviour on the market, but applies, basically, the instructions that it is given by the mother-enterprise, taking into consideration, especially, the organisational, economic and juridical boundaries that unite the two entities[30]. In the particular case in which a mother-enterprise possesses 100 % of the capital of its subsidiary, there is a relative presumption according to which the respective mother-enterprise exerts effectively a decisive influence over the behaviour of its subsidiary[31].

Thus, it results that, according to the "a single economic unity" theory, in order to qualify the subsidiary as undertaking, we have to relate to the degree of economic-financial and decisional autonomy of the subsidiary compared to its founder: it will represent an undertaking if the subsidiary could exert an autonomous, independent behaviour on the market; on the contrary, in the case in which the subsidiary has an absolute economic dependence on the mother, its existence within the group of enterises representing a mere internal organisation of the tasks, it is obvious that it cannot be characterised as an undertaking to which the competition rules address, because it does not have decisional autonomy.

In the hypothesis in which the mother-entersprise does not have the totality of the allotments of the subsidiary, then it has to be demonstrated that the first is able to influence tha attitude of the second one. I consider that an affirmative response results from the collaboration of more factors such as: the mother-enterprise controls the leading of the subsidiary the profit is taken by the mother-enterprise, the subsidiary acts accoding to the instructions of the first.

The "one single economic entity" theory has an important juridical consequence, in the aspect of the liability: in the absence of the decisional autonomy of the subsidiary the liability of the breaking of the competition rules will entail the mother-enterprise[32].

C. The Entities without juridical personality.

The French doctrine recognises the qualification as undertaking to which the competition rules[33] address of the entities without juridical personality, if they meet the essential requirement of the economic activity by means of offering goods and services on a market.

On a national scale, the doctrinal opinions are divergent as regards the branch. In an opinion, it has been appreciated that such entities are undertakingss, to the extent to which it would be ascertained that, de facto, they have benefitted from sufficient economic and functional autonomy in order to adopt an anticompetitive behaviour of their own[34]. On the contrary, in different opinions it has been appreciated that the sucursale cannot be qualified as undertakings in the competition law, because "they do not have a will distinct from that of the primary undertaking that created them,

---

[28] Decision of 14.12.2006, Confederación Española de Empresarios de Estaciones de Servicio, C-217/05; Decision of Case Akzo Nobel vs. Comisia, C-97/08; Decision of 1.07.2010, in Case Knauf Gips vs.Comisia, C-407/08.

[29] Decision of 30.09.2003, Michelin/Comisia, T-203/01.

[30] Decision in Case Imperial Chemical Industries/Comisia C-48/69; decision Geigy/Comisia; decision of. 21.02.1973, Europemballage and Continental Can/Comisia, 6/72; Case Centrafarm C-15/74; Case Bodson v. Pompes Funebres C-30/87; Case Armando Alvarez SA vs. Comisia, T-78/06, decision of 16.11.2011.

[31] Decision of Case AEG-Telefunken/Comisia; Case Armando Alvarez SA vs. Comisia, T-78/06, decision of 16.11.2011.

[32] Case Akzo Nobel, C-97/08; Case Armando Alvarez SA vs. Comisia, T-78/06, decision of 16.11.2011.

[33] Riplet, G.; Roblot, R., Vogel , L., Traite de droit commercial, Ed. 18, L.G.D.J; Paris, 2001, vol. I, p. 690; Gavalda, Christian; Parleani, Gilbert, Droit des affaires de l'Union Européenne, ed. 4, Litec, Paris, 2002, p. 285; Boutard-Labarde M. – Ch., Canivet G., Droit francais de la concurrence, LGDJ, Paris, 1994, p. 230; Vogel, Louis, Droit europeen de la concurrence, LawLex, Paris, 2006, p. 129.

[34] E. Mihai, op.cit., p. 35.

being mere doers of the mandatory directives for the subordinated unity from the system"[35] or because "it cannot have its own liability nor a competitive position distinct from that of the enterprise to which it belongs".[36]

As far as I am concerned, i appreciate that the analysis has to be conducted distinguishing between the two hypotheses in which the branch can act: a) the branch acts as an entity within the group of enterprises, and the activity of the group is susceptible to enter the sphere of the competitive illicit. In such a hypothesis, the double subordination, economic and juridical, of the subsidiary to the parent enterprise in the Romanian law demonstrates the lack of decisional autonomy of the subsidiary in the economic activity that is performed, conditions in which we cannot classify it as representing, distinctly, an undertaking to which the competition rules address. In the same sense another argument a fortiori pleads, detached from the "one single economic entity" theory, exposed previously: if a subsidiary –legal entity apt to exercise, by its own, dinstincly, economic activities autonomously – it will not be qualified as undertaking in the condition in which it does not have autonomy from the parent enterprise, all the more reason why this conclusion is imposed in the case of the subsidiary, totally dependent, economically and juridically, on the enterprise that created it; b) the subsidiary acts without the group of undertakings, analysis to which the circumstance obliges me, although in isolation, however the Commission has established as addressee of its decision a subsidiary (the Commission's decision from 9th June 1972, in Raymond-Nagoya Cause, 72/238/CEE; in this case, the subsidiary had signed a licence contract).

In the Romanian law, from this perspective, the subsidiary cannot be qualified as representing an undertaking, because it does not have juridical personality, thus it does not have capacity for use, and, consequently, it cannot issue juridical documents in behalf of its own.

De lege lata, I consider that, in the Romanian law of competition, the entities without juridical personality cannot be qualified as undertakings, because, as i have shown, the Law no. 21/1996 regulates the undertaking as subject of right, and not as an organised activity, considering as undertakings only the private individuals or the legal entities.

III. Relevant market.

III. 1. Notion. The importance of defining the relevant market.

"The market" is a term with pronounced economic resonances; synthetic, the market is the place where supply meets demand. In the context of competition law, "the market" means "relevant market".

In competition law, concept of the market has a specific meaning, justified by the premise of competition: rivalry of undertakings can exist only in a given market. The existence of any distortion of competition can not be analyzed abstract or at a global level, but by reference to a determined market, because in the game of competition, rivalry implies undertakings with similar activities (the competition between a bookseller and a seller of cosmetics is not possible, because products are offered to different customers). As such, in the context of competition law, "the market" has a specific significance: it means "relevant market". Equally, the specialized literature uses the terms as"marche concernee", marche en cause", or "relevant market"[37].

The determination/the defining of relevant market is very important in analysis of anticompetitive practices.

Sanctioning the anticompetitive agreements refers to those agreements, decisions and concerted practices which have as their object or effect the prevention, restriction or distortion of the competition. Assessing these anticompetitive effects usually involves defining the relevant market and proving the fact that the agreement would have a negative effect on competition. Agreements which have as their object the prevention, restriction or distortion of competition, are not subject of this rule. In their case, defining the relevant market is not a precondition for finding the infringement of competition rules. Defining the relevant market will be required later to determine the turnover of the undertaking concerned, in order to implement the fine prescribed by law.

[35] Căpățînă, Octavian, *Dreptul concurentei comerciale. Concurența patologică. Monopolismul, op.cit.,*p. 60.

[36] T. Prescure, *op.cit.,*p. 183.

[37] Jones, Alison; Sufrin, Brenda, EC Competition Law, Text, Cases & Materials, Oxford University Press, 2008, p.350; Gavalda, Christian; Parleani, Gilbert, Droit des affaires de l'Union Européenne, Litec, Paris, 2002, p. 289

Sanctioning an abuse of dominant position occurs only in the case of dominant undertakings. An undertaking can be considered as dominant if it has a significant market power, if its market position enables it to behave independently of its competitors, of its customers and ultimately of its consumers. To determine the market power of the undertaking and whether or not it has a dominant position, firstly, the relevant market in which it holds a dominant position must be defined.

Also, defining the relevant market provides for the competition authority the information necessary that allows to close an investigation at an early stage. In this way, there can be identified those agreements which don't have a significant impact on competition or those situations in which the undertakings will not have substantial market power. Defining the relevant market is also important to determine whether the market share of an undertaking is lower or higher than the thresholds set for certain block exemptions.

Defining of relevant market is important, because undertakings claim the existence of a larger market and thus to reduce their market share.

In 1997, stressing that such aims to ensure greater transparency to understand how to interpret and apply the rules of competition, the European Commission published Commission Notice on the definition of relevant market[38]. Commission stresses that the relevant market is determined by analysis of two aspects: the product market and geographic market. In our national law, The Competition Council issued Instructions on the relevant market definition[39], which have similar prescriptions.

The relevant product market comprises all those products and/or services which are regarded as interchangeable or substitutable by the consumer, by reason of the products' characteristics, their prices and their intended use. The relevant geographic market comprises the area in which the undertakings concerned are involved in the supply and demand of products or services, in which the conditions of competition are sufficiently homogeneous and which can be distinguished from neighbouring areas because the conditions of competition are appreciably different in those area.

III.2. The criteria for defining the relevant market.

a. The relevant product market.

The relevant product market comprises all those products and/or services which are regarded as interchangeable or substitutable by the consumer, by reason of the products' characteristics, their prices and their intended use

The keyword is substitutability: to be included in the same relevant market, products must be sufficiently similar to constitute a real choice for consumers.

Substitutability of products must be determined from a double perspective: demand substitution and supply substitution.

Demand substitution.

The assessment of demand substitution entails a determination of the range of products which are viewed as substitutes by the consumer. From this point of view, the relevant market comprises all those products and/or services which are regarded as interchangeable or substitutable by the consumer, by reason of the products' characteristics, their prices and their intended use. Products must be sufficiently similar to constitute a real choice for consumers.

[38] J.O. no. C 372 /1997, http://eur-lex.europa.eu/.
[39] M.Of. no. 553/05.08.2010.

Products considered interchangeable between them not must be identical; it is sufficient to constitute a real alternative, satisfying consumer needs and desires. The degree of substitutability between products should be a reasonable. In the case Continental Can[40], the Court stated that it is sufficient a reasonable substitutability, without difficulty, from products to achieve the same purpose. To assess the degree of substitutability between products may be considered as criteria: characteristics, price and use of products.

- ”characteristics”: Similarity of products’ characteristics (such as physical nature, form, structure / composition, technical properties), usually, justifies the presumption that mutual substitution is possible and that so the products are substitutes (e.g. wooden furniture and plywood).

- ”price”: The price is very important in the analysis of products’ substitutability. Commission adopted SSNIP test - "Small But Significant Increase in prices and no transitory"-, also known as the "hypothetical monopolist test”. Conceptually, this approach means that, starting from the type of products that the undertakings involved sell and the area in which they sell them, additional products and areas will be included in, or excluded from, the market definition depending on whether competition from these other products and areas affect or restrain sufficiently the pricing of the parties' products in the short term. The question to be answered is whether the parties' customers would switch to readily available substitutes or to suppliers located elsewhere in response to a hypothetical small (in the range 5 % to 10 %) but permanent relative price increase in the products and areas being considered. If substitution were enough to make the price increase unprofitable because of the resulting loss of sales, additional substitutes and areas are included in the relevant market. This would be done until the set of products and geographical areas is such that small, permanent increases in relative prices would be profitable.

-”use”: If products can be used for the same purpose, they are interchangeable.The Court decided that glass packaging and metal packaging are interchangeable[41].

In case law, were considered non-substitutable, for example, bananas[42] with other fresh fruit, fixed and mobile telephony[43].

Supply substitution.

Supply-side substitutability may also be taken into account when defining markets in those situations in which its effects are equivalent to those of demand substitution in terms of effectiveness and immediacy. This means that suppliers are able to switch production to the relevant products and market them in the short term without incurring significant additional costs or risks in response to small and permanent changes in relative prices. When these conditions are met, the additional production that is put on the market will have a disciplinary effect on the competitive behaviour of the companies involved. Such an impact in terms of effectiveness and immediacy is equivalent to the demand substitution effect.

These situations typically arise when companies market a wide range of qualities or grades of one product; even if, for a given final customer or group of consumers, the different qualities are not substitutable, the different qualities will be grouped into one product market, provided that most of the suppliers are able to offer and sell the various qualities immediately and without the significant increases in costs. In such cases, the relevant product market will encompass all products that are substitutable in demand and supply, and the current sales of those products will be aggregated so as to give the total value or volume of the market. The same reasoning may lead to group different geographic areas.

[40] Case C- 6/72.
[41] Case United Brands, C- 27/76.
[42] Case United Brands, C- 27/76.
[43] The Competition Council, decision no. 27/11.03.1999

b. The relevant geographic market.

The keyword for defining the relevant geographic market is homogeneity.

According to Commission Notice on the definition of relevant market and Instructions on the relevant market definition of The Roumanian Competition Council, *t*he relevant geographic market comprises the area in which the undertakings concerned are involved in the supply and demand of products or services, in which the conditions of competition are sufficiently homogeneous and which can be distinguished from neighbouring areas because the conditions of competition are appreciably different in those area.

The approach in geographic market definition might be summarized as follows: it will take a preliminary view of the scope of the geographic market on the basis of broad indications as to the distribution of market shares between the parties and their competitors, as well as a preliminary analysis of pricing and price differences at national and Community or EEA level. This initial view is used basically as a working hypothesis to focus the Commission's enquiries for the purposes of arriving at a precise geographic market definition.

The reasons behind any particular configuration of prices and market shares need to be explored. Companies might enjoy high market shares in their domestic markets just because of the weight of the past, and conversely, a homogeneous presence of companies throughout the EEA might be consistent with national or regional geographic markets. The initial working hypothesis will therefore be checked against an analysis of demand characteristics (importance of national or local preferences, current patterns of purchases of customers, product differentiation/brands, other) in order to establish whether companies in different areas do indeed constitute a real alternative source of supply for consumers. The theoretical experiment is again based on substitution arising from changes in relative prices, and the question to answer is again whether the customers of the parties would switch their orders to companies located elsewhere in the short term and at a negligible cost.

If necessary, a further check on supply factors will be carried out to ensure that those companies located in differing areas do not face impediments in developing their sales on competitive terms throughout the whole geographic market. This analysis will include an examination of requirements for a local presence in order to sell in that area the conditions of access to distribution channels, costs associated with setting up a distribution network, and the presence or absence of regulatory barriers arising from public procurement, price regulations, quotas and tariffs limiting trade or production, technical standards, monopolies, freedom of establishment, requirements for administrative authorizations, packaging regulations, etc. In short, the Commission will identify possible obstacles and barriers isolating companies located in a given area from the competitive pressure of companies located outside that area, so as to determine the precise degree of market interpenetration at national, European or global level.

The actual pattern and evolution of trade flows offers useful supplementary indications as to the economic importance of each demand or supply factor mentioned above, and the extent to which they may or may not constitute actual barriers creating different geographic markets. The analysis of trade flows will generally address the question of transport costs and the extent to which these may hinder trade between different areas, having regard to plant location, costs of production and relative price levels.

c. Other criteria.

- Potential competition. Undertakings are subject to three main sources or competitive constraints: demand substitutability, supply substitutability and potential competition. From an economic point of view, for the definition of the relevant market, demand substitution constitutes the most immediate and effective disciplinary force on the suppliers of a given product, in particular in relation to their pricing decisions. A firm or a group of firms cannot have a significant impact on the prevailing conditions of sale, such as prices, if its customers are in a position to switch easily to available substitute products or to suppliers located elsewhere. Basically, the exercise of market definition consists in identifying the effective alternative sources of supply for the customers of the undertakings involved, in terms both of products/services and of geographic location of suppliers.

The third source of competitive constraint, potential competition, is not taken into account when defining markets, since the conditions under which potential competition will actually represent an effective competitive constraint depend on the analysis of specific factors and circumstances related to the conditions of entry. If required, this analysis is only carried out at a subsequent stage, in general once the position of the companies involved in the relevant market has already been ascertained, and when such position gives rise to concerns from a competition point of view[44].

- Temporal aspect. In specialised literature, temporal aspect is considered by some authors as criterion to defining the relevant market. Thus, it is stressed that: " a market can evolve a cyclic manner, according to time periods"[45], or " the markets have a temporal element, meaning that a firm may have market power at a certain time of year, when competition from other products is reduced, as these products are only available seasonally"[46].

In my opinion, temporal aspect is related to product/services and, consequently, it leads to defining the relevant market of product (for example, the fact that certain fruits or vegetables are available only in certain periods of the year), thus it is not a criterion what must be considered separately to determine the relevant market.

Conclusions.

"The undertaking" and "the relevant market" are the key concepts in the analysis of anticompetitive practices.

The active subject of anticompetitive practices is "the undertaking". This concept has a particular significance in the competition law, different from the common law. In the context of the competition law, the term "undertaking" covers any entity that performs an economic activity, regardless of the juridical status and the way in which it is financed. Different from the common law, In Roumanian Competition Law, undertaking is a legal entity/ subject of right and not an organised activity.

"The market" is a term with pronounced economic resonances; synthetically, the market is the place where supply meets demand. In the context of the competition law, "the market" means "relevant market". The relevant market is the market of product/service in terms of demand and supply, and then superimposed on the geographic market. A relevant product market comprises all those products and/or services which are regarded as interchangeable or substitutable by the consumer, by reason of the products' characteristics, their prices and their intended use. The relevant geographic market comprises the area in which the undertakings concerned are involved in the supply and demand of products or services, in which the conditions of competition are sufficiently homogeneous and which can be distinguished from neighbouring areas because the conditions of competition are appreciably different in those area. The relevant market within which to assess a given competition issue is therefore established by the combination of the product and geographic market.

Future research would involve: identifying difficulties in establishing the autonomous behaviour on the market, the cases in which the behavioral authonomy of the subsidiary on the market is affected; identifying the relevant market in special cases (captive markets and market infrastructure).

[44] Commission Notice on the definition of relevant market and Instructions on the relevant market definition of The Roumanian Competition Council, cit. supra.

[45] Fuerea, Augustin, Business Community Law, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2006, p. 272.

[46] Craig, Paul; Grainne de Burca, EU Law, Oxford University Press, 2003, p. 1261.

References

- Stanciu Cărpenaru, Tratat de drept comercial, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2009.
- Stanciu Cărpenaru, Dreptul comercial în condițiile Noului Cod civil, Curierul Judiciar nr. 10/2010.
- Octavian Căpățînă, Dreptul concurentei comerciale. Concurența patologică. Monopolismul, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 1993.
- Octavian Căpățână, Dreptul concurenței comerciale. Partea generală, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 1998.
- Emilia Mihai, Dreptul concurenței, All Beck, Bucharest, 2004.
- Prescure Titus, Curs de dreptul concurenței comerciale, Rosetti, Bucharest, 2004
- Augustin Fuerea, Business Community Law, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2006
- G. Riplet, R. Roblot and L. Vogel, Traite de droit commercial, L.G.D.J., Paris, 2001.
- Christian Gavalda and Gilbert Parleani, Droit des affaires de l'Union Européenne, Litec, Paris, 2002.
- Boutard-Labarde M. – Ch., Canivet G., Dreptul francez al concurentei, LGDJ, Paris, 1994.
- Louis Vogel, Droit europeen de la concurrence, LawLex, Paris, 2006.
- Paul Craig and Grainne de Burca, EU Law, Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Richard Wish, Competition Law, Butterworths, London, 2001.
- Alison Jones and Brenda Sufrin, EC Competition Law, Text, Cases & Materials, Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Decisions of the European Court of Justice, www.curia.eu.int.
- Decisions of the Competition Council, www.competition.ro.

SOME CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE JURIDICAL REGIME OF THE ACCESSION

EMIL MOLCUȚ[*]
IONUȚ CIUTACU[]

Abstract:
The juridical institution of the accession derives its origin from the norms of the Roman private law that consecrated the criteria according to which a property is defined as being principal or accessory. In agreement with these criteria - of a patrician origin - a property was considered to be principal when it did not lose its individuality after the accessory was incorporated to it. This rule was taken over by the Romanian legislator since 1864. But, once the new Civil Code was adopted in 2011 a redefinition of the criteria concerning the two properties was specified: the most valuable property will be considered as principal; this redefinition will become the law for the mentality of a whole social category.

Keywords: Roman private law, accession (lat. accessio), Ancient Civil Code, New Civil Code, criteria of classifying the principal property and the accessory.

Introduction:

The main concern of this essay is about the juridical institution of accession (accessio) from the moment it was consecrated in the Roman juridical texts up to the moment when the Romanian law-maker adopted a New Civil Code. This juridical institution supposes the absorption of the accession by the principal property or, from this point of view the Romanian New Civil Code brings forth certain new elements concerning the accession, establishing new ways of defining the principal and the accessory property. This new element is very important, as the owner of the principal property will get - by virtue of accession - the ownership over the accessory asset. A deeper analysis of the provisions of the New Civil Code points to a certain alienation from the ancient Romanian juridical tradition - that was taken over by the provisions of the Civil Code adopted in 1864 - although the juridical form of its specificity was maintained in the chapter about the accession. Consequently, the factors determining a certain juridical regulation were changed.

The research envisaged by this essay raises a series of fundamental questions: which were the reasons that imposed the change of the factors determining the content of a juridical norm or, whom does this modification serve to? At the same time, our approach to the problem will prove its utility by underlining the aim of the new legislative policy in the domain of accession.

The analysis of the objectives in view is divided into four sections. The first section of the essay will deal with the Roman private law which had established the accession in agreement with the old Roman conception about ownership. The second section will devote to the analysis of certain norms from Andronache Donici's Juridical Manual, „Amendments to the Law" and from Calimah's Code, as to notice the modifications appeared, in the feudal age, in this domain. The third section will analyze the way in which the accession and the specification were defined in certain codes adopted in the modern and contemporary periods. The fourth section deals with the present juridical regulations, that is, with the Romanian New Civil Code. On this occasion, one can notice that the norms of the present regulations go toward another end meant to reflect the mentality of the important owners of capital.

[*] Professor, Ph. D., Law Faculty, Bucharest University.
[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Juridical and Administrative Sciences, "Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University, Bucharest (email: ionutciutacu@yahoo.com).

The adoption and enforcement of the New Civil Code, on October 1, 2011, is an important event as the new juridical regulation includes both the latest legislative innovations in the domain of the civil law as well as the results of the theories formulated by the specialized juridical literature. Yet, the researchers of the juridical phenomenon did not insist on the factors that determined the appearance and evolution of the juridical profile of the accession.

I. The accession in the Roman private law

The millenary evolution of the Roman private law is due to several elements. One of them is the ownership together with all the aspects it involves. The Roman jurisconsults sanctioned, to the lesser details, the juridical institution of ownership and, implicitly, the ways of acquiring it, as they understood the fundamental importance of how to protect ownership. It appeared to be a really necessary measure as the numerically larger the population and the more intricate and complex social relationship, the more the Romans were forced to conclude juridical agreements with the inhabitants of the cities, inclusively; that was the moment which generated the possible appearance of a new chapter in the Roman private law: the law of nations[1] to which the juridical institution of accession is owed.

In the everyday language, accession was given the sense of adjunction or mixture[2]. Nevertheless, the Roman jurisconsults envisaged this modality for obtaining the ownership. In their view, the accession meant the incorporation of the accessory thing into the principal thing, with no possibility for the latter to lose its own identity. In other words, the accessorial thing had to have the same fate as the principal thing in agreement with the rule of accesorium sequitur principale[3]. This modality was sanctioned by the Roman juridical texts for those situations in which the accession meant the unification of two immovables, of a movable with an immovable or of two movables. If speaking about the first situation, one can easily notice that the alluvion[4] and the strip of land torn off by the waters[5] can be considered accessory thing as reported to the riparian territory of the owner, which is considered to be the principal thing. In the case of the unification of a movable with an immovable the superficies solo cedit rule is applied, in the virtue of which the owner of the ground

---

[1] Aurel N. Popescu, trans., Gai Institutiones (Bucureşti: Editura Academiei RSR, 1980), 141-142; Vladimir Hanga, trans., Iustiniani Institutiones (Bucureşti: Editura Lumina Lex, 2002), 64-74.

[2] Ioan Nădejde şi Amelia Nădejde Gesticone, Dicţionar latin-român complect pentru licee, seminarii şi universităţi (Iaşi: Editura „Viaţa Romînească", 1927), 6; C. Accarias, Précis de droit romain, tome premier (Paris: Librairie Cotillion, 1891), 634; Constantin St. Tomulescu, Drept privat roman (Bucureşti: Tipografia Universităţii, 1973), 185.

[3] I. C. Cătuneanu, Curs elementar de drept roman (Cluj-Bucureşti: Editura „Cartea Românească", 1927), 246; D 6. 1. 23. 4-6; D 41. 1. 26. 1.

[4] „But, in agreement with the same law, it can also be ours whatever is added by alluvia; alluvion is another natural mode of acquisition. Alluvion is an addition of soil to land by a river, so gradual that at a particular moment the amount of accretion cannot be determined; or, to use the common expression, an addition made by alluvion is so gradual as to elude our sight." - Gai Institutiones II. 70.

„Moreover, soil which a river has added to your land by alluvion becomes yours by the law of nations. Alluvion is an imperceptible addition; and that which is added so gradually that you cannot perceive the exact increase from one moment of time to another is added by alluvion." - Iustiniani Institutiones 2. 1. 20.

[5] „Accordingly a parcel of your land swept away by a river, and carried down to mine, continues your property." - Gai Institutiones II. 71.

„If, however, the violence of the stream sweeps away a parcel of your land and carries it down to the land of your neighbour it clearly remains yours; though of course if in the process of time it becomes firmly attached to your neighbour's land, they are deemed from that time to have become part and parcel thereof." - Iustiniani Institutiones 2. 1. 21.

will get the estate for the building, irrespective of the fact that the building was erected with foreign materials[6] or by another person[7]. In case of the unification of two movables, the accessory thing will be incorporated to the principal thing so as to become its integrant part[8] even if the latter is less precious[9]. Later, together with the assertion of the school of Proculus, the Romans admitted that the picture painted on another's canvas can be considered as principal, because the painting made by a notable painter cannot be incorporated as an accessory to a less valuable painting[10] although, with no canvas the painting could not exist. This instant will become crucial in the evolution of the private law, as it is the first step in achieving a profound turn in the physiognomy of the juridical institution of accession.

II. Accession in the ancient Romanian Law

This juridical institution is often to be traced back to the origins of the ancient Romanian law. Among these, only the „Amendments to the Law", Andronache Donici's Juridical Manual and Calimach's Code are to be mentioned.

With the exception of the first regulation, the others define both the accession relatively to immovables and movables. To adopt the Juridical Manual of Andronache Donici and the Code of Calimach is considered to be an important step in the history of the Romanian law because, according to the French law, the chapter concerning accession will include dispositions specific to other juridical situations, as specification and mixture.

The „Amendments to the Law" regulates only that clause which refers to the unification of a movable with an immovable, borrowing from the Roman law the superficies solo cedit rule, because „any one who builds a house on an another's land on his own account, in as far as the wood and expenses are concerned, that person shall know that he is the one to administer the land and the house, as written in the law which says that the upper ones will be victorious over the lower ones"[11]. The same law will be taken over by the provisions of the Juridical Manual of Andronache Donici[12] [6] „If a man builds upon his own ground with another's materials, the building is deemed to be his property, for buildings become a part of the ground on which they stand." - Iustianiani Institutiones 2. 1. 29.

---

[7] „Again, a building erected on my soil, though the builder has made it on his own account, belongs to me by natural law; for the ownership of a superstructure follows the ownership of the soil." - Gai Institutiones II. 73.

„On the other hand, if one man builds a house on another's land with his own materials, the house belongs to the owner of the land." - Iustiniani Institutiones 2. 1. 30.

[8] Paul Frederic Girard, Manuel élémentaire de droit romain (Paris: Librairie Arthur Rousseau, 1924), 342.

[9] „On the same principle, the writing inscribed on my paper or parchment, even in letters of gold, becomes mine, for the property in the letters is accessory to the paper or parchment." - Gai Institutiones II. 77.

„Writing again, even though it be in letters of gold, becomes a part of the paper or parchment, exactly as buildings and sown crops become part of the soil, and consequently if Titius writes a poem, or a history, or a speech on your paper and parchment, the whole will be held to belong to you, and not to Titius." - Iustiniani Institutiones 2. 1.33.

„The canvas belonging to me, on which another man has painted, e. g. a portrait, is subject to a different rule, for the ownership of the canvas is held to be accessory to the painting: a difference which scarcely rests on a sufficient reason." - Gai Institutiones II. 78.

„Moreover, anything which is written on my paper or painted on my board, immediately becomes mine; although certain authorities have thought differently on account of the value of the painting; but where one thing can not exist without the other, it must necessarily be given with it." - Iustiniani Digesta 6. 1. 23. 3.

[10] „Where, on the other hand, one man paints a picture on another's board, some think that the board belongs, by accession, to the painter, others, that the painting, however great its excellence, becomes part of the board. The former appears to us the better opinion, for it is absurd that a painting by Apelles or Parrhasius should be an accessory of a board which, in itself, is thoroughly worthless" - Iustiniani Institutiones 2. 1. 34.

[11] Andrei Rădulescu et al., Îndreptarea legii (Bucureşti: Editura Academiei, 1962), 290.

[12] See the provisions of paragraph 2 title XXVI according to which „if someone will build a house on another's land, or build in the underground without any previous convention with the owner of the land, or will build something over another's building, then the owner of the land will become the owner of the built things."

and that of the Calimach's Code[13] in which there is establish the law according to which the owner of the land shall also become the owner of the building. The same ancient Roman rules will be applied in the case of the unification of two immovables[14].

The accession whose object deals with two movables is regulated in a very strange manner by the Code of Calimach, which will later be included in the content of the Romanian Civil Code that entered into force in 2011. According to this pattern, if any one has been working with another's materials and will mix his own materials with the other one's, he will not acquire the ownership over those things because, then when those things would be brought back to their initial status, each owner will regain his own thing or, the owners of those things will share them as co-owners, on the condition that the one whose things have been joined be retained or left to the other person. By an attentive analysis of these dispositions, one can easily notice that unlike the norms of the Roman private law which established different juridical situations[15], the same regime is supposed to be applied to more juridical institutions. This error is due to the fact that the Roman juridical texts considered them to be natural modalities for acquiring the ownership[16], while the members of the commission that drafted the dispositions of the Calimach Code erroneously considered that accession, mixture and specification will be submitted to the same juridical regime. These are the reasons why the fourth chapter of the Section concerning the real rights of the Calimach Code was entitled „Obtaining the ownership over properties through increase or addition" and title XXVI th of the "Juridical Manual" of Andronache Donici was entitled "On whatever is acquired beyond a natural equitableness."

Another novelty brought by this regulation is that of specification, in the chapter about accession. At a closer analysis one can notice that these dispositions are originated in the Institutions of Justinian which adopt an extra solution to the one suggested by Gaius - a jurisconsult devoted to

---

[13] In agreement with art 562 of the Calimach Code „if someone will willingly build with another's materials on his own land, then the building will remain his as mentioned in the rule: the building is submitted to the land it has been built on." In agreement with art 563 of the Calimach Code: „on the contrary, if someone with his own materials built something on another's land, then that building will be due to the proprietor of the land, in conformity with the following law: the buildings are subject to the place they have been built on."

[14] Pragraph 1 of title XXVI-th of the Andronache Donici's "Juridical Manual"; art. 551 and 552 of the Calimach Code - Constantin Hamangiu, Codul general al României. Volumul I. Codurile (București: Editura Librăriei Leon Alcalay), 1907.

[15] Valerius M. Ciucă, Lecții de drept roman, volumul I (Iași: Editura Polirom, 1999), 270.

[16] „The natural reason is also resorted to in other cases. On a change of species, also, we have recourse to natural law to determine the proprietor. Thus, if grapes, or olives, or sheaves of corn, belonging to me, are converted by another into wine, or oil, or (threshed out) corn, a question arises whether the property in the corn, wine, or oil, is in me, or in the author of the conversion; so too if my gold or silver is manufactured into a vessel, or a ship, chest, or chair is constructed from my timber, or my wool is made into clothing, or my wine and honey are made into mead, or my drugs into a plaster or eye-salve, it becomes a question whether the ownership of the new product is vested in me or in the manufacturer. According to some, the material or substance is the criterion; that is to say, the owner of the material is to be deemed the owner of the product; and this was the doctrine which commended itself to Sabinus and Cassius; according to others the ownership of the product is in the manufacturer, and this was the doctrine favoured by the opposite school." - Gai Institutiones II. 79.

„When a man makes a new object out of materials belonging to another, the question usually arises, to which of them, by natural reason, does this new object belong – to the man who made it, or to the owner of the materials? For instance, one man may make wine, or oil, or corn, out of another man's grapes, olives, or sheaves; or a vessel out of his gold, silver, or bronze; or mead of his wine and honey; or a plaster or eyesalve out of his drugs; or cloth out of his wool; or a ship, a chest, or a chair out of his timber. After many controversies between the Sabinians and Proculians, the law has now been settled as follows, in accordance with the view of those who followed a middle course between the opinions of the two schools. If the new object can be reduced to the materials out of which it was made, it belongs to the owner of the materials; if not, it belongs to the person who made it. For instance, a vessel can be melted down, and so reduced to the rude material – bronze, silver, or gold – of which it is made: but it is impossible to reconvert wine into grapes, oil into olives, or corn into sheaves, or even mead into the wine and honey out of which it was compounded." - Iustiniani Institutiones 2. 1. 25.).

the old patrician traditions - who promoted the idea that the newly obtained things belongs to the owner of the material. Since the social conflicts appear at the level of the juridical regulations, inclusively, the Justinian theory was taken over by the ancient Romanian law referring to specification[17], although the solution adopted by the members of the commission drafting the Calimach Code established the fact that the artisan will acquire the ownership over the material used in order to obtain a certain property[18].

III.Accession in the Ancient Romanian Civil Code

The three hypotheses of accession are also met with in the provisions of the ancient Romanian Civil Code. If, in the case of the natural accession to immovables, the ancient Roman conception was taken over completely, the substance of the artificial accession to immovables includes, for the first time, provisions regarding the possibility of the landowner to oblige the person who had built on his land to pull the building down[19]; this fact enables the builder to recuperate the ownership of the building materials, because, as long as the union exists, the right over the accessory thing is frozen. This situation is far from being accidental, as the law-maker adopts similar rules with regard to the accession to movable property as well, rules that allow the owner of these things to require the separation and the restitution, in case they are more valuable than the principal property[20]. Under these conditions, a serious violation from the finality in view was noticed, although the Romanian law-maker of 1864 established the criteria meant to make a distinction between the principal thing and the accessory one, according to the French model. Therefore, in conformity with art 567 and 569 of the French Civil Code of 1804 - whose content has been taken over by the Romanian law-maker[21] - it is considered to be principal that thing for whose usage, ornament or completion the unification with the other thing whose value is higher was necessary[22]. Nobody denies the usefulness of these regulations, but can we still speak about accession in case its thing is more valuable than the principal one, and consequently, its owner can claim it?

Analyzing the way the laws were adopted at the beginning of the XIX th century, the ancient Civil Code of 1864 erroneously[23] considered specification close to accession; in this way the concept referring to value plays an important role as, contrary to the Roman juridical texts, the artisan will acquire the ownership over a newly created thing then when the manual labour would greatly exceed the value of the used materials, even if that thing can or cannot resume its initial state[24]. So, beginning with this period we are the witnesses of a new wave of thinking in the domain of the ownership, thinking that will extend greatly in 2011, the year of the implementation of the New Romanian Civil Code.

---

[17] According to paragraph 5 of title XXVI of the Juridical Manual of Andronache Donici „when another's materials enter the composition of a thing[...] which cannot be separated without spoiling the material, then after paying for the materials, they remain to the owner of the land; yet, if the materials can be restored to their initial state, then the effort vanishes [...]".

[18] Art. 561.

[19] According to the provisions of art 494 paragraph. 1 of the Ancient Romanian Civil Code, if the buildings and the works have been made by a third person with his own materials, the landowner has the right to keep them or to oblige that person to take them away."

[20] Art. 506 of the Ancient Romanian Civil Code.

[21] Art. 505, 507.

[22] According to the provisions stipulated by art 507 of the Ancient Romanian Civil Code, if out of the two things united as to form one single thing none of them can be considered an accessory to the other one, it is considered as principal the one having a higher value. In case the value of the things is almost equal, the one whose volume is bigger will be considered the principal.

[23] Contrary to the French and Roman law-makers the Italian law-maker of 1942 mentions the specification alongside with other different modalities of acquiring the ownership.

[24] Art.508, 509 of the Ancient Romanian Civil Code; art 940 of the Italian Civil Code of 1942.

IV. Accession in the New Romanian Civil Code

The entering into force of the New Romanian Civil Code of 2011 stands for the materialization of the practices introduced by the Romanian law-maker in 1864. It is a certain fact that the effects of this policy will be also noticed in the domains of accession to immovable, adjunction and specification as mentioned by the provisions of the section devoted to the accession to movable.[25]

The new provisions concerning the artificial accession to immovable are definitely diverting from the ancient Roman regulations, as - by the provisions of art 581 and 584 of the Civil Code - they offer the possibility to the author of the work - irrespective of his good or bad faith - to buy the construction - at the request of the owner - at the price it could have if the construction had not been built. This situation is mentioned in a around about way by the provisions of art 584 paragraph 3 of the New Civil Code[26] that establishes the juridical regime of the useful adjunct work. It goes without saying that similar provisions will be applied in the case of autonomous works regulated by the provisions of art 581[27] and 582[28] of the New Civil Code; both laws stipulate similar provisions. This time, as usual, the economic reasons are considered more important that the final aim the juridical institution of accession had in view.

Moreover, it is not clear why the bad-faith author can derive profits from buying an immovable property at the market price it might have had if that construction had not been built.

The provisions referring to the accession to movable visibly estrange from the provisions of the Ancient Romanian Civil Code and from the norms of the Roman private law because, in case of the adjunction of two movable things, their owners can ask for their separation if by the separation the prejudice suffered by the other proprietor could be bigger than a tenth of the value of his own property. On the other side, in case this is not possible, the Romanian law-maker applies the rules from the domain of specification, according to which, depending on the value of the labour work or of the materials, the property will belong to the artisan or to the owner of the materials.

After a deep analysis of these provisions, one can notice that in the virtue of an old Roman mentality, accession will operate in favour of the owner of the more valuable thing (a trader) or of the one who produced it (the artisan).

---

[25] Book III (On Goods), title II (Private Property), chapter II (Accession), section IV of the New Romanian Civil Code.

[26] Irrespective of the good or bad faith of the author of the work, if its value is high, the ownership of the real property can oblige the author to buy it at the price the immovable would have been estimated at if the construction had not been done.

[27] „When the author of the autonomous work, having a lasting character over the immovable of someone else, is of good faith, the owner of the real property has the right to:

a) ask the court to register him in the land register as the proprietor of the work, if paying, according to his choice, the value of the materials and of the manual labour to the author of the work or the extra value added to the construction by improving it;

b) to ask the court to oblige him to buy the immovable at the price it might have had if the work had not been done."

[28] „(1) When the author of the autonomous work having a lasting character over the immovable of someone else is of bad faith, the owner of the immovable has the right to:

a) ask the court to register him in the land register as the proprietor of the work if paying, the author of the work according to his choice, half of the value of the materials and of the manual labour or of the extra value added to the construction;

b) to ask to court to oblige the author of the work to pull the construction down;

c) to ask the court to oblige the author of the work to buy the immovable at the price might have had if the work had not been done.

(2) The demolition of the work is done with observing the legal provisions in the domain, on the expense of its author who is at the same time obliged to repair all damages which also include the fact that the construction has not been used."

V. Conclusions

Society is the place where the interests of different social categories come into conflict, and the results of this conflict are more often than not reflected into the content of the juridical norms which represent the interests of the dominant class. The same conclusion is reached when analyzing the modality of how the juridical institution of accession developed. We do neither reprove the present material conditions that determine certain juridical regulations nor the usefulness of these regulations, because various social categories are interested to impose their own interests as juridical norms. Unfortunately, on this occasion, the representatives of these categories want the standardization of certain juridical aspects as to be able to find new juridical procedures meant to satisfy their own interests, even if they evidently depart from the real functions of accession. Given these realities, for maintaining the equilibrium between the law principles and the juridical institutions it is necessary the redefinition of the criteria according to which the property can be principal or accessory and it is useful to create new juridical institutions able to allow a harmonious inclusion of the new procedures of the juridical system.

References:

- Aurel N. Popescu, trans., Gai Institutiones (Bucureşti: Editura Academiei RSR, 1980), 141-142.
- Vladimir Hanga, trans., Iustiniani Institutiones (Bucureşti: Editura Lumina Lex, 2002), 64-74.
- Ioan Nădejde şi Amelia Nădejde Gesticone, Dicţionar latin-român complect pentru licee, seminarii şi universităţi (Iaşi: Editura „Viaţa Romînească", 1927), 6.
- C. Accarias, Précis de droit romain, tome premier (Paris: Librairie Cotillion, 1891), 634.
- Constantin St. Tomulescu, Drept privat roman (Bucureşti: Tipografia Universităţii, 1973), 185.
- C. Cătuneanu, Curs elementar de drept roman (Cluj-Bucureşti: Editura „Cartea Românească", 1927), 246.
- Paul Frederic Girard, Manuel élémentaire de droit romain (Paris: Librairie Arthur Rousseau, 1924), 342.
- Andrei Rădulescu et al., Îndreptarea legii (Bucureşti: Editura Academiei, 1962), 290.
- Valerius M. Ciucă, Lecţii de drept roman, volumul I (Iaşi: Editura Polirom, 1999), 270.
- Constantin Hamangiu, Codul general al României. Volumul I. Codurile (Bucureşti: Editura Librăriei Leon Alcalay), 1907.

THE COMMERCIAL POLICY OF THE EUROPEAN UNION - PART OF THE WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION POLICY

CLAUDIU-IULIAN FUEREA*

Abstract
The common commercial policy is a pillar for the external relations of the European Union. It is based on a set of uniform rules under the Customs Union and the Common Customs Tariff and governs the commercial relations of the Member States with Non-EU Member Countries. The EU has evolved during the process of globalization by aiming for the harmonious development of world trade and fostering fairness and sustainability. It actively encourages the opening of the markets and the development of trade in the multilateral framework of the World Trade Organization (WTO). At the same time, it supports developing countries and regions through bilateral relations with a view to involving them in world trade using preferential measures.

Keywords: The common commercial policy; European Union; World Trade Organization; Member States; globalizations

1. Preliminary considerations

Article 206[1] of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) provides that, "by establishing a customs union", the European Union is contributing "to the development (...) of world trade, the progressive abolition of restrictions on commercial international trades and direct external investments, and to the lowering of taxes and other barriers". It should be noted that the customs union, as stage of economic integration has been accomplished since 1968, being the result of the suppression of all customs duties between Member States of the European Community at that time, of the elimination of quantitative restrictions for intra-Community trade and not least, of the progressive implementation of a customs tariff[2], common in relation with third countries.

The common commercial policy (CCP) is one of the policies laid down since the establishment of the European Economic Community, being regulated even in the Treaty of Rome in 1957[3]. The purpose of this policy was and still is to contribute to the integration of national markets into a single market. This common commercial policy has been conceived because the free movement of goods and services in the European Union "could not be achieved through different national policies generating negative outsourcing"[4].

The fact that this policy is carried out by reference to principles and objectives of the Union's external action, must be taken into consideration. There is an exclusive[5] competence of the Union within CCP, meaning that the right of legislative initiative belongs exclusively to the European Union, so this field is one of those where Member States have agreed that, once they acquire the statute of membership, they have to give up their power to legislate. We should also mention that Member States can act within this trade policy only if they are expressly authorized by the Union institutions. Thus, we consider useful to present in short, the fields reserved for the European Union and those for which Member States are competent. In this respect, we take into

* Ph. D. Candidate, Doctoral School, Law Faculty, University of Bucharest (email: claudiu-iulian.fuerea@drept.unibuc.ro).

[1] Former art. 131 of the Treaty on European Community (TEC).

[2] By establishing the common customs tariff, the free trade area has been transformed into the customs union.

[3] The Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (TCEE), which entered into force in 1958.

[4] Adrian Dobre, "The European Union's common commercial policy*"*, Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p.71.

[5] Under article 3paragraph (1) letter e) TFEU.

consideration, first, art. 207[6] TFEU, that we can consider the "core text"[7], in terms of explicit powers. According to the article cited, the scope of exclusive competence of the EU common commercial policy is extended, namely: changes in tariff rates, tariff and trade agreements on trade in goods and services, commercial aspects of intellectual property, foreign direct investments, uniformity in measures of liberalization, export policy and measures to protect trade (especially dumping and subsidies). It results from the text analysis that the free movement of persons, in their capacity as traders, is not included in the scope of exclusive competence, which leads us to appreciate that the Union can not conclude international agreements which do not have as exclusive object, the commodities. The trade liberalization is not limited, naturally, only to goods. Services may be taken into consideration by the common commercial policy, being, thus, within the exclusive competence of the Union; however, as outlined in the specialized literature, "in the agreements negotiated, the services are considered commodities"[8].

Without going into further details, we notice that the doctrine in the field mentioned has identified, in addition to this exclusive jurisdiction, also the possibility of implicit powers of the Union, taken from art. 207 TFEU[9]. The issue of implicit powers of the Union arose at the same time with the gradual development of the secondary legislation in the common commercial policy. Regulations, directives and decisions may give rise to restrictive common legal rules that could be implemented only if Member States kept the freedom to negotiate. Considering, however, that the legislative harmonization is still partial, the possibility of concurrent jurisdictions for states and the Union, in matter of negotiating, should be analyzed. The more difficult is to determine parts of an international agreement which correspond to a complete harmonization within the Union, the more complex the situation is. In notification no. 1 / 94, of 15 November 1994, the European Court of Justice (ECJ)[10] refers to the obligation of Member States to cooperate, as shown in article 10[11] of the Treaty establishing the European Community. According to the Court, "as the object of an agreement or a convention falls, partly, within the competence of the Community and, partly, within the competence of Member States, it is important to ensure a close cooperation between state and Community institutions, both in the negotiation and conclusion process, as well as in fulfilling their commitments. This obligation of cooperation stems from the requirement of a cooperative international unit representing the Community"[12]. The duty of cooperation, says the Court, is particularly imposed in the case of agreements, as those annexed to the Agreement of the World Trade Organization (WTO). Thus, in the absence of close cooperation, in the situation where a Member State had, within its sphere of competence, to be duly authorized to take retaliatory measures, but it considered that they were ineffective if they were adopted in the areas covered by The General Agreements on Trade in Services (GATS[13]) or by Trade Agreements on Intellectual [6] Former art. 133 TEC.

[7] Christian Gavalda, Gilbert Parleani, „Droit des affaires de l'Union européenne", 6e édition, Litec, Paris, p. 60.

[8] Augustin Fuerea*,* "European Business Law*",* second edition, Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006, p. 64.

[9] Christian Gavalda, Gilbert Parleani, op. cit., pag. 60-61.

[10] Currently, after the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon on December 1st, 2009, the new name of the ECJ is the Court of Justice. This, together with the Tribunal (T) and the Civil Service Tribunal (CST), are forming the European Court of Justice (ECJ).

[11] The current article 4, paragraph (3) of the Treaty on European Union (TEU). According to the article, "Under the principle of loyal cooperation, the Union and Member States respect and assist each other in carrying out tasks which are resulting from the Treaties. Member States shall take any general or specific measures to ensure the fulfillment of obligations under the Treaties or resulting from the acts of Union institutions. Member States shall facilitate the achievement of the Union's tasks and refrain from any measure which could jeopardize the attainment of its objectives".

[12] Section 108 of Approval no. 1 / 94.

[13] The General Agreement on Trade in Services.

Property Rights (TRIPS[14]), that state does not have, under the Community / EU law, the power to take retaliatory measures in the field of trade in goods, whereas in any case, this matter falls within the exclusive competence of the Community / Union. On the contrary, in the absence of the same close cooperation, if the Community / Union obtains the right of retaliation in the area of goods, but it is considered unable to exercise it, the Union becomes unable to take legal retaliatory measures in the areas covered by GATS and TRIPS, this responsibility falling within the jurisdiction of states.

Regarding this issue, article 207 TFEU, in paragraph (6) provides that the exercise of powers conferred on the Union, in the common commercial policy field "does not affect the delimitation of competences between the European Union and Member States and does not involve the harmonization of laws, regulations and administrative provisions of Member States insofar as the Treaties exclude such harmonization".

The role of the Union institutions within the common commercial policy is provided in the very Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, in paragraphs (2) and (3) of article 207. So, we keep in mind that in the case of negotiation and conclusion of agreements with one or more third countries or international organizations, the following procedure provided in article 218 TFEU is applied: the Council is authorizing the opening of negotiations, is adopting negotiating directives, is authorizing the signing of agreements and is concluding them. The Commission is giving recommendations to the Council for a decision authorizing the opening of negotiations. The negotiator's appointment or the appointment of the chief of the negotiating team falls within the same competence of the Union. Throughout negotiations, the negotiator may receive directives from the Council. It should be noted that negotiations are conducted in consultation with a committee appointed by the Union Council. The decision authorizing the signing of the agreement and, where necessary, its provisional application before its entry into force is adopted by the same Council, but at the negotiator's proposal. The Council adopts the decision regarding the conclusion of the agreement, after consulting the European Parliament. The latter issues its approval within a time limit which the Council may set depending on the urgency of the matter. In the absence of a notification elaborated within that period, the Council may decide. It should be noted that for the conclusion of an agreement, the Council can authorize the negotiator to approve, on the Union's behalf, modifications to the agreement if it provides that these modifications must be adopted, under a simplified procedure or by a body set up by that agreement. The Council may attach specific conditions to such authorization. During the procedure, the Council decides by qualified majority. Also, we mention that a Member State, the European Parliament, the Council or the Commission may obtain the approval of the Court of Justice, on the compatibility of an agreement complying with provisions of the Treaties. In the case of a negative notice of the Court, the agreement can enter into force after its amendment or after the review of Treaties.

There is however provided, an exception to this procedure, in article 207 paragraphs (3) - (6) TFEU. Unlike the usual procedure, in this case, the Commission is the one which shall make recommendations to the Council, authorizing it to open the necessary negotiations. The Council and the Commission are responsible to make sure that the agreements negotiated are compatible with internal Union policies and rules. These negotiations are conducted by the Commission, in consultation with a committee specially appointed by the Council to assist it in this mission, and complying with directives that the Council might give. The Commission shall report regularly to the European Parliament, on the progress of negotiations. For the negotiation and conclusion of agreements with one or more third countries or international organizations, the Council decides by qualified majority. For the negotiation and conclusion of agreements on trade in services and commercial aspects of intellectual property, as well as in foreign direct investments, the Council shall act unanimously where such agreements include provisions for which unanimity is required, for the adoption of internal rules. The Council shall also unanimously decide for the negotiation and conclusion of agreements in the following areas: trade in cultural and audiovisual services, where these agreements risk prejudicing the Union's cultural and linguistic diversity; trade in social, education and health services, where these agreements risk seriously disturbing the national organization of such services and prejudicing the responsibility of Member States to deliver them. The negotiation and conclusion of international agreements in the field of transport are covered by article 218 TFEU.

[14] The Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights.

2. The European Union strategy for a competitive common commercial policy

On October 4, 2006, the European Commission presents to the Council, European Parliament, Economic and Social Committee and Regions Committee, a Communication entitled "Europe's competitiveness in a globalized economy"[15]. The document aims to present the contributions that trade policy has in stimulating the economic growth and the creation of jobs in Europe. There are explained the ways in which, in a world economy that rapidly turns, can be achieved "a more comprehensive, integrated and forward-looking trade policy that contributes more to European competitiveness"[16]. The need to adapt the tools of EU trade policy to new challenges in establishing new partnerships is emphasized, and all to make sure that Europe remains opened to the world, but that other markets too remain opened to Europe. The Communication mentions also the existent relationships between policies applied in the Union, on the one hand and the extra unional space, on the other hand. Globalization has resulted, among others, in removing the distinction between internal and external policies, this aspect having a major influence on the external competitiveness of the European Union. Given these issues, the Commission presents an analysis of the grounds of trade policy and EU competitiveness, proposing also a number of steps to follow in order to implement a series of priorities to cope with globalization. Faced with these challenges, the European Union should strengthen competitiveness on the basis of transparent and efficient rules. In this respect, according to the Commission, the Union's competitiveness depends, first, on the existence of "sound national policies, namely"[17]: competitive market to promote competitiveness of European enterprises; economic openness (as opposed to protectionism, the opening to trades and international investments leads to competitive pressures that are profitable for innovation, new technologies and investment[18]); social justice (the Union must deal with the impact of opening markets, especially by accelerating the structural change resulting from the phenomenon of globalization). Also, the European competitiveness lies in the opening of markets, which requires that the trade policy focuses on the following: non-tariff barriers, access to resources and new sectors of growth, intellectual property rights, services, investment, public markets and competition.

To achieve these goals, the Commission proposes an action program for the revival of external competitiveness of the European Union which is structured on two pillars, namely: the internal pillar and the external pillar.

A. The internal pillar. Starting from the reality according to which European companies should benefit from the EU competitiveness, citizens should acquire a number of advantages, and the Lisbon strategy represents the cornerstone of EU competitiveness. The European Commission presented in May 2006, the Communication entitled "A project for citizens", in which it proposed a thorough examination of the single market in order to ensure competitiveness of companies through diversification, specialization and innovation.

According to the Commission, the developing process of EU policy must take into consideration its ability to meet existing challenges worldwide. A special importance is attributed to

[15] COM (2006) 567 final (not published in the Official Journal of the European Union) - available on the website: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2006:0567:FIN:FR PDF.

[16] COM (2006) 567 final, p. 2.

[17] http://europa.eu/legislation_summaries/external_trade/r11022_fr.htm.

[18] Idem.

developing an international legal tool or a coherent European tool to conduct international and bilateral cooperation. Given the effects of the markets opening, the Commission and Member States must ensure that European citizens[19] benefit of special import prices. The common customs system should also be modernized, being proposed in this respect, the revision of the Customs Code and the introduction of electronic customs systems (e-customs).

B. The external pillar. Externally, the Union must commit itself to accept and implement the "multilateralism"[20], which provides the means to eliminate barriers to trade, in a stable and sustainable manner. An important role is attributed to the relationship that the European Union must develop with the World Trade Organization. Consistent with the idea promoted by the Communication, the Commission considers that the Union should promote the trade liberalization in bilateral relations, through free trade agreements, highlighting that such agreements have the advantage of being able to cover areas not regulated by an international legal instrument or by WTO.

The Commission considers that transatlantic trades are the core of EU bilateral relations, especially in overcoming global challenges. Meanwhile, China is a very important partner, offering opportunities of economic growth and jobs.

The aspects referring to efforts of intellectual property rights are not omitted; these efforts should result in the conclusion of bilateral agreements, in particular, asserts the Commission, with Russia, China, Korea, Mercosur, Chile, Ukraine and Turkey.

The market access strategy (strategy dating from 1996, but that is to be renewed), as well as the trade defense instruments are also brought into discussion; the public markets of third countries should be opened to European suppliers.

Another important document for our analysis is another Communication of the European Commission, namely the "External Dimension of the Lisbon Strategy for Growth and Employment"[21], presented on 16 December 2008. The Communication has as objective to provide better opportunities for EU companies in third countries and brings together external and internal policies. At the same time, the Communication is the first annual report on the access to markets, offering a perspective on the main existing barriers. Removing barriers will require, according to the Commission, "a strong expression, in one voice, of European commercial interests. The success of EU actions will continue to depend largely on the seriousness of the commitment of all stakeholders"[22]. Removing barriers to trade requires a coherent and targeted action. "The European Union must use all these tools strategically and ensure a better integration of foreign policy agenda for trade-offs and win-win solutions for all parties involved. The regulatory cooperation offers further benefits not only in terms of access to markets, but also in areas such as consumer protection, improving environmental standards and the collection of basic information needed to develop legislation and to reduce the cost of enterprises"[23]. The Communication defines ways to remove the regulatory barriers and to improve the access to markets, to generate economic growth and create jobs. These efforts must be followed by further development of the Lisbon Strategy for Growth and Employment after 2010.

In summarizing the main steps of the European Commission, to relaunch the common commercial policy, in the context of the Union strategy for Europe's competitiveness, one can not omit the Communication of 18 April 2007 entitled "Global Europe: a stronger partnership to deliver

[19] COM (2006) 211 final.

[20] http://europa.eu/legislation_summaries/external_trade/r11022_fr.htm

[21] COM (2008) 874 final (not published in the Official Journal of the European Union), available on the website http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2008:0874:FIN:RO: PDF

[22] COM (2008) 874 final, p. 15.

[23] Idem.

market access for European exporters"[24]. The Communication conclusions underline that "a stronger partnership for better access to the market is an essential component of the Global Europe strategy and a significant contribution to the Lisbon agenda for growth and employment. European companies - from strong global companies to large SMEs and developing SMEs- are struggling to succeed on global markets. A strong market access policy is a key function of the common commercial policy and a key area where the European Union can deliver real economic benefits for its Member States and for the European citizens and businesses. The European Union policy of 1996 should be strengthened and adapted to the changing global economy where markets to which we pursue to have access and barriers that prevent this are changing"[25]. At the end of the document, we find several proposals of the Commission, of which we mention the following: establishing a stronger relationship between the Commission, Member States and EU companies, in order to directly support businesses in overcoming specific difficulties that they are facing with, when they have access to third country markets, in a manner and framework consistent with the commercial reality; decentralizing the current system and encouraging the local initiative in third countries, by establishing local teams of EU market access which include representatives of delegations of the Commission, of embassies of Member States and of business organizations; restoring the database on the European Commission's market access; improving efficiency and transparency in the Commission's analysis of complaints about trade barriers, including a new streamlined system for registering complaints, etc.

3. The place and role of European Union's common commercial policy in relation to WTO

Established in 1995, as successor of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), the World Trade Organization aims to liberalize trade in goods and services worldwide. In retrospect, we see that, immediately after the Second World War, negotiations were launched, among other things, on establishing a United Nations institution dedicated to trade on the one hand, and to the lowering of customs barriers, on the other hand. In this respect, Havana Charter was signed in 1948 and it provided the establishment of a World Trade Organization; the Charter had never entered in force because of the failure of many countries (especially the U.S.) to ratify it. However, in October 1948, 23 states signed the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, Agreement which was aiming at reducing tariffs. It should be mentioned that this agreement has never been established as an international organization. During 1947-1994, the main activity of the GATT was to organize multilateral trade negotiations for global trade liberalization. Since the entry into force of the GATT and up until the establishing of the WTO, there were eight rounds of negotiation. The first five rounds, conducted between 1947 and 1967, had been focused specifically on the suppression of quantitative restrictions and on reducing tariffs.

At the moment of conclusion of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community[26], Member States[27] had already been bound by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. "They could not evade the existing obligations to third countries, as consequence of an act passed between them. The intention of Member States to meet commitments of the General Agreement was manifested, in particular, in art. 110[28] of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (TCEE), containing an affiliation to Community objectives of the General Agreement, and in art. 234[29] paragraph (1) which provided that rights and obligations arising from

[24] COM(2007) 183 final (not published in the Official Journal of the European Union) – available on the website: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2007:0183:FIN:RO:PDF

[25] COM (2007) 183 final, p. 10.

[26] 1957.

[27] France, Germany, Italy, Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg.

[28] The current art. 206, the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU).

[29] The current art. 351 TFEU.

agreements concluded before the entry into force of the Treaty, in particular from the multilateral agreements concluded with Member States, were not affected by the Treaty provisions. The Community has assumed, gradually during the transitional period, and totally at the end, pursuant to article 111[30] and article 113[31] of the Treaty – the specific competences of the tariff and trade policy. By entrusting those duties to the Community, Member States were expressing their will to subject it to contractual obligations, under the General Agreement. Since the entry into force of the EEC and, in particular since the implementation of the common external tariff, the transfer of power, occurred between Member States and the Community, has resulted in different ways, under the General Agreement and has been recognized by other contracting parties. In particular, from this period, the Community, acting through its own institutions, has become a partner in tariff negotiations and part of agreements of any kind, concluded under the General Agreement, in accordance with article 114[32] of the EEC Treaty providing that tariff and trade agreements "are concluded on behalf of the Community"[33]. Since the Community has assumed, under the EEC Treaty, powers previously exercised by Member States in applying the General Agreement, the provisions of this agreement have the effect of creating obligations for the Community.

Thus, with the ruling by the Court of Justice of the European Community, in the case International Fruit[34], the European Economic Community and now, the European Union, became party of the GATT. As a consequence, the Community is a founding member of this international organization, which is the WTO.

As it can be observed, the European Union played an important role in the negotiations on trade liberalization, especially in the Doha Round, which began in 2001. The purpose of those negotiations was to reduce tariffs and remove other barriers to the world trade. "The Doha negotiations were slowly advancing. Persistent differences between rich and poor countries were emerging, on the mutual access to markets and on the much discussed issue of agricultural subsidies. Many crises appeared during negotiations. (...) The European Union was actively involved in order to make of Doha Round a success"[35]. The Union believes that the WTO system based on rules constitutes a guarantee of legal certainty and transparency in the carrying out of international trade. The WTO sets rules under which its members can defend themselves against unfair practices like dumping, whereby exporters compete with local rivals. Also, the WTO provides the legal framework for solving disputes.

Assuming that trade rules are multilateral, but the trade itself is bilateral, the European Union, in addition to its participation in the Doha Round and previous rounds of negotiations in the WTO, has developed a network of bilateral trade agreements with countries and regions around the world. The Union has also concluded partnerships and cooperation agreements with countries of the Mediterranean Basin and Russia and other republics of the former Soviet Union. On the contrary, the Union has not concluded specific trade agreements with its major trading partners among the developed countries, like USA and Japan. Trade relations with them are based on WTO mechanisms, although in some sectors, there are many agreements between the EU and the two countries. The WTO framework also applies to trades between the European Union and China, which joined the organization in 2001. Currently, China is the second commercial partner of the Union, after the United States of America[36].

---

[30] Currently, repealed by the Treaty of Maastricht in 1992.
[31] The current art. 207 TFEU.
[32] Currently, repealed by the Treaty of Maastricht.
[33] ECJ Judgement of 12 December 1972, International Fruit, Joined Cases 21 - 24/72.
[34] Cited above.
[35] http://europa.eu/pol/comm/index_ro.htm
[36] According to http://europa.eu/pol/comm/index_ro.htm

By Decision 94/800/CEE[37], the following multilateral agreements and acts were approved on behalf of the Community, regarding the share of competence of the European Community:

- the Agreement establishing the World Trade Organization;
- the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in 1994 (which also included the one in 1947);
- the Agreement on agriculture;
- the Agreement on the application of sanitary and phytosanitary measures;
- the Agreement on textiles and clothing;
- the Agreement on technical barriers to trade;
- the Agreement on measures relating to investment and trade relations;
- the Agreement on anti-dumping measures;
- the Agreement on customs evaluation;
- the Agreement on pre-shipment inspection;
- the Agreement on rules of origin;
- the Agreement on import licensing procedures;
- the Agreement on subsidies and countervailing measures;
- the Agreement on safeguard measures;
- the General agreement on services (GATS);
- the Agreement on trade related aspects of intellectual property rights (TRIPS), including trade in counterfeit goods;
- the Agreement on trade in civil aircraft;
- the Agreement on public procurement;
- the International Agreement on the dairy sector[38];
- the International Agreement on beef[39].

