With regard to charges having equivalent effect, from community practice it shows that the mandatory level of which no derogation can be made and it is applied in a Member State by forwarding Customs agents was not considered as a tax having equivalent effect to a customs duty within the meaning of the Treaty, if importers can actually choose whether or not to use the services of such persons with the result that the fee is not mandatory for anyone wishing to make a customs declaration[105]. However, although a charge was applied similarly to domestic and imported products, it was considered to be discriminatory if it was intended only to support activities that bring benefits to domestic product[106]. And, in another case[107] in which the tax was imposed on both domestic products and those imported to finance a certain products industry, it was considered that a fee has equivalent effect to a customs duty if three conditions are fulfilled: 1) It has the sole purpose of funding specific activities for the benefit of the domestic product.; 2) the domestic product subject to tax and the domestic product that benefits are the same; 3) taxes imposed on domestic products are collected in full.

Another condition for the existence of the customs union is the adoption of a common customs tariff in their relations with third countries, which is required at Community/EU borders. Any goods that will enter Community/EU territory shall be subject to this tariff, regardless of country of entry.

At the beginning of European integration during the transition period for establishing the common market, Member States declared their readiness to contribute to the development of international trade and the lowering of customs barriers by specific agreements based on reciprocity and mutual benefit, to reduce tariffs below the general level that could beneficiary to them as a result of establishing a customs union between them. These goals were achieved either by agreements with various countries, independently, or in GATT trade rounds throughout time (Dillon, Tokyo, Uruguay).[108]

But the desire for uniform application of Community law materialized by Regulation no.950/68 of the Council of 28 June 1968 which established the Common Customs Tariff, which replaced the tariffs of the Member states. And from 1 January 1988 a new integrated tariff was established and statistical nomenclature system by Council's Regulation no.2658/87. The Combined Nomenclature of the tariff rates are based on integrated tariff, called "Taric", and takes into account the International Convention on the harmonized goods description and coding system adopted by the Customs Cooperation Council and signed by the Community.[109]

Common Customs Tariff nomenclature consists of afore mentioned tax percentages, other relevant taxes, tariff measures and tariff arrangements set out in the community[110], the current

---

[104] These articles deal with the internal transit goods in the Community.

[105] C. 119/92 Comisia c. Italiei, judgment from February 1994, in ECR, 1994, 2, 393 apud Manolache, Treaty, 226.

[106] C. 77/72, Capolongo c. Azienda Agricola Maya, preliminary judgment from 19 June 1973, in ECR, 1973, 1, 611 (quoted in J.Steiner, L.Woods, op.cit., p.143) apud Manolache, Treaty, p.226.

[107] C. 77/76, Fratelli Cucchi Enterprise c. Alvez SpA, preliminary judgment from 25 May 1977, in ECR, 1977, 987 (quoted in J.Steiner, L.Woods, op.cit., pp.143-144) apud Manolache, Treaty,p.226.

[108] See, Manolache, Treaty, p.226.

[109] Manolache, Treaty, p.226-27.

[110] See,P.J. Kapteyn, P. ver Loren van Themaat, op.cit., p.365; W. Cairns, op.cit. pp.227-232; G. Druesne, op.cit., p.550 apud Manolache, Treaty, p.227.

version of the tariff is published annually in the Official Journal. There was also a Community Customs Code, adopted by Regulation no.2913/92 and for its application Regulation no.2454/93 of 2 July 1993 on the implementation of Council Regulation no.2913/92 establishing the Community Customs Code was adopted[111].

It is the responsibility of the Union in order to ensure that the imposition of taxes has a uniform impact on all Member States on trade with non-member States to determine and, if necessary, to change the customs duties and taxes payable on products from those countries[112]. We can deduce that customs duties are the same, without the need to distinguish according to the day of importation, as the Union's external border protection is the same, what distinguishes the customs union of simple free trade area where each member country retains its own customs tariff[113].

Common Customs Tariff does not apply for a Community authority separated standing alone, but by national authorities of the Member States in whose territory the goods enter, acting on behalf of Communities/EU where they are framing the respective tariff classifications. But, according to Article 31 TFEU, the Common Customs Tariff duties are set by the Council on a Commission's proposal.[114]

Also, free movement of goods can be affected not only by imposing customs duties or charges having equivalent effect, but also quantitative restrictions or other measures with equivalent effect or by controlling trade. Expressly prohibited by Articles 34 and 35 TFEU quantitative restrictions on import and export, and also all measures having equivalent effect.

According to specialized literature[115], measures having equivalent effect to quantitative restrictions have been defined by the Commission as any regulations and administrative provisions constituting a barrier to the import or export to be achieved, including those provisions and practices that would be more expensive making the import or export more difficult compared with domestic sales on the domestic market, but discrimination provisions applicable to imports and local products not constituting measures as having equivalent effect to quantitative restrictions.

In this subject Article 36 TFEU establishes the following exception: "The provisions of Articles 34 and 35 shall not preclude prohibitions or restrictions on imports, exports or goods in transit justified on grounds of public morality, public order, public safety, protection of health and life of humans, animals or plants, the protection of national treasures possessing artistic, historic or archaeological value or the protection of industrial and commercial property. However, prohibitions or restrictions shall not constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between Member States".

Furthermore, the EU external trade relations can meet certain unfair practices[116], and among them are dumping practices and subsidies (subsidies), and Regulation no.1225/2009[117], governing the protection against dumping imports from countries not members of the European Union and Regulation no.597/2009[118] on protection against subsidized imports from countries not members of the European Union are relevant in the matter.

---

[111] OJ L 253, 11.10.1993, p.1.

[112] C. 126/94; Aprile Srl c. Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato, preliminary judgment from 5 Octomber 1995, par. 34-37, in ECR, 1995, 9/10 (I), 2950-1 apud Manolache, Treaty, p.228.

[113] In this regard, G. Druesne, op.cit., p.549 apud Manolache, Treaty, p.228.

[114] Manolache, Treaty, p.228-29.

[115] Doc. WQ 64, J. Of. C. 169/12/1967. Prohibition of quantitative restrictions and all measures having equivalent effect applies not only to national measures, but also to measures adopted by Community institutions – C. 114/96, Criminal proceedings against René Kieffer and Romain Thill, preliminary judgment from 25 June 1997, in ECR, 1997, 6 (I), 3630 apud Manolache, Treaty, p.237-38.

[116] See, in detail, Manolache, Treaty, 629 and next. Other unfair practices are obstacles to trade and counterfeiting.

[117] OJ L 343, 22.12.2009, p.51.

[118] OJ L 188, 18.7.2009, p.93.

Conclusions

The phenomenon of international double taxation erodes the development of international economic relations between states, representing a brake on the liberalization of the movement of goods, services, capital and persons.

This phenomenon is found only in cases of direct taxes, and in light of this, according to EU law, direct taxation is for the Member States, the latter must exercise that competence in accordance with EU law. This aspect is certified and resumed constantly by the jurisprudence. Often the best way to avoid this phenomenon is represented by double taxation conventions that eliminate or mitigate the resulting negative effects on the internal market resulting from the coexistence of national tax systems.

As for the relationship between double taxation conventions and European Union law, according the application priority of EU law in the EU, Member States may not convene, by bilateral tax conventions against Union rules. In consequence, European Union law prevails the provisions of the bilateral tax conventions.

However, the Court may not examine the report of a national measure and the provisions of an agreement to avoid double taxation, because the scope of a bilateral tax agreements concluded by Member States is limited to natural or legal persons specified therein.

Today there is no obligation for Member States to effectively eliminate double taxation, bilateral agreements sustain that the States are making sustained efforts to eliminate them. However elimination of double taxation in the European Union represented and represents one of the objectives of the Union.

Through the jurisprudence in the way of taxation, there is a "negative harmonization" manifestation. The Court of Justice of the European Union removes, by law, incompatible national legislation that cannot set up a tax system compatible with the common market; therefore this integration is a negative matter only by abolishing all incompatible systems, without proposing an acceptable alternative.

Nevertheless, the steps taken by now, for example, the directives issued on the basis of subsidiary principle in the field of direct taxation, establishing an arbitration procedure to avoid double taxation, are hailed, under the criticism of priority to safeguard the legal persons to the individuals' loss.

We also consider commendable the European Commission proposal to regulate a common system of calculating the tax base of companies operating in the EU - a common consolidated corporative tax base (CCCTB), which ultimately seeks significant reduction in administrative burden, the compliance costs and legal uncertainty currently faced by EU companies, offering companies a unique set of rules for calculating the tax base and the ability to transmit a single consolidated tax return of a single administration for all activities conducted within the EU. Of course, it remains to follow the implementation of this possible Directive.

Thus, in the contemporary context of liberalization of movement of goods, services, capital and persons, and economic diversification of international financial relations, moving from regional to a global plan of interdependence on the one hand, and in the context of the integration process intensifying the European Union, the European Community - Pillar I, on the other hand, we believe that the management of the double taxation phenomenon in the EU is in the early stages, although European construction has over 50 years since it was established.

References

I. Treaty, momographs, courses
- Brezeanu, Petre; Ilie Şimon and Sorin Celea. European Taxation, (Bucharest, Economic, 2005).
- Brezeanu, Petre. European Finance, (Bucharest, C.H. Beck, 2007).
- Fuerea, Augustin. European Union Manual, (Bucharest, Legal Universe, 2006).
- Gornig, Gilbert, and Ioana Eleonora Rusu. European Union Law, (Bucharest, C. H. Beck, 2007).
- Manolache, Octavian. Community Law Treaty, (Bucharest, C. H. Beck, 2006).
- Moşteanu, Narcisa Roxana. International double taxation, (Bucharest, Didactic and Pedagogic Publishing House, R.A., 2003).
- Nemoianu, Daniela Camelia. "Avoiding double taxation in the context of bringing Romanian legislation to the European Union standards." (PhD Thesis, University of Bucharest, 2005).
- Petroşel, Florin Norocel. "Avoiding double taxation in international relations." (PhD Thesis, University of Bucharest, 2007).
- Postolache, Rada, Financial Law, (Bucharest, C. H. Beck, 2009).
- Şaguna, Dan Drosu and Dan Şova. Tax Law, (Bucharest, C.H. Beck, 2011).
- Şaguna, Dan Drosu and Mihaela Tofan. Financial and fiscal European Law, (Bucharest, C.H. Beck, 2010).
- Scăunaş, Stelian. European Union, (Bucharest, C. H. Beck, 2008).
- Sozza, Guerrino. La fiscalità internazionale, (Milano, Edizioni Fag, 2010).
- Ştefan, Tudorel and Beatrice Andreşan-Grigoriu. Community law, (Bucharest, C. H. Beck, 2007).
- Zdanovschi, Alice Cristina Maria. "International Taxation."(PhD Thesis, University of Bucharest, 2011).

II. Articles, studies
- Banu, Mihai. Note to cause C-376/03, D. c. Inspecteur van de Belastingdienst/Particulieren/Ondernemingen buitenland te Heerlen, Judgment made on the 5 of July 2005, not published, Journal of Romanian Community Law 3 (2006): 133-149.
- Bufan, Radu. "Taxation of transactions with foreign elements (I)." Commercial Law Journal 1 (2005): 167-192.
- Diaconu , Nicoleta. "Tax regulations in the European Union." Commercial Law Journal 2 (2009): 5-12.
- Moise, Raluca. "Freedom of establishment under Community law and direct taxation." Romanian Journal of Community Law 3 (2005): 64-70.
- Lyons, Timothy. "Direct taxation and the Court of Justice: the Virtues of Consistency." Communication presented at the "Community Taxation: Recent Developments and Future Perspectives" Conference, Trier, October 30-31, 2003.
- Ştefan, Elena Emilia. "European Society (I) – (Societas Europaea)." Commercial Law Journal 1 (2007): 105-19.
- Ştefan, Elena Emilia „European Society (II) – (Societas Europaea)." Commercial Law Journal 2 (2007): p.105-18;
- Truichici, Adrian-Milutin. "General considerations in the commercial european society ('Societas Europaea')." Commercial Law Journal11 (2008): p.48-53.
- Zdanovschi, Alice Cristina Maria. "The concept of fiscal sovereignty" Communication presented at the Scientific Session of Teachers of Legal and Administrative Sciences Faculty, Christian University "Dimitrie Cantemir", Bucharest, April 7, 2011.

III. Legislation, jurisprudence
- Case C-298/05: Judgment of the Court (First Chamber) of 6 December 2007 — Columbus Container Services BVBA & Co. v Finanzamt Bielefeld-Innenstadt.
- Cauza C-194/06 Staatssecretaris van Financiën v. Orange European Smallcap Fund NV, judgment made in 20 of may 2008; www.eurlex.eu;
- Cause C-101/05 Skatteverket versus A, judgment made in 18 december 2007; www.eurlex.eu;
- Convention 90/346/CEE on eliminating double taxation connected with the profits adjustments (Arbitration Convention);
- Council Decision no. 468 of 28 June 1999 laying down the procedures for the exercise of implementing powers conferred on the Commission

- Council Directive 90/434/CEE on the common tax regime applied to mergers, divisions, partially transfer of assets and exchanges of shares between the welfare state in different Member States and transfer of the registered office of an SE or SCE between Member States;
- Council Directive 90/435/EEC of 23 July 1990 on the common system of taxation applicable in the case of parent companies and subsidiaries of different Member States
- Council Directive 2003/48/EC of 3 June 2003 on taxation of savings income in the form of interest payments
- Council Directive 2003/49/EC of 3 June 2003 on a common system of taxation applicable to interest and royalty payments made between associated companies of different Member States
- Directive 77/799/CEE concerning mutual assistance by the competent authorities of Member States in direct taxation and taxation of insurance premiums;
- Council Directive 77/308/CEE on the laws of the Member States relating to turnover taxes - common system of value added tax: uniform basis of assessment;
- Council Directive 2006/112/CE on the common system of value added tax;
- Council Directive 2009/47/CE of amending Directive 2006/112/CE with regards to the reduced tax rates on value added tax;
- Council Directive 92/12/CEE of Council in 25 February 1992 concerning the general arrangements for products subject to excise duty and on the holding, movement and monitoring of such products;
- Council Directive 2008/118/CE on the general arrangements for excise duty and repealing Directive 92/12/CEE;
- Council Regulation (EEC) No 2913/92 of 12 October 1992 establishing the Community Customs Code
- Council Regulation (EC) No 1061/2009 of 19 October 2009 establishing common rules for exports
- Council Regulation (EC) No 260/2009 of 26 February 2009 on the common rules for imports (Codified version)
- Council Regulation (EC) No 1225/2009 of 30 November 2009 on protection against dumped imports from countries not members of the European Community
- Council Regulation (EC) No 597/2009 of 11 June 2009 on protection against subsidized imports from countries not members of the European Community (Codified version)
- Press Release, „Towards a single market act - For a highly competitive social economy- 50 proposals to optimize labor, commercial activities and exchanges." - COM(2010) 608, 27.10.2010.
- Romania's Constitution.
- The proposal for a Council Directive concerning on a common consolidated corporate tax base (CCCTB), Bruxelles, 16.3.2011, COM(2011) 121 final, 2011/0058 (CNS)
- Treaty on European Union;
- Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union;
- Treaty establishing the European Community;

IV. Internet

- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/ro/treaties/dat/12006/pdf/ce00020090212ro00010331.pdf,
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=OJ:C:2010:083:0361:0388:RO:PDF,
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=CONSLEG:1990L0434:20070101:EN:PDF,
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/Notice.do?mode=dbl&lang=en&lng1=en,ro&lng2=bg,cs,da,de,el,en,es,et,fi,fr,hu,it,lt,lv,mt,nl,pl,pt,ro,sk,sl,sv,&val=615635:cs&page=1&hwords=CCCTB~,
- http://europa.eu/rapid/pressReleasesAction.do?reference=MEMO/11/171&format=HTML&aged=0&language=en&guiLanguage=en,
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=CONSLEG:1990L0434:20070101:EN:PDF,
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=CONSLEG:1990L0435:20070101:EN:PDF,
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=CONSLEG:1976L0308:20040501:RO:PDF,
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=CONSLEG:2006L0112:20110101:EN:PDF,
- www.eurlex.eu.

THE RIGHT TO A FAIR TRIAL

FLORICA BRASOVEANU[1]

Abstract

Among the general rights of the citizen on finds the free access to justice, the rights to defense and the right to legal security. The jurisprudence based on principles of law and on international treaties, caused the appearance, along the constitutional protection provided by default by a lawyer, of the need of fair and equitable procedures to ensure a balance in the rights of the parties.

Today the right to a fair trial is a fundamental right most frequently invoked in front of Romanian courts, as in complaints to the European Court of Human Rights.

This study is intended as a guide of the most important solutions that have been promoted to ensure the protection of the right to a fair trial with all the guarantees that are involved, starting with the right of access to justice and ending with the right to adversarial proceedings.

Keywords: fundamental Rights, fair trial, access to justice, the European Court of Human Rights, the fundamental principle.

Introduction

In modern law, the possibility for citizens to appeal to the court, in order to achieve their legitimate rights and interests is the establishment of rights - guarantees.

The present study deals with the fundamental principle of criminal law issues, namely the principle of fair trial rights.

Such reference is made to all persons involved in legal work: judges, who must ensure the rights of parties to proceedings; lawyers, which have to represent and defend their clients, the justice seekers, who must be aware of their rights of the in judicial proceedings.

This article is intended to represent a theoretical study of the fundamental human right to a fair trial, it is dotted with a number of examples of judicial practice - criminal of the European Court of Human Rights or of national courts.

To achieve the paper we analyzed a series of books and magazines appeared in the doctrine of specialists in our country and abroad, and will concur or not the views expressed within them.

With one subject exhaustively analyzed, in competence by renowned authors in treaties and magazines, trying to move something from what has been said so far or to add something to the already accumulated scientific heritage in the field, it might seem daring. It is no less an exciting scientific experience which we do not understand to evade from.

Procedural guarantees field is practically infinite, so that comprehensive coverage is a work far beyond the ambitions of this study,that, as I indicated from the beginning, proposed to present in a rather general way, the most important issues involved by the European Convention on human Rights in material procedural guarantees in criminal procedural law in our country.

In our opinion, despite the unanimous belief, the Roman legal system suffers, in terms of guaranteeing the right to a fair trial, a lack of regulation. There are many institutions in which those regulations are either nonexistent or insufficient, or set at a level too general, without involving specific provisions regarding the incidence of general provisions.

Such an issue we meet in the matter of the right to silence which is treated in such a manner by the legal text that is difficult to enforce the judicial bodies to give them due importance[2].

---

[1] Assistant Lecturer Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, „Ovidius" University, Constanta (e-mal; floriordache@yahoo.com).

[2] Damaschin, Mircea, The right to a fair trial in criminal matters, (Ed. Universul Juridic, 2009)

We must not forget that the presumption of innocence is hardly regulated, our law lacking any reference to the sanction for non-compliance or the need for the the respect of the presumption by all state bodies, especially in their relations with the press. Also essential principles of due process related to a person's right to attend his own trial, procedural equality of arms, etc.. benefit only by rules with absolute general nature, lacking any reference to the remedies against such conditions or warranties visible to ensure compliance of principles that seem thrown somewhere in the first articles of the constitution or procedure codes.

Also, taking advantage in a good measure of the lack of regulations, not even practical application, at the courts or the prosecution, of the existing rules of procedure doesn't seem to be, with the necessary exceptions, to required quality standards. I Remind you that we had several convictions at Strasbourg for lack of motivation of court orders or refusing to enforce court orders, situations that tend to become endemic in our judicial system. In addition, the feeling that I had many times on the solutions offered by the courts, including those rendered by appeals on points of law, is that the judges seem rather inclined to do anything possible to not judge a cause , looking incredibly excited when succeding to reject a case as inadmissible, forgetting that access to justice is an essential element of a democratic state.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is one of the sources of the current Romanian law and an important source of information for the Constitutional Court who must rule on the conformity of law with the Constitution, the Declaration, treaties, covenants and conventions Romania is part to.

The base of freedom, justice and peace in the world is recognizing the inherent dignity of all human family members and their equal and inalienable rights.

The principle of "equality of arms" means equal treatment of parties throughout the proceedings in the courts, without any of them to be advantaged relative to other party or parties in the process. This principle, in fact, is only one element of the broader concept of "fair", one of the guarantees relating to the proper conduct of the judicial process which aims to strike a balance between litigants.

Article 6 of the Convention does not require a specific form of how the accused must be informed of the nature and causes of the accusation against him.

Specialized legal literature emphasized that the right of defense has two meanings: one material, which comprises the whole complex of rights and procedural guarantees that ensure parties can defend their rights, and other formal providing parties with the right to benefit by a defender.

The Article 6, paragraph 3, letter. c of the Convention guarantees any "accused" can defend the charge they face in three ways: the accused can defend himself, may be assisted by a lawyer of his choice or may have the free assistance of a defender .

The right of the accused to defend himself should not be confused with his personal presence in court.[3] As underlined by the European Court, even if not expressly mentioned in art. 6 of the Convention, the right to take part personally in the proceedings of his trial results from the object of this text: right to a fair trial. Thus, if the defendant has the opportunity and the case is not part of the very serious cases that require a legal representative, they may represent themselves About the right of the accused to be assisted by a lawyer of his choice, the Court held that it is a key element of a fair trial.

According to the provisions of the Convention, the right of defendants to free legal assistance occurs when the accused can not defend themselves or is not entitled to pay a lawyer. Thus, the Convention recognizes the right to free legal assistance, assistance that will be provided by an appointed lawyer when the interests of good administration of justice requires the presence of counsel. Also, according to the European Convention, longer guarantees of a fair trial are the right not to be trialed or punished twice for the same offense, and the right not to be punished for an act that was not an offense when committed Irregularities in the conduct and settlement of the case always must be punished and always who suffered should be entitled to compensation.

[3] Renucci Jean Francois, Treaty of European human rights law, (Ed. Hamangiu, Bucuresti, 2009)

Article no. 6, paragraph 1 of European Convention on Human Rights established the elements of a fair trial which is "good guarantees justice". Thus the publicity is required as a separate provision of a fair trial, : every person is entitled to it publicly.

In this respect the European Convention on Human Rights is a guide for courts in Romania in their obligation to respect the principle of publicity that is found in the Code of Civil Procedure, art. 121 and the Code of Criminal Procedure Art. 290.

According to Article 121 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "the meetings are public, except for cases when the law provides otherwise. The court may order that discussions take place in camera, if public discussion could harm public order or morality or in parts. The parties may be accompanied, in addition to their defenders, by maximum two people designated by them. Judgment is always delivered in public. "Article no. 290 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that "the hearing is public. Minors under 16 may not attend the hearing. If the judgement in open court could harm state interests, morals, dignity or private life of a person, the court, at the prosecutor's, the parties request or ex officio, declare the secret meeting for all or for a specific part of the trial case.

In open court after hearing the parties and the prosecutor, when it participates in court,the judge can declare that it is public session.

When the meeting is secret none other than the parties, their representatives, advocates and other persons called by the court in the interest of the case are allowed in the courtroom . "

According to The European Convention on Human Rights, the principle of public proceedings is not absolute, national authorities are allowed to take into account the imperatives of efficiency and economy.[4]

On court orders, the 6th article provides that they must be pronounced publicly. Judicial practice of the courts of Romania is firm in that the failure of this rule expressly contained in the Article 121, paragraph 3, C.proc.civ. art.310 and the Code of Criminal Procedure., is a violation of the principle of publicity and is punishable by revocation.

Article no. 290, para. 4 provides that "during the time the meeting is secret, none other are permitted in the courtroom but the parties, their representatives, advocates and other persons called by the court in the interest of the case."

According to art.328 Code of Criminal Procedure "when the secret meeting was arranged all throughout the process, each witness, after being heard, will be asked to leave the room, but remain near to the court room."

According to the article no. 6 of the Convention the courts have to motivate their decisions, but this obligation should not be understood as meaning that they must respond in detail to process each argument of the parties.

Analysing the provisions of Article 6 of European Convention on Human Rights, which envisage a fair trial, it is clear that they relate to certain requirements without which the process is not fair[5]. Thus, free access to an independent and impartial tribunal, both in the trial and settlement of criminal law and taking any coercive action on the rights and freedoms is required. The first requirement is provided during our criminal process, because only a court is entitled to jurisdiction, to apply the punishment to offenders. Also in Romania, there is a separation between the the prosecution function, exercised by a prosecutor who brings the suspect before the court and the office of jurisdiction exercised by the court, who judgez and finally resolves the conflict of criminal law, the punishment can be applied only by the court.

[4] Galea R., Regulation of remedies for excessive length of judicial proceedings - paper presented at the Conference of 10 years anniversary of the entry into force of the European Convention on Human Rights in Romania, (Bucuresti, 2008);

[5] Chirita, Radu, The right to a fair trial, (Ed. Universul Juridic, 2008).

In connection with the requirements referred to in Article 6 paragraph 1 of the Convention, the European Court of Human Rights has a well crystallized and constant practice, which offers a full array of legal situations, which can be checked by the domestic courts in about each of the three elements that make up the structure of the Convention requirement expressed in this regard, namely: i) the tribunal established by law, ii) independent tribunal, iii) impartial tribunal.

Heads of claim of action have to be considered , but also the reasons formulated throughout remedies exercised by the parties, the differences between Contracting States concerning the sources of law, differences relating to the presentation and drafting judgments. Judges should always indicate with sufficient clarity the reasons underlying its decision because it is the only way, for example, a defendant may exercise remedies under domestic law.

The purpose of a Criminal trial is to help to defend the rule of law[6], the person, defending their rights and freedoms, but also to educate people in the spirit of compliance, it is necessary that the penalty imposed to offenders intervene as close to the date of the offense. It is how the general interest of society is satisfied - the immediate criminal repression as a means of general prevention, but also prevent criminals to continue criminal activity, on the other hand, the private interest of the victim and the defendants to know as soon as possible the outcome of the process; any extension of the process over a reasonable period, even if the correct solution would be adopted, and l loses its repressive educational role that it should have.

Conclusions

We started this study in the introductory part from the idea that the existence of procedural guarantees is the trunk the whole scaffolding that supports the rule of law institutions stands on. The good Function of the procedural guarantees such as the respect of the right to a fair trial, the existence of a real justice is what characterizes a state built on the model of Western democracy[7], as Romania is proclaimed by the very art. 1 of its Constitution. At the end of the study the question whether Romania is a state of law.

We present, therefore, in the lines below, in very general, the most important findings of our study mainly related to the current situation in Romanian law, followed by an opinion on the compliance of rules of a due process in Romania.

We believe that in light of all stated throughout this study, Romania is not a state of law, but the road there seems very long

Perhaps this conclusion may seem harsh, but it is the answer to several questions which, naturally, would not even be able to be made in early 2008, in a Romania which stands as a European country: why Romania the nation with the most complaints brought before the Court, after Russia? Why Romania is by far the state with the largest number of complaints per capita introduced in court? Why Romania is in select company of Russia, Ukraine and Moldova, among the States in which there is a constant denial of public institutions, established by the Court to enforce final judgment? Why Romania is the only state in Eastern Europe that has huge waves of complaints in relation to the issue of nationalized houses? Why Romania is, along with Turkey, Bulgaria and Russia, the State that begins to have increasingly more problems in court regarding the lack of effective investigation? Why Romania is a European Union country where confidence in justice is the lowest, according to reliable barometer made by the Community institutions in November 2007? Why is the Romanian state constantly threatened by the clause of safeguard on the problems of justice ? Why did the last flags of integration aim at independence of the judiciary? Why Roman judgments do not benefit from automatic recognition in other EU countries?

[6] G. Theodoru, Criminal Procedure Law Treaty, ediția a 2-a, (Ed. Hamangiu, București, 2008);

[7] Stanciu Roxana, The enforcement and the right to a fair trial in ECHR jurisprudence, Ed. (Hamangiu, 2011)

Questions are obviously rhetorical. In fact, in our opinion, despite the bombastic affirmation of the need to protect fundamental rights, neither state institutions nor the executive nor the legislative, nor the court, appear to put too much value on compliance. Beyond the fault represented by activity - rather, the lack of activity - the legislative and executive bodies, I think a lot of responsibility for this situation belongs to the Romanian judicial system, despite the lack of regulations that others would have had to provide the magistrate , the court system is that who, after all, refuses to grant the necessary protection rights and fundamental freedoms, respecting the procedural guarantees that accompany these rights.

References

- Chirita Radu, European Convention on Human Rights, vol. I, (Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucuresti, 2007);
- Chirita Radu, The Right to a Fair Trial, (Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2008);
- Corneliu Barsan, European Convention on Human Rights. Comments by article. Volumul I – Rights and Freedoms, (Ed. CH Beck, Bucuresti, 2005);
- Galea R., Regulation of remedies for excessive length of judicial proceedings - paper presented at the Conference of 10 years anniversary of the entry into force of the European Convention on Human Rights in Romania, (Bucuresti, 2008);
- Lazerges C., La presumption d''innocence, in Libertes et droits fondamentaux, (Editura Dalloz, 10e edition, Paris, 2004);
- Miga Raluca Besteliu Brumar Catrinel, International protection of human rights, (Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2007);
- Predescu Ovidiu, Mihail Udroiu, European Convention on Human Rights and Romanian criminal trial, (Ed. CH Beck, Bucuresti, 2007);
- Renucci Jean Francois, Treaty of European human rights law, (Ed. Hamangiu, Bucuresti, 2009);
- G. Antoniu, N. Volonciu, N. Zaharia, Dictionary of Criminal Procedure, (Ed. Ştiinţifică şi Enciclopedică, Bucureşti, 1988);
- G. Theodoru, Criminal Procedure Law Treaty, ediția a 2a, (Ed. Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2008);
- Popa I. , Treaty on the profession of judge in Romania, (Editura Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2007).
- Mock H., Le droit a un process equitable en matiere civile, in Revue trimestrielle des droits de l'homme, 1995.
- Volonciu Magda, Considerations on the system degrees of Romanian criminal jurisdiction, in Revista de drept penal nr. 2/1995.
- Anechitoae, Constantin, Elements of international law. Course Notes, (Ed. Bren, Bucuresti, 2010).
- Anechitoae, Constantin, The geopolitics of maritime activities.Protection of the elements of the marine environment. Course Notes , Ed. Bren, Bucuresti, 2005.
- Anechitoae, Constantin, Introduction to intellectual property law. 6th Edition . (Bucureşti: Editura BREN, 2011).
- Bogdan, Dragos, The Fair civil trial in ECHR jurisprudence. Vol II. Equity stricto-sensu (Ed. Rosetti International, 2011).
- Damaschin, Mircea, The right to a fair trial in criminal matters, (Ed. Universul Juridic 2009).
- Stanciu Roxana, The enforcement and the right to a fair trial in ECHR jurisprudence, (Ed. Hamangiu,2011).

EUROPEAN POLICY CONCERNING THE PROTECTION OF THE QUALITY OF THE ENVIRONMENTAL FACTOR - WATER

FLORICA BRASOVEANU[*]
ALEXANDRU PETRU LISIEVICI BREZEANU[]

Abstract
European Union environmental policy, as was established in the EC Treaty aims at ensuring environmental sustainability activities through its inclusion in EU sectoral policies, by developing measures to prevent by following the basic principles of sustainable development and by taking joint responsibilities.
Environmental legislation is one of those tools that combine management of natural resources with the prevention and control of the pollution. These laws attempt to prevent, or at least limit the effects of environmental degradation caused by the phenomenon of pollution. Environmental legislation should primarily be flexible in the sense to allow the fulfillment of current and the future goals in order to stimulate sustainable development concept and to base on general criteria for the purposes of allowing the extension to complex environmental problems. The environmental legislation is due to focus on integrating the source - effect policy , that is to focus on regulations for issuing permits for pollution, but also the responsibility of companies and citizens.
Despite the significant improvements that have occurred especially in reducing air and water pollution, European legislation should be developed further. It is true that there are still many points that require completion and perfection, but the path followed is the best. In the European Union the process of implementation and adoption of new regulations on environmental protection (regulations, directives, decisions,recommendations) to combat the causes of degradation of environmental quality and life quality time with them continues.

Keywords: environmental protection, sustainable development, environmental policy, environmental law, pollution.

Introduction

Among the many problems that people are going to face at the beginning of this century and millennium, there is that of degradation of environmental quality. Life needed resources worryingly decline and the direct consequences that any citizen feels is soon to come. Environmental degradation today affects safety tomorrow.

In recent decades it was found that most countries in transition are facing serious environmental problems caused by an economy based on excessive consumption of energy and natural resources, the use of polluting and obsolete technologies. For these reasons, the present study aims at presenting concepts, practices and solutions taken at Community level, to highlight the important role both in the European Union environmental policy and the way in which our country has complied with Community objectives.

Emphasis was placed on the environment factor water, because in my opinion, it is the most endangered, with an important impact on human health and beyond.

The role of this study is to show the public how European legislation in the pre-accession period was transposed, especially given the lack of information on national level, almost non-existent in pre-accession period. As a suggestion which I consider founded our country's citizens not only have the right but the obligation to know the regulations concerning environmental protection, but the absence of informative publications deepen the population in a deep ignorance.

[*] Assistant Lecturer Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, „Ovidius" University, Constanta (email: floriordache@yahoo.com).

[] Assistant Lecturer Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, „Ovidius" University, Constanta (email: floriordache@yahoo.com).

Ensuring adequate quality of environment, protection of the necessity of survival and progressing, is a matter of interest. This calls for appropriate regulation of human activities to mitigate adverse environmental impacts. Without proper legislation, to establish clear obligations to do and not do, perhaps the world would be today a much higher state of degradation. The need to protect the environment calls for a set of rules by which to avoid the causes of environmental degradation and thus to eliminate the negative consequences of human activities.

The transposition of European directives in the field of environmental protection, Romania adopted new laws and standards for this sector. Although expensive and demanding, their implementation is a radical change in national policy and approach on environmental protection. Also, extensive restructuring in industry and agriculture, reduction and extraction activities and the use of solid materials, among others, have contributed to environmental improvement.

Content

Considering the fact that before 1990, in Romania environmental legislation was not taken into account, our country was seriously affected. As a result of industrialization and unsustainable agricultural development coupled with lack of interest in the political system on environmental issues, natural environment in Romania was characterized by a high level of emissions into air and the water, the degradation of land due to agricultural waste, industrial and municipal.

Consequently, after 1990, a rapid recovery from this point of view was impossible. Considering these circumstances, our country's effort to reduce environmental degradation is admirable. Merit goes to the large influence the European Union had, as Romania was forced to adopt European policies in this area.

After 1995, when new environmental legislation came into force, Romania has adopted a series of sectoral strategic documents and rules to take into account the principles of sustainable development. These strategies include conclusions and recommendations of the European strategies of sustainable development and of the 6th Environmental Action Programme, to ensure conservation, protection and improve the environment and human health.

Since the beginning Romania needed major investments in the sector and to strengthen the administrative capacity to transpose and implement environmental acquis for the environment. In the early years of European Union accession process, our country progress in the transposition of European legislation in this area was unsatisfactory. Approximation step up in 2001 was quite slow. Thus, in 2005 there were still problems regarding the administrative capacity of environmental authorities. Since 2002, the step of approximating European legislation has increased considerably, so that in 2006 considerable progress was made[1]

The new European dimension requires as a key condition the better quality of environment. Although during the accession process Romania has made considerable progress in terms of legislation in this sector many efforts and resources are still required to meet the standards imposed by the European Union.After negotiations of Chapter 22 - Environment, have been granted transition periods for some areas that require the compliance efforts, including water supply, rehabilitation or construction of wastewater treatment plants, which could not be implemented until the accession date.

After analyzing the main issues the European population is facing and the main directives regulating environmental protection of this factor, we presented not only the crucial importance that these legal instruments give, but also the risks that the world is imenaced by. Besides finding the importance of drinking water supply of population and wastewater treatment plants, the destructive effect of this environmental factor, an effect which is closely related to climate change is analyzed.

[1] Stefan Traca, Treaty of environmental law, (Ed. Lumina Lex , Bucharest, 2010).

Environmental issues are one of the fundamental policies that concern the international community's quality of life in general and especially the European one.So lately two specific trends in terms of environmental protection and water quality were noticed.

First, international and internal law have seen a number of improvements (amend, repeal) corresponding to the evolution on multiple levels of economic factors and secondly, we can say that the last period was characterized by a laborious activity of development of organisms that can influence directly environmental factors, among which water.

What characterizes this whole set of measures adopted by the UN structures and other international organizations, hence the European community, is to increase the requirements for environmental protection by increasing the share of mandatory rules of creating an appropriate framework of environmental protection, current and future problem of humanity. Integral part of these measures, national and Community regulations on water environmental factor, play a crucial part, considering that this give-the resources of human existence.

It is obvious that EU environmental legislation on water quality protection sets high standards in terms of environmental factors, mainly due to its importance. The path taken is obviously the best, with European Directives protecting the water quality containing important regulations relating primarily to protect human health and integrity and then aquatic ecosystems. Evolution of European legislation in this area is truly appreciated, the only thing that requires some criticism being the some small gaps in the legislation that basically refer to examples and regulation of the use of certain dangerous substances. Since technology is constantly developing, this is obviously difficult to do, and the establishment of limit values of the substances can be achieved by numerous studies on individual substances.

Oceans and seas can not be managed without cooperation with third countries and not in multilateral forums. European Union policy on oceans must be developed in this international context.

If Europe is to face the challenge of finding a better relationship with the oceans, not only the industry will need to innovate, but also those policy makers. We should consider a new approach to the management of seas and oceans, not only focus on what people can draw from the oceans, nor one that looks at the oceans and seas in a purely sectoral but one which regards it as a whole. [2]

So far our policies on maritime transport, industry, coastal regions, offshore energy and other relevant areas have been developed separately. Of course, we tried to ensure that their impact on each other was taken into account. But no one looked for more links between them. No one examined in a systematic manner how these policies could be combined to reinforce each other. Fragmentation can result in the adoption of conflicting measures, which in turn could have negative consequences on the marine environment, or impose disproportionate restrictions on competing maritime activities.

Moreover, fragmentation of decision-making process makes it difficult to understand the potential impact of a set of activities upon another. It prevents us from exploring unused synergies between different sea sectors. Now is time to bring all these elements together and create a new vision for managing our relationship with the oceans. This will require new ways of designing and implementing policies at local, national and EU level and internationally, through the external dimension of our internal policies.

In this study we focused on the need for urban waste water collection and treatment, which appears in many data from the European Environment Agency and the national plan of the Ministry of Environment.

In developing this study we aimed primarily to highlight the importance of European Union's role in solving global environmental problems, and last but not least, as a personal opinion, I find it unacceptable, that evev now, our country's citizens are not sufficiently informed regarding the influence of European policy.

[2] Jaann Carmine, Stacy D. VanDeveer, EU enlargement and environmental protection.

Also from personal experience, I believe the Government Decision no. 1076 of 2004 on the procedure for carrying out environmental assessment for plans and programs, provides too long terms, accounting for up to 6 months to obtain the environmental permit. The legislature probably had in mind when stating these terms that the interested subjects (population, institutions, NGOs, etc.), show their opinions and / or give suggestions to be considered subsequently by authorized bodies in the field[3], to what I totally agree. However, one should not ignore, that, because of these terms, many subjects wishing to access European funds, especially for projects in agriculture and animal husbandry have finally found out that they could not beat deadlines, thus losing the material support and must give up such projects. This was among the reasons for which Romania has been criticized as not having managed to access but a small part of European funds. For these reasons, I believe that it is important to change this decision by the Government in terms of shrinking the waiting periods.

Despite the small criticism that I think are quite objective, our country's progress in pre-accession period, I believe that Romania is on the right road in terms of environmental legislation. Although Romanian legislation in this sector requires many additions, I am keeping my optimism regarding the idea that we will achieve the objective required.

I think that all measures that I mentioned would be fully effective if supported by an extensive program to educate people at all levels to form an ecological consciousness.

Groundwater supplies about one third of world population. Unsustainable exploitation of water resources raises concerns. Groundwater extraction in quantities greater than nature's ability to renew reserves is widespread in some regions of the Arab peninsula, China, India, Mexico, former USSR and the USA. In some cases, surface waters decrease from 1 to 3 meters annually. In a world where 30-40% of agricultural production comes from irrigated land, this is a serious problem for food security. Already there is a fierce national competition in the water for irrigation and current production in some parts of the world, which will worsen with increasing population. Today, the Middle East and North Africa are most affected by the issue of water and sub-Sahara region of Africa will cleave these countries in half a century once its population increases by two or even three times.

Lack of drinking water is not the only problem. Use of fertilizers and chemical pollution threaten water quality and human health. Over a fifth of the fish in clean water are already in danger due to pollution or changing settlements.

The next serious problem is that over 1 billion people lack access to safe drinking water, while half of humanity lacks such sanitation systems. In many developing countries, rivers in cities are a bit cleaner than sewers. Health impact is devastating.

Dirty water and poor sewage systems cause 80% of all diseases in developing countries. Annual mortality is over 5 million, 10 times the average number of people killed during the war every year. Over half the victims are children. No other measure would do more to reduce disease and save lives in developing countries than providing clean water and proper sewage systems for all.

International waters have always been an important area for the life of human communities. In these conditions professional activities gradually developed, which were combined with, in a continuous ascent, scientific concerns, all having an important role in the establishment of habits, but also in the development of specific legal rules for professions that have their place of business in coastal land area, or even in river waters, seas and oceans[4].

The evolution of technology in the contemporary period does that the new conditions of use of marine areas (the complexity and diversity that have: fishing, aquaculture, shipping, oil resources) require international cooperation as the only guarantee of optimizing all activities.

---

[3] Daniela Marinescu, Environmental law treaty, (Ed.Universe, Bucharest,2010).
[4] Constantin Anechitoae, Elements of international law, (Ed. Bren, Bucuresti, 2010).

Based on these realities, the EU related scientific and technological research of marine areas to its overall objectives of political, economic and social. We started from the thesis that oceans and marine environment in general guarantee the preservation and the continuity of life on earth and from the need for global management of these areas to ensure a sustainable balance between use and protection.

The tremendous amount of pollution, overpopulation and population movements to coastal areas, over-exploitation of fish resources, the dramatic decrease of marine resources necessary to life, progressive degradation of coastal areas and major climate change, represent a warning to justify more concerted action by all countries of the world.

Conclusions

Contrary to previous assertions, seas and oceans ability to absorb harmful substances, is really limited, so that residues of any kind, discharged even a single country, entering the global ocean circulation and sea space may end up being toxic and without life for all countries. There you have sufficient reasons for strong measures to counter the individual exploration of common resources, belonging to all mankind to be taken, thus justifying the development of this study.

Establishing a new legal, economic and moral order about the space marine, must contribute to promoting justice and equity in use of resources and the marine environment, with care and respect for the principle of solidarity with future generations in a sustainable development. At present European initiatives in maritime science and technology are scattered, so a European or even global coordination, the creation of an International Agency oceans and seas is required, which should dictate the direction of marine science and technology activity.

Scientific research faces a problem with extreme complexity so that multi-disciplinary approach and creating conditions for integrated management of oceans, seas and coastal areas, through the participation at acts of decision of all actors and particularly governments and civil society are fundamental.

The Ministerial Conference of the World Water Forum, which met in March 2000, recommended a series of real obligations on water and sanitation.

To stop the unsustainable exploitation of water resources, we need water management strategies at national and local levels. They must include structures that promote equity and efficiency. We need a "blue revolution" in agriculture, which aims to increase productivity per unit of water - "more crop per drop" - along with better water management and flood. But none of these campaigns will not take place without public awareness and outreach, to inform people about the extent and causes of the crisis of water. In conclusion, whatever the method adopted for maintaining water quality, act pro aqua ... Pro Vita.

References

- Ernest Lupan, Environment Law, (Ed. Lumina Lex, Bucuresti, 2007);
- Ernest Lupan, Environment protection Dictionary, (Ed. Lumina Lex, Bucureşti, 1997);
- Mircea Dutu, Environmental Law Treaty, (Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucuresti, 2007);
- Daniela Marinescu, Environmental Law Treaty, (Ed. All Beck, Bucuresti, 2003);
- Dumitru Mazilu, Community Law of Environment, (Ed. Lumina Lex, Bucuresti, 2006);
- Barzea Cezar, Policies and Institutions of EU, (Editura Corint, Bucureşti, 2001).
- Conferința Interguvernamentală pentru aderarea la Uniunea Europeană - Document de poziție al României, Capitolul 22 - Protecția mediului înconjurător.
- Darie Nicolae, EU. Construction. Institutions. Law. Joint policies. Development, (Editura Matrix Rom, Bucureşti, 2001).
- Convention on environmental impact assessment in cross-border context, adopted at Espoo on 25th February 1991;

- Convention on the access to information, public participation to the decision making process and the access to justice in environmental issues, Aarhus, 25.06.1998;
- Romanian Government Decision on the free access to environment information, no. 115/2002;
- O.U. NR. 195 of 2005 on environment protection, amended;
- O.U. NR. 152 of 2005 on integrated pollution prevention and control.
- IPCC The Physical Science Basis, cap.II, Changes in Atmospheric Constituents and în Radiative Forcing.
- Kiss Alexander Charles, Droit International de l'environnement, (Paris, Editura A.Pedone, 2000).
- Constantin Anechitoae, Introduction to maritime international law, Editia a IV-a. Note de curs, (Ed. Bren, Bucuresti, 2011).
- Constantin Anechitoae, Elements of international law, (Ed. Bren, Bucuresti, 2010).
- Stefan Traca, Treaty of environmental law, (Ed. Lumina Lex , Bucharest, 2010).
- Daniela Marinescu, Environmental law treaty, (Ed.Universe, Bucharest, 2010).
- Jaann Carmine, Stacy D. VanDeveer, EU enlargement and environmental protection. (Institutional Change and Environmental Policy in Central and Eastern Europe), (Ed. Arc, 2009).
- Mirela Gorunescu, Crimes against the environment, (Ed. All Beck Bucharest, 2011).

THE MANIFESTATION OF THE EUROPEAN CENTRAL BANK'S LEGAL PERSONALITY AT NATIONAL, EUROPEAN AND INTERNATIONAL LEVEL

MONICA ŞAGUNA*

Abstract
The European Central Bank is one of the world' s most important central banks, responsible for the monetary policy covering the 17 member States of the Eurozone. Established by the European Union in 1998, it was given the exclusive right to authorize the issue of banknotes within the European Union. The European Central Bank has legal personality under public international law. As article 282, paragraph 3 of the Treaty on functioning of the European Union and article 9, paragraph 1 of the Statute of the European System of Central Banks and of the European Central Bank states, the European Central Bank and the National Central Banks enjoy their own legal personality. The European Central Bank, given its important role in the economic integration, is the single institution of the European Union which has legal personality. This is a premise for it to fulfill its objectives. In this framework, the purpose of my paper is to analyze the effects of the European Central Bank's legal personality from a complete perspective: at national, European and international level. Therefore the objectives of my study are: an introspection in the concept of legal personality, the identification of the reason why it was entrusted to a single institution of the European Union and a detailed analyze of the effects of the European Central Bank' s legal personality.

Keywords: legal personality, effects, national level, european level, international level.

1. Introduction

My paper covers the concept of legal personality in relation with one of the most important institutions of the European Union, the European Central Bank. The concept will be analyzed from a complete point of view: at national, European and international level.

The importance of the study lays in the fact that The European Union is certainly the most prominent scheme of international economic integration and the European Central Bank was created as one of its essential institutions and, more than that, it is the single institution of the European Union which was entrusted with legal personality.

On January 1, 1999, the European Central Bank became one of the most powerful European Union Institutions, affecting the lives of all people living in the member states of the Euro-Zone, as the monetary policy in the euro area has been delegated to it.

Therefore, the reason for what it was entrusted with legal personality should be in close relation with its important functions, aspect which will be clarified among the pages of the study and appears as the main objective of my study. The other two objectives are: to fully understand the concept of legal personality and to analyze its manifestation at national, European and international level.

In order to answer at these objectives I will start by understanding what legal personality means at national and international level, having this understood I will try to reveal why it was entrusted to a single institution of the European Union – the European Central Bank, and afterwards, approaching step by step to the final objective, how it is manifested in practice.

Therefore, in order to answer to these objectives, I will divide my paper in four sections:

- The legal personality at national level;
- The legal personality at international level;

* Ph. D. candidate at "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, (email: angra121@yahoo.com).

- The European Central Bank as a European institution with legal personality;
- The manifestation of the European Central Bank's legal personality

The existent specialized literature has debated this subject, but this paper will present the concept of central bank legal personality from a complete point of view, starting from the concept, revealing why the European Central Bank was designed in this way and including the practical aspects, meaning the way central banking legal personality is manifested.

2.Paper content

The legal personality at national level

In 1928, about 80 years ago, Bryant Smith judged that "to be a legal person is to be the subject of rights and duties". A very short definition but concise and still available nowadays, if we consider the different legislations of the members of the European Union or even of the world's. To confer legal rights or to impose legal duties, therefore, is to confer legal personality.[1]

Whatever the controversies about the "essential nature" of legal personality, there seems to be a uniform concurrence in these as respectively the test of its existence in a given subject, and the manner in which is conferred, whether upon a natural person or upon an intimate thing.

Among definitions to be found in discussion of the subject, perhaps the most relevant and common is the capacity for legal relations.

The legal personality (also known as artificial personality, juridical personality and juristic personality) is the characteristic of a non-living entity regarded by law to have the status of personhood.

A legal person (Latin: persona ficta) (also artificial person, juridical person, juristic person, and body corporate, also commonly called a vehicle) has a legal name and has rights, protections, privileges, responsibilities, and liabilities under law, just as natural persons (living beings) do. Natural persons are distinct from juridical persons. The concept of a legal person is a fundamental legal fiction. It is pertinent to the philosophy of law, as is essential to laws affecting a corporation (corporations law) (the law of business associations).

Legal personality allows one or more natural persons to act as a single entity (a composite person) for legal purposes. In many jurisdictions, legal personality allows such composite to be considered under law separately from its individual members or shareholders. They may sue and be sued, enter contracts, incur debt, and own property. Entities with legal personality may also be subjected to certain legal obligations, such as the payment of taxes. An entity with legal personality may shield its shareholders from personal liability[2].

The European Convention on Human Rights extends fundamental human rights also to legal persons, which can file applications with the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg in case of a violation by one of the 47 signatory states.

The legal personality at international level

From the international point of view, International legal personality refers to entities endowed with rights and obligations under public international law. The term includes both human and non-human entities. Generally, international legal entities are states, international organizations, nongovernmental organizations, and to a limited extent private individuals and corporations within a state.

---

[1] Bryant Smith, Yale Law Journal, no. 3, January 1928

[2] The Juristic Person. I, George F. Deiser, University of Pennsylvania Law Review and American Law Register, Vol. 57, No. 3, Volume 48 New Series. (Dec., 1908), pp. 131-142.

According to the international laws, international legal personality is defined as "The capacity to bear legal rights and duties under international law"[3]

Therefore an "international legal person" can be said to an entity that is having powers to act independent on the international plane.

In right to this we can therefore see that international personality is therefore bench marked on the power that is given to the entity. If the entity does not have the power to force the power that has been granted under the international laws, therefore it cannot be said to be an international person.

This is the reason why the definition of an internal individual may not be the same as the normal definition since it will be referring to a specific entity rather those specific human beings.

This means that the international community is taken as a being made up of "persons" who posses powers to act on behalf of the international community.

This definition hence takes in the factors of power that is granted to the specific individual to implement the powers for the international community. While in our normal definition we may be referring to specific humans, the international community recognizes the states alone.

But the non-governmental organization has also been given the same power of recognition in the international community as states. While the international law clearly defines an international person as "an entity that has the capacity to bear legal rights and duties under the international law" non-governmental organizations have been able to bear the foresaid legal right and duties[4].

International organizations are also given legal entity in the internal community. While the aim of the international law is to bring together the world, it has been changing from time to time in order to accommodate other emerging influential entities like the sates. Originally the states which are political arrangement in a country have been given the sole membership to the body. However there has been other emerging center of power that also need to be recognized by the international law. There has been development of other organization like the non-governmental organization that needs to be recognized by the body.

With an aim of consolidating or bringing the world together, the international law must therefore seek to address the needs of various segments in the world. It must recognize that changing arrangement in the world. The emergence of trade blocs and non-governmental organization that need to be given the same legal entity to the international community has been well defined in the laws.

There is a further elaboration of the international legal personality in light of this. While the state has the totality of all the right that are granted under the international law or it has totally of international right duet as recognized by the international laws, the right and the duties of other entity like an international organization has to be defined in another way. There is a regulation that the entity of such an organization

"Must depend on its purposes and function as specified or implied in its constituent document and developed in practice"

Therefore we see that there is clear distinction between the personality of belonging to a nation and personality of belonging to the international community. Personality of individual to a nation is based on the rights of being born or staying for some time in a nation and therefore it does not depend on the capacity of the individual person.

However in the international arena, legal personality is based on the capacity of the individual personality as defined to have the legal right and capacity to carry out duties as per the international laws. Therefore there is a factor of capacity that brings the difference between the two entities.

Under the doctrine of the international law, therefore the capacity of the entity is more exemplified by the way in which the given entity is recognized. This means that the legal personality as defined must therefore have laws in itself that are in line with the provision of the international law. It must have domestic laws that are in line with the requirements of the international laws.[5]

[3] Ian Brownlie,*Public International Law; (*Oxford University Press, 6th Edition, 1990), p. 680-683

[4] DW Greig, International Law, (1996, Macmillan, London), p. 32

There are usually incidence when the domestic law comes to conflict with the international law. In this regard there is usual a question of superiority of the laws. But as defined by the capacity description in the internal law, any entity that has ratified the internal law is also obliged to live to its ratification. Therefore in most instances when the domestic law conflict the international law, the personality will have to bear the capacity to implement the international laws and therefore it is the international law that will carry the day. The legal entity will have to live to its ratification and therefore carry out the internal laws as agreed.[6]

As a conclusion, it is evident here that the legal personality in the face of international law is quite different from the legal entity of the domestic law. While in the domestic law it may be based on some factors of residence, it is contrary to the international law. The legal personality in the international laws is based on the legal capacity of the entity to carry out duties as depicted in the internal laws. This means that legal personality here is defined by the capacity of in the "individual person" to carry out duties as required by the internal law.

The European Central Bank as a European institution with legal personality

The European Central Bank is the core of the European Union monetary policy.

The European Central Bank has legal personality under article 282 of the Treaty on functioning of the European Union and enjoys the most extensive legal capacity accorded to the legal persons under the respective national law of each member state under article 9.1. of the Statute of the European Central Banks and of the European System of Central Banks.

The strong point of the European Central Bank's meaningful position is its exclusive right to issue money and the responsibility over its value. According to article 106 from the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union, the European Central Bank shall have the exclusive right to authorize the issue of banknotes within the European Union.

The primary objective of the European Central Bank is to maintain price stability in the Euro area. The Treaty on the functioning of the European Union does not define the idea of „price stability", which gives the European Central Bank relatively free hands to both define and implement its objective. Not disregarding this objective, it shall also support the general economic policies and objectives of the European Union as laid down in Article 2 of the Stature of the European System of Central Banks and of the European Central Bank. On this line, article 2 above mentioned, establishes a clear hierarchy of objectives.

After the Lisbon Treaty, the European Central Bank was officially mentioned among the institutions of the European Union, as article 13 of the Treaty on the European Union states.

According to the mentioned article, each institution shall act within the limits of the powers conferred on it in the Treaties, and in conformity with the procedure, conditions and objectives set out in them. The institutions shall practice mutual sincere cooperation. The provisions relating to the European Central Bank were detailed and set in the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union.

We notice that legal personality is accorded to the European Central Bank, not to the European System of Central Banks. Under the Treaty on European Union, the European System of Central Banks is entrusted with carrying out central banking functions for the euro. However, as the European System of Central Banks has no legal personality of its own and because of differentiated levels of integrations in the European Monetary Union, the real actors are the European Central Bank and the national central banks of the euro area countries. They exercise the core functions of the European System of Central Banks under the name of "Eurosystem".

[5] G. Verdirame, Personality, Statehood and Government, (2004, Cambridge University).
[6] J. Klabber, Presumptive Personality, International Law Aspects of the Europe Union, (Kluwer, 1998).

So, unlike the European Central Bank and the national central banks, the European System of Central Banks has no legal personality, no capacity to act and no decision-making bodies of its own. Instead, the components of the European System of Central Banks – the European Central Bank and the national central banks – are legal persons and actors. They to have the capacity to act, but when they perform tasks assigned to the European System of Central Banks, they act in line with its objectives, the rules of the Treaty and the Statute and the decisions taken by the decision-making bodies of the European Central Bank.

As an organisation created by the Treaty on the European Union, the European Central Bank enjoys genuine powers. These powers have not been delegated by the European Union institutions; they are genuine powers given to the European Central Bank by the Treaty on the European Union and in order for the European Central Bank to exercise them, it must have legal personality.

The legal personality is also a condition for the European Central Bank and of the national central banks to issue banknotes. Since 1 January 2002, the national central banks and the European Central Bank have issued euro banknotes. However, although the competence on issuing euro banknotes may be considered to represent an obligation of the Eurosystem as a whole, it is necessary for the central banks to act as legal issuers because the Eurosystem has no legal personality.

Also, the European Central Bank, which functions under the principle of independence and is known as the most independent central bank in the world, enjoys legal personality as a prerequisite for the independence of the members of the Eurosystem. For the European Central Bank, the legal independence includes the right to bring actions before the European Court of Justice in order to uphold its prerogatives if they are impaired by the European Union's institutions or by the member states.

As a conclusion, the legal personality is one crucial aspect of European Central Bank powers and a prerequisite in order for it to exercise its powers.

The manifestation of The European Central Bank's legal personality

The European Central Bank has legal personality under article 282 of the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union and enjoys the most extensive legal capacity accorded to the legal persons under the respective national law of each member state, under article 9.1. of the Statute of the European Central Banks and of the European System of Central Banks. In other words, the exact scope is determined by and it varies according to the law of the member state.

The Statute mentions two examples, which means that the powers of the European Central Bank to act are not necessarily restricted to them. Internally, the European Central Bank's legal capacity (to act) includes the following in every member state:

- the European Central Bank has the right to acquire and to dispose of property, both movable and immovable;
- the other important example is that the European Central Bank may be a party to legal proceedings.

So, as a consequence to its legal personality, the European Central Bank may, in particular acquire or dispose of movable and immovable property and may be a party to legal proceedings.

The European Central Bank shall ensure that the tasks conferred upon the European System of Central Banks under article 127 paragraph 2, 3 and 5 of the Treaty on functioning of the European Union are implemented either by its own activities pursuant to its Statute or through the national central banks pursuant to article 12.1 and 14 of the Treaty.

In addition to the possibility to acquire or dispose of movable and immovable property and to be a party to legal proceedings, other effect of the European Central Bank's legal personality it is that the European Central Bank enjoys those privileges and immunities that are necessary to the performance of its tasks, under the conditions laid down in the Protocol on the privileges and immunities of the European Communities of 8 April 1965.

The Protocol also applies to the European Central Bank, to the members of its organs and to its staff, without prejudice to the provisions of the Protocol on the Statute of the European System of Central Banks and the European Central Bank.

According to the Protocol, the European Central Bank is, in addition, exempt from any form of taxation or imposition of a like nature on the occasion of any increase in its capital and from the various formalities which may be connected therewith in the State where the bank has its seat.

The activities of the Bank and of its organs carried on in accordance with the Statute of the European System of Central Banks and of the European Central Bank are not subject to any turnover tax.

The privileges and immunities granted to the European Communities and the European Central Bank are largely comparable with privileges and immunities customary in diplomatic relations, as codified under the aegis of the United Nations in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (1961; in force since 1964).

Other manifestation of the European Central Bank's legal personality is that, as a legal person, under public international law, the European Central Bank is in a position to, among other things, conclude international agreements in matters relating to its field of competence and participate in the work of international organizations such as the International Monetary Fund, the Bank for International Settlements and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Article 23 of the European Central Banks' Statute authorises the European Central Bank to establish relations with central banks and international (monetary) organisations (first indent) and conduct all types of banking transactions with third countries and international organisations (fourth indent).

The International Court of Justice has given the following definition of the legal personality of an international organisation "That it is a subject of international law and capable of possessing international rights and duties, and that it has capacity to maintain its rights by bringing international claims"[7]

Undoubtedly, the European Central Bank has capacity to act internationally, but subject to limitations. Naturally, the scope of the European Central Bank's activities is defined by its tasks (functionally). In addition, the European Central Bank's powers are limited by the competences accorded to the European Union, and in particular the Council of the European Union.

In practice, in matters directly pertaining to its powers, the European Central Bank has concluded agreements with international organisations. The anti-counterfeiting agreements with Europol and Interpol can be mentioned as examples.

Another example is the Headquarters Agreement between the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany and the European Central Bank concerning the seat of the European Central Bank (29.12.1998).

As it concerns the liability, the principles regarding the European Union's non-contractual liability apply to damage caused by the European Central Bank or its servants in the performance of their duties as stated in article 240 Treaty on functioning of the European Union. Pursuant to Article 268 from the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union, the Court of Justice of the European Union has jurisdiction.

[7] Ian Brownlie, Public International Law; Oxford University Press, 6th Edition, 2003; p. 649

Conclusions

As a conclusion, by analyzing the concept of legal personality at national and international level, we understood how it is manifested in our studied case: the legal personality of the European Central Bank, a core institution of the European Union and the only institution of the European Union which has legal personality.

Also, from the paper resulted that the legal personality of the European Central Bank is a prerequisite for it to fulfil the task conferred by the European treaties and to manifest its independence.

The paper analyzed the European Central Bank's legal personality from a complete point of view, starting from the concept, revealing why the European Central Bank was designed in this way and including the practical aspects, meaning the way central banking legal personality is manifested.

As a suggestion for future researches, I believe that an interesting paper would consist into analyzing the acts issued by the European Central Bank and the control exercised by the European Court of Justice under article 265 of the Treaty on functioning of the European Union.

References

- Bryant Smith, Yale Law Journal, no. 3, January 1928;
- The Juristic Person. I, George F. Deiser, University of Pennsylvania Law Review and American Law Register, Vol. 57, No. 3, Volume 48 New Series. (Dec., 1908);
- Ian Brownlie: Public International Law; (Oxford University Press, 6th Edition, 2003);
- DW Greig, International Law, (1996, Macmillan, London);
- G. Verdirame, Personality, Statehood and Government, (2004, Cambridge University);
- J. Klabber, Presumptive Personality, International Law Aspects of the Europe Union, (Kluwer, 1998);
- David Howarth and Peter Loedel, The European Central Bank, The New European Leviathan? Revised second edition,(Palgrave Macmillan, 2005);
- Ali M. El-Agraa, The European Union, Economics and Policies, (Prentice Hall, Financial Times, seventh edition, 2004);
- Augustin Fuerea, Manualul Uniunii Europene, ediția a IV-a, revăzută și adăugită, (Universul Juridic, 2010)
- Jakob de Haan and Helge Berger, The European Central Bank at Ten, (Springer, 2010)
- Jakob de Haan, Sylvester C.W. Eijffinger and Sandra Waller, The European Central Bank, Credibility, Transparency and Centralization, (CESifo Book Series, 2005);
- J.H.H. Weiler, The European Central Bank and Legitimacy, Is the European Central Bank a Modification of or an Exception to the Principle of Democracy?, (Harvard Law School, 2000);
- Hanspeter K. Scheller, The European Central Bank – History, role and Functions, (2nd revised edition, 2006);
- Paul Craig, Grainne de Burca , Dreptul Uniunii Europene: comentarii, jurisprudență și doctrină, (editura Hamangiu, 2009);
- Eleonora Ioana Rusu, G. Gornig , Dreptul Uniunii Europene, (Editura C.H. Beck, 2009);
- Paul Craig, The Lisbon Treaty – Law, Politics and Reform, (Oxford University Press, 2010).

ROMANIAN AERONAUTICAL METEOROLOGY APPLICABLE LEGAL FRAMEWORK –BRIEFING

CATALIN POPA[1]

Abstract

The purpose of this briefing is toprovide an overview of the aeronautical meteorology legal framework in Romania. In this context, the role and importance of aeronautical meteorology in international air traffic management will be underlined, with focus on the civil aviation activity in Romania. The international legal framework and modalities of implementing these rules at national level will constitute a significant part of the present study., Specific accent will be put on the national regulatory framework and structure, means of updating it, and how it responds to changing regulatory requirements.

Keywords: aeronautical meteorology, international regulations, national regulations, implementation, SARPs.

1. Introduction

The legal regime of the airspace of Romania and the civil aviation activity are being governed by a series of laws, both at national an d international level. The framework is established by the Civil Aviation Code [2], approved by Government Ordinance no. 29/1997, republished, modified and supplemented, by internal legal acts in the field. An important role in regulating civil aviation in the territory of Romania is the being played by the Community legislation in conjunction with the Convention on International Civil Aviation signed in Chicago on December 7, 1944 (hereinafter referred to as the Chicago Convention). Also,, conventions and international agreements to which Romania is a party are an influential factor in this sense.

In order to ensure a unitary, coherent and modern preparation and development of the Romanian national civil aviation regulations ,these are developed, issued or adopted in accordance with:

a. national legislation;
b. the Chicago Convention;
c. standards and recommended practices presented in the annexes to the Chicago Convention;
d. international conventions and agreements to which Romania is part to.

In accordance with the Civil Air Code and for the purpose of regulating civil aviation, the Ministry of Transport and Infrastructure has the status of state authority. In this capacity, designs or supervises directly the implementation and application of civil aviation regulations. The Ministry can also delegate its competences to specialized technical bodies, public institutions or, as appropriate, authorized companies. These regulations are binding for all participants to civil aviation and related activities.

According to Government Decision no. 405/1993 establishing the Romanian Civil Aeronautical Authority, as amended, and the Order of the Minister of Transport, Constructions and Tourism no. 1.185/2006, the Romanian Civil Aeronautical Authority (hereinafter referred to as RCAA):

- Acts as the national supervisory authority;
- Ensures the adoption and implementation of the national aviation regulations;

---

[1] Aeronautical Inspector/RCAA, (email: catalindpopa@gmail.com).

[2] Civil Aviation Code sets the legal framework of the Romanian civil aviation and it has been, approved by the Romanian Government.

- Ensures compliance by legal and natural persons with the regulations in the field of civil aviation;
- Implements the provisions of international aviation agreements to which the Romanian State is party.

The category mentioned above includes aviation regulations and all provisions related to aeronautical meteorology. Therefore,they are subject to regulatory and supervisory activities of the RCAA too.

With regard to aeronautical meteorology, there is a process in Romania related to the issuence, implementation and supervision of the regulations. They must be in accordance with the laws in force.

For a better understanding of the concepts presented, the terms listed below shall have the following meaning:

- AIP = (Aeronautical Information Publication) A publication issued by or with the authority of a State and containing aeronautical information of a lasting character essential to air navigation
- AIP Romania = Aeronautical Information Publication Romania
- ANS = Aeronautical Navigation Services
- EUROCONTROL = European Organisation for the Safety of Air Navigation
- EUR-ANP = European Air NavigationPlan
- ICAO = International Civil Aviation Organisation
- METEOROLOGICAL AUTHORITY = Romanian CAA
- PIAC = Internal Procedures for Romanian Civil Aviation
- RACR = Regulation for Romanian Civil Aviation
- RCAA = Romanian Civil Aviation Authority
- SARPs = Standards and recommended practices
- WMO = World Meteorological Organisation

2.Content

Regulatory framework in aeronautical meteorology

A. International regulatory framework

The International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO)[2], a specialized agency of the United Nations Organization was created to promote the safe and orderly development of international civil aviation throughout the world. It sets standards and regulations necessary for aviation safety, security, efficiency and regularity, as well as for aviation environmental protection. The Organization serves as the forum for cooperation in all fields of civil aviation among its 191 Member States.

[2] Due to the failure of the 1919 Paris Convention, the 1929 Warsaw Convention and the International Commission for Air Navigation, governments met in Chicago in December 1944 in order to discuss and identify common rules in civil aviation. The States participating to this reunion, concluded that, in order to ensure the development of international civil aviation in a safe and orderly manner and that international air transport services can be based on an equal opportunity for all and to be operated in a healthy economical environment, the establishment of an international forum of cooperation was necessary. Article 43 of the Chicago Convention expresses the agreement of the Sates "to establish an organization to be named the International Civil Aviation Organization." The Convention on International Civil Aviation (also known as the Chicago Convention), to which each ICAO Contracting State are party, was signed on 7 December 1944 by 52 States. This Convention entered into force on April 4, 1947. Meanwhile, the termination of the International Air Navigation Comission was decided, as it was replaced by the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO). Romania ratified the Convention in 1965. In October 1947, ICAO became a specialized agency of the United Nations linked to the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC). According to the terms of the Convention, the Organization is made up of an Assembly, a Council of limited membership with various subordinate bodies and a Secretariat. The chief officers are the President of the Council and the Secretary General.

ICAO works in close co-operation with other members of the United Nations family such as the World Meteorological Organization, the International Telecommunication Union, the Universal Postal Union, the World Health Organization and the International Maritime Organization. Non-governmental organizations also participate in ICAO's work, among which the International Air Transport Association, the Airports Council International, the International Federation of Air Line Pilots' Associations, and the International Council of Aircraft Owner and Pilot Associations.

As one of the two governing bodies of ICAO, the Council gives continuing direction to the work of ICAO. In this regard, one of its major duties is to adopt international Standards and Recommended Practices (SARPs) and to incorporate these as Annexes to the Chicago Convention. The Council may also amend existing Annexes as necessary.

Currently, there are 18 Annexes to the Chicago Convention, each constituting itself as a standard in the field of civil aviation regulator.

ANNEX 3 to Chicago Convention entitled "Meteorological services for international air navigation" is the governing provision of aeronautical meteorological services in civil aviation. The object of the meteorological service outlined in Annex 3 is to contribute to the safety, efficiency and regularity of air navigation. This is achieved by providing necessary meteorological information to operators, flight crew members, air traffic services units, search and rescue units, airport management and others concerned with aviation. Close liaison is essential between those supplying meteorological information and those using it.

Commission Regulation (EC) no. 1035/2011 establishes requirements for the provision of aeronautical meteorological services. To ensure consistent responses to international regulatory framework, that regulation will follow the procedure for amending implemented by Community rules, meaning updating its provisions, including references to be made ICAO Annex 3.

Standards and recommended practices in ICAO Annex 3 apply to those portions of air space under the jurisdiction of a State signatory of the Convention on International Civil Aviation. They also apply to those States that provide aeronautical meteorological services in those air spaces where the state accepts responsibility for providing air navigation services over the high seas or in air space of undetermined sovereignty.

Any differences[3] from the standards and recommended practices in ICAO Annexes., or termination of these differences (Annex 3 as well) must be notified to ICAO under Article 38 of the Chicago Convention. These differences are published in the aeronautical information service, in AIP Romania.

According to art.1, para.(3) of the European Parliament and Council Regulation (EC) no.549/2004 as amended, establishing a framework for creating the Single European Sky, provides that its application shall be without prejudice to the rights and obligations of Member States established under the Chicago Convention.

B. National regulatory framework

Romanian civil aviation regulation RACR-ASMET is the national transposition of standards and recommended practices set out in Annex3 to the Chicago Convention - "Meteorological Services for International Air Navigation" (hereinafter referred to as ICAO Annex 3). ICAO Annex 3, together with the European Air Navigation Plan (EUR-ANP) governing international civil aviation meteorological services in Europe, are applied in order to establish in the territories and airspace of Romania a regulatory framework to be applied by the providers of meteorological services in their activity related to air navigation as appropriate:

- meteorological support services to civil aviation activities

[3] According to ICAO, even a different level of implementation of the provision ,in the sense that if a recommendation of international regulation is implemented as a national standard- which happens in all cases in terms of regulations weather-it is assumed to be difference and be highlighted as such by the ICAO.

- services necessary to ensure safe conduct of air navigation, in an orderly and expeditious manner
- units of the services necessary to ensure safe conduct of air navigation, in an orderly and expeditious manner.

Rules and other provisions contained in the Romanian civil aviation regulation RACR-ASMET were developed with due consideration to grant meaning to the standards and recommended practices adopted by the ICAO in accordances with the general principles of law developed by the Chicago Convention and its Annexes.

For the purposes of the foregoing, the provisions RACR-ASMET were developed so that:

- ICAO standards specified in Appendix 3 are fully transposed into RACR-ASMET as rules, in accordance with ICAO provisions, while making, where appropriate, the customizations needed in order to facilitate understanding and correct application (eg there is an ICAO standard which provides a state responsibility (for?), the appropriate rule RACR-ASMET specify the institutional context of the Romanian Civil Aviation, which functions / institutions - state authority, delegated authority, government or businesses providing services, etc. - shall be responsible for not fulfilling the specified obligations).
- recommended practices set out in ICAO Annex 3 are and accurately translated in the RACR -ASMET provisions. The same observation applies with regard to the additional details that have been entered in the text;
- Appendices ('Appendices') and supplements ('Attachments') in Annex 3 have been or will be fully implemented in the specific procedures for the application of RACR-ASMET
- Tables and figures in ICAO Annex 3 have been or will be also implemented faithfully in the application of specific procedures RACR-ASMET, keeping the text in line.
- Transpose the preamble of ICAO Annex 3, entirely or in part, in the regulation of civil aviation Romanian RACR-ASMET .
- Notes from the original text were translated, entirely or in part, where it was considered that these details are necessary or useful in applying the rules.
- Have been translated into Romanian civil aviation regulation RACR-ASMET and those standards and recommended practices of ICAO Annex 3 to the aeronautical meteorological services in Romania had not yet on a certain editions, technical and operational support necessary, but considering that implementation of these standards and practices that national rules is necessary for further development, aviation weather services and the national ANS system.
- Develop RACR-ASMET in line,as much as possible, with the structure of ICAO Annex 3, except that the provisions contained in Part II were added to the appropriate chapters and paragraphs of Part I ,without differentiating between them. This was considered necessary because both contain equally appropriate standards and recommended practices to be implemented as rules at national level,. Correlation between them is essential.

Compliance with the rules and recommendations set out in RACR-ASMET have been carried out together with the procedures and guidelines for civil aviation, associated with this regulation. They are developed and issued by the aeronautical meteorological authority. Such documents embrace the form of PIAC(underRACR-11[4]) at national level There are also other institutions of civil aviation that develop standards and procedures, along with the national aeronautical meteorological, which is RCAA.Any air navigation service provider subject to the rules RACR-ASMET must seek to achieve those requirements specific to applying the means of compliance provided in procedural manuals, circulars, etc .issued by ICAO, and using materials for guidance and directions established by the WMO and EUROCONTROL. Other means of compliance may be allowed only if the air navigation service provider shall justify and argue unequivocally in front of the aeronautical meteorological authority, , that using these other means of compliance, the same level of safety will be achieved.

[4] RACR-11isa Romanian Civil Aviationregulation for develop and issue Romanian civil aviation regulations and procedures for their application .

At 18 November 2010 Amendment75 to ICAO Annex 3 entered into force. Its provisions have been fully adopted and implemented nationwide in the regulation RACR-ASMET, edition4/2008, Amd. 1/2012.

The procedures and instructions related to the Regulation RACR-ASMET, edition4/2008, were developed nationwide and entered in force in the form of PIAC-CMA[2]"Aeronautical Meteorological Codes" ed. 1/2006, which transposes the provisions on the making of a true, encoding and transmission of weather observations, contained in ICAO Annex 3.

Provisions for aeronautical meteorological activities aimed at aeronautical meteorological personnel are included in Annex 1 " Personnel Licensing " to the Chicago Convention. In terms of civil aviation in Romania, the provision of aeronautical meteorology are translated into RACR-LMET "Romanian civil aviation regulation on licensing of aeronautical meteorological personnel", edition 2/2009, and the internal procedure at the PIAC-LMET, ed . 1/2006, in both regulations taking into account the Doc. WMO no. 49 "Technical Regulations", vol. 1, developed and approved by the Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology of WMO.

By presenting the international and national regulatory framework in aeronautical meteorology, we believe that the most important materials were presented. Also, the basic recommended standards and procedures applicable in the field were developed in the above study. It is worth mentioning in this context that at this time Romania has a a level of implementation of 100%, as can be inferred from the graph shown in Fig. 1 below (according to the information presented by ICAO on the ICAO website, EFOD-Romania section).

Moreover, considering the specific requirements of all stakeholders in civil aviation, there are many other norrme and applicable provisions issued by other ICAO or non-ICAO bodies closely with ICAO requirements given inAnnex 3[3].

3. Conclusions

In conclusion, ICAO Annex 3 is the main document providing standards and recommended practices of aeronautical meteorology, which are implemented nationwide by the RCAA through the Romanian Civil Aeronautic Regulation RACR-ASMET and the PIAC-CMA.

What it is important to mention is that the other Annexes to the Chicago Convention include references regarding aeronautical meteorology too, implemented nationally in appropriate internal regulations (RACR-LMET, RACR-AIS, etc).

[2] PIAC – CMA is a Romanian Civil Aviation internal procedure that regarding the issuance of meteorological message using the international meteorological codes.

[3] In accordance with the requirement of ICAO Annex 3, para. 2.1.5 : "Each Contracting State shall ensure that the designated meteorological authority meets the requirements of WMO regarding qualifications and training of meteorological personnel providing air navigation services", the WMO Executive Council approved the inclusion standard of competence for staff weather aircraft technician and forecasters in theDoc. WMOno.49 "Technical Regulations", vol1,developed and approved by the Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology of WMO. The requirements of this document can be found in ICAO Annex 1and, respectively, in the provisions of RACR-LMET and PIAC-LMET.

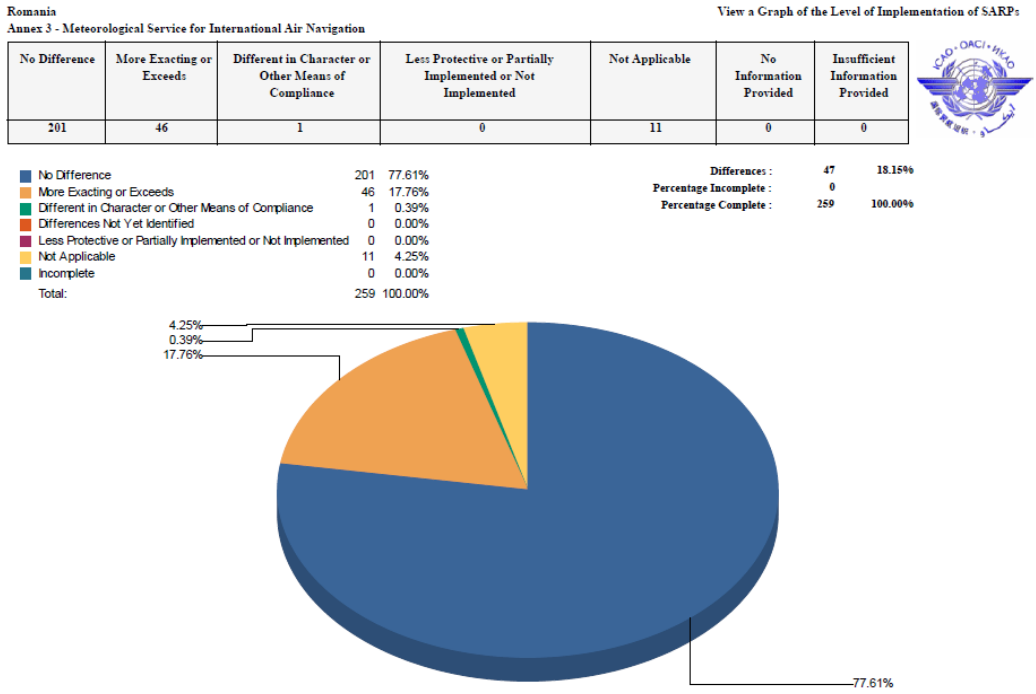

Fig. 1 - Level of implementation of SARPs

European civil aviation bodies emit a series of requirements and regulations in the field of aeronautical meteorology as well. These need to comply with ICAO Annex 3, and are transposed into national regulations, too.

In this sense we suggest that it could be a very good idea to continue the future development of this briefing in aeronautical meteorology, by a detailed approach to these regulations.

References

- International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), Convention on Civil Aviation ("Chicago Convention"), 7 December 1944, (1994) 15 U.N.T.S. 295, available at: http://www.unhcr.org/refworld/docid/3ddca0dd4.html [accessed 15 March 2012].
- Annex 3 ICAO, "Meteorological Service for InternationalAir Navigation", available at: http://www.wmo.int/pages/prog/www/ISS/Meetings/CT-MTDCF-ET-DRC_Geneva2008/Annex3_16ed.pdf[accessed 15 March 2012].
- Abridged Final Report with Resolutions and Recommendations of the Fourteenth Session of the Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology (WMO-No. 1053).
- RACR-ASMET available at: http://www.caa.ro/cadru-legislativ/racr-:-servicii-de-navigatie-aeriana.html[accessed 15 March 2012].

THE OBJECT OF THE PRELIMINARY QUESTION

IULIANA-MĂDĂLINA LARION*

Abstract
The study intends to explain what may be the object of a preliminary question sent by a national court or tribunal of a member state to the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU), analyzing the first paragraph of article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, with references to the CJEU's relevant case law.

Keywords: national court, member state, Court of Justice of the European Union, preliminary question, article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union.

I. Introductory considerations

The preliminary ruling procedure is an instrument at the disposal of national courts or tribunals[1], which have the possibility and, sometimes, the obligation, to ask the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) to give a ruling on the interpretation of the Treaties, on the validity and interpretation of acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the European Union (EU).

Its purpose is to enable the national judicial body to receive the Luxembourg Court's opinion on a question on the interpretation or validity of European Union law, opinion necessary in order to give a ruling in the case it has been vested with. It is a means of cooperation between the national judge and the European Union Court, meant to help the national judge in his/her mission to apply and interpret European Union law.[2]

Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union provides that:

"The Court of Justice of the European Union shall have jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings concerning:

a) the interpretation of the Treaties;

b) the validity and interpretation of acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the Union;

Where such a question is raised before any court or tribunal of a Member State, that court or tribunal may, if it considers that a decision on the question is necessary to enable it to give judgment, request the Court to give a ruling thereon.

Where any such question is raised in a case pending before a court or tribunal of a Member State against whose decisions there is no judicial remedy under national law, that court or tribunal shall bring the matter before the Court.

---

* Judge at the Second District Court of Bucharest; Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, (email: madalinalarion@gmail.com). The study is elaborated within the frame of the project "CERDOCT – Ph. D. scholarships to support doctoral research in technical and human areas, in environmental health, in national, European and global legislation with eco-economic and socio-economic impact", ID 79073, under the observance of Professor Augustin Fuerea, Ph. D.

[1] An autonomous notion in European Union law. In the interpretation of the European Court of Justice (ECJ), the meaning of "national court or tribunal" is not restricted to the judicial system stricto sensu, but includes, also, bodies authorised to give rulings of a judicial nature. The characteristics of such a body were defined by the ECJ in case 246/80 Broekmeulen, judgment of 6 October 1981 (http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c1_juris.htm).

[2] See also Petersen, John; Shackleton, Michael; The Institutions of the European Union, Second Edition, (Oxford University Press, 2006) p.132.

If such a question is raised in a case pending before a court or tribunal of a Member State with regard to a person in custody, the Court of Justice of the European Union shall act with the minimum of delay."[3]

The goal of this study is to explain what may be the object of a preliminary question sent by the national court of a member state, with references to the CJEU's relevant case law on the interpretation of the first paragraph of article 267 of the TFEU.

II. Questions on the interpretation of the Treaties

The interpretation of Treaties includes the interpretation of the founding treaties, of the treaties that have modified and amended the founding treaties and of the treaties of accession of the member states. As they have the same legal force as Treaties, the protocols and declarations annexed to Treaties, such as the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, can also be interpreted by the Court of Justice (CJ).

The Treaties cannot be the object of a question about their validity, as they are, first of all, international covenants, concluded under public international law, with a series of inherent characteristics deriving from their judicial nature[4]. Once ratified, they express the will of the party states.

The judicial institutions created on the basis of these international covenants, in order to ensure the functioning of the international organisation established by the parties, do not have jurisdiction to rule on the validity of the agreement of the states.

For the same reason, national courts cannot ask preliminary questions on the validity of the Treaties. The Court of Justice has never received such a question.

However, in the EU literature it has been pointed out that "one cannot exclude entirely the annulment by the Court, in exceptional circumstances, of a provision of the Treaty as being null and void, for example, because it is in obvious contradiction to a fundamental principle of EU law or it has been introduced by an amendment to the Treaty that has been adopted without following the procedure set forth by the Treaty."[5]

In our opinion, this possibility can only be received with certain reserve, since article 267 of TFEU establishes expressly the limits of the Court's jurisdiction.

III. Questions on the interpretation of acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the Union

The interpretation of acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the European Union covers binding acts, such as Regulations, Decisions, Directives, as well as Recommendations and Opinions, "if the use of such instruments is necessary to aid the interpretation of national law adopted to implement Community law"[6].

This conclusion is derived from the principle of interpretation according to which where the law does not distinguish, nor should the interpreter (ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus) and has been confirmed by the Court of Justice of the European Communities[7] in case

[3] See, in Romanian, Tudorel Ştefan, Beatrice Andreşan-Grigoriu, Tratatele Uniunii Europene. Versiune consolidată., (Hamangiu Publishing, Bucharest, 2010), p. 163.

[4] See also Raluca Miga-Beşteliu, Drept internaţional public, Second Edition, Volume I, (C.H. Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2010), p. 89-112 and Volume II, (C.H. Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2008), p. 57-106.

[5] Morten Broberg, Niels Fenger, Procedura trimiterii preliminare la Curtea Europeană de Justiţie, translated in Romanian by Constantin Mihai Banu, (Wolters Kluwer Publishing, Romania, 2010), p. 102 (our translation).

[6] Margot Horspool, Matthew Humphreys, Siri Harris, Rosalind Malcolm, European Union Law, Fourth Edition, (Oxford University Press, 2006), p.110.

[7] Today, the Court of Justice, after the coming into force of the Lisbon Treaty, on the 1 of December, 2009.

322/88 Grimaldi[8], which concerned a Recommendation issued by the Commission. The Court stated that it has jurisdiction to give a preliminary ruling on the validity and interpretation of all acts of the institutions of the Community without exception. It therefore has jurisdiction to rule on the interpretation of Recommendations adopted on the basis of the Treaty.

The Court observed that Recommendations are generally adopted by the institutions of the Community[9] when they do not have the power under the Treaty to adopt binding measures or when they consider that it is not appropriate to adopt more mandatory rules. Since they are measures which, even as regards the persons to whom they are addressed, are not intended to produce binding effects, they cannot create rights upon which individuals may rely before a national court. However, since Recommendations cannot be regarded as having no legal effect at all, the national courts are bound to take them into consideration in order to decide disputes submitted to them, in particular where they cast light on the interpretation of national measures adopted in order to implement them or where they are designed to supplement binding Community provisions.

Most frequently, preliminary questions concern the interpretation of Regulations, Decisions and Directives. The main provisions on these types of acts are found in Article 288 of TFEU. This text sets forth their features. In a nutshell, the Regulation has general application; it is binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all member states (it does not require transposition in national law).

The Decision is binding in its entirety and, if it specifies those to whom it is addressed, it is binding only on them.

The Directive is binding, as to the result to be achieved, upon each member state to which it is addressed, but, leaves to the national authorities the choice of form and methods. The Directive is not directly applicable, as it requires transposition in national law[10]. The consequence is that the national judge shall apply the national provision and not the Directive, as such[11].

The Court of Justice stated that it is not necessary that the acts of the institutions should be directly applicable in order to be the object of a preliminary question. For example, in case 111/75 Mazzalai [12] the Court was asked to interpret a provision from a Directive. It stated that it has jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings concerning the interpretation of acts of the institutions, regardless of whether they are directly applicable.

In its jurisprudence, the Court of Justice has accepted jurisdiction for the interpretation of international treaties which the European Union has concluded, on the basis that they also constitute acts of the institutions. Consequently, their interpretation can be the object of a preliminary question.

In the Kupferberg[13] ruling, the preliminary question asked by the German court was on the interpretation of a free trade agreement concluded by the European Community (EC)[14] with Portugal, before Portugal aceeded to the European Coomunities. The Court held that the agreement was equally binding for the member states and for the EC institutions, empowered to conclude it and that they fulfil, in ensuring respect for commitments arising from an agreement, an obligation not only in relation to the non-member country concerned but also and above all in relation to the Community which has assumed responsibility for the due performance of the agreement. That is why the provisions of such an agreement form an integral part of the Community legal system.

---

[8] *Judgment of 13 December 1989, Grimaldi (http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c1_juris.htm).*

[9] Today's European Union, after the coming into force of the Lisbon Treaty, on the 1 of December, 2009.

[10] See Augustin Fuerea, Manualul Uniunii Europene, Fifth Edition, (Universul juridic Publishing, Bucharest), 2011.

[11] See Marcela Comşa, Caracteristicile dreptului comunitar european şi rolul judecătorului naţional, Dreptul, number 10, 2007, p.104-105.

[12] *Judgment of 20 May 1976, Mazzalai / Ferrovia del Renon (http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c1_juris.htm).*

[13] Judgment of 26 October 1982, Hauptzollamt Mainz / Kupferberg & Cie., 104/81 (http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c1_juris.htm).

[14] Today, the European Union.

In a series of cases, the Court stated that there can be the object of preliminary questions provisions of EU law that apply to strictly internal situations, due to the fact that national law extended their application to purely internal matters. For example, in case 166/84 Thomasdünger[15], the Court said that, with the exception of cases in which it is clear that the provision of Community law which it is asked to interpret does not apply to the facts of the dispute in the main proceedings, ECJ leaves it to the national court to determine whether a preliminary ruling is necessary in order to decide the dispute pending before it.

III. Questions on the validity of acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the Union

The Court has jurisdiction to rule on the validity of the acts issued on the basis of and for the application of the Treaties (primary sources of EU law[16]), in the context of the annulment proceedings, instituted by article 263 TFEU (a direct action) or of the preliminary ruling proceedings, an indirect means for exercising legal control over the acts issued by the EU institutions.

The jurisdiction belongs solely to the Court of Justice and national courts do not have the power to declare acts of the EU institutions invalid. To this end, in case C-344/04 IATA and ELFAA[17], the Court said that it is necessary to ensure that Community law[18] is applied uniformly by national courts. Differences between courts of the member states as to the validity of Community acts would be liable to jeopardise the very unity of the Community legal order and undermine the fundamental requirement of legal certainty.

The Court emphasized that the preliminary ruling procedure does not constitute a means of redress available to the parties to a case pending before a national court and therefore the mere fact that a party contends that the dispute gives rise to a question concerning the validity of Community law does not mean that the court concerned is compelled to consider that a preliminary question has been raised.

The Court held that courts against whose decisions there is a judicial remedy under national law may examine the validity of a Community act and, if they consider that the arguments put forward before them by the parties in support of invalidity are unfounded, they may reject them, concluding that the act is completely valid. On the other hand, where such a court considers that one or more arguments for invalidity, put forward by the parties or, as the case may be, raised by it of its own motion, are well founded, it is incumbent upon it to stay proceedings and to make a reference to the Court for a preliminary ruling on the act's validity.

The substance of the judgement gives rise to the idea that if the national court has reasonable doubts regarding the validity of the EU act applicable to its case, it is under the obligation to ask the preliminary question, regardless of the fact that it is or not a court against whose decisions there is a judicial remedy under national law.

However, in other cases, the Court in Luxemburg stated that, if the EU norm could have been the object of a direct annulment action, provided by article 263 of TFEU, introduced by the person who asked for the preliminary question to be sent, but it was not or the action was dismissed because the 2 month term expired, the national court shall reject the request to send a preliminary question, without having to analyze the righteousness of the reasons offered by the parties in claiming invalidity.[19]

---

[15] *Judgment of 26 September 1985, Thomasdünger / Oberfinanzdirektion Frankfurt am Main (*http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c1_juris.htm).

[16] See Augustin Fuerea, Drept comunitar european. Partea generală., (All Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2003), p. 49-105.

[17] *Judgment of 10 January 2006, IATA and ELFAA (*http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c2_juris.htm).

[18] Today, EU law.

[19] See cases C-188/92 TWD, C-119/05 Lucchini.

IV. Questions outside CJEU's jurisdiction

The object of the preliminary question is limited by article 267, paragraph 1 of TFEU to the three situations above. Thus, a first exception is the questions regarding the validity of the Treaties, the primary sources of European Union law.

Also, national courts cannot ask questions about international agreements that have not been concluded on the basis of TEU or TFEU. In case 44/84 Hurd/Jones[20] the Court was asked a series of preliminary questions about article 3 of the Act concerning the conditions of accession and the adjustments to the Treaties, annexed to the Treaty concerning the accession of the Kingdom of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the European Economic Community and to the European Atomic Energy Community, with regard to the levying of domestic taxation on the salaries paid by the European school at Culham in the United Kingdom to the British members of its teaching staff.

The Court established it has jurisdiction to interpret article 3 of the Accession Act. However, the Court observed that the European schools were not set up on the basis of the Treaties establishing the European Communities or on the basis of measures adopted by the Community institutions, but on the basis of international agreements concluded by the member states, namely the Statute of the European school and the Protocol on the setting-up of European schools. Those agreements together with the instruments, measures and decisions of organs of the European schools adopted on that basis do not fall within any of the categories of measures that may be the object of a preliminary question.

However, the Court held that, in order to determine the scope of article 3 of the Act of Accession with regard to such instruments, it may be necessary to define their legal status and, consequently, to subject them to such scrutiny as is necessary for that purpose. In performing that task the Court does not acquire, on the basis of article 3 of the Act of Accession, full and complete jurisdiction to interpret the instruments in question.

Often national courts ask if provisions of internal law are contrary to European Union law, because the parties to the legal dispute are trying to determine the national court not to apply internal laws that are not favourable to their interests.

European Union law authors have emphasized that „such a question involves the application of Community law rather than its interpretation, but the Court will usually confine its ruling to the issue of interpretation, leaving it to the national court to draw the conclusion (which may then be readily apparent), whether in the light of that interpretation the national provisions should be applied.[21]

In case 13/61 Bosch[22] the jurisdiction of the Court was challenged on the ground that, among others, the question was not on the interpretation of the Treaty, but its application. The Court held that the Treaty does not prescribe, either expressly or by implication, a definite form in which the national court must put its request for a preliminary ruling. The national court is free to put its request in a simple and direct form, leaving it to the Court of Justice to rule on that request only within the limits of its jurisdiction that is insofar as it involves questions of interpretation of the Treaty. The Court concluded that the direct form of the question allows it to extract without difficulty the questions on interpretation.

In another case, 16/65 Scwarze[23], the national judge asked the Court to interpret a Community measure, whereas a ruling on the measure's validity was clearly required. The Court answered, stating that the real purpose of the question submitted by the national court is concerned rather with

---

[20] Judgment of 15 January 1986, Hurd / Jones ( http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c1_juris.htm)

[21] Neville Brown, Tom Kennedy, The Court of Justice of the European Communities, Fourth Edition, (Sweet&Maxwell Publishing, London, 1994), p. 205.

[22] *Judgment of 6 April 1962, De Geus en Uitdenbogerd / Bosch and others (http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c1_juris.htm)*

[23] *Judgment of 1 December 1965, Schwarze / Einfuhr- und Vorratsstelle für Getreide und Futtermittel (http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c1_juris.htm)*

the validity of Community measures than with their interpretation. The Court found it is appropriate to inform the national court at once of its view without compelling the national court to comply with purely formal requirements which would uselessly prolong the procedure of the preliminary ruling and would be contrary to its very nature.

Thus, even in the situation of an imperfect question, the Court shall try to offer the national court a useful answer, without exceeding its own jurisdiction. Still, as the number of cases registered by the Court increased, it has adopted a more strict position. „Now, therefore, not only are hypothetical questions refused, as we saw above, but also the national judge is expected to describe the factual and legal background of the national proceedings in sufficient detail to enable the Court to reply usefully to the questions submitted: this is particularly necessary in the field of competition law. If this is not done, the Court may refuse to answer the question submitted as manifestly inadmissible."[24]

The Court of Justice cannot rule that an internal law is contrary to an EU law, but it can offer the national court all the elements necessary to draw its own conclusions on that matter.[25]

Within the framework of the preliminary ruling procedure, the Court shall, in principle, only interpret EU law and not advise a national court on the application of EU law, not will it order a national court to declare its national law invalid.[26]

The Court does not only reject, as inadmissible, those questions ouside its jurisdiction ratione materiae, but also the questions ouside its jurisdiction ratione temporis. For example, in case C-302/04 Ynos[27], the Court was sent a question on the interpretation of a provision from a Directive, that had been transposed in national Hungarian law before Hungary's accession to the European Union. The Court noted that the facts of the main case had happened before Hungary became a member of the EU and concluded that it did not have jurisdiction to interpret the Directive.[28]

V. CONCLUSION

The preliminary ruling procedure is an instrument at the disposal of national courts, a means of cooperation between national courts and the CJEU, that enables the national court to ask the Court of Justice to give a ruling on the interpretation of the Treaties, on the validity and interpretation of acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the European Union.

The object of the preliminary question is limited to the three situations enumerated in paragraph 1 of article 267 of TFEU. The Court of Justice does not have jurisdiction to answer questions about the validity or the application of the Treaties or about international agreements that have not been concluded on the basis of EU law.

The Court of Justice cannot rule that an internal law is contrary to an EU law, nor will it order a national court to declare its national law invalid, but it can offer the national court all the elements necessary to draw its own conclusions on those matters.

Even in the situation of an imperfect question, the Court shall try to offer the national court a useful answer, without exceeding its own jurisdiction. Still, as the number of cases registered by the Court increased, it has adopted a more strict position[29]. It is settled case-law that a reference from a

---

[24] Neville Brown, Tom Kennedy, The Court of Justice of the European Communities, Fourth Edition, (Sweet&Maxwell Publishing, London, 1994), p. 206.

[25] *Judgment of 12 December 1990, SARPP (*http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c2_juris.htm)

[26] Margot Horspool, Matthew Humphreys. Siri Harris, Rosalind Malcolm, European Union Law, Fourth Edition, (Oxford University Press, 2006), p.111.

[27] Judgment of 10 January 2006, Ynos, C-302/04 (http://curia.europa.eu/en/content/juris/c2_juris.htm).

[28] For other examples, see Laurențiu Brînzoiu, Examen de jurisprudență a Curții de Justiție a Comunităților Europene în materia admisibilității trimiterilor preliminare, Revista Română de Drept Comunitar, number 6, 2007, pages 83-85.

[29] See also James Hanlon, European Community Law, Second Edition, (Sweet&Maxwell Publishing, London, 2000), p.140.

national court may be refused if it is quite obvious that the interpretation of EU law sought bears no relation to the actual facts of the main action or to its purpose, or where the problem is hypothetical or the Court does not have before it the factual or legal material necessary to give a useful answer to the questions submitted to it. Save for such cases, the Court is, in principle, bound to give a preliminary ruling on questions concerning the interpretation of EU law.

If a matter of invalidity of EU legislation is raised, the national judge cannot declare the European Union act invalid. If a decision of the Court of Justice is necessary to enable the court to give judgement and if the point is not as clear as to simply declare the legislation to be valid, the domestic court is under the obligation to send the question to the CJ.

The Court shall reject, as inadmissible, all those questions ouside its jurisdiction ratione materiae or ratione temporis.

I. References (in Romanian):

- Broberg, Morten; Fenger, Niels; Procedura trimiterii preliminare la Curtea Europeană de Justiție, translated in Romanian by Constantin Mihai Banu, (Wolters Kluwer Publishing, Romania, 2010), p.102
- Fuerea, Augustin; Drept comunitar european. Partea generală, (All Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2003).
- Fuerea, Augustin; Manualul Uniunii Europene, Fifth Edition, (Universul juridic Publishing, Bucharest, 2011).
- Miga-Beşteliu, Raluca; Drept internațional public, Second Edition, Volume I, (C.H. Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2010) and Volume II, (C.H. Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2008).

II. References (in other languages than Romanian):

- Brown, Neville; Kennedy, Tom; The Court of Justice of the European Communities, Fourth Edition, (Sweet&Maxwell Publishing, London, 1994).
- Hanlon, James; European Community Law, Second Edition, (Sweet&Maxwell Publishing, London, 2000).
- Horspool, Margot; Humphreys, Matthew; Harris, Siri; Malcolm, Rosalind; European Union Law, Fourth Edition, (Oxford University Press, 2006).
- Petersen, John; Shackleton, Michael; The Institutions of the European Union, Second Edition, (Oxford University Press, 2006).

II. Periodicals:

- Brînzoiu, Laurențiu; Examen de jurisprudență a Curții de Justiție a Comunităților Europene în material admisibilității trimiterilor preliminare, Revista Română de Drept Comunitar, number 6, 2007
- Comşa, Marcela; Caracteristicile dreptului comunitar european şi rolul judecătorului național, Dreptul, number 10, 2007

III. Legislation:

- Ştefan, Tudorel; Andreşan-Grigoriu, Beatrice; Tratatele Uniunii Europene. Versiune consolidată., (Hamangiu Publishing, Bucharest, 2010).

IV. Other sources:

- www.europa.eu – The European Union
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu – EU legislation
- http://curia.europa.eu – The Court of Justice of the European Union
- www.ier.ro – The Romanian European Institute
- www.mae.ro – The Romanian Ministry of External Affairs

ATTRIBUTION OF CONDUCT TO A STATE-THE SUBJECTIVE ELEMENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY OT THE STATE FOR INTERNATIONALLY WRONGFUL ACTS

FELICIA MAXIM[*]

Abstract

In order to establish responsibility of states for internationally wrongful act, two elements are identified. First, the conduct in question must be attributable to the State under international law. Secondly, for responsibility to attach to the act of the State, the conduct must constitute a breach of an international legal obligation in force for that State at that time. For particular conduct to be characterized as an internationally wrongful act, it must first be attributable to the State. The State is a real organized entity, a legal person with full authority to act under international law. But to recognize this is not to deny the elementary fact that the State cannot act of itself. States can act only by and through their agents and representatives. In determining what constitutes an organ of a State for the purposes of responsibility, the internal law and practice of each State are of prime importance. The structure of the State and the functions of its organs are not, in general, governed by international law. It is a matter for each State to decide how its administration is to be structured and which functions are to be assumed by government. But while the State remains free to determine its internal structure and functions through its own law and practice, international law has a distinct role. Conduct is thereby attributed to the State as a subject of international law and not as a subject of internal law. The State as a subject of international law is held responsible for the conduct of all the organs, instrumentalities and officials which form part of its organization and act in that capacity, whether or not they have separate legal personality under its internal law.

Keywords*: international responsibility, internationally wrongful acts, state, attribution of conduct to a state, the subjective element.*

1. Introductory aspects

Responsibility in international law is an old topic that has been the subject matter of the study of various entities, but it is also current. The studies conducted by experts with a view to codification have led to the identification of several directions of action. Thus it has been considered a responsibility of the states for internationally wrongful acts, but also a responsibility for prejudices triggered by activities allowed by international law, and also the intention has been to codify the responsibility of the international organizations. Each type of responsibility has raised various problems, which have led to long periods of time taken for conducting the works of the International Law Commission (I.L.C.) of UNO.[1] The completion of the works has been achieved by adopting various draft articles, which are subject to the works of the UNO General Assembly in order to establish the form that these articles should take. The same as the other types, the responsibility of the states for internationally wrongful acts has brought into discussion various aspects identified in the practice of the states and international case law. Establishing the elements necessary to triggering the responsibility for internationally wrongful acts and the identification of the concrete cases brings into discussion the chargeability of the internationally wrongful acts and the breach of the international obligation of the state. The chargeability (attribution) of the internationally wrongful act to the state – the subjective element of the responsibility of the states for internationally wrongful acts – involves [*] Senior Lecturer Ph. D. Faculty of Law, „Titu Maiorescu" University; Associate Scientific Researcher with the Institute of Legal Researches "Acad. Andrei Rădulescu", (email: maxfel2006@yahoo.com).

[1] Dumitra Popescu, Felicia Maxim, Drept internațional public-curs pentru învățământul la distanță (Public International Law – course of lectures for distance learning), Editura Renaissance (Renaissance Publishing), (Bucharest 2010), p.329.

the research of a big number of cases that will be analysed below with a view to the identification of the cases where a state can be held liable at international level.

The study of the chargeability of the internationally wrongful acts has led to various controversies which the ILC experts have tried to resolve also considering the guidelines of the international practice in the field by preparing a draft that reflects the position of the governments of the UNO member states.[2] It is known that the subjective element consists in the conduct of a person or group of persons, which due to certain characteristics needs to be attributed to the state as a subject of international law, and not to the person or group of persons that have initiated it. In attributing the wrongful act to the state, there shall be taken into account firstly the identification of the legal connection existent between the persons that engage the conduct and the state; secondly, we will consider the state as subject of international law; and thirdly, the attribution of the wrongful conduct shall be done in accordance with the international law norms.

The state is an organized entity that acts in the international field by means of certain bodies and persons that has governmental authority, that is why, the state is charged with the acts of those who represent it and that have been committed in their official capacity.[3] It is thus necessary to determine the individual behaviours that can be considered acts of the state and those that, on the contrary, need to be considered actions or omissions of the private entities.

Thus, the state will be responsible for the wrongful act of a body of the state power or of another entity that has the capacity to exert the prerogatives of public power. It is also attributed to the state the conduct of a person or of an entity that is not a body of the state power, but that is enabled by it to exert prerogatives of public power, or act under its management or control, even if this conduct is in breach of the instructions received, as well as the conduct of a body made available to a state by another state and that exerts public power on the behalf of the latter, the conduct of a person or group of persons that exerts in fact the prerogatives of public power in case of an absence of the official authorities, as well as the conduct of an insurrectional movement that becomes the new government of a state or that creates a new state.[4]

In respect of the wrongful acts conducted by private persons, the specialized literature claims that there is a generally applicable principle, according to which the state is not responsible for the acts of the private persons as such are not committed on the behalf of the state.[5] The facts of private persons trigger the responsibility of the state if they have been committed as a result of actions or omissions arising from bodies of state power, cases that may occur in the event of facts that affect the representative offices of foreign states or citizens of such foreign states. In such cases, the state has the responsibility for its own omissions, such as the failure of taking measures to prevent the respective acts, measures which the international law obligates the state to take or measures of repression conformant with the execution of its international obligations.[6]

---

[2] Draft articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, with commentaries 2001,Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 2001, vol. II, Part Two.; Felicia Maxim, Dreptul răspunderii statelor pentru fapte internaţional ilicite (Responsibility of the States for Intrnationally Wrongful Acts), (Editura Renaissance, 2011),p.79-126.

[3] I.Anghel,V.Anghel, Răspunderea în dreptul internaţional (Responsibility in International Law), (Editura Lumina Lex, Bucureşti, 1998), p.31.

[4] I.Diaconu, Tratat de drept internaţional public (Treatise on Public International Law), vol. III, (Editura Lumina Lex, Bucureşti, 2005), p.340.

[5] Patrick Daillier, Mathias Forteau, Nguyen Quoc Dinh, Alains Pellet, Droit international public, 8 edition, (LGDJ, 2010), p.869; Cazul Tellini- League of Nations, Official Journal, 4th Year, No.11(November 1923), p.1349.

[6] D.Popescu, A.Năstase, Drept internaţional public (Public International Law), Ediţie revăzută şi adăugită, (Casa de editură şi presă „Şansa" S.R.L., 1997), p.311; Raluca Miga Beşteliu, Drept internaţional public-curs universitar (Public International Law- university course), vol.II, (Editura C.H.Beck, 2008), p.34;Felicia Maxim, op. cit.,p.123.

The process of charging the wrongful act is conducted mandatorily by observing two important rules, namely: the attribution of the wrongful act to the state as subject to international law and classification of the wrongful act in accordance with the norms of international law.

2. State Authorities

First, mention must be made of the fact that it is not relevant the position of the state body within the internal organizational structure and neither does the internal hierarchy.[7] This mention is important as in specialized literature there have been expressed opinion according to which the responsibility of the state can be triggered only in case of wrongful conduct of state bodies. Thus, it is well known the theory that claimed that only an act or omission of the body responsible for the foreign affairs of the state (head of state, minister of foreign affairs, diplomatic) can represent a wrongful act of the state. Thus it has been claimed that the state is responsible for the acts of the of the internal bodies, for instance, bodies that exert legislative power, administrative of judicial bodies, only indirectly, if the acts of the internal bodies had affected or prevented the acts of the bodies with foreign responsibilities.[8]The theory starts from the confusion between the acts of the state bodies in international realm, which are perfectly valid acts, and the wrongful acts that trigger the responsibility of the state, which are, in fact, breaches of the international obligations. Case law and international practice have constantly proven that the relevant difference cannot be supported. The issue that has dominated the specialized literature has been whether the responsibility of the state can be determined by a wrongful act engaged by any of the state bodies or organs that can be excluded from this category. The differences have been eliminated by an analysis made per each category of body. In fact, so far there have not been identified any arbitral or judicial decision to establish whether the state will not be responsible for instance for the wrongful acts engaged by the legislative of judicial bodies, on the contrary, there are decisions confirming the responsibility of the state or the wrongful acts engaged by the state bodies, irrespective of their position in the state organizational structure.

In conclusion, the international responsibility of the state is triggered in case of charging a state with an act of bodies belonging to the internal organizational structure. Further to analysing the existent doctrine and case law, it can be said that the notion of "state body" is used lato sensu, so that the preparation of a regulation in general terms would not lead to controversies. It is of no interest the internal organization of the state, what is of interest is only the capacity of state body. Still, the specialists in international law and international bodies with attributions regarding the codification of international law have deemed it necessary to mention each category of bodies, in order not to give way to interpretations. As a result, the conduct of each body of the state shall be considered that an act of the state, irrespective of the fact that that body belongs to the legislative, executive, judicial power or have other capacities, irrespective of the position held in the organizational structure of the state and independent of whether it is part of the central governmental bodies of the state or of the local units of the state. A body includes any person or entity that has this capacity in agreement with the internal law of the state.[9]

The law making authority is the vital organizational structure of a state, the problem under scrutiny regards the case where the body that exerts the legislative power can breach international obligations, thus triggering the international responsibility of the states.

---

[7] T. Hillier, Sourcebook on public International law, (London, 1998), p.340.

[8] Yearbook of the International Law Commission, vol.II, Part One, 1971, p.243; C. Eagleton, *The Responsibility of States in International Law, (*New York University Press, 1928), p.54-55.

[9] See in this respect art. 4 of the Draft regarding the responsibility of the states for internationally wrongful acts; The Salvador Commercial Company Case -United Nations, Reports of International Arbitral Awards, vol. XV, 1902, p.477;W.T.O. Panel Report, United States-Measures Affecting the Cross-Border Supply of Gambling and Betting Services,WT/DS285/R, 2004, para.6.128.

In the international legal practice it has been considered that a state is responsible internationally both when the legislative bodies adopt a normative act that infringes an international obligation, and when it does not adopt such an act necessary for the execution of this obligation.[10]

The bodies that exert the executive power present certain particularities within the state organizational structure, bringing into discussion aspects related to the way of distributing the attribution, the position of the public servants, as well as aspects related to the local collectivities determined by the administrative-territorial of the state.

The predominant opinion, which is also currently valid, claims that no distinction is made between the acts of the official superiors and subordinates, if they act based on their official capacity, it is no doubt that the official at an inferior level may have a reduced activity, not being in a position to make the final decision.

The theory has been also taken over by the International Law Commission, being introduced in the regulation at article 4 under the phrasing "irrespective of the position held in the organizational structure of the state".

Being faithful to the opinion expressed in the specialized literature, as well as the ones formulated in the codification works, it is normal to assert that in case of the executive bodies it is of no importance the position held by the state representative or the level of the respective bodies, local or central.[11] Irrespective of whether it is a minister involved or a mere public servant with the local administration, the responsibility of the state is triggered when such persons commit wrongful acts based on their official capacity. The state is responsible for the wrongful act of a public servant when the government has been informed of the public servant's intention and has not acted in due course or in the event where the wrongful act has been committed and the government does no punish the respective public servant.

The state is responsible for the wrongful acts attributed to the central bodies, but also for the wrongful acts committed by the local communities[12]. In this case, it will be considered the way of administrative-territorial division of a unitary state, but also federative states part of a federation.

The principle starts from the concept of unitary state regarded as a subject of international law. As subject of international law the state appears as an entity "equipped" with a complex system of bodies that act under the its control and authority. In respect of the federal state, the internal organizational structure which is different from of a unitary state does not affect in any way the principle of the responsibility of the state for internationally wrongful acts.[13] The component states of the federation, although they have a certain domestic autonomy according to the constitutional provisions, do not have legal personality of international law, do not have the capacity of signing treaties and cannot be held responsible internationally. In the cases where the component units can sign treaties in own name[14], the other party needs agree to limit its recourse to the component unit that has assumed commitments, in the event of infringing an obligation. In such a case, the responsibility of the federal state cannot be invoked as we are not under the scope of the rules regarding the responsibility of the states for wrongful acts. Another possibility provides for the responsibility of the federal state according to the provisions of a treaty, a responsibility which is however limited by a federal clause inserted in the treaty[15]. The cases mentioned above are considered exceptions to the general rules regarding the application of the treaties between the states that are parties to them.

---

[10] G.Geamănu, Drept internațional public (Public International Law), vol.I, (Didactic and Pedagogical Publishing House, Bucharest,1981), p.333.

[11] Moses Case -International Arbitrations, vol.III, 1871, p.3127.

[12] James Crawford, The international Law Commission's Articles on States Responsibility, Introduction, text and Commentaries, (Cambridge University Press 2002), p.97.

[13] Germany v.Unites States of America, I.C.J.Reports, 1999,p.9.

[14] art 56(3),172(3) Swiss Constitution of April 18, 1999.

[15] art. 34 of the Convention on the protection of world cultural and natural heritage in Paris from 1971.

Consequently, the legal provisions focus on the responsibility of the states for wrongful acts engaged by communes, provinces, regions, cantons or component states of a federal state, entities which from a linguistic point of view can be called former bodies of the states.

Judicial authority is independent from the law making and executive power, according to the principle of separation of the state powers; however, it is a state authority that acts on the behalf of such state. From this point of view, the case of a court, which would infringe the norms of international law, could trigger the responsibility of the state. The responsibility of the state for acts of judicial bodies can be triggered when court decisions are adopted that run counter the norms of international law (solutions that ignore the immunity of jurisdiction of a diplomat or the right to be protected of a citizen, or disregarding an extradition treaty) and when the behaviour of the court can be referred to as a denial of justice (refusal to allow access to the court, denying foreign citizens the protection of their rights, delay in the administration of justice, the expedite conducting of judicial procedures, refusal to execute a court decision that is favourable to a foreigner).

3. Persons or entities that act on the behalf of the state

The organizational structure of the states is different and complex, thus beside the category of the state.

It is attributed to the state the behaviour of a person or entity that is not a state body, but that is enabled to exert prerogatives of public power, even if this behaviour infringes the instructions received, or acts under its management or control, as well as the behaviour of a person or group of persons that exert in fact prerogatives of public power in case of an absence of the official authorities.

It has been asserted that the principle of the responsibility of the state for wrongful acts engaged by its state bodies is not necessarily absolute or exclusive.[16] On the contrary, the analyse of the principle would include in the category of the acts attributed to the state, also the acts of persons or groups of persons that do not fall under the category of state bodies. In order to understand more correctly the concept of an entity authorized to exert services of public character or governmental authority, we will analyse the category of the para-state bodies, which can include public corporations, semi-public entities, all types of public agents and even in special cases private companies, on condition that in each case the entity should be empowered to exert public functions, which normally should have been exerted by the state bodies. For instance, in some states, private security companies can be contracted to operate as prison guards and in such case can exert public powers, such as maintaining the state of detention, discipline and tasks regarding the compliance with the prison regulation. The state or private air services can be delegated to exert undoubtedly functions regarding the immigration control or imposing quarantine.

When an entity is attributed powers in order to exert elements of governmental authority, its nature is not taken into account, in the sense that it is disregarded whether the entity is public or private, or it is disregarded the state's participation in the equity or the type of ownership over the goods.

Such entities are empowered by exerting the elements of governmental authority according to domestic law. Against this background, mention must be made that there are taken into account only the activities performed that are not related to state functions and no other private or commercial activities in which such entities can be engaged. Thus, for instance, the management of a railway company involving the ensuring of safety activities is regarded as an activity of the state according to international law, other activities, such as the distribution of tickets, do not fall under the category of the activities analysed.

To international law, it is relevant the connection established between entities and the state in order to be able to analyse the chargeability of the wrongful acts committed on the behalf of the state.

[16] Yearbook of the International Law Commission,1971,vol.II, Part One, p.254.

Considering the claims by the practice and doctrine of international law, I.L.C. has instated the rule mentioned in art.5, thus: the conduct of a person or entity that is not a body of the state according to art.4, but that is empowered according to domestic law to exert elements of governmental authority, can be considered an act of the state according to international law, specifying that the person or entity acts in a specific case.

The legal provision regulates the position of the entities analysed above, the category mentioned not being provided for in art.4 that refers only to the entities that act as state bodies, irrespective of the position held in the organizational structure of the state. The wording is general and the state entities and activities that can be exerted are to be determined by the way of internal organization of the state, by the tradition instated and last but not least by the historic evolution of the concepts.

We have pointed out that the wrongful act can be charged to the state due to the wrongful conducts engaged by the state bodies or by the wrongful conducts engaged by entities that exert elements of governmental authority. Further on, we will focus on the cases where the wrongful acts are engaged by persons or groups of persons that do not have a well-defined position within the organizational structure of the state, but that can determined, by their wrongful acts, the international responsibility of the state.

There is a considerable number of cases, where a person or even a group of persons that, although they do not hold an official position according to the internal order can find themselves in a position to exert certain functions, which are normally exerted by state bodies. As we know, the conduct of private persons is not attributed to the state, thus the wrongful acts engaged by private persons cannot trigger the international responsibility of the state unless under special conditions. It is worth mentioning the role played by the principle of effectiveness in international law, which focuses on the real relation established between an individual or group of individuals and the mechanisms of the state. According to the domestic law, the state often assumes responsibility for the acts committed by private persons that exceptionally exert public functions in the stead of lawful public servants, who omit to exert such functions or are faced with an impossibility to do that. Similarly, the state is considered responsible for the acts of the persons authorized to perform especially public services, or for the acts of individuals or groups of individuals that have been authorized to carry out missions for the state.

The state, in its capacity of subject of international law, could be responsible for the wrongful acts committed by various categories of persons that are not authorized to perform activities, directed, controlled missions or missions according to the instructions of the state. The performance of the specified missions in an improper manner leading to infringing the international obligations assumed triggers the international responsibility of the state. The effectiveness principle, asserted strongly in the analysis made, requires the setting of clear cut criteria showing in a certain manner the relation between the mechanisms of the state and the conduct of the respective person. An act by a person empowered with legal capacity is not necessarily an act of the state, if the respective person acts in private capacity. Similarly, it is but logical that the acts of a private person who in one way or another conducts activities or missions under the coordination of the state can be considered acts of the state and can trigger the international responsibility.

Charging the states with the authorized conduct of persons or groups of persons is recognized by international practice usually in the cases where persons or groups of persons are used as forces ancillary to the armed forces or sent as volunteers to the neighbouring countries, but also in the cases where the persons are charged with certain missions in foreign territories.[17]

---

[17] United Nations,Reports of Interational Arbitral Awards,vol VI,1925, p.160- cazul Zafiro; United Nations, Reports of International Arbitral Awards, vol.IV, 1927, p.267- Stephens case ; American Journal of International Law, Washington, vol.25, No.1, 1931,p.147; UNRIAA, vol.VIII, 1930, p.84 şi UNRIAA,vol.VIII, 1939, p.225- Black Tom şi Kingsland cases.

In respect of the aspect presented above, in some cases there has been developed the concept of the de facto official, and, in order to justify the concept mentioned above, it has sometimes been invoked the theory of appearance, some other times, the theory of necessity or negotiorum gestio[18]. However, there are of no interest the various justifications of the validity of the acts performed according to the internal law of the state, as this has to do with international legal order. Considering the acts committed as acts of the state according to international law is independent from the attribution of the acts according to the domestic law, even is common aspects might exist. As an example of a de facto official, we may refer to a person that assumes public offices without being expressly appointed to a position; they might have been appointed occasionally or although they conducted a regular activity, they have been suspended for a certain period of time. In such cases, it has been asserted that the respective person only apparently exert this position in a regular manner, these acts are not of the officials', but can exceed official capacities or may be unlawful, as the person that acts is not a person with an official capacity. According to the facts above this is a private person that exerts public offices. Nevertheless, the acts and decisions are perfectly valid, according to domestic law, as against a third person. That is why it is normal that such acts should be considered acts of the state according to international law. Such a conduct is attributed to the state only if it is directly controlled, directed, a specific operation, and the challenged conduct has been an integral part of the operation conducted.

The principle does not extend to a conduct that has been only incidental or to a certain extent associated with the operation or when the operation has broken loose from the direction or control of the state. Thus, establishing the degree of control that can be exerted by the state so that the conduct should be attributed to it has been the key of resolving the case Military and Paramilitary Activities in Nicaragua.[19]

The above clearly show that the responsibility of the state for the acts of the persons or groups of persons is triggered only when such persons or groups of persons act according to the instructions or under the guidance or control of the state to meet the conditions of the conduct.

Closely following the principles derived from the international practice, I.L.C. has aimed, throughout its activity of codifying the responsibility of the state for internationally wrongful acts, at regulating the principle stating that a conduct charged against a person or group of persons can be considered an act of the state, if such persons or groups of persons act according to the instructions or guidance or control of the state.[20]There are considered three variants, namely – instruction, guidance, control -, being enough to establish one single variant in order to have a wrongful act attributed to the state.

4.Ultra vires Acts

The problem is whether it is possible to attribute to the state the conduct of its bodies, which act in their official capacity, but exerting in excess the competencies attributed according to the domestic law has been a matter of interest for the specialists in international law for a rather long period of time. The difficulties have been determined first of all by the concept supported by older theoreticians, who based on the premise that state organization is determined exclusively by the domestic law of the state have been wrong to say that it is impossible to attribute to the state the action of entities that are not state bodies or that although they have this capacity do not act according to the provisions of the domestic law. The analysis regarding the conditions under which an action or [18] Administrarea afacerilor altuia (Other business administration).

[19] Martin Dixon, Robert McCorquodale,Cases and Materials on International law,fourth edition, (Oxford University Press, 2003),p.415.

[20] The conduct of a person or group of persons shall be considered an act of a State under international law if the person or group of persons is in fact acting on the instructions of, or under the direction or control of, that State in carrying out the conduct-Article 8- Conduct directed or controlled by a State omission by a body of the state that acts in excess authority or contrary to the instructions received triggers the responsibility of the state, will be made by a diligent research of the practise of the states, judicial decisions and specialized literature.[21] The rule invoked involves the need for clarity and security of the international relations.

The practise of the states' existent in the second half of XIX century seems to be in agreement, on both sides of the Atlantic, to assert the idea that the states need to accept the responsibility for the facts of their bodies, even if the acts committed are manifested outside the attributed competencies or run counter to the legal provisions. Although in principle the states on the European continent had a rather similar position to that of the United States, there still existed differences on the basis of triggering responsibility. It was claimed that the responsibility of the states for the ultra vires acts of the officials is determined by the position of the body in the hierarchical structure of the state, the European States being against such a distinction.

In XX century, it was noted a recognition of the rule, as being a principle of international law.[22] During the preparing works for the Hague Conference, the government of the member states were questioned with regard to the principle according to which the responsibility of the state is triggered in case of committing wrongful acts by the state bodies that act contrary to the legal provisions or in excess of authority. The participants in the Conference adopted an article that established that the international responsibility is chargeable to the states if the damage incurred by a foreigner are the result of unauthorized acts of the officials acting officially, if the actions run counter to the international obligations of the states.

The criteria that prevailed in the Codification Conference in Hague did not suffer big changes, the practice of the states from 1930 to date has proven the recognition of this principle.[23] Constantly, it has been established that the responsibility of the states is engaged for the acts of the military, if force had resulted from an official duty and the military acted under the command of an officer. It has been proven in numerous cases that what is chargeable to the state is the negligence of the officer that exerts control over the soldiers under their command.[24]

As a result, it is recognized the theory according to which it is chargeable to the state internationally its responsibility for the wrongful acts committed by its officials or bodies that act contrary to the orders received or in excess of authority.[25] Wrongful acts committed by the bodies or agencies of the state trigger responsibility, even if there has been no specific authorization. The type of responsibility under scrutiny cannot find its basis in the general principles and we refer here to the principles that govern the internal organization of the state (an allegation supported by the older theoreticians of international law). An action performed by the bodies or agencies of the state is considered an action of the state only if it is performed according to the legal provisions and it remains within the limits of the regulated competency. Thus, an action performed outside the competency, is not an action of the state and will not trigger the responsibility of the state. International life is, however, much more complex and uncertain and accepting the exclusion of the responsibility of the state for the wrongful acts of the state bodies that exceed the attributed competency or run counter the instruction received would make difficult the conducting of international rapports. That is why it has been considered correct to establish the responsibility of the state for the wrongful acts committed by its bodies or agents or organisms that exert public offices, establishing the objective character in order to guarantee the international security. In order to allow the triggering of the objective responsibility, the actions taken by the bodies that act outside the [21] Fourth report on State responsibility, by Mr. Roberto Ago, A/CN.4/264 And Add.1,p. 4.

[22] Digest of International Law, vol.V, p.570-571.
[23] Cazul Youmans-Reports of International Arbitral Awards, vol.IV, (1926), p.115-116; Cazul Caire- Reports of International Arbitral Awards, vol.V, 1929, p.531.
[24] John O'Brien, International Law, (Cavendish Publishing Limited, London, 2001), p.368.
[25] M.Shaw, International Law, 4th Edition, (Cambridge, University Press, 1999), p.549.

competency need to be actions that create the appearance that those bodies act in official capacity or have used methods and powers outside the official competency.[26]This theory was at the basis of the arbitral decision ruled in the Caire case.

This rule was reaffirmed in the Mosse case*,* which states: even if it had been noted that the officials acted outside the legally established competency, it could not be admitted that the request is ungrounded. It would be necessary to establish whether in international order the state could be considered responsible for the actions taken by the officials apparently within the limit of their positions, according to a conduct that was not fully contrary to the instructions received.[27]

The responsibility of the state for the internationally wrongful acts committed by state bodies outside the competency attributed or contrary to the instructions received has been recognized also by the International Courts and Tribunals of Human Rights.[28] For instance, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights established in the Valesquez Rodriquez case that the breaching of the Convention was independent of whether the official had acted contrary to the provisions of the domestic law or above the limits of the authority conferred, in international law the states being considered responsible for the actions or omissions of the agents that acted according to their official capacity, even if the agents acted outside the attributed authority or breached the norms of the domestic law, as they acted under the appearance of the official capacity.[29]

At first sight, further to analysing the theories mentioned above, winning position seems to be held by the traditional theory according to which the state is not responsible for the actions of the bodies or entities that exert elements of government authority, actions that have been taken contrary to the instructions received or in excess of authority, as this would be contrary to the principle that establishes the way of internal organization of a state. However, the reference is international order and not domestic order and in international realm the state is considered responsible for the acts committed by its bodies or agents, as the state has failed to take all the necessary measures to eliminate such cases. It is important to clarify whether the officials have acted based on the state authority or whether the action does not correspond to the set of functions held and then another case comes into attention, namely the status of the private actions that are not attributed to the state. The distinction between the acts not authorized but performed under an official capacity and the private conduct is difficult to make and involves a careful analysis of each case.

The opinions expressed in the specialized literature, the practise of the states and rich case law have helped ILC in its efforts of codification to form a grounded opinion and to assert that the rule is worth introducing in the draft regarding the responsibility of the states and thus it refers to the conduct of a body of the state or of a person or entity empowered to exert elements of governmental authority and mentions that this conduct can be considered an action of the state according to the international law, even if the body, person or entity acts in excess of authority or contrary to the instructions received.

We note that an essential condition is the legal relation between the entities that act and the state, this relation determining essentially the responsibility. Entities are state bodies, irrespective of their place in the organizational structure, or persons or entities empowered with elements of the governmental authority. It therefore results that several conditions are met: a set of attributions, a competency established according to the legal provisions and entities that act exceeding their legal competencies or contrary to the instructions received without, however, having any authorization in this respect. It can thus be considered that the theory of appearance supported by the United States from the very beginning finds its applicability in the cases where the provisions of art. 7 are [26] R. McCorquodale, M. Dixon, op.cit., p.413.

[27] M. Shaw, op.cit., p.549.

[28] European Court of Human Rights, Grand Chamber, Ilaşcu and others v. Moldova and Russia, 2004, para.319.

[29] Yearbook of the International Law Commission, vol.II, Part Two, 2001, p.102.

applicable. We point out that if the appearance of official position did not exist, then it would be obvious that the entities mentioned above would act in a private capacity. It is obvious that the aim is not to formulate justifications to avoid the cases of responsibility of the states, but neither should we exaggerate in considering all the wrongful acts committed as acts of the state.

5.Conduct manifested in the absence or lack of official authorities

This principle is manifested as legitimate in art.4, paragraph A(6) of the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949 regarding the treatment of the war prisoners, as well as other legal international instrument. The recognition of this principle does nothing else than bring back to the attention of the specialized literature the existence of the rule levee en masse, which can be identified with the cases of legitimate defence of the citizens in the absence of the regular forces, it is a form of "agency of necessity". Practice has proven that there can be identified such cases, thus raising the problem of assuming responsibility. In the Yeager v. The Islamic Republic of Iran case*,* the position of the Revolutionary Guards or the "Komitehs" immediately after the revolution in Iran was treated based on the rule analysed by the Court set up upon that occasion. The Court granted compensations for the acts of expelling, but in this case the acts were performed by the Revolutionary Guards after the success of the revolution. Although the Revolutionary Guards did not have at the time the capacity of official bodies of the Iranian state, it was established that they exerted the governmental authority, this aspect being known and approved, thus triggering Iran's responsibility for the actions of the Guards.[30] In a different development, in the Rankin v. The Islamic Republic of Iran case, the Court noted that the claimant failed to prove that he had left Iran after the revolution as a result of the actions of the Iranian government or of the Revolutionary Guards or that he had simply left Iran due to the difficult life conditions existent during the revolution. As such, the responsibility of the Iranian state could not be engaged.[31]

As it can be seen, the setting up of the respective entities is determined by special circumstances arisen in case of revolutions, armed conflicts, foreign occupations, when the legal authorities are dissolved or suppressed becoming non operative. The circumstances need to be such as to generate the necessity of exerting the elements of government authority by private persons. The exerting of elements of government authority can be determined by the absence or actual lack of the official authorities legally constituted, which leads to a complete collapse of the state apparatus or partial collapse by losing the authority over a part of the territory.[32]

In this respect, we welcome the rule instated by the draft articles, meant to cover a wide range of cases identified in practice, according to which the conduct of a person or group of persons can be considered an act of the state, according to international law if the person or group of persons exert in fact elements of governmental authority in the absence or lack of official authority in circumstances that require the exercise of such elements of authority.[33]

From the analysis of the provisions presented above we consider that there can be identified three conditions that need to be met in order to engage the responsibility of the state: the conduct should actually reflect the exerting of the elements of governmental authority; the conduct should be exerted in the absence or lack of official authority; the existing circumstances should require the exertion of governmental authority.

---

[30] M.Shaw, op.cit.,p.552.

[31] Idem.

[32] Such a case should not be mistaken for the situation of the de facto governments, the latter being part of the state structure and replace the governments that existed before them.

[33] Art.9 of the Draft articles regarding the responsibility of the state for internationally wrongful acts.

6. Insurectional movements or other internal unrest

The possibility of the responsibility of the state for wrongful acts committed by bodies of insurrectional movement is analysed generally in relation to the problem of the responsibility of the state for the acts committed by private persons during the internal unrest, the violent rallies. The movement is in essence a "temporary" topic, the length of its existence coincides with the length of the fight against the state, thus, if the fight is suppressed, its existence is finalized and its organizational structure is dissolved. If the movement is victorious, two cases may arise: the insurrectional movement may take over the control over the organizational structure of the old state or a new state may appear.[34]

The first case elaborates on the annihilated insurrectional movement, a case where the specialized literature has identified certain particularities. As a general principle, the acts of some insurgents that violate international law (harming representatives of foreign states, diplomatic missions, foreign citizens and their properties) cannot be charged to the states, as this case resembles, from this point of view, the acts of private persons. Still, the state is responsible also in such cases for the lack of "due diligence" in adopting – if possible – adequate measures of protection or repression.[35] A wide scope support of the principle is included in arbitral case law.[36] Although the case of exoneration from responsibility might constitute a principle, the doctrine claims that it could not be applied to cases where the state has the obligation of due diligence.[37]

We mention that there is no difference between the case where negligence of the state occurs before the insurrectional movement should have an active existence and the subsequent case, where, for instance, the internal restoration took place and the state authority has omitted to punish the authors of the acts committed during the insurrectional movements.

The elimination of the international responsibility for the wrongful acts of the state can be justified in case where it acts with a view to annihilating the insurrectional movement, the case of the internal conflict might constitute an event of force majeure. The rule is easy to support with arguments, but difficult to apply in the context of the general rules under scrutiny.

In conclusion we can say that the annihilated insurrectional movement does not trigger the responsibility of the state for the wrongful acts committed by the agents of the insurrection during the rebellion, apart from the case where it can be invoked the fact that the state had the obligation of due diligence and failed to meet this obligation.[38] On the other hand, the state is not responsible for the actions committed during the military operations conducted in order to annihilate the movement, only if it has caused damage which is not justified in the given circumstances. Thus the defeated insurrection does not engage the responsibility of the state for the acts of the rebels, but the state is, however, responsible for the acts of its agents.[39] The elimination of responsibility can be achieved by invoking the existence of internal unrest, which may constitute an event of force majeure. This conclusion is also shared by the International Law Commission which states that the acts of the insurrectional movement cannot be attributed to the state, they can be charged only if they are classified as acts of the state (as per art. 4 to 9[40]).

---

[34] Gerhard von Glahn, James Larry Taulbee, Law among Nations, 8th Edition, (New York, San Francisco, Boston, 2007), p.328;(Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1972), vol.II, p.129.

[35] Gerhard von Glahn, James Larry Taulbee, op.cit., 2007, p.328; I.Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, (Oxford, 1998), p.162.

[36]Report of International Law Commission, 2001,p.112; M.Shaw, op.cit.,p.551; caz Sambaggio- United Nations, Reports of International Arbitral Awards, vol. X, 1903, p.512-513.

[37] J.O'Brien, op.cit., p.371.

[38] I.Anghel,V.Anghel, op.cit.,p.35.

[39] R. Miga-Beşteliu,op.cit., 2008, p. 34;Patrick Daillier, Mathias Forteau, Nguyen Quoc Dinh, Alains Pellet, op.cit,p.869.

[40] Yearbook of International Law Commission, vol.II, Part Two,2001,p.112.

The success of the insurrectional movement can lead to radical changes to the state against which is has fought, the result being the affecting of the continuity of the state and major changes to its identity. The organizational structure of the pre-existent state ceases to exist, forming a new state on the same territory, with an international personality different from the one of the state that has disappeared. On the other hand, the victory of the insurrectional movement can lead to the apparition of a new state on a part of the territory of the pre-existent state or within the territory under the administration of the state.

The basic principle regarding the attribution of the conduct of the victorious movement or of another movement to the state, according to the international law, is determined by the relation between the movement and the governmental bodies. We mention that the word "conduct" regards the conduct of the insurrectional movement and not the conduct of the members of the movement that can act in own interest.

In case where the insurrectional movement, as new form of government replaces the prior form, the organizational rules of the insurrection become organizational rules of the new state. The continuity existent between the newly established state and the victorious insurrectional movement constitutes a thorough justification to be able to attribute to the new state the acts committed by the insurrection during the fight. In such a case, the state does not cease to exist as subject of international law, it remains the same entity, in spite of the changes occurred, being reorganized and adapted from an institutional point of view. We point out that the acts attributed to the new state are acts committed by the insurrection with a view to winning the fight and forming the new government.

Another form of continuity considers the case where the bodies of the insurrectional movement become bodies of the new state established further to decolonization on a part of the territory of the predecessor state or on the territory under the administration of the predecessor state. The notion of territory needs to be understood as being a part of the territory of the predecessor state over which the movement has obtained sovereignty as a result of the fight conducted or any territory that was under a regime of dependence.

The practice of the states, the arbitral decisions and the specialized literature have confirmed the two cases.[41]

The decisions of the international courts and recent practice undoubtedly confirm the application of the principle of the responsibility of the state for the wrongful acts committed by the victorious insurrectional movement. The Short vs. Iran case, settled by The Iran-United States Claims Tribunal with decision of 1987, proves the possibility of applying the rule under scrutiny only when all the specific circumstances are identified in the case. Thus, the plaintiff, Mr. Short, claimed damages for losing the benefits of the workplace and personal property caused by his forced expulsion from Iran further to the Islamic Revolution of 1978-1979. The plaintiff invoked the acts committed by the revolutionaries trying to attribute the responsibility for these acts to the government that was instated further to the success of the revolution. Still, there were not identified the persons that acted as agents of the revolutionary movement and that forced him to leave the Iranian territory. The acts of the supporters of a revolution cannot be attributed to the government instated further to the success of the revolution, the same as the acts of the supporters of the previous government cannot be attributed to the new government[42], which can also be found expressed in the ILC draft[43]-art.10.

---

[41] United Nations, Reports of International Arbitral Awards, vol IX, 1903, p.453.

[42] Iran-United States Claims Tribunal, (1987-III) 16 Iran-US CTR 76; B. Onica-Jarka,C. Brumar, D.A.Deteşean, Drept internaţional public (Public International Law), Caiet de seminar, (Editura C.H.Beck,Bucureşti, 2006), p.180.

[43] Article 10. Conduct of an insurrectional or other movement:1. The conduct of an insurrectional movement which becomes the new Government of a State shall be considered an act of that State under international

The term of insurrectional movement used by the ILC in para.1,art.10 does not cover all the categories of manifestations in practice of these movements. That is why, under para. 2, it is attempted an extension of the concept, and art.10, para. 1 covers the case where the victorious movement substitutes the organizational structure of the predecessor state, by the phrase "which becomes the new government", by designating the consequences.

However, the provisions mentioned above do not cover the case where the conflict ends by a national reconciliation between the authorities of the state and the leaders of the insurrectional movement. We consider that this case can be classified legally, according to the terms of the national reconciliation, if the reconciliation regarding the maintaining of the governmental authorities of the predecessor state or the takeover of power by the leaders of the movement, this leaving room for joint liability. If the power is taken over by the leaders of the movement, the case can be classified under the scope of the provisions of art. 10, whereas in case of the continuity of the predecessor state, the problem is more difficult to deal with, that is why another separate legal provision would have been necessary in this respect.

There is no distinction between the categories of movements, considering the legitimacy of the acts undertaken in order to form the new government.

The analysis of the text of art. 10 shows that the responsibility of the insurrectional movements or of other similar manifestations does not fall under the scope of the purpose pursued by the Draft regarding the international responsibility of the states for wrongful acts. However, the existence of the responsibility of the defeated insurrectional movement cannot be denied, although it is not regulated. For instance, such an entity could be considered responsible for the violation of the rules of the international humanitarian law by its forces.

7. Responsibility of the states for wrongful acts engaged by bodies of other states.

The development of the international society, by adaptation to various historical periods has led to the apparition of a big number of subjects of international law, resulting in the diversification and intensification of the rapports between them. The most numerous rapports are recorded between the states, thus a state can make available to another state a certain category of bodies or can participate in conducting activities of common interest with other states. The rapport created have international consequences, in this respect, considering the topic under scrutiny, we will deal with the consequences vis-a-vis the international responsibility.

The first case that we will subject to analysis is that in which a state makes available to another state certain bodies, be them individual or collective, so that the respective state can use them in order to perform certain activities or public functions. In practice, such cases may for instance take one of the following shapes: a state makes available to another state a police contingent or a contingent of armed forces so that together with the forces of the beneficiary state it can resist the insurrectional movements or foreign aggression; a state may send to another state a detachment that ensures the medical services, a hospital or bodies that ensure other types of services in order to give assistance in case of an epidemic or a natural disaster; the authorization of the officials of a state to ensure on the territory of a third state services for another state whose officials cannot provide for various reasons.

---

law;2. The conduct of a movement, insurrectional or other, which succeeds in establishing a new State in part of the territory of a pre-existing State or in a territory under its administration shall be considered an act of the new State under international law; 3. This article is without prejudice to the attribution to a State of any conduct, however related to that of the movement concerned, which is to be considered an act of that State by virtue of articles 4 to 9.

A different case is when the bodies of the sending state travel on the territory of the beneficiary state in order to give aid or assistance, but the directions, control or instructions are still given by the state to which the bodies belong.[44]

The cases presented above underscore the fact that the delimitation of the activities needs to be carefully made also according to the circumstances existent on case by case basis. This should not be mistaken for the cases of the states which given the situation they were in – dependence, protectorate, under mandate, military occupation – had to accept the presence of the bodies of another state on their territory or had to make available their own state bodies to the state to which they were subordinated.

The authors of public international law have supported the principle, as it has been justified by the international practice and case law. Brownlie and Durante have been the only ones that have paid a greater attention to explaining the principle of the responsibility of the states for the wrongful acts committed by the bodies made available to another state. Without pointing out the existing particularities, Brownlie claimed that the beneficiary state was responsible,[45] on the contrary, Durante underscored the importance of proving the subject that coordinated and controlled the activity of the engaged bodies. It is important to note that the international practice and case law have left a defining mark. Thus, the principle was applied by the arbitral decision dated 9 July 1931 in the C*hevreau* de by Judge Beichmann, who rules his decision on the basis of the compromise signed in London on 4 March 1930 by France and Great Britain.[46]

The phrase "made available to another state" expresses the essential condition that needs to be proven so that the wrongful act engaged by the respective body should be attributed to the beneficiary state and not to the state to which it normally belongs. Performing various activities under the control or directions of another state involves unequivocally the determination of the activities performed, namely their type and the time span in which it is acted in order to fulfil the functions entrusted by the requesting state, exclusively under the direction and control of the beneficiary state. The bodies in question need to have the capacity of bodies of the sending state, on the one hand, and on the other hand the conduct engaged should involve elements of the governmental authority of the beneficiary state. As a result, private entities and individuals cannot have the capacity of state bodies. For instance, the experts made available to another state according to a program of technical assistance do not have the capacity of state bodies.

The deriving conclusions is the following: in case of wrongful conduct engaged by the bodies of a state, the beneficiary state will be responsible, if the respective bodies had the capacity of bodies of the sending state and if they exerted elements of governmental authority in the beneficiary state, being an integral part of its internal organizational structure.

The analysis cannot be concluded here, as the practice and case law of international law have also identified the case of the states that act jointly triggering the responsibility of a state with regard to the act of another state. It has been claimed that the existence of a wrongful conduct is often determined by the joint action of several states, the cases where a state acts alone being less frequent.[47] There are also cases where several states act independently, but with a view to achieving a common goal or cases where the states acted by means of a common body. The wrongful act may be generated in cases where a state acts on the behalf of another state in fulfilling the respective tasks. There are also circumstances where the wrongful conduct of a state depends on the independent action of another state. A state can engage a conduct together with another state already involved,

---

[44] Xand Z v. Switzerland, (Yearbook E.C.H.R.,372, 1977), p.402-406.

[45] I.Brownlie, Principles of public international law, (Oxford University Press, 1998), p.376.

[46] United Nations Reports of International Arbitral Awards, vol II, (1931), p.1115-1116.; I.Brownlie,op.cit., 1998, p.458.

[47] I.Brownlie, System of the Law of Nations: State Responsability (Part I), (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1983),p.189-192.

thus the conduct engaged by the intervenient state can be relevant or even decisive in determining the existence of infringing the international obligation by the first state. We mention that it is considered the responsibility triggered by the wrongful conducts committed within the international organizations.

There can be brought into discussion also the responsibility of a state that deliberately forced another state to commit an wrongful act. In such cases, the responsibility of the forcing state towards the third state derives from the acts of forcing, the responsibility being determined by the wrongful conduct committed by the action of the forcing state. There can be identified two different rapports: the first rapport arises between the state that commits the acts of forcing and the forced state and the second rapport arises between the forced state and the state victim as a result of the wrongful act committed by the forced state.

With regard to these aspects, the comments on the draft articles regarding the responsibility of the states say that the cases of forcing can equal the invoking of an event of force majeure. Forcing that equals force majeure can determine a cases of absence of the wrongful act of the forced state. As a result, the act of the forced state cannot be considered wrongful act, however, it can be considered an act committed under the control of directions of another state. As a result, by invoking the directions or control exerted by another state, the responsibility of the forcing state could be triggered. On the contrary, if the forcing state was not found guilty, the victim state would be disadvantaged as it would not be able to cover the damage caused. In practice, the forcing is manifest under various forms starting from the use of force, the intervention in the internal affairs of another state or serious economic pressure, forms that can unequivocally lead to committing wrongful acts.

In such a case, where it is invoked the forcing by another state, Romania was also subject to. In the dispute between Romania and the United States, the request of the American government regarding the destruction of the oil storage facilities that belonged to an American company at the request of the Romanian government during World War II was initially formulated against the British government. The prejudice was effected when Romania was at war with Germany, which was preparing to invade Romania. Thus, the United States asked the Romanian authorities to cooperate with Great Britain in order to take the necessary measures. The British government denied responsibility saying that its influence exerted on the Romanian authorities had not exceeded the limits of good counselling between the governments of the states associated in such cases. The central point of the dispute was not represented in fact by determining the responsibility of a state for the wrongful acts committed under the pressure of another state, but rather the existence of forcing.[48]

In this field, the ILC draft includes norms of international law that generate controversies even today. For instance, the case of a body made available to a state by another state has been introduced in Chapter II, which has aimed at codification[49]special circumstances determined by the subjective element of responsibility. With regard to the responsibility of the state in respect of the act of another state, a lengthy analysis has led to the preparation of a separate chapter. Chapter IV thus includes in four articles rules regarding: the responsibility of the state in case of giving aid or assistance to another state; the responsibility of the states when they have exerted directions and control with a view to committing a wrongful act by another state; the case of engaging a wrongful conduct by a state forced by another state, as well as the effects of the respective norms.

The research of the practice of states, international case law and doctrine has led to many divergent opinions even if we are talking about a 50-year long experience.

---

[48]Hackworth Green Haywood, Digest of Internațional Law, vol V, (U.S.Government Printing Office, Washington,1943),p.702 .

[49] Article 6. Conduct of organs placed at the disposal of a State by another State-The conduct of an organ placed at the disposal of a State by another State shall be considered an act of the former State under international law if the organ is acting in the exercise of elements of the governmental authority of the State at whose disposal it is placed.

A part of the authors of international law has criticized rather harshly the approach of ILC. Thus, it is claimed that articles 4-11 approach these matters by the term "attribution", which indicates when an act should be considered an act of the state. These rules are generally traditional and reflect mainly a codification of the existent customary law, rather than a significant development of law. In spite of the apparent concrete character, the standards established under some rules lead to important ambiguities and their application will often require finding significant facts and rationales. For instance, the phrases "government authorities" or persons "under the guidance and control of the state" have been explained by resorting to the decisions ruled by international tribunals that have approached these matters in rather different manners. The state authorities are defined as being all the categories of bodies that are part of the internal organizational structure of a state according to the internal law. But internal law may be an imperfect or incomplete guide or may not include any relevant provisions, so that particular circumstances will be determined outside the national law. The extent to which states should be held responsible for the behaviour that involves private actors is a contemporary topic with an increased significance. Still, the attribution rules as established represent only the tip of the iceberg in respect of the cases where private acts may trigger the responsibility of the state. Thus, the compliance by the state with the environmental agreements depend in most cases not only on the action of the state, but also on the action of private parties whose incapacity of reducing pollution to the levels required by an agreement may lead to the violation of the obligation by the state.[50]

Conclusions

The analysis of the subjective element of the wrongful act makes us adopt a rather uncertain position expressed by the phrase "too much or too little". The purpose is to identify general elements that should determine the preparation of a convention or document of a general character. The identification of particular cases, from our point of view, and their introduction in the content of a general approach cannot be considered as correct. Subsequently, a point may be reached where there may be identified other cases of a special character leading to the possibility of invoking the fact that the state is not responsible. Mention must be made that the aim is to prepare a set of rules regarding the responsibility of the state, irrespective of whether it is about an action or omission, irrespective of whether it is a victorious revolutionary movement or a defeated one, etc. If the intention is to identify other entities that should be responsible for improper international conduct, then it should firstly be established whether these entities can have or not the capacity of subject of international law or in what capacity they are responsible internationally.

References

- I.Anghel,V.Anghel, Răspunderea în dreptul internaţional (Responsibility in International Law), Editura Lumina Lex, Bucureşti (Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest), 1998;
- R. M. Beşteliu, Drept internaţional public-curs universitar (Public International Law- university course), vol.II, (Editura C.H.Beck, 2008);
- I.Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, (Oxford, 1998);
- James Crawford, The international Law Commission's Articles on States Responsibility, Introduction, text and Commentaries, ( Cambridge University Press 2002);
- Patrick Daillier, Mathias Forteau, Nguyen Quoc Dinh, Alains Pellet, Droit international public, 8 edition, (LGDJ, 2010;)

[50]D. Bodansky, J. R.Crook, Introduction and Overview, Symposium: The ILC's State Responsibility Articles, American Journal of International Law, vol.96, 2002, p.782.

- I.Diaconu, Tratat de drept internațional public (Treatise on Public International Law), vol. III, (Editura Lumina Lex, Bucureşti, 2005);
- C. Eagleton, *The Responsibility of States in International Law, (*New York University Press, 1928);
- G.Geamănu, Drept internațional public (Public International Law), vol.I, (Editura Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucureşti, 1981);
- Gerhard von Glahn, James Larry Taulbee, Law among Nations, 8th Edition, (New York, San Francisco, Boston, 2007);
- T. Hillier, Sourcebook on public International law, (London, 1998);
- F. Maxim, Dreptul răspunderii statelor pentru fapte internațional ilicite (Responsibility of the States for Intrnationally Wrongful Acts), (Editura Renaissance, 20110;
- D.Popescu, A.Năstase, Drept internațional public (Public International Law), Ediție revăzută şi adăugită, (Casa de editură şi presă „Şansa" S.R.L., 1997);
- D. Popescu, F. Maxim, Drept internațional public-curs pentru învățământul la distanță (Public International Law – course of lectures for distance learning), (Editura Renaissance, 2010;
- D.Popescu, A.Năstase, Drept internațional public (Public International Law), Ediție revăzută şi adăugită, (Casa de editură şi presă „Şansa" S.R.L., 1997);
- John O'Brien, International Law, (Cavendish Publishing Limited, London, 2001);
- M.Shaw*, International Law,* 4th Edition, (Cambridge, University Press, 1999);
- Draft articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, with commentaries 2001, Yearbook of the International Law Commission, (2001), vol. II, Part Two.

THE PRINCIPLE OF SUBSIDIARITY – THE LEGAL BASIS FOR THE PARTICIPATION OF NATIONAL PARLIAMENTS AT THE EUROPEAN UNION'S LEGISLATIVE ACTIVITY

GABRIEL ANDRONACHE*

Abstract
The communication aims to emphasize the context in which the principle of subsidiarity was adopted, clarifying the dilemma about its purpose: is it a legal instrument to protect national sovereignty of the European Union's Member States or is it a legal instrument which accelerates their federal integration. The document also approaches the problem of the Romanian Parliament in adapting procedures to the Lisbon Treaty, Protocol no. 2 on applying principles of subsidiarity and proportionality. In the described context it shall be discussed the controversial subject regarding the sovereignty transfer whenever the national parliament performs a subsidiarity check on an EU draft legislative act.

Keywords: subsidiarity, Lisbon Treaty, Protocol no. 2, national level, the European Union's Member States.

1. Introduction

Subsidiarity is the legal instrument through which the states affirm their legal sovereign willpower (and determination) in the legislative process of theEuropean Union. Is this affirmation true? Most opinions in European law doctrine confirm this idea.

The doctrinally arguments supporting that the states manifest their sovereignty in the legal european area by applying the sovereignty principle are multiple. Their detail must start from the historical perspective over the start and later over the strengthening of this principle.

"In the doctrine it was sustained[1] that the principle of subsidiarity, a principle that is considered constitutionally fundamental in European law, comes from the Roman-Catholic mentation of 1930`s, according to whom the social, politic and human problems must find their solution as close as possible to the individual, inside his community: family, school, working place; the political echelon (superior) must be requested only ultimately, as the first one is outdated"[2]. It was also pointed in the doctrine that "the idea of subsidiarity is specific to the federal/federate ratio, or German law generally"[3].

"The presence of the principle of subsidiarity inside European Union is old. Its associated purpose does not miss a moment from this system. This way, it can be appreciated that the communitary structure appeared as consequence to the implementation of subsidiarity, while the competence assignment operated to its benefit was, incontestably, generated by the experienced need of Member States of regrouping to deal together with some problems that they could not individually solve any longer, or could not satisfying solve. In this spirit were amended institutive treaties, meaning that new competences were assigned the Communities new competences when trough the European Single Act and Treaty on the European Union"[4].

---

* Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, (email: gabiandronache@yahoo.com).

[1] N.W.Barber, The limited modesty of subsidiarity, European Law Journal, vol. 11, (2005), p.308; A. Follesdal, Subsidiarity, Journal of Political Philosophy, 1998, p.231-259.

[2] Raluca Bercea, European Law. Basics, (C.H.Beck, Bucharest, 2007), p. 327.

[3] V. Constantinesco, Who`s Afraid of Subsidiarity, in A. Barraw, D.A. Wyat and J. Wyat (ed.) Yearbook of European Law 11 , (Clarendon, Oxford,1991), p.3.

[4] Raluca Bercea – c.w. , p. 327-328.

"The constitutionalisation of the principle due the Maastricht Treaty, in which preamble the European Member States declare themselves decided to continue the creating process of a tighter and tighter union between european nations where the decisions will be taken as close as possible to the citizen, according to the principle of subsidiarity. The second Article of the Treaty, which defines European Union`s Purposes, contains also a reference to the principle of subsidiarity, which will be imposed, generally, to all Union`s institutions"[5]. In this direction article 5 of the Treaty, establishing the European Community (inserted by the Treaty regarding European Union) disposes: "The community acts in its competences limits and its established objectives through this treaty. In the fields that are not related to its exclusive competence the community does not interfere, according to the principle of subsidiarity, only if and as far as the objectives and purposes are better realized at communitary level"[6] .

The principle of subsidiarity was taken and extended in the treaty regarding the instauration of a Constitution for Europe, not active. Currently, this principle is settled, in the European Union Function Treaty where it has two protocols consacrated, The Protocol number 2 regarding the application of the principle of subsidiarity and proportionality and the Protocol number 1 regarding the role that national Parliaments are having in European Union, which devote the legal mechanism through which the principle of subsidiarity finds its relevance.

We observe, inside the legal evolution that the principle of subsidiarity became an indispensable mechanism to maintaining and affirming the states sovereignty, in the ample elaboration process of legal documents at european level.

"Joel Rideau notices that if initially the states became aware of the necessity to assign some competences to European Union to be able to deal with some common duties"[7], then "the development of communitary competences and their wield had gathered fear reactions received from some states restless to see their sovereignty limited. The national Parliaments felt often voided of their prerogatives in behalf of a system characterized by an incontestable democratic deficiency. The component states often felt frustrated and restless towards the communitary power. The German Lands reactions had a true catalyst role in the establishment of this principle"[8].

Another doctrinaire, Jean-Paul Jaque notices, regarding the principle of subsidiarity that it "governs the exercise of competences". Although the statement used in the Maastricht Treaty is negative ("Community does not interfere") the principle of subsidiarity presents two aspects: one way it limits the communitary intervention when a problem that can be solved by the Member States; on the other way, however, it involves a communitary action when it appears necessary due the problem`s magnitude and due the incapacity of the Member States in treating it effectively"[9].

In practice and also in doctrine the principle of subsidiarity generates arguments and controversies. The principle is identified as an instrument through which the states can manifest their national sovereignty inside the political union or as an instrument through which the overstatal character of European Union confirms itself and this way it reduces the manifest for sovereign willpower of European Union`s Member States. Our demarche intends to clarify this controversy.

[5] Raluca Bercea – c. w. , p. 331.

[6] European Union Traty, Maastricht, 1992.

[7] Constanţa Călinoiu, Victor Duculescu, Constitutional European Law, (Lumina Lex publishing, 2008), p.178

[8] Joel Rideau, Droit institutionnel de l`Union et des Comunnautes europeenne, II, (Librairire Generale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, Paris, 1999), p. 907 .

[9] Constanţa Călinoiu, Victor Duculescu, idem 7

2. Content

The principle of subsidiarity - legal instrument of strengthening the legal power of European Union

The doctrine delivers extremely diversified points of view regarding the role and exercise of principle of subsidiarity. Many of the opinions are expressed in supporting the assumption that the principle of subsidiarity was instituted to protect the national sovereignty compared to the tendency to gain all the settlement fields at union level, such as J. Steiner`s opinion: " The European Union was not preoccupied with the distribution of competencies between community and Member States, but with the distribution of duties/responsibilities from a very large activities area, with the purpose touching some common objectives and mutual conveniences. Although it was obvious that in some contents the possibility of an action from the Member States was reduced, still, to be able to gather the wanted purpose- the custom community was an indispensable premise to the unique market- in most areas the competency was convergent. This did not mean that the states and the Union could govern the same thing in the same time, or that there were not required any kind of restrictions to the competency of the states in this areas (when they had to follow the rules included in the treaties-institutive and modifying), but that their action had to have a complementary or an additional character. Obviously, once the Union wielded its attributions, gained through the treaty, to govern a certain aspect inside an activity field, the states have no longer the liberty to develop measures that could overcome those rules. The states attributions decrease in the same time with the increase of the volume and area of inclusion of communitary law. But the contents of activity in which the Member States did not held a certain level of competency are few"[10]

An opposite opinion was expressed by A.G.Toth. He affirms that "repeatedly" (...) the Court confirmed (...) that in all contents transferred to the Union by the Member States, the Union`s competency is practically exclusive and does not keep a corner to some competencies from the Member States. So, where the competency of the Union starts, the one of Member States ends. Consequently, where the Union`s competency starts, the competency that the Member States have ends. Beyond this point the Member States have no longer the prerogative to elaborate one sided law. They can operate in the limits of their strictly defined attributions in management/implementation, delegated backward toward the national authorities by the Union`s institution. As the Court of justice of European Union decided "the existence of Union`s Competencies excludes the possibility of some concurrent responsibilities from the Member States. "Not even the fact that, for a certain period of time, the Union does not exercise the competency that has been conveyed to, does not create a concurrent competency in favor of Member States during that period of time. This principle results from the doctrin (and jurisprudence- a.n.) of supremacy of Europe Union`s law, which, of course, is a basic principle of European Law"[11] Based on the jurisprudence created regarding European Union`s law supremacy compared to national laws "the European Court of Justice is considered often the <<negative character>>"[12] because, some national voices say, this defeats through the decrees the national powerwill of Member States. In this context, „the application of subsidiarity principle had create, as expected, important problems in interpreting, specially inside European Union`s Court of Justice. One of them is the question if the action of Member States, that the art. 5 (ex 3B) of TCE reports must be related to the activity developed by the states individually or/and collectively. This involves examining if a collective action of the states can or cannot go under the incidence of subsidiarity principle and in what measure"[13].

---

[10] J. Steiner, Subsidiarity under the Maastricht Treaty, O`Keefee şi Twomey, Legal Issues of Maastricht Treaty (Chancery,1994), p.57-58

[11] A.G. Toth, A Legal Analysis of Subsidiarity, O`Keefee şi Twomey, Legal Issues of Maastricht Treaty (Chancery,1994), p.39-40

[12] Paul Craig, Grainne de Burca, European Law, IV (ed.), (Hamangiu publishing, Bucharest, 20090, p. 133

[13] Constanţa Călinoiu, Victor Duculescu, c.w., p.179

The Court of Justice, in 1996, in test case the Board versus Belgium, expressed its point of view, meaning it "excluded the possibility that the principle of subsidiarity would justify the taking, culturally contented, of a state from the obligations resulting from the Directive 89/552/CEE from October 3,1989 regarding the redistribution of cable emission"[14].

It is interesting to analyze if the principle of subsidiarity is a warranty-instrument to protect the national sovereignty or is an instrument wherethrough it`s guaranteed to the european institutions the "won right" in the way of legal competence.

At first view we could be temped to consider the principle of subsidiarity a favoring instrument to sovereign powerwill of the states, but the institutive and improvement treaty`s evolution, starting with the Maastricht Treaty and ending with Lisbon Treaty, contravenes this hypothesis. The principle of subsidiarity has become the legal instrument that guarantees the application of Supremacy Principle of European Law! We argue this affirmation through the fact that the sent settlement fields, by sovereignty transfer to communitary level, exit the settlement area of the states and enter in the exclusive Union`s settlement competency, using the reason that at communitary level the settlement is more effective. Consequently, by applying the subsidiarity principle at communitary and national level fulfills the process of sovereignty renouncement. When an european institution applies the subsidiarity control to a law-making project and claims that it is in its competency to govern, practically it invests itself with the sovereign force of states, and when the states, following the same procedure find out that is respected the principle of subsidiarity, they proceed to a sovereignty renouncement, that they transfer, through every favorable notice, to the european institutions.

It is also interesting the procedure that the national parliaments accomplish this transfer. The common disposals are found in the Protocol 2 regarding the application of the principle of subsidiarity, Treaty regarding European Union Function. In this protocol it`s showed through the disposals of article 6 and 7 that "in term of eight weeks from the date of sending a law-making project in official languages of Union, any national parliament or any chamber can address to the President of European Parliament, to the President of the Commission and to the President of the Council, with a motivated notice that expose the reasons why they consider that the project is not in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity."

Every national parliament or every chamber of a national parliament has the assignment to consult the regional parliaments with legal competences. Every national parliament has two votes, allocated according to the national parliamentary system. If the parliamentary system is a two-chambered system, every chamber has a vote. If the motivated notices regarding non-compliance with the principle of subsidiarity by a law-making project represent at least the third part of all votes adjudicated to national parliaments, according to indent (1), second paragraph, the project needs to be reevaluated. This bar is the fourth part in case of a law-making project presented in validity of the article 76 from the Treaty regarding the action of European Union, concerning liberty space, security and justice."

The member states apply different procedures to assay the concordance of a law-making project with the principle of subsidiarity.

In Austria the article 23(d) from the Constitution gives Lands the possibility to influence Austria`s position inside the process of adopting decisions in European Union, through the presentation of their point of view. Therefore, the article 23 letter (d) establishes:

„(1) The Federation must inform the Laender without delay regarding all projects within the framework of the European Union which affect the Laender's autonomous sphere of competence or could otherwise be of interest to them and it must allow them opportunity to present their views within a reasonable interval to be fixed by the Federation. Such comments shall be addressed to the Federal Chancellery. The same holds good for the municipalities in so far as their own sphere of competence or other important interests of the municipalities are affected. Representation of the municipalities is in these matters incumbent on the Austrian Association of Cities and Towns (Austrian Municipal Federation) and the Austrian Association of municipalities (Austrian Communal Federation) (Art. 115 paragraph. 3).

[14] Constanța Călinoiu, Victor Duculescu, c.w., p.180

(2) Is the Federation in possession of a uniform comment by the Laender on a project within the framework of European Union where legislation is Land business, the Federation is bound thereby in negotiations with and voting in the European Union. It may deviate therefore only for compelling foreign and integration policy reasons. The Federation must advise the Laender of these reasons without delay.

(3) In so far as a project within the framework of the European Union affects also matters whose legislation is Land business, the Federal Government can assign to a representative nominated by the Laender participation in the Council's formation of its objective. The exercise of this authority will be effected in co-operation with the competent member of the Federal Goverment and in co-ordination with the latter. Para. 2 above applies to such a Land representative. In matters pertaining to Federal legislation the Laender representative is responsible to the National Council, in matters pertaining to Land legislation to the Land legislatures in accordance in respect with Art. 142.

The article 23 (e) establishes the participation of the National Council and Federal Council to prepare Austria`s position that needs to be defended inside the decisional process in European Union:

(1) The competent member of the Federal Government shall without delay inform the National Council and the Federal Council about all projects within the framework of the European Union and afford them opportunity to vent their opinion.

(2) Is the competent member of the Federal Government in possession of an opinion by the National Council about a project within the framework of the European Union which shall be passed into Federal law or which bears upon the issue of a directly applicable juridical act concerning matters which would need to be settled by Federal legislation, then the member is bound by this opinion during European Union negotiations and voting. Deviation is only admissible for imperative foreign and integrative policy reasons.

(3) If the competent member of the Federal Government wishes to deviate from an opinion by the National Council pursuant to paragraph 2 above, then the National Council shall again be approached. In so far as the juridical act under preparation by the European Union would signify an amendment to existing Federal constitutional law, a deviation is at all events only admissible if the National Council does not controvert it within an appropriate time.

(4) If the National Council has pursuant to paragraph 2 above delivered an opinion, then the competent member of the Federal Government shall report to the National Council after the vote in the European Union. In particular the competent member of the Federal Government shall, if deviation from an opinion by the National Council has occurred, without delay inform the National Council of the reasons therefore"[15].

The national dispositions of Belgium, through the article 168 dispose "the information of Parliament`s Chambers when the negotiations regarding a review of European Union Treaties start. They have to be informed about the new treaty before it has been signed." The Constitution of Belgium anticipates (article 105 paragraph 3) the obligation that the Council of Ministers has to inform the National Congregation regarding Belgium`s obligations that come from its quality of member of European Union:

[15] Chamber of Deputies, Department of legal studies, Study Constituional, 2010, p.2

Article 105 paragraph (4) mentions expressly the Council`s duty to inform detailed and in advance the National Congregation regarding its actions in the context of participating to the adopting process of law-making projects of European Union. "If participating at elaboration and adoption of law-making projects inside European Union, the Council of Ministers informs the National Congregation in advance and in detail regarding its actions. Up to now it was not adopted any special law that details the procedure Belgium would exercise its vote concerning the conformation for the principle of subsidiarity in elaborating and adopting legislative european acts"[16].

Regarding Czech Republic, "according to article 10(b) from the Constitution, the Government has the duty to inform the Parliament repeatedly and in advance about the aspects referring to the obligations resulted from Czech Republic`s quality as member to an international organization. The Parliament`s Chambers express their notice about the decisions of such an international organization or institution accurately through the standing orders. Also, the article decides that the competences can be assigned through a law concerning the principles in those reports area of common organ of the Chambers"[17].

"According to the paragraph 20 from the Constitution, the prerogatives that authorities of Denmark have can be transferred to the international authority invested through a mutual agreement with other states, the purpose being promoting the international law and co-operative rules. To adopt a law-making project a majority of 5/6 of all Parliament`s members is needed (Folketing). If this majority is not obtained, but there is the majority needed to adopt an ordinary law, and if the Government continues to defend the law project, it will be subjected to the poll, respecting the rules regarding organizing the referendum"[18]

The article 93 from Finland`s Constitution mentions "The Government is responsible for the national preparation of the decisions to be made in the European Union, and decides on the concomitant Finnish measures, unless the decision requires the approval of the Parliament. The Parliament participates in the national preparation of decisions to be made in the European Union, as provided in this Constitution."

„The Parliament participates in the national preparation of decisions to be made in the European Union, as provided in this Constitution. Concerning establishing Parliament`s position, the Government is obligated to communicate immediately the motions mentioned previously. The motions are to be debated in the Great Commission and in one or more special commissions that are obligated to show reports to the Great Commission.

The Foreign Affairs Commission debates motions that have as goal foreign policy and security. When needed the Great Commission or Foreign Affairs Commission can emit a report on the motion to the Government. Plus, the President`s Conference can decide if the motion is debated in plenum, when no decisions will be made by the Parliament.

The Government is forced to deliver to permanent commissions all the information needed for the debates concerning formulated motions inside European Union. Also, the Great Commission and the Foreign Affairs Commission must be updated regarding the Government`s position about the analyzed issues.

According to article 97, the Great Commission must receive reports from the Government concerning the problems debated inside European Union. The president`s conference decides if any of those reports must be debated in plenum, but those debates do not end with Parliament taking any decision.

[16] Chamber of Deputies, c.w., p.3
[17] Chamber of Deputies, c.w., p.3-4
[18] Idem

The Prime-Minister is obligated to deliver to the Parliament or to any parliamentary commission information about problems that will be debated inside European Council. The competent commission emits a report addressed to the Government, based on reports and information previously mentioned"[19].

In France "Title XV of the Constitution, titled-About the European Union, was amended by Constitutional Law no. 2008-103 of February 4th 2008 in order to allow the ratification of the Lisbon Treaty and establish a constitutional basis for new prerogatives recognized in national parliaments. Two new articles were introduced, 88-6 and 88-7.

According to Article 88-1, "The Republic that participates in the EU consists of countries that have freely chosen to exercise certain powers of their common pursuant to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty on the Operation of the European Union, as reflected in the Treaty signed in Lisbon on December 13th 2007 ".

According to Article 88-4, "The Government presents the National Assembly and the Senate the draft European legislative acts and other projects or proposals of EU acts, after being received from the EU council. According to the manner prescribed by the regulations of each Assembly (Chambers of Parliament), European resolutions can be voted, outside the sessions if necessary, on projects or proposals referred to, as well as any documents coming from an EU institution. It states that "within each parliamentary Assembly, a committee responsible for European affairs will be established".

Article 88-5 states that any bill authorizing the ratification of a treaty on the EU accession of a State should be subject to referendum by the President of the Republic. However, by vote of a resolution adopted in an identical form by each of the Assemblies by a majority of three fifths, the Parliament can authorize the adoption of a Bill in accordance with the procedure referred to in Article 89, Paragraph 3 of Constitution17.

According to Article 88-6, "The National Assembly and the Senate may issue a reasoned opinion on the conformity of a draft legislative act with the principle of subsidiarity; the opinion is addressed by the President of the Assembly concerned to the Presidents of the European Parliament, the Council and the European Commission; also, the Government is informed. Each Assembly may appeal to the Court of Justice of the European Union against a European legislative act for violating the principle of subsidiarity; this action is transmitted to the ECJ by the Government. To this end, resolutions may be adopted, according to the initiative and the discussions set by the regulation of each Assembly. A ."Legal action is initiated at the request of sixty deputies or sixty senators 18 ".

Article 88-7 states that the Senate and the National Assembly (the Parliament) may oppose, by voting a motion adopted in identical terms by the Chambers, to the changing of the rules for the adoption of the EU acts - regarding the simplified revision of treaties and judicial cooperation in civil matters through the TEU and the TOEU "[20].

As for Germany, "as primary disposition regarding the participation of this EU State Member, Article 23 of the Fundamental Law (Constitution) states that, in order to establish a united Europe, Germany shall participate in the development of the European Union which is committed to the democratic, social and federal principles of the state of law and to the principle of subsidiarity and which ensures a level of protection of fundamental rights essentially comparable to that granted by the Basic Law. To this end, the Federation may transfer the powers of sovereignty, by law, with the consent of the Bundesrat. The Establishment of the European Union, as well as the changes of its treaties and of the comparable regulations, changes that either complete the German Fundamental Law or allow such changes and additions, are subject to the rules of Article 79, paragraphs (2) and (3) [amending the Constitution].

[19] Constitution of Finland, art. 96
[20] Chamber of Deputies, c.w., p.5

Bundestag and the Länder, through the Bundesrat, may participate in EU affairs. The federal government has an obligation to inform the Bundestag and the Bundesrat, comprehensively and as early as possible.

Before participating in the adoption of the EU legislation, the federal government is obliged to give the Bundestag the opportunity to express its position. During negotiations, the federal government shall take into consideration the position of the Bundestag; the details will be established by law.

Bundesrat participates in the federal decision-making process as long as it is competent to participate in the appropriate business internally or to the extent in which the matter falls within the internal competence of the Länder.

To the extent that, in a matter within the exclusive competence of the Federation, Länder interests are affected, as well as in other matters, as long as the Federation has legislative power, the federal government is obliged to take into account the position of the Bundesrat. As far as the powers of the Land, the structure of Land authorities or their administrative procedures are being affected, the position of the Bundesrat must be taken into account to the highest extent possible, under the federal responsibility for the nation as a whole. In matters which can increase costs or reduce revenues for the federation, the consent of the federal government is needed.

When the exclusive legislative powers of the Lands in matters of education, culture or broadcasting are affected, the exercise of the rights belonging to the Federal Republic of Germany, as an EU Member State, will be delegated by the federation to a Land representative designated by the Bundesrat.

These rights shall be exercised with the participation and coordination of federal government, their performance must comply with the federal responsibility for the nation as a whole.

The details of the above provisions are regulated by law, requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 24 of the Fundamental Law brings under regulation the transfer of the prerogatives of sovereignty. The Federation may transfer, through a law, such prerogatives of sovereignty to international organizations.

To the extent to which provinces are empowered to exercise state powers and perform state functions, they can transfer, with the federal government's agreement, the sovereign prerogatives to the transboundary institutions of the neighbouring regions.

In order to maintain peace, the Federation may join a system of mutual collective security; in doing so, she will consent to limitations of the prerogatives of sovereignty needed in order to lead to and ensure a lasting peace in Europe and among the peoples of the world. To settle disputes between states, the federation adheres to agreements that establish the general international arbitration, comprehensively and mandatory.

Article 45 of the Fundamental Law states about the EU Affairs Committee. The Bundestag shall appoint an Affairs Committee of the European Union and authorize the commission to exercise its rights specified in Article 23 of the Fundamental Law in its relations with the federal government.

Article 50 establishes the participation of the Lands, through the Bundesrat, in the legislative and administrative procedures of the federation in matter regarding the European Union. In matters on the European Union, the Bundesrat will establish a Chamber for European Affairs, whose decision shall be deemed to be decisions of the Bundesrat "[21].

The Greek Constitution, revised on May 27th, 2008, states in Article 70 about "the obligation to bring under regulation, in the Statute of organisation and functioning of the Parliament, of the procedure by which the Parliament is informed by the Government on matters covered by the legislative proposals of the EU institutions and on their debates."

[21] Chamber of Deputies, c.w., p.6-7

In the Republic of Ireland, "the law on the 28th Amendment of the Constitution in 2009, promoted (by referendum) in order to ratify the Lisbon Treaty, has a number of important provisions regarding the participation of this State Member in the European Union, stating that<< Ireland reaffirms its commitment to the European Union in which member states of this Union work together to promote peace, common values and welfare of their peoples>>.

The State may exercise the following options and powers specified in the Treaty of Lisbon provided a prior approval by both Houses of Parliament (Oireachtas) of that decision, regulation or law was given:

- Enhanced cooperation, referred to in Article 20 TEU;
- Protocol. 19 on integrating the Schengen acquis in the EU;
- Protocol. 21 on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland regarding the area of freedom, security and justice, including the option of applying this protocol to cease, in whole or in part, on Ireland.

Also, the state can agree on decisions, regulations or other laws:

- Under the TEU and TOEU, which authorizes the EU Council to decide differently than unanimously;
- Under these treaties, which authorizes the adoption of the ordinary legislative procedure;
- Under Article 82 (2) (d) TOEU, Article 83 (1) paragraph (3) TOEU and Article 86 (1) and (4) TOEU, for space of freedom, security and justice.

The State can not adopt a decision already adopted by the European Council in order to establish a common defense under Article 42 TEU, situation in which the common defense would include Ireland"[22].

"The Constitutional Law on the status of Lithuania as member of the EU IX-2343, to which Article 150 of the Constitution refers to, establishes rules of constitutional powers in relation to EU matters. The Government informs the Parliament (Seimas) on proposals for the adoption of Community acts. The Government is obliged to consult with Seimas on matters of its competencies. The Parliament may recommend a certain position of the Lithuanian Government on those proposals. According to the Seimas Regulation, the Committee on European Affairs of the Seimas Committee on Foreign Affairs may present to the Government the Seimas opinion on the proposals for the adoption of Community acts. The Government will consider the recommendations or opinions presented by the Seimas or by the committees and will inform the Seimas about their execution, according to the established procedure"[23]

In the case of Malta, "according to Article 65 of the Constitution, the Parliament may legislate for peace, order and good governance in accordance with full respect for human rights, generally accepted principles of international law and regional and international obligations of Malta, especially the obligations under the Treaty of Accession to the European Union (signed in Athens on April 16,2003)"[24].

Also in Article 7 of the Constitution of Portugal "a provision is found for the participation in the EU of this member state, meaning that Portugal shall take every effort to strengthen European identity and strengthen the actions of European states to democracy, peace, economic progress and justice in the relations between peoples.

In terms of reciprocity and respect for fundamental principles of a democratic state based on rule of law and the principle of subsidiarity and in order to achieve economic, social and territorial cohesion in an area of freedom, security and justice and the definition and implementation of foreign policy, security and defense policy, Portugal may enter into agreements in order to exercise jointly or in cooperation with EU institutions, the powers needed to build and deepen the European Union.

[22] Chamber of Deputies, c.w., p.7
[23] Chamber of Deputies, c.w., p.8
[24] Chamber of Deputies, c.w., p.9

Article 8 [International law] states that the treaties governing the European Union and the rules adopted by its institutions in discharging their responsibilities apply to the internal national law in accordance with the Portuguese law and the fundamental principles of a democratic state based on rule of law.

Article 33 regulates the expulsion, extradition and asylum, a provision which states the application on matters of extradition of the rules regarding the judicial cooperation in criminal matters adopted by the European Union.

According to Article 112, the transposition of EU legislation and other legislations in national legal system may take the form of a law, a decree or order of a regional legislative decree.

Article 161 specifies the responsibility of the Assembly of the Republic to rule, within the law, on matters that are being debated by EU bodies, matters which are under the exclusive legislative competence of the Assembly.

Also, according to Article 163, the Assembly is responsible for supervising and examining Portugal's participation in building the European Union.

In his political performance, the Government shall respond, in relation to articles 161 and 163 of the Constitution, by providing information to the Assembly on the construction of the EU (Article 197).

Article 227 establishes the powers of the autonomous regions, including from the point of view of European businesses "[25].

The Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia "in Article 3a states that during the taking of legal norms and decisions of international bodies to which Slovenia has transferred part of its sovereign rights, the Government is obliged to inform the National Assembly on proposals for such acts and decisions as well as on their work. The National Assembly may adopt positions thereon, and the Government is obliged to take account of these positions in their activities "[26].

Slovakia "may transfer the practice of a part of its rights to the European Communities and the European Union under Article 7 of the Constitution, through an international treaty ratified and promulgated in accordance with the procedure regulated by law, or under such treaty. Legally binding acts of the European Communities and European Union laws have priority over Slovakia. Legally binding documents that require the implementation will be adopted by law or by emergency decree under Article 120 (2) of the Constitution"[27].

In Sweden "Article 6 of the Instrument of government has required the Government to continuously inform the Parliament (Riksdag) and consult with the bodies appointed by the Riksdag on developments on the European Union.The Parliament Act establishes detailed rules on the obligation of informing and consulting"[28].

In Romania, the constitutional provisions on the procedure for cooperation with European Union laws are general, art. 148 decides that:

"(1) Romania's accession to the Constitutive Treaties of the European Union, in order to transfer certain powers to Community institutions and to exercise jointly with other member states the abilities stipulated in such treaties, is achieved by adopted law in the joint session of the Chamber of Deputies and Senate, by a majority of two thirds of deputies and senators.

[25] Idem
[26] Chamber of Deputies, c.w., p.10
[27] Idem
[28] Ibidem

(2) Following the accession, the provisions of the Constitutive Treaties of the European Union and other mandatory community regulations, have precedence over the provisions of the national laws, in compliance with the Act of Accession.

(3) The provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) shall apply accordingly to the accession of the acts of revision of the Constitutive treaties of the European Union.

(4) The Parliament, the President of Romania, the government and the judicial authority shall guarantee the obligations resulting from the accession act and the provisions of paragraph (2).

(5) The Government shall send the two Chambers of Parliament the draft mandatory acts before they are subject to approval by EU institutions".

According to Art. 148 of the Constitution, the Romanian Parliament adopted, for verification of European law through the principle of subsidiarity, Decision no. 11/2011. The procedure for the determination of the compliance of the legislative act with the principle of subsidiarity works as follows: the "following documents are subject to parliamentary review of the European Union:

a) draft laws eligible for subsidiarity test under Protocol. 2 of the Lisbon Treaty in order to establish the compliance with or the breach of the principle of subsidiarity;

b) draft legislation of the European Commission, EU Council and European Parliament and the European Commission's consultation documents, selected by the Chamber of Deputies in accordance with their political, economical, social, financial or legal relevance.

c) projects of EU legislation for which the Government of Romania draw general terms"[29]"Parliamentary scrutiny is completed by developing one or more documents or acts of the Chamber of Deputies, as follows:

a) reasoned opinion when identifying a failure to comply with the principle of subsidiarity by a legislative proposal of the European Union;

b) opinion, in the case of fund reviewing of the legislative proposals and consultation papers, which express the views of the Chamber of Deputies;

c) information report on the documents examined, at the initiative of the European Affairs Committee of the Chamber of Deputies, to which it appoints a rapporteur or a group of reporters;

d) minutes of debate or hearings organized by the concerned committees in joint or separate meetings"[30].

"The Chamber of Deputies receives the referral letter that initiates the 8-week procedure that assesses whether the proposed legislation of the principle of subsidiarity is complied with. The Letter of complaint is registered at the Department of Community law.

The Department of Community law shall notify the Permanent Bureau, (...). The Standing Bureau shall forward the proposal of the permanent legislative to the committee or committees as proposed by the Department of Community Law and by the European Affairs Committee of the Chamber of Deputies, within 7 days of receipt of written advice from the Department of Community law. The Permanent Bureau may decide to transfer the legislative proposal to other standing committees than those proposed by the Department of Community law. The transmission of documents is performed simultaneously to all standing committees involved as well as to the European Affairs Committee of the Chamber of Deputies. If the Standing Bureau is not met within seven days of receipt of the legislative proposals from the Department of Community law or a decision has not been reached, within this period, regarding the transmission of documents and European legislative proposals, the transmission is made by the Chairman of the Chamber of Deputies, with subsequent notification of the Standing Bureau.

The Standing Committees shall observe, in their examination, the compliance with the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality. The examination is completed as follows:

---

[29] Chamber of Deputies, Decision no. 11/2011,art. 3

[30] Chamber of Deputies, Decision no. 11/2011,art. 4

a) in case of compliance with the principle of subsidiarity, the Standing Committee shall prepare a report containing the main elements of the debate, the vote expressed, if any, and finding the presence of the principle of subsidiarity. The minutes are provided for information to the Chamber of Deputies Standing Bureau and to the Department of Community law;

b) in case of non-compliance with the principle of subsidiarity, the Standing Committee shall prepare a draft of the reasoned opinion.

In case of detection of non-compliance to the principle of subsidiarity by a legislative proposal of the European Union, subject to the subsidiarity test, the Standing legislative committee and the European Affairs Committee of the Chamber of Deputies immediately shall warn the Department of Community law to convey the information to the Standing Representative of the Chamber of Deputies within the European Parliament and to convey this information to the national parliaments through its communication platform IPEX, mentioning that the reasoned opinion is in draft form and it does not represent an official view of the Chamber of Deputies.

The Standing Commission shall send the draft for the reasoned opinion or the report to the Committee on European Affairs of the Chamber of Deputies no later than the 40th day following receipt of notification from the European Union institutions.

The European Affairs Committee of the Chamber of Deputies shall debate and draft, as appropriate, the following documents:

a) final draft reasoned opinion, integrating the views expressed by the standing committees, when detecting the non-compliance with principle of subsidiarity;

b) an information note that is attached to the minutes of the standing committees and the minutes of the debate of the European Affairs Committee of the Chamber of Deputies, when detecting the compliance with the principle of subsidiarity.

The European Affairs Committee of the Chamber of Deputies shall submit the final reasoned opinion draft or the information note from the Standing Bureau of the Chamber of Deputies no later than the 47th day following receipt of notification of the EU institutions. The final reasoned opinion draft or the information note shall be sent to the Department of Community law for registration.

In the case of reasoned opinion draft for infringement of the principle of subsidiarity, the Standing Bureau:

a) may propose the addition to the agenda of the Chamber of Deputies for debate and approval of a final reasoned opinion draft. The Chamber of Deputies shall vote on the final reasoned opinion draft in their first meeting of its inclusion on the agenda, but no later than 56 calendar days following the receipt of notification from the EU institutions. Reasoned opinion shall be considered adopted by vote of the present majority. The Decision of the Chamber of Deputies of the approval of the reasoned opinion is published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I.

The Chairman of the Chamber of Deputies shall sign the reasoned opinion and shall send it to the EU institutions and the Government of Romania;

b) decides to convey the reasoned opinion, as drafted by the Commission for European Affairs, to the Romanian Government and the European Union institutions. The Chairman of the Chamber of Deputies shall sign the reasoned opinion and shall send it to the EU institutions and the Romanian Government.

The reasoned opinion on subsidiarity infringement is transmitted immediately by the Department of Community law, to the Standing Representative of the Chamber of Deputies in the European Parliament and are loaded to the IPEX platform.

If the compliance to the principle of subsidiarity is met, the Department of Community law shall communicate through the IPEX platform the completion of the review and the compliance with the principle of subsidiarity "[31].

[31] Chamber of Deputies, Decision no. 11/2011, art. 14-27.

Currently, there is a bill in the legislative circle on the cooperation between the Parliament and the Government regarding European affairs (PLx no. 3/2012) establishing a complex procedure of cooperation between the legislative and the executive power on matters of adoption and submission to the European institutions of views, opinions or notes on the draft European legislation, by applying protocols no. 1 and No. 2 of the Treaty of Lisbon.

3. Conclusion

(...) The doctrine has supported the thesis that the subsidiarity, as established by the Maastricht Treaty, further enhanced by modifying treaties, is unable to meet its objective: the problems that subsidiarity wishes to solve are not really the ones that the European Union is actually facing. First, in its present formulation, subsidiarity stipulates that the European institutions have to refrain from taking action if the objectives pursued by it can be achieved by the Member States. However, that was not the stake that Member States had in mind when forcing the entrance of this principle in the primary treaties. Instead of providing a method likely to weigh the interests of the States and Union's, this regulation takes on the Union's objectives, favors their absolute accomplishment and it merely shows who will be entrusted with the execution effectively. (...) As long as the Member States consider analyzing a measure to be adopted in terms of the effects it will produce in any field, effects that realize the extent to which the measure will limit its powers, the European institutions assess the extent to which it will contribute to achieving common goals.

(...)The pre-legislative examination, which must decide whether the measure to be adopted satisfies the requirements of the principle is, however, ineffective as the principle itself. On one hand, the problem to be solved (by the contemplated action) is determined before starting the actual control of subsidiarity. On the other hand, it is obvious that the possibility for Member States to solve sufficiently the problem at hand is considered exclusively from the perspective of the problem itself and the community purpose. Also, the impact of the measure on the national system is taken into consideration fairly marginal, out of the whole process, lacking any explicit considerations related to national autonomy and any measurements of the Union's goals, and of the national ones respectively.

Currently, the European system evolution has come to affect the most sensitive areas of traditional national competence.

In this context the core developments of European law is to restore the limit "in which, legitimately, the Union may legislate, namely those in which the autonomy of Member States must imperatively be respected"[32].

References

- Bercea Raluca, European Law. Basics, (C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2007).
- Craig Paul, de Burca Grainne, The Law of the European Union, edition IV , (Hamangiu publishing, 2009).
- Corbertt Richard, Jacobs Fr., Schackleton M., European Parliament, edition VI, (Monitorul Oficial publishing, Bucharest, 2007).
- Fuerea Augustin, The Law of the European Community, (All Beck publishing, Bucharest, 2003).
- Fuerea Augustin, European Union Manual, edition V , (Universul Juridic publishing, Bucharest, 2011).
- McGiffen Steven P, European Union, Critical Guide, (Monitorul Oficial publishing, Bucharest, 2007).
- Spence David, Edwards Geoffrey, European Comission, (Monitorul Oficial publishing, Bucharest, 2008).

[32] Raluca Bercea – c.w. , p. 339-341

ASPECTS RELATED TO THE PRODUCING OF EVIDENCES IN TRADEMARK COUNTERFEITING CASES IN ROMANIA

ALEXANDRU LUCIAN ARJOCA*

Abstract
The study contains a presentation of evidences and meanings of evidence used in civil and penal trademark counterfeiting cases in Romania. The study analyses the evidences (concept, object, importance, the burden of evidence), means of evidence used in trademark counterfeiting cases, the estimating of the value of the evidence by instance or by prosecutors, new aspects related to the burden of evidences in penal trademark counterfeiting cases in Romania.

Keywords: evidences, means of evidences, civil and penal trademark counterfeiting cases

Introduction

The paper covers aspects regarding Intellectual Property Law (trademarks), Penal Law, Penal Procedure Law, Civil Law and Civil Procedure Law.

The importance of study is given by:

- the newness in intellectual property doctrine;
- the experience of Romanian authorities (instances and prosecutors) for combating the trademark counterfeiting;
- jurisprudence of Romanian civil and penal courts in this domain;
- the development of this phenomenon in Romania in the last five years;
- The signed by 22 EU member states, including Romania of a new treaty, ACTA (Anti-counterfeiting Trade Agreement) in 26th January at Tokyo.

For answering to these problems I will try to share my experience in combating the trademark counterfeiting offences (I am chief prosecutor of Bureau for combating IPR crimes – General Prosecutor Office attached to High Court of Cassation and Justice), to analyze the jurisprudence and legal framework regarding the burden of evidences.

PAPER CONTENT

1.Evidence concept and the importance of evidences

In usual language, evidence meaning fact who served to the confirmation of the truth, proof, testimony and to prove means to demonstrate, to put in evidence[1].

In penal procedure the evidences are defined like informative relevant elements of all aspects of penal case[2] and are facts who served for the establishing of existence or inexistence of offence, for identification of the person who committed an offence, for knowledge of necessary circumstances for fair solution of the case (article 63 paragraph 1 of The Penal Procedure Code).

---

* Bureau Chief Prosecutor, General Prosecutor Office attached to High Court of Cassation and Justice, Ph. D. Candidate, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: alexarjoca@yahoo.com).

[1] Academia Română – Institutul de Linvistică „Iorgu Iordan", DEX – Dicționar explicativ al limbii române, Ediția a II-a (Romanian Language Explanatory Dictionary - Second Edition), Editura Univers Enciclopedic , Bucuresti, 1998, p. 852.

[2] Vintilă Dongoroz, Siegfried Kahane, George Antoniu, Constantin Bulai, Nicoleta Iliescu, Rodica Stănoiu, Explicații teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român, Partea generală, vol.I, (Teoretical Explanations of Romanian Penal Procedure Code, General Part, volume I) Ed.Academiei , Bucureşti, 1975, p. 168.

The achievement of penal justice mainly depends by the evidences system[3], Romanian legislator has adopted liberty appreciation of the evidences (article 63 paragraph 2 of The Penal Procedure Code).

In civil procedure, evidence meaning, lato sensu, either the action for establishing of existence or inexistence of legal position, or the mean that permitted to establish the legal position that must be proofed, or the result obtained by using the means of evidence[4].

From this definition results that the evidences are indispensable for the establishing the fact situation, and represent means used by instance to take cognizance of material law rapports who are the object of the process[5].

2. The object of evidence

In penal procedure, object of evidence (thema probantum)[6] means the assembly of facts or circumstances who must be proofed for solving penal case (facts regarding prosecution, facts regarding aggravation or attenuation of penal responsibility, facts regarding consequences of offence, fact and circumstances that must be proofed only in specific penal case)[7].

In civil procedure, object of evidence means juridical facts, lato sensu, (juridical facts and acts) from that are arise rights and obligations of the litigation parties[8].

For identification of object of evidence in civil and penal counterfeiting cases, it is necessary to see the provisions that regulate the counterfeiting of trademark from Law no.84/1998, republish, regarding trademarks and geographical indications (Trademarks Law).

According to the article 36 paragraph 2 who regulate the trademark counterfeiting lawsuit "The owner of the trademark may request the competent judicial body to prohibit third parties not having his consent from using in the course of trade:

(a) any sign which is identical with the trademark, in respect of goods or services which are identical with those for which the trademark is registered;

(b) any sign where, because of its identity with or similarity to the trademark and because of the identity or similarity of the goods or services on which the sign is affixed, there exists a likelihood of confusion on the part of the public, including the likelihood of association between the sign and the trademark;

(c) any sign which is identical with or similar to the trademark, in respect of goods or services which are not similar to those for which the trademark is registered, where the latter has a reputation in Romania and where use of that sign without due cause could take unfair advantage of the distinctive character or the reputation of the trademark."

In fact, in trademark counterfeiting lawsuit matter, the plaintiff (the right holder of registered trademark or the applicant of trademark registration request, published in Official Industrial Property Bulletin) must proofed that the using by third parties in the course of trade, without his consent, of identical sign with the trademark, in respect of goods or services which are identical with those for which the trademark is registered.

---

[3]Ion Neagu, Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Penal Procedure Teatry. General Part), Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucureşti 2008, p.429

[4] Viorel Mihai Ciobanu, Gabriel Boroi, Drept procesul civil. Curs selectiv. Teste grilă, Ediția 4(Civil Procedure, Selective Course, Tests, 4 Edition), Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucureşti, 2009, p.229

[5] Viorel Mihai Ciobanu, Gabriel Boroi, quated work, p.230

[6] Ion Doltu, Unele aspecte ale probațiunii penale (Some aspects regarding penal burden of evidences), în R.D.P. nr.2/1999, p.97-105

[7] Nicolae Volonciu, Drept procesual penal (Penal Procedure), Ed. Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucureşti 1972, p.158-159

[8] Viorel Mihai Ciobanu, Gabriel Boroi, quated work, p.230

The using of identical sign with the trademark, in respect of goods or services which are identical with those for which the trademark is registered can be done by promoting goods or services via internet or mass media channels, by using of commercial name that is identical or similar with registered trademark, by importing, exporting or conveying in transit there under, stocking, EU acquisitions, offering, putting on the market of products who have applied an identical or similar sign with a registered trademark, application of identical or similar sign with registered trademark on products or packages of products and using of such sign in commercial documents.