The main objectives of the European Union activity in the World Trade Organization are: "the opening of markets for goods, services and investments in accordance with clear rules and consistent with a timetable, to enable their implementation in all countries; the transformation of the World Trade Organization into a more open, more accountable and more effective entity, by engaging in discussions with other groups and organizations; totally including developing countries in the decision-making process within the World Trade Organization, helping them, thus to integrate into the world economy[40].

4. Conclusions

The core material for the common commercial policy is given by articles 3 and 207 TFEU. The first confers exclusive competence on the European Union, while the second provides that "the common commercial policy is based on uniform principles, particularly in regard to changes in tariff rates, tariff and trade agreements on trades in goods and services and commercial aspects of intellectual property, foreign direct investments, uniformity in measures of liberalization, export policy and measures to protect trade, such as those to be taken in the event of dumping or subsidies".

We mention that Romania, as Member State, with absolute rights and obligations of the European Union from January 1st, 2007, must know and comply with the Union provisions, in matters of common commercial policy, mainly by undertaking not to implement divergent policies

[37] Council Decision 94/800/EC of 22 December 1994 concerning the conclusion, on behalf of the European Community, regarding matters within its competence, of agreements reached during the multilateral trade negotiations in the Uruguay Round (1986-1994), published in the Official Journal of the European Community L336 / 1 of December 23, 1994.

[38] Repealed in 1997.

[39] Idem.

[40] ,"Trade and Development Policy*"*, the European Institute of Romania, series Micro monographies - European Policies, 2005, p. 11.

from those of the Union, unless it is authorized, expressly for this purpose, by European Union institutions.

The new priorities of the European Union's common commercial policy are necessary to relaunch European competitiveness and to identify opportunities created by international openness. These new perspectives are included in several action programs initiated by the European Commission. The common commercial policy will be able to meet the objectives of growth and employment from the Lisbon Strategy, while facing the challenge of globalization.

In conclusion, we maintain the assertion that, currently, the World Trade Organization is the core of the international system based on rules governing the world trade.

References:

- Dobre, Adrian, "The European Union's common commercial policy", Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010;
- Fuerea, Augustin*, "European Business Law",* second edition, Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006.
- Gavalda, Christian; Parleani, Gilbert, „Droit des affaires de l'Union européenne", 6e édition, Litec, Paris, 2010.
- Council Decision 94/800/EC of 22 December 1994 concerning the conclusion, on behalf of the European Community, regarding matters within its competence, of agreements reached during the multilateral trade negotiations in the Uruguay Round (1986-1994), published in the Official Journal of the European Community L336 / 1 of December 23, 1994.
- COM (2006) 567 final (not published in the Official Journal of the European Union) - available on the website: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2006:0567:FIN:FR PDF
- COM (2006) 211 final.
- COM (2008) 874 final (not published in the Official Journal of the European Union), available on the website http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2008:0874:FIN:RO: PDF
- COM(2007) 183 final (not published in the Official Journal of the European Union) – available on the website: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2007:0183:FIN:RO:PDF
- http://europa.eu/legislation_summaries/external_trade/r11022_fr.htm
- ECJ Judgement of 12 December 1972, International Fruit, Joined Cases 21 - 24/72.
- http://europa.eu/pol/comm/index_ro.htm
- , "Trade and Development Policy", the European Institute of Romania, series Micro monographies - European Policies, 2005.

SEVERAL OBSERVATIONS REGARDING THE REGULATION OF THE CONTRACT OF PARTNERSHIP IN THE NEW CIVIL CODE

IOLANDA-ELENA CADARIU-LUNGU*

Abstract

Following the model of the Italian Civil Code, of the Civil Code from Quebec, the Swiss and the Dutch ones, the new Romanian Civil Code has adopted the monist conception of regulating the private law relationships, gathering in the same normative act traditional civil law dispositions as well as dispositions that are specific to the commercial relationships among professionals.

In this regulating context, one of the fundamental changes the new Civil Code brings is the unification of the legal regime applicable to civil and commercial contracts, with all the consequences that derive from this new legislative approach.

This fundamental modification is first determined by the profound change of the character of social, economic and juridical relationships, by the change of the cultural level of the Romanian society, by the closeness of the two branches of civil and commercial law and, last but not least, by the evolution of the business environment.

In this line of thought, we can identify important changes in the matter of the contract of partnership which, as regulated by the new Civil Code, constitutes the common law both for the simple partnerships (former civil societies) as well as for the commercial companies, to which the special legislation still in force in the matter still applies.

In this study we aimed at analyzing the general common features of all associative forms listed by art. 1.888 Civil Code and the new elements in the matter, with critical observations where needed, which take the form of a comparison with the specific legislation in the field from the Civil Codes that served as a source of inspiration for the Romanian legislator.

Keywords: monist conception, contract of partnership, simple partnership, commercial companies, liability.

1. Introduction

The adoption of a new Civil Code in our country was not only desirable, given the long period of time that passed since its latest regulation in 1864, that became rigid and obsolete, but also an imperative of the Romanian society in its entirety. The evolution of domestic economic, legal and social relationships, the exigencies of international exchanges as well as the European tendencies of a adopting a common contract law dictated not only a terminological modernization of the Civil Code, but also the modernization, even the fresh articulation of certain institutions or the adoption of some new ones, able to cope with the new realities.

Several attempts to re-codify and rearticulate the Romanian Civil Code have existed even before the 1989 Revolution[1], but they only materialized in 2009, through the adoption of the new Civil Code[2], that entered into force on October 1st 2011, drawing heavily on the Civil Code of Quebec[3].

* Senior Lecturer, Faculty of Law, "Petre Andrei" University, Iasi; lawyer in the Bar of Iasi; Ph. D. candidate "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: iolandacadariu@yahoo.com).

[1] Marian Nicolae and Mircea-Dan Bob, "La recodification du droit civil roumain en quête de modèle," Studia Iurisprudentia 2 (2008), accessed on January 25, 2012 at http://studia.law.ubbcluj.ro/articol.php?articolId=123.

[2] The new Civil Code was adopted by Law 287/2009 regarding Civil Code, published in the Offical Gazette no. 511 from July 24, 2009 modified and completed by Law 71/2011 for the enforcement of Law 287/2009 regarding Civil Law, published in the Official Gazette no. 409 from June 10, 2011.

[3] For similarities between the two Civil Codes, from Romanian and from Quebec, see Iolanda Boți and Victor Boți, "Codul civil din Quebec: Sursă de inspirație în procesul de recodificare a dreptului civil român," Studia Iurisprudentia 1 (2011), accessed on January 25, 2012 at: http://studia.law.ubbcluj.ro/articol.php?articolId=367.

The main modification of the new Civil Code resides in the unification of the private law norms (civil, commercial and family law) and their inclusion in a single normative act.

The monistic conception of regulating the private law relationships and the unification in a single legislative body of civil law and commercial law relationships constitutes therefore the central element of the new normative act. An important part of commercial legislation has thus been absorbed in the Civil Code; however, this absorption did not lead to the disappearance of commercial law as a law branch[4].

Unlike its Quebec relative, the Romanian Civil Code fails to include commercial companies in its sphere, providing only a short enumeration of these in art. 1.888 Civil Code, but further regulated by Law 31/1990 regarding commercial companies.

Under this regulation background, the contract of partnership is treated by the Civil Code as a common basis both for the constitution of commercial companies, which are still subject to special regulations, as well as for simple partnerships (whose regulations constitute the common law for all business forms) and other associative entities enumerated by art. 1.888 Civil Code. Art. 1.887 Civil Code also stipulates that "the hereby Chapter constitutes the common law in the matter of companies".

The contract of partnership has thus been given a new, modern and necessary regulation, the old (civil) contract of partnership included in the 1865 Civil Code being obsolete and unable to cope with the needs of modern society.

As far as civil partnerships set up based on the old Civil Code are concerned, in agreement with art. 139 line 1 of Law 71/2011 regarding the enforcement of the new Civil Code, these may transform at any given time into any of the partnership structures enumerated by art. 1.888 Civil Code or regulated by other special normative acts, with the observance of their conditions.

In the present study we aimed at analyzing several aspects related to the regulation of the contract of partnership contained in the new Civil Code: the classification of partnerships, the means of gaining legal entity, the form of the contract of partnership, the social contribution, the relationship between the shareholders and the partnership as well as the relationship between shareholders and third parties, on one hand, and the relationship between the partnership and third parties, on the other hand, culminating with the termination of the contract of partnership due to its nullity.

2. Regulation of the contract of partnership

The Civil Code defines the contract of partnership as the contract by which "two or more individuals are mutually bound to cooperate in order to conduct an economic activity and to contribute to it by monetary or asset contributions, scientific knowledge or services, in view of sharing the benefits or make use of the profit that might exist". The definition given by art. 1.881 line 1 Civil Code for the contract of partnership is school-like and very didactic, making reference to all the characteristic elements of association: affectio societatis, the contributions of the shareholders and the means of contributing, as well as the sharing of the benefits resulted from the commonly conducted activity.

The 1864 Civil Code used to define the contract of partnership in a more simplistic manner, but also containing all the three elements that are characteristic to a company: affectio societatis ("two or more individuals agree to share…"), the contribution ("to make a joint contribution") and the splitting of benefits ("in view of sharing the benefits that might derive").

The definition provided by the new Civil Code is similar to the definition found in the Civil Code from Quebec, where art. 2186 line 1 stipulates: "a contract of partnership is a contract by which the parties, in a spirit of cooperation, agree to carry on an activity, including the operation of an enterprise, to contribute thereto by combining property, knowledge or activities and to share any resulting pecuniary profits[5]".

[4] For arguments in this sense, see Stanciu D. Cărpenaru, "Dreptul comercial în condițiile Noului Cod civil," Curierul Judiciar (2010), accessed on January 25, 2012 at: http://curieruljudiciar.ro/2010/11/09/dreptul-comercial-in-conditiile-noului-cod-civil.

The quality of shareholder can belong to any individual or legal entity[6], unless the law stipulates otherwise. The partnership may be formed between spouses or between spouses and other individuals[7]. The common property may constitute contribution only with the express agreement of the other spouse. (art. 1.882 line 1 corroborated with art. 349 line 1 Civil Code), under the sanction of relative nullity stipulated by art. 347 line 1 Civil Code.

Besides the specific elements for the validity of the contract of partnership (affectio societatis, the shareholders' contributions and the sharing of the profits resulting from the common activity), the contract of partnership must also comply with the general fundamental conditions any contract must observe (the contracting parties should have full ability of exercise, the agreement should be validly expressed, the object must be determined, legal and in agreement with public order and morality, and the cause should be legal and moral).

3. Forms of partnerships

According to art. 1.888 Civil Code, depending on their form, partnership may be:

a)simple;
b) in participation;
c)general partnership;
d) limited partnership;
e)with limited liability;
f) joint stock;
g) limited partnership on shares;
h) cooperatives;
i) other types of company specifically regulated by law.

According to art. 1.887 line 2 Civil Code „the law may regulate other types of partnerships depending on the form, nature or business purpose". The partnerships set up based on special laws are still subject to them with regard to regulation (art. 138 of Law 71/2011 for the enforcement of the new Civil Code).

In the legal practice, the contract of partnership is to be met in various fields of activity: commercial companies[8], agricultural societies[9], professional societies of lawyers[10], notaries public[11], doctors or pharmacists[12], court executors[13], architects[14], associations in view of building residential buildings[15] etc.

4. The legal status of the partnership

Based on the new dispositions (art. 1.881 line 3 Civil Code) the partnership may be set up with or without legal entity. In order to gain legal personality, the shareholders must agree, either

[5] "Le contrat de société est celui par lequel les parties conviennent, dans un esprit de collaboration, d'exercer une activité, incluant celle d'exploiter une entreprise, d'y contribuer par la mise en commun de biens, de connaissances ou d'activités et de partager entre elles les bénéfices pécuniaires qui en résultent".

[6] Eugeniu Safta-Romano, "Unele aspecte mai importante ale contractului de societate civilă," Dreptul 2 (1992): 29; Dan A. Popescu, Contractul de societate (Bucureşti: Lumina, 1996), 150.

[7] Florin Moțiu, Contractele speciale în noul Cod civil (Bucureşti: Universul Juridic, 2011), 215.

[8] See Law 31/1990 regarding commercial companies.

[9] See Law. 36/1991 regarding agricultural companies.

[10] See Law 51/1995 regarding the organization and exercise of the lawyer's profession.

[11] See Law 36/1995 – The Law of public notaries and notaries' activity.

[12] Gov. ordinance no. 124/1998 regarding the organization and functioning of medical cabinets.

[13] Law 188/2000 regarding the organization and functioning of the activity of court executor.

[14] Law 184/2001 regarding the exercise and organization of the profession of architect.

[15] Dumitru Macovei, Iolanda-Elena Cadariu, Drept civil. Contracte (Iaşi: Junimea, 2004), 249.

using the contract of partnership or a separate act, on the constitution of a legally distinct partnership, in compliance with the law. In this instance, the partnership may only be set up in the form and under the conditions stipulated by the special law that grants it legal personality.

The simple partnership has no legal personality (art. 1.892 line 1 Civil Code). In the event the shareholders opt for a legal personality for their simple partenership, they may modify the contract of partnership, case in which they will expressly mention the legal form of the new entity and will harmonize all the clauses of the contract with the provisions of the applicable law.

The legal status of the partnership is gained only through registration in the Trade Register, starting with the date of incorporation, unless the law stipulated otherwise.

5. The form of the contract of partnership

Ad probationem the contract of partnership must be in written form, except for the cases when the law requires the written form for its validity itself. Thus, the contract of partnership must be done in writing, ad validitatem, when it serves as a basis for the creation of a company with legal personality (art. 1.884 line 2 Civil Code), otherwise the contract is sanctioned with absolute nullity. In this particular case, the contract of partnership should expressly indicate the shareholders, their contributions, the legal form, the object, the name and the address of the company. If the associates or some of them contribute with real estates, the contract of partnership must be authenticated, the dispositions of the land book register being also applicable.

The authentic ad validitatem form of the contract of partnership is also stipulated by art 5 line 6 of Law 31/1990 regarding commercial companies as modified by art. 10 of Law 71/2011 for the enforcement of the Civil Code. According to this article, the contract of partnership must be authenticated when:

a) among the assets contributed to the social capital there is a real estate asset;
b) when a general partnership or a limited partnership is set up;
c) when the joint stock company is set up by public subscription.

The Civil Code largely regulates the simple partnership, this form of partnership constituting the common law with regard to partnerships, the rules stipulated by the Civil Code for this partnership being also applicable to the other business forms.

6. The social contribution

The shareholders are bound to contribute to the formation of the partnership's social capital in the form of money or assets. In exchange for the contribution made, the shareholder receives shares in proportion to the contribution, unless the law or the contract of partnership stipulates otherwise.

The shareholders may also contribute with services or specific knowledge, in exchange for which they are entitled to take part in the share of benefits, losses and the decisional process in the company.

The obligation to make a contribution is valid for all shareholders, none being validly exempted from this obligation. The value of the contributions needs not be equal and nor the contributions should be of the same nature[16].

In case of cash contributions, in case of faulty non-execution, the shareholder owns statutory interest from the due date[17], as well as default interests.

Similar dispositions are to be found in Law no. 31/1990 regarding commercial companies, which stipulates, in art. 65 line 2, the obligation of the shareholder who is late in contributing with the social capital to compensate for the damages thus caused and the obligation to pay legal interest from the day the payment should have been made.

---

[16] Stanciu D. Cărpenaru, Drept comercial român (Bucureşti: Universul Juridic, 2008), 165; Dan Chircă, Drept civil. Contracte speciale (Bucureşti: Lumina Lex, 1997), 276.

[17] Liviu Stănciulescu, Drept civil. Partea specială. Contracte şi succesiuni (Bucureşti: Hamangiu, 2006), 174.

Similar provisions were mentioned in the 1864 Civil Code in art. 1504 line 1.

If the shareholder's contribution consists of an asset, it may be brought to the partnership either as property or by constituting another real right on it, or by constituting a right of use only. When the contribution consists in the transfer of the property right or any other real right on the asset, the shareholder's liability for the contribution is similar to the seller's liability towards the buyer, while in the event the contribution only has a right of use, the shareholder's liability is similar to that of the lender to the lessee.

In all situations the contribution is made by the transfer of the right on the asset and to the partnership and by delivering it in a good state of functioning for the use of the company.

According to art. 1.899 Civil Code the contribution under the form of services or specific knowledge is owed continuously for the duration the shareholder is a member in the company and takes place by the shareholder's performance of concrete actions and by making available for the partnership certain information in order to accomplish its goal, in the manner and under the conditions set forth in the contract of partnership.

7. The relationships between the shareholders and the partnership

The relationships between the shareholders and the partnership, as well as those between the partnership and third parties, must be regulated based on the general principle of good faith[18] established by art. 14 line 1 Civil Code, both regarding the exercise of rights and the execution of correlative obligations.

Art. 1903 line 1 Civil Code expressly stipulates the non-competition obligation on the part of the shareholders against the partnership, its breach triggering the culpable shareholder's liability and the obligation to pay for the damage thus caused. The shareholder must therefore refrain from conducting, either on his/her own name or on behalf of any other individual, a competing action or any other action that might cause damage to the partnership and to its interests.

In the event the shareholder bound to contribute with assets, services or specific knowledge to the partnership, he/she cannot take part on his/her own or on somebody else's account in an activity meant to deprive the partnership of these assets, services or specific knowledge.

The shareholder is entitled to use social assets only in the interest of the partnership and in agreement with their destination, without hindering the rights of the other shareholders. The use of social assets for one's own interest or the interest of somebody else may be done only with the express written consent of the other shareholders and, in the contrary case, the liability being not only to pay for the damage caused to the partnership, but also to return all the benefits resulting there from.

The shareholder may not have access to the monetary funds of the partnership in excess of a limit fixed for the needs of the partnership, the contract of partnership mentioning the right of the shareholders to take certain sums of money from the partnership for their personal needs.

In the event the shareholder incurred certain expenses to the interest of the partnership out of his/her own pocket, the shareholder is entitled to the reimbursement of the sums paid. The shareholder is also entitled to be compensated for the obligations or liabilities assumed while acting in good faith for the partnership's interest.

8. The relationships of the partnership with third parties

Art. 1.919 Civil Code, through its marginal note the „representation in justice", stipulates that the partnership is represented by its administrators with a right of representation or, in the absence of formal appointment, by any of the shareholders, except for the case when the contract of partnership indicates a right of representation for only some of them.

[18] See also Francisc Deak, Tratat de drept civil. Contracte speciale (Bucureşti: Actami, 1999), 474.

We believe that this article applies to all situations when the partnership enters legal relationships with third parties, the partnership being represented in all situations by its administrators or, in the absence of an appointment, by any of the shareholders, except for the above-mentioned situation.

9. The relationships of the shareholders with third parties

Social creditors will draw their debts from the shareholders' common assets. To the extent in which these assets are not enough to meet the creditor's demands, each shareholder will be personally liable in proportion to his/her contribution to the social patrimony.

With regards to the personal creditors of one of the shareholders, they will first draw their debts from the own assets of that particular shareholder and, to the extent these are not enough, they will be able to claim title on the debtor's assets brought as contribution to the partnership or to split the shareholders' common assets and attribute to the debtor shareholder its part of the community, having as consequence the loss of the quality of shareholder. (art. 1.920 line 1 Civil Code).

Art. 1.921 Civil Code validates the public transparency of the quality of shareholder. Thus, this article regulates a similar liability with that of a genuine shareholder for any individual who claims to be an associate in the partnership or who deliberately creates confusion to this purpose. Liability is only triggered against the third parties who actually were misled by the alleged shareholder. This article basically enforces the Roman principle error communis facit ius.

In order to trigger the liability of the false shareholder, the following conditions must be met:

a. the third party should have acted in good faith on the date the legal relationship was established (meaning that the third party who knew or even suspected the quality of the alleged associate will bear the risk of contracting a non-associate);

b. by his/her action, the alleged associated must have created to the third party a "convincing display"; the "convincing display" will be decided upon by the court in concreto from one case to another, taking into consideration the third party's experience and the concrete circumstances in which the alleged shareholder acted;

c. the alleged shareholder must have acted with the intent of misleading with regard to his/her quality. We believe that this condition springs from the use by the legislator of the word "deliberate" (art. 1.921 line 1 Civil Code refers to "any individual who claims to be an associate or who deliberately creates for third parties a convincing display…"). In other words, in this particular situation we speak about a third party's consent vitiated by willful misrepresentation

With regard to the partnership as distinct identity from the person of the alleged shareholder, it is not liable against the misled third party unless it provided sufficient reasons for the third party to consider the alleged associate as a real associate or, having knowledge on the misguiding actions, failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the misleading. The partnership's liability is therefore not triggered unless a fault or complicity to the willful misrepresentation committed can be associated to it.

The liability of the occult associate is regulated in a similar way with the liability of the apparent associate (art. 1.922 Civil Code).

The shareholders, regardless of the fact whether they are administrators or nor, are jointly and subsidiary liable in relationship with the partnership for all the damage incurred by third parties following the breach of interdiction to issue financial instruments (under the sanction of absolute nullity).

10. Termination of the contract of partnership as a result of the partnership's nullity

Besides the general nullity that deprives the contract of partnership of legal effects following the breach of certain validity conditions common to any other contract, the Civil Code also regulates a special nullity that arises exclusively as a result of a breach of the imperative dispositions applicable to the contract of partnership. The nullity of the partnership, as it is stipulated by art.

1.932-1.936 Civil Code is an express nullity that arises only under situations specially stipulated by law. For the other situations when an imperative norm contained in the chapter dedicated to the contract of partnership is breached and when the sanction of nullity does not result expressly and explicitly, the Civil Code introduces a new sanction (much debated on and denied after the code was enforced), namely to consider the contractual clause contrary to the imperative norms as not written (see for example, art. 1.902 line 5 and art. 1.910 line 5 Civil Code).

After thorough analysis of the chapter dedicated to the contract of partnership, we notice that the actual nullity of the contract of partnership (and, implicitly, of the partnership) intervenes only in a special case, namely when a partnership with legal personality is set up and the contract fails to comply with the provisions required by art. 1.884 line 2 Civil Code[19]. In such a situation, under the sanction of absolute nullity, the contract of partnership must be concluded in written form and must comprise mentions related to the shareholders, their contributions, the legal form of the partnership, the purpose, the name and its address.

Another case of nullity of the contract of partnership (only that this time we speak about a general nullity that is applicable to other legal operations) is the one stipulated by art. 1.882 Civil Code with the marginal note "Validity Conditions", which draws on art. 349 Civil Code which, in turn, draws on the sanction stipulated by art. 347 line 1 Civil Code. Corroborating the three legal texts mentioned above there results that the sanction of nullity (this time relative nullity) of the contract of partnership arises if one of the spouses, an associate in the partnership, contributes with a commonly held asset without the prior express consent of the other spouse.

Another situation when the contract of partnership is sanctioned with nullity (a nullity indicated by a special law and not in the Civil Code chapter dedicated to the contract of partnership) is when the nature of the asset brought as contribution to the constitution of the company imposes a certain form of the contract of partnership, that was breached. Art. 1.890 final thesis of Civil Code is relevant to this sense. This article needs however be corroborated with art. 5 line 6 of Law 31/1990 regarding commercial companies as it was modified by art. 10 of Law 71/2011 for the enforcement of the Civil Code, according to which the contract of partnership must be authenticated when among the assets contributed to the social capital there is a residential building. The same article of the companies' law stipulates the sanction of nullity for breach of authentic form when a general or limited partnership is set up or when the joint stock company is set up by public subscription.

The other cases of nullity expressly stipulated by the Civil Code chapter dedicated to the contract of partnership refers to legal acts that are subsequent and exterior to the contract of partnership, concluded by the shareholders or the partnership in conditions other than those required by law and which require a validly signed contract of partnership. The dispositions of art. 1.908 line 3 Civil Code are dedicated to this aspect, which, under the sanction of absolute nullity, forbid the shareholder to warrant personal liabilities or a third party's liabilities with social rights, without the prior consent of all the other shareholders. In this case, nullity targets the legal act by means of which the warranty was constituted, which is not legally binding, and not the contract of partnership in itself.

Another case of nullity that is extrinsic to the contract of partnership is the one regulated by art. 1.923 Civil Code with the marginal note "The interdiction to issue financial instruments", when absolute nullity targets both the legal acts concluded to this purpose and the financial instruments issued.

With regard to the regime of partnership nullity, we notice that this is a special one, with derogation from the general regime of the common law nullity. Thus, while the absolute nullity regulated in the general part of the Civil Code may be invoked by any interested party and even by the court and cannot be removed through confirmation, the nullity in the matter of the contract of partnership will be covered in the event the cause of nullity was removed before conclusions are drawn in front of the judge. The court required to assess or declare the nullity is bound to inform the parties on the possibility to modify the contract of partnership and set a reasonable period of time for this remediation, even if the parties disagree (art. 1.933 line 2 Civil Code).

[19] See also Cristian Gheorghe, „Nulitatea contractului de societate şi nulitatea persoanei juridice în noul Cod civil", Dreptul 6 (2010): 61.

We notice that the rules applicable to the partnership nullity are laxer, more flexible in general, being taken from the commercial law, the legislator's intention being that of saving the contract of partnership and not that of ruling it out.

It is worth mentioning the fact that these laxer rules only apply in case of the nullity of the contract of partnership and not in the other cases of nullity that relate to acts that are subsequent and extrinsic to the contract of partnership (the constitution of warranties without the agreement of the other shareholders, the issuance of financial instruments).

Another derogatory rule from the general regime of nullity targets prescription; in the matter of the contract of partnership, the prescription period for nullity, even absolute nullity, is within the general term of 3 years (except for absolute nullity for an illicit purpose of the partnership – art. 1.933 line 3 Civil Code).

The legislator also makes a derogation from the general rules of nullity with respect to the effects of nullity, meaning that this time nullity is not retroactive and the partnership ends from the date of the final court decision assessing or declaring the nullity (nullity therefore produces ex nunc effects and not ex tunc effects). As a result, the good faith third parties are not affected by the nullity of the contract of partnership, the legal acts concluded before remaining valid.

In the case of the relative nullity of the contract of partnership due to the vitiation of consent or incapacity of a shareholder, the regularization of the company has priority.

The Civil Code also regulates liability for the loss caused by the assessment or declaration or partnership nullity. The compensatory action has a prescription period within 3 years from the final court order assessing or declaring nullity.

In the event that nullity was covered as a result of a disappearance of the nullity clause, the compensatory action is prescribed within 3 years, calculated from the date nullity was covered.

11. Conclusions

We may state that, through the regulation of the newly adopted Civil Code, the contract of partnership has been brought to life once again, after a long hibernating period due to the obsolete approach of the 1864 Civil Code. The new approach is a modern, flexible one, meant to allow the enforcement of these provisions and associative norms of exercising a profession, in agreement with the European regulations in the field.

References

I. Treaties, courses, monographs

- Cărpenaru, Stanciu D. Drept comercial român. Bucureşti: Universul Juridic, 2008.
- Chircă, Dan. Drept civil. Contracte speciale. Bucureşti: Lumina Lex, 1997.
- Deak, Francisc. Tratat de drept civil. Contracte speciale. Bucureşti: Actami, 1999.
- Macovei, Dumitru, and Cadariu, Iolanda-Elena. Drept civil. Contracte. Iaşi: Junimea, 2004.
- Moţiu, Florin. Contractele speciale în noul Cod civil. Bucureşti: Universul Juridic, 2011.
- Popescu, Dan A. Contractul de societate. Bucureşti: Lumina, 1996.
- Stănciulescu, Liviu. Drept civil. Partea specială. Contracte şi succesiuni. Bucureşti: Hamangiu, 2006.

II. Articles

- Boţi, Iolanda, and Boţi, Victor. "Codul civil din Quebec: Sursă de inspiraţie în procesul de recodificare a dreptului civil român," Studia Iurisprudentia 1 (2011), accesat la data de 25 ianuarie 2012. http://studia.law.ubbcluj.ro/articol.php?articolId=367.

- Cărpenaru, Stanciu D. ”Dreptul comercial în condiţiile Noului Cod civil,” Curierul Judiciar (2010), accesat la data de 25 ianuarie 2012. http://curieruljudiciar.ro/2010/11/09/dreptul-comercial-in-conditiile-noului-cod-civil.
- Gheorghe, Cristian. Nulitatea contractului de societate şi nulitatea persoanei juridice în noul Cod civil, Dreptul 6 (2010): 59-68.
- Nicolae, Marian, and Bob, Mircea-Dan. “La recodification du droit civil roumain en quête de modèle,” Studia Iurisprudentia 2 (2008), accesat la data de 25 ianuarie 2012. http://studia.law.ubbcluj.ro/articol.php?articolId=123.
- Eugeniu Safta-Romano. “Unele aspecte mai importante ale contractului de societate civilă,” Dreptul 2 (1992).

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS OF JUDICIAL WILL REGARDING ITS LIMITS IN ECO – ECONOMICAL CONTRACTS

MIHAELA C. PAUL (MODREA)[*]
IOSIF R. URS[]
IUDITH IPATE[]

Abstract:
After a brief study of the contract legal concept we attempted to examine the essential elements of the contract - the agreement of will between parties.
The autonomy theory of will - which legally promoted contemporary, the concept of freedom of contract, we will analyze the concept in question, both over time and in last centuries when transformations of freedom of contract and contractual law have been most reliable, amplifying the ambiguity of the meaning of contractual freedom in the Romanian legal order and the number and diversity of doctrines that were interested in freedom of contract become substantial.
Economic and social realities experienced significant changes, which made the autonomy theory of will first to be put in question and then challenged, attempting to detect the judicial construction of the contract.

Keywords*: will, contract, autonomy, theory of will, limits*

Introduction:

In front of uncertainties and increasing complexity of the world, every individual should aspire to an additional awareness, wisdom in understanding its environment, in the sense that every manager of human organizations must be able to develop "intelligent actions" to cope with the complex systems of nature and especially of society.

This paper is devoted to a particular actual topic and represents now one of the most effective means of solving the eco- economic issue. The topicality of the issue results from the major tasks currently undertaken by the law science in order to address the issue concerning the protection of eco-economy.

Man needs a more environmental action. This can only be the result of everyone's will and this requires the development of individual consciousness.

If plants and animals adapt to the conditions offered by the environment, man has imposed its own will, adapting it to his needs and to those of society. As long as his interventions have not passed a certain threshold, below which the system had its own capacity to redress the ecological balance, there was no sign disturbing the relationship between the man as "exploiter" and the environment.

Man through his economical activity must resize his strategy for an environment close to equilibrium, in order to correct imbalances through a conscious activity.

The time has come to understand that man and societies are part of the biosphere and that they show and addiction to the resources it offers. Therefore degradation of the biosphere will have adverse consequences on the human species.

,, The will is the most important factor because it can dominate any other factor, provided it be reconciled with the life program; no hereditary influence, no pressure from the environment, nothing is more powerful than the will!''(Edgar Cayce).

---

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, „Titu Maiorescu" Univerity, Bucharest (project POSDRU no. POSDRU/CPP107/DMI 1.5/S/778082; email: av.mihaelapaul@yahoo.com).
[] Professor, Ph. D., „Titu Maiorescu" Univerity, Bucharest.
[] Dr. CS 1, Romanian Academy INCE „Constantin C. Kiritescu".

In human mental processes, the will have a special place, but it is not a separate process. It is always linked to thinking, representation, memory, learning, perception, sensation and attention.

Using the maximum principle of will autonomy as the freedom of the conventions, the traders did proceed to the formation of rules to facilitate their work, to increase speed and safety of the commercial operations.

In this sense, the modern contracting techniques have replaced the older modalities, creating standard contracts for form and general conditions for the fund.

The paper contains:

A true market economy, without any doubt, is supported in a considerable measure, by the regularity and fairness of legal relations between the partners within the extensive and complex process of production and circulation of goods, in the large field of services, with the purpose to satisfy the people's needs.

Such a fundamental goal can be achieved only if supported, especially the main act of birth, and fighting to achieve or to end those relationships – the civil contract.

An important legal instrument within the economic life, the contract has been known since ancient times. It became known on the territory of our country at the end of the eighteenth century and the first half of next century, by the Romanian rule; in the area of the former gold mines of Dacia during Trajan rule, at Alburnus Maior, around 50 coated tablets were discovered, out of which 25 were retained, and they were published in 1873 by the famous historian Theodor Momsen in his work, "Corpus inscriptiorum latinarum".

They contain the text of some civil contracts, unique in the world through the original conception in the art of writing.

„The Contract" of the Romanian law and the Greek„ synallagma" (today translated within the concept of synallagmatic contract) represents the origin of the great multitude and variety of contracts in the modern market economy.

The Middle Age Law developed the field by restricting the ancient contract formalism, and by approaching the priority related to the „ the free expression of human will "and by customizing commercial contracts compared to the civil ones .The Contract did not loose its importance not even today. It is the main source of obligations, offering the means to achieve the stability in human relations within the circulation of goods and values.

A significant Latin adagio, "contractus legem ex conventione accipiunt "(Contracts receive legal sanction from the agreement of the parties) highlights the parties' legal force materialized in this important legal document.

The basis of the contract - the theory of autonomy of will. Following the developments that have occurred since the late nineteenth century, political, economic and social realities have changed. The theory of the autonomy of will came into conflict with these facts, therefore, was put into question and even challenged. This is why attempts were made in order to find another basic concept of the contract. It was searched within the space of legal positivism doctrine. Thus, the following was proposed: the contract theory – objective legal situation; the theory grounding the common good contract and equity or the principles of social utility and commutative justice.

The contractual solidarity belongs to the same field, grounding the contracts and its effects on the relationship of solidarity between the parties, which work together to achieve common objective consisting of the sum of their contractual interests. The contractual solidarity agreement has significant consequences, from pre-contractual stage and then throughout its execution.

None of these theories is unanimously accepted. Therefore, this study concludes with the proposal to be built an eclectic theory, and from the contract's basic concept the following cannot miss: the will of the contracting parties, the solidarity relations arising between the parties due to contractual interest of each party, but undertaken by the other party, and the positive law, meaning the state norms which are imperative in this field.

The psychology represents the science that provides data and information needed in order to create the legal will. These data show a high degree of generality, of schematics and mobility, in order to be introduced in the middle of the, moving fluidity of life"[1].

In the field of Law, the role of the will has a double meaning on the one hand, the general will of the whole society or social groups, due to certain common interests, which tends to formalize through state activity, creating the state law, and on the other hand, the individual will expressed through law enforcement[2].

The legal is part of the components of legal consciousness.

Consequently, the legal will represents an attitude expressed by the subject by right, in order to participate to the completion of legal documents, where elements that lead to decision making to have such a conduct, are included.

The autonomy of will in the legal sense is identified with the principle of legal freedom [3].

The autonomy of will theory, inspired by the individualism that strongly marked philosophical thinking of the past centuries was transformed by the current realities in a real myth or dogma, as many authors deny to this theory the possibility to realize and to set the basis of the contractual freedom, due to the restrictions this freedom has suffered or it is still subject to.

Historically analyzing the concept of "autonomy of will", the Roman law did not know a principle of autonomy of will, as Roman law was strictly formalist, and therefore the existence of autonomy of will could not be recognized, without observing its external forms, in order to generate legal effects.

An idea supporting the existence of self-expression was promoted at the end of the late nineteenth century and it was produced as a direct result of the occurrence of the first signs of threat of its main consequences – contractual freedom – consisting of the development of new types of contract, different from the classic ones, as contracts of adhesion[4].

The classical contract considered in drafting the French Civil Code of 1804 representing an operation where "two persons with the same legal and economic power expose and discuss in a free debate their claims which they oppose, as they make concessions to each other and concluded an agreement where all terms are the wise and true expression of their common will", was followed by the emergence of a category of contracts of adhesion, drafted unilaterally by one party only, as defined by „ the unilateral will contract determining the economy of the contract where one of its elements, the adhering party's will, intervenes only to give legal efficacy of this unilateral will"[5].

For the undefined contracts when they were recognized as binding, "their legal value was resulting not from the fact that they represented agreements of will, but from the fact (independent of them) that a party had already performed a service, as they were relying on the principle of unjust enrichment and not on the common will".

The Will is subject to the law, because it could not be included within the counter-law or defiance of morality. The formalism specific to the Roman law was continued within the Roman and Germanic Law dominated by culture although its concrete manifestations suffered some changes[6].

---

[1] Tr. Ionascu, op.cit., pg. 261.

[2] I. Dogaru, Drept civil. Idei producatoare de efecte juridice /Ideas leading to legal efefcts, Ed. All Beck, Bucuresti 2002, pg. 740.

[3] A se vedea, J. Carbonier, Droit civil, Tome premier, PUF, 1955, p. 140; C. Hamangiu, I. Rosetti-Balanescu, Al. Baicoianu, op. cit, p. 91.

[4] V. Ranouil, L'autonomie de la volonte: Naissane et evolution d'un concept, Travaux de l'Universite de Paris, II, 1980. p. 656.

[5] G. Berlioz, Le contract d'adhesion, Ed. LGDJ, 1973, P.13 in Pascal Lotriec p. 60.

[6] R. Tison, op. cit. p.17-19. Thus, manifestations of „fides facta", „festuca" and „vadium" They were borrowed from the ancient French law, but in the same time they were replaced with the shake of hand and oath – gestures which still exist today, but without the same juridical content.

The principle „solo consensus obligat" didn't have the juridical valences that we give it nowadays. It didn't assign the autonomy of will – this matter having its origin in the practice of cannon law, which legalized the practice of the promissory oath[7].

The principle„ solo consensus obligat" rather represents the evolution from Roman Law formalism to the „Christianization of the law and of convention"

From the religious promissory oath to the secular one, there was just a step, apparently made by Grotius[8].

The same principle became to be used in order to explain the contract termination if promises were not kept; thus, the rule „ solo consensus obligat" will explain not only the contract conclusion or establishment , by also its achievement, regardless it was a named one or not.

The will was considered the unique source of justice. The Contract is not only a source of rights and obligations, but it also refers to the idea of justice, because only the contract by self-approved limitation – ensures the freedom of conscious will.

The contract is generally above the law, so the law cannot cut individual freedom, but as far as it facilitates to freedom of others.

The theory regarding the autonomy of will represent the basis of economic and political liberalism, and on the legal plan it determined the principle of contractual freedom. In these conditions, the western societies were less developed and the stated, minimally conceived, did not intervene in social-economical issues.

Briefly, the principle of contractual freedom can be concentrated in a few ideas: the basis of the binding force of contracts represents the will of the parties, the parties are free to determine the content and form of contract, the contract is binding for the parties and considered the „law of the parties"; the effects of the will agreement do not extend to the third parties, as that did not participate to the establishment of the legal relation[9].

According to the Civil Code, individuals or legal entities have the right to conclude contracts freely. The principle of the contractual freedom will be thus materialized.

The Civil Law recognized the contractual freedom – when interpreting the legal papers, the inner will of the contracting parties will prevail, the autonomy of will being very important.

In Commercial Law, the declared will prevails, by using written or printed documents, frame agreements. The Romanian Constitution does not expressly guarantee as a fundamental right or as a fundamental freedom or as a constitutional principle, the contractual freedom.

Any analysis of this concept comes against the trivialization of the notion itself referring to contractual freedom, by its metaphorical use and very rarely clarified by the consequences of the autonomy of will.

The Contract is the main source of obligations. Its importance as a means of establishing the various relationships between individuals and legal entities will be present in all fields, from the simplest needs of people, up to the professional business activities.

A contract is considered as concluded when the will is expressed by complying with the conditions of substance and form required by law, by making reference to the specifics of each contract.

The essential factor is the conclusion of the agreement of the parties – the legal will. The contractual freedom will be expressed from the perspective related to the form, within the rule regarding the consensus of the conventions, according to which in order to validate such a [7] R. Tison po. Cit. p. 19, by which God was conventionally valued in a double role.

---

[8] Grotius, Le droit de la guerre et de la paix, t.II, cap. XIII, Du sermet, Paris 1865, in the sens that the contribution of Grotius led to the secularization of natural law during his time and it was essential, see E. Gounot – *Le principe de l'autonomie de la volonte en droit priv*e, Dijon, 1912, p.3.

[9] Constantin Acostioaei, Note de curs - Elemente de drept pentru economişti/ Law elements for economists, Ed. All Beck, Bucharest 2004, p. 162.

convention, all you need is the agreement of the parties, unless we are talking about real or formal contracts and the obligations will be performed as undertaken, („pacta sunt servanda").

The basis of the principle of contractual freedom can be found in the so-called theory regarding the autonomy of will formulated by the French jurist Charles Dimonliu, who, in its drafting, took into consideration the necessity of finding some solutions for conflicts or laws of the province appeared in the 17th century France[10].

As the human will is free, the contracting parties, exclusively by their will cand give birth to a contract, took into consideration.

As a philosophical argument of this theory, it was said that "when people assume obligations through a contract, they limit their freedom by their own will… therefore individual will has its own power creating obligations from itself, not from the law and in this sense it is creative[11].

If discussing about the contractual freedom represents a sensitive step, even a risky one, the obligation to approach at least the most visible layer, remains legitimized not only theoretical, ethnically, but especially in a connotative and psychological plan: as long as the Romanian Constituent Party seems to have ignored this freedom, to talk about it largely represents to make it familiar.

Romanian specialized legal literature gives us some brief definitions of the concept of contractual freedom involving the same coordinates: contractual freedom is an abstract possibility circumscribed by the legal framework for both natural and legal persons, on the one hand in order to concluded contracts, meaning to engage in creating a contractual relationship, the contract establishing the actual content of this report, and on the other hand not to conclude a contract, meaning to refuse to engage in a determining contractual relationship.

Professor I.Albu considers[12] that contractual freedom represents „ the possibility of legal and natural persons, according to the law, to create contracts and to establish their content".

Another Romanian authors[13] argues „ that contractual freedom can result in the possibility to create a contract according to the parties' will, but also by refusing to concluded a contract". If any contract is justified by itself and the obligation arises from the parties' will, it is normal that they can determine the content[14] and the expression form of their legal will.

The most important field of application of the principle regarding the autonomy of will is therefore the contractual aspect, where we deal with two types of contracts: named or unnamed. This classification is very important from the viewpoint of the study, because contractual freedom is much higher in the unnamed ones. If within the named contracts the will of the parties is limited by other legal provisions, within those unnamed, the parties are free, with even the duty, to provide and detail the terms they desire.

The legal will and its limits within a contract.

Although the theory regarding the autonomy of twill theory could impose an absolute contractual freedom this has not happened and being limited all the time. In the Romanian law, the Civil Code provides no derogation by convention or private provision from public order and morals. The freedom of the parties is thus limited and their will must violate the above-mentioned legal texts. This is considered as the great principle of autonomy of will[15].

---

[10] I. Filipescu, Drept internațional privat/ Private International Law, Ed. Procardia, Buharest1993, p.88

[11] L.Pop, Teoria Generala a Obligațiilor/General Theories of Obligations, Tratat, Ed. Chemarea, Iași, 1994, p.31.

[12] I. Albu, Libertatea contractuală/Contractual freedom, Revista Dreptul nr. 3/1993, Buc, p.29.

[13] Gabriel Olteanu, Autonomia de voință în dreptul privat/ Autonomy of will in private law, Ed. Universitaria, Craiova 2001, p. 49.

[14] L. Pop, Tratat de drept civil. Teoria generala a obligațiilor/General Theory of Obligations, Ed. Chemarea Iaşi 1994, p. 60.

[15] C.Hamangiu, I.Rosetti-Balanescu, AL. Baicoianu, op. cit., p.30.

Mandatory rules. Depending on the conduct prescribed by law legal rules and devices are binding. The rules entities can not deviate from, being thus subject to such sanctions are imperative, and the onerative rules are those norms requiring a particular conduct or those prohibitive when they ban something[16].

Public order. Public order is defined in the Romanian law as: the political, economic and social order as regulated by the Constitution. Briefly, the public order is the state public policy [17].

The limitations to the autonomy of the will can be change in the same time with the change of the political opinions of the law making authority, and the breach of the imperative provisions which establish the political, economic and social order will be sanctioned with the absolute nullity.

Good Morals. In the Civil Code, the Romanian law making authority used the word "good morals". In this name were included the rules regarding the actual morals and also those regarding the public morals.

The good morals represent a new limitation of the freedom related to legal papers. An immoral or illicit cause has as a result the nullity of the civil legal paper, as it happened in the following cases:

- a decision[18] of the former Supreme Court established that, in the case when, contrary to the social life rules, a contracting party took advantage of the other party's ignorance or constraining state, in order to obtain benefits that are disproportionate compared to the performance the latter received, the respective convention cannot be considered as valid, as it was established on an immoral cause.

- when the applicant has followed the conclusion of the legal act with a manifestly immoral purpose, the reimbursement of the provided services is not accepted;

- the amounts requested by a Belgian surgeon in order to be sent to the Attending Physician cannot represent a remuneration, but a fee that the surgeon pays to the person helping him to have a patient. Such a practice was considered by the court as having an immoral cause, as its purpose was to introduce in such a profession a commercial spirit and consequently the amount of 20,000 Belgian francs was returned to the patient[19].

The autonomy of will in commercial contracts

In commonly used and simple commercial contracts, negotiation lacks completely. Currently, the commercial activity is described by the true expansion of the adhesion contracts. The stronger partner eliminates from the beginning the possibility of negotiation, the other party having only the freedom to accept or not the contract.

For the sale-purchase contracts, the general practice in the traders' activity is to display the price of the good, the buyer having no choice but to accept it. (Retail). In these cases, the autonomy of will is limited by "take it or leave it"".

The adhesion contracts can be also found in the insurance field, in the banking activity, in transportation or in electric and thermal energy supply contracts.

A specific enforcement of the principle related to the autonomy of will from a commercial point of view, is the principle of free competition. This consists of the freedom provided to the economic agents to freely use the means and methods to win and maintain the clients[20].

Some authors have used in order to define this attitude of the economic agents, the notion of competitive conduct[21].

---

[16] A se vedea N. Popa, Teoria generala a dreptului/General Theory of Law, Ed. Actami, Bucuresti, 1996, p.172.

[17] C.Hamangiu, I.Rosetti-Balanescu, AL. Baicoianu, op. cit., p.91.

[18] Tribunalul Suprem, S.Civ., decizia nr. 73/1969, in RRD, NR. 7/1971, p. 112, cu nota de N.Cosma.

[19] Civ. Bruxelles, 25 aprilie 1931, Pas., 1931, II, p. 98 in J.Falys, op. cit., p. 200.

[20] R. Houin, M. Pedamon, Droit commercial. Acte de commerce et commerciants. Activite commerciale et concurrence, Dalloz, Paris, 1980, p.379.

[21] C. Barsan, A. Ticlea, V. Dobrinoiu, M.Toma, Societatile comerciale/Trading companies, Casa de editura si presa Sansa SRL, Bucuresti, 1993, p.198.

Among the limitations brought to the free competition we can find[22]:

- The conditions to maintain an economic balance for the companies;
- The economic orientation and the protection as measures apparently complying with the principle of free competition, such as commercial standardization and urbanism which often marks onerous operations favoring some players on the economic market.
- Conventions to limit competitions.

Although the human being permanently evolves and gains rights and freedoms, almost in the same rhythm, if not faster, obligations are being imposed to him, and these are limiting is will and capacity to act. He has to respect not only the objective laws of nature, but also the norms of the society he lives in, the rights, aspirations and freedoms of the collectivity hosting him[23]. More than that, the alarming signals come from the planet which he populates, from the changes of the environment he lives in, and from the self-destruction risk. Therefore, beyond the daily, common rights and obligations, the right to a healthy environment and especially the obligation to respect and protect the environment and to develop a green economy represent the only rules capable to help the species survival and more than this, the planet survival.

Conclusion:

As the economic and social evolution is more and more far from the principles of the old civil codes, we can wonder if the principles governing the legal document, especially the contract, are still up-to-date and consequently applicable.

In this paper I tried to underline the need to maintain the principle of autonomy of will and contractual freedom in question, as research topics for jurist, with the personal hope, which totally lacks fantasy, to bring a plus of consistency in the awareness of contractual freedom within the legal culture of the Romanian Law system, as well as in the French system; systems where the actual distances in the contractual freedom prove their incapacity to remove the convergences of the same field as traditionally imposed in a legal freedom space drafted by the Civil Codes and consolidate Modern Constitutions.

The recommendations set forth in the article will allow the development of certain directions in science, law and practice. This, at its turn will lead to the revision of the traditional general view on contractual, including the environmental reports.

In addition to the fact that in doctrine and practice a clear idea about the specific environmental reports will be outlined, as elements of distinct branches, this will represent a first-step in the consecration of a difference in the procedure for examining complaints and disputes related to environmental issues dealing with the environmental damage.

Acknowledgments

This work was co financed from the European Social Fund through Sector Operational Program Human Resources Development 2007-2013, project number POSDRU/CPP107/DMI1.5/S/77082: "Doctoral training grants eco-economic and bio complex for food and feed safety and security of human ecosystems".

References

- Acostioaei C., Note de curs - Elemente de drept pentru economişti, Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti 2004

[22] M. de Juglart, B. Ippolito, Traite de droit commercial, Ed. Montchrestien, Paris, 1998, p. 668.

[23] Diana Dascalu, Raspunderea civila – forma a raspunderii juridice in contextual eco-economic actual /Civil responsibility – the form of the legal responsibility in the current eco-economic context, Raport de cercetare/Research Report– Ph. D., Bucharest, 2012, p. 3.

- Albu I, Libertatea contractuală, Revista Dreptul nr. 3/1993, Bucuresti
- Berlioz G, Le contract d'adhesion, Ed. LGDJ, 1973, in Pascal Lotriec
- Barsan C., A. Ticlea, V. Dobrinoiu, M.Toma, Societatile comerciale, Casa de editura si presa Sansa SRL, Bucuresti, 1993, p.198
- Carbonier J., Droit civil, Tome premier, PUF, 1955
- Dogaru I., Drept civil. Idei producatoare de efecte juridice, Ed. All Beck, Bucuresti 2002
- Dogaru I., Valentele juridice ale vointei, Editura Stiintifica si Enciclopedica, Bucuresti, 1986
- Dascalu D., Raspunderea civila – forma a raspunderii juridice in contextual eco-economic actual, Raport de cercetare – Doctorat, Bucuresti, 2012
- Filipescu I., Drept internaţional privat, Ed. Procardia, Bucureşti 1993
- Gannout E., Le pricipe de L'autonomie de la volonte en Droit prive, These Dijon 1912, in Pascal Lotriec, Contract et Pouvoir, Ed. LGDJ Paris 2004
- 11.Hamangiu C., I. Rosetti-Balanescu, Al. Baicoianu, Tratat de drept civil roman, vol.I., Editura All Beck, Bucuresti, 2002
- Houin R., M. Pedamon, Droit commercial. Acte de commerce et commerciants. Activite commerciale et concurrence, Dalloz, Paris, 1980, p.379
- Ionascu A, Drept civil. Partea generala, EDP, bucuresti 1963
- Ionascu Tr., Tratat de drept civil, vol. I, Partea generala, Editura Academiei, Bucuresti, 1967
- Ippolito B., M. de Juglart, Traite de droit commercial, Ed. Montchrestien, Paris, 1998
- Olteanu G., Autonomia de voinţă în dreptul privat, Ed. Universitaria, Craiova 2001
- Pop L, Teoria Generala a Obligaţiilor, Tratat, Ed. Chemarea, Iaşi, 1994
- Popa N., Teoria generala a dreptului, Ed. Actami, Bucuresti, 1996
- Ranouil V., L'autonomie de la volonte: Naissane et evolution d'un concept, Travaux de l'Universite de Paris, II, 1980.
- Tison R, Le principe de l'autonomie de la volonte dans l'ancient droit francais, Ed. Domat-Montchrestien, Paris
- Tribunalul Suprem, S.Civ., decizia nr. 73/1969, in RRD, NR. 7/1971, p. 112, cu nota de N.Cosma
- Civ. Bruxelles, 25 aprilie 1931, Pas., 1931, II, p. 98 in J.Falys, op. cit., p. 200

THE PENALTY CLAUSE. CONVENTIONAL WAY OF ASSESSING DAMAGES

FLORIN LUDUŞAN*

Abstract
Penalty clause is one of the most important and frequent changes by convention of the parties of the legal status of contractual liability. The parties may agree on the amount of damages, before the damage, by a clause in the contract contents or a separate convention, in case of failure, improper performance or delayed performance of the contractual obligations by the debtor. The purpose of this research is to analyze the concept and advantages of inserting the penalty clause in contracts. Also the study aims to delimitate the penalty clause of other similar institutions.

Keywords: penalty clause, contract, contractual liability, pledge, alternative obligation

Introduction:

Penalty clause has its origins in the principle of contractual freedom. According to this principle, the parties are free to sign any contracts and to determine their content within the limits imposed by law, public order and ethics. (Art. 1169, The New Civil Code). Thus, the free will of the contracting parties remains sovereign and values as law.

The contractual liability issues as penalty clause inserted into contracts is of perennial novelty, the contracting parties being free to assess their compensations by agreement. The Penalty clause has a contractual nature. Thus, as a convention, it must meet the conditions of validity required by law.

The legal contractual nature of penalty clause creates the possibility of the parties to modify and even to terminate it by mutual agreement. Therefore having a a legal and contractual nature, the penalty clause should be inserted in a contract embodied in written form.

The Parties, in performance of the contract concluded between them, have the whole interest to provide shelter for any damage likely to suffer as a result of non-performance or defective performance of the obligations incumbent upon the other party engaged in the same legal agreement

The paper includes:

Defining penalty clause of the 1864 Civil Code and the New Romanian Civil Code.

The main legislative guidelines regarding the penalty clause, which resulted in doctrinal and jurisprudence interpretations, were the provisions of the old Civil Code from 1864, Articles 1066 to 1072.Penalty clause has been defined by the old Civil Code in art.1066 as "Penalty clause is that by which a person, to give assurance for the performance of an obligation, binds to give a something in case of failure by his party. "

The new Civil Code enshrines the legal institution of the penalty clause in art. 1538 - 1543, defining the penalty clause (Art. 1538 Paragraph 1) in the following terms: "penalty clause is that by which the parties stipulate that the debtor is committed to a particular benefit for non-performance of his primary obligation."

Advantages and disadvantages to incorporate the penalty clause in contracts.

The Penalty clause provides the advantage of allowing the parties and not the court to choose the amount of compensation in case of a damage suffered, thus the parties shall be from the

* Ph. D. candidate, „Titu Maiorescu" University, Bucharest, (project no. POSDRU/CPP107/DMI 1.5/S/77082; email: florinludusan@yahoo.com).

beginning aware of what and how much it shall cost if they do not meet their obligations, in this point of view it not being only a mechanism of defense against harmful consequences of a default, but also coercion, both legal and moral, without leaving the parties in hope that they will not pay or will pay much less for "breaching" the contract.[1]

Within the contractual relationship, throughout the contract or by a separate agreement, after the conclusion of a contract, but before the default, the parties have the opportunity to determine the amount of damages due by the debtor as failure to perform his contractual obligations.[2]

Also, in the assumption of inserting a penalty clause in contracts, the injured party is exempt from a long, costly and uncertain legal procedure. It can thus be avoided a trial between the contracting parties to establish the due compensation for the damage caused to the creditor by non-performance of the contractual obligations.

The creditor receiving penalty clause is exempt from the requirement to prove the injury suffered by willful misconduct of the main obligation. This clause gives the creditor the option between forced execution in nature of the main obligation and forced execution of the penalty clause. The choice shall be made by the creditor and is not within the debtor's freedom of choice.[3]

Therefore, the parties are free of any evidence to the existence and extent of the injury and thus of the amount of damages owed by the debtor. The creditor must prove only the non-performance, the defective performance or late performance of the contractual commitments undertaken by the debtor.

In the event that the indemnity established is less than the actual injury, the liability of the debtor is reduced by effect of the penalty clause.[4]

We may conclude that the usefulness of the penalty clause, expression of the principle of contractual freedom, results from exempting the parties of any evidence on the existence and extent of the damage and the amount of damages owed by the debtor, and in avoidance of a possible legal dispute between the parties covering the settlement of the damages owed by the debtor to the creditor as a result of the damage caused.

Nevertheless the Penalty Clause has drawbacks. Thus, the debtor of the obligation performed improperly can be determined either for economic reasons or because the creditor's bad faith to set very high amounts in the penalty clause which can lead to unfair situations with injurious effects on him if the clause is enforced.[5] Likewise, if the amount determined by penalty clause is too small, it gives the debtor a means or reason to deliberately evade the execution of duties. This finding is particularly applicable when the penalty clause is less than the benefit that the debtor gets from non-performance of the contract.[6]

Delimitation of penalty clause from similar institutions.
Penalty clause and pledge

The pledge contract is a contract under which the debtor or a third party submits to a creditor or a third party a movable good, tangible or intangible, to secure the fulfillment of obligations. [7] In

---

[1] Dascălu D.N., Issues of Penalty Clause in Civile Contracts from the Perspective of the New Civil Code, Acad. Andrei Rădulescu Institute of Legal Research of the Romanian Academy, Law, State of Law and Juridical Culture, Annual Scientific Paper Session, May 13, 2011, Bucharest, p.464.

[2] S. Angheni, The Penalty Clause in Civil and Commercial Law, Oscar Print Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996, p.14.

[3] Turcu I., Laws Commented on, The New Civil Code, Law no. 287 / 2009, Book V. On Obligations, Art. 1164-1649, Comments and Explanations, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest 2011, p.633.

[4] Weill A., quoted by Bârsan C., în The Penalty Clause in International Commercial Contracts by Babiuc V., Rucăreanu I., Bârsan C., Sitaru D., Turcu N.- Seclaman, World Institute of Economy, Bucharest, 1985, p.39.

[5] Sângeorzan D.E., Practical Comments, Civil Liability in Civil and Commercial Matters, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucuresti, 2009, p.113.

[6] Ibid, p.114.

[7] M.N.Costin, C.M.Costin, Civil Law Dictionary from A to Z, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest 2007, p.487.

the old regulation, namely the Civil Code of 1864, the pledge agreement was defined as "Pawn is a contract whereby the debtor delivers the creditor a movable good for debt security" (Art. 1685).

Under the new regulations, Art. 2480 of the New Civil Code stipulates that pledge may relate to tangible goods or securities issued in the materialized form.

Regarding the subject of penalty clause, Art. 1538 Paragraph (1) of the New Civil Code provides: "penalty clause is that by which the parties stipulate that the debtor is committed to a particular benefit for non-performance of his primary obligation." This benefit may consist of a sum of money or other goods.[8]

A first difference between penalty clause and pledge is that, for the penalty clause, the object on which it was agreed as its object remains in the possession of the debtor, while the pledge is usually with dispossession. Thus, according to Art. 2481 of the New Civil Code: "The pledge is constituted by delivering the property or title to the creditor or, where appropriate, keeping it by its creditor, with the debtor's consent, to ensure the claim." So, the pledge agreement remains a real contract, its establishment taking place at the time of handing the good or title to the creditor, or when the creditor shall have it in possession, for holding it in order to guarantee the obligation.[9]

Pledgee is a poor owner of the good given in pledge in favor arising three rights for him: the right to own the good, the right to claim the good pledged to third parties the right of preference.[10]

Art 2483 and Art. 2484 of the New Civil Code expressly enshrine the right of the pledgee to own the good pledged.[11]

Right to claim the asset from third parties (the prerogative of tracking the pledged asset) is also enshrined in Art. 2486 of the New Civil Code which provides that: "Subject to rules regarding the acquisition of movable property by possession of good faith, the pledgee may request reimbursement of the asset it holds, unless the asset had been taken over by a or senior mortgage lender or the takeover occurred in the procedure of forced execution." So, when the asset pledged is no more in the possession of the pledgee, he may request restitution from the one who holds it, except for the cases: a) the conditions relating to the acquisition of mobile assets by possession in good faith are met (Articles 937-939 of the New Civil Code), b) those in which the property was taken over by a senior mortgage lender, c) those in which the takeover occurred in forced execution proceedings.[12] Therefore, the prerogative of tracking consists of the opportunity of the pledgee to claim reimbursement of the asset from any person who would hold it.

The right of preference. In relation to unsecured creditors, the right of preference grants creditor the possibility to be paid with priority of the price of the pledged asset and subsequently capitalized. The right of preference stems from the essence of any real right and the right of pledge is an ancillary real right together with the mortgage, privileges and the right of retention.

Therefore results a second essential difference between penalty clause and pledge. The creditor of the obligation with penalty clause is an unsecured creditor, which comes in competition

---

[8] Adam I., Civil Law. Obligations. Contract., C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011. p. 709.

[9] Juridical Instruments, New Civil Code, Notes, Correlations, Explanations, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p.886.

[10] Găina A.M., Real Estate Warranties for Execution of Civil and Commercial Obligations, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p.63.

[11] In Art. 2483 the New Civil Code provides that: "Owning the asset by the pledgee should be public and unequivocal. When to third parties is created the appearance that the debtor owns the asset, the pledge cannot be opposed to them", and Art. 2484 of the New Civil Code: "With the approval of his debtor, the creditor may exercise detention through a third party, but this detention does not provide ownership of the pledge until the moment he receives the document acknowledging the pledge."

[12] See: Juridical Instruments, New Civil Code, Notes, Correlations, Explanations, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p.887.

with the other creditors of that debtor [13], not being the holder of a real right over the property subject to penalty clause and not having tracking right and right of preference on the asset.[14]On the other hand, the pledgee being the holder of a real right over the asset that is subject to a pledge agreement acquires the three powers, namely, the right to own the asset, the right to claim the asset pledged to third parties the right of preference.

A third difference between the object of the the penalty clause and that of the pledge is that for pledge the object of pledge may be proposed for sale with the purpose of sufficiency for creditor or may be turned over to the property of creditor by the decision of Court. In the case of the penalty clause, the size of the actual damages sought by the lender has no meaning.[15]

Delimitation of penalty clause from alternative obligation.

According to art. 1461 Paragraph 1 of the New Civil Code, "The obligation is alternative when it covers two main benefits, and the performance of one of them releases the debtor from all obligations."

(2) The obligation remains alternative even if, at the time it is born, one of the benefits is impossible to be executed.

Article 1462 (1) Choosing the benefit which will discharge the obligation lies with the debtor, unless it is expressly granted to the creditor.

(2) If the party to which the choice of the benefit is borne does not express its option within the term granted for this purpose, the choice of the benefit shall be borne to the other party.