For the situation regulated by article 36 paragraph 2 b), it is necessary to prove the likelihood of confusion on the part of the public, including the likelihood of association between the sign and the trademark, and for the situation regulated by article 36 paragraph 2 c), it is necessary to prove that the trademark has a reputation in Romania and that the use of that sign without due cause could take unfair advantage of the distinctive character or the reputation of the trademark

According to the article 37 paragraph 2 from Trademarks Law when the plaintiff claim damages for the acts referred to article 36 paragraph 2, he must burden of evidences regarding suffered prejudice.

Trademark counterfeiting criminal offence is regulated by article 90 from Trademarks Law.

Paragraph 1 incriminate the infringement of the trademark who means carrying out or using a sign, identical or similar with a registered trademark, by third parties in their commercial activity, without the consent of the owner of the registered trademark.

For the proving of such offence it is necessary to prove the existence of premise situation (the existing of national registered trademark, published in National Register of Trademarks, or the existing of international registered trademark or the existing community registered trademark), the existence of material object (carrying out or using a sign, identical or similar with a registered trademark, by third parties in their commercial activity, without the consent of the owner of the registered trademark) and to prove the existence of the subjective side (the offence can be committed only with intention, guilt form of the culpa being excluded).

For the situation regulated by article 90 paragraph 1 a) related to article 90 paragraph 1 b) from Trademarks Law (identical signs for similar products/services or similar signs for identical products/services) it is necessary to prove the existence of likelihood of confusion including the likelihood of association between the sign and the trademark, and for the situation regulated by article 90 paragraph 1 a) related to article 90 paragraph 1 c) from Trademarks Law (notorious trademark) it is necessary to prove the existence of trademark reputation in Romania, the existence of the profit of unfair advantage of the distinctive character or the reputation of the trademark and the existence of the prejudice for the trademark holder.

Paragraph 2 of article 90 from Trademarks Law regulated the marketing of counterfeited products. For the proving of this offence it is necessary to prove the existence of premise situation (the existing of national registered trademark, published in National Register of Trademarks, or the existing of international registered trademark or the existing community registered trademark), the existence of material object (marketing of counterfeited goods - offering the goods, putting them on the market or stocking them for such purposes, or providing services there under, as well as importing, exporting or conveying them in transit there under), the existence of the prejudice for the trademark holder and the existence of the subjective side (the offence can be committed only with intention, guilt form of the culpa being excluded).

For the situation regulated by article 90 paragraph 3 it is necessary to prove the existence of organized criminal group defined by article 2 a) related article 2 c) from Law no.39/2003, amended and supplemented, and the counterfeited products threaten consumers' safety or health.

3. Admissibility, burden and estimating of evidences

For being admissible, the evidence must achieve the next general conditions:

a)The evidence must be legal, provided by material or procedure law;

b) The evidence must be relevant, in relation with the object of civil or penal case;

c)The evidence must be conclusive, to contribute to solving the case.

Civil procedure doctrine includes in general conditions for evidence admissibility the credibility condition of evidence, who means that the evidence do not infringe the nature laws or to aspire to proving impossible facts[9], and the Penal Procedure Code (article 67 paragraph 2) and penal procedure doctrine includes in general conditions for evidence admissibility, the useful condition of evidence, who means that the evidence must identify the facts that are relevant for solving the case[10].

Regarding trademark counterfeiting, we appreciate that the evidences that will be produce in civil or penal case, must achieve these general conditions, with some differences.

The burden of evidences presumes the proposal of evidences, the grant of evidences and properly burden of evidences.

In trademark counterfeiting lawsuits, the proposal of evidences must be done in initial phase of the case, in following modalities:

a) by plaintiff in the complaint in the court, in the request for whole or amending the initial complaint, or in the welcome to the counterclaim (article 112, article 132 paragraph 2 and last paragraph from Civil Procedure Code);

b) by defendant in the welcome to the initial complaint, in welcome to the request for whole or amending the initial complaint or in counterclaim (article 115 3), article 132 paragraph 1) and article 119 paragraph 2 related to article 112 5) from Civil Procedure Code).

In principle, the parts in the counterfeiting lawsuits have the obligation to propose the evidences in the same time and the evidence proposal must be done before the first day of appearance, under the sanction of loss the right to propose evidences (article 138 paragraphs 1 from Civil Procedure Code), the exceptions been regulated by the law (article 138 2), 3), 4) from Civil Procedure Code).

The grant of evidences is made by instance within motivated closing of rejection or admission of the evidences, under discussion of parties and the properly burden of evidences is done before first instance if the law otherwise provides (article 169 paragraph 1 from Civil Procedure Code) in the constancy of the court order (article 168 paragraph 2 from Civil Procedure Code) and before the beginning debate regarding counterfeiting lawsuit.

The burden of evidences in counterfeiting lawsuits is the one who makes a statement, plaintiff in the complaint (onus probandi incumbit actori) or defendant in welcome to the complaint or in counterclaim (in excipendo reus fit actor).

One exception from this rule is regulated by article 16 paragraph 1 from TRIPS (Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights) ratified by Romania by Law no.133/1994, who establishes a legal presumption of likelihood of confusion, and is applicable in the situation of using by third parties of an identical sign with a registered trademark, for the same products.

In the same situation, article 36 paragraph 2 a) from Trademarks Law set up a legal presumption of prejudice suffered by owner of trademark, the existing of identical signs been sufficient to find trademark counterfeiting act, in fraud imitation form, without the consent of the owner of the registered trademark[11].

---

[9] Viorel Mihai Ciobanu, Gabriel Boroi, quated work., p.234

[10] Ion Neagu, quated work, p.440.

[11] Bucharest Court of Appeal, 9th Civil and Intellectual Property Section, civil decision no.212/A from 9th June 2005 published în Octavia Spineanu-Matei, Proprietate intelectuală, Mărci/Brevete de invenţie. Desene şi modele

Another exception from the rule is given by the impossibility of proving negative facts. Civil jurisprudence regarding trademark counterfeiting stated that the burden of the consent of the owner of the registered trademark for using and marketing of similar sign with a registered trademark is reversed, returning to the defendant[12].

Articles 5-7 of the Emergency Ordinance of the Government no.100/2005 concerning the protection of the intellectual property rights, who transpose EU Directive no. 2004/48/CE of European Parliament and Council, from 29th Aprilie 2004, set up a special burden of evidences by courts (the judicial authorities may order that avaible evidence sufficient to support the plaintif claim be presented by the opposing party, if the evidence lies in the control of the opposing party, subject to the protection of confidential information; the judicial authorities may order the comunication of documents under the control of the opposing party, subject to the protection of confidential information; the judicial authorities can order prompt and effective provisional measures for preserving evidence).

For investigating the trademark counterfeting offence, the burden of evidences is made by criminal investigators, prosecutors and parties in prosecution phase, and by court and parties in judiciary phase.

The grant of evidences is made by prosecutor within motivated ordinance or resolution of rejection or admission of the samples (article 203 related to article 67 paragraph 3 from Penal Procedure Code), or by court within motivated closing, after the reading of prosecution act, according to article 322 and the next related to article 67 paragraph 3 from Penal Procedure Code.

According to article 65 paragraph 1 from Penal Procedure Code the burden of evidences is made by the prosecutor or the court.

For the burden of evidences article 68 from Penal Procedure Code set up a specific procedure who forbidden violences, threatens or others means of coercion, promises or impulses to obtain evidences (paragraph 1) or determination of one person to comit or to continue to comit a crime for evidences obtained purpose (paragraph 2).

The prohibition regulated by article 68 paragraph 2 from Penal Procedure Code has some legal exceptions. We consider that it is possible to use cover investigators or surveillance acquisitions of counterfeited goods according to article 224^1 related to article 2 b) 8), 14), 16) and 18) from Law no.39/2003, amended and supplemented, when smuggling offence is in competition with trademark counterfeting offence, when unfair competion offence is in competition with trademark counterfeting offence, when fiscal fraud is in competition with trademark counterfeting offence or when crimes comitted via Internet are in competition with trademark counterfeting offence.

When trademark counterfeting offence is comitted in versions regulated by article 90 paragraphs 1 letter a related to article 90 paragraph 3 a) and by article 90 paragraph 1 b) from Trademarks Law, the legal presumtion of likelihood of confusion regulated by 16 paragraph 1 from TRIPS is applicable. This situation is an exception from principle statutes by article 65 paragraph 1 from Penal Procedure Code (the burden of evidences is made by the prosecutor or the court*)*.

The estimating of evidence is a mental operation made by court, criminal investigators or prosecutors, to determine the value of evidence and evidences assembly burden in trademark counterfeiting case, knowing some restrictions regulated by law.

As far in civil procedure, far in penal procedure and also in trademark counterfeited cases, operate the free estimating evidences principle, evidences have not a pre-establish value, aspect sanctioned by article 63 paragraph 2 from Penal Procedure Code.

---

industriale. Drepturi de autor şi drepturi conexe. Practică judiciară (Intellectual Property. Trademarks/Patents, Utility Models and Industrial Designs, Copyright and related rights. Jurisprudence) Ed. Hamangiu, Buccuresti, 2006, p.74-79

[12] Bucharest Court of Appeal, 9th Civil and Intellectual Property Section, civil decision no.341/A from 6th October 2005 published în Octavia Spineanu-Matei, quated work, Ed.Hamangiu , Bucuresti, 2006, p.94-100

4. Main sets of evidence for trademark counterfeiting lawsuits

The main sets of evidence are documentary evidence, material evidence like web pages screen shots, samples of counterfeited products, witness hearings, cross-examination of defendant, legal presumptions and expert reports.

Next section is dedicated to documentary evidence and expert reports as means evidence used in the analyzed field and their associated legal requirements.

The trademark registration certificate plays a very important role. As many of the European national jurisdictions, in 1967, Romania adopted the system of priority of registration (the attributive system) which confers to the trademark owner an exclusive right to use the registered sign for the goods and services for which protection was granted, with the exclusion of well-known marks, signs prior used in trading activities, prior rights related to names and images, copyrights, which all together enjoy unconditioned protection free of registration pursuant to article 6 paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Trademarks Law[13].

The plaintiff brings to Court as evidence of counterfeiting action a license agreement signed with the defendant who's obligations were breached by the latest (article 43 paragraph 2 of the Trademarks Law), documents evidencing the post-license commercialization of plaintiff products where an alteration or modification of their aspect occurred after their putting in circulation by the plaintiff (article 38 paragraph 2 of the Trademarks Law).

Others documentary evidences presented by the plaintiff to the court can be a cease and desist letter sent to the defendant and the evidence of an attempt to reach a settlement of agreement by mediation of the conflict, fiscal, commercial and banking documents able to prove the commercialization of counterfeited products, samples of counterfeited products and packaging.

Others documentary evidences attached to initial complaint can be an evidence of prior legal use – even if the trademark has not been registered in Romania, documents providing names and addresses of manufactures, distributors, suppliers, wholesale agents and retailers of the counterfeited goods, documents indicating quantities of illegal goods manufactured, delivered or even ordered and the amounts gathered form selling of counterfeited goods, customs documents evidencing imports, royalties rates in the specific market in Romania.

In addition, according to article 5 of the Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 100/2005 concerning the protection of the intellectual property rights, the plaintiff can promote a court motion to oblige the defendant to provide samples of counterfeited goods and documents (bank, financial and commercial) under its possession under the confidentiality protection.

According to article 6 of the same piece of legislation, at the plaintiff's motion the court may decide preservation of evidence by way of a presidential ordinance ruling a distrait of counterfeited goods, materials and instruments used for manufacturing and distribution of such goods and linked relevant documents.

In respect of market research studies aimed to prove the likelihood of confusion and the conditions of existence of trademark counterfeiting, we are of opinion that a valid reference to the national jurisprudence of cases of annulment of trademark registration can be done. There the courts ruled "the appreciation of the risk of confusion based on a market study made at plaintiff's request should not be a relevant evidence, that being an exclusive appreciation of the court by analyzing the trademarks in conflict and specific criterion[14]".

---

[13] Viorel Roş, Octavia Spineanu-Matei, Dragoş Bogdan – Dreptul proprietăţii intelectuale. Dreptul proprietăţii industriale. Mărcile şi indicaţiile geografice (Intellectual Property. Trademarks and geographical indications), Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti 2003, p.19-20.

[14] High Court of Cassation and Justice, Civil and Intellectual Property Section, decision no.1543 from 13th February 2009, published în Octavia Spineanu-Matei, Proprietate intelectuală(4). Practică judiciară 2009 (Intellectual Property, Jurisprudence (4)) Ed. Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2010, p.34-84.

The defendant may choose to use for its defense strategy evidence as: an application for trademark registration done before date of application for registration of plaintiff's trademark, a valid registration of a community mark older than plaintiff's registration, an older national registration certificate of a trademark, certification mark or collective mark by making use of the provisions of article 6 paragraph 4 d) and e) of the Trademarks Law, a trademark used in foreign territory at the date of plaintiff's application for registration, the written consent of the plaintiff allowing registration of the defendant's trademark, documents (invoices, publicity/advertising, accounting books) all to bring the prove of plaintiff's getting over attitude for a period of 5 years, according to article 70 paragraph 1 of the law, documents indicating the trading of products wearing the plaintiff's trademark in UE and the EEA by the owner himself or under his consent (article 38 paragraph 1).

We are of opinion that in the practice area under scrutiny the expert report has no as meaningful relevance as in other areas of industrial property (patents, designs, topographies and integrated circuits).

The expert may render the most its opinion in respect of resemblances and differences between original product and the counterfeited goods. In the trademark-counterfeiting field the courts hold the exclusive power to appreciate the risk of confusion irrespectively the evaluation of similarities by using criterion rendered by national and community jurisprudence (Sabel v. Puma AG, Canon v. Cannon).

A different kind of expert report assumed in this area is the expert report underlining the damages suffered by the owner of the trademark as consequence of the counterfeiting activities. It is true that the Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 100/2005 provides in article 14, paragraph 2, for legal criterion to be taken into consideration by the courts when appreciating the damage level (negative economic consequences, especially loss of earnings by the damaged party, unlawful benefits of the counterfeiter, the moral damage, the royalties rates or consideration corresponding to infringed rights due by the infringer in case of him choosing the steps to legal use of the trademark) still with all that the court may order a judicial expert accounting report meant to check all those aspects.

Furthermore the courts can take into account as an evaluation criterion of damages the degree of distinction of the registered trademark, the seniority of the trademark being a possible element of appreciation of distinctively or even trademark' notoriety in relation with other evidence proving degree of familiarity with the trademark of the relevant public.

It should be noted courts appreciations that "determination of the elements of calculation of compensations can be requested alternatively, but they have to be indicated in the court motion not revealed in the hearing for evidence".

It should be here mentioned the provisions of Section II (article 7 to 12) of ACTA (Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement) signed by Australia, New Zeeland, USA, Singapore, and EU (22 countries including Romania) in respect of means of evidence of counterfeiting activities.

Its true ACTA is not yet applicable as the adoption procedure will be long but its afore-mentioned provisions give shape to the way of administration of evidence and subject of proof in counterfeiting actions which shall be uniform at international level.

Those are pretty similar with provisions of EU Enforcement on Intellectual Property Rights Directive and its national transposition by the Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 100/2005 concerning the protection of the intellectual property rights.

I would like to bring under consideration the provisions of article 8 paragraph 1 which give to courts the possibility to issue an order against a party to desist from an infringement, to prevent the entrance of counterfeited goods in the commercial channels, the provisions of article 9 that establishes legal criterion for courts when came about compensations for counterfeiting and article 11 which rules the way of gathering evidence at the motion of the owner of the trademarks when they are under adverse party control.

Article 12 paragraph 4 obliges the owner of the mark to provide the court with evidence of trademark counterfeiting when seeking provisionary measure under a bond payment, while paragraph 5 give the defendant the possibility to seek for damages in case of provisionary measures ordered without prove of counterfeiting.

5. Main sets of evidence for trademark counterfeiting offence

According to the provisions of Penal Procedure Code related to the provisions of article 90-94 from Trademark Law the main sets of evidence are charged person statement, defendant statement, civil part statement, injured part statement, witness statement, documentary evidences, interceptions, audio-video recordings, lifting of objects and documentary evidences, domicile search, computer search, technical-scientific establishment and expert report.

Provisional measures for preserving evidence and burned of evidences when a trademark counterfeiting offence was committed are regulated by provisions of article 91-94 from Trademark Law completed with provisions from Penal Procedure Code. The significant fact is that these provisions are identical with articles 5 and 6 from the Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 100/2005 concerning the protection of the intellectual property rights, but they referees only to the trademark counterfeiting offence.

Regarding this aspect, we consider that the provision of Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 100/2005 concerning the protection of the intellectual property rights are applicable only for trademark counterfeiting lawsuits completed with the provisions of Civil Procedure Code and the provisions of article 91-94 from Trademark Law, completed with provisions from Penal Procedure Code are applicable only for trademark counterfeiting offence.

In this section we will insist on sets of evidences who are relevant and who are mostly burned by investigators and courts when trademark counterfeited offence was committed.

Useful sets of evidence are interceptions and audio-video recordings, mostly when trademark counterfeited offence was committed via Internet.

In practice, these sets of evidence combined with documentary evidence permit to identify the infringer of trademark counterfeited offence committed via Internet.

Penal courts from Romania approved in the last few years (2010-2011) many interception warrants in this domain, and on the other hand, take into consideration the private investigators identification of the infringers of trademark counterfeited offence, private investigators hired by the owner of the trademark[15].

Other set of evidence is domicile search, done in according with articles 110-111 from Penal Procedure Code. If we are in situation of lifting of counterfeited products detained in companies' storehouses, we appreciate that it is necessary to have domicile search warrant and started prosecution against juridical person. When trademark counterfeited offence is committed via Internet, the investigators who made the domicile search must take measures to identify all memory stocking devices such memory stick, CD, DVD, portable hard-disk, who can contain relevant information.

Regarding computer search, this set of evidence can be relevant when the offence regulated by article 90 1) b) is committed via Internet, and will be done according to the provisions of article 56-58 from Law no.163/2001, modified and completed.

Regarding the lifting of documentary evidences from workstations of companies who marketing counterfeited goods and to avoid obtain of search warrant, we recommended mixed controls made by investigators and commissars from Financial Guard, according to provisions of article 7 from of Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 91/2003 regarding Financial Guard

[15] To see the evidences burned in case no. 42529/3/2007 of Bucharest Tribunal.

(the prosecutor had the power to delegate Financial Guards commissars to investigate such crimes, according to article 4 of the same law).

The documentary evidences have relevance to prove subjective element (intention) of trademark counterfeited offence. So, the intention can be proofed by fiscal documents of acquisition of original products from authorized company by trademark owner, before offence was committed, by suspending the release of suspect goods by custom authorities, by criminal records of the infringers or by interrogation of Intellectual Property Rights Common Data Base.

The jurisprudence of prosecutor offices from Romania revealed the fact that in many trademark counterfeiting cases, the prosecutor propose an expert report, for the reason that the prosecutors didn't want to assume exclusive power to appreciate the risk of confusion irrespectively the evaluation of similarities by using criterion rendered by national and community jurisprudence (Sabel v. Puma AG, Canon v. Cannon).

Our opinion is that the prosecutors and penal courts must assume this exclusive power, and the expert may render the most its opinion in respect of resemblances and differences between original product and the counterfeited goods.

Very useful for solving big trademark counterfeiting cases were technical-scientific establishment released by the experts of trademark owners, experts who were later interrogated by court[16].

For proving the committed of aggravate trademark counterfeited offence, regulated by article 90 paragraph 2 from Trademark Law, it is necessary an expert report from Criminology Expertise National Institute, an expert report from National Medicine Agency or an expert report from Consumer Protection National Agency.

The investigations regarding trademark counterfeited offence revealed that Romania isn't a producer of counterfeited goods but its import and transit country via EU for such goods and the marketing of counterfeited goods implicated both national and international juridical or physical persons. So, we recommended to investigators to use procedure provisions regarding burned of evidences according articles 50, 170-203 from Law no.302/2004 regarding international judiciary cooperation in penal matters.

Conclusions

Romanian legislation regulated many evidences for trademark counterfeiting offence and for trademark counterfeiting lawsuit and it is a scope of parts, investigators and courts how manage these evidences, how used it, how burned it and how evaluate it, according to procedure laws.

The new Trademark Law (Law no.84/1998, republished) represents a forward step, in Romanian anti-counterfeiting legislation exists some legal presume (exceptions from principles settled by procedure laws) and the Romanian legislation regarding set of evidences is according with Anti-counterfeiting EU Directive and ACTA.

Investigators and courts must have the initiative to applied all the regulations regarding burned of evidences for solve a trademark counterfeiting case and the prosecutors and penal courts must assume exclusive power to appreciate the risk of confusion irrespectively the evaluation of similarities by using criterion rendered by national and community jurisprudence

[16] Bucharest Tribunal – First Section admitted the hearing of pharmaceutical company expert who made a technical-scientific report in prosecution phase in case no.2041/2009

References

- Academia Română – Institutul de Linvistică „Iorgu Iordan", DEX – Dicţionar explicativ al limbii române, Ediția a II-a (Romanian Language Explanatory Dictionary - Second Edition), Editura Univers Enciclopedic , Bucuresti, 1998
- Viorel Mihai Ciobanu, Gabriel Boroi, Drept procesul civil. Curs selectiv. Teste grilă, Ediția 4 (Civil Procedure, Selective Course, Tests, 4 Edition), Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucureşti, 2009
- Ion Doltu, Unele aspecte ale probațiunii penale (Some aspects regarding penal burden of evidences), în R.D.P. nr.2/1999
- Vintilă Dongoroz, Siegfried Kahane, George Antoniu, Constantin Bulai, Nicoleta Iliescu, Rodica Stănoiu, Explicații teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român, Partea generală, vol.I, (Teoretical Explanations of Romanian Penal Procedure Code, General Part, volume I) Ed.Academiei , Bucureşti, 1975
- Ion Neagu, Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Penal Procedure Teatry. General Part), Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucureşti 2008
- Viorel Roş, Octavia Spineanu-Matei, Dragoş Bogdan, Dreptul proprietății intelectuale. Dreptul proprietății industriale. Mărcile şi indicațiile geografice (Intellectual Property. Trademarks and geographical indications), Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti 2003,
- Octavia Spineanu-Matei, Proprietate intelectuală, Mărci/Brevete de invenție. Desene şi modele industriale. Drepturi de autor şi drepturi conexe. Practică judiciară (Intellectual Property. Trademarks/Patents, Utility Models and Industrial Designs, Copyright and related rights. Jurisprudence), Ed. Octavia Spineanu-Matei, Proprietate intelectuală(4). Practică judiciară 2009 (Intellectual Property, Jurisprudence (4)), Ed. Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2010
- Nicolae Volonciu, Drept procesual penal (Penal Procedure), Ed. Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucureşti 1972

PATTERNS AND DESIGN PROTECTION SYSTEMS IN ROMANIAN LAW

OVIDIA JANINA IONESCU*

Abstract

Because of the significant differences among the laws of member states in the field of design and patterns, by Council Directive No. 98/71/EC of 13 October 1998 on the legal protection of patterns and designs, the European Parliament has implemented a patterns and design protection system adapted to the needs of any domestic market.Based on Directive No. 98/71/EC, the Council Regulation (EU) No. 6/2002 of 12 December 2001 on community designs and patterns has been issued, being compulsory in all its elements and applying directly to all member states. Thus, a special legal protection has been provided, which is meant to encourage individual creators to bring forward innovation, the development of new products and investments in their manufacturing. In order to implement the provisions of Regulation (EU) No. 6/2002, the Commission Regulation (EU) No. 2245/2002 of 21 October 2002 has been adopted. All these regulations are intended to provide protection of designs and patterns, and for this purpose two forms of protection are deemed necessary, i.e. a long-term one, corresponding to unregistered designs or patterns, and a short-term one, corresponding to registered designs and patters.

In this paper we shall present in detail these forms of protection, as well as the substantive and formal conditions necessary to be fulfilled for the registration of designs and patterns. The presentation shall be founded on the legal regulations mentioned above that are enforceable and binding also on the Romanian territory, a legal protection of design and patterns being thus provided not only inland but also intra-community. The purpose of this paper is to also highlight the necessity of design and patterns protection, a sine-qua-non condition for the development of new products and investments.

Keywords: design and patterns legal protection, innovation, formal conditions, unregistered design or patterns , registered design and patterns

Introduction

The field covered by the theme of the proposed study pertains to intellectual property law, specifically protection matters (in the case at hand, design and patterns protection).

The importance of this study and its objectives results from the contemplated aims hereof, i.e. the identification of the design and patterns protection system applicable to Roman law, as regulated by Directive No. 98/71/EC, and subsequently by Commission Regulation (EC) No. 6/2002 of 12 December 2001 (enforced based on Commission Regulation No. 2245/2002 of 21 October 2002) on community industrial design and patterns, which is mandatory in its entirety and applies directly to all member states of the European Union.

The manner in which this study envisages to identify such matters consists in the presentation of all forms of protection, namely, a short-term one corresponding to unregistered design and patterns, and a long-term one corresponding to registered design and patterns, of the conditions related to both content and form that must be met in view of registering patterns and designs, as well as of the stages that must be gone through, or any other relevant procedures.

The research is essential for gaining significant knowledge of the applicability of international regulations in this respect, i.e. Directive No. 98/71/EC and Council Regulation (EC) No. 6/2002 of 12 December 2001, which represent the foundation of the field of design and patterns protection, applicable also to community law, as well as for the identification in principle of existing protection systems and their application (effects) at community level. Since all previous studies on this theme are quite technical, this review is aimed to be, besides technical, novel (paying attention to matters such as domestic implementation and applicability), mentioning that, at such internal level there are several studies/publications/books on the same subject matter, any references thereto being made both in footnotes, and the body of this paper.

* Notary Public, Ph. D. candidate (email: ovidiaionescu@yahoo.com)

Content

As domestic doctrine states "the intellectual property cannot be constrained easily to territorial boundaries, as it naturally has a much rather international scope. Products of the human spirit and genius defy any barrier placed before their free circulation, and modern information and communication media favor such movement. (...) Products of the human spirit must also be protected outside the national borders of the territory where their author resides, when being utilized, according to their intended purpose, in the territory of other states (...)"[1].

As regards the notions of design and pattern, it is worth mentioning that, globally, two concepts are being used in this field, with one and the same meaning, respectively: English-speaking "common low" countries use the term "design", while French-speaking countries use the notions "design or pattern", case applicable also to community Roman law.

Because of the significant differences between the laws of member states in the field of design and patterns, by Council Directive No. 98/71/EC of 13 October 1998 on the legal protection of patterns and design, the European Parliament has implemented a patterns and design protection system adapted to the needs of any domestic market. Based on said directive, the Council Regulation (EU) No. 6/2002 of 12 December 2001 on community designs and patterns has been issued, being compulsory in its entirety and applying directly to all member states (community Roman law inclusively).

Ensuring the protection of designs and patterns can be done in two ways, namely a short-term protection corresponding to unregistered design and patterns, and a long-term protection for registered design and patterns.

The two Regulations contain the necessary provisions for the development of the procedure for registration of a community design or pattern, the administration of registered community design and patterns, the proceedings for challenging the decision of the Office, and the procedure for cancelling a community design or pattern, such provisions having to be known since they are the foundation of the registration process relating to any community design and pattern.

The Directive mentions that the community design or pattern should meet, inasmuch as possible, the needs of all Community economic sectors[2].

Some of these sectors produce huge quantities of designs or patterns of products that oftentimes have a brief economic life cycle, their protection thus becoming necessary and efficient, yet without undergoing each and every registration stage, or, on the contrary, there are economic sectors where registration is advantageous and which require protection of their designs or patterns for longer periods of time, according to their foreseeable life duration on the market.

At the same time, it is deemed that, in order to be considered valid, a community design or pattern should be new and individual – differentiating itself from other designs or patterns[3]. By new it is thus understood that no other identical design or pattern should have been made public before the date of submitting the registration request, in the country and abroad, for the same category of

---

[1] Viorel Roş, Dragoş Bogdan, and Octavia Spineanu Matei, Copyright and Other Related Rights Treatise (Dreptul de autor şi drepturile conexe Tratat), (Bucharest: All Beck Publishing House, 2005), 24.

[2] Council Regulation (EC) No. 6/2002 of 12 December 2001, item 15 "The community design or pattern should meet, inasmuch as possible, the needs of all Community economic sectors."

[3] Council Regulation (EC) No. 6/2002 of 12 December 2001, item 19 "In order to be considered valid, a community design or pattern should be new and individual, differentiating itself from other designs or patterns."

products; as regards designs and patterns, identity refers to the fact that their essential features differ only in terms of insignificant details.

Thus, it is considered that the individual character of the design or pattern results from the effects it has on the user, respectively if such effect is different from the one any other previously publicized design or pattern has had on the same user, that is, before the submission of the registration application.

In this case it is deemed that two forms of protection are necessary, i.e. a short-term one corresponding to unregistered design or patterns, and a long-term protection related to registered design or patterns.

According to the Regulation, the designs and patterns meeting the aforementioned conditions are called "community designs and patterns", as follows:

A community design or pattern is protected:

a) as an "unregistered design or pattern", if it is made public as per the procedures provided for in the regulation. One may conclude that the protection of an unregistered community design or pattern is automatically acquired further to disclosing to the public the products that incorporate the respective designs or patterns, by means of publishing, exhibiting, marketing, making public by any other means of advertising, in order to be made widely known in the activity media from the sector concerned, on condition that the disclosure is carried out within the territory of the European Union. If the disclosure is performed outside the above-mentioned territory, no protection can be enjoyed.

b) as a "registered design or pattern", if registered as per the procedures provided for in the regulation.

Also, the regulation defines the main relevant terms:

– "design or pattern": the external aspect of a product or a part thereof, resulting from the combination of its main features, especially lines, contours, colors, shapes, textures and/or materials and/or the decorations of the product itself; – "product": any industrial or crafted product, including, inter alia, pieces designed to be assembled into a more complex product, packaging, presentation, graphical symbols and typographical fonts, excluding computer software;

– "complex products": a product made up of several replaceable pieces that allow disassembly and reassembly of such product.

Situated "at the crossroads between art and industry"[4], designs and patterns are known both in Romanian law and in the law of other countries, as "applied art" or "decorative creations"[5], the protection being possibly given for all the products included in the Locarno Classification.

Apart from the aforementioned clarifications, the Regulation identifies in detail all procedures and stages that must be undergone so as that a community design or pattern that is subjected to intellectual property rights may benefit from protection; it also comprises information on how to draft the application, the format conditions needed for the registration of designs and patterns, the capacity of the person submitting the application, how the application is submitted, priority rights, application examination, certificate issuance, payment of certain charges, and the duration of the granted protection.

The Regulation sets forth both the items that can be registered and protected as community designs and patterns, and the ones that cannot be registered and protected as community designs and patterns, as follows:

– a community design or patterns does not give rights over the aspectual features of a product, which are imposed exclusively by the product's technical functionality;

[4] Y. Eminescu, The Protection of Industrial Designs and Patterns, (Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 1993).

[5] J. Schmidt – Szalewski, Droit de la propriete industrielle, (Paris: Dalloz, 1997).

– a community design or pattern does not give rights over the aspectual features of a product, which must be mandatorily reproduced in their exact form and dimensions so as that the product in which they are integrated, or which the design or pattern is applied to, can be mechanically connected to another product, or so as that it can be placed inside or around another product, or put in contact with another product, in such a way that allows each of them to achieve their own functionality;

– by derogation from the provisions of para. (2) above, a community design or pattern gives rights over another design or pattern that observes the conditions established in the Regulation at Art. 5 and 6, and which aim at allowing the multiple assembly or connection of certain interchangeable products within a modular system.

- a community design or pattern does not confer any rights at all if that particular design or pattern infringes public order or good morals principles (and, during the process of national registration of a design or pattern, consideration should be given to the fact that the concepts of "public order" and "good morals" may differ from one member state to another); it is possible at times to identify cases in which a design or pattern registered with a national office from one member state be denied in another country on account that it infringes public order or good morals principles.

The rights on community designs or patterns are set forth in Art. 14 of the Regulation, which stipulates that "the right on a community design or pattern belongs to their author or their successors in rights"[6]; furthermore, it is stated that, if several persons have created a design or pattern together, the rights on such community design or pattern are jointly held by all of them; also, the rights on the so-called "professional" designs or patterns, if they have been conceived by employees of a company at the express request of their employers, belong to the latter, save for the cases regulated under any other contrary provisions governing such matters as set forth in conventions concluded between employers and employees, or in the text of the relevant national legislation in force.

The importance of registering patterns and designs resides in the fact that, further to registration, the titleholders will have the right to use such intellectual property items and to prohibit any third party from using the same, without their express consent in relation thereto, being also able to set forth the conditions of such use (pecuniary inclusively, as the case may be). Unregistered community designs or patterns do not give their titleholders the right to prohibit the performance of any activities in relation thereto unless the challenged use thereof results from copying such protected designs or patterns.

De facto, practice showed that all products, especially the ones with a particular design or pattern and with a greater commercial success, are actually being counterfeited, which causes immense financial troubles and losses to the entitled owners, and confuses consumers, who can thus purchase products of a quality that is inferior to the original products they think they are actually buying, and who pay the same price for the fake products as they would for the originals. The registration of designs and patterns is thus a guarantee given to the holder of such registration certificate, whereby he/she can prohibit third parties, without his/her consent, to reproduce, manufacture, market, offer for sale, or use the design or pattern of the product within which they are incorporated, throughout the European Union.

"Titleholders may choose among the various manners of national and international protection, and the designs or patterns registered and administered by The Office of Harmonization for the Internal Market (OHIM), which, starting from 2003, are available, and which can cover all 27 member states of the European Union in one application[7]."

---

[6] Council Regulation (EC) No. 6/2002 of 12 December 2001, Art. 14 "the right on a community design or pattern belongs to their author or their successor in rights".

[7] Constantin Duvac, and Ciprian Raul Romitan, The Legal and Penal Protection of Designs and Patterns (Protecţia juridico – penală a desenelor şi modelelor), (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2009), 103.

The Regulation stipulates that the contested use is not considered to result from the copying of the protected designs or patterns if it originates in the independent creative work of an author who can affirm, in a grounded manner, that he/she had no knowledge whatsoever about the existence of the design or pattern disclosed by the titleholder.

This study now continues to discuss the Regulation provisions regarding the rights transmitted to the titleholder, the limitation of such rights, the duration of the granted protection, as well as the termination of such rights.

Rights conferred to the titleholder

The rights conferred to the titleholder are different function of whether the design or pattern is registered or not, as follows:

Registered community designs or patterns give their titleholders the exclusive right to use them and to prohibit any third party from using them without the agreement of the titleholder. By use it is understood, in the sense of the Regulation, especially the manufacturing, inclusion in an offer, marketing, export or the use as such of a product in which the concerned design or pattern has been integrated or applied to, as well as the storage of the respective product in order to be used for the purposes mentioned above.

Unregistered community designs or patterns do not give their titleholders the right to prohibit the activities specified at para. (1), unless the contested use results from the copying of the protected design or pattern.

The Regulation mentions, in Art. 19, that the contested use is not deemed as resulting from the copying of the protected design or pattern if it originates in the independent creative work of an author who can affirm, in a grounded manner, that he/she was not cognizant of the design or pattern disclosed by the titleholder.

Limitation of rights

Art. 20 of the Regulation specifies the cases in which the rights conferred by a community design or pattern cannot be enforced, as follows:

- activities developed for private non-commercial purposes;
- activities developed for experimental purposes;
- activities related to multiplication for didactical or bibliographical purposes, provided that such activities are compatible with fair trade practices, do not infringe the normal use of the design or pattern concerned, and also indicate the source.

Moreover, the rights conferred by a community design or pattern cannot be enforced in the case of:

- the equipment used onboard ships or aircrafts registered in a third party country and which temporarily cross Community territory;
- the imports in the Community of parts and accessories dismantled from vehicles in view of being used for the repair of the same vehicles;
- the performance of repairs onto such vehicles.

Also, Art. 23 of the Regulation mentions one more situation in which the right of the titleholder cannot be enforced: when the community design or pattern is used by the government of a member state for security and defense purposes.

Protection Duration

The duration of the protection is different for registered and unregistered designs and patterns, as set forth at Art. 11and 12 of the Regulation.

A design or pattern meeting the conditions stipulated in the Regulation at Section 1 is protected as unregistered community design or pattern for a period of three years as of the date when the design or pattern was disclosed to the public for the first time at Community level.

In the sense of para. (1), it is considered that a design or pattern was disclosed to the public at Community level if it has been published, exposed, marketed or made public in any other way, such that, in the course of normal business operations, it can be presumed that the respective action would have become known to specialized groups from the concerned economic sector at Community level. Nevertheless, it is not deemed that a design or pattern is disclosed to the public if divulged only to one third party, with the explicit or implicit condition of preserving their secrecy.

By the registration with the Office, a design or pattern that meets the conditions of Section 1 of the Regulation is protected as registered design or pattern for a period of five years starting from the date when the application was submitted. The titleholder of the right may extend the duration by several five-year terms, up to a maximum of twenty five years as of the date when the application was submitted.

Termination of Rights

Art. 21 of the Regulation mentions that the rights conferred by the community design or pattern are not enforced in the case of a product into which it has been incorporated or onto which the protected community design or pattern is applied, if such product was placed on the market on the territory of the Community by or with the agreement of the titleholder of the respective community design or pattern.

PROTECTION SYSTEMS

Designs and patterns find protection as regards intellectual property rights in many various ways, such variety being explained both through the particular features of such type of intellectual creations, and, as already mentioned above, through the fact that they are at the crossroads between industrial property and copyrights, and also by the constant existence of certain disputes regarding the legal nature of the rights on industrial designs and patterns, the up-to-date character of the field and the diversity of the legislative solutions adopted[8].

Depending on the particular features of such creations, there are three main systems for the protection of designs and patterns:

- the system of integrated cumulation of protection,
- the system of partial cumulation of protection,
- the system of specific protection.

Each of these systems is dealt with in various national legislations.

Thus, the system of integrated cumulation of protection, both in doctrine and in specialized literature, is known as "the system of cumulated protection". In my opinion, the concept of system of integrated cumulation of protections is more relevant and recommendable for use, since, by doing so, the distinction between the other systems is being strengthened, and especially the one in which similar criteria are being used, namely the system of partial cumulation of protection as regards designs and patterns.

This system has been consecrated in French law. Designs and patterns are regulated both in the Special Law of 14 March 1909, and the Law of 11 March 1957 on literary and artistic property.

The solution of the cumulation of protection is explained by the theory of the unity of art. Due to the impossibility of finding a single objective criterion to appreciate it, art in itself cannot be separated from applied arts. French jurisprudence stated that designs or patterns must be new and not a result of hazard; apart from this fundamental condition, there is another formal condition related to storage, which consists in the fact that the latter should be prior to the sale of the product, and which has the capacity to confer rights.

The most significant advantages of the cumulation of protection are: in the absence of storage, which conditions the acquiring of protection, the creator's rights can be capitalized as copyrights; the protection of copyrights lasts longer; the action against counterfeiting involves simple proceedings in the case of copyrights, and the sanctions are more serious.

[8] Nathalie Dreyfus, and Beatrice Thomas, Marques, dessins & modeles – Protection, defense, valorization, Second Edition, (Paris: Dalmas Publishing House, 2006).

The author of a design or pattern may choose a cumulative protection or another alternative. The granted protection is not conditional upon the artistic value of the design or pattern in question.

This principle of cumulative protection of designs and patterns has known a more recent recognition in Art. 17. of EC Directive 98/71. We can notice, therefore, that, at community level this principle has been recognized after many years from the operation, in the Romanian system, of the protection of intellectual property rights applicable to designs and patterns, which leads us to believe that the Romanian legislative system is a modern one, able to anticipate a complex protection for such works, and offering, at the same time, titleholders the possibility of getting increased protection for their creations.

The system of partial cumulation of protection

The system of partial cumulation of protection is traditional to German law. The German system is based on the distinction being made, depending on the predominant features of the artistic elements, between applied artwork, susceptible for copyright protection, and the designs and patterns themselves. In order to benefit from copyright protection, designs and patterns should be original. According to this system, the theory of art unity is rejected, while the distinction between designs and patterns and applied artwork is being made based on the criterion of artistry of the respective creation. Consequently, this system stipulates that originality is an essential condition for granting protection. Should the originality condition not be met, the design or pattern will only benefit from the specific protection given to industrial design and patterns. A similar system exists in Benelux as the Uniform Law of 1 January 1975, which also sets forth originality as criterion for the granting of double protection.

The system of specific protection

The system of specific protection is used in Italian law. The Italian system excludes any cumulation of protection; designs and patterns can only be the subject of protection in specific terms. Industrial designs and patterns are protected by specific regulations only, as established under Royal Decree No. 1411 of 25 August 1940, amended by Law No. 60/14 February 1987, as subsequently completed. By totally excluding cumulation, designs and patterns benefit from a unique protection system. Designs and patterns are referred to as decorative creations. Their legal status is the same as in the case of utility patterns.

In Romanian law, industrial designs and patterns enjoy a specific protection under Law No. 129 of 1992, which does not exclude the protection conferred by other legal provisions on intellectual property rights. To date, industrial designs and patterns have been subject to copyright protection.

The importance of this theme is also given by the fact that, for a while, the Romanian (and other) lawmakers have avoided providing a definition of designs and patterns, preferring instead to establish the fundamental conditions that they should meet in order to be protected, but, in the light of the new regulations, such definition has been enunciated in concrete terms and therefore, there is no shadow of a doubt as regards such topic – which this study attempted to focus on and clarify.

Regulation No. 6/2002 does not exclude the enforcement, in the case of designs and patterns, of protected community designs and patterns, regulations on industrial property or other relevant regulations pertaining to the member states, as well as the ones referring to the protection acquired by registration, or the ones concerning unregistered designs or patterns, onto commercial trademarks, patents and other utility patterns, or onto the ones regarding unfair competition and tort liability.

The rights on designs and patterns are property rights, as defined under civil law, which allows their creators to receive benefits from capitalizing their output. These rights are real, exclusive and absolute. Moral and patrimonial rights are recognized to the creators of designs and patterns.

Moreover, in the absence of a complete harmonization of the legislation on copyright matters, the Regulation imposes the principle of cumulating specific protection for community designs and patterns with the protection offered by copyrights, at the same time giving member states unrestricted freedom in establishing the degree of protection provided by copyright and the conditions for the granting of such protection.

Conclusions

The main directions approached by this study refer to the identification of a protection system applicable to designs and patterns valid in community law, as regulated by Directive No. 98/71/EC, and Council Regulation (EC) No. 6/2002 of 12.12.2001; it has briefly presented the aforementioned enactments, and discussed the various steps that must be followed in pursuing the procedure for obtaining protection and which, in my opinion, deserved such attention and analysis. Another focus of this study was the identification of available protection systems, and the review thereof, in order to better understand the applicability of said enactments and their importance in practice.

The expected impact of this study is to increase awareness on the importance of the legislative enactments applicable at European level on the subject matters discussed herein, and to understand the achievements in the field of intellectual property protection of designs and patterns. This aspect has known a growing importance in domestic and worldwide economy.

On a last note, I suggest expanding the analysis of this theme so as to include casuistry, as well as copyrights, trademarks and other components of intellectual property rights.

References

- Council Regulation (EC) No. 6/2002 of 12.12.2001 (enforced based on Commission Regulation No. 2245/2002 of 21.10.2002).
- Directive No. 98/71/EC.
- Dreyfus, Nathalie, and Thomas Beatrice, Marques, dessins & modeles – Protection, defense, valorisation, Second Edition. Paris: Dalmas Publishing House, 2006.
- Duvac, Constantin, and Ciprian Raul Romitan, Legal and Penal Protection of Designs and Patterns (Protecția juridico-penală a desenelor şi modelelor). Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2009.
- Eminescu, Y., The Protection of Industrial Designs and Patterns (Protecția Desenelor şi modelelor industriale). Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 1993.
- Roş, Viorel, Dragoş Bogdan, and Octavia Spineanu Matei, Copyrights and Other Related Rights, Treatise (Dreptul de autor şi drepturile conexe Tratat). Bucharest: All Beck Publishing House, 2005.
- Schmidt - Szalewski, J., Droit de la propriete industrielle, Paris: Dalloz, 1997.

DECISIONS OF ROMANIAN LAW COURTS IN CASES CONCERNING THE INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE 3 (D) OF REGULATION (EC) NO 469/2009 OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND OF THE COUNCIL OF 6 MAY 2009, CONCERNING THE SUPPLEMENTARY PROTECTION CERTIFICATE FOR MEDICINAL PRODUCTS

BUCURA IONESCU[*]

Abstract

The supplementary protection certificate is currently considered to represent an accessory of a national or European patent granted in order to extend the duration of the rights that said patent confers on its owner in respect of an active substance or a combination of active substances. Based on the above-mentioned patent and on the certificate, the owner shall have the exclusive right of manufacturing and commercializing the patented product, as well as the right to oppose to any form of counterfeiting of the patented product. The grant of this protection title for medicaments is regulated on the territory of the European Union by the Regulation (EC) No 469/2009 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 6 May 2009 concerning the supplementary protection certificate for medicinal products (Codified version). The conditions for obtaining the certificate are stipulated under Art. 3. The paper is intended to present the decisions made by the Romanian courts in the cases concerning the controversial interpretation of Art. 3 letter d) of the Regulation, which provides that the valid authorization to place the medicament on the market in accordance with Directive 2001/83/EC or Directive 2001/82/EC, as the case may be, should be the first authorization to place the product on the market as a medicament. At the same time, the paper presents the differences in the approach and the judgment of such cases by OSIM (State Office for Inventions and Trademarks) and by the national courts. The paper aims at analyzing said decisions as compared to the European practice, with a view to identifying solutions for a uniform interpretation of Community legislation at the level of the Romanian courts.

Keywords*: patent right, supplementary protection certificate, medicinal products, EU Regulation, court decisions*

Introduction

The supplementary protection certificate is currently seen rather as a patent sub-domain, than as an independent industrial property title. It is an accessory of a previously granted national or European patent, intended to extend the duration of the rights that said patent confers on its owner in respect of an active substance or a combination of active substances. Based on the above-mentioned patent, the owner shall have the exclusive right of manufacturing and commercializing the patented product, as well as the right to oppose to any form of counterfeiting of the patented product.

In a field so dynamic as the field of medicaments and the industrial property rights of patent owners in medicaments within the EU, the Council Regulation (EEC) No. 1768/1992 on the creation of a supplementary protection certificate for medicaments[1], hereinafter referred to as Regulation, created the legal framework for the settlement of cases in which a pharmaceutical company that owns a patent for a medicament and is also authorized to place said medicament on the market, can enjoy the extension of duration of its exclusive rights by the grant of a supplementary protection certificate.

[*] Director Patents Directorate, State Office for Inventions and Trademarks, Romania, (email: bucura.ionescu@osim.ro).

[1] Council Regulation (EEC) of 18 June 1992 concerning the creation of a supplementary protection certificate for medicinal products (OJ L 182, p.1, Special edition 13, volume 11, p.130)

The Regulation entered into force on 2 January 1993 and, in 2009, as a consequence of the evolution of exigencies in the pharmaceutical field, on the one hand, and of the changes occurred in the geopolitical area of the Community, on the other hand, the codified version thereof was adopted as the Regulation (EC) No 469/2009[2]. In the following pages, reference will be made especially to the Regulation of 1992 and, where appropriate, the Regulation of 2009 will be called by the phrase "codified version".

Although the supplementary protection certificate was established in the Community almost 20 years ago, specialized literature in this field can scarcely be found in Europe, Romania not even having judicial practice.

The paper presents five decisions made by Romanian courts in disputes related to the controversial interpretation of Article 3 (d)[3] of the Regulation which provides that the valid authorization for placing a medicament on the market in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC should be the first authorization to place the product on the market as a medicinal product. The paper points out the different approaches and ruling of these five identically similar cases by the national protection granting authority - OSIM[4], and by the national courts. The paper aims at analyzing said decisions in the context of the European practice, with a view to identifying solutions for the uniform interpretation of Community legislation in Romanian courts.

Content

1. Case Insulin lispro (the medicament named "Humalog"). File No. 42590/3/2009, Law Court of Bucharest, Fifth Civil Section

The supplementary protection certificate application no. c2007-061 of the applicant Eli Lilly and Company, for the product having the chemical name Human insulin [Lys(B28), Pro(B29)] and the ICD Insulin lispro, was filed with OSIM on 20.06.2007, within the 6-month legal time limit of Romania's accession to the European Union, under the transitional provisions stipulated in Article 19a (l) of the Regulation[5].

With a view to granting the SPC applied for, the Examination Board of OSIM analyzed the compliance with the conditions stipulated under Article 3 of the Regulation, as follows:

The product named Insulin lispro is protected by the basic patent in force RO 2.192T, having the title Insulin Analog Compound and Pharmaceutical Compositions Containing the Same, as identified in Claims 1 and 2 and the examples in the description of the basic patent. The condition

---

[2] Regulation (EC) 469/2009 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 6 May 2009 concerning the supplementary protection certificate for medicinal products (Codified version) (OJ L 152/1)

[3] Under the title Conditions for obtaining a supplementary protection certificate, (hereinafter referred to as SPC), Article 3 of the said Regulation provides as follows:

"A certificate shall be granted if, in the Member State in which the application referred to in Article 7 is submitted and at the date of that application:

(a) the product is protected by a basic patent in force;

(b) a valid authorization to place the product on the market as a medicinal product has been granted in accordance with Directive 65/65/EEC or Directive 81/851/EEC, as appropriate;

(c) the product has not already been the subject of a certificate;

(d) the authorization referred to in (b) is the first authorization to place the product on the market as a medicinal product."

[4] State Office for Inventions and Trademarks, Romania, hereinafter OSIM.

[5] Article 19: "Additional provisions relating to the enlargement of the Community

Without prejudice to the other provisions of this Regulation, the following provisions shall apply:

[…] (j) any medicinal product protected by a valid basic patent and for which the first authorisation to place it on the market as a medicinal product was obtained after 1 January 2000 may be granted a certificate in Romania. In cases where the period provided for in Article 7(1) has expired, the possibility of applying for a certificate shall be open for a period of six months starting no later than 1 January 2007;"

provided under letter a) of Article 3 is complied with. No SPC has been granted in Romania in respect of said product, the condition provided under letter c) of the same article being also met thereby. From the SPC application filed with OSIM, it results that the product Insulin lispro is retrieved as an active substance in the medicament named Humalog, authorized for the first time to be placed on the market in Romania as a medicinal product through the Registration Certificates no. 5256/96, 5257/96 and 6764/98 and reauthorized to be placed on the market through the authorization no. 3149/2003. Said later authorization obtained by the product as a medicament is an authorization granted in accordance with Directive 65/65/EEC of the Council of 26 January 1965 on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to proprietary medicinal products, so that the condition provided under letter b) of Article 3 is met, as well. For the cumulative compliance with the four conditions stipulated by Article 3 of the Regulation, the authorization no.3149/2003, granted in accordance with Directive 65/65/EEC, needs to be the first authorization for placing the product Insulin lispro on the market as a medicinal product (Article 3 (d)). It is worth mentioning that the first authorization for placing the product on the market, in the Community, was issued on 30.04.1996, as the applicant indicates in the SPC application.

The registration certificates for the medicament Humalog having Insulin Lispro as an active substance have been issued by the National Medicines Agency, based on Romanian Government Ordinance No. 31/1995 (Official Gazette No.201 of 30.08.1995) and the Order of the Minister of Health No.949/1991, which approved the Directives concerning the authorization, registration and monitoring of medicaments and other products for human use. These certificates were issued in the period of time when the above-mentioned national acts in force had provisions as to the harmonization with the Directive 65/65/EEC, with which they were already harmonized to a large extent. Based on said certificates, the medicament Humalog could be commercialized in Romania before the date of 01.01.2000. Taking into account the meaning of the date of 01.01.2000, i.e. in Romania, the first authorizations for placing the medicaments on the market were granted by virtue of procedures harmonized with the Directive 65/65 EEC, starting from this date, based on the Emergency Ordinance No.152/1999[6], OSIM interpreted the phrase "the first authorization to place a product on the market as a medicinal product", in the Article 19 a (l), as referring to the first authorization for placing the product on the market in Romania, not in the Community. It results that the right to be granted an SPC in Romania is explicitly limited to those products that cumulatively comply with the provisions of Article 3 (b) and (d), and of Article 19 a (l) of the Regulation, in this case it being relevant that the product had not been placed on the market in Romania before 01.01.2000.

Consequently, as the conditions for the grant of the SPC for the product Insulin lispro were not cumulatively complied with, the application was refused by the Examination Board, through the Decision No.3/29 of 28.12.2008.

On 17.04.2009, the company Eli Lilly and Company, represented by SCA Turcu & Turcu, lodged an appeal against the decision of the Examination Board, with the OSIM Board of Appeal, asking for "the annulment of the decision no. 3/29 of 28.12.2008 and, consequently, for the granting of a supplementary protection certificate for the medicinal product Humalog – Insulin lispro".

The grounds, as claimed in the appeal, related to the fact that Article 19 a (l) of the Regulation does not explicitly limit the right to be granted an SPC to the products commercialized on the Romanian market, for the first time after the date of 01.01.2000, "but rather relates to the products whose first market authorization (as defined in the Regulation) was granted after 01.01 2000. With a view to obtaining an SPC in Romania, it is not relevant whether the product was placed on the market in Romania before the date of 01.01.2000, as long as those products were not authorized in Romania in accordance with a procedure similar to the procedure provided by the Council Directive 65/65/EEC". The appellant also showed that a contrary interpretation could lead to an erroneous conclusion, namely that, in Romania, an SPC can only be obtained for those products for which the first market authorization was obtained in a Community Member State, after the date of 01.01.2000, which would limit the purpose of application of the Regulation on the territory of our country. In the appellant's opinion, because Article 19 a (l) relates to Article 3 (b) and (d), the phrase "first authorization" used in Article 19 a (l) shall represent the first authorization in Romania. Invoking the uniform application of Community legislation, based on the fact that the same product has been granted an SPC in the majority of the other EU Member States, the appellant also points out that the product Humalog – Insulin Lys Pro obtained the first EMEA market authorization on 30.04.1996, which allows the granting of an SPC. The invoked legal grounds are Article 3, Article 17 and Article 19 a (l) of the Regulation, Article 7(1) of the Law No.93/1998 on the pipeline protection of patents[7], Article 51[8] of the Patent Law 64/1991, as republished.

[6] GEO No. 152/1999 of 14 October 1999 on medicinal products for human use, published in the O.G. No. 508 of 20 October 1999 and entered into force on 01.01.2000

Subsequently, the appellant also filed written conclusions to prove the unlawful character of the appealed against decision to refuse the application for the grant of an SPC. Essentially, the appellant considers that the decision appealed against was made as a consequence of the unlawful interpretation of the concept of "first authorization to place the product on the market as a medicinal product." With a view to explaining the meaning of the phrase "first authorization to place the product on the market", the appellant applied the reference decision of ECJ – Hässle vs Ratiopharm[9] to the case: "The first authorization for placing the product on the market in the Community", mentioned under Article 19 (l) in the Regulation No. 1768/92 must be, the same as "the first authorization for placing the product on the market " mentioned under Article 3 of the said Regulation, an authorization issued in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC."

The ruling of the OSIM Board of Appeal as to reject the appeal is pronounced with majority of votes through the Decision No. 64/16.07.2009. The Chairman of the Board formulated a separate opinion thereto, as to allow the appeal. The grounds of the Board judgment consisted in that the first authorizations for placing the product on the market as a medicament were issued as the Registration Certificates of 1996 and 1997, granted by the Ministry of Health, based on the Government Ordinance No.31/1995 (Official Gazette No. 201/30.08.1995) and the Order of the Minister of Health No.949/1991 approving the Directives concerning the authorization, registration and monitoring of medicaments and other products for human use. Said Certificates were granted by virtue of a procedure following to a great extent the structure and content of the Directive 65/65/EEC, still not being fully harmonized therewith, but based on a complete authorization file which contained a chemical-pharmaceutical and biological documentation, a pharmaco-toxicological documentation and a clinical documentation, as well, being elaborated in accordance with the European Communities good practice rules on pharmaceuticals. The said acts have permitted the circulation and use of the medicament Humalog (Insulin lispro) on the territory of Romania, since 1996. The legal grounds invoked are Article 18 of the Regulation (codified version) and Article 53 of the Patent Law 64/1991, as republished.

---

[7] Law No. 93/1998 on the pipeline protection of patents of 13 May 1998, published in the O.G. No. 186 of 20 May 1998. By virtue thereof, the pipeline protection starts on the date of filing the patent application with OSIM and lasts until the date of expiry of the patent.

[8] Article 51 of the Patent Law 64/1991 republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, No.541 of 08.08.2007: Any decision made by the Examination Board may be appealed against with OSIM within 3 months from communication."

[9] C-127/00 – The court held with no doubt that there is no reason for different interpretation of the phrase „authorization for placing the product on the market", depending on the provision of the Regulation it is comprised in, and that the phrase cannot have different meanings when mentioned under Article 3 or under Article 19.

In his dissenting opinion, the Chairman of the Board argued that the allowability of the appeal was imposed by the reason that said Registration Certificates cannot represent first authorizations to place a medicament on the market, as they can be ignored in the meaning of Article 20 of the codified version of the Regulation.[10]

The above–mentioned Decision No. 64/16.07.2009 of the OSIM Board of Appeal was appealed against by the appellant Eli Lilly and Company, represented by SCA Turcu & Turcu, before the Law Court of Bucharest – Civil and Intellectual Property Section, on 28.10.2009, registered under the number 42590/3/2009.

In opposition with the respondent State Office for Inventions and Trademarks (OSIM), and pursuant to the provisions of Article 57 (1) of the Patent Law 64/1991 and Article 282 and the following of the Civil Procedure Code, the appellant asks for :

"the delivery of a decision as to allowing the appeal and consequently:

i) changing the decision appealed against in whole;

ii) accepting the application for the grant of a supplementary protection certificate for the medicament Humalog (Human Insulin Lys Pro);[...]"

In the statement of reasons of the attack, the appellant indicates the legal ground for its SPC application, i.e. Article 19 a (I) of the Regulation (EEC) 1768/92, and shows that "the condition set out under this article is that the medicament had not been given a market authorization before the date of 1 January 2000." And, despite the substantiation in extenso of the fact that the authorization referred to under Article 19 (I) is an authorization issued in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC and, consequently, the Certificates issued in 1996, allowing commercialization in Romania of the medicament Humalog, were not issued according to a procedure pursuant to the Directive, these essential arguments were not analyzed by OSIM and the Board of Appeal "was content with assuming the examiner's opinion." Thus, one of the pleas raised by the appellant in support of the appeal is the unsubstantiation: the attacked decision has not been substantiated.

Another plea in support of the appeal is the violation of the principle of equality of arms and fair trial[11], as OSIM gave the value of presumption iuris et de iure to a communication from the National Medicines Agency setting out that "the certificates of registration issued before the date of 01.01.2000, although not fully harmonized with the Directive 65/65/EEC, are based on an extensive chemical-pharmaceutical, biological, pharmaco-toxic and clinical documentation" thereby preventing the appellant from effectively appealing against its acts. This represented an obvious violation of the right to a fair trial.

Finally, the appellant also invokes the groundlessness of the judgment, as the respondent OSIM states that Romanian norms in 1996 were "to a great extent" in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC, even if the procedure was "not fully harmonized"; however, "to a great extent" does not mean completely and "not fully harmonized" does not mean identical.

OSIM filed a statement of defence claiming that the Court should reject the appeal as unfounded and, subsidiarily, reject the head of claim concerning the payment of Court costs. In brief, the respondent OSIM shows that in Romania the right to obtain an SPC is limited to the products – active substances – which cumulatively satisfy the requirements of Article 3 (b) and (d) and Article 19 (l) of the Regulation, where it is relevant that the product was not placed on the market before the date of 01.01.2000, even if it had been already commercialized in the Community.

The Court ascertains that the decision appealed against was made based on a misinterpretation of the applicable legal provisions and allows the appeal. We quote from the statement of reasons of the Court:

---

[10] Article 20 is the former Article 19 a (I) of the Regulation No.1768/92 – Additional provisions relating to the enlargement of the Community

[11] Principle of equality of arms and the fair trial is applicable in civil matters in the meaning of Art. 6 of ECHR

"The Court retained that the problem submitted for trial is to establish whether the Registration Certificates no. 5256/1996, 5257/96, 5258/96 and 6764/98, 5488/97, granted by the Ministry of Health, represent or not the first authorizations to place the product on the market, referred to under Article 3 (d) of the Regulation, as related to Article 3 (b) of the same Regulation and the harmonization of the Romanian legislation with the Directive 65/65/EEC.

These certificates cannot represent a valid authorization for placing the product on the market as a medicinal product, in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC, and do not comply with the requirements of Article 3 (b) and (d) of the Regulation. In support of this interpretation, the Court also considered the provisions of Article 8, (1) (b) of the Regulation, stipulating that: "The application for a certificate shall contain: […] a copy of the authorization to place the product on the market, as referred to in Article 3 (b), in which the product is identified, containing in particular the number and date of the authorization and the summary of the product characteristics listed in Article 4a of Directive 65/65/EEC". For the same purpose, the Court retains the case-law of the ECJ referring to the rulings in the case C-127/00 Hässle AB vs Ratiopharm. It also judges that a medicament that has not been authorized pursuant to the Community law cannot be introduced onto the market of a Member State. And there are no provisions in the Directive 65/65/EEC to stipulate the possibility of such derogations or to allow one to consider that the mere introduction onto the market, even during several years, of a medicament which was not the subject of a market authorization issued in accordance with the Community law, could replace such an authorization."[12]

In conclusion, the Court considered that the appellant's application for the grant of an SPC cumulatively satisfies the requirements of Article 3 of the Regulation, as follows:

a) The product is protected by a basic patent in force, i.e. patent RO 2192T, granted under the Law No.93/1998;

b) A valid authorization for placing the product on the market as a medicinal product was granted in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC – Market authorization no. 3149/2003/01 issued on 21.02.2003;

c) The product has not already been the subject of a certificate;

d) The authorization referred to under letter b) is the first authorization for placing the product on the market as a medicinal product.

Based on these reasons, ascertaining that the decision appealed against was given with the misinterpretation of the incidental legal provisions, through the Civil Matters Decision No. 593 pronounced in open session on 27.05.2009, the Court allowed the appeal lodged by the appellant Eli Lilly and Company against the Decision No. 64/16.05.2009 made by the respondent OSIM and ordered the same to grant the SPC for the product Humalog (Human Insulin Lys Pro). The decision remained final and irrevocable by lack of appeal.

Consequently, OSIM granted the Supplementary Protection Certificate for the product Humalog (Human Insulin Lys-Pro) valid from the date of 07.02.2010 until 30.04.2011.

2. Case Anastrozole (the medicament named "Arimidex"). File No. 42583/3/2009, Law Court of Bucharest, Fifth Civil Section

The supplementary protection certificate application no. c2007-080 of the applicant AstraZeneka UK Limited for the product of the ICD Anastrozole (active substance having the chemical name 2,2'-[5-(1H-1,2,4-triazole-1-methyl)-1,3-phenylene]di(2-methylproiononitrile), possibly as a pharmaceutically acceptable addition salt, was filed with OSIM on 29.06.2007, within the 6-month legal time limit of Romania's accession to the European Union, under the transitional provisions stipulated in Article 19a (I) of the Regulation.

[12] Decision No. 593 of the Law Court of Bucharest, Fifth Civil Section, pronounced in open session on 27.05.2010

With a view to granting the SPC applied for, the Examination Board of OSIM analyzed the compliance with the conditions stipulated under Article 3 of the Regulation, as follows:

The product named Anastrozole, optionally as a pharmaceutically acceptable addition salt, is protected by the basic patent in force, RO 2.189T having the title "Aralkyl-Substituted Heterocyclic Compounds and Pharmaceutical or Veterinary Composition Containing the Same", as identified in Claims 1 and 7 (first compound) and first example in the description of the basic patent. The condition provided under letter a) of Article 3 is complied with. No SPC has been granted in Romania in respect of said product, the condition provided under letter c) of the same article being also met thereby. From the SPC application filed with OSIM it results that the product Anastrozole is retrieved as an active substance in the medicament Arimidex, authorized for the first time to be placed on the market in Romania as a medicinal product through the authorization (Registration Certificate) no. 92/1999/01 of 27.05.1999 and reauthorized to be placed on the market through the market authorization no. 6459/2006/01 of 31.05.2006. The first authorization for placing the product on the market in EEA is the authorization no. PL12619/0106 granted on 11.08.1995, in the United Kingdom. For the cumulative compliance with the four conditions stipulated by Article 3 of the Regulation, the market authorization no. 6459/2006/01 of 31.05.2006, granted in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC, needs to be the first authorization to place the product Anastrozole on the market, as a medicinal product (Article 3 d).

OSIM ascertained that, based on the authorization no. 92/1999/01 of 27.05.1999, the medicament Arimidex could be commercialized in Romania before the date of 01.01.2000.

In a similar way with the Humalog cas, as the conditions for the grant of the SPC for the product Anastrozole have not been cumulatively complied with, the application was refused by the Examination Board, through the Decision No. 3/20 of 30.10.2008[13].

On 26.02.2009, the applicant AstraZeneka UK Limited, represented by SC Rominvent SA, lodged an appeal against the decision of the Examination Board, with the OSIM Board of Appeal, asking for the annulment of the decision of the Examination Board and admission of the SPC application c2007-080. The legal ground invoked: Article 17 of the Regulation, Article 51 (1) of the Patent Law 64/1991, as republished.

As an argument in favour of granting the SPC, the appellant invokes Article 2 of the Regulation, mentioning that*: "Article 2 in the Regulation No.1768/1992 provides that the medicinal product in respect of which the SPC is applied for should be the subject of a valid authorization for placing the product on the market, issued in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC (applicable to medicinal products for human use) abrogated by Directive 2001/83/EC, or the Directive 81/851/EEC (in case of medicinal products for veterinary use) abrogated by Directive 2001/82/EC on the Community code relating to veterinary medicinal products".*[14]

[13] From the whole number of SPC applications filed with OSIM under Article 19 (I) of the Regulation, for products contained in medicaments commercialized on the territory of Romania before the date of 01.01.2000, based on certificates or authorizations which were not fully harmonized with the Directive 65/65/EEC, the first decision to refuse the application was made in respect of Anastrozole. The chronology of the decisions is only relevant in the light of the evolution of the grounds invoked by the representatives of patent owners upon attacking OSIM decisions.

[14] Text of Article 2 of the Regulation No. 1768/1992: Scope

"Any product protected by a patent in the territory of a Member State and subject, prior to being placed on the market as a medicinal product, to an administrative authorization procedure as laid down in Council Directive 65/65/EEC… may, under the terms and conditions provided for in this Regulation, be the subject of a certificate."

It also relies on the above-mentioned case Hassle vs Ratiopharm in order to substantiate the identity between the authorization referred to under Article 3 and the authorization under Article 19 of the Regulation, which must be in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC.

The ruling of the OSIM Board of Appeal as to reject the appeal is pronounced with majority of votes through the Decision No. 67/25.05.2009. The Chairman of the Board expressed a separate opinion thereto, as to allow the appeal. The ground of the Board judgment is similar with the Humalog case. The legal grounds invoked in support thereof are Article 20 of the Regulation (EC) No.469/2009 concerning the SPC for medicaments and Article 53 of the Patent Law 64/1991, as republished.

In his dissenting opinion, the Chairman of the Board argued that the allowability of the appeal was imposed by the reason that said Registration Certificates cannot represent first authorizations to place a medicament on the market, as they can be ignored in the meaning of Article 20 of SPC Regulation No.469/2009 (EC). He also referred to the case no. HC 08 C 02210 Synthon B.V. vs Merz Pharma of 02.04.2009, where the judge Justice Floyd presented a judgment of Bundespatentgericht of 11.12.2007 (pages 7-8) and stated that old authorizations, granted in accordance with the unharmonized legislation, are not taken into account by the Federal Patent Court of Germany.

The above-mentioned Decision No. 67/25.05.2009 of the OSIM Board of Appeal was appealed against by the appellant AstraZeneka UK Limited, represented by SCA David and Baias, before the Law Court of Bucharest – Civil and Intellectual Property Section, on 28.10.2009, under the number 42583/3/2009. In opposition with the respondent OSIM and pursuant to the provisions of Article 57 (1) of the Patent Law No. 64/1991 and Article 282 and the following of the Civil Procedure Code, the appellant claims that the Court should:

i) invalidate the Decision appealed against in whole;

ii) order OSIM to issue an SPC for the product Arimidex, with the active substance Anastrozole; […].

In the statement of reasons of the attack, the appellant indicates first that, although the Decision of the OSIM Board of Appeal is related to the Regulation (EC) No. 469/2009, which is the codified version of the SPC Regulation No. 1768/1992, reference will be made to the consolidated text of the Regulation, prior to the codification of 2009. The appeal is based on the unlawfulness and groundlessness of the Decision made by the Board of Appeal, the appellant putting forward its arguments to prove that:

1.The first authorization for placing the product on the market, within the meaning of Article 3 (d) of the Regulation must be a market authorization harmonized with the Directive 65/65/EEC.

In order to support the uniform application, at the Community level, of the Regulation, and thus, of the national procedures for medicaments authorization, which must be in compliance with the Directive 65/65/EC, the appellant relies on the cases Hassle AB vs Ratiopharm GmbH and Pharmacia Italia SpA. Because almost 30 years elapsed from the adoption of the Directive, in 1965, to the issuance of the Regulation, in 1992, it is "impossible to retain that Article 3 (d) would relate to a market authorization unharmonized with the Directive."

2.The market authorization-1999 (in fact the Registration Certificate of 1999) was not issued by virtue of a procedure harmonized with the Directive 65/65/EEC.

Starting from the assertion of the respondent OSIM itself, that the Certificate of 1999 was not harmonized with the Directive, the appellant points out the meaning of the date of 01.01.2000, and states:

"Thus, from the viewpoint of the Regulation purpose, the market authorizations issued after the date of 01.01.2000, under the GEO No. 152/1999, comply with the Directive 65/65/EEC and can give the right to the grant of an SPC, while the market authorizations issued prior to this date, under the GO 31/1995 do not comply with the Directive 65/65/EEC and, by consequence, cannot be relied upon for the grant of an SPC. In other words, the date of 01.01.2000 is mentioned by this text only because the grant of any authorization in accordance with the Directive would not have been possible prior to this date. Consequently, the conclusion of the OSIM "analysis" alleging that the presence of the product on the Romanian market before the date of 01.01.2000 would represent a reason of non-compliance with the Regulation requirements for the grant of an SPC is obviously erroneous and lacks any legal support."[15]

The statement of reasons of the Court findings is identical with the statement in the Humalog-Insulin lispro. It is found that the first authorization to place the product on the market is not the Registration Certificate No. 92/1991/01, but the market authorization no. 6459/2006/01 issued on 31.05.2006 under the GEO No. 152/1999 harmonizing the national legislation with the Directive 65/65/EEC, coming to the conclusion that the decision appealed against was given with the misinterpretation of the legal provisions. OSIM was ordered to grant the SPC for the product Arimidex.

The Decision No. 523/13.05.2010 of the Law Court of Bucharest was further appealed against by OSIM.

This further appeal was based on the consideration that, in ruling the appeal brought against the OSIM Board of Appeal, the Court misinterpreted the provisions of Article 3 and Article 19 a (I) of the Regulation. As, under Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (former Article 234 EC), the mission of ensuring application, interpretation and enforcement of Community law throughout the territory of the EU is incumbent on the European Court of Justice, OSIM found necessary that the following question should be referred to the ECJ for preliminary ruling[16]:

"Does an authorization granted in Romania, which is in accordance with the Council Directive 65/65/EEC, represent for a product "the first authorization for placing the product on the Romanian market as a medicinal product", provided that this authorization was obtained following to a request for reauthorization based on a prior authorization issued under certain normative acts harmonized "to a great extent" with the Directive 65/65/EEC?"

Through a statement of defence, AstraZeneka UK Limited, represented by SCA Baias and Baias, asks the Court of Appeal to reject the appeal entered by the respondent OSIM, as unfounded, invoking, on the one hand, that there is no need of a preliminary ruling of the ECJ concerning the interpretation of Article 3 of the Regulation, and, on the other hand, that the Law Court of Bucharest considered correctly that the market authorization of 2006 was the first authorization for placing the product Arimidex on the market, within the meaning of Article 3 (d) read in conjunction with Article 3 (b) of the Regulation. The preliminary ruling of ECJ is considered unnecessary for the following reason: "the concept of "first authorization for placing a product on the market" was settled by the ECJ in the case C-127/00 Hassle vs Ratiopharm GmbH, the court being not obliged de plano to refer [15] Decision No. 523 of the Law Court of Bucharest, Fifth Civil Section, pronounced in open session on 13.05.2010, pages 13-14.

[16] In accordance with the provisions of Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU), Article 2 (1) of the Law 340/2009 on a declaration made by Romania under the provisions of Art 35 (2) of TFEU, as well as in accordance with the Information Note on references from national courts for a preliminary ruling, published in the JO No.297 of 5 December 2009 and Article 23 in the Statutes of the European Court of Justice, where an instance has doubts on the interpretation of an act issued by a European institution, it may refer the case to the ECJ for preliminary ruling.

the case to the ECJ considering that a question within the meaning of Article 267 TFEU was raised.[17]"

The company Teva Pharmaceuticals SRL, represented by SCA Nestor Nestor Diculescu Kingston Petersen, entered, based on Article 49 (1) and (3) read in conjunction with Article 51, 54, 55 and 56 of CCP, an application for intervention in the interest of OSIM and in opposition with AstraZeneka UK Limited, claiming, among other things, that the Court should allow the appeal entered by OSIM and change the decision made by the Law Court of Bucharest[18]. Teva Pharmaceuticals SRL justified its interest in the case Anastrozole by its being the owner of the authorization for placing on the Romanian market the generic medicament Anastrozole TEVA, having the anastrozole as an active principle. Because the patent RO 2189T has expired since 14.06.2008, the company which manufactures generic medicaments is interested in the commercialization, on the Romanian market, of the generic medicament containing the active substance/principle Anastrozole, for which it already obtained the market authorization. The extension of the SPC duration may thereby affect the rights of the company to commercialize its products, rights obtained upon issuance of the market authorization. The arguments brought by the intervener in order to support the lack of legal grounds of the decision made by the Law Court of Bucharest concerning Article 3 and Article 19 a (I) of the Regulation are the following:

A. Arguments based on the interpretation of legal texts

Article 19 a (l) is an amendment brought to Article 19 a as a consequence of the Act of Accession of Bulgaria and Romania to the EU[19]. This article originates in Article 32 of the Law No 581/2004 on the supplementary protection certificate for medicaments and plant-protection products"[20] which has the following content:

"a certificate may be granted for any product which, on the date of entering into force of this law, is protected by a basic patent in force or by a pipeline protection certificate in force and for which a first authorization to be placed on the Romanian market as a medicament or plant protection product was obtained starting from 1 January 2000, provided that the application for the grant of the certificate is filed within a time limit of 6 months of the date of Romania's accession to the European Union."

Hence, as regards Romania, an SPC cannot be granted if the first authorization for placing a medicament on the market was issued before the date of 1 January 2000.

B. Arguments based on the interpretation of similar legal texts by other Member States

---

[17] Paul Craig, Greinee de Burca – Dreptul Uniunii Europene, Fourth Edition, Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest 2009, p. 585

[18] From the Application for accessory intervention entered by NNDKP, only the aspects relating to the appeal lodged by OSIM shall be hereinafter referred to.

[19] The Act of Accession of Romania and Bulgaria to the EU was published in the Official Journal of the European Union No. L 157/11 of 21.06.2005. In Annex III to the Protocol setting the conditions and arrangements for accession, the chapter concerning the company law contains the Industrial Property Rights section with the sub-section Supplementary Protection Certificates.

[20] Law No.581/2004 on the supplementary protection certificate for medicaments and plant protection products was published in the Official Gazette of Romania No. 1233 of 21 December 2004. The law never produced effects and was expressly abrogated by the Law No. 107/2007, because, on the date of Romania's accession to the European Union, the Community Regulations became directly applicable and prevailing over the conflicting provisions of national legislation.

It is the case of Hungary and Poland. For the transitional (pipeline) protection in the two said Member States, there are applicable the provisions of Article 19 a (f) and (h), respectively. In this two Member States, the same as in Romania, the transitional provisions of Article 19 a do not expressly refer to a first market authorization obtained in the respective Member State, as is the case in Cyprus, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Slovenia and Slovakia. In its position of additional negotiation in the view of its accession to the EU, the government of Hungary upheld the applicability of the SPC regime only for those medicaments whose first authorization to be placed on the Community or Hungarian market (or the market of other countries in course of accession) was obtained after 1 January 2000, position which was accepted by the EU.

The interpretation presented above is also applicable to Poland, where an SPC cannot be granted for a product whose market authorization was obtained before the date of 1 January 2000, in Poland or in any Member State, as mentioned in the specialized literature[21].

C. Arguments based on the interpretation of the European Court of Justice

In the case C-66/09: Kirin Amgen. Inc. vs Lietuvos Respublikos valstybinis patent biuras, the ECJ concludes: "the objective pursued by Regulation No 1768/92 of according uniform protection for a medicinal product throughout the European Union does not preclude transitional provisions, resulting from the accession negotiations, which may mean that it is not possible to apply for an SPC for certain medicinal products in certain Member States. This outcome, which may impede, even if only temporarily, that objective and the functioning of the internal market, is justified by the legitimate objectives concerning health policies, including, as the case may be, the financial stability of the health systems of the Member States".

D. Arguments based on an interpretation per a contrario

Having in view that from the transitional provisions concerning states as Malta or Slovenia, from the wording of sub-paragraphs (g) and (i), it explicitly results that the first authorization for placing a product on the market relates to Malta or Slovenia, respectively, while the wording of sub-paragraph (I) concerning Romania is comparable with the situation of Hungary and Poland, it obviously outcomes that the interpretation of the provisions of the Regulation cannot lead with certainty to the conclusion that, in Romania, an SPC may be granted for a product for which an authorization for placing it on the market was obtained before the date of 1 January 2000 in any Member State, as interpreted by the Romanian Law Court of Bucharest.

The intervener further invokes the provisions of Article 2 of the Regulation.

The two requirements of this article provide that the product should be protected by a basic patent and should be subjected to authorization, pursuant to the Directive, prior to its being placed on the market. The provisions of Article 2 differ from those of Article 3 (a) and (b) in that Article 2 excludes from its scope the products placed on the market in the absence of an authorization pursuant to the Directive 65/65. Moreover, if the grant of an SPC based on other authorizations than those pursuant to the Directive were possible, the period of exclusivity would exceed, in certain cases, the total limit of 15 years from the date of the first authorization in Community, mentioned within the eighth recital of the preamble of the Regulation.

Finally, the arguments relating to the logic of the Regulation could be summarized by the following deduction: if the authorizations legally obtained before the date of 1 January 2000 could not be deemed to be the first authorizations for placing a medicament on the market, for lack of compliance with the Directive, the reference date mentioned under Article 19 a (l) (i.e. 1 January 2000) would be completely useless, as all the products having market authorization received after this date would be automatically eligible for the grant of an SPC (no market authorization in compliance with the said Directive was obtained before this date).

[21] Rafal Witek, The First Yyear of SPC in Poland: A Tentative Summary, http: www.wtspatent.pl/files/en5.pdf

The intervener claimed that six questions should be referred to the European Court of Justice for preliminary ruling. Of these questions, we will mention the following:

1. In the meaning of Article 20 (j) (former Article 19 a (l)), may an SPC be granted in Romania for a product whose first market authorization, pursuant to the Directive 65/65/EEC, was obtained before the date of 1 January 2000 in any Member State?

2. Should the answer in the first question be in the affirmative, is a product firstly authorized to be placed on the market in Romania, before the date of 1 January 2000, without the administrative procedure provided for by the Directive 65/65, eligible to be granted an SPC in accordance with the Regulation?

3. Within the meaning of Article 3 (d) of the Regulation, is an authorization issued in accordance with the legislation in force in Romania before the year 2000, and which was not in compliance with the Directive 65/65 but allowed the product to be legally placed on the market, deemed to be the first authorization for placing a product on the market as a medicinal product?

The application to intervene is dismissed by the Court of Appeal of Bucharest – Ninth Civil Section for cases concerning intellectual property, based on the grounds invoked in the Statement of defence filed by AstraZeneka UK Limited, represented by SCA David and Baias. There was invoked the objection of inadmissibility of the legal strategy proposed by the intervener, namely the fact that the product Anastrozole is not within the scope of the Regulation, i.e. Article 2. Firstly, a new legal argument was invoked, i.e. Article 2, despite the fact that OSIM did not invoke or contest this article in its decisions; secondly, by invoking Article 2, the principle of availability was violated. Thus, OSIM entered its further appeal relying on the ground referred to under Article 304 (9) of the CPC, i.e. "wrongful application of law", in relation with Article 3 and Article 19 a (I) of the Regulation, which are the only legal norms under assessment by the Examination Board, Board of Appeal and Law Court of Bucharest. Whereas Article 2 was not the subject of a dispute between the parties, the arguments brought in support of the appeal entered by OSIM cannot be allowed. Thirdly, the fact of invoking Article 2 violates the principle of double jurisdiction, since the intervener Teva may not invoke criticism on applicability and interpretation of legal texts which were not discussed before the Law Court of Bucharest, but are brought, for the first time, before the Court of Appeal.

Although, in the Written Conclusions sent to the Court of Appeal on 08.02.2011, OSIM reiterates the need to refer the questions on the interpretation of Article 19 a of the Regulation for preliminary ruling by the ECJ, provided that, in SPC matters, after Romania's accession to the EU there is no corresponding case-law, the Court of Appeal is a court whose decisions cannot be subject of internal attack, and " the preliminary ruling system is a fundamental mechanism of European Union law aimed at enabling national courts to ensure uniform interpretation and application of that law in all the Member States"[22], this request is rejected by the Court.

The Court of Appeal dismisses the appeal entered by OSIM before the Court of Appeal of Bucharest against the Decision No. 523/13.05.2010 of the Law Court of Bucharest as unfounded and, at the same time, it rejects as groundless the application to intervene filed by Teva Pharmaceuticals SRL in the interest of OSIM. The Decision of the Law Court of Bucharest is thereby irrevocable.

[22] Information Note on references from national courts for a preliminary ruling, 12, OJ No. C 297/1 of 5 december 2009.

As a consequence, OSIM granted the Supplementary Protection Certificate for the product Anastrozole, possibly as a pharmaceutically-acceptable addition salt, valid from 15.06.2008 until 11.08.2010.

3.Case Olanzapine (the medicament named Zyprexa). File No. 42589/3/2009, Law Court of Bucharest, Fifth Civil Section

The supplementary protection certificate application no. c2007-058 of the applicant Eli Lilly and Company, for the product having the ICD Olanzapine (the active substance with the chemical name 2-methyl-10-(4-methyl-1-piperazinyl)-4H-thieno[2,3-b][1,5]benzodiazepine), was filed with OSIM on 14.06.2007, within the 6-month legal time limit of Romania's accession to the European Union, under the transitional provisions stipulated in Article 19a (l) of the Regulation.

With a view to granting the SPC applied for, the Examination Board of OSIM analyzed the compliance with the conditions stipulated under Article 3 of the Regulation, as follows:

The product named Olanzapine is protected by the basic patent in force, RO 2.168T having the title Pharmaceutical Compounds and Pharmaceutical Compositions as identified by Claims 1 and 7 of the basic patent. The condition provided under letter a) of Article 3 is complied with. No SPC has been granted in Romania in respect of said product, the condition provided under letter c) of the same article being also met thereby. From the SPC application filed with OSIM it results that the product Olanzapine is retrieved as an active substance in the medicament named Zyprexa, authorized for the first time to be placed on the market in Romania as a medicinal product through the Registration Certificates no. 5920/1997, 5970/1997 and 5931/1997 by the Ministry of Health, based on the Government Ordinance No 31/1995 and the Order of the Minister of Health No. 949/1991 mentioned above. The authorization for placing the product on the market on which the SPC application is based is the market authorization no. 1806/2001/01 of 23.03.2001. The first authorization for placing the product on the market in EEA is in fact a series of authorizations issued by EMEA on 27.09.1996. For the cumulative compliance with the four conditions stipulated by Article 3 of the Regulation, the market authorization of 2001, granted in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC, needs to be the first authorization to place the product Olanzapine on the market, as a medicinal product (Article 3 d).

The case is identically similar with the first two cases presented above, i.e. Insulin lispro and Anastrozole, hence we will not analyze it in detail. The SPC application was refused by the Examination Board through the Decision No.3/21 of 30.10.2008.

On 25.02.2009, the company Eli Lilly and Company, represented by SCA Turcu & Turcu, lodged an appeal against the decision of the Examination Board, with the OSIM Board of Appeal, asking for "the appeal to be allowed, the Decision no. 3/21 of 30.10.2008 to be annulled and a supplementary protection certificate to be granted for the medicinal product Zyprexa (Olanzepine)".

The statement of reasons of the appeal is similar to the Insulin lispro case-file and, following to the analysis of the reasons and documents enclosed with the case-file, the OSIM Board of Appeal decided to reject the appeal by virtue of the same de facto and de jure considerations referred to in the Insulin lispro case-file.

The Decision No. 62/16.07.2009 of the OSIM Board of Appeal as to reject the appeal, was appealed against by the appellant Eli Lilly and Company, represented by SCA Turcu & Turcu, in opposition with the respondent State Office for Inventions and Trademarks (OSIM). It was ruled through the Civil Decision No. 875A pronounced in open session on 07.07.2010 by the Law Court of Bucharest, Fifth Civil Section. The grounds and arguments as to accept the application for the grant of an SPC for Olazepine are the same as those referred to in the previously presented case Humalog (Insulin lis pro). Also, the statement of reasons of the Civil Decision No. 875A is identical with the Civil Decision No. 593 pronounced in open session on 27.05.2009 in respect of the Humalog case.

But this time, the Civil Decision No. 875A is further appealed against by OSIM which asks the Court of Appeal of Bucharest for preliminary ruling by the European Court of Justice. The procedural steps and arguments brought by the parties are further on carried out in a way similar with the Anastrozole file. Teva Pharmaceuticals Europe BV also applies for accessory intervention. In the session of 23.12.2010, the Court adjourns the case with the following ruling: it unanimously dismisses the Teva application for accessory intervention as inadmissible and ascertains, with majority, the admissibility of principle of the intervention application, with the dissenting opinion of judge Stanciu as to the inadmissibility of the intervention application.[23] Through the Civil Decision No. 84/01.03.2011 it dismisses the appeal as unfounded and dismisses the application to intervene. The Court Decision is irrevocable.

Consequently, OSIM grants the Supplementary Protection certificate for the product Olanzapine, valid from 25.04.2011 until 27.09.2011.

4. Case Candesartan Cilexetil (Atacand). File No. 35794/3/2011, Law Court of Bucharest

The supplementary protection certificate application no. c2007-079 was filed with OSIM by Takeda Pharmaceutical Company Limited (hereinafter Takeda), based on the pipeline protection patent RO 2005T, granted on 31.08.1999, protecting the active substance Candesartan cilexetil and having the expiry date on 19.04.2011. The first authorization for placing the product on the market in the European Economic Area (EEA) under the number PL 15661/0001/0002/0003/0004, obtained by Takeda in UK, on 29.04.1997, for the medicament Atacand containing the patented product, is mentioned in the application form.

On 23.09.1998, the Ministry of National Health authorized the medicament Atacand, having Candesartan cilexetil as an active substance, to be placed on the Romanian market by issuing the Registration Certificates no. 7480/23.09.1998, 7481/23.09.1998 and 7479/23.09.1998. On 02.04.2003, Takeda applied with the National Medicines Agency for the reauthorization of the medicament Atacand and obtained the market authorizations no. 6959/2006/01 and 6960/2006/01 of 17.12.2006, granted through a procedure in accordance with the provisions of the Directive 65/65/EEC. The SPC application mentioned the market authorization of 2006 as the first authorization for placing the medicament on the market, in Romania, and asked for the extension of protection for the product 1-(cyclohexyloxycarbonyloxy)ethyl- 2-ethoxy-1-[[2'-(1H-tetrazol-5-yl)biphenyl-4-yl]methyl]benzimidazole-7-carboxylate - Candesartan cilexetil in the basic patent.

Following to the analysis of the application documents, the SPC application was refused through the Decision No. 3/16 of 30.10.2008 of the Examination Board of OSIM, on the ground of not cumulatively complying with the conditions for the grant of an SPC, stipulated under Article 3 (b) and (d), and Article 19a (I) of the Regulation. In fact, the Board considered that the market authorization of 2006 was not the first market authorization of the product, as said product had been commercialized in Romania since 23.09.1998, based on the Registration Certificates. Moreover, said market authorization represents a reauthorization. The Decision No. 3/16 of 30.10.2008 was attacked by appeal lodged with OSIM.

Through the Decision No. 66/25.09.2009, the OSIM Board of Appeal rejected the appeal entered by Takeda, maintaining the decision to refuse the application.

The above-mentioned decision 66/25.09.2009 of the Board of Appeal was appealed against by the applicant Takeda, before the Law Court of Bucharest, the subject of the case-file no. 42584/3/2009. The reasons invoked were the same as in the previous cases and we will not insist thereupon, as the cases are identical. The appeal brought by Takeda was allowed by the Law Court of Bucharest in an open session, on 11.05.2010, the Court changed the Decision 66/25.09.2009 of the Board of Appeal in whole and ordered OSIM to grant an SPC for the product Candesartan cilexetil. The Civil Decision No.626A/11.05.2010 remained final and irrevocable by lack of appeal and OSIM granted the SPC applied for, valid from 20.04.2011 to 29.04.2012.

[23] http://noulportal.just.ro/InstantaDosar.aspx?idinstitutie

The case differs from the other cases presented before in that a Romanian medicaments company, Teva Pharmaceuticals SRL, filed with OSIM, on 29.03.2011, a request for revocation of SPC Atacand, invoking the violation of the provisions of Article 2 and Article 19a (I) of the Regulation.

As regards Article2, Teva takes the view that: "a product authorized to be placed on the market as a medicinal product for the first time in Romania, without being subjected to the administrative procedure provided for by the Directive 65/65/EEC (such as Candesartan cilexetil), should not be eligible for protection by SPC, in accordance with the provisions of the SPC Regulations and, consequently, does not enter within the scope of Article 2"[24]. As regards the violation of the provisions of Article 19a (l) of the Regulation, within the same Request for revocation, Teva mentions that: "the wording of Article 19a (l) is the direct result of negotiations carried out by Romania in the process of its accession to the European Union" and from the historical interpretation of legal texts, it results that the said article "sets out an exception from the general rule, currently applicable at the Community level, and this is why the said article should have, in its turn, a restrictive interpretation which must be supported by the case-law and the doctrine based on the interpretation of other identically similar legal texts adopted by other Member States of the European Union, as well as the interpretation of the European Court of Justice". The request for revocation does not expressly refer to the unlawfulness of application of Article 3 of the Regulation.

On 19.05.2011, Teva also brought before the Court an Action for Invalidation of SPC, in opposition with Takeda and with OSIM as issuing authority, based on Article 54 (1) of the Patent Law, as republished, read in conjunction with the provisions of Article 2, Article 3 (b) and (d), Article 15, Article 17, Article 18 and Article 19a (I) of the Regulation, read in conjunction with the provisions of Article 109 (1) and Article 112 of the Civil Procedure Code. The action is the subject of the case-file no.35794/3/2011 pending in the Law Court of Bucharest. In supporting the plea of violation of said Community provisions, Teva relied on the same arguments, as well as on an identical reasoning as in the Request for Revocation. Takeda, represented by D&B David and Baias SCA, filed with OSIM, based on Article 58 (5) and Article 59 (6) of the Implementing Regulations to the Patent Law No.64/1991, as republished, a request to suspend the proceedings concerning the Request for Revocation of SPC until a final and irrevocable decision is made in the case of the Action in Annulment pending before the Law Court of Bucharest.

We find that the request to suspend the proceedings, filed by Takeda with OSIM, is well founded, taking into account that the lawfulness of the SPC Atacand in relation with Article 2, Article 19a (I) and Article 3 are concomitantly assessed by OSIM, by means of the request to suspend the proceedings, and by the Law Court of Bucharest, by means of the Action in Annulment, in the case-file no. 35794/3/2011. The judgment to be given thereupon by the Law Court of Bucharest shall be enforceable judgment for OSIM, given its opposable and mandatory characteristics, hence, it shall play a decisive role as regards the ruling to be made by OSIM. In order to prevent contradictory rulings to be made with regard to the same case, with undesirable effects upon the stability of the legal relationship between the parties, it would be desirable that OSIM orders the proceedings concerning the Request for Revocation of SPC c2007-07912 to be suspended.

[24] Request for revocation filed with OSIM by Teva on 29.03.2011, page 6, point 5 (a).

At the same time, we assume the argument of Takeda according to which the grant of the SPC Atacand by OSIM does not represent the finality of a procedure carried out within OSIM, but "the exclusive result of enforcing the Decision No 626A made by the Law Court of Bucharest on 11.05.2010, judgment by which the lawfulness and groundedness of the application for the grant of the SPC Atacand has been finally and irrevocably decided by the law courts […]. In this context, as OSIM is the administrative authority which observed the imperative provisions of a judicial decision, […] only the law courts could decide upon the lawfulness of the grant of the SPC Atacand, and not OSIM, to which the decisions of the law courts are mandatory and enforceable." (page 7 of the Request to suspend the procedure filed with OSIM on 16.12.2011)

5. Case Donepezil and the Pharmaceutically Acceptable Salts Thereof (Aricept). File No.19925/3/2010 – Court of Appeal of Bucharest

The supplementary protection certificate application no. c2007-073 was filed with OSIM, on 27.06.2007, by the applicant Eisai Co. Ltd. of Japan (hereinafter Eisai), through the professional representative Cabinet Margareta Oproiu, based on the pipeline protection patent RO 2004T, protecting the active substance Donepezil hydrochloride. The first authorization for placing the product on the market in the European Economic Area (EEA), under the numbers 10555/0006 and 10555/0007, obtained by Eisai in UK, on 14.02.1997 for the medicament Aricept, containing the product Donepezil protected by the above-mentioned patent, is mentioned in the application form.

On 14.01.1998, the Ministry of National Health authorized the medicament Aricept, having Donepezil as an active substance, to be placed on the Romanian market by issuing the Registration Certificates no. 6662/1998 and 6663/1998. On 29.04.2005, Eisai applied with the National Medicines Agency for the reauthorization of the medicament Aricept and obtained the market authorizations no. 5307/2005/01 and 5308/2005/01, granted through an administrative procedure in accordance with the provisions of the Directive 65/65/EEC.

The SPC application mentioned the market authorization of 2005 as the first authorization for placing the medicament on the market, in Romania, and asked for the extension of protection for the product 2-[(1-Benzyl-4-piperidyl(methyl)]-5,6-dimethoxy-2,3-dihydroinden-1-one and the pharmaceutically acceptable salts thereof, according to Claims 1 – 3 and 5 and Example 4 of the basic patent.

Following to the analysis of the application documents, the SPC application was refused through the Decision No. 3/15 of 30.10.2008 of the Examination Board of OSIM, on the ground of not cumulatively complying with the conditions for the grant of an SPC, stipulated under Article 3 (b) and (d) and Article 19a (I) of the Regulation.

Through the Decision No. 12/25.02.2010, the OSIM Board of Appeal rejected the appeal entered by Eisai, maintaining the decision to refuse the application.

The said Decision 12/25.02.2010 of the Board of Appeal was appealed against by the applicant Eisai before the Law Court of Bucharest, said appeal being the subject of the case-file no. 19925/3/2010. The reasons invoked were the same as in the previous cases, and we will not insist thereupon, as the cases are identical. The matter pending before the Court was to establish whether the Registration Certificates of 1998 are or are not the first authorizations for placing the medicament Aricept on the Romanian market, referred to under Article 3 (d), as related to Article 3 (b) of the Regulation and the harmonization of Romanian legislation with the Directive 65/65/EEC.

The Law Court of Bucharest allowed, in the open session of 19.10.2010, the appeal brought by Eisai and decided to change the attacked decision in whole as to allow the request in the application c2007-073 for the grant of an SPC for Donepezil and the pharmaceutically acceptable salts thereof, particularly the hydrochloride.

The Civil Decision No. 1087A/19.10.2010, given by the Law Court of Bucharest in respect of the case-file no. 19925/3/2010, was further appealed against by OSIM before the Court of Appeal of Bucharest. The appeal relies on the ground that the attacked Decision was given with wrong application and interpretation of the law, as provided under Article 304 (9) of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thus, in this Decision, it was found that the Registration Certificates of 1998 were not the first authorizations to place the medicament Aricept on the Romanian market, because it was found that the first market authorization obtained by virtue of a procedure harmonized with the Directive 65/65/EEC was the market authorization no. 5307/2005, finally coming to the obviously unlawful and groundless conclusion that this authorization is, at the same time, the first authorization for placing the product on the market, in Romania. However, the condition set forth by Article 3 (d) of the Regulation provides that the authorization obtained in accordance with the Directive should be the first authorization for placing the product on the market as a medicinal product, and said provisions cannot be interpreted within the meaning that the first authorization obtained in accordance with the Directive is implicitly the first authorization for placing the product on the market, taking into account that the product has been commercialized in Romania since 1998 and the authorization was renewed in 2005.

The Court of Appeal of Bucharest allowed the appeal entered by OSIM against the Civil Decision no. 1087/A/19.10.2010 given by the Law Court of Bucharest, changed the attacked decision in whole as to the rejection of the appeal brought before the Law Court of Bucharest as unfounded. It consequently maintained the Decision of the OSIM Board of Appeal No. 12/25.02.2010 to refuse the SPC application c2007-073. The decision is irrevocable. Up to now, said decision has not been drafted yet.

Conclusions (Author's opinion)

The cases presented above represent, in our opinion, five identically similar cases having as a subject-matter the application for the grant, in Romania, of SPCs in the transitional six month-period counting from the date of 1 January 2007, the date of Romania's accession to the European Union. The legal ground invoked therefore is represented by Article 3 and Article 19 a (I) of the Regulation. In each of said cases, the product (the active substance) is protected in Romania by a patent in force, it has not already been the subject of a certificate, and the medicament containing the respective active substance was granted, after the date of 1 January 2000, a valid market authorization in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC. However, each of said medicaments had been authorized to be placed on the market, in Romania, before the date of 1 January 2000, by registration certificates which, on the date of their issuance, represented the legal way to place a medicament on the market. All said medicaments had a first authorization to be placed on the Community market, which was therefore obtained in accordance with the administrative procedure provided for by the Directive 65/65/EEC, the date of which was earlier than the date on which the Registration Certificates were obtained in Romania.

A synoptic summary of the market authorizations for the five cases is shown below:

Medicament	Date of first authorization to place it on the market in the Community	Date of the first Registration Certificate in Romania	Date of the market authorization in Romania, in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC
Humalog (Insulin Lispro)	30.04.1996 (EMEA)	1996, 1997, 1998	2003
Arimidex (Anastrozole)	11.08.1995	27.05.1999	2006

Zyprexa (Olanzapine)	27.09.1996	1997	2001
Atacand (Candesartan cilexetil)	29.04.1997 (GB)	1998	2006
Aricept (Donepezil)	14.02.1997 (GB)	14.01.1998	2005

All said SPC applications were refused by the Examination Board of OSIM, as well as, following the applicant's appeal, by the Board of Appeal, on the ground that the market authorizations granted in Romania according to the administrative procedures provided for by the Directive 65/65/EEC were not the first authorizations to place the products on the market, relying on the legal ground of their failure to cumulatively comply with the provisions of Article 3 (b) and (d) and Article 19 a (I) of the Regulation, and Article 20 (j) of the codified version of the Regulation, respectively. In each of said cases, the Chairman of the OSIM Board of Appeal expressed a dissenting opinion, arguing that "the phrase "first authorization to place a product on the market as a medicinal product" should be interpreted as the authorization granted in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC. In order to obtain the authorization, the patent owner had to comply with the entire procedure provided for by the Directive, in the case of a previously granted certificate the reauthorization being more than a simple renewal."

All the decisions of the OSIM Board of Appeal, as to reject the appeal, were appealed against by the applicant, and the Law Court of Bucharest allowed the appeals, the statements of reasons in all said cases being very similar. In brief, the Court retains that the problem submitted for trial is to establish if the Registration Certificates granted by the Ministry of Health before the date of 1 January 2000, represent or not the first authorizations to place the product on the market, referred to under Article 3 (d) of the Regulation, as related to Article 3 (b) of the same Regulation and the harmonization of the Romanian legislation with the Directive 65/65/EEC. Because these certificates were not granted following a procedure pursuant to the Directive 65/65/EEC and do not comply with the conditions of Article 3 (b) and (d) of the Regulation, they cannot represent a valid authorization for placing the product on the market as a medicinal product and, thus, they are not deemed to be the first authorizations for placing the product on the market. The Court also finds that a medicament that has not been authorized pursuant to the Community law cannot be introduced onto the market of a Member State, and there are no provisions in the Directive 65/65/EEC to stipulate the possibility of such derogations to allow that the mere introduction onto the market, even during several years, of a medicament which was not the subject of a market authorization issued in accordance with the Community law, could replace such an authorization.

In conclusion, the Court finds that the decision appealed against was made with the misinterpretation of the legal provisions and OSIM is ordered to grant the SPC.

Whilst in the case Humalog, the decision of the Court remained final and irrevocable by lack of appeal, in the other cases the Civil Decisions of the Law Court of Bucharest were further appealed against by OSIM before the Court of Appeal of Bucharest.

The further appeal relied on the consideration that, in ruling the appeal brought against the OSIM Board of Appeal, the Court misinterpreted the provisions of Article 3 and Article 19 a (I) of the Regulation. Having in view that, under Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (former Article 234 EC), the mission of ensuring application, interpretation and enforcement of Community law throughout the EU is incumbent on the European Court of Justice, OSIM found necessary that reference should be made to the ECJ for preliminary ruling.

Although in two cases, i.e. Anastrozole and Olanzapine, there were applications for intervention in favour of the respondent OSIM, which claimed that the Court of Appeal should refer certain questions to the ECJ for preliminary ruling, the Court of Appeal did not find necessary to suspend the trial and refer for preliminary ruling and dismissed the OSIM appeal as unfounded. The legal provisions discussed were Article 2, Article 3 and Article 19 (I) of the Regulation.

Court of Appeal and, consequently, the Decision No. 12/25.02.2010 of the Board of Appeal as to refuse the SPC application c2007-073 was maintained. This decision is irrevocable.

Before upholding our opinion concerning the five cases, it is worth mentioning that the wrongful application of Article 3 (b) and (d) and Article 19 a (l) represents the legal ground of the decision to refuse the applications, and of the appeals and further appeals, as well.

We will analyze in the first place the provisions of Article 3 of the Regulation: Conditions for obtaining a supplementary protection certificate.

In our opinion, the reasoning of the interpretation of this article, reasoning on which the arguments leading to the decisions to grant four SPC of the five presented cases are based, is wrong. In fact, it represents a "reversal of premise"; in other words, if an authorization for placing a medicament on the market does not comply with the Directive 65/65/EEC, it cannot be deemed to be the first market authorization referred to under Article 3 (d) of the Regulation. Consequently, in all the five cases, the arguments are based on evidence proving that the Registration Certificates issued before the year 2000 do not comply with the requirements imposed to the market authorizations issued in accordance with the Directive, hence, they cannot be considered to be first authorizations to place the medicaments on the market, in Romania. It cannot be denied that the Registration Certificates were not based on the entire procedure provided for by the Directive, however, they represented the legal acts authorizing the presence of medicaments on the market, under the legislation in force in Romania. In some cases, the argument invoked in order not to take into account the Registration Certificates was that, for being granted a market authorization after the date of 1 January 2000, i.e. in accordance with the Directive, the patent owner had to follow additional authorization procedures, not required on the date of the issuance of the Registration Certificates. This incurred important financial efforts for research, so that, if the Registration Certificates are deemed to be the first authorizations for placing the product on the market, the recital 4 of the preamble of the Regulation is not complied with. The recital 4 provides as follows: "Whereas at the moment the period that elapses between the filing of an application for a patent for a new medicinal product and authorization to place the medicinal product on the market makes the period of effective protection under the patent insufficient to cover the investment put into the research". In other words, the investment made with a view to obtaining authorization in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC is not covered and this is why the grant of the SPCs is justified. Obviously, all these arguments are worthless, and so is any piece of evidence brought before the Court for proving that the Registration Certificates were not in accordance with the Directive. The synoptic table presented above shows clearly that all these Registration Certificates were issued in Romania subsequently to the market authorizations obtained in the Community. Hence, on the date on which the Certificates were applied for in Romania, the patent owners had already passed the exigency tests imposed by the Directive, the research necessary for completing the authorization file was already done, so that no further investment and effort were necessary for obtaining the market authorizations after the year 2000. At the same time, one purpose of the Regulation was to compensate the time needed for making the tests imposed by the Directive, which diminishes the actual duration of the protection given by the patent. If all the tests required by the Directive had already been performed in order to obtain the first market authorizations in the Community, prior to the issuance of the Registration Certificates, is the compensation given through the SPC for having obtained the authorizations for placing the product on the market in Romania still justifiable? Of course not.

Moreover, in the majority of the presented cases, the market authorizations obtained after the year 2000 are in fact re-authorizations of the Registration Certificates. In a literal interpretation, the meaning of the word re-authorization leads to the idea of successive authorizations: an authorization existing at a certain moment is subsequently authorized again. In other words, the Registration Certificates may not be ignored. Moreover, they may not be ignored even when certain medicaments, e.g. Zyprexa, existed on the market within the period 2000-2001, based on the Registration Certificates, without any obligation to withdraw the same. As a matter of fact, in the above mentioned period of time, the authorization regime based on Registration Certificates co-existed, in Romania, with the regime based on market authorizations in accordance with the Directive.

Our interpretation of Article 3 (b) and (d) of the Regulation is that the authorization obtained in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC should be understood as the first authorization having made possible for the product to be placed on the market as a medicinal product, and not that only the first authorization obtained in accordance with the Directive is the first authorization for placing the product on the market, as the applicants argued in all the presented cases. In other words, the concept of "market authorization" does not automatically include the conformity with the Directive, but, on the contrary, within the meaning of the Regulation, the conformity with the Directive is the condition that the first authorization must comply with for an SPC to be granted.

As far as the case C-127/00 Hassle AB vs Ratiopharm GmbH, invoked by the SPC applicants, is concerned, we concur with the opinion expressed each time by OSIM on the erroneous decision of the Court as to admit said case-law. The subject of this case and the legal issue settled by the ECJ are different from the cases in Romania, because the problem raised by the case C-127/00 is whether an authorization concerning the price of a medicament can be considered to be a first authorization to place a product on the market within the meaning of the Regulation[25]. In support of our assertion, we further quote: "In this context, the Community Court admitted that the phrase "first authorization for placing a product on the market" refers to the "first authorization applied for in accordance with the provisions concerning the medicinal products, within the meaning of the Directive 65/65/EEC of 26 January 1965". In other words, it is the first authorization having the same nature as the authorization provided by the Directive 65/65/EEC, namely an authorization required, according to the legislation on medicinal products, for placing the product on the market (Note: The authorization provides for tests to be carried out with a view to completing pharmaceutical, pre-clinical pharmacological, pre-clinical toxicological and clinical files), which is different from other authorizations concerning pricing or price reimbursement in medicaments.[26]

Regarding Article 19 a (l), it is noticeable that the wording of this article referring to Romania is different in comparison with the provisions referring to the other Member States accessed after 2004, whereas the second sentence thereof refers to Article 7 (1) which, in its turn, refers to the market authorization obtained in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC. Consequently, the interpretation given invariably by the applicant for an SPC was that only the authorization obtained in Romania after 1 January 2000, as the only one granted in accordance with the Directive, represented in fact the first authorization for placing the product on the market, in Romania, as a medicinal product.

As regards the interpretation of Article 19 of the Regulation, we consider that, in both its letter and spirit, the Regulation does not aim to remove or annul the effects produced by the authorizations issued before the date of 1 January 2000 (referred to under Article 19 a (l) of the Regulation) or to deny the obvious fact that the medicaments have been placed on the market, even authorized in accordance with the national legislation in force on that date, which was not fully harmonized with the Directive. The purpose of the Regulation was to provide for uniform solutions at the Community

---

[25] The relevant paragraph of the case C-127/00 reads as follows:

"So far as concerns medicinal products for human use, the concept of 'first authorisation to place ... on the market ... in the Community' in Article 19(1) of Regulation No 1768/92 refers solely to the first authorisation required under provisions on medicinal products [...] granted in any of the Member States, and does not therefore refer to authorizations required under legislation on pricing of or reimbursement for medicinal products."

[26] Document drafted by the law firm Stoica & Asociații and filed with OSIM on 9 June 2011, in support of the further appeal lodged by OSIM against the Decision No. 1087A of 19.10.2010 of the Law Court of Bucharest in the case Donepezil, for SC Labormed Pharma SA, page 4.

level, in order to prevent the risk of displacement of the research centres in Member States offering better protection, and this has been related to Romania since 1 January 2000. If the authorizations legally granted in Romania prior to 1 January 2000 could not be considered to be the first authorizations to place certain products on the market, because they are not in accordance with the Directive, the reference date mentioned in Article 19 a (l) (i.e. 1 January 2000) would be completely useless, as all the products authorized to be placed on the market after this date would automatically be eligible for the grant of an SPC, provided that market authorizations in accordance with the Directive were only obtained after this date, and the provision would become redundant.

Special attention has been given throughout this paper to the case Anastrozole (medicament Arimidex) and the application for accessory intervention filed by Teva, because we completely agree with the arguments brought by the intervener in support of the opinion that a product authorized to be placed on the market for the first time in Romania before the date of 1 January 2000, without having previously been subject to the administrative procedure provided for by the Directive 65/65/EEC, is not eligible for the grant of an SPC under the provisions of the Regulation, as it does not comply with the scope of Article 2. It is only on the occasion of the applications for intervention that this article of great importance for the correct application of the Regulation is invoked for the first time. Unfortunately, OSIM has never had in view this article, its attention being exclusively focused on the legal ground invoked by the applicant in the applications for the grant of an SPC: Article3 and Article 19 a (I). And, as we have argued above, regarding the products eligible for the grant of an SPC, Article 2 sets out two conditions to be complied with: the product should be protected by a basic patent and subject to authorization procedure in accordance with the Directive before its being placed on the market. The difference between the provisions of Article 2 and of Article 3 (a) and (b) consists in that the scope of Article 2 excludes those products placed on the market without an authorization in accordance with the Directive 65/65/EEC. However, we cannot disagree with the fact that invoking Article 2 for the first time before the Court of Appeal contravenes the principle of double jurisdiction. Moreover, if the grant of SCP were possible for products placed on the market based on other authorizations than those granted in accordance with the Directive, in certain cases the exclusivity period would exceed the total limit of 15 years from the date of the first authorization in the Community, referred to in the eighth recital of the preamble of the Regulation (it is, for example, the case of the product Donepezil): "The duration of the protection granted by the certificate should be such as to provide adequate effective protection; for this purpose, the holder of both a patent and a certificate should be able to enjoy an overall maximum of fifteen years of exclusivity from the time the medicinal product in question first obtains authorization to be placed on the market in the Community"

In support of this argument we also rely on the case C-195/09 Synthon BV vs Merz Pharma GmbH & Co KG in which the European Court of Justice ruled, on 28 July 2011[27], on the referrals concerning the interpretation of Article 2, 13 and 19 of the Regulation. The case is worth being briefly presented since, in our opinion, this case-law is also applicable to the previously presented cases and could lead, for the cases still pending before the Law Court of Bucharest and the Court of Appeal[28], to be ruled differently than the previous cases. Besides, it was also invoked in the case Anastrozole. It results from the case file that the active substance named memantine has been commercialized on the German market as the medicament Akatinol of the pharmaceutical company Merz before the date of 1 September 1976, based on a German regulation of 1961 which obviously did not comply with the provisions of the subsequent Directive 65/65/EEC. On 13 November 2002, the company filed in UK an application for the grant of an SPC for memantine, where an authorization granted in the UK in 2002 was mentioned as the first authorization for placing the product on the market, without mentioning the market authorization obtained in Germany. The SPC was granted by the UK Patent Office. By the action brought before the High Court of Justice (Patent Court), the generic medicaments company Synthon claimed that the said SPC should be declared invalid or the duration of its protection should be fixed at zero. Having doubts relating to the scope of the Regulation and to the interpretation to be given to the concept of "first authorization to be placed on the market in the Community", the High Court of Justice specialized in the field of patents decided to suspend the judgment of the case to refer a series of question to the ECJ for preliminary ruling. The third of these questions is, in our opinion, relevant for the cases of Romania.

[27] http://eur-lex.europa.eu, OJ of 08.10.2011

[28] On the date of drafting this paper, the ruling of the Court of Appeal on the appeal entered by OSIM in the case Sildenafil is still pending pronouncement.

"Is a product which is authorised to be placed on the market for the first time in the EEC without going through the administrative procedure laid down in [Directive 65/65] within the scope of [Regulation No 1768/92] as defined by Article 2?"

The Court interpretation to the scope of the Regulation was that " for the purposes of obtaining an SPC, the product concerned must be protected by a valid patent in the national territory and it must have been subject, prior to being placed on the market as a medicinal product, to an administrative authorisation procedure as laid down in Directive 65/65."

This interpretation is confirmed by the purpose of the Regulation. As it is apparent from the first to fourth recitals in the preamble to Regulation No. 1768/92, in order to ensure sufficient protection to encourage pharmaceutical research, that regulation seeks, through the creation of an SPC for medicinal products that were granted marketing authorisation, to make up for the fact that the period of effective protection under the patent is insufficient to cover the investment put into the research, given the period that elapses between the filing of an application for a patent for a new medicinal product and the authorisation to place that product on the market. It would be contrary to that objective of offsetting the time taken to obtain a marketing authorisation – which requires long and demanding testing of the safety and efficacy of the medicinal product concerned – if an SPC, which amounts to an extension of exclusivity, could be granted for a product which has already been sold on the Community market as a medicinal product before being subject to an administrative authorisation procedure as laid down in Directive 65/65.

The conclusion of the Court was that such a medicinal product is not within the scope of Regulation No 1768/92 and may not, therefore, be the subject of an SPC.

We find that this case is similar with the previously presented cases and it must be noticed that a court having such a prodigious experience in the field of patents and SPC like the High Court of Justice (Patent Court) in the UK referred for preliminary ruling by the ECJ, in 2009, questions concerning the interpretation of the Regulation in force in the Community since 1992, in order for it to meet the essential condition for the Community legislative acts, namely to provide for uniform solutions at the Community level. That is why we cannot agree with the fact that, although in Romania there is no case-law in the SPC field and, for the discussed cases, various diverging interpretations were given to the Regulation, the Romanian courts refused the referral for preliminary ruling by the ECJ and contradictorily ruled in identically similar cases.

We hereby express our hope that this paper could contribute, to a certain extent, to create an overview of SPC cases which raised special problems of interpretation of a Community regulation, as well as to deliver judgments based, on the one hand, on the Community case-law, and, on the other hand, to ensure the observance of the constitutional principle of the free trade for those medicaments producers whose right to the free exploitation of the patented technical solution could be abusively restricted.

References

1.Books

- Boroi Gabriel, Drept civil. Partea generală. Editura Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2010
- Calmuschi Otilia, Considerații privind procesul de armonizare a legislației naționale cu legislația comunitară, SDR, nr. 1-2/2004
- Calmuschi Otilia, Dreptul proprietății intelectuale, Editura Universității Titu Maiorescu, Bucureşti, 2004
- Furerea Augustin, Drept comunitar european. Partea generală, Editura C H Beck, Bucureşti, 2007
- Fuerea Augustin, Drept comunitar al afacerilor. Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2003
- Gheorghiu Gheorghe, Ştrenc Alexandru Cristian, Ionescu Bucura, Dreptul brevetului Tratat, vol I şi II, Editura Lumina Lex, 2005, 2007.
- Roş Viorel, Protecția invențiilor, inventatorilor şi titularilor de brevete de invenție, Dreptul proprietății intelectuale, Editura Global Lex, Bucureşti, 2001
- Beier/Haertel/Schricker, Europäisches Patentübereinkommen. Münchner Gemeinschaftskommentar, since 1984, Carl Heymanns Verlag KG
- Benkard Georg, Europäisches Patentübereinkommen, Verlag C. H. Beck, 2002
- Brückner Christopher, Czettritz von, Peter, Ergänzende Schutzzertifikate mit pädiatrischer Laufzeitverlängerung, Carl Heymanns Verlag 2011
- Chavanne Albert, Burst J. J., Droit de la propriete industrielle, Dalloz, Paris, 1998
- DPMA, Taschenbuch des gewerblichen Rechtsschutzes, herausgegeben vom Deutschen Patent- und Markenamt, 67. Ergänzungslieferung, 2010
- Dybdahl, European Patents, Carl Heymanns Verlag 2001; in German: Europäisches Patentrecht, Einführung in das europäische Patentsystem, Carl Heymanns Verlag, Köln etc. 2000;
- Brandi-Dohrn/Gruber/Muir, Europäisches und Internationales Patentrecht. Einführung zum EPÜ und PCT, Beck'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 5. Auflage 2002
- Hirsch Fritjoff, Hansen Bernd, Der Schutz von Chemieerfindungen, Chemie-Kommentar zur Rechtsprechung nach dem deutschen Patentgessetz und em europäischen Patentübereinkommen, VCH Verlagsgesellschaft, Weinheim, 1995
- Kramer Birgit, Patentschutz und Zugang zu Medikamenten, Carl Heimans Verlag, 2007
- Krasser Rudolph, Lehrbuch des Patentrechts, C.H. Beck'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung, München, 1986
- Lieck Stefan, Parallelhandel mit Arzneimitteln innerhalb der Europäischen Union unter arzneimittel-, marken- und patentrechtlichen Aspekten, GEW, Band 10, 2008, Universität Zürich
- Mathély, Le Droit Europeen des brevets d'invention, Librairie du Journal des Notaires et des Avocats, Paris 1978
- Pagenberg Jochen, Patentubereinkommen, Münchener Gemeinschaftskommentar, Carl Heymanns Verlag, KG, 2002
- Pfanner/Sünner, Der gewerbliche Rechtsschutz im EURATOM- Vertrag, 1958
- Singer Margarete, Stauder Dieter, Europäisches Patentübereinkommen, CarLHeymanns- Verlag, 3nd ed 2003
- Schennen Detlef, Die Verlängerung deer Patentlaufzeit für Arzneimittel im Gemeinsamen Markt, 1993
- Strauss Joseph, Deutsches und europaisches Patentrecht, Max Planck, 2001
- Schulte Rainer, Patentgesetz mit EPU, 8-te Auflage, Carl Heymanns Verlag, 2008
- M. Snodin, J. Miles, RAJ Pharma, Iulie 2007, pag. 459, „Making the Most of Paediatric Extensions", www.rajpharma.com
- Symposium „Ergänzende Schutzzertifikate- geringe Anmeldezahlen, hohe wirtschaftliche Bedeutung", Deutsches Patent-und Markenamt in München, 17 März 2011, Dr. Georg Fuchs, Boehringer Ingelheim, „Ergänzende Schutzzertifikate für pädiatrische Untersuchungen von Wirkstoffen"
- Formulare des DPMA
- Richtlinien des DPMA, Stand 17.03.2011, available under www.dpma.de
- Merkblatt zum Anmeldeformular für ergänzende Schutzzertifikate
- Forms and Information of the UK-IPO
- Manual of Patent Practice of UK-IPO available under www.ipo.gov.uk
- UK-IPO Guide for applicants available under www.ipo.gov.uk

2.Internet links

- European Union : http://europa.eu.int/index
- EUR-Lex : http://eur-lex.europa.eu
- European Parliament: www.europarl.europa.eu
- World Organisation for Intellectual Property : www.wipo.int
- Bucharest Law Court : http://portal.just.ro
- Justiz Bundesministerium Deutschland : www.bmj.bund.de
- Max Planck Institut fur Geistiges Eigentum www.intellecprop.mpg.de
- Deutsche Vereinigung für gewerblichen Rechtschutz und Urheberrecht (GRUR) : http://grur.de
- Bundesjustizamt Deutschland : www.bundesjustizamt.de
- European Union Court of Justice: www.curia.eu.int
- Bundesgerichsthof Deutschland : www.bundesgerichtshof.de
- Bundespatentgericht Deutschland : www.bpatg.de
- England and Wales High Court (Patents Court): www.bailii.org/ew/cases/EWHC/Patents/
- European Patent Office : www.epo.org
- Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt : www.dpma.de
- United Kingdom Intellectual Property Office. www.ipo.gov.uk

SHORT CONSIDERATIONS ON THE USE OF TRADE INDICATORS AS TRADEMARKS

PAUL-GEORGE BUTA*

Abstract
In today's global marketplace products and services are exchanged internationally not only by large companies wielding a large portfolio of internationally protected trademarks but also by small enterprises and even individuals who have neither the resources nor an interest in the building of such a portfolio. Since they are nonetheless economic agents using either their own or others' trade indicators to indicate the origin and quality of the products and services they provide or simply to advertise them, the present paper addresses some of the issues arising out of that use which is akin to trademark use in what regards said products and services. Special attention is paid to the change in purpose of the trade indicators when used as trademarks and the effects said change causes in the legal protection conferred to those trade indicators. Moreover the possible conflicts between such rights are shortly analyzed and the means for resolution of such conflicts briefly reviewed. Far from being an exhaustive study of the issues raised the present paper aims at identifying these issues and pointing to contentious points to be addressed by future research.

Keywords: Trademarks, use as trademark, business identifiers, trade name, corporate name

Introduction

The present short study is aimed at providing some insight into the differences between trade indicators (a sub-category of business identifiers including the corporate name, the trade name and, in some jurisdictions, the emblem) and trademarks as regards their intended purpose. The study tries to find the criteria for determining these differences starting from the definition and purpose of the different rights granted in what those signs are concerned.

Since trademarks are generally considered to be very similar in nature, purpose and protection to such business identifiers, as can be seen in the literature[1], most strikingly in "Trade-Marks and Trade Names--An Analysis and Synthesis"[2], there are cases in both the literature and jurisprudence in which the two categories of signs and their corresponding rights are confounded. This has led to the point where little difference is made between the two and, in practice, they seem to have been overlapped in both their use and their protection.

The study therefore aims to restate the differences that have caused the legislator (both national and international) to differentiate between the two categories (albeit at times not in express terms) and, as a result, create two different protection regimes for these signs. Moreover the study tries to point to the effects these differences produce in respect of the protection granted to trade indicators when they are used outside the limit intended by the purpose envisaged by the legislator upon their creation.

In order to properly determine the purpose trade indicators have in opposition to trademarks and to identify how their use as trademarks represents a departure from their intended use the present study tries to first define trade indicators by means of defining the component signs and then trying

---

* Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: paul.buta@univnt.ro)

[1] Yves Reboul, „Le nom commercial et la marque" in Mélanges offerts à Albert Chavanne, Litec (Paris – 1990), p. 283

[2] Milton Handler and Charles Pickett, „Trade-Marks and Trade Names--An Analysis and Synthesis: I" in Columbia Law Review, Vol. 30, No. 2 (February 1930), pp. 168-201 and Milton Handler and Charles Pickett, „Trade-Marks and Trade Names--An Analysis and Synthesis: II" in Columbia Law Review, Vol. 30, No. 6 (June 1930), pp. 759-788

to identify the common purpose that seems to justify their belonging to a single category. Subsequently the purpose so determined is compared to the purpose of trademarks defined from the starting point of the justification of trademarks from an economic perspective. The economic justification thus determined will then be opposed to the purpose of trade indicators in order to ascertain what using each sign is meant to achieve in the marketplace.

Finally the study looks at how use of trade indicators as trademarks differs from their use as trade indicators and what might be the protection such use can enjoy when in conflict with a trademark.

There is very little literature dealing exclusively with trade indicators, most of it analyzing the subject under the framework for unfair competition, which, following the decision of WTO Appellate Body in Havana Club[3], appears to be at least incomplete. However there are some studies looking at the economics of trade names[4] as well as some contributions analyzing, among others, the conflicts between trade names and trademarks[5]. In what the economics of trademarks are concerned the main body of work consists of the contributions of Landes and Posner[6] as well as the classic contribution of Akerloff[7] regarding the functioning of trade markets operating under information asymmetry.

Content

1. Trade indicators defined

The expression "trade indicators" is not an established one in legal jargon, it normally being used in economics to summarize the means of measuring trade. For the purposes of the present study the expression has been chosen as an 'umbrella' term to encompass the various types of sign used to indicate trade. Although, at least in France and Belgium, the expression "distinctive signs used in commerce"[8] is used to collectively designate most of the types of sign we place under the umbrella of "trade indicators", we have chosen not to use the same expression in the present study since, in our view, it unduly puts too much emphasis on the need for these signs to differentiate between rather than indicate trade. We wish however to make clear that the term here used was chosen only because it appears to suit better this particular argument and is not to be considered as having an importance beyond that.

Thus for the purposes of the present study we will assume trade indicators to encompass the name of the trader (be it called firm, raison or designation sociale, corporate name or business name), the name of the trader as used in his commerce (trade name, nom commercial, assumed name), his emblem and his Internet domain name (which we will not analyze in the context of the present study).

---

[3] Havana Club, Report of the Appellate Body, WT/DS176/AB/R (WTO 2002)

[4] Steven Tadelis, "What's in a name? Reputation as a tradable asset" in The American Economic Review, vol. 89, No. 3 (June 1999), pp. 548-563

[5] Yves Reboul, „Le nom commercial et la marque" in Mélanges offerts à Albert Chavanne, Litec (Paris – 1990), pp. 283-296; Milton Handler and Charles Pickett, „Trade-Marks and Trade Names--An Analysis and Synthesis: I" in Columbia Law Review, Vol. 30, No. 2 (February 1930), pp. 168-201; Milton Handler and Charles Pickett, „Trade-Marks and Trade Names--An Analysis and Synthesis: II" in Columbia Law Review, Vol. 30, No. 6 (June 1930), pp. 759-788; Thierry van Innis, Les signes distinctifs. La propriété industrielle, Larcier (Bruxelles – 1997); Gail E. Evans, "Recent Developments in the Protection of Trade Names in the European Union" in Hugh C. Hansen (ed.) Intellectual Property Law and Policy, vol. 10, Hart (Oxford, Portland – 2008), pp. 478-501

[6] William M. Landes and Richard A. Posner, The economic structure of intellectual property law, The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press (Cambridge, London - 2003)

[7] George Akerloff, "The Market for Lemons: Quality Uncertainty and the Market Mechanism" in The Quarterly Journal of Economics, Vol. 84, No. 3 (Aug., 1970), pp. 488-500

[8] Jacques Azéma and Jean-Cristophe Galloux, Droit de la propriété industrielle, 7eme ed., Dalloz (Paris - 2012), p. 941; Thierry van Innis, Les signes distinctifs. La propriété industrielle, Larcier (Bruxelles – 1997), p. 23

Since reference was made above to "distinctive signs used in commerce" we must point out that the French and Belgian authors using the expression have also included in the category trademarks (individual and collective), indications of origin and controlled denominations of origin[9].

Given the purpose of this study these were all excluded from the category called "trade indicators" since they normally do not indicate trade (or the trader) but rather origin of the products or services to which they are attached.

Since the types of sign constituting 'trade indicators' vary across jurisdictions it is necessary to briefly review the definitions of these terms.

In the United States a corporate name is defined as being "The registered name under which a corporation conducts legal affairs such as suing, being sued, and paying taxes; the name that a corporation files with a state authority (usually the Secretary of State) as the name under which the corporation will conduct its affairs . • A corporate name usually includes, and in many states is required to include, the word "corporation", "incorporated" or "company" or an abbreviation of one of those words"[10].

The correspondent of the corporate name in France is the "dénomination sociale" which represents the name that individualizes the moral person[11]. It is a mandatory element of identification of the moral person and it needs to be followed by the acronym indicating the form of incorporation.[12]

In Romania the law concerning corporations indicates that a mandatory element of the statutes of a new corporation is its denomination[13] but, further on, the same law makes reference to the registration of the "firm"[14]. Although most authors[15] seem to consider that the lawmaker has intended to use the terms denomination and firm interchangeably, the fact that both acts contain references to both denomination and firm[16], each used, usually[17], in reference to different situations, determines us to put forth an argument for the existence of a delineation between the two in the sense that each gives rise to a different right, one registered by the mere registration of the statutes and the other after a prior verification of availability. This argument is further strengthened by the fact that both the firm and denomination are protected by means of a claim of unfair competition grounded in

---

[9] Jacques Azéma and Jean-Cristophe Galloux, Droit de la propriété industrielle, 7eme ed., Dalloz (Paris - 2012), p. 941; Thierry van Innis, Les signes distinctifs. La propriété industrielle, Larcier (Bruxelles – 1997), p. 23

[10] Brian A. Garner (ed.), Black's Law Dictionary, 9th ed., West (St. Paul - 2009),p. 1147

[11] Jacques Azéma and Jean-Cristophe Galloux, Droit de la propriété industrielle, 7eme ed., Dalloz (Paris - 2012), p. 956

[12] Jacques Azéma and Jean-Cristophe Galloux, Droit de la propriété industrielle, 7eme ed., Dalloz (Paris - 2012), p. 956

[13] Arts. 7 b) and 8 b) of Law nr. 31/1990 concerning corporations. The English word 'denomination' is used instead of 'name' in order to avoid any confusion with the 'corporate' or 'trade' or 'business' name.

[14] When the law requires that for the registration of the corporation the Registry of Commerce be presented with, among others, proof of the firm's availability – art. 36 (2) c) of Law nr. 31/1990 concerning corporations and especially in the detailed provisions contained in Law nr. 26/1990 concerning the Registry of Commerce.

[15] Ion Băcanu, Firma şi emblema comercială, Lumina Lex (Bucureşti - 1998), p.9, Vasile Nemeş, Drept commercial, Universul Juridic (Bucureşti – 2011), p. 113

[16] Law nr. 31/1990 concerning corporations contains references to denomination wherever it refers to the name of the moral person and firm when it refers to its registration (even when the registration is not operated by the Registry of Commerce but by an independent registry – art. 181 (4)). In exchange, Law nr. 26/1990 concerning the Registry of Commerce uses the term 'firm' when dealing with the "name or denomination under which a trader exercises his trade and underneath which he signs" – art. 30 (1) – and the term 'denomination' when referring to the mandatory identifier of the person seeking the registration or to whom the registration would refer to.

[17] Art. 74 (1) of Law nr. 31/1990 concerning corporations provides that "In every invoice, offer, order, tariff, prospectus and any other document used in commerce, emanating from a corporation there must be mention of [the company's] denomination, form of incorporation, headquarters, registry number in the Registry of Commerce and VAT code." – this would appear to, at least in part, cover so-called 'use in the exercise of trade', thereby overlapping the denomination and firm over the firm's definition – see note 9 above.

the provisions of art. 5 of Law nr. 11/1991 concerning unfair competition, said provisions indicating that "It is a criminal offence […] a) the use of a firm […] likely to create confusion as to those used legitimately by another trader. […] g) the manufacture in any way, importation, exportation, storage, offer for sale or sale of products/services bearing false indications regarding […] the denomination of the manufacturer or trader, with the intent of deceiving the other traders or the customers". Thus it would appear that the company has a right in its denomination, albeit weaker than the one it gains by registering its firm, with only the latter being an exclusive right (therefore protected against possible confusion and not just against purposefully deceitful use.

The trade name is defined in the United States as being: "1. A name, style, or symbol used to distinguish a company, partnership, or business (as opposed to a product or service); the name under which a business operates. • A trade name is a means of identifying a business – or its products or services – to establish goodwill. It symbolizes the business's reputation. 2. A trademark that was not originally susceptible to exclusive appropriation but has acquired secondary meaning."[18]

Still in the United States the assumed name (alias or fictitious name) is defined as being "The name under which a business operates or by which it is commonly known"[19]. The assumed name is usually preceded by the acronym D/B/A or Doing business as which "signals that the business may be licensed or incorporated under a different name."[20]

In France the "nom commercial" is defined as being "the name under which a natural or moral person trades; it distinguishes the goodwill of a trader from the goodwill of similar traders"[21]. In Belgium it is defined as being "the verbal distinctive sign of the enterprise […] the sign of rallying the clientele, the name under which the enterprise operates"[22] which also covers the "denomination sociale" – which is "the distinctive sign of the moral person participating in the business life"[23].

As mentioned above in Romania the firm is usually taken to mean one and the same thing with the denomination of the corporation, which we believe not to be the case. However we do need to indicate that both seem to be mandatory (each deriving this character from a different provision of the law) and both need to be registered with the Registry of Commerce (unlike in the other jurisdictions where the trade name and nom commercial do not need to be registered but rather gain their protection by use).

While in the United States the symbol "used to distinguish a company, partnership, or business"[24] is considered to be a trade name, in France, Belgium and Romania the "nom commercial" and "firm" can only be comprised of verbal signs, such symbol being protectable only as an emblem or "enseigne". Defined as being "a visible sign indentifying a commercial establishment at its location"[25] it is defined in Romania by art. 30 (2) of Law nr. 26/1990 concerning the Registry of Commerce and "the sign or name distinguishing between two traders practicing a similar trade". The Romanian definition has been widely criticized[26] and was considered in the literature as pertaining more to the identification of the location a commercial establishment of the trader[27].

2. What use are trademarks?

---

[18] Brian A. Garner (ed.), Black's Law Dictionary, 9th ed., West (St. Paul - 2009),p. 1633

[19] Brian A. Garner (ed.), Black's Law Dictionary, 9th ed., West (St. Paul - 2009),p. 142

[20] Brian A. Garner (ed.), Black's Law Dictionary, 9th ed., West (St. Paul - 2009),p. 455

[21] Jacques Azéma and Jean-Cristophe Galloux, Droit de la propriété industrielle, 7eme ed., Dalloz (Paris - 2012), p. 943

[22] Thierry van Innis, Les signes distinctifs. La propriété industrielle, Larcier (Bruxelles – 1997), p. 33

[23] Thierry van Innis, Les signes distinctifs. La propriété industrielle, Larcier (Bruxelles – 1997), p. 33

[24] Brian A. Garner (ed.), Black's Law Dictionary, 9th ed., West (St. Paul - 2009),p. 1633

[25] Jacques Azéma and Jean-Cristophe Galloux, Droit de la propriété industrielle, 7eme ed., Dalloz (Paris - 2012), p. 954

[26] Ion Băcanu, Firma şi emblema comercială, Lumina Lex (Bucureşti - 1998), p. 26

[27] Ion Băcanu, Firma şi emblema comercială, Lumina Lex (Bucureşti - 1998), p. 29

Trademarks on the other hand are in all analyzed jurisdictions defined as being signs of any kind capable of being represented graphically and capable of distinguishing goods and services of one undertaking from those of another.

A key difference between the trade indicators and trademarks is apparent: while trade indicators indentify the trader, trademarks distinguish between products and services belonging to different traders. In simpler terms if trade indicators tell us who one is trademarks tell us to whom a product or service belongs.

Although the answer to both questions might sometimes be the same that does not mean that the rights serve the same purpose.

To better illustrate the statement above we draw on the classic economic model identified by Landes and Posner[28] where after indicating that the economic function of trademarks is to lower consumer search costs (akin to transaction costs) they postulate that in the equation where π is the full price of good X, P is the money price and H the search costs he incurs in learning about the relevant characteristics of X[29], H depends in part on the information provided by the firm to the buyer by means of its trademark T. The higher the T (the stronger the trademark) the lower H will be. The authors then go on to indicate that T generates two types of information:

$$\pi = P + H(T, \gamma, W)$$

1. "The first is information that enables the consumer to identify the source of the good; for example, knowing that Crest toothpaste comes from a single source even if one does not know that Procter and Gamble is that source. Information about source economizes on search costs by lowering the cost of selecting goods on the basis of past experience or the recommendation of other consumers.

2. The second kind of information is information about the product itself. For example, a "descriptive" mark […] may, in addition to identifying source, describe some properties of the brand; this information also lowers search costs."[30]

Without delving further into the economic analysis we need to point at the fact that the economic function of the trademark are indelibly linked to providing information relating to the good in question and not to the trader. The information mentioned first above, usually qualified as the essential function of trademarks (to indicate origin of the goods) does not mean indication of the actual source but merely the possibility of identifying that source as being the single source for the good in question.

Advocate-General Jacobs has indicated in his Opinion in HAG II[31] that "The function of a trade mark is to signify to the consumer that all goods sold under that mark have been produced by, or under the control of, the same person and will, in all probability, be of uniform quality".

Therefore information as to origin provided by trademarks is not information of identification of the trader but only as to the existence and uniqueness of said trader.

We need to note though that in more recent times both the literature and the courts have tended to approach trademarks from a more "proprietarian" standpoint[32] and put more emphasis on

---

[28] William M. Landes and Richard A. Posner, The economic structure of intellectual property law, The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press (Cambridge, London - 2003), p. 174

[29] γ represents the other factors that can strengthen the trademark and W the index of the availability of words and other symbols that the firm can use as its trademark.

[30] William M. Landes and Richard A. Posner, The economic structure of intellectual property law, The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press (Cambridge, London - 2003), p. 174

[31] SA CNL-SUCAL NV v Hag GF AG (C-10/89) [1990] ECR I-3711 par. 24

[32] For a critique of proprietarianism as guiding principle in intellectual property policy-making see Peter Drahos, A Philosophy of Intellectual Property, Dartmouth (Aldershot- 1996), pp. 205-213

the reputational function of trademarks[33] which would seem to fit well with the second type of information Landes and Posner indicate is generated by the trademark – i.e. information about the product itself, - in the sense that information regarding the reputation of the trader which would, in turn, spillover into the presumed quality of the good.

Two important points should be noted here:

1. Even in this case the association made by the customer is in direct relation to the good and not the trader (he assesses the quality of the good by means of implying it from the reputation of the trader); and

2. The reputation of the trader is, although possibly implied by the information the trademark conveys, built in tandem with his past performance in the market, i.e. based on the linking of the identity of the trader with his performance in trading the goods in question (or other goods). This point is further supported by the model proposed by Tadelis[34] indicating that in order for a name with a reputation to be traded the reputation it has built needs to result out of its readily-observable past performance. Thus information regarding the identity of the trader, while necessary for the building of a reputation around that identity, is not to be confused with reputation since that reputation only occurs in time, depends on the performance of the trader and, should it be a bad reputation it can be easily discarded and thus become irrelevant form the analytical point of view[35].

Although the majority of the literature indicates that trademarks have more functions than merely that of indicating origin (usually reference is made to the function of guarantee of quality, consumer protection and advertising) we will not lengthen the present study so as to include those as well into our analysis since all these functions are, we believe, manifestations of the essential function of the mark, itself a legal coding of the economic function of the trademark.

Without disputing the alternative justifications for the existence of intellectual property rights in general and trademark rights in particular we will assume, in the present study, that the "orthodox" argument grounding the existence of intellectual property rights in the economic justification built around the "market failure" theory is valid[36].

As a first conclusion we propose that trade indicators are different from trademarks in their purpose insomuch as they merely indicate the trader and the locations of his trade while trademarks, by distinguishing between goods, indicate the commercial origin of those goods. While both have a reputational possibility attached to them, for each reputation is built in time by the historical association consumers create between the identity of the trader and the identity of the goods (as per their unique origin) respectively and the performance or quality of the trader and goods respectively.

3. Trademark use

Though there is debate surrounding the exact definition the general view in the literature is that use of a sign as a trademark means using it to indicate origin[37]. That is any use of a sign to indicate the commercial origin of goods is use of that sign as a trademark.

Retrospectively this use can turn an otherwise unprotectable sign into a registrable trademark[38] and, if the sign used is identical or similar to a registered trademark, it can constitute infringement of the rights in that trademark if, as the European Court of Justice indicated in

---

[33] L'Oréal SA, Lancôme parfums et beauté & Cie SNC, Laboratoire Garnier & Cie v. Bellure NV, Malaika Investments Ltd., Starion International Ltd (C-487/07) [2009] ECR I-05185

[34] Steven Tadelis, "What's in a name? Reputation as a tradable asset" in The American Economic Review, vol. 89, No. 3 (June 1999), pp. 548-563

[35] Tadelis, quoted above, proves that the only names that can be assets are names with a good reputation, there being no market for names with bad reputation, assuming of course, an infinite supply of names.

[36] Michael Spence, Intellectual Property, Oxford University Press (Oxford – 2007), pp. 63-67

[37] Lionel Bently and Brad Sherman, Intellectual Property Law, 3rd ed., Oxford University Press (Oxford – 2009), p. 923

[38] Jeremy Phillips, Ilanah Simon, „Conclusion: What use is use?" in Jeremy Phillips, Ilanah Simon (ed.) Trade Mark Use, Oxford University Press (Oxford – 2005), p. 344

Arsenal[39], the use affects or can affect the functions of the trademark, particularly the function of guaranteeing to consumers the origin of the goods.

As shown above trade indicators are not meant to be used as trademarks per se since their role is to identify the trader or locations of his trade. However, in Céline[40], the European Court of Justice has indicated that (citations omitted):

"The purpose of a company, trade or shop name is not, of itself, to distinguish goods or services. The purpose of a company name is to identify a company, whereas the purpose of a trade name or a shop name is to designate a business which is being carried on. Accordingly, where the use of a company name, trade name or shop name is limited to identifying a company or designating a business which is being carried on, such use cannot be considered as being 'in relation to goods or services' within the meaning of Article 5(1) of the Directive.

Conversely, there is use 'in relation to goods' within the meaning of Article 5(1) of the Directive where a third party affixes the sign constituting his company name, trade name or shop name to the goods which he markets.

In addition, even where the sign is not affixed, there is use 'in relation to goods or services' within the meaning of that provision where the third party uses that sign in such a way that a link is established between the sign which constitutes the company, trade or shop name of the third party and the goods marketed or the services provided by the third party."[41]

In conclusion, drawing from the above, a trade indicator is used as a trademark only when diverted from the purpose it was designed for, i.e. to identify a company or designate a business which is being carried on.

The question then arises: What rights can such use give rise to? And what liabilities?

4. Trade indicators used as trademarks

In order to answer this question we must turn into the title under which such use takes place. In order to properly qualify it we can only look at three possibilities: it could be a use of a trade indicator, it could be use of a trademark (albeit not registered) or it could be use covered by no right whatsoever.

It is clear that the owner of a trade indicator is entitled to make use of it. But the exercise of a right must always be carried on within the limits of that right, both internal and external.

In the situation described at par. 23 of the Céline[42] judgment the use made of a trade indicator might be within the external limits of the right to the trade indicator but it is clearly outside the internal limit of the right at it diverts the purpose of the right from the one envisaged by the law to a new purpose for which the law envisaged a different type of right i.e. a right to a trademark.

Given the above it is that much clear that use of the kind described at paragraph 22 of the Céline[43] judgment is outside both the internal and external limits of the right to a trade indicator.

If it is now obvious that usage of the trade indicator outside the external limits of the right can't be thought of as use as a trade indicator the solution must be the same for using the trade indicator outside the internal limits of the right since that would amount to an abuse of right and such abuse of right cannot, by definition, have a legal title to it.

Using the trade indicator as a trademark can lead, as shown above, to the acquirement of distinctiveness sufficient for the registration of the sign the trade indicator is comprised of. But such possibility is recognized for any sign, be it a trade indicator or not so this would appear to be, at least until the registration of the sign as a trademark, to be in fact a use under no title at all, defendable

[39] Arsenal v Reed, C-206/01 [2002] ECR I-10273
[40] Céline SARL v Céline SA C-17/06 [2007] ECR I-07041
[41] Céline SARL v Céline SA C-17/06 [2007] ECR I-07041, par. 21-23
[42] Céline SARL v Céline SA C-17/06 [2007] ECR I-07041
[43] Céline SARL v Céline SA C-17/06 [2007] ECR I-07041

only by means of a claim of unfair competition under the higher standard requiring intentional deceit of the traders and customers (in Romania).

If on the other hand, the trade indicator, when used as a trademark, has gained recognition in the relevant public sufficient to warrant said sign being a well-known or famous mark such use would be made under the title of trademark but only because the right itself to trademark would exist, in parallel to the right to the trade indicator.

The conclusion here would be that use of a trade indicator as a trademark, with no trademark right existing, is done with no legal title whatsoever and should therefore not allow the user to benefit from a protection extended out of his right to the trade indicator in order to protect such use.

5. Conflicts

Given the above we now move on to consider what would the outcome be in conflicts between trade indicators and trademarks where the use is likely to create confusion in the mind of the relevant public.

a. Trademarks used as trade indicators

When trademarks are used as trade indicators i.e. to identify the company or its place of doing business and the trademark right is anterior to the right in the trade indicator difference should be made between the jurisdictions protecting trade indicators without the need for prior registration and the ones requiring such prior registration. Where no requirement of registration exists the use itself is deemed to give rise to the right is such trade indicator and thus the owner of the trademark may oppose the use of the later trade indicator (since the trademark owner himself has a right in a trade indicator). This is also the case where the conflict occurs between two traders belonging to different countries members of the Paris Union by virtue of direct application of article 8 of the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property.

In the case of jurisdictions requiring registration of the trade indicator for it to be protected and where the two owners are both nationals of that jurisdiction the later trade indicator would prevail since use of the trademark as a trade indicator would amount to an abuse of right and thus could not gain legal recognition.

b. Trade indicators used as trademarks

Leaving aside the case of trade indicators amounting through use to well-known or famous marks (which do not need to be registered in order to be protected) we believe that no matter the anteriority of the trade indicator or the trademark the trademark owner should prevail unless use of the trade name would be an honest commercial practice as defined by the European Court of Justice in Anheuser-Busch[44], Inc., Bayerische Motorenwerke (BMW)[45], Gerolsteiner Brunner GmbH[46] and in Gillette[47].

Conclusion

The present study has determined the nature of trade indicators in opposition to trademarks and has proposed that the differences existing between them justifies their regulation as different rights granted for different purposes. Although each can be used for the purpose of the other doing so would appear to bring no benefit in terms of legal protection, situations where protection under the other regime being granted by use left aside.

We believe future research should further delineate these differing signs based on an instrumental approach to policy-making in intellectual property as a whole and industrial property especially so as to clarify the benefits and liabilities of gaining protection under each of these differing regimes and to clearly set out the points of interference and possible outcomes.

---

[44] Anheuser-Busch Inc. v. Budejovický Budvar, Národní Podnik, C-245/02 [2004]

[45] Bayerische Motorenwerke AG (BMW) and BMW Nederland BV v. Ronald Karel Deenik, C-63/97 [1999]

[46] Gerolsteiner Brunnen GmbH & Co. v. Putsch GmbH, C-100/02 [2004]

[47] The Gillette Co. and Gillette Group Finland Oy v. LA-Laboratories Ltd. Oy, C-228/03 [2005]

Refrences

- George AKERLOFF, "The Market for Lemons: Quality Uncertainty and the Market Mechanism" in The Quarterly Journal of Economics, Vol. 84, No. 3 (Aug., 1970)
- Jacques AZEMA and Jean-Cristophe GALLOUX, Droit de la propriété industrielle, 7eme ed., Dalloz (Paris - 2012)
- Ion BACANU, Firma şi emblema comercială, Lumina Lex (Bucureşti - 1998)
- Lionel BENTLY and Brad SHERMAN, Intellectual Property Law, 3rd ed., Oxford University Press (Oxford – 2009)
- Peter DRAHOS, A Philosophy of Intellectual Property, Dartmouth (Aldershot- 1996)
- Gail E. EVANS, "Recent Developments in the Protection of Trade Names in the European Union" in Hugh C. Hansen (ed.) Intellectual Property Law and Policy, vol. 10, Hart (Oxford, Portland – 2008)
- Brian A. GARNER (ed.), Black's Law Dictionary, 9th ed., West (St. Paul - 2009)
- Milton HANDLER and Charles PICKETT, „Trade-Marks and Trade Names--An Analysis and Synthesis: I" in Columbia Law Review, Vol. 30, No. 2 (February 1930)
- Milton HANDLER and Charles PICKETT, „Trade-Marks and Trade Names--An Analysis and Synthesis: II" in Columbia Law Review, Vol. 30, No. 6 (June 1930)
- Thierry VAN INNIS, Les signes distinctifs. La propriété industrielle, Larcier (Bruxelles – 1997)
- William M. LANDES and Richard A. POSNER, The economic structure of intellectual property law, The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press (Cambridge, London - 2003)
- Vasile NEMES, Drept commercial, Universul Juridic (Bucureşti – 2011)
- Yves REBOUL, „Le nom commercial et la marque" in Mélanges offerts à Albert Chavanne, Litec (Paris – 1990)
- Jeremy PHILLIPS, Ilanah SIMON, „Conclusion: What use is use?" in Jeremy Phillips, Ilanah Simon (ed.) Trade Mark Use, Oxford University Press (Oxford – 2005)
- Steven TADELIS, "What's in a name? Reputation as a tradable asset" in The American Economic Review, vol. 89, No. 3 (June 1999)

ECONOMIC RIGHTS OF THE NEIGHBORING RIGHTS OWNERS PERFORMERS' RIGHTS MANAGEMENT MARIANA SAVU*

Abstract

The scientific research theme aims to deepen a topical issue, i.e. to examine the legal requirements of performers' rights from Romania, by collective management, to do a critical analysis of the regulation in our country and to contribute thereby to the correction of the law, to its harmonization with the EU countries. Intellectual creation has some amazing features: it is invisible, it can be passed across borders, it can be multiplied to infinity and its value increases steadily over time. Any country that cares about its traditions and seeks to make progress in the field of culture, of science and education, must recognize, encourage and protect intellectual creation. The copyright neighboring rights or "les droits voisins" as they were called in doctrine and jurisprudence, have been regulated for the first time in the Romanian law by the Law no.8 /1996 on copyright and neighboring rights. The neighboring rights are intellectual property rights, other than the copyright, granted to performers for their own performances or executions, to sound recordings producers and audiovisual recordings producers for their own recordings, and to broadcasting organizations (radio and television) for their own transmissions and program services. Performers' rights can be managed mandatory or optionally by the collective management societies. The collective management of copyright and neighboring rights is a necessary step for implementation of certain rights in comparison with various ways of exploitation. Since the beginning, some of performers' economic rights proved difficult to assess individually. The technical progress and widespread mass exploitation have made individual control virtually impossible. Collective management primarily involves the collection of remuneration payable by users/importers and its distribution to those entitled to it, proportional to the actual use of each repertory, within 6 months from collection date.

Keywords: performers; economic rights; compulsory collective management; optional collective management; performers' rights management organization.

Introduction

Intellectual creation occupies a prominent place within economic, social and cultural development of each nation, and well-being of a country is also appreciated by its capacity to create, introduce, manage and exploit intellectual assets beyond its natural resources, its labor or capital. Creativity, said Dr. Kamil Idris[1] – General Manager of World Intellectual Property Organization - „is an inexhaustible resource characteristic of all nations, as it is manifested at all times and in any culture"[1]. Moreover, on the OMPI Dome in Geneva is a Latin inscription which has the following content: „the human spirit gives birth to works of art and inventions. Such creations provide a dignified life to the people and it is states' duty to protect arts and inventions".

Protection of intellectual property rights is of particular importance, because the essence, the goal and purpose is to protect the product of human intelligence and at the same time, to guarantee for the benefit of consumers the use of such product.

Ensuring a fair/compensating remuneration to authors and performers fosters creativity and urges publishers or producers of sound and audiovisual recordings to invest in new products and services.

* Attorney at Law, Ph. D. candidate (email: liliana.savu@credidam.ro)

[1] Kamil Idris, OMPI General Manager's Message, for the World Day of Intellectual Property, in the „Romanian Magazine of Industrial Property", no. 2/2003, p. 7.

At the same time, it can be said that, if we consider the provisions of art. 27 paragraph 2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[2], according to which „everyone is entitled to the protection of his/her moral and material interests resulting from any scientific, literary or artistic creation which author he/she is", we can place the right to the protection of intellectual property among the fundamental human rights.

We can say that respect for intellectual property is nowadays one of the landmarks that determine the degree of civilization of a country. Cultural act, in order to be made at its true value, should be funded, and in a society where the state's financial contribution is reduced, the only real support to the cultural act is the implementation of legal provisions of intellectual property rights which immediately reflect into the patrimonial perception of holders' rights.

In the Internet era, within the planetary context, respect for intellectual property is one of the criteria which defines the degree of civilization of a country, because, as the author states, the respect for intellectual property cannot be achieved where poverty, corruption, abuse, ignoring of the law are all day-to-day realities[3].

Given the above, we may say that promotion and legal protection of intellectual property is absolutely necessary because the progress and welfare of a nation depend on people's ability to create in the areas of art, technology and culture. Furthermore, the promotion and protection of intellectual property stimulate economic growth, provide a significant number of new jobs and industries, improve the quality of life and, not at last, represent a mean to create a favorable image of the state in front of the international community.

This study aims to address the collective management of performers' rights, regarding: the beneficiaries of collective management, ways to use artists' performances, what are the collective management organizations and what is their role, the mandate granted by the artist to the collective management organization, the content of the mandate granted by the holder, the negotiation of remuneration/fees due by the users to the performers, categories of payers, methods of remuneration collection and distribution and, not at least, transparency of collecting organizations to the general public, to their own members and to ORDA[4].

ACTUAL CONTENT

1. NEIGHBORING RIGHTS TO THE COPYRIGHT

The rights related to copyright, or „neighboring rights" as they were called in French doctrine and jurisprudence, have been regulated for the first time in the Romanian law by adopting Law no. 8/1996 regarding copyright and neighboring rights[5]. Romanian Legislator was inspired by the provisions of the International Convention for the Protection of Performers, Producers of [2] It has been adopted and proclaimed by the Resolution of the United Nations General Assembly no. 217A (iii) dated December 10th, 1948.

[3] Ştefan Gheorghiu, Intellectual Property – creativity reward or just a business?, in „Info CREDIDAM", no.4/2005, pp.2-3.

[4] The Romanian Office for Copyright is a specialized body under the jurisdiction of the Government, acting as unique regulation authority for keeping records by national registry, for surveillance, licensing, arbitration and technical and scientific observance in the field of copyright and neighboring rights.

[5] Published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 60 dated March 26th, 1996, as amended and supplemented by Law no. 285/2004, as published in the „Official Gazette of Romania" , Part I, no. 587 dated June 30th, 2004, as amended and supplemented by Government's Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005, as published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 843 dated September 19th, 2005, as amended and supplemented by Law no. 329/2006 regarding the approval of Government's Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005 for the amendment and supplementation of Law no. 8/1996 regarding copyright and neighboring rights, as published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I ,no. 657 dated July 31st, 2006. (Moreover all specifications regarding Law no. 8/1996 refer to the form amended and supplemented by Law no.329/2006).

Phonograms and Broadcasting Organizations, concluded at Rome on October 26th, 1961[6] and of the Convention for the Protection of Producers of Phonograms against Unauthorized Duplication of their Phonograms, concluded at Geneva on October 29th, 1971[7].

The neighboring rights to the copyright are intellectual property rights, other than copyrights of which performers enjoy for their own interpretations or executions, producers of audio recordings and producers of audiovisual recordings, for their own recordings and the broadcasting and television organizations, for their own shows and program services.

1.1 Performers enjoying collective management.

In the legal sense of the Law no. 8/1996, we understand by performers: actors, singers, musicians, dancers and other persons who present, sing, dance, recite, declaim, play, interpret, direct, conduct or perform in any other way a literary or artistic play, any kind of show, including folk, variety, circus or puppet shows (art.95).

In practice there was raised the question whether the „figurants" can be considered as performers and can take advantage of neighboring rights as a result of exploiting their performance, although, as seen in the definition given by law to performers, „figurants" are not mentioned.

The extra artist (the figurant) is neither mentioned as being part of the category of performers by the French legal system. Thus, art. L 212-1 of the French Intellectual Property Code excludes the extra artist from the category of persons who may enjoy neighboring rights as a result of their performance in a play[8]. However, in France „special extra performance" is paid. If the figurant, by his/her performance, contributes to the creation, implementation, interpretation of a collective play/work, he/she gains the clear status of beneficiary and holder of rights related to copyright, even if the said performer ('figurant') has only one line, being treated as an episodic part.

According to the DEX (Romanian Explanatory Dictionary) we understand by 'figurant'/'extra' „a person participating in the action of a play, an opera or a movie only by his/her physical presence or by his/her gestures, attitudes etc., without saying any line"[9]. The AFTRA 10 Code defines the 'figurant' as „the person playing mute parts, but he/she can make himself/herself understood individually or as a whole, in groups or in a crowd"; and according to the „Urban Dictionary" the 'figurant' is „a performer who does not perform solo; a performer with no speaking part/line; a person with no status higher than that of simple group member"[11].

In a study referring to agreements and practices relating to remuneration for performers of audiovisual works, presented to the Informal Ad-hoc Meeting on Audiovisual Interpretations and Performances that took place in Geneva on November 6th - 7th, 2003, they mention that none of the union agreements provides remuneration to 'figurants' for secondary uses[12].

---

[6] Romania acceded to the Rome Convention regarding the protection of performers, producers of phonograms and broadcasting organizations by Law no. 76 dated April 8th, 1998 published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 148 dated April 14th, 1998.

[7] Romania acceded to the Geneva Convention for the protection of producers of phonograms against unauthorized duplication of their phonograms by Law no. 78 dated April 8th, 1998, published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 156 dated April 17th, 1998.

[8] „À l'exclusion de l'artiste de complément". For details, please see Code de la propriété intellectuelle, Édition 2002, Litec, Paris, pp.177-178.

[9] Romanian Academy, „Iorgu Iordan" Institute of Linguistics, The Explanatory Dictionary of Romanian Language, DEX, Universul Enciclopedic Printing House, Bucharest, p. 378.

[10] The American Federation of Television and Radio Artists.

[11] See location: www.urbandictionary.com/define.php?term?=figurant

[12] Katherine M. Sand*, Study on Agreements and Remuneration Practices regarding Performers of Audiovisual Works in the United States of America, Mexico and the United Kingdom*, presented within „Informal Ad-hoc Meeting on Audiovisual Interpretations and Performances", Geneva, November 6th-7th, 2003.

Likewise, Professor Viorel Roş explains that „'figurants', either for theatre or for cinema, are not considered as holders of neighboring rights, the limit between the 'figurant' and the performer being determined by the professional practices"[13].

Given the above, we consider that not having the freedom movement, the 'figurant' acts like a „machine" running some of the director's instructions. For this reason, the 'figurant' is not able neither to express his/her own personality while performing the act of an intellectual creation, nor to enjoy the neighboring rights as a result of exploiting such work.

In another opinion[14], Professor Ligia Dănilă believes that „you can include between those who enjoy neighboring rights, without any doubt, also those who are 'extras'/'figurants' in a show, provided that their part and position in the general framework of the show to be essential for transmitting the message and to be an unequivocal condition for its transmission". This eminent author considers that „such an analysis can be done, in case of dispute, based on studying the directing book of the show, on the text of the notes made as directing indications, or on other specific evidence". In order to strengthen these considerations, the author shows that her interpretation „ is also subsumed to the general definition of the author as given by the legislator in the 1st article of the law, which says that the author is the person or entity who created the work. However, this interpretation does not conflict with the provisions of article 3 of the Rome Convention". At the same time, the author proposes that the interpretation of the said article of the law should be made subsequently to a „nuanced analysis, varied from one case to another, from one show to another, of the role and contribution of the 'figurant' in the creation of the show and, as a consequence, to distinctly establish, according to each case, if the 'figurant' may or may not have the quality of holder of neighboring rights"[15].

1.2. Use of performers' artistic performances

Performer wants everyone to know that HE is the „father" of his/her interpretations and, at the same time, everyone respects him. He also wants to control the use of his performances, both at national and international level, and, at the same time, to be protected against any illegal use of his performances in order to enjoy and benefit from the fruits of his intellectual effort.

Any use of his performance, by any means, can be achieved only with the consent of the artist. This is the general rule which supports, however, some explicit and restrictive exceptions provided by most copyright laws.

As Paula Schepens[16] shows, „copyright (in the generic sense) should allow to establish a fair balance between the interests of the community, the public, who is entitled to information, training, education in order to reach full intellectual development and personal interests of the creator. The author needs his public, he needs to be understood and heard. The public, in turn, requires those who were destined by nature, and have that extra little thing called talent, which allows them the creation of a work, able to enthuse, to captivate the spirit, to broaden the worldview. The author cannot be isolated from the world. He must live in the community where he draws inspiration. He grew up in a certain culture that ancestors have left as legacy. He will bring to light what has been bequeathed, adding his own imprint of personality. We speak here about an interaction. Therefore there are limits against his absolute power".

For further creative and artistic work, in order to be able to fund this activity, performers and producers of phonograms or of audiovisual recordings should receive fair remuneration, proportional

---

[13] Viorel Roş, Dragoş Bogdan, Octavia Spineanu – Matei, op.cit., p. 466.

[14] Ligia Dănilă, Figurants – subject for neighboring rights or just ornaments?, in „ Romanian Magazine of Intellectual Property Right", no.4/2007, pp. 20-25; Ligia Dănilă, Intellectual Property Right, C.H. Beck Printing House, Bucharest, 2008, pp.33-35.

[15] Idem

[16] Paula Schepens, Guide sur la gestion collective des droits d'auteur (La Societe de Gestion au Service de l'Auteur et de l'Usager), UNESCO, 2000, p.6

to the use of their work. To ensure the availability of such remuneration and to enable satisfactory obtaining of benefits from the investment, adequate legal protection of copyright and neighboring rights is needed.

In this respect, since 1990, the European Commission stressed the need to establish at Community level, a general and flexible legal framework in this field.

Harmonization of legislation on copyright and on neighboring rights to copyright shall help, as shown in the preamble to Directive 2001/29/EC on the harmonization of certain aspects of copyright and neighboring rights in the information society, the implementation of the four freedoms of the internal market and regards complying with the fundamental principles of law, in particular the principle of property, including intellectual property, free speech and public interest.

It is also shown in the preamble to said directive, by enhancing the legal certainty and providing a high level of protection of the intellectual property, a harmonized legal framework regarding copyright and neighboring rights will foster substantial investments in creativity and innovation, including network infrastructure, and will lead to growth and greater competitiveness of European industry, both in content delivery and information technology, and generally in a wide range of industrial and cultural sectors. This provides jobs preserving and encourages job creation.

In conclusion, we appreciate that without harmonization at community level, legislative activities at national level which have already been initiated in several Member States in order to meet the technological challenges can create significant differences in protection and therefore restrictions on the free movement of services and products incorporation or based on intellectual property, leading to refragmentation of internal market and to legislative inconsistency.

2. SHORT HISTORY REGARDING COLLECTIVE MANAGEMENT OF RIGHTS

Collective management of copyright arose when the first national laws on copyright began to be adopted, a practice that has developed over the centuries, with the evolution of scientific progress. Thus, one can say that copyright is collectively managed at the end of the eighteenth century.

Authors' first organizations were established in France. At first, the functions of professional associations – to fight, inter alia, for the full recognition and respect o copyrights – have been combined with elements of collective management of rights.

Establishment of the first organization of this kind is closely linked to the name of Beaumarchais. It was he who led the legal „battles" against theatres which had some delays in the recognition and respect for moral and economic rights of authors.

Honoré de Balzac, Alexandre Dumas, Victor Hugo and other French authors continued efforts of Beaumarchais, so on April 28th, 1908 they founded the Society of French Writers (Société des gens des lettres – SGDL) which held its first general meeting upon the end of 1837 (this organization currently operates). Those organizations were not collective management organizations in the sense such type of organizations work today.

In 1847, the composers Paul Henrion and Victor Parizot, the writer Ernest Bourget, supported by their editor, filed a lawsuit against the „Ambassadeurs" (a „café-concert" located in Avenue des Champs-Elysées, Paris). They were unhappy that they had to pay for seats and food consumed at „Ambassadeurs", while they receive no remuneration for their works which were interpreted by that local orchestra, which is considered by them as a blatant contradiction. So they took the courageous – and logical – decision to no longer pay the meals as long as neither of themselves is paid for their works. The authors of the works interpreted in that local won the lawsuit and the owner of „Ambassadeurs" premises was obliged to pay them a considerable amount. This Court decision has created new opportunities for composers and lyricists of non-dramatic musical works, although it was obvious that they will not be able to control and enforce these new rights individually. Court decision led, in 1850, to the establishment of a collective agency which was replaced by the Society of Music Authors, Composers and Editors (Société des auteurs, compositeurs et éditeurs de musique – SACEM), an organization that is successful even nowadays[17].

In the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, in almost all European countries, as well as in other countries, have established similar author bodies (the so-called interpretation rights organizations). Given that these bodies have worked very well through bilateral reciprocal representation contracts of repertoire, it became necessary to have an international body to coordinate their activities and to contribute to the more effective protection of authors' rights worldwide. Thus, in June 1926, delegates from 18 organizations have set up the International Confederation of Societies of Authors and Composers – CISAC.

In conclusion, we can say that copyright and technology have evolved in parallel: first in print, then the sound recording, film, broadcasting, photocopying, transmission by satellite and cable, video recording and more recently, the Internet. Today, this practice became current, in the world collecting societies operating in over 100 countries[18].

In Romania, the collective management of neighboring rights was regulated for the first time by the Law no. 8/1996, which by the amendments brought in July 2004 by Law no. 285/2004, n September 2005 by Government's Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005 and in 2006 by the Law no. 329/2006 has undergone major amendments and supplements.

Following the adoption of such legislation, in Romania were created more bodies for the management of copyright and related rights, currently operating a number of 12 collective management organizations.

3. INTRODUCTORY NOTIONS REGARDING THE COLLECTIVE MANAGEMENT OF RIGHTS

The Collective Management Societies (organizations) are entities established by free association, having as main activity collection and distribution of rights which management is entrusted to them by the holders. The collective management organizations are subject to regulations on non-profit associations and may acquire legal personality by ORDA authorization. The collective management organizations are created directly by the holders of copyright or neighboring rights, natural or legal persons, and acting within the granted mandate and on the basis of statues adopted according to the procedure provided by law. These can be set separately for different categories of right management, corresponding to different fields of creation, as well as management of rights belonging to different categories of holders[19].

Collective management means: managing for the benefit of authors community. The amounts thus collected shall go to their final recipient, meaning the author himself. In the „Guidelines on the collective management of copyright", Paula Schepens says: „Everyone gets as he/she deserves! Rights should not serve collective goals. It's not about a fee but about the author's wages. So, collectively gathered, but individually assigned/distributed. Collective management is the only way that guarantees the legitimate interests when the author has before him/her a multitude of users"[20].

Collective management of copyright is generally used to facilitate the effective exercise of these rights to authors and to promote the lawful exploitation of works and cultural benefits. As Salah Abada, Director of the Section Creativity and Copyright of the UNESCO, shows, „in modern [17] Mihaly Ficsor, Collective management of copyright and related rights, WIPO, 2002, pp.18-19.

[18] Tarja Koskinen-Olsson, the Collective Management of Reproduction. This study was developed under the cooperation agreement between WIPO and IFFRO in 2003.

[19] See Rodica Pârvu, Ciprian Raul Romițan, op.cit., pp.77-78.

[20] Paula Schepens, Guide sur la gestion collective des droits d'auteur (La Societe de Gestion au Service de l'Auteur et de l'Usager), UNESCO, 2000.

society, collective management is one of the best means to ensure respect for exploited works and fair remuneration of the creative effort to cultural enrich, facilitating quick access to the public in a lively and constant enrichment culture".

According to art.4 paragraph 3) of Council Directive 92/100/CEE dated November 19th, 1992 regarding rental right and lending right, and certain rights related to copyright in the field of intellectual property, „Managing the right to obtain a fair remuneration may be entrusted to some collective management organizations representing authors or performers".

4. NECESSITY TO ENSURE THE COLLECTIVE MANAGEMENT OF COPYRIGHT AND NEIGHBOURING RIGHTS

Over the past 15 years, the issue of the collective management of copyright and neighbouring rights was debated on a European level. For this purpose, the European Commission has made an analysis in order to establish whether the "current rights management methods do not hamper in any way the functioning of an internal market, especially considering the increased strength of the information society".

Thus, the European Commission underlined in its communication dated the 19th of April 2004, the need to set up a European legislation on the collective management and the good functioning of the collective management organizations[21].

Moreover, the Commission highlighted the issue of the digital rights management and spoke about the emergence of DRM (Digital Rights Management) systems, "which could be used for authorizing rights, for monitoring behaviours and for applying rights". This new type of system was considered by the Commission as being the most important instrument in the field of digital rights management, in the context of the internal Market. However, the Commission stated that the inoperability of the DRM systems' infrastructure is a necessary prior condition which ensures the access of right holders and of users.

As shown before, the collective management bodies represent an important link between the authors and users of works protected by copyright, because they guarantee to their authors, as holders of such rights, remuneration for the use of their works. In a wider sense, collective management means the exercising of the copyright and neighbouring rights by a body which acts for the interest of and on behalf of right holders.

The members of a collective management organization can be all the holders of copyright or of rights related to copyright, such as: authors, composers, publishers, writers, photographs, musicians, performers or players, etc. The radio broadcasting bodies cannot become members of a collective management organization, because they are considered as belonging to users, even though they hold certain rights on their own shows.

Once they subscribe to a collective management organization, the members provide to it a series of personal information and declare the works they created. All the supplied information is an integral part of the collective management organization's documentation and allows it to establish the connection between the use of works and the remuneration for such use, as well as to make it possible for conveying the due amounts to the right holders. The works declared by the members of the collective management body represent the "national" or the "local" repertoire (versus the "international repertoire", which is made of the foreign works managed by the international collective management bodies).

[21] http://europa.eu.int/comm/internal_market/copyright/management/management_fr.htm

The declaring of the repertoire by artists actually represents the contents of the mandate given to the collective management organization.

Subsequent to the performed survey and to the documents provided by the CREDIDAM collective management organization, the repertoire is declared on standard forms or online, following ISO accredited procedures.

Such procedures contain punctual explanations, so that the artist is able to easily identify how the form should be filled in.

For example:

A) Definitions and abbreviations:

- CREDIDAM® Member – performer or player, respectively actor, stunt, singer (vocal performer), instrument player, conductor, dancer, ballet dancer, director (radio theatre), circus artist;
- CREDIDAM® Repertoire – the totality of performances or plays, previously fixed or radio-broadcast, respectively the totality of performances in the audio field (phonograms) and of the artistic performances in the audiovisual field (performances made during TV shows, TV theatre, feature film/TV series, previously radio broadcast concerts);
- Repertoire statement – affidavit, under private signature, according to the dispositions of art. 292 from the Criminal Code (forgery and use of forgery);
- The audiovisual field will hereinafter be called "AV";
- The artistic performance in the audio field will be called: "Music phonogram/Radio phonogram";
- The field on the standard forms will be called "R-Columns";

B) Process description

I. Manner of declaring:

a) By filling in the standard forms found at the CREDIDAM® headquarters or by downloading from the www.credidam.ro website;

b) Online, by accessing the personal account, using the username and the password;

The permanent and timely declaration of the repertoire by the CREDIDAM® members, in complete and accurate form, in compliance with the provisions concerning this procedure, is the fundamental/mandatory conditions for benefiting from the distribution of remunerations related to the neighbouring rights.

II. Repertoire declaring:

CREDIDAM® records/enters in its data base the performances from the audio field (phonograms) and the artistic performances from the audiovisual field, bearing neighbouring rights, in relation to which the CREDIDAM® member must prove his/her participation, by submitting certified copies of the original and signed copies of contracts, certificates, copies of album covers, etc.

The format of such repertoire statement will be filled in horizontally, complying with the guidelines and with the legend on the right side of the form. This form will be filled in only by the holders of neighbouring rights falling in the category of actors/stunts/dancers/ballet dancers/singers/instrument players, who attended the recording/fixing of a performance such as a feature film/documentary film/commercial/video clip. The repertoire statement must be accompanied by the contract attesting the artistic performance or the certificate according to which the CREDIDAM® member transferred his/her neighbouring rights or not.

Rules for filling in:

- R1- "Film name" – is an mandatory column; the name of the film/commercial/video clip will be inserted, with capital letters, perfectly legible; no additional observations will be inserted; no abbreviations will be used;

- R2- ”Name of the director”- only the name of the film/commercial/video clip director will be filled in, with capital letters, without any additional observations, without abbreviations;
- R3- ”Sub-gender” – depending on the type of the declared artistic performance, the sub-gender will be filled in based on the legend on the right side of the form, i.e. FA-for feature film, FD-for documentary film, RE- for commercial/advertising spot and CP-for music clip/video clip;
- R4- ”Function”- is an mandatory column, which will be filled in according to the legend on the right side of the standard form, and to the proposed abbreviations;
- R5- ”Lead artist”- is an mandatory column; the name of the lead artist will be filled in, without any additional observations, or abbreviations;
- R6- ”Total number of participants”- the number of participants to the recording/fixation of the declared performance;
- R7- ”Character name”- only the name of the performed character will be filled in, without any additional observations;
- R8- ”Producer”- is an mandatory column; the television channel which radio broadcasts the declared artistic performance will be inserted;
- R9- ”Year of recording”- is an mandatory column; the date when the performance was radio broadcast by the television channel will be filled in;
- R10-”Duration”- the duration in minutes and seconds, of the declared artistic performance, will be filled in.

Each repertoire statement/standard form must include the legible name of the holder, the CREDIDAM® ID Card number, the signature and the date.

In case the repertoire statements are incomplete and illegible, and the operator ascertains that the artistic performances cannot be entered in the data base due to the lack of information or to incorrect information, the CREDIDAM® member will be notified by a written notification sent by mail/e-mail or facsimile, regarding the determined incongruities and a 10 days deadline since the notification date will be given for clarification/settlement.

In case the above deadline is not complied with by the performer and the issues concerning the declared repertoire are not solved due to the holder’s fault, CREDIDAM® will be exonerated from any responsibility regarding possible impairments of the neighbouring rights connected to the respective repertoire.

Online statement/updating: the CREDIDAM® member will access his/her personal account/box from the CREDIDAM® website, using his/her username and password and will follow every step indicated for filling in all fields.

Any update of the repertoire, performed on the CREDIDAM® website must be validated by the holder of neighbouring rights either by an electronic signature, or by the submission at the CREDIDAM® headquarters, of a copy printed and signed by the holder. Otherwise, the repertoire declared on the website will not be validated and will not be entered in the CREDIDAM® data base, in order to generate remunerations.

By the repertoire updating it is understood the declaring of fixed artistic plays/performances, in the interval between the last repertoire statement and the current repertoire statement.

The repertoire update is made monthly and it is a statutory obligation of the CREDIDAM® members, the same as that of submitting the contracts related to the repertoire statements in the audiovisual field, so as to determine whether the patrimonial rights were transferred or not. Considering that in the audiovisual field the collective management is optional, we state that during the periods when the holder of neighbouring rights fails to declare his/her repertoire, he/she does not mandate CREDIDAM® to manage his/her repertoire and it is presumed that he/she opted for the individual management of the repertoire fixed during the respective period.

Capacity of mandate of the collective management bodies.

The collective management mandate represents a (contractual) power of attorney given by the holders of patrimonial copyright or neighbouring rights, to certain collective management bodies, in order to act in the performers' name and to manage their rights related to their repertoire[22].

The mandate concerning the collective management of patrimonial rights, copyright or neighbouring rights, is granted directly, by a written contract, by right holders.

Each right holder who granted a mandate to the collective management organization is entitled to one vote within the General Assembly. The performers or players who attended a collective performance or play of a work are entitled to a single vote at the General Assembly, by the representative appointed according to the procedure stipulated in art. 99 paragraph 2)[23].

As per art.129 paragraph 3) from the law, the mandate concerning the collective management of patrimonial rights, copyright or neighbouring rights may also be granted indirectly, by holders, by written contracts, concluded between collective management bodies in Romania and foreign bodies, which manage similar rights, based on the repertoires of the members thereof. The indirect mandate does not grant a voting right to the right holders.

Any holder of copyright or neighbouring rights may entrust through a mandate, the management of his/her rights over his/her own repertoire, to a collective management organization. The respective body must accept the management of such rights based on collective management, to the extent of its object or domain of activity. Per a contrario, if the rights, for whose management the collective management organization is empowered, do not fall under the scope of its object of activity, it may reject the request.

The collective management bodies may not have as object of activity the use of the protected repertoire for which they received a collective management mandate.

In the case of the mandatory collective management, if a holder is not associated to any organization, the organization in this field with the greatest number of members will have competence. The claim, by the unrepresented right holders, of the amounts they are entitled to, can be lodged within 3 years from the notification date. After such term, the undistributed or unclaimed amounts will be used according to the Resolution of the General Assembly, except for the management expenses.

For exerting their mandate, according to Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and neighbouring rights, the collective management bodies are not transferred or assigned copyright and neighbouring rights or the use thereof.

The quality of CREDIDAM member is obtained starting from the moment when the holder of neighbouring rights mandates this collective management organization, in writing (by filling in the management mandate), in order to manage his/her rights.

This entitles the associate to take part in the social life of the association and to enjoy equality of treatment.

In the application for registering with CREDIDAM, each right holder undertakes the obligation to mandate this association exclusively for managing his/her patrimonial rights coming from the exploitation of the previously fixed or broadcast artistic performances, whose right holder he/she is, according to the law or to the association's Memorandum of Incorporation.

The management mandate given to the collective management organization by each member, in his/her own name is subject to the dispositions of Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and neighbouring rights, as well as to the dispositions of the common law in this field.

---

[22] Rodica Pârvu, Ciprian Raul Romițan, op.cit. p.67.

[23] According to art. 99 paragraph 2) of Law no. 8/1996, performers who are collectively involved in the same interpretation or execution, such as members of a musical group, of a chorus, of an orchestra, of a ballet or of a theatre troupe, should mandate in writing a representative among them, with the consent of members' majority. The director, conductor and soloists are exempted from these provisions (paragraph 3).

The management mandate (act of adhesion) includes the member's commitment to comply with the dispositions from the Memorandum of Incorporation and not to perform any act or fact that might prejudice the association or the members thereof, as well as the option regarding the collective management of the rights susceptible of being collectively managed.

Each member of the collective management organization undertakes to pay, upon signing the management mandate (act of adhesion) the fee for joining the association.

Such joining tax is established annually by the Board of Directors. The quality of member is not transmissible.

The documents issued by the association for its underage member are issued on the underage member's name, and the management mandate will be countersigned by one of his/her parents or legal representatives (custodian, curator, etc.).

The quality of CREDIDAM member is lost in the following cases:

a) Upon request (renunciation):

- the renunciation application will be made in writing, with at least 6 month prior to the end of the calendar year, will be motivated and becomes effective on the 1st of January of the following year;

- the failure to comply with the 6 months term leads to the automatic extension of the mandate by another year.

The statutory disposition represents the particular application of the legal rules solely in relation to the time interval when the calculations between the principal and the mandate, according to the provisions of art. 1541 from the Code of Civil Procedure. According to art. 1541 from the Civil Code in force on the adopting date of the Memorandum of Incorporation: "The mandate must, whenever asked to, inform the principal about his/her works and supply it with everything there is to be received based on the mandate, even when what is received would not have been owed to the principal".

Because the legal dispositions concerning the mandate's obligation to answer before the principal is not limited in time in terms of its execution, in relation to the specific nature of the legal relationships between the collective management bodies, on behalf of and for the principal's interests, according to the law, the statutory disposition forces CREDIDAM, within a precise time interval, to complete the calculation operation with the principal who revoked the mandate, in compliance with the principal of the annuity of the financial year and for avoiding to discriminate the budgetary execution annually approved by the General Assembly.

The CREDIDAM Memorandum of Incorporation can only be interpreted in relation to the law, but also to the legal rules of interpretation applied by similarity to those in the matter of conventions, respectively to art. 977 – 985 from the Civil Code in force on the adopting date of the Memorandum of Incorporation.

Consequently, the literal meaning of the used terms cannot be transformed into an absolute one, because the real intention of those who adhere to the CREDIDAM Memorandum of Incorporation is that of voluntarily conform to certain rules which discipline and constrain the collective management organization, by imposing it, also in the hypothesis when the mandate is given up, according to the incident budgetary exercises, to be diligent when collecting the rights due to the principal for the period previous to the mandate revocation, which may be collected after the revocation request date and to cautiously proceed to making estimates for the budgetary projection, in relation to the disciplining of the revocation procedures.

b) Is terminated by law :

- when the member of the collective management organization becomes a member of another collective management organization abroad, having the same object of activity or concluded a representation contract with it;

- when subsequent to a final and binding court order, he/she is prosecuted for one of the facts stipulated and sanctioned by Law no. 8/1996;

- after the death of the CREDIDAM member:

- in case a member dies, the remunerations will continue to be distributed in the account of the entitled persons, until depletion, in line with the dispositions of Law no. 8/1996, being collected by the legal heirs and/or legatees of the late.

- the identification of heirs, as well as the proof of the death, will be made based on the heir certificate, and on the death certificate, within at most 3 years since the death for the categories of rights which are mandatory managed collectively and within at most 6 months for the categories of rights managed optionally.

- if there are no legal heirs, the exercise of such rights belongs to CREDIDAM, in compliance with the dispositions of Law no. 8/1996 and of the Civil Code.

The revenues due to members, whose quality terminated by law, will continue to be received by the association, which will transfer them to the persons legally entitled thereto, until depletion. From the distributed amounts, the management fee (commission) will be withheld.

6. COLLECTIVE MANAGEMENT FORMS

The performers' rights can be mandatory managed collectively and/or optionally by the collective management bodies.

The performers' rights must be analyzed on a multidisciplinary basis, as they are connected to the civil law, labour law, fiscal law, civil procedural law, criminal law, criminal procedural law, and Community law.

The collective management of copyright and neighbouring rights represents a necessary stage for the materialization of certain rights in relation to the numerous means of exploitation. Certain patrimonial rights of the performers or players have proven from the beginning to be difficult to analyze individually. The technical process and the mass exploitations generalization have made the individual control almost impossible.

The collective management presupposes first of all the collection of the remunerations owed by users/importers and the distribution thereof to those entitled, pro rata with the real use of everybody's repertoire, within at most 6 months since the collection date.

According to art.123 paragraph 1) from Law no. 8/1996, the holders of copyright and neighbouring rights can exert such rights acknowledged by this law either individually or, based on a mandate, through the collective management bodies. Based on the analysis of this text, one can say that the rule is represented by the exercising of rights personally and not through intermediaries, by the right holders, and the exception is represented by the possibility to exert such rights through the collective management bodies.

The patrimonial rights acknowledged through this normative act may not be transferred to the collective management bodies by the holders of copyright of neighbouring rights.

The collective management of copyright is made only for the works previously made public, and the collective management of neighbouring rights can be made only for performances or plays previously fixed or radio broadcast, as well as for phonograms or videograms previously made public.

Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and neighbouring rights restrictively and expressly establishes the categories of rights which can be mandatory managed collectively and those that can be managed optionally.

Thus, according to the dispositions from art.123^1 paragraph1) the collective management is mandatory for the exercising of the following rights:

a) the right to compensatory remuneration for private copy[24];

[24] We understand by levy (compensating remuneration the right of the authors of works reproduced after sound or audiovisual recordings, after paper works, reproduced on any other type of support, as well as of publishers,

b) the right to a fair remuneration for public lending stipulated in art. 14^4 paragraph 2)[25];

c) the resale right[26];

d) the right to the radio broadcast of musical works[27];

e) the right to the public communication of music works, except for the public projection of cinematographic works[28];

f) the right to a fair remuneration acknowledged for performers and phonogram producers for the public communication and radio broadcast of commerce phonograms and the reproductions thereof[29];

g) the right to cable retransmission[30].

The law stipulates that for the categories of rights provided in art.123^1 paragraph 1), the collective management bodies also represent the right holders who did not grant a mandate to them.

Moreover, art.123^2 paragraph 1) presents the rights which can be managed collectively, meaning optionally. Such rights are: producers of phonograms and videograms and performers to receive an amount of money for private copying done under the law (Rodica Pârvu, Ciprian Raul Romiţan, Copyright and Related Rights, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005, p.90). We understand by private copy reproducing a work without author's consent, permitted by law without the author's consent, when done for personal use or normal circle of a family, provided that the work has been previously brought to the attention of the public, and the reproduction is not contrary to the normal exploitation of the work and does not impair either the author or the holder of rights of use (Rodica Pârvu, Ciprian Raul Romiţan, op.cit. p.28).

---

[25] According to art. 14^4 paragraph 2) of Law no. 8/1996 „ Lending by the library does not require consent of the author and entitles him to an equitable remuneration. This right may not be waived".) We understand by lending, to make available for use, for a limited time and without economic or commercial advantage, directly or indirectly, of a work through an institution allowing public access for such purpose (art.14^4 paragraph 1). We understand by fair/equitable remuneration the right of performers and phonogram producers to receive an amount of money for direct or indirect use of phonograms published for commercial purposes or of their reproductions via radio broadcasting or any other means of communication to the public (Rodica Pârvu, Ciprian Raul Romiţan, op.cit. p.90).

[26] We understand by resale right the right of the author of an original work of graphic or plastic art, or of a photographic work , to get a share of the net selling price obtained for any resale of the work, subsequent to the first transfer by the author, as well as the right to be informed of the location of his work.

[27]We understand by broadcasting: a) issuing a work by a radio or television broadcasting organization, by any means of wireless transmission of signals, sounds or images, or of their representation, including its public communication by satellite in order to be received by the public; b) transmission of a work or of its representation, by wire, cable, optical fiber or any other similar procedure, except for computer networks, in order to be received by the public (art. 15^1).

[28] We understand by public communication of musical works the communication made in a place opened to the public or in any other place where people gather in a number exceeding the normal circle of a family and acquaintances, regardless the method of communication either by direct presentation by the performers or by using electronic or electroacoustic means (television, radio receivers, tape recorders, stereos, computer equipments - PC, CD-player, amplifying equipments and any other devices playing sound or audiovisual recordings), for the purpose of creating the environment in order to perform other activities not requiring the use of musical works (see the Methodology for the use of musical works through public communication and remuneration representing royalties due to authors of musical works). The Musical work is „an expressive sound order codified in a graphic score" (Bucharest Court of Appeal, Civil Section IX and intellectual property cases, Decision no. 134A dated May 24th, 2007, published in the Off. Gazette no. 610 on September 4th, 2007, p.10).

[29] We understand by commercial phonogram a phonogram which is communicated or broadcasted to the public by that category of users in report to which it is impossible to individually exercise the right to equitable remuneration by the holders of rights related to copyright; and we understand by phonogram published for commercial purpose a phonogram which is communicated or broadcasted to the public by that category of users in report to which it is possible to individually exercise the right to equitable remuneration by the holders of rights related to copyright.

[30] We understand by cable retransmission, as defined by law: a) a simultaneous retransmission of a work by an operator, unaltered and in full, by wire, cable, optical fiber or by any other similar procedure, except computer networks, for its reception by the public or b) by a short wave broadcasting system, for reception by the public of an initial transmission, by wire or wireless, including by satellite, of program or television broadcasting services, intended for reception by the public.

a) the right to reproduce music works on phonograms or videograms;

b) the right to the public communication of works, except for music works and the artistic performances from the audiovisual field;

c) the lending right, except for the case stipulated in art. 123^1 paragraph 1) item b);

d) the right to radio broadcasting of artistic works and performances in the audiovisual field;

e) the right to a fair remuneration resulting from the transfer of the rental right stipulated in art. 111^1 paragraph 1)[31];

f) the right to a fair remuneration acknowledged for performers and phonogram producers for the public communication and radio broadcasting of phonograms published for commercial purposes of the reproductions thereof.

For the categories of rights stipulated in art.123^2 paragraph 1), the collective management bodies represent only the right holders who granted a mandate to them and elaborate methodologies, to the extent of the managed repertoire, if the conditions stipulated in art. 130 paragraph 1) item a)[32] are fulfilled, or directly negotiate with the users the license contracts. The collective management bodies will allow, upon the users' request, the analysis, at the bodies' headquarters, of the managed works repertoire, from among those requested by the applicant, in the form stipulated in art. 126 paragraph 2)[33], as well as the list of Romanian or foreign copyright and neighbouring rights holders, that it represents. This collective management activity is under the supervision and control of the Romanian Copyright Office, as guarantor for the application of the law.

Upon request, the collective management bodies authorize the use of intellectual creation works, only based on the documents attesting the existence of the mandate given by the holders of copyright or of neighbouring rights, except for the cases when the collective management is mandatory.

All the rights acknowledged by the law, except for the ones stipulated in art. 123^1 and 123^2, they can be managed through the collective management bodies, only to the extent of the special mandate given by the right holders.

Regarding the negotiations with an individual title, concerning the rights acknowledged by Law no. 8/1996, the existence of the collective management bodies does not prevent the holders of copyright and of neighbouring rights to address to certain intermediaries, which can be both specialized natural persons and legal entities, in order to be represented.

As it can be seen, based on the analysis of the texts in art. 123^1 item f) and art.123^2 item f), the law giver wanted to differently regulate the social relationships concerning the remuneration owed for the radio broadcasting of the "commerce phonograms", as opposed to the same radio broadcasting activity of the "phonograms published for commercial purpose".

For the correct interpretation of the law, we deem that the text found in art. 123^1 is the correct one, being in line with the dispositions of art. 12 from the Rome Convention and with art.15 paragraph1 from the WIPO Treaty*"*.

In relation to the technical-juridical dispute regarding "commerce phonograms" and "phonograms published for commercial purposes", our point of view is and still remains the same, [31]According to art. 111^1 paragraph 1) of Law no.8/1996 „If an author or performer has transferred or ceded his/her right to rent or loan, with respect to a phonogram or a videogram, to a producer of phonograms or of audiovisual recording, he/she retains the right to obtain equitable remuneration".

[32] According to art.130 paragraph 1) item a) collective management organizations have the obligation to grant non-exclusive license to users, by their request, made before using the protected repertoire/playlist, in exchange for a remuneration, by written non-exclusive license.

[33] According to art 126 paragraph 2 of the law regarding copyright and related rights, such repertoire/playlist is submitted to ORDA a database protected by law, both in writing and in electronic format, as established by general manager's decision, and contains at least the name of the author, the name of the holder of rights, title of the work, identification elements of the performers, phonograms and videograms.

the law not making any distinction between the two wordings and the juridical regime applicable for the phonograms is unique.

The legislation in Romania transposed the dispositions of the international regulations, having as purpose the homogenization of the standards regarding the protection of intellectual property rights at international level.

Phonograms have a unique definition in each of these international instruments:

a) art. 3 paragraph 1 item b) from the Rome Convention[34] defines the phonogram as: "any fixation of an audio reproduction of the sound of a representation or of other sounds".

b) art. 2 paragraph 1 item b) from the WIPO Treaty[35] on phonograms and public reproduction (WPPT) defines the phonogram as the fixation of the sound of a representation or of other sounds or the production of sounds, other than in a fixed form and incorporated in a cinematographic or audiovisual work.

Moreover, art.12 from the Rome Convention establishes: "when a phonogram published for commercial purposes or a reproduction of such phonogram is used directly for radio broadcasting or for any other type of communication to the public, the one using it will pay to performers or players or to the phonogram producers or to both, a fair and unique remuneration".

Art. 15 The WIPO Treaty[36] establishes the fact that the performers and phonogram producers will benefit of a right to a fair and unique remuneration for the direct or indirect use of the phonograms published for commercial purposes for radio broadcasting and for any public communication.

We ascertain that on an international scale, there is no distinction between "commerce phonograms" and „phonograms published for commercial purposes".

The distinction made by the Romanian law is artificial and contradictory, as long as the subsequent amendments from Law no. 8/1996 only intended to transpose the international regulations, which contain no difference, in this sense.

According to art. 20 from the Romanian Constitution, in which the provisions of international treaties to which Romania is a part, prevail, in case when there are incongruities or contradictions between them and the regulations from the national legislation, the regime applicable to phonograms is unique and there isn't necessary to make any distinction in this field[37].

De lege ferenda, through the bill on the amendment and supplement of Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and neighbouring rights, with subsequent amendments and supplements, drafted by the Government in order to be submitted to the Romanian Parliament for adopting, the envisaged purpose is to eliminate the drafting errors found in the text of Law no. 8/1996, including the elimination of the notion of "commerce phonogram" from art. 123^1 paragraph 1, item f from Law no. 8/1996, and the replacement thereof by the wording "phonogram published for commercial purposes" (wording used throughout the contents of the Law). Moreover, item f in art. 123^2 from Law no. 8/1996 will be eliminated, in order to remove any doubt in relation to the obligatory nature of the management activity in the case of phonogram radio broadcasting.

[34] Law no. 76/1998 for Romania's accession to the International Convention for the Protection of Performers, Producers of Phonograms and Broadcasting Organizations, concluded at Rome on October 26th, 1961, published in the Off. Gazette no. 148/1998.

[35] The World Intellectual Property Organization

[36] WIPO Treaty on performances, executions and phonograms, ratified by Romania by Law no. 206/2000.

[37] See Civil Resolution no.57A/2011 of BCA Civil Section IX and for IP causes, unpublished.

7. NEGOTIATION OF REMUNERATIONS

In order to start the negotiation procedures, the collective management organization must submit to the Romanian Copyright Office an application, accompanied by the methodologies proposes for negotiation, according to art. 130 paragraph (1) item a) from Law no. 8/1996.

The methodologies proposed and submitted to the Romanian Copyright Office are negotiated within a commission set up based on a decision of the General Manager of the Romanian Copyright Office, issued within maximum 5 days since the reception of the application for the start of the negotiation procedures. The decision of the General Manager of the Romanian Copyright Office will be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, on the expense of the collective management bodies.

According to art. 131 paragraph 2) from the Law, the final part, the negotiation commission is composed of: one representative for each main collective management organization, which function each for one category of rights and one representative for each main associative structure mandated by the users, appointed from among them, and one representative of each of the first 3 major users, established based on their turnover and market share in the field, provided they are declared at the Romanian Copyright Office on their own responsibility, as well as of the public radio broadcasting and television societies, if applicable.

In the view of being appointed within the above mentioned commission, the collective management bodies submit to the Romanian Copyright Office, together with their methodologies, the list of the associative structures of their users and the list of their major users, which will be convened for negotiations, as well as the identification data thereof.