Art. 1463 The debtor cannot perform, nor can he be constrained to execute a part of a benefit and a part of another.

Art. 1464 The debtor who has the choice of benefit, when one of the benefits has become impossible to be executed even by own fault, is required to execute the other benefit.

(2) If, in the same case, both benefits become impossible to execute, and one's impossibility is due to the fault of the debtor, he is bound to pay the amount of benefit that has last become impossible to be executed.

The alternative obligation assumes that its object consists of two or more benefits, of which, upon selection of one party (the debtor, except when expressly provided that the choice is of the creditor and the situation when, upon maturity, the debtor does not opt), performance of one benefit leads to extinguishing the obligation.[16]

The alternative obligation is characterized by the fact that there is one and the same obligation which consists of two or more main benefits, of which only one must be executed by the debtor to be entirely free of the debt assumed.[17]

Plurality exists, but only subject to the object of the obligation, not in terms of its execution because the execution of one of the benefits has the effect of extinguishing the obligation. The alternative character of obligations with plurality of objects can be determined by the existence of the conjunction "or" between the benefits that the parties determine to be owed by the debtor. It follows that, in obligatione, the debtor owes the creditor two or more benefits, and in solutione is bound to perform only one of them.[18]

---

[13] S. Angheni, The Penalty Clause in Civil and Commercial Law, Oscar Print Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996, p.16.

[14] Adam I., Civil Law. Obligations. Contract., C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p. 71.

[15] S. Angheni, op. cit., page 17.

[16] Boroi G., C.A. Anghelescu, Civil Law Course, General, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p.73.

[17] L.Pop, Regulation of the Penalty Clause in the Writs of the New Civil Code, in "Dreptul" Magazine, no. 8/2011, p.19.

[18] Pop L., Civil Law Treaty. The Obligations. Volume I. General Juridical Regime, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006, page 205.

For the penalty clause obligations, there are actually two distinct obligation relations, even if the penalty clause agreement is ancillary to the main obligation.[19] Therefore is penalty clause an alternative obligation? The answer can only be negative. The convention which stipulates that penalty clause does not give the debtor a genuine choice between the main obligation and the ancillary one, essentially subsequent and conditioned by default of the primary obligation, but reinstates to him an unique and determined benefit. The penalty clause is in the range of responsibility, punishing non-performance of an obligation, not the obligation itself.[20]

If an obligation is accompanied by a penalty clause we are in the presence of two distinct obligations, a principal one and an ancillary and conditional, which expires when the main obligation expires, or for alternative obligation failure to execute one of the benefits that are object to it does not have a result in its expiry, it continues to exist as a rule, as pure and simple obligation.[21]

The alternative obligation is therefore an obligation with multiple benefits, one of the benefits having to be executed, upon choice of both parties or one of them, this performance leading to settle the obligation, while the for the obligation with penalty clause, there actually are two separate obligation relations, even if the penalty clause agreement is ancillary to the main obligation.[22]

The alternative obligation is distinct from the penalty clause. This is not object of the obligation and is a way of assessment of the damage suffered by the creditor by non-performance according to the title of his claim.[23]

According to Art. 1538 Paragraph (3) of the new Civil Code "the debtor cannot be unbound offering the compensation agreed upon." Thus, the penalty clause debtor has no right of option, does not have the possibility to choose and cannot be released from obligation only by performing the main obligation, not being able to provide the penalty clause in return. The debtor of the obligation with penalty clause has two contractual obligations, namely a main obligation which consists of the obligation to perform the in-kind benefits undertaken and an ancillary obligation consisting in payment of money or other benefits set out in the penalty clause. Or, in the case of alternative obligation, as explicitly stipulates Art. 1462 Paragraph (1), the debtor has the choice of benefit, unless the creditor had expressly been granted the choice between the two obligations. "Choosing the benefit which will discharge the obligation lies with the debtor, unless it is expressly granted to the creditor. (Art. 1462 Paragraph 1 of the new Civil Code).

The creditor of an obligation with penalty clause cannot claim payment instead of the main obligation as long as it is possible to execute in-kind the main obligation. However, in case of non-performance, the creditor can ask for either the in-kind forced execution of the main obligation, or the penalty clause (Art. 1538 Par. 2 of the new Civil Code). Therefore for the creditor there can be the choice of option provided that the main obligation had nor been performed.

While any of the benefits of alternative obligation can be executed directly, the penalty clause is an indirect execution.[24] In the case of alternative obligations, the execution of one of them is sometimes independent of any fault of the debtor, for the obligations to which a penalty clause is associated enforcement of this clause is subject to the debtor default for non-performance of the main obligation.[25]

---

[19] S. Angheni, The Penalty Clause in Civil and Commercial Law, Oscar Print Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996, p.17.

[20] I. Deleanu, S. Deleanu, Considerations on the Penalty Clause in "Pandectele Romane", no. 1 / 2003, p.116.

[21] L.Pop, Regulation of the Penalty Clause in the Writs of the New Civil Code, in "Dreptul" Magazine, no. 8/2011, p.19.

[22] Adam I., Civil Law. Obligations. Contract., C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p. 718.

[23] Almăşan A., Pluralist Obligations, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007, p.12. Almăşan A., Pluralist Obligations, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007, p.12.

[24] Almăşan A., Pluralist Obligations, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007, p.13.

[25] Deleanu I., Deleanu S., Considerations on Penalty Clause, in Pandectele Române, no. 1/2003, p.116.

Penalty clause and optional obligation

The obligation is optional when has its object is one main benefit of which the debtor may be released by executing another predetermined benefit. (Art. 1468 Paragraph 1 of the new Civil Code). The debtor is discharged if, without fault, the main benefit becomes impossible to be executed. (Art. 1468 Paragraph 2 of the new Civil Code)

Voluntary obligation is characterized by the uniqueness of the object of obligation: the benefit which the debtor undertakes is unique. The creditor may require the debtor to execute only the benefit which alone is subject to the obligation. The creditor may therefore only require its execution. The debtor is obliged to execute only one benefit, with choice for the debtor to get unbind by performing another determined benefit.

The other determined benefit the debtor may execute is a "choice" (in facultate solutionis). Therefore: if the main benefit becomes impossible to be performed without fault of the debtor, he shall be freed of obligation; if the main benefit disappears by fault of the debtor, the creditor is only entitled to damages according to general rules.[26]

Therefore, there is only one obligation which "in obligatione" has only one object, and "in solutione" has two objects, the faculty of paying by execution of the other benefit belongs solely to the debtor. Rather, in the case of obligation with penalty clause we have two distinct obligations, each with its specific object, the right of choice belongs exclusively to the creditor and is subject to unlawful non-performance of the benefit subject to the debtor's principal debt.[27] "In case of non-performance, the creditor may either request forced in-kind execution of the main obligation, or the penalty clause." (Art. 1538 Paragraph 2 of new Civil Code).

The penalty clause acts as a penalty and is within the reach of the creditor in case of failure or improper performance of contractual obligations of the debtor, while the faculty of the debtor of the voluntary obligation is a way of release within the reach of the debtor.

Conclusions

Inserting the penalty clause in contracts remains a challenge for theorists and especially for law practitioners. In the event the contractual debtor does not perform the obligation undertaken, his contractual partner is therefore entitled to obtain the damages under the penalty clause without any claim to prove the existence of the loss and its size. It is sufficient that the parties will have agreed that non-performance or delayed performance of the obligations undertaken cause damage and will have added value to remove, on this plan, any subsequent judicial investigation.

In our study, I tried to stress the need and usefulness of inserting this type of clause in contracts following that in the presence of such clause, the parties to be able from the beginning to determine the amount of damages due to non-performance, poor execution or delayed execution of contractual obligations.

Acknowledgments. This work was cofinanced from the European Social Fund through Sectoral Operational Programme Human Resources Development 2007-2013, project number POSDRU/ CPP107/DMI 1.5/S/77082, "Doctoral Scholarships for eco-economy and bio-economic complex training to ensure the food and feed safety and security of anthropogenic ecosystems"

[26] See: Juridical Instruments, New Civil Code, Notes, Correlations, Explanations, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p.543.

[27] L.Pop, Regulation of the Penalty Clause in the Writs of the New Civil Code, in "Dreptul" Magazine, no. 8/2011, pag.19

References:

- Adam I., Civil Law. Obligations. Contract., C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011
- Almăşan A., Pluralist Obligations, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007.
- S. Angheni, The Penalty Clause in Civil and Commercial Law, Oscar Print Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996.
- Boroi G., C.A. Anghelescu, Civil Law Course, General, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011.
- M.N.Costin, C.M.Costin, Civil Law Dictionary from A to Z, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest 2007.
- Dascălu D.N., Issues of Penalty Clause in Civile Contracts from the Perspective of the New Civil Code, Acad. Andrei Rădulescu Institute of Legal Research of the Romanian Academy, Law, State of Law and Juridical Culture, Annual Scientific Paper Session, May 13, 2011, Bucharest.
- Deleanu I., Deleanu S., Considerations on Penalty Clause, in Pandectele Române, no. 1/2003.
- Găina A.M., Real Estate Warranties for Execution of Civil and Commercial Obligations, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010.
- Juridical Instruments, New Civil Code, Notes, Correlations, Explanations, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011.
- Pop L., Civil Law Treaty. The Obligations. Vol. II, The Contract, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009.
- L. Pop, The General Picture of Civil Liability in the Writs of the New Civil Code, in "Revista romana de drept privat" Magazine, no. 1/2010.
- Pop L., Civil Law Treaty. The Obligations. Volume I. General Juridical Regime, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006.
- L.Pop, Regulation of the Penalty Clause in the Writs of the New Civil Code, in "Dreptul" Magazine, no. 8/2011.
- Sângeorzan D.E., Practical Comments, Civil Liability in Civil and Commercial Matters, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucuresti, 2009.
- Turcu I., Laws Commented on, The New Civil Code, Law no. 287 / 2009, Book V. On Obligations, Art. 1164-1649, Comments and Explanations, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest 2011.
- Weill A., quoted by Bârsan C., în The Penalty Clause in International Commercial Contracts by Babiuc V., Rucăreanu I., Bârsan C., Sitaru D., Turcu N.- Seclaman, World Institute of Economy, Bucharest, 1985.

LIBERTIES - LEGAL ACT OF UNILATERAL OR BILATERAL TRAINING

ANCA NICOLETA GHEORGHE[*]
CAMELIA SPASICI[]

Abstract
We analyzed liberality, special institution of civil law substantially in two particular aspects: legal document formation legal act unilaterally and bilaterally band.
Every human life is a complex and irreversible phenomenon, which they flow, limited in time, involve many connections with other beings, interfering various rights and obligations, concessions and compromises in the most varied forms.
Within this complex phenomenon are inherent and legal operations are intertwined in the thread everyday life, day after day.
Legal acts are governed by common rules, essential and generally applicable, on unilateral expression of will, the conditions of formation of the agreement will, in respect of conditions of life imperative, the form you need to put the act .
Human freedom is expressed through law. But what is really important, lies in the fact that human beings can not be taken away freedom of choice to discern between good and evil, between normal and abnormal. Each person in relation to choice of law can have consequences.

Keywords: liberality, will, unilateral, bilateral, civil act.

Introduction

Liberality is primarily a legal act.

In the following we intend to analyze this special institution of civil law substantial under two particular aspects: the legal act formation legal act unilaterally and bilaterally formation.

In the general context of the study we specify that the Civil Code of 1864 was not true of general rules of civil act. A indirect regulation of legal act concept could be found in Title III of Book III of the Civil Code, "About contracts or agreements".

In doctrine, civil act has been defined generally as a manifestation of the will made with the intention to produce legal effects, that is, born, modify or extinguish a specific legal relationship[1]

A) Juridical act - manifestation of will

In addition to the classical definition of the legal act, pointing out that "the legal act is a manifestation of will - unilateral, bilateral or multilateral committed with intent to establish, modify or extinguish, according to objective law, legal relations, provided that the existence of this intention to produce legal effects depend on itself (sn) [2]".

The civil legal act, has the following elements:

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Law Faculty, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: av.ancagheorghe@yahoo.com).
[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Social and Administrative Science, University of Bucharest (email: av_cameliastanciulescu@yahoo.com).

[1] See G. Boroi, op, cit., p. 185; see V.V. Popa, op. cit., p. 62.

[2] See M. Mureşan, Civil Law. General part, Cordial Publishing, Cluj-Napoca, 1994, p. 106.

- a manifestation of the will (which may come from one or more individual or legal entities)[3]

- manifestation of will is expressed with the intention to produce legal civil effects[4]

- the pursued legal effects may consist in giving birth, modify or extinguish a specific civil legal relationship

We mention that the term "act" can have two meanings: legal operation (negotium iuris) or document acknowledging the manifestation of will, meaning the material support notifiying or rendering the legal operation (instrumentum probationis)[5].

In relationship with the planned, existence of this effect, particularly on the one hand, acts committed with intent to produce legal effects, that is civil legal acts and on the other hand, acts committed without intention to produce legal effects, but shall take effect under the law, that is legal acts (stricto sensu)[6].

We mention that particular importance present the classification of legal acts according to their volitional nature in the events, or natural facts, and actions, or voluntary acts, "because only if the latter, law will assign legal relevance to the will."

Events are those surrounding reality changes that occur beyond the control of the individual, but born, alter or extinguish concrete legal relations under the law[7].

Therefore, civil acts include actions which manifest the intention of the author, in the meaning of birth, alteration or extinction of specific civil legal relations.

Consequently, the volitional character, different legal acts (events and actions) committed without intention to produce legal effects[8].

In the national doctrine of legal act is studied in the two forms already established (unilateral legal act and contract), unlike the French theory that divides legal documents: contracts, unilateral legal acts and legal acts of collective[9].

The category of collective legal acts consists of : collective unilateral acts (such as majority decisions - acts of will that precede a common final) and collective agreements (eg collective agreements)[10]. Unilateral legal act is a manifestation of a (single) will, in order to produce legal effects[11]. As the result of a single legal will, unilateral act is likely to produce legal effects in itself, not being conditioned by the consent of another person[12].

As regards the issue concerning the quality source of obligations of the unilateral act, in doctrinal and jurisprudential plan, have emerged two tendencies:

- first, he deems the unilateral legal act a source of obligations only in cases prescribed by law;

---

[3] See Şt. Răuschi, Civil law. The general part. Individual. Legal person, Foundation House "Chemarea" Publishing , Iaşi, 1993, p. 75.

[4] See P.M. Cosmovici, Civil law. Introduction to Civil Law, All Publishing House, Bucharest, 1994, p. 95.

[5] See Pop, Gh. Beleiu, op. cit., p. 187.

[6] Stricto sensu, legal fact only means individual actions that produce legal consequences by effect of law against the will of the perpetrator, and natural facts, see RI Motic, Mihai Gheorghe, Introduction to the study of law, Alma Mater Publishing House, Timisoara, 1995, p 201 et seq.

[7] See E. Lupan, M. Răchită, D. Popescu, Civil law. General Theory, Babes-Bolyai University, Cluj-Napoca, 1992, p. 114.

[8] Volitional nature it is of essence of civil act in an area where "right it is a world of finalities, the civil act it is set to reach participants predilect instrument to legal circuit realization of subjective interests protected by the law" see St.. Rausch, op. cit., p 75, T. Pop, Romanian Civil Law. General Theory, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 1993, p 119.

[9] According to the art. 1166 of the New Civil Code, "contract is the agreement of wills between two or more persons intended to constitute, modify or extinguish a legal relationship."

[10] See J. Four, J.L. Aubert, E. Savaux, op. cit., (2006), and 416 and seq..

[11] See E. Chelaru, op. cit., p. 100.

[12] See N. Popa, General Theory of Law, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2002, p 276 et seq.

- the second most recent, which includes the unilateral legal act, part of obligations sources category whenever there is a firm promise that does not require acceptance for.birth.

Between civil legal act and manifestation of will can be establish the following correlation: if any legal act is a manifestation of will, "not every manifestation of will is a legal act"[13].

Consequence of individual action and beyond its, legal acts take effect in the classification of concrete material situation, in the general and abstract pattern of law.

Legal facts, broadly, are situations which the rule of law assigns in precisely defined circumstances, legal relevance, for the purposes of generation, variation or settlement of legal relations[14]. The concept of legal fact is identical with the source of the legal ground. In the limited sense, the legal fact means only individual actions that produce legal consequences by effect of law against the will of the perpetrator, and natural facts[15].

B) Legal will in unilateral legal acts

The term "unilateral act" is established and used whenever it is a legal document expressing the unique will of its author's[16]. Therefore, unilateral legal act is a manifestation of a will to produce legal effects[17]. In the the above conditions, is likely that unilateral legal act to produce legal effects itself unconditionally by consent of another person. Worth mentioning that french doctrine distinguishes between unilateral legal act and unilateral commitment, placing the two concepts in a similar relationship to that of agreement - contract. Therefore, in the accordance with art. 1101 of French Civil Code, the contract is defined as a "generating convention obligations" unilateral commitment is a specie of unilateral legal act which results in the birth of obligations on its author[18]. National doctrine, has an original vision of the unilateral legal act institution. As "a specific procedure for creating private norm" unilateral legal act is defined as "a unilateral declaration will be issued for the purpose to generate, modify or extinguish a civil institution, or in order to find acceptance"[19]. It follows that unilateral legal acts are susceptible of classification as they have or do not need to produce specific effects of an acceptance from another person unilateral acts statute and non statutory unilateral acts. Statuary unilateral act is characterized by that "manifestation of will is sufficient to generate a set of legal relationships, which will apply to the issuer"s will, act being born valid and effective without the need for acceptance from another entity "[20]. In terms of potestative rights theory, the doctrine considers that exercise of the potestativ right only depend on unilateral will of its owner, who, by the exercise of this right, will get new legal effects in the relation to a specific new legal situation[21]. Similarly, the classical doctrine has opined for the impossibility of unilateral will of generating an obligation on the promissory and benefit of the others. In support of the above

[13] See I. Dogaru, op. cit., 2005, p. 6.

[14] See R.I. Motica, Gh. Mihai, Introduction to study law, Alma Mater Publishing House, Timisoara, 1995, p 201.

[15] See G. Boroi, op. cit., p. 43; E. Chelaru, op. cit., p. 100.

[16] See M. Avram, Unilateral act in private law Hamangiu Publishing, 2006, p 18.

[17] According to the art. 1324 of the New Civil Code, "is the legal document that requires only unilateral expression of will of its author." According to the art. 1325 of the New Civil Code, "If not otherwise provided by law, the laws relating to contracts are properly applied unilateral acts".

[18] See M. Avram, Some theoretical and practical aspects of unilateral voluntary act Romanian law and Community law, Annals of University of Bucharest: Rosetti, 2003, p 49.

[19] See M Avram, op. cit., p. 18.

[20] See P. Vasilescu, op. cit., p. 155.

[21] See L. Pop, op. cit., p. 136; I. Deleanu, Parties and third parties. legal effect and enforceability of relativity, Rosetti House, Bucharest, 2002, p 212.

has argued with the symmetry principle of civil legal acts, whereby a legal act may be revoked or modified under similar conditions it was concluded[22]

C) Foundations of unilateral act in the private law

Unilateral legal act has its source in the definition of the legal act in general and it is based on will"s subjects, which aim to create certain legal effects[23]. In the doctrine, will"s role within legal act was the subject of controversy, since "you can not ignore the fact that positive law determine to what extent, this will create subjective rights and obligations"[24].

In this context we show that, in civil act theory a particular importance has the classification of legal acts according to their volitional nature in the events, or natural facts, and actions, or voluntary acts, "because only in the latter case the law assigns legal relevance to the will ". We remind that the events are those changes of surrounding reality that occur beyond the control of the individual, but born, alter or extinguish concrete legal relations under the law[25].

For example, are included in the category above: human birth, resulting in the appearance of a new entity; reaching the age majority and gaining full legal capacity; passage of time in consequence of acquisition or extinction of rights, natural catastrophes and disasters, legal with the effects related[26]. Human actions are omission or commission facts, committed with or without the intention of producing legal effects, appointed in the doctrine and the notion of legal facts stricto sensu.

Human action involves a subset depending on the legality or illegality of the action. Lawful facts, which do not affect the rule of law and social values, and enforceable in the power of legal rules are: business management, undue payment or unjustified enrichment[27].

Illegal acts, offenses and quasidelictele, although voluntary acts, it will take effect from the power of their author, but by law.Note that the scope of civil legal acts include actions which the author will be manifested in the sense of birth, alteration or extinction of specific civil legal relations. Volitional nature is what distinguishes civil legal act other legal acts committed without intention to produce legal effects[28]. In this context, we remind that the majority of the doctrine has civil legal act defined as the manifestation of will made with the intention to produce legal effects, that is, born, modify or extinguish a specific legal relationship[29]. Note in conclusion that the foundation the unilateral legal act is his volitional character. In other words, the civil act is "the predilect instrument offered to the participants to achieve their subjective rights and interests protected by law"[30].

As a result of a single legal will, unilateral act is susceptible to produce legal effects itself unconditioned by the consent of another person. More precisely, unilateral legal act is a manifestation of a will in order to produce legal effects[31].

The recognition of unilateral legal act as a source of civil obligations meets the draft of European Code of Contracts which stipulates that the promise made with intent to be bound linking

---

[22] Therefore, those original author will unilateral legal act may thus be revoked the discretion of it at any moment.

[23] According to the art. 1325 of the New Civil Code, "If not otherwise provided by law, the laws relating to contracts are properly applied to unilateral acts".

[24] The foundation of the legal act under private law is different in comparison with public law, see M. Avram, op. cit., (2006), p 12.

[25] See O. Ungureanu, op. cit., p. 103.

[26] See E. Poenaru, Introduction to civil law. General Theory. People, Publishing Dacia Nova Europe, Lugoj, 2001, p 93.

[27] See P.M. Cosmovici, Civil. Introduction to Civil Law, All Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999, p 68.

[28] See M. Muresan, Civil. Part general, Cordial House, Cluj-Napoca, 1994, p 106.

[29]See Tr Ionaşcu, legal elements will, in the Treaty of civil law, vol I, Part General, Publishing House, Bucharest, 1967, p 258.

[30] See T. Pop, Romanian Civil Law. General Theory, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 1993, p 119.

[31] See D. Cosma, General theory of civil act, Scientific Publishing House, Bucharest, 1969, p 14.

its author[32]. As already mentioned, the french doctrine distinguishes between unilateral legal act and unilateral commitment, placing the two concepts in a similar relationship agreement - contract. Therefore, unilateral commitment is a specie of unilateral legal act which has results in the birth of obligations on its author[33]. In conclusion, having the origin in unilateral will of the author, the obligations of the legal act could be revoked at its sole discretion at any moment. Similarly, after the death or incapacity of its author, the commitment will become null and void by suppressing the will that is "the only support of the obligation"[34].

D) The particularities of will in legal acts of bilateral formation

The study of free will can not be complete without taking into account the particularities of liberal manifestation in bilateral legal acts. Therefore we consider it necessary to present some considerations on the implications of subject-domain analysis of contracts. In support of the above, we consider the fact that the New Civil Code has provisions common to both donation and will (art. 984-1010). Therefore, are covered with institutions such as: capacity in the liberalities area (art. 987-992) fideicomisare substitutions (Art. 993-1000); liberties treatment (Art. 1001 to 1005), reviewing the conditions and tasks (articles 1006 - 1008) etc[35]. Classical, the contract is based on the principle of autonomy, that contractual obligation is based exclusively on the will of the parties, the will that is the source and dimension of all rights and obligations created by the very expression of its free and aware manifestation[36]. Principle is based on natural liberty, fundamental attribute of every human being and the will was the main source of rights and obligations, recognizing thus the ability of individuals to be bound by the will, and only to the extent they wish, no contradiction idea of man's natural liberty[37].

In the above context, the individual is not bound by the obligations he did not assumed, especially since those might be injust, but instead he is bound to execute all obligations to which he has subscribed freely. According to the concept, to be free means, first and foremost, all self-limitation of our freedom by the contracts we have concluded in the absence of constraints or external influence. Therefore, the contract has become the main source of law, drawing on the strength from the agreement of will necesarry to its conclusion[38]. According to this, marriage is not the result of law, but a tacit agreement between the spouses, legal succession reflects a silent testament of the deceased, citizenship is in turn the result of a contract between individual and state.

Source of rights and freedoms in the state, liberal contract allows individual setting of fair and useful relationships between community members.According to the ideas of the great french thinker,

---

[32] See M. Abram, Some theoretical and practical aspects of unilateral voluntary act Romanian law and Community law, Annals of University of Bucharest: Rosetti, 2003, p 49.

[33] See H., L. and J. Mazeaud and F. Chabas, Lessons of civil law. Obligations. General theory, Montchrestien, Paris, 1991, p. 359.

[34] See St.. Rausch, Civil. The general part. Individual. Legal person, Chemarea Publishing, Iasi, 1993, p 75.

[35] According to the art. 985 of the New Civil Code, "The donation contract through which, with the intent to gratify a party, named donor dispose irrevocably by the a good in favor of the other party, called the donee."

[36] See P. Vasilescu, Relativity civil act. Highlights for a new general theory of private law act, Rosetti House, Bucharest, 2003, p 15.

[37] According to art. 989 of the New Civil Code, "Under penalty of absolute nullity, the person who dispose need to determine the beneficiary of the liberality or at least provide criteria for the beneficiary to be determined after the liberality void. Person which do not exist at the date of liberality can receive a gift if it is made to someone able, with the latter task to give to the client object of the liberality soon as possible. Under penalty of absolute nullity, the person who dispose can not let a third party, beneficiary right to appoint or establish the liberality its subject. However, distribution of assets transferred by related persons designated by the testator may be left to the third party. It is valid the liberality made by the person who dispose of an designated person, with a task on behalf of a person chosen either gratified or a designated third party, itself, also by the the person who dispose ".

[38] See J.J. Rousseau, Du contrat social, Editura Flamarion, Paris, 1992, p. 34.

the individual is the best judge of his needs, and since he can manifest freely his will, he will conclude only those contracts that protect his interests. Likewise, any obligation imposed is unjust, disregarding the interests of the debtor (State lead but only one insurance policy frameworks needed to satisfy individual interests, market forces, supply and demand by adjusting production of goods) and therefore the contract is above the law, which plays a secondary, complementary, covering only those issues which the parties have not considered.

Therefore, promoting individual interest could only lead to satisfying the public interest, perceived as the sum of individual needs[39]. We mention that all civil laws are based on inspired napoleonic principle of autonomy of individual will.

In addition to the principles, theory of nullity abolishes the effects of the legal act arising from a legal will altered by vices of consent, as "freedom of contract is the legal corollary of freedom understood as the product of conscious and free will, a social reverberation of this will"[40].Note that the drafters of the Civil Code of 1864 only partially joined the independent nature of individual will.From the analysis of art. 969 Civil Code, conventions are viewed as private law of the parties, but only subject to compliance with state law. Therefore, the contract draws its binding force from the outside of the norm. Therefore, the parties will, through conditioning, receives a secondary role[41].

To the theory of "justice and equality", opposes the reality of social inequality. Therefore, meeting individual free wills on contractual plan will oppose the need of the accumulation and appropriation for human beings, seeking the social utility and profitability of the legal documents that adhere. Contract will be self-conscious and rational and therefore a source of law (consent, as an externalized the will must not be expressed flawed and knowingly)[42].

The corrupted contractual will is considered that there is no occurrence at the time of consent. The indifference of ground of the contract, essentially expresses that the product of independent will can not be censored [43]. We remind in this context that internal will (of each contracting party) creates rights and thus "externalizing will is logic condition of delivery of the contract, as long as it remains in itself, will not disclosing valences nomothete"[44].

In unilateral legal acts (will) the liberal intention can not be based than the one will of the person who dispose..In donation agreement araises the question: liberal intention animus donandi is only the will of a partie (the donor) or donee too (for the contract is an agreement of wills)?On the question above, we will make several considerations.

The liberal Intention is born of donor initiative and after the contract is concluded, it becomes irrevocable.Therefore liberal intention is characterized first and foremost by manifestation of the will of the donor, without which that would not exist. It is defined as the donor intended to confer to the donee without seeking or obtaining the equivalent of consideration he made.

But because it is expressed in a donation contract, the agreement of the parties is essential for the valid formation of the contract. The agreement of wills, involves two distinct persons which have mutual intention to make or accept a liberality. The valid conclusion a donation requires the acceptance from the gratified. As a consequence, for liberal intention to take effect, it is subordinated to the act of acceptance of the gratified. According to the art. 1013 of the New Civil Code, "Offer of donation may be revoked while bidder was unaware by the acceptance address. Incapacity or death of tender attracts caducity of.acceptance Offer can not be accepted after the death of her recipient. But inheritors can communicate the acceptance address made it. Offer of donation made to a person

---

[39] See J. Goicovici, Formalism and substantial freedom of contract, in Studia Babes-Bolyai University, Cluj-Napoca, no. 2-4/2002, p 111 et seq.

[40] See P. Vasilescu, op. cit., p. 34.

[41] See O. Ungureanu, op. cit., p. 114.

[42] See D. Chirica, Principle of contractual freedom and its limits in terms of the sale, in DRC no. 6/1999, p 45-49.

[43] See I. Albu, contract and contractual liability, Dacia Publishing House, Cluj-Napoca, 1994, p 27

[44] See P. Vasilescu, op. cit., p. 35.

without legal capacity will be to accepted by legal guardian. Offer of donation made to a person with limited legal capacity may be accepted by the latter, with the consent of legal protector ".

"The liberal intention has not such existence on legal stage, unless the donation it is accepted by the donor without his consent it has no legal a value.Only through acceptance by the beneficiary, will give legal value to the animus donandi of the donor.

Study of donation agreement, concerning the wills of the parties is interesting because it raises a problem relatively overlooked by specialists: the intention animus donandi belongs exclusively to donor? and if so, when the donor and donee are concurring wills?

Conclusion

In conclusion of the analysis of particularities of liberal will, generally and mortis causa especially we appreciate that a clear dissociation between the will for the cause of death - generosity and willingness to cause of death - substitute a person can not be achieved, for which it follows to take into account under both aspects.

References

- Avram M., unilateral act in private law, Hamangiu Publishing, 2006. Avram M., Some theoretical and practical aspects of unilateral voluntary act Romanian law and Community law, Annals of University of Bucharest: Rosetti, 2003.
- Boroi, G., Civil. The general part. People, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001.
- Boroi, G., L. Stănciulescu, Civil. Selective Course. Scale tests, fifth edition, revised and enlarged, Hamangiu Publishing, Bucharest, 2010.
- Boroi, G. Civil. The general part. People, Third edition, revised and enlarged, Hamangiu House, Bucharest, 2008.
- Boroi, G. Civil. The general part. People, fourth edition, revised and enlarged, Hamangiu House, Bucharest, 2010.
- Chirica, D., Civil. Succession and wills, Rosetti House, Bucharest, 2003. Chirica D., principle of contractual freedom and its limits in terms of the sale, in DRC no. 6/1999.
- Cosmovici P.M., Civil. Introduction to Civil Law, All Publishing House, Bucharest, 1994.
- Cosmovici P.M., Civil. Introduction to Civil Law, All Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999.
- Deleanu I., Parties and third parties, enforceability and relativity of legal effects , Rosetti House, Bucharest, 2002.
- Dogaru I Civil Law. General Theory of documents free of charge, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005.
- Dogaru, I., Civil. The idea of flow time and its legal consequences, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2002.
- Goicovici J., Formalism and substantial freedom of contract, in Studia Universitatis Babes-Bolyai University, Cluj-Napoca, no. 2-4/2002.
- Ionaşcu, Tr,, legal elements will, in the Treaty of civil law, vol I, Part General, Publishing House, Bucharest, 1967.
- Macovei, D., Striblea, M.S., Civil. Contracts. Succession Junimea Publishing, Science, 2002.
- Macovei, D., Cadariu, i.e., civil law. Succession Junimea Publishing, Science, 2005.
- Poenaru, E., Introduction to civil law. General Theory. People, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2002.
- Poenaru E., Introduction to civil law. General Theory. People, Publishing Dacia Nova Europe, Lugoj, 2001.
- T. Pop, Romanian Civil Law. General Theory, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 1993. Pop L., Treaty of civil law. Obligations. The legal status, vol I, Ed C. H. Beck, Bucharest, 2006.
- L. Pop, Romanian Civil Law. General theory of obligations, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 2006.
- Rausch St.., Civil. The general part. Individual. Legal person, Foundation House "Chemarea", Publishing, Iasi, 1993.
- P. Vasilescu, Relativity civil act. Highlights for a new general theory of private law juridical act, Rosetti House, Bucharest, 2003.

PARTICIPANTS IN INSOLVENCY

RAREŞ-SEBASTIAN PUIU-NAN*

Abstract
The article examines the officials and other participants in insolvency. The main purpose of the insolvency procedure is to cover all the debts of the debtor side, in favor of his creditor side.
The most important regulations regarding this issue consist in Law no. 85/2006, according to it in the insolvency procedure are to be appointed the following officials: insolvency courts of justice, insolvency judge, receiver, liquidator. All these officials have to act in celerity, in order to promptly perform acts and operations provided by law and to respect and provide other participants' rights and obligations.
My article present in the beginning the insolvency courts of justice, their material and territorial competence and the procedure rules. Next chapters are dedicated to the insolvency judge, receiver and liquidator and analyze the following issues: their appointment, their powers, their auxiliary officials and their ceasing of the powers. Some regards on the British law and French law are also included. The next chapter is dedicated to the participants to the insolvency procedure: the creditors general assembly, creditors committee and special administrator, followed by conclusions and recommendations.

Keywords: insolvency, judge, receiver, liquidator, creditors general assembly.

Introduction

My paper work is about the participants in insolvency, about the authorities and persons taking part in such procedure.

The companies have a very important role in the economy of a nation. They represent the force that sustains the economy, the bases for the future development and a source of stability. Any massive decline of one the companies could produce a "chain reaction" and could compromise the national economy. For these reasons, based on legal previsions, it is extremely important to avoid the bankruptcy of such companies and its consequences. Thus, it is very important for each legal system to adopt a clear and efficient legislation in this matter. It is also important to create and maintain a mechanism to supervise and prevent the insolvency of the companies. When insolvency of a company appears, it is thus important to know the parties, persons and authorities involved in.

The purpose of this paper is to realize a detailed analysis of the participants in insolvency, their duties and powers. The analysis of this issue will help the persons involved in such procedures or which are about to be involved to have a concrete image of all the applicable laws regarding the participants in insolvency. The narrow meaning of the concept of participants in an insolvency includes the bodies and the parties. The bodies appointed to enforce the proceeding are: legal courts, bankruptcy judges, trustees in bankruptcy and liquidators. The parties in insolvency are: the debtor and the creditors.

Taking into consideration its collective nature, other stakeholders take part in the insolvency proceeding: creditors' general meeting, creditors' committee and the special administrator.

This issue, based on present regulation, was analyzed before, but this paper tries to add different regulations in other European legal systems, so it is my duty to create a proper and a most accurate image of different legal reglementation regarding the participants in insolvency.

* Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, Law Faculty, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: raryseb@gmail.com).

Paper content

Chapter 1: Introduction. Overview

The insolvency proceeding is a complex procedure whose accomplishment requires the intervention of parties or bodies compelled to or interested in participating in such procedure in order to solve the situations caused by the lack of the debtor's cash flow so that his payables to creditors be covered.

The people working together as part of the insolvency procedure in order to attain its goal are called participants.

As rightly emphasized in the legal literature, the concept of participants in a civil trial differs from the content of the same concept in the civil law. While in the civil law, participants are only the subjects of the legal civil relationship, in a civil trial, the participants are the bodies and people summoned to contribute to the progress of the civil trial. In the insolvency proceeding, by overlaying the scopes of the two concepts, we can notice that, for the purpose of the civil law, participants will mean the debtor and the creditor.

As understood from the above, the broader meaning of participants in a civil trial encompasses all the official or private subjects who actually take part in the activities of the insolvency proceeding. For this purpose, the participants include: the parties, the judicial bodies and other participants.

The narrow meaning of the concept of participants in an insolvency includes the bodies and the parties.

The parties in insolvency are:

a) the debtor – the private law natural or legal entity who is among the entities stipulated in art.1 of the law and who is undergoing insolvency

b) the creditors

The law distinguishes among various creditor categories, defining them as follows:

A creditor is a natural or legal entity holding a right of creditors against the debtor's property and who has expressly requested the court that its receivables be recorded in the definitive receivables table or in the consolidated receivables table and who can duly prove its receivables against the debtor's property (art. 3 point.7 of the law).

A creditor who is entitled to request the commencement of insolvency means a creditor whose receivables against a debtor's property are certain, liquid and have been claimed for more than 90 days. The creditors, including the state-owned entities, may request the commencement of insolvency only if, after settling any mutual debts, the amount owed to them exceeds the amount stipulated by point. 12 (art. 3 point 6 of the law).

A creditor entitled to participate in the insolvency proceeding means such creditor who has formulated and has been partially or fully admitted a petition for the recording of the receivables on the debtor's list of creditors and who has the right to participate and vote in the creditors' meeting, including to vote for a legal reorganization plan endorsed by the bankruptcy judge, to be appointed as a member of the creditors' committee, to take part in the distribution of the funds collected as a result of the debtor's legal reorganization or of the debtor's property liquidation, to be informed or notified on the progress of the procedure and to participate in any other proceeding regulated by this law. The debtor's employees have the capacity of creditors entitled to participate in the insolvency proceeding without having to submit personally a statement of claim (art. 3 point 8 of the law).

The bodies appointed to enforce the proceeding are: legal courts, bankruptcy judges, trustees in bankruptcy and liquidators.

Taking into consideration its collective nature, other stakeholders take part in the insolvency proceeding: creditors' general meeting, creditors' committee and the special administrator.

As we have talked about the parties earlier herein, we will continue by presenting the categories of the bodies that implement the insolvency proceeding and of the other participants.

Chapter 2: Bodies implementing the insolvency procedure

Subchapter 1: Preliminary Explanations

The nucleus of the matter is article 5 and subsequent articles of Law no. 85/2006, according to which the bodies implementing the insolvency proceeding are:

- the legal courts (regulated by the provisions of art. 6-8 of Law no. 85/2006);
- the bankruptcy judge (regulated by the provisions of art. 9-12 of Law no. 85/2006);
- the trustee in bankruptcy (regulated by the provisions of art. 19-23 of Law no.85/2006);
- the liquidator (regulated by the provisions of art. 24 and 25 of Law no. 85/2006).

In the French law, the bodies implementing this procedure are:

- the legal courts;
- one or more juges-commissaires;
- the public ministry;
- the legal agent;
- one or more trustees in bankruptcy;
- the liquidator.

In the British law, the bodies implementing this procedure are:

- the Court;
- the administrator;
- the official receiver;
- the administrative receiver;
- the supervisor or nominee;
- the liquidator or provisional liquidator;

Subchapter 2: Legal courts

A. Preliminary explanations

Law no. 85/2006 consecrates the traditional concept according to which the main part in implementing collective proceedings is played by the legal courts. During the proceeding, certain disputable aspects may occur (having a litigation nature), which may require the trial of the case under contradiction circumstances, and the only authorities able to intervene and order over such disputes are the legal courts. According to the law, the legal courts entitled to implement the insolvency procedure are the tribunal (as a first instance) and the court of appeal (as an appeal instance).

B. The tribunal

a) Principles

The law grants full authority to a tribunal; thus, according to the provisions of art. 6 of Law no. 85/2006, „all the proceedings required by this law, except for the appeal stipulated by art.8, shall fall under the responsibility of the tribunal under whose jurisdiction the debtor's registered office is located...", as registered with the Trade Registry or with the agricultural company registry or with the registry of associations and foundations and shall be exercised by the bankruptcy judge.

Therefore, the bankruptcy judge has the authority of trialling both main requests and ancillary or incidental petitions: intervention requests[1] or injunction reliefs[2]. The purpose of granting full authority is that of making effective the principle of celerity of insolvency proceedings and of ensuring continuity in the completion of the procedures required by insolvency.

b) Authorities

b.1. venue of the court

By analyzing the provisions of art. 6 of Law. 85/2006, the first instance venue is the tribunal, irrespective of the value of the creditors' receivables (less than 500,000 RON or more than 500,000 RON). Such provisions have a special nature and derogate from the general matter provisions (art. 2 letter b of the Rules of Civil Procedure), according to which the tribunals trial as first instance the civil lawsuits and claims whose subject-matter exceeds 500,000 lei (RON). Therefore, if the receivables value is 500,000 RON or less, the venue of the court authorized to settle the case is the tribunal and not the city court, as required by the general regulations.

b.2. jurisdiction of the court

According to art. 6 of Law no. 85/2006, the sole criterion to determine the jurisdiction of the court (and of the insolvency department – if such department has been created) is the debtor's head office, as registered with the Public Registers.

The jurisdiction of the court is determined on the day the court is informed by means of a petition for an order of relief so that, even if the debtor changes its registered office during the proceedings to the jurisdiction of another tribunal, the original tribunal (where the debtor had its original registered office) shall have the authority to settle the case (according to the provisions of art. 6 par. 3 of the Law no.85/2006).

Should a debtor under insolvency proceedings be a subsidiary of a trade company, the jurisdiction of the court shall be the tribunal under whose jurisdiction the company is registered, as, according to art. 42 of Law no. 31/1990, such subsidiary is a legal entity.

The situation is different for a branch of a trade company. In this case, as a branch is not a legal entity, the jurisdiction of the court is the tribunal where the parent-company is registered, as the debtor in such a case is the latter and not the former.

b.3. functionality of the court

Law no.85/2006 does not require the establishment of a dedicated insolvency department within a tribunal, but, where such department exists, „it is the one authorised to carry out the proceedings stipulated by this law".

[1] Bucharest Court of Appeal, 5th Commercial dept., decision no. 276/2007, published in C.A.B., Anthology,1, 2007, page199.

[2] Bucharest Court of Appeal, 5th Commercial dept., decision no. 1088/2007, published in C.A.B., Anthology,1, 2007, page210.

c) Proceeding rules

The proceeding rules established by Law no. 85/2006 are aimed at making effective the celerity principle and have mainly a derogatory nature from the common law (The Rules of Civil Procedure) in terms of subpoenas and the communication of the proceedings documents, namely:

- subpoenaing the parties, as well as communicating any proceeding documents, summons and notifications are carried out by the Insolvency Proceedings Bulletin, except for the following cases (when the provisions of the Rules Of Civil procedures apply):
- participants having their registered office or residence abroad (art.7 par.1 thesis 2);
- communication of the proceeding documents which precede the commencement of the proceedings and the notification concerning the commencement of the proceedings (art.7 par.3);
- first subpoena and the communication of the proceeding documents to the parties against whom a lawsuit is filed, by virtue of law no. 85/2006, after opening the insolvency proceedings (art.7 par.3 ind.1);
- the creditors having submitted requests for the admission of receivables, who are supposedly aware of the hearing date and, therefore, will not be subpoenaed (art.7 par.7);
- in the litigation proceedings regulated by Law no. 85/2006 shall be subpoenaed as parties only the entities whose rights or interests are referred to the bankruptcy judge to be settled, under contradiction circumstances; in any other cases shall apply the provisions of the Rules of Civil Procedure on the non-litigation proceedings, to the extent to which they do not violate any express provisions of this law (art. 7 par. 2);

The notifications, except when they are the responsibility of other bodies enforcing the procedure, shall be carried out by the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator, where appropriate (art. 7 par. 6).

Should the debtor be a company traded on a regulated market, the bankruptcy judge shall communicate the order forrelief to the Securities National Commission (art. 7 par. 4).

B. The Court of Appeal

a) Authority

According to the provisions of art.8 of Law no. 85/2006, the court of appeal is the venue authorized to trial the appeal filed against the decisions passed by the bankruptcy judge.

b) Proceedings rules

The law sets deadlines and special proceedings, which are derogatory from the relevant common law, concerning the trial of the appeal:

- the appeal deadline is 7 days after the decision has been communicated, unless the law specifies otherwise;
- the right of appeal against the decisions of the bankruptcy judge is to be held only by the participants in the proceedings in the cases and under the conditions provided by law; the creditors who have not applied for a statement of affairs do not hold such right; on the other hand, the creditors who have applied for a statement of affairs and their application has been rejected are entitled to such right;
- the appeal shall be trialed by specialized panels no later than 10 days after the files was registered with the court of appeal;
- the subpoenaing of the parties in the appeal and the communication of the passed decisions shall be carried out according to the provisions of the Rules of Civil Procedure;

- by derogation from the provisions of art. 300 par. 2 and 3 in the Rules of Civil Procedure, the decisions of the bankruptcy judge cannot be suspended by the appeal court, unless the appeal concerns:
- the decision rejecting the debtor's contestation, filed by virtue of art. 33 par.4;
- the judgment whereby it has been decided to enter the simplified proceedings;
- the judgment whereby bankruptcy has been decided upon, passed according to art. 107;
- the judgment settling the appeal against the plan of distributing the funds obtained following liquidation and collection of the receivables, filed by virtue of art. 122 par.3 of the law.
- for all the appeals filed against the decisions passed by the bankruptcy judge as part of the proceedings a single file shall be constituted.

Subchapter 3: Bankruptcy judge

All the proceedings concerning insolvency falling under the authority of the tribunal, according to Law no. 85/2006, are exercised by the bankruptcy judge. Thus, such judge plays the main role in applying the insolvency proceedings.

A. Capacity of bankruptcy judges

The bankruptcy judges have the legal capacity of a judge – a court judge. Bankruptcy judges have a public position of general interest and they organize and run the entire insolvency proceeding, from its opening to its closure. Therefore, to fulfill their duties, bankruptcy judges do not act as representatives of the creditors' or debtors' interests. They act as judges, their orders are binding for all the participants in the insolvency proceedings.

In the French law, such a judge is called a juge-commisaire and is appointed by the tribunal (several juges-commisaires may be appointed if necessary)[3].

B.* Appointing bankruptcy judges

According to art. 9 of Law no.85/2006, the assignment of the cases whose subject-matter is the proceedings stipulated by this law to the judges appointed as bankruptcy judges is carried out randomly and computer-based in compliance with the provisions of art. 53 of the Law no. 304/2004 on judicial organization[4], republished.

C. Duties of bankruptcy judges

The main duties of bankruptcy judges are regulated by art. 11 of Law no. 85/2006, namely:

a) the justified order for relief and, where applicable, for bankruptcy, both within general and simplified proceedings;

b) consideration of debtor's appeal against the creditors' first claim for the commencement of proceedings; consideration of creditors' opposition to the commencement of proceedings;

c) the appointment justified by the judgment for an order for relief of a temporary trustee in bankruptcy or, where applicable, of a liquidator, among the compatible insolvency practitioners having submitted an offer for this purpose to the case file, who will manage the proceedings until his/her confirmation or replacement by the creditors' meeting or by the creditor holding at least 50%

[3] Dominique Legeais, Droit commercial et des affaires, pct. 813.
[4] Published in the Official Gazette no. 576/29th June 2004.

of the receivables; the determination of remuneration in compliance with the criteria set by the law on insolvency practitioners, as well as of their obligations for such period. The bankruptcy judge shall appoint the temporary trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator requested by the creditor who has submitted the petition for the commencement of proceedings or by the debtor, if such petition has been filed by the latter. Should the party having submitted the petition for an order for relief not request the appointment of a trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator, such appointment shall be performed by the bankruptcy judge among the practitioners who have submitted offers in the case file. In case of a file merger, the debtors' petitions shall be considered based on the value of receivables or on the debtor's petition, if there is no petition filed by a creditor;

d) the confirmed appointment, by means of a conclusion, of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator designated by the creditors' meeting or by the creditor holding at least 50% of the receivables, as well as the acknowledgement of the fee agreed upon. If there are no appeals against the creditors' meeting decision or against the decision of the creditor holding at least 50% of the receivables, such acknowledgement shall be performed in council chambers, without subpoenaing the parties, no later than 3 days after the creditors' meeting decision or the main creditor's decision was published in the Insolvency Proceeding Bulletin;

e) the replacement on solid grounds and by means of a conclusion of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator;

f) the consideration of the petitions requesting the removal of the debtor's right of running his business;

g) the consideration of petitions for personal liability for the members of management who have contributed to the debtor's insolvency, according to art.138, the intimation of the investigating bodies concerning the offences stipulated by art. 143-147;

h) the consideration of actions filed by the trustee in bankruptcy or the liquidator for the cancellation of some fraudulent documents and of some estate-related establishments or transfers preceding the commencement of proceedings;

i) the consideration of the appeals of the debtor, the creditors' committee or any other stakeholders against the measures taken by the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator;

j) the admission and approval of the reorganization plan or, where applicable, the liquidation plan, after it has been voted by the creditors;

k) the settlement of the petition of the trustee in bankruptcy or |the creditors' committee to discontinue the reorganization and bankruptcy procedures;

l) the settlement of the contestations submitted against the reports of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator;

m) the consideration of the action for the annulment of the creditors' meeting decision;

n) the delivery of the judgment on the decision of closing the proceeding.

The bankruptcy judge is not the debtor's manager under insolvency. The management duties belong to the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator or, exceptionally, to the debtor itself if such debtor has not been deprived of the right to manage his property.

According to art.11 par. 2 of the law, the duties of the bankruptcy judge are restricted to the judicial control of the activity of the trustee in bankruptcy and/or the liquidator and to the judicial processes and petitions related to the insolvency proceedings. The management decisions may be controlled in terms of opportunities by the creditors, through their bodies.

In order to fulfil its obligations, a bankruptcy judge may ask for the opinions of experts in various fields. Such experts may be appointed, by means of a conclusion, by the bankruptcy judge upon the proposal of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator. Such experts are entitled to receive a remuneration whose value shall be determined by the bankruptcy judge, by means of a conclusion; such remuneration shall be paid out of the debtor's estate or, in the absence of liquidities, out of the fund stipulated by art.4 par. 4 of Law no.85/2006.

D. Decisions of the bankruptcy judge

The decisions of the bankruptcy judge shall be definitive and enforceable as of the day they have been passed. They can be appealed (art.12 par.1). By derogation from the provisions of art. 300 par. 2 and 3 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, the decisions of the bankruptcy judge shall not be suspended by the appeal court unless in case the appeal concerns:

a) the sentence whereby the debtor's contestation is rejected, filed by virtue of art. 33 par.4;
b) the judgment whereby it has been decided to enter the simplified proceedings;
c) the judgment whereby bankruptcy has been decided, passed according to art. 107;
d) the judgment settling the appeal against the plan of distributing the funds obtained following liquidation and cashing the receivables, filed by virtue of art. 122 par. 3 of the law.

The bankruptcy judge is authorized to pass successive resolutions in the same file. This status quo does not lead to incompatibility, according to the provisions of art. 24 par.1 of the Rules of Civil procedure, unless there is a case of retrial after the resolution was written off during appeal. (art. 12 par. 2 of Law no. 85/2006).

A. Cessation of the duties of the bankruptcy judge and the specialist personnel appointed by the former

The duties of the bankruptcy judge shall cess as of its replacement, as well as in case of closure of the insolvency proceedings.

a) replacement of the bankruptcy judge

Unlike the old regulation (law no.64/1995), Law no.85/2006 does not regulate the conditions in which the bankruptcy judge may be replaced. Nevertheless, in practice, the question of replacement may occur in case of incompatibility (other than that stipulated by art. 12 par.2 of Law no.85/2006), abstention or recusal. We believe that in such a case a new bankruptcy judge will be appointed randomly and computer-aided in compliance with the provisions of art. 9 of Law no. 85/2006.

b) closure of proceedings

According to art. 136 of the law, upon the closure of the proceedings, the bankruptcy judge, trustee/liquidator and all other participating entities are relieved from any duties and responsibilities regarding the proceeding, the debtor and his estate, the creditors,, security holder, the partners and shareholders.

Should the bankruptcy judge have been assisted by experts, their duties cess in the same manner. We believe that, as the appointment of experts was carried out by the bankruptcy judge, their duties may cess also by their replacement by the bankruptcy judge or by their removal.

Subchapter 4: Trustee in bankruptcy

A. Capacity of a trustee in bankruptcy

An important role in the insolvency proceeding, along with the bankruptcy judge, is played by the trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy is the compatible natural or legal entity practising insolvency, duly authorised and appointed to perform the duties required by law during the observation period and during the reorganisation procedure (art. 3 point 27).

According to the provisions of art. 19 par. 5, the trustee in bankruptcy, a natural or legal entity, including its representative, shall have the capacity of an insolvency practitioner. The legal status of insolvency practitioners is regulated by the Emergency Government Order no.86/2006 on insolvency practitioners[5].

B. Appointing a trustee in bankruptcy

The trustee in bankruptcy shall be appointed in compliance with the provisions of art. 19 of the law.

B.1 the process of appointing a temporary trustee in bankruptcy

The person who wants to be appointed as a trustee in bankruptcy in an insolvency file shall submit in advance a documentation including:

- the proof of their capacity of insolvency practitioners;
- copy of the professional insurance policy;
- bid of taking over the position of a trustee in bankruptcy in the relevant file.

Among these people, by means of the judgement for the commencement of the general proceeding, the bankruptcy judge shall designate one of the bidders as a temporary trustee in bankruptcy, and by means of the judgement for the commencement of simplified proceeding, the bankruptcy judge shall designate a temporary liquidator. For the temporary appointment of the trustee in bankruptcy, the bankruptcy judge shall take into consideration all the submitted offers, of the petitions submitted by the creditors and, where applicable, by the debtor, if the first petition belongs to the debtor.

Therefore, when the first petition is formulated by the debtor, the latter may propose a trustee in bankruptcy. The creditors, by means of their petition submitted to the court, have the same possibility of proposing a trustee in bankruptcy. Should the holder of the first petition not propose a trustee in bankruptcy, the bankruptcy judge shall appoint a temporary trustee in bankruptcy among the bidders. Should no insolvency practitioners have submitted any offer to the file, the bankruptcy judge shall appoint temporarily, until the first creditors' meeting, an insolvency practitioner selected randomly out of the Table of the National Union of Insolvency Practitioners (art.19 par.1).

B.2 the procedure of appointing a temporary trustee in bankruptcy

Upon the recommendation of the creditors' committee, during the first creditors' meeting or later, the creditors' holding at least 50% of the total receivables may decide upon the appointment of a trustee in bankruptcy/liquidator, determining their remuneration (art.19 par.2). The creditors may decide to acknowledge the trustee in bankruptcy who has been temporarily appointed by the bankruptcy judge or may appoint another insolvency practitioner.

Should one of the creditors hold more than 50% of the total receivables, such creditors may decide upon the appointment of a trustee in bankruptcy and set their remuneration without consulting the creditors' meeting. In such case, such creditor may also acknowledge the person that has been temporarily appointed by the bankruptcy judge or may appoint another insolvency practitioner.

The creditors' decision or the decision of the creditor holding more than 50% of the total receivables concerning the acknowledgement of the temporary trustee in bankruptcy /liquidator appointed by the bankruptcy judge or concerning the appointment of the trustee in bankruptcy /liquidator (who is another insolvency practitioner than that temporarily appointed by the bankruptcy judge) may be contested by the creditors only on grounds of unlawfulness. Such contestation shall be formulated and submitted to the file no later than three days after any of the decisions mentioned above has been published in the Insolvency Proceeding Bulletin.

[5] Published in the Official Gazette no. 944/22.11.2006, approved by Law no. 254/2007 (Official Gazette no.507/30.07.2007).

All the contestations shall be settled simultaneously and urgently by the bankruptcy judge by means of a conclusion which may order the following:

- reject all contestations and appoint the designated trustee in bankruptcy/liquidator acknowledged by the decision of the creditor(s) holding more than 50% of the total receivables;
- admit the contestation, in which case the meeting of the creditors/ the creditor holding more than 50% of the total receivables shall be requested to designate another trustee in bankruptcy /liquidator;

If within three days after either of the decisions mentioned above has been published in the Insolvency Proceeding Bulletin no contestation is formulated, by means of a conclusion, the bankruptcy judge shall appoint the trustee in bankruptcy proposed by the creditors or the creditor holding more than 50% of the total receivables.

By means of a conclusion, upon the appointment of the trustee in bankruptcy (who is another insolvency practitioner than that temporarily appointed), the bankruptcy judge shall order the cessation of all duties of the temporarily designated trustee in bankruptcy.

In order to protect the debtor's and creditors' interests, the law requires the trustee in bankruptcy to have concluded a professional liability insurance which he shall show before his appointment and keep it, without reducing the insured amount directly or indirectly. In case of violation of these obligations, the trustee in bankruptcy shall be removed and shall pay potential damage (art.19 par.9).

In the British law, as part of the administrative receivership, the „administrator receiver" is designated by the creditor among the insolvency practitioners. The creditor designates such receiver by means of a document that is binding provided that the designated receiver accepts such position. Such acceptance shall be given until the end of the working day following the day when the designated receiver received the appointment document. In the old regulation, a designated receiver could be replaced by the creditor having appointed him. Nowadays, a receiver's replacement may be ordered only by the court[6].

As part of the procedure called administration, the administrator is a person appointed in compliance with sch B1 of the Insolvency Act 1986, in order to manage daily activities, business and assets of the companies. Such administrator is an officer of the court and is appointed among the insolvency practitioners by the court, the majority creditor, by the company or its managers.

In the French law, according to needs, one or more trustees in bankruptcy may be appointed, whose duties are determined by the court and may consist of assisting the debtor in managing the company or even in administering it, fully or partially.

C. Duties of the trustee in bankruptcy

According to art. 20 of Law no. 85/2006, the main duties of a trustee in bankruptcy, for the purpose of this law, are:

a) to examine the debtor's economic status and the documents submitted in compliance with art. 28 and 35 and to draw up a report whereby either the simplified proceeding or the continuation of the observation period as part of the general proceeding is proposed, then to submit the report to the bankruptcy judge within a period set by the latter, which cannot exceed 20 days after the trustee in bankruptcy has been appointed;

b) to examine the debtor's business and draw up a detailed report on the causes and circumstances leading to insolvency, by mentioning the people to which such insolvency may be imputed, as well as on the existence of the conditions leading to their liability, in compliance with art. 138, as well as on the real possibility of debtor's actual business reorganization or on the reasons which do not allow such reorganization and to submit the report to the bankruptcy judge within a period set by the latter, which cannot exceed 40 day after the trustee in bankruptcy has been appointed;

[6] Roy Goode, Commercial law, page 847.

c) to draw up the documents stipulated by art. 28 par. 1 if the debtor failed to fulfill their relevant obligation within legal deadlines, as well as to verify, correct and supplement the information in the relevant documents, when they have been presented by the debtor;

d) to develop the debtor's business reorganization plan based on the content of the report mentioned in letter a above and in the terms and conditions stipulated by art. 94;

e) to supervise the operation of debtor's estate management;

f) to manage fully or partially the debtor's business; if partially, such management shall be performed in compliance with the express requirements of the bankruptcy judge concerning his duties and the terms of payment out of the debtor's account;

g) to convene, chair and ensure the secretariat of the creditors', shareholders', partners' meetings or of the meetings of the debtor's members who are legal entities;

h) to file actions for the annulment of the fraudulent documents concluded by the debtor to the damage and prejudice of the creditors' rights, as well as of some property related transfers, of business operations concluded by the debtor and of some securities granted by the latter which will supposedly damage the creditors' rights;

i) to inform immediately the bankruptcy judge if they find that the debtor has no assets or that such assets do not suffice to cover administration expenses;

j) to maintain or terminate some contracts concluded by the debtor;

k) to check the receivables and, where applicable, to formulate objections to such receivables, as well as to develop receivables tables;

l) to collect receivables; to follow the collection of receivables concerning the debtor's property or the amounts transferred by the debtor before the commencement of the proceeding; to formulate and support claims for the collection of the debtor's payables, even by means of attorneys;

m) provided that the following are endorsed by the bankruptcy judge, to conclude transactions, bankruptcy discharges, to discharge fidejussors, to wave security interests;

n) to inform the bankruptcy judge about any matter that may require settling by the latter.

By means of a conclusion, the bankruptcy judge may set for the trustee in bankruptcy any additional duties to those mentioned in art. 20 par. 1, except for the duties which the law requires as the authority of the former.

The trustee in bankruptcy shall be remunerated for the performance of his duties. Such remuneration shall be determined by the bankruptcy judge by means of the order for relief which may be later amended by creditors..

In addition to the duties above, the trustee in bankruptcy shall submit on a monthly basis a report including the description of how they have fulfilled their duties, as well a rationale for the expenses spent to manage the proceeding or for any other expenses made out of the funds in the debtor's property, including their remuneration, as well as of the method such remuneration has been calculated.

To exercise his duties, the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to designate certain experts (art.23). The appointment and remuneration of experts shall be submitted to the approval of the creditors' committee, and, should the remunerations of such people be paid of the liquidation fund, the appointment and the remuneration shall be approved by the bankruptcy judge.

In the British law, the concept of a trustee may have two meanings, each for a different procedure:

a) administrative receiver, who is appointed for a creditor's interest;

b) administrator, appointed in the procedure of administration;

a) What is characteristic for the procedure performed by the administrative receiver is that such procedure has the legal status of a judicial enforcement and not of a collective insolvency procedure. According to law, an administrative receiver shall ensure with priority the covering of secure party creditors. His main obligation is to serve the interests of the debenture holder who has appointed him, and his main duty is to make sure that the payables of the debtor appointing him are paid, either by liquidating debtor's assets and distributing the collected price to the creditor, or by managing the business, collecting the profit and distributing it to the creditor. Therefore, even if such receiver acts on behalf of the debtor, his duties are subordinated to the creditor's interests[7].

The administrative receiver holds two kinds of powers: i) powers in rem and ii) agency powers. The powers in rem have their source in the securities accompanying the credit and include the right of possessing and collecting the fruit and of using the assets constituting the security. Carrying out such powers in not influenced in any way by the order for relief.

By virtue of his managing powers, the administrative receiver may run the debtor's business, may hire or lay off employees, may conclude or terminate debtor's contracts. Such powers cess on the day of the order for relief[8].

b) The administrator's legal status is more similar to the status of the trustee in bankruptcy in our law system. The main difference from the administrative receiver is that the administrator is appointed to represent the debtor and to serve his interests and the interests of the creditors' group, who shall be consulted before his appointment. The proceeding carried out by the administrator (called „administration") has the following characteristics: transparency, responsibility and collectivity and may have two forms: rescue or asset liquidation and distribution of price. The objective to be achieved by the administrator is, in the order of priority[9]:

- rescuing the company;
- recovering some receivables in an amount for the group of creditors that is greater than the amount should the liquidation have been applied, without a preceding administration;
- liquidation of company's assets in order to ensure the payment for one or more secure party creditors or priority creditors.

The effect of this procedure is the discontinuity of the judicial enforcement on the debtor's real property or debtor's rights of claim[10].

The powers of the administrator are identical to those of the administrative receiver (in rem and managing), which have been mentioned above; furthermore, the administrator may remove or appoint directors and may convene the creditors' general meeting.