The main negotiation criteria:

a) the category of right holders, members or non-members, and the field for which the negotiation is being carried;

b) the category of users represented during negotiations by the associative structures or by the other users appointed to negotiate;

c) the repertoire, confirmed by the Romanian Copyright Office, managed by the collective management organization, for its own members, as well as for the members of other similar foreign bodies, based on their representation contracts;

d) the percentage of use of the repertoire managed by a collective management organization;

e) the percentage of uses for which the user fulfilled the payment obligations by direct contracts with the right holders;

f) the revenues obtained by users from the activity which uses the repertoire constituting the scope of the negotiation;

g) in case there are no revenues, the European practice in the field will be used;

h) the European practice on the results of negotiations between the users and the collective management bodies.

If the collective management is obligatory, the methodologies will be negotiated without taking into consideration the criteria stipulated in paragraph (1) items c) and e), the repertoires being considered extended repertoires.

The negotiation of methodologies takes place according to the schedule established by the two parties, over a time span of maximum 30 calendar days since the setting up of the commission.

The understanding between the parties in relation to the negotiated methodologies will be recorded in a protocol, which will be submitted at the Romanian Copyright Office, Part I, on the expense of the collective management bodies, based on a decision of the General Manager of the Romanian Copyright Office, issued within 5 days since the date of submission. The methodologies thus published are enforceable against all the users in the field for which negotiations were carried and against all the importers and manufacturers of supports and devices for which the compensatory remuneration for private copy is owed.

Based on the analysis of these legal texts, it results that the negotiation stage must be extremely serious, the parties being bound to concretely establish their claims, which means actual elements, grounded on the general principles established by the law[38].

8. ARBITRATION PROCEDURE

According to art.131[1] paragraph 3) from Law no. 8/1996, the Romanian Copyright Office can be requested to start the arbitration procedure[39] performed by arbitrators, in the following situations:

a) the entities forming a party which will attend the negotiation were not able to agree on a mutual point of view that needs to be presented to the other party;

b) the two negotiating parties were not able to agree on a unique form of the methodology, within the deadline stipulated in paragraph (1);

c) the collective management bodies were not able to agree on the conclusion of a protocol for the distribution of remunerations and for the establishment of the commission owed to the sole collector.

Within 5 days since the request for arbitration, the Romanian Copyright Office will convene the parties in the purpose of appointing, by drawing of lots, 5 titular arbitrators, who will form the arbitration court, and 3 backup arbitrators. The latter will replace the unavailable titular arbitrators, in the drawing of lots order. The appointment of arbitrators through the drawing of lots will also be made in case the convened parties are absent.

Moreover, within 5 days since the appointment of arbitrators, the Romanian Copyright Office will convene at its headquarters the appointed arbitrators and the parties, for the setting up of the arbitration court. The arbitration court establishes: the gross fee, based on negotiations with the parties, the first term, but not longer than 5 days, and the place of arbitration, informing the parties about its decision.

The two parties under arbitration, the collective management bodies and the users or other payers, respectively have an equal contribution to the settlement of the fee. The amounts will be deposited at the Romanian Copyright Office's pay desk, before the first arbitration term. The failure to make the payment in time leads to the withdrawal of the right of the party which did not pay the fee, to submit the evidence and to draw conclusions during the arbitration period.

The arbitrators must, within 30 days since the first arbitration term, submit to the Romanian Copyright Office, the decision including the final form of the methodologies submitted for arbitration, in the view of delivering it to the parties. As an exception, the arbitrators may request, on a grounded basis, to the Romanian Copyright Office, the extension of such term, by maximum 15 days. The arbitrators may collect their fee from the Romanian Copyright Office's pay desk only after the submission of the arbitration award.

The arbitration award concerning the final form of the methodologies will be delivered to the parties by the Romanian Copyright Office and will be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, on the Office's expense, based on a decision of the General Manager, issued within five days since the submission date thereof. The methodologies thus published are enforceable against all users in the field for which negotiations took place and no deductions from the payment of the owed remunerations are granted, others than those stipulated in the published methodologies[40].

---

[38] For details see Arbitration Resolution dated July 25th, 2007, published in the Off. Gazette no. 586 dated August 27th, 2007, according to the ORDA General Manager's Decision no. 262 dated July 31st, 2007. The Arbitration Panel was composed of the following arbitrators: Ana Diculescu-Şova; Cristian Iordănescu; Alexandru Ţiclea; Mihai Tănăsescu; Gheorghe Gheorghiu.

[39] Arbitration is a mean for resolving the dispute between two parties by a third party or by a group of third parties, called arbitrator or arbitrators, who resolve differences through an Arbitration Resolution enforceable by law (Rodica Pârvu, Ciprian Raul Romiţan, op.cit. p.4).

According to art. 131^2 paragraph 9) from Law no. 8/1996, within 30 days since the publication of the arbitration award in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, the parties can file an appeal against it before the Court of Appeal in Bucharest, which will advise in relation to the cause, in civil session. The arbitration award is enforceable by law until the delivery of the solution regarding the maintaining or the modification of methodologies. The award given by the Court of Appeal in Bucharest is final and binding and will be submitted to the Romanian Copyright Office and will be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, on the expenses of the Romanian Copyright Office, based on the decision of the General Manager, issued within 5 days since the servicing date.

The methodologies negotiated or established according to the legal dispositions are not enforceable against the users who, on the starting date of the procedure concerning the negotiation of methodologies, undergo a direct negotiation process of a license contract or have already completed such negotiations with the collective management bodies.

A new request for the start of the negotiation procedures in relation to the tariffs and methodologies can be filed by the collective management bodies or, if applicable, by the associative structures formed by users, by major users, by public radio broadcasting societies or by television societies only after 3 years since the publication data thereof in a final form, in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I.

In the case of negotiations stipulated in art. 107 paragraph 4), either party can file a new request for the starting of the methodologies negotiation procedures only after 2 years since the publication thereof in final form, in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I.

The remunerations established in fixed form can undergo annual changes, starting with the first month of the year following that when the methodologies were published, by the collective management bodies, based on the inflation index, established at national level. Such modifications will be submitted at the Romanian Copyright Office, and afterwards they will be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, on the expense of the collective management bodies, based on a decision of the General Manager of the Romanian Copyright Office, issued within five days since the submission date. The modifications become effective starting with the month following their publication.

The remunerations collected by the collective management bodies are not and cannot be assimilated to their revenues.

9. COLLECTING THE AMOUNTS OWED BY USERS

The collecting of the amounts owed by users or by other payers is made by the collective management organization whose repertoire is being used.

If there are several collective management bodies for the same domain of creation, and the managed rights fall into the category of those stipulated in art. 123^2, the beneficiary bodies will establish the following, in a protocol which will be submitted at the Romanian Copyright Office for publication in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, on their expense:

a) the criteria for distributing the remuneration among the bodies;

[40] For detail see Bucharest Court of Appeal, Civil Section IX and intellectual property cases, Resolutions no.115A and no.116A dated May 2nd, 2007, published in the Off. Gazette no. 562 dated August 16th, 2007; Resolutions no. 29A dated March 7th, 2006 and 116A dated June 15th, 2006, published in the Off. Gazette no. 841 dated October 12th, 2006.

b) the collective management organization which will be appointed from among them, based on a decision of the General Manager of the Romanian Copyright Office, as collector in the field of the respective right holders;

c) the means of emphasizing and justifying the expenses regarding the real coverage of the collecting costs of the collective management organization.

If for these cases, the beneficiary collective management bodies fail to submit to the Romanian Copyright Office the above mentioned protocol, within 30 days since the effective date of the methodologies, the Romanian Copyright Office appoints from among them the collector in the field of the respective right holders, based on representation, through a decision of the General Manager.

For the above mentioned situation, the unique collector appointed by the Romanian Copyright Office may not distribute the collected amounts either among the beneficiary bodies, or to its own members, until after the submission to the Romanian Copyright Office, of a protocol concluded among the beneficiary bodies, in which the criteria for the distribution of the collected amounts are established. The collecting expenses in this case, are separately highlighted and they must be justified based on documents regarding the real coverage of the collecting costs of the management organization which is the collector in the field of the respective right holders.

Upon the expiry of the 30 days term, any of the collective management bodies may request the Romanian Copyright Office to start the arbitration procedure performed by the arbitrators, for the establishment of the criteria concerning the distribution of the remuneration among the categories of beneficiaries.

The collective management organization, which is a sole collector, must issue the authorization by non-exclusive license, in writing, on behalf of all the beneficiary collective management bodies, and ensure the transparency of all the collecting activities, as well as that of the related costs in relation to the beneficiary collective management bodies. They must support the collecting activity.

The collective management bodies may agree in a protocol which will be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, based on a decision of the General Manager of the Romanian Copyright Office, the appointment of a joint collector on a field of payers, of the remunerations owed to the categories of right holders represented by them. Moreover, the collective management bodies may set up, with the approval from the Romanian Copyright Office, joint collecting bodies for several fields, which will function based on the legal dispositions regarding the federations made up of private law natural persons without patrimonial purpose, as well as according to the express dispositions regarding the organizing and functioning of the collective management bodies from this law.

9.1 Remunerations owed to right holders

a) unique fair remuneration

b) fair remuneration for the rental or lending of the right

c) compensatory remuneration for private copy

In practice, the distribution of the collected remunerations by the collective management organization of performers is carried out as follows:

CREDIDAM undertakes the obligation to collect and distribute the remunerations according to the management mandate received from the right holders, according to the legal dispositions. The distribution of the collected amounts will be made in compliance with the law, with the Memorandum of Incorporation and with the distribution regulation, approved by the General Assembly. The amounts coming from the remunerations collected by CREDIDAM will be directly distributed to right holders, to performers or players, pro rata with the real use of their own performances, minus a management share (commission) for covering the functioning expenses.

The management share (commission) for the members of the CREDIDAM collective management organization is the maximum percentage stipulated by Law no. 8/1996 with subsequent amendments and supplements. For non-members, the management share (commission) is given by the real expenses incurred with the management of rights (collecting and distribution), but not more than 25%.

The amounts thus remaining will be taxed according to the legal dispositions in the matter.

The distribution of the remunerations to the rights beneficiaries will be made twice a year.

If the bilateral contracts concluded with the partner management companies abroad stipulate otherwise, the distribution to the foreign beneficiaries will be made according to such contracts.

The distribution of the collected rights will be made according to the regulation for the distribution of remunerations towards the holders of neighbouring rights, as follows:

Compensatory remuneration for private copy

The reserve fund for the requests of right holders submitted within 3 years since the collection date is set up. The size of the reserve fund is of 20% from the amounts collected annually for private copy. This can undergo annual changes based on a resolution of the General Assembly, depending on the cashing collected from this source.

The compensatory remuneration owed to performers for private copy will be distributed to them in relation to the national market research, which will be done annually by a specialized institution. The Board of Directors appoints the institution and the conditions for performing such market research which establishes the percentages for copying the artists' performances by categories of performance (acting, directors of shows, except for film directors, dancing, music and stunts), by categories of genders (classical music, light music – jazz, rock, pop, folk, dance, manele music, etc. and folklore music) and by categories of origin of the artistic performances (Romanian, European and American).

The value of each phonogram/videogram is given by its radio broadcasting duration and by the amount collected during the period constituting the object of the distribution, in relation to the total number of play lists declared by the Radio and TV channels. The distribution of the amounts to the performers will be made considering, in the absence of a convention recorded with CREDIDAM upon the declaration of the repertoire, the criteria stipulated in radio broadcasting of phonograms/videograms.

Fair remuneration for public lending, internet and reproduction.

For the public lending, the amounts will be distributed according to the information provided by the institution which allows public access to the performances or plays of performers. According to this information, the amounts will be distributed to the performers whose artistic performances are found on the respective lists, in relation to the criteria stipulated in relation to the radio broadcasting of phonograms/videograms.

For the Internet, the amounts are distributed according to the information supplied by the institution which allows public access to the performances or plays of the performers. According to this information, the amounts will be distributed to the performers whose artistic performances are found on the respective lists, in relation to the criteria stipulated in relation to the radio broadcasting of phonograms/videograms.

For reproduction, the remuneration collected based on the special mandate will be distributed as follows:

- The percentage of 80% will be distributed as follows: 50% for the leading role (in case the cast includes several actors or the director's book includes several actors for the same type of role, the resulting amount will be distributed equally to all participants), 30% for the secondary part, 10% for the cameo role and 10% for the actor whose image is on the DVD/VHS, etc cover or for the artists taking part in the promotion.

- The percentage of 20% for the film soundtrack will be distributed depending on the part played by the respective performers or players.

If one of the above mentioned categories is inexistent, the related remuneration will be redistributed pro rata, in the following order: leading roles, secondary roles, cameo roles, etc.

Radio broadcasting of phonograms/videograms

The amounts will be distributed according to the real use resulting from the information received from users (play lists). The value of each phonogram/videogram is given by the radio broadcasting duration and by the amount collected for the radio broadcasting period (the collected amount will be divided by the total number of radio broadcasting seconds, thus obtaining the value per second, which will be multiplied by the number of seconds for each play/performance, thus resulting the value per play/performance). The amount calculated for a phonogram/videogram will be distributed to all the performers who participated to the respective recording, in accordance with the repertoire statement, or with the attendance sheet.

The criteria used to establish the score for each participant to a phonogram/videogram are, in the absence of a convention registered with at the time of declaring the repertoire:

a) The role or title within the recording (fixing).

b) The number of persons participating in the fixing.

The amounts collected from the users which radio broadcast or retransmit by cable works doubled by performers or players will be distributed to the CREDIDAM members, pro rata with the real use of the repertoire, in compliance with the score system based on the declarations given by the performers or players on their own responsibility under private signature.

Public communication

The remuneration collected from the public communication of phonograms/videograms for ambient/lucrative purposes will be distributed as a compensatory remuneration for private copy, respectively according to the provisions concerning private copy.

The remuneration collected from the public communication of the artistic performances in the audiovisual field in cinematographs will be distributed according to the information provided by the user and to the collected amounts. Based on such information, the amounts will be distributed to the performers whose artistic performances are found on the respective lists, in relation to the criteria stipulated for the radio broadcasting of phonograms/videograms.

Distribution of amounts collected from cable distributors

The amounts will be distributed according to the list of radio broadcast channels retransmitted by cable distributors, according to the distribution system stipulated for the radio broadcasting of videograms and phonograms on television channels. The list of retransmitted channels is communicated by the cable distributor, or can be asked by CREDIDAM from the National Audiovisual Council.

The rights susceptible from being collectively managed for which the express agreement of the members is necessary, according to art.123^2 and to art.123^3 will be distributed solely to the performers or players who mandated CREDIDAM for collecting the remunerations pro rata with the direct cashing related to the use of each artistic performance.

Undistributed or unclaimed amounts

The undistributed amounts are the amounts for which within 3 years since the collecting date, CREDIDAM did not received the information necessary for distributing them.

The unclaimed amounts are the distributed amounts, but whose holders failed to request them for 3 years since the notification date or amounts owed to the deceased CREDIDAM members, whose legal heirs did not claim them for 3 years since the date of their distribution.

The undistributed or unclaimed amounts have the following regime:

- with the open vote of the majority of members present at the General Assembly, the undistributed or unclaimed amounts are included in the amounts designated for the distribution of the collected rights following the rule of distribution of the private copy.

- with the open vote of the majority of members present at the General Assembly exerted in the conditions stipulated by this law, the use for mutual purposes of the undistributed or unclaimed amounts can be decided, based on:

- the granting of temporary aids to the association's members undergoing temporary work incapacity, medically certified and verified by the Board of Directors

- the initiation, support and development of certain social, cultural informative and documentation projects or programs, regarding the association's members or the users of their performances

- with the open vote of the majority of members present at the General Assembly, it can be decided to support through mutual programs and projects, the authority's activities following the public-private partnership rules.

Conclusions

The lead path addressed was a concrete analysis of the collecting and repartition way of performers' rights.

This work is of particularly interest for: performers, authors, producers, users, collective management societies etc. and will contribute to the comprehensive acknowledge of the above mentioned rights and interests.

Therefore, allow me to consider a must the thoroughgoing study for "negotiations and arbitrage" provisions in performers' intellectual property rights, both at national level and at EU or international level. It will be useful for all actors in Copyright issues.

References

- Kamil Idris, OMPI General Manager's Message, for the World Day of Intellectual Property, in the „Romanian Magazine of Industrial Property".
- Ştefan Gheorghiu, Intellectual Property – creativity reward or just a business?, in „Info CREDIDAM", no.4/2005.
- Law no. 8/1996 published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 60 dated March 26th, 1996, as amended and supplemented by Law no. 285/2004, as published in the „Official Gazette of Romania" , Part I, no. 587 dated June 30th, 2004, as amended and supplemented by Government's Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005, as published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 843 dated September 19th, 2005, as amended and supplemented by Law no. 329/2006 regarding the approval of Government's Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005 for the amendment and supplementation of Law no. 8/1996 regarding copyright and neighboring rights, as published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I ,no. 657 dated July 31st, 2006. (Moreover all specifications regarding Law no. 8/1996 refer to the form amended and supplemented by Law no.329/2006).
- Romania acceded to the Rome Convention regarding the protection of performers, producers of phonograms and broadcasting organizations by Law no. 76 dated April 8th, 1998 published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 148 dated April 14th, 1998.
- Romania acceded to the Geneva Convention for the protection of producers of phonograms against unauthorized duplication of their phonograms by Law no. 78 dated April 8th, 1998, published in the „Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 156 dated April 17th, 1998.
- „À l'exclusion de l'artiste de complément". For details, please see Code de la propriété intellectuelle, Édition 2002, Litec, Paris.
- Romanian Academy, „Iorgu Iordan" Institute of Linguistics, The Explanatory Dictionary of Romanian Language, DEX, Universul Enciclopedic Printing House, Bucharest.
- Paula Schepens, Guide sur la gestion collective des droits d'auteur (La Societe de Gestion au Service de l'Auteur et de l'Usager), UNESCO, 2000.
- Mihaly Ficsor, Collective management of copyright and related rights, WIPO, 2002.

- 10.Tarja Koskinen-Olsson, the Collective Management of Reproduction. This study was developed under the cooperation agreement between WIPO and IFFRO in 2003.
- http://europa.eu.int/comm/internal_market/copyright/management/management_fr.htm.
- Rodica Pârvu, Ciprian Raul Romiţan, Copyright and Related Rights, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005.
- Bucharest Court of Appeal, Civil Section IX and intellectual property cases, Decision no. 134 A dated May 24th, 2007, published in the Off. Gazette no. 610 on September 4th, 2007.
- Law no. 76/1998 for Romania's accession to the International Convention for the Protection of Performers, Producers of Phonograms and Broadcasting Organizations, concluded at Rome on October 26th, 1961, published in the Off. Gazette no. 148/1998.
- WIPO Treaty on performances, executions and phonograms, ratified by Romania by Law no. 206/2000.
- See Civil Resolution no.57A/2011 of BCA Civil Section IX and for IP causes, unpublished.
- For details see Arbitration Resolution dated July 25th, 2007, published in the Off. Gazette no. 586 dated August 27th, 2007, according to the ORDA General Manager's Decision no. 262 dated July 31st, 2007. The Arbitration Panel was composed of the following arbitrators: Ana Diculescu-Şova; Cristian Iordănescu; Alexandru Ţiclea; Mihai Tănăsescu; Gheorghe Gheorghiu.
- Bucharest Court of Appeal, Civil Section IX and intellectual property cases, Resolutions no.115A and no.116A dated May 2nd, 2007, published in the Off. Gazette no. 562 dated August 16th, 2007;
- Resolutions no. 29A dated March 7th, 2006 and 116A dated June 15th, 2006, published in the Off. Gazette no. 841 dated October 12th, 2006.
- See location: www.urbandictionary.com/define.php?term?=figurant
- Katherine M. Sand*, Study on Agreements and Remuneration Practices regarding Performers of Audiovisual Works in the United States of America, Mexico and the United Kingdom*, presented within „Informal Ad-hoc Meeting on Audiovisual Interpretations and Performances", Geneva, November 6th-7th, 2003.
- Viorel Roş, Dragoş Bogdan, Octavia Spineanu – Matei, Author rights and Neighboring Rights, Treaty, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005.
- Ligia Dănilă, Figurants – subject for neighboring rights or just ornaments?, in „Romanian Magazine of Intellectual Property Right", no.4/2007.
- Ligia Dănilă, Intellectual Property Right, C.H. Beck Printing House, Bucharest, 2008.

RELATED RIGHTS OF THE PRODUCERS OF PHONOGRAMS GENERATED BY BROADCASTING THEIR PHONOGRAMS

ANDREEA IULIA STRATULA*

Abstract:
The exploitation of phonograms by collective management is a topic of increasingly present among the right holders of copyright and related rights, but the issues raised by this activity are multiple and complex. From the type of the right set in our national legislation to individually or collectively management of this right, there are many interpretations that require further analysis. Phonograms broadcasting by radio broadcasting organizations is one of the first secondary uses which generated rights for the rights holders.

Keywords: phonogram, commerce, commercial, broadcasting, remuneration.*

Introduction:

As legal framework, I will analyze the applicable provisions of Law no. 8/1996, Rome Convention, WIPO Treaty for the notion of phonogram, notion of phonogram published for commercial purposes, notion of commerce phonogram and the type of management for phonogram broadcasting.

Legal Framework:

- Law no. 8/1996, as supplemented and amended, on copyrights and related rights

Article 103 - (1) A sound recording or a phonogram, for the purposes of this law, shall be deemed to be the fixation of the sounds originating from an interpretation or performance or of other sounds or digital representation of such sounds, other than in the form of a fixation incorporated in a cinematographic work or in another audiovisual work.

(2) The producer of sound recordings shall be the individual or legal entity that has the initiative and undertakes liability for the organization and financing of the first fixation of the sounds, regardless whether it is a work in terms of the present law or not.

Article 105 - (1) Subject to the conditions provided for by Article 92 paragraph (1), the producer of sound recordings has the exclusive patrimonial right to authorize or to prohibit the following:

……

…

_____

f) the broadcasting and communication to the public of his/her own sound recordings, except those published for commercial purposes, case in which he/she is entitled only to an equitable remuneration;

……

……

(2) The definitions from Article 14, 14^1, 14^2, 14^3, 14^4, Article 15 paragraph (1), Articles 15^1 and 15^2 shall apply by analogy to the rights provided for by paragraph (1) as well.

……

……

* Attorney at Law, Bucharest Bar Association, copyright specialization (email: andreea.stratula@upfr.ro)

Article 106^5. - (1) For direct or indirect use of the phonograms published for commercial purposes or of the reproductions thereof by broadcasting or any means of communication to the public, the performers and producers of phonograms are entitled to single equitable remuneration.

(2) The quantum of this remuneration shall be established by methodologies, pursuant to the procedure provided for by Articles 131, 131^1 and 131^2.

(3) The collection of single remuneration is made subject to conditions provided for by Article 133.

……

Article 112^1. – Should the owners of rights benefit from a mandatory remuneration, by effect of the law, they cannot object to the utilizations that generate it.

Article 15^1. - For the purposes of this law, broadcasting means:

a) broadcasting of a work by a radio or TV broadcasting organization, by any means servicing for the wireless transmission of the signals, sounds or images, or of representation thereof, including the public communication by satellite, for the purpose of reception by the public;

b) transmission of a work or representation thereof, by wire, cable, optic fiber or any other similar procedure, with the exception of computer networks, for the purpose of reception by the public.

Article 92. - (1) Related rights shall not prejudice the rights of authors. No provision of this Title must be construed in such a way as to limit the exercise of copyright.

(2) Patrimonial rights recognized in this Title may be assigned, either entirely or in part, subject to the conditions provided for by Articles 39-43 that apply by analogy. These rights may be the subject matter of exclusive or non-exclusive assignment.

Article 134 - (3) Remunerations collected by the collective management organizations are not and cannot be assimilated to their income.

(4) In the exercising of the mandate, pursuant to this law, the copyrights and related rights or the use thereof cannot be assigned or transferred to collective management organizations.

Article 123. - (1) Owners of copyrights and related rights may exercise their rights acknowledged by this law individually or through collecting societies, based on mandate, pursuant to this law.

(2) Collective management of copyrights can be provided only for works that have already been disclosed to the public, and the collective management of the related rights can only be provided for performances that have already been fixed or broadcasted, as well as for phonograms and videograms previously disclosed to the public.

(3) Owners of copyrights or of related rights cannot assign the patrimonial rights acknowledged by this law to the collecting societies.

Article 123^1. - (1) Collective management is mandatory for exercising the following rights:

……

f) the right to equitable remuneration acknowledged to performers and producers of phonograms for communication to the public and broadcasting of commerce phonograms or of the reproductions thereof;

……
……

(2) For the categories of rights provided for by paragraph (1) the collecting societies also represent the owners of rights who have not mandated them.

Article 123^2. - (1) The following rights may be managed collectively:

……
……

f) the right to equitable remuneration acknowledged to the performers and producers of phonograms for the communication to the public and broadcasting of the phonograms published for commercial purposes or of the reproductions thereof.

(2) For the categories of rights provided for by paragraph (1), the collecting societies represent only the owners of rights who have mandated them and draw up methodologies within the limit of the managed repertoire, if the conditions provided for at Article 130 paragraph (1) letter a) are fulfilled, or negotiate the license agreements directly with the users.

……
……

- Rome Convention for protection of performers, producers of phonograms and broadcasting organizations, ratified by Romania by Law no. 76/1998 – Article 12: If a phonogram published for commercial purposes, or a reproduction of such phonogram, is used directly for broadcasting or for any communication to the public, a single equitable remuneration shall be paid by the user to the performers, or to the producers of the phonograms, or to both. Domestic law may, in the absence of agreement between these parties, lay down the conditions as to the sharing of this remuneration.

- WIPO Treaty on performances, and phonograms, ratified by Romania by Law no. 206/2000 – Article 15 (1) Performers and producers of phonograms shall enjoy the right to a single equitable remuneration for the direct or indirect use of phonograms published for commercial purposes for broadcasting or for any communication to the public. (4) For the purposes of this Article, phonograms made available to the public by wire or wireless means in such a way that members of the public may access them from a place and at a time individually chosen by them shall be considered as if they had been published for commercial purposes.

2. Content

Domestic law has one definition of the notion of phonogram, and two references to the notion of "phonogram published for commercial purposes", and one of the two references may be deemed as a definition of this second notion.

Phonogram is deemed to be the registration or the fixation exclusively of the sounds originating from an interpretation or performance or of other sounds or digital representation of such sounds, other than in the form of a fixation incorporated in a cinematographic work or in another audiovisual work.

At first glance, we would be tempted to believe that the musical work or phonogram incorporated in an audiovisual work loses the protection that it enjoys, in reality however, should we construe this law text together with the special provisions of Articles 65-67 and 70 from Law no. 8/1996, as amended and supplemented, on cinematographic works and other audiovisual works, it evidently results that only the music especially created may lose its freestanding protection, as this is the only one which is fixed concurrently with the audiovisual work, as the other phonograms used within it are preexisting phonograms, keeping the freestanding protection, generating rights from any broadcasting or communication to the public of the audiovisual work in which they are incorporated.

A literary work used for screening is clearly a preexisting work as well as any musical composition inserted in various stages of the movie, other than music specifically created for that movie. It is detached interpretation of the doctrine in terms of phonograms used in an audiovisual work.*

We stated that only the music especially created for the audiovisual work may lose its freestanding protection, and only insofar as the author of the especially created music assigns to the producer of the audiovisual work the exclusive rights on using the overall work. We notice that this assignment is not part of the cases of assignment presumption between the authors of the audiovisual work and the producer for using the overall work (provided by art. 70 from Law no. 8/1996, as amended and supplemented), therefore the assignment of the especially created music must be especially entered into, otherwise the producer may not use the overall work. Unless otherwise provided for by the assignment contract, the author of the especially created music keeps all the separate use rights of his/her own contributions, as well as the right to authorize and/or prohibit uses other than the specific one of the work, entirely or in part. This aspect is inasmuch obvious as the lawmaker, as we stated above, chose to except the assignment of the especially created music from the presumptions of assignment between the authors of the audiovisual work and the producer even in case of its use within the audiovisual work. Therefore, an express provision regarding further uses is inasmuch necessary.

Another notion found in our legislation is the one of "phonogram published for commercial purposes", not defined by the our Copyright Law, however defined by the WIPO Treaty ratified by Romania by Law no. 206/2000 as being the phonogram made available to the public by wire or wireless means, in such a way that members of the public may access it from a place and at a time individually chosen, whereas Article 11 from the Rome Convention refers to the copies in commerce of the phonogram as an implicit definition of the phonogram published for commercial purposes, confining itself therefore to the physical product on which the phonogram is fixed (CD, DVD, vinyl, and any type of support).

Our Copyright Law has however no limitations on the collective management of phonograms, only on the ones fixed on physical support, providing expressly that collective management may be made only for fixed performances or only previously broadcasted or for phonograms previously disclosed to the public. A phonogram only previously broadcasted or disclosed to the public is not necessarily found on the market on physical support, and even in this latter case, its broadcasting generates related rights for the holder. From this point of view, the provision from the Rome Convention seems obsolete in the context of the latest digital technology development, as sales on physical support dropped dramatically. Otherwise, we would admit the theory according to which, in case the phonogram is not published on physical support [which must be found on the market], it could not generate related rights from broadcasting/any other use.

Our Copyright Law uses another notion, namely the notion of "commerce phonogram", however without any definition in this case either. This notion appears only once in the law text, namely in Article 123^1 letter f), and it is not found in any act or treaty to which Romania acceded. Although it seems an obvious material error [as to which it is true that no institution took any measures in order to correct it], it was deeply exploited by the users of phonograms and vastly debated in the law courts, however for controversial reasons and arguments.

However, this was not the end of this regrettable error, as it also influenced the type of collective management in case of phonogram broadcasting. On this subject, the Decision of the Court of Appeal Bucharest no. 23A/2007 amending the Arbitration Decision from 10 April 2006 [Decision of the Romanian Copyright Office no. 74/2006] is very well known. Therefore, the Court of Appeal Bucharest motivates the concerned Decision as follows:

"Having regard to the considerations above, and seeing the dynamics of the amendments to the Copyright Law, the Court concludes that the two collocations "commerce phonograms" and "phonograms published for commercial purposes" used by the lawmaker in Article 123^1 paragraph

(1) letter f) and in Article 123[2] letter f) from Law no. 8/1996 as it is in force upon the arbitration (therefore with the amendments made by Law no. 285/2004 and Government Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005) must be construed as follows:

- the collocation "commerce phonogram" means the phonogram communicated publicly or broadcasted by that category of users in relation to which it is impossible to exercise individually the right to equitable remuneration by the holders of the rights related to copyright;

- the collocation "phonogram published for commercial purposes" is that phonogram communicated publicly or broadcasted by that category of users in relation to which it is possible to exercise individually the right to equitable remuneration by the holders of the rights related to copyright.

g) From the analysis of the provisions of Article 123[1], 123[2] and of Article 131[1] paragraphs (1) and (4) from the Law, the Court finds that the different regime of the legal relations on exercising the right to equitable remuneration, depending on the category of phonograms, "commerce phonograms" and "phonograms published for commercial purposes" respectively is evident.

Therefore, in the case of commerce phonograms, the holders of the rights related to copyright may not exercise the right to remuneration individually, but only through a collective management organization, even though they granted no mandate for this purpose to such an organization. Concurrently, users may not refuse the payment of the remuneration due to the reason that the collective management organization has no mandate from the holder of the right or due to the reason that it would pay the due remunerations directly to the right holders [Article 131[1] paragraph. (4)].

On the contrary, in case of phonograms published for commercial purposes, the right holders related to the copyright may exercise the right to remuneration either individually, or through a collective management organization. In such situations, collective management organizations may collect the remuneration only if they can prove that they represent the holder of related rights, and the ratio of using the works for which the user fulfilled the payment obligations by direct contracts with the holders of rights shall be taken into account as well in determining the quantum of the remuneration [Article 131[1] paragraph (4)].

……

Therefore, in case there is a limited category and with a low number of users on a certain market, users who are included in a database, which is easily accessible to the holder of the related right, and which could be verified by a reasonable effort from the latter, the holder of the related right may exercise individually its rights, due to the fact that he/she has the possibility to identify easily the users and to negotiate his/her rights with them.

On the contrary, if the number of users is very high, and difficult to be accessed by the holders of the related rights, they cannot exercise individually their right to an equitable remuneration, and in this case collective management shall be mandatory, with the applicable legal consequences.

By applying the above criterion, the Court believes that, in reference to broadcasting companies, they are part of the category of users easily accessible to the holders of the related rights, due to the fact that the number of broadcasting companies is limited in Romania, and there is a special procedure by which such companies obtain the operation agreement, and the holders of rights have the reasonable possibility to identify them, and to negotiate individually the equitable remuneration corresponding to the phonogram use.

Therefore, the phonograms published by the broadcasting companies from the Romanian territory have the legal status of "phonograms published for commercial purposes".

On the contrary, in case of users who use phonograms in order to assure or to create a pleasant environment for the development of commerce, such as: alimentation units, discotheques, commercial units or service providing units, sports and leisure, tourism and transportation units, the Court believes that the phonograms used by the latter by communication to the public or by broadcasting have the legal status of commerce phonograms, for which the collective management of the right to remuneration is mandatory. In such situations, it is practically impossible for the rights holders, as well as for the respective companies, to exercise their rights and obligations on the collection and payment of the equitable remuneration, respectively. "

The coexistence of Article 123^1 paragraph 1 letter f) with Article 123^2 paragraph 1 letter f) from Law no. 8/1996, as amended and supplemented, would lead to the entirely erroneous conclusion that the producers of phonograms and the performers would be the beneficiaries of two rights to equitable remuneration, one for communication to the public and for broadcasting of commerce phonograms, which is exercised by mandatory collective management (Article 123^1 paragraph 1 letter f), and another for communication to the public and for broadcasting of phonograms published for commercial purposes, for which collective management is elective (Article 123^2 paragraph 1 letter f). However, Law no. 8/1996, as amended and supplemented, regulates only a single right to equitable remuneration for public communication and broadcasting, namely only in case of phonograms published for commercial purposes (Article 105 and Article 106^5), and this right is exercised only thorough the beneficiary management organizations (Article 106^5 paragraphs 2-4).

Which is the difference between the commerce phonogram and the phonogram published for commercial purposes, in the context in which Law no. 8/1996 has no definitions for these notions? This is obviously a rhetorical question, as there is no difference between them. Has the Court indicated at least one example of commerce phonogram and one example of phonogram for commercial purposes? This is so due to the fact that the same phonograms are used in case of broadcasting as well as in case of environmental communication to the public. However one may see that the notion of "commerce phonogram" is used ONLY ONCE (in Article 123^1 paragraph 1 letter f)) in Law 8/1996, unlike the notion of "phonogram published for commercial purposes", which is used in Law 8/1996 (in many articles) as well as in the WIPO Treaty (Article 15), ratified by Romania by Law no. 206/2000 on the ratification of the WIPO Treaty on performances and phonograms, and in the Rome Convention (Article 12) ratified by Romania by Law no. 76/1998, phonogram whose broadcasting creates a new right to single equitable remuneration for artists and producers. The only definition of the notion of phonogram published for commercial purposes is given by the WIPO Treaty which, according to Article 15 paragraph 4 "phonograms made available to the public by wire or wireless means in such a way that members of the public may access them from a place and at a time individually chosen by them shall be considered as if they had been published for commercial purposes", in the context of regulating the same right to equitable remuneration for the communication to the public and broadcasting of phonograms.

In supporting the mandatory nature of managing the rights of the producers of phonograms, in case of phonogram broadcasting, we indicate the following rules (noted as management principles in our law, as well as in the Community legislation and in international Treaties):

a) the producers of phonograms are entitled only to a SINGLE EQUITABLE remuneration (Article 106^5 and Article 105 paragraph (1) letter f) from Law 8/1996); this rule must be correlated with the one referring to the fact that producers may not prohibit the use of their own phonograms, if they benefit from an equitable remuneration (Article 112^1 from Law 8/1996); therefore, producers of phonograms have no exclusive right to authorize or to prohibit the broadcasting of their phonograms, which is a stronger protection than the one conferred by our lawmaker by the right to single equitable remuneration.

b) the single equitable remuneration is determined BY METHODOLOGIES (such as the one from this case), according to Article 106^5 paragraph (2) and the collecting society has the legal obligation (provided for by Article 130 paragraph 1 letters a and b from Law no. 8/1996) to draft methodologies (such as the present case) in view of authorizing the users, against remuneration "in case of those works whose operating manner RENDERS IMPOSSIBLE INDIVIDUAL AUTHORIZATION by the holders of rights". This circumstance – impossibility of individual authorization – strengthens the mandate of the management organization to represent the rights and interests of all the producers of phonograms in case of negotiation and determination of the final form of the methodology. The impossibility for individual authorization presumes the incapacity of the producer of phonograms, and of the artist respectively, to control the use of their own phonograms, and to verify the remunerations directly from the user.

c) The methodology drafted by the collecting societies refers to two categories of right holders – performers and producers of phonograms, more precisely to all the artists, and producers respectively, not only the members of the collecting societies.

Therefore, the collecting societies are acknowledged by the law the legal mandate to represent all the producers of phonograms with a view to negotiating and determining this remuneration (also to determine the final form of the methodology). In the relations between the producers of phonograms and broadcasters, the management organization is the representative of all the producers, and concurrently the guarantor assuring the observance of their rights in the relations with the broadcasters, due to the fact that the producers receive the remuneration from the management organization and not from the broadcaster.

In reality, the Court of Appeal grounded its decision by a formal reasoning concerning the qualification of management, starting from the material error that resides in the distinction between the commerce phonogram and the phonogram published for commercial purposes. This reasoning is substantially false, and generates conflicts, interpretations and speculations outside the law, and in reality there is no such distinction. The phonogram is the same as product made by the producer, as is the scope and form of the phonogram use (by broadcasting).

We find that the entire argumentation of the arbitration panel on elective collective management, applicable in case of broadcasting, is based on a MATERIAL ERROR, appeared in the process of drafting Law no. 329/2006 on approving Government Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005, to amend Law no. 8/1996 on copyrights and related rights. From the analysis of the amendments in time of Law no. 8/1996, one may easily see that the first version of the law (1996) stated a mandatory collective management on radio broadcasting, TV broadcasting or public presentation of sound recordings, and the first amendment to this law by Law no. 285/2004 also provided very clearly the mandatory collective management for these types of use. Subsequently, by the coming into force of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005, the material error referred above occurred, error also maintained by the approving Law no. 329/2006.

This point of view is affirmed in the very EXPOSITION OF MOTIFS of the bill for amending and supplementing Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, as subsequently amended and supplemented, drafted by the Government in order to subject it for approval to the Parliament. The bill amending the Law and the exposition of motifs, currently at the stage of public debate, can be found for consultation on the site of the Ministry of Culture and National Patrimony (http://www.cultura-net.ro/DezbateriDetalii.aspx?ID=346). The bill aims at correcting this error, in the sense of removing the notion of "commerce phonogram" from Article 123 index 1 paragraph 1, letter f) from Law no. 8/1996, by replacing it with the collocation "phonogram published for commercial purposes" (collocation used throughout the law). Concurrently, letter f) of Article 123 index 2 shall be removed from Law no. 8/1996, in order to avoid any doubt concerning the mandatory regime of management in case of phonogram broadcasting.

The Court of Appeal attempted to offer a justification of the previously mentioned legal provision, although it is not the will of the lawmaker, on the contrary, it is a MATERIAL ERROR which led to the ERRONEOUS IDEA that the same use, in this case, the broadcasting, may create different categories of phonograms and distinct equitable remunerations, ALL DEPENDING ON THE CATEGORIES OF BROADCASTERS, namely broadcasters whose identification is easier or broadcasters whose identification is more difficult!!!!!?????

Decision 153A of the Court of Appeal Bucharest (published in the Official Gazette no. 470/2011 by Decision of the Romanian Copyright Office no. 216/2011 as being the Methodology for the application of Law no. 8/1996, as amended and supplemented, in the field of broadcasting, as a use generating related right to the copyright) presents nevertheless an entirely different approach of the notions of phonogram published for commercial purposes and commerce phonogram as well as of the type of management of the two types of registrations, as quoted below. We shall use a longer quote from the considerations of this resolution, especially as it is an absolutely different interpretation than the one given also by the Court of Appeal in 2007, but also a lot more interesting.

<<The first aspect that must be clarified, […….], is the one of the contents of the notions "commerce phonograms" and "phonograms published for commercial purposes ", notions for which Law no. 8/1996 establishes a different legal regime in Article 123[1] letter f) and in Article 123[2] letter f).

Firstly, the Court cannot accept the assertion of the plaintiffs in appeal in the sense that there is no difference between the two notions, and that the existence of the two notions would only be the consequence of a material error slipped into the text when the law was amended in 2004.

Thus, should the existence of the two notions be a mere material error, it would have been removed by the lawmaker upon adopting Law no. 329/2006 approving Government Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005, amending Law no. 8/1996, or by a subsequent amendment, but close in time to the moment of the amendment that included such an error.

Moreover, the use of the two notions within Law no. 8/1996 is not a mere inadvertency of language used by the lawmaker, without any legal consequences, but it involves also a difference of applicable legal regime, which leads to the conclusion that the lawmaker took into account certain distinctions between phonograms, distinctions with a nature to attract for these a distinct regime in reference to the mandatory or elective nature of the collective management of some or other of these categories of phonograms.

Therefore, taking into account the fact that the lawmaker differentiated between the two categories of phonograms only with respect to the regime of collective management, the two notions may be outlined only by starting from the general criteria in relation to which it was established in Law no. 8/1996 that certain copyrights and related rights must be collectively managed, whereas collective management is elective for other such rights.

However, by analyzing the categories of rights for which differences of legal regime were established in reference to the mandatory or elective nature of collective management, the Court finds that in reference to the rights for which the regime of mandatory collective management was established (Article 123[1]) the lawmaker presumed that there is a impossibility of the holders to manage individually the respective rights.

Concurrently, the rights provided at Article 123[2] are rights which, due to their particularities, may be individually managed. Therefore, it was established for these rights that collective management is elective.

As Article 123[1] paragraph 1 letter f), as well as Article 123[2] paragraph 1 letter f) approach the right to equitable remuneration acknowledged to the performers and to the producers of phonograms for phonogram broadcasting, the only conclusion that results is that the distinction between the two categories taken into account by the aforementioned legal provisions is given by the category of phonograms whose use by broadcasting creates this right, and this conclusion, which is strengthened by the circumstance that the lawmaker used different denominations for the two categories of phonograms, the ones taken into account by Article 123[1] paragraph 1 letter f) are named "commerce phonograms", and the ones taken into account by Article 123[2] paragraph 1 letter f) are named "phonograms published for commercial purposes ".

From this perspective, the Court finds that it was erroneously noted in the challenged arbitration resolution that the distinction between the two legal categories of phonograms must be made in relation with the user, due to the fact that the application of such a criterion would lead to the conclusion that the same phonogram is either a commerce phonogram, or a phonogram published for commercial purposes, depending on the user.

Moreover, the conclusion of the arbitration panel is erroneous in the sense that, "this case, ... is concerned with the right to equitable remuneration for using phonograms published for commercial purposes by the broadcasting companies, and therefore the collective management of this right is elective, ...".

Thus, the present methodology concerns the use of phonograms by broadcasting, use which is taken into account at Article 123[1] letter f), as well as at Article 123[2] letter f) from Law no. 8/1996. Therefore, as long as the use modality of phonograms is the same - broadcasting, it concerns commerce phonograms, as well as phonograms published for commercial purposes, and the difference of legal regime is given by the category of phonograms used by broadcasting.

In reference to the types of phonograms, the Court finds that, in relation to the purpose for which they are created, purpose attracting also a specific use manner thereof, 3 types of phonograms may be identified.

A first type of phonogram is the one which includes interpretations, performances or other sounds or digital representations thereof, whose fixation was mainly made for disclosing such to the public, including by selling the supports on which the respective interpretations are fixed. The best known and most frequent phonograms of this type are the ones that include music performances and interpretations, and the main purpose for their accomplishment is to disclose such phonograms to the public by selling the supports which contain their reproductions. Phonograms of this type or the reproduction thereof are subsequently taken over by different users and are used in various modalities, including by broadcasting. The use by broadcasting of some or other phonograms of this type is made in relation with the free choice of each broadcasting organization, according to its own criteria, with variations of use of some or other phonograms of this type and, concurrently, with variations of broadcasting frequency of the same phonogram. Moreover, when the phonogram of this type is made, one cannot know certainly that it would be taken over and broadcasted. These characteristics render impossible the individual management of the right to equitable remuneration in the vast majority of the cases, right which is acknowledged to the producers of phonograms and to the performers for broadcasting, which makes this type of phonogram fall into the legal category of "commerce phonograms", category taken into account by the provisions of Article 123[1] letter f) from Law no. 8/1996, and their applicable legal regime is the one of mandatory collective management.

A second type of phonograms is represented by the phonograms which include interpretations, performances and other sounds, made for purposes of identification and self-promotion of a broadcaster or of one of its programs, phonograms whose producer is either the respective broadcaster, or another producer of phonograms that made the phonogram as ordered by the respective broadcasting station.

A characteristic of this type of phonogram is the fact that they have no interest is use other than for the respective broadcaster, and there is no interest of the public to purchase the supports that include the reproductions of such phonograms, and no interest of other broadcasting stations to take over and use phonograms that identify or promote another broadcasting station or one of its programs.

Therefore, due to the fact that this type of phonograms is destined to the use by a single broadcaster, the management of the right to equitable remuneration of the producers and performers may be made individually.

Therefore, taking into account the purpose for which this type of phonograms is made, exercising the right to remuneration for broadcasting, of the producer of the phonogram, as well as of the performers, may be made directly in relation with the beneficiary of the phonogram (the respective broadcasting station) within the contractual relations entered into for making the respective phonogram, either by paying a lump sum, or by paying periodic sums.

Moreover, if the broadcaster which is the beneficiary of the identification or self-promotion phonogram is its producer as well, it is obvious that the broadcasting of the concerned phonogram shall be made by it in exercising its capacity as a producer of the phonogram, and the payment to itself for the broadcasting of the respective phonogram is not an issue. In the analyzed situation, only the payment of the remuneration corresponding to the right of the performers could be an issue, and this issue can be solved either within the contract entered into by the performers and the respective station with a view to making the phonogram, or by other modalities that are specific to the case when the performers are concurrently employees of the broadcasting station that produces and uses the concerned phonogram.

In any case, should the issue of remuneration remain unsolved based on the contractual relations established with a view to producing phonograms of this type or in another modality that involves an individual management, the right to equitable remuneration acknowledged by the law to the producers of phonograms and to the performers may be exercised also within the elective collective management, pursuant to Article 123^2 letter f) from Law no. 8/1996.

A third type of phonograms is the one which includes interpretations, performances and other sounds, made with a view to being broadcasted for the promotion of a product or service, belonging to a third party in relation with the broadcasting station, as an advertising form of the respective product or service. The interest for using these phonograms belongs only to their beneficiary, who advertises a product, service or event through these phonograms.

This type of phonograms includes also phonograms from the second type of phonograms presented above, insofar as the phonogram is broadcasted by a broadcaster other than the one promoted by the phonogram, and the characteristic element of this type of phonogram is however the circumstance that the broadcasting is made for a fee or, in any case, based on an understanding with the beneficiary of the phonogram.

Therefore, phonograms of this type are the ones whose broadcasting produces income for the broadcasting stations, and their broadcasting is made as a rule based on advertising contracts.

As a result, considering the scope for making such a phonogram, and the circumstance that its use is only in the interest of its beneficiary, the exclusive right to decide upon the using manner of the phonogram by the beneficiary is, as a rule, assured by the clauses of the contracts entered into with a view to making the respective phonogram, and also by establishing the remunerations due to the producer of the phonogram and to the performers for any manner of use decided by the beneficiary, and these remunerations may be established in the form of a lump sum or in the form of periodic sums.

As in the case of the phonograms from the second type described above, in case the issue of remuneration is not solved based on the contractual relations established with a view to producing the phonograms of this type or by other means that involves an individual management, the right to equitable remuneration acknowledged by the law to the producers of phonograms and to the performers may be exercised also within the elective collective management, pursuant to Article 123^2 letter f) from Law no. 8/1996.

Consequently, the Courts shall establish, as a first point of the concerned methodology, that the phonograms corresponding to the first type described hereinabove fall into the legal category of the commerce phonograms taken into account by Article 123^1 letter f) from Law no. 8/1996, and their management is a mandatory collective one, whereas the phonograms corresponding to the second and third type fall into the legal category of phonograms published for commercial purposes, taken into account by Article 123^2 letter f) from Law no. 8/1996, and their collective management is elective and conditioned by the failure to fulfill the right to remuneration by an individual management.

Therefore, the contents of point 1 of the methodology shall be the following:

"1. Commerce phonograms, pursuant to Article 123[1] paragraph 1 letter f) from Law no. 8/1996, are phonograms which include interpretations, performances or other sounds or digital representations thereof, whose fixation was mainly made for the purpose of disclosing them to the public by selling the supports on which the respective interpretations are fixed.

Phonograms published for commercial purposes, pursuant to Article 123[2] paragraph 1 letter f) from Law no. 8/1996 are:

- phonograms which include interpretations, performances and other sounds, made for purposes of identification and self-promotion of a broadcasting station or of one of its programs, phonograms whose producer is either the respective broadcasting station, or another producer of phonograms that made the phonogram as ordered by the respective broadcasting station;

- phonograms which include interpretations, performances and other sounds, made with a view to being broadcasted for the promotion of a product or service, belonging to a third party in relation with the broadcasting station, as an advertising form of the respective product or service."

Establishing the contents of the notions of "commerce phonogram" and "phonogram published for commercial purposes" as presented above, the criticism [……], according to which establishing the elective joint management regime leads to the infringement of the provisions of Article 106[5] from Law no. 98/1996, may not be accepted.

Therefore, in the initial form of the law, all the phonograms were included in a single legal category, namely in the category of "phonograms published for commercial purposes", however the law failed to establish a mandatory collective management regime. Upon the amendment of the law in 2004 (by Law no. 285/2004), the lawmaker introduced the notion of "commerce phonogram ", establishing for this category of phonograms a mandatory collective management legal regime. Hence, although the notion "phonogram published for commercial purposes" was used throughout the law, the same notion was no longer used in establishing the management regime, therefore the lawmaker implicitly introduced a distinction between two categories of phonograms, some of which had a mandatory collective management regime, named by the lawmaker "commerce phonograms", and the remaining phonograms, which had an individual management regime were not itemized in Article 123[2]. Subsequently, by Government Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005, letter f) of Article 123[2] paragraph 1 was included, establishing that for the phonograms which are not subjected to the mandatory collective management regime, management may be not only individual, but also collective, and for these latter phonograms the lawmaker used the notion of "phonograms published for commercial purposes". Upon introducing the notion of "commerce phonogram", the lawmaker did not amend however all the other provisions in which the generic notion of "phonogram published for commercial purposes" was used, and therefore the notion of " phonogram published for commercial purposes" used throughout the law in other articles than 123[2] letter f) shall be understood to refer either to both legal categories, in case the legal regime of management is a matter of no concern, or to that legal category of phonograms, whose management regime is compatible with the respective provision

Therefore, the provision included in Article 106[5] from Law no. 8/1996 may concern both legal categories of phonograms, but only insofar as for the category of phonograms published for commercial purposes [Article 123[2] letter f)] management is also performed collectively. >>

Therefore, according to this recent interpretation of the Court of Appeal Bucharest, there is a difference of legal regime between the commerce phonogram and the phonogram published for commercial purposes, as a premiere in the European legislations. To put this into the practice of broadcasting, I could exemplify as follows: the phonogram “Un arici pe-un camp de maci”, performed by Florin Chilian, is a commerce phonogram when it was used to promote the newspaper Jurnalul National, and a phonogram published for commercial purposes when it was broadcasted entirely by any radio or TV station OR the phonogram “We love to entertain you”, performed by the band Voltaj, is a commerce phonogram when it assures the promotion of the TV station Prima TV, and a phonogram published for commercial purposes when it is broadcasted entirely by any radio or TV station. There are obviously phonograms especially created to promote a radio or TV station or to promote a certain product, however it does not mean that they are not published for a commercial purpose, it does not mean that they have a different legal regime.

Therefore, a regrettable error of the lawmaker generated different interpretations in the doctrine, although the attempts to approach this subject are rather shy, but especially in the case law with a negative impact on the attempt to apply the provisions with the title of methodological norm.

Conclusions

In fact, the name of these works as being published for commercial purposes comes indeed from their publication on the market in sufficient copies, and the term was used for the first time by the Rome Convention, notion which, as presented above, became obsolete in my opinion. Phonograms are works which essentially must be available to the public. In the past, they were made available to the public by marketing audio tapes, CD, vinyl and any other recording fixation form. Phonograms become published for commercial purposes as of their official release in a territory – USA, Europe or worldwide. This characteristic thereof – advertising has distinguished and will further distinguish them from videograms, which can be rarely found on the market – music videograms, and I refer especially to music videos, are never found on the market, and cannot be purchased as phonograms by the consumer public. In fact, movies as videograms have an entirely different course than phonograms as far as protection is concerned – they first appear in cinemas (at that time the movie is not available on DVD), and they appear after a rather long period of time on DVD (home video) and only subsequently they can be seen on TV, and this type of protection is never found in case of phonograms. A fixed concert, which is also a videogram, appears on DVD within approximately 1 year after the end of the tour, and subsequently, after another period, it can be seen on TV by the public.

Phonograms can be however made available to the public nowadays by being broadcasted or used on the Internet, and never being fixed on a support to be included in the commercial circuit.

References

- Gheorghe Gheorghiu, Audiovisual works, 2004, Publishing House Lumina Lex, pp. 115-116 "In many occasions, audiovisual works either as a starting point or incorporates previous works ……. For those situations where the audiovisual work is based on a preexisting work, Law no. 8/1996 regulates at the article. 68 paragraph. (1) the right of audiovisual adaptation, as << exclusive right of the copyright holder of a pre-existing work to transform it or include it in an audiovisual work>>….. Not in all cases there is also an adaptation or modification of preexisting work, sometimes a simple reproduction, for example, assuming a known musical composition is inserted in certain scenes of the movie".
- Viorel Ros, Dragos Bogdan, Octavia Spineanu Matei, Dreptul de autor si drepturile conexe TRATAT (Copyright and Related Rights TREATY), 2005, Publishing House All Beck "In relation with the right to authorize or prohibit the broadcasting and public communication of his/her own sound recordings, other than the ones published for commercial purposes [Article 105 paragraph 1 letter f)] we believe that it has an erroneous wording as negation lacks, which could make the text and the regulated exception logical."

SHAKESPEARE, CULTURE AND ECONOMIC INTANGIBLES IN KNOWLEDGE ECONOMIES

A.S. WEBER*

Abstract
This contribution investigates the vexed question of economic intangibles in the knowledge economy using Shakespeare as a locus of inquiry. Shakespeare is particularly suited for this analysis since as England's widely-acknowledged greatest dramatist, the author possesses considerable cultural capital, but also contributes substantially to the tangible, measurable economy of Great Britain through productions of his works, tourism, and fee-generating activity in universities, museums and heritage sites. In addition, a considerable number of knowledge products (Intellectual Property) arise directly from Shakespeare including books, films, instructional materials, and research articles. Due to the large number of peer-reviewed books and articles annually produced by scholars of Early Modern history and literature, academics joke about "the Shakespeare industry." Drawing on cultural economics, cultural theory, and knowledge economy research, this paper attempts to bridge the gap between quantitative statistical based economic theory and qualitative research into culture, value, and artistic transmission.

Keywords: Shakespeare, economic intangibles, cultural economics, intellectual property, cultural economics

I. Introduction

As a cultural icon, symbol of the achievements of a golden age of literature, imperial expansion, and prosperity (and I will argue below that these aspects of Elizabethan culture are inter-related), Shakespeare still commands international and national attention. The 'Isles of Wonder' theme drawn from Shakespeare's play The Tempest will form the backdrop of the £27m Olympic Opening Ceremony for the 2012 London summer Olympic games. A 27-tonne bell to be used in the ceremony, twice the size of the 13.5 tonne Big Ben bell cast in 1856 in the same foundry, will be inscribed with a line from Shakespeare: "Be not afeard, the isle is full of noises." The line introduces the theme that England has many 'Isles of wonder,' i.e. tourist spots. Hosting the Olympics obviously provides a wide range of tangible economic benefits to the host country in addition to tourist revenue, such as job creation, advertisement, and foreign direct investment ('showcasing' the country for potential investors). As the Culture Secretary Jeremy Hunt argued, "the Games represented 'an extraordinary business opportunity' likely to attract foreign investment.""[1]

The Olympic ceremony bell additionally signals to the world the geopolitical message that the UK is still a modern, wealthy, industrialized, and a continually advancing nation able to outdo its previous achievements in manufacturing (casting a larger, more expensive bell than was possible in 1856). Without delving into the reality of this self-perception, this recent example demonstrates how culture (Shakespeare as a cultural symbol) is intimately linked to both tangible and intangible economic assets as well as related political and social power structures.

Exactly what are tangible and intangible cultural capital assets? Tangible capital includes forms of property such as buildings, physical locations and sites that possess cultural significance, often called 'cultural heritage', along with artworks, artifacts, paintings and sculpture.[2] They exist in the physical world primarily in the form of land, structures and movable objects (the word tangible derives from Latin tangere, to touch). Intangible cultural capital, according to Throsby, "comprises the set of ideas, practices, beliefs, traditions and values which serve to identify and bind together a given group of people, however the group may be determined, together with the stock of artworks existing in the public domain as public goods, such as literature and music. These intangible cultural assets also give rise to a flow of services which may form part of private final consumption and/or may contribute to the production of future cultural goods."[3]

* Ph. D., Assistant Professor of English, Weill Cornell Medical College in Qatar, Box 24144, Education City, Doha, State of Qatar (email: alw2010@qatar-med.cornell.edu).

[1] Jane Mower and Michael Hirst, "London 2012: Isles of Wonder theme for Olympic ceremony," BBC News UK, January 27, 2012, accessed February 1, 2012 http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-16747032.

[2] David Throsby, "Cultural Capital," Journal of Cultural Economics 23 (1999): 7.

The concept of intangible cultural heritage gained international recognition at a 2003 UNESCO meeting in Paris. The meeting drafted The Convention for the Safeguarding of Intangible Cultural Heritage which has spawned a number of programs in addition to a list of Masterpieces of the Oral and Intangible Heritage of Humanity.[4] Part of the reason for establishing this list was to counter-balance UNESCO's designation of World Heritage Sites, which are physical locations such as monuments and natural habitats. Another reason was to preserve cultural traditions, particularly oral-based performances and practices, in imminent danger of disappearing. Although Shakespeare in many senses would fit in to the UNESCO definition of intangible cultural heritage–for example, Shakespearean language such as figures of speech, famous quotations, metaphors, and neologisms which he coined have become part of the oral heritage of Britain–there is still so much attention paid to this author and his influence that there is little likelihood that Shakespeare, Shakespeareanism or Shakespearean language will become endangered and die out in the near future; hence Shakespeare's cultural influence would not be in need of UNESCO protection.

The modern economic discussions about capital and economic assets, both tangible and intangible, would not be entirely foreign to Shakespeare himself. His father was a wealthy glover and wool merchant and Shakespeare himself became wealthy through acting, joint stock ownership in theatres, and the reputation he built through the (often illicit) publication of his poetry and drama, which became a box office draw for theatre-goers. He owned, for example, along with fellow members of the Lord Chamberlain's Men, a 12.5% share in the immensely profitable Globe Theatre (1599-1642) where many of his plays were performed.

The present analysis takes a qualitative cultural economics view of Shakespeare–the man, his creative works, and the cultural institutions that have grown up around him. Shakespeare is particularly interesting because he, along with Ben Jonson and other contemporary writers, contributed to the development of the concept of intellectual property (our modern term) during the critical period spanning the founding of Caxton's first printing press in Westminster in 1476 until the 1709 Statute of Anne which broke the 1557 monopoly of the Stationer's Company. The Statute of Anne invested rights of reproduction or copyright in authors instead of a single guild and is recognized as one of the first modern copyright laws.

II. Shakespeare and Economics

Two immediate concerns arise in these kinds of discussions of cultural value: the term culture itself is a contested concept and economics likewise spans a wide range of methodologies. As Doyle observes: "But it remains that conceptions of what counts as culture are varied and, likewise, economic research in the area of culture is diverse."[5] Culture is here defined as creative products of a society imbued with shared ritual and symbolic meaning. In one sense, cultural institutions can be understood using well-established laws and principles of classical economics. For example, the sites and buildings managed by the Shakespeare Birthday Trust are simply a non-profit business (technically under British law, an educational Registered Charity) that through visitor fees and donations must manage and maintain several historical buildings (essentially museums), and a library and archive. The value of properties such as these can be calculated simply by market value–what the land and structures would command if offered for sale–or if buildings remain protected from sale in non-market public trust, one could determine how much the public is willing to spend on their upkeep and preservation. David Throsby, who has been instrumental in defining and developing the field of cultural economics, believes a new concept of capital called cultural capital may be useful in defining the total value of such properties as Shakespeare's birthplace. These kinds of buildings (Throsby uses the related example of an historic church) possess a "'cultural value', a multidimensional representation of the building's cultural worth, assessed in quantitative and/or qualitative terms against a variety of attributes such as its aesthetic quality, its spiritual meaning, its social function, its symbolic significance, its historical importance, its uniqueness and so on."[6]

[3] Throsby, "Cultural Capital", 7.

[4] "Text of the Convention for the Safeguarding of Intangible Cultural Heritage," UNESCO, accessed January 15, 2012, http://www.unesco.org/culture/ich/index.php?lg=en&pg=00006.

[5] Gillian Doyle, "Why culture attracts and resists economic analysis," Journal of Cultural Economics 34 (2010): 246.

As such, cultural capital at times does seem to be a real physical entity, easily recognizable as such to both specialists and non-specialists. Throsby, however, seems over-optimistic about the possibility of developing quantitative measures of cultural capital. For example, we can recognize in Shakespeare spiritual meanings (as the greatest English dramatist, and embodiment of the English character) and symbolic meanings (evidenced by his incorporation into the Olympic ceremony), but placing a number value on these meanings would have to be done indirectly through proxies or through qualitative methods or common sense approaches. The benefits of introducing this new kind of capital and quantitative measures of it into the traditional economic formulations of physical or manufactured capital, human capital, and natural capital, are obvious in that cultural objects including non-physical objects such as a country's songs, oral poetry, and traditional theatre can be understood and managed under a rational system, for example, the system of investment. Both society and governments, in other words, can plan more wisely how much they want to invest in preserving a particular art form, such as traditional dance, by building theatres, supporting educational scholarships for transmitting the art, or underwriting the costs of performances, etc.

Some of the early research on Shakespeare and economics–or example, Henry W. Farnham's Shakespeare's Economics (1931)–came to the odd conclusion that Shakespeare "seldom sets out to give a picture of the economic condition of his times, or to moralize on its economic problems."[7] But this assessment was based on Farnham's inability to uncover any of what passed for the specific and technical terminology of economics of Shakespeare age. The term economics appears nowhere in Shakespeare's works. In fact, during Shakespeare's day, economics, variously spelled, referred specifically to the two works on household management by Xenophon and Aristotle entitled Oikonomikos and only gradually during the late 18th to early 19th centuries did a recognizable vocabulary of modern economics emerge.[8] However, Elizabethan thinkers and politicians developed a both practical and philosophical economic discourse and theory of mercantilism which impacted all levels of society since mercantilism fuelled England's overseas adventures.

Trying to demonstrate Shakespeare's ignorance of technical economic terms, however, is misplaced and even inaccurate: he was not university educated and his primary reading was in classical Latin literature as per the standard grammar school education of his day. T.E. Baldwin has meticulously reconstructed Shakespeare's learning and reading in the absence of any surviving school records. The classical literature to which Shakespeare was exposed (possibly including excerpts from the Oikonomikos treatises), contains a great deal of history, theory and speculation about intrinsic value, worth, rent, payments, balance of trade, etc. Thus several important abstract concepts that we would recognize today as economic in nature can be found throughout his plays.

---

[6] David Throsby, "Cultural Capital," in A Handbook of Cultural Economics, ed. Ruth Towse (Cheltenham, UK: Edward Elgar, 2003), 167.

[7] Henry W. Farnham, Shakespeare's Economics (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1931), 3.

[8] "Economics," Oxford English Dictionary, third edition, last modified March, 2008, accessed January 31, 2012, http://www.oed.com/view/Entry/270555.

For example, Shakespeare humorously explores in the Tempest through the character of Gonzago an ideal commonwealth where money is not employed:

Gonzalo. I'th'commonwealth I would, by contraries, / Execute all things; for no kind of traffic / Would I admit; no name of magistrate; / Letters should not be known; riches, poverty, / And use of service none; contract, succession, / Bourn, bound of land, tilth, vineyard, none; / No use of metal, corn or wine, or oil; / No occupation; all men idle, all; / And women too, but innocent and pure; No sovereignty–

Sebastian. Yet he would be king on't.

Antonio. The latter end of his commonwealth forgets the beginning [II.i.148-159].[9]

In this passage the impossibility of a Utopian state without the underpinnings of any system of money, exchange, commerce or trade is brought into focus.

Likewise The Merchant of Venice contains a nuanced analysis of usury and money through Shylock's exposition of the biblical tale of Jacob and Laban. Similarly, Shakespeare's line in Troilus and Cressida "what is aught but as 'tis valued" signals a concern with intrinsic worth and illuminates the theme of the bartering of women in the play, evidenced by the trading of Cressida for the hostage Antenor. In addition, the not accidental repetition of the etymologically related words "price," "prize," "praise" which has been noted by several literary critics reveals an underlying theme of trade and barter and what objects are really worth. Both the Greek and Trojan commanders question whether the praised prize Helen has been properly appraised: whether her price, the blood of many brave soldiers, is worth the killing and chaos that her abduction has sparked. This question of value has wide ranging implications for modern economics (i.e. the gold standard, valuations, assessments, monetary policy, sources of wealth, etc.). The brilliance of Shakespeare lay in the fact that he could talk about the fundamental and complex ideas embedded in wide range of fields (astronomy, philosophy, and theology to name a few) in a language understandable to a reasonably intelligent Englishman.

As Turner has shown, Shakespeare has embraced a rich lexicon of words that have historically been used in an economic sense, and many of which are still part of the technical lexicon of economics, including 'bonds, trust, good, save, equity, value, mean, redeem, redemption, forgive, dear, obligation, interest, honor, company, balance, credit, issue, worth, due, duty, thrift, use, will, partner, deed, fair, owe, ought, treasure, sacrifice, risk, royalty, fortune, venture and grace."[10] Interestingly, many of these words simultaneously maintain a moral and ethical dimension, since, in essence, they regulate and control the interactions among moral agents and they reveal a host of difficulties in quantifying human emotions and feelings, such as trust, confidence, and security that moral agents feel towards one another.

Commoditization of artistic production has been a interesting locus of debate in modern economics with respect to knowledge products–art can be consumed (a play watched, a book read), but the production is not destroyed if the know how to reproduce it again remains and its consumption does not lead to resource scarcity. Today, recreation of artistic production (i.e. copying an MP3 of a song) is often trivial, hence the recent frenzied interest of IP holders to develop software tools and laws such as SOPA, PIPA and ACTA to tackle online piracy to protect their investments in original content. These intellectual property laws may be the only way that creators can safeguard innovation or creativity without fixation (placing creativity into a physical form) and then physically safeguarding that fixation.

---

[9] William Shakespeare, The Tempest, in The Riverside Shakespeare, ed. G. Blakemore Evans (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1974), 1620.

[10] Frederick Turner, Shakespeare's Twenty-First Economics: The Morality of Love and Money (New York: Oxford UP, 1999), 11.

Turner observes provocatively that Shakespeare created worth from entities with no individual intrinsic economic value: "Poets spend their lives making value out of combinations of words that have no economic worth in themselves, being common property, infinitely reproducible, and devoid of rarity value."[11]

III. Shakespeare and the Development of the Concept of Intellectual Property

Shakespeare and his contemporary Ben Jonson, along with their publishers, were among the first creative artists to capitalize on their cultural influence due to the expanding literacy brought about the Elizabethan school system, the introduction of printing, and the emergent concept that the creative productions of authors were property and could fall under property rights laws (intellectual property). If we look at previous well known English authors before the introduction of printing, such as Chaucer, we see a different manuscript culture and different economic model of literary production and dissemination. Writing a well-received poem or other form of literature had only indirect financial benefits for authors, who could sell a work outright to a stationarius (who then retained rights for copying) for hand copying and renting to readers, such as students, for copying at their own cost. But the main economic motivation for authors in the medieval period (and there were obviously many purely non-economic motives, such as the aesthetic joy of language and stories), was to increase one's fame and reputation for wit, intelligence, and wisdom which could lead to court appointments, invitations to foreign courts (including stipends) to entertain or tutor, or offices from the king. Geoffrey Chaucer's (1343-1400) poetry was greatly appreciated and rewarded at the English court and he served in a number of royal offices.

However, when mass production of literary output began to be facilitated by the printing press, theatres began jealously protecting their playscripts. Due to the numerous "bad quartos" of Shakespeare's plays published during his lifetime and without his permission, it is surmised that copyists would attend plays and clandestinely write them down to sell to publishers. Also, play scripts, often kept under lock and key, could be smuggled out of the theatre for copying and then replaced, or actors could reconstruct an entire play from memory and sell it to a stationer. What is interesting is the continuing concern with the physical object of the manuscript itself and securing it against theft, as opposed to its creative content, a concern that would shift during Shakespeare's age. The price of the manuscript (medieval manuscripts were expensive, hand-produced objects often illustrated and made of highly priced vellum) became a trivial concern when cheaply printed paper books arrived. These practices made authors and play acting companies realize that the performance when fixed in a manuscript had a property value attached to it, and that the creative content had a value as well since it was the origin of the profit-making physical object (the book). However, there were no copyright laws at the time which assigned rights to authors. Acting companies normally would register their works with the Stationer's Company through booksellers for the sole (monopolistic) right to publish a certain work.

IV. Shakespeare From the Perspective of Quantitative Economics

Shakespeare is difficult to remove from English department curricula in U.S. high schools and universities – parents and administrators would interpret such an action as tantamount to an attack on western rationalism and the liberal arts tradition itself: as a faculty member quoted by Brantlinger has stated: "It's a fetish thing. Bardolatry. You can deconstruct other authors into oblivion, but Shakespeare really is immortal"[12] Thus, even if theatrical productions and performances of Shakespeare's works die out–which does not seem likely in the near future–Shakespeare will continue to be a source of economic activity in universities in the form of professorships, courses, textbooks, institutes, libraries, and scholarly research. Many of these activities consume and generate capital and are easily quantifiable.

[11] Frederick Turner, Shakespeare's Twenty-First Economics, 11.

[12] Patrick Brantlinger, "Who Killed Shakespeare? An Apologia for English Departments," College English 61.6 (1999): 681.

Quantitative economic research has asked the question whether productions of Shakespeare's plays are subject to Baumol's disease. William J. Baumol, along with William G. Bowen, formulated Baumol's Disease, which theorizes that sectors like manufacturing have undergone productivity increases followed by wage increases as workers share in the benefits of greater profitability of their labor. But some sectors, particularly labor-intensive ones, cannot increase productivity (for example, the same number of musicians are needed to play a Schumann symphony today as in 1854, thus the productivity of classical symphonies have remained static). But wages for classical musicians have risen along with other wages; if they didn't, then workers would abandon industries like teaching where maximum efficiencies have been reached long ago for higher paying jobs, which creates shortages and consequent rise in salaries in the abandoned industries to match more productive industries. Attempts to analyze the effect of Baumol's disease in the theatre have been unsatisfactory, such as Gambling and Andrews' analysis of Royal Shakespeare Company operations from 1968-78[13] – the analysis quickly becomes a large complicated multi-variate equation with unfortunately, several important variables not known, such as seasonal production costs. Another notable attempt to understand the economics of Shakespearean performance using the records of the Royal Shakespeare Company include James H. Gapinski's 1984 article in the American Economic Review and the responses and replies to it.[14]

V. Conclusions

In this brief discussion, the field of inquiry into Shakespeare as a locus of cultural economic activity can only be briefly delineated. Shakespeare's works themselves provide in depth economic analyses, albeit primarily in non-economic terminology that must be interpreted and teased out by literary scholars. Furthermore, due to his unique historical position, Shakespeare was one of the first authors to solely and directly capitalize on the remuneration of his creativity through profits from performances of his writings, with minimal benefit from the financial patronage system that had previously existed for poets since Roman times. The posthumous publication of his works proved that creativity could be fixed in mass produced objects (books) that would generate further wealth. This necessitated a stricter regime of intellectual property rights control which came a generation after his death with the Statue of Anne. Thus the circumstances of his authorship were instrumental in the development of copyright law in England. Also, as one of the world's most popular and widely performed playwrights, studying performances of Shakespeare using such resources as the well documented financial records of the Royal Shakespeare Company or box office receipts from the numerous film versions of his works can be a valuable exercise for economists for understanding the quantitative financial aspect of artistic performance and knowledge products. The quantitative aspect of intangible goods, however, is a new area of quantitative economic inquiry and needs more development.

[13] Trevor Gambling and Gordon Andrews, "Does Baumol's Disease Exist? Some Findings from the Royal Shakespeare Company," Journal of Cultural Economics 8.2 (1984): 73-91.

[14] James H. Gapinski, "The Economics of Performing Shakespeare," The American Economic Review 74.3 (1984): 458-466; Edwin G. West, "The Economics of Performing Shakespeare: Comment," American Economic Review 75 (1985): 1206-09; James H. Gapinski, "The Economics of Performing Shakespeare: Reply," The American Economic Review, 75.5 (1985): 1210-1212.

References

- Brantlinger, Patrick. "Who Killed Shakespeare? An Apologia for English Departments." College English 61.6 (1999): 681-690.
- Corning, Jonathan and Armando Levy. "Demand for Live Theater with Market Segmentation and Seasonality." Journal of Cultural Economics 26 (2002): 217-235.
- Doyle, Gillian. "Why culture attracts and resists economic analysis." Journal of Cultural Economics 34 (2010): 245–259.
- "Economics." Oxford English Dictionary, third edition. Last modified March, 2008. Accessed January 31, 2012. http://www.oed.com/view/Entry/270555.
- Farnham, Henry W. Shakespeare's Economics. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1931.
- Gambling, Trevor and Gordon Andrews. "Does Baumol's Disease Exist? Some Findings from the Royal Shakespeare Company." Journal of Cultural Economics 8.2 (1984): 73-91.
- Gapinski, James H. "The Economics of Performing Shakespeare." The American Economic Review 74.3 (1984): 458-466.
- Gapinski, James H. "The Economics of Performing Shakespeare: Reply." The American Economic Review 75. 5 (1985): 1210-1212.
- Mower, Jane and Michael Hirst. "London 2012: Isles of Wonder theme for Olympic ceremony." BBC News UK, January 27, 2012. Accessed February 1, 2012. http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-16747032.
- Throsby, David. "Cultural Capital." Journal of Cultural Economics 23 (1999): 3-12.
- Throsby, David. "Cultural Capital." In A Handbook of Cultural Economics, edited by Ruth Towse, 166-69. Cheltenham, UK: Edward Elgar, 2003.
- Shakespeare, William. The Tempest. In The Riverside Shakespeare, edited by G. Blakemore Evans, 1611-38. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1974.
- Turner, Frederick. Shakespeare's Twenty-First Economics: The Morality of Love and Money. New York: Oxford UP, 1999.
- UNESCO. "Text of the Convention for the Safeguarding of Intangible Cultural Heritage." Accessed January 15, 2012. http://www.unesco.org/culture/ich/index.php?lg=en&pg=00006.
- West, Edwin G. "The Economics of Performing Shakespeare: Comment." American Economic Review. 75 (1985): 1206-09.

SCIENTOMETRIC CRITERIA IN SOCIAL SCIENCES EVALUATION

STELIANA SANDU [*]

Abstract

The concern for ensuring research excellence and international competitiveness, together with the increasingly higher demand for greater transparency and accountability of the public funds for scientific research called forth a rapid development of systems, methods and instruments for evaluation of the research output that would help sifting the relevant from the piles of research papers.

As R&D funding is directed towards natural and physical sciences, evaluation processes and procedures by scientometric criteria is of greatest concern. When the interest for assessing social sciences research activity increased, it underwent the almost same evaluation processes, despite characteristics that would have called for different and specific criteria, procedures and methods. It is well recognized by different experts in specialized field that socio-economic R&D should answer to the both, the socio- economic needs and opportunities and scientific performance requests. The literature on scientific research evaluation highlights the potential pitfalls associated with applying only scientometric assessment tools, methods and data sources for Social Sciences and Humanities research, ignoring the specificity of this type of research, which is addressed, first of all, to the economy and people.

Following a review of the relevant literature on the issue, the present paper surveys the recently elaborated and officially established evaluation criteria for research performed within the SSH fields, in Romania. The author will look into the potential merits, as well as setbacks of the new regulation, underlining challenges and likely impact on the SSH research community, output and performance.

Keywords: economic and social sciences, evaluation criteria, scientometric criteria versus socio-economic effects, and responsibility in social science evaluation

Introduction

Substantiate, objective and reliable assessment of scientific research work has always been a constant concern and pursuit for both scientific community in search for recognition and performance, and outer stakeholders such as R&D funding agents, be they public or private contributors, prestigious journals, publishing houses or society as a whole. Performance orientation and evaluation has became more adequate to prove efficiency of public funds using, as well as competitiveness, expressed as international rankings. The experience of different countries proves that, in last time, research activity is increasingly linked to innovation and interaction with society.

Effective and timely integration of the Romanian research system within the European Research Area has become a national strategic target and, consequently, the policy makers are searching for tools and mechanisms for increasing the international competitiveness of the national research work. The public investment in R&D was more and more related to the scientific performance at international level and evaluation procedures adopted, also, international scientometric criteria, even for social and humanities sciences. Incorporating international standards in the scientific evaluation has often brought the desired balance between financial effort and researcher scientific performance.

The most traditional, common and widely accepted evaluation method remains the peer-review assessment, which involves anonymous appraisal by experts. Especially useful in journal / book editors' decision making, as well as in merit-based funding, it's objectivity level is improved through multiple simultaneous reviews. With rising competition for funds and other acknowledgements, the issue of bias and subjectivity became wide spread asking for new, more objective quantifiable tools and techniques to evaluate science output and scientists' careers and potential. These should complement or substitute peer evaluation, which, by itself, might favor the creation and domination of "select few cartels of senior scientists" (1, 6, 7)

[*] Ph. D., 1st degree Scientific Researcher, The Institute of National Economy, Romanian Academy (email: s_steliana@yahoo.com, sandu.steliana55@yahoo.com).

The new sub-discipline of scientometrics – or bibliometrics – has proved very productive, many research papers elaborating on the citation, publishing and Impact Factor (IF) figures, addressing mostly the interests and decision making processes of librarians, potential employers, research institutions and universities, funding agencies, etc.

Alongside its widespread application, increasing criticism emerged (2, 5, 8, 10)[1], especially when it is applied in social sciences evaluation.

1. The Specific of Social Sciences in terms of output evaluation

It has been largely acknowledged that the pace, impact pattern, publishing and citation culture and behavior associated to the research output significantly differ between the natural and life sciences, on one hand, and social and humanistic sciences, on the other. Ever since 1955 (4), considerable research work has been done to draw attention to the differences between the two broad scientific research areas that should call for different approaches, criteria of evaluation, bibliometric tools, computation methods. (5,6 etc)

Following extensive reviewing of social science bibliometric methodology and papers, some authors (5) warn that, relevant and correctly performed bibliometric based evaluation of Social Sciences output is possible, but with high costs, complexity and difficulty. Compared to the natural and life sciences, properly assessment of social scientist's scholarly work cannot rely solely on the same methods and data (e.g. SSCI-Social Science Citation Index), which, even cheaper and easier, misrepresent the true state of the subject examined.

It has been noted that the scientists of natural sciences publish most often in English (16), are oriented to the research frontier, referencing recent papers, and work within disciplinary frameworks and normally reach consensus. SCI (Science Citation Index) [2]covers mostly English work, use short citation windows and rely on the premises that there is large consensus among scholars regarding criteria of relevance, importance, truth, etc. Therefore, using bibliometrics through SCI may remain effective, reliable and extremely useful sound evaluation of scientific work in natural and life sciences, despite the criticism presented above. This might not be, unfortunately, the case for social sciences.

Foremost, social sciences (SS) address, very often, their national public, as society is their concern. Therefore, even if scientific research transcends national borders, social science is, to a considerable extent, of national interest. SS research priorities reflect national trends, local policy concerns and may not even stay relevant if expressed in other languages. Bibliometric evidence suggests that both, producers and consumers of social science, are nationally oriented (5, 8, 10) and [1] Other most acknowledged limitation and deficiencies generally associated to bibliometrics are related to: some lack of transparence in Thomson Reuters's methodology and process in journals selection, citations collection and IF computation ; the citation window applied in counting IF is often questioned, being considered sub-optimal; other factors than relevance and quality might often alter the indicators as it has been noticed that open-access journals, available online and journals with higher frequency receive good IF despite their lower scholar recognition in their scientific fields; given the huge volume of scientific research output and full automation of evaluation, it happens that controversial and even invalid, fraudulent and retracted articles continue to be cited and counted for IF, as there is no system of linking indication of retraction in the original publication; it has also been frequently reported that editors and publishers are able and accustomed to manipulate and manage the IF of their journals (impact factor game), especially through citation cartels and through publishing more review articles which are more often cited than the original research papers, etc. Many authors have also urged attention on the fact that SCI seems to be biased towards North American journals due to a higher frequency of self and colleague citations (5, 7, 9) and to the fact that English journals are much better covered in the detriment of other languages.

[2] In 1960, Eugen Garfield's Institute for Scientific Information introduced the first citation index for papers published in academic journals, first the Science Citation Index (SCI) and later the social Science Citation Index (SSCI) and the Arts and Humanities Citation Index (AHCI).

that national science literatures are largely excluded from the SSCI, which provide the main data for bibliometric evaluation of the social sciences[3].

Literature highlights that the research front on many topics in the social and behavioral sciences are more and more international. Social scientists seem to become more internationally oriented and there are clear tendencies towards the homogenization of social sciences given the economic globalization, widespread internet usage, high European pressure for international collaboration, the national level evaluation requiring publishing in high impact journals (5). The percentage of social scientists publishing in English is increasing.

Nevertheless, there is still large amount of relevant, high-quality scientific literature that elaborates on national issues that address primarily a national audience being, therefore, under-appreciated and excluded in bibliometric-based evaluations.

Secondly, it is important to note that many of the social sciences research work is stirred by the mission of educating the public they observe, of informing, of enlightening and determining behavior. If psychologists, statisticians and geographers do not publish much in non-scholarly literature, other fields, such as economics (despite it being scientific in publication patterns), linguistics, education and sociology do, as they address non-specialists.

Moreover, non-scholarly literature has been acknowledged as of a high applicative character, being, therefore, associated, in substance and role, to patents. Yet, it has not been subject for consistent bibliometric evaluation, as it requires a sound qualitative evaluation base (5).

Be it scholarly work or non-scholarly literature, this research output loses its meaning and relevance if published in other language than the national one, as its readers would be others than the addressed ones. (2,5,8). It is obvious that non-scholarly literature, as well as national literature is less well indexed and international evaluation criteria, usually based on bibliometrics, would certainly misrepresent the real performance of a scientist career in social sciences.

Bibliometric based evaluation criteria, widely used on an international base, also focus on scientific journals bibliometrics (mainly SSCI), leaving under shadow book publishing. Extensive research literature on this issue arguments that journal based bibliometric indicators are generally based on a smaller fraction of research output in the social sciences than in the natural sciences. (5). The percentage for natural scientists publishing in journal articles or conference proceedings is considerably higher than for social scientists.

The classic bibliometrics techniques (used in SSCI) are also frequently criticized (5, 7) for applying the same citation windows as for SCI (used for natural and life sciences). The time distribution of citations shows that a much longer time is needed in order to capture the slow pace of citation accumulation in SS and the germinative potential of research work in social sciences.

The strong transdisciplinary character of social sciences often alters the SSCI based bibliometric results, as it leads to fragmentation of literature. That would cause a weaker coverage of journal literature by SSCI, which cannot identify any core literature and cannot provide comprehensive coverage (5).

However, bibliometric evaluation in the social sciences gains more credit, as fields like economics and psychology come to resemble more and more in publication patterns to natural and life sciences. Scholars try to boost their evaluations, tending to change publishing behavior towards SSCI indexed journals, leaving aside book publishing and other disseminating means.

---

[3] To name a few examples, the afore-mentioned papers conclude that German and French authors cited material in their own language more than 60% of the time, although such material accounted for less than 10% of literature in the field (Yitzhaki, 1998); the top 20 most cited documents by Polish sociologists in the Polish SCI versus SSCI contained none in common, as all but one of the SSCI cited documents were in English and all PSCI cited documents were in Polish; the most cited sociologist on the national list ranked far lower in the SSCI and vice-versa; SSCI lack in coverage of Chinese and Indian social science, etc. These results show that the SSCI and national literatures represent partially overlapping, yet different worlds.

2. Recent approaches towards social sciences research evaluation, in Romania

World scientific publications in "Economics" and related area have experienced the greatest growth during 2005 - 2010. Globalisation gave a good impetus to "Management", "Business, Finance" and "Social Sciences" fields of sciences. Consequently, these fields increased by over 30 world journals each. Social & Behavioural sciences had one of the highest rates of growth that is 31%.[4] Romania is represented in Social and Behavioral sciences for the first time during 2005-2010, with 10 journals coverage.

Fig.nr.1

	SPAIN	BRAZIL	AUSTRALIA	POLAND	TURKEY	ITALY	FRANCE	CHINA	S KOREA	JAPAN	INDIA	ROMANIA	CROATIA	S AFRICA
2010 Covg	166	132	189	142	75	181	283	145	99	237	113	60	61	68
Added 2005- 2010	112	105	97	85	68	65	62	62	62	61	60	52	47	41
2005 Covg	54	27	92	57	7	116	221	83	37	176	53	8	14	27

Source : James Testa : The Globalization of Web of Science:2005-2010, Thomson Reuters, June 2011 , p.4

Recently, Romania has also increased its performance in scientific publications. The number of articles published and monitored by the Web of Science by Romania's researchers increased from 8,228 articles in 2000 to 11,739 in 2010. At the same time, it has been the increase of the number of Romanian journals, which are monitored by the Web of Science from 8 in 2005 to 60 in 2010, that is higher international visibility of Romanian researchers. Despite this, Romanian researchers still mainly publish in "national international journals", but Romania has become more international. On average, a country is expected to have 10% of its publications among the top 10% most cited ones worldwide but for Romania it is too early to have such high international performance[5].

Given the path-dependency character and the specific evolution of the social sciences in Romania, the issue of science and scientist evaluation would have required a sound substantiation based not only on recent international practice but, also, on the rich literature available on the matter and on the past experience of other more advanced countries regarding R&D performance, scientific visibility and expertise (1, 6). This would allow for avoiding potential pitfalls hidden in evaluation criteria less adequate for social sciences, or uncorrelated to the specific of the Romanian context.

The good intentions of policy makers and the optimistic expectations that drew forward the recent radical reform in the policy of scientific activity evaluation haven't been completely confirmed in the aftermath. The scientific community support has also been lower than expected[6].

[4] James Testa : The Globalization of Web of Science:2005-2010, Thomson Reuters, June 2011

[5] Technolpolis Group: Mid –term Evaluation of the National Strategy and of the National RD&I Plan 2007-2013, Final Report, 23 January, 2012.

[6] "Rapidly improving, but many of the research institutes and university research groups still don't perform well, even though there was a significant slug of extra money between 2005 and 2008. The money did not necessarily get distributed to the best people, and academic positions don't necessarily go to the best people either. Some academics tend to hold several powerful positions at once, and this results in potential conflicts of interest. Scientific nepotism still exists. We need more input from Romanian scientists abroad and an influx of the best international practices. I know Scientometric criteria were mostly applied for the project proposals evaluation within the Excellence Programme in 2005. In 2011, new criteria, very demanding and setting high standards, were used in evaluation of the applications for projects financed through the national programme IDIAS. These criteria sets requiring ISI indexed articles and books available at minimum 3 to 12 European or OECD Universities' libraries, were the same for all projects proposals, no matter the scientific area they may have belonged to. This undifferentiated approach brought forth protests and criticism, especially from the arts, social and humanists scientists (3, 11, 12).

Romanian Government has approved new standards and methodologies for evaluation in social sciences, having in view specific indicators for each field of social sciences, in order to implement the requirements of the National Education Law (number 1/ 2011). While the literature suggests that the application of bibliometric techniques is at least questionable in a number of social science disciplines, it seems that, according to the Romanian criteria, a social scientist should be evaluated by very exigent scientometric criteria.

The minimal standards regarding the scientific performance required for designation of academic titles and distinctions in higher education, professional degrees and ability certificate for scientific fields were published in three Ministerial Orders pertaining to the Ministry of Education, Youth and Sports [7]. These ministerial acts take into consideration scientific work published in journals indexed in international recognized data bases, as well as books and book / volume chapters, conference proceedings published by international prestigious publishing houses.

It is noteworthy that the indicators used for the appraisal of economic scientists research activity – necessary for being designated with academic or research degree – are very different compared to other social science fields. While for the other social disciplines the indicators applied are numerous (between 20 for Psychology and 22 for Juridical and Military sciences, some of them more easier to be accomplished), the criteria for Economics and Business Administration evaluation are restrictive, based on publications of high originality in ISI indexed journals with Impact Factor higher than 0,25, or, in other journals indexed in prestigious special data bases. In order to be appreciated for conference participation, the author needs to present the evaluation reports of the scientific referees that evaluate the paper before publishing the proceedings (with a prestigious publishing house). Moreover, the author must prove that his paper, directly presented at international conferences, has been commented within the Conference works, by at least a scientific referee designated by organizers and acknowledged in the Conference program. Self-citations, or half-self citations are not considered; other citations have to be made in ISI or other journals indexed in at least 3 international data-base, or in books and volumes published at internationally acknowledged publishing houses and only in English, French, German, Italian or Spanish.

Specific historical context of the economic science evolution in Romania cannot and shouldn't be overlooked. Given the political impact over this scientific field before 1989, through the requirements regarding the research themes and the restrictions imposed to international collaborations and publications, the collaboration of the Romanian scientist from economic and social field with the international one were very poor. Even if the situation has significantly improved within the last years, the evaluations criteria are too exigent compared to the past evolution and, even, to those imposed to economic researchers in other European countries. Time is needed for proper alignment to the new standards and exigency.

---

how science needs to be managed. I know the nuts and bolts of a scientific career and how to recognize the best research, worthy of funding from public resources. I am also a big fan of private research. People, who were used to getting money, even though their results were humdrum, are angry. They know they can't convince me that what they are doing is important if it isn't. I hope that most of the dynamic scientific community supports my attitude"(Interview of minister of Education, Research, Youth and Sport, Daniel Funeriu for the NatureNews , 12 January 2011).

[7] Order 4478 / 23 iunie 2011 for mathematics, natural, engineer and biomedical sciences, Order 4691 / 26 july 2011 for social sciences, Order 4692 / 29 july 2011 for humanists and arts.

Social sciences should be considered not only of intrinsic scientific merit in itself but as an indispensable tool for improving the quality life and as an engine for economic recovery and growth. Therefore, the spending of public funds in this field of sciences must be justified not only by scientific scientometric indicators but also by the quality of answers to the needs of economy and society .The educational impact of the social and economic research on the individuals and society could be grater when we take into consideration research result published in national review than the articles published in prestigious international reviews.

One obvious way to accomplish this requirement and introduce a real evaluation in the Romanian social science is to use an adequate system of indicators, combining scientometric indicators with other qualitative indicators that could measure national impact and visibility of research results for the present and for the future.

Consequently, new procedures must be built based on strengths and weaknesses of existing system of evaluation with enhanced dialogues between scientists and policy and social science managers, using bottom up and top down procedures of evaluation. Mutual learning from experiences used by different other countries could help in this process.

It may be difficult to evaluate the return of social sciences in strict economic terms but collateral, intangible benefits, discovering many business opportunities or ways for economic and social activity improving, recommendations for increasing the living standard of the people need to be taken into account when we evaluate social sciences output.

On the other side, social scientists , especially those from the economic and social fields, must change their behavior and demonstrate flexibility and an increasing capacity for adopting reactively and proactively to the new conditions and demands of the economy and society, especially in this difficult period of economic crisis.

3. Conclusions

1. Setting guidelines and standards, delineating integrated system of evaluation criteria for scientific research have been meant to encourage researchers to improve the quality and visibility of their scientific contributions.

2. The literature of evaluation in the S&T field and the experience of other advanced countries urge caution in indiscriminate and excessive use of scientometric evaluation criteria, especially regarding social sciences research. Bibliometric, SSCI based evaluations, even if recently more reasonable and relevant, remain partial and misleading, as they would neglect the integrative picture of the economic and social science, with its important contributions to understanding and serve their national human communities and societies.

3. With the view of shrinking the gap between the national and European R&D performance, of convergence towards the quality of the European scientific output, a complex set of procedures, standards, criteria and principles, internationally applied, have been adopted within the Romanian research system.

4. The evaluation criteria for social sciences are not fully adapted to the specific context of the Romanian scientific culture and community, to the specific of the social science area. The evaluation methodology and procedures contain very exigent and inadequate scientometric criteria for Social Sciences and the most exigent of them are for Economic Sciences.

5. It is, therefore, strongly recommended in the literature, that the bibliometric evaluation of SS be supplemented by other means of evaluation. Even though they involve higher costs, efforts and time, they would carry more relevance and reliability, avoiding the scientific research behavior alteration that would be detrimental to the very social science mission.

References

- ANEP, 2007, Evaluation Criteria for Social Sciences R&D, Social Sciences Working Group, nov. 2007 www.micinn.es/stfls/MICINN/.../9.3_criterios-evaluacion-ccss3_EN.pdf .
- Burnhill, P. M., Tubby-Hille M. E., 1994, On Measuring the Relation between Social Science Research Activity and Research Publication. Research Evaluation, 4, 3, 130-152.
- Dobrescu C., 2011, Coarnele birocratiei pe capul societatii civile, Observator Cultural nr 592 / 16 spetembrie 2011
- Economic and Social Research Council, www.sussex.ac.uk/Users/sylvank/pubs/ESRC.pdf
- Hicks D., 2006, The Dangers of Partial Bibliometric Evaluation in the Social Sciences, Economia Politica, XXIII, n. 2 August, pp. 145-162.
- Lamont M., 2005, Peer Evaluation in the Social Sciences and the Humanities Compared: the United States, the United Kingdom, and France, Report prepared for the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada
- Satyanarayana K., 2010, Impact Factor and other Indices to Assess Science, Scientists and Scientific Journals, Invited Article in Indian J. Physiol Pharmacol 2010, 54(3), pp 197-212
- Schoepflin, U., 1990, Problems of Representativity in the Social Sciences Citation Index, Weingart, P. Sehringer, R., Winterhager, M. (Eds.), Representations of Science and Technology, Proceedings of the International Conference on Science and Technology Indicators, Bielefeld, Germany, 10-12 June, 1992 (pp. 177-188) Leiden: DSWO Press.
- Van Leeuwen Th., 2006, The application of bibliometric analyses in the evaluation of social science research. Who benefits from it, and why it is still feasible, Scientometrics , Akadémiai Kiadó, Budapest and Springer, Dordrecht (sci…)
- Webster, B.M.,1998, Polish Sociology Citation Index as an Example of Usage of National Citation Indexes in Scientometric Analysis of Social Science. Journal of Information Science, 24, 1, 19-32.
- Alarma: Inegalitate flagranta in criteriile de evaluare ale Minsiterului Educatiei, Observator Cultural, 592, 16 septembrie 2011
- Zamfir C., 2011, Evaluarea in stiintele sociale: o schimbare necesara de perspectiva, Revista Inovatia Sociala nr 2/2011, http://inovatiasociala.ro/index.php/jurnal/article/view/111

THE WAY OF PROCESSING DATA IN APPROACHING ECONOMIC APPLICATIONS

ADRIAN GHENCEA[*]
OANA SIMONA HUDEA[]
DANA-FLORENTA SIMION[]

Abstract
Economic Informatics originates in the industry economy and the electronic processing of information. A clear distinction is made between IT and economic informatics, and further between general and particular economic informatics (the particular economic informatics meaning administration, industrial informatics etc). Economic informatics is deemed to be an applicative science relating to the conception, working modality and representation of IT and communication systems, oriented towards companies which are using electronic computers.
This paper pursues to integrate applications allowing the information systems to interconnect at informational level, by information sharing, and at service level, considering the control of the related processes in real time.

Keywords*: information systems, economic applications, integration, XML, CRM (Customer Relationship Management)*

Introduction

The paper approaches a current theme that takes into account data and information processing which may lead to economic applications development using a series of latest technologies.

Technologies such as XML, HTML, CRM allow the achievement of integrated systems, giving efficiency in user's activity. The revealed text analyses a series of specialized papers, emphasizing and comparing the advantages and disadvantages of the shown systems.

The modern management of the activity of a trading company is unthinkable without being grounded on sufficient information. Obtaining timely and top quality information implies using the e-computing technology on a wide scale. The quality of the decisions made to ensure the proper course of the economic activity ultimately depends on the quality of the information that the upper management operates with, and on their ability to analyze it.

Paper content

We could state that, in terms of management, information is the bearer of news about the economic phenomena and processes taking place inside or outside a company, but relating to it, such information being used in business analysis and decision making.

Information is the output of an entire range of primary data processing occurring as result of the carrying out of a trading company's activity.

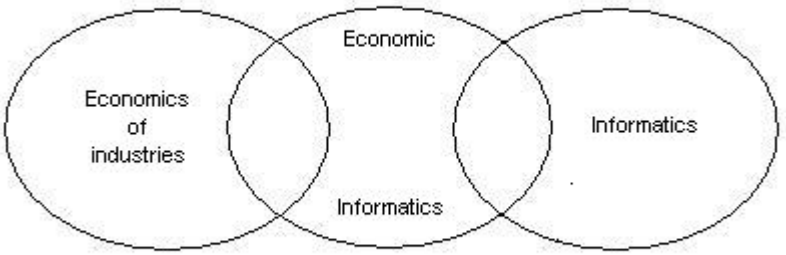
---

[*] Ph. D. Assistant Lecturer, "Titu Maiorescu" University, Bucharest (email: adighencea@gmail.com).
[] Ph. D. candidate of the Academy of Economic Studies, Bucharest - This work was co-financed from the European Social Fund through Sectorial Operational Programme Human Resources Development 2007-2013; project number POSDRU/107/1.5/S/77213 „Ph. D. for a career in interdisciplinary economic research at the European standards".
Ph. D. Assistant Lecturer. at "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: caraman_simmy2005@yahoo.com).
[] Ph. D. Assistant Lecturer, „Titu Maiorescu" University, Bucharest (email: danaflorenta.simion@gmail.com).

The processing activity turns data into a useful form, endowing them with additional knowledge. In terms of the processing cycle, information represents the outcome of data processing, designed to be used in the management and decision flows.

Seen as a means of knowledge, information represents a news-story, a signal reflecting the state of a system or of the environment within which it operates, and bringing added value.

As information results from data processing, we could say that it means nothing else than the final product of such process.



Picture 1 Fields of Economic Informatics

Programming languages, techniques and methods have known a tremendous boost since the appearance of computers until nowadays, due to the need to respond to the continuing increase in number and complexity of miscellaneous issues to be settled and therefore, implicitly, of the related programs. Thus, programming has evolved from the initial stage of introducing notions directly in binary code, and continued with the advent of assembling languages allowing the symbolic representation of instructions for computer.

The main issues arising in data integration process are generated by:

The use of multiple data sources resorting to different versions of data representation,

The necessity to synchronize in time the data taken over from different sources

The use of non-conventional data,

The ad-hoc connections to be made between different types of data or between different software applications.

Unconventional data are not standardized, semi-structured and newly defined within applications data, data with a dynamic structure or changeable in time. Given the specific characteristics of unconventional data, it is extremely difficult, and sometimes even impossible, to define general rules, universally accepted, for handling and using such types of data in software applications.

The distributed application is that application running on multiple computers simultaneously so as to improve the application performance and scalability.

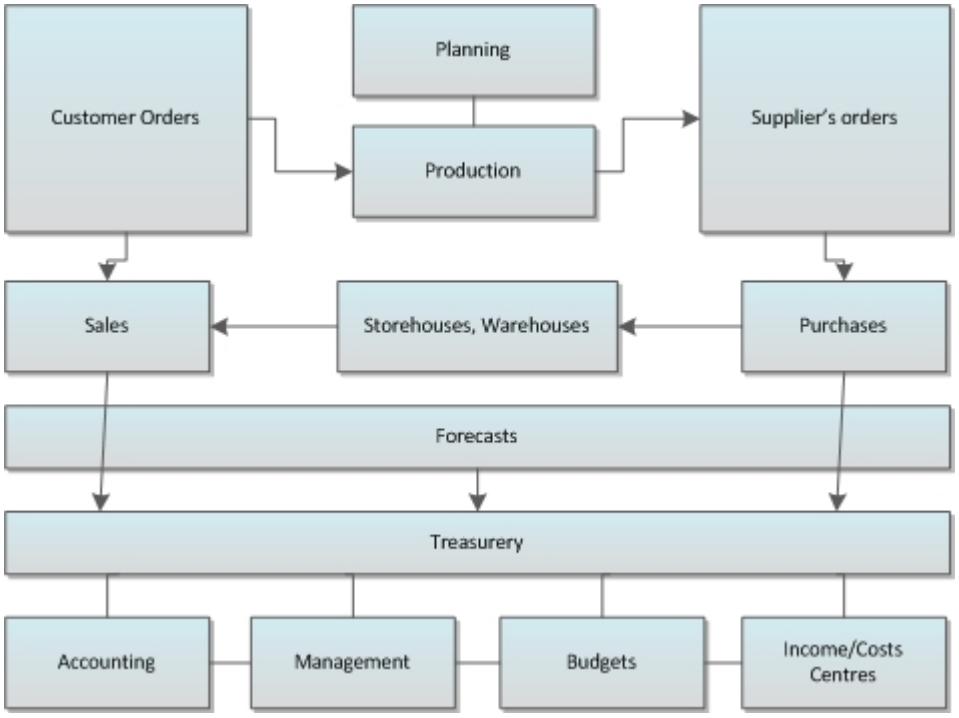
The use of distributed architectures for the development of economic applications offers several advantages, namely:

The provision of the application with automatic scalability, by adding other computers to the system,

The possibility to integrate applications running in different environments, on different platforms or operating systems,

The possibility to synchronize and to allow real-time communication between multiple clients,

The possibility to support poor computer systems in terms of technical characteristics to ensure the hardware resources required to run the related applications.

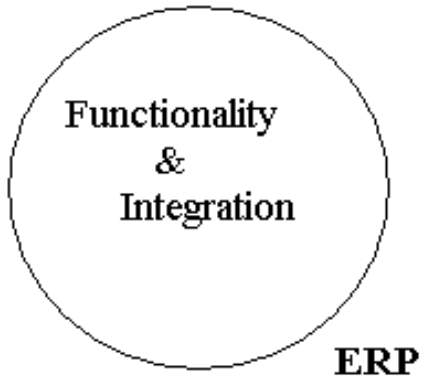


Picture 2 Flow of data exchange between a company's departments

The accelerated changes in the business environment and the increase in complexity of the activities carried out by companies impose a permanent adjustment of the effort and analysis capabilities of the human being.

Able to process a large volume of data and aggregated information in order to optimize processes and to render them more efficient, the ERP systems have been created as a solution to such challenges. The main idea relating to the development of software applications for enterprise systems consists in their evolutionary nature[1].

[1] Lungu, Ion Integrarea sistemelor informatice,(IT Systems Integration), A.S.E. Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007



Picture 3 Fundamental Properties of ERP

Integration ensures the connectivity between the flows of functional economic processes. It may be construed as a communication technique. Here are some common ways in which communication takes place through and for integration: source code, extensive local networks of computers, Internet, e-mail, workflow, automated configuration tools, protocols and databases. We could state that integration is achieved through communication, and communication is achieved through integration.

The functional part of an ERP system ensures the flows of economic processes within each function. Therefore, in an ERP sequence we can find from several to tens of functional modules (general accounting, debtors, payroll, inventory, supply, production planning, logistics and sales orders).

Data integration combines the basic elements of data management systems, content management systems, data warehouses and other enterprise applications, bringing them altogether into a common platform.

Development of XML-based applications

XML is a relatively new technology. Still, this does not prevent it to impose itself almost in all branches of information technology. Obviously, since XML has become a usable component of computerization, business might also be useful.

Less than a year after its release, XML has impressed many developers and users. Currently, XML is becoming increasingly popular and irreplaceable. In 1998 the international organization W3C has strengthened the XML specification as "Extensible Markup Language (XML) 1.0. This meant green light for the development and implementation of XML.

It is clear that HTML and XML documents are based on the same structure using tags. But the functions of these two languages are quite different.

HTML	XML
Used to display data	Used to carry on data
Used to visually define data	Used to describe data
Used to show how data are displayed	Used to show how data are used

Table 1 HTML – XML Differences

The above table reveals that XML is working with data definition and transportation. An eloquent example would be the one described below, where we determine information relating to a physical entity. If we described the given information in a relational database, it would look like below:

Name	James
Surname	John
Date of Birth	07.23.1985
Height	179

The weakness of the above-described information is that it can be processed only by database management systems, which, most often, are incompatible.

From HTML to XML

The two languages have been created for different purposes:

XML was designed to describe data and to focus on their structure;
HTML was designed to display data and to focus on their design.

The XML Objectives are reflected by the following characteristics:
Simple to use on Internet;
Able to support a wide variety of applications;
Compatible with SGML (Standard Generalized Markup Language);
Fit for easy writing of programs processing XML documents;
Designable quickly, formally and concisely.

The XML data can be used in HTML language and allow a rapid identification of documents via the search engines. By means of codes such as javascript, php etc., the XML files can be embedded in web pages, the most notable example being the RSS system that uses an XML file to carry on information from one web page to several web pages.

Advantages of XML:
Extensibility (new indicators can be defined, if necessary)
Validity (the data structural accuracy can be assessed)
Facility for users to represent their data independently of applications
Simple and accessible (they are text files created to structure, store and transport information)
Easy to edit and modify (it only requires a simple text editor such as Notepad, WordPad, etc.).

XML language provides a method of inter-human communication, not of data interchangeability between machines, therefore creating relationships between the designers and the beneficiaries of their documents. XML inherits the neutrality of the platform and speech, and the liberty of the data present in SGML.

All these remarks indicate us that XML provides users with an information markup open standard, without limits in terms of annotation techniques (provided extensibility), easy to use (able to support knowledge databases) and easy to implement.

The future of XML will impact not only the IT employees, but also the political and economic world. The combination of XML with XSL could replace all current formats of text processing and publishing:

A unique format for Web posting and printing;

A common format for storing data in various software products;

A single format for all languages.

The success of XML can be foreseen both as regards Web, where is allows the creation of extensible multimedia applications, and as regards the information processing in general.

Application development using the concept of CRM (Customer Relationship Management)

The CRM application is a dedicated solution for customer relationship management which offers: direct support for developing business strategies and the ability to connect front-office and back-office roles into a complete customer oriented business solution. Also, the ability to collect and analyze information, to be able to anticipate customer needs and build a profitable and long-term relationship is another important feature of this type of software solution.

The sharply increasing transition of "traditional" business towards electronic media has brought along important mutations in the crucial field of relationship administration between companies and their customers. The Customer Relationship Management (CRM) is now one of the fashionable concepts in the new digital economy, but it is hardly an innovation of recent years. Historically, the relationship between the customer and those who provided a particular product or service has arisen since the first customer. This relationship has been managed over time in the most different ways, yet using the "traditional" methods, which implied direct contact between a company's sales representatives and its customers. As until recently a letter, a catalog sent by mail, a phone call, or an elegant restaurant were "tools" more than sufficient to maintain a close relationship of loyalty with the customer, things have changed with the appearance of the Internet. What the digital revolution brought along was an unprecedented widening of a company's customer base, and thus, almost an exponential growth of the problems involved in dealing with them.

The CRM has become a priority for the companies that have sought to have an advantage in today's stormy economy. Worse now, even if they invest hundreds and thousands, if not millions of dollars in CRM, most companies are not closer then before than when the system appeared.

The Customer Relationship Management can be defined in the following ways:

Strategy for selecting and maintaining the customers so that their value to the firm is optimal; it involves a business philosophy that puts the customer at the center, through all the processes; the success is possible if and only if the leading team, the strategy and the organizational appropriate culture act simultaneously;

A process of implementing a business strategy that places the customer at the center, which, in a "chain reaction" determines to redefine all the functional activities - this implies new work processes, possible only by using information technology;

"Super-class" of business models, processes, methodologies, interactive technologies, to achieve a high retention rate of clients belonging to identifiable groups of customers with great value for business and growth potential;

Extension of the concept of selling as an ongoing process, considered both art and science, to collect and use customer information in order to "educate" their loyalty - which is impossible without the use of appropriate technology;

A concept of development and implementation of business strategies and related technology support, to eliminate the difference between the actual and the possible acquisition level, the development and maintenance of customer relationship - which improves the efficiency of assets;

A timely process for enlarging and applying the knowledge (and not necessarily of data storage) on a client, leading to the individualization of acquired strategies and business to meet the personalized needs of each client;

Specific management approach that places the customer at the center of the business processes and practices, the purpose of this approach being the increase in the profit and productivity;

The management of all interactions with the customers, with the purpose of expanding its customer base by bringing in new customers and meeting the needs of the existing ones;

A term specific to the information domain on potential methodologies, to the software packages offered and to the Internet, to help a company conduct customer relationships in an organized manner;

The "overall" approach that integrates the processes of receipt of orders, sales and service, which unifies and coordinates all the channels through which the customers interact with the company, that "something" which has most to do with customer satisfaction and, in fact, has nothing in common with technology and for which technology is only a means and not an end in itself;

A process to guide the entire company towards its outside, towards the clients, which involves understanding the customer needs and process management within the company to develop and maintain customer relations.

The information about the customers is the essence of CRM. Although the development and maintenance are important, clear and well structured data about the customers are vital. Unfortunately, many businesses do not pay enough attention to the importance of consistent and quality data. In fact a study by PriceWaterhouseCoopers showed how widespread are the data on quality problems in companies around the world.

Based on a survey of 600 mid-level companies in the U.S., Europe and Australia, the following conclusions were drawn:

70% of companies have recognized that insufficient data have a negative financial effect on the business. 50% added extra costs to reconcile the data.

30% have been forced to postpone investments in new systems because of data issues.

A company stated that data problems have caused a loss of $ 8 million only in one fiscal year.

Many leaders have considered the subject of data management companies as boring, until they realized how much is at stake. When a critical project can not come alive because of data problems or clarity, or when they realized how much it will cost to clean the institutionalized data, the negative effect of data neglecting became clear, and the responsible persons were notified.

More than money, poor quality data means low analysis and performance indicators which makes the management take appropriate decisions to get out of this impasse. When it comes to customer information, poor data quality can lead to problems that are no less critical. Each has a story about incorrect data related to customers. But the quality of customer data is no joke, they are absolutely necessary to develop and maintain operational CRM enterprise and analytical systems. Thus consistent and quality data are critical components of the CRM system.

Customers require easy and convenient access through the channels that they choose. Creating multiple points of contact with the customer is served is a prerequisite. Unfortunately, creating multiple points of contact increases the risk of appearing inconsistent interactions. In companies where we can not reconcile information about the same customer at various points of contact, dissatisfaction shows up.

The creation of a single universal database is, unfortunately, not feasible for most large companies because of differences in portfolio applications and associated databases. However, an integrated view, and a multi-channel on the customer is feasible and represents one of the main advantages of the CRM applications. To achieve this, these applications must be integrated pragmatically, using intermediate components with intermediate applications, each dealing with a portion of data collection.

A well organized target reduces the development effort necessary to document and code the interfaces between systems, reducing duplication in technology integration, and shortening the time required to change existing applications.

Definition of customer transactions can vary widely between business-to-business (B2B) and business-to-consumer (B2C). In B2B customers are the companies and their customers, and B2C client is usually an individual, but can be a family.

The next step is to inventory the available sources of data, determining where to collect data from internal sources or whether they will be obtained from external sources. To create an analytical view, the data must be extracted from various sources, converted into consistent and usable information, and then loaded into the analytical data structures. Tools for extracting, transforming and loading (ETL) can be used for this. They are driven by data sets and have a strong support for meta-data. In addition to collecting the data from internal sources, methods to fill in the external uncovered gaps should be available.

CRM Implementation

Alone, the CRM is not a technology, but a process of collection and retention of customer information and their interactions with the company. CRM implementation tends to be a complicated and expensive test. It is estimated that during the next two years, 2,000 companies will have to spend $ 250 million each on CRM solutions. While money is exhausted, many companies have not been able to determine what kind of return on investment they obtain in their system, beyond the obvious data.

A recent study by Andersen Consulting is seeking direct correlation between CRM and the business income. Typically a billion $ turnover could add $ 40 million profit would increase the CRM capacity by 10 percent. Besides this, the CRM increases performance and the business income.

Significantly, companies that have successfully implemented CRM solutions do not see CRM as an IT project driven away from a specific department - that is, they see CRM as a broad initiative. Most CRM implementations have been fragmented, put into operation in a department without an over viewing perspective. Similarly, the CRM software needed to be transferred to all levels throughout their organization. Marketing will be able to formulate responses and to provide the results of specific promotions or campaigns across the customer segments. The employee dealing with customer relations will be able to provide superior customer support and satisfaction services.

When talking about the technologies used to achieve the implementation of CRM system, we must first refer to the server level of the CRM. Thus the operating system on which the CRM system developed is Microsoft Windows 2000 Server and the IIS Web server is used. The application is developed in MS Visual Studio.NET Framework and the Server software is MS Framework 1.1

SDK. CRM customers that will benefit from this application should have as 2k/NT Windows operating system and IE5.

The dynamic information accessed in/through the CRM interface information will be considered as "functional" (interface elements such as labels, Message box sites, input fields sites) and "business" information (data about customers, products).

The support for the "functional" data consists in a MS SQL Server database. These data allow direct access from the interface through a ADO.net. connection. The business information is accessed through predefined Web services.

Advantages of CRM

The impact on the cost and quality data

Using data integration solutions (CDI) can produce a significant return on investment (ROI). Benefits of the CDI are:

Better cross-selling and up-selling "(facilitated by an improvement in the modeling and better targeting of the customers)

Improving customer retention (achieved by avoiding worn out customers)

Improving attracting new customers

Competitive advantage through CRM

The CRM is defined as a strategy to manage customer relationship and interaction with them in the most profitable way possible for both. There are several providers of operational CRM solutions that enable traditional CRM implementation strategies. These typical strategies are supported by solutions focused on how the services, sales and marketing of more effective departments should be made, this increasing the profitability of such organizations and of their customers.

Conclusions

Web services and applications are emerging as a key technology for conducting automated interactions between distributed and heterogeneous applications and for connecting various business processes.

At software and hardware level, technology integration is the main phrase for the current IT products. Thus, the various existing technologies allow an interaction with outstanding results between databases and web services.

ICT infrastructures containing databases, large volumes of data, OLAP, Java turn into web platforms, therefore hardware decreasing in relevance.

A series of advantages of IT integration and interaction are outlined below:

Diminishing of implementation, exploitation, conversion and other hidden costs;

Increasing of data security due to the submission to common restrictions;

Diminishing of the complexity of different technologies;

Avoidance of scalability-related problems;

Avoidance of issues relating to the implementation and management of different software products by using a single product;

Obvious evolution of end users.

References

- J. Data, An Introduction to Database Systems (Addison Wesley, 2004)
- Gomadam K, A Faceted Classification-Based Approach to Search and Rank Web APIs (IEEE International Conference on Web Services, IEEE Press, 2008).
- I. Lungu, IT Systems Integration (Bucharest, Economic Study Academy, 2007)
- M.P. Papazoglou, D. Georgakopoulos, „Service Oriented Computing", Communications of the ACM, vol. 46, no. 10: 24-28.
- M. Stanescu, General Informatics (Bucharest, Titu Maiorescu University, 2004).
- „QuickStudy: Application Programming Interface (API)", Computerworld, January 10, 2000, http://www.computerworld.com/action/article.do?command=viewArticleBasic&articleId=43487
- „Definition of API", PCMag, http://www.pcmag.com/encyclopedia_term/0,2542,t= application+ programming+ interface&i=37856,00.asp.
- „Mashup Dashboard", ProgramableWeb, http://www.programmableweb.com/mashups
- „Software development methodology", Wikipedia, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Software_development_ methodology

HOW TO SUSTAIN ECONOMIC PERFORMANCE? ECONOMIC GROWTH AND ITS IMPACT FACTORS

OANA SIMONA HUDEA (CARAMAN)*

Abstract

This paper intends to render several important factors of impact on economic growth and to describe the particular types of relationships of the latter with each one of its influencing elements. In order to correctly determine such issue, we have resorted to three carefully selected models that have been estimated and compared so as to identify the most adequate and representative regression. For this purpose we have performed an analysis based on cross-section annual data for 105 countries spread all over the world. After having tested and rejected certain exogenous variables initially considered, such as imports or exports, we have finally retained the external debt and foreign direct investments as explanatory items of the dependent variable. The results revealed that both of them positively affect the gross domestic product of the analysed countries, this one being inelastic in relation to the exogenous variables considered. Even if the relationship between the economic growth and the external debt of a country is usually negative, as the money exit out of the country due to the debt service causes non-achieved potential investments, yet, there is an inflexion point up to which the external debt has a positive influence on economic growth by the increase of the investments funds acquired as result of the external credit contracting, this being the case reflected by our study. As for the relationship existing between foreign direct investments and GDP, the economic theory confirms that FDI and economic growth are directly correlated, the former contributing to technical progress, production increase and, finally, to the improvement of the living standard.

Keywords*: economic growth, external debt, FDI, causal relationship, economic modelling*

1. Introduction

The present study based on cross-section annual data for 105 countries all over the world is destined to render various essential issues on the economic growth phenomenon and to provide a sound analysis of several important influencing factors of it.

As reflected by the economic theory, economic growth means the increase of the real GDP from a period to another one and indicates the living standard and well being of a society. Considering this, the identification of the key factors significantly impacting on economic growth and the decryption of their related relationships becomes essential is proposing and adopting the best possible economic policies. These influencing elements cover a large range, comprising, among others, without limitation, investment, unemployment rate, budgetary deficit, exports, imports, governmental expenses, external debt or population increase. Given their variety, we have undertaken to introduce them separately into models and to further render our analysis increasingly complex.

Therefore, we have started our study, by resorting to only one explanatory variable, meaning external debt. Later on, after having calibrated the model, we have introduced other exogenous items: foreign direct investments, exports and imports. After having considered several issues described hereinafter, we have finally selected for estimations the equations below:

* Ph. D. candidate of the Academy of Economic Studies, Bucharest - This work was co-financed from the European Social Fund through Sectorial Operational Programme Human Resources Development 2007-2013; project number POSDRU/107/1.5/S/77213 „Ph. D. for a career in interdisciplinary economic research at the European standards"

Ph. D. Assistant Lecturer, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: caraman_simmy2005@yahoo.com).

$\log_{gdp08} = \alpha + \beta_1 * \log_{dat08} + \varepsilon$
$\log_{gdp08} = \alpha + \beta_1 * \log_{dat08} + \beta_2 * \log_{inv08} + \varepsilon$
$\log_{gdp08} = \alpha + \beta_1 * \log_{dat08} + \beta_2 * \log_{inv08} + \beta_3 * \log_{exp08} + \varepsilon$

The relationship between the economic growth and the external debt of a country is, basically, negative, considering the opportunity cost relating to the money exit out of the country due to the debt service, this rendering non-achieved potential investments. Yet, there is an inflexion point, an optimum level up to which the external debt has a positive influence on economic growth by the increase of the investments funds acquired as result of the external credit contracting. In this case, it is important to see whether the investment yield is sufficient to cover the long-run debt service rate, so that the leverage should not reverse once the reimbursements begins. In order to achieve a positive impact of the external debt on growth, an efficient and comprehensive debt strategy is absolutely necessary.

In respect of foreign direct investment, these ones are usually deemed to be one of the major catalysts to economic growth, therefore the relationship between such variables being positive. Yet, the benefits obtained via FDI do not accrue automatically and evenly across countries. The characteristics of host country economy and industry largely affect the FDI impact on growth in developing economies. FDI has a favorable influence on economic performance as it reduces the gap between the existing production level and a steady state production border and besides, it comes with built-in advanced technologies and last hour knowledge from more developed countries. But, if the target country doesn't have a high absorption capacity so as to take advantage from what powerful nations provide, all such advantages might vanish.

The debates regarding the export - economic growth relationship have mainly revealed a positive connection between these two items, as exports can help the country to harmonize with the world economy and to reduce the impact of external shocks on the domestic economy. Also, exports help domestic production in achieving a high level of economies of scale.

In view of rendering this paper as clear as possible, we have decided to structure it into six sections, as follows: Introduction in section 1 (the current section), a brief Literature Review which appears in section 2, followed by the description of Data in section 3, the presentation of the Methodology and Empirical Results in section 4, Conclusions in section 5 and, finally, Suggestions for Further Research in section 6.

2. Literature review

The analysis of the relationship existing between economic growth and its various influencing factors represents one of the main topics of interest approached by economists all over the world.

The relationship between the total external debt and the GDP growth rate is carefully examined by Patillo et al. (2002, 2004). They analysed 61 developing countries, for the period 1969-1998 and discovered a backward bending growth curve with a debt-growth positive relationship at low levels of national debt and negative relationship at high levels, thus indicating us that the debt-overhang effects might occur only after having reached a certain threshold. Clements et al. (2003) resorted to the generalised method of moments with fixed effects econometric technique, applied on data for 55 low-income countries, over the period 1970–1999, in order to render the channels through which economic growth is affected by external debt in the analysed countries. They evidenced that a high decrease in external debt for heavily indebted poor countries might determine an increase per capita income growth and might contribute to economic growth by their effects on public investments. The analysis of Hameed et al. (2008) was directed towards the long-run and short-run relationships between external debt and economic growth. In this respect, they made appeal to annual data collected for Pakistan during 1970-2003. The debt service ratio proved to have a negative impact on GDP translated into a decrease of the economic growth rate in the long-run, with adverse consequences as for the capacity of the country to service its debt. Also, the estimated error correction term indicated a significant long-run causal relationship among the said variables. Reinhart and Rogoff (2010) used in their study 3,700 yearly observations for 44 countries covering about 200 years and drew the conclusion that the relationship between government debt and real GDP growth is weak for debt-GDP ratios below a threshold of 90% of GDP, while, above 90%, median growth rates fall by 1%, and average growth falls considerably more. As regards the emerging markets, there are lower thresholds for public and private external debt: when external debt reaches 60% of GDP, annual growth decreases by about 2%; for higher levels, growth rates are roughly cut in half.

The idea emerging from most of the studies regarding the influence of FDI on economic growth is that the developing countries should provide a supportive business environment and should have reached a minimum level of economic development before they can capture the FDI growth-enhancing effects. Alfaro et al. (2003) revealed, by using cross-section data between 1975-1995 for various OECD and non-OECD countries, that FDI causes economic growth only if the the target countries benefit from well developed financial markets. Countries should be interested not only in attracting FDI but also in improving their local conditions, as in this way, on one hand many foreign companies could be attracted and, on the other hand, the host economies would have the possibility to optimize their foreign investment-related benefits. Kinoshita and Lu (2006) carried out an empirical study based on a reduced form approach, in their panel data analysis for 42-non OECD countries. For them, infrastructure seems to be the one of the key elements in providing FDI efficiency. The central result is that FDI does not represent an economic growth driver by itself. The host country should undertake infrastructure investment before attracting FDI so as to maximize the incidence of technology spillovers from FDI. Lee, Chang (2009) applied panel cointegration techniques and panel error correction models for 37 countries for the period 1970-2002, based on annual data in order to explore directions of causality among FDI, financial development, and economic growth and revealed a strong long-run relationship. Besides, the financial development indicators proved to have a larger effect on economic growth than FDI. Overall, the findings underscored the potential gains associated with FDI when coupled with financial development in an increasingly global economy.

The export-economic growth correlation has been also approached by various authors. Jordaan (2007) focused on the causality relationship between exports and GDP of Namibia over the period 1970 – 2005, resorting for this purpose to Granger causality and cointegration analysis and concluded that exports influence GDP and GDP per capita and that the export-led growth strategy based on incentives has a positive influence on growth. Ullah et al. (2009) discovered a positive relationship between exports and economic performance when resorting to VEC models for time series from1970 to 2008 for Pakistan. The results indicated that there is uni-directional causality between economic growth, exports and imports. Besides, Granger causality through VEC is checked by means of F-value of the model and t-value of the error correction term, partly reconciling the traditional Granger causality test.

3. Data

In order to achieve our research, we have selected the following data series:

The gross domestic product in 2008 (gdp08) - expressed by GDP at PPP in USD, annual series taken over from the UNO database.

The external debt in 2008 (dat08) - represented by the credits contracted by authorities and by the economic agents from the banks reporting to IRB, corrected by the implicit index for passing to PPP standard, for comparability. These data have been annualised (given that the external debt series is quarterly) and they have been taken from UNO and IMF databases.

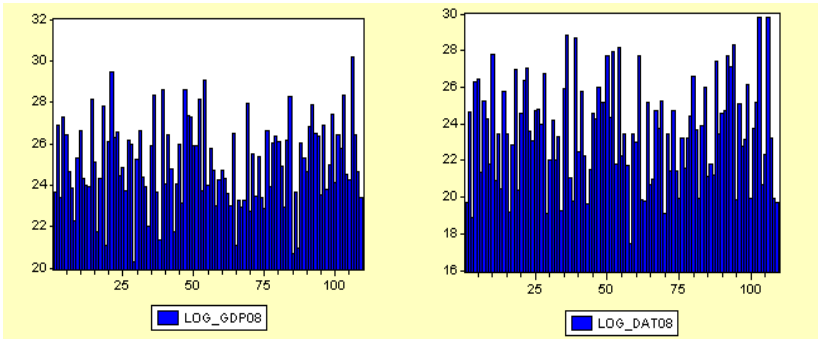
The foreign direct investments (I08), exports (EXP08) and imports (IMP08) in 2008 - computed based on the series of their percentage expression in GDP. These are annual series taken over from the UNO database.

The data correspond to the year 2008 and refer to the economic standing of 105 countries. This study is a continuation of the previously presented simple regression model.

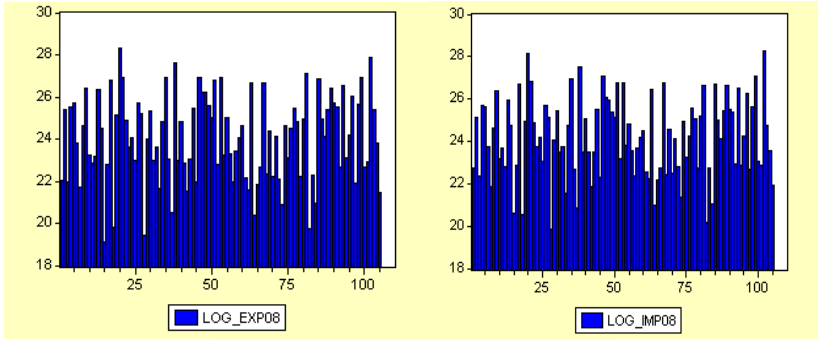
4. Methodology and Empirical Results

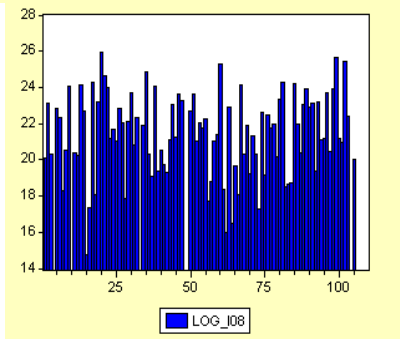
4.1. Data Descriptive Analysis

The graphic representation of the gross domestic product and of the external debt reveals the major differences between the analysed countries, even if these have been partly compensated by the logarithmic transformation performed. As for GDP, the differences indicate the distance separating the well developed countries from the poor ones. Such significant differences are also obvious in the case of the external debt series. We specify that this series is adjusted with the implicit index for passing to PPP standard and it comprises both external public debt and external private debt.



We have also rendered below the graphs specific to the three series in logarithm added to our previous analysis:





As noticed, the size differences preserve in this case too, but their amplitude is less significant for imports and exports. The foreign direct investment series also contains negative values, so that, by the logarithmic transformation, they have been turned to 0.

Correlation Matrix

	GDP08	DAT08	I08	EXP08	IMP08
GDP08	1.000000	0.717154	0.640893	0.791651	0.903491
DAT08	0.717154	1.000000	0.628806	0.529327	0.657320
I08	0.640893	0.628806	1.000000	0.794587	0.791705
EXP08	0.791651	0.529327	0.794587	1.000000	0.963921
IMP08	0.903491	0.657320	0.791705	0.963921	1.000000

According to the matrix of correlation coefficients, the import series is positively correlated to the export one, with a correlation coefficient very close to 1 value. Therefore, in order to avoid this phenomenon, we have decided to exclude the data series relating to imports from our analysis. Even if it has a higher correlation coefficient in relation to GDP than the export series, exports are theoretically deemed to have a superior influence on economic growth.

As for the other correlation coefficients, the estimations of the models by pairs have indicated that, the other variables being retained, no multi-collinearity phenomenon should occur.

4.2. Parameter Estimation by OLS

Model 1:

$\log_{gdp08} = \alpha + \beta_1 * \log_{dat08} + \varepsilon$

Comments based on model 1:

- The probability of F statistics and that of parameters α and β1 is 0%. Therefore, the parameters are significantly different from zero, and the eternal debt variable is correctly introduced in the model.

- F statistics = 215.7692 is higher than F with (P-1,T-P) freedom degrees and 5% significance level, whose critical value obtained from the specific table is F(2-1,105-2) = 3.936. This confirms the correct definition of the model (the explicative variable – external debt – is fit for explaining the behaviour of the GDP variable).

- The t-statistics value – computed for the parameter estimators – exceeds the one rendered for t critical value with (T-P) freedom degrees and a significance level of 5%; t (105-2)=1.645. It results that the external debt variable is relevant within the model.

- The adjusted R-squared is 67.37%, this meaning that our explanatory variable explains 67.37% of GDP variance.

The Durbin Watson (DW) statistics indicates a value of 2.235523, belonging to the interval (d2,4-d2)=(1.72 ; 4-1.72), meaning that the error series in uncorrelated. (d2 is extracted from the table considering k=2 parameters and T=105 data).

In order to improve this simple regression model, we have decided to add one more variable: foreign direct investments.

Model 2:

$\log_{gdp08} = \alpha + \beta_1 * \log_{dat08} + \beta_2 * \log_{i08} + \varepsilon$

Comments made based on model 2:

- The probability of F statistics and that of parameters α, β1 and β2 is 0%. Therefore, the parameters are significantly different from zero, and the explanatory variables are correctly introduced in the model.

- F statistics = 172.4927 is higher than F with (P-1,T-P) freedom degrees and 5% prag de significance level, whose critical value obtained from the specific table is F(3-1,105-3)=3.087. This confirms the correct definition of the model (at least one of the two explanatory variables – external debt or foreign direct investments is fit for explaining the behaviour of the GDP variable).

- The t-statistics values – computed for each estimator of the two parameters exceed the one rendered for t critical value with (T-P) freedom degrees and a significance level of 5%; t (105-3)=1.645. It results that both explanatory variables used are relevant within the model.

- The adjusted R-squared is 77.77%, this meaning that the three explanatory variables explain 77.77% of GDP variance.

The Durbin Watson (DW) statistics indicates a value of 2.242166, belonging to the interval (d2,4-d2)=(1.74 ; 4-1.74), meaning that the error series in uncorrelated. (d2 is extracted from the table considering k=3 parameters and T=105 data).

Subsequently, we have introduced a new explanatory variable in 2008, in order to render our model more complex.

Model 3:

$\log_{gdp08} = \alpha + \beta_1 * \log_{dat08} + \beta_2 * \log_{i08} + \beta_3 * \log_{exp08} + \varepsilon$

Comments based on model 3:

- Ads notices in Table 2.1, the variables $\log_{dat08}$ and $\log_{i08}$ are incorrectly introduced in the model, having probabilities 68.08%, respectively 17.53%.

- The probability of F statistics and that of parameter β3 is 0%; the probability of the intercept parameter is 3.03%, still it belongs to the interval 0-5%. Therefore, only β3 and α parameters significantly differ from zero, this meaning that just the exports explanatory variable is correctly introduced in the model.

- F statistics = 384.9854 is higher than F with (P-1, T-P) freedom degrees and 5% prag de significance level, whose critical value obtained from the specific table is F(4-1,105-4) = 2.696. This confirms the correct definition of the model (at least one of the three explanatory variables – external debt, foreign direct investments or exports is fit for explaining the behaviour of the GDP variable).

- The t-statistics values – computed for each estimator of the first two parameters are lower than the one rendered for t critical value with (T-P) freedom degrees and a significance level of 5%; t (105-4)=1,645. It results that the first two explanatory variables used are not relevant within the model. The t-statistics for the third parameter (13.308) exceeds the related critical value.

- The obtained adjusted R-squared is indeed higher than in previous models (92.16%), this meaning that the three explanatory variables explain 92.16% of GDP variance.

The Durbin Watson (DW) statistics indicates a value of 1.737297; this value do not belong any more to the interval (d2,4-d2)=(1.76 ; 4-1.76), meaning that the error series in auto-correlated. (d2 is extracted from the table considering k=4 parameters and T=105 data).

Table 2.1.

Indicators	Model 1	Model 2	Model 3	Model TSLS
Coeficient β1	0.610929	0.330684	0.016963	0.409588
Coeficient β2	-	0.460119	-0.078361	0.493743
Coeficient β3	-	-	1.027295	**-
t-statistic β1	14.68909	5.832822	0.412661	2.596898
t-statistic β2	-	6.718064	-1.365715	2.655667
t-statistic β3	-	-	13.30821	-
Prob1	0.0000	0.0000	0.6808	0.0109
Prob2	-	0.0000	0.1753	0.0093
Prob3	-	-	0.0000	-
Coeficient α	10.71861	7.390172	1.577747	4.824524
t-statistic α	10.95133	7.708104	2.198428	4.425868
Prob	0.0000	0.0000	0.0303	0.0000
R-squared	0.676882	0.782306	0.923997	0.764195
Adjusted R-squared	0.673745	0.777770	0.921597	0.759282
F-statistic	215.7692	172.4927	384.9854	186.0950
Prob F-statistic	0.0000	0.0000	0.0000	0.0000
Akaike	3.196818	2.836981	1.804859	**-
Schwartz	3.247370	2.915621	1.909713	-
Durbin-Watson	2.235523	2.242166	1.737297	2.150270

By analysing the table with centralized results for the three analysed models, we see that the third model cannot be considered due to the probabilities of the parameters β1 and β2 that exceed 5%. By comparing the first and the second model, we notice that the second one has a superior R-squared. In conclusion, model 2 is selected as the most appropriate of them.

4.3. Selected model parameter estimation by TSLS

As our analysis has started with data series at a given moment in time, delayed variables (t-1, t-2) would not have been an option for being used as instrumental variables. If we have used as instrumental variables exactly the explanatory ones: $\log_{dat08}$ and $\log_{i08}$, the same results as by means of OLS would have been obtained.

By using dat08 and i08 as instrumental variables, the results are close to those obtained by resorting to OLS, but the probabilities of the parameters β2 and β3 are 1.1%, respectively 4.55%. After several trials, we have decided to use as instrumental variables dat08, i08 and $\log_{exp08}$, for which the probabilities of parameters are: 1.09% for β1 and 0.93% for β3.

Comments made based on TSLS:

- All parameters have probabilities lower than 5%; therefore, the variables are correctly introduced in the model.
- As for OLS, in this case too the F and t statistics values exceed the critical ones taken from the related tables. Still, the adjusted R-squared decreases in TSLS as compared to OLS, from 77.77% to 75.93%.

4.4. Selected model autocorrelation and homoskedasticity hypotheses testing

4.4.1. Autocorrelation

The error autocorrelation has been rejected by the Durbin-Watson test for model 2 estimated by OLS. Yet, in order to strengthen this result, we have decided to use also the Breusch-Godfrey test.

The statistics BG = (T-P') * R² follows a distribution $\rightarrow \chi^2$ with P' freedom degrees and 5% significance level. It is also to be mentioned that P' represents the number of parameters contained in the model having as explained variable the resid series, obtained after having estimated model 2 (the analysed model), and as explanatory variables, the explanatory variables of model 2 completed by the delayed values of the endogenous variable:

$$\varepsilon_t = b_1 * \log_{dat08} + b_2 * \log_{i08} + a_1 * \varepsilon_{t-1} + a_2 * \varepsilon_{t-2} + a_2 * \varepsilon_{t-3}$$

In this model, we have P=3 parameters and T=105. P' is 2+3=5, so that the test statistics has the value:

$$BG = (105 - 5) * 0.22555 = 2.2555 < \chi^2_5 = 11.07$$

This statistics indicates us that we cannot reject the null hypothesis according to which the coefficients of the above-mentioned model are null, therefore model 2 presents no error autocorrelation.

4.4.2. Homoskedasticity

In order to test the error homoskedasticity, we have resorted to the White test implemented in Eviews.

The statistics W = T * R² follows a distribution χ^2 with 2*P freedom degrees, where R² is the determination ratio computed for one of the two regression models having the square of errors as explained variable and the square of the explanatory variables as explanatory variables, without cross terms, respectively with cross terms.

Without cross terms: W = 105 * 0.104471 = 10.969455 < W with 2*3 freedom degrees taken from the table = 12,592 => the null hypothesis, according to which the data are homoskedastic, is accepted.

With cross terms: W = 105 * 0.113288 = 11.89524 < W with 2*3 freedom degrees taken from the table = 12.592 => the null hypothesis, according to which the data are homoskedastic, is accepted.

In consequence, the White test reveals the absence of heteroskedasticity in model 2 estimated by OLS.

5. Conclusions

As result of our attempt to study the economic growth and its influence factors, we have created various models that have been estimated by OLS and TSLS methods, the best one being finally selected based on several criteria.

Out of the chosen series, the imports one has been eliminated due to the high level of collinearity. The trials to improve the simple regression model have lead to the selection of two important factors determining GDP: external debt and foreign direct investments, both having a positive influence on the economic performance of countries.

The positive relationship between external debt and GDP revealed by this study may have one of the following two explanations:

- considering the major differences between the values of the analysed series, the negative leverage effect obtained for some of them has been compensated the positive effect of the other ones, so that, as a whole, a positive relationship emerged for the two variables of interest;
- at the world level, in average, the threshold above which the indebting influence on the economic performance should become negative has not been reached yet.

The coefficients obtained within the estimations may be interpreted as elasticities and indicate that, while GDP is inelastic in relation with debt, the latter has a supra-unitary elasticity, so that the conclusion may be drawn that its modification is ampler than the GDP one.

Such result could be explained by stating that, if an increase of the debt determined a quicker increase of GDP, then many countries would indebt themselves until the maximum limit so as to obtain economic growth, and the debt service would be always covered by it.

The debt elasticity in relation with GDP is supra-unitary and it is confirmed for the developing and emerging countries, with significant economic growths, but highly indebted in order to reach a superior development standard, especially considering that their governments are involved in expensive development projects.

As regards the extended model, the positive relationship between GDP and external debt remains unchanged, the statement of its reversal after a critical threshold being still valid. We could also mention that the inelasticity of GDP maintains, but it has a lower value as compared to the one obtained within the simple regression model.

As for the relationship existing between foreign direct investments and GDP, the economic theory confirms that FDI and economic growth are directly correlated, the former contributing to technical progress, production increase and, finally, to the improvement of the living standard.

We can find in the economic theory cases when a negative relationship has been revealed for these two variables, but just for certain areas (for instance, the Latin America countries) and for short periods of time.

Considering that we have used logarithmic values, the values of coefficients can construed as elasticities. As regards the foreign direct investments, the elasticity coefficient is sub-unitary, this involving that GDP is inelastic in relation to foreign direct investments, increasing only by 0.33% when FDI increases by 1%.

By comparing our results to those obtained by the authors of the articles considered as basic bibliographic sources, we could state that this study has revealed the same trend as that reached by Patillo et al. (2002, 2004), with the mention that the latter found a debt coefficient much closer to the inflexion value above which the leverage on GDP becomes negative. Our findings are in compliance with those reacjed by the quoted authors also as regards the foreign direct investments. Still, their analysis does not comprise TSLS estimations, therefore a comparison from the perspective of this method being impossible.

6. Suggestions for further research

In view of going on with our economic growth analysis, we propose to resort to a panel data approach, therefore enlarging the perspective on the economic performance phenomenon and its impact factors. As for the methodology, a GMM econometric estimation technique, with fixed versus random effects could be applied. The long-run relationship between variables could be also examined so as to see whether cointegration is present or not. If a cointegration relationship is revealed, the use Error Correction Models would be an interesting approach which might significantly enrich our study.

References

- Alfaro, L., Chanda, A., Kalemli-Ozcan, S. and Sayek, S. (2003), FDI Spillovers, Financial Markets and Economic Development, IMF Working Papers 03/186, International Monetary Fund
- Alfaro, L et al. (2003), FDI and Economic Growth: The Role of Local Financial Markets, Journal of International Economics 64, no. 1 (2004): 89–112.
- Clements, B., Bhattacharya, R. and Nguyen, T. Q. (2003), External Debt, Public Investment, and Growth in Low-Income Countries, IMF Working Paper WP/03/249
- Hameed, A., Ashraf, H. and Chaudhary, M.A.(2008), External Debt and its Impact on Economic and Business Growth in Pakistan, International Research Journal of Finance and Economics, 20: 132-140
- Hudea, O.S. (2011), From External Debt to Economic Growth … and Back. Lex et Scientia International Journal, 18 (1): 252-261
- Jordaan, A. C. and Eita J. H. (2007), Export and Economic Growth in Namibia: A Granger Causality Analysis, South African Journal of Economics, Vol 75:3.
- Kinoshita and Lu (2006), On the Role of Absorptive Capacity: FDI Matters to Growth, The William Davidson Institute working paper no. 845.
- Lee, C.C. and Chang, C.P. (2009), FDI, Financial Development, and Economic Growth: International evidence. Journal of Applied Economics, 12, 249-271.
- Levine, R., Loayza, N., and Beck, T. (2000), Financial intermediation and growth: Causality and causes, Journal of Monetary Economics, 46:31–77.
- Mankiw, N. G., Romer, D., and Weil, D. N. (1992), A contribution to the empirics of economic growth, The Quarterly Journal of Economics, 107(2):407–437.
- Patillo C., Poirson H., Ricci L. (2002), External Debt and Growth, IMF Working Papers 02/69, April
- Patillo C., Poirson H., Ricci L. (2004), What are the channels through which external debt affects growth?, IMF Working Papers 04/15
- Reinhart, C. and Rogoff, K. (2009), This Time is Different: Eight Centuries of Financial Folly. Princeton, NJ: Princeton Press
- Reinhart, C. and Rogoff, K. (2010), Growth in a Time of Debt, American Economic Review, American Economic Association, vol. 100(2): 573-78
- Ullah, S. et al. (2009), Cointegration and Causality between Exports and Economic Growth in Pakistan, European Journal of Social Sciences vol 10(2)
- Yao, S. and Wei, K. (2008), Economic growth in the presence of FDI: the perspective of newly industrializing economies, Applied Economics Letters, 15, 887–891.

THE INFLUENCE OF SPARE PARTS EXPENSES ON PRODUCTION COSTS WITH THE PREPARATION OF THE JIU VALLEY COAL

GIANINA BÂRSAN DUDUIALĂ[*]
CARMEN FLOREA[]
ADRIAN VASILE SUCIU[]

Abstract
The activity of supply and that of exploitation of the spare parts from the composition of the equipments that realize the preparation of the Jiu Valley coal influence its production costs.
In this respect, this paper deals with, during some periods of time, initially determined, the specific costs of the spare parts for the sieves, pumps and pipes, equipments, and also auxiliary equipments that are part of the endowment of the Exploitation of the Jiu Valley coal preparation.
The results got can be used to rank and determine the causes which determine the high expenses of some spare parts categories as well as the possibility to reduce the production costs within E.P.C.V.J.

Keywords: spare parts, energetic coal, washing subjected coal, sterile.

Introduction

The Jiu Valley exploitation of coal preparation is a subunit of C.N.H. – S.A. PETROŞANI, it realises the raw coal processing and preparation extracted by the mining units, as well as the delivery of final products obtained.

Part of the extracted raw coal is directly delivered to the beneficiaries from the loading points belonging to the mining units after making a claubage that consists of manual evacuation of rocks, wood, metal, rubber etc and that of some sifting operations; after that it is loaded into wagons and delivered under the name of sorted energetical coal.

The remained raw coal quantity is subjected to concentration at the Coroesti factory within E.P.C.V.J.-Vulcan , where the following finite products are obtained:

Superior energetical coal
Washed energetical coal
Mixed energetical coal
Hydro-cycloned energetical coal
Filtered coal slate

The technological flow consists of: claubaging, sieving and breaking the raw coal received from the mining units, followed by its concentration in the machines and the draining of the obtained products with the help of draining sieves and of the vibrating spins.

The small coal in the circulation waters is concentrated with the help of the hydro-cycloning and recovery batteries, as well as drained with the help of draining sieves. The soft sterile from the residual waters is purged in the decanters of sterile sludge, and then filtered in press filters. The big sterile resulted after the preparation process is drained in cups elevators and transported with the help of the cableway on the sterile landfills.

Spare parts expenses in coal preparation process

The vibrating sieves realise hard and exact screenings, through the vibrating system with " obliged oscillation", obtained by means of an eccentric tree, fixed in the walls on the chassis, that leads to the same amplitude of oscillation of the housing independently from the material weight, that is better material selection. The oscillating housing is made up of superior width board and the selection stands are fixed with auto locked screws, avoiding the risk of internal tension forming in the welded areas, tensions that can provoke leaks or breakings of the housing.

[*] Ph. D. candidate, „Mihai Eminescu" National College of Petroşani, (email: gianinaduduiala@yahoo.com).
[] Professor, Ph. D., Universty of Petroşani, (email: carmenflorea2004@yahoo.com).
[] Engineer, CNH Petroşani , (email: adisuciu@cnh.ro).

The single-deck vibrating screen WK1 – 2.6 x 5.0 is designed for classification of coal and other granular materials on screens. The vibrating screen includes:

Riddle
Sieve-deck
Inertial drive / vibrator
Drive of the vibrating screen
Support of the vibrating screen

The riddle is made of two side-plates tied toghether with box girders which form a bearing for the sieve deck. Inside the side walls, mounting pcokets of the vibrator bearings are fastened, connected by a tube shielding the shaft of the vibrator.

The sieve deck is made of sieve panels placed with a slight sloping on oblong ribs lined with protective pads. On the sides, the sieves are fastened by means of terminal strips.

Perforated sieves, made of sheet or woven of wire, can be applied in the vibrating screen. The kind of sieves and the size of sieves meshes in the deck depend on the required technology.

The vibrator of the inertial type vibrating screen forms a long unbalanced bearing shaft in two special barrel bearings. The bearings are fastened in the side walls of the riddle in removable mountings sealed by labyrinth covers. Extra unbalanced masses, allowing to change the pitch of the vibrating screen, are placed on the pins of the shaft.

The vibrator is originally assembled with 1 pads g = 20 mm in the weight. The remaining two pads are given separately.

The choice of weights of the vibrator shaft other than the installed g = 10 mm can be made exclusivley with acceptance of the producer.

The two-deck vibrating screen SccII – 1.8x5.25 is designed for dewatering and classification. This vibrating screen includes the following units:

Riddle
Inertial drives
Sieve-decks
Drive of the vibrating screen
Support of the vibrating screen

The riddle is made of two plates tied toghether with bearing and stiffening beams of the I-section. In the walls of the riddle, bearing mountings of the vibrators are fastened. The central casings of drives work as additional beams stiffening the construction of the riddle.

The inlets and outlets fastened to the terminal beams of the riddle enable supply and reception of products.

The upper sieve deck consists of panels of welded sieves. The lower sieve deck is the made of slotted sieves in the form of frames. On the sides, the sieves are fastened by means of shielding terminal strips.

The vibrating screen is equipped with two inertial drives (each composed of two vibrators), fastened in the sides of the riddle, connected directly with electric motors. The whirling unbalanced backward masses of the vibrators generate centrifugal forces, neutralizing each other or accumulating in definite positions, inducing a harmonic motion of rectilinear trajectory or near-eliptical trajectory of the springily supported riddle.

The vibrator consists of a mounting fastened with a flange to the riddle side. Inside the mounting, a short shaft on two roller bearing is mounted. Weights witch replaceable cylindrical pads are placed on the shaft necks, allowing the change of the stroke of the vibrating screen. Two opposite vibrators are connected together with a coupling shaft. All rotating elements are protected by protective shields. The same numbers of pads must be mounted in all weights of a given vibrating screen.

Originally, vibrators are equipped with 2 pads, 16 mm thick, in each weight. The remaining pads are supplied separately. To a maximum, one pad 8 mm thick can be mounted additionally with the approval of the producer. Also, another amount and size of pads can be mounted in the weights after obtaining the producer's acceptance.

The drive of the vibrating screen consists of two electric motors mounted on a common frame. The motors are connected directly with vibrators by means of properly shielded bow-clutches.

The support of the vibrating screen consists of four sets of spiral springs. The upper seats of the supports are fastened to the pins of the riddle, while the lower seats are connected with the supporting construction (substructure). The support allows to change the angle of inclination of the vibrating screen according to technological instructions of the development design.

Table 1. Technical characteristic of the vibrating screen SccII – 1.8 x 5.25

PARAMETER	UNIT	VALUE
Size of sieve holes of the upper deck	mm	21
Gap width of slotted sieves of the lower deck	mm	1
Frequency of vibration	min^{-1}	960
Stroke of the riddle	mm	9 ± 0.5
Surface of the sieve	m^2	2 x 11
Type of the vibrator	-	100W/1800
Engine power	kW	2 x 11
Engine speed	min^{-1}	960
Static load of 1 pillar	kN	17.2
Dynamic load of 1 pillar	kN	± 2.6
Mass of the vibrating screen	kg	7680

The supporting construction of the vibrating screen should be appropriately rigid in order to take over strengths and vibrations generated by the vibrating screen effectively and to guarantee proper work of the machine.

The construction should ensure a comfortable access to:

sieve decks and sides of the riddle vibrators and their lubricating points supporting springs

clutches and driving motors

Chutes, funnels and elements of the stationary construction should be installed with the minimum distance of 50 mm from the riddle. The supplying chute should ensure smooth distribution of the feed over the whole breadth of the vibrating screen.

The oscillating group disposes of an eccentric tree, treated and rectified, mounted on 4 special bearings for vibrating machines width a large front. According to the selection needs, on the stands sieves can be mounted or steel bars. The main stand is made of sections that confer an adequate support, having a dismountable and protected with anti-wear board or with rubber.

The spare parts for sieves and pumps, as well as the transports pipelines of the water and the material influence the production costs for the coal that is "subjected to washing", as well as the "washed net".

Table 2 The specific expenses with spare parts for sieves

Nr. crt.	EQUIPMENT NAME	YEAR	SPARE PARTS NAME	CONSUM-PTION (piece)	VALUE (lei)	THE COST INFLUENCE ON THE WASHING SUBJECTED (lei/to)	THE COST INGLUENCE ON THE WASHED NET (lei/to)
1.	SIEVES	2005	Surface. Ranking	24	23509.68	0.024943296	0.041157395
			Surface. Ranking 18 G 2A(perforated board)	6	10152.54	0.01077164	0.017773619
				TOTAL 2005	33662.22	0.035714936	0.058931014
2.		2006	Spring damper sieve	28	6860	0.010427053	0.017016463
			Elicoidal spring damper sieve	96	26880	0.040857025	0.066676754
			Typical sieve beam	16	35900	0.054567232	0.089051171
				TOTAL 2006	69640	0.10585131	0.172744388
3.		2007	Spalt OL 600x875 mm with holes 0,8	132	177067.56	0.34704159	0.496390794
			Typical sieve housing	2	133078	0.260824742	0.373070562
			Delivery system for the sieve	2	168910.36	0.331053977	0.473522918
				TOTAL 2007	479055.92	0.938920309	1.342984273
4.		2010	Sieve arches	48	21840	0.039218362	0.075703481
			Spalts 650x875	96	165120	0.296508057	0.572351591
			Spalts 600x875	73	110960	0.199252265	0.384618051
			Perforated board 8x1000x2000-20	50	41100	0.073803786	0.142463968
			Perforated board 8x1000x2000-50	50	37750	0.067788149	0.130851941
				TOTAL 2010	376770	0.67657062	1.305989033
5.		2011	Spring damper sieve	8	13702.16	0.059886801	0.110409579
			Spring damper sieve	8	8086.56	0.035343202	0.065160069
				TOTAL 2011	21788.72	0.095230003	0.175569648

Table 3. Specific spare parts expenses Warman pumps

Nr. crt.	NAME	YEAR	SPARE PARTS NAME	U.M.	CON-SUMPTION	VALUE(lei)	THE COST INFLUENCE ON THE WASHING SUBJECTED (lei/to)	THE COST INGLUENCE ON THE WASHED NET (lei/to)
1.	Warman pumps	2010	Overall group bearings	Pcs	4	74696.38	0.134133228	0.258918314
			Sealing gland	Pcs	16	1225.28	0.002200251	0.004247159
			Gland	Pcs	4	3205.94	0.005756947	0.011112675

			Discharge seal	Pcs	4	756.76	0.001358923	0.002623139
			Suction plate	Pcs	4	25994.66	0.046678937	0.090104682
			Intake gasket	Pcs	4	684.08	0.001228411	0.00237121
			Sealing gasket	Pcs	4	1296.68	0.002328465	0.004494652
			O-Ring	Pcs	4	122.52	0.000220011	0.000424688
			Rotor	Pcs	4	54164.06	0.097263083	0.187747613
			Wear shirt	Pcs	4	72113.24	0.129494651	0.249964436
			Seal wear shirt	Pcs	8	1592.76	0.002860139	0.005520947
			Discharge board	Pcs	4	21635	0.038850241	0.074992894
			Sealing liner	Pcs	4	13936.66	0.025026235	0.048308318
			Restrictor ring	Pcs	4	1123.12	0.002016801	0.003893045
			Distance	Pcs	4	3808.34	0.006838684	0.01320076
			Wearing sleeve	Pcs	4	4645.56	0.00834209	0.016102796
					TOTAL 2010	281001.04	0.504597096	0.974027328

Along with screeners and pumps, pipelines (with diameters between 76 and 325mm) introduce high specific costs as shown in Table 4.

Table 4. Specific expenses for pipelines

Nr. crt.	NAME	YEAR	PIPELINE TYPE	U.M.	CONSUMPTION	VALUE(lei)	THE COST INFLUENCE ON THE WASHING SUBJECTED (lei/to)	THE COST INGLUENCE ON THE WASHED NET (lei/to))
1.	PIPELINES	2005	Pipe Ø 108	Pcs	50	21500	0,022811066	0,037639133
			Pipe Ø 219	Pcs	50	8900	0,00944272	0,015580851
					TOTAL 2005	30400	0,032253786	0,053219984
2.		2006	Pipe Ø 108	Pcs	20	4700	0,006933135	0,01165851
			Pipe Ø 259	Pcs	62	16965,68	0,02502667	0,042083946
					TOTAL 2006	21665,68	0,031959806	0,053742456
3.		2007	Pipe Ø 108	Pcs	50	7535,5	0,014769119	0,021125004
			Pipe Ø 800	Pcs	1,5	933,46	0,001829525	0,00261686
					TOTAL 2007	8468,96	0,016598644	0,023741863
4.		2009	Pipe Ø 76	Pcs	10	1719,5	0,035685379	0,005930537
			Pipe Ø 159	Pcs	10	3271,4	0,067892498	0,011283024
			Pipe Ø 325	Pcs	20	10160	0,210854	0,035041733
			Pipe Ø 325	Pcs	85	15045	0,312234098	0,051890046
					TOTAL 2009	30195,9	0,626665975	0,10414534
5.		2010	Pipe Ø 108	Pcs	25	6514,75	0,011698618	0,022581925
			Pipe Ø 159	Pcs	22	9559	0,017165216	0,033134138
			Pipe Ø 325	Pcs	4	2032	0,003648888	0,007043474
					TOTAL 2010	18105,75	0,032512723	0,062759537
6.		2011	Pipe Ø 108	Pcs	30	7229,9	0,031599075	0,058257254

			Pipe Ø 159	Pcs	30	13458	0,058819673	0,108442181
			Pipe Ø 219	Pcs	25	17250	0,075393027	0,138997446
			Pipe Ø 325	Pcs	90	15714	0,06867977	0,12662063
					TOTAL 2011	53651,9	0,234491545	0,43231751

Tables 2 and 4 reflect the specific expenses with the spare parts that are necessary for sieves and pipes, during 2005-2010 (inclusively for 10 months of 2011); in table 4 there are the specific spare parts expenses necessary for the Warman pipelines in 2010.

It results that with a production of 228.801 to of washed coal, in those 10 months of year 2011, the expenses are:

-for spare parts necessary for sieves: 0.095230003 lei/to x 228.801 to=10348.66992 lei

-for pipes: 0,234491545lei/to x 228.801to=53651.89999 lei

As for the net coal, the situation of the spare parts expenses is the following:

- for spare parts necessary for sieves: 0.175569648 lei/to x 124103 to=21788.72003 lei

-for pipes: 0,43231751 lei/to x 124103 to=53651.89994 lei

At the same time, in 2010, for a production of 556882 to, washed coal, the spare parts expenses necessary for pumps are 0.504597096 lei/to x 556882 to=281001.04 lei, and for the net coal 0.974027328 lei/to x 288494 to=281001.04 lei.

The costs influences with spare parts differs from one year to another, as well as from a machine to the other due to their usage, in the production process, but also the maintaining[3] activities that are difficultly realised. There is a double in the specific spare parts expenses for sieves, pumps and pipes.

All the above mentioned costs reflect a high financial effort both for the washed coal and for the net one, that is necessary both for respecting the maintenance activities of the machines/equipment and for their reconditioning (where possible).

By reconditioning, the maintenance costs are reduced with 30-70% as the reconditioning cost can be between 20% and 70% out of the factory cost of a new part, of an appropriate quality. The reconditioning cost of a part can be determined (in a workshop or office) with the help of the relation:

$$C=c_{mc}+c_m+c_r \text{ ,lei} \quad (1)$$

where:

c_{mc}- the cost of the materials consumed to recondition the part, lei

c_m-the manoeuvre cost, lei

c_r-the workshop activity, lei

The economical efficiency condition includes both the new part working time (t_{pn}) as well as the reconditioned part working time (t_{pr}):

$$C_{pr} / t_{pr} \leq C_{pn} / t_{pn} \quad (2)$$

where:

C_{pr} –the reconditioned part cost

C_{pn} –the new part cost.

It`s estimated that at least 50% out of the spare parts mentioned in tables 1,2 and 3 can be reconditioned, without any supplementary endowments, within the enterprises belonging to C.N.H.Petroşani, which could allow an important increase of the coal preparation activity worth.

Routine maintenance and fault finding for Warman Pumps

Warman pumps are of sturdy construction and when Correctly assembled and installed, they will give long Trouble-free service with a minimum amount of maintenance. However, regular observation checks by the operator can minimise the risk of costly stoppages.

It should be periodically checked gland seal water supply and discharge. Operator should always maintain a very small amount of clean water leakage along the shaft by regularly adjusting the gland. When gland adjustment is no longer possible replace complete gland pack.

Maintenance personnel should inspect gland packings at regular intervals, not longer than six months (1800 hours) to determine when packings need to be changed. Warman International Limited can supply all recommended packings in individual blocked rings, cut to length and moulded to the correct size for each type of pump.

Warman pump performance is inversely proportional to the clearance between the impeller and the intake liner. This is more pronounced with an open impeller.

With wear, the clearance increases and pump efficiency drops. For best performance it is necessary, therefore to stop the pump occasionally and adjust the forward impeller clearance. This adjustment can be carried out without any dismantling of the pump.

Before restarting, it should be checked that impeller turns freely and that bearing housing clamp bolts are tight.

Maintenance personnel should open bearing housing at regular intervals (not longer that twelve months) to inspect bearings, lubricant and to determine each time the course of action and the period for the next inspection.

The wear rate of a solids handling pump is dependant on the severity of the pumping duty and of the abrasive properties of the material handled. Therefore, the life of wearing parts, such as impellers and liners, varies from pump and from one installation to another.

Wearing parts must be replaced when the performance of a given pump no longer satisfies the requirements of the particular installation. Where a pump is used on a particular duty for the first time and especially where failure of wearing part during service could have serious consequences, it is recommended that the pump be opened at regular intervals, parts be inspected and their wear rate estimated so that the remaining life of the parts may be established.

Where stand-up-pumps are standing idle for long periods, it is advisable to turn their shafts a quarter of a turn by hand once a week. In this way all the bearing rollers in turn are made to carry static loads and external vibrations. Alternatively run all pumps at weekly intervals.

Conclusions

Reconditioning and rehabilitation of the parts for the coal preparation equipments, as well as the equipments of the maintenance activities meant to re-establish the geometrical shape of the used landmarks and even to improve their physical- mechanical proprieties according to the initial ones, appear as an immediately applicable solution and with effects of productive activity worth.

The opportunity of spare parts reconditioning is made according to technical-economical analysis, regarding their final reconditioning and sustainability. The correct choice of the material as well as the already applied treatments to the part, the functional conditions and requests, the limit performances that are to be assured, the usage size and the reconditioning cost.

References

- A., Magyari, Mining machinery, Ed.Tehnică Publishing house , Bucureşti, 1990
- A., Magyari, Used to prepare minerals , Ed.Tehnică Publishing house, Bucureşti, 1983
- C., Florea, Maintenance, Ed.Universitas Publishing house, Petroşani, 2006

LABOR MARKET POLICIES AND EFFECTIVENESS.

DRITAN SHORAJ[*]
DORINA ZENELAJ[]

Abstract
In this paper will be examined some important issues of the labor market policies in Albania. As well, the analysis of labor market institutions such as the Social Insurances or the Syndicates on the efficiency of employing active labor forces. Which are the policies on the protection of the labor forces and the criteria of definition of the minimum salary? Furthermore, it continues with the importance of reforms in the labor market policies, to be examined in the labor market aspect as a production factor and as a regulator of the internal market. Fast globalization is causing continuous risk and movement for the active labor forces. The increase and development of technology puts out of the market many employees, decreasing the number of unqualified employees and increases the demand for the qualified ones. Does the globalization really affect the labor market, efficiency and as a consequence increase production, or the latter are benefits only for the developed economic countries? At the same time, we shall examine the movement of the labor forces from one country to another and the fluctuation of the relevant salaries.
In general, the analysis of this paper faces two key issues: the first being raised on discussion of the kinds of programs on the active labor forces, such as programs of direct employment or consideration of employment in public sector, and the second regarding the methodology of evaluating these programs. How effective are them on the domestic market?
The paper ends with conclusions and recommendations on the efficiency of policies for the labor market forces.

Keywords: efficiency, policies, labor market forces, program, migration.

Introduction

Unemployment and employment of active labor forces is a major concern for each society. In 1991 Albania was unprepared to face this reality. The shift from a dictatorial system with centralized economy where the employment was guaranteed to a democratic system with capitalist economy and an individualistic employment model on basis of personal skills, made the Albanian society fall into chaos in terms of employment and opportunities offered by the labor market.

From the entire transition period to present time, the labor market situation in Albania was associated with several issues such as informal employment, migration, limited involvement of women in the labor market compared to men, lack of guidance of the young people to labor market needs and professional education, difference of salaries between women and men etc.

The improvement of living standards and consequently the economic growth have been the main challenges of Albania for a period of almost 20 years. The Foreign Direct Investment Report in Albania qualifies the domestic economy for 2010 with a 6 % average increase of GDP. However, according to the equality of purchasing power, the GDP per capita is only 25% of the EU-27 average, lower than the one of Bulgaria which is an EU member country with lower incomes.[1]

Accordingly, this paper will introduce a survey of the labor market situation in Albania on the effects it will have after the integration of the market to the European Union, identification of problems encountered in the course of implementation of labor market programs and their effectiveness as well as the internal migration of the population.

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Economy, Department of Management, University of Tirana, Albania, (email: dshoraj@yahoo.com).
[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Education Science, University "Aleksander Xhuvani", Elbasan, Albania, (email: dorina.zenelaj@gmail.com).
[1] UNCTAD, Foreign Direct Investment Report for Abania (Tirana: 2011), 20-25.

The importance of this scientific paper lies in the sensibilization of the main stakeholders, either be policymakers, implementers, employers or employees, that although the program and policy implementation is a challenging phase, the importance of this phase is vital. On the other hand, we wish to emphasize that unemployment and poverty cannot be reduced only by drafting qualitative laws and policies but their practical implementation is essential.

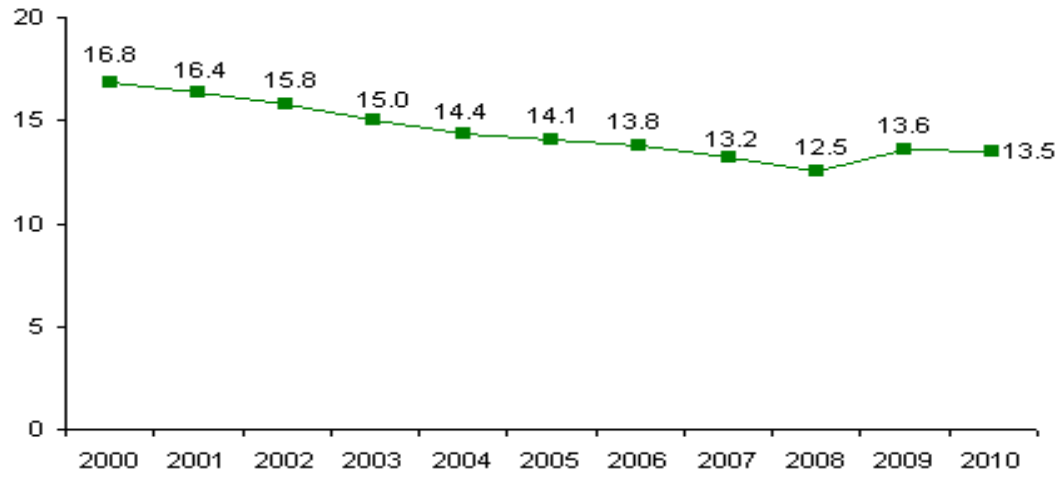
We have endeavored to make a realistic overview of the labor market in Albania, of the existing labor market policies and programs and the obstacles for their implementation. Alternatively, we offer various recommendations for overcoming the obstacles encountered with the view of improving the current situation.

The paper introduces an in-depth analysis of the labor market policies and programs in Albania. On the other hand, we draw a comparison of these policies with the evaluation reports of international organizations covering the Albanian labor market. Some of the main sources used in this paper are the Albanian legislation on labor market, reports of the World Bank, UNDP, ILO and statistics from INSTAT. The paper will be closed with some conclusions and recommendations of the authors.

Labor market policies and programs in Albania.

The labor market in Albania has experienced and still has a low level of employment of active labor force. A characteristic of the transition period Albania has already passed is naturally both unemployment and lack of labor market policies. The first ten years of the transition period showed high rates of unemployment in the country. Hence, "the number of employed people in the public sector is reduced from 850.000 in 1991 to 189.000 in 2001, and further on in 176.000 people in 2004"[2]. In the meantime, according to INSTAT, the average figure of unemployed people in the country for the first 9- month period of 2011 is 142.082."[3]

Scheme: The Registered Unemployment Level, 2000 - 2010



Source: INSTAT, Data from Professional Education and Training (PET), published in 2011.

[2] Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities , Sectorial Strategy of Employment 2007-2013(Tirana: 2007), 5.

[3] "Results from the Labor Market Questionnaire, Labor Market in Albania", INSTAT, accessed Janary 10,2012, http:// www.instat.gov.al

Unemployment still has not good indications, while the labor force is growing and may become a major source of future economic growth. If Albania is not able to improve the new job generation climate, this "potential demographic gift" could further aggravate the unemployment issue. "During this decade, the working age population will grow approximately by 5% every year and by 2015 it will constitute two third of the total population."[4] Under these conditions, the labor market situation in Albania requires the engagement of many stakeholders in order to enable the required changes and further social and economic development.

In Albania, the Law "On Promotion of Employment" was drafted in 1995 and approved by the Law No. 7995, dated 20.09.1995*. This Law placed special focus to the "employment, information and professional training, National Employment Service and adoption of general active policies in support of full, productive and free choice employment by the individuals"[5] This law has been subject to key amendments in 2005, which draft was approved later in July 2006, bringing other improvements in several issues such as: 1) improvement of its definitions and introduction of other adapted definitions, 2) introduction of the orientation and advisory concept for new jobs creation and employment, 3) new provisions related to modifications in the procedures of management of financial funds of professional training, which entered into force as a result of the Law No. 8872 dated 19.03.2002, "On professional education and training in the Republic of Albania".[6]

Articles 3 and 4 of this Law clearly specify its main goals. Respectively, the Article 3 emphasizes that every individual looking for a job shall be addressed for registration as an unemployed person to the National Employment Offices which gives appropriate advice and orientation for the labor market. Foreign citizens, without Albanian citizenship, coming from countries which have or do not have bilateral agreements with Albania can also benefit from this Law. This Law is also beneficial to the foreign citizens married to Albanian citizens who are residents in the Republic of Albania.

The Article 4, in its paragraphs 1 and 2, emphasizes the measures of national employment policies in support of both the promotion of employment and provision of related financial support. Economic development, employment and development of active state policies for employment are primarily focused on the concept that every citizen looking for a job has the right job, the job has a fruitful performance and the individual can choose the job in accordance with his skills and capabilities.

In Albania, there are also several programs in support of those looking for a job and the market labor offers in the country. Let's have a look ahead on the specifics of these programs which have a common ground in the reduction of the registered unemployed people in the National Employment Offices, and the shift of these individuals from the passive financial support scheme, such as the unemployment financial support and economic support.

The programs currently being applied in Albania are as follows[7]:

1) Employment promotion program of unemployed people; the employers providing temporary employment for unemployed people (3-6 months) shall benefit financial support of their monthly wages up to 100 % of the minimum wage and the expenses for the social security of the beneficiary employed people. If the beneficiary employed people are employed for a period up to 1 year and with regular contracts, the employer shall benefit a financial support equal to a minimum monthly wage and the obligatory contribution to social security for a period up to 5 months. If the

[4] World Bank, Albania: Market Labor Assessment, Report No. 34597-AL,(Tirana:May 2006), 4-6.

Note*: Law 7995 on "Promotion of Employment " was amended by Law No. 8444, dated 21.01.1999, with the Law No. 8862 dated 07.03.2002, and the Law No. 9570 dated 03.07.2006

[5] Official Journal, "On Promotion of Employment", Law No. 7995, dated 20.09.1995, 3-4.

[6] Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities , Sectorial Strategy of Employment, 30-32.

[7] Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities , Sectorial Strategy of Employment, 22.

beneficiary employed people do not have related professional training skills for the job to be performed, and the employees have the possibility to offer that training, then he can benefit an increase of 10-20 percent of the total fund for each individual employed.[8]

2) Employment promotion program through on-the-job-training practices; this option support the employers conducting specific training programs with the beneficiary unemployed people followed by the creations of jobs for a number of the trained individuals. In this case, employers shall be supported with the wages and social security expenses for the trained unemployed people they employ, provided that the employers offering these training sessions shall at least employ 40% of the trained individuals.

3) Employment promotion program through institutional training and education; the employment offices shall assign and provide appropriate training for the beneficiary unemployed individuals of those companies which: a) guarantee the employment of individuals after the training, or b) show through studies and investigation of the labor market that the training shall be useful for the participants. The beneficiary individuals refusing the participation in these training courses are checked out from the list of unemployed people and their unemployment wage is interrupted.[9]

4) Employment promotion program for the unemployed individuals of female gender; this program is focused on the integration in the labor market of marginalized women, such as Roma women, ex-trafficking abused women, elderly and disabled women, and;5) In 2007 for the first time it was applied the employment promotion program for unemployed individuals holding a Bachelor diploma, who have completed their studies in or out the country by means of their participation in professional training and education programs in public or private institutions/ enterprises. Public employers are obliged to provide employment for these unemployed individuals engaging them under a free of charge policy, based on the internship status scheme of employment of 1 in 50 personnel of the public administration.[10]

As described above, Albania has in place the appropriate policies and programs but they shall cover and balance the protection of workers as well. It is necessary to develop legal arrangements for the types of contracts including obligations for both employers and employees, as well as other procedures including the removal from job. The basic legislation in Albania is the 'Job Code' with legal effects from 1995 with various key amendments in 2003. "Employment Promotion Legislation (EPL) offers job security for the covered employed individuals, but it can also give undesirable consequences concerning the discouragement of creation of new jobs, especially in the public sector."[11]

As a conclusion, Albania has related policies and programs on employment of active labor force, but the key question mark is to the quality of their implementation. Quite often, business and company entrepreneurs are not well-informed on Albanian legislation. Sometimes they are not aware of the forms of financial support provided by the government in cases of employment of young individuals, marginalized women, or regarding the training of unemployed people; not to say that a skeptical view is in place regarding the question of validity and implementation of these employment promotion programs in Albania.

Globalization effects to the labour force.

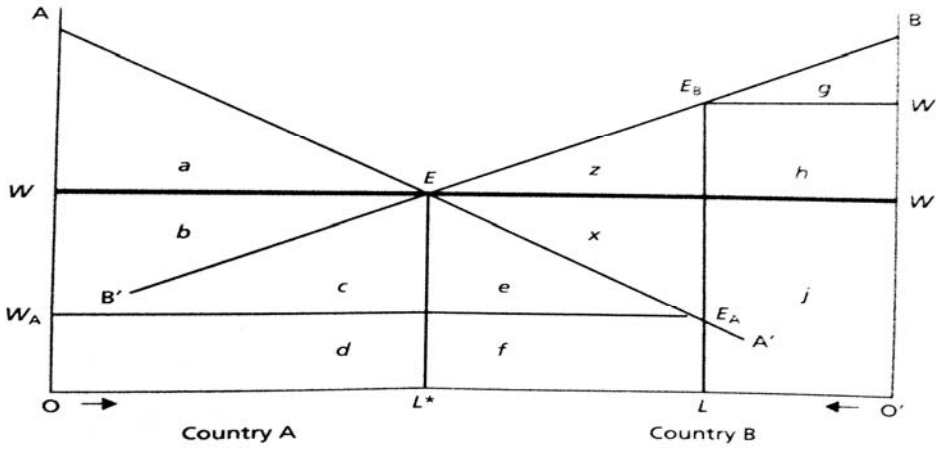
Without mentioning the stages and the processes the Albanian economy will experience, there is no doubt that the final destination is the unification and accession of the Albanian economy to the economy of the European family, which it geographically belongs from the very existence of the planet. On one side, there is no doubt that the transition from one economy with barriers and

[8] Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities , Sectorial Strategy of Employment, 32-33.
[9] Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities , Sectorial Strategy of Employment, 22.
[10] Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities , Sectorial Strategy of Employment, 23.
[11] World Bank, Albania: Market Labor Assessment, 6-7.

quota levels to a global economy without borders and tariffs will be associated with mutual benefits for the respective countries. On the other side, this phenomenon will be connected with some visible disorders in the labour market, for both respective countries.

Economic integration of a country in the European common market and the free movement of labour force from a country to another will have immediate impacts on the labour force offer and demand for these countries. It will have an impact on the increase and decrease of wage rates as well.[12]

For study purposes, let us take two countries, with more or less approximate characteristics. Let's say Albania (A), and another country of the European Union (B), which both produce the same product X, using the same technology, and with the same production factors, the Stock Exchange (K) and Labour Force (L). Below, let us introduce both countries in a common scheme.



Source: Hitiris Theo, European Union Economics,16.

Albania, country A, is shown on the left side of the scheme, and the size of the labour force is represented by the segment OL in the horizontal axis of the scheme. The country B is shown to the right side of the scheme and the size of the labour force is O'L. As it can be seen from the scheme, the size of labour force for both countries is the horizontal axis OO', while the vertical axis show the marginal product of labour (MPL), and wage rate (W) for both countries. With no changes in the above mentioned parameters, the requirements of Albania A for labour force is presented in the line AA', which is the marginal product of labour, MPL_A. As it can be observed from the table, it goes down as long as the labour employment is increased. The same thing happens in the other country but in the opposite side of the scheme. According to the European Union Economics "equilibrium with full factor employment and profit maximization behaviour, is reached in each country when the marginal product of labour equals the market wage rate"[13], so that $MPL_A=W_A$ for Albania (A) and $MPL_B=W_B$ for the country B. While, in the country A we have a larger number of labour force compared to the country B, (OL>O'L), under the conditions of a full employment of labour, the wage rates as observed by the scheme, are higher in the country B, ($W_B>W_A$). For both countries, national revenues are equal throughout the entire area below MPL, up to the crossing point of country A and the same thing in the country B.

[12] Theo Hitiris, European Union Economics:Fifth Edition,(Prentice Hall Europe: 2003), 6-15.
[13] Hitiris, European Union Economics, 15-19.

At the moment of the liberalization of labour market in a common market, where between Albania (A) and the other country (B) all barriers are removed, we are facing the fact that in the country (B) the labour force, for the same job, is paid at a much higher price that in Albania. Under these conditions, Albanian employers are facing a dilemma: to stay and work for the Albanian employers with lower wages or run to work for the employers of the country B? Under these conditions, we will experience a massive movement of the labour force from the country A to the country B. That means we will have an increase of the job offer in the country A and a decrease of the job offer in the country B. As a consequence, we will see an inflation of the labour force in this country. Based on Adam Smith market economy, "this phenomenon will be associated with a decrease of the wage rates."[14]

While in the country B, we will observe an inflation of the labour force, the employers in Albania (A) will suffer a situation of an extreme lack of labour force, which will seriously damage their business. Under these conditions, the Albanian employers will try to attract their employees in order they do not immigrate to the country B, by offering an increase of their wages. Therefore, we are in a situation when in the country B there is a tendency of the decrease of the wage rates as a consequence of the inflation of the labour force; in Albania there is a tendency to increase the wage rates as a consequence of the movement of the labour force. This phenomenon will continue until the wage rates are made equal in the two countries, in W. As a conclusion, we will have an increase of the wage rates of the employees in Albania from W_A in W. Meanwhile, we will see a drop of labour force from OL to OL'. In the country B, we will see a decrease of the wage rates of the employees of the country B from W_B to W, and an increase of the labour force from O'L to O'L'. Simply, let us suppose we have two bottles, one of them empty and the other full of water. At the moment both bottles are connected with a tube at the bottom of the bottles, the water will start to move quickly from the full bottle to the empty one. This phenomenon will continue until the height of the water in both bottles is at equal levels. It does not matter if the bottles are equal in size or not. In this case, the height of water level means the wage rates, and the width of the bottle means the labour market. This study does not consider various expenses (transport, rent, accommodation), which are added to the employees moving to the other country. They are forced to live away from their families, so they will have some additional expenses.

Based on the above table, we can reach the following conclusions:

At the W quota level, we have a unification of the wage rates for both countries, as well as the decrease of the wage rates in the country B, and the increase of the wage rates in Albania.

Incomes of Albania will fall into the areas (a+b+c+d), that means it will lose the areas (e+f), which will be in favour of the country B.

Historic incomes of the country B, (g+j+h), will be increased not only in the area (e+f), to be recovered by Albania but also in the area (z+x), which could be recovered as a result of the integration of the labour market.

As a result of the integration of the labour market of both countries, total national incomes of both countries will be extended to the area (z+x), which will be recovered as a result of the integration of the labour market.

Migration of active labor force and informality.

Economic opening of Albania after the 90-s was associated with the internal migration of the population to the areas with broader opportunities for employment and living. During the period of democratization of the country, the privatization of many enterprises, especially in the capital, opened many opportunities for employment. "The trends show that internal migration was grown during the period from 1990 to 1998 and at that point it fell again. This migration culminated in the years following the collapse of the pyramid schemes in the country when many people around the country moved to Tirana. Since 1998, the flow of people is considerably decreased and it seems it is stabilized to an average figure of some 20,000 persons a year."[15]

[14] Adam Smith, trans.,The Wealth of Nation,(Tirana: Toena 2001), 10-40.

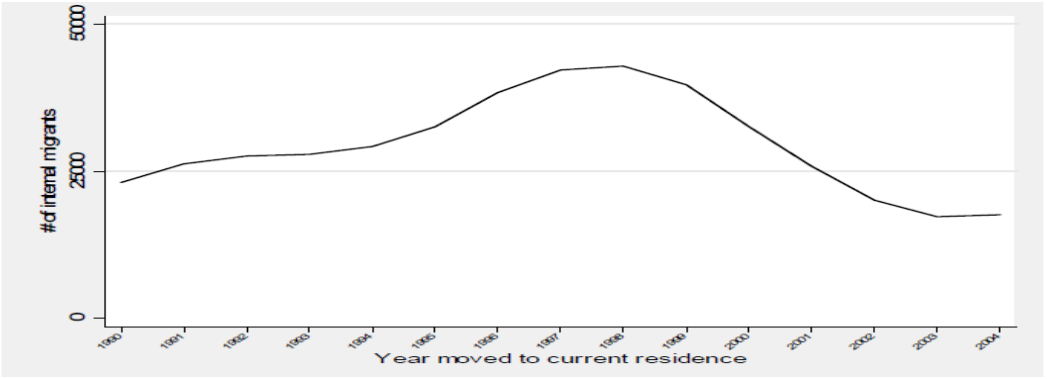
The movement of the population from rural to urban areas of Albania was not foreseen to be so difficult to be kept under control, and as a consequence, it brought a number of social problems in the country, such as unemployment, informal employment, low education, non-registration of the population in registry offices, overcrowding in several areas, where Tirana and Durres had more newcomers from other districts and especially from the north of the country. According to World Bank, "... with regard to the destination, the flows of people are equally distributed, where about one third of the total number of migrants goes to Tirana. In the last years, the part of internal migrants going to Tirana is further increased. Within the period from 2002 to 2004, some 4 out of 10 internal migrants have moved to Tirana municipality."[16]

Scheme: Flow of internal migrants by year



Source: World Bank, Albania: Urban Development, Migration and Reduction of Poverty, 57.

One of the most acute problems of internal migration in Albania was the informal employment of the active labor force. In economy, the informality has taken a large proportion and as such, it remains a problem to be solved for the entire Albanian society.

The informal sector, in accordance with the contemporary literature, and especially based on the definition of authors such as Schrage (1984) and Thomas (1992), is given the definition as: "A number of activities that are legally exercised in principle, which shall be subject to tax and tariffs but which are not declared as legal commercial activities, and are not included in the total value of national incomes or partially included in the GDP of the country"[17] Of course, the informal economy with the informal sector and fiscal evasion, are a consequence of an unsuccessful economic transition.

According to AFP data "... For 2009, some 55.8 % of general employment relates to informal economy. The employees to whom are not paid the social security contribution represent 27 % of the total of general employment. This is small compared with the other part of the self-employed people in the private sector of agriculture."[18] According to INSTAT, the majority of unpaid employees

[15] World Bank, Albania, Urban Development, Migration and Reduction of Poverty:Report No.40071- AL (Tirana: June 2007), 33-35.

[16] World Bank , Albania, Urban Development, Migration and Reduction of Poverty, 57.

[17] Richard Allen and Daniel Thomas, Managing Public Expenditure: A Reference Book for Transition Countries, (OECD: 2004), 12-16.

[18] PET, 9- Month Analysis 2011, Young professional educated people and their employment, (Tirana: Janary 2012), 3-5.

belong to the age-groups of 30 to 54 years old, where the young people are 27% of the total while the employees of 55 years old are 11 % of the total. The part of young unpaid employees of the family and the young self-employed individuals, presented in the value of informal employment, is about 66 % of the total of young employees. [19]

These figures are really worrying for the Albanian economy; therefore there is an immediate need for an intervention, and especially for the implementation of policies related to the employment of young people. Special attention shall be paid to the management of the high rates of informal economy in the country. Priority should be given to the fact that programs and policies being formulated and approved on the labor market and active labor force shall be well adapted to our national reality. As a matter of fact, figures on unemployment and employment of labor force are not realistic, not to say they are unreliable. This is also another reason for the unsuccessful implementation of employment policies and programs in Albania.

According to some economy experts in Albania, the main factors which led to consolidation of the informal economy in Albania are:[20] 1) Massive closure of the working activities during the first period of transition 2) large demographic movement to field areas (internal migration), to large cities and especially to Tirana. 3) High level of political orientation of public administration and significant interventions of the politics in the economic decision-making. 4) Development of a new legislation framework and periodic update, but still with uncertainties to the flourishing of the informal economy.

The causes of ill-functioning of actual policies for the employment of unemployed people and the existence of the informal market are many and of different nature. The Action Plan for the Employment of Young People (2010-2013) developed in cooperation with the International Labor Office (ILO) has identified other causes related to the existence of the informal market, such as; "lack of cooperation or institutional bureaucracy among executive bodies, such as Tax and Tariffs, National Labor Inspectorate, and the Institute of Social Securities. Another cause is connected with the lack of full control of movement and currency circulation favoring informality and unfair competition. Further on, the high flow of movement of labor force based on the demand-offer driver of the market, especially in the construction sector is rendering the control and identification of this black-collar labor market difficult...etc."[21]

As a conclusion, internal migration of the population, informal employment and the existence of informal market, promotion of illegal employment practices for the young people, lack of active policies for the protection of employed people in the informal market, bring growing negative social and economic consequences for Albania. Low wages, job related insecurity, shift from a profession to another, and poverty, are phenomena that accompany the informal unemployed people. A considerable number of them are people who have moved from rural to urban areas. These conditions of informality call for an immediate need for intervention. Based on these problematic issues of informality, it is very important to have related arrangements on the tax system in Albania.

Often, the content of taxes is very difficult to be understood by the entire population, because they are not realistic and very difficult to be applied. Reduction of taxes shall enable the control of formality. On the other side, bureaucratic barriers of Albanian state institutions have considerably influenced the increase of informality. As a consequence, the reliability of these institutions is at a low level and we could not further refer to the efficiency and effectiveness of the policies. Also, lack of exact figures of the migration of population and active labor forces makes it difficult to have exact figures on informal employment and informal economy in general.

[19] INSTAT, Results from the Labor Market Questionnaire, Labor Market in Albania, 28-30.

[20] Fatmir Mema and Zef Preçi, Informal Economy – A Barrier to a Sustainable Development, Special number of magazine: Transition and Economy, 1998), 2-4.

[21] Youth Employment and Migration and ILO, Albania: Action Plan for the Youth Employment 2010-2013, (Tirana: Printed at PEGI, 2010), 62.

Legislation on protection of labor forces and minimum wages.

In early 90-s, the institutions under the subordination of the Ministry of Labor assumed some commitments for the health and security protection of active labor forces. The labor market was opened at that time and it encountered difficulties such as the poor quality of working environments, either be environments of private or public institutions. "This was also a challenging reality as Albania was under the conditions of a ruined economy, associated with transition-related issues. The policy makers faced the need to implement more comprehensive reforms for the protection of employees."[22] The main objective of the Ministry of Labor was the formulation of policies for the security and health protection, as their priorities: "Protection of physical, mental and social integrity of employees and the institution which had to deal with the implementation of these policies was the State Labor Inspectorate, which promoted the implementation of the labor legislation."[23]

A sustainable economic development definitely requires the production progress and high quality but to achieve this, it is required the creation of proper conditions for labor, health protection and security of the employees. The implementation of policies for the employees' protection is in full compliance with the European Community standards, which aims at the improvement of the well being at work. Accordingly, the State Labor Inspectorate launched the initiative for drafting the strategy on security and health at work for the period 2007-2010, a legal package which supplements the Labor Code establishing the European Directive "Directive Cadre" 89/391 dated 12.06.1989."[24]

On 16.12.2009, "the Council of Ministers approved the draft law "On Security and Health at Work", drafted by the Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities, in the framework of the approximation of the Albanian legislation to the EU one and the obligations of Albania for the implementation of the Stabilization Association Agreement".[25] The employers' obligations to insure the employees in relation to the health at work, prevention of different risks due to accidents within the working premises, professional diseases and collective and individual protection were for the first time regulated by law only in 2009.

The Labor Code of the Republic of Albania has clearly stipulated all rights of the employees and employers' obligations. Hence, the working environment, supply of heavy machineries and other necessary equipment, conditions of illumination, humidity, temperatures of working environments, sanitary installations, cabinets for personal belongings, hygiene conditions in all premises, and in particular in the environments where food is consumed during the rest hours, fire extinguishment equipment or first aid kits, working or rest hours and drafting of regular legal contracts etc, are obligations of the employers to the employees.[26]

The payment of employees is certainly a legal obligation of employers who, by the most recent decision of the Council of Ministers, have defined the minimum monthly wages which still remain of the lowest in Europe. According to DCM 1114, the " for the purpose of the calculation of social and health security contributions, from 01.07.2010 onwards the minimum monthly wages will be not less than 16 820 (sixteen thousand and eight hundred and twenty) ALL while the maximum monthly wages will be 84 100 (eighty four thousand and one hundred) ALL. The minimum monthly amount of contributions for all security branches for the period from 1.7.2010 onwards will be 4 693 (four thousand and six hundred and ninety three) ALL. "[27]

---

[22] World Bank,Albania: Evaluation of the Labor Market, 15-16.

[23]Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities , Sectorial Strategy of Employment, 24-25.

[24] Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities , Sectorial Strategy of Employment, 37.

[25] Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities, Law No 10237: On Security and Public Health, (Tirana: official jornal 2009), 1-2.

[26] Ministry of Labor, Labor Code of the Republic of Albania, (Tirana 2003), 8-9.

[27] General Tax Directorate, DECISION No.1114, dated 30.7.2008, (Tirana: July 2008), 5.

All of the above components give an overview of the policies and legislation for the protection of employees and minimum monthly wages, which is the obligation of each employer. However, if we explore the reality of the employees in most of state businesses and institutions, the working conditions are far from desirable. The protection and security of employees is a legal requirement that is hard to be implemented for some important businesses within the country.

Such abuses that may be easily identified are not supported by the trade union organizations or the State Labor Inspectorate. The existence of trade unions as custodians of the employees' rights has not demonstrated proper effectiveness, which is so necessary. The trade unions in Albania have still not displayed the typical characteristics of trade union organizations for the protection of employees' rights and this group has unfortunately been under the influence of the Albanian politics.

As cited above, the Albanian legislation was significantly improved during the recent years. It has even progressed toward the unification with the European legislation. Yet, it is worth mentioning there is still much to be done for its practical implementation.

Effectiveness of labor market policies and programs in Albania.

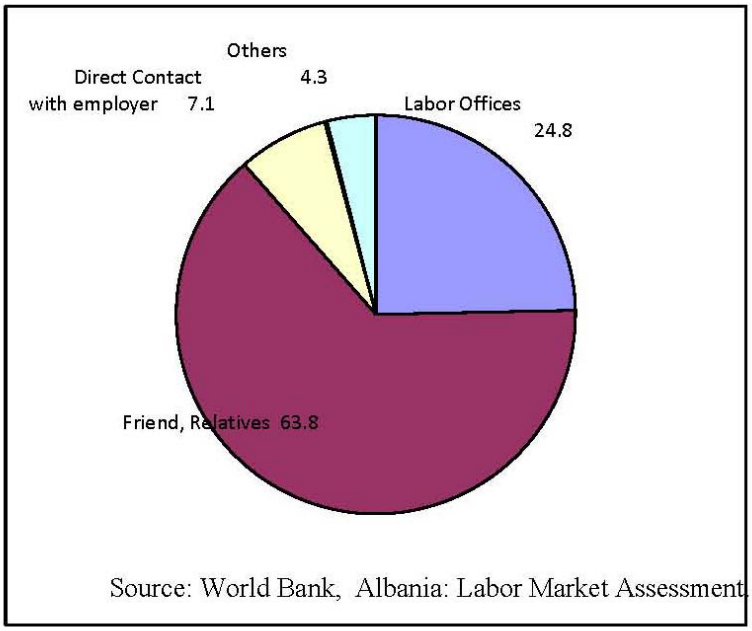
We have examined below some issues of the labor market in Albania, where some causes of domestic unemployment were explored. Lack of effectiveness of the labor market programs only discourages the employers and increases the number of unemployed. According to ILO (International Labor Office) in Albania, many problems are identified in relation to the effectiveness of labor market programs, where some of the most distinguished are: "1) incompliance between the level of professional skills of the jobseekers and professional skills required by the labor market, 2) low demand for the labor force, 3) unemployment period is long for the jobseekers due to the absence of information about job vacancies."[28]

Lack of precise information for finding a job discourages the jobseekers. The shift of unemployed individuals to the labor market is a challenging and chain process, therefore the effective implementation of labor market programs is crucial.

The employment counseling programs are essential and have been assumed as cost-effective programs, enabling the reduction of the number of unemployed. It is critical for these programs to support the unemployed, thus making possible the counseling process adaptation to real needs and potentials of those persons, jointly setting more realistic employment objectives. In Albania, this type of service to the unemployed is fictitious in most of the cases as the relations between the employment experts and the unemployed are generally short. Consequently no specific forecasts for each unemployed client may be realized. Hence, the provided service is less likely to comply with the client's needs and the type of job he/she is looking for.

On the other hand, another challenging factor is the information of jobseekers about free vacancies. The information of jobseekers via Internet has been applied in Albania only during last years as this type of information was generally provided through personal acquaintances of each individual and a limited number of people was informed and could find job through the employment offices. However, not all jobseekers have proper skills to apply for jobs via these websites or be informed of free vacancies.

[28] Valli' Corbanese and Gianni Rosas, Guide for drafting, monitoring and evaluation of innovatory programs of the labor market, targeting individuals at risk of exclusion from the labor market, (Tirana: ILO 2009), 9-10.



Source: World Bank, Albania: Labor Market Assessment

Job training programs developing the professional skills of jobseekers are an objective which, if effectively accomplished, has a major impact on the reduction of unemployment. In Albania, the Vocational Training Centers are extended to the main cities and towns and offer professional training for some of the professions currently required from the labor market. According to the data of PTA (Professional Training Agency), the young people who attend vocational training courses are more oriented to the labor market needs; therefore they have larger employment opportunities in comparison to the young people who follow higher education studies. "Accordingly, only for the first nine months of 2011, 2086 young people have been certified all over the country in different professional profiles and only 460 of them were employed, where 230 are females.