D. Contestations against the measures taken by the trustee in bankruptcy

The measures taken by the trustee in bankruptcy when carrying out his/her duties may be contested in compliance with art. 21 of Law no. 85/2006. The law acknowledges the locus standi of suing in making the contestation:

a) natural person debtor;
b) special administrator of legal entity debtor;
c) creditors;
d) any other stakeholder.

The contestation shall be registered no later than 3 days after the report by the trustee in bankruptcy to the bankruptcy judge and shall be trialed no later than 5 days after its registration, in

[7] Roy Goode, Commercial law, page 845.
[8] Roy Goode, Commercial law, page 847.
[9] Roy Goode, Commercial law, page 851-0852.
[10] Roy Goode, Commercial law, page 852.

chambers by subpoenaing the claimant, the trustee in bankruptcy and the creditors' committee. Upon the claimant's request, the bankruptcy judge may suspend the enforcement of the contested measure.

The bankruptcy judge cannot cancel by default the measures taken by the trustee in bankruptcy which have not been contested, if such measures have been taken in compliance with the law. However, if such measures are unlawful, taking into consideration the role of the bankruptcy judge, in accordance with art. 11 par. 2 of the law, such judge shall have the obligation to cancel any unlawful measure taken by the trustee in bankruptcy, even if such measure has not been contested by the parties entitled to do it.

E. Replacing the trustee in bankruptcy

The trustee in bankruptcy may be replaced by the bankruptcy judge at any stage of the proceeding, on solid grounds in compliance with the provisions of art. 22 of the law. The replacement of the trustee in bankruptcy may be ordered by default or upon the request of the creditors' committee. The replacement shall be ordered by means of a conclusion which, in order to ensure transparency and prevent abuse, shall be explained. The conclusion whereby replacement is ordered shall be passed urgently in Council Chambers by subpoenaing the trustee in bankruptcy and the creditors' committee.

In the British law, the replacement of the trustee in bankruptcy may be ordered by the court upon the former's request or following the request of a creditor or partner/shareholder of the debtor company, when the administrator has acted or is acting or intends to act wrongly, so that to damage the claimant's interests[11].

F. Sanctions that may be applied to the trustee in bankruptcy

In order to make effective the principle of celerity of deeds and operations concerning the insolvency proceeding, the law requires that, if the relevant practitioner refuses his appointment as a trustee in bankruptcy or, once he has been appointed in such capacity, he fails to fulfil or delays the fulfilment of his duties stipulated by law or set by the bankruptcy judge, such trustee in bankruptcy may be fined with a judicial fine by the bankruptcy judge.

F.1 Refusal of appointment

An insolvency practitioner designated for the case may refuse the appointment; for this purpose, such practitioner shall communicate the refusal to the court no later than 5 days after the appointment notification. Failing to communicate his refusal timely, without solid grounds, shall be sanctioned by the bankruptcy judge with a judicial fine ranging between RON 500 to 1000. In such case of refusal, a new insolvency practitioner shall be appointed, in compliance with art. 19 of the law.

F.2 Failing or delaying the fulfillment of duties

Should the trustee in bankruptcy, by fault or bad faith, fail to fulfill his duties or delay same fulfillment, such trustee may be sanctioned by the bankruptcy judge with a judicial fine ranging between RON 1000 to 5000. Should damage have been caused following the failure or delay of duty fulfillment, upon the request of any stakeholder, the bankruptcy judge may force the trustee in bankruptcy to pay damages.

For the enforcement of the fines and damages, the provisions of art. 108 ind.4 and ind.5 of the Rules of Civil Procedure shall apply.

[11] Roy Goode, Commercial law, page 853-854.

Subchapter 5: Liquidator

A. Capacity of liquidator

An important role in the insolvency proceeding is played by the liquidator. For the purpose of Law no. 85/2006 (art 3 point 28), the liquidator is a natural or legal entity practicing insolvency and being duly authorized, appointed to run the debtor's business and carry out the duties required by law for both the general and simplified bankruptcy proceeding.

B. Appointing the liquidator

According to the provisions of art. 24 of Law no. 85/2006, the liquidator is appointed following the same rules as the trustee in bankruptcy, the provisions of art. 19 of the law applying appropriately.

The law allows that a formerly designated trustee in bankruptcy be appointed as a liquidator.

On the day the liquidator's duties have been set by the bankruptcy judge, the mandate of the trustee in bankruptcy cesses.

B. Duties of liquidator

According to art. 25 of Law no. 85/2006, the main duties of a liquidator are:

a) to examine the business of the debtor undergoing the simplified procedure against the actual status and drawing up a detailed report on the causes and circumstances leading to insolvency, by mentioning the people to which such insolvency may be imputed, as well as on the existence of the conditions leading to their liability, in compliance with art. 138, and to submit the report to the bankruptcy judge within a period set by the latter, which cannot exceed 40 day after the liquidator has been appointed, provided that such report was not drawn before by the trustee in bankruptcy;

b) to run the debtor's business;

c) to file actions for the annulment of the fraudulent documents concluded by the debtor to the damage and prejudice of the creditors' rights, as well as of some property related transfers, of business operations concluded by the debtor and of some securities granted by the latter which will supposedly damage the creditors' rights;

d) to apply seals, list assets and take appropriate measures for their preservation;

e) to maintain or terminate some contracts concluded by the debtor;

f) to check the receivables and, where applicable, to formulate objections to such receivables, as well as to develop receivables tables;

g) to follow the collection of receivables concerning the debtor's property resulting from assets or amounts transferred by the debtor before the commencement of the proceeding; to collect receivables, to formulate and support claims for the collection of the debtor's payables, even by means of attorneys;

h) to receive payments on behalf of the debtor and record them in the debtor's property account;

i) to sell assets from the debtor's property, in compliance with the provisions of this law;

j) provided that the following are endorsed by the bankruptcy judge, to conclude transactions, bankruptcy discharge, to discharge fidejussors, to wave security interests;

k) to inform the bankruptcy judge about any matter that may require settling by the latter;

l) any other duties set by the bankruptcy judge by means of a conclusion.

The liquidator shall be remunerated for the performance of his duties. As for the trustee in bankruptcy, such remuneration shall be determined by the bankruptcy judge by means of the order for relief which may be later amended by creditors.

In addition to the duties above, on every proceeding hearing, the liquidator shall submit a report including the description of how he has fulfilled his duties, as well a rationale for the expenses spent to manage the proceeding or for any other expenses made out of the funds in the debtor's property. The report shall contain the activities performed every month or for a few months.

To exercise his duties, the liquidator is entitled to designate certain experts (art.23 and 24 of the law). The appointment and remuneration of experts shall be submitted to the approval of the creditors' committee, and, should the remunerations of such people be paid of the liquidation fund, the appointment and the remuneration shall be approved by the bankruptcy judge.

D. Contestations against the measures taken by the liquidator

The measures taken by the liquidator when carrying out his/her duties may be contested in compliance with art. 21 par.2 and art. 24 of Law no. 85/2006. The law acknowledges the locus standi of suing in making the contestation:

a) natural person debtor;
b) special administrator of legal entity debtor;
c) any of the creditors;
d) any other stakeholder.

The contestation shall be registered no later than 3 days after the report by the liquidator has been submitted to the bankruptcy judge and shall be trialed no later than 5 days after its registration, in chambers by subpoenaing the claimant, the liquidator and the creditors' committee. Upon the claimant's request, the bankruptcy judge may suspend the enforcement of the contested measure

The bankruptcy judge cannot cancel by default the measures taken by the liquidator, which have not been contested, if such measures have been taken in compliance with the law. However, if such measures are unlawful, taking into consideration the role of the bankruptcy judge, in accordance with art. 11 par. 2 of the law, such judge shall have the obligation to cancel any unlawful measure taken by the liquidator, even if such measure has not been contested by the parties entitled to do it.

E. Replacing the liquidator

The liquidator may be replaced by the bankruptcy judge at any stage of the proceeding, on solid grounds in compliance with the provisions of art. 22 par. 2 and art. 24 of the law. The replacement of the liquidator may be ordered by default or upon the request of the creditors' committee. The replacement shall be ordered by means of a conclusion which, in order to ensure transparency and prevent abuse, shall be explained. The conclusion whereby replacement is ordered shall be passed urgently in Council Chambers by subpoenaing the liquidator and the creditors' committee.

F. Sanctions that may be applied to the liquidator

As for the trustee in bankruptcy, the liquidator who refuses the appointment or fails to fulfill or does not fulfill his duties appropriately may receive a fine in compliance with the law.

In order to make effective the principle of celerity of deeds and operations concerning the insolvency proceeding, the law required that, if the relevant practitioner refuses his appointment as a liquidator or, once he has been appointed in such capacity, he fails to fulfill or delays the fulfillment of his duties stipulated by law or set by the bankruptcy judge, such trustee in bankruptcy may be fined with a judicial fine by the bankruptcy judge.

F.1 Refusal of appointment

An insolvency practitioner designated for the case may refuse the appointment; for this purpose, such practitioner shall communicate the refusal to the court no later than 5 days after the appointment notification. Failing to communicate his refusal timely, without solid grounds, shall be sanctioned by the bankruptcy judge with a judicial fine ranging between RON 500 to 1000. In such case of refusal, a new insolvency practitioner shall be appointed, in compliance with art. 19 of the law

F.2 Failing or delaying the fulfillment of duties

Should the liquidator, by fault or bad faith, fail to fulfill his/her duties or delay same fulfillment, such liquidator may be sanctioned by the bankruptcy judge with a judicial fine ranging between RON 1000 to 5000. Should damage have been caused following the failure or delay of duty fulfillment, upon the request of any stakeholder, the bankruptcy judge may force the liquidator to pay damages.

For the enforcement of the fines and damages, the provisions of art. 108 ind.4 and ind.5 of the Rules of Civil Procedure shall apply .

Chapter 3: Other participants in the insolvency proceeding

Besides the bodies authorized to enforce the procedure, who have been analyzed above, other participants in insolvency are the creditors' general meeting, the creditors' committee and special administrator.

Chapter 4: Conclusions

The purpose of the insolvency proceeding is the establishment of a collective procedure to cover the liabilities of the debtor undergoing insolvency, by paying the debtor's payables to the creditor(s), which shows the concern of the lawmakers for ensuring the protection of creditors' interests.

Among others, the insolvency proceeding is a legal and collective procedure, as shown in the chapter on the characteristics of the insolvency proceeding. Therefore, all deeds and operations involved in the insolvency proceeding are regulated by the law and are performed under judicial control by the bodies authorized to enforce them (legal courts, bankruptcy judge, trustee in bankruptcy and liquidator). Taking into consideration its collective nature, other stakeholders participate in the insolvency proceeding (creditors' general meeting, creditors' committee and special administrator).

Conclusions

We believe that the new regulations on insolvency should greatly emphasize the efficiency of this procedure, mainly conditioned by the quick performance of the process stages. The repeated legislative reforms have shown care for speed, for shorter solution periods, but, at least so far, they have not proven efficient enough, as the proceedings are carried out over long period of times – years. These procedures modified and gave more powers and duties to the participants, being more clear and concrete.

The efficiency of the procedure may also be given by the advantages, but especially by the disadvantages it generates to the debtors and creditors (for creditors – the possibility of a compulsory payment of a legal security, stopping of the calculation of any interests, increases and penalties, the possibility of maintaining some ongoing contracts, contrary to the creditors' interests, the debtor's discharge of debts, and for the debtors – the interdiction of a repeated reorganization application, removal of debtor's right to administer his assets, possibility of forcing the debtor to submit a legal security for provision of services).

The soundness, transparency and efficiency of these regulations will ensure the stability and dynamics necessary to the business environment, will encourage trade in good faith and will deter the ill-meaning traders, will allow for a safe circulation of capital and will prevent financial blockages.

References

Treaties, university courses, monographs

- Carpenaru, Stanciu D „Tratat de drept comercial român", Ed. „Universul juridic" ,
- Bucuresti 2008;
- Nemes, Vasile, Drept comercial, Ed. „Universul juridic", Bucuresti 2011;
- Schiau Ioan, „Drept comercial", Ed. Hamangiu, Bucuresti 2009;
- Schiau Ioan, „Regimul juridic al insolventei", Bucuresti 2001;
- Turcu, Ion, Tratat de insolventa, Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucuresti 2006;
- Piperea, Gheorghe, Insolventa: legea, regulile, realitatea, Ed. Wolterskluwer, Bucuresti 2008;
- Good, Roy, Principles of corporate insolvency law, 4-ed., London, Sweet & Maxwell, 2011;
- International Insolvency Law Revue, Munchen, Beck 1, 2010;
- Goode, Roy, Commercial Law, 3-ed, Penguin Books,
- Mayson, French and Ryan, Company Law, 24-ed., Oxford 2007-2008,
- Legeais, Dominique, Droit commercial et des affaires, 17-ed., Sirey, 2007;
- Jacquet J.M, Delebecque Ph., Corneloup S., Droit du commerce international, 1-ed., Dalloz 2007;
- Perochon F., Bonhomme R.,Entreprises en difficulte. Instrument de credit et de paiement, 7-ed., L.G.D.J. 2006;

Legislation

a) Romanian legislation

- Law no. 85/2006 on the insolvency procedure.

b) foreign legislation

- The Council Regulation (CE) nr. 1346/2000 on insolvency

UNDER THE NEW CIVIL CODE: THE SALE CONTRACT IS TRANSLATED PROPERTY OR CREATOR ONLY OF OBLIGATIONS?

LIVIU STĂNCIULESCU*

Abstract

According to art. 1650, paragraph. 1, of the Civil Code, "The sale is the contract that the seller transmits or, where appropriate, seek to transmit the property of an asset to the buyer, for a price which the buyer is obliged to pay"

The dispositions of the 2011 civil code suggests that compared to the time of transfer of ownership, the contract may have different legal nature: creative translative property or obligations.

Thus, transfer of ownership may be immediately and in this case, as occurs or may be postponed (conclusion of the contract) and in this case, is an obligation of the seller. For example, art. 1674 of Civil Code states that "the property is" shifting "by right to the buyer" and "General Provisions" of art. 1672. paragraph 1 and art. 1673. paragraph 1 of Civil Code provides that "The seller is obliged to transmit the buyer the ownership of the sold property ".

Please note that until the appearance of the Civil Code 2011, the sale was widely known as "translational property" and a possible shift in the category of contracts creating obligations would produce important consequences for the concept (and related institutions).

On the background issues above, we consider that the presentation of opinions and arguments in their support could be beneficial.

Keywords: seller, property transfers, ownership, obligations, contract

a) Transfer of ownership: the right or the responsibility of the seller?

The sale (that any legal act) legal effect, designed to enforce their interests. As derived directly from the contract (of law) or to the parties, the effects of the contract is divided into: effects of legal and personal effects. Thus, the sales contract has a double effect: the transfer of ownership from the seller to the buyer and the creation of obligations (to the parties).

Given the text of the law, that "the seller shall provide or, where appropriate, the buyer is obliged to send a good property" (Art. 1650 para. 1 Civil Code) would seem that the legislature in 2011 is only concerned with time transfer of ownership

Without diminishing the role of time in which ownership is transferred from seller to buyer, at least as important to consider and determine the real spring that goes right to the buyer.

Clarification inconsistency is justified by the New Civil Code provisions. Thus, according to art. Paragraph 1650. A Civil Code, "the seller send" or seller "is obliged to submit property" (a transfer of ownership means that person is a seller's obligation), in turn, according to art. 1674 Civil Code, "property is shifting the right buyer at the time of conclusion" and art. Paragraph 1683. 3 Civil Code, "property is shifting the right buyer at the time of acquiring the property by the seller" (transfer of ownership is done right, the effect of the agreement will, even when the seller becomes the owner after the contract).

Next, we present briefly the transfer of ownership characteristics in the contract of sale, both in terms of mechanisms that produce it, but the implications when it is done.

b) Property transfers: legal (automatic, instant abstract)

Translative property contracts, representative doctrine is unanimous in assessing that the transfer of ownership takes the law (by agreement of wills, the contract itself, the source of the transfer).

* Professor, Ph. D., Law Faculty, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: stanciulescu.liviu@gmail.com).

Thus, in the opinion permitted national appreciated that, "In contracts which have as their object or another translation as real property, property or right is transmitted by operation of contract" (sn), thus the transmission of ownership is achieved "automatically and ex law.[1]"

Likewise, "even if the parties by their will postpone the transfer of ownership to a date other than the conclusion of this transfer will be all automatic" (sn)[2].

In the same context, but in another opinion stated that "the sale is in essence a contract translative of property so sold property transfer is done right, by contract[3].

Consequently, the seller has an obligation to transfer the property because, once the property transfer contract law, without the intervention of the parties[4].

Transfer of ownership occurs as, although it was agreed that when the transfer is delayed (Art. 1683 para. 3 Civil Code). In short the difference between the transfer of property and obligations of the parties is the difference between the obligations of giving and doing[5].

Also indicated that the transfer of ownership is made instantly (totally healthy), that is inconceivable to understand a possible "transfer rate" of ownership[6].

We appreciate that misunderstandings New Civil Code, reported the matter of ownership transfer mechanism should be attributed to different situations and without coordination of these laws.

Opinion that in any case, there is no question about a contract of sale otherwise (than already known) and therefore, according to the concept enshrined in national and European doctrine, the transfer of ownership in the contract of sale always operates of law (whether time coincides with the conclusion of the contract or transfer was postponed by the will of the parties or the law)[7].

In conclusion, the "displacement" effect property is a legal contract and the seller has two obligations (personal) main teaching work and guarantee customer.

c) When transferring ownership.

In terms of his conduct in time when transfer of ownership is important (to be defined and in no way confused with the source, spring transfer law).

Transfer of ownership at the time the contract.

Usually, the transfer is done right at the time of conclusion of sale. It says so on the immediate transfer of ownership. According to art. 1674 Civil Code, "property is shifting the right buyer at the time of conclusion, even if the property was not delivered or was not yet paid the price."

Postponing the transfer of ownership after the contract end sale at a later date can be operated with the law.

---

[1] See L. Pop, Talk about some clarification of their obligations covered by the law no. 8 / 2005, p. 56-57.

[2] "The sale gives rise only to the requirements of teaching work sold, which is but one to make, and not one to give, subsequent transfer of ownership", see D. Chirica, special contracts. Civile and commercial Rosetti House, Bucharest, 2005, p. 74-75.

[3] See F.l. Moțiu, Special Contracts, Legal Universe Publishing, Bucharest, 2011, p. 59.

[4] The European doctrine established, the value that transfer work widely sold is not "an obligation lies with the seller, because it is done by simple effect of the contract, that is, abstract manner, without any formality and, in principle, instantly" (sn), see Ph. Malaurie, L. Aynès, P.Y. Gautier, Droit civil. Les contrats speciaux, Defrenois, Paris, 2007, p. 161, J. Huet, Traité de droit civil. Les principaux contrats spéciaux, LGDJ, Paris, 2001, p. 179; A. Benabent, Droit civil, civils et Les contrats speciaux comerciaux, Montchrestien, Paris, 2008, p. 94.

[5] See G. Boroi, A.C. Anghelescu, civil law course. The general part. Hamangiu Publishing, Bucharest, 2011, p. 156.

[6] See D. Chirica, op. cit. (2005), p. 40.

[7] Given that ownership is an abstract, we ask the question: How should the legislature understand the actual transfer of ownership by the direct seller?

Likewise, time delay and the parties may transfer agreement at a later date will. They have the right to postpone the moment of transfer of ownership because "time is not of public order"[8].

If the sale of future goods, transfer of ownership operates only when they were executed (if things are to be made, the next crop, etc.).

Also, "when the sale is to such goods, including goods from a limited kind, the property is transferred by the buyer on their individualized teaching, counting, singing, printing, measurement or by otherwise agreed or required by the nature property "(Article 1678 Civil Code).

When concluding the contract the Seller is not working, own health is shifting the right buyer at the time of acquiring the property by the seller (Art. 1683 para. 3 Civil Code).

Likewise, the sale in installments, "the buyer acquires ownership of the final installment payment on the price," even if the thing was delivered terminates the contract (art. 1684 and art. 1755 Civil Code). In this case, the automatic transfer of ownership and abstract character remains[9].

According to art. 119 of Law no. 71/2011 formalities necessary for enforceability reserve property advertising applies to contracts concluded before the entry into force of the New Civil Code, "if the subject property did not become enforceable against the previous law."

Finally, by the will of the law, "real rights on buildings included in the land is acquired, both between parties and against third parties" only upon entry in the land (Article 885 Civil Code). Thus, the sale agreement marks the only time of registration of transfer of immovable property (not the transfer itself, which takes place by agreement of wills).

In conclusion, according to the New Civil Code, the sale of property, transfer of ownership from the seller when the buyer is after the conclusion of the contract and the time overlaps effective against third parties.

d) Another thing selling is prohibited or valid?

By its nature, the sale is "translational property" because the work transferred ownership from seller to buyer. So to achieve the transfer of ownership, the seller must hold the right alienated[10]. Per a contrario, if the seller does not own, cannot sell (on the principle that gave Quod nemo non habet). Thus, "Nothing seems more obvious and common sense than the fact that nobody can send more rights than he himself"[11] (sn).

Based on the foregoing, ownership of the seller is a requirement for the validity object. Although legal abnormal operation, sale by a non-proprietary work is common in practice is known as "selling another thing." The most common are cases of fraudulent operations (eg a third party sale or sales work the same good to multiple buyers), the work sold to a third party without bad faith (in the hope that it will acquire and transmit property later in time[12]) or retroactive loss of the right (following the cancellation or acquisition of property resolution act).

In our legislation, the sale is not expressly banned another work and therefore the situation is subject to general principles governing conventions (general theory of contract)[13].

Please note that previous national doctrine, under the empire of the Civil Code of 1864 acknowledged that "the sale of another work" void contract (for non-requirement of validity of the object).

---

[8] In the French doctrine speaks of bringing forward the time of transfer of ownership of property to be purchased later, see A. Benabent, civil Drpoit. Les contrats speciaux civils et commerciaux, Montchrestien, Paris, 2008, p. 95-97.

[9] See D. Mainguy, Contrats speciaux, Dalloz, Paris 2008, p. 123.

[10] See Fr. Deak, civil law treaty. Special contracts, Actami Publishing, Bucharest, 1999, p 56.

[11] See D. Chrică, op. cit. (2005), p. 71 ff.

[12] For example, the sale by one spouse without the consent of a common good spouse or a spouse possessing, selling to a co-owner of an undivided ownership so good.

[13] Unlike French law, in that art. 1599 Civil Code provides that sales other work is zero.

The new Civil Code challenged "sale of another work" by the provisions of art. paragraph 1683. One that "if the conclusion of the contract on an individual item determined, it is owned by a third party, the contract is valid" (sn).

In these new conditions, requiring a reconsideration of the institution "another sale work", for which thus arises a natural question: sale of another work or not valid?

From the outset we must stress that we appreciate the provisions of art. 1683 of the New Civil Code, at least for the fact that they have reopened the issue of sale of another work (properly unresolved previous regulations).

Please note that the doctrine of recent French ban on the sale is estimated that another work is fully justified in the case and immediately transfer the property. Otherwise, the parties postponed the transfer of ownership to a later conclusion of the sale, "prohibition loses its opportunity.[14]"

In agreement with the current design, we consider that the seller should not always ownership at the time the contract. It is sufficient that the requirement of ownership to be fulfilled at the time of transfer to the buyer the right (which can be time the contract or a later time set by law or will of the parties - art. 1674 Civil Code). For this reason, the sale of future goods, the sale of such goods, the sale on time, etc., could not pronounce the nullity of contracts.

Trying to answer the question above, we must distinguish between two situations, as: the property buyer is shifting (right) with the contract or transfer of ownership is postponed. In the first case, the transfer of ownership takes place in time the contract if the seller has no ownership, contract of sale is sanctioned by nullity (for non sold work requirement).

Given the above, the sanction applicable to differ, as the parties were in error or have been informed (about the ownership of the seller).

When the parties (or at least the buyer) were in error, believing that the property belongs to the seller sold[15] it was accepted that the sale is canceled (relative void) for error on the essential quality of the seller (owner of the work considered sold). In this situation, we can say that the seller apparently acted as an owner.

Relative nullity of the sale may be made only by the purchaser, by the action (if the price was paid) or an exception (if the price was not paid).

The seller cannot rescind the contract under any circumstances, even if in good faith, because the error does not make void the falls on the person with whom contracted[16].

No real owner can request cancellation, the third to the contract, but may bring an action to recover possession[17]. In this case, non-exercise claim action can be interpreted as "ratification of sale by owner" (Art. 1682 para. 2 Civil Code).

But if, meanwhile, became the owner seller work (after the sale), no buyer cannot rescind it. The obligation to guarantee the seller for eviction and remain in a situation where the buyer has not requested or required prior to cancellation, is the true owner crowded.

Note that, if the property is alienated in the public domain of the state or territorial administrative units, the contract is absolutely null in all cases, even if the buyer was in good faith (art. 136 of the Constitution).

When the parties knowingly entered into the contract (there was bad faith), knowing that the thing sold is the property of another person (and therefore the error is no longer an issue), it was [14] This is the reason why French law tends to limit the scope of nullity domenuiul established by art. 1599 French Civil Code, see F. Collart Dutilleul, Ph. Delebeque, Contrats civils et commerciaux, Dalloz, Paris 2001, p. 117-119.

---

[15] See R. Sanilevici, I. Macovei consequences sale solutions work in the light of other legal practice in DRR no. 2 / 1975, p. 33 and practice: C.S.J., v. Civil Code, in December. no. 132/1994, the Law no. 5 / 1995, p. 77.

[16] According to art. 1212 Civil Code, "The victim of an error which is not otherwise entitled to the requirements of good faith."

[17] See T.S., v. Civil Code, in December. no. 2257/1967, in C.D. 1967, p. 83.

considered that the sale transaction is a purchase of another speculative work, that is absolutely illegal and therefore null (under art. 1236 par. 2 and art. 1238 par. 2 Civil Code)[18].

Note that, since the absolute nullity may be invoked by any person in this situation, the true owner may invoke the nullity, even if not attended the conclusion of the Convention. Over all the above, do not forget that according to the spirit of the Civil Code the legal act is presumed to be valid and the invalid is an extreme sanction, which operates only when the legal act cannot be preserved in any way.

In the second case, the transfer of ownership (and work) is postponed to a time after the conclusion of the contract if the seller has not become the owner of the work, the contract of sale is sanctioned by rescinded (for failure to obtain work and to "ensure "thus, transfer of ownership to the buyer - art. 1683 par. 4 Civil Code).

Appreciated that the new vision of the Civil Code in this field, enter the direction of European doctrine. For example, the recent French doctrine, selling work of another, is considered restrictive, appreciating that "there selling work to another, shall, be exposed to the crowed buyer made a true owner who exercises the claim" (sn). To do this, "should result in a sale of property right transfer, opening and a true owner's claim"[19].

Moreover, all the French doctrine is admitted that the sale of another work "cannot be canceled when the seller, even if no owner of the work, is its apparent owner, as if the heir apparent" (sn). In this case, "the sale is valid on two conditions: good-faith purchaser (he ignores the fact that the seller was not the owner) and common error (everyone thought so): error facit jus communis (common error is the source of law) [20]".

Consequently, under the new Civil Code requirement seller of property owner has suffered an attenuation conditional for delay transfer of the right (by the will of the parties or the law). In this case, it is accepted that, and can contract valid conclusion by a non-proprietary vendor.

Can be thus concluded by a non-proprietary valid sale and future assets, such sales, sales of individual assets determined (acquisition condition subsequent work), etc.

References

- G. Boroi, A.C. Anghelescu, civil law course. The general part. Hamangiu Publishing, Bucharest, 2011
- D. Chirica, special contracts. Civil and commercial Rosetti House, Bucharest, 2005
- Fr. Deak, civil law treaty. Special contracts, Actami Publishing, Bucharest, 1999
- Fl. Moțiu, special contracts, Legal Universe Publishing, Bucharest, 2011
- L. Pop, talk about some clarification of their obligations covered by the law no. 8 / 2005
- Sanilevici R., I. Macovei consequences sale solutions work in the light of other legal practice in DRR no. 2 / 1975, and practice: C.S.J., v. Civil Code, in December. no. 132/1994, the Law no. 5/1995, T.S., v. Civil Code, in December. no. 2257/1967, in C.D. 1967, p. 83.
- A.Benabent, Droit civil, civils et Les contrats speciaux comerciaux, Montchrestien, Paris, 2008
- F. Collart Dutilleul, Ph. Delebeque, Contrats civils et commerciaux, Dalloz, Paris, 2001
- J. Huet, Traité de droit civil. Les principaux contrats spéciaux, LGDJ, Paris, 2000
- Ph. Malaurie, L. Aynès, P.Y. Gautier, Droit civil. Les contrats speciaux, Defrenois, Paris, 2007
- D. Mainguy, Contrats speciaux, Dalloz, Paris, 2008

[18] The contract vendor fraud law by owner, with the complicity and in any case, the risk of the purchaser, is a typical case and void, see Fr. Deak, op. cit., p. 42 and practice: Tribe. Constanta County, v. Civil Code, in December. no. 778/1987, in R.R.D. no. 2 / 1988, p. 69 70.

[19] To do this, "should result in a sale of property right transfer, opening and a true owner's claim" see Ph. Malaurie, L. Aynes, PY. Gautier, civil law. Special contracts, Wolters Kluver, Bucharest, 2007, 124.

[20] See Ph. Malaurie, L. Aynes, PY. Gautier, op. cit., p. 126-127.

THE CONTRACTS AS VIEWED BY THE CIVIL CODE

EUGENIA VOICHECI*

Abstract
The law no.287/2009 regarding the Civil Code, the law no.71/2011 for applying the Civil Code and the G.E.O no.79/2011 for modifying and completing the law no.71/2011 all conduct to the terminological leveling in the contracts field, assigning them the name of civil contracts or just contracts. The same regulatory documents, appertaining in terminis to the economic/commercial/ remunerative oriented activity, acknowledge the distinguishing characteristic of the merchant-proffesional, of the commercial enterprise and therefore of the contracts regarding the economic activity. The Civil Code becomes the frame-law in the contracts field and attempts to compile an inventory of the contracts defined by the law, inventory in which the prevailing role is held by the contracts specifically related to the commercial activity. The intent of this study and its goals are to prove that, in spite of the terminological offensive - expression of the homogeneous regulation of the Private Law, the Civil Code not only does not eliminate the Commercial Law as a sefl-contained filiation of the Private Law, but assimilates it and allows to be contaminated by it. This happens because the Commercial Law sprung from a reality - the commercial activity - and it will perish alongside this reality, which is never going to happen. Today, more than allways, the Commercial Law has become the foundation of the Civil Law in regard to obligations and this study intents to prove this.

Keywords: contracts, Commercial Law, merchant-proffesional, commercial enterprise, the contract as a source of obligations

INTRODUCTION

1. Terminological unity . In line with the recently adopted system intended for the unity of the private law regulations and noting certain "regrettable" omissions of the legal terminology, the Romanian lawmaker passes the following corrections in Act No. 71/2011 - art. 8 para.2 :

In all current laws, the terms "commercial acts" and "commercial deeds" respectively are replaced by the term "production, commerce or service provision activities".

Unfortunately, we witness a lawmaker's increased "vigilance", who, at the time prior to the effectiveness of the New Civil Code, discovers and "remedies" other faulty terminological "discrepancies", deciding on the following:

Art. VII of the Government's Emergency Ordinance No. 79/2011 for the regulation of certain measures necessary (our underline) for the effectiveness of Act No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code:

On the effectiveness of Act No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, republished, the term "commercial contract" or "commercial contracts" is replaced by the term "civil contract" or, as the case may be, "civil contracts", whereas the term "contracts or commercial acts" is replaced by the term "contracts".

The lawmaker's "rigor" is exemplary. It has determined some doctrine specialists speak of a "cleansing of the legal vocabulary" and an "excommunication" of the commerce- and commercial law-related concepts[1].

* Ph. D. candidate, Law Faculty, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: eugenia_voicheci@yahoo.com).

[1] Turcu, Ion – "Noul Cod civil. Pe cine incomodează existența dreptului comercial?"/"The New Civil Code. Who Is Bothered by Commercial Law?" – www.juridice.ro.

We have called it terminological offensive and our opinion is, nonetheless, that the undertaking lacks efficiency as the legal area and legal institutions it is based on do not disappear by way of a mere "reform" of the legal language.

Back to our topic, we notice that, de lege lata (the law as it exists), one cannot speak but about civil contracts and/or contracts. Given the aforementioned arguments and those we are about to elaborate hereunder, we believe there are still commercial contracts or, to be strictly compliant with the provisions of art. VII of the Government's Emergency Ordinance No. 79/2011, there are contracts on the commercial activity.

1. The topic of this article is contracts. The study aims at highlighting the New Civil Code vision on contracts.

2. The importance of the article consists of its novelty as it is, to the best knowledge of its author, the first to approach the topic of the New Civil Code on contracts.

Its pursued goals are as follows:

- present an overview of the New Civil Code on contracts, underlining that this vision is intended to ensure the regulatory unity of the private law;
- highlight the fact that the New Civil Code is based on a coherent structural vision with novel elements as compared to the former regulatory system, that fill certain gaps and consecrate, from a legislative point of view, a series of doctrine and jurisprudence solutions in the area of contracts;
- expose the drawbacks of this vision, the failures of the monist conception in the area of contracts;
- underline the specificity of commercial activity contracts, highlight the comprehensiveness of the special legislation that is the core matter of these contracts, a legislation that preponderantly lies outside the code and that alleviates the all-comprehensive ambition of the New Civil Code of being the framework law on contracts.

3. The means to reach these objectives mainly resides in the critical analysis and systemic interpretation of the provisions of the New Civil Code, as well as those of the relevant special laws on contracts. Equally, the relevant doctrine on the matter, both consecrated ad recent one, will be considered. Also, it will be taken into account that no references to the internal jurisprudence will be possible, given the recent effectiveness of the New Civil Code.

4. To the best knowledge of the author, there are no studies that cover the entire area this article refers to. There are specialized works (articles, volumes) dealing with this issue in a fragmented manner: specificity of contractual obligations, of obligations undertaken by professionals, autonomy of commercial law, existence of a real law on professional contracts.

CONTENT

A. CONTRACTS IN THE NEW CIVIL CODE

2. The contract as a source of obligations

In line with art. 1164 of the New Civil Code, the obligation is a rightful connection by virtue of which the obligor has to perform for the obligee, and the latter is entitled to the owed performance.

The above-mentioned article means real progress as compared to the former Civil Code, which did not provide a definition for the term "obligation", such definition being imposed by the doctrine and consolidated by jurisprudence.

Art. 1165 of the New Civil Code lists the sources of obligations: contract, unilateral document, business administration, enrichment without just cause, non-owed payment, illicit deed, as well as any other document or deed that the law relates the birth of an obligation to.

This regulation performs a systematization of the sources of obligations, not far from those already consecrated by the doctrine under the former regulation: the legal document, legal and illegal deed. Moreover, art. 1165 of the New Civil Code refers to "other" documents and deeds that the law relates the birth of an obligation to. A normal question is raised in relation to these "other" documents and deeds that the law could set forth at a given time as sources of obligations. Why are these expressly laid down and what are the arguments based on which they cannot be a sub-category of those referred to in the article body? At the time of this present analysis, we could not find a satisfactory answer to these questions.

For lack of any textual arguments, this reference appears to be superfluous; however, we will wait for it to pass the test of time.

Back to our discussion on the contract, mention must be made of the lawmaker's firm option in favour of the term "contract" detrimental to the term "convention". On a legislative level, there is a distinction between the two notions in the French law (art. 1101 of the French Civil Code), however, in the Romanian law, despite the opinions on the doctrine, there is no such legislative distinction, the terms being actually synonymous.[2]

Art. 1166 of the New Civil Code defines the contract as an agreement based on the free will of two or more parties to it with the intention to establish, change or cease a legal relation. The definition is approximately similar to that in the former art. 942 of the Civil Code, with the addition of the intention to change an existing legal relation.

Mention must be made about the relation between the contract and the civil legal document. The latter is an institution defined as a manifestation of the will of one or more persons, done for the purpose of establishing, changing, transmitting or ceasing rights and obligations. In this context, the legal document, where the emphasis is placed on the volitional and intentional aspect (unlike the legal deed) is the gender, whereas the contract is the species. Hence, any contract (uni-, bi- or multi-lateral) is a legal document, but not all legal documents are contracts. Given this aspect, one should notice that the New Civil Code consecrates the institution of the unilateral legal document and determines its legal regime in Book V, Title II, Chapter II.

3. The Civil Code as the framework law of contracts

Art. 1167 of the New Civil Code stipulates, in para. 1, that all contracts shall comply with the general rules and regulations in Chapter I, Title II, Book V; however, para. 2 of the same article stipulates the derogation regime applicable to certain contracts of the Code or in special laws.

Hence, this article establishes the vocation of the New Civil Code as a framework law of contracts.

It also establishes, together with art. 1168, three applicability principles concerning all contracts:

1. all contracts shall comply with the general rules and regulations in this chapter;

2. certain contracts (special ones, in our opinions) shall be applied particular rules and regulations laid down in the New Civil Code and special laws;

3. contracts that are not regulated by law (traditionally known as "non-regulated contracts") shall be applied the provisions of this chapter and, if these provisions are not sufficient, the special rules (our mention: in the Code or special laws) concerning the contract that the non-regulated contracts are mostly similar to.

This latter assumption is, in our opinion, a typical case of analogia legis.

---

[2] Adam, Ioan – Drept civil. Obligațiile. Contractul/Civil Law. The Obligations. The Contract, (C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011) , 6-7.

As far as contract classification is concerned, we note that art. 1171 – 1177 of the New Civil Code propose various contract categories, however, as concerns the above-mentioned matter, , i.e. the vocation of the New Civil Code of representing common law, it necessary to make a conceptual determination of the special contract institution and that of "non-regulated contracts" (particularly known as "non-regulated contracts").

3.1 Special contracts

The doctrine is unanimous[3] in acknowledging the "bridging" role that special contracts play between the general theory of obligations (that determines the abstract civil contract unconnected to reality) and the individual civil contract as an agreement of free will between certain parties, with a specified content.

Equally, as resulting from art. 1167 para. 2 of the New Civil Code, special contracts are applied the special legal rules stated for each special contract type, which rules are laid down in the Code or special laws. This provision stands for the accurate application of the specialia generalibus derogant legal principle.

As a matter of correlation, in considering the vocation of the common law New Civil Code in the area of contracts, we should emphasize that this regulation will apply whenever there is no specific regulation of special contracts and validity, interpretation and performance of special contracts respectively.

The category of special contracts stands for, just as the entire area of commercial law, some sort of "laboratory" where legal regulations and principles and legal institutions are applied, forged and perfected. This "laboratory" that is connected to the economic and social reality to the highest of levels gives rise to novel legal constructions and techniques most often materialized in contracts failing to comply with traditional patterns, that are innovative and push the boundaries of the legal sphere.

To the extent the solutions resulting from this alchemy are validated in practice, they become popular and represent a premise for reflection that can become materialized in legislative terms and often influence various areas of activity.

In that respect, it has been fairly underlined, we believe, that "a tendency in the contemporary law is noted, that of elaborating transversal rules that apply to special contract categories (our underline), in particular goods and services provision contracts"[4]. In that respect, "the common consumer protection or free competition concerns..."[5] were mentioned.

3.2 Regulated and non-regulated contracts

As far as non-regulated contracts are concerned, that are designated by the lawmaker in art. 1168 of the New Civil Code as "contracts not regulated by law", one can note that the New Civil Code limits itself to mentioning them without defining them, thus persisting in the tradition of the former Civil Code and failing to take up the example of art. 1107 of the French Civil Code.

It has been stated[6] that this category of "non-regulated contracts was eventually consecrated in Justinian's time, opening a new specific action – prescriptio verbis. They were divided in four categories: do ut des, do ut facias, facio ut des, facio ut facias".

As these contracts, though regulated by the parties, stay non-regulated in relation to the legal categories, they were considered actual legal fictions.[7]

---

[3] Cărpenaru, Stanciu- introduction to Contracte civile şi comerciale – cu modificări aduse de Codul civil 2009/Civil and Commercial Contracts – As Amended by the 2009 Civil Code, done with Stănciulescu, Liviu and Nemeş, Vasile, (Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009) , 1 and Moțiu, Florin – Contractele speciale în Noul Cod civil/Special Contracts in the New Civil Code, II edition, (Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011) , 17.

[4] Moțiu, Florin – quoted work, 18.

[5] ditto.

[6] Deleanu, Ion – Ficțiunile juridice/Legal Fictions, (All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005) , 66.

Most contracts falling under this category are typical of the commercial activity, being determined by the countless facets of such activity, as well as the parties' intention to build conventional instruments characterized by a certain level of diversity and flexibility, in order to respond to the most complex of requirements.

The existence of non-regulated contracts is not excluded from the legal relations between non-professional natural individuals either; however, their numbers are visibly lower, given, on the one hand, the overall low percentage of contracts entered into as to these legal matters and, on the other hand, the aim concerning the civil circuit security these are involved in, materialized in resorting to legislatively consecrated forms they can enter into.

Regulated contracts are those whose content is laid down in the provisions of the Civil Code and/or other special laws. The main special contracts are sale and purchase as an instrument for economic exchange, mandate, lease (or sale of use) and general contractor agreement as an instrument of service provision.

Regulated contracts are the lawmaker's exclusive attribute as their creation is not possible by the parties' agreement based on their will. The parties only have the possibility to enter into individualized special contracts, adapted to their needs, which contracts are, however, subject to the special rules in the Code and/or special laws, and, as to their general conditions – they are subject to the general conditions in the Code.

Non-regulated contracts are those beyond legal regulation, though, in terms of the legal conditions, they are legally executed. This is the reason why they have been classified to fall under the category of legal fictions: they are legal documents that meet the validity-related legal conditions, comply with public order and mores, but which the law does not "know" and regulate, however, having no reason to challenge them.

The content of these non-regulated contracts is the parties' exclusive attribute, an expression of the principle of freedom to contract, and serves their actual needs. A recent example in the commercial law is the reservation contract or, in the real estate field, the construction contract, the latter being a mixtum compositum between the general contractor agreement and the bilateral promise of sale and purchase.

The issue that non-regulated contracts raise is related to the applicable legal regime. However, the problem that an authority summoned to settle a dispute based on such a contract faces is, above all, an issue concerning contract qualification.

This involves an analysis of the contract content, the parties' converging/common/real will and then the contract qualification. In other words, in order to determine whether it is a non-regulated contract or not, one needs to interpret the contract and determine the unquestionable difference between them and between special or regulated contracts.

Often this is rendered difficult by the name the parties give to their contract, a name which could point to its classification in this or that category of regulated contracts or that, on the contrary, could create a first similarity (identity) with a regulated contract, contradicted, on a more careful analysis, by the sui-generis non-regulated content of the contract.

Nonetheless, the person interpreting the contract should not leave out the application of the interpretation rules laid down in art. 1266-1269 of the New Civil Code.

Once a contract classification in the non-regulated category is done, the applicable legal regime is the one laid down in art. 1168 of the Code: the rules first to be applied are the general rules on contracts, the rules laid down in Book V, Title I, Chapter I, and, should these not be sufficient, the special rules applicable to the contract the non-regulated contract resembles the most.

[7] ditto.

4. Contract categories established by the New Civil Code

Section 2 of Chapter I, Title II, Book V, deals with "various contract categories" with no enunciation by the lawmakers of the criteria they consider when elaborating such taxonomy.

One should note that the Code does not provide a classification that exhausts the criteria that it was constantly based on, and, from this perspective, it is not that distinct from the former provisions of art. 943-947 of the Civil Code.[8]

Art. 1171 differentiates, by content, between synallagmatic and unilateral contracts.

A contract is synallagmatic when it includes mutual and independent obligations, and is unilateral unless it does so, even if its performance involves obligations resting upon both parties.

The ambiguous wording of the legal text results in the conclusion that a contract is synallagmatic whenever it gives rise to mutual and independent obligations, both parties concomitantly having the capacity of obligee for the other party's obligation(s) and obligor to its own obligation(s).

An interesting emphasis was placed in the doctrine in connection with the synallagmatic contract, asserting that this is a redundant construction, given the etymology of the term "synallagmatic" – from "synalagme", meaning contract in Greek. [9]

Art. 1172 differentiates, by the purpose pursued by the parties, between onerous contracts and gratuitous contracts.

A contract is onerous if both parties aim at getting some advantage in exchange for the undertaken obligation.

On the contrary a contract is gratuitous if a party aims at providing a benefit (our italics) to the other party, without getting any advantage in exchange.

We estimate that, whereas the lawmaker does not made any legal differentiation between "benefit" and "advantage", the use of the two terms, that are within the same semantic sphere, is not inspired and leaves room for speculation. We believe that the lawmaker had the possibility to choose either of the two terms and use it exclusively in order to escape all ambiguity.

Art.1173 differentiates, by the certainty or uncertainty of provision extent at the time of contract execution, between commutative contracts and random contracts.

A contract is commutative if, at the time it is entered into, the existence of the parties' rights and obligations is certain, and the consideration is determined or determinable.

A contract is random if, by its nature or the parties' will, it gives at least one party the chance of a benefit and simultaneously exposes it to a loss, which gain or loss are dependant on a future uncertain event.

Art.1174 differentiates, by the manner of formation, among consensual, solemn and real contracts.

A contract is consensual if it is formed by the mere parties' will.

A contract is solemn if its validity is subject to fulfilling certain formalities laid down by law.

Finally, a contract is real contract if the remission of the assets is necessary for its validity.

---

[8] A classification of contracts can be found in, exempli gratia, Stătescu , Constantin and Bîrsan , Corneliu – Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligațiilor/Civil Law. General Theory of Obligations , IX edition,(Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008) , 22-37.

On categories of contracts not included in the New Civil Code, see Turcu , Ion – Vânzarea în Noul Cod civil/Sale in the New Civil Code, (C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011) , 78-84.

[9] Piperea, Gheorghe – "Concepția monistă a Noului Cod civil , între intenție și realitate sau Despre Noul Cod (civil) comercial"/"The Monist Vision of the New Civil Code, between Intention and Reality or On the New Commercial (Civil) Code in Noile Coduri ale României – Studii și cercetări juridice/The New Codes of Romania - Legal Studies and Research, (Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011) , 36.

In the case of solemn and real contracts, the form prescribed by the law, and the provision of the asset respectively, are prerequisites for contract validity; failure to comply with the same results in absolute nullity.

However, mention must be made of the fact that, by art. 1260 of the Code, a solution is legislatively consecrated that long ago found its settlement in the doctrine and that was applied as a matter of jurisprudence. This article introduces the institution of conversion of the null contract and stipulates in para. 1 that an absolutely null contract shall still have the effects of the legal document the legal content and form requirements are fulfilled for.

The second paragraph of the same article includes however an alleviation of the conversion process, providing prevalence to the parties' contrary will.

Thus, it is stipulated that the provisions of para. 1 shall not apply if the intension to exclude the conversion application is stipulated in the contract affected by nullity or unquestionably results from the purposes pursued by the parties on contract execution.

Art.1175 defines the adhesion contract and comes to cover, from a legislative perspective, a doctrine and jurisprudence creation resulting from a reality where such contract type has become very common.

A contract is an adhesion contract if its core clauses are imposed or elaborated by, for or following the instructions of either party whereas the other party is left with the sole possibility of accepting them as such on a "take it or leave it" basis.

As far as this contract type is concerned, the free will of either party, usually the one in an inferior financial or economic position is limited to adhering or not adhering to a contract with predefined clauses that it does not have a possibility to negotiate.

Art.1176 defines the framework contract as an agreement which the parties agree to negotiate, enter into or maintain contractual relations whose core elements are determined by.

It is worth noting that this contract type stipulates only the core elements of the contractual relations and that the means to implement the framework contract (in particular, term, volume of performance and, if applicable, price thereof) is indicated by subsequent conventions.

One should note that this contract type has been taken up in the domestic legislation following the pattern of framework contracts commonly used in international law, in complex and long-term operations, such as double-entry records, international economic cooperation, complex exports.

The doctrine[10] underlines the following:

"Framework contracts are of a nature similar to predefined clauses compared to subsequent special classes, i.e. the latter relate to the former, framework contracts containing coordination and harmonization clauses of the subsequent clauses with a view to reaching their joint economic goal.

Secondly, framework contracts contain clauses whose subject matter is an in contrahendo obligation, i.e. the contracting parties' obligation to enter into the mentioned special contracts, unlike the latter whose subject matter are an obligation to give, do or not do, as the case may be."

Finally, art.1177 deals with the contract entered into with consumers, but it limits itself to mentioning it, without defining it, with a referral to the special legislation outside the Code and only as a supplementation of the Code provisions.

5. Freedom to contract and good faith as fundamental principles of contract execution and performance

We have reviewed the principles that, in our opinion, govern civil law and contracts.

[10] Sitaru , Dragoş-Alexandru – Dreptul comerţului internaţional. Tratat. Partea generală/International Commerce Law. Treatise. General , (Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008) , 439.

The principle of freedom to contract has been included among the principles governing contracts, and the principle of good faith was included among the general principles of civil law.

If we are to resume the discussion on these two principles, we do it to highlight the fact that they are distinctly evoked by the Romanian lawmaker in the area of contracts, in Section 1 – General Provisions, which leads us to the conclusion that they are considered of utter importance in said area.

Art. 1169 of the Code enunciates the freedom to contract principle, its content and limitations of its application. This principle will be the subject matter of subsequent elaboration.

In reality, Art. 1170 of the Code establishes the good faith obligation that rests upon the parties in the pre-contract stage, on contract execution and performance, stating the prohibition to stipulate any clause that could remove or limit said obligation.

One can thus note the legislative evolution from the presumed good faith, express in bona fides praesumitur, to the good faith that the lawmaker imposes to the participants in the civil circuit.

It is easily noticed that the lawmaker limits himself/herself to evoking good faith, without defining it, though the issue of the concept identity has been the object of doctrine concerns. In that respect, the works of the Henri Capitant Association are worth mentioning, that focused on good faith and took place in Paris in 1992 and 1994.

To summarize, without any claim of providing a definition herein, it has been shown that good faith, regarded as a general clause, involves a psychological and intellective notion, i.e. that it represents unawareness of a fact or circumstance, the erroneous conviction that a subject has taken up.[11]

The same author has shown that good faith is a purely moral concept, a rule of conduct in line with loyalty and honesty.[12]

The role of good faith has been summarized as follows: a rule of conduct in contract formation, corrective in contract performance and complementary in identifying the obligations undertaken by the parties (e.g.: obligation to inform).[13]

We believe that, in establishing such an obligation, which is salutary nonetheless, the Romanian lawmaker of 2009-2011, should not have relied, in an area as technical as that of contracts, on such a hard-to-define construction that anyone is convinced of knowing, yet that each interprets at will.

It would have been auspicious if, and our belief is that it will be established as such, at least in the area of contracts, good faith had been adjoined by, at least, merchants' equity and honest and practices.

B. CONTRACTS CONCERNING COMMERCIAL ACTIVITIES

1. Terminology rationale

We stated in the abstract our firm belief that commercial law should stand as an independent branch of private law, even in light of the abrogation of the 1887 Commercial Code and the lawmaking unity via the New Civil Code.

We support the idea that this branch of the law includes the totality of laws concerning the legal regime of professional merchants and commercial companies, as well as legal documents that professional merchants enter into within their commercial activity.

We equally support the idea that the legal documents that the professional merchants enter into are commercial legal documents, and the overwhelming percentage in their economy is represented contracts.

---

[11] Alpa, Guido – Diritto giurisprudenziale , excerpt – www.altalex.com.
[12] ditto.
[13] ditto.

We would unhesitatingly continue to use the term "commercial contracts" should there not be a prohibition placed by art. VII of the Government's Emergency Ordinance No. 79/2011, that abolishes it in terminis, replacing it with term of "civil contracts" or, simply, "contracts".

However, as the commercial area further preserves its identity, focused on commercial activity, in considering the connection between the contracts entered into by professional merchants and the commercial activity within which it is concluded, we believe that this contract category has a special name and status and such contracts may be named, with maximum legal accuracy and in compliance with the lawmaker's terminological prescriptions, commercial activity contracts.

2. Criteria for differentiating commercial activity contracts

The problem that needs to be solved mainly in relation to these contracts is that of the criteria of differentiation from other civil contracts.

We estimate that, on characterizing the commercial nature of a contract, the following requirements must be simultaneously met:

a . the contract should be entered into professional merchants or at least one contracting party should be a professional merchant;

b . the contract should be entered into in connection with the operation of a commercial undertaking, and the performance of an economic activity respectively;

c . the contract should be onerous in nature, and pursue the goal of providing an advantage (profit) to the contracting professional merchant.

Hence, in an attempt to outline a definition, we state that a commercial activity contract is a contract entered into two or more parties, among which at least one is a professional merchant, that concerns one or several operations connected to the commercial activity and by which the professional merchant aims at obtaining profit.

3. Peculiarities of the legal regime of commercial activity contracts

The general rules are those laid down in art. 1166-1168 of the New Civil Code.

A close analysis of the area of obligations requires, however, revealing a series of peculiarities that the New Civil Code still preserves as concerns legal relations among professionals.

Similarly, peculiarities of commercial legal relations can be identified, extended in the New Civil Code and the legal relations among non-professionals.

3.1 Rules borrowed from commercial law and extended throughout the civil law

3.1.1 Formation of distance contracts, contracts between remote parties or inter absentes contracts

The mechanism was consecrated by the former 1887 Romanian Commercial Code in art. 35-39 and became popular because "in the relations among merchants, the variety of concluded contracts and the requirements for business rapidity most often require the conclusion of contracts between parties that are located in various places and communication between them is done by correspondence (...)" [14]

As constantly underlined in the doctrine[15], though the former Commercial Code mentions conclusion of contracts "between remote parties", in reality, what is of interest is not the distance separating the contracting parties, but the non-concomitance of the manifestations of their will, the interval of time when the agreement by will is done.

[14] Cărpenaru, Stanciu – Tratat de drept comercial român/Romanian Commercial Law Treatise, II edition (Universul Juridic Publishing House , Bucharest , 2011) , 466.

[15] ditto.

It is noted that the New Civil Code takes up this mechanism of the former Commercial Code in art. 1182-1203 and extends it to all contracts, regardless of the capacity of the contracting parties, thus acknowledging that it has proved viable in time and confirmed in practice.

The New Civil Code consecrates, in art. 1186 para. 1, the theory of acceptance, which implies that a contract is entered into at the time and place where the acceptance reaches the offerer even if he is not aware of the acceptance due to reasons that are not imputable to him.

Justly, it was noticed in the doctrine[16] that the Enforcement Act No. 71/2011 establishes in art. 106 that the provisions of art. 1186 para. 1 of the New Civil Code do not apply to contracts if the offer to contract was sent before the effectiveness of the Civil Code. This is how the incidence of the tempus regit actum principle is acknowledged.

It is worth noticing that para. 2 of art. 1186 extends, throughout the civil contracts area, the application of the former art. 36 of the Commercial Code, known in the doctrine as a legal basis of the "simplified contract", and "order followed by immediate implementation" respectively.

Art. 36 of the Commercial Code stipulates that, when the party making the proposal requests the immediate implementation of the contract and a previous acceptance response is not requested or necessary, given the nature of the contract, then the contract was perfect as soon as the other party started its implementation.

Art. 1186 para. 2 of the New Civil Code refers to performing a "conclusive document or deed" and its meaning of offer acceptance, regardless whether the offerer becomes aware of it or not, the acceptance significance being determined based on: the content of the offer (here it is worth noting the perfect resemblance to art. 36 of the Commercial Code); the practices consolidated between the parties; general practices; nature of the business (identical to art. 36 of the Commercial Code).

3.1.2 Determination of the place for obligation fulfillment

This is the subject matter of art. 1494 of the New Civil Code that extends the provision of art. 59 of the Commercial Code to the entire area of contracts, previously applied only to commercial obligations.

Thus, the determination of the place where the payment will be made will comply with the terms and conditions of art. 1494 of the New Civil Code only if the parties do not have an express provision at hand in that respect or if the payment place cannot be agreed due to the nature of the performance as per the contract, practices between parties or general practices.

We estimate that the assumption in the text concerning "under the contract" is redundant, being covered by the initial assumption "unless stipulated otherwise".

The following seems to us a more accurate wording: "whenever the parties have not agreed otherwise as in the following provisions, as well as if the payment place cannot be agreed due to the nature of the performance as per the contract, practices between parties or general practices, the obligations shall be performed as follows ...."

It should be noted that the Romanian lawmaker determines the place of contract performance (i.e. payment place) depending on the nature of the obligation. For obligations consisting of sums of money, the lawmaker establishes the portability principle, the payment place being the obligee's domicile or headquarters as of the date the contract is entered into.

For obligations consisting in delivery of a defined individual thing, the payment place is that where the thing is located as of the date the contract is entered into.

[16] Popa, Cornel; Frangeti, Ruxandra – "Reguli specifice aplicabile raporturilor între profesionişti conform Noului Cod civil"/"Specific Rules Applicable to Relations between Professionals under the New Civil Code" - www.noulcodcivil.ro.

For the remaining obligations, the payment place is defined according to the principle of the obligee's capacity to approach the obligor at the obligee's headquarters, it being the obligor's domicile or headquarters as of the date the contract is entered into.

As a matter of novelty, the second paragraph of art. 1494 of the Code identifies the solution of a problem that, in practice, could result in additional costs and could burden the obligor of the payment obligation. This is the case where any party changes, after contract conclusion, its domicile or headquarters designated as place where the payment will be made. The above-mentioned legal provision establishes an equity criterion, i.e. obliges the parties responsible for such a change to incur the additional expenses caused by performance at the new location.

3.1.3 Regime of interests in case of pecuniary obligations

Art. 1535 of the New Civil Code extended to the civil matter the principle established by art. 43 of the former Commercial Code, i.e. the legal accrual of interests as of the due date in the case of exigible pecuniary obligations. The article characterizes the interest as deferred interest, stipulates that its level may be agreed by the parties, and, unless they do so, the interest shall be the one that is stipulated by law and exempts the obligee from any prejudice.

Moreover, as a matter of novelty, para. 1, final thesis, art. 1535 of the Code prohibits the obligee to prove that the prejudice incurred by the obligee by late payment would be lower than the one resulting from the calculation of conventional or legal interest.

It is worth noting a new provision in para. 2 of art. 1535 :

If, before the due date, the debtor owed interests higher than the legal interest, the deferred damages are owed at the level applicable before the due date.

We believe the provision to be useless, falling under the assumption laid down in para. 1 of the same article, in case the parties agreed on the interest level in the contract respectively. The only utility of the text is that of interpreting it as a possibility provided to the parties to set forth deferred interests whose value is higher than that of legal interest.

With regard to the elaboration of the above-mentioned legal provisions, one may consider they govern both the legal relations that professionals are parties of, and those that non-professional are involved in.

It should be noted that, in correlation to the provisions of art. 1535 of the New Civil Code, the Government's Ordinance No. 9/2000 was amended by the Government's Ordinance No. 13/2011 on the legal remuneration and penalty interest for pecuniary obligations, as well as for the regulation of financial and fiscal measures in the banking field.

3.1.4 Interest capitalization or anatocism

This is applicable to all contractual relations as the provisions of art. 1489 para. 2 of the New Civil Code make no distinction depending on the capacity of the participants in these relations.

This article shall be supplemented by the provisions of the Government's Ordinance No. 13/2011 that, as shown previously, amend the Government's Ordinance No. 9/2000 on the level of the legal interest on pecuniary obligations.

3.1.5 Solidarity of joint obligors

With regard to this rule, derived from the former art. 42 of the 1887 Commercial Code, the doctrine opinions differ. Some authors believe this rule is maintained only for obligations contracted while performing the activity of an undertaking.[17]

On the contrary, other authors[18], whose opinion we agree with, believe that the provisions of art. 1446 in the New Civil Code, though they set forth in terminis the solidarity between the joint obligors of an obligation contracted during the activity of an undertaking, should be extended to non-professionals as well by virtue of the principle provisions of art. 3 para. 1 and 3 of the Code that stipulates "the general unity of application of the Civil Code".

[17] Popa, Cornel; Frangeti, Ruxandra – quoted article.

It has been argued, in a just manner nonetheless, we believe, that this vision should concern the entire legal relation as "the differentiated application, for each part of the rules, is not even possible as long as the purpose was the unity of the private law"[19]. The presumed solidarity of joint obligors should extend to non-professionals as well in compliance with art. 3 para. 3 of the New Civil Code.

Anyway, the area of application of the presumed solidarity is much enhanced as compared to art. 42 of the Commercial Code, even if the professionals' category extent that exceeds that of merchants should be considered.

3.1.6 Cumulated penalty and direct, precise and unchanged performance of obligations

This is a novel rule added by art. 1539 of the New Civil Code and, though it is not a creation of the commercial law, it should be firstly signaled in considering its novelty in the area of contractual obligations, as well as in considering that it is a rule applicable to all contractual obligations that both professionals and non-professionals participate in.

3.2 Rules typical of the legal relations between merchants, that are taken up from the New Civil Code

3.2.1 Grace period

Art. 44 of the former Romanian Commercial Code stipulates that, as to commercial obligations, the judge cannot grant an obligor the grace period laid down in art. 1021 in the former Civil Code.

This prohibition was rigorously maintained until the abrogation of the Commercial Code, with the only derogation provided by the Government's Ordinance No. 5/2001 and the Government's Emergency Ordinance No. 119/2007.

Thus, art. 6 para. 2 and 3 of the Government's Ordinance No. 5/2001 on the procedure of demand for payment and art. 10 para. 1 and 3 of the Government's Emergency Ordinance No. 119/2007 on the steps for fighting the late performance of payment obligations resulting from commercial contracts, stipulate that the judge, finding the request grounded, will issue the ordinance of demand for payment, and payment ordinance respectively, which will indicate the payment due date.

However, we estimate that these two legislative instruments did not influence the rule laid down in art. 44 of the former Commercial Code as they were stated for two special procedures, which were brief, where the investigation of the receivables right was exclusively done based on written documents.

In common law litigations, where decisions were made that enjoyed the res judicata (matter judged) status, the provisions of art. 44 of the Commercial Code were fully incident, that prohibited grace periods, and the application of such rules was confirmed even in the trial-related matter, art. 720_8 of the Civil Procedure Code expressly consecrating the enforceability of court decisions made in the first instance in commercial cases.

[18] Săuleanu, Lucian – "Specificul obligațiilor asumate de profesioniști în contextul dispozițiilor Noului Cod civil" – „Specificity of Obligations Undertaken by Professionals under the New Civil Code" - www.juridice.ro.

[19] ditto.

3.2.2 Prohibition of dispute and obligation extinction by the obligor before an obligation assignee

The rule laid down in art. 45 of the former Romanian Commercial Code concerning the prohibition of dispute and obligation extinction by the obligor in the assignment of a right deriving from a commercial deed, which rule characterized the area of commercial obligations, is no longer found in the New Civil Code.