The largest number of employed people is reported in Shkodra district for the telemarketing course where 150 young people[29] are employed". We have observed that the professional training at these centers indeed covers the most required professions of the labor market but there are also some challenging issues in these institutions such as shortages of premises which are necessary to exercise the adequate working practice for a specific profession, unqualified human resources, concentration of training in theoretical aspects rather than practical ones.

In particular, compared to the training sessions conducted only in the teaching environments, the training which combines the classroom learning with on-job learning increases by 30 per cent its chances for positive effects on the labor market and when combined with other employment services; the positive impact probability is increased at 53 per cent.[30] Also, this program, although proving to be productive for the employment of local jobseekers, is again associated with a series of problems which make it partly effective.

[29]Dritan Shoraj and Dorina Zenelaj, Employment of young people with professional education, (paper presented at the seminar conducted by Don Bosco Center, Tiana: Janary 2012), 8-10.

[30] J. Fares, O.S. Puerto, Towards comprehensive training, (World Bank Mimeo: Washington D.C. 2008), 21-25.

Jobseekers subsidy programs are indeed likely to have a positive impact on the increase of the number of employed. The reduction of labor force costs for the employers is a policy encouraging the latter to increase the number of employees in their enterprises.

However, according to ILO assessment about the effectiveness of labor market policies in Albania, "a series of evaluations carried out for the employment subsidy programs suggest that the latter may increase the chances for the disadvantaged individuals to fill the job vacancies. Alternatively, there are insufficient facts demonstrating that these programs really increase the number of available job vacancies."[31]

In addition to the foregoing, it seems that the subsidy programs for the jobseekers in Albania have no significant impact on the reduction of the number of unemployed. There are two potential causes to produce this type of result. Firstly, similar policies are little implemented in Albania and secondly, not all local enterprises and businesses are realistically informed of the employment promotion programs and policies. Hence, it seems that the system as a whole does not properly function, the lack of cooperation between respective factors and bureaucracy represent a main barrier rendering these programs ineffective.

In the meantime, the employment promotion programs for marginalized women or employment promotion programs for the young Bachelor graduates, are currently more challenging in respect of their implementation. "Over 40% of women have not participated in the labor market. For many women it is hard to find a job and there is a high level of unemployment such as the long-term unemployment. The labor market situation for women is particularly negative and demanding in urban areas where only a little more than one third are employed and the unemployment level is almost 30%."[32] However, according to the World Bank, the involvement level of women in the labor market in Albania is very low compared to Europe and shows lower figures in comparison to Turkey, Bosnia-Herzegovina or Macedonia.

Again, numerous difficulties have been encountered in this case for the implementation of this program as a whole. On the other hand, the employment of young Bachelor graduates is a challenge for the policy makers in Albania. "The trends of young people to follow higher education studies, without taking into consideration the real needs of the market for this type of profession they may benefit from such education, has made the market for young Bachelor graduates be oversaturated , generally in branches such as law, international relations, diplomacy, psychology etc."[33]

Conclusions and recommendations.

On the basis of the foregoing, the positive impact of employment policies and programs and entry of the unemployed to the labor market should be related to the increase of the number of employed persons. However, such a reality is not present in Albania. The programs still lack the desired effectiveness.

Firstly, the whole paper represents that policies and programs in Albania are not missing and the Albanian legislation is even too modernized and adapted to the labor market needs. The premises to be part of EU have made Albania growingly unify the labor market policies and programs. Their successful implementation is a weak point for the respective institutions. A larger cooperation between the comprehensive institutions may lead to the increase of effectiveness of these policies and reduction of unemployment.

Secondly, the opening of labor market to the EU will bring the unification of salaries for all countries and consequently, the social welfare development. In the meantime, as observed in the above graph on movement of labor forces as a consequence of the merger of these two markets, the total incomes of these two countries will be increased in the area (z+x), which remained unexploited prior to their merger. The Albanian Government should properly arrange for the increase of salaries and their approximation to the European standards for the purpose of avoiding the massive movement of active labor forces.

[31] Valli' Corbanese and Gianni Rosas, Guide for drafting, monitoring and evaluation of innovatory programs of the labor market, targeting individuals at risk of exclusion from the labor market, 14-17.

[32] World Bank , Albania: Labor Market Assessment, 79-82.

[33] Dritan Shoraj and Dorina Zenelaj, Employment of young people with professional education, 9-10.

Thirdly, the transition period has made the internal migration reach high figures and there are still no accurate figures on the settlement of population towards areas with larger employment and living opportunities. Hence, the lack of statistics on internal migration makes the informal employment of this stratum of population difficult to be controlled, so there are high informal employment figures within the country.

Consequently, the informality has caused low salaries for the employed under informality, without security at work due to the non-involvement in social securities, high health and social risks and poverty. In reducing the informal employment, the cooperation among the Tax and Duty Authorities, State Labor Inspectorate and Institute of Social Securities would be effective, as well as the promotion of these policies and programs to enable their recognition by the employers.

Fourthly, according to all evaluations made on the effectiveness of labor market programs, Albania has qualitative employment programs but due to their poor implementation, the effectiveness is very low. Consequently, there is a very high level of unemployment, one of the countries with the highest figures in the region, with 13.25% of the population unemployed for the first nine months of 2011. The creation of specialized groups to enable the training of teams dealing with the implementation of on-site labor market policies and programs. Supervision and continuous motivation of these groups, their performance evaluation and benchmarking.

References

- Adam Smith, trans.,The Wealth of Nation,(Tirana: Toena 2001).
- Dritan Shoraj and Dorina Zenelaj, Employment of young people with professional education, (paper presented at the seminar conducted by Don Bosco Center, Tiana: Janary 2012).
- Fatmir Mema and Zef Preçi, Informal Economy – A Barrier to a Sustainable Development, Special number of magazine: Transition and Economy, 1998).
- General Tax Directorate, DECISION No.1114, dated 30.7.2008, (Tirana: July 2008).
- INSTAT "Results from the Labor Market Questionnaire, Labor Market in Albania", accessed Janary 10,2012, http:// www.instat.gov.al
- INSTAT, Results from the Labor Market Questionnaire, Labor Market in Albania, 28-30.
- J. Fares, O.S. Puerto, Towards comprehensive training, (World Bank Mimeo: Washington D.C. 2008).
- Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities , Sectorial Strategy of Employment 2007-2013(Tirana: 2007).
- Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities, Law No 10237: On Security and Public Health, (Tirana: official jornal 2009).
- Official Journal, "On Promotion of Employment", Law No. 7995, dated 20.09.1995.
- PET, 9- Month Analysis 2011, Young professional educated people and their employment, (Tirana: Janary 2012).
- Richard Allen and Daniel Thomas, Managing Public Expenditure: A Reference Book for Transition Countries,(OECD: 2004).
- Theo Hitiris, European Union Economics:Fifth Edition,(Prentice Hall Europe: 2003).
- UNCTAD, Foreign Direct Investment Report for Abania (Tirana: 2011).
- Valli' Corbanese and Gianni Rosas, Guide for drafting, monitoring and evaluation of innovatory programs of the labor market, targeting individuals at risk of exclusion from the labor market, (Tirana: ILO 2009).
- World Bank, Albania, Urban Development, Migration and Reduction of Poverty:Report No.40071- AL (Tirana: June 2007).
- World Bank, Albania: Market Labor Assessment, Report No. 34597-AL,(Tirana:May 2006).
- Youth Employment and Migration and ILO, Albania: Action Plan for the Youth Employment 2010-2013, (Tirana: Printed at PEGI, 2010).

POLITICAL REGIMES AND ECONOMIC PERFORMANCE

JIHAN SHANABLI[*]

Abstract
The present paper brings a contribution to the research area dedicated to the relationship between political regimes and economic growth. Implicitly the interdependence relation between the two large domains, namely politics and economy will be the core of the study.
The major focus will be on the way politics influences the economic evolution and development of a country.
The premise is that political institutionsplay an essential part with respect to the economic performance as they have the potential to relax the constraints imposed over the economic structure and not only. The three basic dimensions used in constructing the paper are thedegree of political freedom, the level of political stability and the level of political security.

Keywords: political regime and economic performance, political institutions, political freedom, political stability, political security.

Introduction

During the last decades, the economic, political and social development has reached new levels. Regarding the academic interest presented, political researchers, economic scientists and sociologists transformed this area of research into one of the most prosperous and dynamic fields of social sciences.

Despite the fact that the difference of development between the countries represents a reality, it is only recently that the scientists started to focus on the elements that are responsible for painting this reality and to properly examine them.

Every economy is in fact sustained by a certain political framework, therefore it is impossible for the economic agent to be insensitive to the political structure sustaining that economy. Thus, the political regime, along with its government and taking into account its characteristics and level of efficacy, attracts repercussions over the economic framework of the country in question[1].

The level of economic development brings information not only about the implemented political regime, but also about the rules and goals of the respective country. Therefore, looking into the causes and primary elements that lead to a favorable economic performance became a topic of major interest for the 21st century scientists.

It is only recently that the existing relationship between political regime and economic performance started to be properly analyzed.

There are more and more studies pointing towards the failure at the level of governing as primary cause for the slow and inequitable economic growth, as well as the defining element of the poorest countries in the world.

It is these studies that put the form of government, including here its characteristics, on a superior level of any research agenda having as main goal a better understanding of the political economy regarding economic development[2].

---

[*] Ph. D. candidate, Doctorship, fourth year of study, National Institute of Economic Research - Romanian Academy (email: shanablijihan@yahoo.com).

[1] Yi Feng, Democracy, Governance, and Economic Performance. Theory and Evidence (Cambridge, Massachusetts, London, England: Massachusetts Institute of Technology Press, 2003), 17.

[2] Philip KEEFER, "Governance." The SAGE Handbook of Comparative Politics. (2009). SAGE Publications, accessed March, 10, http://www.sage-ereference.com/hdbk_compolitics/Article_n25.html.

The present paper brings a contribution to the interest presented in analyzing the relationship between political regimes and economic performance.

My target in this article is to underline the political determinants over the economic performance, meaning on the way politics affects the economic performance. Therefore, the question here is: Does politics, and here I am making reference as well to policies, play any role in determining the degree of economic performance?

Therefore, my objective is to analyze the types of political regimes capable of providing social and political conditions favorable for the economic and social development. For this I will briefly define and explain the major elements of political regimes. Afterwards I will discuss the relationship between political regimes and economic performance, having in mind the major political factors that bring along repercussions over the economic growth and development. Finally, after drawing a line, I will come up with the concluding remarks.

Content

In a modern society, the state is often identified with the political community or with the government as such[3], and implicitly with the type of political regime or the way of governing.

There is no universal definition of the political regime. From the many interpretations and visions, I chose to explain the political regime as the regime that brings into light the way of organizing and ruling a country in which it is reflected both the activity of the state institutions, as well as of the political parties, of the groups of interest or pressure groups and of the other organizations of the civil society. Such an interpretation of the political regimes is not based on the identification of those who detain state power, but on the way these exercise the power in the state[4].

The tight relationship between institutions, primarily political institutions, and economic performance represents a major issue of academic preoccupation during the last decades[5].

A rich society supposes a political regime characterized by strict rules that allow an efficient economic system and the implementation of institutions capable of sustaining this performance.

It is the state the primary mechanism of resource allocation and the one capable of stimulating or inhibiting the economic growth and therefore performance. The political institutions are those that mold the political economy[6], and the political reasons spring from the welfare brought by the existence of resources.

The group of politics that brings a solid contribution to the economic performance of a country points towards the protection of the property rights, the maintenance of macroeconomic stability, a sufficient level of economic freedom and of the free market, the assurance of a public goods network as well as the existence of a proper infrastructure and a certain level of education[7].

Because the economic development takes place when the individuals put away capital and make investments, appealing to present sacrifices aiming future gaining, this cannot happen in the absence of a proper frame[8].

Therefore, the economic development and performance depend on the country's ability to offer a favorable environment for the individuals to make investments in their own economy, as

---

[3]LiahGreenfeld, „Nationalism and Modernity", Social Research, Vol. 63, No. 1, Spring, (1996), 20.

[4] T. Draganu, Dreptconstitutional,siinstitutiipolitice(Bucharest: Lumina Lex , Vol. I, 1998), 266.

[5] Michelle Egan, "Markets", The SAGE Handbook of European Studies (2009), SAGE Publications, accessed March 10, 2008 <http://www.sage-ereference.com/hdbk_eurostudies/Article_n8.html>.

[6]Thad Dunning, "Resource Dependence, Economic Performance and Political Stability", The Journal of Conflict Resolution, Vol. 49, No. 4, Paradigm in Distress?Primary Commodities and Civil War, (Aug., 2005), 474.

[7]Stephan Haggard and Robert R. Kaufman, *Development, Democracy, and Welfare States. Latin America, East Asia, and Eastern Europe, (*New Jersey:Princeton University Press, 2008), 353.

[8]Yi FENG, *Democracy, Governance, and Economic Performance. Theory and Evidence, (*Cambridge, Massachusetts, London, England :Massachusetts Institute of Technology Press, 2003), 21.

investments have proved to be the essential component of growth, among other potential factors that can lead to a good economic performance[9].

To analyze the existing differences at economic level between the world's nations, we cannot reach very far regarding the gross categories of political regimes, namely liberal-democratic political regimes, populist authoritarian political regimes, oligarchical authoritarian political regimes, totalitarian political regimes, or regarding the gross categories of the economic system, capitalism or market economy versus communist economies[10].

Yet, in general terms we can talk about three types of political regimes: democratic, totalitarian and authoritarian.

A short vision of a democratic regime points towards that regime in which political parties lose elections as the results of the democratic processes are uncertain and determined by the people[11]. It is about the officials elected through secrete vote, about free, fair and frequent elections, about the freedom of expression, alternative sources of information, freedom of association and universal suffrage[12]. Thus, by democracy we can understand the type of political regime characterized by civil rights, representative institutions and public liberties[13].

Totalitarian regimes can be fascist or comunist regimes. Both types cancel or decrease the rights and liberities of citizens, annihilate opposition and political adversaries, impose an official doctrine, manipulates the public opinion through its demagogical discourse, enforce the repressive apparatus, and so on[14]. In other words, the state interferes and annihilates the forces of society by creating new institutions subject to the unlimited control of the ruling elite, control which can be found in all fields, such as economy, education, culture, religion and even over the family[15].

As for the authoritarian regimes, which many have evolved into dictatorships, these are characterized by the restrainment of certain rights through the excessive rationalization and the marginalization of the parliament, through the restriction of political pluralism and the concentration of the political power in the hands of one authoritarian leader. Yet there is allowed the existance of autonomous groups, more if these appeared long before the regime[16].

Basically, the conclusion that we can draw from here is that every time we talk about a certain political regime and about its economic performance, we must take into account its particularities, and in the context of globalization, there must be included in the general picture the cultural turning or change to which many countries are subjected[17].

In the case of non-democratic political regimes, power represents at any time a delicate topic. In most cases, the communist party takes control over the mobility of all important party members and officials' carriers through the nomenclature system. Personnel control is based on the core of the party's political power. Thus, on the one side, the communist ideology does not separate politics from economy, and on the other side, the communist regimes are maintained through the compensation of the right people appealing to professional promotion. The good economic performance does not necessarily describe the most loyal and important candidates for power

---

[9] Michelle Egan, "Markets".

[10] Harold L. Wilensky, *Rich Democracies. Political Economy, Public Policy and Performance, (*Bekerly, Los Angeles, California :University of California Press, 2002), 216.

[11] Adam Przeworski, Democracy and the Market. Political and Economic Reforms in Eastern Europe and Latin America, (Cambridge:Cambridge University Press, 1991), 10.

[12] Robert Dahl, *Despred*emocraţie, (Institutul European, 2003).

[13] Morton R. Davies and Vaughan A. Lewis, *Models of Political Systems, (*London, Basingstoke: Manmillan, 1971), 98, 99.

[14] CristianIonescu, RegimuriPoliticeContemporane, (Bucharest:All Beck, 2004), 86.

[15] Karen Dawisha and Bruce Parrott, The Consolidation of Democracy in East-Central Europe, Cambridge, (New York:Cambridge University Press, 1997).

[16] Dawisha and Parrott, The Consolidation of Democracy in East-Central Europe,

[17] Trevor J. Barnes, „Retheorizing Economic Geography: From the Quantitative Revolution to the Cultural Turn", *Annals of the Association of American Geographers, (*Vol. 91, No. 3, Sep., 2001), 457.

positions in such political regimes. Finally, the economic performance of local leaders counts only in the measure these manage to bring political and financial benefits to the higher rank elites of the regime[18].

As for the democratic regimes, voting on economic bases has most of the time a punishment role, and the best reward for an official is to be reelected. This comes in contradiction to the communist regimes where the economic responsibility consists in rewards, especially in promoting the official, and the punishment for incompetence represents a rarity[19].

Despite the fact that many political scientists associate democracy with social and economic welfare, today's reality clearly points us that a spectacular economic performance can be obtained not necessarily by a democracy, and the best example in this case is China[20].

The premise of the present paper consits in that political institutions play an essential role regarding economic growth, in the sense that it is these institutions that have the potential to relax the contraints imposed over the economic structure and not only. That is, the level of performance of the different economies consists in the political institutions belonging to the political regime that establish the political parameters regarding both the economic as well as social development. Cutting loose, the political regime, with its political institutions, generates the general political conditions for the economic performance[21].

Yet, not to forget that even the political institutions and values are exposed to changes[22].

Due to the fact that the paper represents a study of the connection between political regimes and economic performance, I suggest to focus primarily on three major dimensions specific to any political regime, namely the type of political regime, and here I am referring to the level of political freedom, the level of political stability and the level of political security.

Relating these three dimensions to economic development, it can be drawn the following: no political dimension, per se, can determine economic performance. Besides the direct impact of these dimensions in relation to the economic development, these come to affect as well the economic performnce throught the influence they have over other variables that are in themselves in favor or against economic growth. Thus, these dimensions constitute the political bases of the economic management and affects not only the economic performance, but also the economic growth determinants, such as inflation, investments, human capital, income distribution, property rights, population growth, and others[23].

Why the three dimensions?

The degree of political freedom, political stability and political security represent the three major political dimensions that shape the political institutions of any political regime. Taking into account the fact that the political institutions are those that create the political environment for the economic growth and social and economic development, it must be underlined that also the institutions are the ones that condition and constrain the economic decisions of the individual to invest in consistent capital. Therefore, the decisions of the economic actor are influenced by the political conditions on the local market. As such, the economic growth, which is a function of accumulation for the consistent capital, will increase or decrease according to the three political variables: political freedom, political stability and political security.

Various studies have concluded that the lower the probability for the regime to survive or the higher the level of political instability, the lower the level of economic growth. Moreover, the more

---

[18] Gang Guo, „Retrospective Economic Accountability under Authoritarianism: Evidence from China", *Political Research Quaterly, (*Vol. 60, No. 3, Sep., 2007), 380.

[19] Gang Guo, „Retrospective Economic Accountability under Authoritarianism: Evidence from China", p. 382.

[20] Henry Wai-Chung Yeung and George C.S. Lin, „Theorizing Economic Geographies of Asia", *Economic Geography, (*Vol. 79, No. 2, Clark University, Apr. 2003), 107.

[21] Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 11.

[22] Morton R. Davies and Vaughan A. Levis, Models of Political Systems, 92.

[23] Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 1.

polarized the position of the parties in opposition or the higher the degree of uncertainty or security, the lower the degree of performance. Finally, the more repressive a political regime is, meaning the lower the level of political freedom, the lower the growth rate[24].

It is important to underline that the lack of political freedom is about the impossibility of the individual to reach a certain goal, and not about the incapacity of reaching that goal as when the individual is too poor to obtain what he wants without confrunting any legal interdictions.

For a political regime to be firm, this has to be accepted by the society. As for the political stability, it is the form of government rather than its content. The public officials and policies are subject to change, rather they remain firm in the sense that the political institutions show a capacity of resistance without any major change of the model.

The radical political changes that lead to the replacement of the political regime are those to increase the level of uncertainty when it comes to investments, the main element of performance, thus there is place for negative effects.

Political security, the third major dimension, can be understood as the absence of disagreement over the public policy between government and opossition. The uncertain policy impedes growth and investments through the increase in the retained goods and the decrease of the present investment value.

Studies in the field have shown that irrespective of the degree of political freedom, a secure and stable society is prefered instead of a stable but unsecure society or secure but unstable society[25].

Again, none of the three variables represents a necessary or suffiecient condition for the economic growth. An undemocratic regime can enjoy a favorable economic performance if this is politically stable or if it is economically efficient[26]. On the other side, a democratic regime, which most of the times is conceived to promote growth and development, can experience an economic slow down if it is affected by the lack of political stability and security[27][28].

The life of a political regime is associated in a positive manner with the level of economic growth. The higher the economidc performance of a regime, the more popular the party in power.

Besides the direct and visible effects created by political freedom, political security and political stability, the indirect effects present quite a similar importance. The determinats of economic growth such as inflation, human capital, investments, income distribution, property rights, population increase, affect both the economic and social evolution of any country.

Inflation, which is both an economic and a political phenomenon, brings negative effects over the private investments and therefore over the economic growth rate, and it represents a consequence of the macroeconomic uncertainty[29]. The lower the level of political security, the higher the level of inflation. The higher the level of political stability, the lower the inflatin rate. Yet there cannot be said if a democracy can bring lower rate of inflation than a nondemocratic regime. What is sure is that political instability brings a major impact over inflation, as it can come up with devastating consequences over the price stability[30].

Investments represent another key element for the economic growth. Irrespective of the type of political regime implemented, the government has to be consistent in executing the policy. Even though we might deal with a bad policy which is going to be carried out, the investor may still find ways to make money. The really important aspect here is consistancy in carrying out the policy. Besides the domestic political institutions that affect the level of savings and investments, the international factors also have to be taken into consideration. Many times the domestic environment

[24]Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 21.
[25]Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 37.
[26] This is the case Of Taiwan during 1970's and 1980's.
[27] This can be the case of Russia and Poland at the beginning of the 1990's.
[28]Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 37.
[29]Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 126.
[30]Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 157.

for investments is constrained by the economic relationships between countries and by the international security. Also there must be pointed out the consequences of international economic sanctions or international conflicts. What is certain is that the more obvious the growth is in the past, the more probable is for investors to make investments in the future[31]. Political corruption affects as well the level of investments[32].

Instability and economic stress bring consequences too over the level of investments by destroying the confidence that the political arrangement will remain untouched[33]. Only a capable, stable and powerful government is able to maintain the political capacity consistent with the desired politics and the stability of political freedom and of the civil liberties.

Between politics and education there is an obvious connection, as the state is the one shaping the educational system with the purpose of realizing its political agenda, and science is the one ensuring the progress of society and the improvement of the human quality of life. If democracies, through the production of human capital, manage to enlarge the formation of human capital necessary for the economic growth, for the authoritarian regimes sometimes science can harm its political control[34].

As for the income distribution, a democratic regime has more chances to reduce income inequalities than a nondemocratic regime. For the latter, the strong minority holds the power as well as the motivations to influence the political elite when favourable politics for the income augmentation need to be adopted[35].

The relationship between economic freedom and political freedom is important for our study. Political freedom is an important factor, if not a condition for economic freedom. As for the economic freedom, this presents two major components, the protection of private property and the freedom of usage and exchange of the property. Two conditions are required. First, when the purchased property takes the legal and peaceful way, it is protected against the physical invasion of others, and secondly, when the individuals enjoy their freedom to use, exchange or offer their property as long as by their actions no identical rights of other are being violated[36].

The birth rate brings also indirect effects over the economic performance of a country. In case of a stable, capable and free government, the birth rates face a decline.

In order to make applicable its agenda, a country has to spend. If in the case of the democratic regimes, the political leaders are compensated or punished by the electorate by renewing or not their mandate, in the case of non-democratic regimes, while the stake is the promotion of the national good, the compensation or the punishment for the local leaders in conformity with the economic records of their jurisdictions can represent an efficient strategy to enforce the legitimacy of the political regime[37].

Conclusions

The premise of the paper states that the political institutions play a major role regarding the economic performance as it is them that have the potential to relax the constraints imposed over the economic structure and not only. It is the political institutions of the regime as such, including its particularities and the cultural turn, that establish the political parameters not only for the economic

---

[31] Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance. Theory and Evidence, 172.

[32] Stephen Knack and Phillip Keefer, „Institutions and Economic Performance: Cross-Country Tests Using Alternative Institutional Measures", Economics and Politics, (1995), 7:207-227.

[33] Jeffrey E. Cohen, „Economic Perceptions and Executive Approval in Comparative Perspective", *Political Behavior, (*Vol. 26, No. 1, Mar., 2004), 30-31.

[34] Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 193.

[35] Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 193.

[36] Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance. Theory and Evidence, 252-253.

[37] Gang Guo, „Retrospective Economic Accountability under Authoritarianism: Evidence from China", 379.

development as for the social development as well. Thus, the political regime, with its political institutions, generates the general political conditions for the economic performance.

As a general rule after years of studies, the conclusion in the field is that for a certain and continuous economic growth, a country has to maintain a stable political atmosphere, to improve both economic and political freedom, to maintain a capable and efficient government. Political stability and governmental efficiency have been declared stimulators for economic performance.

The accent fell on three major dimensions: the degree of political freedom, the level of political stability and the level of political security.

In the case of economic performance, political stability is preferred to instability, and in the case of instability, the lower it is, the better. Yet, if there is a high level of instability, as long as the existing policy is maintained in the future, its negative effect can be significantly reduced. Political liberty is important as well as the political reform towards a higher level of openness can lead to a better economic performance, and more as the democratic institutions bring important effects over the degree of competition. Yet, irrespective of the degree of freedom, investors prefer a stable and secure society.

Economic growth is sustained by savings and investments. A regime that is unstable determines its consumers to reduce economies and to increase consumption. In case of political uncertainty, both demand and supply for capital go down. More, the political instability makes the working opportunities less attractive and available, decreasing this way the potential for savings.

Yet, none of the three variable represents a sufficient and necessary condition to ensure a good economic performance. But a combination of the three creates effects over the economic growth. A regime deprived of freedom, unstable and uncertain is destined to have a disabled economy, and this because the political repression, instability and uncertainty define and constrain the economic decisions taken by the individuals on the market[38].

A non-democratic country can enjoy a good economic performance if it is politically stable or if it is economically efficient[39]. A democracy, which most of the times is conceived as promoting growth and development, can experience an economic slow down as result of the lack of political stability and security[40].

Besides the direct impact of these three dimensions, there stand the indirect influences over other variable that can be either for or against economic growth. These dimensions constitute the political basis for the economic management and affect not only the economic performance, but also the determinants of economic growth, such as inflation, investments, human capital, income distribution, property rights, and population increase[41].

The economic growth and development depend on the capacity of the regime to offer a favourable environment for the individuals to invest in their own economy, as investments represent one of the potential factors which sustain economic performance.

Drawing a line, the key to success seems to consist in a group of policies that sustain economic growth. This group includes the protection of property rights, the maintenance of macroeconomic stability, the control of inflation as a major economic objective, a sufficient degree of economic freedom and the existence of a free market, the insurance of a public goods network as well as infrastructure and education[42].

Despite the fact that most political scientists tended to associate democracy with the social and economic welfare, the case of Asia comes to question this assumption.

---

[38]Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 89, 90, 296.

[39]The case of Taiwan during 1970's and 1980's.

[40]The case of Russia and Poland at the beginning of the 1990's.

[41]Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance. Theory and Evidence, 1.

[42]Stephan Haggard and Robert R. Kaufman, *Development, Democracy, and Welfare States.Latin America, East Asia, and Eastern Europe, (*Princeton, New Jersey Princeton University Press, 2008), 353.

Most recent studies in the field have concluded that the effects of democracy over the growth are statistically insignificant. Democracy can promote performance through the facilitation of certain factors as investments, inflation, education, birth rates, economic freedom/ property rights, income distribution, political stability, factors that by themselves lead to an improvement of the level of performance. Despite the fact that democracy does not bring a direct effect on economic performance, due to its principles, primarily a strong middle class, responsibility in front of the electorate, etc., it can decrease the degree of political instability, improving indirectly the economic performance[43].

Economic performance is not about democracy or non-democracy, but about a secure, firm, strong and in a continuous development economy.

No matter the type of political regime, the government has to be consistent in the execution of its policy. In the case of a bad policy, but consistent, investors can still find ways of making money.

The impact that political regimes can have over the economic institutions can be critical. The maintenance of economic freedom depends not only on the tradition of respecting the property rights, but also on a political system consistent with the economic freedom. Thus, while the direct effect of democracy over the growth has an ambiguous character, its indirect effects can have a positive impact due to the secure property rights and other economic liberties[44].

To conclude, about the three main dimensions it can be said that first, the lower the probability for the regime to survive, the higher the level of political instability and as such the lower the rate of economic growth; second, the more polarized the position between the opposition parties or the higher the degree of uncertainty/ insecurity, the lower the degree of performance; and finally, the more repressive a regime is, that is the lower the level of political freedom, the lower the rate of growth.

References

- Barnes, Trevor J.. „Retheorizing Economic Geography: From the Quantitative Revolution to the Cultural Turn", Annals of the Association of American Geographers, Vol. 91, No. 3,(Sep., 2001).
- Cohen, Jeffrey E.. „Economic Perceptions and Executive Approval in Comparative Perspective", Political Behavior, Vol. 26, No. 1, (Mar., 2004).
- Dahl, Robert. *Despre*mocrație, (Institutul European, 2003
- Davies, Morton R., and Lewis, Vaughan A.. Models of Political Systems, London, Basingstoke: Manmillan, 1971.
- Dawisha, Karen, and Parrott, Bruce. The Consolidation of Democracy in East-Central Europe, Cambridge, New York:Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Draganu, T..*Dreptconstituțional*şi*instituțiipolitice*, Bucharest: Lumina Lex , Vol. I, 1998.
- Dunning, Thad. "Resource Dependence, Economic Performance and Political Stability", The Journal of Conflict Resolution, Vol. 49, No. 4, Paradigm in Distress? Primary Commodities and Civil War, (Aug., 2005).
- Egan, Michelle. "Markets", The SAGE Handbook of European Studies (2009), SAGE Publications, accessed March 10, 2008 <http://www.sage-ereference.com/hdbk_eurostudies/Article_n8.html>.
- Feng, Yi. Democracy, Governance, and Economic Performance. Theory and Evidence , Cambridge, Massachusetts, London, England: Massachusetts Institute of Technology Press, 2003.
- Greenfeld, Liah. „Nationalism and Modernity", Social Research, Vol. 63, No. 1, Spring, (1996).
- Guo, Gang. „Retrospective Economic Accountability under Authoritarianism: Evidence from China", Political Research Quaterly, Vol. 60, No. 3,(Sep., 2007).
- Haggard, Stephan, and Kaufman, Robert R.. Development, Democracy, and Welfare States. Latin America, East Asia, and Eastern Europe, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 2008.

[43]Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance. Theory and Evidence, 90, 93.
[44]Yi Feng, Democracy Governance, and Economic Performance.Theory and Evidence, 273, 274.

- Ionescu, Cristian. RegimuriPoliticeContemporane, Bucharest:All Beck, 2004.
- Knack, Stephen, and Keefer, Phillip. „Institutions and Economic Performance: Cross-Country Tests Using Alternative Institutional Measures", Economics and Politics, (1995).
- KEEFER, Philip. "Governance." The SAGE Handbook of Comparative Politics. (2009). SAGE Publications, accessed March, 10, http://www.sage-ereference.com/hdbk_compolitics/Article_n25.html.
- Przeworski, Adam. Democracy and the Market. Political and Economic Reforms in Eastern Europe and Latin America, Cambridge:Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Wilensky, Harold L..Rich Democracies. Political Economy, Public Policy and Performance, Bekerly, Los Angeles, California :University of California Press, 2002.
- Yeung, Henry Wai-Chung, and Lin, George C.S.. „Theorizing Economic Geographies of Asia", Economic Geography, Vol. 79, No. 2, Clark University,(Apr. 2003).

DO REALLY EMPLOYEES RESIST CHANGE? CASE STUDY AT A CREDIT INSTITUTION

DANIELA BRADUȚANU[*]

Abstract
Organizational management literature describes resistance to change as an impediment, an inevitable and natural reaction to change. The purpose of this study is to show that employees do not always resist change, at least not change per se. We have conducted a survey in a credit institution that underwent a major change in the last few years. Data was collected using questionnaires, interviews with managers and other employees and direct observation. The objectives of the study are to identify the real reasons why employees resist change, what is the outcome expectation of the change process and if the employees support the change process. Some researchers argue that top management usually opposes the new changes, while others confute these statements. The identified results show that few employees resist change, willingness to change being the general response in the organization.

Keywords: organizational change, resistance, credit institution, personal interests, status quo

Introduction

Organizational change and resistance to change received academic interest when Kurt Lewin (1947) developed his theories of change and field theory in social science in the late 1940's (Marsh, 2009). Since 1928, Lewin had been working on the idea that the status quo represented an equilibrium between the barriers to change and the forces favoring change. Even if Lewin's activity was followed by many researchers and practitioners who developed more complex change models, the success of achieving major change in organizations has been chronicled as being poor, some researchers noting failure rates reaching as high as 70 per cent (Beer and Nohria, 2000; Burnes, 2005; By, 2007, Carleton and Lineberry, 2004; Wildenberg, 2006). A study published by the Center for Creative Leadership reported that between 66 per cent and 75 per cent of all public and private change initiatives fail, a depressing statistic for those who seek to change an organization (Kee and Newcomer, 2008).

Resistance to change represents a common concept in the field of organizational change, being recognized for a long time as an important factor that impacts the success of an organizational change effort. Through this study, we tried to highlight employee's reaction towards change. The objectives of the study are: first, to identify the main reasons why employees resist change, if they resist it of course, second, what is the outcome expectation of the change effort and the third, do employees support the change process. Some researchers argue that top management usually opposes the new changes, while others confute these statements. To answer our objectives, we have conducted a survey in a credit institution that underwent a major change for the last years. Data was collected using questionnaires, interviews with managers and other employees and direct observation.

Literature review

Any change, no matter how apparently beneficial to workers and the organization, will be met with and often be sabotaged by resistance (Spiker and Lesser, 1995). Even if many organizations try to implement new changes, because of the employee's resistance, a lot of them fail to accomplish the results of the change process.

Resistance is often viewed as the enemy of a change process. Many authors (Lawrence, 1954; Maurer, 1996; Strebel, 1994; Waddell and Sohal, 1998; among others) highlight that the reasons for the failure of many change initiatives can be found in resistance to change. In Schein's view (1988), resistance to change is considered to be one of the most ubiquitous of organizational phenomena. Ansoff (1990) defines resistance as an impediment, a multifaceted phenomenon that affects the change process, slowing it down and introducing costs and instabilities. Resistance also represents any behavior that tries to maintain the status quo. Employees adjust to certain conditions, create social relationships and any change that might disrupt their working environment is seen as an obstacle.

[*] Ph. D. candidate, West University of Timisoara, Faculty of Economics and Business Administration, aliasd17@yahoo.com.

Resistance to change represents a natural reaction of the people, which is why it is expected. Many reasons of resistance to change are due to human nature, but most of them are affected by life experiences. Kotter and Schlesinger (1979) identified four most common reasons for resisting change: people focus on their own interests and not on those of the organization, misunderstanding of the change and its implications, belief that the change does not make sense for the organization, and low tolerance for change (Bennebroek Gravenhorst, 2003). Conner (1998) mentions that loss of control is the most important cause that determines people to manifest resistance. In the romanian literature 15 reasons that cause resistance to change have been identified and presented by Mariana Prediscan (2004).

Resistance to change has usually been recognized as a significant factor that can influence the outcomes of an organizational change effort (Sikora, Beaty and Forward, 2004). People are afraid of new changes, because they will disturb their status quo. Employees get used to their routines and the change process can make them feel insecure. The outcome expectation of the change process can be positive for some organizational members, while for others negative. But according to Huang and Huang (2009), it is definitely confirmed that resistance to change is negatively related to change outcomes.

It is obvious that those who had negative experiences with previous changes wil not support the new ones and vice-versa. That is why it is essential for mangers to identify the main reasons why employees resist change and to outline the benefits that it will bring for them. If executive managers want to obtain the support of their employees they must communicate with them frecquently and try to involve employees as much as possible. An effective change manager almost welcomes resistance because it is a sign that the change process is unfolding (Davidson, 2002).

However, the almost generally accepted axiom that people resist change has recently come under challenge (Jansen, 2000). As Dent and Goldberg (1999) note, the best way to challenge the conventional wisdom is to suggest that people do not resist change, per se. In their research, the authors found few or no instances of employees resisting change. Similar results have been provided by Kotter (1995) and Spreitzer and Quinn (1996). Despite the fact that some authors argue that employees do not resist change, others suggest that employees do manifest resistance, representing a barrier to change. In general, resistance is not a negative concept, as not all change efforts are beneficial for organizations. As Mabin, Forgeson and Green (2001) argue, resistance is viewed as both a positive and necessary force that can inform change efforts through providing alternative ideas, harnessing people into the problem solving process and aiding the consideration of alternatives.

According to Bennebroek Gravenhorst (2003), resistance seems to apply to everyone in an organization, except to top management. Since top managers are the ones who decide what changes should be implemented and how, it is deducted that they are the initiators of the change processes and therefore, will not manifest resistance. As change strategists (Kanter et al., 1992) they initiate change processes and subsequently are confronted with line-managers and employees who resist this changes. This view is contradicted by other researchers (Smith, 1982; Spreitzer and Quinn, 1996), who argue that the ones who usually work toward maintaining the status quo are the top managers, resisting most of the change efforts.

Further, through the proposed case study, we are going to examine if employees really manifest resistance to change and will try to answer to each of our objectives.

Method

We have conducted a survey in a credit institution that underwent a major change during the last few years. The credit institution has emerged twice and despite the financial difficulties, the management kept all its employees.

On-site data collection, analysis and literature research were carried out between july and december 2011. Data was collected with questionnaires, interviews with bank managers and employees and also direct observation. The questionnaire consisted of 15 statements, which were grouped in three categories. Each category contains a number of statements which respond to one of the three objectives mentioned above. The first four statements reffered to the employee's reasons, the next six outline the outcome expectation of the change process and the last five statements, highlight the support of employees.

The questionnaire was send to 136 employees which work in the bank's branches and agencies in the west region of Romania. The questionnaire was fully completed by 104 employees, which represents 76.37 per cent. As Edwards, Thomas, Rosenfeld and Booth-Kewley (1997) state, there is not an accepted criterion for survey response, but generally one can be satisfied with 50 per cent or more. It was given personally to 30 per cent of employees and send by email to the rest.

Results

Staff structure was represented mostly by employees with the age between 27 and 35 years old, the average age of the respondents being 32.22 years. 14 were men and 90 were women. The youngest employee was 25 years old and the oldest was 57 years of age.

Analyzing the first objective, the real reasons why employees resist change, we have concluded that most employees usually understand the need for change and believe that it will make sense for the organization, but at the same time, they do not neglect their own interests. The main motive why employees resist change is their personal interest. For 63.47 per cent of employees, their personal interests count more than those of the organization. If a loss is expected due to the new change, they will not support it and try to prevent a proper functioning.

Analyzing the main motive in terms of age, we have concluded that employees who treasure most their personal interests, had the age between 25 and 36 years, being less loyal to the organization than those after 37 years.

The second motive is represented by the understanding of the goal of the new change. Employees need to know exactly what is going to happen and what impact the new change will have on them. Security is very important for employees, which is why top management must communicate constantly with their subordinates.

Employee's results regarding the first objective are shown below, in the table 1.

Motives of resistance to change Table 1

Scale	1 – Strongly disagree (%)	2 – Disagree (%)	3 – Agree (%)	4 – Strongly agree (%)
My personal interests count more than those of the organization	2.88	33.65	43.27	20.2
I do not understand always the goals of the new change	2.88	51.04	42.23	3.85
I have the belief that the change does not make sense for the organization	11.53	82.7	5.77	0
I have low tolerance for change	12.5	77.88	9.62	0

The general outcome expectation of the change effort is positive, 87.5 per cent of employees having a good feeling regarding the new change. Over the years, employees got used with the frecquent changes and gained enough knowledge and experience to perform well after changes are implemented. Even if 12.5 per cent of employees still expect a negative outcome, the rest are more open minded, expecting positive results. In terms of age, 11 per cent of the employees who expect negative results have the age between 27-36 years old.

Table 2
Outcome expectation of the change,

	Percent %
Outcome expectation
Very negative	0.48
Negative	12.02
Positive	76.76
Very positive	10.74

Do employees and managers support the change process? Analyzing table 3 we can say that almost 78 per cent of members manifest support for change, being willing to put an effort to make the change happen. Even if 76 per cent of employees find the changes necessary, 38 per cent disagree with the fact that the new changes will have clear advantages for them. Usually new changes equate with more tasks and responsabilities, but taking into account the current economic situation, employees do not mind working harder.

Table 3
Support for change

	Percent %
Support for change
Very low	0
Low	22.11
High	68.27
Very high	9.62

As the interviewed employees occupy different positions in the company, we wanted to find out which ones are more or less resistant to the new changes. Dividing employees in three categories, operations officers, middle management and top management we discovered the following:

The operations officers are very adaptable to the new changes. As the work procedures change constantly, they are used to work in a changing environment. Even if they agree with the fact that the new changes will not have clear advantages for them, they still support the goals of the change process and are willing to put an effort to make the new changes stick.

Middle managers also support the new changes and are willing to put an effort in the change process, despite the fact that almost 25 per cent of them do not find the new changes necessary.

Executive managers are the ones who want the new changes to be implemented. They support the new changes fully and consider most of them vital for the further development of the organization.

After conducting a few interviews with four bank managers and observing the employees for three months, we have concluded that most employees welcome the new changes, but of course, there are a few exceptions.

According to one manager, "because the company started to make redundancies, employees work harder than before. New changes are expected and they are trying to get involved as much as possible in the process". Even if deep in side, some of the employees do not like the new changes, they do not manifest resistance. They comply to the new situation and as their job is at stake, everyone tries to welcome the new change and do their job as good as possible. An interesting fact revealed by another manager was that some employees manifest resistance by not doing their job properly. "Even if most employees say that they understand the need for change and agree to go to trainings, some are not willing to do the things according to the new procedures". In some cases, it is easier for employees not to check if a company's situation has changed during one or two years, completing the form with the previous details and sending it for further analysis.

Conclusions

Results show that few employees resist change, willingness to change being the general response in the organization. Employees usually understand the need for change and even if their own interests count more than those of the organization, they are willing to support the goals of the change process. The general outcome expectation of the change is positive, 87.5 per cent of employees having a good feeling regarding the new change.

Analyzing the stuff structure we observed that most employees are young, with an age around 32 years old. According to our results, both middle and executive managers want the new changes to be implemented and they fully support them. This results confute Smith's (1982) and Spreitzer and Quinn's (1996) hypothesis, according to which top management tries to maintain the status quo while middle managers manifest desire for implementing new changes.

Taking into account the current economic situation, we can say that employee's general response to change is mainly supporting it. To keep their jobs, employees work harder and sometimes overtime.

The limits of this research are:

We can not assert that the obtained results are valid for all credit institutions;

For greater impact it would be recommended to analyse bank's branches from all over the country and see how employees react to change in other regions;

Employees general assessments regarding their workplace might have a high degree of subjectivity;

The economic crisis influences employee's decisions regarding job opportunities.

For further research, we would like to analyze employee's resistance to change in organizations that operate in different economic sectors and of course, to make a prospective comparison between the present time and a future time of economic growth.

Acknowledgments

This work was co-financed by the European Social Fund through the Sectoral Operational Programme - Human Resources Development 2007-2013, project number POSDRU/107/1.5/S/77213,, Ph.D. for a career in interdisciplinary economic research at the European standards".

References

- Michael Beer and Nitin Nohria, "Cracking the code of change", Harvard Business Review, 78 (2000): 133-141.
- Kilian M. Bennebroek Gravenhorst,"A different view on resistance to change". Paper presented at the "Power Dynamics and Organizational Change IV" EAWOP Conference in Lisbon, Portugal, May 14-17, 2003.
- Bernard Burnes, "Complexity theories and organizational change", International Journal of Management Reviews, 7(2005): 73-90.
- Rune Todnem By, "Ready or not", Journal of Change Management, 7/1 (2007): 3-11.

- J. Robert Carleton and Claude S. Lineberry, Achieving post-merger success. (San Francisco: John Wiley and Sons, 2004).
- Colin A. Carnall, Managing change in organizations, 2nd edition, (Hertfordshire: Prentice Hall International, 1995).
- Jeff Davidson, "Overcoming resistance to change", Public Management, Vol. 84, Iss. 11 (2002): 20-23.
- Eric B. Dent and Susan Galloway Goldberg, "Challenging "Resistance to change"", The Journal of Applied Behavioral Science, 3(1999): 25-41.
- Jack E. Edwards, Marie D. Thomas, Paul Rosenfeld, Stephanie Booth Kewley, How to conduct organizational surveys. A step-by-step guide, (CA: Sage, 1997).
- Fiona Graetz, Malcolm Rimmer, Ann Lawrence, Adam Smith, Managing organizational change, 2nd edition, (Sidney and Melbourne: John Wiley and Sons Australia, 2006).
- Chiung-Hui Huang, Ing-Chung Huang, "Resistance to change: the effects of organizational intervention and characteristics", Review of Business Research, vol.9, 1(2009): 110-114.
- James Edwin Kee, Kathryn E. Newcomer, "Why Do Change Efforts Fail", Public Manager, Vol. 37, 3(2008): 5-12.
- Vicky J. Mabin, Steve Forgeson, Lawrence Green, "Harnessing resistance: using the theory of constraints to assist change management", Journal of European Industrial Training, 25/2 (2001): 160-168.
- Jeffrey D.Marsh, "Resistance to change: An analysis between observed behaviors and espoused perception. A proposed study at …". PhD diss., Capella University of Minnesota, 2009.
- Manuela Pardo del Val, Clara Martinez Fuentes, "Resistance to change: a literature review and empirical study", Management Decision, 41/2 (2003): 148-155.
- Mariana Predişcan, "Schimbare organizațională: ce, când şi cum să schimbăm", (Timişoara: ed. Universitatea de Vest, 2004), 138-142.
- John G. Wildenberg, "The culturally aligned change message: How knowledge of organizational culture can improve support for organizational change". PhD diss., Capella University of Minnesota, 2006.

OVERVIEW OF THE COMPANY'S FINANCIAL STRUCTURE

VIORICA MIRELA STEFAN-DUICU*

Abstract
The purpose of the paper is to highlight the fact that the company's financial structure is, empirically speaking, the parent entity from which starts all the activities that generate the self existence of the company. The company's financial structure also known as the company's capital structure conducts directly the organizational and inter-organizational behavior and indirectly the classification on the market of the referred economic agents.
This paper aims to describe the factors that influence the company's financial activity, it's direct and related sources of funding used to maintain or increase a satisfying turnover and the theories that conduct the company's capital structure.

Keywords: financial structure, company, economic agents, capital, turnover*

Introduction

The financial structure of the company reflects the composite formation of the capital that can be borrowed and represents the ratio between the short and long term financing.

The financial structure of the company generated countless disputes along the theories of classifications of companies in the market, theories regarding the financing resources of an enterprise and the organizational and inter-organizational behavior of the direct participants in the economy.

Over the time informational frames were formed regarding the necessary theories for companies classification in the market, theories regarding the financing sources and also debates, critics and additions to the financing decisions as in practice and in theory.

The first economic representation of a company has been shaped by the neoclassic model and started from the ideas promoted by Adam Smith in 1776 regarding the fact that individual focused interests pursuit should lead to a common interest. The neoclassic theory regarding the economic balance, partial and global, as Prof. Ion Stegaroiu said, is considered to be the best finalized representation of market economy functioning, where the company has the central role.

The traditional model includes a number of significant features of the analyzed environment, as follows: the description of balance conditions in the perfect competition context, characterized by the atomicity of participants (the existence of a high number of buyers and sellers whose volume of individual exchange is negligible compared to the overall volume of trade), the product homogeneity (the suppliers trade identical goods, so the buyers are indifferent to the identity of the seller), free and transparent market entrance (the traders are perfectly informed regarding the price and quality of products) and the individual rationality principle.

In the neoclassic theory, the company is seen as an entrepreneur expressing its own will (the atomicity feature) who, eventually, will seek the maximization of profit (rationality feature), promoting its product (the homogeneity feature) to a group of perfectly informed buyers (economic transparency feature).

The neoclassic reasoning has many advantages and has been considered over time to be eloquent and relevant. The advantages are extremely important and regarding the theoretical possibility of seeing the optimal conditions thorough which the producer has at disposal an important analyzing mechanism that adds to its management instrument (break-even, elasticity, productivity, etc.) that permit the identification of maximum profit opportunities.

* Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, (email: chirita.mirela@gmail.com).

The neoclassic theory has been often criticized and labeled unrealistic, bringing the argument that the existence of a platform which has all of the offers and requests centralized is rarely seen. Another argument brought is that the theory is dedicated to the market efficiency issue, without considering the cost of its operation.

Despite the criticism, the issues addressed by this approach cannot be totally rejected. Over time the assumptions were reconsidered, retreated, adapted to the existing market model, leading to other theories that have been guiding the competitive environment and the economic activity both to microeconomic and macroeconomic level.

Goods homogeneity assumption was shaped in a different manner by E. H. Chamberlin who proposed a monopolistic competition analysis through which "every supplier has absolute monopoly over his product, but it is subjected to competition by more or less substitutable goods"[1].

The assumptions of individuality, subjected to a new analysis by A. A. Berle and G. Means highlighted the property exclusion from the company's management.[2]

The principle of rationality has known a conceptual retreatment proposed by H. Simon[3] namely the addition in the neoclassic model of the bounded or procedural rationality concept over the perfect rationality, starting from an economic behavior analysis implicated in decision taking processes, given the substitution of the profit maximization principle with the satisfaction principle, so, the individual can be pleased with a satisfactory decision and not necessarily with an optimal decision so it is taken to consideration that the individual does not seek the higher earning but the acceptable solutions.

Comparing the perfect rationality with the bounded one, we can observe that the perfect rationality is founded both from decisional processes results and objectives and the means to achieve them aprioristic, while the bounded rationality is based on decisions taking procedures and the objectives and means to achieve them are settled as reference base and as research results.

Based on the new framework created by the introduction of new notions used above, J. G. March and H. A. Simon (1958) [4] and R. M. Cyert and J. G. March (1963) proposed a contractual and behavioral model of the company as a productive organization which consisted in a coalition of individuals that contribute to the well functioning of the organization in exchange of a satisfying payment. By combining the production elements and highlighting the managerial art involvement, the organizational practices are highlighted and they lead into a more general model that takes into account the economic efficiency, to the contractual theory. The purpose of this theory consists in describing the exchange relationships between the parts taking into consideration the institutional and informational restrictions that govern them.

As alternative approaches to the attempt to eliminate the contractual theory's inadvertences, the conventions economy and the evolutionary economy emerged.

The conventionalist approach states that the company is a conventional framework, therefore a convention that defines working in common and the market as a qualification convention that defines the exchanges trough which the consumer has the role of expressing its wishes and the company has the role of answering to them.

The evolutionary approach tries to settle the way that different behavioral model are perpetuated over time and aims to decipher and understand the processes involved in all the evolutional stages both at technological and organizational level.

---

[1] E. Chamberlin, The Theory of Monopolistic Competition: A Re-orientation of the Theory of Value, Harvard University Press, 1933, 1965, 8th ed.

[2] A. A. Berle and G. C. Means, The Modern Corporation and Private Property (2nd edn Harcourt, Brace and World, New York 1967).

[3] Simon, Herbert, Bounded Rationality and Organizational Learning. Organization Science 2 (1): 125–134.

[4] March, James G., A Primer on Decision Making: How Decisions Happen. New York: The Free Press.

This kind of evolution leaded to the renewal of microeconomic analysis instruments, as the finality to the new theory emerged – The Theory of Games.

The Theory of Games was introduced into economy by John von Neumann and Oscar Morgenstern[5], both of them defining the game: "the game is simply the totality of the rules which describe it". Taking into consideration that this description can be applied to any type of phenomenon, the Theory of Games has found a series of uses in both the social and economic domains, distinguished from other theories by the pronounced mathematic character.

The base assumption of the Theory of Games is the assumption that includes the rationality of players, according to whom each player has as purpose the maximization of his own earnings. These earnings depends both on his and others decisions. The main approach consists of the assumptions and questions that each player will ask himself: what will others do? This is the only question available because another essential assumption of the Theory of Games is based on the fact that each player has a complete set of information: each player has information on the game and other players – common knowledge, except for their decisions, the only issue being the right anticipation of these decisions. Theoreticians signaled situations where the players do not take into consideration various characteristics of the game, this being the complete informing situations. If the information is not completely defined, in its minutest details, then the theory is not relevant.

The result of the Theory of Games and economic information lead over time to the contractual theories that have as purpose the description of inter-agents exchange relationships taking into consideration all the institutional and informational restrictions in which they fit at evolutional level. Punctually, the contractual theories can be used to describe the applied strategies in negotiating contracts, as in substantiating the finance, management, marketing and other decisions. In these theories, the company is considered a perfect framework that incorporates a perfect network of contracts, policies and agreements between the component individuals. Inside the contractual theories we also find the Positive Theory of the Agency based on the article "Theory of The Firm: Managerial Behavior, Agency Costs and Ownership Structure" published by M. C. Jensen and W. H. Meckling in 1976" [6]. Founder's initial concern of the Positive Theory was to show to the managers an analysis pattern that will allow understanding the degree of the organizational structure involvement in the performance in order to shape the actions and the decisions in this way.

The presentation of the above mentioned theories aimed to highlight the initial microeconomic framework, which trough the adhesion at a dynamic economic environment in a continuous evolution scale, emerges to new approaches of the important issues of financial microeconomics, namely the issues regarding the company financing and optimal capital structure selection.

In 1985 M. Miller and F. Modigliani[7] sustained the famous theory under which the value of the company is independent from the means of financing, theory criticized for its restrictive assumptions that, over time has been enriched and as a result brought in foreground the reflections centered on the financial structure selection throughout the systemic principle of arbitration between costs and advantages of different financing sources.

New microeconomics theories have removed two hypothesis of the classical scheme: the symmetry of information for all agents and the identity of their interests (income maximization or company's value). Regarding the financing principles, the Theory of Signals shows that the level of indebtedness can serve as a signal from the managers to their external partners, fact that can

---

[5] John von Neumann and Oskar Morgenstern, Theory of Games and Economic Behavior, Princeton University Press (1944).

[6] Jensen M. C., Meckling W. H., Theory of the firm: Managerial behavior, agency costs and ownership structure, Journal of Financial Economics, vol. 3, 1976.

[7] Modigliani, F.; Miller, M. (1958), The Cost of Capital, Corporation Finance and the Theory of Investment, American Economic Review 48 (3): 261–297.

determine the balance for each financial structure. The Theory of Agency states the indebtedness as a solution to the conflict of interests between the managers and shareholders mentioning that it can also cause other conflicts (between the managers and shareholders on one hand and creditor on the other hand).

The classic company financing scheme, with the perfect market assumption and maximizing company's value behavior for the financial market can be highlighted trough two essential ideas. The first idea refers to the fact that enterprises do not use self-financing for net investment but the depreciation fund installments for the corresponding amount for replacement investments, distributed as dividends for shareholders and use external capital to finance their net investments. The second idea underlines the fact that companies have two external sources of financing: increase of share capital by shares issuing and credit indebtedness[8]. The issue of finding the advantageous financing sources was brought up, thereby the answers to M. Miller and F. Modigliani's theorems. The first theorem can be enounced as follows: for the given class of economic or exploitation risk, the market value of the company (the sum of equity and expenses) is independent to the financial structure, in these conditions the average weighted cost and company's value are constant. The second theorem states that the investment decisions are independent to the financing decisions.

Criticisms of the classic scheme are presented as three aspects: the purpose of self-financing, heterogeneous character of external financing sources and the real issues of indebtedness[9].

The purpose of self-financing refers to the fact that depreciation funds allow financing a part of the growing investments by the game of multiplication effect – Lohmann-Rüchti effect and by keeping a part from the net result inside the company, underlining the important part of self-financing in financing the growth and replacement investments.

The heterogeneous character of external financing sources refers to the heterogeneity of loaning or cash intake from shareholders. About the increase of share capital method of external financing, it has been observed that unlisted companies cannot use the same conditions used by the listed ones.

The issues of real indebtedness limits that are referred in the theorem of independent company value in relation to its financial structure is knowing why the companies are not totally indebted and why in reality certain companies indebted more than other, even if belongs to the same class of economic risk. M. Miller and F. Modigliani solved this problem, proving that companies choose to maintain a certain capacity of indebt to benefit from flexibility.

Empirical studies showed that the classic scheme doesn't provide answers to lots of questions that are subject to actual concerns at company's financing, but financial neoclassicism, trough the Theory of Agency and the Theory of Signals brings not only answers but real solutions to solving the optimal financial structure issue. The Theory of Signals begins from the assumption that markets are rarely in balance and the obtained information has a defined cost criteria conducting to different delivery times to the managers. Having this theory as basis, the managers of a company can have access to information that investors cannot, hence the interest of obtaining information before others do. This activity can sometimes be misinterpreted because of manager's opinion, unfounded and exaggerated optimism leader of hidden advantages. The signal is actually a financial decision with negative consequences for the one launching it, in this case the one who tries to send erroneous message. The Theory of Signals analyses the company's financial decisions – financing policies, dividend distribution policies, indebtedness policies, repurchase of shares policies, etc., as signals from managers to investors.

Indebtedness policy explains why an increase of liabilities means an increase in the company's risk. Managers of companies from this situation send information that authorizes the market to believe that the company's performance will allow reimbursing this debt without difficulties. If the signal is false, the following sanctions can even discharge the managers if taking into consideration that the company will be in difficulty at the reimbursement time, this means that the managers are stimulated, most of times, to send correct signals.

[8] Encyclopédie de gestion, vol. II, Economica, p. 1223, 1989.
[9] Perez R., Grande entreprise et système de financement, in Mélanges offerts à P. Vigreux, Toulouse, 1981.

The dividends distribution policy transmits information regarding several studies that demonstrate the managers are reluctant to decrease of paid dividends. Distributions of dividends is interpreted as a positive signal sent to market, centered on the idea that managers believe that the performance evolution of the company will allow to maintain current dividends in the following years, or even increase the amount. Otherwise, a decrease of dividends has a negative signal impact, noticing unclear perspective to the evolution of the company.

If the Theory of Signals reconsider the classic premesis regarding the uniform spread and accesibility of information, the Theory of Agency reconsider the premesis by which the company has as sole representative the share holder manager, claiming that the company can solve conflict by completing a contractual relationship network, company's behavior being now incomparable to the market's, meaning it represents the result of a complex balancing process.[10]

Conclusions

The financial structure of a company will always rise issues of specific capital components, of their nature, considering that from the first theories until present, their studying will know a large expansion in interest granted by the factors influencing the financial structure - meaning the assets structure, sales stability, manager's behavior, internal climate and the financial market conditions, taxation and low trust in banking institutions.

The own funds/borrowed funds controversy, developed by finance theoreticians who tried to find the optimal liabilities structure is vaguely found in the practice because the practitioners are more interested in the conclusions of the Theory of Signals, for which a viable enterprise borrows and manages to repay at term [11] and the conclusions of the Theory of Agency who's originality consist of rejecting the convergence assumption in the interest of all partners of the company.

Concluding, the traditional approach shaped by M. Miller and F. Modigliani resumes to the fact that in the presence of income tax, the value of an indebted company is equal to the value of a company without loans with the addition of the economy of income realized from indebtedness. The Theory of Agency approach reflects on the fact that the optimal financial structure results from a compromise between various ways of financing that allows solving those conflicts of interest, considering that indebtedness and equity attenuates some conflicts and starts other ones.

References

- A. A. Berle and , The Modern Corporation and Private Property (2nd edn Harcourt, Brace and World, New York, 1967).
- C. Munteanu, A. Horobet, Finante transnationale: Decizia financiara in corporatia moderna, Ed. All Beck, Bucuresti, 2005.
- E. Chamberlin, The Theory of Monopolistic Competition: A Re-orientation of the Theory of Value, Harvard University Press, 1933, 1965, 8th ed.
- Encyclopédie de gestion, vol. II, Economica, 1989, p. 1223.
- I. Stegaroiu, Economie industriala- O abordare epistemologica, Ed. Bibliotheca, Targoviste, 2004
- I. Stancu, Finante – Teoria pietelor financiare, finantele intreprinderilor, analiza si gestiunea financiara, Ed. Economica, Bucuresti, 1997.
- Jensen M. C., Meckling W. H., Theory of the firm: Managerial behavior, agency costs and ownership structure, Journal of Financial Economics, vol. 3, 1976.

[10] John von Neumann and Oskar Morgenstern: Theory of Games and Economic Behavior, Princeton University Pres, 1944.

[11] M. Glais, Le diagnostic financier de l'enterprise, Paris, Economica, 1984.

- John von Neumann and Oskar Morgenstern, Theory of Games and Economic Behavior, Princeton University Press (1944).
- M. Grigore, Noua Microeconomie, Ed. Universitara, Bucuresti, 2005.
- March, James G., A Primer on Decision Making: How Decisions Happen, New York: The Free Press.
- Modigliani, F.; Miller, M. (1958), The Cost of Capital, Corporation Finance and the Theory of Investment, American Economic Review 48 (3): 261–297.
- M. Glais, Le diagnostic financier de l'enterprise, Paris, Economica, 1984.
- Perez R., Grande entreprise et système de financement, in Mélanges offerts à P. Vigreux, Toulouse, 1981.
- Simon, Herbert, Bounded Rationality and Organizational Learning, Organization Science 2 (1): 125–134.

BUSINESS OFFSHORING IMPLICATIONS ON THE LABOUR MARKET

SERGHEI MĂRGULESCU[*]
ELENA MĂRGULESCU[]

Abstract

In terms of economic policy, three new aspects are important in the current context of globalization which brings forward new strategies regarding the outsourcing and offshoring of activities and functions of the value chain. These aspects refer to the instant appearance of an offshore transferable function , to the unpredictability of winning and losing functions and to the lowering of competition from the levels of sector, company or professional qualification category to an individual level.

Of the three features, the most problematic for policy makers is the unpredictability of the impact of globalization. For example, in Europe we can not reasonably believe that workers in the most competitive sectors will be in a position of winners, nor that these winners will be the most prepared or trained in analytical functions. Many European workers currently work at prices fixed by the local market and not covered by productivity. But when the competition on functions will expand through globalization outside the country or area, their choices will be either a job loss or a reduction in salary. The question that will be raised ever insistently will be the following: what jobs are more exposed to this new competition?

On the one hand, offshoring is on balance positive for Western economies, because it makes domestic companies more competitive. At the same time the material outsourcing is, for most developed economies, much more important than the outsourcing of services and the implications for labor market must be objectively differentiated in the two sectors.

On the other hand, if we take into account the amplification of the effects that offshoring already has on the structure and distribution of labor, the socio-economic European policy of labor orientation to the coordinates of a "knowledge based" economy and to the jobs of the "information society" could be wrong.

Keywords: outsourcing, offshoring, labor market, competition, education

Introduction

In recent years, a host of famous economists in the study of international economics and social issues, argued, in one way or another, the idea that globalization has entered a new phase. As Professor Gene Grossman from the Princeton University said, this phase is so different from previous ones, that its understanding claims even a new paradigm.

In an article published in 2006, Professor Richard Baldwin from the Institute of International Studies in Geneva[1] is trying to clarify the paradigms of the old and the new globalization, analyzing the phenomenon as a long process, characterized by two major " unbundlings ". The first unbundling, driven by rapid drop in transportation costs, has put an end to the need of [*] Professor, Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: margulescu@univnt.ro).

[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: elena.margulescu@univnt.ro).

[1] "Globalisation:The Great Unbundling(s)" – article published in the report "Globalisation Challenges for Europe" of the Secretariat of the Economic Council of the Government of Finland, march 2006.

manufacturing the products near the areas of consumption, allowing the spatial separation of factories and consumers. The basic levels at which globalization spread its effects were firms and economic sectors.

The second unbundling was driven by significant reduction, in the last decade, in the costs of communication and coordination of activities in the international space, which ended the need to perform most phases of production in close proximity. Also, more recently, period, a further decoupling of activities or functions of the company (besides the production) has taken place, by offshoring the service sector activities. Thus, the second unbundling has dissociated in space factories and offices and drew the global competition to the level of functions that these structures previously retained. This unbundling can be found under names such as fragmentation, offshoring, vertical specialization and segmentation of the value chain.

Marketing of products is replaced by marketing of functions, including those individually performed, which lowers the overall competition at the level of individual workers in manufacturing or services, which perform similar tasks in different countries.

The second unbundling triggered by globalization

By the mid '80s globalization was developed exclusively at the level of companies and industries. Though savings could be achieved by transferring labor intensive activities to the South, production bases were maintained in individual locations in the North, to facilitate coordination of activities of managers and workers. Both financial considerations and those of coordination made sense to coupling labor, capital and European technology right in Europe, despite salary differentials. The geographical separation of the different bases of production has become more attractive with the growing wage gap, adjusted for productivity and for the cheaper cost of fragmentation through the reduction of telecommunications and air transport costs. The importance of distance, especially on travel costs of managers and skilled workers results also from the fact that the first major unbundlings in industry started in the mid 80s, on short geographical distances: Japan to Southeast Asia and the U.S. to Mexico.

This trend was pejoratively called "the voiding" of the Japanese economy. The differentiation of countries in headquarters- countries and production host- countries has increased further by practicing the same " voiding " by countries like Taiwan, Korea, Singapore and Hong Kong. China's readiness to integrate into the global economy in the '80s spurred offshoring's strong appeal.

More recently, the second unbundling was reflected also in the field of "offices", by outsourcing functions that were previously regarded as nonmarketable. The classic example are the American call- centers in India.

Meanwhile, the latest unbundling process is found in the services area. This is in rapid expansion, although at a smaller scale.

The result of these processes of unbundling functions and tasks is the transfer of competition to the level of production phases, tasks of departments and duties of individual employees. Also, competition may affect functions which are common to a large number of sectors, regardless of their characteristics, namely labor intensive or capital-intensive. In conclusion, the North losers of globalization are not anymore just industries or activities that are labor intensive. Because transportation costs do not vary significantly, depending on the nature of goods, we can say that the reduction of these costs affects likewise all sectors.

For functions, the situation is different. Some of these, such as truck driving, are completely uninfluenced by lower international costs of coordination, while others are strongly affected, such as call- center services.

In terms of economic policy, three new aspects become important:

- the unpredictability of the winning and the losing functions. At present, even economists have difficulty in understanding the glue that unites the various functions in "packages" (of factories and offices), and thus how they will be removed in future.

- the instantaneous appearance of an offshore transferable function, due to the differential impact of the reduction in telecommunications costs on various functions and development of new management technologies.

- the lowering of competition from the levels of sector, company or professional qualification category to an individual level.

Implications of offshoring on the labor market

Of the three features mentioned above, the most problematic for policy makers is the unpredictability of the impact of globalization. For example, in Europe we can not reasonably believe that workers in the most competitive sectors will be in a position of winners, nor that these winners will be the most prepared or trained in analytical functions. Many European workers currently work at prices fixed by the local market and not covered by productivity. But when the competition on functions will expand through globalization outside the country or area, their choices will be either a job loss or a reduction in salary. The question that will be raised ever insistently will be the following: what jobs are more exposed to this new competition?

Already in 1996 P. Krugman[2] warned that the differentiation will operate not due to the education level of workers, but due to the entering of the various services in the category of marketable services. This point of view was recently taken over by other authors, such as A.S Blinder (2006)[3] or G. Grossman and E. Rossi-Hansberg (2006)[4]. The latter's analyzed the implications of offshoring in general, and especially on wages, in terms of three effects: the effect of business conditions, the effect of employment and , the effect of productivity.

The first effect of production offshoring to countries with lower wages is to reduce product prices on international markets. This price will trigger the reduction of wages in the country of origin, remaining in the same sector. Their salary will be reduced also by the decreased demand for jobs in the sector. In reality, workers in the country of origin will focus on functions involving higher productivity, in order to increase the salary in accordance with this productivity. Of course the productivity effect may be exceeded by the cumulative effect of business and employment conditions, but Grossmann and Rossi-Hansberg paradigm allows the following important conclusion: if commodity prices fall and offshoring is not allowed, the workers in the country of origin will face even higher wage cuts.

Offshoring refers, in this case, to the routine (both normal routine, and cognitive routine) functions (tasks). In contrast, non-routine functions involving face-to-face interaction and continuous optimization and revaluation are not unboundling. An American study from 2003 shows that the share of jobs with routine functions declined since 1970 and this trend accelerated after 1990. Simultaneously, the share of non-routine job rised. This study urged Grossman and Rossi-Hansberg to say that the offshoring of routine functions is already underway.

Two examples of North-South tradable and non-tradable functions are provided by A.S.Blinder (2006)[5]. The first category includes, for example, taxi drivers in Sweden and India. Prices of these functions are set locally and no matter how small would be the difference in productivity between two taxi drivers in these countries, it can not influence their relative wages, because it does not create competition between the functions performed by these drivers on the two markets.

An example of until recently non-marketable functions, are the computer security or informatic systems analysts. Many routine activities in this area can be provided remotely now. Remotely means another floor the same building or another office in Germany, either, due to the

[2] Krugman P.(1996): "White Collars Turn Blue" Article for centennial issue of the NYT magazine.
[3] Blinder A.S. (2006): "Offshoring: The Next Industrial Revolution?"
[4] Grossman G. & Rossi-Hansberg E. (2006): "The Rise of Offshoring:It's Not Wine for Cloth Anymore".
[5] Blinder A.S. (2006): "Offshoring: The Next Industrial Revolution?"

lower costs of communication and management technologies, a company in India. This option puts the Germans and Indian computer workers in direct competition with the very important consequence that the German-Indian wage differential has to be justified now also by a compensating differential in productivity.

However the difference should be made between the services sector and the trade in goods sector, thus involving industrial area, where it is considered (R. Baldwin 2006[6]) that the North-South wage differential has been brought more or less in line with the productivity differential. A massive offshoring of jobs in production with intensive use of labor had taken place between Japan and China, and this has led to a significant increase of the international competitiveness of Japanese industry, even without any noticeable impact on unemployment. Japanese workers have rapidly specialized in new functions that maintained the productivity gap against Chinese workers, abundantly justify the wage gap towards them.

Regarding the U.S. market, A. Bardhan and C. Kroll (2003)[7] estimated that about 10% of the U.S. workforce was employed in occupations that can be transferred offshore, such as financial analysts, medical technicians, computer and math specialists.

D. Van Welsum and X. Reif (2005)[8] and D. Van Welsum and G. Vickery (2006)[9] define tradable and offshorable jobs as those characterized by the following four characteristics:

- To be IT intensive
- Results to be IT-transmittable,
- Functions to be encodable,
- To require little face-to-face interaction.

Based on this definition, they found that about 20% of the American workforce could be offshored.

Studying the occupational statistics C. Mann (2005)[10] shows that most affected were the low-wage American workers in IT institutions, about one third of the jobs disappearing in the 1999-2004 period, despite the very low wages ($ 25,000 on average per year). This includes occupations such as telemarketing, telephone operators, computer operators, etc..

In antithesis stood the occupations implying high skills, reasoning and solving problems, in which wages are three times higher, and which have offered 17% more jobs in the same period. Regarding the situation in Europe, the study prepared by M.Falk and Y. Wolfmayer (2005)[11] estimated that due to offshoring about 0.3% of jobs in the industry were lost annually during 1995-2000, with sensitive differences between sectors, but, in some of the most dynamic of them, no losses of jobs due to offshoring have been recorded.

K.Ekkholm and Hakka K. (2006)[12] conducted an analysis of the effects of offshoring of intermediate productive inputs on the labor force in Sweden and found that:

- Offshoring to low-income countries has reduced demand for workers with average level of education;
- Offshoring to high-income countries (mainly in the case of Sweden) did not produce statistically significant effects on the workforce.

---

[6] R. Baldwin (2006): "Managing the Noodle Bowl: : The Fragility of East Asian Regionalism".

[7] Bardhan A & Kroll C. (2003):"The New Wave of Outsourcing: Fisher Center for Real Estate and Urban Economics, University of California".

[8] Van Welsum D. & Reif X. (2005): "Potential Offshoring: Evidence from Selected OECD Countries".

[9] Van Welsum D. & Vickery G. (2006): "The Share of Employment Potentially Affected by Offshoring – an Empirical Investigation".

[10] Mann C. (2005):"Accelerating the Globalisation of America. Institute for International Economics."

[11] Falk M. & Wolfmayer Y. (2005):"The Impact of International Outsourcing on Employment: Empirical Evidence from EU Countries. Austrian Institute od Economic Research Paper".

[12] Ekholm K. & Hakkala K. (2006): "The Effect of Offshoring on Labour Demand: Evidence from Sweden".

Also, other studies for Germany, such as, for example, those of M Falk and Koebel (2003), show that offshoring reduces the demand for medium skilled workers.Another type of analysis attempts to show what type of outsourcing has greater effects on developed countries. In this respect M. Amiti and SJWei (2005)[13] analyzed the statistics on trade in services of the U.S. and other industrialized countries, in the period 1983-2003, concluding that:

- Outsourcing of services has increased significantly in recent years but it is not still an important phenomenon (eg for U.S. imports of IT and business services in 2003 represented only 0.4% of GDP).
- U.S. and other developed countries are net exporters of IT and business services, the surplus increasing even for some of these countries (ie USA).
- the material outsourcing is far more important than the outsourcing of services.

A recent study prepared by H.Goerg, D.Greenaway and R. Kneller (2008)[14] points out some implications of offshoring on the U.K economy. Research has covered a total of 66,000 companies and, after they found that offshoring is practiced mostly by large companies with branches abroad, focused on the 2850 British multinationals with foreign subsidiaries.

Thus, during 1995-2004, the offshoring of these companies increased by 35% in production and 48% in services. But even after this increase, it was still below 5% of GDP in 2004. Despite the somewhat automatic association of offshoring with the call centers in India, only 4.5% of multinationals in services and 8% in the industrial sector had branches in India and China. Most of the international outsourcing is done in other developed countries, and primarily in the EU. An essential problem is related to the offshoring's impact on unemployment, but unlike media exaggerations, the study in question found that in 2005, only 3.5% of the jobs lost in England can be attributed to offshoring . Simultaneously, however, companies could produce more because offshoring made them more competitive and thus, overall, have created more jobs than were lost. In the analyzed period there were added due to offshoring about 100,000 new jobs.

A negative impact of offshoring and more generally of globalization is considered to be the alleged phenomenon of wage cuts in developed countries. The study to which we refer does not discover such an effect in the industrial sector, but in the services sector it is however found some average decrease. The explanation seems to lie in the fact that companies in the services sector outsource more qualified and better paid work. But the reduction was small and by extrapolation it was estimated that if the offshoring will continue to grow at the same rate in a decade, the average salary in services will directly shrink with only 2%.

The conclusion of the study is optimistic through the fact that offshoring is on overall positive for the economy because it makes companies more competitive and generate jobs in the country and abroad.

Conclusions

In terms of socio-economic impact of policies promoted at EU level, we have to emphasize the idea brought into question since 1996 by Paul Krugman[15] and reiterated by Alan Blinder (2006) and R. Baldwin (2006), that the European economic policy of orientating the workforce in accordance with the coordinates of a " knowledge based economy " and with "information society" jobs could be wrong.

If the offshoring trend in the services sectors is maintained, many analytical jobs, which today seem to have a high value added could be outsourced to other countries. Overall, such offshoring will be an opportunity for Europe to improve productivity, but the investments in qualification of workers would be unnecessary. Emphasis on analytical skills should be at least doubled by a similar emphasis placed on the ability to be flexible and to learn new skills. The most important conclusion for educational policies becomes that that is more important for future generations to learn how to learn than to teach skills in a particular field. The educational system must prepare them for lifetime employability, and not for lifetime employment.

[13] Amiti M & S.J. Wei (2005):"Fear of Service Outsourcing:Is It Justified? Economic Policy".

[14] Goerg H., Greenaway D. & Kneller R. (2008):" The Economic Impact of Offshoring. Nottingham University's Globalisation and Economic Policy Centre".

[15] Krugman P (2006) "White Collars turn Blue" – NYT magazine.

Also, the employees protection policies become more feasible than workplaces protection policies. Offshoring will become more attractive to companies located in countries with more powerful social policies of jobs protection because, ultimately, offshoring gives companies the flexibility they need to go out of the rigidity of legal schemes in the country of origin .

As for Romania, starting from the analysis of the factors that favor offshoring decisions internationally, but also from the strategies of TNCs present in the country, that would not be late to predict the evolution of Romania in terms of offshoring host of activities and functions and also as source of offshoring. The logical purpose of such a study would be the development of appropriate strategies and policies in the labor market area, and the rethinking of the foundations of the Romanian educational system of tomorrow.

References

- "Globalisation:The Great Unbundling(s)" – article published in the report "Globalisation Challenges for Europe" of the Secretariat of the Economic Council of the Government of Finland, march 2006.
- Krugman P.(1996): "White Collars Turn Blue" Article for centennial issue of the NYT magazine.
- Blinder A.S. (2006): "Offshoring: The Next Industrial Revolution?"
- Grossman G. & Rossi-Hansberg E. (2006): "The Rise of Offshoring:It's Not Wine for Cloth Anymore".
- Blinder A.S. (2006): "Offshoring: The Next Industrial Revolution?"
- R. Baldwin (2006): "Managing the Noodle Bowl: : The Fragility of East Asian Regionalism".
- Bardhan A & Kroll C. (2003):"The New Wave of Outsourcing: Fisher Center for Real Estate and Urban Economics, University of California".
- Van Welsum D. & Reif X. (2005): "Potential Offshoring: Evidence from Selected OECD Countries".
- Van Welsum D. & Vickery G. (2006): "The Share of Employment Potentially Affected by Offshoring – an Empirical Investigation".
- Mann C. (2005):"Accelerating the Globalisation of America. Institute for International Economics."
- Falk M. & Wolfmayer Y. (2005):"The Impact of International Outsourcing on Employment: Empirical Evidence from EU Countries. Austrian Institute od Economic Research Paper".
- Ekholm K. & Hakkala K. (2006): "The Effect of Offshoring on Labour Demand: Evidence from Sweden".
- Amiti M & S.J. Wei (2005):"Fear of Service Outsourcing:Is It Justified? Economic Policy".
- Goerg H., Greenaway D. & Kneller R. (2008):" The Economic Impact of Offshoring. Nottingham University's Globalisation and Economic Policy Centre".
- Krugman P (2006) "White Collars turn Blue" – NYT magazine.

PREMISES FOR CREATING KNOWLEDGE-BASED ORGANIZATIONS IN ROMANIA

ADELA ANCA FUCEC*

Abstract

The transition to the knowledge-based economy in Romania is the main path towards obtaining a sustainable economic growth and may even be the feasible solution our country needs in order to exit the current economic crisis. The knowledge-based organizations are the main vector, a necessary and ireplaceable condition and factor for the creation of the knowledge economy, therefore every leader should be at least familiar with the premises needed to increase the number of these kind of organizations in Romania and sustain a propitious environment for their development. Therefore, the purpose of this paper is to identify and unfold the premises that need to be fulfilled in order to facilitate Romania's transition to the knowledge economy. To this end, following the macroeconomic and microeconomic situation, not only from an economical perspectrive, but also from a managerial one, there have been two categories of premises, which are actually conditioning elements for Romania's transition to the knowledge economy. At macroeconomic level, the main premise is that of the need to substantiate (found), elaborate and implement a genuine strategy for the transition to the knowledge economy; at microeconomic level, the organizations need to embrace a strategic management, relocate their attention towards the human resources, receive support from the IT departments and give the proper importance to organizational culture and the processes related to change management. By emphasizing the details of these premises, the objectives of ilustrating Romania's vulnerabillities and needs regarding the transition to the knowledge economy have been attained.

Keywords: knowledge economy, knowledge-based organization, strategy, organizational culture, sustainability;*

Introduction

The paper presented finds itself at the encounter of at least two fundamental domains, specifically economics and management, but considering that the issue of the knowledge-based economy and the knowledge-based organizations is under review, it is safe to say that this is an interdisciplinary study. The purpose of the paper is to identify and unfold the premises that need to be fulfilled in order to facilitate Romania's transition to the knowledge-based economy, in particular by creating the main components of such an economic environment: the knowledge-based organizations. The European Union officialy aknowledges the importance of the knowledge-based economy by outlining the Lisbon Strategy, therefore this paper shows relevance in pointing the way towards how to achieve this major and complex transformation as soon and as efficient as possible in our country, emphasizeing the vulnerabillities and requisitions of Romania in regard to the transition to the knowledge-based economy. The study describes how Romania should best prepare itself to embrace the new worldwide economic circumstances, enveloping two approaches: a top-to bottom approach, the macroeconomic one, residing in the presentation of Romania's strategy for the creation of the knowledge-based economy, and the second approach, the bottom-to-top one, at a microeconomic level, consisting in the necessary organizational prerequisites. Documentation research entailed the unfolded results of the paper. Since there is no strategy for Romania's transition to the knowledge-based economy, the following national and european documents have been reviewed in order to give foundation to the upcoming strategy: the National Reform Plan 2011-2013, the National Development Plan, 2007-2013, the National Research, Develoment and Innovation Strategy 2007-2013, the Lisbon Strategy, and, of course, the Europe 2020 Strategy, as well as other strategical or tactical initiatives such as the listed ones. In regard to the microeconomic premises, the current state of research is considered to be incipient. Although a number of researches conducted in this domain (Nicolescu 2005, 2011; O'Dell, Hubert 2011; Geisler, Wickramasinghe, 2009) have lead to several interpretations and definitions of this grand economic system, a consensus has not been reached yet, so that leaves the knowledge-based economy and its organizations as an indefinite subject. Starting from the main elementes found in such reasearch and taking into account the elements unfolded by the strategy, the choise has been made to present and emphasize on the premises that are of true relevance in the particular context of Romania.

* Ph. D. candidate, The Institute for Doctoral Studies, The Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies, (email: fucec.adela@yahoo.com).

The knowledge-based economy and organizations

The knowledge revolution[1] and the tranformation of the informational society into a human resources centered[2] society, actually, have secventially lead to what we know and refer to today as the knowledge-based economy.

Knowledge, in all the shapes it is found, has always been the foundation of economic and even social growth. Knowledge has not just appeared over night so as to lead to the development of the knowledge-based society and economy. What did, however, occur, was the aknowledgement of the importance and the capability of knowledge to deliver a sustainable competitive advantage, considering that the clasical resources are becoming fairly outdated[3]. When the attention of academicians and practicians revealed the catalyst character of knowledge in regard to economic growth and susteinability, was marked the effective beginning of the transformation of the society and the economy. Moreover, when the managers of the great corporations joined the tempo, especially after the first papers dedicated to knowledge and knowledge management were elaborated, the incipient discipline of knowledge-based management emerged[4]. Therefore, when managers spotlighted knowledge and recognized the potential impact it can create, amplified by the expanding information society and advocated by globalization, this was the outlining of the elements entailing to the new shape of the economy: the knowledge-based economy[5].

The knowledge-based economy "is characterized by the transformation of knowledge into raw material, capital, products, essential production factors and by economic processes in which generating, selling, buying, learning, storage, development, sharing and protecting of knowledge become prevalent and critically condition the profits and the assurance of the economy's long term sustainability"[6].

Among the most pregnant traits of the knowledge-based economy are namelly the accelerated rythm of change and learning, digitalization, globalization, focus on intellectual capital and a high rate of innovation. A particular trait of this type of economy is entailed by the specificity of intellectual capital. The explanation would be the following: "if a physical object is sold, the seller ceases to own it, but when an idea is sold in the new economy, the seller still posses it and can sell it over and over again"[7]. Thus, the growing worldwide potential is practically close to infinite.

In regard to the knowledge-based organizations, they constitute "the main component of the knowledge-based economy"[8]. Hereby, it is difficult to conceive an environment where this kind of organizations exist and the requisite of the host-environment is not fulfilled, namelly the knowledge-based economy does not exist. Therefore, this paper proposes in the following pages, as premises for the development of knowledge-based organizations in Romania, two types of actions: at

[1] O. Nicolescu and L. Nicolescu, Economia, firma si managementul bazate pe cunostinte, 19-28
[2] Geisler and Wickramasinghe, Principles of Knowledge Management: Theory, Practice and Cases
[3] Geisler and Wickramasinghe, Principles of Knowledge Management: Theory, Practice and Cases, 67
[4] Geisler and Wickramasinghe, Principles of Knowledge Management: Theory, Practice and Cases, 24
[5] Geisler and Wickramasinghe, Principles of Knowledge Management: Theory, Practice and Cases, 83
[6] Translation from O. Nicolescu and L. Nicolescu, Economia, firma si managementul bazate pe cunostinte, 48
[7] Geisler and Wickramasinghe, Principles of Knowledge Management: Theory, Practice and Cases, 68-83
[8] Translation from Nicolescu et al., Dictionar de management, 302

macroeconomic level, the elaboration of Romania's strategy for the knowledge-based economy, in order to assure this transition beeing handled in the best way possible; at microeconomic level, the main dirrections in which organizations should redirect in order to turn into knowledge-based organizations are unfolded. These dirrections include the practice of a strategic knowledge-based management, spotlighting human resources, having technology and information systems to rely on and taking into consideration the organizational culture and the processes relating to change management.

The macroeconomic prerequisite: Romania's transition to a knowledge based-economy, the pad for the development of knowledge-based organizations

In light of this prerequisite, Romania is in need for a strategy for the creation of the knowledge based-economy. Following, we present the European Union's strategy in this domain, we argue the need for a national strategy and outline a sketch of this strategy for Romania.

The European Union's strategy and the need for a national strategy in Romania

In march 2000, the European Council settles in Lisbon the development plan of the economy of the European Union (EU) for the following 10 years, outlining the Lisbon Strategy, which aimed ar turning the EU into "the most competitive and dynamic knowledge-based economy in the world capable of sustainable economic growth with more and better jobs and greater social cohesion"[9]. Around the middle of the implementation interval, information concerning the progress evaluation of the member states were revealed. As far as Romania is concerned, these results war far from positive. "The Lisbon Agenda may appear as a luxury for Romania at the moment", finds Daianu in a study[10] former to the evaluation of the strategy. It was the first time that significance was officially granted to knowledge and the appearance of the knowledge based-economy was aknowledged, but it was obvious that Romania was not ready to complete the transition in 2004. The same study finds that the structured bases of the romanian economy are rusty, the agriculture activities don't deploy at a proper efficiency, financial intermediary is an incipient faze, granting of state aids requires revision and liberalization of the utilities market is not yet under debate. "Under these conditions, the effort of going forward in the direction of a knowledge based-economy, when we have not yet consolidated the market economy, is a dashing attempt. Nevertheless, the effort must be made."[11], argues Daianu.

Therefore, by 2010, since the objectives of the Lisbon Strategy were not accomplished (and not just in Romania's case), the European Commission proposes the Europe 2020 Strategy, as an extension of the previous one. In addition to the Lisbon Agenda, Europe 2020 is not only a strategy for the transformation of the economies into knowledge-based economies, although this goal is still pursuited, but this strategy also represents a solution for ending the financial-economic crisis which entered into force during 2008-2009.

At national level, in the member states, the EU2020 strategy is implemented by means of the National Reform Plans (NRP); this is where the first big deficiency appears and prevents the whole implementation process in the member states. The European Strategy cannot be implemented in the member states by means of (just) a plan. We are facing a strategic motion with implications throughout all micro and macroeconomic domains in a country, thus such a motion of complexity and profound impact on the economy demands the existance of a veritable strategy in each of the countries.

Merely by existing, these european strategies represent only the first phase. In a logical and strategical sequence, the next phase should be the distribution of these strategies and their adjustment to the charasteristics of each country under the economic entity known as the European Union, because it is not enough just to set national targets for the objectives, as has already happened. It is obvious that Romania cannot have the same target for the unemployment rate as, for example, Germany or France, since the basic values are perceptibly different. In the best case scenario, it would take a longer period of time for Romania to reach the targets set in Germany. Each country needs its own strategy, acording to the national specificity, with a mission and objectives of its own, achivable strategic options, resources and deadlines according to the growth rate of the significant indicators and, last, but not least, a feasible competitive advantage. Romania needs a strategy for the transition to the knowledge-based economy moreover due to the fact that the evaluations conducted in order to estimate the degree of the construction of such an economy have placed our country at the end of the european ranking[12].

[9] "Lisbon European Council", European Parliament, March, 2000, accessed November 24, 2011, http://www.consilium.europa.eu/uedocs/cms_data/docs/pressdata/en/ec/00100-r1.en0.htm

[10] Translation from Daianu et al., "Romania si Agenda Lisabona – aderarea la UE si competitivitatea economica", Group of Applied Economics, November, 2004, 4

[11] Translation from Daianu et al., "Romania si Agenda Lisabona – aderarea la UE si competitivitatea economica", Group of Applied Economics, November, 2004, 4

The year 2004 has brought along great consideration made by the European Commission in regard to the implementation of the Lisbon Strategy. Thus, the European Institute of Romania presented in a paper[13] the three main categories of action in the approach of the research-development-innovation trinomial: a modern approach, a traditional approach and a group of country with peculiar approaches, different ones, hard to add up into one category. Romania was not yet a member of the European Union at the time, but still the European Commission considered it to be one of the countries with a special, peculiar approach. Also, it was found that in Romania fundamental academic research comes first and industrial innovation is not enough emphasized. The same paper mentions that only 6 countries had at that moment a national strategy according to the Lisbon Strategy, only 4 countries had a ministry for research-development and innovation, but 24 countries had a national strategy for research-development.

One other major aspect needs to be attended to when debating the macroeconomic situation and international position of Romania. Our country is currently facing three fundamentally important and extremlly difficult to implement processes: defining the market economy (not yet finalized), the European Union integration and building the knowledge-based economy[14]. The essembly of these three processes has an essential sinergetic potential, but the bad management of these phenomenons may deepen the vulnerabilities of our country, affecting the long term economic development.

Moreover, in the past few years, a new proccess emerged for our country to also handle: the worldwide economic crisis[15]. Under these circumstances, outlining the knowledge-based economy may be the sustainable solution that Romania needs so as to exist the current economic crisis. But this grand process must be unrolled strategically, this clearly showing the need for a national strategy, adjusted accordingly to the EU's strategy, in order to be able to obtain the sustainable economic growth.

For the elaboration of Romania's national strategy for the knowledge-based economy, we propose the model presented by Nicolescu and Verboncu in "Metodologii manageriale"[16]: foundation of the strategy, the effective elaboration of the strategy and its implementation. Each phase, its steps and elements are unfolded as follows.

Romania's strategy for the knowledge-based economy

Foundation of the strategy

The foundation of the strategy is the first and most important phase of the whole process. If the fundamentals are not relevant and consistent enough, the elements of the strategy will not have

[12] Daianu et al., "Romania si Agenda Lisabona – aderarea la UE si competitivitatea economica", Group of Applied Economics, November, 2004

[13] Voinea, Pauna and Marinescu, "Performanta in contextul Agendei Lisabona: experiente de succes, design institutional", European Insitute of Romania, accessed November 25, 2011, 13

[14] Nicolescu and Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazat pe cunostinte, 181

[15] Nicolescu and Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazat pe cunostinte

[16] Nicolescu and Verboncu, Metodologii manageriale, 59-86 essence, will be only apparently serving a purpose, but never will the implementation lead to long term results. Therefore, considering the basic pillars of the foundation of the strategy, we unfold a sketch of the items that the strategy for the knowledge economy should be based on:

Diagnosis studies

Since we are dealing with the construction of a national strategy, specialists say that a diagnosis, as in a "realistic evaluation of the state of evolution of Romania towards the knowledge-based economy can only be achieved by means of an international comparative approach"[17] (Nicolescu, 2011). Such an evaluation was conducted in 2004 by the Group of Applied Economics, and the results placed Romania nearly at the end of the european ranking, in the inferior part (Daianu, 2004; Nicolescu, 2011). The 2004 statistics are presented in tabel 1, but considering the integration of Romania in the European Union in 2007 and the effects of the economic crissis incipient in 2008-2009, the indicators most surely have suffered changes that ought to be recorded and resumed. An evaluation as the one in 2004 should be available for 2011. Also, the evaluation has to be taken into consideration when setting quantitative targets and national objectives, because they cannot be identified without such a reporting scale.

Ecological studies

Worldwide preocupation for polution and a sustainable use of natural resources was first displayed in Rio de Janeiro, in 1992, when the spotlightes highlighted the concept of "sustainable development". Then what followed was the negotiation of an international covention regarding the environment, in 1997, agreement known as the Kyoto Protocol. The document reffers to the period between 2008-2012, during which the signing countries agreed to reduce their greenhouse gas emissions by 5.2% on average in comparison to the values is 1990. Recently, during the conference in Durban, South Africa, it was decided to prolong the Protocol until the year 2015[18]. Due to the current global situation and an obvious and justified concern towards environmental issues, it is safe to say that this international convention will continue to exist and press the signing countries into taking responsabilities, both on the short and medium term and the long run.

Tabel 1

Domain	Synthetic evaluation[19]
Innovation and research	D
Market liberalization and fluidization	D+
Entrepreneurial and entreprenourship development	D
Employment rate and social cohesion	C-
Sustainable development	C-

Source: translation from O. Nicolescu, C. Nicolescu[20]

Romania, as a participating country in the Rio de Janeiro Covension and the Kyoto Protocol, cannot dissregard these agreements and the targets for greenhouse gas emissions reduction, when debating the ecological fundaments of the strategy for the knowledge economy. On the other hand,

[17] Nicolescu and Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazat pe cunostinte, 177

[18] Morosan, "Acord mondial pentru continuarea Protocolului de la Kyoto", Curentul, December, 2011, accessed December 17, 2011, http://www.curentul.ro/2011/index.php/2011121266618/In-lume/Acord-mondial-pentru-continuarea-Protocolului-de-la-Kyoto.html

[19] Evaluation was made on a three-scale from A (best) to E (worst), with three intermediate grades (e.g.: A-, A, A+)

[20] Nicolescu and Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazate pe cunostinte, 180

the domain of environmental protection has been favorized when elaborating the EU 2020 strategy, the domain having assigned to it the biggest number of objectives (three, when other domanins have only one or two). This could be explained by the statement of the romanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs' website, saying that "the European Union has taken upon itself the role of a global leader in fighting climate change, committing itself unilaterally to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 20%, by 2020, compared to the levels in 1990"[21].

Another document important to mention in this context is the ex-ante environment evaluation included in the National Development Plan (NDP) 2007-2013, based on information from november and december 2005. "The environment evaluation of the NDP was conducted as part of the ex-ante evaluation of the NDP, included in the Phare project RO 2002/IB/SPP 01 'Building Structural Fund compatible Capacities and Instruments'."[22]

Marketing studies

When dealing with a company we require marketing studies in order to analyse the market and the organization's environment, but in the case of the national strategy, the issue will not be approached from this angle. Both theory and pratice have already shown that the one viable and sustainable response for survival and growth is the transation to the knowledge-based economy. On this behalf, instead of a marketing study, it could be more appropiate to conduct a specific SWOT analysis, emphasizing the threats and opportunities from the international surroundings in respect to the construction of the knowledge-based economy in Romania.

Included in the NDP 2007-2013 can be found a SWOT analysis for Romania, concluded after researching 12 domains of interest (the socio-economic situation; production sector; infrastructure; human capital; employment rate; social inclusion; health sector; agriculture, rural development and fishing; regional differences in economic development; european and territorial cooperation; public management capability; spatial development situation). Based on this analysis and sprinkling other relevant elements, we outline in table 2 a summary SWOT analysis for Romania from the perspective of the knowledge economy.

The national (international) strategy

Since we are fundamenting a national strategy for Romania, we shall search one level higher, at a european or international scale, in order to be able to identify this base for the strategy. Therefore, the Lisbon Strategy and the EU 2020 Strategy are the two strategical documents thet we point our attention towards.

Other important documents that need to be mentioned and taken into consideration are: the National Development Plan (NDP) 2007-2012, the National Reform Plan (NRP) 2011-2013, the Convergence Programme 2011-2014 and all the sectorial strategies elaborated so far in Romania (the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation; the Energy Strategy; the National Strategy for Exports; the National Strategy for Sustainable Development; the National Strategy for Lifelong Learning; the Fiscal Strategy, the National Strategy for Waste Management, etc.)

[21] Translation from "Schimbari climatice la nivel UE", Ministry of Foreign Affairs, accessed November 18, 2011, http://www.mae.ro/node/1663

[22] NDP 2007-2013, 372

Tabel 2

Strenghts	Weaknesses	Oportunities	Threats
Availability of a research and development strategy	The research and development sector is underdeveloped and not practical, unrelated to the economic realities.	New forms of organizations available (the network company, the network of companies, the virtual firm, etc.)	The financial-economic crisis and the post-crisis period
"A big number of ITC specialists"[23]	Smooth and insuficient financial and cultural base for SMEs	The Internet and the expansion of social networks (Facebok, Twitter, etc.)[24]	Decrease in the intensity of several industrial sectors, which move along to other locations that offer them significant financial benefits
High and increasing share of the tertiary sector in the GDP (Gross Domestic Product)	Difficulty and numerous bureaucratic barriers to obtaining financial or informational resources in the business sector	Liberalization of the public aquisition processes and the markets and the redesign of the business models	Increasing rate of Romania's perception in Europe as an economy based on the primar productive sector, where the added value rate is low
Increase and diversity in exports	Bad climate management, bad business environment management and miss-handling of the informational infrastructure	Development of the internal business environment (clusters, business incubators, networks of firms, etc.)[25]	Emigration of the human resources with faculty degrees, especially knowledge-based employees (doctors, researchers, etc.)
High access rate to human resources, available at a low cost and with a solid informational base	Work force insufficiently adapted to the economic conditions and not enough engaged to handle the lifelong learning necessity	Proliferation of the e-society, including e-commerce, e-government, e-banking	Deterioration of the natural environment and tranciency of natural resources

Source: adapted from NDP 2007-2013

Effective elaboration of the strategy

The mission

Romania's mission could be somewhat like the following: Romania wishes to become an economy with a durable growth sustained from internal sources, knowledge-based and economic, social and ecological performance-orientated, seeking to achieve these by exploiting and increasing the competitive advantages it has, for the final purpose of maintaining the main productivity, social cohesion, employment rate and environment protection indicators at the most adequate levels in the European Union, so as to blur the socio-economical development differences between Romania and the other member states of the European Union.

[23] Translation from NDP 2007-2013, 235

[24] O'Dell and Hubert, The New Edge in Knowledge

[25] Nicolescu,Verboncu and Profiroiu, Starea de sanatate a managementului din Romania in 2010, 144

The basic ideas included in mission are the main elements of the EU 2020 strategy, but also the pillars of a knowledge-based economy. Thus, knowledge is under the spotlight (knowledge-based), and the outcomes comprehend the three key areas of the knowledge economy (economic, social and ecological performance-orientated). By transiting to a knowledge-based economy, Romania will be able to maintain the sustainable growth that any state needs to have, and, moreover, it will be able to obtain and support this growth by means of internal knowledge, specifically by completing the competitive advantages of each industry (become an economy with a durable growth sustained from internal sources, ... , seeking to achieve these by exploiting and increasing the competitive advantages it has). The point of this transition resides in consolidating Romania's position in the European Union, by diminuishing the disparities concerning socio-economic development between Romania and other member states (for the final purpose of maintaining the main productivity, social cohesion, employment rate and environment protection indicators at the most adequate levels in the European Union).

Since the expression "most adequate levels" is particular to a mission, ambigous and subjective, we hereby link the following phase of the elaboration of the strategy, the setting of the objectives, in order to be able to quantify and control the evolution of the strategy. This following stept is likely to be the most important, complex and comprehensive one.

Objectives

The objectives that need to be accomplished will be set from two perspectives: they will be personalized national targets adapted from the EU 2020 objectives, in order to assure the coherence and integration in the EU (these are the national targets set by the European Commission), and they will also be set individually, by each country, in such a way as to permit the overall development of the economy. Without pretending a comprehensive approach, we unfold a sketch of the main long term objectives of Romania for the transition to the knowledge-based economy, based on several targets already established by romanian and european officials.

The objectives of the EU 2020 Strategy:

According to the EU 2020 Strategy, its objectives have been transposed into national objectives, adapted to the specificity and circumstances of each country. Romania's case is presented in tabel 3. To better understand these national targets, we also present in tabel 4 a synthesis of the levels of each indicator from tabel 3 in Romania during 2000-2010.

Tabel 3

Member states targets/ EU	Employ-ment rate (in %)	R&D in % of GDP	CO_2, emission reduction targets, base year 1990	Renew-able energy	Energy efficiency – reduction of energy consumption in Mtoe	Early school leaving in %	Tertiary educatio n in %	Reduction of population at risk of poverty or social excusion (number of persons)
Main EU target	75 %	3 %	-20 %	20 %	20 % increase of energy efficieny (equivalent for 368 Mtoe)	10 %	40 %	20.000.000
Romania' s target	70%	2%	-19%	245	10%	11,3%	26,7%	580.000

Source: European Commission[26]

The objectives set at national level:

In order to set these objectives, we have adjusted the objectives from the NDP 2007-2013 and the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation, and sprinkled them with the optics of the authors and other specialists. Therefore, we present Romania's objectives for the knowledge economy.

Tabel 4

Year/ target	Employ -ment rate (in %)	R&D in % of GDP	CO_2, emission reduction targets, base year 1990	Renew -able energy	Energy efficiency – reduction of energy consumption in Mtoe	Early school leaving in %	Tertiary educatio n in %	Reduction of population at risk of poverty or social excusion in number of persons (% of population)
2000	69,1	0,37	57	-	906,05	22,9	8,9	-
2001	68,3	0,39	59	-	869,24	21,7	8,8	-
2002	63,3	0,38	62	-	857,74	23,0	9,1	-
2003	63,7	0,39	64	-	847,43	22,5	8,9	-
2004	63,5	0,39	64	-	766,70	22,4	10,3	-
2005	63,6	0,41	62	-	732,99	19,6	11,4	-
2006	64,8	0,45	64	17,2	704,78	17,9	12,4	-
2007	64,4	0,52	62	18,4	659,09	17,3	13,9	9904 (45,9%)
2008	64,4	0,58	61	20,5	612,76	15,9	16,0	9418 (44,2%)
2009	63,5	0,47	52	22,4	576,90	16,6	16,8	9112 (43,1%)
2010	63,3	0,47	-	-	-	18,4	18,1	8890 (41,4%)

Source: European Commission[27]

The goal of the strategy: enhancing the characteristics of the knowledge-based economy, in order to obtain a sustainable competitive economic growth[28]

Fundamental objectives:

Increasing the GDB per capita up to at least 45% of the EU average by 2020[29]

Reaching an average enterprise productivity of minimum 60% of the european productivity average by 2020[30]

Increasing the share of R&D expenses with 1% of the GDP by 2015 and 2% by 2020[31]

"Increasing the contribution of SMEs to the GDP with 20% by 2015"[32] and increasing the number of new SMEs, especially the share of innovative firms out of the total on SMEs

Increasing the share of enterprises and population using the Internet up to 85% of the enterprises and 70% of the population by 2020[33]

"Reduction of the primary energy intensity with 40% by 2015, in comparison to 2001"[34]

---

[26] "Europe 2020 targets", European Commission, accessed November 19, 2011, 2

[27] "Europe 2020 indicators – Headline indicators", European Commission – Eurostat, accessed November 10, 2011

[28] Adaptation to the first national development priority from NDP 2007-2013, 243

[29] Adaptation tothe target of the main goal from NDP 2007-2013, 236

[30] Adaptation to the general objective of Priority 1 from NDP 2007-2013, 247

[31] Adaptation to the second national development objective of Priority 1 from NDP 2007-2013, 248

[32] Translation from the first specific objective of Priority 1 from NDP 2007-2013, 248

[33] Adaptation to the third specific objective of Priority 1 from NDP 2007-2013, 248

More efficient management of natural resources, in regard to protecting and ameliorating the effects of industrialization on the environment[35]

Accelerating the economic growth of the underdeveloped areas, in regard to ameliorating the socio-economic disparities between and inside different regions[36]

Development of the rural economy and increasing the productivity of the agriculture sector, by creating a knowledge-based agriculture[37]

Enhancement of the basic infrastructure at european standards, by "providing an extended, modern and sustainable transport infrastructure", so as the share of the transport activities in the GDB to increase up to "a minimum of 7 billion euro by 2015"[38];

Creating a network for the circulation of information in every sector of the economy, by means of broadband Internet, mobile telephony, but also classical stocking and transmitting mediums (radio, television, etc.)[39]

Creating a national innovation-centered knowledge system, in order to contribute directly to the enrichment of the knowledge flow, as to support a sustainable economic and social growth of Romania

Connecting through practical relations the enterprises, research centers, universities and other economic entities, in order to manage the flow of knowledge under real requirements of the business environment, as to transform that knowledge into products, services or new items[40].

Engaging in state financed projects that should include and constitute the "demand" for all the unfolded research and development activities[41]

Increasing the qualitative and quantitative performances[42] of the national research and development system, by means of:

Increasing the number of articles in the main flow of knowledge ("ISI indexed publications")[43]

Significant increase in the number of EPO patents per million inhabitants, USPTO patents, patents registered in OSIM and high-tech patents[44];

Quantitative and qualitative growth in human resouces[45] engaged in research and development activities, by means of:

Increasing the number of researchers and the "share of doctors and doctoral students up to over 50% of all researchers"[46]

Establishing laboratories and research centers and indexing them in the european research infrastructure, concurrent with improving and facilitating the access of romanian researchers to the important research infrastructures in Europe[47]

---

[34] Translation from the fouth specific objective of Priority 1 from NDP 2007-2013, 248

[35] Adaptation to the third national development priority from NDP 2007-2013, 243

[36] Adaptation to the general objective of Priority 6 from NDP 2007-2013, 336

[37] Adaptation to the general objective of Priority 5 from NDP 2007-2013, 319

[38] Translation Obiectivul general al Prioritatii 2 din NDP 2007-2013, 262

[39] Geisler and Wickramasinghe, Principles of Knowledge Management: Theory, Practice and Cases, 76

[40] Geisler and Wickramasinghe, Principles of Knowledge Management: Theory, Practice and Cases, 76

[41] Nicolescu and Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazate pe cunostinte, 185

[42] Adaptation to the first specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 16

[43] Adaptation to the first specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 16

[44] Adaptation to the first specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 16; Nicolescu and Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazate pe cunostinte, 183

[45] Adaptation to the second specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 16

[46] Translation from the second specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 16

"Involvement of the private sector"[48] in the research and development activity, and also increasing the degree of active involvement from the government[49], by means of:

Increasing the share of private research and development expenses in the GDP, by establishing technological platforms and scientific centers, thus allowing innovative firms and not only them to conduct an innovative technological development[50]

"Expanding international cooperation"[51] in the research and development domanin, transforming Romania into an active and present player on this market, including also the romanian researchers in other countries.

Enhancing the knowledge of the national human capital, facilitating the use of this knowledge and improving performances in regard to the added value created by human resources[52]

Increasing the degree of knowledge of the human capital, in order to assure an intensive development of its competitiveness on the labour market, considering the principle of social inclusion and leading towards the development of a sustainable, knowledge-based labour market, capable to include 900.000 persons by 2015 and increase this number with minimum 5% annualy, by 2020[53]

Starting reforms and drawing up educational offers that can provide a solid basic education and facilitate lifelong learning, equally for all the citizens, as to improve their educational state for when they enter the labour market[54]

Perfectioning the human capital in the educational system, by including it in systems that support and enhance initial and permanent learning, concurrent with the introduction of new professions of the knowledge-based economy, these targets comprehending a minimum of 40.000 persons[55]

Gradual increase in higher education graduates at one thousand 20-29 aged inhabitants[56]

Launching educational programmes that would train 1.100.000 persons in coherence with the real and actual needs of the labour market, also including a minimum of 400.000 persons that encounter difficulties in entering or reentering the labour market, as well as training a minimum of 300.000 youths, from which 30% persons from socially vulnerable categories[57]

Enhancing the entrepreneurial spirit especially among the youth, by means of financing innovative start-ups and supporting the entrepreneurial culture of the managers[58]

The three fundamental objectives above cover the most important three areas that support growth in the knowledge-based economy: economic, research-development-innovation and human resources. These areas should be considered to be highly complex, because they take into account the objectives and the action priorities definied by the European Union. For example, the area reffering

---

[47] The second specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 16

[48] Translation from the third specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 17

[49] Adaptation to the fourth specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 17

[50] Adaptation to the third specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 17

[51] Translation from the last specific objective from the National Strategy for Research, Development and Innovation 2007-2013, 17

[52] Adaptation to the third specific objective from NDP 2007-2013, 242

[53] Adaptation to the general objective of Priority 4 from NDP 2007-2013, 298

[54] Adaptation to the first specific objective of Priority 4 from NDP 2007-2013, 298

[55] Adaptation to the second specific objective of Priority 4 from NDP 2007-2013, 298

[56] Nicolescu and Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazate pe cunostinte, 183

[57] Adaptation to the fifth and sixth specific objectives of Priority 4 from NDP 2007-2013, 298-299

[58] Adaptation to the sixth spefici objective of Priority 4 from NDP 2007-2013, 299

to human resources includes equality of chances, continuous learning, poverty fighting, and also social inclusion.

These objectives need to be unfolded into short and medium term objectives, but these will be the content of several plans or programmes afferent to the strategy and reffering to shorter periods of time. Objectives of this kind are also available in the NRP, but they require a reevaluation before beeing included in strategic documents of the implementation of the strategy for the creation of the knowledge-based economy.

Strategic options

The strategic options are the main courses of action by which the objectives can be fulfilled. In the national strategy, they can be found among the initiatives proposed in the NRP and the Europe 2020 strategy. Therefore, taking these two important documents into consideration, as well as views of the authors and other specialists, we consider that the main strategic options of Romania are:

Optimizing the internal businss environment[59]

Enlargement of the internal market and inclusion of it into the european market

Redesigning the national educational system, so as to be able to welcome the practical needs of the business environment, as well as to promote social inclusion and lifelong learning, centered on personal development and training

Promoting the sectors of e-government, e-banking, e-commerce and finalisation of the legislation, where it is due[60]

Supporting research and development in the business environment, by means of promoting business incubators and clusters, as well as other new forms of knowledge-based organizations, so as to be able to embrace the objective of increasing the number of innovative firms

Turning on a large scale towards public-private partnerships for investments and growth

Placing innovation and social and ecological elements in the center of sustainable economic growth

Paying attention to the top industrial sectors which handle great stocks and flows of knowledge, as well as promoting the sett-up of new firms in the mentioned sectors[61]

Resouces

Resouces represent one of the starting engines of the strategy, having a primar role in the implementation phase. On the other hand, equaly important is the determination of the size of the reosurces, because neglectfully fundamenting them may turn out to be an authentic impediment in the following steps and phases of the strategy. The main categories[62] of required resources are:

Financial resources[63]:

From national sources: the state budget for each year from 2011 to 2020, as well as local budgets and other public and local sources for growth;

From drawn sources: structural instruments related to the EU objectives[64], in total amount of 19,7 billion euro, granted among 2007-2013; after 2013, the following post-adhesion funds will be taken into consideration;

From borrowed sources: external lowns from the World Bank Group, International Monetary Fund, European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, European Investment Bank;

Technical / material resources : various buildings where knowledge is beeing created or stocked (libraries, research centers, scientific parks, business incubators, etc.), technical resources (computers, pads, servers, etc.);

---

[59] NRP 2011-2013, 39-55

[60] Nicolescu, Verboncu and Profiroiu, Starea de sanatate a managementului din Romania in 2010, 145

[61] Nicolescu, Verboncu and Profiroiu, Starea de sanatate a managementului din Romania in 2010, 144

[62] Nicolescu and Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazate pe cunostinte, 184

[63] NPD 2007-2013, 350

[64]The "Convergence" objective and the "European Territorial Cooperation" objective

Human resources: doctors in sciences (economy, sociology, geology, ecology, etc.), doctoral students, researchers, consultants, analists, trainers, IT people, politicians (especially to sustain the political actions), ministers and any other person that can qualitatively contribute to the elaboration and implementation of the strategy;

Knowledge / informational resources : consulting companies in Romania, the main flow of publications (romanian articles from various databases), other studies (as a result of research projects funded by the government or private firms), registered patents, social networks (Facebook, Twitter, etc.);

The categories of resources mentioned above are meant to be merely general dirrections, because deeply fundamenting numerical values for each of them would constitute a great paper and would most certainly require a different study for the matter. Therefore, we have here a dirrection for further research in the presented issues.

Deadlines

The deadlines that have to be taken in consideration when elaborating the strategy for the knowledge economy are the initial date, intermmediate deadlines and the final term.

In regard to the initial date, it would have been ideal to start on 01.01.2011, since in 2010 the Lisbon Strategy becomes outdated and the Europe 2020 Strategy becomes effective.

The point of view expressed by E. Dinga in a study[65] of his is considered to be relevant in regard to establishing the intermmediate terms for monitoring the strategy. The author proposes a "two-step system for progress monitoring": in order to assure the identification of errors in time, the first step consists of elaborating annual progress reports; the second step consists of an overall evaluation of the implementation of the strategy, done every two years.

It is important to mention here the concept of european semester. It consists of the first six months of each year, period during which the member states coordinate their policies according to the European Union, in various economical aspects. In january, the Commission establishes the main goals of the EU for the following period of time, based on an annual growth survey, previously presented. In march, the national policies are beeing outlined, then they turn into NRPs by april and are sent to the European Union in june, to undergo evaluation and possible recommandations[66].

The final term, concurrent with the EU 20202 Strategy, is the year 2020. It is usefull to mention that since we are dealing with an european or national strategy, the 10 years duration (between 2010 and 2020) is adequate, recommandations having been made as to extend the strategy over approximately 10-15[67] years.

Competitive advantage

Taking into account the two well known types of competitive advantage described by Michael Porter, cost leadership and differentiation, Romania's obvious choice should be going for a cost leadership. This would imply, for example, low fiscality, according to the opinion of Sebastian Bodu, ex-president of NAFA (National Agency for Fiscal Administration). He statted in march 2011 that "we have a low fiscality, it is good to keep it this way, this is the only competitive advantage of Romania"[68]. Mugur Isarescu, governer of the National Bank of Romania, declared a little while ago, in october 2011, that he believes that Romania has a three-way orientated competitive advantage: "it as all about the industry in which financial capital, technology, internal and external management

[65]Dinga, Prelipcean and Baltaretu, "Noua strategie europeana pentru crestere economica si ocuparea fortei de munca (Europa 2020): Obiective, instrumente de monitorizare a implementarii, resurse necesare", European Institute of Romania, March 31, 2011, 11

[66] "Europa 2020 – Guvernanta economica", European Commission, accessed November 19, 2011, http://ec.europa.eu/europe2020/priorities/economic-governance/index_ro.htm

[67] Nicolescu and Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazate pe cunostinte,184

[68] Translation from Alina Bardas, "Bodu: Fiscalitatea redusa, singurul avantaj competitiv al Romaniei", ziare.com, March 15, 2011, accessed November 15, 2011, http://www.ziare.com/sebastian-bodu/stiri-sebastian-bodu/bodu-fiscalitatea-redusa-singurul-avantaj-competitiv-al-romaniei-tv-ziare-com-1081721 have been invested, as well as the work force in IT and the wine industry. One can not rely solely on the work force, especially since migration is one of the esential elements of Europe"[69]. Therefore, even if Romania would hold several advantages on each industry, most of them would be cost leadership orientated.

The implementation of the strategy

Implementing the strategy involves three aspects: analysing the work climate and assuring the managerial premisses, as well as the other categories of conditions (financial, human and material).

The work climate, in the context of a national strategy, will be equal to the state of mind of the people. In this regard, worth mentioning is a study conducted in 2010 by the Institute for the Quality of Life (ICCV), entitled "The quality of life in Romania 2010". The results of the study have shown that in 2010 the population felt the overall situation of the country roughly at the same level as in 1999 or even worst, without any improvement having been registered, as one would have aspected, due to socio-economic progress. Romanians turned out to be optimistic and faithfull concerning non-economic elements, such as family and relations with neighbours, but when it comes down to income, taxes, high prices and difficulty to enter the labour market, the people consider them to be "the most critical elements of the quality of life" [70]. Among the online press articles, there have also been titles to, unfortunatelly, describe very synthetically and expresive the research conducted by the above mentioned study: "Pessimism, life style among romanians"[71]. Under these circumstances, implementing a strategy for the transition to the knowledge-based economy may be more difficult. The proper conditions would imply an open-minded population, prepared for change, optimistic and faithfull, ready to embrace fundamental changes that would open the path towards a sustainable, efficient and environment-friendly lifestyle.

By all means, the cultural aspects have a major importance in implementing the strategy, but making a swift in the national culture may take dozens of years, if possible at all, so hope in regard to this strategy is that the realities of the knowledge economy, as well as the strategy itself, will be the departure point in the birth of new values, behaviours, thinking patterns and even processes.

As fas as the managerial conditions are concerned, they would be administrative premises when dealing with a national strategy. E. Dinga finds in a study[72] such three institutional conditions for the implementation of the EU 2020 strategy in the member states:

bordering and aknowledgement of the EU2020 strategy as a "master programme for the institutional construction of the European Union, socially and economically"[73]; convergence of the National Reform Plans, as implementing instruments, with the National Stability Programmes, as main monetary policy instruments; evaluations should be conducted annually; carefuly monitoring of the progress: establishing an European Council responsible for writting the annual progress report, as well as a Biannual European Forum for the evaluation of the state on implementation of the EU2020 strategy[74].

---

[69]Translation from "Isarescu identifica trei avantaje competitive ale Romaniei in lupta pentru atragerea investitiilor", evz.ro, October 28, 2011, accessed November 12, 2011, http://www.evz.ro/detalii/stiri/care-sunt-avantajele-competitive-ale-romaniei-in-opinia-lui-isarescu-951628.html

[70] Margineanu et al., "Calitatea Vietii in Romania 2010", Research Institute for the Quality of Life (ICCV), 2010, accesed January 12, 2011, 5

[71] Translation from "Pesimismul, stil de viata la romani", 9AM News, August 20, 2010, accessed December 15, 2011, http://www.9am.ro/top/Social/156724/Pesimismul-stil-de-viata-la-romani.html

[72] Dinga, Prelipcean and Baltaretu, "Noua strategie europeana pentru crestere economica si ocuparea fortei de munca (Europa 2020): Obiective, instrumente de monitorizare a implementarii, resurse necesare", European Institute of Romania, March 31, 2011

[73] Translation from Dinga, Prelipcean and Baltaretu, "Noua strategie europeana pentru crestere economica si ocuparea fortei de munca (Europa 2020): Obiective, instrumente de monitorizare a implementarii, resurse necesare", European Institute of Romania, March 31, 2011, 10

The same study names three vulnerabilities for the european strategy. These include "misunderstanding the national targets as being quantitative differentiations, placing the accent away from the objectives to the implementation actions and over autonomising the targets, by conserving their nature". Very eloquent, the author shows an explication, the risk involved and a solution for each of these weak spots of the strategy.

Another administrative prerequisite is the involvement of high state officials, as to ensure the support necessary for such an initiative and increase the trust of the population and other entities or institutions interested in contribuiting to the achievement of the strategy's targets.

Last, but not least, ensuring the material, financial and human conditions is equivalent to ensuring the resources necessary for the effective implementation of the strategy. This phase is actually the beginning of the process of turning the economy into a knowledge-based economy, as the presented strategy pursuites.

Microeconomic prerequisites for creating knowledge-based organizations

As it has been shown how to create a favorable environment for knowledge-based organizations using Romania's strategy for transition to the knowledge-based economy, attention should focus on the efforts that organizations must do at a microeconomic level and on the areas that should be of most interest.

Premise 1: Strategic knowledge management

Promoting strategic management has so far validated its merits, demonstrating that without a strategy, any result (efficient or not) obtained by organizations, is just a contextual variable and there is no sustainable basis to ensure the survival and competitiveness of the organization.

Regarding strategic knowledge management, the situation becomes more critical, because an initiative in this area cannot lead to results unless it starts as a strong strategic approach. Studies have been made in recent years to show how strategic knowledge management can lead to improved organizational performance, presenting the main faults, concepts, steps to be followed to succeed and the importance of communities of practice[75]. On the other hand, other studies have shown that strategic knowledge management is applied under the shadow of classic strategic management paradigms; hence the weaknesses of it, weaknesses that can be disproved[76].

Analyzing how the daily routine of an organization affects the processes of treating knowledge, it was found that strategic commitment and "strategic engagement" are a crucial direction to be followed in the knowledge-based organizations[77]. In addition, strategies and knowledge strategic management suffer many optical adjustments or changes due to the emergence of knowledge and intellectual capital. For example, what shows up is the need to redirect attention to the financial aspects of risk measurement and to the value of investments in intellectual capital in terms of long term sustainability[78]. Another example in this respect is the model developed by Snyman and Kruger, which combines strategic knowledge management and classical strategy formulation, in order to capture the changes that occur due to increased importance of knowledge[79].

Another point of view is that of human resource strategic management, which becomes more important than in the traditional organization. Human resources as a whole increases as significance

---

[74] Dinga, Prelipcean and Baltaretu, "Noua strategie europeana pentru crestere economica si ocuparea fortei de munca (Europa 2020): Obiective, instrumente de monitorizare a implementarii, resurse necesare", European Institute of Romania, March 31, 2011, 10

[75] Cook, "Strategic knowledge management"

[76] Nielsen, "Strategic knowledge management research: Tracing the co-evolution of strategic management and knowledge management perspectives"

[77] Sun, "Five critical knowledge management organizational themes", 507

[78] Bose, Oh, "Measuring strategic value-drivers for managing intellectual capital"

[79] Snyman, Kruger, "The interdependency between strategic management and strategic knowledge management" in the knowledge-based organization, but these issues will be addressed in the following premises. The main idea of this paragraph is that strategic management should include human resources from the organization. In a paper describing the importance of human resources in the knowledge-based economy, the main challenges the management of knowledge-based employees is facing and the human resource management strategies applied in these conditions due to their deep centering on people, the authors conclude with an expressive statement: "As the industrial economy transforms itself into a knowledge economy, the people management function need a similar transformation to be able to fulfill its critical role in leveraging intellectual capital as a sustainable competitive advantage" [80]. Studies over time have provided evidence to support the claim that the human resource management strategy is a key determinant of organizational performance. The correlation of knowledge management initiatives with the strategic management of human resources is argued; the aim is to increase organizational performance, even if specific human resource management activities do not directly influence the performance of the organization, but rather influence human resources by increasing capital intellectual possessed by them or improving communication, issues that indirectly contribute to achieving performance[81]. Moreover, it was shown that implementing the same strategy in two different companies leads to different levels of performance results due to other internal control factors, as for example organizational culture[82] (which is another prerequisite treated in the following pages) or were described effects driven by two types of human resource management strategies on knowledge treatment processes and on human resources behaviour[83].

In conclusion, strategic approach must always be present in a knowledge management initiative and is especially useful and necessary because the managerial problems are always the deepest within the organization and they do not disappear with technological or informational changes that can be made at any time[84]. Without strategic knowledge and strategic knowledge management, it's like the entire organization is "getting on board a wagon with no horse to pull you through your journey"[85].

Premise 2: Increased attention to human resources

Going further, the second premise appears, namely, the increased importance to be given to human resources, and treating them differently from classical organization. Human resources are the main bearers of knowledge, which gives them a special status in the knowledge-based organization, aspect that was submitted to research by studying the links between knowledge management and four key areas of human resource management: "training, decision-making, performance appraisal, reward and compensation". The results show that the knowledge-based organizations required a different approach than in traditional organizations, hence the special role of human resource management[86]. However, acceptance and action in accordance with this role, namely the attention given to human resources is one of the challenges knowledge-based organizations around the world

[80] Thite, "Strategic positioning of HRM in knowledge-based organizations", 41

[81] Afiouni, "Human resource management and knowledge management: A road map toward improving organizational performance"

[82] Teo et al., "Strategic human resource management and knowledge workers: A case study of professional service firms"

[83] Edvardsson, "HRM and knowledge management"

[84] Evanschitzky et al., "Knowledge management in knowledge-intensive service networks: A strategic management approach"

[85] O'Dell and Hubert, The New Edge in Knowledge, 23

[86] Yahya, Goh, "Managing human resources toward achievieng knowledge management" are still facing[87]. "In order to manage this type of human capital, managers at all levels of the hierarchy must develop abilities that exceed those of traditional managers." [88]

To ensure the success of knowledge management, human resources have been studied by many authors and summaries have shown the benefits that can be obtained from a synergetic promoting of human resources management and of knowledge management, the two together being able to lead to increased organizational efficiency and performance[89]. Once managers and researchers have realized the importance of this, the best practices regarding knowledge management and human resource management have been identified. A recent study identified less common practices, especially how they energize each other, and final focus fell on how the practices handle less known classic dilemmas of human resource management and knowledge management, in organizations which received National Award for Quality in Uruguay[90].

Thus, we can say that human resource management is one of the the basic pillars of knowledge management. "People, not technology, are the key to KM." [91]

Premise 3: Support from technology

Even if is not the key to knowledge management, technology is certainly a very important pillar, that should not be ignored, nor confused with this phenomenon. Knowledge management initiative needs to rely on technological tools in order to ensure the full benefit of this management system in all its dimensions. For example, emerged from a study in Africa, related to analyzing factors that stimulate e-commerce, the relationship between knowledge, information and IT support has been analyzed, concluding that managing information and knowledge depends on a good informational, software base. [92]

Definitely, it must be clarified that knowledge management is not just informatics, information systems, technology or information management. In a work that aims to clarify precisely the concept of knowledge management, it is set out, that "In particular, information systems and human resource management are two important pillars of KM but none of these per se can be termed as KM, which is a much bigger and comprehensive concept" [93]. Another expressive approach in this regard urges not to allow software to become the brand of knowledge management initiative, as many management programs have failed because they acted under the name of technological applications. "Don't let your software brand yout program. We have seen many KM programs get branded by their technology application and then crash and burn. A wiki is a tool, not a brand to promote your KM program. Ensure that KM is seen as a holistic approach enabled by dedicated employees, standard processes, and robust technology tools."[94]

Usually, investments in advanced technologies and information systems are already completed when the organization considers the promotion of knowledge management, so a proper knowledge management must support and exploit the investments already made[95]. Software systems to support the technological aspects of knowledge management are multiple and diverse, so there are many ways to ensure information support to the implementation of specific solutions for this management direction[96].

---

[87] Kalkan, "An overall view of knowledge management challenges for global business", 390
[88] Geisler and Wickramasinghe, Principles of Knowledge Management: Theory, Practice and Cases, 160
[89] Svetlik, Stavrou-Costea, "Connec ting human resources management and knowledge management"
[90] Algorta, Zeballos, "Human resource and knowledge management: best practices identification"
[91] O'Dell and Hubert, The New Edge in Knowledge, 129
[92] Badamas, "Knowledge management and information technology: Enablers of e-commerce development"
[93] Pillania, "Demystifying knowledge management", 98
[94] O'Dell and Hubert, The New Edge in Knowledge, 134
[95] Schafer, "Beyond access – from IT to managing knowledge"
[96] Lindvall, Rus, Sinha, "Software systems support for knowledge management"

Premise 4: Considering cultural aspects

Culture, whether organizational, managerial, national or any other nature, is a direct determinant of management and its various branches, including knowledge management. In this respect, compared to many qualitative works, studies to provide a quantitative basis, for all previous work proving the influence of culture on knowledge management, have appeared. One such study, conducted on 14 foreign subsidiaries of a pharmaceutical company in Japan, captured more pronounced influences of organizational culture on knowledge management, than the influences from the national culture[97].

Starting from investigating the premise according to which culture is a critical antecedent of knowledge management, a concepts base has been developed to be used by companies to analyze the relationship culture - knowledge management or by researchers to deepen this relation's study. In the same time, it was described how the five levels of culture (from the national culture to the climate in the working groups) influence the practices and knowledge management success[98].

Due to recognition of the significant impact of culture, studies have continued to widen, in order to solve the challenges brought by the equation of implementing knowledge management. A new approach indicates, unlike most experts that recommend attention to culture before implementing knowledge management, to "get over it. Culture change is more often a consequence of knowledge sharing than an antecedent to it."[99]

Other studies have focused on the influences of a culture from a hierarchical organizational structure on knowledge management processes, showing management areas where such a culture is friendly and where it is an impediment to knowledge management system performances[100]. Some authors have even deepened the relationship among organizational culture, knowledge management and other items of managerial interest, such as ERP systems[101], being presented theoretical and pragmatic implications of these management areas' association.

Another example of research made due to the importance of cultural aspects is a study made at a manufacturing company in China, that captures the specific barriers and factors favoring China's culture in relation to knowledge management[102]. One of the conclusions of the study was, for example, that the Chinese prefer to keep knowledge in tacit form, and if they share them or turn them into explicit knowledge, prefer to do so informally. The importance of cultural factors appears once again, crucial.

Stating the importance of culture by refering to a traditional model of knowledge creation, stands out the work of Glisby and Holden. The study "attacks" the famous model of knowledge creation, developed by Nonaka and Takeuchi, the authors arguing that the model should be considered as specific to its culture of origin, namely, japanese culture. They describe how, in different cultural environments, the model can behave differently, so it should be regarded as indicative only and not an authentic model of reference in the field of knowledge management[103].

Of course, the informal part of organizational culture takes on special features in the context of knowledge management. It becomes an environment favorable for the manifestation of knowledge-based employees, and a climate of trust, based on sustainable relationships between employees remains a cornerstone in the foundation of the company's competitive advantage[104].

---

[97] Magnier-Watanabe, Senoo, "Shaping knowledge management: organization and national culture"

[98] King, "Questioning the conventional wisdom: culture-knowledge management relashionships"

[99] O'Dell and Hubert, The New Edge in Knowledge, 129

[100] Tseng, "The effects of hierarhical culture on knowledge management processes"

[101] Palanisamy, "Organizational culture and knowledge management in ERP implementation: an empirical study"

[102] Tong, Mitra, "Chinese cultural influences on knowledge management practices"

[103] Glisby, Holden, "Contextual Restraints in Knowledge Management Theory: The Cultural Embeddedness of Nonaka's Knowledge-creating Company"

[104] Pyoria, "Informal organizational culture: the foundation of knowledge workers' performance"

Thus, in the light of various approaches presented and of all aspects regarding cultural influences, already tested and validated, we report that cultural issues should be viewed carefully in implementing knowledge management.

Premise 5: Promoting change management

Many works dedicated to knowledge management associate it with an intense process of organizational change, a process that cannot be left to chance, but must be managed with change management tools and techniques. "Knowledge-sharing is a change-management exercise" [105], is the title of a study showing the benefits of sharing knowledge attitude and the need to promote change in the company to obtain such an attitude.

Starting from existing models of change, a new model was even proposed for transforming institutions into "learning institutions", through strategies specific to Knowledge Management as a Mechanism for Change Management – KM-M-CM"[106].

The fact that the relationship between change management and knowledge management is bilateral, shows that this correlation cannot be ignored, because not taking it into account can be an impediment to the success of becoming a knowledge-based organization, with a specific management. It was said that "success in measuring KM is about 20 percent process and 80 percent change management" [107]. In fact, things are exactly the same when it comes to the whole process of implementing knowledge management, instead of just measuring it.

Conclusions

This work aimed at identification of macro and microeconomic premises to facilitate Romania's transition to knowledge-based economy, according to Europe 2020 strategy. At the macroeconomic level, we argued the need of Romania's strategy for creating knowledge-based economy and we also outlined the main elements of it. At the microeconomic level, we defined the main issues organizations should pay attention in order to become knowledge-based organizations and to form this way the whole economic and social system of this kind. These microeconomic assumptions happen to be well summarized in the following expression: "Three main components constitute a knowledge strategy: culture as the foundation, knowledge architecture as the blueprint of approaches and technology as the enabler."[108]

Thus, strategic approach is needed, as knowledge is important (hence the attention to human resources, in their role as key knowledge holders); culture should be regarded as a basic factor and the technology support is vital. Of course, all these elements must be included in the change management process. The purpose of these results is to redirect the attention of all actors interested towards building a successful knowledge-based society in Romania. Thus, we consider that future research directions should move toward developing a real strategy to create the knowledge-based economy and deepening on the functioning and organization of knowledge-based companies.

[105] Totsch, "Knowledge-sharing is a change-management exercise"

[106] Shoham, Perry, "Knowledge management as a mechanism for technological and organizational change management in Israeli universities"

[107] O'Dell and Hubert, The New Edge in Knowledge, 153

[108] Saint-Onge and Armstrong, The Conductive Organization, 91

References

- Ovidiu Nicolescu and Ciprian Nicolescu, Organizatia si managementul bazate pe cunostinte, Bucuresti: Pro Universitaria, 2011.
- Ovidiu Nicolescu and Luminita Nicolescu, Economia, firma si managementul bazate pe cunostinte, Bucuresti: Economica, 2005.
- Ovidiu Nicolescu and Ion Verboncu, Metodologii manageriale, Bucuresti: Universitara, 2008.
- Elie Geisler and Nilmini Wickramasinghe, Principles of Knowledge Management: Theory, Practice and Cases, New York: M.E.Sharpe, 2009.
- Ovidiu Nicolescu, Ion Verboncu and Marius Profiroiu, Starea de sanatate a managementului din Romania in 2010, Bucuresti: Pro Universitaria, 2011.
- Carla O'Dell and Cindy Hubert, The New Edge in Knowledge, New Jersey: John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 2011.
- Hubert Saint-Onge and Charles Armstrong, The Conductive Organization, USA: Elsevier, 2004.
- Ovidiu Nicolescu et al., Dictionar de management, Bucuresti: Pro Universitaria, 2011, 302.
- "Strategia Nationala de Cercetare, Dezvoltare si Inovare 2007-2013", accessed December 10, 2011, http://www.mct.ro/img/files_up/1188314177strategia%20ro.pdf
- "Programul National de Reforma (PNR) 2011-2013", April, 2011, accessed December 10, 2011, http://www.dae.gov.ro/admin/files/PNR%202011-2013.pdf
- "Planul National de Dezvoltare (PND) 2007-2013", December, 2005, accessed December 10, 2011, http://www.fsenordest.ro/BIBLIOTECA/pnd_ro.pdf
- "Isarescu identifica trei avantaje competitive ale Romaniei in lupta pentru atragerea investitiilor", evz.ro, October 28, 2011, accessed November 12, 2011, http://www.evz.ro/detalii/stiri/care-sunt-avantajele-competitive-ale-romaniei-in-opinia-lui-isarescu-951628.html
- Alina Bardas, "Bodu: Fiscalitatea redusa, singurul avantaj competitiv al Romaniei", ziare.com, March 15, 2011, accessed November 15, 2011, http://www.ziare.com/sebastian-bodu/stiri-sebastian-bodu/bodu-fiscalitatea-redusa-singurul-avantaj-competitiv-al-romaniei-tv-ziare-com-1081721;
- "Europe 2020 targets", European Commission, accessed November 19, 2011, http://ec.europa.eu/europe2020/pdf/targets_en.pdf
- "Europa 2020 – Guvernanta economica", European Commission, accessed November 19, 2011, http://ec.europa.eu/europe2020/priorities/economic-governance/index_ro.htm
- "Lisbon Strategy", Wikipedia, last modified on 13 December 2011, accessed November 18, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lisbon_Strategy
- Daniel Daianu et al., "Romania si Agenda Lisabona – aderarea la UE si competitivitatea economica", Group of Applied Economics, November 2004, accessed November 10, 2011, http://www.gea.org.ro/documente/ro/lisabona/romaniasiagendalisabona15%20nov.pdf
- "Europe 2020 indicators – Headline indicators", European Commission – Eurostat, accessed November 10, 2011, http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/portal/page/portal/europe_2020_indicators/headline_indicators
- "Protocolul de la Kyoto", Wikipedia, last modified on January 12, 2012, accessed November 18, 2011, http://ro.wikipedia.org/wiki/Protocolul_de_la_Kyoto
- Georgiana Morosan, "Acord mondial pentru continuarea Protocolului de la Kyoto", Curentul, December, 2011, accessed December 17, 2011, http://www.curentul.ro/2011/index.php/2011121266618/In-lume/Acord-mondial-pentru-continuarea-Protocolului-de-la-Kyoto.html
- "Schimbari climatice la nivel UE", Ministry of Foreign Affairs, accessed November 18, 2011, http://www.mae.ro/node/1663
- Liviu Voinea, Bianca Pauna, Cosmin Stefan Marinescu, "Performanta in contextul Agendei Lisabona: experiente de succes, design institutional", European Insitute of Romania, accessed November 25, 2011, http://www.ier.ro/documente/studiideimpactPaisIII_ro/Pais3_studiu_4_ro.pdf
- Ene Dinga, Gabriela Prelipcean and Camelia Baltaretu, "Noua strategie europeana pentru crestere economica si ocuparea fortei de munca (Europa 2020): Obiective, instrumente de monitorizare a implementarii, resurse necesare", European Institute of Romania, March 31, 2011, accessed November 25, 2011, http://www.ier.ro/documente/arhiva_evenimente_2011/E._Dinga_Prezentare__Strategia_Europa_2020_SPOS_2010_.pdf
- Ioan Margineanu et al., "Calitatea Vietii in Romania 2010", Research Institute for the Qality of Life (ICCV), 2010, accesed January 12, 2011, http://www.a1.ro/usr/imagini/2010/11/03/138121-calitatea_vietii.pdf

- "Programul de convergenta 2009-2012", February, 2010, accessed November 18, 2011, http://discutii.mfinante.ro/static/10/Mfp/pdc/Programconvergenta_ro.pdf
- "Lisbon European Council", European Parliament, March, 2000, accessed November 24, 2011, http://www.consilium.europa.eu/uedocs/cms_data/docs/pressdata/en/ec/00100-r1.en0.htm
- "Pesimismul, stil de viata la romani", 9AM News, August 20, 2010, accessed December 15, 2011, http://www.9am.ro/top/Social/156724/Pesimismul-stil-de-viata-la-romani.html
- Heiner Evanschitzky et al., "Knowledge management in knowledge-intensive service networks: A strategic management approach", Management Decision 45 (2007): 265-83, accessed November 21, 2011, doi: 10.1108/00251740710727287.
- Peter Sun, "Five critical knowledge management organizational themes", Journal of Knowledge Management 14 (2010): 507-23, accessed November 21, 2011, doi: 10.1108/13673271011059491.
- Sanjoy Bose and Kook-Bon Oh, "Measuring strategic value-drivers for managing intellectual capital", The learning organization 11 (2004): 347-56, accessed November 21, 2011, doi: 10.1108/09696470410538242.
- Teo et al., "Strategic human resource management and knolwedge workers – a case study of professional service firms", Management Research News 31 (2008): 683-96, accessed November 21, 2011, doi 10.1108/01409170810898572.
- Geoff Cook, "Strategic Knowledge Management", Training Journal (2007): 45-9, accessed November 21, 2011.
- Bo Bernhard Nielsen, "Strategic Knowledge Management Research: Tracing the co-evolution of strategic management and knowledge management perspectives", Competitiveness Review 15 (2005): 1-13, accessed November 21, 2011.
- Retha Snyman and Cornelius Johannes Kruger, "The interdependency between strategic management and strategic knowledge management", Journal of Knowledge Management 8 (2004): 5-19, accessed November 15, 2011, doi: 10.1108/13673270410523871.
- Mohan Thite, "Strategic positioning of HRM in knowledge-based organizations", The learning organization 11 (2004): 28-44, accessed November 15, 2011, doi: 10.1108/09696470410515715.
- Veli Denizhan Kalkan, "An overall view of knowledge management challenges for global business", Business Process Management Journal 14 (2008): 390-400, accessed November 15, 2011, doi: 10.1108/14637150810876689.
- Salleh Yahya and Wee-Keat Goh, "Managing human resources towards achievieng knowledge management", Journal of Knowledge Management 6 (2002): 457-68, accessed November 15, 2011, doi: 10.1108/13673270210450414.
- Marcos Algorta and Fernando Zeballos, "Human resource and knowledge management: best practices identification", Measuring Business Excellence 15 (2011): 71-80, accessed January 5, 2012, doi: 10.1108/13683041111184125.
- Ivan Svetlik and Eleni Stavrou-Costea, "Connecting Human Resources Management and Knowledge Management", International Journal of Manpower 28 (2007): 197-206, accessed November 15, 2011, doi: 10.1108/01437720710755209.
- Fida Afiouni, "Human Resource Management and Knowledge Management: A Road Map Toward Improving Organizational Performance", Journal of American Academy of Business 11 (2007): 124-31, accessed November 15, 2011.
- Ingi Runar Edvardsson, "HRM and knowledge management", Employee Relations 30 (2008): 553-61, accessed November 21, 2011, doi: 10.1108/01425450810888303.
- Rajesh K. Pillania, "Demystifying knowledge management", Business Strategy Series 10 (2009): 96-9, accessed November 21, 2011, doi: 10.1108/17515630910942223.
- Muhammed A. Badamas," Knowledge Management and Information Technology: Enablers of E-Commerce Development", Communications of the IIMA 9 (2009): 53-67, accessed November 21, 2011.
- Mikael Lindvall, Ioana Rus and Sachin Suman Sinha, "Software systems support for knowledge management", Journal of Knowledge Management 7 (2003): 137-150, accessed November 21, 2011, doi: 10.1108/13673270310505449
- Paul S. Schafer, "Beyond Acces – from IT to managing knowledge", Knowledge Management in the E&P marketplace (2000): 3, accessed January 5, 2012.
- Shu-Mei Tseng, "The effects of hierarhical culture on knowledge management processes", Management Research Review 34 (2011): 595-608, accessed January 5, 2012, doi: 10.1108/01409171111128742.

- Jin Tong and Amit Mitra, "Chinese cultural influences on knowledge management practices", Journal of Knowledge Management 13 (2009): 49-62, accessed December 5, 2011, doi: 10.1108/13673270910942691
- Martin Glisby and Nigel Holden, "Contextual Restraints in Knowledge Management Theory: The Cultural Embeddedness of Nonaka's Knowledge-creating Company", Knowledge and Process Management 10 (2003): 29-36, accessed December 5, 2011, doi: 10.1002/kpm.158.
- Ramaraj Palanisamy, "Organizational culture and knowledge management in ERP implementation: an empirical study", The Journal of Computer Information Systems 48 (2007/2008): 100-21, accessed December 5, 2011.
- Remy Magnier-Watanabe and Dai Senoo, "Shaping knowledge management: organization and national culture", Journal of Knowledge Management 14 (2010): 214-27, accessed November 21, 2011, doi: 10.1108/13673271011032364.
- William R. King, "Questioning the conventional wisdom: culture-knowledge management relashionships", Journal of Knowledge Management 13 (2008): 35-47, accessed January 5, 2011, doi: 10.1108/13673270810875840.
- Pasi Pyoria, "Informal organizational culture: the foundation of knowledge workers' performance", Journal of Knowledge Management 11 (2007): 16-30, accessed November 21, 2011, doi: 10.1108/13673270710752081.
- Snunith Shoham and Milly Perry, "Knowledge Management as a mechanism for technological and organizational change management in Israeli universities", High Educ 57 (2008): 227-46, accessed December 5, 2011, doi: 10.1007/s10734-008-9148-y.
- Melissa W. Totsch, "Knowledge-sharing is a change-management exercise", The Tax Adviser 34 (2003): 361-64, accessed November 15, 2011.

ECONOMETRIC DETERMINATION OF VOTING BEHAVIOUR

NICOLAE-MARIUS JULA[*]
NICOLETA JULA[]

Abstract
In this paper, we are testing the responsive hypothesis: if the economy is growing strongly and unemployment is low, the incumbent party has a very good chance of retaining office. When the economy is faltering, voters will more likely vote for change. We use econometric models for forecasting, based on economic data, the voter's choices and the evolution of the economy under the influence of political pressure.

Keywords*: economic voting, responsive hypothesis, econometric forecasting, regional data analysis, vote function*

Introduction

Forecasting the voting results using the economic data has been an intensive research in western democracies and United States. In Romania, the democratic experience computes a small number of electoral moments. Therefore, it is not possible yet to build an electoral behaviour econometric model using the political time series. In these circumstances, in the following section, by the examination of the political and economic dynamics during the 1990-2012, we try only to identify some significant signals concerning the economic impact of the electoral timing. We use an econometric model to analysis the political behaviour using a regional economic and political data.

The analyses start from the study of Ray C. Fair, The Effect of Economic Events on Votes for President. We adapt his model to Romanian's situation and we use this for forecasting the voting results using quarterly data from 2000 until 2012.

The importance of such a study is underlined also by rich international literature focused on the impact of the political behaviour on economic conditions. It is important to analyse if political factors do influence the economy not for the common wealth, but for increasing their chances of re-election.

The answer to this subject is reflected by the results presented in this study. The economic and econometric evidences are presented to support the results. There is a large specialized international literature on economic voting and we tested some methods and models to find out if the results for Romania are in accordance with the results obtained for other western democracies

Ray C. Fair econometric model

In USA, like in other democracies, the voters tend to be influenced by the state of economy. If the economy is growing strongly and unemployment is low, the incumbent party has a very good chance of retaining office. When the economy is faltering, U.S. voters will more likely vote for change. Second, Americans tend to favour an incumbent president running for re-election. If the economy is weak enough, however, an incumbent president can lose, as Jimmy Carter learned in 1980 and George H. W. Bush did in 1992.

There were predictions for many years, since 1948. The equation predicts the percentage share of the two-party vote won by the incumbent party, and is fitted over the 16 elections since the Second World War (Table 1). It is driven by a combination of economic and predetermined political factors.

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., „NicolaeTitulescu" University from Bucharest, (email: mariusjula@univnt.ro).
[] Professor, Ph. D., „NicolaeTitulescu" University from Bucharest, (email: nicoletajula@yahoo.com).

Table 1 [1]

Election Model Results

(Percentage of two-party vote for incumbent party)

					Incumbent Party's
Election	Actual	Fitted	Error		Candidate	Opponent
1948	52.4	54.0	-1.7		Truman (D)	Dewey (R)
1952	44.6	42.1	2.5		Stevenson (D)	Eisenhower (R)
1956	57.8	57.6	0.2		Eisenhower (R)	Stevenson (D)
1960	49.9	48.5	1.4		Nixon (R)	Kennedy (D)
1964	61.3	60.6	0.8		Johnson (D)	Goldwater (R)
1968	49.6	50.4	-0.9		Humphrey (D)	Nixon (R)
1972	61.8	57.5	4.3		Nixon (R)	McGovern (D)
1976	48.9	50.6	-1.6		Ford (R)	Carter (D)
1980	44.7	44.1	0.6		Carter (D)	Reagan (R)
1984	59.2	58.7	0.5		Reagan (R)	Mondale (D)
1988	53.9	53.1	0.8		Bush (R)	Dukakis (D)
1992	46.5	47.0	-0.5		Bush (R)	Clinton (D)
1996	54.7	53.7	1.0		Clinton (D)	Dole (R)
2000	50.3	52.6	-2.4		Gore (D)	Bush (R)
2004	51.2	54.8	-3.5		Bush (R)	Kerry (D)
2008	46.3	47.8	-1.4		McCain (R)	Obama (D)
2012		50.3			Obama (D)	? (R)

Note: italicized errors represent elections where the equation incorrectly predicted the winner of the popular vote.

[1] http://www.ihs.com/products/global-insight/industry-economic-report.aspx?ID=1065931711

The econometric model

Ray C. Fair uses a model like:

$VOTE_t = a_1 + a_2(GROWTH_t - GROWTH^) + a_3(INFLATION_t - INFLATION^)(1 - WAR_t) + a_4(GOODNEWS_t - GOODNEWS^*)(1 - WAR_t) + a_5PERSON_t + a_6DURATION_t + a_7PARTY_t$, t=1,...,23

The notation for the variables is as follows:

- VOTE = Incumbent share of the two-party presidential vote.
- PARTY = 1 if there is a Democratic incumbent at the time of the election and -1 if there is a Republican incumbent.
- PERSON = 1 if the incumbent is running for election and 0 otherwise.
- DURATION = 0 if the incumbent party has been in power for one term, 1 if the incumbent party has been in power for two consecutive terms, 1.25 if the incumbent party has been in power for three consecutive terms, 1.50 for four consecutive terms, and so on.
- WAR = 1 for the elections of 1920, 1944, and 1948 and 0 otherwise.
- GROWTH = growth rate of real per capita GDP in the first three quarters of the election year (annual rate).
- INFLATION = absolute value of the growth rate of the GDP deflator in the first 15 quarters of the administration (annual rate) except for 1920, 1944, and 1948, where the values are zero.
- GOODNEWS = number of quarters in the first 15 quarters of the administration in which the growth rate of real per capita GDP is greater than 3.2 percent at an annual rate except for 1920, 1944, and 1948, where the values are zero.

The variable WAR appears in the vote equation because INFLATION and GOODNEWS are zeroed out for 1920, 1944, and 1948. This treatment leads to there being a different constant term in the equation for these three elections, which is what WAR is picking up. To see this precisely, consider the equation:

GROWTH* is the "normal" rate, normal in the sense that growth rates above this value are a plus for the incumbent party and growth rates below it are a minus. The same is true for INFLATION* with the sign reversed, and the same is true for GOODNEWS*.

The equation has VOTE on the left hand side and the other variables plus a constant term on the right hand side. It is linear in coefficients. The estimation period begins with the 1916 election. The equation is estimated by ordinary least squares.

For the 2012 election PARTY is 1, PERSON is 1, DURATION is 0, and WAR is 0. Multiplying these values by their respective coefficients and adding the intercept gives a value of 48.39. A modified version of the vote equation for 2012 is then:

*VOTE = 48.39 + .672*GROWTH - .654*INFLATION +0.990*GOODNEWS*

or

The equation to predict the 2012 presidential election is

*VP = 48.39 + .672*G - .654*P + 0.990*Z*

Interpretation: In January 28, 2012, forecast from the US model compared with data from October 30, 2011: G is now 2.88 rather than 2.75, P is now 1.54 rather than 1.88, and Z is still 1. (The one strong growth quarter is 2012:3.) The new economic values lead to a predicted value of VP of 50.30, essentially the same as the 50.0 in October.

As Ray C. Fair stated, "The main message from the presidential vote equation is again the same as it has been from the beginning. For a moderately growing economy, which the US model is now forecasting, the election is predicted to be close. The current US model forecast is probably somewhat more optimistic than consensus, but with slightly slower growth in 2012, the election would still be predicted to be close. If the economy suddenly starts to boom - say 5 or 6 percent growth - Obama would be predicted to win by a comfortable amount. If the economy suddenly goes into another recession - say minus 5 or 6 percent growth - the Republicans would be predicted to win by a comfortable amount. As of this writing the economy in 2012 looks like it will be ok, but not great, which means a close election - essentially too close to call. If the economy does turn out to be ok, but not great, and if the election is close, the voting equation will have done well. If instead in this case the election is not close, the equation will have made a large error."[2]

Estimation for Romanian Presidential elections

We start with the Ray C. Fair's model:

$VOTE_t = a_1 + a_2(GROWTH_t - GROWTH^) + a_3(INFLATION_t - INFLATION^)(1 - WAR_t) + a_4(GOODNEWS_t - GOODNEWS^*)(1 - WAR_t) + a_5PERSON_t + a_6DURATION_t + a_7PARTY_t$, t=1,...,23

For Romania:

WAR=0

PERSON=0

DURATION=1

PARTY=1 (we use 1 for incumbent party and -1 for opposing coalition)

GROWTH*=0

INFLATIN*=0

GOODNEWS*=1

So, the adjusted equation for Romania is:

$VOTE_t = a_1 + a_2GROWTH_t + a_3INFLATION_t + a_4GOODNEWS_t + a_5PERSON_t + a_6DURATION_t + a_7PARTY_t$, t=1,...,23

In Romania, the democratic elections were recorded in 1992, 1996, 2000, 2004 and 2009. The elections from 1990 cannot be considered in the model because of the change in the political system following the revolution from 1989. We have only 5 different moments, so an econometric model based on these data cannot be validated.

Assuming that the coefficients in the regression would be close to the ones from Fair's model, in a calibration model for Romania, we have the following situation:

Growth=7.2 (in trimester III, 2011, the GDP is 1.8 higher than in trimester II)

Inflation=21.81 (for the last 45 months)

Z=7 (7 trimesters of growth for GDP from last 15)

*VP = 48.39 + .672*G - .654*P + 0.990*Z*

VP=45.89

[2]http://fairmodel.econ.yale.edu/vote2012/index2.htm

That means the candidate from the ruling party would obtain about 45% in a direct competition with an opposing candidate.

Paldam model - Presidential election - November 2009

Elections for President of Romania from 22nd November – 6th December 2009 were conducted in accordance with Law no. 370/2004, as amended and supplemented, supplemented by Government Emergency Ordinance no. 95/2009.[3]

According to the new electoral law that marks the difference between the term of President's seat (5 years) and duration of the seat of Parliament (four years) for the first time in Romanian politics, election of the President of Romania was not held simultaneously with elections for the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate. Instead, its first round of electing the President of Romania overlapped with the time of the national referendum held on the initiative of the President in office, on the shift from a bicameral Parliament in an unicameral Parliament and reducing the number of Parliament's members to the maximum of 300. The first round of Presidential elections was set on November 22nd, 2009, and the second round was scheduled two weeks later (December 6th, 2009).

In due time, a total of 29 applications were made, of which the Central Electoral Bureau admitted 12 (3 - of the independent candidates and 9 from political parties)[4]. The percentage of voters was 54.37%, over 15 percentage points higher than in parliamentary elections (39.20%).

Results for Presidential elections – 1st round, 22nd , November 2009

		Valid cast votes
No.crt.	Name and surname of the candidate	Number	% of total number
1	Traian BĂSESCU (PD-L)	3153640	32.44%
2	Mircea-Dan GEOANĂ (PSD)	3027838	31.15%
3	Crin ANTONESCU (PNL)	1945831	20.02%
4	Corneliu VADIM-TUDOR (PRM)	540380	5.56%
5	Hunor KELEMEN (UDMR)	373764	3.83%
6	Sorin OPRESCU (independent)	309764	3.18%
7	George BECALI (PNGcd)	186390	1.19%

Source: Central Electoral Bureau for election of the President of Romania from 2009, first round results, November, 22nd, 2009, http://www.bec2009p.ro/rezultate.html

The other five candidates have obtained each a percentage less than 1% of votes, which means less than the required minimum number of supporters that was presented to support the application (200,000 supporters).

In the second round, held on December 6th, 2009, the first two runners competed and the turnout has been higher, 58.02%. TraianBăsescu, the President in office, won by a close shave the Presidential elections, with a difference of less than one percentage point from the PSD candidate (50.33% vs. 49.66%, nearly 70,000 additional votes, from a total of 10,500,000 valid votes).

As Election Observation Mission OSCE / ODIHR[5] assessed: "The elections for President of Romania in 2009 took place in an atmosphere characterized by respect for fundamental political freedoms and were conducted generally in accordance with OSCE commitments and international standards for democratic elections and with national legislation. Although authorities have taken

[3]Government Emergency Ordinance no. 95/2009 amending and supplementing Law no. 370/2004 for the election of the President of Romania, published in Official Journal no. 608 of September 3, 2009.

[4] Applications rejected did not meet certain criteria imposed by the electoral law: in most cases, were not accompanied by a list of at least 200,000 supporters.

[5] OSCE/ODIHR means Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe / Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights steps to correct some deficiencies observed in the first round and to investigate irregularities, further efforts are needed to address remaining weaknesses in order to improve election process and to enhance public confidence"[6].

Paldam model

Vote function (hereafter V-function) is defined as a function explaining (the change in) the vote for the government by (changes in) economic conditions and other variables. A Popularity function (hereafter P-function) explains (the change in) the popularity of the government – as measured by pools – by (change in) the economic conditions and other variables.

For Romania, we have studied the impact inducted by the state and dinamics of some economic variables on the change of voting intensions. The data are analysed in regional structures. We used a Paldam type model. In its most simple linear version the function are:

$$\Delta P_t = \{a_1 \Delta u_t + a_2 \Delta p_t + \ldots.\} + [c_1 D^1{}_t + c_2 D_t^2 + \ldots] + e_t$$

Here Δ is used to indicate the first difference; P is either the vote or the popularity, for the political parties, in %. The *a*s and *c*s are coefficients to be estimated, and the e is the disturbance term. The braces contain the economic variables: the e-part of the model. Two of the variables are u and p, where u is the rate of unemployment and p the rate of price rises. The next set of variables, the *d*s, are the political variables forming the p-part of the model – it is found in the square brackets.

For Presidential election, we have built a model where periods are shown separately: May 2008 - November 2008 (PNL in office) and November 2008 - November 2009 (PD-L in office)

$$pr_{ij} = \{a_0 + a_1 \cdot cj_{ij} + a_2 \cdot prescj_{ij}\} + [a_{3,i}(rs_{nov2008} - rs_{mai2008})_j +$$

$$+ a_{3,i}(rs_{nov2009} - rs_{nov2008})_j] + e_{ij},$$

where pr_{ij} – represents the share of votes won by the competitor i for Presidency in county j, to the total number of valid votes in that county, in the Presidential Elections in November 2009

We anticipate, in line with the economic voting theory, that a_3 is negative for candidates who represent the ruling parties and positive for the ones representing opposition parties.

The results for Presidential elections in November 2009 are not econometrically significant. Nor is any other econometric model, in which the results from parliamentary elections in November 2009 are regarded as political variables and as economic variables are used the change in unemployment between the two time election, or three months before the election. Lack of regional statistics for other economic variables discussed in the specific literature in the context of vote-popularity functions (e.g. inflation) has not allowed the construction of some models with more variables. Subject to this methodological observation, the conclusion of the tested econometric models is that for Presidential elections in Romania, organized in November 2009, the economic voting has no significant influence on election results of the main candidates, as resulted in regional structures.

Conclusions

The recorded data for Romania is a major drawback in the estimation models from international literature regarding the forecasting of vote behaviour based on economic variables. The only solution is to use regional data, when available.

[6] Romania, Presidential Elections, November 22nd and December 6th, 2009 – Final Report of Election Observation Mission OSCE / ODIHR, cited by the Permanent Electoral Authority, the White Paper for Election of President of Romania 2009, p. 103, http://www.roaep.ro/

The Ray C. Fair model can be only partially tested and used for Romania because of the history data regarding economic situation for more electoral moments. If for US there are 16 electoral moments, we have only 5. Using this model, the results are that a candidate from the current ruling party would lose the elections.

Other models, like Paldam's presented one, cannot be econometrically supported (estimators do not pass the significance tests). Until further date, we can admit the hypothesis that elections from 2009 were not influenced by an economic voting, but other political and social factors.

References

- Alesina A., Roubini N., & Cohen G.D. (1997). Political Cycles and the Macroeconomy, Cambridge – Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1997
- Drazen A. (2000). The Political Business Cycle After 25 Years, Working paper, University of Maryland, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and NBER, May
- Fidrmuc J. (1996). Political Sustainability of Economic Reforms: Dynamics and Analysis of Regional Economic Factors, Working paper, CentER for Economic Research Tilburg University, Tilburg, The Netherlands
- Fidrmuc J. (2000), Political support for reforms: Economics of voting in transition countries, European Economic Review 44, 1491-1513
- Fair C. R. (2012), Predicting Presidential Elections and Other Things, Second Edition, Stanford University Press, Stanford, California, USA
- Frey B. (1996). Political Business Cycles. Aldershot: Edgar Elgar.
- Gaertner M. (1994). Democracy, Elections and Macroeconomic Policy; Two Decades of Progress, European Journal of Political Economy, 10: 85-110.
- HallenbergM.,& Souza L.-V. (2000). The Political Business Cycles in EU Accession Countries, Tinbergen Institute Discussion Paper, TI-2000-085/2
- Hayo B. (2000). Micro and macro Determinants of Public support for Market reforms in Eastern Europe, Working paper B-25/1999, ZentrumfürEuropäische Integrations forschung, Rheinische Friedrich-Wilhelms-Universität Bonn
- JulaD.,&Jula N. (2000a). Economie sectorială, Ed. DidacticăşiPedagogică, Bucureşti
- JulaD.,&Jula N. (2000a). Political Business Cycles. An Overview, Romanian Economic Research Observer, 1:6-14, Romanian Academy.
- JulaD.,&Jula N. (2000b). Political Business Cycle in Romania, Romanian Economic Research Observer, 4:6-25, Romanian Academy.
- JulaD.,&Jula N. (2000c). Economic Signals of Political Behaviour in Romania, in The Economy of Development, Proceeding papers, The International Conference of Financial-Accounting and Administrative Management Faculty, Bucharest Ecological University, Bucharest, 4-5 April.
- NannestadP.,&Paldam M. (1994). The VP-Function: A Survey of Literature on Vote and Popularity Functions after 25 Years, in Public Choice 79, 213-245.
- NannestadP.,&Paldam M. (1999). The Cost of Ruling. A Foundation Stone for Two Theories, Working Paper 19/5, Department of Economics, Aarhus University, Denmark
- Pacek A.C., (1994), Macroeconomic Conditions and Electoral Politics in East Central Europe, in American Journal of Political Science 38, 723-44.
- Paldam M. (1997), Political Business Cycles, cap. 16 in Mueller (ed.), Perspectives in Public Choice. A Handbook, Cambridge UP: Cambridge, UK & NY.
- Persson T., &Tabellini G., 1990, Macroeconomic Policy, Credibility, and Politics, Chur, Switzerland: Harwood Academic Publishers.
- Rodrik D. (1995). The Dynamics of Political Support for Reforms in Economies in Transition, in Journal of the Japanese and International Economies 9, 403-25.

THE AMERICAN ECONOMIC SYSTEM – WHEN THE THERAPY LEADS TO FAILURE

RADU-MARCEL JOIA*

Abstract

The phenomenon of globalization is a subject that has made much ink to flow. The tumultuous economic life led scientists to seek explanations to the negative economic events, events that take many forms, and to whom it is a must to find a solution or even a mitigating factor.

In the past years, the globalization has generated a significant development of the emergent economies, but also that of the level of the developed countries. As it is easy to notice, we are the spectators of an ever more "globalized" world which does not lack numerous risks. Starting with the inequality between the people, continuing with various social problems and ending with the "creative destruction" of some countries' economies, an inevitable and irreversible destruction after entering into this game, the globalization phenomenon has become a threat.

The globalization has opened, in the absence of economic protective policies, the way of frequent economic crises. The present crisis has taught us that the governments of the countries should play a more active role in the co-ordination of the economic policies, striving to prevent unbalances as those registered already and to avoid crises.

Through this paper, we tried to make an brief analysis on the American economic system, underlying its most important aspects under the economic globalization phenomenon, starting from Joseph Stiglitz's most recent study and showing that sometimes the therapy can lead to failure, as in the case of United States of America. We also tried to create a little debate on the financial markets fundamentalism issue, talking about the concepts of freedom, political power and wealth.

Keywords: economic policies; political power; freedom; wealth; globalization; financial markets;

Introduction

Starting from the book of J. Stiglitz „Freefall: America, Free Markets, and the Sinking of the World Economy", published in the year 2010 by the publishing house W. W. Norton &Company, one can identify important aspects of an economic system model, proven to be not competitive, reaching a dramatic position, beginning with the biggest world's economy. This book represents another clarifying study for the present world-wide financial crisis, written by the Nobel Prize laureate for Economics in the year 2001 and former adviser for economic problems during the Clinton administration[1].

From the beginning of the crises there were drawn up many interesting studies concerning the present economic crisis, but Stiglitz certainly remains one of the most authorized voices with regard to this subject. These could be divided two categories – one that presents "internal" aspects, focusing upon the decline or salvation of various financial institutions, such as the book of Andrew Ross Sorkin, "Too Big To Fail", or enlarging the area of analysis of economic theories representing the basis of the present economic system proven to be not competitive, identifying the causes and offering possible solutions that could avoid the repetition of the same mistakes. In this last category are included the works of Stiglitz, mentioned before, and John Cassidy, "How Markets Fail"[2].

*Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, Nicolae Titulescu University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: radu.joia@univnt.ro).

[1] Joseph Stiglitz is the laureate of the Nobel Prize for 2001 for economics, president of the Council of Economic Advisers, vice-president and chief economist of the World Bank, teacher at Columbia University.

[2] Cassidy, J. „How Markets Fail: The Logic of Economic Calamities", Farrar, Straus and Giroux, New York, 2009.

The title of this study, „Freefall" is one very well chosen by the author, because it includes two key words of the economic theories: "free" – the equivalent for free, freedom, one of the most precious assets of a person, but also "fall" – collapse, that can be considered as one meaning recession or decline in economic terms. This combination "free fall" or, why not, „decline caused by the excess of freedom" are particular metaphors helping to identify and characterize what it is happening with the American economic system.

Making an incursion into the domain of physics, an object in free fall is under the influence of a single factor, i.e. the gravity. In the absence of a force that could stop or damp the fall, nothing else prevents the collision with the soil. Moreover, the speed of an object in free fall increases as the object approaches the earth. We could say that the absence of an intervention or an inefficient intervention in the economies being in free fall leads to nothing else but disaster.

An American lead writer, Eric Falkenstein, says that the subtitle of the Stiglitz's work should be sooner "why the free markets are like the religious fundamentalists"[3], being given the author's affinity with the expression "market fundamentalism". In the book one can remark the critics of the present capitalism, this being a concept explained by Stiglitz through the term of "free market", a market which is in free fall, in an extreme decline. The present article is only an invitation to read Stiglitz's book, in order to understand the origins and the causes of the present crises and to overcome the barrier of the unknown with regard to a not competitive economic system.

"Freefall"* – main ideas

Stiglitz's book identifies the origins of "The Big Depression", intensely criticizes the policies initiated in order to cope with it and offers alternative remedies for future policies that could better handle a crisis from its early signs. What the book has in common with many other studies, written upon the same theme, is the acknowledgment of the fact that the American economic system is in collapse, it stopped being competitive, and can be fixed only by examining the theories upon which it is based. Because until now these theories have not been the subject of a serious debate, this has led to what the author describes as "bubble capitalism"[4].

There are some aspects which Stiglitz shares with other authors concerning this subject. One of these is the effect that the 30 years of dependence upon the economic theories of the free market[5] (market fundamentalism), had upon the whole American economy, in contradiction with the lessons taught after "The Big Depression" of the 30's. Another aspect is represented by the "re-arrangement" of incentives in the financial services of the economy, incentives that have prioritized the short term performance, over the reaching of long term social objectives. Another one is the political power that the industry of financial services exerts upon the carrying out of the economic policies, but also the inherent conflicts of interest, which such a power places above other various challenges and with which nor the legislative or the executive power has been confronted until the present crisis. In other words, all of the above mentioned aspects have represented, and certainly still do, challenges of the American economic system, unheard-of and difficult to meet given that the executives have not the necessary desire to do so.

If we would make an historical analysis of the economic policies embraced by the American government leaders starting with "The Great Depression", we could learn a lesson that, through a late understanding, would underline the nature and the causes of what one could name as an extreme failure of the market.

---

[3] *Stiglitz's Freefall By Eric Falkenstein Mar 3, 2010 (*Author's Website: The subtitle should be "why free market types are like religious fundamentalists", because he loves using the cute phrase 'market fundamentalism' the way MSNBC uses the phrase 'tea baggers').

[4] Joseph Stiglitz, „Freefall: America, Free Markets, and the Sinking of the World Economy", W. W. Norton & Company Ltd., Castle House, London, 2010, pag. 26.

[5] Concept created by the School of Chicago, used especially under the Reagan administration.

In the next paragraph can be identified the extreme failure of the market: „The United States will have regulation, just as government will spend money on research and technology and infrastructure and some forms of social protection. Governments will conduct monetary policy and will provide for national defense, police and fire protection, and other essential public services. When markets fail, government will come in to pick up the pieces. Knowing this, the government has what it can to prevent calamities. [...] In America, too many of the rules were set by and for those from finance, and the referees were one-sided. [...] Can we expect even to restrict the banks from engaging in excessively risky behavior?"[6]

The above paragraph is essential in analyzing the American economic system. As we can notice, there are some key words underlined, precisely for a better identification of the causes leading to this extreme failure of the market. By his critic attitude towards the adopted economic policies, Stiglitz denounces the present capitalism, militating through his book in the favor of rethinking this economic system. This is done across the entire contents of the book, where it is presented as a speculative non competitive system, based upon commissions and speculation.

Even the rules of the monetary policy are put into discussion, rules that for the most part are made by and for the people in financial industry. In other words, the author's critics with regard to the carrying out advantageous economic policies for the financial domain, underlines an error of the economic system, which is not based exclusively upon the finances. We could notice the author's attitude concerning the fundaments of the real economy. According to the presented elements, the focus has to be moved from the monetary policy to the real economy. It is difficult to change an economic system, but is much easier to try changing the theories on which it is based, therefore it is absolutely necessary to return to the drawing board in order to succeed an adequate rebuilding/correction of the system.

"Today, the challenge is to create a New Capitalism. We have seen the failures of the old. But to create this New Capitalism will require trust - including trust between Wall Street and the rest of society. Our financial markets have failed us, but we cannot function without them."[7]

The present capitalism has to be dismounted, but the creation of a new capitalism, although it is a challenge and a necessity, is supposed to have trust as a fundament, trust in its economic system. The critic of the financial system is severe and, although the financial markets have betrayed our trust, they remain necessary for the operation of the New Capitalism. The financial markets have failed, but the fault was of those who established the rules, i.e. those who carried out the economic policies, and the fundament of this economic system was a wrong one.

Stiglitz criticizes the financial system, but goes further with regards to the inability of the markets to function properly and to correct themselves. No supporter of capitalism and partisan of the role of the invisible hand can "advocate that the surrogate capitalism – reached in the United States could be one efficient or correct, or one leading to the wellness of society"[8].

Another important aspect is represented by the critique of the American system, which is based upon speculation, high commissions, a Wall Street critique, a critique of the Bush administration, and even a critique of the Obama administration. Much more valuable is the idea of recession of freedom, a decline of this right, a violation of the American people's right to be free. This economic system has generated overpaid bankers and brokers, rewarded for their mistakes, that fed and generated additional needs for the American individual (by offering him/her credits, even when he/she was not eligible), violating his/her freedom and transforming him/her from a free individual into a person chained up in the economic system, a slave of the banking system based upon speculation and huge commissions.

[6] Stiglitz, J., „Freefall: America, Free Markets, and the Sinking of the World Economy", W. W. Norton &Company, London, 2010, pag. 97.

[7] Stiglitz, J., „Freefall: America, Free Markets, and the Sinking of the World Economy", W. W. Norton &Company, London, 2010, pag. 94.

[8] Stiglitz, J., „În cădere liberă, America, piața liberă și prăbușirea economiei mondiale", Editura Publica, București, 2010, pag. 325.

Therefore, the giving of toxic mortgage credits, credits given to persons not fulfilling the crediting conditions, credits secured through their transfer to foreign investors, in order to share the risks and obtain a better absorption, have led to the collapse of the American economic model, based upon speculation. Its basis is presented in the Figure 1.

Figure 1 – The failure of the economic model based upon speculation and deregulation

Source: Joseph Stiglitz, „Freefall: America, Free Markets, and the Sinking of the World Economy", Chapter 4

The lack of professionalism among credit brokers, who presented and faked data concerning the applicants' incomes, with the purpose of meeting the crediting conditions, the applicants' lack of information with regard to the risks they took by soliciting said credits, the banks succeeding to create needs and desires many of them didn't have, the bankers' lack of professionalism and greed, plus the absence of regulation to maintain the economic stability, represent the "parasites" that "have infected" the financial markets of the American economic system.

All of these have represented negative instruments leading to this "free fall". They are presented in Figure 2:

Figure 2 – The mortgage swindling – characteristics

Source: Joseph Stiglitz, „Freefall: America, Free Markets, and the Sinking of the World Economy", Chapter 4

The markets represent the vital centre of a successful economy, but they must not be left free, and the State has to play a regulator role, particularly for preventing situations such as those already occurred. "Perhaps Adam Smith was not completely right when he said that the markets lead the society, with an invisible hand, towards prosperity. But no defender of Adam Smith would dare to say that surrogate capitalism – reached in the United States could be an efficient or correct one, or leading to the wellness of society."[9]

Many times in economic studies, an association between the political power and the economic one is present. An economic system and the political power have to be in a tight relationship, a balance, precisely for succeeding in maintaining stability. Unfortunately, in U.S.A., this balance has been broken, which has also spread beyond its borders. The globalization phenomenon has emphasized this unbalance.

The unbalance means o state opposite to order. An unbalance represents a state of uncertainty, where one of the economy components becomes inefficient, although on the surface it seems to be very beneficial to the economy, it is a state of maximum vulnerability for the economic system. In the U.S.A, this unbalance has been created by the "vulnerability" of markets, by the lack of their regulation. The financial markets seemed to be very productive, bringing benefits and growth, but the fundaments were wrong, they were "corrupted".

"The American Empire" is an economic system, that before the crisis, offered credibility, precisely because the U.S.A. were the first economic power in the world. Nobody doubted the U.S.A.'s capacity to manage the risks, but it wasn't so. The risks have poorly managed, the models were wrong, and obtaining a large sum of money within the shortest period of time, was the main objective of the agents. The globalization has imposed a very high rhythm of adaption to various economies.

The present crisis has demonstrated that irrespectively of the size of the economic system, even that of an empire, the unbalances occur and develop, if there is not a tight connection between state and the economic environment. This crisis demonstrates that both models, the Anglo-Saxon one, based upon "laissez-faire" and freedom of markets, and the European one, of the welfare/social state, proved to be imperfect, limited and crises generators.

[9] Stiglitz, J., „În cădere liberă, America, piața liberă și prăbușirea economiei mondiale", Editura Publica, București, 2010, pag. 325.

Many authors have written about the existing crisis, but few of them have also offered solutions from the theoretical point of view, not only the practical one. For example, in his book "Economy of crises. Flash course about the future of finances"[10], Nouriel Roubini, says the economic system needs a new essence, even a new economic model. The proposal made by N. Roubini is based upon a model of market economy, where the government provides the necessary public services and where a "healthy" prudential monitoring of the economy and of the financial system exists.[11]

Stiglitz and Roubini share common ideas with regard to the economic system based upon a corporative capitalism. Roubini also sustains that this present capitalism should be changed radically. Analyzing the ideas of both economists, one can say that Roubini has a more critical attitude than Stiglitz, he wants a radical change of the system, while Stiglitz wants a return to the fundaments of the economic theory, that favors the rebuilding of a New Capitalism.

The crises are benefic, because they bring changes in the area of policies and especially in the one of ideas. If Roubini says that a crisis should not be wasted, Stiglitz bring concrete arguments, mentioning that if the right decisions will be taken, the effects of the crisis will be diminished and a new crisis will be avoided. If the taken decisions are wrong then the society will have the most to suffer, dividing itself even more, with the economy becoming more vulnerable, lacking any order.

The critiques brought by the author to the economic system are:

- ✓ lack of regulation concerning the issuing of toxic credits;
- ✓ deregulation done in such a way as to easily allow bankers to issue toxic credits;
- ✓ counteracting the persons kept responsible for solving the problems within the financial industry;
- ✓ the adoption of some inadequate measures, like the reduction of the interest rate to one percentage, which lead to a speculative bubble;
- ✓ the incompetence of the banks in estimating the risks;
- ✓ the conservators' attitude, according to whom the State shouldn't be involved in financial activities to help the population.

The remedies offered are concrete ones, resulting from Stiglitz's especially critique attitude with regard to the economic system:

- the financial bailing of the loans givers, as way of controlling the forced executions;
- solutions in favor of population – for the salvaging of dwellings – without bailing out the crediting banks which should be forced to support the consequences of the fact that they didn't properly estimated the risks;
- solutions to support the population to return the loans;
- loans from State with a very small interests or even zero for putting at the population's disposal a not so expensive credit; this should be translated in a gain for the State and the population, but not for the banks;
- the State should maintain a full employment and a stable economy, promote innovation, provide protection and social insurances and prevent abusive exploitation[12].

---

[10] Roubini, N., Mihm, S., „Economia crizelor. Curs fulger despre viitorul finanțelor", Editura Publica, București, 2010.

[11] Roubini, N., Mihm, S., „Economia crizelor. Curs fulger despre viitorul finanțelor", Editura Publica, București, 2010, pp.9-15.

[12] Stiglitz, J., „În cădere liberă, America, piața liberă și prăbușirea economiei mondiale", Editura Publica, București, 2010, pag. 326-331.

Conclusions

Before acting, the economists should rethink the fundaments of the economy and to ponder on the correctness of the economic theories. We are witnessing radical economic changes, the end of certain economic cycles.

The used pretext, namely the Stiglitz's book, shows that if not kept under control, this unbalances will generate other mutations, even more serious ones. The substantiation of some correct ideas is important, learning lessons from crises, because in time the crisis will disappear and only its consequences will persist. "The battle of ideas" represents our legacy, a diary which we may have to open again anytime, because the market economies are in a constant change and a continuous struggle.

The ideas presented are only some among the most important ones with regard to the American economic system, an empire which right now is unbalanced. The main idea brought in debate is that of "dismounting the present capitalism", and returning to its fundaments in order to rebuild a new capitalism based upon trust. The key words, such as power, order, globalization, fundamentalism of the markets, freedom, are cleverly used by J. Stiglitz in his approach with arguments. These key words represent forgotten values or used in a distorted way by the American type of capitalism, a thing that has created a clear unbalance, its result being the "free fall" of the entire economic system.

The present crisis offers with no doubt one of the most useful lessons about a dynamic world that fails too frequently, and should make aware both the ordinary citizen and the deciding factors of the economic policy about the risk of getting prosperity at any cost.

References

- Cassidy, J. „How Markets Fail: The Logic of Economic Calamities", Farrar, Straus and Giroux, New York, 2009.
- Dinu, M., „Economia de dicţionar", Editura Economică, Bucureşti, 2010.
- Dinu, M., „Globalizarea. Modelul explicativ", Seria sinteze, Editura Economică, Bucureşti, 2006.
- Dinu, M., „Fundamentele antitetice ale economiei", article published in the Economie Teoretică şi Aplicată magazine, issue # 3/2011 (556).
- Ross Sorkin, A., „Too Big to Fail: The Inside Story of How Wall Street and Washington Fought to Save the Financial System and Themselves", Viking Penguin, New York, 2009.
- Roubini, N., Mihm, S., „Economia crizelor. Curs fulger despre viitorul finanţelor", Editura Publica, Bucureşti, 2010.
- Stiglitz, J., „Freefall: America, Free Markets, and the Sinking of the World Economy", W. W. Norton &Company, 2010.
- Stiglitz, J. „În cădere liberă: America, piaţa liberă şi prăbuşirea economiei mondiale", Editura Publica, Bucureşti, 2010.
- Stiglitz, J., „Globalizarea. Speranţe şi deziluzii", Editura Economică, 2003.
- Stiglitz, J. „Mecanismele globalizării", Editura Polirom, 2008.

COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF THE GORJ COUNTY OF SOCIO-ECONOMIC WITH NEIGHBORING COUNTIES IN CRISIS

CONSTANTA ENEA[*]
CONSTANTIN ENEA[]
CARINA ELENA STEGAROIU[]

Abstract
Purpose of the paper is to highlight how the economy evolved in the Florida county comparison with neighboring counties in economic crisis that society through the difficult years. also study and make a comparison in terms of demographic characteristics, respectively, compared between young and old, labor migration, etc. form., indices that are decisive for evaluating the economic situation of the county above mentioned.
Economically, the county is in the connection between the economy and sub-mountainous and mountainous plains. The specificity of its resources, Gorj is a leading energy suppliers of the country, both as primary energy (coal, oil) and processed (heat and electricity)[1]. Results and statistical sources that Gorj currently produces more than 20% of the thermoelectric power of[2]. In terms of population below national averages Gorj is the fourth in the region after Olt and Valcea. Is medium in size, being the third after Dolj and Valcea. In terms of urbanization, Gorj is below the national average and third in the region after Dolj and Mehedinti. After the general level of development, the county is in a less favorable position, because the permanent part is characterized by a lower level of development.

Keywords: socio-economic status, crisis, sectoral developments, opportunities, weaknesses

Introduction

Regional studies and analyzes of recent years puts the South-west, of which the county among the four least developed regions, with North-West, South and North-East. The last report of human development region in sixth place[3].

After studying the evolution of human development indicators has been a very interesting development. Thus, development in the Region 4 South-West Oltenia, the county took positions quite low, being placed in positions 24, 25 or 33, positions indicated in the previous years' studies on regional disparities.

But, according to the United Nations Development Programme, takes places close Gorj regional or national average in terms of life expectancy and education. As regards gender equality, indicated a lower share of the female population, ranging in tertiary and higher unemployment rates compared to regional and national averages. Following the socio-economic analyzes, the county was included in the Southwest Development Region, considered one of the most homogeneous regions, the cultural aspect and in terms of statistics. The county has a total of 70 basic administrative units,

* Associate Professor, Ph. D., "Constantin Brancusi" University of Targu-Jiu, Romania, (email: eneaconstanta@yahoo.com).
 Associate Professor, Ph. D., "Constantin Brancusi" University of Targu-Jiu, Romania, (email: eneaconstanta@yahoo.com).
 Lecturer Professor Ph. D., "Constantin Brancusi" University of Targu-Jiu, Romania, (email: eneaconstanta@yahoo.com).

[1] According to NIS, in 2004, coal was extracted in Florida over 70% of total national coal extracted and extracted natural gas production was about. 20% of the national total

[2] Southwest PDR 2007 – 2013.

[3] Human Development Index, calculated and published in the 2007 annual report of the United Nations Development Programme..

according to Law No. 2 of 1968, as supplemented and amended. Gorj counties is considered one of the most stable in terms of territorial administrative organization, post-December changes are limited.

Changes were more than administrative status, the declaration of new cities. Urban network is young and includes small towns such as Țicleni, Tg-Cărbunești, Novaci Rovinari Tismana Turceni with population of approx. 8000 inhabitants. In 2011, Motru was elevated to the city being the second city of Targu-Jiu Gorj and only after the county with over 20,000 inhabitants.

In conclusion, the county includes 2 cities, 7 towns and 61 communes. The villages are in number 411, of which 35 belong to cities and towns. They added the 15 localities of the city Tg-Jiu, Motru Rovinari and Turceni[4].

CONTENTS

The county has two cities tier II (Tg-Jiu and Motru) and 7 tier III cities. According to traditional classifications, the capital city of the county is considered a medium, which is the upper limit of 100,000 inhabitants and is Motru low as 20,000 inhabitants, while all other cities (the 7) is in the category of small cities with less than 20,000 inhabitants. The following table already observed significant difference between Tg-Jiu and other cities (the first being the 4.1 ratio). But we can say that from this point of view the situation the county is not very different from the other counties of the region under discussion.

REPORT RECEIVED IN SOUTH WEST

FIRST REPORT	SOUTH WEST OLTENIA	County
		DOLJ	GORJ	MEHEDINȚI	OLT	VÂLCEA
	2,7	14,5	4,1	8,1	2,2	5,3

In the South West can be seen that this ratio is generally high, especially in Dolj and Mehedinti, suggesting massive concentration of urban life in a small number of settlements.

Tg-Jiu county, is placed in a favorable position in the regional settlement system, the intersection of two major axes of communication, almost perpendicular: the North-South direction Craiova – Petrosani - Deva - Cluj - Napoca (supported by a double track: Road - E79 and the railway - branch 202 of bus 200), which will provide connection to the Pan-European Corridor IV and axis southwest - northeast direction Drobeta -Turnu Severin – Ramnicu - Valcea which will provide river corridor connecting the Pan-European (VII), on the one hand and E81 with Bucharest and other pan-European corridors, on the other.

From geographically, Gorj capital is placed in a key position to limit the Carpathian area, close access to the Jiu Valley and crossing the main link between Oltenia and south-western Romania, on the one hand and Transylvania northwest, on the other. In view of achieving double road and rail bridge at Calafat - Vidin, the strategic role of Tg-Jiu city may increase by a further opening axis to Sofia and southern Balkans.

In conclusion, quantitatively the county is well balanced system of settlements with a ratio of 1 to 7 common town and 7 villages / common environments report higher national / regional 1/5, but specific Carpathian areas.

Economically, the county is one of the counties rich in natural resources, both in terms of both quantity and diversity. These resources can be identified in the agricultural and forest lands and mineral resources of surface and depth.

Thus, the county is characterized by significant weight ratio of forest areas and areas with pastures and meadows, as well as those with orchards. As the structure of the land, Gorj is similar

[4] INSSE Gorj, 2004

Valcea and forests is of central importance especially in the north of the county. Due to these characteristics, forestry and livestock industries are important economic activities.

LAND FUND - MAIN USE
(%) 2010

Nr. crt.	County	Total Area		Agricol areal (total in)	Arable land	Area pastures and hayfields	Area living.	Area orchards.	Woodland (in total)
		kmp	%		(in agricol)
1	Dolj	7414	25	79	83	12	4	1	11
2	Gorj	5602	19	44	41	54	2	4	49
3	Olt	5498	19	79	89	7	2	2	11
4	Mehedinți	4933	17	60	64	31	2	3	30
5	Vâlcea	5765	20	43	36	57	1	6	51
6	Regiunea 4	29212	100	61	70	25	2	3	29

Source: ISSE, Peliminary report, territorial statistics, 2010

Fund water and fauna and flora is also important landscape values, water resources are very important county is located in a basin with high internal resources national average. Water resources are an important potential hydro energy capture and the valleys and Tismana earrings. In terms of mineral resources, surface and depth, they are diverse and widespread throughout the county. Apart from mineral resources in very large quantities, and exploitable lignite surface ponds Motru-Rovinari, Gorj has major oil and gas resources (in Central and Eastern County) but less frequent and mineral resources and anthracite (Staging) graphite (Baia de Fier) or building stone and dolomite, granite, limestone (in the North-west and north-east), plus and mineral water springs (Săcelu), unfortunately with little or no added value.

These resources with potential economic recovery have mentioned and of cultural and tourist resources and natural landscapes, cultural - protected areas, located mainly in the north of the county, and depression in the mountain area, the so-called Subcarpathian Oltenia or Oltenia under the mountain.

Competitiveness of a country can be evaluated in terms of opening that country's economy, its trade structure and performance of the internal market.The indicators proposed in the Lisbon Agenda, monitoring economic competitiveness can be listed: GDP / capita, labor productivity (expressed in GDP / employee), employment rate, unemployment and even research and development expenses[5].

So, in terms of GDP / capita of the evidence available, Gorj region ranks first in 2878 EUR / capita, higher regional average of 40% and about 20% national[6]. This high value is attributed to the large coal and energy production and is about eight times lower than EU average. Between 2002 and 2010, the county decreased by approx. 13,700 inhabitants, 3.42% respectively. Although the decrease is significant, it should be noted that it is the lowest in the region, other counties recorded decreases between 3.66% (Dolj) and 7.79% (Mehedinti)[7].

South-West Oltenia is among the regions with a high negative score of the population between two censuses, falling by 3.2% on last position, with three developing regions (South Wallachia), 5 (west) and 8 (Bucharest-Ilfov). So Gorj is in a region with a pronounced decline, but the decline is the geographical area the lowest. Population dynamics at regional and county.

Decline in the last 10-15 years has been and continues to be more pronounced in rural than in urban areas, pointing out significant differences in regional and county level. Thus, in 2011, the

[5] under the National Spatial Plan
[6] Data taken from Regional Operational Programme 2007 - 2013
[7] According to Human Developement Report

regional urban experiences a natural increase of 0.8%, while rural areas registered a negative of -9.2%. Gorj the values are 1.7% and 5.1%. These demographic characteristics are supported by the age structure and demographic dependency ratio. And these indicators, Gorj proves more critical and less old than neighboring counties and regional and national averages.

Population dynamics at regional and county

	Population 2010	Growth rate annual		Birth rate 2010	Mortality rate 2010	Natural growth 2010
	Inhabitants	1980 - 1990	1990 – 2010	‰	‰	‰
ROMÂNIA	21623,8	0,5	-0,5	10,2	12,1	-1,9
Southwest	2306,5	0,3	-0,4	8,9	13,4	-4,5
Dolj	718,9	0,3	-0,5	9,1	14,2	-5,1
Gorj	384,9	0,9	-0,1	9,4	11,1	-1,7
Mehedinți	303,9	-0,1	-0,5	8,8	14,3	-5,5
Olt	483,7	-0,1	-0,6	8,5	14,2	-5,7
Vâlcea	415,2	0,3	-0,3	9,0	12,5	-3,5

Source, 2011, UNDP

The intra-county area but significant differences appear between urban and rural and geographically. Thus, according to the census of 2011, the elderly in rural areas is a percentage of 17.3% to 6.9% in urban areas[8].

Aging geographical areas are in northern and southeastern county. Geographical dependency ratio, expressed as the ratio of elderly to young and active population (15-64 years), indicating favorable conditions in most urban centers and less favorable in the south, especially in south-eastern county. At intra-county, age structure and population dynamics are influenced both by natural growth and not migration. Growth on migration, the county has a better situation at the regional level, with positive and negative incentives, but lower than the national average or other counties.

Unlike other counties, rural-urban migration was not reversed and is more attractive urban than rural. In 2011, the increase in migration at the county level was 2.18%, 1.54% in urban and -2.75% respectively in rural areas. Active population of the county is 40.1% of the total population, which places the county at the forefront in the region than the national average, but below the national average of 40.6%. In terms of economic profile, Gorj can still be characterized as an industrial district, share in the industry as superior regional and national media and from other counties in the Southwest region. Economic and industrial decline is felt in the county at a slower pace than in other counties and areas of the country. Also, between 2000 and 2010, decreases were 4% nationally, 8% at regional level, but only 6% in Punjab. On average, the number of employees in the area is 10.5%, while in rural Ruban is about three times higher, respectively of 31.8%[9].

Territorial distribution is profoundly unbalanced focus areas of employees as cities (less Novaci and Tismana) and communities of the mining basin Motru-Rovinari[10]. The joint 44, are more than 10 residents and 27 salariați/100 less than 5 salariați/100 inhabitants. This uneven distribution and concentration of jobs paid by the urban and mining area, probably causes a high population mobility, a phenomenon that would require specific research.

In terms of occupational profile, the county can be identified rural areas where agriculture is still the dominant sector and areas of concentration of industrial type activities.

Thus, eastern and northeastern areas of the county is characterized by a significant presence of agricultural work force - over 35%, the net worth profile of urban agriculture and Tismana Novaci

[8] under the National Spatial Plan
[9] Data taken from Regional Operational Programme 2007 - 2013
[10] DSJ Gorj

that, from this point of view, characteristics specific areas. Areas of concentration of the active population in the secondary sector correlates quite well with the focus of employees, respectively Motru Rovinari basin, south in the vicinity of the city Bumbesti Turceni and Jiu.

In the development of the tertiary sector, one can notice that the cities get their share of 15% with an average of about 50%, except Tismana. The situation presents a very good-Cărbuneşti Tg, Tg-Jiu and villages and Săcelu Leleşti.

In rural areas, the service sector is less developed, being generally below 30%. A favorable situation with levels below 20% in the municipalities meet Negomir, Oaks, Rosia for Amaradia, Prigoria, Borăscu and Godineşti.

Regarding unemployment, the county stood in 2009 at a level 8.0% above the average for South-West of 7.5% and above the national average of 6.3%. Regionally, only Mehedinti present a more serious and 10.2%. In 2010 - 2011, unemployment in the county dropped to below 6% in urban areas, even at 4.4% and in rural areas around 7.4%[11]. Among women and youth unemployment higher values known regional and national averages. It may be noted that the evolution of unemployment between 1990 - 2011, in the county, compared to the national level, has experienced two distinct periods: the first until 1997, when unemployment rates remained low and below the national average, and second, after 1997 when, with the start mining sector restructuring, unemployment rose and rose above the national average, a level that keeps it today[12].

In conclusion, unemployment, even reaches fever pitch, is higher than the national average being able to see an accelerated decline in the number of employees.

At the regional level, a comparative analysis of county position, the main socio-economic indicators, allowing an assessment of the degree of development of its components relative to other counties.

The county has a place in a number of 9 indicators and 2nd in the other 14 of the 33 indicators examined. It can be seen easily that Gorj has a number of socio-demographic characteristics superior to other counties in the region, but have less favorable unemployment indicators and entrepreneurial activities.

A highly sensitive indicator of socio-economic level is the population itself and its territorial distribution. Concentration or depletion phenomena, even a small county, are symptomatic of the development, population moving naturally or spontaneously to areas more attractive in terms of quality of life, namely jobs, services and equipment Social, clean environment, good accessibility etc.

An analysis of territorial distribution of population of the county indicating its concentration around the capital and north-south traffic axis. In villages and towns adjacent national road E79 and in the neighboring city, but also in the capital, living about 160 to 165,000 inhabitants, 40% of the total population is below 20% of the total area of the county and in less than one quarter the number of basic local government units. The ends of the north-east and north-west about 30,000 inhabitants live predominantly mountain, the densities of 30-40 inhabitants / km. In areas southwest and south-east, are average densities of 60-70 inhabitants / km and live between 75 to 85,000 inhabitants. [13]In early 2010, employment in the county was the number of 142,400 people of which 42,300 people work in agriculture, which is 29.7%, in industry employment was 44,700 people or 31.4% of total population occupied.

In other sectors, the share of employment was in 2010: 6.2% in construction, 8.7% in trade, transport 4.3%, 1.9% in public administration, 5.1% in education; 4.1% in health and social care. Large share of employment in agriculture is because, following restructuring that took place largely in the mining industry, much of the labor force turned to agriculture. In the county in late December 2010, the unemployment rate was 5.5%, corresponding to a 8205 number unemployed was registered a downward trend unemployment rate compared to December of 2009, when the unemployment rate was 7.8 %. On the age structure of registered unemployed on 30/11/2011, age groups where unemployment is found most group 30-39 years accounting for 30%, followed by group 40-49 years accounting for 29% of the total registered unemployed and will age group 50-55 years in 13% of the total unemployed.