3.3 Rules typical of the legal relations among merchants, applicable in contractual relations among professionals only

3.3.1 Determination of the price among professionals

Art. 1233 of the New Civil Code stipulates that, when a contract entered into among professionals (our underline) does not define the price or does not indicate a means to define the same, it is presumed that the parties considered the common price in the field for the same provisions under comparable circumstances or, for lack of such a price, a reasonable price.

This article is remindful of art. 40 and art. 61 of the former Commercial Code that, in similar circumstances, referred to the "real price" or "current price", agreed on the basis of the stock market level or the relevant lists of prices where the contract was entered into.

However, the current regulation no longer takes up the parties' possibility provided by art. 61 para. 2 of the former Commercial Code, i.e. determination of the price by a third party (arbitrator) designated by the parties either by contract or after contract execution and seems to have submitted the determination of the price not agreed by the parties by contract to the court or arbitration tribunal.

4. Commercial activity contracts set forth in the New Civil Code

An overview of Title IX, Book V, the New Civil Code, finds that it considers a high number of special contracts, serving as an actual list thereof. Our intention is not that of providing an interpretation of these contracts, but an analysis of their structure and the significance of said structure.

Two conclusions emerge, prima facie, in connection with this title on special contracts:

The first conclusion: despite the outstanding number of special "regulated" contracts that it refers to, Title IX does not claim to be exhaustive as it concerns "various" special contracts.

Relating the name of this Title of Book V to the provisions of art. 1167 para. 2 of the Code, the conclusion is that, de lege lata, there are two systems that regulate the special contracts: the New Civil Code and special laws.

The second conclusion: given the non-comprehensive inventory of the special contracts regulated by the New Civil Code, the most overwhelming part is covered by contracts that are traditionally considered commercial contracts, that we designate, due to legislative limitation reasons, commercial activity contracts.

Thus, out of a total of 20 special contracts (guarantees excluded) laid down in the Code, at least 15 essentially concern commercial activities whereas only 4 are civil in nature: loans among non-professionals, life annuities, maintenance, games and gambling as activities unauthorized by the competent authorities.

The remaining special contracts either essentially concern commercial activities (supply, contracting, transport, shipping, consignment etc.), or are traditionally very common in the area of commercial activity (sale and purchase, exchange, lease, company etc.).

Given the circumstances, even without considering the special contractual legislation outside the Code, that is almost exclusively related to commercial activity, we can speak of a real "commercialization" of civil law, a contamination thereof, that not only fails to justify the existence of commercial civil law as a species of civil law[20], but, on the contrary, it reverses the gender-species relation between commercial law and civil law.

Once again, we deal with the terminological constraints imposed by Law No. 71/2011 and the Government's Emergency Ordinance No. 79/2011 as concerns the terms "commerce", "merchant" and "commercial" and we limit ourselves to stating that such strong penetration of civil law by the commercial law, and the extension of the application sphere of such a great number of commercial law institutions to all types of legal relations (thus involving non-professionals) stands, in fact, for the victory of commercial law.

5. Commercial activity contracts that are not laid down in the New Civil Code, set forth in special laws

We have previously presented an inventory of the major special contracts/and areas of commercial law where such contracts regulated by special laws are entered into.

We added here transports that, in doctrine, are even the object of a legal sub-category – law of transports, maritime commerce – still under the incidence of the non-abrogated part of the 1887 Commercial Code, financial derivatives (with futures, options, forward contracts) etc.

The legal regime of these special contracts, just as in the case of those set forth by the New Civil Code, is that stipulated by art.1167 para.2 of the Code: these contracts are subject to the special legislation that consecrates them.

These legal provisions are meant to clarify a dilemma raised in relation to special contracts not laid down in the New Civil Code: what is their fate? Not being in the Code equals failure to exist?

Based on the very title of Section II, Title II, Book V, the New Civil Code – Miscellaneous (our underline) contract categories – and also considering the provisions of art.1167 para.2 of the Code, results in the idea that failure to include a multitude of mostly commercial special contracts in the Code does not deny their existence, on the contrary, it acknowledges it, determines they are subject to the legislative instruments that consecrate them and, thus, confirms the incapacity of the Code itself to create a complete inventory thereof, hence the failure of the tendency to integrate and the much praised unitary regulatory system.

6. Several final reflections on commercial activity contracts

These contracts, being specially laid down in the New Civil Code and the special commercial laws, are special or regulated contracts.

With reference to them, an author [21] justly signaled that "they are creators of the common law; the latter is not rigid, it grows every day based on doctrine and jurisprudence, as well as some special regulations for certain contracts, that are later generalized by contractual practices as well, that become abstract. Thus, certain principles (the principle of consensus), certain techniques (contract for a third party's benefit, subcontracting) or certain concepts (the creating drive of appearance in law, abuse of law, good faith, obligation to inform) are generalized."

We find a simple, but essential mention necessary: the contracts that set the tone and stimulate the evolution of common law concern the commercial activity.

In reflecting on the ample nature of this area and the vast and extremely technical set of issues it gives rise to, an idea was proposed, i.e. configuring a new branch of civil law, namely the law of professional contracts.[22] It remains to be seen whether such vision passes the test of time, gathered around the new concept of "professional" and the variety of contracts that "operating an undertaking" involves.

[20] Piperea, Gh. – homonymous article Curierul judiciar issue 7-8/2011.

[21] Moțiu , Florin – quoted work, 17.

[22] Piperea ; Gheorghe – Introducere în Dreptul contractelor profesionale/Introduction to the Professional Contracts Law, (C.H. Beck Publishing House , Bucharest , 2011).

Conclusions

1. The article follows two major directions:

a. The vision of the New Civil Code on contracts, with focus on the following:

- the contract as a source of obligations;
- the New Civil Code as a framework law in the area of contracts;
- regulated and non-regulated contracts and their legal regime;
- categories of contracts laid down in the New Civil Code;
- the freedom to contract and good faith as fundamental principles of contract execution and performance.

b. Commercial activity contracts with focus on:

- criteria for differentiating these contracts from other contracts;
- definition of commercial activity contracts;
- peculiarities of the legal regime of these contracts;
- commercial activity contracts laid down by the New Civil Code;
- commercial activity contracts not stipulated by the New Civil Code, but regulated by special laws;
- place and importance of this contract type within the overall area of civil contracts.

The core result of this undertaking is outlining the vision of the New Civil Code on contracts, its pros and cons, as well as focusing on the specificity of commercial activity contracts and the influence they exert on all civil contracts.

2. The estimated impact will be:

- on legal professionals to whom it will provide a general overview on the New Civil Code vision, benefits and drawbacks thereof;
- on decision-makers that will consider potential future remedies on a legislative level;
- last, but not least, legal theoreticians who will find in this article reasons to debate the justness and timeliness of the Romanian lawmaker's option for the private law regulatory unity system.

3. The author's belief is that future research in the analyzed area will concern the vocation of the New Civil Code as a framework matter on contracts, the determination of the specificity of commercial activity contracts, making a list of such contracts (stipulated in the New Civil Code and special laws), as well as the determination of their compatibility with the New Civil Law regime.

References

- Adam, Ioan - Drept civil . Obligaţiile . Contractul / Civil Law. The Obligations . The Contract , Bucharest , C.H. Beck Publishing House , 2011
- Alpa , Guido - Diritto giurisprudenziale , excerpt , www.altalex.com
- Cărpenaru , Stanciu D. - introduction to Contracte civile şi comerciale – cu modificările aduse de Noul Cod civil 2009 / Civil ansâd Commercial Contracts – As Amended by the 2009 Civil Code , done with Stănciulescu , Liviu and Nemeş , Vasile , Bucharest , Hamangiu Publishing House , 2009
- Cărpenaru ,. Stanciu D. - Tratat de drept comercial român /Romanian Commercial Law Traitise , II edition , Bucharest , Universul Juridic Publishing House , 2011
- 5. Deleanu , Ion - Ficţiunile juridice / Legal fictions , Bucharest , All Beck Publishing House , 2005
- Moţiu , Florin – Contractele speciale în Noul Cod civil / Special Contracts in the New Civil Code , II edition , Bucharest , Universul Juridic Publishing House , 2011

- Piperea , Gheorghe – „Dreptul civil comercial ca specie a dreptului civil „ / „Commercial civil law as a species of civil law” , Curierul Judiciar , 7-8 (2011)
- Piperea , Gheorghe – „Conceoția monistă a Noului Cod civil , între intenție şi realitate sau Despre Noul Cod (civil) comercial” / „The Monist Vision of the New Civil Code , between Intention and Reality or On the New Commercial (Civil) Code” in Noile Coduri ale României – Studii şi cercetări juridice / The New Codes of Romania – Legal Studies and research , Bucharest , Universul Juridic Publushing House , 2011
- Piperea, Gheorghe – Introducere în Dreptul contractelor profesionale / Introductions to the Professional Contracts Law , Bucharest , C.H. Beck Publishing House , 2011
- Popa , Cornel and Frangeti , Ruxandra – „Reguli specifice aplicabile raporturilor între profesionişti conform Noului Cod civil” / „Specific Rules applicable to Relations between Professionals under the New Civil Code” – www.noulcodcivil.ro
- Săuleanu , Lucian „Specificul obligațiilor asumate de profesionişti în contextul dispozițiilor Noului Cod civil” / „Specificity of Obligations Undertaken by Professionals under the New Civil Code” – www.juridice.ro
- Sitaru , Dragoş-Alexandru- Dreptul comerțului internațional. Tratat .Partea generală./International Commerce Law . Treatisae. General , Bucharest , Universul Juridic Publishing, 2008
- Stătescu , Constantin and Bîrsan , Corneliu – Drept civil . Teoria generală a obligațiilor / Civil Law . General Theory of Obligations , IX edition , Bucharest , Hamangiu Publishing House , 2008
- Turcu , Ion - „Noul Cod cvil . Pe cine incomodează existența dreptului comercial ?” / „”The New Civil Code . Who is Bothered by Commercial Law ?” – www.juridice.ro
- Turcu , Ion – Vânzarea ăn Noul Cod civil / Sale in the New Civil Code , Bucharest , C.H.Beck Publishing House , 2011

ONE CANNOT BE TRIED FOR THE SAME DEED TWICE

NICOLAE GRĂDINARU[*]

Abstract
The principle of applying a single sanction for a single wrongful act.
This principle involves the application of a single penalty for a single wrongful act; who has ignored the rule of law his conduct will meet once for illegal acts, violation of law for a corresponding one legal sanction.
It does not preclude the simultaneous existence of several forms of legal liability for the unlawful act committed by the same person, when the same act is violated several rules of law.
Article 4 of Protocol 7 of the Convention enshrines the "right not to be tried or punished twice", known as traditional „ne bis in idem": "Nobody can be tried or punished by the criminal jurisdiction of the same State for an offense for which has already been acquitted or convicted by a final decision under the law and penal procedure of that State. (...)"
In two cases this will expose the principle settled by the European Courts non bis in idem.

Keywords: liability, wrongful act, offense, conviction, final decision.

Introduction

Legal order is not based solely on coercion, but rather its essential feature is that it requires primarily through voluntary compliance with the rules of law, and this aspect is the legal responsibility.

In general sense, responsibility is seen as an obligation to bear the consequences of breaches of rules of conduct and therefore violates or ignores when responsibility.

Legal liability is also seen as a constraint on state power exercised by the individual, as a response to breaches of law, thus making him suffer the consequences of his act default (to repair the damage caused, to undergo a criminal or contravention etc.).[1]

In conclusion, it appears that the complex social relationship of which is the determination of liability under it is that which violates a rule of law, called the action illegal and the penalty is the means by which coercion is performed.

Legal liability is circumscribed branches of law and is linked to other specific rules of each of these branches. Thus, criminal liability shall commit a criminal offense specific, with guilt as provided by law, a penalty called punishment, administrative liability and administrative deviation are characteristic specific penalty, liability for damages available through material creates an obligation, etc. Legal liability principles guiding ideas are those that find their expression in all the rules of law governing the various forms in which that principle is presented.

It envisages common features of all cases of legal rules governing the conditions, how involved various forms of legal liability.

The principles

Of the principles enshrined in the legal literature and results of rules of law include:

a) The principle of employing only legal responsibility under the law.

The principle of legality is a fundamental principle of criminal law. In the area of criminal liability, this rule expresses the principle by which the whole activity of criminal liability of those who violated the law by committing crimes, based on the sole legal basis. The legality of criminal responsibility involves the legality of conviction and the legality of criminal sanctions: "nullum crimen sine lege" and "nulla poena sine lege".

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D. „Constantin Brâncoveanu" University, (email: gradinaru_fd@yahoo.com).
[1] M. Eliescu - Tort civil liability, Academy Publishing House, 1972, pag. 8-31.

However, we believe that the legality principle applies to all forms of legal liability, as in every branch of law and the legal liability of any form of legal penalties may be imposed only for illegal acts, whether of crime or civil illegal administrative irregularities.

b) The liability for the acts committed by guilt

This principle requires that any matter of law can be punished only when he is guilty and only within the limits of his guilt. Legal liability occurs because a matter of law failed to comply with legal rules of conduct prescribed for the conduct of several possible just chose the one which violates social interests protected by legal rules. By law, society condemns those of its members who conduct contrary to its interests, and the perpetrators know that their conduct contrary to these interests.

Under this principle, the liability comes only material facts of conduct that is unlawful for the legal facts. It does not affect people's ideas, embodied in acts of conduct, according to the Roman maxim: "de internis non judiciat praetor".

The idea of guilt illegal act involving the author's attitude to decide its own behavior and consciousness through the act of violation of its legal norms of conduct.

In principle, tort liability for acts committed by guilt, but, in the Romanian law the presumption of innocence operates illicit offender so that guilt must be proven by the injured party, or by the prosecution for criminal liability. However, the law governing the presumption of guilt in some cases the responsibility of individuals, such as presumption of guilt of the parents for their minor children's actions, which will still protect from liability if they prove that they could prevent injurious act.

c) The principle of personal responsibility

According to this principle sanctions effects occur only on the person who has violated the legal standard, committing the unlawful act.

The extent of liability is determined by personal circumstances of the offender, which is assessed on the occasion of determining the penalty.

There are exceptional cases expressly provided by law, vicarious liability occurs when - liability objective, indirect, such as liability of principals for the acts of servants, and artisans of primary school pupils and apprentices for the acts or facts parents for their minor children.[2]

In the case of joint liability, it operates several subjects in person, so the injured can be compensated by any of them, and thus recovered the entire loss, as one who will rise to full compensation for the injury to be able to recover through an action for recourse against the other co-debtors more than what he paid as due to himself, according to his degree of guilt.

d) The principle of accountability for speed

The achievements of legal liability largely depends on the extent and speed of implementation of the principle, which expresses the requirement for accountability to be appropriate, such as failing to produce the effects of repressive and preventive - Educational.

Sanction is the reaction of society through state coercion against illicit act, so it is necessary for punishment to occur in a short time after the date of the deed, as if the coercion does not occur promptly, not longer obtain desired aims, either in the offender, or in relation to society.

Undoubtedly, the timing punish the perpetrator causes a feeling of insecurity in interpersonal relations and social ones, and a sense of confidence in the ability of institutional factors required to ensure law and order[3].

As is known, accountability is not only educative effect, but also lead to restoring the rule of law, impaired by committing illegal acts, and the passage of time can lead to the loss of evidence or

[2] Gh. Mihai, R.I. Motica - Optima justice, ALL Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999, pag.201.
[3] Gh.Mihai - Argumentation and interpretation in law, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999.

to determine the real impediments to actually establish the actual state . Therefore, by law, often set time limits for implementation or prescription of the penalty.

e) Principle "non bis in idem"

The principle of applying a single sanction for a single wrongful act.

This principle involves the application of a single penalty for a single wrongful act, one that has ignored the rule of law his conduct will meet once for illegal acts, violation of law for a corresponding one legal sanction.

It does not preclude the simultaneous existence of several forms of legal liability for the unlawful act committed by the same person, when the same act is violated several rules of law.

For example, according to art.208 of the Criminal Code, making a movable possession or detention of another person without consent constitutes theft and is punishable by law, intervening criminal liability and, on the other hand, civil law, that protects the holder's ownership, the entitlement to restitution and compensation for damage to property which constitutes a civil penalty.

So the same offense in violation of a rule violation and a rule of criminal law and civil penalties for each branch of law whose rules were ignored accumulate on this path several will and forms of legal liability.

Another example, by committing a traffic offense on the road, but the author be liable for civil criminally liable if he committed a civil wrongful act of another person causing harm. Thus, the violation by the same unlawful conduct as a rule of criminal law and a rule of civil penalties for each branch of law whose rules were ignored accumulate.

Criminal liability can be combined with disciplinary liability in the performance when the employment contract employee commits an act which is unlawful, while a disciplinary offense and a crime, and thus applying both criminal penalty provided by law, as and disciplinary sanction. In these cases no principle in defeat (non bis in idem), because it consolidates two types of responsibility of a different nature, which entail different penalties.

Disciplinary liability may be combined with administrative responsibility if the act is unlawful while misconduct and negligence, thereby applying a disciplinary penalty and a sanction.

This principle but excludes the application against the same person, for the same unlawful conduct of two or more sanctions identical in nature: either criminal or civil, administrative or so., since restoring the rule of law violation for each violation requires violated a rule of law applying a single penalty, which depends exclusively on the nature of such legal provision violated.

Therefore, when there is a multiple violation of the rule of law, aimed at legal regulation of different and overlapping occurs two or more of the same kind of legal sanctions that would apply the same person for a single wrongful act, does not violate the principle of applying a single sanction for a single wrongful act.

If a person commits an act that is qualified as a crime, can not be held accountable and administratively for the same offense as an act can not be the same for both offense and offense, the offense is defined as potentially act as a lesser offense than.

In conclusion overlapping criminal liability is excluded administrative responsibility.

This principle is proclaimed in both the civil procedural law and criminal procedural law, the legal texts providing for specific penalties for the same kind of overlapping failure.

The court

One of the main effects of judgments shall cease to be entitled to take legal action in a material way and that preventing a new prosecution for the same offense and against the same person.

Court when the court finds that there is a final and res judicata, it will accept the final solution and will comply with the ban to judge or decide a case is finally resolved. And as it tends to respect this principle, because the final judgments and various sanctions can not be different or the same kind by one or more courts.

We believe that the approach should take into account the rights established in the European Convention on Human Rights as interpreted and applied solutions CEDO Court.[4]

Article 4 of Protocol 7 of the Convention enshrines the "right not to be tried or punished twice", known as traditional "ne bis in idem ", "No one shall be tried or punished by the criminal courts for committing the same State offense for which has already been acquitted or convicted by a final decision under the law and penal procedure of that State. (…)"

In two cases this will expose the principle settled by the European Courts non bis in idem.

In the first case, on 11 November 1999, plaintiff was involved in an incident in which, according to the police report called on the spot, broke a neighbor's door, entered his apartment and punched.

Following the police report, Mayor of Gabrovo to the applicant a fine for disturbing the public order of 50 leva (25 euros). The sanctions became final, not being challenged in court.

Subsequently, the prosecutor began criminal and prosecuted for trespassing, battery and other violence. Gabrovo District Court acquitted him for trespassing and battery and other violent convicted to imprisonment for 18 months. The solution was Gabrovo Court upheld on appeal and the appeal by the Supreme Court of Justice of Bulgaria.

The European Court, the plaintiff alleged violations of Articles 6 of the Convention and 4 of Protocol. 7 to the Convention (which guarantees the right not to be tried or convicted twice for the same facts – ne bis in idem).

Court in its Judgement delivered on 14 January 2010, found violations of both articles.

Regarding Article 4 of Protocol 7 to the Convention, the Court stated that:

- contravention penalty imposed by the Mayor of Gabrovo applicant can be considered as having a "criminal" in the autonomous meaning of that term which the Convention accords, given that, on the one hand, violated the prohibition imposed by the legal text is addressed to all persons and that, on the other hand, the purpose of punishment is to punish and prevent the future commission of similar acts;

- there is identity of facts between those who rise to the penalty for minor offenses and that those who have caused criminal proceedings against the applicant, regardless of the legal definition of domestic law gives offense, that the two offenses;

- there was a doubling of legal proceedings against the applicant, given that criminal proceedings were preceded by sanctioning its contravention, which became final by neapelare.

In conclusion, the applicant had been "convicted" in the administrative proceedings (contravention) to be treated as a "criminal" autonomous meaning of that term in the Convention. After this "conviction" became final, had been brought against him in another criminal indictment which concerned the same conduct and essentially the same facts. Given that art. 4 of Protocol 7 to the Convention prohibits both the prosecution and conviction of a person for acts which have already led to the imposition of a permanent criminal penalties, the Court found a violation of this article to Bulgaria.

In the second case, the Judgement of 11 December 2008 the Court of Justice (CJCE) ruled in Case C-297/2007 Staatsanwaltschaft Regensburg / Klaus Bourquain, and that the prohibition from being tried twice for the same act also applies to a conviction which could never be enforced directly.

According to the CJCE, "this interpretation seeks to ensure that a person is prosecuted for the same offense in several contracting states resulting from the exercise by it of the right to freedom of movement".

[4] Law no.30/1994 Law on ratification of the Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (signed in Rome on 4 November 1950) and of the Additional Protocols to the Convention, published in the Official Gazette no.135/31.05.1994.

In Case C 297/07, regarding a reference for a preliminary ruling under Article 35 EU Landgericht Regensburg (Germany), by decision of 30 May 2007, the Court received on 21 June 2007, criminal proceedings against Klaus Bourquain.[5]

Reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Article 54 of the Convention Implementing the Schengen Agreement of 14 June 1985 between the Governments of the Benelux Economic Union, the Federal Republic of Germany and France on the gradual abolition of checks at common borders.[6]

The request was made in criminal proceedings brought in Germany on 11 December 2002 against Mr Bourquain, a German national, in terms of murder, while the criminal proceedings initiated for the same acts by a judicial authority in another Member contractor against the person had already mentioned, on 26 January 1961, by a conviction in absentia.

Legal

First Article of the Protocol integrating the Schengen acquis within the European Union annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community by the Treaty of Amsterdam (hereinafter "the Protocol"), 13 Member States of the European Union including Germany and the French Republic, is authorized to establish enhanced cooperation between themselves in areas covered by the scope of the Schengen acquis as defined in the Annex to this Protocol.

Since the Schengen acquis thus defined, in particular, the Agreement between the Governments of the Benelux Economic Union, the Federal Republic of Germany and France on the gradual abolition of checks at their common borders signed at Schengen on 14 June 1985 and the CAAS.

Under Article 2 (1) second paragraph, second sentence of the Protocol, the EU Council adopted on 20 May 1999 Decision 1999/436/EC establishing, in accordance with relevant provisions of the Treaty establishing the European Community Treaty on European Union, the legal basis for each of the provisions or decisions constituting the Schengen acquis. In Article 2 of this decision in conjunction with Annex A thereto, that Articles 34 EU and 31 EU were designated by the Council as the legal basis of Articles 54-58 of the CAAS.

Under Article 54 of the CAAS, which is in Chapter 3, entitled "Implementing ne bis in idem", Title III of the Convention, entitled "Police and security"

„A person against whom a final decision was rendered in a trial by a Contracting Party can not be prosecuted by another Contracting Party for the same acts provided that, where a sentence was pronounced, it have been enforced, is being enforced or can no longer be enforced under the laws of the sentencing Contracting Party."

For information concerning the date of entry into force of the Amsterdam Treaty, published in the Official Journal of the European Communities, 1 May 1999 (OJ L 114, p. 56) that the Federal Republic of Germany made a declaration under Article 35 (2) EU accepting jurisdiction to decide the manner prescribed in Article 35 (3) (b) EU.

The facts in criminal proceedings and the question.

On 26 January 1961 at the Bone (Algeria), Mr. Bourquain engaged in the French Foreign Legion, was sentenced to death in absentia by the Permanent Military Tribunal for crimes of Constantine the eastern zone of desertion and intentional homicide.

---

[5] By Decision of 11 December 2008 the Court of Justice of the European Communities (CJEC) ruled in the case C-297/2007 Staatsanwaltschaft Regensburg/Klaus Bourquain, and found that the prohibition against being tried twice for the same act also applies in the case of a conviction which could not ever be executed directly.

According to the CJEC, "this interpretation seeks to avoid that a person is prosecuted for the same acts on the territory of several Contracting States after exercising his/her right to move freely."

[6] JO 2000, L 239, p. 19, Ediție specială, 19/vol. 1, p. 183), semnată la Schengen (Luxemburg) la 19 iunie 1990 (denumită „CAAS").

The application of the French Code of Military Justice for the Army, the military court held it proved that, on 4 May 1960, while trying to desert on the Algerian / Tunisian border, Mr. Bourquain shot dead another Legionary all of German nationality, who tried to prevent defection.

Lord Bourquain, refugee German Democratic Republic had not learned of the decision notice given in absentia and given the punishment imposed by the decision considered in adversarial proceedings could not be executed.

Bourquain Lord did not subsequently prosecuted or Algeria, or France. Moreover, in France, all in connection with war crimes in Algeria were given amnesty by the laws mentioned above. In contrast, Germany has opened an investigation against him for the same facts and, in 1962, a warrant was sent to authorities in the former German Democratic Republic, which rejected.

In late 2001, it was discovered that Mr Bourquain lived in the area of Regensburg (Germany). On 11 December 2002, Staatsanwaltschaft Regensburg (Regensburg floor) in terms prosecuted murder, the court, for the same acts under Article 211 of the German Criminal Code.

In these circumstances, by letter dated July 17, 2003, the court of France Ministry of Justice requested information in accordance with Article 57 (1) of the CAAS to determine if the decision of the Permanent Military Tribunal of Constantine the eastern zone, delivered on 26 January 1961 to prevent the commencement of criminal proceedings in Germany for the same offense, given the prohibition of double prosecution, under Article 54 of the CAAS.

Prosecutor's Office Military Tribunal in Paris responded to this request for information, indicating in particular the following:

„Judgement rendered in absentia on 26 January 1961 against [Mr Bourquain] has power res iudicata. The decision to sentence to death penalty has become final in 1981. Since the French law, the limitation of the sentence in criminal cases is 20 years, the decision can not be enforced in France."

That court asked the Max Planck Institut für ausländisches und internationales Strafrecht (Max Planck Institute for international criminal law and comparative criminal law) an advisory opinion on the interpretation of Article 54 of the CAAS in the circumstances of the main proceedings. In the opinion of 9 May 2006, the institute concluded that, although enforcement of the conviction in absentia was not possible because of procedural peculiarities of French law, however, in the main, the conditions under Article 54 of CAAS and therefore can not be triggered new criminal proceedings against Mr Bourquain. The same institute, in response to the request for additional comments, and maintained its position in the letter of 14 February 2007.

Landgericht Regensburg, holding that Article 54 of the CAAS could be interpreted as meaning that in order to prevent a new proceedings in a Contracting State, the first conviction in a trial conducted in the territory of another Contracting State shall have been performed at a given moment past, decided to stay proceedings and refer the following question:

„A person against whom a final decision was rendered in a trial by a Contracting Party may be prosecuted by another Contracting Party for the same acts, if the sentence was never applied could not be enforced under the laws State in which he was convicted?"

It should be added that in any case, Article 58 of the CAAS authorizes the Federal Republic of Germany to apply broader national provisions on the principle ne bis in idem. Thus, it allows Member States to apply this principle to judicial decisions other than those falling within the scope of Article 54.[7]

Conclusions

Question referred under Article 35 EU - Schengen Agreement - Convention implementing the Schengen Agreement - Interpretation of Article 54 - Principle ne bis in idem – Conviction in absentia - res judicata - non-punishment condition.

[7] Decision of 11 february 2003, Gözütok şi Brügge, C-187/01 şi C-385/01, Rec., p. I-1345, pct. 45.

By this question, the court asks, essentially, whether the principle ne bis in idem[8] enshrined in Article 54 of the CAAS is applicable in the case of criminal proceedings in a Contracting State for the facts on which a final decision has already ruled against a defendant in the trial by another Contracting State, even if the sentence was never applied could not be enforced under the laws of the State in which he was convicted.

It should be noted, on the one hand, as the Commission stated in its written observations, that, in principle, a conviction in absentia can be within the scope of Article 54 of the CAAS and can therefore constitute a procedural bar to the commencement of new procedures.

First, the actual wording of Article 54 of the CAAS that judgments in absentia are not excluded from its scope, the precondition for the implementation of this Article 54 is only that there has been a final decision in a trial by a Contracting Party.

Secondly, it should be noted that Article 54 of the CAAS is not subject to harmonization or approximation of criminal laws of the Contracting States in respect of judgments rendered in absentia.[9]

In these circumstances, Article 54 of the CAAS, applied to the case of a decision by default, given in accordance with national legislation of a Contracting State, or to an ordinary decision, necessarily implies the existence of mutual trust with the Contracting States their criminal justice systems and the acceptance by each state of the application of criminal law in force in the other Contracting States, even where their national law enforcement would lead to a different solution (see this Gözütok and Brügge, cited above, paragraph 33).

How many Member States have argued, and the Commission in their written comments, should be checked conviction in absentia by the Permanent Military Tribunal for the eastern zone of Constantine's "final" within the meaning of Article 54 of the CAAS, taking into account the impossibility of enforcement of the penalty determined by the requirement imposed by French law to pursue if he were to reappear in absentia, a new trial, this time in his presence.

It is clear that the Prosecutor of the Military Tribunal in Paris, without making any reference to the fact that crimes were committed by Mr Bourquain amnesty in 1968, notes that the sentence against him became final in 1981, ie before the onset second criminal proceedings in 2002 in Germany.

Should be added that, although Law no. 68 697 French amnesty consequence that its entry into force, Mr Bourquain crimes not subject to any penalty, the effects of that law, as described in particular Articles 9 and 15 of Law no. 66,396, can not be interpreted as meaning that there is an initial decision under Article 54 of the CAAS.

Judgement rendered in the absence of the person concerned must be considered final within the meaning of Article 54 of the CAAS, must determine whether the condition of execution referred to in that Article, namely that the penalty can not be enforced, and where, in any time in the past, even before the amnesty or prescription, the first conviction the penalty imposed could not be directly enforced.

In these circumstances, the answer to the question that the principle ne bis in idem enshrined in Article 54 of the CAAS applies to criminal proceedings brought in a Contracting State for the facts on which a final decision has already ruled against a defendant in the trial by another Contracting State, even if the laws State in which he was convicted, the sentence was never applied could not be directly enforced, due to features such as those of the main procedural.

---

[8] Decision of 11 february 2003, Gözütok şi Brügge (C-187/01 şi C-385/01, Rec., p. I-1345), Decision of 10 martch 2005, Miraglia (C-469/03, Rec., p. I-2009), Decision of 9 march 2006, van Esbroeck (C-436/04, Rec., I-2333), Decision of 28 september 2006, van Straaten (C-150/05, Rec., p. I-9327), Decision of 28 september 2006, Gasparini (C-467/04, Rec., p. I-9199), Decision of 18 june 2007, Kretzinger (C-288/05, Rep., p. I-6441), and Decision of 18 july 2007, Kraaijenbrink (C-367/05, Rep., p. I-6619).

[9] Decision Gözütok şi Brügge, pct. 32.

Thus, the court said, the principle ne bis in idem, enshrined in Article 54 of the Convention Implementing the Schengen Agreement of 14 June 1985 between the Governments of the Benelux Economic Union, the Federal Republic of Germany and France on the gradual abolition of checks at common borders signed at Schengen (Luxembourg), 19 June 1990, applies to criminal proceedings brought in a Contracting State for the facts on which a final decision has already ruled against a defendant in the trial by another Contracting State, even if the laws of the State was convicted, the sentence was never applied could not be directly enforced, due to procedural features such as those in the main proceedings.

References

- M. Eliescu - Tort civil liability, Academy Publishing House, 1972
- Gh. Mihai, R.I. Motica - Optima justice, ALL Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999
- Gh.Mihai - Argumentation and interpretation in law, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999

Legislation

- Law no.30/1994 Law on ratification of the Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (signed in Rome on 4 November 1950) and of the Additional Protocols to the Convention, published in the Official Gazette no.135/31.05.1994.
- By Decision of 11 December 2008 the Court of Justice of the European Communities (CJEC) ruled in the case C-297/2007 Staatsanwaltschaft Regensburg/Klaus Bourquain, and found that the prohibition against being tried twice for the same act also applies in the case of a conviction which could not ever be executed directly.
- According to the CJEC, "this interpretation seeks to avoid that a person is prosecuted for the same acts on the territory of several Contracting States after exercising his/her right to move freely."
- Decision of 11 February 2003, Gözütok and Brugge, C-187/01 and C-385/01, Rec., p. I-1345, paragraph 45.

EXERCISE WITH BAD FAITH OF SUBJECTIVE CIVIL RIGHTS

NICOLAE GRĂDINARU*

Abstract
The abuse of rights is qualified as civil offence and it may not be different from that of aquilian responsibility, the purpose of its sanction is to protect the victim and not to punish the author.
In the Romanian legal doctrine, the abuse of rights was defined as "the exercise of a civil subjective right by breaching the principles of its exercise."
The Constitutional Court held that the person exercising in bad faith and abusively his/her subjective or procedural rights is punishable by appropriate penalties, such as: dismissal of his/her legal action, obligation to bear the costs, application of certain court fines, etc.

Keywords: food faith, bad faith, abuse of right, aquilian responsibility, public order, morals.*

Introduction

According to article 57 from the Constitution of Romania, the Romanian citizens, the foreign citizens and the stateless persons shall exercise their constitutional rights and freedoms in good faith, without breaking the others' rights and freedoms.

According to article 17 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms the abuse of rights is prohibited so that no provision of the Convention shall be construed as authorizing a State, a group or an individual to conduct an activity or to perform an act in order to destroy the rights or freedoms set forth in this Convention, or of a broader limitation of these rights and freedoms than those provided by this Convention.[1]

The restrictions brought to the respective rights and freedoms can only be applied for the purpose for which they were provided.

The Civil Code stipulates in article 14 the good faith so that any natural or legal person must exercise his/her rights and perform his/her civic obligations in good faith, according to the public order and morals.

Good faith is presumed until proven guilty.

Where there is good faith, there cannot be abuse of rights, but in case the right is exercised in bad faith, by its distortion from the economic and social purpose as it is documented, by the violation of another person's rights, he/she can no longer benefit from the protection of law.

Such regulations are also to be found in other special laws such as the stipulations of auricle 136^1 of law no. 31/1990 on companies which contains an express provision in the matter, namely: "The shareholders must exercise their rights in good faith, respecting the rights and the legitimate interests of the company and of the other shareholders."

Abuse of rights in the Civil Code

The French Court of Cassation held that there is an abuse of rights when "the attitude contrary to the general interest of the company, proven by the prohibition to perform an essential operation for it and for the sole purpose of favouring their own interests at the expense of all the other partners' interests."[2]

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D. „Constantin Brâncoveanu" University Pitesti (email: gradinaru_fd@yahoo.com).

[1] The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Rome 04.11.1950, ratified by Romanian by Law no. 30/1994 published in the Official Gazette no. 135/31.05.1994.

[2] Decision no.158/2009 of Court of Appeal Timişoara, Civil department.

Constitutional Court held that the person exercising in bad faith and abusively his/her subjective or procedural rights is punishable by appropriate penalties, such as: dismissal of his/her legal action, obligation to bear the costs, application of certain court fines, etc. [3]

In the Romanian legal doctrine, the abuse of rights was defined as "the exercise of a subjective civil right with the breach of the principles of its exercise."

The abuse of rights is qualified as civil offence and may not be different from that of aquilian responsibility, the purpose of its sanction is to protect the victim and not to punish the author. [4]

The legal characteristics of the abuse of rights are the following:

- exercising the subjective civil right;
- disregarding the economic and social purpose for which the subjective right is recognized;
- exercising the subjective right in bad faith;
- exercising the subjective right by exceeding its limits.

The abuse of rights can be punished by:

- the rejection of the plaintiff's claim to the court of law when it finds that he/she has abusively exercised a subjective right. Such a regulation is stipulated in article 29, paragraph 5 of Law no. 47/1992: "If the exception is inadmissible, being contrary to the law stipulations, the Court rejects by a reasoned resolution the referral request to the Constitutional Court."[5]

- the removal of the defendant's defence by the Court of law when he/she exercises the respective right abusively;

- when the abuse of law is materialized in an act that causes damages, the Court of law gives rise to the author's liability to the injured person in one of his/her rights by obliging him/her to repair the damage with recovery of damages. Thus, there are the stipulations of article 1353 of the Civil Code which provide that the person who causes a damage through the proper exercise of his/her rights is not obliged to repair it, unless that right is exercised abusively. Therefore, it is established, as general principle, that the person who caused a prejudice to another person by exercising his/her rights is not obliged to repair it unless the rights were exercised abusively. [6]

The Civil Code regulates in article 15 the abuse of rights and stipulates that no right can be exercised in order to harm or to injure another person excessively or unreasonably, contrary to good faith.

The exercise of civil rights with the violation of this "good faith" principle represents "abuse of rights" and it is punishable as such.

The holder's civil liability is involved in the case of committing an abuse only if the right is exercised with the intent of causing material or moral damage to another person.

If one cannot remember the author's guilt as the intention to cause damage to another person, the author is responsible in the situation in which the subjective right is exercised excessively and unreasonably, contrary to good faith, and if damage is caused to another person. In the case of the abuse of rights as well, in order to be able to have civil liability, it is necessary to meet the general conditions as in the civil aquilian responsibility, namely: the existence of the illegal act, materialized in exercising abusively the right; the material or moral damage caused by exercising the right, the causal link between the illegal act and the author's damage and guilt.[7]

---

[3] Decision no. 161/2002 of the Constitutional Court published in the Official Gazette no. 448/26.06.2002.

[4] Marilena Uliescu. – New Civil code, 3rd edition, revised and added – Bucharest, Universul Juridic, 2011.

[5] Law no. 47/1992 on the organization and functioning of the Constitutional Court, republished in the Official Gazette no. 807/03.12.2010.

[6] Article 1349 of the Civil Code. Aquilian responsibility

Everyone has the duty to respect the rules of conduct which the law or local custom requires and not to bring prejudice through his/her actions or inactions to the legitimate interests of other persons.

The one who, having discernment, violates this duty, is responsible for all the damage caused, being obliged to fully compensate it.

[7] Christina Vlădescu – The abuse of rights in the regulation of the New Civil Code, 2011.www.juridice.ro.

The new Civil Code also speaks about the abuse of rights in the regulation of article 193 paragraph 2 on the effects of the legal personality, so that no ne can plead against a good faith person the quality of law subject of a legal person, if by this one tries to conceal a fraud, an abuse of rights or public order attack.

According to the stipulations of article 630 of the Civil Code, if the owner causes, by exercising his/her right, inconvenience higher than the normal one in the neighbourly relations, the Court may, on grounds of fairness, oblige him/her to pay compensation for the benefit of the injured person, as well as to restore the previous situation when possible.

If the injury caused were minor in relation to the need or usefulness of carrying out the prejudicial activity by the owner, the Court may approve the conduct of that activity. But the injured person will be entitled to compensation.

If the damage is imminent or very likely, the court may approve, by way of presidential ordinance, the necessary measures to prevent the damage.

According to article 2496 of the Civil Code, the right of retention cannot be exercised if the ownership of the property comes from a wrongful or illegal act or if the property is not susceptible of legal prosecution.

The right of retention cannot be invoked by the owner of bad faith except in the cases specifically stipulated by law.

The Civil Code does not establish the way in which the abuse of rights can be sanctioned, the person who is guilty of abuse of rights may be ordered by the Court, on the grounds of the general principles of civil liability, to compensate for the damage as the judge considers it appropriate in the specific circumstances of the case tried.

The Court of law has to establish concretely, according to the particularities of each case, the removal of the effects caused by exercising the abusive right, the compensation for the material or moral damage caused or granting recovery of damages.

The abuse of rights in exercising procedural rights

The exercise in good faith of certain rights is also regulated by the new Code of civil procedure[8] in article 12 which stipulates that the procedural rights must be exercised in good faith, according to the purpose for which they were acknowledged by the law without violating the procedural rights of another party. The party exercising the procedural rights abusively is responsible for the material and moral damage caused. The party may be required, according to the law, to pay a legal fine as well.

The party that does not fulfil his/her procedural rights in good faith is also liable for the material and moral damage caused.

According to article 12 of the new Code of civil procedure, the person who is guilty of abusively exercising a right, shall be required, according to the law, to pay a legal fine.

The Code of procedure in force stipulates in article 723 that the procedural rights must be exercised in good faith and according to the purpose for which they were acknowledged by the law.

The party who uses these rights abusively is liable for the damage caused.

The Code of civil procedure sanctions the exercise of the procedural rights in bad faith, so that the party who uses these rights abusively has the obligation to be liable for the damage caused.

The Code of civil procedure does not show which are the criteria for determining the abuse of rights, the mere rejection of the subpoena form does not mean, eo ipso, that the plaintiff has acted abusively so that he/she may be held liable for invoking certain unjustified claims. As such, it was considered that only the judicial approach, initiated in bad faith or out of a serious error that makes it close to fraud, with the intent to cause damage, moral or material, may be considered abuse of rights.[9]

[8] New Civil Procedure Code Law no.134/2010 published in the official Gazette no. 485/15.07.2010.

The provisions of article 723 Code of civil procedure do not entitle the Court to invoke ex oficio the abuse of procedural law, but rather, according to paragraph (2) thereof, it results that only the adversary, injured by the abuse of procedural rights, may claim the abuse of rights, and not the Court which does not act as the passive subject of this abuse, but as guarantor of obeying the procedural rights.

Due to the fact that the stipulations of paragraph (2) article 723 show which is the penalty for the abuse of rights, namely the obligation to compensate for the "damage caused," the conclusion that can be drawn is that only the adversary, injured by the abuse of the procedural rights, may invoke the abuse of rights, not the Court, which does not act as the passive subject of the abuse or as party in the proceedings, but as guarantor of obeying the procedural rights, as provided by article 129 of the Code of civil procedure.

The only sanction applicable to the abuse of rights is that of the damages offered to the injured party, as provided by the stipulations from paragraph (2) article 723 of the Code of civil procedure. No other legal provision authorizes the rejection of an application solely because during the trial his/her titular has used abusively his/her legal rights, diverting them from their purpose legally acknowledged. In order to sanction such procedural conduct, the judge can use the stipulations from article 108^1 paragraph (1) letter a) or paragraph (2) letter b) Code of Civil Procedure and the legal fine penalty, as well as the stipulations of article155^1 paragraph (1) Code of Civil Procedure stipulating the sanction of proceedings suspension. [10]

According to article 28 paragraph 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the same grounds of recusal a new petition against the same judge cannot be made.

The formulation, again, of the request for recusal takes the form of abuse of procedural law, whose sanction is, in the light of article 723 Code of Civil Procedure not only granting of compensation but also, as a way to compensate in kind, depriving the pleading of the effects sought by the party who did it abusively. However, the inadmissibility of the request for recusal and, therefore, the abuse of rights, is directly found, even by the judge before whom the procedural act was committed, and not by a higher court or by another panel of judges, the purpose of article 28 paragraph (3) Code of Civil Procedure being to prevent delays in resolving cases by making requests for abusive recusal. This goal is achieved only if the inadmissibility of the request for recusal and, implicitly, the abuse of rights, is found directly, by the very judge before whom the procedure act was committed, otherwise the party that wants to block the trial will reach its aim. On the other hand, the provisions of article 30 paragraphs (1) and (2) Code of Civil Procedure consider the hearing of certain requests for recusal admissible in principle, whose trial on the merits involves assessing the merits of the recusal grounds, and article 28 paragraph (3) establishes the inadmissibility of a request for recusal of the same judge for the same reasons. It results that the inadmissibility of a request for recusal is a separate issue which has to be solved by the Court summoned by the request for recusal, under the common law jurisdiction. [11]

Conclusion

The repeated formulation, within the insolvency proceedings, of certain requests for referral to the Constitutional Court and for the suspension of trial, by the debtor and by those creditors who are either shareholders or former directors of the debtor, takes the form of abuse of procedural law, whose sanction is, in the light of article 723 Code of Civil Procedure, in addition to compensation, [9] Marilena Uliescu. – New Civil Code, 3rd ed. revised and added – Bucharest, Universul Juridic, 2011.

[10] Decision no. 548/2006 of Bucharest Court of Appeal, Fifth Department of Trade.
[11] Completion of 12 December 2006 seventh Department of Trade Bucharest Court of Law.

the depriving of the pleading act of the effects sought by the party who has done them abusively, as a means of redress in kind.

The abuse of rights is found directly, by the very judge before whom the procedure act was committed, and not by a higher court or by the constitutional litigation one. Therefore, the syndic judge, noting that the new request takes the form of abuse of rights, will reject, as inadmissible, the requests for referral to the Constitutional Court and for the suspension of the trial.

The Constitutional Court ruled in several decisions on the abuse of rights, and we mention in this respect, Decision no.161/2002 which states that no Government Ordinance no.5/2001 facilitates the abuse of rights, and the person exercising in bad faith and abusively his/her subjective or procedural rights is punishable by appropriate penalties, such as: dismissal of his/her trial action, obligation to bear the costs, application of court fines and other. [12]

Under article 51 of Law no.47/1992 on the organization and functioning of the Constitutional Court, when it finds that the objection in law of unconstitutionality was unfounded and that it was raised in bad faith to delay the resolution of the trial, the Court may punish the party who invoked the objection in law with a fine of 10,000-100,000 lei.

The Constitutional Court had the possibility to sanction the abuse of rights, thus through Decision no.81/2001 the Court notes that the Constitutional Court Decision no.26 of 23 February 1999, on the plea of unconstitutionality of the provisions from article 239, paragraph 1 of the Criminal Code, is res judicata, the object, the case and the parties being the same both in the previous objection in law and in the objection in law referred to in this decision. Thus, taking into account the provisions of article145 paragraph (2) of the Constitution and those of article 25 paragraph (3) of Law no.47/1992, republished, according to which the final decisions of the Constitutional Court are binding, the party that invoked the objection in law can not reiterate it anymore, whereas the first decision comes into the power of res judicata and, therefore, the exception is inadmissible.

The author of the objection in law knew the content of the Constitutional Court decision, which is published in Romania's Official Gazette, Part I, and, moreover, it is filed at the Court, but in bad faith raised again the same objection in law in order to obtain the case trial suspension. The bad faith of the person who raised the objection in law also results from the random invoking of certain texts of the Constitution and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights or of the provisions of article 284^{1} of the Criminal Procedure Code, which have no relevance in the case. In this situation, the Court finds that the provisions of article 51 of Law no.47/1992, republished, are incidental pleas in the case, according to which, "When the Constitutional Court finds that the objection of unconstitutionality is unfounded and that it was raised in bad faith to delay the settlement of the case, it may penalize the party who invoked the objection in law with a 10,000 to 100,000 lei fine.[13]

The Constitutional Court has also found that the Court should have rejected itself the writ of summons to the Constitutional Court.

Article 51 of Law no. 47/1992 was repealed by Law no. 232/2004.

To avoid the writ of summons in bad faith to the Constitutional Court which decides on the objections in law raised before the courts or on the commercial arbitration on the unconstitutionality of a law or ordinance or of a provision of a law or of an ordinance in force, which is related to the settlement of the case at any stage of the dispute and whatever its subject, was repealed by Law no. 177/2010, a stipulation which suspended the trial of the dispute until the settlement of the objection of unconstitutionality, thus causing undue prolongation of the trial.

In conclusion, the exercise of a right is considered abusive when the right is used to achieve its purpose, but with the intent to harm another person or contrary to good faith. [14]

---

[12] Decision no.161/2002 of the Constitutional Court, published in the Official Gazette no.448/26.06.2002.

[13] Decision no.81/2001 of the Constitutional Court, published in the Official Gazette no.176/2001, CDH 2001, p. 646.

[14] Marilena Uliescu. – New Civil Code, 3rd ed. revised and added – Bucharest, Universul Juridic, 2011.

References

- Christina Vlădescu – Abuse of rights in the regulation of the New Civil Code, 2011.www.juridice.ro
- Marilena Uliescu. – New Civil Code, 3rd ed. revised and added – Bucharest, Universul Juridic, 2011
- Completion of 12 December 2006 seventh Department of Trade Bucharest Court of Law.

- Legislation
- The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Rome 04.11.1950, ratified by Romanian by Law no. 30/1994 published in the Official Gazette no. 135/31.05.1994.
- Decision no. 161/2002 of the Constitutional Court published in the Official Gazette no. 448/26.06.2002.
- Law no. 47/1992 on the organization and functioning of the Constitutional Court, republished in the Official Gazette no. 807/03.12.2010.
- Article 1349 of the Civil Code. Aquilian responsibility
- Everyone has the duty to respect the rules of conduct which the law or local custom requires and not to bring prejudice through his/her actions or inactions to the legitimate interests of other persons.
- The one who, having discernment, violates this duty, is responsible for all the damage caused, being obliged to fully compensate it.
- New Civil Procedure Code Law no.134/2010 published in the official Gazette no. 485/15.07.2010
- Decision no. 548/2006 of Bucharest Court of Appeal, Fifth Department of Trade.
- Completion of 12 December 2006 seventh Department of Trade Bucharest Court of Law.
- Decision no.161/2002 of the Constitutional Court, published in the Official Gazette no.448/26.06.2002.
- Decision no.81/2001 of the Constitutional Court, published in the Official Gazette no.176/2001, CDH 2001, p. 646.
- Decision no.158/2009 of Court of Appeal Timişoara, Civil department.

THE EXECUTION INSTANCE OF THE JUDICIAL JUDGEMENTS SENTENCED IN THE LITIGATIONS OF ADMINISTRATIVE CONTENTIOUS

ADRIANA ELENA BELU[*]
ANDREEA DIANA PAPA[]

Abstract
The instance which solved the fund of the litigation rising from an administrative contract differs depending on the material competence sanctioned by law, in contrast to the subject of the commercial law where the execution instance is the court. In this matter the High Court stated in a decision[1] that in a first case the competence of solving the legal contest against the proper forced execution and of the legal contest that has in view the explanation of the meaning of spreading and applying the enforceable title which does not proceed from a jurisdiction organ is in the authority of the court.
The Law of the Administrative Contentious no 554/2004 defines in Article 2 paragraph 1 letter t) the notion of execution instance, providing that this is the instance which solved the fund of the litigation of administrative contentious, so even in the case of the administrative contracts the execution instance is the one which solved the litigation rising from the contract.
Corroborating this disposal with the ones existing in articles 22 and 25 in the Law, it can be shown that no matter the instance which decision is an enforceable title, the execution of the law will be done by the instance which solved the fund of the litigation regarding the administrative contentious.

Keywords: The Law of the Administrative Contentious, the instance, the commercial law, the execution instance, administrative contracts.

Introduction:

The Law of the Administrative Contentious no 554/2004 defines in Article 2 paragraph 1 letter ţ) the notion of execution instance, providing that this is the instance which solved the fund of the litigation of administrative contentious, so even in the case of the administrative contracts the execution instance is the one which solved the litigation rising from the contract.

Corroborating this disposal with the ones existing in articles 22 and 25 in the Law, it can be shown that no matter the instance which decision is an enforceable title, the execution of the law will be done by the instance which solved the fund of the litigation regarding the administrative contentious.

The instance which solved the fund of the litigation rising from an administrative contract differs depending on the material competence sanctioned by law, in contrast to the subject of the commercial law where the execution instance is the court. In this matter the High Court stated in a decision[2] that in a first case the competence of solving the legal contest against the proper forced execution and of the legal contest that has in view the explanation of the meaning of spreading and

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, „Spiru Haret" University, Craiova; lawyer (email: adyelenabelu@yahoo.com).
[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, „Spiru Haret" University, Craiova; lawyer (email: papa.andreea1980@yahoo.com).
[1] The Decision no15 from the 5th of February 2007 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice in L. Mera, A. Pena, cited work, pg.119.
[2] The Decision no15 from the 5th of February 2007 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice in L. Mera, A. Pena, cited work, pg.119.

applying the enforceable title which does not proceed from a jurisdiction organ is in the authority of the court.

From the interpretation of article 25 paragraph 1 from Law it results that the execution instance apply the sanctions and gives the compensations only to the demand of the claimant, which means that these cannot be given ex officio.

In this context, provided that the claimant does not demand to the instance the application of the sanctions or of the compensations the coercive force of the state is not set going regarding the defeat of the resistance of the public authority.

Paper content:

In the case of the administrative contracts, the general disposal established in article 25 from the Law no.554/2004 presents interpretations in the sense that the law is applied no matter that the claimant is a legal person of private law or of public law. So, paragraph 4 of article 25, stipulates that the provisions regarding the forced execution are applied "adequately" to the administrative contracts because the classic situation was that of the unilateral administrative acts, in which the defendant is only the public authority.

In the case that the administrative organ resists the execution, the interested part can appeal to the services of a judicial executor who will notify the defendant a court day in which the latter can execute his obligation.

Nevertheless, given the nature of the litigation, which stood at the basis of the forced execution, the judicial executor cannot send but a summons, being only a proper execution. At the most, the judicial executor can inform the criminal pursuit organs for the putting into execution of the offence of abuse confidence sanctioned in the Criminal Code.

Law no.554/2004 stipulates in article 24 paragraph 3 a specific criminal sanction which objective side consists in the non-execution from imputable reasons or the non observance of the ultimate and irrevocable judicial decisions sentenced in the instance of administrative contentious in 30 days from the date of the application of the penalty of the leader of the public authority or, in case, of the obliged person.

The legal action against the decision of the fund instance follows the regime of the community law, in the sense that it is not subjected to the appeal, but only to the recourse, the latter being suspensive of execution. The instance which solved the fund of the litigation regarding an administrative contract does not always coincide with the execution instance, because the decision of the first instance can be attacked by recourse. The decision of the instance which solved the fund also constitutes an enforceable title providing it has not been attacked by recourse or when the recourse has been rejected.

The procedural disposals in community law sanctioned by article 400 and the following from the Code of Civil Procedure become points of law in the subject of the administrative contentious regarding the acts which have in view the execution of the decisions which regard the application and the explanation of the issued enforceable title. The legal contest at execution can be formulated against the enforceable title itself, title which is constituted of a judicial decision. The High Court of Cassation and Justice[3] decided in 2005 that the actions which have as an object the legal contest at execution of the enforceable titles represented by judicial decisions sentenced by instances of administrative contentious are admissible, and the competence belongs to the instance which solved the fund of the litigation of administrative contentious.

In the case of the litigations rising from administrative contracts, the legal contest at execution can be formulated not only by the private law person, but also by the public authority. The disposals in the community law are applied in this case regarding the suspension of the enforceable title in exchange for a bail. The legal action against the decisions sentenced by the execution instance, the recourse, can be promoted by the both parts of the administrative contract, this not being suspensive of execution.

[3] Decision no. 5485/2005 from 16 November 2005 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, on www.legenet.indaco.ro.

In the subject of the administrative contracts, regarding the execution of the decisions by which compensations were given for material and moral damages the disposals of the community law, namely of the 5th book in Civil Procedure Code are applicable. In accordance with article 371 "the obligations which subject consists in the payment of a sum of money, the giving of an asset or of its use, the abolition of a building, plantation or other work or taking another measure acknowledged by law" can be forcefully executed.

For these categories of decisions the putting into function with an executory formula is necessary in order to become enforceable titles.

As far as the administrative contracts are regarded issued in the basis of OUG 34/2006 regarding the assigning of the contracts of public achievement, of the ones of concession of public works and of the contracts of concession of services[4], article 286 establishes that the person who demands compensations has to prove that the provisions of the urgency ordinance were infringed.

In the case that the person who demands is a natural person or a legal person of private law, the situation does not impose discussions, the public authority having all the execution means given by the community law. But if the legal person of public law is the one who was obliged to pay a sum of money, the situation is different because any expense has to be registered in the budget.

Autonomy and principles of the European law

EU's treaties and regulations created an autonomous legal order that is directly imposed to member states and natural persons or legal entities within the European Union.

Thus, in the court case Costa / Enel, the European Court (former Court of Justice of the European Union-Court) has pronounced upon the autonomy of the European law (Community law) in relation to the national law of the member states, stating that the EEC Treaty has set its own legal order, integrated in the legal system of the member states, which is imposed to the national judicial bodies, without the member states' ability to take a subsequently unilateral action against this legal order.

The Case is based on the innovative nature of the European Communities that do not create classical interstate relationships, but a limitation of powers and a transfer of competences to the Community.

In theory it was shown that there is no contradiction in presenting the Community order as being both different from national orders and forming an integral part thereof as well[5].

In this context, it should be noted that the Community provisions' integration in national systems is done automatically, without the interference or intervention of national authorities, however, the national judge applies the European law in its quality as legal autonomous order, and not as a national one.

In its jurisprudence, the Court failed to consider the conditions under which a member state has introduced the treaty in its national law, taking into account that the receiving hadn't had the effect of transforming the treaties and that they must be applied by domestic courts to the extent that they belong to the European law and not the national one[6].

In our opinion, the provisions of art. 4 par. 3 of the Treaty on European Union -Lisbon Treaty (former art. 10 par. 2 T.E.C.), which regulates the principle of loyal cooperation, introduces into the member states's duty an obligation "of not doing" in the sense of not taking measures that would jeopardize the application of Community provisions.

[4] Published in the Official Monitor no.148 from 15 May 2006.
[5] See Guy Isaac, Marc Blanquet, Droit general de l'Union Europeene, Publishing House Sirey 2006, pag. 262.
[6] Ibidem, pag. 265.

The rule instituted by the provisions of art. 267 Treaty on European Union (former art. 234 T.E.C.) establishes the cooperation procedure between national courts and the Court in Luxembourg for a uniform interpretation and in order to ascertain the validity of European rules, making the national judge the judge of the European common law, which is maintained by the Court's interpretation.

The European court case law has established the link between the principle of cooperation and the principle of direct effect of the Community law's dispositions[7].

The direct effect of the European law, as a basic principle, is that the Community provisions - clear, precise and unconditioned (are not subordinated to any further action that contains a discretionary power either of the European institutions or the member states) - may be invoked by individuals, natural persons and legal entities, directly before the national judge, when rights in their favor are created, in the absence or disregarding the contrary national rule and stating that authorities do not have discretionary power regarding the implementation of the European provisions.

The fundamental elements of the principle have been established for the first time in Van Gend & Loos decision (covering the direct effect of the treaty's provisions) where the European Court has pronounced upon the autonomy of the European law against the national law, and the fact that is biased when generating rights in favor of individuals within their legal jurisprudence, which must be protected by national courts.

We state, same as Pierre Mathijsen[8], that the direct effect of the European law has been recognized since the beginning by almost all national courts, which, by submitting "prejudicial issues" to the European court, agreed that European provisions should apply to their judicial system and confer rights which they must support.

Just by analyzing the criteria that have to be met by a European provision in order for its direct effect to be recognized (clarity, precision and unaffectedness of conditions), we note the following:

a) the regulation has a direct effect in accordance with art. 288 par. 2 EU Treaty (former art. 249 par. 2 T.E.C.) which states that "it is binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all member states" and consequently, the direct effect can not be opposed to a legislative provision of a national law which should compromise its essential character (cause Orsalina Sconisio/ Ministero de l'Agricultura e Foreste)[9].

In theory, it was shown that the regulation has a completely direct effect - vertical and horizontal, operating in the relationships between states and individuals, as well as in the relationships between individuals[10], claim which seems fair and is supported by the European court case.

b) the directive is mandatory for each member state regarding the result that has to be achieved, but gives the authorities in the process of transposition competence relating to form and means.

The directive does not confer in the first phase any rights or obligations for individuals, however, if properly implemented, its effects reach individuals through implementing measures taken by the state.

---

[7] Ovidiu Tinca, Jurisprudența Curții de Justiție a Comunităților Europene referitoare la principiul cooperării loiale între statele membre și instituțiile comunitare, R.R.D.C. no. 3/2007, pag. 51.

[8] See Pierre Mathijsen, Compendiu de drept european, VII edition, Publishing house Club Europa 2002, pag. 48.

[9] Indicated by Ovidiu Tinca in Efectul direct al dreptului comunitar, Dreptul no. 11/2007 pag. 69.

[10] See Jean-Caude Gautron, Droit europeene, Publishing house Dalloz 2006, pag. 181.

By analyzing the practice of the Court of Justice it ensues the fact that it has a direct effect only on condition that the member state has not adopted measures of transposition within the prescribed period or made an inconsistent transposition, the directive establishing rights that individuals and legal entities may use against the state (Becker decision C8/81)[11].

Therefore, the direct vertical effect of the directive can not be resisted unless its provisions are clear, precise and unconditioned against any further action or subject to a certain term.

In the French doctrine[12] it was stated that the lack of enforcement of the directive (not being transposed or its incorrect transposition) is the one that substantiates the power and the national judge's duty to directly apply it, and is a necessary condition added to the unconditional and sufficiently precise character of its terms.

As for us, we agree with this view and add that the two conditions - failure to transpose the directive and its unconditional nature - must be met simultaneously, and where, for lack of transposition or inconsistent transposition, harm has been done to individuals, the European law requires member states to compensate for damages, the national court being competent in deploying the state's willingness to assume responsability.

This will be initiated only if all three conditions are simultaneously met:

a) directive to recognize rights in favor of individuals,

b) the rights' content should be identified by means of the directive's provisions,

c) existence of a causal connection between the breach of the obligation incumbent on the state and the harm suffered by the injured party (Francavich and Bonifaci decision C/ Italia C6/90 and C9/90)[13].

In court case Ratti[14], the Court reiterated the reasons set out in the Van Duyn case, regarding the purpose of adopting directives and the possibility of their direct effect, stating in par. 22 that "a member state that has not adopted the implementing measures required by a directive within the prescribed period can not oppose individuals to the failure of fulfilling its obligations under the directive."

From the above, it results that the theory developed by the Court in case of directives reflects the principle nemo auditur propriam turpitudinem suam allegans.

In conclusion, it has to be shown as well that, although member states have an estimation margin (discretionary power) when implementing a directive, an individual can, through the national court, determine whether authorities have overstepped the bounds of evaluation.

c) decision under art. 288 Treaty on European Union (former art. 249 par. 4 T.E.C.) is binding in its entirety for its recipients, who may be individuals or member states.

As the Court had pronounced in the case Franz Grand[15], decisions addressed to individuals who qualify for the purposes of clarity, precision and unaffectedness by circumstances, have a direct vertical effect.

We conclude by arguing that if a Community disposition has a direct effect, the national judge is obliged to protect the subjective rights created for individuals, letting the national contrary rule utterly unenforceable.