[11] Data taken from Regional Operational Programme 2007 - 2013
[12] Data AJOFM, Gorj 2011.
[13] Date AJOFM, Gorj 2011.

This structure is maintained approximately linear trend throughout the analysis period 2005 - 30.11.2011. Nationally representative in terms of unemployment structure by age, as in previous months, are weights for age groups 30-39 years (25.0% of total unemployed) and 40-49 years (25.1% of total unemployed). In territorial, the number of unemployed is located in rural areas - 4850 people, 60% of 3236 people or 40% in urban areas and in terms of percentage of unemployed in the total population in the 18-62 in the county, it is 3.3%. This structure is maintained approximately linear trend throughout the analysis period 2005 - 30.11.2011.

Given the basic function of employment agencies, work to fit in people seeking work, the analysis of becoming unemployed as a result of collective redundancies and staff current in 2005 - 30/11/2011 (15,895 persons) and exits from unemployment through employment (28,913 people), we can see that there are more unemployed than employed are redundant, the significant contribution flattening growth markers in unemployment due to staff layoffs.

Of the total number of 15,895 people entered the period 2005 - 30/11/2011 from unemployment and layoffs occurring as a consequence of restructuring and privatization of various sectors, only 8943 people from collective redundancies, remaining 6952 individuals from the current staff redundancies. Staff redundant, it was only partially absorbed in sectors that have managed to establish new activities, restructuring processes producing major changes, both in terms of total county employment and county economic branches.

It is significant that massive restructuring plan under which they operated since 1997 in sectors prevailing county, namely mining, energy, oil extraction plants and gas, mono-industrial character of the county was not changed and employment level in Punjab , although lower than that recorded in the country and in the counties of South-West Oltenia has a higher share of employment in industry and especially in the mining industry, which justifies the county contribution to GDP, placing 15th place Gorj between counties and between counties in the 2nd South-West Oltenia. At territorial level, the number of unemployed increased in 27 counties recorded increases in Dolj (2170 people), Iasi (732 people), Gorj (696 people), River (640 individuals) and Maramures (498 people) and in other counties and in Bucharest, there were decreases in the number of registered unemployed. The most significant declines are reported in the following counties: Vaslui (562 people), Caras Severin (359 people), Cluj (352 people) and Bihar (294 people). The counties with the largest share of total unemployed not unemployed are: Manchester (87.41%), Mehedinti (86.38%), Science (86.01%), Virginia (85.11%), and Dolj (85.17%).

In the next period, given the issues highlighted the fact that some growth is anticipated the total number of registered unemployed in the country, mainly due to seasonal effects, and promotion of graduates of 2008 entries, it is necessary, careful monitoring the most vulnerable in the labor market because they have actively supported in their quest to find a job quickly, to prevent their becoming long term unemployed.

Conclusions

Economic and statistical data and analysis indicates that the county has a series of regional competitive advantages and that its socio-economic levels superior to other counties.

- Gorj has important natural resources, which is an important economic base development district.

- Also has human potential with favorable socio-demographic characteristics, people with high vitality regional averages and high educational level.

- Infrastructure major means of communication and energy networks is also well developed.

- In the county, there are numerous works and hydro networks exploiting a rich water resource.
- Macroeconomic type GDP / capita indicates a higher level regional and national averages.
- County recipient of valuable natural and cultural heritage sites.

This favorable situation is overshadowed by:

- Gorj still belongs to the category of least developed four regions;
- The natural environment is affected to a significant extent, even if it is not serious pollution events, large areas and large ecosystems are disturbed by mining activities;
- Mining activities are not a basis for long-term economic development and private sector experiences a small slow growth, not strong enough to be considered a solid alternative to a massive restructuring of the mining sector;
- Technical and social infrastructure in underdeveloped rural areas;
- The phenomenon of migration of young population to more developed areas is monitored and known;
- Secondary urban centers are small and either mono-industrial in nature or have a half-urban character.

At intra-county disparities can be analyzed in terms of urban-rural relationship and geographic area, in terms of identifying certain territorial groups with distinct characteristics.

In terms of criteria and indicators for assessing disparities, these belong to the demographic - social, economic, in terms of distribution activities, the equipment infrastructure of utilities and social or terms of natural and anthropogenic.

Opportunities:

- Administrative stability
- Important natural resources of coal and natural gas;
- Significant production of electricity;
- The leading producer of cement in the region;
- Favorable position of the city at the crossroads of major axes of movement;
- Favorable geographical position at the contact zone between the mountain - hill and plain;
- Single center urban system, polycentric development potential;
- Human potential good, young population and high level of education;
- Favorable demographics;
- Development of higher education;
- Natural and cultural heritage sites of outstanding value;
- Good access to major road and rail;
- Integration into the EU;
- Start of work on mixed mode (road and rail) of the Calafat-Vidin;
- Connecting the future pan-European corridors

Weaknesses

- Resource spa tourism in decline (the Săcelu);
- Towns with predominantly rural characteristics (Tismana) or mono-industrial type (Turceni);
- South-East less developed in terms of access to urban services;
- Landscape degradation and damage to natural ecosystems in the coal mines and oil;
- Increasing unemployment;
- Increasing unemployment among young and among women;
- Poor access to drinking water, running for over 30% of the population;
- Low investment in research;
- Low to attract foreign investment;
- High modernized roads;
- Low level of entrepreneurial development (especially in South County);

- Rural areas with low and low associativity equipment;
- Decline of traditional activities (livestock);
- Agriculture, lack of technology in general and modern equipment;
- Industrial restructuring;
- High dependence on extractive industries;
- Application of new environmental regulations;
- External labor migration;
- Competition nearby tourist areas;
- Orientation of foreign investment by major regional centers and capital.

Even if Gorj is better off in a regional context, in terms of population dynamics, there is significant intra-county disparities in some areas knowing a sharp decline or very stressed. If, according to excerpts of the Landscaping Plan at national, central and central-western area known moderate increases or decreases, mountainous and piedmont southeast known acute depopulation processes.

References

-  Development strategy has a socioeconomic County Gorj www.cjgorj.ro/.../Strategia%20socio-economica/strategie%20dezv%2...
- www.prefecturagorj.ro
-  Data taken from Regional Operational Programme 2007 – 2013
-  Data AJOFM, Gorj 2011.
-  under the National Spatial Plan
-  According to Human Developement Report
-  Human Development Index, calculated and published in the 2007 annual report of the United Nations Development Programme.
-  INSSE Gorj, 2004 -2010

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE COST OF EDUCATION AND THE HUMAN CAPITAL. THE ALIGNEMENT OF ROMANIA TO THE EUROPEAN STANDARDS

IOANA-JULIETA JOSAN*

Abstract

Once with the development of the human capital theory, the education received an economic value, which is a quality variable of human resources and the main determinant of economic growth. The famed economists have shown that the remarkable economic effects of the investments in education influence the chances of acquiring a job and earnings, demonstrating how the theory justifies such an investment.

Human capital approach allows also estimating the costs of education in schools and higher education, as well as the profits that comes out of it. Thus, the human capital theory is primarily focused on the demand for education. Moreover, the objective function of the state, in terms of education, contains itself two contradictory arguments: the state, theoretically, is a representative and guarantor of the collective good and its organizer; the state will seek to maximize individual education on the one hand and on the other hand will search for the optimization of the relationship between professional training and formal education. Also, in the context of recent years, the budgetary constraints are raising the problem of optimal allocation of the resources, as well as the funding of the performance of the educational services.

The particularities, in terms of flexibility and cumulative distribution of the investment levels in the human factors, are translated into a practical action in the sense that global competition, from which Romania cannot decouple. In the long run, there are winning and resisting only those with academic flexible formation and the intelligent persons.

Considering the above arguments, the purpose of this paper is to analyze the main characteristics of funding mechanisms for education systems, the volume of spending on education and ways of managing the resources allocated to the education. The cost allocation for education in Romania is investigated in terms of government policies, but also in terms of human capital theory.

Also, to answer to the question how Romania had aligned to the modern trends in terms of allocation of the resources more and more important for human capital formation, this paper attempts to estimate the economic effort claimed by the financing of the education system.

Keywords: investment, human capital, cost, economic growth, performance

Introduction

The economy and the efficiency of education is an area that integrates public economy and the economy of human resources. Over time and especially today, the issue of budgetary constraints underlines the problem of optimal allocation of the resources and the funding on performance of the educational services. Following the above considerations, the content of this paper will focus on analyzing the main characteristics of funding mechanisms for education systems, the volume of spending on education and the ways of managing the resources allocated to the education. The cost allocation for education in Romania is investigated in this paper both in terms of government policies and in terms of human capital theory.

Also, to answer the question of how to connect Romania to the modern trend of the allocation of resources more important for human capital formation, we attempted to estimate the economic effort claimed with regards to financing the education.

*Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, University of Bucharest, Faculty of Business and Administration, Bucharest, Romania, Ph. D. candidate "Costin C. Kiritescu", National Institute of Economic Research, Bucharest, Romania (email: ioanajulieta@yahoo.com).

As for the literature notes, several currents are highlighted and referred to in this paper. The first research papers have focused on the cost measurement methodology, the study of determinants of the unit costs, on their laws of evolution[1], and the measurement of educational costs supported by the family[2]. 80s decade has seen a deepening of this line of thinking - further comparative studies[3]and more specific studies mainly on the cost of systems using new technological means (Eicher, Hawkridge, MacAnany, Orivel, 1986). Recently, the scientific speech of financing has been the object of the numerous papers. Thus, education systems are currently funded, sometimes even totally by the public power. On the other hand, economic theory does recommend full public funding only in the cases of pure collective goods. Therefore, in front of growing constraint of the budget, the problem arises not only for the optimal allocation of resources, but also how best to finance educational services. This issue concerns the specialized literature, as well as governments of the developed and emerging countries.

The role of human resources education and training in Economic theory

The education and the training of human resources stands more than six decades in the interdisciplinary focus of governmental structures, national and international non-governmental organizations.

The research and the economics – in their permanent renewal, development and structure included as a separate specialty, in the late 50's, a new branch and economic discipline called education. Although the influence that education can have on human productivity was pointed out and still stressed by classical economists, particularly Adam Smith, in their works are not found consistent and detailed analysis to substantiate their statements. If we exclude the work and management studies (financial - accounting) of the educational institutions that have developed and have considerable experience in Western countries, the new economic approach to education includes two major research topics:

Application of the theory of education analyzed and evaluated by the theory of the human capital;

The correlation between education and training of the labor force and economic growth.

In time, the crisis phenomena accompanied by increasing budgetary constraints have produced an additional application for studies and research regarding optimal allocation of resources for education and lookup for more efficient ways of financing it. Also, growth and persistence of unemployment have generated a certain priority of employment for continuous education and training issues, recycling and retraining the workforce, directly and indirectly influencing demand, content, duration and pragmatism of the formal education.

Therefore, education core economy - the human capital theory - has been a subject to criticism and contradictions, as well as extensions of the scope and content approaches.

Human capital theory and the effectiveness of education

The concept of the human capital is attributed to Theodore Schultz.Theoretical developments around this concept date from the 60s and is related to the author contributions quoted to which we can add the contribution of Gary Becker and Jacob Mincer.

However, the core of thinking about human capital is much older: Jean Bodin states so that "there is no greater wealth than men", Adam Smith, in Chapter 10 of Book I, "Wealth of Nations" show that "the man who was educated by a significant expense and time is necessary to provide work/activity that would reimburse the cost of his training, with an ordinary income at least equal to that of a capital equal value."It can be easily seen that assimilation of the education with an investment and human capital prepared is obvious, but this idea has been analytically resumed neither by Smith nor by his closer successors.

[1]Eicher, J.C. şi Orivel F., 1979, L`allocation des resourcesàl`enseignement dans le monde, Paris, UNESCO

[2]Mingat, A. şi Perrot, J., 1980, Familles: coûts d'éducation et pratiques socioculturelles, Dijon, Cahier De l` IREDU, N.32

[3]Eicher, J.C, 1986, L`évolution des systems d`enseignement dans le monde de 1960 à nos jours: aspects économiques et financiers, Paris, UNESCO

Among other tangential references, but significant economic importance of education, we can mention Benjamin Franklin – "an investment in knowledge brings the best profit"[4] or John Stuart Mill that argued that the return of development is fast only when the population is allowed to use the same knowledge and skills they had before[5].

At the beginning of the twentieth century, Irving Fischer has developed a theory that considers any stock as capital resources leading to the birth of future income, considering training people, along with the construction of cars as investments.

Thus, the spectacular increase in the needs of specialists of different professions, generated by technical and technological developments determined also the restructuring of general knowledge essential for most jobs; vocational training was becoming more and more perceived and considered as an investment.

Currently, education systems are funded primarily - sometimes almost totally–by the public power, from the public funds, but the economic theory does recommend full public funding only in the case of pure public goods. Since the potential demand for education is higher than the number of places or facilities offered, it cannot practice the principle of non-exclusion and therefore do not represent a "pure public good".

The budget constraints raise the problem not only of an optimal allocation of resources but also of the performing funding of the educational services. As in the developed countries the principle of free primary and secondary education in public institutions is still intangible, the economic research has been focused on the financing of higher education. Related to these issues, under the pressure coming from social demand, higher education budget has a rapidly growing trend and quasi public funding - full of this form of education is income redistribution from poor to rich because at this level of access the social inequalities are particularly evident.

In their approach to finding the best financing mechanisms, the researchers often produced descriptive studies, comparing methods used by different countries, the European solutions compared to the U.S. or Japan solutions. The results show that optimal funding was initially addressed by analysis of the redistributive effects in the higher education; concomitantly there are studied efficiency problems and those of equity, asking to increase tuition fees and scholarships reform, it is proposed more often by funding student by the loans.

Also, as I mentioned above, in the developing countries, the size of the financial crisis and internal and external public debt increased the demand for research on education funding. This research has been conducted mainly under the financial impetus of the World Bank[6]. The results of the researches take in consideration the introduction of the enrollment fees, reforming scholarships, creating credit market for education, development of the private education, etc. Therefore, in education, not only the cost is important but also the methods and the resources of the funding.

The optimal funding issue was first addressed through an analysis of the redistributive effects of higher education[7]. This research was directly achieved by simultaneously taking into account efficiency and equity issues and highlight the need to increase tuition fees, where they are almost nominal (symbolic) and to reform the support systems granted to the students.

With all the explosive nature of the debate on taxes, most European countries seem to take into account the recommendations or being about to implement them.

---

[4] Becker, G., Capitalul uman. O analiză teoretică şi empirică, cu referire specială la educaţie, Editura All, Bucureşti, 1997, p. 173

[5] Mill, J.S., Principles of Political Economy with some of their application to social philosophy, London, Prker, p. 57, citat de G. Becker în op. cit.

[6] 6Le financement de l'education dans les pays en développement, Washington, 1986, L'éducation en Afrique Sub –Saharienne, Washington, 1988

[7] Blaug, M., 1987, The Economics of Education and the Education of Economist, New York, New York University Press

The most debated is the support systems granted to the students. The controversy over "Bons education" (Education vouchers) was not always entirely clear, but it has helped, finally, to highlight various possible solutions, the advantages and disadvantages (in Blaug, 1987)[8].While until recently, these findings influenced policies on higher education was almost zero, the recent evolution of influential groups in the principle of student financing through loans and extent of reforms put into action in some countries, like in United Kingdom, shows that these ideas are building their own way.

In the developing countries, the extent of the financial crisis is so great that the demand for research on education financing has become, for some years, very high. The World Bank has played an exciting role. Much of reflections is emanating either from its members (Psacharapoulos and Woodhall, 1988) or from experts working for this institution. They prepared major reports (BanqueMondiale, 1986 and 1988).

Conclusions concerns the favorable effects on the efficiency and equity of the institutionalization establishment of the selective enrollment fees, on a reform of the support systems going to a selective reduction and allocation of scholarships to students in higher education, to create a market for education loans, loan financing for this purpose and, finally, to the relaxation of restrictions on private and local schools.

Regarding the financing of educational institutions by themselves due to the education production, economists have shown that logically they can expect little from these activities (Eicher, 1984).

The cost of the education in European Union

The funding structure and policies applied in education vary from state to state and sometimes even within the same state from one region to another. In the education system of any state is of particular importance its funding mechanisms, and compatibility with public financing legislation.

All sources of funding of education can be grouped into two broad categories, namely: public sources and private sources. Public sources come from central, regional and local authorities, while private sources come from students, households and non-governmental organizations. The relative importance of each type of funding source, whether public or private, varies significantly from state to state, ranging from "total funding of education in countries such as Denmark, Finland and Sweden, while in many Member States taxes for the study are burned by the students"[9]. Therefore, it should be noted that the European Union in recent years, there is a constant concern to find effective ways of financing education. "For example, the Netherlands, is promoting a performance-based lending, where loans can also take the form of reimbursable grants if the student successfully complete its studies. This keeps the public funding source, while contributing to increased efficiency in education"[10]. To highlight the interest that European Union Member States show to education, I will use as support statistical data developed by Eurostat[11] upon the total expenditures for education in 2008. The statistic mentioned reveal that in European Union (EU -27) the public expenditure on education in 2008 measured up to 5.1 % of GDP. The highest public spending on education relative to GDP was observed in Denmark (7.8 % of GDP), while Cyprus (7.4 %), Sweden (6.7 %), Belgium (6.5 %), Finland (6.1 %) and Malta (6.0 %) also recorded relatively high proportions. The situation at the level of all the EU members' states is not so good if we take into consideration that in 2008 the share of public expenditure on education was less than 5% of GDP, in more than half of European countries (Figures 1). It should be noted that the EU-15 total expenditure percentage is below 5%,

[8] Idem

[9] Consiliul Concurenței, Ghid privind finanțarea sistemului de învățământ din România, comparativ cu unele state membre ale U. E., din perspective legislației ajutorului de stat (The Competition Council, Guidelines about the financing of education in Romania, a comparison with some EU member states in terms of state aid legislation.)

[10] Idem

[11] Educational expenditure statistics ,Eurostat (http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/statistics_explained/index.php?title=File:Expenditure_on_educational_institutions,_2003_and_2008_(1).png&filetimestamp=20111117102022, accesed March 2011 and the situation is slightly better in the EU - 27 where the percentage of total spending severely stands at 5.07 %. Also, compared with 2003, in 2008 the percentage of total expenditure in the EU-15 is lower by 0.06 points; Hungary and Slovenia recorded the largest decreases, both down 0.8 percentage points. It should be noted that changes in GDP (growth or contraction) can mask significant increases or decreases made in terms of education spending.

Tabel 1: Total public expenditure on education as a percentage of GDP (2003 and 2008)

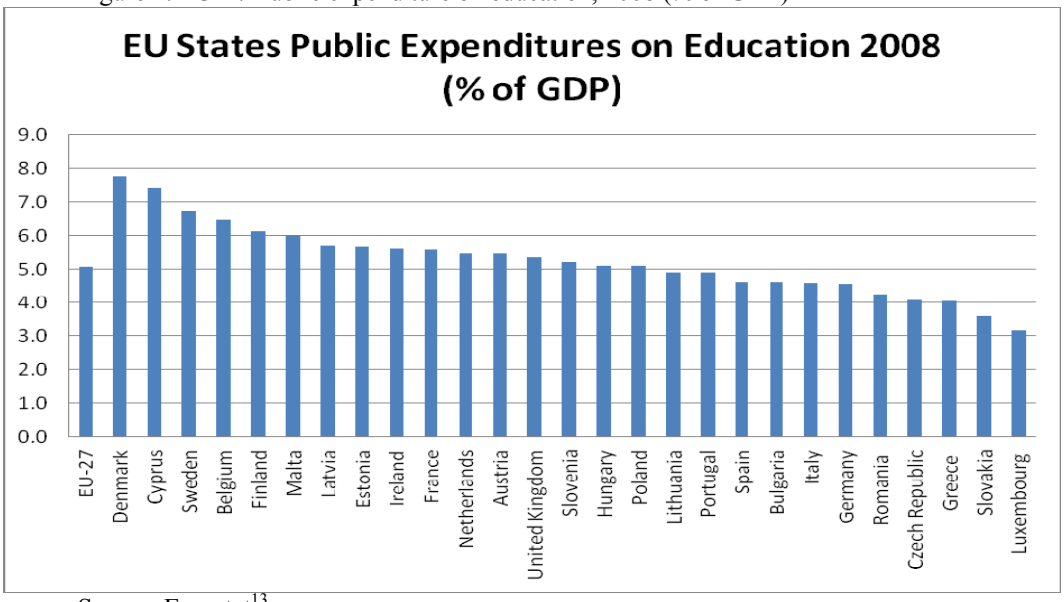
	Public expenditure (% of GDP)		Private expenditure (% of GDP)		Expenditure on public & private educational institutions per pupil/student (PPS for full-time equivalents)
	2003	2008	2003	2008	2003	2008
EU-27	5.14	5.07	0.64	0.75	5 414	6 459
Euro area (EA–15)	5.03	4.97	:	:	:	:
Belgium	6.03	6.46	0.35	0.37	6 343	7 866
Bulgaria	4.23	4.61	0.67	0.58	1 692	2 840
Czech Republic	4.51	4.08	0.37	0.57	3 354	4 520
Denmark	8.33	7.75	0.32	0.55	7 133	8 701
Germany	4.70	4.55	0.92	0.70	6 005	6 953
Estonia	5.29	5.67	:	0.30	:	4 226
Ireland (2)	4.38	5.62	0.31	0.34	5 279	7 172
Greece	3.56	:	0.20	:	3 778	:
Spain	4.28	4.62	0.54	0.66	5 042	6 941
France	5.90	5.58	0.56	0.60	6 038	7 031
Italy	4.74	4.58	0.40	0.41	6 118	6 609
Cyprus	7.29	7.41	1.35	1.35	5 968	8 461
Latvia	5.32	5.71	0.83	0.60	2 258	4 332
Lithuania	5.16	4.91	0.46	0.52	2 183	3 622
Luxembourg (3)	3.77	3.15	:	:	:	:
Hungary (4)	5.89	5.10	0.56	0.54	:	3 995
Malta (5)	4.70	6.01	1.40	0.31	4 272	6 220
Netherlands	5.42	5.46	0.94	0.92	6 881	8 069
Austria	5.57	5.46	0.31	0.50	7 604	8 836
Poland	5.35	5.09	0.66	0.74	2 524	3 781
Portugal	5.57	4.89	0.09	0.49	4 287	4 979
Romania (6)	3.45	4.25	:	0.50	:	:
Slovenia	5.82	5.22	0.83	0.63	5 021	6 529
Slovakia	4.30	3.59	0.45	0.70	2 325	3 523
Finland	6.44	6.13	0.13	0.15	5 858	6 988
Sweden	7.30	6.74	0.19	0.17	6 825	8 067
United Kingdom	5.24	5.36	0.95	1.72	6 097	7 942
Iceland	7.71	7.57	0.70	0.71	6 727	8 290
Liechtenstein (2)	2.46	2.11	:	:	5 851	7 788
Norway	7.54	6.51	0.10	0.09	8 275	10 084
Switzerland	6.00	5.37	0.62	0.56	:	:
Croatia	3.96	4.33	:	0.36	:	4 147
FYR of Macedonia	3.39	:	:	:	:	:
Turkey (7)	2.96	2.86	0.04	:	:	:
Japan	3.70	3.44	1.25	1.66	6 682	7 530
United States	5.61	5.40	2.05	2.10	9 924	11 759

Source: Eurostat[12]

[12]Educational expenditure statistics ,Eurostat (http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/statistics_explained/index.php?title=File:Expenditure_on_educational_institutions,_2003_and_2008_(1).png&filetimestamp=20111117102022, accesed March 2012

In essence, education accounts for a significant proportion of public expenditure in all of the EU Member States – the most important budget item being expenditure on staff. The cost of teaching increases significantly as a child moves through the education system, with expenditure per pupil/student considerably higher in universities than in primary schools. Although tertiary education costs more per head, the highest proportion of total education spending is devoted to secondary education systems, as these teach a larger share of the total number of pupils/students. However, in absolute terms, there is almost no change between 2008 and 2009 and several countries even had a decrease in education spending.

Figure 1: EU-27 Public expenditure on education, 2008 (% of GDP)

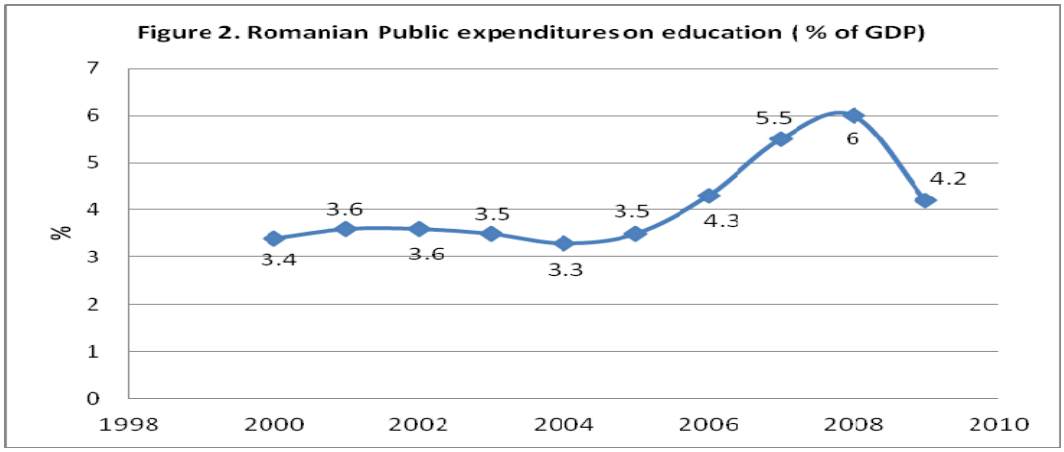


Source: Eurostat[13]

In 2009, government spending on education as percentage of GDP was the highest in Denmark (8.0 %), Sweden (7.3 %), Cyprus (7.1 %), and Estonia (7.0 %). The lowest percentages were found in Romania (4.2 %), Slovakia (4.3 %), Germany and Bulgaria (both 4.4 %), and Greece (4.5 %).

Compared with the other member states, the percentage of GDP allocated to education in Romania ranks our country at the one of the last position of the EU Member States, close to the Czech Republic and Slovakia. In 2009, has decreased its growth rate registered in 2007 and 2008 (see Figure 2) due to anti-crisis measures imposed by the Romanian Government. The significant decrease in GDP in 2009 led to a decrease in funds allocated to education, reaching a value of 4.2%.

[13] Educational expenditure statistics ,Eurostat , http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/statistics_explained/index.php?title=File:Public_expenditure_on_education,_2008_(1)_(%25_of_GDP).png&filetimestamp=20111117102037, accesed March 2012



Source: Ministry of Education, Research, Youth and Sports

The lower percentage of GDP in education has led to measures, primarily to reduce technology and material investments and, secondly, reduce salaries of teachers and administrative staff. Thus, in Romania, the average salary that a teacher can receive is 21,468 lei (5,063 Euros) per year, while a high school teacher is 23,353 lei (5,508 Euros) per year. Only Bulgarian teachers are paid less than the Romanian, with 4271 Euros per year. In contrast, the highest salary paid per year to teachers in the European Union are in Luxembourg (88 315 Euros), Denmark (61,804 Euros) and Austria (57,663 Euros). Moreover, in some countries, including Romania, the basic gross wages for teachers in the early years of their career are lower than the national GDP per capita, except Germany, Spain and Portugal.

Even so, in all European countries, staff costs represent the largest part of the costs of education, they are found, on average, around 71% of annual costs in the European Union.

Central governments and/or local ones take most decisions on the total amount allocated to public schools in compulsory education cycle, depending on the category of resources involved. Only in four countries, are found the key regional donors and recipients of education budgets. These countries are Belgium, Germany, and Spain and to a lesser extent, the Czech Republic, here more than 70% of funds allocated to education (45.5% in the Czech Republic) are collected and spent at regional level. In three of these countries, regional institutions (Communities of Belgium, the Spanish Autonomous Communities and provinces of Germany) are the highest level of authority in education. In Austria, the situation is slightly more complex - almost 75% of resources are collected by central government contribution, which can spend only 53% of available funds. In Estonia, Slovakia and Finland, the central authorities provide a big part of resources, but uses less than 40%. Countries where there is a greater decentralization are Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, United Kingdom and Iceland. In these countries, local authorities are providing and consuming most of the financial resources allocated to education. This is due to the organizational structure of education in these countries and because the regional authorities are not involved, except Poland.

In majority of the countries, total public expenditure with the teaching staff are determined centrally, at the government level, while decision-making procedures involving non-teaching staff costs, operational resources and current assets are divided between local and central authorities or are implemented only locally.

The general tendency is to decentralize the decision to determine the total amount which will be allocated to the resources not directly related to the teaching activities.

To support the development of human capital, in all European countries family allowances are granted for studies. They are offered when children born and paid by the end of compulsory education. The amounts awarded will vary depending on the number and age of children. For example, in Bulgaria, Czech Republic, Italy, Portugal, Slovakia and Iceland, the amounts are proportional to family income. It should be noted that in some cases, families that exceed a certain level of income do not receive financial support in the Czech Republic, Spain, Malta, Poland, Slovenia and Slovakia. Also, scholarships for children who are enrolled in compulsory education exist only a in a few countries. In four countries (Belgium, France, Luxembourg and the Netherlands), scholarships are available only from lower secondary education and family options are always evaluated. In Romania allowance is granted to children from birth until the age of 18 years, provided under the condition that the student is enrolled in an educational institution. The amount allocated does not vary by family income or other criteria. It should be remembered that the person shaving an economic and social disadvantaged can receive additional support from the state as a social scholarship is given throughout the school year. It also supports the involvement of children in Romanian state education system, respectively, human capital formation by free / discounts offered for transport, health, reductions in price ticket for artistic and cultural institutions.

In various countries are implemented and other specific measures to assist parents with children in additional compulsory education. Some of these approaches involve reducing the price of transport, free meals at school, specifically to support the purchase of teaching materials, free distribution of textbooks, etc.

The cost of education in Romania

Education funding in Romania is a long debated topic in the last 20 years. Many analysts in educational policy, theoretical field, press and representatives of education institutions management in Romania presented and analyzed different aspects both positive and negative about the funding of education in our country. A recent study conducted by Eurostat reveals that Romania is the state that allocates the least amount per student across the European Union[14].According to the research cited above, The total annual unit cost of a pupil/student which is on average PPS EUR 5 748 in the EU-27 varies widely between countries. One group of countries (Bulgaria, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Poland, Romania and Slovakia) is characterized by unit costs per pupil/student which are relatively modest compared to the other member states average and do not go beyond PPS EUR 4 000 (ranging from Romania with 1 467 to Poland with 3 278).

There is a second group of countries in which the unit costs vary from PPS EUR 7 000 to 8 000, namely Belgium, Spain, Cyprus, the Netherlands, Sweden and Liechtenstein and to a lesser extent Ireland, France and Italy (slightly below). In a third group the unit costs are more than PPS EUR 8 000, as in Denmark, Iceland, Norway or Luxembourg, which is way ahead with more than PPS EUR 14 000 per pupil/student.

Lack of funds necessary for financing the European Union average and close to the high costs faced by families to support a pupil / student in school has a direct impact on school attendance by children and culminating in early school leaving. It also shows that between access to education and involvement of children in work there is a double link: on the one hand children are forced to work to contribute to family income (including to cover part of tuition fees) and on the other hand, the involvement of children in school can affect time work, which leads to absenteeism and even drop of education. Data from the Ministry of Education, Research, Youth and Sports reports show that the dropout rate has tripled in the period 2000-2007.

Also in the current context of economic and financial crisis, it is expected that the situation will be worse in the future. Thus, according to recent research undertaken by the Institute for Quality of Life points out that during the crisis, Romania's children will suffer even more, they are “hit indirectly by lowering income families, coupled with decreasing financial support for social system, but also for education and health". The report highlights that the relative poverty rate increased even during the period of economic growth 2000-2008 particularly for vulnerable populations, including single-parent family find with dependent children (relative poverty rate increased from 25.6% in 2000 from 27.1% in 2006), and especially the family of two adults with two dependent children (in which case the increase is about 5 percentage points from 12.8% to 17.6%).

[14] Key Data on Education in Europe 2009, Eurostat http://eacea.ec.europa.eu/education/eurydice/documents/key_data_series/105EN.pdf

At present, in Romania the education funding is based on standard cost per pupil / preschool. In accordance with decision no. 1395[15], the standard cost per student is determined for each level of education, branch, field, specialization / field, the number of students, language teaching, education and other specific indicators of urban / rural. Therefore, the standard cost per student / preschool is an indicator of substantiation necessary funds to cover basic costs of financing. Standard cost level that of each category of expense base funding is determined by physical indicators of human and material resources consumption established by laws and government decisions or regulations issued by ministries and central institutions in the field. The standard size cost and actual cost per student / preschool is determined by at least two reasons:

Standard cost relates to a school with a standard number of pupils, a number of classes and students/class, a regulated space necessary for a student etc. while teaching a particular unit may have a number of students other than standard, different volume of space per student, a certain degree of education, etc. equipped with means.

Actual costs of staff in a school/ student may be higher or lower than standard depending on the degree of qualification of teachers, average length of education, and number of students per teacher position etc.

These differences between actual costs and standard costs are not related to the objective quality of management or policy management. These differences can be eliminated through a medium and long term policy regarding the school network, concentration and modernization of educational facilities, etc. On average, in the year 2011, the standard cost per pupil / school / day is highlighted in the table below:

Tabel 2: Some standard cost per pupil / school / day

Nr. Crt.	Level / chain / profile	Type of education	Average number of students per class		Standards of cost per pupil, on average and level RON		Standards of cost per pupil, on average and the levels[16]
			Urban	Rural	Urban	Rural	Urban	Rural
1	Kindergarten with normal program	with frequency	20	18	1.478	1.617	1.478	1.617
2	Primary education	with frequency	22	18	1.701	2.027	2.041	2.432
3	Secondery education	with frequency	25	20	2.230	2.727	2.549	3.117
4	College	with frequency	28	28	2.119	2.119	2.401	2.401

Source: author

[15] HOTĂRÂRE NR. 1395 privind finanţarea unităţilor de învătământ preuniversitar de stat, finanţate din bugetele locale, pe baza standardelor de cost pe elev/preşcolar pentru anul 2011, publicată în M.Of. nr. 896 din 31 decembrie 2010

[16] Education in minority languages

If we look overall, in reality, the cost of education per student is higher. In the study conducted by Save the Children Organization, in 2010, regarding the cost of education of children at the family level[17] has revealed a number of expenses that the family makes for a student during a school year. The average cost spent by parents for a child's schooling is 1490 RON, and per family is about 2,000 RON. It should be noted that the above amount is calculated taking into account the average costs for parents in the sample budgets, representing a trend as it emphasizes not an absolute value. Also, looking at the results we see that the total cost may reach values of over 4,500 RON per year, per student. The survey questionnaire was conducted based on a sample of approximately 600 parents and 300 teachers, thus the data has a more rough guide character; generally, the expenditures differ regionally, at the school level, considering also school popularity rank and the parent's salary level who allocate more or less financial resources for children human capital development.

Regarding higher education, university funding is based on actual work performed. Funds and thus the responsibility to develop their own strategies for the cost optimization is the freedom of university management. Of the total base funding of 70% shall be distributed based on the number of students unitary equivalent and 30% are considered as quality indicators.

In fact, at higher education institutions in 2011 the average amount paid for a student was about 2,750 RON, slightly lower than in 2010 when the state paid about 2840 RON / student equivalent. In 2010 approximately 470,000 students have disposed of 1,903,513,398 RON - as far as core funding has been granted from the budget for higher education. In 2009, the amount allocated from the budget for students was 1,990,932,992 RON, and in 2011 the Ministry of Education Research, Youth and Sports has provided an allowance for equivalent unit student an average of 2,750 RON. The reason for reductions of funding is the financial crisis affecting our country. This cost varies depending on the criteria above. At a minimum calculation relative to the cost factors used to determine the areas of education funding, it appears that a "a medicine student will benefit from support from the state amounting to 6.187 RON (1467 Euros), a chemist - 5225 RON (1244 Euros), a student of a faculty of the human and socio-economic profile - 2,750 RON (654 Euros). The biggest amount of money - 20,625 RON (4910 Euros) - will receive the students who want to make a career in cinematographic art"[18].In addition to costs incurred by the state, the student and / or family have the direct private annual total costs[19] of between 2000-6000 thousands of Euros, depending on the locality in which the educational institution has it activities, on faculty requirements related to books, on software and on family financial availability. To cover some of the hidden costs that have to support student or family, the Romanian authorities offers performance scholarships for students with exceptional results, scholarships for students with good results, but also social aid scholarships for students from families with very small financial funds. Also, some private companies assist the performing students through foundations offering scholarships.

Therefore, the biggest problem remains at the primary and secondary levels of education where the Romanian state must find better solutions to encourage school attendance and lower school dropout in poor families or with single parents. In terms of human capital it is noted that rural schools in counties with a low level of socioeconomic development are characterized by poor learning conditions, low quality education, socially disadvantaged segment of pupils which get low educational performance: lower participation in the yearly evaluations with very poor results, which often either exclude them from the competition, or do not allow them the enrollment and attendance in a desired school to continue their studies.

---

[17] Cercetare cu privire la costurile „ascunse" din educaţie "Învăţământul gratuit costă", realizată de Organizaţia Salvaţi Copiii, Bucureşti, 2010 (Research about the "hidden" costs of education - Free education costs, conducted by Save the Children, Bucharest, 2010). The survey questionnaire was conducted based on a sample of approximately 600 parents and 300 teachers.

[18] Cât investeşte statul roman într-un student, articol publicat în Săptămâna financiară, 4 Martie2011 (How much Romanian state invests in a student. Article published in Financial Week, March 4, 2011)

[19] Becker, G., Capitalul uman. O analiză teoretică şi empirică cu referire specială la educaţie, p. 180

Conclusions

Currently, education systems are funded primarily - sometimes almost totally by the public power, public funds, even if the economic theory does not recommend full public funding. Community practice revealed that at the European Union level funding modalities of the educational system varies significantly from state to state, ranging from full funding to the combination of private funds with public ones. Low potential of the Romanian education funding from private sources and needs and stringent requirements which Romania has to face, require increased attention to the educational process from decision makers, both in the quality and in ensuring an appropriate degree of financing. The need to find adapted solutions for the Romanian education system is urgent because the low level of public expenditure on education (about 4% of GDP) leads to the proliferation of serious effects on educational performance and human capital accumulation. Among them are:

Decreased level of teacher's training because of the lack of motivation due to lower wages;

Migration of highly qualified teaching staff to better paying areas of the country or abroad;

Loss of logistics that cannot sustain an efficient teaching process;

Decreased quality of students performance and accumulation of skills necessary after graduation;

Increased school dropout, especially in rural areas where it is found a constant need for qualified teachers, especially in Moldova.

All these effects cause the loss of human capital among both teachers and pupils. Underdevelopment of human capital can lead to a partial exclusion of human resources able to work, but unprepared in terms of knowledge and skills required on the labor market. This "exclusion" of human resources creates serious social and economic effects like increasing unemployment rate and number of social assistance or hiring on low qualifications jobs for small salaries. These effects will be extended by the author in other works.

In conclusion, the differences of the educational system between Romania and European Union developed countries can be eliminated through a medium and long term policy regarding the school network, concentration and modernization of educational facilities. Therefore, it is recommended that Romania has to create an efficient financial system, along with the development of educational policies designed to enhance the quality and prestige of education that should be regarded as a national priority and activity of a general interest that the future depends largely on the degree of development of the country.

References

- Gary Becker,Capitalul uman. O analiză teoretică şi empirică cu referire specială la educaţie (Bucureşti: Editura All, 1997);
- Mark Blaug, The Economics of Education and the Education of Economist (New York: New York University Press, 1987);
- Consiliul Național pentru Finanțarea Învățământului Superior (CNFIS), Finanțarea învățământului superior în România, http://www.cnfis.ro/documente/FinantareIS.pdf, accessed January10, 2012;
- Date cheie privind educația europeană în anul 2009, Eurostat, http://eacea.ec.europa.eu/education/eurydice/documents/key_data_series/105RO.pdf;
- Edward Denison,Le mesure de la contribution de l`enseignement (et du facteur residuel) a la croissance economique (Paris: OCDE,1964) ;
- George Dinca and Radu Damian, Financing of higher education in Romania (Bucureşti: Alternative, 1997);
- Ilie Dogaru, Formula de finanțare a învățământului preuniversitar din România: studii şi proiecte (Bucureşti: Editura Economică, 2002) ;
- Jean Claude Eicher and Garboua Levy, Economique de l`education (Paris: Economica, 1979);

- Jean Claude Eicher, L'evolution des systemes d'enseignement dans le monde de 1960 a nos jours; aspects economiques et financiers (Paris: UNESCO, 1986);
- Jean Claude Eicher and Francois Orivel,L 'allocation des resources a l'enseignement dans le monde (Paris: UNESCO, 1979) ;
- Ştefania Enache, Cât investeşte statul român într-un student, Săptămâna financiară, March 4, 2011;
- Ovidiu Măntăluță, Abordarea economică a politicilor educaționale: principii, teorii şi posibile acțiuni de piață (Bucureşti: revista Sfera Politicii, nr 129-130, ANUL XVI, 2008);
- Alain Mingat, Essai sur le demande d`éducation (Dijon: Cahier De l` IREDU, n. 29, 1977);
- Alain Mingat and Jean Perrot, Familles: coûts d'éducation et pratiques socioculturelles (Dijon: Cahier De l` IREDU, N.32, 1980);
- Adrian Miroiu and George Dinca, Politica finanțării de bază a învățământului superior (Bucureşti: ARS DOCENDI, 2000);
- Michelle Riboud,Accumulation du capital humain (Paris:Economica, 1978) ;
- Save the Children Organization, Research about the "hidden"costs in education. "Free education costs" (Bucureşti, 2010);
- Theodore Schultz,The Economic Value of Education (New York: Columbia University Press,1963);
- Marta – Christina Suciu, Investiția în educație (Bucureşti: Editura Economică, 2000);
- Lester Thurow, Generating inequality: Mecanics of Distribution in the US Economy (New York: Basic Books, 1975);
- Hotărârea Guvernului nr. 1618/2009 privind finanțareaunităților de învățământ preuniversitar de stat, finanțate din bugetele locale, pe baza standardelor de cost per elev/preşcolar pentru anul 2010, publicată în M.Of. Partea I nr. 920 din 29 decembrie 2009;
- Hotărârea nr. 1395 privind finanțarea unităților de învătământ preuniversitar de stat, finanțate din bugetele locale, pe baza standardelor de cost pe elev/preşcolar pentru anul 2011, publicată în M.Of. nr. 896 din 31 decembrie 2010;
- Hotararea nr. 369 din 14 aprilie 2010 (Hotararea 369/2010) pentru modificarea si completarea;
- Hotararii Guvernului nr. 1.618/2009 privind finantarea unitatilor de invatamant preuniversitar de stat, finantate din bugetele locale, pe baza standardelor de cost pe elev/prescolar pentru anul 2010, publicată în M.Of. nr. 283 din 30 aprilie 2010;
- Hotărârea nr. 1395 din 28 decembrie 2010 privind finanțarea unităților de învățământ preuniversitar de stat, finanțate din bugetele locale, pe baza standardelor de cost pe elev/preşcolar pentru anul 2011;
- Ministerul Educației şi Cercetării, Consiliul Național pentru Finanțarea Invățământului Preuniversitar de Stat, "Costuri standard, formula şi indicatorii de alocare a fondurilor pentru finanțarea unităților de învățământ preuniversitar", februarie 2005;
- Ministerul Educației, Cercetării, Tineretului şi Sportului, Consiliul Național pentru Finanțarea Învățământului Superior http://www.cnfis.ro/fb2011/MetodologieFB2011.pdf

ACTIVE AGEING AND REFORMING PENSION SYSTEM. MAIN CHALLENGES

VALENTINA VASILE[*]

Abstract
Active ageing and economic crisis create a great pressure on pension systems, from the financial sustainability and performance of the old architectures of the 3 tired system point of view. Reforms of public pension systems during the last years highlight that demographic ageing is a major influence factor on financial sustainability of the national insurance and social assistance systems, with long-term effects. Associated with "classic" demographic ageing (low birth-rate, increase of the average life expectancy) for some new member states, such Romania, labour mobility on medium- and long-term and the change of its largest part into emigration, heightens labour force ageing and diminishes participation to insurance systems (due to the low portability of pensions). To these are added also the specific effects generated by the crisis that have put pressure on decreasing social expenditures, in reverse trend against the demand generated by demographic ageing.
Romania, and also several EU member countries are involved in large-scale actions of reforming pension systems both as answer to the increase in the numbers of elderly population, and implicitly of associated social expenditures, but also for stimulating the extension of active life. The increase in the standard retirement age and its correlation to life expectancy constitute priorities of changing the methodology in pension computation. The reformed policies in the field of pensions pursue as well restricting accessibility and diminishing early-age retirement schemes in parallel with stimulating the employability of individuals aged 50 and over.
In this paper we present the main policy action in order to stimulate and develop a new model of old age insurance and a new pattern of incomes after retirement, and also to investigate the support measures among EU member state for active ageing and increase incomes for elder persons.

Keywords: active aging, reforming pension system, financial sustainability
JEL Classification: J40, J2, B26

Introduction[1]

The impact of the financial crisis on private pensions and financial restrictions of the state have strengthened the necessity of developing sustainable, combined/multi-tiered pension systems, the creation of financial balances on each component, as well as assuring medium- and long-term the individual sustainability. As a result, assuring decent life at old age turned into an actual challenge, the weaknesses of the public system triggering the rethinking of the association scheme for various types of pensions, for assuring total comfortable/decent incomes (EC, 2011)[2]. Moreover, in some EU countries is pursued to ensure the compatibility of the pension system's structure and the possibility of benefiting from pension under various systems of public or private insurance, irrespective of the fund's type where the contribution was made and the location of the person at retirement age.

[*] Professor Ph. D. and Senior researcher I, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, (email: valentinavasile2009@gmail.com).

[1] Present paper represent an synthesis of the Chapter 1 of the Study "Analiza evoluţiilor şi politicilor sociale în UE în ultimii trei ani – pensii suplimentare/private şi impactul îmbătrânirii populaţiei" Strategy and Policy Studies (SPOS) 2011, Study no 4, European Institute from Romania, Bucharest, 2011, coord Valentina Vasile

[2] Concluding the first European semester of economic policy coordination: Guidance for national policies in 2011-2012, Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the European Council, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions COM(2011) 400 final, EC, Brussels, 7.6.2011, http://ec.europa.eu/europe2020/pdf/communication_en.pdf

Economic development level, social model and pension system

The level of economic development and the social model represents main determinants of the national pension systems evolution and performance. The main restrictions of the financial sustainability were: economic dependency ratio, the employment rate and average level of incomes of the contributors of the public and private pensions

An economic developed country can afford to build up public insurance systems for pensions that would promote to a large extent the safety of old-age income, supporting at legal and institutional level and by adopted policies the participation to the system and the development of complementariness. Private pensions become attractive for supplementing incomes from the public system and are used as additional safety system by persons with decent and/or comfortable incomes. In the case of weak state insurance systems, where the pensions becomes insufficient and there is no adequate (decent) ceiling of the minimum pension, or where the principle of the social minimum pension is not applied, private pensions are attractive as alternative to public insurances in particular for persons with incomes above average or high, in general non-wage employed population, for whom in many countries, the public pension pillar is optional. The attempt has been made in the last years to increase the contribution base by attracting within the system all types of active population, yet the deterioration of the economic dependency ration leads to the option of aggregating sources for incomes on retirement by broader participation, hence more risky to the private system of old-age insurance.

If the public pillar is mainly based on the PAYG system, the private one, in its constructive variants has as ground principle capitalisation and preserving the purchasing power of the saved amounts (contributions) by investment portfolio.

If, at the beginning, the private systems were predominantly optional, and represented an individual, singular option of the beneficiary, in the last decades, as social relationships and social accountability of the companies and of the state as market stakeholders developed, private pension systems evolved supported by companies or by the state: a) occupational pensions related especially to the activity of the social partners, and firstly of the trade unions and guilds/professional associations, and b) compulsory private pensions supported under various forms by the state, respectively by fiscal deductions, management support systems for the funds, by regulating supervision and guaranteeing institutions, etc.

Also individual insurances remain, yet they develop and diversify, gravitating around the idea of life insurance (pension insurances on the life insurance system), and represents a specific market insurances for those with average and high incomes and a culture of managing incomes oriented on the market mechanisms (as form of risk management and of active participation on the market for generating positive yields of saved funds).

The multi-tiered system is present in several countries of the world, and at EU level was promoted the coordination policy (EC, 2004)[3] for insuring financial flows between national funds and for rendering efficient systems.

Population ageing has developed specific systems of insuring elderly persons, based on integrated adequate health services, social assistance centred on the particular needs, etc. In the field of pension insurances was pursued the development of individual insurance culture and of extending the active life as direct active measure. At the same time, the increase of the average number of years spent as pensioner has triggered the reconsideration and reform of public systems – the system of contribution and the calculation formulae, the transfer rate wage-pension. In parallel, as answer to increasing social responsibility, in many countries was constituted (and in the last years also in Romania) the system of the minimal social pension and the access conditions to early retirement pension and invalidity pension were hardened. The entry in deficit of several pension systems due to the diminishment of the contributors' base and of extending the period of paying the old-age pension became permanent and acute in some national systems, the transfer of funds for balancing from the state budget turning more difficult, in particular during the crisis period.

[3] Regulation (EC) no 883/2004 of the European Parliament and of the Council from 29 April 2004 regarding the coordination of social security systems.

Many experts propose the in-depth revision of the multi-tiered pension system, and even the question of their sustainability for medium- and long-term was raised for the PAYG-type public system! Moreover, the crisis with its manifestation forms and extended duration (and from the relapse perspective but on other more restrictive and complex coordinates) challenges us to analyse from the current pension systems' sustainability viewpoint[4] the survival potential of the present capitalist system (N Roubini, 2011 on K Marx's theory of capitalism self-destruction).

Recent developments of pension policies within the EU and Romania

The pension systems' of the EU member countries are multi-tiered combining the PAYG principle for the public pillar with the one of capitalising for the private and occupational pension pillars, either compulsory or optional. Employers, through the social partners, have developed insurance systems with capitalisation of the occupational pensions' type as form of supporting employees and instrument of stabilising employment, the transfers between these funds being, in general, more difficult.

The private pensions' market is represented on one hand, by actual private funds, subjected to particular regulations in the field of private pensions, and coordinated/supervised by specific institutions, and on the other hand to the life insurance systems of the pension-type, where reimbursement of capitalised sums under the form of annuities or monthly payments is constituted into additional income for pensioners.

The pensions are the most important component of social expenditures and remains the basic source of pension-type incomes. With respect to the private pension funds, according to available data for 2010, is found that these are significant in the Netherlands (over 1.3 times of GDP), Great Britain (86%), Finland (82%), Denmark and Ireland (about 50% of GDP), modest in Portugal, Spain, Poland, Hungary, Estonia and Slovakia (about 7-16% of GDP) and very low (under 1% of GDP) in France, Romania, Latvia. The national pension system analysis of the country files shows thus a very broad variety of the constituents and structure for pension funds, public and private, largely depending on the social model and the history of insurances' development, and the size of state's involvement in the field. Also, a diversity of old-age insurance forms is found as well, and the association with the development level and the social model certifies a stronger involvement of the state in countries with a generous social model and an important public pensions' system. The significance of the public pensions' system for EU-15 countries decreases on the geographic axis North-South. For transition countries, that still define their social models (which are developed to the vast majority under a hybrid form) and that have a lower development level, the public pillar is strong, yet with high efficiency deficit. The reforms in these countries are mostly under development, promoting both adjustment by in-depth reforms of pillar I, and the gradual implementation and expansion of the contributors' basis for the pillars II and III.

Under the conditions in which, at EU-level, by the Green Paper the pension insurance policies are reoriented towards "adequacy, sustainability and safety", also a convergence of the systems is developed in their reformed shapes. The measures of the last years[5] are focused towards efficiency

[4] http://www.realitatea.net/foto_1182141_profetul-crizei-marx-a-avut-dreptate-cu-privire-la-autodistrugerea-capitalismului_875627.html şi http://europe.wsj.com/video/nouriel-roubini-karl-marx-was-right/68EE8F89-EC24-42F8-9B9D-47B510E473B0.html?KEYWORDS=Roubini

[5] The main policy measures in the field of pensions for the last years in EU-27 are synthesised in three categories of documents: a) recommendations of the European Council, specific to each member state; b) working papers for each country elaborated by the Staff of the Commission, and c) national documents, respectively national programmes of reforms and/or Stability Programmes/Convergence Programmes. COUNCIL RECOMMENDATION and balance of funds, by promoting new insurance and integrated assistance services policies for third-age individuals (employment for active ageing, adjusted health system, a pension system generating decent pensions, safety net for disfavoured categories, increasing efficiency and sustainability of each component/pillar, etc.).

At Euro-area[6] level it is estimated that from the perspective of ageing population, the reform of pensions and of the social security systems are not enough for ensuring the long-term financial sustainability, the Commission requesting measures that would allow for "coordinating the pensions reform with the national demographic situation". In this context, recommendations are made for diminishing public debt under the threshold of 60%, including by reforming the public pension systems. At national level, the recommendations and policy measures initiated by governments are varied as impact and severity, with a different potential of adjustment/adequacy of the pension system to particular requirements of ensuring long-term sustainability and correlation with the social assistance measure package for the third age.

For EU-15 countries the pension systems have a history based on the three pillars, well-defined and with a private component integrated into the system long time ago. Transition countries developed an adjusted/adequate public system to the market economy, or in the best circumstances, reformed to which is attached a private system under construction. As result, the reform of the public system under conditions of economic crisis and budgetary restrictions of various intensities, is the more important for countries that cannot support themselves by a coherent and performance private system and that face issues related to the general level of incomes and the capacity of the public pension of ensuring adequate incomes in old age. Additionally, these countries have also poorly developed social assistance systems for third-age individuals, still inadequate to current and future circumstances, or which are still under construction and not always with a clearly defined and agreed on intergenerational responsibility and/or the involvement of the state as artisan of minimal social conditions.

Without performing a detailed analysis of the public pension systems with the EU-27, we shall present some of the current guidelines regarding the PAYG pillar reform, from the viewpoint of its sustainability[7].

The reform of the pension systems based on restricting access, of increasing the contribution period, the retirement age, etc, under conditions of diminishing labour incomes which are the backbone of constituting social funds and budgetary sources of the state for social assistance generate reverse effects and intergenerational pressures, imbalances on the labour market, diminishment of replacement flows of contributors' basis and, finally the decrease of required financial resources. A comparative analysis of demographic ageing costs emphasises the following aspects:

- public pensions represent the most important component of social costs, with an increasing trend, mainly due to a growing number of beneficiaries, and they are followed by health expenditures;

- the ageing dynamics differ on countries and the increase estimated is of up to 15.3 pp from GDP in Luxemburg. In Romania the estimated increase is of 7.4 pp which means almost doubling the expenditures with pensions, and puts the country into the group of countries with a high pressure on budgetary expenditures for pensions; of 12 July 2011 on the implementation of the broad guidelines for the economic policies of the Member States whose currency is the euro (2011/C 217/05), Official Journal of the European Union, C217/15

---

[6] http://ec.europa.eu/europe2020/pdf/recommendations_2011/dts_737_euro_en.pdf

[7] The build-up of the national multi-tiered models is extensively presented and periodically analysed in EU and OECD documents, fact for which we consider as important in the current paper to present the adjustments triggered by the convergence of the systems and by the ones associated with the financial crisis, with emphasis on the development, performances and perspectives of the private pensions' systems, as a constant for a performance system, based on the complementariness between individual's responsibility and the one of the society for decent, active and comfortable ageing under the aspect of incomes and of the quality of life.

- a hierarchy of pensions' pressure on budgetary costs places Romania on the 17th position after the 2010 level of pensions expenditures in GDP, next to Malta and Luxemburg and on the 5th position under the aspect of their expected increase, after Luxemburg, Cyprus, Greece and Slovenia; as compared with the European average, the share of pensions in GDP for Romania is of 8.4%, inferior to the European average of 10.2% and by 5.6 pp lower than in Italy, country which has the highest share and by 3.3 pp over the minimum European value recorded in Latvia. But, this relative ranking hides significant differences of the policies and, particularly, of the performances for public pension funds.

Increase of costs associated with demographic ageing within the EU

% in GDP	Pensions		Medical Assistance		Long-term Assistance		Unemployment		Total
	2010	Change 2010-2060	2010	Change 2010-2060	2010	Change 2010-2060	2010	Change 2010-2060	2010	Change 2010-2060
RO	8,4	7,4	3,6	1,3	0	0	2,7	-0,2	14,7	8,5
EU	10,2	2,3	6,8	1,4	1,3	1,1	4,9	-0,2	23,2	4,6
Italy	14,0	-0,4	5,9	1,0	1,7	1,2	4,3	-0,2	26,0	1,6
France	13,5	0,6	8,2	1,1	1,5	0,7	5,8	-0,2	29,0	2,2
Austria	12,7	1,0	6,6	1,4	1,3	1,2	5,2	-0,2	25,7	3,3
Portugal	11,9	1,5	7,3	1,8	0,1	0,1	5,6	-0,4	24,9	2,9
Greece	11,6	12,5	5,1	1,3	1,5	2,1	3,8	0,1	21,9	16,0
Poland	10,8	-2,1	4,1	0,8	0,4	0,7	3,8	-0,6	19,1	-1,1
Finland	10,7	2,6	5,6	0,8	1,9	2,5	6,4	0,0	24,7	5,9
Hungary	10,5	0,6	5,8	1,3	0,3	0,4	4,5	-0,3	21,0	2,0
Belgium	10.3	4,5	7,7	1,1	1,5	1,3	7,3	-0,3	26,8	6,6
Germany	10,2	2,5	7,6	1,6	1,0	1,4	4,6	-0,4	23,3	5,1
Slovenia	10,1	8,5	6,8	1,7	1,2	1,7	5,1	0,7	23,1	12,7
Sweden	9,6	-0,2	7,3	0,7	3,5	2,2	6,6	0,0	27,1	2,7
Denmark	9,4	-0,2	6,0	0,9	1,8	1,5	8,0	0,1	25,2	2,2
Bulgaria	9,1	2,2	4,8	0,6	0,2	0,2	3,0	0,2	17,1	3,2
Spain	8,9	6,2	5,6	1,6	0,7	0,7	4,8	-0,2	20,0	8,3
Luxemburg	8,6	15,3	5,9	1,1	1,4	2,0	4,0	-0,3	19,9	18,2
Malta	8,3	5,1	4,9	3,1	1,0	1,6	5,0	-0,7	19,2	9,2
Czech R.	7,1	4,0	6,4	2,0	0,2	0,4	3,3	0,0	17,0	6,3
Cyprus	6,9	10,8	2,8	0,6	0,0	0,0	5,8	-0,6	15,5	10,7
United Kingdom	6,7	2,5	7,6	1,8	0,8	0,5	4,0	0,0	19,2	4,8
Slovakia	6,6	3,6	5,2	2,1	0,2	0,4	2,9	-0,6	14,9	5,5
Netherlands	6,5	4,0	4,9	0,9	3,5	4,6	5,6	-0,2	20,5	9,4
Lithuania	6,5	4,9	4,6	1,0	0,5	0,6	3,5	-0,4	15,1	6,0
Estonia	6,4	-1,6	5,1	1,1	0,1	0,1	3,2	0,3	14,8	-0,1
Ireland	5,5	5,9	5,9	1,7	0,9	1,3	5,3	-0,2	17,5	8,7
Latvia	5,1	0,0	3,5	0,5	0,4	0,5	3,3	0,3	12,3	1,3

Source: Belgian Stability Programme (2011-2014), p 55

In fact, it is considered that active ageing represents a sustainable solution for counteracting both the effects of demographic ageing and of the crisis, the reforms within pension systems having, mainly, for the largest part of the member states three general coordinates: increasing the legal retirement age, diminishing access to early-retirement schemes and diminishing implicit taxation for supporting continued activity for elderly (Regional Economic Outlook: Europe, Oct 2011, FMI)

A brief synthesis of EC recommendations from 12 July 2011 regarding the reform of the pension systems includes as main required measures and recommends their implementation, the following: limiting access to early retirement and special schemes; extending the contribution period, and increasing the retirement age (with gender uniformity, establishing relationships between benefits and actual demographic and economic conditions, stimulating employment as alternative or in complementariness, stimulating optional/private insurance, etc.

Measures for ensuring the sustainability of pensions' systems and increasing the effective retirement age

Measures	Countries
Limiting access to early retirement schemes	AT (for persons with long insurance periods), BE, BG, DK (reform of very early retirement schemes VERP), LU, MT, FR
Revision of the accelerated pension system for public officers, diminishing pension by 10% for newly entered into the system and indexing pensions with inflation.	IE,
Diminishing pensions	PT
Low taxes on pensions	SE
Change of the pensions' indexing system	RO, SK,
Limited access to invalidity pensions	AT
Increasing the standard retirement age	AT, BE, BG, IE, LU, MT, NL, PL, RO,ES, UK (from 65 la 66), FR (from 65 to 67)
Harmonising/equalising the retirement age for women and men	AT, RO,
Establishing a relationship between the standard retirement age and the development of life expectancy at birth	BE, CY, CZ, FI, LU, MT, NL, PL, RO, SK, ES,
Determining a strict relationship between benefits and contributions	EL, RO,
Increasing the standard contribution period	BG, CY, RO, ES,
Promoting attractive participation schemes for wider contribution to the system	CZ,
Maintaining low rates for the pension funds' administrative costs and ensuring transparency	CZ,
Policies for stimulating employment for elderly	BG, DK („flex-job" system), LT, MT,
Measures preventing the increase of poverty risks for elderly	CY
Measures for ensuring the sustainability of the public pillar	CZ, FR, EL, IE, LU, NL, RO, SK, SI, UK, FR (balance in 2018)
Measures for stimulating participation to private insurance and savings systems for old-age	CZ, MT
Eliminating the feeding of the private pensions feeding and transfer of already accumulated sums to pillar I PAYG	HU,
Diminishing transfers to private pensions (temporary)	IE, LV,

Source: Selection based on 2011 Report on Public Finances in EMU, European Economy 3/2011, EC, Directorate General for Economic and Financial Affaires

The majority of recommended or assumed measures by the governments aims in-depth and radical changes for long-term/final which imply the calculation methodology or the access conditions to various forms of pensions. Other measures consider short-time periods and do not change the build of the system, only its enforcement. From the latter category we mention the measures taken and/or foreseen by Portugal: progressive diminishment of pensions higher than 1500 Euro, in 2011, suspending indexation and freezing pensions for 2012 (save for the lower ones)[8].

For some countries no concrete measures are stipulated, that would aim to reform or restrictions regarding the management of the pension funds, but indirect measures are recommended for stimulating the participation to private systems, among others by diminishing compulsory social contributions to various funds (neutral budgetary manner). Among these countries we mention EE, FR ('niches fiscales'), and DE.

The reforms were accompanied in some cases by the (re)construction/development of the institutional system, like in France, where a public body was created "Comité de pilotage des régimes de retraite" which presents some yearly analyses on the pension accounts and makes proposals for adjusting policies in the field.

[8] Portugal: Memorandum of understanding on specific economic policy conditionality, 3 May 2011, http://www.ste.pt/actualidade/2011/05/memorandotroika_04-05-2011.pdf

The EU recommendations consider also particular measures, depending on the possibilities of each state and on the build of the national pension system, for ensuring the separate sustainability of each pension pillar. To this end, the measures taken by the member states were extremely different:

- In Hungary eliminating the compulsory private pillar and funds' transfer back to the public pillar;

- Greece: a new reform of the pensions' system in 2012, after the recent one of 2010 for ensuring the sustainability of the state pillar. The reform includes both legislative measures for public and private pensions based on the analysis of the National Actuarial Authority and considers, among others, the auxiliary funds of pension and the welfare funds: diminishing the number of funds, eliminating deficits and ensuring medium- and long-term sustainability for secondary schemes by relating contributions to benefits. It is projected to freeze nominal supplemental pension and adjust the replacement rate for funds with deficit, as well as constituting a computerised system of individual accounts of pensions[9];

- Ireland: increasing the retirement age for the social welfare pension from 65 to 68 years of age in the interval 2014-28 and implementing a single scheme for pensions for the newly entered within the public system which will relate the retirement age to the pension level and average career earnings and annual inflation[10].

- Romania: freezing for 2011 the level of transfers to pillar II at the level of 3 per cents, in order to attenuate the deficit of the public pillar; for 2012 the intention is to increase contribution to 3,5%, but this is conditioned by the economic growth perspectives and on finding the financial sources for covering the deficit of the PAYG system. At the same time, the passing of the legislation for implementing the pillar of occupational pensions is postponed.

Some countries, like Latvia have developed strategic documents that envisage a general rethinking of the pensions system that shall be implemented as of 2012 and by which is pursued ensuring the long-term sustainability of the 3 pension pillars. The intention is that as the economic situation turns around to return to the contribution for pillar II of 6% from the gross wage up to 2013. In a similar manner is reformed the pension system from Latvia, the secondary legislation undergoing approval procedures, in parallel with fiscal measures for maintaining on the labour market individuals of retirement age (eliminating fiscal instruments to restrict the continuation of retirement age persons on the labour market).

Private pensions – role in building-up the pension system for transition countries

The social model on one hand, and the culture of savings on the other hand, determine the role and place of private pensions for each country, and their capacity of satisfactorily supplementing old-age incomes is related to the development level, the average level of incomes as compared with the poverty threshold and the consumption model.

The PAYG system is the backbone of the pension system for the majority of European countries. Several countries have supplemented statutory pensions with a pillar based on defined contributions and in many instances managed in a private system by specialised financial institutions. . Other states have in place, or complementary an occupational and individual system. In some instances, the occupational systems are of the PAYG-type by book reserves constituted by the employer, or by schemes managed by pension or insurance funds (group insurance contracts). Individual pensions have as basis individual contracts signed with the private pensions' provider – in general an insurance company or a private pensions' fund. Individual contributions are accumulated and invested, and the final sums are the basis of the individual pension. The participation to the occupational and individual pension schemes may be compulsory or voluntary, and in some countries it is used as an alternative to the compulsory pension schemes.

[9] IMF, Greece: Letter of Intent, Memorandum of Economic and Financial Policies, and Technical Memorandum of Understanding, 28 February 2011, http://www.imf.org/external/np/loi/2011/grc/022811.pdf

[10] EC, Memorandum of understanding between the EU and Ireland, Brussels 20.5.2011 SEC(2011) XXX final, http://www.finance.gov.ie/documents/publications/other/2011/moumay2011.pdf

If we would analyse the importance of private pensions, we must consider a series of elements, that is:

- current level of development for private pensions and their history;
- population participation to the life insurance systems of the pensions type and their share against total private pensions;
- level and build-up model of compulsory private pensions;
- possibility of the population to participate to optional old-age insurance systems and their propensity for using this market instrument as compared with the traditional ones of bank savings, or securities;

The countries from the last integration wave (EU 10+2) are in different stages of implementing the multi-pillar system, the most advanced ones being Hungary, the Czech Republic, and Poland. The reform is delayed in Lithuania, Slovakia and Romania for pillar II (compulsory private pensions), and optional private pensions were enforced as of 2004 in Lithuania and are still under implementation in Romania.

Development of non-PAYG components in EU transition countries

Country	Pillar II Compulsory Pensions	Pillar III Optional Pensions
Hungary	1998	1994
Czech R	unavailable	1994
Poland	1999	1999
Slovenia	2000	2000
Latvia	2001	1998
Bulgaria	2002	1994
Estonia	2002	1998
Croatia	2002	2002
Lithuania	2004	2004
Slovakia	2005	1997
Romania	2007	2007

Source: APAPR, http://www.aparp.ro

A multi-tiered system in which the emphasis changes towards private pensions as solutions for long-term performance of old-age insurances is not a new orientation (OECD 1992, IMF 1997) and begins with two considerations: the limits of the Bismark modeland the relationship between contributions and benefits at individual level. The diversity of models and the development degree of industrial relations defined and developed a large diversity of occupational funds and a private system that depend on the quality of the social dialogue and the availability of individual incomes. In fact, the existence and performance of the Bismark-type systems (insurance related to obtained incomes) and of the Beveridge-type (basic/minimum pension for all – social pension) have triggered the availability and use of optional and occupational private systems. Yet, the lack of individual optional insurance culture and the low level of economic development associated with low incomes have promoted during the last years in transition countries the implementation of the compulsory private system for those active population cohorts for whom the period remaining for contributing to the system is relevant under the aspect of "building-up" an adequate supplemental private pension (for Romania the participation to the private system is compulsory for individuals up to 35 years of age, and for those aged between 35 and 45 years of age the participation is optional and performance depends on the level of insurance, and for those above 45 years of age the system is irrelevant under the aspect of the resulting pension).

The increase of labour mobility in the last decades, associated with the change of the employment model and the development of open career and the dynamic of creating new jobs generated by the absorption of RDI outcomes and of promoting LLL on one hand, and the relative rigidity of the transfer between funds on the other hand, have diminished the interest for occupational pensions, allowing for the development of the optional private insurance for old-age.

The main factor supporting or inhibiting the participation to private pensions is represented by the conversion rate between the income on retirement and the total incomes from compulsory old-age insurance systems. Development countries, such as France, Switzerland, the Netherlands, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, Italy, United Kingdom have generous insurance schemes, supported by the economic performances, in various combinations of the PAYG pillar with the occupational one and the promotion of a minimal income of old-age incomes. Others, such as Luxemburg have a strong and on surplus PAYG pillar that allows for continuing the policy even under crisis conditions, without restrictions, but only by modernising the system and strengthening sustainability.

The replacement rate of incomes with public pension (and additionally with the occupational one) is on decrease, same as the long-term financial sustainability of the PAYG system reason for which currently all states consider private pensions as a complementariness alternative (Ebbinghaus B., Gronwald M., 2009)[11]. Yet, access to optional private pension is limited by the supplementary financial effort, the associated costs and high risk of final benefits, being less accessible to those with low incomes.

For some transition countries, the private pension system developed as optional pillar and/or with a compulsory component (Hungary, Romania).

Characteristics and architecture of the Romanian pension system

The pension system in Romania is a multi-pillared one and, theoretically, includes the following categories of pensions:

- the public pillar PAYG, initially adopted and reformed in 2000 and 2010 introducing the calculation algorithm of the personal contribution "history"; there is a minimum and standard period of contribution for access to the pension right of the DC type. Currently the system is regulated by Law no. 263/2010 regarding the unitary public pensions system;

- the compulsory private pillar, constituted by partial and gradual transfer from total individual contribution to old-age social insurance system (to 6% in 2016) with capitalisation of the DC type, compulsory for persons up to 35 years of age in the implementation year, and optional for those aged between 35 and 45 years of age; currently the number of contributors to the system is of about 5,5 million persons, and the share of corresponding assets' volume in GDP is of 0,5% (Hungary 10%, Poland 14%, Bulgaria 4%) – data of CSSPP (Law 411/2004, with subsequent amendments, enforced as of July 2007);

- occupational pension schemes for which the specific legislation is undergoing reviewing/amendments and the implementation of which follows to be realised in the next future, after passing new regulations; in accordance with the Law Draft regarding occupational pensions, the right to propose an occupational pensions' scheme pertains to the employer, alone or in association with other employers, and by consulting the representatives of the employees. Also, the occupational pension schemes would follow to be supplied by managers based on a prospect. At the same time, the managers collect contributions, invest financial resources of the occupational pension funds, and pay occupational pensions[12];

[11] Ebbinghaus B., Gronwald M., 2009, The Changing Public-Private Pension Mix in Europe: from the Path Dependence to Path Departure, http://www2.asanet.org/sectionchs/09conf/Ebbinghaus.pdf

- individual pension schemes, based on life insurances of the pension-type supplied by national and international insurance companies, regulated by Law 204/2006 applicable as of June 2006; Pillar III is the name given to the system of optional pensions, managed by private companies, a system based on individual accounts and optional adhesion. The contributors to this system number almost 212 thousand persons with a fund under 300 million Lei (2010, CSSPP data). As opposed to "compulsory private pensions" (Pillar II), the legislation for Pillar III does not forbid the participation to optional pensions depending on age, anyone being able to contribute to the system with up to 15% from the monthly gross achieved incomes. In order to benefit of an optional pension, the legal conditions impose for each contributor to have at least 90 monthly contributions (not necessarily consecutive) made to the fund, up to an age of at least 60 years, and a minimum accumulated sum[13].

In conclusion, the current contribution scheme for Romania to the pensions' system includes 3 sources of constituting the pension, with the involvement of the state and private national/international market operators. The system develops the voluntary savings side and was reformed for answering better to the profile of the contributor, as to be anticipative, stimulative, and allowing for correlating benefits depending on contribution.

The scheme of the pension insurance system in Romania for the year 2011

System structure	State involvement	Employer's involvement	Individual contribution	Components structure
Pillar I	YES	Compulsory	Compulsory	Employee/employer contributions
Pillar II Compulsory private pension	YES	compulsory	Compulsory up to 35 years of age Optional – 35-45 years of age (in 2007)	Contribution transfer of up to 6% from pillar I
Pillar III Optional private pension	NO	Optional	Optional	Up to maximum 15% from individual incomes

Source: based on enforced legislation for 2011

Contributions to the public pension funds increased in the last two decades from 17%[14] of the gross income bill 31,3% for normal labour conditions (41,3% for special conditions), from which is born by the employer to a share of 20,8% (25,8% – special labour conditions, 30,8% – exceptional labour conditions) and by the employee in percent of 10,5 % for normal labour conditions (10,5% – special labour conditions, 10,5% – exceptional labour conditions). From the compulsory contribution of each employee that fulfils the conditions and is affiliated to a private pensions' fund (selected individually or by automated redistribution), thus in 2011 were redistributed to the compulsory private pensions' fund 3 pp and other 3.5 pp shall be transferred in 2012.

The optional pension has as basis the individual choice and presupposes additional payment. The eligible individuals may contribute to several optional pension funds provided that the maximum contribution limit imposed by law is not exceeded (Law 204/2006 regarding optional pensions, with subsequent changes and amendments). Moreover, to pillar III may contribute also employers, providing thus for actual benefits for their employees. The contribution to this pillar (pillar III) is stimulated by assuring through the Fiscal Code the facility of fiscal deductions of employee's and employer's contributions. In 2011, for contributions born by employers on behalf of their employees, these benefit from the exclusion from the calculation basis of the taxes of the contributions of social insurances (including the insurance contribution for work accidents and professional diseases), to the deductibility limit established by law, respectively the equivalent in Lei of the amount of 400 Euro yearly, for each participant. The own contribution of the employee to Pillar Iii is considered deductible on calculating the tax on wage earnings to the same limit.

[12] http://www.romanialibera.ro/bani-afaceri/economie/legea-pensiilor-ocupationale-in-dezbatere-publica-16077.html

[13] http://www.csspp.ro/pilonul-3

[14] http://www.mmuncii.ro/pub/imagemanager/images/file/Statistica/Statistici%20lunare/Evolutia%20valorii%20cotelor%20de%20CAS%202011.pdf

The expenditures with pensions in Romania are lower as share in GDP than in the majority of EU member countries. For instance, according to the Eurostat statistics, in 2009 the expenditures on pensions[15] (last available data) represented 9,4% in GDP, close to the ones in Luxemburg, yet lower by 3,6 pp than the EU-27 average and by 6,6 pp lower than in Italy which recorded the highest value for this indicator.

Share of expenditures on pensions in GDP, for the years 2005, 2008 and 2009 (%)

	2005	2008	2009
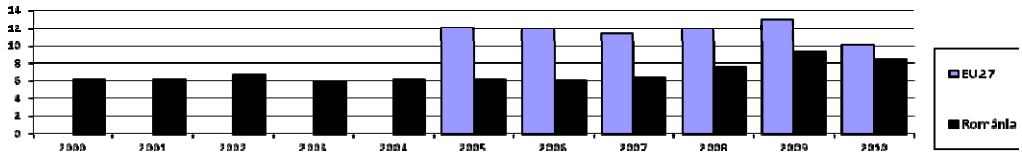
EU (27 countries)	12.15	12.05	13.07
Norway	7.97	7.64	8.79
Bulgaria	7.57	7.02	8.80
Romania	6.19	7.61	9.41
Luxembourg	9.57	8.30	9.45
Spain	:	9.26	10.10
Slovenia	10.33	9.63	10.89
Denmark	10.99	11.08	12.06
Belgium	11.16	11.32	12.14
Sweden (2004)	12.15	12.15	12.15
Switzerland (2008)	:	12.15	12.15
United Kingdom	10.76	11.35	12.53
Finland	11.18	10.80	12.57
Netherlands	12.54	12.01	12.83
Germany	13.37	12.32	13.14
Portugal	12.34	13.20	14.12
France	13.30	13.67	14.51
Austria	14.17	14.02	15.06
Italy	14.71	14.96	16.03

Source: http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/portal/page/portal/social_protection/data/main_tables

[15] The 'Pensions' aggregate comprises part of periodic cash benefits under the disability, old-age, survivors and unemployment functions. It is defined as the sum of the following social benefits: disability pension, early-retirement due to reduced capacity to work, old-age pension, anticipated old-age pension, partial pension, survivors' pension, early-retirement benefit for labour market reasons.

Under the aspect of their evolution in time, as of 2000 when the reform was initiated, the share of expenditures with pensions in GDP increased about 1,5 times from 6,11% to 9,41%, and more considerable in 2007.

Share of expenditures with pension in GDP (%)



Source: http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/portal/page/portal/social_protection/data/main_tables

The old-age social benefits as share in total social benefits[16] represent for Romania 47,4%, being exceeded only by Poland and Italy which denotes a social insurance system centred on pensions. Against the EU-27 average, the share of pension benefits is by about 8 pp higher, and against Ireland with the lowest share, it is over 26 pp. Due to this structure, any imbalance in the public pensions system has a higher magnitude on the social insurance budget and the risk associated to individuals with social vulnerabilities increases.

Share of old-age benefits in total social benefits, 2000-2009

	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004	2005	2006	2007	2008	2009
EU27	:	:	:	:	:	38.97	39.02	38.89	39.69	38.97
Ireland	19.50	19.09	22.58	23.03	22.57	22.25	22.53	22.39	21.84	21.11
Iceland	28.55	27.66	28.07	27.74	28.02	28.60	28.63	22.62	22.33	21.22
Luxemburg	36.85	26.20	26.28	26.11	25.87	26.32	26.75	27.38	26.79	27.27
Norway	29.41	29.23	28.83	28.20	28.52	29.44	29.87	30.34	30.58	30.08
Spain	34.85	34.41	33.96	33.11	32.71	32.35	32.35	32.47	32.04	31.28
Belgium	33.33	33.70	33.42	32.60	32.43	32.36	32.99	32.23	32.72	32.68
Germany	32.95	33.38	33.30	33.61	34.30	34.46	34.78	34.87	34.65	33.11
Netherlands	37.05	36.35	35.98	35.42	36.54	37.37	35.20	36.12	35.82	35.18
Finland	31.85	32.64	33.00	33.22	33.25	33.65	34.26	34.96	34.61	35.34
Slovakia	32.17	33.21	33.37	35.45	36.99	39.08	38.48	38.27	37.14	36.78
Denmark	38.05	37.95	37.64	37.20	37.17	37.51	37.87	38.10	38.38	37.13
Cyprus	41.27	39.62	41.53	39.98	41.40	39.99	39.61	40.22	38.97	38.48
Slovenia	43.24	43.63	44.68	43.28	43.31	42.36	38.09	39.48	38.53	38.83
France	38.41	38.47	37.07	36.94	37.03	37.36	38.06	38.67	39.39	39.20
Hungary	35.76	36.67	37.63	35.90	36.64	36.50	36.35	37.80	39.38	39.63
Sweden	37.08	36.89	36.64	37.18	37.25	37.78	37.41	38.62	39.95	40.23
Lithuania	43.70	43.14	42.98	43.18	42.68	42.13	40.49	42.82	40.97	40.57

[16] Social benefits consist of transfers, in cash or in kind, by social protection schemes to households and individuals to relieve them of the burden of a defined set of risks or needs. The functions (or risks) are: sickness/healthcare, disability, old age, survivors, family/children, unemployment, housing, social exclusion not elsewhere classified.

Greece	46.39	48.10	47.15	47.44	47.38	47.76	43.24	43.57	42.43	41.35
Estonia	43.38	42.50	43.61	44.01	42.86	43.14	44.36	42.97	42.29	41.89
Czech R.	38.84	38.30	37.87	36.72	36.92	38.36	38.97	39.76	41.88	41.94
Austria	39.67	40.02	40.08	40.09	40.22	40.61	41.26	41.84	42.18	42.35
United Kingdom	44.43	42.44	41.69	41.26	41.21	41.74	41.20	38.17	42.79	42.62
Malta	39.76	41.76	40.70	39.95	39.51	41.05	42.08	42.35	42.49	42.92
Portugal	37.60	38.65	38.55	39.28	40.09	41.24	42.15	42.93	44.24	43.54
Latvia	55.82	53.75	53.90	50.66	48.37	46.32	44.58	43.78	43.67	45.21
Switzerland	47.31	47.03	45.03	44.01	44.46	44.13	44.55	45.64	45.98	:
Bulgaria	:	:	:	:	:	46.53	47.81	46.84	45.03	46.76
Romania	41.43	42.79	43.18	40.56	42.77	39.93	41.50	41.72	46.24	47.39
Poland	44.47	45.33	45.95	46.73	48.48	48.27	49.48	49.04	48.73	50.71
Italy	52.48	51.56	51.66	51.85	51.00	50.67	50.79	51.55	51.46	50.81

Source: http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/portal/page/portal/social_protection/data/main_tables

It should be noted that the share of old-age benefits increased from under 40% in 2005, to more than 47% in 2009 and more heightened during the crisis.

If we refer to absolute values per person in PPS, then we can nuance our previous findings with the following:

Romania allots for old-age benefits 27.66% from the EU-27 level in 2009, against only 17.72% in 2000 the highest growth within the EU was recorded, of over 3 times of the value per capita expressed in PPS, more marked after 2005

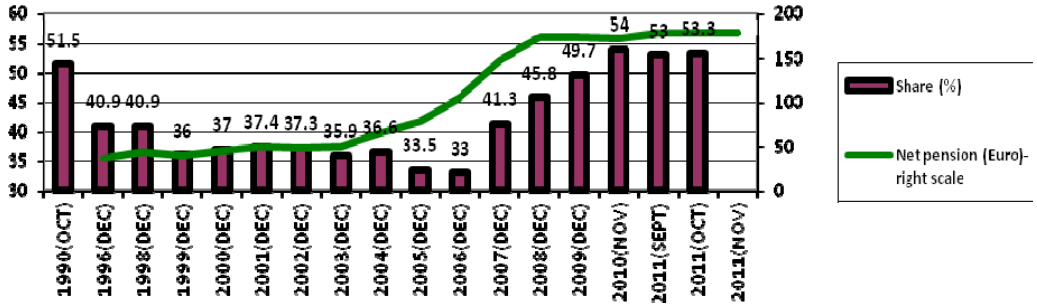
The public pension pillar ensures currently a net average level of the pension of less than 50% from the net wage at national level and the average pension is of about 178 Euros.

Net pension from public pillar (Euro) and share of pension of net average wage (%)



Source: http://www.cnpas.org/portal/media-type/html/language/ro/user/anon/page/default.psml/template/ generic?url=%2Fcontent%2Fcnpas%2Fstatistics.html&title=Indicatori+statistici+pilon+I

Taking into account the cost of living, in particular housing expenditures in the urban area to which are added the specific costs for the third age (health and specific services) it can be appreciated that the minimum pension (about 81 Euros/month) is insufficient for ensuring decent

In the last years Romania pursued the reform of the public pension system, unifying funds for different professional categories and building-up the compulsory private system and the optional one. The factors that triggered the shaping of the multi-tiered system were similar to the ones in other countries, respectively: life-span increase, respectively the pensioners live longer and benefit for a longer period from the public pension, the PAYG system being incapable of ensuring the obligations assumed towards the beneficiaries, with an economic dependency ratio in marked deterioration, the number of contributors to the public systems of social insurances decreasing and the public pensions no longer being able to ensure decent replacement rates, adequate for the pensioners.

Even though initiated in 2000, the reform of the pensions' system for developing pillar II – compulsory and private – was started 8 years later by feeding from initially paid contributions to the public pillar. The legal framework was also created for the occupational pensions. In parallel operated also the system of life insurances under the form of private pensions, until the implementation of compulsory private pensions, constituting the only form of insurance with capitalisation and payments (integrally or gradually) after fulfilment of the retirement age. To the compulsory private system in the month of October 2011 contributed within the system 5516038 individuals, with a fund of over 40,2 million Euros. Among contributors, 51,7% were men and the distribution on age groups indicated: 28,7% for up to 25 years of age, 41,5% with ages between 25and 35 years of age and 39,8% for those over 35 de years of age (CNPAS data)[17].

The increase of the economic dependency ratio of elderly persons due to demographic ageing and diminishment of the number of contributors to the system (lower entries on labour market and exits due to labour mobility and definitive migration) generated deficits in fund's growth. In order to ensure long-term sustainability the shift was made to a new restructuring stage of the system, first by recalculating pensions by introducing the system of determining the history of individual contributions and then by rethinking its build-up for the purpose of ensuring long-term sustainability. The strategy in the field of pensions provides for: balancing and strengthening the public pensions' system; diversifying the insurance resources of old-age incomes; creating insurance resources for labour accidents and professional diseases. The reform is still underway, and in parallel changes were brought to the law of pensions, the objectives for the period 2009-2012 established by CNPAS being: assuring the financial sustainability of the public pensions' system based on the principle of contribution and social solidarity; eliminating inequities and anomalies still existing in the public pension system; reaching a target of 45% from the gross average wage on economy of the pension point (in October 2011 it was of 36.5%) under the conditions of public pensions' system sustainability; ensuring a minimum guaranteed social pension that would add the pension of up to 350 Lei monthly for all pensioners with a pension quantum under this stipulated amount, financed from the state budget; eliminating inequities with respect to pensions for persons employed in the former labour categories I and II, as well as for special and exceptional labour conditions, in accordance with the provisions of Law no. 218/2000; enforcing the provisions of the new legislation regarding the public pensions' system for farmers[18].

The reform aims to key parameters of the pensions' system construction, respectively indexing pensions by inflation and not depending on the development of the average wage on economy, limiting discretionary increases of some pension categories, extending the taxation basis by including also some public officer employees who were excepted by the old system. The scheme of increasing the retirement age is continued, also the one of closing the gap and then equalizing the standard age between men and women, and relating the standard retirement age to the life expectancy at birth. In parallel, support programmes shall be developed for sustaining poor elderly. The building-up of the compulsory private pillar is continued by the annual increase of the contribution to the fund. The target of the reform is to ensure a transfer rate pension-wage at the time of retirement of 45% on the background of ensuring (gradually) the sustainability of each pillar[19]. In the new memorandum signed with IMF are included as reform measures of the pension system: freezing for 2011 the value of the pension point and enforcing the reformed legislative framework in the field for ensuring the sustainability of the private pensions' pillar[20].

[17] http://www.cnpas.org/portal/media-type/html/language/ro/user/anon/page/contributions.psml/template/generic?url=%2Fcontent%2Fcnpas%2Fstatistics2.html&title=Indicatori+statistici+pilon+II

[18] http://www.cnpas.org/portal/media-type/html/language/ro/user/anon/page/ integration.psml/template /generic?url=%2Fcontent%2Fcnpas%2Fobjectives.html&title=Obiective

In conclusion, the reform of the pensions' system by leaving aside consideration about consistent participation to the private system is of less performance for the majority of future pensioners. If we refer to the fiscal deductibility for supplementary pension insurances provided for by law, we can appreciate that the minimum conditions are met for stimulating the additional insurance, yet the quantum of the additional contribution benefiting of fiscal deductibility is much too low as compared with the savings need for ensuring a financially comfortable wage-pension conversion. Moreover, the insurance risk is double: on one hand the risk of receiving a diminished pension or cessation of payments to pillar I, under conditions of chronic deficits of the PAYG fund; on the other hand, the market risks for private funds. Finally, the risk that the final aggregated pension is insufficient at the level of maximal contributions under the conditions of integrally making use of the fiscal facilities. Recent studies (AVIVA, 2011[21]) have shown that the savings need for a decent pension is proportional with the age, respectively the total period of contribution. The average yearly deficit of pension savings is of 3700 Euros/year for the persons from Romania who retire between 2011 and 2051(in Poland is of 3400, in the Czech Republic of 4600 and Hungary 1900), which is equivalent with about 300 Euros/month and a total amount of 40,2 billion Euros, the equivalent of 35% from GDP in 2009 If we consider the age of persons in 2010, the average deficit of savings/person is of 4800 Euros/year for those of 50 years of age, 2900 for individuals of 40 years of age, 1700 for those of 30 years and of only 1300 for the ones aged 20 years, respectively almost 120 Euros/month (for 11 months of savings per year). If we consider the deductibility limit of 15% at total monthly earnings it is obvious that the gross monthly income should be at least 800 Euros/month, an amount that is hardly accessible to a young graduate and not only, particularly that the average gross wage in October 2011 was of about 467 Euros.

In fact, any actuarial calculation taking into account DC or DB for contributors from Romania, by using the input data of the analysis based on: the maximum level of fiscal deductibility (400 Euros), the contribution limit to the private optional pension (15% from monthly earnings) leads us either to required amounts to be saved by the systems of public pensions that are hardly accessible for those with low and average incomes, or to insignificant complementary sums. Currently, such official estimates are inexistent and cannot be made in a systematic manner[22]. Such determinations were made by the experts already in the year 2005[23], and more recently by companies operating on

[19] IMF, Romania: Letter of intent and technical memorandum of understanding, 24 April 2009

[20] IMF, Romania: Letter of intent and technical memorandum of understanding, 10 March 2011

[21] Document-2011-09-22-7812507-0-raport-deficitul-pensii.pdf The study quantifies for the first time the savings deficit at Pan-European level. The analysis realised by Deloitte on Aviva commission quantifies the savings deficit for pensions in Europe and separately in the countries where Aviva operates, such as Romania. The savings deficit for pensions refers to the gap between the income individuals retiring in the period 2011 to 2051 will require for an adequate living standard on retirement and the estimated level of the pension.

[22] CSSPP opinion: Currently there is no law has been passed for pensions' payment, nor the secondary law applicable to it that contains provisions about the payment manner, including here also types of pensions, mortality tables, computation formula, etc. Thus, at present, we cannot realize any estimate about the yearly saved amount that could lead to a private pension of one unit. After the emergence of the applicable legislation to the payment of private pension we shall be able to make first scenarios that shall be made available to the large public.

[23] http://hermes-ir.lib.hit-u.ac.jp/rs/bitstream/10086/14248/1/pie_dp268.pdf Vasile. V, Zaman. Gh., Romania's pension system between present restrictions and future exigencies, p 19 "..Additionally, the 200 Euros/year deduction from personal incomes taxation for participating to the system could not be considered as an incentive because it the private pensions' market (the AVIVA study)[24]. The future development of the private pensions' pillar and its value is determined by several factors among which the most important are the yield obtained in investing the assets and the level of cashed contributions.

Conclusions

One of the priorities of each modern state is to create a legal framework that would allow for organising a pension system as sustainable as possible and realistic which is capable of assuring for the citizens reaching the retirement age a decent and careless living standard as much as possible, even under the conditions of the existence of some performance pension systems both public and private, at the time of retirement a dramatic diminishment of income takes place yet without an according diminishment of the level of expenditures. As result, the living standard to which each citizen was accustomed is difficult, if not impossible, to maintain.

Elderly persons represent a human capital that is under-used at present from the perspective of active involvement/participation to community life and to sustaining the economic and social development at local level. The extension of the period of financial independence for elderly against public social assistance services can be realised both by ensuring comfortable incomes on exiting the labour market through diversified pension-type benefits, and by providing for the possibility of continuing the activity and completing pension incomes with ones achieved on the labour market.

The developments of the last years have highlighted the issues of the current system of old-age insurances and the vulnerability, in particular of the public pensions' system against conjectural developments of the economy.

The crisis has proved that: a) the present operational pension systems must be rethought, reanalysed, and improved in particular from the perspective of ensuring the financial sustainability; b) more efforts should be made in order to improve the efficiency and safety of the pension schemes that would provide elderly with means for decent living. The pension systems are faced with hard difficulties in fulfilling their "pension promises" due to increased unemployment, to recession and to the volatility of the financial market. EU Member-States are in various stages of (re)forming the insurance and social assistance systems, in particular the pensions' system. In Central and Eastern Europe, Romania was the most delayed country in the process of pensions' reform and shifting to the system of private pensions. The reform of the pensions' system in Romania began, practically, only in 2000 when the new pension law was passed (Law 19/2000) and enforced as of 2001. Up to the current year repeated revisions took place of the old pension law, the financial issues of the system were partially improved/solved by sequential measures, without a long-term strategy which deepened and created even (new) inequities within the system.

The demographic developments of the last decade, labour force mobility and informal employment sizes as well as the dynamics of the economic dependency rate impose a series of measures in the field of pensions' system reform and of ensuring old-age specific social assistance such as: increasing the pensioning age (65 years of age for both men and women); eliminating early-retirement age within the public system or, at least, limiting access and avoiding the facile issuing of assures a very small (completion) pension (a simple calculation shows us that under the conditions of a contribution within the limits of deductible sums until the fulfillment of the legal retirement age, the obtained additional pension is of 80 Euros/month for a person up to 35 years, 35 Euros/month for a person up to 45 years and of about 11 Euros if the age of entering into the occupational scheme is of 55 years). If we consider a decent additional pension of approximately 400 Euros per year, a beneficiary of 35 years should contribute about 800 Euros/year for 30 years, one of 45 years with 1800 Euros in 20 years, amounts that cannot be directed to these destinations just from work incomes!)" necessary approvals; attracting youth for registration with the optional pension funds next to compulsory private pensions for benefiting at old age from higher and more diversified incomes than the ones due according to the public pension system; the development of some retirement delaying programmes for elderly who show they are still apt of performance on the job, including by partial/flexible employment programmes, associated fiscal facilities, etc.; vocational re-training or improvement, and extending active life period as well as encouraging significant participation of elderly to society life, including by means of another vocational path, or in the system of social and/or community activities, etc.

---

[24] Document-2011-09-22-7812507-0-raport-deficitul-pensii.pdf and http://www.evz.ro/detalii/stiri/studiu-aviva-romanii-trebuie-sa-economiseasca-3700-de-euroan-pensie-decenta-906676.html#ixzz1bPvWENSI " In average, each Polish citizen must save yearly the amount of 3.400 Euros, respectively 4.600 Euros for each employee in the Czech Republic. The best placed are the employees from Hungary, who must save 1.900 Euros yearly", stated the chairmen of Aviva Life Insurances..

Also for the future the policy in the matter of pensions shall remain a common concern for public authorities, social partners, the pensions' sector and the civil society at national and EU-level. A common platform for monitoring all aspects related to the policy and regulation in the matter of pensions in an integrated manner and for joining together all interested parties might contribute to obtaining and maintaining adequate, sustainable and safe pensions.

The crisis has shown the importance of the European approach of the pension systems, questioned the long-term sustainability of the PAYG-type public system, and proved the interdependency of the different pillars of the pension systems within each member state, but especially, the importance of common approaches at EU-level in the matter of solvency and social adequacy.

References

- Ebbinghaus B., Gronwald M., 2009, The Changing Public-Private Pension Mix in Europe: from the Path Dependence to Path Departure, http://www2.asanet.org/sectionchs/09conf/Ebbinghaus.pdf
- Roubini, N 2011 on K Marx's theory of capitalism self-destruction http://europe.wsj.com/video/nourie l-roubini-karl-marx-was-right/68EE8F89-EC24-42F8-9B9D-47B510E473B0.html?KEYWORDS=Roubini
- Vasile, V., 2012 - Analiza evoluțiilor şi politicilor sociale în UE în ultimii trei ani – pensii suplimentare/private şi impactul îmbătrânirii populației, Strategy and Policy Studies (SPOS) 2011, Study no 4, European Institute from Romania, Bucharest,
- Vasile. V, Zaman. Gh., 2005 - Romania's pension system between present restrictions and future exigencies, http://hermes-ir.lib.hit-u.ac.jp/rs/bitstream/10086/14248/1/pie_dp268.pdf
- Aviva & Deloitte 2010- Deficitul Pensiilor în Europa http://economie.hotnews.ro/stiri-pensii_private-7812060-studiu-fiecare-roman-care-pensioneaza-urmatorii-40-ani-trebuie-economiseasca-medie-3-700-euro-anual-pentru-trai-similar-celui-dinainte-pensie.htm
- EC 2011- Concluding the first European semester of economic policy coordination: Guidance for national policies in 2011-2012, Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the European Council, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions COM(2011) 400 final, EC, Brussels, 7.6.2011, http://ec.europa.eu/europe2020/pdf/communication_en.pdf
- EC 2011 - COUNCIL RECOMMENDATION of 12 July 2011 on the implementation of the broad guidelines for the economic policies of the Member States whose currency is the euro (2011/C 217/05), Official Journal of the European Union, C217/15
- EC 2011- 2011 Report on Public Finances in EMU, European Economy 3/2011, EC, Directorate General for Economic and Financial Affaires
- EC 2004 - Regulation (EC) no 883/2004 of the European Parliament and of the Council from 29 April 2004 regarding the coordination of social security systems.

ECONOMIC CRISIS AND THE COMPETITIVENESS OF TRANSNATIONAL COMPANIES

LIVIU RADU[*]
CARMEN RADU[]

Abstract
In crisis situations, the competitiveness of transnational companies becomes a particularly complex concept, due to the fact that said business entities are continuously moving within the context of internationalization and increasing use of global strategies. Given the current economic context, one cannot merely assess the competitiveness level of any given transnational company from a static standpoint, depending on the turnover, sales volume or number of employees of said company, but such assessment needs to be made from a dynamic standpoint, in close connection with the internal and international business environment in which that company carries out its activity.

Keywords*: national competitiveness, transnational companies' competitiveness, competitive advantage, transnational level, economic crisis*

Introduction

The concept of competitiveness is similar to that of economic efficiency and reflects a conjuncture of the economic activity, determined by a certain consumption of resources for obtaining goods and services. This approach presents the competitiveness from the efficiency of distributing resources standpoint, bringing in the center of attention the existing relation between maximizing effects and minimizing the efforts made by economic agents. The production of goods and services reflects the competitiveness under the conditions of diminishing costs, while the production's distribution under competitiveness conditions must assure, on one hand, a concordance between the volume, structure and quality of goods and services and, on the other hand, the market's exigencies.

While studying competitiveness, this has been approached through the angle of competitive advantage, when the competitiveness on a national level and similar with the term of competition was taken in consideration, and when the competitiveness of an economic agent on an international plan was being analyzed. At the same time, more detailed approaches were expressed by Kirsy Hugues[1] who considers competitiveness to be a problem of relative, static or dynamic efficiency, as well as a reflection of firm's performances in the international commerce (moderated performances), either under the form of export mark shares, or under the form of import penetration degree.

In conclusion, competitiveness is the capacity of an economic agent, product or service, individual or activity, to be susceptible to support the competition with the others participants to the market. On each economic agent's level, more categories of competitiveness can be identified: global, financial, commercial, human, managerial, technical and organizational. On the economic agent's level, global competitiveness represents his potential and implies the accomplishment of a diagnosis or an analyzing inventory of the capacity it disposes of, namely that of the financial-economic forces it can mobilize and the firm's vulnerable points. In other words, competitiveness depends on the proper functioning of the economic agents' assembly of organizational components.

The analysis of competitiveness concepts and competitive advantage, the role of foreign investments and attenuation of economic crisis are subjects of permanent interest. Specialized literature has benefited in time of the analyses of multiple prestigious authors, such as John H.

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D. „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: lradu@yahoo.com).
[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D. „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: cradu@univnt.ro).
[1] Hugues Kirsty (1993), European Competitiveness, Cambridge University press, pg. 5

Dunning, William Northaus, Kirsty Hugues, Robert Solow, Gilbert Abraham – Frois, or Ngaire Woods. In the Romanian economic literature the special contribution of researchers Costea Munteanu, Alexandra Horobeț, Anda Mazilu, Vasile Dan, Liviu Voinea etc. are noticeable.

The present global crisis, initiated in 2008, determined a decrease in international production of goods and services offered by the 82.000 transnational companies and by their 810.000 branches that function on a global scale. Decreases in profit, withdrawals of capital, massive discharges, restructurings and bankruptcies were recorded on these companies' level.

The global crisis initiation was predicted and afterwards analyzed by Nouriel Roubini, the Nobel Prize for economy winner from 2008, Paul Krugman, Professor Joseph Stigliz and the controversial investor George Soros. Along with them international financial organisms such as the World Bank, European Central Bank and the International Monetary Fund, and trough competent voices such as Christine Lagarde, warn that the crisis situation has not yet been surpassed and, instead, the risk exists that it will gain new features and aggravate in 2012.

The present study proposes to analyze the challenges to which the transnational companies that wish to maintain a high competitiveness in the context of the actual crisis must answer to.

PAPER CONTENT

1. Conceptual analysis of the term competitiveness

The specialized literature (David Held, Anthony Mc Grew, David Goldblatt and Jonathan Perraton, 2004)[2], while analyzing the transnational companies' activity, considers that at the present time they compete on a global scale, remaining, however, anchored in the originating country's economic system and extracting their competitive advantage particularly from the national base, but applying global strategies in order to withstand the competition. To this extent, UNCTAD (2002) considers competition as being "the main locomotive" of competitiveness, by referring to the activity of those said companies, and delimits static competitiveness from the dynamic one. Static competitiveness highlights emphasizes price competitiveness, determining firms to compete on the basis of facilities. Conditions in which maintaining the competitiveness depends on the increase or decrease of fabrication costs. Simultaneously, dynamic competitiveness is associated with the changing nature of competition which does not only emphasize the connection between costs and prices but also the firm's ability to learn, to rapidly adapt to new market conditions and to innovate. Consequently, the lack of resources, insufficient technological capacities and the incapacity to adapt trough innovation can cause the firms considered competitive on internal scale, to lose the ability to answer to the international competition's exigencies.

Other approaches (Iuliana Ciochină, Alina Voiculeț, 2004)[3], define the term competitiveness through its characteristics: strategic competences: long term prediction and organizational competences: risk management.

The definition underlines especially the managerial competences, the adaptability of production and of transnational companies' marketing, on the host-countries' level.

Associated to a multinational corporation, the term of competitiveness suggests security, efficiency, quality, high productivity, adaptability, success, modern management, superior products, optimum costs. However, in order to consider a firm to be competitive, a rigorous analysis is required to be applied on the said firm as well as on its activity environment. A firm's competitiveness is mainly influenced by the capacity to understand and adapt as properly as possible to the surrounding world. These approaches along with classifying the corporations whose activity exceeds national borders (established by Charles Hill in 1998)[4], empower us to consider a transnational company to be competitive under the conditions in which it can adapt its production and marketing offer to the local environment's conditions, which brings into foreground the commerce and its competitive advantage. To this extent, the companies' present tendency to globalize determines us to not neglect the aspects related to competition, analyzed through the experienced gained and valorized as a result to adaptability and innovation.

[2] Held David, Mc Grew Anthony, Goldblatt David and Perraton Jonathan (2004) – Global changes : politics, economy and culture, Polirom Publishing House, Iași

[3] Ciochină Iuliana, Voiculeț Alina (2004) – The firm's competitiveness from European perspective, paper sustained at the International Economic Conference - Lucian Blaga University, Sibiu, 2004

The study on competitive firms emphasized some of their similar characteristics but the audit of the firm's potential remains to be concretized in the list of factors or foundations of competitiveness as follows[5]:

The financial competitiveness can be evaluated by: the size of the profit, the capacity to auto finance, potential of financial capacity and potential to solvability.

The commercial competitiveness is given by: market share, turnover evolution and commercial notoriousness;

The technical competitiveness implies: the nature of equipment, technical advance and supply;

The managerial competitiveness involves: the leaders' profile, the capacity to lead and the collaborators' value;

The organizational competitiveness refers to: the form of organizational structure, the nature of decisions delegation and the rate of integrating individuals and services in the firm's objectives.

Thus, one might consider competitiveness to be the economic capacity of an enterprise to comply with an effective or potentially competition. Competitiveness can be evaluated in accordance to certain elements, such as: price, product quality, services post sales, flexibility and versatility of offer. Out of all these elements the most important ones are the price and quality of products. At the same time and according to a well-known definition from the American specialized literature (M. Porter – 1987)[6], the competitive advantage can be obtained: by reducing costs or by qualitative differentiation of products. In the fight for new markets, the firms must emphasize their qualities in order to win advantages ahead the competitors. This is one method of seeing competition, but a more detailed view must take in consideration the obtained results in an industrial competitive structure in the international market. A firm's direction is given by its own strategy, whilst the chances to succeed are given by competitive advantages. In order to increase an enterprise's competitiveness, to withstand the competition and exacerbate profits, the manager requires information regarding changes from the domain on a global scale, needs to know the tendencies on the international market and the perspectives of its evolution and also to detain information about the global competitors' programs. The managerial model is changing and the present manager must not limit to the strict business of its firm and just to knowing the evolution of business from the branches in the country in which he works. Transnational competitiveness is carried out by transnational companies, through complex managerial strategies, by effectuating strategic merges and alliances and promoting foreign direct investments.

2. The connection between national and transnational companies' competitiveness

According to certain experts' opinion[7], „there was a time when the nation state was regarded as being an economic force, primordial and capable to dictate the rules of the game in accordance to other economic agents. That period is long gone. Gradually, a transfer of power was produced by the

[4] Hill Charles (1998) - International Business: Competing in the Global Marketplace, McGraw-Hill Companies; 2nd edition (July 2, 1998)

[5] Dan Vasile – Industrial competitive strategies and structures, All Educational Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997

[6] Porter Michael (1987) – From competitive advantage to corporate strategy, Harvard Business. Review, no 3, 1987

[7] Strage S.(1997) – The Retreat of State, Cambridge University Press

following three coordinates: from the poorly industrialized countries to the strong ones; from states to markets and through this to transnational companies; part of the power gradually diminished, in the sense that no one carries it out." The same author also identifies the main causes at the base of this forces rapport: technological innovations promoted by transnational companies; high costs of new technologies that the said companies cannot sustain alone and not to mention the emphasis placed on the structural power to the detriment of the relational one.

The transnational companies' objectives are not always similar to the competitive objectives of every country in which these companies act. However, the governments of the host countries can, most of the times, encourage the STN arrival, trusting that those will contribute financially, humanly and technologically to the national economic and social competitiveness. Transnational companies have as well their own interest in maintaining some connections with the host countries' governments in order to avoid the enclosure of the awarded rights and freedoms. At the same time, another interest is to keep the inalienable image of the products and brands they represent by avoiding any inappropriate behavior on a national market that could have serious consequences on their competitiveness on all national markets in which they are present.

Consequently, all international agreements and treaties consider the following as being main responsibilities for the multinational corporations that are active in host countries: to contribute to the development of receiving economies; to protect the environment; to create new jobs; to maintain good relations with the employees; to assure a loyal competition; to take in consideration the consumer's norms of protection; to contribute to the removal of corruption and bureaucracy and to value the human rights. At the same time, the host country is interested in the transnational companies and autochthon firms to follow the national legislation and not violate to their own advantage the weaknesses of the legislative and administrative system even if it interposes in the economic activity.

The connection between the host countries' and the transnational companies' double competitiveness is emphasized by the main responsibilities established by the international forums (U.N.O. and O.E.C.D.)[8] for this companies. OECD creates a set of rules that should be followed by transnational companies in order to pursue the host countries' interest: firstly, they have to contribute to the economic, social and environmental progress; secondly, to encourage the local capacity for developing the enterprises' activities on local and foreign markets; thirdly, to encourage the development of human resources especially by assuring opportunities of development and facilitating the access of employees to courses for specializing one's carrier (training) and last but not least, to not involve in the local policy by respecting the human resource to its true value.

In short, one might consider the following as being particularly important in analyzing the competitiveness of transnational companies and of host countries:

The contribution of public incomes of the host countries. As it is well-known, public incomes are part of the most important sources of financing development projects. Consequently, the governments of host countries are interested that the transnational companies are respecting the engagements of paying debts to the state budget and are not using abusive practices in remigration of profits. The companies are, simultaneously, indebted to put, at the service of fiscal authorities, correct data and accounting financial documents which the authorities might solicit.

The collaboration with autochthon firms. The transnational companies must initiate and maintain close connections to national firms, thus aiding the increase of their competitiveness. This requires from the transnational companies tight, long term engagements of incorporating in the host country's economy

[8] In 1986, within the U.N.O., a Code of conduct of CMN was adopted and greeted with the universal need of regulating the conduct of relations between the states members of U.N.O. and the transnational corporations, and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) established a guide for CMN in 1976.

The creation of jobs and increase of the autochthon work force's degree of training. Along with this, the transnational companies are invited to promote good relations with local firms and make considerable efforts to reduce the negative effects that might result in certain situations, like, for example, the effects of the present economic crisis.

The transfer of technology. Transnational companies contribute to the increase of the host countries' competitiveness by cooperating with autochthon firms as well as with local authorities. greet

As the transnational companies extend over national borders, the obligations assumed by them on the host countries' level and especially on the host economies level, extend also. From this point of view, Kofi Annan (1999)[9] considers that the assembly of industrial operations with a social impact on implemented communities, require valences with different sense and action, derived and reunited under the shape of norms, instruments and politics, that can exert successive shaping of the behavior of local consumers and, implicitly, in the image of products manufactured on regional plan, by the resident transnational companies.

To this extent, we present a few of the politics adopted by some countries for the functioning of transnational companies[10] on their territory. In the U.S.A. a politic of "open doors" is being promoted, simultaneously with blocking some acquisitions, protecting certain areas of activity and declining unwanted investments. In Japan an administrative surveillance is being applied while it is specialized in restrictions over remigration of profits and establishment of companies of joint-ventures type, monitoring the transnational companies' activities and the thorough analysis of foreign investments. In the European Union investments are approved under the condition they do not affect the activity of its own societies and for this purpose they are being carefully supervised.

The following are among the authors devoted to explaining competitiveness under the form of cost/benefit advantages: J. Dunning (1993)[11], R. Caves (1982)[12] and S. Vogel (1997)[13]. On this matter, the argument brought by J. Dunning is interesting: "the more a transnational company cares about its advantages over property, the smaller the probability it will renounce on the control over them".

The competitiveness of transnational companies on the levels of host country and mother country's economy can be studied through the standpoint of the alliances' strategies and of the management specific to these companies, as well as through the foreign direct investments (FDI) accomplished by them.

3. The influence of economic crisis on the investments of transnational companies

American economists consider that the source of crises[14] is the following context: "…markets have become too large, too complex and too dynamic to subject matter to the type of surveillance and regulation of the twentieth century. No wonder that this globalized financial mammoth surpasses the complete power of understanding of even the most sophisticated participants to the market." In order to have an image on the financial system from the beginning period of the global economic crisis and in order to connect to the above quote, we present a few statistical data: Among the 50 classified financial transnational companies, 9 of them are American with a capital of 8,260 billion dollars, 6 are English with a total capital of 6,780 billion, 5 are French with a capital of 6,360 billion dollars. Germany and Japan occupy the same position with 4 other financial transnational companies, and both have a total capital of approximately 4000 billion dollars.

---

[9] Annan Kofi (1999) – A compact for the new century; New York; United Nations

[10] Bailey, D., Harte, G., Sugden, R.,- Transnationals and Governments, Routhledge, 1994

[11] Dunning J. (1993) – Multinational Enterprises and the Global Economy, Addison – Wesley.

[12] Caves R. (1982) – Multinational Enterprises and Economic Analysis, Cambridge University Press

[13] Vogel S..(1997) - International Games With National Rules: How Regulation Shapes Competition in Global Markets", Journal of Public Policy No.1, 1997

[14] Greenspan, Alan (2007) - The Age of Turbulence: Adventures in a New World. New York: Penguin Press

The erosion of the moral capital, necessary for the business environment, is also caused by some discoveries related to some corporations' corporatist frauds that are part of the 50 transnational companies on a global level. Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs Group Inc, Merrill Lynch % Company Inc, Citigroup Inc, Ubs Ag, Credit Suisse Group and Societe Generale are some of these transnational companies.

The changes produced nowadays in the global economy have reached such an extremely fast pace that we can expect the significant deceleration of the global economy's increase rhythm. Economists warned in 2010 that the assistance program does nothing more than delay the inevitable. Unfortunately, their predictions have been confirmed. Ireland avoided a banking crisis only by appealing to a loan of 85 billion Euros from the EU and IMF, and Portugal was forced to choose a similar solution by taking in loan 78 billion Euros. In Spain, the unemployment rate has exceeded 21%, the highest in the developed world, and Greece's public debt increased from 120% from GDP to 150% and in 2011 the state requested a new loan. Italy has already reached the point in which these states were when they requested emergency credits, from the standpoint of interests the markets required to finance the state. Volatility remains the defining word for Europe and the risk of public debt has been transferred to the banks since they have massively loaned the governments. Being integrated in a succession of consecutive phases and periods, these changes to which the international business environment has been complied to, imply an entire process of re-dimensioning and re-allocation of funds for the purpose of maintaining them on the parameters impose by the exigencies of global competitiveness[15].

The global financial and economic crisis strongly affected the evolution of international investing activities in 2008 by determining the notable decline of the foreign direct investments (FDI) flows, intercepted and generated on a global plan, after a cycle of four years of continuous increase. According to the estimations revised by UNCTAD, the value volume of the intercepted global FDI incomes had reduced to 15% in 2008, summing up to 1,659 billion USD, as opposed to the historical record from 2007, of 1,941 billion USD. The decline of FDI outcomes from 2008 was caused especially by the 29% collapse of the sales volume associated with trans-boundary fusions and acquisitions. The decrease of FDI outcomes between the period of 2008 and 2009 is the result of two major factors that affect internal market, such as international investments. Firs of all, the firms' capacity of investing was reduced by the decrease of access to financial resources, internally – due to the decline of corporative profits – as well as externally – as a result of a lesser availability and a higher cost of financing.

Second of all, the tendency to invest was negatively influenced by the economic perspectives especially in developed countries that are affected by the most severe recession of the post-war era. The impact of both factors is aggravated by the fact that at the beginning of the year 2009, a high level of perception over risk determined transnational companies to reduce their investments cost and programs, so that they will become more resistant to any deterioration of the business environment. All three major types of foreign direct investments (FDI of valorizing markets, FDI of valorizing resources, FDI of efficiency) will be affected by these factors, but in a different manor. The regression of foreign direct investments has especially affected the trans-boundaries fusions and acquisitions. The crisis's impact over the FDI differs in terms of region and sector. The developed countries have been the most affected until now, with a significant decrease of FDI outcomes in 2008, mainly because of the slow market's perspectives. The FDI outcomes continued to increase in the developing economies during 2008, however on a much slower rate than in the previous year. All developing regions, with the exception of West Asia, recorded in the year 2008 higher values of FDI incomes. Afterward, the crisis extended in size and turbulence on a large scale, thus being followed by financial markets that hit many developing and emergent economies. Emergent economies, such as Hungary, Iceland, Latvia and Ukraine needed to appeal to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) for assistance. From the beginning of 2009, this list has been extending for other countries, such as Indonesia, Pakistan and Romania. Subsequently, the crisis rapidly spread to sectors other than the financial one, with severe damage for real economy. The much more strict conditions of credit inevitably affected the companies' capacity to spend on factories and equipment, along with being able to make acquisitions.

[15] Crafts Nicholas (2000) – Globalization and Growth in the Twentieth Century, IMF Working Paper, WP-00-04, IMF, Washington D.C.

Economic crisis has also impacted the activity of certain transnational companies operating in Romania: Nokia closed down its Jucu plant, Renault-Dacia reduced its production due to acute decrease of the demand on the internal and external market, Ford reduced its initially planned investments in Craiova, Kraft Foods and Colgate-Palmolive also closed down their plants in Romania.

The consumers trust has roughly decreased in many states of the world, reaching historical minimum first in the United States and later on in the European Union. Also large companies from many industries were severely affected by the decrease of sales. Beginning with the financial services, which were directly affected by the crisis, the shock waves hit many other industries, from extraction and fabrication industries to infrastructure services. The foreign direct investments were in 2010 of 2,596 billion Euros, with 25,6% less than in 2009 when they reached 3,48 billion Euros.

The World Bank's rapport from January 2012 considers that, in 2012, the global economy should be sustained by an 5,4% increase in the developing countries. In spite of this, the increase will only be of 1,4% in the countries strongly industrialized. The same rapport expresses that the progression of the volume for global economic exchanges had reduced to 6,6% in 2011 (in comparison to 12,4% in the year 2010, the year of global economy re-launch) and that in 2012 it will continue to drop, reaching only 4,7%.

Conclusions

In conclusion, the managerial actions, strategic management, mergers, acquisitions and alliances made by multinational companies all aim to one single objective – to increase organizational competitiveness in the context of increasingly competitive markets.

The transnational companies' competitiveness is a highly complex notion due to the fact that at present times, this type of economic agents represents entities that are in a continuous motion in the context of the internationalization process and that of changing to using global strategies. The transnational company is a complex system in which a permanent manifestation takes place regarding the contradiction between activities' flexibility and coordination. This contradiction has its origin in the very motion tendency of the firm abroad and from the permanent objective to extend its actions beyond the originating country's borders. Given the current economic context, one cannot merely assess the competitiveness level of any given transnational company from a static standpoint, depending on the turnover, sales volume or number of employees of said company, but such assessment needs to be made from a dynamic standpoint, in close connection with the internal and international business environment in which that company carries out its activity.

The business environment of a transnational company imposes the analysis of the manifestation mode of the existing competition between these entities in the national economic area. The competitiveness represents a competition between transnational companies with the aim of occupying new positions on market outlets. Regarding the multinational corporations' competitiveness, the most suitable description was given by G.A. Frois, who considers these enterprises should think globally, but act locally.

The economic crisis obviously influences transnational companies' competitiveness and, at the same time, their decreasing competitiveness determines the adjournment of surpassing the crisis situation and re-launching economic growth. In the last years, numerous transnational companies have drastically reduced their activity, from the foreign investments standpoint, as well as from reducing production in accordance to the decreasing demand from individual and institutional consumers.

The austerity politics to which many governments were forced to resort to, have an impact on consumers (on incomes and their capacity to consume) and also on transnational companies that are no longer in resonance with them. Reducing major public investments is another loss for the transnational companies that beneficiated of state orders in multiple countries.

The economic crisis has reconfigured the positions of countries in the top of global competitiveness. As regards Romania, the Romanian economy has climbed 10 positions up in the top of global competitiveness over the period between 2007 and 2010 (from 74 out of 133 analyzed countries in 2997-2008 to 64 in 2009-2010)[16].

The European Committee is discussing today methodologies of co-sharing sovereign debts by emitting community obligations. France, and Germany especially, are opposing this. On one hand are the so-called PIGS states – Portugal, Italy, Greece and Spain – and on the other – Germany, Austria, Holland and Finland.

In this derogatory context, 2012 will unfortunately be an eminently electoral year and the following voting that will take place in 2012 may bring major changes or confirmations on a political level in many important countries, including countries that are great or regional powers, such as the USA, the Russian Federation, China and France, in smaller countries that are politically important through their resources and strategic positions hold, and in the Arab states (Egypt, Libya, possibly Syria or Iraq), Eastern Asia (Taiwan), the Euro zone or Eastern Europe and from the formal Soviet Union (Greece, Italy, Slovakia, Serbia, Romania, Ukraine, Georgia and Moldavian Republic), might decisively mark the geopolitical configuration of Europe and the rest of the world. Under these conditions it is highly unlikely for the said governments to establish radical reforms that could bring electoral losses. The lack of economic measures will reflect on transnational companies from the mother states as well as from host states.

References

- Annan Kofi (1999) – A compact for the new century; New York; United Nations;
- Bailey, D., Harte, G., Sugden, R.,- Transnationals and Governments, Routhledge, 1994;
- Caves R. (1982) – Multinational Enterprises and Economic Analysis, Cambridge University Press;
- Ciochină Iuliana, Voiculeț Alina (2004) – The firm's competitiveness from an European perspective, paper sustained at the International Economic Conference - Lucian Blaga University, Sibiu, 2004;
- Crafts Nicholas (2000) – Globalization and Growth in the Twentieth Century, IMF Working Paper, WP-00-04, IMF, Washington D.C.;
- Dan Vasile – Industrial and competitive strategies and structures, All Educational Publishing House. Bucharest, 1997;
- Dunning J. (1993) – Multinational Enterprises and the Global Economy, Addison – Wesley.;
- Held David, Mc Grew Anthony, Goldblatt David and Perraton Jonathan (2004) – Global changes: politics, economy and culture Polirom Publishing House, Iaşi;
- Hill Charles (1998) - International Business: Competing in the Global Marketplace, McGraw-Hill Companies; 2nd edition (July 2, 1998);
- Hugues Kirsty (1993), European Competitiveness, Cambridge University press, pg. 5;
- Porter Michael (1987) – From competitive advantage to corporate strategy, Harvard Business. Review, no 3, 1987;
- Strage S.(1997) – The Retreat of State, Cambridge University Press;
- Vogel S.(1997) - International Games With National Rules: How Regulation Shapes Competition in Global Markets", Journal of Public Policy No.1, 1997;
- World Economic Forum, The Global Competitiveness Report 2009-2010, p.266
- World Bank rapport – January 2012

[16] World Economic Forum, The Global Competitiveness Report 2009-2010, p.266

THE ROLE OF THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND IN RESOLVING THE GLOBAL FINANCIAL CRISIS

MIHAI SPĂTARU-NEGURĂ*

Abstract

In 2008-2009, the global economy experienced the worst financial crisis since the Great Depression in the 1930s, as it has been characterized. We consider that the current global financial crisis is a major challenge for the International Monetary Fund („IMF" or the „Fund"). The IMF has emerged as a powerful institutional force and has provided recomendations and analyses that have served as the basis of official action on several fronts. This paper discusses the potential roles the Fund may have in resolving the current global financial crisis.

Keywords: International Monetary Fund, global, crisis, financial, economy.*

Introduction

When the subprime crisis struck in the US and especially when it spread to other advanced economies and pushed the global economy into recession, designing an effective policy response to the crisis became the number one priority for policymakers around the world.

The causes of economic and financial crises are varied and complex. Key factors can include weak domestic financial systems; large and persistent external or domestic imbalances (including current account deficits or fiscal deficits, or both); high levels of external and/or public debt; exchange rates fixed at inappropriate levels; spillovers of economic and financial crises from other countries; natural disasters; armed conflicts or large swings in the price of key commodities, such as food and fuel. Exogenous shocks, ranging from natural disasters to terms of trade or foreign demand shocks are common causes of economic distress. This is especially true in low-income countries, which have limited capacity to invest in disaster prevention, and are dependent on a narrow range of exports of mostly primary goods.

In the doctrine it was underlined that the current global financial crisis is testing the ability of the IMF in its role as the central international institution for oversight of the global monetary system[1]. However, the current financial crisis represents a great challenge for the IMF because it is wholly unequipped to provide by itself the necessary liquidity to the US and affected industrialized countries.

The International Monetary Fund is an organization of 187 member countries, working to foster global monetary cooperation, secure financial stability, facilitate international trade, promote high employment and sustainable economic growth, and reduce poverty around the world.

The IMF promotes international monetary cooperation and exchange rate stability, facilitates the balanced growth of international trade, and provides resources to help members in balance of payments difficulties or to assist with poverty reduction. The IMF works with other international organizations to promote growth and poverty reduction. It also interacts with think tanks, civil society, and the media on a daily basis.

It is a specialized agency of the United Nations but has its own charter, governing structure, and finances. Crucial aspect of the IMF's governance: nearly all decisions are made by consensus. Its members are represented through a quota system broadly based on their relative size in the global economy. Upon joining, each member of the IMF is assigned a quota[2], based broadly on its relative size in the world economy. The IMF's membership agreed in May 2008 on a rebalancing of its quota system in order to reflect the changing global economic realities, especially the increased weight of major emerging markets in the global economy. A member's quota delineates basic aspects of its financial and organizational relationship with the IMF, including:

* MBA alumnus, INDE Bucharest & ASE Bucharest & CNAM Paris, Bucharest, Romania (email: spataru.negura.mihai@gmail.com);

[1] Martin A. Weiss, The Global Financial Crisis: The Role of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), CRS Report for Congress, Updated October 30, 2008, available at http://fpc.state.gov/documents/organization/112052.pdf;

• subscriptions. A member's quota subscription determines the maximum amount of financial resources the member is obliged to provide to the IMF. A member must pay its subscription in full upon joining the IMF: up to 25 percent must be paid in the IMF's own currency, called Special Drawing Rights ("SDRs") or widely accepted currencies (such as the dollar, the euro, the yen, or pound sterling), while the rest is paid in the member's own currency.

• voting power. The quota largely determines a member's voting power in IMF decisions. Each IMF member has 250 basic votes plus one additional vote for each SDR 100,000 of quota. Accordingly, the US has 371,743 votes (16.77 percent of the total), and Palau has 281 votes (0.01 percent of the total). The newly agreed quota and voice reform will result in a significant shift in the representation of dynamic economies, many of which are emerging market countries, through a quota increase for 54 member countries. A tripling of the number of basic votes is also envisaged as a means to give poorer countries a greater say in running the institution.

• access to financing. The amount of financing a member can obtain from the IMF is based on its quota. Under Stand-By and Extended Arrangements, which are types of loans, a member can borrow up to 200 percent of its quota annually and 600 percent cumulatively. However, access may be higher in exceptional circumstances.

• SDR allocations. Allocations of SDRs, the IMF's unit of account, is used as an international reserve asset. A member's share of general SDR allocations is established in proportion to its quota. The most recent general allocation of SDRs took place in 2009.

This paper focuses on the the potential roles the Fund may have in resolving the current global financial crisis. My own work has been to critically examine the actions of IMF during the current crisis and the results obtained.

I have attempted to examine how the IMF reacted this past years and how it had adapted its policy.

Paper content

It is worth mentionning from the beginning that the role of the IMF has changed significantly since its founding in 1944, and as the global financial system has evolved over the decades, so has the IMF.

From 1946 to 1973, its main purpose was to manage the fixed system of international exchange rates agreed on at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire. The IMF monitored the macroeconomic and exchange rate policies of member countries and helped them overcome the balance of payments crises with short-term loans that helped bring currencies back in line with their determined value. This system ended in 1973 when the US floated its currency and introduced the modern system of floating exchange rates.

Nowadays, the IMF responsabilities and operations can be grouped into three areas:

a) surveillance – involves monitoring economic and financial developments and providing policy advice to member countries;

b) lending – entails the provision of financial resources under specified conditions to assist a country experiencing balance of payments difficulties; and

c) technical assistance – includes help on designing or improving the quality and effectiveness of domestic policy-making.

[2] Information available at http://www.imf.org/external/np/exr/facts/quotas.htm;

Through its economic surveillance, the IMF keeps track of the economic health of its member countries, alerting them to risks on the horizon and providing policy advice. It also lends to countries in difficulty, and provides technical assistance and training to help countries improve economic management. This work is backed by IMF research and statistics. Marked by massive movements of capital and abrupt shifts in comparative advantage, globalization affects countries' policy choices in many areas, including labor, trade, and tax policies. Helping a country benefit from globalization while avoiding potential downsides is an important task for the IMF. The global economic crisis has highlighted just how interconnected countries have become in today's world economy.

As mentioned before, the IMF has evolved along with the global economy throughout its 65-year history, allowing the organization to retain its central role within the international financial architecture. As the world economy struggles to restore growth and jobs after the worst crisis since the Great Depression, the IMF has emerged as a very different institution. During the crisis, it mobilized on many fronts to support its member countries. It increased its lending, used its cross-country experience to advice on policy solutions, supported global policy coordination, and reformed the way it makes decisions. The result is an institution that is more in tune with the needs of its 187 member countries[3]:

• stepping up crisis lending. The IMF responded quickly to the global economic crisis, with lending commitments reaching a record level of more than US$250 billion in 2010. This figure includes a sharp increase in concessional lending (that's to say, subsidized lending at rates below those being charged by the market) to the world's poorest nations;

• greater lending flexibility. The IMF has overhauled its lending framework to make it better suited to countries' individual needs. It is also working with other regional institutions to create a broader financial safety net, which could help prevent new crises;

• providing analysis and advice. The IMF's monitoring, forecasts, and policy advice, informed by a global perspective and by experience from previous crises, have been in high demand and have been used by the G-20[4].

• drawing lessons from the crisis. The IMF is contributing to the ongoing effort to draw lessons from the crisis for policy, regulation, and reform of the global financial architecture.

• historic reform of governance. The IMF's member countries also agreed to a significant increase in the voice of dynamic emerging and developing economies in the decision making of the institution, while preserving the voice of the low-income members.

As regards the IMF's new lending framework, as part of moves to support countries during the global economic crisis, the IMF is beefing up its lending capacity and has approved a major overhaul of how it lends money by offering higher amounts and tailoring loan terms to countries' varying strengths and circumstances. More recently, further reforms have been approved to improve the IMF's capacity to prevent crises. Mainly:

• doubling of member countries' access to IMF resources;

• streamlined approach aims to reduce stigma of borrowing

• new Flexible Credit Line (FCL) for countries with robust policy frameworks and a strong track record in economic performance[5];

[3] Information available at http://www.imf.org/external/np/exr/facts/changing.htm;

[4] The G-20 represents about 90 percent of global gross national product, 80 percent of world trade (including trade within the European Union) as well as two-thirds of the world's population. The G-20 comprises Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, France, Germany, India, Indonesia, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Russia, Saudi Arabia, South Africa, South Korea, Turkey, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America, plus the European Union, represented by the rotating Council presidency and the European Central Bank. The Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund and the President of the World Bank, plus the chairs of the International Monetary and Financial Committee and Development Committee of the IMF and World Bank, also participate in G-20 meetings;

• new Precautionary Credit Line (PCL)for countries that have sound economic policies and fundamentals, but are still facing vulnerabilities[6];

• reform does away with "hard" structural conditionality; starting May 1, 2009, structural performance criteria have been discontinued for all IMF loans, including for programs with low-income countries. Structural reforms will continue to be part of IMF-supported programs, but have become more focused on areas critical to a country's recovery. And the monitoring of these policies will be done in a way that reduces stigma, because countries will no longer need formal waivers if they fail to implement an agreed measure by a specific date.

• new focus on objectives rather than specific actions;

• increased focus on social spending and more concessional terms for low-income countries.

As regards the flexibility and the decrease of the number of conditions, we underline that the IMF-supported programs have been tailored to individual country circumstances and focus on the most immediate issues to resolve the crisis. Conditionality is now more tightly focused on core objectives. The number of structural conditions has decreased in many programs, and has been increasingly limited to the most critical measures. Hence, we mention that:

The May 2010 IMF-supported program in Greece is the largest financing package assembled for one country and represents a new level of coordination with international partners (the European Commission), is broad-based (addressing fiscal, financial and structural constraints), and represents a flexible application of IMF lending policies to mitigate systemic risk.

The September 2008 IMF-supported program in Costa Rica used expansionary fiscal policy to mitigate the adverse effects of the drop in private demand during 2009, including increases in the wage bill and infrastructure spending.

The April 2008 IMF-supported program in Guatemala sought a moderate fiscal stimulus to support domestic demand, financed with substantial external resources from multilateral institutions. Social spending was slated to increase by 0.6 percent of GDP, to help offset the effect of the crisis on the poorest people in society.

In Pakistan, the IMF and the authorities have worked to create fiscal space in the program for increased social safety net and security spending. Recently, in response to the devastating floods in July-August 2010, the IMF provided $451 million of Emergency Assistance (ENDA) to help the government provide food, shelter and health services for those affected by the disaster. This additional funding was disbursed quickly, and was not linked to any program-based conditionality or review. The program's macroeconomic framework will be adjusted to take into account the impact of the floods on growth, the balance of payments, and the budget deficit;

On May 4, 2009, the IMF Executive Board approved Romania's request to conclude a standby arrangement for a period of two years, amounting to SDR 11.4 billion (approximately EUR 12.9 billion) and the release of the first tranche worth SDR 4.37 billion (approximately EUR 4.9 billion). From this arrangement were drawn 7 of the 8 installments provided, DST totaling 10.57 billion (about 11.9 billion euros). Regarding the 8th installment, it was considered, at the request of the Romanian authorities, to be preventive, and in the favorable macroeconomic context, it was not drawn. At its meeting on March 25, 2011, the IMF Executive Board approved the earlier termination of the previous agreement and has approved a new preventive Stand-By Arrangement with Romania, for a period of 24 months, amounting to SDR 3090.6 million (about 3.5 billion euros), representing 300% of Romania's IMF quota. The date of entry into force of this Act is March 31, 2011. At [5] The FCL is a crisis prevention tool that offers disbursements that are not phased. There are no conditions to be met once a country has been approved for the facility. The FCL was further enhanced in August 2010 to make it more predictable and flexible. Colombia, Mexico, and Poland have been provided access over $100 billion;

[6] The PCL is also a new crisis-prevention tool that combines an initial disbursement once the country has been approved for the PCL without conditions, with further disbursements subject to focused conditions. In January 2011, Macedonia became the first country to access the PCL;

December 19, 2011, the IMF Executive Board completed the third review meeting of performance criteria assumed by Romania within that agreement, providing our country the fourth tranche of SDR 430 million. On August 7, 2009, the IMF approved the resolution on a new general allocation of SDRs totaling SDR 250 billion. Currently, the amount of cumulative SDR allocations related to Romania is SDR 984.8 million[7].

The IMF also emphasized on social protection:

• The IMF emphasizes protection of social and other priority spending, in line with countries' priorities as set out in their poverty reduction strategies. In the context of the IMF's new architecture for LIC lending facilities, increased emphasis is given to strengthening safeguards on social and other priority spending, including through explicit program targets where possible.

• Social spending is being preserved or increased wherever possible. For instance, under the IMF-supported program in Tajikistan, the authorities aim to raise social- and poverty-related spending from 7.3 percent of GDP in 2008 to 8.7 percent of GDP in 2009, and further to 10 percent of GDP by 2012. All IMF-supported programs in low-income countries are expected to include floors on social and other priority spending. In Latvia, the IMF has been working with the authorities, the European Commission, and the World Bank to refine cost-cutting measures so they deliver the necessary adjustment while protecting the most vulnerable groups. These efforts have resulted in a comprehensive strategy to improve the social safety net at a cost expected to reach 0.6 percent of GDP in 2010. In Jamaica, spending on well-targeted social assistance programs will be increased by at least 25 percent in FY2010–11. This increase will benefit the school feeding program and the Program of Advancement through Health and Education (PATH), which provides conditional cash transfers to the poorest. Structural reforms are designed in a way to protect the most vulnerable. For instance, in El Salvador, the authorities eliminated the non-residential electricity subsidy, thereby creating fiscal space (of up to 0.3 percent of GDP) to increase social spending in 2009.

• The IMF is working closely with the World Bank and donors to identify additional external financing for social protection and to help countries promote social safety net reform.

The IMF is also helping the world's poorest and it has overhauled its concessional financing facilities to make them more flexible and address the diverse needs of low-income countries, as many are being hard hit by the global crisis. The reform allows the Fund to provide more effective short-term and emergency financial assistance. The new framework includes increased resources, a doubling of borrowing limits, zero interest rates until the end of 2011, and a new interest rate structure thereafter to ensure increased concessionality.

In response to the global financial crisis, the IMF undertook an unprecedented reform of its policies toward low-income countries. The IMF response was built around a sharp increase in its concessional lending to these countries - to around US $4 billion in 2009, an increase of about four times historical levels. In 2009 and 2010, the IMF committed new concessional lending to sub-Saharan Africa totaling about US $4 billion, compared to US $1.1 billion in 2008 and only about US $0.2 billion in 2007.

Additional resources—including from the sale of IMF gold—are expected to boost the Fund's concessional lending up to $17 billion through 2014. As a result of the reforms, IMF programs are now more flexible and tailored to the individual needs of LICs, with streamlined conditionality, higher concessionality and more emphasis on safeguarding social spending.

[7] In the analysis published on March 27, 2012 on its website, the IMF experts recognized that, the tough austerity measures adopted in 2010 could have been implemented gradually, taking into account Romania's low public debt. In the report it is emphasised that the austerity measures have delayed the recovery of Romania and that these measures have resulted in more pronounced pro-cyclical evolution, which has delayed the economic recovery. Looking back, it could be argued that adjustment could have been gradual, especially given the low public debt. For more informations regarding the errors of the IMF made in Romania, please visit http://www.imf.org/external/pubs/ft/scr/2012/cr1264.pdf;

Stronger pre-crisis macroeconomic positions and a robust countercyclical policy response facilitated a rapid recovery in many low-income countries. This was also made possible by the sharply higher IMF financial support and increased flexibility on fiscal policy in IMF programs.

Partly because of the crisis, the IMF has generally factored in higher deficits and spending in 2008 and 2009, and has made financial assistance programs more flexible. For example, on average for all sub-Saharan Africa, fiscal deficits widened by about 2 percent of GDP in 2009.

The e*stablishment of* Post-Catastrophe Debt Relief (PCDR) Trust allows the IMF to join international debt relief efforts for very poor countries that are hit by the most catastrophic of natural disasters. PCDR-financed debt relief amounted to SDR 178 million ($268 million) in 2010.

Furthermore, at the April 2, 2009 Summit in London, leaders of the G-20 agreed to triple the IMF's lending capacity to $750 billion and enable it to inject extra liquidity into the world economy via a $250 billion allocation of SDRs.

But, the IMF has also an important role in shaping post-crisis financial architecture. In this regard:

- the IMF is closely working with governments and other international institutions to try and prevent future crises;
- steps are being taken to improve risk analysis, including by taking a cross-country perspective. Linkages between the real economy, the financial sector, and external stability, in the focus of an early-warning exercise carried out jointly with the Financial Stability Board. Work is also underway looking at financial interconnectedness across borders, and how financial and economic policies in one country can affect others;
- more attention to the effectiveness of the IMF's country surveillance is also key, requiring more even-handedness, clarity, and candor;
- the IMF has also provided advice on how to rethink global regulation and supervision of markets.

The IMF is working on several fronts to help its members combat the worldwide economic and financial crisis. The Fund is tracking economic and financial developments worldwide so that it can help policymakers with the latest forecasts and analysis of developments in financial markets. It is giving policy advice to countries and regions, and money to assist emerging market and low-income economies that have been hit by the crisis. And it is assisting the Group of 20 industrialized and emerging economies with recommendations to reshape the system of international regulation and governance.

The IMF's roles in the global financial crisis

1. Firefighter: providing financial assistance to countries that need it.

2. Coach and advisor: providing advice on how to get individual countries and the global financial system back to health.

3. Architect: providing recommendations on how to overhaul the global financial system.

IMF is considered to be firefighter for emerging economies because:

the IMF has provided loans and credit lines worth $174 billion to 23 emerging market countries: Ukraine, Hungary, Pakistan, Iceland, Latvia, Belarus, Mexico, Romania, Poland, Colombia, Serbia, Angola.

The Flexible Credit Line (FCL)[8] was designed to meet the increased demand for crisis-prevention and crisis-mitigation lending from countries with robust policy frameworks and very strong track records in economic performance. To date, three countries, Poland, Mexico and Colombia, have accessed the FCL: due in part to the favorable market reaction, all three countries have so far not drawn FCL resources.

[8]Information available at http://www.imf.org/external/np/exr/facts/fcl.htm;

A key objective of the lending reform is to reduce the perceived stigma of borrowing from the IMF, and to encourage countries to ask for assistance before they face a full blown crisis; in addition, countries with very strong track records can apply for the FCL when faced with actual balance of payments pressures. The FCL works as a renewable credit line, which at the country's discretion could initially be for either one- or two-years with a review of eligibility after the first year. If a country decided to draw on the credit line, repayment should take place over a 3¼ to 5 year period.

There is no cap on access to IMF resources, and the need for resources will be assessed on a case-by-case basis.

The cost of borrowing under the FCL is the same as that under the Fund's traditional Stand-By Arrangement (SBA). If accessing Fund resources on a precautionary basis, countries pay a commitment fee that is refunded if they opt to draw on those resources. The commitment fee increases with the level of access available over a twelve month period, effectively ranging between 24 and 27 basis points for access between 500 and 1000 percent of quota, and higher above 1000 percent of quota.

As with other non-concessional IMF facilities, the cost of drawing under the FCL varies with the scale and duration of lending. The lending rate is tied to the IMF's market-related interest rate, known as the basic rate of charge, which is itself linked to the Special Drawing Rights (SDR) interest rate. Large loans, with credit outstanding above 300 percent of quota, carry a surcharge of 200 basis points. If credit outstanding remains above 300 percent of quota after three years, the surcharge rises to 300 basis points. The escalation of the surcharge is designed to discourage large and prolonged use of IMF resources. Currently, the effective interest rate under the FCL (or an SBA) for access between 500 and 1000 percent of quota—ranges between 2.2–2.8 percent, rising to about 2.6–3.5 percent after 3 years, and higher above 1000 percent of quota.[1] These interest rates exclude a flat 50 bps service charge, which is applied to all Fund disbursements.

The qualification criteria are the core of the FCL and serve to show the IMF's confidence in the qualifying member country's policies and ability to take corrective measures when needed. At the heart of the qualification process is an assessment that the member country:

- has very strong economic fundamentals and institutional policy frameworks;
- is implementing—and has a sustained track record of implementing—very strong policies;
- remains committed to maintaining such policies in the future.

The criteria used to assess a country's qualification for an FCL arrangement are:

- a sustainable external position;
- a capital account position dominated by private flows;
- a track record of access to international capital markets at favorable terms;
- a reserve position that is relatively comfortable when the FCL is requested on a precautionary basis;
- sound public finances, including a sustainable public debt position;
- low and stable inflation, in the context of a sound monetary and exchange rate policy framework;
- no bank solvency problems that pose systemic threats to banking system stability;
- effective financial sector supervision;
- data integrity and transparency.

the IMF has provided loans and credit lines to 29 low-income countries (LICs)[9]: Liberia, Kyrgyz Republic, Moldova, Haiti, Malawi, Nicaragua, Madagascar, Zambia, Afghanistan, Cote d'Ivoire, Ghana.

The global financial crisis is having a severe impact on LICs, with many facing a significant deterioration in their external positions. Loan demand in 2009 was strong—new lending reached SDR 2.5 billion (US$3.8 billion), compared to SDR 0.8 billion (US$1.2 billion) for 2008. In 2010, demand for IMF concessional financing remained elevated at SDR 1.2 billion (US$1.8 billion), as many LICs continued to face a difficult environment even as global demand began to recover.

Total projected demand for PRGT loans over the period 2009–2014 remains broadly consistent with the earlier estimates of SDR 11.3 billion (about US$17 billion). Latest projections point to demand of about SDR 2 billion for 2011. While the global outlook remains highly uncertain, demand over the medium term is likely to remain elevated at about SDR 1.5–2.0 billion annually. On this basis, the overall financing capacity needs for 2009–14 would remain at about SDR 11.3 billion, in line with the projections made at the time of the reform of the LIC facilities (Table 1). These projections take into account the doubling of access limits approved by the Executive Board in April 2009, and the implications of the new facilities architecture.

Table 1. Projections of Concessional Lending to LICs through 2014 1/

Commitments	Actual annual average	Actual	Actual			Total
	2000–08 2/	2009	2010	2011	2012–14	2009–14
In billions of SDR	0.7	2.5	1.2	1.4	6.3	11.3
In billions of US$ 3/	1.0	3.7	1.8	2.1	9.4	17.0
Memorandum item: Projections in July 2009
In billions of SDR	0.7	2.7	2.7	1.5	4.5	11.3
In billions of US$ 3/	1.0	4.0	4.0	2.3	6.8	17.0

1/ May not add up due to rounding.
2/ Excluding the very high level of lending committed to Pakistan in the aftermath of 9/11, and to Liberia in 2008 following arrears clearance.
3/ Assuming exchange rate of US$1.5 per SDR.

[9] Information available at http://www.imf.org/external/np/exr/facts/concesslending.htm;

Table 2. PRGT Loan Resources Mobilization
(In billions of SDRs; as of end-February, 2011)

Target for loan resource mobilization	10.8
of which: initial target	9.0
liquidity buffer needed	1.8
Loan Resources Secured 1/	7.7
Additional resources required	3.1
Memorandum items:
Loan resources pledged but not yet available	2.2

1/ Secured through Loan Agreements with Canada, Denmark, France, Korea, the Netherlands, Norway and Spain and through Note Purchase Agreements with China, Japan and the U.K.

Loan resources of about SDR 10.8 billion (US$16 billion) will need to be mobilized to meet projected demand over the medium term. As of end-August 2011, SDR 9.5 billion of loan resources had been secured. Given demand projections, it is urgent that additional loan resources be secured expeditiously.

Resources needed to fully subsidize the projected concessional lending are estimated at SDR 2.5 billion in end-2008 NPV terms, or US$4.7 billion in cash terms (Table 3).

Table 3. Subsidy Needs and Availability

	In billions of SDRs (end-2008 NPV terms)	In billions of US$ (cash terms) 1/
Estimated subsidy needs	2.5	4.7
Minus: available resources	1.0	1.9
Remaining needs	1.5	2.8

1/ Assuming an exchange rate of US$1.5 per SDR.

This would cover the projected lending of SDR 11.3 billion over the medium term, as well as the estimated cost of temporary interest relief being provided through end-2011, and reducing the concessional interest rates charged thereafter according to the new structure of interest rates. Taking into account the resources available in the PRGF ESF Trust, additional subsidy resources of about SDR 1.5 billion (US$2.8 billion in cash terms) will need to be mobilized.

On July 23, 2009, the Executive Board endorsed a financing package to ensure the necessary financing of the new LIC facilities architecture, involving the following elements (Table 4):

Table 4. Subsidy Needs and Possible Sources of Financing
(In billions of SDRs; end-2008 NPV terms)

Subsidy requirements	2.5
Minus: available resources	1.0
Remaining needs	1.5
Possible sources
Transfer from PRGF-ESF Reserve Account	0.62
New bilateral contributions	0.2-0.4
Delaying PRGF-ESF reimbursement (for 3 years)	0.15-0.2
Gold sales resources 1/	0.5-0.6

1/ After assumed leakage of 10 percent of the distribution of gold sales.

In light of the critical role that bilateral subsidy contributions have played in past fund-raising exercises, the Executive Board agreed that such contributions should remain an important part of the new financing package. Recognizing the budget constraints facing many countries, the Board agreed to target additional bilateral subsidy contributions of SDR 0.2–0.4 billion (end-2008 NPV terms). As of the end of August 2011, SDR 155 million of subsidy resources had been secured.

To help meet the projected subsidy needs, it was agreed that for a period of three years starting in FY 2010, an amount equivalent to the expenses of operating the PRGF-ESF Trust would be transferred from the PRGF-ESF Trust Reserve Account to the new General Subsidy Account under the PRGT (see below). Based on current projections, this could generate subsidy resources of about SDR 0.15–0.2 billion.

There was broad support for using resources from the PRGF-ESF Reserve Account as part of the financing package. Staff's analysis indicated that it is feasible to make an allocation of Reserve Account resources of about SDR 0.62 billion (in end-2008 NPV terms) to help meet LIC subsidy needs and still leave sufficient resources in the Reserve Account to ensure its annual self-sustained subsidization capacity of about SDR 0.7 billion after 2014–15.

The Executive Board agreed that resources of SDR 0.5-0.6 billion (end-2008 NPV terms) linked to gold sales would be used for LIC subsidy financing. In this context, it was also agreed that the strategy would involve the use of windfall profits arising from gold sales at an average price in excess of US$850 per ounce in the first instance. This strategy would allow the corpus of the gold sales proceeds, and thus the Fund's ability to implement the new income model, to be preserved.

The Board noted that the strategy regarding the use of the resources linked to gold sales for financing subsidy needs will guide future Board decisions to be taken after the completion of the gold sales. These decisions will provide for the transfer of such resources from the Investment Account to the General Resources Account, to be followed by the distribution of an equivalent amount to members in proportion to quotas. Members would then be expected to allocate this distribution, or broadly equivalent amounts, as subsidy contributions to the PRGT.

The new financing framework that is consistent with the new architecture for LIC facilities was also approved. The framework increases flexibility of use of loan and subsidy resources, while preserving the scope for donors to earmark contributions for specific facilities. The key elements of the framework include: (i) consolidating all concessional financing instruments in the PRGT; (ii) establishing a General Loan Account (GLA) for all PRGT facilities, three Special Loan Accounts for specific facilities, and a single Reserve Account to provide security to lenders for all outstanding loans of the Trust; and (iii) establishing a General Subsidy Account (GSA) within the Trust to receive and provide resources for the subsidization of loans under all facilities of the PRGT, and four special subsidy accounts for specific facilities. To achieve its purposes, the PRGT will provide loans under the new facilities as well as under any new lending facilities that may be established under the PRGT in the future. The new lending facilities are:

- the Extended Credit Facility (ECF) succeeds the Poverty Reduction and Growth Facility (PRGF) as the Fund's main tool for providing flexible medium-term support to low-income members with protracted balance of payments problems;
- the Standby Credit Facility (SCF) addresses short-term and precautionary balance of payments needs, similar to the Stand-By Arrangement (SBA); and
- the Rapid Credit Facility (RCF) provides rapid low-access with limited conditionality to meet urgent balance of payments needs.

IMF is considered to be coach and advisor because of its 3 level surveillance role:

- Global: World Economic Outlook and Global Financial Stability Report;
- Regional: Regional Economic Outlooks;
- Bilateral: regular checkups of countries, known as Article IV consultations (country surveillance).

Global surveillance entails reviews by the IMF's Executive Board of global economic trends and developments. The main reviews are based on the World Economic Outlook reports and the Global Financial Stability Report, which covers developments, prospects, and policy issues in international financial markets. Both reports are published twice a year, with updates being provided on a quarterly basis. In addition, the Executive Board holds more frequent informal discussions on world economic and market developments.

The IMF also has the option of holding multilateral consultations, involving smaller groups of countries , to foster debate and develop policy actions designed to address problems of global or regional importance. In 2006, multilateral consultations brought together China, euro area countries, Japan, Saudi Arabia, and the United States to discuss global economic imbalances.

When a country joins the IMF, it agrees to subject its economic and financial policies to the scrutiny of the international community. It also makes a commitment to pursue policies that are conducive to orderly economic growth and reasonable price stability, to avoid manipulating exchange rates for unfair competitive advantage, and to provide the IMF with data about its economy. The IMF's regular monitoring of economies and associated provision of policy advice is intended to identify weaknesses that are causing or could lead to financial or economic instability. This process is known as surveillance.

Regional surveillance involves examination by the IMF of policies pursued under currency unions—including the euro area, the West African Economic and Monetary Union, the Central African Economic and Monetary Community, and the Eastern Caribbean Currency Union. Regional economic outlook reports are also prepared to discuss economic developments and key policy issues in Asia Pacific, Europe, Middle East and Central Asia, Sub-Saharan Africa, and the Western Hemisphere.

Country surveillance is an ongoing process that culminates in regular (usually annual) comprehensive consultations with individual member countries, with discussions in between as needed. The consultations are known as "Article IV consultations" because they are required by Article IV of the IMF's Articles of Agreement. During an Article IV consultation, an IMF team of economists visits a country to assess economic and financial developments and discuss the country's economic and financial policies with government and central bank officials. IMF staff missions also often meet with parliamentarians and representatives of business, labor unions, and civil society.

The team reports its findings to IMF management and then presents them for discussion to the Executive Board, which represents all of the IMF's member countries. A summary of the Board's views is subsequently transmitted to the country's government. In this way, the views of the global community and the lessons of international experience are brought to bear on national policies. Summaries of most discussions are released in Public Information Notices and are posted on the IMF's web site, as are most of the country reports prepared by the staff.

In June 2007 the IMF's Executive Board adopted a comprehensive policy statement on surveillance. The 2007 Decision on Bilateral Surveillance over Member's Policies, complements Article IV of the IMF's Articles of Agreement and introduces the concept of external stability as an organizing principle for bilateral surveillance. This means that the main focus of the discussions between the IMF and country officials is whether there are risks to the economy's domestic and external stability that would call for adjustments to that country's economic or financial policies.

IMF is considered to be an architect because:

- it improves surveillance of global economic developments and policies;
- it strebghtens economic policy coordination;
- it improves regulation and supervision of internationallya ctive financial institutions;
- it enhances financing arrangements.

In this difficult environment, the IMF is helping governments to protect and even increase social spending, including social assistance. In particular, the IMF is promoting measures to increase spending on, and improve the targeting of, social safety net programs that can mitigate the impact of the crisis on the most vulnerable in society. Below are some examples of how recent IMF-supported programs seek to protect social spending in a way that is both fiscally sustainable and cost-effective[10].

Armenia	Protecting and better targeting social spending. The program has aimed at mitigating the impact of the crisis on the poor. To this end, social spending rose from 5.8 percent of GDP in 2008 to 6.9 percent of GDP in 2010. Looking ahead, the program aims to protect social spending while at the same time improving the targeting of social safety nets. So as to allow the expansion of benefits to more eligible families.
Belarus	Strengthening the social safety net. To protect the most vulnerable people against the effects of economic shocks, the authorities increased in 2009 allowances for housing assistance for families with 3 or more children, noncash housing subsidies for low-income families, and unemployment assistance. The 2010 budget doubled targeted social assistance (TSA), as the authorities reformed this program to widen its scope and increase the average assistance for poor households. The government plans with technical assistance from the IMF to reform TSA in order to improve its effectiveness in view of restructuring and possible privatization of state-owned enterprises.
Bosnia and Herzegovina	Protecting social spending. The program aims to cushion the aftershocks of the global economic crisis and of the fiscal adjustment on vulnerable groups by avoiding cuts to pensions and reforming the social safety net. The rights-based benefits system is being overhauled with help from the World Bank to improve targeting and prevent abuses of eligibility criteria. Entity governments have adopted laws mandating means-testing and auditing of most civilian and war-related benefits, but implementation has been slow and the savings so far have been insufficient to allow increased support of the most vulnerable. Ongoing reform of the pension systems in both Entities aim at putting them on a sustainable footing through parametric reform and proper screening of recipients of pensions given under special conditions.

[10] Information available at http://www.imf.org/external/np/exr/facts/protect.htm.

Burundi	Strengthening the social safety net. Fiscal and monetary policy was eased in 2009 to help the economy adjust to the shocks from the global financial crisis. To offset the impact of this crisis on the poor, the IMF-supported program accommodated emergency spending on targeted social safety nets (approximately 1.5 percent of GDP). Such spending, financed by donor grants, was programmed for food security and school feeding programs and to assist the most vulnerable segments of the population and farmers. Notwithstanding a difficult budgetary situation, social spending increased from 15.1 percent of GDP in 2008 to 16.8 percent of GDP in 2009.
Costa Rica	Higher social spending. Fiscal policy under the IMF-supported program, which expired in July 2010, aimed at mitigating the adverse effects of the drop in private demand. The authorities used available fiscal space to increase spending in education, health and social protection. As a result, social spending increased by over 3 percentage points of GDP in 2009 and 2010, despite a substantial decline in fiscal revenues.
Dominican Republic	Strengthening the social safety net. Despite record high growth in the period 2003–08, poverty indicators are still weaker than before the financial crisis of 2003. As the global crisis unfolded, the poverty situation deteriorated further. An important element of the Stand-By Arrangement approved by the Executive Board in November 2009 is to strengthen the social safety net. The IMF-supported program made it possible to increase the conditional cash transfer program (Solidaridad) by 70,000 families in the last quarter of 2009, which is over 10 percent of the population living in conditions of extreme poverty, and increase the coverage of the program to about 85 percent of the poor. In addition, the program aims at achieving by end-2011 an increase in the coverage of poor families under the targeted electricity subsidy program BONOLUZ, from 50,000 in December 2010 to 250,000, and a further extension of the conditional cash transfer program by 60,000 additional families to 590,000. In addition, the authorities committed to increase social spending (mostly education and health) by 0.75 percent of GDP a year during 2010–12 (something that has proven a challenge in 2010 and 2011 because of the fiscal consequences of the oil shock).
El Salvador	Better targeting and higher social spending. The government's IMF-supported program seeks to place debt on a firm downward path while making space for priority social spending. Subsidies (transportation, water, electricity, and liquefied propane gas) have been targeted to low-income households, with the savings (0.4 percent of GDP) used to broaden health services in low-income areas, provide uniforms and meals to school children, and expand conditional cash transfers. To strengthen the social safety net, the minimum pension has been raised to equal the minimum wage.
Guatemala	Higher social spending. Social spending increased by 1.3 percent of GDP (from 4.4 percent of GDP in 2008 to 5.7 percent in 2010). The authorities' social protection policy focused on enhancing existing programs to offset the effect of the crisis on the poorest segments of the population. To address extreme poverty, emphasis was placed on four flagship government programs. A key conditional cash transfer program that was initiated in 2008 ("Mi familia progresa") was expanded to reach 0.3 percent of GDP in 2010 (from less than 0.1 percent of GDP in 2008).
Hungary	Better targeting. TThe fiscal strategy under the IMF-supported program, which expired in October 2010, aimed at protecting the poor and low-income earners from the impact of the global crisis. Measures included preserving the purchasing power of low-income civil servants despite the nominal freeze of the public sector wage bill, replacing a universal housing subsidy by a targeted scheme to help the needy have access to adequate housing, and canceling increases in disability pensions while increasing benefits for the poorest disabled, and temporarily guaranteeing mortgage payments for unemployed people. Active labor market policies have been used to maintain employment.

Iceland	Higher social spending. Automatic stabilizers were allowed to operate with few limits in 2009, which means Iceland's extensive social safety net helped to cushion the blow for the most vulnerable groups. The fiscal consolidation currently underway aims to ensure a gradual and orderly return to sustainable levels of borrowing while preserving Iceland's social welfare model. To this end, the 2010 and 2011 budgets—while entailing expenditure cuts in some areas—have also added new programs to deal with specific issues (for example, youth unemployment and overly indebted households). Engagement with social partners and consensus building have facilitated agreements on key budget issues, including a framework for household debt workouts and the recently concluded tripartite stability pact, which entailed a substantial increase in social benefits.
Jamaica	Higher social spending. Despite the overall need for fiscal consolidation, the IMF-supported Stand-By Arrangement has been designed to help mitigate the impact of economic adjustment on the most vulnerable through meaningful increases in social spending for targeted programs. Spending on well-targeted social assistance programs has been increased to around 40 percent in FY2010–11 (0.3 percent of GDP). This increase will benefit the school feeding program, which provides breakfast as well as lunches to children, and the Programme of Advancement through Health and Education (PATH), which provides conditional cash transfers to five categories within the poorest income groups. The government will also be pursuing efforts to expand the social safety net to assist people below the poverty line who do not qualify for PATH assistance.
Latvia	Strengthening the social safety net. The IMF has been working with the authorities as well as with the European Commission and the World Bank to refine cost-cutting measures to make sure they can deliver the necessary adjustment while protecting the most vulnerable groups. These efforts have resulted in a comprehensive strategy to improve the social safety net at a cost expected to reach 0.5 percent of GDP in 2011. Measures include an increase in the guaranteed minimum income by 8 percent for adults and 22 percent for children, the full coverage of health copayments for poor and needy people, the protection of schooling for 5 and 6-year-olds, and the support of unemployed people through an active labor market program (co-financed from the European Social Fund) with over 180,000 envisaged participants.
Mongolia	Protect the poor from the burden of adjustment. As the global economic crisis unfolded, the Mongolian economy was hit hard (especially by the sharp decline in copper prices). By early 2009, growth was stalling, international reserves were being rapidly depleted, and there was insufficient financing to meet the needs of the government. An 18-month Stand-by Arrangement was approved in April 2009 and successfully completed in October 2010. The main goal was to ensure that the economy quickly returned to a path of strong, sustained, and equitable growth, which it has—GDP growth was 6.4 percent in 2010. A key pillar of the program was to shield the poor from the impact of the 2009 recession. Despite significant budget cuts, social transfers were protected in 2009 and actually increased last year. The authorities submitted a social transfer reform law to parliament in 2010, which, however, has not yet been passed. The law would introduce a targeted poverty benefit that would strengthen the social safety net and increase the resources available to protect the poorest.

Pakistan	Higher social spending and better targeting. Strengthening the social safety net is a key priority under the program. The government is collaborating with the World Bank to develop specific measures to strengthen the social safety net and improve targeting to the poor. Cash transfers to poor households were targeted to increase from 0.2 percent of GDP in 2008–09 to 0.6 percent in 2009–10, but due to administrative capacity constraints, social spending in 2009–10 was lower than budgeted, at 0.4 percent of GDP, though still significantly higher than in 2008–09. The 2010–11 budget assumed zero nominal growth in cash transfers compared to the 2009–10 outcome, which would imply a decline from 0.4 percent of GDP to 0.3 percent of GDP. However, the authorities also provided a one-off cash transfer to each household affected by the July 2010 floods in an amount totaling 0.2 percent of GDP at the federal and provincial levels. In September 2010, the IMF provided $451 million (0.2 percent of GDP) in emergency assistance, to be directed to the country's budget, which helped finance urgent spending to help the population affected by the floods, especially the poor and the vulnerable groups in need of food, shelter, and medical assistance. Preliminary data suggest that actual cash transfers, excluding flood relief, fell somewhat short of the budgeted amount. The 2011/12 budget targets a 15 percent nominal increase in cash transfers, which would imply a small reduction as a percent of GDP, to 0.25 percent. Although no specific provision for flood relief has been made in the 2011/12 budget, under their commitment with donor agencies, the authorities plan to provide $100 million through re-allocation within the budget as part of the overall Citizen's Damage Compensation Program. An additional $480 million being provided by donors would bring total cash transfers in FY2011/12 to about 0.5 percent of GDP.
Romania	Higher social spending and better targeting. The IMF-supported program provides room for additional spending of RON 250 million (amounting to 0.05 percent of GDP) in 2009 and RON 500 million (0.1 percent of GDP) in 2010 to alleviate the immediate impact of the current crisis on the most vulnerable households. Overall social assistance has increased by RON 9.8 billion (1.9 percent of GDP) in 2009 and RON 4.7 billion in 2010 (about 1 percent of GDP). The government has recently taken steps to consolidate certain social benefits and fight fraudulent claims, and is initiating work on a comprehensive reform to develop a more streamlined and transparent, means-tested social assistance system. Recently, the government is also making efforts to limit gas price increases for households and set up mechanisms to minimize the impact of heating price increases on vulnerable households.
Serbia	Protecting and better targeting social spending. Social spending remained protected from budget cuts. Serbia has a well-developed social protection system with an increasing share of well-targeted social programs, and the 2011 budget provides for an increase in the allocation for those benefits.
Seychelles	Better targeting. The Stand-By Arrangement of late 2008 introduced a cash transfer program, aimed at protecting the most vulnerable segments of the population, replacing untargeted universal product subsidies. The targeted social assistance program has worked well and was a key element to the rapid macroeconomic stabilization, which reduced consumer price inflation to near zero since early 2009.
Tajikistan	Higher social spending. Under the IMF-supported program, the authorities raised social- and poverty-related spending from 7.3 percent of GDP in 2008 to 9.0 percent of GDP in 2010, and intend to further increase it to 9.1 percent of GDP in 2011. In 2009–10, the increase fell partly on transfers to households to help them deal with the Ukraine	decline in disposable income on account of a 31 percent decline in remittances inflows during the global crisis, but also on strengthening Tajikistan's health and education systems. The authorities have also committed to reforming the agriculture sector with a view to creating employment opportunities and raising farmers' income potential. Seeking more effective social protection. Under the current IMF-supported program, existing social assistance programs in Ukraine are being expanded to protect the poorest households. Beginning 2011, the threshold for maximum utility costs as a percent of income for working families was lowered from 20 to 15 percent (and from 15 to 10 percent for pensioners). Amounts above this are covered by the state budget. This is expected to protect some 800,000 households (about 5 percent of total). The authorities are also undertaking a review of all existing programs, in consultation with the World Bank, with a view to improve their targeting and effectiveness (it is estimated that currently, only about 25 percent of overall social assistance is received by poor families).

Conclusions

As discussed before, the IMF's roles in the global financial crisis are firefighter, coach and advisor, architect.

But, the key role of the IMF is to identify contingent risks that threaten global economic and financial stability and to develop policy responses. With its mandate to promote economic and financial stability and its global membership, the IMF is uniquely placed to provide a forum for discussions on international economic issues and to help reach consensus on policy responses. For the Fund to be effective in this role, member countries must feel they have a stake and a voice. The transfer of at least 5 percent of voting power to underrepresented members by 2011, as agreed at the 2009 IMF annual meeting, is essential in this respect. Consideration should also be given to expanding the Fund's mandate to cover the capital account. But first, the Fund needs to distill the lessons of the crisis for its exchange rate advice.

Unfortunately, IMF is not the panaceum for the financial crisis. We withnesed the errors made by this institution in Romania, but we shouldn't forget also the errors made by the IMF in Argentina or in the Asian financial crisis. Moreover, the failure of the IMF strategy in Romania represents the topic of a future research.

However, the present activity of the IMF and the process of adapting this institution for the current crisis suggest that there is much to be talked about in the future.

References

- Age Bakker, The Role of the IMF in the Financial Crisis, Presentation made at the National Bank of Romania, Bucharest, December 17, 2009, available at http://www.bnro.ro/Interviews-and-presentations-1574.aspx;
- Ross P. Buckley, The Bankruptcy of Nations: An Idea Whose Time Has Come, The International Lawyer, Vol. 43, no. 3, p. 1189 – 1216;
- Aldo Caliari, Updating the International Monetary System to Respond to Current Global Challenges: Can It Happen Within the Existing Legal Framework?, Minnesota Journal of International Law, Vol. 20:2, p. 588 – 618;
- Lucian Croitoru, Vor fi duse la bun sfârşit acordurile României cu UE, FMI şi Banca Mondială, Bussiness Standard, November 17, 2009, available at http://www.bnr.ro/Puncte-de-vedere-4011.aspx;
- Edwin M. Truman, The IMF and the Global Crisis: Role and Reform, Remarks delivered to the Tulsa Committee on Foreign Relations on January 22, 2009 and to the Dallas Committee on Foreign Relations on January 23, 2009, available at http://www.iie.com/publications/papers/truman0109.pdf;

- Martin A. Weiss, The Global Financial Crisis: The Role of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), CRS Report for Congress, Updated October 30, 2008, available at http://fpc.state.gov/documents/organization/112052.pdf;
- Miranda Xafa, Role of the IMF in the Global Financial Crisis, Cato Journal, Vol. 30, No. 3 (Fall 2010), p. 475 – 479;
- www.bnr.ro;
- www.imf.org.

THE PUZZLE OF SIMULTANEOUS SAVINGS AND DEBTS

RODICA IANOLE*

Abstract

„Neither a borrower nor a lender be" recommends Shakespeare in Hamlet. The advice seems particularly interesting in nowadays society where a person can be easily found in both approximate situations, in the same time. It goes without saying that saving and borrowing do not describe mutually exclusive strategies of financial management and thus many people retain savings or carry on saving at the same time as having debts. We add to this fact a more pragmatically wisdom, the one of the economist Robert Solow -"We (economists) think of wealth as fungible; we think a dollar is a dollar. Why don't they (the others) do so?" (Solow, 1987) – and we naturally ask ourselves if the mechanism of having simultaneous savings and debts is a rational one, according to traditional economics.Making appeal to the emerging body of behavioral economics literature we reach to the mental accounting theory to see if it can explain savings inclination versus debt inclination. The main research question we want to explore is the following: if mental accounting prevents people from spending money from one „mental account" on goods belonging to another one, will people – after using all their money from a given account – be willing to go into debt to buy goods belonging to this account in a situation when they still have money in other accounts?

Keywords: mental accounting, savings, debts, behavioral economics.*

Introduction

This year I moved to a new place which needed lot of repairs in order to be habitable. After some thinking and some market research I have came up with a budget and started to plan the operation. Having a clear aversion to borrowing, I thought from the very beginning to use my savings in order the finance the project. However, discussing the situation with various groups of friends, more than once the following idea was advanced: why not take a small loan (more precisely an overdraft credit) for these specific expenditures and just keep my savings for vacations or other things? In the first instance I was quite surprised and confuse on hearing the alternative. It just seemed an unnecessary complication, given the fact that I already had the money. In the same time, something in the argument had an echo in me. Indeed, the perspective of an exotic trip would seem more feasible using my savings and not a loan, making also, by comparison, the perspective of a loan for house expenditures more reasonable. At the time, it was not enough to change my prudent and low-risk profile, thus I have proceeded in accordance with my way of doing things. Still, the thought stayed with me, making me wonder what kind of situations would make me switch towards the alternative, and of course, what determined my friends to suggest this.

As the story reveals, one important acknowledgement is that saving and borrowing do not describe mutually exclusive strategies of financial management. Also, it is usual for many people to retain savings or carry on saving at the same time as having debts (Livingstone & Lunt, 1993). At the first glance, this may seem an ordinary fact, especially in the contemporary period but if we to read it through the lens of standard economic theory an inconvenient immediately appears. To be precise, one of the basic rules of rational economic decision making is the following: do something only if the marginal utility you get from it exceeds the marginal cost of doing it. In our case, the problem is raised by the fact that usually the interest rate for loans is higher than the interest rate of savings. In other words, people fell more at ease to borrow while they maintain some savings, and they are willing to pay for this ease feeling a certain amount of money (mainly, the difference between the two interest rates, but also other commissions that may appear when contracting a loan).

* Assistant Lecturer, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, Faculty of Social and Administrative Sciences, Ph. D. candidate in Economics, National Institute of Economic Research, Romanian Academy (email: ianole.rodica.gmail.com).

The present study is a conceptual one and tries to envisage some potential explanations for the situations described above. Basu (2008) delves on the importance of this topic and proposes a behavioral model of simultaneous borrowing and saving, with time-inconsistent agents, showing, among others, that this strategy can lead to higher lifetime welfare than the conventional approach (of borrowing only when we do not dispose of other means). Taking it from here, we will further explore the concept of mental accounting on this choice, but also the impact of variables like the feeling of confidence, control and security on our decisions regarding savings and debts.

The paper has the following structure. We first review the emerging literature on mental accounting, savings and debts characteristics and dynamics, and discuss the implications for individual self-control. We then report on the extreme scenarios of over consumption and over borrowing, with some specific features on the Romanian society. The conclusions section sets the frame for a future experimental testing of the theoretical reasoning advanced through the manuscript.

Theoretical background

Mental accounting

A key concept of behavioral economics, mental accounting is the subject of consecrated research papers (Henderson and Peterson 1992; Kahneman and Tversky 1981; 1998; Prelec & Loewenstein, 1998; Thaler 1980, 1985, 1999) which have repeatedly shown how people refer to, evaluate and use in different ways resources based on the categories they belong or they have been assigned to. The implicit purpose of this cognitive mechanism is to keep track of expenses and to control consumption, allowing a diverse scale of labels for the accounts: similar goals, reasons, explicit purposes, similar purchase feature etc. In processual terms, there are even some analogies with the principles described in categorization, schema, and script theories.

A derived addition to the mental accounting theory is the mental budgeting construct. Heath and Soll (1996) state that consumers budget parts of their assets to separate mental accounts and then track expenses against the budgets. Furthermore, these expenses deplete the available reserves in the specific accounts and this leads to unlike future purchases. An important consequence of this process is the difficulty to correctly anticipate relevant consumption opportunities. Thus, it can be identified as one cause of over-consuming or under-consuming products from a given category.

In addition, the paper of Prelec and Lowenstein (1998) on the mental accounting of debts and savings is seminal for our discussion. Their article departs from the hypothesis that „acts of consumption and financial transactions call mental accounts to mind", and this structure is considered responsible for a certain state, of pleasure or of pain, determined by the position of the account. These types of mental accounts specific to a transaction can also exert a constraint for consumers to use the purchased goods and not go running for more appealing alternatives.

However, we need to be aware that people create mental accounts not only for spending. There is experimental evidence they do so also for time, in the attempt to balance their time across work and non-work activities (Rajagopal & Rha, 2009).

Another important fact is that the ambiguity that may me noticed around the system of mental accounting has be understood as a positive factor (Chema & Soma, 2006) for the desires of an individual, in the sense that it makes the whole process more malleable, leaving some space for „creative bookkeeping". In other words, there can appear breaches in the self-control system governed by mental accounts.

Account 1: Savings

Popular wisdom says that our savings are the best `umbrellas` for many types of `rainy days`. Thus, we should strive to accumulate them and be careful on how to spend them. Using the motive scale developed by Keynes (1936), this is a matter of precaution and it may easily stand as the most common explanation for contracting a loan and preserve savings for another rainy day. It is also confirmed by traditional theories that explain the savings-debts dynamic, under the label `the option value of savings`. Frequent examples illustrate the fact that under some risky circumstances or other types of emergencies an individual can make appeal to his savings promptly and comfortably. On the other hand, the manner in which we evaluate the gravity of a certain situation it is poorly documented. Assessing that it is the case to use savings or just postpone the action is more likely to be a subjective decision and not the result of an objective and rational line of thought. In this regard, time preferences are essential. More precisely, we refer to the degree in which individuals are likely to consider distant outcomes in choosing their present behavior. This insight can give us a sense of understanding on the type of financial decisions they will make and it was synthesized through the attribute `myopic` for describing the emphasis made by consumers on short-term benefits over long-term benefits (O'Donoghue & Rabin, 1999).

Moreover, behavioral research emphasizes the role of non-liquid savings as a self-control tool (Laibson et al., 2001). Agents conserve their assets for a delayed consumption in the future and prefer to borrow for their present consumption, usually with the help of financial products like overdrafts, debt credit cards and so on. The issues that are usually ignored are the advantages of paying cash: not paying any type of interest (interest which is omnipresent and multivariate, depending on the type of credit card) and having greater probabilities to get some better deals in terms of availability, logistics, delivery etc.

From the mental accounts basic assertion that an individual may value two identical monetary gains differently because they are coded and evaluated through two distinct mental accounts, it was also inferred that the same absolute saving made on an article seems to be more appealing the higher its relative value compared to the initial cost of the article, even in the conditions that the total sum paid for all purchases made remains the same (Moon et al., 1999).

Account 2: Debts

In the attempt of identifying a rationale for the existence of debts in the equation modeling our case, we also stopped at one statement of common sense frequently asserted by consumers: if I can pay off the amount borrowed over a short period of time, I will not disrupt my savings plans. From a behavioral economics point of view, this is a classical illustration of the cognitive bias called overconfidence effect. Due to a miscalibration of subjective probabilities, the individuals `sincerely believe they have expertise, act as experts and look like experts` (Kahneman, 2011). On an operational level, they underestimate future costs and over evaluate present benefits, unconsciously bounding their willpower. The logic applies perfectly to the activity of contracting loans even without a solid motivation, just by ignoring potential future credit obligations, information and transactions costs as additions to the pretty picture depicted in the present. To properly use the economic terminology, we speak of hyperbolic discounting of future costs.

In accordance with the findings on materialism – defined as „the centrality of possession and acquisition in consumers' lives" (Richins & Dawson, 1992) - the results of a study performed by Watson (1998) are pointing out to the following conclusion: people who are highly materialistic have more favorable attitudes toward spending as well as more favorable attitudes toward debt than people with low levels of materialism. What was not yet properly analyzed is the impact of such attitudes towards empirical actions like excessive debt.

From an emotional perspective, the discomfort provoked by being in debt or by having worrying thoughts of not being able to return the money is alleviated by the confidence state given by the existence of savings. However, if we turn to the reasons listed for savings, there is one that comes in a deep contradiction with the simultaneous debt-savings situations: the down-payment motive (Browning & Lusardi, 1996), which aims exactly at using savings for expensive and durable goods or other type payments.

On an operational note, Kilborne (2006) proposes that these behavioral insights may be used to improve the legislative framework concerning consumer debt and bankruptcy, preventing in this way a range of social problems associated with excessive consumer debt: job loss, medical disorders (both physical and psychological), divorces etc.

The „over" puzzle: over-consuming and over-borrowing

In the last couple of years, consumer credit has grown more and more, projecting itself into a positive aura of empowering consumers by increasing their possibilities to choose and finally by making them to live better through a leverage of future earning potential. Most analyses of consumption societies were made at the beginning on the US case and some western European countries, but the consumerist phenomenon has rapidly expanded to China, Middle East and Eastern Europe.

In Romania, before the start of financial crisis, in 2005 and 2006, the credits granted to the population were representing 34,5% from the governmental credit, the percentage registering an increase of 7 percentage points only in 10 months, compared with the 3.7 point in the all 2004 year. Moreover, the population credit has surpassed in value both production and investments credits of the firms. (National Bank of Romania, Report on credit tendencies, 2005). In these conditions, with a level of almost 15% of the GDP, the market for consumption credits in Romania is a leader in the region, considerably surpassing the average of 9.4% and even more developed neighboring countries like the Czech Republic, Poland or Turkey.

More recent data from the media (Business Magazin, 2010), confirm that 30% of the Romanians in the urban environment have loans: 37% for daily expenses, 25% for constructions and renovations, 11% for buying a house, 11% for buying a car, 8% for studies (personal ones or for their children), 3% for refinancing another loan, 3% for going on holiday, 2% for medical services or medicines. It is true that in the last year, the rate of loans has diminished for most of categories apart from housing loans, but also true is the difficulty to find data on the level of savings. The general assumption is that these savings are quite low but even in this case there still remains a problem of transparency. Another information promoted by the media is that Romanians do not compare bank offers. We also need to ask ourselves if this is a matter of ignorance or just a generalized feeling of mistrust Within this clear context of over-borrowing, we reiterate our initial research question, searching for a potential pattern in our choice that makes us more eager for debts than for savings.

Consumption society may have overleaped the feedback of self-control imposed by mental accounts and, on the same basis of preserving the specific destination of an account, we assist at the refill of an account through loans, even if there are savings available for spending. Not crossing the line and spend them it is indeed a good measure of self-control. However, if the temptation is strong enough, and the financial sector allows, the account can be easily filled through credit, thus invalidating the initial control and indulging anyways into an irrational process of consumption.

Paraphrasing some research that states that in the absence of self-control devices, they may over consume vices and under consume virtues (Baumeister, 2002; Schelling, 1984), we may postulate an overconsumption of debts and an under consumption of savings. This characterization is made possible through the violation of the fungibility principle, largely assumed by economic theory. The principle simply implies that any unit of money is substitutable for another and that the composition of income is irrelevant for consumption. By contrast, both natural field experiments and controlled laboratory ones (Abeler & Marklein, 2008; Frederick, 2005; Benjamin et al., 2006;) have shown that the principles fails to be validated for cognitive reasons. For example, there are findings pointing out that subjects equipped with higher mathematical and cognitive skills are more likely to behave in line with standard economic theory, whereas subjects revealing lower cognitive skills have the tendency to act in accordance with theories of bounded rational behavior.

Conclusions and further research

The paper was born from a personal inquiry: it will be better get loan and preserve my savings, in a given situation? From this point, a large span of questions arises: Should I use my savings to pay my debts? What role does play the nature/category of the good which is the object of savings or debts in making the financial decision? Do acquiring new debts while maintaining savings generate an individual feeling of security and/or a collective vicious circle of indebtedness?

With the help of mental accounting theory, we wanted to draw bring some new perspective on why we irrationally go simultaneously into debt and over consume in some areas. If mental accounting prevents people from spending money from one „mental account" on goods belonging to another one, will people - after using all their money from a given account – be willing to go into debt to buy goods belonging to this account in a situation when they still have money in other accounts? This is a problem that needs to be approach in an experimental manner because at least at a theoretical level there are some hints that point to a positive answer.

In our further work, we plan to test the following hypothesis: The subject will be more likely to decide to get a loan in a situation when goods belong to different categories, than when both goods belong to the same category? In addition, we are interested in exploring the causality between this behavior, consumption society and subjective well-being.

References

- Abeler, J. & Marklein, F. (2008). Fungibility, labels and consumption, IZA Discussion Paper No. 3500, available at http://ftp.iza.org/dp3500.pdf
- Barberis, N. & Huang, M. (2001). Mental accounting, loss aversion, and individual stock returns, Journal of Finance 56(4), p. 1247-1292.
- Basu, K. (2008). A Behavioral Model of Simultaneous Borrowing and Saving, available at http://mpra.ub.uni-muenchen.de/20442/1/karnabasu-simultaneous.pdf
- Benjamin, D. J., Brown, S. A. & Shapiro, J. M. (2006), Who is 'behavioral'? Cognitive ability and anomalous preferences, Harvard University Working Paper.
- Browning, M., & Lusardi, A. (1996). Household saving: Micro theories and micro facts, Journal of Economic Literature, XXXIV(4), 1797–1855.
- Cheema, A. & Soman, D. (2006). Malleable Mental Accounting: The Effect of Flexibility on the Justification of Attractive Spending and Consumption Decisions, Journal Of Consumer Psychology, 16(1), 3344
- Druica, E., Cornescu, V., Ianole, R. (2010). Consumerism and Hyperconsumerism in the Romanian Society, Global Business and Management Research: An International Journal, Vol.2, Nr.4, pp.386-402
- Frederick, S. (2005), Cognitive reflection and decision making, Journal of Economic Perspectives 19(4), 25-42.
- Heath, C. & Soll, J. (1996), Mental budgeting and consumer decisions, Journal of Consumer Research
- Henderson, P. & Peterson, R. (1992). Mental Accounting and Categorization. Organizational Behavior and Human Decision Processes 51(1), 92–117.
- Kahneman, D. (2011). Don't Blink! The Hazards of Confidence. New York Times, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2011/10/23/magazine/dont-blink-the-hazards-of confidence.html?_r=1&pagewanted=all
- Kamleitner, B. & Kirchler, E. (2006), Personal loan users' mental integration of payment and consumption, Marketing Letters, 17:281–294
- Keynes, J. M. (1936). The general theory of employment, interest and money. London: Macmillan.

- Kilborn, J. (2006), Behavioral Economics, Overindebtedness & Comparative Consumer Bankruptcy: Searching For Causes And Evaluating Solutions, available at http://www.law.emory.edu/fileadmin/journals/bdj/22/22.1/Kilborn.pdf, Emory Bankruptcy Developments Journal, vol 22
- Kivetz, R. (1999). Advances in research on mental accounting and reason-based choice. Marketing Letters*, 10(3), 249–266.*
- Laibson, D., Repetto, A., & Tobacman, J. (2003), A Debt Puzzle, in Knowledge, Information, and Expectations in Modern Economics: In Honor of Edmund S. Phelps by Aghion, P., Frydman, R., Stiglitz, J., and Woodford, M. (eds.), Princeton University Press
- Livingstone, S., & Lunt, P. (1993). Savers and borrowers: Strategies of personal financial management. Human Relations, 46, 943–985.
- Moon, P., Keasey, K. & Duxbury, D. (1999). Mental accounting and decision making: The relationship between relative and absolute savings, Journal of Economic Behavior & Organizations, Volume 38, pp. 145±153
- Prelec, D. & Loewenstein, G. (1998). The Red and the Black: Mental Accounting of Savings and Debt, Marketing Science, Vol. 17, No. 1, pp. 4-28
- Rajagopal, P. & Rha, J. (2009). The Mental Accounting of Time. Journal of Economic Psychology, 30, 772–81.
- Richins, M.L & Dawson, S. (1992), Consumer Values Orientation for Materialism and Its Measurement: Scale Development and Validation, Journal of Consumer Research, Vol. 19, 303-316.
- Schelling, T. C. (1984). The mind as a consuming organ. In T. Schelling (Ed.), Choice and consequence: Perspectives of an errant economist (pp. 328–346). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Shefrin, H. & Thaler, R. (1988), The behavioral life-cycle hypothesis, Economic Inquiry 26, 609-643.
- Shefrin, H. & Thaler, R.(1992). Mental accounting, saving, and self-control. In George Loewenstein and Jon Elster, Eds.), Choice over Time. New York: Russel Sage Foundation
- Shefrin, H. & Thaler, R. (2006). Invest now, drink later, spend never: On the mental accounting of delayed consumption, Journal of Economic Psychology 27, 694–712
- Thaler, R. (1980), Toward a positive theory of consumer choice, Journal of Economic Behavior & Organization 1, 39-60.
- Thaler, R. H. (1985). Mental accounting and consumer choice. Marketing Science, 4, 199-21 4.
- Thaler, R. H. (1999). Mental accounting matters. Journal of Behavioral Decision Making, 12(3), 183–206.
- Tversky, A. & Kahneman, D. (1981). The framing of decisions and the psychology of choice., Science 211, 453±458.
- Watson, J. (1998), Materialism and Debt: A Study of Current Attitudes and Behaviors", available at http://www.acrwebsite.org/volumes/display.asp?id=8153
- Winnett, A. & Lewis, A. (1995), Household accounts, mental accounts, and savings behaviour: Some old economics rediscovered?, Journal of Economic Psychology 16 (1995) 431-448

GROWTH OF COLLECTIVE INTELLIGENCE BY LINKING KNOWLEDGE WORKERS THROUGH SOCIAL MEDIA

JAROSLAVA KUBÁTOVÁ*

Abstract

Collective intelligence can be defined, very broadly, as groups of individuals that do things collectively, and that seem to be intelligent. Collective intelligence has existed for ages. Families, tribes, companies, countries, etc., are all groups of individuals doing things collectively, and that seem to be intelligent. However, over the past two decades, the rise of the Internet has given upturn to new types of collective intelligence. Companies can take advantage from the so-called Web-enabled collective intelligence. Web-enabled collective intelligence is based on linking knowledge workers through social media. That means that companies can hire geographically dispersed knowledge workers and create so-called virtual teams of these knowledge workers (members of the virtual teams are connected only via the Internet and do not meet face to face). By providing an online social network, the companies can achieve significant growth of collective intelligence. But to create and use an online social network within a company in a really efficient way, the managers need to have a deep understanding of how such a system works.

Thus the purpose of this paper is to share the knowledge about effective use of social networks in companies. The main objectives of this paper are as follows: to introduce some good practices of the use of social media in companies, to analyze these practices and to generalize recommendations for a successful introduction and use of social media to increase collective intelligence of a company.

Keywords: collective intelligence, social media, knowledge, management, virtual team*

Introduction

This paper deals with collective intelligence in the era of Internet-based social media. This topic is worth our attention because if the company is able to use the potential of collective intelligence appropriately, it can achieve a strong competitive advantage. Collective intelligence can also be used for public benefit. In this paper we have tried to establish if there are some general rules how to use collective intelligence in favor of a certain project. The phenomenon of web-based collective intelligence is relatively new. The best theoretical background for this topic is created by the MIT Center for Collective Intelligence. The background publications on the subject of web-based collective intelligence are: Inventing the Organizations of the 21st Century by Thomas W. Malone, Robert Laubacher, and Michael S. Scott Morton,[1] The Future of Work by Thomas W. Malone,[2] Democratizing Innovation by Eric von Hippel,[3] or Organizing Business Knowledge: The MIT Process Handbook by Thomas W. Malone, Kevin Crowston, and George A. Herman[4]. The MIT Center for Collective Intelligence publishes working papers presenting the results of its research. These working papers are available at the website of the MIT Center for Collective Intelligence.[5]

* Associate Professor, Ph. D., Philosophical Faculty, Palacký University in Olomouc, Czech Republic (email: jaroslava.kubatova@upol.cz)

[1] Thomas W. Malone, Robert Laubacher, and Michael S. Scott Morton, Inventing the Organizations of the 21st Century (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2003).

[2] Thomas W Malone, The future of work: how the new order of business will shape your organization, your management style and your life (Boston: Harvard Business Press 2004).

[3] Eric von Hippel, Democratizing Innovation (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2005).

[4] Thomas W. Malone, Kevin Crowston, and George A. Herman, Organizing Business Knowledge: The MIT Process Handbook (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2003).

[5] "MIT Centre for Collective Intelligence – Publications", accessed November 19, 2011, http://cci.mit.edu/publications/index.html.

Some papers are also published in scientific journals such as MitSloan Management Review. To achieve our aim, i.e. to find some general guideline how to create a successful web-based collective intelligence network, we have analyzed six successful cases of the growth of collective intelligence and compared the concrete characteristics of the project with some general recommendations of the MIT Center for Collective Intelligence.

Collective intelligence has existed for as long as humans have. However, this traditional phenomenon is nowadays occurring in entirely new forms. Thanks to modern information and communication technologies (ICTs), particularly the Internet and Internet-based social media, large numbers of people around the world can work together in ways that were never possible before.[6] This possibility is a great opportunity but also a great challenge for the companies. The opportunity is strengthened by the fact that we live in the knowledge society and knowledge economy. That means that a growing ratio of products is based on knowledge and knowledge workers and their human capital are the most valuable sources of the companies which employ them. Since knowledge is intangible, it can be, at least in its explicit form, shared through ICTs. The companies can gather virtual teams of workers without having to take into account their geographical location, because the team members can communicate and cooperate via ICTs. Moreover, present-day companies can use collective intelligence of the crowd and take advantage of its collective intelligence. The crowd can be composed of employees, customers, experts, by the general public, etc. Thus, it is very important for the management of the companies to profoundly understand collective intelligence so the company can create and take advantage of these new possibilities.

Collective intelligence and Social Media

Not surprisingly, there are many definitions of collective intelligence. For the purposes of this paper we can use the definition by the MIT Center for collective intelligence. The experts from this center define collective intelligence as "Group(s) of individuals doing things collectively that seem intelligent."[7] Collective intelligence refers to harnessing the power of a large number of people to deal with a problem as a group. The idea is that a group of people can solve problems more efficiently and offer greater insight and a better answer than any one individual could provide. As mentioned above, these people can now cooperate via Internet-based social media. Social media refers to the ICT platforms designed for real-time social interaction.[8] The examples are wikis, discussion forums or blogs. Many platforms are available on public websites and are very popular, e.g. Facebook or LinkedIn. The companies can use also private sites, e.g. Jive, Yammer, Socialcast. Some of the platforms enable creating information and interaction for general audience, e g. Facebook, some are more specialized, e.g. LinkedIn enable professionals to create and share professional profiles and create professional networks. Enterprise social networks usually contain wikis, discussion forums, blogs, or enable sharing text and other files.

The managerial questions arise: Why should be the use of Internet-based social media efficient? Should the companies change the way of decision making and take into account the views of the crowd? And what are the key issues when designing collective intelligence platforms? Actually, these questions represent only a small part of the problems which the managers now have to solve. It is obvious, that current management models used in many organizations are obsolete, because they are based on bureaucratic hierarchies, on control and specialization and do not address the way knowledge workers work best. New innovative management practices must be implemented.

---

[6] Malone, The future of work.

[7] "Handbook of Collective Intelligence", accessed January 10, 2012, http://scripts.mit.edu/~cci/HCI/index.php?title=What_is_collective_intelligence%3F.

[8] Rafiq Dossani, Social Media and the Future of Business, accessed October 5, 2011, http://www.wipro.com/Documents/insights/SOCIAL-MEDIA.PDF.

Management innovation is the most challenging innovation which the organizations have to go through, but it is also the most enduring source of business innovation.[9]

While making decisions, current hypercompetitive and fast-paced business requires very broad exploration of potential opportunities, accurate responses and short response times – all that at once. Thanks to the Internet and other ICTs we have access to data, but we have to explore the data, find the opportunities and finally make decisions. Unfortunately, as individual decision makers, we have certain limitations. It seems that our brain is not well equipped to deal with so many business problems of this day in an effective way.[10] The solution can be to use collective intelligence of others. Thanks to currently available ICTs it is not a problem to involve a large group of people in the decision-making process. However, "the wisdom of crowds" in corporate decision making can only be used if the managers are able to assess whether in a given case the use of collective intelligence is appropriate, possible and under what conditions.

Decision making is the essence of management. To make a decision to solve a problem the managers actually have a two-level task. First, they have to generate different alternatives of problem solution and second, they have to evaluate these alternatives and chose the optimum one as a solution to the problem. During the decision making process the individual can fall into several traps.[11] The most common traps are

- Anchoring trap – the propensity to give a disproportionate weight to the first information the decision maker receives
- Status quo – the tendency to stick to the status quo
- Sunk costs – the predisposition to continue an endeavor once an investment in the form of money, effort, or time has been made
- Framing trap – the propensity to be influenced by different reference points
- False assumptions – the proclivity to assume something is true without evidence to support it
- Missed signals – the penchant to ignore warning signs

Competition trap – the urge to win during a competitive challenge that blinds decision makers from seeing reality clearly Collective intelligence can help mitigate the effects of these traps by bringing the diversity of viewpoints into the decision making process. Thanks to the use of the Internet and its specialized sites the companies can seek advice from the crowd.

Examples of successful growth of collective intelligence

In this part of the paper we have provide some examples of successful use of social media in favor of the growth of collective intelligence. Actually, it is a problem to claim that collective intelligence of a certain group of people is on a certain level or that it is increasing. Nevertheless, we can feel that if people create such a big thing such as e.g. Wikipedia, the new value or public knowledge arises. The MIT Center for Collective Intelligence examines the possibilities of measuring collective intelligence but there are no results yet.[12] However, if we extend the mentioned definition of collective intelligence we can assess if there is a growth of collective intelligence in the examples provided below. We have stated that collective intelligence can be defined as a group of individuals doing things collectively that seem intelligent. We can add that the group addresses new [9] Gary Hamel, "The Management 2.0 Challenge. How Will You Reinvent Management in Your Organization?" Harvard Business Review, July 28, 2011.

[10] Eric Bonabeau, "Decisions 2.0: The Power of Collective Intelligence," MIT Sloan Management Review. (Winter 2009): 45-52.

[11] John S. Hammond, Ralph L. Keeney and Howard Raiffa, "The Hidden Traps in Decision-Making," Harvard Business Review (January 2006): 118-126.

[12] "Measuring collective intelligence" accessed January 12, 2012, http://cci.mit.edu/research/measuring.html.

or trying situations and that the group applies knowledge to adapt to a changing environment.[13] Thus, if we can see that these assumptions are fulfilled successfully, we can conclude that collective intelligence is growing. The first three examples are focused on public networking, the other three examples are focused on private corporate networks.

Wikipedia

The famous example of collective intelligence is Wikipedia (www.wikipedia.org). Wikipedia is a multilingual, web-based, free-content encyclopedia project based on an openly editable model. Wikipedia is written collaboratively by largely anonymous volunteers. Anyone with Internet access can write and make changes to Wikipedia articles. Since its creation in 2001, Wikipedia has grown rapidly into one of the largest reference websites, attracting 400 million unique visitors monthly. There are more than 82,000 active contributors working on more than 19,000,000 articles in more than 270 languages. Contributions cannot damage Wikipedia because the software allows easy reversal of mistakes and many experienced editors are watching to help and ensure that the edits are cumulative improvements.[14]

Stack Exchange

Stack Exchange (www.stackexchange.com) is a very interesting example of collective intelligence. Stack Exchange is a fast-growing network of nearly 80 question and answer sites on diverse topics from software programming to cooking. It is an expert knowledge exchange site. After someone asks a question, members of the community propose answers. Others vote on those answers. Very quickly, the answers with the most votes rise to the top. The questions and answers on Stack Exchange can be edited by anyone. The site is free and open to everyone. Registration is not necessary; however, registered users can collect reputation points when people vote up his/her answers. It means that Stack Exchange focuses on solution proposals and also on solution evaluation. Everything is done publicly.

InnoCentive

A more business-oriented but still public example is the web site InnoCentive, through which companies can post their problems (challenges) and solicit solutions. The winning solution receives a cash award.

Social networking in NASA

NASA is the first example from the corporate segment. They started social networking in 2008 claiming that new ideas and new solutions for their complex missions require input from a geographically dispersed community of knowledge workers. By providing an on-line social network, NASA created a collective intelligence and learning community for its knowledge workers.[15] According to NASA on-line networking accelerates communication and problem solving, captures an individual knowledge worker's know-how for reuse by many, creates peer-to-peer communication in context and deepens the understanding for decision making. Currently NASA is still developing its social media-based networking. For internal communication, NASA uses Yammer and some of the employees use ExplorerNet – an internal social networking tool.[16] Each user of ExplorerNet has an individual profile with contact information, they can add information about their expertise, past and [13] "Handbook of Collective Intelligence".

[14] "Wikipedia: About", accessed December 10, 2011, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wikipedia:About.

[15] Celeste Merryman, Findings from the NASAsphere Pilot, accessed December 12, 2011, http://socialcast.s3.amazonaws.com/corporate/downloads/NASAsphereReportPublic.pdf.

[16] In Talk. Social Media in NASA. May/June 2011, accessed January 15, 2012 http://www.nasa.gov/pdf/542302main_ITTalk_May2011.pdf.

current project, etc. Each user is also given his/her own blog, wiki and discussion space. Communities are another component of ExplorerNet. The communities have wikis, discussion forums, community blog, polling and some project management functionality. Anyone can create a community at any time for any purpose. The communities can easily cooperate as virtual teams. The employees state that thanks to ExplorerNet they are able to cooperate at a much higher level than before.

Mutual Fun in Rite-Solutions

Rite-Solutions (www.ritesolutions.com) created a state-of-the-art "innovation engine" designed to provoke and align individual brilliance toward collective genius. The goal of the company was to connect people on an emotional level where all employees are entrusted with the future direction of the company, asked for their opinions, listened to, and rewarded for successful ideas. Rite-Solutions is a software/system engineering company. It is built on two fundamental beliefs:

- Nobody is as smart as everybody (good ideas are not bounded by an organizational structure, but can come from anyone, in any place, at any time)
- The hierarchical pyramid as a relevance structure is a relic of command and control conventional wisdom, more suited to controlling information flow than fostering innovation

In 2005 Rite-Solutions launched a collaborative stock market-based game with the aim of making the employee feel relevant to the success of the business in the most tangible way, and tapping their amazing intellectual bandwidth far beyond assigned job tasks. The name of the application is Mutual Fun.[17] The first step of the user is to complete a profile that details his/her work experience, expertise and capabilities, interests and curiosities. This is how users establish what they bring to the game table and ultimately allows other players to search for people who might be able to assist them in various areas of their innovative ideas based on profile information. Every person in the company gets an initial $10,000 to invest in their peers' "idea stocks." Players can float, advance and develop portfolios of ideas. Colleagues can make dollar investments in stocks, volunteer time or express interest. An algorithm dynamically derives individual stock values and a player's place on the leader board (from an individual's own idea stock values and activity in assisting, investing, and discussing their co-workers ideas). Inevitably, volunteer teams spring up around initiatives on Mutual Fun. The best ideas are realized by the company.

Some of the most valuable ideas come from the most unexpected places. A company administrator with no technical experience came up with an idea for using a bingo algorithm which Rite-Solutions had created for their casino clients to create a web-based educational tool. The inspiration came when this employee helped her daughter with a school project. That idea, "Win/Play/Learn" immediately caught the attention of some engineers, who developed her idea into a successful product. By 2011 Mutual Fun innovation game generated more than 50 innovative products, service and process ideas, 15 of which have been successfully launched and account for 20 % of the company's total revenue.

My Customer in Best Buy

Our last example is from the company Best Buy (www.bestbuy.com). Best Buy is an innovative consumer electronics retailer with over 1,500 retail locations across North America, Europe and Asia. The Company prides itself on the knowledge of its employees and unleashing the power of its people as part of its core philosophy and values.[18] Best Buy created the software platform "My Customer" to unleash the voice of its more than 100,000 frontline employees to share what they heard or learned from daily interactions with customers. The thought was that Best Buy can solve real problems that employees report in as close to real-time as possible. By processing data in the analytics, Best Buy can acquire early indicators of potential opportunities or issues that can be addressed by various business units throughout the company. The fact that any employee could participate in helping drive change was powerful in itself. The managers are still listening to the employees. My Customer is ingrained in normal business rhythms. Employee satisfaction directionally increased in correlation with the submissions provided. If leaders listen to what employees share, employees in turn feel good about their work and feel valued.

[17] Jim Lavoie, Nobody's as Smart as Everybody - Unleashing Individual Brilliance and Aligning Collective Genius, accessed October 10, 2011, http://www.managementexchange.com/story/nobody%E2%80%99s-smart-everybody-unleashing-quiet-genius-inside-organization.

All the above-mentioned companies take advantage from the Web-enabled collective intelligence. All of them link knowledge workers or volunteers with certain knowledge through social media. In all examples groups of individuals do things collectively in a way which seem intelligent. We can state this because all the groups achieve useful results. Wikipedia is a broadly used encyclopedia, Stack Exchange helps people solve problems and achieve professional reputation; InnoCentive is a platform for gathering innovative problem solution, where people can meet companies and vice versa. NASA shifted the level of cooperation to a higher level, Rite-Solutions creates innovative products and Best Buy can immediately respond to customer needs. In these cases we can speak about collective intelligence without hesitation.

Another question is, if the groups of people in our examples address new or trying situations and if their knowledge is used to adapt to a changing environment. In Wikipedia new articles are written every day and many articles are reworked and updated. The content of the articles mirrors the changing environment. In Stack Exchange the experts answer the questions and the knowledge is captured in the application for future needs. The knowledge is used by the people to solve their job tasks or private issues. In any case, the knowledge is used to address a new or trying situation. In InnoCentive the companies directly go public with their problems (trying situations) and thanks to the knowledge of other people their problems are solved. NASA reported that thanks to social networking the communication and problem solving accelerates and the understanding for decision making is deeper than before. If we understand a problem and are able to find a solution, it means that we have adapted to a new situation. Rite-Solutions uses collective intelligence of its workers to create new business ideas and develop new products. If the new product is successful, it means that the company is able to react to the changing needs of its customers. The main idea of My Customer application in Best Buy is to solve the problems of the customers in real time. It means that Best Buy, thanks to My Customer, can address new or trying situations. In all these examples the characteristics of the growth of collective intelligence are fulfilled, and Web-based social networking triggers the growth of social intelligence.

General rules for successful social networking

The preceding examples are concrete cases of the growth of collective intelligence by linking people through social media. But another question arises: Are there any general rules for successful social networking in order to increase collective intelligence? Apparently, to many problems that the companies face, there is potentially a solution out there, however, far outside of the traditional places where management usualy search for it. Why don't more businesses use collective intelligence to solve their problems? It seems that they do not know how. Practice is still far ahead of theory in the field of collective intelligence and managers are not always willing to use the trial-and-error method. In this paper some successful projects are presented, but numerous projects have failed. The MIT

[18] Steve Wallin, My Customer: One Voice is Noise, Many is a Chorus – Voice of the Customer through the Employee, accessed October 14, 2011, http://www.managementexchange.com/story/my-customer-one-voice.

Center for Collective Intelligence identified a relatively small set of attributes which are present in successful collective intelligence systems.[19] Let's introduce these attributes and examine if there are present in our examples.

To build the kind of collective intelligence system suitable for the desired goal, managers have to ask four main questions:

What is being done?
Who is doing it?
Why are they doing it?
How it is being done?

In general, these questions have to be answered for any business activity. What often differs in case of the web-based collective intelligence are the answers.

The answer to What is the mission, goal or at a lower level task. As mentioned above, management as a decision making body consists of two steps: it is necessary to create possible solutions and to decide which of them will be realized.

The answers to Who are very interesting in case of collective intelligence. Traditionally the answer is the experts or managers inside the company. But in web-based collective intelligence systems activities can be taken by anyone in a large group. The group can be unlimited (like in case of Wikipedia, Stack Exchange or InnoCentive) or limited, e.g. to employees (like in NASA, Rite-Solutions or Best Buy).

Why is the question of motivation. Why do people take part in the activity? Examining the motivation of the contributors is a big and also interesting task. However, we can find three main incentives which make people participate in social networks. It can be money, love and glory.[20] Money is a traditional source of motivation. Love is a motivator which works well in social networks. People are motivated by their enjoyment of an activity or by the opportunity to socialize with others and by the feeling that they contribute to some large cause. Glory can also be an important motivator. People want to be recognized and appreciated by peers, experts or managers.

How refers to the procedure how to chose the best idea proposed by the contributors. (We do not deal with the technical solutions of web-based collective intelligence applications.) Usual group decision making methods such as voting, consensus, and averaging can be used there, sometimes contest is possible and also final individual decision can be made by the responsible person.

In table 1 the attributes What, Who, Why and How for the above mentioned examples are identified.

[19] Thomas W Malone, Robert Laubacher, Chrysanthos Dellarocas, "The Collective Intelligence Genome," MitSloan Management Review, (Spring 2010, Vol. 51, No.3): 21 – 31.

[20] "The Collective Intelligence Genome", 27.

Table 1: The What, Who, Why and How of the successful collective intelligence networks

Example	What	Who	Why	How
Wikipedia	Freely available full sum of human knowledge to all people in their own language[21]	Anyone	Love Glory	There is no need to make decisions. Public and editors can influence the content of the articles.
Stack Exchange	An expert knowledge exchange, network on diverse topics[22]	Anyone	Love Glory	Voting. The best answers are voted by the users.
InnoCentive	The world's largest problem solving marketplace, the open innovation and crowdsourcing pioneer that enables organizations to solve their key problems by connecting them to diverse sources of innovation[23]	Anyone	Love Glory Money	Individual decision. The company chooses the best solution and the author receives a financial award.
NASA	To foster an environment of creativity and innovative thinking[24]	The employees	Love Glory Efficient teamwork	Team decision making
Rite-Solutions	Create internal markets for ideas, cash & talent, depoliticize decision-making[25]	The employees	Love Glory Money	Voting. Some of the best ideas are founded by the company management – final managerial decision based on employee recommendation.
Best Buy	Create a democracy of information, enable communities of passion, expand the scope of employee autonomy[26]	The employees	Love Glory	Employees' immediate managers response to employee submissions, in more general topics top management is engaged.

[21] "Wikipedia: About", accessed December 10, 2011 http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wikipedia:About.
[22] "Stack Exchange", accessed January 12, 2012, http://stackexchange.com/about.
[23] "InnoCentive", accessed January 13, 2012, http://www.innocentive.com/about-innocentive.
[24] James McClellan, Beyond 140 Characters: Social Media@JSC accessed January 14, 2012, http://www.nasa.gov/offices/ocio/ittalk/5-2011_SocialMediaAtJSC.html.
[25] Lavoie, Nobody's as Smart as Everybody.
[26] Wallin, My Customer.

As we can see all the networks have a very clear goal, the answer What is explicitly answered. Also the answer Who is clearly answered. It is necessary to give considerable thought to whether it is appropriate to ask the public to participate or to limit the network only to the employees or chosen experts. If a company invites the public, they can meet the people with knowledge and skills which they would not otherwise meet. But they also have to count on bigger danger of misuse or sabotage of the network. To cooperate with the people the company knows is better for the corporate security; however achievable knowledge and skills are smaller.

Before the company launches a collective intelligence network, they have to be sure as to the motivation of the participants to cooperate inside this network: Why should they participate? If there is no clear motivation, the project will sooner or later fail. In our examples the participants are highly motivated. It is surprising how many people love to contribute to Wikipedia or Stack Exchange. They do it for free, for their enjoyment or maybe for glory. If your answers in Stock Exchange are often voted for by other users, you start to be so-called guru and the employers can ask you for paid cooperation. But it seems that the main reason why people participate in Stack Exchange is the support and help to people who ask questions.

InnoCentive is an interesting corporate – public network. The participants can simply have fun when they suggest problem solutions, or they hope they will be recognized as experts and will be invited to some form of paid cooperation or they can even win the money promised by the company for the best problem solver.

NASA tried to create some up-to-dated communication tool for knowledge workers. The employees may like this tool, they can be recognized as experts but the main reason why to participate in the network is better, easier and faster cooperation inside the company. The networks used in NASA are efficient tools of knowledge management and help people work. In Rite-Solutions all the three motivators are interconnected. It is fun for the employees to participate, they can profile themselves as active experts and they can earn money because the system works as a stock market of ideas. If the idea is chosen for realization, it is fanatically supported by the management. Money is not the subject in Best Buy. The motivation for the employees is their engagement which is taken seriously by the managers. Employees feel that they are being listened to and that there is a response to their ideas which motivates them to continue to submit their ideas. The best of them are also recognized as high performers. As the network was created as a form of customer support, the increased satisfaction of customers makes the work more pleasant.

How represents the way collective intelligence will be used. How must be also clear, otherwise all the effort of the participants can be lost. In Wikipedia there is no need to decide a certain problem. In this case the participants cooperate in a surprisingly efficient way when creating and updating the articles. Also at Stack Exchange there is no need to decide which answer or question is the best one. However, the users can mark their favorite answers. Every user can decide which proposed solution is the best for his/her purpose. InnoCentive is a case of individual decision-making. Somebody in the company which posted the problem (challenge), has to choose a solution. In NASA the application serves for communication and for team work. Thus the decision is a matter of a team. In Rite-Solutions the management asks the employee to vote and they trust collective intelligence of their employees. In Best Buy the employees only post their experience, problems or ideas and mangers decide how to solve the situation.

We can conclude that in all the examples the answers to What, Who, Why and How are clear and known to all the participants. If people know, what is being done, that they are welcomed to participate, what the benefits they can achieve are, and how their contribution is used as a part of a bigger project, they are highly motivated. They are willing to share knowledge and become a part of a creative collective intelligence network.

Conclusion

The current management models inhibit the success of many companies. The companies which are able and willing to innovate their managerial methods achieve a strong competitive advantage. One of the big opportunities is the use of collective intelligence in decision making. Attainable collective intelligence is nowadays almost unlimited thanks to the Internet-based social networks. The use of collective intelligence can help companies solve their problems, to mitigate the effects of decision making traps, to overcome the individual brain limitations, etc.

We have introduced six examples of successfully growing collective intelligence, which is used in favor of the public or in favor of the companies. In many companies the use of collective intelligence is not yet on the agenda. The reason is that there are no general rules or guidelines how to build an efficient social network and how to take advantage of collective intelligence of the participants. There is always the danger, that instead of collective intelligence the company can tap into a collective madness. A lot of research has to be done before some general recommendation for building collective intelligence-based networks can be articulated. Moreover, it is very likely that the development of ICTs will be faster than research. So, what else can managers do than just look at examples and hope for inspiration and success? In this paper we have proved that well prepared answers to the common business questions What, Who, Why and How can support the success of a social network and to stimulate the growth of collective intelligence. There may be many combinations of What, Who, Why and How, but they always have to be carefully specified. Then the chance the project will be successful in the long-term increases. The use of social networking and collective intelligence is a big opportunity, it brings some risk but in any case it is an adventure.

References

- Eric Bonabeau, "Decisions 2.0: The Power of Collective Intelligence," MIT Sloan Management Review. (Winter 2009): 45-52.
- Rafiq Dossani, Social Media and the Future of Business, accessed October 5, 2011, http://www.wipro.com/Documents/insights/SOCIAL-MEDIA.PDF.
- Gary Hamel, "The Management 2.0 Challenge. How Will You Reinvent Management in Your Organization?" Harvard Business Review, July 28, 2011.
- John S. Hammond, Ralph L. Keeney and Howard Raiffa, "The Hidden Traps in Decision-Making," Harvard Business Review (January 2006): 118-126.
- "Handbook of Collective Intelligence", accessed January 10, 2012, http://scripts.mit.edu/~cci/HCI/index.php?title=What_is_collective_intelligence%3F.
- Eric von Hippel, Democratizing Innovation (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2005).
- "InnoCentive", accessed January 13, 2012, http://www.innocentive.com/about-innocentive
- In Talk. Social Media in NASA. May/June 2011, accessed January 15, 2012 http://www.nasa.gov/pdf/542302main_ITTalk_May2011.pdf.
- Jim Lavoie, Nobody's as Smart as Everybody - Unleashing Individual Brilliance and Aligning Collective Genius, accessed October 10, 2011, http://www.managementexchange.com/story/nobody%E2%80%99s-smart-everybody-unleashing-quiet-genius-inside-organization.
- Thomas W. Malone, Robert Laubacher, and Michael S. Scott Morton, Inventing the Organizations of the 21st Century (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2003).
- Thomas W Malone, Robert Laubacher, Chrysanthos Dellarocas, "The Collective Intelligence Genome," MitSloan Management Review, (Spring 2010, Vol. 51, No.3): 21 – 31.
- Thomas W. Malone, Kevin Crowston, and George A. Herman, Organizing Business Knowledge: The MIT Process Handbook (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2003).
- Thomas W Malone, The future of work: how the new order of business will shape your organization, your management style and your life (Boston: Harvard Business Press 2004).
- James McClellan, Beyond 140 Characters: Social Media@JSC accessed January 14, 2012, http://www.nasa.gov/offices/ocio/ittalk/5-2011_SocialMediaAtJSC.html.
- "Measuring collective intelligence" accessed January 12, 2012, http://cci.mit.edu/research/measuring.html.

- Celeste Merryman, Findings from the NASAsphere Pilot, accessed December 12, 2011, http://socialcast.s3.amazonaws.com/corporate/downloads/NASAsphereReportPublic.pdf.
- "MIT Center for Collective Intelligence – Publications", accessed November 19, 2011, http://cci.mit.edu/publications/index.html.
- "Stack Exchange", accessed January 12, 2012, http://stackexchange.com/about.
- Steve Wallin, My Customer: One Voic is Noise, Many is a Chorus – Voice of the Customer through the Employee, accessed October 14, 2011, http://www.managementexchange.com/story/my-customer-one-voice.
- "Wikipedia: About", accessed December 10, 2011, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wikipedia:About.

EXPORT PROMOTION POLICY, PREREQUISITE OF AN EFFICIENT NATIONAL FOREIGN TRADE STRATEGY

OCTAVIAN-LIVIU OLARU[1]

Abstract
The importance of international trade is widely recognized not only by the business sector, but also by governments. Governments all over the world have reviewed and streamlined their foreign trade strategies during the last decades. Nearly all countries have adopted special export promotion and development programmes. These programmes have focused on providing more efficient trade support services in areas such as trade information, financing, logistics, customs procedures and communications. Trade Promotion Organizations (TPOs) have a broad mandate to provide or coordinate trade support services in the above mentioned area.

Keywords: foreign trade strategy, export promotion

Introduction

In the context of globalization and increased competitiveness in the world market in general, and in Central and Eastern European countries, in particular, structural adjustment programmes and trade policy reforms are preconditions for economic growth and healthy trade performance. However, macroeconomic initiatives need to be complemented and supported at the microeconomic and operational level, in order to ensure a dynamic, outward-oriented and competitive business sector. Firstly, there is a need to improve the export supply response through institutional strengthening and enterprise-oriented assistance in areas such as product development and adaptation, trade finance, export quality management, export packaging, and better management of imported inputs. Secondly, efforts towards market expansion and diversification must be intensified, for example through the strengthening of business information networks.

Performance in international trade has become a synonym with international competitiveness for countries, regions and firms, alike. The successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round and the World Trade Organization setting up have reinforced the multilateral trading system and have intensified the level of competition in international markets. World trade has consistently outperformed GDP growth and is projected to expand twice as fast as world output in the following decade. In many ways, international trade has become the fast lane to economic growth and restructuring.

The importance of international trade is widely recognized not only by the business sector, but also by governments. Governments all over the world have reviewed and streamlined their trade policies during the last decades. Significantly, efforts have gone beyond the commercial policy framework. Nearly all countries have adopted special trade promotion and development programmes. These programmes have focused on providing more efficient trade support services in areas such as trade information, financing, logistics, customs procedures and communications.

A recent survey issued by the International Trade Centre UNCTAD/WTO estimated that the budgets for public trade promotion programmes, alone, amount to an average order of magnitude of 0.1% of national exports per year. This is equivalent to global expenditure on trade promotion of some US$ 10 billion for 2010. If one includes the budgets of non-commercial trade support services by non-governmental institutions such as chambers of commerce and industry associations, the amount would be significantly larger.

[1] Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Economic Sciences, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, (email: livolaru@yahoo.com).

In spite of this considerable resource endowment of trade promotion programmes, these programmes need to be selective in terms of products, functions and/or markets. An equal distribution of trade promotion resources over all products, functions and markets would obviously not make sense, as resources would be spread to thinly to reach anywhere a critical mass.

Strategic Guidelines in Export Promotion Activity

Trade Promotion Organizations (TPOs) have a broad mandate to provide or coordinate trade support services in the above mentioned area.

A Trade Promotion Organization (TPO) is defined by the International Trade Centre UNCTAD/WTO from Geneva like a private or public institution with the main task to facilitate entry into foreign markets for a collective group of exporters and manufacturers of the home country. Governmental TPOs are those bodies set up by government as part of its infra-structure in order to facilitate foreign trade in general, but exports more in particular.

To the question "Why is necessary a TPO?" the answer is:

- To increase foreign exchange earnings.
- To reduce dependence upon a limited number of markets.
- To decrease trade deficits.
- To provide employment.

In practice, trade promotion activities are a function of several entities in any country. There is usually one central governmental export promotion body to provide the policy framework and mechanism for co-ordination and consultation among the various sectors or organizations involved in foreign trade. Such TPOs can be specialized in a few key functions or perform a broad range of services. The type and extent of their activities depend on the resources available to them, such as the experience of the organization, the quality of its work force, its network of linkages and financial resources. The TPO's ability to identify changing conditions and requirements of its primary clients – the exporters - and then adapt trade promotion services accordingly is more important than the variety of services offered. Typical TPO activities may be classified into four general categories:

- Identification of products and markets.
- Promotional activities abroad.
- Trade information services.
- Specialized support services.

Identification of products and markets. Most countries focus on strategies for export development and promotion, given the importance of national goals and their limited resources. A TPO has a significant role in laying the groundwork for an export promotion programme. The TPO can give invaluable assistance by doing the necessary studies to identify what products to promote and decide which markets offer the greatest opportunity for export growth. Moreover, the TPO could participate in designing and developing marketing strategies for specific sectors and products, incorporating into these strategies all recommended measures and actions for achieving export targets.

There are three steps in the methodology for product identification:

- Prepare the product-market framework.
- Determine export potential of local industries and make a pre-selection.
- Make a survey of the export supply.

Product–market framework. A useful and practical approach is to adopt the product-market framework for an export promotion programme. As the term suggests, each programme concentrates on a specific product or group of products. Activities are directed mainly at helping the specific sector or a selected group of companies to gain entry into certain markets. The product-market framework means allocating resources to focused activities for maximum impact designed to achieve export targets. Three features of this approach are:

Products are identified for the purpose of designing a marketing strategy for a specific sector, including all necessary action and support activities that help generate or increase exports.

A programme based on the product-market framework can address specific concerns of the sector; particularly obstacles to export growth, and provide the basis for coordinated or co-operative actions, including joint export promotion and marketing activities.

The programme can help individual companies to develop their own marketing strategies and programmes and to identify specific areas where support or assistance is required.

Planning and implementing a programme with a product market framework could be done by a central export coordinating body, although institutions and organizations from both the public and private sectors might also participate.

The significant role of the TPO is to lay the groundwork in preparing the programme and to do the necessary studies to identify the products to be promoted in identified markets.

In many cases, a country do not have a clear idea of what products to promote in international markets. This leads to haphazard trade promotion efforts, often as a reaction to inquiries made by foreign buyers, with uncoordinated, ineffective export assistance. Identifying priority export products is necessary to maximize the impact of all activities and efforts aimed at achieving national export targets.

Selection of product sectors. Initial selection and determination of export supply capability are the first steps in the identification of export products. Identified products have to be matched with the results of corresponding market selection and identification activities in order to fully determine export potential. Product identification is a process of successive selection until the most promising products emerge. The process begins with preliminary research into national economic development. Policies and programmes set the priorities for product sectors and statistics on production, domestic consumption, exports need to be analyzed in order to determine the availability of an export supply.

A list of products should be made that could be matched with the demand potential in major importing countries. The initial analysis could be the basis for deleting certain products from this list. Then, the following types of products should be identified in order to give them priority ranking:

Products for which local raw materials are available and for which development could lead to high value added downstream activities.

Products that are produced predominantly by local companies.

Products subject to few restrictions, giving access to foreign markets.

Products that can make possible contributions to foreign exchange earnings.

Labor-intensive exportable products that will help alleviate employment problems.

The determination of the products to concentrate on for export has to be discussed at a governmental inter-agency level or committee. A TPO, together with ministries and agencies involved in industrial policy, foreign investment and economic planning and representatives from the private sector should sit on this committee to map out current and future export plans which will form the basis of the policies and programmes for priority product sectors.

Export readiness survey. After making a broad selection of export products, the next important step towards product identification is determining who are existing and potential exporters. This is done with an export readiness survey with the following objectives:

To identify and select exporters/manufacturers who could most effectively use trade promotion assistance and support, so that they could be successful lead participants in the drive for specific export markets.

To identify and select the most promising products in terms of sales and production capability in order to estimate the amount of production that can be exported in the short and medium term.

To identify the constraints companies face in exporting, and/or in increasing exports of the selected products.

To identify the type of assistance packages that will help companies become major exporters by increasing their sales and production capability in the short and medium term.

The suggested approach is to identify potential export companies, and then identify promising products. This approach is based on a strong belief that in the early stages of export promotion, the most able companies (rather than those most in need of assistance) can give the needed push for national exports.

These companies can be used as vehicles to generate export business growth and to support and reinforce this growth with suitable assistance programmes or services. This does not mean that a TPO should ignore the less able companies, which should also be assisted once the more able firms have secured a foothold in overseas markets.

The first step in this approach is to develop a list of potential export companies. Possible sources of information include the customs department, the central bank, other government agencies and trade/industry associations. The second step is to narrow down the list by using the information obtained from research and looking at the following criteria:

- Unique or strong products.
- Production capacity.
- Strong export capability.
- Financial capability.
- Management capability.
- Staff capability.
- Management motivation.

The third step is to use questionnaires and make visits to the selected companies in order to obtain more detailed data. It is important to prepare adequately for the site visits to the companies and the questionnaire. The staff assigned to do this fieldwork should be competent product/industry specialists. Their knowledge about the product/industry and their interviewing skills will be critical in gaining the confidence of the companies' respondents and gathering accurate information.

Promotional activities abroad. The main thrust of the export promotion and marketing efforts is to attract the attention of targeted markets abroad and to project the desired image for the country as a source of products. Trade promotion activities abroad are thus crucial functions for most TPOs. The availability of resources and international commercial representation will determine the extent of a TPO's activities abroad. The TPO can provide an invaluable service to exporters by intensifying its promotional efforts in selected foreign countries. Activities related to trade fairs, sellers missions, inviting foreign buyers to visit local manufacturing plants and facilitating subcontracting arrangements are some examples of a TPO's efforts. A TPO's overseas network of commercial representatives will play an important role in the planning and implementation of the overseas marketing programme. By being "on the ground," commercial representatives will be able to supplement information on characteristics of markets; competitors and market access issues. Such information is important when deciding how to enter these overseas markets.

Trade information services. The quality of business decisions depends on pertinent, reliable and timely information. Exporters need to stay current in their awareness and understanding of market developments and trade opportunities in order to maintain their positions or establish edges over their competition. A TPO should pay close attention to the trade information needs of exporters and have appropriate mechanisms for acquiring such information systematically and disseminating it in a timely way. Moreover, a TPO provides basic and useful support to the export community if it can facilitate contacts between foreign buyers and exporters.

Specialized support services. Specialized export services aim at providing exporters with skills in various foreign trade techniques, thus helping them to become more competitive in the international market. Training, advisory services and facilitation services, plus other forms of technical assistance, may be provided concerning export procedures and documentation, export financing, packaging, costing, pricing and legal procedures. The range of assistance and services can be as wide and as varied as manufacturers and exporters may require. Of course, the TPO should focus on services for which it has the expertise and resources. Two different approaches may be considered:

- The "integrated approach", in which several special services and overall advice to client companies are provided by a group of trained staff; or
- The "specialist approach", in which such services are offered by a specific group of specialists.

Organizational requirements for TPOs

Certain basic conditions must be present for a trade promotion organization (TPO) to be effective, no matter what form the organization takes. Studies on experiences of TPOs show that the following conditions should be present:

- The organization's main role and field of action should be clearly defined commensurate with the authority, resources, and autonomy granted to the TPO. The definition will have an important influence on the structure of the organization.
- The organization should have a legal position within the overall governmental structure to provide it with the means and required authority to implement its task. There should be a close and logical relationship between the position and authority it is granted and the responsibilities it is assigned.
- The organization's corporate purpose should be clearly stated in order to minimize or avoid any confusion about its aims and any duties unrelated to its main objectives.
- Adequate human and financial resources must be available. The technical nature of the TPO means that it should also be given the necessary freedom to manage its staff adequately, despite limits resulting from civil service regulations and practices.
- The TPO must have support from the export community. Otherwise, it would be impossible for the TPO to start appropriate promotional and development activities.

All of the conditions listed are important, but the most relevant one is the TPO's autonomy to carry out its programme. Autonomy also implies that adequate funding is available and that the TPO is free to plan and manage its promotional programme and has enough access to be represented abroad and to request the services of specialists.

From a legal point of view, TPOs in countries around the world have a number of different forms. About one third of all trade promotion bodies have been formed as sections or departments of a ministry. These lack autonomy, because they are subject to various limitations. Within the public sector of various countries, a little more than 10 per cent of TPOs do not belong to any particular ministry. They may enjoy much more autonomy, but in many instances they are expected to perform functions that are not involved in export promotion. There are also a small number of private sectors TPOs, which are usually part of a chamber of commerce or an exporter association. One explanation for this small number is that there is a lack of adequate financing by the private sector for creating and supporting such promotional bodies.

The three forms of TPOs described above account for about 50 per cent of the total number of TPOs worldwide. The rest are so-called autonomous organizations, which are essentially public sector institutions that are financed entirely by the government.

In almost all cases the government provides financing through budgetary allocations or levies and duties. Such TPOs are treated as independent bodies. However, in actual practice, they might not always have the operational autonomy necessary and end up being restricted due to inadequate financing or unnecessary interference from the parent ministries.

Like most public sector institutions, almost all of the autonomous organizations are linked to a ministry. More than half are linked to the Ministry of Trade and/or Industry, while the rest are linked to a Ministry of Foreign Trade, Foreign Affairs, Economy or Finance.

Conclusions

In keeping with the experience of the EU countries in field of specific practices and techniques aiming to foster their international economic relationship, foreign trade promotion activity has to represent for Romania, one of the most important components of the national economy development strategy. This activity has to be developed in accordance with the provisions of the international agreements in which Romania is a signatory part, as well as with the international market rules and procedures. Within this framework, the promotion of the Romanian companies dealing with foreign trade activity by an adequate conceived system of governmental and non governmental TPOs is acquiring new dimensions, having to become one of the main pillars of the XXI century economic development of the country. This problem has to be taken into consideration by the Romanian governmental and non-governmental bodies, taking in view that each economic operator acting in the field of foreign trade should take big efforts in order to penetrate and maintain its position on a very competitive international market.

Actually, in Romania the approach of the above-mentioned problems is carried out by Romanian Trade Promotion Center, established at a governmental level, and a lot of institutions and organizations with responsibilities in the field like Romanian Chamber of Commerce and Industry, ROMEXPO, EXIMBANK, National Association of Exporters and Importers from Romania, professional and employers' associations, in supporting the activity of Romanian exporting companies.

Based on the EU countries experience in foreign trade promotion activity, as well as on a detailed analyze of local conditions, there is possible to identify some key elements for the success of a trade promotion system in Romania:

- There must be a clear definition of the responsibilities and functions of all institutions dealing with foreign trade, especially with regard to their role in policy making and the implementation of promotional activities. Whatever the responsibilities allocated to the TPO might be, it must be granted adequate authority that will enable it to carry them out.
- The TPO must have the necessary autonomy to carry out its programmes. This autonomy can be achieved within different schemes of supervision and control by higher authorities, but unnecessary interference should be avoided.
- They should provide a wide range of services as well as carry out activities intended to improve the export climate. The TPO cannot lose its perspective of being an institution to the service of the business community, and consequently should avoid a tendency to become an organization to the exclusive service of the government. It is essential that the TPO have the clear support of the export community and this community's confidence in its technical skills.
- The TPO must be responsible for the planning, implementation and management of certain basic activities such as market research, trade information services and a range of specific promotional and assistance actions. The services provided by the TPO must be relevant to the exporters, and their definition should be based on a clear identification of the exporters' needs.
- In contrast with that, the TPO must not be given the responsibility for administering or implementing functions especially control related ones, for which it is not adequately equipped, or which can be better administered and carried out by other institutions. Clear coordination mechanisms must be established among the various institutions in order to avoid operational difficulties and conflicts of interest.
- The TPO must have access to the services and facilities offered by the overseas representation system.

• TPO should be able to engage the services of specialized staff because of the nature of the services to be provided. Mechanisms should be established in order to guarantee continuity in the employment of qualified staff.

• The TPO cannot forget that in many instances the business sector must be pushed towards involvement with export activities, and consequently the entity should use its resources to lead the sector towards that end.

• In order to raise the volume of exports substantially, the TPO should focus on the future, i.e. on developing export trends, and not limit itself to the promotion of current products.

The above mentioned factors have to be taken into consideration by the Romanian decision makers in drawing up a national export strategy in the new national and international framework, after the Romania's accession within the European Union.

We are speaking about "a national export strategy" on purpose. We are not referring to a national trade policy. That means that Romanian governmental and non governmental bodies have to focus on the process by which our country will arrive at effective national strategies to support exports and competitiveness of the business sector. While traditional trade promotion services remain relevant, they are no longer sufficient to promote exports and competitiveness. Trade information, missions, exhibitions, generic publicity and commercial representation abroad are not enough to generate export success. National export strategy that confines him to these operational programmes is, in our view, unlikely to meet the challenges that Romania has now to face.

Being aware of both the importance of the promotion activity in attaining the strategically objective of growing efficient exports and the fact that the high costs implied by the export promotion activities could be prohibitive for many Romanian exporting companies, especially for SMEs, the governmental decisions makers together with the Romanian business community, have to take a lot of measures looking for redressing this situation.

A trade promotion strategy designed and implemented in isolation from other economic and commercial initiatives in Romania is unlikely to succeed. Creating a national export strategy is by definition a national issue involving all relevant players, having to be treated as a national, interdisciplinary and multi-sectoral imperative. A solid national export strategy has to include the effective participation of the ministries of economy, finance and industry as well as experienced exporters.

For a national export strategy to be effective, strong linkages with other economic and developmental strategy initiatives are required. Strategy makers must look beyond existing export capacity and work towards ensuring that new export capacities are generated.

Promoting export-oriented foreign direct investment must go in tandem with promoting exports in the international market place.

Developing higher value-added export performance must be directly supported through, for example, developing strong backward linkages in industry and forward linkages in agriculture. Romanian strategy makers must look at "on-shore" domestic production issues, as well as "off-shore" market development issues when developing their future responses.

For a strategy to work, the private sector — perhaps the key player in implementing export strategy — has to be fully involved and committed to the overall process. The private sector has to "buy in" and feel responsible for the success or failure of the strategy. There must be a real and effective partnership between the public and private business sector.

References

- ITC - UNCTAD/WTO – Trade Promotion Organizations – A variety of Approaches, Geneva, 2008
- ITC - UNCTAD/WTO - TPO Best Practices. Strengthening the Delivery of Trade Support Services, Geneva, 2011.
- ITC - UNCTAD/WTO, World Directory of TPOs and other Foreign Trade Bodies, Geneva, 2011.
- ITC - UNCTAD/WTO, Geneva, Priorities on Export Trade Promotion and Competitive Advantage, 2011
- ITC - UNCTAD/WTO, Geneva, The International Framework for Trade Promotion, 2011
- ITC-UNCTAD-WTO- The role of the TPO: Ensuring network credibility through service, referral and coordination, 2011
- Olaru, Octavian Liviu, Promovarea exportului, componentă esențială a strategiei naționale de comerț exterior, Editura Cavallioti, Bucureşti, 2002

NEW RELATIONS BETWEEN NATURAL RESOURCES AND INDUSTRY IN A GLOBALIZED WORLD ECONOMY

CRISTIAN SIMA[*]
CĂTĂLINA BONCIU[]
MARIUS BULEARCA[]
GHEORGHE MARINESCU[*]

Abstract
Natural resources are not homogeneous in nature, having certain features in the productive process that require grouping them into different categories by different criteria. Consequently, natural resources cannot be addressed all at once, but only distinctly, according to relevant criteria selected based on the proposed goals. Changing approaches based resources (materials) to the knowledge, from quantity to quality, from mass products to new concepts of higher added value, follows a development that is based on eco-efficiency and sustainable products and services. In this respect, integrated research will become key factors towards global processing.

Keywords: economy, mining industry, natural resources market, property rights regime, total economic value

Introduction

The knowledge of the crisis and the clear economic value of resources may impose a series of initial constraints as short-term relatively high costs, but in the same time, such effective increases may also provide incentives for economic innovations necessary to any problem which may arise in times of crisis. Optimistic predictions are often supported by old innovations responsible for the lack of raw materials and energy.

The modern industrial economy lies in a remarkable number of options which require compliance with environmental and natural resource exploitation. The technological changes generating new substitutes increase the productivity of the old ones. The way of improving these processes include:

1. Increase production per unit of resources entered into the economic process, for example, the decrease in the amount of coal needed to generate a kWh.
2. The discovery of new metals, synthetic fibers, plastics, etc.
3. Productivity growth in mining processes.
4. Productivity growth in extraction processes and discovery of resources.
5. Develop techniques for waste reuse and recyclable materials.
6. Develop techniques for deep mining or other abundant resources.

One of the major effects of these technological developments is the reduction of economic dependence on some expensive resources and a progressive widening of the range of raw materials used. Limiting the analysis to the crisis of these natural resources used as raw materials in the production process, we notice that they impose higher economic costs as their degree of depletion increases. This automatically requires increased fund allocation for innovation. The conventional [*] Dr. CS III, Centre for Industry and Services Economics, Romanian Academy (email: sima60cristian@yahoo.com).

[] Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Administration and Business, University of Bucharest, Romania (email: catalina.bonciu@yahoo.com).
[] Dr. CS II, Centre for Industry and Services Economics, Romanian Academy (email: mariusbulearca@yahoo.com).
[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D.,"Dimitrie Cantemir", Christian University Bucharest, Romania approach is generally optimistic about the ability of the economic system to overcome such constraints of the long-term natural resources crisis in a globalized economy.

Each great discovery, from fire to nuclear energy, had good and bad parts. It depends on how it was used by humans, for or against themselves. Even the process of industrialization in itself had positive and negative aspects. It all depends on how it is done, for what purpose and how it is integrated into the social and economic structures of the respective company.

Each time something new appeared there were the optimists, who saw in change new opportunities for progress and the pessimists, who feared apparent or unexpected incidents may arise from the new created context. In reality, mankind has permanently faced slow or abrupt changes, evolving or obsolete, deeper or more superficial, but it eventually found all the resources and ability to solve these problems.

Today, for example, there are many arguments supporting the thesis that even major crisis, such as energy or raw materials, accelerate progress, forcing people to search for new "ways" in the development of new "breakthroughs", in finding new options. Every time the "costs" of such an impact are higher. Also, one has to find a new approach to these problems in their broader context, economic, social, technological, cultural and ideological. Thus, either we would not understand them or we will partially understand their meanings, and solutions would not be other than partial. There are many signals indicating that we can only go one way, that of "knowing more about the least." The too narrow view of the specialist, the "tunnel" vision, may turn into a handicap of understanding interdependencies. The attempt of a more precise evaluation on phenomena or processes with high specialization arise "barriers" in the way of noticing and handling complexity. We are in a period when we equally need integrative synthesis, holistic visions. From this point of view, the problems regarding the mineral resources depletion acquire special significance. Therefore, it is worth reflecting on the idea that as earth is finite so are its resources. This is obviously true, but the error presented as irrefutable proof of the final catastrophe is to take the finite for exhaustible. With very few exceptions, the huge volume of earth's mineral resources is not lost by extraction and use, but it continues to form an integral part of the planet's resources. They can be temporarily incorporated in inputs or consumer goods, they can be chemically combined with other elements, and however they remain indestructible.

New technologies have proven their capacity to find ways to extract resources from various geological formations. Also, through them, we can recover materials that have already been used once or several times.

However, the gloomy forecasts on the depletion of mineral resources have drawn the attention of the contemporary world by even urging economic slowdown.

Actual Content

The increasing demand for metals, directly influenced by the industrialization processes, together with the continuous reduction of the amount of metal obtained from the mining, determined and will determine the increase of mining production. In fact, in recent years at world level was recorded a trend of continuous decrease in the content of useful substances from ore mining and an increase in the size of mining mass extracted to obtain the same amount of metal which leads to higher material and energy costs. Therefore, the main restriction in metal consumption shall be in the future the "energy cost", as total energy consumed to produce one ton of metal, from ore extraction to obtaining the basic metals (steel, aluminum and electric copper, lead and refined zinc, etc.). This cost increases rapidly as the content of metal from the mining mass extracted decreases.

The decreased useful content form the exploited deposits also involve special technologies for the recovery of a larger quantity of metals from the extracted mining mass subject to processing, which in turn leads to a considerable increase in investment, energy and production costs and raise special problems of environmental protection. Therefore, in the past few years, special attention is paid to the recovery and reuse of metals, which besides bringing energy savings help in conserving the world's metal resources.

Under these conditions, the dependence on the demand of metals at the economic development level is reduced. One important aspect these days is to save mineral resources, particularly the defective ones, to recycle and reuse them and to raise awareness of recovery. In fact, structural modification occurring in the global economy, the emergence and development of new industries with low consumption of metals, but with high volume of human resources, entail new economic policy guidelines of the states.

Also, subject to structural changes taking place in the world economy, new guidelines appear in the metal demand. Currently, we are witnessing a new phenomenon which manifests itself in a growing number of countries, namely, the gradual reduction of dependence of the industrial development on the natural resources. In countries where raw materials and energy is reduced gradually, depending on either the accelerated development of processing industries, or the stagnation or reduction of internal reserves, the share of imports in total consumption of resources is becoming greater. Illustrative of this case are Japan, the U.S. and some European countries, which cover most metal needs from imports.

New geological discoveries shall continue to enrich the picture of mineral reserves in the world, providing global demand for certain resources still remaining a difficult problem of the contemporary world due to more or less economic reasons. Newly discovered deposits generally have harder extraction conditions, being located in less accessible locations or having lower contents of useful substances, which require new technologies for the recovery of useful substances.

The increased dependence of national industries on the world commodity market may lead to imbalances and disruptions in the global economy. Given the policies of the developing countries, owning mineral resources, of protecting their own raw material base and developing processing industries to exploit the local natural riches, special importance is given to restructuration and reorientation of their economies towards top branches, with low energy and material consumption.

Despite the policy of reducing specific consumption due to the introduction in production of technical progress, the demand is reduced. At world level, both now and in the medium and short term forecasts global demand for metals, especially the base ones, is satisfied, although certain disorders may appear due to postponement of some projects, lack of funds or because of the diminishing absorption capacity of the volume of metal production by the industry. The problem of ensuring metal resources may not represent a problem even on longer term. The current situation does not allow precise answers to the question: how long the earth reserves can keep up with the rapid growth and demand for mineral exploitation?

Along with the global economic development, the new procurement possibilities for resources from different parts of the world, the countries' dependence on the world market is becoming increasingly important.

Natural availability of the different metal resources, their geographical distribution and geopolitics, the cost of their extraction and preparation, the energy consumption, transport etc., give a perfect overview on how these resources are placed according to the level of economic development. In the future we believe this proportion shall be decisively influenced by energy and extraction costs, mainly due to the transition to ores with lower useful content, with high degree of impurities and more difficult operating conditions.

The development of national economies based on an intense industrialization process from many countries in the world economic system had led, as we stated earlier, to a growing demand for metals, tempered in recent years by the economic crisis. Whether they dispose or not of metal reserves, in their economic development process and industrialization, most countries have given special attention to metallurgy, as priority industry field ensuring the conversion of resources in raw materials necessary for other industries.

Industrial developed countries, which have reserves of metal resources (such as: U.S.A., Australia, Canada, Sweden, etc.), search, first to protect their national heritage and then to exploit as much as they can these resources. For example, the U.S.A, a bauxite importing country, despite its high quality reserves, in order to protect them undertakes extensive research to extract alumina using different substitutes like: clay, kaolin etc.

Although these procedures to obtain aluminum need more energy than through conventional processes, from bauxite, in order to reduce the dependence of these resources on the world market the countries allocate substantial funds for research in this area. Also, both by using the most advanced technologies for extracting and processing metals and by the policy of restructuring industries towards increasing those fields with low consumption, superior capitalization of metals and bigger profits are aimed.

Industrial developed countries, which do not have metal resources (such as: Japan, Italy, Switzerland, etc.) or have insufficient amounts, orient their production towards high efficiency and low cost fields. Through the high processed products these countries offer for sale on the world market, they cover the necessary expenses for importing resources. Japan is quite a convincing example, if we take into account this country has low natural reserves of metals, but is one of the biggest metal consumers. In the same time, it offers high-tech products at reasonable prices on the world market.

The developing countries, with metal resources, orient their economic policy on the one hard to develop the national first processing industry (primarily), and on the other hand to market these resources on the world market at reasonable prices. However, these countries in order to cover domestic demand for superior manufactured products have to export considerable quantities of ores.

In the new economic conditions, favored by the development of transports and capital and technology transfers, covering the need for raw materials is partly or entirely based on imported resources.

For most non-energy mineral resources, the known reserves are concentrated in certain regions or countries which represent, in fact, the most important manufacturing regions. These attract large capital investments in order to exploit these deposits. Also, the mining activities, provided with adequate social and economic infrastructure, stimulate research and development of mining on the same territories or in neighboring regions, more accessible and which offer greater economic benefits. As such, the interrelations between the three activities of research, prospecting and extraction, stimulate development, with influences both from the exploitation of mineral reserves and from the extension of exploitation, mainly in countries with tradition. These processes were slowed with the onset of the world economic crisis. Economic decrease in industrialized countries has led to lower imports and hence the appearance of commodity price fluctuations on the world markets. Therefore, the operating activities of mineral deposits and the various industrial manufacturing processes are not as closely related as before; the non-ferrous metal industry and the metal industry, for example, develop independently from the place of extraction of the respective resources.

The close dependence between the metallurgical and the processing industries, one the one hand, and the mineral resources, on the other hand, was present since the beginnings of industrial development. This dependence was gradually reduced with the change of industrial centers and gradual depletion of rich reserves from the consuming regions, as well as the penetration of technological progress in all areas including transportation.

Changes occurring worldwide in terms of minerals supply sources supporting the industry development and the transition from self-consumption of raw materials to importers, especially over long distances, have caused many economic and technological changes. Thus, import of raw materials began to be the basis for development of certain industries in more and more countries.

Despite efforts to find new perimeters and widening the geographical area of operation, the extraction of minerals remains concentrated in a relatively small number of countries. Taken as a whole, the world's mineral production is concentrated in proportion of 70-75% in 12 countries, of which approx. 50% are developing countries. By increasing the mining capacity also the export availabilities have increased, thus creating the premises for more intense trade in this area. The ore trade flows are extended from regional and neighboring level, to large and very large distances.

Seven major producing countries (Australia, Brazil, Canada, Sweden, Russia, India and China) export more than half the world production of iron ore. It is worth mentioning that two of the seven major countries exporting metal ores decreased their production especially after 1990. Thus, the former USSR, by subdividing in independent countries, has lost its status as large producer of iron ore. In addition to Russia states such as Ukraine, Latvia, Belarus have emerged, leading to redistribution of power in the extraction and export of minerals. But Russia remains a worldwide major producer and exporter of iron ore.

Sweden, adopting a series of regulations for environmental protection, decreased both the iron ore production and the metallurgical production, considered as heavily polluting and energy-consuming.

Expanding minerals international trade has been possible due to the introduction of new technologies of concentration, agglomeration and transportation over long distances. To ensure efficient transportation from the extraction location to the consumer, a special importance was given on the quality of the ore. For example, by increasing the content of iron from 51% to 62% transportation costs of useful content are reduced with 20%. Moreover, the shipping, auto and rail capacity increased, in order to reduce long distance transport costs.

Economic development and the use of advanced primary processing technologies determined a new global division of mineral production. Thus, an increasing share of world production of mineral raw material is processed in developed countries and a relatively small amount in the developing countries, which own significant non-energy mineral resource deposits. For example, only 10% of the total production of extracted bauxite is processed and converted into alumina in the countries where it is extracted from. In the case of iron ore and manganese the part which is processed in the countries of origin is of approx. 15-30% for zinc, approx. 50% for lead and approx. 70% for nickel. On average, developing countries process locally only 30% of the extracted ores, the remaining 70% being processed in the importing countries. A special case is China which, in recent years, has experienced a strong economic growth, and reached to impact on the price of raw materials worldwide.

The big differences between countries and regions, as well as between minerals in the different levels of processing, depend on a series of factors such as: the necessary of investment and the investment power of the countries; the degree of integration of production in the respective industries; the level of required technologies and the specific energy consumption; energy capacity of the respective countries; the size and evolution of demand etc. These factors have certain mobility, an evolution according to the technical progress and level of economic development of the countries, to the pace of this development, as well as to the stability and political and economic interests of these countries and the international organizations in those areas.

The countries with mineral raw materials tend, through their economic development programs, to capitalize their natural riches by developing the respective industries, processing such wealth and gradually restricting exports of raw materials.

Achieving these goals shall be possible if the mineral processing expands and intensifies, which will influence the global trade restructuring in terms of goods flows on groups of countries and, in particular, flows of metallurgical goods. Moreover, the balance of international trade with metallurgical goods reflects the effects of the development level of some countries, but also the restructuring necessary in the world economy and in the trade relations between countries.

Increasingly strong is the desire of many developing countries, producers of natural resources, to move to industrialization by extending the processing of minerals extracted. At the same time, some developed importing countries build in the developing countries industrial units of extraction and primary processing of natural resources in order to obtain intermediates, especially through direct investment and providing long-term loans repayable in products. This support may be explained by the fact that the developed countries are interested in ensuring their supply of raw materials, while avoiding the expansion on their territories of heavily polluting and energy-intensive processes. Therefore, by the high processing of intermediates imported from the developing countries, the countries with tradition in metallurgy may obtain many economic, environmental and energy advantages.

The customs tariff system is used, frequently, by the developed countries, on the one hand to stimulate the developing countries to export raw minerals, and on the other hand to stop them – from the economic point of view – from exporting manufactured goods. Thus, tariffs increase with the transition to higher stages of processing.

The industrial development increases the demand for mineral resources. Even if we reduce the specific consumption, the recycling of materials and the use of substitutes, the demand for non-energy mineral resources shall experience significant growth, without taking into account the real possibilities to satisfy such need. Therefore, on the one hand the exploitable reserves have a certain evolution based on the research activity and geologic exploration, like that of ore extraction, and on the other hand the possibilities of expanding the supply with mineral raw materials are more and more limited.

Conclusions

It would be wrong to believe that these facts are just situational, and it would also be wrong not to notice that behind them are much deeper economic and social reasons. However, as time passes it becomes increasingly clear that it is not just about solving some practical, economic, financial, monetary, technological problems or problems regarding the economic restructuring policies or the industry, even though these are urgent and inevitable. There are "deep currents of change" which forecast changes in much wider areas, in concepts, in values mainly due to the global crisis and the global problems arising from it. Therefore, together with the immediate restructuring of fields such as industry, technology, raw materials, energy etc., it is necessary to better clarify the directions of change in multiple areas. Access to energy and raw materials is essential for a developing world. Also, the access to technologies is extremely important in a globalizing world, in order to stop the depletion of these.

"This work was supported by the project "Post-Doctoral Studies in Economics: training program for elite researchers - SPODE" co-funded from the European Social Fund through the Development of Human Resources Operational Programme 2007-2013, contract no. POSDRU/89/1.5/S/61755."

References

- Harold J. Barnett. and Chandler Morse, Scarcity and Growth: the Economics of Natural Resource Availability, (Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD, 1963)
- Francis M. Bator, The anatomy of market failure, (in Quarterly Journal of Economics, 72, 1958)
- John M. Hartwick and Nancy D. Olewiler, The Economics of Natural Resource Use, (Harper & Row, New York, 1986)
- Home, C.N. Natural Resources Economics, Issues, Analysis and Policy, (Wiley, New York, 1979)
- Harold Hotelling, The Economics of Exhaustible Resources, (in Journal of Political Economy 39, London, 1931)
- Leif Johansen, Econometric Models and Economic Planning and Policy, (University of Oslo, 1982)
- Erhun Kula, The modified discount method - comment on comments, (in Project Appraisal nr.3, 1989)
- Erhun Kula, Economies of Natural Resources, the Environment and Policies, (Second Edition, Chapman and Hall, London, 1994)

- Vincent Ellis McKelvey , Mineral resource estimates and public policy, (in American Scientist, 60, 1972)
- James Meade, Economic Policy and the Threat of Doom, (in A. Butlin (editor) - Economics and Resources Policy, Longman, London, 1981)
- Thimoty O'Riordan, The politics of sustainability, in Sustainable Development Management (editor: R. K. Turner, Belhaven Press, London, 1988)
- Mancur Olson and Richard Zeckhauser, The efficient production of external economies, (in American Economic Review nr.60, 1970)
- David W. Pearce, Environmental Economics, (Longman, London, 1977)
- David W. Pearce, The Dictionary of modern economics, (MacMillan Press, London, 1981)
- David W. Pearce, Cost-benefit Analysis, (Second Edition, MacMillan, London, 1983)
- David W. Pearce and Mark A. Yanda, The Benefits of Environmental Policies, (OECD, Paris, 1989)
- David W. Pearce and Kerry R. Turner, Economics of Natural Resources and the Environment, (Harvester Wheatsheaf, London, 1990)
- Paul A. Samuelson and William Dawbney "Bill" Nordhaus, Economics, (4-th Edition, McGraw Hill Book Co., New York, 1992)
- Graham L. Smith, Impact Assessment and Sustainable Resource Management, (Longman Scientific and Technical, Harlow, England, 1993)
- Tom Tietenberg, Environmental and Natural Resources Economics, (Third Edition, Harper-Collins, New York, 1992)
- Arvind Virmani, Tax and Contractual Arrangements for the Exploitation of Natural Resources, The World Bank, Washington D.C., U.S.A, 1985)
- Paul Wannacott. and Robert Wannacott, Economics, (Third Edition, McGraw Hill Co., New York, 1986)

RELEVANCE OF CORPORATE GOVERNANCE MODELS IN COMPANIES DEVELOPMENT, IN CONTEXT OF THE GLOBAL CRISIS

LUMINIȚA CECILIA CRENICEAN*

Abstract
Although the existing confusion regarding the concept of corporate governance persists, its role on sustainable maximize corporate values and providing high performance is undeniable.
Moreover, the test of a corporate governance effectiveness model is the measurement in which it succeed to achieve the main objective, namely, that the company's perspective to maximize value to shareholders.
In the economic crisis, it requires that by those systems in which companies are managed and controlled has to interact directly with social responsibility and business ethics held by those entities. It is expected that corporate managers have an efficient economic behavior, different from that of members of governments and economic decline that records do not meet current socio-economic situation.

Keywords*: model, corporate governance, company, social responsibility, business ethics*

Introduction

Although they are related, business management, corporate responsibility and corporate governance should not be confused. All components of corporate governance, consisting in norms, rules and codes are important for successful market economies.

Corporate governance can be defined in a variety of ways, but generally refers at the mechanisms by which a business enterprise organizes it process of management, control and direction. Over the past decade, interest in the role that corporate governance plays in economies, and particularly in capital markets, has increased in the European Union and its Member States.

Important European changes, such as: adoption of the unique currency, economic globalization, the complex process of privatization and, more important of all, the free flow of capital, goods, services and people across EU borders increased the interest of investors and issuers in understanding the role of corporate governance in arising their business, in lowering the barriers in development of the unique European market.

The main contribution of this paper is to bring together the several different literatures on corporate governance, finance, law, institutions and development so as to examine recently available empirical evidence concerning corporate governance, competition and influence of economic crisis in emerging markets.

An analysis of available data has highlighted that some emerging economies have become relevant players in the global economy - and even more so in selected regional and national contexts - and that some EMNCs[1] may by now claim the status of real "global players." The motivations for the corporate decision to internationalize via overseas investment are largely similar to those of OECD to seek market access, resources, and capabilities and justify the gamble of operating in foreign territories rather than exporting from the home country. Nonetheless, the international business environment has changed, product cycles are shorter, time-to-market imperatives faster, regionalism and economic liberalization processes more widespread, and network alliances of increasing importance, and firms are pushed to internationalize via direct investment much earlier in their lifecycle.

* Ph. D. candidate, Valahia University, Târgoviște (email: lumi_cecilia@yahoo.com).

[1] Enterprises have amassed sufficient capital, knowledge and know-how to invest abroad on their own and earn the status of emerging multinationals (EMNCs),
http://www.oecd.org/document/33/0,3746,en_2649_33731_36223265_1_1_1_1,00.html

Important cases of failure occurred in corporate governance have bring to attention areas of particular concern in the field, giving to those interested important cases to study, for the development and refinement of corporate governance standards. Developed industries and complex business forms arising lately pointed to severe conflicts of interest by brokers and analysts, underpinning the introduction of principle V.F. covering the provision of advice and analysis into the Principles.

The Enron/Worldcom failures pointed to issues with respect to auditor and audit committee independence and to deficiencies in accounting standards. The Parmalat and Ahold cases in Europe also provided important corporate governance lessons leading to actions by international regulatory institutions such as IOSCO[2] [www.iosco.org] and by national authorities. In the above cases, corporate governance deficiencies may not have been causal in a strict sense. Rather, they facilitated or did not prevent practices that resulted in poor performance.

1. Diversity in models of corporate governance - culture, ownership and law

Depending on their cultural inheritance and especially the legal provisions, in UE Member States appears a higher diversity in corporate governance codes of practices, structures and types of applying. This rich diversity complicates corporate governance comparisons between nations. The codes that have been registered in Member States in the last years express similarities which worth mention: they reveal that as reliance on equity financing increases and shareholdings broaden in Europe, a common understanding is emerging of the role that corporate governance plays in the modern European corporation.

Nowadays, specific academic literature regarding corporate governance focuses on the impact of national and business-culture on corporate governance systems. It is to mention here co-operative relationships and consensus and market processes in their corporate governance frameworks.

Mostly known differences in the EU Member States which applies corporate governance rules, models and codes are those arisen in Germany and United Kingdom, typical examples of differences in culture.

Often characterized as more market-oriented, The United Kingdom is, with a higher value placed on competition, differently based from Germany which is often characterized as traditionally valuing co-operation and consensus. The German emphasis on co-operation and consensus has been pointed to as underpinning the role of employee co-determination and works councils within the German corporation, and the rights given employees of certain sized companies to information about the economic and financial situation of the company and major plans for organizational changes, such as mergers.

The degree to which Member States have relied on equity markets for corporate finance has also varied significantly throughout EU Member States, although in all Member States equity financing appears to be gaining in importance. For example, in the Netherlands, bank lending has been a far more important source of financing, traditionally, than the stock markets. With less traditional reliance on equity markets for financing, shareholding has been fairly concentrated.

In this case of common interests, despite the main differences existing in corporate governance way of applying, important are international institutional investors which apply the same tests of security and rate of return in every business they are interested in. Therefore, they could be considered a real decisional force for governance convergence, a force which could change for better or for the worse the process of clear corporate governance. Convergence of this kind is getting to obtain new corporate governance standards, since these investors look for the same levels of board effectiveness, transparency, accountability, and financial probity no matter where they investment is placed.

[2] https://www.iosco.org/webmeth_pub/index.cfm

The downside is that they may thereby overlook opportunities in countries where their investment could earn both an acceptable return and make a considerable contribution to that country's development; in effect, where their investment could be socially and economically most productive.

2. Relevant changes in corporate governance during the economic crises. New models requirements

The financial crisis revealed severe shortcomings in corporate governance. When most needed, existing standards failed to provide the checks and balances that companies need in order to cultivate sound business practices.

In 2008, the OECD launched an ambitious action plan to develop a set of recommendations for improvements in priority areas such as remuneration, risk management, board practices and the exercise of shareholder rights. These recommendations also address how the implementation of already-agreed standards can be improved. This work was published in 3 phases[3] [www.oecd.org]: Corporate governance lessons from the financial crisis - a first overview of corporate governance shortcomings and the resulting challenges; corporate governance and the financial crisis: key findings and main messages -follow-up analysis providing the basis for the recommendations; conclusions and emerging good practices to enhance implementation of the Principles - recommendations to help companies and governments to overcome corporate governance weaknesses and support a more effective implementation of the OECD Principles on Corporate Governance.

The crisis that struck in 2008 forced governments to take unprecedented action to shore up financial systems. As economic recovery takes hold, governments will want to withdraw from these extraordinary measures to support financial markets and institutions. This will be a complex task. Correct timing is crucial. Stepping back too soon could risk undoing gains in financial stabilization and economic recovery. It is also important to have structural reforms in place so that markets and institutions operate in a renewed environment with better incentives.

The crisis has highlighted pervasive principal-agent problems which need to be corrected by improvements to corporate governance. Two issues stand out. First, CEOs and other top executives, notably including those charged with credit risk assessment and management, are rarely controlling shareholders of large financial institutions. They are shareholders' agents who have all too often failed to act in shareholders' interests.

The high exposure of shareholders' funds to risk and the very high levels of compensation unrelated to performance, paid out of shareholders' funds, point to the need to ensure better accountability for management decisions to the principals, i.e. the shareholders. This requires clear reporting responsibility and accountability of the CEO and management team to the Board of Directors.

The management should not controlled the all activity of the company, that's why The Board must be independent and motivated to act in the interests of shareholders. The "originate-to-distribute" business model that has increasingly replaced the traditional "originate-to-hold" model has allowed too many decisions to be taken by people or institutions rewarded for completing a transaction, i.e. by collecting a fee, commission or bonus, while transferring the risk to someone else.

Even many of the investors who make the capital allocation decisions on which the chain of transactions depends, e.g. hedge funds, pension funds and insurance companies, are themselves merely agents for the ultimate risk holders. These include pensioners, insurance policyholders, mutual fund owners and hedge fund investors who are not in a position to influence decisions. If the Board is acting effectively on behalf of the shareholders, it will align key executive and board remuneration with the longer-term interests of the company and its shareholders (aligned with OECD Principles of Corporate Governance and the FSB Principles for Sound Compensation Practices).

[3] http://www.oecd.org/document/48/0,3746,en_2649_34813_42192368_1_1_1_1,00.html

Commission and other staff compensation are best left to management and regulatory intervention should be avoided. However, recognition of income from fees received from outside parties for origination of assets that will have an extended life should depend on the ultimate performance of the assets. Such fees would include those for underwriting bonds, originating loans and establishing CDOs. Ideally, they could be put in escrow and drawn over the life of the loan. At minimum, even if the fees are fully paid up front, recognition of the revenues and associated income can be deferred over the life of the asset much as interest on a standard mortgage is spread over its life.

Complex and fast changing of political and economical situation during the actual crisis has revealed the new landscape for corporate governance, new keys to act in those circumstances.

Some of the key elements in corporate governance arisen are leading to the question if those companies are prepared for the requirements of new governance guidance. A short list of the most recent developments and new board responsibilities in the corporate governance will refer to:

- the board is responsible for determining the nature and extent of the risks it is willing to take in achieving its strategic objectives;
- enhanced role for the senior independent director and, of course, more emphasis on the role of chairman, not ignoring the role of managers;
- diversity, including gender, to be taken into account for new board appointments;
- proposing, at every 3-5 years, an external evaluation of the board;
- an annual report in which to be specified every way of improvement of the corporate governance model applied.
- further guidance on the design of performance-related remuneration, taking in account challenging performance criteria, excluding any form of payment or reward for non-performance managerial activities;

3. The primordial role of internal audit to a successful model in corporate governance

The current economic crisis has led many investors to raise serious concerns about the accountability and responsiveness of some companies and boards of directors to the interests of shareholders, and has resulted in a loss of investor confidence. During this recession, the leadership at some of the nation's most renowned companies took too many risks and too much in salary, while their shareholders had too little say. By creating a large public demand for reforms, the current crisis offers another opportunity to improve governance arrangement.

Corporate governance is a combination of processes and organizational structures implemented by the Board of Directors to inform, direct, manage, and monitor the organization's resources, strategies and policies towards the achievement of the organizations objectives. The internal auditor is often considered one of the "five pillars" of corporate governance, the other pillars being the Board of Directors, management, audit committee and the external auditor.

Recent events have highlighted the critical role of boards of directors in promoting good corporate governance. In particular, boards are being charged with ultimate responsibility for the effectiveness of their organization's internal control systems. An effective internal audit function plays a key role in assisting the board to discharge its governance responsibilities.

A primary focus area of internal auditing relating to corporate governance structures is helping the Audit Committee inside the Board of Directors perform its responsibilities effectively[4]. This may include reporting critical internal control deficiencies, informing the Audit Committee privately on the capabilities of key managers, suggesting questions or topics for the Audit Committee's meeting agendas and coordinating carefully with the external auditor and management to ensure the Audit Committee receives effective information.

[4] Suciu A., Morariu G., Stoian F., Internal Audit and Corporate Governance, University Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008, pp.185-190

Corporate governance includes structures that govern together relations between those who invest resources and those who monitor and manage business in that country. These relations are both formal, defined by rules and regulations as well as informal, materialized in business practice, ethical codes, etc. In such approach, transparencies in relationship with investors, as well as the quality of financial reports addressed to them, are primordial factors that may significantly influence the decision of undertaking a certain level of risks associated to financial investments.

Through the review of an audit procedure is to ensure that the committee has sufficient authority and resources to perform its duties. The membership of the committee is being verified to ensure that members have the necessary skills and experience, the size of the committee is appropriate and members are independent from management. Further considered the individual meetings to ensure papers are distributed in advance, members attend every meeting where possible, and new board members receive sufficient induction to the committee. Particularly, audit is interested in highlighting the Strategy Committee's role in relation to strategic planning; ensuring members are informed of main strategic targets and corporate planning process.

The success of implementing corporate governance depends upon reliability allocated to corporate operators, being required cooperation and responsibility. In nowadays crisis business climate, corporate governance has become a reality, taking in account the fact that it assures a certain level of reliability, requested for an adequate functioning of a market economy, lowering the informational risk and the cost of capital, as well as efficiently resources consumption. The importance of corporate governance for Financial Investment Companies has led to specific regulations inspired from national law system as well as implementing the standards regarding auditing, their main role concretizing in specific ways to communicate between auditors and officials in order to gain principal aspects of the financial aspects[5].

Conclusions

In the present situation of an unbalancing economic crisis, corporate governance must promote transparent and efficient markets, must comply with rules and regulations, clearly segregating responsibilities between regulators and operating entities.

From this approach, Financial Investment Companies must adopt clear and transparent corporate governance structures, establishing adequate functions, abilities and responsibilities for management and the Board of directors. Furthermore, in their annually report, Financial Investment Companies must insert special paragraphs to describe relevant events related to corporate governance, as well as explications to inadequate application of recommendations from the Bucharest Stock Exchange Corporate Governance Code[6].

Relations between issuers of securities and investors should remain clear and transparent; this should be a fundamental requirement for promoting an adequate level of informational efficiency for Romanian stock market. Therefore, specific laws and regulations require Financial Investment Companies to respond at investors' informational needs by reporting all the significant changes and events that may cause relevant changes in the field (changes in control possession or in managerial structures, changes in stock prices, financial condition depreciation, etc.).

Of a main importance in having a functional corporate governance nowadays is to verify, periodically, all those sources of information that could influence actual status of the company, these include interim reports, Board of directors' reports, audit or reviewing reports, changes in rights

[5] http://www.pakistaneconomist.com/issue2002/issue22/f&m3.html

[6] Danescu, T., Spatacean, Ovidiu. Corporate Governance- Applied principles for companies listed on a regulated capital market, Financial Audit Magazine of August, 2008, edited by Romanian Financial Auditors Chamber attached to securities, litigious events or bankruptcy procedures initiation, off-balance sheet with significant impact upon financial condition.

As such, corporate governance structures should assure correct and operating dissemination of all material aspects related to Financial Investment Companies, including financial statements, property rights and governance policies.

Dissemination and transparency respond to reporting requirements applied to Financial Investment Companies, related to relevant aspects, such are: financial and operational results, development strategies, management objectives and philosophy, property rights and voting rights of shareholders, remuneration policies regarding management and the Board of directors, transactions involving related parties, risks and uncertainties with significant impact upon entities, etc.

Disclosure and presentation of financial and non-financial information should comply with high quality financial reporting standards and dissemination tools should provide equal, efficient and operative access to all users, especially investors. Information produced by financial reporting system should be subject of internal audit process, in an independent, objective and professional manner, to assure management and Board of directors that financial statements reflect in all material aspects, a true and fair view of financial position and performances. Internal auditors should also test the efficiency and reliability of internal controls, in aspects that may have relevant impact upon financial statements.

References

- Danescu, T., Spatacean, O., "Corporate Governance- Applied principles for companies listed on a regulated capital market", Financial Audit Magazine of August (2008), edited by Romanian Financial Auditors Chamber.
- Suciu A., Morariu G., Stoian F., Internal Audit and Corporate Governance, Bucharest: University Publishing House, 2008, 185-190.
- http://www.oecd.org/
- https://www.iosco.org/
- http://www.pakistaneconomist.com/issue2002/issue22/f&m3.html
- http://www.guvernantacorporativa.ro/

A STUDY REGARDING THE LEVEL OF TRUST THE YOUNG ROMANIAN CONSUMER HAS IN PAID MEDIA AS OPPOSED TO THAT IN EARNED MEDIA

MIHAIL-CRISTIAN DIȚOIU*

Abstract

Along with the evolution of the Internet and with its growing capacity to impose itself on the population, the consumer has become stronger through the simplification of access to information. Thus, 24 hours out of 24 hours, Internet users from all around the world are searching for relevant information about the product they desire. This is also the reason why organizations are striving to be as present as ever in the online medium, interacting with their consumers, monitoring the information dissipated by them on the Internet about their products, and measuring the effects they have produced. The media available to an organization is represented by: paid media, owned media and earned media. The problem that is raised is that of a correct management by the marketers so that the investment in one type of media will also pursue the conversion in another type of media, thus resulting, through the help of consumers, a chain. When a consumer wants to buy a product, he needs relevant information in order to make a decision. The information about the product is analyzed based on source credibility, which is seen as a perception of the degree of the consumer's trust. The present study tries to investigate the level of trust the young Romanian consumer has in paid media and earned media during the buying process. The study is conducted on a group of young Romanian people, with ages ranging from 18 to 24 years, from urban backgrounds. In order to observe if there exists a difference in the perception of media based on the type of medium the subject finds himself in, the survey has been conducted online, as well as offline.

Keywords: level of trust, paid media, owned media, earned media, buying process

Introduction

At a time when the consumer is bombarded with advertisement messages from everywhere, his level of trust in the information he is receiving is dropping. Positioning itself in the area of values-based communication, the present study is an exploratory investigation of the level of trust young Romanians have in two types of media during the purchasing process. Thus the marketers should plan media in time and they should allocate the budgets by choosing the proper information channel in which the consumer trusts and by achieving the conversion from one type of media to another trough the use of a continual communication that runs both ways.

The entire decisional process of buying contains the following five stages: the emergence of an unfulfilled need, the search for information and the identification of alternatives, the mental evaluation of alternatives, the result of this evaluation and the post-buying evaluation[1]. As Kotler[2] observes, these stages take place in sequencing. During the first phase the buyer observes a problem or an unsatisfied need, the marketer's role being to identify the conditions that bring about certain needs and to develop the strategies that catch the consumer's attention. In the second step the consumer searches for more information about the product and for alternatives, the marketer's job becoming that of tracking the sources of information accessed by the consumer, as well as keeping trace of the relative influence that these sources have on him. We may affirm that in the third stage –

* Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, IOSUD ASE – Faculty of Marketing (email: ditoiu_cristian@yahoo.com).

[1] Iacob Catoiu and Nicolae Teodorescu, Comportamentul consumatorului, 2nd ed. (Bucuresti: Uranus, 2004), 34-42.

[2] Philip Kotler and Kevin Lane Keller, Managementul marketingului, 5th ed. trans. Cosmin Crisan and Smaranda Nistor (USA: Teora USA LLC, 2008), 287-300.

of evaluating the identified variety of products - there is no universal process that is used by all the consumers, but that these assessments are often based on the consumer's convictions and attitudes. The fourth step leads to the materialization of all the prior phases by making the decision to buy. The last stage - the post-buying behavior - reminds the marketers that the purchasing process has not yet been finished and that they need to have as goal the consumer's satisfaction, as well as the post-purchasing undertakings or the usages the acquired product can gain.

Analyzing things based on distribution, paid media represents that which the organization pays in order to obtain the channels, owned media refers to the owned channels, and earned media - the consumers become the channels[3]. Paid media is distributed on a limited number of channels, while earned media - on an unlimited number of channels[4]. In terms of its online aspect, earned media is now stable, everlasting, being at the same time a huge factor of influence. Even if earned media presupposes the allocation of money, its orientation is more in terms of management, than acquisition: the design of an editorial schedule, monitoring and the analysis of the results[5]. Earned media becomes an effect of paid or owned media, thus resulting in a media chain in which the consumer is a missionary[6].

The framework

The exploratory investigation was undertaken from December 2011 to January 2012 on a group of 300 young people, with ages ranging from 18 to 24 years, coming from an urban background. The sampling was done non-probabilistically by applying the snowball method and by using the questionnaire as a means of collecting data. Half of the research was conducted through the use of the Internet by questioning online a number of 150 young people, and the other half was carried out offline/in a traditional style on a number of 150 young people.

As for the level of trust the subjects have in paid and earned media, the following scale was used: 1 = total lack of trust; 2 = high degree of distrust; 3 = moderate degree of distrust; 4 = low degree of distrust; 5 =neutral (neither distrust nor trust); 6 =low degree of trust; 7 = moderate degree of trust; 8 = high degree of trust; 9 = absolute trust.

During the process of purchasing the consumer is influenced by the sources of information. The basis of all this information is the organization, which reaches the consumer through the help of the media. There are three types of media available to the organization: paid media, owned media, and earned media.

In the study "Rethinking paid, earned and owned media: New rules for marketing performance" from "Initiative" we have the following things defined: paid media as the advertisement space acquired from TV, print, online, etc.; owned media as the space of communicating the brand directly to the consumer, without intermediates, an example from this point of view being a company website; earned media - as the space controlled by the consumer, such as word-of-mouth, testimonials, etc. By reading the study put forward by those from "Initiative" it appears that 43% of all consumers buy a brand after they have previously checked it out on the Internet. They have also reached the conclusion that there is no unique formula for success regarding the three types of media, hence while consumers from Australia trust paid media, those from Spain

[3] Sean Corcoran, "Defining Earned, Owned And Paid Media," Forrester (blog), December 16, 2009, http://blogs.forrester.com/interactive_marketing/2009/12/defining-earned-owned-and-paid-media.html.

[4] Gil Rudawsky, "Earned media vs. paid media: A 7-point list of benefits," Ragan's Pr Daily Europe (blog), September 29, 2011, http://www.prdaily.eu/mediarelationsEU/Articles/Earned_media_vs_paid_media_A_7point_list_of_benefi_9635.aspx.

[5] Greg Shove, "The new PEO media model," iMedia Connection (blog), June 22, 2011, http://www.imediaconnection.com/content/29345.asp.

[6] Lauren Drell, "How Social Media Is Changing Paid, Earned & Owned Media," Mashable Business (blog), June 23, 2011, http://mashable.com/2011/06/23/paid-earned-owned-media/.

have trust in a mix of owned media and earned media. Romania was not included in the sampling of the survey from "Initiative". At the end of the study they observed that paid and owned media have influenced half of the activity in earned media[7].

Within the boundaries of the present study that has as target Romanian youths two types of media have been taken into consideration: paid media and earned media. Owned media has been considered as being part of paid media because the organization must pay for both of them, and the consumers see them as commercial sources, while earned media can at best be influenced with the help of paid media. Because it cannot be fully controlled by the organization, the consumers define earned media as an independent source. The research conducted online and offline has lead to results.

The consumer's interest in buying a product is triggered in a higher degree by earned media (64%) than paid media (36%) in the online research, while in the offline research earned media has reached a percentage of 54%, and paid media of 46%.

The stage in which the consumer seeks information about the product that triggered his purchasing interest presents the following distribution of trust as a function of the number of appearances of the grade that designates his level of trust. In Diagrams 1 and 2 we can observe that in the online survey the most frequent mark is 7 for both types of media and that in the offline survey, the most frequent marks are 7 for paid media, and 6 for earned media. These two sets of repartition indicate the direction and the intensity of the consumer's trust in paid and earned media. The point which resumes the intensity of the sample's image is the weighted arithmetic mean of all the opinions, this mean being: for paid media 5,46 (online questionnaires) and 5,91 (offline questionnaires); for earned media 6,73 (online questionnaires) and 5,90 (offline questionnaires).

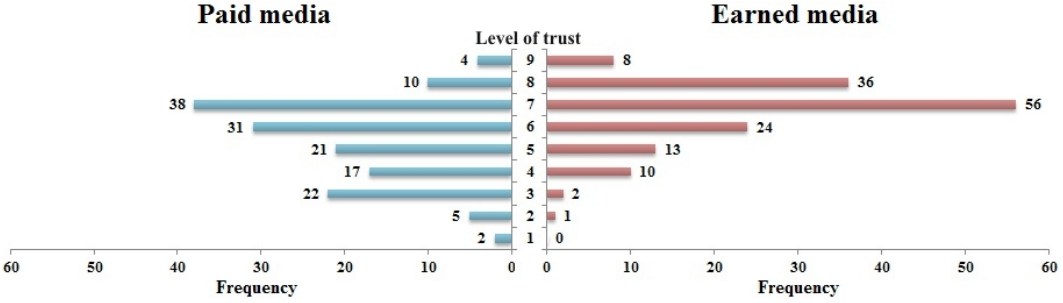

Diagram 1. The distribution of the consumer's trust in paid and earned media as a function of the frequency of the grade attributed to the level of trust during the stage of searching for information - online survey

[7] Initiative. "Rethinking paid, earned and owned media: New rules for marketing performance, " news release, September 6, 2011, http://initiativeblog.ro/wp-content/uploads/2011/09/06.09.2011-Press-Release-Initiative-Launches-Paid-Earned-Owned-Media.pdf.

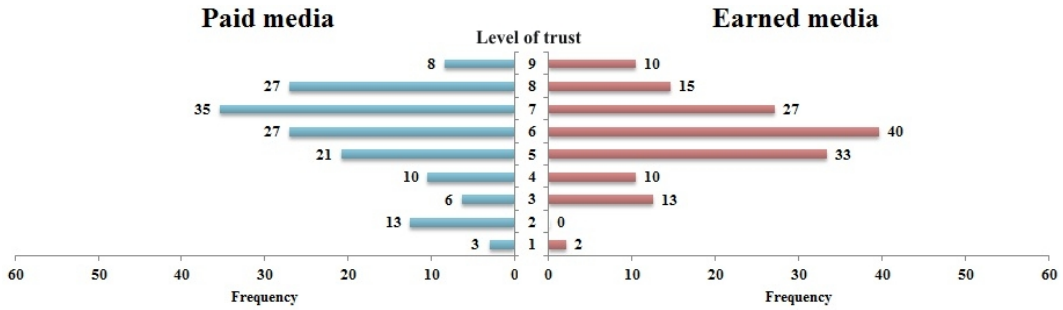

Diagram 2. The distribution of the consumer's trust in paid and earned media as a function of the frequency of the grade attributed to the level of trust during the stage of searching for information - offline survey

During the process of evaluating the identified alternatives for the product, but before reaching the stage of developing the intention to buy and before making this decision, the consumer's level of trust presents the following distribution:

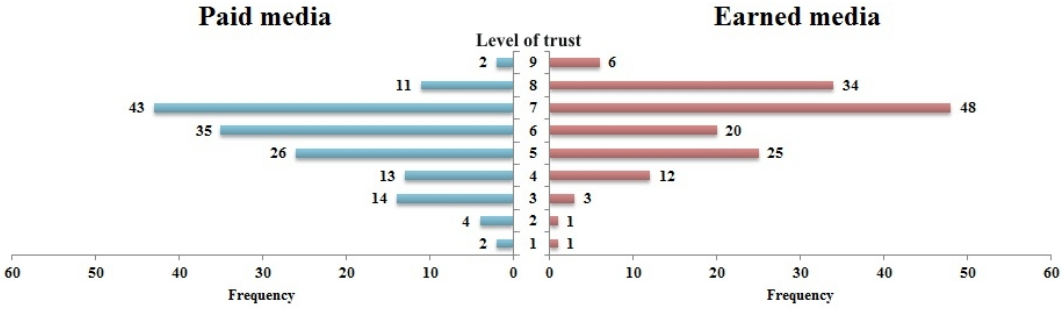

Diagram 3. The distribution of the consumer's level of trust in paid and earned media as a function of the frequency of the mark attributed to the level of trust during the stage of evaluating the alternatives for the product - online survey

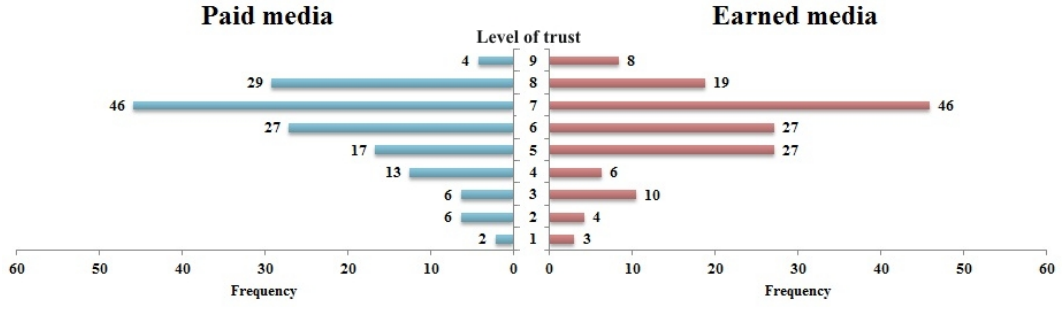

Diagram 4. The distribution of the consumer's trust in paid and earned media as a function of the frequency of the mark attributed to the level of trust during the stage of evaluating the alternatives for the product - offline survey

Diagrams 3 and 4 show us that the most frequent mark attributed to the level of trust in both types of media is 7, in online surveys and in offline ones, as well. The weighted arythmetic mean for the paid media is 5,67 (online surveys) and 6,14 (offline surveys), and for earned media – 6,45 (online media) and 6,05 (offline surveys).

When the consumer places himself in the stage of making the finale decision to buy, the distribution of his level of trust in media is the following:

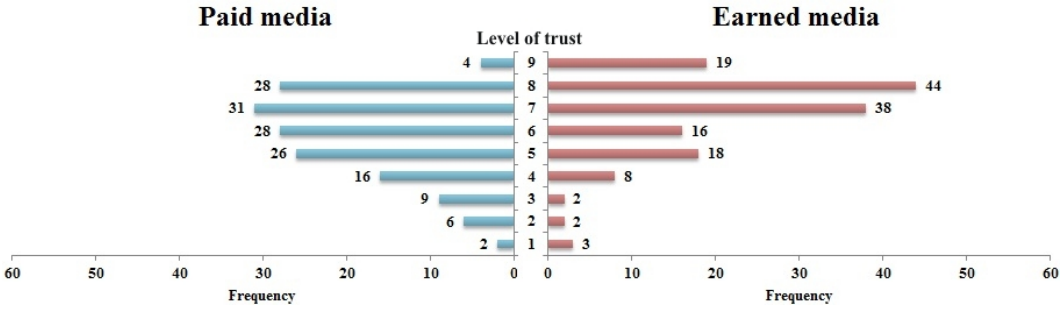

Diagram 5. The distribution of the consumer's trust in paid and earned media as a function of the frequency of the mark attributed to the level of trust during the stage of taking the final decision to buy - online survey

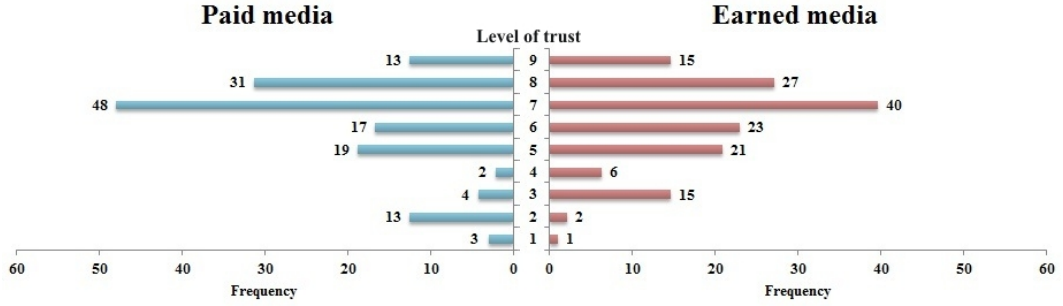

Diagram 6. The distribution of the consumer's trust in paid and earned media as a function of the frequency of the mark attributed to the level of trust during the stage of taking the finale decision to buy - offline survey

According to Diagram 5, in the case of the online survey, the most frequent grade attributed to the consumer's level of trust in paid media is 7, and in the case of earned media - 8. According to Diagram 6, in the case of the offline survey the most frequent grade for both types of media is 7. By calculating the weighted arithmetic mean we obtain for paid media the value 5,87 (online survey) and 6,31 (offline survey), and for earned media - 6,80 (online survey) and 6,32 (offline survey).

Once the decision to buy has been made, the process is not finished, and we thus enter the stage pertaining to the post-buying behavior. For example, the consumer's satisfaction is one of the indicators that should be analyzed by marketers. As for the type of media, which establishes for the consumer a horizon of expectations regarding the bought product that are closer to his perceptions of the acquired product's performance, the percentages are the following: during the online survey, paid media 33%, and earned media 67%; during the offline survey, paid media 49%, and earned media 51%.

To this post-buying stage is also linked the satisfaction or non-satisfaction of the consumer regarding the purchased product. From the online survey results that, when the consumer is content with the product, he will recommend it to other people he knows. The percentage of people who have indicated that they recommend the product is of 49%. When the consumer is dissatisfied with the product, he will no longer buy it, 36% of the subjects choosing not to buy the product again. The rest of the post-purchasing actions from the online survey are presented in Tables 1 and 2.

Table 1.

The manifestation of satisfaction – online survey
Recommends	49%
Reiterates the purchase	17%
Becomes a loyal costumer	10%
Uses with pleasure	9%
Gives a good review	8%
Is happy	7%

Table 2.

The manifestation of dissatisfaction – online survey
Doesn't buy any more	36%
Gives negative publicity	23%
Doesn't recommend	17%
Files a complaint	12%
Returns product	9%
Is angry	3%

Table 3.

The manifestation of satisfaction – offline survey
Recommends	61%
Reiterates the purchase	23%
Becomes a loyal costumer	9%
Uses with pleasure	5%
Gives a good review	2%
Is happy	0%

Table 4.

The manifestation of dissatisfaction – offline survey
Doesn't buy any more	30%
Gives negative publicity	30%
Doesn't recommend	27%
Files a complaint	7%
Returns product	5%
Is angry	1%

Table 3 and Table 4 show us the post-buying actions of the consumer when he is content with the purchased product or when he is dissatisfied, according to the offline survey. When they are satisfied with what they have bought the percentage of consumers that recommend the product is 61%. Taking into consideration the hierarchy there nevertheless appears a change from the online survey, in a situation of dissatisfaction, when, according to the acquired percentages, the first positions are represented by the following actions: doesn't buy any more (30%) or gives negative publicity (30%).

Overall: the source of good information during the buying process is represented by earned media (Diagrams 7 and 8).

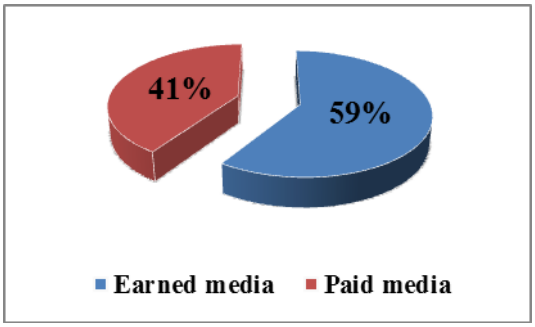

Diagram 7. Media as a source of good information during the buying process - online survey

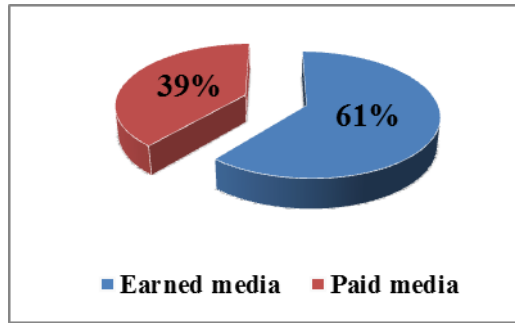

Diagram 8. Media as a source of good information during the buying process - offline survey

At the end of the research the consumers' opinions have been analyzed in the case of a touristic product. When the consumer chooses his vacation destination based on the trust he has on the quality of the information from those two types of media, the results from the online survey places paid media at 37% and earned media at 63%, and from the offline questionnaire paid media gains 44% and earned media 56%. When the question arises whether to purchase a vacation or not, the consumer is influenced in a much higher degree by earned media because we have the following percentages: 59%, according to the online questionnaire, and 51% in the case of the offline questionnaire. Paid media influences 41% of the subjects according to the online questionnaire and a percentage of 49% in the case of the offline questionnaire.

Conclusions

It becomes more obvious by the minute that the consumer's behavior is changing as a result of introducing the Internet and of the emergence of online social networks which are in the benefit of earned media. The access to information about the products, as well as their online purchasing are now facilitated.

The present research has strived to study the level of trust the young Romanian consumer has in paid and earned media during the buying process. In all the five stages pertaining to the buying process earned media has obtained from an overall point of view a higher credibility score than paid media. During the online research, throughout every stage of the buying process, the level of credibility in earned media is higher than in the case of the offline research regarding the same type of media. In what regards the offline research, throughout every stage of the purchasing process, the credibility of paid media is higher than in the case of the online research regarding the same type of media.

The consumer's post-buying actions materialize in accordance to the subjects when they are satisfied about the bought product: recommendations, the reiteration of the purchase, loyalty, using the product with pleasure, giving good reviews, or obtaining a state of well-being. In both the online and offline surveys the most common among satisfied consumers is the recommending of the product to other people known. In what regards the consumer's post-purchasing actions when he is dissatisfied, these are the following: failing to re-purchase the product, negative publicity, the lack of recommendation, filing a complaint, returning the product, or a state of unhappiness. According to the online research the consumer's dissatisfaction with the product he has just purchased impels him not to buy it again. The offline research establishes that two of the most frequent actions the consumer takes when he is discontent are to give negative publicity and not to buy the product.

Marketers should take into consideration the fact that earned media represents an alternative in an environment which is overwhelmed with the organization's messages toward the consumers, and they should bring to use the credibility of this independent source. It has always been known about how high an efficiency recommendation has in influencing the consumer during the buying process. The Internet and the social networks are very helpful nowadays in the dissemination of this type of recommendation, and thus they lead to earned media. But it is up to the marketer to choose the best media mix, based on, for example, as this study has shown, the stage in which the consumer finds himself during the purchasing process and the type of medium he habituates in that particular moment. The media strategies and planning must also be interested in the conversion from paid media to earned media, as well as in the opposite type of conversion, the consumer being their main area of focus. By shifting the focus during the purchasing process on the satisfaction of the consumer, more earned media would be generated, thus having a higher level of credibility as a source of information, in spite of the fact that this information is not always as accurate as it should be. Earned media can sometimes function as a guaranty of the choice. In order to obtain correct information it is high time that owned media appeared as a support for earned media, and that paid media represented the link between owned media and earned media.

Research should be continued so as to identify the sources that generate earned media, to obtain the optimum mix of media and to trace the influence of earned media in the context of different categories of products, target-groups and the environments in which these groups can be found. Another research direction could be towards transforming consumers into brand ambassadors through earned media.

References

- Catoiu, Iacob, and Nicolae Teodorescu. Comportamentul consumatorului. 2nd ed. Bucuresti: Uranus, 2004.
- Corcoran, Sean. Forrester (blog). http://blogs.forrester.com/interactive_marketing/2009/12/defining-earned-owned-and-paid-media.html.
- Drell, Lauren. Mashable Business (blog). http://mashable.com/2011/06/23/paid-earned-owned-media/.
- Initiative. Rethinking paid, earned and owned media: New rules for marketing performance. news release. September 6, 2011. http://initiativeblog.ro/wp-content/uploads/2011/09/06.09.2011-Press-Release-Initiative-Launches-Paid-Earned-Owned-Media.pdf.
- Kotler, Philip, and Kevin Lane Keller. Managementul marketingului. 5th ed. Translated by Cosmin Crisan and Smaranda Nistor. USA: Teora USA LLC, 2008.
- Rudawsky, Gil. Ragan's Pr Daily Europe (blog). http://www.prdaily.eu/mediarelationsEU/Articles/Earned_media_vs_paid_media_A_7point_list_of_benefi_9635.aspx.
- Shove, Greg. iMedia Connection (blog). http://www.imediaconnection.com/content/29345.asp.

FROM STRESS TO MOBBING

CĂTĂLINA BONCIU[*]
GHEORGHIȚA CĂPRĂRESCU[]

Abstract
The currently specific problem at work is chronic fatigue, a syndrome characterized by physiological and emotional exhaustion and often generated (through permanent frustration) by the position with a too much or too low volume of work. First of all, the treatment of stress, of burnout or in countering resilience, is preventive and consists in gaining a better resistance.
In simpler words, fighting against those phenomena is maintaining personal health. "Health is a fully favorable condition, physically, mentally and socially, and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity"[1]. Later it was added that health is the "capacity to lead a socially and economically productive life."
But, when the general concern is to destroy the balance, whatever that may mean – the balance of the active body or the body "ready to leave the system", balance of knowledge, individual and collective mental equilibrium, functional balance of economy, balance of the bio-system… - we must not remain indifferent. It occurs frequently a phenomenon which is a relatively unknown concept for the Romanian economy – the mobbing or bullying.

Keywords: stress, burnout, resilience, mobbing, management of stress/burnout/resilience and combating mobbing

Introduction

From the second half of 2007 I wrote about the fundamental changes which began to occur on the labor market. In fact, the evolution of economy cannot take place without the human factor to adapt to those always changing requirements. The times we live now are much different from what people have experienced or imagined for the future. More specifically, individuals are not mentally prepared for the changes in the social disposition, economic system, life and work conditions... If it is relatively easy to adapt the skills, abilities, professional competences to new jobs, is not the same with the people's psychological preparation to work in stressful conditions. Employers remain subject of immediate profit, but few think that the level of fulfillment of this mission depends mostly on the physical and mental quality of their employees. The more restrictive the legal conditions the lower the investments in the human factor, in the professional development techniques, but especially in preserving or improving their health. It seems that the general concern is to destroy the balance, whatever that may mean – the active body or the body "ready to leave the system", balance of knowledge, individual and collective mental equilibrium, functional balance of economy, balance of the bio-system… Therefore, how can survival and continuation, especially in conditions of performance, be preserved? According to the primary laws: who has days will escape?! According to nepotism laws: who is related to … or who belongs to the group …?! In the spirit of Christian laws: who loves his neighbor as himself and do everything he can to help, support, promote?! The problem of the imbalances in the individual's body, whether at work or in family or society, in the context of the economic crisis or the reorganization of the economic activity, is a subject frequently brought into the public's attention [2].

[*] Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Administration and Business, University of Bucharest, Romania, (email: catalina.bonciu@yahoo.com).
[] Professor, Ph. D.,"Dimitrie Cantemir", Christian University, Bucharest, Romania (email: ghcaprarescu@yahoo.com).

It is true that it is not the world leaders who show concern for the fate of the workers. For some time, there is said that the planet's current population exceeds its level of affordability. Various studies, presented staggering conclusions, announced with temper or slipped discreetly, starting from the crisis (in different forms of manifestation) and reaching to subsequent decimations of the population (by means of apparent recovery and modernization).

What should actually raise real signs of concern among employers and managers? Completely voluntarily are not included in the analysis those who "master" us, economically and politically, seen or not seen…

1. The scientific concepts as well as the causes of the phenomena they explain.
2. The general and specific manifestations in the current transition towards a new economic order.
3. The management of all physical phenomena disturbing the physical and psychical equilibrium of the person exposed to transition.
4. What could be done to diminish the negative consequences of these phenomena with negative impact on individuals?

In life, the events we live are not happening at random. There are rare the situations when one cannot reveal the causes. A well scientifically and spiritually trained person, with sufficient attention to everything around him, can logically and emotionally interpret, can relate in time and space, and more than that, he can act as he considers more fit, not as it is directed, manipulated or coerced, forced.

Actual Content

Starting from this premise, what is fundamental for a businessman with a long term vision is to form a professional and loyal team, well trained and ready to change qualification if needed, with willingness to climb the career ladder, with a strong sense of responsibility and duty. Such people bring value to the business, are valuable themselves, and bring value to others in the team. Why? Because they have skills, abilities, competences.

Skills are mental and physical attributes, based on specific functional structures, which lead the person to successfully accomplish a certain activity. As they are reflected in the activity's quality, they show the human's possibilities. The skills are based on hereditary predispositions, but emerge only during activities, under the influence of the environment and the education. Higher forms of manifestation are: vocation (when the individual has a special inclination towards a particular activity), talent (creative development of complex skills) and genius (the highest level of development involved in an activity of historical significance – is rarely encountered among workers). The professional skill is seen as a juxtaposition of simple skills, being conditioned by knowledge, interests and aptitudes. The consummation of the professional skill takes place when the general or intellectual skills (intelligence, memory, observation, attention) are accompanied by one or more specific skills (technical or mechanical, psychomotor, sensory, organizational or management, etc.).

Skills are completed by mental abilities (verbal understanding, word fluency, ability to count, resonance, inductance, memory, perceptual speed and other special skills) and physical abilities [3]. Ability is defined according to the Romanian Explanatory Dictionary as skills, cunning, adroitness, dexterity, quality of being shrewd, skill to do something.

The professional competence is the ability to perform activities required at the workplace at the quality level specified in the occupational standard [4]. Professional skills are acquired through: initiation, qualification, training, specialization, retraining:

Initiation - acquiring the minimum knowledge, skills and abilities necessary to perform an activity.

Qualification - acquiring a set of skills that enable a person to perform a specific activity or profession.

Training - developing the professional skills within the same qualification.

Specialization - acquiring knowledge and skills in a small area of coverage of an occupation.

Requalification - acquiring skills which are specific to other occupations or professions, different from those previously acquired.

Most workers, after fulfilling all the steps in developing and/or acquiring the skills, abilities, competences needed, could not enjoy the results of the effort made for their professional investment.

The present prolonged crisis psychologically marked the workers, stressed them, some more, some less. There are neurotic, depressive employees, employees with identity crises, which receive treatment. But most of them do not even realize what is going on with them, let alone the fact that they would not have the sufficient financial resources for specialized treatment.

The insistence to work under stress turns into burnout. Later, the employers, noticing the employees lack of response to harsh work conditions, being content with their apathy or even rejoicing that they managed to instill terror among the employees, can impose permanent stressful working conditions.

Are any of those interested in the health of their subordinates? Generally, no. If course, if asked, they all pretend to be worried and involved, but, in reality, protection happens only at individual level. However, irrespective of the actions of the employer or of the manager, each individual has the obligation to maintain his health and work capacity in the normal parameters, through his own efforts, without expecting too much from others.

Literature review

According to the Romanian Explanatory Dictionary, stress is the name given to any environmental factor (or combination of factors) causing abnormal body reaction. Stress is an adverse effect of the human body produced by an environmental factor.

The Oxford Dictionary translates the word "stress" as a condition of care, with energetic physical and mental implications. Stress is also a condition or circumstance (not always negative), which can disrupt the normal physiological and psychological functioning of an individual.

There is not a universally accepted definition of stress; many scholars have considered the phenomenon as being the sum of "external and internal conditions creating stressful situations" [5], or "symptoms experienced as a result of the existence of stressful conditions."

Arnold şi Feldman [6] define stress as "the reactions of the individuals to new or threatening environmental factors" and William and Huber (also 1986) define it as "physical and mental reaction to environmental conditions extended beyond the individual's adaptive capacity."

In the publication "Gestalt Therapy Verbatim (1969), Pearls [7] suggests a more general interpretations, in which stress is a manifestation of thinking about the future.

French, Kast and Rosenzweig [8] highlight the idea that stress is not necessarily negative. "The term stress can be considered neutral, while distress and eustress terms can be used to define the negative effects and respectively the positive effects." The authors propose a model that characterizes the optimal level of stress in relation to its effects on performance. What goes beyond the optimal threshold leads to poor performance and "burnout", and what is under the optimal threshold leads to a decreased performance and generates the "rust-out" (:rusting". i.e. a trivialization of performance and creativity).

The "father" of the stress concept is Hans Hugo Bruno Selye. He believes that stress is the individual's adaptation syndrome to the environmental aggressions, through tenseness, tension, coercion, force, strain. Hans Slye defines stress as the totality of the human body reactions to the external action of certain causative agents (physical, chemical, biological and psychological), consisting of morpho-functional changes, frequently endocrine. In the case of a long-term stress agent the general syndrome of adaptation involves a stage evolution. Selye [9] was the first author who described the stages of the human body in threatening situations. His model, "the general adaptive syndrome" defines three phases: alarm reaction stage (preparation for a possible emergency by slowing digestion, increased heart rate, blood vessel dilation, increased blood pressure and respiratory rate), the stage of resistance (continued stress lead to resistance, the body get accustomed to the effects of the stressful factor) and the exhaustive stage (as the adaptive energetic resources are consumed, the alarm reaction symptom reappears and distress manifests as illness).

The concept of burnout was set in 1969 by H.B. Bradley, in his article "Community-based Treatment for young adult offenders." Burnout was first defined as a particular stress, strictly related to work. This term has been repeated by the psychoanalyst Herbert J. Freudenberger (1974), then by psychologist Christina Maslach (1976), where burnout was the manifestation of professional wear and tear.

The definition of mobbing is rooted in the English verb "to mob" (to criticize, to confront, to attack someone). There has been written about mobbing since 1963, when Konrad Lorenz described the manifestations of rabbits and geese when a fox appeared. Later, in 1969, the concept was extended to human society by the Swedish Dr. Peter-Paul Heinemann, who studied violence on groups of children [10].

The Swedish psychologist Heinz Leymann consolidated the concept in the world of specialists with his work "Mobbing", published in 1993, paving the way for German and Scandinavian researchers. He identified about forty components of aggression, which, if repeated at least once a week for six months, represent mobbing. That is, a conflict that degenerates.

The psychiatrist and psychoanalyst Marie-France Hirigoyen has introduced the term "le harcelèment moral" in the French literature, through her book "Le harcelèment moral – La violence perverse au quotidien" (1998). Continuing her studies and research, her second book "Malaise dans le travail" (2001) brought together a growing number of workers which were found in situations similar to those presented in the book. "Moral harassment is an abusive conduct manifested in particular by behavior, words, actions, gestures, writings which can have negative impact on the personality, dignity or physical or mental integrity of a person, endangering his/her work or degrading the social environment." In other words, the person aggressed is unable, psychologically, to withstand the onset of a conflict or to assume an open conflict, less damaging. [11].

Theoretical background

1. Stress

In management, the concept of stress was borrowed from medicine, where it is perceived as a reactive state of the body subject to a sudden action, and the etymology has to be searched in English, where stress means treadmill. In medical language, stress is defined as a disruption of the body and the homeostasis. This mind-body application occurs when you must deal with continual changes occurring in life. A state of stress appears relatively normal.

Doctors have identified multiple sources of aggression on the body, each representing stressors: trauma, emotional shock, surgery, poisoning, cold and generally, the constraints of daily life (noise, multiple phone calls, urban transport, etc.) In more specific terms, aggression triggers at brain level (pituitary) an "alarm reaction" that stimulates the secretion of adrenocorticotropic hormone and adrenocortical hormones. They change the subject's psycho-physiological balance and provoke tachycardia, respiratory hyperventilation and arterial vasoconstriction. When stress is kept within the normal limits, it plays a positive role, improving resilience to pressure. Not the same thing happens when aggression is very intense or too extended in time.

Still in medicine, stress-related disorders are treated at levels such as the neurovegetative factors, endocrine or tissue, with individual customization.

The most common symptom is stomach ulcer – a repeated stimulus leads to the contraction of the arterial network irrigating the stomach mucous. If the stress is not eliminated, ischemia occurs, i.e. causing circulatory failure or deterioration or necrosis of the tissues. The next step is bleedings or stomach perforation.

Stress-related diseases can appear at cardiovascular level (myocardial infarction, hypertensions), digestive level (transit disorders, colitis, ulcers), at skin level (rash, alopecia or hair loss), endocrine level (chronic adrenal insufficiency) and at gynecological level (ovulation disorders and/or menstruation flow).

Stress can be the source of pains and neurovegetative ailments (heart palpitation, syncope), rebel fatigue, depression, insomnia, anorexia and even mental confusion.

Recent studies talk about the dangerous physical changes attributed to prolonged exposure to stress. A report made in New York showed an increase of twenty grams of the heart muscle at persons exposed to stress situations. This "growth of the left ventricle of the heart is present, many times, as an incipient form of a coronary heart disease and a heart attack" (Pieper, 1990). Also, the "Omni" magazine (1991) published a series of experiments made on animals in order to examine the effects of prolonged stress. Researchers have discovered that there is a loss of neurons in the hippocampus region, a phenomenon likely to occur also in the case of human subjects.

Why did I start with the medical approach of stress? Precisely to understand the gravity of the phenomenon. Before explaining the manifestations of organizational stress, everyone should pay more attention to the serious consequences on our body's health.

In other words, there is a potential for the occurrence of stress. The stressed person cannot manage the imbalance between the individual capacities and the personal resources, and the difference between the rewards and costs of achieving a certain goal is substantial (ibid). The personal level of stress is therefore dependent on the self-perception of the personal skills, self-confidence and fear of failure.

As the work environment often implies new situations, stress is unavoidable, and reactions to stress are individualized, depending on perceptions, emotions, attitudes and personal changes of the human resources.

Stress appears as an adaptive individual response to a conscious or unconscious threat, a subjective phenomenon, not as an objective response to the environmental factors. The level of stress caused by a certain situations depends on the way that situation is interpreted, not only by the contextual conditions. In other words, stress is a relative phenomenon.

In addition, focusing on a somewhat distant horizon, creating expectations for the future and appreciating the difference between their ideals and the present situations, individuals begin to feel anxiety. When this anxiety is released on one task, one can speak of eustress, positive and motivating stress. But when anxiety does not leas to mobilization, we are dealing with distress, negative and harmful stress.

Ivancevich and Matteson [12] made the connection between the customs of the primitive people, with responses like "fight or run" in order to survive and the inertia of the human nervous system to respond now, in the same way, to environmental stress factors, even though the environment is radically different. Reitz [13] strengthens and supports the idea that individuals in modern societies often substitute the fight or run option with psychological reactions, such as negativism, the expression of boredom, irritability, nervousness in front of unimportant problems, but also with feelings of persecution, apathy, resignation, fantasy, amnesia, lack of concentration and impossibility to take decisions.

The stress present for a short time represented a useful tool in the survival of humankind. But extended for a longer period of time, stress leads to continuous and increased adaptive efforts. When it comes to work, the negative effect of stress on the physical and emotional health is important. Williams and Huber (1986) presents a comprehensive list of stress symptoms: constant fatigue, low energy levels, headaches, intestinal problems, chronic respiratory problems, sweating limbs, dizziness, increased blood pressure, constant inner tension, insomnia, temperamental crisis, hyperventilation, irritability, restlessness, inability to concentrate, aggressiveness, chronic worry, anxiety, inability to relax, feeling of inadequacy, increased self-defense, dependence on painkillers, alcohol and tobacco abuse." Moreover, stressful jobs expose people to serious diseases: managers subject to high levels of stress are twice more prone to heart attacks than those at lower level of stress [14].

2. Burnout

Excessive stress at work is not an isolated or negligible problem. The "burnout" phenomenon is already a constant presence in the life of most employees. In such situations, work-related stress leads to lower productivity levels and the emergence of personal health problems [15].

Burnout is a popular term for mental or physical energy depletion after a period of chronic, unrelieved job-related stress characterized sometimes by physical illness. The person suffering from burnout may lose concern or respect for other people and often has cynical, dehumanized perceptions of people, labeling them in a derogatory manner. Causes of burnout often include stressful, even dangerous, work environments; lack of support; lack of respectful relationships; low pay scales compared with other's salaries; shift changes and long work hours; pressure from the responsibility of providing continuous high levels of work over long periods; and frustration and disillusionment resulting from the difference between job realities and job expectations [16].

Burnout is the syndrome of total exhaustion. That is, a higher stage of the evolutionary scale of discomfort. Burnout is a disease characterized by a set of signs, symptoms and behavioral changes at workplace; general pain, lack of attention, insomnia, irritability, anxiety, fatigue and psychological distress, lack of work motivation.

In some cases one can observe also morphological, functional or biochemical changes, that can lead to a wrong diagnosis. In such a state of fatigue, burnout is included among the psychosocial risk occupational diseases, as a subsequent exposure to permanent and prolonged stress. Expressed in a cynical way, burnout means: "dead by work overload."

Burnout is the current specific situation at work, of chronic fatigue syndrome, characterized by physiological and emotional exhaustion. The causes must be sought in the chronic frustration given by the workplace, on one side, and the work volume, on the other side. Therefore, it is not a surprise that persons having the burnout symptoms are all the more: increased consumption of alcohol, coffee and even drugs, depression, decreased self-esteem, pessimism and accentuated feeling of loneliness, absenteeism, tiredness and irritability, muscle tension and stomach problems, loss of sense of humor and strong sense of guilt.

In the current organizational context, employees may experience positive stress, perceived as a pleasant challenge, of limited duration. This helps them concentrate and perform well. The main condition is the short time of manifestation. However, conversion to negative stress, as an intermediary step to burnout, is made on account of a continuous pressure exerted on the respective subject, when they are obliged to act in ways not compatible to their real competences, skills, time and resources.

In 1980, Freudenberger et Richelson in "Burnout: The High Cost of High Achievement", p. 145, defined burnout as "a state of frustration, depression and chronic fatigue caused by dedication to a cause, a life model or a relationship that fails in producing the expected results, leading to reduced involvement and non-completion of work tasks."

Generally, people do not realize when they go through the stress stages to reach burnout: frustration, anxiety, depression.

Frustration is deep discontent, felt by the individual when something or someone comes in the way of attaining a goal. When kept within certain limits, frustration has beneficial effects: customizes behavior and pushes towards progress and energy mobilization in solving emerging problems. The consequences of frustration are positive only when frustration is intermittent and when the individual has the opportunities to solve the problems. When these lack, frustration becomes an emotional state of mind which may take aggressive forms such as protest, violence, sabotage or in extremis, apathy and isolation. When frustration comes by surprise and is considered as having unjust causes, it manifests as aggression.

Anxiety is the reaction to a physical or psychological anticipated threat, unlike fear (a response to present danger). Both occur on the lack of defense against possible danger. Anxiety appears in an organization because of the employees' vulnerability in front of decisions which are not in their favor: frequent changes of routine, internal competition, when persons can lose their position or reputation, ambiguity of tasks, job insecurity, mistrust and continuous and hostile surveillance. The personal factors, such as illness, family problems, alienation from a group, too high ambitions, also have an important role in the installation of frustration. Moderate anxiety motivates, sharpens the senses and increases innovation, being the source for interesting solutions to problems and tasks. But when it becomes chronic and exceeds certain limits, the subjects are no longer thinking rationally. Some even start to get help and courage from alcohol, tobacco and drugs. The worst is that people manifesting anxiety, especially men, do not recognize their status (which they consider a sign of weakness), thereby delay discussions on this problem and other's attempts to help them.

Depression is also an emotional state experienced by everyone at some point, following an illness, of a prolonged effort or an unfortunate event. At these times, depression for a limited period is beneficial because the body functions slow down, defending it in front of excessive energy consumption in order to adapt. Normally, depressions disappear after short periods of time. Energy, appetite for life, optimism return and normal life is resumed. But for some depression becomes a permanent state. They are becoming increasingly apathetic and isolate, they are not sleeping well (they get up after one hour or two of sleep), no longer have appetite, are undecided, negligent about their appearance, they find it hard to focus, they feel guilty and helpless, they no longer enjoy life. All this affects their ability to work, their family and social relations, leading to abuse of medicine, alcohol and drugs.

3. Resilience

"At some point, everyone experiences stress. The term was used to describe a variety of negative feelings are reactions that accompany threatening or challenging situations. Thus, not all forms of stress are negative. A certain amount of stress is necessary for our survival. Reaction to stress maximizes energy production to prepare the body to cope with such situations" [17].

Those who managed to maintain themselves in relatively normal operating conditions respond to another managerial and psychological concept – resilience.

Resilience is defined as a dynamic process that individuals exhibit positive behavioral adaptation when they encounter important adversity, trauma, tragedy, threats, or even significant sources of stress:

- good outcomes regardless of high/risk status;
- constant competence under stress;
- recovery from trauma;
- using from challenges for growth that makes future hardships more tolerable.

In the past two years, words such as layoffs, unemployed and restructuring are also known by children. The so-called "survivors" of these events positively answered to the resilience phenomenon, to the recent economic and financial changes.

The price paid by those who leave a company which undergoes a restructuring process is far too high. The consequences for the survivors are also, significant and serious. The employees' confidence and moral often suffers as the volume of work increases and job insecurity become more pressing. Over half of these survivors are extremely stressed at work, suffer of fatigue due to reduction of personnel and present the risk f no longer being apt for work. However there are cases of survivors who consider this an opportunity for personal development [18].

Reduction of personnel seems to cause stress both to managers and those who manage to keep their jobs. Managers may feel threatened because, according to the American model – where growth equals success, the opposite may indicate a failure, at least in perception. Whether it is an inefficient or poor management, managers that implement staff reductions say they themselves feel a certain degree of insecurity at the work place. Managers are thus faced with a diminished importance in the organization – the image and their status is affected. Moreover, their responsibility of communicating the layoffs decision to the employees leaving the company is generating stress and anxiety in itself [19].

Employees, survivors of such changes may come to feel the stress at a very high level, mainly because of a mixture of guilt and insecurity. They often feel guilty, especially in front of their colleagues leaving the company. Then, exposure to the departure of those colleagues causes the perception of a threat: losing their job, demotion and income reduction (ibidem).

As a concept, the reduction of personnel is not equivalent to the decline of the organization, as it aims growth in efficiency, productivity and competitiveness. The survivors of this process may contribute or hinder this goal. Everything depends on the reactions and behaviors they adopt. The classification of survivors can be made in a sociologic frame of reference EVLN – exit, voice, loyalty, neglect (Hischman, 1970, Farell, 1983), according to types of behavior constructive/destructive and active/passive (MISHRA, SPREITZER, 1998). By juxtaposing the two dimensions, we can classify survivors in:

- Constructive – do not perceive restructuring as threatening and are willing to cooperate with management in order to implement it. Example: employees work unpaid overtime to help the organization overcome the transition period.
- Destructive – just the opposite; they feel the change as threatening and become uncooperative. Example: the surviving employees stock or block in their department resources which could be used in other departments;
- Active – express confidence that they can cope with the restructuring, are assertive. Example: employees offer to identify the jobs that need to be restructured or, by contrast, organize protests against restructuring.
- Passive – do not trust their ability to cope with the reorganization process, do not have initiative.

Example: employees wait for their superiors to identify the jobs to be restructured.

4. Mobbing

Mobbing is a communication interrupted by a conflict between colleagues or between superiors and the staff at the workplace, where the concerned individual is systematically dominated and often attacked, directly or indirectly, by one or more persons (at least once a week) and over a long period of time (min. six months) with the purpose to expel him/her from the working life and what makes him/her feel discriminated against.

There is a so called "list of the 45" [20] which clearly lists the behaviors and actions resulting from mobbing:

a) Effects on the victims' possibilities to communicate adequately (10):

- Management gives the victim no possibility to communicate;
- The victim is constantly interrupted;
- The victim is silenced by colleagues;
- The victim is verbally attacked;
- The victim is permanently criticized about his/her work ;
- The private life of the victim is continuously commented (negatively);
- The victim is terrorized via phone;
- The victim is orally threatened;

- The victim receives written threats;
- The victim is denied eye contact, by derogatory glances or gestures, through allusions, without being directly spoken.

b) Effects on the victims' possibilities to maintain social contacts (5):
- The colleagues do not talk with the victim;
- He/she is denied conversation;
- The victim is isolated from the colleagues, being moved as far away as possible;
- The colleagues are forbidden to talk with the victim;
- He/she is completely ignored.

c) Effects on the victims' possibilities to maintain his personal reputation (15):
- The victim is calumniated;
- Rumors are spread;
- The victim is ridiculed;
- The victim is suspected to suffer from a mental illness;
- It is intended to force the victim to submit to a psychiatric examination;
- Colleagues make fun of a handicap of the victim;
- They imitate walking, way of talking or gestures, in order to laugh at him/her;
- They attack the political and religious views of the victim;
- They publicly despise the victim's privacy;
- They laugh of the victim's ethnic heritage;
- The victim is forced to do tasks that shake his/her confidence;
- The victim's work is appreciated in an incorrect and offensive way;
- They question the victim's decisions;
- They use obscene words or other calumnious expressions;
- The victim is made verbal sexual offers.

d) Effects on the victims' occupational situation:
- The victim is not given work assignments;
- The victim is stopped from completing their work assignments;
- The victim is given meaningless work assignments,
- The victim is given work tasks which are not suitable for his/her qualification;
- The victim permanently receives new tasks;
- The victim is given offensive tasks;
- The victim is given tasks which are not proper for their own qualification, in order to discredit him/her.

e) Effects on the victims' physical health:
- The victim is given dangerous work assignments;
- The victim is threatened with physical attacks;
- The victim is aggressed physically, to be given a lesson;
- The victim is physically aggressed;
- The victim is caused financial damages;
- The victim is caused physical damages in privacy or at work;
- The victim is sexually aggressed.

In most cases, mobbing appears in a stressed body, in a person physically and morally weakened. Mobbing is likely to appear when the organizational climate favors the splitting of the working team, when individuals, separated from the group, become vulnerable. The phenomenon degenerates in:

I – daily conflicts, unnecessary but common;

II – psychological terror, mobbing installed because the victim did not participate in the resolution of previous conflicts;

III – bad management of the destructive personnel, often too late for the victim and only on the recommendation of colleagues' representatives;

IV – exclusion from the working life, not because of physical and social problems, but because of the misfortune of being "chosen" for such a position.

It is clear that there are well planned scenarios by which the victim is forced to resign or retire earlier. And these are the situations with a happy end, because the gravity of the phenomenon is revealed by many call centers and therapy clinics, where victims seek help, either just advice or medical, psychotherapeutic help. I met a large number of medics and psychiatrists, who have tried, for at least ten years, to help suffering people, victims of mobbing. The effects of their work cannot be neglected, but satisfactions (if it can be named as such in this context) are always minimal. Why? Because the percentage of psychological and moral relief and comfort of individuals subject to mobbing (and who, no doubt, are made ill on the long run) is not at all high, any person recovered is a huge success for the therapists.

People are different, not everyone has the ability to acknowledge mobbing. They do not know how to react in their own favor, they have no courage to oppose, or to ask help from their superiors. Often, they do not know their rights, they have no idea where to turn, what help to ask. In our country, unlike France, Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden, Norway, the United Kingdom… the phenomenon is ignored by legislation, and the EU laws, which naturally should be appropriated by any state of the European Union, are totally ignored.

Conclusions

Stress at work is responsible for millions of working days unused each year and millions of days of sick leave. So the figures for human and material (money) losses are significant since many companies do not realize how much stress at work affects life and the economic progress.

First of all, the treatment of stress, of burnout or in counter resilience, is preventive and consists in gaining a better resistance.

The holistic combat of stress is made through a healthy way of life, by maintaining a perfect equilibrium between work and life style, with the help of:

- Education (strengthen self-esteem, positive thinking); in all its forms: in family, formal, informal and non-formal;
- Energetic rehabilitation (healthy food; exposure to natural light and fresh air; exercises in open air; respecting the sleeping hours…)
- Adopting a preventive behavior: diminish/eliminate smoking, alcohol, avoiding crowded placed or with a high degree of risk, use seat belt while driving, helmet on motorcycle, knee pads and armrests while practicing certain sports, using protection gloves while gardening…

Alimentation has to be made of substances necessary to the daily consumption: carbohydrates (50-55%), proteins (15-20%), unsaturated fats, fibers, vitamins, minerals and a lot of water (2l/day), vegetables, fruits and cereals (over 60% of the daily menu); as many fresh, natural aliments as possible, no additives or preservatives.

Water, which is considered "the source of life" is an main component of the human body (present in almost 75 pc) has structural role and role in the fluid equilibrium; lubricant and emollient; thermostat; washing, conditioning, transport and solubilization agent, with an important role in digestion (forming saliva); prophylactic and curative factor – hydrotherapy.

Light was defined over time as: photons, wave flow, complex of electromagnetic radiations, UV radiations (A – long, B – medium, C – short), visible (40% of those reaching Earth) and infrared (caloric), cosmic radiations, γ, X rays, and so on. The effects of light are: it is photochemical and photosensitive (heatstroke, rash…), bactericidal, physiological and psychological of colors, biochemical and metabolic, it has effects on blood, circulatory, respiratory, digestive systems, on the endocrine and on the nervous system, on the skin…

The fresh air, even though invisible it is vital, more than physically necessary (to the life of plants and animals) and through the negative ions favors the effect of aerotherapeutics and diminishes those of pollution (smoking)…

Exercises in open air and physical exercises are recommended, such as:

- walking every day and jogging as much as possible;
- renouncing at the comfort of the elevator, the car (for the bicycle), the escalators…;
- walks in lunch breaks or between activities;
- rediscover the gym or the sports in parks with special gym arrangements;
- dance classes;
- trips on touristic routes;
- climbing on high mountains;
- practice any physical activity.

Self-determination and respecting the sleeping hours has to respect the three equal parts: 8hrs work + 8hrs other activities + 8hrs of sleep. Even in the case of insomnia the body has to remain in an horizontal position in bed, with eyes closed, and it is recommended 2hrs of sleep or rest in bed in the afternoons. Rest is called the universal force of our existence, a proper behavior factor, but also a remedy with extended utility.

The causes of exhaustion are: long hours work or physical effort – hypotonic fatigue, long term work or intellectual effort – hypertonic fatigue, insufficient sleep. Sleep is defined as the organism's rejuvenation period, characterized by interrupting the state of wakefulness.

According to the simple people, it is recommendable to draw a "map of life", as a diagnosis analysis of what is healthy and recommended to be preserved (raw a little processed food, water consumption in large quantities, respect and time for one's self, happiness and passion in life) and what is harmfully and has to be eliminated (alcohol, smoking, drugs in any way – medicines, plants, coffee – in excess), and what is not yet part of one's behavior, to be adopted.

Maybe the easiest way to apply in the treatment of stress, burnout and resilience, has to start from a few advices:

- Nothing, except respecting the laws, is compulsory, but recommendable.
- "You don't have to, it's good to…"
- Life lived intensely, alertly, with preoccupations, shortcomings and worries impede people to think about themselves, about their aspirations, their ideals…
- Self-forgetting leads to exhaustion, illness or extra pounds, motivation, energy or the joy of living disappear.
- The most recent recommendation encourages the change in the existential paradigm by adopting a new approach of the phenomena's causality and effects and existential simplification (reduction in the number of daily needs – from 11.000 of the modern man).

The incredible regenerative capacity of the organism can be met by a series of complementary therapies:

- Therapies for a better way of life: naturopathy, relaxation, visualization, meditation…
- Therapies for wellbeing: Alexander technique, Tai Chi, Chi Kung…
- Natural therapies: homeopathy, natural medicine…
- Touch therapies: massage, shiatsu, aromatherapy, reflexology…
- Art therapy: dance, color, painting, music, sculpture…
- Manipulation therapy: palm-therapy, osteopathy…
- Mental therapies: healing, psychotherapy, hypnotherapy…
- Eastern therapies: Ayurveda, Chinese traditional medicine, acupuncture…

Adopt a healthy way of life, in harmony with nature, can influence genetically a person. "Healthier life, rawer and vegetarian food, intense exercise and continuous love stimulate the development of brain cells, disabling genes that generate diseases, transforming them in benefic ones." (dr. Dean Ornish, president and founder of the Preventive Medicine Research Institute in Sausalito, California, during the latest TED Conference in Monterey).

Regarding mobbing, its impact on an individual has long-term consequences and infinitely more devastating than stress or its higher forms – burnout and resilience – because, the moral subjugation of the individual is more destructive, both for him/herself and the society.

Managing a mobbing situation is more complicated and costly than preventing it. People subject to bullying have certain manifestations, at least on three levels [21]:

- Psychopathological: reactions to anxiety, fear and avoidance; apathy; concentration problems; depression; changing mood; flashbacks; hypertension; insecurity; insomnia; intrusive thoughts; irritability; lack of initiative; melancholy; recurrent nightmares;
- Psychosomatic: asthma attacks; hypertension; tachycardia; arrhythmia; heart diseases; dermatitis; hair loss; headaches; muscle and stomach aches; even ulcers; loss of balance...
- Behavioral: hetero-aggressive and self-aggression reactions; eating disorders; increasing frequency of drinking, smoking, drugs; avoiding friends and social isolation; physical discomfort and illness; self-isolation from social engagements; detachment from family ties, from commitments/responsibilities; intolerance to family problems; violence and worsening school performance of children; sexual dysfunctions; marital problems and divorce; loss of join projects, friends; difficulty in qualifying for other jobs or engage in job search; litigations; loss of income; health expenses ...

Losses are considerable both for the employers and the community/society.

In the first case employers engage additional costs related to retirement; repeated transfers and staff replacement costs; absenteeism due to sickness; growing number of people unable to work, as well as the total number of employees; increased costs of training new personnel and workplace integration; costs for labor disputes; loss of qualified personnel; damage to company image; decrease in number of clients; reduced competitiveness and product quality; reduced individual and group productivity; reduced motivation, satisfaction and creativity; organizational climate damage.

In the latter case, the whole society becomes a victim because of the increased pressure on the general wellness, with various consequences, depending on the national health system and social services: costs due to early retirement; high costs for the disabled/work incapacity; high costs with unemployment; medical costs and possible hospitalizations; loss of human resources, more painful when it comes to efficient/productive employees.

If the main concern today is strictly related to money, either as income or costs, mobbing is one important aspect that has to be brought into discussion, not necessary the impact of mobbing on the victim, but especially in respect to the behavior of the community. In most cases considered delightful by those fond of conflicts and scandals, it is lost sight of the consequences of the victim's manifestations on his/her colleagues. Some enjoy, participate directly, as aggressive characters, morally threatening. Others, more fearful, with a weak personality or training keep distance from the victim, without realizing that in a near of distant future they will take his/her place. And then the skills, abilities, talent or vocation, competences, experience or seniority will not matter.

Therefore, if this reminiscent animal behavior found in the reactions of certain workers is understood, why not establish a system to protect potential victims?

As we are witnessing in the recent years a massive loss of rights won by workers in several hundred years, the only viable recommendation is to keep one's mental state in perfect condition, to provide oneself with a solid cultural and educational baggage, capable of allowing an easy integration in the work team and more flexibility in interpersonal relations.

References

- Hugh J. Arnold, Daniel C. Feldman, Organizational Behavior, (New York: McGraw Hill, SUA, 1986)
- Cătălina Bonciu, Stress, burnout and resilience, (comunicare ştiinţifică ICEA, Bucureşti, România, 2011)
- David J. Cherrington, The Management of individual and organizational performance, (Allyn and Bacon, SUA, 1989)
- Ingrid M. Cordon, Stress, (Ed. California State University, Northridge, SUA, 1997)
- Wendell L. French, Fremont Ellsworth Kast and James Erwin Rosenzweig, Understanding Human Behavior in Organizations, (New York: Harper & Row, SUA, 1985)
- John M. Ivancevich, Michael T. Matteson, Stress and Work, (Glenview, IL: Scott, Foresman, SUA, 1980)
- Peggy Lawless, Employee Burnout: Amerca's Newest Epidemic, (Minneapolis, MN: Northwestern National Life Employee Benefits Division, SUA, 1991)
- Theodor J.E. McGrath, Stress and behavior in organizations in Handbook of Industrial and Organizational Psycholog, (Dunnett, M. D. (ed) Chicago: Rand McNally College Publishing, SUA, 1976)
- Karen Spreitzer and Gretchen M. Spreitzer, *Explaining how survivors respond to downsizing: the roles of trust, empowerment, justice, and work redesign, (*Academy of Management Review, Vol. 23, No.3: 567-588, SUA, 1998)
- Frederick S. Perls, Gestalt Therapy Verbatim, (Lafayette, CA: Real People Press, SUA, 1969)
- H.Joseph Reitz, Behavior in Organizations, (Homewood, IL: Irwin, SUA, 1986)
- Ray H. Roseman, Meyer Friedman, The central nervous system and coronary heart disease, (in Hospital Practice 6: 87-97, SUA, 1971)
- Hans Selye, The general adaptation syndrome and the diseases of adaptation, (in Journal of Clinical Endocrinology. 2: 117-230, SUA, 1946)
- Robert Sutton, Thomas D'Aunno, *Decreasing organizational size: untangling the effects of money and people, (*Academy of Management Review, No. 2, Vol. 14: 194-212, SUA, 1989)
- Guide pour les victimes du harcèlement moral „Mobbing" et pour leurs interlocuteurs, (Mobbing aslb, Luxembourg, 2011=
- Mosby's Medical Dictionary, (8th edition, Elsevier, 2009)
- OUG 129/2000 privind formarea profesională a adulţilor, art.5.
- http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mobbing
- http://fr.wikipedia.org/wiki/Harc%C3%A8lement
- http://www.semneletimpului.ro/stirescurta/S-a-deschis-primul-centru-anti-mobbing-din-Romania-3599.html

CONSUMER OPINIONS TOWARDS ONLINE MARKETING COMMUNICATION AND ADVERTISING ON SOCIAL NETWORKS

GHEORGHE ORZAN[*]
OTILIA-ELENA PLATON[]

Abstract
On the Internet, a medium that has already proven its effectiveness in marketing activities, changes take place with astonishing speed. The recent explosion of social networking applications and their number of users has captured the marketers' attention. Companies have started to rethink their relationships with consumers and adapt to the new online world. In this virtual world of social networks the public is the key element. Consumers perceive the social network as a personal space where they control the content. They decide on their own what they want to see and share with others. Thus, in order to manage marketing communications effectively, marketers must know the consumers' opinions towards their presence in social networks.

Keywords*: online marketing, online advertising, social networks, Social Media, marketing research*

Introduction

Knowing that, currently, social networks, blogs, forums and sharing sites are the main centers of interest for Internet users, marketers have started to rethink their online communication strategies and adjust to the new trend. Many companies are realizing that having a website and making it visible and easy to find through search engines (SEO) is simply not enough anymore. Nowadays it is vital that their online presence includes a Social Media component on sites like Facebook, Google+, Hi5, MySpace or Twitter.

The specialists' opinion, expressed by the American research firm MarketingSherpa, is that "Social Media moved from the notion of novelty to the one of necessity, and it should be perceived as an integrated element of the business communication strategy."[1]

Analyzing the maturing of this field, MarketingSherpa also noticed that most marketers, who use Social Media tools, relied themselves more on intuition and did not outline a precise plan to conduct and measure the success of their campaigns. Thus, the effectiveness of the online marketing activities was usually affected.

This situation may be the consequence of the fact that, in general, commercial messages posted on social networks belong to less known brands or companies, with little experience in promoting their products/services. Another explanation may be the fact that many companies didn't study well enough the consumer opinions and behaviour towards online marketing and advertising before implementing their campaigns on such a highly humanized channel like Social Media.

Therefore this paper aims to underline the significance of knowing and studying the consumer perceptions, attitudes and opinions before trying to engage their attention with specific online marketing tools.

The importance of this research stems from the fact that many small Romanian companies still need guidance in interacting with consumers on the Internet and taking full advantage of all the opportunities the online medium offers.

---

[*] Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Marketing, The Academy of Economic Studies, Bucharest (email: orzang@ase.ro).

[] Junior Teaching Assistant, Ph. D.candidate, Faculty of Economic Sciences, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: otiliapl@yahoo.com).

[1] Sergio Balegno, Social Marketing ROAD Map Handbook: A method for mapping an effective social media strategy, (Warren, Rhode Island: MarketingSherpa LLC, 2010), http:// www.marketingsherpa.com/heap/SocialMediaHandbookExcerpt.pdf

Thus, with the help of an exploratory research, this paper will outline the features, online social activity and opinions of social networks users in Bucharest. These findings may provide some guidelines on how to implement efficient marketing campaigns through social networking applications.

Content

About online marketing and Social Media

In essence, "online marketing involves using the Internet to communicate directly personalized, interactively and at a long distance in order to achieve the relational and/or transactional objectives of the organization."[2]

Online marketing activities mainly consist of four categories of actions:[3]

- creating company identities through corporate websites,
- placing online advertisements (especially banners) on different sites,
- participating in group discussions (forums, newsgroups), virtual communities, electronic newsletters, to increase awareness and interest among some well-defined consumer segments,
- using the e-mail as a direct channel of communication with consumers.

The third category primarily focuses on Social Media, which is a virtual space divided into five categories: social networks, blogs and microblogging platforms, wikis, forums and sharing communities (for audio and video content). Amongst all, until now, the social networks proved the most efficient in capturing the user's attention and their potential is far greater than any other application.

A social network can be defined as "an application that expands and gains consistency by means of human interaction, usually an interaction between groups that share the same interests, that come from the same cultural or geographical region or groups formed on a specific criterium."[4] In other words, virtual social networks are a form of public space, led by the concept "users with common interests/needs". A social network is a place where the passion for a common interest, the need for affiliation or for personal development, or even the need to share life experiences, brings people together.

A social network generally has the following features:

- it is built around a regional particularity, local culture, a specific function or dominant traits of its members;
- aims mostly at aspects of work and personal life;
- attracts mainly members of a certain age, depending on their interest.

On this basis, online marketing developed a new facet, that of the communicational campaigns created using well known references about consumers. Based on the information provided by users on their profile pages, marketers can target a specific audience, defined by age, gender, preferences, hobbies or even by the groups of which they are members.

Beside this aspect, online marketing through social networks has other advantages such as:

- the consumers' personal data can be easily obtained; this helps to establish specific market segments and user typologies;
- it is based on online conversations, dialogues, grants freedom of expression and encourages the direct involvement of the consumer;
- offers direct, rapid feedback from users;
- companies can create their own communication channels with target groups, through newsletter or blogs;

---

[2] Călin Vegheş, Marketing direct, (Bucharest: Uranus, 2003), 334

[3] Philip Kotler et al., Principles of Marketing - European Third Edition, (London: Prentice Hall, 2002), 801

[4] Marius Mailat Blog, Listă rețele sociale România, January 28, 2009, www.submitsuite.ro/blog/

- the fans can promote themselves a message or a brand;
- the enthusiastic consumers can become "ambassadors" or promoters of brands;
- consumers can influence each other by creating homogeneous groups where they may get together and exchange opinions or pieces of advice;
- events that receive attention and create a certain „buzz" form the basis of viral marking, which is an essential element for success on social networks.

Being aware of all the advantages and opportunities that online marketing offers, companies may decide to start communicating on the Internet. After doing that, they should take into account that implementing a promotion through social networks requires, above all, rigorous organization and planning in order for the results to be maximized.

Companies should also take into consideration that, on social networks, the public is the key element. They perceive the social network as a personal space in which power and control over the content is in their hands. Due to these characteristics, implementing a Social Media campaign must be creative, transparent and perfectly adapted to this environment.

Extending companies' presence on these platforms which have a large number of users should be a natural thing since brands should be always heading where they future audience is.

The benefits are obvious when taking into account the fact that two thirds of the world's Internet users constantly use social networks, which overcame e-mail in the top of online activities. The time spent on these social networks has been growing three times faster than the time spent online in general.

An estimated number of 1.2 billion persons are using Social Media applications and nearly 20% of overall time spent online is spent on social networking sites.

According to The Nielsen Company's study, published at the end of January 2010, global consumers spent, on average, more than five and a half hours on social networking sites like Facebook and Twitter in December 2009. The study showed an 82% increase from the same month of 2008 when users spent just over three hours on social networks.

In Europe, a demographic analysis of time spent on social networking sites in five countries (France, Germany, Italy, Spain and United Kingdom) revealed that women spent significantly more time on social networks than men across all age groups, during April 2011. Women aged between 15-24 years were the most engaged audience as they spent 8.4 hours on social networking sites, followed by 45-54 years old women with 5.5 hours, which is double the time spent by men, in the same age group, during the month.

In addition, the overall traffic to social networking sites has grown over the last four years. Specifically, two thirds of online visitors spend their time on social networks and blogs, placing them ahead of other online forms of engagement and interaction including games and instant messaging.

In our country the situation is different. Until recently, companies in Romania took little notice of social networks as potential marketing goals destinations. The reason was the fact that the number of customers who had membership accounts on such platforms was not large and only a small part of the public was deemed relevant by companies that were using the Internet to advertise.

However things began to change. The phenomenon of social networks has been growing in our country especially during the last two years and has been gradually arousing interest among companies keen on promoting.

With an impressive number of over six million Romanians who use social networks (out of over 7.4 million Internet users in our country) and for whom signing in on sites like Hi5, Facebook, MySpace, Twitter and LinkedIn has become routine, social networks have become more attractive for companies in Romania who have started to see this as new means of promotion worth investing into. For example, in 2012 there are 4.161.340 Facebook users in Romania and 26.87% of them live in Bucharest.

Industry experts say that during recent years advertisers have become less reluctant as before when it came to placing their ads on these platforms. At the moment, all big Romanian companies advertise on Social Media.[5]

In this context, the companies efforts must be sustained by researches and studies meant to create an overview of the present situation.

The methodology used within research

The current study was based on a quantitative research conducted among a small group of Bucharest inhabitants, active members of different social networks.

The data collection method used for this research was the survey and an online self-managed questionnaire was used as a research instrument. The questionnaire consisted of 20 closed questions, with choice offered answers, all ranked by research objectives. The introductory section of the questionnaire aimed to reveal the habits of using social networking platforms, the main section of the questionnaire centered on the actual consumer opinions towards Social Media marketing, and the final part's purpose was to identify the socio-demographic characteristics of the respondents.

The measurement scales used were generally non-metric, nominal and ordinal (for Likert scale), and metric scales, interval (for responses using semantic differential).

Given that this research has an exploratory character, the final size of sample was set at 200 persons. The target group of the study consisted of Bucharest residents, aged between 18-35, selected using the non-random (nonprobability) method of snowball sampling. Snowball sampling relies on referrals from initial subjects to generate additional subjects and it was used because the snowball chain can be obtained easily when using social networks.

The main research results and their implications

The research results showed that Facebook is the social network where most of the respondents own an user account (27.8% of responses), followed by Hi5 with 21.6%, Youtube with 14.7%, Neogen (9.2%), LinkedIn (7 %) and Twitter (6.6%).

Regarding the frequency of using social networks, 55% of the respondents said they sign in daily or almost daily, 25% of them sign in several times a week and 20% several times a month or less frequently than once a month. For 60% of the respondents the average time spent on social networks on a regular day is less than an hour and the locations used to access social networks are in order: from home (67.4%), from work (20.8%), from school/college (2.8%) and only 9% of respondents said they are using a mobile platform or a mobile phone to log in on a social network.

The purpose why users access social networks is keeping in touch with friends or acquaintances (32.9%), followed by entertainment (30.6% of responses). Only 4.2% of respondents showed interest in using social networks to take advantage of special offers, contests or promotions for various products/services.

In terms of categories that users link to on social networks, the highest percentage was assembled by clubs/bars/restaurants pages with 21.1% of responses, followed by products or services (20.5%), private parties and events (13.7%) and celebrities (12.6%).

Other results, regarding aspects of Social Media marketing, showed that almost half of respondents (49%) rarely seek for advertisements within these platforms.

Regarding the frequency of advertising messages' occurrence on the social networks, opinions are divided between the 54% of Internet users who believe that ads appear in an acceptable number and the 46% who believe that they occur too often. Analysing the responses according to the division by gender, the research shows that women tend to believe that commercial messages appear in an acceptable number, while most men say they appear too often.

[5] Anca Arsene-Bărbulescu, „Tot mai mulţi români sunt pe reţelele sociale iar reclamele îi urmează", Business Magazin, 29 martie 2010, accesed May 15, 2010, http://www.businessmagazin.ro/business-hi-tech/new-media/tot-mai-multi-romani-sunt-pe-retelele-sociale-iar-reclamele-ii-urmeaza-5779806

About banner ads, most respondents (33%) stated that it's quite disturbing when they appear in their browsing windows, 88% tending to ignore and close them. In the case of men, the responses indicate a more pronounced disturbance regarding the emergence of banners, unlike the women who are less disturbed by their appearance.

Another result shows that respondents tend to agree with the idea that promoting products through social networks is useful. This is shown by the high percentage of responses: 41% of respondents agree and only 11% disagree.

The results for the idea that the promotional methods used on social networks are too aggressive, show that 34% of people agree, 38% are indifferent and 16% disagree.

For most respondents (38%) the element of the greatest importance for the success of promotional campaigns through social networks is the originality, followed by a consistent and well transmitted message (for 25%), interactivity (16%), attractive design (15%) and animation (with only 6% of responses).

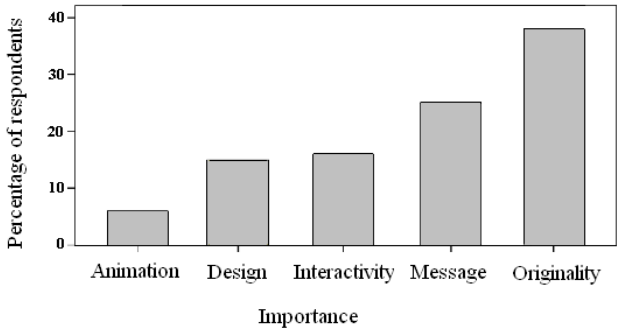

Figure 1. Important elements for the success of promotional campaigns

For more than 50% of the Social Media users the brand, the company name and the company characteristics are also very important for capturing their attention.

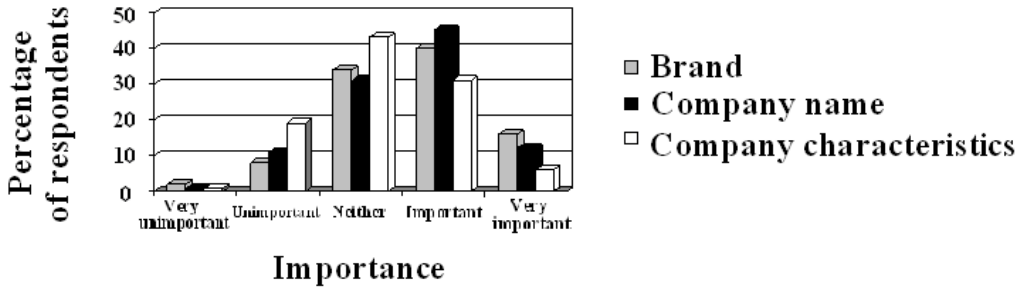

Figure 2. The extent to which brand, company name and company characteristics influences the respondents

The purchase of a product as a result of experiencing a form of online advertising through social networks was achieved by only 16% of respondents who said they had purchased clothing or accessories (sunglasses, jewelry), electronics (cell phones, cameras, laptops), IT products (software and hardware) or flight tickets.

Knowing all the results we can next present a series of conclusions, suggestions and recommendations for marketers in order to manage marketing communications more effectively.

As an exploratory research, conducted on a small sample of respondents, the limits within the research are obvious, but we can shape some conclusions regarding the characteristics of social network users.

The first important conclusion that emerges from the research is that Internet users in Bucharest are more and more open towards social networking platforms and spend a lot of time surfing them. Most users are young, educated and are middle-income employees. The respondents own on average 2.73 membership accounts on social networks, which means that a typical user has accounts on at least two different social platforms.

The fact that more consumers sign in every day on one or more social networks is essential in creating a successful online marketing campaign, because in this way their visibility and contact will be ensured among a large number of Internet users.

Another interesting conclusion is that almost all respondents aged between 18 and 25 have a Facebook account and the purpose for using the network is entertainment (games, quizzes, music, videos etc.), which shapes the typical Facebook user as being a young, dynamic, modern person, eager for information and entertainment.

Most respondents aged between 26 and 35 and all the respondents who have corporate leadership or decision making positions have a Twitter account, which may confirm the idea that the members of this site are opinion leaders or aspirational models, mature professional people, who have an important point of view to share with others.

The research revealed another important finding, namely that users agree to the idea that promoting products or services through social networks can be useful and that advertisements appear in an acceptable number within these platforms. The study also shows that women tend to be more open and tolerant than men in these aspects.

On the other hand, the Internet user's sensitivity towards traditional forms of online advertising is gradually decreasing. This is revealed by the very high percentage of respondents who have the tendency of ignoring and closing the advertising banners displayed when browsing on social networks.

In this context, user's interest and attention should be captured by new promotional methods. According to this research, the solution for a successful promotional campaign in the future could be originality combined with a consistent and well communicated message.

The content is the key element according to experts' opinions too. Companies interested in the promotion must come up with content of interest to grab the public's attention. Consumers have become reluctant to brands because of the aggressive publicity and assault of a huge number of promotional banners in recent years. So a more original content could be the right solution, and in social networks, this solution is extremely convenient and easy to implement. The organization's goal is to find an interesting subject of discussion for users and people will create content and interact.

On this basis, advertising on blogs can be a segment of increasingly success. Being addressed to a well established segment and not for mass exposure, it has the advantage that in this way consumers can get involved, can offer suggestions and other users are able to see their daily comments posted on blogs.

Another solution to capture the consumer attention, could be the adaptation to user requirements and features. Instead of using the traditional push marketing messages, companies could use pull messages as:

- interruptive messages (animated banners, display ads, overlay ads, video banners, pre-roll videos);
- involving activities (affiliate marketing, contests, promotions, viral marketing);
- participative branding (blogs, forums, online questions);
- applied actions (sponsored applications, custom tools);

- conversational messages (topics related to brands, products or services).

Another highlighted result of the research is that, although not in large numbers, respondents access social networks through mobile phones as well. However, the international trend shows that more and more users use the mobile Internet, and according to the comScore M: Metrics study "in Europe accessing social networking sites on mobile phone is the fourth most popular activity after e-mail, music and photos."[6]

Currently there are only four social networks that can be accessed from a mobile phone: Facebook, Google+, MySpace and Twitter. In August 2009, 65 million Facebook members (almost one third of users), have accessed the website from a mobile phone, four times more than the same period in 2008, and in 2010 their number has exceeded 100 million persons. In addition, people who have accessed the site from their mobile phones were almost 50% more active than those not using mobile Internet.

In Romania, mobile service companies did not fail to meet users demand. Thus, Vodafone has partnered with Facebook to launch 0.facebook.com. This is an optimized, faster and easier version of m.facebook.com page, which lets you use Facebook Mobile free of charge for data traffic.

Mobile phone as media channel comes with many advantages for Social Media because it is part of the personal things that the user always has with him, always in operation and involves strong participation from consumers. Through them, companies have guaranteed their message's visibility virtually wherever and whenever. Mobile advertising began in 2008 and grew significantly in 2009 with more than 85% invested budgets and 50% more advertising.

Another conclusion outlined by research is that online advertising on social networks can be useful especially for electronic devices (laptops, cameras, mobile phones, computer products), which are the products that most respondents have purchased after viewing an ad.

Having known all this data, we can say that in the future the development of marketing on social networks has all the opportunities and reasons to keep on growing in our country.

Conclusions

The recent development of what is called Web 2.0 was an important step in expanding ways to communicate on the Internet. Consisting of applications such as social networks, blogs, forums or sharing content sites, the Web 2.0 differs from the previous 1.0 versions in that it changes people's relationship with information and media, encourages and provides more niche platforms for users to discuss about their hobbies or interests.

It is worth noting again that, although social networks are proving to be a core partner in the promotional and communication activities for the companies interested to take by surprise the audience, yet looking at them like a saving solution meant to produce miraculous results in a short time, is an exaggeration. The Web is not the ideal way to successfully promote and communicate, because its facilities will not make a poor advertisement to be successful and does not guarantee the sale of unsuitable products.

Providing it has access to all sources of information, a company is able to reap the full benefits of promoting through social networks, while minimizing the disadvantages, and the Internet may prove to be the most convenient form of action for the company in its quest for alternative marketing solutions.

Since the research had an exploratory character, with obvious limits, and because the Internet is a changing environment, the current research could be improved in the future. A larger and representative sample of users, a more complex set of questions or maybe a qualitative research are all possible ways of getting an in-depth insight onto the subject. By applying all these measures of improvement, the research may very well grow into a useful and powerful tool for marketers in the near future.

[6] Ed Flower, „Când Social Media întâlneşte telefonul mobil", OnMedia, February 2010, 10

References

- Arsene-Bărbulescu, Anca. „Tot mai mulți români sunt pe rețelele sociale iar reclamele îi urmează". Business Magazin, 29 martie 2010. Accessed May 15, 2010. http://www.businessmagazin.ro/business-hi-tech/new-media/tot-mai-multi-romani-sunt-pe-retelele-sociale-iar-reclamele-ii-urmeaza-5779806.
- Balegno, Sergio. Social Marketing ROAD Map Handbook: A method for mapping an effective social media strategy. Warren, Rhode Island: MarketingSherpa LLC, 2010. Accessed May 15, 2010. www.marketingsherpa.com/heap/SocialMediaHandbookExcerpt.pdf.
- comScore Data Mine. „Young European Women Spent Most Time on Social Networks". June 10, 2011. http://www.comscoredatamine.com/2011/06/young-european-women-spent-most-time-on-social-networks/.
- Flower, Ed. „Când Social Media întâlneşte telefonul mobil". OnMedia. February 2010.
- Kotler, Philip, and Armstrong, Gary, and Saunders, John, and Wong, Veronica. Principles of Marketing (European Third Edition). London: Prentice Hall, 2002.
- Mailat, Marius Blog. Listă rețele sociale România, January 28, 2009, http://www.submitsuite.ro/blog/.
- Platon, Otilia-Elena. "Online marketing through social networks". Master diss., The Academy of Economic Studies, Bucharest, 2010.
- Săndulescu, Loredana. „Online Marketing la Putere". Biz. October 5-18, 2009.
- Solis, Brian Blog. Time Spent on Social Networks up 82% Around the World, February 24, 2010, http://www.briansolis.com/2010/02/time-spent-on-social-networks-up-82-around-the-wrold/.
- Vegheş, Călin. Marketing direct. Bucharest: Uranus, 2003.
- Virtopeanu, Dan. „Aproape 20% din timpul petrecut online are loc pe retelele sociale". January 30, 2012. http://refresh.ro/2012/01/infografic-aproape-20-din-timpul-petrecut-online-are-loc-pe-retelele-sociale/

IMPORTANCE OF COMMUNICATION IN ORGANIZATIONAL INTELLIGENCE DEVELOPMENT IN THE CONTEXT OF GLOBAL CRISIS

MANOELA POPESCU*

Abstract

It is now clear that different ways to generate, integrate and apply knowledge within organizations varies accordingly, at least, with the human factor, regardless privileged modalities of interactions between the firm and the environment.

In the current context, of the global economic crisis, communication and communicative behavior are sometimes improperly used in explaining institutional deficits. However, the role of communication in generating the appearance and development of intelligence organizational context (organizational context, technological and linguistic) and at the determinants and co-factors of organizational intelligence (organizational learning, leadership, organizational culture, management) is major. Besides that, generating knowledge in organizational framework is achieved through communication.

Keywords*: communication, global crisis, organizational intelligence, leadership, organizational culture*

Introduction

The literature reveals many definitions and theories on organizational intelligence concept (monolithic theories, factorial theories, hierarchical structures theories, evolutionary theories and qualitative). Organizational intelligence has always been defined in terms of intelligence, personal intelligence, emotional intelligence, collective intelligence.

Intelligence, the abstract specific human concept (according to some experts) can be simply defined as "the ability to understand easily and well, to refer to what is essential, to resolve situations and new problems based on previous experience" (DEX), although they find it difficult to define. Reported at the organizational level, intelligence became a complex concept, determined by many variables. Representing a real and potential fact, intelligence could be considered and addressed as a process or phenomenon, skill or ability. Obviously, intelligence can be defined so as a mental organizational attribute (in psychology), but also behavioral one.

Over time the concept of intelligence has received several definitions, being investigated from different perspectives, many science bringing their contribution to its development. These sciences can be listed: psychology, management, anthropology, biology, communication, etc.

The fact is that in 1969 John McCarthy and Patrick J. Hayes defines the intelligence of an entity in closely connection to the existence of an appropriate model of the world, to help it respond to a variety of questions, with the necessary information procured from the outside world and to conduct certain activities to achieve objectives, taking account of its possibilities. Obviously, nowadays are several studies on models that underlie the emergence and development of organizational intelligence: social, structural, systemic, etc.

In the context of the global crisis and the knowledge-based economy in which the individual is a carrier of culture, knowledge, being creator and innovator, the model that can be addressed in studying the emergence and development of organizational intelligence is an integrated social model. This model not only explains the emergence and manifestation of organizational intelligence impact on company profitability growth in the current context, but may be the basis for demonstrating the importance of communication in the development of organizational intelligence. This is because through communication can be created a certain context in which to could be generated a certain capacity of the entity to generate, integrate and apply knowledge. Also, communication is the essence of the event co-factors and determinants of organizational intelligence. Central axis of the appearance, manifestation and development of organizational intelligence is individual. He may have a verbal/linguistic intelligence, logical/mathematical, visual/spatial, bodily/kinesthetic, musical/rhythmic, interpersonal, intrapersonal, and naturalistic emotional as Gardner's theory of multiple intelligences (Frames of Mind: The Theory of Multiple Intelligences 1993). Intelligence entity manifested in a certain context, which is having the following dimensions: the organizational dimension, technological dimension, the cultural and linguistic dimension. All entities have a certain amount of absorption and a tendency of forgetting, absolutely necessary for the renewal of knowledge and organizational learning efficiency. Of course, management and leadership entity is responsible for organizational effectiveness, processes and activities, the default communication process.

* Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Touristic and Commercial Management, „Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University, Bucharest (email: manoela.popescu@yahoo.com).

1. Communication and dimensions of organizational intelligence development context

It should be noted that all four dimensions of the context in which intelligence appears, manifests and evolves are determined by communication. Competitive entity has a synergy of the composing elements necessary to achieve performance in a highly competitive environment. Communication is one that ensures that invisible thread that unites people and that determine synergistic explosion.

Thus, the organizational context concerns a framework different from a specific organizational system, structure and communication, open, dynamic and adaptable. Which means that changes occur in the system, voluntary or involuntary, resulting in a process of generating knowledge and new skills to solve problems and carry out activities. Members of the organization form a dynamic system, evolving under the effect of three forces: individual impulses, indirect impulses transmitted by the actions of other members, internal changes and changes caused by management decisions external environment organization.

Any entity supports multiple types of changes throughout its existence. In fact, some organizations are open systems that take their inputs from the external environment becomes part of them and send them into the environment as system outputs. If the environment is changing, organization is in change. Change can be defined in terms of field of action, respectively as operational and organizational change. Operational change refers only to individuals, roles and values, and organizational change concerns all procedural changes within the organization.

In the current context, organizations need to initiate change processes to meet market demand, offering added value, increase value to shareholders or to execute the mission and purpose for which they were created. Also, organizations must implement any change processes to maintain organizational stability, but also to support economic growth and sustainable development.

It could certainly say that all organizations are faced with internal and external sources of pressure for change. As such, managers must recognize the changing environment elements which require modification of the organization. In other words, if the inputs are modified and changes in output occur. For output changes occur are necessarily modification with cultural implication in inside organizations. These changes may be the targets and strategies, technological level, the organizational structure, the phases and processes of work and not least the members of the organization and involves changes in knowledge and processes to generate new knowledge.

Changing organizational structure involves not only changes in the organization but also the attitudes of employees. Individual stations need identity and meaning. Structural changes include changes in rules, policies and procedures. The members of the changes are made both in terms of hiring fresh labor, and in the development of attitudes and abilities of former employees. Always any change in an organization must begin with its members, by developing the necessary skills and positive attitudes. Changing the culture is changing between the individual and changing mental organization. Change process involves a series of organizational events taking place over time.

Also, one of the most important effects of organizations is their endogenous dynamics. This means that organizational contexts can boast different aspects: structural, individual, psychological, moral, material, etc.

Changing organizational context can be also defined as innovative as it involves changes at the individual level, procedural or organizational. Innovation is treated in the literature as to define the phase of creativity[1] unique organization of mental processes into the association of personality skills to obtain new and original. At company level, innovation is present as redesign their organizational structures, depending on the magnitude of the specific functional requirements of each stage of their maturation and development. In this perspective, social innovation is the main source of creativity and decision decisive factor of change and development.

Planned and ongoing efforts to change organizations to be more intelligent, efficient and more humane is called organizational development[2]. It uses behavior to induce a culture of organizational self-examination and willingness to change. Put an emphasis on interpersonal and group processes acknowledging that change affects everyone in the organization and that their cooperation is needed to implement the new cultural configurations. If the organizational development is being institutionalized, continuous availability for review and further changes become components of organization culture. The term cultural development applies only to the extent in which the development of means or methods of implementation of content organization culture or spiritual development takes place the organization's members, who contribute to culture change.

Organizational development seeks to change cultural norms and roles so that the organization is aware of itself and be ready to adapt. This method of changing the organization by changing the organizational culture was successful only in so far as to take into account the "personality organization" and its members, trust, cooperation and open expression of feelings of those who compose it. It is true that the organizational culture itself is never perfect, but nascent; it must ensure reconciliation but his spirit materializations social subjects to become a strong culture and a success factor for the organization.

In the process of organizational change, communicating the organization has a greater success rate than others. This is because communicating organization has some specific features: it is open to communicate with the outside, issuing, receiving messages that making up an interactive process, is flexible, evolutionary (value on innovation), is responsible (transmits ethical and responsible information, ideas, opinions, etc..), is dynamic (grows through communication) and has a purpose (to create a structure in which to express formal communication, organized to achieve the high performance). Communicational organization requires organic structures, flexible and participatory management.

Communication is essential in planned organizational change, i.e. organizational development. In this respect, the most important organizational development strategies are: teamwork training, feedback surveys (among employees), total quality management, re-engineering. Obviously, lack of communication or inadequate communication process leads to inefficient implementation of planned changes.

Besides generating knowledge organizational framework is achieved through communication as the most important aspect of any process is information and communication is how this can be achieved.

Linguistic context. Only with communication (broadcast reception/verbal) can accumulate human social experience (speaking, writing, reading); people can cooperate only communicating

[1] Bâtlan, I. Introduction to the history and philosophy of culture, Bucharest: Didactic and Pedagogic, RA, 1993, p. 33

[2] Johns, G. Organizational Behavior , Bucharest: Economic Publishing House, 1998, p. 532 between them through activities, they can try to generalize and to increase dowry of the previous generations in the field of science, technology, art, culture, architecture, medicine, etc.

Cultural context. Organization is not just a technical response to technical and economic problems faced, but also a cultural tool to tackle human structure and regularization of cooperation conflict participants[3].

Known is that people shape culturally the society (and organizations which are voluntary or less voluntary), leaving at the same time, shaped by it. Moreover, people use their culture as a means of interpreting reality tool socio-economic life and understanding of the world (other cultures, other individuals, etc.).

Certainly, organizational culture consists of shared records that directs the behavior of individuals in the organization culture that is designed and built through a systemic process-oriented education and training of all personnel engaged in an endeavor to solve two of the most important problems of organization: learning algorithms and integration of the individual.

When people came in firms, entering with unique sets of skills, interests and attitudes, they want to maintain their individual identity and self-esteem by maintaining their unique qualities and build what is on them. On the other hand, they are interested to know "how things are done in business", all its ins and outs and use their unique qualities, but in a manner acceptable to their colleagues and superiors.

Culture is formed continuously in the sense that there is constantly some kind of learning, based on the organization's relationship with the external environment and internal management problems.

Also, dynamic culture of an organization can be explained in terms of continuity and discontinuity phenomena that characterize them in their dynamics. Note that within an organization, both phenomena occur. Thus, in the evolution of culture are highlighted two processes: one to create new values, another use of the existing values, which are included in the organizational culture as "cultural goods" made in previous periods. This makes the transition from one stage of development of a society in which an organization operates at a different stage of development (example Central and Eastern European countries in their transition from communism to capitalism), the continuity of culture that organizations is done by taking the values of national culture and the assimilation of cultural values of other countries. The phenomenon of continuity and discontinuity that are not homogeneous phenomena, they are not done in the same way, the same means, with the same intensity in the plane of the elements of organization culture and, of course, not at the same time, the same cultural elements.

Technological context. Technology concept involves a multitude of definitions. Of these, the most comprehensive one that seems to be "systematized knowledge of all human activities, making use of results of scientific research, experiments, calculations and projects, as well as tools, machinery, small, all the processes (methods, recipes, rules) and material resources (tools, machinery) used for the purpose of employment, in industrial practice, technology means only the procedures used"[4]. Also, an explicit definition is that the technology is seen as "a system of knowledge and means that allow specific categories of activities to achieve objectives"[5]. This means that the technology "works as a cybernetic system, in a hierarchical system comes into interconnection"[6] and the use of knowledge and means in order to achieve the objectives are obtained

---

[3] Buzărnescu, Stefan. Introduction to organizational sociology and management, Bucharest: Didactic and Pedagogic, RA, 1995, pp. 66-68

[4] Ministry of Research and Technology - Innovation and Privatization Policy Sector, Bucharest, 1994

[5] Cojocaru, G. New aspects of technology transfer. Synthesis documentary, Bucharest: INID, 1991

[6] Hutu, CA. Organizational culture and technology transfer, Bucharest: Publishing House, 1999, p. 44 in accordance with the rules of structured systems and reasoning systems and performance evaluation mechanisms.

Here should be specified the fact that the technology is nothing in itself, but only in relation to its integration in an organization. The effects of technology on a company are reflected in how her organization: organizational structure, decision-making characteristics necessary level of education and training, configuration and characteristics of the communication and transmission of data and information, setting standards of performance etc.

External technology transfer is the process technology or elements thereof, used in a given organizational context, are reviewed and integrated into a new organizational context, in a new technology or an existing technology system. Internal transfer of technology is, in fact, the process of communicating knowledge organized in order to create products, processes and new or improved services.

Many models used (communication, cyber or mixed) to transfer technology and know-how support, explicitly or implicitly, and the influence of conceptual differences, contextual and perceptual between source and receiver, and various disturbances that occur during the process, the barriers for carrying out performance under the transfer process. Whether the source and receiver are part of the same company or not, is very important given context as the source and receiver, concepts, perceptions, ways of communication, etc., of both components of the model. But concepts, beliefs, perceptions, values, etc. are elements of company culture. In other words, culture is one that can reduce or eliminate barriers to efficiency of transfer of technology and know-how.

Moreover, the organizational context (degree of innovation, uncertainty, ability to lead change) represents a category of factors with a significant impact in all stages of transfer. The organizational context is higher when the transfer of technology and know-how will be more difficult. So, in receiving commercial firms, "having" culture based on "high context" communication, the transfer of technology and know-how to achieve it, will hit more obstacles than if commercial firms would had a culture of "low context".

Stages of adaptation and acceptance are the most influenced and determined by the culture of an organization. Attitudes and beliefs of organization members on technology and knowledge that lead to intentions, intentions, in turn, leads to actual behavior, evidenced by their use voluntarily.

2. The role of communication in improving organizational learning processes

Organizations are open systems, cognitive entities connected with the external environment and internal environment. Entities, whether physical or legal, present different ways to adapt to environmental changes, even ways to generate changes in their environment action, developing specific learning processes. Learning involves the accumulation of new knowledge and skills, based on experience. Among the most popular theories of learning is associative learning (classical conditioning) and instrumental learning (operant conditioning)[7].

Pavlov's classical conditioning theory[8] of learning explains the association between stimulus and response. Instrumental learning involves the existence of an event that increases or reduces the likelihood of that behavior to be repeated. Organizational culture must be addressed in a perspective emphasizing changes that facilitate partial or total[9], dynamic process which occurs because of the internal integration and external adaptation[10] and as a result of the impact of different types of cultures, especially in the globalized markets.

[7] Mitchell, T., Dowling, P., Kabanoff, B., Larson, J., People in organization – an introduction to organizational behaviour in Australia, McGraw-Hill Book Company Australia, Pty Limited, 1988, pp. 18-30; Luthans, F., Kreitner, R., „Learning theory", în Contemporary readings in organizational behavior, Third Edition, McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1981

[8] Tucicov-Bogdan, A., General Psychology and Social Psychology, Volume II., , Bucharest: Didactic and Pedagogic Publishing House, 1973, pp. 78-83

[9] Nicolescu, O. coordinator., Systems, methods and techniques of organization management, Bucharest: Publishing House, 2000, p. 513

Inside entities arise two major processes in the development of intelligence: the process of socialization and integration process. By internal integrating culture system provides stability and acts as a filter field that helps to focus attention on certain segments of the environmental impact on the company.

If it is envisaged that socialization is a process of transfer psychosocial assimilation of attitudes, values, concepts or specific behavior patterns of a group or community, for training, adaptation and social integration of people, it may be that socialization is an interactive process of communication. This is supposing the double approach of individual development and social influences, personal way that reception and interpretation of social messages and variable dynamic content entity and social influences.

Socializing employees can achieve maximum efficiency while using certain communication tools, such events for employees: team-building activities, briefings, meetings with certain individuals' representative of a certain behavior.

Compliance with rules, rules, and values is made through a learning process, which is based on communication. In fact, people attitudes and socio-economic conduct are essentially the result of cultural learning, a consequence of assimilation law-like patterns, rules and requirements of the community through communication. Also, integration in the primary task group, defined as a process of gradual assimilation behaviors and integrating environmental behaviors is achieved through communication.

At the organizational level, the integration processes and socialization are based on relations of influence. Generally, influence means to determine other to comply. Of course, influence, even in the extreme form of persuasion cannot be effective unless accepted by the receiver. If we start with the definition of the concept of influence of Parsons ("determines the other's decisions to act in a certain way because he feels that it is a good thing for him, and not that through non-conformation would violate certain obligations") is obviously that the influence of co-orientation is the result of transmitter and receiver in the communication process. In fact, in the communication process partners are often the relationship of influence. In this sense, any entity may achieve compliance with another (or influencing it or manipulating it) through a process of positive communication, logical and reasoned.

Professional integration can be approached from the perspective of four dimensions: cognitive, relational, cultural and informational; thus communication process is seen as a process of influence on three key levels: normative, cognitive and social. The regulatory approaches, the communication process (influence) creates, strengthen and imposes values to organizational members. From cognitive perspective, through the communication process (influence) information are properly used, from the organization and beyond, for effective professional integration. From social perspective, relations of influence (communication relations) are playing a major role in the establishment, maintaining roles, statuses, or rather the power and authority.

Therefore, there are a few situations in which one of the persons involved in communication may not be in a relation in which wishes to exercise some influence over the other or others, it can say that the influence has three directly observable functions at the organizational level: creation of rules (identifying and sustaining influence norms that give cohesion group / entity and determine positive behaviors), individual socialization (relations of influence (communication) are the essence of the rules learning process learning, principles, operating modes, behaviors, etc., (knowing the ways and social standards is achieved through communication) and social control (influence helps social groups to maintain the integrity and allows them to provide and channel the behavior of its members. It thus strengthens the individual's dependence on the social system).

[10] Schein, E. H., Organizational culture, American Psychologist, 1990

In the process of organizational learning are important roles that organizational members are willing to play, according to the specific activities. Adapting to the requirements of each individual internal and external environment involves a first stage of organizational learning. Many entities decide to make changes more or less large, and these changes are based on learning processes, achieved through effective communication. In fact, in all phases of change oriented toward individual or organization, there is a learning process.

Leadership contributes to the development of organizational intelligence in that it stimulates organizational learning and development of effective relationships. Leadership requires certain interpersonal and intrapersonal skills, resulting in organizational development. After 1900, many researchers began to study people in hopes of identifying leadership traits that turn them into successful leaders. H. Kelleher[11] is one who has made a list of traits associated with effective leadership. Such traits, personal characteristics of individual features including physical, intellectual ability and personality, can be considered: intelligence, energy, confidence, domineering spirit, motivation to lead, emotional stability, honesty and integrity, need for achievement. In determining these traits to measure their employees and many companies use personality tests and "scales of assessment (appraisal)" when making hiring and promotion decisions.

Also, at the organizational level, leadership is one who can develop creative organizational and professional development. Obviously, effective leadership requires effective communication, interpersonal communication because the people are able to generate insights and ideas, by exploring areas little explored by each individual separately. Of course, people must be willing to communicate empathy, active listening and willing to develop effective relationships.

3. The integrated social development of organizational intelligence

Developed as a reaction to the knowledge economy, where innovation is more important than the production, that model emphasizes people and their knowledge. Also, considering the intelligence entities as something that they have by inheritance, but also as something that can be through learning is a basic assumption of the model. It is obvious that some people have interpersonal skills and/or intrapersonal. They develop a friendly relationship inventory, given that they can relate easily with others. Of course, others can learn how to develop positive relationships with other entities. Evolve, through qualitative and quantitative leap, the result of learning in a specific cultural context, can occur in all aspects of the development entity.

Entities with an organic structure can develop such models. An organic structure allows the generation and development of interpersonal relationships through communication, and developing a strong organizational culture. It is known that any entity has a certain culture, which can be defined from several perspectives and guidelines. Successful entities that have demonstrated a strong culture, positive, adaptive strategy directly relate to high organizational performance. Also, these entities have successfully developed culture based on cultural differences and systems; the focus is on value, knowledge, innovation, creativity and learning.

Model characteristics are:

- flexible organizational structure,;
- high degree of creativity in their activities;
- high degree of cooperation between sub-entity, based on teamwork. If the entity is an individual, it is clear that intelligence is a prerequisite for the development of good health, although there were times when just physical problems have generated a development of some kind of intelligence (emotional intelligence, naturalist, music, etc.);
- proactive environmental approach;

[11] Lord, R. C., DeVader, C. L., & Alliger, G. M., „A meta-analysis of the relationship between personality traits and leadership perceptions: An application of validity generalization procedures", Journal of Applied Psychology, 71 (1986): pp. 402-410

- diversification and flexibility in tasks and views;
- effective leadership and strategic management participation;
- entity based on knowledge, innovation and creativity;
- transparency in disseminating information and knowledge;
- the individual is most important for the organization and the focus on human capital development through training and personal development;
- philosophy, mission and vision of the organization are based on people;
- entity is socially responsible and ethical behavior is;
- individuals are properly motivated performance, creativity and innovation;
- communication is strategic, with a communication strategy and policy in this area.

Integrator aspect of the model aims, in fact, to address communication from the systemic perspective and also the entity view as a system. Systemic view of communication reveals cognitive, emotional and behavioral complexity. Systemic approach to communication not only trying to make sense of actions within the entity or to provide all important communication, which coordinates its components in a precise meaning, but to exploit and capitalize elements of communication process, revealing interdependencies and internal connections communication, generating synergies and complex structures needed to develop intelligence entity, especially in the current context. Communication system essentially provides mutual comprehension of at least two people. The school developed semiotic, structural models of communication bring forward a systemic approach as a prerequisite for the development of communication entities. The communication is developing not only the personalities of individuals but also socio-economic entities, regardless of the context of occurrence, although bear influence that context.

Also, this model of development of organizational intelligence shows that the individual is the bearer of culture, abilities, skills, experiences and, especially, generating innovation and creation. Innovative and creative spirit, man is the difference between success and failure of various businesses.

Conclusions

Development of organizational intelligence is more complex than individual or collective one, but it can be addressed as development of intelligence entities (and individuals) to identify general and specific determinants, in which event it has a major role communicating. Is obvious its importance in the development of individual intelligence: man evolves through communication, regardless of context. But the context in which entities arise is created through communication. The individual is one who communicates voluntarily or involuntarily and thereby, on the one hand, expand their skills and communication skills, and on the other hand, change their behavior positively or negatively. Presentation of a development model of intelligence entities, from the idea that intelligence entities is "inherited and learned" not only give broad field reflections on the impact of communication on intelligence entities, but also the mathematical relations that can be identified and analyzed in this perspective.

References

- Bâtlan, I. Introduction to the history and philosophy of culture, Bucharest: Didactic and Pedagogic, RA, 1993.
- Johns, G. Organizational Behavior , Bucharest: Economic Publishing House, 1998, 532.
- Buzărnescu, Ştefan. Introduction to organizational sociology and management, Bucharest: Didactic and Pedagogic, RA, 1995, 66-68.
- Chen, M. Managing international technology transfer, London:Thompson Business Press, 1996.
- Cojocaru, G. New aspects of technology transfer. Synthesis documentary, Bucharest: INID, 1991.

- Hutu, CA. Organizational culture and technology transfer, Bucharest: Publishing House, 1999, 44
- Lord, R. C., DeVader, C. L., & Alliger, G. M., „A meta-analysis of the relationship between personality traits and leadership perceptions: An application of validity generalization procedures", Journal of Applied Psychology, 71 (1986): 402-410.
- Luthans, F., Kreitner, R., „Learning theory", în Contemporary readings in organizational behavior, Third Edition, McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1981.
- Mitchell, T., Dowling, P., Kabanoff, B., Larson, J., People in organization – an introduction to organizational behaviour in Australia, McGraw-Hill Book Company Australia, Pty Limited, 1988, 18-30.
- Nicolescu, O. coordinator., Systems, methods and techniques of organization management, Bucharest: Publishing House, , 2000, 513.
- Schein, E. H., Organizational culture, American Psychologist, 1990.
- Tucicov-Bogdan, A., General Psychology and Social Psychology, Volume II., Bucharest: Didactic and Pedagogic Publishing House, 1973, 78-83.
-  Ministry of Research and Technology - Innovation and Privatization Policy Sector, Bucharest, 1994.

THE ASSESSMENT OF RISKS THAT THREATEN A PROJECT

CRISTINA MARIA STOICA[*]
BORIS CONSTANTIN []
MARIUS ALEXA[]

Abstract
A project consists of a number of interrelated tasks whose aim is to produce a specific result. A project risk analysis consists of analyzing schedule, cost risk, quality of the final product etc. A cost risk analysis consists of looking at the various costs associated with a project, their uncertainties and any risks or opportunities that may affect these costs. The distributions of cost are added up in a risk analysis to determine the uncertainty in the total cost of the project. A schedule risk analysis looks at the time required to complete the various tasks associated with a project, and the interrelationship between these tasks.
In this paper we want to study the various risks associated with the project. We start this study with the assumption that a project's cost and duration are linked together and also cost elements and schedule durations are correlated. The normal uncertainties in the cost items are modeled by continuous distributions like the Pert or triangular distribution. For project schedule modeling the most flexible environment is spreadsheet. We are interested in building blocks that typically make up a schedule risk analysis (also a cost risk analysis) and then show how these elements are combined to produce a realistic model. In the same time we want implement software tools for run Monte Carlo simulations on standard project planning applications.

Keywords*: feedback loops, cascading risks, portfolios of risks, sensitivity analysis, Monte Carlo simulations, critical path analysis, ModelRisk software*

Introduction

A project consists of a number of interrelated tasks, whose aim is to produce a certain result. Typically, a risk analysis on the achievement of a project implies the analysis of the risk regarding the plan of the project and its cost. In some cases the analysis may also include other aspects, such as for instance the quality of the final product. Risk may be defined as the possibility of the emergence of an event that affects the achievement of technical or cost objectives, or of project terms. The risk is aleatory, unpredictable, may be favorable, yet most of the times is unfavorable and thus, under these circumstances the analysis and prevention of risks should be an utmost preoccupation for project managers.

In this paper one intends to identify the risks that may appear during the execution of a project, as well as to identify techniques and methodologies of dealing with these risks. Since the risk is usually tackled statistically and since the statistical results are better only if the statistical distributions used are closer to the distribution of real data, one emphasized here the creation of new statistical distributions that would fulfill this requirement.

With this aim in view the team leaded by the author of this article created a library of programs, named DistriRisk which is based on the following four methods of creating new distributions: the composition method, the „Rejection Sampling" (RS) method, the „Importance Resampling" (IR) method and the Metropolis – Hastings (MH) algorithm. Using the random generation of numbers, one also created a program for the generation of beta distribution, applicable in the Monte Carlo method. All these new distributions are to be included in the pack of programs ModelRisk developed by the company VOSE Consulting with its European headquarters in Belgium.

[*] Professor, Ph. D., "Petre Andrei" University, Iaşi (email: stoicacristinamaria@yahoo.com).
[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "Gh. Asachi" Technical University, Iaşi (email: borisconstantin@yahoo.com).
[] Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. Candidate, "Al.I.Cuza" University, Iaşi

This paper also suggests another way to calculate the cost of a project by applying the central limit theorem. Since the ordinance of a project is a simulation based on a privileged scenario for each task, we hereby suggest the use of the Monte-Carlo method, which allows the exploitation of several ordinances, combining different scenarios for the tasks of the project, and leading to a probabilistic analysis of certain information, such as the duration of the project or the probability for a task to be difficult to achieve.

In the future we intend to develop a sampling algorithm based on the Latin hypercube method, which will provide a sampling method that seems to be random but guarantees the reproduction of the input distribution with greater efficiency that the one provided by the Monte Carlo method.

Once this methodology is certified, we will try together with the specialists of the company VOSE Consulting to tackle the quantitative calculation of risk, as well as the possibility to model it, so as to evaluate as many projects as possible.

The risks of a project

The risks corresponding to the main stages of a project are the following: the analysis of the needs, preparing the project and the execution of a project.

The analysis of the needs. There are four categories of risks that should be taken into account before launching a project: - the risk of competition; - the risk of market (the commercial situation);- commercial risks (the manufacture of the product, the relation cost / quality); - technological risks.

The factors that may increase the risk could be the following: - the inexistence or the incomplete previous research in the field of the project; - a need formulated in a wrong way; - functions or restrictions unspecified by the user; - functions, whose complexity is inadequately assessed when analyzing need, one also noticing an under-estimate of the level of difficulty that requires expensive resources; - non-negotiable functions, imposing thus highly restrictive objectives from a technical point of view or when it comes to price or terms, choosing some functional performances without being in fact imposed by the needs; - not knowing norms and regulations imposed on certain products.

Preparing the project. These analyses and conception considerations exert an important effect in the stage of the execution of the project. In the second stage the following risks may be mentioned:

- various flaws and constant hesitations in the first version of the project, to which one may add an incomplete and less competent technical documentation;
- under-estimating the complexity of the methods and conception procedures (programs, automatization microcontrollers), which leads to too little time spent for the learning of working techniques;
- difficulties in defining and planning the stages mentioned in the program;
- the wrong assessment of the availability and performance of resources used; generally, there is the tendency to over - estimate performances and to under-dimension costs, being too optimist in what regards the terms;
- if we also take into consideration the subcontracting of certain stages to specialized companies, the dimensioning of the performances of resources is an extremely laborious and risky action;
- the generation of conflicts in using available resources. The resources are limited and most of the times they should be used simultaneously in various activities. Under these circumstances, neglecting critical activities may lead to delay.

The execution of the project. The risks here are related to various flaws in the identification and analysis of critical information (delayed diagnosis, wrong diagnosis, improper answers).

According to the method AMDEC (the analysis of the defecting ways and their effects) a rational perception of the risk is done according to the following typology:

- identifying the flaws and weak points before they occur may be more or less precise and tardy, depending on the case.

A controlled procedure in a favorable organizational context may generate good results. Practically, a good piece of information travels in a favorable moment towards a responsible actor;

- the diagnosis of the cause – there are statistical methods which may provide data, according to which one may decide ensuring measures against diagnosis errors*;*

- prognosticated analysis of effect – appears when the effect is not yet evident or will be achieved on long term, and cannot be yet mentioned.

Emphasizing a risk in the management of a project

A project is defined by price objectives, performance objectives and terms objectives. Each category of objectives has its own risk issues, which make up the object of specific research:

- The analysis of the risk to exceed the cost of the project is usually done during its execution, appealing to techniques of financial and accounting control; the analysis of this type of risks may be also done in the stage of defining the project, appealing to the qualitative risk analysis.

- The analysis of the risk of the failure to comply with performances is an issue for technicians and its approach should focus on the technical fields to which it is related. Becoming aware of certain technical risks may be facilitated by the qualitative risk analysis.

- The analysis of the risk of the failure to comply with terms; its insufficiencies lead to its completion by approaching the risk from a qualitative point of view.

- The quantitative approach does not provide the decisive factor with information meant to guide one in action, this being oriented towards the quantification of the dispersion of results for an objective such as duration or price.

- The qualitative approach – the intuition of the leader, as well as good knowledge of the company and its environment have always played an essential role. A formal approach structures the reason with the help of control lists, which allow a fast and significant diagnosis.

This emphasis of the risk may be done either when defining the project (or the in-depth periodic re-examination of the project), as well as during the execution of the project, even if one does not use the same methods.

The quantitative risk analysis

The risk specific to this category is the failure to comply with terms and with the initially allocated budget.

A. The quantitative approach of the risk of not complying with terms.

The quantitative approach of the risk is done in a classical way, using statistical distributions. Of course, nowadays there simulation methods that are far richer in possibilities and information. This thing is a result of the use of computing techniques and implies highly sophisticated software.

The statistical methods[1] used for the management of the working time is based on the two classical distributions, i.e.:

- the empirical statistical distribution;
- the theoretical statistical distribution (beta, normal, triangular etc.).

Usually distributive methods are used. These are based on the following principles:

- the duration of each task in a project is considered random;
- one uses especially the Beta statistical distribution;

[1] Creangă Camelia, Darabonț Doru, Ionescu Dan, Kovacs Ștefan, Metodologii pentru aprecierea riscului la locul de muncă – ARLM; The Office for documentary information for industry, research and management (Oficiul de informare documentară pentru industrie, cercetare, management – ICTCM), Bucureşti, 2001, p. 134

- one determines the parameters of this distribution starting from the extreme values A and B that the duration of the execution may take, and from the most probable value M_0 of the duration of execution.

Therefore one should come up with answers to the following three questions:

1. Which is the minimum duration (time)? – parameter A;
2. Which is the maximum duration (time)? – parameter B;
3. Which is the most probable duration (time)? – parameter M_0.

Once the parameters A, B, and M_0 are known, one may calculate the average mean and the variation of this random duration (time):

$$\mathbf{E}(t) = \frac{\mathbf{A} + \mathbf{B} + 4\mathbf{M}_0}{6}; \quad \mathbf{V}(t) = \left(\frac{\mathbf{B} - \mathbf{A}}{6}\right)^2$$

- one determines the critical path of the project placed in a concrete situation, after which making use of the average times, one emphasizes the critical stages that cannot be delayed;

- the duration of the project is considered to be the sum of the durations (times) of the tasks of the critical path previously identified. This is a simplifying hypothesis;

- we use the central limit theorem in order to approximate the law of distribution of the probability of the project's execution schedule, using the approximation with continuity corrections for the Beta distribution. In other words we do, with the help of the corrections mentioned above, the normal approximation for the Beta distribution, with which the distribution of the project's execution schedule was configured;

- knowing the law of the probability distribution of the execution schedule of a project allows the calculation of trust intervals or of the probability for a schedule to be exceeded.

In order to generate a random variable with beta distribution we shall use two independent generations for the random variables with gama distribution, as can be noticed in the source code of the program that implements this generating way:

```
program rndbeta
    write(*,20)
 20 format(' ','introduce values for ix, iy, alpha, beta, n') read(,) ix, iy, alpha, beta, n do 100 i = 1, n ix = ix + i do 200 j = 1, n
                    iy = iy + j call betarnd (ix,iy,alpha,beta,rn)
                            write(,) ix, iy, rn
 200                Continue
 100 Continue
 end
    subroutine betarnd(ix,iy,alpha,beta,rn)
c Input: ix, iy - seeds
c alpha : form parameter
c beta : scala parameter
c Output: rn
 call gammarnd(ix,iy,alpha,1.0,rn1) call gammarnd(ix,iy,beta ,1.0,rn2) rn = rn1 / (rn1+rn2)
```

```
      return
      end
subroutine gammarnd(ix,iy,alpha,beta,rn)
c Input: ix, iy - seeds
c alpha : form parameter
c beta : scala parameter
c Output: rn
 rn = 0.0
      Do 1 i = 1, nint(alpha) call exprnd(ix,iy,beta,rn1)
 1   rn = rn + rn1
      return
      end subroutine exprnd(ix,iy,beta,rn)
c Input: ix, iy - seeds
c beta: parameter
c Output: rn
 call urnd(ix,iy,rn1)
      rn = -beta * log(rn1) return
      end
subroutine urnd(ix,iy,rn)
 1   kx = ix / 53668
      ix = 40014 * (ix – kx * 53668) – kx * 12211 if(ix .lt. 0) ix = ix + 2147483563 ky = iy / 52774
      iy = 40692 * (iy – ky * 52774) – ky * 3791 if(iy .lt. 0) iy = iy + 2147483399
      rn = ix - iy
      if(rn .lt. 1.) rn = rn + 2147483562 rn = rn * 4.656613e-10
      if(rn .le. 0.) go to 1
      return
      end
```

ix and iy are the seeds, whereas rn is a random number between 0 and 1.

B. The analysis by simulation, using the Monte Carlo method [2]

The Monte Carlo method starts from the so-called "what – if" scenarios. The "what – if" scenarios are based on the deterministic modeling. This type of modeling implies the use of a single "well guessed" estimation for each variable, with the purpose of determining the results (effects) of the model. In practice, one varies the parameters of the model, thus slightly modifying the "well guessed" estimations, in order to determine the degree to which the effects in reality vary from those calculated by using the model. This thing can be done by selecting various combinations for each input variable. These various combinations of the possible values around the best guess, are known as the "what – if" scenarios. The model is quite often "stressed", since the variables (parameters) take values, so that they represent highly realistic scenarios.

[2] Boris Constantin, Utilizarea calculatorului în analiza statistică, vol.1, Editura Tehnopress, Iaşi, 2010, p. 130-165

For instance, let us consider the following simple problem: the sum of the costs for five articles. As values to be used in a "what – if" analysis, we may choose the following three points: the minimum, the best guess and the maximum. Since we have five costs (one for each article) and three values for each article, we therefore have $3^5 = 243$ possible combinations that may be generated during the analysis. Obviously this set of scenarios is far too large for a practical application. The process also suffers from two further drawbacks:

1. for each variable one uses only three values, even though in practice these values may be in large number;

2. one conducts no analysis whatsoever in what regards the probability of the emergence of the value that represents the best guess in comparison to the probability of the emergence of the minimum, respectively maximum values.

We may stress the model by raising the minimum value of the cost, so as to obtain the best scenario, or by raising the maximum value of the cost, so as to obtain the worst scenario. By doing so, we usually obtain an unrealistically great number of values that provide however no real image of the model. There is only one exception, i.e. when the scenario is still acceptable.

The quantitative risk analysis (QRA), which uses the Monte Carlo simulation, one of the most important modeling techniques, is similar to the "what if" scenarios, which generate a number of possible scenarios. Basically, one simulates scenarios for each possible value that may be taken by the variables of the model, after which these scenarios are weighted by their probability of emergence. QRA makes this thing by modeling each variable that appears in the model by means of a probability distribution.

In other words, the structure of a QRA model is very similar to that of a deterministic model where the variables are no longer simple values, but are represented by probability distribution functions. The objective of QRA is to calculate the combined impact of the uncertainty from the parameters of the model, with the purpose of determining an uncertainty distribution of the possible effects of the model.

The Monte Carlo method implies the random sampling of each probability distribution within a model, so as to generate hundreds or even thousands of scenarios, called iterations or attempts.

Each probability distribution is sampled in such a way so as to reproduce the shape of the distribution.

Therefore, the distribution of the values calculated for the results of the model reflect the probability of the values that may appear.

The Monte Carlo simulation provides lots of advantages, among which the most important are the following:

- the distributions of the variables of the model need not be approximated in any way;
- the correlations and other inter - dependencies among variables may be modeled;
- the level of mathematics necessary to use this simulation is basic knowledge;
- determining the distribution of the results obtained after the simulation is done entirely by the computer;
- the programs necessary to do this are commercially available;
- one may at any time include more complex mathematical notions (powers, logarithms, IF structures etc.);
- the Monte Carlo simulation is widely acknowledged as a valid method, so that the results obtained by using it are more likely to be accepted;
- the behavior of the model may be more easily investigated;
- a model may be changed really fast, the new results thus obtained being easily comparable to the results obtained by using previous methods.

The Monte Carlo simulation method may reach at least in practice any level of precision required, by the simple increase of the number of iterations. The only limitations are imposed by the number of random numbers that may be produced by using a generator of random numbers and by the time necessary for a computer to generate them.

For most of the problems in practice these limitations are irrelevant or may be easily surpassed by structuring the model into several sections.

In order to generate random samples for the input distributions of a model, one starts from a random variable X and a number p, which fulfill the condition $0 < p < 1$. We define the quantile of order p of the random variable X, or of its distribution function F, the number x_p with the following characteristics:

$$P(X \leq x_p) \geq p$$
$$P(X \geq x_p) \geq 1 - p$$

For p = 0.25 or 0.75 one obtains a quartile of X, and for p = 0.5 a median line of X. For instance, if X is distributed N(0,1) and p = 0.1, 0.2, 0.3, 0.4, 0.5, 0.6, 0.7, 0.8, 0.9, by interpolation, symmetry and considering the tables of normal distribution, we determine the deciles: $x_{0.1} = -1.282$, $x_{0.2} = -0.842$, $x_{0.3} = -0.524$, $x_{0.4} = -0.253$, $x_{0.5} = 0$, $x_{0.6} = 0.253$, $x_{0.7} = 0.524$, $x_{0.8} = 0.842$, $x_{0.9} = 1.282$. The values of the quantiles for conveniently chosen values of p allow us to have a representation on the distribution function.

Knowing them gives us a clue on the way in which the probability unit is distributed above the real line. If F(x) is a monotone continuous function, the quantile x_p is the single solution of the equation:

$$F(x_p) = p$$

If F(x) is continuous and $p' > p$, then: $P\{x_p \leq x \leq x_{p'}\} = p - p'$. The quantiles may be calculated with the help of the quantile function, or as it is also known, the inverse distribution function. Let us choose the random variable X characterized by the distribution function F(x):

$$\alpha = \mathbf{P}\{\mathbf{X} < \mathbf{x}\} = \mathbf{F}(\mathbf{x}).$$

The inverse function

$$\mathbf{x} = \mathbf{F}^{-1}(\mathbf{x}) = \mathbf{G}(\alpha) = \mathbf{G}(\mathbf{F}(\mathbf{x}))$$ is called the quantile function: $x = G(\alpha)$ is that number for which with the probability α, the random variable has a value that does not exceed this number. In other words, if the cumulative distribution function F(x) gives us the probability P for the variable X to be higher than or equal to x ($F(x) = P(X \leq x)$), the inverse function allows us to answer the following question: which is the value of F(x) for a given value of x?. The concept of inverse function is that concept used in the generation of random samples starting from each distribution that appears in a risk analysis.

In order to generate a random sample for a probability distribution, one should generate a random number α between 0 and 1. This value is then introduced in the equation $x = G(\alpha)$ in order to determine the value that should be generated for the distribution. The random number α is usually generated starting from the uniform distribution (0,1) in order to ensure an equal opportunity for an x to be generated in any series of percentiles. The concept of the inverse function is used in almost all sampling methods. In practice, in the case of some probability distributions one may not determine an equation for G(F(x)), and this is when we appeal to numerical methods.

There are various packs of programs which may used in this respect, such as ModelRisk, @RISK, Crystal Ball etc. The ModelRisk pack uses the method of inverse function for the entire family of more than 70 single-varied distributions, also allowing the user to control the way in which the distribution is sampled via the so-called "U parameter". For example:

Normal(mu, sigma, U)

where mu and sigma are the mean value and respectively the standard deviation of the normal distribution;

Normal(mu, sigma, 0.9)

returns the 90th percentile of the distribution;

Normal(mu, sigma) or Normal(mu, sigma, RiskUniform(0,1)) for the users of the @RISK pack, or

Normal(mu, sigma, CB.Uniform(0,1)) for the users of the Crystal Ball pack etc. returns the random samples from the distributions controlled by ModelRisk, @RISK or Crystal Ball.

If the random variable is continuous and one has the probability α (the generated random number), $x = G(\alpha)$ may be found out by solving the usually transcendent equation in a numerical way:

$$\alpha - \int_{-\infty}^{x} f(t)\,dt = 0$$

The survival function, written down as S(x) is defined as the probability for the random variable to have a value greater than or equal to x.