For the purposes of the above, our supreme court has pronounced a decision[16] in which the provisions of Directive no. 2004/38/EC of the Council and European Parliament (on the free movement of EU citizens), came into conflict with the provisions of art. 38 of Law no. 248/2005 which restricted the exercise of this right; on conditions of the directive not being transposed on time,

---

[11] Decision from 19.01.1982 in C.J.E.U. Jurisprudence, vol. I, pag. 52.
[12] See Guy Isaac and Marc Blanquet, op.cit., pag. 277.
[13] C.J.E.U. Jurisprudence, vol.II pag. 411.
[14] Quoted by Tudorel Ştefan and Beatrice Andreşan-Grigoriu, op.cit., pag. 219.
[15] Cause 9/70 Franz Grand quoted in op.cit., pag. 214.
[16] I.C.C.J., Decision no. 5982/2007 published in P.R. no. 1/2008.

the national court applied the European law, protecting the individuals' rights confered by the Directive.

Besides its direct effect principle, the principle of priority of the European law is also a consequence of the obligation of loyal cooperation between member states.

Affirming the principle of priority was firstly made by the European court during the famous case Costa / Enel which resolved the conflict between the Treaty and an Italian law [17].

It was thus stated that the supremacy of the European law is confirmed by the provisions of the art. 288 Treaty on European Union (former art. 249 T.E.C.), according to which regulations are binding and directly applicable in all member states.

Based on these considerations, the Court stated that "the legal system of the Treaty can not be surpassed because of its special and original nature, by national legal rules, whatever their legal force, without being deprived of its character as Community law and without the legal foundation of the Community itself being called into question."

In the court case Interntionale Handelsgesellschaft, the Court reiterated arguments because of Costa / Enel, stating in paragraph 3 that "the validity of a European measure or its effect on a member state's territory can not be affected by allegations that the measure would be contrary to fundamental rights, such as those formulated by the Constitution of that member state or the principles of national constitutional structure".

From the above, and the doctrine's analysis[18], one can conclude that the principle of Community law has an inclusive effect against national constitutions and consequently any national legislation incompatible with the Community law constitutes a bar, and the national judge is the one that has to apply the Community law's dispositions.

In this respect, in the court case C-106/77 Simmenthal[19], seeking a preliminary ruling, former ECJ decided that the national judge should ensure the full effect of the provisions of the European law against any contrary provisions of national law, even later ones, without seeking or expecting its prior removal by legislative means or constitutional court.

In this context, it should be noted that in another case, former ECJ went further, requiring the British judge, for the case where national law forbids them to take interim measures, with the purpose of ensuring the existence of the rights invoked in virtue of the European law, to remove the application of national rules incompatible with the Community law (C213/89 Factartome LTD/ and others)[20].

As for us, we reject the priority thesis of the European law against national constitutions, reaching for the limited superiority of the European law, its supra-legislative value, but infra-constitutional in the same time, so that in case of a conflict with the national law, it prevails, but not in case of a normative conflict with the constitution. We argue our position with the approach adopted by the Romanian Constitution as well, which, in art. 11's provisions imposes a priority principle of all international treaties against any national laws, these having therefore a supra-legislative position in the hierarchy of legal norms, but an infra-constitutional one at the same time, meaning that if a treaty contains provisions contrary to the Constitution, it will only be ratified after reviewing the Constitution.[21]

The national judge asked to rule on the compatibility of a national legislation with the European law, can refer to the Court with an "appeal of interpretation" in order to be able to settle this issue of compatibility.

---

[17] C.J.E.U. Jurisprudence, vol.I pag. 115-Decision C6/64.

[18] See Octavian Manolache, op.cit., pag. 72; Tudorel Ştefan and Beatrice Andreşan-Grigoriu, op.cit., pag. 192; Jean Claude Gautron, op.cit., pag. 185.

[19] C.J.EU. Jurisprudence., vol.I, pag. 115.

[20] Jurisprudence of the C.J.E.U., Vol.II, pag. 403 .

[21] Dan Claudiu Dănişor, Ion Dogaru, Gheorghe Dănişor, Teoria Generală a dreptului, Publishing house CH Beck 2008, pag. 200-201.

This action regulated by the provisions of art. 267 Treaty on European Union (former art. 234 T.E.C.) is also a judicial cooperation mechanism which establishes the participation of the Court of Justice to the national courts' regulation, due to the dialogue from judge to judge.

In the occidental doctrine[22] it was considered that the appeal of interpretation regulated by the provisions of art. 267 Treaty on European Union (former art. 234 T.E.C.) has three functions:

a) to ensure the unity of the Community law by avoiding differing interpretations of national jurisdictions;

b) to fill infringement appeals when finding about the state not fulfilling its obligations to which individuals have access, if a conflict between a provision of national law and a Community disposition;

c) to complete the action of cancellation (as to the validity of a secondary legislation act), to which individuals have limited access.

Being in agreement with the doctrinal statements, we can afford to supplement them by saying that the mechanism of prejudicial issues causes the accessibility of the European law to litigants and the national judge who in the future is no longer obliged to notify the Court of Justice of the European Union with an appeal of interpretation.

Regarding the obligation to notify, the Court of Justice in case C 283/81 SRL Clif and Lanificio di Gavore SpA C / Ministry of Health, stated that a national judicial body whose decisions are not subject to appeal under the national law is obliged, when before it it is formulated a question about the European law, to notify the Court of Justice unless it finds the question irrelevant or the European disposition was interpreted by the Court or the right way of implementing or the European law is so obvious, that it leaves no room for reasonable doubt.

When reasoning the decision stated above, the theory of "clear act" and "clarified act" from the French law is being applied.

Conclusions:

The law of the local public administration no.215/2001 establishes the obligation of the administrative- territorial units and of the Ministry of Public Finance to assure from the local budgets, respectively the state budget the compensations that Romania must pay for the lost cases at the European Court of Human Rights.

The debts consisting in the compensations owed by the state or by administrative-territorial units cannot be covered but by their money, the material means of any other nature, stock goods, personal properties and estates not being susceptible of forced execution. The problem of forced execution of public authorities presents difficulties concerning the organization of a compulsion system applied by state against the state because the execution organ is in the last instance the state through its representatives.[23]

Not even the public authorities can invoke the lack of funds to justify the non-observance of a judicial decision through which compensations were given in the subject of administrative contracts; such an attitude is not interpreted in the European jurisprudence as an infringement of the property right.

In the view of the European Court of Human Rights[24] the certain, liquid and exigible debts owned by one person are assimilated to the property right being "goods" in a broad way and including not only the personal goods, but also the patrimonial values and debt rights.

---

[22] See Jean-Claude Gautron, Droit europeen, Publishing house Dalloz 2006, op.cit.,pag. 175.

[23] E.D. Tarangul, Administrative right course for second year thesis, Litography „Romanian Book Book Store", pg.393, cf. O.Puie, cited work, pg.84.

[24] Constandache Cause against Romania, Decision on admissibility from 11 June 2002 and Constitutional Court, Decision no.70/2001 and 97/2004.

In terms of assessing the validity of the European law, the notification is required when the judge has a serious doubt on the validity of the European act contested by way of exception.

In our specialist literature it was appreciated that in case of an appeal of interpretation, we have a judge a quo who has to, and if necessary, has the possibility to suspend proceedings and send the competent judge ad quem a controversial legal issue and who the case's settlement depends on.[25]

In this context, it is clear that the European court does not replace national jurisdiction, it gives an abstract decision that affects the attitude of national judges when adjudicating a concrete solution, but does not apply the law in its place.

References:

- The Decision no15 from the 5th of February 2007 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice in L. Mera, A. Pena, cited work, pg.119;
- The Decision no15 from the 5th of February 2007 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice in L. Mera, A. Pena, cited work, pg.119;
- E.D. Tarangul, Administrative right course for second year thesis, (Litography „Romanian Book Book Store", pg.393, cf. O.Puie, cited work), 84;
- Constandache Cause against Romania, Decision on admissibility from 11 June 2002 and Constitutional Court, Decision no.70/2001 and 97/2004.
- Paul Cassia, La mise en oeuvre du droit communautaire dans la contentieux administratif în Droit administratif Europeen, (coord. Jean Bernard Auby şi Jacqueline Dutheil de la Rochere, Editura Bruylant 2007), 54-57;
- Jurgen Schwarze,Le sources et principes du droit administratif europeen în Droit administratif Europeen, (coord. Jean Bernard Auby şi Jacqueline Dutheil de la Rochere, Editura Bruylant 2007), 87-89;
- Diana-Urania Galeta, Le principe de proportionnalite în Droit administratif Europeen, coord. Jean Bernard Auby şi Jacqueline Dutheil de la Rochere, (Editura Bruylant 2007), 103-105;

[25] Emanuel Corneliu Mogîrzan, Noţiunea de chestiune prejudicială şi cea de acţiune în terminologia dreptului român şi în cea a dreptului Uniunii Europene, Magazine Dreptul no. 5/2007.

CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE NORMATIVE DIMENSION OF THE JUDICIAL RESPONSIBILITY

LOREDANA BELU[*]
ELENA ALEXANDRA ILINCA[]

Abstract
The judicial responsibility, understood as an assembly of rules and obligations which are born by committing an illicit fact, can be taken only under the condition of the judicial responsibility. Knowing that the basis of the judicial responsibility is the illicit fact, the irresponsibility cancels the illicit character of the fact. So, the judicial responsibility should be analyzed depending on two criteria: the normative criterion (when the responsibility of some categories of people is established and defined by law) and the bio-psychological criterion (the state of psychic normality which includes the presence of discernment).

Keywords: the juridical responsibility, the illicit character, the normative criterion, the bio-psychological criterion, rights and obligations.

Introduction:

The juridical liability represents a premise of the juridical liability, an active way of reporting the individual and the collectivity to a certain cause, it involves taking certain liabilities and risks, sometimes by acting beyond the system of norms, which ensures their rights and obligations.

Thus, while the juridical liability has a normative character and aims at abiding or not abiding by the disposition included in the juridical norm, the juridical responsibility has a value character and aims at reporting the individual at the value contained and expressed by the juridical norm.

Talking about the juridical responsibility, we refer to a personality found under the condition of normality, we are talking about the person who is acting in report with the values expressed by the juridical normative system, meaning that the individual who made himself an own values system may choose the prescription of the juridical norm, by finding it according to his own convictions. The attitude focused in the continual social value, expressed by the juridical norm, is the juridical responsibility itself. The moment when the juridical responsibility was taken is the individual's decision, understood as a final act of the decision.

1. Etymological analysis

The notion of « responsibility » was born by the combination of two Latin words : the noun res (which may mean : thing, reason, interest, cause, etc.) and the verb spondeo (which is translated by : to guarantee, to promise). In the verbis contract from the old Roman law, the term « spondeo » meant a solemn promise of the debtor to perform that obligation assumed by the contract concluded with his creditor. In Gainus' « Institutions », it was provided that in the case of the verbis obligation, the answer « I promise ! Solemnly ! » (spondeo) was present. In Larousse de la Langue Francaise « Lexis » (1979, page 1629) it is provided that the term of « responsibility » was introduced much later than the term of « liability » and it means the obligation to fix.

2. The definition of the juridical responsibility

The juridical literature offers a diversity of opinions, under the aspect of defining, starting from the proximal type under which the juridical responsibility ought to fall. Depending on this criterion, we found the following types »

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences University of Craiova (email: loribelu@yahoo.com).

[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, „Spiru Haret" University, Craiova; lawyer (email: alailinca@yahoo.com).

In some authors' opinion, the juridical responsibility is an obligation, namely:

- the obligation of the subject to fulfill a certain debt that was born by not fulfilling a prior obligation [1];

- the obligation to be subject to a restriction, or to repair a prejudice[2];

- the obligation of the one who did an illegal action to be subject to a juridical sanction[3];

- the obligation to be subject to a restriction because of an illegal behaviour reported by the state[4].

Paper content:

In the works of other authors, the juridical responsibility is understood as a juridical relationship of constraint, being defined as follows:

- it represents a complex of rights and obligations which form the content of a juridical relationship of constraint, which appears between the state as the only active subject and the author of the illegal action, as a passive subject.[5];

- it is a juridical relationship of constraint having as object the juridical sanction.[6]

- we also find a more extensive point of view, as a necessary step to overpass the limits established by the juridical relationship: it is the institution which includes the assembly of juridical norms that aim at relationships which are born in the field of the activity performed by the public authorities under the provisions of the law, against the ones who break or ignore the order, with a view to ensure the observance and promotion of the public order and public wellness.[7].

Happily, there has been formed a group of authors that see the juridical responsibility from the point of view of the three factors highlighted previously : psychological, social and juridical.

Examples:

- it is a form of the social responsibility, which includes the complex of human attitudes reported to the juridical normative system formed in the society in which it lives, with a view to learn, preserve and promote this system and the values it expresses, in order to maintain and promote the juridical order and the public wellness [8];

- it is a concept by which the legislator expresses certain persons' vocation to liability, for some juridical actions and deeds performed personally or through other people or things they manage (valid for the private law, because for the public law the author expresses the definition in a different way: it is the juridical institution by which any legal entity can be declared by the legislator liable for certain juridical actions and deeds which he may perform by issuing, organizing, executing, abiding by the law and making justice personally or through other people or by things managed by him)[9];

- a skill, a real possibility or vocation to work with guilt[10].

We consider that a scientific approach of the juridical responsibility imposes a certain inter-disciplinary analysis and not a static position of equalization with the obligation when being subject

---

[1] see Alessandra Levi, Teoria generale del diritto, Cedam, Padova, 1967, p.389.

[2] see Antonie Iorgovan, Administrative Law. Elementary Treaty, Ed. Proarcadia, 1993,p. 175.

[3] see I Oancea, The notion of criminal liability, in the Annals of the University of Bucharest, series Social and Juridical Sciences, no. 6/1959, p. 133.

[4] see I. Iovănaş, Theoretical considerations regarding the administrative responsibility, in the Law of RSR, Ph. D. Thesis, Cluj, 1968, p. 49.

[5] see M. Costin, Juridical responsibility in the law of RSR, Ed,. Dacia, Cluj, 1974, p. 27.

[6] see Ghe. Boboş, The general theory of the state and law, Ed Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucureşti, 1983, p. 264.

[7] see Lidia Barac, A few considerations regarding the definition of juridical liability, Revista Dreptul, no. 4/1994, p. 41.

[8] see Lidia Barac, Juridical responsibility and sanction, Ed. Lumina Lex, Bucureşti, 1997, p. 21.

[9] see Valerică Dabu, Policemen, prosecutors and judges between law and crime, Regia Autonomă, Monitorul Oficial, Bucureşti, 1997, p. 20.

[10] see N. Giurgiu, Responsibility and the Criminal Sanctions, Ed. Neuron, Focşani, 1995, p. 7.

to the juridical sanction. In such vision the relation between the psycho-social and juridical responsibility becomes relevant. We can also get to this conclusion by relating the below thoughts:

1. The juridical responsibility is a premise of the juridical liability.

2. The basis of the juridical liability is the illegal deed.

3. The irresponsibility removes the illegal character of the deed.

So, the irresponsibility removes the juridical liability, logic followed in the juridical practice: the court firstly established if the subject is responsible, when enforcing the law in the resolution of a concrete case, and only after this do they check if this one will be liable for the respective action under the given circumstances. Namely, they refer to the responsibility of the subject. In this context, the juridical responsibility must be seen from two points of view:

a) A normative dimension, when the law establishes and splits the responsibility in categories of people (for example, the responsibility of the public clerk)

b) A bio – psychological dimension, as a normal state which includes the presence of the discernment.

The existence of the first dimension may be explained with examples which aim at the juridical responsibility at a constitutional level:[11]:

- in article 21 from the French Constitution, it is provided: „The Prime Minister leads the actions of the Government. He is responsible for the national defense";
- in article 65 of the German Constitution it is shown: „The Federal Chancellor established the main lines of the politics and takes the responsibility for them". Within these limits, each federal minister leads their departments in an independent way and under their own responsibility";
- in article 13 of the Constitution from Denmark it is provided: „The King is not responsible; his person is inviolable and sacred; the ministers are responsible of their behavior in front of the Government, the responsibility is regulated by the law". In the same spirit, article 14 shows that „each minister who countersigned is responsible of this decision";
- in article 22 from the Constitution of Belgium it is shown that „The law determines which are the responsible agents for the violation of the secret of correspondence"

In article 108 from the Romanian Constitution (from 1991) it is provided: „The cases of liability and the punishments given to the members of the Government are regulated by a law regarding the responsibility of ministers" In other laws also the concept of responsibility can be found (examples)

- in the Law of the local public administration (Law no. 69/1991) right in article 1, the responsibility of the organs of the local public administration is regulated;
- in the Law regarding the status of military employees (Law no.80/1995), it is provided – referring to this professional category – „They are responsible of the way in which they fulfill the missions given to them"

The bio – psychological dimension of the juridical responsibility has a position which alternates with the normative dimension: taking as example the public clerk or the military employee, responsible – after the provisions of the law – (the examples can be multiplied), we can retain, subsequent to the legal medical expertise, the irresponsibility of the one who committed an illegal deed (for example, he has a mental condition which cancels his discernment). In this case, the bio – psychological dimension is subsequent to the normative dimension, this being also the order of the research in the juridical practice. The places are switched if, in a primary phase, when the issue of juridical liability is not present. Namely, the public clerk or military employee reached this status and this position because they have proved in time, normally developed personalities, strong bio-psycho-social-cultural structures.

[11] see Les Constitutions de L' Europe des Douze, La documentation francais, Paris, 1992.

Thus, speaking of juridical responsibility, we are talking about a personality found under the condition of normality, which necessarily includes the axiological component: the individual behaves reported to the values expressed by the juridical normative system. If the juridical liability is a normative one, aiming at the compliance or non-compliance of the prescriptions or dispositions of the juridical norms, the juridical responsibility is a value one, namely the individual that created himself an own values system may choose the prescription of the juridical norm because he finds it according to his own ideas. The inner forum is the one dictating such an attitude: the acceptance of the juridical order, seen separately or as a whole, and not a behavior external to his personality. The juridical responsibility represents the attitude focused on the social value contained and expressed by the juridical norm, value assumed and imposed by the individual, with the conviction that he is serving the public and personal wellness.

The normal individual, mentally developed, who acts freely can be legally responsible.

Note*: The juridical responsibility is structured in two dimensions, each of them reflecting the fate of the whole, depending on the situation or the context. In the absence of such deal, negative, unreal conclusions may be drawn, some of them even with a comic denouement (we remind the provision of art. 13 from the Danish Constitution: „the King is irresponsible").

3. The basis of the juridical responsibility

The two dimensions on which the juridical responsibility is situated attract, each of them, the identification of its own basis:

- the normative dimension in the virtue of which the juridical responsibility is provided and regulated by law, leads to an undoubted conclusion: the law is the basis of the juridical responsibility;

- the bio – psychological dimension requires as basis of the juridical responsibility the normally developed human personality, in its free manifestation. The mental normality must be correlated with freedom, which must be present in three stages: choice, decision (the free will) and action, In each team, the social values expressed by the juridical norm are aimed at, such values becoming criteria of the juridical responsibility[12]. In this way, the juridical responsibility becomes itself a way to appreciate and evaluate the behavior required by the disposition of the juridical norm.

4. The stimulation of the juridical responsibility

The moment when the juridical responsibility starts is the decision of the individual, understood as a final act of the decision. He decides to act – and will act – according to the option chosen, by evaluating that this one is corresponding to the final purpose which must be reached. Such decision must be supported by proper training and education. By training, the informational field may be improved, by education the information may be affectively oriented, turning it into conviction. By training, he is learning the field of obligations and restrictions, by education he is using the freedom to act.

The stimulation of the juridical responsibility can be done by the complementary development of the two forms: training and education. Beyond the theoretical character of the two ways of stimulation, the individual must understand the elements which the society must ensure: a political and juridical democratic regime and necessarily, material and economic conditions mandatory for a decent way of living. In this way, under the conditions of material and social independence, the individual becomes a fertile ground where the training and education can seed the system of attitudes compatible with the values included in the juridical normative system.

[12] see L. Barac, op. cit., p. 29.

Conclusions:

Responsibility – higher form of integration

When the child is born, he has a hereditary potential which must be turned to value, shaped and stimulated by educational processes, socialization and social control. The human individual develops himself as a personality only in society, crossing a lot of social groups as a bearer of statuses and roles. The human is a social-cultural, educational and historical product, who received and assimilated the influences of the environment, historic stage in which he develops and lives.

By education and socialization, the individual assimilates norms and social models of behavior under the influence of certain social factors: family, school, social and cultural institutions, the system of practices from the collective he lives in. By socialization, the child is lead in order to acquire certain habits, knowledge processes, ways to act and behaviors, ideals according to the social environment. The socialization is in a complete inter-dependence with social integration, process by which the individual is assimilated in units and social systems by adapting to the conditions of the social life. In this purpose, the adaptation expresses the agreement between the personal behavior and the models of behavior belonging to a certain social environment. We are talking about a social maladjustment in case of people with mental diseases, criminals, individuals with behavior disorders, the causes being complex : hereditary issues, harmful living environment, frustration or emotional trauma, etc.

Juridical responsibility – condition of the public wellness

The juridical responsibility can be considered as an assumption of desirable values for the responsible individual and not only, desirable for his community. The law itself is a product of the will and expresses the will to live in a juridical community in which the coordinates are good and justice. Such an idea is found in the outstanding definition given to the law by the Romanian legal experts: "jus est ars bori et acqui" (the law is the art of good and justice) [13].

From a different perspective, we consider that the finality of the law rule is the finality of the society itself – common wellness: Lex est ordinatio ad bonum comune*". The common wellness, namely the public wellness cannot have conventional borders, it must be understood in the dialectic national wellness – international wellness. Coming back to the values protected by the juridical norms, these must be accepted as an exemplary collection, situated in an order corresponding to the needs and ideals of some human collectivities hic et nunc [14]. What could we understand by public wellness? Firstly, everything that characterizes the good generally, everything claimed by the personality of each of us in order to reach and build a dynamic, prosperous balance, the order which gives us safety and trust and moreover, that „universality of the values of human interest".[15].

By its function of ensuring the preservation and improvement of the system of juridical norms, the juridical responsibility aims at promoting the public wellness.

References:

- V Hanga, History of the Romanian Law. Cutuniar Law, (Iaşi, Ed. Chemarea, 1993), 15 ;
- Valerică Dabu, Policemen, prosecutors and judges between law and crime, (Regia Autonomă, Monitorul Oficial, Bucureşti, 1997), 20;
- N. Giurgiu, Responsibility and the Criminal Sanctions, (Ed. Neuron, Focşani, 1995),7;
- Antonie Iorgovan, Administrative Law. Elementary Treaty, (Ed. Proarcadia, 1993), 175;
- Oancea, The notion of criminal liability, in the Annals of the University of Bucharest, (series Social and Juridical Sciences, no. 6/1959),133.

[13] see V Hanga, History of the Romanian Law. Cutuniar Law, Iaşi, Ed. Chemarea, 1993, p. 15.

[14] see E. Gheorghe, Value Priorities in the Contemporany Society, in Rev. de Filosofie, nr. 3- 4/1991, p. 168.

[15] see I. Craiovan, Finalities of the Law, Ed. Continent XXI, Bucureşti, 1995, p. 122.

THE ROLE OF THE EMPLOYEES' REPRESENTATIVES IN THE LIGHT OF THE NEW ROMANIAN SOCIAL DIALOGUE LAW

IULIA BĂDOI*

Abstract

In the environment of constant social and legislative changes, the field of labor law, as part of the private law domain, is always a subject of debates. The year 2011 is a relevant benchmark for the major modifications brought to the field of labor law in Romania.

The amendments of the labor law significant acts had as role to find efficient means of dialogue between the social partners. The legislative provisions represent only a premise for a successful social dialogue. In fact, the key of communication between the social partners is the negotiation.

The employees' representatives, as social partners, may represent the employees' interests within a unit, in the absence of a union. In the light of the new Social Dialogue Law the employees' representatives may also participate in negotiations even in the presence of a union organization.

There is no doubt that the new Social Dialogue law and Labor Code inserted new concepts meant to facilitate the labor relationships and social dialogue. It's only to be seen in which way these new regulations will affect the labor relationships.

Key Words: Social Dialogue, social partners, labor conflict, negotiation, employees' representatives

Introduction

Labor relationships represent a very important part of the private law domain, with significant repercussions over the social and economic life of every state. As a result of constant social evolution and in the context of a global economic crisis with general effects in various aspects of the social life, some legislative changes came as a natural result in Romania.

During the year of 2011, two of the major acts bringing new provisions in the field of labor law were the Labor Code republished and the Social Dialogue Law.

The Labor Code was practically written again, all laws regulating the collective labor relationships were abrogated and replaced by a single law, Law no. 62/2011.

Some of the declared goals of the legislative changes were to render the labor market more flexible and to simplify the contractual procedures.[1]

The Law on Social Dialogue aimed to consolidate the following five acts into one law: Law no. 54/2003 on trade unions, Law no. 356/2001 on employers, Law no. 109/1997 on the organization and functioning of the Economic and Social Council, Law no. 130/1996 regarding collective labor contracts, Law no. 168/1999 regarding the settlement of labor conflicts.[2]

Before the Romanian Labor Code came into force, the institution of „employees' representatives" was regulated only in what concerned the negotiation and closing the collective labor contracts in the hypothesis in which in a certain unit there was no representative union.[3]

Also, we were in the presence of regulations stipulated in several special laws that were making references to the role of the employees' representatives, which will were abrogated.

---

* Ph. D. candidate, The Academy of Economic Studies – The Council for Doctoral Studies – field „ Law studies" Bucharest, (email: iulia.badoi@yahoo.com).

[1] Raluca, Dimitriu, "Collective labor conflicts in companies and public institutions: some prospects", Transylvanian Review of Administrative Sciences, No. 34 E/2011, pp. 81.

[2] Raluca, Dimitriu, "Collective labor conflicts in companies and public institutions: some prospects", Transylvanian Review of Administrative Sciences, No. 34 E/2011, pp. 83.

[3] Ion, Traian, Ştefănescu, "Tratat teoretic şi practic de drept al muncii", Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2010, p.125-126.

The social dialogue is the instrument for ensuring the social peace. The social peace is a result of the social dialogue between social partners[4]. Article no. 214 the Romanian Labor Code published in 2003 article 214 [and article no. 211 of the Romanian Labor Code republished in 2011] stated that: "In order to ensure a climate of stability and social peace, the law foreseen consultation and constant dialogue means between the social partners."

The present article has as objective to show the importance of employees' representatives in the light of the new Romanian Social Dialogue Law. In order to be able to speak about the role of this type of social partners or representatives of social partners is essential to analyze some terms such as: labor relationships, social partners, employee, employer, social dialogue, social peace, what happens when we are in the presence of collective labor conflicts and what are the means of settlement.

The Romanian legislation on collective labor conflicts, currently at crossroads, is rather susceptible to discourage the initiation of collective labor conflicts. Such a situation looks alarming since the absence of conflicts does not in fact mean social peace. Irrespective of the law system, social peace is a result of a conscious and voluntary effort, never imposed upon the potential actors.[5]

Definitions and general presentation of the legislative provisions

Defining the elements involved in the labor relationships was always a concern of the Romanian legislator.

The main social partners involved in the labor relationships are the employer and the employee. The new social dialogue law defines the social partners in the article no. 1, letter a) as it follows: "the social partners are the unions and the unions' organizations, the employers and the syndicates and also the representatives of the public administration authorities, which interact in the social dialogue process."[6]

Before being abrogated, the Law no. 168/1999 was using the term "unit" as for indicating a juridical person that uses the work of employees. Art. 6 (2) of the Law regarding the settlement of labor conflicts foreseen that "The labor conflicts between the employers, private individuals and their employees will be settled in accordance with the provisions of this law." The term "unit" was meanwhile abandoned in the juridical literature under the influence of the Labor Code that doesn't use it anymore. [7]

The Labor Code uses a term with a wider understanding, which is "employer"[8], including in this notion the persons that employ paid work. So, in accordance with the legal text of article no. 14 of the Labor Code "the employer is a private individual or a juridical person that can provide employment on the basis of an individual labor contract, in accordance with the legal provisions."

The law no. 62/2011 updated the definition given by the Labor Code: "The employer is a private individual or a juridical person that can provide employment on the basis of an individual labor contract or a working relationship."[9] The new element is the fact that the legal ground for the employment is not only an individual labor contract, but also a working relationship. This provision is wider than the one used by the Labor Code and it comprises in the notion of employee not solely the persons employed on the basis of an individual contract, but also other types of employed persons [such as public servants with special status - like militaries, policemen - that work on the basis of collective labor contracts, in accordance with special laws].

---

[4] Raluca, Dimitriu, "Legea privind soluționarea conflictelor de muncă, Comentarii și explicații" –C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2007, p.14.

[5] Raluca, Dimitriu, "Collective labor conflicts in companies and public institutions: some prospects", Transylvanian Review of Administrative Sciences, No. 34 E/2011, pp. 96.

[6] Law no. 62/2011, published in the in Official Journal no. 322/10.05.2011.

[7] Raluca, Dimitriu, "Legea privind soluționarea conflictelor de muncă, Comentarii și explicații", p. 6.

[8] Article no. 14 of the Law no. 53/2003 republished in 2011.

[9] Article no. 1, letter e).

The social dialogue is the willing process of informing, consulting and negotiating between the social partners in order to establish agreements in what concerns problems of commune interest.

The informing consists in the obligation of the employer to transmit data to the union or the employees' representatives with the aim for them to get used to the themes of debates and to permit a proper assessment from their part.

The consultation involves the change of opinions within the process of social dialogue.

The collective negotiation is the negotiation between the employer/syndicate on a hand and union/unions' organizations or employees' representatives on the other hand. The collective negotiation has as goal to regulate the labor or working relationships between the involved parties and also any other agreements for matters of commune interest.[10]

The collective labor contract represents the written convention closed between the employer/syndicate and the employees representatives meant to establish the rights and obligations resulted from the working relationships. By closing collective labor contracts the goal is to promote and to defend the interest of the signing parties, the prevention and limitation of collective labor conflicts, in order to ensure the social peace.[11]

Law no. 168/1999[12] regarding the settlement of labor conflicts divided collective labor conflicts into: (a) conflicts during the pre-contractual stage, bargaining conflicts, solved by conciliation, mediation, arbitrage, strike, called conflicts of interests, and (b) conflicts during the execution of a collective or individual labor contract, solved by the court of law, called conflicts of rights. This is not a recent classification but it has been present in the Romanian law for a long time. The conflicts of rights occurred because a right stipulated in the law or in the collective or individual contract was not complied with, whereas the conflicts of interests occurred in case of disagreement between the parties regarding a claim of the workers not yet stipulated by law, the collective or the individual labor contract. The conflicts of rights were usually solved by the court while the conflicts of interests were solved by specific, extra-jurisdictional methods (conciliation, mediation, arbitrage, strike).

Against this logical approach already in place, which was perceived as fair by the doctrine and by jurisprudence, the new Law on Social Dialogue brings a fundamental change: it removes the difference between conflicts of rights and conflicts of interests (difference which is admitted either expressly in legislation or in the jurisprudence of almost every European law system) replacing it with the classification of the labor conflicts into collective and individual disputes.

Currently, therefore, if the collective contract cannot be concluded because the employer and the employees cannot reach a mutual agreement, a collective conflict can be initiated. However, which may be the nature of a conflict arisen as a result of non-compliance with a collective contract? Such a conflict can no longer have a collective nature (since the collective conflicts are defined exclusively in relation to the moment when the collective contracts are negotiated). It results, somehow surprisingly, that a dispute arisen from non-compliance with a provision in the collective contract can only have an individual nature (irrespective of the number of employees or public servants affected).[13]

Before coming into force of the Social Dialogue Law no. 62/2011 the institution of employees' representatives was regulated by the Labor Code provisions and several special laws. The Social Dialogue Law abrogated most of the important special laws in the field of labor relationships and the new Labor Code also brought novelty elements in the domain, including in what concerns the employees' representatives.

---

[10] Article no. 1, letter b) of the Law no. 62/2011.

[11] Article no. 1, letter i) of the Law no. 62/2011.

[12] Abrogated by Law no. 62/2011.

[13] Raluca, Dimitriu, "Collective labor conflicts in companies and public institutions: some prospects", Transylvanian Review of Administrative Sciences, No. 34 E/2011, pp. 83.

The law no. 168/1999 related to solving the collective labor conflicts established different attributions for the employees' representatives linked to the interests conflicts, including the right for strike [in case of no representative union].[14]

Although achieving social peace would be ideal, sometimes this doesn't necessarily mean that it's in everybody's best interest. That's why it's important to have instruments of coming to a settlement in case of labor conflicts occur. The Social Dialog Law foresees as means of settlement in case of collective labor conflicts: the conciliation, the mediation and the arbitrage. These means of settlement are instruments only for the parts involved in the conflict.

The conciliation procedure is mandatory. The law contains provisions related to the procedural steps in case of conciliation. If after the debates the parties reach an agreement with reference to the demands, the collective labor conflict ends.

In case the conflict is still not solved, the parties may decide, expressing their free willingness, to initiate the mediation procedure, in accordance with the provisions of the law.

Also, during the conflict the parties may decide, expressing their free willingness, to let an arbitrator to decide upon their demands. The arbitral decisions are mandatory for the parties, update the provisions of the collective labor contracts and are enforceable from the moment they were rendered.

Mandate of the employees' representatives

The regulations concerning the employees' representatives were comprised in Chapter III, articles 224-229 of the Labor Code. The new Labor Code also assigns a special chapter to this institution, Chapter III, articles no. 221-226.

In accordance with the Romanian Labor Code the chosen employees' representatives on the basis of a special mandate can promote and represent the interests of the employees in units with more than 20 employees where none of them is a union member.

Between the employees' representatives and the employees that have chosen them there is a juridical connection that has its legal grounds in a contract of civil mandate.[15]

The employees' representatives are chosen within the employees' general meeting, with the vote of at least half of the total number of employees.

The employees' representatives can not be involved in activities recognized by the law as being an exclusive attribution of the unions.

The employees' representatives can be chosen from within the employees having at least 21 years old and that have been worked in that unit for at least one year without any interruption.

The condition related to the duration of working in a unit is not applicable in what concerns the employees' representatives in the new incorporated units.

The number of employees' representatives is being established together with the employer in accordance with the number of employees.

The duration of the mandate for the employees' representatives can not exceed 2 years.

As it can be easily interpreted from the legal text of the Labor Code, the employees' representatives have to fulfill a series of conditions in order to have this capacity, such as:

- The unit where they perform their activity must have at least 21 employees;
- The employees they represent don't have to be members of a union;
- They have to have a special mandate given by the employees in order to promote and represent their interests;
- They have to be at least 21 years old;
- They must have been worked in that unit for at least 1 year without any interruption.

[14] Ion, Traian, Ştefănescu, op.cit., p.126.
[15] Ion, Traian, Ştefănescu, op.cit., p.127.

In accordance with the Labor Code published in 2003[16], the employees' representatives had the main legal attributions:[17]

- To keep evidence that the employees' rights are being respected, in compliance with the current legislation, the applicable collective labor contract, the individual labor contracts and with the internal regulation;
- To participate in elaborating the internal regulation;
- To promote the employees' interests related to salaries, working conditions, duration of the working time, stability in work and any other professional, economic and social interests linked to the labor relationships;
- To inform the labor inspectorate referring to the non compliance with the legal regulations and with the amendments of the applicable collective labor contract.

The modification of the Labor Code[18] added a new attribution to the employees' representatives[19]:

- To negotiate the collective labor contracts, in accordance with the law.

Before the Labor Code was republished the previous regulation didn't foresee the right of the employees' representatives to negotiate the collective labor contracts, art. 223, letter e) being a new element of the Labor Code.

In the presence of the 2003 Labor Code, in practice we were facing a problem: the representatives chosen in accordance with the Labor Code were they entitled to negotiate and close the collective labor contract and to conduct a strike? Or, by contrary, although in the presence of such representatives (chosen in accordance with the Labor Code), other representatives should be chosen, in accordance with special laws, for closing the collective labor contract or for conducting a strike? And the other way around: the representatives pro causa, meaning chosen for closing the collective labor contract or for conducting a strike [in the absence of a representative union and of other representatives chosen in accordance with the Labor Code's provisions] could they performs also the attribution foreseen by the Labor Code?[20]

In the first case, this problem was solved by the stipulation of article no. 223, letter e) of the new Labor Code.

In the second case, the extension of the attributions of the employees' representatives chosen to negotiate the collective labor contract or for organizing a strike is not possible taking into consideration that the laws in the matter are applicable only in the situation foreseen for their purpose.[21]

The employees' representative attributions, the means of fulfilling their tasks and the duration and limits of their mandate are established by the employees' general meeting, in accordance with the law provisions.

Similar to the regime of the unions' leaders, the employees' representatives are entitled to some facilities and measures of protection.

The time spent by the employees' representatives in order to accomplish their assigned mandate is of 20 hours a month and it's being considered as working time and it's duly paid.

During their mandate the employees' representatives can not be fired for reasons that are not related to the employee, for being professional unfit or for reasons that are linked to the mandate of representing the employees.

---

[16] Law no. 53/2003, published in the Official Journal no. 72 on 05.02.2003.

[17] Article no. 226 from Law no. 53/2003 ; the new Labor Code published in the Official Journal no. 345 on 18th of May 2011 – article no. 223.

[18] Law no. 53/2003 republished in May 2011 in the Official Journal no. 345 on 18.05.2011.

[19] Article no. 223, letter e) of the Law no. 53/2003 republished in 2011.

[20] Ion, Traian, Ştefănescu, op.cit., p.126.

[21] Idem.

Definitely, the most important attribution of the employees' representatives is the negotiation of the collective labor contract within a unit.

The initiative concerning the negotiation of the collective labor contract is subject to several steps, as it's being stated in the social dialogue law.[22]

It's important to know that the employer or the syndicate initiates the collective negotiation with at least 45 working days before the expiring of the collective labor contracts.[23] In the case where the employer or the syndicate doesn't initiate the negotiation, this one will start due to the written request of the employees' representative, within 10 days from the request.[24]

The negotiation can not last more than 60 working days, unless we are in presence of an agreement between the social partners. [25]

The law foresees the possibility that through the collective labor contracts to establish to periodically renegotiate any stipulation convened by the parties.[26]

During the first negotiation meeting, the employer settles which public and confidential information can provide to the employees' representatives in accordance with the law (information regarding the updated economical-financial situation and the employment situation). [27]

Also, with the occasion of the first negotiation meeting, the social partners will write a report which will mention the most important information related to the members of the negotiation teams for each side, the maximum period of negotiation, the place and calendar of the meetings. [28]

The negotiations between the employees' representatives and the employer are final when the collective labor contract is being closed and registered at the competent authorities.

Conclusions

Considering the facts presented so far, the aim was to see in which way the legislative changes brought modifications to the attributions of the employees' representatives and in which way these updates improved the labor relationships, but also to compare the previous provisions with the new ones.

There is no doubt that the legislative changes in the field of labor relationship were required in the context of social and economical evolution. Both the Labor Code republished and the Social Dialog Law widened the attributions of the employees' representatives. Taking into consideration that currently it's very difficult to achieve representativeness for unions/unions' organization in order to be able to negotiate the provisions of the collective labor contracts, giving the possibility of negotiation in such case for the employees' representatives even in the presence of a union, can only be a positive change for the employees' interests.

From practical point of view the actual effects are to be noticed in the future and based on these effects a proper assessment of the impact over this area of private law will be made.

References:

- Raluca, Dimitriu, "Legea privind soluționarea conflictelor de muncă, Comentarii și explicații" –C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2007;
- Raluca, Dimitriu, "Collective labor conflicts in companies and public institutions: some prospects", Transylvanian Review of Administrative Sciences, No. 34 E/2011;

[22] Law no. 62/2011.
[23] Art. 129 paragraph 3 of the Law no. 62/2011.
[24] Idem, paragraph 4.
[25] Idem, paragraph 5.
[26] Idem, paragraph 6.
[27] Art. 130 paragraph 2 and 4 of the Law no. 62/2011.
[28] Idem, paragraph 5.

- Ion, Traian, Ştefănescu, "Tratat teoretic şi practic de drept al muncii", Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2010;
- Law no. 53/2003 republished in May 2011 in the Official Journal of Romania no. 345 on 18.05.2011;
- Law no. 62/2011, published in the in Official Journal of Romania no. 322/10.05.2011;
- Law no. 54/2003 on trade unions;
- Law no. 356/2001 on employers;
- Law no. 109/1997 on the organization and functioning of the Economic and Social Council;
- Law no. 130/1996 regarding collective labor contracts;
- Law no. 168/1999 regarding the settlement of labor conflicts.

THE VALIDITY OF CONTRACTS CONCLUDED BY ELECTRONIC MEANS IN ROMANIAN LAW

MIHAELA GIURANIUC (TUDORACHE)*

Abstract
The purpose of this paper is to analyze the legislation, doctrinal opinions and relevant case law regarding the validity of contracts concluded by electronic means (e-contracts) in Romania and to contribute to the current stage of knowledge in this matter.
The objectives pursued by the author are:
- identification of the peculiarities of the transposition of the E-Commerce Directive into Romanian legislation;
- identification of problems that could arise from law's interpretation;
- analyzing the relevant case-law in this matter;
- issuing of the de lege ferenda proposals.
According to Romanian Law, an e-contract has the same effects as a contract concluded by traditional means, if the conditions of validity imposed by law have been observed.
In Romanian legislation, the document in electronic form, to whom was incorporated, attached or logically associated an advanced electronic signature based on a qualified certificate not suspended or not revoked at that time and which was generated with the aid of a secure equipment of electronic signature creation is equated in terms of conditions and effects to a document under private signature.

Keywords: contracts concluded by electronic means, electronic signature, advanced electronic signature, certification service provider, qualified certificate

I. Introduction

Enhancing the trust in electronic transactions is a necessary condition for the development of a unique digital market, which would be beneficial for citizens, enterprises and public authorities. In order to make this happen, safe electronic services are necessary, ensuring confidentiality, providing legal certainty and the security of transactions, function beyond border lines and are acknowledged by all the activity sectors, and being at the same time, cheap, easy to use and under the strict control of the parties to the transaction.[1]

In Romania, electronic commerce is gradually occupying an important part in the citizens' lives.

The volume of online payment electronic commerce increased in 2011 by 24% year-on-year, reaching the amount of Euro 158.9 mil., according to the date provided by Romcard and supplied by ePayment[2]. In 2011, the highest transactions were in the field of plane tickets – Euro 9,700, tourism packs – Euro 8,800 and software applications – Euro 6,000. The majority of transactions were performed in Romania – 59.8%, but also in Italy – 14.7%, in Spain – 5.8% or in Great Britain - 5%, according to the above mentioned source.

---

* Ph. D. candidate, Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies; (mihaela@tudorache.net).

[1] COMMUNICATION FROM THE COMMISSION TO THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT, THE COUNCIL, THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COMMITTEE AND THE COMMITTEE OF THE REGIONS, Single Market Act, Twelve levers to boost growth and strengthen confidence "Working together to create new growth"{SEC(2011) 467 final}. Accessed at January 20, 2012 at http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2011:0206:FIN:EN:PDF, 13.

[2] Românii aleg tot mai mult să cumpere online: comerţul electronic a crescut cu aproape 25% în 2011, accessed at January 20, 2012 at: http://www.mediafax.ro/economic/romanii-aleg-tot-mai-mult-sa-cumpere-online-comertul-electronic-a-crescut-cu-aproape-25-in-2011-9140677/.

In this economical context, the theme of the paper – validity of the contracts concluded by electronic means - is of a great interest, both from the perspective of scientific research and from a practical perspective, as the electronic commerce have gradually expanded, having today a significant share of total world's trade.

Up today, the theme of the legal recognition of the validity of contracts concluded by electronic means was not treated as an independent subject of research, by Romanian doctrine, being mentioned in the the context of analyse of the form of the electronic contract in general[3] or in the context of the proof of the electronic contract[4].

Also, the theme of the proof of the contracts concluded by electronic means, in case of litigation, is treated by the Romanian doctrine in the context of analysing:

- the legal problems caused by introducing and usage of electronic signature in transactions[5];
- the legal regulation of the electronic signature[6];
- the admisibility of the electronic signature as proof[7];
- electronic signature – as means of the will espression by comerciants, part I[8] and part II[9].

As a method of research, the paper starts from analyzing the legal provisions, relevant case law, and the doctrine in the field, focusing on the legal recognition of the validity of contracts concluded by electronic means and on the proof of the contracts concluded by electronic means, in case of litigation. It highlights the particularities of the transposition of the of EU law into Romanian law and outlines the current status of research in Romania.

Finally, the paper draws specific conclusions meant to complement the existing scientific literature on the subject, and to contribute to the development of the Romanian doctrine in this field.

II. Legal recognition of the validity of contracts concluded by electronic means

The subject matter of contracts in the Romanian law was traditionally regulated by the civil code.

Starting from the 1st of October 2011, Romania has a new Civil Code (NCC) [10] which has replaced the old Civil Code valid since 1864[11], setting up a monist conception for the regulation of all private legal relations in a single code.

Drafted based on the Civil Code model of the Quebec Province, which was adopted in 1991, NCC preserves the principle of autonomy of the will, as basis for the contract, traditionally applied in the Romanian private law.

The principle of the autonomy of the will states the full contractual freedom, both in the sense of the substantive freedom and in the sense of a full freedom of form.

---

[3] Marcel Ionel Bocşa, Încheierea contractelor de comerț internațional prin mijloace electronice (Bucureşti: Universul Juridic, 2010), 246.

[4] Alexandru Bleoancă, Contractul în formă electronică (Bucureşti: Hamangiu, 2010), 120.

[5] Camelia-Tatiana Ciulei, "Probleme juridice legate de introducerea semnăturii electronice şi folosirea ei în tranzacțiile încheiate pe internet", Revista de drept comercial nr. 2 (2009), 88.

[6] Tiberiu Gabriel Savu, „Consacrarea legală a semnăturii electronice", Revista de drept comercial nr. 7-8 (2002), 222.

[7] Florea Măgureanu, „Semnătura electronică. Admisibilitatea ei ca mijloc de dovadă", Revista de drept comercial nr. 11 (2203), 137.

[8] Ştefan Mihăilă, Marcel Bocşa, „Semnătura electronică – mijloc de exteriorizare a voinței comercianților (I)", Revista de drept comercial nr. 6 (2008), 76.

[9] Ştefan Mihăilă, Marcel Bocşa, „Semnătura electronică – mijloc de exteriorizare a voinței comercianților (II)", Revista de drept comercial nr. 9 (2008), 33.

[10] M.Of nr. 511 din 24/07/2009, Republicarea 1 în M.Of nr. 505 din 15/07/2011.

[11] M.Of nr. 271 din 04/12/1864, Republicat în Broşura nr. 0 din 26/07/1993.

The freedom of form (principle of consensualism) is expressly regulates by NCC in art. 1178 and in art. 1240.

Thus, art. 1178 from the NCC, expressly stipulates that the contract is validly concluded based on the mere agreement of the parties unless the law imposes a certain formality for the valid conclusion thereof.

If the parties imposes a certain formality for the valid formation of an contract and that consensual formality was not observed, the contract will be valid.

But, the will of contracting must be externalized in order to produce legal effects. The "will" remained in thought stage could not produce legal effects.

The will of contracting can be expressed verbally or in writing (art. 1240).

The mere agreement of the parties, unaccompanied by any kind of form, is sufficient for the valid formation of the contract.

The will can also be manifested by a behaviour which, according to the law or based on the convention between the parties, on the practices established between them and on the customs, leaves no doubt as to the intention to produce the adequate legal effects.

In the Romanian law, consensual contracts are the rule[12].

As we mention, in the case of consensual contracts, the mere agreement between the parties is sufficient so that the parties validly conclude the contract.

However, most of the times, the parties choose to record their agreement in a document ("instrumentum"), in order to pre-establish a proof in relation to the contract existence, as well as to the extent of the parties' rights and obligations, in case of conflict.

In Romanian Law, the contract can be proved only through a document (art. 1950 from the NCC).

For certain types of contracts, called "solemn contracts", the law stipulates the necessity ad valididatem to conclude the contract in the form of a writing document with handwritten signature or in a writing document with handwritten signature authentified by a public notary.

In theory, the form of a legal act is that condition which consists in the means of externalizing the manifestation of wills, with the intention of creating, modifying or terminating a concrete civil legal relationship. Lato sensu, "the form of the civil legal act" designates three types of requirements concerning the form: (1) the form required for the validity of the legal act itself – ad validitatem; (2) the form required for probating the legal act – ad probationem; (3) the form required for the enforceability of the legal act against third parties[13].

Unlike the old Civil Code, the new Civil Code expressly use the concept of "contracts concluded by electronic means", implicitly acknowledging the existence and validity thereof, and making express reference to the special law in relation to the conditions regarding the form thereof. (art. 1245 NCC)

In our opinion, the term "special law" mentioned in art. 1245 from the NCC designates the law applicable to the contract concluded by electronic means, according to its essence and nature, and not the law which regulates the data in electronic form. The special law which regulates the data in electronic form (Law no. 455/2001) expressly re-enforce the principal of consensualism: "No provision of this Law could be interpreted so that the principal of autonomy of the will and the principal of contractual freedom should be limited" (art. 3).

---

[12] Constantin Stătescu, Corneliu Bîrsan, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor (Bucureşti: ALL, 1997), 25

[13] Gheorghe Beleiu, Drept civil român. Introducere în drept civil. Subiectele dreptului civil (Bucureşti: Şansa, 1995), 149.

Therefore, if the contract concluded by electronic means is a sale-purchase contract, then the special law regulating the form of such contract ad validitatem is the law applicable to that sale-purchase contract in general.

The validity of the contract concluded by electronic means is expressly mentioned in Romanian law, by art. 7 (1) from Law no. 365/2002 on electronic commerce[14], also:

"contracts concluded by electronic means produce all the effects that the law recognizes in relation to contracts, when the conditions requested by the law concerning the validity thereof are satisfied".

The Law no. 365/2002 on electronic commerce was adopted in the process of transposition of the Directive 2000/31/EC of the European Parliament and Council from the 8th of June 2000 on certain legal aspects of information society services, in particular electronic commerce, in the Internal Market ("Directive on electronic commerce")[15] into national law.

The art. 7 (1) from Law no. 365/2002 on electronic commerce consecrates in the national law the principle of equivalence of the tradition paper-based data with the data in electronic form, representing a transposition of the provisions of art. 9 from the Directive on Electronic Commerce. Art. 9 from the Directive on Electronic Commerce imposes on the Member States the obligation to watch that their legal system makes possible the conclusion of contracts by electronic means. Member States especially watch that the legal regime applicable for the contractual process does not hamper the use of electronic contracts and does not lead to the lack of legal effect and validity of the contracts because of the conclusion thereof by electronic means. The Directive on Electronic Commerce imposes a negative obligation on Member States, in the sense that the conclusion of a contract by electronic means is not a reason for declaring that a contract does not fulfil the conditions concerning the form.[16]

The principle of the form equivalence is applied to the entire process of concluding a contract, including to the offering, negotiation, and offer acceptance phases.

In the Romanian law, in order for the contracts concluded by electronic means to be valid, the prior agreement of the parties regarding the use of electronic means is not necessary.

In base of art. 7 (1) from Law 365/2002 and art. 1178 NCC, we consider that, in Romanian law, a contract concluded by electronic means for which the special law did not impose a special form ad validitatem, is presumed to be valid, independently of the type of electronic signature incorporated, enclosed or attached to it.

But, the validity of a contract is independent by the proof of the contract. A contract could be validly conclude, but could be impossible to prove it.[17]

As we mention above, in Romanian law, the contract must be proved by documents.

So that, in the cases when a contract is concluded by electronic means, then, in order to prove the contract, all the legal conditions necessary for the data in electronic form to be legally assimilated to the paper document with handwritten signature must be complied with. The same is the case for data in electronic form, other than contracts, and for which the law stipulates ad validitatem or ad probationem the written form of the manifestation of the will.

[14] M.Of nr. 959 din 29/11/2006, Republicare.

[15] JO L 178/1 din 17.7.2000, 13/vol. 29, page 257.

[16] Apostolos Gkoutzinis, Internet Banking and the Law in Europe. Regulation, Financial Integration and Electronic Commerce (Cambridge: University Press, 2006), 186.

[17] Alexandru Bleoancă, op. cit., 121.

III. The proof of the contract concluded by electronic means. Document. Electronic signature.

In the Romanian law, the proof of concluding contracts by electronic means and of the obligations resulting from such contracts is subject to the dispositions of the common law in terms of proof and to the dispositions from Law no. 455/2001 on the electronic signature[18] (art. 7 paragraph 3 from Law no. 365/2002).

Until the 1st of October 2011, in Romania, the matter of probation in the civil law relations was regulated by art. from 1169 to art. 1206 from the Civil Code and by art. from 167 to art. 241 from the Code of Civil Procedure[19].

NCC entered into force on the 1st of October 2011 and it no longer contains a special chapter about probation.

A special chapter dedicated to probation can be found in the new Code of Civil Procedure, which will become effective on the 15th of July 2012[20] (NCCPr.).

Thus, in art. 259 from the NCCPr, the document is defined as any writing or other registration which includes data about a legal act or fact, irrespective of the material support thereof or the means of preservation and storage thereof.

Moreover, the NCCPr make a distinction between the paper document, the computing support data and the data in electronic form.

While the computing support data is accepted as proof in the same conditions as the paper document, if it complies with the conditions stipulated by the law, the data in electronic form are subject to the dispositions of the special law.

The special law in the matter of data in electronic form is the Law no. 455/2001 on the electronic signature, which implemented in the internal law the Directive 1999/93/EC of the European Parliament and Council from the 13th of December 1999 on a Community framework for electronic signatures [21] (Directive on electronic signatures).

The term "data in electronic form" is defined by Law no. 455/2001 on the electronic signature as a collection of data in electronic form among which there are logical and functional relations and which render letters, digits or any other characters with legible significance, destined to be read using software or a similar procedure.

Consequently, a data in electronic form can be the following: an e-mail, the terms and conditions posted on a website and any other document drafted in electronic form, if they can be read using computer software or a similar procedure.

At the transposition of the Directive on the electronic signature into the Romanian law, the Romanian legislator change the name of the article "Legal effects of electronic signature" with the "Legal effects of the data in electronic form".

The Law no. 455/2001 on the electronic signature expressly lists the conditions that a data in electronic form must be fulfil in order to be legally assimilated to a written paper with handwritten signature.

The data in electronic form to which an extended electronic signature, based on a qualified certificate, not cancelled or not revoked on the respective moment and created by a secure signature-creation-device was incorporated, enclosed or logically associated, will be assimilated in terms of its

[18] M.Of nr. 429 din 31/07/2001.
[19] Broşura no. 0 from 26/07/1993.
[20] M.Of nr. 485 din 15/07/2010.
[21] JO L 13, 19.01.2000, 12.

conditions and effects, to the written paper with handwritten signature (art. 5 from the Law no. 455/2001). This provision establishes the principle of the equivalence of the electronic signature with the handwritten signature, in the conditions in which the electronic signature is extended, based on a qualified certificate, not cancelled or not revoked on the respective moment and created by a secure signature-creation-device. This concept corresponds to the terms "qualified electronic signature" from the Directive on electronic signatures.

In art. 262 paragraph (2) from the NCPrC, it is mentioned that an electronic signature is not valid unless it is reproduced in the conditions stipulated by the law. But, the Law no. 455/2001 regulate the force of evidence of an electronic signature and not the validity.

In our opinion, this wording contradicts art. 5 paragraph 2 from the Directive on electronic signatures, according to which an electronic signature will not lack legal effectiveness and will not be rejected as evidence in justice for the mere reasons that:

- It is presented in electronic format or
- It is not based on a qualified certificate or
- It is not based on a qualified certificate issued by a certified provided or certification services or
- It is not created by a secure signature-creation-device.

De lege ferenda, we consider that the text of art. 262 paragraph 2 from NCPrC should be replaced with the following: "The force of evidence of an electronic signature is regulated by the special law on electronic signatures".

This modification appears necessarily in the context of the recent jurisprudence, when by Decission no. 1077/2007, the Bucharest Court of Law – 6th Commercial Section ascertained that the e-mail correspondence which was intended to be used in order to establish the recognition of a debt rising from a consensual contract cannot be taken into account as evidence, in relation to the dispositions from art. 5 and subseq. from Law no. 455/2001 on the electronic signature, because the submitted e-mail did not have any extended electronic signature included, enclosed or associated to it[22].

In our opinion, the Decision issued by the Bucharest Court of Law overruled the dispositions of art. 5 paragraph 2 from the Directive on electronic signatures and rejected as evidence a data electronic form on the grounds that the document was in electronic form and did not have enclosed any extended electronic signature based on a qualified certificate, created by a secure signature-creation-device. Taking into account that the respective data in electronic form was not intended to be used for proving the existence of a contract or of an act in relation to which the law stipulated ad validitatem the written form, instead was intended to be used for proving the recognition of a debt (proof that could be made with witnesses, interrogatory, presumptions), the correct solution would have been the appraisal of the proof as admissible and the qualification thereof as a "commencement of a proof in writing".

In doctrine[23], it was asserted that the data in electronic form to which an electronic signature was associated, which is not an extended electronic signature or which is not based on a qualified certificate or which is not created using a secured signature generation mechanism, can be assimilated in terms of its effects and conditions, to the commencement of a proof in writing and it can be supplemented by other means of probation in order to make the proof of the respective legal relationship.

The commencement of a proof in writing is regulated by art. 304 from the NCPrCP in the section called "Proof by witnesses", being defined as any writing, even unsigned and undated, which comes from a person against which the respective writing is enforceable or from the one whose successor in title is such person, if the writing makes the claimed fact credible. The commencement of a proof in writing can make the proof between the parties only if it is supplemented by other means of probation, including by the proof by witnesses or by presumptions.

[22] Tribunalul Bucureşti, Dosar 43787/3/2006, accessed at January 20, 2012 at: http://www.euroavocatura.ro/jurisprudenta/1252/Corespondenta_prin_email__Semnatura_electronica__Creanta_nelichida.

[23] Florea Măgureanu, op.cit, 141.

Given the dispositions of art. 5 paragraph 2 from the Directive on electronic signatures, according to which a signature cannot be refused as evidence on the grounds that it is an electronic one, we also consider that a data in electronic form which does not fulfil the legal conditions in order to have the force of evidence of a written paper with handwritten signature will have the legal value of the commencement of a proof in writing, with the mention that this qualification is valid only in the cases when the respective data in electronic form is not used in order to make the proof of a contract. The assimilation of such "incomplete" data in electronic form with the commencement of a proof in writing is correct even if one cannot certainly establish that the data in electronic form comes from the party against which it is enforceable, because the commencement of a proof in writing is not a stand-alone proof. The same is in the case of the traditional commencement of the proof in writing, when additional pieces of evidence are necessary in order to establish whether the handwritten mentions belong to the person against whom they are enforceable.

The data in electronic form, to which an electronic signature was logically incorporated, enclosed or attached, recognized by the person against whom it is enforceable, has the same effect as the authentic act between the ones subscribing to it and those who represent their rights (Art. 6 from Law no. 455/2001). That is, if the a data in electronic form is recognized by the party against whom it is enforceable, it will have the legal value of an authentic document even if it is not accompanied by an electronic signature in extended form, even if it is not based on a qualified certificate and/or even if it is not created by a secure signature-creation-device. In our opinion, this category also includes contracts concluded by electronic means on whose grounds the parties started executing their mutual obligations. Thus, if the parties established by e-mail the contents of an advertising service supply contract, the e-mail has a simple electronic signature and the Performer fulfilled its obligations as agreed by e-mail, and the Beneficiary made the payment of the price, even partially, we consider that the respective contract was duly concluded, even if the two parties did not sign their own e-mail correspondence with extended signatures based on qualified certificates.

In the cases when, according to the law, the written form is requested as a probationary condition or as a condition of validity of a legal act, a data in electronic form fulfils this requirement if an extended signature based on a qualified certificate and created by a secure signature-creation-device was logically incorporated, enclosed or attached to it (art. 7 from the Law no. 455/2001). There is no need for the certificate to be unsuspended or non-revoked at such time as was expressly lists on the conditions necessary to assimilate a data in electronic form with a written paper with handwritten signature detailed at art. 5 from the Law no. 455/2001. In our opinion this difference is an error in the legislative procedure, because there is no reason to regulated differently those types of electronic signature. De lege ferenda, at art. 7 from the Law no. 455/2001 should be added that the qualified certificate on which is based the extended signature must be "unsuspended and non-revoked" when the written form is requested as a probationary condition or as a condition of validity of a legal act, also.

In a relatively recent case, by Decision no. 358/2009, the Court of Appeal from Suceava appraised that the resignation delivered to the employer by e-mail does not fulfil the conditions of a written notification required ad validitatem by art. 79 paragraph 1 from the Labour Code, because the e-mail lacked an extended signature based on a qualified certificate and created by a secure signature-creation-device, logically incorporated, enclosed or attached to it.[24]

In our opinion, a written document with handwritten signature can be amended by a data in electronic form if the latter has a qualified electronic signature logically incorporated, enclosed or attached to it.

We could resume, that the Romanian law knows three types of electronic signatures which, in relation to the dispositions of art. 5 paragraph 2 from the Directive on electronic signature, should be accepted as a means of probation, the court of law being empowered to assess their force of evidence, on a case to case basis:

1. "Simple" Electronic signature

According to the Law, the electronic signature represents data in electronic form, enclosed or logically associated with other data in electronic form and which serves as an identification method.

The scope of this definition also covers the writing of one's name in an e-mail correspondence, the scan of the holograph signature, the signatory's biometric data.

The problem with these techniques is posed by their intrinsic low level of security: given the fact that a biometric or scanned signature is always the same and is not univocally connected to the signed message, anyone (the recipient itself) can gain possession of the data, can record it in their own personal computer and can take the place, without authorization, of the real owner, in order to send messages[25].

Thus, a "simple" electronic signature certifies only the sender's consent regarding the contents of the data in electronic form, without being able to exactly establish whether or not the contents was changed. Also, the reproduction of such signature can be performed by anybody.

The legal definition does not stipulate that the electronic signature must come only from a natural person, which means that a legal entity can also be the holder of an electronic signature.

The definition provided by the Romanian law is similar to the one provided by the Directive 1999/93/EC of the European Parliament and Council from the 13th of December 1999 on a Community framework for electronic signatures (Directive on electronic signatures).

2. Extended electronic signature

The extended electronic signature represents that electronic signature which cumulatively fulfils the following conditions:

a) is uniquely related to the signatory;

b) provides the identification of the signatory;

c) is created by means under the sole control of the signatory;

d) is related to the data in electronic form, to which it makes reference, so that any ulterior modification thereof is identifiable.

As can be seen from the above definition, the extended electronic signature is the correspondent of the advanced electronic signature, regulated by the Directive on electronic signatures and provided certainty both in relation to the identification of the signatory and to the data integrity.

The scope of the extended electronic signature also includes the digital signature.