The inverse function of the survival function, also known as the probability function, written down as $Z(\alpha)$, represents that value that the random variable exceeds with the probability α:

$$x = Z(\alpha) = Z(S(x))$$
$$P\{X > Z(\alpha)\} = \alpha$$ i.e. $Z(\alpha) = G(1 - \alpha)$ where G is the inverse function of the distribution function and S is the survival function. In the case of a continuous random variable, with the probability density f(t), the value x, also known as critical point may be found out by solving the transcendent equation:

$$1 - \alpha - \int_{-\infty}^{x} f(t)\,dt = 0$$

The critical point is that point of the axis t that has the abscissa x. The function $Z(\alpha)$, the inverse function of the survival function, is one of mostly used statistical functions; for this function there is in the specialty literature the greatest number of tabled values.

From the relation $Z(\alpha) = G(1 - \alpha)$, it results that the values of the probability function (the inverse survival function) may be obtained with the help of the quantile function, in which $\alpha \to 1-\alpha$.

The risk function, also known as the intensity of death, is written down as h(x) and is defined as the relation between probability density and the survival function in the point x:

$$\mathbf{h(x) = \frac{f(x)}{S(x)} = \frac{f(x)}{1 - F(x)}}$$

In the case of a discrete random variable, the risk function is defined in the following way:

$$\mathbf{h\,(\,x\,)\;=\;\frac{f\,(\,x\;+\;1\,)}{1\;-\;F\,(\,x\,)}}\;;\;\text{x whole number}$$

The cumulative risk function, written down as H(x) is defined as an integral from the risk function:

$$\mathbf{H(x) = \int_{-\infty}^{x} h(u)du}$$

The following relations exist:

$$\mathbf{H\,(\,x\,)\;=\;-\;\ln(\,1\;-\;F\,(\,x\,))}$$
$$\mathbf{S\,(\,x\,)\;=\;1\;-\;F\,(\,x\,)\;=\;\exp(\;-H\,(\,x\,))}$$

In many statistical applications (building trust intervals, searching for critical fields for verification criteria of statistical hypotheses) one should find out the so-called critical points in percentages or the percentage critical points. In order to do this, in the equation $1-\alpha-\int_{-\infty}^{x} \mathbf{f(t)dt} = 0$, one expresses the probability α in percentages Q, i.e. $\alpha = 0.01Q$. The critical point in percentage is defined as the root x of the equation:

$$\mathbf{1\;-\;\int_{-\infty}^{x} f\,(\,t\,)\,dt\;\;=\;\;0\,.\,01\;Q}$$

The critical point x is the abscissa for which the shaded area represents Q percentages of the entire area under the probability density curve (= with 1).

The Monte Carlo method uses as sampling method precisely the method described above. The Monte Carlo sampling fulfils the most exigent needs of a natural random sampling method. It is extremely useful when one tries to obtain a model that should imitate a random sampling coming from a certain population or when we wish to conduct statistical experiments.

The random feature of the sampling of the Monte Carlo method refers to the fact that we may have over- or under-samplings on various pieces of the distribution, which does not give us faith that we could correctly reproduce (model) the shape of the input distribution. This aspect may be removed by considerably increasing the number of iterations done.

For most of the analyses regarding risk modeling, this random feature of the Monte Carlo sampling is not relevant. We are far more concerned to see whether the model reproduces the distributions determined (chosen) by us for its inputs. Therefore, why spend so much time and effort to find these correct distributions? The answer to this question has been recently provided by the sampling method named Latin hypercube, which provides a sampling method that seems to be random but guarantees the reproduction of the input distribution with far greater efficiency than the one provided by the Monte Carlo method.

The qualitative risk analysis of not complying with terms

The limits of the quantitative analysis lead to a qualitative approach, as well, thus facilitating the understanding of the causes of delays and subsequently a better way to prevent them.[3]

Chronologically speaking, the management of a project has a preparation stage, in which the work to be done is technically defined, based on a certain number of work hypotheses, and a simple ordinance by an achievement stage, during which the programming is applied.

The problems encountered during the execution lead quite often to a revision of the project analysis and thus to a coming-back towards the preparation stage. This type of analysis may be applied in a series of categories of risks presented in the following paragraphs of the paper.

The risks in the stage of project elaboration

In this moment of the stage, the responsible person of the project, as well as the team define the activities to be executed, conditioned by inner and outer factors and by the resources applied in this purpose. These risks may be re-grouped into four categories.

A. The internal risks when defining the project specifications

In the preliminary stages of the project, the information cannot always be very precise, defining a certain number of fundamental characteristics [4] (the list of tasks that need to be achieved, the duration periods of various tasks, the human and material resources necessary for each task, the quality criteria).

The reasons that generate these imprecisions may be the following:

- the existence of future tasks, whose exact content depends on the decisions made during previous activities that are not yet executed;
- the incomplete analysis of tasks, due to time crisis, of partial information of appealing to a temporization logic;
- the existence of various possible technical scenarios that the analysis did not intend to tackle in the research done;
- an under-assessment of the activities and what should be executed, the absence of previous experience for certain types of tasks (the inexistence of fabrication, package or control series);
- an under-assessment of the new difficulties determined by the simultaneous execution of several tasks;
- postponing to designate the responsible persons with the execution of certain tasks;
-vagueness in defining objectives of the project (quality, quantity, tolerance, durability, reliability, maintenance);
- modifying the content of the project depending on the human or material resources available;
- modifying the content of the project and the responsible persons during the execution of a task or a project.

This list should be completed before initiating the project. This process is not always possible, even unwanted due to the excessive delay caused by the search for complementary information.

The incoherence of the functional data sheets of the project

The data sheet of a project specifies the main objectives and means, but nothing guarantees the coherence between the objectives proposed and the means that can only result from the iterative

[3] Walliser, B., Systemes et modeles. Introduction critique a l'analyse des systemes, Economica, Paris, 1977, p. 166 evolution between the various parts of the project. In this stage competence and honesty should prevail.

[4] Opran Constantin; Stan Sergiu, Managementul proiectelor, Editura comunicare.ro, Bucureşti, 2004, p. 44

The paymasters of the project are tempted to abuse of their position so as to excessively limit the means, in relation to the objectives assigned; on the other hand, the responsible person with the execution of tasks would like to have some time and space to get ready for possible execution difficulties and to be able to comply with their arrangements.

The exchange of information may be ”distorted” from both sides, the objective of transparency being outside the power of perception, the information having nothing but a technical role and the denaturized effects of this informational transaction being only limited and not eliminated. [5]

Among the possible causes of informational incoherence in the datasheets one may mention the following:

- the date of the project finalization is too optimist (too close in time);
- the budget for the project is insufficient;
- the desired quality specifications are too ambitious;
- the technical performances of resources are over-estimated, therefore an unrealistic succession.

Technical and industrialization risks

These refer to the companies organized on project management. Under these circumstances the following cases may be emphasized [6]:

- under-estimating the complexity of the product or its innovating character may lead to a wrong perception of the difficulties at the level of the project coordination;
- choosing a new manufacturing method relies on the hypotheses regarding the development time and the performance of the method, which in turn condition the objectives of price (cost), terms and quality; these performances may not be reached if one does not mobilize more resources;
- the possible appearance of a new manufacturing method or a new technique during the execution of a project could lead to abandoning an already known technical solution, possibly partly done, if the new method diminishes the cost, increases the reliability or improves other performances;
- the anteriority relations between the tasks may double their technical connections: the specifications of a task take shape in the manufacturing of a product with precise technical characteristics; otherwise, the content itself of the guarantee task for the use of a product should be revised even taking into account additional costs and delays;
- combining several verified solutions may lead to problems difficult to predict.

The weak capacity to manage the development and tracing of projects

The organizational context of the project may or may not favor the appearance of realistic hypotheses and conditions the efficiency of the continuation of the execution. It is a factor that may lead either to the increase or decrease of risks exposed.

Tackling the organization of a project is justified by a certain number of advantages, with the help of which one may better manage time and costs; furthermore, one may also see beneficial effects in what regards the level of knowledge gained.

This means looking for alternatives from the class of specific problems and writing them under a transmissible form adequate to the limitation of the emergence of certain errors.

---

[5] Alexander Carol, Operational Risk, Regulation, Analysis and Management, Prentice Hall, Finanacial Times, Pearson Education Limited, London, UK, 2003, p. 276

[6] Carroll Tery, WEBB Mark, The risk factor. How to make risk management work for you in strategic planning and enterprise, Take That Ltd., England, 2001, p. 194

In the absence of all collective reflections on this field, the capitalization is individual and reveals the expertise of the responsible persons, and transmitting the skill is difficult and tributary to the individual and the circumstances. A too fast rotation of the personnel is a major obstacle in gaining experience.[7]

The procedures of elaborating the project may lead to the emphasis of certain lacks or their explanation with the help of grids. The analysis of risks may seem useless to those who chasing for immediate results prefer to come up with an action plan without wondering about its fundamentals.

The procedures used for the elaboration of a project may limit the exchanges of information and commitments, and thus when establishing an ordinance with infinite capacity, assuming that all resources are available, the emphasis of possible conflicts that might appear at the request of using the same resources at the same moment, coming from various tasks of the project or from other projects, differ.

The procedures to continue the execution of the project may increase or decrease the effects of certain risks. The absence of formal procedures leads to a tardy detection of problems, and the correction actions taken under the pressure of emergency may not be the best (the compromises from technical validations of components transfer the risk towards the final characteristics of the product) [8].

A continuous activity is done by periodical update of work hypotheses, since the control of the project's progress may be done in comparison to a realistic technical recommendation and not to an initial recommendation lacking in significance and supported by out-of-date information and data.

The rigor implied by these updates represents the cost paid so as to be able to manage possible technical and financial deviations. The conflicts between the departments involved in the project appear inevitable. The procedures to solve or mediate these conflicts may be inexistent or may not be suited to the situation, which leads to more specific risks.

B. External risks in defining specifications

Anticipating the demand is mandatory for the launching of new products. This implies prognoses, as well as a certain level of risk: the norms that the product should comply with may change and may lead to regulated risks. Such errors may have serious consequences in specifying the resources required, with implications in delays and costly corrective actions.[9]

Unpredictable change of the environment is rather rare, but the following two risks may appear:

- the enforcement of new regulations in a certain field may be unsafe; a new law (such as pollution norms) has to be enforced, but the precise enforcement date is still unknown;
- the relative ignoring of the exact content of the future regulation.

In order to limit these types of risk, one may prefer adopting expensive technical solutions, which provide better reactivity, or maintaining restrictive specifications for the products.

Risks connected to use of resources

The risks connected to the use of resources focus on defining the resources required and their forecasted availability.

C. Risks connected to defining the resources requested

[7] Lupu Ramona Ana, Daniela Coman, Managementul proiectelor, Editura INFOREC, Bucureşti, 2000, p. 217

[8] Prunea, Petru Riscul în activitatea economică, Editura Economică, Bucureşti, 2003, p. 25

[9] , Dicţionar de managementul proiectelor; AFITEP, Asociaţia Franceză de Managementul Proiectelor; translation from French into Romanian, Ion Năftănăilă; Editura Tehnică, Bucureşti, 2001, p. 251

The legal environment does not condition only the specifications of products, but also the use of personnel and equipment resources, thus generating regulated risks regarding the resources, the variables also according to the country in which the manufacturing process is ensured.

These restrictions may be internal (internal regulations, provisions), quite predictable, and external (laws, reports), less predictable, that are imposed upon the company: [10]

- in what regards the personnel the hypotheses on the environment susceptible to change may cause a modification of the personnel registries, referring to: the paragraphs imposing the duration of work (paid leave, weekly duration of work, permanent team), collective agreements, interior regulations of order;

- in what regards the equipment the following restrictions are to be taken into consideration at the level of the company (complying with security and safety norms) and at the level of the impact of their use on the environment (limitation of chemical, thermal, sonic pollution).[11]

The hypotheses regarding the defining of resources required may turn out to be ungrounded because of:

- ignoring the exact resources, human and material,

- ignoring their mobilization and the capacity of the execution of work required in a certain period of time.

An underestimation of the complexity of a task may require more complex resources than the ones forecasted:

- the incoherence between resources: the introduction of a new machine may have as a consequence a prior formation (or recruit) of operators, as well as an adaptation of technology and maintenance;

- the problems are bound to appear if these incidents are not brought to a minimum level.

Risks regarding the availability of resources required

Programming the project imposes special attention given to various mobilized resources, the productive potential available and the way to solve possible conflicts. A wrong definition of the productive potential may be determined by:

- ignoring the performances of certain resources (newly acquired machines, new operators) or of their reliability;

- the bad emphasis of the continuous improvement in using resources (the Kaizen approach in Japanese management);

- under-estimating the period of knowing the new resources (employing a new operator or machine may not become immediately operational);

- the bad emphasis of organizational issues (problems of coordinating the mobilization of resources).

D. Risks in the stage of project execution

During the execution of the project, unfavorable events (be they forecasted or not) may compromise the objectives of the project, and the notion of risk has a specific meaning.

The reaction of those responsible with the adaptation to a new situation may be more or less adequate, this changing the hypotheses of the labor of programming and the risks continue afterwards, as well. The risks during the stage of project execution are related to: the tardy detection of the problem, wrong diagnosis and inadequate reaction.[12]

---

[10] Budica, Ilie, Mitrache, Marius, Metode specifice de asumare a riscului în deciziile manageriale, în: Revista Finanțe publice și contabilitate, v. 17, nr. 5, 2006, pp. 55-57

[11] Bibu Nicolae, Claudiu Brandas – Managementul prin proiecte, Editura Mirton, Timișoara, 2000, p. 118

[12]  Manual de Managementul Proiectelor, Guvernul României, Departamentul pentru Integrare Europeană, București, 2008, p. 117

The risk of late detection

In order to have a good diagnosis, the operator should dispose rapidly of good information and should obtain timely and adequate protection against flaws and deviations. Making use of necessary information varies according to risk: the external information regarding the surrounding technical and economic environment is relatively comfortable but often quite expensive; the internal information necessary is usually available but rarely adequate, on good support and in the right place.[13]

An active and non-passive attitude in front of information is a mandatory condition of a good reactivity. The problem of defining data to follow and the quality of the information available depends on the regularity of daily check-ups, and the emergency of other obligations is often invoked so as to differentiate certain daily check-ups; this behavior is the cause of the delays in identifying problems, which in their turn maintain the "pressure" on the operationalization of the project.

The risk of the wrong diagnosis [14]

The analysis of partial information may lead to the over or under-estimation of a problem. A diagnosis may be wrong because the phenomenon we fear does not have the degree perceived. At the same time, the error of the diagnosis may lead to the interpretation of facts:

- more possible causes may have the same effect, the cause retained being the wrong one;
- we may focus on an apparent cause, without looking for a remedy for profound causes;
- the mental representation of reality by actors (the inadequate use of the model of complete costs) always has deviations and may lead to wrong hypotheses of causal relations and consequently a false diagnosis in what regards the origin or the consequences of the problem detected.

A wrong diagnosis may lead to an inadequate answer, but a good diagnosis does not necessarily require adequate answers.

The risk of the inadequate answers

Once the diagnosis is formulated, the answer chosen may be inadequate. This phenomenon occurs if the diagnosis is justified by a local logic, because this tackles the problem only partially (the predominance from the point of view of the service performed or quite on the contrary, from the point of view of the management of projects) or does nothing else but temporize (the predominance of a budget or short-term argument), thus postponing solutions that need to be adopted, but which generate conflicts.

Another objectionable answer to the problem identified is the creation of new rules (procedures) that aim at the prevention of the reappearance of a problem with a slight chance of repeating itself, thus leading to the progressive suffocation of the system. [15]

The risk regarding the cost of the project

A risk analysis regarding the cost starts from a document, in which the various working packs contained by the project are mentioned and detailed. Each pack is then divided into a series of quantities estimating the quantity of work necessary for their achievement. Each pack is associated to an item of cost, which may also have an element of uncertainty.

These elements of uncertainty may be discreet events (of risk or opportunity), which may change the sizes of costs and are modeled by continuous distributions, such as the PERT distribution

---

[13] Bowman, Wiliam Archibald, Căi de îmbunătățire a activității unei companii printr-o abordare bazată pe risc, în: Audit financiar, v. 5, nr. 4, 2007, pp. 9-12

[14] Butler Cormac, Mastering Value at Risc; A step-by-step guide to understanding andapplying VaR; Financial Times, Prentice Hall; London, United Kingdom, 2001, p. 17

[15] Kieffer, J.P., Les systemes de production, leur conception et leur exploatation, Edition Dunod, Paris,1997, p. 153

or the triangular distribution. We shall use here the triangular distribution, because it is highly popular in risk analysis. This distribution allows a good modeling when the minimum and maximum values of a variable, as well as its mode (the most probable value) can be estimated.

For instance let us assume that the body of a ship consists of 562 boards, and each of these boards should be clinched in its right position. Each board is clinched by a workman. The head engineer assesses that a board should be clinched the fastest in 3 hours and 45 minutes and the slowest in 5 hours and 30 minutes. The most probable value of the clinching time is thus 4 hours and 15 minutes. Clinching each board is paid with 50 lei per hour. The total cost for the entire process of clinching can be thus modeled:

Cost = 562 * Triangle (3.75, 4.25, 5.5) * 50

Having a number of 1000 simulations, one notices that we have quite a lot of values close to 3.75 and 5.5 respectively, which cannot be accepted because this means that the workmen work either too fast, or too slow. The problem appears because the triangular distribution models the uncertainties starting from the mean value of the working time for the 562 boards.

The easiest way to remedy this failure is to model each board in part. We thus obtain a column with 562 Triangle (3.75, 4.25, 5.5) distributions that we add and then multiply by 50. Even though the result is correct, the method is basically impossible to apply into practice because we would have to use a very large number of cells. In this case we shall use an aggregate model created by the company Vose Consulting and implemented in the pack ModelRisk:

VoseAggregateMC(562, VoseTriangleObject(3.75, 4.25, 5.5))

We would also like to suggest another way to solve the problem mentioned above, i.e. by applying the central limit theorem. We start from the fact hat the average mean μ and the standard deviation σ of the Triangle(3.75, 4.25, 5.5) distribution are:

$$\mu = 4.5$$

$$\sigma = 0.368$$

Therefore, considering the fact that we have 562 items, the distribution hours – total persons for the entire technological process is the following:

$$\text{hours – total persons} = \text{Normal}(4.5 \times 562, 0.368 \times \sqrt{562}) =$$
$$= \text{Normal}(2529, 8.724)$$

Therefore, the total cost for the clinching of all boards is estimated to be:

Cost = Normal(2529, 8.724) x 50

Conclusions

We consider that this paper sets the methodological and scientific bases necessary for tackling the quantitative and qualitative study of risks which may appear during a project. Generating new distributions, different from the ones used nowadays, and finalizing the algorithm for the sampling method known as the Latin square will allow in the future a much more precise statistical analysis of risk phenomena. The inclusion of the new distributions in the ModelRisk pack of the Vose company, specialized in risk analyses, will allow the authors to take part in real risk analyses together with the specialists of this company.

In the future one wishes to tackle the risks that may appear during very large projects, in which their number may be of thousands. In such a case each risk should be associated to a certain probability of appearance and a PERT – type distribution should reflect the size of that risk. We believe that in the near future the change of the organizational culture regarding the qualitative and quantitative analysis of risks of any kind should become of utmost importance.

References

- Bassett E.E., Bremner J.M., Morgan B.J.T., Jolliffe J.T., Jones B., – Statistics. Problems and Solutions, World Scientific Publishing Co. Pte. Ltd., P.O.Box 128, Farrer Road, Singapore 912805, ISBN 981-02-4293-X, Singapore, 2000.201-203
- Boris Constantin – Utilizarea calculatorului în analiza statistică, vol.1, Tehnopress, Iaşi, ISBN 978-973-702-708-5, 2009.255-313
- Cox D.R., Snell E.J. – Applied Statistics. Principles and Examples, Chapman and Hall Ltd., 11 New Fetter Lane, London EC4P 4EE, ISBN 0-412-16560-0, 1981.
- Cox D.R., Reid N. – The Theory of the Design of Experiments, Chapman & Hall/Crc, ISBN 1-58488-195-X, Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data, USA, 2000.
- David Vose – Risk Analysis. A quantitative guide, John Wiley @ Sons, Ltd., ediția a -III-a, Anglia, ISBN 978-0-470-51284-5, 2010.473-491
- Douglas C. Montgomery, George C. Runger – Applied Statistics and Probability for Engineers, Third Edition, John Wiley & Sons, Inc., New York, ISBN 0-471-20454-4, USA, 2003.
- 15. George Roussas – Introduction to Probability and Statistical Inference, Academic Press, An imprint of Elsevier Science, 525 B Street, Suite 1900, San Diego, California 92101-4495, USA, 2003.
- George G. Roussas – A Course in Mathematical Statistics, Second Edition, Academic Press, 525 B Street, Suite 1900, San Diego, CA 92101-4495, ISBN 0-12-599315-3, USA, 1997.
- Hisashi Tanizaki – Computational Methods in Statistics and Econometrics, Marcel Dekker, Inc.,270 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10016, ISBN 0-8247-4804-2, USA, 2004.
- Johnathan Mun – Modeling Risk, John Wiley @ Sons, Inc., ediția a – II-a, USA, ISBN 978-0-470-59221-2, 2010.178-192
- Johnathan Mun – Risk Simulator Software, USA, 2009.
- Johnathan Mun – Real options super lattice solver 5.0, USA, 2009.
- Johnathan Mun – Real Options Valuation COMPILER , USA, 2009.
- Johnathan Mun – Integrated Risk Analysis. Modeling Toolkit., USA, 2009.
- Jerome L. Myers, Arnold D. Well – Research Design and Statistical Analysis, Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, Publishers, Mahwah, New Jersey, London, 2003.209-212
- Rudolf J. Freund, William J. Wilson - Statistical Methods, Academic Press, An imprint of Elsevier Science, 525 B Street, Suite 1900, San Diego, California 92101-4495, USA, 2003.
- Salvatore Dominick, Reagle Derrick – Theory and Problems of Statistics and Econometrics, Schaum's Outline Series, McGraw-Hill, ISBN 0-07-139568-7, USA, 2002.

ASPECTS REGARDING NEUROMARKETING SPECIFIC RESEARCH METHODS

MIRELA-CRISTINA VOICU*

Abstract
Information is one of the most important resources that a company must posses. Some informations are hidden deep in the black box - the mind of the consumer. Neuromarketing helps us find what is inside of the black box without troubling the consumer with questions that he doesn't want to answer or that he can't answer. Today because of an extensive research in mapping cortical and subcortical activity in association with behaviors and thoughts, the confidence in neurological data is growing. Thanks to discoveries in perceptual sciences we can identify the parts of the brain that are responsible for the phenomena that we experience daily. For all those interested in information obtained through neuromarketing techniques it becomes evident that there are corresponding neural substrates of consumer decision making process and these substrates can be observed, measured, and possibly manipulated. The following paper reveals some important aspects of the use of neuromarketing in studying consumer behavior by presenting the concepts, methods and techniques used under this sophisticated name, the limitations and advantages of using neuromarketing techniques and the importance of this type of information in decision making process at a company level.

Keywords: marketing reseach, neuromarketing, consumer behavior, observation, neurosience

Introduction

Companies have always wanted to get inside consumers skulls, in the so-called "black box" in order to predict as accurately as possible how the latter will react to the stimuli in the market, from prices to offers and advertisements, in order to extract as much as possible out of their pockets. In the past, marketing was based only on a relatively crude measurement of what causes the consumer to buy, using to this end, surveys, the focus group or the observation based on the measurements of eye movements and the degree of sweating (the more excited the subjects are about something the greater is the tendency to sweat) to read the thoughts and feelings of consumers. The reality is that approximately 90% of consumers' buying behavior is unconscious and we cannot really accurately explain their preferences or their most likely purchasing decisions.

Typically, specialists in consumer behavior tend to divide the consumption decisions in two areas: emotional decisions and rational decisions[1]. Emerging academic fields such as behavioral economics taught us that there are also forces that are neither rational nor emotional. Unlike emotions - which can be identified through projective techniques - instincts are factors that most people are not aware of. They occur in the absence of thought. We often see consumers who make these types of instinctive choices, such as, for example, in the situation where they choose from the shelves a particular brand of soft drink or bag of chips without knowing exactly why they chose that brand.

Under these conditions, the traditional studies performed are of questionable value. In the case where companies pour millions of dollars or euros in a promotion that may or may not reach its target, we realize that it is time for a paradigm shift.

What is neuromarketing?

Currently, researchers are trying and succeeding to go directly to the decision maker - namely the brain. This action led to a controversial new field called neuromarketing, combining neuroscience, marketing and technology. Considered by some marketing researchers as the most important progress in the field, neuromarketing has been at the same time, rejected by skeptical neurologists as being closer to a pseudo-scientific fraud. Many experts point out that our current exploration and vision on the human brain is probably as complete or as accurate as a map of the world in the sixteenth century.

* Senior Lecturer Ph. D., „Nicolae Titulescu" University (email: voicu.cristina.m@gmail.com).

[1] Harries, S., Davies, S., 2010, Neuromarketing Mad Scientists Meet „Mad Men"?, DRAFTFCB, http://www.draftfcb.com/content/engage/pdf/Engage_Neuromarketing.pdf

While the first use of fMRI (Functional Magnetic Resonance Imaging) as a marketing tool has been reported in the late 90s by Gerry Zaltman, a professor at Harvard, the term "neuromarketing" was invented by Professor Ale Smidts, considered the father of neuromarketing and a Nobel Prize winner for Economic Sciences, in 2002, while the first neuromarketing conference was held in 2004 at Baylor College of Medicine in Houston. Also, in the development of this area, an important threshold was exceeded in June 2001 with the creation of the first American neuromarketing company in Atlanta, located not far from Coca-Cola headquarters: Brighthouse Institute, led by marketing expert Joe Reyman.

Neuromarketing has recently entered our country by a LAB Romania initiative which has offered its services to the Romanian market since 2009. The first products that used neuromarketing in our country were those of the premium range, but with a large volume of sales, like luxury cars. Communication specialists argue that the market in Romania is not yet ready for neuromarketing, so that local firms will allocate resources to this activity in the near future.

The term neuromarketing designates techniques to identify brain mechanisms in order to understand consumer behavior, in order to improve marketing strategies.

Neuromarketing is an undisguised observation technique based on the techniques resulted from neuroscience, used for a better identification and understanding of brain mechanisms underlying consumer behavior, in view of increasing the effectiveness of the commercial activities of the companies. In other words, neuromarketing is that the domain of marketing studying sensory, motor, cognitive and affective responses recorded by the human brain when it is subjected to external stimuli (when the consumer sees an ad, eats a chocolate bar, drinks a glass of Coca-Cola). This calls for the technology of magnetic resonance imaging transfer technology used to detect brain tumors, but at the same time, allows the identification of the way the brain receives, processes and interprets the various images that are submitted. There are many cases where aspects of consumer behavior cannot be articulated verbally or in writing no matter how skilled is the interviewer or how cooperative is the subject, since these aspects operate below the consciousness level of the individual. In other cases, the very act of acquiring information may interfere with the perception that scientists are trying to measure.

The premise of using this technique is that consumer purchase decisions are made in seconds in the subconscious, the emotional side of the brain and that by understanding what we like, we do not like, what we want, what causes us fear or boredom, etc., as shown when watching our brain responses to stimuli can design products and marketing communications to better meet the unmet needs of the market and determine purchase.

Neuromarketing specific methods

Brainwave recording devices have been available for decades, the difference being that new technologies can now more accurately identify which brain regions are active when people respond to products, when they make brand-level choices or when they are exposed to advertisements.

Brain imaging techniques currently used in neuromarketing are[2]:

• EEG (electroencephalography) – it records brain wave changes produced by the cortex, reflecting the positive or negative emotions produced at that moment. The technique has an excellent temporal resolution of 1/1000 of a second being non-invasive, rapid, inexpensive and the records can be obtained in a natural environment. But the results thus obtained are not reliable because the device is very sensitive to the movements of those around, to neon lights, to the electromagnetic waves, or to head movements. Moreover, it only records surface brain activity, while the decision-making mechanism requires the activity of deeper parts of the brain. Although some experts may claim otherwise, it is generally accepted that this technique allows a little over just measuring the interest. While this may be helpful in understanding those aspects of communication that attract attention, it does not allow us to identify emotional reactions. EEG technology has the advantage of being a relatively discreet investigation and allows the subjects of the investigation to enjoy some freedom of movement.

[2] Lewis, D., Bridger, D., 2005, Market Researchers make Increasing use of Brain Imaging, ACNR, Volume 5, No 3, July/August 2005

• fMRI (functional magnetic resonance imaging) that measures oxygen consumption in various tissues of the brain. This imaging technique has been used to date to investigate the impact of brand perception on consumer preferences, to evaluate videos and television advertising, the study of buying decision process and even to investigate the likely impact of electoral advertising during the presidential elections. The biggest drawback of this technique is that the device needed to perform imaging cannot be transported. Therefore, it introduces a distortion, because it does not take into account the concrete conditions in which the shopping is done and thus, it does not measure the environmental influences.

• QEEG (quantitative analysis of the frequency of the electroencephalography) used for the analysis of viewers' response to television advertising and other forms of advertising, the exploring of the effects of watching happy or sad facial expressions, exploring the mental states of motorists who must drive under time pressure or examining how people react to an unexpected "free road". The QEEG technique is simpler to use and less expensive, also allowing to make records in a wide range of natural environments. QEEG can be used in combination with qualitative research methods thus providing a better understanding of consumer choices which could not be uncovered otherwise.

• MEG (magnetoencephalogram). An example of a situation where this technique was used is the one for the measurement of the purchase decision-making process in a "virtual" supermarket. The authors of the study reported that the right parietal cortex became active only when consumers were faced with a preferred brand and concluded that this region was involved in conscious decision making regarding the choices for purchase. The main drawback of this technique is similar to the fMRI technique, i.e. the technology for performing them is not particularly convenient in terms of its use. It "ties" both the researcher and the subject of the investigation to an immovable machine having a high operating cost and which, moreover, requires positioning the subject's head inside a very large machine.

• ECoG (electrocorticography).

• PET (positron emission tomography) measures blood flow and the intensity of metabolism in the brain.

Of the aforementioned techniques, fMRI captured the most interest among marketing researchers and enjoyed the most extensive advertising in the general interest and marketing press.

Facial coding techniques are used in support of brain imaging techniques, electromyographies (EMG) to measure the activity of primary facial muscles (zygomatic / orbicular) that may reflect the conscious or unconscious expression of emotions, following the gaze direction (indicating areas of focus of the eyes) and the recording of variations in the galvanic skin response (GSR) showing whether the product attracted interest from the consumer.

Currently, brain scanning is coming increasingly closer to the home of the subjects, by using wireless devices that allow monitoring of emotions even when the subject is in the comfortable environment of his home. In order to perform a study of neuromarketing the specialists recommend using a preselected number of people between 30 and 100, chosen by product or area.

Neuromarketing's pros and cons

One of the most praised aspects of neuromarketing methods is that they are devoid of subjectivity and bias from the participants. For example, when asking a subject to state what he thinks about a certain brand, the person's response will be colored by a complex network of contextual biases and tangential cognitive factors. The promise of neuromarketing is that we can all bypass these confounding factors to get at the heart of the matter – the real representation of the brand. Unfortunately, while this is true to some extent, an entirely new set of confounding factors is introduced during the analysis of neuromarketing data. While many neuromarketing measures are indeed more objective than verbal reports, the data thus obtained does not remain unfiltered. While the signals are not filtered by the consciousness of the research subject, a great deal of manipulation and filtering of the data is performed by the researcher. This introduces the potential for error, but through a different path.

In the studies performed, neuromarketers study the reaction (reactions) of the brain to some stimuli such as appearance, smell, descriptive language (aspect mainly used in the food industry), a chain of events or a story, or the association made between a celebrity and a certain brand (such as can be seen in the sports, perfumes and clothing industry). Biometric sensors are often used to monitor brain activity before, during and after exposure to various stimuli through various neuromarketing techniques. This is done in order to detect processes that have led to certain decisions and to identify that part of the brain that implemented those processes. Biometric sensors use, along with the imaging techniques described above, physiological sensors that monitor heart rate, breathing and skin response.

In this area, however, it is one thing to be able to see what parts of the brain become active in response to a stimulus and it is something else to interpret what this means or what to do with the information obtained. Thus, neuromarketing studies indicate increasingly more towards various "centers known" in the brain. The knowledge about these so-called "known centers" are often sketchy and the demands on their function are often motivated by speculation rather than by a known fact.

Neuromarketing practice is not without criticism or problems. First, consumer advocates argue that neuromarketers exploit people to change their behavior towards the purchase of products / services that they do not need and which lead to the creation of unhealthy and irresponsible addictions and desires. Second, neuromarketing still suffers from a problem that it is trying to overcome – the artificiality of marketing research. Brain activity recorded in a laboratory may not equate with brain behavior at the mall where the purchase decision is taken. Third, neuromarketing studies are not common to the B2B field, probably because of the fact that the customer buying process tends to be lengthy and involves many people so that these decisions can be very difficult to measure in a reliable manner. Fourth, the present cost of these studies is prohibitive for many companies.

We must also be aware when we consider making a research through this technique that neuromarketing has limitations:

- neuromarketing is still only an adjunct, a technique complementary to traditional techniques - not a substitute for them[3]. The results obtained in neuromarketing studies are translated into specific marketing language, so that the information is used by those who know all the elements of the marketing mix, providing a significant amount of additional information, but not just any information about consumer behavior. On the other hand, the results generated by neuromarketing studies are, at the moment, far too broad and subject to interpretation, to be useful individually.
- The second limit is represented by the price and the technology. According to specialists, neuromarketing is now accessible to more than one hundred companies worldwide. These include Coca-Cola, K-Mart, Delta Airlines, Levi Strauss, Alcatel. One can however estimate that the real demand for such equipment used in applications other than medical will lead to a rapid reduction in both cost and size of the equipment, a situation that we approach with small steps.

[3] Page, G., 2006, Neuromarketing: Beyond the Buzz, Millward Brown's Pov, april 2006, www.millwardbrown.com

5. The role of neuromarketing

Neuromarketing shows a very important fact, namely that, as a rule, decisions are taken by the consumer at a mental, emotional and instinctive level[4]. Through brain imaging, marketers seek to capture the rapid commands[5] set up by the brain for efficient and rapid analysis in the evaluation of the alternatives within the purchasing decision-making process. To save time, the brain does not always go through the entire list of risks, benefits and value judgments. Whenever possible, it is based on some "quick keys" that are based on experience and the benefits of stored information.

The results obtained through neuromarketing have been used so far in the following areas of interest:

- Increasing brand preference;
- Improving advertisements retention;
- Maximizing the impact of advertising;
- Improvement of TV commercials;
- Optimization of media budgets by admastering (shortening the time for broadcasting the spot);
- Optimization of production budgets by testing the spot in the production process.
- Making the branding operational;
- Testing the products before their market launch.

Rezultatele Neuromarketing research results can be surprising. In Buyology [6], Martin Lindstrom presents the results of a study organized by him and conducted during three years. Among its conclusions, we mention:

- the warning labels on cigarette packs stimulate a brain area associated with lust - despite the fact that the subjects of the study said they considered the warnings on the packages to be effective;
- the images of dominant brands such as iPod, stimulated the same part of the brain normally activated by religious symbols;
- a picture of a Mini Cooper activated that part of the brain that responds to faces

Neuromarketing can also be used in psychological and theoretical applications, the examples in this regard being represented by the assessment of the neurological responses during presidential speeches and movie trailers in order to improve the way both are presented to the public.

Using brain imaging techniques will never allow marketing professionals to find the "Holy Grail" of marketing research, the "buy button" - a mythical region of the brain that should only be stimulated so that consumers feel compelled to purchase a product even if they do not want to do so. This button will not be found because it does not exist! Neuromarketing offers, from a realistic point of view, the prospect of a better understanding of how the brain responds to a wide variety of everyday situations. In addition to great commercial value, neuromarketing offers the opportunity to increase our knowledge of brain function among a non-clinical population, to the extent to which there is an expansion of strong medical technologies in a new and challenging research area.

Neuromarketing specific technology can help minimize negative effects. However, it can help maximize positive aspects, as it requires creativity and a holistic view of the person, considering it a real human being. What neuromarketing can really do is to improve the way companies create

[4] Boricean, V., 2009, Brief History of Neuromarketing, The International Conference on Economics and Administration, Faculty of Administration and Business, University of Bucharest, Romania ICEA – FAA Bucharest, 14-15th November 2009, http://conference.faa.ro

[5] Park, A., 2007, The Brain: Marketing To Your Mind, Time Magazine, 19 January 2007, retrieved from http://www.time.com/time/magazine/article/0,9171,1580370-3,00.html

[6] Lindstrom, M., 2011, Buyology, Publica Publishing House, ISBN 978-973-1931-59-3

products and promote them, so as to make them more interesting, attractive and valuable for consumers. Or, as Joey Rieman said in "The New Scientist": "The objective of neuromarketing is to change the behavior of the companies, not the behavior of the consumers!"

Conclusions

The immediate application of neuroscience in marketing requires companies to act carefully and to detach scientific substance from promotional deception. In the long run, neuromarketing will be more welcome, from a social point of view, in terms of applications that focus on products and causes with a clear social benefit - applications such as road safety messages or convincing people to quit smoking or to resist the over-eating trend.

Currently, many companies invest in technology and neuromarketing studies and books, and neuromarketing blogs on neuromarketing are given more attention and legitimacy. The recent investment of research company Nielsen in the research "NeuroFocus' increased the influence and credibility of neuromarketing. However, the field is young and like the Wild West many people outside the marketing area expressed concern about the reliability and ethics of neuromarketing.

Neuromarketing is a developing discipline, which in time will give us new insights into human behavior. Unfortunately, at present there are little published research articles in this field. Current debate on neuromarketing is reduced to a few key points:

- pragmatic realities related to the business environment often require science to adapt. For the use of measurement techniques specific to neuromarketing, the solution that is measurable, effective and provides valid results in an acceptable margin of error is the winning solution;
- for neuromarketing to become a common technique in marketing research, it is necessary for the necessary devices to become mobile in order to allow observations in the real world.
- neuromarketing can help understand the differences between what consumers say and what they do, but it should be applied on a large enough sample for this technique to express the behavior of consumers;
- hybrid models can increase efficiency. If you combine the techniques of eye tracking and EEG with a prediction on the market, you get better results. But if you combine sensory testing models with biometric measurements, you will get high depth results.

- References

- Boricean, V., 2009, Brief History of Neuromarketing, The International Conference on Economics and Administration, Faculty of Administration and Business, University of Bucharest, Romania ICEA – FAA Bucharest, 14-15th November 2009, http://conference.faa.ro
- Harries, S., Davies, S., 2010, Neuromarketing Mad Scientists Meet „Mad Men"?, DRAFTFCB, http://www.draftfcb.com/content/engage/pdf/Engage_Neuromarketing.pdf
- Lewis, D., Bridger, D., 2005, Market Researchers make Increasing use of Brain Imaging, ACNR, Volume 5, No 3, July/August 2005
- Lindstrom, M., 2011, Buyology, Publica Publishing House, ISBN 978-973-1931-59-3
- Page, G., 2006, Neuromarketing: Beyond the Buzz, Millward Brown's Pov, april 2006, www.millwardbrown.com
- Park, A., 2007, The Brain: Marketing To Your Mind, Time Magazine, 19 January 2007, retrieved from http://www.time.com/time/magazine/article/0,9171,1580370-3,00.html

ETHNOMARKETING - A NEW PARADIGM THAT REFLECTS MARKETING'S CONCERN FOR THE CULTURAL DIMENSION OF THE MARKET

MIRELA-CRISTINA VOICU[*]
ALINA-MIHAELA BABONEA[]
OTILIA-ELENA PLATON[]

Abstract
Culture has often been regarded as one of the main determinants of consumer behavior and of the symbolism acquired by certain products. It is well known that states are composed of many subcultures and that cultural diversity is an ever-present topic. Culture has invaded the entire current range of business, its presence is seen everywhere, and marketing makes no exception.
In this context and considering culture as an important factor that conducts and guides the entrepreneurial success, the following paper reveals some important concepts, characteristics and principles of ethnomarketing for a better exploitation of market opportunities, especially on its consumer behavior dimension.

Keywords: marketing, culture, subculture, ethno marketing, marketing research

Introduction

Culture offers people a significant context in which they can meet, think and face the world. The way we perceive the world around us, the way we think and act, our norms and values are determined by the culture in which we live and which we consider to be normal. It is a system that we learn and that is passed on from generation to generation. Culture can be represented as a collection of elements such as language, buildings, religion, clothing, cuisine etc. On the other hand, as part of a culture, subcultures are groups of people who have value systems based on common experiences of life. Even a group of World of Warcraft fans in a society form their little subculture. Subcultures are also, among others, ethnic minorities. Spanish speakers in the United States of America represent a subculture, a rather significant ethnic group. To the same extent Hungarian speakers in Romania are an ethnic group or a subculture. Different cultures have a simultaneous influence upon one another. Ethnic groups create cultural diversity in that they actively contribute and change the culture of the society they belong to.

Culture has often been regarded as one of the main determinant factors of consumer behavior and of the symbolism acquired for certain products. It is also well known that states are composed of numerous subcultures and cultural diversity is an ever-present topic. Culture has invaded the entire current range of business, its presence is seen everywhere: on the market, on which are reflected the three levels of culture (artifacts and conduct, values and beliefs, and the world which lies at their basis) and also inside the organization dominated by certain cultural patterns throughout the life of the enterprise. In these conditions there is has been a growing interest, for the past 20 years, for the cross-cultural differences between different ethnic groups and their implications for the marketing strategy developed at the level of the organization, using culture and ethnicity as segmentation criteria.

It should be emphasized that, in practice, small and medium enterprises in particular are faced with the need to include culture the process of design, implementation and control of marketing activities.

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: voicu.cristina.m@gmail.com).
[] Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: alinababonea@univnt.ro).
[] Junior teaching assistant, Ph. D. candidate, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: otiliapl@yahoo.com).

The concept of ethno-marketing

Ethno-marketing involves the recognition of culture as the framework and essence determining contemporary business and consumer behavior analysis, the decisions of the organization and the dynamics of the market on which the company acts from the point of view of cultural dimensions. In other words, ethno-marketing is a differentiated marketing in the light of the cultural origin of the target groups, the cultural minorities living in a country being addressed through a tailored marketing mix. In this context, are taken into account the contributions of anthropology and ethnography that characterize consumer cultures. Ethnography, the science that classifies the peoples of the world, studying their composition, origin and spread, follows the development of their material and spiritual culture, etc., has now become the method allowing the acquiring of understanding of the values, behaviors and other specific components of culture. The goal of the ethnographic method used in ethno-marketing is to penetrate inside the symbolic and social universe of the persons investigated to decipher their perceptions, attitudes, habits, values and way of life and, thus, to better understand their actions and motivations[1]. On the other hand, cultural and social anthropology is most often used in marketing as it examines cultural facts that influence the behavior of individuals.

Ethno-marketing is not a new idea, having emerged in 1920 as a concept in the U.S. („ethnic marketing") in an attempt to address migrant Asians and Latin Americans. The basic principle of ethno-marketing at the time was that for minorities specific means of marketing should be used, their stimulation being achieved through different methods.

Two reasons led to the increasing importance of ethno-marketing. First, ethnic groups have become larger and have gained greater purchasing power, which led to the increase in their attractiveness. Secondly, the marketing field has become increasingly advanced which means, among other things, a concentration of attention on ever-smaller market segments. In recent years, minority consumer market segmentation has become increasingly complex and sophisticated. Thanks to new tools and state-of-the-art techniques of data processing, such as, for example, data-mining, brands are now able to reach niche segments of consumers that have become increasingly narrow[2].

Ethno-marketing , this new paradigm in marketing, was conceptualized as the social process in which, in terms of human groups, are designed and implemented three main functions of marketing: understanding consumers, to winning customers (buyers) and retaining customers.

The four epistemological foundations of ethno-marketing are[3]:

ethnicity - a concept of individual and group identity adopting differences in color, language, religion or attributes related to common origin. Many researchers state that the basis of ethnicity is the self-identification of members mediated by the perception of others.

ethno-consumerism understood as the study of social group or cultural group consumption, using categories of behavior and thinking that are rooted in the cultural component. Ethno-consumerism is based on the basic cultural categories of a particular culture and studies the actions, practices, words, thoughts, language, institutions and interconnections between these categories. Ethno-consumerism forces the researcher to observe a particular person not as an individual but as a cultural being, belonging to a culture, subculture or having another affiliation group;

---

[1] Chirade, A., Guezais, C., Marzouk, S., 2008, The Ethno-marketing, course notes MOI (International Operational Marketing), University of Paris X, 1/17.04.2008, http://christophe.benavent.free.fr/IMG/pdf/MOI_2008_Ethnomarketing.pdf

[2] Pauwels, M.C., 2006, Marketers as Innovators: how ethnic marketing revisits ethnicity, LISA e-journal, Vol. IV - n°1/2006: Driving Innovation in Anglo-Saxon Economies: Comparative Perspectives, p. 234-254, Electronic ISSN 1762-6153, http://lisa.revues.org/2293

[3] Morales, D.P., 2005, Ethnomarketing, the cultural dimension of marketing, paper accepted for presentation at the 2004 Academy of Marketing Science Cultural Perspectives on Marketing Conference held at the Universidad de las Américas Campus in Puebla, Mexico, published in Pensamiento y Gestión, N°18, Universidad del Norte, pp. 177-206, ISSN 1657-6276, http://ciruelo.uninorte.edu.co/pdf/pensamiento_gestion/18/7_Ethnomarketing.pdf

the cultural dimensions of markets, namely those markets where the objects, rules and stakeholders acquire a meaning related to a particular culture; the market-oriented organizational culture where marketing has a predominant role representing the core of any strategy of an enterprise. Trying to create or run a market-oriented organizational culture involves efforts towards integrating the concept of marketing as an element always present in each functional unit that makes up the organization. This means that in order to be successful, a market-oriented organization must build long term relationships, by implementing the strategies that enable the transformation of potential consumers into loyal customers, one of the key postulates of the concept of marketing. In order to achieve this state of customer loyalty, an organization must have extensive knowledge about customer needs during the various times when the organization builds its exchange relationships: before (pre-transactional exchange), during (transactional exchange) and after (post-transactional exchange) the execution of the process. A market-oriented organizational culture is defined as a set of behaviors, myths, rites, rituals, symbols, beliefs, assumptions, and especially values that allow the organization to place the customer at the heart of its activities, to know the present and future competition, to properly co-ordinate its internal activities, to take decisions in a long term perspective and to have a profitability in accordance with its own previously determined plans and needs.

Ethno-marketing specific actions in a company

Basically, ethno-marketing is a specific way to address the market, on the basis of other segmentation criteria, designed to aim for those niches represented by people from different ethnic backgrounds[4]. It is designed as a type of marketing applied to homogeneous ethnic groups under a great cultural diversity that characterizes the current cultures.

Formulating the assumptions underpinning ethno-marketing, these can be stated as follows:

- the conception and practice of marketing are included in the relativistic scientific paradigm, in open, not complementary, opposition with the positivist paradigm dominant in the current marketing schools. In other words, marketing as a discipline has a contextual nature and the validity of its truth depends entirely on the environmental conditions detected, analyzed and interpreted. The essence of any context is completely determined by dominant cultural models and schemas.
- products - goods, services and ideas, bear great symbolic meaning;
- anthropology, with its most recognized method, ethnography, represents the social science best able to understand, conquer, and keep the market participant agents;
- marketing research must be supported by different methodologies in which the consumer can be contemplated in natural circumstances. One may use for this purpose, among other data compilation techniques, techniques of observation of the subjects, in-depth interviews, mystery client technique, audio and video recordings etc.;
- consumer phenomena that form the symbolic meanings, rather than functional meanings, should be the starting point of any marketing effort;
- any undertaking must have a clear and strong market-oriented organizational culture in order to create superior values for the customer;
- the process of identifying market segments should be conducted in accordance with a symbolic approach;
- consumers belong to different market segments at the same time in terms of a particular product category;
- organizational communication must ensure that it targets a specific market segment;

[4] Van der Schaaf, C., 2008, Ethno marketing is slightly crude, The issue, Erasmus University Rotterdam, http://www.eur.nl/english/news/the_issue/issuearchive/2008/issue_2008_26/

- substantial efforts should be made by the company to build effective and dynamic market information systems;
- marketing audits should become a routine in any organization.

The continuous support towards consumer sovereignty is one of the key postulates that ethno-marketing recognizes; this first feature is linked to the need to understand consumers. Consumer profiles, consumption trends, tastes and preferences should be deeply known. Based on the contemplation of consumer phenomena, expressions, contexts and rituals, is it possible to know consumers, their categorization, their quantification and, especially, the drafting of future marketing strategies and of the programs to be implemented in order to meet the their deepest aspirations.

Culture shapes (most often unconsciously) every human behavior, including consumer behavior. Multiple cultural elements - language, religion, values and symbols - different from one culture to another can exert a strong influence on consumer behavior. Individual consumption is closely linked to culture on several levels: the connotations of a specific language, the postures, gestures and contacts between individuals, color perception, etc. Any decision to purchase is the result of a complex process in which occur, to some degree, the symbolism and the irrational. The activity of ethno-marketers is to remove from the shadow that part which motivates the decision and which is influenced by the cultural factor.

Consumer understanding must be translated into clear and convincing explanations of human complexity. With this information, it is possible to transform potential customers into loyal customers, the final target of all organizational efforts on the market. Thus, different types of consumption inherent in this period will have to be made visible and consumer motivations emphasized by the ethno-marketing approach which shall have to be designed to address human groups, ethnic groups. For example, the profane and the sacred consumption must be clearly defined in order to discover whether the profane or the sacred prevailed in some social circles. Consumption must also be defined in terms of processes of imitating public persons, located in the upper layers of society that many potential customers perform. Also, the materialism considered to be typical of this age will be taken into consideration, given its remarkable influence in purchasing a certain type of products (luxury goods, vehicles, jewelry)

Possessions now represent a way to reaffirm the personality for many consumers. For these consumers life revolves around the value of things that can be purchased and through these things they are aspire to be perceived as successful people and therefore worthy of being emulated. Similarly, consumption rituals must be identified in terms of artifacts used, texts learned and repeated faithfully, roles to be fulfilled with the audience to which is destined the role which is executed. It is also indispensable to find the connection between cultural values and terminal values, through which consumers try to materialize their consumption objectives, and those product attributes that consumers assume that they can meet their expectations.

The process of study, analysis and interpretation of current environmental realities of the market in order to provide solutions to identified needs, involves more or less focusing on the cultural environment. In this context, cultural circumstances could only be approximated by appealing to specific ethnographic methods of cultural anthropology, in order to discover the symbolic world that lies hidden behind business actions and decisions of each community studied. Ethnography sets not only the context and subjective meaning of the experience of a group of people, but it also explains the cultural significance of this experience in a comparative and interpretive manner.

In other words, ethno-marketing breaks the traditional view of the marketing imposing the classical approach to the marketing mix (4Ps: product, price, placement, promotion) in thousands of fragments. Acting under the old marketing concept brought great damage, equally to both the business and academic environment in an attempt to reduce marketing processes to a universal formula with superficial variations on the four main components, without giving sufficient attention to radical adjustments related to the current competitive environment.

Regarding product policy, it is recommended that before applying the principles of ethno-marketing , the organization checks the convenience degree of its products because the products have varying degrees of dependence on the cultural factor (see figure 1).

Figure 1. Products' dependency on the cultural factor

Source: adaptation from Waldeck, B., von Gosen, C., Ethno marketing in Germany, paper presented at the 1st International Conference on Strategic Development of the Baltic Sea Region (BSR), Tallinn, Estonia, 25-27 February 2007, http://ikarus.e-technik.fh-kiel.de/bsn42/fileadmin/bsn_ftp/Waldeck_Paper_Ethno_Marketing_6-E.pdf

Thus, standardization, to which reference is made in the above figure refers to the fact that a product may be sold in different markets without realizing any changes due to cultural reasons. The dependence on cultural factors is in a close relationship with tradition. Products dependent on this factor have a long tradition and are thus part of the cultural identity of individuals. For example, clothing and food products are visible features of a culture; through them, a differentiation can be achieved from one culture to another. The products that are not dependent on cultural factors satisfy the same needs irrespective of the cultures manifested in that country.

In ethno-marketing , particular attention should be paid to cultural influences on brand names and packaging design. In this context, the brand name must meet three conditions: to be easy to pronounce, to have a positive significance and, last but not least, it must sound good. These are also the characteristics that distinguish languages from one another.

The brand name should be understood and easily pronounced by the target group. Also, more important than phonetics (pronunciation) is semantics (meaning and associations). The brand name must not lead to negative associations with the target group. This can happen with brand names that have various meanings in other languages. For example, Unilever has named one of its soaps "Le Sancy", a phrase that means in some Asian dialects “death upon you ", an association that was certainly not intended. A third feature of the language - morphology - provides information about word length and the fact that, in a language, short or long words are preferred, and thus are preferred short or long brand names.

On the other hand, when it comes to design and product packaging, heed should be paid to selected colors and / or symbols that should not cause any negative association with the target group due to the cultural context.

The service offered to customers represents, as we know, a component of the product policy. Customers often seek to obtain product information before purchase (commercial service). They require leaflets and after sales service. In ethno-marketing, these services should be provided in the native language of the target group. Most times, it is very important to satisfy the information needs of the target group because, otherwise, the organization's marketing efforts will remain unsuccessful.

Another component of the marketing mix, the promotional policy, offers a variety of possibilities in the form of advertising, advertising in print, websites, promotions, etc. that can support the application of the ethno-marketing vision. As we can imagine, is very important to adapt the communication campaigns to the needs of the targeted ethnic group. In addition to caring for the language used, in the communication activity other elements of cultural features must be used, such as symbols, colors and music. The key to achieving a genuine relationship goes beyond simply using specific language and images used in advertising, being designed to build trust and take seriously the clients from minority groups. A promotional campaign designed specifically for the foreign client in his language does not only prevent distortions due to negative associations made only after translation, but also makes the customer feel adequately addressed, it shows him that he is important for the company. Some ethnic groups living in our country understand the advertising done in Romanian, but there is a difference between the perception of publicity and its internalization. Ethnic minorities in a society feel strongly affiliated to their own culture and the language is a key identification feature. Thus, advertising in Romanian is perceived, but advertising in their native language stirs up emotions.

In ethno-marketing, the distribution policy is particularly important in the field of services. Banking and insurance services mainly involve conducting extensive advisory activities, being fully substantiated the need for their staff to learn more languages in order to provide this service to target ethnic groups. On the other hand, most often, in Romania the vast majority of distributors do not take into account the differences existing in the behavior of consumers who are part of ethnic groups of interest, therefore, their members have created their own distribution channels. Due to the sales force's lack of knowledge regarding foreign languages, foreigners prefer to buy goods they need from the so-called "ethnic stores" because in them they feel understood and can make themselves understood. This psychological barrier can be overcome, as mentioned above, by hiring people to speak the language of the target ethnic group. The role of the communities is also important in this case. People like to buy things where they can meet with friends, so that once created, the positive experiences in the store will lead to loyalty.

Pricing policy does not have the same importance on the realm of ethno-marketing as the other policies of the marketing mix. From this point of view, three factors influenced by the cultural component and which can provide information on how potential customers will react to the price are: the role of money in a society, that price as key- stimulus and the acceptance of the price by customers.

The role of money varies in different cultural areas. Money could be a taboo topic which is not discussed in public. For a given target group moderation could be a sign of poverty and for another group for a sign of cleverness. These attitudes are different from one society to another and they provide information about people's attitudes toward money.

Price is also a key stimulus for a product. Often, the price of a product is associated with its quality even if this combination is not always appropriate. The extent to which the price is a key stimulus for a product is influenced by cultural factors.

Customer acceptance of a price is strongly influenced by the cultural factor. How much is the customer prepared to pay for a product depends on the importance of that product in a given society in a given ethnic group. The same product can enjoy a different importance in different cultures.

In ethno-marketing, we must keep in mind that most likely, customers have different attitudes toward money, and therefore they will react differently and unexpectedly to price policy measures, such as, for example, discounts or coupons.

Ethno-marketing is, as we have seen, a concentration of the efforts of the company on ethnic or cultural minorities in a country through a marketing tailored to their needs. A problem that can arise in applying the principles of ethno-marketing arising from the issue of segmented marketing and refers to the economically necessary dimension of a market segment. Ethnic groups are often only a small percentage of the total population of a country. Profitability should be possible with any target group. However, in many countries, ethno-marketing is not an option due to lack the necessary size of the ethnic groups concerned. On the other hand, market segmentation also means the determination of a segment profile. In ethno-marketing, the drafting of the consumer profile may be a risk. Given that cultural characteristics are difficult to identify, the wrong or superficial knowledge about the attributes and needs of a segment can lead to insufficient communication with the target group.

The issues of ethno-marketing in Romania

The issue of ethno-marketing is important for our country because of the large number of Hungarian and Roma minorities and the possibilities of transforming them into targets of the business activity. We offer you the official statistics regarding the ethnic structure of the Romanian population:

Nationality	2002 Census	**%
Romanian	19.409.400	89,5%
Hungarian	1.434.377	6,6%
Gypsy	535.250	2,5%
German	60.088	0,28%
Ukrainian	61.353	0,28%
Russian	36.397	0,17%
Turks	32.596	0,15%
Tatars	24.137	0,11%
Serbs	22.518	0,10%
Croatian	6.786	under 0,10%
Slovenian	175	under 0,10%
Slovaks	17.199	under 0,10%
Bulgarian	8.025	under 0,10%
Hebrew	5.870	under 0,10%
Czech	3.938	under 0,10%
Polish	3.671	under 0,10%
Greek	6.513	under 0,10%
Armenians	1.780	under 0,10%
Ruthenians	257	under 0,10%
Italian	3.331	under 0,10%
Albanian	477	under 0,10%
Macedonian, slavs etc.	695	under 0,10%
Total	21.698.181

Source: "Minorities in transition - Report on public policies in the field of national and ethnic minorities in Romania", January 2005, Ethno-cultural Diversity Resource Center, http://www.edrc.ro/docs/docs/minoritati_in_tranzitie.pdf

On the other hand, in 2009, 80,000 foreign citizens lived in Romania, of which 54,000 were citizens from outside the European Union, and 24,000 were nationals of EU countries, according to the Romanian Immigration Office (RIO)[5]. In a population of 21,469,959 inhabitants[6] this means a rate of 0.4%. Accurately recording the exact number of foreign citizens in Romania is not easy. We still have no answer to questions such as: With the registered number of foreigners do we cover only the persons with foreign citizenship or do we also include persons with dual citizenship? But what about people who naturalized and only have a Romanian passport? Are they recorded in the statistics as persons with Romanian citizenship, although they preserve the culture of their home country?

Although there are a few Romanian organizations that have implemented ethno-marketing in their strategies, most did not do this. For many companies the concept of ethno-marketing can lead to the first mover advantage in winning the confidence of members of ethnic groups. It is clear that, in the future, in the context of globalization, the concept of ethno-marketing will gain importance in the future with the increase in the foreign population of Romania and of Europe.

Conclusions

To conclude, we reiterate the idea expressing the fact that ethno-marketing represents the principle according to which organizations take into account the needs of ethnic groups and thus target group members feel respected and integrated into the host society. Related to this, in 1979, Herbert Gans introduced the notion of "symbolic ethnicity" a low-level identification based on symbolic structures that represent nostalgia for traditions and which do not involve an intense commitment. Recent marketing research has confirmed this idea. Consumers are now turning more and more to products not only for what they do, but for what they mean. Symbolic significance is more important than mere utility. Because ethnic identity is now something chosen, rather than pre-established, individuals tend to swing between several identities. Thus, we must realize that ethnicity is now most often in the eye of the beholder.

On the other hand, in the current conditions of globalization, we see that talking about ethnicity and addressing a particular ethnic group, in particular through ethno-marketing, is difficult and complicated. Indeed, due to the multiple streams of migrants, ethnic groups were mixed and can be found hidden around the world. Thus, targeting a particular ethnic group is almost the same as finding a needle in the haystack. This is not an issue to be neglected. It is therefore necessary that each organization assesses its opportunities and its capacities of fruition, through an extensive analysis, in the cultural context in which they operate.

References

- Chirade, A., Guezais, C., Marzouk, S., 2008, The Ethno-marketing, course notes MOI (International Operational Marketing), University of Paris X, 1/17.04.2008, http://christophe.benavent.free.fr/IMG/pdf/MOI_2008_Ethnomarketing.pdf
- Pahoncia, A., 2009, "80.000 of foreigners living in Romania", Ziarul Financiar from 5 April 2009, http://www.zf.ro/eveniment/80-000-de-straini-traiesc-in-romania-4160708/
- Páramo, D., 2005, Ethnomarketing, the cultural dimension of marketing, paper accepted for presentation at the 2004 Academy of Marketing Science Cultural Perspectives on Marketing Conference held at the Universidad de las Américas Campus in Puebla, Mexico, published in Pensamiento y Gestión, N°18, Universidad del Norte, pp. 177-206, ISSN 1657-6276, http://ciruelo.uninorte.edu.co/pdf/pensamiento_gestion/18/7_Ethnomarketing.pdf

[5] Pahoncia, A., 2009, "80.000 of foreigners living in Romania", Ziarul Financiar from 5 April 2009, http://www.zf.ro/eveniment/80-000-de-straini-traiesc-in-romania-4160708/

[6] Romanian Statistical Yearbook 2010, National Institute of Statistics, http://www.insse.ro/cms/rw/pages/anuarstatistic2010.ro.do

- Pauwels, M.C., 2006, Marketers as Innovators: how ethnic marketing revisits ethnicity, LISA e-journal, Vol. IV - n°1/2006: Driving Innovation in Anglo-Saxon Economies: Comparative Perspectives, p. 234-254, Electronic ISSN 1762-6153, http://lisa.revues.org/2293
- Van der Schaaf, C., 2008, Ethno marketing is slightly crude, The issue, Erasmus University Rotterdam, http://www.eur.nl/english/news/the_issue/issuearchive/2008/issue_2008_26/
- Waldeck, B., von Gosen, C., Ethno marketing in Germany, paper presented at the 1st International Conference on Strategic Development of the Baltic Sea Region (BSR), Tallinn, Estonia, 25-27 February 2007, http://ikarus.e-technik.fh-kiel.de/bsn42/fileadmin/bsn_ftp/Waldeck_Paper_Ethno_Marketing_6-E.pdf
-  Romanian Statistical Yearbook 2010, National Institute of Statistics, http://www.insse.ro/cms/rw/pages/anuarstatistic2010.ro.do
-  "Minorities in transition - Report on public policies in the field of national and ethnic minorities in Romania", January 2005, Ethno-cultural Diversity Resource Center, http://www.edrc.ro/docs/docs/minoritati_in_tranzitie.pdf

SUSTAINABILITY AND COMPANY'S CORPORATE SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY NEED[1]

MONICA VIOLETA ACHIM [*]
SORIN NICOLAE BORLEA[]

Abstract

The company is a living organism, is an entity and its analysis should be made taking into account the whole system. The company is a dynamic environment, which has as a mainly aims to add value for all participants in the economic life.

In the organizations, the achievement of the concept of sustainable development is achieved through the concept of societal responsibility of the organizations. For this scope we need to use the term introduced by Elkington namely "The Triple Bottom Line" which involve economic prosperity, environmental compliance and improve social cohesion. [11]. So, "The Triple Bottom Line" can be defined as an approach for measuring the overall performance of an organization according to its triple contribution to the three aspects mentioned above.

The new conceptual framework change radically the final aim of a company because it is not anymore maximizing the value of shares held by shareholders, but it is maximizing value for all stakeholders, where shareholders are just another category of stakeholders.

Sustainable development and globalization require new performance standards that exceed the economic field, for both national company and international ones. As a consequence, these standards must be integrated into the company's development strategy, to ensure sustainability of activities carried, by the harmonization of economic, social and environmental objectives.

Keywords: sustainable development, corporate social responsibility, company, economical, social and performances environmental.

Jel Classification: D00, D20, D30, D40, D60

Introduction

The idea that a company has obligations exceeding its economic role is not new. Not infrequently, history shows that organizations producing goods and services were involved in political action, social and / or military, in addition to core activities. Studies have shown that during the nineteenth century, the company has seen a rapid evolution. It is not surprising therefore that in the mid-twentieth century, the corporate social responsibility (CSR) is an object of analysis of some American experts in business management, giving in particular Peter Drucker. In 1970, the economist Milton Friedmann drew the effective value of the corporate social responsibility as being to achieve a profit within the rules of ethics and societal laws. [3]. Moreover, the financial performance does not necessarily provide a firm future because a business can not develop in a world that fails. Voltaire said: "We are not good at anything, when we are good only for ourselves."

In brief, the role of corporate social responsibility might run within 4 main areas of interest as a matrix called "corporate social responsibility matrix", as follows:

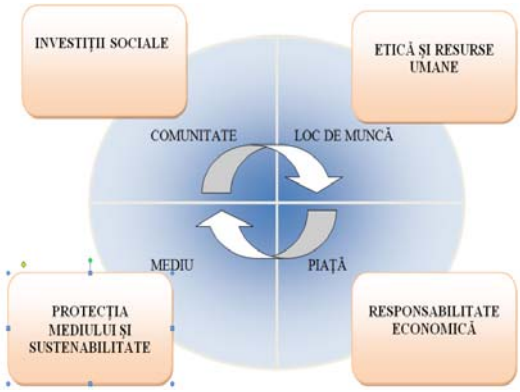
[1] Această lucrare a beneficiat de suport financiar prin proiectul „Studii Post-Doctorale în Economie: program de formare continuă a cercetătorilor de elită – SPODE", contract de finanțare nr. POSDRU/89/1.5/S/61755, proiect finanțat din Fondul Social European prin Programul Operațional Sectorial Dezvoltarea Resurselor Umane 2007-2013"

This work was supported by the project "Post-Doctoral Studies in Economics: training program for elite researchers - SPODE" co-funded from the European Social Fund through the Development of Human Resources Operational Programme 2007-2013, contract no. POSDRU/89/1.5/S/61755

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., „Babes-Bolyai" University, Cluj-Napoca, Romania, (email: monica.achim@econ.ubbcluj.ro).

[]Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Vasile Goldis University, Arad, Romania, email: snborlea@yahoo.com

FIGURE no. 1 CSR MATRIX



Source: Pintea, 2011

The social responsibility means [13] managing a business in a socially responsible manner so that business:

- ✓ To promote ethical practices in employment policy and take an interest in improving working conditions;
- ✓ To be involved in building of a local community and to disclose their actions in this regard;
- ✓ To invest in building of social infrastructure;
- ✓ To contribute to maintaining a clean environment, to its protection and sustainability;
- ✓ To contribute at economic development, broadly, through the activities undertaken.

1. Marks regarding the origins and evolutions of the corporate responsibility concept

The theme of corporate social responsibility has gained a real size only in the early 90's, with a significant acceleration to 2000. The debate on corporate social responsibility concept fits into the global debate on the future of the planet (in the economic, social and environment) around the concept of "sustainable development" formalized by United Nations in 1992, at the World Summit in Rio. The Sustainable Development theme was initiated in 1970 along with publishing of the first report of the Club of Rome entitled "The Limits of Growth"

The Brundtland report (1987), sustainable development is defined as "the current generation capacity to meet the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs".

If before 2000 sustainable development was a theme addressed in macro-economic terms, today it is discussed mainly in terms of micro-economic, at the companies' levels. The sustainable development issue is mainly referring to the large multinational corporations, given the turnover and presence in all countries including those in which human rights or the fight against corruption is not a priority for governments. Sustainable development applied to the corporations and economic entities in general has resulted in the concept of "corporate social responsibility".

Corporate social responsibility (CSR) as a concept is mentioned for the first time in Lisbon (2000). In July 2001 the Commission published the Green Paper "Promoting a European framework for corporate social responsibility", whereby public authorities at all levels, namely: international organizations, enterprises, social partners and all interested persons, are called to are called to "express their opinion on the manner in which to build a partnership to establish a new framework to promote corporate social responsibility, taking into account the interests of both companies and the various parties involved ".

Concretely, European Commission in "Green Paper" defining the concept of social responsibility as "the voluntary integration by companies of social and environmental concerns in their economic activity and the relationship with interest groups". From this definition emerge three fundamental principles:

- Voluntary action of companies;
- Triple approach: economic, social and environmental;
- Align to the corporate interest groups (eng. "stakeholders").
- From this level was launched the concept of "Best Practice" in areas such as:
- lifelong learning;
- work organization;
- equality;
- social inclusion.

2000 Lisbon Agenda calls for the involvement of companies in achieving the targets set for the future of Europe, in anticipation of 2013. In the new economic and social space of the beginning of XXI century, the company / firm is the most dynamic force of the new institutions of market economy [12]. Effectiveness companies will no longer be measured only in terms of economic performance, which are directly influenced by the s social and environmental approach. Operation in long-term competitiveness in the context of an increasingly globalize economy challenge the company to develop strategies and policies to ensure the business transformation in an environmentally and socially responsible business.

The European Commission Communication of 03.23.2006 "Making Europe a pole of excellence in corporate social responsibility" emphasize the fact that corporate social responsibility (CSR) "become a more and more important concept in the world". European Commission's 2006 Communication is also a basis for achieving the objectives set by the Lisbon Agenda for the period 2007 to 2013.

2. Factors that have led to need for social responsibility

The current interest for CSR is the result of a set of factors that are contributing to increased attention to RSE, such as:

Globalization - with important consequences for cross-border trade of multinationals and world-class supply networks - raises, in the CSR, many more concerns, mainly in practical human resource management, environmental protection, health and safety.

Multinational companies based in developed countries, but producing and buying materials raw in/from developing countries, use the enterprises from these countries as sub-suppliers of material resources and cheap labor. The involvement of multinational companies in developing welfare policy, environmental protection and workers rights in developing countries is expression of their responsible behavior, but also a challenge to reduce pressures in countries of origin of multinationals, by reducing the cost competition. [9].

Thus, globalization is an accelerated process of economic integration, whose consequences are reflected on sustainable development and that call for the big companies to introduce of social corrective in their work.

Increase the frequency of cycles of growth and economic decline after the Second World War, culminating in the great financial scandals of the early 21 century.

General climate of trust in the predictability of economic events that characterized the growth period after World War II, was replaced in the last 30 years by an increase in the frequency of cycles of growth and economic decline, which contributes to create an impression of uncertainty, unfavorable corporations.

Early 21st century was tumultuous in terms of global financial and economic life, which is shaken by multiple financial scandals generated by bankruptcies of a large corporations that have occurred since 2001 (energy group Enron Corporation) and continuing with 2002 (WorldCom, Qwest Communications, Adelphi, Global Crossing, Nortel, Parmalat).

Series bankruptcy crisis started with the spectacular giant energy group Enron Corporation, WorldCom will (most significant bankruptcy in U.S. history), Tyco International, Qwest, Xerox, Lehman Brothers, American suite, Vivendi Universal, Ahold and Parmalat in Europe. [4].

In this context, corporations are forced to restructure in depth how to act, become unsatisfactory to investors and shareholders whose number is growing. The role of multinational companies is now a complex one these are players with full responsibilities in the social landscape.

Shift from physical production-centered economic model based on exploitation, pursuing individual interests, towards the sustainable development model, centered on intangible assets, focusing on quality of life, resource conservation, the interests of society as a whole.

Just as the welfare of a country is no longer measured only by GDP but also in terms of education, health, freedom of expression, the income distribution, in the same way the state of an economic entity is no longer assessed solely by financial results. Much of the company's capital is founded today more on people's intelligence and less on infrastructure. It's about image, mark, about the shift from quantity to quality.

Increased transparency of the economic environment along with global increased of information flows through development of new technologies and especially TIC. Information about unethical attitudes of a company can be known not only at home, allowing more rapid intervention parties.

The evolution of information technologies, that can exchange information in real time at low cost has enabled a growing number of people have access to information and ask for more transparency in the conduct of business. Consumer type passive receiver (consumer-client) gives way to an active subject who wants to critically consume (consumer-citizen) who wants to know which are the social costs of the products and services they consume. [2].

Increasing the role of opinion society in landscape view of economic life

Opinion society is characterized by so-called phenomenon NIMBY (from engl. "Not In My BackYard") [10].

This phenomenon refers to the opposition shown to the projects of common interest that may affect human life's quality. The phenomenon is characterized by a local aspect of reactions such as local reaction to the installation of a factory, to a new infrastructure, etc.. It is characterized by individualism, a high community spirit and includes claims population to participate directly, actively, to make decisions. NIMBY phenomenon reveals extensive implications in democratic societies: finding a balance between private and general interests, which is possible only through transparency and open discussion with social actors.

Last but not least, public opinion greatly influences the attractiveness of the company, ability to attract human resources. Human resource managers found that the younger generation is very sensitive in terms of corporate values and they take it into account as criteria in choosing a job. In case of less attractive sectors where recruitment is difficult, any defamation that could stain the corporate reputation is a fundamental risk

The above is added the great social and economic disparities world, the warming of the planet phenomenon, more frequent periods of financial and political instability.

The balance between developing new global economic structure and people's expectations is a first contributing factor of the global trend towards a greater awareness of Social Responsibility, primarily for large companies , usually and then for domestic enterprises, including SME's.

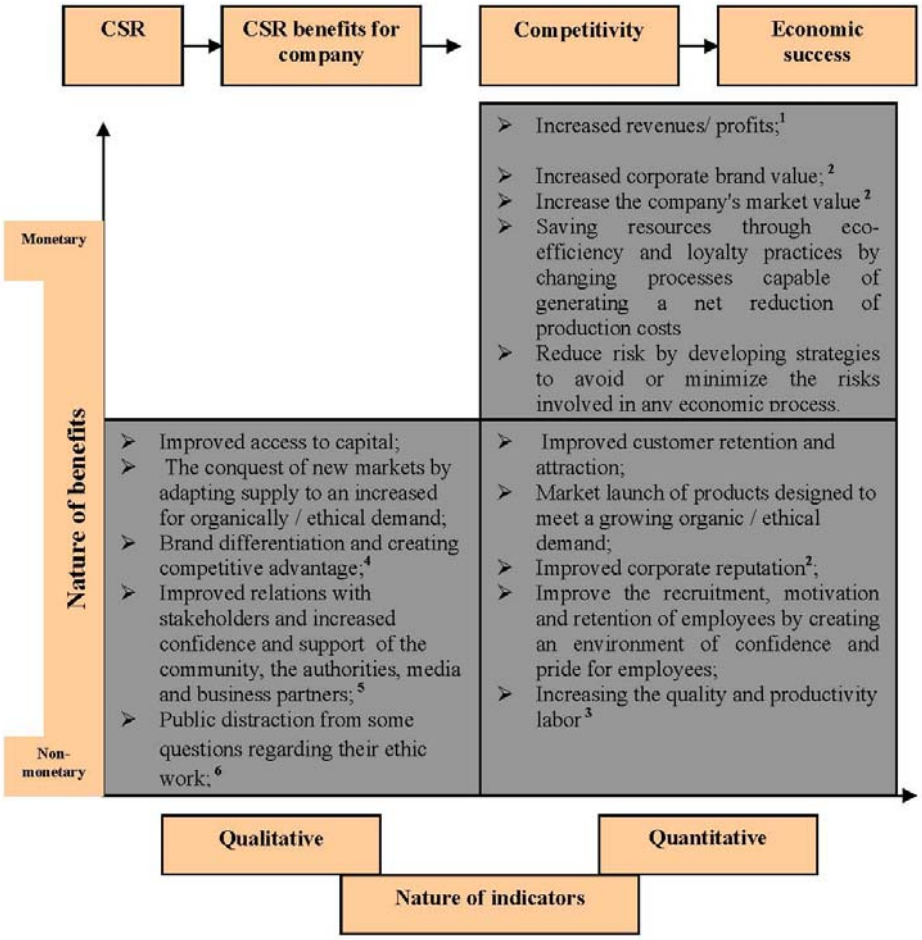
In the new economic and social space of the beginning of XXI century, the company / enterprise has become the most dynamic force of the new institutions of market economy. [12]

United Nations Global Pact, - through its 10 principles based on fundamental documents, calls the enterprises, on their leaders, to adopt, to promote and to be granted a human rights, labor standards, the environment and fight against corruption fundamental values set. In this context more and more European companies have promoted strategies on corporate social responsibility (CSR) as response to social, economic and environmental pressures. Strategies aim was to send a signal to everyone involved with these companies interacts.

3. CSR benefits for companies

The benefits of defining and implementing a corporate social responsibility (CSR) strategy, for the company, may vary depending on the area and the local or global community in which company operates. However, in all cases, The benefits of such implementations are appearing on medium and long term (over 3-5 years). Exceptions are companies whose brand is already known in the community or target market.

Figura No. 2 CSR BENEFITS FOR COMPANY



Source: adapting after Weber, 2008

[1] First of all, among the effects of implementation CSR in companies, there are traced the financial effects (quantitative and monetary), in areas as: increase income, decrease costs and increase profits. Numerous scientific studies come to support this hypothesis:

A study of IBE (Institute for Business Ethics) has shown, by calculating financial and corporate responsibility indicators, that 'ethical' companies generated a net superior value added and a profits on average 18% higher than other companies [20];

Moreover, a large number of analysis and empirical studies analyzing the effect of environmental performance on financial performance (Lapalnte & Lano, 1994, Lano et al., 1998, Konar & Cohen, 2001, Khanna & Damon, 1999) and theoretical results indicate either a positive or negative connection. Konar and Cohen (2001) have shown significant positive effect of good environmental performance, measured by toxic emissions on the value of intangible assets of firms.

Similarly, Austin et al. (1999) demonstrated that good environmental performance, expressed through various measures (eg. toxic emissions) positively influence the rates of return on equity. In accordance with the above-mentioned studies, Hart and Ahuja (1996) showed that the degrease of emission level results in a better financial performance, based on accounting information for a period of two years and Filbeck and Gorman (2004) by comparing for a period of three years the revenues to the penalties related to the environment, show a positive link between financial and environmental performance.

A study conducted in 1997 by DePaul University - Chicago found that those companies that have defined a social involvement towards the ethical principles strategy have financial benefits (based on the annual sales / revenues) more better than companies that do not involve themselves in this direction .[21]

A study over a period of 11 years conducted by Harvard University found that companies that act as social partners in the market had a growth rate of 4 times and 8 times higher when increasing the number of employees were compared with companies that are focused only on their business and profit.. [21].

[2] A survey conducted in year 2000 by the prestigious company Burson-Marsteller in three most important European markets: Britain, Germain and France attends to the followings results [18].

- 66 % of opinion leaders were interviewed strongly agreed that business involment in the community will matter greatly in the future;

- 64 % of opinion leaders surveyed were strongly agree that a company's reputation will affect their decisions as legislators, decision factors, journalists and investors;

- 42 % of opinion leaders were interviewed strongly agreed that corporate social responsibility will influence a company's share price in the future.

[3] Experts from Business for Social Responsibility said that "the company's efforts to improve working conditions, reducing environmental impact and increase employee involvement in decision making, most often leads to increased productivity and reduced error rate. "For example, companies that invest in improving working conditions and good practice with providers often reveals that decreases the number of scrap or raw material that is damaged and can not lead to a quality product that is sold.

[4] In this increasingly crowded market, companies seek to define new competitive advantages that could separate from the competition in the consumer's mind. Studies conducted in European countries showed that a reputation for integrity and business practices represents an important image capital in defining competitive advantage. Moreover, the chances of winning EU funds increase substantially by respecting what the Council of Europe has defined as corporate social involvement

[5] Types strategies and initiatives CSR help the company to increase confidence and support of the community, the authorities, media and business partners. Community will be significantly more favorable towards a brand which are perceive as involved in its development or in improve their living conditions. Authorities are always interested in identifying the partners which participate in sustainable development of the community but also to help lower the budget financial effort to improve living conditions of a community. The media is the basic support to popularize CSR strategies. Many companies want their brands association with a strong brand and therefore CSR initiatives contribute greatly to increasing the visibility and thus the power of a brand.

[6] Corporations can use CSR profile programs in an effort to divert public attention from some ethical questions targeting their activities. Examples of such companies are in the areas of cigarette manufacturers and in companies which produce environmentally hazardous waste.

Conclusions

The adoption of social responsibility in business occurs in response to strong economic pressures, social, legislative push corporate activity, the industrial revolutions that marked the world economy, culminating with the economic crises. Corporate social responsibility (CSR) is in fact a complementary and effective agreement between business and society in which they operate. CSR is defined by how businesses align their values and expectations with the needs and requirements of the society where we include - not only customers or investors, but also their employees, suppliers, community, legislators, special interest groups, with other words, society as a whole. CSR is in fact, the extent to which business is committed to match the expectations of society. CSR is a concept very generous, and has begun to change the world we live. Society today is interested in both the financial performance of companies and the way they do their business. In this context, an increasing number of companies adopt, as part of organizational culture and business strategy, the corporate social responsibility.

CSR's key points include business management, supply chain, environmental protection standards on relationships with employees, and the community that we are part, human rights and social equity. CSR is not merely the fulfillment of a debt against the society; it can bring a real competitive advantage. Thus, through an effective social responsibility, companies can benefit from these advantages: optimization of opportunities of access to capital, improving brand image, increase sales, attract, retain, motivate and develop employees, improve decision making, improve risk management and reduce costs.

The approach of corporate governance to ensure maximum satisfaction on social needs, must address the following participants in economic life (stakeholders)

- Corporate Governance, achieving social objectives should be applied first at the level of corporate governance structures by: ensuring the independence of directors and managers at different organizational levels, respect shareholder rights, transparency of information, an efficient, transparent and independent internal audit and control system.
- Customers: the link cost-effectiveness-satisfaction, correct and timely information, ethics and balanced contractual relationships;
- Employees: jobs, work motivation (bonuses, promotion), health and safety conditions at work;
- Creditors: timely payment of credit and interest rates;
- Providers: ethical and fair contractual relationship;
- State: timely payment of state taxes and fees, environmental protection, respect for law;
- General public: creation of new jobs, local market development, healthy environment, sponsorships.

In conclusion, we can assess corporate social responsibility as "an obligation freely assumed by a firm, beyond the legal obligations or restrictions imposed by economic, to pursue long term goals are for the benefit of society" [14].

The advantages of CSR have been seen and will be taken increasingly on the future by more and more companies which are interested in a long-term strategy and an investment that brings benefits not only the image and confidence level but also at sales, all leading to the identity of a smart and healthy organization.

References

- Journal Articles :
  - Austin D., Alberini A., Videras J. (1999), is there a link between a firm's Environmental and Financial Performance?, presented at NBER Summer Institute Public Economisc Workshop: Public Policy and the Environment, Cambridge, MA, August 2, 1999;
  - Bianchini M., Perché alle organizzazioni del XXI secolo si chiede di essere Socialmente Responsabili? In che modo possono realizzare un comportamento etico e come possonocomunicarlo?, 2004, Disponibil pe Web http://www.itconsult.it/knowledge/articoli/pdf/;
  - Ciuca V., Lincaru C, Atanasiu D (2009), Social Responsability of Entreprise

-Factor of Sustainable Development. Possibilities of Measuring, The 33 rd Annual ARA Congress, Sibiu;

- Feleaga, N. (2006) „Financial crises at the turn of XX and XXI centuries and corporate guvernance", Revue of Theoretical and Applied Economies, nr. 9/2006, available on-line at http://www.ectap.ro/articol.php?id=156&rid=9;
- Filbeck G, Gorman R. (2004), The relationship between the Environmental and Financial Performance of Public Utilities, Environmental and Resource Economics, 29, pg. 137-154.
- Friedmann M. (1970), The Social Responsibility of Business is to increase its profits, The New York Times Magazin, p1-6
- Hart S., Ahuja G. (1996), Does it Pay to be Green? An Empirical Examination of the Relationship between reduction and Firm Performance, Business Strategy and the Environment, 5(1), pg. 30-37.
- Konar S., Cohen M. (2001), Doers the market values Environmental Performance?, Review of Economics and Statistics, 83(2), pg. 281-289.
- Mironiuc M. (2009), Analiza financiară versus analiza extra-financiara in măsurarea performantelor intreprinderii durabile, Supliment of Theoretical and applied economics Revue, Bucharest.
- Nicu I-A, Integrarea responsabilității sociale în sistemele de management a corporațiilor, http://www.scribd.com/doc/54777621/Responsabilitate-Sociala ;
- Pesqueux Y. (2002), Organisations: modeles et representations, Presses Universitaires de France, Collection Gestion, Paris, pg. 397 ;
- Porter Michael E., (1985) Competitive Advantage: Creating and Sustaining Superior Performance, Publisher: Simon&Schuster ş
- Pintea M (2011) Companies' performances in the context of sustainable development, Publish House Risoprint, Cluj-Napoca;
- Robbins S.P., Coulter M., "Management", Prentice-Hall International Inc., New Jersey, USA, 1996;
- Sacconi L., Dobbiamo chiedere alle imprese di essere socialmente responsabili? E se sì,come?, CELE, 2003Laplante B., Lanoie P. (1994), The Market response to Environmental Incidents in Canada: A Theoretical and Empirical Analysis, Southern Economic Journal, 60(3), pg. 657-672;
- Khanna M., Damon L. (1999), EPA's Voluntary 33/50 Program: Impact on Toxic Releases and Economic Performance of Firms, Journal of Environmental Economics and Management, 37 (1), pg. 1-25;
- Tabără N., Horomnea E., Nută M., Dicu R., (2007), Considerații privind performanța globală a întreprinderii, Contabilitatea, expertiza şi auditul afacerilor, No. 8;
- Stihi L, Covas L, Solcan A., (2011), Company's increasing performances social responsability programmes towards employees, Review of General Management, no. 1/2011 available at http://www.managementgeneral.ro/pdf/1_2011_16.pdf ;
- Weber M. (2008), The Business Case for Corporate Social Responsibility: A Company – Level Measurement Approach for CSR, European Management Journal, Vol. 26, Issue 4, Pergamon-Elsevier Science Ltd., Amsterdam, Netherlands, p.250 ;
- Webley, S. More E. (2008), "Does Ethics Pay?", Ethics and Financial Performance, IBE Publications, /www.ibe.org) ;
- Corporate social responsibility – definitions, assumptions, study conducted by Human Resource Romania, presented on www.myjob.ro
-

- Internet:
  - www.bsr.org
  - www.bitc.org.uk
  - www.developpement-durable.net
  - www.rapports-developpementdurable.org
  - www.csr-romania.ro
  - www.responsabilitatesociala.ro

INVESTMENT IDEAS IN A VOLATILE ENVIRONMENT - A STUDY CASE FOR THE 2012 SOCIETY

VERONICA ADRIANA POPESCU[*]
GHEORGHE N. POPESCU[]
CRISTINA RALUCA POPESCU[]

Abstract
The year 2011 has proven to be a highly volatile year, especially if we take into account the Eurozone crisis. Even so, the year 2011 has proved to be a year in which great opportunities were created, as well.
Our article "Investment Ideas in a Volatile Environment - A Study Case for the 2012 Society" starts by presenting both the strong and the weak points of the year 2011, in terms of assets markets and net results, continuing with the general outlook of the year 2012 and putting a strong emphasis on the investment ideas for 2012.
In our study we are going to describe the opportunities that exist in the year 2012, providing answers to questions such as: what equities should investors focus on, what changes can be predicted in terms of foreign exchange market, what will the evolution of the commodities be like, how will the evolution of different types of currencies look like.

Keywords: investments, volatile environment, economic crisis, emerging markets, value, global turmoil.

Introduction

In our opinion the issues concerning the investment process should be more present in our plans, perspectives and minds, especially in times of crisis than in times of wealth and growth. It is our belief that the best opportunities arise during the recession and during the crises period than otherwise.

Starting from this particular assumption, our paper focuses, in the first part on the literature review concerning the terms "investment", "investing", "asset", and how should investment decisions best function. The paper continues with the investigation of the decisions that were taken in 2011, in terms of investments, market development and financial perspectives. Furthermore, we have stated that a volatile environment is a place in which individuals should take more risks, find better opportunities and invest accordingly. That is the main reason why, after closely investigating the marketplace, in terms of economic, financial, and accounting perspectives, we have presented fields in which is better to invest in during the year 2012.

What is the field that the paper covers?

The paper covers the field of investments, and takes into consideration the evolution of the year 2011 in terms of economic perspectives. Also, the paper refers to the new opportunities that the year 2012 brings with it, in terms of economic, financial and accounting views.

What is the importance of the subject chosen and what are its main objectives?

The subject that we have chosen in terms of debate is extremely important and keeps its validity in all times and places. Its objectives are to show the relevance of the terms investment, investing and assents, than to describe the pros and cons of the year 2011 in terms of investments, and to show to possible investors which are the key points of the year 2012 and its strong parts.

[*] Associate Professor, Ph. D., Academy of Economic Studies, Bucharest, Romania, (email: popescu_va@yahoo.com).
[] Professor, Ph. D., Academy of Economic Studies, Bucharest, Romania, (email: popescu_gh_cafr@yahoo.com).
[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., University of Bucharest, Romania, (email: email: popescu_cr@yahoo.com).

What are the methods and means that we are going to use in order to conduct our study?

Our study presents in a critical manner the issues on investment, investing and assets, in turbulent times, such as the times of crisis. The article is a theoretical inquiry in this respect.

Which is the state of research in the field and in terms of literature review?

The subject of investments is an extremely complex one, and there are a lot of studies in this matter. What makes this paper extremely useful for academics and researchers is the comparison between the years 2011 and 2012 in the matter of investments, and the key points in which one should invest in during the year 2012, aspects which are clearly presented and explained. Moreover, the literature review part that comes next will underline the importance of investment in nowadays society.

Literature review

Our belief, in our position of research economists, is that nowadays one of the most important and interesting phenomenon is being represented by the way investment decisions are being taken. Investment, as a complex and all mighty fact represents at present the sacrifice that individuals make for future benefits. While deciding upon what one should invest in, each one of us has in mind different aspects, according to the knowledge that one has, interests, expectations, and so on. Of course, the investment decisions are influenced by their fundamental factors, but the aspects that we have in mind while investing are not really easily determined and quantifiable. For example, another factor is the biasness of any investor to their investment, biasness that depends on the cognition and emotions, because some investors use them as heuristic for the investment decision instead of fundamentals, as stated in their work by Amir and Ganzach (1998), Pompian (2006), Peltonen et.al (2009), Kuzmina (2010).

Our research is based on the terms "investment", "investing", "asset", and due to this fact we consider that it is very good to start our inquiry with the explanation of these terms and what we mean when we use them here.

The first term that we stop at is the term "investment". According to the site www.investopedia.com, an investment is an asset or item that is purchased with the hope that it will generate income or that will be appreciated in the future. Taking into consideration the economic sense of an investment, we might say that it is the purchase of goods that are not consumed today but are used in the future to create wealth. The term investment is also used in the field of finance, where an investment is a monetary asset purchased with the idea that the asset will provide income in the future or appreciate and be sold at a higher price.

In order to be clearer, we will refer to some examples, as follows www.investopedia.com:

A situation that refers to the building of a factory used to produce goods and the investment one makes by going to college or university are both examples of investments in the economic sense.

A situation in which we refer to the purchase of bonds, stocks or real estate property, is in fact the financial sense investments include.

We would like to emphasize the fact that the expressions "making an investment" and "speculating" are different in terms of meaning. In this particular matter, investing usually involves the creation of wealth whereas speculating is often a zero-sum game; wealth is not created. Another defining characteristic is the one referring to speculators, who are often making informed decisions, speculation cannot usually be categorized as traditional investing.

The second term that we consider very important in our research process is "investing". According to www.investopedia.com, "investing" is the act of committing money or capital to an endeavor (a business, project, real estate, etc.) with the expectation of obtaining an additional income or profit. "Investing" also can include the amount of time you put into the study of a prospective company, especially since time is money. Good investing refers not only to the simple process of putting some money into an economic process and wait for results; it refers to investing them properly and wisely.

The third term to which we refer to in our paper is "asset". According to the same source quoted above (www.investopedia.com), the term "asset" has to possible meanings, such as:

A resource with economic value that an individual, corporation or country owns or controls with the expectation that it will provide future benefit.

A balance sheet item representing what a firm owns.

In this matter, the term "asset" focuses on the following issues:

Assets are bought to increase the value of a firm or benefit the firm's operations. You can think of an asset as something that can generate cash flow, regardless of whether it's a company's manufacturing equipment or an individual's rental apartment.

In the context of accounting, assets are either current or fixed (non-current). Current means that the asset will be consumed within one year. Generally, this includes things like cash, accounts receivable and inventory. Fixed assets are those that are expected to keep providing benefit for more than one year, such as equipment, buildings and real estate.

Investing in times of economic crisis – an economic perspective

Firstly our intent, at the beginning of this part of our article, is to present first both the strong and the weak points of the year 2011, in terms of assets markets and net results (see, in this matter, Table no. 1: "The year's 2011 economic evolution – pros and cons"). We consider extremely important to shortly review the year's 2011 economic evolution, because we feel very confident that the crisis, in some ways, also created opportunities for investors, in general. Starting from these ideas, the year 2011 turned out to be a highly volatile year, particularly because of the Eurozone crisis. We consider that the asset markets performed reasonably well during some months, but there were also saw some big dips, especially in August 2011. Moreover, the net result of that did create opportunity in the sense that stock markets are now at levels that do seem to offer value.

Table no. 1: "The year's 2011 economic evolution – pros and cons"

The year's 2011 economic evolution, in terms of assets markets and net results
Weak Points	Strong Points
The great uncertainty brought by the Eurozone crisis.	The Euro crisis is just a part of the global crisis, but it is generally known that all the crisis have brought also good aspects as well.
The potential turmoil in the Middle East.	The currency fluctuation provides new perspectives of investment, on long term.
Furthermore, the American market will continue to grow, but at a slow rate.	In the case in which Euro goes down, the investments can focus on the US dollar, causing benefits on that market.
Moreover, emerging markets will continue to	The emergent markets offer new perspectives grow but at a slow rate.	in terms of economic, financial, accounting market.

By contrast, peripheral Europe will remain rather weak.	Some countries in Europe, such as Germany, which has a strong economy, maintain her privileged statue no matter what.
The effect of that on a market where both stocks and many credits start the year at fairly reasonable valuations means opportunity exists but it is likely to be volatile.	The investments should be done in terms of prudent decisions and in strong countries or regions.

Source: the authors

In terms of erratic investor behavior, it is for sure correct if we state the fact that the year 2011 has been a period of a lot of uncertainty and the data presented in the table above strengthens all these ideas (see, in this matter, Table no. 1: "The year's 2011 economic evolution – pros and cons").

Nowadays, due to this ongoing uncertainty, planning the investment strategies in this challenging environment is a must, and furthermore, our article presents some top investment ideas for 2012, that could prove very useful.

Secondly, another main interest for us concerning this article referred to some top investment ideas for the year 2012 (https://infocus.credit-suisse.com) (see, in this matter, Table no. 2: "Key investment ideas for 2012").

Table no. 2: "Key investment ideas for 2012"

Key investment ideas for 2012
The fixed income sector
The first investment idea	Refers to investing in a diversified basket of core corporates, which are those companies with credit that looks attractive at the current price. Here, specialists usually recommend 70 percent of investment grade names and 30 percent top high yield issuers, in order to have the right combination.
The second investment idea	Takes into account emerging market semi or quasi-government bonds. In this matter, some examples could be: less risky ones are the Korean bonds; more risky are the Chinese, Indonesian and Russian bonds.
The equities sector
The third investment idea	Takes into consideration the high dividend stocks which are favored in 2012. At this particular point, there are some good quality corporate names which are typically supported by substantial cash on the balance sheet and good potential to keep growing.
The fourth investment idea	Puts an accent on having some covered call writing strategies, which are option strategies where investors get a premium in respect of a stock that they currently hold. Also, another solution is that they can also be implemented through investing in funds or structured products.
The currency market sector: the foreign exchange market
The fifth investment idea	Takes into consideration the perspectives of diversifying the traditional currencies into Asian currencies and the Yen, which could go even stronger.

The sixth investment idea	Refers to enlarging furthermore the currencies investment option, and start focusing also on the Chinese Renminbi, which does tend to trend upwards and is becoming easier to invest in over time.
The commodity market
The seventh investment idea	Highlights the great potential that lies nowadays on value commodities, those commodities where the price has fallen to a level that looks attractive. An example is the one of some of the industrial metals such as copper. Investing in gold is clearly a good opportunity for investment, especially in uncertain times.
The real estate sector
The eight investment idea	Takes into account the real estate perspective of investing in order to generate income. In this area specialists tend to recommend either exposure via collective investments where the price has come down a bit or, for specialist investors who have access to direct real estate investments, commercial opportunities exist in some markets including Australia, Singapore, parts of the US, parts of Latin America, as well as parts of Germany and France.

Source: the authors

Conclusions

In terms of conclusions, we have imagined to possible scenarios, with two possible settings in respect to solutions:

Scenario no. 1: The Eurozone crisis goes out of control: In the context in which the Eurozone crises really were to go out of control, then the euro would weaken a lot more than any scenario made until now. In consideration to this, some new and more interesting options would suggest to invest on the dollar or Yen. In this context, also buying Australian dollar long-dated sovereign bonds would prove to be a very good idea because if things do go wrong the world economy will be bad, commodity prices will come down and while that is bad for the Australian economy, it is good for Australian bonds. The recommended solution would be the one of hedging those into US dollars.

Scenario no. 2: The Eurozone crisis goes better, or anyway as predicted: In the case of a better evolution of the Euro crisis bonds and in the case in which high debt countries were to perform well, than it would be recommended to invest in Italian and Spanish bonds, for example.

Our study is useful both to academics and researchers, but also has its limitations, concerning the economic, financial and accounting field. We would suggest in the future, as a perspective for further investigation and research, to take each of the points recommended above as investment opportunities, and see their real value at the end of the year 2012, or at the beginning of the year 2013.

References

- Amir, E., & Ganzach, Y. (1998). Overreaction and under reaction in analysts' forecasts. Journal of Economic Behavior & Organization 37, 333-347.

- Kuzmina, J. (2010). Emotion's component of expectations in financial decision making. Baltic Journal of Management, 5(3), 295-306.
- Peltonen, T. A., Sousa, R. M., & Vansteenkiste, I. S. (2009). Fundamentals, Financial Factors and the Dynamics of Investment In Emerging Markets. JEL classification.
- Pompian, M. M. (2006). Behavioral Finance and Wealth Management. Canada: John Wiley & Sons, Inc., Hoboken.
-  Consumer Decision-Making in Retail Investment Services: A Behavioral Economics Perspective, Final Report, November 2010
-  http://www.investopedia.com/terms/i/investment.asp#axzz1mHj7SvZU
-  https://infocus.credit-suisse.com/

THE BONUS-MALUS SYSTEM MODELLING USING THE TRANSITION MATRIX

SANDRA TEODORESCU*

Abstract

The motor insurance is an important branch of non-life insurance in many countries; in some of them, coming first in total premium income category (in Romania, for example).

The Bonus-Malus system implementation is one of the solutions chosen by the insurance companies in order to increase the efficiency in the motor insurance domain. This system has been recently introduced by the Romanian insurers as well.

In this paper I present the means for modelling the bonus-malus system using the transition matrix.

Keywords: Bonus-Malus, system, Romanian Bonus-Malus system, transition matrix, motor insurance.

Introduction

One of the most important problems in the Romanian insurance market is the increase in damages.

Car insurance is part of the general insurances activity and has an important share in terms of revenues, in the specific markets from Romania and from abroad. Even more, it is estimated that over 75% of the paid damages by the Romanian insurance companies are caused by the motor segment.

Dominating the portfolio of most of the composite insurance or of the general insurance companies, with increased rates which have maintained above 25%, in the last 5 years, the auto insurance can be denominated, without any doubt, a running "engine" for the Romanian insurance market. Its dominating position leads to a higher risk of market destabilization.

In Romania, the auto insurance segment has the largest market share (57%), setting the market trend and having a constant increase, against a background of:

- increase in the number of cars;
- increase in the auto park value;
- increase in the number of car accidents;
- increase of the damages rate;
- increase of the repair tariffs;
- the road infrastructure is the same.

The traffic indiscipline, the increased tariffs of the auto services, the emergence of more and more refined methods of defrauding the insurance companies and the climatic conditions that undergo a continuous change exert a great influence over the damages amount of the Motor Hull insurance segment.

Against this background, the necessity to modify the calculation system of the individual level of the bonus for the Motor Hull insurance emerged, considering the fact that the driver is the guilty party for causing an accident in most of the cases, and not the car. Thus, in setting a bonus one should consider the insured person profile: age, legal status, residence locality, driver's license duration, destination, the frequency and manner of car usage and also the driver's conduct in traffic. At the same time, one should not overlook the car features: the brand, the model, the original value, age, technical features (power, cylindrical capacity etc.), the additional gear and the safety systems.

* Associate Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Economic Sciences, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: tsandra@xnet.ro).

With the renewal of the auto park, the number of Motor Hull policies concluded by the insurance companies increases, as well.

The majority of the companies that subscribe to the Motor Hull policy are in search of new solutions to limit the effect of the damages dualities. Some of the solutions chosen by the insurance companies in order to cut costs on the auto segment are the deductible franchise, the implementation of the Bonus-Malus system (reward and punishment) and the use of independent systems of the costs calculation.

Definitions and remarks

Definition 1.

The Bonus-Malus system can be defined as an auto insurance system which requires the payment of a more substantial premium by the ones who are affected by damages, and a premium reduction for those who do not have undesired road events.

Malus (penalization) represents the fraction between the bonus collected by the insurer for a year of Motor Hull and the total paid or due to be paid (for damages which are about to be solved) damages by the insurer in that year. Depending on the value of that fraction, the bonus for the next year will increase up to 50%.

Bonus (reward) represents the decrease of the premium with percentages between 0- 50% and is granted for consecutive years of damage free Motor Hull.

Remark 1.

The Malus can be simple or, in many cases, a few times higher than the value of the insurance premium, depending on the insurance companies established criteria.

Another definition of the Bonus-Malus system, this time in mathematical terms, is presented below [4].

Let`s assume that, for a certain type of insurance, there is a number of rating levels J, numbered from 1 to J. In the first year of the insurance, any policy is placed in a starting level j. A policy remains in a certain rating level over a period of an insurance year. For the i class, the insurance premium will be P(i).

If a policy that is in the i rating level had during the course of the year r damages, then at the end of the year it will be transfered into the C (i,r) rating level. The C function defines transitions rules from one rating level to the other for the Bonus-Malus system. The rating levels have the following property: if k>1 then the k level is „better", having a smaller premium, so $P(k) \le P(i)$.

So, the principal purpose of this system is that the „good" risks arrive in the high levels (of Bonus), and the „bad" risks in the lower levels (of Malus).

Definition 2.

In conclusion the Bonus-Malus system can be defined by the triplet (C,i,P), made up by the bonus elements. The (C,j) pair forms the bonus rules. The bonus elements must verify the conditions:

the P function is decreasing the C(i,r) function is increasing in i (for a fixed r) and decreasing in r (for a fixed i).

Below are presented definitions and some basic properties of Markov chains. The purpose of these definitions is to model the Bonus-Malus system.

Definition 3.

A stochastic process $X = \{X_t, t \in \mathbf{N}\}$ in discrete time is called a (first order) Markov chain if for all $j, i, i_{t-1}, ..., i_0 \in E$, where E is the state space of the Markov chain.

$$P\left(X_{t+1} = j \middle| X_t = i,\ X_{t-1} = i_{t-1},\ ..., X_0 = i_0\right) = P\left(X_{t+1} = j \middle| X_t = i\right)$$

The probability

$$p_{ij}(t) = P\left(X_{t+1} = j \middle| X_t = i\right) \tag{1}$$

is called (one step) transition probability. The matrix is called transition matrix or matrix of transition probabilities. It is a stochastic matrix, since all rows sum to one.

$$P(t) = \left(p_{ij}(t)\right) \tag{2}$$

The probabilities

$$p_{ij}^{(r)}(t) = P\left(X_{t+r} = j \middle| X_t = i\right) \tag{3}$$

are called r-step transition probabilities, in particular, $p_{ij}(t) \equiv p_{ij}^{(1)}(t)$. Similarly, the matrix is called r- step transition matrix.

$$P^{(r)}(t) = \left(p_{ij}^{(r)}(t)\right) \tag{4}$$

Remark 2.

The probability (1) could be translate in insurance terms thus: the probability of the insured placed in the i rating level, in the t year, to pass into the j rating level, the next year.

The probability (4) could be translate in insurance terms thus: the probability of the insured that was placed in the i rating level, in the t year, to pass after r years, into the j rating level.

Definition 4.

In probability theory and statistics, the Poisson distribution is a discrete probability distribution that expresses the probability of a number of events occurring in a fixed period of time if these events occur with a known average rate and independently of the time since the last event. Such a variable represents the number of damages during the validity of the policy , wich in non-life insurance is equal or less than one year.

If $N \square\ Poisson(\lambda),\ \lambda > 0$, then

$$p_x = P(N = x) = e^{-\lambda}\frac{\lambda^x}{x!}, \quad x \in \mathbf{N} \tag{5}$$

The Poisson distribution is often used in practice, in case of the frequency of damages, thanks both to its simplicity and to its good properties such as aditivity: if $N_i \sim Poisson(\lambda_i), i = 1,2$, are independent, then $N_1 + N_2 \sim Poisson(\lambda_1 + \lambda_2)$.

Definition 5.

The process $N(t)$ is a Poisson process if for some intensity $\lambda > 0$, the increments of the process have the following property:

$$N(t+r) - N(t) \sim \text{Poisson}(\lambda r) \tag{6}$$ for all $t > 0, r > 0$ and each history $N(s), s \le t$.

As a result, a Poisson process has the following properties:

as increments are independent: if the intervals $(t_i, t_i + r_i), i = 1,2,...$, are disjoint, then the increments $N(t_i + r_i) - N(t_i)$ are independent;

the increments are stationary: $N(t+r) - N(t)$ is $\text{Poisson}(\lambda r)$ distributed for every value of t.

Remark 3.

Frequently a Poisson distribution is used to model the transition probabilities within a Bonus-Malus system [1]. To be more specific, the Poisson distribution describes the number of claims for an individual and the transition probabilities are determined from this claim frequency distribution. Hence, the number of claims in each year is a $\text{Poisson}(\lambda)$ variable and the probability of a year with one or more claims equals $p = 1 - e^{-\lambda}$.

Some examples of a Bonus-Malus system. The Romanian Model.

The Bonus-Malus system determines a total different conduct from the actual behavior of the Romanian insured. The percentage of the Motor Hull insured that were compensated in the course of a year, in our country is over 50%, the damages ranging between minor scratches and broken rear mirrors.

In the countries where the Bonus-Malus system has been developed, this type of damages are usually solved by the insured on his expenses, in order to maintain the Bonus-Malus scoring and not to fall, implicitly, in a superior risk category. And the increase of the rating level is much more expensive than a simple repairment.

Every country has his own Bonus-Malus system, the wheel having been reinvented quite a few times. First, a basic premium is determined using rating factors like weight, catalogue price or capacity of the car, type of use of the care (privately or for the business) and of course the type of coverage (Motor Hull Insurance, Motor TPL Insurance or a mixture). This is the premium that drivers without a known claims history have to pay. The bonus and malus for good and bad claims experience are implemented through the use of a so-called Bonus-Malus scale.

One ascends one step, getting a greater bonus, after a claim-free year, and descends one or several steps after having filed one or more claims.

There are different rating factors and a different Bonus-Malus scale for different countries [3].

The Romanian Model. The transition matrix.

The Bonus-Malus scale, including the percentages of the basic premium to be paid and the transitions made after 0,1 or more claims, is depicted in Tabel 1. In principle new insureds enter at the step with premium rate (adjustment coefficient) 100%. This is only one Bonus-Malus model used by Romanian insurance companies.

Table no. 1

Transitions rules and premium rates for one the Romanian Bonus-Malus system

Rating level (class)	Premium rate (percentage)	New Bonus-Malus step after claims
		0	1	2	3	4	5	6	≥ 7
0	250	1	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
1	170	2	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
2	130	3	1	1	0	0	0	0	0
3	110	5	2	2	1	0	0	0	0
4	100	5	3	2	1	0	0	0	0
5	95	6	4	3	2	1	0	0	0
6	90	7	5	4	2	1	0	0	0
7	80	8	6	5	4	2	1	0	0
8	70	8	8	6	5	4	2	1	0

Using the relations (1) and (5) we have:

$$p_{ij}(t) = \{k\} = p_k = \frac{\lambda^k}{k!} e^{-\lambda} \tag{7}$$

or

$$p_{ij}(t) = \{k, k+1, \ldots\} = \sum_{l=k}^{\infty} p_l \tag{8}$$

For example:

$$p_{53}(t) = \{2\} = p_2 = \frac{\lambda^2}{2!} e^{-\lambda} \quad p_{50}(t) = \{5, 6, 7, \ldots\} = \sum_{l=5}^{\infty} p_l$$

;

.

Then, the transition matrix (2) , accordingly to the Romanian model, is:

$$P(t) = \left(p_{ij}(t)\right)_{i,j=\overline{0,8}}$$

.

Consequently, the transition matrix could be presented as follows (table no. 2):

Table no. 2

Transition matrix for the Romanian Bonus-Malus system

i / j	0	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8
0	{1,2,3…}	{0}	.	.	.	.	.	.	.
1	{1,2,3…}	.	{0}	.	.	.	.	.	.
2	{3,4,5…}	{1,2}	.	{0}	.	.	.	.	.
3	{4,5,6…}	.	{1,2}	.	.	{0}	.	.	.
4	{4,5,6…}	{3}	{2}	{1}	.	{0}	.	.	.
5	{5,6,7…}	{4}	{3}	{2}	{1}	.	{0}	.	.
6	{5,6,7…}	{4}	{3}	.	{2}	{1}	.	{0}	.
7	{6,7…}	{5}	{4}	.	{3}	{2}	{1}	.	{0}
8	$\{\geq 7\}$	{6}	{5}	.	{4}	{3}	{2}	.	{0,1}

where . = 0.

Conclusions

The ultimate goal of a Bonus-Malus system is to make everyone pay a premium which is as near as possible the expected value of his yearly claims.

The Bonus-Malus system is the powerful instrument to assess individual risk. Note that for the transitions in the Bonus-Malus system, only the number of claims filed counts, not their size. Although it is clear that a Bonus-Malus system based on claim sizes is possible, such systems are hardly ever used with car insurance.

In conclusion, the basic characteristics of Bonus-Malus system are:

classification according to claims experience (period: 1 year);

number of classes and period required to reach maximum bonus beginner's class

reclassification at renewal.

As to the reduction of the duality, cooperation between insurers is necessary, in the sense of creating a common database or multilateral agreements, for Bonus-Malus system implementation and the tariffs depending on the risk profile.

By applying the Bonus-Malus system the company assumes the risk of losing many clients disadvantaged by the significant increase of the rate premium, in the next period, but the favorable results will appear on a long or medium term.

References

- Kaas, R., Goovaerts, M., Dhaene, J. & Denuit, M. - Modern Actuarial Risk Theory, Kluwer Academic Press, Boston , 2001, p.129.
- Klugmann, S.A.; Panjer, H.H.; Willmot, G.E. - Loss models: from data to decisions (2nd edition), New York, John Wiley&Sons, Inc, 2004.
- Teodorescu, S. – Asigurări - aspecte teoretice şi practice, Editura Bren, 2006.
- Teodorescu, S. - The role and importance of the Bonus-Malus system in the motor insurance, The International Scientific Session organized by „Nicolae Titulescu" University and the Business and Administration Faculty, University of Bucharest, 5-6 june 2008, Lex et Scientia no. XV, vol 3, 2008
- Vernic, R. - Matematici actuariale, Ed ADCO, Constanța , 2004, p. 55.

PROBLEMS FOR THE ACCOUNTING OF POLITICAL PARTIES IN KNOWLEDGE SOCIETY

AURELIAN VIRGIL BĂLUȚĂ*

Abstract

The society needs good reports from the accounting of political parties. The public power, including the Government, depends on the kind of financing of political parties. The improvement of the control of resources used by the parties accounting is very important. The paper presents the tools for the accounting of political parties in knowledge society. The paper contains the author's opinion on current issues of political party accounting. Arguments are presented against some recent proposals to amend the regulations, arguments in favor of concrete solutions and the analysis of the correlation between accounting expertise and the political parties accounting in the knowledge society.

Keywords: accounting, reports, finances, main solutions to improve accounting of political parties in the knowledge society, political parties.

Introduction

The domain covered by the paper

Communication is part of both accounting and finance. The problem of financing political parties, including election campaigns, is part of finance. The problems of political party funding are analyzed from the perspective of the information that is or should be provided by accounting. This in turn comes in contact with another borderline discipline, the accounting expertise. Likelihood of litigation relating to the funding of political parties and electoral campaigns is quite high because it is often wanted for the problems of funding a party to be used as a political weapon by opposing political parties.

The importance of studying the problem presented in the paper

The issue of financing and the accounting of political parties is related to a number of important issues of the knowledge society: who and with what means does the government lead, who is behind those who have gained political power and who supports the opposition (which want to take the power). The quality of public management depends very much, especially in the knowledge society, of the quality of those who have power and their ability to respect the transparency in money management, including in the struggle to win political power.

The objectives considered by this scientific paper

The study aims to bring in debate current issues specific to the knowledge society, related to the informational control regarding the accounting of political parties.

How the study responds to the paper's objectives

Modern accounting aims, among others, „to cast a real light upon income and expenditure" [1]. For this reason the income of political parties is in close relationship with both their administration activity and with the level or form of expenses. In the study there are put into question the proposals usually formulated in an informal setting by the civil society, an essential element in the knowledge society, or by practitioners. All these aims at transparently determining revenues, expenditures and financial position of political parties. Some proposals are not appropriate for the objectives. Others would bring added knowledge of the real financial situation of political parties. We presented pro or against arguments for each one, as applicable. We also considered the role of accounting expertise in improving information financial flows of political parties.

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., „Spiru Haret" University, Romania, (email: baluta.aurelian@yahoo.com).

[1] Dumitru Voina, General accounting course (Bucharest: Academiei Publishing House, 1944), 7

To answer questions on financing political parties, as for many other problems of life, society disposes of accounting tools. They were very much improved in the knowledge society. There is a true reflex of citizens in knowledge society to find answers from accounting to problems where money is involved.

The level of knowledge in the presented paper

Accounting for political parties is still in an applicative and empirical research phase. When theoretical references are made to the financial statements of political parties, they are presented as a specific form of association[2]. In other countries studies of political parties accounting are also rare and occur in response to either changes in legislation[3] or to major problems of democracy related to the lack of public control over financing political parties or election campaigns[4].

Inadequate solutions in terms of the accounting law proposed by public authorities or by non-governmental organizations

Public opinion in Romania has put pressure on public authorities for improving the reporting method of revenue and expenditure of political parties, seen as an essential element of the democratic process. In a bid to increase transparency of financing political parties and electoral campaigns, some proposals were made not in accordance with accounting law or the fundamental principles of the European civil law. The list of these proposals and the arguments against them are presented in Table No. 1.

Table 1

No.	Proposal content	Arguments against proposal
0	1	2
1	The prohibition to conclude loan contracts	It has a vague character and could lead to confusion and misinterpretation. It is not specified whether it's prohibited for a party to act as borrower or lender, neither if it about financial loan or commercial loan. The general prohibition of the loan according to the wording of the bill may require parties to pay on the spot any benefits, commercial credit also being banned, which would be absurd. Only the operation by which a party can grant a financial loan from income specific to political activity can be banned. Any other type of prohibition has implications in other chapters of the law regarding financing political parties making certain provisions inoperative[5].
2	Regulating political parties accounting by completing the legislation on financing political parties and electoral campaigns	In principle any accounting regulation should be included in the Accounting Law. In Romania as in other European countries there is a tradition of 100 years in compliance with the regulatory unit of accounting. Even during periods of authoritarian regime, the accounting regulation was achieved through a specific legislative act[6]. Proposed

[2] For example Virginia Greceanu Cocoş, Comparative, commented, alignment, simplified and updated accounting for non-profit legal entities,(Bucharest: ProUniversitaria Publishing House, 2008)

[3] Marie Goransson, Jean Faniel, Le financement et la comptabilite des parties politiques francophones, on www.

[4] The proposals of Institute of Charted Accountants of India, on the website www.zeenews.india.com

[5] Commercial loan is a part of commercial sales.

[6] Government Decision 1598/1948 and Government Decision 846/1950

No.	Proposal content	Arguments against proposal
0	1	2
		changes to political parties accounting, as rational or necessary as they would be, must be included in an initiative to amend the Accounting Law and not the legislation regarding parties financing. The regulation on the reconstruction of lost, stolen or destroyed documents should refer to common provisions in the field. An evasive wording specific to political parties is not justified if there is a common, well-defined framework with a relevant practice. Accounting standards have general rulls adecquate including for political parties: the discussion about objectives is really about which group′s returns management is trying to maximise.[7]
3	Obligation to communicate quarterly contributions revenue within 30 days	The obligation to communicate quarterly contributions revenue within 30 days has the character of an accounting report. Economic entities and all other types of entities have a longer deadlines for the first semester. Usually the deadline for reporting is around August 15. For annual reporting there are no deadlines with less than 60 days.[8] A 60 calendar days duration is recommended for every periodic reporting, including the one regarding contributions. The objective is to obtain accurate reporting, not sanctioning parties for late submission of the situation.
4	Obligation of collecting contributions and donations of more than 1,000 lei in bank accounts	Obligation of collecting contributions and donations of more than 1,000 lei through bank accounts should be eliminated for the following reasons: is inconsistent with the rules on the movement of money. Government Ordinance 15/1996 has a cap on cash operations only between legal entities[9]; cash operations of much greater value and operations of greater complexity are allowed, such as property sale or sale of agricultural products; there was not recorded any exaggerated volume of cash revenues in the nature of contributions or donations to disrupt the circulation of money as a whole; political parties in Romania face a chronic under-funding and the introduction of new restrictions increases the financing gap; the previous limit of privacy equivalent to 10 salaries (in terms of donations) is amended. There is no reason that the limit for privacy of contributions to be much smaller; the extent of the banking sector is not as high in Romania so that most people would have a personal account; such legislation limits the ability of citizens to participate in the

[7] ACCA Financial information for management, ACCA Official Publisher, London, 2001, pp.27
[8] Law 82/1991, point 36
[9] Government Ordinance 15/1996, updated, point 5

No.	Proposal content	Arguments against proposal
0	1	2
		financing of political parties.
5	Recording donations at market value	The liberties and benefits received for free by parties fall are registered as fair value, an accounting concept that includes the market value. Some favors or benefits do not have market value. The proposed regulation creates a blokage in recording favors or benefits received for free in accounting.
6	The introduction of a specific stipulation allowing all the contributions received during the campaign to be transferred to campaign financing if they are passed through specific campaign treasury accounts in compliance with accounting regulations	Contributions are legal and permanent sources of financing political parties. Individual amounts are small and can not generate frauds in the election campaign funding transparency. Accounting legislation requires the existence of supporting documentation for such transfers. In principle it is natural that the amounts remaining from the campaign to be transferred to the current activity. The transfer operation will be performed by the financial agent as part of its obligations and will be subject to review by the Permanent Electoral Authority to finance the campaign. A deadlock is avoided after which at a subsequent control there is another point of view than at the election campaign financing control.
7	Drafting a trial balance in 15 days after the completion of the election campaign.	The 15 days period to prepare the trial balance is unrealistic and in conflict with the provision of other legal rules: the invoice may be issued under the Tax Code within 15 days after the benefit[10]; therefore for the services rendered in the last days of the campaign there is no time for the movement of the invoice from supplier / provider to the beneficiary and for the centralization of data; Payments are due within 30 days from receiving the invoice; only after that date that they become outstanding[11]; In conclusion the trial balance drafted after 15 days of completion of the campaign has preliminary data that does not use the information system in any way.
8	Unspent money from the campaign of political parties are made revenues to the state budget.	Confiscation is a penalty and can only be based on a deviation from legal norms; savings during a campaign is an approach to efficiency that can not be punished by confiscation; savings during campaigns of independent candidates can be discussed in the spirit of the Constitution[12]; amounts unspent in the campaign of political parties must be transferred to the current activity; they can not be seized.
9	Political parties are required to submit all documents and information	Documents whose provision depends on third parties and which political parties have not included in the mandatory reports can not be requested.

[10] Tax Code, point 155,about invoice
[11] General rull including for public entities
[12] Romanian Constitution, point 44

No.	Proposal content	Arguments against proposal
0	1	2
	required to PEA within 15 days if those documents forms or had formed, according to accounting rules and rules regarding parties funding, the basis for preparation of legal accounting reports.

Solutions to improve accounting of political parties in the knowledge society

In knowledge society there are special requirements to effectively achieve transparency in parties financing. Accounting plays an important role. The control system of the financial management method also acts besides accounting. To improve certain components of this flow I would suggest that solutions presented in Table 2 are taken into account. The arguments presented draw attention to their usefulness.

Table 2 - Solutions to improve accounting of political parties in the knowledge society

No.	Solution to improve accounting	Arguments and methods of achievement
0	1	2
1	Strict control on the actual political independence of people in the financial control bodies of the parties	High profile public friendship relations between employees of financial control bodies of political parties and members of governing bodies of the parties should be eliminated. In addition political rewards subsequent to membership term in control bodies must be monitored.
2	The special sanction of transitioning from one party to another of people who meet financial responsibilities and do not loyally fulfill their assumed duties.	Accounting of parties must be a true mirror of the management of funds. Infiltration from one party to another in order to create financial problems alters the true and fair view that accounting must provide.
3	Clarifications on the establishment of the limit of donations to political parties in the case of a individual's natural association with a company.	If the individual has donated an amount of a party's campaign, a commercial company should be able to donate. Functioning of any company is based on the principle of property separation between employers (shareholders, partners) and the company they have shares to[13]. For this reason the individual must always be treated as a separate legal entity than the one to which it has holdings. When the law sets limits on party and electoral campaigns financing then they are valid for every legal entity. Therefore the limit of donation should be treated as a sum of the individual limits and of each legal entity controled by it.

[13] Commercial Code and Civil Code from Romania

4	Completing the list of expenditure categories by introducing fundraising expenses	A political party that organizes fundraisers has a number of expenses. These are associated to the current activity. Their separate recording proves transparency in party financing.
5	The precise regulation of the campaign surplus.	Unspent or surplus income over the legally allowed maximum is to be carried to the current activity of the party or any other legal project, as decided by those entitled.
6	Any other sources obtained during the election campaign outside contributions can be used for campaign financing if they are declared at Permanent Electoral Authority	The introduction of a provision to allow any other sources obtained during the election campaign outside contributions can be used for campaign financing if they are declared at Permanent Electoral Authority similar to donations and legacies.

The correlation between the accounting of political parties and the accounting expertise in knowledge society

Accounting expertise is susceptible to interference with the accounting activity of political parties as well as in all types of organizations outside of some processes or in processes.

Besides some processes, accounting expertise can track the accuracy of financial statements of political parties especially when replacing the management, determining some accounting and financial vulnerabilities, how the legislation with application in accounting can be met in the case of political parties, transfering balances and accounting activity between current accounts and accounts of election campaigns, etc.. Current legislation has no clear provisions on how accounting expertise operates. In the case of political parties the fluctuation of management or execution personnel may be higher and less predictable. Legislation should specify the compliance obligation and the presence of persons who finish their mandate or withdraw from a party when conducting accounting expertise for the duration of the mandate. Changing policy options should not affect the management of funds that is basically a matter of public interest.

The accounting expertise in a process related accounting of parties on the one hand takes the general elements of such an accounting expertise but also has special features.

According to the rules of civil procedure, the parties in a process are obliged to give the expert any clarification about the subject in work. This is also required of people who represent the political party at the date of the process and those that represented it during litigation. In the absence of mandatory rules, because of the fluctuation specific to politics there is the risk that people who ordered certain actions or inactions can not be constrained in any way to express themselves on the facts of their mandate. If they do not participate in the expertise it will be very difficult for possible effects of the court sentence to be applied to them. Thus it creates an advantage for people of bad faith. At the same time the legal obligation to be summoned and welcomed to express their opinions of those who met thier mandate in the period subject to litigation also seems as their right. If they do not participate in the expertise, these individuals may be disadvantaged by the court's solutions. There is an unjustified disadvantage for people of good will who want to support the actions and inactions during their mandate.

Given the political fluctuation in the management of political parties it is natural that only supporting documents that have been taken in the financial statements and only final or intermediate reports approved by the party leadership can be invoked against them. Documents provided by people who are no longer part of the party structures can not be included in any expertise much less in a judicial one. The exception to this is the proof that the document has been validated at that date and included in the financial statements. Another interpretation of the legal regime of supporting documents or intermediate reports of political parties would allow sanctions against smaller political parties in which supporters of large or ruling parties have infiltrated. In no case reports or documents may be accepted that were provided by people for which there is proof that the party imposed disciplinary sanctions, including exclusion.

If the objective of the expertise is related to a dispute between the party and a state authority with control attributions then the obligations of the parties on supporing the work of the expert are very important. The parties, both the control authority and the political party, will simultaneously provide documents supporting their opinion before the expert. Simultaneously, if needed, the person who served in the mandate during the term covered by the control will be called. If it results three distinct interests, all will present views and documents simultaneously, so that truth is not distorted by agreements between two parties. The expertise report will record whether in conclusions were used official documents of the party or and other categories of documents or reports. In justified cases such documents will be included, specifying the reason for their inclusion and the impact their lack would have on the conclusions. In any case, no documents will be received after the submission of the report unless it is proved that they occurred after its preparation. When submitting a document that was not part of the party's official list there will be allow time to identify the actual situation that has generated them. Documents that are not part of the official party list and obtained or made in violation of legal norms or by exceeding internal competencies will also not be used.

The existence of the preparation date, of the period covered and the business segment to which it refers are essential elements in establishing the relevance of each document considered in the expertise report. Separating the a party's current activity from the election campaign and of the main activities from the economic ones are important elements to be considered when taking over a document into the expertise report.

Each person fulfilling a mandate within the party is obliged to know the situation mainly based on the official summary documents or the internal reports they received. They can also be obtained under certain conditions from mail correspondence, specifying that it is not a supporting document unless under limited circumstances.

Any defect in a document made available to the expert, if taken into account in drafting the conclusions, it will have to be mentioned in the report.

Neither party should be allowed to avoid the legal role of the expert of finding out the truth by providing the document directly to the court.

Conclusions

Main solutions to improve accounting of political parties in the knowledge society in my opinion:

- Strict control on the actual political independence of people in the financial control bodies of the parties;
- The special sanction of transitioning from one party to another of people who meet financial responsibilities and do not loyally fulfill their assumed duties;
- The precise regulation of the campaign surplus;
- Any other sources obtained during the election campaign outside contributions can be used for campaign financing if they are declared at Permanent Electoral Authority;
- clear provisions on how accounting expertise operates in the case of political parties;
- only supporting documents that have been taken in the financial statements and only final or intermediate reports approved by the party leadership can be invoked against them;
- participate in the expertise people who represented the political party during litigation.

References

- ACCA Financial information for management, (London: ACCA Official Publisher, London, 2001), 27
- Accounting Law 82/1991 from Romania
- Civil Code from Romania
- Commercial Code from România
- Dumitru Voina, General accounting course (Bucharest: Academiei Publishing House, 1944), 7
- Government Decision 1598/1948 from Romania
- Government Decision 846/1950 from România
- Government Ordinance 15/1996 on fiscal discipline from Romania
- Law 334/2006 regarding financing political parties and electoral campaigns from Romania
- Romanian Constitution
- Tax Code from Romania

LIMITS AND VULNERABILITIES OF BANKING PROFITABILITY INDICATORS DURING THE FINANCIAL CRISIS

TEODORA CRISTINA BARBU [*]
IUSTINA ALINA BOITAN []

Abstract
Bank performance measurement, as an expression of banks' ability to generate sustainable profits, is a topic of major interest, located in the core of all categories of participants involved in the banking business: banking supervisory authorities, rating agencies, shareholders, investors and analysts of banking activity.
Recent developments in bank profitability during the global financial crisis have highlighted a number of limitations of traditional banking performance measurement indicators, in respect of their capacity to provide relevant, credible and genuine information related to credit institutions' activity. In this article we intend to argue, by investigations at conceptual and quantitative level, the extent to which traditional indicators of bank profitability provide a comprehensive and real insight into the credit institutions' financial performance.
The empirical study applies the stress test methodology, through which is assessed the extent to which Romanian banking system's performance, represented by ROE, changes in the context of defining adverse, but plausible scenarios. Hence, it had been simulated ROE's degree of response for three types of scenarios. We have applied both univariate stress tests (sensitivity analysis) in order to isolate the potential impact of each risk factor on bank profitability, and multivariate stress tests, which allow the simultaneous application of multiple shocks on risk factors. The results show the most important risk factors that adversely affect banking system's profitability and the concrete value by which profitability is expected to decrease for each scenario analyzed.

Keywords*: profitability indicators, banking systems, financial instability, regulation, stress test scenario.*

Introduction

Financial markets' current concern is to strengthen financial activity's regulation, a special emphasis being placed on refining the capital adequacy requirements. Indirectly, on medium and long term, banking profitability acquires a key role in the capital formation, because maintaining it on an upward trend will enable banks to generate internal capital, thus reducing their dependence on foreign or interbank loans.

Profitability ratios are used to measure how well a business performs in terms of profit, by offering different scales for assessing an entity's ability to achieve positive financial results. The analysis of a bank's ability to be profitable has been the subject of numerous studies, which revealed the presence of correlation between bank performance and macroeconomic variables.

Bolt, de Haan, Hoeberichts van Oordt and Swank (2011) examined the relationship between banking profitability and business cycles, by developing a model which takes into account the history of bank loans, amortization and provisions. Their analysis focused on bank profit components: net interest income, other income, net provisions and other costs. The results confirmed the cyclicality of bank profits and their strong decline during crises. The authors found that for each percent of GDP contraction, during a severe recession, it is registered a decline of 0.24% of the level of profitability based on assets (ROA).

Another study (Apergis, 2009) also put in evidence the correlation between bank profitability and business cycles. The relationship is positive and robust in every phase of the economic cycle, but in the expansion phase the correlation is even more intense and is conclusive both in the case of the emerging and developed countries.

[*] Professor, Ph. D., The Bucharest University of Economic Studies, Romania, (email: teodora_barbu@yahoo.com).
[] Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D., The Bucharest University of Economic Studies, Romania, (email: iustinaboitan@yahoo.com).

McKinsey global consulting company (Visalli, Roxburgh, Daruvala, Dietz, Lund, Marrs 2011) has analyzed banks' performance in 2010, compared with the average value recorded in the period before the financial crisis (2001-2007). This revealed that banks in emerging markets have managed to recover the performance and confidence indicators in the banking system faster than in developed countries (see the picture below).

Overview of banking "performance" and "confidence" indicators

2010

Better than 2001–07 avg.
Near 2001–07 avg.
Worse than 2001–07 avg.

		Developed markets	Emerging markets
Performance	1 Financial depth[1] (% GDP)	427	197
	2 Banking revenue pool growth after provisions (%)	23	21
	3 Net interest and fee margins (%)	2.7	5.9
	4 Annual provisions for loan losses (% revenues)	23	16
	5 Nonperforming loans (%)	4.0	3.8
	6 Cost-to-income ratio (%)	54.0	45.7
	7 Banking profit pool growth (%)	141	28
	8 Bank ROEs (%)	7.9	19.6
	9 Bank capital ratios (TCE/RWA[2], %)	10	14.1
	10 Loan-to-deposit ratio (%)	92.2	82.3
Confidence	11 Cross-border capital flows (% GDP)	9.2	5.6
	12 Short-term cross-border loans[3] (% foreign liab.)	12.3	11.9
	13 LIBOR-OIS spreads (bps)	21.6	-
	14 Bank CDS spreads (bps)	136	213.7
	15 Bank market caps (% total market cap.)	10.8	17.3
	16 Bank P/B multiples	1.0	1.9

NOTE: "Better/worse than 2001–07 average" indicates deviation >10%
1 Stock market capitalization, public debt securities, financial and nonfinancial corporate bonds, and securitized and nonsecuritized loans
2 Tangible common equity/risk-weighted assets
3 Stock of cross-border loans with a maturity of less than 1 year

SOURCE: McKinsey Global Banking Practice; McKinsey Global Institute

Also, the authors have made a forecast relative to the potential level of ROE in 2015. For U.S. banks, it is expected to vary between 6.2 and 8.3%, while for the European Union banks it will range between 7.4 and 8.6%, well below the levels recorded in the year prior to crisis (11.4% in the U.S. and 16.7 % in the EU in 2007).

Aebi, Sabato, Schmid (2011) examined the extent to which corporate governance, subordinated to risk management procedures, exerts any influence on bank performance during crises, especially in 2007-2008. The results indicate that banks are determined to maximize shareholder wealth before the crisis and to take on risks in order to generate significant revenue later. Banks that are well prepared to cope with financial crises present an important and significant improvement in the quality of risk management function, but, at the same time, a lower performance than previous periods. An important point is that related to the mix of factors that impact banks' performance during crises. The results show that liquidity and credit quality are the variables that contribute positively to banking performance recording.

Another study that answered the question why some banks perform during crises is Beltratti and Stulz (2009), which made a comparative study on the impact of governance and banking regulation. Using conventional indicators to express corporate governance, the authors show that banks with a friendly relationship between its board and shareholders registered poor performance during crises; in turn, countries where regulations are strict in terms of capital and supervisory authority is independent, banks registered better performance.

According to Coffinet and Lin (2010), from the standpoint of supervisory authority, the identification of vulnerabilities that may have negative impact on bank profitability is subordinated to maintaining banking system's solvency.

Bank profitability sensitivity to adverse, but plausible changes in the macroeconomic, financial and bank-specific indicators is a concern that catches more and more shape, being subject to stress tests carried out under the aegis of central banks.

In this respect, Coffinet and Lin (2010) conducted a study on the French banking system, for the period 1993-2009, the empirical results indicating that although the profitability of individual credit institutions is largely influenced by GDP growth; interest rate spread; volatility of capital markets; the share of financial income, other than interest, in the total asset; banks' size and capital ratio, all the simulated shocks do not severely erode the profitability level.

Stress tests conducted at the Bank of Norway (Andersen, Berge 2008), based on a sample of five major credit institutions, have reported that under a scenario of severe housing prices decrease, rising interest rates and boost of banks' risk aversion, their profits will face a downward trend.

Rouabah (2006) performed univariate stress tests on banks profitability in Luxembourg, based on historical data series for the time interval 1994-2005. Results indicated that the monetary shocks have a marginal effect on the level of profitability, but the GDP and stock index Stoxx DJE variation have a high impact on the revenue of Luxembourg banks.

Stress exercises conducted by Lehmann and Manz (2006) for the Swiss banking system revealed significant influence of GDP growth rate and interest rates on bank profitability. The stress scenario that captures the simultaneous manifestation of the recession, lower stock prices and increasing interest rates has generated substantial loss of profitability for Swiss banks.

On the other hand, a strong point of view, supported by the European Central Bank (2010), is on the ROE indicator limits during the current period of financial instability. The ECB has made a number of critics on the ability of this indicator to provide relevant information about bank performance, after the onset of financial crisis. Thus, ROE as a measure of performance has some limitations, namely:

- it is not risk-sensitive;
- it hasn't a long term predictive ability. A number of banks that, during the financial crisis, recorded significant losses had, with 3-4 years before its onset a good level of ROE. Therefore, ROE is a short-term indicator and has many weaknesses in times of financial uncertainty;
- provides contradictory information: for example, while banks have had to restructure their capital by issuing new titles, this strategy for improving capital and income has generated a decline in ROE;
- ROE is the best known indicator of bank performance, being under the attention of all market investors. Targeting this performance indicator exposes the bank to a strategy based on short-term balance sheet management;
- lack of transparency and inconsistency of this indicator made it difficult and irrelevant to be used for comparisons across different banks. Non-recognition of losses and the use of different accounting standards show that this indicator cannot be used for comparative measurement of bank performance.

In the present study we aimed, in the first instance, to investigate to what extent the traditional indicators of bank profitability provide a comprehensive picture of the actual financial performance of banks. The second part of the study evaluates, by applying the stress test methodology, the way Romanian banking system's financial performance will change, as a result of simulating adverse, but plausible scenarios that may materialize in the loan portfolio or macroeconomic environment.

The stress test methodology and simulation results

In the following, we intend to evaluate the impact of macroeconomic and bank-specific risk factors on the traditional indicator ROE, which provides a quantitative measure of the global performance, recorded by all the business lines of a credit institution and synthesizes shareholders' investment profitability.

The empirical study involves two steps: a) defining and processing the set of explanatory variables, by applying stationarity tests, multicolliniarity tests, deseasonalisation and estimating the functional form of the equation; b) performing stress test analyses, through which it had been measured the degree in which Romanian banking system performance changed in the context of the definition of adverse, but plausible scenarios.

In essence, stress exercises are designed to identify potential sources of vulnerability (risk factors) for a financial institution and to simulate the impact of extreme events on its activity. These complete the risk management tools available to financial institutions and central banks.

A report published by the BIS (2005) made a synthesis of major financial institutions' stress test practices, revealing that 47.5% of them consist of sensitivity analyses, 30.43% are hypothetical scenarios and 22.01% are scenarios based on historical data analysis. Most stress exercises were designed to simulate changes in interest rates or credit.

In this study we have simulated the response of ROE indicator for three types of scenarios: one reflecting increases in idiosyncratic risk factors (bank-specific risks: credit risk, liquidity risk, interest rate risk), other that captures the impact of exogenous factors, having a macroeconomic nature (unemployment rate, inflation, average salary on economy, EUR/RON exchange rate) and a third one that combines idiosyncratic risk factors with macroeconomic ones.

It had been performed both univariate stress tests (sensitivity analysis) in order to isolate the potential impact of each risk factor on bank profitability, and multivariate tests, which allow the simultaneous application of multiple shocks on several risk factors.

The analysis was developed based on data aggregated for the entire Romanian banking system, available for the period January 2001 - October 2011, the time series considered having a monthly frequency. The methodology used is the classical linear regression model, the coefficient values being determined with OLS estimation method. In Table 1 we summarized the variables used.

Table 1. Description of variables

Dependent variable	Return on equity (ROE)
Explanatory variables	Macroeconomic factors: - unemployment rate - inflation rate - net average salary on economy - EUR/RON exchange rate
	Bank-specific variables: credit growth loan loss provisions due and doubtful loans/total loans liquidity indicator lending/deposit interest rate ratio

Preliminary analysis of the statistical characteristics for the variables considered revealed the presence of a positive asymmetry (skewness) for inflation rate, liquidity indicator, lending / deposit ratio, loan loss provisions, due and doubtful credits in total credit, average net salary and the unemployment rate, suggesting that, during the period considered, these variables have followed an upward trend, while ROE, the EUR/RON exchange rate and the credit growth showed a negative asymmetry. Also, we noticed a trend towards platikurtosis for the exchange rate, liquidity indicator, the average net salary and ROE, the remaining variables indicating a tendency for leptokurtosis, which means that the likelihood for an extreme event to occur is higher. It hasn't been detected the presence of multicollinearity between variables; the time series for unemployment rate, net average wage, loan loss provisions and credit growth rate were deseasonalized. Time series' unit root was tested using the Augmented Dickey-Fuller test. Inflation rate and credit growth were found to be stationary in level, the average net wage is stationary in the second difference while the other variables are stationary in first difference, the null hypothesis of having a unit root being rejected at a critical level of 5%. In addition, the variables were considered in their logarithm, to facilitate the interpretation of the estimated coefficients in the form of elasticities.

In the following, we have estimated the parameters of simple and multiple linear regression equations, which will constitute the basis for performing univariate and multivariate stress test exercises. In the case of simple linear regressions, the only variables that statistically prove to have explanatory power on the level of ROE are: the liquidity indicator, loan loss provisions and due and doubtful loans in total loans. The estimated equations are presented as follows:

$$\ln ROE = 0.6107 \times \ln \text{liquidity indicator}(-8) - 0.0265$$
$$\ln ROE = -1.3516 \times \ln \text{due and doubtful loans in total loans} - 0.01$$
$$\ln ROE = -0.1764 \times \ln \text{loan loss provisions}(-1) - 0.0254$$

Thus, a 1% increase in expenses with loan loss provisions will be followed one month late by a decrease of ROE with 0.1764%; a 1% increase of the liquidity indicator, with a lag of 8 months, will generate in the current period a reduction of 0.6107% in ROE level and the increase of the share of due and doubtful loans in total credit by 1% will be followed by a reduction of ROE of 1.3516%.

In the case of multivariate regressions, in order to facilitate the subsequent stress exercises, we tested three specifications:

a regression model that includes only bank-specific variables, reflecting banking activity idiosyncratic risk (credit risk, liquidity risk, interest rate risk). Regression's functional form is:

$$\ln ROE = 0.0489 \times \ln \text{credit growth}(-6) - 1.6943 \times \ln \text{due and doubtful loans in total loans}(-3) - 0.1829 \times \ln \text{loan loss provisions}(-1) + 0.6413 \times \ln \text{liquidity indicator}(-8) + 0.126418$$ a regression model composed only by macroeconomic variables (inflation rate, unemployment rate, exchange rate, net average salary on economy). The results revealed that ROE level can be explained only by the variation registered by unemployment rate and inflation rate.

$$\ln ROE = -2.0293 \ln \text{unemployment rate}(-3) + 23.7235 \ln \text{net average salary}(-3) + 0.018182$$

Thus, increasing the unemployment rate by 1% will take effect on the level of ROE with a delay of three months, leading to a reduction of 2.0293%. On the other hand, the increase of net average wage in the economy by 1% will be reflected in the growth with 23.7235% of the ROE level, with a lag of one quarter.

a regression model that gathers both bank-specific variables and macroeconomic ones. The estimated coefficients are:

$$\ln ROE = 0.4462 \times \ln \text{inflation rate}(-3) - 3.7807 \times \ln \text{exchange rate}(-16) - 3.0399 \times \ln \text{unemployment rate}(-3) + 29.2260 \times \ln \text{net average wage}(-3) + 0.0429 \times \ln \text{credit growth}(-6) - 1.1174 \times \ln \text{lending/deposit ratio}(-13) + 0.6379 \times \ln \text{liquidity indicator}(-8) - 0.1637 \times \ln \text{loan loss provisions}(-1) - 2.0286$$

It can be noted that, although the sign of estimated coefficients is in line with economic theory, for the inflation rate the coefficient is positive, meaning that an increase in the inflation rate improves bank profitability. Coffinet and Lin (2010) reported that the effect induced by inflation on profitability is ambiguous, although most recent studies indicate a significant positive effect. The explanation lies in the ability of banks to accurately forecast the inflation rate and to adjust the interest rates charged on loans and deposits, so as that revenues grow faster than expenses.

The second stage of the analysis consisted in defining several adverse scenarios and simulating the ROE's response, as a reaction to the volatility recorded by explanatory variables. The severity of shocks applied to each risk factor has been calibrated based on the most significant changes in the historical series of observations. In other words, we have considered the first two most significant changes in the level of each explanatory variable, recorded during January 2001- October 2011.

Table 2. Sensitivity analysis

The scenario defined	The change induced in the level of ROE
Decrease of the liquidity indicator (8 months lag) with 14.5%	Decreases with 2.78%
Decrease of the liquidity indicator (8 months lag) with 30%	Decreases with 5.76%
Increase of the share of due and doubtful loans in total loan with 30%	Decreases with 38.43%
Increase of the share of due and doubtful loans in total loan with 54%	Decreases with 69.17%
Increase of loan loss provisions (one month lag) with 34%	Decreases with 61.82%
Increase of loan loss provisions (one month lag) with 27%	Decreases with 49.10%

As seen in the simulations presented in Table 2, the change of the liquidity ratio has a relatively low impact on profitability; in turn, the impairment of credit risk proxy variables (the share of overdue and doubtful loans to total loans, loan loss provisions expenses) significantly erodes banks' profitability. In Table 3 we summarized the combined influence of explanatory variables on ROE, assuming three stress scenarios.

Table 3. Multivariate stress tests

The scenario defined	The change induced in the level of ROE
Microeconomic scenarios
Credit growth contraction (6 months lag) with 33.72% Increase of the share of due and doubtful loans in total loan (3 months lag) with 54% Increase of loan loss provisions (one month lag) with 34% Decrease of the liquidity indicator (8 months lag) with 30%	Decreases with 149.22%
Credit growth contraction (6 months lag) with 2.1% Increase of the share of due and doubtful loans in total loan (3 months lag) with 30%	Decreases with 101.02%

Increase of loan loss provisions (one month lag) with 27% Decrease of the liquidity indicator (8 months lag) with 14.5%
Credit growth contraction (6 months lag) with 2.1% Increase of the share of due and doubtful loans in total loan (3 months lag) with 30% Increase of loan loss provisions (one month lag) with 27% Decrease of the liquidity indicator (8 months lag) with 10%	Decreases with 100.1%
Macroeconomic scenarios
Increase of unemployment rate (3 months lag) with 44% Decrease of average wage (3 months lag) with 9%	Decreases with 15.5%
Increase of unemployment rate (3 months lag) with 11% Decrease of average wage (3 months lag) with 9%	Decreases with 14.89%
Increase of unemployment rate (3 months lag) with 11% Decrease of average wage (3 months lag) with 2%	Decreases with 2.78%
Mixed scenarios
Increase of inflation rate (3 months lag) with 2% Exchange rate depreciation (16 months lag) with 6% Increase of unemployment rate (3 months lag) with 44% Decrease of average wage (3 months lag) with 9% Credit growth contraction (6 months lag) with 33.72% Increase of lending/deposit ratio (13 months lag) with 21% Decrease of the liquidity indicator (8 months lag) with 30% Increase of loan loss provisions (one month lag) with 34%	Decreases with 244.95%
Increase of inflation rate (3 months lag) with 2% Exchange rate depreciation (16 months lag) with 6% Increase of unemployment rate (3 months lag) with 11% Decrease of average wage (3 months lag) with	Decreases with 216.4%

9% Credit growth contraction (6 months lag) with 2.1% Increase of lending/deposit ratio (13 months lag) with 12% Decrease of the liquidity indicator (8 months lag) with 10% Increase of loan loss provisions (one month lag) with 34%
Increase of inflation rate (3 months lag) with 2% Exchange rate depreciation (16 months lag) with 6% Increase of unemployment rate (3 months lag) with 11% Decrease of average wage (3 months lag) with 2% Credit growth contraction (6 months lag) with 2.1% Increase of lending/deposit ratio (13 months lag) with 9% Decrease of the liquidity indicator (8 months lag) with 10% Increase of loan loss provisions (one month lag) with 27%	Decreases with 65.81%

The combination of banking system's specific variables generates a significant loss of profitability in our simulation, of over 100%. Of these, the deterioration of loan portfolio quality, reflected by the increase of overdue and doubtful loans to total credit and the increase of provisioning costs have the greatest impact on the level of ROE.

In terms of the macroeconomic scenarios simulated, we noticed a more pronounced decrease in the level of ROE, mainly due to contraction of net average wage and, in a smaller proportion, to increases in unemployment rate. The explanation lies in the fact that not all borrowers can be affected by the entry in unemployment, but a generalized decrease in the level of wages in the economy will be passed on to each debtor.

The third scenario offers an overview of the evolution of profitability level, because it connects both the specific characteristics of banking activity and macroeconomic factors. Thus, developments on the labor market directly affect the profitability both directly, as increases of unemployment and / or decreases of disposable income are translated into the contraction of the demand for new credit, and indirectly by the fact that repayment difficulties faced by borrowers will damage the quality of loan portfolio, will increase the provisions costs, thus eroding the profitability of credit institutions. The results indicate that ROE is very sensitive to reductions of net average wage in the economy and increases in loan loss provisions expenses.

Conclusions

ROE is an indicator that characterizes the overall performance of the activity of credit institutions, without revealing how much of this performance is due to certain lines of business: retail, corporate, investment banking, private banking. In our opinion, it is necessary to design new profitability indicators that provide a more faithful picture to banks' sources of profit (non-bank customer lending operations, loans and placements with other financial institutions, securities transactions, and asset management). The empirical results obtained indicate that the main macroeconomic indicators and the specific banking system ones don't explain, overwhelmingly, the changes recorded by ROE. Analysis must be completed with variables that reflect, with a greater degree of accuracy and detail, financial situation and vulnerabilities related to retail and corporate sector, and individual characteristics of banks: sources of revenue, operating expenses, the market share held (banks with a higher market share and diversified products can benefit from greater stability of revenues).

References

- Aebi V., Sabato G., Schmid M. (2011) Risk management, corporate governance and bank performance in the financial crisis, Journal of Banking and Finance, 3 November 2011.
- Andersen H., Berge T.O. (2008) Stress testing of banks' profit and capital adequacy, Norges Bank, Economic Bulletin 2/2008, vol 79, 47-57.
- Apergis N. (2009) Bank profitability over different business cycles regimes: evidence from panel threshold models, Banks and Bank Systems, Volume 4, Issue 3, 2009.
- Beltratti A., Stulz R. (2009) Why Did Some Banks Perform Better during the Credit Crisis? A Cross-Country Study of the Impact of Governance and Regulation, ECGI Working Paper Series in Finance, Working Paper no. 254/2009.
- BIS (2005) Stress testing at major financial institutions: survey results and practice, January 2005.
- Bolt W, de Haan L., Hoeberichts M., van Oordt M., Swank J. (2011) Bank Profitability during Recessions, Eurobanking Conference, Vienna, 23-25 May 2011.
- Coffinet J., Lin S. (2010) Stress testing banks'profitability: the case of French banks, Document de Travail no. 306.
- ECB (2010) Beyond ROE – how to measure bank performance - Appendix to the report on EU banking structures, September 2010.
- Lehmannn H., Manz M. (2006) The exposure of Swiss banks to macroeconomic shocks: an empirical investigation, Swiss National Bank Working papers, 2006-4.
- Visalli S., Roxburgh C., Daruvala T., Dietz M., Lund S., Marrs A. (2011) The state of global banking- in search of a sustainable model, McKinsey Annual Review on the banking industry.
- Rouabah A. (2006) La sensibilité de l'activité bancaire aux chocs macroéconomiques: une analyse en panel sur les données de banques luxembourgeoises, Central Bank of Luxembourg, cahier d'étude no. 21.

EMERGING CAPITAL MARKETS: OPPORTUNITIES AND LIMITS

FELICIA RAMONA BIRĂU*

Abstract

This theoretical study examines the concept of emerging capital markets in Europe from the border between certain opportunities and limits. The financial architecture of emerging capital markets has certain characteristics such as a high degree of instability and a sharp level of illiquidity which exposed the vulnerability of this particular type of market. Emerging capital market represents a main characteristic of developing countries and they are less efficient than the developed market given their deep functional, structural and institutional dysfunctions.

Keywords*: emerging capital markets, developed capital markets, dysfunctions, efficiency, investment, risk.*

Introduction

This article examines issues of current interest in the financial field, respectively the concept of emerging capital markets analyzed in relation to their opportunities and limits. It is well known that over the past two decades, capital markets in developing countries, known as emerging capital markets, have experienced a tremendous rise. Moreover, emerging capital markets represent a significant part of the financial markets area, extremely attractive and dynamic.

The importance of this study is to highlight certain aspects of great current interest, especially in context of the global financial crisis. Financial investors, both institutional ones, as well as individual ones, perceive emerging capital markets as a great chance to obtain significant benefits.

Metaphorically, this category of capital markets was perceived at one time as an unexploited financial oasis. Even in the context of the current financial crisis restrictive conditions, emerging capital markets remain attractive due to return opportunity and to the possibility of increase the portfolio return.

This article aims to emphasize the main features of emerging capital markets in Europe, being focused on their opportunities and limits. In recent past years, the economic literature has provided an extensive series of studies regarding emerging capital markets characteristics. In addition, this article tries to identify as well those characteristics which are seen only in times of financial crisis, but not noticed in terms of economic growth or stagnation.

Another important approach analyzed in this article is considering the concept of market efficiency in the context of emerging capital markets in Europe. It is considered in general that emerging capital markets are not efficient in semi-strong form or strong form. In the most optimistic case, empirical research studies have identified a weak form of efficiency. Emerging capital markets are less efficient than the developed capital markets given their functional, structural and institutional malfunctions and limitations.

Emerging capital markets opportunities - an exhaustive theoretical analysis

An emerging capital market is distinguished by certain key features such as : great return expectations, sharp volatility and various specific risks. In terms of investment opportunities that characterized emerging capital markets in Europe, statistical evidences emphasize significant performances on this particular type of capital market.

* Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Economics and Business Administration, University of Craiova, Craiova, Romania, (email: birauramona@yahoo.com).

Before trigger the analysis, it is necessary to be made several additions. Therefore, according to the Financial Times Stock Exchange (F.T.S.E) evaluation criteria there are four categories of classification of national capital markets: developed markets, advanced emerging markets, secondary emerging markets and frontier emerging markets.

Advanced emerging markets category are: Brazil, Mexico, Hungary, Poland, South Africa and Taiwan, while the secondary emerging markets include countries such as China, Russia, India, Egypt, Colombia, Czech Republic, Peru, Pakistan, Turkey, Indonesia and Thailand.

F.T.S.E places the Bucharest Stock Exchange in the last category of quality of the four, along with the capital markets of: Bulgaria, Serbia, Tunisia, Cyprus, Estonia, Macedonia, Malta (September 2010), Slovakia, Slovenia, Croatia, Bangladesh, Botswana, Kenya, Nigeria, Sri Lanka or Vietnam. Also, Standard & Poor's (S&P) and Morgan Stanley Capital International (M.S.C.) evaluation criteria placed the capital market of Romania in the category of frontier emerging markets.

The global financial crisis that was caused by U.S. subprime crisis affected all the capital markets in the world. The negative impact was reflected by: reduction of the value and volume of transactions, significant reduction in the level of investment, the share price decrease and the unprecedented reduction of the profit opportunities.

The major stock markets indices of developed countries registers significant declines since the beginning of the financial crisis in the second half of 2007, as well as the advance emerging capital markets indexes that have evolved in close contact with mature stock markets in the U.S., Europe and Asia. Some specialists consider that there may be only an emotional connection between a relatively small capital market, like certain emerging capital markets in Europe and one characterized by extremely high volumes, because of the fact that institutional investors are unable to validate a significant packet of shares because of low liquidity and insignificant holdings of value compared to the case of developed capital markets.

Nevertheless, there are a number of counterarguments in favor of investing on emerging capital markets. First of all, there are real opportunities for increasing the financial assets portofolio return. It is also one of the reasons why foreign investors are attracted to invest there. Also, relatively low experience and not very high level of training of local professional investors are other opportunities to exploit by foreign investors.

Emerging capital markets are defined as transitional, being noticed an increase in both foreign and local financial investment. Based on the idea that an emerging economy is characterized by low to middle per capita income, is obvious that a consistent investment can decisively influence the stock prices.

In another train of thoughts, one of the main opportunities of emerging capital markets, which is important for both individual and institutional investors, is that this particular type of capital market is less informational efficient comparing to developed capital markets.

According to Eugene Fama : ”an efficient market is defined as a market where there are large numbers of rational, profit-maximizers actively competing, with each trying to predict future market values of individual securities, and where important current information is almost freely available to all participants”.

Efficient Markets Hypothesis suggests that since everyone has access to the same information, it is impossible to regularly beat the market, because that stock prices are efficient, reflecting everything we know as investors. In other words, a market in which prices always “fully reflect” available information is called efficient.

Capital market efficiency involves three dimensions : allocational, operational and informational efficiency. However, it has been noted that capital markets with higher informational efficiency are more likely to retain higher operational and allocational efficiencies (Müslümov et al, 2004). A market is efficient with respect to a set of information if it is impossible to make economic profits by trading on the basis of this information set (Ross, 1987).

Malkiel suggested the following definition:

"A capital market is said to be efficient if it fully and correctly reflects all relevant information in determining security prices. Formally, the market is said to be efficient with respect to some information set…if security price would be unaffected by revealing that information to all participants. Moreover, efficiency with respect to an informational set …implies that it is impossible to make economic profits by trading on the basis of (that informational set)."

Accordingly, a market in which prices always "fully reflect" available information is called efficient. One of the main aspects of Efficient Markets Hypothesis is represented by the degrees of efficiency issue. Thus, on a capital market, the degree of informational efficiency involves the following categories :

a) weak form efficiency

b) semi-strong form efficiency

c) strong form efficiency

It would be an illusion to believe that an emerging capital market is efficient in semi-strong form or strong form. As it was already suggested in the introduction to this article, in the most optimistic case, empirical research studies have identified a weak form of efficiency. Emerging capital markets are less efficient than the developed capital markets given their functional, structural and institutional deficiencies.

What is the importance of these issues for investors? In the case of emerging capital market, the access to information is delayed, distorted, difficult, incomplete, influenced and expensive. Although at first glance seem to be disadvantages, features mentioned above are actually investment opportunities. An intelligent investment strategy can provide significant gains from these certain malfunctions. One of the most important issue regarding efficient market theory is that it is not possible to outperform the market over the long-term. As it was stated previously, there are great opportunities to do so in the context of emerging capital markets.

Emerging capital markets limits

An emerging capital market is characterized by deep functional, structural and institutional dysfunctions. In other words, we can identify certain particularities such as : high volatility, the existence of bubbles, panic, speculation, anomalies, high-risk investment opportunities, a low level of liquidity, reduced capitalization, strong correlation with developed capital markets, reduced number of transactions, insufficient development of financial instruments, exchange rate instability and many others also.

A very important issue with major consequences is the concept of "liquidity" and its implications in the context of emerging capital markets. Liquidity is a sine qua non condition for a capital market to be effective, in the sense that its capacity to ability to ability to manage financial flows is significantly higher during periods when the market is more liquid. Especially in the case of emerging capital market, maintaining an optimal level of liquidity is very important. In the literature, the concept of market efficiency is the cornerstone of modern finance and also represents a significant advance in the financial field. a liquid market allows that a large volume of transactions to be conducted with minimum effect on price. At some point, it is crystallizes a very interesting connection between the concepts of efficiency and liquidity. Thus, the capital market liquidity contributes significantly to improve market efficiency. A high level of liquidity contributes substantially to enhancing the available information that is reflected in market prices.

Metaphorically speaking, the reverse of the medal is very dramatic. Destabilisation implications of the emerging capital market generated by insufficient liquidity are extremely severe. It is extremely important to distinguish between liquidity and trading volume. There is a paradox in time of financial crisis, respectively a lower liquidity level corresponds to a high volume of transactions.

Efficient market hypothesis have not reached the issue of liquidity crisis, or even the concept of liquidity itself. It assumes that investors are rational and they aim to select certain efficient financial assets to form an optimal portfolio as to achieve the highest possible returns over the long term, under the terms of a tolerable level of risk. However, in conditions of crisis, investors have a completely irrational behavior.

According to Peters : "If all information had the same impact on all investors, there would be no liquidity. When they received information, all investors would be executing the same trade, trying to get the same price."

It is significant to highlight the fact that investment decision is influenced in a large proportion by psychological and emotional factors. Human emotional complexity includes the following primary feelings: fear, panic, anxiety, envy, euphoria, greed, satisfaction, ambition or vanity. This cocktail of human emotions interferes in certain proportions in a financial investment decision making. Investors are people with many deviations from rational behavior, which often make illogical decisions. In the existing global financial perspective, the major influence of psychological factors in investment decision-making is undeniable.

Accordingly, chances that an investor to behave rationally in liquidity crisis conditions are extremely low. In such circumstances, obtaining a fair price is no longer a priority. Liquidity crises are a consequence of inadequate capital market functioning. In terms of emerging capital market it highlights the fact that they are characterized by severe institutional, structural and functional disequilibrium.

Conclusions

Emerging capital markets opportunities and limits complement each other to form a whole extremely attractive for investors.

In this article have been highlighted a number of issues of current importance such as the global financial crises. The vulnerability of emerging capital markets and its high degree of exposure to financial crises can be reduced by implementing some rigorous measures, such as : the adoption of relevant legislation, securities laws and regulations, the improvement of the trading infrastructure system, the establishment of appropriate supervisory structures, promoting transparency and fairness, discouraging short-term speculation in favor of long-term investments.

Acknowledgement

This work was supported by the strategic grant POSDRU/CPP107/ DMI1.5/S/78421, Project ID 78421 (2010), co-financed by the European Social Fund – Investing in People, within the Sectoral Operational Programme Human Resources Development 2007 – 2013

References

- Aguiar, M. and Gita, G., "Emerging Market Business Cycles: The Cycle is the Trend", Journal of Political Economy,vol.115, nr.1, 2007
- Aizenman, J., "Emerging markets", Santa Cruz, 2005 http://www2.ucsc.edu/econ /faculty/ aizenman/Emerging_Markets.pdf
- Aizenman, J. and Pinto, B., "Managing Volatility and Crises: Overview, Draft chapter for Managing Volatility and Crises: A Practitioner's Guide", Washington, The World Bank, 2004 http://economics.ucsc.edu/faculty/aizenman/ManagingVolatility.pdf
- Aizenman, J. and Powell, A., "Volatility and Financial Intermediation", Journal of International Money and Finance, 2003, vol.22 (5)
- Barberis, N. and Thaler, R, "A survey of behavioral finance", Handbook of the Economics of Finance, Elsevier Science B.V., 2003
- Birău Felicia Ramona – "Behavioral Finance Paradigm And Its Implications On Investment Decisions", International Scientific Conference „ECO-TREND 2011 - Exit From The Crisis And Revival Of Sustainable Growth", 8th edition, November 25-26, 2011, Tg – Jiu, Romania

- Birău Felicia Ramona, "The meanings of efficient market paradigm in the context of emerging capital markets. An analysis of weak-form efficiency on the Bucharest Stock Exchange", The International Conference, „Competitiveness And Stability In The Knowledge Based Economy", The Faculty of Economics and Business Administration, University of Craiova, Romania, 4 - 5 November 2011
- Chang, R. and Velasco, A., "Liquidity Crises in Emerging Markets: Theory and Policy", Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, Working Paper 99-15, October 1999
- Eichengreen, B. and Mody, A., "What explains changing spreads on emerging-market debt : fundamentals or market sentiment?", National Bureau Of Economic Research, Cambridge, 1998, http://www.nber.org/papers/w6408
- Fama Eugene, "Market effciency, long-term returns, and behavioral finance", Journal of Financial Economics 49, 1998, pp.283-306
- Fama Eugene, "Random Walks in Stock Market Prices", Financial Analysts Journal , 1965
- Malkiel, B., "The Efficient Market Hypothesis and Its Critics", Princeton University, CEPS Working Paper No. 91, 2003
- Mandelbrot, B. and Hudson, R., "The (Mis)behavior of Markets, A Fractal View of Risk, Ruin and Reward", Profile Books LTD, 2005
- Peters Edgar, "Fractal Market Analysis: Applying Chaos Theory to Investment and Economics", New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1994
- Sharpe,W. and Alexander, G., "Investments", 4th Edition. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1990
- Torre, A. and Schmukler, S., "Emerging Capital Markets and Globalization - The latin american experience", A Copublication Of Stanford Economics And Finance, An Imprint Of Stanford University Press, And The World Bank, 2007
- http://www.nyse.com/audience/listedcompanies.html
- http://siteresources.worldbank.org/DATASTATISTICS/Resources/GNIPC.pdf
- http://www.ftse.com/Indices/FTSE_Frontier_Indices/index.jsp
- http://www.msci.com/products/indices/country_and_regional/fm/

THE FRACTAL MARKET HYPOTHESIS

FELICIA RAMONA BIRĂU*

Abstract
In this article, the concept of capital market is analysed using Fractal Market Hypothesis which is a modern, complex and unconventional alternative to classical finance methods. Fractal Market Hypothesis is in sharp opposition to Efficient Market Hypothesis and it explores the application of chaos theory and fractal geometry to finance. Fractal Market Hypothesis is based on certain assumption. Thus, it is emphasized that investors did not react immediately to the information they receive and of course, the manner in which they interpret that information may be different. Also, Fractal Market Hypothesis refers to the way that liquidity and investment horizons influence the behaviour of financial investors.

Keywords*: Fractal Market Hypothesis, chaos theory, fractals, capital market, Efficient Market Hypothesis.*

Introduction

Capital markets are extremely complex and unpredictable. Capital markets' chaotic behavior and non-liniarities, complication and uncertainty, unexpected booms and crashes are some of the most challenging current issues.

Fractal Market Hypothesis is an alternative to Efficient Market Hypothesis and it is based on chaos theory. The antagonism between the two theories is more than evident. Actually, Fractal Market Hypothesis is a new and different approach which was developed to provide an alternative solution to the difficulties faced by the traditional theory in explaining certain financial phenomena.

Fractal Market Hypothesis is an alternative to Efficient Market Hypothesis and it is based on chaos theory. The antagonism between the two theories is more than evident. Actually, Fractal Market Hypothesis is a new and different approach which was developed to provide an alternative solution to the difficulties faced by the traditional theory in explaining certain financial phenomena.

Chaos theory has established a new level of understanding regarding the concept of capital market. In general, capital market is one of the most fertile and accessible areas to apply chaos theory. Through its fundamental characteristics, a capital market is even more appropriate. A chaotic system, as it is a capital market presents certain characteristics such as: unpredictability, instability, disorder, noise and lack of control.

Chaos represents a state of complex, unpredictable, nonlinear dynamics. Moreover, a chaotic system appears to be random when in fact is an evolved form of order. In other words, a chaotic system is a unconventional collage consists of a deterministic and a random process.

Chaos theory provides an explanation for the fact that complex and unpredictable results can and will occur in systems that are sensitive to their initial conditions. In addition, chaos theory is perceived as a qualitative study of complex and unstable irregular behavior regarding deterministic nonlinear systems such as capital markets.

Fractal Market Hypothesis - the boundary between traditional and unconventional finance

The analysis of capital market based on chaos theory provides a completely different perspective compared to the concept of Efficient Market Hypothesis. Under the terms of a globalized world, traditional finance paradigm can no longer be considered a panacea.

* Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Economics and Business Administration, University of Craiova, Craiova, Romania, (email: birauramona@yahoo.com).

Eugene Fama suggested that : "The ideal is a market in which firms can make production-investment decisions and investors can choose among the securities that represent ownership of firms' activities under the assumption that security prices at any time "fully reflect" all available information. A market in which prices always "fully reflect" available information is called efficient".

The central idea of the efficient market theory is that any information is available to all investors or market participants, so capital prices always incorporate and reflect all relevant information. Due to this issue, the price of a capital should reflect the knowledge and expectations of all investors or market participants. Because of that, except for long-term investment trends, future capital prices are difficult, if not impossible, to predict. In other words, an investment strategy based on past capital prices cannot preview future prices, no matter how complex and deep would be.

Eugene Fama defined market efficiency in a very accessible manner: "In an efficient market, competition among the many intelligent participants leads to a situation where, at any point in time, actual prices of individual securities already reflect the effects of information based both on events that have already occurred and on events which, as of now, the market expects to take place in the future. In other words, in an efficient market at any point in time the actual price of a security will be a good estimate of its intrinsic value."

On the other hand, according to Mandelbrot, in finance, the concept of chaos is not a rootless abstraction but a theoretical reformulation of a down-to-earth bit of market folklore - namely, that movements of a capital or currency all look alike when a market chart is enlarged or reduced so that it fits the same time and price scale.

Consequently, it becomes impossible to identify price changes from one period to another, even if it's weeks, days or hours. This feature defines the charts as fractal curves and make available to users a wide range of mathematical and computer analysis methods.

According to Peters, through the Fractal Market Hypothesis, we can understand why self-similar statistical structures exist, as well as how risk is shared distributed among investors.

Fractal Market Hypothesis is based on certain assumption. Thus, is emphasized that investors did not react immediately to the information they receive and of course, the manner in which they interpret that information may be different.

A central concept in the framework of this theory is the capital market liquidity. The Efficient Market Hypothesis does not mention at all the concept of liquidity. This aspect is very important considering the fact that the most dramatic crashes were caused by the lack of liquidity. As a consequence, a lack of liquidity constrains investors to accept any price whether it is fair or not.

A liquid capital market is a stable market. However, a capital market is stable when it consists of a large number of investors which have different investment horizons. In contradiction with Efficient Market Hypothesis, the Fractal Market Hypothesis suggests that information is valued according to the investment horizon of the investor. Short-term price changes have a predisposition to be more volatile than long-term price trends.

The capital market is a complex and dynamic system with noisy, nonstationary and chaotic data series.[1] Some researchers are suggesting that such complexity is an intinsic characteristic of such system. The interesting thing about the chaotic dynamics of capital markets is its great ability to generate dramatic movements which appear to be random, with higher frequency than linear models. Obviously, this chaotic behavior of capital markets in general, but especially of capital markets is a non-linear deterministic process. The non-linear models are much more complex and can generate a much more varied types of behavior.

Capital market modeling is an area of interest to capital traders, quantitative finance specialists, investment professionals and applied researchers. One of the most controversial issue in the recent past is probably whether the capital market can be predict in a satisfactory manner or not. Howerer, there is always some risk to investment in the capital market due to its unpredictable movements. Thus, an appropriate prediction model for capital market forecasting would be highly valued and useful, being an issue of a major interest.[2]

[1]Peters Edgar, "Fractal Market Analysis: Applying Chaos Theory to Investment and Economics", New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1994

Human understanding of capital market is limited, because our capability in analyzing all the date has not been complete and empirical economic methods have not been satisfactory. The obvios complexity of the capital markets has been investigated by various researchers and a large amount of research papers has been published in recent times. Resolving such complexity has been for many long years just an utopia.

Capital market is characterized by complex nonlinear dynamics which does not converge to a known purpose, a result that may be anticipated or influenced, or at least to a limit cycle. In this context, even the concept of financial investment rationality reaches a completely different meaning. Thus, limited rationality replaces rational expectations.

At a certain level, on the capital markets is distinguished exclusively the human dimension of the financial events and, of course, the causes that led to the triggering of these particular phenomenon. Fractal Market Hypothesis and implicitly Chaos theory are applied to explain different categories of discontinuities. In recent past, this unconventional theory was applied in the financial field for modeling discontinuities based on complex and quite sophisticated mathematical models.

Conclusions

Fractal Market Hypothesis is an alternative to classical finance. Metaphorically speaking, there are many scientific boundaries in terms of market efficiency.

Chaos theory represents a significant progress in understanding a dynamic, complex, unpredictable, nonlinear systems such as the capital market. Assuming that capital market is a chaotic system and not just purely random, chaos theory is in sharp contradiction with Efficient Market Hypothesis. A market in which prices always "fully reflect" available information is called efficient. The most important issue regarding efficient market theory is that it is not possible to outperform the market over the long-term. Chaos theory contradicts deeply and argued this conventional principle of traditional finance.

Capital markets behavior is extremely haotic and difficult to predict, so it is not an unusual or an impossible fact that seemingly minor events can cause major perturbations in the final outcome. In other words, very small and insignificant variations in initial conditions can generate extremely significant differences in the final event.

Acknowledgement

This work was supported by the strategic grant POSDRU/CPP107/ DMI1.5/S/78421, Project ID 78421 (2010), co-financed by the European Social Fund – Investing in People, within the Sectoral Operational Programme Human Resources Development 2007 – 2013

References

- Aizenman, J. and Pinto, B., "Managing Volatility and Crises: Overview, Draft chapter for Managing Volatility and Crises: A Practitioner's Guide", Washington, The World Bank, 2004 http://economics.ucsc.edu/faculty/aizenman/ManagingVolatility.pdf

[2] Birău Ramona, "Box-Jenkins Methodology vs. Fuzzy Logic in capital market modeling", The International Scientific Conference „Advancements in the theory of economic decisions under risk and uncertainty conditions. Fuzzy systems in economics", 26th edition, Iaşi, 16 september 2011, vol. XIII, Tehnopress, Iasi, ISBN 978-973-702-863-1, pp. 124-133

- Aizenman, J. and Powell, A., "Volatility and Financial Intermediation", Journal of International Money and Finance, 2003, vol.22 (5)
- Barberis, N. and Thaler, R, "A survey of behavioral finance", Handbook of the Economics of Finance, Elsevier Science B.V., 2003
- Birău Felicia Ramona – "Behavioral Finance Paradigm And Its Implications On Investment Decisions", International Scientific Conference „ECO-TREND 2011 - Exit From The Crisis And Revival Of Sustainable Growth", 8th edition, November 25-26, 2011, Tg – Jiu, Romania
- Birău Ramona, "Box-Jenkins Methodology vs. Fuzzy Logic in capital market modeling", The International Scientific Conference „Advancements in the theory of economic decisions under risk and uncertainty conditions. Fuzzy systems in economics", 26th edition, Iaşi, 16 september 2011, vol. XIII, Tehnopress, Iasi, ISBN 978-973-702-863-1, pp. 124-133
- Birău Felicia Ramona, "The meanings of efficient market paradigm in the context of capital markets. An analysis of weak-form efficiency on the Bucharest Capital Exchange", The International Conference, „Competitiveness And Stability In The Knowledge Based Economy", The Faculty of Economics and Business Administration, University of Craiova, Romania, 4 - 5 November 2011
- Blackledge, J. and Murphy, K., "Currency Trading Using the Fractal Market Hypothesis", Risk Management Trends, InTech, 2011
- Chang, R. and Velasco, A., "Liquidity Crises in Markets: Theory and Policy", Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, Working Paper 99-15, October 1999
- Chorafas, D., "Chaos theory in the financial markets: applying fractals, fuzzy logic, genetic algorithms, swarm simulation & the Monte Carlo method to manage market chaos & volatility", McGraw-Hill Professional, 1994
- Eichengreen, B. and Mody, A., "What explains changing spreads on -market debt : fundamentals or market sentiment?", National Bureau Of Economic Research, Cambridge, 1998, http://www.nber.org/papers/w6408
- Fama Eugene, "Market effciency, long-term returns, and behavioral finance", Journal of Financial Economics 49, 1998, pp.283-306
- Fama Eugene, "Random Walks in Capital Market Prices", Financial Analysts Journal , 1965
- Malkiel, B., "The Efficient Market Hypothesis and Its Critics", Princeton University, CEPS Working Paper No. 91, 2003
- Mandelbrot, B. and Hudson, R., "The (Mis)behavior of Markets, A Fractal View of Risk, Ruin and Reward", Profile Books LTD, 2005
- Mandelbrot, B., "How Fractals Can Explain What's Wrong with Wall Street. The geometry that describes the shape of coastlines and the patterns of galaxies also elucidates how capital prices soar and plummet", Scientific American, 2008
- Kellert, S., "In the Wake of Chaos: Unpredictable Order in Dynamical Systems", (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1993), cited in Crayton Bedford, The Case of Chaos, in Mathematics Teacher Magazine, April 1998.
- Peters Edgar, "Fractal Market Analysis: Applying Chaos Theory to Investment and Economics", New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1994
- Sharpe,W. and Alexander, G., "Investments", 4th Edition. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1990
- Torre, A. and Schmukler, S., " Capital Markets and Globalization - The latin american experience", A Copublication Of Stanford Economics And Finance, An Imprint Of Stanford University Press, And The World Bank, 2007

THE CAPITAL MARKET IN THE CURRENT ECONOMIC CONTEXT

CARMEN RADU[*]
LIVIU RADU[]

Abstract
For nearly a century now, economists have studied the advantages and disadvantages of financial systems based on either banks or financial markets in their attempt to forward economic growth and a better capital resources allocation. Nevertheless, the effects of the financial crisis that began in 2007 over the capital market are not only numerous, but also affect financial institutions, the stock exchange volume and list, the behaviour of market investors and not least such generate the need for capital market regulations to be amended. Even so, due to measures that have been taken, in Romania the stock exchange works on profit, while the effects of the financial crisis over such still fail to occur.

Keywords*: capital market investments, institutional investors, financial crisis, financial instruments, regulations.*

Introduction

For many years, economists from all over the world are examining the advantages and disadvantages of financial systems which are based either on the preponderance of the money market (namely the banking system) or on the financial markets, in their attempts to forward economic stability and a better capital funds allocation within the current economic and financial crisis. We are trying to demonstrate below which structure of the financial system better promotes inward investments. Also tests are made on whether the structure of the financial system has independent influence on inward investments by controlling the level of financial development. Economic studies have concluded that the level of financial development, namely the economic development, is the one that influences the investment decisions and not the structure of the financial system. So, in this case what could be the investors' option in conditions of economic crisis?

Two questions emerge regarding the impact of financial mediation on the real economy. The first question is whether the development of the financial sector affects the economic activity. The second question is whether the structure of the financial system weighs in obtaining some results in the economic sector. Many studies embrace the idea that the development of the financial system has a positive effect on the real economy, including investments, employment, productivity and sustainable economic growth.

Until recently, economists[1] have stopped on the role of financial system structure on economic activity based on some case studies regarding the advantages and disadvantages of either bank-based financial systems (Germany and Japan) or the capital market (U.S. and Great Britain). Studies in Germany and Japan have examined the banks playing a leading role in corporate management and the role of banks-firms relations in granting credits, allocating capital efficiency, productivity, namely on the whole economy. The economic research in U.S. and Great Britain have emphasized the role of the financial markets in providing information on corporate activity, mergers and acquisitions and their impact on economic efficiency. It is difficult to assert that a structure of the [*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: ceradu2005@gmail.com).

[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: ceradu2005@gmail.com).
[1] Asli Demirguc-Kunt and Ross Levine - Bank-based and market-based financial systems: cross-country comparisons, Development Research Group, The World Bank, and Finance Department, University of Minnesota, 2000

financial system is better than the other, especially since these studies have been made on some countries (Great Britain, Germany, Japan and the U.S.) that have similar performances on long-term economic growth.

New studies[2] have concluded that both banks and financial markets play an important role in supporting economic growth and that they are complementary. There were two new approaches in economic literature: (1) the role of financial services and (2) the role of law and finance.

The first approach emphasizes the role of the financial system in reducing market imperfections and providing key services to the private sector, thus increasing economic performance. Financial systems improve economic performance through a better assessment of investment opportunities, by exerting corporate control, minimizing the risk management, as well as capital allocation costs. As the financial system develops, it becomes more efficient in providing financial services, with direct implications on the economic growth. According to this approach, it is irrelevant to the economic activity whether the economy of a country is based on the financial system or the capital market.

The second approach which is based on the role of law and finance emphasizes the role of the creditor and investor rights for the development of financial intermediation. In countries where the legal system enforces these rights effectively, the financial system also becomes more efficient in providing services to the private sector. The quality of the legal system is one of the most important predictor of financial development. These studies wish to emphasize the role of the legal environment that will facilitate the development of the banking system and capital markets, which in turn will support economic growth.

Paper content

The banking system can influence investments in several ways[3].

The banking system can influence investments in several ways.

First, banks help to increase the funds available for investments by attracting deposits. Financial intermediaries are thus saving by reducing costs to attract savings and to collect and process information on debtors. Thus, for a given level of income per capita and for a potential saving rate, the current level of savings and investment should be higher in countries with a more developed banking system.

Second, banks facilitate investments by reducing liquidity risk. Generally, investments imply the mobilization of large amounts on a long-term. Private investors are reluctant to long-term fund immobilization, because they have a higher preference for liquidity. Banks can achieve the liquidity-profit balance by attracting the population's savings, making short-term loans and granting long-term loans. In a country that does not have a developed banking system, the profitable but more risky investment projects will not be carried out successfully due to lack of available capital. The development of the banking system should lead to a better allocation of capital and to an equilibrated balance between the short and long term private sector investments.

Third, financial intermediaries play an important role in reducing the cost of collecting and processing information on future investment projects, as well as on exerting control over firms. Many firms manage to obtain the necessary amount for financing their activity from a large mass of foreign investors who, individually, cannot monitor the use of funds by firm managers. On behalf of individual investors banks play the role of "delegated monitoring activity" and firm management

---

[2] Milan Kuber, Management consulting, ANCOR Publishing House, Bucharest 1992 and many other American authors Hans F. Olsen, Daniel Kessler, Kenneth Kuttner, Andrew Lo, Robert Merton, Vance Roley or David Laibson and Romanian authors: Valerica Olteanu, Beatrice Vlad (The behaviour of financial products consumers, online marketing magazine, volume 1 no. 4), Camelia Burja, T. Hada, M. Stoian, I. Stanciu, N.C. Ene, V. Valcu and others behaviour monitor. The banks' ability to carry out this function stimulates foreign investors to invest, which improves the allocation of funds for investment projects. A developed banking system will lead to increased investment and a better allocation of capital.

[3] Demirgüç-Kunt, Asli and Maksimovic, Vojislav. "Law, Finance, and Firm Growth", Journal of Finance, December 1998, 53(6), pp.2107-2137.

Banking innovations provided the possibility to offer customized financial products that address specific needs of each firm. These represent the investors' main source of external financing who have limited access to financial markets, such as small or newly constituted firms. According to economist Robert C. Merton,[4] "financial markets tend to be efficient institutional alternatives to intermediaries when the financial products are standardized, being able serve a large number of investors, and they are facilitating the contracting parties in order to be comfortable in assessing their prices." Studies have shown that, in industrialized countries, small firms depend more on bank financing than large firms. Moreover, the reduction of the volume of loans granted by banks (due to the new monetary policy) has a large impact on the investments of the firms that are dependent on the banking financing.

Banks are important for the discovery of new financial products due to the customized packages offered to customers. Some of these new products are transferred on the capital markets; banks and financial markets are complementary institutions. Therefore, banks play an important role in the process of financial innovation for both the real economy – by financing innovative investment projects - and for the financial sector - by creating new financial instruments.

Those who criticize the bank-based financial systems describe a number of disadvantages and weak points of such a system in terms of growth in investment and economic performance. First, banks are interested in active participation in innovative investment projects from which they can earn a lot reducing the effort of firms to carry out innovative activities. Second, banks may be inclined towards greater caution. Indeed, evidence shows that in Japan firms closely connected to a bank are using fewer technological innovations and have lower profit rates than the others, fact which suggests that banks profit from their relationship with the client-firms. Third, critics of the bank-based economies state that the existence of some close relations between firms and banks prevent the competition on the credit market and reduce banks' ability to boost corporate governance. Some studies show that banks tend to support firms that face problems, but where they and / or other banks from the system have shares, while their relations with the other firms promotes the interests of creditors. If a close connection between firms and banks can facilitate access to capital, this does not necessarily reduce the cost of capital, nor increase the volume of investments for the firms where they hold shares.

The implications of the financial sector on enterprises

Several recent studies have shown that industrial sectors, namely those firms that depend heavily on external financing, grow faster in countries with developed financial sectors. Therefore it is natural to expect for industrial specialization and trade to be influenced by the financial sector. Indeed, a well-developed financial intermediation sector and some developed financial markets have a positive impact on the external trade financing.

Financial systems endowed with strong, well-structured and regulated institutions will specialize in production of goods that use intensively the services provided by these institutions. Economists believe that the financial markets and intermediaries are all factors that influence the production of goods and services. In order to support comparisons between countries, the condition imposed to a production factor is to be movable in international trade. Although it is not obvious that this condition is met, it is considered that between the development of the domestic financial sector and the internationalization of production factors is a negative relationship. Recent studies have shown that financial services are immovable geographically speaking, even in the USA.

[4] Robert Merton, Nobel Prize laureate in economics in 1997 (together with Myron S. Scholes)

The financial sector

The financial sector is seen as a production factor. A country endowed with strong financial institutions will specialize in sectors that widely use services provided by these institutions. On the other hand, countries with developed financial markets are external financing exporters.

Why the financial sector is seen as an immovable production factor building in terms of international trade? Currently the answer to this question is given by the fact that the inclusion of international production factors can lead to incorrect results. If capital markets are integrated, the level of domestic financial development would not be important for local investment opportunities. Financial services are not movable in terms of trading, even within a country.

The information asymmetry on the financial markets and the conflict of interests between creditors and debtors have led to intermediaries specialised in evaluating and monitoring investment projects, information dissemination, which reduces the negative effects of market imperfections. If we were to compare two countries with relatively equal interest rates, of which one has a more developed financial sector, the difference would occur in terms of allocation of financial capital. The level of uncertainty of investment projects and the share of investments in intangible assets are just two of the factors that make financial intermediation even more important. Financial intermediaries have other roles as well besides collecting money to finance investments in physical capital.

Many economists consider the financial sector as a type of human or organizational capital, specialised in overcoming market imperfections related to the financing of the economic growth. The level of financial development represents a determinant factor of the level of development of firms, industry and overall economy. In this type of study a causality problem emerges: a developed financial sector may be the result of high demand for financial services, suggesting a causal reversed relationship, meaning that the industry structure affects the demand for financial services and, therefore, the financial development as well.

Current debates determined by the economic crisis are focusing on bank-based financial systems versus capital market-based financial systems.

An economy based on the banking system may be superior to one based on the financial market due to long-term relationships established between banks and firms, which may increase the investors' incentives to acquire information about the firm and exercise corporate control. Capital markets aggregate information about firms, as well as internal market and they make these data publicly available, an action which a bank cannot do. Moreover, corporate control may be facilitated by stock markets through compensation schemes that are linked to stock market performance. Banks invest less in risky projects, being biased against risk; which can be explained by observations made upon economies based on financial markets where riskier industries attract more external funding. Another explanation might be capital markets expand the possibilities for risk diversification, thereby making high-risk projects more attractive for the individual investor.

The efficiency of financial markets has been brought into theoretical debates starting with 1970, Eugene Fama's studies, which have been followed by a synthesis in 1991, and Jensen's in 1978, Grossman's and Stiglitz's studies in 1980, etc., thus being formulated the hypothesis on whether financial markets have their own "intelligence". In this regard, three major trends can be identified among those trying to analyze the behaviour of financial markets: a) random walk theory according to which all the fluctuation of financial markets is random, b) "fundamentalist" school theory according to which any fluctuation is the result of an intelligible whole, within which assessments can be made c) technical and cartographic analysis which we can call diagnosis and whose supporters take an intermediate position and, rejecting the examination of the explanatory factors of the assessment of financial assets' course, believe that any asset has no other possible value than the price set by the market.

Capital market

Most studies highlight a positive correlation between the activity of capital markets and investment market. In which way do the capital markets effectively affect investments?

Capital market provides information about the expected profitability of investments. As a result, a functioning capital market may increase the volume of investments because it identifies the most profitable projects (with an estimated probability of achieving them and a higher risk) which otherwise would have been considered too risky. Capital market also affects the quality of investments, as well as capital allocation because it identifies the most profitable economic activities.

On the other hand, capital market affects investment decisions by its effects on cost of capital. Along with the development of capital market and as it becomes more liquid, the investment risks decrease which leads a reduction of financing costs. This statement is supported also by studies on the liberalization of capital markets, which is followed by an increase in market capitalization, a reduction in capital cost and an increase in volume of investments.

Third, capital market influences positively investments by exerting pressure on corporate managers, threatened by hostile takeovers and mergers. Capital market affects corporate governance because it allows the connection between firm performance and managers' compensation.

Critics of financial markets-based financial systems support a number of factors that limit their ability to increase the volume and quality of investments. Investment decisions are based on the fact that the market estimation on firm's profitability is a better indicator than that calculated by the firm's managers. This difference emerges due to asymmetric information or speculative operations. Which of the following predictions is better: the prediction made by the market or the one made by the firm's management? Opinions vary in this case. On one hand, some economists suggest that investment decisions should be based primarily on market evaluation. The reason is the fact that foreign investors are willing to accept lower rates of return, while managers try to equalize the rate of return with the marginal product of capital. Although mergers and acquisitions occur on the capital market, critics show that this does not necessarily mean a higher efficiency. Financial markets do not eliminate the information asymmetry and those inside the firms have more information than the outsiders. From the U.S. experience results the fact that large firms do survive not due to increasing profitability, but due to the fact that that the size of the firm increases even more through mergers and acquisitions. Moreover, takeovers do not necessarily lead to a quantitative increase in investment; there is only a transfer of "property" from old owners to new owners. Massive takeovers that took place in the 80s on the U.S. capital market did not resulted in increased net investments or market efficiency, but, in turn, they damaged the corporate sector to a great extent.

Also based on the observations made on the U.S. capital market, it was demonstrated that hostile takeovers create value only for the new owners, by redistributing the property to the disadvantage of staff and suppliers. Experts point out that hostile takeovers determine a preference of managers to make investments with short-term results at the expense of long-term investments, with negative consequences for the economic performance.

The underlying cause of the financial crisis was the abundant liquidity created by the world's main central banks (FED - U.S. Central Bank, BOJ - Central Bank of Japan) and by the desire of the countries that export oil and gas to limit the currency appreciation. Also, there was a over saturation with savings generated by the increasing integration into the global economy of some countries (China, Southeast Asia in general), with high rates of accumulation, but also by the global redistribution of wealth and income towards the supply exporters (oil, gas, etc.). The abundant liquidity and the over saturation with savings created available resources for investments, including sophisticated financial instruments, more difficult to understand for some investors. The consequences of the abundant liquidity were the very low interest rates and their low volatility. Together, these consequences have led to the increased appetite for assets with large gains. In addition, the low market volatility has created the tendency to underestimate the risk and a real lack of vigilance from the investors. The risk margins have also been very low and non-discriminatory. Together, the low interest rates, the appetite for high income assets, the low vigilance to risk and the low margins hampered the warnings of prices on the financial markets and led to an incomplete understanding of the involved risks. Under these circumstances a series of microeconomic reasons has also functioned as aggravating: excessive securitization, cracks in the business model of the rating agencies, privately rational outsourcing but socially ineffective and, finally, an increased international competition for deregulations. The consequence of the excessive securitization was that once the crisis was triggered by the emergence of failure to pay rates on loans for houses, the financial market became non-transparent. Establishment of investors' lack of confidence has placed rapidly the bonds issued by the special purpose vehicles (SPV) in the risky category (quality of assets financed was not clear any longer) and refinances became impossible. Due to discrepancy between maturities on assets and liabilities, these SPV have started relying on financing from sponsoring banks. In the end, the liquidity demand combined with the loss of confidence in banks, resulted in the rush after cash and the effective interest rate started to increase.

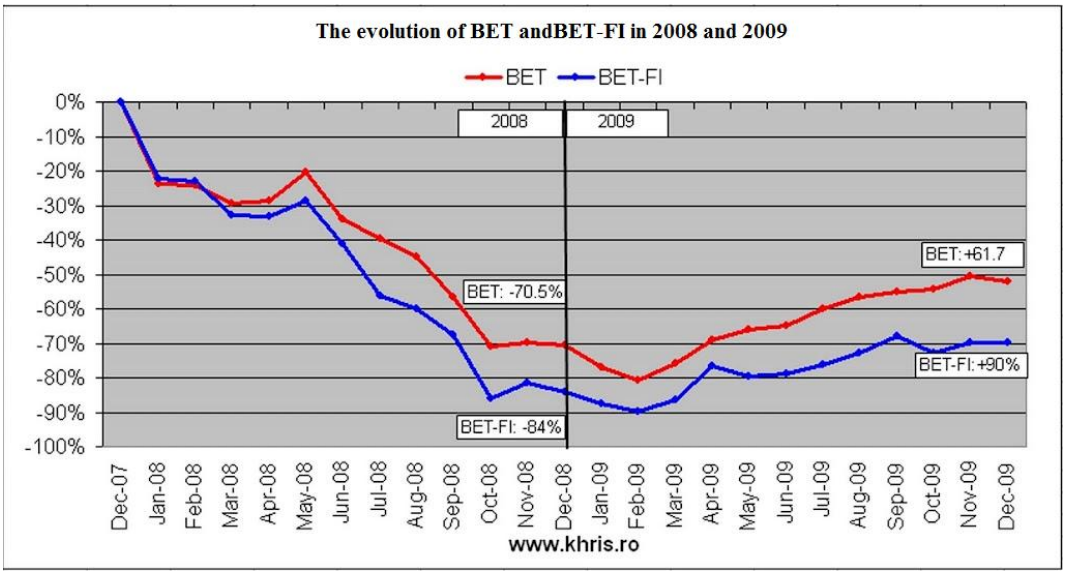
In the USA and some states in Europe, governments and central banks responded by improving liquidity; granting governmental warranties for loans; recapitalization of financial institutions; warranty of the newest issuance by insured banks; prevention of erratic collapse of major interconnected enterprises; purchase of stocks in banks; coordinated reductions of interest rates. Although such type of measures have been implemented, after 17 months from starting the turbulences, the market remained non-transparent, and hence the financial crisis increased and facilitated its entry in the real sector of economy, first in the USA, then in other developed countries. What are the main challenges from now on? How to invest effectively in conditions of recession?

The evolution of stock market

After the poor results in 2008, not too many analysts hoped that in 2009 we'd witness a comeback of the decreasing quotations trend on the BSE, trend started in mid 2007 and continued until early 2009, at which the BET index was 82% lower than the maximum, and BET-FI fell by 92% - in other words, who invested 100 lei in the SIFs in July 2007, in February 2009 had only 8 lei. Moreover, the capitalization of stock markets worldwide decreased from $ 63,000 billion in October 2007 to $ 28.7,000 in February 2009, which means a decrease of 54.4%. Thus, the DJIA value was 53% lower than the peak in October 2007, London's index FTSE 100 had fallen by 47%, while the German DAX by 55%. If we think that in order to compensate for a decrease of 84%, an increase of over 500% is needed, meaning 6 times. However, who bought in early 2009 won in 10 months the equivalent bank interest for at least 5-6 years. The evolution of BSE for BET and BET-FI indices, from 2008 - 2009 had the following configuration:

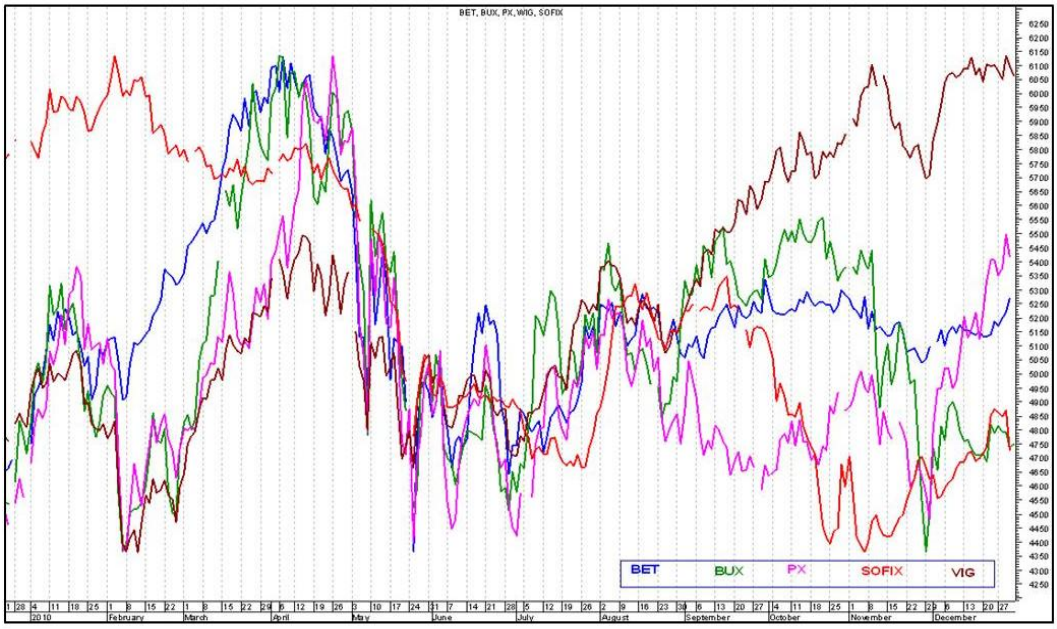


Unfortunately, the evolution of Bucharest Stock Exchange is largely dependent on the development of the other markets, especially the U.S., and the evolution of the developed economies during crisis can also shake the Bucharest Stock Exchange, regardless the evolution of the Romanian economy.