---

[24] Curtea de Apel Suceava, Decizia nr. 358/2009, accessed at January 20, 2012 at: http://www.legi-internet.ro/jurisprudenta-it-romania/decizii-it/semnatura-electronica/semnatura-electronica-validitatea-unui-inscris-in-forma-electronica-martie-2009-curtea-de-apel-suceava.html.

[25] Ştefan Mihăilă, Marcel Bocşa, "Reguli uniforme privind cometul electronic (III)", Revista de drept comercial nr. 2 (2010), 31.

3. The extended electronic signature based on a qualified certificate and created by a secure signature-creation-device. (qualified electronic signature)

The qualified certificate represents a certificate that includes the following issues:

a) the indication of the fact that the certificate was issued as a qualified certificate;

b) the identification data of the certification service provider, and its citizenship, for natural persons, respectively its nationality, for legal entities;

c) the name of the signatory or his/her pseudonym, identified as such, and other attributes specific to the signatory, function of the purpose for which the qualified certificate is issued;

d) the signatory's personal identification code;

e) the signature verification data, which corresponds to the signature creation data, under the sole control of the signatory;

f) the indication of the beginning and end of the validity period of the qualified certificate;

g) the identification code of the qualified certificate;

h) the extended electronic signature of the certification service provider issuing the qualified certificate;

i) if applicable, the limits for the use of the qualified certificate or the value limits of the operations for which it can be used;

j) any other information established by the regulatory and supervising authority specialized in this field.

and which is issued by a certification service provider which fulfils the following conditions:

a) has the financial means and material, technical and human resources adequate for guaranteeing the security, reliability and continuity of the provided certification services;

b) ensures the fast and safe operation of the information recording stipulated in art. 17, especially the fast and safe operation of a service for suspending and revoking the qualified certificates;

c) ensures the possibility of accurately determining the date and time of the issuance, suspending or revocation of a qualified certificate;

d) checks, by adequate means, compliant with the legal dispositions, the identity and, if the case may be, the specific attributes of the person to whom it issues the qualified certificate;

e) uses staff which holds specialized knowledge, experience and skills, necessary for the supply of the respective services and, especially, which has management skills, specialized knowledge in the field of electronic signature technology and sufficient practical experience in relation to the corresponding security procedures; moreover, it should apply the adequate administrative and management procedures in line with the acknowledged standards;

f) uses products associated to the electronic signature, with a high degree of reliability, protected against modifications and which ensure the technical and cryptographic security of the activities involving the electronic signature certification;

g) adopts measures against the falsification of certificates and guarantee confidentiality during the process of generating the data for signature creation, in the case when certification service providers generate such data;

h) preserves all the information concerning a qualified certificate for minimum 10 years since the expiry date of the certificate, especially in order to be able to make the proof of the certification in case of litigation;

i) does not store, reproduce or reveal to third parties the signature creation data, except for the case when the signatory asks for that;

j) uses reliable systems for storing the qualified certificates, so that: only the authorized persons are allowed to insert and change the information found in such certificates; the accuracy of the information is open for verification; the certificates can be analyzed by third parties only if the holder thereof agrees with that; any technical modification, which might endanger such security conditions, is identifiable by the authorized persons;

k) any other conditions established by the regulatory and supervising authority specialized in this field.

The party invoking before the court an extended electronic signature must prove that it fulfils the defining conditions of the extended electronic signature.

The extended electronic signature, based on a qualified certificate issued by an accredited certification service provider is presumed to fulfil the defining conditions stipulated for the extended electronic signature.

The party invoking a qualified certificate before the court must prove that the certification service provider which issued the respective certificate fulfils the legal conditions stipulated for the certification service provider in order to issue qualified certificates.

The accredited certification service provider is presumed to fulfil the legal conditions stipulated in relation to the certification service provider in order to issue qualified certificates.

The accreditation of certification service providers in Romania is a voluntary procedure and is made by the Ministry of Communications and Information Society, according to the Minister Order no. 473 from the 9th of June 2009 on the procedure for granting, suspending and withdrawing the decision concerning the accreditation of certification service providers[26].

For the time being, in Romania there are 3 accredited certification service providers[27]:

- TRANS SPED SRL;
- DIGISIGN S.A;
- CERTSIGN S.R.L.

The secure signature-creation-device is that device used for the creation of an electronic signature, which cumulatively fulfils the following conditions:

a) the signature creation data, used for generating the signature, appears only once and is confidential;

b) the signature creation data, used for the signature generation, cannot be inferred;

c) the signature is protected against falsification by the technical means available at the time of its generation;

d) the signature creation data is effectively protected by the signatory against the use thereof by unauthorized persons;

e) it does not change the electronic data, which must be signed, and it does not prevent it from being submitted to the signatory prior to the completion of the signing process.

The party invoking before the court a secure signature-creation-mechanism must prove that it fulfils the above conditions.

The secure signature-creation-device, homologated based on this law, is presumed to fulfil the above conditions.

The homologation of the secure signature-creation-device in Romania is performed by the homologation agents, public or private law legal entities, agreed by the Ministry of Communications and Information Society.

[26] M.Of. nr. 411 din 16/06/2009.

[27] Ministerul Comunicaţiilor şi Societăţii Informaţionale, accessed at January 31, 2012 at: http://www.mcsi.ro/Minister/Domenii-de-activitate-ale-MCSI/Tehnologia-Informatiei/Servicii-electronice/Semnatura-electronica/Registrul-furnizorilo-de-servicii-de-certificare-P.

In conclusion, a qualified electronic signature generated by an accredited certification service provider and created with a homologated secure signature-creation-device fulfils the highest safety standards, being presumed to be valid.

An qualified electronic signature generated by an accredited certification service provider and created with a homologated secure signature-creation-device is not equivalent under any circumstance with a valid signature, but is relatively presumed as being valid. For example, in the case of digital signatures, there is the possibility to use the "private key" without the right to, either by the certification service provider, or by a person which gains possession thereof, without authorization.[28]

If one of the parties fails to recognize the data in electronic form or the electronic signature, the court will always order that the verification is made through a specialized technical expertise.

For this purpose, the expert or the specialist has the duty to ask for qualified certificates, as well as any other necessary documents, according to the law, for the identification of the author of the writ, of the signatory or of the certificate holder.

The electronic signature is a means of signing a data in electronic form and it may not be invoked as the proof of signing of a document in physical form. The document in physical form must bear a handwritten signature. For this purpose, recently, the courts of law which were faced with requests for ascertaining the absolute nullity of the minutes for acknowledging the offence of driving on public roads without a vignette, delivered in physical form and not bearing a handwritten signature, rejected the defence of the acknowledging agent, who stated that the minutes were signed with an electronic signature and cancelled the respective minutes for lacking a signature, motivating that an electronic signature can only accompany a data in electronic form, not a document in physical form[29].

In practice, several methods for signing data in electronic form have been developed, which vary from very simple methods (e.g. the inserting of the scanned image of a hand signature in a text processing document), to very advanced methods (e.g. using cryptography).

The electronic signatures based on the "encrypting of a public key" are called digital signatures and are considered as crucial for certain applications, such as official communications with public institutions. A digital signature can be beneficial because it ensures a single identified person and it makes the connection between the signature and the writ. It guarantees both the signatory's identity and the contents of the signed document.

Among the private persons, the electronic commerce has developed without the use of an qualified electronic signature, because the costs for such signature would exceed the benefits brought by such transactions, the majority of which are of low value.

This is why the regulation of the electronic signature has not been developed, and the private persons continue to use the "click and accept" means of purchasing.[30]

Obviously, the contracts concluded by electronic means, which in majority are sale-purchase contracts, are valid in the Romanian law, because they are consensual contracts. The absence of a qualified electronic signature attached to such contracts does not attract their nullity, but the impossibility to prove them, in case of litigation.

[28] Tiberiu Gabriel Savu, op.cit., 227.

[29] Judecătorii anulează amenzile pentru că procesele-verbale au semnătura electronică a CNADNR şi nu semnătură olografă, accessed at January 22, 2012 at: http://www.avocatnet.ro/content/forum%7CdisplayTopicPage/topicID_264018/Judec%C4%83torii-anuleaz%C4%83-amenzile-pentru-c%C4%83-procesele-verbale-au-semn%C4%83tura-electronic%C4%83-a-CNADNR-%C5%9Fi-nu-semn%C4%83tur%C4%83-olograf%C4%83.html.

[30] Study on the Economic Impact of Electronic Commerce Directive, accessed at January 12, 2012 at: http://ec.europa.eu/internal_market/e-commerce/docs/study/ecd/%20final%20report_appendix%20c.pdf.

In Romania, the prove of contracts concluded by electronic means must be done in accordance with the provisions of NCC (which state that a contract can be proved only through a document), the provision of NCPrCiv (which recognised the data in electronic form as a document) and the provisions of the Law no. 455/2001 on the electronic signature (which establish the force of evidence for data in electronic form).

The providers of certification services must comply with the legislation regarding the protection of data and the right to privacy.

However, in order to enjoy a universal acceptance of their probationary value, electronic signatures must be fit for use as evidence before the court of law in all countries.

The international recognition of the probationary value of the electronic signature may face difficulties in international transactions, because the accreditation of the certification service provider is not regulated by a worldwide norm establishing international standards applicable at universal level. The certification service providers who perform certification services for the public must observe the national norms on professional liability.

For the development of the electronic commerce at international level, international agreements should be concluded, guaranteeing the worldwide interoperability by the mutual recognition of the certification services.

IV. Conclusions

We have analyzed the legal provisions, relevant case law, and the doctrine existing in Romania in the field of contract law, in general, and in the field of electronic contracts in particular, focusing on the legal recognition of the validity of contracts concluded by electronic means and on the proof of this type of e contracts in case of litigation.

The results of this research adds to the actual state of of the art in the contract law, by providing a first coherent and critical interpretation of the national laws and jurisprudence regarding the validity and proof of a contract concluded by electronic means.

In Romania law, a contract concluded by electronic means for which the special law did not impose a special form ad validitatem, is presumed to be valid and produce all the effects that the law acknowledges in relation to that contract, independently of the type of electronic signature incorporated, enclosed or attached to it.

In the cases when, according to the law, the written form is requested as a probationary condition or as a condition of validity, contracts concluded by electronic means fulfil this requirement if an extended signature based on a qualified certificate and created by a secure signature-creation-device was logically incorporated, enclosed or attached to it.

Only a qualified electronic signature generated by an accredited certification service provider and created with a homologated secure signature-creation-device is presumed to be valid. For the rest, the party that prevails itself of an qualified electronic signature must prove all its definitory legal conditions.

In our research we formulate some opinions that could help the practitioners in law at the interpretation of the unclear disposition of law, as:

- the term “special law” mentioned in art. 1245 from the NCC designates the law applicable to the contract concluded by electronic means, according to its essence and nature, and not the law which regulates the data in electronic form;

- the wording of art. 262 paragraph (2) from the NCPrC, that stipulates that "an electronic signature is not valid unless it is reproduced in the conditions stipulated by the law" contradicts art. 5 paragraph 2 from the Directive on electronic signatures;
- contracts concluded by electronic means to which an simple electronic signature was logically incorporated, enclosed or attached, but on whose grounds the parties started executing their mutual obligations, are the subject of Art 6 from Law no. 455/2001 which stipulates that "data in electronic form, to which an electronic signature was logically incorporated, enclosed or attached recognized by the person against whom it is enforceable, has the same effect as the authentic act between the ones subscribing to it";
- a written document with handwritten signature can be amended by a data in electronic form if the latter has a qualified electronic signature logically incorporated, enclosed or attached to it.

Also, we formulate some proposals de lege ferenda in order to remove the errors appeared in the legislative procedures, as:

- Art. 7 from the Law no. 455/2001 should be complemented with the provision that the qualified certificate on which the extended signature is based must be "unsuspended and non-revoked" when the written form is requested as a probationary condition or as a condition of validity of a legal act;
- the text of art. 262 paragraph 2 from NCPrC which contradicts art. 5 paragraph 2 from the Directive on electronic signature must be harmonised by replacing it with the following: "The force of evidence of an electronic signature is regulated by the special law on electronic signatures".

As a theme of further research, the author intends to complement the analysis of the validity of the contract concluded by electronic means by concentration on the international recognition of the probationary value of the electronic signature both between the Member States and between a Member State and a third country.

References:

- Alexandru Bleoancă, Contractul în formă electronică (Bucureşti: Hamangiu, 2010), 120, 121
- Apostolos Gkoutzinis, Internet Banking and the Law in Europe. Regulation, Financial Integration and Electronic Commerce (Cambridge: University Press, 2006), 186
- BRO nr. 0 din 26.07.1993
- Camelia-Tatiana Ciulei, "Probleme juridice legate de introducerea semnăturii electronice şi folosirea ei în tranzacţiile încheiate pe internet", Revista de drept comercial nr. 2/2009, 88
- COMMUNICATION FROM THE COMMISSION TO THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT, THE COUNCIL, THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COMMITTEE AND THE COMMITTEE OF THE REGIONS, Single Market Act, Twelve levers to boost growth and strengthen confidence "Working together to create new growth"{SEC(2011) 467 final}. Accessed at January 20, 2012, http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2011:0206:FIN:EN:PDF, 13
- Constantin Stătescu, Corneliu Bîrsan, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor (Bucharest: ALL, 1997), 25
- Curtea de Apel Suceava, Decizia nr. 358/2009, accessed at January 20, 2012 at, http://www.legi-internet.ro/jurisprudenta-it-romania/decizii-it/semnatura-electronica/semnatura-electronica-validitatea-unui-inscris-in-forma-electronica-martie-2009-curtea-de-apel-suceava.html
- Florea Măgureanu, "Semnătura electronică. Admisibilitatea ei ca mijloc de dovadă", Revista de drept comercial 11 (2003), 137, 141
- Gheorghe Beleiu, Drept civil român, Introducere în drept civil. Subiectele dreptului civil (Bucureşti: Şansa, 1995), 149
- JOL 178/1, 17.7.2000, 13/vol. 29, 257
- JO L 13, 19.01.2000, 12
- Judecătorii anulează amenzile pentru că procesele-verbale au semnătura electronică a CNADNR şi nu semnătură olografă, accessed at January 22, 2012 at: http://www.avocatnet.ro/content/forum%7CdisplayTopicPage/topicID_264018/Judec%C4%83torii-anuleaz%C4%83-amenzile-pentru-c%C4%83-procesele-verbale-au-semn%C4%83tura-electronic%C4%83-a-CNADNR-%C5%9Fi-nu-semn%C4%83tur%C4%83-olograf%C4%83.html

- Marcel Ionel Bocşa, Încheierea contractelor de comerț internațional prin mijloace electronice (Bucureşti: Universul Juridic, 2010), 246
- M.Of nr. 959 din 29/11/2006, Republicare.
- M.Of. nr. 511 din 24.07.2009, Republicarea 1 în M.Of. nr. 505 din 15.07.2011
- M.Of. nr. 271 din 04.12.1864, Publicat în Broşura nr. 0 din 26.07.1993
- M.Of nr. 429 din 31/07/2001
- M.Of nr. 485 din 15/07/2010
- M.Of. nr. 411 din 16/06/2009
- Ministerul Comunicațiilor şi Societății Informaționale, accessed at January 31, 2012 at: http://www.mcsi.ro/Minister/Domenii-de-activitate-ale-MCSI/Tehnologia-Informatiei/Servicii-electronice/Semnatura-electronica/Registrul-furnizorilo-de-servicii-de-certificare-P
- Românii aleg să cumpere tot mai mult on-line: comerțul electronic a crescut cu aproape 25% în 2011, accessed at January 20, 2012 et: http://www.mediafax.ro/economic/romanii-aleg-tot-mai-mult-sa-cumpere-online-comertul-electronic-a-crescut-cu-aproape-25-in-2011-9140677/
- Study on The Economic Impact of the Electronic Commerce Directive, Accessed at January 12, 2012 at: http://ec.europa.eu/internal_market/e-commerce/docs/study/ecd/%20final%20report_appendix%20c.pdf
- Ştefan Mihăilă, Marcel Bocşa, „Reguli uniforme privind comerțul electronic (III)", Revista de drept comercial 2 (2010), 31
- Ştefan Mihailă, Marcel Bocşa, "Semnatura electronică-mijloc de exteriorizare a voinței comercianților (I)", Revista de drept comercial 6 (2008), 81.
- Ştefan Mihăilă, Marcel Bocşa, „Semnătura electronică – mijloc de exteriorizare a voinței comercianților (II)", Revista de drept comercial nr. 9 (2008), 33
- Tiberiu Gabriel Savu, „Consacrarea legală a semnăturii electronice", Revista de drept comercial 7-8 (2002), 222, 227
- Tribunalul Bucureşti, Dosar 43787/3/2006, accessed at January 20, 2012 at, http://www.euroavocatura.ro/jurisprudenta/1252/Corespondenta_prin_e-mail__Semnatura_electronica__Creanta_nelichida

ASPECTS OF CIVIL LIABILITY, AS A FORM OF SOCIAL LIABILTY, IN THE CONTEXT OF ECO-ECONOMY

DIANA-NICOLETA DASCĂLU[*]
IOSIF R. URS[]

ABSTRACT
This study aims to treat certain aspects of civil liability, as a form of legal liability and social responsability in the context of today's economy. In the current global context, for the economy and thus society can survive one must take into account compliance with environmental sustainability. Implications of this line of development on the civil liability will be analyzed in this study.

Keywords: civil liability, social responsibility, eco-economy, environmental liability

Introduction

The present paper addresses a topic of utmost importance to the legal environment, respectively an institution which constitutes the very foundation of civil law, namely civil liability.

This paper proposes as main objectives the presentation of civil liability institution as a form of legal liability, considering first the general framework of its social liability in terms of joint relationship between law and society.

We are trying this way to bring a touch of novelty and originality in addressing this issue, on the one hand by presenting the novelty brought by the new Civil Code in this field and on the other hand by a multidisciplinary treatment of the analyzed subject.

In this sense, we are trying to present a definition of the notion of social liability, through the analysis of the relationship between law and society, presenting several definitions and views promoted by a number of prominent people from various fields, including lawyers, historians philosophers etc.

Another novelty and originality issue is presented by capturing the institution of legal liability in the context of eco-economy, considering the need to draw attention to the role of this institution, particularly important in finding solutions to provide an adequate protection and direction of citizens and environment in the scenery of the economic and environmental crisis that presents at the beginning of this millennium.

However, appealing to logic and comparative methods, we analyze this institution in the context of the new regulations of the Civil Code, considering discussing at certain points the choices of the legislature of 2011, such as, for example, on the subjective concept of civil liability. We consider very important, though, that the new regulation allowed the legal possibility of civil liability in situation where fault is less important, the most important matter being prejudice repair.

Liability issues have known an oversized attention from doctrine and judicial practice since the time of Roman law, and its legal nature was considered in turn to be that of punishment and compensation for damage, whether the doctrine and law stopped at the subjective concept, promoted with high intensity for a long time, whether it was proposed its objectification, whether it meant accepting a mixed concept, considering that the principle of the liability is based on the author's fault, but yet situations may have existed, which would have required the intervention of liability without requiring proof of fault of the author.

We also analyze the suggestions of certain national doctrine voices, which consider that, in the current era, objectification of the principle of civil liability is necessary, presenting also arguments for and against these proposals.

Such objectification proposal of the civil liability, had, as a premise, the adoption of the precautionary principle by the common civil law, taken from environmental specific civil liability.

One of the innovations that this chapter is capturing is an attempt to combine specific elements of this liability with elements of common law civil liability, by trying to propose a new vision of civil liability in general, vision whose consequences upon the basic elements of civil liability are analyzed herein.

1. General considerations on legal liability – form of social liability in the current eco-economic context

Motto: "For the first time, a civilization is consuming from the natural capital instead of living out of the interest that capital provides."

"Transforming our environmentally destructive economy into one that can sustain progress depends on a Copernican shift in our economic mindset, a recognition that the economy is part of the earth's ecosystem and can sustain progress only if it is restructured so that it is compatible with it. The preeminent challenge for our generation is to design an eco-economy, one that respects the principles of ecology. A redesigned economy can be integrated into the ecosystem in a way that will stabilize the relationship between the two, enabling economic progress to continue.

Lester Brown

Social liability appears as a special relation created between society and individual, in which human conduct should be allowed to take the form of rights and freedoms recognized by society, established by the provisions, principles or values of that society, and whose failure to comply would lead to a form of social sanction, whether we speak of moral, economic, political or legal liability.

Human society, to be able to survive and evolve at the same time, imposed a specific individual human conduct, limited by rules of coexistence of plural nature, from moral and customary rules to legal rules which govern every sector of public and private life, their breach attracting a reaction of rejection, of condemnation of the human subject, compelling it to obey social norms, presenting various tools used to compel the subject, the most important being the preventive tools, but also the disciplinary ones.

Individual behavior is subject to assessment and feedback from institutionalized society, with the help of social norms, required to shape decisions and behavior of the individual, aiming them in the direction of the dominant social order. Social liability involves social sanctioning of the attitude of the individual which is inconsistent with the established social norms.[1]

"Ubi societas ibi ius", thus when we discuss society, we also imply law, as two realities that cannot survive one without the other.

The relationship between law and society, although necessary through the nature of the implied reality, is presented in a very interesting manner by Petre Andrei as: "the ideas of just, unjust, need of legal norm were born with the birth of society, that is why legal values are social values, whose role is to regulate the function of social reality."

Liability, as a branch of social liability, aims the negative consequences which an individual would bear if its conduct is contrary to legal norms, created by civil society, consequences which would manifest through the creation of new judicial reports, shortly of new obligations.

[1] E. Lupan, M. Şt. Minea, A. Marga, „Dreptul mediului. Partea specială." Edit. Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 1997, p. 367.

Ecological, economic and legal. Three areas that cannot live without each other, in the present millennium, where an amazing evolution of science and technology is present, an intense exploitation of the natural – renewable and non – resources in order to support a global economy strengthened to provide for the ever growing human population.

Along all these, humankind, master without limits of the surrounding nature, due to ever exploitation environmental intense degradation, finds itself in the position to impose legal limits in order to restore the ecologic and economic environment.

Thus occurs the civil liability, which is destined to prevent destruction of the planet by the individual, in the chaos created by the struggle for survival.

Ecologic challenges of the new millennium, particularly in terms of operating principles of the economic system, outline the efforts size this new path requires.

The first significance results from the ecologic and environmental characteristics of the latest decades. These represent the period in which factual elements may be listed, such as illnesses caused by pollution, floods and landslides, lower production of fish, desertification, reduced soil fertility, species extinction and many others that were amplified. On the other hand, profit and welfare arguments, strongly supported the development of economic activities which contributed significantly to the manifestation of the effects listed above. Threshold of the millennium is where "gaps seeds" sprout and the man is forced to reassess their place in the biosphere, to formulate a perspective on the functioning of ecological systems that created them, being faced with millennial action of population growth limit, as a result of depletion of the resources that support it.[2]

The notion of liability has had a large number of definitions over time in specialty doctrine, one of the definitions we support being as follows: "Legal liability is the related rights and obligations complex, which – by law – is born as a result of committing an illegal act, and which constitute the framework of society imposed coercion, with the purpose of insuring the stability of social reports and mentoring members of society to respect the rule of law"[3].

Liability had a double role, in terms of eco-economic analysis: on the one hand, the role of protecting the environment from destructive human actions, especially against the pollution, perhaps the greatest enemy of the environment and human, and, on the other hand, to protect man against environmental changes and environmental products through its creations and interventions, we refer in particular to liability for damage that occurs in genetically modified organisms produced.

Thus, the use of genetically modified micro-organisms requires those who are concerned to assess health and environmental risks of their activity, even if they are not known.

Liability has several forms depending on the branch of law that interferes: civil legal liability, criminal legal liability, legal liability administrative law, financial law legal liability, etc.

In the case of responsibility for the protection of ecosystems is distinguished civil liability, criminal liability and liability offenses.

Social responsibility, first, and juridical liability, secondly, must be considered in the context of contemporary society, in the development course of global economy, which generated a high consumption of renewable and non-renewable resources and created serious ecological imbalances, which, irreparably, affect the environment.

The problem of the environment, affected in a more rapid rhythm and increasingly in danger of complete destruction, is now examined by all political and legal mechanisms in the world in the attempt to find solutions for overcoming the eco-economic crisis in which humanity is the present moment.

In this regard, a general objective of the Sustainable Development Strategy for an enlarged European Union is "continuous improvement of quality of life for present and future generations

---

[2] F. Bran, I. Ioan, Eco-economia ecosistemelor si biodiversitatea, Editura ASE, Bucharest, 2004, p. 5-7.

[3] M. N. Costin, O încercare de definire a noţiunii răspunderii juridice, in Revista Română de Drept nr. 5/1970, p. 83.

through the creation of sustainable communities able to manage and use resources efficiently and to the potential environmental and social innovation of the economy to ensure prosperity, environmental protection and social cohesion ".[4]

So the concerns of modern economists who have to face human drama confronted with the alarming decline of many species of plants and animals, massive cutting of forests, the increase of world population and the decrease of food supply and other problems of similar nature, are turning to "the increase of the human welfare through sustainable economic development, given the global and regional environmental effects of large transfers of energy and raw materials, which take place in human development and maintenance for life. "[5]

2. Discussions about some aspects of civil liability as a juridical liability form

Civil liability is a fundamental institution of civil law, and one of the basic forms of legal liability, which has aroused the interest of theorists and practitioners worldwide.

The foundation of the liability institution is, above all, the need to constrain the person who causes prejudice to another, to repair that prejudice. It is the principle formulated by the European Group on Tort Law in European Tort Law Principles of Contents: "A person to whom damage to another is legally attributed is liable to compensate that damage".

One well-known voice of the French doctrine, following the specific case jurisprudence noted that "specific to civil liability is restoration of the prejudiced equilibrium as much as possible, and restoring the injured party at the state previous to the prejudice suffered, at the expense of the wrong-doer".

The above cited author, notes that the current practice has the tendency to give priority to the notion that states that the role of civil liability is to repair the damage and restore the previous situation, if possible, and not that of punishing the author of that injury, the punitive function is thus left in charge of other types of liability, such as criminal, administrative etc[6].

Yet not all acts of deeds that create an injury to someone other than the author entail civil liability.

As noted by French doctrinaires[7], the object of civil liability is the prejudice repair, who's author will be considered responsible from legal point of view and proof of the existence of a prejudice is not enough to have a right to repair, but there must exist a characterization of the "deed generating retribution" to be able to give birth to a repair obligation, repair which will cover only the damage that can be legally estimated as products of the illicit deed.

Civil liability has been given several definitions by specialty literature, the common feature being the existence of an obligational report on which grounds a person is indebted to repair damage caused to another by its deed or, in cases provided by law, by the act of another.[8]

As a legal institution, civil liability is comprised of all legal norms regulating the obligation of any person to repair a prejudice caused to another by its non-contractual or contractual deed, for which is required by law to respond[9].

---

[4] http://circa.europa.eu/irc/opoce/fact_sheets/info/data/policies/environment/article_7294_ro.htm.

[5] D. Chiriac, C. Humă, A. Mihăilescu, Dimensiunea ecologică a consumului de bunuri şi servicii, edition coordonated by M. Stanciu, Expert, Bucharest, 2008, p. 17.

[6] Ph. Malaurie*, Liberte et responsabilite* , Defrenois, Paris, 2004, p. 351.

[7] Ph. Malaurie, L. Aynes, Ph. Stoffel-Munck, Les obligations, ed. 5, Defrenois, Paris, 2011, p. 9.

[8] To see I.M. Anghel, Fr. Deak, M.F. Popa, Răspunderea civilă, Ed. Ştiinţifică, Bucharest, 1970, p. 9-11; M. Eliescu, Răspunderea civilă delictuală, Ed. Academiei, Bucharest, 1972, p. 5-8; I. Albu, V. Ursa, Răspunderea civilă pentru daunele morale, Ed. Dacia, Cluj-Napoca, 1979, p. 23-24; L. Pop, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor. Tratat, Ed. Fundaţiei „Chemarea", Iaşi, 1996, p. 158; P. Drăghici, Faptul juridic ilicit cauzator de prejudicii, Ed. Universitaria, Craiova, 1999, p. 41.

[9] To see: I. Albu, V. Ursa, op. cit., p.24.

Legislative base of these rules is the Civil Code entered into force on 1 October 2011 and other special laws.

2.1. The conception of the New Civil Code editors on liability structure: duality or unity?

The necessity to adapt the liability to the transformation of social relations even if it is recognized although, at times, by the legislator in 2011, is without major changes in regulatory and foundation of this institution.

The new regulation preserves the unique, but not unitary nature of civil liability, with its two forms, tort and contractual liability, expressly establishing general rules for each one.

As it was only natural, the new lawful starts treating the institution in question, from the obligation to repair the damage caused to individuals through an illicit deeds, joint obligation of both forms of accountability, responsibility being ultimately just a mechanism to repair damage.

The institution of civil liability is regulated by the provisions of the Civil Code, more precisely the Book V, Title II, Chapter IV.

Regarding the possibility of cumulating the two forms of civil liability, art. 1349-1350 stipulates that one cannot choose between contract and tort liability, according to the provisions most favorable if the law does not so provide.

The new Civil Code provisions do not contain a legal definition of civil liability, so it was left to the doctrine this entire responsibility for such an approach.

Civil liability, in a simple definition, it contains a person's obligation to repair the damage unjustly suffered by another person, through the injury of its rights and interests.

Both types of liability have, as a starting point, the breach of an obligation.

Tort refers to the duty of everyone to fully repair all the damages caused to another person through the breach of the obligation to respect the rules of conduct which the law or local custom requires and shall not affect rights or legitimate interests of others-art. 1349 alin1-2 of the New Civil Code.

The contractual liability includes the duty of every person party to a contract to repair damage caused through default of another party that has contracted art. 1350-2, paragraph 1 of the New Civil Code.

There are still differences between the two forms of liability, but the new Civil Code, as the old code, adopted a theory of joint civil liability.

In its conception there is only one liability, seen as a legal institution, but with two regimes. The two regimes play a complementary role. The legal regime of tort liability is considered as the common law and the legal status of contractual liability has derogatory nature.

The purpose and key elements are common to the two responsibilities: injury, wrongful act, causal link between the wrongful act, damage and negligence. Fault is not essentially different, it always derives from a breach of existing obligations.

2.2. The critique of the vision of the New Civil Code regarding the concept of subjective liability

As noted in the international doctrine[10], accidents at work, traffic accidents, nuclear accidents and then the whole series of sources of danger created by technical progress led to a more pronounced process of socializing responsibility in all its components and a decline of individual responsibility.

[10] G. Viney, La declin de la responsabilite individuelle, Ed. Librairie Generale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, Paris, 1965.

It is noted however that the vision of the legislation in 2011 remains dependent on subjective liability based on fault, focusing on punitive function of civil liability and not on the reparative function, which would give preference to the repair of the damage suffered by the victim and not to the punishment of the author.

The importance of this difference between the two angles of view is that subjective civil liability in certain legal relations does not meet the requirements of reparation, either because of the difficulty in the author's fault probation, either because the author is obliged to respond even in the absence of the concept of guilt, on the principle of security, risk, family solidarity, etc.

This orientation of liability in 2011 was criticized in Romanian doctrine and for good reason.

It was said that what once was able to sustain that "to talk about liability without fault, of fault without an illicit deed was like talking about a man without a head, a car with no engine, a syllogism without premises"[11] today may not be available. Fault, the traditional basis of liability may not give a reasonable answer for more and more damages that cannot be attributed to individual behavior.[12]

Such evolution of liability has made some voices assert that nowadays "there is a crisis of tort liability, a reconstruction of it."[13]

Civil liability is therefore into a permanent change, adaptation, especially in a constantly spreading. It's like a spider webs and invades all areas of law "and becomes a right which tends to absorb all others, goods, people and even contracts."[14]

Therefore, it would be required a new approach to civil liability, one of its objectification, since the foundation of liability in negligence is not a solution to meet its application to situations that require the most diverse damages even if the fault cannot be established.

2.3 A new vision of civil liability in the current eco-economic context. The precautionary principle

2.3.1 General considerations

Motto: "L'homo sapiens, who for more than five millennia of building a civilization with its values and shortcomings, but which respected itself, transformed in the last two centuries into homo economicus and, with the passing from the industrial age to the technological era, it seems to become, at a frightening speed, "catastrophicus homo".

Constantin Teleagă

Part of the national doctrine, in recent years, taking into account the eco-economic context in which we live, characterized by economic and environmental crisis faced by humanity, respectively depletion of natural resources, the alarming rate of pollution of the environment and other factors of the same nature, has developed a new legal concept, which seems at first sight, and abstract concept, purely theoretical, namely the precautionary principle.

Gradually, this concept, which until twenty years ago was almost unknown, begins a transformation into a legal factual reality, due to the idea that, as said[15], no one can predict the future, and the new risks arising from unrestrained development of science and technology require the need

[11] P. Esmein, Le fondement de la responsabilite contractuelle, in Revue trimestrielle de droit civil, 1933, p. 627.

[12] S. Neculaescu, Răspunderea civilă delictuală în Noul Cod civil-Privire critică- in Dreptul, nr. 4/2010, p. 46.

[13] S. Carnal, La construction de la responsabilite civile, Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 2001.

[14] Ph. Malaurie, L. Aynes, Ph. Stoffel-Munck, op. cit., p. 11.

[15] C. Teleagă , Principiul precauţiei si viitorul răspunderii civile, in Revista Română de Dreptul Mediului, nr.1(3)/2004, p. 29.

for a "a remedy of law to punish those who do not adopt an appropriate behavior to this new existential situation"[16].

Although this concept first appeared in the science of environmental law, perhaps the first area facing risk and prejudice caused to humankind environment and health , most times without a possibility to establish a fault of the polluting agent, it has spread rapidly in other areas of legal and social fields.

The precautionary principle has emerged and developed due to the attempts of the doctrine to find a viable solution in a context that nor moral liability, or classic civil liability, would have the necessary power to protect the two elements at stake: the planet and the humankind.

A new type of ethical responsibility is necessary because the rationality of science, which occurs abruptly in biological life, not only may reverse the order of nature but also the human destiny[17].

Analysis of eco-economic causes of the crisis we face today, revealed that for a long time, the industrial society of the XIX century, which believed that technical progress is humankind's bright future, considered that nature was an inexhaustible reservoir of resources and a waste bin for the waste left behind by the exploitation of these resources, in the service of man and progress[18].

Analyzing the eco-economic road followed by mankind in a historical context, as well noted by a Romanian author[19]: "the twentieth century continued this tradition to which were added, through military equipment, means of destruction previously unimaginable, which has the particularity to "pollute" the litter box inherited from uncontrolled industrialization processes. The object of the quantitative growth had to reach a critical mass and humankind conscience to realize its own capacity for self-destruction, for something to start to change. But change is slow and problematic. Nature responds slowly to aggression and technological society is unable to measure time with the same standards with which Prometheus unleashed to conquer the universe, losing on his way, if not on the Milky Way, to which it aspires, the sense of measure"[20].

"Man has gained much ground on human natural temporality and human temporality tends to defeat the natural one definitively."[21]

As stated above, the principle in question has arisen in environmental law with the other two principles: the polluter pays principle and the principle of prevention.

The relationship between environmental law and civil law is one of direct connection and interdependency, environmental law has always resorted to the principles and elements of classic civil liability and civil law has the tendency to borrow elements that appear in the environmental law such as, for example, the precautionary principle, which we believe will be adopted by civil law in a matter of years.

What civil liability, specific to reports that have as a constitutive element the environment, took from civil law is the classical schematic of civil liability recorded in the principle "the polluter pays": the author of the illicit deed which acts negligently or with intent, produces a prejudice, and so, between the deed of the author and the prejudice there is a causality report, and thus the author is bound to repair it.

The principle of prevention, which we mentioned earlier, foresees the obligation to intervene before the damage would occur, but the matter is about a prejudice that is certain and a causal relationship between the action to be prevented or the unaccepted omission and prejudice.

---

[16] D. Mazeaud: „Responsabilité civile et précaution" in Responsabilité Civile et Assurances Nr. 6 bis/2001. p. 72.

[17] H. Jonas*, Le principe de responsabilité* , Paris, Cerf, 1990, p.174.

[18] N. de Sadeleer*: „Les principes du pollueur – payeur, de prévention et de précaution"*, Bruxelles, Bruylant/AUF, 1999, p. 37.

[19] C. Teleagă, op. cit., p. 30.

[20] C. Teleaga, op.cit.,p 30.

[21] J.P. Delage, „Une histoire de l'écologie", Paris, La Decouverte, 1991, p. 250.

The principle subject to discussion[22], the precautionary principle, implies that there is a prejudice, which was not yet produced, and the eventuality of the prejudice is not proven without a doubt and, as stated, the risk is uncertain, its realizations is possible at most, plausible, thus it would be a preventive action, anticipated in the context of uncertainty regarding risk, difficult to define, but which is applicable in the positive law.

The precautionary principle was born due to shortcomings of legal instruments in classic civil law where "damage is uncertain, but a risk impact would also have such consequences that repair, meaning a return to the previous situation, is excluded, and its dimensions are unpredictable and incalculable."[23]

But, as said by supporters that want to take over the principle of common law liability, the law is about to be changed through an evolutionary process that will mean the adoption of this principle. "The evolution that marks the transition from a legalistic model of justice, formal and logical, to a teleological justice whose ambition would be to find appropriate solutions to the objective choice…"is in progress.

2.3.2 The precautionary principle and the civil liability

Envisaging anticipatory preventive action in response to uncertainty, the precautionary principle represents an important milestone in risk reduction. The question is no longer merely how to prevent assessable risks, but rather how to anticipate risks pervaded by uncertainty. By leaving behind the realm of 'sound science', precaution necessarily gives rise to conflict.[24]

The precautionary principle was born in international environmental law, is a forward-looking concept: it is used to determine what can be allowed to happen in the future. There, instead of using a behavior marked by prudence as the standard evaluation of past actions of an individual to judge the legality of its actions? In civil law, the answer is "yes." Apply the precautionary principle in civil law abolishes the foreseeability test and transforms liability based on fault in strict liability.[25]

With the emergence of this principle, there are theorists who have tried a combination of classical notions of civil liability with the notions expressed by this principle, but not the current form of proposals emerged, lacking the force of arguments that would give the concrete of a possible legal regulations.

However the idea of civil liability which must be reconsidered for the purposes of admission and application of the precautionary principle is one innovative and prospective.

At first glance, there is an incompatibility between civil liability as is currently regulated and the precautionary principle.

It is easy to see from where comes this apparent incompatibility, if we analyze the elements of liability and the foundation of this institution and what suggests the precautionary principle.

Thus, civil liability is to repair the damage already produced, and the precautionary principle aims to protect the community and the environment of major risks, but uncertain.

There are authors who consider that In this latter case it is not about the repair of the damage but the repair of a risk, therefore if creating a risk means a material repairable injury, we can talk about civil liability.[26]

---

[22] C. Teleagă, op.cit., p. 30-31.

[23] Ibidem, p. 30.

[24] N. de Sadeleer: "The Precautionary Principle in EC Health and Environmental Law" in European Law Journal Volume 12, Issue 2, pages 139–172, 2006.

[25] Bruce Pardy, Applying the Precautionary Principle to Private Persons: Should it Affect Civil and Criminal Liability, Les cahiers de droit, nr. 1, vol. 43, 2002, p. 63.

[26] Geneviève Pignarre: „La responsabilité, débat autour d'une polysémie" in RCAss nr. 6 bis/2001, p. 15.

Insights in the current liability is difficult to accept the idea that civil liability has as object a risk, as long as the damage has not occurred, because this institution, now, does not punishes the author unless we can speak of a certain damage to be repaired.

As said, now is often necessary to prevent, neutralize, eliminate questionable but possible dangers, taking action even under uncertainty, and this urgently. Because damage uncertain, but possible, have very specific size and because, at least in principle, they are not repairable.

We agree basically with the proposal of the author, that in such a conception, tort liability, has the right to leave the rigid land of classic law to explore the virgin territory of the uncertainty and to play an active role in today's globalized society.

Precautionary principle should allow tort liability facing orientation that goes beyond the horizon of the foreseeable future, precisely because it threatens us with force increasing unpredictability. In this view elements of liability would largely change largely.

The precautionary principle, applied retrospectively, is inconsistent with the rules of tort liability as they presently exist. It is not compatible with the elements of negligence or nuisance because all of these causes of action now require fault in the form of foreseeability. Whether the precautionary principle should be applied to tort actions for environmental harm depends upon whether those fault requirements are appropriate. Strict liability is more consistent with the dominant purpose of tort actions derived from actions on the case: to compensate. Tort liability is not primarily intended to punish defendants, but to compensate victims harmed by the actions of others. To require fault on the part of defendants before liability will be imposed frustrates that purpose, and confuses the mandate with that of criminal law. The key determinant of liability should be causation, not fault. Thus, it is consistent with the purposes of tort law to apply the precautionary principle to the actions of alleged tortfeasors[27].

Proposing a new orientation to civil liability, or due to striking a news and they announced radical changes, even the formation of a new kind of liability should consider changes that would require the adoption of this principle on the concepts and elements which is based on classical civil liability: negligence, injury, causal link.

2.3.3. Fault in the new vision of civil liability under the precautionary principle

As we already know, guilt is a constitutive condition of common law liability, namely the subjective responsibility.

In civil law, concept of fault is used in place of the notion of guilt, without making any difference between them and includes several levels: the fraud or intent, negligence and imprudence. Unlike civil law, criminal law uses the notion of guilt, not guilt as synonymous, but as a form of it with intent.

Fault has been defined in legal literature as abnormal behavior, unexpected in conflict with the rules that define the normal conduct a balance of social harm[28].

Therefore it was said that "lack of caution is responsible for liability for negligence. We find that as the scale and scope of risk lies in many sectors of social life, guilt must be revised because it becomes urgent to find a responsible"[29].

Fault in the precautionary principle would correspond to an insufficient diligent, thorough examination of all aspects of neglect due diligence to their depletion. Raising the bar, imposing a duty to anticipate risk, diligence carried to its ultimate consequences, the principle redefines the scope of fault. It promotes an ethic of prudence in which each of us is asked to reconsider its

---

[27] B. Pardy, op.cit., p. 70.

[28] A. Bénabent: „Droit civil. Les Obligations“, Paris, Montchrestien, 1997, p. 323.

[29] C. Thieberge – „Libres propos sur l'évolution du droit de la responsabilité - vers un élargissement de la fonction de la responsabilité civile“, in Revue Trimestrielle de Droit Civil (RTDC) nr. 3 sept. 1999, p. 572.

approach to the unpredictable, which gives rise to a new conception of fault. Therefore, caution and diligence obligation would form a new structure of fault. Guilty in this case as one that in a situation of uncertainty or doubt don't adopt an attitude of caution. The duty of care would require more professional attention, especially in health and ecology and would require the detection of what may constitute a potential danger, systematic monitoring, evaluation, production expertise of all the processes that generate risk.[30]

2.3.4. The injury, causal link and the precautionary principle

In the current design of tort are to be repaired only the certain damages which occurred or will definitely occur, and does not fall under tort liability the future , possibly, hypothetical damages.

But the precautionary principle suggests the adoption of measures which take into account the uncertain damage, irreversible, which, as I said, are currently incompatible with the principles of common law liability.

Difficulties exist in the causal link because, as it was mentioned, precautionary prejudice is conditioned by multiple causality whose identification is not easy.Therefore it was concluded that the expected liability of the precautionary principle is without prejudice and without liability victims, based on non-repairable damage anticipation of change. It is designed to provide liability risks and thus avoid the major damage.[31]

Draft of this type of liability is yet to be outlined. Even if we don't reject from the beginning the idea of innovation and healthy foundations in what regards the sustainability of the precautionary principle, there still are steps to be taken to implement such a vision of civil liability. Even then, such liability would only add elements to the classic civil liability, without removing the whole basis of liability as it appears.

Conclusions

This paper has addressed an issue that has presented a great interest to lawyers, theorists and practitioners, since the formation of law; due to its importance, being called a "keystone" of the entire legal system, respectively the institution of civil liability.

The institution mentioned above was presented in the wider context of judicial liability, as a form of social liability, having thus tried to offer an appropriate definition to each of the liability notions.

Social and responsibility, and thus liability, the most important form of social responsibility, were analyzed yet in the eco-economic context in which we find ourselves at the beginning of the millennium. It was necessary to adopt a such initiative as long as the economic crisis and especially ecologic crisis is more acutely felt, and, as it is well known, the legal element – and we particularly mean civil liability – is an instrument to find solutions for this kind of issue.

We also analyzed the perspective of the legislature of 2011 on the foundation of subjective liability, choosing to devote, as a rule, the liability based on fault, but not exclude the possibility of intervention of an objective liability in situations established by law.

Adopting the concept of subjective liability has been criticized by specialized literature, considering that in the new millennium the point of view regarding the institution of liability should be abandoned. So we should abandon the idea that is more important to punish the author then to repair the prejudice. If so far the sanction was a main objective, from now on the social and eco-economic realities impose a an approach towards prevention and, if prejudice has already been caused, we should first attempt to repair and only then we might direct towards punishing the author.

[30] C. Teleagă, op.cit., p. 45.
[31] C.Teleaga,op.cit., p. 45.

We should thus allow criminal and administrative liability to sanction the author of an environmental prejudice and allow civil liability to become mainly a protective legal environment and only secondly a mean of sanctioning the illicit deed.

We believe that the trend of civil liability is to objectify, yet without completely removing the notion of fault, which still finds applicability. The point of view upon civil liability must be changed, and an objective liability must be adopted at the point where it intervenes, without trying to appeal, with no real proof, to assumptions.

We tried thus, to capture the inter-connection and inter-condition relationship between ordinary civil liability and environment specific civil liability, analyzing the points where they interfere by borrowing different elements.

Such "loan" is the takeover by the special civil liability, from the classic civil liability of the classical scheme which involves: wrongful act, injury, causal link and in some cases fault.

This scheme finds perfect application of the "polluter pays" principle, which maintains the concept of guilt taken from common civil law.

But, a basic principle entered the specific law environment, the precautionary principle, which proposes a slightly different objective liability, the novelty being a liability for a prejudice which has not yet occurred, but whose possibility of occurrence present minimal data.

We conclude that, although the proposed draft for the adoption of the precautionary principle in joint liability would be a step forward in the evolution of this institution, which probably will be done over the years, currently doctrinal proposals have failed to create a strong existential framework of an objective liability which would sanction individual behavior in a precautionary manner before the injury would occur, or even before the prejudice would become cert.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Project co-financed by the European Social Fund, through the Sectorial Operational Programme for Human Resources Development 2007 – 20013, POSDRU/CPP 107/DMI 1.5/S/77082/2010: "Doctoral training grants for eco-economics and complex bio-economics for safety and security of food and forage from anthropogenic ecosystems", coordinated by the National Institute of Economic Research, "Costin C. Kirițescu", Romania, in collaboration with Titu Maiorescu University Bucharest, Lucian Blaga University of Sibiu, Vasile Goldiş University - Arad, Universiy of Oradea, University Nicolae Titulescu - Bucharest, National Institute for Research and Development for Microbiology and Immunology, "Cantacuzino" Bucharest and S.C. SIAT S.A.

REFERENCES

I. COURSES AND MONOGRAPHS

- Albu I., Ursa V., Răspunderea civilă pentru daunele morale, Dacia, Cluj Napoca, 1979
- Anghel D., Răspunderea juridică privitoare la protecția mediului, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2010
- Bénabent A., Droit civil. Les obligations, Paris, Montchrestien, 1997.
- Bran F., Ioan I., Eco-economia ecosistemelor şi biodiversitatea, ASE, Bucharest, 2004
- Camal S., La construction de la responsabilite civile, Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 2001
- Chiriac D., Humă C., Mihăilescu A., Dimensiunea ecologică a consumului de bunuri şi servicii, edition coordonated by Mariana Stanciu, Expert, Bucharest, 2008.
- Delage J.P., Une histoire de l'ecologie, Paris, La Decouverte, 1991
- Drăghici P., Faptul juridic ilicit cauzator de prejudicii, Universitaria, Craiova, 1999
- Jonas H., Le principe de responsabilite, Paris, Cerf, 1990
- Lupan E., Minea M.Ş., Marga A., Dreptului mediului, Partea specială, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 1997
- Malaurie Ph., Aynes L., Stoffel-Munck Ph., Les obligations, ediția a V-a, Paris, 2011

- Malaurie Ph., Liberte et responsabilite, Defrenois, Paris, 2004
- Pop L., Drept civil român. Teoria generală a obligațiilor, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 2000
- Sadeleer N., „Les principes du pollueur – payeur, de prévention et de précaution" , Bruxelles, Bruylant/AUF, 1999, p. 37
- Viney G., La declin de la responsabilite individuelle, Librairie Generale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, Paris, 1965

II.ARTICLES, STUDIES AND NOTES

- Costin M.N., O încercare de definire a noțiunii de răspundere juridică, Revista Română de drept, nr. 5/1970
- Esmein P., Le fondement de la responsabilite contractuelle, in Revue trimestrielle de droit civil, 1993
- Mazeaud D., Responsabilite civile et precaution, in Responsabilite Civile et Assurances Nr.6 bis, 2001.
- Neculaescu S., Răspunderea civilă delictuală în Noul Cod civil – Privire critică – in Dreptul, nr. 4/2010
- Pardy B., Applying the Precautionary Principle to Private Persons: Should it Affect Civil and Criminal Liability? in Les Cahiers De Droit, vol. 43, No. 1, 2002
- Pardy B., Requiem for Rylands v Fletcher, 1994, N.Z.L.J.- 130
- Pignarre G., La responsabilite, debat autour d'une polysemie, in RCAss, nr. 6biss/2001
- Sadeleer N. de, Le statut juridique du principe de Precaution en droit communautaire: Du slogan a la regle, in Cahiers du droit europeen, nr. 1-2/2001
- Sadeleer N. de, "The Precautionary Principle in EC Health and Environmental Law" in European Law Journal Volume 12, Issue 2, pages 139–172, 2006
- Teleagă C., Principiul precauției şi viitorul răspunderii civile, in Revista Română de Dreptul Mediului, anul II, nr. 1(3)/2004
- Thieberge ., Libres propos sur l'evolution du droit de la responsabilite – vers un elargissement de la fonction de la responsabilite civile, in Revue Trimestrielle de Droit Civil (RTDC), nr. 3, sept. 1999

III. INTERNET

- http://circa.europa.eu/irc/opoce/fact_sheets/info/data/policies/environment/article_7294_ro.htm (accessed in december 2011)

THE TIMESHARE INDUSTRY AT ITS FINEST

ELENA-RALUCA DINU*

Abstract
The coagulation process of timeshare systems, the drafting action of its main peculiarities and the stake of its implementation have ushered the proclivity of U.S.A and of the E.U member states to legally set the aboriginal bricks of the juridical tower overseeing the ownership right in its new gala dress, which was the timeshare cloak that unfurled upon the naked shoulders of the resort service industry. The U.S.A precipitated in establishing the controlling channels of such a large scale operation by making the timeshare ownership concept a part of the South Carolina legislative compound, but nevertheless the E.U did not cave under the grueling weight of the good's market new product figure, adopting instead the Timeshare Directive aimed to protect the consumer's best interests. This paper suggests a bird's eye view over the requirements induced through the 94/47/EC Directive and then later through the new and improved 2008/122/EC Directive (with the Romanian transposition of the two normative acts' provisions) for an individual to become the beneficiary of their protection. The study will be completed with a series of data concerning the economical impact of timeshare development, which will credit the fast-forward actions of the above mentioned continents that proved themselves visionaries in the long run.

Keywords: timeshare network, temporary usage right, article 2 of the Timeshare Directive, O.G 14/2011, economical input of the timeshare industry in the larger picture of the trade market

Introduction

Many of the economical agents that offered timeshare goods to the consumers have previously sold only the appearance of property, creating an illusionary image in the minds of purchasers, which in the final picture frame couldn't pinpoint the exact right gained in exchange of the price they paid the other contractual party. Thus, an avalanche of pleads from the citizens of member states were sent to the mail box of all the European organisms, but especially to the European Parliament, the main complaints emerging from them all being the aggressive sales techniques and the contractual elements that imply making use of the international private law prerogatives that create difficulties in the flow of the timeshare sales contract[1]. Having in mind that in the majority of the member states this sort of contracts was poorly schematized[2], the European Community decided to weave a harmonized minimal provision basket that referred to the obligation set in the name of the economical agents to inform the consumers upon the constituent aspects of the contract, the methods through which these data should come into their acknowledgement and also upon the manners of annulment and denouncement of the juridical act that bounds the two parties.

At the origins of the Timeshare Directive sat an European Parliament decision from October 13th 1988 that rang the bell on the aspect that consumers were the victims of delinquent manifests on behalf of the sellers in this type of contracts. Further down the lane, the same institution with the back-up of the European Council strived to adopt the 94/47/EC Directive and did so on the 26th of October 1994. In accordance with the arguments that stood as corner stones for its adoption, the directive was necessary to come into being in order to obtain an uniform legal by-standing for the

* Ph. D. candidate, Doctoral Law School, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: dr_dinu_raluca@yahoo.com).

[1] Decision of the Federal Court of Germany from the 19 th of March 1997 explained in Revue critique de droit internationnal privé, 87 no. 4/1998, page 610 with notes by professor Paul Lagarde in pages ranging from 619 to 631.

[2] Only four states had norms to provide for timeshare contracts before the 94/47/CE Directive was adopted: Portugal, France, Greece and Great Britain.

timeshare sales contracts and to withstand the unfair trade practices on one hand and to protect the acquirer's right that rise from signing this sort of convention, on the other.

Although the working staff of the two European organisms has neglected mentioning the juridical nature of the rights that are gained by the consumer, they did not oversee the probability for the parties to become confused on this respect, thus they made the specification that even if the timeshare contract bears resemblances to the rent contract, the two shouldn't be seen as species of the same kind of convention. Therefore, this paper considers that a glance at the material and personal domains of application of the two directives comes in the aid of the large consumer population that may not be in tune with the requirements needed to be checked in the grid for them to benefit from the communitary protection offered by the Timeshare Directive and the 2008/122/EC Directive.

Content

Article 2 first paragraph of the 94/47/EC Directive states that this act applies to all the contracts regarding the direct or indirect securing manners of a periodical usage right of one or more locative spaces. It further establishes that the contract or group of contracts must be signed for a time span of at least three years and must refer to the transfer or promise of transfer of an ownership right or any another right (usus, fructus) over the above mentioned object for a minimum of a week in a determined or determinable interval each year in exchange for a global price. This definition is sufficiently vast to include all the juridical embodiments of how the usage right may be loomed, as well as all the real-world manifestation that came into being before the directive was adopted. The ante-adoption literature[3] underlined and amended the fact that the initial proposal of the European Commission made talk about the economical agent in the terms of "seller" and only about the potential transfer of an ownership right, hypothesis that is fairly unacceptable in accordance with the multitude of systems in the form of which timeshare may be found in pure state: obligational type, real, associated and trust based. The criticism has been partially taken into consideration, the final definition keeping an open field for all the possibilities.

The Timeshare Directive mentions that the usage right is bound to be obtained directly or indirectly, but doesn't go an extra mile to explain and exemplify the situations in which the right is extracted otherwise than by expressing the consent to become party in a timeshare contract, but the doctrine came in hand when it suggested that an indirect obtaining manner covers, in fact, the hypothesis arose in some Germanic law systems in which the transfer of the usage right operates solely after the concrete take in possession of the contractual object. Article 2 regards the directive as applying to immovable objects, meaning a building as a whole or part of it to which the usage right is exerted, therefore the material domain that constrains the timeshare contracts is the spaces with a living destination attached to them. By interpreting these guidelines we must conclude that the Timeshare Directive excludes de plano the protection of purchasers of boats, trailers, goods with an industrial or commercial destination, of terrains which hold no constructions upon them, even if they would be destined to act as camping grounds, thus we must observe that the living destination can be fulfilled only by a building and not by a surface of land on which nomadic population dwells. An author[4] makes a supplementary underlining in the sense that the 94/47/EC Directive is to be applied not only to leisure time destination locative spaces, but also to housing apartments if the buyer exerts each year for an exact period of time any professional actives in the region in which the object of the timeshare contract is situated.

The third and fourth paragraph of article 2 discuss about the seller and depict him as any individual or juridical personal that in its activity domain creates, transfers or is obliged to transfer the usage right upon the object of the timeshare contract, meanwhile the purchaser may become anyone who is the recipient of that right or in favor of whom such a right has been born. The proposal[5] of the Economical and Social Committee for associations or enterprises that do not comply to the activity domain to stand as parties in this type of contract has been rejected by the communitary legislation. Moreover, the directive does not expand its protection to purchasers that don't intend to retain the object for their own needs, but had the explicit motivation of selling the good in order to become beneficiaries of a profit. Similar to the 87/102/EC Directive regarding consumer's credit, the Timeshare Directive makes use of the seller notion in a functional way, not by a strict reference to the qualification that the party embodies, that's the reason why an owner that decides at one moment to share the usage right of his vacation house with a number of other people will not be sheltered by this normative act. This exclusion of private persons from the sphere of protection of the directive has been frantically criticized[6]. As for the purchaser concept, the aspect that raised eyebrows was if the protection applies on an abstract level or it must subdue to a concrete situation, respective if a person that works in the timeshare industry signs such a contract for his own use will be not be neglected by the directive. The answer to this dilemma was offered by interpreting the provisions of another directive that is 85/577/EC regarding the protection of consumers in contracts that are negotiated outside the realm of commercial destined spaces[7]. The European Court of Justice decided in the respect of following the spirit of this act that the protection is unbias and must, therefore, be applied to all the individuals that sign a contract that is covered by the umbrella of the directive, regardless of their occupation[8].

[3] M. Martinek, Teizeiteigentum an Imobilien in der Europäischen Union- Kritik des Timesharing-Richtlinienvorschlags der Europäischen Kommision in ZeuP 1994, pages 470 to 492.

[4] Maria Constança Dias Urbano de Sousa, Das Timesharing an Ferienimmobilien in der EU, Nomos Verlag, Baden-Baden, 1998, pages 22 to 23.

The 282/2004 Law for the transposition of the Timeshare Directive is a faithful copy of it, the Romanian legislator not bothering making any additional specifications, rendering the material and personal domains of application such as the directive established them in the second article. Although article 3 letters a and b of the law is not very easy to understand because of the multiple juxtapositions and intricate phrases, it's clear that the text isn't meant to limit the domain of protection to the contracts regarding vacation housing, but it stretches to accommodate other buildings or part of them with a living destination as far they are the object of a contract that unfurls for at least three years, which constitutes a periodical right of usage for an unspecified time span, but no less than a week each year in exchange for a global price paid upfront. Because the law doesn't distinguish, the less experimented would consider that the special provisions of the directive apply without distinction also to rent contracts, supposition that must be from the start put aside as unlikely. The 114/1996 Law provides solely for the juridical relationships born between a landlord and a tenant in virtue of satisfying the permanent necessities of residence for a person or a family, the other rented goods complying to the common legal bindings, so vacation housing, defined as temporary dwellings, will not fall under the concept of locative space in the sense of this law, which means a continues living situation from the part of the consumer. Because the 16th article of the 282/2004 Law doesn't pull away from recognizing that it transposes word for word the Timeshare Directive, in order to determine the material domain of application we must glance at point 6 of the exposition of reasons for the adoption of the directive that states the contractual transactions take place on the hotel and residence market. Adding all the information, considering the preponderant commercial juridical nature of the contracts and also the motivation of protecting the consumers, we can conclude that the law's norms are exclusive for commercial contracts who's object are hotel type buildings, the French literature naming them contracts de location saisonniers[9]. The use of the seller notion is plausible for

[5] Published in JOCE no. C 108 from the 19th of Aprilie 1993, page 3.

[6] M. Martinek in Das Recht der Europäischen Union-Kommentar, by E. Grabitz and M. Hilf, no. 106.

[7] C. Toader, Considerații asupa ordonanței privind contractele încheiate în afara spațiilor comerciale in RDC nr. 12/1999.

[8] CJEC decision from the 14th of March 1991, C-361/89, di Pinto.

[9] J. Huet, Traité de droit civil. Les prinncipaux contrats spéciaux, LGDJ, Paris, 2001, page 689.

criticism since the part who transfers an usage right shouldn't be qualified as such, but nevertheless the term is sustained by the fact that the location contract is also known as the sale of usage, the fact that the contracts are broadly commercial and by the fact that the obligation of the economical agent may consist of transferring a real right. One more argument in favor of the commercial nature of the timeshare contracts resides in the necessity for the purchaser to sign juridical acts in his professional activity domain.

The new Directive 2008/122/EC for the protection of consumers in respect of certain aspects of timeshare, long-term holiday products, resale and exchange was passed by the European Parliament in Strasbourg on the 22nd of October 2008. There was an overwhelming majority in favor of the Directive with 674 votes for it, 11 against and 10 abstentions. The new Directive has received widespread support from industry bodies, consumer representatives and government agencies. It gave consumers better protection and confidence when investing in timeshare, other long-term holiday products and related services. The Directive is dated 14/01/2009, came into effect on 23/02/2009 and established that it must be transposed into national laws by Member States by 23/02/2011. The new Directive clarifies, improves on, extends and harmonizes the protection given to consumers buying timeshare throughout the EU. The new Directive extends the scope of timeshare to include canal boats, caravans, cruise ships, etc. excluded by definition in the old Directive. In the spirit of the directive, the timeshare contracts mustn't be interpreted as having objects that include multiple unit reservations unless they imply rights and obligations that exceed the ones that arise from the separate reservations. On the same basis, the long term holiday product contracts shouldn't be set on the platform with regular fidelity programs that confer the purchaser clearances for future holiday plans in a chain of hotels. As far as all the other specifications I made when analyzing the Timeshare Directive and the 282/2004 Law of transposition, they translate to the 2008/122/EC Directive and its Romanian transposition law (O.G. 14/2011) that is in fact an approximate copy of the directive.

Timeshare is a relatively complex and high-value product when compared to a traditional package holiday. As consumers want to buy a holiday experience, and not a complicated product, the marketing challenge for the timeshare industry is to persuade consumers to take the time to understand timeshare and the high-quality holiday experience that it offers. For the developer, this challenge is compounded by the volume of sales needed at each development: every apartment needs to be sold roughly fifty times – once for every week that it can be used. Here are some economic information that paints a picture of the timeshare market.

General characteristics of the timeshare industry in Europe

- In 2007 1.5 million European households owned timeshare.
- The UK and Ireland form the largest market having 589,653 timeshare owners, followed by Germany and Italy.
- Most resorts are concentrated in Spain, with 26.3% of the total, 14.94% in Italy and 11.05% in the UK & Ireland
- There were a total of 1,312 resorts in Europe.
- The total number of units in European resorts is 73,540, resulting in 67,590 million bed nights.
- Average occupancy levels across completed European resorts was 71.7%.