2010 was a weaker year for the stock quote although most indices ended the year with positive values. For share indices, 2010 recorded more modest values than the previous year. The performance of stock indices on BSE, as well as international stock market indices was affected by the fact that some European Union countries have faced and are still facing the sovereign debt crisis, while developed economies have continued to increase after the financial crisis. The contradictory performances recorded on the stock markets of the emerging countries are remarkable: poorer performances on some stock markets in emerging countries (Brazil, China), but an increase on Russian stock market. But some stock markets in Central and Eastern Europe (Czech Republic, Austria, Poland and Romania) had better performance, except the Sofia Stock Exchange which registered a downward trend.

Comparing the evolution of the stock indices in Central and Eastern Europe in 2010, one can see that the Polish WIG index increased by 18.8%, in Austria the ATX index was 16.4%, then the BET index was 12.3%, the Czech index PX was 9.6% and Hungary's BUX index which increased by only 0.5%. SOFIX index in Bulgaria decreased by -15.2% was the discordant note.

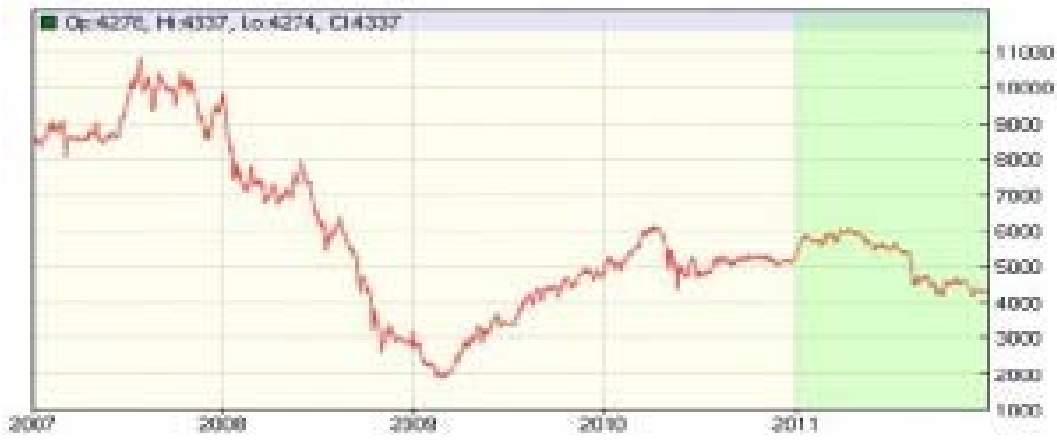
The evolution of the main stock indices in Central and Eastern Europe in 2010



Source: Puls Capital

The evolution of the stock indices experienced distinct periods in 2010. The first part of 2010, precisely the first 3 months, led to further increases recorded since March 2009. But sovereign debt crisis in Europe and panic felt on large international financial markets have shaken the stock market in Bucharest which was already small, with no large companies listed. Thus the situation has changed radically in the second quarter of 2010, when stock indices showed significant corrective movements according to stock market indices of developed markets. In the third quarter, stock indices began to resume their increases, while the fourth quarter brought new withdrawals and reluctant developments of these indices.

Romanian capital market recorded a dropping year in 2011. The evolution of the main index of Bucharest Stock Exchange (BET) from 2007 to 2011 is presented below:



Source: Puls Capital

Contrary to pessimistic analysis carried out by Razvan Pasol, president of Intercapital Invest brokerage company, Romania, the Bucharest Stock Exchange (BSE), ranked 59 in the world in 2011 in the world's major stock markets based on the variation of the main indices.

Due to the global economic crisis only 12 markets ended with positive results in 2011, while the other 77 markets brought negative results to investors. Venezuela Stock Exchange ranked first with a benefit of 78% on the main index. Caracas market is strongly influenced by the decisions of the political regime in this country and the nationalization of several major companies, as well as the shutting down of more than 40 brokerage firms represent the most recent measures that have negatively influenced trading on this market. Stock exchange from Mongolia, Panama and Jamaica are ranked next, each with double-digit returns for their main indices. The New York Stock Exchange makes the USA the only developed market in the world to finish the year with increased results.

Increasing the threshold for holding SIFs and subsequent recovery helped Romanian index BET-FI to get on the first part of the ranking. But taking into account the evolution of BET, the main index of the Bucharest Stock Exchange, Romania descends into the lower half of the above mentioned ranking.

The penultimate place is occupied by Greece, the most affected country by the sovereign debt crisis in 2011. In 2011 Athens Stock Exchange fell by nearly 61%. Only Cyprus Stock Exchange recorded values lower than Greece, with an average loss of 72%.

Conclusions

Before the current crisis, some insights about the aggregate efficiency of the financial system and legal environment have widened the debates on the merits of various structures of the financial system. Some economists argued that financial markets and banking system are complementary rather than substitutes and that the efficiency of the financial sector as a whole, is more important. They believed that the legal system represents the key for the financial system to function (especially, protection of creditors and minority shareholders against expropriation by majority shareholders and management team). Currently Romania is facing one of the highest rates of expansion of money supply in the world, which could predict a large increase in the Bucharest Stock Exchange. In this regard, a recent study made by the analysts of the Austrian financial group Erste Group and released on December 21, 2011[5] shows that in periods marked by intense financial and economic turmoil as the one that we are currently going through – and which will probably continue, if not get worse, and in 2012 – the analysis of the underlying factors is no longer able to offer the players on the stock exchange the right signals needed to accurately explain the market developments and to make correct investment decisions. According to analysis conducted by the Austrian financial group, it is believed that accelerating the growth rhythm of the money supply and credit lead to the appreciation of stock quotes listed, while the opposite phenomenon puts negative pressure on stock prices. Accelerating the growth rhythm of the money supply[6] and the volume of credit in economy is likely to signal investors that a boom period on the stock market is about to happen. Monetary indicators that are most useful to observe in order to anticipate the trends of the capital markets are money supply in a narrow sense (M1), which comprises currency in circulation and current deposits in banks, intermediate money (M2), composed of narrow money M1 plus deposits with agreed maturity up to two years. Along with monetary aggregates, the evolution of credit both the nongovernmental, corporate and public, as well as the government credit may be taken into account. Thus, "investors must rely on the appreciation of stock quotes and to overexpose themselves on cyclical sectors and

[5] The study includes the U.S.A., the Euro area, Japan, the four BRIC countries, 6 countries in Central and Eastern Europe and Turkey financial companies shares as long as the credit is easily accessible and rapidly growing. As soon as lending conditions tighten and growth rate of loans decreases, investors should sell these shares gradually and to focus on more defensive sectors," says the Erste Group study. In conclusion the two markets overlap in a unique way so that none of them can develop without the contribution of the other. Only if the stock could exploit the advantage provided by the listing of the Fondul Proprietatea which is currently exploited too little, although there is great interest from investors.

[6] Gerald Walek, Henning Esskucken and Stephan Lingnau. - Austrian vision, Bursa newspaper January 9, 2012

References

- Edward Altman and Brenda Karlin (2009) – The Re-Emergence of Distressed Exchanges in Corporate Restructurings. Published in: Journal oj Credit Risk, Vol. 5, No.2, p. 43-56;
- Oliver Blanchard (2009) – The Crisis: Basic Mechanisms, and Appropriate policies, IMF Working Paper, International Monetary Fund;
- Asli Demirguc - Kunt and Ross Levine (2000) - Bank-based and market-based financial systems: cross-country comparisons, Development Research Group, The World Bank, and Finance Department, University of Minnesota;
- Asli Demirgüç-Kunt, and Maksimovic, Vojislav (1998) - Law, Finance, and Firm Growth, Journal of Finance, December 1998, 53(6), p. 2107-2137;
- Milan Kuber (1992) - Management consulting, Ancor Publishing House, Bucharest;
- Valerica Olteanu, Beatrice Vlad (2007) - The behaviour of financial products consumers, online marketing magazine, volume 1 no. 4;
- www.kmarket.ro;

STRUCTURAL AND COHESION FUNDS VERSUS THE IMF LOANS: IMPLICATIONS AND CHALLENGES FOR THE ROMANIAN FINANCIAL SYSTEM

VASILE COCRIŞ[*]
CORINA BERICA[]
ANCA ELENA NUCU[]

Abstract
The Structural and Cohesion Funds as well as the loans obtained by our country from the IMF have significant implications upon the Romanian financial system. This article is a comparative approach structured on five parts as it follows: the second part is a review of the specific literature regarding the theme of our work, the third part is an analysis of the absorption stage of the Structural Funds and the evolution of the stand by agreements between Romania and IMF, the fourth part is a SWOT analysis of the Structural Funds versus the IMF loans and the last section is dedicated to the econometric quantification of the efficiency of the two financing opportunities. The IMF loans ensure the coordinates of the financial stability but the structural funds represent the link between stability and the development that Romania needs. We consider and claim that Romania needs European funds. We do not ask to give up entirely to the IMF loans but we plead for having an equilibrium which could support the economical development.

Key Words: Structural and Cohesion Funds, IMF facilities, economic growth, financial stability, Romania.

Introduction

Our paper covers a complex financial matter, related to the opportunity of attracting European funds versus the implications of the loans obtained by our country from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) upon the Romanian financial system. The purpose of this article is a comparative approach of the two funding sources mentioned above and it structured on five parts as it follows: the second part is a review of the specific literature regarding the theme of our work, the third part is an analysis of the absorption stage of the Structural Funds and the evolution of the stand by agreements between Romania and IMF, the fourth part is a SWOT analysis of the Structural Funds versus the IMF loans and the last section is dedicated to the econometric quantification of the efficiency of the two financing opportunities.

Using a simple linear regression model we analyse the efficiency of the Structural and Cohesion Funds versus the IMF loans using Romania's example for the period 01.2007- 08.2011, based on data with monthly frequency.

In academic literature, we find a lot of studies which analyze the implication of IMF facilities upon financial systems and economic growth (Hutchison, 2004; Atoyan and Conway, 2005; Nsouli et al., 2005; Barro and Lee, 2005; Steinward and Stone, 2009). Instead, we can not say the same thing about the Structural and Cohesion Funds, which are a relatively new topic for the economic theory and practice, and studies on the example of the Romanian economy are few.

The critiques consider that the Romanian government has preferred the IMF because the money from the European funds "cannot be embezzled" and has chosen to get the Romanian people into debt. This affirmation is sustained by the austerity conditions imposed by the IMF. In the context of the financial assistance offered by the IMF, which determinates a drastic reorientation of the fiscal [*] Professor, Ph. D., „Alexandru Ioan Cuza" University of Iasi, Romania, (email: vcocris@uaic.ro).

[] Ph. D. candidate, „Alexandru Ioan Cuza" University of Iasi, Romania, (email: corina.berica@yahoo.com).
[] Ph. D. candidate, „Alexandru Ioan Cuza" University of Iasi, Romania, (email: nucu.anca@yahoo.com).

– budgetary policy, we suggest the raise of the absorption rate of the Structural and Cohesion Funds as possible solution.

We propose a comparative approach of Structural and Cohesion Funds in relation with IMF loans in order to outline a complete background of their challenges upon Romanian financial system.

Previous empirical research

The European Union aims at reducing the economic and social gaps among the EU countries using the Structural Instruments. The European Fund for Regional Development and the Social European Fund constitute the Structural Funds and these last ones along with the Cohesion Fund form the Structural Instruments.

It is very important to emphasize the impact of these European funds upon the economical growth. The image of irredeemable financing creates a perpetual satisfaction feeling and an enrichment desire. John Bradley and Gerhard Untiedt have identified in their work Do economic models tell us anything useful about Cohesion Policy impacts? A comparison of HERMIN, QUEST and ECOMOD, 4 main stages in analysing the impact of the cohesion policy:

Stage 1: The cohesion policy – a challenge

Stage 2: The creation of the interventions inside the cohesion policy

Stage 3: The methodology for evaluating the impact of the cohesion policy

Stage 4: The presentation and analysis of the results

It is not easy to measure the impact but we can use a series of measures for creating an overview (Report from Commission, 2010):

- The regional statistics measure in terms of GNP, labour market, unemployment, but they do not show the impact of the policy in terms of changes;
- Monitoring the programmes emphasizes the result of the policy: how many kilometres have been built? How many persons have been trained?
- The analysis cost-benefit ex-post can estimate the contribution of the infrastructure to the economical growth;
- Macroeconomic models: The General Direction of the Regional Policy uses two macro-models: HERMIN and QUEST and also a model regarding the transportation investments TRANSTOOLS;
- Models with impact upon the labour market, the companies and the farms: model that has been recently applied in 6 member states: Denmark, Germany, Italy, Austria, Poland and United Kingdom with different socio-economical features but representative for the other EU states;
- Interviews, case studies can be used for quantifying the contribution of the Structural Instruments.

It is obvious that the European Commission cannot bring proofs for justifying the performance of the Structural Instruments. Thus, EU asks the state members to make their own evaluations. And when dealing with several evaluations it is possible to draw an image of the performance and of the improvement of the Structural Instruments.

An example is the ex-post evaluation of the period 2000-2006. For the FEDR evaluation 2000-2006, 105 detailed case studies have been generated, 29.500 monitoring indicators have been analysed from 382 programmes. In the context of the ex-post evaluation for FES 49 case studies have been made and 2000 measures from 238 programmes have been analysed (Report from Commission, 2010).

For quantifying the impact of the Structural and Cohesion Funds, many authors use the mathematic – econometric model type HERMIN, model focused upon the main features of the marginal economies of EU (Bradley and Untiedt, 2007).

Using such a model for the Romanian economy implies the analysis of the four very important blocks that constitute the model based on the studies elaborated so far (Ibraim, 2010).

For catching as precise as possible the influence of the structural instruments upon the regional development from Romania and considering the Herom model, the Romanian version of the Hermin model, which has been used during the autumn of 2008 by the experts of the National Commission of Economical Prognosis for a quantitative estimation of the macroeconomic impact of the Community Support Framework for the period 2007 – 2020 (Marchis, 2008).

The HEROM model considers two basic scripts imagining an economical growth in Romania, „with structural funds" and „without structural funds". The „without structural funds" version does not consider the EU structural funds planned for Romania during 2007 - 2013, being limited only to the pre-adhesion funds. The second script „with structural funds" is based on the supposition that the structural funds planned in the National Development Plan 2007-2013, will be absorbed at a rate of 100%. The HEROM model starts also from the premises that after 2013 the structural funds will be reduced to zero, fact that will cause a „shock" for the Romanian economy, with negative effects for several years (Gherghinescu and Băndoi, 2009).

The literature offers multiple possibilities for analysing the impact of the structural instruments in accomplishing the economical convergence. Thus, some specialists recommend macroeconomic simulation models (Bradley et all., 2006), this version being accepted by the European Commission while others choose regression econometric models oriented towards specific dimension, coordinates, influence factors (Boldrin and Canova, 2001; Ederveen et all., 2002; Fuente, 2003).

Ibraim Kagitc, in his PhD thesis, Improving the attraction and use of structural and cohesion funds of the European Union in financing the Romanian projects, has calculated the impact of the Structural Funds upon the modification of the main variables (GNP and the gross capital formation), econometrically by estimating two regressions which follow the way in which the variation of the funds generate the variation of the two variables indicated above (Ibraim, 2010). The conclusion of the analysis has shown that the impact of these financial instruments upon the GNP and upon the gross capital formation has not been a considerable one, although we have to mention that Romania needs reliable and realistic projects for attracting European funds.

Gabriela Marchis, in her PhD thesis, The Impact of the European Union Extension upon the Regional Strategies and Policies. The Role of the Structural Funds, has chosen a multiple linear regression model for testing the existence of the relationship between the GNP of each county and the volume of the investments, the working population, the number of projects and the absolute absorption of the Phare funds during the programming period 2000 – 2006 (Marchis, 2008). The F test of global signification has shown that the regression is adequate for the purpose of predicting the GNP of the county and the observed data have allowed the identification of a linear valid model especially between the volume of investments and the county's GNP.

In the modern literature we identify many studies which investigate the way in which the IMF programmes and their implementation affect the equilibrium of the payment balance, the inflation and the economical growth (Bird, 2007; Steinward and Stone, 2009). The impact of the IMF programmes upon the economical development is analysed by many authors whose conclusions are different without reaching unanimous consensus. The empirical contradictory results appear from the differences regarding the sample of analysed countries, the test period and the methodology used.

Dreher (2006) using panel data for over 98 countries during the 1970-2000, analyses the way in which the IMF implication influences the economical growth and the empiric results show that the impact of the conditionality upon the development is quantitatively low. Steinwand and Stone (2009) claim that very few aspects are certainly known about the effects of the IMF credits but that a lot had been learned about the mechanics of the IMF programmes which will be considered for obtaining objective estimations of these effects .

The impact of the IMF programmes upon the countries facing the crisis seems a certitude. Kutan et all (2011) analyses the impact of the assistance offered by IMF upon the countries that experiment periods of financial crisis, such as Indonesia during the Asian crisis. The results indicate the fact that the IMF actions during that crisis had a significant impact upon the profitableness of different sectors. Also, the results of the empirical tests done by Dreher and Walter (2010) show that the involvement of IMF reduces the probability of currency crisis. Hândoreanu (2010) analyses the impact of the agreement between Romania and the International Monetary Fund upon the exchange rate EUR/RON. The conclusion of the study is that the agreement with the International Monetary Fund has reduced the pressure regarding the depreciation of the national currency and, in conditions of caeteris paribus, has lead to a reduction of the inflationist pressures which are sent by the currency exchange channel.

Stenward and Stone (2009) suggest four main directions for improving the IMF programmes: refining the existing selection models, shaping the heterogeneity of the debtors, shaping the variations in conditionality; shaping the variations in practice .

The justification of the opportunity of the IMF loans for the economy of our country rise different opinions. The reason for which the central bank has made appeal to such loans is justified by the necessity of avoiding a financial crisis caused by the lack of currency provisions (Creţan and Lacrois, 2010). The IMF intervention has generated the reduction of the public expenses along with the increasing of the taxes with serious implications reflected at the level of the main macroeconomic indicators. The effects of the economical redressing measures will be experiences in time.

The stage of the absorption vs the stand by agreements of romania with imf

The Structural Instruments are specially designed for contributing to reducing the gaps in seven domains very important for our country. Thus, seven Operational Programmes (OP) have been elaborated in the context of the "Convergence" objective (meant to accelerate the economical development for the regions left behind, by investments in human capital and in the basic infrastructures).

Table 2 shows the stage of the Structural and Cohesion Funds absorption identified in the column for internal payments towards beneficiaries and intermediary payments from the CE. The Ministry of European Affairs (MAEur) makes a few clarifications regarding the definition of the absorption rate (Press release, 2011, http://www.dae.gov.ro):

Absorption in national plan (14,72%) – quantified by the real payments towards the beneficiaries accounts (pre-financings and reimbursements from community funds and from the state budget).

External or effective absorption (3,72%) – transfer of the advance from the European Commission at programme level and transfer of the intermediary payments (reimbursements).

Table 1. The stage of absorption of the Structural and Cohesion Funds for each Operational Programme the 30th of November 2011

Programme	Allocation EU 2007-2013 mil. RON	Projects submitted		Projects approved		Contracts Signed		Domestic payments to beneficiaries		Interim payments from the EC
		No.	Total value (mil.RON)	No.	EU Value (mil.RON	No.	EU Value (mil.RON)	mil. RON	%	mil. EUR	%
Transport	19 686	115	37 880	62	7 857	53	6 857	609	3,09	113,69	2,49
Environment	19 455	457	34 642	288	16 134	233	16 005	2 380	11,50	85,36	1,89
Regional	16 065	7 924	53 145	2 773	13 543	2 340	12 098	4 278	24,49	274,56	7,37
Human Resource Developmente	14 987	10 187	43 031	2 990	15 118	2 139	12 093	3 742	23,61	102,92	2,96
Competitiveness	11 013	11 051	67 897	3 288	7 465	2 094	4 656	1 878	15,39	117,49	4,60
Administrative Capacity	897	1 346	3 480	344	540	323	444	102	10,67	9,84	4,73
Technical Assistance	734	92	414	78	266	73	251	87	11,70	11,65	6,85
TOTAL	82 837	31 172	240 489	9 823	60 923	7 255	52 404	13 076	14,72	715,51	3,72

Source: site of The Ministry of European Affairs (MAEur)

The results of the absorption are not at all encouraging and the disappointment is even stronger when we observe that by POS Transport only 3,09% have been attracted from the 2007 – 2013 allocation for the modernization and the development of the national transportation networks, for promoting the railroad, naval and intermodal transportation. We wonder if we don't really need intervention in these chapters and if we afford to miss such an opportunity. Most people blame the imposed bureaucracy, the difficulties in obtaining the notifications etc. We prefer to develop human resources, fact proved by the percentage of 23,61%.

The implementation of programmes and of new support services for developing the enterprise culture, the development and promotion of modern management abilities are very important indeed. In the beginning it was understandable that many people needed training courses, teaching, support but we can benefit from the new abilities for accessing more funds for the environment, for transportation, for developing the administrative capacity.

On the other hand, the financial assistance given by IMF to Romania has been materialized in loan Stand by agreements, loan programmes and, starting 1972, our country has used the IMF resources on twelve occasions as financial support for the government economical projects. The 31st of December 2010, the total amount drawn by Romania from the IMF agreement was of 9,8 billion DST (approximately 11,9 billion Euro) from which 7,85 billion DST by BNR and the difference – in an unusual way – by MFP for financing the budget deficit.

The total of the irredeemable credits by the end of February 2011 was of 10569 million DST, respectively 1025.52% from the quota. The Romanian authorities have closed in March 2011 a new financial agreement with EU, IMF and MB for 5,4 billion Euro, the support offered by IMF being of 3,5 billion Euro.

Swot analysis of the structural and cohesion funds vs IMF loans

By this article we try to answer to the question: Why we take loans from IMF and we don't attract Structural Funds?

Romania has received in May 2009 a financial support of 20 billion Euro, from which 12,95 billion Euro (17,1 billion USD) from the IMF. Many critiques claim that we have chosen the wrong way because we won't have enough funds to return this amount. Some say that the Romanian government has preferred the IMF because the European funds "cannot be embezzled" and has chosen to burry the Romanian people in debt. This affirmation is sustained by the austerity conditions suggested by IMF and the obligations imposed.

In order to see which of these financing possibilities could contribute more to the economical growth of Romania we will try to emphasize some features which define these international funds:

Strong aspects

Structural and cohesion funds

reducing the economical and social gaps among the EU members by the Structural Instruments; irredeemable financing – solution against the negative effects of the financial crisis; making the EU members responsible by the decentralized (national) management of the funds;

creating a close collaboration between the European, national and regional authorities in writing, evaluating and implementing projects (partnership principle); lower costs of accessing projects by the Structural Funds compared to other financing modalities (reference to the beneficiary and to the Romanian Government).

International monetary fund

- IMF offers financial assistance to the states who have difficulties in the payment balance, giving them the possibility to rebuilt the international provisions stock, to stabilize the currency rate, to continue the payments of the imports and to reinstall the economical growth conditions;
- the IMF implication reduces the probability of currency crisis;
- the IMF programmes re-establish the investors' trust and reduce the contagion from other markets, having in the end a positive effect upon the financial stability;
- the partnership with IMF is a supplementary anchor for the reforms that Romania needs;
- introducing at the level of the bank sector the International Standards of Financial Reports (ISFR) starting the 1st of January 2012.

Weak points

Structural and cohesion funds

- lack of commitment and financial instruments which should allow the co-financing sustainment;
- reimbursement principle – means that the projects beneficiaries should make some expenses from their own funds and recovering the amounts after the audit and the validation of those expenses;
- weak institutional capacity for controlling the way to spend the funds and to prevent fraud.

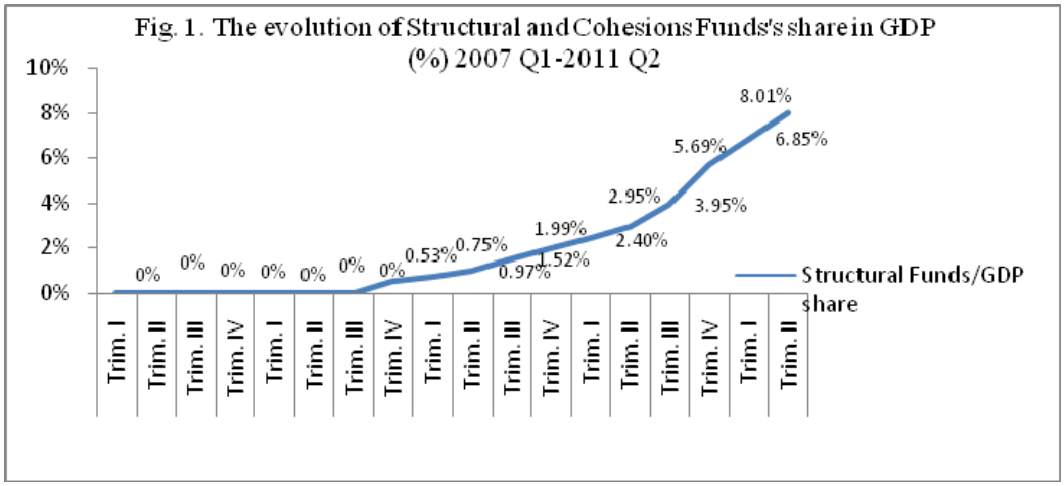
International monetary fund

- as a consequence of the conditionality of the agreements closed with IMF and EU of consolidating the public finances sustainability at medium term, the adverse effects have generated extended inflation and economical contraction;
- increasing external debt at medium and long term. The medium and long term external debt has been of 75 292 million Euro the 30th of September 2011 (76,9% from the entire external debt) bigger with 3,3% compared to 31st of December 2010.
- the rise of the standard VAT quote with 5 percentage points (to the level of 24%), starting the 1st of July 2010 has generated problems in configuring and implementing the monetary policy;
- Romanian authorities do not estimate the future quantum of the annual budget based on the specific criteria, waiting first of all the prediction made by IMF.

Opportunities

Structural and cohesion funds

- reducing the economical, social and financial gaps among the EU countries;
- offering reliable financing at reduced costs;
- environment protection, human resources development, professional reconversion, administrative capacity development, economical competitiveness for the IMM, regional development, modern territorial infrastructure, transnational good practice exchange;
- reaching performance indicators important for the economical growth: rise of the occupation rate, of the GNP:



Source: own calculations based on Ministry of European Affairs database

In the above graphic we can observe the ascendant trend of the absorption rate at national level of the Structural and Cohesion Funds upon the General National Product. The year 2007 has been considered to be dedicated for establishing the technical aspects, for elaborating and approving all the specific documents for these European funds. In 2008 the first project requests have been launched and only the IV-th trimester brought the effective payment for the beneficiaries. Unfortunately this small launching has been stopped by the international crisis and, as a consequence, the absorption rate was still at a reduced level. Starting 2009 and until now we can observe "flourishing" results but it is still not enough considering the fact that we occupy the last place in the member states top. The impact of these funds upon the GNP is not a significant one but it has an ascending trend and we hope that we will reach the planned indicator – a GNP per citizen of 41% from the EU average until 2015 (The National Development Plan 2007-2013, 2005).

International monetary fund

- the financial discipline imposed by IMF represents a guarantee of the foreign investments with beneficial effects for the Romanian economy;
- the possibility of covering the financing risks which could appear when materializing an antagonistic script on external plan having as consequence the reduction of capital entrance or exports;
- the state companies will benefit of private management.

Threats

Structural and cohesion funds

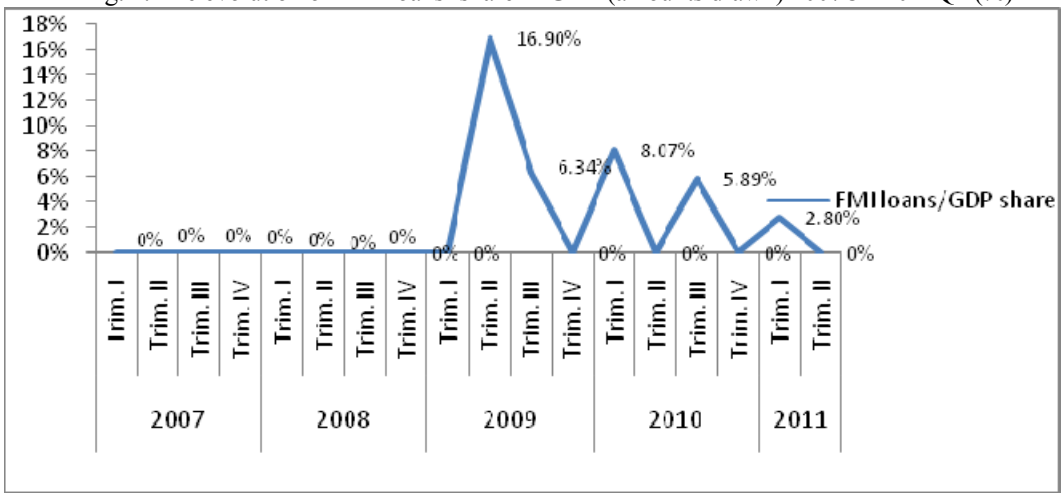
- financial contribution of the applicant;
- carelessness and indifference from the beneficiary;
- inefficient communication with the institutions which offer consultancy;
- time gap between the moment of applying the financing request and the selection result;
- lack of a strategic plans at the institutional level which supervises and implements the European funds.

International monetary fund

- protests of the syndicates unhappy about the economical policy of the governments;

• consequence of the painful reforms (for instance, budgetary, salary, fiscal, pension system and medical insurance revisions) which affect directly the life standard of the population's majority and the activity of the business environment, the agreements closed with IMF do not benefit from the public support.

Fig. 2. The evolution of IMF loans' share in GDP (amounts drawn) 2007Q1-2011Q2 (%)



Source: own calculations based on NBR database

The quarterly analysis of the loans rate obtained (sums drown) by our county from IMF inside GNP during the period Q1 2007-Q2 2011, shows the fact that their value is decreasing. The highest value, 16.90%, has been registered in the II-nd trimester 2009 fact sustained by closing the stand by agreement in April with a value of 11 443 billion DST, the value of the sums drown effectively being of 10 569 billion DST. The rate of these loans in GNP has diminished, the agreement closed in March 2011, with a value of 3090 million DST being of preventive type.

Econometric quantification analysing the efficiency of the structural funds versus the imf loans

Data and methodology

The purpose of this section is to analyse the efficiency of the Structural and Cohesion Funds versus the IMF loans using Romania's example for the period 01.2007- 08.2011, based on data with monthly frequency.

For fulfilling the purpose we have used a simple linear regression model: $Y=\alpha+\beta*X$, where Y= dependent variable, X= independent variable, and α and β the parameters of the regression equation. We plan to quantify econometrically:

the relation between the employees number (the working population – thousands of people) – labelled as "efectivul_sal" and the value of the payment towards the beneficiaries (lei) "plăți_benef";

the relation between the number of employees (the working population – thousands of people) and the value of the sums drawn by the stand by agreements (thousand of lei) labelled as "imprumuturi_fmi".

The dependent variable (Y) is the number of employees and the value of the payments towards the beneficiaries and respectively the value of the sums drawn by the stand by agreements are independent variables (X). We choose as proxy variable for economic growth the number of employees (working population) due to the lack of data with monthly frequency available for other macroeconomic variables. The choice of a variable with quarterly frequency (as GNP) would have put at doubt the results of the empirical testing because of the reduced number of observations. The source of the data is represented by the data bases of the Romanian National Bank and of the Ministry for European Affairs.

Empirical results

The Unit Root test shows that the variable "efectivul_sal" is stationary in the first difference at the level of 10%, the other two variables being stationary at any level, still from the first difference.

The econometric results of the first testing show that there is a reverse link between the values of the payment toward the beneficiaries in the context of the Operational Programmes and the number of employees inside the Romanian economy. The estimated equation is:

efectivul _sal= -7, 899207-0.041940 * plati_benef.

The determination report R^2 =0.116343 shows that only 11,63% from the variation of the employees number can be explained by the variation of the independent variable – payments toward beneficiaries, so there are other variables which influence the evolution of the dependent variable in question.

Table 2 The estimation on regression model

Dependent Variable: D(EFECTIVUL_SAL)
Method: Least Squares
Date: 12/07/11 Time: 17:47
Sample (adjusted): 2007M02 2011M08
Included observations: 55 after adjustments

Variable	Coefficient	Std. Error	t-Statistic	Prob.
C	-7.899207	3.431821	-2.301754	0.0253
D(PLATI_BENEF)	-0.041940	0.015877	-2.641596	0.0108

R-squared	0.116343	Mean dependent var	-8.163636
Adjusted R-squared	0.099670	S.D. dependent var	26.81146
S.E. of regression	25.44024	Akaike info criterion	9.346227
Sum squared resid	34301.91	Schwarz criterion	9.419221
Log likelihood	-255.0213	F-statistic	6.978030
Durbin-Watson stat	0.904468	Prob(F-statistic)	0.010821

Source: own simulation, significant at 5%

The results obtained, using this model, contradict the unanimous opinion of the specialists according to which the Structural and Cohesion Funds contribute to the economical growth. The possible explanations could be:

- the time gap in which the beneficial effects of these irredeemable funds are felt in economy, the transmission mechanism being made more difficult by the negative implications of the economical and financial crisis;
- many of these projects are still in progress;
- the analysed period is too short for emphasizing a convincing result (financial allocation being for the period 2007-2013).

The econometric results of the second empirical test show that there is no significant relationship between the value of the sums drawn from the stand by agreements with IMF and the number of employees from the Romanian economy.

Table 3 The estimation on regression model

Dependent Variable: D(EFECTIVUL_SAL)
Method: Least Squares
Date: 12/07/11 Time: 17:46
Sample (adjusted): 2007M02 2011M08
Included observations: 55 after adjustments

Variable	Coefficient	Std. Error	t-Statistic	Prob.
C	-8.284046	3.668171	-2.258359	0.0281
D(IMPRUMUTURI_FMI)	0.007725	0.025768	0.299772	0.7655
R-squared	0.001693	Mean dependent var		-8.163636
Adjusted R-squared	-0.017143	S.D. dependent var		26.81146
S.E. of regression	27.04030	Akaike info criterion		9.468220
Sum squared resid	38752.42	Schwarz criterion		9.541214
Log likelihood	-258.3760	F-statistic		0.089863
Durbin-Watson stat	1.066625	Prob(F-statistic)		0.765524

Source: own simulation, significant at 5%

Although the results are statistically significant, we can identify some limits of the proposed model:

- the short period of time which have been taken into consideration for our analysis;
- due to the lack of data with higher frequency available for other macroeconomic variables, we consider the "number of employees" as proxy for economic growth.

Conclusions

The main contribution of our study is the fact that we propose a comparative approach of Structural and Cohesion Funds in relation with IMF loans in order to outline a complete background of their challenges upon Romanian financial system.

The Structural Instruments are specially designed for contributing to reducing the gaps in seven domains very important for our country. However, the results of the absorption are not at all encouraging and the disappointment is even stronger when we observe that by POS Transport only 3,09% have been attracted from the 2007 – 2013 allocation for the modernization and the development of the national transportation networks, for promoting the railroad, naval and intermodal transportation. We wonder if we don't really need intervention in these chapters and if we afford to miss such an opportunity. Most people blame the imposed bureaucracy, the difficulties in obtaining the notifications etc. We prefer to develop human resources, fact proved by the percentage of 23,61%.

The IMF loans ensure the coordinates of the financial stability but the structural funds represent the link between stability and the development that Romania needs. By the absorption of the European funds, focused on our country's priority, the economical growth will have an ascendant trend. And, the bigger the economical development, the smaller will be the burden of the external debt.

Using a simple linear regression model we analyse the efficiency of the Structural and Cohesion Funds versus the IMF loans for the period 01.2007- 08.2011. Firstly, we quantify econometrically the relation between the employees number (the working population – thousands of people) and the value of the payment towards the beneficiaries (lei) and, secondly, the relation between the number of employees (the working population – thousands of people) and the value of the sums drawn by the stand by agreements (thousand of lei).

The empirical results of the first regression model shows that only 11,63% from the variation of the employees number can be explained by the variation of the independent variable – payments toward beneficiaries, so there are other variables which influence the evolution of the dependent variable in question. Our results contradict the unanimous opinion according to which the Structural and Cohesion Funds contribute to the economical growth. The possible explanations could be:

the time gap in which the beneficial effects of these irredeemable funds are felt in economy, the transmission mechanism being made more difficult by the negative implications of the economical and financial crisis;

many of these projects are still in progress;

the analysed period is too short for emphasizing a convincing result (financial allocation being for the period 2007-2013).

The econometric results of the second empirical model show that there is no significant linkage between the value of the sums drawn from the stand by agreements with IMF and the number of employees from the Romanian economy.

Therefore, our country cannot count on loans from IMF for raising the number of employees, the role of the stand by agreements being to ensure the coordinates of the financial stability in the eventuality of shocks manifesting in the international financial markets.

We consider and claim that Romania needs European funds. We do not ask to give up entirely to the IMF loans but we plead for having an equilibrium which could support the economical development.

As implication of such outcomes, we expect to increase the interest and the concerns of policymakers in managing better the European funds.

For further research, we suggest to test other macroeconomic variables in order to validate the econometric model. We consider that GDP would be a better choice.

Acknowledgements

This work was supported by the the European Social Fund in Romania, under the responsibility of the Managing Authority for the Sectoral Operational Programme for Human Resources Development 2007-2013 [grant POSDRU/CPP 107/DMI 1.5/S/78342]

References

Article in an online journal

- Bird, G. "The IMF: A Bird's Eye view of its role and operations", Journal of Economic Surveys, 21(4) (2007): 683–745. Accessed December 09, 2011
- Ederveen, S., J. Gorter, R. de Mooij and R. Nahuis „Funds and Games: The Economics ofEuropean Cohesion Policy, CPB Special Publication No. 41 (2002). Accessed December 13, 2011
- Evrensel, A. and Kutan, A. "How do IMF announcements affect financial markets in crises? Evidence from forward exchange markets", Journal of Financial Stability 4 (2008): 121–134. Accessed December 15, 2011
- Kutan, A.,Muradoglu, G. and Sudjana, B. "IMF programs, financial and real sector performance, and the Asian crisis", Journal of Banking & Finance 36 (2011): 164–182. Accessed December 23, 2011
- Steinwand, M.and Stone, R. The International Monetary Fund: A review of the recent evidence. *Review of International Organizations,*3(2) (2009):123–149. Accessed December 07, 2011
- Article in a print journal
- Boldrin M., Canova F. "Inequality and convergence in Europe's regions: reconsidering European regional policies", Economic Policy, Volume 16, Issue 32, (2001): 205–253.

- Dreher, A. "IMF and Economic Growth: The Effects of Programs, Loans, and Compliance with Conditionality", World Development Vol. 34, No. 5, (2006) : 769–788.
- Dreher, A. and Walter, S. "Does the IMF Help or Hurt? The Effect of IMF Programson the Likelihood and Outcome of Currency Crises", World Development Vol. 38, No. 1, (2010) :1–18.
- Gherghinescu O., Bandoi A. "Specificities of using the cost-benefit analysis for public projects financed by the structural funds", Finance - Challenges of the Future, vol. 1, issue 11, (2009):236-242.
- Working papers
- Bradley J., Mitze T., Morgenroth E., Untiedt G., "How can we know if EU cohesion policy is successful? Integrating micro and macro approaches to the evaluation of Structural Funds," Working Papers 1-(2006), GEFRA - Gesellschaft fuer Finanz- und Regionalanalysen.
- Bradley J., Untiedt G., "Do economic models tell us anything useful about Cohesion Policy impacts? A comparison of HERMIN, QUEST and ECOMOD", Working Papers 3-(2007), GEFRA - Gesellschaft fuer Finanz- und Regionalanalysen.
- Fuente A., "El impacto de los Fondos Estructurales: Convergencia real y cohesi? interna," UFAE and IAE Working Papers 572.(2003), Unitat de Fonaments de l'Anàlisi Econòmica (UAB) and Institut d'Anàlisi Econòmica (CSIC).
- Paper presented at a meeting or conference
- Belka, M. , "The impact of the crisis on new EU member states-Role and Contribution of the Fund in the Crisis". paper presented at the annual meeting 2009.
- Creţan, G. C. and Lacrois, Y. I., "The Impact of the IMF loan on National Policies". Paper presented at 11th International Conference Financial and Monetary Stability in Emerging Countries, Bucharest, 2010.
- Hândoreanu, C. , "Impact of IMF Agreement on Exchange Rate. The Romanian Case". Paper presented at 11th International Conference Financial and Monetary Stability in Emerging Countries, Bucharest, 2010.
- Website
- „Romanian National Bank", http://www.bnro.ro/, accessed December 07, 2011
- „Romanian Government", www.dae.gov.ro, accessed January 15, 2012
- „International Monetary Fund", www.img.org, accessed December 18, 2011
- Thesis or dissertation
- Ibraim Kagitci , "The Efficiency Of The Attracting And Use Of The Structural And Cohesion Funds From The European Union In Financing Of Projects In Romania". PhD diss., Academy of Economic Studies Bucharest, 2010.
- Marchis G., "The impact of EU enlargement on Regional Strategies and Policies. The role of Structural Funds ", PhD diss., Academy of Economic Studies Bucharest, 2008.
- Reports
- National Bank of Romania (2011) „Financial Stability Report".
- Report from the Commission (2010), "Fifth report on economic, social and territorial cohesion".
- Romania Gouvernment (2006), „The National Strategic Reference".

AN EMPIRICAL INVESTIGATION OF FACTORS AFFECTING CREDIT MARKET

CRISTIAN-FLORIN DĂNĂNĂU[*]
CIPRIAN-ANTONIADE ALEXANDRU[]

Abstract
We investigate through an econometric approach the credit market and the factors that interact with it. The current research is beyond the minor aspects of the behavior and determinants of credit market in Romania and our concerns go to macroeconomic factors, consumption, investments and capital market. Results demonstrate a relationship between complex factors such as monetary policy and the credit market.

Keywords: credit market, monetary policy, macroeconomic factors, non-governmental credit.

Introduction

The credit market appeared and developed in Romania after 1989. The appearance and the boost of the private sector of the national economy, as well as the increase in household incomes have determined a serious demand for financing, which was mainly satisfied by the financial-banking sector through non-governmental credit. Although initially limited, its development became significant after 2000, when the economic growth[1], combined with the favorable perspective of accession to the European Union, as well as the constant improvement of the internal macroeconomic environment as a result of a well-planned mix of economic policies represented factors which led to an unprecedented growth in non-governmental credit.

This article focuses on the credit market in Romania, in particular during the period 2000-2010. Econometric methods are used to highlight the evolution of this market in the general macroeconomic context as precisely as possible. The main innovation is represented by the estimation and validation of a disequilibrium model for the Romanian credit market for the first time.

The article has the following structure: in the first part this market is described briefly. The main characteristics of the evolution of the credit market are presented, with special focus on its development after 2000, unanimously considered to be the year when the stable and sustainable growth of the national economy began. The second part is an overview of the theoretical framework of the disequilibrium models and of the significant results from the specialty literature related to evaluating/ controlling the credit markets from various countries that apply this set of models. The third part focuses on the evaluation/ control of the credit market by using a disequilibrium model adapted to macroeconomic developments in Romania. The last part of the article includes comments on the estimated model, as well as the conclusions of this analysis.

---

[*]Ph. D. candidate, The Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies, Romania, (email: floryncd@hotmail.com).
This paper represents a scientific contribution of the author to a doctoral program from The Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies.
[]Associate Professor, Ph. D., Ecological University of Bucharest, Economic Sciences Faculty, Romania, (email: ciprian.alexandru@ueb.ro).
This paper represents a scientific contribution of the author to a postdoctoral program from Romanian Academy, ID 62988, POSDRU, financed by European Social Fund.
[1] During the period preceding the economic crisis – 2002-2008, the gross national product increased at an average annual rate of 6% (real values).

1. The crediting activity in Romania: main characteristics

In the first decade after 1989, the level of credits was initially very low, which is common to all emerging national economies in Eastern Europe. Starting from 1998, in a relatively short period, several banks went bankrupt and others were privatized, thus facilitating the appearance of foreign capital, which had a positive impact on the development of the credit market. Annex 1 presents a chronological overview of the restructuring of the banking sector, structured according to the information provided in the paper [Isărescu, 2009].

It is well known that bank privatizations improve performance and encourage competition [Clarke, Cull, Shirley, 2005]. As a result of the repositioning of the financial-banking sector, bank credit developed quickly, and its relevant indicators gradually reached the same levels as those in developed countries. The graph below illustrates the evolution in our country of non-governmental credit/ GDP, the most used index according to the specialty literature.

Graph 1. Non-governmental credit/ GDP ratio during the period 1993-2010 (%)

Source: National Bank of Romania

In the first stage, 1993-2000, the analyzed indicator had a fluctuating evolution. Thus, after having reached the value of 25% in 1996, it decreased to 14% in 1997 and 9.3% in 2000, as a consequence of the bankruptcies mentioned previously and of the rise in interest rates. During 2001-2010, the non-governmental/GDP ratio increased steadily as a result of the rapid growth in GDP (which led, among others, to increased revenues of the economic operators) and of the decrease of active interest rates. It is important to mention that, apart from these two factors, other causes contributing to this ascending trend were:

- the improvement of prudential bank supervision by the central bank by introducing the uniform banking rating system – CAAMPL – in 1999;
- the use of a new method for calculating the specific provisions for credit risk[2] starting from 2003.

The indicator registered the highest growth in 2007, when its value was 11 percentage points higher than in the previous year, reaching the level of 35.6%. This spectacular evolution occurred as a consequence of the significant appreciation of the national currency exchange rate, which led to massive capital infusions, a phenomenon that started in the first months of 2006. In its turn, this appreciation was significantly encouraged by external factors:

- the improvement of the investors' perception of the national economy, in a political context;

[2] NRB Regulation 5/ 2002concerning the classification of credits and investments, as well as the formation, regulation and use of specific credit risk provisions, published in the Official Journal of Romania n. 626/ 2002

- the lei-foreign currencies differential;
- the increased degree of financial integration[3].

Due to the economic crisis that has affected our country since the last three months of 2008, the indicator remained stable in 2009 and 2010. We must mention that despite this generally ascending evolution, the final value of the indicator in December 2010 (40.7%) was lower compared to its similar values in developed countries.

The non-governmental credit growth rates also registered high values, which is also true in the case of real increases in consumer credit. One of the causes of this boost is the fact that the initial values were very low. Thus, total non-governmental credit represented the equivalent of only 3.1 billion euro in December 2000, while in December 2010 its value reached 48.8 billion euro, which is a growth of over 1500%. In its turn, consumption credit in the national currency evolved significantly in the same period, from the equivalent of 141.2 million euro to 8.4 billion euro, which represents a growth of over 5900%[4].

Graph 2. Credit dynamics during the period 1996-2010
(in real terms, the corresponding month in the previous year = 100)

Source: National Bank of Romania, own calculation

After having a fluctuating evolution, sometimes reaching negative values in the period 1996-2000, the real growth of consumer credits in lei registered positive values after January 2001, reaching the highest value in the second half of 2003. The dynamics of the indicator had impressive monthly values of up to 223%, a figure that was recorded in August 2003. After a drop in the growth rate at the end of 2004, a new peak was reached in May-September 2006, with values between 110-120%. The phenomenon of credit growth can be to a great extent associated with the significant increase in revenues. This led to a higher demand for goods, especially durable, non-food goods, which finally determined the increase in household credits, both in terms of absolute and relative values.

Generally speaking, non-governmental credit had a similar evolution, with positive values after July 2001 and the maximum value reached in the second half of the analyzed period, in January 2008 (55.5%). Both indicators started to decrease in September 2009. A notable exception was registered in June 2010, when non-governmental credit grew by a marginal value of 1.97%. After this period the real crediting dynamics had only negative values, and the improvement of crediting has not yet been confirmed. There are several factors that have influenced both the supply of credits offered by banks:

[3] Isărescu, 2009, p. 250-251
[4] References were made based on the exchange rates at the end of the respective months

- the increase of the share of state securities portfolio (the appearance of the crowding-out phenomenon);
- the perception of the amplification of risk credit;
- the refusal to loosen credit standards, and the demand for credits:

- the increasingly difficult financial situation of firms and individual consumers (due to government measures for reducing the budget deficit[5]), and that have contributed directly to these negative trends.

Compared to the rhythms of 2007-2008, when the average annual rates had an approximate value of 45%, in 2009 non-governmental credit had an average growth of only 7.5%. Actually, 2009 was the last year when growth was registered, as in 2010 non-governmental credit started to decrease by approximately 3.8%.

As a partial conclusion, we could say that the expansion of the non-governmental credit practically reflected a process of catching-up in the field of financial intermediation, a process which was influenced in a negative way by the difficulties that the Romanian banking system had to face during the period 1998-2002, as well as by the economic crisis that started in the second half of 2009.

Regarding the structure of non-governmental credit in terms of currency denomination, illustrated in Graph 3, the national currency had a higher share in household credit in 2004, when 70-80% of household credits were provided in lei.

Graph 3. The share of credits in lei in non-governmental and consumer credit

Source: National Bank of Romania, own calculation

The factors that caused this situation were the central bank's policy of controlled floating of the exchange rate in order to minimize currency risk and the fact that bank resources were mainly denominated in lei during this period (2000-2004).

On the other hand, the share of loans in lei from the total value of non-governmental credit was much lower in the first years of this period, due to the fact that firms generally preferred credits in foreign currencies to finance their import activities and to reduce currency risk, in the context of a relatively high volatility of the exchange rate.

After the liberalization of the capital account, which started in 2004 (one of the conditions for accession in the European Union), individual consumers started to show increasing preference for credits in foreign currencies, the share of loans in lei decreasing below 35% at the end of 2010.

[5] The increase in the VAT rate from 19% to 24%, through the Emergency Government Ordinance 58/ 2010 (Official Journal of Romania n. 431/ 2010), as well as the decrease in salaries in the state sector by 25%, through Law 118/ 2010 on necessary measures for ensuring a balanced budget (Official Journal of Romania n. 441/ 2010)

During the period 2006-2010, loans in foreign currencies constantly consolidated their share both in non-governmental and in consumer credit, reaching values of 63%, respectively 65%. It is important to notice that 2006, when the share of credits in lei in the non-governmental credit went beyond the psychological threshold of 50%, was also the year when the lowest rate of inflation for the entire period was registered (4.87% December 2006/ December 2005). This year was also the only one when the central bank reached its inflation target (4% ±1pp).

The following graph indicates the evolution of non-governmental credit according to the currency denomination of the loans.

Graph 4. Annual credit growth, according to the currency (values deflated with the consumption price index, year 2000= 100)

Source: National Bank of Romania, own calculation

Before 2004, the constant economic growth, as well as the obvious perspectives of accession to the European Union, which were the result of the beginning and finalization of negotiations for accession[6] in a relatively short period, led to accelerated rates of credit growth. The real growth rates of credits, both in lei and in foreign currencies, were also influenced by the regulations and the monetary policy of the central bank. After the central bank stopped applying its policy for maintaining a low volatility of the exchange rate, the risk related to credits in lei increased and the debtors started to prefer loans in foreign currencies.

In September 2005, the central bank introduced several regulations in order to set limits to credits denominated in foreign currencies[7], which had a positive influence on the evolution of credits in lei, which registered high growth rates in real terms: 56.5 % in 2005, respectively 66.1 % in 2006. Nevertheless, credit in foreign currencies increased significantly in 2007 by 72.6% due to the inflow of foreign currencies during that year. At the same time, the growth rate of credits in lei dropped to only 30.6% in the same year. Finally, in 2009 and 2010 there was a dramatic slowing down in the growth rates, and in the case of credits in lei there was even a drop in real terms: -9%, respectively -10.1%. This phenomenon can be attributed to the economic crisis, which led to the decrease of GDP after many years of sustained economic growth. The demand for credits decreased drastically as a direct consequence of the significant decrease of the gross domestic product, and credits in lei declined as a result of the decrease in available revenues (denominated to a large extent in lei) of the companies and the individual consumers.

[6] In December 2004 Romania closed the negotiations for all the 31 chapters of the Community acquis, which had started in the spring of 2000

[7] The NBR Regulation 11/ 2005 on restricting the exposure of credits in foreign currencies, published in the Official Journal of Romania n. 840/ 2005

In conclusion, we could say that, on the whole, one of the sources of credit growth was the external financing obtained by commercial banks. The interest rate differential between lei and foreign currencies, as well as the real appreciation of the national currency determined the banks to expand their portfolio of credits in lei. Regarding the credit in foreign currencies, its ascending trend occurred due to the banks' ability to increase their resources through the mechanism of external financing, as well as to the increasingly fierce competition in the banking sector, the credit in foreign currencies being perceived as an alternative to loans in lei.

2. Theoretical framework of the model

A disequilibrium model involves the estimation of two functions, one related to the demand for credits, the other to credit supply. The two sets of independent invariables have to be distinct and to include variables that determine supply and demand from an economic perspective. It is considered that the minimal of the two values represents the level of credit equilibrium on the market. The theoretical framework of this group of models was presented for the first time in the article of Maddala and Forrest [6]. In order to formalize the described method, the following linear regression equations are given:

$$D_t = X_{1t}^{'}\beta_1 + u_{1t}$$

$$S_t = X_{2t}^{'}\beta_2 + u_{2t}$$

where D_t, S_t represent the demand, respectively the supply in period t, the vectors X_1, X_2 represent the exogenous variables that influence the demand, respectively the supply of credits, and u_1, u_2 represent the residuals. Then, the level of equilibrium of the market at a given t moment is established by:

$$Q_t = \min(D_t, S_t)$$

This assumption is reasonable, as if demand is higher than the supply, then the excess demand remains unsatisfied, and in the opposing situation when supply is higher than the demand, the excess supply remains uncovered. It is necessary to determine the degree of probability π_t to establish whether each observation belongs to the equation of the demand or to the one of the supply; the method of maximum likelihood estimation is used.

3. Previous results

The method described above has been used relatively recently by various authors for analyzing certain national markets: Ghosh and Ghosh[4] for Korea, Indonesia and Thailand, Barajas and Steiner[2] for Columbia, Peru and Mexico, Nenovsky, Peev and Yalamov[7] for Bulgaria, Baek[1] for Korea, Vodova[8] for the Czech Republic. We will present briefly the results of these studies.

Ghosh and Ghosh[4] use a disequilibrium model to investigate a potential credit crisis in three Asian countries: Indonesia, Korea and Thailand during the period 1997-1998. Credit crisis is a situation when interest rates do not lead to a balance between the demand and the supply of credits, and the aggregate volume of credits is restricted by the demand, meaning there is a rationalization of quantity.

The analysis starts from the premise that a decrease of credit in real terms is consistent with the decrease of the supply or of the demand for credits, or even with declines in both. The key identification issue consists in associating the noticed changes in the actual credit values to the subjacent evolutions of the functions of supply and demand. This issue is solved in an alternative regression framework by setting exclusion restrictions a priori (for instance, the restriction that only the supply of credits, not the demand, is influenced by the banks' ability to provide loans). Thus, the authors assume that the real supply of credits depends on the following variables: i) the real interest rate compared to the cost of resources (the latter is estimated according to the rates for deposits); ii) the current output as a measure of the companies' reimbursing capacity; iii) the commercial banks' real capacity to grant loans. In its turn, the real demand for credits is determined by the following variables: i) the real interest rate; ii) the current output, in order to evaluate both the demand for working capital and as an indicator of future output (calculated as an average in the periods t-2, t-1 and t in order to reduce endogeneity-related issues); iii) the production gap, measured as a deviation of the current industrial production from its long-term trend; iv) stock market prices (as a proxy for expected output); v) inflation, as a general indicator of the macroeconomic environment.

Barajas and Steiner [2] examine the slowing down of bank credits to the non-governmental sector in eight countries in Latin America. By using an econometric approach based on a disequilibrium model, they focus on investigating the possible causes of the decline in three countries: Columbia, Mexico and Peru. Although both the factors that influence the supply and those that influence the demand play a key role, their relative significance varies from one country to another. The econometric analysis uses data at a macroeconomic level to establish if credit contraction situations actually represent a credit crisis. This is defined as a situation in which, for a given level of deposits, banks refuse to increase the interest rate for their loans up to a level where the market becomes saturated.

The functions of aggregate supply and demand for credits in the three countries – Columbia, Mexico, Peru – are estimated. For identifying a model it is necessary to exclude one or several variables included in one function from the other. For this purpose, the authors use the key-variable "capacity to grant loans", defined as the availability of funds necessary for granting credits. The second challenge involves the identification of variables which provide a reflection of the macroeconomic context and the business environment, which the demand for credits should be connected to in a positive way, and the supply should "respond" to the extent to which this affects the level of credit risk. The following variables are included: i) the industrial production; ii) the gross domestic product; iii) the GDP gap – only for Columbia – calculated as a monthly linear interpolation of a three-month gap; iv) the expected inflation rate – the arithmetic average of inflation on a three-month period, expressed in annual terms, focusing on the current month; v) the stock market index. In addition to elements presented in previous studies, two specific variables are included for the supply function: the percentage of non-performing loans from the total volume of credits, as well as the percentage of specific credit risk provisions from the total volume of non-performing loans. The dependent variable is the natural logarithm of real credits to the private sector.

The econometric estimates for Columbia, Mexico and Peru lead to the following conclusions:

- macroeconomic conditions influence the demand and sometimes the credit supply;
- the capacity to grant loans plays a key-role in determining the credit supply;
- certain alternative interest rates have a significant impact on the demand for credits.

The study of Nenovsky et. al[7] can be placed in the category of those that use a disequilibrium model, making use of a variety of factors to explain credit supply, respectively credit demand. The authors extend this perspective, whose main limitation consists in the use of traditional "mechanical" factors in establishing supply and demand (the capacity to grant loans, interest rates, income). They consider that this type of approach cannot express the entire range of relations between banks and companies, especially in the context of an economy in transition, which is characterized by significant institutional changes. The argument at the basis of the authors' approach is the following one: credit supply and demand concentrates in themselves to a great extent the entire "range" of relations between companies and banks; in their turn, these relations are a reflection of the economic environment and context. The influencing factors can be grouped in the following categories: i) traditional factors (the size of the companies, the profit, bank resources), which also include internal regulations, as well as the structure of the banks and the companies; ii) the legal and institutional framework, mainly the restrictions resulting from the implementation of the monetary council regime; iii) corruption, influence exercised by the state; iv) property structure, control over the companies and the banks. Data regarding companies was gathered from a data base which includes 118 large companies listed on the stock market in Bulgaria, and the covered period is between 1998 and 2001. Data about banks was obtained mainly through a questionnaire that all the 35 commercial banks in America completed, and other necessary information was gathered from the banks' balance sheets and profit and loss accounts.

Baek's study[1] uses a disequilibrium model to identify credit crisis in Korea, defined as a situation when credit supply in real terms decreases and there is an excess demand for real credit on the market. The study makes use of monthly data collected in the period 1992-2005.

The author uses the following vectors of independent variables for the Korean credit market:

- for the supply: loans granted in the previous period, the interest differential between the interest rate for credits and the coupons of corporate bonds, bank deposits from the previous period, compulsory reserve rate and the industrial production index;
- for the demand: the value of credits in the previous period, the interest differential between the interest rate for credits and the performance of certificates of deposit and the industrial production index.

Four credit crises are identified (the decline of real credit supply and excess demand for real credit for at least two months). Two of them occurred before the financial crisis, and the most recent one started in December 2004 and lasted 4 months. In the author's opinion, the main causes of these crises are related to the companies' credit risk, the lack of trust persisting on the market and/ or the decrease in the volume of bank deposits. The most effective policy would be to eliminate distrust and to diminish the companies' credit risk rather than to stimulate the expansion of crediting provided by commercial banks. The elimination of factors that determine the decrease of bank deposits would also offer significant support in this direction.

Vodova's article[8] focuses on the credit market in the Czech Republic and uses a disequilibrium model to estimate the volume of loans granted. Thus, the regressive factors used for credit demand are: i) the interest rate; ii) the gross domestic product, with a lag of 3 three-month periods; and iii) the inflation rate, measured by using the consumption price index. For credit supply two independent variables are used: i) the banks' capacity to grant loans, defined as the total liabilities from which minimal reserves, necessary liquidity, cash in the cashier's desks and owners' equity are eliminated; and ii) the gross domestic product, as a measure of the debtors' ability to pay their debts.

The available data cover three-month periods between 1994 and 2006. All the estimated coefficients are statistically significant at the threshold of 5%, and their values are in accordance with the macroeconomic context. The following is worth noticing: positive signs would be expected for both determinants in the equation of credit supply. However, in reality the GDP coefficient has a negative sign, which illustrates the existence of an inverse relation between this parameter and the credit supply. According to the author, this can be explained by referring to the banks' potential anti-cyclic behavior: if they expect a decline in the economic growth in the future, they can reduce their current credit supply. Next, the forecast data is compared to the real one and periods of excess demand – the first and last third in the period (1994-1998, 2002-2006), respectively excess supply (1999-2002), are identified.

The study synthesizes in a table the determinants of both credit demand and supply used in other analyses. The author makes two observations:

a) some determinants are common, which means that they can be used to control both "sides" of the credit market;

b) the list for credit supply is much longer; as a consequence it is more difficult to control supply than demand. This means that, from the practical perspective of implementing the mix of economic policies, it is easier to influence demand.

4. The empirical disequilibrium model for the credit market in Romania

In the sequel, we shortly describe the variables included within the empirical model, together with their motivation for such a choice. The estimation results are also presented, and some comments on their relevance from an economic viewpoint are made. Finally, we drawn some practical considerations on the credit market evolution and we indicate some future research directions related to the empirical disequilibrium model.

4.1 Description of the model

In order to estimate and subsequently validate the disequilibrium model in Romania's case, first we have to establish the regressors' vectors. The regressors must be macroeconomic indicators that could influence either credit demand or credit supply.

To this end, for credit demand we take into consideration the following vector:

$$\mathbf{X_1 = (IPI, INFL, RDCR)}$$

where:

- IPI is the manufacturing output index, as a proxy for the general economic activity;
- INFL is the inflation rate, measured by consumer price index. This is a truthful indicator of the „quality" of ecoomic environment;
- RDCR is the real lending rate, as a price of the credits granted by banks;

In demand's case, the manufacturing out index will be lagged, and the lag's value will be chosen to offer the best statistical parameters. Economically speaking, a certain lag means that a better creditworthiness, resulted from getting revenues in a past period, allows getting credits in present period. Estimation of the demand's regression should deliver negative coefficients both for lending rate and for inflation rate. The motivation lies in the fact that a worsening of the economic environment (perceived through an inflation rise) as well as an increase in the cost of loans (measured through interest rate) should eventually result in a plummeting demand. The IPI's estimated coefficient should be positive, and this is explained by the fact that growing industrial production increases the creditworthiness of firms and individuals, consequently stimulating the borrowers' demand for new loans.

The regressors' vector for credit demand is as follows:

$$\mathbf{X_2 = (IPI, CAIM)}$$

where:

- IPI - is the manufacturing output index, seean as a measure of borrowers's capacity to repay their debts;
- CAIM – is the real lending capacity of banks, in million lei. The time series was computed as follows: total bank total liabilities (both in lei and foreign currency) minus capital minus cash in vault. Required reserves were calculated by applying the National Bank of Romania rates to the lei and foreign currency liabilities.

Estimating supply regression should lead to a positive coefficient for manufacturing output, due to the fact that its increase determines an improvement of the borrowers capacity to reimburse their debts, especially for companies. In this way, banks are tempted to increase credit supply toward the potential borrowers. In addition, the estimated lending capacity coefficient should be positive and less than 1, since, by definition, it measures banks „power" of granting loans.

The dependent variable is the real non-government credit, CNG, expressed in million lei.

We mention that, since the initial time series are non-stationary, we used the first level series in our model. For D(CNG) series the augmented Dickey–Fuller tests rejects the null hypothesis of a unit root at significance level of 5%. The completed results of these tests are presented in annex 2.

In order to capture the influence of the economic crisis as an exogen influence factor on the credit market we introduced a dummy variable for both regressions, having value 1 for 2009m1-2010m12 interval and 0 otherwise. The rationale behind this as follows: the first quarter of 2009 marked the beginning of the economic crisis from a macroeconomic standpoint, the gross domestic product registering a fall of 6.1% in annual terms.

The nominal values of the lending rates, lending capacity and non-government credit were deflated by the cumulated consumer price index, starting from 31 December 1999.

The time series have a monthly frequency and covers January 2000-December 2010 period (132 observations). The data is obtained from National Bank of Romania website, except for manufacturing production index, which is obtained from Unite Nations Economic Commission for Europe. This index represents the monthly level of manufacturing output, with 2005 as base year, and is de-seasonalised.

The majority of the studies in this research area used the gross domestic product as is research area used the gross domestic product as a proxy for the general level of economic activity. Nevertheless we chose manufacturing production index based on the following reasons:

- monthly frequency of the data, which is available for all the other time series, except for GDP;
- in the analysed period, on average, loans to companies account for 70% of the overall non-government credit. This is a strong argument in favour of our choice, since the manufacturing output could heavily influence both credit demand and credit supply.

4.2 Estimations' findings

In order to estimate regression equations we used the software package Eviews 5.0. After trying to estimate different variants, we chose lag 4 for the manufacturing output index, as regressor in demand's equation, since it delivers the best statistical results.

Estimation's results are presented in the following table. Full data are presented in annex 2.

Table 1. Estimation's results

Demand regression (n = 128, k = 4)[8]		Supply regression (n = 131, k = 3)
IPI(-4)	21.38 (p=0.005)	IPI	30.72 (p=0.00)
INFL	-18.25 (p=0.013)	D(CAIM)	0.29 (p=0.00)
RDCR	-33.70 (p=0.079)	dummy	-933.37 (p=0.00)
Dummy	-1097.47 (p=0.000)	Constant	-2959.46 (p=0.00)
Constant	-1157.58 (p=0.233)

Source: own calculation

The constant is statistically insignificant in demand's equation, while of all the other coefficients are statistically significant, and the coefficient's signs confirm the expectations.

We observe that for demand's equation both inflation and lending rate negatively affects the demand; the lending rate has a much more influence than inflation, its coefficient is almost twice the inflation's coefficient. We infer that financing costs are greatly taken into account in the process of making borrowing decision by the economic operators, while the general economic climate, represented by inflation rate is considered to a lesser extent. Also the credit demand is positively influenced by manufacturing output index, with lag 4.

[8] Sample size and number of regressors, respectively

Estimation of the supply regression confirms the heavy influence of the industrial production on the credit supply, at a ratio of 1:30.7.The coefficient of D(CAIM) variable is less than 1 and thus confirms the assumption of using the lending capacity as a barometer for credit supply .

The negative values of the dummy variable represent the negative impact of the economic crisis on the credit market. The lesser value of the dummy's coefficient in demand's case shows the greater crisis impact on demand as compared to the supply.

Re-estimating our model by using quarterly data[9] for the same study period (44 observations) leads to similar results. The complete results are shown in annex 3. A remarkable difference from monthly data is a better explanatory power of the model, the R-squared coefficients being 0.63 and 0.67 respectively. This fact stems from the following argument: a reduced sample rate has the advantage of a better measuring of the exogenous variables on the credit market. It is worth mentioning that, in demand's equation we chose a lag 1 (id est three months) in order to get the desired similarity with precedent estimations, where the lag is 4 months.

Having in mind that our estimation delivers the fitted values in first difference of the non-government credit, we computed dynamically the theoretical values of the credit demand and supply. We used the initial (observed) values from April 2000 for demand, and from January 2000 for supply as starting points. In general, in the disequilibrium models framework, the actual values of the supply and demand cannot be observed; therefore this „reconstruction" indicates the (theoretical) periods of excess demand or excess supply. The following graph represents the two series.

Graph 5. Excess demand and excess supply, according to the predicted values of D(CNG)

Source: own calculation

After a short period of equilibrium, ended in December 2000, the model predicts the excess supply appeared, starting from January 2001. The „cleaning" of the banking system from the „bad" banks, a process that ended in the first years of the 2000-2010 lead to an excess supply, which persisted until the first half of 2005. Afterwards, the trend reversed, and the excess demand appeared and lasted until the beginning of 2008.

[9] Quarterly values calculated as average of the monthly data in the current quarter

This could be interpreted either by a reduction of bank supply, or by the emergence of a greater demand, generated by the accession to the European Union and the perspectives of a sustainable growth, which had to be financed. First possible explanation cannot be corroborated, since in this sub-period (July 2005-January 2008) the actual lending capacity increased with a percent of 130%. Moreover, the excess demand was generated by an acute need for new loans, additionally sustained by a sensible reduction of lending rate, from 19.5% in July 2005 to 13.1% in January 2008.

The end of 2008, which marked the beginning of economic recession, coincided with a decreasing trend of both credit market components. In the last two years of the studied period, the excess supply prevailed until August 2010. The last five months of this year registered a resurrection of the credit demand, one possible explanation could be the governmental austerity measures implemented in July 2010. Excess demand appeared on a plummeting credit market, while the firms' and individuals' revenues largely decreased, leading to an emerging need for bank loans as substitute for the previous inherent cuts of profits and salaries.

4.3 Further research area related to the model

This paper's model uses lending capacity as a variable that discriminates between demand and supply, and it is calculated as described in paragraph 4.1. If we take into account the large number of possible factors that may affect credit supply, mentioned by Vodova [7], a future research area is the testing and validation and calibration of disequilibrium models that include those factors, and/or credit supply. Another argument in favour of inclusion of other exogenous variables in the model is the relatively low explanatory power, the R-squared coefficients being in both cases lesser than 0.5.

Additionally, the present study may be improved by estimating coefficients through maximum likelihood method, as presented in Maddala and Nelson [5]. Due to the complexity and the necessity to validate such computations, this research is reserved for a future work.

Conclusions

This paper investigates the Romanian credit market that appeared in the process of transition to the market economy, which include a healthy banking system. First part of our paper is purely descriptive and deals with the synthetically indicators regarding the credit market, closely related to macroeconomic climate.

The second and third parts shortly present the theoretical model, as well as some findings in the economic literature that use of such an approach. The variables used in these studies are reviewed, and the overall conclusions are highlighted.

The last part is dedicated fully to the proposed disequilibrium in Romania's case. The time series, as well as the rationale behind their choice are thoroughly treated, our model being an empirical one. The estimations results on one hand confirm this choice, and on the other hand reveal, by means of the econometric approach, the ongoing processes of the credit market. Re-estimating the model using quarterly data leads to a better explanatory power.

Finally, some possible future research areas related to the improvement of the analysed disequilibrium model are suggested.

References

- Baek, E.G. "A disequilibrium model of the Korean credit crunch", The Journal of the Korean Economy, vol. 6, no. 2 (fall 2005), 313-336
- Barajas, A., Steiner. R. , "Why don't they lend? Credit stagnation in Latin America", IMF Staff papers vol. 49, special issue, 2002

- Focarelli, D., Rossi, P. "La domanda di finanziamenti bancari in Italia e nelle diverse aree del Paese (1984-1996)", Temi di discussione, Banca d'Italia, numero 333, Maggio 1998
- Ghosh, S.H., Ghosh, R.A., "East Asia in the aftermath: was there a credit crunch ?", IMF Working Paper No. 38, March 1999
- Maddala, G.S., Forrest, N.D., "Maximum likelihood methods for models of markets in disequilibrium", Econometrica, Vol. 42. No. 6 (November 1974)
- Nenovsky, N., Peev, Yalamov, E.T. "Bank-firms nexus under the currency board: empirical evidence from Bulgaria", William Davidson Working paper No. 555, April 2003, University of Michigan Business School
- Vodova, P., "Credit market and prediction of its future development in the Czech Republic", Munich Personal RePEc Archive No. 11904, 2008
- Clarke, G, Cull, R., Shirley, M. „Bank privatization in developing countries: a summary of lessons and findings", Journal of Banking and Finance 29 (2005) pag. 1905-1930
- Isărescu, M.C. "Contribuții teoretice şi practice în domeniul politicilor monetare şi bancare", Editura Academiei Române, Bucureşti 2009, ISBN 978-973-27-1892-6
- * * *, 2000-2010, National Bank of Romania, www.bnr.ro
- * * *, 2000-2010, National Institute Of Statistics, www.insse.ro
- * * *, 2000-2010, United Nations Economic Commission for Europe, www.unece.org

Annex 1

Banking restructuring in Romania, 1998 - 2002
(worked out from [Isărescu, 2009], pp. 286-290)

No.	Bank name	Type of restructuring	Year
1.	Banca Agricolă S.A.	privatization	1999-2001
2.	Banca Albina S.A.	insolvency	1999
3.	Bankcoop S.A.	insolvency	2000
4.	Bancorex S.A.	acquisition by Banca Comercială Română	1999
5.	Credit Bank S.A.	insolvency	2000
6.	Dacia Felix S.A.	cesionarea creanțelor	2001
7.	Banca Română de Scont S.A.	Insolvency	2002
8.	Banca Turco-Română S.A.	Insolvency	2000-2002
9.	Banca Internațională a Religiilor S.A.	Insolvency	2000-2002
10.	Banca Columna S.A.	Insolvency	2003
11.	Casa de Economii şi Consemnațiuni S.A. (CEC Bank din anul 2008)	transformed from savings bank for natural persons to a retail bank	2002
12.	Banca de Export-Import a României S.A.	Transformed from a commercial to state agent for sustaining foreign trade	2000
13.	Banca Română pentru Dezvoltare S.A.	privatization	1999
14.	Bancpost S.A.	privatization	1999-2002

Nota: In 1998 the new laws on banking industry have been adopted as follows: Law no.58/2001-banking law, Law no. 101/1998 on NBR statute, Law no. 83/1998 on insolvency procedure of banks

Annex 2

Estimation Command:
==========
LS D(CNG) IPI(-4) INFL RDCR DUMMY C

Estimation Equation:
==========
D(CNG) = C(1)*IPI(-4) + C(2)*INFL + C(3)*RDCR + C(4)*DUMMY + C(5)

Substituted Coefficients:
==========
D(CNG) = 21.38464513*IPI(-4) - 18.25516384*INFL - 33.70302231*RDCR - 1097.472639*DUMMY - 1157.580223

Dependent Variable: D(CNG)
Method: Least Squares
Sample (adjusted): 2000M05 2010M12
Included observations: 128 after adjustments

Variable	Coefficient	Std. Error	t-Statistic	Prob.
IPI(-4)	21.38465	7.621782	2.805728	0.0058
INFL	-18.25516	5.533280	-3.299158	0.0013
RDCR	-33.70302	19.04711	-1.769456	0.0793
DUMMY	-1097.473	147.0262	-7.464471	0.0000
C	-1157.580	966.1487	-1.198139	0.2332

R-squared	0.393782	Mean dependent var	371.2944
Adjusted R-squared	0.374068	S.D. dependent var	707.6417
S.E. of regression	559.8570	Akaike info criterion	15.53152
Sum squared resid	38553104	Schwarz criterion	15.64293
Log likelihood	-989.0172	F-statistic	19.97433
Durbin-Watson stat	2.114830	Prob(F-statistic)	0.000000

Estimation Equation:
==========
D(CNG) = C(1)*IPI + C(2)*D(CAIM) + C(3)*DUMMY + C(4)

Substituted Coefficients:
==========
D(CNG) = 30.72715534*IPI + 0.2927893851*D(CAIM) - 933.373874*DUMMY - 2959.46128

Dependent Variable: D(CNG)
Method: Least Squares
Sample (adjusted): 2000M02 2010M12
Included observations: 131 after adjustments

Variable	Coefficient	Std. Error	t-Statistic	Prob.
IPI	30.72716	5.098769	6.026387	0.0000
D(CAIM)	0.292789	0.044170	6.628736	0.0000
DUMMY	-933.3739	129.3340	-7.216774	0.0000
C	-2959.461	543.2673	-5.447523	0.0000

R-squared	0.538118	Mean dependent var	362.3004
Adjusted R-squared	0.527207	S.D. dependent var	701.9793
S.E. of regression	482.6804	Akaike info criterion	15.22665
Sum squared resid	29588510	Schwarz criterion	15.31444
Log likelihood	-993.3453	F-statistic	49.32064
Durbin-Watson stat	1.912062	Prob(F-statistic)	0.000000

Null Hypothesis: CNG has a unit root
Exogenous: Constant
Lag Length: 3 (Automatic based on SIC, MAXLAG=12)

		t-Statistic	Prob.*
Augmented Dickey-Fuller test statistic		-0.389748	0.9064
Test critical values:	1% level	-3.482035
	5% level	-2.884109
	10% level	-2.578884

*MacKinnon (1996) one-sided p-values.

Null Hypothesis: D(CNG) has a unit root
Exogenous: Constant
Lag Length: 2 (Automatic based on SIC, MAXLAG=12)

		t-Statistic	Prob.*
Augmented Dickey-Fuller test statistic		-3.277540	0.0180
Test critical values:	1% level	-3.482035
	5% level	-2.884109

	10% level	-2.578884

*MacKinnon (1996) one-sided p-values.

Null Hypothesis: CAIM has a unit root
Exogenous: Constant
Lag Length: 0 (Automatic based on SIC, MAXLAG=12)

		t-Statistic	Prob.*
Augmented Dickey-Fuller test statistic		1.201154	0.9981
Test critical values:	1% level	-3.480818
	5% level	-2.883579
	10% level	-2.578601

*MacKinnon (1996) one-sided p-values.

Null Hypothesis: D(CAIM) has a unit root
Exogenous: Constant
Lag Length: 0 (Automatic based on SIC, MAXLAG=12)

		t-Statistic	Prob.*
Augmented Dickey-Fuller test statistic		-10.39558	0.0000
Test critical values:	1% level	-3.481217
	5% level	-2.883753
	10% level	-2.578694

*MacKinnon (1996) one-sided p-values.

Annex 3

Dependent Variable: D(CNG)
Method: Least Squares
Date: 02/09/12 Time: 22:30
Sample (adjusted): 2000Q2 2010Q4
Included observations: 43 after adjustments

Variable	Coefficient	Std. Error	t-Statistic	Prob.
IPI(-1)	57.77171	26.05692	2.217135	0.0327
INFL	-54.26446	18.05335	-3.005784	0.0047
RDCR	-121.4190	67.64951	-1.794825	0.0806
DUMMY	-3203.095	483.0399	-6.631119	0.0000
C	-2607.625	3354.161	-0.777430	0.4417

R-squared	0.634801	Mean dependent var	1103.063
Adjusted R-squared	0.596360	S.D. dependent var	1674.433
S.E. of regression	1063.813	Akaike info criterion	16.88605
Sum squared resid	43004490	Schwarz criterion	17.09084
Log likelihood	-358.0501	F-statistic	16.51325
Durbin-Watson stat	2.368312	Prob(F-statistic)	0.000000

Dependent Variable: D(CNG)
Method: Least Squares
Sample (adjusted): 2000Q2 2010Q4
Included observations: 43 after adjustments

Variable	Coefficient	Std. Error	t-Statistic	Prob.
DUMMY	-2991.448	485.8263	-6.157444	0.0000
D(CAIM)	0.266659	0.103653	2.572629	0.0140
IPI	100.5384	20.15229	4.988929	0.0000
C	-9720.257	2109.659	-4.607501	0.0000

R-squared	0.674130	Mean dependent var	1103.063
Adjusted R-squared	0.649063	S.D. dependent var	1674.433
S.E. of regression	991.9324	Akaike info criterion	16.72560
Sum squared resid	38373265	Schwarz criterion	16.88943
Log likelihood	-355.6003	F-statistic	26.89325
Durbin-Watson stat	1.933698	Prob(F-statistic)	0.000000

EU COMPARISON OF VAT

MARIA ZENOVIA GRIGORE [*]
MARIANA GURĂU []

Abstract
VAT is one of the newest tools of the global economy and is widely adopted in most of the countries. For EU Member States is required not only the existence of VAT, but also that its main characteristics to be uniformly implemented. This should facilitate intra-Community transactions, but in practice does not as there are many local variations which can lead to costly errors and penalties.
The objective of this paper is to collate data about the main characteristics of VAT in EU Member States and to highlight the key differences between them.
This survey shows that there continue to be opportunities and risks for businesses trading cross border, as a result of differences in application of Community legislation on VAT. This led to the necessity of VAT reform. On this basis, the Commission adopted on the end of the last year a Communication on the future of VAT. This sets out the fundamental characteristics that must underlie the new VAT regime, and priority actions needed to create a simpler, more efficient and more robust VAT system in the EU.

Keywords: VAT standard rate, VAT registration threshold, distance selling, VAT recovery, principle of destination.

Introduction

Fiscal policies represent an important lever for the support of a sustainable economic growth and for public finances consolidation. It is important that the European fiscal system becomes effective, efficient and correct, especially regarding the VAT European system given the fact that at present, the VAT constitutes one of the main sources of revenues for the Member States budgets.

One of the conditions to accede to the EU is that the main characteristics and rules regarding VAT be uniformly implemented. The objective of this request is to simplify the taxation of intra-community transactions, but in practice this thing is not possible because of different local VAT regulations and foreign languages assessing the compliance of some operations. In the first part of the work, we shall emphasize these differences which are especially related to the level of VAT rates, thresholds of VAT and foreign companies VAT recovery.

In the second part of the work, we shall analyze the recent initiatives of European Commission regarding the creation of a more efficient, stronger and simpler VAT system. This system should reduce the operational costs for companies and administrative charges of authorities, fighting at the same time against fraud which represents a considerable burden for public finances and for consumers.

1. Comparison of VAT in Member States of European Union

The main normative act of VAT is Council Directive 2006/112/EC on the common system of value added tax, which is a recast of the Sixth VAT Directive of 1977. This normative act pursues to establish a general frame as VAT systems of Member States be compatible. The Directive establishes mandatory rules for all states, but some aspects are left in care of Member States which can have thus a certain degree of decision.

[*] Associate Professor, Ph. D., Faculty of Economic Sciences, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: mgrigore@univnt.ro).
[] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, Faculty of Economic Sciences, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: mgurau@univnt.ro).

For example, the mandatory rules deal with the definition of taxable operations, taxable persons, VAT rules in case of intra-Community aquisition and supply, VAT tax base etc. Uniformity of VAT tax base is necessary taking into account the obligation of EU Member States to contribute to the Union budget with a part of collected VAT, a contribution which is calculated by application of a percentage rate upon the tax base.

One of the most significant differences between the VAT systems of Member States refers to VAT rates. Besides the standard VAT rate, another three rates are applied: reduced rate, over-reduced rate and parking rate. Table no. 1 presents the four VAT rates applied in EU Member States at 1st of January 2012.

Table no. 1. VAT rates in EU Member States (%)

	Standard rate	Reduce rate	Super reduce rate	Parking rate
Belgium	21,0	6/12	-	12
Bulgaria	20,0	9	-	-
Czech Republic	20,0	14	-	-
Denmark	25,0	-	-	-
Germany	19,0	7	-	-
Estonia	20,0	9	-	-
Ireland	23,0	13,5	4,8	13,5
Greece	23,0	6,5/13	-	-
Spain	18,0	8	4	-
France	19,6	7	2,1	-
Italy	20,0	10	4	-
Cyprus	15,0	5/8	-	-
Latvia	22,0	12	-	-
Lithuania	21,0	5/9	-	-
Luxembourg	15,0	6/12	3	12
Hungary	27,0	5/18	-	-
Malta	18,0	5/7	-	-
Netherlands	19,0	6	-	-
Austria	20,0	10	-	12
Poland	23,0	5/8	-	-
Portugal	23,0	6/13	-	13
Romania	24,0	5/9	-	-
Slovenia	20,0	8,5	-	-
Slovakia	20,0	10	-	-

Finland	23,0	9/13	-	-
Sweden	25,0	6/12	-	-
United Kingdom	20,0	5	-	-

Source:

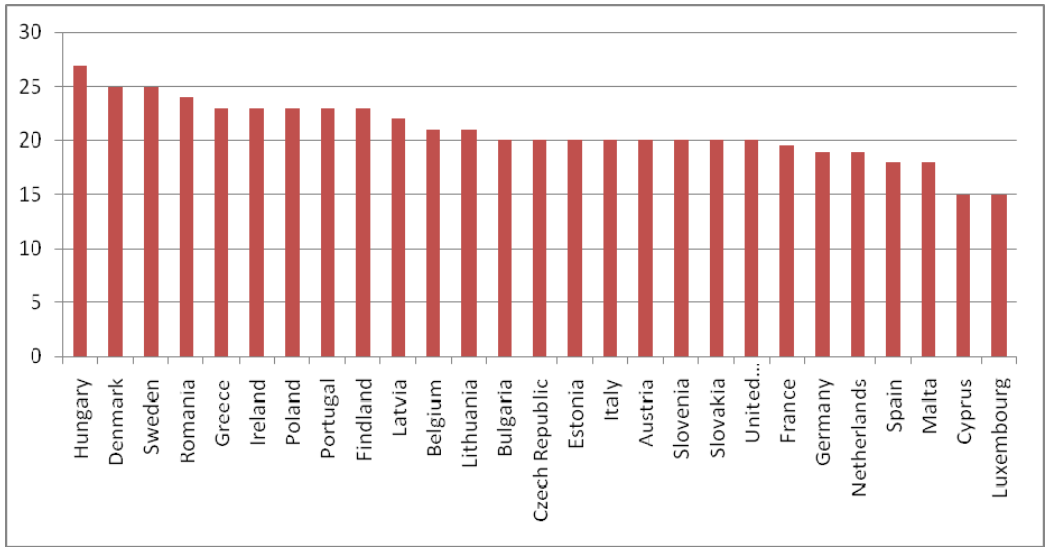
http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/resources/documents/taxation/gen_info/economic_analysis/tax_structures/2011/report_2011_en.pdf

http://www.vatsystems.eu/index.php/news/show_prev_news/12/2011

The minimum standard rate in EU is established to 15%, each Member state having the liberty to establish the rate considered appropriate for its budgetary necessities. This minimum rate helps to avoid substantial variations in Member States' VAT rates which could lead to distortions of competition between high and low rate countries and put the smooth functioning of Single Market at risk.

Hungary practise the biggest standard rate of TVA from EU: 27%. The rate of 25%, the second as size in EU, is applied in Denmark and Sweden. Romania was till the 1st of July 2010 in the group of middle states with a rate of 19%, but now it occupies third place in the classification of EU Member States with a rate of 24%. The most relaxed taxation regarding VAT is found in Cyprus and Luxembourg, countries which practise the minimum rate of 15% (graph no. 1).

Graph no. 1. VAT standard rates in the Member States



According to the data from table no. 2, between 2000 and 1st of January 2012, the VAT standard rate remained unchanged in 8 Member States (Belgium, Bulgaria, Denmark, France, Italy, Luxembourg, Austria and Sweden), rose in 17 Member States and diminished only in Slovakia (from 23,0% in 2000 to 19,0% in 2012) and Czech Republic (from 22,0% to 20,0%). The highest rises were registered in Greece (from 18,0% to 23,0%) and Cyprus (from 10,0% to 15,0%).

Table no. 2. Evolution of the standard rate of VAT (%)

	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004	2005	2006	2007	2008	2009	2010	2011	2012
EU-27 average	19,2	19,3	19,5	19,5	19,4	19,6	19,4	19,5	19,4	19,8	20,4	20,7	20,9
Belgium	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0
Bulgaria	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0
Czech Republic	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	20,0	20,0	20,0
Denmark	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0
Germany	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0
Estonia	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0
Ireland	21,0	20,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,5	21,0	21,0	23,0
Greece	18,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	23,0	23,0	23,0
Spain	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	16,0	18,0	18,0	18,0
France	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6	19,6
Italy	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0
Cyprus	10,0	10,0	13,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0
Latvia	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	21,0	21,0	22,0	22,0
Lithuania	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	19,0	21,0	21,0	21,0
Luxembourg	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0
Hungary	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	27,0
Malta	15,0	15,0	15,0	15,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0	18,0
Netherlands	17,5	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0
Austria	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0
Poland	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	23,0	23,0
Portugal	17,0	17,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	21,0	21,0	21,0	20,0	20,0	21,0	23,0	23,0
Romania	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	24,0	24,0	24,0
Slovenia	19,0	19,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0	20,0
Slovakia	23,0	23,0	23,0	20,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	19,0	20,0	20,0
Finland	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	22,0	23,0	23,0	23,0
Sweden	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0	25,0
United Kingdom	17,5	17,5	17,5	17,5	17,5	17,5	17,5	17,5	17,5	15,0	17,5	20,0	20,0

Source:

http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/resources/documents/taxation/gen_info/economic_analysis/tax_structures/2011/report_2011_en.pdf

http://www.vatsystems.eu/index.php/news/show_prev_news/12/2011

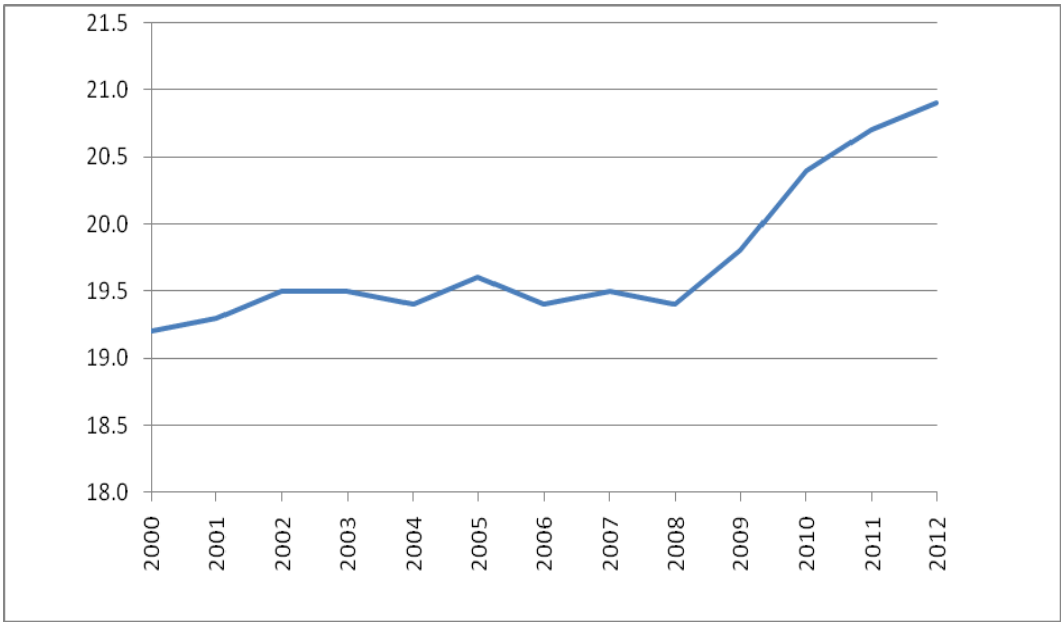
Under the pressure of the financial crisis, more European countries resorted last years to the enhancement of standard rate.

In 2010 Greece increased the VAT rate with four percentages, but in two stages. The first increase was from 19% to 21% and the second till 23%. In exchange, Spain increased the VAT rate only with two percentages from 16% to 18%. Also, Finland increased in 2010 the VAT rate but only with one percentage from 22% to 23%. Also, the VAT rate increases with one percentage in Portugal from 20% to 21% in 2010 while in 2011 it increases till 23%. In 2011, increases of VAT rate of one percentage have taken place in Latvia, Poland and Slovakia. On the 1st of January 2011, Great Britain increased the VAT rate from 17,5 % to 20%.

The only country which increased the VAT rate with 5 percentages like Romania is Hungary. The Hungarian government increased in 2009 the VAT rate from 20% to 25%. From the 1st of January 2012, two countries increased the VAT rate with 2 percentages: Ireland from 21% to 23% and Hungary from 25% to 27%.

According to the data from table no. 2, in EU-27 the VAT standard average rate rose from 19,8% in 2009 to 20,2% in 2010, 20,7% in 2011 and 20,9% in 2012. As compared to 2000, in 2012 the rise of VAT average rate was of 1,7% (Graph no. 2).

Graph no. 2. Evolution of the standard rate of VAT (EU-27 average)



Member States have the option of applying one or two reduced rates to a restricted list of goods and services. The reduced rate cannot be less than 5% and the list of eligible goods and services must be strictly interpreted. As we can see in table no. 1, the differences between Member States are substantial: 12 states have one reduced rate, 14 states have two reduced rates and Denmark is the single state which doesn't have reduced rate. The minimum reduced rate of 5%, value imposed by European Directives, is found in Cyprus, Latvia, Hungary, Malta, Poland, Romania and Great Britain. The highest values of reduced rate are found in Hungary (18%), Czech Republic (14%), Ireland (13.5%), Greece, Portugal and Finland (13%).

Not only the value of reduced rates differs from one state to another, but also the categories of goods and services for which these rates are applied. There are 21 of such categories among which we enumerate: foodstuffs, medicines, medical equipment for the disabled, books on all physical means of support, newspapers, periodicals, passenger transport, admission to shows, theatres, museums, etc.

The variety of reduced VAT rates brings a new level of complexity to intra-community transactions, leading to additional compliance costs. In spite of all this, for those who seek more advantageous situations, these differences can be used as opportunities worthy to be taken into consideration when they chose the country where they are going to open their business.

Over-reduced rates (lower than 5%) are applied only in five states: Spain (4%), France (2.1%), Ireland (4,8%), Italy (4%) and Luxemburg (3%), for goods and services as: food products, pharmaceuticals, books, newspapers, periodicals, television license fees, supply of new buildings, medical equipment for disabled persons etc.

A characteristic met among EU states is represented by the parking rate, which is a special VAT rate applied in five Member States (12% in Belgium, Austria, Luxemburg; 13% in Portugal; respectively 13,5% in Ireland) for certain goods as: certain energy products, certain wines, washing and cleaning products, printed advertising matter, tourism publications etc.

According to the table no. 3, European legislation provides three thresholds of TVA: for small enterprises (column A), for intra-Community acquisition accomplished by taxable persons not entitled to deduct input tax and by non-taxable legal person (column B) and for distance selling (column C).

Table no. 3. VAT Thresholds (September 2011)

Country	A. Exemption for small enterprises (annual turnover)		B. Threshold for non-taxable intra-Community acquisition (annual value of intra-Community acquisitions)		C. Threshold for application of the special scheme for distance selling (annual value of distance selling)
	National currency	Euro equiva-lent	National currency	Euro equiva-lent	National currency	Euro equiva-lent
Belgium	5.580 euro	-	11.200 euro		35.000 euro
Bulgaria	50.000 BGN	25.565	20.000 BGN	10.226	70.000 BGN	35.791
Czech Republic	1.000.000 CZK	40.851	326.000 CZK	13.318	1.140.000 CZK	46.570
Denmark	50.000 DKK	6.707	280.000 DKK	6.500	280.000 DKK	37.557
Germany	17.500 euro	-	12.500 euro	-	100.000 euro	-
Estonia	15.978 euro	-	10.226 euro	-	35.151 euro	-
Ireland	75.000 euro or 37.500 euro	-	41.000 euro	-	35.000 euro	-
Greece	10.000 euro or 5.000 euro	-	10.000 euro	-	35.000 euro	-
Spain	None	None	10.000 euro	-	35.000 euro	-
France	81.500 euro or 32.600 euro	-	10.000 euro	-	100.000 euro	-
Italy	30.000 euro	-	10.000 euro	-	100.000 euro	-
Cyprus	15.600 euro	-	10.251 euro	-	35.000 euro	-

Latvia	35.000 LVL	49659	7.000 LVL	9.932	24.000 LVL	34.052
Lithuania	100.000 LTL	28.962	35.000 LTL	10.137	125.000 LTL	36.203
Luxembourg	10.000 euro	-	10.000 euro		100.000
Hungary	5.000.000 HUF	18.328	2.500.000 HUF	9.164	8.800.000 HUF	32.257
Malta	35.000 euro or 24.000 euro or 14.000 euro	-	10.000 euro	-	35.000 euro	-
Netherlands	None	None	10.000 euro	-	100.000 euro	-
Austria	30.000		11.000 euro	-	35.000 euro
Poland	150.000 PLN	37.774	50.000 PLN	12.592	160.000 PLN	40.293
Portugal	10.000 euro or 12.500 euro	-	10.000 euro		35.000 euro
Romania	119.000 RON	28.249	34.000 RON	8.071	118.000 RON	28.012
Slovenia	25.000 euro	-	10.000 euro	-	35.000 euro	-
Slovakia	49.790 euro	-	13.941,45 euro	-	35.000 euro	-
Finland	8.500 euro	-	10.000 euro	-	35.000 euro	-
Sweden	None	-	90.000 SEK	10.190	320.000 SEK	36.232
United Kingdom	70.000 GBP	81.843	70.000 GBP	81.843	70.000 GBP	81.843

Source:

http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/resources/documents/taxation/vat/traders/vat_community/vat_in_ec_annexi.pdf

Small enterprises, meaning entrepreneurs whose turnover (plus the value-added tax on it) has not exceeded the legal threshold in the preceding calendar year and is not expected to exceed this threshold in the current year, do not need to pay value-added tax. According to the data from table no. 3, column A, this threshold varies between 5.580 euro (Belgium) and 81.843 euro (United Kingdom). There are only three Member States not applying the special exemption for small enterprises: Spain, Netherlands and Sweden.

For simplification reasons, goods acquired by taxable persons not entitled to deduct input tax and by non-taxable legal person are not subjected to VAT if annual acquisitions are below an annual turnover threshold set by their Member State, though it is still possible to opt for taxation.[1] This threshold varies between 8.071 euro, in Romania, and 81.843 euro, in United Kingdom (table no. 3, column B).

Regarding distance sale, differences appear although theoretically it should be used either the minimum threshold of 35.000 euro or the maximum one of 100.000 euro. In spite of all this, as we can notice in table no. 3, column C, this request wasn't applied and implemented uniformly in those 27 states.

The great variations regarding these three thresholds of TVA can represent a real trap for many entrepreneurs who wish to develop their businesses in different Member States.

Even for companies which know their responsibilities regarding VAT registration and payment, the differences regarding the reporting periods specific to each country, as well as those regarding the order of declarations which must be submitted every month, quarter or year, create great problems (table no. 4).

[1] M. Z. Grigore, M. Gurău, Fiscalitate. Noţiuni teoretice şi lucrări aplicative, Cartea Studenţească Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009

Table no. 4. Fiscal period of VAT

Country	Fiscal period	Annual VAT declaration deadline
Belgium	Monthly / Quarterly	Not Applicable
Bulgaria	Monthly	Not Applicable
Czech Republic	Monthly / Quarterly	Not Applicable
Denmark	Monthly / Quarterly / Biannually	Not Applicable
Germany	Monthly / Quarterly	May
Estonia	Monthly	Not Applicable
Ireland	Biannually / Annually	Not Applicable
Greece	Monthly / Quarterly	10 May
Spain	Monthly / Quarterly	January
France	Monthly / Quarterly	Not Applicable
Italy	Monthly / Quarterly	Not Applicable
Cyprus	Quarterly	Not Applicable
Latvia	Monthly / Quarterly / Biannually	1 May
Lithuania	Monthly / Quarterly / Biannually	Not Applicable
Luxembourg	Monthly / Quarterly / Annually	May
Hungary	Monthly Quarterly Annually	Not Applicable
Malta	Quarterly	March
Netherlands	Monthly / Quarterly / Annually	March
Austria	Monthly / Quarterly	April
Poland	Monthly / Quarterly	Not Applicable
Portugal	Monthly / Quarterly	15th July
Romania	Monthly / Quarterly / Biannually / Annually	Not Applicable
Slovenia	Monthly / Quarterly	Not Applicable
Slovakia	Monthly / Quarterly	N/A
Finland	Monthly	Not Applicable
Sweden	Monthly / Quarterly / Annually	Not Applicable
United Kingdom	Monthly / Quarterly / Annually	Not Applicable

Source: http://www.agn-europe.org/htm/firm/news/ttf/2011/2011_vat_web.pdf

The fiscal period varies depending mostly on the overall turnover of the previous year, but also depending on VAT payment of precedent or current fiscal year (Hungary and Netherland), or depending on type of taxable person. Only 9 of the 27 EU Member States are required to submit an annual statement of VAT.

Since 1st January 2010, the procedure for reimbursement of VAT incurred by EU taxable persons in Member States where they are not established has been replaced by a new fully electronic procedure, thereby ensuring a quicker refund to claimants. The previous paper-based procedure was slow, cumbersome and costly. The new procedure better facilitates taxable persons and improves the functioning of the internal market. A new feature is that taxable persons will be paid interest if Member States are late making refunds.

The data from table no. 5 suggest that the new procedure determined the improvement of VAT recovery time as a result of the fact that many Member States joined the statutory term of 4 months.

Table no. 5. Foreign Company VAT Recovery

%	Claim time limit?	Representative required?	Approximate recovery time (months)	Surrender of original invoices required	Proof of payment needed	Certificate of registration required
Belgium	30 June	yes	6	yes	no	yes (original)
Bulgaria	30 September	no	4	no	no	yes (original)
Czech Republic	30 September	no	6	yes	no	yes (original)
Denmark	30 September	no	3	yes	no	yes (original)
Germany	30 June	no	6	yes	no	yes (original)
Estonia	30 September	no	4	yes	no	no
Ireland	30 June	no	0	yes	yes	yes (original)
Greece	30 June	no	6	yes	yes	yes (original)
Spain	30 September	yes	6	yes	no	yes (original)
France	30 June	no	3	yes	yes	yes (original)
Italy	30 June	no	6	yes	no	yes (original)
Cyprus	30 September	no	4	yes	no	yes (original)
Latvia	9 months	no	4	yes	yes	yes (original)
Lithuania	30 June	no	4	yes	yes	yes (original)
Luxembourg	30 June	no	6	yes	no	yes (original)
Hungary	30 September	no	4	yes	yes	yes (original)
Malta	9 months	no	4	yes	yes	yes (original)
Netherlands	30 June	no	6	yes	no	yes (original)
Austria	30 June	no	6	yes	no	yes (original)
Poland	30 September	no	6	yes	no	yes (original)
Portugal	30 September	yes	0	yes	no	yes (original)
Romania	30 September	no	6	yes	yes	yes (copy)
Slovenia	30 September	no	4	yes	no	yes (original)
Slovakia	9 months	no	6	yes	no	yes (original)

Finland	30 June	no	3	yes	no	yes (original)
Sweden	30 June	no	3	yes	no	yes (original)
United Kingdom	9 months	no	4	no	no	no

Source: http://www.agn-europe.org/htm/firm/news/ttf/2011/2011_vat_web.pdf

2. Directions for VAT system improvement from EU

On 1st December 2010, the European Commission adopted a Green Paper on "The future of VAT – Towards a simpler, more robust and efficient VAT system"[2]. The purpose of the Green Paper was to generate a comprehensive debate with all interested stakeholders (businesses, academics, citizens, tax authorities) regarding the assessment of actual VAT system and possible modalities to enhance its coherence with the single market and its capacity to mobilize revenues, reducing at the same time the VAT compliance cost.

The Green Paper deals especially with the way of approach of cross-border transactions as well as other essential aspects related to VAT neutrality, the necessary degree of harmonization on the single market and decrease of bureaucracy.

One of the VAT essential aspects is the principle of neutrality. As VAT is a final consumption tax, companies shouldn't bear the VAT payment burden. As a result, Member States should ensure, in principle, the taxation of all commercial transactions and similar goods and services should be treated similarly.

Regarding intra-community transactions, the actual VAT system diverged from the initial commitment of Member States to apply the principle of origin, for lack of political support between Member States regarding cooperation in view of application of this principle.

A VAT system based upon the principle of destination, not only in case of goods but also in case of services seems to be a pragmatic and feasible solution.

According to the Communication released by European Commission as a result of the public debate of the Green Book,[3] the result of the proposed reform should be a VAT system with three attributes.

First, VAT must be made more workable for businesses. It should exist one single set of clear and simple rules regarding VAT (an EU VAT Code), which to be applied in case of a taxable person who develops its activity in many EU states; such a person should deal with tax authorities from one Member state. Among the measures envisaged for a more business-friendly VAT are expanding the one-stop-shop approach for cross border transactions, standardizing VAT declarations and providing clear and easy access to the details of all national VAT regimes through a central web-portal.

Second, VAT must be made more neutral and efficient in supporting Member States' fiscal consolidation efforts and sustainable economic growth. Broadening tax bases and limiting the use of reduced rates will generate new revenue or will allow the standard rate reduction without decreasing the revenue. The Communication sets out the principles that should guide the review of exemptions and reduced rates. Neutrality imposes equal rules regarding the right of deduction and very limited restrictions regarding the practising of this right.

Third, the huge revenue losses that occur today due to uncollected VAT and fraud need to be stopped. It is estimated that around 12% of the total VAT which should be collected, is not. Modern methods of VAT collection and monitorization should maximize the revenue practically collected and limit or even eliminate fraud. Besides the facilitation of legislation observance by companies, local tax authorities should concentrate upon risky behaviours, aim to combat frauds and finally to act collectively as European authority. An intensified, automatic and fast information exchange between national tax administrations will be vital in achieving this goal.

[2]http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/resources/documents/common/consultations/tax/future_vat/com(2010)695_en.pdf

[3]http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/resources/documents/taxation/vat/key_documents/communications/com_2011_851_en.pdf

Conclusions

Value added tax constitutes an important source of revenue for national budgets of Member States. Consumption taxes are considered to be a more stable revenue source, and more growth-friendly, than certain other taxes such as profits and income. Therefore many Member States have recently increased their VAT rates as part of their consolidation efforts.

The VAT legislation is regulated at the community level, but the necessary time to observe the tax liabilities comprised in the VAT legislation varies depending on different administrative used practices. For example, the observance of tax liabilities regarding VAT needs 222 hours in Finland and 288 in Bulgaria.[4]

With different local VAT regulations and foreign languages assessing the compliance of some operations, preparing and submitting VAT declarations can be complicated and time consuming for companies involved in European cross-border operations.

Business environment needs clear norms as regards VAT which grow the juridical degree of security and the probability that these norms be interpreted uniformly in Member States. Actual Council directives comprise inaccurate dispositions which increase the possibility of interpretation while the complex VAT system thus created prevents the cross-border activities and generates useless administrative charges.

The objective of Commission initiative, under the form of the Green Book, is to create a „simpler, stronger and more efficient" VAT system which is more transparent and focused on a close collaboration and exchange of best practices between Member States with the observance of subsidiarity principle.

A simpler, more harmonised VAT system, more adapted to modern business models and new technologies, would create a better environment for business and a more attractive market for investment.

References

- M. Z. Grigore, M. Gurău, Fiscalitate. Noțiuni teoretice şi lucrări aplicative, Cartea Studențească Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009
- http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/resources/documents/taxation/gen_info/economic_analysis/tax_structures/2011/report_2011_en.pdf
- http://www.vatsystems.eu/index.php/news/show_prev_news/12/2011
- http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/resources/documents/taxation/vat/traders/vat_community/vat_in_ec_annexi.pdf
- http://www.agn-europe.org/htm/firm/news/ttf/2011/2011_vat_web.pdf
- http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/resources/documents/common/consultations/tax/future_vat/com(2010)695_en.pdf
- http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/resources/documents/taxation/vat/key_documents/communications/com_2011_851_en.pdf
- http://www.pwc.com/gx/en/paying-taxes/pdf/paying-taxes-2011.pdf

[4] http://www.pwc.com/gx/en/paying-taxes/pdf/paying-taxes-2011.pdf

COMPARATIVE STUDY ON ACCOUNTING AND FISCAL AMORTIZATION

MARIANA GURĂU[*]
MARIA ZENOVIA GRIGORE[]

Abstract
Placed in the international trend, Romanian accounting had experienced various changes, especially as regards of progress on disconnection between accounting and fiscality. In the present, fiscal rules should not have any role in accounting decisions, because accounting rules are applied to produce accounting information that is useful in making decisions and to provide a "true and fair view" upon financial reality of the entity. However, the barrier in the habit of accounting to thinking for fiscal point of view all economic transactions remains insurmountable, yet.
Starting from this perspective on disconnection between accounting and fiscality would mean that amortization recorded in the accounting, as a result of management policy, to be different from fiscality amortization, to calculate income tax.
Although formally accepted, disconnect between accounting and fiscality continues to meet many difficulties. In this sense, it is usual in practice to use the same method of amortization for accounting purposes and for fiscal purposes to prevent complications of double track amortization and prevent wandering in the rules in this field. Accounting rule is deliberately eluded in favor of the fiscal rules.
This is the reason we proposed to make in this paper a comparative study between norms and rules on accounting and fiscal amortization, paper in which we intend to show the benefits of applying accounting and fiscal rules separately.

Keywords*: true and fair view, fiscal amortization, linear amortization, disconnect between accounting and fiscality.*

Introduction

In the engaged (integrated) relationship between accounting and fiscality is integrated recognition, measurement, amortisation, all these being subordinated to profit tax. In regard to the acceptance by fiscality of accounting rules and treatment in regarding items listed, occur three types of situations:

- fiscality accept tacit the accounting treatment;
- fiscality accept explicit the accounting treatment;
- fiscality defines its own behavior and its own treatment.

Situations in which fiscality defines its own behavior and its own treatment refer to taxation of profit, but also to those elements that converge to the taxation of profits.

One of the problems that develop asymmetries between accounting and fiscality, amortization, as a resource to rebuild equity, urges businesses to reflections in order to choose the best methods in accordance with the economic context in which they operate, but also with the strategy of the entity.

State aims to reduce amortization costs for the income taxes to be as high. On short term higher fiscal incomes collected, in the long term this fact determines disequilibrium at the microeconomic level, which subsequently has macroeconomic effects. In terms of inflation it must not have tax interest; duration of use should be adjusted to finance fixed capital.

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Faculty of Economic Sciences, Bucharest, Romania, (email: marianagurau@univnt.ro).
[] Associate Professor, Ph. D., „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Faculty of Economic Sciences, Bucharest, Romania, (email: mgrigore@univnt.ro).

Symmetries and asymmetries on accounting and fiscality amortization

Amortization in accounting understanding

Assets that are subject to amortization are tangible and intangible assets. In the amortization study are important to define some elements in terms of European and international accounting rules. In this regard:

amortization is the allocation of the depreciable amount of an fixed asset over the estimated life. Collection of the year amortization is deducted directly or indirectly from the result of that financial year; useful life is the period in which the entity expects to use a depreciable asset or the number of production units expected to be produced by functioning of the respective asset; appreciation of useful life of amortizable assets or a group of similar assets is generally based on physical depreciation estimated moral wear and legal or other limits imposed on asset. Durations useful life should be reviewed periodically, default rates of depreciation must be updated to the current and future periods.

The depreciable amount of an asset subject to amortization is its historical cost or other value which replaced the historical cost from the financial statements, less estimated residual value; If it is considered a significant residual value, it is estimated at the time of recognition or on any further review. National accounting rules do not recognize the residual value of an amortizable asset.

Amounts related to amortization of assets shall be allocated on each financial year during the use of asset, as different methods. Whatever is the amortization method chosen, it must be used with consistency in the spirit of the principle of consistent methods, without being conditioned by the level of the company profitability, by the tax considerations or changing the economic strategy.

There must never lose sight of the fact that a change of accounting method have the effect of distortion of the image reflected by the financial statements and that the information offered by them may not be comparable from one year to another. Amortization method may be modified only when it is determined by an error in the estimation of consumption of the benefits for that fixed assets, and this must be mentioned in the notes to financial statements, together with the reason that led to changing the method of amortization.

Fiscal amortization

In the acceptation of the Fiscal Code, the concept of asset is used to define any property, which is held for use in the production or supply of goods or services, to be leased to third parties or for administrative purposes, if it has a normal duration more than one year and a value greater than the limit established by Government decision.

We can define amortization, in fiscal terms, as a recovery by deductions of acquisition, production, construction assembly or improvement assets costs from the result.

Fixed assets are differentiated in amortizable fixed assets and unamortized fixed assets. Fiscality defines amortizable fixed assets as any tangible assets that satisfying the following conditions:

is owned and used in the production, supply of goods or services to be leased to third parties or for administrative purposes;

has a tax value higher than the limit established by Government decision, the entry in the assets of the taxpayer; has a normal duration of use more than one year.

In the Tax Code sense are considered amortizable fixed assets too:
a) investments to fixed assets subject to leases, lease, location management or other similar;

b) fixed assets partially put into operation, for which no registration forms as tangible were prepared. They are included in those groups in witch it will be recorded, with the value resulting from the sum of actual expenses occasioned for their implementation;

c) investments for uncovering in order to exploit the useful minerals, as well as openness and readiness work to underground and surface extraction;

d) investments to existing fixed assets, as further expenditures made to improve the initial technical parameters and leading to future economic benefits, by increasing the asset value;

e) investments from own resources, embodied in new goods, on the nature of public domain and in the development and modernization of public owned property;

f) fittings of land.

For tangible assets that are used in lots, sets or forming only one wing, lot or set, to determine amortization should consider the value of entire body lot or set. For parts in the structure of a tangible asset, of which normal period of use differs from the normal use of the asset result, the amortization shall be determined for each component.

From the perspective of accounting rules, from the tangible assets, only land are not amortized. In fiscal terms, in addition there are also other fixed assets which are not amortized as follows: land, including woodland, paintings and works of art, lakes , marshes and ponds which are not the result of an investment, public goods financed from the budget, any asset that does not lose their value over time due to use, according to the rules, own rest houses, housing protocol, vessels, aircraft, vessels cruising, other than those used for his income realization.

The evaluation base of accounting and tax amortization

From an accounting perspective, the amortizable value of an asset is historical cost or other value which replaced the historical cost, respectively the input value of the tangible assets. Therefore, the assessment base of amortization is represented by:

- acquisition cost for bought goods;
- production cost for goods produced in the entity;
- contribution value determined by an expert assessor for property obtained as a contribution to capital;
- market value or fair value for assets received free of charge or plus to the inventory found;
- in amortizable value are included the costs after putting into service of an asset when they improve operational status of the asset in comparation with the initially estimated performance of that asset ;
- amortizable value may be decreased if the utility of an asset or group of assets is permanently altered as a result of moral damage or wear;
- revalued value, in case of application for revaluation treatment.

From a fiscal perspective, the evaluation base for amortization consists of costs for acquisition, production, construction, assembly, installation or improvement of depreciable assets that are recovered in terms of tax by deducting amortization.

Fiscality uses as a evaluation basis, fiscal value represented by:

- acquisition cost,
- production cost,
- market value of assets gained free of charge or provided as contribution, the entry in the property taxpayer

Fiscal value includes accounting revaluations.

Accounting and fiscal policies for amortization

Amortization along with recognition and evaluation of amortizable assets is, in our opinion, the most bidder section on accounting methods and alternative treatments that give the possibility of accounting options, more or less correct, to serve the interest of the economic entity.

In this regard, we take into account:

- useful life / normal operating period;

- amortization methods ;

- the borrowing costs directly attributable to the acquisition, construction or production of a qualifying asset production, which may be included in the cost of that asset.

Useful life

From an accounting perspective, amortization period for an amortizable asset is called useful life or economic period. Amortization period should correspond with the useful life, which have be determined by reference to the future economic benefits expected to be obtained by use of amortizable assets.

In setting amortization of tangible assets are considered duration of economic use and conditions of use.

Most often choose amortization period is a matter of optimization ranging from accounting and fiscal interest, amortization enrolling between components of self-financing capacity of the entity.

Just as often there is no agreement between accounting and fiscal interest, the same happens when choosing the amortization period. Accounting may choose a different amortization period than fiscality does, at least in theory, although in practice not much happens.

More specifically, economic duration, and the normal amortization duration of fixed assets are estimated, not measured, depending on experience offered by the practice for amortizable asset categories. On the other hand, this period may be different from the physical life of assets.

Factors that determine the establishment of normal duration of use are:

- physical wear, which sets a limit for the duration of service;
- moral wear due to new technology which shortens the life of the asset before the exhaustion of physical life, and
- inadequacy of assets in relation to changes in the profile and increasing the capacity of the entity.

With regard to the freedom that accounting rules allow for setting service life, it is important to note that, if fully amortizated tangible can be more used, to reevaluation a new value is established and a new period of economic use, for the period estimated to still use.

Amortization period initially set may change if there is a significant change in the terms of use, the aging of a tangible or in other exceptional cases. This should be chosen independent of the fiscal arrangements in the field.

The normal operating period

In terms of taxation, the amortization period is called the normal operating period. Establish normal operating duration imposed an authorized control to temper the businesses policy to establish small duration of use, and amortization too.

In this sense, the amortization duration is fiscal period which may differ from the accounting and are governed by Decision no. 2139/2004 for approving the Catalogue for classification and normal operating duration of fixed assets.

This catalog includes the classification of fixed assets used in the economy and their normal operating period, corresponding to amortization times, in years, for the system of linear amortization.

The normal operating period is the period of use in which recovering by amortization, from fiscal point of view, the fiscal value of the assets. The catalog specifies that normal operation period is lower than the physical life of respectively asset and for each fixed asset are presented a system in years of beach between a minimum and maximum, with a choice of choose normal operation period between these limits.

We can say therefore that there is some flexibility in determining the normal operating period.

The normal operation period of the asset, determined as the range of years from the catalog, remain unchanged until full recovery of its input value or removed from function.

An overview of symmetry and asymmetry between accounting and fiscality regarding amortization, starting from the known fact that fiscality divides tangible assets in amortizable and unamortizable tangible assets, is shown in the table below:

Accounting amortization of fixed assets	Fiscal amortization of fixed assets
Tangible assets are assets that: - Are held by an entity for use in the production of goods or services to be leased to third parties or used for administrative purposes and - Are used for a period longer than one year.	Depreciable fixed assets are represented by any tangible which meets the following conditions: - Are owned and used in the production, supply of goods or services to be leased to third parties or for administrative purposes; - Have a fiscal value higher than the limit established by Government decision; - Have a duration of use more than one year.
	By exception, if an item of tangible asset has a fiscal value less than the limit established by Government decision, the taxpayer may choose to deduct costs or to recover these costs by amortization deductions.
The assessment base is: - acquisition cost for bought goods; - production cost for goods produced in the entity; - contribution value determined by an expert assessor for property obtained as a contribution to capital; - market value or fair value for assets received free of charge or plus to the inventory found;	The assessment base is fiscal value represented by: - acquisition cost, - production cost, - market value of assets gained free of charge or provided as contribution, the entry in the property taxpayer Fiscal value includes accounting revaluations.
The assessment base can change with: - including in amortization of value of the costs after putting into service of an asset when they improve operational status of the asset in comparation with the initially estimated performance of that asset ; - amortizable value may be decreased if the utility of an asset or group of assets is permanently altered as a result of moral damage or wear; - revalued value, in case of application for revaluation treatment.	The assessment base can change with: - the later costs will be included in asset cost, if this leading to higher economic benefits - Replacing the initial fiscal value with revalued value, only if it is not lower than the entry value.
Useful life is determined by economic life.	The normal operating period – from Catalog
Useful life can change: After revaluation; May be reviewed	The normal operating period can not be reviewed (change).
Not amortized: land	Not amortized: - Land, including forests; - Paintings and works of art; - Goodwill; - Lakes, ponds and lakes that are not the result of an investment;

	- Public goods financed from the budget; - Any asset that does not lose value over time due to use, according to the rules; - Own holiday homes, housing protocol, vessels, aircraft, cruise ships, other than those used for his income.
It amortized and: - investments for arrangement of lakes, ponds, land and other similar works.	It amortized and: Land arrangements, linear over a period of 10 years
It amortized: - Investments to tangible assets leased, on the lease duration. On expiry of the contract value of the made investment and the corresponding amortization gives to the property's owner	It amortized: - Costs of investments to fixed assets leased, rented or leased by the management who made the investment, during the contract or during normal use, as appropriate.
Amortization method: - The linear method; - Degressive method; - Accelerated method; - Method per unit of product.	Amortization method: - In case of construction applies linear amortization method; - In case of technological equipment, machinery, tools and plants, as well as computers and peripherals thereof, may opt for linear amortization method, degressive or accelerated; - In case of any depreciable asset, can opt for linear or degressive amortization method. - Per unit of product for exploitation of mineral substances useful; - Vehicles can be amortized and depending on the number of kilometers or number of operating hours provided in the manuals
It is necessary to use the same method of amortization for all assets of the same nature and having identical terms of use	It is necessary to use the same method of amortization for all assets of the same nature and having identical terms of use
It is also amortized - Development costs are amortized over the contract period or duration of use - Costs of setting up are amortized over a maximum period of five years, if the entity choose not to recognise them in period's costs. - Goodwill is amortized, usually within a period not exceeding five years. - Patents, licenses, trademarks, rights and other similar assets are amortized over their expected use by the entity holding them.	It is also amortized using linear method during the contract period or useful life of: - Costs related to the acquisition of patents, copyrights, licenses, trade marks or factory - Other intangible assets recognized for accounting purposes, - Development costs which are recognized like intangible assets from accounting point of view linear, over a period of three years - Cost of acquisition or production software. Degressive or accelerated amortization method. - For invention patents
	Not amortized: - Costs of setting; - Goodwill,

As can be seen from the table, between accounting and fiscal treatment there are asymmetries at all levels: elements that are subject to amortization, amortization methods, the possibility of revision, revaluation. Perhaps for this reason, the accounting rules and fiscal rules come to meet the need of specialists with very clear specifications about amortization.

In the case of amortization there are the most differences between accounting and fiscal rules. Accountants must understand that this should not affect the true and fair view of the entity showed through financial statements. Knowing the symmetries and asymmetries of amortization, we can calculate and record amortization in accounting according to accounting rules, and in terms of taxation (in the register of fiscality) depending on fiscality rules. Also, the Income Tax Declaration (101) we have to declare separately accounting and fiscal amortization. Note that if is chosen to apply the fiscal rules for accounting too, is compulsory to complete the information about accounting and fiscal amortization in the Income Tax Declaration 101.

Conclusions

Financial statements should provide a true and fair view of the entity. We believe this is a great ideal in the context of the market is too complex to be captured by any accounting system, and the establishment (by choice) to amortization methods involve a high degree of subjectivity, the classification of this process into an accounting set of rules can be dangerous, or even impossible.

We consider that it is necessary awareness of the inherent accounting's limits by its nature and by the complexity of economic reality for which reflection aims to realize. In our opinion, economic entities have no reason to not apply accounting rules for financial statements and fiscal rules, other than accounting, in order to determine the taxable profit in the direction of amortization. Maybe just one of convenience, because the use of different methods for the two areas involves double work: accounting by accounting documents and fiscal evidence, into the Fiscal Register for amortization.

In conclusion, we can say that the national accounting regulations contain explicit provisions relating to amortizable assets mostly converging with IFRS and offer the possibility of detaching of the fiscality, perhaps in the greatest extent by comparison with other cases of this kind.

We hope that shown comparative analysis of accounting and fiscal amortization to be useful for accounting specialists in selecting of accounting policies on amortization.

References

- M. Grigore, M. Gurău, Fiscalitate, Noţiuni teoretice şi lucrări aplicative, Cartea Studenţească, Bucureşti, 2009, ISBN 978-606-501-021-5
- V. Răileanu, A. S. Răileanu, Abordări contabile şi fiscale privind impozitele şi taxele, Editura Economică 2009, ISBN 978-973-709-477-3
- Colecţia revistei Finanţe. Bănci. Asigurări, 2005 – 2011
- Colecţia revistei Audit Financiar, 2005 – 2011;
- Colecţia revistei Taxe, Finanţe, Contabilitate, 2005 – 2011;
- Colecţia revistei Contabilitatea, expertiza şi auditul afacerilor, CECCAR, 2005 – 2011
- Colecţia Jurnalul Cercetării Doctorale în Ştiinţe Economice, 2009 -2010
- Ordinul ministrului finanţelor publice nr. 3055/2009 pentru aprobarea Reglementărilor contabile conforme cu directivele europene, Monitorul Oficial al României,Partea I, nr. 766 din 10 noiembrie 2009
- Ministerul Finanţelor Publice: Legea nr. 571 din 22 decembrie 2003 privind Codul Fiscal, publicată în Monitorul oficial nr.927 din 23 decembrie 2003cu completările şi modificările ulterioare;
- Ministerul Finanţelor Publice: Hotărârea nr. 44 din 22 ianuarie 2004, privind Normele metodologice de aplicare a Legii nr. 571 din 22 decembrie 2003 privind Codul fiscal

SKEWNESS IN STOCK RETURNS: EVIDENCE FROM THE BUCHAREST STOCK EXCHANGE DURING 2000 – 2011

IULIAN PANAIT[*]
ECATERINA SLAVESCU[]

Abstract
Our paper investigates the symmetry in stock returns of the 30 most liquid companies traded on Bucharest Stock Exchange during 2000 – 2011 and also the most representative 5 market indices. Our daily data shows that skewness estimates are slightly negative for most indices and individual stocks, but only a few present values significantly different from the characteristics of a normal distribution. We compare our results with skewness estimates for 21 major and emerging stock market indices around the world and find that such results are similar to other low capitalization and trading volume markets. For all the Romanian and international assets studied, the Studentized-Range (St-R) and Jarque-Bera (J-B) tests reject the hypothesis of normal distribution of daily returns.

Keywords: Skewness, stock returns, asymmetric returns, frontier and emerging markets.
JEL Classification: G01, G12, G14, G15

Introduction

This paper is dedicated to the study of the normality of distributions and especially the symmetry (or asymmetry) of the financial assets returns. Our focus is on the Romanian capital market and especially on the indices and individual stocks traded on the Bucharest Stock Exchange but for comparison reasons we also include in our analysis a good number of international developed and emerging stock market indices.

Maximization of utility is the principle behind investment choice. The conventionalmean-variance equilibrium method (a two-parametermodel) requires either that return distributions are normal (Gaussian) or quadraticutility functions. Although over time esearchers have proposed different statistical distributionsfor pricing financial assets, the pertinence of symmetry analysisexceeds the pure determination of the statistical distributions.

The well known Capital Asset Pricing Model(CAPM) assumes that investors are only interested about the mean andvariance of returns, and thus implying that upside and downside risks are viewedwith equal dislike.

Some other authors have found that CAPM-based valuationmeasures are not so appropriate when market timing strategies and their subsequentnon-normal returns are taken into account. Also, investors typically take into consideration the difference between upside and downside risk. As a result, the basic hypothesis of the CAPM are disputed, and its emblematic risk measure beta is equally doubted.

There are models that allow for some asymmetry of the returns (two or three-parametermodels) and require logarithmic or cubic utility functions.Alternatively, some financial models were created to allow skewness to affect the requiredreturn of financial assets. Kraus and Litzenberger (1976),(1983) constructed a three-moment capital asset pricing model that includesthe effect of skewness on valuation.

[*]Ph. D. candidate, The Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies, Piata Romana 6, District 1, Bucharest, Romania, (email: iulian.panait@gmail.com).
[]Ph. D. candidate, The Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies, Piata Romana 6, District 1, Bucharest, Romania, (email: ecaterinaslavescu@yahoo.com).

If we take into consideration arguments that higher moments of returndistributions are not negligible, at least not in major international financialmarkets like USA, UK and Japan, it is not reasonable to assume thatinvestors will ignore them.

Consequently, the objective of ourinvestigation is to extend the previous work and to find whether such results are true for the Romanian capital market. In order to achive this, we will compute skewness according to its most widely used defition and will employ statistical tests for the significance of mean, skewness and for the normaly of the distributions of the sample daily log-returns.

A number of authors have proposed analysing portfolioson the basis of the first three moments of return distributions, rather thanthe traditional two moments (mean and variance introduced by Markowitz in 1952). The positive sign of the third derivative ofthe utility function ((Arrow, 1964), (Pratt, 1964)) gives tells us that investors' risk aversion decreases as wealth increasesand, therefore, has cubic utility functions.

Arrow (1971) suggests that the most desirable properties for an investor'sutility function are (a) positive marginal utility for wealth, (b) decreasingmarginal utility for wealth and (c) decreasing absolute risk aversion.The first two conditions are consistent with mean-variance preference.Arditti(1967) has argued that condition (c) implies preference for positive skewness.

Important work about the type of empirical returns wasperformed byFama and Roll (1968) and Fama (1971). Also, a theoretical refference on thirdmoments was developed by Jean (1971), by addressing the question of skewnesspreference in a portfolio context.

Recently, Kearney and Lynch (2007) used daily returns on 6 international stock market indices from 1978 to 2002 in order to search for skewness in the tails, in different intervals and in the entire distribution and found very limited evidence of statistically significant skewness.

Tudor (2008) explored the power of the skewness coefficient in explaining stock returns on the Romanian equity market employing weekly observations for 31 common stocks traded on Bucharest Stock Exchange during 2000-2006 and found positive results.

Lucey et all (2006) showed that the incorporation of skewness as an objective in portfolio selection causes the optimal portfolio to change significantly from one formed only under conditions of meanvarianceanalysis.

Peiro (1999) addressed the symmetry of daily returns in eight international stockmarkets and three spot exchange rates. He showed that for his data the tests of symmetry with the sample skewnessseem of little value, due to the non-normality of the returns, butunder alternative nonnormaldistributions, the symmetry of the returns cannot be rejected for most markets.

Again Peiro (2001) examined the symmetry of twenty-four individual stock returns at different frequencies: daily, weekly and monthly. He found that while some asymmetries are observed indaily returns, they disappear almost completely at lower frequencies.

Machado-Santos and Fernandes (2005) used binomial and distribution free tests and found significant evidence of negative skewness in the Portuguese market during 1997-2002 period.

Brunner et all (2009) experimentally tested skewness preferences at the individual level. And found that the skewness of a distribution has a significant impact on the investment decisions.

Data and methodology

In our study we used daily prices from 21 international indices, 5 indices of the Bucharest Stock Exchange and 30 individual stocks traded on the Bucharest Stock Exchange. For the international indices the source of data was Yahoo Finance (www.finance.yahoo.com), while the date for the Romanian stocks and indices were obtained directly from the Bucharest Stock Exchange, courtesy of the Data Dissemination Department.

Our objective was to investigate the symmetry of the distribution of the daily returns during 2000 – 2011. However, a few of the indices and individual stocks used in our study were traded for only a part of this period, or data was unavailable for the first part of the period that we investigated.

These exceptions are mentioned in the Table 1 presented below. We consider that this compromise is not significant and didn't influence our conclusions.

Table 1: The financial time series used

Series symbol	Description	Period of daily observations
_AEX	Amsterdam Stock Exchange Index (Netherlands)	2000 - 2011
_ATX	Wien Stock Exchange Index (Austria)	2000 - 2011
_BET	Bucharest Stock Exchange BET Index	2000 - 2011
_BET_C	Bucharest Stock Exchange BET-C Index	2000 - 2011
_BET_FI	Bucharest Stock Exchange BET-FI Index	2001 - 2011
_BET_XT	Bucharest Stock Exchange BET-XT Index	Jun 2008 - 2011
_BFX	Euronext BEL-20 index (Belgium)	2005 - 2011
_BSESN	BSE SENSEX Index (India)	2000 - 2011
_BVSP	IBOVESPA Index (Brasil)	2000 - 2011
_FCHI	CAC 40 Index (France)	2000 - 2011
_FTSE	FTSE 100 Index (UK)	2000 - 2011
_GDAXI	DAX 30 Index (Germany)	2000 - 2011
_GSPC	SP500 Index (USA)	2000 - 2011
_HSI	Hang Seng Index (Hong Kong)	2000 - 2011
_JKSE	Jakarta Composite Index (Indonesia)	2000 - 2011
_KLSE	FTSE Bursa Malaysia (Malaysia)	2000 - 2011
_KS11	KOSPI Composite Index (South Korea)	2000 - 2011
_MERV	MERVAL Buenos Aires (Argentina)	2000 - 2011
_N225	NIKKEI 225 (Japan)	2000 - 2011
_NZ50	NZX 50 Index (New Zeeland)	May 2004 - 2011
_OMXSPI	OMXS All Share Index (Sweden)	2000 - 2011
_OSEAX	Oslo Exchange All Share Index (Norway)	2001 - 2011
_ROTX	Bucharest Stock Exchange ROTX Index	Oct 2008 - 2011
_SSEC	Shanghai Composite Index (China)	2000 - 2011
_SSMI	SMI Index (Switzerland)	2000 - 2011
_TWII	TSEC Index (Taiwan)	2000 - 2011
ALT	Altur Slatina SA	2004 - 2011
ALU	Alumil RomIndustry SA	2007 - 2011
AMO	Amonil Slobozia SA	2000 - 2011
ATB	Antibiotice Iasi SA	2000 - 2011
AZO	Azomures Tg-Mures SA	2000 - 2011

BCC	Banca Comerciala Carpatica SA	2004 - 2011
BIO	Biofarm SA	2000 - 2011
BRD	BRD - GSG	2001 - 2011
BRK	SSIF Broker Cluj SA	2004 - 2011
CMP	Compa Sibiu SA	2000 - 2011
COMI	Condmag SA	2000 - 2011
DAFR	Dafora SA	2000 - 2011
IMP	Impact SA	2000 - 2011
ELMA	Electromagnetica SA	2000 - 2011
OLT	Oltchim Rm-Valcea SA	2000 - 2011
PTR	Rompetrol Well Services SA	2000 - 2011
RRC	Rompetrol Rafinare Constanta SA	2004 - 2011
SCD	Sicomed SA	2000 - 2011
SIF1	SIF1 Banat-Crisana SA	2000 - 2011
SIF2	SIF2 Moldova SA	2000 - 2011
SIF3	SIF3 Transilvania SA	2000 - 2011
SIF4	SIF4 Muntenia SA	2000 - 2011
SIF5	SIF5 Oltenia SA	2000 - 2011
SNO	Santierul Naval Orsova SA	2000 - 2011
TBM	Turbomecanica SA	2000 - 2011
TEL	Transelectrica SA	2006 - 2011
TGN	Transgaz SA	2008 - 2011
VNC	Vrancart SA	2004 - 2011
TLV	Banca Transilvania SA	2000 - 2011
SNP	OMV - Petrom SA	2001 - 2011

Regarding the returns estimation, as Strong (1992, p.353) pointed out "there are both theoretical and empirical reasons for preferring logarithmic returns. Theoretically, logarithmic returns are analytically more tractable when linking together sub-period returns to form returns over long intervals. Empirically, logarithmic returns are more likely to be normally distributed and so conform to the assumptions of the standard statistical techniques." Precisely for this reason we decided to use logarithmic returns in our study since our objective is to test of whether the returns of the Romanian stock and indices during 2000 – 2011 were normally distributed or, instead, showed signs of asymmetry (skewness). The computation formula of the daily returns is as follows:

$$R_{i,t} = Ln\left(\frac{P_{i,t}}{P_{i,t-1}}\right)$$

where $R_{i,t}$ is the return of asset i in period t; $P_{i,t}$ is the price of asset i in period t and $P_{i,t-1}$ is the price of asset i in period t-1. According to this methodology of computing the returns, the prices of the assets must be adjusted for corporate events such as dividends, splits, consolidations and share capital increases (mainly in case of individual stocks because indices are already adjusted).

As a result of this initial data gathering we obtained 56 time series of log-returns, each with approx. 3000 daily observations.

Concerning the estimation of skewness, according to most authors a time series of financial asset returns is symmetric around it's mean (noted here with μ) if:

$$\forall k, f(\mu + k) = f(\mu - k)$$

where f is the density function of the returns. If this property is valid then the mean of the returns series coincides with its median.

The skewness of a data population is defined as the third central moment. To be more precise, skewness is computed as the average cubic deviation of the individual observations from the sample mean, divided by the standard deviation raised to the third power. As a consequence of these considerations, we have calculated the sample skewness as follows:

$$\hat{S} = \frac{\frac{1}{N}\sum_{t=1}^{N}(R_t - \bar{R})}{\hat{\sigma}^3}$$

where $\hat{S}$ is the sample skewness; N is the total number of individual observations within the sample, R_t is the return of period t, $\bar{R}$ is the sample arithmetic mean and $\hat{\sigma}$ is an estimator for the standard deviation that is based on the biased estimator for variance ($\hat{\sigma} = \sigma\sqrt{(N-1)/N}$), where the standard deviation is given by:

$$\sigma = \sqrt{\frac{\sum_{t=1}^{N}(R_t - \bar{R})^2}{N-1}}$$

The skewness of a symmetric distribution, such as the normal distribution, is zero. Positive skewness means that thedistribution has a long right tail and negative skewness implies that the distributionhas a long left tail.

According to Peiro (1999), under normality hypothesis, the asymptotic distribution of $\hat{S}$ is given by $\hat{S} \to N(0, \frac{6}{T})$.

Results and interpretations

The first thing that we observe analyzing the data is that for 45 out of 56 of assets investigated we cannot reject the null hypothesis of zero mean of the sample daily returns over the 2000-2011 period. Still, it is very interesting that from the 5 Romanian indices investigated, three present mean sample returns that are significantly positive (at the 5% level). Also, 2 out of the 30 individual Romanian stocks studied present significant negative daily mean returns and 4 out of 30 present significant positive daily returns. From 21 the international indices studied for the period 2000-2011 only 2 present significant positive daily returns, while for all the other 19 indices we were not able to reject the hypothesis of zero mean returns.

More important for our study, from all the 56 assets investigated, during the period 2000-2011 only 11 presented skewness values that appear far from zero (the value of the standardized normal distribution). All these 11 assets are Romanian assets: one index (ROTX) and 10 individual stocks. None of the 21 international indices appear to present significant skewness although most values are slightly negative.

As shown below in Table 2, both tests of the normality of the distribution of sample returns during 2000-2011 that we have conducted (the Studentized-Range test and the Jarque-Bera test) indicate that none of the 56 assets studied present a normal (Gaussian) distribution. In such a context, where the sample returns don't seem to conform to a normal distribution, a more complex analysis is needed in order to verify whether there is asymmetry in the data.

Table 2: Return statistics

Series	N	Mean (in %)	t-stat	Std. Dev. (in %)	Skewness	Sk S.E.	St-R	Jarque-Bera
_AEX	2989	-0.0092%	-0.7246	0.0069	0.0245	0.0448	12.30	3802.74
_ATX	2892	0.0089%	0.7122	0.0067	-0.2902	0.0455	14.44	6601.98
_BET	2898	0.0360%	2.4616	0.0079	-0.5053	0.0455	13.06	6110.21
_BET_C	2891	0.0256%	1.8644	0.0074	-0.5350	0.0456	20.40	24260.21
_BET_FI	2684	0.0501%	2.2116	0.0117	-0.1251	0.0473	11.07	2977.05
_BET_XT	855	-0.0257%	-0.6991	0.0107	-0.5089	0.0838	9.58	857.99
_BFX	1552	-0.0098%	-0.6048	0.0064	0.1600	0.0622	12.92	3456.70
_BSESN	2891	0.0164%	1.1878	0.0074	-0.1155	0.0456	16.26	4315.93
_BVSP	2891	0.0213%	1.3544	0.0085	-0.0643	0.0456	13.24	1522.98
_FCHI	2988	-0.0066%	-0.5255	0.0069	0.1190	0.0448	12.66	2490.25
_FTSE	2963	-0.0019%	-0.1790	0.0057	-0.0806	0.0450	14.09	3848.92
_GDAXI	2983	-0.0009%	-0.0703	0.0071	0.1243	0.0448	11.03	1766.27
_GSPC	3019	-0.0022%	-0.2044	0.0060	-0.1525	0.0446	14.73	6242.37
_HSI	2915	0.0016%	0.1162	0.0072	0.0110	0.0454	16.27	6286.14
_JKSE	2828	0.0240%	1.9207	0.0066	-0.6811	0.0461	12.14	4277.19
_KLSE	2874	0.0086%	0.8998	0.0051	-0.2201	0.0457	33.03	869185.20
_KS11	2868	0.0091%	0.6299	0.0078	-0.4093	0.0457	13.23	2055.04
_MERV	2880	0.0182%	1.0348	0.0094	-0.1602	0.0456	13.37	2682.09
_N225	2847	-0.0116%	-0.8870	0.0070	-0.3707	0.0459	15.77	5200.25
_NZ50	1863	0.0042%	0.5384	0.0033	-0.3789	0.0568	14.00	1983.22
_OMXSPI	2733	0.0002%	0.0123	0.0065	0.0684	0.0469	10.70	1331.09
_OSEAX	2661	0.0141%	1.0654	0.0068	-0.5903	0.0475	12.02	3430.63
_ROTX	789	-0.0093%	-0.2526	0.0103	-1.1287	0.0872	12.68	3087.56
_SSEC	2958	0.0067%	0.5190	0.0071	-0.0933	0.0450	11.49	2488.70
_SSMI	2961	-0.0013%	-0.1243	0.0056	0.0911	0.0450	14.76	4119.56
_TWII	2867	-0.0026%	-0.1999	0.0069	-0.2359	0.0457	10.42	714.01
ALT	1503	-0.0619%	-1.3276	0.0181	0.1104	0.0632	11.27	797.87
ALU	1094	-0.0733%	-1.5720	0.0154	-0.5380	0.0741	8.37	875.59

ATB	2795	0.0196%	0.7499	0.0138	-0.3673	0.0463	9.92	6411.76
AMO	2594	-0.0159%	-0.4027	0.0201	0.1103	0.0481	6.53	763.88
AZO	2748	0.0481%	1.4460	0.0174	-1.3681	0.0467	25.04	131989.50
BCC	1758	-0.0515%	-1.8918	0.0114	-0.3367	0.0584	11.50	4912.83
BIO	2363	0.0084%	0.1009	0.0406	0.2151	0.0504	45.76	8278150.00
BRD	2533	0.0209%	0.6903	0.0152	6.3559	0.0487	42.04	7089361.00
BRK	1591	-0.0906%	-1.9790	0.0183	-2.1014	0.0614	15.50	33666.87
CMP	2730	0.0272%	0.8999	0.0158	-0.4526	0.0469	14.22	6607.11
COMI	1248	0.1208%	0.7553	0.0565	0.0381	0.0693	18.81	46759.67
DAFR	1780	0.0255%	0.1466	0.0734	0.4441	0.0581	32.43	1905812.00
ELMA	2296	0.0167%	0.3408	0.0235	-6.5459	0.0511	25.30	1340663.00
IMP	2554	-0.0470%	-1.2981	0.0183	-2.4815	0.0485	18.33	94268.74
OLT	2658	0.0492%	1.2440	0.0204	1.3308	0.0475	18.45	48503.15
PTR	2492	0.0168%	0.2578	0.0325	-30.3469	0.0491	44.16	171000000.00
RRC	1773	0.0066%	0.1945	0.0142	0.4581	0.0582	9.91	1265.69
SCD	2780	0.0288%	1.1098	0.0137	-8.0406	0.0465	32.88	6646394.00
SIF1	2848	0.0516%	2.0217	0.0136	-0.2789	0.0459	9.64	2873.11
SIF3	2836	0.0439%	1.6136	0.0145	-3.2254	0.0460	24.88	546528.10
SIF2	2849	0.0564%	2.1254	0.0142	-0.2634	0.0459	9.26	2639.46
SIF4	2832	0.0351%	1.4139	0.0132	-0.2075	0.0460	9.94	2965.16
SIF5	2836	0.0503%	1.9384	0.0138	-0.1601	0.0460	9.50	2547.85
SNO	1976	0.0384%	0.9071	0.0188	0.0594	0.0551	6.98	543.21
SNP	2374	0.0239%	0.9764	0.0119	-0.2607	0.0503	11.01	3512.21
TBM	2461	-0.0030%	-0.0959	0.0155	-0.0934	0.0494	8.46	3096.99
TEL	1270	-0.0132%	-0.4068	0.0116	0.0440	0.0687	11.00	1302.75
TGN	956	-0.0084%	-0.2436	0.0106	-0.2264	0.0792	12.15	3620.56
TLV	2718	-0.0159%	-0.5301	0.0156	-9.1025	0.0470	27.78	3489067.00
VNC	1473	-0.0159%	-0.4251	0.0144	0.0599	0.0638	9.07	875.80

Conclusions

This study was dedicated to the issue of symmetry in financial assets returns on the Romanian capital market during the period 2000-2011.

In early financial studies, many authors and traditional methodologies used only the first two moments of the distributions (mean and variance) for pricing of the financial assets, assuming implicitly the normality of those distributions. Latter,a vast literature appeared suggesting that the inclusion of skewness and kurtosis in such valuation methods is useful since the third and fourth moments of the distribution are not negligible and therefore they are not ignored by investors and speculators.

We used daily data from Bucharest Stock Exchange for the mentioned period to prove that the distributions of the log-returns are not normally distributed although for most of the series we could not reject the null hypothesis of zero mean. This result is consistent with what we find for 21 international indices (both from developed and emerging markets) during the same period and confirm the recent studies of other authors for other markets, periods and asset groups.

Calculating the skewness of the distributions of the daily log-normal returns we found very few evidence of significant asymmetry, with only 10 individual Romanian stocks and 1 Romanian index presenting clearly negative skewness out of the 56 total assets studied. None of the 21 international indices presented clear evidence of skewness significantly different from zero. Still, we think that further analysis is required to clarify the issue of asymmetry because according to literature, the rejection of normality does not necessary imply the rejection of symmetry (Machado-Santosand FERNANDES, 2005). In this context a binomial distribution test and a distribution-free test such as Kruskal-Wallis test could be more suited.

Also, it would be interesting, as a piece of further research, to extend this study of skewness to a low frequency sample data such as the weekly and monthly returns for the same period.

References

- AGGARWAL, R. – RAO, R. – HIRAKI, T. (1989): Skewness and Kurtosis in Japanese Equity Returns: Empirical Evidence. The Journal of Financial Research, vol. 12, 1989, no. 3, pp. 253–260.
- ARDITTI, F. (1967): Risk and the Required Return on Equity. Journal of Finance, vol. 22, 1967, no. 1, pp. 19–36.
- ARDITTI, F. – LEVY, H. (1975): Portfolio Efficiency and Analysis in Three Moments: The Multiperiod Case. Journal of Finance, vol. 30, 1975, no. 3, pp. 797–809.
- ARROW, K. (1964): The Role of Securities in the Optimal Allocation of Risk-Bearing. Review of Economic Studies, vol. 31, 1964, pp. 91–96.
- ARROW, K. (1971): Essays in the Theory of Risk Bearing. Markham Publishing Company, Chicago, 1971.
- BASCI, S. – ZAMAN, A. (1998): Effects of Skewness and Kurtosis on Model Selection Criteria. Economic Letters, vol. 59, 1998, no. 1, pp. 17–22.
- BEKAERT, G. – ERB, C. – HARVEY, C. – VISKANTA, T. (1998): Distributional Characteristics of Emerging Market Returns and Asset Allocation. Journal of Portfolio Management, vol. 24, 1998, no. 2, pp. 102–116.
- BRUNNER, T., LEVINSKI, R. and QIU, J. (2009): Skewness preferences and asset selection: An experimental study. Working Papers in Economics and Statistics, University of Innsbruck, vol. 2009-13, 2009.
- CHUNHACHINDA, P. – DANDAPANI, K. – HAMID, S. – PRAKASH, A. (1997): Portfolio Selection and Skewness: Evidence from International Stock Markets. Journal of Banking and Finance, vol. 21, 1997, pp. 143–167.
- FAMA, E. (1971). Risk, Return, and Equilibrium. Journal of Political Economy, vol. 79, 1971, no. 1, pp. 30–55.
- FAMA, E. – ROLL, R. (1968): Some Properties of Symmetric Stable Distributions. Journal of the American Statistical Association, vol. 63, 1968, pp. 817–836.
- FERNANDES, A. – MACHADO-SANTOS, C. (2002): Evaluation of Investment Strategies with Options. International Journal of Business and Economics, vol. 2, 2002, no. 1, pp. 282–293.
- FERNANDES, A. – MACHADO-SANTOS, C. (2005): Skewness in Financial Returns: Evidence from the Portuguese Stock Market. Finance a úvůr – Czech Journal of Economics and Finance, vol.55, 2005, no. 9-10, pp. 460–469.
- GUJARATI, D. (1995): Basic Econometrics. 3rd Edition. McGraw-Hill International Editions, New York, 1995.
- JEAN, W. (1971): The Extension of Portfolio Analysis to Three or More Parameters. Journal of Financial and Quantitative Analysis, vol. 6, 1971, no. 1, pp. 505–515.
- KANJI, G. (1995): 100 Statistical Tests. 1st Edition. SAGE Publications, London, 1995.
- KEARNEY, C., LYNCH, M. (2007): Are International Equity Markets Really Asymmetric? Applied Financial Economics, vol. 17, 2007, no. 5, pp. 399-411.
- KRAUS, A. – LITZENBERGER, R. (1976): Skewness Preference and the Valuation of Risky Assets. Journal of Finance, vol. 31, 1976, no. 4, pp. 1085–1100.

- KRAUS, A. – LITZENBERGER, R. (1983): On the Distributional Conditions for a Consumption-Oriented Three Moment CAPM. Journal of Finance, vol. 38, 1983, no. 5, pp. 1381–1391.
- LELAND, H. (1999): Beyond Mean-Variance: Performance Measurement in a Nonsymmetrical World. Financial Analyst Journal, vol. 55, 1999, no. 1, pp. 27–36.
- LEVY, H. – SARNAT, M. (1972): Investment and Portfolio Analysis. John Wiley & Sons Inc., New York, 1972.
- LINTNER, J. (1965): The Valuation of Risky Assets and the Selection of Risky Investments in Stock Portfolios and Capital Budgets. Review of Economics and Statistics, vol. 47, 1965, no. 1,pp. l3–37.
- LUCEY, B., TULLY, E., POTI, V. (2006): International Portfolio Formation, Skewness and the Role of Gold. Frontiers in Finance and Economics, vol. 3, 2006, no. 1, pp. 49-68.
- MARKOWITZ, H. (1952): Portfolio Selection. Journal of Finance, vol. 8, 1952, no. 1, pp. 77–91.
- MARKOWITZ, H. (1959): Portfolio Selection Efficient Diversification of Investments. John Wiley & Sons Inc., New York, 1959.
- MARKOWITZ, H. (1991): Foundations of Portfolio Theory. Journal of Finance, vol. 46, 1991, no. 2, pp. 469–477.
- PADUREANU A. (2011): Rational Option Pricing Theory's Feasibility Testing During the Current Financial Markets's Conditions. Case Study: American Index Options, Studii si Cercetari de Calcul Economic si Cibernetica Economica, vol. 45, 2011, nr. 1-2, pp.153-173.
- PEIRÓ, A. (1999): Skewness in Financial Returns. Journal of Banking and Finance, vol. 23, 1999, pp. 847–862.
- PEIRÓ, A. (2001): Skewness in Individual Stocks at Different Frequencies. IVIE working papers, 2001, Instituto Valenciano de Investigaciones Economicas, WP-EC 2001-07: V-1486-2001
- PRATT, J. (1964). Risk Aversion in the Small and in the Large. Econometrica, vol. 32, 1964, no. 1-2, pp. 122–136.
- RUBINSTEIN, M. (1973): The Fundamental Theorem of Parameter Preference Security Valuation. Journal of Financial and Quantitative Analysis, vol. 8, 1973, pp. 61–69.
- RUBINSTEIN, M. (1976): The Valuation of Uncertain Income Streams and the Pricing of Options. Bell Journal of Economics and Management Science, vol. 7, 1976, no. 2, pp. 407–425.
- SAMUELSON, P. (1970): The Fundamental Approximation of Theorem in Portfolio Analysis in Terms of Means, Variances and Higher Moments. Review of Economic Studies, vol. 37, 1970,pp. 537–542.
- SHARPE, W. (1966): Mutual Fund Performance. Journal of Business, vol. 39, 1966, no. 1, pp. 119–138.
- STRONG, N. (1992): Modelling Abnormal Returns: A Review Article. Journal of Business Finance and Accounting, vol. 19, 1992, no. 4, pp. 533–553.
- TSIANG, S. (1972): The Rationale of the Mean-Standard Deviation Analysis, Skewness Preference and the Demand for Money. American Economic Review, vol. 62, 1972, no. 3, pp. 341–360.
- TUDOR, C. (2004): Testarea puterii coeficientului de asimetrie ca sursa de risc la Bursa de Valori Bucuresti. EIRP Proceedings, vol 3, 2008, pp. 536-543.

CONSIDERATIONS CONCERNING ACCOUNTING INFORMATION AND ACCOUNTING DECISIONS AND THEIR IMPLICATIONS IN BUSINESS MANAGEMENT

ANDREEA PAULA DUMITRU[*]

Abstract
The accountants need to make choices to recognize, evaluate and classify business transactions for assuring true and fair value of information. In this paper, we try to classify these choises so that called accounting decisions. Also we try to view them in an informational perspective knowing the importance that accounting information has in the process of making business decisions.

Keywords*: accounting decisions, accounting information, business management.*

Introduction

Many professional writers that define accounting as technology science argue that accounting information, they predominantly due to the specific number, is placed within the perimeter of objectivity and accuracy.

It is known that accounting information as a starting point are two different sources and uneven in terms of quality.

Thus, the following transactions carried out from various markets are seen in the emergence during the financial year. They are largely the result of estimates and reflect the accounting policies of the enterprise management.

Even when there are seemingly strict rules, professional accountant can do to make ordering choises to describe the facts, of a margin of fredoom that lead to a subjective interpretation of them.

Economic decision-maker needs information coming from the external environment and internal environment of the enterprise.

Accounting information is essential in making economic decisions by management factors.

Accounting performs a data processing transactions and economic events held in the firm providing financial information (if the form of a monetary valued information), non financial (if expressed quantitatively) and/or accounting (if it has undergone a process of specific data processing accounting).

In their concern to provide a true and fair view in order to help decision makers, professional accountants reasoning applies (according to International Accounting Standards/Financial Reporting), taking decisions on the use of another treatment or to make a good information.

In this context, in this paper, we will try to outline a possible answer to these questions:

1. Use accounting information in accounting decisons?
2. Accounting decision is an economic decision?
3. Accounting decision is an operating decision, an investment decision, or a financing decision?

[*] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Economic Sciences, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: queenye04@yahoo.com).

Importance of professional reasoning – a skill summum

In their concern to provide a true and fair view in order to help decision makers, professional accountants reasoning applies (according to International Accounting Standards/Financial Reporting), taking decisions on the use of another treatment or to make a good information.

Accounting is not an exact science for obtaining relevant information requires making judgments for each case - shows a business associate of the French audit firm.

Financial Accounting provides financial information to external users. Is and why it is called so. It should be noted however, that it applied accounting treatment of the data represented by economic events in order to provide financial information.

Economic decisions concerning the optimal functioning of the company so long term and short term.

Financial decisions relate to financial instruments are financial risks for the enterprise or speculative purposes. They occur under the conditions of capital markets where the price negotiated equity investors offered securities of companies that listed on the stock market.

The major role of management accounting is to produce information that allows modeling of the relationship between resources deployed and consumed and results in return; in an optical forecast, management accounting help decision makers, and a retrospective measure optical performance[1].

Managerial accounting provides accounting decision-maker in the spotlight. He must deal with planning and budgeting, performance evaluation and cost control so that the overall objectives of the company can be reached.

Lack of standardization in the field of management accounting provides accounting in abiguous situations where you must prove velleities the decider. Furthermore, by applying the International Accounting Standards, accountants must use professional reasoning in finding problems, evaluation and classification.

In accordance with International Accounting Standards, in case there is no relevant accounting standard, enterprise management develop accounting policies in accordance with "General preparation and presentation of financial statements" and ensure that "financial statements provide information showing true results and financial position of the company, reflecting the economic reality of events and transactions, not just their legal form, are unbiased and prudent and has all significant material[2].

If in special circumstances, compliance with accounting standards do not meet the requirement to present a true, enterprises management will deviate from these requirements as necessary to present a true. In this case, the company must submit in the notes, the provisions from which deviations were made, the nature of misconduct, considered improper accounting treatment, the treatment adopted, and the financial impact of these deviations.

The main areas in which management accounting estimates and judgments are important is: tangible and intangible assets, financial investments, provisions for assets, long-term contracts, determining provisions and contingent liabilities, segment reporting.

Accounting decisions and their adoption results in business management

Accounting management of the enterprise lies in its administration regulatory compliance with accounting data so that decisions and actions of the company to respect the fundamental objective of the true and fair value.

---

[1] Bouquin H. – Comptabilité de gestion, translation and introductory study – professor N.Tabară, Publishing TipoMoldova, Iaşi, 2004, pp.65

[2] Bogdan V. – Harmonisation of international accounting, Economic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004, pp.404

The objective of financial statements is to provide information about financial position, performance and changes in financial positionm performance and changes in financial position of the enterprise, which are useful to a broad scope of users in making economic decisions[3].

Often the leaders pursuing the objectives of enterprise management, the accounting will be tempted to make a subjective choice[4]:

1. The reduction result: by extracting depreciation and provisions for risks and charges; by extracting overheads; the undervaluation of stocks;

2. The increase in earnings: by estimating from a lack of provisions for impairment; by generating a profit from a financial leasing operations; the abandoument of claims within a group; by estimate asset value as a result of mergers between companies; incorporating the financial costs of the acquisition cost of an asset or a stock; the failure to update a term debt and interest without generating.

So far we have tried to emphasize that the accounting work is not limited to the registration of a company acts in the economic and technical knowledge does not require registration in accounts skills decider they do not make books in a management team member. Robert Kaplan says the team that creates value for an organization is one in which accountants are involved and that they should participate in formulating and implementing strategies in an organization.

Identify activities that are decisions to be made carefully, because not every activity performed by an accountant involves a decision.

These decisions consist of choosing from a set of possible alternatives.

Research in the field of accounting decisions are not many studies on the role although there are numerous accounting and information provided by it in decision making.

In the field of management research organization well known are those relating to economic decision.

In the field of accounting decisions proves significant with reconsidering the accounting officer responsabilities and powers in the chief financial officer. This was not an accident but was caused by the adoptation of Romanian companies in the management structures of capitalist organization. This feature of the proffesional accountant and business leaders namely dress specific to certain types of managerial responsabilities.

Chief financial officer is responsible for managing the organization, compliance directives dealing with senior management control and effective management of organizational resources.

Management is planning, organization, coordination and control. Being chief is in our opinion, not only to drive and we belive that in the financial accounting function to perform all the attributes of enterprise management. Thus we speak of enterprise accounting management. Presence of several options in a country's accounting referential that fact and the presence of several reference in the accounting system of a country or difficulties resulting from international comparisons, diversity in accounting policies and estimation techniques can create a state of anarchy with serious consequences for decision making.

When asked if there is only one true account?

The answer is definitely negative although that can be answered, however, each accounting provides economic and social life protagonist in truth it needs[5].

Economic event analysis reveals practical problems of quantification enterprise: problem finding, problem assessment and classification problem.

---

[3] IASB – Framework, paragraph 12

[4] Popescu A.F. – Methods and techniques of reconciling the differences between accounting and taxation in the application of International Accounting Standards, Congress of the accounting profession in Romania – "Harmonisation or convergence in the International Accounting Standards", Bucharest, 2006

[5] Pop A. – Romanian financial accounting harmonised with EU Accounting Directives and International Accounting Standards, Publisher Intelcredo, Deva, 2002, pp.15

These three issues are now based on almost any major decisions in the field of financial accounting and application of accounting policies.

Thus, these decisions can be listed asset management activity represented by assets, stocks and cash: choosing a method of depreciation of property, choosing a method of evaluation of goodwill, inventory selection system, the choice of assessment methods outflows of stocks, assessing claims based on certain valuation bases, the problem in assessing the fair value of assets, the revaluation for assets using historical cost to register.

Decisions in business debt management: debt evaluation according to certain bases of assessment, classification and distinction in debt, contingent liabilities or provisions as appropriate, the classification of leasing operations, classification of financial instruments that assess their accounting and financial assets or liabilities, credit risk problem in assessing the fair value of financial instruments, hedge accounting issues related to credit risk arising from the use of derivatives, tax management.

Decisions in business enterprise capital management sizing issue and redemption premiums, subsidies for investment management, classification of financial instruments in debt and equity elements.

Table 1

Accounting decisions and their adoption results in business management

Scope	Name	Detail	Result
Financial Accounting	Observation Evaluation Classification	Decisions related to professional reasoning in making management accounting firm heritage	Presentation of financial information used by these external users in financing and investment decisions.
Management Accounting	Make or buy Capital expenditure policy and management Award costs of products and services	Decisions related to performance management (balanced scorecard, dash boards) and monitoring budgets to achieve the planned levels	Disclosure by the management company for planning, control and decision making (especially those operating work-related).

Internal Management

Reveal internal management issues: performance evaluation, planning and budgeting (track to achieve planned levels by budgeting), cost allocation methods used for products and services, forecasts, assess each area of responsibility within a company, determining the causes of deviations and taking the necessary measures, budgeting capital expenditures, such decisions to produce or buy, decisions on special orders, capital expenditure policy and management, maintain control over production costs (continuous comparison of costs with revenues expected proceeds from the sale of products), inventory control structure, (there are enough goods products, raw materials and products in progress to meet future demand), critical point analysis.

Decisions management accounting for assets, liabilities and equity are taken by the chief financial officer with other accountants in the financial accounting department, on the basis of financial accounting information, economic environment, the existing norms and standards in the field and analysis based on information held, provide appropriate solutions.

Note that all these decisions are not subject to approval by the general manager, they have adopted or approved by the chief financial and information resulting from the adoption of such decisions in the company's information flow is materialized in the accounting system output and active input, debt or equity.

Supporting documents for the information represented by these accounting decisions are economic manager decisions.

For internal management, decisions are taken by the chief financial support of management accountants performers, based on information relating to costs or activities provides cost management solutions, performance evaluation and for budgeting and planning.

Conclusions

The first question asked in this approach is:

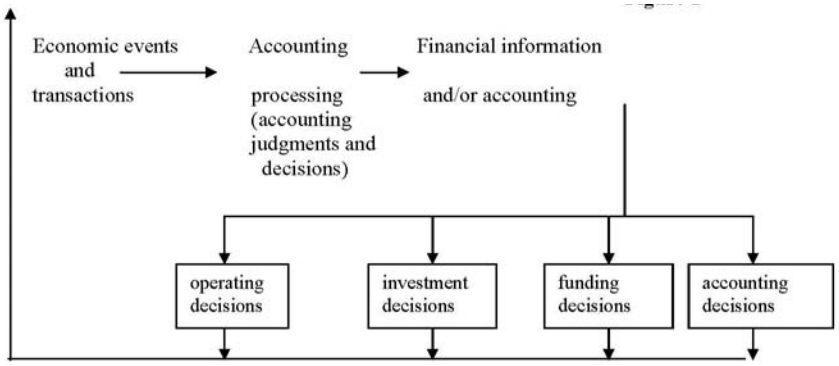
1. Use accounting information in accounting decisions?

Accounting decisons makes a primary data processing system provided by transactions and economic events.

Our opinion is that the accounting information used in decisions related to management accounting (decisions make or buy) sizing budgets, performance evaluation of managers).

In the following figure we present the link between accounting information and accounting decisions.

Figure 1



A second question that arises is:

2. Accounting decision is an economic decision?

Accounting decison is an economic decision to the extent that it takes place in a company and is related to its economic life. But accounting decisions related to management activities specifically, accounting is known as a science of business maangement.

Going concern is an accounting principle and a goal for management.

The third question that arises is:

3. Accounting decision is an operating decision, an investment decision, or a financing decision?

Cycles of economic activity of the company are divided into: investment cycles, cycles of operation and funding cycles.

In their accounting decisions are provide information relevant internal and external users.

In conclusions, the decision is specific accounting of all business cycles of the enterprise.

What does this mean for users of financial accounting information ?

Users of financial accounting information is ussually in a paperless environment, a system needs to offer the conditions for satisfying its decision. In fact, based on information and knowledge are making a decision. Translated in accounting, decision making based on accounting information and knowledge are carrying.

Current systems for automatic data processing transactions are focused on transactions (namely the supporting document).

It is enough for an accountant to get that operate with a supporting document in the accounting and recording solution is offered by computer application.

In this context, it is proven that an accountant apply knowledge, reasoning and even make decisions in accounting problems, we belive that under International Financial Reporting Standards implementation, IT applications should include more opportunities for analyzing information to help makers.

References

- Bogdan V., (2003), Harmonisation of international accounting, Economic Publishing House, Bucharest, pp.65;
- Bouquin H., (2004), Comptabilité de gestion, translation and introductory study – professor N.Tabară, Publishing TipoMoldova, Iaşi, pp.404;
- International Financial Reporting Standards issued by the International Accounting Standards Board (IASB), CECCAR Publishing (2010), paragraph 12;
- Pop A., (2002) , Romanian financial accounting harmonised with EU Accounting Directives and International Accounting Standards, Publisher Intelcredo, Deva, pp.15;
- Popescu A.F., (2006), Methods and techniques of reconciling the differences between accounting and taxation in the application of International Accounting Standards, Congress of the accounting profession in Romania – "Harmonisation or convergence in the International Accounting Standards", Bucharest, 14-15 september
- Minister of Finance Order nr.3055/2009 for approval of Accounting Regulations in accordance with European directives, published in the Official Gazette, nr.766/10.11.2009.

FISCAL POLICY AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN THE CURRENT FINANCIAL CRISIS

VALENTIN SAVA*
MANUELA-VIOLETA TUREATCĂ

Abstract
Fiscal policies in the current era are the sovereign right of states to collect and administer taxes on national territory. In this respect, the European Union, which is an association of independent states, did not created an European tax - although many politicians proposing it - and within the Union is found important differences between the tax systems of member states.
Due to historical and national different traditions, the EU member states have heterogeneous tax systems and revenue sharing systems because of different conceptions of public policies relative to the role of state in social and economic respective community's life.
The financing of public spending is usually considered the main function of taxation. In the original tradition following Locke[1], property protection is the main functions of the state. As a result, the tax must correspond to the services rendered, that is to say, to pay the State for the protection of the rights it provides. Here we are at the origin of the doctrine of the benefit that there should be equivalence between the utility derived by the citizens of public services they consume and the "price" they pay tax.

Keywords*: direct and indirect tax, fiscal revenues, public expenditures, redistribution, incentives, macroeconomic development.*

Introduction

With the development of state functions, justified by the need to counterpart market failures or to ensure the harmonious development of industrial capitalism, government spending increased, particularly spending on infrastructure and education, and demanding an extension of the role of the tax.

Redistribution aims to redress inequalities in income and wealth distribution. It may take a monetary or non-monetary form. Traditionally, there are two dimensions of redistribution. Horizontal redistribution operates transfers that are not motivated by the income hierarchy. It is therefore either transactions between households in the same stratum of income or operations based on criteria other than income. Social protection responds mostly to this type of problem because it aims to make transfers of resources for the benefit of people at social risk: sickness, maternity, family, etc.

The vertical redistribution takes into account the income hierarchy and seeks to reduce inequalities. In this context, the objective of fiscal redistribution is the narrowing of the income spectrum and its preferred instrument is the progressive income tax. It is said that a tax is progressive when the average tax rate is growing faster than income, which means that the elasticity of the tax yield is greater than 1. It follows that escalation can be understood as a positive deviation from a levy proportional to income. In fact, escalation can be analyzed as the structure of a sample, that is to say the distribution of a monetary unit as tax among taxpayers classified according to their position in the income range, while redistributive effects measure the magnitude of changes introduced by the levy in the income distribution. Given a primary distribution of income, the magnitude of these

*Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Economics, "George Barițiu" University, Brasov, Romania, (email: sava_valentin1@yahoo.com).
Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Economics, "George Barițiu" University, Brasov, Romania, (email: manu_vio_10@yahoo.com).
[1] John Locke (1632-1704) a British philosopher.

distributional effects depends on both the degree of progressively and average tax rate, that is to say, the bulk of revenue actually collected. In other words, the variation of inequality resulting from a sample can be expressed as the product of its progressiveness by the average tax rate.

Fiscal policy as the main component of macroeconomic policies to stimulate development

The problem of economic policy coordination occurs at two levels: national budgetary policies among themselves and that of their interaction with monetary policy.

In the first case, the need for coordination is a function of the magnitude and meaning of externalities they generate on the partners. Fiscal policy, since it involves a significant investment, can have two effects on the activity. It exerts a positive externality in the sense that it increases the demand partners, but also a negative externality by higher interest rates of the entire economic area concerned. If the benefits outweigh, the non-coordination of fiscal policies will lead to overly restrictive policies. If the negative effects take over, fiscal policies are too expansionary; since national governments underestimate the actual cost to the Union conducted a fiscal stimulus at national level.

As for monetary policy, the policy mix in Europe is possible only when policies are coordinated between Central Bank and European Commission or European Parliament. Then it is to have equal means and an even consistency in objectives between monetary and fiscal policies. But the monetary policy of the Union is not managed according to the particular situation of a state, but depending on the situation of all states. It would therefore be natural to develop a degree of European federalism for fiscal policy in addition to the current centralized policy monetary.

In the European context, it seems - at first glance - that functions to stabilize the economy should be met by the European Union than by its Member States. As for the prerogatives of government, they remain in the distribution of goods and services where consumption is located. In this regard, the provision of public goods corresponds to the respective preference given in terms of cost of facilities, ability to pay and demands for public goods. To do this, this activity should not be centralized at the European level, except for public goods whose provision would be relevant at the federal level.

Moreover, in the economic literature, it seems to be equivalence between politic and institutional federalism and the coordination of economic policies.

The coordination of economic policies can open a very wide range of possibilities, from the simplest coordination where states are happy to inform each other of their national policies to centralize the most important. The main quality of this coordination should be the speed of adaptation and its freedom of action. This coordination also needs to have a relative independence vis-à-vis the electoral and administrative machinery that characterize inter-governments. This is extremely important since it is relevant to the implementation of the policy of the European Union, it is equally important for the design of its financial resources.

Economic and financial crisis, together with fiscal policies adopted by governments had a major impact on tax revenues. It should be noted that even using the same methods of data recording, the major's legislative changes and economic situation had a major impact on tax revenues.

Governments have limited leeway to conduct their fiscal policy. Various constraints such as economic, cultural or institutional can indeed intervene, reducing the ability of fiscal policy to achieve its objectives, or limiting its scope. The tax can also cause unwanted effects, which in turn affect the economic mechanisms.

To control the macroeconomic balance, to ensure the growth and to move towards full employment, there are usually centered on policies to support the application for or recovery of the economy, policies favoring the offer, those more restrictive, favorable for savings and / or seeking to improve business competitiveness.

According to Keynesian analysis, the positive impact of the fiscal policy on economic growth and employment is the result of the multiplier. However, for Keynesians, an increase in public spending is not equivalent to a reduction in revenue. Indeed, the budget expenditure multiplier is greater than the tax multiplier due to slower reaction times of individual incomes and therefore consumption, changes in taxation.

For their part, offer's economists does not believe in the effectiveness of the multiplier and criticize what they call "damage of Keynesianism", in particular the misallocation of productive capacity in the economy that would be generated distortions caused by the tax and public spending. That is why they argue that lower taxes are the instrument of public spending cuts which would result in a revival of investment and activity to eventually fill the deficits.

It must also take into account the counter-cyclical effect of most public activities, including taxation. These activities have certain inertia about the economy and act as automatic stabilizers. In particular, the tax burden and particularly the tax on personal income increases during booms and fall during recessions. The variations are even more important that the samples exhibit a progressive profile. In this regard, Robert Solow[2] argues that tax policies addressing escalation charges call into question the ability of budgets to mitigate the impact of spontaneous economic shocks.

The tax burden characterized indeed by their dual nature, legal and economic. This power is expressed in the tax law that revolves around a set of rules, whose combination determines the extent of contributions and tax policy changes in order to give concrete form to the options which it precedes. From an economic perspective, tax exempt purchasing power to private so that it alters the income distribution, influences the overall activity and affects behavior. It follows that if the tax part of the state functions, it does not fit directly to the type of Musgrave.

As regards fiscal policy, it should be considered the potentially disruptive effects of mobility of factors of production - material resources, skilled labor and capital - in the Union, so that national economic policies in an attempt to gain unilateral advantages by applying a low taxation does not lead to reallocation of business, that could strongly negatively affect other Member States.

At the same time, States supporting the application of a lower tax burden and restriction, at least for certain taxes, tax harmonization, motivate their choices by the need to stimulate the national economy and monitoring of public debt, which has become lately a major problem for all countries, whether developed or developing. This imperative is even more pronounced in the EU Member States, as these economies are economies with a high degree of openness, exhibited competitive pressure and the Union as a whole, must develop and implement effective fiscal policy, being able to challenges posed by sovereign debt crisis in several Member States.

Taxation is the heart of relationship between citizens and the state. Therefore, not only government experts and academics, but also ordinary citizens addressed their questions on the taxation of their country and the European Union, European community we belong to and how the member states are compared with each other.

In this respect, the Stability and Growth Pact[3] provides a fiscal strategy at Community level to reconcile the two trends, following the meeting the need for balanced development of the Union and [2] Robert Solow (2002) "Can we use fiscal policy? Is it desirable?" Revue de l'OFCE, No. 83, pp. 7-24.

[3] Stability and Growth Pact (SGP) is a regulatory framework for the coordination of national fiscal policies in economic and monetary union, which includes a preventive component and an arm.

The preventive

Under the provisions of the preventive arm, Member States must submit annually stability programs (convergence) to show how they intend to perform or ensure stable medium-term fiscal positions, taking into account the impact it will have imminent population aging on the budget . These programs are evaluated by the Commission and Council issues an opinion on each of them. Preventive component includes two policy instruments that can be used to avoid deficits "excessive".

protect the interests of Member States in terms of growth potential in the very competitive Community environment.

The consequences of opening the economy[4] to the economic system, mainly commercial on the tax-budget system are numerous, with both direct but especially indirectly impact. In all Member States of the European Union, the openness of the economy - measured as a share of the total volume of foreign trade volume of trade - is high, as the first pillar of the European constitution was even free movement of goods.

According to Ramsey's[5] theory, that levies taxes to be effective - that is, to achieve its goal with acceptable expense - tax bases should be as stable and large amounts, so collected revenues to be less sensitive to tax rate changes. In fact, the American Arthur Laffer showed that a steady rise in marginal tax rate leads, over a certain limit, to a decrease in tax revenues.

Between taxation principles it is found that of equity, which makes the tax system to be optimal when applied to all taxpayers and the marginal rates of taxation are regressive, allowing positive marginal utility of labor factor. Also, it appears that the entity is paying tax effective support and tax pressing exercises, mainly on the less elastic foundations.

Openness of the economy reveals a major difference in tax bases according to their degree of mobility, because of a number of factors that are potentially incompatible. Thus, the mobility factor increases with the openness of the economy, and when they tend to migrate - such as the labor in an economy with low performance, adversely affecting remuneration - tax levies volume decreases, with negative implications for both public sector financial balance - reordering deficit and also increased borrowing - and the private sector, which will be supported to a lesser extent by active economic policy, namely through public spending the internal's economic redistribution.

In the same vein, it should be noted that the most mobile elements: employees with the highest degree of professional qualification, the most modern businesses and high processing capacity, etc., contribute the most, due to their higher pay.

Of equal importance in building an efficient tax system is the share of social contributions of enterprises, because they affect the cost of labor factor with direct influence on management decisions on the duality of labor / capital productivity, thus affecting the inclination of technical and technological modernization.

Economic and financial crisis currently facing the vast majority of EU states to reveal all aspects on which public policies have to lean very closely, referring mainly to the competitiveness

---

Based on a proposal from the Commission, the Council may initiate an early warning procedure to prevent an excessive deficit. Through early warning system, the Commission may recommend a Member State to respect the Stability and Growth Pact obligations.

Corrective component

Preventive arm of the Pact governing the excessive deficit procedure (EDP). This is triggered when the deficit exceeds the 3% of GDP in the Treaty. If it concludes that the deficit is excessive for the purposes of the Treaty, the Council shall issue recommendations to the Member States concerned to correct the excessive deficit and set a deadline for it. Failure initiation recommendations leads to the following stages of the procedure, including the possibility of sanctioning euro area Member States.

Long-term sustainability of public finances

Since the aging European population as people live longer and have fewer children, EU Member States face the challenge of ensuring long term sustainability of public finances, given the impact this phenomenon will have on the budget. To meet this challenge and given the strong focus on long-term viability Pact revised version in 2005, are designed joint long-term budget forecasts in the EU and assess and monitor the situation of individual Member States. Complete analysis can be found in the report on viability. Long-term sustainability of public finances is taken into account when assessing stability and convergence programs.

(Source: http://ec.europa.eu/economy_finance/sgp/index_ro.htm)

[4] The concept of an open economy designate the intensity of trade in goods and services of a state with a foreign State.

[5] Frank Ramsey, British mathematician, theorist of the determinism and hazard in a system.

and alleviate imbalances between states, without losing to the Union's position in the global economy.

Thus, the recession has had a clear impact on revenue already in 2008, not only for income taxes (usually very sensitive to growth), but also consumption taxes, which are usually expected to be somewhat more resistant to a downturn, in particular consumption tax revenue, fell more than the volume of consumption itself. However, in 2008, the effect of the crisis was felt strongly on the expenditure side than on the revenue side, probably because of the adoption of spending programs in order to prevent the impact of the crisis. In all main tax measures, both tax increases and tax cuts were introduced in the last two years, often in the same country and sometimes even within the same tax. This is because in the early stages of the crisis, almost all governments have placed greater emphasis on supporting economic activity, but in a later stage of strengthening. Another explanation is that governments often use the reforms as an opportunity to make some needed "maintenance" of the tax system, the introduction of tax incentives at the same time as new features are introduced. Changes in statutory tax rate, as a tax measure, given their high visibility and the fact that they affect a greater number of taxpayers, would normally have a stronger impact on agents' expectations, but usually costs more (in budgetary terms, if the rate reduction, and politically, if growth rate) measures aimed at the tax base, such as the introduction of exemptions.

Given the wide diversity of characteristics tax levy in each country, comparing them is difficult to be taken, and the total compulsory levies collected by the tax authorities, even expressed in the same currency per capita, taking into account purchasing power, have very different values.

To overcome these shortcomings and to make comparative analysis of the states tax being pressed, the used statistical information[6] reveal an indicator known as the tax burden rate or level of taxation, which is defined as the ratio of receipts to mandatory sampling data reported in Gross Domestic Product (GDP), considered the most synthetic macroeconomic indicator.

$$Tax\ burdon\ rate = \frac{Tax\ revenues}{GDP}$$

This indicator is relatively simple and easy to determine, based on information provided by national tax statistics and, therefore, is considered the most common synthetic indicator between macroeconomic indicators on tax and social levies. Accordingly, tax levy rate allows comparative analysis of fiscal policies implemented in different countries of the world, but details of the tax burden analysis must take into account not only tax plus compulsory social contributions, but also the volume of public expenditure dedicated funding social services, which are consistent for each individual state, social policies involved in a greater or lesser extent, public authorities in the community.

Evolution and significance of the tax burden rate is dependent on several factors:

- The level and size variations of GDP. Being located in the denominator of the above function, it is noted that, with the assumption about a constant volume of tax revenues at a constant, any decrease in GDP is reflected in an increase in tax burden, and vice versa, any GDP growth determines a decrease in that pressure. In reality, changes in economic performance are combined with public finances and underground economy size, which is quite difficulty sized, and which, however, influence in many ways the GDP, should be considered when fiscal policy is developed and / or start a significant reform in this area.

- The role of public sector - size and involvement in community life - influence of a decisive manner the tax levy. But there are significant nuances from one country to another, mainly because

[6] Information sources are diverse, but the most used are those provided by economic institutions and / or financial international vocation: OECD, IMF and World Bank, Eurostat, European Central Bank and others, plus information provided by governments national tax. (Sources: Agnes Benassy-Quere, Martine Carré-Tallon, Matthieu Crozet - A competitive tax system in a competitive world, Report for the Council Levies Obligatory CEPII, October 2009)

the public social institutions role: insurance and assistance in several areas such as health, old age pensions, education for all ages, disadvantaged persons protection, etc. join organizations within public / private partnership or even those services are assumed by the private sector, as determined by the national legal framework that stimulate this involvement;

- The degree of intervention of public central authorities, which is another indicator, measured by the rate of tax levies namely the so-called degree of tax net, which takes into account the primary budget deficit[7]. Thus, if, in successive fiscal years, the state register important budget deficits and, to cover its, have recourse to new loans, tax burden rate, calculated according to the formula above, is less than the share of spending in GDP, because expenditures include the cost of debt (interest and fees). In fact and vice versa is true: if a state was indebted in previous years tax levy rate may be greater share of public expenditure so that it would be possible to cover financial debt.

- Ways of intervention of central public authorities. The State has various means of intervention in the economy, which affects, according to their use, the rate of tax burden. Thus, if a State considers certain socio-economic circumstances, can act providing various types of subsidies, can reform the tax system to achieve objectives similar to those that can be achieved through public spending, etc. If we exclude the possibility of resorting to deficit increase, providing new subsidies to the businesses produce, inevitably, increase the tax burden to finance these subsidies. On the contrary, if the equivalent benefits are allocated through measures on taxes, the tax burden rate will be reduced accordingly;

- Redistributive effect. In calculating the rate of tax burden are taken into account only gross levies, which are redistributed to taxpayers aside amounts through various programs and social protection. In this respect it should be emphasized that in determining the rate of tax burden does not take account of public funds to finance public goods and services provided by the state and established by mandatory contributions. Exclusion counterpart does difficult, if even not conclusive, the comparison of tax systems of states, because sampling required is a direct cost figures, while the expenditures cost advantages, particularly those with social value may be quite vague. Redistributive impact can be significant, especially in countries where public sector is important and whether the central government implements active policies of redistribution;

- Distribution of tax burden and tax structure used. Rate tax burden does not consider the weight of various types of taxes and, at the same time, the typology of individuals and / or legal entity to legal regulations of a fiscal nature. In this way, can not be determined by analyzing this ratio, fiscal pressure on individuals or corporations, but the indicator can be used with good results to analyze the impact of fiscal policy on public finances national concerned.

Despite its widespread use, the concept of tax and therefore the fiscal burden suffer from several shortcomings that affect its use. While the tax burden analysis, considered as the sum of taxes can detect a higher tax rate for a given country, the indicator does not provide relevant information on social services made by public authorities, which have to be closely correlated with the amount of contributions social. However, the tax rate is a useful indicator for international comparisons and analysis of fiscal developments, coupled with public spending.

Evolution of the share of different taxes in the democratic states that have implemented tax systems adapted to the activity-based competition is different from country to country, but it can distinguish common trends that occurred in most of them, considering a period of time relative prolonged.

---

7 Primary budget deficit is calculated by subtracting from gross deficit (budgetary revenues - budgetary expenses) payment of amounts of public borrowing costs in fiscal year at the national level.

$$\text{Primary budget deficit} = \text{Fiscal deficit} - \text{Public debt cost}$$

Primary deficit is a sign for net borrowing requirement, i.e. the amount to be obtained from outside sources to cover the total budget expenditures, from it been extract the cost of previous loans.

Evolution of fiscal taxes in OECD countries

	1965	1975	1985	1995	2000	2008
Total	100	100	100	100	100	100
Personal income tax	26	30	30	27	25	25
Corporate tax	9	8	8	8	10	10
Social security contributions, of which:	18	22	22	25	24	25
- The employee part	(6)	(7)	(7)	(9)	(9)	(9)
- - The employer part	(10)	(14)	(13)	(14)	(14)	(14)
Taxes on property	8	6	5	6	6	5
General tax on consumption	12	13	16	19	19	20
Specific taxes on consumption	24	18	16	13	12	10
Other taxes and taxes	2	2	2	3	3	3

Sources : OECD Fiscal Statistics 2010

It is observed relatively high share of social security contributions, given that most democratic countries have adopted and implemented policies to protect the population, particularly the vulnerable one, because low income or due to aging, health, the adverse economic circumstances that involves an increase in unemployment, etc.

Also, a generalized tendency in all OECD member states is to increase general consumption tax, represented in most of them by the value added tax, which was adopted as neutral tax on the consumption of goods and services throughout the entire European Union and the other countries outside the Union.

In the EU there is a wide variety of tax systems, with reference both to the tax base and tax rates and administration procedures, particularly after the accession of ten and then two new states in 2004 and 2007. Also, compared with the major developed countries in the world, the European Union presents a higher tax generated and the need to finance public expenditure system covering a wide range of public services.

In the EU, tax levies evolution marks specific fluctuations, especially if we consider heterogeneous composition in terms of macroeconomic development, of the Member States in the last decade, when the Union was enlarged by the accession of another 12 new states.

Government revenues evolution in European Union
- % in GDP -

No.	Types of revenues	Year
		2000	2008	2009	2010
1=2+6+7+8 +9	Total revenues, of which:	45.4	44.6	44.0	44.0
2=3+4+5	Fiscal taxes, of which:	27.3	26.6	25.5	25.6
3	- indirect taxes	13.4	13.1	12.9	13.2
4	- direct taxes	13.7	13.1	12.3	12.2
5	- per capita taxes	0.2	0.4	0.3	0.2
6	Social contributions	13.9	13.6	14.1	13.9
7	Other current revenues	1.8	1.9	1.9	1.8
8	Capital revenues	0.2	0.2	0.1	0.2

Sources: "eurostat. Statistical books. Government finance statistics. Summery tables – 1/2011. data 1996-2010. 2011 edition.

As a general trend, it is observed the decrease of the tax burden exercised by all taxes and fees (25.6% in 2010 compared with 27.3% ten years ago, in 2000, as a percentage of GDP), the causes can be grouped into two broad categories:

- EU enlargement, the new Member States applying in the most part, a lower tax burden, since the policy of stimulating economic development is the Keynesian type;

- After 2008, the first year that it is felt strongly the financial crisis and subsequent economic crisis, all European countries have tried to implement fiscal policy instruments and / or budget to maintain macroeconomic balance and avoid skidding sovereign debt.

The distinction between receipts from direct and indirect taxes is empirical, but for a depth analysis of taxation and, especially, to implement a policy to achieve the main objective of stimulating economic stabilization, this distinction is essential, because the way that taxes affect the taxpayer concerned, first and second, but perhaps even more important, the entire economic and social life varies according to their typology.

Direct tax burden for individuals consists of income taxes (wages, property rights, rights of use of property disposal, income from self-employment and income from independent activities, income from capital, etc.) and circulation of wealth or property, which is, the rule in most states, imposed by local authorities. These tax obligations that are entirely without direct counterpart, compulsory social security contributions are added to individual task in general when it performs dependent work.

Direct business taxation consists of taxes placed on the benefits they obtained during the fiscal year, as well as obligations of the employer's social contributions costs for staff, plus taxes on heritage buildings, land, vehicles, etc., that is, as with individuals, local taxes.

The tax burden both on individuals and legal entities is much higher than that of indirect taxes as their bearer is the final consumer.

The overall progressivity determination of tax systems is difficult and imprecise. In most states applying progressive taxation, i.e. increasing taxes as the tax base increases, it is specific for personal income tax, unlike all other taxes or fees that apply proportional tax - which means single percentage calculated for the tax base - or specific tax, i.e. sampling is a fixed amount per unit of physical measures.

Undoubtedly, personal income tax makes the tax customization. Through fiscal measures which take into account family situation and applying a progressive tax scale, progressive tax burden can be adapted according to economic and social situation of the taxpayer. Most developed countries, where the middle class population, which has medium to high income, has the largest share in total population, was traditionally applied, progressive personal income tax, including as a measure of respect equity and social solidarity.

In recent times, however, tax reforms implemented in developed countries, especially after the '80s, when public intervention had to nuance and to adapt to new challenges of globalization and the rapid expansion of information society, the general trend was reduction in personal income tax share of total public revenues and increased indirect taxation, especially as the current period is characterized as increased consumer society, even though currently mitigated the effect of financial crisis.

Income taxation of individual's revenues from any sources presents a relative diversity in the European Union but Member States can be grouped into two categories that have similar characteristics:

- Member States with a higher development level, applying a direct tax on personal income in progressive installments proportionate share, with a high marginal quota, so that people with higher incomes to contribute more to the financing of public services through budgetary allocations. I.e. there are in this situation, the European Union: Germany, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Spain,

Finland, France, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal, United Kingdom, Sweden, etc. Some of these states exempt an annual amount, above which sits a tax on income and other income differential rates of pay than that: dividends, interest and income immigrant entrepreneurs or rich persons who are subject to lower tax pressure – as in Belgium, Netherlands and others;

- Member States that have recently integrated in the European Union and implements structural reforms in many sectors, trying to induce and stimulate sustainable economic growth. They shall apply to mail tax systems axis, emphasizing indirect taxation to collect most of the public revenues, which, although it is inevitable, even if they have the highest revenue neutral to individuals and businesses. Most Member States in this second category imposes a personal income flat, relatively lowered, trying to stimulate savings and thus increase capital available for investment financing. Examples: Lithuania, Romania, Slovakia, Czech Republic etc.).

Taxation of benefits / corporate income also shows a great variety in European Union Member States, both in terms of tax rates and the methodology for determining the tax base are correlated with economic policy conducted by national public authorities in the field of real economy. It could be notice in this respect several features that distinguish each member:

- Countries where the rate of profitability of domestic firms is large, practice a higher tax on profits, but also more exemptions / deductions to stimulate activities considered of national interest. For example, in Belgium, the standard rate is 33.99% with application of special deductions for interest earned by companies and scientific research exemptions of benefits affected. At the same time, Belgium practice a decreased quota at 24.98% on profits applied to the benefits achieved by SMEs to support their financial solvency.

Spain used an advantageous tax regime applies to companies for research and development, extension work, training, SMEs. Luxembourg, a tiny state, but very attractive for equity investments, exempts from tax all financial companies. Some Member States use differentiated rates - tax sliced-depending on the business benefits gained from the current activity: France (331 / 3% and 15%), Hungary (19% and 10%), Ireland (12.5, 10% up to 25%), Netherlands (29% to 34%), United Kingdom (19% to 32.7%);

- New Member States shall, in general, tax rates proportionately lower profit, but such an approach is found in countries with very high level of development, such as, for example, Switzerland.

Indirect taxation must respect freedom of movement of labor, location and movement of services, capital movements, as in equal situations, tax discrimination are prohibited through the effect of the provisions of the European Community Treaty. In the European Union, taxation falls within the provisions of the EU Treaty, which prohibits any discrimination on the domestic market, limiting tax incentives to the export and also obliging Member States to eliminate double taxation within the European Community international bilateral tax conventions.

At the same time, the tax system of each Member State has to respect freedom of movement of persons, mainly those who exercise a profession, the organizational entities that provide services and movement of capital, so that similar situations, tax discrimination are prohibited.

Tax harmonization within the European Union does not mean putting value added tax similar in all Member States, but only on the construction regulations trim identical VAT rates applied may vary as follows:

- The standard rate from 15% minimum and 25% maximum. Currently, VAT rates used in Europe have increased: from 15% in Cyprus and Luxembourg, 25% in Denmark and Sweden, the European Union and Switzerland from 8% to 25% in Norway, outside the European stars Europe;

- reduced tax rates, two or even three, applied to products and / or services that public authorities consider important to the life and / or the country's economic development. Examples of reduced rates are multiple: three reduced rates used in Luxembourg - the country with the highest average level of income / capita; in Denmark, which does not use any reduced rate and standard rate, mentioned above, the maximum of 25 %, although it should be noted that the Danish living standards are among the largest in Europe and even in the world. On the other hand, in countries where the income / capita is above the EU27 average, even more than the EU15 average, applied to food and general products of interest - for example children's clothing - much reduced rate, which makes the weighted average tax rate of VAT to be much lower than in poorer countries. Examples are numerous: Great Britain, which apply a zero rate for food products and many other products and services, Germany 7% on food; France 5.5% for food, etc.

Conclusions

European fiscal strategy[8] has become a necessity in the current situation, marked by financial and economic crisis, but to develop and implement such a strategy is necessary to overcome, through the adhesion of the majority of Member States' populations, a large number of obstacles refers to compulsory levies that produce adverse behavior, the budget deficits that still remain and a number of other situations, different and difficult to monitor and handle. In general, the above issues adversely affect the growth potential of the European Union, considered in its whole, which requires measures to be applied to most mobile economic factors, namely the production, capital and labor the best qualified.

The eexperience about harmonization of consumption taxes, namely the indirect tax: value added tax and excise duties, and implementing the common commercial policy, which eliminated the clearance of goods crossing the national borders of Member States, leads to the thought of achieving a Community tax bases covering primarily to a tax professional, taking into account the free movement of persons, which is perceived as the main pillar of the European Union. The main feature of a common European tax system aims to combine a wider tax base and lower rates. Fiscal and budgetary convergence between Member States involves the need to reduce public debt, while reducing budget deficits, which can not be achieved without a monitor, even a reduction in general government spending. Without, however, affect national policy autonomy to influence productivity regions. In addition, the proposed strategy should influence national decision to choose a social system or another, but at the same time, consider European competitiveness across the EU. In this respect, it should be noted that the Stability and Growth Pact, which was based on a number of options at national level related to their autonomy, proved ineffective. The danger of bankruptcy that faced with several European countries in 2010 and 2011 threatens even the existence and the functioning of the euro zone. To support the Union, was created European Financial Stability Fund, which has been allocated significant sums to support financial integration and monetary union.

Fiscal incentives to manipulate the behavior of economic agents play an increasingly important role in tax policy. The fiscal intervention is performed, so massive, very long time, but it was mostly an economic and social vocation. In recent years the tax incentives are increasingly used to discourage harmful activities and promote activities socially valued positively.