Economic impacts of the timeshare industry in Europe

- € 3.2 billion of expenditure was generated by the European timeshare industry in 2007.
- European timeshare owners spent € 1.6 billion during their timeshare vacation, plus
- € 957 million on timeshare purchases and € 618 million on timeshare maintenance fees.

• The top spending market is the UK generating almost € 1.4 billion (about half the total expenditure) in timeshare.

• The average expenditure in 2007 per trip (or vacation) was € 1,588 per family, which was mainly spent on restaurants, car rental, parking and petrol, groceries, accommodation and gifts, souvenirs and clothes.

• In terms of employment, a total of 69,836 jobs are directly sustained by the timeshare industry.

• The overall employment costs for the timeshare developers sector across all resorts is € 1.28 billion (€ 1.06 billion if considering only resorts on the twelve European countries of this study).

European Timeshare Owners

• 86.6% of the owners reported that they were satisfied with their timeshare holiday and, 55.6% of them stated that they were very satisfied.

• 73% of the owners felt that their timeshare accommodation was better than other self-catering holidays they had taken, whilst 50.9% of all owners stated that their timeshare was much better than other self catering holidays.

• 32.2% of European timeshare owners own timeshare in their own country of residence, whilst two thirds of owners own timeshare abroad.

• Quality of accommodation, exchange opportunities and the credibility of the company are the three most important attributes and features in the owner's purchase decision.

• The average age of timeshare owners in Europe is 55 years.

• The average level of pre-tax household income of the European timeshare owners is € 60,475.

European Timeshare Developers

• 60% of developers described their resorts as 'built and marketing'.

• 21% of developers described their resorts as 'built and sold out', and a further 19% as 'under construction and marketing'.

• The average number of completed resort projects between 2002 and 2007 is 4.1 projects per developer.

• Almost half of the timeshare developers plan to sell out the completed resorts by 2015.

• 84% of timeshare developers do not have plans to build more units or new resorts.

• In 2007 in-house/hotel marketing programs accounted for 32% of developers' marketing expenditure, while direct marketing represented 23%.

• 98.3% of all developers state that their organization handles both the sales and marketing process of their timeshare development.

Conclusions

During 2011 the travel industry as whole saw a dramatic increase as families began feeling more comfortable spending their money on leisure activities. Over the past few years many people have felt the pinch of the downturn in the economy and therefore decided to skip their vacation timeshare plans or travel somewhere closer to home, families began traveling with more frequency across the country. Business travel has also seen a dramatic increase in frequency as companies began augmenting revenue from consumer spending and feel more comfortable sending their employees around the country to conduct business. Secondly, the increased travel demand led to a rise in timeshare rentals. Timeshare owners who tried to rent their timeshare found their units drawing more interest than over the past few years. Due to the expanding demand for rental units owners also realized they were able to increase their asking price, before many owners were trying to simply cover their maintenance fees when renting, there may be a little room for profit in the year that have past. Finally the timeshare resales remained in the same position they have been for the last couple of years. While travelers were willing to travel more often they didn't feel comfortable enough to commit to purchasing a timeshare and they rather rented a timeshare to make sure the economy continues to stabilize during the next few years. While owners found timeshare rentals increasing in both frequency and price timeshare, resales did not follow the same trend these years, however resales should be set to take a boost during the following years if the economy continues to grow and people continue to gain a sense of security and confidence in it.

They have always been seen as innovators within the industry but now Worldwide Timeshare Hypermarket have embraced the world of the new digital media with their own Facebook pages, Twitter account and even a Youtube channel. These have been set up so that Worldwide Timeshare Hypermarket will be able to reach out to both its existing customers and to give them coverage to reach a whole new range of people who may not have access to their normal means of advertising. These should not simply be viewed, however, as additional advertising streams. Paramount importance to Worldwide Timeshare Hypermarket is the role that these media avenues can play in expanding their program of educating the public to the benefits of timeshare ownership.

The educational process took a major step forward in July 2009 with the airing on satellite television's Travel Channel and Travel Deals Direct of a 30 minute program all about the ownership system which can now be viewed on their Youtube channel in bite size pieces. Phil Watson, Managing Director of Worldwide Timeshare Hypermarket was quoted as saying "we have made major steps towards educating the public about timeshare and what it has to offer. We are very excited, therefore, with the way we can expand that education program to an ever wider audience."

A large part of the success of the program has been down to Harry Taylor, Chief Executive Officer of the Timeshare Association (Timeshare Owners and Committees) TATOC who features heavily in the television program and explains all there is to know about timeshare, exchanges, management fees and re-sales. Harry Taylor has affirmed: "Worldwide Timeshare Hypermarket have been long term industry leaders and are taking timeshare and timeshare resale's to a new level and new audiences and I am sure that these initiatives will be very successful and prove to be popular with existing and prospective timeshare owners".

References

Legislation

- Ordonanță de urgență 14/2011 pentru protecția consumatorilor la încheierea şi executarea contractelor privind dobândirea dreptului de folosință pe o perioadă determinată a unuia sau a mai multor spații de cazare, a contractelor pe termen lung privind dobândirea unor beneficii pentru produsele de vacanță, a contractelor de revânzare, precum şi a contractelor de schimb
- The 2008/122/EC Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council for the protection of consumers in respect of certain aspects of timeshare, long-term holiday products, resale and exchange
- Legea 282/2004 privind protecția dobânditorilor cu privire la unele aspecte ale contractelor purtând asupra dobândirii unui drept de utilizare pe durată limitată a unor bunuri imobiliare
- The 94/47/EC Directive regarding the protection of purchasers of immovable goods through timeshare contracts

o Books

- Maria Constança Dias Urbano de Sousa, Das Timesharing an Feriennimmobilien in der EU, (Nomos Verlag: Baden-Baden, 1998)
- M. Martinek, Teizeiteigentum an Imobilien in der Europäischen Union- Kritik des Timesharing-Richtlinienvorschlags der Europäischen Kommision (ZeuP, 1994)
- J. Huet, Traité de droit civil. Les prinncipaux contrats spéciaux, (Paris: LGDJ, 2001)

Journal articles
- V. Stoica, "Proprietatea periodică", Pandectele Române 4/2005, 169 and the following pages
- B. C. Stoica, S. Stoica, "Discuții privind proprietatea în sistem time sharing. Investițiile imobiliare în regim timeshare – între miraj şi posibilități de implementare" , Pandectele Române 5/2004, 222 and the following pages
- Popa, "Coproprietatea spațio-temporală", Pandectele române 5/2004, 227 and the following pages
- C. Toader, "Contractul de time-sharing, acum reglementat şi în România", Revista de drept comercial 9/2004, 152 and the following pages
- T. Sâmbrian, "Proprietatea în sistem time sharing - proprietatea periodică - , o nouă modalitate a dreptului de proprietate", Dreptul 5/1997, 35 and the following pages
- L. Stănciulescu, "Particularitățile contractelor de locațiune sezonieră, reglementate de Legea 282/2004 privind protecția dobânditorilor cu privire la unele aspecte ale contractelor purtând asupra dobândirii unui drept de utilizare pe durată limitată a unor bunuri imobiliare", Revista de drept comercial 9/2004, 23 and the following pages
- V. Pătulea, "Legea 282/2004 privind protecția dobânditorilor unui drept de utilizare limitată a unor bunuri imobile", Dreptul 1/2005, 7 and the following pages
- C. Toader, "Considerații asupa ordonanței privind contractele încheiate în afara spațiilor comerciale" , Revista de drept comercial nr. 12/1999
- M. Martinek , "Das Recht der Europäischen Union-Kommentar", by E. Grabitz and M. Hilf, no.106
- J.P. Rousselle, "La multipropriété, La reve du Notariat, Montreal", vol 87, nr 5-6/1985

Jurisprudence
- Decision of the Federal Court of Germany from the 19 th of March 1997 explained in Revue critique de droit internationnal privé, 87 no. 4/1998
- JOCE no. C 108 from the 19th of Aprilie 1993
- CJEC decision from the 14th of March 1991, C-361/89, di Pinto

Websites
- www.eccromania.ro
- www.ec.europa.eu
- www.eur-lex.europa.eu
- www.ote-info.com
- www.protectia-consumatorilor.ro
- www.timeshare.org.uk
- www.thetimeshareauthority.com

THE CONSIGNMENT CONTRACT FROM THE PERSPECTIVES OF THE OLD AND NEW LEGISLATION

DAN-ALEXANDRU SITARU*

Abstract
A form of intermediation contracts based on the mandate without representation is also the consignment agreement, a variety of the contract of commission. The consignment contract is lawfully established by Law No. 178/1934 for the regulation of the consignment contract. The New Civil Code, under Article 2054, limits to providing that this agreement is a variety of the contract of commission having as object the sale of some immovable goods which the consignor entrusted to the consignee for this purpose.
The consignment agreement may be defined as the consent, by which a party, called consignor, entrusts the other party, called consignee, certain goods in view of being sold in its own name, but on behalf of the consignor, at a price established by the parties, in exchange for a payment. The consignee is bound to deliver the obtained price or, as the case may be, return the unsold good. The purpose of the paper is to underline the changes in legislation subsequently to the New Civil Code and to compare both perspectives.

Keywords: mandate without representation, contract of commission, consignor, consignee, movable goods

§I. INTRODUCTION, NOTION AND LEGAL FEATURES OF THE CONSIGNMENT CONTRACT

1) Notion of consignment contract

The consignment contract is a special form of intermediation contract without representation, along the contract of commission, shipment contract etc. The consignment contract is a variety of the contract of commission, in the sense that it is an intermediation contract, arising from a power of attorney granted by the principal, and as regards the actual means in which the representative acts the consignment contract is characterized by imperfect or indirect representation[1].

As a variety of the contract of commission, the consignment contract[2] distinguishes itself by a particular object, consisting of concluding with third parties particular legal documents. As per Article 2054(2) of the New Civil Code, the consignment contract is governed by the rules of the New Civil Code, expressly provides regulations for this type of contract, by means of the special law, as well as by the provisions regarding the contract of commission and contract of mandate, to the extent in which the latter forms of contract are compatible.

A definition of the consignment contract is given by the provisions in the new civil provision, under Article 2054(1) of the New Civil Code. According to these provisions, the consignment contract is a variety of the contract of commission having as object the sale of movable goods which the consignee entrusted to the consignor for this purpose.

---

* Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D., Law Faculty, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: dan.alexandru@sitaru.ro).

[1] See, further on the legal regime of the consignment contract, St. D. Cărpenaru, Tratat de drept comercial român, 2nd Edition, revised and supplemented, Universul Juridic Printing, Bucharest, 2011, p. 584-591; F.A. Moțiu, Contractele comerciale de intermediere fără reprezentare, Lumina Lex Printing, Bucharest, 2005, p. 139-170; F.A. Moțiu, Contractele speciale – în Noul Cod civil –,Wolters Kluwer Romania Printing, Bucharest, 2010, p. 258-263.

[2] See L. Papp, Contractul de depozit şi consignaţie, Cartea Românească Printing, Ploieşti, 1934.

Before the New Civil Code entered into force, the consignment contract was regulated by the provisions of Law No. 178/1934 on the regulation of the consignment contract[3].

The legal mechanism of the consignment contract presupposes a power of attorney being granted and this instrument underlies the consignee acting as intermediary in view of selling movable goods to third parties belonging to the consignor and given in consignment, in its own name, however on behalf of the consignor. The sale of movable goods is made in exchange for a price previously established by the consignor, and the effect of having executed the consignment contract consists either in the obligation to send the consignor the amounts of money received for the sold goods or, in case the goods were not sold to third parties, in the obligation to return the goods to their rightful owner.

In conclusion, the consignment contract is the legal document by means of which one party, called consignor, entrusts the other party, called consignee, certain goods, in view of being sold to third parties, in its own name, but on behalf of the consignor, at a previously established price, and the consignee is bound to deliver the obtained amounts or to return the unsold good to the consignor.

2) Legal features of the consignment contract

The consignment contract displays a series of legal features, which establish the main features of this separate legal institution, as follows:

a) The consignment contract is a consensual contract

The consignment contract is a consensual contract[4], arising from the parties simply giving their consent (Article 1174(2) of the New Civil Code). This manifestation of will which was thus articulated should not take a particular form provided by the law.

As regards the form of the consignment contract, the New Civil Code stipulates under Article 2055, that the consignment contract should be concluded in written form, which is necessary only for making proof of the contract, unless otherwise provided by the law. In this sense, Article 2 of Law No. 178/1934 also stipulates that, this contract, and also any other convention regarding the amendment, change or termination of the consignment contract, may be proven only by a written proof.

In other words, the written form of the consignment contract is requested ad probationem[5], and not ad validitatem, and the contract's validly arises from the parties freely expressing their will.

In conclusion, as a consequence to the consensual nature of the consignment contract, it should be mentioned that the goods being entrusted by the consignor to the consignee, in view of being sold, is not a condition for the valid rise of the contract[6], and it is an effect of the contract being executed. In this sense, the issue of delivering the movable goods to be sold and, correlatively, the consignee receiving them, shall be examined in the matter of the effects of the consignment contract, as reciprocal obligations of the parties.

---

[3] Law No. 178/1934 on the regulation of the consignment contract was published in the Official Gazette No. 173 of 30 July 1934.

[4] F.A. Moțiu, Contracte speciale, p. 259.

[5] St. D. Cărpenaru, op.cit., p. 585.

[6] With respect to the opinion according to which the consignment contract has an in rem character, since it involves the handing over of some goods in the care of the consignee, see R. Petrescu, Teoria generală a obligațiilor comerciale, Romfel Printing, Bucharest, 1994, p. 191.

b) In principle, the consignment contract is an onerous contract

The consignment contract is onerous in nature[7], each contractual party wishes to obtain a patrimonial advantage following the execution of this legal instrument[8]. Thus, on the one hand, the consignor wishes to sell its movable goods, and on the other hand, the consignee wishes to obtain the proper remuneration in exchange for the service it rendered.

According to the provisions of the New Civil Code, under Article 2058(1) thesis I of the New Civil Code, stipulates that the onerous nature of the consignment contract is presumed, and, only if the parties expressly provide, it could also be a gratuitous contract.

As regards the gratuitous or onerous nature of the consignment contract, one should also take into consideration the provisions of Article 12 of Law No. 178/1934, according to which the rightful remuneration of the consignee is established by the parties under the contract, or by calculating the difference between the price obtained in exchange for the sold movable goods belonging to the consignor and the inferior sell price agreed by the parties, or established by a court of law. This provision also entitles to draw the conclusion that the consignment contract is onerous in nature.

c) The consignment contract is a bilateral contract (synalagmatic)

The consignment contract is bilateral[9] (synalagmatic) in nature, because it gives rise to reciprocal rights and obligations in the care of both parties.

Thus, as regards the consignment contract, it is of the kind as to give rise to reciprocal and interdependent rights and obligations in the care of both parties, as follows: the consignor is bound to hand over to the consignee the movable goods to be sold, and also to ensure that the consignee is paid for the rendered service, consisting both in the amounts agreed in the contract, and also the additional expenses which the consignee incurred for fulfilling its duties. In exchange, the consignee is bound to receive, preserve and insure the movable goods handed over in view of being sold, and also to fulfil the entrusted tasks and to account for the proper manner for fulfilment. It follows that, the consignor and the consignee, as a result of the rights and obligations in their care under the consignment contract, display, in the legal relations between them, a double quality, as lenders and debtors.

d) The consignment contract is an intuitu personae contract

As a variety of the contract of commission, which is nothing else but a contract of mandate without representation executed between professionals, the consignment contract takes over the intuitu personae nature of the contract of commission.

The consignment contract is concluded in consideration of the personal qualities of each contractual party, thus justifying the intuitu personae[10] nature thereof. The obligations undertaken by the consignor, as well as those undertaken by the consignee, are a direct consequence of the other party assuming the obligations and especially the reciprocal trust which they have in their capacities and for the execution with good-faith of the other party.

---

[7] F.A. Moțiu, Contracte speciale, p. 259.

[8] With respect to the classification of legal documents in onerous legal documents and in gratuitous legal documents, see Gh. Beleiu, Drept civil român. Introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele dreptului civil, 11th Edition, revised and supplemented by M. Nicolae and P. Truşcă, Universul Juridic Printing, Bucharest, 2007, p. 132-133.

[9] F.A. Moțiu, Contractele speciale, p. 259.

[10] F.A. Moțiu, Contractele comerciale de intermediere, p. 148.

Therefore, the intuitu personae nature of the consignment contract is based on the fact that the consignor puts its trust in the consignee's abilities and professional experience, which was entrusted with selling certain movable goods belonging to the consignor, while the consignee undertakes to fulfill the obligations under the contract, in consideration of the remuneration to which its rendered service entitled.

Under Article 2063 of the New Civil Code, the consignment contract terminates, inter alios, by the death, dissolution, bankruptcy, incapacitation or deregistration of the consignor or consignee. These special causes for terminating the consignment contract justify the intuitu personae nature of the contract, which causes the contract to terminate in case there appears a cause leading to the impossibility to carry on with the execution of the contract by the same parties and in the same original capacities.

e) The consignment contract is a nontranslative property contract

Following the execution of the consignment contract, the consignor is bound to hand over to the consignee the movable goods to be sold thereby, and also the correlative obligation of the consignee to execute the given tasks. As an effect of the movable goods being entrusted to the consignee, the ownership right over such goods is not transferred to the consignee, and it shall continue to remain in the consignor's patrimony.

Thus, the consignment contract is not a translative property contract; the consignee strictly acts as temporary holder of the consignor's goods, during the time elapsed between their being handed over and the actual sale to third parties. Consequently, as we will hereinafter show, the consignor may exert at any time its right of control over the goods in question, also being able to request their return, by rescinding the executed contract. In this sense, as per Article 2057(2) of the New Civil Code, the consignor disposes of the goods entrusted to the consignee, throughout the entire duration of the contract. It may, at any time, repossess them, even if the contract was executed for a limited duration.

§II. CONDITIONS FOR VALIDITY

1) Form of the consignment contract

As previously mentioned, the consignment contract is consensual in nature. Therefore, for it to be validly executed it is not necessary to observe any conditions of form, the simple manifestation of the parties' will leads to the valid rise of the contract.

Thus, the consignment contract may be in writing, either by drawing up a signed document not notarized or writ in authentic form, or verbally. As a variety of the contract of commission, the provisions of Article 2044 of the New Civil Code may be applied by analogy to the consignment contract, as follows: the contract of commission is executed in written form, authenticated or signed but not notarized, and, unless the law provides otherwise, the written form is only necessary for making proof of the contract. In other words, further to this provision, it may be concluded that the validity of the contract does not depend on the written or verbal form of the consignment contract, but its proof exclusively depends on executing the contract in written form.

As per Article 2055 of the New Civil Code, the consignment contract is executed in writing, and this is only necessary to prove that the contract was duly executed, unless otherwise provided by the law. In this sense, the New Civil Code is in line with the old regulation regarding the consignment contract, according to which, as per Article 2 of Law No. 178/1934, the consignment contract, as well as any juridical legal for its amendment, change or termination, may only be proven by written evidence.

2) Proof of the consignment contract

Bearing in mind that the execution of the consignment contract may be both in written and oral form, as previously mentioned, under Article 2055 of the New Civil Code, similar to Article 2 of Law No. 178/1934, according to which the execution of the consignment contract in written form only serves as a means of making proof of the legal relation thus born, it may be said that the written form of the consignment contract is required ad probationem, and not ad validitatem.

However, the proof of the consignment contract may only be made by a written document, ascertaining the will of the parties and the main rights and obligations falling in their care. Thus, the document created as proof serves to identify the object of the executed consignment contract, consisting in the sale of movable goods belonging to the consignor, in its own name by the consignee, but on behalf of the consignor, issuer of the power of attorney, in exchange for a proper remuneration, and also helps to identify the means and limitations within which the consignee may act in relation to third parties.

Proving the consignment contract, on the one hand, envisages the consignor actually granting a power of attorney, whereby it lists the actual conditions which the sale-purchase contracts for the entrusted goods should observe; for instance, such conditions may refer to the markets on which the goods will be sold, the lowest price applicable to the sale etc. In addition, the power of attorney containing the consignor's will is also a means in which third parties may check the tasks entrusted to the consignee, and also the limits within which it may act on behalf of the consignor. This purpose which the instrument which contains the consignor's will serves exists only if it is assumed that the third parties are informed about the consignee's capacity as intermediary.

On the other hand, proving the consignment contract envisages the consignee accepting the tasks given by the consignor. By executing the contract, the consignee undertakes to take over the movable goods belonging to the consignor and to sell them in its own name to third parties, however, with the consequence of the effects of the concluded sale-purchase legal documents occurring in the consignor's patrimony, which shall receive all the amounts received for the respective goods. The proof of the consignee's acceptance is made either by the probative instrument which the parties concluded, or by the deeds for the execution of the contract, unquestionably evincing its will in the sense of performing the given tasks.

Lastly, the proof of the consignment contract may also envisage the amount of the remuneration to which the consignee is entitled for the services it rendered to the consignor, consisting either in the amount provided as such in the contract, or in the difference between the price actually obtained for the sold movable goods and the lowest price imposed by the consignor, bearing in mind the onerous nature of the contract, under which the consignor has the obligation to pay its proxy for its rendered service, as such amount shall be established by a court of law on a case to case basis, arises.

Proving the consignment contract directly influences the occurrence of the effects arising from the sale-purchase contracts concluded by the consignee in the consignor's interest. Thus, not proving the contract shall cause the sale of the movable goods not to lead to the rise in the consignor's patrimony of the right over the amounts obtained in this way, as accompanied by the consignee's obligation to forward these amounts to the grantor of the power of attorney. As regards the fact that the sale purchase contracts are concluded in its own name by the consignee, not making proof of the contract will cause the consignee to be the creditor of the amounts representing the price of the sold goods, and the consignor to be a third party in these legal documents.

3) Substantive conditions of the consignment contract

a) Parties' capacities

A condition for the valid execution of the consignment contract is the parties meeting the requirements regarding the parties' capacity to execute the contract. Both the consignor and the consignee need to meet the requirements regarding the capacity to acquire rights and to validly assume the obligations arising from the consignment contract.

Firstly, as regards the consignor, it should have the capacity to itself conclude the legal documents for whose conclusion it grants a power of attorney to the consignee. Bearing in mind that the sale-purchase contract with respect to the movable goods belonging to the consignor are concluded and produce legal effects on its behalf, in the absence of a power of attorney granted under the contract, it should be able to conclude such documents on its own[11].

Secondly, as regards the consignee, it should have full capacity, since it concludes sale-purchase contracts with third parties in its own name (proprio nomine), in the relationships with third parties appearing as the true party of the respective legal relation. Usually, the consignee acts as a professional[12], a natural or legal person, concluding such type of professional operations or having the operations which are object of the consignment contract included in the company's business object[13].

The conditions regarding the parties' capacities are mandatory for the valid existence of the consignment contract, all the more since the incapacity of a party is provided as a cause of termination for the contract. And the intuitu personae nature of the consignment contract, loss of capacity of one of the parties may lead to the contract being terminated.

Given that the loss of the capacity necessary for the valid existence of the contract leads to its termination, all the more the failure to meet the conditions for capacity when the contract is executed does not allow its valid rise.

b) Consent

The consent which the consignment contract presupposes in order for it to validly rise implies both the manifestation of the consignor's will, and also the consignee's will.

On the one hand, the valid execution of the consignment contract presupposes the consignor expressing its will, which shall grant a power of attorney under which it transfers to the consignee the task of selling certain movable goods, in its own name, however on behalf of the consignor which is owner. Thus, the consignor's consent is expressed by the power of attorney which is being granted to the consignee.

As regards the consignor's consent being expressed by granting a power of attorney, it was admitted that the manifestation of will should be express. In this sense, for the valid execution of the contract, the power of attorney should exist and be proven in view of accurately establishing the obligations which the consignee undertakes under the contract, and also the limits of the powers granted thereto. Moreover, the power of attorney granted by the consignor should be expressly granted, should be in such a form as to allow to prove the unquestionable manifestation of the consignor's will with respect to the consignee's possibility of acting in its own name in the relations with third parties, however on behalf of the grantor of the power of attorney.

[11] St. D. Cărpenaru, op.cit., p. 585; F.A. Moțiu, Contractele comerciale de intermediere, p. 148.
[12] F.A. Moțiu, Contractele comerciale de intermediere, p. 149.
[13] Mona-Lisa Belu-Magdo, Contracte comerciale, Tribuna Economică Publishing, Bucharest, 1996, p. 139.

In conclusion, as regards the consignor, its manifestation of will by empowering the consignee for handling specific professional businesses, in its own name, however on behalf of the principal, should be express. This results in the per a contrario interpretation of Article 2012(1) of the New Civil Code, according to which, unless the context requests otherwise, the proxy represents the principal when concluding the documents for which it was empowered. Therefore, basically, the mandate implies power of representation, and assuming there are doubts as regards the power of representation conferred to the representative, the granted power of attorney shall imply representation.

On the other hand, as regards the consent expressed by the consignee when the consignment contract is executed, it was ascertained that its manifestation of will may also be tacit. In other words, the execution of the contract may be express or tacit[14], in the latter case the contract arises from the consignee performing the tasks received from the consignor.

c) Object and scope of the consignment contract

With respect to the object of the consignment contract, the New Civil Code stipulates under Article 2054(1) the following: "the consignment contract (…) has as object the sale of movable goods which the consignor entrusted the consignee for this purpose."

Thus, the consignee negotiates and concludes with third parties sale-purchase contracts having as object the goods belonging to the consignor, in view of being sold in its own name and on behalf of the grantor of the power of attorney. Legal documents object of the contract of commission are included in the businesses carried out by the consignor, entrusting the consignee with fulfilling certain professional operations.

As regards the object of the sale-purchase contracts which the consignee undertakes to conclude, the new civil regulation takes over of the old regulation which was concerned with the consignment, found under Article 1(1) of Law No. 178/1934, according to which the object of the sale-purchase contracts which the consignee shall conclude is "the movable goods or objects". Thus, the goods which the consignee is entrusted to sell on behalf of the consignor are movable goods[15].

The consignor's correlative obligation under the contract has as object the consignee being paid remuneration appropriate for its services rendered on behalf of the consignor, as shown below.

The consignment contract produces effects within the limit of the powers granted to the proxy. Thus, the scope of the contract results, and consequently, produces effects, depending on the operations which the consignor provided in the granted power of attorney, whereby it established the limits within which the consignee is entitled to act. As a result of accurately establishing the consignee's rights and obligations, the consignor shall be bound within the limit of the conferred powers, while the legal documents concluded beyond the limits of these powers shall remain with no effects in relation with it.

[14] Bucharest Tribunal, commercial section, decision No. 225/1996, in D. Lupaşcu, Culegere de practică judiciară a Tribunalului Bucureşti 1990-1998, All Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 1999, p. 191-193.

[15] F.A. Moțiu, Contractele comerciale de intermediere, p. 151.

In conclusion, the limits of the freedom to act are expressly provided under the granted power of attorney. In this sense, according to the provisions of the New Civil Code, under Article 2017(1) and (2), regulating the contract of mandate, however which are applied by analogy in the matter of consignment, it is stipulated in the sense that the proxy (consignee) does not exceed the limits established by mandate. Nevertheless, it may divert itself from the received instructions, if it is impossible for it to previously inform the principal (consignor) and it may be presumed that it would have consented to the diversion if it had known the surrounding circumstances.

§III. EFFECTS OF THE CONSIGNMENT CONTRACT

Bearing in mind the main features of the consignment contract, it produces specific legal effects, which differentiate it and confer it a special construction in the broad category of contracts of intermediation.

Firstly, the consignment contract produces legal effects in relation to the contracting parties, the consignor and the consignee. These effects are direct consequences of the legal relations born between the parties, and consisting in rights and obligations falling in the care of the parties. Secondly, the consignment contract produces legal effects representing the consequence of performing the contractual obligations. Thus, the consignee concludes sale-purchase legal documents, in its own name however on behalf of the consignor. Establishing a contract with third parties is also of the kind as to produce effects both in the relations between the consignee and third parties, and in the relations between the consignor and third parties.

1) Effects of the consignment contract in the relations between the consignee and the consignor

A) Consignor's obligations

a) Obligation to entrust the consignee the movable goods to be sold

Based under the power of attorney granted by the consignor, which underlies the contract that was executed by the parties, the consignor undertakes to entrust to the consignee the movable goods that shall represent the object of the sale-purchase contract to be concluded with third parties. In order for the proxy to be able to fulfil the undertaken contractual obligations, it should receive the goods that shall be sold by it.

As per Article 2057(1) of the New Civil Code, the consignor will entrust the goods to the consignee in order to perform the contract (...). The new regulation in the matter of the consignment contract is a continuation of the logical-juridical reasoning which Article 1(1) of Law No. 178/1934 implies; the article in question indicates that the object of the obligation to hand over in the care of the consignor is the movable merchandise or goods[16].

We should mention an extremely important aspect regarding the title with which the movable goods belonging to the consignor are delivered to the consignee. The goods are made available to the latter however at no time is the ownership title transferred thereto. The regulation of the New Civil [16] As regards the means of performing the obligation to hand over the goods, Law No. 178/1934 stipulates under Article 1(2), in the sense that the goods entrusted to the consignee shall be handed over thereto, all at once or gradually, by successive notes or invoices, issued in relation to the contract.

Code indicates the fact that the ownership title over the goods object of the consignment contract, remains in the consignor's patrimony, further to it fulfilling its obligation to entrust the goods to the consignee. Thus, according to the provisions of Article 2057(2) thesis I of the New Civil Code, the consignor disposes of the goods entrusted to the consignee, throughout the entire duration of the contract.

As a consequence of the fact that subsequently to the consignee being entrusted with the movable goods, the consignor remains the owner thereof until the transfer of property to third parties occurs, and the consignor shall enjoy all the rights over the goods which were thus entrusted, including the right to dispose of them at any time, unless otherwise provided in the contract[17].

The consignor's ownership right over the movable goods is expressed by its possibility to manifest its autonomy of will, by indicating the criteria or even the person to whom the ownership over the goods will be transferred, by a request of returning the goods from the consignee's care or even by personally and actually picking the goods up. The New Civil Code provides, by Article 2057(2) thesis II, the consignor's possibility of repossessing the entrusted goods at any time, even if the contract was executed for a limited duration.

The difference as compared to the regulation of Law No. 178/1934, which the New Civil Code makes as regards the consignor's right to request the repossession of the goods from the consignee's care, consists in that, although the old regulation did not require sending a prior notice and in relation to picking up the goods, the New Civil Code conditions the repossession of the goods by giving a prior notice allowing the consignee to hand them over (Article 2057(3) of the New Civil Code).

Assuming that the consignee refuses to hand over the goods, they may be repossessed by a presidential ordinance, as per the provisions of Article 581 of the Civil Procedure Code, stipulating that, in expedite events, the court of law may order temporary measures for keeping hold of a right which would have caused damages by delay, in order to prevent an imminent loss and which could not be remedied, and also to remove any impediments which could occur on the occasion of an execution[18].

Thus, by means of the presidential ordinance, the consignor may exercise its right to pick up the goods from the consignee's care which is not the owner, to the extent in which it stands against the goods being taken over by the consignor. Moreover, the presidential ordinance may be granted also in view of the consignor picking up the goods at any moment, even in case the contract stipulates a clause regarding the obligation to give a prior notice.

The right of the consignor-owner to dispose of its goods subsequent to them being delivered to the consignee in view of performing the contract is also materialized in its recognized possibility to inspect and check the standing of the goods, at any moment, throughout the entire duration of the contract (Article 2057(1) thesis II).

[17] These conclusions are a natural consequence of keeping the ownership right over the goods in the consignor's patrimony, as Article 3(3) of Law No. 178/1934 also mentions.

[18] As per the old regulation, Article 4(3) of Law No. 178/1934 stipulates that the presidential ordinance may be given even without summoning the parties, to the extent in which the consignment contract is executed by a signed in the form of a signed document not notarized.

The consignor-owner is also acknowledged the right to unilaterally change the terms for the sale of the goods entrusted to the consignee, unless otherwise provided under the contract (provisions of Article 2056(2) of the New Civil Code). The consignee will be bound by this change, as of the moment when it is informed in this respect.

An additional consequence of the fact that the ownership over the goods is not transferred to the consignee following the goods being handed over is also the event in which, as per Article 2057(4) thesis I of the New Civil Code, in case consignor is declared bankrupt, the goods are included in its statement of assets. Therefore, since the handing over of goods does not turn the consignee in their owner, but it shall simply become their temporary holder, the solution according to which the consignor being declared bankrupt causes the goods to be included in the statement of assets of all the goods belonging thereto is justified, in other words, both the goods it actually owns but also the goods in the consignee's possession, under the consignment contract. The latter goods may be used just as well to cover the consignor-owner's debts, or may be divided following the closing of the bankruptcy procedure, to the extent in which the value of the consignor's goods exceeds the value of the debts.

Consequently, the consignee being declared bankrupt does not trigger the inclusion of the goods received in consignment in its statement of assets, and they shall be excluded from the consignee's statement of assets and shall be immediately repossessed by the consignor (Article 2057(4) thesis II of the New Civil Code).

b) The obligation to pay the consignee the rightful remuneration

The new civil regulation establishes the onerous nature of the consignment contract, based on a presumption set by the Article 2058 of the New Civil Code, according to which the consignment contract is presumed to be onerous.

The quantification of the amount which the consignor is bound to pay is made either by a contractual clause, or based on objective conditions under which the contract is performed, as shown hereinafter. In this sense, according to Article 2058 of the New Civil Code, the remuneration to which the consignee is entrusted is established by other or, in lack thereof, as the difference between the sale prices established by the consignor and the actual sale price. If the sale was made at the current price, the court of law shall establish the remuneration.

Firstly, the parties are free to establish the consignee's remuneration by a contractual clause referring to this aspect.

Secondly, to the extent in which the parties made no mention in the contract with respect to the retribution or benefit given to the consignee, it would only be entitled to the overcharges it shall obtain from the sale. In other words, the consignee may claim, as remuneration, the difference between the prices actually collected under the sale-purchase contracts that it concluded with third parties having as object the consignor's movable goods, and the sale prices provided by the consignment contract or the consignor's notes, invoices, or instructions[19]. Thus, if either by contract or based on the instructions given by the consignor certain minimum prices are established for the sale of the goods, any higher value obtained from third parties following the consignee's endeavors or qualities, could be in its benefit, as remuneration.

[19] In this sense the provisions of Article 12(1) of Law No. 178/1934 were regulated.

Thirdly, to the extent in which the remuneration to which the consignee is entitled under the consignment contract, is determined neither by contract nor by the consignor's notes, invoices or instructions, and the sale of the goods to third parties is made by the consignee at the current price, the consignee may address a court of law to establish its retribution. In view of establishing the accurate amount thereof, the court of law shall take into consideration the difficulty of the sale, the diligences the consignee makes for performing the contract and the remunerations practiced on the relevant market for similar operations (Article 2058(2) of the New Civil Code). This regulation takes over the old one, similarly stipulating under Article 12(2) of Law No. 178/1934.

In conclusion, the onerous nature of the consignment contract presupposes the consignee's right to receive a payment for its rendered service, either at the value established by the parties' consent, or at the value established by the court of law.

Bearing in mind the paragraphs above, it follows that the appropriate retribution to which the consignee is entitled is established in lump amounts, by a fixed amount, or in percentages, by reference to the price obtained for the sold goods[20].

c) Obligation to repay the consignee the expenses incurred by it on the occasion of performing the tasks

In this sense, as per Article 2059 of the New Civil Code, the consignor is bound to cover the consignee's expenses incurred for preserving and selling the goods, unless otherwise provided by the contract. Therefore, the obligation to repay the expenses made by the consignee on the occasion of the received tasks also includes the amounts made by it for the preservation and sale of the goods received in consignment, for concluding contracts with third parties, and also for protecting it against any loss incurred while performing the consignment contract. Such hypotheses, in which performing the contractual obligations causes losses to the consignee, the losses shall be covered by the grantor of the power of attorney.

Moreover, the consignee's right of being indemnified does not survive in case the consignor repossesses the goods or orders them to be removed from the consignee's possession, and also in case the consignment contract may not be performed, without any fault of the consignee. Thus, the latter is entitled to have its expenses made for performing the contract covered (Article 2059(2) of the New Civil Code). To the extent in which the consignor is bound to repossess the goods in the care of the consignee and it fails to fulfil this task, the consignor in default is held liable to pay the maintenance and storage expenses. Failure to fulfil its obligations triggers the consignor's liability for any loss suffered by the consignee on the occasion of preserving and storing the goods.

In case the contract is terminated by the consignee's renunciation, if, given the circumstances, the consignor may not promptly repossess the goods in question, the consignee shall remain liable for its obligations to keep, insure and maintain the goods until the consignor repossesses them. The consignor is bound to carry out any diligence necessary for repossessing the goods promptly after the contract is terminated, subject to the sanction of covering the costs for preservation, storage and maintenance (Article 2059(4) of the New Civil Code).

B) Consignee's obligations

a) Obligation to receive, keep and insure the goods entrusted for being sold

Based on the consignment contract, the consignor issues a power of attorney whereby it empowers the consignee to conclude with third parties sale-purchase legal documents for certain goods belonging to the consignor, in its own name and on behalf of the consignor. In order to fulfil the granted tasks, the consignee should be entrusted with the goods in question, with respect to which it should fulfil certain obligations to receive, preserve and insure, throughout the entire duration in which the goods are in the consignee's possession.

[20] St. D. Cărpenaru, op. cit., p. 586; F.A. Moțiu, Contractele speciale, p. 260.

This obligation to receive and preserve the goods which shall be the object of future sale-purchase contracts, is an obligation that is reciprocal and correlative to that in the consignor's care consisting of having to entrust the consignee with the goods in question.

The obligation to receive the goods object of the consignment contract, presupposes their being received by the consignee, however not limited thereto. The obligation to take over the consignor's goods is a complex obligation, which also implies the preservation of goods[21] and allowing them to be at the free disposal of the consignor-owner throughout the entire duration. Taking into consideration that the delivery of goods by the proxy does not also cause the transfer of the ownership right in the consignee's patrimony, it follows that the property, and implicitly the prerogative of disposal, remain in the consignor's benefit, which, at any moment, may amend the granted power of attorney or may give additional instructions as regards the conditions for selling its goods.

In addition, the consignor may also exercise the rights over the goods in question also by its acknowledged possibility to inspect, control and request their being repossessed at any time. Such hypotheses, in which the consignor wishes to repossess the goods, as per Article 2057(3) of the New Civil Code, the consignor is bound to send a prior notice to the consignee, with the purpose of granting him a term within which it may prepare the goods to be handed over.

Regarding the means of exercising the obligation of preserving the goods received under the consignment contract, the New Civil Code stipulates under Article 2060(1) that the consignee shall receive and shall keep the goods as an owner and shall give them to the buyer or, as the case may be, the consignor, in the standing in which it received them for being sold. In other words, on the one hand, the conclusion of sale-purchase contracts with third parties with respect to the goods entrusted in consignment, should bear in mind the standing in which the goods were received from the consignor. On the other hand, to the extent in which the goods are not sold to third parties, and returned to the consignor, they should even more be sent back in the same standing in which they were handed over, and the consignee is bound to preserve and insure them.

As regards the obligation to receive and preserve the goods in consignment, all costs for their preservation and sale of the goods entrusted in consignment, are in the consignor's care, unless otherwise provided by a contractual clause, as per Article 2059(1) of the New Civil Code.

In view of verifying the means in which the consignee fulfils the obligations assumed under the consignment contract, the consignor is acknowledged the right to control and verify, at any moment, the merchandise entrusted to the consignee, and also to proceed to an inventory thereof (Article 2057(1) of the New Civil Code). In order for it to exercise this right, the old law acknowledged the consignee's right to obtain, at any moment, upon request, the presidential ordinance (Article 8 of Law No. 178/1934).

---

[21] Supreme Court of Justice, commercial section, decision No. 572/2000, in Pandectele române No. 4/2001, p. 52; Bucharest Court of Appeal, commercial section, decision No. 466/1999, in Bucharest Court of Appeal. Culegere de practică judiciară în materie comercială, 2007, volume I, Wolters Kluwer Printing, 2008, p. 88.

Another aspect which the obligation to receive established in the care of the consignee presupposes, consists in the fact that it is bound to insure the goods given in consignment. Thus, as per Article 2060 of the New Civil Code, the consignee shall insure the goods at the value established by the contractual parties of the consignment contract or, in lack thereof, at the goods' price estimate on the day when the goods are received in consignment. The consignee is bound to regularly pay these insurance premiums.

Accordingly, the purpose which this provision wishes to attain is that of procuring that all the risks to which the goods are exposed to during the period in which they are in the consignee's care, be covered by the concluded insurance, starting with when the goods are sent by the consignor.

As regards the consignee's obligation to insure the goods, correlatively to this obligation, in its care there also exists the duty to regularly pay the insurance premiums related to the insurance contract which was concluded. As long as the goods are in the consignee's care, it is also bound to insure them, so its obligation to also make the payment arising from the insurance contract is legitimate. Any insurance concluded by the consignee, with respect to the goods entrusted in consignment, are deemed as fully concluded in favour of the consignor, provided that it notifies the insurer with respect to the consignment contract, prior to paying any damage. Consequently, in order for the consignor to benefit from the insurance, the consignor is bound to inform the insurer that the goods are in the consignee's care based on a consignment contract, at any moment, until damages in case of occurrence of the ensured risk are paid.

The New Civil Code, by Article 2060(2) thesis II, provides that the consignee's liability is engaged towards the consignor for the deterioration or disappearance of the goods due to force majeure events or an action of a third party, if they were not insured upon their receipt in consignment or the insurance expired and was not renewed or the insurance company was not approved by the consignor.

To the extent in which the consignee fails to fulfil its obligation of insuring the goods object of the consignment contract, the consignor may insure the goods at the consignee's expense, in order to cover the risk of disappearance or deterioration of the goods. Such insurance is rightfully concluded in the consignor's benefit, provided that it notifies the consignment contract to the insurer prior to it paying the damages (Article 2060(3) and (4) of the New Civil Code).

As regards the consignee's obligation to receive, keep and insure the goods entrusted for being sold, it should also be mentioned, that, regarding the fact that the ownership over the goods in question is not transferred in the consignor's patrimony, in case (…) the consignee is declared bankrupt, the goods are excluded from its statement of assets and shall be repossessed promptly by the consignor (Article 2057(4) thesis II of the New Civil Code).

b) Obligation to perform the tasks given by the consignor

Under the consignment contract, the consignee undertakes the obligation to conclude with third parties sale-purchase contracts with respect to certain movable goods belonging to the consignor. Based on the power of attorney granted by the consignor, the consignee concluded legal documents with third parties, in its own name and on behalf of the grantor of the power of attorney, in other words, in this way it performs its contractual obligations.

The sale-purchase contracts are concluded under the terms and conditions indicated by the consignor, which had an interest in perfecting such operations. The consignee may sell or alienate the goods entrusted in consignment, only in the conditions provided by contract. In other words, the consignee is bound by the consignor's instructions given under the power of attorney, and may act, in line with its capacity as intermediary without representation, only within the limits provided by the beneficiary of the business. The consignee undertakes under the consignment contract, the obligation to sell the consignor's goods, however the actual means of fulfilling its duties, meaning complying with the terms and conditions for concluding the sale-purchase contracts with third parties, the persons towards which the goods are alienated, the sale prices and the means of collecting money etc. are those imposed by the consignor.

Based on the consignor's right, as actual beneficiary of the contracts concluded by the consignee with third parties, of imposing the limits and conditions under which the proxy may act, the consignor may unilaterally change, at any time throughout the duration of the contract, the terms of the sale, unless otherwise provided by the contract. The consignor may, therefore, amend the provisions included in the power of attorney granted to the consignee, in the sense of amending any element relating to the object of the consignment contract.

Such amendments are mandatory for the consignee, since these amendments are communicated in writing. As regards the consignee's obligation to act in its client benefit, any instruction coming from the client is imperative for the intermediary, which by performing the consignment contract serves the consignor's interests. The mentioned rule was also taken over by the new civil regulation under Article 2056(2) which stipulates that subsequently to when the power of attorney is granted, the consignor may unilaterally change the established sale price, and the consignee shall be bound by this amendment since being communicated in relation thereto in writing.

In conclusion, performing the contract is the consignee's main obligation and it is bound to comply with the instructions given by the grantor of the power of attorney, the owner of the sold goods. Nevertheless, in the absence of certain express provisions referring to the terms of sale for the entrusted goods, and in the absence of written instructions coming from the consignor, the consignee may not sell the goods entrusted in consignment , unless for cash and at the market's current prices.

This rule is also taken over by the new civil regulation, which stipulates, under Article 2056(1), that the price at which the good shall be sold is the one established by the contractual parties to the consignment contract, or, in lack thereof, is the current price of the merchandise on the relevant market, at the moment when the sale is made.

In addition, it is also provided that, unless otherwise stipulated or unless the consignor instructs otherwise, the sale shall be made only by way of cash payments, by transfer or crossed cheque and only at the merchandise's current prices, as per paragraph (1) of the same article (Article 2056(3) of the New Civil Code).

Consequently, based on an express provision included in the contract, the consignee may be authorized to sell the goods on credit, also mentioning the terms of such sale. In such situation, since the sale-purchase contracts concluded with third parties are concluded on behalf of the consignor, in view of being profitable for it, the receivable for the price owed for the goods sold on credit belongs to the consignor[22]. Thus, the consignee may validly take any action on the receivable towards debtors and third parties, may receive the payment, may follow the receivable and may take any insurance measures.

[22] St. D. Cărpenaru, op.cit., p. 588.

Nevertheless, in case the consignee is granted the right to sell the goods on credit, unless the parties agree otherwise, it may grant the third party buyer a term within which it may pay the price of, which shall not be longer than 90 days and exclusively based on a bill of exchange or promissory note (New Civil Code, Article 2061(1)).

If the goods were sold on credit, unless otherwise provided, the consignee is jointly liable towards the consignor, for the payment on term of the price for the goods sold in this method (Article 2061(2) of the New Civil Code).

As regards the acknowledgement of the possibility of making a sale to third parties on credit, it was established that the consignor has the right to forbid the consignee to make a sale on credit to certain companies or particular persons, even if by contract the consignee was empowered to make sales on credit, with or without restrictions (Article 15 of Law No. 178/1934). This interdiction is mandatory for the consignee since being informed in writing in relation thereto.

c) Obligation to be accountable to the consignor for fulfilling the granted power of attorney

Under the consignment contract, the consignee is bound to comply with the instructions given by the consignor in view of concluding sale-purchase contracts with third parties, with respect to the consignor's goods. As an effect of assuming towards the consignor the mentioned obligations, in the consignee's care the obligation to be accountable in front of the grantor of the power of attorney for how it fulfilled the entrusted tasks shall also arise.

The obligation to be accountable has not been taken over by the new civil regulation however with respect to the consignee's capacity as intermediary without representation acting on behalf of the consignor we believe it is necessary to maintain such obligation in the consignee's care. This examination is made by reference to the old provisions of Law No. 178/1934.

The obligation of accountability is a complex obligation, which, on the one hand, gives rise to duties in the consignee's care, and on the other hand, to correlative rights in the consignor's benefit.

Thus, as regards the first aspect which the obligation of accountability presupposes, namely, that of the consignee being bound to regularly inform the consignor on the manner in which the power of attorney is fulfilled, it should be mentioned that in its capacity of intermediary without representation, the consignee shall inform the consignor on any action taken in relation to its goods, received in consignment, which could mean an act in the sense of performing the contract, and just as well a ground for causing incapacity or hindering the contract being performed.

As per Article 18(1) and (2) of Law No. 178/1934, the consignee is bound to inform the consignor, at the terms stipulated in the contract, on all the sales it made that had as object the goods which were entrusted in consignment by the consignor. The notice sent to the consignor shall have to precisely indicate the goods sold in exchange for cash and the goods sold on credit, indicating, in the case of the latter goods, the name and full address of each debtor, the owed amount based on the sale-purchase contracts, the granted payment term, and also the received bills of exchange or guarantees. In case the contract contains no such provision relating to the consignee being bound to inform, at the latest, at the end of each week the consignee is bound to inform the consignor on any operations relating to the week in question.

As regards the consignee's obligation to be accountable to the consignor for the manner in which it fulfilled the received tasks, an additional aspect which this duty presupposes consists in the fact that, as per Article 17(1)-(3) of Law No. 178/1934, the consignee is bound to account for all the operations relating to the goods entrusted to him in consignment, so that their control and verification may be easily made.

In this sense, by its clauses the consignment contract may stipulate that the consignee is bound to keep one or more special registries in which it shall record the operations relating to the goods entrusted in consignment. In case the contract provides that the consignee should keep special registries, it shall be bound to present these registries, upon the consignor's first request. In order to proceed to the examination and verification of the special consignment registries, the consignor is entitled to obtain a presidential ordinance, as per Article 4 of this Law.

2) Consignee's right of lien

As previously mentioned, the consignment contract is an onerous contract, which gives rise in the care of the consignor to the obligation to remunerate the consignee for the rendered service. A right of receivable over the amounts to which it is entitled for the rendered service in the consignor's interest is acknowledged in favour of the consignee.

The consignment contract is a variety of the contract of commission, meaning that certain provisions setting out the legal regime of the contract of commission are applicable to it, to the extent in which they are compatible. Thus, as regards the contract of commission, the old regulation acknowledged for the consignee, by analogically applying the provisions relating to the contract of mandate with representation, a special privilege[23], with the purpose of covering all amounts which are owed to it based on or as a result of performing the contract of commission[24], the consignment contract contains different provisions. In the case of the contract of commission, the special privilege established in favor of the consignee envisages covering, on the one hand, the commission owed to it for the rendered service in the principal's interest, and on the other hand, any other expenses for fulfilling the power of attorney, or the losses incurred while performing the contract. The special privilege of the commission agent is exerted over all of the principal's goods, object of the contract of commission and which are in the commission agent's care or disposal.

The issue of the consignee's special privilege over the consignor's goods is taken over in the new civil regulation which stipulates under Article 2062, that, unless otherwise provided, the consignee has no right of lien over the goods received in consignment and the amounts to which the consignor is entitled, for its receivables in it. Unlike the provisions of Law No. 178/1934, the New Civil Code acknowledges the consignee's possibility to exert a right of lien over the consignor's goods, to the extent in which the parties agree by a contractual clause in this respect.

Even if assuming that the right of lien was exercised, the consignee's obligations regarding the maintenance of goods still remain valid, however the storage costs fall on the consignor, if the exercise of the right of lien proves substantiated.

Absence of the consignee's right of lien over the consignor's goods, as regulated by the New Civil Code, falls in line with the provisions of Law No. 178/1934. Hence, unlike the regulation included in the contract of commission and although the consignment contract is a variety of the contract of commission, as far as the consignment contract is concerned, according to Article 20 of

[23] F.A. Moțiu, Contractele comerciale de intermediere, p. 93-97.

[24] With respect to the commission agent's right of lien over the principal's goods, see Ioana-Nelly Militaru, Privilegiul dreptului de retenție al comisionarului, in Revista de drept comercial No. 1/2008, p. 65 et seq.

Law No. 178/1934, the consignee may not exercise towards the consignor any right of lien, and neither on the goods entrusted to it in consignment, nor on the amounts or the amounts obtained from selling these goods. In other words, certain receivables belonging to the consignee against the consignor as a result of performing the contract do not entitle the consignee to exert a right of lien over its movable goods or over the amounts collected from third parties after sale-purchase contracts were concluded.

This special regulation does not display a logical justification, of the kind to explain the difference in the legal regimes between the contract of mandate and the contract of commission, on the one hand, and the consignment contract, on the other.

3) Effects of performing the consignment contract

a) Relations between the consignee and third parties

As shown above under the consignment contract the consignor shall grant a power of attorney, whereby it shall empower the consignee to conclude sale-purchase contracts for certain movable goods belonging to the consignor with third parties, in the consignee's own name, however on behalf of the grantor of the power of attorney.

Hence, performing the consignment contract, under the terms established by the parties, leads to direct legal relations between the consignee and third parties, in the virtue of which it shall transfer the ownership right over the goods in question to third parties, acting in its own name, as if it were the real owner of the goods. Therefore, the effect of performing the consignment contract consists in creating direct legal relations between the consignee, as seller, and third parties, as buyers. These relations are governed by rules applicable in the matter of sale-purchase contracts.

Bearing in mind that the sale of the goods is made by the consignee in its own name, this makes the third party buyers have the benefit of a direct action against the consignee, whereby its liability towards third parties for failure to fulfil any obligation undertaken under the concluded sale-purchase contract is triggered.

In addition, the consignee may take action against third parties, resorting to any action which the seller has, as per the law, for performing the sale-purchase contract and for the price being paid.

b) Relations between the consignor and third parties

Based on the consignment contract, the consignor acts as beneficiary of the operations of intermediation without representation which the consignee exercises, being the actual owner of the affairs concluded by its proxy. Hence, the sale-purchase contracts for the goods belonging to the consignor and entrusted in consignment, although are concluded in the consignee's own name, they are in the consignor's benefit. On the one hand, the latter is the actual owner of the sold goods, and, on the other hand, the creditor of the amounts representing the value of the goods.

In other words, although between the consignee acting as seller in its own name, and third party buyers, direct legal relations are created which are particular to sale-purchase contracts, nevertheless, the consignee is not the actual owner of the goods thus alienated. Accordingly, bearing in mind that these contracts are concluded based on a power of attorney granted by the consignor and on its behalf[25], the right over the price obtained by the consignee in exchange for the sold movable goods belongs to the consignor.

[25] Supreme Court of Justice, commercial section, decision No. 4311/2002, loc. cit., p. 115.

Moreover, the transfer of the real rights over the sold movable goods and the risks relating to the goods operates directly between the consignor and third parties[26]. The direct transfer of the ownership from the consignor's patrimony to that of third parties' is the logical consequence of the fact that the ownership over the goods entrusted in consignment does not consecutively pass through the consignee's patrimony. The latter is being handed over the goods as simple temporary holder in charge of certain obligations however the ownership and disposal right still remain in the patrimony of the consignor, until being sold to the third parties[27].

Hence, as regards the effects of performing the consignment contract, no direct legal relation is established between the consignor and third party buyers.

Nevertheless, bearing in mind the consignee's simple capacity of intermediary, even though it would have undertaken certain obligations in its relation with third parties by the concluded sale-purchase contracts, for instance, guaranteeing hidden vices of the goods, such obligations in question fall in the duty of the consignor[28].

In case the goods given in consignment are sold on credit, the receivable for the owed price belongs to the consignor[29], as actual owner of the affair.

As per Article 2061(2) of the New Civil Code, unless the consignment contract provides otherwise, the consignee is jointly liable together with the buyer towards the consignor for the payment of the price in exchange for the merchandise sold on credit.

Towards debtors and third parties, the consignee may validly take any action over the respective receivable and, especially, shall be able to receive the payment, and follow the payment being collected and may take any insurance measures[30]. This conclusion is justified by the fact that, at least apparently, the consignee acts as seller-owner of the goods, thus being acknowledged any actions for satisfying its receivable and the proper performance of the third parties' obligations.

4) Consequences of non-observance of obligations

Under the consignment contract, both the consignor and the consignee, undertake a number of mutual obligations, which are the body of the contract, as previously examined. Failure to observe any such obligations, from the part of any party, triggers the liability of the party in default. As per

---

[26] In this sence, see, Brasov County Tribunal, civil decision No. 1214/1975, in Revista română de drept No. 4/1976, p. 52.

[27] F.A. Moțiu, Contractele speciale, p. 263.

[28] In this sense, please see, Cristina Popa Nistorescu, Contractul de consignație, in Revista de drept comercial No. 11/2009, p. 115.

[29] R.I. Motica, L. Bercea, Drept comercial român şi drept bancar, volume I, Lumina Lex Printing, Bucharest, 2001, p. 364.

[30] In this sense the old regulation applicable to the consignment contract made stipulations under Article 13(2) of Law No. 178/1934. Nevertheless, upon the consignor's first request, the consignee is bound to notify the debtor the source and the nature of the receivable. In other words, the consignee is bound to exceed its capacity of a simple intermediary, to the extent requested by the consignor. As of the moment the consignee delivers the notification, it will no longer be able to take any valid action with respect to the receivable in question, the rights hereinafter exclusively belonging to the consignor (Article 13(3) of Law No. 178/1934). Prior to the notification or in case the consignee refuses to send the notification, the consignor may seize at any moment the amounts owed in the debtors' hands, without any bail (Article 13(4) of Law No. 178/1934).

the legal provisions in the matter of the consignment contract, such liability may be, as the case may be, civil or criminal.

a) Civil liability

As per the legal provisions relating to the consignment contract which were previously examined, signing the contract presupposes the rise of legal relations between the consignor and consignee, based on which the parties acquire rights and assume reciprocal obligations, appropriate to the quality in which they act under the contract.

The consignment contract is a variety of the contract of commission, hence, as regards the rights and obligations between the consignor and consignee, by analogy, the rules in the matter of the contract of commission shall apply; according to these rules between the principal and consignee there are the same rights and obligations as between the principal and proxy. Accordingly, the relations between the parties to the consignment contract are similar to those specific for the contract of mandate.

Thus, any party's failure to observe the contractual obligations, triggers the contractual liability of the party in default, under the legal terms provided for the contract of mandate[31].

b) Criminal liability

The provisions regarding the criminal liability under the consignment contract found in Law No. 178/1934, which was abrogated since the New Civil Code entered into force, were not taken over by the latter.

§IV. TERMINATION OF THE CONSIGNMENT CONTRACT

1) Cases of termination of the consignment contract

A) General causes for terminating the consignment contract

Termination of the consignment contract may be due to any of the general causes for extinguishing the contractual obligations. Hence, the consignment contract terminates, by the consignee fulfilling the tasks given by the consignor, by the lapse of the term for which the contract was concluded and within which the consignee was bound to fulfil the undertaken tasks, by meeting the resolutive condition affecting the contract, or by fortuitous incapacity of fulfilment, for instance, due to the loss of the movable goods entrusted to the consignee in view of being sold and being object of the contract etc.

B) Main causes for terminating the consignment contract

As regards the main cases for terminating the consignment contract, as per Article 2063 of the New Civil Code, it may be terminated by the consignor rescinding the contract, the consignee renouncing to it, for any of the causes indicated under the contract, and also in case of death, dissolution, bankruptcy, incapacitation or de-registration of the consignor or consignee.

a) Rescindment of the power of attorney granted by the consignor

The consignment contract terminates as a result of the power of attorney granted by the consignor being rescinded. Taking into consideration that the consignor grants the power of attorney, in view of the consignee concluding sale-purchase contracts with respect to the consignor's movable goods given in consignment, it follows that the main interest in entering into contracts with third parties belongs to the grantor of the power of attorney. Thus, although the sale is concluded in its own name by the consignee, the patrimonial advantages it presupposes are reflected on the consignor, as true owner of the affair.

[31] St. D. Cărpenaru, op.cit., p. 590.

Consequently, if the consignor's interest in selling its goods via an intermediary disappears, the consignor is acknowledged the right to revoke the granted power of attorney, which fact leads to the termination of the contract. The consignment contract may not continue if the party interested in performing it or not revokes the right to produce effects in its patrimony by contracting, on its behalf with third parties. This solution is rightful even more since the effects of the contracts with third parties, consisting in the transfer the ownership right over the sold movable goods, consist in transferring the ownership right over the sold movable goods, directly affecting the consignor.

As regards the termination of the contract after the consignor rescinds it, along the arguments relating to the appropriateness of the contract, the right to revoke the power of attorney is also justified by the intuitu personae nature of the legal document. The consignment contract is especially executed based on the consignor's trust in the consignee's experience and professional conduct. Assuming that throughout the contract, this trust is lost,[32], to maintain the contract is no longer justified[33].

The consignment contract, as shown above, displays an onerous nature. This feature may also give rise to the consignee's right to claim damages for the losses suffered as a result of the unexpected or abusive rescindment. The action for damages is the sole right acknowledged to the consignee in case an unexpected or abusive rescindment, the repossession action is not permitted.

The provisions of the New Civil Code expressly establish, as previously mentioned, that the consignor revoking the power of attorney leads to the termination of the contract (Article 2063 of the New Civil Code). A similar conclusion may also be derived from Article 2057(2) thesis II, according to which the consignor may repossess the movable goods entrusted in consignment, at any time, even if the contract was executed for a limited duration.

b) The consignee renouncing the contract

The consignment contract terminates as a result of the consignee renouncing the contract. Equally to the possibility acknowledged to the consignor to revoke the granted power of attorney, the consignee's right to renounce to perform the contract is likewise admitted; this fact leads to the impossibility of continuing with the contract under the terms in which it was initially concluded and consequently, to its termination. The consignee may renounce to the granted power of attorney at any time, subject to the consignor being notified, in order to avoid causing it any losses.

This cause for terminating the consignment contract is expressly regulated by Article 2063 of the New Civil Code, and is motivated by the intuitu personae nature of the contract, which in the absence of the consent from one of the contractual parties to terminate or continue with the contract shall cause the contract to terminate. The consequence of terminating the contract following the consignee's renunciation is that the consignor is bound to promptly repossess the goods entrusted in consignment.

---

[32] For additional explanations, see Claudia Roşu, Contractele de mandat şi efectele lor, p. 103.

[33] In this sense, as per Article 3(2) of Law No. 178/1934, the consignment contract, and more specifically the power of attorney underlying the consignee's possibility to act on behalf of the consignor may be revoked by the consignor at any time after granting it, even if the contract was concluded for a limited period, unless otherwise provided. Thus, irrespective whether the execution of the contract was agreed for a limited or unlimited period, the possibility to revoke the power of attorney is free, may occur at any time, being motivated by the very fact that the execution of the contract directly depends on the consignor's interests, which should come first.

As per Article 2059 of the New Civil Code, if, given the circumstances, the consignor may not promptly repossesses the goods, in case the contract terminates by renunciation from the consignee, it shall remain bound by its obligations to keep, insure and maintain the goods until the consignor is able to repossesses them. Thus, as long as the goods are in the consignee's care, the latter is bound to preserve, insure and maintain them, if for objective reasons the consignor may not repossess the goods.

Nevertheless, the consignor is bound to take any necessary diligence to repossess the goods promptly after the contract is terminated, subject to covering the costs for preservation, storage and maintenance.

c) Death, dissolution, bankruptcy, incapacitation or de-registration of the consignor or consignee

Death, dissolution or de-registration of the consignor or consignee cause the termination of the contract, based on its intuitu personae nature. The consignment contract is executed in consideration of the consignee's experience and capacity to serve the consignor's interests by concluding with third parties sale-purchase contracts regarding its goods, and also in consideration of the consignor's possibilities to satisfy its obligations for paying the remuneration undertaken by contract. In case the other party dies or disappears, the premises which were taken into consideration when the contract was executed disappear.

